Mr. TALLMADGE said that it did appear to him that the nation was placed in such a position that it became imperiously the duty of this Committee to decide some very important question relative to the embargo. I am sorry, said he, that the gentleman who introduced the resolution (Mr. NICHOLAS) is unable to attend, from indisposition, and to maintain and defend the principles of his resolution; and I am glad that the resolution is so worded as to admit of a division as to the two great questions of a continuance of the embargo and a commencement of hostilities, so that they may be distinctly presented to the minds of the members of this House. I am very free to declare as to the first question, which is the only one now pending, that my mind is completely made up; and although I should rather fill the blank for the time of its repeal with the word "immediately," yet I am perfectly willing to meet gentlemen who wish for the longest period, on the middle ground, and fix on the fourth of March for its repeal. I do conceive it to be a duty highly incumbent on this Committee to decide this question emphatically and at once; and there are several reasons which I will offer to the House, which have induced me to form this opinion. The first reason is a respect for ourselves and for the Government of the United States. What will be the opinion of our constituents, when they see resolutions offered to repeal the embargo, postponed from day to day, without obtaining a decision on them; and, after that, when they see a resolution offered for repealing the embargo, annexed to which is a proposition tantamount to a declaration of war? I am afraid that the people will think either that we do not understand the business for which we came here, or that our conduct amounts to direct trifling. I am, therefore, for deciding the question abstractedly whether we will repeal the embargo or not. When that question is once decided, the people will know what to depend upon. When, sir, I review the present condition of this country I feel alarmed. We all must read the public papers and know the events now daily occurring, some of which cannot have escaped your observation. Into one of the Northern States (Vermont) the President sent his proclamation in April last, making it known that combinations were forming, and an insurrection about to take place, and calling upon all officers civil and military to aid in suppressing the same. The grand jury of one of the counties in that State have really made a presentment of it as a grievance, although the proclamation has not been specially named. This must be disagreeable to every gentleman on this floor, and is one of the evils which I wish to remedy. To me it appears to be a serious circumstance that the measures of the Government should be thus treated, and it is a state of things which I would take all proper measures to avoid. Another circumstance I will mention: Since the passage of the last supplementary embargo law, the Governor of the State of Rhode Island directed some of the military officers to call out a portion of the military force. Several companies were accordingly called out, and when they came upon the ground they determined that they would not obey the instructions of a revenue officer. They did not refuse to obey their own officers, but they said they knew no such officer over them as a revenue officer. This is another disagreeable circumstance, and I am very unwilling to see the laws in such a situation that either civil or military officers shall refuse to execute them with impunity. In another State, the large and respectable State of Massachusetts, the citizens, where they have felt the effects of the last embargo law bearing hard upon them, have resorted to the law of the State under which they live to obtain redress. The consequence is, sir, that your revenue officers are, from the nature of the case, unable to execute your laws. Such heavy bonds are required of them by the State courts, that they cannot readily procure them, and must decline the execution of the law or go to prison. This is another evil which I am anxious to see remedied, and therefore I do not wish a law of the United States to remain in this situation.

I have another reason which induces me to urge a speedy decision. I wish to see an end put to all speculations arising out of the laws or proceedings of this Government? What will be the effect of the resolution on the table? I will venture to predict that the price of articles proper for export will be raised ten, twenty, or even fifty per cent., under a belief that the embargo will be raised. What will be the effect of postponing the repeal until the period proposed? That speculation will be prolonged, and I wish to see an end to it.

I have another reason, sir: I feel unwilling that the dignity of this nation should be prostrated in the view of foreign Governments. We seem to be resolving and re-resolving without doing anything, until we become indeed the laughing-stock of the European world. I wish to see the Government respected at home and abroad. For these reasons I am for filling the blank with the earliest period, but am willing to compound with gentlemen, and take the fourth of March as a middle day.

Mr. SOUTHARD commenced his observations by referring to the sad spectacle which the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TALLMADGE) who had preceded him had given of the state of the nation, which, if true, must cast an everlasting stigma upon this country, which had been boasted of for its independence and forbearance. Obedience to the laws was characteristic of a good citizen, and to this principle he believed it was always safe to appeal first. Now had this been so strongly evinced as was desirable to the northward? It was true that there were a number of petitions on the table for the repeal of the embargo laws, but there was very little evidence that they waited for the desirable redress. If he was not much misinformed, very great pains had been taken in the New England States to sour and irritate the minds of the inhabitants against the embargo system of laws, particularly by gentlemen of the law; and circular letters had been sent from town to town to inflame the people on a subject with which they were perhaps but too little acquainted of the real causes for which the restrictions were laid on commerce, having been concealed from them as much as possible.

The proposition now under consideration is very important indeed. The subject to which it relates has produced more agitation in the nation, and occasioned more debate and discussion in this House, than any subject I have ever seen brought before the National Legislature since I have had the honor of a seat in it. It has always been an unpleasant and disagreeable subject to act upon, and a hard and difficult question for me to decide, and therefore I have generally given what is called a silent vote. I have voted in favor of the embargo with reluctance; but the measure was imperiously called for by the situation of our country, and the disposition of the belligerent nations of Europe. I voted for it on three accounts: First, to secure the property of the United States; against the depredations of the rulers of the ocean. Necessity seemed to impose those restraints upon us, even though they were irksome; but however irksome, they ought to be preferred to the prostration of our national rights and interest to the decrees of the belligerents. Secondly, I voted for it as the best measure which I could perceive our Government had in its power to preserve peace, and to use against those nations who had deprived other nations as well as ours of their property, their rights, and their Government. From such nations I wish to withdraw as much as possible all connexion, lest they might injure us as they have all others that have been connected with them. Thirdly, I thought that by such a disseverment our manufactures might be the more encouraged, and thus our true independence be rendered more firm. This advantage I considered of great importance, and such circumstances, if no other, might promote the growth of so desirable an object, without which we can never be said to be truly independent.

Mr. S. expressed himself decidedly a friend to commerce, but at the same time did not believe that the existence of the country depended, as had been said, solely upon commerce. He would venture to say, that if this country would maintain its independence, in fact as well as in name, it must resort to manufactures. This doctrine would by some be considered as treason against England, and importing merchants; but it was nevertheless true. We cannot, said he, have a stronger evidence of this fact, and of the necessity of encouraging our own manufactures, than by a circumstance which took place about two years since. The President of the United States had entered into a contract with a person for a supply of thirty thousand stand of arms, which were to be shipped from Holland. The Emperor of France, being informed of this contract, immediately prevented the shipment of the arms. We were disappointed—but this proved to be a fortunate circumstance. The Government was convinced of the necessity of manufacturing in our own country this important article. I hold it to be a correct principle, that this country should manufacture for itself every necessary of life. The bowels of the earth are full of riches, and the face of the country abounds with every raw material, sufficient not only for the necessaries, but also for the luxuries of life.

The seed is sown—the germ is already sprung. By means of the embargo we shall reap a permanent good. Many infant manufactories are already established throughout the country, and are rapidly progressing to perfection. Another great advantage will arise by inducing domestic industry. Families will provide themselves with the necessaries and conveniences of life, which heretofore they have procured at a great expense, and which manufactures he believed would render the country more independent of foreign nations than anything else which could be devised.

Mr. S. had some faint hope that the embargo would have operated as a coercive measure upon the belligerents. But in this hope he was in some measure disappointed, because either the law was not observed, or not enforced. He solemnly believed that the law would have answered every valuable purpose for which it was intended, if it had been obeyed. He blamed members of this House, as well as other persons, for the long continuance of this measure. There have been written, not only during the last, but also during the present session, seditious and inflammatory letters, calculated and intended to excite the people to rise in opposition to the law; and, at the same time giving encouragement to the belligerents to continue their destructive measures towards us.

He was persuaded that, if members had acted as good citizens, the embargo laws would have been repealed six months after their passage. Mr. S. believed that, various as were the views and calculations of gentlemen who advocated, or voted for the embargo, and of the effects which it would produce on ourselves, and upon the Powers against whose injustice and avarice it was intended to guard us, no man of sense, he was confident, ever believed the measure was intended to be permanent; but only as a temporary and precautionary means, whereby to save our property and seamen from the depredations of those Powers whose only rule of right is the extent of their power, and who regard neither the laws of justice, nor of nations. The doctrine of necessity, which they so strenuously advocate, to which no bounds can be prescribed, is plead by them to justify the greatest enormities.

Notwithstanding all that had been said and written against the embargo, Mr. S. did not regret that he gave his vote in its favor. It had produced much good; it had saved to the country an immense amount of property; and, so far, it had preserved us from war. The principal difference of opinion in that House appeared to be in this, whether the blank should be filled with the first day of June, or fourth day of March next. He was in favor of the latter day, and was ready to join a majority of the House in such other measures as should better secure and maintain the honor and independence of the country.

The opponents of the embargo have told the House a great deal of the unparalleled sufferings which this measure has produced. Can this be a correct representation of facts? No, sir, it cannot be. The ruin and distress which gentlemen say this measure has inflicted upon the people of the Eastern States, has again and again been depicted by them, in such strong and glowing colors that all the sufferings of the Revolutionary war, all the sufferings of our impressed seamen on board British ships of war, from the year 1794 to the present day, have been lost, and swallowed up in this ideal mass of misery. And, sir, it is only ideal, when contrasted with the sufferings endured during a seven years' war; or, the sufferings of our impressed seamen, groaning under the lash of a tyrant, who has deprived them of liberty, and of every comfort of life. Our slaves are infinitely better circumstanced than these men. I would ask what has become of the spirit of sympathy which appeared to actuate gentlemen who used to describe the real sufferings of our seamen in such impassioned language? We were then told that every wave and wind that crossed the Atlantic, wafted the groans of our fellow-citizens into the bosom of their native country. Their tongues are now mute, or employed only to traduce the Government.

There are members on this floor, said Mr. S., who have seen more real suffering in one day, than what could possibly be produced by the restriction on trade since the passage of the law so much complained of. For one, I have seen towns and villages wrapped in flames; the country desolated; helpless women and children turned out of their houses by the near approach of a cruel and vindictive enemy—and fleeing for their lives, destitute of every comfort; men slaughtered in defence of their natural rights, property, and families; and yet, we are to believe, that a partial privation of a few of the luxuries of life, is more ruinous and destructive than all the calamities of war. The whole blame which our situation produces is thrown on our Government, while all the injuries which we have sustained from foreign nations, are covered under a mass of prejudice against the Administration. The injustice of one of one of the belligerents is either wholly overlooked, or palliated, while every supposed error of our Government is exaggerated. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) calls for a free trade. "Give to us," said he, "a right to the ocean." Why does he demand of this House a free commerce? Let him turn to the orders and decrees, and see whether it can be obtained. But, these destructive measures of the belligerents are considered by some members as mere trifles—innocent things—growing out of mere necessity. However innocent and harmless some gentlemen may consider these orders and decrees, the belligerents consider them as very ruinous to neutral commerce. Mr. S. referred to the letter from Champagny to Mr. Armstrong, and read a paragraph from the letter of Mr. Erskine to Mr. Madison, of the 12th March, 1807, in the following words: "But, though this right of retaliation would unquestionably accrue to His Majesty, yet His Majesty is unwilling, except in the last extremity, to have recourse to measures which must prove so distressing to all nations not engaged in the war with France."

Mr. S. lamented that members of Congress, to whom were confided the best and dearest interests of the country, were found palliating the impositions of foreign Powers, that they might thereby inflict the deeper wounds on their own Government. Restore, said the gentleman from New York, the confidence of the people in their Government. Mr. S. despaired of so desirable an object ever being accomplished whilst there were in the national councils men leagued with the British Cabinet, and hiring printers laboring with all their might to detach the people from the Government. This, sir, is no new thing, said he. Look back for more than seven years and you will find a systematic opposition against the Administration. With them, nothing is right; everything is wrong; every act of consequence has been denounced; great pains taken in various parts of the Union to stir up the people to opposition; the laws represented as unconstitutional, cruel, and oppressive.

The same gentleman from New York, now declares against war, and paints its horrors in the most glowing colors. I also, said Mr. S., deprecate war. Let not him that putteth on the harness boast, but him that taketh it off. It is not long since that gentleman told this House and the nation, "that the salvation of this country depended on war"—"Ally yourself with England and declare war against France." Sir, for one, I differ with that gentleman. Ally yourself with either of these Powers and on the day you sign such alliance, you sign the death-warrant of the liberties of this country. It would be infinitely better to fight these Powers single handed than to be allied with either; because when you had fought by yourself, you may negotiate by yourself and make peace without asking leave of your ally. What has become, asked Mr. S., of all those nations who have allied themselves with Great Britain, or been subsidized by her? British gold has corrupted and ruined almost all the nations of Europe. She has destroyed their commerce, and France has deprived them of their liberty.

The gentleman from New York regretted that hard words should have been used by the majority, calculated to wound the feelings of the minority. Can the gentleman imagine that the majority have no feelings—the Government no sensibility? Who first began to use hard words and opprobrious language, but the minority? Let me, said Mr. S., remind those gentlemen of an old adage—let those who live in glass houses beware how they throw stones. In order to relieve this country from its present embarrassments, we are called upon to retrace our steps, to turn back to the policy of a former administration, and undo all we have done. Sir, should the gentleman himself take a sober review of the measures pursued and the cruel and unjust policy adopted in those happy days of which he speaks, the recollection of the actual situation of our country might cause a blush—but I forbear to pursue so disagreeable a subject. It was said that there ought to be more time given in order to favor negotiation. If it was probable that by that day they could be effected by negotiation, it would be best to take the most distant day; but I believe there is but little prospect at present of our differences being settled by treaty. Be that as it may, as soon as you pass the resolution now on your table, the embargo laws will cease to have any effect on foreign nations, and will only operate to the injury of our citizens. If the embargo laws are to be repealed, so as to take effect either in March or June, the earliest day will be the best. It will afford sufficient time to the honest and virtuous citizen, who has obeyed your laws, to be ready to take advantage of foreign markets as soon as the man whose cupidity has induced him to prepare to violate every sacred obligation which he owes to society.

Mr. S. said that under existing circumstances he had but very little hope or expectation that much advantage would be derived from commerce, and he feared some men might be base enough to pay tribute, or sail under British license. Perhaps, sir, said he, I may be too much prejudiced against such license and protection, owing to what took place, somewhat of a similar nature, during the Revolutionary war with Great Britain. Was there an instance of a man who went voluntarily into the enemies' lines and took his Majesty's protection, who has not proved an injury to his country? The man who, for the sake of gain, would pay tribute to a foreign Government, ought forever to lose the protection of his own.

He thought it his duty to make these observations in vindication of his own conduct in voting for the embargo law, and also in support of the Government, against which the tongue of calumny had been so long aimed. If these laws are repealed, he hoped and trusted that others would be substituted in their stead better calculated to maintain the independence of the United States.

With respect to a resort to war as a remedy for the evils experienced at present, Mr. S. would only observe that war was in itself so great an evil that the United States had wisely considered peace and an honest neutrality as the best foundation of their general policy. It was not for him to say, under what degree of aggravated injuries and sufferings, a departure from such policy would become a duty. The most pacific nation on earth might find itself compelled to exchange for the calamities of war, the greater distresses of longer forbearance. Should imperious circumstances require the United States to enter into war to defend and maintain their liberties, Mr. S. pledged his life that his fellow-citizens of New Jersey would cheerfully rally round the standard of their Government, and, as in 1776, rather see their hills and their plains smoking with the blood of her sons, than tamely submit to the dictates of France, or degradingly pay tribute to England.

Mr. UPHAM said a few words expressive of astonishment that the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. SOUTHARD) should have taken exception at the statement of facts made by his colleague (Mr. TALLMADGE) in relation to the execution of the embargo laws, and the impression which they produced in some parts of the country. So far from producing irritation in the House, Mr. U. conceived it to be the bounden duty of every man who knew of such facts to state them to the House. He was surprised that gentlemen should object to hearing facts.

Mr. DURELL said, although in forming an opinion upon the subject more immediately under discussion, it may not be necessary to go over the whole field of argument, in relation to the great questions of war or embargo, yet there is such a connexion between these subjects and the question of filling the blank in the resolution upon your table, that I must beg the indulgence of the Committee while I enter into such a view of the case as seems to be necessary, in order to understand the precise point of the question before us.

The resolution upon your table proposes a repeal of the embargo, and hostilities against Great Britain and France. There appears to be a strong sentiment in favor of the first proposition, viz: a repeal of the embargo. And if the sentiment in favor of war is not so strong, it is not for the want of provocation—this, God knows, we have in abundance—but because war would be putting too much at hazard, and at best, would be assuming a new and positive evil, for no better reason than to get rid of an old one, although of a negative and very doubtful quality. To exchange the embargo for war would (to indulge in the homely style of our forefathers) be but stepping out of the frying-pan into the fire. However, sir, if war is to be substituted for the embargo, and is to begin where that ends, then in filling the blank upon your table, the question, instead of being, when shall the embargo be raised? should be, when shall hostilities be commenced? The former, considered singly, and unconnected with the latter, would be of very little moment—in settling it we should merely take into view the convenience of our merchants in the several seaports in the Union; but in considering the latter we should exclusively calculate upon the convenience of the State. The precise time for removing the embargo, in this case, is merged in that when it would be most proper to commence hostilities. The one may be done at almost any time without much hazard, but the other requires great deliberation, and should not be adventured upon too precipitately—surely not till we are prepared for it. If then war must begin where embargo ends, the question is not when shall embargo end, but, when shall war begin.

There are two reasons why war should be postponed to the longest day that has been mentioned; first that we might be the better prepared to meet it; and secondly, to give us further chance for negotiation.

Sir, we propose commencing hostilities against two of the most warlike and powerful nations the world has ever witnessed in arms. With no less than the master of the continent of Europe, and the mistress of the ocean. And are we prepared to meet the shock? I am aware it may be said—indeed, it already has been said—that a war with France would be merely nominal. But, are your strong points fortified in a manner to resist the attacks, even of Britain, from the side of the ocean, with her thousand ships of war? Or are you exposed, from Maine to Georgia, not only to the thunder of her ships-of-the-line, but, even to the pitiless peltings of her vile picaroons?

Again. It is understood, sir, that despatches from your Government are on the point of sailing for your Ministers at Paris and London. It is also rumored, that a further attempt at adjustment is to be tried, by a new offer to negotiate; and, for my part, I have no objection to this ultimatum of experiment, this last appeal to interest, (for reason and justice are quite out of the question,) before there is an appeal to the sword. I should have said, "ultima ratio regum," for that, I think, sir, is the courtly phrase with politicians; and, although the success of this new overture will, probably, depend upon the mere chances of the war upon the Continent, yet, I am willing that the last chapter of accidents should be turned over leaf by leaf, so long as there is the chance of an issue in our favor. Thus much, I have thought it my duty to say, in favor of putting far away the evil day. But, if war is to commence so early as June, I must confess there are very strong reasons why it should begin at an earlier period.

Any measure we may adopt which will carry with it a repeal of the embargo, would, in a very great degree, relieve the public anxiety. The people have so long complained of restrictions imposed by the embargo, that, like one laboring under the hysterics, from an imaginary, they have fallen into a real disorder; from which, nothing will restore them but an entirely new course of regimen. And, whenever this new course should be administered, the body politic has so long labored under this disease that it would cheerfully submit to any other course the Government may choose to prescribe. I do not, myself, consider this as a very overwhelming argument, yet, when we reflect that ours is peculiarly a Government of the people, made by themselves, and for their sole use and benefit, and that we, their Representatives, have been selected by them to execute their will, it cannot be considered as a very weak one. On the whole, it appears to me that the very caprices of the people must sometimes be gratified, even at the expense of their interest. They appear very solicitous to barter away the embargo for something else, and, for one, I am for gratifying them, even if this something else were to be an immediate declaration of war.

Repeal of the Embargo.

H. OF R.

Again sir, if you go to war, your object, at least in part, is, indemnity for the past; and where is this to be found? Not entirely upon the ocean. It is true, you will harass and cut up the enemies' commerce; but, as this is to be done chiefly by privateers, the booty acquired will not belong to the Government, but to private individuals, whose valor has wrested it from the foe. This indemnity, then, must be sought, not upon the ocean, but upon the plains of Quebec, and at Halifax; in Canada, and Nova Scotia; in the fisheries of Newfoundland, and the rich soil and extensive forests bordering upon the lakes; and the St. Lawrence, whose ample waters are destined, one day, to waft the fruits of American enterprise and industry, from their very sources, to the ocean. If, then, Canada is to be attacked, your operations ought not to be delayed till June, because this would be giving the enemy time to fortify and intrench himself, as well as to receive reinforcements from Europe. The plan, sir, should be no sooner conceived than the blow should be struck, if you intend to conquer; but, if you intend to be foiled, and put to an unnecessary expense and delay, then take care to notify the world of your intentions; but be sure not to commence your operations till June, that the enemy may be on his guard.

Again, to delay hostilities till June, would protract the war at least a year, because it would then be too late to collect your army, march to Canada, make the necessary dispositions, conquer and garrison the country, and bring back the residue of your troops before the commencement of the inclement season. In this case you would be obliged to winter in the country, which, already desolated by the scourge of war, could afford you but very scanty supplies; and, if unsuccessful in the onset, you must either return to the States without effecting anything, or winter in the country, in the face of the enemy, under every disadvantage, both of shelter and climate.

On the whole, sir, if we must have war, between this and the first of June, and one of its objects is the conquest of Canada, it is high time we set ourselves about it in good earnest; and, in my opinion, the sooner the better.

Thus far, in considering this subject, I have supposed that war must necessarily and immediately follow a removal of the embargo. But, sir, there are many, very many, within these walls, and who belong to this Committee, who cannot persuade themselves that war must necessarily be substituted for embargo. And if a measure so distressing, even to the victorious, can be honorably avoided, who is there in this honorable Assembly who will raise his voice in favor of a state of things so disastrous, I might say fatal, to society as war? Here then, Mr. Chairman, a very important question presents itself. Can the embargo be raised, consistently with the national honor and interest, without the hard necessity of recurring to war as a substitute? Let us examine this question fairly, and with candor, for, of all others, it is of the first importance to this nation.

In the discussion of this part of the subject, I shall be obliged to indulge in a wider range than I at first had intended. In order, sir, to cure a disease, it is often necessary to know its origin and causes; combat and subdue the cause, and the effect ceases, of course. The first inquiry, then, should be, what were the causes which produced the embargo? To this question, sir, I answer, without the fear of contradiction from any man; the British Orders in Council of November 11, 1807, and the French decree of November, 1806, or rather the practice under it, which began about the time the British Orders first made their appearance. I am aware that the British Orders had not been officially notified to the American Government, at the moment of laying the embargo; but the substance of them had appeared in the newspapers, and were publicly read in this Hall, a day or two before the President's Message recommending that measure was sent to the House; and although we might not know the precise details of those orders at the time of passing the embargo law, yet we knew enough of them to be satisfied that they were intended to fatten the British navy upon the ruin and spoils of American commerce. The orders of Britain and the decrees of France, then, were the true causes of laying the embargo; and to these edicts the nation must not, cannot, submit. Sir, we, its Representatives, in behalf of the people, have already pledged ourselves that we will not submit. This, then, is an axiom, a first principle, that the orders of Britain and the decrees of France cannot, and will not, be acquiesced in.

The bearing of those edicts, in relation to the American commerce, being anticipated by the embargo, their deleterious effects have hitherto, in a great measure, been prevented. Our object, then, in selecting a substitute should be, to adopt such measures as will meet them full in the face, and thereby prevent them from operating injuriously in future. Raise your embargo, and the bearing of those edicts upon your commerce must be prospective, and if we are to content ourselves for the present with security for the future, it will be sufficient, if your substitute has a prospective bearing too, capable of resisting the orders and decrees henceforward, and of preventing them from operating injuriously in future.

War, sir, in order to be justifiable, is always retrospective as well as prospective in its objects; it seeks indemnity for the past, as well as security for the future; and however Governments may pretend they are justifiable in making an unprovoked attack, for the purpose of averting a distant, and of course uncertain evil, as was the case with Great Britain in her assault upon Denmark, yet I think no nation can be justified in commencing hostilities, unless those hostilities are grounded upon injuries already received, for which it is intended by the war to seek indemnity. Let us, for a moment, examine the ground we have already taken in relation to the orders and decrees.

In pursuance of a law of the last Congress, the President of the United States did, some time in the month of June, propose to the British Cabinet to suspend the embargo, as to them, on condition that the Orders in Council should be rescinded as to us. This proposition did not consider indemnity for the numerous injuries we have received at the hands of the British nation, as a sine qua non to a repeal of the embargo; but, on the contrary, it was a consent, on our part, to waive all considerations of indemnity for the past, until a season more propitious for negotiation should present itself, and to content ourselves with a bare removal of the Orders in Council, as a pledge both of security for the future, and indemnity for the past.

On this point, then, the Government seems to be committed, for its language has been, give us a pledge of security for the future, and we consent to waive indemnity for the past until a more favorable and propitious moment for negotiation. As this friendly proposition was rejected by the British Cabinet, I acknowledge we are under no obligation to it to pursue a course which would have the same result of that proposal, had it been acceded to by Great Britain; yet, if that proposition was wise, and we can attain the end proposed by it, without recurring to the dreadful calamities of war, it is unquestionably our interest and our duty to do so.

The grand consideration, then, is to find a substitute for the embargo, which will meet the future operations of the orders and decrees full in the face, and will either secure us against their effects, or reduce the belligerents to the necessity of becoming aggressors anew. Such a course must assuredly be preferable to direct hostilities, because it would give you a chance of avoiding hostilities altogether; and because, if hostilities must follow, you will throw upon your enemy the odium of being the aggressor. Sir, I would not be understood as insinuating that Great Britain and France are not already the aggressors, but I am looking forward to a state of things subsequent to a repeal of the embargo. If, then, we are willing to postpone a consideration of the past to a season better adapted to a friendly discussion of the points in difference, and to regulate their conduct solely with a view to the future, then, I say, if we should be so unfortunate as to come again into collision with the belligerents, it will be all-important to us, that we should throw upon them the odium of aggression. It is to this source alone we are to look for that spirit of union and manly resentment necessary to carry a Government like ours through a war successfully. It has been said, on a former occasion, that Kings go to war to gratify a favorite, or a mistress. This, thank God, is not the case with Republicans, who have no favorites but their country, nor mistresses but the laws. Republicans are rarely so intemperate as "to seek a quarrel in the cannon's mouth." They never go to war until the general sentiment, roused by some flagrant act of injustice against the State, demands it; and even then, if their resentment be suffered a little to cool, there is no way of bringing the public pulse back again to a war pitch but by new aggressions from the side of the enemy. We all know we have ample cause of war with Great Britain; and there was a time when the people of the United States, would, to a man, have dared every danger to meet it; but their resentments have been suffered to cool, and instead of making it a point of honor, they now consider it as a matter of deliberate calculation. If we have war, we all wish that war to be successful; but, in order to be successful, we must be united, and we shall not be united until we have received new indignities. But, it will be asked, What is this new course, this grand specific? I answer, to arm against the illegal and obnoxious orders and decrees of the belligerents. But, say gentlemen, will you arm against the British navy? Sir, I would arm against her tyrannical orders (not against her navy) for the purpose of bringing the subject fairly at issue. The project of arming against France no one will treat as chimerical; all sides of the House, and especially our friends in the opposition, suppose we are a full match for her upon the ocean. France, then, we may lay quite out of the reckoning. Thus, having happily got rid of France, we have only to contend with the navy of Britain; and how is this to be done? Sir, I have already observed that the object was not to fight the British navy, but to oppose the Orders in Council, and in such way as to bring their bearing upon our commerce fairly at issue. Let, then, your merchants arm in their own defence, and if they are suffered to proceed without molestation, (and verily, sir, I am almost ready to persuade myself they would be,) well; but, if they are captured and condemned, then we are at war; and, England being again the aggressor, the war will be popular. Either alternative would be preferable to the present state of things, and there could be no possibility of avoiding both of them. One or the other must be our condition immediately upon a removal of the embargo.

If, sir, I could persuade gentlemen to go with me in the belief that a state of things such as I have described would immediately follow removal of the embargo, no considerations could induce me to suppose they would hesitate for a moment to adopt the system I have proposed. A fear of having the reputation of abandoning a measure which had been unsuccessful could have no weight with the good sense and patriotism of this honorable body, if such an aspersion should be attempted; but as there could be no possibility of succeeding in the attempt, there can be no reason for alarm from that quarter. Let us examine this part of the subject a little more minutely, that we may not mistake its consequences.

If your merchants go out armed, and suffered to proceed to their ports of destination without being molested, we shall be perfectly secure both in point of interest and practical reputation, also; for who, in this case, would have the presumption to say, the embargo was not the cause of this security? Had not the embargo been laid, the edicts in question would not have been enforced, and your commerce would have been swept away. One hundred millions would have been sacrificed to glut the avarice of Britain or France. The embargo, then, will have saved this immense property to its rightful owners, and have given it a permanent security. But, sir, if your property should be arrested and condemned, what better evidence could you have of the importance of the embargo? This state of things would clearly demonstrate that it had not only saved your property from the devouring grasp of the belligerents, but had also hitherto preserved you from war. This state of things would also confute the arguments of our opponents, who have contended that there was no sort of danger in resuming the navigation of the high seas. All their logic upon this subject would be overthrown in an instant. The people would be satisfied that the Government was correct, and that themselves had been led into an error by the clamor of demagogues, and the sophistry of such as make a point of railing at every act of your Government. And what is more, sir, the spirit of impatience, too often manifested against the necessary restraints of the law, would give way to a just and fiery indignation against those freebooters who again had dared to rob you upon the common highway of nations.

Sir, we have been told by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) that the embargo being a measure of precaution, by letting out your merchants before you are prepared to protect them by war, would be counteracting the principle you had assumed. This opposition must have been predicated on the idea that the property over which the precaution had been exercised, belongs to the State. Indeed, it belongs to the nation, or rather to the individuals who compose it, and, in this point of view alone, has the Government a right, under the Constitution, to exercise this sort of protection over it; but even this ceases the moment the property is in safety. The Government, then, has done its duty; like a faithful monitor it has given the warning, after which the individual should be left to manage his own property agreeable to his own discretion, unless weighty reasons of State should induce the Government to control him. So that, as a precaution operating solely with a view of securing the property of individuals from sudden danger, the Government has nothing farther to do with it. Again, the same gentleman has told us, if you will raise the embargo, you would have war in less than six weeks. This, sir, would be bringing the thing to a point; it would unite the nation, and is precisely what we want.

These remarks, sir, have appeared to me to be pertinent to the subject before us. If, therefore, the principle of arming is to be adopted in filling the blank upon your table, we need not at all be governed by a consideration of war. All, then, that is necessary, is to consult the general convenience of our mercantile brethren. It will be recollected that some of our principal seaports are, at this moment, embargoed by the frost; such as Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Alexandria; and will probably remain so until the first of March. It would be unfair, then, to raise the embargo at a moment when the merchants of those cities could not find their way to the ocean. And, indeed, were it otherwise, some little time should be allowed in order that the citizens from one extremity of the Union to the other, might have an equal opportunity of finding a good market.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the fourth of March will be as generally accommodating as any other period that has been mentioned, and shall therefore vote for filling the blank with that day.

Mr. GHOLSON said, he considered the time at which the change of measures should take place to be equally important with the resolution itself. Not one month ago, said he, the House voted by a very audible and distinct majority that the embargo should be enforced and carried into effect, as the best policy to relieve the nation from the difficulties under which it labors. I have, therefore, felt a degree of surprise at hearing gentlemen who voted in the affirmative then, advocating now a sudden departure from the measure. Is not the consistency and dignity of the House involved in filling up the blank? Will the House of Representatives act like a parcel of school-boys? Determined to enforce the law, and then, without the happening of any circumstances to induce a change, suddenly depart from the measure they determine to enforce! Unless I was very much deceived, I heard all the friends of the present policy declare that their object was, that the measure should receive a fair experiment. If not, for what reason was the act for enforcing the embargo passed? For passing that act, Congress have been censured. The Federalists throughout the Union have denounced us for giving to custom-houses so much of what they call Legislative discretion. I ask them, again and again, was all this for nothing? If it is to be abdicated the fifteenth of this month, I do protest that the passage of the supplementary embargo law was a rash, hasty, and inconsiderate deed, unworthy of this Assembly. Whilst it was the opinion of most of the friends of the present system, and mine, distinctly expressed on a former occasion, that the embargo should have a fair trial; that it should be carried into execution, and that, for that purpose, the President should possess all the energies of the State; I wish it to be understood that I was not in favor of a protracted embargo, after the period should have arrived which would prove it to be inefficient, or after an act of even half justice to us. Let me ask, then, whether the first of June is more than a reasonable period? Will gentlemen say that five months' embargo (for, till the first of January it was little more than nominal, being daily violated) is more than a reasonable experiment? I humbly conceive not. A law has lately been passed requiring the National Councils to assemble on the fourth Monday in May. Now, upon a change of policy, (for it appears to be contemplated that we should have war of some kind; when a transition is made from a calm and pacific to a warlike attitude,) it will very possibly produce some convulsion that will render it necessary that Congress should be here. For what should Congress convene here, but to take advantage of circumstances as they may arise? I want not Congress to be here, if we are to take war on or before the fourth day of March. But, being in session, and a change of policy not taking place till after they meet, they will have it in their power to take advantage of any change in our relations. Another circumstance operates on my mind. If, as is generally expected, war must ensue a repeal of the embargo, I ask gentlemen whether we are at this time prepared for war? And I will refer the House to arguments already advanced on this subject. Have we an army already prepared? Would you expect to conduct a war with militia? On the contrary, are you certain that the militia are constitutionally qualified to embark in that kind of war in which we should, in all probability, be involved? It is a serious question, sir, whether the militia can be carried without the limits of the United States. There is another reason which weighs powerfully with me: it is a respect for the character of the Government itself. Your law has been wantonly and traitorously set at defiance. The hardy arm of rebellion has been raised against you. Amidst the feuds of the East, the law has been silent. I would sooner see the country spill its best blood, than I would yield to turbulence and faction the dominion of the law, and, with it, the very existence of your Government. Although my own constituents suffer as much as any other, they wait patiently under the laws which they partake in forming.

H. OF R.

Repeal of the Embargo.

What an example will it be for future times, if an inconsiderable portion of your citizens are permitted to rise in opposition to the laws which are fairly and constitutionally enacted? If measures the most important be put at defiance by factious individuals, goaded on by avarice or worse passions, your Constitution is not worth having. I have already remarked that I consider it necessary, for the sake of consistency, putting aside motives of policy, that the embargo should be protracted at least till June. There is another consideration which perhaps is more powerful than all. It has been well said on both sides of the House that ours is a peaceable nation; that for it we would sacrifice any other considerations, than those of national honor. I hope the time never will arrive when we sacrifice national character for peace. Although the Governments which have injured us have manifested little disposition to do us justice, I am willing, nay, I am anxious, whatever may be said of the cup of humiliation or of paper wars, to have another chance for the renewal of intercourse.

I have understood from the public prints that Government vessels are about to leave this country for France and Great Britain. If these nations are apprized that we are determined beyond a particular period no longer to endure their aggressions against us, that our forbearance will speedily have an end, they may give to their differences between us a more attentive consideration. Perhaps each may think it better to do justice than that we shall be added to the list of their enemies. I attempt not to say, sir, that I have any confidence that such will be the result; but as there is at least a hope of it, I am willing to protract this measure till the first of June, if a disposition to friendly accommodation among us may avail ourselves of it. I suppose some of us would have an objection to peace with Great Britain, although I view her as our grand, natural and determined enemy—if she will respect our neutrality, there is not much doubt as to the interest of the other nation; it will be their interest to do so.

Sir, I have heard many arguments advanced at different times by a gentleman from New York at which I have been astonished, particularly his apologizing for those who violate our law. He was told in debate that they could not consent to the present measure; that they could not endure it; that it could not be expected of them. When we hear language like this in this Hall, we are no longer astonished at circumstances which have occurred. Shall it be told to any portion of the people of the United States from this Hall, that the people will not consent to a law; that they will not endure it, and that it cannot be expected of them? If they cannot consent to one other inference but they may rebel. And is it not a doctrine which should be advocated by every one friendly to the Constitution, that every portion of the people ought to acquiesce in those rules of conduct in the enactment of which they have themselves participated? I should be very glad that gentlemen who hold and openly avow such doctrines, would reconsider their observations and if compatible with their ideas of propriety would hereafter abstain from such excitements. Upon a calm and dispassionate review of such expressions, gentlemen must, and I am sure will be sensible of their mischievous tendency, and I hope will cheerfully revoke them. But the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) has introduced the example of Virginia as standing out in opposition to the sedition act. Sir, there never was a more splendid and memorable triumph of law over public feeling than in the trial of Callender. There, where every one around the court execrated the law, we saw its authority supported. The statute said that what was published was illegal and seditious, and the judge declared the law to be Constitutional. What did the people of Virginia do? They saw one of their citizens go into a dungeon by virtue of an act which they deemed to be oppressive and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. They disdained to oppose the execution of a law Constitutionally passed, and declared by the judicial authority to be Constitutional.

Repeal of the Embargo.

H. O. R.

When the vote was taken upon the resolution of the Committee of Exterior Relations which said that we could not consistently with our national dignity submit to the edicts of the belligerents, and the gentleman from New York answered in the negative, I thought he believed it to be a truism, but because it was an abstract proposition voted against it. Now I know not what to think, because he has admonished the House, the embargo be repealed, not to bring on greater grievances. If we are to repeal the embargo and not to take any stronger measure, I beg of that honorable gentleman to point out what we are to do? If we take off the embargo and oppose nothing between us and taxation, we are to submit; and this doctrine tends to the most unequivocal and unconditional submission; and so far as gentlemen contend for the repeal of the embargo unconditionally, and the adoption of no other measure, do we hear downright and base submission advocated on this floor. I do not say that gentlemen mean to submit; but to me it is as clear as day, that the doctrine leads to a downright submission.

When the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. VAN DYKE) entered into a prolix review of the conduct of the Executive for the last five years, I did expect that the Chairman would have called him to order; but such a latitude has been throughout the session tolerated in discussion, that in future we shall scarcely expect any gentleman on any subject to be called to order. Sir, it would only require a very concise examination of the gentleman's doctrine to demonstrate most clearly that to admit his conclusions he must admit premises which the people of the United States will never consent. You must in fact admit the British doctrines of impressments itself. He says that in January, 1804, the project of a treaty was transmitted from the Department of State to the Commissioner of the United States in London; that, although it was known to the American Government that the principle of impressment would never be abandoned, yet subsequently, in 1777, the same concession from Great Britain was insisted on as a sine qua non in negotiation. Now, the gentleman and I are at issue as to the principle. If we had not a right at any time to say the principle that Great Britain may impress American seamen when she pleases, the gentleman may be correct. [Mr. VAN DYKE said he had spoken only of the impressment of British men.] Mr. G. observed, that as he conceived the subject to have no relation to the question before the House, he would not persist in the discussion of it; but that, take it as the gentleman insisted, his argument was founded altogether on our surrender on our part of the right of impressment to Great Britain. A right which the American people will never recognize.

Mr. DANA rose with a view that his vote might not be misunderstood, that he might not be supposed in voting for repealing the embargo on the first part of the proposition, to pledge himself as to any other measure. The only pledge for him, then, to give as a member of the House, was the fact, that a public trust was committed to him by freemen; and in executing the trust according to his best judgment, his mind should be left free as the air, with respect to any ulterior question. This however he was ready to say—if the alternatives presented to the House were to be only those stated in the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations—national occlusion, or national submission, or national war with the belligerent world, he was for neither of them. It was enough for him then, to say, that he did not agree to either of those propositions.

With respect to the general idea of going to war, I have had some doubts at least whether we should go to war very soon with France and Great Britain; for if it be difficult to fight one of those Powers, it must be peculiarly difficult to fight them both. Before we go to war, I have been of opinion that those charged with the affairs of the nation, or at least some of the leaders, must make one discovery. It is this—before we go to war we should be prepared for it. To go to war before being prepared for it would not become us as officers of the public, although an ardor of zeal even without preparation might be well enough for mere recruits. Before going to war, a number of things might be convenient for waging it to advantage; such as a military chest, because it is necessary to have some money, as well for the pay of troops as for various other expenditures, known to be requisite for the advantageous conduct of a war. Men, too, may be wanted. In case of undertaking an expedition to Halifax, I have thought that it might be proper to consider whether we should go by land or by water. If by water, I have rather supposed that we should not go in gunboats. If by land, I have been disposed to consider the distance, and to estimate how many leagues of forest in the province of New Brunswick would intervene, which have not been traversed by any considerable body of men, or in which a horse-track or foot-path could scarcely be found.

In travelling with an army, it might be proper to consider how long a time it would require to make a road through such a forest, and whether it was not probable that all the men who might be employed in cutting it would be cut to pieces before they could cut through the road. Baggage, and some provisions, too, must be transported; for, really, soldiers are such beings that they cannot live without eating. And I have been disposed to inquire, in case of undertaking to march through that province a military force, with baggage, provisions, military stores, wagons, field artillery, and battering cannon, what length of time would be requisite for an army of the best spirit, under commanders of the greatest talents, to accomplish it? Canada has also been mentioned; but the season for striking a blow there has certainly passed away during the embargo. The spirit of hostility which existed between the Northern parts of the nation and Canada is diminished. The boundary line is imaginary, passed daily by those who are in the habit of performing offices of friendship towards each other, or of transacting business; and thus the spirit of hostility is allayed. And, however once the inhabitants of Canada might have wished to be under the Government of the United States, that wish has ceased. For, however much we may extol the protection of the embargo, those who a year since perhaps were friendly to you, would now not accept your protection. For, whilst they pay but small or no taxes there, and enjoy various privileges of freemen, they will not take your taxes, and receive no privilege with them. If you were to go to war now, you would find that the zeal of the inhabitants of the United States, as to marching into Canada, is very much diminished. And, sir, when we come to consider the subject, the idea of marching to attack a foreign territory is not congenial with the habits of this country. How much would the invasion of Canada cost you? You would want an operating army of at least 25,000 well-disciplined men. Are you ready to appropriate ten millions of dollars for raising and supporting troops? With respect to marching the militia into Canada, you might order them, but I do not believe they will go, because I do not believe that the militia can be constitutionally required to march beyond the frontier. I do not believe that you can make a law requiring the march. For such reasons, among others, I think that you will not soon go to war; especially as you cannot seriously think of going to war merely for the sake of fighting, when there is no prospect of success. When you talk about going to war without any systematic plan, it is to be regarded as merely theroetic.

On the question of enforcing the statutes of embargo, I shall not enter into a particular examination of the subject; but I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) that if there be a rebellion against the laws, you ought to crush it. If you know of the existence of rebellion, put it down, or you are unworthy to hold the reins of empire. If you do not put it down, cease to call it rebellion. Take either alternative. What has been the doctrine of every Administration? That insurrection should be put down, if necessary, by arms. Was it not on the anniversary of the battle of Lexington, on the 19th April, 1808, that the President of the United States issued his Proclamation for quelling an insurrection near Lake Champlain? This, to be sure, was so small an insurrection or commotion that it was not seen by any one on the spot. Congress was then in session, and no information on the subject was laid before us. Indeed, I believe the Proclamation only states a probability of an insurrection. Now, it has been stated on the floor of Congress that there is rebellion in the land. And here, let me ask, what was intended or predicted by advocates of the embargo, as to the effects on a foreign country? Was it not this: that it would produce such effects, relative to some of the foreign Powers, as to cause insurrections against Government, and thus compel an accession to your terms? The policy of your embargo was a policy of insurrection. And are you disposed to say that the bitter chalice of trouble, which was prepared for a foreign Government, is already commended to the lips of our own Administration? Are they even now drinking the ingredients which they had compounded for others?

Gentlemen should, in some degree, be cautious as to the language which they use on this floor. When animadversions are here made upon the people for want of patriotism, do such reproaches become this House? Can the history of the world exhibit the example of a free and active people bearing so long, and with so much patience, measures which affect them so severely—which produce so much suffering? And are we so little acquainted with human nature, that we expect our acts of Government to be enforced by patriotism alone?

In a population of six million of whites, are there to be none but patriots? More especially when many men in the country have but recently come into it. Do you expect all the people, without any exception, to be patriots? Do your Constitution and laws suppose this? If so, for what cause is the Executive Magistrate authorized to display the sword? No, sir; they have not been weak enough to trust to patriotism alone; they were more wise. Some persons may have felt indifference with respect to the policy of embargo; and some from principle, whatever they might think of the policy, would abstain from violating it. Some may have evaded it with impunity, while they were urged by the pressure of want on the one hand, and by the hope of profit on the other. Have you trusted to patriotism altogether? Wherefore, then, have your statutes been passed with such rigorous punishments? You might trust to the patriotism of a majority of the community; you might trust to the sentiments of the great mass of men who are interested in maintaining the rights of property, person, and character. But you may always expect there will be some bad men who will evade or violate the laws, although clearly Constitutional; and those you should calculate to put down.

Some questions, however, have arisen in relation to this subject, of a very serious and interesting nature. Perhaps the House might not be willing to hear me express all the sentiments which are familiar to my own reflection. Perhaps, too, my expressions might be liable to misconstruction, which, on such a subject, I should by no means wish. On one point, however, which has reference to the idea of the secession of any State from the Union, or a dismemberment of the Union, perhaps I ought to say something. All this doctrine, for myself, I utterly disclaim. The achievement of the independence of the thirteen original States, and the establishment of the Constitution, under which they are united, are connected with too many precious, too many proud recollections, to permit a man easily to think of realizing a dismemberment of the Union so achieved and so established. Whatever diversity of opinion, whatever rivalry of States, whatever jealousy of State ambition may exist, still one sentiment is to be recollected, and it is one on which, when I mention it, I need make no comment. The distinguished, the illustrious patriot, whose memory is cherished in the Northern portion of this Union, with a veneration next to idolatry, was a gentleman of Virginia. Independently of all those recollections which apply strongly to the heart, and which must so interest all honorable minds as not to be driven from them by any diversity of political opinion, for, among gentlemen, there are some sentiments of honor always recollected in relation to each other; independently of these, there are considerations so strongly applying to what I deem the interest of the State from which I am a Representative, against a separation of the States, and such is my confidence in the good sense, the strong practical intelligence, and the sound principles of my constituents, that, were every State near it to solicit a separation from the present Union, and desire the concurrence of Connecticut, supporting it with all the talents which those States possess, I do believe that, even myself, with my single talent, however small, could prevent the acceding to the proposition supposed. A reason for this opinion is, that, from the habit of education together, and my knowledge of the consequent uniformity of sentiment, I am very confident, on mature reflection, with respect to a subject of this nature, the people of Connecticut would generally adopt the same conclusion with myself. And, in saying this, sir, I request to be understood as relying not on any imaginary potency of my talent, but on the prevalent power of truth.

Repeal of the Embargo.

H. OF R.

Yet, sir, be pleased to recollect that this Government, according to Constitutional principles, is not a consolidated Government. I have heard, in the course of the present session, an argument against the embargo as being a consolidating measure; and reference was made to the language of a celebrated orator of Virginia, (now deceased,) as to the danger of consolidation. Since that time, I have been almost astonished at the change produced in my own opinion; for the argument which then seemed to have more of eloquence and fertility of mind than of real solidity, the argument which then seemed but specious, has since appeared to be hardened into solidity by measures which have been adopted. It is well known that this is a Government of limited powers; when the members of the Government act without Constitutional authority, they act as unauthorized individuals. In case of questions arising, whether our acts are Constitutional or not, some, perhaps, might say that our decision should be regarded as infallible. But the Constitution does not proceed upon the supposition of the infallibility of Congress, or upon the supposition of Executive infallibility. The question, remains, with respect to our acts, whether others may not rightfully decide as to their constitutionality. Every member of Government, who is sworn to support the Constitution, has to perform his public trust according to what he believes to be the true construction of the rule of duty to which he is bound by oath. According to this principle, judges have doubted the constitutionality of legislative acts, and have considered themselves not bound to give effect to any legislative provision when clearly unconstitutional.

The elective franchise is of great use as well to prevent the adoption of unconstitutional measures, as to guard against the abuse of powers unquestionably delegated by the Constitution. If, however, unconstitutional acts be adopted, are they not acts of usurpation? Such acts, whether adopted from patriotic motives, or otherwise, are not in pursuance of the trust committed to the Government; and the members of independent authorities, who are sworn expressly to support the Constitution, are not to be considered as sworn to give effect to such measures. When, therefore, a deliberative body is called upon to act in aid of the statutes not Constitutional, they are at liberty to refuse. Thus the judges of courts of the United States are considered as not bound to afford any agency or aid toward carrying into effect a legislative provision, which is unconstitutional. The Legislatures of individual States are also deliberative bodies. And some acts might be required from them for giving complete effect to some of the acts of Congress. I will cite an example. The act relative to the militia could not be carried into its intended effect without some legislative provisions on the part of the State Governments. Such provisions have been made, and the act has gone into general operation. But if any State Legislature had believed the act to be unconstitutional, would it have been their duty to comply with its unconstitutional provisions? One State, I think, did omit, for a time, to pass any act conformable to that act of Congress, although not from doubts about constitutionality, but from some other cause. I consider, therefore, that the State Legislatures, whose members are sworn to support the Constitution, may refuse assistance, aid, or co-operation, as to an act of Congress which they sincerely believe to be unconstitutional. And one step, further, I think, may be admitted. They may refuse the co-operation of persons holding offices as agents under the State; for the agency of such persons is the agency of a part of the State itself.

If we admit all these principles, gentlemen need not suppose that they in the least endanger the Constitution of the Union; not in the least, sir. But, if measures were pursued tending to alienate large portions of the people by giving effect to unconstitutional principles, this might expose the Union to the hazard of division, or to the hazard of being consolidated by arbitrary power into one Government. The Legislatures of individual States have motives of policy and interest to decide in favor of acts of the General Government, because it is a common cause to maintain legislative authority. Of consequence, when a question is raised by a respectable portion of the community as to the constitutionality of a statute, it should be regarded as warning the General Government to review the subject with serious deliberation.

Perhaps gentlemen are not perfectly acquainted with the nature of some proceedings which have taken place in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or with the nature of their town meetings. Those primary assemblies of the people exhibit the great force of the principles of free Government. They are bodies legally constituted, with the power of making local regulations, and of imposing taxes upon themselves; they are meetings convened in strict form of law, as much so as when the President of the United States issues his Proclamation for a meeting of Congress. When assembled they proceed to choose a person to preside in a manner as conformable to law as the choice of Speaker of this House; and order may be maintained there with as absolute certainty as it is here, for the officer who presides may require the assistance of peace officers. In those places, their military men assemble; the men and officers there meet on even floor, and deliberate freely. Thus the meetings may exhibit what is resolved upon by the mass of fighting men. They are assemblies to which the people are perfectly accustomed, to which all legally qualified to vote are admitted, and in which they all may express their sentiments on their common concerns. They are seen proceeding with much deliberation and with much caution to judge and decide on what they believe to be proper for them according to the Constitutional law of the land. Instead of thinking them scarcely worthy of notice they should rather be regarded with peculiar attention.

Much has been said as to the example of Virginia in relation to a trial under the statute of the United States, called the sedition act. That was a case, sir, in which a statute could not go into effect but through the medium of a court. The court gave its aid, pronouncing the act in question to be Constitutional. If, however, an act were never to come before the court, and the State officers were called upon to execute it, it would present a very different case. There was an insurrection of unauthorized individuals in Pennsylvania against a law of the United States which was certainly Constitutional. I recollect that much was heard from Virginia about the trial alluded to. Resolutions and addresses of the Virginia Legislature were passed about legislative or judicial usurpation.

Mr. GHOLSON asked leave to correct Mr. DANA as to facts. The resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia were antecedent to the trial of Callender.

Mr. DANA would mention some other trials for supposed libels or sedition. There is a case now coming up to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the case of a prosecution at common law for supposed libel, or sedition, or slander, instituted before a circuit court of the United States, conducted by an officer appointed by the present President of the United States. There have been instituted before the circuit court of the United States in the district of Connecticut, within about three or four years past, seven or eight prosecutions at common law for libellous publications, or seditious or slanderous words against either the President or Congress, or some portion of the Government of the United States. Some of the prosecutions have been attempted to be carried at common law beyond anything contained in that sedition act of which so much has been said. These are facts well known. The district attorney of the United States has conducted the prosecutions. To be sure, no persons have ever been punished under them, because it always so happened that there has been some error in the business, some defect of skill or attention in the attempt to bring up the question which it was wished to have decided by jury. I do not mean to charge the public prosecutor with purposely leaving a deficiency in these cases so as to liberate the persons prosecuted. You may judge of the nature of the prosecutions, when I observe that a judge of the highest court of law has been prosecuted in the name of the United States for a supposed libel—a man eminent for his personal worth, professional talents, and literary acquirements. One of our most distinguished clergymen has been indicted, and another clerical gentleman has, I think, been committed to prison. Two or three of the editors of newspapers have also been indicted. All these prosecutions have been had in a court of the United States. Yet the people had made no noise whatever about them abroad. They suppose that the influence of the Executive administration of the United States, however great, was directed against that small State; but they have never complained to the other States, or asked aid of any other State about the affair. The judges of the court have both been appointed by the present Administration; they are, however, of distinguished professional talents, and I recollect no reproach cast upon them as to any decision in these prosecutions, even by those more opposed to them with respect to political opinion. The Lieutenant Governor of the State has been arraigned before the same circuit court. Although it was painful to see the second magistrate of the State subjected to such a prosecution, and although it was felt as an insult upon the State, yet, for this, no opprobrium was cast on the court. The prosecution was ultimately abandoned—unquestionably, it could not be sustained where law and justice were respected. When gentlemen say so much of one prosecution in Virginia under the sedition act, they are desired to reflect that the small State of Connecticut has borne all these prosecutions. It is a State which never has given a President to the United States, and perhaps never will. The prosecution now pending at common law for supposed libel or sedition, is suffered to proceed without disturbance.

When Mr. DANA had concluded, the question was taken on filling the blank with the first day of June, and negatived—73 to 40. The Committee then rose, without taking any other question, 58 to 56, and had leave to sit again.

And on motion the House adjourned.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Disbursement of Public Moneys.

H. OF R.

FRIDAY, February 3.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, accompanied with such returns as have been transmitted to him, of the election of members to serve in this House from the said State, for the term of two years, commencing the fourth of March next; also, the copy of a proclamation issued by the said Governor, relative thereto; which was read, and, together with the said returns and proclamation, ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his report on the petition of William McLaland, referred to him by order of the House, on the thirteenth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a memorial of sundry citizens of the county of Harrison, in the Indiana Territory, praying, for the reasons therein set forth, that the ordinance of Congress for the government of the said Territory, passed on the 13th of July, 1787, may be so revised and amended as to vest in the people of that Territory the power of electing their delegate in this House, for the same term of time, in the same manner, and by the same persons who elect the members in the House of Representatives for the Indiana Territory.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed on the twenty-sixth of December last, a bill extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. VAN DYKE, after presenting a memorial on the subject, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inquire and report to this House whether it be expedient to erect at or near Wilmington, at or near Newcastle, at or near Port Penn, in the county of Newcastle, and at or near Lewis, in the county of Sussex, in the State of Delaware, one or more batteries or fortifications, for the protection of the said towns, and the country adjacent. And, in case he be of opinion that it is expedient to erect such batteries or fortifications, that he report whether any, and what, additional appropriations be necessary for the purpose.

The resolution was supported by Messrs. VAN DYKE, PITKIN, and LYON, on the ground that it was only intended to bring the subject before the Department of War, that it might receive the attention of the proper officers; and opposed by Messrs. MACON, D. R. WILLIAMS, and BLOUNT, because it was unusual to act on the subject of fortifications specially, as the subject had been always considered as a national one—the execution of the law on the subject resting solely with the Executive officers. The resolution was negatived—ayes 23.

THOMAS PAINE'S PETITION.

Mr. LYON rose and observed that he had seen in a morning paper, that the Committee of Claims, had reported that Thomas Paine should have leave to withdraw his petition; and, on examination, he had found that that report was ordered to lie on the Clerk's table, without the usual order for printing the memorial and the accompanying documents. I confess, said Mr. L., I was astonished at the report. Shall it be said of this nation that Thomas Paine, the man to whom this nation is indebted for its independence more than to any living being; that its Legislature has been memorialized by this same Thomas Paine, intimating that he is in want, and that he is willing to accept of pecuniary aid on account of those inestimable services rendered the American people, when they were growing into a nation—shall it be said of this nation that they are as ungrateful to their benefactor as the Romans were to their Belisarius! I did not rise, sir, to express my feelings on this subject. I must reserve myself for a more proper opportunity, when I shall move, if no other gentleman does it, that the report of the Committee of Claims be recommitted, with instructions to that committee to report their opinion of what the justice and the honor of the nation requires to be done for Thomas Paine. In order to prepare the mind of the House for this question, I move that the report of that committee, together with the accompanying documents, be printed. Motion carried—ayes 58, nays 19.

DISBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, he rose for the purpose of making a motion which he had expected and wished should have come from some other quarter; but he said he could not reconcile it to himself to be wanting in what he conceived to be his duty as a member of the House, in the hope that that duty would be more zealously performed by others, especially when he perceived no prospect of its being, in relation to this particular object, performed at all. I believe, sir, said Mr. R., it will not be a new thing to you to be told that rumor—and something more than rumor, too—has gone abroad respecting the application of public moneys. Among the duties—and among the rights, too—of this House, there is perhaps none so important as the control which it constitutionally possesses over the public purse. To what purpose is that control? The mere form of appropriating public money, unless this House rigorously examine into the application of the money thus appropriated; unless the House examine if the amount of appropriation is exceeded by the expenditure; or if it be misapplied, that is, if money appropriated for one object be expended for another; unless we do this, sir, our control over the public purse is a mere name—an empty shadow. I now rise, not only for the purpose of asserting this right on the part of the House, and exercising what I conceive to be my duty to it and to the people whom I represent, but also for the purpose of vindicating, in the only way in which it can be vindicated, the reputation of the Government under which we live—I mean the Administration. Whenever charges are brought against any Administration, the only way in which they can be repelled, is by a frank, full, and impartial inquiry into the matter constituting those charges. This is the only mode in which the honor of any Administration, in a Government like ours, can be vindicated. You must well recollect, sir, that in the first session of the sixth Congress of the United States—a period, sir, to which I delight to recur; it gives me pleasure to look back upon it as the era of a glorious reformation—an act was passed fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States. The fourth section of this act establishes the pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates. I will read it:

“That the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, be as follows, to wit: To the brigadier general, two hundred and twenty-five dollars, which shall be his full and entire compensation, without a right to demand or receive any rations, forage, travelling expenses, or other perquisite or emolument whatever, except such stationery as may be requisite for the use of his department,” &c.

Never, perhaps, sir, were the words of a statute more explicit; and no one on this floor knows better than yourself why it was made thus explicit. It is said, (with what degree of truth remains for us now to investigate,) that, in the teeth of that statute, advances—and to a considerable amount beyond the emoluments thus provided by law, have been made by the War Department to the brigadier general. There is not a single department of this Government—not a man in the Administration—against whom I would credit a charge of this sort with greater diffidence than against the Secretary of War; so long have I been acquainted with his economy, regularity, and strict attention to keep the expenditure of his department within the annual appropriation made by this House. But this very circumstance—the high reputation of this officer for regularity and punctuality, renders his claim to investigation into this rumor but the more strong, and unites his interest with that of the American people and the duty of this House to induce the passage of the resolution which I now submit:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any advances of money have been made to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, by the Department of War, contrary to law; and, if any, to what amount.”

The resolution was adopted without debate—ayes 25—and Messrs. RANDOLPH, SMILIE, JOHN MONTGOMERY, TAYLOR, and JOHNSON, were appointed the committee.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved that the House again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution.

Mr. TROUP moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject indefinitely. [This motion was understood to contemplate putting the subject completely at rest.] Mr. TROUP's motion was negatived—yeas 26, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, jr., David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Thomas Blount, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Dawson, Josiah Deane, Meshack Franklin, James Holland, John G. Jackson, William Kirkpatrick, Nathaniel Macon, John Morrow, John Porter, Benjamin Say, Ebenezer Seaver, John Smilie, Richard Stanford, John Taylor, George M. Troup, Jesse Wharton, Robert Whitehill, David R. Williams, Alexander Wilson, and Richard Winn.

NAYS—Lemuel J. Alston, Ezekiel Bacon, Joseph Barker, John Blake, jr., Adam Boyd, John Boyle, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Orchar Cook, John Culpeper, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, jr., Joseph Deaha, Daniel M. Durell, William Ely, John W. Eppes, William Findley, James Fisk, Francis Gardner, James M. Garnett, Thomas Gholson, jr., Peterson Goodwyn, Isaiah L. Green, John Harris, John Heister, William Helms, William Hoge, David Holmes, Benjamin Howard, Reuben Humphreys, Daniel Hsley, Richard Jackson, Robert Jenkins, Walter Jones, James Kelly, Thos. Kenan, Philip B. Key, John Lambert, Joseph Lewis, jr., Edward St. Loe Livermore, Edward Lloyd, John Love, Matthew Lyon, Robert Marion, Josiah Masters, William McCreery, William Milnor, Daniel Montgomery, jr., John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Jonathan O. Mosely, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newbold, Thomas Newton, Wilson C. Nicholas, Timothy Pitkin, jr., John Pugh, Josiah Quincy, John Randolph, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Jacob Richards, Matthias Richards, Samuel Riker, John Rowan, John Russell, Lemuel Sawyer, Samuel Shaw, James Sloan, Dennis Smelt, Jedediah K. Smith, John Smith, Samuel Smith, William Stedman, Clement Storer, Lewis B. Sturges, Peter Swart, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, John Thompson, Abram Trigg, Jabez Upham, James I. Van Alen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Nicholas Van Dyke, Archibald Van Horn, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Isaac Wilbour, and Nathan Wilson.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject.

The question being now on filling the blank in the resolution for repealing the embargo and issuing letters of marque and reprisal with the “fourth day of March”—

Mr. MOSLEY said he did not rise to detain the Committee with many remarks at this time. He could not but express the gratification he felt at the vote given in the Committee against filling the blank with so distant a day as the first of June. He said he should be in favor of the earliest day. Having begun a good work, he hoped they would go on with it; and, for himself, he could truly say, that every step they proceeded in it, he should go on rejoicing.

It did appear to him that the same reasons which induced gentlemen to consent to a repeal of the embargo at all must operate in favor of a speedy repeal. One powerful reason, and which he should suppose of itself sufficient, was, the multiplied evasions of the embargo acts, in defiance of every effort to enforce them. It is said by some that they are violated only by the worthless and unprincipled part of the community. If this be the fact, so much the worse. It proves, only, that some adventurers are growing rich by their transgressions of the embargo acts, while the regular and fair traders are suffering by their obedience to them.

On the subject of the violation of the embargo acts, he thought gentlemen had been in the habit of imputing the blame rather too much to the people of the Northern and Eastern States. Some gentlemen have seemed disposed to confine this charge almost exclusively to what they are pleased to term the Old Tories and Federalists of the North. They may, perhaps, be worse in theory; but, if reliance is to be placed upon statements which have been made, they are not much worse in practice than the Young Tories and Democrats of the South. These at least, it appears, are apt scholars; who, according to their opportunities, have not been behind their brethren in the North. The truth is, the violations of the embargo acts are not confined to any particular section of the country, or to any political party. They are known to be so general, and so numerous, as to render the embargo utterly nugatory and inefficacious, even in the estimation of those who have been most partial to it; and, if the remark made by his honorable colleague, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) "that the funeral of the embargo had already gone by," might not, by some, be considered as strictly correct, he would venture to assert that it could not long survive. It was, now, literally "dying of the doctor." The last prescriptions of its physicians had proved too powerful. They have had a most unfavorable operation. Some gentlemen imagine that a slight inflammation only has been excited, and that a little phlebotomy would at once allay it. He apprehended there would be greater difficulties in applying this remedy than gentlemen were aware of. But, as it might not be perfectly pleasant, nor, perhaps, proper, in this place, to dilate upon this subject, he should dismiss it. He could not, however, help noticing a remark of an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) that sooner than he would be deterred from enforcing these laws, "he would drench the nation in blood." Surely, the gentleman could not be serious in this declaration. Would he, or would any gentleman professing an attachment to a republican form of Government, a government of laws founded on the affections of the people, wish to have recourse to such an expedient as this, to embrace obedience to odious and unpopular measure?

But some gentlemen, who declare that they are not disposed to proceed to extremities and to attempt compelling obedience to the embargo acts at the point of the bayonet appear to be grieved and almost offended that the people, and especially the commercial class, should be so blind to their own interest. They declare that all they have done has been from motives the most friendly to commerce, and that hereafter they never would lift a finger for its protection.

He could not doubt the sincerity of their declaration; but in the opinion of those most interested they had taken rather a singular and unfortunate way of showing their friendship; and provided they should ever feel their affections for commerce rising again, he hoped they would not give her such another fraternal embrace as entirely to stop her breath; to stagnate her blood, and absolutely to kill her out of kindness.

Mr. M. said, now he was up, he would make a single remark upon the second branch of this resolution, authorizing letters of marque and reprisal. He should be utterly opposed to this, because he considered it as equivalent to a declaration of war, and he was by no means prepared to give his sanction to any hostile measures at this time. Before we resolve to rush into a war we ought coolly and dispassionately to consider the policy of such a step, to weigh well the probable advantages, our capacity of carrying it on with success, and the prospect of unanimity in the nation. He did not believe that a war at this time would be proper.

As to the embargo it had been fully tried. Experience had clearly evinced its impolicy and inefficacy. The nation were sick of it. And he considered that the most imperious reasons must present themselves to the minds of gentlemen in favor of an immediate repeal. Its longer continuance, he contended, could produce no possible good, and might be attended with the most calamitous consequences.

He hoped, therefore, that the embargo would be repealed without adopting the second clause of the resolution. What had already been done he had no doubt had excited the most pleasing hopes and joyful anticipations in the nation. Let us not disappoint them—let us not dash from their lips the cup of bliss which we have held out to them, unless they will receive it from our hands mixed with an ingredient, deadly and destructive!

The question was now taken on filling the blank with the fourth day of March, carried ayes 70.

The question then being about to be put on that clause of the resolution contemplating the repeal of the embargo—

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that he had voted against filling the blank in the resolution with the 4th day of March because, if possible, he could have wished an earlier day; reserving however, in his own mind the right, when the question should come before the House, of agreeing to that day, if an earlier could not be obtained. He hoped, and the prospect which presented itself that morning gave him good cause to hope, that the committee would agree to that member of the resolution which was then before them. For some time past he had been an inactive, though not an inattentive observer of the proceedings of Congress. He did not know whether he ought not to rejoice at the physical incapacity which had prevented him from taking a part in those proceedings. They had been such as (until now) to fill his mind with great apprehension and alarm, because they had hitherto indicated a great want of concern, not to say disunion, somewhere. He would have deemed it one of the most calamitous events that could have befallen the country, if, after the progress which had been made in the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) the House could, that day, have refused further to consider it. And wherefore should he so have deemed it? Because it would have indicated not merely a want of concert and of union in the Cabinet and Councils of our country, but he feared it might have led to a state of things which he would not then attempt to anticipate. The plain, broad, open road for every Government to pursue was that of common sense and decision—common sense in theory; decision in execution. If, as they had been told, there existed dissatisfaction, murmuring, discontent; a spirit, if not of insurrection, at least leading to insurrection against the laws; wisdom and policy required either a prompt subdual of that spirit, or an immediate yielding to it—one, or the other. It was the halting between these extremes, an oscillating, hesitating, temporizing, tampering, patching-up policy, that brought ruin on every nation, so situated. The history of our own Revolution taught this. The conduct of the British Ministry to the American colonies, he supposed, would have impressed this principle on the mind of every man. What was that conduct? Marked by a spirit of irritation and indecision. While we were irritated on the one hand, we were uncontrolled by power on the other, and, after years of excitement and ill-blood, the event is known to all. He therefore congratulated the House and the nation that this system—if system it could be called—was about to be given up; that the hopes, the wishes, the fears, every strong passion of the public, were no longer to be sported with, that the example of Lord North was not so soon to be lost upon us. Sir, said he, if my voice will permit me, I will state another subject of congratulation to you and the Committee. It is, that during this period of general distraction—I hope no gentleman will attach any bad, or wrong sense to the word, but that it will be taken (as I utter it) to mean a difference, a contrariety of views and opinions—there being hitherto perhaps no ten men to be found in this House who could agree upon any affirmative proposition—amidst this public distraction, it is a subject of consolation to me that we have not, as yet, compromised the safety of the State; that during this long and tedious political malady under which we have been—and not without some shadow of reason—so extremely peevish and fretful, the body politic has sustained perhaps no radical injury; and that, now, by a happy determination to the surface, the disease is likely to be wholly thrown off.

By some it might be thought that in the wide, and perhaps wild range, which he should take upon the subject, he was violating the rules and orders of the House. On this subject he must be permitted to say that there was not a single question; not even that of filling a blank in the resolution under consideration, that did not involve every foreign, and he might almost say every domestic relation of this Union. It was impossible to discuss a subject of that great and momentous national importance with the dry minuteness of a special pleader—not to travel out of the record, or to be tied down to the matter contained in the declaration. And permit me, sir, said Mr. R. to add that so long as I escape the correction of the Chair, I shall feel myself at liberty to proceed, whatsoever may be the opinions as to order of other gentlemen.

There are occasions in which to speak of any man to his face in a certain strain, ought to be reprobated and stamped as the vilest adulation; but there are other occasions in which not so to speak, to restrain the feelings of a full and overflowing heart, subjects perhaps to colder, but far bitterer censure. I shall dismiss this topic, then, by saying, that you, sir, have not so long presided in this assembly, with so much reputation to yourself and benefit to the State, to be now schooled in your duty by the youngling of yesterday. And I say it, because a Chairman of this Committee would certainly very grossly depart from rule and order were he to rise to vindicate his conduct in this assembly, from any argument of it by a member.

In the train of argument which he should pursue, Mr. R. really did not think it at all necessary, with his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) or the learned gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. FITKIN,) to go into a minute calculation on the subject of the revenue or debt of Great Britain, or of the gross products of duties derived by her from the importation of West India commodities. Such calculations ought not to enter into any determination of that House; for, however he might be made to appear on paper, and whatever might have been said on the subject from the days of David Hume, and Dr. Price, to the present hour, the continental enemy of that Power had, for at least half a century, been deceived in his reckoning as to her time of bankruptcy. That subject had baffled all the calculation of political economists. And really, sir, said Mr. R., it is hardly worth our while, after Bonaparte, like Canute of old, has set down on the seashore at Boulogne, vainly waiting for the great tide of British wealth to recede, to take measures, here, bottomed upon calculations of her being unable to carry on the war for want of capacity to raise the supplies. It is a well established fact that the gross revenue of that Kingdom was for the year 1807 (exclusive of loans and the revenue derived from Ireland) sixty millions sterling; and that collected at an expense of £4 5s. per cent. This is answer enough to us, on the subject of her being unable to carry on the war for want of resources, particularly when we look back to our own revenue, the expense at which it is collected—and more especially when we look at the proposition of our Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of the Treasury, to carry on the war (should we engage in one) with loans, exclusively. It is an ample, a redundant answer. Shall we calculate upon the failure, for want of revenue, of a nation whose annual loans bear so small a proportion to her whole receipt, (in the year which I have quoted, about a fourth,) whilst we ourselves are told that loans must constitute nearly the whole of our revenue? There, then, can be no doubt that this subject not only ought not to enter into our views upon the great question of war, but perhaps had better not be stirred at all; that our measures ought to be taken in reference to our own capacity and disposition for exertions, and not grounded on flattering, perhaps delusive hopes, of our adversary's weakness. Another point it might be as well, in passing, to notice—the small proportion which the customs bear to the revenue of that State, and that proportion decreasing, although their aggregate amount be actually increasing; whilst the revenue from internal sources has been rapidly increasing every year, as well in proportion to the whole receipt as in aggregate amount.

But, sir, said Mr. RANDOLPH, amidst the various causes which I find for felicitating you and the nation, the recent change in the aspect of our affairs is not the least—that we are at last to settle upon some system; and I listened, I confess, with very great pleasure the other day, to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) and my worthy colleague, (Mr. BURWELL,) although perhaps I may not have exactly agreed with either, certainly not with both of them. I listened to them because they held out to us the prospect of a happy termination of the present state of things—a state of things, which, after the vote of yesterday and to-day, I might almost be tempted to pronounce cannot last beyond the fourth of March. A great deal had been said about the patriotism of the country under the operation of this system. In Mr. R.'s opinion never did any people exhibit so striking an instance of patriotism as the people of the United States had done since December, 1807. He believed that their patriotism had in that period been put to a test more severe than during the Revolutionary war; because whatever of suffering the people then felt, they saw that it was inflicted by the immediate hand of the enemy; and it operated only to goad to a still higher pitch their fury against that enemy. But in this case, (whether right or wrong was perfectly immaterial,) the system had been such as to impress a great portion of the public with the opinion that their sufferings proceeded from the Government, and it ought not to be a matter of surprise that the popularity of the Government should have been diminished. It called for the exercise, by all classes and descriptions of men, of the rarest virtues—patience, forbearance, self-denial, and long suffering without repining. It presupposed the existence of a state of society in which there was no occasion for government itself. Was it wonderful that those who could not see wisdom in the measure should murmur, when suffering under it?—that men not strictly conscientious should violate its provisions?—that under the severity of its operation the Administration should lose somewhat of their former popularity? Mr. R. was not, never had been, and he trusted never would be, in the habit of paying compliments to men who have much at their disposal, but he would declare his belief that the popularity of no man whom God ever made could have endured the test which that of the present President of the United States had not merely endured, but gone through with victory. There could not have been so strong a proof of the deep-seated love, and unqualified approbation of that man as his having been politically able to support the weight of that experiment. It was a trophy of which he never could be divested, let him die when he would—whatsoever might be the course of his future life. Yes, sir, said Mr. R., after the vote of this committee, I do consider the embargo as substantially repealed. It is something like a vote of credit; it has not gone through all the forms of law, but no banker would hesitate to advance money upon it. Gentlemen shake their heads, sir, and heads of such weight, too, that I despair of shaking them myself. I had supposed that the embargo was all but repealed; in point of fact I believe that it is already repealed. A member of this House has cited the embargo as a strong proof of the stamina of this infant Hercules, who had been so long able to bear what would have crushed, as he says, any other nation in six months. I believe, sir, that it would have crushed the popularity of any Ministry of any other nation than this in less than six months, supposing that nation to have half the pretensions to freedom that we have. He remembered to have read a great while ago in an extremely beautiful epic poem that the natives of Chili, when they threw off the Spanish yoke, proposed to choose their captain by this test: A very heavy beam of wood was produced, and he who could support it on his shoulders the longest time was to be selected as their general. One of the chiefs stood under the burden such an amazing number of hours, that they were like never to come to a conclusion, and (if he remembered rightly) they had to abandon their experiment. Whatsoever proof we had given of our wisdom, we had indubitably borne away the palm of bodily strength, anything in the observations of a gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) about our being puny and rickety, to the contrary notwithstanding; and Mr. R. hoped we should give perhaps not quite so strong a proof of our wisdom, by throwing the beam off from our shoulders, now that we had ascertained our strength by the experiment.

But it was asked, what substitute would he propose for the embargo. None. He hoped he would not be misapprehended. Considering the embargo in its operation as mischievous, and even ruinous, it would bedroll indeed if he should require a substitute for an evil that he proposed to get rid of. Shall a man refuse to be cured of a cancer unless you will provide him with a substitute? But if he were asked what the nation is to do after repealing the embargo? his answer was ready. To be sure, sir, said he, it is a very old one, and therefore may not take with the fashions of the day; but in matters of policy, old systems which have been sifted and tried by experience, are not in my judgment the worst, and the longer tried, perhaps, the better. So far, therefore, from its being an objection with me that a proposition is old and trite, it is a recommendation; as it is precisely the reverse with respect to new projects, however ingenious, however calculated to catch or dazzle the eye, like the room in which we sit, where I at this moment discern the fissures which perhaps are to reduce us to the situation of poor Lenthall. We had as well stuck to our old apartment, (I do not mean the library,) where we had every convenience and comfort, and saved our money.

H. OF R.

Repeal of the Embargo.

The diseases of this State took their rise, I repeat it again and again, in the years 1805-6. We were then a flourishing, united, and happy people. The Government permitted itself, a majority of this House permitted themselves, and I believe they now sorely repent of it, sir, indeed some of them have told me so, to be urged by mercantile clamor and cupidity into collision with powerful European States. From that day we have been going on from bad to worse, until we have arrived at this superlative state, which can no longer be borne, for which a remedy must be found, gentle if you will, aliterative if you please, but at any rate a remedy, however desperate. That which I would now propose is what I had the honor of proposing at the last session of Congress, and I think of mentioning more than once, on Sunday morning, the 18th of December last; a remedy which, without pledging the State, without mortgaging every foot of land in the country for the protection of the mercantile flag in the most remote seas, would permit our merchants to protect themselves, if they pleased, and if not, stay at home, at their option. This was my opinion as far back as 1805-6, and I think it will be found, although not in detail, in a report made during that session of Congress, which proposed raising a military force for the purpose of commanding within the United States obedience to the laws, not from ourselves, but a foreign Power. And here suffer me to say that I really think we are coming back again slowly—for large bodies (even such as move in ellipsis) move slowly—after having been long in aphelion, we are returning back to the daylight of those good old republican principles of which, as I think, and as I would endeavor to show, if it could answer any good purpose, we have too long lost sight. And after being for years one of the proscribed and denounced, I am not without a saving hope that I shall die in the faith, whether I die in the church or not. I am induced to this belief, principally, from perceiving that scarcely a sentiment is contained—I beg pardon of the Committee for this egotism—I believe if it be warranted in any human being, I might fairly challenge a right to it now—scarcely a sentiment is expressed in either of those speeches of which I was the author, (unfortunately as it would seem,) that I have not heard, during the present session of Congress, from lips the most orthodox in this House. They amounted to this: "Before you begin this contest, count the cost; calculate your means of annoyance as well as of resistance; your enemy (if she become such) is all powerful at sea; if she strikes, you will feel; bring matters to extremity and you will have to recede—not from your claims, but from the ocean." All this and more I have heard urged, not only by the Chairman of the Committee of the whole House, but repeatedly by other gentlemen nearly as orthodox as himself on various questions, the navy bill in particular, and I hope to hear sentiments of the same sort when the other bill (army bill) is taken up, which was put down in order to act on the present subject. The embargo, and the course pursued by the Administration generally, have, during this session, been defended and eulogized on positions admitted on all hands to be indisputably true, but which it was criminal in me to advance three years ago. "Then, it was little short of treason to magnify, as it was said, the resources of our rival, and depreciate those of our own country; now, it is madness not to perceive our inability to cope with her on the ocean"—the theatre of our wrongs, where redress, to be effectual, must be obtained. Was it not wiser to make a just estimate of our strength, or even to under-rate it a little, before plunging into a conflict, than afterwards have to abate from our sanguine, overcharged expectations? We suffered ourselves to be driven, step by step, by mercantile clamor, into a situation which has raised (whether rightfully or not) more clamor, from the same parties too, than all the foreign injuries about which they beset the Government. I now, therefore, propose that they be restored to that situation which, according to their own showing, is so enviable a one, and against the evils of which I hope they will never again have the hardihood to complain to this House, or apply for means of redress. It will therefore at once be perceived, that I am not friendly to that part of the resolution from which my worthy colleague on my left (Mr. BURWELL) anticipates so much benefit, and for the plainest of all reasons, because I do not conceive a threat to be the best means of patching up a reconciliation (and as such a hope has been expressed from that quarter, I may be at liberty to name it) between two parties who look at each other already perhaps with too jealous an eye; and for another reason: because I do not choose to put out a distant threat, to the execution of which either the capacity or disposition of the country may be doubted. Sir, we have dealt in the mimatory sort of traffic long enough, and I have no disposition to be any longer laughed at. We began with the non-importation law. That was undoubtedly a threat, for a power was given to suspend it, in case our terms were complied with. Next came the embargo; that too was to be suspended in case—and so forth. Now we are called upon to hang by a single hair over the head of the belligerents the sword of Damocles, to be cut some time in June next. It is all a threat, sir, and as such, must have a bad operation on any negotiation, which Government in its wisdom may think fit to commence (and we have had an intimation of that sort) for the purpose of settling our differences. Nay more, it is war to commence in June next, and really, to my apprehension, we might as well make a declaration of war to take effect in the next century, as in June next. I speak as to the power of this House, as well as to the policy of the thing.

"Will you then submit?" say gentlemen. "Have you not recorded a vote that you will not submit?" Unquestionably I have, and I will not submit. What is submission, and what resistance? By submission I understood either a formal renunciation of the thing in dispute, or a passive acquiescence in the claims of your adversary. When you say that you will not submit, what do you mean? That you will make the best resistance that you can. And when we have made this determination, we come to the great question of expediency, as to what is that best resistance? Now if you permit the merchantmen to arm in their defence instantly, and not till the British Ministry that you mean to arm next year, and go out and fight the English and French, until they revoke their orders and decrees, what follows? Why, sir, you not only make resistance, but you do it in the most honorable, manly, and effectual way, and therefore in the way leading most directly to a restoration of peace—not to a good understanding, for that I fear we shall never have, but to your system, Mr. Chairman, of "hands off." Can Great Britain undertake for a moment to consider that as war upon her, which she requires of us to do, in order to maintain our fair neutrality, viz: to resist the decrees of Berlin, Milan, Bayonne, or anywhere else, non-resistance to which is the plea for her Orders in Council? What offence can it be to her? None, sir; and yet to all the practical, beneficial effects of war, such a system would be as efficient as any you can devise—as war itself. Can France, although indeed there be a sort of system within a system there, which I do not very well understand—can France say that your resistance to what she calls the tyranny of the seas, justifies her in taking any hostile steps against you, supposing it to be in her power? Unquestionably not. France claims the power to issue certain decrees, on the ground of England's having usurped the empire of the ocean. You resist that usurpation. Those decrees, then, are not in any respect applicable to you; for I understand your non-resistance to be the sole alleged cause of those decrees. England retaliates the system—why? Because, as she says, you do not resist it. France issues her decrees because you do not resist (as she alleges) the British orders—England issues her orders because you do not resist the French decrees. Now, I would resist both, and if either construe that resistance (which they have both called upon you to make) into war, and do notwithstanding capture your armed ships, why then, sir, you have nothing left but to annoy them by every means in your power. It will be they who make the war and not yourself; and that circumstance will unite every heart and hand throughout the country in your cause. But, sir, I believe (although I have not so much confidence as some gentlemen have in the wisdom of those nations) that they have rather too much good sense thus to act—thus to drive you into the arms of the other party.

Let your merchants, then, go and arm in defence of their lawful trade against French decrees, British Orders in Council, and anything else of a similar stamp, and let the nation which by force shall attempt to execute them, know that it is war. Your resistance, according to their own showing, is lawful—they have called for it—the withholding it has been the pretext for their aggressions—and the first gun fired on you, when so resisting, is actual, flagrant, maritime war. You then throw the onus on them. You show the people that it was not within the power of human wisdom to have devised a mode of keeping out of war with them—that the very proofs which they required of our fair neutrality (resistance to each other's monstrous pretensions) have provoked their hostility—that there was no alternative but war or embargo—and who knows, sir, but the embargo may thereby become so popular a measure that we may put it on never to be pulled off again; that, like our winding-sheet, we shall be buried in it.

To the course which I propose, one of the strangest objections has been taken that human ingenuity could have devised: "that if you authorize the merchant vessels to arm and make resistance, they will not arm;" (which proves that there is no occasion for arming of any sort)—"or, that they will arm and yet go to England and take license—pay tribute." If a reason of this kind is to govern us, as we have fitted out the navy the best use that I know for it will be to fight the merchantmen, to make them fight the French and English. Suppose you issue letters of marque and reprisal, or declare war and commission privateers—the same thing may be said, that they will not fight; that they will go to London with cotton, and pay tribute. You must then invent some mode of making them fight. Sir, there is no mode of making men fight against their will; there has been none yet ever devised, nor ever will be. Do gentlemen know so little of mankind; are they so ignorant of the character and composition of that mixed assemblage, a nation; so little read in the history of our Revolution, as not to know that when the crisis—(Sir, this is a poor worn-out word, I hope to be pardoned for using it, it shall be the last time) was over, the American patriots began to trade with the British at New York, and elsewhere? It is an established fact that they engaged in what was well known as the London trade, men, too, who fought and bled and gained renown in the battles of their country. No sooner was all prospect of subjugation over—they did not wait for preliminary articles of peace—than they traded with the English; and they will do it now, even if you go to war, except it be a part of the system that they shall not trade at all, not even among themselves. Another strange objection is made to this system. It is said that American vessels will go to St. Bartholomew's or Gottenburg—no matter where, for all they want is an entrepôt, no matter who the buyers or sellers—that at this place of deposit your produce will be lodged—that the English will buy it—that France having no navy, will come in for no part of the trade, and that, therefore, it will operate partially against her. We have carried our ideas of impartiality to a strange length, sir. We must fight impartially and trade ditto. But the substance of the objection is this, that because one of your enemies, against whom you are making resistance (such as it is) has not a powerful navy to take her share of your trade from neutral ports, you ought not to trade at all. If France were our friend, ally, benefactor, gentlemen could state this and it might have some weight. But to offer it as a reason for abstaining from all trade, that a Power, assumed to be your enemy, and against whom you profess to make such resistance, lamenting that it is in your power to do so little—"wish very much, sir, that Florida belonged to her, or that she had some province on our frontier—very sorry indeed, that she presents no vulnerable point to us, but that is not our fault"—that we should abstain from all trade because this Power cannot reap an advantage from it, is a novel argument, indeed. So be it. It then seems, sir, that by a strange derangement of intellect, by some strange sort of logic, which I do not understand, and hope I never shall—when you are reduced to such a situation in which you cannot injure a powerful foe, you are bound to render her all the benefit you can; and her not receiving her full and impartial share of all the benefits which may incidentally accrue from any of your measures, taken purely with a view to your own advantage, is to be a good and valid reason why you should forego those measures! That you must continue to suffer, because, if you get relief one of your greatest foes will derive no benefit from it! This cannot be too much insisted on; it should, if possible, be driven into the skull of every head in the country.

But this plan, it seems, does not suit the ideas of some gentlemen who think very highly of the point of honor, who think that we must fight; that we must draw a little blood from the sword arm to gratify this punctilious itching; that one of two courses must be taken; either that we must set too to drawing it from our own citizens, or march forthwith to Canada. This, sir, was the only part, as I could apprehend it, of my worthy colleague's argument the other day, that did not precisely suit my conception of the true interests of the country; and if he would permit me, I would observe that supposing his statement to be true, he did most unquestionably demonstrate that the embargo would have been a wise, an efficient, and salutary measure by way of rider to the reduction of Canada; that if we had first of all overrun Canada, stormed Quebec, reduced the provinces of Nova Scotia and Brunswick, and then laid an embargo, it would have had a very salutary operation. Having however thus unluckily put the cart before the horse, the embargo before the conquest of Canada, before we go to mending the broken gear and making preparation for a new set out, a little rest, and some consideration, would not be amiss. I am willing to take up some of the ideas, I could almost say all, which fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts and my colleague. [Mr. BURWELL said that Mr. R. had misunderstood his argument he presumed. I endeavored (said Mr. B.) to give my opinion that it would not be proper to go to war to take possession of, Canada; but if we were forced to go to war, there are other considerations connected with the means of coercing the enemy to do us justice which would make it expedient to take the British provinces: and my argument in relation to Canada was in reply to an observation of a gentleman from Connecticut, that Canada had obviated much of the effect of our embargo; if so, it would be important, were we to go to war, that we should take possession of it, though I do not precisely admit his position.] My colleague (said Mr. RANDOLPH) is mistaken. I think I have not misunderstood him, even though his argument was addressed to the gentleman from Connecticut, by way of reply. The embargo has not been operative, through the intervention of Canada. Whether by furnishing supplies of her own production as the instrument of drawing them from us, is immaterial—Canada is the cause. The embargo would have operated, it is said, but for the British having possession of Canada. Therefore, sir, the taking of Canada ought (by the statement) to have preceded the embargo, as I trust in God it will precede the next that is laid. But, sir, why take Canada now, when my colleague tells you, and when other gentlemen tell you, that there is a prospect of re-adjustment; and when at least, it is demonstrable that the sort of resistance which I propose, viz: the arming of our merchantmen in their own defence, is the kind of resistance not only best calculated to meet the evil against which we would guard, but presents the best possible chance of a re-adjustment of our differences? For if we say, that, at any future day, in case the belligerents do not come to our terms, we will let fall on their heads letters of marque and reprisal, as you said by your suspension of the non-importation act, and offer to suspend the embargo, you may be sure that such a plan will not procure accommodation, if that be your object. If you injure a man and he exercises his rights as a man, and defends himself without overstepping the bounds of defence so as to make him the aggressing party, it is much more easy for you to come to an accommodation than if he were to say to you, "I will on such a day do so and so, if you do not retract." He puts it out of your power to make an apology, when he says that he will fight you on such a day if you do not render him justice. That is not the way that tends to an honorable adjustment of the dispute, or an honorable termination on the field of battle. In fact it has too much the air of a bravado; and as we have been suspected, I hope unjustly, of going into this sort of thing on former occasions, of going at least as far in words as in acts, it will be best to content ourselves with the exercise of our rights on the ocean. Their orders and decrees conflict with those rights. We will resist them, not going beyond our rights as acknowledged by the laws of nations and even by themselves. If they use force against us in the exercise of those rights, we are at war to all intents and purposes, and they put us at war. This course would be calculated to produce the result which I have no doubt my colleague has as much at heart as myself. And it is not strange that a difference of opinion should exist in the unsettled state of mind in which we have been for some time past—for if such has not been our situation, how comes it that we have done nothing? Or, if we have, that we have but rescinded to-day what we did yesterday, and to-morrow will perhaps undo what we are doing to-day?

I need not speak of the navy bill, sir; the history of that transaction is impressed much more strongly on your memory than it is on mine. I might mention another bill. I think it was between twelve and one o'clock on Saturday and Sunday, the 17th or 18th of December, that, on the plea that we were sleeping on our posts, on the plea of urgency, the House was forced into a vote on a report of a memorable and honorable committee, (of foreign relations,) which subject in the shape of a bill has closed very quietly on your table from that day to this—I speak of the non-intercourse. It was an expression used by gentlemen that we had been sleeping on our posts; and, therefore, it was necessary that we should sit up one night for the public good. There are constitutions in this House which have not yet recovered from the shock of that night's session. The non-intercourse, the navy bill, the supplementary embargo bill—and how the latter passed is really a curiosity, a novelty in legislation. The bill came from the Senate—it came from a quarter, sir, from whence, God be praised, we have had all our strong doses, under all Administrations—the alien and sedition laws, the suspension of the habeas corpus, the new treason bill, the last supplementary embargo bill, ay, sir, and the first embargo bill too; they all came from the same mint, and I liked none of them—and in my capacity as a freeman and a legislator, representing a free and enlightened people, I shall here and elsewhere, without any sort of reserve, speak of them as I think they merit; extenuating nothing and setting down naught in malice. The bill came to us then from the Senate on Thursday the 22d of December, and was proposed to be made the order of the day for the next day, Friday, and for Saturday—both days were named. Some gentlemen craved only till Monday to consider the numerous and important provisions of such a bill, and nearly the whole day was consumed in debate whether the bill should be the order of the day for Monday or Saturday. Saturday was carried; the delay till Monday being somewhat sternly refused; even the postponement to Saturday was with difficulty obtained. On Friday this House, having consumed the whole of the preceding day in debating that important point, adjourned over to Monday, that very day to which they had refused to postpone the bill, it being, like the report of the committee to which I have just alluded, a matter of such urgency that it could not be delayed. Monday came, and a motion was made by one of the friends of the bill to discharge the Committee of the whole House from its farther consideration. It was rejected, and the House went into a committee on it. Next day a similar motion was made and carried, and the bill was referred to a select committee, who reported on the following morning (Wednesday.) The bill, with their amendments, was again referred to a Committee of the whole House, and made the order of the day for Friday; and the week passed off without any further mention of this urgent business. On Saturday, the last day of the year, the House adjourned over to meet on Tuesday the 3d of January. Tuesday came and the consideration of the bill was at length resumed; but, there not being a quorum, the House adjourned by a vote of 60 to 10. The next day the unfinished business, as it is called, was asked for; but by a strange sort of decision, which I do not pretend to understand, it was determined, by a formal vote too, that there was a nice distinction somewhere, between business unfinished and unfinished business—and lo! what does the House but take up the proposition of a gentleman from Vermont to repeal the embargo. Although they had been bolstering up the embargo before, buttressing it, as many intelligent and honest men believe, at the expense of the best principles of the Constitution, they now took up the resolution for repealing the embargo. What happened that night, God knows—but the next day the bill was resumed, urgency again decreed, and it was driven, Jehu-like, through the House, through all its stages, from a committee to its third reading and final passage. I, who have scarcely been able to hold up my head since the night when that report was so vehemently passed which has slept so soundly ever since, came to the House at 9 or 10 o'clock with the hope, if not of speaking, at least of exercising my right of suffrage. But somewhere between four and five o'clock in the morning I was compelled to leave it; and at breakfast, about two in the afternoon on that day, I heard that the bill was passed—you know how, sir. Mr. R. said, he mentioned this thing not with the slightest view of creating unpleasant sensations in the bosom of any human being—nothing was further from his mind—but to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of a similar circumstance; and to do more—to show, that after all their vibrations and legislative contortions, they had come back to the proposal laid on the table almost the first day of the session to repeal the embargo; and he did most cordially congratulate every man in the House upon this event, except those gentlemen who considered the embargo a political panacea, which no circumstances, whatsoever be the consequence, should ever induce us to give up. He trusted that they were few, and though he had such confidence in some of them that he believed nothing would change their opinion, he hoped that this few were daily and hourly diminishing.

To get back, in his rambling way, to this decisive stroke—not now, but some time or other—of going to war, of taking Canada. It would be a sort of deed of trust from the body politic—an instrument with which I am sorry to say, that we gentlemen from the South are but too well acquainted—a deceitful present relief at the expense of a certain but remote evil; we may invert the telescope from its true position and the evil lessens to our view—but the day must come when that pledge must be redeemed—and indeed whatever cause he might have as an individual, he should not like to give bond and security to fight next year. He might in the mean time undergo a great revolution of opinion; he might change his religion, perhaps turn Quaker—and really if he were to change at all, he believed he could not do better—for theirs was a system of order, industry, charity, and peace—of comfort and affluence too, very good things in their way.

He was against plunging in this dashing way into war; because there was a possibility, to say no more of it, and his colleague (Mr. BURWELL) seemed to think, a pretty good hope, that we might get out of the scrape without a war, provided we would take his prescription. He felt the more and more indisposed to war, and should every day while he lived, when he looked at certain consequences and reflected on certain doctrines which had grown too familiar, in his apprehension, to the minds of that House. We too had a navy. It had cost us near twenty-three millions of dollars, about ten millions of which had been spent by the former Administration. It had cost us a great deal more than Louisiana; and he ventured to say that none but those gentlemen who viewed Louisiana (as he did the embargo) as a positive evil, would consider our navy of as much importance to us as the navigation of the Mississippi. The cost is tremendous for a machine which, if they adopted his colleague's (Mr. NICHOLAS'S) proposition, must be enlarged, repaired, beautified, and built up on an extended scale. It was more unfortunate that we had paid so much for the cost of a machine rusting all the time in idleness. We might then calculate from this fact what this cost would be, provided the House adopted the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, in its broad form, the most dangerous ever presented in that House—and pledged the nation to the maritime defence of commerce. From the commencement of the present Administration to the present day, a principle so abhorrent to his mind, so dangerous to the liberties of this country, had never been proposed to Congress. It contemplates a pledge of every drop of blood, of every shilling of money, to the maritime protection of commerce. Est modus in rebus. He was not willing on one day to lay the axe to the neck of commerce, to decollate her—and the next day to decollate himself, to commit suicide for the sake of commerce. If commerce could not take care of itself, it was not worth caring for. But after all that had been said on the subject of a navy, properly so called, ships and seamen would somehow or other work out their own salvation. A great many of them may be destroyed, but the rest would make such profitable voyages as to induce others to run the same risk. He looked at this proposition, therefore, with affright. We had a Navy Department, to which, ex officio, profusion and expense were incidental. It was an establishment of the worst kind—an establishment of disbursement alone, without a shadow of benefit—an establishment which, as managed by us, was a mere running sore in the body politic. If he were an Englishman or a Hollander, which thank God he was not, he would advocate a navy. As an American, at this time of the day, at least, he was against it, for the plainest of all reasons—that it was not suited to the time and our circumstances, and let gentlemen say what they will, these must have their weight. And what had been heard on that floor, coming not from men of doubtful principles, but from good Republicans, as they are called, both navy and anti-navy men? Why, first, that in the distribution of the powers of Government the Executive share is too small—next, that the Government lacks energy; that if we cannot enforce a law, however arbitrary and unconstitutional, not only at the expense of a limb of the body politic, but of the very trunk itself—“Away with such a Government—it wants energy and force; give us one that has some strength.” Gentlemen want it to be magnificent, strong, able to crush all opposition, to destroy the States. What next have we heard? “That the Executive patronage is, as it were, the Presidential property, and that he possesses the right to do ‘with it as he pleases;’ instead of considering it a trust placed in his hand, as it is even in limited monarchies, to be exercised under sound discretion and a high responsibility for the general good.

When these doctrines are broached in Congress, sir, by men calling themselves Republicans, and deemed as such, I am compelled to recollect the times, the energetic times, as they were called, when the Constitution was trampled under foot; when some men dared to risk the sentence, “that the parchment had better be burnt.” I am unwilling to see such principles govern, let who will be at the head of affairs; and, therefore, I am unwilling to give my assent to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) which has been, with his characteristic humanity, charitably adopted by my colleague, (Mr. BURWELL,) for, in truth, it was thrown an orphan on the wide world by its parent. I do not say that the time may not, or even that it will not, come when it will be necessary to strike at Quebec; but I am unwilling to do it now, when there remains one chance to this nation of preserving the blessings of peace; for, if we have a war of that sort, commissaries and contractors may fatten, but the public will be impoverished; and scarce any man who has not a fat contract, or a snug office, will be enabled to pay his taxes and maintain his family in the way they have been accustomed to.

But that is not all, sir. If we plunge at this moment into war—for to my mind there is really not one atom of difference, if we are to go to war, between this day and the first of June—who can say how or when the war shall end? And, with an empty exchequer—for to all practical purposes the exchequer is empty—with a revenue depending wholly on loans, would it be very astonishing if the same causes which overthrew the most powerful monarchy in Europe, should shake a little our own confederated Republic? That our present form of Government should be destroyed by the same causes which unquestionably did destroy our late government under the Confederation? The Government of France—a populous country as we all know, rich in internal resources almost beyond imagination—was blest or cursed, as you please, by a Minister who determined to carry on a war without taxes—loans were to supply all deficiencies. The experiment ended in the subversion of the Government. I believe that no man can doubt, if the ways and means could have been raised in 1788, that the French Revolution would never have taken place. Shall we then unnecessarily (and I speak of it in this point of view only) expose our Government to such shocks? I hope not. If they come, I am for meeting them manfully. In that event, I would hope that instead of destroying—for we ought always to hope for the safety of the Republic, however destitute of ground for it—it will nerve and toughen our manhood; that it will chastise our pampered—arrogance, I was going to say; that it will operate, as in one point of view I am willing to allow that the embargo may have operated, to bring old-fashioned homespun principles, as well as garments, into notice, to repress the rage of speculation, and reduce our bloated luxury; in fact, to give us something more of a national character. In that point of view I am willing to allow that even the embargo has not been without its salutary effect.

There is another reason why I am unwilling to take the attitude recommended to us by the gentleman from Virginia, and by my worthy colleague. I have seen in this House a proposition to give efficiency to the militia; to arm them; to make them what they ought to be—but what I fear they are not—an adequate and competent national defence, “damned with faint praise,” and a little paltry, beggarly appropriation, of $200,000 voted for that object. And but name a regular force, sir; strike but the naval chord, or standing army, call them volunteers or what you will, the sound vibrates to your heart; you loose the purse strings, and pour forth the national treasure without counting it. When I hear principles advocated against which I always did and always will protest, and when I see the policy of this House sovariant from what I conceive it ought to be, I am induced to take one more possibility, another chance of avoiding immediate war; and, therefore, when that part of the resolution comes up which proposes the issuing letters of marque and reprisal, I shall move you so to amend it as to change it from its present portentous and dismaying aspect, as a solemn pledge from this nation for the maritime protection of commerce in every sea, to what I conceive it ought to be—an authority to our merchants to arm and defend themselves, and resist (not submit to) those decrees and Orders in Council, which we have declared we will resist; in other words, that we will not submit to. There are a great variety of opinions as to what will be the eventual consequence; no man can precisely see the issue; but, to my judgment, it is the most promising plan that has been suggested. Its immediate consequence will be, that your merchants will go out armed, and, if captured, the bile and rancor of which we have heard so much, instead of being vented in sputtering and spiteful resolutions against their own Government, will be poured forth upon the aggressor. It will perhaps restore the Government to its accustomed popularity. If the merchant feels, he will know from whom—for, will he dare to come back and say that you ought to have kept on the embargo? No, sir; you will have permitted him to go out with his eyes open; the Government will have washed its hands of the thing. The merchants will become, what they ought to be, the carriers of your produce, the great machinery for transporting your commodities, instead of being a kind of political caballers. Let them go the counting-house, and they will have enough to do; give them employment, and you get rid of their complaints. If we take this step, it is not possible that Mr. Canning—even he—I beg his pardon—I would not speak harshly of any man behind his back, much less of one that is three thousand miles off—that a British Minister could have the face to construe this resistance into a just cause of war on their part. Commerce will protect itself, and peace, I trust, will be the result.

When Mr. RANDOLPH had concluded, the question was taken on the clause, and carried, ayes 76.

The question being stated on the second clause of the resolution, viz: that part which relates to issuing letters of marque and reprisal,

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out that part of the resolution, and insert after the words “and at the same time” the words “to authorize the merchant vessels of the United States owned wholly by citizens of the United States to arm and defend against any armed vessels sailing under the British or French flag, so long as their orders or decrees are unrevoked.

Mr. KEY, after stating the importance of the alternatives presented to the decision of the Committee by this motion for amendment, moved that the Committee now rise, to give time for mature deliberation.—Agreed to without debate.

And on motion, the House adjourned until tomorrow.

Repeal of the Embargo.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

SATURDAY, February 4.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, accompanied with his report, exhibiting a statement of the whole number of persons born in foreign countries, and legally admitted citizens of the United States by naturalization, who have been registered as American seamen, and returned as such to the Department of State, according to the lists transmitted by the Collectors of the Customs, in pursuance of the law relative "to the relief and protection of American seamen," transmitted in obedience to a resolution of this House, of the ninth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied with a supplementary report and sundry documents in relation to invalid pensioners; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HOLMES from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of John N. Stout; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. LIVERMORE presented memorials of sundry inhabitants of the county of Essex, in the State of Massachusetts, whose names are thereunto subscribed, respectively praying for the reasons therein set forth, that the several laws of Congress laying and enforcing an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States may be repealed; and that the system of just, equal, and liberal policy, which heretofore, in the opinion of the memorialists, was calculated to promote the honor, dignity, and general welfare of the Union, may be restored.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the resolution proposed by Mr. NICHOLAS, and Mr. BACON, on the twenty-fourth and twenty-seventh ultimo.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate, of the third instant, for the appointment of a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election; and to regulate the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President: Whereupon.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said resolution; and that Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. CUTTS, be appointed a committee on the part of this House, pursuant thereto.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, accompanied with sundry documents and statements, exhibiting the measures authorized by the board, subsequent to their report, dated the fifth of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

A bill from the Senate for the incorporation of religious societies in the District of Columbia having been read,

Mr. W. ALSTON moved to reject it.

The motion was supported by Mr. ALSTON and Mr. RBEA, of Tennessee, on the ground that it bore the appearance of commencing an established religion in this country, which was repugnant to the principles of the Constitution; and that the States should not intermeddle with the church; the two, church and State, being wholly distinct.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. DAVENPORT, LEWIS, VAN HORN, DANA, TALLMADGE, GARDENIER, and MACON, for the reason that the House had heretofore incorporated turnpike and library companies, and it was hoped that the House would not show so much disrespect to religion as to reject it on its first appearance in the House; and that, even if the bill were not perfect, it might be amended before it was passed; that it was but a decent attention to the people of the District of Columbia, to consider the bill, for their petitions were too much disregarded.

Mr. W. ALSTON finally withdrew his motion, and the bill was read a second time, and ordered to be read a third time.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution; the question pending being on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion to amend it—

Mr. KEY said he had never risen under more embarrassment to address a public body than he now did; for there never was presented to him to act upon before, a subject of so momentous a nature—a subject which involved in its discussion and effects, certainly the best and dearest interests of the country. It seems, (said he,) if I correctly understood the proceedings of yesterday, that a large majority of this House is determined to repeal the embargo, but that a great diversity of opinion exists as to the measure which is proper to be adopted on its repeal. I confess, sir, I feel gratified in observing that diversity of opinion; for, in the collision of contrary sentiment, much good may elicit, when every individual offers to the House his candid views of the subject. And I see in that diversity of sentiment, sir, a pledge of strong attachment to the interests of the country, influencing every member to consult his own breast as to those measures which shall best promote our interest, when the embargo shall be removed. Various propositions have been submitted to the Committee; but before I examine them I would ask every member of this honorable body, to consult himself to see what is the end proposed, and to consider the means to attain that end. Is the end war? Is it to compel France to respect her treaty with us; or to coerce Great Britain to make one? Certainly not. These ideas have not been advanced on this floor. What then do gentlemen contemplate as the end proposed? I hope it is this: that the nation shall be placed, in relation to foreign Powers, in the same situation in which it stood, anterior to the passage of the orders and decrees. I wish the ground I mean to occupy in argument, to be distinctly comprehended; and I wish gentlemen would deeply reflect if, on raising the embargo, they mean to place themselves in the same position in which they stood, anterior to the causes which produced the embargo. If this be the end, if this is the object, let the wisdom of this House devise the means most suitable to the accomplishment of that end. It is in vain to call our attention to the course to be pursued, unless we see, and feel, and examine its adequacy to the end proposed. Every honorable member will make up his own mind as to his object; and then consider as to the means necessary to effect it. Some gentlemen talk of war. High and honorable minds, spurning the insults done to the nation, bring into public discussion those feelings so much to be estimated in private life, but which, influencing our passions, to a great degree impair our judgments; for however the finer feelings may be the ornament of private life, in legislation the cool exercise of sound reason is more to be desired. A nation's honor is a nation's happiness. Government was instituted for the happiness of the people, and those measures are most wise, and most honorable, which best promote and secure it. I shall not speak of war with respect to all those calamities usually consequent on it, for, if we are driven into it by imperious necessity, I know that we have firmness enough to breast it, to meet the shock as men ought—but I will make some observations on it, to show gentlemen why I think that the first proposition ought not to prevail as part of our system; and especially as growing out of the feelings which have been expressed.

Repeal of the Embargo.

A large army has been spoken of. If our object be the protection of maritime rights, and securing the enjoyment of the ocean, I ask gentlemen if raising a body of fifty thousand men well armed and well disciplined is a measure which in itself can in any means insure that object? But, say gentlemen, we can take Canada, and injure one of our enemies by conquering New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. And, I ask, what then? Gratify gentlemen to the extent of their wishes; place Canada in our possession; place Halifax in our possession—won, if won, at great cost; and kept, if to be retained, at incessant and heavy expense—grant all this, I ask gentlemen will it further the object they have in view? Can a single ship, if the whole continent was in our possession, reach an European port in more safety than she now can? Are the means proportioned to that end? I think not. If we are to seize hold of this lever as a political engine to operate on one of our enemies, we must first see the cost, the probability of success, and the certainty of effect when the success is achieved. In defensive war I would compute no cost. If invasion hovered on our shores I would never calculate. Our altars and our fire-sides must be defended; and the last cent and last drop of blood in the country be cheerfully expended. Not so of offensive war; when it is not for the defence of our altars and our fire-sides, I would calculate with the precision and coolness of a counting-house. The nation ought to know the cost; we ought to see the object, and, when accomplished, a reasonable ground of belief that it will insure the end designed. If all America was consolidated into one great Power, with all the legions of Napoleon and the funds of France, we should still be, as Napoleon now is, incapable of getting from our own shores. I speak of the means proposed in relation to the end, viz: to protect and enforce our maritime rights. I cannot therefore consent to means inadequate and irrelevant to the end, and which we have not the physical force to accomplish. I know the power of this country; I believe it is competent to the reduction of the British provinces. I have very little doubt of it. But if conquered, in what state will they be placed in relation to us? As conquered provinces. Have we a Constitutional right so to hold them? Are they to be incorporated as States? No gentleman wishes or entertains that idea. They will only be held as a stake for the purpose of inducing Great Britain to do justice to us. Would the conquest of those territories have such effect on Great Britain that it would induce her to surrender rights which she deems essential to her existence? She would suffer her provinces to perish before she would abandon maritime claims of such moment. Sir, the possession of those provinces could not in my mind operate as a lever, for what man would not part with a member when his life is at stake? What nation would not lop off an extremity before she would sacrifice a principle which she holds as incorporated with her existence? I ask gentlemen, therefore, if the conquest of these countries will more than probably produce the effect which they anticipate. Possibly it may not produce that effect? And shall we encounter war for a probable or possible result? For, whatever these provinces might have been to Britain, such has been the singular and rapid succession of events in Europe, that she seems to have received her prosperity and safety from the hand of her most deadly enemy. The attack of Bonaparte on Portugal has so connected her with the Brazils, and his assault on Spain has so identified her with South America, that, whether she be successful or not, Britain finds an indemnity, more than tenfold for what she would lose by our capture of her Northern provinces; she will have derived it too from a source which never meant to confer prosperity on her—from her most inveterate enemy. A gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) in a very strong argument (though I differ from him in his conclusions) delivered in a manner the most gentlemanly and decorous to the House and himself, did admit that Great Britain never before stood so high and firm as she does now. The avenues opened to her on the Southern continent will tend very much to the furtherance and increase of her force. And so standing, we ought not to wage offensive war against that country and her provinces in America, unless gentlemen can demonstrate to us that it is our interest to risk their conquest, and when we have expended vast sums in that conquest, to hold them as provinces or to incorporate them as States; unless indeed we consider them as a pledge for her better behaviour—a pledge which she will never redeem if she holds to those principles, which all believe she will never abandon. One great right in contest, which we are told by her Ministers that she never will cede, is the right to search American vessels for British seamen. Does any rational politician believe that if she considers that practice connected with her existence, she will abandon it to recover out of our hands those provinces which at any moment we can attain? Surely not, sir—the war will be of a different cast. I do therefore suppose that a measure of this nature, until war becomes necessary and indispensable, ought not to be attempted.

There are other causes which should make this nation pause and reflect, before it attempts offensive war. We are an agricultural people, a peaceful people. The bond of our union was mutual defence. We are not constituted with active powers for offensive operations; but we are all-powerful for defensive measures. In a state of war, armies will become necessary; and even when necessary, they are always dangerous to republics. Their shield and safety is a well regulated militia. I have no doubt, if war is declared, that we shall raise a great force; and if we do, it is war that will jeopardize the independence of the several States. Their security ever exists on a militia officered as the Constitution provides, by themselves; because such a body feels local State attachments, and does not look up to the General Government for protection and patronage. An army so constructed only binds more firmly the Republic; but a standing army for offensive war goes to shake our republican institutions. I have lately seen, what does in my mind excite some jealousy on these subjects, not from any general view of the departments of our Government, but in a measure emanating from one department. It shows, if danger is to arise, it is not from the States, but from the General Government, and not to the General Government from the States. By the Constitution a State can raise no army or navy, and has no protection but the militia, officered by itself—and yet, sir, I have seen a letter from the Secretary of War to the Chief Magistrates of the different States, not infringing the letter but the spirit of the Constitution, by prescribing to those Governors what officers in the late call for their quota of militia they shall select. It would properly be the duty of that department to say what number of the militia should form the quota of each State; and I trust our Governors have sufficient respect for their States and the Union to select officers most competent to command them, without being schooled as to the manner of selection, suggested to them in terms highly exceptionable, as printed in the circulars said to have been addressed to the Executives of the different States:—"They will be careful in their selection of officers, to take such as can be confided in for all purposes." I do not say that improper purposes were intended. Let not gentlemen misunderstand me. I say that the Department of War has no right to interfere in any manner with the selection of officers of the militia, which is exclusively confided to the State Executives, who are competent at all times to do their duty.

Another evil grows out of war and a standing army: a vast patronage is placed at the disposition of one man, and I would not, but in a case of absolute imperious necessity, trust any man, even the humblest in society, with the command and patronage of fifty thousand men; a power which in republics should never be vested in any man but when war is indispensable, when it is forced upon us. Ambition is awakened by the means of carrying it into effect. The instrument suggests its own use; and ambition, once awakened, like jealousy, makes the food it feeds on. Iron and stone are two of the most inert and quiescent substances in nature—harmless asunder, but bring them in contact, and the collision elicits fire. So the heart of man and power, are safe when separate, but when united, power is abused by almost as unerring a law of nature as fire is produced from the collision of flint and steel. This state of things, this danger, invariably grows out of placing power in the hands of one man, of which examples may readily be cited from ancient and modern times. When Cæsar invaded Gaul, when Napoleon was at the military school, in Paris, when Cromwell petitioned Charles for liberty to come to America—these men, in their wanton dreams, never dreamt of the guilty and giddy heights to which their ambition ascended. Power was at hand; they seized the ready instrument, a standing army, and history in blood has recorded the consequences.

Suppose a state of things to have occurred in 1802, similar to the present—war not forced upon us, but fifty thousand men raised, the officers appointed by the President. How would the destinies of the nation have been wielded, if Providence had taken the President from us? Who would have wielded that force? Aaron Burr—and does any man believe, if that force had been at his disposal, that he would not have crimsoned the Presidential chair with the best blood of the country before he would have left it? I mean no imputation on the present or the future President; I do not believe that we are in military danger from either. But the country that acts wisely will never place in any hands, but in extreme cases, power of such magnitude; and I believe it is a maxim consecrated by ages "that the people are never in so much danger as when power is placed in the hands of those of whom they have no suspicion." Take history through and you will find it so. But although, in the hands of the gentleman now in office or his successor, this power might not be abused—and I mean not to impute to them motives which I am sure they do not possess—but a few lives intervene between them and some one, we know not whom. How he would wield that force none of us can say. I am confident when Burr was elected to the Vice-Presidency by a Constitutional majority of votes, no man then dreamt how he would have abused the power, had death removed the President. My argument then is this: that except in a moment of extremity it is not wise for a Republican Government to resort to raising an army, because the possession of power begets a disposition to abuse it, which otherwise might never have existed. I would not go to war, therefore, unless the nation could be satisfied of the certainty of success, and of the effect of such success on such end as they proposed to attain. I am confident, if we had conquered the British provinces and had now embodied an army of fifty thousand men, it would in no degree insure to us the free navigation of the ocean. I have made these observations, because to my mind they have weight in rejecting the second part of the first proposition, which is war—I mean the granting of letters of marque and reprisal. It is not general or perfect war, but it is war as far as it goes, and is usually the forerunner and precursor of immediate war. If then that state of things which may endanger our Republican institutions is not forced upon us, I would avoid every measure leading to war until it was indispensable. I say nothing of the horrors of it which desolate all Europe. We are as yet a peaceful and as yet a happy people, and I am sure we all feel the strongest desire to add to that happiness. That can be best secured by continuing at peace, certainly not by waging offensive war. Gentlemen may think, sir, that I mean to submit. I do not—I mean to chalk out a plan precisely commensurate with the causes of offence. We are not now on a general question of peace or war; but as to what measure shall be adopted on the removal of the embargo to obviate those effects against which, it is said, the embargo was intended to secure us. Why was the embargo laid? I do not speak of its effects. Out of what occasion did it grow? Consult the Executive Message recommending it. From the decrees of France and Orders in Council of Great Britain. Was it not to obviate the inconveniences resulting from those measures that the embargo was advised and laid? Remove the embargo then, and what measure do you want? A measure precisely commensurate with the cause for which you laid the embargo—a measure to resist those decrees and Orders in Council, and place us in the relative situation in which we stood before its adoption. Am I correct in saying that the embargo was not intended or recommended as a war measure? If it was in part an expedient to retaliate on foreign nations for their decrees and Orders in Council, raise the embargo, because it is found to be inadequate to the end. And what should you substitute in the place of it? A line of conduct commensurate with the causes which produced that measure. The ground I mean to occupy is this: that we are not now debating a measure for the redress of all former evils or injuries which have been heaped upon us by those Governments. I do not so understand it; perhaps I am wrong. I ask gentlemen to weigh what I have said, and to say whether, if we remove the embargo, the substitute ought not to be a measure of resistance commensurate with the injury. I am with great candor and sincerity delivering the little all of my mind on this occasion. I ask it to be fairly understood and distinctly viewed, and I would then ask whether the plan which I shall mark out, instead of continuing the embargo, be not the proper substitute, if a substitute must be had? The British have claimed the right of searching our vessels for British seamen. This claim has been the subject of treaty negotiation time after time; it was made the sine qua non of a treaty. The British Ministry told you that the nation could not come up to the mark, but that they would make the operation of the principle as little oppressive in practice as they could. Grant for argument sake that this arrangement was not as satisfactory as it ought to have been. Do gentlemen mean to adopt a measure to meet that? If so, it must be war and interminable war; for they say they will not abandon it, and we say we will insist on it. I want that, and all other questions to be left open as before, for, although our commerce was greatly oppressed under that practice, still it flourished; our country prospered and grew in strength and riches.

The second proposition under consideration, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON) goes too far. I grant that it is not up to the war point; but it goes too far from the line of discrimination which I make; because it authorizes the resistance of violations of our general neutral rights claimed on our part to be exempted from, and on the part of the British to be enforced. It is interfering with the state of things which existed between the two countries before the decrees and Orders in Council. I want gentlemen to repeal the embargo because it is not efficacious, and to adopt a measure (if any is to be adopted) which shall be precisely commensurate with it. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, though not up to the war mark, is too far from the ground which I occupy, that is, to place this country in the same situation in respect to its foreign relations in which it stood when the decrees and orders were passed, to resist which or to cause which to be repealed the embargo was laid. Take it off, then, and take a substitute which shall be coequal with it. I have not heard you called upon to take off the embargo, and adopt a measure to remedy all the evils occurring before it; we should by this get into a state of things which would be war. The House will pause, reflect, ask themselves the point they mean to go back to, and whenever they have made up their minds on that point, accordingly as they determine, they will be for war, or arming our merchant ships, to resist seizure, or any search growing out of the decrees and orders. This is the line of distinction which I take. It is not hard to be drawn; we know the diplomatic battle-ground antecedent to the orders and decrees. Leave it open to negotiation. Restore us to our ancient state of things. If we were not happy with many rights violated, it was at least more satisfactory than our present situation. And this is precisely what the President recommended—for our Minister was authorized to offer to England a repeal of the embargo, on rescinding her Orders in Council, and this was to produce the anti-embargo state of things. The proposition offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) yesterday, with a slight amendment, will meet my idea. I do not ask gentlemen to submit when they take off the embargo. They have told the nation that they will not submit—to what? To general violations of our rights? No, sir. The report of our Committee of Foreign Relations was predicated wholly on the decrees and Orders in Council, and they saw no alternative but submission to them, war, or embargo. These are the alternatives growing out of the state of our foreign relations, in the opinion of the committee. I would not keep on the embargo, or declare war; neither would I submit, because if anything is to be done I would arm our vessels to resist any attempt at search under those orders. I ask gentlemen if this be not an efficacious plan—to arm for the purpose of resisting those decrees and those orders, to cause which to be removed was the reason why they laid the embargo? I do not understand the embargo as having been laid on the principle that it was to coerce England to abandon the right to the impressment of our seamen. I do not understand it as having been laid to produce reparation for the attack on the Chesapeake. All these were conspiring causes which might have led to the laying of it, but they were not avowedly by this measure intended to be redressed. Does any man believe that the embargo was laid to continue till Great Britain should formally abandon the right of impressing her own seamen? The orders and decrees not being repealed by the agency of the embargo, gentlemen say we will not submit to them. Granted; I do not mean it. I mean to resist in terms those decrees, and I mean to make my resistance precisely commensurate with the objects which that measure was destined to attain. I want the substitute, if we are to have one, to go as far and no farther; and in so doing and going no farther, I believe we shall act wisely. I think peace may grow out of it; and we shall be restored to that state of things which may probably—I wish to God I could say certainly—at no distant day induce a settlement of our differences. If we go to war on any other grounds, we say that we will fight Great Britain till she comes to our terms. Sir, gentlemen will pause, will consult their pillow, before they go so far; they will leave the door to negotiation open. To me this seems an honorable plan and a fair course, calculated to restore our country to peace within, I trust to happiness also, and to a fair adjustment of our other differences. I have listened with great attention to every observation on this subject which has fallen from every member on the floor, and have said nothing. But I should be wanting in duty to my country and respect to myself if I did not, with as much perspicuity as I could, simply submit to the judgment of this House those propositions which would in my mind conduct us to the most desired issue—I mean the most probable one which would accomplish our end. I do hope and trust, if the embargo, as a measure of coercion, was laid for the purpose of meeting the decrees and orders, that gentlemen will vote for the repeal of the embargo, and that they will be satisfied with adopting the motion which I have proposed to substitute—unless indeed, finding the inefficiency of the measure, they will concur in an unconditional repeal, and make another effort at negotiation, unfettered by acts that diminish the prospect of success.

Mr. MILNOR congratulated the House on the vote of yesterday. He hailed it, and the nation would hail it, as the harbinger of a new day. He received it as a proof of the patriotism of the majority of this House, who, seeing the nation severely oppressed by a measure which was adopted as an experiment, and which had failed in its object, had come to a resolution to relieve the nation from its further pressure. I confess, however, said Mr. M., that the second part of the proposition now before you has, to my mind, an aspect of a highly alarming character. If I correctly understand it, it leads the nation to direct and open warfare; and, indeed, the gentleman who offered the resolution so explained it. Viewing it in this light, I can never give my consent to it, until I am convinced that the nation is brought into that situation, that there is no other mode of saving its honor than by a resort to war. Believing, as I do, that this is not the case at present, I wish to offer a few observations to the Committee, as the ground upon which I shall oppose the second part of the resolution, and of course why I am in favor of striking it out, for the purpose of introducing an amendment. When a nation is about to involve itself in war, it appears to me that it should not only be convinced that the ground of war is a just one, but that the end proposed to be attained by war is probably within its reach. As to the first point, I have no hesitation in saying that the two great belligerents of Europe have given us ample and repeated causes for war. On that ground, therefore, I should feel no hesitation in going with gentlemen in favor of this proposition, did I believe that the policy of this nation warranted it, and that the end proposed would be, in this manner, attained. It is proper, however, to ask ourselves in what way we are to operate on the belligerents in order to produce the desired effect. It has been said by gentlemen who appear to be ready for the adoption of this proposition, that we can attack and take Canada and Nova Scotia; and that such a measure would be severely felt by Great Britain. That we are competent to take Canada I have no doubt; but I am so far from believing that the conquest of Nova Scotia would be an easy task, that I do not think it is in the power of this nation to accomplish it, unless we could first procure to ourselves an ascendancy on the ocean. That does not appear to be probable at this time. I am therefore persuaded that our only operation in that quarter would be the taking of Canada. The gentleman last up (Mr. Kew) has shown very clearly that the conquest of Canada, and the securing of that conquest, would cost more than it would be worth; and that it would not be efficient for the object for which we should attempt it. I believe that experience, in a little time, would teach Great Britain that the loss of Canada would be, in fact, an immaterial loss to her empire. But, in another point of view, this conquest might have a very injurious effect on our affairs. At present, there can be no doubt but the people of Great Britain are much divided in opinion in respect to their hostile measures against our neutral rights. I do not believe that the people of that nation can be unanimous in a measure which the Ministry themselves do not justify as a right, but as a measure of necessary retaliation upon their enemy. If, in order to redress ourselves, we make an attack upon a part of the British Empire and dismember it, we at once arouse the pride of the people, induce them to attach themselves to their Government, to justify their measures of retaliation upon us, and thus, in all probability, prolong the contest, and perpetuate those measures of which we complain. In what other way could we operate on Great Britain in such a manner as to make any great impression on her? I know that it is the belief of some persons that we could, by fitting out privateers, so harass her commerce as to make a very serious impression on her, and at the same time indemnify our merchants for their losses in the contest. I confess that I have not full faith in this part of the experiment. I believe we should find that the impression to be made on her commerce in this way would not be anything equal to what was made by us during our Revolutionary war. At that time the system of convoys was not carried to the extent that it now is; at that time the merchant ships frequently crossed the ocean singly, or in companies of two or three together, and therefore it was in the power of our privateers to capture and bring in many of them. Few are now permitted to sail singly; they generally go under the protection of strong convoys. I believe, therefore, that it would soon be found that privateering would be an extremely unprofitable business. If, then, we could not make a serious impression, by our efforts either on land or water, I would ask in what way are we likely to accomplish the object in view? To carry on a war against us, it appears to me that Great Britain would be put to very little additional expense. She has been obliged to resort to every means of offence and defence against her European enemies; and the very weapons which she makes use of against them she could, in part, turn against us, without adding anything to her expenditure. Thus, while she can carry on the war with facility against us, it will be far different with us. By going to war we deprive ourselves of almost all the commerce of the world; we deprive ourselves of the opportunity of deriving revenue from those sources from which we have hitherto received it; and, at the same time, reduce our citizens to such a situation of distress and privation as to render them wholly unable to bear the burden of internal taxes which must be resorted to, to raise the necessary supplies. I believe that, in a war of defence, for the protection of the soil, this country is invulnerable; I believe that there is no sacrifice which would not be cheerfully offered up by our fellow-citizens in support of such a war; there the hands and the hearts of the people would be with you; but when we are called upon to enter into a war of offence for the attainment and security of certain ends, which there is by no means a certainty of attaining; a war, of which it is impossible to foresee the consequences or to fix the probable period of its termination; it is putting the happiness and safety of our country too much at risk to plunge into such a war. You may involve the nation in such a war, and when they find themselves engaged in it, they will feel bound to carry it on; but I venture to predict that the Administration, or the majority, which involves the nation in such a war, will not long exist. The nation is not prepared for war. It has been justly observed, sir, that the nation is yet in a state of infancy; it is growing fast, and if nothing to impede its growth or destroy its strength be done at this day, it will soon assume the form and vigor of manhood; it will soon arrive at that masculine state, that it will be able not only to repel aggressions, but to chastise the aggressors. I have already stated that, in a just and necessary war, a war which is no longer to be avoided without a sacrifice of national honor and national rights, I shall be as ready to engage as any man in the nation; but I do not believe we are yet reduced to that situation; and when I view the critical situation of the European world engaged in a most sanguinary conflict, and then turn my eyes to the peaceful and happy situation of my own country, I cannot consent to engage her rashly in the doubtful contest.

Repeal of the Embargo.

H. OF R.

The report of the committee on our foreign relations states three alternatives, out of which it is said we must take a choice; these are, embargo, war, or submission. The last is rejected by every man. It would seem, then, that there is only a choice between embargo and war. If the arguments of gentlemen in the minority had been attended to, if they had been coolly and carefully weighed and examined, I think it would have been seen that there was another course, a path by which we could travel in safety, which, while it would lead us from embargo, would avoid war. This path has been repeatedly pointed out to you before this day; and has been now again repeated by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Key.) It is this: repeal your embargo, and suffer your merchants to arm their ships in their own defence; to resist the violation of our lawful commerce. I would not grant them letters of marque and reprisal, because that would be war, but I would authorize them, in every case, to resist unlawful seizures and detentions. If I have any idea of what would be the true course of policy for this Government to pursue, this is that course. If I have a right understanding of what is truly meant by the terms submission and resistance, I most certainly think the proposition I have made is essentially resistance; that sort of resistance which our country is capable of making, and which would show to the enemy that we would not submit to their unjust orders and decrees. I shall not now enter into an argument to show that the embargo is submission; that has been sufficiently done on a former occasion. I never did believe that the embargo would have a coercive effect on either of the belligerents. Entertaining this opinion, when I saw the nation retiring from the ocean, in order to avoid the effects of the injurious orders and decrees of other Powers, in compliance, as it were, with their mandates, it appeared to me as the most complete, not to say disgraceful, submission.

H. of R.

Repeal of the Embargo.

A gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) addressed you a few days ago, sir, and told you that he considered the minority as holding the destinies of the nation; that it was in their power to regulate the course hereafter to be pursued. I confess that, when the gentleman made that observation, it excited some surprise as well as pleasure in my mind. I felt happy in the momentary idea, that I might, perhaps, be instrumental in so directing the course of this nation, that we might at once avoid Scylla and Charybdis. I could not, however, distinctly understand the gentleman's meaning in the declaration which he made. He did not tell us in what way the minority possessed the power which he spoke of; he did not explain himself sufficiently to show that the minority do indeed hold the destinies of the nation in their hands. Sir, the destinies of the nation, so far as human power extends, are and must be in the hands of the majority; they are responsible to the nation for the course which shall be pursued, and it is not in their power by any legerdemain to shift that responsibility from their shoulders to those of the minority. I believe that, so far as the power of the minority extends, they would use it to direct the course of the nation in such a manner as to promote its peace, happiness, and lasting prosperity; and could they, indeed, guide its destinies, they would, on the one hand, spurn the idea of submitting the rights and independence of the nation, while, on the other, they would, if possible, avoid involving their country in a calamitous and ruinous war.

There is one point of view in which this subject has passed over my mind, and on which I feel extreme delicacy in expressing myself, because I do not know how far it may be allowable for me to touch on a topic, into which I do not wish to enter improperly, but which is so important that I have never lost sight of it when considering this subject. As the resolution is penned, it contemplates a hostile resistance to both belligerents; an offensive war against them. Its object has been so explained by the gentleman who brought it forward. I endeavored to show, when I first rose, how far we might operate against Great Britain in an offensive war. Can we act with any great effect upon France? Have we those means of operating upon her by war, so as to induce her to rescind her decrees? I confess

I have never yet been able to see where she is vulnerable to attack from us, or how she is to make an attack on us. She has no possessions on this continent, nor any commerce on the ocean. To me it appears that, although we ostensibly make a declaration of war against both belligerents, the contest, in reality, will be but with one. When we shall have entered into this contest, we shall find that, with Great Britain, we shall have an active conflict, with France a mere war of words; with her, action cannot take place. After we shall have been engaged in the contest for a short time, having received many severe and bloody blows from Great Britain, the irritation of the nation would be excited to the highest possible degree, and of course the disposition to continue the war with her would be greatly increased. On the part of France no such circumstances could occur. Having felt no serious effects from her hostility, we should have no strong incentive, arising from suffering, to continue a war with her. The higher the irritation was excited against the one, the more it would be allayed towards the other.

The Emperor of the French, seeing one of the fondest objects of his solicitude accomplished, that of inducing America to follow the example of the European nations, by engaging in the war against Great Britain; seeing us engaged in a contest from which we cannot withdraw, without dishonor and disgrace, will come to an accommodation with us. I know not what other gentlemen may think of such a result as this, but I confess that I do not wish to see it. Sir, I dread that man's friendship infinitely more than his enmity; that kind of friendship, I mean, which would connect us with him as his allies; I shrink from it with horror. Where is the nation which has accepted of his friendship, that is not now his vassal? Perhaps there is one solitary instance to the contrary; Russia may be an exception, thanks to her power. But, excepting this, where is the nation to whom he has extended his friendly hand, that its touch, more deleterious in its effects than the poisonous effluvia of the bohon upas, has not quickly withered their liberties? Believing that all the professions of this man, about the freedom of the seas, are insincere and hollow; that he has no more regard for the freedom of the seas than for the liberty of the land. I have no desire to join him in the contest. Were we now to humble Great Britain, to get possession of her fleet, and to rule ever Europe, is there any gentlemen in this Committee who can persuade himself, for an instant, that he would respect the liberty of the seas? If any gentleman, with all the experience which we have had of the conduct of that man, can persuade himself of such a result, I should pity his head while I did justice to his heart. I have no doubt, in case the event alluded to takes place, that we shall have the highest professions of friendship; not only professions, sir, but acts. No doubt but he would be generous enough to loan us money, and officers and men to carry on his war. He lent them to Spain, sir; he sent his officers and his legions into her empire for her protection; and when he had got them placed at the proper points, he then did as, in every other instance he had done where he had the power; he told them they were no longer free, that Spain was no longer a nation; that they must accept of a new master. I have not the least doubt but he would pursue the same course with us, if he had the opportunity. He would not only lend us the means of subjugating us, but, in his gracious condescension, I have no doubt but he would also lend us a royal brother to rule over us, to ameliorate our condition.

Gentlemen may suppose, sir, that these are mere fanciful ideas, which we are in no danger of realizing. I hope, indeed, we shall not realize them; and that, in order, to escape a result so calamitous, we shall avoid the ensnaring friendship of that man. Viewing the present disastrous situation of the world; seeing the whole of Europe groaning under the miseries of war and desolation; engaged in a contest, to the termination of which no man can look with any certainty, I am anxiously desirous of preserving my country from its vortex. Whether the Committee shall be of opinion with me that the dangers I have pointed out are to be apprehended or not, yet the calamities and disasters of war are so great, that we ought to pause and to ask ourselves, what is its object, and what will be the probable result? Is there any probability that, by entering into a war at this time, with both France and Great Britain, we can accomplish the object we have in view? Can we so act upon them as to compel them to indemnify us for the past, or to respect our rights for the future? I have endeavored to show, sir, what I conscientiously believe, that we cannot. Impressed with this firm conviction, I trust that the good sense of this Committee will induce them, before they try the last awful resort, to use every honorable expedient for the preservation of peace.

I shall be in favor of striking out the words of the resolution which relate to granting letters of marque and reprisal; but I do not very well like the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in lieu of them. I had drawn up an amendment which I had wished to have proposed; and, for the information of the Committee, I will read it. It is to follow the word "authorizing;" in the resolution, and is in these words:

"Under suitable regulations and restrictions, to be provided by law, the citizens of the United States to arm their ships, for their own defence, against illegal seizures and detentions when engaged in lawful commerce."

The difference between the amendment under consideration, and that which I propose, consists in this: that the former points to an opposition to all searches or seizures as long as the orders and decrees are in existence; the latter to an opposition to seizures and detentions under those orders and decrees, contrary to the laws of nations. Now, there are certain rights of belligerents as well as of neutrals on the ocean, to which I think it proper that all nations should submit.

There are certain clear and defined laws of nations, which, for the sake of preserving peace, we ought to adhere to. It is true that the orders and decrees, of which we complain, violate neutral rights, and trample upon those principles which ought to be held sacred: but I do not think that a departure from justice on their part, would make it good policy in us to follow their example; I am not willing, because they violate neutral rights, that we should resist acknowledged belligerent rights. It is always a maxim with me to leave my enemy in the wrong; and I hold it to be a correct principle in national as well as individual concerns. By so doing you have a decided advantage over him, and, in his moments of reflection, if he has any, he will discover your superiority over him, and will feel a disposition to do you justice, in order to be on an equality with you.

As the measure for which the substitute is proposed, has been brought forward, not in opposition to the acknowledged rights of nations, but only to their unjust orders and decrees, I should wish whatever substitute we adopt to have the same tendency; that it should be opposed to all illegal seizures and detentions, but not to those searches admitted by the general law of nations. I wish, in the measures that we adopt, that we may be careful not to extend the ground of collision; I wish our measures to be confined within such bounds, that it shall not create a jealousy on their part, that we mean to contend, at this particular time, for things which we have not heretofore contended for, things which we know they will not concede. It is in this view of the subject that I prefer the amendment, which I have read, to that offered by the gentleman from Virginia. The resolution is only the foundation of a bill into which all the necessary restrictions and regulations may be introduced. It will be necessary, if we permit our merchants to arm, to place them under proper restrictions, or the nation might be involved in a war by the acts of individuals. If the amendment should take place, it will be an evidence to the belligerents that we are peaceably disposed; that, while we are determined not to surrender our rights, we are anxious for an amicable adjustment with them upon honorable terms. I believe that this will have a better effect in inducing them to repeal their unjust edicts, than all the open and avowed hostility which we can make against them. I trust that until every honorable means of preserving peace have been exhausted, until we are convinced that there is no other way of preserving our national honor and independence, that a majority of this Committee and of Congress will not be disposed to rush madly into a ruinous and destructive war.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, he hoped that the House would do him the justice to believe, for he had given many proofs of it, that although he had talked much about war lately, he felt just as strong an aversion against going to war, while peace can be preserved without disgrace, as any man could do. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) cannot feel more than I do on the subject of foreign relations, except in one particular point of view—that submission to the edicts of Great Britain and France, seems to him less heinous, less dreadful to the national interests than it does to me. The gentleman has read to you an amendment, which he would propose. What was its tendency? To permit your merchantmen to pay the tribute armed, rather than defenceless, as if the mere permission to arm could vary the terms or the operation of the belligerent edicts. Were you not told by him that he most sincerely believed that by war, or by any measure which you could adopt, Great Britain would not be induced to repeal her Orders in Council? And yet he attempted to persuade you, it is expedient to depend upon the very feeblest effort that can be made, as resistance, when in the same breath, he declared the whole energies of the nation, exerted in open war, would be inadequate. In advocating the repeal of the embargo, then, he must be for submission. The gentleman shakes his head. Sir, I wish he would be so good as to tell us, if not submission, what it is he is for?

Mr. MILNOR said that he would not submit. He had endeavored to show that the course which he proposed to pursue would not be submission. If he had failed to convince the gentleman from South Carolina of it, it was not his fault; but while he believed that such a measure would be more essential resistance than the embargo, he should give it preference. To satisfy the gentleman from South Carolina on the subject of submission to tribute, he could observe, that he was ready to adopt any measure which the gentleman could point out, to prevent the payment of tribute.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that he was much obliged to the gentleman, and would, in three words, tell him how to avoid paying a tribute—continue the embargo. For the gentleman and the minority to help him, who seem willing to accept of what he could not but consider a tributary commerce, can—the embargo repealed—devise no mode of preventing the payment of the tribute by our merchantmen short of war.

To my plain understanding, sir, the amendment, as proposed, ends in this: That our vessels bound to England will, if they make any show of resistance, do it by Quaker guns. Every gentleman, in the least acquainted with maritime phrases, understands the term; while, on the contrary, if they do resist, it will only be to involve you in a war with France—an inducement, I believe, with many of its advocates for supporting it. We have now arrived at a period when the sentiments of every member should be explicitly known. That moment you put the country in a situation which subjects its commerce to tribute, I am for war with Great Britain, because any course short of war makes you tributary to her.

Some days since, I declared to the minority—it was in the sincerity of my heart I spoke—that they could save the country from its present dreadful situation. They know that they have produced a state of things that must not be suffered to exist. They have reduced us to the alternative of enforcing the law by physical force, or of repealing it. That they still possess the power to put down the effervescence they have excited, I cannot doubt; for while the inhabitants of the South are forming patriotic associations to enforce the law, some in the North, so excited, are exerting themselves to prevent its execution. I called upon them then, I entreat them now, to remember what are the dearest interests of their country—to put down the opposition to the law. By silencing it what will they do? Endear themselves to the nation—merit its thanks—save the Government without the aid of the bayonet from the disgrace of imbecility—and, in so doing, must necessarily save the character of the nation from the black stain incident to foreign taxation, and from sinking into the lowest state of degradation. This idea of tribute, of again becoming British colonies, I cannot think, much less speak of, with patience. I will begin in another place—of the embargo. Upon this subject gentlemen exert themselves, because they are interested in decrying it; for, when it was originally imposed, they told you that it would be ineffectual, and we all know some of them have done everything that could be considered necessary to realize the prophecy. Passing over the original causes altogether, subsequent events show, that the measure was wise. They wish now to induce the people to believe that it was not wise, not necessary, because in driving us from it, they drive us into war; and if the removal of it be followed by war, no matter in what way, gentlemen feel that they must take the responsibility of it to themselves. Sir, they have told us, in substance—for the open avowal would not do—that we were the basest creatures in the world; that we have neither virtue nor energy to direct the energies of the nation; that we imposed the embargo in subservience to France; and, unfounded as the accusation is, it has been the cry from one end of the country to the other. Now, sir, we approach the period when, from the excitement in the East, war may be preferable. What is the consequence? Why, sir, the very men who taxed you with base submission, with supererogation in submission, who vaped about national honor, and the maintenance of maritime rights, now warn you not to plunge the nation into war! And, in order to alarm and prevent you from defending the rights of the nation by arms, dilate upon the monstrous power of the belligerents opposed to you. The gentlemen have surely forgotten, that, when one of these very Powers was mistress of this country, of whose ablest Minister it has been truly said, that with one hand he smote the Bourbon on his throne, and in the other wielded the democracy of England, we fought with, and conquered our independence from her. Are we to be now told, if we are driven into a war, that we cannot resist her? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR) told you, that you cannot now get rid of the Orders in Council even by war; while you were yet in the gristle, you conquered from Great Britain the sovereignty of the soil we live on; and, lest this observation should be insufficient, you are conjured by others not to go to war, because the Executive has been wrong. Gentlemen entertain, at least detain, us, by reading the documents, hour after hour, to prove it. For God's sake, sir, supposing the Executive has been wrong from first to last, is this a reason why they will not resist foreign taxation? You are taxed more heavily by Great Britain than her own colonies are, or than you are by your own Government; you are in a much worse situation as to the exportation of the produce of your own soil, under the operation of the Orders in Council, than the island of Jamaica, and I can prove it if gentlemen deny it. The produce of that island, it is true, is necessarily constrained to be first deposited in Great Britain; but all the surplus of that produce is free to be exported thence, and entitled to drawback. Is it so with yours? No, sir, the great staple of the country, cotton, worth more than any two others, is coerced into England, and absolutely prohibited from exportation altogether. You are to raise cotton, to carry it to the British isle, and no where else. What does this amount to? Anything short of a positive assumption of the sovereignty of the soil? I heard a gentleman before me, (MR. RANDOLPH,) with a patriotism and warmth of eloquence which fired my bosom, exclaim against the violation of our territory in 1805. Touch the soil, said he, and you touch the life-blood of every man on it. What is your situation now? Every square foot of cultivated land in the country is laid under contribution, and gentlemen very coolly say they will repeal the embargo, and will not go to war under such circumstances until it is forced upon them. They want cause of war. Yes, sir, this is a truth, and take notice of it, that the British colonial system only requires the importation of colonial produce into the mother country. Your produce is placed in the same situation, with this addition: coerced into her ports, you are prohibited from re-exporting one great article, cotton, and on other articles duties of 40 and 50 per cent. are imposed on their re-exportation. And why, sir? They tell you that you must carry your cotton there, because they want it. What does Mr. Erskine tell you is the cause of the regulation in relation to cotton? Why, sir, he told you insultingly that you must look to the prosperous state of the French manufactures for the cause. And yet gentlemen want cause of war; they cannot in this see anything distressful to the country or disgraceful to its character.

I think, sir, that the best course which we can pursue would be to say nothing at all about the repeal of the embargo. And if gentlemen will do so, we may chance to have an accommodation of all our differences, because then an opportunity will be given to the Executive, which he will not otherwise have, to attempt an accommodation. It was considered a kind of treason here the other day when I spoke of an extra mission; but it is a very fashionable idea all over the House now. Even the worthy gentleman from Virginia before me (MR. RANDOLPH) has no objection to one more chance for accommodation. Now, if gentlemen will not go to war with us, and really they talk as if they will not, let them adhere to the embargo and give a chance for negotiation. Let us have this one other chance for an honorable accommodation.

I do really believe, sir, that war is preferable to submission. I have been educated in this kind of opinion, and I cannot give it up promptly. But it is unnecessary, say gentlemen; you can gain nothing by it. Suppose you had made this calculation during the Revolutionary war; suppose, Mr. Chairman, that you (MR. MACON) had been thinking of what you could make instead of marching to South Carolina, and losing your all in the common cause—where would you have been now? Would you ever have been Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States? Would any of these gentlemen have the honor of seats here? And shall we abandon them now without an exertion?

We are told that we must not go to war, because of the monstrous disproportion between our revenue and that of the British Government. Did not the disproportion exist in a greater degree during the Revolutionary war, when we were without a Government? Yes, sir; but you had that in abundance, in which I fear we are very deficient now—patriotism. You conquered the soil then without revenue—and will you stop to calculate what is the proportion of your revenue to that of Great Britain when she is bringing you to a worse state than you were in before you became free? For it is a fact that the state in which we are placed if we trade under the Orders in Council, is much worse than that which you, Mr. Chairman, assisted to redeem us from. One, certainly not the least of the attributes of sovereignty, is the power to lay taxes and consequently to repeal them—here is a tax imposed upon you without your consent—can you get it off? No, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania (MR. MILNOR.) Then, sir, we should abdicate the Government. You are taxed without your knowledge, against your consent. We cannot get it removed, says the gentleman. I do not believe it, sir; I would bury the last man in the country before I would accede to it.

A gentleman from New York, (MR. GARDENIER) says he wishes the nation to grow. I too wish it, if it could be allowed to grow in honor, in virtue, in patriotism; but if not, I would not desire it should "start a peg." Stop where you are, with honor, rather than grow in disgrace. I wish not to see the nation, to use the converse of his metaphor, like a great booby who has been told by his mother, "don't fight Billy till you grow big," and then he won't fight in defence of his own person; every little fellow in the street spurns him. The gentleman says, we may be a spunky, though a ricketty set of little fellows. Sir, I had rather be small, than a coward; a ricketty freeman, with one hand and one arm, than a slave with the handsomest appearance possible. The plain question presented for your determination is this; will you live slaves or die freemen? It is easy of solution; you can't find an American in the nation, so lost to honor, to feeling, as not to say, "I will not live a slave." And why not improve the opportunity to wipe off this stain? No, says the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. KEY.) there is reason to fear the Commander-in-Chief may be dangerous, an ambitious man, and overturn the Constitution. What, sir, can place us in a worse situation than we are now in? Suppose an army of fifty thousand men raised, with a Chief at its head, disposed to sacrifice our liberties, would you prefer that every attribute of sovereignty shall be blasted by Britain, rather than take the risk of having an ambitious General to resist her? If the Constitution is made of such brittle stuff as not to stand a single war; if it is only to be preserved by submission to foreign taxation, I shall very soon lose all solicitude for its preservation. The gentleman also talked about the dangers avoided by the development of Burr's real character, as if a foreign was to be preferred to a domestic tyrant. If I could choose in such a case, I would rather take my chance with the latter than the former; indeed, much rather have a sovereign from among our own native blood royal, than from the royal family of England. You know, sir, they are not apt to be overburdened with a certain, commodity, considered essential to good Government in this country.

Do not shackle us with war measures, let the nation grow, says the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER.) I am much mistaken, sir, if the gentleman himself was not the first who declared for war. I am positive he told you, months since, he was for a declaration of war against France; but now, Great Britain is the subject, he cries, don't shackle us with war measures. Can he have forgot his own description of the ambition and resources of Bonaparte? Has he forgot the picture which his friend from Connecticut (Mr. PITTIN) drew of the colossal power of Napoleon? The gentleman dwelt upon it so long, he really appeared towards the close, to be under an apprehension of its extension even over us. He ought certainly to remember this is the man who has truly smote the Bourbons, has humbled the proud house of Austria, has crushed the power of Prussia, and who has vanquished even the "heroic, the gallant Alexander." Declare war against France, said the gentleman yesterday; do not shackle us with war measures, to day! Sir, when the gentlemen on the other side begin to fear the power of Britain, or to tremble at the extension of Bonaparte's, they pay marked homage to the wisdom of the embargo measure, for it alone has preserved us from collisions with both these mighty nations.

Every gentleman who has spoken on the opposite side, has declared that the French edicts are inoperative, are empty menaces; they have supposed, they have proven their position, by the premiums of insurance; and are we, therefore, because they are inoperative, to declare war against her? The orders of Great Britain, but for the embargo, would be operative, would have intercepted all your commerce, and yet we must pay her! Gentlemen say we cannot come into contact with France, her decrees are inoperative, therefore, we must fight her; while Great Britain, who does come into collision with you who attempts to blast your character, to sap your most vital interests, who has imposed tribute on you, must be propitiated by money, must be paid! How does this sound, sir? Not very spirited; what is it in reality? Contemptible cowardice. My ideas of honor, of national rights and justice, revolt at this thing. The gentleman from New York, I recollect, some time since declaimed with a pathos that moved my soul, when we were about to determine the order of the day of the supplemental embargo bill, "give us but one day's liberty," said he—

"Is worth a whole eternity of bondage."

And it is true, sir. What does he now say? Virtually, that he will submit; that he will consent, for a humble commerce, circumscribed and regulated by Great Britain, to pay tribute to her. The gentleman's passions were excited; he could see nothing but slavery under the operation of a law of his own country; but when the Orders in Council are under consideration, he is off; and not he alone, but many of the opposers of the embargo.

The gentleman from Connecticut, a Revolutionary character, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) called upon us the other day to repeal the embargo, and to take a stand calculated to maintain the honor and dignity of the nation, but was extremely cautious not to say what that stand is; and really, if his stand is not better calculated to maintain the rights of the nation, than his reasons are forcible for the repeal, they will be poorly maintained indeed. He offered you three, and but three reasons for the repeal. I very much doubt whether the gentleman will be willing to recognise them for his own when he hears them repeated; certainly much abler arguments are to be expected from a Representative from the State of Connecticut, which having been steady in its habits, must have, by this time, if we are to believe the slang of former days, monopolized all the "virtue and talents of her neighbors." 1. Because a grand jury of Vermont had some time ago presented the proclamation of the President, issued in April last. This presentment of the grand jury, if it ever had been a reason, which I deny, for repealing the embargo, has lost that character, being at least neutralized, by presentments of an opposite cast—I question whether five gentlemen in the House ever heard of it before. 2. That the militia; perhaps of Providence, (Rhode Island,) had disobeyed the orders of the Governor. I am happy to say the alarms, which had been excited in my mind, relative to the state of public mind there, were much greater than the case authorized. As to the particular case alluded to, I am informed by authority, to my mind perfectly conclusive, that although the militia did not carry into execution the orders issued by the proper authority, it was not that kind of disobedience, if it can be termed disobedience at all, to which anything reprehensible can be attached; they were paraded, the vessel which it was intended they should detain, was beyond their reach. Is this a reason, sir, for repealing the embargo? So far from its showing a spirit of resistance, it is a proof that the law even there does govern. 3. That the collectors will be thrown into jail, inasmuch as they will be required, under the operation of State laws, to give bond for damages to so large an amount that sureties cannot be obtained. As to this objection, it is equally futile with the others. Let the whole machinery of State law be directed to this point, I believe Mr. Gallatin may, as it were with a single stroke of his pen, put it down completely. However large the bail required may be, if the Secretary of the Treasury orders the deposit of public money to be removed from one bank to another, that bank which secures the deposits will furnish the collector's security. I am not to be understood that this has been done, but calculating on the sagacity and fidelity of the Secretary of the Treasury, I have no doubt it will be done, when necessary. It is not certain, far otherwise, that there will be such a necessity—but happen when it may, the same spirit which has excited so much sensation in the East—mercantile cupidity—money will furnish the remedy. Bad indeed, sir, must be that cause which can be sustained by no better arguments than these. The gentleman from Connecticut should abandon it.

My worthy friend from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) urged yesterday, as a reason why you should not go to war, that you will thereby pledge every shilling and the last drop of blood in the nation, for the maintenance of maritime rights in every sea. If we go to war, certainly I should be for asserting those rights everywhere, but—[Mr. RANDOLPH said he had objected to adopting the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) as being that pledge.] That is not all which I understand by it, said Mr. W. I consider the resolution tantamount to a declaration of war and shall vote for it, at least so much of it as relates to letters of marque and reprisal; not for the maintenance of maritime rights in every sea only, but for the preservation of sovereignty on the land. If the objection to leaving commerce to protect itself, by means of armed merchantmen, rested only where the gentleman placed it, I could accede to his amendment; for merchants do not deserve more, if so much, as any other class in the community, that the whole national resources should be pledged for the maintenance of their individual benefit; but while my friend and myself are unwilling to do this, assuredly we ought not to say, they alone shall fight the nation's battles. Adopt the amendment, and you thereby declare maritime rights shall not be defended by Government, and yet in the same declaration you make that very interest sustain the whole national cause—if any fighting is done, it is to be done by those very merchants whom you resolve not to protect. Sir, I cannot consent to such a project. I wish to see the Government and not the individual alone embarked in the cause—for one I never will consent to pin my safety and the rights of the people of the United States on the sleeves of the merchants only.

But my friend started another objection to the embargo, which he says is not applicable to his plan—viz: that he was tired of new experiments—that he liked a project the better for being old and true—well sifted; so do I sir; but I should be very glad to know if his proposition be not a bran new one. I profess to be as little read in maritime, or national, or indeed any other law as any man, and therefore it may not be surprising if I am mistaken in the matter of fact, but certainly, I never heard of such a system of warfare before; nor do I believe such an one ever has existed. No, sir; I never have heard of the permission being granted to merchants to resist seizures without the right of reprisal. But the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. KEY) has carried this doctrine to a much more refined distinction. He would allow the merchants to resist co-extensive with the Orders of Council only in defence of their lawful trade; but the dispute must not be widened and, therefore, they must only resist such attacks as are made under the orders and edicts. Under this system a corps of lawyers will become as necessary to a merchantman as their cables and anchors. I understood the gentleman to take great pains to satisfy us that we ought not to broach any subject of dispute, we should not widen the breach, and therefore, we should authorize no resistance to the exercise of power, claimed by the belligerents, though in contest previous to those orders and decrees—and this, sir, is the kind of resistance we are to make against the impressment of seamen; for the recovery of indemnity for spoliated commerce; insulted, tarnished honor! Sir, it is time we should assume, if it is not in our natures, nerve enough to decide whether we will go to war or submit; if you submit, for one, I declare I had much rather do it without arming your merchantmen with wooden swords and Quaker guns, when destined to be the prey of either Great Britain or France. Let the people understand—they do from the Delaware, South and West—that the tax is not on our maritime rights alone, but that it affects deeply the agricultural products of the whole nation; that there is not a square foot of this country but is in some measure laid under contribution; that the soil is violated; and depend upon it, sir, this new, puny kind of war will not be appreciated by them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILLNOR) did that which is very common in the House, attempted to follow suit to my friend from Virginia. He would congratulate the nation on the prospect before it. I do with sincerity join the gentleman from Virginia, in congratulations, that during these times of oscillation the character of the nation is not yet compromised—I hope we may be able to do so, with as much truth, a month hence. This congratulation was worthy of the gentleman, but that of (Mr. MILNOR) was of a very different kind: He would congratulate the nation on the prospect of removing the embargo. Depend upon it, sir, if the embargo is repealed and you take no better means of asserting the rights of the nation than this amendment, it will be no cause of satisfaction to any of us—it will be a just cause for bitter lamentations to the nation. Nation, did I say! It will be out of the question to talk about the nation—you are about to become a no nation. You may keep up all this gaudy paraphernalia of sovereignty, this solemn mockery of independence; but if you do not give this torpedo, embargo, a chance to explode in the heart of Great Britain, and will not go to war, you are ruined; you may talk of liberty, but what is it, when encumbered and borne down by foreign taxation! No, sir, we are again becoming British provinces, and therefore, it is that I choose war rather than this proposition, so inadequate, so illy calculated to sustain the pressure of the times.

The Committee rose, without deciding the question, and obtained leave to sit again.

MONDAY, February 6.

Mr. BURWELL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the second instant, a resolution relative to certain sets of journals, documents, and reports, to be deposited in the Library of Congress made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to furnish the Library of Congress with two complete sets of the journals, and of all printed reports and public documents laid before Congress, or either House, at each session.

Mr. GARDNER presented a petition of the inhabitants of Packersfield, in the State of New Hampshire, praying that the several acts laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and more effectually to enforce the same, may be repealed, whenever, in the judgment of Congress, it may be expedient to adopt that measure.

Mr. MUMFORD presented a memorial of the citizens of the third and eighth wards of the city of New York, to the like effect.

The said petition and memorial were referred to the Committee of the whole House on the resolutions proposed by Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. BACON, the twenty-fourth and twenty-seventh ultimo.

Mr. BURWELL presented to the House a memorial of Samuel Briscoe, and others, Commissioners appointed by a law enacted at the last session of the General Assembly of Maryland, to receive subscriptions for stock in the Susquehanna Bridge Company, praying the aid and patronage of Congress to enable the said company to effect the object therein specified.

Mr. BURWELL also presented to the House an attested copy of a late law passed by the General Assembly of Maryland, entitled "An act to incorporate a company for the purpose of building a bridge over the Susquehanna."

The said memorial and act were ordered to lie on the table.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Several petitions having been presented, in addition to those heretofore stated, against the mode in which the late election in the State of Massachusetts was conducted—

Mr. BACON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House do carry to the Senate the several memorials from sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the mode in which the appointment of Electors for President and Vice President has been proceeded to on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives of said State, as irregular and unconstitutional, and praying for the interference of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, for the purpose of preventing the establishment of so dangerous a precedent."

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he saw no objection to the resolution, or even to going farther than it proposed. The Constitution had declared that the election of Electors in each State should be held in such manner as the Legislature should direct; and, he said, he never could consent to the doctrine that any set of men, without the authority of law, could make an election of Electors. He believed that the case was not provided for; and as the present case could not vary the general result of the Presidential election, gentlemen appeared not to be disposed to interfere in it. But, he hoped it would operate on the House to induce them to consider the propriety of providing some mode of hereafter distinguishing between legal, and illegal or surreptitious elections.

Mr. VAN HORN moved to strike out the words in italic, as he understood them as committing the House to express an opinion on the subject of the petitions. Motion lost—yeas 18.

Mr. ROWAN was opposed to the resolution. He contended, that the Constitution having provided that each State shall choose, in such a manner as the Legislature shall direct, a number of Electors equal to the number of their Senators and Representatives, it was improper that this House should interfere in it. Why might it not as well interfere in the election of Senators? He said that Congress certainly did not possess a superintending power over the acts of the States in general cases; if they did in this particular instance, he wished it to be shown. He thought that an interference by Congress, would be an assumption of power on their part forming a dangerous precedent. The House was called upon to say that the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts had improperly directed the manner of election. Was Congress to form for the States a model of the manner in which they should direct their elections to be held? Congress had no power to act on the subject. Why, then, send the memorials to the Senate? He said he was against taking any order in relation to them. In his opinion, it was improper to give the petitions a place on the files of the House, because they related to a subject on which the House had not the power to legislate. Although it was a general principle that all petitions should be heard, this rule certainly did not include petitions on local matters, or State concerns, on which the House had no jurisdiction. It seemed to him improper, therefore, that the petitions should have been received; but, having been received, he wished them to lie on the table.

Mr. BACON observed that the adoption of the resolution would not commit the House at all. He was aware that there was a difficulty in acting on this subject, and he only wished to give an intimation to the Senate that such petitions had been received. It was but decorous to the petitioners that their petitions should be brought into view; though, Mr. B. said, with the gentleman from Kentucky, he doubted whether anything could be done for them.

The resolution was agreed to—yeas 51, nays 24.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The following resolutions were offered by Mr. DURELL on Saturday, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the resolutions of Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. BACON:

Resolved, That the United States will consider any capture and condemnation of merchant vessels of the United States, owned wholly by a citizen or citizens thereof, and engaged in lawful commerce, by an armed vessel sailing under a belligerent flag, and acting by and under authority of orders, decrees, or edicts violating the lawful commerce or neutral rights of the United States, as a declaration of war on the part of that Government to which said belligerent flag shall belong, and in whose courts such condemnation shall be had.

Resolved, That the President of the United States, on being satisfactorily informed of such capture and condemnation, as aforesaid, be requested, forthwith, to recall from such belligerent State, by and under whose authority such capture and condemnation shall be made, such resident Minister or Ministers of the United States as may reside at the Government thereof.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions offered by Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. BACON, and Mr. DURELL.

The amendment offered to Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution by Mr. RANDOLPH, in the following words, being under consideration: "To authorize the merchant vessels of the United States, owned wholly by citizens of the United States, to arm and defend themselves against any armed vessels sailing under the British or French flag, so long as their orders or decrees remain unrevoked."

Mr. J. G. JACKSON rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The questions before the Committee most assuredly involve the destinies of this nation, its honor, and most essential interests. We have arrived at a crisis, solemn and portentous, which no human wisdom could foresee, no prudence avert. The injustice of foreign nations has increased with their knowledge of our pacific dispositions, until, driven to the wall, it behooves us to make a stand in defence of our country, its liberties, and its rights. I could not have supposed that, at such a period, with the full lights before gentlemen, they would have mistaken the source of our calamities, and, shutting their eyes against the attacks of our enemies, have found nothing to condemn but their own Government; and least of all did I expect it from the gentleman from Delaware, whose candor I had highly appreciated; nor am I now willing to accuse him of a want of candor, although his statements are partial, and his conclusions incorrect, but rather attribute it to that unfortunate imperfection of our nature which presents subjects to our minds in a form most congenial to our feelings. Looking at one side only, we are blind to the evidences on the other; and hence, often with the most upright intentions, we condemn measures which all honest men should approve.

The gentleman from Delaware set out with declaring that the Administration were the source from whence all our embarrassments have flowed. And how did he prove it, sir? Why, by recurring to the volume of documents published at the last session of Congress, upon which the nation has emphatically pronounced its judgment of approval. I am surprised that it escaped the sagacity of the gentleman, that in that volume we have official information that those embarrassments owe their origin principally to the hostile spirit predominant in Great Britain against us. Mr. Monroe, in his letter concerning the Chesapeake, (Doc. No. 1, p. 20, communicated last Winter,) states:

"Such is the state of this country [Great Britain] at the present crisis, that it is impossible to foresee what will be its conduct towards the United States. There has been at all times, since the commencement of the present war, a strong party here for extending its ravages to them. This party is combined of the shipowners, the navy, the East and West India merchants, and certain political characters of great consideration in the State. So powerful is this combination, that nothing can be obtained of the Government, on any point, but what may be extorted by necessity," &c.

The same evidence of hostility occurs again, in page 23 of the same document. Mr. Monroe observes;

"By Mr. Canning's queries, in his last note, I was led to consider it as preparatory to an embargo on American vessels, and intended to found some measure, on my reply, of an unfriendly nature, as most of the gazettes had recommended, and the public mind seemed to be essentially prepared for it."

In Mr. Monroe's valedictory letter, (Doc. No. 4, p. 44.) he states:

"Great Britain was resolved to yield no ground which she could avoid, and evidently prepared to hazard war, rather than yield much."

I prefer relying on the testimony of Mr. Monroe, rather than on the unequivocal acts of a hostile character committed by Great Britain, because Mr. Monroe has been considered better authority with certain gentlemen than his Government itself; and the facility of explanations, disavowals, and all that, do away the force of measures which may be taken towards us, in the estimation of men who always attempt to put their Government in the wrong. This gentleman it is, who tells us that the ship-owners, the navy, the East and West India merchants, and certain political characters of great consideration in the State, are for war with us; that the gazettes had recommended, and the public mind were prepared, for hostile measures; that they would yield nothing that was not extorted, and risk a war rather than yield much. And pray, sir, who are the characters described by him? Why, the whole ruling interest in that nation. When such language is addressed to the American people, and they contemplate what are the claims of their Government—what has been its forbearance; how just are its pretensions, and how hostile those of Great Britain—I am filled with surprise unutterable that their ignorance can be so far counted on by men among us as to expect credit for their charges that we are hostile to Great Britain; that we are enforcing unjust demands; and that we are in the wrong! The gentleman from Delaware accuses the Government of neglecting our interests—of omitting to treat with Great Britain in time. We know, sir, by painful experience, that treaties are a poor barrier against belligerent encroachment; and whilst we observe them with good faith, they are wantonly violated by others. We have now a treaty with Great Britain, consisting of ten articles. They are to be perpetual, and the first of them declares, that “there shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship” between them and us. Notwithstanding which, they have violated our peace, and trampled upon all the ties of friendship. Treaties, therefore, are nothing—the laws of nations are nothing, also.

But sir, there was no neglect on our part to make a new treaty; for the moment the Treaty of '94 was loosened from around our neck, where it had hung like a millstone, offers were made—measures were taken to enter into stipulations with them; and the gentleman, aware of his mistake, changed his ground, by asserting that the Executive took a position in relation to seamen, which they knew would not, and could not be conceded by the British Government. Sir, the reverse is the fact; and as mine is a matter-of-fact argument, as the principles I assume can be substantiated, I will adduce my proofs, for with intelligent men, they are worth all the declamation of the most eloquent orators. The position I take is this—the Executive had the best reasons for believing that Great Britain would give up her claim to the right of impressment. In No. 2, page 20, it is stated an arrangement had been made with Mr. King, to give it up, and the only obstacle was an exception of the “narrow seas.” No. 3, page 32, the same fact occurs. In 1802 Lord Hawkesbury agreed with Mr. King “to prohibit impressments altogether on the high seas.” In page 5 of No. 3, it is repeated; then surely it was reasonable to believe that Great Britain would relinquish it entirely, when she had offered to relinquish it upon the “high seas.” In February 1806, page 112 of No. 2, Mr. Monroe informs Mr. Fox, that he had presented the subject to his predecessor, Lord Hawkesbury, and after referring to his instances, he adds: “I think myself perfectly correct in stating that nothing occurred in our conferences to justify an inference that he thought them unreasonable. They were postponed from time to time, at his instance, and finally transferred to Lord Harrowby, his successor.” Page 80 of No. 3, we find that Lord Vincent entertained the subject in August 1806. Page 84, Mr. Fox expresses his solicitude to make such arrangements as will “render perpetual a system of mutual friendship.” Page 93, Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney state that Lords Holland and Auckland “were diligently and anxiously employed in endeavors to devise an arrangement which should be convenient and honorable to us, and at the same time free from improper hazard to Great Britain;” and in page 109, the same gentlemen inform their Government that “to (their) original project thus amended, the British Commissioners seemed to give their assent.” In No. 1, page 41, even Mr. Canning, the redoubtable and polite Mr. Canning, condescends to admit that “at a proper time Great Britain may be ready to entertain it.” Away then with the idle charge that the Executive were insincere, and have proved it, by urging a point which they knew never would be, and never could be conceded; for all the Administrations of England professed a willingness to remedy the evil. One of them proposed to enter into an agreement to do it partially, and Mr. Canning himself, at “a proper time,” will listen to you. After disposing of this serious charge, I come to the merits of the question. Was the ground taken by us concerning seamen, proper? Did the honor and rights of the nation require it?

In considering this important subject I will examine,

- 1st. The practice of impressments, and the right to exercise it.
- 2d. Shall it be tolerated? can it be submitted to?
- 3d. The propositions made by us to Great Britain in relation to it.
- 4th. The formal arrangement.

Upon the first point, I will call the attention of the Committee to the volume of documents pointing out the practice and its injustice. Nothing that I can add would shed light upon it; the hand of a master is seen in the able elucidation, which no one who deserves the name of freeman can read, without feeling honest, honorable indignation; and resolve that he will rally round the constituted authorities to resist the usurpation. Sir, I intended to read to the Committee the luminous letter of Mr. Madison, in pages 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, of No. 2, of the documents, but I perceive that I shall be drawn into a much more lengthy discussion than I intended, and shall occupy more time than I ought. I will therefore omit reading it. It is, or ought to be, in the hands of every man, and is doubtless recollected by all; he speaks of the sacred regard in which property found on the high seas is held by all nations; that no matter how manifest the presumption is, that it is liable to seizure; no matter how inconsiderable the value, or flagitious the conduct of its possessor, it is carried before a legal tribunal, and a regular trial is had; but the great and paramount question of allegiance is decided in an instant, by an interested commander, who wants sailors; and every brave fine-looking fellow, who speaks the same language, and has the same complexion of a British subject, notwithstanding the most conclusive proofs that he is an American citizen, is mistaken for a British seaman, because he is able to endure the service; nay more, so flagrant have the outrages been, that Danes, Swedes, Germans, and even negroes, who could not be mistaken, have been forcibly impressed and carried off; thereby, as it respected our citizen, whose far m is the sea, cutting him off from his most tender connexions; exposing his mind and his person to the most humiliating discipline, and his life itself to the greatest dangers.

Passing from the consideration of Mr. Madison's letter, I will recur to what Mr. Monroe says, for his authority seems to be conclusive. No. 2, page 104. Mr. Monroe, in a remonstrance to the British Government, remarks, "The rights of the United States have been so long trampled under foot, and the feelings of humanity so often outraged, that the astonished world may begin to doubt, whether the patience with which these injuries have been borne ought to be attributed to generous or unworthy motives; whether the United States merit the rank to which in other respects they are justly entitled, or have already in the very morn of their political career lost their energy, and become degenerate." [Mr. JACKSON referred also to Mr. Monroe's letter to Mr. Canning, pages 27 and 28 of No. 1, to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney's letter to the same, in page 207, of No. 3, which he read—in which they enforce the arguments of Mr. Madison, by pointing out the degradation and abuses resulting from the practice of impressments. Mr. J. then proceeded.] I ask sir, by what authority they claim the right of entering our vessels to impress the seamen found on board? The vessel bearing the flag of the nation is the national territory; the flag gives protection to the crew; and no Power can violate the flag without invading the sovereignty of the nation, or seize upon the crew without, ipso facto, committing an act of hostility.

This leads me to consider the second point—shall impressments be tolerated? The gentleman might have spared himself the trouble of proving that the Government had determined to resist it, and to make its relinquishment the sine qua non of a treaty. It was truly observed by Mr. Madison, that it was of primary importance in the estimation of Congress and of the nation; and that they never would consent to surrender the principle. I well recollect, and so must you, Mr. Chairman, that although it did not occupy a distinguished station in the memorials of the merchants, presented to Congress in 1805-'6, who then pledged their lives and fortunes to support the Government in the maintenance of their rights, it was nevertheless considered of paramount interest, and entered deeply into the views and policy of that period. The gentleman from Delaware has spoken of the happy prospects of our country in times past; that the arts and sciences, commerce, and agriculture, smiled upon us; and we were blest with their bounteous munificence. Yes, sir, they have smiled, indeed, for never were a people more truly the worshippers of them—but if we were so degenerate as to abandon our brave sons, the virtuous, hardy seamen, who unfurl our sails, and carry the American flag into every sea, they would start from their sculptured places over the entrance into this magnificent hall, and, frowning like a Medusa's head upon them, would turn the apostates from liberty into stones. No, sir, the brave tars, whose lives are at their country's call, and who constitute its sole defence at sea, where our rights are most liable to invasion, never shall, with my consent, be denied that correspondent protection which is the promised equivalent for allegiance. The rights of our citizens are the same at sea as on land, and their seizure by a foreign nation is as inadmissible in the one case as the other. Whilst we are a nation, and claim the attributes of independence, I for one will never consent that our flag shall wave unfurled over authorized disgrace, humiliating like that; rather would I launch everything we possess upon the ocean—let the political ship buffet it with the winds and the waves; and when unable to outride the storm, nail the flag to the main-mast—make one last, mighty struggle—and if all will not avail, rather than survive our lost honor, go down to the bottom all together, amidst the shouts of liberty, or death!

It was understood that Great Britain complained of illicit practices in relation to her seamen, as affording an apology for her usurpation; and I will now consider the propositions made by us to Great Britain. In discussing them I shall show, 1st. What we required.

2d. What we offered in lieu of the asserted right.

We required, see page 5 of No. 2 [Here Mr. J. read the article offered in the instructions of Mr. Madison, which requires an exemption of all persons upon the high seas from seizure, when found on board of our vessels, excepting such persons as are "liable to be taken according to the laws of nations," also page 5 of No. 3, in which the same requisition is repeated. Mr. J. proceeded,] I have already shown that it was a just demand.

2d. We offered to Great Britain as an equivalent—[Mr. JACKSON read the various offers made to the British Government—No. 2, pages 8, 9 and 10. No. 3, pages 62, 63. No. 3, page 103—ditto, page 109—and remarked upon them, particularly the last; whereby the American Government offers to bind itself to make penal laws for punishing commanders who receive British seamen on board, and "make it the duty of the Government to restore them;" referring also to the statement there of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, alleging, that "to (their) original project, thus amended, the British Government seemed to give their assent"—he contended it proved a degree of insincerity on the part of the British Cabinet, totally inconsistent with the honorable frankness of our own.—Mr. J. proceeded.] I have made a candid summary of these offers; and on recurring to them I feel the mingled emotions of shame and indignation, when I see men wishing to put their Government "in the wrong." Sir, we offered to Great Britain,

1st. To afford no refuge or protection to British seamen.

2d To deliver them up if they took refuge among us.

3d. To make laws for restoring them.

4th. To aid in searching for, seizing, and restoring them.

5th. To keep them in our prisons when requested.

6th. To prohibit our citizens from carrying them off.

7th. To prohibit their employment.

8th. To make penal laws for punishing their employers.

9th. To make it our duty to restore them.

10th. To extend the foregoing provisions, not only to deserters, but all seafaring people.

What more could have been asked, required, or given, than is contained in these offers? Nothing more—unless, indeed, they had asked our independence, and, yielding to the requisition, we had given it. Sir, we do not want the British seamen, even when they are naturalized. If the unfortunate inhabitants of Europe, escaping from the tyranny of the old world, and panting after their long lost liberty, fly to the more hospitable regions of the new, I am willing, on their compliance with our naturalization laws, to receive them into the American family, to let them partake of the blessings we enjoy, whilst they remain among us; but I would prohibit their departure from this country, or, if they went off, refuse them our protection. If they are dissatisfied with their situation on the land, I would say to them, "your allegiance is still claimed by your parent country; we will not risk our peace for you out of our territorial limits; if you pass beyond them, you cease to be an American citizen." I would go further, and prohibit them from owning American registered vessels. Sir, those who come here in search of an asylum, go into the country; they pursue agriculture, or the mechanic arts—they are valuable men, and virtuous citizens; but the mongrels who infest the seaport towns, wear your privileges as a cloak to hide their foreign connexions—they are wolves in sheep's clothing—British merchants, under American colors; they interrupt your happiness, and endanger your safety.

I come now to the informal arrangement made with the British Ministers, which it has been alleged secured our seamen against impressments. What was it? See No. 3, p. 117 and 118—"His Majesty's Government has not felt itself prepared to disclaim, or derogate from a right which has ever been maintained, &c., and actuated by an earnest desire to remove every cause of dissatisfaction, has directed his Majesty's Ministers to give to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney the most positive assurances that instructions have been given, and shall be repeated and enforced, for the observance of the greatest caution in the impressing of British seamen." Our Ministers honestly believed that the assurance was to import something; but they were deceived, as I shall presently show. It did not escape the penetration of our Secretary, that no security was thereby afforded—he construed it as it was intended by the British Government. In his letter to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, page 32 of No. 3, he remarks,—the security is "that instructions have been given, and will be repeated, for enforcing the greatest precaution, &c. If the future instructions are to be repetitions of the past, we well know the inefficacy of them. Any instructions which are to answer the purpose, must differ essentially from the past, both in their tenor and their sanctions." His exposition was the correct one. The objections he took are conclusive; they contain the multum in parvo. The construction given by our Ministers is to be found in No. 3, page 138-9, wherein they state, "our opinion is, that the practice would be essentially, if not completely, abandoned. That opinion has been since confirmed by frequent conferences on the subject with the British Commissioners, who have repeatedly assured us, that in their judgment we were made as secure against the exercise of their pretension by the policy which their Government had adopted, in regard to that very delicate and important question, as we could have been made by treaty." Again, in page 178 No. 3—"It was their idea that by discontinuing the practice in the mode proposed by them, &c. the United States would in the interim enjoy the security they sought." In their letter to Mr. Canning, page, 208 of No. 3, referring to the informal arrangement, they state, that as "an effectual equivalent for the forbearance of the practice" the informal understanding was, that "its practical effect would remove the vexation complained of." Mr. Monroe, in his letter No. 4, pages 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, even goes further—he contends "that it contained a concession in (our) favor, favorable to our interest." [Mr. J. read those passages at length, and referred particularly to page 7, wherein Mr. Monroe says]—"I mean however distinctly to state, that it was understood that the practice heretofore pursued should be abandoned, and that no impressment should be made on the high seas," excepting in cases like one put to him, wherein he supposes a merchant vessel laying in the Tagus, and the desertion of seamen from a British ship of war to the merchant vessel, that there it would be reasonable, "and to such cases it was understood that the practice should in future be confined." Our Ministers were mistaken—for the obvious import of the words in the British note is (if it meant anything) a complete recognition of the right, which we deny; and a mere promise to exercise it cautiously. But, sir, I stand upon firmer ground than the exposition of our Government and the fair meaning of the note. I have British authority for saying that they were mistaken; and I will bring before the Committee a most important document, which, to my extreme surprise, has never been fully presented to the American people; for, although one or two of the public prints have glanced at it, and I believe have given a summary of it—notwithstanding its intimate bearing upon this interesting subject, it has not been republished. I refer to the official documents communicated to Parliament by Mr. Canning in February last, and printed by their order. On receiving the note of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, dated the 24th July, 1807, wherein they state that the practice of impressments was to be discontinued, Mr. Canning wrote the next day to Lords Holland and Auckland the following letter:

Letter from Mr. Secretary Canning to Lords Holland and Auckland, dated July 25, 1807.

FOREIGN OFFICE, July 25th 1807.

MR LORDS: I have the honor to enclose to your Lordships, the copies of a note which I have received from Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, and of the several documents that accompanied it. I submit these papers to the consideration of your Lordships, for the purpose of calling your attention to that passage of the note which refers to a suggestion on the part of His Majesty's Commissioners, on the subject of the impressment of seamen from on board of American ships. It is extremely desirable that His Majesty's Government should have the fullest information on this important point; and I have to request, that your Lordships will be pleased to state to me, whether the representation contained in this part of the note of the American Commissioners be accurate; and whether your Lordships signified any such acquiescence as is there described in the implied, "Informal understanding, respecting the forbearance to be observed by the British cruisers, in regard to the practice of impressment of seamen on board of American vessels."

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

Rt. Hon. LORD HOLLAND and LORD AUCKLAND.

To which they returned the following answer, dated July 28, 1807:

Letter from Lords Holland and Auckland to Mr. Secretary Canning, dated July 28, 1807.

SIR: We have received the honor of your letter, with its several enclosures, and are desirous to give the fullest information in our power respecting any part of our late negotiation with the Commissioners of the United States. We have accordingly applied our attention to that passage of the note delivered to you by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney, which states that "soon after the suspension of the negotiations, it was suggested by His Majesty's Commissioners that, if the topic relative to impressment should be expressly reserved for future conventional arrangement, and a pledge given to the United States for resuming the consideration of it at a convenient season, with that view; and that if, in the mean time, such an informal understanding should be substituted, as, in its practical effect, would remove the vexation complained of, it might, perhaps, be yet possible to conduct the negotiation to a result which would not be unacceptable to the respective Governments. And, in pursuance of this suggestion, the British Commissioners presented their official note of the 8th day of November last."

It appears to us that the several parts of this statement, taken with the context, have all the accuracy, and honorable and right meaning which we experienced in the whole negotiation.

When the American Commissioners speak of "such an informal understanding to be substituted, as would, in its practical effect, remove the vexation complained of," they do not mean, and certainly His Majesty's Commissioners never meant, that there should be a forbearance or suspension or discontinuance of the practice and exercise of the impressment of British seamen. On the contrary, they proceed to say that, "pursuant to the suggestion of the British Commissioners, the official note of the 8th of November was presented." To that note we beg leave to refer.

We considered that note, and still consider it, as pledging His Majesty's Government to give instructions to British cruisers, "to be very cautious in the exercise of the right of impressing British seamen, to take the strictest care to preserve the citizens of the United States from molestation or injury, and to redress any grievances which might be sustained by them."

When the negotiation proceeded, after our delivery of that note, we thought, and still think, that the treaty which we signed—omitting the point of impressment, and several other points afterwards included in the proposed additional articles—was, in itself, complete and unconditional, and subject to no reservation on either part, except that which was expressed in our second note of the 30th of December, on the signature of the treaty.

If circumstances had not taken place, which made it our duty to suspend the signing of the additional articles, and which eventually discontinued the negotiation in our hands, we should have considered ourselves as bound to advert, bona fide, to the further pledge contained in our official note of the 8th of November. We mean that paragraph which states, "that no recent cases of complaint have occurred, respecting the exercise of the right of impressment, and that no probable inconvenience can result from the postponement of an article, subject to so many difficulties; still, that His Majesty's Commissioners are instructed to entertain the discussion of any plan that can be devised to secure the interests of both States, without any injury to rights to which they are respectively attached." The obvious sense of this paragraph, and the forms and substance of the completed treaty, and the proposed additional articles, appear to us to leave no doubt relative to the mutual understanding and views of those who were employed in a negotiation of such importance to their respective countries.

We have the honor to be, &c.

But Mr. Canning was not satisfied with this explicit assurance, and, to place the question beyond all doubt, or more, perhaps, with a view to injure the British negotiators, he wrote them a second letter, dated 6th August, 1807.

Letter from Mr. Secretary Canning to Lords Holland and Auckland, dated August 6, 1807.

MR LORDS: In acknowledging the receipt of the letter which your Lordships have done me the honor to address to me, in answer to mine of the 25th ultimo, I am sorry to have occasion to trouble your Lordships with any further inquiry; but I am sure that your Lordships will feel that the point most immediately in question, respecting the impressment of British seamen from American ships, is one of such essential importance, at the present moment, as to make it necessary for me to ascertain, with as much accuracy as possible, what has really passed between your Lordships and the American Commissioners upon this subject.

I understood the American Commissioners to say that, in addition to whatever passed in writing between you, they received from your Lordships an informal assurance of something that "should, in its practical effect, remove the grievance complained of." By "the grievance complained of," I understood the Commissioners to mean the practice of impressment itself, not any abuses of that practice.

Your Lordships deny that any forbearance was promised, "in the sense of any suspension or discontinuance of the practice," and your Lordships refer to your note of the 8th of November, as containing the correct statement of what you communicated to the American Commissioners.

The note of the 8th of November certainly promises forbearance in the practice, but not a discontinuance of the practice of impressment.

I am therefore under the necessity of requesting your Lordships to have the goodness to state to me whether the note of the 8th of November does, according to your Lordships' recollection and belief, contain the whole of what was promised or held out by your Lordships to the American Commissioners upon this point?

Whether whatever else passed (if anything else did pass) in conversation, was in strict conformity to that note; implying no further concession or forbearance, on the part of Great Britain, and authorizing no further expectation on the part of the United States?

If this be so, it does appear to me that the American Commissioners have misconceived the effect of your Lordships' communication to them; and must have represented it to their Government as implying a much larger concession than was in fact in your Lordships' contemplation.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

R.. Hon. Lords HOLLAND and AUCKLAND.

To this letter they returned the subjoined answer, August 10, 1807.

Letter from Lords Holland and Auckland to Mr. Secretary Canning, dated August 10, 1807.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 6th instant, we have the honor to repeat our former assurances that it is our desire, as it is our duty, to give you every possible information respecting the negotiation with the American Commissioners, which His Majesty was lately pleased to entrust to us.

As the points in which our answer to your letter of the 25th ultimo has not appeared to you sufficiently clear and satisfactory, we must again refer you to our official note, of the 8th of November last, as containing a full and authentic statement of what was settled between us and the American Commissioners, with regard to the impressment of British seamen from on board of American ships. That note was delivered after many fruitless conferences held for the purpose of devising some expedient that might reconcile the interests and pretensions of both nations on this important point. But finding, after much careful consideration of the different plans proposed to us, that the difficulties which stood in the way of any final and permanent adjustment were at that time insurmountable, we were compelled to rest satisfied with the temporary and imperfect arrangement, which our note of the 8th of November promised to afford. We certainly did not then understand, nor do we now understand that, by that note, we pledged our Government to abstain in future from the practice of impressing British seamen from American vessels. We certainly, however, did mean to pledge the British Government to make its cruisers observe the utmost caution, moderation, and forbearance, in the exercise of that practice; but we never either expressed or implied that they were to desist from taking British seamen from American merchant ships. We farther engaged, that our Government would be at all times ready to take into its serious consideration any proposal made to it by the American Government, for the recovery of deserters from the British Navy, who take refuge in the American territory or on board of American ships, without having recourse to the means which are at present resorted to for that purpose.

Whatever passed in conversation was, we conceive, in strict conformity to that note, and implied no farther concession nor forbearance, on the part of Great Britain, than extreme caution and moderation in the exercise of the right, which alone, without any discontinuance, much less renunciation of the practice, we expressed our confident hope would be sufficient to prevent such inconveniences and outrages as the American Commissioners represented, and contended, had frequently arisen from it.

We have the honor to be, &c.

Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING.

Nothing can be more explicit, and prove the mistake of our Ministers more unequivocally; nay, more, the Commissioners say, "the treaty was in itself complete and unconditional, and subject to no reservation on either part, except what was expressed in the note of the 30th of December," wherein Great Britain reserved the right, notwithstanding the treaty, to chastise us if we did not resist France, in the way and manner which she might prescribe; and Mr. Canning echoes the same sentiments. The information he obtained, was a prelude to his note, in reply to Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, of the 22d of October, 1807. See page 224, of No. 3; therein Mr. C. states: "The treaty was considered, by those who signed it, as a complete and perfect instrument. No engagements were ever entered into, on the part of His Majesty, as connected with the treaty, except such as appear upon the face of it." And, he adds, that, with respect to impressments, it must be understood to have had in view the renewal of such discussions, not as forming any part of the treaty then signed." I will not conceal my surprise, sir, at finding Mr. Monroe, who doubtless knew of the correspondence, and received the foregoing answer, persisting in his constructions, and urging upon the nation that it was understood, "that no impressment should be made upon the high seas." The gentleman quoted the documents to prove that the Government were satisfied with the exertions of our Ministers.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Repeal of the Embargo.

H. OF R.

No doubt they were—I believe every man in the nation was satisfied with their exertions; for I take a wide distinction between their exertions and their acts; and I wish not to be misunderstood in doing so. I give them credit for great talents and patriotism, pressed, as they were, by the convulsions in Europe, and the solicitude to settle our disputes; they assumed a latitude of discretion consistent with the genius of our Government, and its honorable conduct in the turmoils of diplomacy. European Ministers march by the plumb-line and square, of their limited instructions; whilst ours, having a wide latitude, may honestly transcend their bounds. We, however, at a distance from the scene, can look more calmly at the passing events there, and refuse to shift our course, because of their supposed importance. I think they were mistaken, in making a treaty in express violation of their instructions; and I think they also erred, in exciting a hope that they had agreed, (see page 119, of No. 3,) on that day, “to conclude a treaty on all the points which had formed the object of their negotiation.” I well recollect the pleasure that was excited here, when this information reached us; for it was communicated forthwith by a special message. But do I therefore doubt of their exertions? Assuredly not; I will be just to them, while I am performing my duty to my country. Sir, I am in the performance of a great duty. The awful situation of this nation, on the verge of war on the one hand, and the abyss of dishonor and destruction on the other, demands, at our hands, that no unjust charge shall be suffered to go out to the people, without its antidote; it is right that they should see and know what their Government has done to preserve peace; the grounds upon which our claims have been rested; and the offers which have been made. Mr. Monroe has complained, but I think it was without just cause; for who is most in fault, the Government, in conforming to their instructions, or he, in departing from them?

The gentleman from Delaware accuses the Administration of inconsistency, in offering to place our whole relations upon an informal arrangement, after having rejected the treaty with the informal arrangement concerning seamen: and Mr. Monroe's letter (Doc. No. 4, p. 14) is referred to, urging the same charge. Sir, I make a most material distinction between placing the whole relations upon an informal understanding, and treating away everything we had to give, while the essential equivalents were merely informally reserved. In the former case, we should retain what we had to offer—the quid pro quo—and in the latter, success could not be expected by us, as no indulgence could be tendered to induce a relaxation on the part of Great Britain. But, I contend that Mr. Monroe is mistaken in what he asserts relative to this subject. Mr. Madison's letter of the 20th May, 1807, states explicitly that “The President is constrained to decline any arrangement, formal or informal, which does not comprise a provision against impressments from American vessels.” The gentleman from Delaware says, Great Britain never will abandon the practice of impressment; she would rather go to war. Mr. Monroe says the same; for “the navy and country are opposed to it.” And in Doc. No. 4, p. 11, he says Great Britain will not treat, unless the non-importation law is thereby repealed.

Doc. No. 3, p. 139—They would not indemnify us for seizures, in violation of the law of nations.

Same, p. 123—The East India Company will not give up anything in relation to the trade to the East Indies.

Same, p. 129—The West India merchants will not permit us to trade, under any restrictions, to the West Indies.

Same, p. 132—They would not agree to any definition, by treaty, concerning blockades.

Same, p. 134—They would not permit us to enjoy the colonial trade, unless it was embarrassed by circuitous voyages and taxation.

Doc. No. 2, p. 6—They would not regulate the right of search by any reasonable stipulations.

Doc. No. 4, p. 144—And they would rather fight us, than yield much.

Pray, Mr. Chairman, what are the claims of the American Government, and what are the points of collision or importance, to be considered in treating with Great Britain? Expressly those, and those alone, which have just been recapitulated; all of which are resisted; and we are officially informed they would rather have war with us than yield either. Gracious God! Are we a nation? Have we not already become base and degenerate in the very morn of our political existence, and unworthy of the liberty so dearly purchased? Why would we treat with any nation? I suppose, sir, that we may receive indemnity for the past and security for the future; and, regardless of both, with a rod suspended over our heads, we treat; and, tremble with pale fear; sacrificing all—obtaining neither. We give up everything—we receive nothing—with a knowledge, too, derived from the pages of experience, that the nation that consents to the surrender of one right, thereby invites attacks upon those remaining. The gentleman from Delaware says, we might have continued the Treaty of 1794, and avoided the embarrassments we are subjected to. The Treaty of 1794 has already passed the ordeal of public opinion. The Republicans of this country condemned it then, and few of them, I presume, would applaud it now.

But I will take a cursory view of that treaty, to see if it contained any security against those embarrassments, and if it is such an one as can be accepted.

The first ten articles are declared perpetual and irrevocable, and it is unnecessary to give any analysis of them.

The eleventh is a mere preamble to the commercial articles.

The twelfth article was rejected. It related to the West India trade.

The thirteenth permitted a trade to the British East Indies, embarrassed with restrictions incompatible with a liberal policy. It required that we should bring their products to the United States.

The coasting trade was disallowed, and our citizens were not permitted to settle or reside there, or go into the interior.

The fourteenth opened all our ports to British subjects and British vessels, and permitted the residence of merchants. In this article, there was no real reciprocity. We were allowed to enjoy the like privileges in their European possessions only, where the balance of trade is greatly against us—whither we carry our raw materials and the necessaries of life, and receive in return their manufactures, after they have received the final finish of the artist. It was foreseen how injurious the residence of their merchants would be. The effects are still severely felt, for a great portion of the capital in this country is British, and all its weight is thrown into the enemy's scale against us.

The 15th provides that no prohibition shall be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles that do not extend to all nations. Thus, if an equivalent were given by any other nation for certain commercial privileges, which may often occur in a young nation like this—as in the purchase of territory, &c., Great Britain became, spoo facto, entitled to them; whereas she having a redundant population and undergoing no change, and, permit me to add, never granting any indulgence in her European possessions to any, was sure to profit by it, while we gained nothing.

The 16th permits the residence of Consuls—theirs in all our seaports—ours in Great Britain and Ireland only.

The 17th stipulates for captures in cases where there is a just suspicion of having enemies' property on board—this sanction to seizures on suspicion is objectionable, because the captors have so strong an interest to suspect, that they will not, living as they do upon plunder, have virtue sufficient to resist the bribe.

The 18th relates to contraband, and comprehends timber, hemp, plank, &c., which ought to be excluded from the list, upon every principle of right and justice. This is not all; it expresses that there is a difficulty in deciding in what cases provisions and other articles are contraband. It would be difficult, indeed, to decide the affirmative—but there never should have been a difficulty allowed to exist in so clear and palpable a case; and a case, too, of such immense interest to this nation, whereby Great Britain could with a single fiat cut off our great staples, "our provisions and other articles," from their market. The stipulation that they shall pay the full value for them in cases of seizure is a flimsy security. Where? at what place is the value to be ascertained? None is mentioned; of course, then, at the British ports, already glutted with our produce, being made the emporium of our commerce. A more pernicious and anti-neutral article could not have been devised; and, immediately succeeding the seizure of our provision-vessels by the Orders of 1793, it gave a sanction to the principle, that Great Britain, when commanding the ocean, may starve other nations into submission.

The 19th article relates to privateers. The objection, and a serious one, too, to this article, is, that they are not sufficiently restrained.

The 20th relates to the punishment of piracy—not objectionable.

The 21st prohibits individuals from committing acts of hostility—not objectionable either.

The 22d prohibits reprisals until justice is refused, and unreasonable delay—the only objection to this is, that the time is too indefinite; and, as we shall always be the complaining party, we have a right to expect prompt reparation.

The 23d article throws open all our ports to their armed vessels, and declares that those insulting the officers shall be punished—it further provides for our admission and stay until time to refit, when driven in by the dangers of the seas into their prohibited ports; let it be recollected that none of ours are prohibited—all are open to them. But to this article there are other insuperable objections. While the British navy have the right to enter our ports without limitation as to numbers; they hold us as much in their power as Bonaparte does Prussia, when his armies occupy all their strong fortresses, and their weak ones too—we are bound to punish the citizen who insults the British officer; and why not punish the officer, too, who insults the citizen? We have an awful lesson on this score in the murder of Pierce—the affair of the Cambrian, and many others—they were punished by promotion.

The 24th prohibits the arming of privateers—no objection to it.

The 25th. This article permits their vessels to enter with their prizes wherever they please; exempts them from search or duties, and prohibits the like permission to any other nation—this is a most unneutral and partial stipulation.

The 26th provides that, in case of war, the merchants may remain as long as they please among us, to carry on trade. Sir, to this there are two strong objections. 1st. They are a curse to us in time of peace, and they would be far worse in a period of war—spies upon us, and moneyed spies too; their whole wealth and power would be brought to bear upon our people for the purpose of corrupting them. 2d. I will ever maintain the position that private property is no more justly liable to seizure at sea than on land; and, unless they would refrain from taking ours at sea, I would retaliate by sequestering theirs on land.

The 27th requires that fugitives shall be delivered up. Under this article, Jonathan Robbins was offered up, and sacrificed.

The 28th relates to the limitation of the articles; the first ten to be permanent, the others to be in force until two years after the signature of preliminary articles of peace. This being the import of the treaty, and the effect of all the articles, which I have separately considered, lest it might be supposed that those omitted contained something favorable, I ask any candid man, if it ought again to be renewed? And, if it were, wherein is to be "indemnity or security?" The good, if any, were contained in the first ten articles, and they were executed, except so far as relates to their permanency. They, indeed, contained much good; and one article, relating to the Western posts, swallowed up all that were obnoxious. You must recollect, Mr. Chairman, with what eloquence and effect that consideration was pressed upon Congress; gentlemen who never saw an Indian, all at once felt uncommon sympathy for us Western people; they painted, in vivid colors, the relentless barbarity of the savages, who waged a war of extermination against us; no age, no sex, no condition, exempting any from the indiscriminate murder of all; led on, too, by British officers, fighting in their ranks and commanding the expeditions—deriving supplies and protection from these posts, and stimulated there, to lay our country waste, and cut off its scattered population. It contemplated a lottery provision, too, for indemnity; five Commissioners were to be appointed; two by Great Britain, and two by the President, and if they could not agree upon the fifth, lots were to be cast. Well, sir, the British Commissioners decided against our merchants, the American ones in their favor; they could not agree upon the fifth, and accordingly drew lots, “and the lot fell upon Jonah;” we got the Commissioner, and our merchants were paid for unlawful spoiliations. We had, to be sure, a hard bargain for this favor, as we engaged to pay the old British debts, due from individuals, to an enormous amount; but, through the provident management of the present Administration, we commuted them for a gross sum of £600,000 sterling.

Let it be recollected, sir, that we were then in the gristle; now we are hardened into the bone of manhood; and what might have been a good treaty then, while our resources and industry were merely unfolding themselves, would be a bad one now, that we are a great, free, and powerful nation. Such as I have rapidly reviewed them, are some of the inherent objections to the Treaty of 1794. It has many sins of omission to answer for. It contained no provision concerning impositions. The West Indies were shut to us. There was no regulation about the colonial trade, and nothing concerning blockades.

Well, sir, the Administration has been accused of error in refusing to accept the Treaty of 1806. It is worse than the former; and proceeding with my first design to make this a matter of fact argument, I will take a review of that treaty also.

1st. The first article, like that of the Treaty of 1794, stipulates that there shall be a firm, inviolable peace, and a true and sincere friendship. As the article in the Treaty of 1794 was still in force, this was superfluous, unless, indeed, that Great Britain, having often violated it, was willing to give a new proof of friendly dispositions, which her conduct rendered necessary.

Article 2d renews the ten permanent articles of the Treaty of 1794, by way of brightening the chain of our recollection.

Article 3d regulates our trade to the East Indies, and is materially worse than that of 1794: by it we are confined to a direct trade from the United States to them, and directly from them to the United States. The great value of that trade, as regulated by the Treaty of 1794, consisted in carrying the produce of the United States to a market in Europe, receiving specie and other articles of traffic there, and going thence to the East Indies; thereby deriving all the benefits accruing from double freights and double profits. The same benefits resulted from the traffic on the return voyages. Under this article the trade would drain the country of specie, as with specie principally it is carried on. It, like the Treaty of 1794, prohibits our citizens from settling or residing there, and from going into the interior.

Article 4th relates to the trade with the United States and Europe—all our States and Territories are thrown open for Europe alone; it is precisely similar to the 14th article of the Treaty of 1794, and the objections urged to that, apply to it.

Article 5th is like the 15th of the Treaty of 1794. It repeals our non-importation act, and prohibits all other restrictive measures, which it may be politic to enact hereafter. There is no reciprocity in it; we are not a manufacturing people, and, through restrictions upon manufactures, we wield a potent engine—and the power of discriminating ought not to be relinquished.

Article 6th declares that the subject of intercourse with the West Indies shall be postponed. Sir, they cannot subsist without the supplies received from us; and yet they will not allow us to trade thither, at a time when every port we own is thrown open to them.

Article 7th relates to Consuls, and is similar to the 16th in the Treaty of 1794—the same objections apply to it; their Consuls are allowed to reside at any of our ports—ours are confined to Europe, and excluded from the East and West Indies, and all other places.

Article 8th concerns captures on just suspicion of being enemy's property. It is similar to the 17th of the Treaty of 1794, and liable to all the objections urged in relation to it.

Article 9th is on the subject of contraband, and includes timber, hemp, plank, &c., which should have been exempted, after the example of the Russian Treaty; and, being the growth and produce of our country, such exemption was the more important to us.

Article 10th relates to the notification of blockades; the definition of them, which we are so much interested in, and had pressed so strenuously, being totally omitted. A provision on this subject acquired fresh importance every day; we had witnessed the most alarming innovations upon the established definitions in the laws of nations—inasmuch that paper blockades were substituted for real ones, and whole islands, kingdoms, and continents, were declared to be blockaded, when the combined fleets of Europe could not effect it.

Article 11th is on the subject of the colonial trade; the restraints upon it are incompatible with the character of independence, and, at first view, the mind is struck with the outrageous attempt of Great Britain to dictate to us in what manner we shall trade with the possessions of an independent nation, and how we shall be permitted to trade with her enemies. The regulation is a humiliating one; for by it Great Britain assumes the prerogative of directing to what extent at least it shall be taxed by us. 1st. If we trade in the productions or manufactures of Europe, destined for the West Indies, they are to be first brought here and subjected to a duty of at least one per cent. before they can be carried there. If we desire to carry the productions of the colonies to Europe, they must be first brought here, and a like duty of two per cent. imposed. I am aware that to this it has been answered we derive a revenue from the traffic; but, sir, I am not for collecting a revenue from our citizens at foreign dictation—besides, the double voyages and expenses so enhance the price, that we cannot compete in the market with the British productions; and it operates as a bounty to that amount on them.

H. OF R.

Repeal of the Embargo.

Article 12th concerns maritime jurisdiction, but within the defined limits permits the right of search, to see if the vessel belongs to an enemy. Within our jurisdictional limits we must maintain exclusive jurisdiction, or fritter away our independence—within them it is a universally acknowledged principle, that the national sovereignty is as complete at sea as on land: nay, so inviolable is that sovereignty, that even enemy's vessels are exempt from attack and capture. It is true, that in the case of the Impetueux, Great Britain trampled upon the law of nations; but it is not the less obligatory, although we submitted to the degradation of its violation. Once allow the right of search for the purpose expressed, and the most alarming abuses will follow. In this article there is no provision against hovering around our ports, and taking stations there, to surprise and vex our inward and outward bound trade—a provision of indispensable necessity, taught us by the melancholy lessons at New York; for that important place has been effectually blockaded by British vessels. Our jurisdiction must be complete and exclusive.

Art. 13th regulates the right of search: it is to be exercised as favorably as the course of the war may permit, observing as much as possible the principles of the law of nations. This is a latitude, boundless as the universe; it is completely undefined; it is a mockery of our understandings. Great Britain may give new aspects to the war every day, and being sole judge of the favorable course which the war may permit, will riot upon our rights. It acknowledges the justice of, nay, sanctions a departure from the law of nations: better, therefore, be without the article entirely. Every man who has attended to the history of our humiliations at sea, must recollect the many complaints of abuses in relation to the right of search. Instead of keeping at a proper distance, and limiting the number allowed to visit our merchant vessel, for the purpose of examining her character and lading, our captain is ordered with his papers to come on board of the British ship, launched in his crazy boat upon a boisterous sea, at the imminent danger of his life, and there saluted with the most abusive, ungentlemanly language. It further relates to judgments in prize-cases and to restitution for unlawful captures: a copy of the sentence and proceedings of the admiralty courts shall be given, if required. Sir, it should have gone further, and compelled the admiralty judge to have stated the grounds of his opinion. Let it be recollected that the court is an ex parte one: we have no security for its integrity, and the abuses committed by them are alarming. Their forms of judgments are, "condemned as enemy's property, or otherwise"—and our courts, where cases depending upon those decisions have come before them, decide that the decree is conclusive, unless there is error apparent on the face of it. Indeed, I believe they go further, and condescend to be the mere registers of the British Admiralty edicts. How can an error in the opinion of the judge appear when he condemns on the ground of "enemy's property, or otherwise?" There is an extreme necessity for some checks. Sir William Scott, judge of the High Court of Admiralty, who has assumed to himself the high character of impartial expounder of the law of nations, for all nations, with all his great talents, has been unable to reconcile his inconsistent, time-serving, varying decisions; and, failing in that, has been at length compelled to take refuge under the orders of the British Privy Council: the laws of nations, of reason, morality, and everything else, being disregarded. Sir, there is no provision for a bona fide restitution; and in proof of the abuses practised, I will state a case which occurred last summer: A vessel belonging to an American merchant was dispatched in ballast to Guadeloupe, under a permission from the President, to collect a debt due to him there. Being prohibited by the embargo laws from carrying any lading, the owner drew bills upon his debtors, and not being able to obtain specie, or perhaps desiring to import some of the productions of the island into the United States, as he lawfully might, he received sugar, &c., in discharge of the debt. On the return voyage, the vessel was captured and carried into Antigua, and libelled there. The judge was disposed at first to condemn the property under the order of June; but finding a better expedient, he determined that it must be enemy's property, as there was no cargo to purchase it with; and inasmuch as drawing bills might be converted to the fraudulent cover of enemy's property, he determined it was enemy's property, and condemned it. Well, sir, although the cargo was worth, and would have sold here for $12,000, by being exposed to sale in a glutted market it brought only $3,400. The costs of prosecuting the claim, in the vice admiralty court, were $1,000; and it was admitted on all hands, that the expenses of appeal would be $2,000 more. Although it was most certain that the decree would be reversed, it was equally so that nothing would be restored but the proceeds of the sale: so that after succeeding, our citizen would lose his property, and $400 into the bargain. Suppose a vessel captured merely for the spoil, carried into, and sold at St. John's, where there are no bidders able to exceed $150; and in such case restitution of the proceeds (which is the universal rule) were decreed—what is the effect? Invitation to plunder, although they have sufficient already. Sir, I am for exposing their judges by making them expose themselves; and for breaking the chains of vassalage, which our judges have put on thereby. Such a provision would effect the object.

The 14th article relates to piracy.

The 15th prohibits citizens from joining others in hostility.

The 16th prohibits reprisals until complaint is made, and unreasonable delay; it is similar to the 22d of '94.

The 17th, like the 23d of the Treaty of '94, admits all their armed vessels into our ports, and requires the punishment of those insulting their officers. I will not repeat the objections already urged, when discussing the 23d article.

Art. 18th relates to arming, in the ports of the two nations.

Art. 19th provides for the admission of their privateers, with their prizes, whenever they please. I wish not to be misunderstood, in discussing this treaty, as intimating that the provisions are not reciprocal upon paper; what I contend is, that there is none in reality. We are a peace-loving nation. Great Britain loves war. We preserve peace if possible. Great Britain prefers war to peace. We have, comparatively, no navy. Great Britain has "1,000 ships of war." This article farther provides, that the privateers of the enemies of Great Britain shall not be allowed to enter with their prizes; but if forced in by necessity, we shall be compelled to hasten their departure; and that hereafter we will not make a treaty inconsistent with these provisions. Such a stipulation in time of war, is a gross departure from neutrality; which consists, in preserving a strict impartiality between the belligerents—granting no advantage to either, (that is not reciprocal,) to the detriment of the other: and it cannot fail to embarrass us in future; for, in this particular at least, every nation entering into treaties with us, and indeed without them, has a right to expect that we will admit them upon the terms of the most favored nation.

Art. 20th, like the 26th in the old treaty, permits the merchants to reside here, trade &c., during a war with us. What I urged against the 26th article need not therefore be repeated. I have, however, an additional objection to this; it provides that if their merchants are suspected they may be warned to go off, and shall even after such warning be allowed to remain twelve months in the country. I want none of their merchants here, and I do not wish any of ours to reside in Great Britain.

Art. 21st, like the 27th, is for delivering up fugitives from justice.

The 22d, shipwreck.

The 23d requires that, in future, Great Britain shall receive all the benefits of the most favored nation. We, sir, are shut out from British colonies: and let me suppose that France and Spain should open theirs by treaty, in consideration of some commercial privilege—that Spain should cede Florida, and stipulate in the treaty for the reservation of some indulgence—shall Great Britain instantly without any equivalent enjoy the like benefits? Its operation necessarily is to prevent us from making a bargain; and let it be kept in mind, that Great Britain cannot enlarge her European possessions; that her system in them is unchangeable, and no inducements can be offered to vary it.

The 24th article concerns the slave trade.

The 25th provides a reservation that no treaties in existence shall be contravened.

Such is the substance of this famous treaty: let any gentleman examine it impartially—let him consider the objectionable tendency of the articles, and above all, the total absence of any provision securing us, and I fear not that his decision will support his Government, in the ground it has taken. If the Treaty of 1794 had much to answer for the crime of omission, this has much indeed; for they far transcend the former.

Upon the great points of difficulty and collision, no provision was made: we treated away all we had to give, and trusted to chance and fate for our security. By the treaty all our ports were opened, all our laws restricting British commerce, British ships, &c., were repealed.

Upon the great point of impressment, the treaty was silent.

The West Indies were shut upon us.

The East Indies more than half closed beyond what they were in 1794.

There was no provision for indemnification: there too, the treaty was silent—and silence upon that point is, in effect, a total abandonment of it. The Treaty of 1794 contained such a provision, and so did the treaty with France. It has been most uncandidly asserted, that we, in the treaty with France, promised to pay our citizens with our own money. It was a wise provision in the Louisiana convention, that a part of the purchase money should be applied to the indemnification of our citizens; the price was not thereby augmented one cent, and all candid men acknowledged that it was a good bargain; the island of New Orleans, alone, being worth more than the sum given for all Louisiana, with its countless millions of acres.

There was no provision against a British export duty, whereby they tax us to a large amount, and we by our Constitution are prohibited from retaliating.

No provision against illegal blockades.

And none for permitting the residence of our Consuls at any of their possessions except in Europe.

In a word, there was no indemnity for the past, no security for the future.

But, sir, there was a sting affixed to it more poisonous than the adder's. I allude to the infamous rider, in No. 3, page 163, which Lords Holland and Auckland say was the only condition or reservation annexed to the treaty. It declares— if France should attempt to execute the Berlin decree, "they are confident the good sense of the ' American Government will perceive the fatal consequence of such pretensions to neutral commerce, and that its spirit and regard for national honor will prevent its acquiescence." But if the enemy executes his threats and neutral nations acquiesce, Great Britain may be compelled to retaliate, and pursue the same measure towards neutrals that France practises. They proceed to sign the treaty in the persuasion that before its return from America the enemy will have formally relinquished his pretensions, or that the United States "by its conduct or assurances will have given security to His Majesty that it will not submit;" and they add, that the note is presented to let us know that without such abandonment, (a formal one too) or such assurances or conduct on our part, the treaty shall not be binding, or Great Britain restrained "from adopting such measures as (to her) may seem necessary for counteracting the designs of the enemy." Upon a former occasion I dwelt upon this subject, and it would be inadmissible to reconsider it at length; but I acknowledge that it would fill me with shame and anguish, if this nation could stoop to the degradation of sanctioning such an outrage upon its honor and its rights, by accepting a treaty to which it was affixed. They confide in our good sense—our spirit and regard to honor; are persuaded we cannot and will not submit; and require that we, by our conduct and assurances, will have given security to His Majesty that we will not. If, however, regardless of our national honor, &c., we do submit and will not give security, they will treat us as we allow France to threaten or treat us. Away with the treaty and the rider too!

Our Ministers had the meekness to inform Mr. Canning, page 221, that he ought to be satisfied with our conduct; for that the French Minister had assured ours, that the decree should not infringe our treaty or our rights, and that we had witnessed a practice conformable to the assurance. This was on the 18th of October, 1807, almost one year after the Berlin decree. Well, sir, on the 22d of October, Mr. Canning wrote his answer, in which, although he does not deny that the decree had not been enforced, he informs our Ministers that he is not satisfied that the American Government has taken such effectual steps as to do away the reservation contained in the note accompanying the treaty. He, as was to be expected, rejected the humble security we had to offer—nothing but unqualified war at the direction of Great Britain would satisfy him. If war be proper, do let us consult our people in making it.

The gentleman from Delaware complained that this treaty was returned without being submitted by the President to the Senate. Who is responsible for the formation of treaties, and for them when formed? The President; and is it reasonable that he should incur such responsibility, where the treaty was not only disapproved of by him, but was made in express violation of his instructions? Should he deliberate on accepting the treaty with its insulting supplement? I have examined, and I trust with candor, the treaties of 1794 and 1806, and shown that neither would comport with the just claims of the United States.

The gentleman asks, has not an error been committed in relation to them? I answer, no; and further, I will say, that neither would have prevented the wrongs we endure; the first (unexpired) article in the Treaty of 1794 promises a firm and inviolable peace, and true and sincere friendship: repeated acts of war have been committed upon us, and sincere friendship has been substituted by the blackest perfidy. France is accused of violating her treaty, as if it were more criminal to do so, than to break the moral law of nations: France has violated both, and so has Great Britain; the only difference consists in this, that Great Britain has done so much more frequently, and more injuriously, than France has.

The gentlemen ask, (Mr. VAN DYKE and Mr. KEY,) will we go to war for British seamen? I put it to them as liberal men: is it not unfair to ask the question? They know well what has been offered on that score; I have made a summary of the offers to-day: it is certainly attempting a very unfair diversion of the public mind to suggest such an inquiry. Other gentlemen (Mr. DANA, &c.) ask will we go to war for the right of free ships to make free goods? This is equally uncandid; for it must be known, that however desirable to us, we never have asserted the principle so as to make its recognition an indispensable condition.

Will you go to war (the gentlemen ask) for the right of search? Sir, both are given up in admitting search for enemies' property; and the latter particularly in the project of a treaty sent to Mr. Monroe by Mr. Madison. See No. 2, p. 7.—Article 3 relates to the right of search, and proposes to regulate the practice.—Article 11 allows the taking of enemies; and No. 3, p. 7, gives up the point of free ships make free goods. The right of search necessarily results from acknowledged principles in the laws of nations. The question of contraband implies it; going to blockaded ports, and seizing persons in the military service of an enemy on board, imply it also.

The gentleman asserts all our embarrassments arise from refusing to be searched for British seamen. I ask him as a man of honor, pledged not to harbor the servants or secrete the property of his neighbor in his house, whether he would submit to have it searched by day or night; and without suspicion, (for being bound by honor and by compact it would be insulting him to suspect him,) or without authority, permit the neighbor wantonly to enter into his rooms, open all his trunks, desks, &c., to satisfy himself that no fraud had been committed, knowing too, that being in want of his purse, and having power to do so, he would carry it off? I can answer for him that he would not.

The same gentleman asserts that if we go to war, it will be for the subject of impressments. There can be no doubt that we ought to make war rather than submit on this point; but it is not now the question of immediate collision: it is merged in the murders of the Chesapeake, and they are merged in the Orders of Council—in the avowed attempt to tax us. What are the causes of complaint? Impressments, spoliations, the case of the Cambrian, the murder of Pierce, the Chesapeake, blockades, colonial trade, orders of June, January, November, and every other month in the calendar: each one has given rise to some outrage. Invitations to our citizens to violate our laws, and go to sea without papers, thereby inviting to piracy in its true definition, and taxing us—demanding tribute. Are not these sufficient causes of war? God knows, if we want a justification in the eyes of all men for going to war, it is to be found abundantly in them. The single case of Pierce was held sufficient; his murdered body was carried through New York by the exasperated citizens; the Federalists were vying with the Republicans in expressions of indignation; Mr. King was at their head, and he is still a favorite, as the votes recently given by them for President and Vice President will show. All our difficulties, it is said, would have been avoided, if the Treaty of 1806 had been accepted. This treaty was to cure the king's evil or the evils of the King; it was to avert all our difficulties, although many of them preceded it, and were unatoned for thereby. No, sir; all of them were omitted or sanctioned by the treaty and its rider. We cannot get the subject resumed, says the gentleman, and it is evident, that it was the best bargain attainable. To my mind it is proof of hostility the most deadly; and as for the bargain it never could be worse. Well, sir, what shall we do? What, it is asked, will be the object of war? I answer resistance. I will resist while there is one man living to aid me; it will be more honorable to die in the contest than to crouch beneath the lash that penetrates to our vitals: we shall thereby avoid a lingering death, for death is inevitable if we submit.

The gentleman (Mr. KEY) asks if we mean to fight France, to coerce a respect for her treaty, to compel Great Britain to make one? On this score there is no difference; both have violated their treaties with us, and trampled upon our rights. If we fight them, it will be to resist their attacks upon us.

I am not for dividing and subdividing the injuries done us, throwing the gauntlet and fighting for the case of the Chesapeake to-day, and after the battle is over, challenging them anew and fighting about the Orders of Council to-morrow. I prefer throwing all the injuries into one account, and fighting to resist and redress them in the lump.

With great exultation it is asked, what will be the effect of war upon Great Britain? what profit will result to us? A nation like us will never make war for the profits of it; we profit more from peace. Not so with Great Britain; her foreign wars are highly beneficial to the Government; they keep the people united, their minds engaged, and inattentive to the crying corruption of their Ministry. When we go to war, no mercenary calculation of dollars and cents will weigh down the scale; it will be a question of country, of liberty, and independence. But, sir, we can injure Great Britain, and also remove a cause from which much evil is to be apprehended. We can take Canada, and thereby put down the hostile spirit of the Indians, to whom the war-belt has been sent from Canada some time since, with an invitation to them to take up the tomahawk against us, in the event of a war with Great Britain. We should be able to subdue the war spirit which so much predominates in savage man. This would be doing much for their happiness, and the future peace of our country. Besides this, we should harass their commerce by our privateers, whose profits would excite a sufficient spirit of adventure to go upon the ocean in search of prey; and, above all, we should avoid a pusillanimous, dishonorable, and degrading submission. This, in my opinion, will be gaining much. War has been painted in glowing colors; it is a great calamity to any nation; it is the greatest calamity that ever infatuated man devised to scourge the world. But great as it is, to us submission would be greater. The gentleman from Maryland deprecates the consequences of trusting an army of 50,000 in the hands of any man, lest such an one as Burr, seated at the helm, should crimson the Presidential chair, and deluge the country in blood. How, and of what materials would this army be composed? Of men, sir, fighting for their families, their altars, and their firesides—for the liberty consecrated by the blood of their fathers. It would contain some of the best blood in this nation, and you might as well suppose that they would tear up the foundations of the earth, as become mercenaries. Sir, even at hearing the din of war as it rumbles across the horizon, you already find them entering your service. There are many men who would not accept the command of your forces on a peace establishment, that would draw their swords, and put on the habiliments of war in subordinate stations, in the hour of danger. Look over the list of your military officers, and ask yourselves whether the colonels, majors, captains, and subordinate officers you find there, would prostitute the liberties of their country, and cut asunder every tender ligament that binds them to it, to serve the designs of any ambitious, designing man?—It is impossible. There are men on that list of the most unquestionable patriotism, public and private virtue; and in talents, inferior to none on this floor. Such men cannot be led into, or excited to partake of, the scheme. We are not yet in such a state of degradation and meanness, too often produced by love of money, as to submit to the ambitious projects of a Bonaparte, who could wield the nation in his right arm, and smite its liberties with his left. All these injurious consequences, however, in their fullest extent, are predicted, as if we were unworthy of trusting ourselves. Instances have been given from desotic States of a daring leader's usurping the government. They do not apply to us; the purse and the sword are wielded by Congress; we hold the purse-strings, the sinews of war; and we thereby have in sufficient check any ambitious projector. The gentleman from Maryland complains of an usurpation already, and argues from it that worse is to follow! and pray hear his charge: "The Secretary at War, in communicating the orders of the President to call out the 100,000 militia, requests the Governors to be careful in selecting fit and proper persons." Risum teneatis. Why, in truth, it is a high misdemeanor, and no doubt will be duly considered upon the trial of that gentleman before the Senate, where it appears he has been impeached. The gentleman from Delaware warns us to avoid war; for in the midst of arms the still voice of reason is not heard. We have reasoned long enough; everything that appertains to the reasoning faculties of man has been tried; we have the better of the argument, as our enemies admit, and we do not propose to go to war for the purpose of old-fashioned reasoning. Force is the only expedient that can produce reason with such nations as we have to deal with. I am for no more "supplemental broadsides." There is more energy and weight, in the diplomatic correspondence, through the mouths of our cannon. The gentleman from Delaware asks, will the nation give its blood to blot out the errors of the Administration? Sir, the people of this country have too much good sense to believe that errors exist, when it is not in the power of ingenious and able opponents to point them out. I defy them to do it. There is no point upon which I, humble as my talents may be, would be afraid to meet them before the nation. The gentleman begs the question, we are not disposed to hide errors, or palliate them. If they exist, we shall be happy to discover them; and I assure gentlemen, that wheresoever they may be found, we will endeavor to apply the proper and Constitutional corrective. The gentleman warns us to "put the enemy in the wrong." Who, I pray you, are in the wrong, ourselves or the enemy? They have put themselves in the wrong. What, sir! does the gentleman mean to defend the murders of Pierce and the Chesapeake, the orders—

[Mr. VAN DYKE explained: He had not intended to convey the idea that Great Britain was justified, but merely that we should put her in the wrong upon every point.]

Mr. JACKSON proceeded.—I accept the gentleman's explanation with great pleasure. Sir, we have put the enemy in the wrong on all points. The gentleman from Maryland says, that we will fight for our altars and our firesides; besides them, all is calculation. I differ with him. The murders at sea, of Pierce, and of the Chesapeake; the invasion of our maritime jurisdiction; the impressment of seamen, and subjecting our exports to pay tribute, are not questions of calculation; they are questions of sovereignty and of independence, and existence itself; we must fight, rather than submit to them. We, by our Constitution, are prohibited from taxing exports; Great Britain asserts the right, and has taxed them, and I would resist that alone, at all hazards. The two gentlemen say Great Britain will not relinquish impressments, as by them alone she supports her navy, and it is a vital principle to her. And we are to submit, forsooth, because it keeps up her omnipotence at sea, to a measure that grinds this nation to powder, and stabs us to the vitals? The gentleman asks, will we not submit to a cutting off a member to save the body? I answer no; I will not submit to the amputation by Great Britain. I will not sacrifice all the members to preserve a lifeless political trunk. If the legs, arms, ears, and nose are cut off, and the head, too, I am incapable of perceiving the use or value of the body; and submission to Great Britain will be a sacrifice of all these. I have read of a great general—I believe it was Cæsar—who directed his soldiers to aim their weapons at the faces of the enemy's army, because, being handsome men, and more attached to their beauty than their country, they would surrender rather than lose it. But, by the gentleman's system, the body is the only desirable place; do not touch that, and the members—eyes, head, and all, may be quietly destroyed.

The gentlemen have urged that notwithstanding impressments, &c., we have flourished. Sir, if we made it merely a question of dollars and cents, perhaps we might flourish under the Orders in Council—but, let me ask, do not our national and personal rights transcend in value all such calculations? Are our liberty and independence worth nothing? Gentlemen say, we are all powerful for defence—we wish for no more than to defend our just rights—we are not aiming at conquest, and for defence we will be mighty indeed, in a war against those who dare to assail us. Gentlemen ask us to convince the people that war is necessary and they will act with spirit and vigor, but not till then. This is true, sir; but by what means are they to be convinced, if they are still incredulous? Those who do not discover the necessity of maintaining our rights, and that we have been deeply injured, must be as callous to feeling as the miserable poltroon who, on being forcibly thrust out of doors, at length discovered that his presence was disagreeable. It is true, as the gentleman states, that the genius of our Government leads to peace; but it is honorable peace alone that can be fostered by them; they will prefer war to disgrace, cost what it may. Peace is the sheet anchor of our prosperity; but if forced into war we will be terrible as the tigress robbed of her whelps. With much preparation and deliberation the gentlemen have announced to us their system—one is for trying the pen first and then the sword. Why, sir, we have already tried this war of goose quills long enough; and if we repeat the warfare I should not be surprised at hearing the whole feathered tribe squalling and squeaking like the British merchants and some of our own too, when a bristle belonging to them is touched; they squeak from one end of the nation to the other, and although they make a great cry we get but little wool. Sir the spirit of the nation has almost been destroyed by this goose-quill warfare—I beg pardon of the people, it is the spirit of this House I mean; we write reports, resolutions, bills, &c., we talk and write much about them, until all our spirit evaporates. Not so with the people; we have indeed for some time been lulling them into a fatal security; they have been dozing over our lethargy; but I trust that like a sleeping lion the nation will awake and rise up in its full strength and vigor to assert and maintain its rights. The other gentleman (Mr. KEY) is for letting loose these embargoed ships, permit them again to navigate the ocean, and resist by force all search for unlawful purposes. How is the lawfulness of the intended search to be foreseen? While the gentleman was speaking I could not refrain from asking how he would discriminate—I was anxious to know how an ingenious gentleman could manage the subject: he said he would tell me, but he failed to attempt it. The right of search is an acknowledged right, resistance to it is war, or piracy; for instance, (as stated in my previous examination) to ascertain the character of the vessel and cargo. Well, sir, a British ship meets one of your vessels with the intention of enforcing the British orders, but the commander does not order his trumpeter to proclaim it at the mast-head; he comes alongside, and orders the captain with his papers on board; unless, out of courtesy, he boards the American vessel. After getting possession of his vessel, the American learns that the object is unlawful, but his vessel is captured; and then, and not till then, he is permitted to resist. Why, sir, resistance comes too late, and ever will, unless we suppose that an intuitive knowledge pervades the navigators of the ocean. The gentleman wishes to leave the door of reconciliation open a little longer. Sir, I wish not to be misunderstood by gentlemen. Although I can see no possible good that can result from further negotiation, I am for a little longer delay. I prefer letting the goose-quills lay idle for a season, and the cannon too—although, as I have remarked, war is not such a dreadful expedient to me, as some gentlemen would represent it; and unless we receive redress, I, for one, will say it must be resorted to. I am at present opposed to granting letters of marque and reprisal. If we send out privateers, they will make war; and if we allow our merchants to arm, they will make it also—or if they do not use their guns until they are searched for unlawful purposes, they will be captured, guns and all. If they resist a search, they become the aggressor, and a species of war ensues. It is said that Mr. Canning's last letter proves their sincere desire for peace—proof was indeed necessary; but I would rather rely upon their acts, than their professions. In my opinion this last letter is not less hostile than the former ones. It persists in the unmanly insinuation that we have acted with duplicity, and made our communications with the British Government dependent upon our relations with France. He has said, to be sure, it would be gratifying to him to settle all differences with

Mr. Pinkney. Perhaps he deemed it politic to hold such language. We, however, must appreciate it according to the actual state of things. I know that I may be asked why, under all these unpropitious appearances abroad, and unfavorable circumstances at home, delay any longer? Why, sir, notwithstanding my want of confidence in their friendly dispositions, I am still willing to await the events of a few fleeting months. As to any inherent regard for our rights, I put it out of the question. I look to more powerful causes—to the occurrences in Spain, and the British disasters there—for there can be no question that their armies have been cut off, unless, as at Dunkirk, they have ran away; and that their dependence was upon their heels, there can be but little doubt, when we look at the map, and examine their marches, in a line parallel to the seacoast, instead of advancing by the side of the patriots, and upon the frontiers of Spain, disputing the passes through which the enemy had to enter into the country. The British nation are a high-spirited people, and they will illy brook the disgrace of running, or (if their armies were compelled to fight) of being cut off. Either alternative is ruin to the ministry. When we look at the sensibility excited by the convention in Portugal, we can have little doubt of the effects of the expedition in Spain. About the same time the communications made to Congress will have reached them. They will put down the slanders there, that we were for submitting to France; they will show the liberal offer made by us to Great Britain; an offer in effect, to join England against France, by trading with England, and resisting France; and the insolent rejection of the offer. All these concurrent circumstances will crush the ministry, or compel them to relax towards us, and come to an accommodation. Wise politicians yield something to circumstances and appearances; and if we disregard them now, after waiting with so much patience, and at a great sacrifice, for so long a time, we could not well answer it to the nation if we rushed into war, if, as is probable, the olive branch is crossing the Atlantic to us.

As to fighting France it is idle; we can't get there, and they can't come here, and their ships are swept from the ocean. I will not join gentlemen in their project of fighting France, and submitting to Great Britain; I am for fighting the enemy who has done us most wrong. The injuries committed by England exceed those by France an hundred fold. While Great Britain kicks us on the highway, robs and insults us, we pocket the affront; but if France, like a man on horseback, happens to approach us near enough to spatter the mud upon us, and dashes on in full speed; after getting out of sight we offer battle, and taking courage from our security we look big and brave. Upon my soul I believe that one of the members of this House (Mr. QUINCY) would have nerve enough for such a daring. I am against arming our merchant vessels unless we make war; for on the day they sail the peace of the nation is gone; they have the power of making war transferred to them, and they may wage it against whomsoever they please. I am for keeping off the evil day as long as possible, and for pursuing the advice of the good old Laertes to his son, "Beware of entrance in a quarrel, but being in, be firm and thy enemy will beware of thee." I am not for immediate war; but let me entrust gentlemen not to abandon the ground we have taken, at a time too when the people from almost every quarter of the Union are pledging themselves to support it. There are a few factious spirits to be sure, who clamor against our measures; they have clamored at all times; their approbation is not desirable: it alone would unhuge the affections of the people in a great degree; but the majority who approve our course is great indeed. For myself, I will yield to the majority, do what they may. I will, as far as I can, resist those measures which I deem unwise and impolitic, but my resistance shall be confined within the Constitutional limits, and I will be ready at all times to coerce others to respect them. If the majority will give up the embargo without substituting war, and thereby submit, however much I deprecate such a surrender of principle, I must acquiesce. One argument urged with much effect, though certainly of no intrinsic weight, is, that we must remove the embargo, or the merchants will do it for us. Sir, on the day we yield to the menaces of a faction our Constitution is not worth a straw. If you sacrifice this measure to a faction in the East, you must sacrifice another to a faction in the West; for the moment you buy off one faction you offer a premium to another. Need I refer to particulars? Look at your public lands; there are men daring enough already to assert that selling them is unjust, and that it would be cheaper to take them without buying. If one great principle is to be sacrificed to the merchants, why not for the agriculturists also? If the merchants triumph over us, I give notice that so far as depends upon me they shall take the consequence, and the seamen too. I will jeopardize the peace of the nation no more for them.

Upon a view of our foreign relations I find that these same merchants first stimulated us to assert their rights, and they are now the first to complain; for, happen what may, they are always the complainants. They clamored about the colonial trade—look at the Boston memorial written by the very party who have accused their Government of improper conduct for insisting on it. We, after having incurred the censure of our constituents for expenditures of money, &c. for their protection, find them the first to turn against us, because we do not obey their clamors in all things. If they drive the Government into submission, I give notice, let them abide the consequences; if they expect protection let them stay at home; I am unwilling to jeopardize our peace for them again. What will gentlemen give us as a substitute for the embargo? I hope they intend to save appearances at least, and pass a non-intercourse. Remove the embargo without it, and allow the arming of merchants, and my life on it they will fight their way into the tributary ports of Great Britain. Sir, I do not consider this to be a mercantile question merely; it is certainly more an agricultural, or rather a national one. The merchant will have his profits on the produce, no matter whether the prices be great or small; and the depression of the price is a loss to the farmer. Our produce will not bear the tax—flour at two dollars per barrel and other articles in proportion. But if this view be fallacious, it is still a national question—as a nation we are bound to protect our citizens in the exercise of their lawful pursuits. If the merchants be attacked, give them protection; they, as an integral part of the nation, ought to be protected; it is our duty to watch over their rights; let us then preserve them from destruction. I never will consent, if they are mindful of their duty, to give them up; and I will not abandon those measures which we have taken, merely to gratify the factious spirit which pervades New England. I am sorry to see so many of my friends yielding to their clamors, (which we need not fear,) as by yielding they add fuel to the flame. If our manufacturers were attacked en masse, who would say it is no concern of ours; let them defend themselves? Whenever we lose sight of the principle I contend for, the same argument will apply to the great landed interest of the nation. I am for considering the various portions of our citizens as embarked on one plank, to sink or swim together.

The resistance in New England, it is said, is justified by the example in Virginia. I am proud to see gentlemen willing to cling to her example—for, in 1798, when the resolutions of Virginia were transmitted to the East, the Legislatures would not treat them with decency. They resolved that the measures of Virginia were a gross usurpation, and deserving marked reprehension. And what did Virginia resolve? That the Constitution had been violated, and that the States who were parties to the compact be invited to co-operate in Constitutional efforts to procure a repeal of the obnoxious laws? And what followed? In the capital of Virginia the sedition law was executed; the authorities of the nation had declared it binding, and no man raised his hand to resist it. In New England, a quarter too where the States were denied the right to concert Constitutional measures to repeal the sedition and alien laws, opposition is organized in town meetings, and in the State Legislature, to resist the laws by force, and to punish those who attempt to execute them; and this is "the land of steady habits." There can be no doubt that the States who are parties to the compact can interpose, and by uniting their efforts, procure a repeal of laws violating the compact; but the course of wisdom is to do so calmly and dispassionately, as we proposed, not by a seditious and rebellious resistance.

But to return to the subject before the Committee. By arming and going out without authority to capture the enemy, our property will be first sacrificed; the enemy will be enriched; and we shall fight to see if we shall keep it: whereas, fighting being inevitable, I am for it while we are whole and strong; sending out the produce invites attack; there are many hungry vultures ready to pounce upon it and ruin will follow. These bristled merchants will then deafen you with their cries, and utter their complaints to the nation against you for so unwisely managing its concerns as to remove the embargo, and thereby admit a diminution of danger. The great drift of gentlemen seems to be attacking the Administration, and artfully evading the question. This is uncandid and incorrect; let censure be applied where it is due—but on all occasions, whether right or wrong, to attack the Government for the purpose of saddling it with our misfortunes, and to shield the oppressors, is so inconsistent that it astonishes me to find it persisted in. If they had been so long successful with their deluded followers, I would apply the fable of the shepherd's boy to them—"when the wolf comes you will not be believed."

Sir, this measure which you are about to abandon, (let me repeat it,) has passed in review before the American people—your course has received their decided sanction, as has been evinced by their recent vote in the election of President; they will act with firmness if we do our duty; and although the wisdom of our plans is doubted by some honest men, it will yet work well—right, like justice, though you trample upon it, will survive the shock, and ultimately triumph. The picture of war has a tendency to enslave us—there was a time when it was thought wise to risk a war for independence; I hope we will risk it again for its maintenance.

I have hunted gentlemen from their lurking places—I have exposed the deformity of the treaty which they say should have been accepted by us; and I trust have proven that, like laudanum, if it eased the pain it would be by producing stupor; by lulling the nation to sleep—the sleep of death to your liberties and independence. Sir, I have discussed this subject of great interest, not unkindly of the argument of gentlemen, that repealing the embargo, and permitting the merchants to be scourged, will unite us—much as I love unanimity I cannot purchase it at so dear a price. If the merchants rush into destruction the nation must feel it—the merchants and the farmers too, will feel it, more severely than the embargo; for then, instead of a part of our property and produce rotting on our hands, the whole must be irretrievably lost.

When Mr. JACKSON had concluded the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 7.

Mr. MACON presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Washington county, in the Mississippi Territory, praying that a right of pre-emption may be granted to the petitioners and other actual settlers within the said Territory; also, that a free navigation of the river Mobile may be secured, so as to prevent the payment by citizens of the United States, or the Territories thereof, of foreign duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into, and exported from, the said river, and passing by the port of Mobile.

10th Con. 2d Sess.—45

The said petition was read, and so much thereof as relates to the right of pre-emption to lands within the said Territory, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; and such other parts of the said petition as relate to a free navigation of the river Mobile, was referred to the Secretary of State, with instruction to examine and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of sundry inhabitants on Tombigbee river, in the Mississippi Territory, praying that the right of pre-emption granted to actual settlers on public lands situated on the west side of the Tombigbee river, may be extended to actual settlers on the east side of the same.

The said petitions were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee appointed, the fourth instant, on the part of this House, jointly, with a committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election; and to regulate the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President, made a report, in part, thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock; that two persons be appointed tellers, on the part of this House, to make a list of the votes, as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President; and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. VAN DYKE be appointed tellers on the part of this House, pursuant to the foregoing resolution; and that the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

On motion of Mr. BURWELL,

Resolved, That a petition of the Commissioners of the Susquehanna Bridge Company, together with the attested copy of a late act passed by the General Assembly of Maryland, presented on the sixth instant, be referred to Mr. SAY, Mr. MARION, Mr. DANA, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. JEDEDIAH K. SMITH, a committee, appointed the twenty-sixth ultimo, and to whom were referred the memorials of the President and Managers of the Susquehanna and Tioga Turnpike Road Company, and of the President, Managers, and Company, of the Philadelphia, Brandywine, and New London Turnpike Roads.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the report, in part, of the joint committee of the two Houses appointed "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and notifying the persons elected of their election; and to regulate the time, place and manner of administering the oath of office to the President;" and have appointed Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, a teller of the votes, on their part.

REPEAL OF THE EMBARGO.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 53 to 51, on the resolution on the subject of the state of our foreign relations. Mr. RANDOLPH'S amendment yet under consideration. Messrs. SLOAN and COOK advocated the amendment.

Mr. LYON said, on an occasion so all-important as the present, on a motion in which is seriously involved nothing less than the peace of this once happy country, I will make no apology to gentlemen when I ask their attention to those observations which I mean to make relative to peace and war, as well as the present state of our country. And although I do not rise to debate the propriety or impropriety of the embargo, I hope to be allowed to name it. It seems no subject can be, or has been, debated in this House, without the mention of that hateful word embargo. The embargo has, like other things, had its day; I believe, with the gentleman from Connecticut, that the burial is gone by; the vote taken in the Committee—76 to 40—in favor of taking it off on the fourth of March, is accepted by the people of the United States as a sure pledge of their redemption from that growth-destroying monster. I do not believe with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) that it is in the power of the Eastern members in the minority to patch up the ruined popularity of the embargo in that portion of the nation. I am too well acquainted with the Eastern people to believe that a single town who have acted on the subject could be persuaded to alter their opinion or their course by every argument in favor of the measure that have been made use of by the majority, if they were enforced by all the influence of the minority; but I think gentlemen in the minority ought to be excused from laboring in this cause until their own understanding is convinced. It is no disparagement to the Eastern Representatives to say that they have left many, very many men, at least equal to themselves in information and patriotism at home, whose eyes are steadily at this moment fixed on the proceedings in this House. These people have never been made to believe that some foreign nation would make war upon us if we did not lay an embargo; or if we should raise it when laid. I know, sir, this has been the effect of the clamor which has been raised (that we must have war or embargo) in some other parts of the nation, and as no nation now threatens us with war, I can see no necessity of going to war at present, unless it is for the honor of those who have told the nation we must have war or embargo. When Dean Swift was very sick, and his servants were mourning about him, he observed to a friend, you see how the poor creatures love me, they do not want to spare me, but they have prophesied that I must die; notwithstanding all their love for me, I believe they would rather I should die than they should turn out false prophets. So it seems to be with some gentlemen; they are good patriots, they love their country most fervently, but they have said we must have war or embargo; embargo is gone, and war we are to have, it seems, merely because they have said so. When they see their favorite embargo is run down, a measure in itself preposterous and self-destroying only, they seem to think the national honor pledged for war, and war the nation must have. When I hear honor so much talked of on this occasion, it makes me think of Paddy's honor. Paddy had sworn by the hill of Hoath, by the holy fathers, and by all the saints in the red leather calendar, that he had no hand, act, or part, in stealing the woman's poker; but when she came to touch his honor, Paddy says, woman there is your poker. So gentlemen, tenacious of the national honor, of which they are more tender than their lives, and the lives and property of their fellow-citizens, say, since we have promised you war, war you shall have, although it is a war destitute of every kind of hope except that of dying honorably. The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to promise himself an honorable death in the struggle he wished to commence, although, as I understood him, he did not even presume to promise that his country or its liberties should exist one moment after his exit. This kind of honor too much resembles that described by Shakspeare's Falstaff, who says, "What is honor? A word. What is that word? Honor. What is that honor? Air. Who hath it? He that died on Wednesday."

After all this talk about honor, let me tell gentlemen that true honor consists in acting wisely; wisdom and virtue are synonymous. So said the wisest man.

The question is not now, as has been said, whether we will live slaves or die free. No, sir, the question is, will you fight on the ocean with a Power vastly superior to yourselves for the command of that ocean, so that you can send your cotton and your tobacco, as well as the sugar and coffee your merchants can obtain in the West Indies, free of restraint to any part of the world where you think you can get most for them, or will you content yourselves with that use of the ocean which your relative strength and importance as a nation entitle you to expect? Two great belligerent Powers, two thousand years older than us, yet not quite so much before us in point of power, attempt to restrain us in the use of what we call the great high road of nations. One of those nations says, she has, at immense expense, turppiked this high road; that she has driven robbers and nearly all her enemies from it; that she keeps a guard upon it for the defence of those of her nation that travel on it. She says the road shall be free for our national vessels, and if our merchants choose to go and come to and from their country, it shall be free for them; she says it shall be free for them to pass and repass to the countries of her friends, and to those who are not her enemies, as well as to the colonial dominions of her enemies; but if our merchants use the road to carry their merchandise to her enemies, they shall pay toll. The other nation says, if you do pay toll, or even if those toll takers speak to you on this road, although it be ever so much against your will, you shall be confiscated, you shall lose all your property the moment you touch at my ports, or the ports of any of my vassals, and my power reaches over almost the whole European continent. Thus, sir, it is impossible to pay this toll or tribute so much talked of; no man would be such a fool as to pay for leave to carry his property to certain confiscation; and if it could be paid, and the goods sold to answer the merchant's purpose, according to our own established doctrine, that the consumer pays all, this tribute would not be upon us, but on the European purchaser. We have, for thirteen months past, said that we would not submit to this treatment, and while we cried out that we would not submit, we have been guilty of the meanest kind of submission, by not only abandoning this great road, but we have nearly destroyed all the roads and passways in our own nation. We have carried this thing so far that no man who has not powerful friends, or favor at Court, can pass on our common national roads, although intended by nature and designated by compact, to be common to all our fellow-citizens. Well, sir, it is now found that all this has done nothing towards obtaining for us a concession that we may freely use the great high road as we please, and that our abandoning it, and spoiling all our domestic roads, is spoiling our own growth, doing ourselves more harm than it is doing everybody else, and the true question now is, what is the wisest course to pursue. War! war! seems to be the cry, but this cry, sir, comes mostly from gentlemen who know little about war, who can promise nothing but honorable death as the conclusion of the war they contemplate. As much averse as I am to war and carnage, I confess my own sense of the injury offered to this country is such, that if I could promise myself and the people I have the honor to represent, a profitable conclusion of a war now to be commenced, and that we could, in any reasonable time, obtain the perfect free use of this road; and have it guaranteed to us, I should be inclined to join in this war; but alas, sir, this is not the case; although, in a defensive war, we are I hope unconquerable, the power and strength of this nation compared to the two we are threatening, is totally inadequate to waging offensive war. I know it may be said, and I believe with truth, too, that we shall have but one of those nations to contend with, namely England, if we go to war, and that Bonaparte will give us every assistance in his power; yet I am not to be persuaded, that with our means we can do her so much harm as she can do us. We can, it is true, take from her all the valuable part of Canada with but little expense; we could have obtained possession of Montreal within one month from this day, if ten thousand Vermonters had been noticed timely of their permission to take it; this, to be sure, would be a considerable injury to England, but, without Quebec, it could be of little use to us, we can raise no revenue from Canada, unless the navigation of the St. Lawrence is open to us; we would not allow the peaceable, unresisting inhabitants of that country to be sacked and plundered; no, this is inconsistent with modern, civilized warfare, and we are an honorable nation; and if that country should be sacked, the produce would not go into our Treasury. True, we would, by taking Montreal, which would be a judicious step in case of a necessary war, secure the allegiance of the Northern Indians and obtain a good frontier; yet, as to an increase of the revenue, or the real strength of the nation, nothing could be gained without Quebec. We have a right to calculate upon finding more disaffected persons in Canada than persons well affected to our Government, and we should be obliged to keep a standing army there of from five to ten thousand men for the safety of the country. As to Quebec, I think it is out of our power to take it; it is a second Gibraltar. When it was not half fortified the British force could not have taken it had they been without a fleet to cut off the communication with the mother country; this being effectually done, and Wolfe cutting off their communication between the city and the country, there was nothing left for Montcalm but to come out on to Abram's plain and fight, or stay in the fort and starve; he chose the former, and Quebec fell. We may expect to take it when we can invest it in the same manner, and not before. It will be a long time before we can attack it in this way if our growth destroying projects should be continued. With Canada I am perfectly well acquainted; with Nova Scotia I am acquainted only by such historical and geographical sketches as have come in my way; but it seems to me there is little to gain there without we had a fleet to support an attack upon Halifax. I remember the fate of the Penobscot expedition very well. I apprehend there would be danger that an attack upon Halifax would turn out in much the same manner as that on Penobscot, and I believe it would be thought best to let that place alone if we were really at war. It may be said, sir, that we have another way to injure our British enemies—we can privateer against them. Yes, sir, we can privateer upon them; but they can privateer upon us too; this is a play that two sides can employ themselves at; it is a play that the British have got their hands in at; their ships that come where we can get at them, are nearly all armed, and their trade is generally convoyed. No doubt our privateers will take many of theirs; will this fill the national coffers, while their privateers and their ships of war take perhaps more than an equal number of ours? Besides this, their ships of war, if they let our great towns alone, may find a great deal of land privateering to do in our little unprotected seaboard towns and villages and their vicinity. Notwithstanding the many millions laid out in fortifying New York, Charleston, &c., the people of those cities may in their turn be glad to take the advice of a gentleman from Maryland and fly to the mountains for safety. This is a subject I do not like to dwell on, but I may be allowed to say the British politician must know that his nation, while she holds the best part of Canada on the courtesy of this Government, feels herself assured of that courtesy by the power she has of annoying our seacoast. Suppose, sir, it would turn out otherwise than I predict, and we should be able to take Halifax and Quebec; we must have men to garrison them. Where have we men for this purpose, beside all that will be wanted for the defence of the coast three or four thousand miles in extent? Whence shall we get money to pay them? If you succeed in attempting to squeeze out of your bankers more than enough to carry on two years of war, their paper will become like our old continental money for want of means of redemption. Your embargo has nearly drained your Treasury, and has had a considerable effect on the banks; the connexion you will have formed with your ally, Bonaparte, will entitle him to offer to garrison those places. You cannot refuse so kind an offer; that moment he has foothold here we are lost. I might pursue this subject further, but it is too disgusting to me. I cannot suffer my mind to dwell on even the dangers of the downfall of my country, the destruction of our Constitution and our Government in this way. No. If you must have war, which can have no object probable to be obtained, I will look for an end to it in another way. There is certainly a very great share of the sensible people of this nation who deplore this proposed war as much as I do. As the depredation, the expense, and the national debt that must be occasioned by it increases, they will be heard too by the great body of the people, who will put the concerns of the nation into hands that will sincerely desire peace, and will be obliged to make it on terms no better, perhaps worse than can now be had. I am not insensible to the impatience and indignation with which some gentlemen listen to my peace talk; but, sir, it is a duty I owe to the nation to speak out my mind. On a great occasion like the present I should like to hear every member of this House speak his sentiments. Now is the time to count the cost; for want of counting the cost in the outset of a project many a fine estate has been lost. Ardent young men are not apt to see the difficulties with which their projects are attended. When they have an enterprise before them, they are apt to think all difficulties can be surmounted by courage. Many a battle has been lost where great courage has been displayed, merely on account of the General's reckoning without his host, belittling the difficulties he had to encounter, and thinking too lightly of the power and strength of his enemy. Anybody that talks at all can cry out war, but it requires the united wisdom of the sages to carry it on with a prospect of success. I ask, have we union among ourselves? Have we confidence in one another? The majority says "No!" This nation can make war when it pleases; but we must have the consent of our enemy and our ally to make peace, as well as that of this nation, and I would lay an equal bet, if it were proper to do it here, that six months after a war is commenced we shall be allied to Bonaparte. I repeat it, sir, now is the time to count the cost; to pause and count the cost. I know a little of what war means. Although I had not the honor of bearing a conspicuous part in that war which gave this country liberty, although I had the mortification, very unjustly, to receive a stab in my reputation in that war, a stab which would have put almost any other man down, I acted an humble, though perhaps a useful part, in that war from the first to the last of it. I was a private soldier in one of those companies called "minute men," who first took up arms in defence of the cause of American liberty, and with my gun on my shoulder marched to take Ticonderoga under the command of Ethan Allen. This was the first offensive war waged by Americans. My humble career ended in the capacity of a militia colonel, commanding in the neighborhood of an exposed frontier, in defence of which, seven years' toil and danger has made an indelible impression on my mind, and has made me to know something of the value of peace; too much to trifle it away on a slight occasion. I never again wish to hear of, much less to see the smoking ruins of our once happy villages, where half-naked women and children shall be assembled to take a last warm at the remaining brand of their late habitation, the father and the husband either murdered or carried into a hopeless captivity. Personal dangers, personal toil, hunger, and cold, are comforts compared to such feelings as these sights produce, yet they are but the common fortune and lot of war. But we are told, sir, that we are called upon to fight at this time for our independence, that our all is at stake as much now as it was in 1775, 1776, and 1777, and that patriotism has deserted our bosoms if we do not rise and challenge our enemies, or put ourselves in battle array. It is no such thing, sir. If Britain was to tell us now, (instead of telling us that their fleets had put them in possession of greater rights on the ocean than ours had us,) that their Parliament had a right to bind us in all cases whatsoever; that she would appoint Governors over our States, who should be above our laws and abrogate them at pleasure; that she would send to this country, and fetch away for trial such of our citizens as her Government should please to call traitors—should she, I say, land troops in Boston to enforce her edicts, and should her troops move again towards Lexington to carry away or destroy our military stores, and again commence the spilling of American blood on their march, I would myself, old as I am, do as I did before, take my gun on my shoulder and march to Ticonderoga, to wrest it from the British veterans, if any Ticonderoga there was as near me as it then was. I had, but two children then, whose slavery I dreaded; I have more than thirty children and grand children now to be alarmed for, and my zeal to defend their liberties is (although my power is not) proportionably increased. Were this the case now there would be no want of patriotism. No, sir, every heart would beat to the sound of the drum; the American people would not wait for the thundering eloquence of the gentleman from South Carolina to wake them up. It would be found, then, that those troublesome yankees, instead of being complained of by the embargo men, their fellow-citizens, would be giving cause of complaint to their country's enemies; but, sir, I must beg the gentleman's pardon when I tell him that, with all his rhetoric and his logic, he cannot persuade me that our independence is at all in question.

Really, sir, suppose gentlemen could have their way about going to war now, and England, having no occasion to employ a man or a ship more on account of warring with us while she wars with France, should take it in her head to keep up with us a long, moderate, and teasing war. What would we have now to induce them to peace? The patriots and philanthropists of that country formerly persuaded the nation and the Government, that American commerce, flowing into the lap of England, would compensate for American independence, this brought about our peace at that time; but, sir, can we have a party in England who will plead for us in this manner now? have we not stopped their mouths by our constant threatening in one way or other, that we will withhold all our commerce from them; that we will injure ourselves to injure them; that we will have manufactures of our own, and be independent of them? Much has been said about the merchants of this country two or three years ago covering your tables with petitions, stating the hardship they suffered by being denied the right by England of carrying on in one way or other the commerce between the French and Spanish colonies and the mother country. What was the consequence? Why we first narrowed the limits of the commerce they had left, and then inhibited the whole, for fourteen or fifteen months, and now, as if to punish these impudent merchants for their interference, they are treated like a patient who has been dosed with warm water until his strength as well as his faith in the doctor is nearly exhausted; the doctor cries out to him, "Bleed, bleed, or die!" So the merchants are told to bleed; they are told that their vessels shall be kept rotting in port, unless they agree to take letters of marque, and make war for us. Ill-fated merchants! we were told about a year ago by a learned gentleman, that there never ought one of them to have a seat on this floor. I should myself care but little about these merchants if it was not that they are the real servants and agents of the farmers and the planters. If they could make a war of their own, a merchant's war, and not trouble the nation with it, I should not be quite so averse to war, but that they should be forced to engage to make war, and that a national war too, before they can have their ships unshackled, is rather too much, especially as I have not learned that one merchant has yet asked the favor of a letter of marque and reprisal. After glancing on the hard case of the merchants, permit me to say, sir, it looks like adding insult to injury for the embargo gentlemen to express so much pity for the poor American sailors. It is too late in the day, sir, for those gentlemen to make much out of that fellow feeling and sympathy their speeches express for this neglected class of their fellow men. The seamen who have been driven into foreign service to earn a livelihood, have a right to say these are crocodile tears, and those who have been starving at home have found, by sad experience, that all the fine speeches of the embargo gentlemen have not made their pot boil.

The gentleman from South Carolina has told us that the destinies of this nation are in the hands of the minority. I wish it were true, sir; the minority are composed of about half the number of the majority; it is my opinion, that if they had the destinies of the nation in their hands for half as long a term as the majority has held the people embargoed, they would, instead of war, give the nation peace on terms that would be to the satisfaction of nearly the whole of the American people; a peace that would suffer the nation to grow a while longer. There is, sir, another set of gentlemen in this House, consisting of about one third, who really hold the destinies of the nation in their hand; to them I look for peace. The gentlemen I mean are those that have not by war speeches committed themselves; that have coolly listened, and steadily kept the fate of the nation before them. Should they, or a majority of them, hold their hand on the helm of State at this time, and keep the political ship from bilging on the rocks among which she seems now to be embargoed, they will deserve the blessings of their country, they will, ere long, enjoy the heartfelt applause of a grateful nation, their children, and their children's children, will bless them, and feel proud of the blessings heaped on them by others, their progeny will thank God that they have the honor of being descended from men who have deserved so well of their country. "Blessed are the peacemakers, (said the King of Peace,) for they shall be called the children of God. When men shall revile you and say all manner of evil things of you, rejoice, and be exceeding glad, for your reward is in Heaven." Blessed, I say, will be they who preserve the peace of this nation and suffer it to grow. Let it grow, I say, in strength, in power, in wisdom, and in virtue.

Mr. Chairman, soon after I came to Congress last year, when yourself and other gentlemen said we were in a kind of war with the British, I offered a resolution for holding British property in the funds, and British debts in the hands and names they then stood in; for this I am charged with having been a favorer of war. Although I have a right, in common with others, to change my opinions, I do not claim to exercise that right on this occasion. I was equally a friend to peace, then as now, but until the disavowal of the British Government of the attack on the Chesapeake, I saw no chance to avoid war, especially as the temper of this nation was up on the occasion; thinking, as I shall always think, that it is best when we have war to do our enemy all the harm we can, I brought forward the proposition, not as a war measure, or as a measure of provocation, but as a measure of precaution, which would have saved, if adopted, more than thirty millions of dollars in a state ready for sequestration in case of war which is now transferred out of the reach of the Government. In case of peace, the owners could not be injured by my proposition, as their property remained in their own hands for them.

For the reasons I have mentioned, and for the sake of humanity and the growth of our country, I hope the motion for striking out will prevail. I should then be willing to adopt, not the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia; that is too much like threatening for my mind in the present state of things; but that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on this side of the House. (Mr. MILNOR.) Something has been said about a special mission; to this I have no objection, provided that mission can move unlogged with embargoes, non-importation acts, non-intercourse acts, and threatening army bills. We have tried negotiation backed with a non-importation act, and at the advice of the negotiator, withdrew this backing. Negotiation then produced us a treaty. I need not repeat the fate of that treaty. If we now send a mission unshackled, we may possibly again get an offer of as good a treaty. A gentleman from Virginia has taken some pains to prove to you that there is a powerful party in England who wish for war; I believe him; there is no doubt of a party there who wish for war with this country—a strong party, who would be profited by it. Then why will you forward their views by your threats, and your attempts at coercion, while you wish to treat? No conduct can be more preposterous.

There are only two wise courses to pursue with regard to England; one is, to reason with them, and obtain and receive such concessions from them as you can persuade them will comport with their interest, and be quiet with that, letting this nation grow. The other course is, to have no more concern with them than is absolutely necessary. Let the system you adopt with regard to our concerns with them be of a permanent nature, and such as our own people will approve of, and can forever bear; such as they will consider consistent with their permanent interest; and in this way let the British know that they must eventually be losers by their rigid, harsh, and unneighborly conduct towards this nation. Neither of these courses have been pursued; you have kept the nation embargoed now near fourteen months, while you have allowed the British to bring here not only toys and gewgaws to a vast amount, to be paid for in cash, while our own produce has been perishing on our hands; but you have allowed them to bring their cotton goods also, subject only to the usual duties, to the great discouragement of your own infant manufacturers, who would, with proper encouragement, make up for our own consumption a large share of that staple article, to get a free sale for which in every part of the world, a great share of thi bluster is made. No, sir, the people do not hear of an additional duty, pledged for fourteen or twenty years on any article which we have been in the habit of receiving from England, and can very well be manufactured here, and the manufacturer live by it, if the importation was discouraged by duties. No, sir, while your embargo has depressed those manufacturers who were in the habit of making hats, shoes, saddlery, pleasure carriages, household furniture, and other articles for exportation, other manufacturers have received no permanent encouragement. The embargo was to remedy every evil, to cure every disease. This done, our commerce with Britain was to be revived with renewed vigor; but the embargo has done nothing abroad; our Government nothing at home. How can such an improvident Government expect to retain the confidence of an enlightened people? They have discouraged those manufacturers who labor to produce articles for exportation; they have looked on with apathy while their policy has ruined many, impoverished and divided the people, and brought the nation to the humble posture of borrowers to meet the common expenditure. I must say as I think, sir, that to this unaccountable apathy, this listlessness, the deficiency of those in whom unbounded confidence has been placed, in the knowledge of the human heart, the wants and ways, the habits and propensities of the American people, to incapacity in them to discern the real and true relative station and importance of this young nation compared with the nations it is proposed to contend with, and with the rest of the world, together with a propensity to man worship in minds that ought to be above such idolatry, nearly all our present difficulties as well as the depressed state of the nation is to be attributed.

We have a Constitution which provides for the meeting of 142 members in this House, and 34 in another, to consult for the common good and provide for the safety of this nation: we may talk here, here we may vote, here we may meet to collect a majority to order the registering of the decrees of a sort of jacobin club called a caucus, who hold their midnight convocations to consult not the good or the safety of the nation—no, that could be best done here. No, sir, it seems it is to consult what can be done to save the party—not the Old Republican party of 1798—no, that party is broken down. I don't hear that yourself (Mr. MACON) and many others of that Old Republican party meet in those caucuses, those nightly meetings: it is it seems the embargo party who meet in the Senate rooms under pretence of consulting and devising means for the national benefit, yet in their discussions they cannot avoid dwelling upon the dangerous situation of their party: it was in the great or little caucuses that this war-whoop commenced; it was there discussed and recommended as a party-saving measure. It seems as if we are in future to look for all national measures to be first canvassed in those midnight meetings by those self-created caucus gentry: it seems that every measure proposed for national benefit, however applicable to the state of this nation, is to be scouted out of this House at the first glance, merely because it is not the child of this caucus; our work is thus to be laid out for us in the midnight caucuses, and we are to be called upon to be present while these measures receive a vote of sanction in this House, which is in future to act the part of Bonaparte's mock Parliament. We are to meet to-morrow here to attend the registering of the election of a caucus President; we are to have a caucus army, I understand, a caucus non-intercourse, a caucus loan of ten millions, equal to the whole capital of the Bank of the United States.

When I passed through Virginia coming here I was very much insulted because I said the embargo had brought our coffers so low, that, notwithstanding the boasted state of our Treasury, we should be obliged next year to borrow. Notwithstanding all the boasting of an overflowing Treasury, and the appointment of a committee to devise means to dispose of its redundancy, we, it seems, are to have the registering of a caucus mandate for this ten million loan. There is, sir, a caucus newspaper in this city. I do not read it, but it seems that it circulates the caucus bulletin or general orders. While gentlemen were at their caucus devotions last evening, I happened to pick up a New York paper, and there I had before me in an extract from this caucus paper the whole work of that caucus pointed out by one of its organs in their paper. Action, energy, decision, promptitude, confidence in one another, confidence in the leaders, union, energy, war, preparation for war, vigor, more embargo, armies, navies, and above all, loans and money are called for; and all this, not to save the nation, but the embargo party. All these subjects, I understand, have been discussed in the caucuses. On Saturday night the prevailing opinion of the caucus was, that immediate war and a revival of the embargo would save the party; last night's caucus softened down the term of immediate war; they would try letters of marque; preparations by armies and loans prevailed. How vilely is the understanding of the American people insulted! their patriotism is appealed to by asking them, will they consent to pay tribute in a case where it is impossible that any man, even without a drop of American blood, would be fool enough to pay it; while a self-created caucus, composed of a few of their Representatives, has the hardihood to propose a loan that would make them pay a substantial and annual tribute of about half a million of dollars, mostly to foreigners, for the purpose of fighting about this nominal tribute; which search for it as sedulously as you please, you can no more overtake it than you can a jack-o'-lantern.

The question was taken on striking out so much of Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution as relates to issuing letters of marque and reprisal; there were for striking out 57, against it 39—majority 16; so that the next question is on inserting the substitute offered by Mr. RANDOLPH; on whose motion the Committee now rose, 56 to 37.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 8.

Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooke county, in the State of Virginia, praying that the road commenced and laid out from the river Potomac to the Ohio river, may pass through the town of Washington, and thence to Charleston, on the river Ohio, for the reasons therein specified.—Referred to the Committee appointed, the fourteenth of December last, on a Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplementary report of the Commissioners appointed under the act of Congress of the twenty-ninth of March, one thousand eight hundred and six, concerning a road from Cumberland to Ohio.

On motion Mr. HOLMES,

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred on the fourth instant, a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied with a supplementary report and sundry documents in relation to invalid pensioners, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said letter, report, and documents, be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the thirtieth ultimo, a bill concerning invalid pensioners.

ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. NICHOLAS offered the following order:

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is now ready to attend them in opening the certificates and counting the votes of the Electors of the several States, in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States, in pursuance of the resolutions of the two Houses of Congress of the 7th instant; and that the Clerk of the House do go with the said message.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it had sometimes been the case, he did not say it had been the practice, that this House had met the other branch of the Legislature in their Chamber, for the purpose of counting the votes; in which cases, very properly indeed, this House being in the Chamber of the Senate, the President of that body had taken the chair. Mr. R. said he now understood that it was proposed, without any vote of this House for the purpose, that the President of the Senate was to take the chair of this House; that the Speaker was to leave the chair, to make way for the President of another body. To this, he, for one, could never consent. I conceive, said he, that such a proceeding would derogate, very materially, from the dignity, if not from the rights of this body. I can never consent, Mr. Speaker, that any other person than yourself, or the Chairman of the Committee of the whole House, should take the chair, except by a vote of the House. I hope, therefore, that this matter may be well understood. I conceive it to be a respect which we owe to ourselves, and to the people, whose immediate representatives we are, never to suffer, by a sort of prescriptive right, the privileges of this House to be in any wise diminished, or its dignity to fade before that of any other assembly of men whatever.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he was as unwilling as any other gentleman to surrender the privileges of the House. When assembled as the House of Representatives, he agreed that none but the Speaker should take the chair; but, on the occasion of counting out the votes, he did not consider the House of Representatives to be formed as a distinct body. In meeting on this occasion, he said, it always had been usual, since the establishment of the Government, for the Vice President of the United States, or the President pro tempore of the Senate, to take the chair. There was, also, a propriety in this course, because, by the Constitution, the Vice President is to open the votes. For twenty years the practice had been that the President of the Senate presided in joint meeting.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON spoke a few words on the same side as Mr. NICHOLAS, and Mr. LYON replied to him.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved, in order to do away any difficulty in this case, that when the members of the Senate were introduced, the Speaker should relinquish the chair to the President of the Senate.

Mr. DAVENPORT supported this motion. He had no doubt of the propriety of the President of the Senate presiding at a joint meeting, more especially, as he was the person designated by the Constitution for counting out the votes.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that if this course were taken, the Senate ought to be notified of this act of courtesy on the part of the House; if not, it might appear that the President of the Senate took the chair as a matter of right. He said he knew that, to many persons, matters of this sort appeared to be of minute importance, but in everything touching the privileges of this House, as it regarded the claims of the other co-ordinate branches of the Government, he would stickle for the ninth part of a hair. It was well known that, in England, the privileges of the Commons had been gained inch by inch from the Kings and Nobles by a steady perseverance; and that man must have very little knowledge of mankind, indeed, who was not persuaded that those privileges might be lost, as they were gained, by gradual and imperceptible encroachment on the one hand, and tacit yielding on the other. This was not a matter of great consequence in itself; but power always begot power. It was like money, he said; any man could make money who had money. So any man, or body of men, who had power, could extend it. I have no objection, said Mr. R., very far from it, to the Constitutional exercise of the powers and privileges of the Senate. Let their President count the votes sir; there is a very good chair for him in which the Clerk now sits. But, on what principle is he to come into the House with a consciousness that he has a right to throw you out of the chair, sir, and take possession of it? I have no idea of suffering a man to come through those folding doors with such a sentiment. If he comes into this House, he comes from courtesy, and cannot assume your chair, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of right, but as a favor. And, if the President of the Senate takes possession of your chair as a favor, it ought to be announced to the Senate as such; for, the more vote on our side amounts to nothing, provided that he, and the body over whom he presides, come into this House under the knowledge, (without an intimation from us,) that you are to leave your chair, and he is to take possession of it.

Mr. SMILIE observed that there was no fear of the privileges of this body being encroached upon by any other, for there was a written Constitution, prescribing the powers of each body; and, at the same time, that it was proper to be careful of their own rights, he said the House should be careful not to infringe on the rights of the other body. In respect to this question, there was a case in point. In one instance while Congress sat at Philadelphia, the Senate had come into the Representatives' Chamber to count out the votes, and the President of the Senate had taken the chair as a matter of right. We, said, Mr. S., are sitting as a convention of the two Houses, for a special purpose, viz: to count out the votes. Who is properly the presiding officer in this case? Unquestionably the officer directed by the Constitution to open the votes. And I consider the Speaker of the House, on this occasion, as acting in the same capacity as any other member of the House.

After some further observations on the subject, from Messrs. MASTERS, LYON, and MACON, the motion of Mr. NICHOLAS was agreed to—years 98.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved that the Senate be acquainted, by message, of this arrangement. Agreed to—years 73.

The resolution first offered by Mr. NICHOLAS was then agreed to.

On the suggestion of Mr. VAN DYKE, it was agreed that the members should receive the Senate standing and uncovered.

The time for counting the votes having arrived, the members of the Senate, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms, entered the Representatives' Chamber, Mr. MILLEDGE, the President pro tempore, took the Speaker's chair, and the members took their seats on the right hand of the chair. The tellers were ranged in front, and the Clerks of each House on the right and left of the tellers. The President of the Senate opened the electoral returns, one copy of which was handed to the teller of the Senate, Mr. S. SMITH, who read it; the tellers of the House, Messrs. NICHOLAS and VAN DYKE, comparing the duplicate returns handed to them.

When this business, which occupied about two hours, was concluded, the tellers handed their report to the President of the Convention, who was proceeding to read it, when

Mr. HILLHOUSE observed that the returns from one of the States appeared to be defective, the Governor's certificate not being attached to it. He thought that this might be as proper a time to notice it as any.

Nothing farther being said on the subject, however, the President of the Senate read the following statement of the votes, as reported by the tellers:

The President of the Senate, pursuant to the joint resolution of the two Houses of the 7th instant, then announced the state of the votes to both Houses of Congress, and declared "That JAMES MADISON was duly elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence on the fourth day of March next; and that GEORGE CLINTON was duly elected Vice President of the United States, for the like term of four years, to commence on the said fourth day of March next."

The members of the Senate then retired in the same order in which they entered.

After the conclusion of the business of the joint meeting, the Speaker resumed the chair, and the House came to order.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON offered a resolution for a total non-intercourse between this country and Great Britain, and France, and for excluding from our waters all armed vessels, with a view to have it referred to the Committee on Mr. NICHOLAS'S resolution.

The SPEAKER having declared the motion for commitment to be in order,

Mr. RANDOLPH appealed from the decision, on the ground that a few days ago the House had decided that a resolution could not be considered when the precise subject of the resolution was already before a Committee of the Whole; and that the decision was variant from the former decision of the Speaker.

After some observations from various gentlemen on the point of order, Mr. JACKSON withdrew his motion, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 9.

Mr. MACON moved to amend the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, by inserting the letter of Mr. Walton, the Elector from the State of Kentucky, who did not attend to give his vote, stating the reason thereof. He stated his object to be to state on the Journal the reason why one vote was deficient from the State of Kentucky, that it might serve as a precedent on similar occasions. For, if hereafter, in consequence of the sickness or inability to attend of any one or more Electors, there should be a tie between any two candidates for the Presidency, it would be made a matter of question whether their votes, although unable to attend at the time, ought not to be counted.

Some discussion took place on this point, it being contended by some gentlemen that the House had no concern with the causes why any vote was not received, but merely to count those which came to hand. And that if it was intended to fix a precedent to govern future proceeding on this subject, it ought to be done with great deliberation.

Mr. MACON'S motion was negatived, ayes 20.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

Mr. TAYLOR said it would be recollected that, in the course of the public business of this session, a resolution reported by a committee on our foreign relations arising out of a motion of a member from North Carolina, for the purpose of interdicting commercial intercourse with such belligerents as had in force decrees or edicts against the lawful commerce of the United States, had been agreed to and referred to the same committee, who had reported a bill for non-intercourse. This bill in fact however comprised but one half of the whole subject embraced by the words "non-intercourse." The bill as reported to this House provided for the non-importation of the goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth and manufacture of these particular countries. That (said he) may be readily accounted for, from the circumstance that the House was then actually engaged in passing a law for the enforcement of the embargo, the committee therefore having only in view the other part of the question, so as to complete a non-intercourse. After that bill was reported, a gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. RHEA.) in order that the whole might be incorporated into one, offered a resolution for that purpose. I did think it unnecessary at that time; but as the course of business seems to look towards a repeal of the embargo, in order that the whole subject of non-intercourse may be incorporated in the bill before the House, I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and that it may be referred to a committee, in order that it may be made in fact what the title imports it to be, completely, a bill for non-intercourse between this country and those nations having in force decrees affecting our neutral rights.

The Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, ayes 72.

A motion having been made that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on Mr. NICHOLAS's resolution, was negatived, 56 to 43.

It was then moved to refer the bill to the committee who reported it, and carried, 61 to 41.

Much desultory debate took place on these motions, in which Messrs. SLOAN, D. R. WILLIAMS, UPHAM, MACON, DANA, EPPES, TAYLOR, NICHOLAS, VAN HORN, and SMILIE, partook.

Mr. W. ALSTON moved that the committee which now has under consideration the resolutions offered by Messrs. NICHOLAS, BACON, and DURELL, be discharged from the further consideration of them, and that they be referred to the same committee to whom the non-intercourse bill was just referred.

Mr. DAWSON seconded the motion, and Messrs. SMILIE, LOVE, HOLLAND, and RHEA, supported it; and Messrs. DANA, RANDOLPH, MILNOR, GARDENIER, and MACON, opposed it.

The question was taken on discharging the committee from the further consideration of them at half-past 5 o'clock—ayes 65, nays 55, as follows:

Mr. W. ALSTON then moved to commit the resolutions to the committee to whom the bill on the subject of non-intercourse was referred.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. RANDOLPH, LYON, VAN HORN, BACON, GARDENIER, QUINCY, and MILNOR; and supported by Messrs. TAYLOR, W. ALSTON, and HOLLAND.

The motion was carried by yeas and nays—55 to 36, as follows:

Mr. VAN ALEN moved to refer to the same committee a resolution offered by Mr. MUMFORD at the commencement of the session for a partial repeal of the embargo; but the House adjourned before a question could be taken.

The effect of the votes of this day, is to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations, composed of Messrs. G. W. CAMPBELL, NICHOLAS, BACON, TAYLOR, FISK, J. MONTGOMERY, MUMFORD, CHAMPION, and PORTER, the several propositions for the repeal of the embargo, for arming the merchant vessels, for non-intercourse, for excluding armed vessels from our waters, and for declaring the first capture made in violation of the neutral rights of the United States to be a declaration of war, &c., with leave to report by bill.

The chief argument in favor of this general reference was, that these propositions might be merged in one bill which should present a general system, and thus render less complicated the proceedings of the House on these resolutions. The main arguments against it were, that it would destroy all that had already been done in Committee of the Whole, and probably present a system at length to the House which would not be approved, and thus produce no other effect at this late period of the session than to protract discussion; and also, that it would encourage that speculation now going on in the mercantile towns, and be ruinous to many men of moderate capitals who had embarked their all in the purchase of produce, in the certainty that the embargo would be raised on the 4th of March.

FRIDAY, February 10.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to incorporate a company for opening the canal in the City of Washington;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented, a bill authorizing the Accounting officers of the Treasury Department to give credit to certain collectors of the Customs, for allowances paid by them to the owners and crews of fishing vessels; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On a motion made by Mr. DANA, that the following be added as a new rule to the standing rules and orders of the House, to wit:

"The Speaker may admit within the Hall such Judicial officers of the United States, or either of them, as he may judge proper, and such gentlemen as have been members of either House of Congress."

The rule was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed, that at present the courts of the Territories have no jurisdiction to try offenders against the laws of the United States. That in the Territory which he had the honor to represent, and probably in other Territories, violations of the embargo laws had taken place and would again take place; and that as the law stood they might take place with impunity, the Territorial courts having no jurisdiction to punish the offenders. He therefore moved for the order of the day on the bill for extending jurisdiction to the Territorial courts. The House refused to take it up, ayes 27.

On motion of Mr. W. ALSTON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriation for the support of Government for the year 1809. The bill having been gone through, and the blanks filled with the various sums reported by the Treasury Department, the Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

No division took place on any appropriation but one of five thousand dollars towards completing the Orleans road; which was opposed by Messrs. GARDNER, GARDENIER, and UPHAM, and supported by Messrs. W. ALSTON, EPPES, DESHA, BIBB, and J. G. JACKSON, and carried 52 to 19.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 43 to 30, on the bill reported by Mr. DANA concerning associations for the security of navigation.

[The bill provides, "That in cases wherein the armament of merchant vessels for defence may be allowed by any law of the United States, it shall be lawful for citizens of the United States to agree, that any ships or vessels by them owned shall sail in concert and be associated for mutual assistance and protection in any voyage or voyages not contrary to law, and during any time or times which may be designated by instrument in writing duly executed by the owners or their authorized agents. The stipulations of the parties contained in such instrument may extend to the equipment and force of the vessels respectively. the relative authority of the masters or commanders, the appointment of places and times of rendezvous and sailing, the regulation of signals, the direction of the general course of the voyage or voyages, the orders to be observed in cases of separation or danger, and the making of arrangements for conducting and managing the respective vessels as may be most effectual for assistance in any case of peril or misfortune, and for protecting all or any of them against forcible seizure or annoyance: Provided, That no such agreement or stipulation shall contravene any instructions or orders issued according to law by the President of the United States. That the respective ships or vessels shall be holden for the stipulations contained in any such instrument concerning them, and shall accordingly be chargeable for such compensation or indemnity as may be justly required on account of any failure to perform the same, as well as for satisfying any reasonable claim of contribution on account of loss or damage incurred in pursuance thereof. The rates of contribution to be so made shall be apportioned to and among the respective vessels, as the parties may have consented and declared by such instrument, or, in failure of such declaration, the apportionment of the same shall be adjusted by the competent court," &c.]

The words in italic in the above were inserted by amendment, on motion of Mr. J. G. JACKSON.

Non-Intercourse.

In explaining the operation of the provisions of this bill—

Mr. DANA said that it did not propose to change the state of our foreign relations with respect to any Power whatever; it decided nothing respecting the cases in which merchant vessels might be permitted to arm for their defence, but proceeded on the supposition that there might be cases in which arming the merchant vessels of the United States should be authorized by law. The object of the bill was to make such arming efficacious, by combining different vessels, that they might act together; the importance of concert being well known to every person who had attended to the difficulty of attaining any point by individual and unconnected efforts. It was well known that, for some trades, vessels were now permitted to arm; and if with respect to the great Powers of the civilized world the United States were to permit their vessels to arm, the bill would equally apply to associations for defence against them as against any other enemy. Such association might now take place by compact where vessels were permitted to arm, which however could be obligatory on the owner only. The object of the bill was, that the vessels engaged might be pledged for the performance of the compact.

Some desultory discussion took place on the details of the bill, in which Messrs. DANA, LOVE, BURWELL, D. R. WILLIAMS, SMILIE, and BASSETT, partook. Messrs. EPPES and BASSETT appeared to be opposed to the principle of the bill, the objection to which appeared to be that it sanctioned armaments by individuals larger than the Government itself chose to support, and that the Government might be deemed in some sort pledged to a responsibility for their acts.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 11.

On motion of Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW,

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the United States, of the 19th February, 1808, communicating an additional report of the proceedings of the Commissioners appointed under "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," be referred to the committee appointed, on the 14th of December last, on a Message from the President of the United States relative to the same object.

A bill from the Senate to incorporate a company for opening a canal in the City of Washington was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. VAN HORN, was ordered to be read a third time to-day—55 to 29. The bill was read a third time, and passed.

The bill concerning associations for the security of navigation being about to be read a third time, was, on motion of Mr. EPPES, with the assent of Mr. DANA, postponed till Monday, on the ground that it had not received that mature consideration by the House to which the importance of the subject entitled it.

The bill making appropriations for the year of Government, for the year 1809, was read a second time, and passed.

Mr. LOVE, after a few prefatory remarks on the following resolution, which was referred to a select committee, with leave to report at any other time, said:

Resolved, That the laws of the several States be regarded as the rules of proceeding on trials and executions in the Courts of the United States, except where the laws of the United States otherwise provide.

On motion of Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, the bill resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for extending the mode of payment for public lands. The bill, after being read through, it was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, the House proceeded to consider an additional resolution standing rules and orders of the House, which was read yesterday by Mr. DANA; and the same being read, was, on the question put thereupon, ordered to be by the House, as follows:

"The Speaker may admit within the Hall such officers of the United States, or other States, as he may judge proper, and such gentlemen who have been members of either House of Congress."

A message from the Senate informed that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's Causeway to Alexandria," and they desire the concurrence of this House.

NON-INTERCOURSE

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL being absent from his seat by illness,) reported a bill, creating commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes. The bill was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

[This bill provides for a repeal of the embargo, except so far as relates to Great Britain and France, on the 4th day of March next, repealing entirely the provisions of the embargo law, relating to the coasting trade, and for a total non-intercourse from Great Britain and France, to commence on the 20th of May. It also excludes the waters of the United States all armed vessels from the 4th of March next.]

MONDAY, February 13.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's Causeway to Alexandria," was read a second time, and committed to the Committee for the District of Columbia, to consider and report thereon to the House.

Mr. MILNOR presented a petition of sundry holders and proprietors of land in that part of the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, which is situated between the towns of Lees andria and Georgetown, stating that they have been informed an application to Congress has been lately made for opening a new road through the lands of the petitioners, between the town of Alexandria and Georgetown ferry; and praying that the prayer of any petition or petitions for that object may not be granted.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

On a motion, made by Mr. MASTERS, that the House do now adjourn, the question was taken thereupon, and decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 54.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the time for making payment for the public lands of the United States," together with the amendments agreed to on Saturday last, was read the third time. Whereupon, the bill, as amended, was recommitted to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

An engrossed bill concerning associations for the security of navigation was read the third time, and recommitted to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. MASTERS reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and, in the course of the discussion, the Committee found themselves without a quorum, and thereby dissolved.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill extending the right of suffrage to the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes. The bill was reported with an amendment; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. MARION,

Ordered, That the bill for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place, be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

DANIEL COTTON.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Daniel Cotton. The bill was reported without amendment. The bill was then read the third time, and passed—yeas 58, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—Jemuel J. Alston, Joseph Barker, John Boyle, Robert Brown, Epaphroditus Champion, John Calpeper, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, jr., Daniel M. Durrell, James Elliot, William Ely, William Findley, James Fisk, Barent Gardenier, Francis Gardner, Isaiah

Smith, Henry Southard, John Taylor, Robert Whitehill, and Isaac Wilbour.

TUESDAY, February 14.

An engrossed bill extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes, was read the third time. Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. ROWAN, that the further consideration thereof be postponed indefinitely. And the question being taken thereupon, it was decided in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. ELY, that the said bill be recommitted to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House. And the question being put thereupon, it was decided in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. BIBB, that the fourth and fifth sections of the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands, further to consider the same, and report to the House. And the question being taken thereupon, it was decided in the negative.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes."

Mr. LOVE, from the committee appointed on the 11th instant, presented a bill to regulate process, in certain cases, in the Courts of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for imposing additional duties on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States.

[This bill provides "that an additional duty of — per centum on the permanent duties now imposed by law, upon goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States from foreign ports or places, shall be laid, levied and collected upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, which shall, after the thirty-first day of January, 1809, be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place; and a farther addition of ten per centum shall be made to the said additional duty, in respect to all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels not of the United States: and the duties imposed by this act shall be levied and collected in the same manner, and under the same regulations, mode of security, and time of payment, respectively, as are already prescribed by law, in relation to the duties now in force on the importation of articles imported from any foreign port or place. That this act shall continue in force until the first day of April, 1810, and no longer: Provided, that the additional duties laid by this act, shall be collected on such goods, wares, and merchandise, as shall have been imported previous to the said day."]

Mr. W. ALSTON, in the absence of Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to fill the blank in the bill with the words seventy-five, stating that the opinions of the members of the Committee had varied as to the proportion with which to fill the blanks, some being for one hundred, some for fifty; and seventy-five had been taken as the average.

The motion to fill the blank with "seventy-five" was negatived, 51 to 37; and "fifty" agreed upon, 59 to 30.

The words in italic in the above were struck out on motion of Mr. W. ALSTON.

The words "and allowances as to drawback," between the word "regulations" and "mode of" were inserted on motion of the same gentleman, security, &c.

A motion was made by Mr. MILNOR to strike out the first section of the bill, which gave rise to considerable debate; but was withdrawn by Mr. M., who moved that the Committee rise, with a view to recommit the bill. Motion negatived.

In the course of the debate, Messrs. MILNOR, LLOYD, TALLMADGE, SLOAN and QUINCY, opposed the principle of the bill, on the ground that the House had not before them any specified information on which to act; that the duties on imported goods were already very high; that an increase of them would encourage evasions of the revenue laws, by throwing out great temptations to smugglers; that the bill imposed additional duties indiscriminately on all articles imported, whilst the House, however it might tax some articles, should avoid burdening those articles used almost exclusively by the poorer classes of the people; that the tax, if raised as proposed, would operate as a complete prohibition of the importation of some articles; that an additional duty would increase the value of goods now in the hands of monopolizers, and excite discontent in a part of the community; and, finally, that if the measure was proper in itself, it was at this time premature, the House not having decided what course of policy it would pursue.

Messrs. W. ALSTON, FISK, SMITH, TAYLOR, EPPES, and RHEA, supported the bill. They remarked that those who were opposed to supporting the Government would undoubtedly vote against any proposition for raising revenue; that besides producing revenue, the bill would encourage our own manufactures, and thus render us more independent of foreign nations; that this measure had been proposed at the last session, though not acted on, and was therefore not a sudden proposition; that if the proportion proposed were too large, the Committee might refuse it and agree to a smaller; that it would be impossible at this late period of the session to form a new tariff of duties discriminating between the increase of duty on different articles imported; that, even supposing there were a difference of opinion as to the mode of laying the duty, the time for the Spring importations was nearly arrived, and by delaying the passage of the bill beyond the present session the benefits of it would be lost; that a bill for imposing discriminating duties would be wholly different from this, and could not be got through the House during the present session.

Messrs. LYON, BACON, COOK, and BURWELL, were in favor of the object of the bill, but wished it to be so amended as to discriminate between the articles on which the duty was to be laid, excepting from it those of the first necessity.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS wished to impose the additional duty exclusively on goods imported from England and France; and thus make the increase of duty a measure to operate on foreign nations as well as to produce revenue to the United States.

The bill having been gone through and a motion having been made that the Committee report the bill—

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to amend the bill by inserting after the words "goods, wares, and merchandise," in the beginning of the bill, the words "the produce or manufacture of Great Britain and France, and the colonies of either." Mr. W. said it would be perceived that this motion proposed wholly to change the aspect of the bill; and as it was late in the day, he moved that the Committee rise, to give time for reflection on it.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

reported the bill without amendment: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. VAN HORN that the bill be now read the third time. And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative. The bill was then committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIS ALSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and nine; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year one thousand eight hundred and nine," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee, on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to consider whether any, and, if any, what measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the President of the United States, for the term commencing the fourth day of March next, to report by bill or otherwise; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLAS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for interdicting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILNOR moved to strike out the first section of the bill, with a view to try the principle of the non intercourse system. In support of this motion, he alleged the impossibility of carrying the system into effect; for he conceived that the embargo had been ineffectual from the impossibility of carrying it into complete effect, and the proposed system would be as difficult to enforce. He thought that it would be impossible to carry a non-intercourse system into effect, as long as vessels were permitted to go to sea. He had many other objections to this bill, among which were these: that, although it raised the embargo only in part, the permission to vessels to go out, would render the provision for a partial embargo nugatory; that, if the bill were to pass in its present shape, it was to be doubted whether any revenue officer of the United States would understand the duty enjoined on him by it; that a time only two days previous to the meeting of the next Congress was fixed upon as the day on which the non-importation should go into operation, and thus the bill appeared to manifest a distrust of that Congress, who certainly would be more competent than the present Congress to decide on its propriety at that time; that a non-intercourse between these countries, would but compel our citizens to pay a double freight to and from the entrepôt, without producing any other effect than injuring our own citizens; that goods from these countries, although their importation were interdicted by law, would be introduced nevertheless; that the extent of the territory and seacoast of the United States was so great that all efforts to interdict the importation of goods must be ineffectual, for they would be introduced contrary to law; thus depriving the United States of the revenue which would be derived from them, if their importation were permitted by law: Rather than accept this system, Mr. M. thought it would be better that this country should remain yet longer under the pressure of the embargo, which he had no doubt must be repealed early in the next session.

Mr. QUINCY entered at considerable length into an examination of the system of coercion on foreign nations, by means of commercial restrictions. The idea of the efficacy of this system, he traced to a deeper root than any Administration under this Government. It was an error of the American people, originating in a period antecedent to the Revolution; it grew out of our colonial regulations. It began to be a favorite belief with the people, antecedent to the year 1760, and was then fostered by the patriots of that day, the idea being also encouraged by the patriots of England. Mr. Q. entered into a comparative statement of the exports from and imports to Great Britain from America at two different periods, viz: the nine years preceding the year 1775, and the nine years succeeding it, with a view to show that the average imports into Great Britain from all the world, during the nine years' peace with this country, amounted to but about one-thirteenth more than the average imports during the same period of war; and the exports diminished, nearly in the same proportion. From his statements on this head and a comparison of the present relative situation of the two countries, Mr. Q. drew the inference that this supposed means of coercing the European Powers, did not exist. He deemed it peculiarly unfortunate that a confidence in this power of coercion had so long existed, as it had prevented the United States from making preparations which they otherwise might have made. He hoped the idea would now cease. In relation to our present situation, he recommended a plain remedy, comprised in two words: "Follow nature." What did she first dictate for remedying any complaint? The removal of all obstructions on her operations. Mr. Q., therefore, recommended the removal of the embargo, the repeal of the non-importation act, and the abandonment of the non-intercourse system. He wished "peace, if possible; if war, union in that war;" for this reason, he wished a negotiation to be opened unshackled with those impediments to it which now existed. As long as they remained, the people in the portion of country whence he came, would not deem an unsuccessful attempt at negotiation to be cause for war; if they were moved, and an earnest attempt at negotiation was made, unimpeded with these restrictions, and should not meet with success, they would join heartily in a war. They would not, however, go to war to contest the rights of Great Britain to search American vessels for British seamen; for it was a general opinion with them that if American seamen were encouraged, there would be no occasion for the employment of foreign seamen. A removal of the embargo, without adopting any other measure, until the event of negotiation had been tried, Mr. Q. said, would, first, prevent any collision with the belligerents which might tend to embarrass negotiation; and, secondly, would give an opportunity to the country to ascertain what would be the practical operation of these orders and decrees, on our commerce; and give an opportunity to the next Congress to shape its measures according to their actual effect. If commerce did not suffer, the knowledge of this fact would supersede the necessity of any other measure, and peace would follow of course; if, on the contrary, a general sweep was made of all the property afloat, it would unite all parties in a war. Mr. Q. concluded a speech of two hours in length, by lamenting the state of the country, and invoking the spirit which "rides the whirlwind and directs the storm," to guide the nation to a happy result.

Mr. NICHOLAS replied to the observations of Mr. QUINCY on the subject of the legal opposition to the embargo laws in Massachusetts. He said, if the laws of the nation were to be resisted in the manner in which he lamented to say that he saw it contemplated in one part of the community, it became the duty of this Legislature to meet it; it was not compatible with their duty to shrink from it. He could not consent that thirteen or fourteen States should submit to one. As men vested with certain powers by the Constitution, Congress could not transfer the powers to any State Legislature, or to any town. In relation to negotiating with measures of coercion in existence, Mr. N. asked, when did the violations of our rights commence? So long ago that the precise time could not be fixed. When did our coercive measures commence? In 1806. Mr. N. noticed the negotiators during whose Ministry abroad these injuries had commenced, and continued. Mr. King, Mr. Monroe, and Mr. Pinkney, all honorable men, had successively represented the United States in Great Britain. And could anything be gathered from anything they had ever written or said, to induce a belief that this Government had not acted with sincerity? There was the most conclusive evidence to the contrary. Mr. N. said, he would ask nothing of Great Britain or France that would tend to sacrifice their honor; and he wished, when gentlemen dwelt so much on the regard of foreign nations for their national character, that they would respect a little the character of our own country.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said, he had been decidedly in favor of issuing letters of marque and reprisal at once; he believed it would have cut off all that fungus matter now deteriorating the body politic—for the people of New England were as patriotic as any, and when the choice was between their own and a foreign country, they would cling to their own. It was the hot-bed politicians who stirred them up; and it was necessary to do something promptly to put an end to their intrigues. Mr. W. disliked the non-intercourse system throughout. If he could not get war, or a continuance of the embargo, he wished, inasmuch as Great Britain and France had each interdicted us from going to the other, to declare that neither their armed nor unarmed ships should contaminate our waters. This was a system which required no exertion of patriotism to carry into effect, which could excite no animosities between the North and South. In relation to the non-intercourse, he believed that it could not be enforced, and used a variety of arguments to show that it could not. If it could be enforced, he believed it would be prodigiously partial. If the embargo was to be taken off, and war not to be substituted; if the nation was to submit, he wished to do it profitably. If the embargo were raised as to a single spot, it was raised entirely to all effectual purposes. Then, let your vessels go, said he, without let or hindrance; let them go and be burnt; your merchants will then feel that the embargo was a shield spread over them, and will come back to your protection, like the prodigal son, and unite like brethren in the common cause. Mr. W. said, his plan was to interdict the entrance of our ports to belligerent vessels, armed or unarmed, and lay a tax of fifty per centum on their manufactures. Great Britain must, then, either go to war or treat with us. If she was inclined to go to war in preference to revoking her Orders in Council, let her do so. But he was inclined to believe that she would treat. If she seized our vessels, however, the effect would be inevitable. Division amongst us would be done away, all would unite heart and hand in war. Mr. W. replied to a number of the observations of Mr. QUINCY, particularly in relation to his position that all obstructions ought to be removed with a view to negotiation. He asked, what security had the United States, if they did all this, if they submitted to such abject humiliation, that Great Britain would treat? Was it to be expected that she would treat more liberally with us, when we solicited as slaves, than she would while we magnanimously contended for our rights? The gentleman from Massachusetts, when repeating his creed, had forgotten a part, viz: "Unfurl the banners of the Republic against the imperial standard!" This would complete a project he had lately seen proposed from the East; and, as to its application, coinciding with the wishes over the water, would be just such a project as Mr. Canning might dictate. "Revoke your proclamation, remove the embargo," and "unfurl the republican banners against the imperial standard." Mr. W. concluded a speech of an hour and a half in length, with giving notice that he should move to amend the bill, when the present motion was decided, by striking out all that part of it relating to non-intercourse, and inserting a provision interdicting the entrance of our harbors to any vessel of Great Britain and France, and imposing an additional duty on all goods imported from those countries.

When Mr. W. concluded, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

The Senate's amendment to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1809, was committed to a Committee of the Whole, who reported their agreement to the same, and it was concurred in by the House.

THURSDAY, February 16.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate, of the fifteenth instant, for the appointment of a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, "to consider whether any, and, if any, what, measures ought to be adopted for the further accommodation of the President of the United States, for the term commencing the fourth day of March next, to report by bill, or otherwise." Whereupon

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said resolution; and that Mr. BASSETT, Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS, Mr. DANIEL MONTGOMERY, jun., Mr. STURGES, and Mr. VAN ALAN, be appointed a committee on the part of this House, pursuant thereto.

Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth of December last, presented a bill in addition to the "Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland in the State of Maryland to the State of Ohio;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for imposing additional duties on all the goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States.

The bill was amended so as to take effect "from and after the passage thereof."

The proposition offered by Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS when the bill was before under consideration was withdrawn.

Mr. COOK renewed the proposition, viz: to confine the duties to be increased, to goods imported from Great Britain and France, and the colonies of either; and spoke an hour and a half in support of his motion, and in opposition to the non-intercourse system. He was in favor of discriminating duties, because he was opposed to the non-intercourse, which he considered the best means of depressing our navigating interest and advancing that of Britain; because the produce of the United States would be carried to some place of depôt in the vicinity, and thence be carried to Europe in British bottoms, while a large proportion of American shipping would be inactive. He thought that, under the arming system, we could trade with at least as much honor and with much more profit than under the non-intercourse system. He contended that the non-intercourse system was precisely calculated to destroy that moral principle which had heretofore so strictly enforced our revenue laws; that the system of restriction was partial, operating so equally on the people of the South, that no individuals particularly suffered from it, while in the North and East individuals were ruined by it, and thus a general distress produced; that it would be the most discouraging act to the mercantile interest, ever passed by the Government, for it would throw the trade in all the produce kept in the country by the embargo into foreign hands at the expense of the American merchant; that the system could not be enforced with so extensive a frontier and seacoast as we possess; that it was a measure calculated to produce irritation on foreign nations, without having the least coercive effect; that it was a political suicide, without the consolation of company in it. Mr. C. was, with his constituents, in favor of further negotiation, and a firm assertion of our rights, which, if refused to be acknowledged, he would maintain. It was high time to abandon visionary schemes and impracticable projects, and to pass good, plain, common sense laws. He believed that this discrimination of duties and arming our merchant vessels would be such a law. He spoke more than an hour and a half.

Mr. C.'s motion was negatived by a very large majority. The Committee then rose, and reported the bill.

The amendments made in Committee of the Whole were severally agreed to by the House; and, on the question that the bill be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. LIVERMORE called for the yeas and nays. There were for it 85, against it 27, as follows:

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for interdicting commercial intercourse.

Mr. MILNOR's motion for striking out the first section being under consideration—

Mr. NICHOLAS rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I shall not conceal or disguise my opinion; it has been and continues to be, that when the embargo shall cease, war will be the only proper and honorable course for this country to pursue, if reparation shall not have been made for the injuries we have received. Under this conviction, I proposed a resolution limiting the duration of the embargo, and authorizing, at the same time, the issuing of letters of marque and reprisal. I trust, sir, I shall be pardoned for expressing the deep regret and affliction I feel for the failure of a measure so important in my judgment, to the best interests of my country. I voted for the embargo as a precautionary and as a coercive measure. In its first character, its wisdom must be admitted by all. Its effects as a coercive measure would, I believe, have been equally certain, if the misconduct of some of our own people, and the revolution in Spain, had not impeded its action. Unless we were determined to persevere in our claims for redress, and to assert our rights, the embargo, even as a measure of precaution, was unnecessary. It gave no protection to our property abroad, it gave it no security on its way home, it only preserved it after its return. When the injuries of which we complain were inflicted, our choice was between submission and resistance. We determined to resist, and commenced our resistance by laying an embargo, with the hope that it might of itself induce the belligerents to do us justice; and if this expectation were disappointed, that we might prepare for war, by preserving in our own possession our essential resources—men and money. If resistance was not our determination, I do not hesitate to say, that the embargo was unwise and unnecessary. If we intended ultimately to abandon our rights without another effort, we should have suffered less both in reputation and in property, by immediate submission, than by now receding from the ground we have taken. I do not believe that a single supporter of the embargo looked to it as the last resort of this country. For myself, I disclaim the impression, and declare that I was ready to abandon it for war, when its primary objects should be attained, and its coercive power fairly tested. I have stated that I considered the return of our citizens, the security of our property, and the employment of time in preparation for war, as the great and more certain effects of the embargo. All these advantages we have derived from it. I believe it is time to change our measures, and to place our future reliance upon Providence, and upon the energies and valor of our citizens. Upon this point, however, I think with a minority. There has been a vote of this House against immediate war. Under these circumstances what ought I to do? I must either vote against every expedient which falls short of what I deem the most proper course, or assent to that which accords most with what I think right. If it were my individual concern, I should certainly rely upon my own judgment: but when everything dear to my country is at stake, I cannot justify to myself a pertinacious adherence to a proposition already rejected by a great majority, which would hazard the loss of a measure, the best, in my opinion, that can be obtained. After having offered what I thought the best, and seen it rejected, I think with the gentleman from South Carolina, that I am at liberty, and that it is my duty, to unite with others in support of attainable measures which appear to me to be conducive to the interest of the country. The bill upon your table appears to me to be such a measure. It maintains our attitude towards the belligerents better than any measure which I have heard proposed, and if it be not the most effectual resistance, at least, it is not submission. It continues our solemn protest against their violations of our rights; it takes new, and in some respects, stronger grounds against them. It excludes from our waters, ports, and harbors, all their vessels, public and private; it excludes from our country all their products and manufactures; and forbids our citizens to debase and degrade their country by a commercial intercourse which would stain and pollute them with the payment of an ignominious tribute to a foreign nation. It reserves the great question to be decided by the next Congress, which will be informed of the wishes of the American people; who can best determine how far they will submit to have their rights trampled on, at the will and pleasure of foreign nations. By keeping the question open for their discussion, I have the utmost confidence that our rights, honor, and independence, will be maintained. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked yesterday, why not repeal the embargo laws, and provide for the enforcement of this system by a new law? In addition to the reasons I have stated, I will mention another, which has great weight. We are told that one of the States of this Union is about to pass a law, imposing penalties on persons employed in the execution of those laws, within that State. I will never consent, under these circumstances, to adopt any measure which might wear the aspect of yielding to a threat like this. No man laments more sincerely than I do, that the Legislature of any State should take such a step, but I think it of the utmost importance that the Government of the United States should maintain its authority, and that it should be ascertained whether its measures may at any time be embarrassed by the Legislatures of one or more States, or its laws annulled by their authority. Such could not, I believe, have been the impression either of the people or of the States when the General Government was formed; and if this conduct be persevered in or submitted to, it will, in effect, supersede the Government, and must speedily terminate in its dissolution. I hope and trust that the wisdom and patriotism of the Legislature of Massachusetts will not permit such a law to be enacted. Otherwise, I do not doubt that the people at the Spring elections, will choose men solicitous to heal, by every means within their power, the wounds inflicted on the Constitution. It is a painful duty to notice this subject. I have ever been devoted to the Union of the States. I would cherish and support it at every hazard, and would sacrifice to its preservation everything but the rights and liberties of one section, in compliance to the wishes of another. On such conditions it would be vassalage, not union. To yield in the present instance, would be yielding the Government to a minority. It is not practicable, however, to act upon the subject during the present session, nor do I wish it. I have the utmost confidence in the people of Massachusetts, and have no doubt but that their good sense will apply the proper corrective. If they do not, it will then remain for the other States, after giving to the subject the solemn and deliberate consideration which it merits, to decide whether they have a Government or not, whether it is compatible with their happiness and interests to preserve a Government whose acts are binding on them only who are willing to obey them; whether they will submit that the public officers of the United States shall be punished for the faithful performances of their duty.

I have confined my observations within as narrow limits as possible. It is not now necessary to speak of our injuries, of the necessity of resistance, nor even of the superior advantages of any particular mode of resistance; for it is, I believe, a very prevalent opinion in this House, as well as with the nation, that we have already deliberated enough, and that it is incumbent on us to act. I will, therefore, very briefly notice some objections I have heard to the bill. It is urged that our products will find their way to Great Britain and France, but certainly to Great Britain, by circuitous routes, and that we shall derive less profit from them on that account, than if a direct intercourse were permitted. This cannot be denied, nor is there a man who would not prefer a free trade with the whole world, if it could be enjoyed upon equal and honorable terms, to a commerce so limited and shackled as ours is at this time by the bell gerent edicts. The question is not how we can most advantageously avail ourselves of a momentary commerce, but how we can assert the national sovereignty, and best secure the permanent interests of the United States. No gentleman, I presume, will contend that it is better for us to permit a disgraceful intercourse with any nation, than to endure a temporary privation, until we can trade on fair and honorable terms. Gentlemen cannot delude themselves with any expectation of advantage from the commerce now allowed to us. The two most valuable products of this country must ruin and beggar those interested in their culture—I mean cotton and tobacco. It is well known that the quantity of tobacco annually produced, is fully equal to the annual consumption, and that we have now two crops on hand; while the edicts of Great Britain and France are continued, it would be folly to cultivate this plant, and it is more or less true of every other product of our soil. If we were at war with these nations, our products would reach them through the same circuitous channels into which they will be forced by this law, but certainly that consideration would not be deemed a good argument for permitting direct intercourse with our enemies. As to the difficulty of excluding their products and manufactures, it is very possible that we may not be able to do it entirely, but I am satisfied that we shall do it essentially. The great avenue through which British goods can be most easily smuggled into this country is Canada, and that, I doubt not, will soon be closed if the edicts be not rescinded. The present state of things cannot long continue; I have no hesitation in saying that it ought not, and that the next Congress must either abandon the contest, or resort to more effectual means for the maintenance of our rights than commercial restrictions and prohibitions. The gentleman from South Carolina, whose eloquence I admire, and whose patriotism I honor, speaks of this measure as submission, and considers that which he proposed as resistance—not indeed as the measure of his choice, but as the one which is the next to it in his estimation. It must be obvious to the House, and I am sure it will be equally so to the gentleman himself, that if his system would be resistance, the course indicated by the bill has in that view superior merit. The gentleman acknowledges the principal advantage of his plan to consist in this, that it would deprive British vessels of the transport of our produce; if it can be shown that this object will be accomplished more effectually by the bill in its present form than by the proposed alteration, it is fair to expect for it his support. If his plan were adopted, Great Britain would regain her full share of the transport of our produce by augmenting the duties in favor of her own bottoms to an amount that would be an indemnity for a short voyage, by opening the port of Halifax, and another port at St. Mary's, to our vessels, and all that would then remain to our own vessels would be the profits of the coasting trade from our harbors to those ports of deposit. If I believed this course the most honorable and effectual mode of resisting, I would willingly embrace it; but, sir, I can never consent to any plan by which a direct commercial intercourse is to be produced between this country and Great Britain and France, while their edicts continue in force. Nor will I ever abandon the hope and belief that my countrymen possess the manly spirit of independence, the honorable pride and character which will disdain to barter for gold, or for a miserable fragment of commerce, those rights which were purchased by the valor and the blood of their fathers.

The question was taken on striking out the first section of the bill and negatived—yeas 24.

The House proceeded in the consideration of the bill. The period after which the entrance of vessels should be prohibited into our waters being under consideration—

Mr. NICHOLAS named the 20th of May. As the vessels coming in after the time fixed on were to be subject to condemnation, he thought it would be to the honor of the nation to give reasonable notice of the regulation.

Mr. LYON named the first of June, as being after the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. FISK hoped neither day would be agreed to. He was not for giving to England any longer notice of our regulations than she gave of the Orders in Council, viz: from the 11th of November to the 12th of January. He therefore named the 20th day of April.

The question on the first day of June was negatived—59 to 41.

The 20th of May was agreed to—80 to 24.

The fourth section having been read (prohibiting the importation of French or British goods,)

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS moved to strike it out, and insert in lieu of it a provision for imposing a discriminating duty of 50 per cent. on all former duties, on goods, &c., imported from Great Britain or France or the colonies of either. Mr. W. made a number of remarks in support of his motion. His motion was predicated on a total repeal of the embargo. He said, to his extreme mortification (for he had not expected it) he had just learned that the Governor of the State of Connecticut had refused to execute the injunctions of the President made in pursuance of a law of the United States. If the embargo could not be executed, he contended that certainly a non-intercourse could not.

Mr. DANA inquired of the gentleman from South Carolina in what particular instance the Governor of Connecticut had refused to execute the directions of the President?

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS replied that he had heard that he had refused to comply with the letter from the Secretary at War, written in conformity with the order of the President of the United States, requesting the Governors of the States to appoint an officer to superintend the militia, who was to be called upon to assist in the execution of the embargo laws. The Governor, he understood, had refused to execute it.

Mr. DANA said he had inquired; because he wished to know, whether the Governor had refused to do any act which the laws or Constitution of the United States gave the President power to require of him. If in a case where neither the law or Constitution authorized it, the President of the United States had applied to the Governor as a gentleman of rank or authority in the country, requesting him to do any act, it was certainly at his option to do it or not, as he chose.

The Committee rose, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, and obtained leave to sit again.

ADDITIONAL DUTIES.

An engrossed bill for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place, was read the third time: Whereupon, the question was stated from the Chair, that the same do pass?

It was opposed by Messrs. DANA, MACON, VAN HORN, LYON, COOK, MILNOR, and SLOAN, and supported by Messrs. W. ALSTON and J. G. JACKSON. It was passed by yeas and nays—67 to 26, as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jr., David Bard, Burwell Bassett, William Blackledge, John Blake, jr., Thomas Blount, Adam Boyd, John Boyle, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, Josiah Deane, Joseph Desha, Daniel M. Durell, John W. Eppes, William Findley, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Thomas Gholson, jr., Peterson Goodwyn, Isaiah L. Green, John Heister, William Helms, James Holland, David Holmes, Benjamin Howard, John G. Jackson, Richard M. Johnson, Walter Jones, William Kirkpatrick, John Lambert, Robert Marion, Daniel Montgomery, jr., John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, John Morrow, Gurdon S. Mumford, Thomas Newton, Wilson C. Nicholas, John Porter, John Pugh, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Jacob Richards, Matthias Richards, Samuel Riker, Benjamin Say, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, John Smilie, Jedediah K. Smith, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, John Taylor, John Thompson, James I. Van Alen, Daniel C. Verplanck, Jesse Wharton, Robert Whitehill, Isaac Wilbour, Alexander Wilson, Nathan Wilson, and Richard Winn.

NAYS—Ezekiel Bacon, Martin Chittenden, Orchard Cook, John Culpeper, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, jr., James Elliot, William Ely, Barent Gardener, Francis Gardner, James M. Garnett, John Harris, William Hoge, Richard Jackson, Robert Jenkins, Edward St. Loe Livermore, Matthew Lyon, Nathaniel Macon, William Milner, Josiah Quincy, John Russell, James Sloan, Richard Stanford, Philip Van Cortlandt, Archibald Van Horn, and Killian K. Van Rensselaer.

Resolved, That the title be, "An act for imposing additional duties upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported from any foreign port or place."

FRIDAY, February 17.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act authorizing an augmentation of the marine corps;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill interdicting commercial intercourse.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS's motion of yesterday being yet under consideration, viz: to strike out the fourth section of the bill and insert in lieu of it a provision for laying a discriminating duty of 50 per cent. on all former duties on goods imported from Great Britain and France—

Mr. LOVE called for a division of the question, so as to take it first on striking out the section.

Mr. LOVE offered a number of arguments in opposition to the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS. He wished to retaliate the belligerent systems as much as possible, by repealing drawbacks on goods imported from those countries; for although we cannot lay export duties, the repeal of drawbacks would have the same operation. As a permanent peace system he had no objection to adopt some such provision as that proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS, but as a substitute for non-intercourse he could not accept it.

Mr. TAYLOR next spoke for near an hour in support of Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment. He had been decisively in favor of issuing letters of marque and reprisal immediately on a removal of the embargo. He was totally opposed to the present bill. The House had been charged with passing too many supplementary (embargo) laws for the purpose of resisting foreign aggression; this bill, Mr. T. said, might be considered "a supplementary bill for carrying into effect the British Orders in Council"—for it gave the monopoly of our commerce to the British nation, under the name of an interdiction of all commerce with her. This however could not be the object of the amendment under consideration, which he liked better than the bill, though he did not pledge himself to vote for either. Mr. T. gave notice, in the course of his speech, that when this bill came into the House (now in Committee) he should move a proposition for immediately issuing letters of marque and reprisal against Great Britain, in order to enter his vote at least in favor of it.

Mr. BIBB next took the floor. He accorded perfectly with the sentiments expressed by Mr. TAYLOR. He looked at the bill on the table with humiliation and astonishment; for he considered it as involving a submission to the belligerent edicts. He was in favor of a further continuance of the embargo, at least until June. If the embargo was repealed he was for war; and in that war he had no idea of entering into a triple contest—an idea which he treated as absurd. He was for choosing his enemy, and felt no hesitation in saying, that he should be for declaring war against that enemy whom we could reach, and who had injured us most. He thought that the people of the United States ought to hurl from their seats in this House, every man who had originally voted for the embargo, and should now vote for a removal of it without any efficient substitute—and he believed they would do it. Although opposed to any half-way measure, he preferred the amendment under consideration to the original bill, and should therefore vote for it.

Mr. TROUP said, that the sentiments which had fallen from the two gentlemen last up were in perfect coincidence with his own. He was wholly opposed to the bill, and gave reasons for that opposition. He commented upon Mr. QUINCY's projet of yesterday. The gentleman really appears to be gifted with the spirit of prophecy, said Mr. T.—an excellent modern prophet. Modern prophets are distinguished from the ancients, sir, only as being instrumental in verifying their own predictions. The gentleman told you some time ago that you could not stand to your embargo—I believe he went so far as to say that you dare not; he threatened you with rebellion if you did. Well, sir, it seems you cannot stand to it. When he was last up (yesterday,) he gave you a projet; his style to be sure was not so imperious as it usually is; but recollect the embellishment of the "black cloud" and the "tempest" which accompanied it, and it will become imperative. If he talks much more about his "black cloud," sir, I am afraid you will come into all his measures, repeal all you have done, and make humble supplication at the footstool of His Britannic Majesty for peace. In another part of his observations, Mr. T. said, What is your situation now, sir? No man could say it with more regret or more pain than myself, but I do it from a sense of high and indispensable duty—pressed without by a foreign enemy, and with boldness by a domestic faction within, perhaps stimulated by the gold of that enemy, the great Legislature of the Union is yielding to the pressure of a faction and counteracting everything, even the interest and certainly the wishes of a great majority of the American people—distracting the public mind with a variety of propositions undigested and almost without object. Mr. T. condemned the proposed non-intercourse system as submission, without even money in return for it.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS expressed his surprise that no gentleman attempted to defend the bill or oppose his amendment, which he supported. In point of revenue his amendment would secure some, whilst the bill as it stood would destroy three-fourths of the revenue of the United States, and raise the price of foreign articles to the consumer, without a possibility of carrying it into effect, so as to exclude foreign goods. Although wholly opposed to anything else than war or embargo, believing anything else to be submission, he had offered his amendment as the least of the two evils; for he believed that it would embrace at least profitable submission. I am for war, said he, the people south of the Delaware are for war; but you have been humbled into an acknowledgment of the truth of the declaration; that you cannot be kicked into a war, because the Eastern people will not follow you.

Mr. W. ALSTON observed, that he thought that the amendment under consideration proposed a system which would be at least as difficult to execute as a non-intercourse. He was himself in favor of a continuation of the embargo; but as a majority seemed to be disposed partially to repeal it, he was willing to take the non-intercourse system till the next meeting of Congress. He thought it probable that Great Britain might retaliate the system of increasing the duties; and that it would be better at once to interdict inter-

Non-Intercourse.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Mr. LOVE replied, to Mr. WILLIAMS.—He considered the non-intercourse as having more of resistance in it, by avoiding any connexion with those nations which had injured us, than the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. It had been objected to the bill that it was a threat. Mr. L. thought no language or measure could be too strong; and he had no objection to the measure being considered in that light. He had been in favor of war whenever the embargo should be removed, unless our injuries were redressed; but as a majority was not in favor of that, he would take the next strongest measure he could get.

Messrs. MILNOR, LYON, and COOK, also spoke in favor of the amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. MILNOR suggested the repeal of the non-intercourse act also, as a measure inefficient in itself, being daily evaded.

The question was then taken on striking out the fourth section in order to insert Mr. DAVID R. WILLIAMS's amendment; which was negatived, 53 to 47.

Some further progress was made in the bill; when the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 18.

Another member, to wit: MARMADUKE WILLIAMS, from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. SMILIE,

Ordered, That until the end of the present session, the daily hour of meeting shall be ten o'clock; and should a quorum not appear, the names of the members shall be called, and those present noted in the journal of each day.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. DANA, from the committee appointed on the twentieth of December last, presented a bill for the benefit of seamen of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Thomas P. Cope, offering to the acceptance of Congress, in behalf of the American Convention for promoting the abolition of slavery and improving the condition of the Africans, lately assembled in the city of Philadelphia, a book, entitled "Clarkson's History of Slavery," which is requested to be deposited in the Library of Congress. The said letter was read; whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. MILNOR, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to acknowledge the receipt and acceptance of "Clarkson's History of Slavery," presented by the American Convention for promoting the abolition of slavery, and improving the condition of the Africans; and that the said work be deposited in the Library.

And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—64 to 16.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill interdicting commercial intercourse, &c.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded in reading the bill.

The twelfth section having been read, which provides for a repeal of the embargo, excepting as relates to Great Britain and France—

Mr. CLOPTON said: Mr. Chairman, being one of those, who are not willing to exchange the embargo for the system of non-intercourse now proposed, I move you to strike out this section of the bill. In making this motion, sir, I cannot say that I entertain much hope of success, although indeed I do sincerely wish that the motion may prevail. It has been uniformly my opinion, sir, and still is, that the embargo ought to be adhered to until a majority of the great body of the people of the United States should prefer war itself to a longer continuance of it. I cannot perceive any middle course between those two alternatives, which can truly maintain the honor of the nation; and shall this nation descend from that ground to any degree of submission, either openly or covertly, to any nation on earth? God forbid, sir. Forbid it everything that is dear and valuable to us as members of a free and independent nation!

It has been frequently suggested that the nation has become restless under the embargo; and some gentlemen have spoken as if they thought that the people were generally anxious for a removal of it at any rate. Sir, that is by no means my opinion. I have no reason to believe that the people of this country in general would prefer a removal of it without some efficient substitute—that they would prefer a removal of it with such a substitute as the one now proposed. On the contrary, is there not more reason to believe that a large majority would prefer a longer continuance of the embargo, rather than such a substitute? that they would prefer this measure to be superadded to the embargo? I think it is much more probable: and I acknowledge for one, sir, that I should rejoice to see such a course taken at this time—a course, which in the early part of the session I fondly expected would be taken.

The same argument, Mr. Chairman, which has been principally urged against a continuance of the embargo system, entire, may be urged more forcibly against the proposed non-intercourse system. I mean the abuses or evasions of it. If evasions of the embargo laws cannot be prevented, much less can evasions of the non-intercourse be prevented. They cannot, sir, and I apprehend a great many may ensue immediately after much of our property has been taken. Sir, if we go to war—if we are to bring on a war, let us not do it by first throwing such advantages into the enemy's hands. Let it commence with activity, and as much advantage as possible on our own side, whenever it shall commence. Let us keep our property within our own ports until we are ready to go to war.

In considering this subject, Mr. Chairman, I am naturally led to reflect on the most prominent feature of the Administration of our own Government respecting the belligerent nations, as being connected with the embargo in its origin, and as showing the policy of its continuance heretofore.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Non-Intercourse.

H. OF R.

Long indeed has our country sought the establishment of neutrality, but sought it honorably. The great and prominent object with the United States, as to their exterior relations, always has been to maintain peace—but to maintain it honorably and consistently with the rights of the nation. In pursuit of this object Great Britain will receive the principal benefit of the trade, notwithstanding the prohibitions of this bill. If American vessels are permitted to go out at all, most of them will go, if not to British ports, to some particular ports, as has been observed, from whence Great Britain will finally receive their cargoes; and in a short time, perhaps, upon cheaper terms than they could be obtained for in our own ports; and I do not know what is to secure them from capture when bound to other ports, if they fall in with British cruisers, unless indeed they should go into British ports, pay the detestable tribute and accept licenses; and the law will be abundantly evaded by smuggling into the country articles of British manufacture—and no doubt, many of French manufacture too. Besides, sir, the consequence of this measure very probably will be war at last, and at no distant period; a war, too, which will commence under great disadvantages to our own country.

In this situation of things, Mr. Chairman, under this accumulation of injuries, the measure of embargo was resorted to—a measure having in view a counteraction to the whole system of aggression carried on against the United States—a measure which has been pursued as a means of bringing about a relinquishment of that atrocious system on the part of the belligerents, and a redress of injuries inflicted on us, together with the preservation of peace. This measure has been thus far pursued for these great purposes; and it has been patiently borne with to this day, by the nation at large, the partial discontents which have appeared in some particular parts of the country only excepted. The nation at large has cheerfully acquiesced in the privations, the inconveniences, and the difficulties incident to such a state of things. It has exhibited a memorable example of self-denial in sustaining this situation, with a view to obtain redress of wrongs and recognition of its maritime rights, without a sacrifice of peace. With this object, fair and honorable negotiation has been resorted to from time to time for a series of years. By this means redress of wrongs has been repeatedly sought, and sought in vain. By this means the Government of the United States has exercised itself to procure relinquishment of outrages and violation of our neutral rights; but as often have all its efforts proved unavailing. No wrong redressed—no cessation of outrage yet appeared; on the contrary more numerous and more aggravated ones followed in quick succession. A long series of injurious acts, the offspring of new and (if possible) more atrocious principles than what constituted the pretended ground of former outrages, were pressed with accumulating weight into the train of former outrages, inasmuch that those which followed after, taken along with those which had preceded, made up a combined system which threatened to sweep from the ocean almost every particle of canvass, and all the floating property of this great Republic.

These, sir, are the objects for which this measure has been thus far and so patiently pursued. Great and momentous objects, and worthy of a great and magnanimous nation! Why, then, should it be now determined at all events to abandon this measure? Why should it be so determined, at a period of all others most propitious to the embargo, if continued and executed—a period, of all others, I think, best calculated to give it effect by this House manifesting a firm disposition to adhere to it? For, sir, I consider this as the most critical period, which could possibly arrive, as to the real effect of the embargo. I consider it as the most important period, at which the conduct of this House might render that measure effectually coercive, if it ever can be made so at all—and why, sir, do I think so? Because, in the first place, I conceive it cannot even be a question whether the British Government has not calculated on the discontents, which appeared in some particular parts of the Union, so as to derive at least some expectation therefrom that those discontents might make such impression on Congress as to induce them to raise the embargo in the course of this session. Those discontents, no doubt, excited grateful expectations of its removal. It is perfectly natural to suppose that such events taking place in any part of this country must have produced calculations of that sort. I cannot but believe, sir, that they have looked forward to the period of this session, with anxious solicitude, to mark the temper of Congress in relation to this very interesting subject; and, as they must have presumed that Congress could not view such serious events with indifference, some expectation that the effect might be so strong as to induce a repeal of the system could scarcely fail to be the conclusion. Such conclusion was to be expected, even if the extent of dissatisfaction had been fairly reported to them—even had it been in no degree misrepresented. But, sir, there are a thousand chances to one that the reports, which conveyed the information to that country, greatly exaggerated the facts—that the picture was drawn in much stronger colors than were consistent with the real truth—that the instances of discontent were stated not only to have been deeper in their nature than they really were, but that a much larger number of persons had partaken of it than really did—that a spirit of disaffection had spread itself far and wide. Not a shadow of doubt rests on my mind, sir, that, in all respects whatever, the unpleasant occurrences to which I have alluded, were greatly magnified. With these circumstances others have combined to render the embargo inefficacious as yet, or at least to prevent it from having its full effect. It is to be recollected, sir, that very soon after the law laying an embargo was passed efforts were made to render it unpopular and to excite dissatisfaction. Dissatisfactions were not only excited; but many unprincipled persons found means to evade the law and make exportations contrary to its provisions. Under a combination of circumstances, then, so encouraging to the hopes of the British Government as those must have appeared to them, the continuance of their Orders in Council until the temper of Congress, during this session, could be known to them, is not much to be wondered at. The hope of ultimate success in rendering our commerce tributary to them, which those circumstances, no doubt, contributed not a little to inspire, with such a Government, was of itself sufficient ground to induce a continuance of those orders. Long experience of British policy, which the United States have had, justifies this opinion. Long experience of a systematic design in that Government to shackle our commerce and subject it to their arbitrary restrictions, leaves no room to doubt of their disposition to pursue that design until the conduct of this Government should convince them of its total inefficiency to produce the object sought for. The slightest prospect of succeeding in their design, however delusive that prospect might be, keeps up their hopes until the delusion vanishes. It remains, then, for the Congress of the United States, at this very interesting crisis, to dispel that delusion by a firm adherence to this measure, and thus to disperse every gleam of hope which may have resulted from the circumstances of discontent which had appeared, and the evasions of the law which took place in the country. At this truly critical period, to which their anxious attention has been directed, let this body manifest an inflexible perseverance, and demonstraie to them that all their hopes, founded on those or any other circumstances, are vain indeed. Let it be demonstrated to them that this Government cannot only resolve upon, and carry into effect, measures of energy, though attended with inconveniences and difficulties, but that it can pursue such measures so long as they shall be deemed expedient for the object in view. Let every declaration and every conception concerning the American character, as a nation, in respect to its cherishing an overweening attachment to gain, so as to be willing to submit to indignities for the sake of it, be completely falsified. Let it be demonstrated, beyond a possibility of doubt, that there exists not in the great body of the people of this country any love of gain comparable to the love of real national independence and freedom; that this love of national independence and freedom animates the true American soul far beyond any other sentiment, and that, in support of it, the greatest sacrifices of interest are cheerfully acquiesced in. But, sir, what will be the inference drawn from this measure proposing a repeal of the embargo, as it does, after it shall have been adopted. Will it not justify assertions, that this Government has not stability or firmness enough to carry into effect energetic measures, or such as check the current of wealth for any considerable time from flowing into the country? Such assertions, or assertions to that effect, have, I believe, been frequently made; and they have been often repelled by words as slanderous reproaches on the Government. Sir, let us not take from them the demerit of being slanderous, by affording any ground for the justification. But I fear, sir, I greatly fear, that a repeal of the embargo laws, as now proposed, will go far towards justifying such assertions.

This measure, it seems, is contemplated under a belief that the embargo cannot operate as a coercion on the belligerents, because they have not yet rescinded their orders or decrees. Sir, I apprehend the principal reason why such effect has not been yet produced, at least as to one of them, is, that it has not yet had time enough to produce that effect, or, at least, that much of the time which has elapsed since the embargo was laid has been attended with circumstances unfavorable to the production of such effect; so that, although the pressure of the embargo might have been ever so severe, it would nevertheless have been borne with under the expectation that the measure would soon be abandoned—under the expectation that the discounts which have been manifested, and the evasions of the law which have taken place, would induce a repeal of the system. That they have felt, and severely felt, its pressure, I do not know that there is any room to doubt. But it was to be expected that the British Government, particularly, would feel much, and bear much, before they would rescind their orders, while flattered with any prospect of a removal of the pressure. But take away that prospect, which a firm adherence to, and a strict execution of, the measure would do; and then the pressure would not only have its full weight, but would immediately begin to produce the desired effect. The numerous privations produced, and which would be produced, by the embargo, would then be seriously considered. When every ground of expectation that this Government contemplated a repeal of the embargo laws at any definite period should be taken away, they would then reflect on the consequences; they would discover the expediency of making different calculations from those which they had before made. They would not then calculate between the supposition of vast advantages resulting to themselves from a removal of the embargo, together with a subjection of our commerce to their arbitrary restrictions on the one hand, and on the other hand, the mere temporary privations to be sustained by them while it should be continued; because there would then be no ground for such supposition. But their calculations would be founded on a view of what, most likely, would be the losses accruing to them from a continued real non-intercourse with this country, which there would be if this section of the bill should be stricken out, and some other sections of it should be passed, compared with the benefits to be derived from a free and unrestrained commerce with it. The question of interest would be shifted, and placed upon different ground.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Non-Intercourse.

H. OF R.

They would then be brought to decide whether their interest would be promoted in a greater degree by having no trade at all with this country, than it would be promoted by a free and liberal trade without interruption to its commercial rights as a neutral nation. Sir, if the firmness, the decision, and perseverance of this House, were to be such as to convince them that they are to choose between these two alternatives, could they hesitate long after such conviction? Could they hesitate in preferring our trade and relinquishing their impositions on it, when thus convinced that it was by no other means to be obtained? Sir, does not every degree of probability lie on this side of the question? Really I cannot perceive any room to doubt it. What, then, ought we to do, but to persevere in this measure? Sir, I wish it could be continued some time longer. Let us rigidly persevere in it as the best course which the Government can yet pursue; and let us not doubt of its ultimate success.

At any rate, sir, let the embargo continue as it is, until the next meeting of Congress in May; and let that Congress determine as to a repeal of it, according to the then existing state of the public mind, the circumstances of the country, and the then conduct of the belligerents. By that time events may take place in Europe, which may materially influence the conduct of at least one of them. By or before that time, the fate of Spain very probably will be decided; and if Bonaparte should have succeeded in fixing his brother on the throne of that Kingdom, the resources of which Great Britain would be deprived by that event, would certainly affect her in a considerable degree; and such privations would, doubtless, have a correspondent influence on her conduct.

In support of the position which has been advanced, that the embargo cannot coerce Great Britain, it seems to be apprehended that sufficient resources from other quarters would be drawn in to her aid; that the supplies which she had heretofore derived from this country, would be obtained from other countries; and thus the effect of the embargo, as to her, would be defeated.

Sir, if gentlemen will recur to the orders of the British King, to the commanders of his ships of war and privateers, directing them not to "inter-rupt any neutral vessel laden with lumber and provisions, and going to any of his colonies, islands, or settlements, in the West Indies or South America, to whomsoever the property may appear to belong, and notwithstanding such vessel may not have regular clearances and documents on board," I think, sir, they will perceive unquestionable evidence that, so early as April, 1808, when those orders were issued, they must have felt the want of our trade in provisions and lumber to those places; and had it not been for the discontents which, soon after that time, become known to them, and the scandalous evasions of the law which took place, I have no doubt but that, before this time, the Orders in Council would have been revoked; had the law not been so much defeated in its operation by worthless unprincipled men, who, regardless of all the sacred ties of duty to their country, seized the moment of rapid progression to wealth, accepted the infamous royal invitation to violate the solemn laws of their country, and, under the shameful protection thus held out, conveyed to them such supplies as not only enabled them to hold out longer, but encouraged them to hope that the system would soon be abandoned altogether as impracticable, and an export trade allowed from this country, under the restrictions which they had imposed on it.

There is another circumstance of recent date which I would also notice. What, sir, are we to think of the late famous, or rather infamous, letter of Mr. Canning, misrepresenting Mr. Pinkney's communication to him, relative to the proposal of the President, to suspend the operation of the embargo as to British ports, on that Government rescinding its Orders in Council? For what purpose could that letter have been written and published, as it was, unaccompanied with Mr. Pinkney's answer, in the very section of the country where discontent most prevailed? Was it not intended to inflame that discontent, and increase the clamors against the embargo? Indeed, sir, I must believe that such was the design, as well as to foment disaffection to the Government. If so, what could have been the inducement to it, but a strong desire in the British Government that the embargo should be removed? And what could produce such desire but its pressure?

This circumstance, sir, and the orders of the King, encouraging Americans to violate the embargo laws, are both, to my mind, irrefragable evidence of that pressure, which evidence has been frequently corroborated by subsequent information; and, whatever may have been said to the contrary, or whatever may be conceived to the contrary, the embargo, if continued and enforced, must be very distressing to Great Britain. Withhold from her supplies of raw materials for her manufactures, particularly cotton, naval stores, timber, and other materials suitable for naval purposes; and from their West India possessions, withhold supplies of provisions and lumber, and I cannot conceive how she could sustain such privations much longer. The French dependencies in the West Indies would also be greatly distressed for want of supplies of provisions, and, therefore, a continuance and enforcement of the embargo would be severely felt there.

But the greatest objection to a continuance of the embargo, seems to arise from apprehensions that it cannot be enforced. Sir, the evasions which took place previous to the last act passed on the subject, were supposed to have proceeded from defects in the laws passed at the former session of Congress. But, is nothing to be expected from that last act? It has been in existence but little more than a month, and has not had time enough yet to operate in any material degree. It is presumable that, if continued in force, it will be more efficacious than the former one.

But, sir, is there no such thing as patriotism in those parts of the country where evasions of the law have taken place? Has that sacred principle fled away entirely from those places? I cannot believe it, sir; I cannot, indeed. I cannot abandon the idea of patriotism in those parts of the country. I cannot abandon the hope that there is yet patriotism enough to carry the laws into effect. Nor can I, for one, sir, consent to abandon the ground solemnly taken by the Government, merely to appease the clamors, or to gratify the avarice of a set of individuals, whose numbers can bear but a very small proportion to the community at large.

H. OF R.

Non-Intercourse.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

I have made these observations, Mr. Chairman, under an impression, that it was my duty to do so, at this very critical and momentous period, on a subject of such vast magnitude as the one now under consideration. Believing, as I do, most sincerely, that the proper course still to be pursued, is the one I have advocated, I should have been guilty of a dereliction of that duty, had I refrained from expressing to the Committee the sentiments I have expressed. Sir, it is not an opinion of the present moment, or one which has arisen from any late occurrence. It is an opinion which I brought with me when I came to this place, and I have uniformly retained the same opinion to this day.

Much has been said concerning the last act passed for enforcing the embargo. It has been frequently denounced as unconstitutional. Sir, that act was passed by a very large majority; and, for one amongst those who voted for it, I can truly say, that I never should have given my vote for it, if I had not believed it to be within the legitimate powers, the Constitutional authority of Congress to pass it. I am far from believing that it merits the denunciations which have been lavished on it. I consider it as strictly within the limits of the powers vested by the Constitution in this body. If I had, at any period since the passage of the act, been convinced that I had been in error, and that the passage of it was not authorized by the Constitution, I should freely and candidly acknowledge it. It never was my disposition, sir, to resort to rigorous measures in any cases where the objects of them were attainable without such. I truly lamented, and do lament the occasion which produced that act; but I considered it to be of vast importance, as far as possible, to prevent evasions of the embargo system.

This is a period of our political existence, Mr. Chairman, which renders firmness in the Councils of the Nation peculiarly requisite. The crisis is vastly momentous and trying, and attended with circumstances, both from within and from without, which strongly call for decision in the Legislature. The existence of the Government seems almost to depend upon their firmness and decision. Whilst the members of this body respect the rights of individuals, let them consider the consequence of being driven from a measure of great importance by the conduct of a small part of the community. It is the duty of each part equally to respect and obey the laws; and if apprehension of the consequence of a faction, clamoring against the acts of the Government, should deter it from pursuing its course, such would be an alarming manifestation of its weakness. Sir, I fear for the Government, almost to trembling. I feel emotions which I cannot express. It is at a point of awful trial and responsibility. The system, which, it appears, is about to be abandoned, will be exchanged for a miserable one, which, on our return to our homes, will not draw on us many smiles.

The motion of Mr. CLOFTON was negatived, 59 to 35.

Mr. MILNOR moved to amend the same section so as to strike out the exception, and making the repeal of the embargo total.

Mr. VARNUM supported this motion. If the non-intercourse system was to prevail, he thought it made much more intelligible to the revenue officers by repealing the embargo laws, and enacting the non-intercourse as a new system throughout. He spoke in favor of the repeal of the embargo laws, stating the evasions which had taken place, and that these evasions had not been confined to any particular section of the Union. He observed that a partial repeal of the embargo would destroy all the coercive effects of the measure, inasmuch as produce would be let out, and would find its way to every quarter of the world. Mr. V. observed that were the amendment agreed to, he should be ready to go with gentlemen in any other practicable measure which they would select for maintaining our rights.

The motion of Mr. MILNOR was negatived, 57 to 53.

The question having been put that the Committee rise and report the bill—

Mr. GARDENIER rose in opposition to it. He lamented the situation of the country, which he depicted as gloomy in the extreme. If the measures now contemplated, and apparently about to be adopted, were persisted in, the country must be utterly ruined. He conceived that the measures of interdiction could not operate on France, unless to make her rejoice. There is, therefore, said he in the introduction of the words "and France" into our resolutions and statutes, a cruel and solemn mockery; for my abhorrence of which, I can find no expression. Words might disguise the substance, but it was right to rise superior to them when it was ascertained that the effect of the system was to support Bonaparte in that system of commercial warfare by which alone he could ever hope to destroy England, who was, at this moment, the only barrier between him and the dominion of the whole earth. Mr. G. said that the great cause of complaint now against England was the Orders in Council. He thought it unfortunate that such was the irritation in this House on the subject, that they had never received that serious consideration to which they were entitled. He entered into an examination of the Orders in Council, which he believed, and went into an argument to prove, that Great Britain had the right to issue. He contended that, during the existence of the Berlin decree, the United States could not, with honor, have traded to France, and thus, that the Orders in Council only declared that the United States should not do that which they could not do, because they could not honorably do it. He did not say that the orders were lawful, or that they were not infringements of our rights as a neutral nation, as it might offend the prejudices of the House. But I may be permitted to say, observed he, that if they were unlawful, I have proved that they are not hurtful; that the British Orders in Council only supplied to that which our sense of honor would lead us to do, their sanction.

In regard to the subject of tribute, Mr. G. said that previous to the British Orders, we could not trade, honorably, to France; and, therefore, this paying tribute for going to a place where we could not go was merely ideal. If you have got to that pitch, said he, that after such a decree you could trade to France, it would be a disgrace, and you could not be more disgraced by touching at a British port to commence it. I think it perfectly fair in Great Britain that, if you were determined to disgrace yourselves, she should say you should first touch at that island. Mr. G. again dwelt at great length on the power of the Gallic Emperor, and insinuated that this bill would meet his wishes. He wished to know why, in this House, there were no expressions of abhorrence of that Power which had destroyed all the nations of the earth. Although I do not believe in French influence, said he, yet there is, in this House, an animosity to, and hatred of Great Britain, that makes us go into French measures by repulsion as effectually as it could do by attraction. Considering Great Britain as the only barrier between us and universal dominion, he asked gentlemen whether it would not be good policy—considering too, that we had very little, if any, cause of quarrel with Great Britain—to preserve the barrier as it was, instead of attempting to weaken or destroy it, and overwhelm ourselves in its ruin? Mr. G. next turned his attention to the bill before the House, which he conceived to be a weak and imbecile measure. He said that it savored more of an expedient to serve appearances, to keep the public on tip-toe, than to subserve the essential interests of the nation.

Mr. VARNUM replied to some of the observations of Mr. GARDENIER, whose sentiments and premises he believed to be erroneous, and therefore, his conclusions were incorrect. He spoke of the various proclamations of blockade by Great Britain, preceding the Berlin decree, which were at least as good ground for retaliation by France, as the French decree was for retaliation by Great Britain. As to having no cause of quarrel against Great Britain, Mr. V. expressed his astonishment at hearing such sentiments avowed by any gentleman on this floor, and protested against it. He believed it to be the determination of the Governments of Europe to press us, until we should yet be compelled to take the last resort, however desirous we might be to avoid it.

Mr. BURWELL called the attention of Mr. GAR-

DENIER to a speech which he made a few weeks ago, in which he expressly admitted that the Orders in Council were not intended to retaliate on France, but, under cover of such retaliation, to retaliate on the United States for the non-importation law. He suggested to him that there was an evident inconsistency in his remarks at the two different times. Mr. B. entered at some length into a view of the orders and decrees in reply to Mr. GARDENIER. He regretted to hear in the debates of the House so much of foreign countries and so little of our own. If there was anything in the world that could give him sincere pleasure, it would be the union of all parties in the great work of resistance to foreign oppression; that all should be American in language and sentiment as well as in name. Divided as the nation now was, it was as feeble as if there was not a man in the country. As long as they legislated on suspicion of one another it was impossible they should prosper. Mr. B. said, that the bill now under consideration was not palatable to him, though he liked it better than any of the amendments which had been offered.

Mr. MASTERS commented with some severity on the observations of Mr. GARDENIER. He rebuked him for his defence of the British Orders in Council, which he had never expected to have heard attempted to be justified on the floor of Congress. Mr. M. was not partial to the bill.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill; and the House adjourned without considering the report.

MONDAY, February 20.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to remove the office of collector from Tappahannock to Fredericksburg, and to make Tappahannock a port of delivery, and, also, to abolish the offices of surveyor at Fredericksburg, in Virginia, and at St. Mary's, in Maryland; and to establish a light-house at the entrance of Bayou St. John; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported on Saturday last from the Committee of the Whole to the bill to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes; and the same being twice read at the Clerk's table, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning invalid pensioners. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were twice read, and agreed to by the House.

On a motion made by Mr. ELY, the House proceeded to reconsider the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole to the said bill, and the same being amended, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House. The bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the better government of the Navy of the United States,'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill interdicting commercial intercourse, &c.

Mr. MASTERS proposed a new section to the bill, declaring that the bill shall be in force till the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer; and that the embargo shall be repealed at that time.

On the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. M. withdrew his motion for a time; and Mr. R. moved to strike out so much of the 12th section of the bill as makes exceptions to the general removal of the embargo.

Mr. BIBB made a motion which superseded Mr. RANDOLPH's, viz: to strike out the whole section, so as to keep on the embargo in its present situation.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the House would not go directly to this subject by the means proposed by his friend from Georgia; for, if he understood the motion, it went to prevent the repeal of the embargo either in whole or in part. As it was his object not to repeal the embargo partially, but in toto, Mr. R. said he could not vote for the motion of his friend from Georgia, and hoped, therefore, that it would not prevail. At the same time, said Mr. R., it would be no very great stretch of candor to allow that if this House do repeal the embargo in any degree, it would comport more with its dignity and reputation, as well as with the interest of the nation, to repeal it in toto, than in this sort of way. I believe that even what is termed a partial repeal of the embargo, will, to the interest of the nation, be a most important measure, whatsoever bearing it may have on the reputation of the Legislature of the United States; but, if we mean to preserve at once our own credit and to consult the good of the Union, we ought to repeal the embargo in words as well as in fact, totally—and, indeed, let not the words of the wisest man under the sun ever again be quoted to prove that there is nothing new under the sun. Unquestionably a partial repeal of an embargo is a new thing under the sun in legislation. A partial repeal of an embargo! What is an embargo, sir? An inhibition of vessels going from a particular port or from all the ports of a nation. It is limited to a single port, as Bordeaux, or to a whole empire. But a partial embargo is such a thing as verily, I think, never was heard of. An embargo is a prohibition of every vessel from sailing; and here is a permission to any vessel to sail. Look at your embargo laws. Have they any reference to the place of destination of a vessel? No, sir; you might as well undertake partially to pull the House over your heads as partially to repeal an embargo. The embargo, with all its supplements—God knows how many, but this litter of mishapen cubs is sufficient to exhaust their original parent—these laws refer to the act of sailing from the United States to any port of a belligerent or of a neutral, if, indeed, he could find such an animal in political zoology. If we repeal any part of an embargo, we repeal it, in point of fact and practice, altogether. If it were consistent with the gravity of this dignified Assembly, I would say that this bill reminds me of the ingenious project of a citizen of Virginia—a naturalized one—and (strange as it may appear when the story is told) not an Irishman, to let off his gun by degrees—when that scheme was mentioned, it was due to the nation to state that he was not a native—by gently pulling the trigger, he proposed to let off his gun by degrees. This project is precisely such an one—a twin brother. If, sir, you are not able, without any partial repeal of the embargo, with all your penalties and gunboats, to keep the people from going where they will with their cotton, fish, &c., can you expect to prevent them from doing so when you let them go out? Is it in your power to direct their course after they cross the Gulf Stream? Is there any magic in your laws to control them when out of your jurisdiction? If they are not interrupted by the physical force of some belligerent nation, they will, free as the wind that blows, go where they list; and really I consider this as one of the idlest propositions ever submitted to a deliberative Assembly. A partial repeal of the embargo! If it be partially repealed, very well—half a loaf is better than no bread, especially when the grant of half the loaf gives possession of the other half also. If the House choose to proceed in this way, it is not for an anti-embargo man, it may be said, to object anything against it.

In the course of the remarks which I shall offer to your consideration, sir, I shall not think it at all necessary to take notice of the very—I will not give a character to the observations made by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GARDENIER,) on Saturday last. Sir, I was surprised, for one, I confess, that gentlemen who seemed extremely opposed to the sentiments which fell from that gentleman were not willing at the same time to give him an opportunity of continuing them. I cannot conceive anything that could be said by a gentleman in what is called the majority of this House which could have half so strong an effect in favor of their measures as what had fallen from the gentleman from New York against them. I should not—really I should not—think it necessary to notice them in any way were it not that I looked at the gentleman from New York at that moment with the sort of sensation which we feel in beholding a sprightly child meddling with edged tools, every moment expecting (what actually happened) that he will cut his fingers. There are circumstances under which a man would not like to see an adversary placed. The gentleman has powers, and of no ordinary cast; and he has certainly given to the House a strong proof of his candor, whatever it may have been of his discretion. He unburdened himself without reserve; but I do believe—I certainly hope—that there is not another gentleman in the House who takes the same view of the subject which that gentleman has taken. And, sir, the gentleman's friends (if any he have, and I have no right to presume that he has none, but the contrary) will do well to keep such dangerous implements out of his way for the future. At the same time, I am very far from impeaching the correctness of the gentleman's motives. His conduct appeared to me the effect of youthful inexperience; and I have no doubt that when he has attained a greater knowledge of the world, and a greater knowledge (I am sorry to say it) of the rights and interests of his own country, his error will be corrected.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Non-Intercourse.

H. OF R.

But, sir, to come to the point, which is the repeal of the embargo. No question can exist, it would appear to me, in the mind of any practical man, that the embargo must be repealed; and this vote for a partial repeal of the embargo is a proof that there exists a conviction in this House that some way or other the embargo must be gotten rid of. I look upon the embargo as the most fatal measure that ever happened to this country—as the most calamitous event. On account of pecuniary loss? No. Great as that is, I do not view it so on that account. On account of the vexations to which our citizens have been exposed under it, not only from officers of Government, but from their fellow-citizens—from one another—tearing one another to pieces in the courts, where they were open, and unable to satisfy each other's just demands? Not, sir, on that account. Suppose we had answered, in November last, the almost unanimous expectation of America, how different would have been the result! But, by that blind perseverance in this most unfortunate measure, we have lifted the veil which concealed our weakness—we have exposed our imbecility. The veil of the temple of the Constitution is rent in twain; the nakedness of the fathers of the country has been exposed to their unnatural, impious children. That is our situation. You never can redeem it. The Constitution has received a wound that ages cannot heal. But, if we had only come up to the expectation of our suffering people—if we had been content with a twelvemonth's embargo, instead of an embargo ad eternum, the nation would have obeyed, would have been united.

Gentlemen may say what they will; they may declaim as much as they please about the vices of the people; but their virtue has stood a test which that of no other country on earth ever did or ever will stand; but, sir, hope delayed maketh the heart sick; and the heart trifled with under such circumstances has nothing left but desperation. The consequences we all know. We are marked, not merely to Europe, but to ourselves, as a divided people, imbecile, distracted—and why? Were we a divided people eighteen months ago? We were not, sir; we were strong in the sentiment of obedience to the laws; that sentiment which constitutes the vital principle of every Government pretending to be free, was not nearly deficient; it was in its full force; and when you see that sentiment destroyed, you may prate about vice and immorality—its destruction can come from but one source—unwise counsels. Want of wisdom, or virtue, or of both, in the councils of the nation, alone can produce such an effect on a people like ourselves; and, in my opinion, it is something to our honor that it took a longer period of suffering than any man could have anticipated, before that spirit was in the least impaired in any part of the community. But, sir, in our measures throwing away the operation of moral causes and relying wholly on physical force, on main strength, which we had not, we have prostrated the majesty of the laws, and I fear shall hand over to the successor of the present President of the United States a broken sceptre. I believe it is no secret that that gentleman is not among the first of my political favorites—but, do every man justice, sir—in the situation in which we abandon this Government to him, he will deserve immortal honor if he steer the nation through the peril which surrounds it; more especially, if you give it to him clogged with your embargo systems. He will have a task to perform as great as human strength is competent to execute; and if he does it even not very well, he ought to have the credit. The arduous duties of the station—I speak of the officer, not of the man—ought to be weighed.

On the subject of the embargo, sir, I have always understood it, like a vessel for holding liquor, to derive all its value from its tightness; and whenever you begin to drill holes in the bottom, no matter of what diameter, it is good for nothing. We have trusted our most precious interests in this leaky vessel; and now, by way of amendment, we are going to bore additional holes in this machine, which, like a cask, derives all its value, if it have any, from being water-tight. From some notion of honor or dignity, quite incomprehensible to me, we are to stick to this thing; it is to be hung around our necks, or to be trailed after us like a canister tied to the tail of a miserable persecuted dog. This is not all; we are not content to lift the covering which hid, I will not say our nakedness, but we are, I fear, breaking up from the very foundation every principle and maxim of policy which governed the country from the institution of the Federal Constitution to the present moment. I listened the other day with very great pleasure to the remarks of my worthy colleague, (Mr. BURWELL,) made in his usual plain, sensible manner, and to some of them I subscribe; but, in the extent to which they were carried by him, I could by no means agree to them. I understand my colleague to be divided between two opposite and contradictory sentiments, which conflict very much with each other—a desire to protect trade and our maritime rights on the ocean, and a desire to put down trade for the purpose of fostering our manufactures at home; and, until the period when trade shall be so curtailed that we shall be compelled to manufacture for ourselves, he considers that we shall not be independent. If we are to be governed by this policy, there was no occasion for a Constitution or Federal Government; for we might have set up our spinning-wheels and prevented the importation of foreign goods without the Constitution. But the object of the Constitution was to regulate commerce, and to do more, to draw a revenue from trade, which from trade alone could be drawn, for paying the debts and providing for the common defence and general welfare of the Union. But now it seems all this is to be set aside. We are to go upon an opposite policy—to give up the duty on imports and tonnage, and rely altogether on excises and direct taxes. I defy the ingenuity of man to devise any other mode of collecting a revenue than by imposts, excise, or direct tax. If we give up imposts, we have nothing left but internal and direct taxes. Cast back your mind, sir, to the time when the present Administration came into office, and see what was its policy. To rely wholly on impost, to abolish internal taxes, not certainly to burn our fingers with a land tax; though it may not be improper to observe, that a great part of the proceeds of the internal and direct taxes was brought into the Treasury after the 3d of March, 1801—that, however, was not our fault. We set our faces—for, sir, when I speak of the good old times of 1802-'3, &c., I will say we—we set our faces against the internal taxes. Why did we so? From their oppression on the people, and operation on the revenue of the States; from the vast patronage and number of officers which they gave rise to; because the impost was the cheapest tax in collection, least oppressive in its operation, and least injurious to the States. Are we now to turn completely round, to give up imposts, and go back to internal taxes? I am very far from being an enemy to domestic manufactures; but if they do not thrive at present, we cannot make them. There is something ungrateful in the soil, ungenial in the climate—the tree will not grow at all if it does not thrive apace under present circumstances.

One thing, sir, I am very free to allow: that, do what we will, we never can expect (neither do I know that it is desirable) to enjoy as great a degree of foreign trade as we did enjoy at the time we took the humor of quarrelling with our bread and butter, and going into the system which has led to our present condition. As long as we carried her manufactures to France, and the Continent generally, Great Britain connived at our trading there; and why? Because she drew an advantage from it. But the moment that France said that her products should not be imported in your ships, she had no idea of your going on in this way with your one million two hundred thousand tons of shipping, without producing her something, unless she drew a benefit from it. I do not think it necessary to say that she acted wrongfully and hurtfully—the question is, the remedy. If a man knocks you down, you do not require to be told that he has broken the peace. The question is, how will you get reparation?

Whilst noticing the observations of my worthy colleague and friend, permit me to say that I differ from him in two material points. In the first place, the explanation given by the Minister of Marine of the Berlin decree was not a satisfactory one, because the Minister himself declared that he had no authority for giving it. My colleague seems to think that that put off, a mere evasion of the French Government—for it is very easy for a minister of foreign affairs to evade an answer, if you will put up with one from an unauthorized person—was a satisfactory explanation of the Berlin decree. It was not; not only, as it turned out, that the French Government did not so consider it; but that the officer, in giving the explanation, declared that it was no explanation at all, inasmuch as he had no authority to give it. I cannot help thinking that there must have been an application to the officer who had authority to give one; but as I have seen no such correspondence, I cannot determine anything on this point. Whilst on the subject of our foreign correspondence, I think it extremely unfortunate that the motions which I made in the early part of the session for giving publicity to a part of that correspondence did not prevail—not more for the purpose of showing the public what we had, than what we had not. For example, I believe it is generally supposed that the overture made by our Government to the Government of France, on the subject of the decrees, is contained in that correspondence. What does the President say:

“The instructions to our Ministers, with respect to the different belligerents, were necessarily modified with reference to their different circumstances, and to the condition annexed by law to the Executive power of suspension requiring a degree of security to our commerce which would not result from a repeal of the decrees of France. Instead of a pledge, therefore, of a suspension of the embargo as to her in case of such repeal, it was presumed that a sufficient inducement might be found in other considerations, and particularly in the change produced by a compliance with our just demands by one belligerent, and a refusal by the other, in the relations between this other and the United States.”

We are then told that the offer was made to Great Britain to repeal the embargo, in relation to her, in case she revoked her Orders in Council. The reasons are assigned why this offer was not made to France; but what offer was made to France we know not. And I think it proper to state this, because I perceive that there is a general impression abroad that it is contained in the private communications made to us. It is not. As to offering to France to repeal the embargo as to her, if she would revoke her decrees, it would have been a strange proceeding, indeed. France wanted the embargo; and to take from her what she wanted, as an inducement to do what she did not like, would be curious, indeed. If we had have offered to continue the embargo, it might, indeed, have been an inducement to her. I therefore differ from my friend from North Carolina,

H. OF R.

(Mr. MACON.) I think it wise that the offer was not made. At the same time, I should like to know what offer was made.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE said, if the gentleman would turn to pages 20 and 21 of the document he held in his hand, he would find the offer made to France.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I believe I have read the papers, sir. This, by the way—I am extremely obliged to my friend from North Carolina—I remember him at college. He was a very expert mathematician, and doubtless is so still. But, although I am but a poor scholar, I have a small smattering in political algebra, and should have no great difficulty in proceeding from known to unknown things, if I had the necessary data. With the aid of X, Y, or Z, we might perhaps get at it—letters, I believe, which generally designate unknown quantities.

In another instance I differ from my good friend and colleague—in relation to the note accompanying the treaty negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney. That note certainly, sir, made no part of the treaty negotiated by our Ministers with the British Commissioners. If the treaty had been ratified, that note would have made no part of it. But, sir, when we take into view who the persons were with whom that treaty was negotiated—that very (now) minority, in Parliament, who are so often quoted in support of our rights, and who really appear to have acted towards this country in as strong a spirit of conciliation as any Ministry that has ever existed, or probably ever will exist in England—I take this note as a sort of caveat, in a different point of view from my friend from Virginia. I take it rather as a mark of good faith than of the contrary; for, if you make a treaty with your adversary, and he points out (previous to your ratification of it) circumstances under which he must be compelled to violate it, he acts more like a man of honor than if he had waited till the circumstances occurred, and then have broken it, and assigned the very causes for so doing which he had in contemplation when it was agreed upon. Is it not better and fairer to make such a declaration in the first instance, than to keep it back as a mental reservation? Undoubtedly it is. There is another circumstance, applying not to this note, but to that informal understanding respecting impressment, which I wish we had accepted. It is this: that treaties, any more than embargo laws, have no talismanic powers—no magic virtues—which prevent them from being violated. And if we cannot trust to the honor of a party, we cannot trust, with one jot more of wisdom, to their hand and seal. In society, you trust a man of whose honor you are doubtful, under his hand and seal; because, if he depart from his engagements, there is a power to compel his performance. The reason why you take bond of a man in whom you have confidence, is, that he may die; but bodies politic never die. But, if there could be a man who was immortal, and over whom no civil power had control, surely if you could not trust to his honor, you could not to his bond. And there is said to be a species of honor among a class of people (with whom, thank God! I have no acquaintance) more binding on them than even the laws of God or men. I believe we should have an equal chance in trusting to the faith of the British or any other Government in an informal arrangement, as in trusting to any other security whatever. These things being premised, sir, let me say a little on the subject of the offer to repeal the embargo, and other subjects which preceded the proposition. One of the principal objections urged by me on the night when the first embargo bill passed, was, that hitherto the people had been obedient to the laws—not in the sense of not making insurrection against the laws—I mean voluntary obedience, from the heart as well as the hand. The character of a smuggler was disreputable on the exchange and in the coffee-house: this is an honorable trait in the character of our merchants. I anticipated from the embargo that we should put men to a school of smuggling out, and, after the embargo was repealed, they would keep their hand in by smuggling in; more especially, as, after having put them apprentices to the business, we have given them an additional premium of 50 per cent. lest they should not set up for themselves in it. We have given them a stock—lent them a lift. I was going to say that I am surprised, but I am not, cannot, be surprised. Nil admirari is a maxim which every man conversant in politics must sooner or later subscribe to. The demon of infatuation—unless indeed I am mad, and perhaps I am; for they say that the difference between a madman and other people is, that the madman thinks all the rest of the world is mad, and they know him to be mad—the demon of infatuation must have come over this House, before it could consent to pursue its late and (I am sorry to say it) its present policy. You want revenue. Let us take the thing the regular way. The cart before the horse—that is the style of driving now—you lay double duties, and then interdict commerce, and that is the way we are to get revenue! A rumor has been brought into the House this morning that the British Orders in Council are rescinded, and a treaty made. Under any circumstances I should rejoice at this intelligence, but more especially under the present; for, send but a copy of the Journal of this session across the Atlantic, and you may whistle for a treaty with any nation of the earth—ever with the Barbary Powers, unless you bribe them to it—except you grease the fists of their Bashaw well with money.

Here a member from New York, near Mr. RANDOLPH, said the news was false—that the Union had not arrived at New York, as was reported in the morning.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I am told, sir, that the report is unfounded—that the Union has not arrived. The Union has not indeed arrived, sir, nor ever will arrive, unless we change our measures, and give up this system of vibration from point to point—this wonderful discovery of partially repealing an embargo. But, sir, on the subject of this double-duty bill, (as it is called, though improperly,) I believe it is only 50 per cent. now; in May, I suppose, we shall have another 50. Suppose a rich merchant, such as my friend from Georgia (Mr

H. or R.

TROUF) spoke of the other day—Mr. Gray, of Salem, for instance, to have a seat on this floor; who could he vote on such a bill? Voting for it, when he has millions of dollars worth of foreign goods in his warehouses, he must vote to put into his pocket a per centage on those goods equal to the tax imposed. I have no acquaintance with that gentleman; I am told (and it costs me nothing to believe it) that he is a very good man. Except he were a very bad man, he could not have the face to get up here and put 50,000 or 100,000 dollars into his own pocket, without rendering to the public one atom of service. One of the great and crying grievances of the British nation, though they have not advanced at quite as rapid a pace as we have begun to do in raising the customs, is, that every additional excise on malt, for instance, if you please, was so much money at an instant put into the hands of the great capitalists who had large stocks on hand; thus securing, by an ingenious species of bribery, all the weight of those capitalists on the side of the Ministry, at the expense of the great consuming body politic; and thus, by a strange and wonderful political invention, establishing the position (paradoxical, yet true) that, in proportion as you raise taxes, you acquire the power to raise them. In other operations there is friction, or resistance of the atmosphere—something to weaken them—but in this you embody all the capitalists at every turn of the screw, and acquire new power to increase its force. Every revolution of it goes to render the rich richer than they were, and the poor still more wretched. This has caused the yeomanry of that country, in some districts, almost to disappear. Under the operation of such a system, they are swallowed up in two classes—the overgrown rich and the miserably poor. The middle class—that great staff and stay of the community—falls into the one or the other of these descriptions, until it wholly disappears in the ruin of the State. In our wisdom, do we recollect that there is now a supply in this country of some articles—perhaps a seven-years' supply—brought in with a view to exportation, and entitled to drawback—of coffee, for instance, of sugar, and all those articles which pay a high specific duty? Of India goods and dry goods, all of which pay an ad valorem duty, there is an immense supply. We lay a tax of 50 per cent. on the existing duties. One of two things must happen: either that the non-intercourse law will give us some trade, or that it will destroy all trade. If it destroys trade, you give so much money out of the pocket of the consuming public to the great capitalists, and that is all the operation of it. You give a handsome bonus, as the Ministry of Great Britain do on loans to the Barings, or whoever are the favorite bankers of the day, but get nothing in return for it, and here it ends. But gentlemen say, sir, that we shall have this circuitous trade, as I remarked three or four years ago; that you will go to some neutral island, as you did in the last war to St. Eustatia, and give a joe for a striped blanket. Yes, sir; and we are to do it now—to go to a neutral island, and there make sale of your produce—for whose profit? Who will get the freight? The nation who has the command of the ocean. You will sell cheaper and buy dearer. You are there to get British manufactures. I have no more doubt of it, and that Cognac brandy will still be drank here, your embargo and non-intercourse to the contrary notwithstanding, than that we breathe the vital air; and that we are to get them too at double freight, insurance and commissions, and under the additional duty of 50 per cent. besides. And do you expect that you can compete with those merchants who have goods here? No, sir. You must then wait, sir. This circuitous trade will come when the price shall have been such as to enable foreign supplies, with the additional duty on them, to compete in the market. If I had four or five millions of pounds of coffee or sugar, sir, I do not know what weight it might have on my vote, but I should not think myself a good juror. If neither the people nor the Government of the United States chose to challenge me, I should except to myself; I should say that I was not a good juror, and quit my seat. There are merchants in this country—not one or two, but many—who have from half a million to several millions of foreign dutiable articles, which were brought into this country in the direct way, paying only the old impost; and if you expect that your new importations, forbidden by the letter of the law, under double charges and additional duties, will compete with these supplies, you must be totally in an error: they cannot do it.

To what point have we got, sir? When General WASHINGTON first set up this Government, if I may say so, for if he had never existed I believe the Government never would—in what situation were the poor old Congress? Instead of such palaces as this, paying at the rate of twenty-five thousand dollars a year (the amount of our contingent expenses) for candle-ends and cheese-parings, they had not money to go to market—they were literally paupers. When General WASHINGTON came to the Government, the first year's revenue was four millions. Let any gentleman compare the revenue of the eight years of General WASHINGTON's Administration with that of the eight years, ending the third of March next. The difference is enormous. Whence is this great revenue derived? From duties on imports and tonnage. You sanctioned this system; you tore down all the system of internal taxation with a glorious and strong hand—thank God, I assisted in the work, and shall not soon assist to build it up again—you kept up the imposts until your revenue exceeded sixteen millions of dollars a year. This Government began a poor people, with a beggarly exchequer; but we have long been wallowing in wealth; we have been boasting of our millions in the Treasury, besides the payment of former loans. We have got into a habit of expense—and with nations, as individuals, custom is second nature. We have become, in many branches of our expenditure, profuse and extravagant to an alarming degree. Our clerks in the departments have higher salaries than Governors or Judges in respectable States—look at this edifice, too, and the money spent on this ill-thriven brat, the Territory of Columbia. When I see my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) an apt illustration presents itself. The people of South Carolina and Georgia have, for years, become enormously rich from the culture of cotton. Suppose a projector were to tell them they had better cultivate flax; they would say that they had thriven by cotton, and having thereby accumulated many surplus dollars which they could not get rid of without going every summer to Ballstown Springs, and other watering places, they would stick to the culture of cotton. This was our situation; and now, it seems, we have found; not only that General WASHINGTON was wrong in his system, but that we who continued it were wrong; that everything done in the first years of our Administration was wrong; for if we were not wrong, it would be wrong now to lay internal taxes. And if we become what my friend from Virginia wishes to see us, living wholly within ourselves, without trade, in the name of God, how is money to be raised but by internal taxes? We cannot otherwise procure it—we must send a gauger into every man's house. Be it so, but I do not wish to see it—I had rather adhere to the old system.

Yes, sir, we are departing from our first principle, which was to derive revenue from commerce. Yes, sir, we are killing the golden goose like the foolish boy in the fable; and, hereafter, like Venice, Genoa, and other Republics, which have been once rich, great, and powerful, the only vestige of our departed splendor may soon only be found in such edifices as this—palaces of marble, imperial edifices, the astonishment of the world; but poverty, misery, and want, inhabiting within them. No man, if travellers are to be believed, can avoid being struck with the contrast in the places to which I have alluded between their ancient splendor, the monuments of which are stable as the foundations of the earth, and their present wretched, impoverished condition. Yes, sir, we shall have rags and ruffles—tawdry poverty—shabby gentility, of all things on earth the most mean and repulsive; a situation which will but illy comport with our present luxurious and expensive habits.

But, sir, it seems that to repeal this embargo wholly would be to descend from our dignity. The committee of exterior relations told us as much at the beginning of the session. I will thank any gentleman, who has it, for a copy of the report. The report being handed to him by a member, Mr. R. quoted the following passage:

“There is no other alternative than war with both nations, or a continuance of the present system. For war with one of the belligerents only would be submission to the edicts and will of the other; and a repeal in whole or in part of the embargo must necessarily be war or submission. A general repeal, without arming, would be submission to both nations. A general repeal and arming of our merchant vessels would be war with both, and war of the worst kind, suffering the enemies to plunder us without retaliation upon them. A partial repeal—”

The very proposition, as I understand it, which I wish to get rid of. It is not necessary for me to read the whole of the committee's reasoning on this subject, more especially as I do not, never did, nor ever shall subscribe to it—nullius addictus jurare in verba—“a partial repeal must, from the situation of Europe, necessarily be actual submission to one of the aggressors, and war with the other.” It seems that we are neither to have war with both nations nor a continuance of the present system; which will bring the Committee into a dilemma—but as to me, (I speak in the singular,) my withers are unwrung. Suppose, sir, that, instead of this indecisive state of acting, this House had, at the commencement of the present session, repealed the embargo, and armed in our defence instantly—what would have been the consequence? That you must have had at this moment, whilst I am speaking, war with both nations, or an accommodation with one, and war with the other, or an accommodation with both; and I believe that the last would have ensued.

Will gentlemen hint, that arming the merchantmen is not a dignified resistance, and that the embargo, or this wretched thing, is? What is the embargo? It compels your own produce to die on your hands. It has been said, that our merchants would go to England and pay tribute. The embargo is tribute, and of the most destructive sort. It leaves your own produce to perish—to rot—permitting your adversary to throw in her own goods to any amount, and saddle you with a debt which you will be able to pay no one. Two years' importations are to be met with one year's crop. This is a tribute, sir. I am against any tribute; but if we must pay it, I had rather pay it with a full pocket than one nearly empty. A system of resistance to the belligerents, by arming and defending yourself, is paying tribute; but going out under this bill to London, and taking a license, is not tribute. Going to St. Bartholomew's, and disposing of your produce to British capitalists for what you can get, is not paying tribute; but actual fighting is paying tribute. That is all right, sir; for we ought to have a new nomenclature; everything is left-handed. The political heart is in the wrong place, where the mock-doctor placed it in the play. This bill, however, is at least as much resistance as the embargo, and more so: for the embargo runs you in debt, destroys your produce; and levies a contribution on you to an amount which cannot be calculated.

I shall conclude what I have to say on this subject, with remarking, that if we do not repeal the embargo, or do something speedily, we are accessory (innocently, I hope) to one of the vilest species of swindling that ever existed in any country. I speak from correct mercantile information, of the most respectable kind. Before the proposition was made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) to repeal the embargo, the public expectation, though not high, was at a sort of regulated standard, tolerably steady, looking forward to a repeal at some time or other. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia—and I beg you, sir, to recollect from whom it came, the influence of that gentleman, and his supposed acquaintance and high credit with the Administration—made the prices of commodities start, in a night, like mushrooms: sales were made to a great amount; when, on a sudden, as if by the stroke of a torpedo, the proceedings of this House are benumbed. The Committee of the Whole, after the vote to repeal the embargo, is discharged, a recommitment takes place, and what is the result? The mercantile barometer not only went down, but did not stop at the point at which it was before; it fell even lower than ever. It now is fluctuating a little, but is not up to the point at which it stood when the motion was originally made. Now, suppose a man in the secret, when that motion was made, had sold out, perhaps, to the amount of half a million, at an advance of from 25 to 33½ per cent.; a few days afterwards he would be able to buy the same commodity at perhaps a price as much below par as he sold it above—making a difference of from 50 to 66½ per cent. Should such gambling be encouraged? The people want to know what way we are going—whether North or South, East or West. If they could guess, within five points of the political compass, (and I doubt whether we can within fifteen,) they would be satisfied: they will know what they have to depend on. For, whether we take off the embargo in toto, or partially remove it in law, and wholly, in point of fact; or whether we shall go to war, or have a non-importation, with double duties on importation to procure a revenue, is not more material than that they should know what we are going to do. And whatever it is, let us do it with all possible expedition. Let us decide; for there are now but a very few days to the end of our political life: and, really, with this sort of management, I am not without my fears that the session will be spun out without doing anything, and the embargo will be wholly kept on till the fourth Monday of May.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said he felt himself compelled very reluctantly to state to the House a few of those reasons which would influence him to vote for striking out the 12th section of the bill, and those dependent upon it. The present temper of the House affords, indeed, but little encouragement (said Mr. C.) to say a single word on the subject. It would seem from what has taken place while other gentlemen have been up on this subject, as if every member of the majority had made up his opinion, and felt an indisposition to hear the question examined. This however cannot justify me in omitting a duty I deem important. I hope also I shall find some excuse for the short time I may occupy, in the circumstance, that it has not been in my power for sometime to attend the House, and have not therefore had the benefit of the discussion that has taken place on this subject. And this may be one cause of the great surprise I feel at finding the House at this moment occupying a ground so different from that they occupied a few weeks ago. It may be if I had witnessed the several steps taken in the progress to the present stage of the business my astonishment might be less, but I do not believe my approbation of the present measure would be greater. If, in any remarks I may make, my surprise at and opposition to this measure should be expressed in terms that may be thought by some either too harsh or too strong, I trust it will be ascribed to the proper cause, and not to any design to wound the feelings or impeach the motives of any gentleman. I deem it however my duty to state as explicitly as in my power to my constituents and the nation the view I entertain of the subject; and as consistency is, in my opinion, of some importance in every pursuit of life, and much more so in legislation than in any other, I consider it necessary to endeavor to show that my conduct in voting against the proposed measure of a partial repeal of the embargo is consistent with the course I have heretofore pursued and the opinions I have expressed. If I could do this without at the same time exposing what appears to me inconsistent in the conduct of some other members of this House, for whom I entertain the highest respect, it would give me much pleasure; but this may not probably be in my power; for really it appears to me, sir, from the observations I have made during the few hours I have lately been able to attend the House, that something like enchantment had entered these walls and thrown its influence over some of the members of the House, of which they are sensible, but the effects of which they do not wish to be removed, as if there was something delicious in the delusion they would not willingly part from.

The state of my health will not permit me to discuss at length the merits of this measure. I shall only be enabled to state some of the more prominent reasons that induced me to vote for the motion. I have not, as already stated, heard all the arguments of gentlemen on this subject. I shall not, therefore, attempt to answer those of any gentleman in particular, but only present the House with the view I entertain of the subject. If, in doing this, I should repeat arguments advanced by other gentlemen, as probably will be the case, I shall find an excuse in the reasons already given.

I am in favor of the non-intercourse law now before you, and always have been, as connected with the embargo; believing those combined measures would constitute a strong and energetic system that would operate most powerfully on the interest of your adversaries, and maintain the rights, the character, and honor, of your own country. But I am opposed to a repeal of the embargo, either wholly or partially, unless you take a measure at least equally strong in its place. This was my opinion since the commencement of the session, and I had fondly indulged the hope until very lately it was the opinion of a large majority of the House. It is my opinion that, under existing circumstances, the best interests of the nation, as well as its honor and character abroad, require the embargo to be continued until the time arrives, at which it will be necessary and proper to take, in its place, a stronger ground, a more efficient measure of resistance, which, in my view, must be war alone. I need hardly repeat what I have already stated on this floor, that it has always been my opinion, the moment you retrace your steps, or abandon the ground you have taken by a retrograde motion, you sink the character, and give a vital blow to the honor of the nation. You have assumed a certain stand; if you retreat, you acknowledge at least a partial victory gained by the enemy, without striking a single stroke, and fix a stain on the reputation of your country that years of valorous exertions, and the blood of thousands of your brave citizens, will hardly efface. I cannot believe the public sentiment will justify such a measure; and in less than six months, the members of this House will be convinced they have mistaken the present disposition and wishes of the American people, if they suppose, as has been suggested, they would wish the embargo removed without substituting a measure at least equally strong in its place. I have always considered it a slander upon the people to assert they were unwilling to suffer any privations, or meet even all the calamities of war, to maintain their rights and independence. But, at this time, a continuance of the embargo, strengthened by a non-intercourse, until the extra session in May, would, in my opinion, best promote the real interests of this country, according to every view that can be taken of the subject. I consider the present the most critical moment that has occurred for a long time; and the chances for a general peace in Europe greater than at any period since the commencement of the war. It is also the most likely to produce an accommodation between this country and the belligerent Powers. If the subject were pursued, these points could be established beyond a reasonable doubt. It cannot be denied that Great Britain feels your embargo at this time much more severely than at any former period—that its pressure is increased at this moment almost a thousand fold. She is shut out from the Continent, whence she can receive no supplies, and where she cannot find a market for her manufactures. For fourteen months she has been substantially deprived of supplies from this country, whatever may be said respecting the evasion of the embargo. Every circumstance conspires to make it her interest as well as her duty to adjust her differences with your Government. Your own people have endured the pressure of the measure during the same time, and have suffered almost all the difficulties they would have to bear until a fair and full experiment of the measure was made. For I am and always have been of opinion, if you persevered in the embargo system until the next session of Congress in May, it would not be for the interest, or consistent with the honor of the nation longer to continue it. During that session an honorable peace, securing our rights, or actual war, must probably result from the present state of things. You have but two or three months longer to persevere in your measure to make the experiment complete. By that time the result of the war with Spain must be known—the final result of the negotiations between the great belligerents will also be ascertained. Those Powers will have taken their ground; if they do not withdraw their destructive edicts before that time, I would say, (what the whole nation would I presume support,) "it is in vain to wait longer relying on those measures;" I would risk all the calamities of war, rather than longer submit to foreign aggressions. But to repeal the embargo at this time, is to expose to all the hazard of capture the property that has been saved by it for fourteen months, and for the preservation of which it was laid and borne by your people during that time; and which will in all probability be swept from the ocean by the cruisers of the belligerents.

If those Powers would have taken your vessels when the embargo was laid, what is there to prevent them from taking them now? I have heard of no change in their measures, or in their disposition towards us; no such thing is pretended. I know of no protection we can now afford our commerce that we could not then have given. If it is proper the embargo should now be only partial, it certainly ought to have been so laid originally. The reverse of this must also be true; which is the proposition intended to be established; that if sound policy required the embargo originally to be general, which seems to be acknowledged by all those who voted for it, it ought still to continue so; and, as no change of circumstances has taken place, there is nothing to justify a change of measures. I am not for war at this time, or at any time, if it could be avoided; but I would, at this moment, vote for war against one or both of those Powers, rather than for a partial or total repeal of the embargo, or any measure whatever, that would degrade the nation. I am opposed to a partial repeal of the embargo, the question now before the House, because it is, in the first place, surrendering the ground you have taken. It, also, in my opinion, amounts substantially to submission to both Powers, and, in fact and practice, is submission to one—Great Britain. The ground on which you resisted those Powers, was, that as they had cut off your trade from Europe, you would cut off their supplies from America. There was no other ground on which the measure would be supposed to operate coercively. By the proposed partial repeal of the embargo, you furnish Great Britain with all the supplies she may want from you, at her own price, as there will be little or no competition in the market; and, in addition, you deprive your own merchants of the benefit of carrying your produce the greater part of the voyage, and throw it into the hands of those of Great Britain. You say to your own citizens, you shall not carry your produce directly to Great Britain, but you may go to Bartholomews, or to Lisbon, unless it be in the possession of France, which however is very probable, or to Gottenberg, if not in a similar situation, and there deposit your produce, to remain unsold, as there will be no other demand for it until Great Britain shall receive it at her own prices. She will only have to wait until the market is glutted, which will be the case in a few weeks, to get it at a price less than first cost. I must ask of the House to be indulged in reading, in support of this statement, part of a report made by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to this House, some time ago, which contains my sentiments, and which I wish to be considered as part of my reasoning on this subject. It begins on the twelfth page of the report:

"A partial repeal must, from the situation of Europe, necessarily be actual submission to one of the aggressors, and war with the other. The last position is the only one on which there can be any doubt; and it will be most satisfactorily demonstrated by selecting, among the several modifications which might be suggested, that which may on first view appear the least exceptionable; a proposition to repeal the embargo, so far as relates to those Powers which have not passed, or do not execute, any decrees injurious to the neutral rights of the United States.

"It is said that the adoption of that proposition would restore our commerce with the native Powers of Asia and Africa, and with Spain, Portugal, Sweden, and Russia. Let this be taken for granted, although the precise line of conduct now pursued by most of those nations in relation to the United States, is not correctly ascertained. So far as relates to any advantages which would result from that measure, if confined to its ostensible object, it will be sufficient to observe that the exports of articles of the domestic produce of the United States, during the year ending the 30th September, 1807, amounted to $48,700,000, and that the portion exported to the countries above enumerated, falls short of seven millions; an amount too inconsiderable when compared with the bulk of our exports to deserve attention, even if a question affecting the independence of the nation was to be decided by considerations of immediate profit.

"But the true effect of the proposition would be to open an indirect trade with Great Britain, which through St. Bartholomew's and Havana, Lisbon, Cadix, or Gottenburg, would receive, at prices reduced by glutted markets, and for want of competition, all the provisions, naval stores, raw materials for her manufactures, and other articles which she may want. Whether she would be satisfied with that favorable state of things, or whether, considering that boon as a pledge of unqualified submission, she would, according to the tenor of her orders, interrupt our scanty commerce with Russia, and, occasionally, under some new pretext, capture rather than purchase the cargoes intended for her own use, is equally uncertain and unimportant. Nor can it be doubted that a measure which would supply exclusively one of the belligerents, would be war with the other. Considered merely as a question of profit, it would be much more eligible at once to raise the embargo in relation to Great Britain, as we would then, at least, have the advantage of a direct market with the consumer. But the proposition can only be defended on the ground that France is the only aggressor, and that, having no just reason to complain of England, it is our duty to submit to her orders. On that inadmissible supposition, it would not only be more candid, but also a more dignified as well as more advantageous course, openly to join England, and to make war against France. The object would be clearly understood, an ally would be obtained, and the means of submission might be better palliated."

These were sentiments presented to the House about three months ago, as having been agreed to by all the members of the committee who report them except two, and considered in a great degree as the prevalent opinion of a great majority of the House. How the gentlemen have found it convenient since to change their opinions, especially those who agreed to that report, is not for me to say. What circumstances have since taken place to justify a change, are wholly unknown to me. But as I cannot reconcile it to myself to change my opinion without some reason for it, and believing what was then for the interest of my country is still so, I must entertain the same opinions now I did then; and cannot justify myself to the nation in shifting my ground, when no change of circumstances has taken place to authorize it, and saying that what was then considered dishonorable, is now become honorable and proper. You will observe, sir, that when the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, together with the resolution accompanying the same, were presented, in which it was stated that there was no alternative but a continuance and enforcement of the present suspension of commerce, meaning the embargo, to be aided by a non-intercourse or war, it never entered the head of any man as far as is known that the non-intercourse was to be considered a substitute for the embargo. And, with all due deference to the opinions of gentlemen, I can see as much reason in asserting that night is a substitute for day, as that a non-intercourse or non-importation, as proposed, is a substitute for the embargo. I have another reason which operates with me to vote against a partial repeal of the embargo. The present state of things renders it more than probable, that we shall soon have to enter the lists of war with one or both of the belligerent Powers. Your great and powerful enemy, Great Britain, has now within your territory property to the value of about twenty millions sterling. By this very measure you open a door to her to get home all her property, and in those very articles, too, which she most wants for her manufactures, and for supplies of provisions. In case, therefore, you go to war, you, by this means, deprive yourself of the strongest hold you could have upon your enemy. Yes, sir, you do this at the very point of time when that Power which has, for years, been committing every species of depredation on you, is evidently on the tenterhook of suffering, and probably, on the point of relinquishing, as necessary to her own interest, that unjust system which you have long been contesting. At this important moment you step forward, and, instead of holding out till the result is known, you throw into her lap all she can require; you give her your trade and surrender your neutral rights and character. This will most indubitably be the result of this measure, and I might defy its friends to show that it would produce any other. At the very time when your own people are rallying round the standard of their Government; when they are about to shake off that timidity, that alarm, that restless disposition which the first pressure occasioned by the suspension of commerce naturally produced; when they are, in almost every quarter of the Union, declaring their determination, and solemnly pledging themselves to support your measures, to maintain the embargo or go to war, if necessary; to do anything but submit—at that very moment, instead of being invited by a similar patriotic enthusiasm to throw yourselves in front, and to lead them on to the honorable contest, you abandon the ground you have already occupied, you check their generous enthusiasm, and leave them the mortification of seeing their country disgraced, and their best interests sacrificed by a timid, temporizing policy, that must, if persevered in, ruin the nation. The people already feel the reproach your measure will draw down upon them from foreign nations, they tell you, in the strongest terms, that you have deserted your former ground, which they were ready and willing to support; and they will, sir, shortly tell you so, in a tone that will make many of the advocates of this famous non-descript measure tremble in their political seats. Sir, I once before stated on this floor, when I had no idea that I should ever have to oppose a measure of this kind, supported by those who appear now to be its friends, that such would be the very measure your bitterest enemy, Great Britain, would wish you to adopt; that, if she had an agent on this floor, she could not present to this House a measure better calculated to answer her purposes, and to carry into effect her Orders in Council. I am still of the same opinion, for her navy will prevent, in a great degree, all trade to France, and thus throw into her hands all your produce, all the supplies she wants, through the medium of depots, more advantageous to her and more ruinous to you than if she had a direct trade with you. I cannot, sir, change my opinion of the measure demanded by the true interest of this country on account of the yell of insurrection, rebellion, or severance of the States, however loudly vociferated in certain quarters of the Union. I cannot, on this account, see our relations with foreign Powers in a different point of view from that which they before presented to me; they still appear to me the same.

There is another reason which powerfully operates with me to oppose this part of the bill, and one which I conceive to be of much importance, though not equal to that which I have stated. It is this: that though you relieve your enemy, you do not furnish any substantial relief to your own people. No, sir; I am convinced that, in less than three months from this day, should this measure succeed, produce will sink below the price which it now bears, or has borne for the last year. There are but few places to which you can go, and those will naturally become glutted for want of competition; and, in a short time, the prices will not pay the original cost. It will, therefore, afford no substantial relief. The relief, too, which it may afford will be partial, confined to certain portions of the Union, and not equally beneficial to the whole. Tobacco will find no market; cotton a temporary market only—for, although Great Britain will receive it, yet, as we have more on hand than she will immediately want, or can make use of, and as we cannot go to France, and our trade to the Continent will undoubtedly be interrupted by Great Britain, she has nothing to do but wait a few days, weeks, or months, and buy it at her own price.

Another ground has some weight on my mind, and I conceive ought to have some weight with every member of this House. I do believe this measure, unless considered by Great Britain as a favor to her, unless she believes you have at last seen the propriety of taking part with her in the contest against France, will produce war, and that of the most disastrous kind, upon your own commerce. So soon as your immense commercial property is again afloat on the ocean, your enemies, who have told you from time to time that your measures were of a hostile nature, will find it convenient to consider the course you are now to take as sufficient cause of war, and will, under this or some other pretext, sweep your property from the ocean, and this you cannot prevent; you have not the means of protecting your commerce, and what is still more provoking, this will take place after you have imposed, for more than a year, a severe pressure on the people, for the express purpose of preserving your trade from precisely such a fate as I think it will share. You have heretofore saved your property and seamen by the embargo. This is not denied by any human being of common sense and candor. I conceive you are now about to throw at the mercy of Great Britain your whole commerce and seamen that have been so long preserved from her grasp. This appears a strong reason against rescinding the embargo, more especially as it will afford your own people no substantial relief, who must still sustain the pressure of low prices and markets for their produce.

There is another reason that operates conclusively with me to oppose the repeal of the embargo: there is no adequate substitute proposed in its place. You are told indeed by some gentlemen that the non-intercourse is a complete substitute for it, and a more efficient measure. I could hardly believe, if I had not heard the assertion made, that any man who had reflected on the subject would hazard such an opinion. The non-intercourse, or rather non-importation, deprives your enemies only of a market for their manufactures. It cannot, therefore, produce any immediate effect. Great Britain sends you her goods in semi-annual exportations; she could not of course feel its effects sensibly in less than six months or a year. On the other hand, the embargo deprives her of supplies—of the provisions necessary for the support of her people, and the raw materials necessary for her manufactures. The loss of these she would certainly feel much more sensibly than the want of a market for her goods. Besides, the embargo has been pressing severely upon her more than a year, and its effects are at this time most seriously felt through all her dominions. To say, therefore, that the non-importation is a complete substitute for, or is as strong a measure as the embargo, appears to me as absurd as to assert that midnight darkness is as bright as the noonday sun. There is one other circumstance which would seem to put this point beyond all doubt. The embargo is to be repealed on the 4th of March, the non-intercourse or non-importation is not to take effect until the 20th of May, of course there is a chasm between the termination of the one and the commencement of the other of more than two months; during this time it will not be pretended there is any substitute whatever for the embargo, unless gentlemen can fancy the shade of the non-intercourse will anticipate its real existence and fill up the chasm. During this period, then, there is neither embargo nor non-intercourse, nor even the pretext of a substitute of any kind; it is a void to be filled up with the offering of humble submission and national degradation. Again: it appears to be a very general opinion that during the next session, if justice be not done us by the belligerents, war must be the result; that it would not comport with the interest, the honor, or independence of the nation longer to endure aggressions. The non-intercourse expires at the end of the session; its duration cannot, as now limited, exceed a few weeks; its life and death might be announced almost by the same toll. With what pretext, then, gentlemen can consider it a substitute for the embargo, or calculate on its coercive operations, is difficult to conceive.

There is another ground of objection to this measure which has been noticed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) and urged with considerable force, which is this: That putting the non-intercourse in place of the embargo, relieves one part of the Union, and imposes the pressure upon the other part. The embargo operates equally in a great degree on the different parts of the Union. The non-intercourse would press most severely on the Southern and Western States, who depend chiefly on the immediate exchange of their productions for foreign goods, and would throw almost the whole commerce of the nation into the hands of the Eastern States, without competition, and also add a premium on their manufactures at the expense of the agricultural interest to the South and West. Foreign goods being excluded, the manufacturing States would furnish the rest of the Union with their manufactured goods at their own prices. Hence the non-intercourse would operate partially against the Southern and Western, and completely in favor of the Eastern States, and hence the most cogent reasons I have yet discovered why the Eastern gentlemen are almost to a man in favor of it. I shall always feel disposed to support measures that operate as equally as possible on the different parts of the Union, but shall deem it my duty to oppose such as operate partially; and shall feel it more particularly my duty to resist such when their effects are against the interest of those I have the honor to represent. I had supposed a correct view of the effects of this measure would have been conclusive with every member from the Southern and Western States to vote against it. I will briefly notice here a proposition as connected with this subject, which has been frequently mentioned in discussion, as well as in private, as a substitute for the embargo, which is, to authorize your merchant vessels to arm for defence against the belligerent Powers. This appears to me a novel, weak, and undignified measure. It would afford no substantial protection to your commerce, might irritate, but could not sensibly injure your enemies, and being unknown to the law of nations in the shape proposed to be adopted, would at least have the appearance, if no more, of injustice. It is believed to be unprecedented in the annals of nations to authorize merchant vessels to arm for defence against the public ships of civilized Powers in whose Governments there is ground to place confidence. You arm against pirates as you do against robbers, because you have no confidence in their justice, or regard for the common rights of society, and feel no security even in their promised friendship.

When, therefore, you authorize your merchant vessels to arm against Great Britain and France, you announce to the world that they are in your estimation pirates, worse than the Barbary Powers; you treat them as such, and avow your want of confidence in their Governments, laws, and treaties; in fact it would amount to a declaration that you would have no treaties with them. How those Powers would act on such an occasion I shall not pretend to say.

If your merchant vessels were merely permitted to arm without any express authority from Government, they would be considered as pirates, and treated as such by every Power with whose cruisers they came in collision. If on the other hand you give them express authority to arm, they carry your flag; they are under your protection, and you will be responsible for their conduct; you will have to account for their acts, and they will undoubtedly involve you in war. These reasons appeared to me to be so conclusive against adopting this measure, that it was matter of some surprise to hear it so often noticed with approbation in private conversations, as well as on this floor.

It has been said in support of the proposition, that on a former occasion in this Government you passed a law authorizing merchant vessels to arm against France. I shall not at this time investigate this subject at any considerable length, but will only refer the House to the laws passed at that time respecting it; and gentlemen will see that so far from arming our merchant vessels alone for the protection of commerce, it was a regular system of war commenced and carried into effect by several laws, all passed in a few days. The system of arming our merchant vessels alone was never calculated on as a separate measure, and could not have been intended to be carried into practice, without authorized war, and reference to the laws themselves will prove this. The first law passed at that time on the subject bears date the 28th of May, 1798; it authorized the President of the United States "to instruct and direct the commanders of the armed vessels belonging to the United States to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to the laws of nations, any such armed vessel which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coast of the United States, for the purpose of committing depredations on the vessels belonging to citizens thereof; and also to retake any ship or vessel of any citizen or citizens of the United States, which may have been captured by any such armed vessels." The next law which passed on the 20th of June, 1798, is the law alluded to, authorizing merchant vessels to "oppose and defend against any search, restraint, or seizure, which shall be attempted upon such vessel or upon any other vessel owned as aforesaid, by the commander or crew of any armed vessel sailing under French colors, or acting, or pretending to act, by or under the authority of the French Republic; and to repel by force any assault or hostility which shall be made or committed on the part of such French or pretended French vessel pursuing such attempt, and may subdue and capture the same; and may also retake any vessel owned as aforesaid, which may have been captured," &c.

What was the result of this law? Before your merchant vessels could arm and be prepared for sea, before this measure, so extraordinary in itself, if considered separately, could be carried into effect, or practised upon, on the 9th of July following, only fourteen days after its adoption, a law was passed, evidently a part of the same system and most probably before the Legislature at the same time, authorizing the President of the United States to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels of the United States to subdue, seize, and take armed French vessels, &c., wherever found, &c., and also to grant to the owners of private armed ships and vessels of the United States who shall make application therefor, special commissions, &c., authorizing them to subdue, seize, and capture, armed French vessels, &c., in the same manner as the public armed vessels of the United States may be by law, &c. This was in substance and effect issuing letters of marque and reprisal.

[Mr. RANDOLPH asked leave to explain—Mr. CAMPBELL gave way. Mr. RANDOLPH: As the gentleman who has just given way to me was not in the House at the time that some observations were made by myself on this subject, I could not suppose that he had alluded to them. They were made in reply to my friend from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS.) Unquestionably the gentleman is totally mistaken in the view which he has taken of the proposition, if he refers to that made by myself for arming our merchantmen. And certainly it is not matter of surprise that he should be so mistaken, as he is mistaken as to the operation of this bill. He says the non-intercourse will not take place till next Summer, though the fact is directly the reverse; and he is equally mistaken as to the operation of that law, which he says granted letters of marque and reprisal, which authorized the capture of armed vessels only, and not of unarmed vessels. I have nothing more to say at this time.]

Mr. CAMPBELL said, he really did not perceive the necessity there was for the gentlemen to say anything on the present occasion; for he did not hear the observations he had made on this subject when formerly before the House; and did not allude to him at all. In regard to mistakes, said Mr. C., I presume the gentlemen attends more to those of others, than to his own. The time proposed for the non-intercourse to commerce, is stated in the bill, which is on every man's table; and is the 20th of May. There could therefore be no mistake on this point. I did not even know the gentlemen had made such proposition as he states in regard to permitting merchant vessels to arm, and I could scarcely believe any one would seriously risk his reputation in making such. I merely noticed the proposition as it has been frequently mentioned in discussion and in conversation. The laws which I quoted are precisely as I have stated them; there was no mistake whatever made in regard to them, and the gentleman can point out none. And in order to show the House that in this respect the gentleman himself must have been mistaken, I will turn to the laws and read those parts to which I before alluded.

[Here Mr. CAMPBELL read the laws before quoted].

The House must now perceive those laws were correctly stated. They authorized the capture of all armed French vessels, by the public and private armed vessels of the United States. With regard to the practical construction given to the terms "letters of marque and reprisal," very little will be found on the subject in the writings of the best jurists, with which we are acquainted. The meaning of the terms themselves would enable us to form a pretty correct idea of the authority they would give—and the authority to capture armed vessels is as much within their meaning, and has I presume been always so considered until this time, as the authority to capture unarmed vessels. Letters of marque and reprisal might include the authority to capture either vessels of the one or both descriptions. The authority however given by the law in question was to capture all French armed vessels, public as well as private, and clearly proves the position I have taken, that the object was open war with France; that there was no intention of relying on arming your merchant vessels for the defence of commerce, without war; that when Government authorized their merchant vessels to arm for defence, they did it as a part of a system of open war, which was then in a state of preparation, and immediately afterwards carried into effect. In this they acted consistently with the practice heretofore of civilized nations. And it is believed no instance can be adduced of one civilized nation's authorizing her merchant vessels to arm for defence against the public vessels of another civilized nation, with whom the former was at the time on terms of peace.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

It was not my intention, sir, to have detained the House so long. To their indulgence I owe an acknowledgment. I will close the remarks I have to make, by briefly repeating—that believing, as I do, that the proposed partial repeal of the embargo will be abandoning the ground of resistance to foreign aggressions we have taken, will degrade the honor and character of the nation—will not afford any substantial relief to your own people; that you adopt no real substitute in its place—that it will favor the views of your enemies at home and abroad, whilst it will disappoint and damp the spirits of your best friends, and incur the disapprobation of a great majority of the American people; and also in addition to all this it will most probably produce a war of deprecation in which your commerce will become an easy and sure prey to your enemies; believing all this I am decidedly opposed to it, and shall vote in favor of the motion to strike out the section. Should this motion not prevail, as will probably be the case, I will not at present declare what my vote may be on the final passage of the bill. It sometimes becomes necessary to make a choice, though it will be a very reluctant duty, between evils; we are compelled to take the less in order to avoid the greater. This may probably be such a case.

Mr. MACON said that there was not a clearer proposition under the sun, than that the embargo had been and was still the shield of our safety. In the early part of the session he had stated his impression that there were but three alternatives, to go to war, continue the embargo, or to submit. He was still of the same opinion, and thought it demonstrable that every proposition made, which had for its object the removal of the embargo, was either war or submission.

Take off the embargo, said he, in any way you please, if the orders and decrees remain in force, and where can you go? Only into trouble. The embargo did and does prevent Great Britain from getting your property under the Orders in Council. The merchants of this country, when orders were issued by Great Britain, which did not go half so far as at present, forced upon you the prohibitory law. I did not wish it. I thought the measure was unwise. At that time the Chesapeake had not been attacked. Those decrees had not been issued, which now make me wish to continue the embargo for a longer time. I would try it till September. I have stated before to the House, that if we went into the war we should be thrown on the side of France—I hope not into her arms, for I want no entangling alliances, nor treaties, more than we are compelled to make. Suppose you repeal the embargo, and in order to go to France, first go to England and pay her what duty she chooses to exact. Would not that be submission? Suppose you refuse to trade with France in consequence of the Orders in Council—would not that be submission? Both these cases would to my mind be submission; and that all the evils imputed to the embargo are chargeable to the decrees and orders, I believe, as I do that this measure has saved you from their nefar-rious doings. Let your merchants out, and, no matter where they go, the whole system is at an end. The merchants will trade to England. Let it be recollected that Mr. Erskine, in one of his letters to Mr. Madison, stated that the object of the duty on cotton was to prevent the manufactures of France from rivalling the manufactures of Great Britain. Do you expect then, that Great Britain will let the cotton go free? No, sir. How is it with another article—tobacco? I talk about these articles, sir, because they are the product of my constituents, by the culture of which they live. Of this article Great Britain consumes about one-seventh of our whole export; France two-fifths. Upon this two-fifths of our whole export, a tax of three dollars per hundred weight is imposed, almost equal to its whole current value in this country. Sir, I was opposed to the 50 per cent. additional duty bill; but when that duty on imports is compared with the duty which Great Britain lays on our exports, which we have not the power to tax at all, the duty sinks to nothing. We are contending for our existence as a nation. It has been said, a thousand times said, in this House, that tribute ought to be put out of the question. Sir, suppose this tax had been laid on the tonnage of our vessels, instead of the product of the soil, should we have been told not to repeat the word tribute so often? You might as well ask the people of this country to rescind the Declaration of Independence, as to ask them to permit their property to be taxed as a foreign Government pleases. Whenever gentlemen talk about taxes, and can coolly see a foreign nation tax this community more than the General and State Governments united, I scarcely know how to express my wonder at their apathy. The taxes laid by Great Britain on the soil amount to more than the taxes laid in this nation by corporations, towns, State and General Governments, all put together.

If your merchants go out under this bill, in my opinion they will evade it in the way in which Great Britain has evaded the French law; and there is no way to keep out of war, and at the same time avoid paying tribute, if the embargo be thus repealed. I had rather have British custom-house officers here at once, and be done with it. Reverse this thing for a moment. Suppose that the United States and Spain were at war, and the United States were to say that Great Britain should carry nothing to or from the Spanish colonies without coming here and paying an enormous tax on it—we should be thought mad. But this is just a parallel case with our present situation. You are compelled to carry all your produce to Great Britain; and, if you do not there sell it, to purchase a license to export it. Nothing can be more true than what has been several times said, that if we go to war with France, we need not pay any tribute. But, sir, were we to go to war with France, thus to avoid that duty, it would be the basest submission, and you had better go and pay it at once.

A thousand contradictory things have been conjured up in the course of this debate. At one time you are told that Great Britain does not value Canada or you. At another moment, in the fertility of gentlemen's imaginations, cotton and tobacco spring up there, like mushrooms, in a night. If you then talk about taking it, you are told that you will catch a tartar. Let foreign nations respect our rights and we will not concern ourselves with them. If we yield now; they will trample us to death.

Upon this subject, too, it is said by some gentlemen, "let commerce take care of itself." If this be proper, why are the same gentlemen the most strenuous supporters of a navy? If commerce is to protect itself, what is a navy to be sent out for? The commercial part of the nation ought to consider itself as linked with every other part. If commercial men have grown rich from the product of the soil and the labor of the agriculturist, is it fair and honorable for these men to want to destroy that which has given them wealth—I mean the agriculture of the country? Surely not; but it unfortunately happens that it is nevertheless true that the heaviest of these foreign taxes are imposed upon that part of the nation which the gentleman from Connecticut told us the other day has not the greatest portion of physical force. The amount of trade or commerce carried on would be the same, tax or no tax, but the price of the produce of the country would be less, and especially that part of it which can be carried but to one market.

I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Quinoy) in many points which he took the other day—that we should not fight Great Britain because she takes her own seamen from our ships. If she would take only her own and let ours alone I should be content. Notwithstanding all the distress under which gentlemen appear to labor on the subject of a treaty, I have no doubt that if we were to spend less upon treaties, and regulate our commercial affairs more by law, we should find it to our advantage. With whom should we treat? With France and Great Britain, the two most powerful nations in the world, who pay no respect to treaties longer than it suits their own convenience? I would restrict them by navigation laws as they restrict us. That is a sort of system which you can continue, sir. Without saying that our exports are of more value to them than theirs are to us, admit that they are but equally valuable, and we may retort their own doings upon them.

Much has been said about the amendatory embargo law. I have no fear but it will be enforced. It is not to be expected that you will not find smugglers under that as under every other law. I do not believe a word about any State's undertaking to set the law at defiance. I have no such expectation; and I go upon the idea that whatever is for the good of the whole all will obey. Make an experiment under the law. Recollect a case in what are called the hard times, sir, when a great portion of the nation thought the sedition law unconstitutional. The judges decided to the contrary, and the law was enforced. And, talking of hard times, there are several in this House who can better tell what they were than myself, yet I saw enough of them, and felt a little, too, though not as highly honored as some others, who were thrown into jail under the law. The highest honor decreed to me was to have the rogues' march played under my windows. Now I have heard of no personal injury or insult to any members of Congress in the present "hard times." To the hardship of former times many worthy characters, and the records of those days, will bear testimony.

I will here state a fact which did not occur to me till I saw it in another place, in one of the most luminous speeches I ever heard or read. When the attack on the Chesapeake was made, every one applauded the measure (the proclamation) adopted by the President. I came to this place, sir, at the subsequent session a little too full of a vindictive spirit, and others perhaps partook of the same feeling. This feeling continued for some time; and the first word I heard in reprobation of the proclamation was after the British Envoy had been here some time. I speak of a fact which is unquestionable.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in the conclusion of his speech, uttered an expression, in which I hope he was mistaken, viz., that "his arguments or impressions might be attributed by some to foreign influence." I hope he is mistaken. Nothing can be so grating to an American as to suppose that his arguments may be attributed to that source. I speak of it from a degree of experience; for in the "hard times" it has been attached to me. There is no man to whom foreign partialities have been imputed, that cannot feel the impression the charge makes upon a mind purely American. Every one recollects the time when opposition to every measure of the Administration was attributed to French influence. Though I have felt it, I never believed that those amongst whom I was born and raised would give credit to the charge.

It has been said, and great pains have been taken to establish the fact, that the embargo bears harder upon the Eastern than upon the Southern country. The reverse appears to me to be the fact. Upon the towns it may bear harder than upon the country; but take the nation at large, and the embargo, if gentlemen persist in charging all our evils on the embargo, bears harder on the South than on the East. We lose the capital of the trade, whilst they lose but the profits to be made upon the export and import. Can the profits be equal to the capital? Certainly not.

My perseverance in this embargo system may be deemed to be a little fool-hardy; but we are called upon to retire before we are routed. I have no fear of being routed. We cannot retire without disgrace under this non-intercourse bill. Take off the embargo, and we have no alternative but war. Arming merchantmen, issuing letters of marque, &c., all this is fighting. I am not for it if we can avoid it. The country is not ruined as has been said. Our property is safe at home. We have not now to negotiate with France and Great Britain for indemnity for the plunder they would have made but for the embargo. I had rather have my little property in this situation, embargoed at home, than have to depend upon negotiation to procure compensation for it when captured. True it is Great Britain once agreed to pay you for spoiliations, and so far acknowledged some such thing as the law of nations; but I doubt whether she will do it again. How did it happen? You agreed to pay her the amount of it and more too. France too agreed to pay for spoiliations; but how? You bought Louisiana, and she gave you credit for the amount due to you. She has no Louisiana now to sell you, nor has England. All the property taken from you would be clear loss.

The gentleman from Massachusetts told us, some time ago, to take care of his constituents. This is the desire of every man. The gentleman must agree that the articles of tobacco and cotton, without anything else, are equal to the lumber which he talked about. As to his idea of the fertility of the land and riches of the inhabitants of the Southern country, he is wholly mistaken. On the rivers there is some such thing; but in the upper part of the State in which I live, the greatest equality of property exists. These men bear with their present situation, because they see that there is no other alternative than war, and they had rather bear it than go to war. I do not believe that any one of the Southern States has more than three banks, whilst in the Northern States there are from twenty to forty of one kind or other in each State.

The letters read by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. TAOUR) the other day, had the same effect upon my mind which they appeared to have upon his. I have no doubt that some part of our cotton has been carried away; but it is but a small portion of the necessary quantity. As to making cotton in France, as a gentleman from Connecticut attempted to prove from a French author, I have no fear of that. I never had a good opinion of theoretical agriculture; and on hearing that book read, I admire it the less. I have no more fear of cotton being raised in France, especially if they take the author's advice as to the mode of doing it, where they have not spare ground to make tobacco, than I have of its being raised in Canada. And really, sir, as to the Barbary Powers making cotton for the European market, I should as soon expect the Cherokee, with his wallet of corn, to travel from his native soil to Roanoke to sell it.

A quotation was made by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) the other day, from the language of, perhaps, the most eloquent man in the Virginia Convention, for considering the Federal Constitution. I could name a man not quite so eloquent but quite as great a man, one of whose objections to the Constitution was, that you would be taxed by those who had no fellow-feeling for you. Great and prescient as he was, he never dreamed of Great Britain again attempting to tax us. Has Great Britain any fellow-feeling for you? No, sir; she and France have, and will continue to have, a hatred for you so long as you continue free. We are here struggling with this embargo, getting out of it one way or the other, and told that the laws are set at defiance. The bones of our Revolutionary soldiers are scarcely buried—and are we, their descendants, already threatening the Union with discord; tearing characters to pieces, as though the American character was worth nothing? In the city of New York, but the last year, one of the most solemn processions took place which was ever witnessed in the country, to bury the bleached bones of our patriots. And, gracious God! are they so soon to be forgotten? I hope not, sir; that we shall pursue our course with firmness, and not be turned from it by threats, come from whence they will; that we shall not repeal the embargo by passing this bill.

Mr. HOLLAND followed on the same side of the question. He had originally voted against the embargo, because he believed it premature; but he was decidedly of opinion that, when it was imposed, some time would be necessary to try its effects as a coercive measure. He believed that the United States generally sacrificed at least enough of their happiness to the commercial interest; but having taken this ground, he wished to maintain it. And although he was not inclined to favor exclusively external commerce, yet in favor of our indisputable rights on the ocean, he would go to war when efforts of peace failed. He was in favor, therefore, of a further continuance of the embargo, and replied to many arguments against it. He lamented the propensity that existed among gentlemen, because they could not obtain a favorite object in life, to set their faces against everything else. Thus, one gentleman in the other branch of the Legislature, because he had been removed from office some years ago, thought everything had since gone wrong. One in this House might think the same, because he had not been able to obtain an office; another, because he could not move the seat of Government, &c. Mr. H. said he firmly believed, nevertheless, that it was happy for the United States that the one was removed, another disappointed in an office, and that the seat of Government was in its old place. The reasons operating with those gentlemen had no effect on him. He was for pursuing a direct course and adhering to the embargo, until its effect was fully tested. Mr. H. spoke about an hour.

Mr. WINN moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject. Negatived.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the House adjourned about four o'clock, without taking a question.

Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians, reported their agreement to the same, with an amendment; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House,

Ordered, That the said amendment be engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill concerning invalid pensioners was read the third time: Whereupon, a motion being made by Mr. HOLMES that the said bill do lie on the table, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act making provision for the further accommodation of the household of the President of the United States;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" to which bills, respectively, they desire the concurrence of this House.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

Mr. BIBB moved to postpone the further consideration of the unfinished business till to-morrow. A similar bill was before the Senate, which, he believed, would be more generally satisfactory than the bill now before the House, and which would, probably, soon be received. The question now pending was not lightly to be decided; for it was known what effect a mere decision in Committee of the Whole on a part of a resolution had lately produced, The House would be better prepared to vote on it when they had the whole ground before them.

Mr. LLOYD objected to this procedure as unworthy of the dignity of the House. This House had no right to know what was doing in the Senate, except, indeed, it was to be guided in its proceedings by what the Senate should choose to do. For one, he said, he would not be led by the nose by the Senate or any other department of the Government.

Messrs. LYON, DURELL, BACON, and GARDNER, also opposed postponement; Mr. BIBB advocated it.

The question being now taken on the motion for postponement, it was negatived—yeas 38, nays 72, as follows:

The House then resumed the consideration of the said bill: Whereupon, a motion made by Mr. BIBB, which was depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, further to amend the bill by striking out the twelfth section thereof, being revived, the said section was again read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, to wit:

"SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act 'laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States,' and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as forbids the departure of vessels owned by citizens of the United States, and the exportation of domestic and foreign merchandise to any foreign port or place, other than Great Britain or France, or their colonies, or dependencies, or places in the actual possession of either, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, after the fourth day of March: Provided, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been previously incurred by virtue of the said acts as is repealed by this act; or which have been, or may hereafter be, incurred by virtue of the said act, on account of any infraction of so much of the said acts as is not repealed by this act, shall be recovered and distributed in like manner as if the said acts had continued in full force and virtue."

Mr. CULPEPER.—Mr. Speaker: As it is my misfortune very frequently to vote in the minority, and I may be equally unfortunate in my vote on the present occasion, I rise to offer to the House some of the reasons which will govern me in the course I expect to pursue on this subject. I voted against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MILNOR,) and I expect to vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB,) with a design to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS) and the second amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MILNOR.) I intend to vote for the bill under consideration, and desire it may be so modified as to prevent, if possible, the ruin and disgrace of my country.

I do not expect to vote for this bill for its intrinsic merit, for I am not very well pleased with the system; but I have long thought, and I yet think, if the several acts laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States are never repealed until we are all pleased with what gentlemen call a substitute for the embargo, my country will be ruined under the operation of this measure, which so much resembles Fielding's clock—it never can operate as a measure of coercion upon the European Powers; he describes the clock as most exquisitely formed in all its parts, but for the want of conformity in the several parts to each other it could not be put in motion. Just so is your embargo, though its advocates represent it as a political machine calculated to preserve the honor and interests of the country, for want of conformity to the habits of the American people and to the present situation of the country it cannot be executed to advantage. And as we differ in political sentiment, and no doubt, honestly differ, I deem a spirit of conciliation absolutely necessary for the preservation of the country. I feel willing to meet gentlemen who differ from me in sentiment, whenever I discover a disposition in them to do so too. And I think it is time to join and adopt that plan which will be least offensive to any portion of the American people, or their representatives. Under these impressions I expect to vote for this bill, as preferable to your embargo system. If the amendments proposed by the gentlemen from South Carolina and Pennsylvania are adopted, I believe we shall derive some benefit from this system. And should it fail in producing the expected good, it certainly will be productive of less evil than the embargo; it will partially restore our almost ruined commerce. For, however gentlemen may differ from me on this subject of commerce, I consider it a great excitement to industry; a source from which the rich derive most of their opulence, and the poor derive many of the necessaries of life; and gentlemen all acknowledge it to be the source from which we derive the whole of our revenue. To prove these positions, I will call the attention of the House to the commercial prosperity of the nation under the operation of the Treaty of '94, called Jay's Treaty. This treaty has been represented as ruinous and disgraceful. Such were the clamors against it, that I confess I disapproved of it at first; but under its operation we were a happy and a prosperous people. By reference to the several reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, I perceive our customs arising from imposts and tonnage during the four years prior to the adoption of that treaty, averaged, $4,224,728, and our customs arising from the same source, the first four years under the operation of the treaty, averaged $9,720,198, and the last four years averaged $12,340,491; and our exports increased in the same proportion—and we increased as fast in individual as national wealth. Yes, sir, under the operation of that treaty, our farmers were induced to cultivate the soil, and their industry was well rewarded; our seamen employed in navigating the ocean, and our canvass whitened every sea. United at home and respected abroad, we held the second rank among the commercial nations of the earth. But these privileges, though great, were trifling when compared with such as were to be procured by a new system, and when in 1804, Lord Harrowby, the then British Minister, proposed to renew that treaty, it was rejected. In 1806, a partial non-importation act was passed to exclude many articles of British manufacture from our ports—this was to compel the British lion to admit the American eagle to an equal participation in what gentlemen call the great highway of nations. When this plan, so promising in theory, failed in practice, an embargo was added—this was to compel not only the Government of England, but the enlightened Government of France to yield to us, in a state of dignified retirement, what they refused to grant us while pursuing our usual course of honest industry. Sir, what has been the consequence? What have we gained by this method of dignified resistance? I am certain if the citizens of the United States were to be consulted, and were to compare the political blessings we enjoyed under the treaty, with this political (what shall I call it?) curse, to which we have been exposed under the operation of the embargo system—they would not hesitate a minute, but would decide in favor of such a treaty.

But we are told, by the committee of exterior relations, we must have abject and degrading submission or war with both England and France, or a continuance and enforcement of the embargo, or present suspension of commerce. And as the first cannot require any discussion, and the pressure of the embargo is so sensibly felt that the country cannot or will not much longer submit to the privations of this system, gentlemen exclaim what is to be done? Has the nation no honor to maintain? Yes, sir, I hope she has; I hope we will still retain some of our national honor, but I trust in God, we never shall make another attempt to maintain our honor by abandoning our rights. I shall perhaps be told we have not abandoned our rights; this system is not an abandonment, but a suspension of our rights. Be it so, Mr. Speaker, for although I conscientiously consider it an abandonment of our rights, I believe the advocates of the measure consider it only as a suspension. God grant that their expectations in this may be realized; but I fear it will happen otherwise. But gentlemen exclaim, how are we to avoid degrading submission? I hope, sir, we shall abandon or modify this system, and resume the navigation of the ocean, and convince the world we do not intend to abandon our rights.

I am as anxious to maintain the honor of the nation as any gentlemen on this floor; but I subscribe to the position, that, in an agricultural and commercial Republic, honor and interest are convertible terms. I believe, sir, that our honor is our interest, and our interest is our honor. I am confirmed in this belief by gentlemen who profess to differ from me upon this subject. Sir, our actions outweigh our words, and while gentlemen from the South and West, whose constituents are cultivators of the soil, exclaim against a repeal of the embargo as disgraceful, they say the duty demanded by the British Government must be paid by the growers of produce, and that the carriers will receive full freight; and gentlemen from the North and East, whose constituents are many of them commercial, others seafaring men, urge the repeal of the embargo, because it deprives their constituents of commercial and nautical profits. These arguments prove to me that different habits and pursuits produce diversity of sentiments; but that we all consider honor and interest convertible terms. But I for one disclaim any share in that honor, which is contrary to our interest; nor do I wish to see our national concerns governed by the laws of chivalry, and see nations, like imprudent individuals, destroying each other without the prospect of gaining anything but a premature and inconsiderate death.

But gentlemen inquire, do you not prefer war to disgraceful submission? Yes, sir, I do prefer war to submission—but I ever have preferred, and yet prefer a candid, a full, and friendly explanation, to the honor of dying like Abner, as a fool dieth. For these reasons, I am for another attempt at negotiation. And as this attempt, however honest and sincere it may be on our part, may fail, I am for adopting some method to unite the American people. And although this bill, should the amendments proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina and the gentleman from Pennsylvania be adopted, is not just what I prefer, for I am decidedly in favor of repealing the whole embargo and non-importation system, and for permitting our merchants to arm in their own defence; it is the best terms I expect to get, and I am for accepting of it. And should the attempt at negotiation fail, and it prove necessary, I would then prepare in earnest for war; I would proceed to vindicate the honor of the nation and repel force by force. Then, sir, we shall have nothing to fear. The brave but peaceable citizens of the United States, when convinced of the justice and necessity of such a war, will unite as a band of brothers, not to support the embargo party nor the Federal party, but as free Americans to vindicate the honor of the nation, and maintain our rights, and transmit to posterity the rights and privileges which our fathers fought and bled to procure for us. But they are not so fond of war as to prefer that course, when they understand that these privileges could have been secured by a treaty. Believing this to be the desire and the interest of my constituents, and of the majority of the citizens of every portion of the Union, I am for pursuing this course. I am for making this bill as perfect as possible, in order to satisfy the citizens in every portion of the Union. Some gentlemen represent it as disgraceful to yield to the clamors or murmurings of the people. But I consider it the duty of the Representatives to repeal a law whenever it is known to be contrary to the wishes of the people. But gentlemen tell us this system is not displeasing to the people, that notwithstanding all that has been said upon the subject they do not believe it—they do not believe the people disapprove of the embargo. Sir, unbelief has ruined many, and I do awfully fear it will be our ruin. I am certain it will, if we persist much longer in it.

Mr. BIBB observed that, whatever should be the decision of the House, he should obtain one object; he should obtain the names of those who, in the commencement of the session, told the House that the proposition now under consideration was the most dishonorable that could be proposed, and would now vote in favor of it.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, notwithstanding the threat of the gentleman from Georgia, he should vote against his motion. He had a right, as well as the gentleman from Georgia; to judge of the nature of the proposition submitted to him. Every one who voted on the report of that committee, did not adopt its reasoning, and might have voted in whatever way he deemed proper, without consulting their explanation of it. He believed the nation looked forward to a modification of the embargo, and he should therefore vote for the bill.†

Mr. LOVE opposed the motion to strike out the twelfth section. He thought it premature, at least, as there were considerable amendments contemplated to the bill. Mr. L. took an extensive range of argument to show that if the embargo system was repealed the non-intercourse would be the best substitute; that the effects of it would be felt by our enemies, perhaps in a greater degree than the embargo, especially after it was understood, in foreign nations, that the execution of the laws was opposed, even under the sanction of State authority; that the mode of treating infractions of our laws, as it respected our citizens, was a different thing, and he hoped would meet with proper attention. He thought the system to be substituted would probably bring our differences with foreign Governments to an issue of some kind, if the provisions were such as he wished. It was certainly desirable that a termination of some kind should be had to those differences. The honor and independence of the United States required it. Mr. L. replied to observations which had been made of the great power and revenues of England, by stating that the United States were better able now to meet the power of England, if war was to be resorted to, than in the year 1776, when the same causes of war existed, as at present, and when the resources of America were literally nothing. Mr. L. regretted the motion had now been made, as he feared it was calculated to make another false impression on the people of the United States; and, although he should vote against the motion, he should not consider it as committing himself on the final question.

Mr. COOK was against the motion. He considered the embargo as a measure which, in its friendship for commerce, was destroying it by grasping it too tight. He wished its grasp to be loosened.

H. OF R.

Non-Intercourse.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL next took the floor. He was in favor of the motion under consideration. He said he was surprised at the change which a few weeks, during which he had been absent from indisposition, had produced on the minds of the members of the House. It seemed as if some enchantment had spread itself over them, which they perceived, and yet did not wish to remove. He urged many reasons against a repeal of the embargo, and against the bill proposed. But a few weeks ago, the House decided in favor of a continuance of the present system as the only means of honorably avoiding a war; and some of the very same gentlemen were now about to adopt a measure, which the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations had declared to be submission, viz: a partial repeal of the embargo. A removal of the embargo would render our property liable to capture, and give an opportunity to British subjects to take from the country in the manner most advantageous to themselves, twenty millions of property, which would otherwise be in the power of the United States in case of war, which was at least probable. It was a measure which would relieve our adversary without benefiting our own citizens in the slightest degree. Mr. C. expressed his astonishment how gentlemen, whom he perceived supporting this bill, could reconcile it with consistency to do so, when no change of circumstances had taken place, which could authorize a change in their opinions. Mr. C. also noticed the system of arming our merchant vessels, which he pronounced to be novel and futile. He did not state how he might vote on the bill when on its final passage.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied to some of the observations of Mr. CAMPBELL on the subject of the arming system, and in relation to consistency.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, replied to some of the remarks of Mr. CAMPBELL, and defended himself, as one who voted on the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, from the charge of inconsistency. He was in favor of the present bill, and in voting for it should not change his ground. He thought that this bill was what the embargo ought to have been in the beginning. In commenting on Mr. CAMPBELL's observation in relation to the property in this country, he said, that when we went to war for a moral right, he would not say that twenty millions of private property in this country should be taken possession of by us.

The question was then taken on Mr. BIBB's motion, and negatived—yeas 39, nays 84, as follows:

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out of the twelfth section the exceptions to the general removal of the embargo.

Mr. R. supported the motion on the ground of the expediency, for general reasons, of a total repeal of the embargo. And, in addition to the general reasons in favor of a repeal, he observed that although the embargo was to be but partially repealed, in point of practice, no attention would be paid to the remaining part of it. He deprecated the fostering in the people of this country, the sentiment which existed in almost every other country than ours, that obedience was due to the laws so long as the whip of the executioner was flourished over the head, and no longer.

Mr. BACON was in favor of the motion, because he wished, by so doing, to make way for the amendment of a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS,) for imposing additional discriminating duties, &c. If the non-intercourse system was to be adopted, Mr. B. was also in favor of repealing the provisions of the embargo laws, and enacting others which should be more intelligible to the revenue officers, than as it would be, were it not repealed.

Mr. QUINCY advocated the motion from the total impossibility of enforcing the embargo, after the fourth of March, in some parts of the country, particularly in the district of Maine.

Mr. MACON said he cared but little about this question, for the die was cast when the House decided partially to repeal the embargo. He never had an idea, however, that the law could not be enforced; for, if it had been repealed on that ground, any large State would hereafter have it in its power to procure the repeal of any law which it conceived to militate against its interests. He declared that, notwithstanding all that had been said to the contrary, he would maintain that the embargo had never brought an evil on this country.

FEBRUARY, 1809.

Mr. NICHOLAS said that if the embargo were to be repealed, in order to erect the non-intercourse system on its own basis, provisions nearly similar to those contemplated to be retained in force would be necessary. As to yielding to resistance to the laws, if it was to take place, let it come. It was time for the people to know whether they had a Government or not.

Mr. ALEXANDER gave the reasons why he should vote in the affirmative on this motion, declaring that he was not influenced to do so by any opposition to the laws, in any quarter of the Union.

Mr. SMILIE had been in favor of the embargo, which he had considered the only means of preserving us from war; and, as it was determined to repeal the embargo and not go to war, he was in favor of non-intercourse; and he said that the system of non-intercourse was not such a weak or novel system as had been represented. He quoted the instance in which it was adopted in the year 1775, and agreed to in 1793, though not put in practice, because the President ordered a special mission. Amongst the votes in favor of the measure at that day were enrolled some of the most respectable names to be found in American history. What were the causes which had produced a change in the minds of members of the House, in relation to the embargo system, Mr. S. said he did not know; but certain it was, that the threats of some gentlemen from the East had influenced in bringing it about. Mr. S. censured an insinuation made by Mr. DANA a few days ago, on the subject of the relative physical strength of the North and South, as improper to be used on the floor, and unfounded in fact; for the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, contained a population one-seventh greater than that of all the New England States together.

Mr. RANDOLPH supported the measure on the ground that as the law now stood, compounded with the five supplementary embargo laws, it would be almost unintelligible to the revenue officers. He expatiated at some length on this point. If you will have a system of non-intercourse, said he, enact it; but let us, for God's sake, sing a requiem to the ashes of the embargo; let not our successors have to take up the doleful ditty where we left off.

Mr. KEY followed on the same side of the question. He was happy to find that the doctrine which at the commencement of the session was almost heretical, was now becoming orthodox. He was not without hopes that, if he maintained his ground, he should soon be found in the right church, preaching sound and saving doctrine. Mr. K. said that the provision of the bill by which the commencement of the non-importation was fixed for the 20th of May was evidence that it could be still further postponed. If we can rock our honor asleep till the 20th of May, said he, could it not be cradled a little longer for the public good? Mr. K. appeared to be wholly opposed to the non-intercourse system.

Mr. W. ALSTON observed, in the course of some observations in reply to Mr. KEY, that there were some gentlemen whom no system that ever was invented would suit. As to political doctrines, said Mr. A., God forbid that I should ever see the day when the doctrines of that gentleman will become orthodox.

The question on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion was then negatived—yeas 47, nays 75, as follows:

Mr. GHOLSON moved to strike out "the fourth of March," the day at which the partial repeal of the embargo is to take date, and insert the "first of June." Having before given his sentiments on this subject, and so much having been said on it, Mr. G. said he would now add nothing.

The House adjourned before the question could be taken.

lie on the table, be recommitted to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House, it was resolved in the affirmative, and the bill was made the order of the day for this day.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of Georgetown,'" was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making provision for the further accommodation of the household of the President of the United States," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole this day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson;" also, a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of Georgetown,'" to which bills, respectively, they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson," was read three times and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians," together with the amendment agreed to yesterday, was read the third time, and passed.

EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any advances had been made by the War Department to the Commander-in-Chief, contrary to law, and to what amount, stated to the House that the committee had received from the office of the Accountant of the War Department a number of documents, which they had directed him to present to the House as their report.

The documents were read, and a motion made to print them was agreed to.

On the question how many should be printed, a desultory conversation of near three hours took place, not confined to the question before the House, but touching somewhat the subject of the legality or illegality of the advances made.

Questions were severally taken on printing 5,000, 1,200, 1,000, 900, and 600 copies, and negatived by large majorities. The usual number were ordered to be printed.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The bill from the Senate for interdicting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes, was twice read, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for this day.

The unfinished business of yesterday (the non-intercourse bill of this House) was ordered to lie on the table, 64 to 35.

And the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, yeas 65, on the bill from the Senate for interdicting commercial intercourse, &c.

Mr. MASTERS moved to strike out of the 11th section, the words "and to cause to be issued under suitable pledges and precautions, letters of marque and reprisal against the nation thereafter continuing in force its unlawful edicts against the commerces of the United States."

Mr. MILNOR supported the motion on the ground that the Constitution of the United States provided that Congress alone should have the power to declare war, and this bill, by giving the President a discretion to judge when that war should commence, transferred the power to him. Could it be supposed that if it was not proper now to go to war, it would be proper before the next meeting of Congress? Certainly not. And if not, should the President of the United States have the power of declaring war before that time? It was giving a pledge to one nation that if she would withdraw her decrees, we would take part with her in the war against the other, without giving the other a chance to withdraw hers, and thus prevent war; and he was, therefore, opposed to it, because it tended to promote war.

Mr. LIVERMORE also contended that the part proposed to be struck out was unconstitutional. The power of Congress could not be delegated to the President or any other person. They might as well delegate to the President power to make or revoke all laws. The bill did not contemplate a legislative act for issuing letters of marque or reprisal against a particular enemy, but gave a power to the President to choose with which of the belligerents he would take sides and against which he would declare war. If the nation was in favor of war, this was not the proper way to make it. He conceived that if they passed this bill their constituents would tell them that they were traitors to the Constitution; that they had betrayed the trust reposed in them. There was a time when he should have been astonished to see such a bill as this come from the Senate; but the age of miracles was not passed. He should scarcely now be surprised at anything which could be proposed. Its passage would be a precedent which would redound to the everlasting disgrace of the Congress of the United States. He said also that it was a clause which he conceived would shake the Government of the United States to its foundation. He only considered it in a Constitutional point of view; as to its inexpediency, that was a minor consideration when put in competition with its unconstitutionality.

Mr. LYON followed on the same side and on the same grounds as Messrs. MILNOR and LIVERMORE. He believed that the people did not wish for war. No man wished for it but those who wished offices or some other benefit from it. He wished the nation to be permitted to grow. He knew of no mode by which this nation could more effectually be plunged into war with Great Britain and alliance with France, than by this provision of the bill. Although Mr. L. did not like the embargo, because he considered it ruinous to the people, he would rather continue it for seven years than to plunge into war.

Mr. HOLLAND spoke in reply to the preceding gentleman. He was astonished that gentlemen should declare every proposition the worst that ever was made. A short time ago gentlemen would rather have war than the embargo. But this bill neither was a declaration of war, nor a discretion to the President to make it. It authorized the President, at the moment of one of those Powers withdrawing its orders or decrees, to issue letters of marque and reprisal. It conferred no legislative power on the Executive. The event was fixed on the happening of which being made known to the President, he should forthwith issue letters of marque and reprisal. The bill obviated the great objection which had been made to war, viz: that it must be a war against two nations. Now this bill gave choice to those nations which would make herself our enemy; and it would be equally the interest of both to withdraw its decrees or orders, and place the United States at war with the other. He had no idea of consulting the interests of those nations more than our own; and if it was ascertained that those nations were determined to continue their orders and decrees, no gentleman in the House would say that this nation should not resist them, except perhaps the gentleman from New York (Mr. GARDENIER) or the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. LYON.)

The Committee then rose, and on the question that it have leave to sit again, it was, after debate, granted.

THURSDAY, February 23.

A motion was made by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That an order of this House of the 18th instant, directing "that, until the end of the present session, the daily hour of meeting shall be ten o'clock, and should a quorum not appear, the names of the members shall be called, and those present noted in the Journal of each day," be rescinded.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and for other purposes:" Whereupon.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the first, second, and third amendments.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the fourth and last amendments of the Senate to the said bill; and that the title be, "An act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated and to confirm the claims of Abraham Ellis and Daniel Harrelal."

INVALID PENSIONERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on an engrossed bill concerning invalid pensioners; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment thereto. The House then proceeded to consider the bill: Whereupon, the amendment reported thereto from the Committee of the Whole House, to strike out the fourth section, in the words following, to wit:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person who has been or shall be admitted to a pension under the provision of the aforesaid act of the tenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, shall be entitled to receive a sum equal to the aggregate amount of such pension, calculated from the time when the disability, in consequence of which it was granted, was incurred, to the time of his admission on the pension list" being twice read at the Clerk's table, the question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said amendment, and passed in the negative—yeas 48, nays 50, as follows:

The bill was then read the third time: Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. HOLLAND, that the bill be recommitted to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House: and the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate for interdicting commercial intercourse, &c. Mr. MASTERS's motion for striking out part of the eleventh section being yet under consideration.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to strike out the whole of the section preceding the proviso, for the purpose of inserting the following amendment:

"If after Great Britain or France shall revoke such of their orders or decrees, laws, or edicts, as violate the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States, of which revocation the President of the United States shall give public notice by proclamation fixing the time, which shall be at the expiration of fifty days from the date thereof, when the operation of this act and also of the act laying an embargo, &c. shall cease and determine; and the President of the United States shall at the expiration of the time limited in the said proclamation issue letters of marque and reprisal against the nation which shall continue in force its unlawful edicts against the commerce of the United States."

The reason he assigned for it was not a hostility to the principle, but that, as the section now stood, it gave the President a discretionary power to judge of the time at which the commerce of the United States would be safe enough to warrant the withdrawing the embargo as relates to either Power, &c.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for a division of the question on striking out, so as to take the question distinctly on striking out the two clauses of the section.

The question was taken on striking out the first clause of the section, and negatived, 52 to 47.

The question then recurring on striking out the second clause, being precisely the motion of Mr. MASTERS,

Mr. DANA objected to the clause for a variety of reasons, because it delegated to the President power which belonged to Congress only, by making him judge of what "pledges and precautions" were "suitable;" that it authorized the employment of private force in a case in which the public force was not to be employed, which is a novelty; it contemplated not actual war but invited individual enterprise; it was therefore a mere menace, going upon the principle that private vessels might be authorized to make reprisals where the public force was not presumed to be employed; it was therefore a measure unworthy of the Government, and unknown in the history of nations. The construction of the section too was singular, and he was astonished that such a bill should come from the Senate. It made no regulations as to what disposition should be made of the property captured by these vessels, whether declared good prize or not, &c. It was a mere vague proposition, and unworthy of the Government, as it proposed war by individuals while the nation shrunk from the contest. He objected also to the condition on which letters of marque were to be issued—that on one nation's ceasing to wrong us, we should agree to fight another. He objected to it too, because it transferred to the President a legislative power, by making the issuing letters of marque dependent on the events which in the opinion of the President should render the commerce of the United States sufficiently safe, &c.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON renewed his motion to strike out the whole section, except the enacting clause. He acknowledged the justice of the arguments of the gentleman from Connecticut; but as a session of Congress would intervene, the objection to the defect in detail would fall to the ground. The amendment which he intended to offer, would remove the remainder of the gentleman's objections.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for a division of the motion at the same point as before. He said if the Senate had erred, the error was not to be remedied by the proposition submitted to the House. It was only putting a tortoise under the elephant; for the system would be liable to precisely the same objections as the clause proposed to be amended. Mr. R. went into an examination of the amendment which Mr. JACKSON read, to show that this was the case. It was in fact the same point now which the House had under consideration a few days ago—a declaration of war in futuro, leaving it to chance as to whom and how war was to be declared; with a mental reservation at the same time, that all this was mere pen, ink, and paper. It was complying with the object of those very belligerents whom it proposed to resist, viz: involving us in the war—setting the nation up to the highest bidder, the kindest keeper. Was this dignity? Was this the spirit of '76? He described this bill from the Senate as a new alternative, never discovered by the Committee of Foreign Relations, who had some time ago presented three of them to the House. He spoke of the proceedings of the present session. It has been said (observed Mr. R.) that this House has been acting under a panic; and allusion has been made to a particular quarter of the Union as the cause of that panic. I trust, sir, that the members of this House will think it more honorable to themselves, if they are to be influenced by fear, and I hope they are not, to yield to the wishes of a great and respectable portion of the Union, than, after having expressed a disposition to gratify that section, to be whipped in by an editorial paragraphist. It has been truly said that the Government of France was destroyed by the Parliaments putting the galleries in the place of the house, by legislating under the hisses or applauses of the galleries. This was a horrible state of things. But if any body of men is to legislate under hissing, where is the difference, whether they come from the galleries, or, from really the most worthless part of the community? Whether from an individual who arrogates to himself not merely the right, which as an individual and freeman he has of judging of the conduct of this House, but of prescribing what it should do? And when, sir, I indulge in these observations I feel a repugnance at comparing such an audience as I see around me to persons of that description. The foreign difficulties in which we are now involved, Mr. R. attributed to our own oversight; to the rejection of a treaty which might have been formed. The renewal of Mr. Jay's treaty, or the acceptance of that negotiated by Mr. Monroe, would, he conceived, have placed the United States in a situation far preferable to that in which it now found itself. But, instead of that, our Government had searched the volumes of Puffendorf, Marten, Vattel, &c., and produced whole volumes of diplomatic correspondence. He said he could almost wish that the curate and barber would come into the library and make a bonfire of all the rubbish which had led us to this windmill expedition. With regard to our domestic difficulties, Mr. R. conceived that they were all of our own creation; that they had been produced by ill-judged conduct. He compared the present and late situation of this country with that of Great Britain under the administration of Lord North. He said Congress were not now, like Macbeth, in a situation where to go on was as easy as to retreat. He expatiated on their present difficulty; and condemned the policy which had prevented the House from agreeing to the proposition of Mr. CHITTENDEN, to repeal the embargo at the commencement of the present session. If they now intended to modify the embargo at all, he begged of gentlemen, for God's sake, for the love of country, taking warning by the past errors of their former masters, (the Ministry of Lord North,) not to retain one iota of that obnoxious principle which had put this continent in an uproar. Rather than continue it, he would join any man in war, however averse he might be to war. And he was opposed to war; but, put the embargo in one scale and war in the other, he would take war—and why? Because foreign war was better than domestic war. He said that this nation could not go to war with a formidable minority against it. The bill before the Committee might bring on war, though it was not intended. Yes, sir, said he, it may bring us to fighting and to disgrace; it is something like dressing ourselves up in a dough-face and winding-sheet to frighten others, who may blow our brains out at the moment we suppose them in the height of their terror.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that it was his opinion that it would be more to the honor of the nation to persevere in the embargo until they went to war; but the majority of the House appeared to be of opinion that neither course was proper. That being the case, he was willing to make the ground as tenable as he could, so as to avoid downright submission. He replied to various observations made by gentlemen who had spoken on the subject. In relation to domestic difficulties, he should be at little influenced by attacks through newspapers, as by popular meetings, enlisting the people with arms in their hands, in opposition to the Government. In relation to the treaty negotiated by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, he said that the rider attached to that treaty gave a license to the British Government to pursue the very course which now produced our difficulties, and Mr. Canning maintained that to have been the construction of it. Mr. J. said that he was not yet prepared for burning the law of nations, and substituting force for law. As to violations of the embargo or of the proposed system, he observed that all laws restraining the actions of men would be more or less evaded; this, therefore, could be no argument against any law proposed; the same objection would lie against a law for the punishment of murder. Mr. J. spoke for about half an hour.

The question was then taken on striking out the first clause of the section, and negatived—56 to 48.

The question recurring on Mr. MASTERS'S motion for striking out the remainder of the section, relating to letters of marque and reprisal,

Mr. LYON spoke in favor of striking out the clause.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, viewing this section as a measure contemplating further negotiation, was wholly opposed to it. It said to Britain, "we will dismiss every other cause of quarrel with you, if you will revoke your Orders in Council." It told our poor sailors, incarcerated in their "floating hells," that we were ready to abandon them. The surrender to her of the right of impressment, and of even other rights previously in contest, was offered as the purchase-money for the revocation of the Orders in Council; and he blushed for his country, that such a proposition should be seriously entertained in this House. He would declare war to-morrow most heartily. He would vote for a section for immediately issuing letters of marque and reprisal, but he would not barter away our rights for the revocation of the Orders in Council. If we were to submit, he wished to do it in that way which should carry so much destruction into the families of those who cried out so loudly for the repeal of the embargo, that they would rally round the Government in support of the country's rights.

Mr. EPPES, too, was of opinion that there was no honorable course left for this country but embargo or war; but a majority of the House having overruled his opinion, he must acquiesce in their decision. But he could not consent to adopt the measure proposed by this section, which, under whatever aspect he could view it, appeared calculated to produce no effect but disgrace and ruin to the country. It could only be used in one of two ways, either as an instrument of negotiation or as a measure of war. Mr. E. used some arguments to show that, as an instrument of negotiation, proposing to each Power to pass over all former injuries if it would withdraw its last infraction of our rights, and, besides so doing, to go to war with its enemy; whatever might be the result, it could produce nothing but ruin and disgrace. It reminded him of a physician painted blind, with a club in his hands, his patient on one side and the disease on the other; striking at random on each side, he killed the one to which chance directed the first blow. And as a measure of coercion, what was it? Not old-fashioned downright war, but war depending on a contingency. It was a golden apple held up to the belligerents to be adjudged to the swiftest in receding. Upon the humor or whim of Talleyrand or Canning, when they received the proposal, arise ing perhaps from an undigested dinner, was to depend our war with either France or England; and we are to present ourselves as a courtesan to the polluted embraces of England, or be fixed on the imperial car, in either case bribing France or England by going to war with the enemy of the one which should be the first to embrace our offer. Whichever should accept it, disgrace and ruin must be the result. Rome, at one time, was said to want nothing but a bidder; but Rome had its age of virtue. Mr. E. said that it seemed as if we, in our very infancy, had all the degeneracy of the latter days of old Rome. If there was not firmness enough to take a manly attitude, he hoped the House would not take this thing as a substitute for it.

Mr. FISK was against striking out this clause. After some remarks in reply to Messrs. RANDOLPH and LYON, he said that he regretted exceedingly the situation in which the House was placed; that this clause should be stricken out—for it would be virtually saying that they meant to take no honorable ground, that they would submit. He believed that temporizing would ruin the nation. As to opposition of the people in the East to war on any terms, he said that, excepting a few who had been opposed to the Revolution, and who still longed for British dominion, there were not many who would not join their Government in a war against either Great Britain or France for the maintenance of our just rights.

The question was then taken on striking out that part of the bill from the Senate relating to letters of marque and reprisal, and carried—ayes 72.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS then proposed his amendment for substituting a discriminating duty of — per cent. as a substitute for the non-importation from Great Britain and France.

The Committee immediately rose, without taking a question, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 24.

On a motion made by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the House do now proceed to consider a resolution proposed by him yesterday, and ordered to lie on the table, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That an order of this House of the eighteenth instant, directing "that, until the end of the present session, the daily hour of meeting shall be ten o'clock; and should a quorum not appear, the names of the members shall be called, and those present noted in the Journal of each day," be rescinded:

The question was taken thereupon, and passed in the negative.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House went again into Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate for interdicting commercial intercourse, &c. Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS's amendment being under consideration, viz: to strike out that part of the law relating to non-importation, and insert a provision for discriminating duties—

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS rose to rescue himself from an imputation of intending directly to harass the bill by this amendment, because he intended eventually to vote against it. He solemnly abjured any such an intention. Any member who would at this time make such a motion, with a view to embarrass the proceedings of the House, would deserve a halter. Perceiving that a large majority of this House was determined to repeal the embargo, and not to fight, he had been induced to offer to the House that, which, to his understanding, appeared the best plan that had been presented. Mr. W. offered many reasons against the non-intercourse bill; amongst others, that, instead of being coercive, it would operate as a premium to the navigating interest of Great Britain; that two years' continuance of it would be worth millions to Great Britain; that it also injured the agricultural interest of this country, laying additional obstructions on the sale of its produce; that it seemed as though, lest the people should believe the embargo was a wise measure, they were about to pursue the very course which would prevent the people from receiving a conviction of its protecting policy. The course which he proposed would at least prevent this evil, by practically demonstrating to the people the effect of the Orders in Council and Decrees, which were the causes of the embargo.

Mr. SLOAN regretted that this deceptive measure was proposed, nominally contemplating a repeal of the embargo, but which would produce little or no benefit. He described the body politic to be laboring under a disorder, as an individual with a dreadful cancer. When he beheld the situation of this distressed country, he felt it his duty again to address the House, and call their attention to the remedy. Instead of the inveterate passion for war with the belligerents, which existed in a part of the House, he recommended another species of war—a war against the passions—in which, though no friend to war, he had no objection to engage as a volunteer. He agreed with the gentleman from South Carolina, that, if this bill passed, it would be just what the Court of Great Britain would wish. Mr. S. said he should proceed in his remarks without any fear of falling under the late substitute for common law, viz: tar and feathers—even though he was promised "a full suit of homespun from head to foot," by some heroes of Philadelphia, and although he was well acquainted with the power and disposition of the Executives of some States to screen offenders from punishment. Mr. S. stated various objections to the bill. If it were continued long, there would be no occasion for employing a committee to inquire what disposition should be made of the surplus money in the Treasury. He was in favor of Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, as tending to increase revenue, to promote union, and secure the happiness of the United States.

Mr. LYON also spoke against the non-intercourse system, and in favor of Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, at some length. Mr. L. was opposed to the bill, as tending to destroy revenue and navigation. He never had wanted a substitute for the embargo—one evil for another. But, rather than continue the embargo, he would take such a modification of this bill as that proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS, or even the bill itself. The former plan might be operative on Great Britain, whilst the non-intercourse would be wholly inefficient.

Mr. TAYLOR next spoke on the subject. He considered the bill upon the table not to have the merit of resistance. It was submission to trade in the track pointed out by the Orders in Council. And yet, gentlemen said they would not submit. Could gentlemen so deceive themselves as not to see that they were in fact submitting to the British Orders in Council? It was a surrender of the navigation of the world to Great Britain; it made her the carrier of our produce. That this was the effect, could not be concealed. It was wonderful that, like the ostrich, hiding its head, and supposing its whole body out of sight, gentlemen should thrust their heads into a bunch of brambles, and suppose that they hid the effect of this system. Gentlemen said that they would not legalize a trade to Great Britain under the Orders in Council, at the same time that they authorize a trade with her through the depôts, the circuitry of the voyage only tending to the benefit of Great Britain, by giving to her the carriage of our produce. Might not Sweden and Spain too want a little profit, since monopoly was the order of the day, and impose duties at the entrepôts? It was a great objection to this system, too, that it could not be maintained; and he called upon the House not to take a position like this, which their successors might be obliged to abandon with disgrace. France and England could see, as well as ourselves, that the system could not be maintained; and if they should accumulate injuries on our heads, the sinews of war being relaxed, we should not be in a situation effectually to resist. It was also throwing all advantages into the hands of Britain, whilst France was deprived of any portion—being submission to the one and opposition to the other. The exclusion from French ports, too, would be severely felt by the planters of cotton; for, besides the loss of a market for such a proportion of the crop, the glutting of the British market with so large a surplus would depreciate its value enormously. He called upon gentlemen not at this time to give a monopoly to Britain at our own expense. Desirous to do equal justice to both nations, as we would not fight them, and to do equal justice also to ourselves, and not to follow the very meanderings of the Orders in Council, he was opposed to the bill. He also objected to the phraseology of the bill: "Great Britain and France and their dependencies." Who was to judge what nations were dependencies?—whether the term included Holland, Spain, and Portugal? In relation to Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, he considered it to be one which the United States could stand by—which would increase our revenue, and have some effect also on the interests of the belligerents. It would be better than any other system proposed as a measure of resistance—would benefit our merchants, and enrich the Treasury.

Mr. GARDNER was apprehensive that the remainder of the session would be consumed in debating this bill, and that Congress would separate without removing the embargo at all. The consequence of such a procedure he deprecated. He had been in hopes, that when the embargo was repealed, if a substitute was considered necessary, it might be a measure which would benefit the country, and not be equally obnoxious with the embargo. He deprecated the effects produced by these laws on the people, and the consequence which must result from a further continuance of them. He described the New England States. He concluded his observations by reading an extract from the Inaugural Speech of the present President of the United States, the sentiments contained in which he fully approved.

Mr. GIBBON said that the bill on the table was not a favorite plan with him; but, as he should probably vote for it, he wished to rescue it from some of the imputations cast on it. Both the gentlemen from South Carolina (Mr. TAYLOR and Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS) had advocated the resolution reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, proposing this very plan. As to the argument that this bill operated to carry into effect the Orders in Council, the same objection might in the same manner be made to the embargo system, of which both those gentlemen were strenuous supporters. This argument, therefore, had no weight. He denied that we submitted to British taxation by this bill. For, supposing our produce to go to the entrepôt, the British capitalist there, purchasing it, would have to pay in Great Britain the tax on our produce destined for the Continent, instead of our paying it. In this way, therefore, we did not as directly come under the operation of the Orders in Council, as by trading direct to Great Britain. Was there any American who would be willing to resume our usual intercourse with the belligerents, while all the black catalogue of our injuries were unatoned? Surely not; and yet, this appeared to be contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. The discriminating duty would affect not the belligerents, but our own citizens; it would fall wholly upon the consumers of our imports. Sooner than trade thus, he would make a bonfire of all our produce, as the gentleman himself had before proposed in an eloquent speech. It would also be a direct submission to trade under the Orders in Council: it could not be denied. Commerce must at some time be resumed. If we were to have war, we must have some commerce. Let gentlemen point out a system by which commerce could more honorably be pursued, in the present convulsive state of the world, than it could under the proposed law; for, as it had been observed, in the course of the debate, it was easier to find fault with a system than to invent one.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS rose to rescue himself from any imputation of inconsistency. He had been extremely happy when the gentleman rose to hear him avow his intention of rescuing the bill from some of the imputations cast on it, for really it was somewhat necessary, as no reasons had yet been offered in favor of the bill. But he denied that the gentleman had succeeded in his efforts. The resolution for non-intercourse, which had been adopted at the commencement of the session, had been intended to go in aid of the embargo; it did not contemplate a repeal of the embargo as this bill did, and there was, therefore, no inconsistency in voting for that resolution and against this bill. As to the additional duty being a burden, if the law passed as it now stood and was executed, it deprived the people of the article altogether; if not executed, the premium to the smuggler would amount, in some cases, to 500 per cent. instead of 50 or 25 per cent. And unquestionably it could not be executed; for, notwithstanding the existence of actual war between Great Britain and France, and all the revenue officers and military force of both, the British market had always been supplied with French claret and Spanish wool. The gentleman from Virginia had endeavored to saddle him and his friend (Mr. TAYLOR) with inconsistency because he could not defend the bill—for it could not be defended.

Mr. BACON, however he might be prepared to urge arguments against the bill, said he could not in charity push the argument any further upon gentlemen; for no gentleman had attempted to defend it except the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GHOLSON,) who, with the characteristic gallantry of a young and active soldier, had done the best he could for it. Mr. B., however, only rose, as he had been alluded to as having an amendment in his possession, to read it to the House. Mr. B. read the following section as an amendment, which, in connexion with other sections containing details, he intended to propose if Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment should be carried:

"And be it further enacted, That the commander and crew of any merchant vessel of the United States, owned and navigated wholly by a citizen or citizens thereof, may oppose and defend against any unlawful restraint or seizure not authorized by the customary and acknowledged law of nations, which shall be attempted upon such vessel, or upon any other vessel armed and navigated as aforesaid, by the commander or crew of any foreign armed vessel, and may repel by force any assault or hostility which shall be made or committed on the part of such foreign armed vessel pursuing such attempt, and may subdue and capture the same; and may also retake any vessel owned and navigated as aforesaid, which may have been captured contrary to the customary and acknowledged laws of nations, by any foreign armed vessel."

Mr. B. observed, however, even if the bill should not be amended, he should vote for it, chiefly because the term of its duration was limited, and it might produce a little good.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON conceived that the expedient proposed was even worse than the non-intercourse bill. He rose, however, to expose the evil tendency of the amendment suggested by Mr. BACON, which contemplated giving to merchants the power to choose what attacks or seizures they chose to consider unlawful, and thus involve the United States with whom they chose. He warned gentlemen against adopting it. If war was to be made, let it be declared according to the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS's motion was then negatived, 51 to 50.

Mr. COOK renewed the motion to strike out the same part of the bill, for the purpose of inserting an amendment for arming our merchant vessels as a substitute for it. In support of his motion, Mr. C. urged a number of arguments. He was opposed to the non-intercourse system. There was no fear of the arming system driving the nation into war; for, whatever acts should be committed by our armed vessels, would be the acts of individuals and not of the nation. He had heard from parts of the Union, from people not to be interested in or injured by such a course, cries for war, war, war! At whose expense? Not at theirs, but of those on the margin of the ocean, who all wished for peace. Mr. G. again deprecated the continuance of the embargo, and expressed his concurrence in opinion with Mr. RANDOLPH, that our Administration was pursuing a course somewhat similar to what of Lord North under the British Government. The course which he proposed would promote union, and again unite a divided people. The following is the amendment which Mr. C. proposed to insert:

"And be it further enacted, That, from and after the twentieth day of May next, the merchant vessels owned wholly by a citizen or citizens of the United States, and navigated wholly by citizens of the United States, and not in any part laden with goods contraband of war, and not bound to any port or place actually blockaded and invested, and pursuing a commerce permitted by the laws of the United States, may be armed and equipped, and may defend their neutral rights, by resisting the late decrees of France and orders of Great Britain, which violate the long established rights of neutrality; and may repel by force any assault or hostility which shall be made or committed on the part of any French or British vessel of war, in pursuance of such decrees or orders; and to subdue and capture the same; and to retake any vessel of the United States, owned, navigated, laden, and bound as aforesaid, which may have been captured pursuant to such decrees or orders by any vessel sailing under French or British colors, and acting or pretending to act by or under authority of such decrees or orders from the French or British Governments."

Mr. HOLLAND thought it would be better at once to withdraw all our measures, to undo everything that had been done, than to adopt the gentleman's amendment. Of all others the system of arming our merchant vessels was the most futile that could be conceived. The merchants would again come forward and call upon the Government to take up the cause. And was the Government again to be duped by them? No; for if the Government had done wrong, in his opinion it was by going too far for the support of commerce; and their efforts were rewarded by the exclamations of the same people, who, by their cries, had induced the Government so to do. Sooner than again attempt to protect them, if they deserted their own cause, he would leave commerce and the rights of the seas to the mercy of the winds and waves. He would repeal all our discriminating duties and drawbacks, that the merchants should be hereafter precisely on the same footing as foreign merchants.

The question was then taken on Mr. COOK's motion and negatived, 50 to 45.

Mr. MARION moved to amend the bill by striking out the fourth day of March, and inserting the fifteenth day of March, as the day on which the partial repeal of the embargo should take date, and thus to place all the ports in the Union on an equality—negatived by 56 to 45.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS inquired whether the bill extending credit on revenue bonds, the continuance of which depends on the continuance of the embargo, would be continued after the passage of this law.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he could only state his individual opinion that it would be still in force.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS asked whether it had been considered expedient by the Committee on Foreign Relations that that bill should continue in force hereafter?

Mr. NICHOLAS replied that the committee had not had the subject under consideration.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill as amended.

Mr. W. ALSTON hoped that the House would not now consider the report, but take up the appropriation bill for the navy.

The House agreed, however, now to consider the report—yeas 60.

The amendment made in the Committee, by striking out all that part of the bill relating to letters of marque and reprisal, being read, was concurred in—yeas 74, nays 33, as follows:

Mr. GHOLSON moved to strike out the fourth day of March and insert the twentieth of May, as the time at which the partial repeal of the embargo should take date. He said he had taken this day in preference to the first day of June, which he had before moved, because it would give an indubitable pledge to the people that the repeal should take place, by fixing on a period anterior to the convocation of the next Congress for the commencement of the operation of the law. If the non-intercourse system was to be a substitute for the embargo, why should there be an interval from the fourth of March till the twentieth of May? It was a recession for such a time from our ground, without any interposing measure. He called upon gentlemen to show to him that it was not receding, that it was not submission.

Mr. LYON said, that the nation was tired enough of the embargo, and he hoped that they would not continue it any longer.

Mr. BOYD rose to observe to those within his hearing, that he was not willing to submit to the dictates of Great Britain or France, nor of any gentleman on the floor, and that he despised denunciations, come whence they would.

Mr. MACON moved to strike out all that part of the bill relating to the repeal of the embargo, which motion superseded that of Mr. GHOLSON.

The question was then taken on Mr. MACON's motion and decided in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 82, as follows:

The question recurring on Mr. GHOLSON'S motion, a division of the question was called for, so as to take the question first on striking out the words, "fourth of March."

Messrs. MASON, J. G. JACKSON, and TROUP, advocated a protraction of the date. It would be the greatest injustice to the ports at a distance from the seat of Government, not to give notice of the passage of the law, and was in the face of the provision of the Constitution, which required equal privileges to every port. Messrs. MASTERS, RANDOLPH, and QUINCY, contended for an early or immediate repeal, on the ground that the embargo was originally laid without notice: that if our produce was exported, it ought to be exported immediately; and that the people of Canada, or the smugglers of Amelia island or elsewhere, should not have an opportunity to take advantage of the honest part of our citizens.

The question on striking out was negatived, yeas 47, nays 66, as follows:

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to strike out that part of the bill, giving the President power to raise the embargo whenever the decrees of the belligerents are so modified as to render the commerce of the United States sufficiently safe; to make way for the amendment, which he yesterday offered, authorizing the President to issue letters of marque and reprisal against the Power retaining in force orders and decrees whenever the other shall revoke its edicts. He observed that there could be no doubt that gentlemen would agree to strike out this clause, whether they agree to insert the substitute or not; for almost every member who had voted for striking out the clause relating to letters of marque and reprisal, had assigned as one great reason that it gave the President a Legislative power, by making him judge of the events which might call into action that provision of the law. The same objection certainly attached to that part of the section which he now proposed to strike out.

The following is Mr. J.'s amendment: To strike out, after the words, "And be it further enacted," in the first line of the eleventh section, as amended by the House, the following words:

"That the President of the United States be and he hereby is authorized, in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation: after which the trade of the United States suspended by this act, and by the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed with the nation so doing."

And to insert, in lieu thereof, the words following, to wit:

"That in case either Great Britain or France shall revoke her edicts alleged to have been made in retaliation of the edicts of the other Powers, and violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States, the operation of this act, and also of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, shall cease in relation to the nation so revoking, at the expiration of twenty days, to be computed from the date of the notice of such revocation to be given by Proclamation of the President of the United States; and letters of marque and reprisal shall, at the same time, be issued against the nation which shall continue in force its unlawful edicts, violating the lawful commerce and neutral rights of the United States."

The House adjourned, 60 to 35, without taking a question.

SATURDAY, February 25.

On motion of Mr. WILLIS ALSTON it was agreed that the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," together with the amendments agreed and proposed thereto, do lie on the table.

H. OF R.

NAVY AND ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for amending the acts establishing the War and Naval Departments, and making an appropriation for the support of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year 1809.

Amongst other appropriations proposed by the bill is one for fortifications, in addition to the sum already appropriated at this session. Mr. ALSTON proposed to appropriate one million of dollars. It was observed by Mr. BLOUNT that all the money had been already appropriated which was required by the Department of War. The appropriation was supported by Messrs. W. ALSTON, VAN CORTLANDT, COOK, MASTERS, TROUP, NICHOLAS, and SMILIE, and opposed by Messrs. BLOUNT, STANFORD, BOYD, and D. R. WILLIAMS.

The arguments in favor of this appropriation were the importance of permanent defence; the defenceless state of many ports, particularly of New York, which was the pride and boast of the State; the probability of war, which appeared now only to be delayed on our part from the defenceless state of the seaports; that if war was now to take place, the people of the cities must fly to the mountains; that it might be sufficient to complete them all, and would be the last appropriation asked for.

The arguments against it were: that as much had been appropriated as could be expended with ordinary exertions; that the House appeared to be taking a course of recession, instead of resistance, and there was, therefore, no extraordinary appropriation for fortifications against attack necessary; that there were about 700,000 dollars liable to expenditure for this object previous to the next session of Congress; that even were twenty millions appropriated, there was no evidence that New York could be sufficiently fortified, or that gentlemen would be satisfied; that war was not delayed by the defenceless state of the seaports, but by the indisposition of mercantile men to go to war against foreign taxation on the produce of the soil—if it had been on ships or the shipping interest they would have been clamorous for war.

The Committee agreed to insert one million of dollars, by a majority of eleven votes. The bill being gone through, the Committee rose and reported it.

The question on the appropriation of one million of dollars for fortifications was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 45, as follows:

The appropriation of $445,000 for repairing the frigates was objected to by Mr. MACON, but concurred in—ayes 63.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to amend the section appropriating for fortifications, by striking out the words "in addition to," and inserting "including," so as to include in the appropriation the sum of $450,000 already appropriated, instead of adding one million to that sum. He afterwards withdrew this motion, and moved an amendment, so as to authorize the contemplated line of blocks and chains across the harbor of New York. He did this to ascertain the sense of the House on this point, for he should have the same objection to this appropriation if that were the object of it. A sufficient number of members not rising to give the yeas and nays on this question, Mr. BLOUNT withdrew the motion and renewed his former motion; which was negatived—yeas 49, nays 62, as follows:

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON withdrew his motion of yesterday with a view to offer another in place of it, which looked more like a manly stand. He said that the amendment proposed was no offer made to either Power to take sides with the other. There was nothing like threat in the proposition, any more than in the resolutions submitted to the House some time since. It would be a warning to the merchants under what peril they would go out, which they would not otherwise conceive, reposing in false security on this bill. He would not go precipitately into war, for he had the best reason to believe that Great Britain would be disposed to listen to the dictates of justice towards us, but if she did not, he was for immediate war. The amendment now proposed by Mr. JACKSON is as follows:

“Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That after demand made and refused on the part of His Britannic Majesty to withdraw his decrees and orders infringing the local commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall be authorized and required to employ such a portion of the volunteer militia of the United States, not exceeding — thousand, and of the regular troops, as may be necessary to take possession of the territories of His Britannic Majesty, bordering on the United States, and to hold the same, and to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels which are or shall be employed in the service of the United States to subdue, seize, and take any armed or unarmed British vessel on the high seas or elsewhere; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, being British property, shall be brought within some port of the United States, and shall be duly proceeded against and condemned, as forfeited, and shall accrue and be distributed as by law is or shall be provided respecting the captures which shall be made by the public armed vessels of the United States.

“Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, after demand and refusal as aforesaid, to grant to the owners of private armed vessels of the United States who shall make application therefor, special commissions, in the form which he shall direct, and under the seal of the United States; and such private armed vessels, when duly commissioned as aforesaid, shall have the same license and authority for the subduing, seizing, and capturing any armed or unarmed British vessel, and for the recapture of the vessels, goods, and effects of the United States, as the public armed vessels of the United States may by law have; and shall be, in like manner, subject to such instructions as shall be ordered by the President of the United States for the regulation of their conduct. And the commissions which shall be granted, shall be revocable at the pleasure of the President of the United States.

“Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That after demand made, and refusal on the part of the Emperor of France to withdraw his decrees and orders infringing the lawful commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall be authorized and required to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels, which are or shall be employed in the service of the United States, to subdue, seize, and take any armed or unarmed French vessel on the high seas, or elsewhere, and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, being French property, shall be brought within some port of the United States, and shall be duly proceeded against and condemned as directed, and shall accrue and be distributed as by law is or shall be provided respecting the capture which shall be made by the public armed vessels of the United States.

“Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, after demand made and refusal aforesaid, to grant to the owners of private armed ships and vessels of the United States who shall make application therefor, special commissions in the form which he shall direct, and under the seal of the United States; and such private armed vessel, when duly commissioned as aforesaid, shall have the same license and authority for the subduing, seizing, and capturing any armed or unarmed French vessel, and for the recapture of the vessels, goods, and effects of the people of the United States, as the public armed vessels of the United States may by law have, and shall be in like manner subject to such instructions as shall be ordered by the President of the United States for the regulation of their conduct; and the commissions which shall be granted as aforesaid shall be revocable at the pleasure of the President of the United States.”

Mr. EPPES said that this was a proposition which he hoped might unite all parties in the House. It authorized the President to demand the recall of the injurious acts of the belligerents, and on a refusal it declared that we would use all the force which we possess against the decrees and orders, which, under whatever aspect they could be viewed, were calculated to produce total ruin to all the great interests of the country. The bill under consideration, he feared, would afford no relief to the Southern country—their produce would still be lying on their hands. And indeed, take three dollars a hundred from the price of tobacco, (as the Orders in Council do,) and the cultivation of it is out of the question. If we allowed Great Britain to say that we shall not trade without coming and paying her a tax, where would be the limit to her extortion? If we were such dastardly wretches as to permit her to tax at will the great staples of the country, could it be supposed that she would ever allow us hereafter even to be the carriers of our own produce? Whatever present relief the bill might afford to the shipping interest, ruin would ultimately fall on every man who had anything at stake in the country. If we took no means to resist taxation he should be compelled to believe that what had been said was correct: that "the majority cannot be kicked into a war." And if some such measure as that proposed was not adopted, the assertion would stand as a damnable record to future ages. If we should hereafter be refractory, a foreign nation ought therefore not to send troops but men armed with whips to scourge us into obedience. He concluded by saying that he hoped the House would agree to postpone the consideration of the subject until Monday, that the amendments might be printed.

Mr. BASSETT also expressed his approbation of the proposition. There must be one of two intentions in the House, either to glide smoothly down the current of submission or take a higher ground, which must be war. Could it be believed that, if Great Britain maintained her system of excluding our commerce from the ocean, or subjecting it to heavy taxation, war was not inevitable? No man could conceal this fact from himself or from the nation.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS wished to offer an amendment to the amendment, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the House on the subject of fighting. For this purpose he moved so to amend the bill as to authorize the President forthwith to use the public force, &c.

Mr. MASTERS opposed the postponement; he hoped the business would be finally concluded to-night.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on Mr. EPPES's motion for the postponement of the further consideration of the subject till Monday, there were for it 60, against it 60, as follows:

NAYS—Ezekiel Bacon, Joseph Barker, John Blake, junior, Adam Boyd, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin

The House being equally divided, the SPEAKER decided in the negative.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON wished to postpone the consideration of this amendment, so as not to delay the progress of the bill. The SPEAKER declared that a part of a subject before the House could not be postponed.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS rejoiced in the opportunity of registering his vote for war. He observed that the embargo must be considered as perfectly failing except as the precursor of war. We had a much greater hold now on the belligerents than we should ever have again. We had changed the balance of the ledger completely during the embargo. They had before an immense property of ours in their hands; we now had of theirs. Permit the embargo to be removed, and they would again have the same hold on us, and we should not go to war next session. Rather than give them notice that we meant to make war upon them at a certain time, he would seize all their citizens and set them to work on our fortifications—act the Algerine to them. Their Governments played the Algerine on us, and would not we do the same to them? He would seize everything but the funds. If the House could abandon our rights in this manner, when every square foot of our ground was laid under contribution, they deserved to be scoffed at by the world.

Mr. GARDENIER declared the amendment offered by Mr. J. G. JACKSON, to be unconstitutional; because the power of declaring war belonged to Congress, and was a power which they could not delegate.

The question being about to be put on Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, a division of the question was called for, so as to take it first on striking out.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed, that he should vote for striking out, to destroy the hypothetical character of the proposition. If we were to have war at all, it ought to be direct.

Mr. EPPES observed that the proposition of Mr. JACKSON was not contingent, but complete. It authorized the President to say to each nation, "withdraw your orders or decrees." If not, it was war, and immediate war. Means for it were at hand; and nothing was wanting but spirit on the part of the House to use them.

Mr. LYON was in favor of striking out. If we were to have war, he wanted to have the first blow.

The question on striking out a part of Mr. JACKSON's motion, to make way for Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment was negatived—yeas 36, nays 67, as follows:

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL moved an adjournment; which was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 70, as follows:

Mr. JACKSON renewed his motion for postponement—for it, 61; against it, 61. Another count being called—for it, 64; against it, 62. Another count being called for, tellers were named by the Speaker, who reported that there were—for it, 63; against it, 63.

Mr. BURWELL moved that the bill lie on the table—for it 64, against it 63.

The SPEAKER observed, that the subject had been so long under debate, and so many questions had been taken on it, that he felt compelled, by duty, to vote in the negative. So the motion was lost—yeas 64, nays 64, as follows:

The question was then stated from the Chair, that the House do agree to the second section contained in the amendment of Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON, to be inserted as the twentieth section of the bill: Whereupon, Mr. JACKSON withdrew from the table so much of the said amendment as is contained in the second, third, and fourth sections thereof, proposed to be the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second, of the bill.

A motion was made by Mr. BLOUNT farther to amend the bill, by inserting a new section next after the eighteenth section, as the nineteenth section of the bill, in the words following, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That, if any vessel rightfully bearing the flag of the United States, regularly cleared out, according to law, and owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall, upon the high seas, engaged in a lawful commerce, be captured under authority of Great Britain or France, in a manner not warranted by the acknowledged laws of nations, such capture shall be considered an unequivocal act of war, against the United States, and the President of the United States, upon the receipt of satisfactory proof of that fact, shall cause letters of marque and reprisal to be forthwith issued against the nation or nations by virtue of whose orders, edicts, or decrees, such capture shall have been committed, subject to the restrictions and conditions which were contained in the act passed upon the ninth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce of the United States.'

And on the question that the House do agree to the said proposed amendment, it passed in the negative—yeas 49, nays 73, as follows:

A motion was then made by Mr. MACON, farther to amend the bill, by striking out in the eleventh section, after the words "United States," the following words:

"Be, and he hereby is, authorized, in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation; after which the trade of the United States, suspended by this act, and by the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed, with the nation so doing; and to cause to be issued, under suitable pledges and precautions, letters of marque and reprisal against the nation thereafter continuing in force its unlawful edicts against the commerce of the United States: Provided, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been previously incurred by virtue of this, or any other act, the operation of which shall so cease and determine, shall be recovered and distributed in like manner, as if the same had continued in full force and virtue; and vessels bound thereafter to any foreign port or place with which commercial intercourse shall by virtue of this section be again permitted, shall give bond to the United States, with approved security, in double the value of the vessel and cargo, that they shall not proceed to any foreign port, nor trade with any country other than those with which commercial intercourse shall have been or may be permitted by this act."

And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative—ayes 24.

A motion was made by Mr. J. G. JACKSON, to amend the eleventh section of the bill, by striking out, in the second line thereof, the words, "so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease

On the question that the House do agree to the second member of the said amendment, to insert the word "fifteenth," in lieu of the word "fourth," so stricken out, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 30, as follows:

A motion being then made by Mr. RANDOLPH further to amend the said twelfth section of the bill, by striking out immediately after the word "March," in the fourth line, the word "next," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "one thousand eight hundred and nine," the said proposition of amendment was superseded by a motion made by Mr. MACON, further to amend the said twelfth section, by striking out in the third and fourth lines thereof, as amended by the House, the words, "fifteenth day of March," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words, "first day of September:" And on the question that the House do agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. MACON, it passed in the negative.

The question then recurred on the amendment moved by Mr. RANDOLPH; and the question being taken that the House do agree to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. WHEATON further to amend the bill by striking out, in the second and third lines of the nineteenth section, the following words, "and that the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed, from and after the end of the next session of Congress:" And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON further to amend the bill, by striking out, in the first line of the said nineteenth section, the words, "end of the next session of Congress:" And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative. And the bill being further amended, it was ordered that the amendments agreed to be engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read the third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, February 27.

On motion of Mr. MCCREERY,
Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting, by law, for a limited time, the exportation of arms, ammunition, canvass, and cordage; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Messrs. MCCREERY, QUINCY, and MUMFORD, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. J. K. SMITH, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill to extend to Amos Whittemore and William Whittemore, jun., the patent right to a machine for manufacturing cotton and wool cards; which was read twice. Whereupon, the House proceeded to the consideration thereof; and the blank therein being filled up at the Clerk's table, with the word "fourteen," it was ordered that the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to alter and establish certain post roads; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MCCREERY reported a bill prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms, ammunition, canvass, cordage, and hemp, and for encouraging the importation thereof.—Read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

[This bill prohibits the exportation from the United States, or any territories thereof, of any cannon, muskets, pistols, bayonets, swords, cutlas-

It also provides, that all brass cannon, muskets and firelocks, with bayonets suited to the same, pistols, swords, and cutlasses, which shall be imported into the United States from any foreign country, within the term of one year from and after the passing of this act, be free of duty.]

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred, on the ninth ultimo, a petition of Beniot Schweighauser, by John Mason, his attorney, and sundry documents accompanying the same, presented a bill to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the account of the legal representatives of John Daniel Schweighauser; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On a motion made by Mr. BLOUNT, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President as relates to the Military and Naval Establishments, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the bounty now allowed by law to recruits in the military service.

The question was taken that the House do agree to the proposed resolution, and it passed in the negative.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a statement of the militia of the United States, according to the latest returns received by the Department of War. The Message was read, and, together with the return transmitted therewith.—Laid on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of Frederick county, in the State of Maryland, stating their disapprobation of the edicts and decrees issued against the commercial intercourse and neutral rights of the United States by certain belligerent Powers; and pledging themselves to support, with their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor, all such measures as the wisdom of Congress may adopt for the safety and prosperity of the Union.—Laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with his report on the petition of Daniel Jennings, collector of the internal revenue of the United States in the District of Ohio, referred to him by order of the House, on the fourteenth of April last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and nine, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of three members on their part, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed a committee on the part of this House, shall have the application of the money appropriated by the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a library," passed the twenty-first of February, one thousand eight hundred and six; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

MASSACHUSETTS MEMORIAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial received from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, complaining of the measures of the Government, particularly of the embargo laws, and declaring their opinion that the last supplementary embargo law is unconstitutional. On motion of Mr. FISK it was referred to a select committee—ayes 83. The reason which he assigned for the motion was, that the memorial, coming from a respectable State, deserved a particular consideration.

Mr. QUINCY moved that the memorial be printed. On this motion some debate took place. Mr. Q. and other gentlemen observed, that they only wished the same respect to be paid by the House to this memorial as was paid to the resolutions of Pennsylvania and North Carolina.

Mr. DURELL and others, observed that this memorial was committed to a committee, and those resolutions were not; and, therefore, was treated with more attention.

Mr. NEWTON read the answer of the Legislature of Massachusetts to the Virginia resolutions on the subject of the alien and sedition laws, to show how the sentiments of a Federal Legislature then were warped by a Federal Legislature now, to answer party purposes. This answer denies wholly the right of any State to contravert the laws of the General Government, or to declare them unconstitutional.

Mr. QUINCY said that the right of a Legislature to comment on the measures of the Government could not be questioned, when it was secured by the Constitution to every individual; and that the sentiments contained in the memorial just presented were not inconsistent with those expressed in the paper read by Mr. NEWTON.

Mr. TROUP said he would be willing to treat this memorial with respect, but not with peculiar respect. He cited the instance in which a memorial of the Legislature of Georgia on the subject of a proposed infraction of her territorial rights by the United States was neither referred or printed.

Mr. LIVERYMORE denied that the Legislature of Massachusetts had expressed any disorganizing sentiments; they only supported the rights of the States, strengthening instead of weakening the whole machine by preserving a part in its proper operation.

Mr. BACON observed that he should enrol his nay in the vote for printing, without the least fear of being accused of disrespect for the State that he represented—for, however he might respect the Legislature or the State, he could not show his respect for it by giving its memorial a course different from that pursued in relation to petitions or memorials from other portions of the people; and it was already referred to a respectable committee of the House.

Mr. NEWTON observed, that when the committee reported on the memorial, he should be willing to print the memorial and report on it; at the same time he should move to print the answer of the same Legislature to the Virginia resolutions on the subject of the alien and sedition laws, and then it would be the Legislature of Massachusetts castigating the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. QUINCY said that this memorial contained the opinion of a large commercial State, and was entitled, therefore, to the attention of the House. If not printed now, a report would probably not be made on it this session, and it would not be printed.

Mr. HOLLAND observed, that as to its containing information, there was not a new idea contained in the memorial; not one which the gentleman himself had not favored the House with during the session, and some of them in the very words of the gentleman himself.

Mr. ROWAN conceived that the remonstrance of a State was entitled to no particular preference over that of any other memorial from any particular portion of the people; and that the proper course would be to let the remonstrance lie on the table, as the subject of it was now under consideration. If an answer was to be given to it, the Legislature might answer that answer, and there would be no end to the correspondence. Mr. R. moved to reconsider the vote for the reference to a select committee.

Mr. QUINCY withdrew his motion for printing, to permit the question to be taken on reconsidering the vote for reference.

Messrs. SAWYER, MAOON, and TAYLOR, advocated reconsideration. The vote was reconsidered—ayes 84.

Mr. FISK again supported his motion. He wished not, by a silent disposition of the memorial, to sanction its statements, wholly erroneous, or treat it with contempt.

Mr. ROWAN said that he had no idea of doing either; but an answer could only produce irritation, which he was desirous to avoid. It would be true magnanimity, even if the House believed it not to be correct, to pass it over in silence.

The motion to commit was negatived—ayes 20.

Mr. QUINCY renewed his motion that the remonstrance be printed. Negatived—noes 53.

NON-INTERCOURSE.

The bill from the Senate for interdicting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, was read the third time. And, on the question, "Shall the bill pass as amended?"

Mr. MILNOR said that the passage of this bill would be a novelty in legislation, for he believed it had not a friend in the House. He was at a loss what to think of it. He said he should be obliged to gentlemen who were in favor of the bill to explain to him how much of the embargo was to be retained by it, and how much to be removed.

Mr. M. thought that the offensive part of the embargo laws was to be retained by it. The bill was objectionable, too, because it enacted as a substitute for the embargo, a non-intercourse system, which was not to commence until two days previous to the next session of Congress, and was to expire with that session. It would scarcely have gone into operation before it would cease by the limitation of the law. He could not conceive for what purpose the non-intercourse system was to be enacted, if it was to have an end so soon. He had no doubt that those gentlemen who voted for this measure now, and who were to be in the next Congress, would be then told that they had by that vote pledged themselves not to suffer the embargo to be removed without an efficient substitute. For one, he said he could not consent to take this measure in lieu of the embargo, because it was inefficient for the purposes of coercion; because it could not be carried into execution; because it would prevent our usual intercourse without excluding foreign goods, as they would be smuggled in; because some of the manufactures of Great Britain had become necessary to us by habit, and could not be procured elsewhere now. He did not view this system as a permanent measure. He believed that the gentlemen of this House generally perceived and knew that this measure could have but little operation. It seemed as if the House must have something to satisfy themselves that they were not taking off the embargo without some efficient measure; it was but a rattle to please children. In short, the bill under consideration was so very objectionable, the provisions so obscure and extremely difficult to understand, our citizens would be so much at a loss under it to know what were their rights and what were not, that he could not vote for the bill. If gentlemen would come forward and explain the bill, convince him that the obnoxious parts of the embargo laws were to be repealed by it, he might be induced to vote for it. As it was, he must vote against it.

Mr. DAWSON said, that at the last session, when he had given a vote in favor of the embargo law, he had been well aware that it would subject our citizens to many and great inconveniences; that all would be called on to sacrifice to the public good. Relying on the virtue and patriotism of this people, he had believed it would be borne with patience, from a conviction that it was adopted from necessity, produced by the injuries done to us by other nations, and calculated to secure the independence of the country. Under this impression he said he had voted for the measure; and, at the same time that he gave that vote, he had made a solemn pledge to himself, his country, and his God, that he never would revoke it till we took some measure to defend our rights. Such, in his opinion, the bill now before the House was not. He considered it a weak, wretched expedient, and he could not bring himself to vote for it; although, in voting against it, he regretted differing in opinion with many whom he esteemed, and was as much disposed to relieve our citizens as any man could be.

Mr. COOK said, in voting for the bill, he should merely take it as a choice of evils.

Mr. RANDOLPH spoke near an hour in opposition to the bill. He objected to the principle as well as the details of the bill.

Mr. SLOAN declared that his friends from Pennsylvania and Virginia, (Messrs. MILNOR and RANDOLPH,) could not detest the bill more than he did; and yet he should vote for it for this reason, that the people, as well as himself, were so heartily tired of the embargo that they would be glad to get anything else in place of it. Another reason was, that it contained a limitation to the embargo laws, and he hoped that the embargo would expire at the time limited, never again to be re-excited; that it would be dead, dead, dead.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided—yeas 81, nays 40, as follows:

TUESDAY, February 28.

On a motion, made by Mr. DANA, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is proper to make provision, by law, to allow merchant vessels of the United States to be armed for defence in voyages to ports of Europe, or the West Indies, or Atlantic coast of America, and, accordingly, to furnish the documentary evidence which may be proper, in any such case, to manifest the defensive character of the armament allowed, and, at the same time, by law to require securities for the vessels respectively, that they will not proceed to any port known to be actually blockaded, nor carry articles contraband of war to the dominions of a belligerent Power, nor violate the laws or treaties of the United States, or the rules of public law by them acknowledged, but will observe the instructions which may be given by the President of the United States for preventing all such violations, and that due satisfaction shall be made for all damages and injuries, if any should be committed contrary to the tenor thereof:

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House then proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the Collector of Baltimore, on certain conditions, to register anew the ship Thomas. Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. HOLLAND that the further consideration thereof be postponed indefinitely. And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative. The bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to extend to Amos Whittemore and William Whittemore, junior, the patent right to a machine for manufacturing cotton and wool cards, was read the third time, and then passed—55 to 18.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution received from the Senate, on the twenty-seventh instant, for the appointment of a Joint Committee of the two Houses, for the purpose expressed in an act passed the twenty-first of February, one thousand eight hundred and six, entitled "An act making a further appropriation for the support of a library." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said resolution; and that Messrs. NICHOLAS, SAY, and DANA, be appointed a committee on the part of this House pursuant thereto.

SHIP THOMAS.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the sixteenth of November last, a petition of the President and Directors of the Maine Bank, at Portland, in the District of Maine, presented, according to order, a bill to authorize the Collector of Baltimore, on certain conditions, to register anew the ship Thomas; which was read twice. INVALID PENSIONERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning invalid pensioners.

A motion was made by Mr. HOLMES to strike out the fourth section of the bill, which authorizes the payment of the aggregate amount of the arrearages of pensions, from the time their disability was incurred, to all persons entitled to pensions.—Carried.

A motion was made by Mr. MACON, and carried, to strike out of the bill the third section, which allows pensions to all persons in any manner incurring disability during the Revolutionary war, whether by voluntary expeditions, or otherwise.

A motion was made by Mr. BLACKLEDGE to insert an amendment providing for the payment to all persons placed on the pension list since the first of January, 1796, of the aggregate amount of arrearages for ten years preceding.—Negatived.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill as amended.

The House concurred in striking out the third section, 47 to 30.

Mr. RANDOLPH, who originally moved the fourth section, called for the yeas and nays on concurrence with the Committee in striking out the section.

Mr. ROWAN spoke at length in support of the section, which he conceived to be imperiously called for, both by justice and policy. The money due to our soldiers was a just debt, to which it did not become the Government to plead the statute of limitation.

Mr. RANDOLPH also spoke at large in explanation of his reasons for offering the amendment, and in support of it. The claims of the persons placed on the pension list had been rigidly scrutinized, and payment of them could not in justice be refused, unless from inability of the Government to pay them.

The question on concurrence was decided in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 32, as follows:

So the section was struck out.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE renewed the motion which he made in Committee of the Whole, and spoke at length in support of it.

The motion was negatived by yeas and nays, by a large majority.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and subsequently passed, nem. con.

PRESIDENT'S HOUSE.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making further provision for the accommodation of the household of the President of the United States. HEMP, CORDAGE, ARMS, &c.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill prohibiting for a limited time the exportation of arms, ammunition, canvass, cordage, and hemp, and for encouraging the importation thereof.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the first section of the bill, which motion he supported on the ground of its inexpediency, as tending to throw a damp on the culture of hemp in the country, and on the ground of its unconstitutionality—the Constitution not having expressly delegated to Congress the power of prohibiting exports, and having prohibited Congress from taxing them, thereby impliedly denying Congress the power to prohibit exportation.

Mr. McCREEVY stated, in support of the bill, that the United States were in the habit of importing annually twelve millions of pounds of hemp, and great quantities of canvass, a great part of which was bought up to export for the British Navy; and, from the frequency of this practice, it was expected that there would not be sufficient left in the country for home consumption.

Messrs. QUINCY, ELY, LYON, and ROWAN, opposed the bill, observing that, as to prohibiting the export of arms, there could be no occasion for that part of the bill, as arms of every kind bore now a higher price in this country than elsewhere; that the passage of the bill would depress the culture of hemp as well as manufacture of cordage; that the United States already had a sufficiency of naval stores; that a restriction of this kind would only enable the merchant to purchase these articles at a lower price, at the expense of the growers of hemp, and manufacturers.

Mr. SLOAN was opposed to the bill because he disliked the general principle of restricting trade. The single reason that the bill partook somewhat of the nature of a partial embargo, was sufficient to induce him to reject it.

The first section was then struck out—yeas 54, nays 26.

The Committee rose and reported their disagreement to the House, who concurred in it—yeas 54.

Mr. VAN HORN wished to retain the last section of the bill, for importing arms free of duty.

Mr. QUINCY observed that more could be manufactured in the United States than could possibly be wanted.

The whole bill was then negatived.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making further provision for the Corps of Engineers," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole this day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes. The bill was reported with two amendments thereto; which were twice read, and, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

On motion of Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON,

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed, on the thirty-first of January last, a bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the time for making payment for the public lands of the United States," be discharged from proceeding therein; and that the said bill be taken up for consideration in the House.

The House, accordingly, proceeded to consider the bill at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, the bill was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill supplemental to the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Jacob Barnitz went through a Committee of the Whole, was reported to the House, and ordered to a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act farther to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, 52 to 24, on the bill from the Senate, making further appropriations for completing the two wings of the Capitol, in the City of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that he wished to withhold any appropriation but for the accommodation of the Senate. Such extravagance and waste had characterized the progress in the buildings, that, as long as the present Superintendent remained in office, he would not vote a cent further appropriation. He moved to strike out every item in the bill but that for the accommodation of the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS objected to the motion. He called for the reading of the report of the Surveyor of Public Buildings on the subject.

Messrs. ALSTON, SLOAN, SMILIE, and STANFORD, advocated the motion, and Messrs. MACON, NELSON, J. G. JACKSON, and LYON, opposed it on the ground that the buildings, having been commenced, ought to be finished.

for the Representatives' Chamber, was negatived, 44 to 31.

The Committee then refused to strike out any part of the bill.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

The bill being about to be read a third time, Mr. CULPEPER moved that the bill be recommitted for the purpose of striking out the items before moved to be stricken out. Motion negatived, ayes 9.

The bill was then read a third time and passed—yeas 67, nays 21, as follows:

COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 40 to 31, on the bill supplementary to an act for establishing the Courts of the United States. [The bill proposes an alteration in the time or manner of holding the courts of South Carolina.]

Mr. LOVE proposed an amendment to the bill, declaring that the laws of the several States shall be the rules of proceeding in all judicial proceedings in the Courts of the United States, provided that it shall not affect any process on behalf of the United States.

Messrs. TAYLOR and KELLY objected to the introduction of a general provision, embracing such an important principle, into a law for a special purpose—a principle, too, the propriety of which was at least questionable.

Mr. LOVE advocated his motion. He adverted to the laws passed in different States for suspending executions for a time. He did not express an opinion on the principle of suspension; but whatever might be his opinion of the principle, he wished it to be extended to the Federal Courts in those States, for the sake of equality and consistency in judicial proceedings.

Mr. LOVE's motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

The Committee rose and reported the bill.

Mr. LOVE renewed the motion which he made in Committee.

Mr. GHOLSON advocated the motion at some length, and went into an examination of the laws of the United States on the subject of judicial process and of the decisions under them, particularly of a late decision of the Chief Justice, that the law of a State (Virginia) for suspending executions should not be the rule of proceeding for a Federal Court, whilst all other State laws not contravening the laws or Constitution of the United States were binding on it.

Mr. DANA moved to strike out the provision excepting from the operation of the amendment all process in behalf of the United States.—Ayes 30, noes 50.

Mr. M. CLAY conceived the decision of the judge mentioned by Mr. GHOLSON to have been erroneous; and all that was asked was that the decision should be reversed by an explanation of the meaning of the law of the United States; that a judge should not have it in his power to put up the law with one hand and put it down with the other. Under this decision, a merchant to whom money was due in the State in which he resided, had nothing to do but to assign the debt to some one in a neighboring State, and there bring suit on it, and evade the law of the State. The foreigner too had advantages over the citizen of a State, as he could recover debts and obtain execution on the judgment, when the citizen was denied the right.

Mr. GARDENIER offered an amendment to Mr. LOVE's motion, to this effect: "that no citizen of one State which had passed no law for suspending executions should be prevented from obtaining money in a State where such laws had been passed." For it would be unjust to enable the citizens of one State (as Virginia) to refuse payment while their neighbors in another State (as Massachusetts) were compelled to make payment.

Mr. ROWAN opposed Mr. LOVE's amendment, as going to approve the different laws on the subject of suspension of six or seven different States. He thought there was no occasion for the amendment; for by it the House would sweep from the judicial code the laws already existing on this subject—and he deprecated all innovations of the judicial system, where the necessity for amendment was not decidedly apparent.

Mr. GARDENIER's motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. LOVE's motion was then negatived—yeas 25, nays 67, as follows:

No other amendment being offered to the bill, it was ordered that the amendments agreed to, be engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read the third time this day. The bill was subsequently passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, 38 to 30, on the bill for incorporating a company for making a turnpike road from Georgetown to Alexandria. After a long time spent in committee in discussing the details of the bill, about 6 o'clock, after being in session eight hours, a quorum not being present, the Committee was dissolved; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter signed "JAMES MADISON," stating, that he proposes to take the oath which the Constitution prescribes to the President of the United States, before he enters on the execution of his office, on Saturday, the fourth instant, at twelve o'clock, in the Representatives' Chamber.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. Also, the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and nine," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ALEXANDRIA TURNPIKE,

The House proceeded to take into consideration the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's Causeway to Alexandria." Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. TALLMADGE, that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed indefinitely: And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, that the bill be recommitted to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House: And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 35, nays 57, as follows:

Sundry other propositions of amendment to the bill were then moved by Mr. Lewis and Mr. MACON, which being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House. No other amendment being offered, it was ordered that the said bill be read the third time to-day.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of William Hastings; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole this day.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and nine:" Whereupon, the first of the said amendments, to strike out from the word "assembled," in the second line of the first section, to the word "that," in the first line of the sixth section, being read as contained in the words following, to wit:

"That all warrants drawn by either of the Secretaries of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy, upon the Treasurer of the United States, shall specify the particular appropriation or appropriations, to which the same should be charged: The moneys paid by virtue of such warrants shall, in conformity therewith, be charged to such appropriation or appropriations, in the books kept in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in the case of warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury; and, in the books of the Accountants of the War or Navy Department, respectively, in the case of warrants drawn by the Secretary of War, or by the Secretary of the Navy; and the officers, agents, or other persons, who may be receivers of public moneys, shall render distinct accounts of the application of such moneys, according to the appropriation or appropriations under which the same shall have been drawn; nor shall any credit be allowed to either of them except for expenses authorized by law, and for the amount appropriated for the same: Provided, nevertheless, That, during the recess of Congress, the President of the United States may, and he is hereby authorized, on the application of the Secretary of the proper Department, and not otherwise, direct, if in his opinion necessary for the public service, that a portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that Department, be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same Department; in which case, a special account of the moneys thus transferred, and of their application, shall be laid before Congress during the first week of their next ensuing session.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in every case where in his opinion farther delays would be injurious to the United States, and he is hereby authorized, to direct the Auditor of the Treasury, and the Accountants of the War and Navy Departments, at any time, forthwith to audit and settle any particular account which the said officers may be respectively authorized to audit and settle, and to report such settlement for his revision and final decision. And the said Comptroller shall also lay an annual statement before Congress, of the accounts in either of the Treasury, War, or Navy Departments, which may have remained more than three years unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years, together with a statement of the causes which have prevented the settlement of the accounts, or the recovery of the balances, due to the United States.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That exclusively of the Purveyor of Public Supplies, Paymasters of the Army, Purser of the Navy, Military Agents, and other officers already authorized by law, no other permanent agents shall be appointed either for the purpose of making contracts, or for the purchase of supplies in any other manner, or for the disbursement of moneys for the use of the Military Establishment, or of the Navy of the United States, but such as shall be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the President may, and he is hereby authorized, in the recess of the Senate, to appoint all or any of such agents, which appointments shall be submitted to the Senate at the next session, for their advice and consent; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, until otherwise provided by law, to fix the number and compensations of such agents: Provided, however, That their number shall not exceed eight in the whole: And provided, also, That the compensation allowed to either shall not exceed one per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor in any instance the compensation allowed by law to the Purveyor of Public Supplies.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every such agent as may be appointed by virtue of the next preceding section, and every Purser of the Navy shall give bond, with one or more sufficient sureties, in such sums as the President of the United States may direct, for the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in him, and the Paymaster of the Army, the Military Agents, the Purveyor of Public Supplies, the Purser of the Navy, and the agents appointed by virtue of the preceding section shall, whenever practicable, keep the public moneys in their hands in some incorporated banks to be designated for that purpose by the President of the United States, and shall make monthly returns in such form as may be prescribed by the Treasury Department, of the moneys received and expended during the preceding month, and of the unexpended balance in their hands.

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services which are or may, according to law, be made by, or under the direction of either the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, shall be made either by open purchase, or by previously advertising for proposals respecting the same, and shall be previously authorized or subsequently approved by the President of the United States: And an annual statement of all such contracts and purchases, and also

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted."

The question was taken that the House do agree to the said first amendment of the Senate to the bill, and it passed in the negative—yeas 3, nays 73, as follows:

The fourth amendment of the Senate, affecting the title of the bill so as to read, "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and nine," was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

DISBURSEMENT OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

The bill from the Senate further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the War and Navy Departments, having been read a first time,

Mr. W. ALSTON moved that it be rejected: The bill which had been sent from this House contained nearly the same provisions as this, but much more effectual. When the appropriations for the ensuing year had been under consideration before the Committee of Ways and Means, they had unanimously agreed that it would be proper to add to the bill regulations to guard the expenditure of the public money. That great abuses had grown out of the misapplication of public money no one would deny; the facts stared every man in the face. The practice had been, when money had been appropriated for the War and Navy Departments, instead of drawing it out of the Treasury by warrants for each specific purpose, to draw it out by millions. The statement of the Secretary of the Navy, in opposition to the bill as it went from this House, was not sufficient ground to induce the House to reverse its decision; and he was authorized to state from the Secretary of the Treasury that the difficulties stated against the proposed plan did not exist; that the forms for carrying into effect the bill were already provided.

Mr. LOVE thought the motion of Mr. ALSTON at least an impolitic one, as it might, if successful, jeopardize the passage of the appropriation bill, to which provisions of nearly a similar nature had been attached and sent to the Senate. There were indeed some little differences, none he believed in any important principles, between the bill which had passed this House and that sent from the Senate. The few alterations he thought absolutely necessary, and he was surprised to hear the gentleman speak of the statement sent from the Secretary of the Navy, and printed for the use of the House, as erroneous, without any attempt to specify its defects. The gentleman had relied on the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, and however he might concur in an opinion, as to the financial talents of that gentleman, he could not consent that the Secretary who had made the statement on this occasion, had discovered less ability, or knowledge of the duties of his office.

Mr. NEWTON suggested the propriety of permitting the bill to lie on the table till the decision of the Senate on the bill which went from this House was known.

Mr. TAYLOR hoped the bill would be rejected. Now was the time to make a stand in support of the bill sent from this House. The clauses on the subject of the expenditure of public money had been properly annexed to the bill, and he believed that they could be passed; for the Senate he believed would not take upon themselves to push the House from its ground as they had in the case of the famous navy bill during the present session. It had always appeared to him that this Government ought to have some pinnacle whence the people and every member of the House should take a complete view of the whole expenditure of the nation. The Secretary of the Treasury had that commanding view as to the receipts; but he had not the same complete and ample view of the moneys paid from the Treasury. Eight years ago it had been reported, very unfairly perhaps as respected some individuals, who were stated as debtors in the report of the Committee of Investigation, that there had been much misapplication of the public money. From what had it arisen? For the want of that measure which had passed a few days ago in this House without a dissenting voice. The bill as sent from this House was recurring to the good advice given eight years ago, that it was necessary not only that they should be economical in the expenditure of the public money, but that the appropriations should be specifically applied. It was calculated to prevent the agents of the departments from turning over immense sums of the public money at the rate of three per cent. per month. He wished to have some department to be amenable for all the expenditures of the Government; and he would rather, in fact, lose the appropriation bill than agree to strike out the sections sent from this House.

The bill was then rejected, 51 to 26.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

The House took up for consideration the bill for disfranchising vessels of the United States, navigating under foreign licenses.

The first section of the bill, which it will be recollected, calls home all vessels which went out previous to the embargo, &c., had been struck out the last time the bill was under consideration.

Mr. JACKSON moved an amendment subjecting persons convicted of accepting, using, or conniving at the use of a foreign license to fine or imprisonment. This amendment was modified on motion of Mr. NEWTON, so as to disqualify any person so convicted from holding any office of trust or profit under the United States.

Mr. BURWELL observed that he should consider this more as a paper law than an effectual one; but should feel himself bound, by voting for the bill, to enter his solemn protest against so shameful a practice. Mr. B. objected to the principle of expatriation as a punishment, doubting whether Congress had a right to exercise it. As to preventing vessels from sailing under British licenses, he doubted the practicability of preventing it. There were no doubt enough of those licenses in the hands of her public or private agents; and proof of the fact could scarcely ever be obtained, from the privacy under which they were procured, and the discretion with which they would be used. He should, however, vote for such a law as this, were it only to enter a record on their journals against the practice. He conceived, however, that before the next session the Orders in Council rendering such licenses necessary to trade would be better understood, and the people of the Union more strongly united against them; and special laws against particular cases under them would be unnecessary.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON was not disposed lightly to commit the House on the subject of expatriation; but there was unquestionably a difference between expatriation and disqualification for office. He produced precedent in support of the amendment proposed. Mr. J. regretted that this practice could not be prevented, from the Proteus-like character of some merchants; and deplored the necessity which would compel them to place a law for preventing this disgraceful practice on the statute book. He believed that there was not a single member of the House who was not willing to punish those who violated the honor of the country by accepting foreign licenses.

Mr. LYON said he could see no necessity for such a law, because it would be impossible to carry it into effect; and because it was an ex post facto law, operating on persons now abroad, who could have no knowledge of such a law or of an intention to pass it. It was legislating to no other purpose than to show that they had the power to legislate.

Mr. QUINCY suggested the propriety of postponing the consideration of this subject till the next session, when the evil would be better understood and a remedy could be more easily provided. It would be in the power of any person, this bill to the contrary notwithstanding, by a short residence in some foreign port to deprive himself of the character of a citizen of the United States and thereby evade the law.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that no bill which could be passed could constitutionally have a retrospective effect; and, therefore, if we were to wait till the evil had extended, it would be too late to provide a preventive.

Mr. BACON was by no means certain that this law would prevent the practice of accepting foreign licenses to trade; but he should vote for the bill principally as entering a protest against the right of any foreign nation to regulate or embarrass our trade.

Mr. LYON spoke at some length against the bill.

Mr. FISK replied to Mr. LYON. He had not thought that there was an American who, avowing himself to be such, would consent that our citizens should disgrace themselves by this practice. It was necessary to pass this bill if it were only to express the sentiments of the nation on the subject. If no notice were to be taken of it, there would appear to be an acquiescence in the practice by the United States.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON'S motion was carried 67 to 6. The bill was then ordered to a third reading.

FRIDAY, March 3.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the balances which are charged on the books of the Treasury for advances made prior to the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eight, prepared in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the twentieth of April last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire," were discharged from the further consideration of the said bill.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria to alter their style and firm, and to insure against loss by fire:" Whereupon, the question being taken that the said bill be now read the third time, it passed in the negative.

The order of the day, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of religious societies in the District of Columbia," being called for, a motion was made by Mr. NELSON that the said order of the day be postponed indefinitely: And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the promulgation of certain laws in the Territory of Michigan;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the making a turnpike road from Mason's Causeway to Alexandria.

Mr. GHOLSON'S motion for indefinite postponement, was negatived—ayes 9.

Mr. LEWIS moved that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House; negatived—ayes 5. The bill was then passed—ayes 59, noes 12.

FOREIGN LICENSES.

An engrossed bill to deprive, in certain cases, vessels of their American character, and to prevent, under certain disabilities, any citizen of the United States taking a license from any foreign Power to navigate the ocean, or to trade with any other foreign and independent Power, was read the third time: And, on the question, that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 16, as follows:

DELAWARE CANAL.

The order of the day on the bill authorizing the grant of a certain quantity of public land, for stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company, was called for by Mr. NEWTON.

Mr. EPPES observed that, at this late period of the session, the House could not be prepared to consider a bill which not only involved a great grant of property of the United States, but a Constitutional question. He therefore moved to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. NEWTON observed that the principle was not new, and the Constitutional question, if any, had been decided long ago; for the United States had taken stock in the Bank of the United States and in other institutions. He wished the bill to be taken up.

Mr. EPPES confessed he was astonished that any gentleman should oppose the motion which he proposed. Did gentlemen suppose that the property of the nation was to be voted away, and that neither the Representatives nor the people should understand the principle on which it was voted? And was the House to establish the principle that Congress were to become land-jobbers or speculators in public stock? He had no doubt that the Delaware Canal was a proper object for the public attention; and if the Constitution could be amended and money could be appropriated for that object, he said, he should as soon vote it to the Delaware Canal as to any other object of the kind, but not for that object singly. When the subject was taken up, every question, on a similar object, should be passed in review. He really hoped that gentlemen would not, on the present occasion, insist on passing a bill which had never yet been before a committee of this House. He hoped that this would not be made the first instance in which a bill of this importance had been passed at the last day of the session, and at the moment of the dissolution of Congress.

Mr. STANFORD was opposed to the motion for postponement. He was not in favor of this bill as a local question, but from general principle. When the gentleman said that this was a new subject, let it be remembered that, in case of the Cumberland road, this very principle was recognised; it having commenced with the proceeds of the public lands, and this very session the House had appropriated money for nearly a similar object, the canal of Carondelet. This was as good a time to commence the system of improvement as any other. It was also connected with internal defence. If war should follow our present measures, this bill might and would contribute essentially to the common good. The object was not new, for a similar bill had been before the House one or two sessions ago; nor did he know that there was anything proposed by the bill which militated against the Constitution of the United States.

The bill was postponed indefinitely—ayes 42, noes 31.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. NELSON called for the order of the day, on the bill making further provision for the corps of engineers, (to remove the Military Academy to the seat of Government.)

Mr. MASTERS moved to postpone the subject indefinitely, and gave his reasons in favor of it, viz: That West Point was a much more eligible situation; that it would be expensive to the United States to remove the institution, and, after it was removed, to provide buildings for its accommodation; and that private property had been embarked in the settlement at West Point, which would be injured by the removal.

Mr. LEWIS opposed the motion, urging in support of the bill the advantages which would arise from this institution being at the seat of Government, and, being a national institution, the propriety of its being under the immediate superintendence of the head of the War Department.

Mr. LIVERMORE supported the motion, on account of the lateness of the session, and from a belief that, if taken up, it would consume the whole of the session.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON observed that there was no bill before the House more important than this; and it was a single question, on which every member, probably, had made up his mind.

The question on indefinite postponement was carried—ayes 49, noes 34.

MARINE CORPS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate for increasing the Marine Corps.

Mr. MACON moved to amend the bill by striking out that part which authorizes the appointment of the Major; for, he said, there was no occasion for field officers in this corps, as they would never go on board a ship.

Mr. NELSON opposed the motion, as he considered the appointment necessary for the organization of a Marine Corps, and as necessary to induce young men of spirit and enterprise to enter the corps—the prospect of promotion being an inducement. Motion negatived.

An amendment was moved to make all future enlistments for the term of five years. Carried.

The Committee rose and reported the bill as amended.

Mr. MACON renewed his motion for striking out "one Major."

Mr. BURWELL supported the motion. He wished that the bill could have been rejected. He was not one of those who believed if this nation went to war for maritime rights, that it was to be carried on by large frigates, but by small vessels and individual enterprise; and was, therefore, not for increasing this corps.

Mr. MASTERS quoted a report from the Navy Department, on the subject of the Marine Corps. It would be remarked that the Marine Corps were calculated to act as infantry when on shore, and that an additional number were particularly wanted for New Orleans, as well as for service on board the gunboats.

Mr. MACON's motion was negatived—ayes 41, noes 32. And the bill was ordered to a third reading—ayes 43, noes 29.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

A message was received from the Senate informing the House that they insisted on their amendments to the bill from this House, supplementary to the acts for the establishment of the War and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military and Naval Establishments for the year 1809. [Their amendment was to strike out the five sections regulating the mode of expenditure and appropriation of the public money in the War and Navy Departments.]

The question having been put, "Will this House recede from its refusal to concur in the amendments?"

Mr. J. G. JACKSON remarked that this was an important bill, and however he was in favor of the part proposed by the Senate to be stricken out, he hoped that the House would not defeat the bill by adhering.

Mr. W. ALSTON hoped that the House would not recede. Painful as it would be, he would rather see the bill fall altogether. The mode in which these provisions had been affixed to the bill was not unusual; and he produced a precedent in support of it. To the principle there could be no objection.

Army and Navy Appropriations.

H. OF R.

Mr. GHOLSON said, he thought it was too late in the session to commence a new controversy with the Senate; and as it was agreed, on all hands, that part of the bill was certainly necessary, and the other part might be postponed without injury to the State, he was in favor of recession.

Mr. MACON said that, on this subject, there could be but one question, Were the sections which the Senate had stricken out, proper to be passed into a law, or were they not? That was the only question to be decided. He hoped the House would not sacrifice the principle to accommodation.

Mr. SMILIE hoped the House would not give way; they were now struggling for the protection of the public money. He said he would adhere and throw the responsibility of losing the whole appropriation bill on the Senate. If they chose to account to the people for the consequences of the failure of the bill, let them do so.

The question was then taken on receding, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—Ezekiel Bacon, John Blake, jr., Adam Boyd, Epaphroditus Champton, Martin Chittenden, Richard Cutts, Thomas Gholson, jr., David Holmes, Reuben Humphreys, John G. It was then moved, by Mr. W. ALSTON, that the House insist on the bill as it now stands.—Carried, 55 to 19.

It was then moved to appoint conferees, to confer with such gentlemen as may be appointed by the Senate, on the subject of the above bill.—Carried. And Messrs. WILLIS ALSTON, EPPES, and SMILIE, were appointed on the part of the House.

On motion of Mr. N. R. MOORE, the usual resolution was adopted, directing the Clerk of the House to advertise and contract for printing, stationery, &c., for the next Congress.

MARINE CORPS.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps," together with the amendment agreed to this day, was read the third time. And, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 54, nays 28, as follows:

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of William Hastings; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment thereto, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time this day.

The House adjourned until five o'clock, P. M.

Evening Session—Five o'clock.

An engrossed bill for the relief of William Hastings was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the conference desired by this House, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, and of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1809;" and have appointed managers at the said conference, on their part.

On motion of Mr. Lewis, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole—44 to 35—on the bill from the Senate to amend the charter of Georgetown. The Committee rose, without coming to a decision, and were refused leave to sit again.

Mr. JACKSON moved to reconsider the vote of this House this morning, refusing a third reading to the bill to alter the style and title of the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria.—Negatived, 54 to 27.

Mr. LEWIS making another motion to take up the bill for amending the charter of Georgetown,

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved to postpone it indefinitely.—Motion lost, 56 to 30.

Mr. LEWIS's motion was then carried, and the bill ordered to a third reading—55 to 16. It was afterwards read a third time, and passed.

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be authorized to settle and adjust the accounts of Thomas Claxton, junior, and James Claxton, for their services during the present session, and allow them a sum out of the contingent fund of this House, not exceeding one hundred dollars each.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund, to Elexius Spalding, John Phillips, Richard Stewart, John B. Boarman, and George Cooper, each fifty dollars, for extra services performed during the present session.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act providing for the promulgation of certain laws in the Territory of Michigan," was read twice, and the farther consideration thereof postponed indefinitely.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of Georgetown.'"

The order of the day, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the better Government of the Navy of the United States,'" being called for, a motion was made by Mr. JOHN G. JACKSON that the said order of the day be postponed indefinitely, and resolved in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider their amendment disagreed to by the Senate to the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown:" Whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. LEWIS, that the House do recede from their said amendment; and the same being received, and under debate, a motion was made by Mr. WILLIS ALSTON, that the further consideration of the said bill and amendment be postponed indefinitely: and the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative. And on the question that the House do agree to the motion made by Mr. LEWIS, as hereinbefore recited, it was resolved in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. WILLIS ALSTON,

Ordered, That the bill, entitled "An act concerning associations for the security of navigation;" also, the bill providing an additional military force, which originated in this House, and are now depending and undecided upon, do lie on the table.

ACCOUNTS OF GENERAL WILKINSON.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it would be recollected by the House that a committee was appointed some time ago, for the purpose of inquiring whether any advances of money had been made by the War Department contrary to law, and, if any, to what amount; it would also be recollected that, during the discussion on printing the documents, he had stated in his place, that, if no other gentleman did, he would bring forward a motion in relation to that subject. Conceiving it to be his duty so to do, he now rose for the purpose of redeeming the pledge which he had given to the House. He had been extremely reluctant to bring forward a motion on this subject, because he knew it might be said, and truly, that there was no time for the House to examine the documents during the present session. He was well aware of that objection, and, therefore, should not go into that examination, but should restrict his motion to so limited an extent, that it would be impossible for any man, as he believed, to deny its truth; it would be impossible for any man to complain that any difficulty existed as to a ready comprehension and prompt decision upon it; it was restricted only to a single case. If the House adopted the motion, it would then be for them to declare what should grow out of it. Mr. R. said he believed that it was understood in Great Britain that a dissolution of Parliament did not affect an impeachment—that the impeachment did not abate by the dissolution; and it belonged to the wisdom of the House, after the resolution was decided, to say what should be done with it. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he made his motion to redeem a pledge given to the House; and that there was not a man in the United States, however limited his capacity, that would not be able to discern its truth or falsehood. It did not rest upon involved accounts or points of law, but upon the plainest and most luminous propositions which could be offered to the human mind, the truth or falsehood of which would at once appear.

On the 16th of March, 1802, an act passed, fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States. By that act it was provided, "that the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, be as follows, to wit: to the brigadier general, two hundred and twenty-five dollars, which shall be his full and entire compensation, without a right to demand or receive any rations, forage, travelling expenses, or other perquisite or emolument whatsoever, except such stationery as may be requisite for the use of his department." This is the law of the land, said he, in relation to this officer. The law then goes on to state what shall be the pay of other officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates; the fifth section apportion the rations to the different grades of officers, and allows "to the commanding officers of each separate post, such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post." I beg the House to attend that the words are, "such additional number of rations;" and yet it is in proof before the House, that Brigadier General Wilkinson has received a considerable sum of money, to wit: $1,433 16, for thirty-six extra rations per day, whilst commanding at Natchitoches and at New Orleans. Whilst at the latter place, he has also received an allowance of $600 for "quarters, stabling," &c., said allowance, both as relates to rations and quarters, being prohibited by the law of the land. I know that the allowance has been made under very high authority, no less than that of the Attorney General of the United States—under the sanction of no less an opinion than his.

Mr. R. said it did not behoove him to enter into a contest with gentlemen learned in the law, as to the exposition of the law, much less with the Attorney General, in a case susceptible of being so put that a difference of opinion might arise under it. But where the case was such, that a difference of opinion could not take place if the terms of the law were attended to, he should, with great deference, as a representative of the people, not only think himself entitled to decide between that people and the Administration for them, but that he was solemnly bound by duty to express such an opinion. And he felt himself warranted in what he said, by perceiving that the Attorney General, in giving that opinion, had not correctly apprehended, because he had not correctly stated, the law. It has been said that Homer himself sometimes nodded; and a person even of first abilities and legal research, pressed by a multitude of business, might make an oversight—inasmuch as, in the Attorney General's opinion, the word "additional," preceding the word "rations" in the law, was omitted. The Attorney General acknowledged the force of the fourth section of the law, cutting off the Commander-in-Chief from any other emoluments; but said, "To put a just interpretation on any clause contained in a statute, you must look beyond the insulated section. The entire act must be taken into view, and such a construction formed as will give effect to every part." Mr. R. further quoted the printed document—"The allowance made to General Wilkinson, is not in his capacity of brigadier general, but in his quality of commander of a separate post. By the fifth section of the act above-mentioned, the President is authorized to allow the commanders of separate posts such additional number of rations as he may, from time to time, think proper to direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post." Now surely the force of this term "additional" must have been overlooked by the Attorney General in this particular case. To a man to whom rations are allowed by law, you may allow additional rations; but can you allow additional rations to a man who is expressly prohibited from receiving any? Can you allow additional anything to a man whose compensation is fixed by law, and who is precluded, in the act itself, from receiving any farther compensation? To inferior officers commanding at separate posts, additional rations were by the law contemplated to be allowed, and for a reason explained in the act itself; but it would be recollected that the Commander-in-Chief always had a separate command. The law contemplated that, by having a separate command, (incidental things as to inferior officers, but inseparable as to the Commander-in-Chief,) they might be compelled to entertain company, and go into expenses which their pay would not warrant; and, therefore, in such cases, additional rations had been allowed. If my construction of the law be not correct, said he, words have lost their meaning, terms have no longer any signification, and we legislate to no purpose whatever. And the force of this thing will be made more apparent when we come to consider, that it is stated by the Accountant of the War Department that Colonels Cushing and Freeman received "additional rations," agreeably to law, for commanding at New Orleans and Natchitoches, for the same period of time for which an allowance was made to the Commander-in-Chief at the same places. So that, even if his construction was incorrect, if whites conveyed the idea of black, if right was wrong, if "additional" signified subtractional, still the law had been completely executed, quo ad hoc, the moment the President had authorized additional rations to Colonels Cushing and Freeman, for commanding at New Orleans and Natchitoches.

These were things which he thought it his duty to state to the House. If they were not true, if they were not as evident as the lights burning before his eyes, then the House would say so—would deny the fact. I could go on further, said he, and state a great many other illegal grants equally clear with this. I will state one more. It is to be found in these documents. To be sure it is a petty affair, and one which I would not have brought before this House if I were not impelled by a sense of duty. It is an allowance of $47 41 for part pay, subsistence, and forage, from the 16th of March, 1802, to the 31st of May, following. Made how? "By an arrangement of the War Department." Now, on the 16th of March, a law was passed, which took effect as a law of the land from the time the President signed it; and if the President could have defeated the operation of the law till the 31st of May, 1802, he could defeat it altogether. It is the boast of a free government, that law, and not the discretion of men, is to govern; and the highest officer of this Government is as strictly amenable to law as the meanest member of society, in the eye of the law, and, in foro conscientie, more so; because they must be presumed to know the law, although the lower orders may not. If there be one proposition in the world clearer than another, it is the proposition which I am about to submit to the consideration of the House. I know the lateness of the session, and the House will appreciate the motives by which I am actuated; if not, it is my misfortune, but not my fault. I should be sorry to labor under the censure of the House; but if I incur it in the discharge of my duty, I shall bear it with equanimity—I trust, as becomes a man. I therefore move as follows:

Resolved, That the allowance of one thousand four hundred and thirty-three dollars and sixteen cents, for

"thirty-six extra rations per day," made by the Department of War to Brigadier General Wilkinson, at Natchitoches, from the 13th to the 30th of September, 1806, and from the 1st of October to the 11th of November in the same year, and whilst commanding at New Orleans, from 12th November, 1806, to 24th November, 1807; and of six hundred dollars for "quarters, stables," &c., at the same place, is contrary to law, the said allowance being expressly prohibited by the act passed the 16th day of March, 1802, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States."

The House agreed now to consider the resolution—54 to 43.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it would be recollected that he had said the Attorney General had misapprehended, because he had misstated, the law on the subject of the Military Peace Establishment; and yet, when he came to read his opinion as printed, he found to his very great surprise and embarrassment, that the law was correctly quoted. He would state how it happened. In the tenth page of the printed report, fifth paragraph and fourth line, the word "additional," preceding the words "number of rations," will be found, but ought not to be, because it is not in the Attorney General's official report. It was omitted, and Mr. R. said he wished to state how it got in. When the copy of the Attorney General's opinion had been put into his hands, he had perceived the difference between the opinion and the law as it now stood, and with his pen had marked the omission as a guide to himself, and the printer had inserted it in the printed copy; and thus, Mr. R. said, when he read the printed report to the House, he was astonished that it did not tally with his conception. This being a palpable error, every gentleman who had the report, and those who published it, ought to omit the word "additional." This would show to the House, he hoped, that it was not very unreasonable in him to differ on this occasion with a gentleman of the Attorney General's erudition, as he had so far misunderstood the law.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON moved that the resolution lie on the table. He said it would be unnecessary for him to state, that at this late period of the session it would be impossible to give to the resolution that consideration to which it was entitled. As it was announced by the mover of the resolution, said he, and as I find by the printed statement, of which I was really never possessed before this evening, the Attorney General has given, in his official capacity, an opinion that the allowance was just and proper; and that in pursuance of such opinion the amount charged was allowed. What is the House about to do? What are they asked to do? Even admitting that there was no difficulty on the subject, that a person of the high responsibility of the Attorney General had not given an opinion, they are called upon to decide that the construction given by one of the departments to their law is an incorrect one. To make such a declaration would be an encroachment on the other parts of the Government. It would be the essence of despotism to enact laws, and after they have been construed by the proper tribunals, to say that that construction is erroneous. I incline to the opinion that the decision has been incorrect, but deny the authority of this House to reverse the decision. It is a fundamental principle of free governments that the powers of the several Departments shall be separate and distinct. The Legislature enacts; the Judiciary expounds; but it would be as improper for us to expound as for the judges to enact laws. We have witnessed already the impropriety of legislative exposition of laws. It is almost six years since I brought before the House the question respecting the construction of a contract—though I did not wish to have involved that question—between the United States and the State of Ohio, in relation to lands of the United States exempt from taxation by that State. The contract declared that five per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of lands should be applied to roads. The Legislature of Ohio, in accepting the proposition, inserted a provision that three per cent. should be applied, under the direction of the Legislature, in opening roads in the State. The House of Representatives, when the bill was before them contemplating the appropriation of five per cent., solemnly declared that only two per cent. was applicable. The Legislature of Ohio unanimously declared that five per cent. was proper; and Mr. Breckenridge, then Senator from the State of Kentucky, afterwards Attorney General of the United States, (I quote him as high authority,) was of opinion that the decision of this House was incorrect. What does this amount to? That it is extremely dangerous for the Legislature of a country to give an exposition of its own laws. With regard to the word "additional," I should rather presume that the Attorney General in his original opinion, must have inserted it; for on recurring to the letter of the Secretary of War, we find that he says, in the 5th section, &c., the President is authorized to allow the commanding officers of posts such additional number of rations as he shall deem proper. Mr. J. said he could not perceive that any good could flow from the adoption of this proposition at this or any other time. If it was intended to effect anything by legislative construction of the law, it would be inefficacious, because it could only be done by prospective construction. Impeachment of the Secretary of War could not be intended, because he acted correctly from the opinion of the Attorney General; nor of the Attorney General, because, if wrong, he had not so acted corruptly, but from a mere error of opinion. For these reasons, and believing it impossible to act on the subject with that deliberation which it required, Mr. J. wished the resolution to lie on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the House would act on the resolution as in its judgment and wisdom it should think fit, and as a sense of duty and respect to its character and the interests of the public should dictate. He had discharged his duty. But before I sit down, said he, permit me to observe, that to presume the existence of a word, in the official letter which the House have proof, the letter being before them, never was in the letter, is one of the highest stretches of presumption that man ever attained. I know that the word was not in the letter. I pledge my reputation on the fact; and I think that the reputation of the Attorney General as a lawyer is sustained by the words being omitted in the letter. I have seen the letter on file; there is no such word in the letter.

On what ground, sir, did I rest this motion? On the ground of oversight in the Attorney General in giving the opinion, inasmuch as this important word "additional" is omitted in that opinion. But, if you put that word in the opinion, do you not see that, instead of involving oversight, you involve deliberate perversion of law? Do gentlemen call themselves friends of the gentleman, and contend that this word must have been inserted? We have heard of the people being their own worst enemies; it very often happens that a man's friends are his worst enemies. The omission of this word "additional" might—I charge no improper motives—have proceeded from hurry of business; we are all liable to oversights. But it is said that we cannot construe our own laws, except by enacting new ones. Then, sir, I hope we shall not enact new laws, if, when broken through, our remedy is to re-enact them. This is indeed a grand discovery. Can you expect the new law to be adhered to, when the old one is with impunity to be departed from? Unquestionably you cannot. The law, it seems, must be construed by the proper tribunal—and which is the proper tribunal to try anything touching the malversation of public money, but this House? Can you bring it before a judicial tribunal? You cannot. Well, sir, suppose, when Mr. Whitbread brought forward his motion in the House of Commons that certain uses and abuses of public money were contrary to law, he had been met at the threshold by such an objection? We should have heard, and correctly too, of corruption and ministerial intrigue. Mr. Pitt was then in office, and Mr. Melville his bosom friend, his coadjutor in public life; but he had too high a reputation for his own fame, for his own reputation, for that glory which was the first, the last and only object of his life, to make such objection. I have stated the circumstances under which the balance is due. This matter is important to the people—into whose bosom we are about to return, to account for our stewardship—who are not to be put off on questions of money, by questions of order and opinions of high authority—who, over matters of money, will cavil to the ninth part of a hair. If gentlemen think this course will suit them, if they wish to attach what I call this foul stain to the Administration, they shall have my aid in doing it. On them will rest the responsibility. Having done my duty I shall submit, as behoves me to submit. I do not appear here as a partisan. I appear here in the legal and Constitutional exercise of my Representative duties. I have exercised my duty; the House will do theirs, in the manner which to their wisdom shall seem fit.

Mr. HOLLAND said that it was with a wish to preserve the honor and dignity of this House that he rose to make a few remarks. He thought that both would be compromised by the adoption of the resolution under consideration. A committee had been appointed to examine into this subject, and the gentleman from Virginia was the chairman. It would seem proper that that committee should have made a specific report on the subject. Wherefore had they not done it, and why was this motion brought forward at eight or nine o'clock on the last night of the session, and of the existence of the present Congress? Was it for the purpose of forcing the House into a vote of this kind without consideration? If that committee had done their duty, they would certainly have favored the House with a detailed report. The committee had not thought proper to do so, and, therefore, the gentleman from Virginia had presented this resolution. Mr. H. said, that no person could be prepared to decide on the propriety or impropriety of the opinion of the Attorney General. For what purpose, said he, can this resolution be brought forward? Suppose this House were to resolve that the opinion of the Attorney General was incorrect, what good purpose would it answer? Would it bring back into the Treasury the money improperly applied? No. Is it consistent with the dignity of the House to pass an opinion on the subject? It is the duty of this House to make laws, and of another tribunal to decide on the laws when made; and if an incorrect decision be made, the person making it is liable to be impeached, and this House is the organ for that purpose. Why was not the matter brought forward properly? The Attorney General is an officer constitutionally appointed to give his opinion touching any matter of doubt in the Departments of the Government. But have we that right? No; our province is to make laws, and if our officers violate them, they may be impeached in a proper manner. The gentleman from Virginia says, that he has discharged his duty. I very much doubt it, sir. He has done more than his duty; he has brought forward a proposition when it is impossible to deliberate on it. He has done what cannot be supported. I hope the resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON said as to himself he cared not whether the resolution was ordered to lie on the table, or whether a question was immediately taken on it. He was ready for either question. One reason, however, why he should vote for it to lie on the table, was, that it was very late in the session, that the House was exceedingly fatigued, that a great number of members who would probably throw considerable light on this subject were now absent from the House; and were he now to vote for its lying on the table it would be from that consideration. He did not agree with any gentleman who supposed that this resolution had been brought forward from improper motives. He had no hesitation in declaring his sentiments explicitly on that head. Sorry as he was to differ with the gentleman from Virginia on points of this magnitude, yet, upon this subject, he had no hesitation as to the vote which he should ultimately give. I will ask, in the first place, (said Mr. N.) at what does this resolution aim? It is a bare and naked resolution declaring, as the opinion of this House, that certain opinions of the Attorney General are contrary to law. Is it intended to affect General Wilkinson, the late Secretary of War, or the Attorney General? I cannot see the object; whether it points at the one or the other, or at all, is totally immaterial. I do not rise in my place, at this time of night, as the partisan of the one or the other. I disclaim any such motive. I rise because I believe if we pass the resolution it will violate the fundamental principle of the American Constitution; that it will be more dangerous, and be attended with more evil consequences, than Burr's or any other conspiracy. If a precedent of this kind be once set, it leads immediately to the most positive and absolute despotism. The Constitution of the United States has wisely said, that the different departments of the Government shall be separate and distinct. To Congress, it has given the power of passing laws; to the Executive, the power of carrying them into execution. To the Judiciary, it has given the great and important power of expounding laws passed by Congress—and can it for a moment be said in a free country that we will take away the power from the Judiciary? That we will pass a law today, and to-morrow come forward, and, with a bare resolution of one House, say that the law was improperly expounded? Do we mean on one day to pass laws, and on the next day to expound them? If we consider this question in a less important point of view, we shall find this mode of doing business is equally productive of injustice. General Wilkinson, it is said, has improperly received a certain sum; and the gentleman says, that there is no mode of getting it back again. I deny it, sir; the action lies for the recovery, and, on the trial of that, the judges will decide the construction of the law.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, that the gentleman from Maryland, for the exercise of whose candor towards his motives he ought to be obliged, had certainly misstated his argument. He only asked of the gentleman the exercise of the same candor to his argument as he had displayed to his motives. He had not said that judgment could not be had against a public defaulter—far from it—but he did say that as to mismanagement or misapplication of public money, this House was the only tribunal.

Mr. NELSON said he was sorry if he had misstated the gentleman's argument. That certainly had not been his object. He was glad that he and the gentleman from Virginia agreed in one thing, viz: that if the money had been improperly paid out of the Treasury, General Wilkinson was responsible for it. Neither the opinion of the Attorney General, or a resolution of the House of Representatives, were conclusive as to what law was. The only authority which could properly decide on the propriety of the exposition of the law, was the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, suppose an action to be brought against General Wilkinson. Were the House about to prejudge this question? Were they about to create a bias on the minds of the judges? Was the Judiciary to be alarmed because the popular branch of the Legislature had given an opinion on the subject? He had too much confidence in the Judiciary to believe that would be the case; for he believed that they would say that the attempt of Congress to expound the law was futile. Mr. N. said he heard himself admonished by his friends around him, that he was extending his remarks to too great a length for the lateness of the hour. He concluded his observations by expressing his regret at seeing this proposition brought forward at a time and in a manner which precluded a full discussion of it.

Mr. ROWAN thought the present a question worthy of all the time which had been consumed in discussing it; and if the doctrine advanced were true, then were secrets disclosed in the operation of this Government which were not before known. The Constitution provided that no money should be drawn out of the Treasury contrary to law, but now it seemed that the officers might draw money on the opinion of the Attorney General. A sum of money might be wanted, and no law might be passed for the purpose. The President having a right to appoint an Attorney General, his opinion might be procured in favor of the application of the money. He was sorry that so much consequence had on this occasion been given to the opinion of the Attorney General. This officer was not known in this question, not being known to the Constitution. He was an officer created by law, to be consulted on legal questions by the officers of Government, in order to give them confidence in the execution of the laws; but at their risk they then performed their duty, his sanction not exempting them from responsibility. Here was an innovation on the Constitution: the opinion of an officer not known to the Constitution was brought in to screen a misapplication of public money. Had he assumed the judicial power? And were the Representatives of the people to be restrained from making inquiry because he had done so? Gentlemen had said that it was the province of the Judiciary to expound the law, and that an action might be brought for the recovery of the money misapplied. And was the House to be satisfied with this remedy? It was not the mere money which was the object of attention. Should the refunding of the money screen the officer who had violated his trust? A question of this kind should not be passed over out of delicacy to individuals. In proportion to their elevation were officers secure from accusation, because they were approached in such stations with reluctance, and never upon light grounds. This circumstance was sufficient security against light imputation. But, admit the plea of delicacy, and they would be sheltered from all inquiry. Whoever had the money of the nation in custody might then dispose of it as he pleased, because to request him to account for it would be a matter of high delicacy. The argument that by passing this resolution they would prejudge the question, was not sound. The resolution might be amended, so as to appoint a committee of inquiry, upon whose report the House might or might not proceed. The idea that appropriation laws were necessary to be expounded, he said, was inconsistent with the nature of our Government. They should be explicit, and intelligible to the meanest capacity. But if a doubt should arise as to the construction of the law, it should be laid before the House by the President, whose duty it was to lay before Congress from time to time such subjects as he should deem proper for their consideration. Three or four opinions of the Attorney General had lately crept into the history of this country. The opinion of the Attorney General had been sent to the House on the subject of the claim of Beaumarchais without their requisition of it, and in other cases it had been allowed great weight. He thought the nation should put its veto upon the influence of the opinions of the Attorney General, as related to the duties of the great departments of the Government. Mr. R. said, if he understood the duty of the Attorney General, it was to prosecute suits in the courts of the nation in behalf of the United States, and to secure their great interests, but not to give an opinion on points which the heads of departments should propose, and under the authority of his opinion to screen them from the scrutiny or censure of the people. He would not give the nation reason to suppose that the Legislature lent the smallest sanction to a proceeding of this kind, and therefore he thought the resolution should be immediately acted on. It had been said that this proposition involved the character of the persons concerned. Mr. R. said that malfeasance would never be alleged without involving character, and according to the doctrine laid down, public officers had a license to do what they pleased. The argument that the resolution involved the character of General Wilkinson was nothing; that character was out of the question; it had been too long in the public reach to be sullied by anything which could be done in this House. The people never looked to whom money is paid, but by whom it is paid. The responsibility of the departments is involved. If they would give money to the officer, it was well understood that he would spend it. It was an error of the Department of War. He regretted that this proposition had come forward at so late a period of the session, but why it had done so the gentleman from Virginia had explained. He had rather that the subject should not have come before the House, than that it should have been dismissed lightly; for there had scarcely been so important a question before the House during the present session. It connected itself with the vitals of the Government. Say at once, said Mr. R., when you make a law for the appropriation of public money, that you have no power to inquire into its application, that the subject shall not be approached, from delicacy or the fear of prejudging it, and you immediately make the heads of departments despots. A few thousand dollars compared with principle is nothing—a correct decision is worth millions. If the House were to refuse to permit the resolution to lie on the table, it might be amended. If it be thought proper, Mr. R. said, he was prepared to vote for a committee of inquiry, not as to the man or men who had received the money, but as to those who had paid it. He did not say that there was any criminality in the case, but malignity and error in this case were the same; for misconduct would always clothe itself in the garb of the latter, were it to be admitted as a plea in excuse. Upon this subject there should be the utmost rigor of scrutiny. It was lamentable, if the opinion of the Attorney General was to rule the whole Government, that from so young an institution as this Government so perfect an excrescence had grown out. It was no excuse for a man who had the custody of the public money, that he had obeyed the Executive direction in applying it improperly.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he rose now merely to read a section of a law; for gentlemen had repeatedly said that the opinion of the Attorney General was not known to the law in such a case as the present, and that it was improperly foisted in: "There shall also be appointed a meet person, learned in the law, to act as Attorney General for the United States, who shall be sworn or affirmed to a faithful execution of his office; whose duty it shall be to prosecute and conduct all suits in the Supreme Court in which the United States shall be concerned, and to give his advice and opinion upon questions of law when required by the President of the United States, or when requested by any of the heads of departments, touching any matters that may concern the departments, and shall receive such compensation for his services as shall by law be provided." Mr. J. said he was not about to enter into any examination of the vulnerable arguments of gentlemen, because he was aware of the lateness of the hour, (nine o'clock;) but he would remark upon the observation that his presumption was erroneous, that he found that the original letter of the Attorney General was not on the files of the House, but merely a copy of it; and on the remark that a man might lead his friend into difficulty, he would observe that he was Amicus Socratis, sed magis amicus veritatis. He must also be permitted to observe, that "error and malignity" were not to be considered in the same light.

Mr. ROWAN said, he contended that, in money matters and high offices, error was no more pardonable than malignity. So far as the Attorney General was mentioned, in the law just quoted, upon a sound construction, he could only be considered as authorized to give an opinion not as a shield but as a guide to the Department, and not to be less responsible on that account. If the Executive doubted on any point, he might avail himself of the opinion of the Attorney General; but he was not an officer intended to stand over the Executive, and screen him from public opinion.

Mr. GARDENIER had no hesitation in declaring his opinion that the money in question had been illegally, palpably illegally, paid; to prove which he used arguments at some length to the same effect as those of Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. ROWAN. When Mr. G. had been speaking about twenty minutes,

Mr. RANDOLPH asked leave to interrupt him. He said he certainly meant no disrespect to the gentleman from New York or to the House. He had thought that the motion was so clear a proposition that no debate would arise on it. If the debate progressed so as to delay public business, which was urgent, he must withdraw the proposition.

Mr. GARDENIER declined permitting Mr. RANDOLPH to withdraw his resolution, until he had concluded his observations. He spoke about ten minutes longer.

When he concluded, after a few words from Mr. ALEXANDER, the question was taken on the resolution lying on the table, and carried—ayes 65.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked leave to lay another resolution on the table along side of the former, and laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That an advance of pay for the months of March, April, and May, and a further advance of pay for the months of June, July, August, September, October, and November, in 1809, has been made by the Department of War, to Brigadier General Wilkinson, and that when the said advances were made, the said Brigadier General Wilkinson stood indebted in a large amount to the United States, on the books of the Accountant of the War Department, and that the said advances of pay were contrary to law.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the first resolution be printed.—Carried, 44 to 42.

Mr. R. then moved that the second resolution be printed.—Negatived, 40 to 38.

WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS.

A bill was received from the Senate further to amend the bill for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments.

Mr. W. ALSTON stated this bill to be the result of the conference between the two Houses, and to be nearly the same as the five sections of the other bill in contest between the two Houses.

The bill was three times read and passed without opposition.

Mr. W. ALSTON, from the Committee of Conference, then moved that the House recede from its refusal to accept the amendments of the Senate to the bill "further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the War and Navy Departments, and making an appropriation," &c. The House then agreed to the amendment of the Senate for striking out the five first sections.

ADJOURNMENT.

A message was received from the Senate, stating that they had appointed a committee in conjunction with such committee as should be appointed by the House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that they had concluded the business pending before them, and were ready to adjourn. A committee was appointed on the part of this House to join the committee of the Senate.

Mr. SMILIE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to JOSEPH B. VARNUM, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the discharge of the arduous and important duties assigned to him whilst in the Chair.

Mr. ROWAN moved that it be postponed indefinitely. Messrs. ROWAN and LYON supported the motion; and Messrs. EPPES and JACKSON opposed it.

The motion was afterwards withdrawn, and the resolution passed, 68 to 9, as follows:

YEAS—Evan Alexander, Willis Alston, Ezekiel Bacon, David Bard, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, John Blake, jun., Thomas Blount, John Boyle, William A. Burwell, William Butler, Joseph Calhoun, George W. Campbell, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Josiah Deane, Joseph Desha, Daniel M. Durell, John W. Eppes, William Findley, James Fisk, Meshack Franklin, Thomas Gholson, jun., Peterson Goodwyn, Isaiah L. Green, John Harris, John Heister, William Helms, James Holland, David Holmes, Benjamin Howard, John G. Jackson, Richard Jackson, Richard M. Johnson, William Kirkpatrick, John Lambert, John Love, Robert Marion, William McCreery, William Milnor, John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, John Morrow, Gordon S. Mumford, Thomas Newton, Wilson C. Nicholas, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Jacob Richards, Matthias Richards, Samuel Riker, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, John Smilie, Jedediah K. Smith, Clement Storer, Peter Swart, John Taylor, James I. Van Alen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Daniel C. Verplanck, Robert Whitehill, Isaac Wilbour, Marmaduke Williams, Alexander Wilson, and Nathan Wilson.

NAYS—John Campbell, Francis Gardner, James M. Garnett, Joseph Lewis, jun., Matthew Lyon, Josiah Masters, John Rowan, Richard Stanford, and Killian K. Van Rensselaer.

At the request of Mr. BARENT GARDENIER, the House excused him from voting on the question.

The SPEAKER returned his acknowledgments to the House for this tribute of their approbation, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The kind expression of your approbation of my conduct, in the discharge of the duties which you have been pleased to assign me as Speaker of the House, affords me that consolation which an approving conscience alone can surpass. You will please, gentlemen, to accept my thanks for the liberality and candor which you have uniformly manifested towards me: and be assured, that the friendly aid which I have experienced from you in the discharge of my official duty, has made a deep impression on the affections of my heart, which length of time cannot eradicate.

Mr. CURTIS, from the committee appointed to wait on the President, reported that they had performed that duty, and that the President had informed them that he had no further communication to make.

And the House adjourned sine die.

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECHES.

MR. HILLHOUSE'S SPEECH, delivered in the Senate of the United States, December 2, 1808. (ante, page 230.) on the resolution to repeal the Embargo, in answer to Mr. GILLES's second Speech, delivered the same day.

MR. PRESIDENT: Having already occupied so much of the time of the Senate, (to whom my acknowledgments are due for the candid attention with which they have heard me,) I shall not now trespass on their patience by again going into the argument at large, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILLES,) upon what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) and myself. The answer to those remarks will be found in the statements and observations already submitted to the consideration of the Senate. Such of the gentleman's remarks as consist merely in peremptory denials or positive declarations as to the questions of public concernment, and are unsupported by a statement of facts or reasons, merit no reply, and will receive none from me. On two points, only, shall I remark—the resolution of the Senate in 1806, and the British Orders in Council, as connected with the act of Parliament laying the duties complained of. The resolution is in these words:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to demand the restoration of the property of the citizens, captured and condemned on the pretext of its being employed in a trade with the enemies of Great Britain, prohibited in time of peace; and the indemnification of such American citizens for the losses and damages sustained by these captures and condemnations; and to enter into such arrangements with the British Government, on this and other differences subsisting between the two nations, (and particularly respecting the impressment of American seamen,) as may be consistent with the honor and interest of the United States, and manifest their earnest desire to obtain for themselves and their citizens, by amicable negotiations, that justice to which they are entitled.”

This, says the gentleman from Virginia, was in the nature of an instruction to the President of the United States—so understood by the Senate at the time—that the flag of the United States should protect all persons on board American vessels. He therefore could do no otherwise than make it an ultimatum. This is the apology, and the only apology, offered by the gentleman for the President's having made it a positive article of his instructions. It cannot be justified to the nation, that it should be made an ultimatum, after it had been ascertained that the point would not be conceded by the British Government, and thereby hazard the peace, and the then prosperous commerce of our country, upon a vain attempt to secure foreigners, and most of them British subjects, on board American vessels, from impressment. That Great Britain or any other nation should be allowed to impress real American seamen, was a point that could not be yielded. But, far different is the President's claim, that the American flag should protect all persons sailing under it. The resolution is before the Senate. It speaks no such language, and did not warrant the risking of the peace and prosperity of the nation on such an ultimatum. The resolution, among other causes of difference, mentions that of the “impressment of American seamen” as a subject of “amicable negotiation.” There is not the most remote intimation that it was the wish of the Senate that the United States should set up the lofty pretension that the American merchant flag should protect all persons sailing under it—a pretension which we had not one line-of-battle ship to enforce. I cannot find in the resolution an expression of the opinion of the Senate that any point of difference should be made an ultimatum. The whole was left open to amicable negotiation and arrangement. This would have accorded with the wise policy which was adopted in 1794, and was successful. That such was not my understanding of the resolution, as the gentleman from Virginia now contends for, he must be satisfied when I remind him of what took place three or four days before the late rejected treaty (or rather a copy of it) reached this city; when that gentleman declared, that, if the treaty did not contain a positive stipulation that the American flag should protect all persons sailing under it, and in every sea, it would be sent back. I replied, “then the treaty will be sent back;” for, it had been ascertained, to my satisfaction, that Great Britain would not agree to such a stipulation, until she was prepared to surrender her fleet, and yield up her naval superiority. Knowing that gentleman to be in the confidence of the President, I was astonished to hear the declaration; and then, for the first time, suspected that any such instructions could have been given. Had the question been put to the Senate, or the American people, Will you risk your best interests, and even your honor and independence, (which we are now told are at stake,) in an attempt to protect foreigners on board American vessels from impressment—those very foreigners whom the Administration now have it in contemplation to exclude altogether from our service? What answer would have been given? I leave every man possessing real patriotism and truly American feelings to give the answer. It is well known that a copy only of the treaty reached this city on the 3d of March, 1807—the day Congress closed their session—which copy was shown to the President; and on the evening of the same day he announced, not to the Senate, but to some individuals of that body, that the treaty would not be submitted to the Senate. At this time the original treaty, and the despatches from our Minister which accompanied the same, and explained its various provisions, had not reached our shores; for, on my arrival at New York, on my way to Supplemental Speeches.

Connecticut, from the seat of Government, which I left on the 4th of March, I found Mr. Purviance, a special messenger, had just arrived there with the treaty and despatches for our Government. It was impossible, therefore, that the President should have formed any correct opinion of its merits. Not finding the proposed stipulation respecting the American flag, he decided (according to the prediction of the gentleman from Virginia) against it.

Though it was matter of great convenience to our merchants to employ foreigners to aid in carrying on their extensive and profitable commerce, yet it was not an object of such importance as that it would be wise to jeopardize that very commerce, and other important interests, merely to protect these foreigners from impressment. As to real American seamen, the British Government never claimed the right of impressing them. The only difficulty has been to devise some mode of discriminating American from British seamen. Had we not persisted in our claim that the American flag should protect all seamen, there is little doubt but that some mode would have been found out to make the discrimination, and have prevented many of the evils we have suffered from the impressment of American seamen.

It appears, from the documents communicated the last session, that the same ultimatum was contained in the instructions of 1804,* which will

* Articles of instructions from the President of the United States, to Mr. Monroe, January 5th, 1804.

First Proposal.—"No person whatever shall, upon the high seas and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships belonging to, or in the service of the other, unless such person be, at the time, in the military service of an enemy of such other party."

Second and Ultimatum.—"No seaman, seafaring, or other person shall, upon the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel, belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships, belonging to, or in the service of the other party, and strict and effectual orders shall be given for the due observance of this engagement; but it is to be understood that this article shall not exempt any person on board the ships of either of the parties, from being taken therefrom by the other party, in case where they may be liable to be so taken according to the laws of nations, which liability, however, shall not be construed to extend in any case to seamen, or seafaring persons, being actually part of the crew of such vessel in which they may be, nor to persons of any description passing from one port to another port of either of the parties."

In the Instructions of May 7, 1806.

Ultimatum.—"No seaman, nor seafaring person, shall, upon the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded, or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships or men of war belonging to, or in the service of the other party; and strict orders shall be given for the due observance of this engagement."

account for the failure of the negotiations which have been carrying on for so many years. And is it not to be lamented that our having demanded an ultimatum which it was well known would not be granted, has given to the whole negotiation an air of insincerity? It is so much the interest of Great Britain, and nations are usually governed by their interests, to be at peace with the United States, that I cannot but entertain a hope that, if a negotiation was commenced and conducted with the same spirit, and with that liberal policy which governed in the negotiation of 1794, it would have a like successful termination.

A few remarks on the subject of the British Orders in Council, and the act of Parliament, shall close my observations. The gentleman from Virginia asks, in emphatic language, Are you prepared to submit to an act of Parliament imposing a tax? Are you prepared to pay tribute to, and be colonized by, Great Britain? I answer No. I will never voluntarily yield what we waged war and encountered all the difficulties of a Revolution to obtain. Whenever there is an attempt by Great Britain, or any other nation, to impose those evils upon us, I shall be prepared to apply the proper remedy. But an embargo is not that remedy. I can never consent to inflict stripes on our backs for the faults of others.

To make myself understood, let me put a plain case or two: Supposing Orders in Council were to issue, declaring it lawful to carry on a free trade from Boston to Alexandria, are we to abandon that trade through fear that we should be thought to submit to British orders? British Orders in Council granting us permission to trade where we had a previous right, would be futile, and ought not to prevent our pursuing our trade upon the ground of our ancient right. So our carrying on trade with all such places as we have heretofore been accustomed to trade with, though they may come within the purview of the British orders, might be carried on without submission, without disgrace.

Suppose another case, that Orders in Council should prohibit a direct trade between Boston and Alexandria, and subject all vessels to capture and condemnation that did not first touch at Halifax, pay duty, and take a license; at the same time an act of Parliament should pass, laying an export duty of ten per cent. on all exports from Halifax? Of what should we have a right to complain? Surely not of the act of Parliament; that would be a mere municipal regulation, laying a duty on exports, which Parliament might have a right to do, though, by the Constitution of the United States, it is forbidden to Congress. As well might Great Britain complain of the drawback duty of three per cent. laid on her products when exported from the United States. What we should have a right to complain of, what we should complain of, would be the Orders in Council, as a gross violation of our rights, and a most unwarrantable encroachment upon our sovereignty and independence, to which we could not submit without dishonor, which ought and must be resisted. Let me ask, would it be proper, in the proposed case, for the purpose of avoiding submission and a surrender of our independence, to lay an embargo on the ports of Boston and Alexandria, and thereby not only cut off their trade with each other, but with all the world? I should call this submission: the most tame, dishonorable, cowardly submission.

Mr. President, "submission" is a word I utterly discard. It is a word not to be found in the political dictionary of New England. It is because I am not for submission; it is because I am for preserving our independence and honor, that I am for repealing the embargo.

MR. POPE'S SPEECH,

Delivered in the Senate of the United States, December 2, 1806, on the resolution to repeal the Embargo.—[Ante, page 230.]

MR. PRESIDENT: With the indulgence of the Senate, I will endeavor to give a satisfactory answer to those objections to this bill, which, in the view of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. HILLHOUSE) and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) appear so formidable. It is unfortunate for the present Administration, that, in the opinion of its opponents, it always has either too much or too little energy, and that it cannot fix on that precise quantum which will suit them. The degree of energy to be exerted in any government must very much depend on the difficulties it has to encounter in the enforcement of its authority. The propriety and necessity of passing this bill ought to be determined by the experience of the last year, and existing facts. I cannot avoid expressing my surprise at the hostility of these gentlemen to this measure, after having told us that the opposition to the embargo was great in the Eastern section of the Union, and that we could not rely on the patriotism of the people to carry it into effect. I am the more surprised at the hostility of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) when I recollect the measure pursued by his very Democratic State during our Revolutionary war to prevent illicit trade with the British army—at that time the power of punishing offences of that description belonged exclusively to the State governments. I think the gentleman informed us, that the State of Connecticut had a prison about forty feet under ground, and every man who was detected in carrying on any unlawful intercourse with the enemy was tried by a court martial, and sent to "hell." It is strange, indeed, after this example of severity, which appears to have had that gentleman's approbation, to hear him declaim with such vehemence against the bill under consideration; which, so far from containing any provisions for sending the violators of the embargo to the infernal world, has nothing in it touching life or liberty, and in all cases where property is concerned, the owner, before he can be deprived of it, is entitled to a fair and open trial by a court and jury.

In every government a power to declare the national will, as well as to execute it, rests somewhere; the great characteristic which marks the difference between this Government and despotism is, that in a despotism, the despot declares the national will, and with a military force always at his command he executes it, and these acts of sovereignty he performs without consulting the people and without responsibility. In a Republic, such as this, every exercise of power may be said to flow from the people, and every public functionary is responsible to them for his conduct. The people, by their Representatives, pronounce their will, and by an Executive chosen for a short period by themselves, they execute it; but in order the better to prevent oppression and guard the rights of citizens, they have secured to every man whose life, liberty, or property, may be affected by the operations of the Government, a judicial trial. In a despotism, the people neither participate in expressing the public will or in deciding on the manner in which or the purposes for which a military force shall be called forth. Here, sir, the public will is not only declared by the people through their Representatives, but the Executive department is only permitted to use the physical strength of the country in the manner and for the purposes they may direct. In every Government, however, there is a power lodged somewhere to exert the physical energy of the nation, when the public welfare or the public safety requires it. By the Constitution of the United States certain powers are delegated to Congress, to which is added an express authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution these powers, and all others, vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof, and the people, in the abundance of their caution, have inserted in that instrument certain restrictions or limitations on the powers of the General Government, in the nature of a bill of rights. Three questions, therefore, seem to present themselves for our consideration. First, whether Congress has power to lay an embargo? Secondly, whether the means furnished by this bill are necessary to carry that power into execution; and thirdly, whether it violates any of the prohibitory articles of the Constitution? It is contended that Congress has no power to lay an embargo, because it must be exercised under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and that the embargo, instead of regulating, destroys commerce. To this, it might be sufficient to answer, that the embargo secures our commercial property from the avaricious grasp of the belligerents, and prevents our commerce from being regulated by Great Britain. But, sir, I shall not enter into a discussion on this question. I will content myself with calling to my aid the decisions of Congress during General WASHINGTON'S Administration, their decision at the last session, and that of the judiciary, all supported by the voice of the people. Upon these decisions I rely with more confidence, than any reasoning I am capable of offering to the Senate; it is a question worthy of consideration, whether a construction so often given to the Constitution, and so long acquiesced in, ought now to be disturbed.

That the means provided by this bill are necessary to carry the embargo into effect, is hardly denied by the gentlemen opposed to it—upon their representations of the opposition to this system, and the difficulty of enforcing it, this measure may be safely rested. If then we have power to lay an embargo, and this measure is necessary to enforce it, it follows, that it is our duty to pass the bill, unless we are forbidden by some part of the Constitution. If that instrument contains any such prohibition, I have not been able to discover it, and I believe I may with confidence challenge gentlemen to point it out.

Permit me, now, Mr. President, to examine more particularly the several sections of this bill, against which the arguments of the gentlemen have been particularly directed. The objections made to the second section, are entirely obviated by a proviso at the end of it, which secures small vessels from the embarrassments which gentlemen appear to apprehend. They have declaimed at great length against that part of the seventh section, which declares that neither capture, distress, or any other accident, whatever, shall be pleaded or given in evidence. To determine the propriety and necessity of this provision, we must contrast it with the law as it now stands, and endeavor to ascertain from which the greatest inconveniences will result. In every prosecution under the existing laws, if the accused can prove that he was captured, or driven into a foreign port, by contrary winds or other accident, he must be acquitted, although the capture is generally produced by a secret understanding between the captor and the captured. I appeal to the candor of the gentlemen themselves, who are better informed on this subject than I am, whether in one case of an hundred, where these excuses are made, they are founded in truth. Experience has proved the importance of this provision; it is one of the most valuable in the bill; without it, no conviction under our embargo system will be had. The power given to the Secretary of the Treasury to relieve in cases of evident hardship, is all that can or ought to be required. If there is any appearance of severity in this bill, we ought to be reconciled to it, because we know it cannot be dispensed with; there is no danger, however, of its being executed with undue rigor; we have not heard any complaint of a rigid exercise of the discretionary powers, heretofore vested in that department. There is a mildness and humanity in the American character, that revolts at the exaction of severe, cruel justice; and when we consider that every man in our Government is in some degree responsible to public sentiment, we ought not to doubt, but that in every case of hardship which is clearly made out, the proper department will extend appropriate relief. The great complaint in this country, Mr. President, is not of the severity of our laws, but that they are not executed; that too much impunity is afforded to guilt. Indeed it has become a reproach to our laws and our Government.

The ninth section has been denounced with great vehemence. It authorizes the collectors to "seize money or property, found on board any vessel, boat, or watercraft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, &c., or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit such articles to be removed until bond with sufficient sureties shall have been given for the landing or delivery of the same, in some of the United States, whence in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be any danger of such articles being exported." Is this a new principle in our code? To prove that it is not, I will call the attention of the Senate to a section of the revenue laws. [Here Mr. P. read a section, which declares that if spirits shall be removed from a distillery, contrary to law, the ship or vessel, wagon, cart &c., in which it may be found, together with the oxen, horses, &c., shall be forfeited and liable to seizure by the revenue officers.] I will not take up the time of the Senate in reading other parts of the revenue laws; the same principle pervades the whole.

But, sir, it was unnecessary for me to appeal to precedents, so numerous in our revenue code, to support this part of the bill. It is bottomed upon a principle which has been recognised and acted upon, from time immemorial, and is familiar to every one; that it is better by precautionary measures to prevent offences, than to punish the offenders after they are perpetrated. Upon this principle a man who has been guilty of no crime, but whose conduct has afforded probable cause for believing he intends to commit one, is liable to be arrested and committed, until he gives sureties of the peace, or for his good behaviour. The gentlemen, to give more plausibility to their arguments, have asserted that a power is given to the collectors to break open dwelling-houses. I protest against any such construction, and I call upon them to point out the sentence, or even the word which will justify it. They have attempted to make an impression that the collectors would not be liable for improper conduct. This suggestion is unfounded. If a collector, without reason, or, to use a technical phrase, without probable cause, should be guilty of any act of oppression or extortion, he would be liable to a suit, and there is no part of the bill which would shelter him. Gentlemen pretend to be alarmed at the tenth section, by which it is enacted that "the powers given to the collectors by this or any other act respecting the embargo, to refuse permission to load vessels, &c., shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give, and such general rules in pursuance of the powers aforesaid; which instructions and general rules the collector shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit be brought against any collector, or other person acting under the directions of, and in pursuance of this act, he may plead the general issue, and give this act and the instructions and regulations of the President in 'evidence for his justification and defence." It is contended that this section makes the rules and instructions of the President paramount to the law. In this they are mistaken. In an action brought against a collector, if he should rely on the rules and instructions of the President, it will be the duty of the court to decide whether they are made in pursuance of the powers given by the embargo laws; and if the court should be of opinion that they are not authorized by law, they will not justify the collector. This principle, I am informed, has been already settled by the Judiciary and Congress. A suit was brought against an officer of the United States for some act done under the orders of the late President, and on the trial he relied on the instructions of the President for his justification, but the court determined that they were not warranted by law, and a verdict and judgment passed against him for a considerable sum in damages, which was paid out of the public Treasury, pursuant to an act of Congress. It has been the practice, heretofore, for the Secretary of the Treasury to give such instructions to the officers of the revenue, and, by a section of one of the revenue laws, the officers of the revenue cutters are made officers of the customs, and are expressly required to perform the duties enjoined by the Secretary of the Treasury. The reasons urged by gentlemen with so much force against giving discretionary powers to the collectors, and the dangers to be apprehended from their abuse of them, induced me, as one of the committee, to give my assent to this section. The propriety and necessity of it must be obvious to every impartial man upon a moment's consideration. In order to regulate and control the coasting trade, so as to prevent violations of the embargo, it has been found necessary to give the President and collectors some discretionary powers, the exercise of which ought to be governed by uniform rules in the different ports and harbors of the United States, and upon the high responsibility of the President. He is supreme executive officer of the Government, immediately responsible to Congress and the nation for the proper discharge of the executive functions; the collectors are his deputies, they emanate from him, and are under his control. I was, in the language of the gentleman, unwilling to make every collector a little, irresponsible despot, but deemed it more safe to subject them to the orders of the President, and thereby to render him responsible for the due exercise of the powers vested in the executive department. No part of this bill will warrant the assertion that the President is authorized to transcend the law or Constitution of the country. I disclaim such a principle. I have ever thought that Government the best, in which no man is superior to the law; and I advocate this bill for the purpose of carrying this principle into practical operation. I wish to arm the Government with sufficient energy to make every one bow before the majesty of the laws.

Supplemental Speeches.

The last section objected to is the eleventh, which authorizes "the President, or such person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to 'employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, as may be judged necessary to enforce the several embargo laws." This, we are told, establishes a military despotism. I hope to be one of the last men, in this country, to advocate a military despotism. If I could believe that this bill would produce such a state of things, it would not only cease to have my support, but meet with my most unqualified reprobation. But, sir, with whatever warmth gentlemen may bestow such epithets upon it, and sound the tocsin of alarm to the people that their liberties are in danger, whatever efforts they may make to inflame the public mind against this measure, when the good sense of the nation shall pass on it, they will be convinced that all their declamation is but empty sound. This part of the bill is not only warranted by an express grant of power in the Constitution, which declares that Congress shall provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the land, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, but, by numerous precedents, established under every administration of this Government. In addition to those read by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) I will read the seventh section of an act, passed the 5th day of June, 1794, during General WASHINGTON's administration, which is strictly analogous to the eleventh section of this bill.

Mr. POPE here read the 7th section of the act before alluded to, which is in the following words:

"And be it further enacted and declared, That in every case in which a vessel shall be fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, or in which the force of any vessel of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, shall be increased or augmented, or in which any military expedition or enterprise, shall be begun or set on foot, contrary to the prohibitions and provisions of this act; and in any case of the capture of a ship or vessel, within the jurisdiction or protection of the United States, as above defined; and in any case in which any process out of any court of the United States shall be disobeyed or resisted by any person or persons, having the custody of any vessel of war, cruiser or other armed vessel of any foreign Prince or State; in every such case it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of taking possession of and detaining such ship or vessel, with her prize or prizes, if any, in order to the execution of the prohibition and penalties of this act, and to the restoring such prize or prizes, in the cases in which restoration shall have been adjudged; and also for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise, from the territories of the United States, against the territories or dominions of a foreign Prince or State, with whom the United States are at peace."

Here, said Mr. P., a power is given to the President, or such person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to call forth the military strength of the country for several purposes, and among others to prevent the carrying on any military expedition or enterprise, from the territories of the United States, against the territories or dominions of a foreign Prince or State, with whom the United States were at peace. A power which may be exercised as well on the land, in the interior, as on our coasts and in our ports and harbors, and without a warrant or other process from any court or judicial officer. It is proper to remark that this act of 1794 was not a temporary law; it is still in force, and makes a part of our permanent statutory code. The bill before us is to expire with the embargo. All legislation of this kind, Mr. President, ought to arise out of facts, and be the result of evident necessity. The American people were unwilling to entrust to the Executive the power of employing the physical force of the nation at pleasure, or in any manner his discretion or whim might direct. No, sir, they have wisely vested in Congress the power of providing in what manner and for what purposes it shall be called forth. It cannot, I think, be seriously contended that this section violates the Constitution. The question is, does the crisis demand it? To prove that the public good and the character of the Government require it, I need only refer to the circumstances and facts disclosed by the gentlemen opposed to it. They complain of our allusions to the people of the Eastern States. If, in our remarks, we have pointed to them, more particularly than to the people in other quarters of the Union, it has been owing to the representations of the gentlemen themselves. I appeal to you, Mr. President, and every member of the Senate, whether we have not had intimations on this floor, from those gentlemen, that there was danger of insurrection, rebellion, and violent opposition to the embargo laws, in the Eastern section of the Union. I believe, sir, the friends of the embargo have expressed as much confidence in the republicanism and love of country of the Eastern people, as in any other part of the nation. If they have been slandered, these gentlemen have slandered them. If, in the discussion of the embargo, our attention has been particularly directed to that quarter, it has not been the result of any individual distinction, but of causes and circumstances which must strike every man at the first view. It ought to be recollected that our Eastern and Northern frontier is bordered by British provinces, that Halifax is in the neighborhood of Maine, and, therefore, that quarter presents greater facilities for violating the embargo than any other.

The gentleman from Massachusetts informs us that the embargo has been violated in the Southern States, as well as the Eastern States. This is probably true. While the embargo continues, I wish it to operate equally on every part of the community. I do not think, however, that the proof the gentleman has adduced is very conclusive evidence of the fact he wishes to establish by it. He has read a passage from a newspaper, stating that a vessel had arrived in the West Indies from some port in Virginia, and another from Baltimore. Does it follow, that, because they cleared out from some Southern ports, that they belonged to those States? About one-third of the shipping of the United States belongs to Massachusetts, and a number of her vessels are, I believe, employed in the coasting trade, and those vessels which the gentleman has alluded to, may as well have belonged to the Eastern as the Southern people. The fact is immaterial. These newspapers, read by the gentleman, display one fact, perhaps of some importance. They state the price of flour in the West India islands to be thirty dollars per barrel. If this be true, I must question the correctness of public opinion respecting the violations of the embargo. If there is such a scarcity of flour in these islands as to raise the price to thirty or forty dollars per barrel, it is pretty strong evidence that it has not been evaded to the extent generally supposed. The gentleman discovered a degree of displeasure at the remark of the gentleman from Virginia, that the violations of the embargo have been produced by British influence. The feelings of no gentleman ought to have been wounded by it, especially after the explanation which was given. The observations of the gentleman from Virginia certainly did not authorize the inference which appears to have been drawn from them. But, sir, I have never heard a doubt expressed of the existence of such an influence. Is it not notorious that there are in our seaports a number of British subjects, merchants, agents, and contractors for the British navy? I believe there is, at this time, in the town of Alexandria, a contractor for the Jamaica squadron. The contiguity of their Northern possessions and West India islands, enables the British Government, with the aid of persons of the description I have mentioned, and that portion of our own people who are so lost to a sense of that duty which every citizen of a free Republic owes to his Government as to be tempted to become instruments in their hands, to exercise a degree of influence in procuring violations of our embargo, which requires all the vigilance and energy of the Government to resist. Between these violations of the embargo and the Government, issue is now made up, and it remains with Congress to decide which shall triumph. Shall we, by withholding the means necessary to enforce the laws, permit them to be trampled on, and the Government set at defiance? I hope not, sir. We are called on, not only by our most sacred duties as legislators, but by the nation, and especially that portion of it who have faithfully regarded our embargo, to compel obedience from those whose patriotism and virtue cannot be appealed to. I do not contend that the Constitution should be violated to support the embargo system, but that we ought to use such Constitutional means as will be adequate to attain the end in view.

It is worthy of remark, that the powers given by this bill will not be exercised in the interior of our country, but on our frontiers, and in our ports and harbors. Our Government, having intercourse with foreign nations, must give their officers, appointed to execute the laws regulating that intercourse, and to collect the revenue growing out of it, the powers contemplated by this bill; and the laws of every country against smuggling would be nugatory and idle, without a power in the revenue officers to seize those articles upon which the laws operate, whether they are attempted to be smuggled out of, or into the country. The gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) has expressed his astonishment that we should be so blinded by our zeal for this measure; we are equally so at the length to which his hostility to it carries him.

It was not to have been expected, Mr. President, that the general policy of the embargo would have been drawn into debate on this bill. We are again told, as on a former occasion, that the embargo is submission. If this be true, it is strange, indeed, that every British agent, and every friend of Great Britain in this country, should be so violently opposed to it. Their hostility to this system induces me to believe they do not consider it submission, and that it is not viewed in that light by the British Government. It is not the policy or the will of that Government that we should discontinue our foreign intercourse. Has she commanded us to withdraw from the ocean? No, sir; the will of Great Britain, is that we should remove our embargo, and trade, not as an independent nation, but upon her terms; and according to the rules and regulations she has prescribed; our embargo is, at least, a refusal to carry on commerce pursuant to her orders, and must, therefore, be considered resistance, and not submission to her will. We are reminded of the opposition to former Administrations. I was not on the political theatre at the periods to which the gentlemen have alluded, and shall not attempt, here, to discuss the topics which those times furnished.

Whatever may have been heretofore the bias of national feeling, or national prejudice, or of political parties, in relation to France and Great Britain, no friend of his country could have anticipated, that at a moment when both those nations should make war upon us, that we should be a divided people. The gentleman from Massachusetts again tells us, that in our system we are precisely conforming to the views of the French Emperor, and closes his remarks on this point, with an assurance that he does not mean to attribute to us any improper motives. We ought not perhaps to doubt the gentleman's veracity. I feel no disposition to detain the Senate, at this late hour, with recriminations. Permit me, however, to expose the glaring inconsistencies of gentlemen on this subject. Great efforts have been made to prove that the embargo is designed to be a permanent measure, and to meet the wishes of France; and yet we are told in the debate in the resolution to repeal the embargo, by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WARRE), equally opposed to it with the gentleman last up, that the President was tired of the embargo last Spring, and in order to get clear of it, he proposed to Mr. Canning, the British Minister, to remove it, as to Great Britain, provided she would rescind her Orders in Council as to the United States. Mr.

Canning's answer seems to have wounded the American pride and sensibility of that gentleman. He discovered a degree of indignation upon reading it, that did him honor. I believe he almost regretted that an opportunity had been afforded to Mr. Canning to treat our Government with such sarcastic insolence and contempt, after our Government has, in the opinion of gentlemen, almost humiliated itself to procure an honorable intercourse with Great Britain. What would the gentleman from Massachusetts have us do? Why, sir, I infer from what he has said, that he would declare war against France, remove the embargo, and trade with Great Britain. To open our ports to that Government under existing circumstances, while her orders are in force against us, without any reparation or atonement for the many injuries, indignities, and insults she has heaped upon us, would be too disgraceful and degrading for the independent spirit of America. Mr. President, we have been injured and insulted by both France and Great Britain, and it would in my opinion be dishonorable to declare for either against the other, without some concession, some satisfactory atonement. To induce us to pursue the course he has recommended, the gentleman, as on a former occasion, has endeavored to excite our alarm by telling us that Bonaparte is aiming at universal dominion, and that if Great Britain should be conquered, America will fall a prey to his ambition. He might as well tell me of events that are to happen after the day of judgment. He must be a visionary statesman indeed, who would be influenced by dangers and consequences so remote and chimerical as those which appear to haunt that gentleman's imagination. I will never sacrifice the great interest of my country to gratify a vindictive spirit against any nation. I shall be ready to consent to renew our commercial intercourse with Great Britain, so soon as it can be done on terms which this people can accept. We have been assured by gentlemen that Great Britain understands her interests, and is governed by it; if so, and our friendship is necessary to enable her to stand against the conqueror of Europe, she will have it, because she can always command our friendship by conducting towards us with justice and moderation. The door of conciliation has ever been open to her, and is still open—it has never been shut by our Government.

I am really at a loss, Mr. President, to account for the inconsistencies of gentlemen in their arguments against the embargo; by one, we are told that the President was tired of it long since, and therefore solicited Mr. Canning to help him to take it off; by others, it is contended that it is a permanent measure, and resorted to for the destruction of commerce. In the debate on the resolution to repeal the embargo, the gentleman labored to prove that the embargo was submission, and not resistance to the belligerents, that it would not coerce, but benefit Great Britain; and in the same breath, it was insinuated to be a measure of conformity to French policy. All these positions cannot be correct. If it be a measure of hostility to Great Britain, it cannot be submission; if it is submission to Great Britain, and she is benefited by it, it could not have resulted from any concert with France. If, however, the fears of the gentleman from Massachusetts are well founded, that, if Great Britain should be crushed by the colossal power of France, we are gone, and that, therefore, our weight ought to be thrown into the scale of Great Britain, to enable her to maintain her independence; and if it be true, as the gentleman contends, that our embargo does not coerce, but subserve, the interest of England, it follows, from his own premises, that our measures are not hostile to her, and that, for our own preservation, we ought to continue our embargo to strengthen Great Britain.

Gentlemen contend that it is not fair, that the friends of the embargo have no right to call on them for a substitute. I cannot, for my part, imagine upon what ground they can refuse to offer it, if they have any. We all admit that the belligerents are committing depredations upon us, that they are in fact making war against us, and that we ought not to submit, but resist. The only question, then, is, what is the most honorable and efficient mode of resistance? We have resorted to the embargo. If gentlemen opposed to this believe there is any other better measure of resistance, it is certainly their duty to propose it. Would they substitute war? If they would, I could flatter myself with union in support of war against the belligerents. I incline to believe I should consent to accept their substitute. War cannot be their object, because they ridicule the idea of war with both belligerents as quixotic; this sentiment has been frequently expressed by gentlemen in debate, and with great apparent consequence. After all the consideration I have been able to bestow on the subject, I cannot view the project of making war with France and Great Britain in that absurd and ridiculous light in which the gentlemen endeavor to exhibit it. It may appear rather extraordinary that two nations at war with each other should both make war upon us; but, sir, I cannot imagine how it can be considered absurd for us to resist both by war; indeed, it seems to me extraordinary and quixotic that we should not. The gentlemen admit that, if one nation commits acts of hostility upon us, war with that nation would be proper and necessary; but if two nations make war against us at the same time, and they happen to be at war with each other, war, on our part, against both, would be absurd and ridiculous, because there would be great difficulty in fighting a three-sided or triangular battle. This is a kind of reasoning to me perfectly novel; it proves that the more enemies we have, the less resistance we ought to make. I should suppose the reverse of this to be correct. I can tell the gentleman from Connecticut, that the idea of three belligerents, which he thinks so ridiculous and absurd, has been often realized in the country I represent. Before Kentucky was settled by the whites, it was a great common, kept as a hunting-ground for the use of the Indian nations, and, by a general consent or law among them, no settlement was to be made upon it. When it was seized by the whites, they were treated as common enemies by the surrounding savage tribes; and it frequently happened that different tribes, at the same time that they waged war with each other, carried on war against the whites. If the gentleman from Connecticut had been in our country at an early period, and told the people if one Indian nation made war upon them they ought to fight, but if two nations at war with each other committed hostilities upon them, that then it would be ridiculous and quixotic for them to fight both, I imagine they would have considered the gentleman's notions very ridiculous and quixotic, indeed. The opinions of gentlemen on this subject appear to arise from possible difficulties, which might occur in possible, but very improbable cases, which they have imagined. Suppose, says the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) after we declare war against Great Britain and France, that three frigates should meet on the high seas, one belonging to each belligerent, how would this singular battle be conducted? I will not attempt to solve the difficulties with which a case of such peculiarity might be attended, in any other way than by supposing another equally as likely to have happened, but which never did happen. Suppose, sir, that, before the close of the Indian war, two parties of Indians of different tribes who were at war with each other, and a party of whites had met in the wilderness, how would these gentlemen have acted in a situation so rare and embarrassing? I shall not take up your time, sir, in making conjectures so improbable.

The facts alleged by the gentlemen themselves, show that this three-sided figure cannot occur on the ocean. They tell us that France has no naval force to make war on that element; and that Great Britain, with her thousand ships, has drawn a line between us and the continent of Europe. It appears to me remarkable that such practical matter-of-fact statesmen as these gentlemen profess to be, should be influenced by such far-fetched possibilities. If, however, their opinion be correct, that it would be unwise and impolitic to substitute war with both belligerents for the embargo, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that it must be continued until a selection can, with honor, be made.

What, Mr. President, is our situation? France has interdicted our trade with Great Britain, and Great Britain has interdicted our trade to France and the Powers under her control, in many articles, the production of our own soil—cotton she has virtually prohibited altogether. The dispute between us and the belligerents is not about the carrying trade, but whether we shall be permitted to carry our surplus produce to foreign markets? The privilege of carrying our cotton to market, is one in which, not only the growers themselves are interested, but one which concerns every part of the nation. The exportation of flour from the United States has not increased since the year 1793, although it is very certain that a much larger quantity is now made, than at that period. This must be owing to the increased consumption of that article in our own country. The high price given for cotton since that time has induced the Southern people to employ the whole of their capital in the culture of that article, and purchase flour and other articles, for their own consumption, from the people of the Middle, Eastern, and Western States. The growth of our commercial and manufacturing towns, the increase of our shipping, and consequent demand for sea stores, have occasioned a greater consumption of flour than formerly. In those parts of the country where cotton is the chief article of culture, the people of other parts find a market for their horses, a large portion of their manufactures, flour, and other surplus productions; and the ship-owners find employment in carrying our cotton to foreign markets. Indeed sir, cotton has become the great staple of our export trade. It has been for some years the principal stimulus to every branch of industry in our country. We export annually upwards of sixty millions of pounds of cotton, a little more than half of which is used in Great Britain, the residue on the continent of Europe. If we remove the embargo while the British orders are in force, the whole of it must be carried to England; there would then be nearly thirty millions of pounds in the English market more than the demand. Have gentlemen calculated the influence which this surplus quantity would have on the price? But, sir, the prospect is still worse, if we are to credit the statement of these gentlemen. They have informed us that Great Britain is now receiving large quantities of cotton from Brazil, Spanish America, Africa, and the East Indies; and that she is not dependent on us for a supply. The necessity, therefore, of resisting the British orders, and forcing our way to those markets where there is a demand for the article, must be evident to every one who will consider the subject. It is not the cause of the cotton States merely, but of every part of the Union. I believe it will be found, upon an attentive examination, that these States are more united by interest, and that the good of the whole is more intimately connected with the interest of every part than superficial thinkers are disposed to believe. I cannot view the British orders merely as a temporary measure of retaliation on France. I fear they have originated in a policy of a more permanent character. I suspect Great Britain has in view to cripple the United States as her rival in commerce, and to prevent the Powers on the Continent from rivalling her in manufactures. The first she expects to accomplish by contracting the circle of our commercial enterprise; the second, by depriving the continental Powers of the raw materials, and preventing them from sending their manufactures to distant markets, and thereby increasing the demand in those markets for her own manufactures. If my suspicions are well founded, that her orders are the offspring of a permanent policy, I fear that, although our non-intercourse system may severely affect her interest, she will be very reluctant to change her course, and that the American people will be compelled to vindicate their rights by their arms. Within a few months, as soon as we can be prepared to strike a blow, we must exchange our present attitude for one of a military character. Millions for defence, not a cent for tribute! has run through the public prints for two years past, and, however it may have been misapplied, I confess I like the sentiment. I hope it is deeply engraven upon the heart of every American.

I could not, Mr. President, at this late hour, trespass on the indulgence of the Senate in noticing all the observations of the gentlemen opposed to this bill. I have contented myself by answering their most prominent objections to it, and am now ready to give my vote for the passage of the bill.

The House being cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk, a confidential Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Coles, his Secretary, who delivered in the same, and then withdrew.

WEDNESDAY, November 9.

The House being cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk, proceeded in the reading of the confidential Message from the President of the United States, and the accompanying documents, received on the eighth instant, and went through the same.

The said Message is in the following, words to wit:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The documents communicated with my public Message of this day, contain such portions of the correspondences, therein referred to, of the Ministers of the United States at Paris and London, as relate to the present state of affairs between those Governments and the United States, and as may be made public. I now communicate, confidentially, such supplementary portions of the same correspondence as I deem improper for publication, yet necessary to convey to Congress full information on a subject of their deliberations so interesting to our country. TH. JEFFERSON.

NOVEMBER 8, 1808.

Ordered, That the said Message and documents do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, November 23.

The House being cleared of all persons, excepting the members and the Clerk, a motion was made by Mr. RANDOLPH, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy, so far as it relates to the substance of the communications from our respective Ministers at Paris and London, which accompanied the President's Message of the eighth instant, be taken off:

And on the question that the House do now proceed to take the said proposed resolution into consideration, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 1, as follows:

Mr. RANDOLPH then modified his resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the communication from our respective Ministers at Paris and London, which accompanied the President's Message of the eighth instant, be taken off, with the exception of the extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, December twenty-seventh, one thousand eight hundred and seven.

And on the question that the House do agree to the same, it passed in the negative—yeas 31, nays 82, as follows:

Another motion was then made by Mr. RANDOLPH, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the communication from our respective Ministers at Paris and London, which accompanied the President's Message of the eighth instant, be taken off.

And on the question that the House do now proceed to take the same into consideration, the adjournment was called for, and the House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

THURSDAY, November 24

The House being cleared of all persons but the members and the Clerk, and the message proposed by Mr. RANDOLPH, which was read yesterday, at the time of adjournment, again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the substance of the communications from our respective Ministers at Paris and London, which accompanied the President's Message of the eighth instant, be taken off, with the exception of the extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State, dated Paris, December twenty-seventh, one thousand eight hundred and seven.

The question was taken that the House do now proceed to the farther consideration of the same and resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDOLPH, then, with the consent of the House, withdrew the said resolution from the Clerk's table; whereupon, a motion was made by Mr. MAOON that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed

On motion of Mr. MACON, Ordered, That the Secret Journal of this day be published.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE TENTH CONGRESS.

[SECOND SESSION.]

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT

GREAT BRITAIN.

[Communicated to Congress, November 8, 1808, January 17 and 30, 1809, and June 16, 1809.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress certain letters which passed between Mr. Canning, the British Secretary of State, and Mr. Pinkney, our Minister Plenipotentiary at London. When the documents concerning the relations between the United States and Great Britain were laid before Congress, at the commencement of the session, the answer of Mr. Pinkney to the letter of Mr. Canning had not been received, and a communication of the latter alone would have accorded neither with propriety nor the wishes of Mr. Pinkney. When that answer afterwards arrived, it was considered that as what had passed in conversation had been superseded by the written and formal correspondence on the subject, the variance in the statements of what had verbally passed was not of sufficient importance to be made the matter of a distinct and special communication; the letter of Mr. Canning, however, having lately appeared in print, unaccompanied by that of Mr. Pinkney in reply, and having a tendency to make impressions not warranted by the statements of Mr. Pinkney, it has become proper that the whole should be brought into public view.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 17, 1809.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a letter recently received from our Minister at the Court of St. James, covering one to him from the British Secretary of State, with his reply. These are communicated, as forming a sequel to the correspondence which accompanied my Message to both Houses of the 17th instant.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 30, 1809.

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, I transmit extracts from letters from Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State, accompanied by letters and communications to him, from the British Secretary of State for the 10th Con. 2d Sess.—51

Foreign Department; all of which have been received here since the last session of Congress.

To these documents are added a communication just made by Mr. Erskine to the Secretary of State, and his answer.*

JAMES MADISON.

JUNE 15, 1809.

Extract—The Secretary of State to Mr. Pinkney, Minister of the United States at London.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 8, 1808.

Having just learned that the present mail will arrive at New York in time for the British packet, I avail myself of the opportunity of forwarding your commission and letters of credence, as successor to Mr. Monroe, in the legation at London.

Since my last, which went by Mr. Nourse, in a despatch vessel, bound first to L'Orient, and then to Falmouth, I have received your communications of the 23d November, and of — December. These, with a representation from General Armstrong to the French Government on the subject of the decree of Berlin, as expounded and enforced in the case of the ship Horizon, were thought by the President to throw so much light on the course likely to be pursued by Great Britain and France in relation to the United States, that he had the documents confidentially laid before Congress.

Mr. Erskine has made a written communication on the subject of the British orders. I shall answer him as soon as the very urgent business on hand will permit.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 22, 1808.

My last bore date the 8th instant, and went by the British packet. It acknowledged your letter of November 23d, and — December. I have since received those referred to in the latter, and, also, that of January 26, which came to hand last evening.

I cannot enclose my answer to Mr. Erskine's communication of the British orders; the unceasing pressure of other matters, on a state of health still feeble, having thus far delayed it. You will anticipate the complexion which will necessarily be given to it by the character of measures, not only violating our rights, and stabbing our interests, but superadding, under the name of indulgences, a blow at our national independence, and a mockery of our understandings.

Extract—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 4, 1808.

SIR: My last was of March 22, and went under the care of Mr. Rose. I now forward printed copies of the correspondence with him on the subject of his mission, and of the antecedent documents, relating to the case of the Chesapeake. As soon as the voluminous residue of the communications made to Congress issues from the press, it shall also be forwarded. You will find that they include certain documents relating to France, which were thought proper for the knowledge of Congress at the present crisis.

To those communications I add copies of Mr. Erskine's letter to me on the subject of the British decrees of November last, and of my answer. And that you may have a view of the ground which has been taken with respect to the French decree of November, 1806, and to the judicial exposition in the case of the Horizon, giving to it an illegal operation against the United States, I enclose copies of two letters to General Armstrong on those subjects.

The President made to Congress, a few days ago, other communications relating to the present crisis with Great Britain and France, among which were Mr. Erskine's letter, now enclosed, and a letter from Mr. Champagny, to General Armstrong, explaining the course meditated by the French Government with respect to the commerce of the United States. These being excepted from the confidential character attached to the others, have been published, and will be found among the printed enclosures. Your letter of February 26 was enclosed in the communication to Congress, but not in the exception.

The conduct of the two great contending nations towards this country, as it will now appear to it, and to the world, fully displays their mutual efforts to draw the United States into a war with their adversary. The efforts on both sides are too little disguised to be worthy the discernment of either, and are addressed, moreover, to motives which prove great ignorance of the character of the United States, and, indeed, of human nature.

From the posture in which Mr. Rose's final reply to the compromise proposed to him placed the question of adjustment in the case of the Chesapeake, it remains with the British Government to resume it, if adjustment be their object. Whether a tender of reparation will be made here, or to you, will also lie on that side. It will certainly be most becoming that Government, under all circumstances, to make the reparation here; and this course might, of right, be insisted on by this Government. The President, nevertheless, in the liberal spirit which always governs him, authorizes you to accept the reparation, provided it be tendered spontaneously, be charged with no condition, unless it be that, on the receipt of the act of reparation here, the proclamation of July 2d shall be revoked; and provided the reparation shall add to the disavowal of the attack on the Chesapeake an express engagement that the seamen retained shall be immediately restored, and that the guilty officer experience an exemplary punishment. The reparation will be the more satisfactory, and not exceed a just expectation, if the restoration of the seamen be made to the very ship from which they were wrested, and if provision be made for the wounded survivors, and for the families of those who lost their lives by the attack.

I must repeat, however, that it is considered entirely proper that the reparation should be offered here, rather than in London; and it is only in the event of a decided repugnance in the British Government to make it through a functionary here, that you are to accept it there.

The answer to Mr. Erskine's letter on the British orders will furnish the grounds to be taken in your communications with his Government on that subject. If the Cabinet can be brought to view the orders in their true light, a revocation of the whole of them cannot fail to take place, unless they mean to violate every maxim of justice, or are fixed in hostile purposes against the United States. In not regarding the orders, indeed, as acts of hostility, and in trusting for redress to the motives and the means to which they have appealed, the United States have given the most signal proof of their love of peace, and of their desire to avoid an interruption of it with the British nation.

Still, it is to be understood, that whilst the insult offered in the attack on the American frigate remains unexpiated, you are not to pledge, or commit your Government to consider a recall of the orders as a ground on which a removal of the existing restrictions on the commerce of the United States with Great Britain may be justly expected.

The two letters to General Armstrong of 22d May, 1807, and February 8, 1808, are proofs of the sincerity and impartiality with which the President has proceeded in relation to the belligerent parties, and may, perhaps, assist you in repressing unjust suspicions imbibed by the British Cabinet. It would be happy for all parties, the belligerent as well as the United States, if truth could, in this case, be made to prevail, and if the retaliating rivalry of the former against the latter could be converted into an emulation, as politic as it would be magnanimous in both, to take the lead in a fair, lawful, and conciliatory course towards a nation which has done no wrong to either. Should the experiment be made on either side, it would probably be followed on the other, and it could never happen that the side first doing justice would suffer on that account.

In the present state of our relations to Great Britain, it would be premature to mark out the course to be pursued with respect to further negotiations on other topics than those above noticed. You are authorized, however, to continue your interpositions in behalf of our impressed or detained seamen; and, in the event of a repeal of the British orders, and of satisfactory pledges for repairing the aggression on the Chesapeake, to enter into informal arrangements for abolishing impressments altogether, and mutually discontinuing to receive the seamen of each other into either military or merchant service, conformably to the instructions on this point transmitted by Mr. Purviance.

You will find, by a passage in Mr. Rose's reply of March 17, that the British Government does not maintain the principle that the obligation of the United States extends beyond the discharge of deserters from their public service; and, by an order of the Navy Department here, already carried into execution, of which a copy is enclosed, that it has lately been decided that no foreign seamen, whether deserters or not, shall serve on board our ships of war. The principles respectively manifested by these documents ought to facilitate such an adjustment as is contended for by the United States.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 30, 1808.

My last was of the 4th instant, and went by a British packet from New York. I now forward a copy of it. Congress ended their session on the night of the 25th instant. The series of newspapers herewith sent affords a view of their proceedings subsequent to the communications last made to you. Some other points are included, which throw light on the workings of public opinion and the state of public affairs.

You will find that the critical posture of our foreign relations has produced provisions of different kinds for our greater security, and particularly that no pains have been spared to stop every leak by which the effect of the embargo laws might be diminished. I refer you also to the report made to the Senate, by a committee on the documents relating to the affair of the Chesapeake, and on the letters of Mr. Champagny and Mr. Erskine; and indicating the spirit which may be expected to influence the future policy of this country, if kept under the excitement resulting from the system now pursued against it.

You will observe, at the same time, that whilst a determination is sufficiently evinced against a dishonorable acquiescence in the despotic edicts enforced on the high seas, the United States are ready to resume their export trade, as soon as the aggressions on it shall cease; and that, in a hope that this might happen during the recess of Congress, the President is authorized, in such an event, to suspend, in whole or in part, the several embargo laws.

The conditions on which the authority is to be exercised appeal equally to the justice and policy of the two great belligerent Powers, which are now emulating each other in a violation of both. The President counts on your endeavors to give to this appeal all the effect possible with the British Government. General Armstrong will be doing the same with that of France. The relation in which a revocation of its unjust decrees by either will place the United States to the other is obvious, and ought to be a motive to the measure, proportioned to the desire which has been manifested by each to produce collision between the United States and its adversary, and which must be equally felt by each to avoid one with itself.

Should the French Government revoke so much of its decrees as violate our neutral rights, or give explanations and assurances having the like effect, and entitling it, therefore, to a removal of the embargo as it applies to France, it will be impossible to view a perseverance of Great Britain in her retaliating orders in any other light than that of war, without even the pretext now assumed by her.

In order to entitle the British Government to a discontinuance of the embargo, as it applies to Great Britain, it is evident that all its decrees, as well those of January, 1807, as of November, 1807, ought to be rescinded, as they apply to the United States, and this is the rather to be looked for from the present Administration, as it has so strenuously contended that the decrees of both dates were founded on the same principles and directed to the same object.

Should the British Government take this course, you may authorize an expectation that the President will, within a reasonable time, give effect to the authority vested in him on the subject of the embargo laws. Should the orders be rescinded in part only, it must be left to his free judgment to decide on the case. In either event, you will lose no time in transmitting the information to this Department, and to General Armstrong, and, particularly, in the event of such a course being taken by the British Government as will render a suspension of the embargo certain or probable, it will be proper for you to make the communication, by a courier, to General Armstrong, to whom a correspondent instruction will be given; and, to provide a special conveyance for it hither, unless British arrangements shall present an opportunity equally certain and expeditious.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, May 9, 1808.

I had a conversation with Mr. Canning on Friday last, in consequence of the arrival of the Osage.

As it was obviously expected that I should seek an interview with him, I went to Downing street on the 5th with that object. He had been indisposed, and was not at his office; but, in answer to a note which I sent him in the evening, he asked to see me next day at his house in Bruton street.

The Osage had for some time been looked for with considerable anxiety, and the Government had apparently anticipated a communication (and perhaps a proposal) of some importance from me, as soon as my despatches should be received. As I had, in fact, no communication to make, it seemed to be proper that I should render the disappointment of as little moment as possible, by the manner of announcing it, without, however, putting anything to hazard by an indiscreet manifestation of unnecessary solicitude.

The little which I supposed it requisite to say on this occasion appeared to be very well received; and, if any disagreeable impression was left on the mind of Mr. Canning, it certainly was not visible. A feeling of regret was perhaps perceptible, and a hope was intimated that the time was not far distant, when I should be enabled to do what at present was out of my power; but nothing occurred which could be construed into a symptom of impatience, jealousy, or dissatisfaction. There was, undoubtedly, no real ground for anything of the sort; but it was, notwithstanding, quite possible that the importance, which it had become a habit to attach to the arrival of the Osage, from circumstances principally accidental, might have produced a disposition to think otherwise.

I thought it advisable to make use of this opportunity (although the topic was, in many views, more delicate than it had been) to suggest the propriety of yielding, as the moment was sufficiently favorable to such a course, upon the subject of the late Orders in Council, of which I had seen nothing to change my original opinion. There was reason to apprehend, however, that it might be worse than useless to press the suggestion upon my own authority merely, while I could say nothing of the French decrees; and, accordingly, I forbore to do so.

An idea has evidently gone forth, since the Osage arrived, founded upon rumors of a doubtful description, that our relations with France have grown to be extremely precarious, and that we are consequently about to come to an understanding of a very friendly kind with Great Britain. It is not improbable that the Government has, in some degree at least, adopted this idea.

I have the honor to enclose the copy of a notification, recently received from Mr. Canning, of the blockade of Copenhagen and of the other ports of the island of Zealand, which I have caused to be communicated in the usual manner to our Consuls and citizens.

There being no particular inducement for detaining the Osage, Lieutenant Lewis, who will be charged with my letters, will leave town the day after to-morrow; and the ship will sail as soon after he reaches Falmouth as possible.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 4, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's command to acquaint Mr. Pinkney, that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the port of Copenhagen, and all the other ports in the island of Zealand. Mr. Pinkney is therefore requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of all the ports above mentioned are and must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, June 5, 1808.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th of April, by Mr. Bethune, together with the printed and other copies of papers mentioned in it.

I am to have an interview with Mr. Canning in a few days, (which he will agree to consider extra official,) in the course of which I intend to press, by every argument in my power, the propriety of their abandoning immediately their Orders in Council, and of proposing in America (the only becoming course, as you very properly suggest,) reparation for the outrage on the Chesapeake. I shall for obvious reasons do this, informally, as my own act.

Your unanswerable reply to Mr. Erskine's letter of the 23d February has left nothing to be urged against the Orders in Council upon the score of right; and there may be room to hope that the effect, which that reply can hardly have failed to produce upon Ministers, as well by its tone as by its reasoning, will, if followed up, become, under actual circumstances, decisive. The discussion, which Mr. Rose's preliminary in the affair of the Chesapeake has undergone, gives encouragement to an expectation that this Government will not now be backward to relinquish it, and to renew their overture of satisfaction in a way more consistent with reason, and more likely to produce a just and honorable result.

You may be assured that I will not commit our Government by anything I shall do or say, and that, if I cannot make things better than they are, I will not make them worse.

My view of the course which our honor and our interests have required, and still require, is, as you know, in precise conformity with that of the President; but if it were otherwise, I should make his view, and not my own, the rule of my conduct.

Extract—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

LONDON, June 29, 1808.

I had a long interview this morning with Mr. Canning, which has given me hopes that the object mentioned in your letter of the 30th of April, (a duplicate by the packet, for the St. Michael has not yet arrived,) may be accomplished, if I should authorize the expectation which the same letter suggests. Some days must elapse, however, before I can speak with anything like certainty on this subject. The St. Michael will probably have arrived before that time, and will furnish me with an opportunity of giving you not only the result but the details of what has passed and may yet occur. I beg you, in the mean time, to be assured that the most effectual care shall be taken to put nothing to hazard, and to avoid an improper commitment of our Government.

I was questioned on the affair of the Chesapeake. There seems to be a disposition here to consider the amende honorable as already made, and, in a great degree, at least, by Mr. Rose's mission; but I am strongly inclined to think that it will not be at all difficult to induce them to renew their overture in the same manner, on terms more conformable with the view which you very justly take of this interesting subject. I was told (it was not said officially) that the persons taken out of the Chesapeake would be readily restored. The punishment of the officer (otherwise than by his recall, which has been done) will, perhaps, form the greatest embarrassment; but I will endeavor to ascertain, informally, what will be done on that and every other part of the case. My sole object will be, of course, to lead them, as occasion offers, (as far as in my power,) to do what they ought, in the way most for our honor. I can the more properly do this now, as Mr. Canning has himself proposed the subject to me, as intimated above.

Extract—Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinkney.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 18, 1808.

SIR: Your communications by Lieutenant Lewis were safely delivered on the evening of the 8th instant. As it had been calculated that the interval between the return of Mr. Rose, and the departure of Lieutenant Lewis, would give sufficient time to the British Government to decide on the course required by the posture in which the affair of the Chesapeake was left, its silence to you on that subject could not fail to excite the particular attention of the President: and the appearance is rendered the more unfavorable, by the like silence, as we learn from Mr. Erskine, of the despatches brought to him by the packet which left England, and arrived at New York, at nearly the same time with the Osage. I have intimated to Mr. Erskine the impressions made by this reserve, without, however, concealing our hope that the delay does not imply a final purpose of withholding reparation, and that the next communications from London will be of a different import. They must at least ascertain the real views of the British Government on this interesting subject.

There was certainly no just ground for Mr. Canning to expect any particular communications from you on the arrival of the Osage, unless they should have grown out of such accounts from France as would second our demands of justice from Great Britain, particularly the revocation of her Orders in Council; and in imparting to him what you did in that quarter, every proof of candor was given which the occasion admitted. If Mr. Canning was disappointed because he did not receive fresh complaints against the Orders in Council, he ought to have recollected that you had sufficiently dwelt on their offensive features in the first instance; and that, as he had chosen to make the formal communication of them to this Government through another channel, it was through that channel rather than through you that answers to it would be most regularly given.

The communications and instructions forwarded by Mr. Purviance, who was a passenger in the St. Michael, will enable you to bring the British Government to a fair issue on the subject of its orders. If it has nothing more in view than it is willing to avow, it cannot refuse to concur in an arrangement rescinding on her part the Orders in Council, and on ours the embargo. If France should concur in a like arrangement, the state of things will be restored which is the alleged object of the orders. If France does not concur, the orders will be better enforced by the continuance of the embargo against her than they are by the British fleets and cruisers; and, in the mean time, all the benefits of our trade will be thrown into the lap of Great Britain. It will be difficult, therefore, to conceive any motive in Great Britain to reject the offer which you will have made, other than the hope of inducing, on the part of France, a perseverance in her irritating policy toward the United States, and on the part of the latter hostile resentments against it.

If the British Government should have elected the more wise and more worthy course of meeting the overture of the President in the spirit which dictated it, it is to be hoped that measures will have been taken in concert with you, and through its Minister here, for hastening as much as possible the renewal of the intercourse which the orders and the embargo have suspended; and thereby smoothing the way for other salutary adjustments.

It appears that the British Government, not satisfied with the general blockade by her orders of November 11, has superadded a particular blockade, or rather a diplomatic notification of an intended one, of Copenhagen, and the other ports in the island of Zealand; that is to say, a strict and legal blockade of the whole island. The island cannot be much less than two hundred miles in its outline, and is described as abounding in inlets. It is not probable, therefore, if it be possible, that a blockade, within the true definition, should be carried into effect. And as all defective blockades, whether so in the disproportion of force to the object, or in the mode of notification, will authorize fair claims of indemnification, it is the more necessary that guarded answers should be given in such cases as heretofore suggested.

Since the British order of — evidently inviting our citizens to violate the laws of our country, by patronizing on the high seas their vessels destitute of registers and other necessary papers, and therefore necessarily smugglers if not pirates, the circular letter of Mr. Huskisson has made its appearance, in which the United States are named as alone within the purview of the order. A more extraordinary experiment is, perhaps, not to be found in the annals of modern transactions. It is levelled, moreover, against a nation towards which friendship is professed, as well as against a law the justice and validity of which is not contested; and it sets the odious example, in the face of the world, directly in opposition to all the principles which the British Government has been proclaiming to it. What becomes of the charge against the United States for receiving British subjects who leave their own country, contrary to their allegiance? What would be the charge against them if they were, by proclamation, to invite British subjects, those too expressly and particularly prohibited from leaving their country, to elude the prohibition; or to tempt, by interested inducements, a smuggling violation or evasion of laws, on which Great Britain founds so material a part of her national policy? In the midst of so many more important topics of dissatisfaction, this may not be worth a formal representation. But it will not be amiss to let that Government understand the light in which the proceeding is regarded by this. I have already touched on it to Mr. Erskine, with an intimation that I should not omit in it my observations to you.

The French decree, said to have been issued at Bayonne, has not yet reached this country. Such a decree, at such a time, has a serious aspect on the relations of the two countries, and will form a heavy item in our demands of redress. It is much to be regretted, at the same time, that any of our vessels, by neglecting to return home, and conforming to the arbitrary regulations of one belligerent, should expose themselves to the arbitrary proceedings of another. So strong and general an indignation seems particularly to prevail here against the Americans in Europe, who are trading under British licenses, and thereby sacrificing, as far as they can, the independence of their country, as well as frustrating the laws which were intended to guard American vessels and mariners from the dangers incident to foreign commerce, that their continuance in that career ought to be frowned upon, and their return home promoted in every proper manner. It appears, by information from our Consul at Tangier, that great numbers of our vessels are engaged in a trade between Great Britain and Spanish ports, under licenses from the former, and that the experiment proves as unsuccessful as it is dishonorable; the greater part of them being either arrested in port, or by French and Spanish cruizers.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, August 4, 1808.

The St. Michael arrived at Falmouth, on Thursday the 14th of last month, after a passage of eight days from L'Orient. Captain Kenyon delivered me on Wednesday the 20th, (upon my arrival in town from Brighton, where I had been for a short time on account of my health,) your letters of the 30th April, and your private letter of the 1st of May, together with newspapers, printed copies of the embargo act, and its supplements, and of papers laid before Congress at their last session. Mr. Hall brought me a letter from General Armstrong of the 26th of June, (of which I send an extract,) and Mr. Upson brought me a private letter from him, with the following postscript of the 1st of July: "An order has been received from Bayonne to condemn eight other of our ships."

On Friday, the 22d of July, I had an interview with Mr. Canning, and renewed my efforts to obtain a revocation of the British orders of January and November, 1807, and of the other orders dependent upon them. I have already informed you, in my private letter of the 29th of June, that, on the morning of its date, I had a long conversation with Mr. Canning, which had rendered it somewhat probable that the object mentioned in your letter of the 30th of April, (of which I had received a duplicate by the packet,) would be accomplished, if I should authorize the expectation which that letter suggests, but that some days must elapse before I could speak with any thing like certainty on the subject; and I have mentioned in another private letter (of the 10th of July) that it was understood between Mr. Canning and myself that another interview should take place soon after the prorogation of Parliament. In effect, however, Mr. Canning was not prepared to see me again, until the 22d of July, after I had been recalled to London by the arrival of the St. Michael, and had, in consequence, reminded him of our arrangement by a private note.

In the interview of the 29th of June, I soon found it necessary to throw out an intimation that the power vested in the President by Congress, to suspend the embargo act and its supplements, would be exercised, as regarded Great Britain, if their orders were repealed as regarded the United States. To have urged the revocation upon the mere ground of strict policy, or of general right, and there to have left the subject, when I was authorized to have placed it upon grounds infinitely stronger, would have been, as it appeared to me, to stop short of my duty. Your letters to Mr. Erskine (which Mr. Canning has read and considered) had exhausted the first of these grounds; and endless discussions here, in every variety of form, in and out of Parliament, had exhausted the second. There was, besides, no objection of any force to my availing myself, without delay, of the powerful inducements which the intimation in question was likely to furnish to Great Britain to abandon her late system; and it seemed to be certain that, by delaying to present these inducements to Mr. Canning's consideration, I should not only lose much time, but finally give to my conduct a disingenuous air, which, while it must be foreign to the views and sentiments of the President, could hardly fail to make a very unfavorable impression upon the minds of Mr. Canning and his colleagues. I thought, moreover, that if I should reserve the suggestion for a late stage of our discussions, it would be made to wear the appearance of a concession reluctantly extorted, rather than of, what it was, the spontaneous result of the characteristic frankness and honorable policy of our Government.

The intimation once made, a complete development of its natural consequences, if properly acted upon, followed of course; and, taking advantage of the latitude afforded by the informal nature of a mere conversation, I endeavored to make that development as strong an appeal as, consistently with truth and honor, I could (and there was no necessity to do more) to the justice and the prudence of this Government.

It was not possible, however, that Mr. Canning could require to be assisted by my explanations. It was plain, upon their own principles, that they could not equitably persevere in their Orders in Council, upon the foundation of an imputed acquiescence, on our part, in French invasions of our neutral rights, when it was become (if it was not always) apparent that this imputation was completely and in all respects an error; when it was manifest that these orders, by letting loose upon our rights a more destructive and offensive persecution than it was in the power of France to maintain, interposed between us and France, furnished answers to our remonstrances against her decrees and pretexts for those decrees, and stood in the way of that very resistance which Great Britain affected to inculcate, as a duty, at the moment when she was taking the most effectual measures to embarrass and confound it; and when it was also manifest that a revocation of those orders would, if not attended or followed by a revocation of the decrees of France, place us at issue with that Power, and result in a precise opposition, by the United States, to such parts of the anti-commercial edicts as it became us to repel.

In a prudential view, my explanations seemed still less to be required. Nothing could be more clear than that, if Great Britain revoked her orders, and entitled herself to a suspension of the embargo, her object, (if it were anything short of the establishment and practical support of an exclusive dominion over the seas) must, in some mode or other, be accomplished, whether France followed her example or not. In the first case, the avowed purpose of the British orders would be fulfilled, and commerce would resume its accustomed prosperity and expansion. In the last, the just resistance of the United States (more efficacious than that of the British orders) to French irregularities and aggressions, would be left to its fair operation, (and it was impossible to mistake the consequences,) while the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, being revived, would open the way for a return to good understanding, and, in the end, for an adjustment of all their differences.

On the 20th of July I met Mr. Canning again, and was soon apprized that our discussions, if continued at all, must take a new form.

These, and many other reflections of a similar tendency, which I forbear to repeat, could not have escaped the penetration of Mr. Canning, if they had not been suggested to him in considerable detail. But whatever might be their influence upon his mind, he certainly did not pronounce any opinion; and what he said consisted principally of inquiries, with a view to a more accurate comprehension of my purpose. He asked if I thought of taking a more formal course than I was now pursuing; but immediately remarked that he presumed I did not, for that the course I had adopted was undoubtedly well suited to the occasion. I told him that I was so entirely persuaded that the freedom of conversation was so much better adapted to the nature of our subject, and so much more likely to conduct us to a beneficial result, than the constraint and formality of written communication, which usually grew into protracted discussion, and always produced embarrassment when there was anything of delicacy in the topics, that I had not intended to present any note.

This interview (in the progress of which other points were incidentally touched upon) did not authorize any very confident opinion that Mr. Canning approved of what had been suggested to him; and still less could it warrant any anticipation of the final opinion of his Government. But the manner in which my communication was received, and the readiness shown by Mr. Canning to proceed in the mode which was peculiarly favorable to my object, connected with the reasonableness of the object itself, induced me to think it rather probable that the issue would be satisfactory.

The interview of the 22d of July was far from producing anything of an unpromising complexion. I urged again much of what had been said at the last conference, and suggested such further considerations as had since occurred to me in support of my demand. Mr. Canning was still much more reserved than I had hoped to find him; after so much time had been taken for deliberation; but, from all that passed, I was more than ever inclined to believe that the orders would be relinquished. He seemed now to be extremely desirous of ascertaining whether I was authorized and disposed, with a view to a final arrangement, to present what I had suggested, as to the suspension of the embargo, in a more precise shape. I told him, after some conversation upon this point, that, although I would prefer that course which was the least formal, yet, if everything should be first matured, I might be able to combine, with a written demand that their orders should be repealed, such an assurance as I had already mentioned, that the embargo would be suspended; but that I would consider of this with reference to the manner and terms. He then observed, that I would perhaps allow him a little time to reflect whether he would put me to the necessity of presenting such a paper; and, upon my assenting to this, he said that he would give me another appointment towards the end of the following week. As I was on the point of leaving him, he asked me if I would endeavor to prepare, before the next interview, such a note as we had talked of; but he had scarcely made this proposal before he added, "but you will, doubtless, desire first to know what are our ideas and intentions upon the whole subject."

On the 29th of July I met Mr. Canning again, and was soon apprized that our discussions, if continued, must take a new form. He began by inquiring if I had received any intelligence of a late affair on the Lakes, which had caused great alarm and anxiety among the British traders, and of which an account had just been put into his hands. He then read, very rapidly, from a letter, apparently written in Canada, a complaint of an attack upon some British boats, in violation of the third article of the Treaty of 1794, and observed that this was the more to be regretted, as it followed some recent misunderstandings in the Bay of Passamaquoddy. I told him that I had no intelligence, official or private, of these transactions, which he would perceive took place upon our borders, at a great distance from the seat of Government, and that of course I could only express my conviction that the Government of the United States would disavow whatever was improper in the conduct of its agents, and would in other respects act as good faith and honor required.

This matter being disposed of, Mr. Canning said that he had thought long and anxiously upon what I had suggested to him at our late conferences; that the subject had at first struck him as much more simple and free from difficulty than upon careful examination it was found to be; that, in the actual state of the world, it behooved both him and me to move in this affair with every possible degree of circumspection, an intimation which he did not explain; that, without some explicit proposal on my part, in writing, upon which the British Government could deliberate and act, nothing could be done; and, finally, that he must leave me to consult my own discretion whether I would make such a proposal.

I answered that, with such a previous understanding between us as I had counted upon, I should feel no objection to take occasion to say, in an official note requiring the revocation of their Orders in Council, that the orders being rescinded as to us, it was the intention of the President to suspend the embargo as to Great Britain; but that I expected to be told, before my note was presented, what would be the reply to it, and what its consequences in every direction; and that I could not conjecture, if it was really meant to acquiesce in my demand, (the exact nature of it being, in point of fact, understood by this Government just as well as if it had been made in writing,) or if more time than had already been afforded was required for deliberation, why it was necessary that I should, in the last case, take the step in question at all, or, in the first case, without being frankly apprized of the effect it would produce.

Mr. Canning replied that my wish in this particular could not be acceded to; that, if I presented a note, they must be left at perfect liberty to decide upon what it proposed; that he could not give me even an intimation of the probable consequences of it; and, in a word, that he would neither invite nor discourage such a proceeding. He observed, too, that there were some points belonging to the subject which it was necessary to discuss in writing; that my suggestions implied that the embargo was produced by the British Orders in Council; that this could not be admitted; and that there were other questions incident to these two measures, with the examination of which it was proper to begin upon an occasion like the present. I remarked, in answer, that, with an actual result in view, and with a wish to arrive at that result without delay, nothing could be worse imagined than to entangle ourselves in a written correspondence, undefined as to its scope and duration, upon topics on which we were not likely to agree; that if I were compelled to frame my note, with a knowledge that it was to provoke argument, instead of leading at this momentous crisis to a salutary change in the state of the world, he must be conscious that I, too, must argue, and that I could not justify it to my Government to abstain from a complete assertion of all its pretensions, and a full exposure of the true character of those acts of which it complained as illegal and unjust. And where would this end? To what wholesome consequence could it lead?

My remarks having no effect, I made a further slight attempt to ascertain the reception which my note would meet with, if I should determine to present one. This attempt failed; but I believed it to be apparent that, if any other consequence than mere discussion should follow the receipt of my note, it would be at a great distance.

At the close of the conference I observed, that, as the footing upon which this interview had placed this subject made delay of no importance, I should take time to prepare such further proceeding as might appear to me to be required by the occasion.

I ought to mention that I give you in this letter the substance only of the conversation which it states, and that there was nothing in any degree unfriendly in the language or manner of Mr. Canning. I need not say that I thought it my duty to adopt the same tone and manner.

My desire to send a duplicate of this hasty letter by the packet induces me to defer, until another opportunity, all reflections upon the turn which this affair has taken.

As there is now no occasion for detaining the St. Michael, she will be dispatched immediately for L'Orient.

[Referred to and enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's letter of August 4.]

Extract—General Armstrong to Mr. Pinkney.

PARIS, June 26, 1808.

The St. Michael arrived at L'Orient on the 1st instant, and the Government messenger at

Relations with Great Britain.

Paris on the 8th. A passport for the vessel to Falmouth, and thence to L'Orient again, was immediately requested, but one in this form could only be granted by order of the Emperor, and this was not given until the 18th. These circumstances will account for the long detention of your despatches. We have reason to regret that the views of our Government, founded on the justice and wisdom of the belligerent Powers, are so little likely to succeed. Attempts of this character made here (and they have not been unfrequent) have hitherto done no good; nay, the repetition of these may be fairly presumed to have done mischief, inasmuch as it has tended to establish a creed, that words, in some form or other, are the only means we have to employ. The French Council of Prizes, which is, I am told, as like the English Court of Admiralty as one egg is like another, has lately begun its career of condemnation. Between the 1st and 15th instant, five cases have been decided, and I am assured that orders have been received from Bayonne for condemning all American cases "en bloc." What has suspended the axe since the 15th, we can but conjecture. It may be presumed that the reflections of the Spanish junta on the political and other relations subsisting between Spain and the United States, through the medium of the colonies, may have produced this pause. That it is not owing to any conquest which good principles have obtained over bad ones, is certain. Are things any better on your side the channel? &c.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, September 6, 1808.

I have an opportunity of writing by Mr. Bethune, who leaves town to-morrow for Falmouth, to embark for the United States in the British packet, and I cannot omit to take advantage of it, although I have still nothing conclusive to communicate.

The Hope arrived off Falmouth and landed Mr. Atwater on the 16th of last month, and immediately proceeded on her voyage to Havre, with a fair wind. Mr. Atwater arrived in London on the 20th, in the evening, and delivered your letter of the 18th of July.

My public letter of the 4th of August will have apprized you of the footing on which my different interviews with Mr. Canning left the subject of the British Orders in Council, and my private letter of the 2d of that month will have made you acquainted with my intention to present, in an official note, what I had ineffectually suggested in conference.

To such a course there could not, even in the first instance, have been any other objection than that it was calculated to lead to discussion rather than to adjustment; but whatever might be its tendency, it is certain that I could have no inducement to resort to it, until it was indicated by Mr. Canning as indispensable, nor any motive to decline it afterwards.

At our last interview, and not before, it was unexpectedly found that it was in that mode only that I could obtain a knowledge of the light in which this Government thought fit to view the overture I had been directed to make to it, and I determined, in consequence, to lay before it, in writing, the intention of the President, with the same frankness which had characterized my verbal communications.

I have now the honor to transmit a copy of the note, which, in conformity with that determination, I delivered in person to Mr. Canning, on the 26th of last month, a few days after its date. To this note no answer has yet been returned, but it is to be presumed that it will not be much longer withheld.

You will perceive that some time had elapsed after I had sent off my despatches by the St. Michael (the 8th of August) before my note was presented. The truth is, that I had employed a part of that time in framing a note of great length, which, when nearly completed, I thought it prudent to abandon, in favor of one that held out fewer invitations to unprofitable discussions, which, although I would not shun them if pressed upon me, I did not suppose it proper that I should seek.

I believed, too, that a little delay on my part would be far from being disadvantageous. There would still be sufficient time for obtaining a final answer to my proposal, in season for the meeting of Congress; and as the temper of this Government, so far as it had been tried, had not appeared to be favorable to my purpose, I believed that I should act in the spirit of my instructions, and consult the honor of my Government, by avoiding, under such circumstances, the appearance of urgency and precipitation.

Upon the terms or general plan of my note it is not, I hope, necessary to remark. You will discover that it was prepared under a persuasion that, whatever might be its effect, it was infinitely better to make it as conciliatory as, without a sacrifice of principle or national dignity, was possible.

The topics to be embraced by it were such as did not demand, but rather forbade, minute expositions. While it was difficult to urge, in their full force, without seeming to aim at exciting a disposition unfriendly to the object of my instructions, all the considerations which justified the United States in remonstrating against the British orders, it was yet more difficult, without a degree of harshness scarcely suited to the occasion, and without also the hazard of indiscretion, to display in detail the signal injustice and impolicy of persevering in them, after what I had proposed. This could be done, and had been done, in conversation; but it did not, upon trial, appear to be equally practicable in the more formal and measured proceedings which I was now called upon to adopt.

I considered, besides, that an overture so highly advantageous to Great Britain, which the United States were not bound to make by any obligations of equity, although it was wise to make it, did not require, with any view to the character of my country, or even to the success of the overture itself, to be again recommended by an anxious repetition of arguments already fully understood.

As soon as my note was prepared, I called at the Foreign Office to arrange an interview with Mr. Canning, for the purpose of enabling me to accompany the delivery of it with a communication which I deemed important, as well as of affording him an opportunity of asking and receiving such explanations as he might desire. The interview took place on the 26th of August.

It had occurred to me that it would be proper (and could not be injurious) to read to Mr. Canning, from your letter to me of the 18th of July, a brief summary of the instructions under which I was acting. This had not been requested, but it could not be unacceptable, and it was, besides, well calculated to do justice to the liberal sentiments by which my instructions had been dictated, as well as to give weight to my efforts in the execution of them.

I was led, by the reading of these passages, (without having originally intended it,) into a more extensive explanation than I had before attempted of the influence which the proposal of my Government would have, in truth, as well as in the judgment of the world, upon the supposed justice of their new system, as it affected the United States. To that explanation, with the particulars of which I will not, and indeed, for want of time, cannot, at present trouble you, I added a concise recapitulation of some of the prudential considerations which had been so often pressed before, and there I left the subject.

I am, &c., WM. PINKNEY.

[Enclosed in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
August 23, 1808.

SIR: I have had the honor, in consequence of the orders of the President, to recall your attention, in the course of several recent interviews, to the British Orders in Council of the 7th of January, and 11th of November, 1807, and to the various other orders founded upon or in execution of them, and I now take the liberty to renew, in the mode which I have understood to be indispensable, my instances on that subject.

I need scarcely remind you, sir, that the Government of the United States has never ceased to consider these orders as violating its rights, and affecting most destructively its interests, upon grounds wholly inadmissible, both in principle and fact.

The letters of Mr. Madison to Mr. Erskine, of the 20th and 29th of March, 1807, produced by the official communication of that Minister of the order of the 7th of January, and the answer of Mr. Madison of the 25th of March, 1808, to a like communication of the orders of the 11th of November, contained the most direct remonstrances against the system which these orders introduce and execute, and expressed the confident expectation of the President that it would not be persisted in.

That expectation has not yet been fulfilled, but it has, notwithstanding, not been relinquished. The President is still persuaded that its accomplishment will result from a careful review by His Majesty's Government, made in the spirit of moderation and equity, of the facts and considerations which belong to the occasion.

It is not my purpose to recapitulate in this note the statements and reasonings contained in the above-mentioned letters of Mr. Madison in support of the claims of the Government of the United States, that the British orders be revoked. I content myself with referring to those letters for proofs, which it is not necessary to repeat, and for arguments which I could not hope to improve.

But there are explanations which those letters do not contain, and which it is proper for me now to make. Even these, however, may be very briefly given, since you have already been made acquainted, in our late conversations, with all their bearings and details.

These explanations go to show that, while every motive of justice conspires to produce a disposition to recall the orders of which my Government complains, it is become apparent that even their professed object will be best attained by their revocation.

I have the honor to state to you, sir, that it was the intention of the President, in case Great Britain repealed her orders as regarded the United States, to exercise the power vested in him by the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States, under certain conditions, to suspend the operation of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several supplementary acts thereto," by suspending the embargo law and its supplements as regards Great Britain.

I am authorized to give you this assurance in the most formal manner; and I trust that, upon impartial inquiry, it will be found to leave no inducement to perseverance in the British orders, while it creates the most powerful inducements of equity and policy to abandon them.

On the score of justice, it does not seem possible to mistake the footing upon which this overture places the subject, and I venture to believe that in any other view there is as little room for doubt.

If, as I propose, your orders should be rescinded as to the United States, and our embargo rescinded as to Great Britain, the effect of these concurrent acts will be, that the commercial intercourse of the two countries will be immediately resumed; while, if France should adhere to maxims and conduct derogatory to the neutral rights of the United States, the embargo, continuing as to her, will take the place of your orders, and lead, with an efficacy not merely equal to theirs, but probably much greater, to all the consequences that ought to result from them.

On the other hand, if France should concur in respecting those rights, and commerce should thus regain its fair immunities, and the law of nations its just dominion, all the alleged purposes of the British orders will have been at once fulfilled.

If I forbear to pursue these ideas through all the illustrations of which they are susceptible, it is because the personal conferences to which I have before alluded, as well as the obvious nature of the ideas themselves, render it unnecessary.

I cannot conclude this note without expressing my sincere wish that what I have now suggested, in conformity with the liberal sentiments and enlightened views of the President, may contribute, not only to remove the more immediate obstacles to the ordinary intercourse of trade between your country and mine, in a manner consistent with the honor of both, but to prepare the way for a satisfactory adjustment of every question important to their future friendship.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING, &c.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, September 21, 1808.

DEAR SIR: The Hope arrived at Cowes, from France, on the 13th instant.

Not having heard from Mr. Canning, although he returned to London on the 16th, I called again yesterday at Downing street, and was assured that the answer to my note would be sent to-night, or early to-morrow morning. Mr. Atwater will of course be able to leave town on Friday, and embark on Saturday, with a copy of it.

I have been told, since the arrival of the last British packet, (but do not believe it,) that there is more probability than I had anticipated that the late events in Spain and Portugal (which ought not to be considered as deciding anything) will have an effect on public opinion in America against the continuance of the embargo, and favorable to all the purposes of Great Britain. If this were true, I should think that it was deeply to be lamented. I may misunderstand the subject, but I cannot persuade myself that anything that has happened on this side the Atlantic ought to induce us to retreat in any degree from our present system.

If we should resolve to trade with Spain and Portugal (Great Britain and France persisting in their orders and decrees) in any way to which Great Britain would not object, we must suspend the embargo as to those countries only, or as to those countries and Great Britain, or we must repeal it altogether.

The temptation to the first of these courses is, even in a commercial sense, inconsiderable; the objections to it endless. The object to be gained (if no more was gained than ought to be gained) would be trifling. There could, indeed, be no gain. An inadequate market, redundantly supplied, would be more injurious than no market at all. It would be a lure to destruction, and nothing more.

A suspension of the embargo so limited in its nature as this would be, (supposing it to be in fact what it would be in form,) would have a most unequal and invidious operation in the different quarters of the Union, of which the various commodities would not, in the ports of Portugal and Spain, be in equal demand. A war with France would be inevitable, and such a war, so produced, from which we could not hope to derive either honor or advantage, would place us at the mercy of Great Britain, and, on that account, would in the end do more to cripple and humble us than any disaster that could otherwise befall us.

The actual state of Spain and Portugal, is, moreover, not to be relied upon. My first opinion on that subject remains; but even the most sanguine will admit that there is great room for doubt. The Emperor of France is evidently collecting a mighty force for the reduction of Spain, and Portugal must share its fate. And even if that force should be destined (as some suppose) first to contend with Austria, the speedy subjugation of Spain is not the less certain. If France should succeed, Spain and Portugal would again fall under the British orders of November, as well as under the operation of the French decrees. Our cargoes would scarcely have forced their way to the ocean in search of this boasted market before they would be once more in a state of prohibition; and we should, in the mean time, have incurred the scandal of suffering an impatient thirst of gain to seduce us from our principles into a dilemma presenting no alternative but loss, in all the senses of that word.

But it is not even certain what Great Britain would herself finally say to such a partial suspension of the embargo. She would doubtless, at first, approve of it; but her ultimate course, (especially if war between France and the United States were not the immediate consequence, or if the measure were eventually less beneficial to herself than might be supposed at the outset,) ought not to be trusted. That she would approve at first is hardly to be questioned; and the considerations upon which she would do so are precisely those which should dissuade us from it. Some of these are—the aid it would afford to her allies, as well as to her own troops co-operating with them, and its consequent tendency to destroy everything like system in our conduct; its tendency to embroil us with France; its tendency to induce us, by overstocking a limited market, to make our commodities of no value, to dissipate our capital, to ruin our merchants without benefiting our agriculture, to destroy our infant manufactures without benefiting our commerce; its tendency to habituate us to a trammelled trade, and to fit us for acquiescence in a maritime despotism. But there are other reasons. Our trade with Spain and Portugal, while it lasted, would be a circuitous trade with Great Britain and her colonies, for their benefit; our productions would be carried in the first instance to Spain and Portugal, would be bought there for British account, and would find their way to the West Indies, or centre here, as British convenience might require; and thus, in effect, the embargo would be removed as to Britain, while it continued as to France, and we professed to continue it as to both. And if any profits should arise from this sordid traffic, they would become a fund to enable us to import into the United States, directly or indirectly, the manufactures of Great Britain, and thus relieve her in another way, while her orders would prevent us from receiving the commodities of her enemy. It would be far better openly to take off the embargo as to Great Britain, than, while affecting to continue it as to that Power, to do what must rescue her completely (and that, too, without advantage to ourselves) from the pressure of it, at the same time that it would promote her views against France in Portugal and Spain.

As to withdrawing the embargo from Great Britain as well as Spain and Portugal, while the British orders are unrepealed, the objections to that course are just as strong now as they were four months ago. The change in Spain and Portugal (if it were even likely to last) cannot touch the principle of the embargo as regards Great Britain, who reasserts her orders of November in the very explanations of the 4th of July, under which we must trade with those countries if we trade with them at all. If we include Great Britain in the suspension, and exclude France, we do now what we have declined to do before, for the sake of delusive commerce, which may perish before it can be enjoyed, and cannot, in any event, be enjoyed with credit, with advantage, or even with safety. We take part at once with Great Britain against France, at a time the least suited that could be imagined to such a determination; at a time when it might be said that we were emboldened by French reverses to do what before we could not resolve upon, or were tempted by the prospect of a scanty profit, exaggerated by our cupidity and impatience, to forget what was due to consistency, to character, to permanent prosperity. We sanction, too, the maritime pretensions which insult and injure us. We throw ourselves, bound hand and foot, upon the generosity of a Government that has hitherto refused us justice, and all this when the affair of the Chesapeake and a host of other wrongs are unredressed, and when Great Britain has just rejected an overture which she must have accepted with eagerness if her views were not such as it became us to suspect and guard against.

To repeal the embargo altogether would be preferable to either of the other courses, but would, notwithstanding, be so fatal to us, in all respects, that we should long feel the wound it would inflict, unless, indeed, some other expedient, as strong at least, and as efficacious in all its bearings, can (as I fear it cannot) be substituted in its place.

War would seem to be the unavoidable result of such a step. If our commerce should not flourish in consequence of this measure, nothing would be gained by it but dishonor; and how it could be carried on to any valuable purpose it would be difficult to show. If our commerce should flourish in spite of French and British edicts and the miserable state of the world, in spite of war with France, if that should happen it would, I doubt not, be assailed in some other form. The spirit of monopoly has seized the people and Government of this country. We shall not, under any circumstances, be tolerated as rivals in navigation and trade. It is in vain to hope that Great Britain will voluntarily foster the naval means of the United States. Even as allies we should be subjects of jealousy. It would be endless to enumerate in detail the evils which would cling to us in this new career of vassalage and meanness, and tedious to pursue our backward course to the extinction of that very trade to which we had sacrificed everything else.

On the other hand, if we persevere, we must gain our purpose at last. By complying with the little policy of the moment, we shall be lost. By a great and systematic adherence to principle, we shall find the end of our difficulties.

The embargo, and the loss of our trade, are deeply felt here, and will be felt with more severity every day. The wheat harvest is likely to be alarmingly short, and the state of the Continent will augment the evil. The discontents among their manufacturers are only quieted for the moment by temporary causes. Cotton is rising, and will soon be scarce. Unfavorable events on the Continent will subdue the temper, unfriendly to wisdom and justice, which now prevails here. But, above all, the world will, I trust, be convinced that our firmness is not to be shaken. Our measures have not been without effect. They have not been decisive, because we have not been thought capable of persevering in self-denial, if that can be called self-denial which is no more than prudent abstinence from destruction and dishonor.

I ought to mention that I have been told by a most respectable American merchant here, that large quantities of such woollen cloths as are prohibited by our non-importation act have been and continue to be sent to Canada, with the view of being smuggled into the United States.

I need not tell you that I am not induced to trouble you with my hasty reflections because I think you stand in need of them. I give them merely because I believe that you are entitled to know the impressions which a public servant on this side of the water receives from a view of our situation.

P. S. September 24.—Mr. Canning's answer, received last night, confirms all my late anticipations. It is a little extraordinary that, if a written proposal was required from me with the idle motive mentioned in the accompanying paper, no such motive was suggested at the time, and even that other motives were suggested. The fact probably is, that they wished to evade the overture, and hoped that it would not be formally made. Being made, it was difficult to dispose of it, and hence the delay.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, September 24, 1808.

SIR: I am now enabled to transmit to you a copy of Mr. Canning's answer, received only last night, to my note of the 23d of August. This answer was accompanied by a letter, of which also a copy is enclosed, recapitulating what Mr. Canning supposes to be "the substance of what has passed between us at our several interviews, previous to the presentation of my official letter."

To the accompanying paper I think it indispensable that I should reply without delay, supporting with politeness, but with firmness, the statements which I have already had the honor to make to you of the conversations in question, and correcting some errors upon points which Mr. Canning has thought fit to introduce into his letter, but which I had not supposed it necessary to mention in detail in my despatches.

I shall not detain Mr. Atwater with a view to this reply, but will take care to forward a copy of it by an early conveyance. My official note, and the answer to it, being perfectly explicit, Mr. Canning's misapprehensions (for such they are) of previous verbal communications can scarcely be very important in a public view; but it is, nevertheless, of some consequence, that, whatever may be the object of his statement, I should not make myself a party to its inaccuracies by even a tacit admission of them.

I do not perceive that a formal reply to the more official paper can now be of any advantage, but I shall probably take occasion to combine with my reply to the one paper some observations upon the other.

I regret extremely that the views which I have been instructed to lay before this Government have not been met by it as I had at first been led to expect. The overture cannot fail, however, to place in a strong light the just and liberal sentiments by which our Government is animated, and, in other respects, to be useful and honorable to our country.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 23, 1808.

SIR: In laying before the King your letter of the 23d of August, and in communicating to you the enclosed answer which I have received His Majesty's commands to return to it, I confess that I feel some little embarrassment from the repeated references which your letter contains to what has passed between us in conversation—an embarrassment arising, in no degree, as you are perfectly aware, from any feeling of distrust in you, personally, but from a recollection of the misrepresentation, which took place in America, of former conferences between us. You gave me, on that occasion, the most satisfactory proof that such misrepresentation did not originate with you, by communicating to me that part of your despatch in which the conferences particularly referred to were related, and related correctly; but this very circumstance, while it establishes your personal claim to entire confidence, proves, at the same time, that a faithful report of a conference on your part is not a security against its misrepresentation. It was for that reason principally, that, after hearing with the most respectful attention all that you had to state to me verbally on the subject of the present overture, I felt myself under the necessity of requiring, as "indispensable," a written communication upon the subject. It is for that reason, also, that as, in your written communication, you refer me to our late conversations for the "bearings and details" of your proposal, I feel it necessary to recapitulate, as shortly as I can, what I conceive to have passed in those conversations beyond what I find recorded in your letter.

The principal points in which the suggestions brought forward by you in personal conference appear to me to have differed, in some degree, from the proposal now stated by you in writing, are two: the first, that, in conversation, the proposal itself was not distinctly stated as an overture authorized by your Government; the second, that the beneficial consequences likely to result to this country from the acceptance of that proposal, were "pursued" through more ample "illustrations."

In the first of our conferences, I understood you to say little more, on the authority of your Government, than that you were instructed to remonstrate against the Orders in Council of the 7th of January, and of the 11th of November, 1807, but to add, as from yourself, an expression of your own conviction that, if those orders were repealed, the President of the United States would suspend the embargo with respect to Great Britain. Upon the consequences of such a suspension of the embargo, while it would still continue to be in force against France, you expatiated largely; still speaking, however, as I understood, your own individual sentiments. It was suggested by you that America, in that case, would probably arm her merchant ships against the aggressions of France, an expedient to which, you observed, it would be perfectly idle to resort against Great Britain. The collision of armed vessels would probably produce war, and the United States would thus be brought into the very situation in which we must wish to place them, that of hostility to France, and virtual, if not formal alliance with Great Britain.

In our second conference you repeated and enforced these arguments, calculated to induce the British Government to consent to the repeal of the Orders in Council; and, in this conference, though not stating yourself to be authorized by your Government formally to offer the suspension of the embargo as an immediate consequence of that repeal, yet you did profess (as I understood you) a readiness to take upon yourself to make that offer, provided that I would give you beforehand an unofficial assurance that, coupled with that offer so made, the demand of the repeal of the Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, would be favorably received. I, of course, declined to give any such previous assurance; but as you appeared to attach great importance to this suggestion, and as I was led to think that a compliance with it might relieve you from a difficulty in executing the instructions of your Government, I consented to take a few days to consider of it, and to reserve my definitive answer until I should see you again.

I never doubted, in my own mind, as to the inexpediency and impropriety of encouraging you to take an unauthorized step, by an unofficial promise that it should be well received. But, in a matter of such delicacy, I was desirous of either confirming or correcting my own opinion by the opinions of others. The result was, that, in a third interview, which took place shortly after the second, I had the honor to inform you, that, after the most mature deliberation, I found it impossible to yield to your suggestion; and that it therefore remained for you to frame your proposition according to the instructions of your Government, or to your own unbiassed discretion.

My own share in these several conferences, beyond what is implied in the above statement, was very small. I have, as you know, always rather wished to refer the argumentative discussion of the subject of the Orders in Council to the official correspondence I have more than once been taught to expect you to open upon it, than to engage with you in a verbal controversy, which, if confined to ourselves, would be useless; if afterwards to be reduced into writing for the purpose of being communicated to our respective Governments, superfluous.

But to the representations which you have repeatedly made against the Orders in Council of January and November, as "violating the rights of the United States, and affecting most destructively their best interests, upon grounds wholly inadmissible, both in principle and in fact." I have uniformly maintained the "unquestionable right" of His Majesty to "resort to the fullest measures of retaliation, in consequence of the unparalleled aggression of the enemy, and to retort upon that enemy the evils of his own injustice;" and have uniformly contended that, "if third parties suffer from those measures, the demand of reparation must be made to that Power which first violates the established usages of war and the rights of neutral States."

There was, indeed, one point, upon which I was particularly anxious to receive precise information, and upon which, from your candor and frankness, I was fortunate enough to obtain it. The connecting together, in your proposed overture, the suspension of the embargo and the repeal of the Orders in Council, (as well those of November as the preceding one of the 7th of January,) might appear to imply that the embargo had been the immediate consequence of these orders; and I was therefore desirous to ascertain whether, in fact, the Orders in Council of November had been known to the Government of the United States, previously to the Message of the President proposing the embargo, so as to be a moving consideration to that Message. I had the satisfaction to learn from you, sir, that such was not the fact; that rumors, indeed might have reached America of some measure of further retaliation being in the contemplation of the British Government; that perhaps, (as I understood you,) some more severe and sweeping measure might have been expected, but that of the Orders in Council of the 11th of November as having been actually issued, there was no certain knowledge in America, or at least none in the possession of the American Government, at the time of proposing the embargo.

Such, sir, is, according to the best of my recollection, correctly the substance of what has passed between us at our several interviews, previous to the presentation of your official letter; and such I have represented to have been the substance of what passed on these several occasions, in the report of our conferences which it has been my duty to make to the King.

If, in this recapitulation, there is anything mistaken, or anything omitted, you will do me the justice to believe the error unintentional, and you may rely on my readiness to set it right.

I have the honor to be,

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Sept. 23, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had the honor to receive the official letter addressed to him by Mr. Pinkney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, respecting the Orders in Council issued by His Majesty on the 7th January and 11th November, 1807.

He has laid that letter before the King; and he is commanded to assure Mr. Pinkney that the answer to the proposal, which Mr. Pinkney was instructed to bring forward, has been deferred only in the hope that the renewed application, which was understood to have been recently made by the Government of the United States to that of France, might, in the new state of things which has arisen in Europe, have met with such a reception in France as would have rendered the compliance of His Majesty with that proposal consistent, as much with His Majesty's own dignity, and with the interests of his people, as it would have been with His Majesty's disposition towards the United States.

Unhappily, there is now no longer any reason to believe that such a hope is likely to be realized, and the undersigned is, therefore, commanded to communicate to Mr. Pinkney the decision which, under the circumstances as they stand, His Majesty feels himself compelled, however unwillingly, to adopt.

The mitigated measure of retaliation, announced by His Majesty in the Order in Council of the 7th January, and the further extension of that measure (an extension in operation, but not in principle) by the Orders in Council of November, were founded (as has been already repeatedly avowed by His Majesty) on the "unquestionable right of His Majesty to retort upon the enemy the evils of his own injustice;" and upon the consideration, that "if third parties incidentally sufferred by these retaliatory measures, they were to seek their redress from the Power by whose original aggression that retaliation was occasioned."

His Majesty sees nothing in the embargo laid on by the President of the United States of America, which varies this original and simple state of the question.

If considered as a measure of impartial hostility against both belligerents, the embargo appears to His Majesty to have been manifestly unjust, as, according to every principle of justice, that redress ought to have been first sought from the party originating the wrong. And His Majesty cannot consent to buy off that hostility, which America ought not to have extended to him, at the expense of a concession made, not to America, but to France.

If, as it has more generally been represented by the Government of the United States, the embargo is only to be considered as an innocent municipal regulation, which affects none but the United States themselves, and with which no foreign State has any concern; viewed in this light, His Majesty does not conceive that he has the right, or the pretension, to make any complaint of it, and he has made none. But, in this light, there appears not only no reciprocity, but no assignable relation, between the repeal, by the United States, of a measure of voluntary self restriction, and surrender, by His Majesty, of his right of retaliation against his enemies.

The Government of the United States is not now to be informed that the Berlin decree of November 21st, 1806, was the practical commencement of an attempt, not merely to check or impair the prosperity of Great Britain, but utterly to annihilate her political existence, through the ruin of her commercial prosperity; that, in this attempt, almost all the Powers of the European continent have been compelled, more or less, to co-operate; and that the American embargo, though most assuredly not intended to that end, (for America can have no real interest in the subversion of the British power, and her rulers are too enlightened to act from any impulse, against the real interests of their country,) but, by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intention, the American embargo did come in aid of the "blockade of the European continent," precisely at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would most effectually have contributed to its success.

To this universal combination His Majesty has opposed a temperate but a determined retaliation upon the enemy; trusting that a firm resistance would defeat this project, but knowing that the smallest concession would infallibly encourage a perseverance in it.

The struggle has been viewed by other Powers, not without an apprehension that it might be fatal to this country. The British Government has not disguised from itself that the trial of such an experiment might be arduous and long, though it has never doubted of the final issue. But if that issue, such as the British Government confidently anticipated, has providentially arrived much sooner than could even have been hoped; if "the blockade of the Continent," as it has been triumphantly styled by the enemy, is raised even before it had been well established; and if that system, of which extent and continuity were the vital principles, is broken up into fragments utterly harmless and contemptible; it is nevertheless important, in the highest degree, to the reputation of this country, (a reputation which constitutes great part of her power,) that this disappointment of the hopes of her enemies should not have been purchased by any concession; that no doubt should remain to distant times of her determination and of her ability to have continued her resistance; and that no step, which could even mistakenly be construed into concession, should be taken on her part, while the smallest link of the confederacy remains undissolved, or while it can be a question whether the plan devised for her destruction has, or has not, either completely failed, or been unequivocally abandoned.

These considerations compel His Majesty to adhere to the principles on which the Orders in Council of the 7th of January, and the 11th of November, are founded, so long as France adheres to that system, by which His Majesty's retaliatory measures were occasioned and justified.

It is not improbable, indeed, that some alterations may be made in the Orders in Council, as they are at present framed; alterations calculated not to abate their spirit or impair their principle, but to adapt them more exactly to the different state of things which has fortunately grown up in Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals, with a more severe pressure upon the enemy.

But of alterations to be made with this view only, it would be uncandid to take any advantage in the present discussion; however, it might be hoped that in their practical effect they might prove beneficial to America, provided the operation of the embargo were not to prevent her from reaping that benefit.

It remains for the undersigned to take notice of the last paragraph of Mr. Pinkney's letter. There cannot exist, on the part of Mr. Pinkney, a stronger wish than there does on that of the undersigned and of the British Government, for the adjustment of all the differences subsisting between the two countries.

His Majesty has no other disposition than to cultivate the most friendly intercourse with the United States.

The undersigned is persuaded that Mr. Pinkney would be one of the last to imagine, what is often idly asserted, that the depression of any other country is necessary or serviceable to the prosperity of this. The prosperity of America is essentially the prosperity of Great Britain; and the strength and power of Great Britain are not for herself only, but for the world. When those adjustments shall take place, to which, though unfortunately not practicable at this moment, nor under the conditions prescribed by Mr. Pinkney, the undersigned nevertheless confidently looks forward, it will perhaps be no insecure pledge for the continuance of the good understanding between the two countries, that they will have learned duly to appreciate each other's friendship; and that it will not hereafter be imputed to Great Britain, either on the one hand that she envies American industry as prejudicial to British commerce, or on the other hand that she is compelled to court an intercourse with America as absolutely necessary to her own existence.

His Majesty would not hesitate to contribute, in any manner in his power, to restore to the commerce of the United States its wonted activity; and if it were possible to make any sacrifice for the repeal of the embargo, without appearing to deprecate it as a measure of hostility, he would gladly have facilitated its removal, as a measure of inconvenient restriction upon the American people.

The undersigned is commanded, in conclusion, to observe, that nothing is said in Mr. Pinkney's letter of any intention to repeal the proclamation by which the ships of war of Great Britain are interdicted from all those rights of hospitality in the ports of the United States which are freely allowed to the ships of His Majesty's enemies.

The continuance of an interdiction, which, under such circumstances, amounts so nearly to direct hostility, after the willingness professed and the attempt made by His Majesty to remove the cause on which that measure had been originally founded, would afford but an inauspicious omen for the commencement of a system of mutual conciliation; and the omission of any notice of that measure, in the proposal which Mr. Pinkney has been instructed to bring forward, would have been of itself a material defect in the overture of the President.

But the undersigned is commanded no further to dwell upon this subject than for the purpose of assuring Mr. Pinkney that on this, and every other point in discussion between the two Governments, His Majesty earnestly desires the restoration of a perfect good understanding, and that His Majesty would decline no measure for the attainment of that object which should be compatible with his own honor and just rights and with the interests of his people.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney will accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
September 24, 1808.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your answer to my official note of the 23d of last month, relative to the British Orders in Council of January and November, 1807, together with a statement of "the substance of what has passed between us at our several interviews, previous to the presentation of that note."

I shall lose no time in transmitting to my Government copies of both these papers, upon the last of which I will take the liberty in the course of a few days to trouble you with some observations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING.

LONDON, October 11, 1808.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, enclosed, a copy of my reply to Mr. Canning's letter to me of the 23d of last month, accompanying his official answer of the same date to my note of the 23d of August. I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

HON. JAMES MADISON.

[Alluded to in the above letter of Mr. Pinkney.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
October 10, 1808.

SIR: If my reply to the letter which you did me the honor to address to me on the 23d of last month should be of greater length than the occasion may be thought to require, you will I am sure impute it to its real cause—an earnest desire on my part, arising from a feeling of sincere respect for you, that the statement which I am to give of facts deemed by you to be important, should be full as well as accurate.

I will not fatigue you, sir, with assurances that no person could be less disposed than I am to find fault with the object of your letter, which appears to be to guard against all misrepresentation of "what has passed in our late interviews beyond what you find recorded in my note." You have told me that I have personally no concern in that object, and I did not require to be told that my Government has as little. I understand, indeed, that the circumstance which has suggested a peculiar motive for this proceeding was one of those newspaper misrepresentations which every day produces where the press is free—which find no credit, and beget no consequence—and for which it is greatly to be feared your expedient will provide no remedy. Of my conduct, when that circumstance occurred, in giving you unsolicited proofs that I had transmitted to Mr. Secretary Madison a faithful report of our conferences, mistaken by public rumor or private conjecture, it is not necessary for me to speak; for you have yourself done justice to it.

The motive to which I am indebted for the honor of your letter appears to have been instrumental in producing another effect, equally unexceptionable. But you will allow me to say, that, until the receipt of that letter, I had not been apprized, by the slightest intimation, that it was in any degree owing to such a cause that you declined, on the part of His Majesty's Government, after two conferences, in which I had been suffered if not encouraged to unfold myself, individually as well as officially, at great length and with perfect frankness to give an answer to my verbal overture.

At our first interview, (on the 29th of June,)

verbal communication was not discountenanced, but commended: for, after I had made myself understood as to the purpose for which the interview had been requested, you asked me if I thought of taking a more formal course, but immediately added that you presumed I did not, for that the course I had adopted was well suited to the occasion. My reply was, in substance, that the freedom of conversation was better adapted to our subject, and more likely to conduct us to an advantageous conclusion than the constraint and formality of written intercourse, and that I had not intended to present a note. At the second interview, (on the 22d of July,) it did not occur to me that I had any reason to conclude, and certainly I did not conclude, that verbal communication had not continued to be acceptable as a preparatory course; and it was not until the third interview (on the 29th of July) that it was rejected as inadmissible. But even then I was not told, and had not the smallest suspicion, that this rejection was to be ascribed, either wholly or partially, to the motive which your letter has since announced to me. That this motive had, nevertheless, all the influence now imputed to it I am entirely confident, and I take notice of it only because, as I have not mentioned it to my Government in my official account of our conferences, I can no otherwise justify the omission, either to it or to you, than by showing that I had, in truth, no knowledge of the fact when that account was transmitted.

I may take occasion to set forth, in the present letter, the import of all that can be material of our several conversations, according to my recollection of them; but there are some points to which I ought to pay a more particular attention, because you have thought them entitled to it; although I should myself, perhaps, have been inclined to think that they had lost much of their importance by the presentation of my note and the receipt of your written answer; both of which are perfectly intelligible, upon these points at least, without the aid of the conferences that preceded them.

You observe, that "the principal points in which the suggestions brought forward by me, in personal conference, appear to you to have differed in some degree from the proposal stated by me in writing, are two: the first, that in conversation the proposal itself was not distinctly stated as an overture authorized by my Government; the second, that the beneficial consequences, likely to result to this country from the acceptance of that proposal, were "pursued" through more ample "illustrations."

With regard to the first of these supposed differences, I feel persuaded, sir, that upon further recollection, it will occur to you, that, at our first conference, I told you explicitly that the substance of what I then suggested, (that is to say, that your orders being repealed as to us, we would suspend the embargo as to Great Britain,) was from my Government; but that the manner of conducting and illustrating the subject, upon which I had no precise orders, was my own. I even repeated to you the words of my instructions as they were upon my memory; and I did not understand, either then or afterwards, that there was any doubt as to their existence or their sufficiency, or any desire to have a more exact and formal communication of them while the result of our discussions was distant and uncertain. I said, undoubtedly, that I had been directed to require the revocation of the British Orders in Council; but I said also that, although the Government of the United States still supposed itself to be authorized to expect their repeal upon the ground of right as it existed from the first, (a subject, however, which I informed you I did not wish at that time to agitate,) I was, notwithstanding, empowered to give you the above-mentioned assurances, which would, as I presumed, hold out inducements to Great Britain, as well on the score of policy as on that of justice, to fulfil that expectation. I should scarcely have undertaken to offer such assurances as from myself, or upon my own "conviction" that the President would act in conformity with them. And I should still less (if that were possible) have ventured to ask of you that you would make them, in that form, the subject of repeated conferences, and even of reference to others, as placing the question of a recall or continuance of the Orders in Council upon new grounds of prudence and equity.

If it is merely intended (as I doubt not it is) to say that I did not make, or declare my intention to make, my overture in writing, before I had endeavored to prepare for it by personal explanations such a reception as I felt it deserved, and before I could ascertain what shape would it be most proper to give to it, or how it would be met by this Government, nothing can be more correct.

It was my sincere wish that my proposal, which I believed to be advantageous to Great Britain, as well as honorable to the United States, should be accepted; and accordingly I preferred a mode of proceeding, which, while it was calculated to avoid unprofitable discussions upon topics of some delicacy and great difficulty, would furnish opportunities for frank and friendly communication upon all the bearings of my proposal, and lead to the result at which I aimed, if that result should be practicable in such way as upon mature reflection, and after a liberal interchange of sentiments, should be found to be most for the honor of our respective Governments. These views were laid before you without reserve, and seemed to be approved; and I confess to you, sir, that when I was afterwards informed that, if I would obtain an answer to my overture, I must make it in writing, and that I must not look for any previous intimation of the nature of that answer, I did not allow myself any longer to anticipate with much confidence such an issue as I desired.

The second difference which your letter supposes to exist between my note and verbal suggestions cannot, I think, in any view, be very material. I will say something upon it, however.

My note declares, that, if I forbear to pursue certain ideas through all the illustrations of which they are susceptible, it is because our personal conferences, as well as the obvious nature of the ideas themselves, render it unnecessary. This implies, undoubtedly, that more had been said in our conferences, explanatory of these ideas, than is to be found in the note itself; and that implication can scarcely be otherwise than true, if I "expatiated largely," as you very justly say I did, "upon the consequences of a suspension of the embargo as to Great Britain, while it still continued to be enforced against France."

The general idea to which the note refers, is, that justice and interest conspired to recommend that you should take advantage of my proposal. The particular positions are, that, if your orders and our embargo should be rescinded in the manner suggested, our commercial intercourse would be immediately revived; that, if France followed your example, and retracted her decrees, the avowed purpose of your orders would be accomplished; that, if France refused to retract, the American embargo, continuing as to her, would occupy the place of your orders, and perform their office even better than they could perform it themselves, without any of the disadvantages inseparable from such a system.

It is certain that in our conversations I endeavored to prove that these general and particular notions were founded in truth, by a variety of arguments thrown out in a very desultory way with more zeal than precision, and with that entire freedom which unlimited confidence in your candor, and a firm opinion that the views of my Government would derive new titles to respect from a full examination, were calculated to produce.

I should not deal ingenuously with you, sir, if I were to pretend that I think myself able to recapitulate these disjointed arguments as they were actually delivered; and I am quite sure that I shall consult your gratification, as well as my own credit, by declining such an undertaking. But I think I can state, in a condensed form, what I intended you should understand; and I presume that what I did say was not very wide of my real impressions.

Upon the footing on which my overture would place the justice of the British orders, I did not go into much detail at any one of the three interviews mentioned in your letter. But, combining my unconnected and occasional observations on that point, as they were made at different times, and more especially as they were afterwards given and enlarged upon when I had the honor to see you on the 26th of August, (of which, however, it is proper to say I have only a very scanty memorandum,) their import will not perhaps be found to be much, if at all, mistaken in such parts of the following statement as relate to that branch of the subject.

I meant to suggest, then, that upon your own principles it would be extremely difficult to decline my proposal; that your orders inculcate, as the duty of neutral nations, resistance to the maritime decrees of France, as overturning the public law of the world, and professedly rely upon that duty, and an imputed abandonment of it, for their inducement and their justification; that, of these orders, that of the 7th of January, 1807, (of which the subsequent orders of November are said, in your official reply to my note of the 23d of August, to be only an extension, "an extension in operation, not in principle,") was promulgated and carried into effect a few weeks only after the Berlin decree had made its appearance, when the American Government could not possibly know that such a decree existed, when there had been no attempt to enforce it, and when it had become probable that it would not be enforced at all to the prejudice of neutral rights; that the other orders were issued before the American Government, with reference to any practical violation of its rights, by an attempt to execute the Berlin decree in a sense different from the stipulations of the treaty subsisting between the United States and France, and from the explanations given to General Armstrong by the French Minister of Marine, and afterwards impliedly confirmed by General Champagny, as well as by a correspondent practice, had any sufficient opportunity of opposing that decree, otherwise than it did oppose it; that your orders, thus proceeding upon an assumed acquiescence not existing in fact, retaliated a thousand-fold, through the rights of the United States, wrongs rather threatened than felt, which you were not authorized to presume the United States would not themselves repel, as their honor and their interests required; that orders, so issued, were, to say the least of them, an unseasonable interposition between the injuring and the injured party, in a way the most fatal to the latter; that, by taking justice into your own hands, before you were entitled to do so, at the expense of everything like neutral rights, and even at the expense of other rights, justly the objects of yet greater sensibility, and by inflicting upon neutral nations, or rather upon the United States, the only neutral nation, injuries infinitely more severe and extensive than it was in the power of France to inflict, you embarrassed and confounded, and rendered impracticable, that very resistance which you demanded of us; that my proposal destroyed all imaginable motives for continuing, whatever might have been the motives for adopting, this new scheme of warfare; that it enabled you to withdraw, with dignity, and even with advantage, what should not have come between France and us; that its necessary tendency was to place us at issue with that Power, or, in other words, in the precise situation in which you have maintained we ought to be placed, if it should persist in obnoxious edicts; that the continuance of our embargo, so modified, would be at least equivalent to your orders, for that, in their most efficient state, your orders could do no more, as regards the United States, than cut off their trade with France, and the countries connected with her, and that our embargo remaining as to France and those countries, would do exactly the same; that if the two courses were barely, or even nearly, upon a level, in point of expediency, Great Britain ought to be forward to adopt that which was consistent with the rights, and respectful to the feelings, of others; that my proposal, however, had powerful recommendations, which the Orders in Council had not; that it would re-establish, without the hazard of any disadvantage, before new habits had rendered it difficult if not impossible, a traffic which nourished your most essential manufactures, and various other important sources of your prosperity; that it would not only restore a connexion, valuable in all its views, but prepare the way for the return of mutual kindness, for adjustments greatly to be desired, and, in a word, for all those consequences which follow in the train of magnanimity and conciliation, associated with prudence and justice.

Among the observations intended to illustrate my opinion of the certain, probable, and possible effects of the concurrent acts which my proposal had in view, were those to which you alluded in the sixth paragraph of your letter. Having stated that renewed commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States would be the first effect, I remarked, in the progress of the conversation, that the edicts of France could not prevent that intercourse, even if France should adhere to them; although Great Britain, by her superior naval means, might be able to prevent the converse of it; that the power of France upon the seas was in no degree adequate to such a purpose, and, if it were otherwise, that it was not to be supposed that the United States, resuming their lawful commerce with this country, after a recall of the British Orders in Council, would take no measures against systematic interruptions of that commerce by force and violence, if such should be attempted.

If, when I was honored with the different interviews before mentioned, I had been able to conjecture the nature of the arguments which were to have influence against my proposal, as I now find them stated in your answer to my note, I should have ventured to suggest, in addition to the remarks actually submitted to your consideration, that, if "the blockade of the European continent," by France and the Powers subservient to or in combination with her, to which your orders, as "a temperate but determined retaliation," were opposed, has been "raised even before it had been well established," and if "that system," so opposed, "of which extent and continuity were the vital principles, has been broken up into fragments utterly harmless and contemptible," there seems scarcely to be left, in your own view of the subject, any intelligible justification for perseverance in such of the retaliatory measures of Great Britain as operate through the acknowledged rights of a Power, confessedly no party to that combination, and ready to fulfil her fair neutral obligations if you will suffer her to do so. Under such circumstances, to abandon, what it is admitted to have lost, its own legitimate object, is not "concession;" it is simple justice. To France, indeed, it might be concession. But it is not France, it is the Government of America, neither subservient to France nor combined with France, a third party whose rights and interests your orders deeply affect, without any adequate necessity, according to your own showing, that requires their recall; and that, too, upon terms, which cannot but promote the declared purposes of these orders, if any remain to be promoted. I say "without any adequate necessity according to your own showing;" for I am persuaded, sir, you do not mean to tell us, as upon a hasty persual of your answer to my note might be imagined, that those rights and interests are to be set at naught, "lest a doubt should remain to distant times of the determination and the ability of Great Britain to have continued her resistance," or that your orders may, indefinitely, give a new law to the ocean, lest the motive to their repeal should be mistaken by your enemy. If this might, indeed, be so, you will, perhaps, permit me to say, that, highly as we may be disposed to prize the firm attitude and vast means of your country, at this eventful moment, it would possibly suggest to some minds a reluctant doubt on the subject of your observation, "that the strength and power of Great Britain are not for herself only, but for the world."

I might also have been led to intimate that my proposal could apparently lose nothing by admitting, that, "by some unfortunate concurrence of circumstances, without any hostile intention, the American embargo did come in aid of "the before-mentioned" blockade of the European continent, precisely at the very moment when, if that blockade could have succeeded at all, this interposition of the American Government would most effectually have contributed to its success." Yet, I should probably have thought myself bound to remind you, that, whatever may be the truth of this speculation, the same embargo withheld our tonnage and productions from that communication with the colonies of your enemies and with the European continent, which you had asserted your right to prevent; which, as a direct communication (with the Continent,) you had in fact prohibited; which, even through the British ports, or in other qualified forms, you had professed to tolerate, not as that which could be claimed, but as an indulgence that could at any time be withdrawn; which, as a traffic for the United States to engage in, you had at least discouraged, not only by checks and difficulties in the way of its prosecution, but by manifesting your intentions to mould it into all shapes which the belligerent, fiscal, or other peculiar policy of Great Britain might require, and to subject it to the exclusive jurisdiction of her municipal code, armed with all the prerogatives of that universal law to which nations are accustomed to look for the rights of neutral commerce.

In giving an account of our second conference you say "that, though not stating myself to be authorized by my Government formally to offer the suspension of the embargo as an immediate repeal of the Orders in Council, yet I did profess my readiness to take upon myself to make that offer, provided that you would give me beforehand an unofficial assurance that, coupled with that offer so made, the demand of the repeal of the orders would be favorably received; but you, of course, declined to give any such previous assurance; but, as I appeared to attach great importance to this suggestion, and you were led to think that a compliance with it might relieve me from a difficulty in executing the instructions of my Government, you consented to take a few days to consider of it, and to reserve your definitive answer until you should see me again." You then observe that you never doubted, in your own mind, as to the inexpediency and impropriety of encouraging me to take an unauthorized step, by an unofficial promise that it should be well received. I am sure you did not, sir; but I must take the liberty to say that I am equally sure that I never thought of asking you to give me encouragement to take an unauthorized step of any kind. I am, indeed, truly mortified that my conduct has appeared to you in that light; and I should not be readily consoled, if I did not reflect that, in condescending to listen, even for a moment, to what must have struck you as an irregularity, as vain and nugatory in its purpose as reprehensible in its principle, you must at least have given me credit for good intentions, and for a strong desire, sincerely felt, although erroneously obeyed, that our countries should find themselves in that relative position which suits the interests and tends to the happiness of both.

When I professed a readiness to make my proposal in writing, it was, as you state, provisionally; but I did not intimate that I was acting without authority, nor did I comprehend that such was, as I now know it to have been, your impression. The provisional nature of my offer arose out of circumstances, and was afterwards pressed upon conviction that, if it was meant to adopt the views of the President, nothing more could be necessary. I understood you to be desirous of ascertaining whether I was empowered and disposed, with a view to a final arrangement, to present what I had suggested, in a written form, as an overture originating with my Government. I said, of course, that, everything being first matured, a note should be presented, but that I would, with your permission, take a little time to consider of the manner and terms. I did not at that time suppose that we were conversing about a written proposal which was to be made only to be rejected, or even for the purpose of deliberation; and consequently, in professing my willingness to make it as soon as we were prepared for it, I presumed that I had done all that you desired. And I was confirmed in this opinion, not only by your saying nothing, as I supposed, to the contrary, but by your requesting me, as I was about to leave the room, to employ myself, before the next interview, upon such a note as we had been talking of; and then retracting that request, by observing, that I would doubtless first desire to know what were your ideas and intentions upon the subject of it, with which I was given to understand I should be made acquainted at another conference.

At the third interview, after speaking of a transaction upon the Lakes, of which your traders complained, and of another occurrence in the bay of Passamaquoddy, you observed, that you had thought long and anxiously upon what I had suggested to you; that the subject had at first struck you as being much more simple than upon careful examination it had been found to be; that, in the actual state of the world, it behooved both you and me to move in this affair with every possible degree of circumspection; that, without some explicit proposal on my part, in writing, upon which the British Government could deliberate and act, nothing could be done; and, finally, that you must leave me to consult my own discretion whether I would make such a proposal.

It appeared to me that, if this determination should be persisted in, my overture was not likely to be successful; and I urged, accordingly, the propriety of going on in a course which would lead us to a better issue. That course was, that we should understand one another as to our respective views, and that a concise note, which I had in fact prepared since the last meeting, should then be presented and acted upon. You informed me that my wish in this particular could not be acceded to; that, if I presented a note, you must be left at perfect liberty to decide upon what it proposed; that you could not give me even an intimation of the probable consequences of it; and, in a word, that you would neither invite nor discourage such a proceeding. You added that there were some points belonging to the subject which it would be proper to discuss in writing, one of which was the connexion between our embargo and your orders of November, supposed to be implied by my proposal. I remarked that, with an actual result in view, and with a wish to arrive at that result without delay, it could not be advisable to entangle ourselves in a written correspondence, undefined as to its scope and duration, upon topics on which we were not likely to agree, and that, if I were to frame my note, with a knowledge that it was to provoke argument, instead of leading at this crisis to a salutary change in the state of the world, you must be conscious that I too must argue. And where would this end? To what wholesome consequences would it conduct us? At the close of the interview I observed that, as the footing upon which the subject was now placed made delay of no importance, I should take time to prepare such further proceeding as the occasion required.

On the 26th of August I had the honor to see you again, and, after entering more at large than I had before believed to be proper into a consideration of the effect of my proposal on the equity of adhering to your Orders in Council, and, after reading to you parts of my instructions, I delivered an official note, in which the proposal was made in the form required.

Something was said at this interview of the affair of the Chesapeake, and the President's proclamation, which it is not, I presume, necessary to repeat. It will be sufficient to state, that you asked me what was to be done with these subjects? And that my reply was, that they had no connexion with the present; but that I could say, with confidence, that my Government had every disposition to attend to them, with a view to such an adjustment as would be honorable to both parties. I did not suppose that it was expected (for you did not intimate such an expectation) that renewed negotiation upon these points should, as well as the repeal, upon terms, of your Orders in Council, be invited by a formal overture from the Government of America.

I will not trouble you with many observations more.

You state in your letter that "there was one point upon which you were particularly anxious to receive precise information, and upon which, from my candor and frankness, you were fortunate enough to obtain it." This was, "whether in fact the Orders in Council of November had been known to the Government of the United States previously to the Message of the President proposing the embargo, so as to be a moving consideration to that Message?" I quote this passage principally that I may recall to your recollection that my suggestions upon the subject of it were not made officially, or as being authorized or furnished by any communication from my Government, or in answer to any direct inquiries on your part. They were very briefly made near the close, as I think, of our third interview, in consequence of your intimation, (intended, perhaps, to amount to an inquiry,) that my proposal implied that the embargo had been produced by the orders of November; to which you added that this could not be admitted, and, (as I comprehended what you said,) that it even required to be made the subject of some notice or discussion in writing, as intimately connected with my proposal, if it should be brought forward in that shape; and I understood you to assign this as one of the reasons why a written overture was indispensable. In replying to that intimation, and the remarks which followed it, I professed to speak, as I did in fact speak, from general information only, and disclaimed, as it was my duty to do, all authority to say more upon the nature and origin of the embargo than I had some time before communicated to you, in obedience to the orders of the President. The purpose of my observations was chiefly to show that there was no inducement for embarking in formal discussions upon this point; and I assured you that it was not in my power, either as respected instructions from my Government, or knowledge of facts, to do so. My opinion was, and I spoke accordingly, that it was one of those questions which might be left completely at rest, without the least injury to the wisdom or the justice of our conclusions upon the great object of our conferences. There could be no objection, however, to my giving you on this head such conjectural information as I was able; on the contrary, by fully disclosing to you my own materials for forming an opinion upon it, you would be enabled more distinctly to see that I could take no part in any discussion which you might propose to apply to it. And I could not but be assured that any anxiety you might feel to obtain a knowledge of the facts in question sprung from considerations which had every claim to my respect; for I knew that your mind was far above the reach of prejudice, which would ascribe the American embargo to participation in the councils or views of your adversary, or of any foreign Power whatsoever.

My suggestions were to the following effect: that I believed that no copy of your orders of November had arrived in the United States, at the date of the President's Message; that a recent change in the conduct of France to our prejudice did appear to be known; that intelligence had been received, and a belief entertained, of your intention to adopt some further measure, as a measure of retaliation against France, by which our commerce and our rights would be affected; that there was reason to conclude that you had actually adopted such a measure; that (as I collected from American newspapers) this had appeared from private letters and the newspapers of this country, received in the United States some days before the Message of the President, and probably known to the Government; that, in a word, various information concurred to show that our trade was likely to be assailed by the combined efforts of both of the belligerent parties; and that the embargo was a measure of wise and peaceful precaution, adopted under this view of reasonably anticipated peril.

You observe, in another part of your letter, that you have always rather wished to refer the argumentative discussion of the subject of the Orders in Council to the official correspondence which you have more than once been taught to expect me to open upon it. If I should object to any part of this statement, of which the substance is undoubtedly correct, it would be the words "more than once." Your wish has also appeared to be such as you now represent it, and you had reason to expect that I would commence a written discussion of the orders of November soon after their publication. I had told you that I should do so, and you had said that there could be no objection to it. But you were afterwards informed that, upon reflection, I had determined to leave the subject where it was, until I should know the pleasure of my Government.

The orders had been officially communicated, not to me, but to Mr. Madison, through the British Minister at Washington. It seemed, therefore, to be proper, (unless my instructions should make it otherwise,) that the view which the Government of the United States took of them should find its way to you through the same channel; and, accordingly, the letters of Mr. Madison, to which I have referred in my note of the 23d of August, did open at great length a discussion, which I could have no inducement to shun, although I did not continue to think myself authorized to commence it.

It only remains to add, that your share in our several conversations was, what you represent it to have been, not considerable; and that your manner, although reserved, was, as it always is, perfectly friendly.

I need not say that if, in this letter, written under the influence of sincere concern, the proposal I had the honor to lay before you has been unsuccessful, anything is to be found which you could wish to be otherwise than it is, I shall be the first to regret that I have not been able to do justice to my own feelings and intentions.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Madison.

LONDON, Nov. 25, 1808.

SIR: I have the honor to send enclosed a copy of a letter, received last night from Mr. Canning, in answer to my letter to him of the 10th of last month.

The tone of this letter renders it impossible to reply to it with a view to a discussion of what it contains; although it is not without further inadvertences as to facts, and many of the observations are open to exception. I intend, however, to combine, with an acknowledgment of the receipt of it, two short explanations. The first will relate to the new and extraordinary conjecture, which it intimates, that my authority was contingent; and the second will remind Mr. Canning that my letter of the 10th of October does not, as he imagines, leave unexplained the remark that "the provisional nature of my offer to make my proposal in writing arose out of circumstances;" but, on the contrary, that the explanation immediately follows the remark.

The Union is not yet returned from France. Lieutenant Gibbon arrived in London more than three weeks ago, and delivered your letter of the 9th of September, with duplicates of papers in the case of the Little William, and copies of letters which lately passed between the Department of State and Mr. Erskine.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

HON. JAMES MADISON.

[Referred to in the preceding despatch.]

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Nov. 22, 1808.

SIR: I regret exceedingly that an unusual and unintermitting pressure of official business has prevented me from finding an earlier opportunity to reply to your letter of the 10th of last month.

The observations which I have to offer upon some parts of that letter are not, indeed of such a nature, as to make it matter of any great importance whether you receive them a week sooner or later; as they refer less to any point of public interest to our two Governments than to what has passed personally between ourselves.

But I should have been much mortified if you could have been led to believe me deficient in attention to you; the manner as well as the substance of the communication, which I have had the honor to receive from you, entitling it to the most prompt and candid consideration. Your understanding of the motives which induced me to accompany my official note of the 23d September with my letter of the same date, is so far imperfect, as that you seem to imagine that the wish to guard against misrepresentation was the only motive which induced me to write that letter, and that, from that motive alone, I should, in any case, have troubled you with it. Whereas, I must have expressed myself very incorrectly indeed, if I did not convey to you the assurance, that if what had passed between us in conversation had not been referred to by you in your official letter of the 23d August, I certainly should not have thought it necessary or proper to preserve any written record of your verbal communications, which I understood at the time to be confidential, and which I certainly was so far from attempting or intending to "discountenance," that I have no doubt but I expressed myself (as you say I did) in favor of "the course which you adopted, as well suited to the occasion." But you state, at the same time, most correctly, that it was as a preparatory course, that I understood and encouraged this verbal and confidential communication. I never did nor could understand it as being intended to supersede or supply the place of an official overture. I never did nor could suppose that the overture of your Government, and the answer of the British Government to it, were intended to be intrusted solely to our recollections. Accordingly, when the period arrived at which you appeared to be prepared to bring forward an official proposal, I did, no doubt, express my expectation that I should receive that proposal in writing.

It is highly probable that I did not (as you say I did not) assign to you, as the motive of the wish which I then expressed, my persuasion that written communications are less liable to mistake than verbal ones; because that consideration is sufficiently obvious, and because the whole course and practice of office is, in that respect, so established and invariable, that I really could not have supposed the assignment of any specific motive to be necessary, to account for my requiring a written statement of your proposals previous to my returning an official answer to them.

I had taken for granted all along that such would, and such must be, the ultimate proceeding on your part, however you might wish to prepare the way for it by preliminary conversations.

In framing your note, I did not pretend to anticipate how much of what had been stated by you in our several conferences you would think it proper to repeat in writing. But, whatever the tenor of your note had been, I should have felt it right to conform strictly to it, in the official answer, avoiding any reference to any part of your verbal communications, except such as, by repeating them in writing, I should see that it was your intention to record as official.

I confess, however, I was not prepared for the mixed course which you actually did adopt, I am persuaded, (I am sincerely persuaded,) without any intention of creating embarrassment—that of referring generally to what had passed in our conferences, as illustrative of your official proposition, and as tending to support and recommend it, but without specifying the particular points to which such reference was intended to apply; a course which appeared at first sight to leave me no choice, except between the two alternatives of either recapitulating the whole of what you had stated in conversation for the purpose of comprehending it in the answer, or of confining myself to your written note, at the hazard of being suspected of suppressing the most material part of your statement.

The expedient to which I had recourse, of accompanying my official note with a separate letter, stating, to the best of my recollection, the substance of what I had heard from you in conversation, appeared to me, after much deliberation, to be the most respectful to you.

Such having been the motives which dictated my letter, I cannot regret that it was written, since it has produced, at a period so little distant from the transaction itself, an opportunity of comparing the impressions left on our minds, respectively, of what passed in our several conferences, and of correcting any erroneous impression on either side.

There are two points in which our recollections do appear to differ in some degree.

The first relates to the authority which you had, and that which I understood you to state yourself to have, at the time of our first conference, for bringing forward a direct overture, in the name of your Government; the second to the expectation which I stated myself to have entertained "more than once," of your opening an official correspondence on the subject of the Orders in Council.

With respect to the first point, you will give me credit, when I assure you that my understanding of what was said by you, not only in the first, but in our second conference, was precisely what I stated it to be in my letter; and you will, I hope, forgive me, if, after the most attentive perusal of your letter of the 10th October, and after a careful comparison of different passages in it, while I am compelled, by your assurance, to acknowledge that I must have misapprehended you, I find grounds in your statement to excuse, if not to account for, my misapprehension.

According to your recollection, you told me explicitly, in our first conference, "that the substance of what you then suggested, that is to say, that our orders being repealed, as to the United States, the United States would suspend the embargo as to Great Britain," was from your Government; "that the manner of conducting and illustrating the subject (upon which you had no precise orders) was your own," and you even quoted part of your instructions to me which was to that effect.

In a subsequent paragraph, you state that "nothing can be more correct than my apprehension that you did not make, nor profess to intend making, an overture in writing, before you had endeavored to prepare for it such a reception as you felt it deserved, and before you could ascertain what shape it would be most proper to give to that overture, and how it would be met by the British Government."

And in another part of your letter, you admit that "when you expressed your readiness to make your proposal in writing, it was (as I have stated) provisionally;" and you inform me that "the provisional nature of your offer arose out of circumstances:" the nature of which circumstances you do not explain, nor have I any right to require such an explanation.

But, comparing these several statements together; seeing that, in our first interview, you declared no intention of making a proposal in writing; that, in our second interview, (a month or five weeks afterward) you described that intention as "provisional" and contingent; and protesting at the same time (as I do in the most solemn manner) that I cannot find any trace in my memory of any communication whatever of any part of your instructions communicated to me as such; seeing also, that, whatever might be the nature and extent of your instructions from the President of the United States as to the substance of the overture to be made to the British Government, the manner, the time, and the conditions of that overture were evidently considered by you as left to your own discretion; it surely may be pardonable in me to have mistaken (as I most unquestionably must have done,) the precise limits at which the authority of your Government ended and your own discretion began, and to have imagined (which I very innocently did) that a proposition, over which you appeared to have a power so nearly absolute, was a proposition in a great measure of your own suggestion. I do not mean that I supposed you to bring forward such a measure without reference to the knowledge which you must of course have had of the general feeling, disposition, and intentions of your Government, but without its specific instructions for that purpose at that time.

In attributing to you this exercise of judgment, in addition to many others, which it is confessed you were at liberty to exercise, I really intended to convey no imputation disrespectful to you; I can conceive abundance of cases in which it would have been not only excusable but highly meritorious.

My mistake, at least, was a very harmless one, as, whether the fact were that you had no precise authority to give in an official proposal, or that you had such an authority, but subject to contingencies which had not occurred, the practical result must be of necessity the same.

What these contingencies might be, it is not for me to inquire; but if they were of the nature of which I now cannot but conjecture they may have been; if the overture which you were authorized to make to the British Government was to be shaped and timed according to the result of any other overture to any other Government, I am then at once able to account for all those appearances which misled me into a belief of the want of a precise authority on your part. This consideration leads me to the other point, on which alone there appears a difference between us upon any matter of fact, but a difference by no means so wide as it appears. Admitting the general correctness of my statement of the expectation which I was taught to entertain of a written communication from you, on the subject of the Orders in Council, you add, that it was, however, only in November last, and immediately after the publication of the Orders in Council, that you had directly announced to me your intention of opening a correspondence upon them—an intention, from which you afterward desisted, “until you should receive the pleasure of your Government.” The correctness of this statement I do not dispute; but you, I am sure, will agree with me, sir, in recollecting how many times, “more than once,” since the period of that first intention of yours being announced and withdrawn, my expectations that you were about to “receive the pleasure of your Government” upon this subject have been excited by the notification in America, and the destination hither of ships employed by the United States, as it was generally supposed, for the special purpose of conveying representations or proposals from the American Government to the Governments of France and Great Britain, upon the subject of their respective maritime decrees and orders.

Such was the universal belief both in America and in England, upon the arrival of the Osage, upon that of the Hope, of the St. Michael, and of another vessel named, I think, the Union. I have certainly no right to affirm that you shared in the expectation which so universally prevailed; I have no right to say that the Government of the United States designedly created that expectation; but that it did prevail, and that I very sincerely believed it to be well founded, you, I think, must do me the justice to recollect, as, in one instance, at least, that of the Osage, so strong was my persuasion that you must have received instructions from your Government, that I took the liberty of sending to you to inquire whether you had not some communication to make to me, and received for answer that you had none.

It is to these missions that I particularly referred, when I said that I had “more than once expected you to open a correspondence with me upon the subject of the Orders in Council.” This expectation it was that alone prevented me sending instructions to Mr. Erskine to reply to the note addressed to him by Mr. Madison on the 25th of March, in answer to that note of Mr. Erskine’s in which he communicated the Orders in Council, and in allusion to these missions, particularly to that of the Osage; and to the expectation, which had been founded here upon the return here of that vessel after its voyage to France, it was, that I made that declaration in Parliament, which, I see, has been the subject of some misapprehension (I will not say misrepresentation) in America; that, “since the termination of Mr. Rose’s mission, the American Government had not made any communication here, in the shape of remonstrance, or in a tone of irritation.” I am not aware, sir, that there is any other part of your letter which requires that I should trouble you with many observations.

Your report of your answer to the inquiry, which I took the liberty of making “whether the Orders in Council of November were known to the Government of the United States previously to the Message of the President proposing the embargo, was to be a moving consideration to that Message,” does not appear to differ in any material degree from my statement of it. That your answer to such an inquiry was official, or authorized by your Government, I did not assert nor presume. I have already said that it was not till you had, in your official letter of the 23d of August, referred to what passed in conversation, that I should have thought any such reference allowable on my part; and, even then, the generality of your reference precluded me from judging correctly how much of what you had stated in conversation was from official authority, how much from your own personal information or opinion.

You inform me that your answer to this question was of the latter description only; but, even if it were only from your individual authority, it was very material and highly gratifying to learn that the embargo, which had been sometimes represented, both here and in America, as the direct and immediate consequence of the Orders in Council of November, and as produced solely by them, was, in your opinion, “a measure of precaution against reasonably anticipated peril.”

The purpose of this letter is not to renew the discussion upon the subject of your proposal, but merely to clear up any misunderstanding which had existed between us in the course of that discussion. I cannot conclude it, however, without adverting very shortly to that part of your letter in which you argue that the failure of France, in the attempt to realize her gigantic project of the annihilation of the commerce of this country, removes all pretext for the continuance of the retaliatory system of Great Britain. This impotency of the enemy to carry his projects of violence and injustice into execution might, with more propriety, be pleaded with him as a motive for withdrawing decrees at once so indefensible and so little efficacious for their purpose, than represented as creating an obligation upon Great Britain to desist from those measures of defensive retaliation which those decrees have necessarily occasioned. If the foundation of the retaliating system of Great Britain was (as we contend it to have been) originally just, that system will be justifiably continued in force, not so long only as the decrees which produced it are mischievously operative, but until they are unequivocally abandoned; and, if it be thus consistent with justice to persevere in that system, it is surely no mean motive of policy for such perseverance, that a premature departure from it, while the enemy’s original provocation remains unrepealed, might lead to false conclusions as to the efficacy of the decrees of France, and might hold out a dangerous temptation to that Power to resort to the same system on any future occasion; a result which, not Great Britain alone, but all commercial nations are deeply interested in preventing. I have now, sir, only to express my sense of the candor and liberality with which this discussion has been conducted on your part, and my acknowledgments for the justice which you render to my disposition to treat you, at all times, with reciprocal respect, and to listen to you with the attention to which, personally, as well as officially, you have every claim.

I cannot forego the hope that it may yet fall to our lot to be instrumental in the renewal of that good understanding between our two Governments, which is as congenial to the feelings as it is essential to the interests of both countries; which nothing but the forced and unnatural state of the world could have interrupted; and which there is, on the part of the British Government, the most anxious and unabated desire to restore.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

GEORGE CANNING.

LONDON, December 3, 1808.

SIR: I have the honor to send, enclosed, a copy of my reply to Mr. Canning's letter to me of the 22d ultimo. A copy of the letter, to which it is an answer, was transmitted a few days since by the British packet, and a duplicate has been sent to Liverpool.

The Union is not yet arrived from France, and we have no intelligence of her.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

[Enclosed in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of December 3.]

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
November 28, 1808.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 22d instant, and to transmit a copy of it to my Government.

Without desiring to protract a discussion, in the conduct of which neither your sincerity nor mine will, I feel assured, be doubted by any one, I may be permitted to say, that the authority under which I acted in our late communications was not contingent, as you now appear to conjecture, and that the remark contained in my letter of the 10th of October, "that the provisional nature of my offer to make my proposal in writing arose out of circumstances," will be found explained, in the same letter, by passages which immediately follow the remark.

I have said, in my letter of the 10th of October, that "I had no precise instructions as to the manner of conducting and illustrating the subject confided to my management;" but you will suffer me to enter my friendly protest against all suppositions that the overture was left to my own discretion; that I had a power "nearly absolute" over it, or that it was, "in a great measure, of my own suggestion."

I will trouble you no further, sir, on this occasion, than to assure you that nothing could give me more sincere pleasure than to see fulfilled the hope which you express, that it may yet fall to our lot to be instrumental in the renewal of good understanding between our two Governments.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Right Hon. GEORGE CANNING.

FOREIGN OFFICE, Dec. 24, 1808.

SIR: In my official note of the 23d September, I stated to you the probability that some alterations might be made in the Orders in Council, with a view to adapt their operation more exactly to the altered state of Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals with a more severe pressure upon the enemy.

As this statement was, however, only incidental, and as I at the same time disclaimed any intention of taking advantage of such proposed alterations in the discussions then pending between us, seeing that, if made, they would not be founded on the admission of any of the principles for which you were contending, it was, perhaps, not necessary that I should trouble you with any further communication upon this subject. But the order, of which I have the honor to enclose a copy, having been passed by His Majesty in Council on Wednesday last, I am desirous, previous to its actual publication, of explaining to you the grounds on which the more extended alterations which were in contemplation have been suspended.

It was intended to relax, in a certain degree, the regulations of the Orders in Council, with respect to such of the Powers in hostility with His Majesty as were not, or should not place themselves, in a state of hostility with Spain; but at the same time that this relaxation was extended to other Powers, to prohibit absolutely, by strict, rigorous, and unmitigated blockade, all intercourse whatever with France.

The adoption by these Powers, who were to have been the objects of such relaxations, of the views and projects of France with respect to Spain, does away all assignable ground of distinction between France and these Powers; and that part, therefore, of the intended alterations does not take place.

The alterations contained in the enclosed Orders in Council stand upon a separate ground, and, as I have more than once understood from you that the part of the Orders in Council which this order goes to mitigate is that which was felt most sorely by the United States, I have great pleasure in being authorized to communicate it to you.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

GEORGE CANNING.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq.

[Order in Council, enclosed in Mr. Canning's letter of December 24.]

His Majesty, in virtue of the powers reserved to him, by two certain acts passed in the forty-eighth year of His Majesty's reign, the one entitled "An act for granting to His Majesty, until the end of the next session of Parliament, duties of customs on the goods, wares, and merchandises therein enumerated, in furtherance of the provisions of certain Orders in Council;" the other entitled "An act for granting to His Majesty, until the end of the next session of Parliament, certain duties, on the exportation from Ireland, of goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated," is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the operation of the aforesaid acts be suspended, as to any duties on exportation, granted by the said acts, so far as relates to articles being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country, for the time being, in amity with His Majesty, and from the ports of which the British flag is not excluded, imported direct from such country into any port or place of the United Kingdom, either in British ships or in ships of the country of which such articles are the growth, produce, or manufacture.

And His Majesty is further pleased, with the advice aforesaid, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the said duties on exportation be suspended, as to all goods, wares, or merchandise, which have been or may be condemned as prize, until further order shall be made therein.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Canning.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE,
December 28, 1808.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 24th instant, communicating an order passed by His Majesty in Council on Wednesday last, and have transmitted copies of these papers to my Government.

It is perfectly true, as the concluding paragraph of your letter supposes me to believe, that the United States have viewed with great sensibility the pretension of this Government (which, as a pretension, the present order plainly reasserts, without much, if at all, modifying its practical effect) to levy imposts upon their commerce outward and inward, which the Orders in Council of the last year were to constrain to pass through British ports.

But it is equally true, that my Government has constantly protested against the entire system with which that pretension was connected, and has, in consequence, required the repeal, not the modification, of the British Orders in Council.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

WILLIAM PINKNEY.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, March 10, 1809.

I have received from Mr. Canning a notification of blockade, of which a copy is enclosed.

[Referred to in Mr. Pinkney's despatch of March 10, 1809.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 8, 1809.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received

His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Pinkney that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the isles of Mauritius and Bourbon; Mr. Pinkney is, therefore, requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the isles above mentioned are, and must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

GEORGE CANNING.

Extract—Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, May 1, 1809.

I had the honor to receive, on the 25th of March, the letter of your predecessor of the 10th of February; and, on the 15th of last month, Lieutenant Reed delivered to me your letter of the 15th of March.

Upon the receipt of your letter of the 15th of March, it became my obvious duty to ask a conference with Mr. Canning. It took place accordingly on Monday, the 17th of April.

At the close of the conference, he told me that my communications were such as would require reflection, and would naturally make him anxious to see me again; and that he would fix as early a day as possible, and give me notice.

Our next interview took place on the 27th of April.

Mr. Canning read the new Order in Council, and then proceeded very briefly to suggest the practical alterations which it would introduce.

I thought I should best discharge my duty by forbearing useless discussion, and by receiving it as it was offered, but without making myself a party to it, an actual improvement, capable of future extension, under the auspices of just and friendly sentiments and enlightened policy.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, April 30, 1809.

SIR: When I had the honor to transmit to you, on the 24th of December last, the Orders in Council passed on the 21st of that month, I referred to that passage of my official note of the 23d of September, 1808, in which I stated to you that "it is not improbable, indeed, that some alterations may be made in the Orders in Council, as they are at present framed—alterations calculated not to abate their spirit or impair their principle, but to adapt them more exactly to the different state of things which has fortunately grown up in Europe, and to combine all practicable relief to neutrals with a more severe pressure upon the enemy;" and, I at the same time explained to you the grounds on which the design of the larger alterations which had been in contemplation in

Relations with France.

September was for the time laid aside. By the Order of Council which I have now the honor to enclose to you, that design, as explained in my official note of September 23, is fully carried into execution. I have the honor to be, &c.

GEORGE CANNING.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 26th of April 1809; Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas, His Majesty, by his Order in Council of the 11th of November, 1807, was pleased, for the reasons assigned therein, to order that, "all the ports and places of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded, and all ports or places, in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, should, from henceforth, be subject to the same restrictions in point of trade and navigation as if the same were actually blockaded in the most strict and rigorous manner;" and, also, to prohibit "all trade in articles which are the produce or manufactures of the said countries or colonies;" and whereas, His Majesty, having been nevertheless desirous not to subject those countries which were in alliance or in amity with His Majesty to any greater inconvenience than was absolutely inseparable from carrying into effect His Majesty's just determination to counteract the designs of his enemies, did make certain exceptions and modifications expressed in the said order of the 11th of November, and in certain subsequent orders of the 25th of November, declaratory of the aforesaid order of the 11th of November, and of the 18th of December, 1807, and the 30th of March, 1808:

And whereas, in consequence of divers events which have taken place since the date of the first-mentioned order, affecting the relations between Great Britain and the territories of other Powers, it is expedient that sundry parts and provisions of the said orders should be altered or revoked:

His Majesty is, therefore, pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to revoke and annul the said several orders, except as hereinafter expressed; and so much of the said several orders, except as aforesaid, is hereby revoked accordingly. And His Majesty is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all ports and places as far north as the river Ems, inclusively, under the Government styling itself the Kingdom of Holland, and all ports and places under the Government of France, together with the colonies, plantations, and settlements in the possession of those Governments, respectively, and all ports and places in the northern parts of Italy, to be reckoned from the ports of Orbitello and Pesaro, inclusively, shall continue, and be subject to the same restrictions, in point of trade and navigation, without any exception, as if the same were actually blockaded by His Majesty's naval forces in the most strict and rigorous manner; and that every vessel trading from and to the said countries or colonies, plantations, or settlements, together with all goods and merchandise on board, shall be condemned as prize to the captors.

And His Majesty is further pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that this order shall have effect from the day of the date thereof with respect to any ship, together with its cargo, which may be captured subsequent to such day, on any voyage which is and shall be rendered legal by this order, although such voyage, at the time of the commencement of the same, was unlawful, and prohibited under the said former orders; and such ships, upon being brought in, shall be released accordingly; and with respect to all ships, together with their cargoes, which may be captured in any voyage which was permitted under the exceptions of the orders above mentioned, but which is not permitted according to the provisions of this order; and it is hereby ordered, that such ships and their cargoes shall not be liable to condemnation, unless they shall have received actual notice of the present order before such capture, or, in default of such notice, until after the expiration of the like intervals, from the date of this order, as were allowed for constructive notice in the orders of 25th November, 1807, and the 18th of May, 1808, and the several places and latitudes therein specified.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and Judges of the Courts of Vice-admiralty, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

STEPHEN COTTRELL.

FRANCE.

[Communicated to Congress, November 8, 1808.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The documents communicated with my public Message of this day contain such portions of the correspondence therein referred to of the Ministers of the United States at Paris and London, as relate to the present state of affairs between those Governments and the United States, and as may be made public. I now communicate, confidentially, such supplementary portions of the same correspondences as I deem improper for publication, yet necessary to convey to Congress full information on a subject of their deliberations so interesting to our country.

TH. JEFFERSON.

NOVEMBER 8, 1808.

Extract—Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to General Armstrong, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 22, 1807.

SIR: The two last letters received from you were of December 24, and January 16.

Relations with France.

The decree of November 21, communicated in the first, had previously reached us, and had excited apprehensions which were repressed only by the inarticulate import of its articles, and the presumption that it would be executed in a sense not inconsistent with the respect due the treaty between France and the United States. The explanations given you by the Minister of Marine were seen by the President with much pleasure, and it only remains to learn that they have been confirmed by the express authority of the Emperor. We are the more anxious for this information, as it will fortify the remonstrances which have been presented at London against the British order of January 7th. Should it, contrary to expectation, turn out that the French decree was meant, and is to operate according to the latitude of its terms, you will, of course, have made the proper representations, grounded as well on the principles of public law, as on the express stipulations of the convention of 1800. Nothing, besides, could be more preposterous than to blend with an appeal to neutral rights and neutral nations, a gross infraction of the former, and outrage on the sentiments of the latter, unless it be to invite a species of contest on the high seas, in which the adversary has every possible advantage. But, on the more probable supposition that the decree will not be unfavorably expounded, it will be still necessary to press on the French Government a dispatch of such orders to their cruisers in every quarter, as will prevent a construction of the decree favorable to their licentious cupidity. The moment your letter was received, the answer of the French Minister of Marine to your note was communicated to General Turreau, with a call on him to transmit it immediately to the French Governors in the West Indies. This he readily engaged to do. But, notwithstanding this precaution, there are proofs that the West India privateers have, under color of the edict, committed depredations which will constitute just claims of redress from their Government.

Mr. Erving has forwarded a Spanish decree also, avowedly pursuing the example and the views of the French Emperor. The terms of this decree are even more vague, or rather more broad, than those of the prototype; and if not speedily recalled or corrected, will doubtless extend the scene of spoliations already begun in that quarter; and, of course, thicken the cloud that hangs over the amity of the two nations.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Monroe.

PARIS, July 7, 1807.

SIR: The accounts you have had of recent captures made by French privateers of American vessels, under cover of the decree of November last, are not correct; at least, if such captures have been made, I know nothing of them; the only captures I have at any time heard of were those made from Porto Ferrajo. They are by no means of recent date, and have all (I believe,) been redressed by the Council of Prizes. Two of these cases, to which I attended personally, received decisions equally favorable and prompt; interest and damages were given to the plaintiffs, and I know not why decisions equally favorable should not have been given in the other cases. I have within a week been informed by Mr. Erving that he had reason to believe that a French privateer, then in a port of Spain, had plundered American ships, either going to or coming from England, of dry goods to the amount of three hundred dollars. Before anything could be done in Spain for the recovery of these goods, the ship went to sea, and professedly for the purpose of returning to the port of her armament. Believing her to have arrived there, I put all the evidence I possessed before M. Decrés, who closes his answer with the following assurance. "Your Excellency may be assured that, as far as it depends on me, the captains of these vessels, or their owners, shall obtain, if there is ground for it, a prompt and full reparation." I quote this to show you that there is no disposition in the Minister of this Government to sanction or protect such enterprises upon our commerce. From the uses you may be able to make of the facts, and their relation to your question generally, I subjoin a brief exposition of the construction now given to the November decree. It was, you know, admitted by both ministerial and judicial authorities, that this decree did not infract the provisions of the treaty of 1800, between the United States and France. Still it was contended that vessels of the United States, coming from any port of Great Britain, since the date of the edict, could not be admitted to entry in the ports of France. This rule, without some qualifications, was likely to become mischievous, and I accordingly obtained the following modifications of it, and hope to obtain a further modification, which will render it perfectly harmless. These changes took place as circumstances rose to produce them; for though the necessity for them was both foreseen and represented, it was only upon real, not upon hypothetical cases, that the ministers of His Majesty were willing to act.

1. Vessels leaving ports of the United States before a knowledge of the arrêt had been promulgated there, are not subject to the rule.

2. Vessels not coming directly from a British to a French port are not subject to the rule.

3. The cargoes of vessels coming directly from a British to a French port, and offered for entry, on proof that the touching of the ship in England, &c., was involuntary, are put in dépôt or sequestration, until His Majesty shall have decided on the sufficiency of the proof offered, or they are at once given up to the consignees on their giving security to abide the decision which shall be ultimately taken by the Emperor in their respective cases. The vessels can go out freely, and without impediment of any kind. The former rule, of which this is an amelioration, was, that ships as well as cargoes, coming under this description, should be sequestered, &c. The further alteration which I have asked is, the establishment of some principle which shall regulate the kind and degree of proof required with respect to the alleged application of a force majeure, &c.; my own opinion is, that this may best be found in the greater or less correspondence which shall exist between the cargo when shipped in America, and when arrived here. If the correspondence be complete, the evidence ought to be considered as complete also, that they were not in Great Britain for the purposes of commerce; and, not being there for these purposes, the inference is fair, that their going there at all was involuntary. This is a rule the Ministers will consent to; whether His Majesty will do so also will be known in a few days. He is expected here about the beginning of August.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, August 3, 1807.

SIR: We had yesterday our first audience of the Emperor since his return to Paris. Happening to stand near the Minister of Denmark, I overheard His Majesty say to that Minister, "So, M. Baron, the Baltic has been violated." The Minister's answer was not audible to me, nor did it appear to have been satisfactory to the Emperor, who repeated, in a tone of voice somewhat raised and peremptory, "But, sir, the Baltic has been violated." From Mr. Deyer he passed to myself and others; and lastly to the Ambassador of Portugal, to whom, it is said, he read a very severe lecture on the conduct of his Court. These circumstances go far to justify the whispers that begin to circulate, that an army is organizing to the south for the purpose of taking possession of Portugal, and another to the north for a similar purpose with regard to Denmark; and, generally, that having settled the business of belligerents, with the exception of England, very much to his own liking, he is now on the point of settling that of neutrals in the same way. It was, perhaps, under the influence of this suggestion, that Mr. Deyer, taking me aside, inquired whether any application had been made to me with regard to the projected union of all the commercial States against Great Britain, and on my answering in the negative, he replied, "You are much favored, but it will not last." I give you this detail, not from any importance it has in itself, but from the circumstance of its containing all that I have yet heard in relation to a project highly interesting to the United States, and of which you ought to be immediately apprized.

August 9. Not a syllable has yet been mentioned with regard to the projected union, &c. As far as I can learn, they are satisfied that the course we are pursuing is honest to ourselves, and not dishonest to either of the belligerents.

August 15. We had this morning an audience of the Emperor. The seizure of Copenhagen by the British gave room for a new conversation with the Minister of Denmark, in the course of which he stated the British force to have been but ten or twelve thousand men; demanded what had become of the Prince Regent, and asked why the Government had not defended the city? As in the former audience from Baron Deyer he came directly to me, and, after some questions merely personal, he adverted to the outrage committed by the Leopard on the Chesapeake. "This," said he, "is abominable; they have pretended hitherto to visit merchantmen, and that they had a right to do so; but they, even they, have set up no such pretensions with respect to armed ships. They would now arrange it by giving up a right or usage which never existed; but they will arrange it; they are afraid to go to war with your country."

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Mr. MADISON.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, August 9, 1807.

SIR: Your Excellency is not apprized that soon after the promulgation of the imperial decree of the 2d of November last, one of similar character and injunctions was issued by the Prince of Peace, in behalf of His Catholic Majesty. Under this order, sundry vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States have been captured on the high seas, brought into the ports of Spain, and are now before the Court of Admiralty for examination. To this brief statement I subjoin an extract from a letter of the 27th ultimo, from the Chargé des Affaires of the United States at Madrid, which will show your Excellency that the fate of these vessels will depend, not on the construction which might be given to the Spanish decree by the Spanish tribunals, but on the practice which shall have been established by France, under her decree of November last; and that Prince Massirano has accordingly been directed to ask from your Excellency such exposition of that decree, and of the practice under it, as shall regulate on this head, the conduct of Spanish courts and cruisers towards neutral commerce in general. Assured, as I feel myself, that this exposition, whenever given, will not be less friendly and liberal than that already found in the decisions of His Imperial Majesty's Council of Prizes, and correspondence of his Minister of Marine, viz: that the provisions of the decree in question do not infract any of the rights of commerce stipulated by treaty between France and the United States; it is incumbent on me to pray your Excellency, that it (the exposition required) be given as expeditiously as possible, to the end that the legitimate commerce of the United States be relieved from all further annoyance growing out of the doubtful meaning and operation of the Spanish decree aforesaid.

Your Excellency will permit me to avail myself of this occasion to recall to your attention the subject of my letter of the 26th of June last. I learn from Antwerp that the cargoes mentioned in that letter are yet under sequestration, and that considerable loss, as well by diminution of price in the articles, as by accumulation of interest and charges, has been already incurred.

Relations with France.

Your Excellency will do me the honor to accept the assurances of my profound respect.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

His Excellency the PRINCE OF BENEVENTO.

Mr. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong.

AUGUST 21, 1807.

SIR: I have received the letter which you did me the honor of addressing me on the 9th of this month, relative to American vessels carried into ports of Spain, in consequence of the measures taken by that Power against the English commerce, in imitation of France.

As the execution of the maritime measures indicated by the imperial decree of the 21st of November, 1806, rests naturally with his Excellency, the Minister of Marine, and that, moreover, he has already had the honor of addressing you some first observations on the application of that decree, I transmitted without delay your letter, and asked from him the new explanations which you might desire. When they shall have been forwarded to me, I will have the honor of informing you of them.

Accept the assurance of my high consideration,

CHAMPAGNY.

His Excellency Gen. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. Armstrong to the French Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, September 24, 1807.

SIR: I have this moment learned that a new and extended construction, highly injurious to the commerce of the United States, was about to be given to the imperial decree of the 21st of November last. It is therefore incumbent upon me to ask from your Excellency an explanation of His Majesty's views in relation to this subject, and, particularly, whether it be His Majesty's intention, in any degree, to infract the obligations of the treaty now subsisting between the United States and the French Empire?

I pray your Excellency, &c.,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

M. Regnier to the Procureur General of the Council of Prizes.

PARIS, September 18, 1807.

I have submitted, sir, to His Majesty the Emperor and King, the doubts of his Excellency the Minister of Marine and Colonies on the extent of some of the provisions of the imperial decree of November 21, 1806, which has declared the British islands in a state of blockade. The following are the intentions of His Majesty on the points in question:

1. Can armed vessels, under the imperial decree of the 21st of November last, seize, in neutral vessels, either English property or merchandise proceeding from the manufactures of the English territories?

His Majesty notifies me, that since he had not thought proper to express any exception in his decreed, there is no ground to make any in the execution, with respect to anything whatsoever.

2. His Majesty has not decided the question, whether French armed vessels may possess themselves of neutral vessels going to or from England, although they have no English merchandise on board.

3. On the question whether French armed vessels are subject to the deduction ordered by the sixth article of the decree of November 21, His Majesty has declared that the provision of that article was not susceptible of any restriction; that is to say, that the deduction must take effect on the proceeds of all confiscations of merchandise and property which have been or may be pronounced in execution of the decree, without regard to the place of seizure or character of the captors.

You will be so good, sir, as to notify these decisions to the Council of Prizes, to have them entered in the registers, and to acknowledge the receipt of my letter. Accept, &c.

The Grand Judge, Minister of Justice,

REGNIER.

Mr. Champagny to Mr. Armstrong.

FONTAINEBLEAU, October 7, 1807.

SIR: You did me the honor on the 24th of September, to request me to send you some explanations as to the execution of the decree of blockade of the British islands as to vessels of the United States.

The provisions of all the regulations and treaties relative to a state of blockade have appeared applicable to the existing circumstance; and it results, from the explanations which have been addressed to me by the Imperial Procureur General of the Council of Prizes, that His Majesty has considered every neutral vessel going from English ports, with cargoes of English merchandise, or of English origin, as lawfully seizable by French armed vessels.

The decree of blockade has been now issued eleven months; the principal Powers of Europe, far from protesting against its provisions, have adopted them. They have perceived that its execution must be complete to render it more effectual, and it has seemed easy to reconcile these measures with the observance of treaties, especially at a time when the infractions by England of the rights of all maritime Powers render their interest common, and tend to unite them in support of the same cause. Accept, &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, November 12, 1807.

SIR: It was not till yesterday that I received from Mr. Skipwith a copy of the decree of the Council of Prizes in the case of the Horizon. This is the first unfriendly decision of that body, under the arrêt of the 21st of November, 1806. In this case, and on the petition of the defendant, the Court has recommended the restitution of the whole cargo. I did not however think proper to join in asking, as a favor, what I believed myself entitled to as a right. I subjoin a copy of my note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and am, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

Relations with France.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[Enclosed in Mr. Armstrong's letter of November 12.]

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, November 12, 1807.

SIR: The document to which these observations are prefixed will inform your Excellency that an American ship, trading under the protection of the laws of nations, and of particular treaties, and suffering shipwreck on the coast of France, has recently been seized by His Majesty's officers, and adjudged by his Council of Prizes as follows, viz: "Our Council puts at liberty the American vessel, the Horizon, shipwrecked the 30th of May last, near Morlaix; and, consequently, orders that the amount arising from the sale legally made of the wreck of the said vessel, together with the merchandise of the cargo, which, according to an estimate made in presence of the overseers of the administrations of the marine and custom-house shall have been acknowledged not to proceed from English manufactures, nor from English territory, shall be restored to Captain McClure, without deducting any other expenses than those relative to the sale; and with regard to the other merchandise of the cargo, which, from the result of the said estimate, shall be acknowledged to come from manufactures, or English territory, by virtue of the fifth article of the decree of the 21st of November, 1806, they shall be confiscated for the use of the State; the whole to be sold by the forms prescribed in the regulations; and the application of the product to be made in conformity to the arrangements of the said decree, deduction being made for the expense of saving the goods, and that of the support of the crew, until the day that the Captain shall receive the notification of the present decision."

The reasons upon which this decision are founded are at once so new and so alarming to the present friendly relations of the two Powers, that I cannot but discuss them with a freedom in some degree proportioned to my sense of their novelty and importance.

"Considering," says the Council, "first, that the neutrality of the ship and cargo was sufficiently established, the whole ought to be restored, (agreeably to the provisions of the convention of the 30th of September, 1800,) provided no merchandise of English origin had been found in her, and, of course, that she had not been brought within the limits of the imperial decree of the 21st of November, 1806."

Here is an open and unqualified admission that the ship was found within the rules prescribed by the Convention of 1800; that, according to these rules, her cargo and herself ought to have been restored; and that such would have been the fact, but for the operation of the decree of the 21st of November, 1806.

In the letter your Excellency did me the honor to write to me on the 7th of October last, you thought it "easy to reconcile the obligations of this decree with the preservation of those arising from treaties." It was not for me to examine the means by which this reconciliation was to be effected; they no doubt fully existed, and yet exist, in His Majesty's good pleasure; and taking for granted this fact, I saw in the opinion nothing but proofs of friendly dispositions and pledges that these were not to be either wantonly destroyed or diminished. How inauspicious, however, to its authority, and the consolations derived from it, is this recent act of the Council of Prizes! an act which explicitly acknowledges the opposite characters and conflicting injunctions of these two instruments; and which, of course, draws after it considerations the most serious to the Government of the United States.

The second reason of the Council is, "that the decree declaring (British) merchandise good prize had principally in view captures made on the high seas; but that the question, whether shipwrecked goods ought to be restored or confiscated, having always been judged under the fourteenth article of the regulation of the 26th of July, 1778, and, according to their character, (which might have rendered lawful, or have even commanded their seizure at sea,) there is no room to introduce, in this case, any new distinction which, however philanthropic it may appear, has not as yet been adopted as a rule by any maritime nation."

The doctrine resisted in this passage, and which inculcates the duty of extending protection to the unfortunate, is not new to His Majesty's Council of Prizes. They have themselves consecrated it by their decision of the 5th of March, 1800. By that decision they restored an enemy's ship, (the Diana), on the single reason, that "she had been compelled to enter a French port by stress of weather." "I should equally fail," says the Attorney General, "in respect to myself and to the Council, before whom I have the honor to represent the Government, were I not to maintain a principle consecrated by our laws, and by those of all nations. In all circumstances, let the loyalty of the French Government serve as the basis of your decisions. Prove yourselves at once generous and just; your enemies will know and respect your magnanimity." Such was the principle adopted by the Council in the year 1800, and in the case of an enemy's ship; yet we are now told that this very principle, so honorable to the Court, to the nation, and to human nature, is utterly unknown to all maritime people. And on what occasion do we hear this? When an enemy's ship is again thrown on the French coast? No; it has been reserved for the wreck of a neutral and a friendly vessel—for a ship of the United States! It is not denied that, had this ship escaped the rocks and made the port of Morlaix, the only inhospitality to which she would have been exposed, (under the most rigorous interpretation of the law in question,) would have been that of being ordered again to sea.

Relations with France.

Has, then, the misfortune of shipwreck so far altered her condition, as to expose her to the injury of confiscation also? and is this among the principles which the defender of maritime rights means to consecrate by his power and his wisdom? It is impossible!

The third reason of the Council is, "that the application of the fifth article aforesaid, in as far as it concerns the Americans and other nations, is the result both of the general expressions of that very article, and of the communication recently made by his Excellency, the Grand Judge, concerning the primitive intention of the sovereign."

This reason will be found to be substantially answered in my reply to reason No. 5 of the Council. It will be seen that the opinion given here, that "the application of article fifth of the imperial decree, to American commerce, is the result of the general expressions of that very article," was not the opinion of the Council on the 5th of March last, when they judged the case of the Hibernia. They then declared, in totidem verbis, that the decree "said nothing of its own influence on the convention of 1800," between the United States and France.

The fourth reason of the Council is, "that the expedition in question having certainly been made with full knowledge of the said decree, no objection can be drawn, with any propriety, from the general rules forbidding a retrospective action, nor, even in this particular case, from the posterior date of the act in which the Sovereign decides the question; since that act sprung from his supreme wisdom, not as an interpretation of a doubtful point, but as a declaration of an anterior and positive disposition."

A distinction is here attempted to be taken between the interpretation of a doubtful point and the declaration of an anterior and positive rule. This distinction cannot be maintained; for, if the rule had been positive, there would have been no occasion for the declaration. Neither the Minister of Marine, nor the Council of Prizes, could have had any doubts on the subject; the execution of the decree would have been prompt and peremptory; nor would a second act on the part of His Majesty, after the lapse of twelve months, have been necessary to give operation to the first. Need I appeal to your Excellency's memory for the facts on which these remarks turn? You know that doubts did exist. You know that there was, under them, much hesitation in pronouncing. You know that, as late as the ninth of August, I sought an explanation of the decree in question; and that even then your Excellency (who was surely a competent and legitimate organ of His Majesty) did not think yourself prepared to give it. The conclusion is inevitable. His Majesty's answer, transmitted to the Court of Prizes on the 18th of September last, through the medium of the Grand Judge, was in the nature of an interpretation, and, being so, could not, without possessing a retroactive quality, apply to events many months anterior in date to itself.

The fifth reason of the Council, and the last which enters into my present view of the subject, is, "that, though one of the principal agents of His Majesty had given a contrary opinion, of which the Council had at no period partaken, this opinion being that of an individual, could not, whatever consideration its author may merit, balance the formal declaration given in the name of His Majesty himself; and that, if the communication of this opinion had, as is alleged, given room to and served as a basis for many American shipments, and particularly of the one in question, this circumstance, which may call for the indulgence of His Majesty, in a case in which the confiscation is entirely to the advantage of the State, does not prevent a council, rigid in its duty, to pronounce in conformity to the decree of the 21st of November, and of the declaration which followed it."

It would appear from this paragraph that, not finding it easy to untie the knot, the Council had determined to cut it. Pressed by the fact that an interpretation of the decree had been given by a Minister of His Majesty, specially charged with its execution, they would now escape from this fact, and from the conclusions to which it evidently leads, by alleging, 1st. That at no time had the Council partaken of the opinion given by the Minister; and 2d. That this opinion, being that of an individual, could not possess either the force or the authority of one truly ministerial.

It appears to me, as I think it will appear to your Excellency, that the Council have, in these statements, been less correct than is usual to them on similar occasions. If, as they now assert, they have never partaken of the Minister's opinion; if they have never even hesitated on the question, whether the decree of November did or did not derogate from the Treaty of 1800, why, I ask, suspend the American cases generally; or why decide as they did in the case of the Hibernia? If I mistake not, we find in this case the recognition of the very principle laid down by the Minister of Marine. That officer says: "In my opinion, the November decree does not work any change in the rules at present observed with respect to neutral commerce, and, consequently, none in the convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, year nine." And what says the Council? "Admitting that this part of the cargo (the rum and ginger,) was of British origin, the dispositions of the November decree, [which contain nothing with regard to their own influence over the convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, year nine,] evidently cannot be applied to a ship leaving America on the 6th of the same month of November; and, of course, cannot have authorized her capture in the moment she was entering the neutral port of her destination." We have here three distinct grounds of exemption from the effects of the November decree:

1st. The entire silence of that decree, with regard to its own influence over the convention of 1800.

Relations with France.

2d. The early period at which the ship left the United States; and

3d. The neutral character of the port to which she was destined. If such, sir, were the principles admitted by the Council on the 25th of March last, with what correctness can it be now said, "that at no period have they partaken of the opinion of the Minister?"

The second fact asserted by the Council is, that the interpretation of the decree in question, given on the 24th of December, 1806, was private, not public; or, in other words, that it was the interpretation of the man, not that of the Minister, and, as such, cannot outweigh the more recent declaration coming directing from His Majesty himself.

On the comparative weight of those declarations I shall say nothing, nor shall I do more to repel the first part of the insinuation, (that the Minister's declaration was that only of the individual,) than to submit to your Excellency my letter of the 20th of December, 1806, claiming from that Minister an official interpretation of the decree in question, and his answer of the 24th of the same month, giving to me the interpretation demanded.

To your Excellency, who, as late as the 21st of August last, considered the Minister of Marine as the natural organ of His Majesty's will, in whatever regarded the decree aforesaid, and who actually applied to him for information relating to it, this allegation of the Council of Prizes, and the reasoning founded upon it, cannot but appear very extraordinary, and will justify me in requesting that His Majesty may be moved to set aside the decision in question, on the ground of error in the opinion of the Council.

If, in support of this conclusion, I have drawn no arguments from the Treaty of 1800, nor from the laws of nations, your Excellency will not be at a loss to assign to this omission its true cause. It would surely have been a useless formality to appeal to authorities, not only practically, but even professedly extinct. In the letter of the Minister of Justice of the 18th of September, we are told by His Majesty himself, that, "since he had not judged proper to make any exception in the letter of his decree, there was no room to make any in its execution;" and in the report of your Excellency's predecessor, of the 20th of November, 1806, we have these memorable words:

"England has declared these places blockaded, before which she had not a single ship of war.

"She has done more, for she has declared in a state of blockade places which all her assembled forces were incapable of blockading—immense coasts and a vast empire.

"Afterwards, drawing from a chimerical right, and from an assumed fact, the consequence that she might justly make her prey of everything going to the places laid under interdiction by a simple declaration of the British Admiralty, and of everything arising therefrom, and carrying this doctrine into effect, she has alarmed neutral navigators, and driven them to a distance from ports whither their interests attracted them, and which the laws of nations authorized them to frequent.

"Thus it is, that she has turned to her own profit, and to the detriment of Europe, but more particularly of France, the audacity with which she mocks at all rights, and insults even reason itself.

"Against a Power which forgets to such a pitch all ideas of justice and all humane sentiments, what can be done but to forget them for an instant one's self?"

Words cannot go further to show the extinguished authority, in the one case, of the treaty subsisting between the United States and His Imperial Majesty, and, in the other, of the law of nations; to appeal to them, therefore, would be literally appealing to the dead. Accept, sir, &c.,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

The MINISTER of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, December 1, 1807.

SIR: I have this moment received a letter from His Majesty's Minister of Foreign Relations, of which I subjoin a copy; and am, sir, with very high consideration, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[Enclosed in the above.]

Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong.

MILAN, November 24, 1807.

SIR: The execution of the measures taken against the English commerce has frequently caused reclamations on your part. The intention of His Majesty, without doubt, is, that every particular abuse may be repressed; but the Federal Government cannot make any complaint against the measures themselves; and while the United States allow that their vessels may be visited by England, that she may drag them into her ports and turn them from their destination; while they do not oblige England to respect their flag and the merchandise which it covers; while they permit that Power to apply to them the absurd rules of blockade which it has set up, with the view of injuring France; they bind themselves, by that tolerance towards England, to allow also the application of the measures of reprisals which France is obliged to employ against her. His Majesty regrets, without doubt, to have been forced to recur to such measures. He knows all that the commercial classes may have to suffer in consequence of them, particularly those who, having habitual relations with England, using a common language, and often mixing their interests, might more frequently occasion an apprehension of some commercial connivance with the English, inasmuch as they would have greater facilities in covering it. This circumstance made it necessary to use towards them precautions more exact, and an unceasing watchfulness, in order not to be exposed to abuses which might result from a less constant vigilance. But it is not to

Relations with France.

France, it is to England, that these inconveniences to individuals ought to be imputed. She it is who has given the example of measures unjust and illegal, and infringing on the sovereignty of nations. To oblige her to renounce them, it has become necessary to combat her with her own arms; in violating the rights of all nations she has united them all by a common interest; and it is for them to have recourse to force against her, to forbid her the search (la visite) of their vessels, the taking away of their crews, and to declare themselves against measures which wound their dignity and their independence. The unjust pretensions of England will be kept up as long as those whose rights she violates are silent; and what Government has had more to complain of against her than the United States? All the difficulties which have given rise to your reclamations, sir, would be removed with ease, if the Government of the United States, after complaining in vain of the injustice and violations of England, took with the whole Continent the part of guarantying itself therefrom. England has introduced into the maritime war an entire disregard for the rights of nations; it is only in forcing her to a peace that it is possible to recover them. On this point the interest of all nations is the same; all have their honor and their independence to defend. Accept, sir, &c.

CHAMPAGNY.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, December 27, 1807.

SIR: I forward by Mr. McElhony a copy of a second and very extraordinary decree of this Government with regard to neutral commerce. Whether it be meant to stimulate Great Britain to the commission of new outrages, or to quicken us in repelling those she has already committed, the policy is equally unwise, and so decidedly so, that I know not a single man of consideration who approves of it. It is, however, not less true that it is as difficult to find one who will hazard an objection to it. Td, who in this way is permitted to go further than any other person, dare not avow his opinion of it, nor (bad as he thinks it) will he do more than state that the present moment would appear to dictate some modifications. To this point he stands engaged to go, and I wait the result with much anxiety. The Emperor is expected here on the last day of the month.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

P. S.—As Mr. Lee thinks it probable that both the copies of my despatch of the 15th November are taken to England, I send a third copy of it with this. There is no longer a doubt that the Emperor wished to get hold of the royal family of Portugal. There is a degree of wickedness that makes even scoundrels honest. This is verified in the conduct of Aranjo. In every other act of his life he betrayed his master; in this he served, and perhaps saved him. The assailant confided to him his whole secret, and, abandoned as he was, he could not lead himself to its execution.

I have seen a letter from the Minister of Marine, in which he says, "The vessels of friendly and allied Powers now in the ports of the empire shall not be permitted to depart until further orders." The professed object of this measure is "to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy;" the real object to induce the British to arrest all such vessels [of ours] as may be within their grasp. Thus the two rivals are to go on endeavoring which can most outrage law and justice. The letter above-mentioned was written to the Minister of Denmark. A similar notice has not yet been sent to me. It is, therefore, possible that His Majesty's care is restricted to vessels of Powers both friendly and allied; that it is a squeeze purely fraternal. If so, we may escape for this time. I state this, however, as a thing barely possible.

I am, sir, with very high consideration, your most obedient servant,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Extract.—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, January 22, 1808.

The conjecture offered in my last letter with regard to the embargo of our vessels, turns out to be correct; the order was intended to be confined to the vessels of friendly and allied Powers, or Powers having both these characters. The word neutral crept into it merely by mistake. An extract from the Minister's letter to me on this subject is as follows, to wit: "No order has been given to retain neutral vessels in the ports of the empire; and as soon as I knew of the error committed in this respect, I hastened to correct it, and to notify expressly that neutral vessels, and particularly those of the United States, should enjoy an entire freedom." I subjoin, also, a copy of a letter in answer to the remonstrances I have made against the new arrêt of the 17th of December last; by this you will see that the captures under this decree, like those under that of November, 1806, are in the nature of detention, and that, in the contingency of an exclusion of British commerce from the United States, the ships and cargoes will be immediately released. I expect, from one moment to another, the Emperor's orders for immediately raising all the sequestrations which have taken place under the November decree.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of January 22, 1808.]

Translation of a letter from Mr. Champagny to General Armstrong, dated

PARIS, January 15, 1808.

SIR: The different notes which you have done me the honor to address to me have been laid before His Majesty.

The proceedings of England towards all Governments are so contrary to the law of nations, and all the rules constantly observed even among enemies, that no recourse against this Power is any longer to be found in the ordinary means of repression. In order to annoy her, it is become necessary to turn against her the arms which she makes use of herself; and, if transient inconveniences result therefrom, it is to her alone that they are to be imputed. Since England respects no laws, how could they be respected with regard to her? The maritime laws which she violates, ought they still to be a protection to her? And if some Powers tolerate the infractions committed on their independence, could they have the right to require that France alone should restrain herself within limits which her enemy has every where overleaped?

The United States, more than any other Power, have to complain of the aggressions of England. It has not been enough for her to offend against the independence of their flag, nay, against that of their territory and of their inhabitants, by attacking them even in their ports, by forcibly carrying away their crews; her decrees of the 11th November have made a fresh attack on their commerce and on their navigation, as they have done on those of all other Powers.

In the situation in which England has placed the Continent, especially since her decrees of the 11th November, His Majesty has no doubt of a declaration of war against her by the United States, whatever transient sacrifices war may occasion; they will not believe it consistent either with their interest or dignity to acknowledge the monstrous principle and the anarchy which that Government wishes to establish on the seas. If it be useful and honorable for all nations to cause the true maritime law of nations to be re-established, and to avenge the insults committed by England against every flag, it is indispensable for the United States, who, from the extent of their commerce, have oftener to complain of these violations. War exists, then, in fact, between England and the United States; and His Majesty considers it as declared from the day on which England published her decrees. In that persuasion, His Majesty, ready to consider the United States as associated with the cause of all the Powers who have to defend themselves against England, has not taken any definitive measures towards the American vessels which may have been brought into our ports; he has ordered that they should remain sequestered until a decision may be had thereon, according to the disposition which shall have been expressed by the Government of the United States.

Extract—Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Feb. 8, 1808.

Your letters and communications by Doctor Bullus were duly delivered on the 14th day of December; the same conveyance brought a copy of the sentence pronounced by the French Prize Court in the case of the Horizon, giving a judicial effect to the decree of November 21, 1806, as expounded in the answer of Mr. Champagny to your letter of the 12th November, 1807.

Whilst the French Government did not avow or enforce a meaning of the decree of November, 1806, in relation to the United States extending its purview beyond the municipal limits, it could not, in strictness, be regarded as an infraction either of our neutral or conventional rights; and, consequently, did not authorize more than a demand of reasonable explanations of its doubtful import, or friendly expostulations with respect to the rigor and suddenness of its innovations.

The case is now essentially changed. A construction of the decree is avowed and executed, which violates as well the positive stipulations of the convention of September 30, 1800, as the incontestable principles of public law. And the President charges you to superadd, to whatever representations you may have previously made, a formal remonstrance, in such terms as may be best calculated either to obtain a recall of the illegal measure, so far as it relates to the United States, or to have the effect of leaving in full force all the rights accruing to them from a failure to do so.

That the execution of local laws against foreign nations on the high seas is a violation of the rights of the former and the freedom of the latter, will probably not be questioned. A contrary principle would in fact imply the same exclusive dominion over the entire ocean as is enjoyed within the limits of the local sovereignty, and a degradation of every other nation from its common rights and equal rank.

If it be contended that the decree, as a retaliation on the other belligerent, at the expense of neutral nations, is justified by a culpable acquiescence in the prior measures of that belligerent operating through neutrals, you will be able to deny such acquiescence; and to urge moreover that on every supposition the retaliating measure could not be justly enforced in relation to neutrals, without allowing them at least a reasonable time for choosing between due measures against the prior wrong, and an acquiescence in both. The copy of the representations to the British Government, through its Minister here, on the subject of its orders of January, 1807, will at once disprove an acquiescence on the part of the United States, and explain the grounds on which the late extension of the French decree of November, 1806, is an object of just remonstrance.

The conduct of the French Government in giving this extended operation to its decree, and indeed in issuing one with such an apparent or doubtful import against the rights of the sea, is the more extraordinary, inasmuch as the inability to enforce it on that element exhibited the measure in the light of an empty menace, at the same time that it afforded pretexes to her enemy for severe retaliations, for which ample means are found in her naval superiority.

The accumulated dangers to which the illegal proceedings of the belligerent nations have subjected the commerce and navigation of the United States, have at length induced Congress to resort to an embargo on our own vessels, as a measure best fitted for the crisis—being an effectual security for our mercantile property and mariners now at home and daily arriving, and at the same time neither a measure nor just cause of war. Copies of this act were soon after its passage transmitted to Mr. Pinkney, with an authority to assure the British Government that it was to be viewed in this light, and that it was not meant to be the slightest impediment to amicable negotiations with foreign Governments. He was requested to avail himself of an opportunity of communicating to you and Mr. Erving this view of the subject, and I hope that you will have been thence enabled to present it to the French Government. Not relying however on that indirect opportunity, I send by this another copy of the act, with an instruction from the President that you make it the subject of such explanations as will guard against any misconception of the policy which led to it. It is strictly a measure of precaution, required by the dangers incident to external commerce, and, being indiscriminate in its terms and operation towards all nations, can give no just offence to any. The duration of the act is not fixed by itself, and will consequently depend on a continuance or cessation of its causes in a degree sufficient, in the judgment of the Legislature, to induce or forbid its repeal. It may be hoped that the inconveniences felt from it by the belligerent nations may lead to a change of conduct which imposed the inconveniences of it on ourselves. France herself will be a sufferer, and some of her allies far more so. It will be very agreeable to find in that consideration, and still more in her sense of justice, a sufficient motive to an early manifestation of the respect due to our commercial rights. The example would be worthy of the professions which he makes to the world on this subject.

February 18. Since the above was written I have been under a degree of indisposition, which has suspended the proposed continuation of it, and which now will oblige me to be very brief; the more so, as the vessel has been some days detained, which was engaged for the special purpose of conveying public despatches and private letters to Europe.

The delay has enabled me to inform you that Mr. Erskine, a few days ago, communicated, by instructions from his Government, its late decrees of November 11th, and those forming a sequel to them. The communication was accompanied with assurances that much regret was felt by His Britannic Majesty at the necessity which the conduct of his enemy had created for measures so embarrassing to neutral commerce, and that His Majesty would readily follow an example of relinquishing such a course, or even of making relaxations pari passu with his enemy.

Whether these intimations have any reference to the distinction between such parts of the French decree as operate municipally on shore, and such as, operating on the high seas, violate the rights of neutrals, or to a distinction between the former restriction and the late extension of the decree with respect to the United States, Mr. Erskine did not seem authorized to say. The probability is that neither of these distinctions entered into the views of the British Cabinet. But it is certainly neither less the duty nor the true policy of the Emperor of the French so to vary his decree as to make it consistent with the rights of neutrals, and the freedom of the seas, and particularly with his positive stipulations to the United States. This may be the more reasonably expected, as nothing can be more clear, as has been already observed, than that the effect of the decree, as far as it can be carried into effect, would not be sensibly diminished by abolishing its operation beyond the limits of the territorial sovereignty.

In remonstrating against the injustice and illegality of the French decree, I am aware that you may be reminded of antecedent injuries to France and her allies through British violations of neutral commerce. The fact cannot be denied, and may be urged with great force, in our remonstrances against the orders to which Great Britain has given a retaliating character, since the French decree might on the same ground be pronounced a retaliation on the preceding conduct of Great Britain. But ought the legitimate commerce of neutrals to be thus the victim and the sport of belligerents contesting with each other the priority of their destructive innovations, and, without leaving either of them to neutrals, even the opportunity or the time for disproving that culpable acquiescence which is made the pretext by both for the wrongs done to them? And I must repeat that, apart from all questions of this nature, the French decree, or at least the illegal extensions of it to the United States, remain chargeable with all the impolicy which has been pointed out.

I find by accounts from Hamburg, Bremen, Holland, and Leghorn, that the trade and property of our citizens have been much vexed by regulations subaltern to those of the original decree of November 21, 1806. How far the complaints are founded on proceedings violating our public rights, or on such as are unfriendly and inequitable towards our citizens who have placed their property within those jurisdictions, you will be able to decide better than we can do at this distance; and the President refers to your own judgment the kind of representation to the French Government which those and other analogous cases may require.

Enclosed is a copy of the answer from the Minister of Marine, to my letter of the 13th instant, in relation to the sale of a part of the cargo of the ship James Adams. It would now appear, that the promises of forbearance made by another Department are applicable only to vessels sequestered in the ports, and not to such as have been captured at sea.

prize made at sea, and seized for a contravention of the decree of the 17th December last; that the provisional sale ordered on account of the "average" is for the interest as well of the captured as of the captors, and that it is directed according to the case provided for by the regulation of the 2d Prairial, 11th year.

Mr. Patterson offers so good a conveyance that I cannot but employ it. Nothing has occurred here since the date of my public despatches, (the 17th instant,) to give to our business an aspect more favorable than it then had; but, on the other hand, I have come at the knowledge of two facts, which I think sufficiently show the decided character of the Emperor's policy with regard to us. these are—1. That, in a Council of Administration held a few days past, when it was proposed to modify the operation of the decrees of November, 1806, and December, 1807, (though the proposition was supported by the whole weight of the Council,) he became highly indignant, and declared that these decrees should suffer no change, and that the Americans should be compelled to take the positive character, either of allies or of enemies. 2. That, on the 27th of January last, twelve days after Mr. Champagny's written assurances that these decrees should work no change in the property sequestered until our discussions with England were brought to a close, and seven days before he repeated to me verbally these very assurances, the Emperor had, by a special decision, confiscated two of our ships and their cargoes, (the Julius Henry and *Juniatta) for want merely of a document, not required by any law or usage of the commerce in which they had been engaged. This act was taken, as I am informed, on a general report of sequestered cases amounting to one hundred and sixty, and which, at present prices, will yield upwards of one hundred millions of francs—a sum, the magnitude of which alone renders hopeless all attempts at saving it. Danes, Portuguese, and Americans, will be the principal sufferers.

If I am right in supposing that the Emperor has definitively taken his ground, I cannot be wrong in concluding that you will immediately take yours.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, March 9, 1808.

The conversation alluded to in the copy of the letter of — did not take place till the 8th instant, when the Emperor declared, that if means could be found to make an exception to the operation of the November decree, such exception should have his consent.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, March 15, 1808.

I stated in my last letter the substance of a declaration made by the Emperor, viz: that if means could be found to except American property from the operation of the decree of November, 1806, without infringing the principles of the decrees, he would immediately make the exception. No time was lost in communicating this declaration to me; and I was invited to point out the means it required, and assured that they should be immediately submitted to His Majesty. Little as I liked the proposition, and much as I doubt the sincerity of the declaration out of which it grew, I could not refuse any agency of mine in rescuing so much of the American property sequestered in the ports of France as should come within this new rule. I accordingly wrote the note, (a copy of which is subjoined to this letter,) pointing out, in a few words, the property to which that rule would apply. This note was put into the Emperor's hand by the Prince of Benevento, who, though six days have now elapsed, has not yet received an answer.

[Note referred to in the extract from Mr. Armstrong's letter of the 15th March, 1808.]

The imperial decree of November, 1806, contains no authority to sequester the cargoes of neutral vessels touching at English ports, and subsequently coming into those of France, excepting in cases in which the captains or supercargoes may have made false declarations. The penalty provided by that decree for offences other than those of false declarations is immediate departure from the empire; and as in these cases no false declarations have been made, nor are alleged to have been made, so no penalty, other than that of departure from the empire, can be legally inflicted.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, April 5, 1808,

I received the despatches you did me the honor to address to me by Mr. Lewis, on the 26th ultimo.

Though I had complained often and earnestly of both the principles and operation of the Emperor's decrees of November, 1806, and December, 1807, (having written at least twenty notes on the different cases which have arisen under them,) yet, as the President's orders were express, that, on receipt of your letter, I should superadd, to whatever representations might have been previously made, a formal remonstrance against those decrees, I did not lose a moment in writing and presenting the enclosed note; the terms of which will, I hope, appear to be such as were proper or necessary to the case, and calculated either to obtain a recall of the illegal measures, or to leave in full force the rights accruing to the United States from a failure on the part of France to recall them. To this note I have not yet received an answer, nor have I reason to expect one soon, as the Emperor has left Paris, (it is said for Spain,) and had, at no time before he set out, indicated any alteration in the views which originally produced the decrees in question.

Mr. Pinkney found means (in the return to the Continent of M. D'Alopeus) to communicate the President's views on the subject of the general embargo, and particularly the desire he had that it should not be considered as a measure of hostility against any foreign nation. Some explanations of this kind, were, perhaps, necessary in England, where, from the misrepresentations of our own people, the character of the policy was likely to be misunderstood; but as neither the same nor any other reason existed for making them here, none have been offered.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, April 2, 1808.

SIR: Having submitted to the Government of the United States copies of the imperial decrees of the 21st of November, 1806, and 17th December, 1807, and of the expositions which your Excellency has been pleased, at different times, to give of them, I have recently received the instructions of the President to remonstrate against both the provisions and operation of the said decrees, on the ground of their infracting, as well the positive stipulations of a particular treaty, as the incontestable principles of public law.

In discharging this duty, your Excellency will permit me to call to your remembrance the twelfth and fourteenth articles of the treaty made between the United States and France, on the 30th of September, 1800. These articles provide—

1st. That "it shall be lawful for the citizens of either country to sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods always excepted) from any port whatever, to any port of the enemy of the other, and to sail and trade with their ships and merchandise, with perfect security and liberty, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both, or of either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever; and to pass not only directly from the places and ports of the enemy aforesaid to neutral ports and places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be or be not under the jurisdiction of the same Power, unless such ports or places shall be actually blockaded, besieged, or invested."

2d. That "vessels sailing for a port or place belonging to an enemy, without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, may be turned away from such port or place, but they shall not be detained, nor any part of their cargo (not contraband) confiscated, unless, after notice of such blockade or investment, they shall again attempt to enter; but they shall be permitted to go to any other port or place they shall think proper.

3d. That "free ships shall give a freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either; contraband goods being always excepted."

These stipulations are not more clear in themselves, nor of more indisputable application and authority in the present case, than the injunctions of public law by which they were enforced, viz:

That local regulations (excepting by virtue of convention) cannot apply to foreign nations on the high seas, without violating the rights of the one, and the freedom of the other; that blockades can only exist when places are so infested that no serious attempt can be made to approach them without exposing the parties making them to imminent danger; that merchant vessels may be visited without any degradation to the flag of the nation to which they belong, &c. But why multiply proofs of a position which is not denied? Does not the official report of your enlightened predecessor of the 21st of November, 1806, admit the illegitimacy of the original decree? Does it not expressly say, that the doctrines of blockade introduced by England are monstrous and indefensible? and that the practice, like the doctrine, is a mockery of right, and an insult upon reason? After strictures so severe, because so just, what can be said for the policy of France, which differs in nothing from that of England? Has your Excellency attempted to defend either the theory or the practice of this policy, on the ground of its conformity to the principles of public law? Or have you done more at any time, or on any occasion, than to seek a justification for it on the bare suggestion that the United States have acquiesced in the measures of England? And how has even this suggestion been maintained? By an exposition of the wrongs inflicted on American commerce! and which have been notoriously practised by all the belligerents in turn. Have not the ships of the United States been encountered by all? Have they not been turned from their original destination? Have they not been dragged into foreign ports for adjudication? Have they not, in several instances, been burnt on the high seas? Is not the argument, founded on this state of things, equally good for either, or for all the belligerents? And can France derive from it rights which do not equally accrue to her enemies? There is, however, another and a better answer to this suggestion, which your Excellency has already seen in the letter I had the honor of writing to you on the 16th of February last, viz: that the suggestion is neither well nor plausibly founded; and that the United States neither have submitted, nor will submit, to the usurpations of Great Britain nor to those of any other nation.

Accept, sir, &c.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, April 12, 1808.

I have detained Mr. Lewis here till to-day, on the supposition that my letter of the 2d instant would be answered. This was, however, a mere accommodation to forms, as the absence of the Emperor and the Minister of Foreign Relations rendered this supposition highly improbable. There being then no public reason for Mr. Lewis's longer stay in Paris, and the permission to the Oage to prosecute her voyage to England not including one to return to France, I have thought it best that we should embark with such despatches as were ready, proceed to Falmouth in England, and thence, after receiving Mr. Pinkney's orders, return with all possible expedition to the United States. He has accordingly been instructed to this effect.

Extract—Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 2, 1808.

Since my last, of which Lieutenant Lewis was the bearer, I have received your several letters of the 27th of December, 22d January, 15th and 17th of February, with their respective enclosures.

That of the 15th of January, from Mr. Champagny to you, has, as you will see by the papers herewith sent, produced the sensations here which the spirit and style of it were calculated to excite in minds alive to the interests and honor of the nation. To present to the United States the alternative of bending to the views of France against her enemy, or of incurring a confiscation of all the property of their citizens carried into the French prize courts, implied that they were susceptible of impressions by which no independent and honorable nation can be guided; and to prejudice and pronounce for them the effect which the conduct of another nation ought to have on their councils and course of proceeding, had the air at least of an assumed authority, not less irritating to the public feelings. In these rights the President makes it your duty to present to the French Government the contents of Mr. Champagny's letter; taking care, as your discretion will doubtless suggest, that while you make that Government sensible of the offensive tone employed, you leave the way open for friendly and respectful explanations, if there be a disposition to offer them; and for a decision here on any reply which may be of a different character.

Congress closed their session on the 25th ultimo. For a general view of their proceedings, I refer to the series of newspapers heretofore and now forwarded; and to other prints which are added. Among their acts of chief importance is that which vests in the President an authority to suspend, in whole or in part, the embargo laws.

The conditions on which the suspending authority is to be exercised will engage your particular attention. They appeal equally to the justice and the policy of the two great belligerent Powers now emulating each other in violations of both. The President counts on your best endeavors to give to this appeal all the effect possible with the French Government. Mr. Pinkney will be doing the same with that of Great Britain. The relation in which a recall of its retaliating decrees by either Power will place the United States to the other, is obvious, and ought to be a motive to the measure proportioned to the desire which has been manifested by each to produce collisions between the United States and its adversary, and which must be equally felt by each to avoid one with itself.

Should wiser councils or increasing distresses induce Great Britain to revoke her impolitic orders against neutral commerce, and thereby prepare the way for the removal of the embargo, as it applies to her, France could not persist in the illegal part of her decrees, if she does not mean to force a contest with the United States. On the other hand, should she set the example of revocation, Great Britain would be obliged, either by following it to restore to France the full benefit of neutral trade, which she needs, or, by persevering in her obnoxious orders after the pretext for them had ceased, to render collisions with the United States inevitable.

In every point of view, therefore, it is so clearly the sound policy of France to rescind so much at least of her decrees as trespass on neutral rights, and particularly to be the first in taking the retrograde step, that it cannot be unreasonable to expect that it will be immediately taken.

The repeal of her decrees is more to be expected, above all, if Great Britain should repeal, or be likely to repeal, hers, as the plan of the original decree at Berlin did not extend to a violation of the freedom of the seas, and was restricted to a municipal operation for nearly an entire year, notwithstanding the illegal British orders of January, 1807, and as a return of France to that restricted scope of her plan would so immaterially diminish its operation against the British commerce; that operation being so completely in the power of France on land, and so little in her power on the high seas.

But although we cannot of right demand from France more than a repeal of so much of her decrees as violate the freedom of the seas, and a great point will be gained by a repeal of that part of them, yet, as it may not have the effect of inducing a repeal of the whole illegal system of the British Government, which may seek pretexts or plead a necessity for counteracting the unprecedented and formidable mode of warfare practised against her, it will be desirable that as little room as possible should be left for this remaining danger to the tranquil enjoyment of our commercial rights.

In whatever degree the French Government may be led to change its system, you will lose no time in transmitting the information to this Department and to Mr. Pinkney, and by hired conveyances, if necessary. A correspondent instruction is given to Mr. Pinkney.

It is of the greater importance that you should receive from each other the earliest notice of any relaxations, as each Government is under a pledge to follow such an example by the other. And it is not of less importance that the President or Congress should be acquainted with the facts, that the proceedings here may be accommodated to them.

That you may know the grounds on which the British orders of November have been arranged by this Government, I enclose a copy of the answer to Mr. Erskine's note communicating them, a copy of the note being also enclosed.

The other documents communicated will put you in full possession of the relations of the United States with Great Britain, as resulting from the issue of our general negotiations, and from that of the mission of Mr. Rose.

Relations with France.

This despatch is forwarded by Mr. Baker, who takes his passage from Baltimore in a vessel engaged, as was the Osage which sailed from New York, for the special purpose of public and mercantile correspondences with Europe. She will proceed in the first instance to L'Orient, where she will leave Mr. Baker, and thence proceed with despatches for Mr. Pinkney to Falmouth, where she will remain a few days to receive communications from him; she will then return to L'Orient, in order to bring back Mr. Baker, with your communications.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, June 25, 1808.

SIR: The St. Michael arrived at L'Orient on the 1st instant, and, like the Osage, was immediately put under sequestration. It was not until the 8th that Mr. Baker arrived here.

The remonstrance ordered, with respect to the terms of Mr. Champagny's letter of the 15th of January, shall be executed the moment the Prince of Benevento returns from Valençay, and I hope in a way which, while it makes the French Government sensible of the offensiveness of those terms, will not obstruct the road to friendly and respectful explanations on its part.

To give this a chance of finding Mr. Livingston at Bordeaux, I must close it here.

With high respect, &c.

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, July 18, 1808.

SIR: I avail myself of the detention of the Aroturus, to transmit copies of two letters which I have written to M. de Champagny: the one in execution of the President's orders with regard to the offensive terms employed by that Minister in his note of the 15th of January last; the other demanding from him, on the part of his Government, an avowal or disavowal of the conduct of Rear Admiral Baudin in burning or otherwise destroying, on the high seas, four American ships and their cargoes.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of the 18th of July.]

Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.]

PARIS, July 10, 1808.

SIR: Your Excellency will see by the enclosed extracts from two letters which His Majesty's Minister of Marine has done me the honor to address to me on the 18th of April and 13th of June last, that the property taken from the four American ships destroyed by Rear Admiral Baudin has been placed under the jurisdiction of the Imperial Council of Prizes, to be judged by it, as a case of ordinary capture.

To your Excellency it will be unnecessary to remark that, whatever may be the decision of the Council in relation to the merchandise which has been saved, the case presents a question of much higher import, and entirely beyond the jurisdiction of a maritime court, viz: the kind and degree of reparation which shall be due for the ships and merchandise which have been destroyed. And, by way of opening this subject, your Excellency will permit me to ask whether His Majesty's Government does or does not justify the conduct of Rear Admiral Baudin in burning or otherwise destroying, on the high seas, the ships and merchandise of a neutral and friendly Power? I pray your Excellency, &c.,

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

M. CHAMPAGNY.

[Referred to in Mr. Armstrong's letter of July 18.]

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, July 4, 1808.

SIR: It has been made the duty of the undersigned to bring to the view of the French Government an official note addressed to him, on the 15th of January last, by His Majesty's Minister of Exterior Relations, and which, in the opinion of the President, is calculated to derogate from the rights of the United States as an independent nation. The note is in the following words, viz:

(See Mr. Champagny's letter of the 15th of January, 1808, ante page 1668.)

On this note the undersigned would remark—

1st. That the United States have a right to elect their own policy with regard to England, as they have with regard to France, and that it is only while they continue to exercise this right, without suffering any degree of restraint from either Power, that they can maintain the independent relation in which they stand to both; whence, it follows, that, to have pronounced, in the peremptory tone of the preceding note, the effects which the measures of the British Government ought to have produced on their counsels and conduct, was a language less adapted to accomplish its own object than to offend against the respect due from one independent nation to another; and,

2d. That the alternative to be found in the last paragraph, and which leaves the United States to choose between an acquiescence in the views of France against Great Britain, and a confiscation of all American property sequestered by order of His Imperial Majesty, is equally offensive to both Governments; to France, as it would impute to her a proposition founded in wrong to individuals; and to the United States, as it would imply on their part a subjection to pecuniary interests totally inconsistent with their principles, and highly dishonorable to their character.

His Excellency will be persuaded that the President, in directing the undersigned to make this representation, had no object in view beyond that of seeking an explanation, which cannot but tend to promote the harmony of the two Powers.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States,
JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Relations with France.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 21, 1808.

SIR: Herewith you will receive a copy of the papers relating to one of the vessels which were destroyed at sea by the French frigates returning from the West Indies. I observe that, in your letter to Mr. Champagny of the 2d of April, you have incidentally noticed this occurrence. If ample reparation should not have been made to the sufferers, the President thinks it proper that, as their cases become authenticated, you should present them in terms which may awaken the French Government to the nature of the injury, and the demands of justice. The burning of neutral vessels detained on the high seas is the most distressing of all the modes by which belligerents exert force contrary to right, and, in proportion as it is destitute of apology, ought at least to be the promptitude and amplitude of the redress.

If it be contended that the destruction in these cases proceeded solely from the danger that otherwise intelligence might reach a pursuing or hovering force, it may be answered, that, if such a plea were of greater avail, it would only disprove an hostility of intention, without diminishing the obligation to indemnify, on the most liberal scale, the injured individuals. It may be added that, if the outrage on the individuals was not meant as an hostility towards their nation, the latter might justly expect a tender of such explanations as would leave no doubt on this subject. I have the honor to be, &c.,

JAMES MADISON.

Mr. Madison to Mr. Armstrong.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 22, 1808.

Your despatches by Lieutenant Lewis were delivered on the 8th instant.

It is regretted that the interval between his arrival and the date of your letter to Mr. Champagny, during which I presume some verbal intercommunication must have taken place, had produced no indication of a favorable change in the views of the French Government with respect to its decrees; and still more that, instead of an early and favorable answer to your letter, it should have been followed by such a decree as is reported to have been issued on the 22d of April, at Bayonne. The decree has not yet reached the United States, and therefore its precise import cannot be ascertained. But if it should be, as it is represented, a sweeping stroke at all American vessels on the high seas, it will not only extend our demands of reparation, but is rendered the more ominous with respect to the temper and views of the Emperor towards the United States by the date of the measure.

The arrival of Mr. Baker with my letter of May 2, of which a copy is herewith sent, will have enabled you to resume the subject of the decrees, with the fairest opportunity that could be given to the French Government for a change of the unjust and unwise course which has been pursued; and I assure myself that you will not have failed to turn the communications with which you are furnished to the best account. If France does not wish to throw the United States into the war against her, for which it is impossible to find a rational or plausible inducement, she ought not to hesitate a moment in revoking at least so much of her decrees as violate the rights of the sea, and furnish to her adversary the pretext for his retaliating measures. It would seem as if the Imperial Cabinet had never paid sufficient attention to the smallness of the sacrifice which a repeal of that portion of its system would involve, if an act of justice is to be called a sacrifice.

The information by the return of the Osage from England is not more satisfactory than that from France. Nothing was said on the subject of the Chesapeake, nor anything done or promised as to the Orders in Council. It is probable that further accounts from the United States were waited for, and that the arrival of the St. Michael will have led to a manifestation of the real views of that Government on those and other subjects. In the meantime, it cannot be doubted that hopes were cherished there of some events in this country favorable to the policy of the orders, and particularly that the offensive language and proceedings of France would bring on a hostile resistance from the United States; in which case the British Government would be able to mould everything to its satisfaction. There is much reason to believe that, if the British Government should not concur in a mutual abolition of the orders and of the embargo, it will result from an unwillingness to set an example which might be followed, and might, consequently, put an end to the irritating career of her enemy, on which the calculation is built. Might not use be made of this view of the matter in those frank and friendly conversations which sometimes bear admit topics of a delicate nature, and in which pride and prejudice can be best managed without descending from the necessary level? In every view, it is evidently proper, as far as respect to the national honor will allow, to avoid a style of procedure which might co-operate with the policy of the British Government, by stimulating the passions of the French.

Extract of a letter from General Armstrong to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, July 26, 1808.

SIR: It would have given me the highest pleasure to have drawn from this Government such explanations on the general subject of our differences with them as would have met the friendly and equitable views of the United States; but I owe it, as well to you as to myself, to declare that every attempt for that purpose hitherto made has failed, and under circumstances which by no means indicate any change in their respect for the better. With very high consideration, I am, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

Relations with France.

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 7, 1808.

I wrote a few lines to you yesterday. Two weeks have gone by without any new condemnation. My remonstrances continue to be unanswered.

P. S. I enclose a copy of my note of yesterday to M. de Champagny.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

[Referred to and enclosed in Mr. Armstrong's despatch of August 7, 1808.]

Extract—Mr. Armstrong to Mr. Champagny.

PARIS, August 6, 1808.

Mr. Armstrong presents his compliments to M. de Champagny, and begs leave to inform him that, having for some months past made trial of the artificial waters of Rivoli without any useful effect, his physician has prescribed for him those of Bourbon l'Archambault. Should M. de Champagny have any communication to make to Mr. Armstrong, he will be pleased to address them as usual to the Hotel de Légation Américaine; Rue Vaugirard, No. 100, whence they will be regularly and promptly transmitted to Bourbon.

On leaving Paris, Mr. Armstrong thinks proper to express his regrets that the political relations of the two Powers should continue to wear an aspect less auspicious to their future good understanding than is wished for by those who are the friends of both.

That His Majesty has a right to make such municipal regulations as he may deem proper, with regard to foreign commerce, neither is, nor has been, denied; for example, he may forbid the entry into the ports of France of American ships which have touched in England, or been destined to England; and he may either sequester or confiscate such vessels of the United States as shall infract these laws, after due promulgation and notice thereof; but beyond this the United States hope and believe that His Majesty will not go.

M. de Champagny will not fail to seize the distinction which these remarks present, between the authority of municipal regulations and that of public law; and will decide whether it does or does not offer a ground on which the good understanding, so long and so usefully maintained between the United States and France, may be preserved, and a degree of intercourse between them renewed, which shall have the effect of reanimating their former industry.

Does His Majesty fear that the balance of trade, arising from this renewed industry, would go to the advantage of England? Means are certainly not wanting to prevent this consequence. Would it not be entirely avoided by making it a condition of the commerce in question, that all ships leaving France shall take (in some article or articles of their produce or manufacture) the full amount of the cargoes they bring hither?

Ships sailing under this regulation would or would not go voluntarily to England. If they went voluntarily, it would only be because that country afforded the best markets for the productions of France; in which case the habitual results would be entirely changed, and England, ceasing to receive a balance for her manufactures, would begin to pay one to the United States on the productions of France. Could France wish a state of commerce more prosperous than this?

If, on the other hand, the American ships did not go voluntarily to England, but were captured and sent in for adjudication, it may be fairly presumed that the United States could no longer hesitate about becoming a party to the war against England.

Thus, in either case, the interests of His Majesty would be directly advanced by the measure: in the one, the wants of France and her colonies would be not only regularly supplied, but she would herself become an entrepôt for the supply of the Continent; in the other, the wishes of His Majesty, as expressed in February last, would be directly promoted.

Mr. Armstrong has the honor of renewing to M. de Champagny the assurances of his very high consideration.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

BOURBON L'ARCHAMBAULT,

August 28, 1808.

Since my arrival at this place, I have been honored by the receipt of your despatch of the 21st ultimo, and would immediately return to Paris to renew my discussions with M. de Champagny, either personally, as you suggest, or by writing, had I not the most solemn conviction that any new experiment, made at the present moment, in either form, and of official character, would certainly be useless, and probably injurious.

Extract—General Armstrong to Mr. Madison.

BOURBON L'ARCHAMBAULT,

August 30, 1808.

We have somewhat overrated our means of coercing the two great belligerents to a course of justice. The embargo is a measure calculated, above any other, to keep us whole and keep us in peace; but, beyond this, you must not count upon it. Here it is not felt, and in England (in the midst of the more recent and interesting events of the day) it is forgotten.

I hope that, unless France shall do us justice, we will raise the embargo, and make in its stead the experiment of an armed commerce. Should she adhere to her wicked and foolish measures, we ought not to content ourselves with doing this; there is much, very much besides that we can do, and we ought not to omit doing all we can, because it is believed here that we cannot do much, and even that we will not do what we have the power of doing.

GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND SPAIN.

[Communicated to Congress, December 28, 1808.]

To the Senate of the United States :

According to the request of the Senate, in their resolution of November 14, that copies should be laid before them of all the orders and decrees of the belligerent Powers of Europe, passed since 1791, affecting the commercial rights of the United States, I now transmit to them a report of the Secretary of State of such of them as have been attainable in the Department of State, and are supposed to have entered into the views of the Senate.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 23, 1808.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 21, 1808.

The Secretary of State, in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 14th of November, respectfully reports to the President of the United States copies of such belligerent acts, decrees, orders, and proclamations, as affect neutral rights of commerce, and as have been attainable in the Department of State, with the exception, however, of sundry acts, particularly blockades, of doubtful import or inferior importance, which it was supposed would have inconveniently extended the delay and the size of the report.

ART. 2. Their said Majesties reciprocally engage to shut their ports against French vessels, not to permit, in any instance, warlike or naval stores, corn, grain, salted meat, or other provisions, to be exported from their said ports for France, and to take all other means in their power to annoy the commerce of France, and thereby to reduce her to just conditions of peace.

ART. 3. Their Majesties engage to unite all their efforts to prevent other Powers, who shall not take part in this war, from giving, on this occasion of common interest to every civilized State, any protection whatever, direct or indirect, in consequence of their neutrality, to the commerce or the property of the French, at sea or in the ports of France.

GEORGE R.

Additional instructions to the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our Court at St. James's, the eighth day of June, 1793, and in the thirty-third year of our reign.

1st. That it shall be lawful to stop and detain all vessels laden wholly or in part with corn, flour, or meal, bound to any port in France, or any port occupied by the armies of France, and to send them to such ports as shall be most convenient, in order that such corn, meal, or flour, may be purchased on behalf of His Majesty's Government, and the ships released after such purchase, and after a due allowance for freight; or that the masters of such ships, on giving due security, to be approved by the Court of Admiralty, be permitted to proceed to dispose of their cargoes of corn, meal, or flour, in the ports of any country in amity with His Majesty.

2d. That it shall be lawful for the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, that have or may have letters of marque against France, to seize all ships, whatever be their cargoes, that shall be found attempting to enter any blockaded port, and to send the same for condemnation, together with their cargoes, except the ships of Denmark and Sweden, which shall be prevented from entering on the first attempt, but on the second shall be sent in for condemnation likewise.

3d. That in case His Majesty shall declare any port to be blockaded, the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, are hereby enjoined, if they meet with ships at sea, which appear from their papers to be destined to such blockaded port, but to have sailed from the ports of their respective countries before the declaration of the blockade shall have arrived there, to advertise them thereof, and to admonish them to go to other ports; but they are not to molest them afterward, unless it shall appear that they have continued their course with intent to enter the blockaded port, in which case they shall be subject to capture and condemnation: as shall likewise all ships wheresoever found, that shall appear to have sailed from their ports, bound to any port which His Majesty shall have declared to be blockaded, after such declaration shall have been known in the country from which they sailed; and all ships which, in the course of the voyage, shall have received notice of the blockade in any manner, and yet shall have pursued their course with intent to enter the same.

GEORGE R.—Additional instruction to the commanders of all our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our Court at St. James's, the sixth day of November, 1793, and in the thirty-fourth year of our reign.

That they shall stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of any such colony, and shall bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication in our Courts of Admiralty.

By His Majesty's command:

H. DUNDAS.

GEORGE R.—Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France. Given at our Court at St. James's, the eighth day of January, 1794.

Whereas, by our former instruction to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers, dated the 6th day of November, 1793, we signified that they should stop and detain all ships laden with goods the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of any such colony, and should bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication: We are pleased to revoke the said instruction, and, in lieu thereof, we have thought fit to issue these, our instructions, to be duly observed by the commanders of all our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France :

1. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the French West India Islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe.

2. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all ships, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the said islands, the property of which goods shall belong to the subjects of France, to whatsoever ports the same may be bound.

3. That they shall seize all ships that shall be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands that is or shall be blockaded by the arms of His Majesty or his allies, and shall send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication, according to the terms of the second article of the former instructions, bearing date the eighth day of June, 1793.

4. That they should seize all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands, and shall send them into some convenient port belonging to His Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, be proceeded against, according to the rules of nations.

GEORGE R.—Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, Spain, or the United Provinces. Given at our Court at St. James's, the 25th day of January, 1796, in the thirty-eighth year of our reign.

Whereas, by our former instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers, dated 8th January, 1794, we signified that they should bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that were laden with goods the produce of the French West India Islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands to any port in Europe; and likewise all ships, with their cargoes, that were laden with goods the produce of the said islands, the property of which goods should belong to the subjects of France, to whatsoever ports the same might be bound; and that they should seize all ships that should be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands that was or should be blockaded by the arms of His Majesty or his allies, and should send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication; and, also, all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands, and should send them into some convenient port belonging to His Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, might be proceeded against, according to the law of nations: And whereas, in consideration of the present state of the commerce of this country, as well as that of neutral countries, it is expedient to revoke the said instructions, we are pleased hereby to revoke the same; and, in lieu thereof, we have thought fit to issue these our instructions, to be observed from henceforth by the commanders of all our ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, Spain, and the United Provinces.

1. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of any island or settlement belonging to France, Spain, or the United Provinces, and coming directly from any port of the said islands or settlements to any port in Europe, not being a port of this kingdom, nor a port of that country to which such ships, being neutral ships, shall belong.

2. That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all ships, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of the said islands or settlements, the property of which goods shall belong to subjects of France, Spain, or the United Provinces, to whatsoever ports the same may be bound.

3. That they shall seize all ships that shall be found attempting to enter any port of the said islands or settlements that is or shall be blockaded by the arms of His Majesty, and shall send them in, with their cargoes, for adjudication, according to the terms of the second article of the former instructions, bearing date the 8th day of June 1793.

4. That they shall seize all vessels laden wholly or in part with naval or military stores, bound to any port of the said islands or settlements, and shall send them into some convenient port belonging to His Majesty, in order that they, together with their cargoes, may be proceeded against, according to the rules of the law of nations. By His Majesty's command:

PORTLAND.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, March 22, 1799.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of His Britannic Majesty, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. King, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that the King, judging it expedient to avail himself of the superiority of his naval forces for the defence of his dominions, has signified his commands to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to cause the most rigorous blockade to be established at the entrance of all the ports of Holland, which will be maintained and enforced in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war acknowledged and observed in similar cases.

Mr. King is therefore requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England that the above-mentioned ports of the United Provinces are, and must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that from this time no neutral vessel can be suffered to enter them, upon any consideration, or under any pretence whatsoever; and that all the measures authorized by the law of nations and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers will henceforth be adopted and executed with respect to vessels destined for the said ports, as shall attempt to enter them after this notice.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has received His Majesty's command to inform Mr. King that His Majesty has judged it expedient to suspend for the present the blockade of all the ports in the United Provinces, which was established by His Majesty's orders,* and which was announced to Mr. King by the undersigned, in his note dated March 22d last.

GRENVILLE.

Additional instructions by the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, &c.

The right honorable Lord Pelham, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, having transmitted us, as additional instructions, under His Majesty's signet and sign manual, dated the 24th June, 1803, as follows:

To the Commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers.

In consideration of the present state of commerce, we are pleased hereby to direct the commanders of our ships of war and privateers not to seize any neutral vessel which shall be carrying on trade directly between the colonies of enemies, and the neutral country, to which the vessel belongs, and laden with the property of inhabitants of such neutral country: provided, that such neutral vessels shall not be supplying, nor shall have, on the outward voyage, supplied the enemy with any articles contraband of war, and shall not be trading with any blockaded port.

By His Majesty's command:

PELHAM.

To the Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court of the Island of Ceylon.

We send you herewith a printed copy of the said additional instructions for your information and guidance, dated 13th July, 1803.

[Signed by the Lords of the Admiralty.]

Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1804.

Mr. Thornton not having failed to transmit to His Majesty's Government an account of the representation which you were pleased to address to him under date of the 27th October, last year, respecting the blockade of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, it is with great satisfaction, sir, that I have just received His Majesty's commands, signified to me by his principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, under date of the 6th January last, to communicate to you the instructions which have, in consequence of your representation, been sent to Commodore Hood, and to the Judges of the Vice Admiralty Courts in the West Indies.

I have, accordingly, the honor to transmit to you, sir, enclosed, the copy of a letter from Sir Evan Nepean, Secretary to the Board of Admiralty, to Mr. Hammond, His Majesty's Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, specifying the nature of the instructions which have been given.

His Majesty's Government doubt not that the promptitude which has been manifested in redressing the grievance complained of by the Government of the United States, will be considered by the latter as an additional evidence of His Majesty's constant and sincere desire to remove any ground of misunderstanding that could have a tendency to interrupt the harmony which so happily subsists between this Government and that of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTHONY MERRY.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, January 5, 1804.

SIR: Having communicated to the Lords of the Admiralty, Lord Hawkesbury's letter of the 22d ultimo, enclosing the copy of a despatch which his Lordship has received from Mr. Thornton, His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in America, on the subject of the blockade of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe, together with the report of the Advocate General:

Thereupon, I have their Lordships' commands to acquaint you, for his Lordship's information, that they have sent orders to Commodore Hood not to consider any blockade of those islands as existing, unless in respect of particular ports which may be actually invested, and then not to capture vessels bound to such ports, unless they shall previously have been warned not to enter them, and that they have also sent the necessary directions on the subject to the Judges of the Vice Admiralty Courts in the West Indies and America.

I am, &c.

EVAN NEPEAN.

GEORGE HAMMOND, Esq.

Mr. Merry to Mr. Madison.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1804.

SIR: I have the honor to acquaint you that I have just received a letter from Rear Admiral Sir John Duckworth, Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's squadron at Jamaica, dated 2d of last month, in which he desires me to communicate to the Government of the United States that he has found it expedient for His Majesty's service to convert the siege, which he lately attempted, of Curaçoa, into a blockade of that island.

I cannot doubt, sir, that this blockade will be conducted conformably to the instructions which, as I have had the honor to acquaint you in another letter of this date, have been recently sent on this subject to the Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's forces, and to the Judges of the Vice Admiralty Courts, in the West Indies, should the smallness of the Island of Curaçoa still render necessary any distinction of the investment being confined to particular ports.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANT. MERRY.

JAMES MADISON, Esq.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

Circular from Lord Harrowby to the Ministers of the neutral nations residing in London, communicated to Colonel Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, August 9, 1804.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that the King has judged it expedient (for the protection of his subjects and the annoyance of his enemies) to establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the ports of Fécamp, St. Valéry-aux-Caux, Dieppe, Treport, the Somme, Etaples, Boulogne, Calais, Gravelines, Dunkirk, Nieuport, and Ostend, and to maintain and enforce the same in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war acknowledged in similar cases. Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of the above-mentioned ports are, and must be considered as being in a state of blockade; and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe, &c.
HARROWBY.

GEORGE R.

To our Courts of Admiralty, and to the Commanders of our ships of war and privateers: Given at our Court at St. James's, the 17th day of August, 1805, in the 45th year of our reign.

We are pleased hereby to direct the commanders of our ships of war and privateers not to seize any neutral vessel, which shall be carrying on trade directly from the colonies of the enemy to the ports of this Kingdom, and laden solely with the property of inhabitants of the neutral country to which the ship belongs; provided such neutral ship has already cleared out, or shall clear out, from such colony, prior to the 1st day of November next, and shall not have supplied the enemy with any articles contraband of war on the outward voyage, and shall not have entered or be coming from any blockaded port. And in case any neutral vessel, trading as aforesaid, hath been, or shall be detained or brought before any of our Courts of Admiralty, it is our will and pleasure that such ships, together with their cargoes, be forthwith liberated.

By His Majesty's command:
HAWKESBURY.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, April 8, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that, in consequence of His Majesty the King of Prussia having taken possession of various parts of the Electorate of Hanover, and other dominions belonging to His Majesty, in a forcible and hostile manner; and having also notified, that all British ships be excluded from the ports of the Prussian dominions, and from certain other ports in the north of Europe, and not suffered to enter or trade therewith, in violation of the just rights and interests of His Majesty and his dominions, and contrary to the established law and practice of nations in amity with each other: His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrance of the Ems, the Weser, the Elbe, and the Trave, and to maintain and enforce the same in the strictest manner, according to the usages of war, acknowledged and allowed in similar cases.

Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of the above-mentioned rivers are and must be considered as being in a state of blockade; and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockades after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe to accept the assurance of his high consideration.

C. J. FOX.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, May 16, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that the King, taking into consideration the new and extraordinary means resorted to by the enemy for the purpose of distressing the commerce of his subjects, has thought fit to direct that the necessary measures should be taken for the blockade of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both inclusive; and the said coast, rivers, and ports are and must be considered as blockaded; but that His Majesty is pleased to declare that such blockade shall not extend to prevent neutral ships and vessels, laden with goods not being the property of His Majesty's enemies, and not being contraband of war, from approaching the said rivers and ports (save and except the coast, rivers, and ports from Ostend to the river Seine, already in a state of strict and rigorous blockade, and which are to be considered as so continued,) provided the said ships and vessels so approaching and entering (except as aforesaid) shall not have been laden at any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies; and that the said ships and vessels so sailing from the said rivers and ports (except as aforesaid) shall not be destined to any port belonging to or in the possession of any of His Majesty's enemies, nor have previously broken the blockade.

Mr. Monroe is therefore requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the coast, rivers, and ports above mentioned, must be considered as being in a state of blockade, and that from this time all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe, &c.

Lord Howick to Mr. Monroe.

DOWNING STREET, Sept. 25, 1806.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Monroe, that the King having been pleased, on the 16th of May last, to cause it to be signified that he had directed the necessary measures to be taken for the blockade of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the port of Brest, both inclusive, His Majesty is now pleased to declare, that so much of such blockade as extended from the river Elbe to the river Ems, both inclusive, is for the present discontinued; and that, from the date hereof, the navigation of the coast, rivers, and ports, from the river Elbe to the river Ems, both inclusive, is as free as if such blockade had not taken place.

The undersigned requests Mr. Monroe to accept the assurances, &c.
HOWICK.

At a Court at the Queen's Palace, the 7th of January, 1807: Present the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas the French Government has issued certain orders, which, in violation of the usages of war, purport to prohibit the commerce of all neutral nations with His Majesty's dominions, and also to prevent such nations from trading with any other country in any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions; and whereas the said Government has also taken upon itself to declare all His Majesty's dominions to be in a state of blockade, at the time when the fleets of France and her allies are themselves confined within their own ports by the superior valor and discipline of the British navy; and whereas such attempts, on the part of the enemy, would give to His Majesty an unquestionable right of retaliation, and would warrant His Majesty in enforcing the same prohibition of all commerce with France, which that Power vainly hopes to effect against the commerce of His Majesty's subjects, a prohibition which the superiority of His Majesty's naval forces might enable him to support by actually investing the ports and coasts of the enemy with numerous squadrons and cruisers, so as to make the entrance or approach thereto manifestly dangerous; and whereas His Majesty, though unwilling to follow the example of his enemies by proceeding to an extremity so distressing to all nations not engaged in the war, and carrying on their accustomed trade, yet feels himself bound, by due regard to the just defence of the rights and interests of his people not to suffer such measures to be taken by the enemy, without taking some steps on his part to restrain this violence, and to retort upon them the evils of their own injustice; His Majesty is thereupon pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that no vessels shall be permitted to trade from one port to another, both which ports shall belong to or be in the possession of France or her allies, or shall be so far under their control as that British vessels may not trade freely thereat; and the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers shall be, and are hereby, instructed to warn every neutral vessel coming from any such port, and destined to another such port, to discontinue her voyage, and not to proceed to any such port; and any vessel, after being so warned, or any vessel coming from any such port, after a reasonable time shall have been afforded for receiving information of this His Majesty's order, which shall be found proceeding to another such port, shall be captured and brought in, and together with her cargo shall be condemned as lawful prize; and His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty, and the Courts of Vice Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

Extract of a letter from the honorable David M. Erskine, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, June 26, 1807.

I have the honor to inform you that His Majesty has judged it expedient to re-establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the rivers Ems, Weser, and Elbe, inclusive, in consequence of the present position of the enemy upon the Continent, which enables him to command the navigation of those rivers.

By the King.—A Proclamation for recalling and prohibiting British seamen from serving foreign Princes and States.

GEORGE R.

Whereas, it hath been represented to us, that great numbers of mariners and seafaring men, our natural-born subjects, have been enticed to enter into the service of foreign States, and are now actually serving as well on board the ships of war belonging to the said foreign States, as on board the merchant vessels belonging to their subjects, notwithstanding our former proclamation recalling them, contrary to the duty and allegiance which our said subjects owe unto us, and to the great disservice of their native country; we have, therefore, thought it necessary, at the present moment, when our Kingdom is menaced and endangered, and when the maritime rights on which its power and greatness do mainly depend, are disputed and called in question, to publish, by and with the advice of our Privy Council, this our royal proclamation: We do hereby strictly charge and command all masters of ships, pilots, mariners, shipwrights, and other seafaring men, being our natural born subjects, who may have been enticed into the pay or service of any foreign State, or do serve in any foreign ship or vessel, that forthwith they, and every one of them, do, (according to their bounden duty and allegiance, and in consideration that their native country hath need of all their services,) withdraw themselves, and depart from, and quit such foreign service, and do return home to their native country; or do enter on board such of our ships of war as they may chance to fall in with, either on the high seas, or in any rivers, waters, havens, roads, ports or places whatsoever or wheresoever.

And for the better execution of the purposes of this our royal proclamation, we do authorize and command all captains, masters, and others, commanding our ships and vessels of war, to stop and make stay of all and every such person or persons (being our natural born subjects) as shall endeavor to transport or enter themselves into the service of any foreign State, contrary to the intent and command of this our royal proclamation, and to seize upon, take, and bring away all such persons as aforesaid, who shall be found to be employed or serving in any foreign merchant ship or vessel as aforesaid; but we do strictly enjoin all such captains, masters, and others, that they do permit no man to go on board such ships and vessels belonging to States at amity with us, for the purpose of so seizing upon, taking, and bringing away such persons aforesaid, for whose discreet and orderly demeanor the said captains cannot answer; and that they do take especial care that no unnecessary violence be ever done or offered to the vessel, or to the remainder of the crew, from out of which such persons shall be taken.

And in case of their receiving information of any such person or persons being employed, or serving on board of any ship of war belonging to such foreign State at amity with us, we do authorize and command our captains, masters, and others commanding our ships of war, to require of the captain or commander of such foreign ship of war, that he do forthwith release and discharge such person or persons, being our natural born subject or subjects; and if such release and discharge shall be refused, then to transmit information of such refusal to the commander-in-chief of the squadron, under whose orders such captain or commander shall be then serving; which information the said commander-in-chief is hereby strictly directed and enjoined to transmit, with the least possible delay, to our Minister residing at the seat of Government of that State to which the said foreign ship of war shall belong, or to our Lord High Admiral, or Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, for the time being, in order that we, being apprized of such proceeding, may forthwith direct the necessary steps to be taken for obtaining redress from the Government to which such foreign ship of war shall belong, for the injury done to us by the unwarranted detention of our natural born subjects in the service of a foreign State.

And whereas, it hath been further represented unto us, that divers mariners and seafaring men, 10th Con. 2d Sess.—54 our natural born subjects, have been induced to accept letters of naturalization, or certificates of citizenship, from foreign States, and have been taught to believe that, by such letters or certificates they are discharged from that duty of allegiance which, as our natural born subjects, they owe to us: Now we do hereby warn all such mariners, seafaring men, and others, our natural born subjects, that no such letters of naturalization, or certificate of citizenship, do or can in any manner divest our natural born subjects of the allegiance, or in any degree alter the duty which they owe to us, their lawful Sovereign. But in consideration of the error into which such mariners and seafaring men as aforesaid may have been led, we do hereby publish and declare our free pardon to all such, our subjects, who, repenting of the delusion under which they have acted, shall immediately, upon knowledge of this our royal proclamation, withdraw themselves from foreign service, and return to their allegiance to us; and we do declare that all such, our subjects, who shall continue in the service of foreign States, in disregard and contempt of this our royal proclamation, will not only incur our just displeasure, but are liable to be proceeded against for such contempt, and shall be proceeded against accordingly; and we do hereby declare, that if any such masters of ships, pilots, mariners, seamen, shipwrights, and other seafaring men, (being our natural born subjects,) shall be taken in any foreign service by the Algerines, or other Barbary Powers, and carried into slavery, they shall not be reclaimed by us as subjects of Great Britain.

And we do hereby notify that all such, our subjects, as aforesaid, who have voluntarily entered, or shall enter, or voluntarily continue to serve, on board of any ships of war belonging to any foreign State at enmity with us, are and will be guilty of high treason; and we do, by this our royal proclamation, declare that they shall be punished with the utmost severity of the law.

Given at our Court at the Queen's Palace, the sixteenth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and seven, and in the forty-seventh year of our reign. God save the King.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas certain orders, establishing an unprecedented system of warfare against this Kingdom, and aimed especially at the destruction of its commerce and resources, were, sometime since, issued by the Government of France, by which "the British islands were declared to be in a state of blockade," thereby subjecting to capture and condemnation all vessels, with their cargoes, which should continue to trade with His Majesty's dominions:

And whereas, by the same order, "all trading in English merchandise is prohibited, and every article of merchandise belonging to England, or coming from her colonies, or of her manufacture, is declared lawful prize:"

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

And whereas the nations in alliance with France, and under her control, were required to give, and have given, and do give, effect to such orders:

And whereas His Majesty's order of the 7th of January last has not answered the desired purpose, either of compelling the enemy to recall those orders, or of inducing neutral nations to interpose, with effect, to obtain their revocation, but, on the contrary, the same have been recently enforced with increased rigor:

And whereas His Majesty, under these circumstances, finds himself compelled to take further measures for asserting and vindicating his just rights, and for supporting that maritime power which the exertions and valor of his people have, under the blessing of Providence, enabled him to establish and maintain; and the maintenance of which is not more essential to the safety and prosperity of His Majesty's dominions, than it is to the protection of such States as still retain their independence, and to the general intercourse and happiness of mankind:

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all the ports and places of France and her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, and all other ports or places in Europe, from which, although not at war with His Majesty, the British flag is excluded, and all ports or places in the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, shall, from henceforth, be subject to the same restrictions in point of trade and navigation, with the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, as if the same were actually blockaded by His Majesty's naval forces, in the most strict and rigorous manner: And it is hereby further ordered and declared, that all trade in articles which are of the produce or manufacture of the said countries or colonies, shall be deemed and considered to be unlawful; and that every vessel trading from or to the said countries or colonies, together with all goods and merchandise on board, and all articles of the produce or manufacture of the said countries or colonies, shall be captured and condemned as prize to the captors.

But, although His Majesty would be fully justified, by the circumstances and considerations above recited, in establishing such system of restrictions with respect to all the countries and colonies of his enemies, without exception or qualification, yet His Majesty being, nevertheless, desirous not to subject neutrals to any greater inconvenience than is absolutely inseparable from the carrying into effect His Majesty's just determination to counteract the designs of his enemies, and to retort upon his enemies themselves the consequences of their own violence and injustice; and being yet willing to hope that it may be possible (consistently with that object) still to allow to neutrals the opportunity of furnishing themselves with colonial produce for their own consumption and supply, and even to leave open, for the present, such trade with His Majesty's enemies as shall be carried on directly with the ports of His Majesty's dominions, or of his allies, in the manner hereinafter mentioned:

His Majesty is, therefore, pleased further to order, and it is hereby ordered, that nothing herein contained shall extend to subject to capture or condemnation any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not declared by this order to be subjected to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, which shall have cleared out with such cargo from some port or place of the country to which she belongs, either in Europe or America, or from some free port in His Majesty's colonies, under circumstances in which such trade, from such free ports, is permitted, direct to some port or place in the colonies of His Majesty's enemies, or from those colonies direct to the country to which such vessel belongs, or to some free port in His Majesty's colonies, in such cases, and with such articles, as it may be lawful to import into such free port; nor to any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, which shall have cleared out under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, and shall be proceeding direct from some port or place in this Kingdom, or from Gibraltar, or Malta, or from any port belonging to His Majesty's allies, to the port specified in her clearance; nor to any vessel, or the cargo of any vessel, belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, which shall be coming from any port or place in Europe which is declared by this order to be subject to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, destined to some port or place in Europe belonging to His Majesty, and which shall be on her voyage direct thereto; but these exceptions are not to be understood as exempting from capture or confiscation any vessel or goods which shall be liable thereto in respect of having entered or departed from any port or place actually blockaded by His Majesty's squadrons or ships of war, or for being enemy's property, or for any other cause than the contravention of this present order.

And the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, and other vessels acting under His Majesty's commission, shall be, and are hereby, instructed to warn every vessel which shall have commenced her voyage prior to any notice of this order, and shall be destined to any port of France, or of her allies, or of any other country at war with His Majesty, or to any port or place from which the British flag, as aforesaid, is excluded, or to any colony belonging to His Majesty's enemies, and which shall not have cleared out as is hereinbefore allowed, to discontinue her voyage, and to proceed to some port or place in this Kingdom, or to Gibraltar or Malta; and any vessel which, after having been so warned, or after a reasonable time shall have been afforded for the arrival of information of this His Majesty's order at any port or place from which she sailed, or which, after having notice of this order, shall be found in the prosecution of any voyage contrary to the restrictions contained in this order, shall be captured, and, together with her cargo, condemned as lawful prize to the captors.

And whereas countries not engaged in the war have acquiesced in these orders of France, prohibiting all trade in any articles the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions; and the merchants of those countries have given countenance and effect to those prohibitions by accepting from persons, styling themselves commercial agents of the enemy, resident at neutral ports, certain documents, termed "certificates of origin," being certificates obtained at the ports of shipment, declaring that the articles of the cargo are not of the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, or to that effect:

And whereas this expedient has been directed by France, and submitted to by such merchants, as part of the new system of warfare directed against the trade of this Kingdom, and as the most effectual instrument of accomplishing the same, and it is therefore essentially necessary to resist it:

His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that if any vessel, after reasonable time shall have been afforded for receiving notice of this His Majesty's order, at the port or place from which such vessel shall have cleared out, shall be found carrying any such certificate or document as aforesaid, or any document referring to or authenticating the same, such vessel shall be adjudged lawful prize to the captor, together with the goods laden therein, belonging to the person or persons by whom, or on whose behalf, any such document was put on board.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas articles of the growth and manufacture of foreign countries cannot by law be imported into this country, except in British ships, or in ships belonging to the countries of which such articles are the growth and manufacture, without an order in Council specially authorizing the same:

His Majesty, taking into consideration the order of this day's date, respecting the trade to be carried on to and from the ports of the enemy, and deeming it expedient that any vessel belonging to any country in alliance, or at amity with His Majesty, may be permitted to import into this country articles of the produce or manufacture of countries at war with His Majesty:

His Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, is therefore pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all goods, wares, or merchandise, specified and included in the schedule of an act, passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to repeal the duties of customs payable in Great Britain, and to grant other duties in lieu thereof," may be imported from any port or place belonging to any State not at amity with His Majesty, in ships belonging to any State at amity with His Majesty, subject to the payment of such duties, and liable to such drawbacks, as are now established by law upon the importation of the said goods, wares, or merchandise, in ships navigated according to law; and with respect to such of the said goods, wares, and merchandise as are authorized to be warehoused under the provisions of an act passed in the forty third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain to be secured in warehouses without payment of duty," subject to all the regulations of the said last mentioned act; and with respect to all articles which are prohibited by law from being imported into this country, it is ordered that the same shall be reported for exportation to any country in amity or alliance with His Majesty.

And His Majesty is further pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all vessels which shall arrive at any port of the United Kingdom, or at the port of Gibraltar or Malta, in consequence of having been warned pursuant to the aforesaid order, or in consequence of receiving information, in any other manner, of the said order, subsequent to their having taken on board any part of their cargoes, whether previous or subsequent to their sailing, shall be permitted to report their cargoes for exportation, and shall be allowed to proceed upon their voyages to their original ports of destination, (if not unlawful before the issuing of the said order,) or to any port at amity with His Majesty, upon receiving a certificate from the collector or comptroller of the customs at the port at which they shall so enter, (which certificate the said collectors and comptrollers of the customs are hereby authorized and required to give,) setting forth that such vessels came into such port in consequence of being so warned, or of receiving such information as aforesaid, and that they were permitted to sail from such port under the regulations which His Majesty has been pleased to establish in respect to such vessels; but in case any vessel so arriving shall prefer to import her cargo, then such vessel shall be allowed to enter and import the same, upon such terms and conditions as the said cargo might have been imported upon, according to law, in case the said vessel had sailed after having received notice of the said order, and in conformity thereto.

And it is further ordered, that all vessels which shall arrive at any port of the United Kingdom, or at Gibraltar, or Malta, in conformity and obedience to the said order, shall be allowed, in respect to all articles which may be on board the same, except sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and tobacco, to clear out to any port whatever, to be specified in such clearance; and, with respect to the last mentioned articles, to export the same to such ports, and under such conditions and regulations only, as His Majesty, by any license to be granted for that purpose, may direct.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Courts of Admiralty and Courts of Vice Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 11th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas the sale of ships by a belligerent to a neutral is considered by France to be illegal:

And whereas a great part of the shipping of France and her allies has been protected from capture during the present hostilities by transfers, or pretended transfers, to neutrals:

And whereas it is fully justifiable to adopt the same rule, in this respect, towards the enemy, which is applied by the enemy to this country:

His Majesty is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that, in future, the sale to a neutral of any vessel belonging to His Majesty's enemies shall not be deemed to be legal, nor in any manner to transfer the property, nor to alter the character of such vessel; and all vessels now belonging, or which shall hereafter belong, to any enemy of His Majesty, notwithstanding any sale, or pretended sale, to a neutral, after a reasonable time shall have elapsed for receiving information of this His Majesty's order at the place where such sale, or pretended sale, was effected, shall be captured and brought in, and shall be adjudged as lawful prize to the captors.

And the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas it has been represented that it would be expedient to fix certain periods, at which it shall be deemed that a reasonable time shall have elapsed for receiving information, at different places, of His Majesty's order in Council of the 11th of November instant, respecting the trade with His Majesty's enemies, and in their produce and manufactures: His Majesty taking the same into consideration, and being desirous to obviate any difficulties that may arise in respect thereto, and also to allow ample time for the said order being known to all persons who may be affected thereby, is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order and declare, and it is hereby ordered and declared, that information of the said order of the 11th of November instant shall be taken, and held to have been received in the places hereinafter mentioned, at the periods respectively assigned to them, namely:

Ports and places within the Baltic; December 21, 1807.

Other ports and places to the northward of Amsterdam; December 11, 1807.

From Amsterdam to Ushant; December 4, 1807.

From Ushant to Cape Finisterre; December, 8, 1807.

From Cape Finisterre to Gibraltar, inclusive; December 13, 1807.

Madeira; December 13, 1807.

Ports and places within the Straits of Gibraltar, to Sicily, and Malta, and the west coast of Italy inclusive; January 1, 1808.

All other ports and places in the Mediterranean beyond Sicily and Malta; January 20, 1808.

Ports and places beyond the Dardanelles; February 1, 1808.

Any part of the north and western coast of Africa, or the islands adjacent, except Madeira; January 11, 1808.

The United States, and British possessions in North America and the West Indies; January 20, 1808.

Cape of Good Hope, and east coast of South America; March 1, 1808.

India; May 1, 1808.

China, and the coast of South America; June 1, 1808.

And every vessel sailing on or after those days, from those places, respectively, shall be deemed and taken to have received notice of the aforesaid order; and it is further ordered, that, if any vessel shall sail within twenty days after the periods above assigned, respectively, from any of the said places, in contravention of the said order of the 11th of November instant, and shall be detained as prize on account thereof, or shall arrive at any port, in this Kingdom, destined to some port or place within the restriction of the said order, and proof shall be made to the satisfaction of the Court of Admiralty, in which such vessel shall be proceeded against, in case the same shall be brought in as prize, that the loading of the said vessel had commenced before the said periods, and before information of the said order had actually been received at the port of shipment, the said vessel, together with the goods so laden, shall be restored to the owner or owners thereof, and shall be permitted to proceed on her voyage in such manner as if such vessel had sailed before the day so specified as aforesaid; and it is further ordered, that no proof shall be admitted, or be gone into, for the purpose of showing that information of the said order of the 11th of November instant had not been received at the said places, respectively, at the several periods before assigned; and the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty, and Courts of Vice Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace, the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas His Majesty, by his Order in Council, dated 11th November instant, respecting the trade to be carried on with His Majesty's enemies, was pleased to exempt from the restrictions of the said order, all vessels which shall have cleared out from any port or place in this Kingdom, under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, and shall be proceeding direct to the ports specified in the respective clearances; His Majesty, taking into consideration the expediency of making such regulations, is pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all vessels, belonging to countries not at war with His Majesty, shall be permitted to lade in any port of the United Kingdom any goods being the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, or East India goods, or prize goods, (all such goods being lawfully imported,) and to clear out with, and freely to convey the same, to any port or place in any colony in the West Indies or America, belonging to His Majesty's enemies, such port or place not being in a state of actual blockade, subject to the payment of such duties as may at the time when any such vessels may be cleared out be due by law on the exportation of any such goods, or in respect of the same being destined to the ports of the colonies belonging to His Majesty's enemies, and likewise to lade, clear out with, and convey, as aforesaid, any articles of foreign produce or manufacture, which shall have been lawfully imported into this Kingdom, provided His Majesty's license shall have been previously obtained for so conveying such foreign produce or manufactures: and it is further ordered, that any vessel, belonging as aforesaid, shall be permitted to lade in any port of the United Kingdom any goods, not being naval or military stores, which shall be of the growth, produce, or manufacture of this Kingdom, or which shall have been lawfully imported, (save and except foreign sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and cotton,) and to clear out with, and freely to convey the same to any port, to be specified in the clearance, not being in a state of actual blockade, although the same shall be under the restrictions of the said order; and likewise to lade, clear out, and convey foreign sugar, coffee, wine, brandy, snuff, and cotton, which shall have been lawfully imported, provided His Majesty's license shall have been previously obtained for the exportation and conveyance thereof: and it is hereby further ordered, that no vessel shall be permitted to clear out from any port or place in this Kingdom to any port or place of any country subjected to the restrictions of the said order, with any goods which shall have been laden (after notice of the said order) on board the vessel which shall have imported the same into this Kingdom, without having first duly entered and landed the same in some port or place in this Kingdom; and that no vessel shall be permitted to clear out from any port or place in this Kingdom, to any port or place whatever, with any goods the produce or manufacture of any country subject to the restrictions of the said order, which shall have been laden after notice, as aforesaid, on board the vessel importing the same, without having so duly entered and landed the same; or any goods whatever which shall have been laden after such notice in the vessel importing the same, in any port or place of any country subjected to the restrictions of the said order, without having so duly entered and landed the same in some port or place in this Kingdom, except the cargo shall consist wholly of flour, meal, grain, or any article or articles the produce of the soil of some country which is not subjected to the restrictions of the said order, except cotton, and which shall have been imported in an unmanufactured state direct from such country into this Kingdom, in a vessel belonging to the country from which such goods have been brought, and in which the same were grown and produced.

And it is further ordered, that any vessel belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty may clear out from Guernsey, Jersey, or Man, to any port or place under the restrictions of the said order, which shall be specified in the clearance, not being in a state of actual blockade, with such articles only, not being naval or military stores, as shall have been legally imported into such islands respectively from any port or place in this Kingdom direct; and with respect to all such articles as may have been imported into the said islands, respectively, from any port or place under the restrictions of the said order, it shall not be permitted to any vessel to clear out with the same from any of the said islands, except to some port or place in this Kingdom; and the right honorable the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury, His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and the Judges of the High Court of Admiralty and Courts of Vice Admiralty, are to take the necessary measures herein as to them shall respectively appertain.

W. FAWKENER.

At the Court at the Queen's Palace the 25th of November, 1807: Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas His Majesty, by his Order in Council, dated the 11th of November instant, respecting the trade to be carried on with His Majesty's enemies, was pleased to exempt from the restrictions of the said order all vessels belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, together with their cargo, which shall be coming from any port or place in Europe which is declared in the said order to be subject to the re-restrictions incident to a state of blockade, direct to some port or place in Europe belonging to His Majesty; and, also, all vessels which shall be cleared out from Gibraltar or Malta, under such regulations as His Majesty may think fit to prescribe, and which shall be proceeding direct to the ports specified in their respective clearances:

And whereas it is expedient to encourage the trade from Gibraltar and Malta to countries under the restrictions of the said order, subject to regulations to be made in respect thereto; His Majesty is therefore pleased to prescribe the following regulations in regard to such trade accordingly, and by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, that all sorts of flour and meal, and all sorts of grain, tobacco, and any other article in an unmanufactured state, being the growth and produce of any country not being subjected by the said order to the restrictions incident to a state of blockade, except cotton, and naval and military stores, which shall have been imported into Gibraltar or Malta direct from the country where the same were grown and produced, shall, without any license, be permitted to be cleared out to any port or place not being in a state of actual blockade, without the same being compelled to be landed; but neither the said article of cotton, however imported, nor any article which is not the growth, produce, or manufacture of this Kingdom, or which has not been imported in a British ship, or from this Kingdom direct, (except fish,) and which shall have been laden at the port of original shipment after the period directed by an order of this date to be taken as the time at which notice of the said order of the 11th of November shall be considered as having been received at such port of shipment, shall be permitted to be exported from Gibraltar or Malta, except to some port or place in this Kingdom; and all other articles of the growth, produce, and manufacture of this Kingdom, or which shall have been imported into Gibraltar or Malta in a British ship, or from some port or place in this Kingdom, together with the article of fish, however imported, may be exported to any ports or places in the Mediterranean, or Portugal, under such license only as is hereinafter directed to be granted by the Governor of Gibraltar and Malta respectively.

And it is hereby further ordered, that licenses be granted by the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or other persons having the chief civil command at Gibraltar or at Malta, respectively, but in His Majesty's name, to such person or persons as the said Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or persons having the chief civil command, shall think fit, allowing such person or persons to export from Gibraltar direct to any port in the Mediterranean, or to any port of Portugal, or to any port of Spain without the Mediterranean, not further north than Cape Finisterre, and from Malta direct to any port being within the Mediterranean, with any article of the produce or manufacture of His Majesty's dominions, and any article which shall have been imported into Gibraltar or Malta from this Kingdom, to whomsoever such articles shall appear to belong, (not being naval or military stores,) in any vessel belonging to any country not at war with His Majesty, or in any vessel not exceeding one hundred tons burden, and being unarmed, belonging to the country to which such vessel shall be cleared out and going; and also to import in any such vessel or vessels, as aforesaid, from any port within the Mediterranean, to Gibraltar or Malta, or from any port in Portugal or Spain, as aforesaid, to Gibraltar; such port and such destination respectively to be specified in such license, any articles of merchandise whatsoever, and to whomsoever the same may appear to belong; such articles to be specified in the bill of lading of such vessel, subject, however, to such further regulations and restrictions, with respect to all or any of the said articles so to be imported or exported, as may be inserted in the said licenses by the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, or other persons having the chief civil command at Gibraltar or Malta, for the time being, respectively, as to them shall from time to time seem fit and expedient.

And it is further ordered, that in every such license shall be inserted the names and residence of the person or persons to whom it shall be granted, the articles, and their quantities permitted to be exported, the name and description of the vessel, and of the master thereof, the port to which the vessel shall be allowed to go, which shall be some port not under actual blockade; and that no license so to be granted shall continue in force for longer than two months from its date, nor for more than one voyage; nor any such license be granted, or acknowledged to be valid if granted, to permit the clearance of any vessel to any port which shall be actually blockaded by any naval force of His Majesty or of his allies.

And it is further ordered, that the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers, and all others whom it may concern, shall suffer every such vessel sailing conformably to the permission given by this order, or having any license as aforesaid, to pass and re-pass direct between Gibraltar or Malta, and such port as shall be specified in the license, in such manner, and under such terms, regulations, and restrictions, as shall be expressed therein.

And it is further ordered, that, in case any vessel so sailing as aforesaid, for which any such license as aforesaid shall have been granted, and which shall be proceeding direct upon her said voyage, shall be detained and brought in for legal adjudication, such vessel, with her cargo, shall be forthwith released by the Court of Admiralty or Vice Admiralty in which proceeding shall be commenced, upon proof being made that the parties had duly conformed to the terms, regulations, and restrictions of the said license; the proof of such conformity to lie upon the person or persons claiming the benefit of this order, or obtaining or using such license, or claiming the benefit thereof.

And it is hereby further ordered, that no vessel belonging to any State on the coast of Barbary shall be prevented from sailing with any articles of the growth or produce of such State, from any

*Great Britain, France, and Spain.Circular.*FOREIGN OFFICE, January 8, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's commands to acquaint Mr. Pinkney that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade at the entrances of the ports of Carthagena, Cadiz, and St. Lucar, and of all the intermediate ports, situated and lying between the ports of Carthagena and St. Lucar. Mr. Pinkney is, therefore, requested to apprise the American Consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of all the ports above-mentioned are, and must be considered as being in a state of blockade; and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

GEORGE CANNING.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, Esq., &c.

*Anno Quadragesimo Octavo Georgii III, Regis.
Cap. XXVI.*

An Act for granting to His Majesty, until the end of the next session of Parliament, duties of customs on the goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated, in furtherance of the provisions of certain Orders in Council.—March 28, 1808.

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

Whereas measures which have been taken by Powers at war with your Majesty, prohibiting, in violation of the law of nations, all intercourse with this Kingdom, and all trade in any articles of its growth or manufacture, have rendered it necessary for your Majesty to issue Orders in Council to counteract the disadvantages which were thereby imposed upon the trade of your Majesty's subjects, and to retaliate upon the enemy the evils which he intended to inflict upon this Kingdom; and whereas it is expedient and necessary, in order effectually to accomplish the object of such orders, that duties of customs should be granted upon certain goods exported from Great Britain: we, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom, in Parliament assembled, do most humbly beseech your Majesty that it may be enacted:

And be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid, unto His Majesty, his heirs, and successors, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, enumerated, or described in the tables A, B, and C, annexed to this act, exported from Great Britain, the several duties of customs, as the same are respectively described and set forth in figures in the said tables.

And be it further enacted, That the duties granted and imposed by this act, and made payable according to the weight, tale, gauge, measure, or value of any goods, wares, or merchandise, charged with such duties, shall be charged and payable upon any greater or less weight, number, quantity, or value thereof than the weight, number, quantity, or value, particularly inserted, described, and set forth in the tables hereunto annexed, marked A, B, and C, in proportion to the actual weight, number, quantity, or value of such goods, wares, or merchandise.

And be it further enacted, That where any goods, wares, and merchandise, which are allowed to be, or shall have been, warehoused or otherwise secured at the time of the importation thereof, without payment of the duties due thereon, shall be taken out, or entered inwards for home consumption, and the duties of customs and excise then due thereon shall have been paid, and the same shall afterwards be entered for exportation; then, and in every such case, the duties of customs by this act imposed shall be paid on the exportation of the said goods, wares, and merchandise, notwithstanding the payment of any drawbacks to which the exporter thereof may, in such case, under any law or laws then in force, be entitled.

And whereas, by an Order in Council, dated the twenty-fifth of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, it was ordered and declared that information of a certain other Order in Council, of the eleventh of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, should be taken and held to have been received in the places herein-after mentioned, at the periods respectively assigned to them, namely: ports and places within the Baltic, on the twenty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; other ports and places to the northward of Amsterdam, on the eleventh of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; from Amsterdam to Ushant, on the fourth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; from Ushant to Cape Finisterre, on the eighth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; from Cape Finisterre to Gibraltar, inclusive, on the thirtieth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; Madeira, the thirteenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; ports and places within the Straits of Gibraltar to Sicily and Malta, and the west coasts of Italy, inclusive, on the 1st of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; all other ports and places in the Mediterranean beyond Sicily and Malta, on the twentieth of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; ports and places beyond the Dardanelles, on the first of February, one thousand eight hundred and eight; any part of the north and western coast of Africa, or the islands adjacent, except Madeira, on the eleventh of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; the United States and British possessions in North America and the West Indies, on the twentieth of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight; Cape of Good Hope and the east coast of South America, on the first of March, one thousand eight hun-and eight; India, on the first of May, one thousand eight hundred and eight; China and the West Indies, on the first of June, one thousand eight hundred and eight: Be it therefore enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent any vessel which shall have been or shall be imported into Great Britain under any license bearing date subsequently to the said fifth day of February, shall, upon the exportation thereof, from Great Britain, be chargeable with and subject and liable to one-half part only of the duties of customs granted by this act upon goods, wares, and merchandise of the like description, upon their exportation from Great Britain.

And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise, which have been or may be condemned as prize, shall, on the exportation thereof from Great Britain, be charged with and subject and liable to the duties by this act imposed on the exportation of the like goods, wares, or merchandise respectively, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary, notwithstanding: Provided, always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to charge with any of the duties granted by this act, any goods, wares, or merchandise (except cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark) which shall have been or shall be brought into any port in Great Britain for adjudication before the passing of this act, whether the same shall have been or shall be subsequently restored or condemned as prize.

And be it further enacted, That the duties of customs described and set forth in figures in the said tables hereunto annexed, marked A, B, and C, on the several goods, wares, and merchandise, specified therein, shall be paid to the proper officer authorized to receive the duties of customs on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into Great Britain, and may and shall respectively be managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, and recovered, except where any alteration is expressly made by this act, in such and the like manner, and by the same means, ways, or methods, as former duties of customs upon goods, wares, or merchandise, in general, and also by any such special means, ways, or methods, respectively, as former duties of customs upon goods, wares, or merchandise, of the same sorts or kinds, were or might be managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, and recovered; and the goods, wares, or merchandise, whereon duties of customs are by this act charged, as the same are respectively inserted, described, and set forth in the said tables, upon exportation thereof from Great Britain, shall be and the same are hereby made subject and liable to all and every the conditions, regulations, securities, rules, restrictions, seizures, and forfeitures, to which goods, wares, or merchandise, in general, and also all and every the special conditions, rules, regulations, restrictions, seizures, sales, and forfeitures, respectively, to which the like goods, wares, or merchandise were subject and liable by any act or acts of Parliament in force on and immediately before the passing of this act, respecting the revenue of customs, except where any alteration is expressly made by

Provided, also, and be it further enacted, That goods, wares, or merchandise, described in the said tables A and B, of the growth and produce of St. Domingo, which shall have been or shall be imported into Great Britain by license, in any vessel which shall have been cleared from the port or place from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, were imported before the said date before the 11th day of November, or in any vessel which shall have been cleared from the port or place from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall, upon their importation into Great Britain, have been or shall be warehoused for exportation only.

Provided, also, and be it further enacted, That goods, wares, or merchandise, described in the said tables A and B, of the growth and produce of St. Domingo, which shall have been or shall be imported into Great Britain by license, in any vessel which shall have been cleared from the port or place from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, were imported before the said date before the 11th day of November, or in any vessel which shall have been cleared from the port or place from which such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall, upon their importation into Great Britain, have been or shall be warehoused for exportation only.

this act; and all pains, penalties, fines, and forfeitures, of whatever nature or kind the same may be, as well pains of death as others, for any offence whatever committed against or in breach of any act or acts of Parliament in force on or immediately before the passing of this act, made for securing the revenue of customs, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, and the several clauses, powers, provisos, and directions contained in any such act or acts, shall (unless where expressly altered by this act) extend to, and be respectively applied, practised, and put in execution, in respect of the several duties of customs hereby charged, in as full and ample a manner, to all intents and purposes whatever, as if all and every the said acts, clauses, provisos, powers, directions, fines, pains, penalties, or forfeitures, were particularly repeated and re-enacted in the body of this act, and made part thereof.

And be it further enacted, That in all cases where, by the said tables, the duties of custom by this act imposed upon the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise, from Great Britain, are charged, not according to the weight, tale, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be considered as the same shall be at the port of exportation, without any deduction or abatement whatever; and such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the exporter or proprietor of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or his known agent, in the manner and form, and under all the rules, regulations, and restrictions, and subject to the same forfeitures and penalties, as are prescribed and directed for ascertaining and collecting the duties to be paid upon goods, wares, and merchandise, according to the value thereof, by an act passed in the twenty-seventh year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled, "An act for repealing the several duties of customs and excise, and granting other duties in lieu thereof, and for applying the said duties, together with the other duties composing the public revenue, for permitting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, the produce or manufacture of the European dominions of the French King, into this Kingdom, and for applying certain unclaimed moneys remaining in the exchequer for the payment of annuities on lives to the reduction of the national debt;" and in case any goods, wares, or merchandise, chargeable with any such duty by this act, according to value, shall not be valued according to the true price or value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then it shall be lawful for the proper officer or officers of the customs to cause the same to be detained; and the said goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be dealt with, and the proper officers of the customs shall proceed, with relation to the said goods, wares, and merchandise, so detained, in every respect in the manner prescribed in such case by the said recited act.

And be it further enacted, That in case any goods, wares, or merchandise, upon which duties of custom are hereby imposed, shall be detained by any officer of the customs, on account of the same not being valued according to the true and real value thereof, and according to the true intent and meaning of this act, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of His Majesty's customs in England and Scotland, respectively, for the time being, or any three or more of them, respectively, upon proof being made to their satisfaction that no fraud was intended, to direct the entry to be amended, upon such terms and conditions as, under the circumstances of the case, shall appear to the said commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland, respectively, to be reasonable, and as they shall think fit to direct: Provided always, That, if the importer, exporter, or proprietor of such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall accept the terms or conditions prescribed by the said commissioners of customs, respectively, such importer, exporter, or proprietor shall not have or be entitled to any recompense or damage on account of the detention of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or have or maintain any action whatever for the same; any law, custom, or usage to the contrary, notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That such of the duties of customs, by this act imposed, as shall arise in that part of Great Britain called England, shall be under the management of the commissioners of the customs in England for the time being; and such thereof as shall arise in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, shall be under the management of the commissioners of the customs in Scotland for the time being.

And be it further enacted, That in case the whole or any part of the cargo of any vessel, which shall arrive in any port of Great Britain, shall consist of any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, such vessel shall forthwith proceed to the port of London, where all such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be landed, lodged, and secured, under His Majesty's lock, in some of the warehouses belonging to the said United Company, at the expense of the proprietors of such goods, wares, and merchandise, and be there examined, and an account taken thereof by the proper officers of the customs and of the excise, in cases where that revenue is concerned, and such goods, wares, and merchandise shall remain so secured until the exportation thereof; and, before any such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be taken out of such warehouse for the purpose of exportation, the several duties of customs, as the same are described and set forth in figures in the table hereunto annexed, marked C, shall be first paid to the proper officer of the customs; and in those cases in the said table, marked C, where the duties to be paid on the exportation of any such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall not be charged according to the weight, tale, gauge, or measure, but according to the value thereof, such value shall be ascertained by the declaration of the proprietor, or his known agent, in the manner and form, and under the rules, regulations, and restrictions, and subject to the same forfeitures and penalties as are prescribed and imposed for ascertaining and collecting duties to be paid according to the value thereof, by the said recited act passed in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty; and, in case any such goods, wares, or merchandise shall not be valued according to the true and real value thereof, then it shall be lawful for the proper officer or officers of the customs to cause the same to be detained, and the said goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be dealt with, and the proper officers of the customs shall proceed, in the manner prescribed in such case by the said recited act: Provided, always, That such goods, wares, or merchandise, so detained (cotton wool excepted) shall be sold only for the purpose of being exported from Great Britain, any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, also, That, in case any part of the cargo of any such ship or vessel, so consisting in part of East Indian goods, wares, or merchandise, as aforesaid, shall consist of goods, wares, or merchandise, not being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, such last-mentioned goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be duly entered, either to be secured or lodged in warehouses, according to the rules, regulations, and restrictions, of an act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain to be secured in warehouse without payment of duty;" and of a certain other act, passed in the forty-fifth year of his present Majesty, entitled "An act to authorize the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to permit certain articles to be warehoused in different ports in Great Britain, upon giving security for the payment of duties upon the articles therein mentioned;" and of a certain other act, passed in the forty-sixth year of his said Majesty, entitled "An act to extend the provisions of an act made in the forty-third year of his present Majesty, for permitting certain articles to be warehoused in Great Britain, to other articles not therein mentioned, and to alter the condition of the bond directed to be given by an act of the twenty-fourth year of his present Majesty, by the masters and owners of vessels and boats licensed by the Lords of the Admiralty, provided such goods, wares, and merchandise, by law, may be lodged or secured; otherwise, the full duties of customs and of excise, (in cases where any such duties are payable on such goods, wares, and merchandise,) due thereon, shall be paid to the proper officers of the customs and excise; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, so brought into the port of London, shall, on the exportation thereof, be charged with the duties due and payable by this act on any such goods, wares, and merchandise, respectively, as the same are described and set forth in the tables hereunto annexed, marked A and B, as the case may be."

Provided, always, and be it further enacted, That, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the collector and comptroller of the customs of any port in Great Britain, by the report of any vessel which shall arrive at such port with any cargo, part whereof shall consist of goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, that such goods, wares, and merchandise, do not exceed in value one-fourth part of the whole value of the cargo of such vessel, then, and in such case, it shall be lawful for the owner, consignee, or captain of such vessel, after giving such security as shall be directed by the commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland, respectively, or any three of them, for the due conveyance of such goods, wares, and merchandise, as aforesaid to the port of London, there to be warehoused as aforesaid, and not before, to land the cargo of such vessel at the port of her arrival, except such goods, wares, and merchandise, as aforesaid, and either to cause such goods, wares, and merchandise, to be conveyed in the same ship to the port of London, or to cause the same to be transhipped, in order to be conveyed to the said port, upon the said security, and under such regulations and restrictions for securing the conveying the same to the said port, as shall be directed by the commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland respectively.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the proprietor or proprietors of any goods, wares, or merchandise, brought into Great Britain, may, if he or they shall be so disposed, instead of paying the full duties of customs and excise due and payable thereon, secure or lodge in warehouses, approved by the commissioners of the customs of England or Scotland, respectively, without payment of duty in the first instance, any goods, wares, and merchandise, which, by virtue of any law in force at the time of passing this act, are allowed to be so secured and warehoused, under the conditions and regulations of the said recited acts passed in the forty-third, forty-fifth, and forty-sixth years of his present Majesty, respectively; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, so warehoused, on which the full duties of customs and excise shall have been paid, shall, on the exportation thereof, be subject and liable to, and be charged with the duties of customs imposed by this act, as inserted and set forth in the tables hereunto annexed, as the case may be.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the commissioners of customs, or any three or more of them, upon the request of the owner, proprietor, or consignee of any goods, wares, or merchandise warehoused, to destroy the same, in such a manner as they shall respectively direct, without payment of duty, and upon payment only of any charges and expenses thereon.

And be it further enacted, That the importers, proprietors, or consignees of any goods, wares, or merchandises, which shall have been lodged in warehouses, or otherwise secured, according to the directions of the said recited act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty, or any other act of Parliament, by virtue and under the authority of which any such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall have been solodged or secured, shall, within fifteen calendar months, to be computed from the day on which such importers, proprietors, or consignees of such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall have made their first entry thereof, clear and take from and out of such warehouses or places, respectively, all such goods, wares, and merchandise, either for the purpose of being exported according to the directions of this act, on payment of the duties hereby imposed, or to be used or consumed in Great Britain: Provided always, That such goods, wares, and merchandise, may legally be taken out for that purpose, on payment of the full duties of customs and excise that are or may be due or payable thereon at the time the same are so taken out; and in case any such importers, proprietors, or consignees, shall fail or neglect so to do, it shall be lawful for the commissioners of the customs in England or Scotland, respectively, to cause all such goods, wares, or merchandise, to be publicly sold or exposed to sale; and, after such sale, the produce thereof shall first be applied to or towards the payment of the freight, primage, and charges of warehouse room, and other charges that shall arise thereon, next to the duties of customs and excise, and the overplus (if any) shall be paid the proprietor or other persons authorized to receive the same: Provided always, That in case any goods, wares, or merchandise, so remaining and directed to be sold, shall be of the growth produce, or manufacture of any country or place within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, or any goods, wares, and merchandise, which shall be prohibited to be used or consumed in Great Britain, then, and in such case, all such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be sold only for the purpose of being exported, and not on any pretence whatever to be used or consumed in Great Britain: Provided, That no such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be sold, unless a price can be obtained for the same equal, at least, to the full amount of all duties of customs and excise, charged and chargeable thereon, together with the expenses; but if such price cannot be obtained, then, and in such case, all such goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be effectually destroyed by and in the presence of the proper officers of the customs, and also the officers of the excise, in case any duties of excise are payable thereon, who are hereby respectively authorized and required to destroy the same accordingly; and the proprietor or owner of such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall have no claim, either in law or equity, to the value of such goods, wares, or merchandise, or any part thereof, so destroyed as aforesaid, any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary, notwithstanding: Provided always, That all such goods, wares, and merchandise, may be re-exported to the country from which they were brought, or to the country from which the vessel in which such goods, wares, or merchandise, were imported shall belong, or shall have belonged, without payment only of such warehouse or port duties as shall have become due thereon: Provided, That the British flag shall not, at the time of such re-exportation, be excluded from such country respectively.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge the duties imposed by this act on any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, that shall be exported from Great Britain to that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of Ireland, having been imported from thence directly to Great Britain, on the exportation thereof to any country whatever.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge the duties by this act imposed on the exportation of any flour, or meal, or articles not being either in the whole or in any part manufactured, being of the growth or produce of any State in Europe or America in amity with His Majesty, and imported in any ship belonging to such State, or in any British ship navigated according to law directly from any such State, except coffee, sugar, pimento, cocoa-nuts, hides, tallow, oil, and cotton wool, or yarn, or Jesuit's bark.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge with the duties imposed by this act any goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any British colony, plantation, or settlement in Africa or America, which shall have been imported directly from such colony, plantation, or settlement, respectively, and exported to any port or place whatever.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge with the duties imposed by this act any goods, wares, or merchandise, that shall have been imported by the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, or by any subjects of His Majesty trading within the limits of the charter of the said company, with their license, upon the exportation of such goods, wares, or merchandise, from Great Britain to any port or places whatever.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge the duty by this act imposed on any wine, spirits, or tobacco, which shall be shipped for the use of His Majesty's army or navy; but such wine, spirits, or tobacco, shall be subject and liable to all and every the rules, regulations, and conditions, limitations, securities, penalties, and forfeitures, to which such articles so shipped would have been subject and liable if this act had not been made.

Provided also, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge with the duties by this act imposed any goods, wares, or merchandise, exported from Great Britain to the Isle of

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

Man, by virtue and under the authority of any license which the Commissioners of His Majesty's Customs in England or Scotland, or any three or more of them, respectively, are, or may be, by law, authorized and empowered to grant.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the duties by this act imposed on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from Great Britain, shall not be charged, or payable on any goods, wares, or merchandise, not manufactured, either in the whole or in part, nor upon any wine, or any article of provision, (spirits excepted,) exported to any British colony, plantation, or settlement, in Africa or America, or to any British settlement within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel of the United States of America which shall enter any port in Great Britain or Ireland, in consequence of her having been warned not to proceed to a blockaded port under His Majesty's Order in Council of the eleventh of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, shall be liable to be charged with the duty of two shillings a ton of the burden of any ship or vessel belonging to the inhabitants of the said United States, imposed by an act of the thirty-seventh year of His Majesty's reign which has been continued and revived by several subsequent acts.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall extend to affect or take away any of the rights or privileges of the West India Dock Company, of the London Dock Company, or of the East India Dock Company.

And be it further enacted, That the duties granted and imposed by this act shall continue in force until the end of the next session of Parliament, unless His Majesty, by his Order in Council, shall think fit to suspend or reduce the same, or any part thereof.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for His Majesty, at any time, by Order in Council, to suspend the operation of this act as to any duties, or proportion, or part of any duties, granted by this act, in respect of any country for the time being in amity with His Majesty, and to allow the exportation to any such country, so in amity with His Majesty as aforesaid, of any goods, wares, and merchandise, made subject by this act to any duties on exportation, without the payment of such duties, upon such terms and conditions, and subject to such restrictions, as to His Majesty may seem fit.

Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to prevent His Majesty from prohibiting the exportation of any articles, matters, or things, to any country or place from which the British flag is excluded, in any case in which it would have been lawful for His Majesty to prohibit such exportation if this act had not passed.

Provided always, and be it further enacted,

That the duties imposed by an act, passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled An act for granting to His Majesty, during the present war, and until the ratification of a definitive treaty of peace, additional duties on the importation and exportation of certain goods, wares and merchandise, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels in Great Britain; on certain goods, wares, and merchandise therein enumerated and described, and which, by another act passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled An act for permitting certain goods imported into Great Britain to be secured in warehouse without payment of duty, were directed to be paid on all such goods, wares, and merchandise, sugar excepted, which should be exported from the warehouses or places in which such goods, wares, and merchandise had been lodged or secured, under the directions of the said last recited act, shall not be due or payable on any such goods, wares, and merchandise so exported, on which other duties are charged, according to the table marked A, hereunto annexed; but that the duties on any such goods, wares, and merchandise, as set forth in the said table, shall, during the continuance of such duties, be instead and in lieu of the duties charged and imposed thereon by the said two last recited acts passed in the forty-third year of his present Majesty's reign.

And be it further enacted, That all the moneys arising from the duties of custom by this act imposed, the necessary charge of raising and accounting for the same excepted, shall, from time to time, be paid into the receipt of His Majesty's Exchequer at Westminster, distinctly and apart from all other branches of the public revenue; and that there shall be provided and kept in the office of the auditor of the said receipt of exchequer a book, or books, in which all the moneys arising from the said duties, and paid into the said receipt, as aforesaid, shall be entered separate and apart from all other moneys paid and payable to His Majesty, his heirs and successors, upon any account whatever; and the said moneys paid in as aforesaid, into the receipt of His Majesty's exchequer, shall from time to time, as the same shall be paid into the said receipt, be issued and applied to such services as shall then have been voted by the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in this present session of Parliament, for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, or shall be voted by the said Commons for the service of any subsequent year.

And be it further enacted, That if any action or suit shall be brought or commenced against any person or persons for anything done in pursuance of this act, or of any order in council referred to in this act, such action or suit shall be commenced within three calendar months next after the fact committed, and not afterwards, and shall be laid in the county or place where the cause of complaint did arise, and not elsewhere; and the defendant or defendants in every such action or suit may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon; and if the jury shall find for the defendant or defendants in any such action or suit, or if the plaintiffs shall be nonsuited, or discontinue his or their action or suit after the defendant or defendants shall have appeared, or if, upon demurrer, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall have treble costs, and have the like remedy for the same, as any defendant has in other cases to recover costs by law.

And be it further enacted, That this act may be varied, altered, or repealed, by any act or acts to be made in this present session of Parliament.

Tables to which this act refers.

A table of duties of customs, payable on the exportation of certain foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, therein enumerated or described, not being imported by the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, (which, on importation, are allowed to be secured under the regulations of 43 Geo. GROGON R—Instructions to the commanders of our ships of war and privateers. Given at Windsor, the 11th day of April, 1808, in the forty-eighth year of our reign.

Our will and pleasure is, that you do not interrupt any neutral vessel laden with lumber and provisions, and going to any of our colonies, islands, or settlements, in the West Indies or South America, to whomsoever the property may appear to belong, and notwithstanding such vessel may not have regular clearances and documents on board; and in case any vessel shall be met with, and being on her due course to the alleged port of destination, an endorsement shall be made on one or more of the principal papers of such vessels, specifying the destination alleged, and the place where the vessel was so visited. And in case any vessel so laden shall arrive and deliver her cargo at any of our colonies, islands, or settlements aforesaid, such vessel shall be permitted to receive her freight, and to depart, either in ballast, or with any goods that may be legally exported in such vessel, and to proceed to any unblockaded port, notwithstanding the present hostilities, or any future hostilities which may take place; and a passport for such vessel shall be granted to the vessel by the governor, or other person having the chief civil command of such colony, island, or settlement. G. R.

Anna Quadragesimo Octavo Georgii III. Regis, Cap. XXXIV.

An act to prohibit, until the end of the next session of Parliament, the exportation of cotton wool from Great Britain.—14th April, 1808.

Whereas it is expedient to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of cotton wool from Great Britain, except in the manner hereinafter mentioned: Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual, and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, no person or persons whatever shall, directly or indirectly, export, carry, or convey, or cause or procure to be exported, carried, or conveyed out of or from any port or place in Great Britain, or shall load or lay on board, or cause or procure to be laden or laid on board, in any ship, or other vessel or boat, any cotton wool, in order to be carried, exported, or conveyed out of any such port or place, except to Ireland, and also except as hereinafter is provided.

2. Provided always and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for His Majesty, by any license under his royal sign-manual, to authorize any person to export from Great Britain, for his or their own account, or for account of any subject or subjects of any State in amity with His Majesty, any cotton wool, under such regulations, restrictions, and securities, as may be specified in the said license.

3. And be it further enacted, That all cotton wool, which shall be so exported, carried, or conveyed in or laid on board any ship, or other vessel or boat, in order to be exported, carried, or conveyed out of Great Britain, contrary to this act, shall be forfeited; and that every offender therein shall forfeit also the sum of forty shillings for every pound weight of such cotton wool which shall be so exported, carried, or conveyed on board any ship, or vessel or boat, in order to be exported, carried, or conveyed out of Great Britain; and also the ship, vessel, or boat, wherein the same shall be exported, or in or upon which the same shall be laden or laid, in order to be exported, together with her guns, furniture, ammunition, tackle, and apparel, shall be forfeited; and the same respectively may be seized by any officer or officers of the customs.

4. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall extend to prevent any cotton wool being carried coastwise upon any certificate which shall be directed to be given by the commissioner of the customs in that behalf.

5. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures created and incurred by this act shall and may be sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of, in such manner, and by such ways, means, and methods, as any penalties incurred on any goods, ships, or vessels, forfeited for any offence against the customs, may now be legally sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of; and the officer or officers concerned in seizures or prosecutions under this act, shall be entitled to and receive such share of the produce arising from the seizures as they are now by law entitled to, upon prosecution of seizures for unlawful importation, and to such share of the produce arising from any pecuniary fine or penalty, or composition paid for any offence against this act, as they are now by any law or regulation entitled to upon prosecution for pecuniary penalties.

6. And be it further enacted, That all personal actions and suits, indictments, informations, and all prosecutions and proceedings whatsoever, which have been, or shall hereafter be prosecuted or commenced against any person or persons, for having refused to receive any entry or entries for the exportation of any cotton wool, or to clear out any ship or vessel laden with cotton wool intended to be exported before the passing of this act, are and shall be discharged and made void

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

Anno Quadragesimo Octavo Georgii III. Regis, Cap. XXXVII.

An act for making valid certain Orders in Council, and warrants of the Commissioners of the Treasury, for the entry and warehousing of certain goods imported in neutral vessels, and for indemnifying all persons concerned therein; for the remitting of forfeitures in certain cases; and for enabling His Majesty to allow, during the continuance of hostilities, and until two months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, the importation of goods from countries from which the British flag is excluded, in any vessels whatever. [April 14, 1808.]

Whereas several neutral vessels, bound to ports on the continent of Europe from which the British flag has been excluded, have arrived in the ports of the United Kingdom, having been warned or brought into such ports in consequence of His Majesty's Orders in Council for that purpose, and parts of the cargoes of such vessels have been admitted to entry for home consumption, or warehoused for exportation; and other parts of such cargoes, consisting of goods the growth, produce, or manufacture of countries within the limits of the charter granted to the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies, not imported by the said company, have been warehoused for exportation only: And whereas, in consequence of the late events in Portugal, wine and other commodities have been brought from the dominions of the Crown of Portugal in vessels not owned and navigated according to law, and have been admitted to entry or warehoused in the same manner, and subject to the same duties only, as if the same had been imported in British built vessels, owned and navigated according to law: And whereas such goods have been so entered and warehoused, in obedience to Orders of Council and warrants of the commissioners of His Majesty's treasury, which it has been deemed expedient under the circumstances to issue for such purposes; which orders and warrants, and the proceedings thereupon, were not authorized by law; but it is expedient, under the circumstances, that the same should be authorized by act of Parliament; and it is also expedient that the importation of goods from countries from which the British flag is excluded shall be allowed for a limited time in any vessels:

1. Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That all such importations, admissions to entry, warehousing for home consumption or for exportation, and securing in warehouses goods of the produce or manufacture of places within the limits of the charter granted to the East India Company for exportation only; and also all importations and admissions to entry, and warehousing of goods and commodities from the dominions of the Crown of Portugal, which have been made as aforesaid, before the passing of this act, whether under Orders in Council or by warrants of the commissioners of the treasury, shall be deemed and taken to be good in law; and all persons concerned in advising, issuing, or carrying the same into execution shall be, and are, hereby indemnified accordingly; anything in any act of Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding; and no vessels, goods, or commodities, which have been admitted to entry, or imported, or warehoused, or secured, under any such order or warrant, shall be subject to any forfeiture, or the owner thereof be subject to any penalty by reason thereof.

2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the importers, proprietors, or consignees of any goods or commodities that may have been, or which shall be, brought into any port of the United Kingdom, in any ship or vessel which shall have come in, in consequence of any warning under the said Orders in Council, or in any ship or vessel which shall have sailed from any port or place within the respective limits enumerated in His Majesty's Order in Council of the twenty-fifth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, before the respective days specified in the said order, on or after which days the vessels sailing from such ports or places are to be deemed to have received notice of the aforesaid order of the eleventh day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seven, duly to enter and land any such goods or commodities, either for the purpose of securing the same in warehouses for exportation, or on payment of the full duties of customs and excise due thereon, as the case may warrant; and that no ship or vessel so arriving as aforesaid shall be liable to forfeiture, or the owners or proprietors thereof to any penalty, by reason of such ship or vessel not being built, owned, or navigated according to law, or not being in any other respect legally authorized to import into this Kingdom the goods or commodities of which the cargo shall consist; nor shall any goods or commodities, being part of the cargo of any such ship or vessel so brought in as aforesaid, be liable to forfeiture, or the owners thereof to any penalty, by reason of any such goods or commodities being in packages not allowed by law, or for being in any other manner prohibited to be imported into this kingdom, any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for His Majesty, by Order in Council, or license, and in Ireland for the Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governor, or Governors, and the Privy Council of Ireland, by Order in Council, or license, when and as often as the same shall be judged expedient, to permit, during the continuance of hostilities, and until two months after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, any such goods, wares, or merchandise, as shall be specified in such Order in Council, or license, to be imported into any port of Great Britain or Ireland, respectively, from any port or place from which the British flag is excluded, in any ship or vessel belonging to any country, whether in amity with His Majesty or not; any law in force in the United Kingdom, or in Great Britain, or Ireland, respectively, to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

4. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to exempt from seizure any goods or commodities which shall be unshipped, or attempted to be unshipped, for the purpose of being illegally conveyed on shore, or before due entry shall have been made thereof.

5. And be it further enacted, That this act may be altered, amended, or repealed, by any act or acts to be passed in this session of Parliament.

Mr. Canning to Mr. Pinkney.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 4, 1808.

The undersigned, His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received His Majesty's command to acquaint Mr. Pinkney that His Majesty has judged it expedient to establish the most rigorous blockade of the port of Copenhagen, and of all the other ports in the island of Zealand. Mr. Pinkney is therefore requested to apprise the American consuls and merchants residing in England, that the entrances of all the ports above mentioned are, and must be considered as being, in a state of blockade; and that, from this time, all the measures authorized by the law of nations, and the respective treaties between His Majesty and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels attempting to violate the said blockade after this notice.

The undersigned requests Mr. Pinkney to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

Anno Quadragesimo Octavo Georgii III. Regis, Cap. LXXXV.

An Act to regulate the trade between Great Britain and the United States of America until the end of the next session of Parliament. [June 23, 1808.]

Whereas it is expedient to permit goods, wares, and merchandise, being of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States of America, to be imported directly from thence into Great Britain, in British or American ships or vessels, subject to such duties only as are payable on the like commodities when imported from other foreign countries; may it therefore please your Majesty, that it may be enacted:

And be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same; That, from and after the end of the present session of Parliament, it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons to import into Great Britain directly from any of the territories of the United States of America, in British built ships or vessels, owned, navigated, and registered according to law, or in ships or vessels built in countries belonging to the United States of America, or any of them, or in ships or vessels taken by any of the ships or vessels of war belonging to the Government or any of the inhabitants of the said United States, having commissions or letters of marque and reprisal from the Government of the said United States, and condemned as lawful prize in any Court of Admiralty of the said United States, of which condemnation proof shall be given to the Commissioners of His Majesty's customs, or any four or more of them, in England or Scotland, respectively, and owned by the subjects of the said United States, or any of them, and whereof the master and three-fourths of the mariners at least are subjects of the said United States, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, production, and manufacture of the said United States, which are not prohibited by law to be imported from foreign countries, and to enter and land such goods, wares, and merchandise, upon payment of the duties, and subject to the conditions and regulations hereinafter mentioned; any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary, in anywise notwithstanding.

2. And be it further enacted, That all such goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into Great Britain, either in such ships or vessels, or in British built ships or vessels, owned, navigated, and registered according to law, shall and may be entered and landed, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, and no higher, except as hereinafter is provided, as are payable on goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination or description, upon their importation into Great Britain from any foreign country; and in cases where different duties are imposed upon goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination or description, imported from different foreign countries, then upon payment of the lowest duties which by law are now required to be paid on the importation of any such goods, wares, or merchandise from any other foreign country: Provided always, That where any goods, wares, or merchandise, are imported from the said United States, in any ship or vessel not being British built, owned, navigated, and registered according to law, such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be subject and liable to the duties due and payable on similar articles when so imported from any other foreign country.

3. And be it further enacted, That any tobacco, being the growth or production of any of the territories of the United States of America, may be imported into Great Britain in British or American ships or vessels, owned and navigated as hereinbefore required, upon payment of the same duties of customs and excise as are now paid on tobacco imported by British subjects from any British colony or plantation in America; and that any snuff, being the production and manufacture of any of the said territories, may be imported into Great Britain in manner before mentioned, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, as snuff, being the production or manufacture of Europe, is subject to, and may be warehoused and again exported, such tobacco and snuff to be subject respectively, nevertheless, to all and singular the regulations, restrictions, penalties, and forfeitures, relating to the importation and exportation thereof, or in any other respect relating thereto, of an act made and passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled "An act for repealing the duties on tobacco and snuff, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof;" and of another act, passed in the thirtieth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to explain and amend an act made in the last session of Parliament, entitled 'An act for repealing the duties on tobacco and snuff, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof, or of any other act since made relating thereto:'" Provided always, That such tobacco shall be accompanied by a manifest, as by law required.

4. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise, so imported from the United States of America, shall, upon the exportation thereof from Great Britain, be entitled to the same drawbacks as are by law allowed upon the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination and description when exported from Great Britain; and that there shall be allowed and paid the same drawbacks and bounties on goods, wares, and merchandise exported from Great Britain to the territories of the said United States, or any of them, as are allowed by law upon the exportation of goods, wares, or merchandise of the like denomination or description, to any of the islands, plantations, or colonies, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, in America: Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to repeal, or in anywise to alter, the duties of package, scavage, balliage, or portage, or any other duties payable to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, or to the Lord Mayor of the said city for the time being, or to any other city or town corporate within the Kingdom of Great Britain, or to repeal or in anywise to alter any special privilege or exemption to which any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, is or are now entitled by law; but the same shall be continued as heretofore.

5. And be it further enacted, That the duties of customs and excise upon, for, and in respect of any goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into Great Britain from the said United States, by virtue and under the authority of this act, shall and may be respectively managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, allowed, appropriated, and applied, in such and the like manner, and in or by any or either of the means, ways, or methods, by which the duties of customs and excise, and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise upon goods, wares, or merchandise of the same sorts or kinds respectively imported from or exported to any other foreign country were or might be managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, allowed, appropriated, and applied, and the goods, wares, or merchandise, so by this act respectively made liable to the payment of or chargeable with duties of customs and excise, or so entitled to drawback of duties of customs and excise, upon the importation thereof into, or exportation thereof from Great Britain, or on any other account whatever, shall be, and the same are hereby, made subject and liable to all and every the conditions, regulations, rules, restrictions, and forfeitures, to which goods, wares, or merchandise in general, and also all and every the special conditions, rules, restrictions, regulations, and forfeitures, respectively, to which the like goods, wares, or merchandise respectively were subject and liable by any act or acts of Parliament in force on and immediately before the passing of this act, respecting the revenues of customs and excise; and all and every pain, penalty, fine, or forfeiture, of any nature or kind whatever, for any offence whatever committed against or in breach of any act or acts of Parliament in force on and immediately before the passing of this act, made for securing the revenue of customs and excise, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, and the several clauses, powers, and directions therein contained, shall, and are hereby, directed and declared to extend to, and shall be respectively applied, practised, and put in execution for, and in respect of, the several duties of customs and excise and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise, hereby charged and allowed, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes whatever, as if all and every the said acts, clauses, provisions, powers, directions, fines, pains, penalties, or forfeitures, were particularly repeated and re-enacted in the body of this act.

6. Provided always, and be it enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for His Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, by any Order in Council, or by any proclamation made for that purpose, to cause the provisions of this act to be suspended for such time as His Majesty, his heirs, and successors, may deem expedient and necessary; anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

7. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force to the end of the next session of Parliament.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

By the Honorable Sir Alexander Cochrane, K. B., Rear Admiral of the Red, and Commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed and to be employed at Barbadoes, the Leeward Islands, &c.

Whereas an intimation has been received from the right honorable Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, that the strictest naval blockade is to be established over the leeward French Caribbean islands; the several captains, commanders, and commanding officers under my orders, are hereby authorized and directed to stop all neutral vessels destined for any of the ports of the said islands; and if they shall appear to be ignorant of the existence of the blockade, and have no enemy's property on board, the masters of such neutral vessels shall be apprized thereof, and warned not to proceed to such ports, and a notice written to that effect upon one or more of the principal ship's papers.

But if a neutral vessel shall appear to be so warned, or to be otherwise informed of the existence of the blockade, or to have sailed from her last clearing port after it may be reasonably supposed that this notification might have been made public there, and yet be found attempting or intending to enter either of the ports of the said islands, such vessel shall be seized and sent into port for legal adjudication. And with respect to neutral vessels coming out of said ports, having any colonial produce, goods, or merchandise on board, appearing to have been laden after knowledge of the blockade, such vessels shall, in like manner, be seized and sent in for legal adjudication.

Given on board the Belleisle, Carlisle bay, Barbadoes, October 14, 1808.

ALEXANDER COCHRANE.

By command of the Rear-Admiral:
JOHN S. TRACEY.

Copy of the decree of the National Convention of the 9th of May, 1793, 2d year of the Republic of France.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their Marine Committee; considering that the flag of the neutral Powers is not respected by the enemies of France; that two cargoes of flour arrived at Falmouth in Anglo-American vessels, and purchased before the war for the service of the marine of France, have been detained in England by the Government, who would not pay for them, except at a price below that at which flour had been sold:

That a vessel from Papenburg, called the Therisia, commanded by Captain Hendrick Kob, laden with divers effects belonging to Frenchmen, has been conducted to Dover, the 2d of March last, by an English cutter:

That a privateer of the same nation has carried into the same port of Dover, the 18th of the same month, the Danish ship Mercury, Christianlund, Captain Freuchen, expedited from Dunkirk on the 17th with a cargo of wheat for Bordeaux:

That the ship John, Captain Shkleley, laden with near six thousand quintals of American wheat, bound from Falmouth to St. Malo, has been taken by an English frigate, and conducted to Guernsey, where the agents of the Government have simply promised to pay the value of the cargo because it was not on account of the French:

That one hundred and one French passengers of different professions, embarked at Cadiz, by order of the Spanish Minister, in a Genoese ship, called the Providence, Captain Ambrose Briasco, bound to Bayonne, have been shamefully pillaged by the crew of an English privateer:

That the divers reports which are successively made by the maritime cities of the Republic announce that these same acts of inhumanity and injustice are daily multiplied and repeated with impunity throughout the seas:

That, under such circumstances, all the rights of nations being violated, the French people are no longer permitted to fulfil towards the neutral Powers in general, the vows which they have so often manifested, and which they will constantly make for the full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation, decrees as follows:

ART. 1. The French ships of war and privateers may arrest and bring into the ports of the Republic, the neutral vessels which shall be laden wholly, or in part, either with articles of provision belonging to neutral nations, and destined for an enemy's port, or with merchandises belonging to an enemy.

ART. 2. The merchandise belonging to an enemy shall be declared good prize, and confiscated to the profit of the captors; the articles of provisions belonging to neutral nations, and laden for an enemy's port, shall be paid for according to their value in the place to which they were destined.

ART. 3. In all cases the neutral vessels shall be released as soon as the unloading of the articles of provision arrested, or of the merchandises seized, shall have been effected. The freight thereof shall be paid at the rate which shall have been stipulated by the persons who shipped them. A just indemnification shall be allowed, in proportion to their detention, by the tribunals who are to have cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

ART. 4. These tribunals shall be bound to transmit, three days after their decision, a copy of the inventory of the said articles of provision or merchandise, to the Minister of Marine, and another to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

ART. 5. The present law, applicable to all the prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have effect as soon as the enemy Powers shall have declared free and not seizable, although destined for the ports of the Republic, the articles of provision belonging to neutral nations, and the merchandises laden in neutral vessels, and belonging to the Government or citizens of France.

Decree of the National Convention of the 23d May, which declares that the vessels of the United States are not comprehended in the dispositions of the decree of the 9th of May.

The National Convention, after having heard the report of their Committee of Public Safety, wishing to maintain the union established between the French Republic and the United States of America, decree that the vessels of the United States are not comprehended in the dispositions of the decree of the 9th of May, conformably to the sixteenth article of the treaty concluded on the 16th February, 1778.

Extract from the Register of Arrêts of the Committee of Public Safety, Finance, and Supplies.

25TH BRUMAIRE, 3d year of the Republic, (November 18, 1794.)

The Committee of Public Safety, Commerce, and Supplies, order as follows:

ART. 1. The vessels of the United States of America, and those of other neutral Powers, shall be permitted to enter the ports of the Republic and retire from them when they please; nor shall it be permitted to any constituted authority to retard their departure, or to oblige the captains to sell their cargoes against their will.

ART. 2. When the captains or owners of neutral vessels are disposed to sell their cargoes to the public, they shall be paid for them according to the bargain which they make.

ART. 3. It is enjoined to all the commandants of naval armaments, fleets, divisions, and squadrons of the Republic, to respect and cause to be respected, upon their responsibility, in favor of the neutral and allied Powers, the rights of nations and the stipulations of treaties, conforming themselves strictly to the terms of the decree of the Convention of the 27th July, 1793.

ART. 4. In consequence, they are expressly prohibited from turning these vessels from their course; taking from on board of them their captains, sailors, or passengers, other than soldiers or sailors actually in the service of an enemy Power, or of seizing the effects or merchandises which shall be found in them.

ART. 5. Are excepted from the prohibition contained in the preceding article—

1. Merchandises belonging to the enemies of the Republic, until such enemy Powers shall have declared that the merchandises of the French shall be free on board neutral vessels.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

2. Such merchandises of the neutral Powers, also, as are deemed contraband of war, and under which are comprised all arms, instruments, and munitions of war, and every kind of merchandise and other effects destined for an enemy's port actually seized or blockaded.

[Articles 6, 7, 8, and 9, regulate the manner of proceeding where neutral vessels are brought in, upon a presumption of having enemy's goods on board.]

ART. 10. The Commission of Marine shall present, without delay, a statement of the individuals, born subjects of the Powers with whom the Republic is at war, who were taken before the present day upon neutral vessels, that particular arrêts may be taken in each case.

ART. 11. The indemnities which are due to the captains of neutral Powers who were detained by an embargo at Bordeaux, shall be liquidated without delay by the Commission of Marine and Colonies, conformable to an arrêt of the Committee of Public Safety of the 17th Germinal; and this commission shall render an account, in the course of ten days, of the actual state of these demands.

ART. 12. The Commission of Marine is specially charged to receive and adjust the accounts which shall be presented to it by an agent of the United States, for such supplies as the Americans have furnished to the administration of St. Domingo; and it shall take the necessary measures to procure to the parties interested the most prompt justice, and shall also present to the Committees of Public Safety, of Finance, Commerce, and Supplies, the result of its operations in these respects.

ART. 13. The Commission of Foreign Relations is instructed to deliver a copy of this arrêt to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, in answer to his memorial of the 9th Fructidor (September 3) last.

THURIOT,
MERLIN,
CAMBACERES, &c.

Extract from the Register of Arrêts of the Committee of Public Safety, of the 14th Nivose, 3d year of the Republic (3d January, 1796.)

The Committee of Public Safety, considering that, by the twenty-third article of the Treaty Commerce between France and the United States of America, bearing date on the 6th of February, 1778, it is agreed:

1. That the people of France and America may navigate reciprocally, in complete safety, with their vessels, and without exception as to the owners of the merchandise charged upon such vessels, or as to the ports from whence they come, and although the Power for which they may be destined be actually at war, or become afterwards the enemy of the one or the other contracting party; that they may equally navigate in full safety with their vessels and merchandise, and frequent the places, ports, and harbors of the enemies of both nations, or of either, and carry on trade, not only from the port of an enemy to that of a neutral Power, but also from different ports of the same enemy.

2. That free vessels shall make free goods, and that anything shall be considered as free which shall be found on board the vessels of either contracting nation, although it belong, in whole or in part, to the enemies of either the one or the other; contraband always excepted.

3. That the same liberty shall be extended to those who are found on board free vessels, although they be the enemies of either the one or the other contracting nation; and in consequence, that such persons shall not be taken from such vessels, unless they be soldiers in the actual service of the enemy.

Considering that the crimes of England, having given to the war of despotism against liberty a character of injustice and atrocity without example, in the annals of mankind, the National Convention found itself obliged, in using the right of reprisal, to decree, on the 9th of May, 1793, that the vessels of war and cruisers of the Republic might take and conduct into the ports of France such vessels of the neutral Powers as they should find charged, in whole or in part, with provisions belonging either to such Powers or the enemies of France. Soon afterwards, however, and on the 1st July, 1793, the Convention restored in full vigor the dispositions of the treaty above-mentioned of the 6th of February, 1778, but which were again revoked by a decree of the 27th of the same month, in respect to provisions and merchandises belonging to an enemy; upon which latter ground it has stood since, leaving the provisions and merchandises of neutral Powers, in such vessels, free. In regard to which the French Government has not to reproach itself with having waited, to show itself just and loyal, that the Cabinet of London might revoke, as it did a long time afterwards, the order given by it the preceding year to seize all neutral vessels carrying provisions or merchandises into France.

Considering that since, and notwithstanding the notoriety with which this Cabinet continues to insult and violate the rights of neutral nations, by causing their vessels, charged with merchandise, destined for the ports of France, to be seized, yet the National Convention has enjoined it, by the seventh article of the law of the 13th of this month, upon all officers, civil and military, strictly to observe, in all their dispositions, the treaties which unite France with the neutral Powers of the ancient continent, as likewise with the United States of America, declaring all articles of a contrary import in any other law to be absolutely null and void.

Fully, therefore, to carry into effect the said law, according to its true intent and meaning, it is hereby ordered:

ART. 1. The Commission of Marine and of the Colonies shall notify, without delay, to all the commanders of armed vessels, divisions, and squadrons, the article above-mentioned of the law of the 13th of this month; and, in consequence, that they are to consider the fifth article of the arrêt of the 25th Brumaire last, which authorized the seizure of merchandises belonging to an enemy that shall have declared French property on board such vessels free, as now null and void.

ART. 2. The merchandises called contraband, though belonging to a neutral Power, shall continue subject to seizure.

ART. 3. All arms, instruments, and munitions of war, of every kind, horses, and their equipage, and all kind of merchandises, and other effects, destined for an enemy's port actually blockaded or besieged, shall be deemed contraband of war.

PELET.

Decree of the Executive Directory on the conduct of the flag of the French Republic towards neutral vessels, 14th Messidor, 4th year (2d July, 1796.)

The Executive Directory, considering that, if it belongs to French loyalty to respect the treaties or conventions which assure to neutral or friendly Powers the commercial advantages, of which the result ought to be common to the contracting Powers, these same advantages, if they are turned to the benefit of our enemies, either through the feebleness of our allies or of neutrals, through fear, from views of interest, or from any other motive, would provoke, indeed, the inexecution of the articles by which they should be stipulated, decree what follows:

It shall be notified, without delay, to all the neutral or allied Powers, that the flag of the French Republic shall be used against neutral vessels, be it for the purpose of confiscation, search, or detention, (visite ou prehension) in the same manner that they suffer the English to use theirs in regard thereto.

The Minister of Foreign Relations is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall not be printed.

Decree of the Executive Directory concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, loaded with merchandise belonging to the enemies of the Republic, and the judgments on the trials relative to the validity of maritime prizes. 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797.)

The Executive Directory, having examined the law of the 9th May, 1793, which, forasmuch as the flag of neutral Powers not being respected by the enemies of the French Republic, and all the laws of nations being violated to her prejudice, it is no longer permitted to the French people to fulfil towards these Powers, in general, the wish which it has so often manifested, and which it will constantly form, for the full and entire liberty of commerce and of navigation, orders, among other things:

1. That the French vessels of war and privateers may stop and carry into the ports of the Republic neutral vessels, which may be found loaded entirely or in part with merchandise belonging to the enemy.

2. That the merchandise belonging to the enemy shall be declared good prize, and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

3. That, in all cases, the neutral vessels shall be released the moment the unloading of the merchandise seized shall have been effected; that the freight shall be paid at the rates which shall have been stipulated by the freighters, and a just indemnity shall be allowed for their detention by the tribunals whose duty it may be to take cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

4. That these tribunals shall moreover be bound to transmit, three days after their judgment, a copy of the inventory of the merchandise to the Minister of Marine, and another copy to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

5. That the present law, applicable to all prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have its effect when the enemy Powers shall have declared free and not seizable, though destined for the ports of the Republic, the merchandise loaded on board neutral vessels, which shall belong to the French Government or its citizens.

Having likewise examined the law of the 27th July, 1793, which, in maintaining that of the 9th May preceding, here above recited, orders that it should have its full and entire execution, and that, in consequence, all other regulations which may be contrary to it are and remain repealed—a repeal which evidently comprehends the law, of the 1st of the same month of July, by which the vessels of the United States of America had been excepted from the law of the 9th May, in conformity to the fifteenth article of the treaty of the 6th February, 1778.

Having also examined the seventh article of the law of the 13th Nivose, 3d year, (3d January, 1795,) which enjoins on all the agents of the Republic; on all the commandants of the armed force; on the officers, civil and military; to cause to be respected and observed, in all their arrangements, the treaties which unite France to the neutral Powers of the ancient Continent, and to the United States of America; and adds that no blow shall be aimed at those treaties, and that all regulations which may be contrary to them are annulled; considering that this last law does not derogate from that of the 9th May, 1793, save only in favor of those neutral Powers whose treaties actually subsisting with the French Republic are contrary to its regulations; that, consequently, it is important for the information, as well of the commandants of the armed force of the Republic, and of the vessels commissioned by it, as of the tribunals charged with deciding on the validity of the prizes, to take measures for preventing either that it should be supposed that treaties existed which never were made, or that treaties concluded for a limited time which is expired should be considered as still being in force, or that those which have been modified since their formation should be considered as yet requiring a literal execution; that, to this last description belongs particularly the Treaty of Amity and Commerce concluded the 6th February, 1778, between France and the United States of America; that, in effect, by the second article of this treaty, France and the United States of America mutually engage not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in relation to commerce and navigation, which does not become forthwith common to the other party; and that it is added by the same article, that this other party shall enjoy the favor gratuitously, if the grant is gratuitous, or on making the same compensation if the grant is conditional; that thus the provisions stipulated in favor of England by the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, concluded at London, 19th November, 1794, between that Power and the United States of America, are considered to have been in behalf of the French Republic itself; and in consequence modifying, in the points where they differed, the treaty concluded the 6th February, 1778; that it is agreeably to these provisions that the French Government has declared, by its decrees of the 14th and 28th Messidor, 4th year, (2d and 16th July, 1796,) as it is likewise forced to do at present, that it will use the just measures of reciprocation which it had a right to exercise in that respect, in everything which has a relation to the circumstances of the war, as also to the political, commercial, and maritime interests of the French Republic; that, consequently, it is necessary to settle, by reconciling the treaties of the 6th February, 1778, and 19th November, 1794, every doubt as to the case where this right of reciprocation ought to be exercised:

Considering that there have been quite lately raised, as to the manner of stating the proofs of property in the ships and merchandise pretended to belong to neutrals, doubts and controversies which never would have taken place if the provisions of the ancient regulations relative to this business had been better known; that it consequently is of importance to recite these provisions, and to cause to be executed the fifth article of the law of the 14th February, 1793, which has maintained them:

After having heard the Ministers of Justice, of the Marine, and of the Colonies, decrees what follows:

ART. 1. The Commissioners of the Executive Directory, near the civil tribunals of the Departments, shall take care that, on the trials as to the validity of maritime prizes, no judgment shall be founded on the seventh article of the law of the 13th Nivose, 3d year, (2d January, 1795,) unless the Minister of Justice be previously consulted, in conformity to the third article of the law of the 8th Floréal, 4th year, (27th April, 1796,) relative to the treaties in virtue of which some neutrals might pretend to withdraw themselves, by means of the first of these laws, from the execution of that of the 9th May, 1793.

ART. 2. The Minister of Justice will consequently examine if the treaties appealed to still remain in force, or whether they have been modified since their adoption. He shall be furnished, for this purpose, by the Minister of Exterior Relations, with all the information (renseignements) of which he shall be in want, and he shall refer the same to the Executive Directory, as is prescribed by the law of the 8th Floréal, 4th year, (27th April, 1796.)

ART. 3. The Executive Directory reminds all French citizens that the treaty entered into on the 6th February, 1778, between France and the United States of America, has been, from the terms of its second article, in strict right (de plein droit) modified by that which was entered into in London, on the 19th November, 1794, between the United States of America and England. In consequence, agreeably to the seventeenth article of the treaty of London of the 19th November, 1794, all merchandise belonging to an enemy, or not sufficiently proven to be neutral, loaded under the American flag, shall be confiscated; but the vessel on board of which it shall have been found shall be released and returned to the proprietor. It is enjoined on the Commissioners of the Executive Directory to cause to be accelerated, by all means in their power, the judgment on the trials which shall take place, either in relation to the validity of the capture of the cargo, or in relation to freight and demurrage, (surestaries.)

ART. 4. Agreeably to the eighteenth article of the Treaty of London of the 19th November, 1794, there shall be added the following articles to those declared contraband by the twenty-fourth article of the treaty of the 6th February, 1778, viz: wood for ship building, pitch, tar, and rosin, copper in sheets, canvass, hemp, and cordage, and everything that serves, directly or indirectly, for the armament and equipment of vessels, except unwrought iron and fir-plank. These several articles shall be confiscated whenever they shall be destined, or when it is attempted to carry them, to the enemy.

ART. 5. Agreeably to the twenty-first article of the Treaty of London of the 19th November, 1794, every individual known to be American, who holds a commission given by the enemies of France, as also every mariner of that nation making a part of the crew of private or public ships (navires ou vaisseaux) of the enemy, shall be, from that act alone, declared a pirate, and treated as such, without allowing him, in any case, to show that he had been forced by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

ART. 6. In conformity to the law of the 14th February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st October, 1744, and of the 26th July, 1778, as to the manner of proving the right of property in neutral ships and merchandise, shall be executed, according to their form and tenor.

In consequence, every American vessel shall be a good prize which has not on board a list of the crew, (rôle d'équipage), in proper form, such as is prescribed by the model annexed to the treaty of the 6th February, 1778; a compliance with which is ordered by the twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh articles of the same treaty.

ART. 7. It is enjoined on the Commissioners of the Executive Directory to call the severity of the tribunals to the fraudulent manœuvres of every ship-owner calling himself a neutral American, or other, on board a vessel in which shall be found, as has frequently been done during the present war, either maritime papers (papiers de mer) in blank, though signed and sealed, or papers, in form of letters, containing the signatures of individuals, in blank; or of double passports or sea-letters, which indicate different destinations to the vessel; or double invoices, bills of lading, or any other ship papers, which assign to the whole or to a part of the same merchandise different proprietors or different destinations.

ART. 8. From the regulations of the present decree, that of the 9th Frimaire last, (29th November, 1795,) concerning the freights and demurrage, is referred to what relates to the demurrage only.

The present decree shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws. The Ministers of the Marine and of the Colonies, of Justice, and of Foreign Relations, are charged with its execution—each one in what concerns him.

Law which determines the character of vessels from their cargo, especially those laden with English merchandise.

29TH NIVOSE, 6TH YEAR,
(18th January, 1798.)

After having heard the report of a special commission on the message of the Executive Directory of the 15th Nivose, relative to English merchandise; considering that the interest of the Republic requires the most prompt measures against all vessels which shall be loaded with it:

ART. 1. The character of vessels, in what concerns their quality as neutral or enemy, shall be decided by their cargo. In consequence, every vessel found at sea laden in whole or in part with merchandise coming (provenant) from England or her possessions, shall be declared good prize, whoever may be the proprietors of these productions or merchandise.

ART. 2. Every foreign vessel which shall, during her voyage, have entered a port of England, shall not be admitted into a port of the French Republic, save only when there is a necessity for her entering (de relâche), in which case she shall be bound to leave the said port so soon as the cause of her entering it (de sa relâche) shall have ceased.

Decree of the Executive Directory, in explanation of that of the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797,) concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, of the 28th Ventose, 7th year, (18th March, 1799.)

The Executive Directory having examined its decree of the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797,) concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, loaded with merchandise belonging to the enemies of the Republic, and the judgment on the trials as to the validity of maritime prizes; considering that the fourth article of that decree, in what relates to the rôles d'équipages with which neutral vessels ought to be furnished, has had improper interpretations, so far as concerns the rôles d'équipages of American vessels, and that it is time to do away the obstacles resulting therefrom to the navigation of the vessels of that nation.

After having heard the Minister of Exterior Relations and the Minister of Justice declare that, by the fourth article of the said decree, it was not understood that the navigation of American vessels, relatively to the form of their rôles d'équipages, was subjected to other conditions than those imposed on all neutrals by the twelfth article of the ordinance of 1744, and by the ninth article of the 26th July, 1778.

The Ministers of the Marine and of Justice, each in what concerns him, are charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of laws.

Decree of the Executive Directory as to those who compose the crews of the vessels of the enemies of France, 8th Brumaire, seventh year, (October 29, 1799.)

The Executive Directory, on the report of the Minister of Exterior Relations, considering that the squadrons, privateers, and vessels of England and Russia are in part manned by foreigners; considering that this violation is a manifest abuse of the law of nations, and that the Powers of Europe have not taken any measures to stop it, decree:

ART. 1. Every person, native (ou originaire) of friendly countries allied to the French Republic, or neutral, holding a commission given by the enemies of France, or making part of the crews of the vessels of war or other enemy vessels, shall, for that act alone, be declared a pirate, and treated as such, without being allowed in any case to allege that he was forced by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

ART. 2. The Executive Directory of the Bata-vian, Ligurian, Cisalpine, and Roman Republics, shall be informed of this measure.

ART. 3. The provisions contained in the first article shall be notified to the Powers neutral or allied to the French Republic.

Decree of the French Republic on the mode of executing its decrees of the 8th Brumaire, 7th year, (29th October, 1799,) concerning those who compose the crews of enemy vessels, 24th Brumaire, 7th year, (14th November, 1799.)

ART. 1. In execution of the third article of the decree of the Executive Directory of the 8th of this month, the allied or neutral Powers shall be invited to take the necessary measures for recalling, within a time which shall be fixed, those mariners of their respective nations, actually embarked on board the vessels of war or other vessels belonging to England.

ART. 2. The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Envoys of the Republic near the respective Powers shall receive particular instructions on this subject.

ART. 3. The period of the execution of the decree of the 8th Brumaire shall be determined by a subsequent decree.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

Art. 4. The Minister of Exterior Relations is charged to make arrangements with the Minister of Marine and the Colonies for the execution of the present decree.

Law which repeals the first article of that of 29th Nivose, 6th year, (18th January, 1798,) relative to maritime cruising.

ARTICLE 1. The first article of the law of the 29th Nivose, 6th year, (18th January, 1798,) relative to maritime cruising, is repealed.

The Consuls of the Republic order that the above law shall be published and executed, and that the seal of the Republic shall be affixed to it.

Decree of the Consuls of the Republic which puts in force the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, 29th Frimaire, 8th year, (19th December, 1800.)

The Consuls having examined the law of the 23d Frimaire, 8th year, (13th December, 1800,) which repeals the first article of the law of the 25th Nivose, 6th year, (14th January, 1798,) relative to maritime cruising; considering that the repeal of that law necessarily renews that state of the law antecedently existing:

That this, as fixed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, is considered the most proper to conciliate the interests of the Republic with the rights of neutral Powers; wishing to prevent, on the part of the French or neutral owners, (armateurs;) errors or interpretations which shall counteract the views under which the law of the 29th Nivose, 6th year, (18th January, 1798,) has been repealed, decree what follows:

ART. 1. The regulations prescribed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, shall be strictly observed by all those to whom they shall be applicable; but, in case of a contravention on their part, they are to suffer the confiscations and condemnations in damages fixed on by the said ordinance and the laws.

ART. 2. The Ministers of Justice, of the Marine, of Exterior Relations, and of the Finances, are charged, each one in what concerns him, with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

IMPERIAL CAMP, BERLIN,
November 21, 1806.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French and King of Italy, considering:

1. That England does not admit the right of nations as universally acknowledged by all civilized people;

2. That she declares as an enemy every individual belonging to an enemy State, and, in consequence, makes prisoners of war, not only the crews of armed vessels, but also of merchant vessels, and even the supercargoes of the same;

3. That she extends or applies to merchant vessels, to articles of commerce, and to the property of individuals, the right of conquest, which can only be applied or extended to what belongs to an enemy State;

4. That she extends to ports not fortified, to harbors and mouths of rivers, the right of blockade, which, according to reason and the usage of civilized nations, is applicable only to strong or fortified ports;

5. That she declares blockaded, places before which she has not a single vessel of war, although a place ought not to be considered blockaded but when it is so invested as that no approach to it can be made without imminent hazard; that she declares even places blockaded which her united forces would be incapable of doing, such as entire coasts, and a whole empire;

6. That this unequalled abuse of the right of blockade has no other object than to interrupt the communications of different nations, and to extend the commerce and industry of England upon the ruin of those of the Continent;

7. That this being the evident design of England, whoever deals on the Continent in English merchandise favors that design and becomes an accomplice;

8. That this conduct in England (worthy only of the first ages of barbarism,) has benefited her, to the detriment of other nations;

9. That it being right to oppose to an enemy the same arms she makes use of, to combat as she does, when all ideas of justice and every liberal sentiment (the result of civilization among men) are disregarded;

We have resolved to enforce against England the usages which she has consecrated in her maritime code.

The present decree shall be considered as the fundamental law of the Empire, until England has acknowledged that the rights of war are the same on the land as at sea; that it cannot be extended to any private property whatever, nor to persons who are not military, and until the right of blockade be restrained to fortified places, actually invested by competent forces.

Imperial Decree of the 21st November, 1806.

ART. 1. The British islands are declared in a state of blockade.

ART. 2. All commerce and correspondence with the British islands are prohibited. In consequence, letters or packets addressed either to England, to an Englishman, or in the English language, shall not pass through the post office, and shall be seized.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

ART. 3. Every subject of England, of what rank and condition soever, who shall be found in the countries occupied by our troops, or by those of our allies, shall be made a prisoner of war.

ART. 4. All magazines, merchandise, or property whatsoever belonging to a subject of England, shall be declared lawful prize.

ART. 5. The trade in English merchandise is forbidden. All merchandise belonging to England, or coming from its manufactories and colonies, is declared lawful prize.

ART. 6. One-half of the proceeds of the confiscation of the merchandise, and property declared good prize by the preceding articles, shall be applied to indemnify the merchants for the losses which they have suffered by the capture of merchant vessels by English cruisers.

ART. 7. No vessel coming directly from England, or from the English colonies, or having been there since the publication of the present decree, shall be received in any port.

ART. 8. Every vessel contravening the above clause, by means of a false declaration, shall be seized, and the vessel and cargo confiscated as if they were English property.

ART. 9. Our Tribunal of Prizes at Paris is charged with the definitive adjudication of all controversies which may arise within our Empire, or in the countries occupied by the French army, relative to the execution of the present decree. Our Tribunal of Prizes at Milan shall be charged with the definitive adjudication of the said controversies, which may arise within the extent of our Kingdom of Italy.

ART. 10. The present decree shall be communicated by our Minister of Exterior Relations to the Kings of Spain, of Naples, of Holland, of Etruria, and to our allies, whose subjects, like ours, are the victims of the injustice and the barbarism of the English maritime laws.

Our Ministers of Exterior Relations, of War, of Marine, of Finances, of Police, and our Post-masters General, are charged each in what concerns him with the execution of the present decree.

PARIS, December 26.

IMPERIAL DECREE.—Rejoinder to His Britannic Majesty's Order in Council of the 11th of November, 1807.

AT OUR ROYAL PALACE AT MILAN,
December 17, 1807.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and Protector of the Rhenish Confederation:

Observing the measures adopted by the British Government, on the 11th November last, by which vessels belonging to neutral, friendly, or even Powers the allies of England, are made liable, not only to be searched by English cruisers, but to be compulsorily detained in England, and to have a tax laid on them of so much per cent. on the cargo, to be regulated by the British Legislature:

Observing that, by these acts, the British Government denationalizes ships of every nation in Europe; that it is not competent for any Government to detract from its own independence and rights, all the Sovereigns of Europe having in trust the sovereignties and independence of the flag; that if, by an unpardonable weakness, and which in the eyes of posterity would be an indelible stain, if such a tyranny was allowed to be established into principles, consecrated by usage, the English would avail themselves of it to assert it as a right, as they have availed themselves of the tolerance of Government to establish the infamous principle that the flag of a nation does not cover goods and to have to their right of blockade an arbitrary extension, and which infringes on the sovereignty of every State; we have decreed and do decree as follows:

ART. 1. Every ship, to whatever nation it may belong, that shall have submitted to be searched by an English ship, or to a voyage to England, or shall have paid any tax whatsoever to the English Government, is thereby, and for that alone, declared to be denationalized, to have forfeited the protection of its King, and to have become English property.

ART. 2. Whether the ships thus denationalized by the arbitrary measures of the English Government enter into our ports, or those of our allies, or whether they fall into the hands of our ships of war, or of our privateers, they are declared to be good and lawful prize.

ART. 3. The British islands are declared to be in a state of blockade, both by land and sea. Every ship, of whatever nation, or whatsoever the nature of its cargo may be, that sails from the ports of England, or those of the English colonies, and of the countries occupied by English troops, and proceeding to England, or to the English colonies, or to countries occupied by English troops, is good and lawful prize, as contrary to the present decree, and may be captured by our ships of war, or our privateers, and adjudged to the captor.

ART. 4. These measures, which are resorted to only in just retaliation of the barbarous system adopted by England, which assimilates its legislation to that of Algiers, shall cease to have any effect with respect to all nations who shall have the firmness to compel the English Government to respect their flag. They shall continue to be rigorously in force as long as that Government does not return to the principle of the law of nations, which regulates the relations of civilized States in a state of war. The provisions of the present decree shall be abrogated and null, in fact, as soon as the English abide again by the principles of the law of nations, which are also the principles of justice and of honor.

All our Ministers are charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

PARIS, April 23, 1808.

Orders were given on the 17th instant, and received yesterday at the imperial custom-house here, "to seize all American vessels now in the ports of France, or which may come into them hereafter."

April 25, 1808.

Postscript.—I have this moment received the following explanation of the above-mentioned order, viz: That it directs the seizure of vessels coming into ports of France after its own date, "because no vessel of the United States can now navigate the seas, without infracting a law of the said States, and thus furnishing a presumption that they do so on British account, or in British connexion."

Considering that the laws, as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandises;

Considering, that notwithstanding the complaints of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic near the United States of North America, of which he has informed us by his letter of the 2d July, 1796; those States, and especially Virginia, have fitted out vessels, loaded with horses, for the English;

Decree, that from this day forward, all vessels loaded with merchandises, designated by the name of contraband, as arms, instruments, munitions of war, of what kind soever, horses and their furniture, shall be stopped by the ships of war and privateers, to be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

DECRET.

The Special Agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands:

Considering that the ports of the Windward and Leeward islands, as well as those of Demarara, Essequibo, and Berbice, delivered up to the English, occupied and defended by emigrants, are in a state of regular siege, and not entitled to the same advantages as the ports of the different English colonies, possessed by that Power before the war, or to other rights;

Considering that it is against every principle to treat a horde of insurgents, destitute of country, without government, and without a flag, with the same respect as civilized nations preserve towards each other during a war;

Considering that, by the authentic acts which are in our possession, it is proved that the divers places of the colonies delivered up to the English by the rebel Frenchmen and Batavians, no more belong to the British Government than La Vendee, in which the English Ministry had, in like manner, mercenary troops under pay; some regiments clad in the same uniform as those of England; considering that, in virtue of the second article of the Treaty of Alliance, concluded at Paris on the 6th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, the former Power engaged to defend the American possessions in case of war; and that the Government and the commerce of the United States have strangely abused the forbearance of the Republic of France, in turning to its injury the favors granted to them of trading in all the ports of the French colonies;

That, by permitting neutral vessels any longer to carry provisions of war and of subsistence to men evidently in a state of rebellion, would be to prolong civil war, and the calamities and crimes following therefrom, decree as follows:

ART. 1. The ships of the Republic and French privateers are authorized to capture and conduct into the ports of the Republic, neutral vessels destined for the Windward and Leeward islands of America, delivered up to the English, and occupied and defended by the emigrants. These ports are Martinico, St. Lucia, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo; and at the Leeward, Port-au-Prince, St. Marks l'Archaye, and Jeremie.

ART. 2. Every armed vessel, having a commission from either of the said ports, shall be reputed a pirate, and the crews adjudged and punished as such.

ART. 3. The vessels and cargoes described in the first and second articles are declared good prize, and shall be sold for the benefit of the captors.

ART. 4. Every captured vessel, which shall have cleared out, under the vague denomination of West Indies, is comprehended in the first and second articles.

ART. 5. The decree of the 4th of last Nivose, in pursuance of the resolution of the Executive Directory of the 14th Messidor, fourth year, shall be executed till further orders, as far as shall not be contravened by the present decree.

Great Britain, France, and Spain.

This decree shall be printed, transcribed in the register of the criminal and commercial tribunals, sent to all the French colonial ports, read, published, and posted up, wherever it may be necessary. It shall be notified officially to the neutral Governments of St.-Croix, St. Thomas, and St. Bartholomew's.

Enjoining the criminal and commercial tribunals of Gundaloupe, their delegates in the different French colonies and elsewhere, the Rear-Admiral Commandant on the West India station, and the head of the Administration, to aid in executing the present decree, each in his respective department.

The Commission resolves, that the captains of French national vessels and privateers are authorized to stop and bring into the ports of the colony American vessels bound to English ports, or coming from the said ports.

The vessels which are already taken, or shall be hereafter, shall remain in the ports of the colony until it shall be otherwise ordered.

PASCAL.

L. Ferrand, General of Brigade, Commander-in-Chief of St. Domingo, acting as Captain General, and a member of the Legion of Honor.

Experience has, for too much time, taught the General that all kind of regard and modification towards those scoundrels who maintain the rebellion in Hispaniola, by furnishing everything necessary to the rebels, against the will and approbation of their respective Governments, and who, by those acts of cupidity, dishonor the flags they sail under; and finding the necessity of putting a stop to rapacity, and to treat them as pirates, has proclaimed and proclaims:

ART. 1. All individuals whomsoever found on board of any vessel or vessels, allies, or neutrals, bound to any ports in Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, shall suffer death.

Those found on board of any vessel, allies, or neutrals, coming out of any ports in Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, on board of allies or neutrals, shall suffer death.

ART. 2. The General informs, that all prisoners made in those different cases shall be brought into one of the ports of Hispaniola occupied by the French, to be tried by military commission, which is to pronounce sentence.

ART. 3. This proclamation shall be put into execution on the 1st Floréal, (21st April;) and, until that time, all the preceding proclamations, in order to prevent all kinds of communication with the coast of Hispaniola occupied by the rebels, shall be strictly executed.

ART. 4. Of this present proclamation, registered at the colonial inspection, one hundred copies are printed, published, and posted up in all the chief places around the east part of Hispaniola, and all necessary steps shall be taken to its publicity in all the islands and continent of America.

Done at the headquarters of the General of St. Domingo, the 16th Pluviose, year the 13th, (5th February, 1805.)

The General Commander-in-Chief, acting as Captain General, and member of the Legion of Honor.

Copy of a letter from the Secretary of State of His Catholic Majesty to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid:

ARANJUEZ, February 15, 1800.

SIR: The King, wishing to lessen as much as possible the evils resulting to the nation from the scandalous traffic which many of his subjects carry on with Gibraltar by means of neutral vessels, and making use of just reprisals against the enemies of his Crown, who have declared the ports of Cadiz and St. Lucar de Barrameda blockaded, His Majesty has thought proper to declare that, from this day, he should consider Gibraltar as blockaded; and that, under this view, all captures of neutral vessels going to the said place should be held as legitimate; for which purpose, and that ignorance may not be pleaded, His Majesty has commanded me to communicate this declaration for the information and government of your Court.

I place myself at your disposition, and pray God to preserve your life many years.

M. LUIS DE URQUEJO.

[Translation.]

ARANJUEZ, February 19, 1807.

By the greatest outrage against humanity and against policy, Spain was forced by Great Britain to take part in the present war. This Power has exercised over the sea and over the commerce of the world an exclusive dominion. Her numerous factories, disseminated through all countries, are like sponges which imbibe the riches of those countries, without leaving them more than the appearances of mercantile liberty. From this maritime and commercial despotism England derives immense resources for carrying on a war whose object is to destroy the commerce which belongs to each State from its industry and situation. Experience has proven that the morality of the British Cabinet has no hesitation as to the means, so long as they lead to the accomplishment of its designs; and whilst this Power can continue to enjoy the fruits of its immense traffic, humanity will groan under the weight of a desolating war. To put an end to this, and to attain a solid peace, the Emperor of the French and King of Italy issued a decree on the 21st of November last, in which, adopting the principle of reprisals, the blockade of the British isles is determined on; and his Ambassador, his Excellency Francis de Beauharnois, Grand Dignitary of the Order of the Iron Crown, of the Legion of Honor, &c., having communicated this decree to the King our master, and His Majesty being desirous to co-operate by means sanctioned by the rights of reciprocity, has been pleased to authorize His Most Serene Highness the Prince Generalissimo of the Marine to issue a circular of the following tenor:

As soon as England committed the horrible outrage of intercepting the vessels of the royal marine, insidiously violating the good-faith with which peace assures individual property and the rights of nations, His Majesty considered himself in a state of war with that Power, although his royal soul suspended the promulgation of the manifesto, until he saw the atrocity committed by its seamen sanctioned by the Government of London. From that time, and without the necessity of warning the inhabitants of these Kingdoms of the circumspection with which they ought to conduct themselves towards those of a country which disregards the sacred laws of property and the rights of nations, His Majesty made known to his subjects the state of war in which he found himself with that nation. All trade, all commerce, is prohibited in such a situation, and no sentiments ought to be entertained towards such an enemy which are not dictated by honor, avoiding all intercourse which might be considered as the vital effect of avarice, operating on the subjects of a nation, which degrades itself in them. His Majesty is well persuaded that such sentiments of honor are rooted in the hearts of his beloved subjects; but he does not choose, on that account, to allow the smallest indulgence to the violators of the law, nor permit that, through their ignorance, they should be taken by surprise, authorizing me by these presents to declare that all English property will be confiscated whenever it is found on board a vessel, although a neutral, if the consignment belongs to Spanish individuals. So, likewise, will be confiscated all merchandise which may be met with, although it may be in neutral vessels, whenever it is destined for the ports of England or her isles. And, finally, His Majesty, conforming himself to the ideas of his ally the Emperor of the French, declares in his States the same law which, from principles of reciprocity and suitable respect, His Imperial Majesty promulgated under date of the 21st of November, 1806.

The execution of this determination of His Majesty belongs to the chiefs of provinces, of departments, and of vessels (bazels;) and, communicating it to them in the name of His Majesty, I hope they will leave no room for his royal displeasure.

God preserve you many years.

THE PRINCE OF MARINE.

His Majesty has been pleased to issue the following Royal Decree:

JANUARY 3, 1808.

The abominable outrage committed by the English vessels of war in the year 1804, by the express order of their Government, on four frigates of my royal navy, which, navigating under the full security of peace, were iniquitously surprised, attacked, and captured, determined me to break off all connexion with the British Cabinet, and to consider myself in a state of war with a Power which had so unjustly violated the laws of nations and of humanity.

An aggression so atrocious gave me a sufficient motive to break all those ties which unite one nation to another, even if I had not considered what I owed to myself and to the honor and glory of my Crown, and of my beloved subjects. Two years of war had passed without producing, on the part of Great Britain, a diminution of her pride, or a renunciation of the unjust domination which she exercised over the sea; on the contrary, confounding her friends with her enemies and with neutrals, she has manifested her decided will to treat all with the same tyranny. Under these considerations, I determined, in February of the last year, conforming myself to the wise measures adopted by my intimate ally the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, to declare, as I did declare, the British isles in a state of blockade, to see if, by this step, I could convince the British Cabinet that it ought to renounce its unjust domination over the sea, and resolve on making a solid and durable peace. Far from this; not only has it rejected the propositions which have been made to it on the part of my intimate ally the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, as well those made by himself as those made through the medium of several Powers, friends of England; but, having committed the greatest atrocity and piracy, in the scandalous attack on the city and port of Copenhagen, it has thrown off the mask in such a way that no one can doubt that its insatiable ambition aspires to the exclusive commerce and navigation of every sea. Nothing proves it more than the measures which it has just adopted, under date of the 11th November last, not only declaring all the coasts of France, of Spain, of their allies, and those occupied by the arms of the one or the other Power, in a state of blockade, but subjecting the vessels of neutral Powers, friends, and even allies of England, not only to be searched by English cruisers, but likewise to touch, contrary to their will, at an English port, and also subjecting them to the arbitrary payment of a certain per centage on their cargoes, as may be determined by the English Legislature. Authorized, then, by the just right of reciprocity, to take those measures which may seem to me proper to prevent the abuse which the British Cabinet is making of its forces with respect to the neutral flag, and to see if, in this way, a renunciation of so unjust a tyranny can be obtained, I have come to the determination to adopt, and I will that there be adopted in all my dominions, the same measures which my intimate ally, the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, has adopted; and they are as follows:

Considering that, by the act abovementioned of the 11th November last, the British Cabinet has denationalized the vessels of all the nations of Europe, and that it is not at the discretion of any Government to accommodate (transiger) as to its independence and its rights, all the sovereigns of Europe being guarantees of the sovereignty and of the independence of their flags; and that, if, through an unpardonable weakness, which would be an indelible stain in the eyes of posterity, such tyranny should be suffered to be laid down as a principle, and consecrated by use, the English would take it as granted to establish it as a right, in the same way that they have availed themselves of the tolerance of Governments to establish the infamous principle that the flag does not cover the merchandise, and to give to its right of blockade an arbitrary extension aimed at the sovereignty of all States, I have decreed, and do decree as follows:

ART. 1. Every vessel, of whatever nation she may be, which may have been visited (visitado) by an English ship, or may have submitted to touch at a port of England, or may have paid any duty to the English Government, is, from that act, declared to be denationalized, loses the protection of its flag, and makes itself English property.

ART. 2. The vessels so denationalized by the arbitrary measures of the British Government, whether they enter into our ports, or enter those of our allies, or whether they fall into the possession of our ships of war or our privateers, are good and valid prize.

ART. 3. The British isles are declared in a state of blockade, as well by sea as by land. Every vessel, of whatever nation she may be, whatever may be her cargo, dispatched (expedido) from the ports of England, or of the English colonies, or from the countries occupied by the English troops, will be a good prize, as contravening this decree, will be liable to capture by our ships of war or by our privateers, and will be adjudged to the captor.

These measures, which are nothing more than a just reciprocation of the barbarous system adopted by the English Government, which assimilates its legislation to that of Algiers, will cease to have effect on all those nations who know how to oblige the English Government to respect their flag, and will continue in full force until the English Government return to the adoption of those principles of the law of nations which establish the relations of civilized States in time of war.

The dispositions of the present decree will be revoked and have no effect so soon as the English Government shall have returned to the adoption of those principles of the law of nations, which are equally those of justice and of honor.

You will keep this in mind, and communicate it to those to whom belongs its execution.

Signed with the royal hand of His Majesty at Aranjuez, on the 3d of January, 1808.

PEDRO CEVALLOS.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

[Communicated to the Senate, Dec. 16, 1808.]

In obedience to the directions of the act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following report and estimates:

The net revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage, which accrued during the year 1806, amounted to - - - $16,615,430

And that which accrued during the year 1807 amounted, as will appear by the statement A, to - - - 16,059,924

The same revenue, after deducting that portion which arose from the duty on salt, and from the additional duties constituting the Mediterranean fund, amounted, during the year 1806, to - - - 14,848,784

And during the year 1807, to - - 14,375,855

But it is ascertained that the net revenue which accrued during the three first quarters of the year 1808, did not exceed eight millions of dollars, and is daily decreasing.

The statement B exhibits in detail the several species of merchandise, and other sources, from which that revenue was collected during the year 1807.

It appears by the statement C, that the sales of the public lands have, during the year, ending the 30th September, 1808, amounted to about 200,000 acres; and the payments by purchasers to near $550,000. The proceeds of sales in the Mississippi Territory, being, after deducting the surveying and other incidental expenses, appropriated, in the first place, to the payment of a sum of $1,250,000, to the State of Georgia, are distinctly stated.

It appears, by the statement D, that the payments on account of the principal of the public debt have, during the same period, amounted to only $2,335,000. But the payments from the Treasury, for the annual reimbursement of the six per cent. and deferred stocks, and for the final reimbursement of the eight per cent. stock, will (exclusively of a sum of $730,000, already in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund) amount, during the last quarter of this year, to $5,376,000; making the total of public debt reimbursed, from the 1st of April, 1801, to the first of January, 1809, about thirty-three millions six hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of more than six millions, paid during the same period, in conformity with the provisions of the treaty and convention with Great Britain, and of the Louisiana convention.

The public debt will, on the 1st day of January, 1809, amount to $56,647,663; consisting of the following items:

Old six per cent. stock, nominal amount $20,706,603 22, unredeemed - - - - -	$11,919,877 57
Deferred stock, nominal amount $11,717,476 92, unredeemed - - - - -	9,386,627 08
New six per cent. stock, exchanged at par for old six and deferred - - - - -	5,993,343 50
New six per cent. stock, arising from conversion of three per cent. stock, at 65 new six, for 100 three per cent. stock - - - - -	1,859,770 70
1796, six per cent. stock - - - - -	80,000 00
Louisiana do. - - - - -	11,250,000 00
Total six per cent. stock - - - - -	$40,489,618 85
Three per cent. stock - - - - -	16,158,044 42
	$56,647,663 27

The interest on the whole debt, and the annual reimbursement on the six per cent. and deferred stocks, will, for the ensuing year, amount to $4,226,000, leaving, in order to complete the annual appropriation of $8,000,000, a sum of $3,774,000, applicable to the reimbursement of the new exchanged six per cent. stock. The whole of that and of the other new six per cent., arising from the conversion of three per cent. stock, amounting together to $7,853,000, would thus be reimbursed within two years. And after the 1st day of January, 1811, the whole annual amount payable on account of interest and annual reimbursement, could not, during the seven ensuing years, exceed $3,756,000. But, under existing circumstances, it is believed that the reimbursement of that new six per cent. stock will be nominal, and must be effected by incurring a new debt, to an equal amount.

The actual receipts into the Treasury, during the year ending on the 30th September, 1808, as they principally arose from the revenue accrued during the preceding year, (and the payments on account of drawback having been diminished by the embargo,) have been greater than those of any preceding year, and amounted to

And the specie in the Treasury, on 1st October, 1807, amounted to - - - - -	8,529,573 08
Making together - - - - -	$26,481,992 98

The disbursements, during the same period, have amounted to $12,635,275 46; consisting of the following items:

Civil department, and miscellaneous expenses - - - - -	$1,268,967 18
Foreign intercourse, and payment of American claims, assumed by the Louisiana convention - - - - -	406,499 37
Military and Indian departments, including fortifications and the expenses of the new army - - - - -	3,023,759 55
Naval Department, including the appropriation of $877,064 47, to cover the deficit of the preceding year - - - - -	2,267,064 47
Public debt, principal and interest (the greater part of the payments for the year 1808 falling, as already stated, in the last quarter) have amounted only to - - - - -	5,688,984 89
	12,635,275 46
Leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 30th September, 1808, of - - - - -	13,846,717 52
	$26,481,992 98

The cash in the hands of collectors and receivers, and the outstanding revenue bonds, which will almost altogether fall due prior to the first of January, 1810, may, after deducting the debentures yet unpaid, and the expenses of collection, be estimated to have amounted, on the 30th September, 1808, to - - - - - $10,500,000

Making, together with the balance in the Treasury on that day, of - - - - - 13,846,000

An aggregate of - - - - - $24,346,000

Although the expenses of the present quarter cannot at present be precisely ascertained, they will not, including the reimbursement of $5,376,000, on account of the principal of the public debt, exceed - - - - - 8,346,000

Leaving, on the 1st day of January, 1809, a sum of - - - - - $16,000,000

Sixteen millions of dollars, in cash or bonds, payable during the year 1809, and applicable to the expenses of that year. It is presumed that the receipts arising from importations and payments for lands, subsequent to the 30th September, 1808, will not be greater than the deductions on account of bad debts, and of the extension of credit on certain articles.

The expenses of the year 1809 would, according to the appropriations already made, and to the usual annual estimates, amount to thirteen millions of dollars, consisting of the following items:

1. Civil list and miscellaneous expenses - - - - -	$900,000
2. Foreign intercourse - - - - -	200,000

State of the Finances.

3. Grants by Congress, and other miscellaneous unforeseen demands -	150,000
4. Military and Indian Departments,	2,736,000
5. Naval Department - - - -	1,014,000
6. Annual appropriation for the public debt - - - - -	8,000,000
	$13,000,000
	$13,000,000

Leaving a surplus of only three millions of dollars for defraying all the expenses for fortifications, military stores, increase of the army and navy, or otherwise incident to a state of actual war, or of preparations for war.

The annual appropriation on account of the public debt, amounting to eight millions, and the interest for the year 1809, being less than three millions of dollars, an authority to borrow five millions would only create a new debt equal to the principal of old debt reimbursed, during that year, and appears sufficient to provide for any deficiency arising from extraordinary expenses which may be thus authorized by Congress.

It thus appears, that, notwithstanding the general warfare of the belligerent Powers against neutral nations, and the consequent suspension of commerce which took place in the latter end of the year 1807, and notwithstanding the increased rate of expenditure naturally arising from that state of things, the ordinary revenue will have been sufficient to defray all the expenses of the years 1808 and 1809, including, for 1808, a reimbursement of debt exceeding six millions of dollars, and without making any addition to that debt in 1809. The measures necessary to be adopted, in order to make a timely provision for the service of the ensuing years, depend on the course which the United States will pursue in relation to foreign aggressions. And that being yet unascertained, it becomes necessary to examine the several alternatives left to the choice of Congress.

Either the navigation of the ocean will be abandoned by the United States, or it will be resumed.

The first supposition is that of a continuance of the embargo of the vessels of the United States, and admits of two alternatives:

1. Either a provision, generally forbidding exportations, may continue to make part of the system, in which case importations, whether expressly interdicted or not, must, for want of means of payment, be also discontinued.

2. Or exportations and corresponding importations may be permitted in foreign vessels.

The second supposition also offers two, and only two alternatives. It may, indeed, be admitted, that the decrees of France can be enforced only in her own territories, and in those of her allies; that, however efficient in preventing any commerce between the United States and herself, those decrees cannot materially affect that between her enemies and the United States; and may, therefore, in that respect, be disregarded. But Great Britain having the means of enforcing her orders on the ocean, the navigation of that element cannot be resumed without encountering those orders; and they must either be submitted to or resisted. There can be no middle way between the two courses.

3. Either America must accept the portion of commerce allotted to her by the British edicts, and abandon all that is forbidden—and it is not material whether this be done by legal provisions, limiting the commerce of the United States to the permitted places—or by acquiescing in the capture of vessels stepping beyond the prescribed bounds.

4. Or the nation must oppose force to the execution of the orders of England; and this, however done, and by whatever name called, will be war.

Of those four alternatives, the second and third differ neither in principle nor in their effect on the revenue. As both plans consist in permitting partial exportations and importations, it must be acknowledged that, objectionable as that course may be in other respects, if considered merely in relation to the fiscal concerns of the Union, it will, for the moment, be attended with less difficulties than either the present system or war. For, however narrow the limits to which, on that plan, the exportations and importations of the United States may be reduced, yet there will still be some commerce, and some revenue arising from commerce. And, as in pursuing that humble path, means of defence will become unnecessary, as there will be no occasion for either an army or a navy, it is believed that there would be no difficulty in reducing the public expenditures to a rate corresponding with the fragments of impost which might still be collected. If that course be adopted, no other provision seems necessary than an immediate reduction of expenses.

The system now in force, and war, however dissimilar in some respects, are both considered as resistance. Nor is it believed that their effect on national wealth and public revenue would be materially different. In either case, a portion, and a portion only, of the national industry and capital, heretofore employed in the production, transportation, and exchange of agricultural products, or in the foreign carrying trade, can immediately be diverted to other objects. In case of a continuance of the embargo and non-exportation, either a less quantity of commodities must be produced, or a portion will accumulate until the freedom of commerce shall be restored. In case of war, that surplus will be exported; and although a part must be lost by capture, a portion of the returns will be received. If the embargo and suspension of commerce shall be continued, the revenue arising from commerce will, in a short time, entirely disappear. In case of war, some part of that revenue will remain; but it will be absorbed by the increase of public expenditure. In either case, new resources, to an amount yet unascertained, must be resorted to. But the assertion that that amount will be nearly the same, in either of the two alternatives of embargo or war, is correct only on the supposition that the embargo and non-exportation are, after a certain time, to be superseded by war, unless foreign aggression shall cease; and that rendering therefore preparations for war necessary, they require a rate of expenditure far beyond that of a peace establishment.

If, however, the embargo and non-intercourse are to have equal continuance with the belligerent edicts, indefinite as that is; if it be determined to rely exclusively on that measure, and, at all events, not to risk a war on account of those aggressions; preparations for war will become useless, and the extraordinary expenses need not be incurred. In that case, the expenditure for the year 1809 ought not to exceed the sum of thirteen millions of dollars, which, as has been stated, is requisite for the support of the present establishment. And this would leave for the service of the year 1810, the above-mentioned surplus of three millions, and the proposed loan of five millions, which, together, would be sufficient to defray the Peace Establishment, and to pay the interest on the public debt during that year. Thus two years more would be provided for, without either increasing the public debt or laying any new taxes. It is certainly only with a view to war, either immediate or contemplated, that it will become necessary to resort, at least to any considerable extent, to extraordinary sources of supply.

Legitimate resources can be derived only from loans or taxes; and the reasons which induce a belief that loans should be principally relied on in case of war, were stated in the annual report of last year. That opinion has been corroborated by every subsequent view which has been taken of the subject, as well as by the present situation of the country. The embargo has brought into, and kept in the United States, almost all the floating property of the nation. And whilst the depreciated value of domestic products increases the difficulty of raising a considerable revenue by internal taxes, at no former time has there been so much specie, so much redundant unemployed capital, in the country. The high price of public stocks, and, indeed, of all species of stocks, the reduction of the public debt, the unimpaired credit of the General Government, and the large amount of existing bank stock in the United States, leave no doubt of the practicability of obtaining the necessary loans on reasonable terms.

The geographical situation of the United States, their history since the Revolution, and, above all, present events, remove every apprehension of frequent wars. It may, therefore, be confidently expected, that a revenue derived solely from duties on importations, though necessarily impaired by war, will always be amply sufficient, during long intervals of peace, not only to defray current expenses, but also to reimburse the debt contracted during the few periods of war.

No internal taxes, either direct or indirect, are therefore, contemplated, even in the case of hostilities carried on against the two great belligerent Powers. Exclusively of the authority which must, from time to time, be given to borrow the sums required, (always providing for the reimbursement of such loans within limited periods,) and of a due economy in the several branches of expenditure, nothing more appears necessary than such modifications, and increase of the duties on importations, as are naturally suggested by existing circumstances.

1. Although importations have already considerably diminished, and may, under the system now in force, shortly be altogether discontinued, no reasonable objection is perceived against an increase of duties on such as may still take place. Had the duties been doubled on the 1st of January 1808, as was then suggested, in case of war, the receipts into the Treasury, during that and the ensuing year, would have been increased nine or ten millions of dollars. Those articles of most universal consumption, on which an increase of duty would be inconvenient, are generally either free of duty or abundant.

It is, therefore, proposed, that not only the Mediterranean duties, which will expire on the 1st day of January next, should be continued, but that all the existing duties should be doubled on importations, subsequent to that day.

2. The present system of drawbacks also appears susceptible of modifications. The propriety of continuing generally that provision of the embargo laws, which allows a drawback on articles exported more than one year after they have been imported, is doubtful. A modification might check speculations and monopolies. The diminution of importations has afforded sufficient profits on most of the articles which had been imported; and a provision which would have a tendency to bring into market, and to lessen the price of those articles, would be generally beneficial.

3. The causes which induced the adoption of a partial non-importation act, have ceased to exist. The object then in view, has merged into a far more important one. The selection of interdicted articles was founded on the possibility of obtaining them in other countries than England, and does not agree with existing circumstances. The act producing now no other effect than to increase the temptations, and to produce habits of smuggling, impairs and injures the revenue. A general non-intercourse with that country would supersede that partial measure, and might be executed with greater facility. And, it is believed that, under every event, its repeal will be beneficial, and that a permanent increase of duties on articles selected with the view to those which may be manufactured in the United States, would be preferable.

4. It is believed that the present system of accountability of the military and naval establishment, may be rendered more prompt and direct, and is susceptible of improvements, which, without embarrassing the public service, will have a tendency more effectually to check any abuses by subordinate agents. Provisions to that effect are rendered more necessary by the probable increase of expense in those departments.

All which is respectfully submitted

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4, 1809.

The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress as follows:

That the measures which have been authorized by the Board, subsequent to their report of the 5th of February, 1808, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Board, dated the third day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as part of this report.

J. MILLEDGE, Pres. Sen., pro tem.

A. GALLATIN, Sec'y Treasury.

C. A. RODNEY, Attorney General.

Hon. PRESIDENT of the Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 3, 1809.

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund—

That the balance remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1806, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, which balance, as appears by the statement B, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to - - - $1,896,358 10

Together with the disbursements made during the year 1807, out of the Treasury, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, which disbursements, as appears by the statement C, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to - - - 6,347,465 84

And with a further sum, arising from a profit on the remittances from America to Europe, purchased in the year 1807, which profit, as appears by the statement D, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to - - - 9,427 58

And amounting, altogether, to - - - $8,243,251 52

Have been accounted for in the following manner:

1. There was repaid into the Treasury, during the year 1807, on account of the principal of protested bills of exchange, of moneys heretofore advanced for the payment of interest and reimbursement of the funded domestic debt, and of moneys advanced for the purchase of stock, as appears by the statement E, annexed to the last annual report - - - $61,189 66

2. The sums actually applied, during the same year, to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, as ascertained by accounts rendered to the Treasury Department, amount, as will appear by the statement A, viz:

1. Paid in reimbursement of the principal of the debt - $3,737,168 97

2. Paid on account of the interest and charges on the same 3,634,174 80
7,361,343 77

3. The balance remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1807, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, as ascertained by accounts rendered to the Treasury Department, amounted, as will appear by the statement B, to - - - 826,718 09
$8,243,251 52

That, during the year 1808, the following disbursements were made out of the Treasury, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, viz:

1. On account of the reimbursement and interest of the domestic debt - - - $2,405,621 29

2. On account of the domestic unfunded debt - - - 49 20

3. On account of the principal and interest of the foreign debt, and of the interest on the Louisiana stock, and on exchange and converted stocks, payable in Europe - - - 924,343 11

Amounting, altogether, as will appear by the annexed list of warrants C, to - - - $10,330,013 60

Which disbursements were made out of the following funds, viz:

1. From the balance remaining unexpended at the end of the year 1807, of the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars for that year, which was paid at the Treasury, out of the proceeds of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, and which balance, as stated in the last annual report, amounted to - - - $711,529 81

2. From the funds constituting the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars, for 1808, viz:

From the fund arising from the interest on the debt transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, as per statement I $1,035,028 93

From the funds arising from the sale, of public lands, being the amount paid into the Treasury from the 1st of October, 1807, to 30th September, 1808, as per statement K - 600,508 29

From the proceeds of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported, and on the tonnage of vessels - - - 6,364,462 78

Amounting, altogether, to - - - 8,000,000 00

3. From the proceeds of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, advanced in part, and on account of the annual appropriation for the year 1809 - - - - -	1,547,301 48

4. From repayments into the Treasury, on account of remittances purchased for providing for the foreign debt, and of advances made to Commissioners of Loans, and agents for the purchase of stock, as will appear by the statement E, viz :
Repayment of principal advanced from the Treasury - - - - -	$68,795 11
Damages and interest recovered - - - - -	2,366 70
	71,161 81
5. From the moneys appropriated by law, for paying commissions to agents employed in the purchase of remittances, for the Dutch debt, (the commissions, for the purchase of remittances on account of interest on Louisiana stock, and on exchanged and converted stocks, payable in Europe, having been paid out of the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars,) being the amount paid at the Treasury, during the year 1808, for that object, as will appear by the statement C - - - - -	20 50
	10,380,013 60
That the abovementioned disbursements, together with the above stated balance, which remained unexpended at the close of the year 1807, of - - - - -	820,718 09
Amounting altogether, to - - - - -	11,150,731 69
Will be accounted for in the next annual report, in conformity with the accounts which shall then have been rendered to the Treasury Department.
That, in the meanwhile, the manner in which the said sum has been applied is estimated as follows :
1. The repayments into the Treasury, on account of principal, have, during the year 1808, amounted, as by the above mentioned statement E, to - - - - -	68,795 11
2. The sums actually applied, during the year 1808, to the principal and interest of the public debt, are estimated as follows :
1st. Paid in reimbursement of the principal of the public debt - - - - -	$6,986,963 40
2d. Paid on account of interest and charges on the same - - - - -	3,434,531 09
	10,421,494 49
As will appear by the estimate F.
3. The balance which remained unexpended at the close of the year 1808, and applicable to payments falling due after that year, is estimated, as per estimate G, at - - - - -	660,442 09
	$11,150,731 69

That, in conformity with the proceedings and resolutions of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, of the 23d of March, 1807, a copy whereof, marked M, was annexed to the last annual report, a further sum of eight per cent. stock was purchased during the year 1808, amounting to $190,000, for $193,100 specie, as will appear by the statement L.

That, in pursuance of the act of February 11, 1807, books were opened on the 1st day of July, 1807, at the several loan offices, and at the Treasury, and continued open until the 17th day of March, 1808, for the reception of subscriptions of the old six per cent., deferred, and three per cent. stocks, and the issue of new six per cent. stocks in lieu thereof, and agents were appointed to receive subscriptions of the same at London and Amsterdam, pursuant to the fourth section of the said act.

That the amount of old stocks surrendered, and new stocks issued, in consequence of these subscriptions, is exhibited in the annexed statement M, by which it appears that there were surrendered—

Certificates of old six per cent. stock, of the nominal amount of - - - - - $7,435,767 61

Certificates of deferred six per cent. stock, of the nominal amount of - - - - - 1,940,672 01

In lieu of which certificates of exchanged stock for the unredeemed amount of the said certificates of old six per cent. and deferred stocks, were issued, amounting to - - - - - 6,294,051 12

And there were surrendered certificates of three per cent. stock, amounting to - - - - - 2,861,309 15

In lieu of which certificates of converted stock were issued, amounting to - - - - - 1,859,850 70

And that the statement H exhibits the amount of stock transferred to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and to the Treasurer of the United States, in trust for said States, to the 31st of December, 1808, including the sum of $272 35, transferred in the year 1808, in payment for public lands.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

ACCOUNTABILITY IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 25, 1809.]

Mr. GILLES communicated the following letter and statement from the Secretary of the Navy :

February 25, 1809.

SIR: The enclosed is a hasty sketch of the ideas suggested to me in reading the bill before the Senate entitled "A bill further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments."

Respectfully,
R. SMITH.

Warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Navy upon the Treasurer of the United States, do, at this time, and for many years have, specified the particular appropriation or appropriations to which the same should be charged. This is the established usage of the Navy Department, and there are to it but a few exceptions, in cases of inevitable necessity, wherein bills have been drawn to defray contingent expenses, incurred on a distant station.

The moneys paid by virtue of such warrants, are charged in the books of the Accountant of the Navy, in such manner and form as the Treasury Department have, and from to time may prescribe, the Accountant of the Navy having ever considered himself, as to the forms of keeping his accounts, altogether under the controlling superintendency of the Treasury Department.

It is, at present, the duty of all navy agents to make their requisitions upon the Navy Department, for moneys, agreeably to the specifications of the appropriation law, and to render, monthly, distinct accounts of the application of all moneys, according to the appropriation or appropriations under which the same shall have been drawn. Papers A and B are copies of the instructions to the navy agents, upon this subject.

In this, first section, I find the following provision: "Nor shall any credit be allowed to either of them, (agents,) except for expenses authorized by law, and for the amount appropriated for the same." Under such restrictions, no agent would make a purchase, or indeed, incur any expense, without having money in hand to meet it, because he could not know the exact state of the appropriation out of which such expense was to be paid; or, if he knew the unexpended balance of each appropriation, he could not know what dispositions the Department might have made respecting such balances; he would, therefore, never make a purchase without having in hand money of the appropriation under which such purchase would fall. What would be the effect?

Suppose, in time of war, a public vessel should arrive at any port distant from the seat of Government, viz: New Orleans; should be in want of repairs and supplies, and should be on important service, which requires her departure from such port with the least possible delay; her commander calls upon the agent for the requisite supplies, which amount to $2,000 worth of provisions and $3,000 of repairs: the agent has in hand, money enough for the repairs, but not for the provisions, he must then write to the Secretary of the Navy for money for the provisions, and before he gets an answer from the Secretary, three months may have expired. In this case, the vessel would be detained three months for want of provisions; and, if the agent should have a balance of $5,000 in his hands, out of any other appropriation than that of provisions, it would not prevent the detention of the vessel: for, if he applied any part of that $5,000 to the purchase of provisions, he could not be allowed credit for such purchase. The agent could not, in this case, or in any other, negotiate a bill on the Department, because he would never know the exact state of the appropriations.

Would it be possible for the Secretary of the Navy to keep the agents precisely informed as to the actual balances on hand, of each and every appropriation; or could he convey such information in any useful degree? Although he might direct, daily, returns of each and every warrant, upon each and every appropriation, to be made to the agents, still, before such returns could reach them, and particularly those at a distance, the balances would be considerably reduced by the daily drafts upon them, and might, possibly, be exhausted.

If it were possible to convey such information as would enable the agents to ascertain the exact balances on any day of the year, this would not remove the objection stated. No agent could tell, without previous instructions from the Secretary of the Navy, how far he could safely draw upon such balances, as he could not possibly know what other agents might have drawn for. Suppose a balance of $40,000, on account of repairs, and that the agents at New York, Norfolk, Charleston, and New Orleans, know of this balance; that, at each of these places, there are one or more vessels requiring repairs; how can each agent know what the others may want? No one of them can judge; they will, therefore, all write for instructions to the Secretary of the Navy, and wait to receive them before they commence the requisite repairs. Under the provisions of this section, it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to instruct the agents to this effect.

Such instructions, as to public vessels on foreign stations, would, in a still greater degree, impede the public service. Such a vessel might be detained in port six months, at an expense of $50,000, for want of $6,000, for provisions and repairs, as the agent would not undertake to make an advance for the Government to such an amount; because, if he did, and should happen to exceed the appropriation, he would not have credit for the same.

The provision in the latter part of this section, which authorizes the President, "during the recess of Congress," on the application of the Secretary, and not otherwise, to direct "a portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure, to be applied to another branch of expenditure, in the same department" would not remove these difficulties. This provision would be found a deception, in practice; it would not enable an agent to make such application of moneys, without a previous special instruction from the Secretary of the Navy. Hence, "the public service would be nearly as much impeded" with, as without this provision. The agents would not presume upon the sanction of the President, and draw on the Department; that would be applying the money before the President is consulted; whereas, the President can only sanction such application before it is made. He has not power to do it afterwards. But, if this objection could be removed, it might happen that the bill would arrive at the seat of Government, not "in the recess," but during the session of Congress; in such case, the President would have no right to give his sanction. What, then, would be the consequence? The bill is drawn payable at sight; the appropriation on which it is drawn is insufficient to pay it; it cannot, therefore, be paid; the holder protests the bill, and resorts to the drawer for payment of principal, interest, costs, and damages.

The provisions of the second section may be useful. It may be proper, however, for me to observe, that I know of no "injurious delays," on the part of the Accountant of the Navy, in the settlement of accounts.

As to the provisions of the third section, not knowing how many agents the War Department will require, I can form no opinion as to the number that may remain to the Navy Department. I would only respectfully submit to the consideration of Congress, whether the number of essential agents of one Department should, at all, be affected by the number that may be deemed necessary to a distant Department of the Government. Under the limitations contemplated, serious injuries to the public service might, and probably would happen. A public vessel might, by stress of weather, or any other cause, be compelled to put into a port where there is no agent. The commanding officer, in such case, would not undertake to purchase supplies himself; he knows nothing about the state of the appropriations; and would not choose to put to hazard all his pay, probably all his fortune. He must write to the Secretary of the Navy for instructions; and hence would result injuries, necessarily produced by such unavoidable delays, and by the appointment of some temporary agent, who would, probably, be ignorant of his duties.

The Navy Department has, hitherto, distributed the advantages of public expenditures, so that every part of the Union has participated. Under the provisions of this section, those advantages would be monopolized by the towns in which the Department would have agents. In these towns all purchases would be made.

With respect to the provisions of the fourth section; it is proper, and it is at present prescribed by law, that the Comptroller of the Treasury shall give instructions to the Accountant of the Navy, as to the forms of rendering accounts, and as to his giving such forms to the navy officers and agents; and this, I presume, is the intention of this section. It is not, I trust, intended, that such forms shall be sent directly from the Treasury Department to agents of the Navy Department.

The fifth section provides, that "no purchase or contract for supplies or services, shall be made without the President's approbation," &c.

Is a piece of kentege to be purchased, the President must previously approve the purchase; is a laborer or a seaman to be hired, the President must previously approve the hiring. What does the duty of approving or disapproving a purchase imply? It implies a knowledge of the quality, value, use, and quantity required, of each and every article, and the purchase of which is to be approved or disapproved. If such knowledge is not possessed, the duty cannot be properly performed.

But, independently of the impropriety—the unfitness of imposing such duties upon the First Magistrate of the nation—what would be the effect in practice? In some few cases, it might be partially done; in most cases it would occasion great losses and delays. In cases of purchases at the seat of Government, it might be partially done; but, in purchases required at distant ports, it would, obviously, produce great delays. Suppose a public vessel is at Gibraltar, and requires supplies; not a single purchase could be made without the previous approbation of the President; and, indeed, under the provisions of this section, not a man could be entered, to supply the place of one that might have deserted, or died, or have been killed in action.

The President, it is provided, may approve, either before or after the purchase, &c. This subsequent approbation of the President, to purchases, &c., will not be considered as a matter of course; he will exercise his judgment, and approve or reject, as it shall dictate. Who, then, would make a purchase, at the hazard, 1st, of losing the whole amount, because there might not be funds; 2d, of having his purchases disapproved by the President? No agent could, especially at a distance, make a condition with the vender, that, if the President did not approve the purchase, the articles should be returned to him without any compensation; because no person would sell under such circumstances.

I take this occasion to suggest for consideration, whether it would not be an improvement of the present system, if the several Departments of the Government were, by law, required to make to Congress annual reports of the expenditures of the respective Departments, so that Congress might see, whether, in any case, they varied in object, or transcended in amount, the estimates upon which the appropriations are founded; and, if they did, that a satisfactory explanation might be therefor made.

A.—Circular to the Navy Agents.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 9, 1803.

The appropriation law of the present year, changing the classifications made by the law of the last year, renders it necessary that you should receive additional instructions, as to your future conduct, in making requisitions, and in the manner of expending them.

The law of the present year appropriates—

For the pay and subsistence of the officers and pay of the seamen	$283,993 00
For provisions	157,360 20
For medicines, instruments and hospital stores, and all expenses on account of the sick	7,700 00
For the purchase of ordnance and other military stores	15,000 00
For repairs of vessels, store rent, and other contingent expenses	182,000 00
For timber, ordnance, and other materials for 74 gun ships, and transportation	114,425 00
For the erection of sheds and navy yards, including docks and other improvements, the pay of superintendents, storekeepers, clerks, and laborers	48,741 67

Accountability in the Navy Department.

There are other appropriations, which, however, either relate to the Marine Corps, or are for deficiencies in the appropriations for 1802, for objects which are comprehended under the above heads.

I have commenced, and shall progress, in the expenditures, under the determination not to exceed either of the particular sums appropriated. I cannot, therefore, lay my injunctions on you in terms too forcible, to be extremely particular in designating, in your requisition, the objects upon which the expenditures are to be made, that we may, at all times, be able to ascertain under what heads of appropriation to make remittances. It will also be expected, that you will always give a prospective detail of the expenditures as they are contemplated; that we may make remittances with a full understanding of the objects for which they are made, and thus be enabled to avail ourselves, if necessary, of the whole sums appropriated, without exceeding either in the expenditures.

In your letters of requisition, you will be pleased to exclude all matter irrelative to the requisition. Should it be necessary to write to the Department on other points at the same time, that you write for a remittance, be pleased to communicate them in a separate letter.

We shall pay no money upon your requisitions unless made in conformity to the preceding arrangements, and I confidently rely upon your exertions to enable me to carry these arrangements into complete effect.

The Accountant of the Navy will give you instructions as to expenditures.

I am, respectfully, sir, R. SMITH.

B.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Accountant's Office.

SIR: the system adopted at this office for arranging the expenditures of the Department, requires that the several objects and expenditures should be kept separate and distinct, as they fall under the following heads, viz:

- Pay of the Navy, &c.
- Provisions.
- Hospital.
- Contingent.
- Ordnance.
- Navy yards and docks.
- Pay of superintendents, storekeepers, &c.
- Gunboats.

The first of these heads will embrace all payments made on account of the pay or subsistence of officers, or the pay of seamen.

The second will include all payments for, or on account of, provisions.

The third, all medicines, instruments, and hospital stores.

The fourth, all expenditures, of whatever nature, on account of repairs to vessels, and, indeed, all other expenses not falling under any of the other specific heads.

The fifth, all ordnance or military stores purchased for, or on account of the Navy.

The sixth, all expenses, of whatever nature, incurred in the improvement of the navy yards, docks, and wharves.

The seventh, the salaries and wages of superintendents, storekeepers, &c.

The eighth, all expenses, of whatever nature, incurred in building and equipping gunboats.

The form herewith transmitted, is framed on the principles of this system, agreeably to which, you will render your accounts to this office, monthly. It may also be necessary to observe, that it will be proper to accompany your summary statement by abstracts for expenditures on account of each vessel, or other specific object, extending in your summary, in one line, the aggregate amount expended on the particular object. And further, that, as the commanding officers are held responsible for regulating all expenses on account of the vessel under their immediate command, no supplies can be furnished but by the direction, or with the concurrence in writing of the officer commanding; and, in all cases where articles are delivered, or services of any kind rendered to a vessel, it will be the duty of the commanding officer to receipt for the articles, and to certify that the services were rendered; and this evidence, in addition to bills with receipts, stating the amount paid for all expenditures whatever on account of the vessel, will be necessary, to entitle you to credit at this office. And for all expenditures, of whatever nature, bills and receipts will be required. It, also, may not be unnecessary to observe, that all receipts must be signed by the person entitled to receive, and that the receipt of one person for another will not be admitted, unless accompanied by an order in writing.

No payments or advances are to be made to any officer of the Navy, on account of pay, &c., unless particularly instructed from this Department.

Herewith, you will also receive a form for the return of public stores. The object of this return is, to exhibit a clear and distinct view of the number, quality, and value of the articles purchased, and not immediately expended or delivered; and, also, those received from agents, or vessels of war, arranged in appropriate columns. Quarterly returns of these accounts will be made to this office, exhibiting the number, quantity, and value of the several articles on hand at the beginning of the quarter, the articles purchased within the quarter, and, also, those received from other navy agents or vessels of war, as well, also, those that may be delivered within the quarter, thereby showing the balance of articles remaining on hand at the end of the quarter. Vouchers for all deliveries must also accompany the return.

Respectfully, I am, &c.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Accountant's Office,
February 24, 1809.

The foregoing is a copy of instructions that issue from this office to the navy agents, in relation to the manner of keeping and exhibiting their accounts, varying the heads of expenditure from time to time, as it may be necessary, to correspond with the specific appropriations.

This system it was thought advisable, by this Department, to adopt, in the year, 1803, and it has been pursued ever since. Antecedent to that time, the accounts were kept under heads of expenditure, according to instructions from the Comptroller of the Treasury, without regarding the specific heads of appropriation.

THE EMBARGO.

[Communicated to the House, Feb. 6, 1809.]

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the memorial and remonstrance of a meeting of citizens of the third ward of the city of New York, assembled in pursuance of public notice, respectfully sheweth:

That, in the exercise of the undoubted right of freemen, your memorialists approach the Legislature of the Union, to remonstrate against certain provisions of the late act for enforcing the embargo. At the same time, your memorialists offer to Congress a solemn assurance of their readiness to defend the rights of their country, not only against subjugation from abroad, but against usurpation and despotism at home. They are firmly attached to the Constitution and Union of these United States; and whenever no other alternative shall remain, they will be ready to vindicate, in arms, the cause of their country and of its liberties.

Until now, it has been the boast of those who love this country and its political institutions, that we have a Government of laws, not of men; that our citizens are liable to punishment only upon judicial conviction of offences, not on suspicion; that no person can be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; that the right of being secure against unreasonable searches, cannot be violated; that warrants cannot issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation; and as the great bulwark of defence for all these rights, that the trial by jury shall be preserved. If principles, in their nature so original, and so necessarily interwoven with the fabric of every free Government, can need a formal sanction, it will be found in the letter of the fourth, fifth, and seventh amendments to the Constitution, and in the spirit of every part of that instrument.

In the act against which your memorialists remonstrate, they see direct and palpable violations of these principles, in the following, among other particulars:

That, by this act, a citizen may be deprived of his property without process of law:

That, by this act, a citizen may be deprived of his property at the caprice of individuals, not only when innocent of any offence, but of the intent to commit any:

That, by this act, a citizen may be deprived of his property without an offence committed, without proof, without trial, without judgment, without the benefit of a legal appeal against the injustice, and without remedy:

That, by this act, our property is subjected to instructions from the President, which may be kept secret; which may be different for different classes of men; which may proceed from misinformation, or worse causes; and which may be partial, arbitrary, and oppressive:

That, by this act, our property is placed under the discretion of officers of the revenue, with more than judicial powers, who, yet, are not sworn as judges, nor liable to impeachment as such; nor independent in office, nor presumed to be learned in the laws, nor bound to examine facts, or hear the accused:

That, by this act, our property is subjected to seizures, which may proceed, not only from mistake or false information, but from private malice, party animosity, or other corrupt motives:

That, by this act, the military power is introduced into the execution of municipal law before any resistance made, and when there is neither rebellion, war, nor danger of invasion:

That, by this act, we are subjected to vexatious searches and intrusions, without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation:

That, by this act, belief of guilt is taken for guilt itself, and, without the forms of law, is punished accordingly:

That, by this act, we are subjected to secret and odious inquisitions, inasmuch as, when informed against, we have no means of knowing the accusation, or of being confronted with the witnesses, or of having a public trial:

That, by this act, new conditions are annexed to bonds already given, and some of these conditions impossible to be performed:

That this act appears intended to bar the legal remedies for seizures, and other wrongs which may be most oppressive; and, instead of the law of the land, our undoubted and hitherto undisputed birthright, it refers us, for redress, to a petition, a summary hearing, and the final discretion of a district judge:

That, by this act, the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive powers, are vested in one man; which is despotism.

The intention of your memorialists has been to confine themselves, in this remonstrance, chiefly to the objections of unconstitutionality; but they presume to notice some of the other particulars in which they conceive the act to be oppressive to the citizens, and dangerous to public liberty.

The excessive security required for vessels and cargoes, (being six times their value,) is productive of various vexations and oppressions upon almost every class of the community. Upon the small trader and boatman, when unable to find security, the act operates as a total prohibition of the use of his property. It increases the expenses and risks of those engaged in transportation; it thus diminishes competition and supplies; and, without benefitting the farmer, enhances the prices of fuel and provisions in the cities, at a time, in other respects, sufficiently calamitous.

The great number and amount of bonds will also involve almost the whole mercantile community in responsibilities to Government, to an amount equal to that of their property, and perhaps superior. In case of suits, therefore, it may be impossible for them to procure competent bail; and thus the liberty of a great portion of the citizens may be held at the mercy of the prosecuting officers of Government.

Another effect, not less to be deplored, is, that this act, like all arbitrary powers, is calculated to infest society with spies and informers. It will multiply fees, and the exactions of office, encourage prosecutions, and enrich a host, not only of spies and informers, but of collectors, surveyors, tide-waiters, and other custom house officers, district attorneys, marshals, clerks, and their subordinate agents, who will fatten upon the public distress.

If another case was wanting to show the possible oppressions and despotic tendencies of the act, we might notice its application to our own city.

The city of New York receives its supplies of provisions and necessities by boats and water craft. By this act, those vessels must have a general or special permission, which the collectors may refuse, for certain reasons, and the President may direct them to refuse without any reason whatever. We presume New York is the only city on earth, where, according to a public and formal law, the people may be starved at the mere will of a single individual.

Such an act is not more a violation of the express words, and whole scope of our written Constitution, than it is an attack upon those fundamental principles of civil liberty, which, anterior to all charters of rights and powers, form the basis of every social compact.

But the alarm which these provisions are calculated to inspire, is, if possible, increased, when we find the act defended on the recent precedent exhibited at New Orleans. If, indeed, this act shall as soon be made the precedent for another similar step, there may be scarcely time for the people to awaken, before the name of American liberty will be remembered only as a dream.

The occasion does not require your memorialists to discuss the delicate question, how far, in all cases, the application and effect of laws may be Constitutionally subjected to the instructions of Executive officers; but we can readily discern an extreme case when this cannot be done. No law could give the President power to issue instructions for taking our lives by military execution, without offence, accusation, proof, trial, or sentence, upon the collector's mere belief of our intention to violate the embargo. Yet liberty and property, are guarded by sanctions as strong as life, and the violation of one is no more a wound to the Constitution than of the other.

To hardships, deprivations, and oppressions, such as this act may impose, it scarcely can be expected that the freemen of this country will submit.

They can never submit to military government:

They can never surrender the trial by jury:

They can never consent to hold their property subject to the arbitrary control of any man.

They can never surrender those other essential rights of freemen which are guaranteed by the State and General Constitutions, which their fathers fought to maintain, and which, when the occasion calls for it, they will also know how to defend.

Remote as we are from the seat of the General Government, we well know that Congress and the Executive have been assailed and deceived by interested individuals and intriguers for office. Such persons are seeking a momentary profit in measures which may ruin their country. Nor can the suggestion, that these are the opinions of a factious few, or of party animosity, be otherwise than injurious. It cannot long be concealed, that, in this and the neighboring States, the act has excited a spirit which is rapidly uniting all real friends of the country in a common sentiment of disapprobation. We deplore the fact, that Congress should remain ignorant of the strength of this sentiment, or be regardless of its expressions. We solemnly forewarn our Government of the dangers which may ensue from an attempt to array its powers against the rights of the citizens, or to enforce an act which can never be executed against the will of a free people.

And we respectfully pray Congress that the act aforesaid may be immediately repealed.

CLAIM OF THOMAS PAINE.

[Communicated to the House, February 1, 1809.]

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Paine, made the following report:

The memorialist states, that, in the beginning of February, 1781, he sailed from Boston in the frigate Alliance, with Colonel Laurens, who was appointed by Congress to negotiate a loan with the French Government, for the benefit of the United States; that he aided in effecting the important object of this mission, and thus voluntarily rendered an essential service to the country, for which he has received no compensation. This memorial was presented to Congress at their last session, unaccompanied with any evidence in support of the statement of facts. The Committee of Claims, to whom it was then referred, endeavored to procure, from proper sources, such information as would guide them in making an equitable decision upon the case. The Journals of Congress, under the former Confederation, were diligently examined, but nothing was therein found tending to show that Mr. Paine was in any manner connected with the mission of Colonel Laurens. It appears that, on the 18th day of October, 1783, two resolutions were adopted in favor of Major Jackson: one for defraying certain expenses incident to the mission, the other allowing him $1,450 as a full compensation for his services, while acting as secretary to Colonel Laurens. A letter from the Vice President, in answer to one addressed to him by the Chairman of the Committee of Claims, is herewith presented. It will be observed, that the statement of this gentleman is from information, and not from his own knowledge. That Mr. Paine embarked with Colonel Laurens from the United States for France may be admitted; but it does not appear that he was employed by the Government, or even solicited by any officer thereof to aid in the accomplishment of the object of the mission with which Colonel Laurens was intrusted, or that he took any part whatever, after his arrival in France, in forwarding the negotiation; your Committee are, therefore, of opinion that the memorialist has not established the fact of his having rendered the service for which he asks to be compensated.

On the 26th of August, 1785, Congress, by a resolution, declared that Thomas Paine was entitled to a liberal gratification from the United States for his unsolicited and continued labors in explaining and enforcing the principles of the late Revolution; and, on the 3d of October following, the Board of Treasury were directed to take order for paying Mr. Paine three thousand dollars, for the considerations mentioned in the above resolution. This sum, it appears, Mr. Paine received on the 11th October, 1785. That Mr. Paine rendered great and eminent services to the United States, during their struggle for liberty and independence, cannot be doubted by any person acquainted with his labors in the cause, and attached to the principles of the contest. Whether he has been generously requited by his country for his meritorious exertions, is a question not submitted to your Committee, or within their province to decide.

The following resolution is offered to the House:
Resolved, That Thomas Paine have leave to withdraw his memorial, and the papers accompanying the same.

New York, February, 14, 1808.

Citizen Representatives: In my memorial to Congress of the 21st of January, I spoke of a resolve of the old Congress of three thousand dollars to me, and said that the resolve had relation to a matter it did not express; that Elbridge Gerry was chairman of the committee that brought in that resolve; and that if Congress referred the memorial to a committee, I would write to that committee, and inform them of the particulars of it. It has relation to my conduct in the affair of Silas Dean and Beaumarchais. The case is as follows:

When I was appointed secretary to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, all the papers of the secret committee, none of which had been seen by Congress, came into my hands. I saw, by the correspondence of that committee with persons in Europe, particularly with Arthur Lee, that the stores which Silas Dean and Beaumarchais pretended they had purchased were a present from the Court of France, and came out of the King's arsenals. But, as this was prior to the alliance, and while the English ambassador (Stormont) was at Paris, the Court of France wished it not to be known, and therefore proposed that "a small quantity of tobacco, or some other produce, should be sent to the Cape (Cape François) to give it the air of a mercantile transaction, repeating over and over again that it was for a cover only, and not for payment, as the whole remittance was gratuitous." (See Arthur Lee's letters to the secret committee; see also Benjamin Franklin's.)

Knowing these things, and seeing that the public were deceived and imposed upon by the pretensions of Dean, I took the subject up, and published three pieces in Dunlap's Philadelphia paper, headed with the title of "Common Sense to the Public on Mr. Dean's affairs." John Jay was then President of Congress, Mr. Laurens having resigned in disgust.

After the third piece appeared, I received an order, dated Congress, and signed John Jay, that "Thomas Paine do attend at the bar of this House immediately;" which I did.

Mr. Jay took up a newspaper, and said, "Here is Mr. Dunlap's paper of December 29. In it is a piece entitled 'Common Sense to the Public on Mr. Dean's affairs;' I am directed by Congress to ask you if you are the author." "Yes, sir, I am the author of that piece." Mr. Jay put the same question on the other two pieces, and received the same answer. He then said, you may withdraw.

As soon as I was gone, John Penn, of North Carolina, moved that "Thomas Paine be discharged from the office of secretary of the Committee for Foreign Affairs," and prating Gouverneur Morris seconded the motion; but it was lost when put to the vote, the States being equally divided. I then wrote to Congress, requesting a hearing, and Mr. Laurens made a motion for that purpose, which was negatived. The next day I sent in my resignation, saying, that "as I cannot, consistently with my character as a freeman, submit to be censured unheard, therefore, to preserve that character and maintain that right, I think it my duty to resign the office of secretary to the Committee for Foreign Affairs, and I do hereby resign the same."

After this I lived as well as I could, hiring myself as a clerk to Owen Biddle, of Philadelphia, till the Legislature of Pennsylvania appointed me clerk of the General Assembly. But I still went on with my publications on Dean's affairs, till the fraud became so obvious, that Congress were ashamed of supporting him, and he absconded. He went from Philadelphia to Virginia, and took shipping for France, and got over to England, where he died. Doctor Cutting told me he took poison. Gouverneur Morris, by way of making apology for his conduct in that affair, said to me, after my return from France with Colonel Laurens, "Well! we were all duped, and I among the rest."

Cumberland Road.

As the salary I had as secretary to the Committee of Foreign Affairs was but small, being only $800 a year, and as that had been fretted down by the depreciation to less than a fifth of its nominal value, I wrote to Congress, then sitting at New York, (it was after the war,) to make up the depreciation of my salary, and also for some incidental expenses I had been at. This letter was referred to a committee, of which Elbridge Gerry was chairman.

Mr. Gerry then came to me, and said that the committee had consulted on the subject, and they intended to bring in a handsome report, but that they thought it best not to take any notice of your letter or make any reference to Dean's affair or your salary. They will indemnify you, said he, without it. The case is, there are some motions on the Journal of Congress, for censuring you with respect to Dean's affair, which cannot now be recalled, because they have been printed. Therefore, we will bring in a report that will supersede them, without mentioning the purport of your letter.

This, citizen representatives, is an explanation of the resolve of the old Congress. It was an indemnity to me for some injustice done me, for Congress had acted dishonorably to me. However, I prevented Dean's fraudulent demand being paid, and so far the country is obliged to me; but I became the victim of my integrity.

I preferred stating this explanation to the committee rather than to make it public in my memorial to Congress. THOMAS PAINE.

NEW YORK, PARTITION ST., No. 63,
February 28, 1808.

SIR: I addressed a memorial to Congress dated January 21, which was presented by George Clinton, junior, and referred to the Committee of Claims. As soon as I knew to what committee it was referred, I wrote to that committee, and informed them of the particulars respecting a vote of the old Congress of $3,000 to me, as I mentioned I would do in my memorial; since which I have heard nothing of the memorial or of any proceedings upon it.

It will be convenient to me to know what Congress will decide on, because, it will determine me whether, after so many years of generous services, and that in the most perilous times, and after seventy years of age, I shall continue in this country, or offer my services to some other country. It will not be to England, unless there should be a revolution.

My request to you is, that you will call on the Committee of Claims to bring in their report, and that Congress would decide upon it. I shall then know what to do.

Yours, in friendship,

THOMAS PAINE.

The Hon. SPEAKER House of Reps.

NEW YORK, March 7, 1808.

SIR: I wrote you a week ago, prior to the date of this letter, respecting my memorial to Congress, but I have not yet seen an account of any proceedings upon it.

I know not who the Committee of Claims are, but if they are men of younger standing than "the times that tried men's souls," and, consequently, too young to know what the condition of the country was at the time I published Common Sense, (for I do not believe independence would have been declared had it not been for the effect of that work.) they are not capable of judging of the whole of the services of Thomas Paine. The President and Vice President can give you information on those subjects, so also can Mr. Smilie, who was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature at the times I am speaking of. He knows the inconveniences I was often put to, for the old Congress treated me with ingratitude, they seemed to be disgusted at my popularity, and acted towards me as a rival instead of a friend.

The explanation I sent to the committee respecting a resolve of the old Congress while they sat at New York should be known to Congress, but it seems to me that the committee keep everything to themselves, and do nothing. If my memorial was referred to the Committee of Claims, for the purpose of losing it, it is unmanly policy. After so many years of service my heart grows cold towards America.

Yours, in friendship,

THOMAS PAINE.

HON. SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

P. S. I repeat my request, that you would call on the Committee of Claims to bring in their report, and that Congress would decide upon it.

SENATE CHAMBER, March 23, 1808.

SIR: From the information I received at the time, I have reason to believe that Mr. Paine accompanied Colonel Laurens on his mission to France, in the course of our Revolutionary war, for the purpose of negotiating a loan, and that he acted as his secretary on that occasion; but although I have no doubt of the truth of this fact, I cannot assert it from my own actual knowledge.

I am, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE CLINTON.

DAVID HOLMES, Esquire.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

[Communicated to Congress, February 17, 1808.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now transmit to both Houses of Congress a report of the Commissioners appointed under the act of March 29, 1806, concerning a road from Cumberland to Ohio, being a statement of the proceedings under the said act, since their last report communicated to Congress, in order that Congress may be enabled to adopt such further measures as may be proper under existing circumstances.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 13, 1806.

Cumberland Road.

August 30, 1808.

The undersigned, two of the Commissioners under the law to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, report to the President of the United States, that, having in May last resumed the duties assigned them, they have extended the location of the route to the Ohio river, which, with the other parts heretofore reported, completes the location, grading, and marking the whole route from Cumberland to the river Ohio, agreeably to the plat, course, and distances thereof, which accompany this report.

The first report of the Commissioners on this subject states the reasons and necessity for adopting, as a crossing place on the Ohio river, a point opposite the lower end of Wheelen island. On approaching the Ohio with the location, it was found that this point could be reached on a route somewhat shorter than by passing through the town of Wheelen. It was, however, also ascertained that the portage between the Monongahela and the Ohio rivers would not be lengthened by passing through the town which lies on the east bank of the Ohio, and affords as eligible a port for embarkation as the lower point. In consideration whereof, and that many important advantages would be presented to emigrants, traders, and others, in a choice of supplies of boats, stores, and other accommodations along the shore through the town a mile in length, which could not be otherwise as conveniently obtained, and that as the grounds on the town route, being level nearly the whole way, held a decided preference, the Commissioners were of opinion that the town route was entitled to a preference, inasmuch as it was best calculated to secure public benefit, and guard against private injuries.

In reporting the parts which require the most immediate amelioration, the Commissioners have to state that the part from Brownsville to the Ohio, like the other part of the route reported, occupies but little of the old road; that it passes through a country formed wholly of hills and hollows, more irregular in their bearings, and, consequently, rendering the location more difficult and tedious than that heretofore reported, and confining the route, in many places, to the sides of hills which, from necessity, were crossed obliquely.

From these circumstances, and that of the rough, stony state of the more level parts in the mountains, it is not supposed that the balance of the funds appropriated will be adequate to the expense of rendering the whole way barely passable, and much less to make it conveniently so; neither is it believed that a road on these sideling grounds, barely of sufficient width to pass a wagon, would remain passable half a year without the precaution of well-secured conduits, which an uncovered road of common width will not admit. If this opinion should lead to a question, how the present roads through that country are kept in passable order, the fact of their direction being principally adapted to the crossing of the hills nearly at right angles, or along their tops over the centre of all the knobs, to save the necessity of digging, will furnish the answer; while, at the same time, it accounts for the steepness of the hills on these roads, and the great difficulty and sufferings experienced in passing them. Under all the existing circumstances relative to the application of the remaining funds, the Commissioners are impressed with a belief that, instead of using the money towards making the whole way merely passable, the improvement of a few difficult places, which, in that way, may be rendered useful to the intercourse on the roads now in use, would be much more advisable, as much more benefit would result from it.

Among those places which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, have the highest claim to immediate attention, are the crossing of the mouth of Dunlap's creek, between Brownsville and Bridgeport, and the crossing of Wheelen creek, between the town and the lower point of the island. At both these creeks bridges are much wanted. The next object is what is called the Dug hill, near the town of Wheelen, where considerable difficulty and hazard is encountered for want of a safe pass across that hill.

As bridges built with wood, when supported by stone pillars and abutments, and judiciously constructed and secured from the weather, may answer every purpose for many years, it is conceived that the combination of economy and usefulness in this sort of bridge will recommend their adoption for the present.

From a rough estimate of the probable expense of these ameliorations, it is supposed that for a bridge over Dunlap's creek, $2,500, and over Wheelen creek, $4,000 may suffice, with the voluntary aid which will be afforded by the inhabitants of the respective places; and that $1,500 may be usefully and effectually applied in cutting and forming a secure and easy pass over Wheelen hill. It is suggested for consideration, whether the most eligible application of any surplus fund would be in making and perfecting as much road, by way of sample, as it is competent to, near Cumberland, or where the Virginia line intersects the western route at Gwynn's tavern.

It is found that, from Cumberland to Brownsville, there is an abundance of stone, in convenient situations, for the purposes of bridges and covering the road. The grounds from Brownsville to Wheelen are not so conveniently stored, but afford very ample supplies.

The object of this establishment being to afford safety and facility in the intercourse upon it, the Commissioners trust it will not be deemed presumptuous in them to suggest their ideas of the mode of making the road best calculated to accomplish this important object, and which the peculiarity of the grounds seem to require.

The law directs the whole width of the road to be sixty-six feet. Although it is essential to a great highway to have sufficient space for the admission of sun and air, it is not supposed to be intended that the whole breadth should be reduced to a form passable with wagons or other carriages, or even single horse. It is thought that forty feet, and not less, will be amply sufficient for this great thoroughfare; twenty feet of which to be covered one foot deep at least, with broken stone, so reduced as to pass through a gauge ring of three inches diameter; the covered part to be in the centre of the forty feet, with cross conduits at suitable distances, well paved and arched; ten feet on each side of the covered part to be level crosswise of the road, except only such inclination as may be necessary to prevent water from lying on the uncovered part. Stone arches are deemed the most eligible mode of bridging all the streams on the way, except the two creeks already mentioned, and the Big and Little Youhgahana, where wooden bridges are for the present thought most advisable; and except also the Monongahela river, the size of which, and the high floods which frequently fill and partially overflow its banks, render the bridging of that stream a work of too much magnitude to encourage the attempt at this time, but present no unusual impediments in the way of ferries.

The instructions from the President, under date of the 8th of August, not having come to hand before finishing the work, and leaving that part of the country, the Commissioners have to state, that a short time before the completion of the route now reported, they were informed by several of the inhabitants, in behalf of the town of Washington, in Pennsylvania, that a route had been carefully run, graded, &c., at private expense, from Brownsville, through that town nearly to Wheelen, which would be found but little, if any, longer than the route laid off by the Commissioners; and was stated to be capable of very great improvement under the superior skill of the Commissioners; that it commanded a variety of advantages, which, it was believed, would give it a preference; all which was so confidently asserted, that although the Commissioners were convinced, from the knowledge they then possessed of the geographical-situation of the town of Washington, that some mistake must have taken place in the representation of the distance on that route, yet, in order to gratify the solicitude of those interested, and to ascertain to them the merits of their claims, as far as a view and comparison of measurement and local advantages could effect it, the Commissioners were induced to make that view and measurement on their return from Wheelen; which being done, that route appeared upwards of four miles longer than the route located by the Commissioners; and after deducting one mile for improvement, being the utmost it appeared capable of, there remained a difference of upwards of three miles against the Washington route.

It was well known to the Commissioners, that the distance from Brownsville to Short creek was less than to Wheelen, and that to Charlestown was still less than to Short creek; but knowing also that Wheelen lay one degree north of West from Brownsville, and north of a straight line from the latter place to Chillicothe, Vincennes, and St. Lewis, or even to the centre of the State of Ohio, they could not prefer points still more north, which would consequently increase the angle at the Ohio, and necessarily the distance in passing west from Brownsville; and if Wheelen, Short creek, and Charlestown, had been on an equality in all other respects, the circumstances of Wheelen being a point of more useful navigation for the boats of traders or emigrants at low water, could not have escaped the attention of the Commissioners in deciding on the point best entitled, in all respects, to a preference.

The undersigned have to regret the absence of their colleague, Joseph Kerr, whose domestic concerns would not dispense with his personal attention, by which they were deprived of the benefit of his co-operation, and consequently taxed with a larger share of the duties. All which is respectfully submitted.

ELIE WILLIAMS,
THOMAS MOORE.

CAPTAIN PIKE AND COMPANIONS.

[Communicated to the House, December 16, 1806.]

Mr. JOHN MONTGOMERY, from the committee, to whom was referred the resolution to inquire whether any, and, if any, what compensation ought to be made to Captain Zebulon M. Pike, and his companions, for their services in exploring the Mississippi river, in their late expedition to the sources of the Osage, Arkansas, and La Platte rivers, and in their tour through New Spain, made the following report:

That it appears by the documents accompanying this report, that the objects of each of the exploring expeditions, together with the instructions for executing them, were communicated to, and approved by, the President of the United States; that the conduct of Captain Pike, in each of the expeditions, also met with the approbation of the President, and that the information obtained and communicated to the Executive on the subjects of his instructions, and particularly in relation to the sources of the Mississippi, and the natives in that quarter, and the country generally, as well on the Upper Mississippi, as that between the Arkansas and the Missouri, and on the borders of the latter extensive river to its source, and the country adjacent, is highly interesting in a political, geographical, and historical view; and that although no special encouragement was given to the individuals who performed these laborious and dangerous expeditions, yet it was but reasonable for them, should they fortunately succeed in the objects, to expect some reward from Government; that the zeal, perseverance, and intelligence of Captain Pike, as commander, has been meritorious, and the conduct of the individuals generally who composed the parties respectively, has been faithful, and the exertions arduous. The committee, therefore, are of opinion, that compensation ought to be made by law to Captain Pike and his companions.

Documents.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 7, 1808.

SIR: I herewith enclose copies of the instructions to Lieutenant Pike, for the government of his conduct on the two exploring expeditions alluded to in your letter, and likewise lists of the names of the men composing those parties. You will perceive that the instructions were given by General Wilkinson; the object, however, of each party, together with the instructions, were communicated to, and approved by, the President of the United States.

Although no special encouragement was given to the individuals who performed these laborious and dangerous expeditions, yet it was but reasonable for them, should they fortunately succeed in their objects, to expect a liberal reward from the Government; and as there can be no reasonable doubt of the zeal, perseverance, and intelligence, of the commander, or of the faithful conduct and arduous exertions of the individuals generally, composing the respective parties, it may, I trust, be presumed, that no objection will be opposed to a reasonable compensation for such meritorious services.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Hon. J. MONTGOMERY, Chairman, &c.

HEADQUARTERS, St. Louis,
July 30, 1805.

SIR: Having completed your equipments, you are to proceed up the Mississippi with all possible diligence, taking the following instructions for your general government, which are to yield to your discretion in all cases of exigency.

You will please to take the course of the river, and calculate distances by time, noting rivers, creeks, highways, prairies, islands, rapids, shoals, mines, quarries, timber, water, soil, Indian villages and settlements, in a diary to comprehend reflections on the winds and weather.

It is interesting to Government to be informed of the population and residence of the several Indian nations, of the quantity and species of skins and furs they barter per annum, and their relative price to goods; of the tracts of country on which they generally make their hunts, and the people with whom they trade.

You will please to examine strictly for an intermediate point, between this place and Prairie des Chiens, suitable for a military post, and also on the Wisconsin, near its mouth, for a similar establishment, and will obtain the consent of the Indians for their erection, informing them that they are intended to increase their trade, and ameliorate their condition.

You will proceed to ascend the main branch of the river until you reach the source of it, or the season may forbid your further progress without endangering your return before the waters are frozen up.

You will endeavor to ascertain the latitude of the most remarkable places in your route, with the extent of the navigation, and the direction of the different rivers which fall into the Mississippi, and you will not fail to procure specimens of whatever you may find curious in the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, to be rendered at this place.

In your course you are to spare no pains to conciliate the Indians, and to attach them to the United States, and you may invite the great chiefs of such distant nations, as have not been at this place, to pay me a visit.

Your own good sense will regulate the consumption of your provisions, and direct the distribution of the trifling presents which you may carry with you, particularly your flags.

I wish you a speedy, pleasant, and safe tour, and am, sir, with sentiments of respect and esteem, your obedient servant,

JAMES WILKINSON.

P. S. In addition to the preceding orders, you will be pleased to obtain permission from the Indians who claim the ground, for the erection of military posts and trading-houses, at the mouth of the river St. Pierre, the Falls of St. Anthony, and every other critical point which may fall under your observation; these permissions to be granted in formal conferences, regularly recorded, and the ground marked off.

J. W.

Lieut. Z. M. PIKE,
1st regiment infantry.

St. Louis, June 24, 1806.

SIR: You are to proceed without delay to the cantonment on the Missouri, where you are to embark the late Osage captives, and the deputation recently returned from Washington, with their presents and baggage, and are to transport the whole up the Missouri and Osage rivers, to the town of the Grand Osage.

The safe delivery of this charge at the point of destination constitutes the primary object of your expedition, and, therefore, you are to move with such caution as may prevent surprise from any hostile band, and are to repel with your utmost force any outrage which may be attempted.

Having safely deposited your passengers and their property, you are to turn your attention to the accomplishment of a permanent peace between the Canzes and Osage nations, for which purpose you must effect a meeting between the head chiefs of those nations, and are to employ such arguments, deduced from their own obvious interests, as well as the inclinations, desires, and commands, of the President of the United States, as may facilitate your purpose, and accomplish the end.

A third object of considerable magnitude will then claim your consideration; it is to effect an interview and establish a good understanding with the Yau-e-taus, T-e-taus or Commanches; for this purpose you must interest Whitehair of the Grand Osage, with whom, and a suitable deputation, you will visit the Panis Republique, where you may find interpreters and inform yourself of the most feasible plan by which to bring the Commanches to a conference. Should you succeed in this attempt, and no pains must be spared to effect it, you will endeavor to make peace between that distant, powerful nation, and the nations which inhabit the country between us and them, particularly the Osage; and finally you will endeavor to induce eight or ten of their distinguished chiefs to make a visit to the seat of Government next September, and you may attach to this deputation four or five Panis, and the same number of Canzes chiefs. As your interview with the Commanches will probably lead you to the head branches of the Arkansas and Red rivers, you may find yourself approximated to the settlements of New Mexico; and, therefore, it will be necessary you should move with great circumspection, to keep clear of any hunting or reconnoitring parties from that province, and to prevent alarm or offence, because the affairs of Spain and the United States appear to be on the point of amicable adjustment, and, moreover, it is the desire of the President to cultivate friendship and harmonious intercourse with all the nations of the earth, particularly our nearest neighbors, the Spaniards.

In the course of your tour you are to remark particularly upon the geographical structure, the natural history, and population of the country through which you may pass, taking particular care to collect and preserve specimens of everything curious in the mineral or botanical worlds, which can be preserved and are portable. Let your courses be regulated by your compass, and your distances by your watch, to be noted in a field-book; and I would advise you, when circumstances permit, to protract and lay down, in a separate book, the march of the day at every evening's halt.

The instruments which I have furnished will enable you to ascertain the variation of the magnetic needle and latitude with exactness, and at every remarkable point. I wish you to employ your telescope in observing the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, having previously regulated and adjusted your watch by your quadrant, taking care to note with great nicety the periods of the immersion and emersion of the eclipsed satellite. These observations may enable us after your return, by application to the appropriate tables, which I cannot now furnish you, to ascertain the longitude.

It is an object of much interest with the Executive to ascertain the direction, extent, and navigation, of the Arkansas and Red rivers; as far, therefore, as may be compatible with these instructions, and practicable to the means you may command, I wish you to carry your views to those subjects; and, should circumstances conspire to favor the enterprise, you may detach a party, with a few Osages, to descend the Arkansas, under the orders of Lieutenant Wilkinson or Sergeant Ballinger, properly instructed and equipped, to take the courses and distances, to remark on the soil, timber, &c., and to note the tributary streams. This party will, after reaching our post on the Arkansas, descend to Fort Adams, and there wait further orders. And you, yourself, may descend the Red river, accompanied by a party of the most respectable Commanches to the post of Nachitoches, and there receive further orders.

To disburse your necessary expenses, and to aid your negotiation, you are herewith furnished with $600 worth of goods, for the appropriation of which you are to render a strict account, vouched by documents to be attested by one of your party.

Wishing you a safe and successful expedition, I am, sir, with much respect and esteem, your very obedient servant,

J. WILKINSON.

Lieut. Z. M. PIKE.

CANTONMENT MISSOURI, July 12, 1806.

SIR: The health of the Osages being now generally restored, and all hopes of a speedy recovery of their prisoners, from the hands of the Pottawatomies, being at an end, they have become desirous to commence their journey from their villages; you are, therefore, to proceed to-morrow.

In addition to the instructions given to you on the 24th ultimo, I must require you to have the talks under cover, delivered to Whitehair and the Grand Peste, the chief of the Osage band, which is settled on the waters of the Arkansas, together with the belts which accompany them; you will also receive herewith a small belt for the Panis, and a large one for the Tei-taus or Commanches.

Should you find it necessary you are to give orders to Mongraine, the resident interpreter at the Grand Osage, to attend you.

I beg you to take measures for the security and safe return of your boats from the Grand Osage to this place.

Doctor Robinson will accompany you as a volunteer; he will be furnished with medicines, and for the accommodation which you give him he is bound to attend your sick.

Should you discover any unlicensed traders in your route, or any person from this Territory, or from the United States, without a proper license or passport, you are to arrest such person or persons, and dispose of their property as the law directs.

My confidence in your caution and discretion has prevented my urging you to be vigilant in guarding against the stratagems and treachery of the Indians; holding yourself above alarm or surprise, the composition of your party, though it be small, will secure to you the respect of a host of untutored savages.

You are to communicate from the Grand Osage, and from every other practicable point, directly to the Secretary of War, transmitting your letters to this place, under cover, to the commanding officer, or by any more convenient route.

Captain Pike and his Companions.

I wish you health, and successful and honorable expedition, and am yours with friendship,
JAMES WILKINSON.

Lieut. Z. M. PIKE.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 24, 1808.

SIR. In answer to your letter of the 22d instant, I can with pleasure observe, that although the two exploring expeditions you have performed were not previously ordered by the President of the United States, there were frequent communications on the subject of each, between General Wilkinson and this Department; of which the President of the United States was, from time to time, acquainted; and it will be no more than what justice requires to say that your conduct, in each of those expeditions, met the approbation of the President; and that the information you obtained and communicated to the Executive, in relation to the source of the Mississippi and the natives in that quarter, and the country generally, as well on the Upper Mississippi as that between the Arkansas and the Missouri, and on the borders of the latter extensive river to its source and country adjacent, has been considered highly interesting in a political, geographical, and historical view. And you may rest assured that your services are held in high estimation by the President of the United States; and if any opinion of my own can afford you any satisfaction, I very frankly declare that I consider the public much indebted to you for the enterprising, persevering, and judicious manner in which you have performed them.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

H. DEARBORN.

Captain Z. M. PIKE.

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE TENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, NOVEMBER 7, 1808.

An Act to authorize the transportation of a certain Message of the President of the United States, and documents accompanying the same.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Members of Congress and Delegates from the several Territories of the United States be, and they are hereby, authorized to transmit by mail, free of postage, the Message of the President of the United States, of the eighth day of November, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, and documents accompanying the same, printed by order of the Senate, and by order of the House of Representatives, to any post office within the United States, and Territories thereof, to which they may respectively direct, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

J. B. VARNUM,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

GEO. CLINTON,

*Vice President of the United States, and

Approved, November 18, 1808.

TH. JEFFERSON.

An Act authorizing the President of the United States to employ an additional number of revenue cutters.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, empowered to procure so many revenue cutters, not exceeding twelve, as may be necessary for the public service, the expense whereof shall be paid out of the product of the duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels.

Approved, January 6, 1809.

An Act authorizing the payment of certain pensions by the Secretary of War at the seat of Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That every pension or arrearage of pension that shall be due on the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and nine, or that may thereafter become due to any officer or soldier residing in either of the United States, or the Territories thereof, in which there hath not been appointed an agent for the payment of pensions, shall be paid at the seat of the Government of the United States, by the Secretary of the War Department, and the name of the pensioner shall, on his application to the Secretary of War, be transferred from the books of the State in which it was originally enregistered to a register, to be opened for that purpose, at the War Office of the United States.

Approved, January 7, 1809.

An Act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United State," and the several acts supplementary thereto.

Be it enacted, &c., That, if any person or persons shall put, place, or load, on board any ship, vessel, boat, or water craft, or into any cart, wagon, sled, or other carriage or vehicle, with or without wheels, any specie, goods, wares, or merchandise, with intent to export, transport or convey the same without the United States or the Territories thereof, to any foreign place, kingdom or country, or with intent to convey the same on board any foreign ship or vessel within or without the limits of the United States, or with the intent in any other manner to evade the acts to which this act is a supplement, all such specie, goods, wares, and merchandise, and also the ship, vessel, boat, water craft, cart, wagon, sled, or other carriage or vehicle, on board, or in which the same may be so put, placed, or loaded, as aforesaid, shall be forfeited, and the person or persons so putting, placing, or loading, the same as aforesaid, and also the aiders and abettors therein, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and fined a sum by the court before which the conviction is had, equal to four times the value of such specie, goods, wares, and merchandise: Provided, however, That this section shall not be construed to extend to any person or persons, not being the owner or owners of such specie, goods, wares, or merchandise, who shall first inform and make complaint to the collector of the district of any such offence committed within the same district; and any informer or informers, not being the owner or owners as aforesaid, upon conviction of the offenders, shall be entitled to one-half of the fine aforesaid, when the same shall be received by the United States, and shall be entitled to a certificate for that purpose from the court before whom the conviction shall be had.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, vessel, or boat, of any description whatever, any specie or goods, wares, or merchandise, either of domestic or foreign growth, produce, or manufacture, and the same is hereby prohibited, unless a permit, particularly stating the articles thus to be laden, shall have been previously obtained from the collector of the district, in which such ship, vessel, or boat may then be, or from a revenue officer, specially authorized by the collector to grant such permits; nor unless the lading shall be made under the inspection of the proper revenue officers, nor unless the owner or owners, consignee or factor of such ship, vessel, or boat, shall, with the master, have given bond with one or more sureties to the United States, in a sum six times the value of the vessel and cargo, that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance, nor shall, when leaving the port, proceed to a foreign port or place, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel; and that the whole cargo shall be reloaded either in the port where the vessel may then be, or in such other port of the United States as shall be designated in the clearance. And it shall be lawful for the collectors of the customs to refuse permission to put any cargo on board any such ship, vessel, or boat, whenever, in their opinion, there is an intention to violate the embargo, or whenever they shall have received instructions to that effect by direction of the President of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to extend to any ship, vessel, or boat, uniformly employed in the navigation only of bays, sounds, rivers, and lakes, within the jurisdiction of the United States, which shall have obtained a general permission, agreeably to the provisions in the fourth section of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners, consignee or factor, of any ship, vessel, or boat, as described in the preceding section, which may, at the time when notice of this act shall be received at the several custom-houses respectively, be laden in whole or in part, shall, on notice given by the collector, either discharge such cargo or give bond for the same, in the manner and on the conditions mentioned in the preceding section; and, if the cargo shall not be discharged within ten days or the bond given within three days after such notice, the ship, vessel, or boat and cargo, shall be wholly forfeited. But the collectors are hereby authorized to order or to cause the cargoes of such vessels to be discharged for the same causes as they may refuse permission to put any cargo on board of vessels not yet laden in whole or in part. And they are likewise authorized, in the meanwhile, and until the cargoes shall have been discharged, or bonds given, as the case may be, to take possession of such vessels, and to take such other measures as may be necessary to prevent their departure.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby, authorized to grant, under such general instructions as the President of the United States may give to that effect, a general permission to ships, vessels, or boats, whose employment has uniformly been confined to the navigation of bays, sounds, rivers, or lakes, within the jurisdiction of the United States, when it can be done without danger of the embargo being violated, to take on board at any time such articles of domestic or foreign growth as may be designated in such general permission or permissions, bond with one or more sureties being previously given to the United States by the owner, owners, consignee, or factors of such ship, vessel, or boat, and by the master thereof, in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of the said vessel, that such vessel shall not, during the time limited in the condition of the bond, depart from any district of the United States, without having previously obtained a clearance, nor until the master or commander shall have delivered to the collector or surveyor of the port of departure a manifest of the whole cargo on board, that the said vessel shall not, during the time abovementioned, proceed to any other port than that mentioned in her clearance, or put any article on board of any other vessel, or be employed in any foreign trade; and, that on every voyage or trip, the whole of the cargo shall be landed in a port of the United States within the bay, sound, rivers, or lakes, to which the navigation of such vessel is confined.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, if any ship, vessel, or boat, not having received a general permission, and a general bond not having been first given in the manner provided for in the next preceding section, shall take on board any specie, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, either of foreign or domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, contrary to the provisions of the second section of this act, such ship, vessel, or boat, together with the specie, and goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be wholly forfeited; and the owner, or owners, agent, freighter, or factors, master, or commander of such ship, vessel, or boat, shall, moreover, severally forfeit and pay a sum equal to the value of the ship, vessel, or boat, and of the cargo put on board the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the person or persons whose names do or may appear as owner or owners of any ship or vessel, either on the certificate of registry, enrollment, or license, of any such ship, or vessel, or, if neither registered nor licensed, on the last clearance or custom-house document issued before the passing of this act, for such ship or vessel, shall be reputed as the true owner or owners of such ship, or vessel, and be liable to the payment of all penalties which may be incurred by the owners of such ship, or vessel, by reason of any violation of any of the provisions of this act, or of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, or of any of the acts supplementary thereto, by such ship or vessel: Provided, always, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed to release any other person or persons from the payment of any penalty incurred by virtue of any of the acts aforesaid. And in case of any new register or license being granted during the continuance of the said acts, or, in case of the sale of any ship or vessel neither registered nor licensed, a bond with one or more sureties to the United States, shall, previous to the granting any such new register or license, or to recognising the sale of such vessel, not registered or licensed, be required by the collector, in an amount equal to three hundred dollars for each ton of such ship, or vessel, that such ship, or vessel, shall not, during the continuance of the acts laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, contravene or infringe any of the provisions of the said acts: Provided, That nothing herein contained, shall be construed to extend to the owner, or owners, of any ship, or vessel, who shall have made a bona fide sale of such ship, or vessel, in any port or harbor of the United States, before notice of this act, at such port or harbor, respectively; nor to the owner, or owners, of any ship or vessel, in any foreign port or place, who shall have made a bona fide sale thereof, before notice of this act: And provided, also, That such bond shall not release the owners and master of such ship, or vessel, or any other person, from the obligation of giving every other bond required by this act or by any of the acts aforesaid.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where, either under this act, or under the act laying an embargo on all ships or vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, or under any of the acts supplementary thereto, a bond has been or shall be given to the United States, with condition that certain goods, wares, and merchandise, or the cargo of a vessel, shall be relanded in some port of the United States, the party or parties to such bond shall, within two months after the date of the same, (unless in the case of a voyage from New Orleans to an Atlantic port or from an Atlantic port to New Orleans, in either of which cases, four months shall as heretofore be allowed,) produce to the collector of the port from which the vessel had been cleared with such goods, wares, merchandise, or cargo, a certificate of the relanding of the same from the collector of the proper port; on failure whereof, the bond shall be put in suit; and in every such suit, as well as in every suit instituted on a bond given for a voyage from or to New Orleans, judgment shall be given against the defendant or defendants, unless proof shall be given of such relanding, or of loss of the vessel at sea. But neither capture, distress, or any other accident whatever, shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any such suit, unless such capture shall be expressly proved to have been hostile, and such distress or accident caused by no negligence or deviation, nor unless such vessel shall have been from the commencement of the voyage wholly navigated by a master, mate or mates, mariners and crew, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States; nor unless such mate or mates, mariners and crew, shall, all, if living, (and the proof of their death shall lie on the defendant,) be produced on the trial, and sworn as competent witnesses; nor unless such master, mate or mates, mariners and crew, shall have signed a shipping paper in due form of law, and a copy thereof, designating specially the master, mate or mates, mariners and crew, and their permanent place of residence, shall have been lodged with the collector of the port, to whom the bond aforesaid shall have been given, before the commencement of the voyage, and subscribed and sworn to by the master before such collector; and any master who shall falsely, wilfully, and corruptly swear as to the facts contained in such copy, shall, on conviction, suffer the pains and penalties of perjury. And in every suit instituted on a bond, given as aforesaid, the defendants shall pay all costs, if they shall not, within the limited time, have produced the certificate of relanding to the collector of the proper port.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no registered or sea-letter vessel, although in ballast, shall receive a clearance, or be permitted to depart from any port of the United States, unless the same bond shall have been previously given, which is required from vessels licensed for the coasting trade, before they are allowed to depart. And if any such ship or vessel shall depart without bond having been given as aforesaid, the said ship or vessel shall be forfeited; and the owner, owners, agent, consignee, factor, and master or commander, of such ship or vessel, as well as any other person concerned in such prohibited departure, shall be liable to the same penalties imposed by law in the case of vessels licensed for the coasting trade departing, without bond having been given, or without clearance, as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the collectors of all the districts of the United States shall, and they are hereby, authorized to take into their custody, specie or any articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, found on board of any ship or vessel, boat, or other water-craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, wagons, sleighs, or any other carriage, or in any manner apparently on their way toward the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or toward a place whence such articles are intended to be exported; and not to permit such articles to be removed, until bond with sufficient sureties shall have been given for the landing or delivery of the same in some place of the United States, whence, in the opinion of the collector, there shall not be any danger of such articles being exported.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the powers given to the collectors, either by this or any other act respecting the embargo, to refuse permission to put any cargo on board any vessel, boat, or other water-craft, to detain any vessel, or to take into their custody any articles for the purpose of preventing violations of the embargo, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give, and such general rules as he may prescribe for that purpose, made in pursuance of the powers aforesaid; which instructions and general rules the collectors shall be bound to obey: And if any action or suit be brought against any collector or other person acting under the directions of, and in pursuance of this act, he may plead the general issue, and give this act and the instructions and regulations of the President in evidence, for his justification and defence. And any person aggrieved by the acts of any collector, in either of the cases aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district wherein the collector resides, stating the facts of his case, and thereupon, after due notice given to the district attorney and the collector, the said court may summarily hear and adjudge thereupon, as law and justice may require; and the judgment of said court, and the reason and facts whereon it is grounded, shall be filed among the records of said court; and if restoration of the property detained or taken in custody, or permission to load as aforesaid, shall be decreed, it shall be upon the party's giving such bond with sureties as is or shall be required to be taken in similar cases by the collector, and not otherwise; but if the said court shall adjudge against such petition, the collector shall be entitled to treble costs, which shall be taxed for him, and execution awarded accordingly by the court.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces, or militia, of the United States, or of the territories thereof, as may be judged necessary, in conformity with the provisions of this and other acts respecting the embargo, for the purpose of preventing the illegal departure of any ship or vessel, or of detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody any ship or vessel, or of taking into custody and guarding any specie, or articles of domestic growth, produce, or manufacture, and also for the purpose of preventing and suppressing any armed or riotous assemblage of persons, resisting the custom-house officers in the exercise of their duties, or in any manner opposing the execution of the laws laying an embargo, or otherwise violating, or assisting and abetting violations of the same.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act, unless hereinbefore otherwise directed, and all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of the act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," or by virtue of the several acts supplementary thereto, may be prosecuted, sued for, and recovered by action of debt, or by indictment or information, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and if recovered in consequence of any seizure made by the commander of any public armed vessel of the United States, shall be distributed according to the rules prescribed by the act, entitled "An act for the government of the Navy of the United States," and if otherwise, shall be distributed, and accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and may be mitigated or remitted in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," passed the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and made perpetual by an act passed the eleventh of February, one thousand eight hundred; and any officer or other person entitled to a part or share of any of the fines, penalties, or forfeitures aforesaid, may, if necessary, be a witness on the trial, therefor, but in such case he shall not receive any part or share of the said fine, penalty, or forfeiture, but the part or share to which he would otherwise be entitled shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to hire, arm, and employ thirty vessels, not exceeding in tonnage one hundred and thirty tons each, belonging to citizens of the United States, and so many seamen as shall be necessary to man the same, for immediate service, in enforcing the laws of the United States on the seacoast thereof, and to dismiss the same from service, whenever he shall deem the same expedient: Provided, however, That such hiring, arming, and employment, shall not be for a term exceeding one year. And the said ships or vessels, when so fitted and armed, shall be employed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the powers given to the President of the United States by the seventh section of the act of March the twelfth, one thousand eight hundred and eight, to grant permission to citizens having property of value in places without the jurisdiction of the United States, to dispatch vessels for the same, shall henceforth cease.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force from and after the passing thereof, during the continuance of the act, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," and no longer.

Approved, January 9, 1809.

An Act to revive and continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act, passed on the twenty-fifth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and four, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," as is contained in the first section of the said act, (and which was revived and continued in force, for the time therein mentioned, by an act, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," passed the nineteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight) be, and the same hereby is, revived and continued in force until the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ten: Provided, however, That the additional duty laid by the said section shall be collected on all such goods, wares, and merchandise, liable to pay the same, as shall have been imported previous to that day.

Approved, January 10, 1809.

An Act authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots, in the City of Washington, to have the same subdivided and admitted to record.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the proprietor of any square or lot, in the City of Washington, shall deem it necessary to subdivide such square or lot into convenient building lots, pieces, or portions, for sale and occupancy, and alleys for their accommodation, he may cause a plat of the same to be made, on which shall be expressed the dimensions and length of all the lines of such portions as are necessary for defining and laying off the same on the ground, and may certify such subdivision under his hand and seal, in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, upon the same plat, or on a paper or parchment attached thereto.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, at the request of the said proprietor, the surveyor of the city shall examine whether the lots, pieces, or parcels, into which any square or lot may be subdivided as aforesaid, agree in dimensions with the whole of the square or lot so intended to be subdivided, and whether the dimensions expressed on the plat of subdivision, be the true dimensions of the part so expressed; and if upon such examination, he shall find the plat correct, he shall certify the same under his hand and seal, with such remarks as appear to him necessary for the further illustration thereof, and record the said plat, as examined, in a book or books, to be kept by him for that purpose.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when such subdivision of any square or lot shall be so certified, examined, and recorded, the purchaser of any part thereof, or any person interested therein, may refer to the said plat and record for description, in the same manner as to squares and lots divided between the Commissioners and original proprietors; and the ways, alleys, or passages, laid out or expressed on such plat of subdivision, shall be and remain to the public, or subject to the uses declared by the person making such subdivision, at all times under the same police regulations as the alleys laid off by the Commissioners on division with the proprietors.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever the surveyor of the said city shall lay off any lot therein, or any of the parts into which a square or lot may be subdivided as aforesaid, he shall measure the whole of that front of the square on which such lot or part lies; and if, on such admeasurement, the whole front of the square exceeds or falls short of the aggregate of the fronts of the lots on that side of the square, as the same are recorded, he shall apportion such excess, or deficiency, among the lots or pieces on that front, agreeably to their respective dimensions. Whenever, on such admeasurement, the wall of a house previously erected by any proprietor, shall appear to stand on the adjoining lot of any other person in part less than seven inches in width thereon, such wall shall be considered as standing altogether on the land of such proprietor, who shall pay to the owner of the lot on which the wall may stand, a reasonable price for the ground so occupied, to be decided by arbitrators, or a jury, as the parties interested may agree; but if the wall of any house, already erected, cover seven inches or more in width of the adjoining lot, it shall be deemed a party wall, according to the regulations for building in said city, as promulgated by the President of the United States, and the ground so occupied, more than seven inches in width, shall be paid for as above. Which fact the surveyor shall ascertain and certify, and put on record at the request and expense of any person interested therein.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor to attend, when requested, and examine the foundation or walls of any house to be erected, when the same shall be level with the street or surface of the ground, for the purpose of adjusting the line of the front of such building to the line of the street, and correctly placing the party wall on the line of division between that and the adjoining lot; and his certificate of the fact shall be admitted as evidence, and binding on the parties interested.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the surveyor shall be authorized to receive from the persons for whom he shall perform the services required by this act, the fees following, that is to say: For examining the plat and calculations of any subdivision of a square or lot, twelve and a half cents for each of the lots or portions into which it may be subdivided: Provided, That no more shall be paid for the lots in one square than one dollar and fifty cents; for examining any building and giving the certificate required by the fifth section of this act, and recording the same, one dollar and fifty cents; for recording any division or subdivision of any square or lots, for transcripts from records, and for searches in his office, the same fees that have heretofore been paid to the clerk of the county: Provided, That they do not in any case exceed the fee hereby allowed for examination.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all records of the division of squares and lots heretofore made between the public and original proprietors, or which are authorized by this act, shall be kept in the office of the surveyor of the city; and all transcripts therefrom, certified by him, shall be evidence equally valid with certified transcripts from the keeper of the office for recording deeds for the conveyance of land in the county of Washington.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall deem it necessary to subdivide any square or lot belonging to the United States, within the City of Washington, which may not have been reserved for public purposes, into convenient building lots, pieces, or portions, for sale and occupancy, and alleys, for their accommodation, he may cause a plat to be made by the surveyor of the city in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, which plat shall be recorded by the said surveyor, and the provisions of this act shall extend to the lots, pieces, and parcels of ground contained in such plat as fully as to subdivisions made by individual proprietors.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the surveyor of the City of Washington, before entering upon the discharge of the duties required of him by this act, shall take an oath or affirmation before the mayor of the City of Washington, that he will faithfully and impartially perform the duties hereinbefore required of him.

Approved, January 12, 1809.

An Act supplemental to an act, entitled "An act for extending the terms of credit on revenue bonds in certain cases, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c., That the payment of all bonds given, subsequent to the date of the act to which this act is a supplement, for duties on coffee, sugar, pepper, indigo, cocoa, and wine, paying a duty of twenty-three cents per gallon, and which remain unpaid, or for the same articles which may arrive hereafter in any of the ports of the United States, and whilst the act entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," shall continue in force, may be suspended, subject however in all respects to the conditions and provisions made and provided in the act of the tenth of March, one thousand eight hundred and eight, to which this act is a supplement: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to importations made in vessels dispatched under permissions granted by the President of the United States in pursuance of powers in him vested by the seventh section of the act, entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States.'"

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the amount of any bond given for the payment of duties on the importation of coffee, sugar, pepper, indigo, cocoa, or wine, paying a duty of twenty-three cents per gallon, made subsequent to the passage of the act to which this is a supplement, and which bond would by virtue of this act have been entitled to an extension of credit, shall have been previously paid, the money so paid shall, by the proper collector, be refunded to the person or persons who shall have paid the same, or to his, her, or their agent or agents, on his or their giving a bond with sureties, in the same manner and on the same terms, conditions, and restrictions, and on a compliance of the person or persons receiving the indulgence hereby granted, with all the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement.

Approved, January 12, 1809.

An Act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the adjournment of the present session, the next meeting of Congress shall be on the fourth Monday of May next.

Approved, January 30, 1809.

An Act authorising the employment of an additional Naval force,

Be it enacted, &c., That, in addition to the frigates now employed in actual service, there be fitted out, officered and manned, as soon as may be, the four following frigates, to wit: the United States, Essex, John Adams, and President; and moreover the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to equip, man, and employ, in actual service, so many of the public armed vessels, now laid up in ordinary, and gunboats, as in his judgment the public service may require; and to cause the frigates, and other armed vessels, when prepared for actual service, respectively, to be stationed at such ports and places on the seacoast as he may deem most expedient, or to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States or the territories thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying the foregoing provision into immediate effect, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, in addition to the number of petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, at present authorized by law, to appoint, and cause to be engaged and employed as soon as may be, three hundred midshipmen, three thousand six hundred able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, who shall be engaged to serve for a period not exceeding two years; but the President may discharge the same sooner, if in his judgment their service may be dispensed with. And to satisfy the necessary expenditures to be incurred therein, a sum not exceeding four hundred thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, and shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, January 31, 1809.

An Act for dividing the Indiana Territory into two separate Governments.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of March next, all that part of the Indiana Territory which lies west of the Wabash river, and a direct line drawn from the said Wabash river and Post Vincennes, due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, shall, for the purpose of temporary government, constitute a separate Territory, and be called Illinois.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established within the said Territory a government in all respects similar to that provided by the ordinance of Congress, passed on the thirteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; and by an act passed on the seventh day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, entitled "An act to provide for the government of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio;" and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, by the said ordinance.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officers for the said Territory, who, by virtue of this act, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall respectively exercise the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive for their services the same compensations as by the ordinance aforesaid, and the laws of the United States, have been provided and established for similar officers in the Indiana Territory. And the duties and emoluments of Superintendent of Indian Affairs shall be united with those of Governor: Provided, That the President of the United States shall have full power, in the recess of Congress, to appoint and commission all officers herein authorized, and their commissions shall continue in force until the end of the next session of Congress.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio river, as relates to the organization of a General Assembly therein, and prescribes the powers thereof, shall be in force, and operate in the Illinois Territory, whenever satisfactory evidence shall be given to the Governor thereof that such is the wish of a majority of the freeholders, notwithstanding there may not be therein five thousand free male inhabitants of the age of twenty-one years and upwards: Provided, That until there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of twenty-one years and upwards in said Territory, the whole number of representatives to the General Assembly shall not be less than seven, nor more than nine, to be apportioned by the Governor to the several counties in the said Territory, agreeably to the number of free males of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, which they may respectively contain.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed so as in any manner to affect the government now in force in the Indiana Territory, further than to prohibit the exercise thereof within the Illinois Territory, from and after the aforesaid first day of March next.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all suits, process, and proceedings, which, on the first day of March next, shall be pending in the court of any county which shall be included within the said Territory of Illinois, and also all suits, process, and proceedings, which, on the said first day of March next, shall be pending in the general court of the Indiana Territory, in consequence of any writ of removal, or order for trial at bar, and which had been removed from any of the counties included within the limits of the Territory of Illinois aforesaid, shall, in all things concerning the same, be proceeded on, and judgments and decrees rendered thereon, in the same manner as if the said Indiana Territory had remained undivided.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent the collection of taxes which may, on the first day of March next, be due to the Indiana Territory on lands lying in the said Territory of Illinois.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That until it shall be otherwise ordered by the Legislature of the said Illinois Territory, Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi river, shall be the seat of government for the said Illinois Territory.

Approved, February 3, 1809.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing Circuit Courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the Districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio.'"

Be it enacted, &c., That in all actions or suits that were pending in the circuit courts of the United States for the district of Tennessee, established by an act entitled "An act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio," in which any judgment or decree was rendered, or any sentence passed previous to the passage of the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts of the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio,'" the clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the district of East Tennessee be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue executions, and all other process necessary for carrying the same into complete effect, in the same manner as if the said last mentioned act had not passed; which executions and other process shall be directed to the marshal of either of the districts of East or West Tennessee, in which the party against whom the same shall issue may reside, or his property may be found, who shall execute and return the same in like manner he would have done if the act to which this is a supplement had not passed, and shall receive the same fees as are by law allowed for similar services in other cases.

SEC. 2. And, be it further enacted, That the next session of the district court of the United States, for the district of Kentucky, shall be holden on the second Monday in May next, and that the session of the said court heretofore holden on the first Monday in June, annually, shall thereafter be holden annually on the second Monday in May.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all writs and process, which shall have been issued, or may hereafter issue, and all recognisances returnable, and all suits and other proceedings of what nature or kind soever, which have been

continued to the said district court on the first Monday in June next, from the last December term, shall be returned and held continued to the said second Monday in May next.

Approved, February 4, 1809.

An Act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and to defray the expense of deepening and extending to the river Mississippi, the canal of Carondelet.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for the purpose of completing the fortifications commenced for the security of the seaport towns and harbors of the United States, and Territories thereof, exclusive of the contemplated line of blocks and chains across the harbor of New York, there be, and hereby is, appropriated the sum of four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the canal of Carondelet, leading from Lake Pontchartrain, by way of the bayou St. John, to the city of New Orleans, to be extended to the river Mississippi, and made sufficiently deep throughout to admit an easy and safe passage to gunboats, if, upon survey thereof, he shall be convinced that the same is practicable, and will conduce to the more effectual defence of said city; and that, for the purpose of defraying the expense thereof, there be and hereby is appropriated the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 10, 1809.

An Act to revive and continue, for a further time, the authority of the Commissioners of Kaskaskia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the powers heretofore vested in the register and receiver of public moneys for the district of Kaskaskia be, and the same are hereby revived; and the said register and receiver shall be allowed until the first day of January next to complete the investigation of claims to land in said district. They shall have full power to revise any of their former decisions, and also the same power and authority in relation to claims to land in the village of Peoria; notices of which have heretofore been filed, as they have in relation to other claims in the said district. And the said register and receiver, and the clerk of the board, shall each be allowed an additional compensation of five hundred dollars, in full for his services in relation to such claims.

Approved, February 15, 1809.

An Act to incorporate a company for opening the canal in the City of Washington.

Be it enacted, &c., That Robert Brent, Samuel N. Smallwood, Daniel Carroll of Duddington, John Law, William Brent, Frederick May, Elias B. Caldwell, James D. Barry, Griffith Coombe, and George Blagden, or any five of them, be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners to open, or cause to be opened, a book for receiving and entering subscriptions for raising a capital stock not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, in shares of one hundred dollars each, for the purpose of opening the canal to communicate from the Potomac river to the Eastern Branch thereof, through a part of the City of Washington, and that one month's notice be given in one of the newspapers printed in Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, of the time and place of opening the said subscription book, and that the same be kept open until the sum of forty thousand dollars be subscribed: Provided, That no subscription shall be received unless the sum of ten dollars be paid into the hands of the persons authorized to receive the same, on each share subscribed for.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, as soon as the aforesaid sum of forty thousand dollars be subscribed, the said commissioners, or any five of them, shall call a meeting of the stockholders at the City of Washington, by advertisement in one of the newspapers printed in Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, appointing a fit and convenient time and place of meeting; and the said stockholders shall proceed in person, or by proxy, to the election, by ballot, of a president and six directors for conducting the undertaking, and managing the business of the company, for and during the term of one year from the time of their appointment.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said stockholders and their successors, from the time of the said first meeting, shall be, and they are hereby declared to be, incorporated by the name of the "Washington Canal Company," and by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, and may make all necessary by-laws and regulations for the proper management of the business of the company: Provided, That the same be not contrary to the laws of the United States, or the laws in force in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall continue in office one year from the time of their election, and the directors may fill any vacancy which may happen in their own body during the term for which they were elected; and in case of the death, resignation, or disqualification, of the president, they may elect a president to serve for the residue of the term. And the said stockholders, in one year after the day on which the election of president and directors shall be first made, and on the same day in every year thereafter, (except the same shall happen on Sunday, in that case on the day succeeding,) shall elect, by ballot, from among the stockholders, one person as president, and six persons as directors; and the president and directors, for the time being, shall give public notice in one of the newspapers printed in Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, for a new election, at least ten days previous to the expiration of the time for which they were elected; and each stockholder shall be allowed one vote for every share by him or her held at the time in said company; and any stockholder, by a written authority, under his or her hand, and executed in the presence of two witnesses, may depute any other stockholder to vote and act as proxy for him or her at any general meeting.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors, so elected, and their successors, shall be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to agree with any person or persons, on behalf of said company, to cut the canal, as laid down on the plan of the City of Washington, erect such locks, and perform such other works, as they shall judge necessary for opening the canal aforesaid, and the forks thereof; and out of the moneys arising from subscriptions, wharfage, and tolls, to pay for the same; and to repair and improve the said canal, locks, and other works necessary thereto, and to defray all incidental charges, and also to appoint a treasurer, clerk, and such other officers, toll-gatherers, managers, and servants, as they shall judge requisite, and to settle their respective wages.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the treasurer of the said company shall, before he acts as such, give bond to the company in such penalty, and with such security, as the said president and directors shall direct, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors, so elected, and their successors, shall have full power and authority to demand and receive of the stockholders, in equal proportions, the remaining nine-tenths of the shares, from time to time, as they shall judge necessary; and if any of the stockholders shall neglect or refuse to pay their proportions, within one month after the same shall have been ordered, the share or shares of such defaulter shall be forfeited: Provided, That notice shall be given, by advertisement, in one of the newspapers printed in Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, of the time when the same shall be ordered to be paid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall not begin to collect wharfage or tolls, until the canal is made navigable for boats and scows drawing three feet water to pass through the same, from the Potomac river to the Eastern Branch thereof: and if at any time the said canal shall become obstructed, so that boats and scows drawing three feet water cannot pass through the same, from the Potomac river, to the Eastern Branch thereof, it shall not be lawful for the said company to collect any wharfage or tolls, until such obstruction shall have been removed.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That every president and director, before he acts as such, shall take an oath or affirmation that he will well and faithfully discharge the duties of his office; and any four of the directors, with the president, shall constitute a quorum for transacting any business of the company.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the shares in the said company shall be deemed personal and not real property, and transferable in such manner as the company shall direct, and that the shares held by any individual shall be liable to be attached or taken by fieri facias, to satisfy the debts due from any such individual, in like manner as other personal property may be.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a general meeting of the stockholders on the first Monday in June, and the first Monday in December, in every year, in the City of Washington, to which meeting the president and directors shall make a report, and render distinct and just accounts of all their proceedings; and on finding them justly and fairly stated, the stockholders then present or a majority of them, shall give a certificate thereof; and at such half yearly general meetings, after leaving in the hands of the treasurer such sum as shall be judged necessary for repairs, improvements, or contingent charges, an equal dividend of all the net profits arising from the wharfage and tolls hereby granted shall be ordered, and made to and among all the stockholders of the said company, in proportion to their several shares: Provided, That if the net profits shall, in any year, exceed fifteen per centum on the sum actually expended by the said company, in opening the said canal, and completing the same, the fifteen per centum only of the net profits shall be divided among the stockholders, and the excess shall be paid to the Mayor and City Council of the City of Washington, for the use of the said city.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That, for and in consideration of the expenses the said stockholders shall incur in cutting the canal, erecting locks, and in maintaining and keeping the same in repair, and in the enlargement and improvement of the same, the said company is hereby authorized to collect on all articles and materials landed on each side of the canal, from on board any boat or scow, or placed on either side of the said canal, for the purpose of being taken therefrom by any boat or scow, according to such rates as the president and directors may, from time to time, by their by-laws, order and direct: Provided, That the said rates shall, at no time hereafter, and in no particular, exceed the rates which are, or may be, established by the owners of wharves in the City of Washington. And it shall and may be lawful for the said company to demand and receive, at the most convenient place, for all articles carried through the said canal, tolls not exceeding the following rates, that is to say: for each unloaded boat or scow, twenty-five cents; for each barrel of flour, two cents; for each barrel of beef or pork, two cents; for each barrel of whiskey or brandy, three cents; for each hoghead or pipe, six cents; and upon all other articles, packages, and commodities, one-sixth part of the amount of tolls allowed by law to be received by the Potomac Company, at the Great Falls of the river Potomac. And the said company shall also have the exclusive right to establish a packet-boat or boats upon the said canal for carrying passengers, and no other packet-boat or boats, but such as are established or permitted by them, shall be allowed to carry passengers through the same for hire.

SEC. 13. Provided always, and be it further en- acted, That all public property shall pass through the said canal free of toll, and also, that in case the said canal and one of the forks thereof shall not be completed within the term of seven years from the passage of this act, in such manner as to admit boats and scows drawing three feet water to pass through the same, that the said canal shall revert to the United States, and all right and authority hereby granted to the said company shall cease and determine.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall, from time to time, whenever the Mayor and City Council shall order and direct, suffer bridges to be erected across the canal, and shall suffer the same when erected to be repaired: Provided, That every bridge so erected, shall be at least six feet above high water mark.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of said company, after the said canal shall be opened and made passable for boats and scows drawing three feet of water, shall annually, in the month of January, lay before the Congress of the United States, a just and true account of their receipts and expenditures, with a statement of the clear profits thereof.

Approved, February 17, 1809.

An Act extending the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the citizens of the Indiana Territory entitled to vote for Representatives to the General Assembly thereof, shall, at the time of electing their Representatives to the said General Assembly, also elect one Delegate from the said Territory to the Congress of the United States, who shall possess the same powers heretofore granted to the Delegates from the several Territories of the United States, anything in the ordinance for the government of the said Territory to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sheriffs of the several counties, which now are, or may hereafter be established in the said Territory, respectively, shall, within forty days next after an election for a Delegate to Congress transmit to the Secretary of the Territory a certified copy of the returns from the several townships in their counties respectively. And it shall be the duty of the Governor, for the time being, to give to the person having the greatest number of votes, a certificate of his election.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, so soon as the Governor of the said Territory shall divide the same into five districts, the citizens thereof entitled to vote for Representatives to the said General Assembly, shall, in each of the said districts, elect one member of the Legislative Council, who shall possess the same powers heretofore granted to the Legislative Council in the said Territory, and shall hold their offices four years, and no longer; anything in the ordinance for the government of the said Territory to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the General Assembly of the said Territory shall have power to apportion the Representatives of the several counties therein, or which may hereafter be established therein, according to the number of free white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, in such counties; Provided, that there be not more than twelve, nor less than nine, of the whole number of Representatives, any act or acts to the contrary notwithstanding, until there shall be six thousand free male white inhabitants, above the age of twenty-one years, in said Territory; after which time, the number of Representatives shall be regulated agreeably to the ordinance for the government thereof.

Approved, February 27, 1809.

An Act freeing from postage all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson.

Be it enacted, &c., That all letters and packets to Thomas Jefferson, now President of the United States, after the expiration of his term of office and during his life, shall be carried by the mail, free of postage.

Approved, February 28, 1809.

An Act for the disposal of certain tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, claimed under Spanish grants, reported by the Land Commissioners as antedated, and to confirm the claims of Abraham Ellis and Daniel Harregal.

Be it enacted, &c., That the several tracts of land in the Mississippi Territory, the titles to which have been derived under Spanish claims, and which have been disallowed by the Boards of Commissioners east and west of Pearl river, on suspicion of the grants, warrants, or orders of survey, on which the claims are grounded, being antedated, or otherwise fraudulent, and which are embraced in the report of the said Boards of Commissioners, laid before Congress, agreeably to the third section of an act, entitled, "An act supplementary to the act, entitled an act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," shall be, and the same are hereby directed to be sold, in the same manner, at the same price, and on the same terms and conditions as have been, or may be by law provided for the sale of the other public lands in the said Territory; and any person or persons claiming under a Spanish grant, warrant, or order of survey, as aforesaid, shall be entitled to institute, in the highest court of law or equity in the said Territory, his or their suit or action for the recovery of the tract or tracts so claimed as aforesaid: Provided, such claimant or claimants shall institute his or their suit or action within the term of one year from and after the tract or tracts so claimed shall have been sold by the United States; or, in case the same is now inhabited and cultivated in virtue of a pre-emption right, within one year from and after the passing of this act; and if any person or persons, claiming lands as aforesaid, shall fail or neglect to commence or institute his or their suit or action, in the manner, and within the time prescribed by this section, or shall be nonsuit, or discontinue the same, his or their right to commence such suit or action, in any court whatsoever, shall be forever barred and foreclosed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted. That if the person or persons claiming under such grant, warrant, or order of survey, shall make it appear to the satisfaction of the court before whom such suit or action shall be pending, that the tract of land therein specified was actually surveyed prior to the twenty-seventh day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, then, and in that case, the same shall be deemed and held to be good and valid to all intents and purposes, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding. But in case the claimant or claimants shall fail to prove the tract or tracts of land so claimed, to have been actually surveyed prior to the twenty-seventh day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, or, in case the same shall appear to be otherwise fraudulent or illegal, the grant, warrant, or order of survey, granted by the Spanish Government, as aforesaid, by virtue of which such tract or tracts of land may be claimed, shall be, and the same is hereby declared, null and void, to all intents and purposes, and shall not be read in evidence against any claim or certificate of pre-emption, derived from the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful, in the trial of such suit or action, for either party to introduce parole evidence, for the purpose of supporting or invalidating the grant, warrant, or order of survey, as aforesaid; and the judgment, sentence, or decree of the said highest court of law or equity, in the cases aforesaid, shall be final and conclusive between the parties, and may be plead in bar to any subsequent suit or action brought in the same, or any other court, for the recovery of the same land, or any part thereof.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That Abraham Ellis be, and he is hereby, confirmed in a tract of land, granted by the British government of West Florida to Stephen Jordan, containing the quantity of two hundred acres, lying on the waters of Boyd's creek, according to the metes and bounds of said tract of land set forth in the plat thereof made by the Surveyor General of said province of West Florida; and that the amount of money which the said Ellis may have been compelled to pay to the receiver of public moneys west of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, for said tract of land, be refunded to him by the receiver aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That Daniel Harregal be, and he is hereby, confirmed in his title in fee simple to the tract of land whereon he resides, containing the quantity of five hundred and fifty acres, agreeably to a plat thereof filed with the Register of the land office, west of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory.

Approved, February 28, 1809.

An act for the relief of certain Alabama Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be surveyed and designated the metes and bounds, a tract of land, containing two thousand five hundred acres, more or less, of the United States, lying in the parishes of Orleans and west of the river Mississippi, by lease, vest the said tract of land to the tribe of Alabama Indians, and their descendants, for the term of fifty years. Provided, That it shall not be lawful for any person of Indians to transfer or assign the title to the said land, and every such transfer or assignment shall be null and void: And provided, That, if the said tribe of Indians shall remove from the said tract of land, their title to the same shall henceforth cease.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, two tracts of land in the Michigan Territory, one including the place called Brownstown, and the other including the place called Maguaga, in the possession of the tribe of Indians, containing more than five thousand acres, two tracts of land shall be reserved for the use of the Wyandots, and their descendants, in the same manner, and on the same terms and conditions, as is provided in the act of the Alabama Indians by the first act.

Approved, February 28, 1809.

An Act to interdict commercial intercourse with the United States and Great Britain and their dependencies, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from the date of the passage of this act, the entrance of any vessel into the harbors and waters of the United States, and the navigation thereof, be, and the same is hereby, interdicted to all public ships and vessels of Great Britain or France, excepting vessels which may be forced in by distress, or which may be charged with despatches or business for the Government to which they belong, and vessels having no cargo or merchandise on board. And if any public ship or vessel as aforesaid, being included in the exception above mentioned, shall enter any harbors or waters within the jurisdiction of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other person as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to seize such part of the land and naval forces, or the militia of the United States, or the vessels thereof, as he shall deem necessary, to prevent the ship or vessel to depart.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or the Territories thereof, or any person or persons residing or being in the same, to have any intercourse with, or to furnish any aid or supplies to any public ship or vessel aforesaid, which shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, have entered any harbor or waters within the jurisdiction of the United States, or the Territories thereof; and if any person shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, have any intercourse with such ship or vessel, or shall afford any aid to such ship or vessel, either in repairing the said vessel, or in furnishing her, her officers and crew, with supplies of any kind, or in any manner whatever, or if any pilot or other person shall assist in navigating or piloting such ship or vessel, unless it be for the purpose of carrying her beyond the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay a sum not less than one hundred dollars, nor exceeding ten thousand dollars; and shall also be imprisoned for a term not less than one month, nor more than one year.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the twentieth day of May next, the entrance of the harbors and waters of the United States and the Territories thereof, be, and the same is hereby, interdicted to all ships or vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either; vessels hired, chartered, or employed, by the Government of either country, for the sole purpose of carrying letters or despatches, and also vessels forced in by distress, or by the dangers of the sea, only excepted. And if any ship or vessel sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject of either, and not excepted as aforesaid, shall, after the said twentieth day of May next, arrive, either with or without a cargo, within the limits of the United States, or of the Territories thereof, such ship or vessel, together with the cargo, if any, which may be found on board, shall be forfeited, and may be seized and condemned in any court of the United States, or the Territories thereof, having competent jurisdiction; and all and every act and acts heretofore passed, which shall be within the purview of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the twentieth day of May next, it shall not be lawful to import into the United States, or the Territories thereof, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, from any port or place, situated in Great Britain or Ireland, or in any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, nor from any port or place situated in France, or in any of her colonies or dependencies, nor from any port or place in the actual possession of either Great Britain or France. Nor shall it be lawful to import into the United States, or the Territories thereof, from any foreign port or place whatever, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of France, or of any of her colonies or dependencies, or being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, or being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of any place or country in the actual possession of either France or Great Britain: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the cargoes of ships or vessels wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, which had cleared for any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope, prior to the twenty-second day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven, or which had departed for such port by permission of the President, under the acts supplementary to the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the twentieth of May, be imported into the United States, or the Territories thereof, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after the said twentieth of May, be put on board of any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with intention of importing the same into the United States, or the Territories thereof, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited; and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the twentieth of May, be put on board of any ship, or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with intention to import the same into the United States, or the Territories thereof, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and with the knowledge of the owner or master of such ship, or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, such ship, or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, shall be forfeited, and the owner and master thereof shall, moreover, each, forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, and which shall, nevertheless, be on board of any ship, or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after the said twentieth of May next, in the United States, or the Territories thereof, shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry, of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship, or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures, shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission, or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise, imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same has been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise, which he or they now have by law in relation to goods, wares, and merchandise, subject to duty; and, if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise, so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the following additions shall be made to the oath or affirmation taken by the masters, or persons, having the charge or command of any ship, or vessel, arriving at any port of the United States, or the Territories thereof, after the twentieth of May, viz: "I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board, [insert the denomination and name of the vessel,] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the United States, or the Territories thereof, is prohibited by law: And I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, on board the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district."

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the following addition be made, after the twentieth of May, to the oath or affirmation taken by importers, consignees, or agents, at the time of entering goods imported into the United States, or the Territories thereof, viz:

"I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, among the said goods, wares, and merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the United States, or the Territories thereof, is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, among the said goods, wares, and merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district."

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts, as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation; after which the trade of the United States, suspended by this act, and by the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, may be renewed with the nation so doing: Provided, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been previously incurred, by virtue of this or of any other act, the operation of which shall so cease and determine, shall be recovered and distributed, in like manner as if the same had continued in full force and virtue: and vessels bound thereafter to any foreign port or place, with which commercial intercourse shall, by virtue of this section, be again permitted, shall give bond to the United States with approved security in double the value of the vessel and cargo, that they shall not proceed to any foreign port, nor trade with any country other than those with which commercial intercourse shall have been or may be permitted by this act.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as forbids the departure of vessels owned by citizens of the United States, and the exportation of domestic and foreign merchandise to any foreign port or place, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, after the fifteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and nine, except so far as they relate to Great Britain or France, or their colonies or dependencies, or places in the actual possession of either: Provided, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been previously incurred by virtue of so much of the said acts as is repealed by this act, or which have been, or may hereafter be, incurred by virtue of the said acts, on account of any infraction of so much of the said acts as is not repealed by this act, shall be recovered and distributed in like manner as if the said acts had continued in full force and virtue.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That during the continuance of so much of the act laying an embargo on ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as is not repealed by this act, no ship or vessel bound to a foreign port, with which commercial intercourse shall, by virtue of this act, be again permitted, shall be allowed to depart for such port, unless the owner or owners, consignee or factor of such ship or vessel shall, with the master, have given bond with one or more sureties to the United States, in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, if the vessel is wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States; and in a sum four times the value, if the vessel is owned in part or in whole by any foreigner or foreigners, that the vessel shall not leave the port without a clearance, nor shall, when leaving the port, proceed to any port or place in Great Britain or France, or in the colonies or dependencies of either, or in the actual possession of either, nor be directly or indirectly engaged during the voyage in any trade with such port, nor shall put any article on board of any other vessel; nor unless every other requisite and provision of the second section of the act entitled "An act to enforce and make more effectual an act, entitled 'An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto,'" shall have been complied with. And the party or parties to the abovementioned bond shall, within a reasonable time after the date of the same, to be expressed in said bond, produce to the collector of the district from which the vessel shall have been cleared, a certificate of the landing of the same, in the same manner as is provided by law for the landing of goods exported with the privilege of drawback; on failure whereof, the bond shall be put in suit; and in every such suit judgment shall be given against the defendant or defendants, unless proof shall be procured of such relanding, or of loss at sea.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as compels vessels owned by citizens of the United States, bound to another port of the said States, or vessels licensed for the coasting trade, or boats, either not masted or not decked, to give bond, and to load, under the inspection of a revenue officer, or renders them liable to detention, merely on account of the nature of their cargo, (such provisions excepted as relate to collection districts adjacent to the territories, colonies or provinces of a foreign nation, or to vessels belonging or bound to such districts) be, and the same is hereby, repealed, from and after the fifteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and nine: Provided, however, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been previously incurred by any of the said acts, or which may hereafter be incurred by virtue of the said acts, on account of any infraction of so much of the said acts as is not repealed by this act, shall be recovered and distributed in like manner as if the same had continued in full force and virtue.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That during the continuance of so much of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as is not repealed by this act, no vessel owned by citizens of the United States, bound to another port of the said States, or licensed for the coasting trade, shall be allowed to depart from any port of the United States, or shall receive a clearance, nor shall it be lawful to put on board any such vessel any specie, or goods, wares, or merchandise, unless a permit shall have been previously obtained from the proper collector, or from a revenue officer, authorized by the collector to grant such permits; nor unless the owner, consignee, agent, or factor, shall, with the master, give bond, with one or more sureties, to the United States, in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, that the vessel shall not proceed to any foreign port or place, and that the cargo shall be relanded in some port of the United States: Provided, That it shall be lawful and sufficient in the case of any such vessel, whose employment has been uniformly confined to rivers, bays, and sounds, within the jurisdiction of the United States, to give bond, in an amount equal to one hundred and fifty dollars, for each ton of said vessel, with condition that such vessel shall not, during the time limited in the condition of the bond, proceed to any foreign port or place, or put any article on board of any other vessel, or be employed in any foreign trade.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall, during the continuance of so much of the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and of the several acts supplementary thereto, as is not repealed by this act, depart from any port of the United States without a clearance or permit, or having given bond in the manner provided by law, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, shall be wholly forfeited; and the owner or owners, agent, freighter, or factors, master, or commander of such ship or vessel, shall, moreover, severally forfeit, and pay a sum equal to the value of the ship or vessel, and of the cargo put on board the same.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, passed the eighteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, and the act supplementary thereto, be, and the same are hereby repealed, from and after the said twentieth day of May next: Provided, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall have been previously incurred by virtue of the said acts, shall be recovered and distributed in like manner, as if the said acts had continued in full force and virtue.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures arising under, or incurred by virtue of this act, may be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, with costs of suit, by action of debt, in the name of the United States of America, or by indictment or information, in any court having competent jurisdiction to try the same; and shall be distributed and accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine; and such penalties and forfeitures may be examined, mitigated, or remitted, in like manner, and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions, as are prescribed, authorized, and directed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned," passed the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, and made perpetual by an act passed the eleventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force until the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer; and that the act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States, and the several acts supplementary thereto, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed, from and after the end of the next session of Congress.

Approved, March 1, 1809.

An Act making provision for the further accommodation of the household of the President of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the third day of March next, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to cause to be sold such articles furnished by the United States, for the President's household, as may be decayed, out of repair, or unfit for use; and that the proceeds of such sale, and so much of a sum not exceeding fourteen thousand dollars in addition thereto, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as the President of the United States may judge necessary, be, and hereby are, appropriated for the accommodation of the household of the President, to be laid out and expended for such articles of furniture as he shall direct.

Approved, March 2, 1809.

An Act to extend the time for making payment for the public lands of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That every person who has heretofore purchased any of the public lands of the United States, at any of the land offices established for the disposal of the said lands, whether such purchase was made at public or private sale, (sales by virtue of a pre-emption right only excepted,) and whose lands have not already been actually sold or reverted to the United States, for non-payment of part of the purchase money, and the time for making the last payment on account of such purchase, according to former laws, may have expired, or shall expire, on or before the first day of January next, shall be allowed a further term of two years for the payment of the residue of the principal due on account of such purchase; which further term of two years shall be calculated to commence from the expiration of one year from and after the day on which the last payment on account of such purchase should, according to former laws, have become due, and shall be allowed only on the following conditions; that is to say:—First, That all the arrears of interest, on the land purchased, to the end of one year from and after the day on which the last payment on account of such purchase should, according to former laws, have become due, shall have been paid at or before the end of such year. Second, That the residue of the sum, due on account of the principal of such purchase, shall be paid, with interest thereon, in two equal annual payments, viz: one half of the said residue, with the interest which may then be due thereon, within one year; and the other half of the said residue, with the interest which may then be due thereon, within two years after the expiration of one year from and after the day on which the last payment on account of such purchase should, according to former laws, have become due. And in case of failure in paying either the arrears of interest on each of the two instalments of principal, with the accruing interest, at the time and times above mentioned, the tract of land shall be forthwith advertised and offered for sale, in the manner and on the terms and conditions now prescribed for the sale of lands purchased from the United States, and not paid for within the limited time; and shall revert, in like manner, to the United States, if the sum due, with interest, be not at such sale bidden and paid.

Approved, March 2, 1809.

An Act further to amend the Judicial System of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, in case of the disability of the district judge of either of the districts of the United States to hold a district court, and to perform the duties of his office, and satisfactory evidence thereof being shown to the justice of the supreme court, allotted to that circuit in which such district court ought by law to be holden; and on application of the district attorney or marshal of such district in writing to the said justice of the supreme court, said justice of the supreme court shall thereupon issue his order, in the nature of a certiorari, directed to the clerk of such district court, requiring him forthwith to certify into the next circuit court, to be holden in said district, all actions, suits, causes, pleas, or processes, civil or criminal, of what nature or kind soever, that may be depending in said district court and undetermined, with all the proceedings thereon, and all files and papers relating thereto; which said order shall be immediately published in one or more newspapers, printed in said district, and at least thirty days before the session of such circuit court, and shall be deemed a sufficient notification to all concerned. And the said circuit court shall thereupon have the same cognizance of all such actions, suits, causes, pleas, or processes, civil or criminal, of what nature or kind soever, and in the like manner as the district court of said district by law might have, or the circuit court, had the same been originally commenced therein; and shall proceed to hear and determine the same accordingly; and the said justice of the supreme court, during the continuance of such disability, shall moreover be invested with and exercise all, and singular, the powers and authority vested by law in the judge of the district court in said district. And all bonds and recognisances taken for or returnable to such district court shall be construed and taken to be to the circuit court, to be holden thereafter, in pursuance of this act, and shall have the same force and effect in such circuit court, as they could have had in the district court to which they were taken: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to require of the judge of the supreme court within whose circuit such district may lie, to hold any special court, or court of admiralty, at any other time than the legal time for holding the circuit court of the United States in and for such districts.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of such district court shall, during the continuance of the disability of the district judge, continue to certify as aforesaid, all suits or actions of what nature or kind soever, which may thereafter be brought to such district court, and the same transmit to the circuit court next thereafter to be holden in the same district; and the said circuit court shall have cognizance of the same in like manner as is hereinbefore provided in this act, and shall proceed to hear and determine the same: Provided nevertheless, That when the disability of the district judge shall cease or be removed, all suits or actions then pending and undetermined in the circuit court, in which by law the district courts have an exclusive original cognizance, shall be remanded, and the clerk of the said circuit court shall transmit the same, pursuant to the order of said court, with all matters and things relating thereto, to the district court next thereafter to be holden in said district, and the same proceedings shall be had therein, in said district court, as would have been had the same originated or been continued in the said district court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in case of the district judge in any district being unable to discharge his duties, as aforesaid, the district clerk of such district, shall be authorized and empowered, by leave or order of the circuit judge of the circuit in which such district is included, to take, during such disability of the district judge, all examinations and depositions of witnesses, and make all necessary rules and orders, preparatory to the final hearing of all causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

Approved March 2, 1809.

An Act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments.

Be it enacted, &c., That all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, or of War, or of the Navy, upon the Treasurer of the United States, shall specify the particular appropriation or appropriations to which the same should be charged: The moneys paid by virtue of such warrants shall, in conformity therewith, be charged to such appropriation or appropriations, in the books kept in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in the case of warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, and in the books of the Accountants of the War or Navy Department, respectively, in the case of warrants drawn by the Secretary of War, or by the Secretary of the Navy; and the officers, agents, or other persons, who may be receivers of public moneys, shall render distinct accounts of the application of such moneys, according to the appropriation or appropriations under which the same shall have been drawn, and the Secretary of War and of the Navy shall, on the first day of January, in each and every year, severally report to Congress a distinct account of the expenditure and application of all such sums of money as may, prior to the thirtieth day of September preceding, have been by them respectively drawn from the Treasury in virtue of the appropriation law of the preceding year, and the sums appropriated by law for each branch of expenditure in the several departments shall be solely applied to the objects for which they are respectively appropriated, and to no other: Provided, nevertheless, That, during the recess of Congress, the President of the United States may, and he is hereby authorized, on the application of the Secretary of the proper department, and not otherwise, to direct, if in his opinion necessary for the public service, that a portion of the moneys appropriated for a particular branch of expenditure in that department, be applied to another branch of expenditure in the same department, in which case a special account of the moneys thus transferred, and of their application, shall be laid before Congress during the first week of their next ensuing session.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Treasury, in every case where in his opinion further delays would be injurious to the United States, and he is hereby authorized, to direct the Auditor of the Treasury, and the Accountants of the War and Navy Departments, at any time, forthwith to audit and settle any particular account which the said officers may be respectively authorized to audit and settle, and to report such settlement for his revision and final decision. And the said Comptroller shall also lay an annual statement before Congress, during the first week of their session, of the accounts in the Treasury, War, or Navy Departments, which may have remained more than three years unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years, prior to the thirtieth of September then last past, together with a statement of the causes which have prevented the settlement of the accounts or the recovery of the balances due to the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, exclusively of the Purveyor of Public Supplies, Paymasters of the Army, Pursers of the Navy, Military Agents, and other officers already authorized by law, no other permanent agents shall be appointed, either for the purpose of making contracts or for the purchase of supplies, or for disbursement in any other manner, of moneys for the Military Establishment, or of the Navy of the United States, but such as shall be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the President may, and he is hereby authorized, in the recess of the Senate, to appoint all or any of such agents, which appointments shall be submitted to the Senate at their next session, for their advice and consent, and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, until otherwise provided by law, to fix the number and compensations of such agents: Provided, That the compensation allowed to either shall not exceed one per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor in any instance the compensation allowed by law to the Purveyor of Public Supplies.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every such Agent as may be appointed by virtue of the next preceding section, and every Purser of the Navy, shall give bond, with one or more sufficient sureties, in such sums as the President of the United States may direct, for the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in him; and the Paymasters of the Army, Military Agents, the Purveyor of Public Supplies, the Pursers of the Navy, and the Agents appointed by virtue of the preceding section, shall, whenever practicable, keep the public moneys in their hands, in some incorporated bank, to be designated for the purpose by the President of the United States, and shall make monthly returns, in such form as may be prescribed by the Treasury Department, of the moneys received and expended during the preceding month, and of the unexpended balance in their hands.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all purchases and contracts for supplies or services which are or may, according to law, be made by or under the direction of either the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, shall be made either by open purchase, or by previously advertising for proposals respecting the same: And an annual statement of all such contracts and purchases, and also of the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Military Establishment, for the contingent expenses of the Navy of the United States, and the discharge of miscellaneous claims not otherwise provided for, and paid at the Treasury, shall be laid before Congress at the beginning of each year, by the Secretary of the proper department.

Approved, March 3, 1809.

An Act making a further appropriation towards completing the two wings of the Capitol, at the City of Washington, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums of money be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, that is to say:

For improvements and repairs of the House of Representatives, six thousand dollars:

For completing the work in the interior of the north wing, comprising the Senate Chamber, Court Room, &c., twenty thousand dollars.

For completing the staircase, and providing temporary and adequate accommodations for the Library, in the room now used for that purpose, and in the one in which the Senate now sit, five thousand dollars:

For improvements and repairs of the President's house and square, including a carriage house, twelve thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several sums of money hereby appropriated shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, March 3, 1809.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to amend the charter of Georgetown."

Be it enacted, &c., That the following shall, and are hereby declared to be the limits of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding, that is to say: beginning in the middle of College street, as laid down and designated in Fenwick's map of the said town, at or near to the bank of the river Potomac; thence, by a straight line drawn northerly through the middle of said street, to the middle of First street; thence by a line drawn through the middle of First street to a point directly opposite to the termination of the eastern line of the lots now enclosed as the property of the College; thence northerly by the eastern line of said enclosure as far as the same extends; thence in the same northerly direction to the middle of Fourth street; thence eastwardly by a line drawn along the middle of Fourth street to a point at the distance of one hundred and twenty feet westward from the west side of Fayette street; thence northerly by a line drawn parallel to Fayette street, at the said distance of one hundred and twenty feet westward from the west side thereof, until it intersects a boundary line of Beatty and Hawkins's addition to Georgetown; thence westwardly by said boundary line as far as it extends; thence by the courses and distances of the several other boundary lines of Beatty and Hawkins's addition aforesaid, that is to say: westwardly, northwardly, eastwardly, and southwardly, to a point opposite to the middle of Road street, and opposite or nearly opposite to the middle of Eighth street; thence eastwardly by a line drawn through the middle of Road street, as it now runs, and as far as it extends; thence eastwardly by a line drawn parallel to Back street, and continued in the same direction to the middle of Rock creek; thence by the middle of the same creek, and the middle of Potomac river, to a point directly opposite to the middle of College street, aforesaid: thence to the place of beginning.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Corporation of Georgetown be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to cause a complete and accurate survey to be made of the said town, agreeably to the courses and limits prescribed in the preceding section of this act, and to establish and fix, from time to time, permanent boundaries at such places as they may deem necessary and proper for perpetuating the boundaries of the said town, and after said survey shall have been so made, and approved by the Corporation, the same shall be admitted to record in the clerk's office for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the rights, powers and privileges heretofore granted to the said Corporation by the General Assembly of Maryland, and by the act to which this is a supplement, and which are at this time claimed and exercised by them, shall be and remain in full force and effect, and may and shall be exercised and enjoyed by them within the bounds and limits set forth and described in the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation shall have power to lay out, open, extend, and regulate streets, lanes, and alleys, within the limits of the town, as before described, under the following regulations, that is to say: the mayor of the town shall summon twelve freeholders, inhabitants of the town, not directly interested in the premises, who, being first sworn to assess and value what damages would be sustained by any person or persons by reason of the opening or extending any street, lane, or alley, (taking all benefits and inconveniences into consideration,) shall proceed to assess what damages would be sustained by any person or persons whomsoever, by reason of such opening or extension of the street, and shall also declare to what amount in money each individual benefited thereby shall contribute and pay towards compensating the person or persons injured by reason of such opening and extension: and the names of the person or persons so benefited, and the sums which they shall respectively be obliged to pay, shall be returned under their hands and seals to the clerk of the corporation, to be filed and kept in his office; and the person or persons benefited by opening or extending any street, and assessed as aforesaid, shall respectively pay the sums of money so charged and assessed to them, with interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time limited for the payment thereof, until paid; and the sums of money assessed and charged in manner aforesaid to each individual benefited in manner aforesaid, shall be a lien upon and bind all the property so benefited, to the full amount thereof: Provided always, That no street, lane, or alley, shall be laid out, opened, or extended, until the damages assessed to individuals in consequence thereof shall have been paid, or secured to be paid: And provided, also, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed or understood as to authorize the Corporation of Georgetown to locate, lay out, or open any street, lane, alley, or other way, through any of the squares or lots situated in that part of Thomas Beall's second addition to Georgetown, which lies north of Back street, without the consent and permission of the owner or proprietor of such square or lot, first had and obtained in writing, which consent and permission shall be acknowledged in the presence of, and such acknowledgment certified by the mayor of the town aforesaid, or some justice of the peace for the county of Washington.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Recorder of the Corporation shall be, and he is hereby declared to be, a member of the Board of Aldermen, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

Approved, March 3, 1809.

An Act to authorize the making of a turnpike road from Mason's Causeway to Alexandria.

Be it enacted, &c., That John Mason, David Wiley, Henry Foxall, John Cox, and John W. Bronaugh, be, and they are hereby appointed and constituted a Board of Commissioners, a majority of whom to constitute a quorum, with full power to receive and enter in such book or books as they may deem proper, by themselves or by their agents, subscriptions for raising a capital stock of twenty thousand dollars, in shares of one hundred dollars each, for the purpose of opening, graveling, and improving, a road from the west end of Mason's causeway to Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; the times, places, and manner of receiving and entering subscriptions, and the manner of authenticating powers of attorney, or other instruments of writing authorizing subscriptions, to be made by any person or persons, in the name of any other person or persons, to be ascertained by said Board of Commissioners, and duly advertised in such gazettes or public prints as they may deem expedient: Provided, That the books for receiving and entering subscriptions shall be opened on or before the first day of May next, and that no subscription shall be received unless the sum of ten dollars be first paid into the hands of such agent or other person as said Commissioners may authorize to receive it.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any number of persons shall have subscribed one hundred and fifty shares, or more, of the said stock, the said Commissioners, or a majority of them, may, and, when the whole number of shares aforesaid shall be subscribed, shall give notice, in some newspaper printed in the District of Columbia, of a time and place to be by them appointed for the subscribers to proceed to organize the said corporation, at which time and place the said subscribers, by a majority of votes, to be delivered by ballots in person, or by proxy duly authorized, shall elect one president and four directors, to conduct the business of said company for one year, and until other such officers shall be chosen in their place, and may make such rules, orders, and regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, as shall be necessary for the well-being of the affairs of said company: Provided, always, That no stockholder shall, in person or by proxy, have more than ten votes at any election, or in determining any question arising at such meeting, whatever number of shares he or she may hold; and each stockholder, in person or by proxy, shall be entitled to one vote for every share by him or her held under said number; and all persons who may then be, or thereafter may become, the actual holders or proprietors of shares in the said capital stock, either as subscribers for the same, or as the legal representatives, successors, or assignees, of such subscribers, shall become one body politic and corporate, in deed and in law, by the name and style of the President, Directors, and Company, of the Georgetown and Alexandria Turnpike Road, and by the said name shall have perpetual succession, and all the privileges incident to a corporation, and shall be capable of taking and holding their said capital stock, and the increase and profits thereof, and of enlarging the same by new subscriptions, if such enlargement shall be found necessary, to fulfil the intent of this act, and of purchasing, taking, and holding, to them, and their successors, and assigns, in fee-simple, or for any lesser estate, all such lands, tenements, hereditaments, and estate, real and personal, as shall be necessary or useful to them in the prosecution of their works, and of suing and being sued, of having a common seal, the same breaking and altering at pleasure, and of doing all and every other matter and thing concerning the subject aforesaid, which a corporation or body politic may lawfully do.

Public Acts of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall meet on the first Monday in February, in every year, at such place as shall be fixed by their by-laws, for the purpose of choosing such officers as aforesaid for the ensuing year, in manner aforesaid, and at such other times as they shall be summoned by the president and directors aforesaid; at which annual or special meetings they shall have full power and authority to do and perform any act by law allowed, and pertaining to the affairs of said company.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors shall procure printed certificates for all the shares of said stock, and shall deliver one such certificate, signed by the president, to each person for every share by him or her subscribed and held, which certificate shall be transferable at his or her pleasure, in person, or by attorney, in the presence of the president or treasurer, subject however to all payments due, or to grow due thereupon; and the assignee holding such certificate, having caused the assignment to be entered in a book of the company, to be kept for that purpose, shall be a member of said company, and for every certificate by him held, shall be entitled to one share in the capital stock and estate of said company; and if any stockholder, after thirty days' notice in a public paper printed in each of the towns of Alexandria and Georgetown, of the time and place appointed for the payment of any portion or dividend of the sum subscribed in said stock, shall neglect to pay the same for the space of thirty days after the time so appointed, the share or shares on which such delinquency has taken place shall be forfeited to the said company, and may be sold by them to any person, or persons, willing to purchase, for such price as can be obtained, and in case such share or shares should not, on a sale so to be made, produce a net sum equal to the portion or dividends then remaining to be paid thereon, such deficiency may be recovered of the person or persons, so failing to pay, by warrant from a justice of the peace, if the amount shall not exceed twenty dollars, and if the sum so due shall exceed twenty dollars, the same may be recovered by motion, in the name of the said company, on ten days' notice, in any court of record in the county or district where the debtor may be found; and in all such warrants and motions the certificate of the clerk or recording officer of the said company shall be conclusive evidence of the defendant's being a member of the company, and prima facie evidence of the amount due on the share or shares held by such defendant.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall meet at such times and places as shall be agreed upon for transacting their business; at which meetings any three members shall form a quorum, who, in the absence of the president, may choose a chairman, and shall keep minutes of all their transactions, fairly entered in a book; and a quorum being met, they shall have full power and authority to appoint a treasurer, and agree with and appoint all such surveyors, intendants, artists, or other agents, as they shall judge necessary to carry on the intended works, and to fix their salaries, wages, or compensation; to direct and order the times, manner, and proportions, when and in which the stockholders shall pay moneys due on their respective shares; to draw orders on the treasurer for all moneys due from the said company, and generally to do and transact all such other matters, acts, and things, as by the by-laws, rules, and regulations, of said company, shall be required or permitted.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall cause to be surveyed, laid down, ascertained and fixed, the said turnpike road, from the west end of Mason's causeway, and passing near to the head of the tidewater of Four Mile Run, at a place called Adam's Mill, and thence to the limits of Alexandria, in such route or track for the same, as in the best of their judgment and skill will combine shortness of distance with the most convenient ground, and the smallest expenditure of money; and it shall be lawful to and for the said president and directors, their surveyors and agents, to enter upon all and every the lands and enclosures in, through, and over which the said turnpike road may be thought proper to pass, and to examine the ground most proper for the purpose, and the quarries and beds of stone, and gravel, and other materials in the vicinity, that will be useful in making the said road: Provided, That the said road shall not be so laid out as to intersect the road laid out and established by the Washington and Alexandria turnpike company, without the consent of the said company.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful to and for the president and directors, by and with their superintendents, artists and laborers, with their tools and instruments, with carts, wagons, and other carriages, and beasts of draught or burden, to enter upon the lands in, over, or near to which the route or tract of the said intended road shall pass, first giving notice of their intention to the owners thereof, or their representatives, and doing as little damage thereto as possible, and repairing any breaches they may make in the enclosures thereof, and making amends for any damages that may be done, by a reasonable agreement, if they can agree; but if they cannot agree, then by appraisement, to be made upon oath or affirmation, by three indifferent freeholders, or any two of them agreeing, to be mutually chosen, or if they cannot agree in a choice, or if the owners upon due notice shall neglect or refuse to join in the choice, then to be appointed by one of the judges of the circuit court of the District of Columbia; and, having tendered the appraised value so as aforesaid to be made, it shall be lawful to cut, dig, take, and carry away any logs, stone, gravel, sand, or earth, most conveniently situate for making or repairing said road; and it shall and may be lawful for the said president and directors, or a majority of them, to agree with the owners of any ground to be occupied by the road, and the necessary toll-houses, and gates, for the right thereof; and in case of disagreement, or in case the owner thereof shall be a feme covert, under age, non compos, or out of the district, on application to one of the judges of the said circuit court, the said judge shall issue a warrant, directed to the marshal of the district, to summon a jury of twenty-four inhabitants of the District of Columbia, of property and reputation, not related to the parties, nor in any manner interested, to meet on the land to be valued, at a day to be expressed in the warrant, not less than ten, nor more than twenty, thereafter; and the marshal, upon receiving the said warrant, shall forthwith summon the said jury, and when met, provided there be not less than twelve, shall administer an oath or affirmation to every jurymen that shall appear, that he shall faithfully, justly, and impartially, value the lands and all damages the owner thereof shall sustain, by opening the road through such land, according to the best of his skill and judgment, and that the inquisition thereupon taken, shall be signed by the marshal and by the jurymen present, and returned by the marshal to the clerk of the county, to be by him recorded; and upon every such valuation, the jury is hereby directed to describe and ascertain the bounds of the land by them valued; and their valuation shall be conclusive upon all persons, and shall be paid by the president and directors to the owner of the land or his or her legal representative, and on payment thereof, said land shall be taken and occupied for a public road and for the necessary toll-houses and gates, forever. The said president and directors shall cause the said road to be laid out, not exceeding eighty feet in width, twenty-four feet whereof in breadth, at least, shall be made an artificial road of stone, gravel, or other hard substance, of sufficient depth or thickness to secure a solid and firm road, with a surface as even as the materials will admit, and so nearly level as that it shall in no place rise or fall more than an angle of four degrees with a horizontal line; and the said road shall forever hereafter be maintained and kept in good and perfect repair; and wheresoever any bridge over any part of the said road shall be deemed necessary, the same shall be built of sound and suitable materials.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the president and directors shall have perfected the said road from the west end of Mason's causeway to Alexandria, and in the route aforesaid, they shall give public notice thereof in some newspaper printed in the District of Columbia, and it shall be lawful for them thereafter to erect and fix such and so many gates or turnpikes, not exceeding three, upon and across the said road, as shall be necessary and sufficient to collect the tolls hereinafter granted to the said company, and it shall be lawful for them to appoint such, and so many toll-gatherers as they shall deem necessary to collect and receive, of and from all and every person and persons using the said road, the tolls and rates hereinafter mentioned, and to stop any person or persons, riding, leading, or driving any horses, mules, cattle, hogs, sheep, sulkey, chair, chaise, phaeton, chariot, coach, cart, wagon, sleigh, sled, or any carriage of burden or pleasure, from passing through the said gates, until the said tolls shall be paid, that is to say: for the whole distance in length of said road, and so in proportion for any lesser distance, viz: for every score of sheep, eight cents; for every score of hogs, eight cents; for every score of cattle, sixteen cents; for every horse or mule with or without a rider, four cents; for every sulkey, chair, chaise, or carriage of pleasure, with two wheels and one horse, eight cents; for every coach, chariot, stage-wagon, coachee, phaeton, or chaise, with four wheels and two horses, sixteen cents; for any carriage last mentioned with four horses, twenty cents; for every other carriage of pleasure, under whatever name it may go, the like sums, according to the number of wheels and horses in proportion aforesaid; for every sled or sleigh used as a carriage of pleasure, six cents for each horse drawing the same; for every sled or sleigh used as a carriage of burden, four cents for each horse drawing the same; for every cart or wagon whose wheels do not exceed four inches in breadth, five cents for each horse drawing the same; for every cart or wagon whose wheels shall exceed in breadth four inches, and not exceed seven inches, three cents for every horse drawing the same; for every cart or wagon, the breadth of whose wheels shall be more than seven inches, and not more than ten inches, two cents for every horse drawing the same; for every cart or wagon, the breadth of whose wheels shall be more than ten inches, and not exceed twelve inches, one and a half cents for every horse drawing the same; and that all such carriages as aforesaid, to be drawn by oxen in the whole or partly by oxen, or to be drawn by mules in whole or part, two oxen shall be estimated as equal to one horse in charging all the aforesaid tolls, and every mule as equal to one horse: Provided, That no turnpike gate shall be erected within one mile of the line of the town of Alexandria.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said president and directors, by their by-laws, to make any rule or regulation respecting the burdens on carriages to be drawn over the said road, which shall be deemed reasonable and proper, and from time to time to alter the same; and the said president and directors shall cause mile stones to be placed on the side of said road, noting the distance from the north bounds of Alexandria, and at every gate or turnpike shall cause the distance from the north bounds of Alexandria, and the distance from the west end of Mason's causeway, to be marked in legible characters on some conspicuous part of said gate; and shall cause, also, to be affixed at such places a printed list of the tolls, which may be demanded of those using the said road; and for every day the same shall be neglected, they shall forfeit and pay one dollar, to be recovered by warrant, by any person who shall sue for the same: all wagoners and drivers of all kinds, whether of burden or pleasure, using the said road, shall, except when passing by another carriage of slower draught going in the same direction, keep their horses and carriage on the right hand side of the said road, leaving the other side of the road clear and free for other carriages to pass and repass; and if any driver shall offend against this provision, he shall forfeit and pay two dollars to any person obstructed in his passage, who shall sue for the same, to be recovered, with costs, before any justice of the peace, in the same manner as small debts are recoverable; and moreover, shall be liable to the party injured, by suit at common law, for any special damage done.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the president and directors of the said company shall keep, or cause to be kept, fair and just accounts of all moneys to be received by them from the said commissioners, and from the stockholders, or subscribers to the said undertaking, on account of their several subscriptions or shares, and of all moneys by them to be expended in the prosecution of their said work, and shall once, at least, in every year, submit such accounts to a general meeting of the stockholders until the said road shall be completed, and until all the costs, charges, and expenses, of effecting the same shall be fully liquidated, paid, and discharged; and if, upon such liquidation, or whenever the whole capital stock of the said company shall be nearly expended, it shall be found that the said capital stock will not be sufficient to complete the said road, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, it shall and may be lawful for the said stockholders to be convened according to the provisions of this act, or their own by-laws and rules, to increase the number of shares to such extent as shall be necessary to accomplish the work, and to demand and receive the moneys subscribed for such shares, in like manner and under the like penalties, as are hereinbefore provided for the original subscriptions, or as shall be provided by their by-laws.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the said president and directors shall also keep, or cause to be kept, just and true accounts of all the moneys to be received by their several collectors of tolls at the turnpike gates on the said road, and shall make and declare a half yearly dividend of the clear profits and income thereof, all contingent costs and charges being first deducted, among all the holders of said stock, and shall publish the half-yearly dividend aforesaid in some newspaper printed in the District of Columbia, and at the time and place when and where the same will be paid, and shall cause the same to be paid accordingly.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said corporation to keep the said road in good repair; and if, in neglect of their said duty, the said corporation shall at any time suffer the said road to be out of repair, so as to be unsafe or inconvenient for passengers, the said corporation shall be liable to be presented for such neglect before any court of competent jurisdiction, and upon conviction thereof, to pay to the United States a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars, at the discretion of the court, and shall also be responsible for all damages which may be sustained by any person or persons in consequence of such want of repair, to be recovered in an action of trespass on the case in any court competent to try the same: Provided always. and be it further enacted, That whenever the net proceeds of tolls collected on said road shall amount to a sum sufficient to reimburse the capital, which shall be expended in the purchase of said land and making said road, and twelve per cent. interest per annum thereon, to be ascertained by the circuit court of the United States, in and for the District of Columbia, in the county of Alexandria, the same shall become a free road, and toll shall be no longer collected thereon; and said company shall annually make returns to said circuit court of the amount of tolls collected, and of their necessary expenses, so as to enable said circuit court to determine when said toll shall cease.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons, riding in, or driving any carriage of any kind, or leading, riding or driving any horses, sheep, hogs, or any kind of cattle whatever, on said road, shall pass through any private gate, bars or fence, or over any private way or passage, or pass through any toll-gate under any pretended privilege or exemption, to which he or she, or they, may not be entitled, or do any act or thing with intent to lessen or evade the tolls for passing through the gates established under this act, such person or persons, for every such offence, shall forfeit to the said president and directors, not less than three, nor more than ten dollars, to be recovered before any justice of the peace, with costs, in the same manner that small debts are recoverable: Provided, That it shall not be lawful for the company to ask, demand, or receive from or for persons living on or adjacent to the said road, who may have occasion to pass by said road upon the ordinary business relating to their farms, so far as the limits of the same may extend on the road, who shall not have any other convenient road or way by which they may pass from one part to another part thereof, any toll for passing on or by the said turnpike.

Approved, March 3, 1809.

An Act authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the Marine Corps, in the service of the United States, to be augmented, by the appointment and enlistment of not exceeding one major, two captains, two first lieutenants, one hundred and eighty-five corporals, and five hundred and ninety-four privates, who shall be respectively allowed the same pay, bounty, clothing, and rations, and shall be employed under the same rules and regulations to which the said Marine Corps are, or shall be, entitled and subject.
