

SUMMER
SAVORY.

A decorative graphic of a leafy branch, possibly a laurel or olive branch, extending downwards from the word 'SUMMER' and partially overlapping the word 'SAVORY'. The leaves are detailed and arranged in a natural, flowing pattern.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Class. PS 2999

Shelf T 258

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THE WORKS OF
BENJ. F. TAYLOR, LL.D.

SONGS OF YESTERDAY. Illustrated. With handsomely ornamented cover in black and gold. Octavo, silk cloth and full gilt edges.....$3 00

OLD TIME PICTURES and Sheaves of Rhyme. Illustrated. Small quarto, Silk cloth.. 1 50

PICTURES OF LIFE IN CAMP AND FIELD. 12mo, cloth 1 50

THE WORLD ON WHEELS, and other Sketches. Illustrated. 12mo, cloth 1 50

BETWEEN THE GATES. 12mo, cloth..... 1 50

SUMMER-SAVORY, Gleaned from Rural Nooks in Pleasant Weather. 12mo, cloth.. 1 00

SUMMER-SAVORY,

GLEANED FROM RURAL NOOKS

IN PLEASANT WEATHER.

BY

BENJ. F. TAYLOR, LL.D.,

AUTHOR OF "THE WORLD ON WHEELS," "BETWEEN THE GATES,"
"SONGS OF YESTERDAY," ETC.

CHICAGO:
S. C. GRIGGS AND COMPANY.
1879.

71

PS 2999
T2 58

COPYRIGHT, 1879,

BY S. C. GRIGGS AND COMPANY.

DONOHUE & HENNEBERRY, BINDERS, CHICAGO.

TO

S. C. GRIGGS, ESQ.,

MY FRIEND OF "ALWAYS,"

WHOSE IMPRINT HAS ADORNED MY BOOKS FROM FIRST TO LAST,

THIS RAMBLING RECORD IS CORDIALLY

INSCRIBED.

“ON THE STILE.”

SAGE, Caraway, Summer-Savory, and Dill, are four aromatic memories of the old fire-side and garden-side. They suggest the fragrant little trifles that enrich life beyond silver and gold. They are good, winter and summer.

For these records of gypsy-like rambles in sunny days I have picked a leaf from the garden border close to the hollyhocks, and chosen a name — SUMMER-SAVORY. Let us hope the next leaf gathered will not be from among the poppies. That's for forgetfulness.

It is an art to set back the old clock and be a child again. Imagination can easily see the boy a man, but how hard for it to see the man a child; and whoever learns to glide back into that rosy time when he did not know that thorns are under the roses, or that clouds will return after the rain; when he thought a tear can no more stain a cheek than a drop of rain a flower; when he fancied life had no disguises, and hope no blight at all, has come as near as anybody in the world to discovering the Northwest Passage to an earthly Paradise.

CONTENTS.

I.	“A HEATED TERM”	-	-	-	-	7
II.	GLIMPSES OF UTAH	-	-	-	-	16
III.	PICTURES OF COLORADO	-	-	-	-	31
IV.	“YE CRAGS AND PEAKS”	-	-	-	-	37
V.	“THE GARDEN OF THE GODS”	-	-	-	-	46
VI.	HATS	-	-	-	-	51
VII.	THE MEN OF GROOVES	-	-	-	-	55
VIII.	THE NORTH WOODS	-	-	-	-	66
IX.	FUNERAL EXTRAVAGANCE	-	-	-	-	78
X.	“MINE INN”	-	-	-	-	86
XI.	THE CARAVAN	-	-	-	-	98
XII.	EXCURSIONS	-	-	-	-	106
XIII.	THE “NORTH WOODS” MEETING-HOUSE	-	-	-	-	112
XIV.	WINKS AND WINKERS	-	-	-	-	118
XV.	HUMAN FIGS	-	-	-	-	121
XVI.	“THE HILL OF SCIENCE”	-	-	-	-	127

XVII.	THE COUNTRY "CORNERS" - - -	134
XVIII.	AQUARIUS THE WATER-BEARER - -	144
XIX.	HILL COUSINS - - - - -	150
XX.	JAW - - - - -	162
XXI.	JUST AND GENEROUS - - - -	166
XXII.	STITCHING LANDSCAPES - - -	173
XXIII.	THE COUNTRY BALL-ROOM - - -	181
XXIV.	A THANKSGIVING DAY FLIGHT -	187
XXV.	"RIVERSIDE" AND "LAKESIDE" - -	198
XXVI.	CHECKS - - - - -	206

SUMMER-SAVORY,

GLEANED FROM RURAL NOOKS IN PLEASANT WEATHER.

CHAPTER I.

“A HEATED TERM.”

THE world is out of sight. The high tides of midsummer have rolled over it. The green volumes of the maples, the tumbling fountains of the willows, the pensile spray of the elms, the golden calms of the ripe grain, the chopping seas of the swath-ridged meadows, have submerged and washed our brown planet quite away. The armed squadrons of corn are marching to the tune of 100° in the shade. They have whipped out all their swords and thrown away the scabbards. Their green knapsacks are growing plump with rations of samp, hasty-pudding and Indian bread. The sweet whispers of the lilacs, telling of days that are no more, have died out of the year of grace. The first flush of June roses has faded, the first love-songs of birds have been sung, the broad zone of the matron has succeeded to the slender sash of the maid, and the year is marching on. It is a splendid tramp, besides being a trump. The white star-blossom of the strawberry has heralded the sweet red Mars of the ripened fruit—the star is a pleiad and the planet has—gone down! There is a faint smell of new apples in the air, that is better than gales from Araby the Blest. There is a suspicion of caraway, and a hint of dill, and a breath from the red clover. Nature is rich in compensations, and her losses and her gains are paired like the embarking menagerie of the first Admiral, when the Ark put to sea with the greatest and only show on earth, bound for Ararat and a market.

The lights and shades of the year touch and tint and change everything but the English sparrow,—that goes right on with its saucy talk and its perpetual fight and its ceaseless paternosters of beaded eggs the year round. Snow or glow, zephyr or northeaster, it is all the same. What a pugnacious, aggressive ounce of British bird it is! It routs our robins and persecutes our goldfinches, and the gypsy baskets of the orioles swing empty. Oh, for another Bunker Hill! And yet some cry, Spare, oh, the sparrow!

100°.

I have been seeking a cool place. The ambition of the mercury wearies me. The thought of Dr. Kane's chronometer, that was so cold it burned him, is no comfort. Even the "Exiles of Siberia" are selfish as oysters. There they are to-day, comfortably freezing their feet, and do not offer us so much as a chill of a chance to frost a finger. The little arrow that swings from the top of the barn seems to be welded to the spire by the solar force, and to be drawing fire with its barbed point out of the fierce south. The leaves of a tree by my window curl in the sun, as if they were trying to get back into the bud again, and be cozy and cool as they were when the world went Maying.

The robins sit on the cherry-tree with bills apart like a V, and their wings at trail arms. I can almost detect the smell of burned feathers. A match on the window-sill sets off of its own accord, and commits suicide to get out of its misery.

Lawyers' clients grow irritable, and desire to “sue” somebody right away, and talk in a salamanderish style about making the defendant “sweat.” Doctors' patients languish and wilt. Heat expands most things but sermons,—they shrink from an hour to twenty minutes, and sometimes the preachers themselves are scorched out of their pulpits, and flee to the mountains and the islands of the sea. Some cynic has growled because clergymen take a vacation in summer, and sneered with an unanswerable air, “Are not immortal souls as precious in dog-days as in December?” As if, with thermometers at a hundred in the shade, a preacher cannot safely leave his flock so long as he leaves the orthodox suggestion behind him, and does not take the hot weather away with him.

But ice-men, dragon-flies and sun-flowers are happy, and never was a day so torrid that a soda-fountain was unable to play. Yes, and scarlet geraniums!

There is one of them now, bolt-upright in an iron vase painted a comfortable color to warm you up just by looking at it, standing out in "the burden and heat of the day," and hot enough to take a helpless egg beyond the third week of incubation, and a minute or two toward the boiling-point of "eggs rare." That geranium has fairly taken fire with its scarlet flowers, and flares as happy as a torch in a triumphal procession.

People are never so like one another as in a heated term. They get melted down into a homogeneous mass of humanity. Had I written it "mess" it would have been no matter. Their angularities are fused off. They cease to be original. They say, "Isn't it hot!" They blow a ghost of a whistle without any body to it. They say, "whew!" Their collars droop like a hound's ears. They expand into broad-brimmed hats. They blossom out with umbrellas. They festina lentè.

The clouds come up every day, and lay their rugged heads on the rim of the horizon, and watch the landscape to see if it is done brown or done to a turn; but it isn't, and so those drowsy heads sink back, and leave the sky all clear for the setting sun to give us a parting roast at short range. How the brick walls throb and the stone pavements dance with caloric! And the earth turns over and over and fails to find a cool side. We feel the sun as it fires the east windows, and grills the roof, and sits down on every shingle, and scorches the front room, and cooks the west room, and toasts the veranda, and bakes the walls till they begin to be as much at home as they ever were in the brick-kiln.

And we are all the while watching for wind. A poplar lifts an ear of a leaf as if it heard something, and we take courage, but nothing comes of it. As a rule, the wind is always blowing somewhere else in sultry weather. If you happen to have no south window, there is just where it swings a vine or sways a tree. There is quite a breeze in the next town, and a gale in the adjoining county, possibly a tornado, but with you it is as calm as the Sea of Galilee. Fans? To be sure—but then if you have got to work them, you prefer to wait till cool weather for it. Fourth-of-July orations and fans are alike: windy but not exhilarating, and very fatiguing withal. Wasps, as if black rapiers should take wing, dart through the open window like shuttles through a loom. You dodge every red tongue with a dog to it, lest the attachment has grown mad with heat. You hunt for a cabbage-leaf for your hat lest you be sun-struck, and you grow such an absorbent of water that the leaf is about as much at home as if you were a cabbage yourself.

The sun has such a habit of rising that it cannot avoid it, and it comes up clear and red in the latter part of every night. If it could only spend an autumn or two in Indiana, and get "the chills," and have an intermittent fever, instead of the steady, unwinking blaze!

Peeled like an onion, to get as near as possible to the carbonate of lime without becoming an outright anatomy, I have been trying to write! My face and hands beaded with sweat like a savage's wampun; a sudorific, saline stream trickling down the pen, and diluting the ink and pickling the words, and making the wet paper as pleasant to write upon as a jelly-fish, and as appetizing to sheep as a salt-lick, I have been trying to scollop off a remembered sky with the silver edges of Colorado mountains, and give my reader a Sabbath-day's journey toward the Utah Canaan, and bid him see the great white visible throne of Pike's Peak through the red gateway of the Garden of the Gods.

Had my memories been a kid, and a mess of potage exactly the dish to serve up on a page, it would have been brought on, piping hot from the seething kettle of the heated term. But when a man's pen can get about hot enough in the sun to brand a mule, it is time he plunged it into the trough with the blacksmith's tongs, and got the owner of the iron fingers to give him a few blasts from the bellows.

And so the glowing days burned on. The elms stood about as dusty as elephants and supple as sled-stakes. The air grew murky, and Fancy limped as if it had lost a foot. It was like holding the scythe and turning the grindstone too. Shadrach could not have lived in the third story of the house without a miracle. Meshach would not have despised the second, and Abednego would have remembered the fiery furnace had he gone to bed in the first. The building had become warmed down through. It was three layers of torrid zone.

And then I rose betimes, and, satchel in hand, climbed a huge green hill, and found welcome in a great roomy house that opened its hospitable doors to the four quarters and the thirty-two winds of heaven; and the city was under my feet, the beautiful city of Syracuse, salted and seasoned, and warranted to keep in any climate. And the winds came from the southwest and laid cool hands upon my brow, and I sat down upon a granite door-step as cold as Ponto's nose, while behold, the marble mantels in the city had been warm as a slab of new gingerbread. And the rippling grain had a cool look, and the timothy smelled sweet in the sun, and the shadow of the great house fell upon the ground like a home-made twilight, and the blessed winds came and went, and the grass gave to the feet like a king's carpet.

Then the fleecy flocks of the Lord came trooping over the unfenced edge of the western horizon, and we saw them long before the city below knew they were coming at all, and we wondered how they would wonder, and we rejoiced for them beforehand. And when the flocks were all in the home pasture over the city, the smooth wall of a blue slate-stone quarry showed along the west, and out of it, as if there had been a door, came a troop of breezy shepherds; and the flocks were stampeded across the whole visible heaven, with the cracking of great whips and the flicker of torches; and the roof of the great house roared with the wind and the rain, like a drum-corps sixty men strong, and the slanting ratlins of the storm were drawn taut through the air from heaven even down to the earth, and denser than you ever saw them in a ship's rigging; and the bowed trees wrapped all their leaves about them as if they had been cloaks; and the grains and grasses bent low to keep out of the storm, and the pansies just stood and shook with their quaint and quiet laughter, and by-and-by the sun shone out, and lo, there is a new heaven and a new earth!

The city that was tawny as a lion shines green as an emerald. The smoky air is washed clean and cool. We breathe to the bottom of our lungs, with great respirations, as the parched yoke-bearers divert the route of the running brook into their dry and thirsty throats, with long drinks and great breaths of satisfaction between. The buttons of the vest worn a-flap and a-flare made for their holes like prairie-dogs; the coat that had been about as intolerable as the shirt of Nessus was donned with a sense of relief; and behold, I was "clothed and in my right mind." And with a cool, dry hand, that only yesterday was as unhandy a member to write with as a seal's flipper, I grasped the pen and said, "I will write off the salted rust of the sweat from my steel pen, as they scour a plowshare with a few bouts in the fallow; I will record the glowing memories of the days and nights of capsicum and cayenne; and my gratitude for the green hill and the free winds, and the splendid rain that swept the valley of Onondaga with its royal skirts, when the rush and tumult of the storm and the bewildered and beclouded sky made it the fairest day in the calendar of a long fortnight."

What precious stuff it is they write who wish for their friends cloudless skies and gentle breezes and eternal sunshine! Who has not seen some fellow's sonnet to his girl of flesh and blood, imploring such tropical blessings upon her innocent head as could only be endured by phenixes, salamanders, and blacksmiths' anvils! Let us have sense.

CHAPTER II.

GLIMPSES OF UTAH.

DID you ever see a man that had been scalped?— not by the patriarch with his scythe, but by the savage with his knife? Well, it will not pay to see him, as a general thing, unless you have a bit of blue-closet curiosity about you, and almost everybody has. I know a lady who goes to every funeral she can hear of within a Sabbath-day's journey, and looks at the deceased and watches the mourners, and determines the depth and strength and probable length of their sorrow. She is about as sure to be at your funeral as she is to be at her own.

But it gives you a queer sensation, and not without a pleasant trace of horror in it, to sit beside a well-favored gentleman, with luxuriant hair showing around the edge of his cap, and think that a savage once had him in his clutch with a whoop, and swept a keen knife around his lifted locks with another whoop, and whirled the trophy aloft with more whoops, every atom as barbarously delighted as a fox-hunter when he flaunts poor Reynard's "brush," and sounds "the treble mort." It brings back the old border tales of the log-cabin times, you used to hear on winter nights, when you flung an eye over your shoulder as the yarn ran off, lest Black Hawk or Red Jacket, or somebody smelling of moccasins, blankets, smoke and kiinnikinic, should show a red-ochre visage at a green window-pane.

That very pleasant gentleman is a conductor on the Central Pacific railroad, and beguiled the way for me as we steamed toward Ogden from the west. He ventured to a little stream two miles from a station for trout one day, and Chief-Justice Story's natural nobleman surprised him, scalped him, and left him for dead. I knew all about it, but I had a miserable desire to hear him describe the capillary calamity, though I could not quite ask him a blunt question about "the rape of the lock." I mentioned savages, if perchance he might say he knew too much of them, and then gratify my curiosity, but he had apparently forgotten the circumstance. I spoke of narrow escapes in the wilderness, but he only scratched one ear with a thoughtful finger, and pointed out a rock with a nose and chin like Voltaire's, and an eagle on a crag that looked as if he had been scalped. "Bald?" I said; "bald," he replied; and that was as near as he ever got to the subject.

It was a sunny morning when we drew up beside the depot at Ogden, where a hungry gong roared at us with a breath redolent of onion, cabbage, roast, fry and stew, and a little bell made mouths at us and gave tongue, telling of "funeral-baked meats" all cold for lunches, and we accepted the invitation.

Fowls stiff and stark lay in piles, and so cerulean of breast, back and thigh, as to compel the inference that they belonged to the tribe of the Delawares, "Blue Hen's chickens" every egg of them all. The Wahsatch Mountains crowned with snow lift their thousands of feet of grandeur, and the Great Salt Lake stretches its glittering length for eighty miles, an uninhabited waste of three ides, three ums and an ate, to wit: chlorides of sodium, magnesium, calcium, and a sulphate of soda. But they will keep, while unhappily the fowls were kept too long. At last the locomotive whistled us aboard the Utah Central train, bound for Salt Lake City, thirty-six miles to the south. The conductor was a Mormon; also the engineer; likewise the brakeman. We looked curiously about for "signs" of the peculiar people. They were invisible. You might as well expect to catch a Baptist by baiting a trap with a water-tank as to detect the intelligent Mormon by any sanctimonious slides and cadences.

There was but one Pharisee on the train, and I am sorry to say he believed in John Calvin. A Bible in his hand, displayed to show the "Rev. X. Y. Z.;" a roll of sermon protruding like a revolver from his breast-pocket; his hair parted on the "divide" of philoprogenitiveness — what a septisyllable it is! — and brought up over his ears like two little bundles of oats thrust in the elbows of a couple of barn-braces, and about ripe; the corners of his mouth curved down for pronouncing a "woe" upon somebody at sight; a wrinkle to his nose, as if a rank offense saluted him as it smelled to heaven,—there he sat, making the observer positively bilious with depravity as he watched him. Begging his pardon, I asked him the name of a place we were nearing. He made an emphatic pause before he replied, and then, with a momentous look and a deliberate air, as if he fancied he had written the Decalogue and were promulgating it for the first time, he picked his way from word to word, as if they were stepping-stones across a brook, and said, “That—place—ah—is—called—ah—Kaysville!” Fancy such a man moving you to do anything but get out of his reach, or persuading you to give anything but the cold shoulder!

A stately gentleman in black, with a pleasant look and a fatherly way—and he proved to be exceedingly fatherly—and with wives enough for three bishops, attracts your attention. He may be a lawyer who has clients, or a doctor who has patients, or a clergyman who can sing “A Charge to Keep I Have,” but you are sure he is a prominent member of society because of the spread of his vest, as if it were buttoned over the benighted and barbarous regions of an artificial globe. He looks as if he would give you a check for a million, and you could not prevent him from doing it if you tried. He is a Mormon preacher. He came through Emigration Cañon when he was leaner. He saw this valley of abundance in the sage-brush and alkali period, before the soap-provoker had yielded to the roses of Sharon.

And the train is speeding along over the toes of the Wahsatch rugged range. The Great Salt Lake shines in the sun on the west. Evidences of fertility and abundance surround you, but it is a rugged, a sort of old Saxon abundance. There are beautiful places for beauty everywhere, but it has not risen to cultivated elegance. It is the garment with the selvedge on. Things are not square-cut and hemmed, but a little tag-locked and ragged at the edges. But there are no "lean years" in Utah. Had I visited this valley in 1847 I should have been in Mexico, but now I am in an outlying province of—Turkey.

White patches of alkaline soil show here and there; orchards dot the picture; broad pastures freckled with great herds of sleek cattle unroll. Mount Nebo lifts its tall winter one hundred and twenty miles away. Fremont's Peak is fifteen miles to the right. The Mountain of Prophecy shows its dome to the north. We are nearing the banks of the latter-day Jordan. The sharp gleam of the Lake, with its islands and its sea-gulls and its drift of clean salt, is as cooling to look at as the flash of a sword-blade. The rain here as in California is home-made. Utah goes by water.

THE TABERNACLE.

At last the gray roof of the Tabernacle shows above the trees. It is the half of a gigantic egg resting upon forty-six sandstone columns. Gentiles say it is "a bad egg." Build a mental bird that could lay an egg two hundred and fifty feet long and one hundred and fifty wide! It is the great egg of Utah. Between these pillars are windows and doors; open them, and nothing is left but columns and roof.

The streets of Salt Lake City are broad avenues lying square with the world, lined with beautiful trees, and bordered with streams of mountain water. Where in Christendom are the reeking gutters, in Mormondom are the clean, live brooks. But the streets were dusty, the winds were awake, and the mercury was lively. There are beautiful homes, there are adobe houses, there are many hives.

It was Sunday, and we went to the Tabernacle. The great oval structure, sixty-five feet to the roof, was dressed in the gloomy pomp of mourning for the dead president, Brigham Young. Immense funeral wreaths depended from the ceiling. The great dais, raised tier above tier, was draped in black, and upon it were seated the Twelve, and the Elders and Bishops of the Church of Mormon. And they were an impressive and dignified body of men. John Taylor with his frosty crown; Orson Pratt looking over the gray hedge of a mighty beard; John Sharp, shrewd, angular and genial; George Q. Cannon, clean-looking, amiable, and winning in his ways. He had a word to say about tithes, and rallied up the stone-masons to work upon the new Temple. But you would suppose from the pleasant way he talked that he was not calling for ten per cent of back-ache, tug and trowel; but explaining how every man could be his own doctor or lawyer, or could get more money for eight hours' work than he could possibly earn in ten. Take the great Sanhedrim together, it looked legislative enough to be a Senate. The black background was dotted with white heads. There was now and then a bullet-head or a chuckle-head, but of the majority, some of them might have been Baptist deacons, or Methodist ministers, or Presbyterian dominies, or presidents of colleges. Behind them towered the great organ in its trappings of woe. Built where it stands, it rises like a castle, one of the great musical instruments of the world. The fine choir of adults clustered about its base looked like boys and girls, and when the mellow thunder of the deep bass rolled out, and all the birds and flutes locked up in it were let loose above the surf of sound, and the warble of the human voices came out in the lulls, it was very grand.

But the master-spirit of the dais had abdicated. Brigham Young was not there. Coarse and strong, with wonderful executive powers, of an earnest and dogged purpose that never let go, a self-reliance that breasted storm and bearded wilderness, nothing if not resolute, knowing what men were fitted to his use, and building them in the wall of his design as a mason lays the stone, he brought the most heterogeneous elements into harmony, taught a Babel of tongues to talk Mormon with one accord, left a blooming garden where he found a wilderness that grew ghastly pale at its own desolation, founded the mid-continental city of America, and hastened the building of the iron highway from Atlantic to Pacific a whole generation of men.

THE PEOPLE.

I hoped John Taylor would preach, but a nephew of Smith of the tribe of Joseph, who had been on a mission to Europe, cumbered the ground. A pale, lank-sided fanatic, who railed at the Gentiles with venomous bitterness as only a bloodless man can rail, and the fiercer he talked the paler he grew, till his waxen face, relieved upon the black drapery, gave the grotesque effect of a medallion-head escaping from the medal, becoming animate and angry, and bobbing about upon the jet velvet like the rolling eyeballs of Othello.

But if Smith was not worth hearing, the great audience was a memorable sight. Fancy six thousand faces fitted into an ellipse that will seat eight thousand people,—a huge mosaic of human heads! There were at least a thousand children among them, sorted off with picket-lines of mothers between, and about four-score infants in arms. It would have been an appetizing sight for Herod, and would have kept the baby-eating Saturn in rations for three months. Every style of dress was represented, from the old poke-bonnet with a puckered face in its back room to the wafer of a hat with a butterfly on it, and the lamp-mat trifle just caught on the bump of approbation behind. There was the old beaver chafed bare in spots, as if it had worked in harness some time, and the new silk that shines like a bottle. There was the modern girl hung about with two or three dresses of different lengths and divers colors, and curiously caught up with half-reefs here and there, as if a sailor had been taking in the top-hamper for a storm and got blown overboard in the act. There was the strait, scant skirt of the ancient girl collapsed about her form like a balloon with the valve gone. Aggregate a hundred school-house and four-corners country audiences of thirty years ago, sprinkle in a few city people here and there, and you have an idea of that great congregation.

You will look in vain for facial signs of utter misery. There are sad-eyed, weary-looking women, and so there are everywhere. You can pick out many a devout believer who came through the wilderness of old. You can detect the honest doubters and the foxy professors and the sincere worshipers. Drawn largely from the laboring classes of Europe, any considerable intelligence and culture cannot be found in the rank and file, but it is an error to think this has not remarkable exceptions. There are astronomers and naturalists of no mean order; linguists that could grace a professor's chair in eastern universities; men of general cultivation and large business ability, and women of refinement.

But the children are a marvelous product. You ride along the beautiful avenues and see groups of them, neatly dressed and bright as quicksilver, playing in the shade. You meet clusters of Brigham

Young's grandchildren; you encounter his sons and daughters. Every girl is half-sister to somebody, and a boy's father may be his uncle, and his mother own aunt to his half-brother. The ward schools swarm with children. A large and efficient Episcopal school numbers its pupils by hundreds, many of whose parents are Mormons, for about five-sixths of the people are "Saints." Take a flock of sheep in the pleasant April days, flecked white with lambs, each saying its a-b-abs for its mother, and you have the picture.

The communion service is celebrated every Sunday, and while Smith was yet preaching, the cup-bearers with silver pitchers of water were noiselessly serving the multitude, of which every one partook, even to the infant in arms. Then the last hymn was sung, the benediction said, and the great congregation poured out from every side like ants from a disturbed hill, and the Tabernacle was solemn and empty as a cave.

The death of Brigham Young was confidently believed to mark the beginning of the end of Mormonism; that individual ambitions and jealousies would explode the system like a bomb. But it is not true. When the delusion is dispelled it will not be by earthquake shock or government enactment or meditating bayonets, but because the incoming Gentile tide will wash out of it all its color and its strength, and the Gentile sun will draw it up in a misty cloud, and the free winds of the world will blow it quite away.

THE UTAH INDIAN.

The tribes of Utah were Brigham Young's fast friends. Whatever he did, he never broke a promise to them, and they became his faithful allies. The night after his death the Indians kindled signal fires along the mountain peaks, and thus telegraphed the event eighty miles down the valley. An old chief who had known Young since he entered the wilderness came up by the train the next day, and, accosting no one, went directly to the president's mansion. John W. Young met him at the door. "Want to see Brigham." "Father is dead," said the son. "Let me see him," persisted the chief. "Well, come in," and the Indian straightened his blanket, smoothed back his hair, drew himself up, and said, "Ready."

Entering the room, he took in everything without turning an eye, and asked: "Where Brigham?" "In this box," was the answer. He approached, laid his hand upon it, and said: "Brigham dead? He here?" and then, when his doubt was dispelled, he shook with emotion as no paleface ever saw a savage moved before, his broad chest heaved, and with the exclamation, "Brigham dead! Brigham dead!" he burst into tears, fairly convulsed with grief. The son stood silently by until the chief, measurably controlling his emotion, readjusted his blanket, gave one look at the casket, and saying, "Me go home,—tell people Brigham dead. Be much cry there," left the house, went direct to the depot where the southward-bound train was just whistling to go, stepped aboard and was gone with the tidings.

The Indians on the railroads of the far West ride free. They are D. H's, to wit, dead-heads. The scale is graduated thus: hedgers, ditchers and writers, full fare; clergymen, half fare; Indians, editors and infants, scot-free. The managers of the roads act wisely in issuing "complimentaries" to the Indians. Incessantly roaming about, they become invaluable police at large. If anything is wrong with rail, bridge or culvert, or any obstructions are placed upon the track, their runners are sure to warn the engineer and prevent the catastrophe. Every paleface who rides upon the trains may be glad that the savages and the editors are friends to the railroad. Not a few narrow escapes have become matters of public news by this route: an Indian told the engineer, the engineer told the conductor, the conductor told the editor, and the printer told the world.

The desert of thirty years ago, walled in by mountains, inaccessible by distance, is a city to-day of twenty thousand. The locomotive has found it, the trained lightning has struck it, fashion has overtaken it, the Gentiles are at its doors. Its broad avenues, with their twin brooklets and their double lines of shade trees, are traversed by street cars, its dwellings are nested in gardens, shrubbery and flowers, its people extend the open hand of welcome. You hear the prayers of our fathers and the songs of our mothers, and there is little outdoor evidence that you are in a city whose religion is as oriental and corrupt as the faith of the Moslem.

I do not know whether it has been remarked that the children of a polygamous alliance more frequently resemble their mothers, but I think observation will establish the fact. The Sabbath is quite as rigidly observed in Salt Lake City as in any average village in New York, and far better than in Chicago or the majority of large cities in the East, and little presents itself to offend the most fastidious. Scenes of debauchery are unknown. In the ordinary sense of the word, the women of the old Mormon stock are fiercely virtuous. Since the advent of Gentiles and miners, in several regards the slippers are worn a little easier and a trifle more down at the heel. Altogether, the city is remarkably well governed.

A lively and ludicrous warfare is kept up between the Gentiles and the Mormons. What the former lack in numbers they make up in bantam-like vim. Merchandise is brought down almost to the zero of eastern prices, and a traveler direct from California, where he is expected to buy a section of the hotel in which he sojourns, is astonished at the Utah moderation of twenty shillings a day. If there is danger of a lull in the battle, the papers all around the board trumpet the forces to a new charge, and they are sharp, saucy and aggressive as hornets in a heated term.

CAMP DOUGLAS.

We crossed the city with the river Jordan at its feet, and the mountains standing off from it in a stately way on the east, and climbing seven hundred feet, and two miles out, we bowled in upon the splendid parade ground of Camp Douglas. As neat as a nobleman's lawn it is, with its well-appointed barracks, its commodious and elegant officers' quarters, the tidy uniforms of the boys in blue, the old-time clank of swords, and over all, glowing in the setting sun, the most beautiful flag in the universe, always saving and excepting the white banner of the Prince of Peace. To tell the truth, I had not felt as if I were in the United States since entering Utah, till I struck the camp and saw the flag and heard the concordant regimental band, as it gave "The Red, White and Blue" to the mountains that played it back, and the city that listened for it, and the setting sun that marched to it down the western slope.

And then the great kennels of cannon—not a Quaker among them—long-range fellows with their noses toward the city waiting for orders. They gave me a comfortable feeling when I stood at the right end of them, for me, which is the wrong end for business. The city lies at my feet like a great white flock tangled in the shrubbery; the sheen of the lake; the twinkle of the river; the air glorified as if an evening cloud had stained it fast colors; the gateless Gaza of Emigration Cañon yawning below the camp, through which the travel-worn vanguard rode thirty years ago, and came out from the ruggedness and shadow of ravines into the sunshine and calm of that Mormon misnomer, the Promised Land. Altogether it is a beautiful picture, and not easy to be forgotten. And then we rattled down into the valley and back to the hotel in the cool of the night, and the next morning were away for Ogden, and well out of Mormondom, with its border struggles, its dark and bloody ground, the unuttered sorrows of women and the gloom of homes that are loveless. That it can exist and not contaminate the body politic is one of the strangest imaginable gauges in a christian land to measure the greatness of the Republic.

CHAPTER III.

PICTURES OF COLORADO.

DENVER.

IT was at Cheyenne that we got our first steak of the black-tailed deer—rich, juicy, dark, a luxury; and yet I am frank enough to confess that a bit of Southdown mutton, or even one ewe lamb garnished with June peas, suits me quite as well. There was antelope also,—that timid little lady of the genus cervus; but I think Thackeray, after seeing the graceful creatures shaking their glimpse of white handkerchief at him, turning to watch him with a touch of human and feminine curiosity, and then bounding over the plains as light as thistle-downs, might have said he would about as soon dine off of a fine young woman.

We take the train for Denver, one hundred and six miles south, and nearly a thousand feet down from Cheyenne, and are careering over the rolling plains and getting down-stairs by the run. We are in Colorado, the Centennial and the Silver State. We pass a town as much the child of "H. G." as the New York Tribune. It is Greeley, with its hundred thousand acres of fertile land checkered off with trees and traversed by trenches of water. Some years, it has kept a grasshopper boarding-house, and occasionally there has been "a nipping and an eager air," but its general prosperity has been signal. Its harvests go by water, and so do the people. Greeley, therefore, is loafer-proof.

A few more swift dives and we reach Denver, and almost a mile above the level of the sea. It is the marvel of mountain cities. Nineteen years ago its site was an utter wilderness. To-day it is a young metropolis, the capital of a state bound to be opulent and great, a population that crowds twenty-five thousand, a vigorous press, and a great deal of it,—I can remember when a copy of the Rocky Mountain News seemed to belong to a menagerie of grizzly bears and mountain lions, as much a desert production as "the pelican of the wilderness,"—the hub of a railroad system that spokes the state; churches, schools, street railways, business, nerve, culture, refinement and a future. Set down in it at night, the gaslight dazzles you, the hotel cries assail you, the city astonishes you. It is an eastern city to which mountain shoulders have given a big lift. The air is as pure as the wine at the wedding in Cana. It has tonic and tingle. It is like Cowper's tea: it "cheers but not inebriates," and if there ever was an awkward, toggle-jointed sentence, it is that analysis of the poet's "cup." The American Hotel took us in, and we were comfortable at a shake of the bell—"rest and a shelter, food and fire." Let us take pattern from Bunyan's fellow with the muck-rake just at first, and not look up, for there are angels in the air, and we may not care to look down.

A PRAIRIE-DOG ECHO.

There are coughs and coughs. There are the cough of derision, the cough of doubt, and the cough of embarrassment; the cough that helps a halting speaker to bridge the little cañon between one sentence he is puzzled to end and another he doesn't know how to begin, where his thought has tumbled through into the gulf of bewilderment; the racking cough that goes before the coffin as the drum-major before the corps. Let not the compositor lay out the band by spelling that corps with an e. There is yet another cough, which may be called the cough colloquial and Coloradan. It is more frequent in conversation than profanity in the society of canal-horses. In your hotel at Denver you hear people coughing along the halls, — coughs masculine, feminine and neuter; a hollow cough in a distant room, a hacking cough in the office, a smothered cough in the cellar, a subdued cough in the garret, a guttural cough which is Hebrew, a cough in the roof of the mouth which is like the last note of "the cock's shrill clarion" in Gray's Elegy. You meet people of deliberate step and feeble breath; people whose respiration rustles like a silk dress, or pants like the ghost of a steam-boat. You enter the well-filled stores, and are served by men who punctuate their pleasant courtesy with small commas of cough, or bits of ahems, or interjec-tions of sneeze. Denver seems to be an outlying province of Swift's Houyhnhnms—pronounced hoo-inmz, with a whinnying quaver on the n—and you begin to get nervous and ask questions. But when you learn that all these coughers and wheezers and sneezers came up hither for health not long ago, with hardly strength enough to bark above their breath, and that they are improving with might and main, you are comforted and composed. I meet eastern friends who are perfectly well, but came here in wretched plight. "But why don't you go home?" "Ah, that's the rub! We have kept going home,—slipped back every time, like the frog in the well, into the old trouble, and returned to brace up." I encounter several officers of the same name, and all Generals—there are two in sight this minute—who can live nowhere else; a name as common as John Smith, for it is General Debility. It is astonishing how feverish a man grows to escape from a capital place when he finds it impossible; but between death and Colorado, the last is everybody's first choice.

JEWELRY.

Lapidaries abound. At almost every corner you see rich displays of Colorado "specimens," from tiger-cats to moss-agates. Rings, pins, charms, chains, set with smoky topazes, agates, onyxes—which are nothing like lynxes—garnets, opals, amethysts, jaspers, and bits of petrified woods. You see crystals of topaz that weigh ten pounds, and gulch and mountain are full of gem-hunters who, armed with hammer and knapsack, take twenty-mile tramps for the treasures. And there is curious excitement in it like watching a game of chance. You pick up a rusty gray stone, knock off the clinging sand, and pocket it with a doubt. The lapidary may tell you it is a choice moss-agate, or a pebble just right to shie at a sparrow. The mountain jewelry trade engages many hands, and much skill and taste. A tourist abroad has a royal way, you know, of buying things for ten dollars that, returning home, he finds he could purchase around the corner for eight. And so it comes to pass there are "millions in it."

When that hobble-de-hoy of yours was a baby, Colorado was a wilderness that howled, and I have been attending the State Fair of that same Colorado. The law of limitation has apparently been suspended; the cabbages are larger than many of Dr. Peters' asteroids—to the naked eye; three ears of the clean white corn would make a club for Hercules; the wheat is fit to be asked for in the universal petition; the products of the dairy are admirable, and I was prepared to expect it, for if ever a State exemplified the proverb, "there is room at the top," it is Colorado. I was in her sky pastures a mile and a half above the sea, where thousands of cattle round up like the moon at the full. But the geological department was simply magnificent. The precious metals lay about in boulder, nugget, crystal and powder. Almost every description of gem but the diamond mocked the rainbow, and lay about amid all beautiful shapes and crystals of quartz, lead, iron and coal. About every letter of the alphabet that spells e-a-r-t-h was represented.

And the people were there by thousands, and then more thousands. They are an English-speaking people, they are our people, cordial, hospitable, with the first love not died out of them. What we love at a thousand miles away we forget at three thousand. Seven days and nights are a little too long a range for Cupid's common arrows unless he puts more strength in the bow.

CHAPTER IV.

“YE CRAGS AND PEAKS.”

YOU shall be riding in a street-car through the city of Denver on a double-eagle of a day, clean gold and fresh from the Mint. The trees have shaken out all sail for the summer. The bees are booming about among the flowers. The children are playing in the shade. The grind of the wheels of commerce—and the street-car—is in your ears, and you look through the window into the invisible air, not one midge or mote to a sunbeam. You shall see an arc of the western horizon jagged, scalloped and broken down with mountains all dusted and drifted with everlasting snows. You shall see the white billows of innumerable winters, as they seem tumbling on in stupendous silence to overwhelm the world. If there could be such a thing, and anybody could comprehend it, I should say it is a picture of thunder. And yet there is no suggestion of tumult, as the words imply, but rather of a comforting stability and an unspeakable calm. Like death they have “all seasons for their own,” and stand and triumph over a turbulent world. What surges must have broken over the prow of this planet at some time, till the Arctic caught them in the act and struck them with frost, and there they hang about the bows of the craft through the ages, the pale corpses of the troubled and disastered sea. And behold, the Arctic is here beneath the all-day sun!

LONG'S PEAK.

Had the founders of Denver meant nothing more than to sit down and have a lifelong look at the grandest mountains on the continent, they could not have chosen better. Here is an amphitheatre with a sweep of three hundred miles of peaks and crowns and towers and crags, not one of them withdrawn beyond the range of an immediate presence. In this perfect air human vision is as keen as an eagle's. The eye "carries" two days' journey and does instant execution. You sit in the car, and looking northwest behold the white-helmeted poll of Long's Peak fending off the sky with a lift of two and two-thirds miles above the sea. It is eighty miles away, but as palpable and distinct as a picture on your parlor wall. You see the shadows lying under the lee of the mountain. You see the black gashes of old battles with earthquake and lightning; you note where the glaring white tones down into sandstone red and granite gray. You see the maroons and the blue velvets, and all the trickery and enchantment of light, distance and shadow. You discern the timber line, where vegetation dwarfs itself in a fight for life and a foothold, as if huge grenadiers should dwindle down to drummer-boys in the front. You can make out the columns of tall timber farther down. You can watch the clouds around the mountain shoulders like one of the smothering ruffs of Queen Elizabeth. And it is eighty miles away!

And we talk of its vastness, while, if piled peak upon peak, it would take ninety thousand Longs to reach the moon, whose lakes men have meandered without going from home. Ah, there is plenty of room in the sky-parlors, and Denver is a splendid place to study anatomy and count the spinous processes in the continent's backbone.

PIKE'S PEAK.

Then, turning to the southwest, Pike's Peak, the mighty milestone and monument to thousands of the old miners, stands erect and flat-footed upon the world. It is seventy-five miles to his base, but the view is as clean-cut and clear as a cameo. Should I tell anybody it is 13,985 feet high, it would be no very satisfying information: should I say, You must climb about twelve miles to reach the summit, it would be better; but suppose the reader swings a little tea-kettle over a fire on the sea-beach, metonymically, it will boil at 212° . Now pick up kettle, kindling-wood and thermometer, and begin your climb. At 5,300 feet the water is in active trouble at 202° . Playing Longfellow's young man, Excelsior, again, at the altitude of 10,600 feet it is in a lively state of unrest at 192° . Another lift to the top of the Peak, and the peripatetic kettle makes a tambourine of the lid and plays so mild a tune that what scalded you promptly and satisfactorily down by the sea will be no hotter than the tea strong enough to "bear up an egg," wherewith our grandmothers chinked up their hearts and limbered their tongues after a big washing.

How often lofty people forget that ebullition does not always mean earnestness and fervor. Boiling water is not necessarily hot water.

Pike's Peak is not the tallest of the white Carmelites of the mountains, but he is the omnipresent peak of Colorado. He follows you wherever you go. You catch a glimpse of him from the north at a distance of a hundred miles. Fine as a piece of choice old china, it is a page of solid geometry torn from the book and magnified and glorified; a true cone of pure silver. He confronts you on the west. He is sixty miles nearer, but seems no grander than before. He is an unscalable peak still. He seems to be standing off and on, and waiting for you at all points. But when you draw near, Pike loses his symmetry and shows rugged and irregular. What seemed a stately white tent for the occupancy of angels camping out for a picnic is turned into a mighty cairn of crags and boulders. The peak is blunted to a great stone-yard of eighty acres, and as poor plowing as a pyramid. But it is a trick of all mountains to strike their peaks as you approach. It is only when you leave them in the distance that their swelling grandeur returns.

Tall mountains and great men are alike. They show best a great way off. Never climb a mountain to see its peak. You may as well hope to kindle a fire with chips from the North Pole.

“COLORADO SPRINGS.”

Taking the Denver and Rio Grande railroad, a cunning narrow-gauge, while its officers are broad-gauge, you pass the Rocky Range in review, count peaks thick as stacks of grain in a rich harvest; look across the upper edge and dry side of rain storms to the ridges beyond; run down the line seventy-six miles to a place called Colorado Springs, because it has none, and to Colorado City, because it is none. The former is a beautiful prairie town; the latter, the old Territorial capital, is shrunken and rusty, the paint worn off and the pluck worn out. Nothing but a politician out of business is more forlorn than a deserted capital.

A stage is waiting for you at the dry Springs, like a lighter around a ship, to take you six miles to Manitou. You step upon the platform, and there stands Pike waiting for you. He is only eighteen miles off, and so you step on his toes when you touch the ground. Colorado Springs might be a fine prairie village in Illinois, if it did not happen to be in Colorado. It has a frontispiece of “specimens” and “views” to tempt the tourist. Heaps of geology abound, at prices so long that you need “a pocket full of rocks” to begin with. And then you go up hill. There is a feeling of snow in the air, but the fields are in bloom. You look away to the Peak, and see a snowstorm drawn in chalk lines between you and the mountain. It is a profile, a genuine cartoon, of a piece of winter weather. But that snow never touches ground. It weeps itself away in a slow drizzle. It is a white shawl dripping with fringes of water.

Manitou, where the springs really are, is an exquisite nestling-place in the mountains. Of course, Pike is standing before the door of your hotel. The great rock-bowl of splendid soda, grand enough to grace a symposium of the whole Pantheon, is a minute's walk distant. Its edges are chased with silver-white soda, for it always sparkles and forever overflows. Up a beautiful glen are the great iron springs whose waters will turn a clear glass goblet into an amber-tinted beauty, and as fast colors as an Ethiop's skin. I think a man might swallow water enough in three months to make a respectable lightning-rod of himself, and cheat those modest peripatetics with thunder-gust bayonets out of a bargain. It is said there is sufficient iron in a man's blood, anyhow, to make a shot to kill him, and why shouldn't that water make hardware of him altogether? There are spacious hotels, cozy cottages, delightful lounging-places, shaded paths and beautiful views at Manitou. It is worth two Saratogas for health and recreation.

THE MOUNTAIN HOME.

Living twelve miles up the world from this retreat were two valued friends of "lang syne," and the desire to see them was stronger than gravitation, so up we went through the Ute Pass to find them. The Pass is a narrow cañon overhung with rocks, overarched with trees, now roofed with not more than twenty feet of blue sky, now turning under hoods of crags, now out into little bays full of tangled luxuriance. Aspens all along shake in their shoes, and pines give their same old sigh. The splendid road has more crooks than the horn that jarred down Jericho's walls, and it goes through throats of places that make you feel for your windpipe. We met two things when climbing the Pass. One was a storm that threw one solitary thunder down the gorge from top to bottom without striking a stair. It was startling as if a rifle-cannon should call you to breakfast. The other was an eccentric, sparkling stream that leaped and flashed from ledge to ledge at our left. Here, it came fifty feet at a tumble; there, it splintered like a lance against a crag; yonder, it darted bright as silver; now, it lurked black as ink; then, it was fleecy as Jason's sheep; again, it was smooth as a looking-glass. It confronted you, it flanked you, it was an incessant surprise, and a success also.

So we climbed through, and out into the rolling country, but always up, meeting greasy Mexicans with long double-files of lean mules and leaner oxen drawing ore down to the railroad; meeting solitary horse-men; seeing cabins and pleasant homes here and there, until we were nine thousand feet above the sea, and that Pike was waiting for us at the end of our journey! We saw the scar of a trail, and a dished landscape, like a foot-bath at the feet of the Peak, and a long, low, broad-brimmed house with a homelike look and neat out-buildings about it, and a white tent like a big mushroom. It was our friend's eyrie, and we were made welcome.

Soon night came up, for in the mountains it never comes down. Had Homer—who was Homer?—been a Coloradan, he would never have said the god “came down like night.” First, the valley below filled with darkness; then, the basin we were served up in; then, the dish overflowed, and the tide of shadow slowly rose along the mountain sides. We were over head and ears, fairly drowned in night, but Pike's snow-cap yet glittered in the sun. The unclouded sky had not blossomed out with celestial asters. By-and-by the mountain was up to his shoulders in darkness, and then he doffed his white cap for a turban of red kerchief that slowly faded to a dim, cold gray, and it was night all over. Then the voices of nocturnal birds startled the stillness, the long whine of a mountain lion up the cañon, the bay of a dog down the valley, and a score of indescribable rustlings and whisperings, made the silence lonely and audible.

We had climbed out of the world of railroad and telegraph. We had gotten into the back chamber of the century. And—oh, the delight of it!—we had escaped the hammer and the clangor, the banging and the twanging of the wires ever clanging, the wires ever wrangling. That forty-fingered girl with her piano had not found us out. There was nothing above us but the signal station and the stars. It was a new sensation.

Entering the house we sat down like four signs of the zodiac around the generous fireplace, and torches of light pine flung their clear white splendors everywhere, till the house shone like an engine's headlight. Talk of the golden illumination of wax candles, and the glare of gas chandeliers! There is nothing so brilliantly beautiful as the fat pine fire by night. It is more than heat and light. It is cheerfulness, comfort, company and content. The remembrance of that fireside shines like an evening star in the mountains. May those that kindled it ever have an abiding star for all the nights of their two lives, that "goes not down nor hides obscured among the tempest of the sky, but melts away into the light of heaven." That far-off scene is as near as the left breast. The two trout-ponds, gorgeous with fish that must have been caught out in the crimson and golden rain of Danaë and been speckled for life; the prairie-dog village up the road;—they were "not at home," the four-footed prevaricators!—the great furnaces of lime and charcoal, the ebony and alabaster of the mountains; the clear sweet air, that you want a great deal of if you run a race; the complete escape from the elbows and turbulence of the world; the boyish expectancy, on tip-toe for something to prowl down the cañon, or lumber out of the woods, or steal forth from the cleft rocks, say a cinnamon bear or a mountain lion; the stateliness of Pike; the friends we found there;—all make an enduring picture and a delicious memory.

CHAPTER V.

“THE GARDEN OF THE GODS.”

AN hour's drive from Manitou brought us into an up-hill and down-dale region full of rocks in all grotesque shapes and tints; red, gray, pink, yellow, dead white; the eloquent evidences of disturbances in days so long ago that almanacs do not name them, when something put a shoulder to the strata of rocks and lifted them out to the light; and here they are, gnawed by the elements, carved in fantastic forms innumerable. The lower stratum of sandstone was more edible than the upper that rests upon it, and so winds, rains, frosts and suns have eaten it out, and left necks upon which are mounted masses of the more durable rock, curved, rounded, poised and perched upon the lean, long, uncanny necks.

Think of a multitude of stone toadstools, six, ten, twelve feet in diameter; of Chinamen's hats done in pink, yellow, red, with mossy rosettes; of awkward sun-bonnets weighing two tons apiece, always slipping off and never falling; of stone bowls, big as caldron kettles, bottom side up on pillars; of ogreish heads wrapped about with gray turbans; of loaves of overdone bread, two hundred pounds apiece, set upon the rocks to cool; of a crop of capped and hooded gate-posts waiting to be harvested; of petrified dumb-bells such as Jupiter might have practiced with before throwing his thunderbolts; of a flock of witches in red tatters squatting around in dumb petrefaction; of masses of rock as big as a house poised upon stones the size of a pumpkin; of whole families of Leaning Towers—no end of Pisas—accenting everything in a manner more emphatic than delightful;—think of all these at once, and you will know something of this sandstone nightmare.

In and out we go among these queer leavings and carvings of what were once solid books of stone. Did you ever see an old volume that the book-worm had tunneled and honeycombed? Do you remember how spangly the maple-sugar was when ladled out upon snow or dropped into water? It is a jumble of ideas, and so are these sandstone jokes, jests, frolics and fritters. Here is Mrs. Grundy's head, her chisel of a chin and her incisive nose threatening each other across a long unhemmed mouth; and tongue, head, cap and all, dumb and motionless in a blessed sandstone silence. Alas, that it is not the ubiquitous lady indeed, that no more the question should be heard, "What will Mrs. Grundy say?" There is Napoleon's hat. It weighs five hundred pounds if it weighs an ounce. There is a prehistoric look about things, and you feel as if you are four hundred years old yourself. You are afraid some of those Saracen heads will cry "Bismillah!"—the baker come out to look after his loaves—the toads leap forth and sit upon their stools—Mrs. Grundy prove not to be so very dead, or you turn into old red sandstone for other tourists to look at and laugh about.

THE GOLDEN GATE.

We are nearing the gate of the "Garden of the Gods. Some people have a masterly faculty for misnaming things. Whether it is a baby or a bowlder to be christened, the names they bestow could be interchanged without exciting a suspicion that either had been wronged. "Garden of the Gods" is about as appropriate as Orchard of Hesperus or the Valley of Rasselas. It suggests nothing, and it means all it suggests. Here is a park of five hundred acres of land, mountain-locked on the north and west, moated with cañons on the south, and walled with red sandstone on the east, spread with grassy carpets here and there, and dotted with little pines and other vegetable stragglers. You approach a gateway two hundred feet wide, with red sandstone towers three hundred feet high, covered with sculptures that no man can read, and massive and rugged as are no other portals in the world.

In the center of the way is a red pillar twenty-five feet high, which was probably the horse-block whence the Titanesses stepped to the pillions behind their lords and masters when they went their morning rides. You can see the walled-up windows whence the old warders looked forth. You can see escutcheons that no herald can make out; chimneys standing alone; towers dismantled; alcoves, broken arches, pinnacles, castle ruins, and all red as porphyry. And a little way off you see parallel walls that are marble white, and show in fine contrast with the cinnabar tints around.

Not long ago I saw photographs of the ruins of Ba'albek, and I said, a greater than Ba'albek is here; these Titanic castles and fortresses wrecked and ruined, and greater in their destruction than the completed architecture of the Wrens and Walters of modern times. Anybody can rear castles from foundation to turret, but only one architect can build ruins so grand, and his name is Upheaval.

It was a splendid morning when we stood in front of the gateless Gaza, with its green lawn. A couple of men of standard stature walked through, and turned dwarfs as they went. At the right was a monumental group such as Cruikshank might have designed as the Graveyard of the Grotesque. But we halted in front of the grand entrance. There, set in a red frame, though eighteen miles away, was a royal presence. A vast white pavilion rose against the blue sky, as if the Titans had gone into grand encampment. Never was a fairer picture mounted in a more befitting frame. All galleries of art fade into insignificance. All works of the old scenic masters are trifles as you gaze upon this. It was so restful and complete. It filled the eye and the soul as well. But it was not like Longfellow's pavilion when he sang:

“But when the old cathedral bell
 Proclaimed the morning prayer,
 The white pavilion rose and fell
 On the alarmed air.”

This tent was motionless as the arch of heaven, for it was PIKE'S PEAK in a frame of porphyry!

Let us take the noble legend of the State of Colorado and engrave it beneath the picture: Nil sine Numine.

My recollections of Colorado are of the pleasantest. I am glad I have lived to see her born into the Union, and as I took occasion to write a year or two ago, in alluding to the Centennial Exposition:

Egypt! Earth's own eldest daughter,
 Colorado, silver bride!
 One mountain-born and one of water,
 Eldest—youngest—side by side.
 By one star more Centennial given,
 Colorado's Silver State
 Has reinforced the mimic heaven,
 And the Flag strikes THIRTY-EIGHT!

CHAPTER VI.

HATS.

THE manner in which certain excellent people lifted their hats forty years ago is of little moment; of too little, you must think, to need a pair of adjectives, reverently and carefully, to describe it, but why "carefully"? They were not silk hats, but either felt or genuine beaver that had made jackets for the four-footed dam-builders and millwrights; beaver that would last four-and-twenty years without shedding their fur.

Take the roomy bell-crowns, that flared like an old-time wooden churn bottom side up. They were safes and postoffices. In the garrets of those hats were deposited the letters received in a whole quarter, the huge fellows about as long and broad as a brick. There notes of hand, memoranda, accounts, were filed away. The men, most of them, stood sturdily on their legs in those days, and so were not top-heavy in the least. A red bandana sparsely dotted with white spots was also carried in the hat. When the castor was in position, there were three strata of commodities: first, letters and papers; second, textile fabrics; last and lowest, the head. There were two ways of unroofing a man without emptying the gar-ret; either he removed the hat, giving at the instant a little duck of the head, or he put up a hand as he careened the beaver, ready to catch whatever might tumble. The latter looked a little awkward, since it gave him the appearance of wanting to catch something alive, that might lurk in the loft.

Nothing you wear comes to resemble you so nearly as the hat; not the "soft" variety; that is as stupid and devoid of character as a meal-bag; but the firmer fabric that "sets itself aright," and is gradually fashioned to your phrenology, flaring out at your caution, curving away in front of your percepts, or rounding out behind your love of children and—grown people.

You have worn for a minute one of those brass hats, about as cumbrous as a king's crown, that, as the hatter adjusts it upon your head, dots a profile, a sort of ground plan of the cerebral regions, upon a piece of paper in the top of it. Did you much admire that line-fence of your faculties thus portrayed? Sometimes it is shaped like the print of a moccasin with an awkward foot in it, and sometimes like the anatomy of a sap-trough. A double Yankee inheritance would never enable you to guess what it was meant to picture, whether a kidney-bean or the track of a plantigrade, but a human head never!

Hats, like their wearers, have grown ephemeral. Once they lived as long as good dogs live, but now their average age is about six months. I respect a hat that has seen service, that has been worn evenly and steadily winter and summer, that has a whitish suspicion of edges, and has so accommodated itself to the wearer and grown nobby with his faculties, that he quite forgets he is not bareheaded. Find that hat drifting about on the mill-pond, and you immediately know whose body you are going to drag for. There is no more poetry in a hat of the firm variety than there is in a half-joint of stove-pipe. You cannot fancy the hero of a hundred battles in a silk hat. The very name of the article has a disreputable rhyming acquaintance with such words as bat, cat, flat, gnat, rat, scat and sprat. "Stick a feather in it," and it is hat still. Wreathe it like Billy Barlow's:

"All round my hat I wears a weeping willow,"

but it will not do.

"He put his hat upon his head,
And walked into the Strand,
And there he met another man Whose hat was in his hand."

Two hats in the same stanza, and two men with immortal souls engaged in carrying those hats in two different ways, is too much. But make them helmets and call them Greeks, or plumed bonnets and call them Scots, or shadow-shedding sombreros and name them bandits, and there is an element of romance and poetry that may possibly float the article on the rhythmic current. The tall hats of the Puritans have no more grace than a funnel, and the leafless pictures of the Pilgrim Fathers freezing about Plymouth Rock and towering up in their peaked hats always reminded me of something rank run up to seed in the fall.

Figuring in political history, the hat has been garnished with the black cockade and the buck-tail. The crape "weeper" used to swing from it, and, as the mourner walked, sway in a slow and pensive way from side to side, like a black rudder without a helmsman. It is reverently lifted to sorrow, beauty and death. It is whirled about the head in visible huzzas, and shied enthusiastically into the air like a rocket. It is held forth for alms, and, muffled with a handkerchief lest you should hear the jingle of ignoble pennies, is passed about in the beneficent congregation. The mettled racers used to burst from the grand stand at the "drop of the hat."

One family in the British Empire has the privilege of appearing covered in the presence of royalty, and all the old Quakers wore the broad-brim unrebuked in the presence of God and man.

When the wearer cocks his hat over his right eyebrow it means defiance, if it doesn't mean—a fool. If he sets it squarely upon his head and pulls it down like a percussion cap to the tips of his ears, it is determination, if it is not—doggedness. Let down the hammer upon that hat, and he will explode. If he throws it back upon the nape of his neck like the calash-top of a chaise, it signifies a careless independence and a propensity to "face the music" with his whole countenance.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MEN OF GROOVES.

THERE is a fatal facility about grooves. They are wonderfully easy things to run in. They are labor-savers and man-savers. They save time, trouble, bravery and brains. It is as if rivers ran down stream both ways, and oars had never been invented.

The groove-bound doctor attacks the patient in typhoid fever according to a formula so old as to be mossy, and the result is often something else that is mossy, if you give it time enough, to wit, a grave. The medicine and the disease are too much for the poor fellow, and between them he comes to grief and "goes to grass." Venture to suggest to this vendor of antiquities the virtue of good nursing and nourishing food, and incessant watching that nature has fair play, and he denounces it as the wisdom of old women which is foolishness with mummies. The doctrine is, better die according to law than live according to grandna! The physician who studies his patient like a new book; who reads his peculiarities as if they were in print; who sees wherein this case differs from any other; who recognizes the fact that man is not a stereotype, and who finds his treatment less in the pink-and-senna scented library than by the bedside; who dares prescribe what he thinks rather than what he remembers; who believes that books record other men's experiences, and can be verified or condemned only by his own,—this man can never be a man of grooves.

THE TEACHER.

The most useless of stupidities is the teacher who is a groove-runner; who has swallowed text-books without digesting them, and feeds his pupils with the morsels as old pigeons feed squabs, until, like himself, they are all victims of mental dyspepsia, which is a curious synonym for education. Children subjected to such diet are as likely to get fat and strong as so many grist-mill hoppers, that swallow the grain without grinding the kernel. Such teachers forget that one, like Judith's sister "Feeble-Mind" in Cooper's novel, may have a prodigious memory. Who has not known a fool who remembered everything he heard and just as he heard it, who could run up and down the multiplication-table like a cat upon a ladder, and rattle off rule after rule without missing a word, and that was all there was of it—he was a fool still? A good memory built into a well-made intellectual structure is a noble blessing, but that same memory with nothing to match it is like a garret without any house under it; a receptacle of odds and ends, that are worth less than those papers that losers of lost pocket-books are always advertising for, "of no value except to the owner."

Take English grammar under the man of grooves. Learning to swim upon kitchen tables, buying a kit of tools and so setting up for carpenters, are all of a piece with his grammar. Hear them defining a preposition as "connecting words, and showing the relation between them," when not one pupil in a hundred ever finds out whether it is a blood relation or a relation by marriage. Hear them parse: "John strikes Charles. 'John' is a noun, masculine gender, third person, because it's spoken of, sing'lar number, nom'native case t' 'strikes.' 'Strikes' is an irreg'lar, active, trans'tive verb, strike, struck, stricken, indicative mode, present tense, third person singular, and 'greees with John. Verb must 'gree with its nom'native case 'n' number and person. 'Charles' is a noun, masculine gender, sing'lar number, third person, 'cause it's spoken of, objective case, and governed by 'strikes.' Active verbs govern the objective case—please, sir, S'mantha and Joe is a-makin' faces!" And all in the same breath! What ardor! What intellectual effort! What grooves! Meanwhile, grammars mended, amended and emended, multiply. There are four things anybody can do: teach a school, drive a horse, edit a newspaper, and make a grammar. Meanwhile the same old high crimes and misdemeanors against the statutes are daily committed. This comes of grooves and the lack of a professorship of common sense.

Take geography. The young lady fresh from school, who from a steamer's deck was shown an island, and who asked with sweet simplicity, "Is there water the other side of it?" had all the discovered islands from the Archipelago to Madagascar ranged in grooves and at her tongue's end. "Didn't you know," said the father to his son, who expressed great surprise at some simple fact, "didn't you know it?" "Oh, no," replied the little fellow; "I learned it a great while ago, but I never knew it before!"

Take arithmetic. Show a boy who has finished the book, and can give chapter and verse without winking, a pile of wood and tell him to measure it, and ten to one he is puzzled. And yet he can pile up wood in the book, and give you the cords to a fraction, but then there isn't a stick of fuel to be measured, and that makes it easier, because he can sit in his groove, and keep a wood-yard. "So you have completed arithmetic," said the late Professor Page, of the State Normal School, to a new-come candidate for an advanced position; "please tell me how much thirteen and a half pounds of pork will cost at eleven and a half cents a pound?" The price was chalked out in a twinkling. "Good," said the professor, "now tell me what it would cost if the pork were half fat?" The chalk lost its vivacity, the youth faced the blackboard doubtingly, and finally turning to the teacher with a face all spider-webbed with the lines of perplexity, and with a little touch of contempt at the simplicity of the "sum," and, possibly, of himself, he said, "It seems easy enough, but I don't know what to do with the fat!" That fellow was not a fool, but a groove-runner. A little condition was thrown in that he never saw in the book, and that groove of his had never been lubricated with fat pork.

THE CLERGYMAN:

Clergymen are liable to preach in grooves; to employ certain hereditary forms of speech that blunt the edge of expectation; forms whose first words suggest their followers to every hearer, and leave nothing to be listened for. Men should preach in types, and not in stereo-types. Words should not be uttered in blocks of phrases. It is dull and lumbering business. The art of putting things is a great art. Truth is old, but then in what numberless lights it may be revealed! Truth is the sun. He shines with one steady, everlasting beam, but behold the glories of refraction, that give the color and the beauty of the world! Preachers should be refractors. They should see the Bow from the mountain-top as well as from the plain. Hope dwells in the valleys, but Faith is a mountaineer. They should sometimes see the circle swept and finished,—the seal of the new covenant complete as the marriage-ring of Earth and Heaven. There is no grooved route to such vantage-ground of view,—such glimpses of glory.

Dionysius, the tyrant, has been sufficiently denounced, but the tyranny of grooves has never been written. Several years ago I spent a day or two in the engraving department of the Treasury. The men sat in rows and in silence before a well-lighted table.

One was at work upon a Pilgrim, and another giving Pocahontas a friendly touch. But what interested me most was this: you remember the fine parallel lines that used to cross the postal currency, like fairy furrows. The lines grew dim with frequent use, and it was necessary to sharpen them by deepening the impression. There sat a man with a worn plate before him, and a little instrument like a gang-plow. He set it carefully upon the plate, and ran it through those miniature furrows. Should he vary a hair's-breadth, the plate would be defaced and ruined; but he struck the groove with unerring accuracy every time. He said, "I hear the tool fall into the furrow, and then I run it right through." I bent my ear to listen, but no sound even as loud as the tick of a dying watch rewarded the effort. To my unpracticed sense there was no sound at all. The man laughed and said, "Neither could I at first, but now I hear it as plain as a hammer!"

Grooves are subtle things sometimes, and a man, like that gang-plow, strikes into them without knowing it, until he can travel nowhere else without spoiling his work. Denunciation of this "cold and unfriendly world" is one of the groove formulas, and some clergymen almost make us fancy they think the Devil made it, and not the Lord, who pronounced it "good." There is another and a better world, but let us thank God for this, the very best world we have ever been in.

"Life's field will yield as we make it,
A harvest of thorns or flowers."

It is wonderfully easy to talk in a groove. A noted professor of Hebrew went to Germany to spend a year or two in study. One of his associates of the faculty began to pray him on to the ocean before he had left New York. It was a new phrase introduced into his chapel petition, "Our brother on the briny deep." It was the Atlantic ocean surrounded by prayer. And so all autumn and winter he kept that unfortunate man "on the briny deep," like the Flying Dutchman, in all weathers, until when the professor struck salt water there was, to say the least of it, a very cheerful cast of countenance among the students in the chapel. And there he kept the Hebraist on shipboard while he was walking Unter der Linden; while he was buried in a parchment volume as big as a trunk; while he was smoking a pipe at Heidelberg; and when he was happily home again, it almost seemed as if it might require a steam-pump to get the "briny deep" out of that prayer.

THE GROOVE LETTER.

The average letter always runs in a groove. It has no more individuality or heart than a writ of ejectment. A letter should read as a good friendly talk sounds, but it seldom does. It begins with a "Dear Sir," when the writer wouldn't grieve himself to death were you sent to state's prison for life. He addresses you through three mortal pages, and concludes with a "Very respectfully," or a "Cordially," or some other thing equally absurd. They mean as much, these cast-iron beginnings and endings, as a Bantam's top-knot, or a ringlet in a pig's tail. Why do not people write as they feel? Grooves. Women are better letter-writers than men, because honester. If a woman despises you, she never loves you in a letter. Her heart is too near the point of her pen. There is no more relation between the expressions of courtesy that adorn letters and the real sentiment of the writers, than there is between the shingle rooster on the ridge of the barn and that brood of yellow-legged chickens in the door-yard.

ENTHUSIASM.

Grooves are fatal to discovery and invention. Nobody who follows them ever ventures "across lots" for new results. The man of grooves always traveled the two sides of the triangle in great stupidity and content . It was somebody else that struck across, lined the hypotenuse, and discovered the shortest distance from A to B.  The world smiles at and about enthusiasts a great deal, and upon them a very little, but it owes them a debt it can never pay, for all that. Enthusiasm is wonderfully contagious. How pupils catch it from an earnest, all-souled teacher! There is a professor of Greek in the State of New York—may his days be long in the land!—who inspired his pupils, and made them all wish they had been born in Athens, and almost persuaded them to believe that the dialect of the Blest is some sweet and unwritten Ionic. His word to his classes was, "Come, let us be Greeks together." Though his children are daughters, he has been the father of many Hellenists. The shadows of years have not dimmed my recollection of those recitation hours he made the pleasantest of the twenty-four. The Doctor's enthusiasm kindled the dead Greek into a living tongue, and the Attic Bee could have found honey upon his lips. But more than this, his enthusiasm kindled in hosts of hearts a flame of admiring and grateful memories that will never die out.

ROBERT KENNICOTT.

And how could I write anything about enthusiasm without naming young Robert Kennicott, of the Smithsonian Institute, the friend and companion of Agassiz; the boy naturalist, born to observe Nature and to interpret her to his superiors in age and in knowledge of mere books, but who was fated to die away there in British America, whither he had gone to open a new page for the perusal of mankind. Before his lip had the down of a peach, he found "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything." Living at "The Grove," a few miles from Chicago, he often visited the city with little discoveries he had made and specimens he had collected, and almost always called at the office of the writer. There would be a knock, the door would open, and he would begin to talk before he closed it, and talk his way up to the table, and talk himself out-of-doors. It was a flower, a bug, a bird, a quadruped. He was full of plans to help others to see as he did. He bristled with facts. His mind was luxuriant. He had a love for natural science "passing the love of women." He read in concentric circles from his boyhood home farther and farther until he read the State of Illinois. He explored its Delta, that queer region with tropic traces, that is bounded by the Mississippi and Ohio. He brought out its plants, caught its butterflies, unearthed its reptiles. No hardship was too severe if only he could add some coveted specimen to his cabinet. Slight in frame, he would be brave as a lion if anything for his darling science could be gained by it. What a companion he would have been for Audubon! How like an infusion of fresh young blood he was to the sober old professors with whom he came in contact?

The last time I met him was in the halls of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington, where he had been preserving and arranging some of his captures. As he conducted me through, and pointed out this and that, with apt, swift words of explanation, how happy he was! By and by we stood amid a splendid collection of rodents,—rats, squirrels, marmots, beavers, and all the four-footed tribes of gnawers. And then, seizing one and another he would say, "This fellow, you see, digs for a living, and here is how you know. And this one couldn't jump from tree to tree, like little Red Jacket there, and you see why,—he lacks a rudder to steer by. And this, you see what kind of food he must eat, because here are the tools he did it with. That foot,—look at it,—made to run both ways, up and down a tree at will. And here is a shady fellow, loves twilight,—see his eyes; and here one that is happiest in the sunshine, and loves warmth, and likes folks if he can keep them at arms-length.” And so he ran on with the texts in his hand, and, though wholly unpremeditated, just what he said would have made a delightful lecture. His mind was brimful all the while.

Poor Robert! Science lost a rarely-gifted son, whose simplicity of character, gentleness of spirit and enthusiasm of soul made him beloved in life and mourned in death.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE NORTH WOODS.

THERE is a range of hills in the county of Lewis, seven miles to the summit, called "Tug," and if ever anything was well named, it is that same range. Had the duty of christening it been given to Adam he could not have done better. It is a short word with a sharp pull to it. It straightens the traces to twanging point. It is as expressive as anything in the language,—Tug! This morning I am on the lowest step of this mighty flight of stairs, about two tall church spires above the lovely village of Lowville, that Goldsmith would have embalmed in rhyme had he ever fluted his way into the Valley of the Black River. Stand here by my side, and you shall see a panorama. Before you is a splendid table of green and gold,—of pasture and meadow and grain. It is the table of abundance. Beyond it, the land drops away into the lap of the valley that holds Lowville in its apron. Along the eastern edge of the valley, like a piece of silk braid upon a seam, is Black River, and beyond,—ah, beyond, is the great wilderness in the heart of New York, stretching away to the lake that Commodore McDonough immortalized with the thunder of his triumphant guns. The rising sun touches the woods and tints the smokes, and the forests, that were drawn up in black and solid columns all night long, stand apart, and open their ranks a little to the bright lances of the sun. You see little square clearings set deep in the woods here and there, like panel-work, and cigar-boxes, painted white, scattered about in the openings. Before you are the great North Woods, where the panther's cry and the foot of the prowling bear are familiar as plantain in a farmer's door-yard; where the rattle of the moose's hoofs used to crackle like burning hemlock as the mouse-colored monsters crashed through the wilderness; where wolves, gaunt and gray, made night hideous. As it was forty years ago so it is to-day through a rugged region of an hundred miles. Colton's Map of the New York Wilderness lies open upon my knee. I lift my eyes from the paper, and lo, a thirty-mile sweep of the original, draped in the mountain blue, is full before me: Let us climb the hill another stair. We turn, and the picture unrolls like a scroll.

There are figures on the slant hillsides. You mistrust mowers, but you hear nothing. It is the world in slippers of list. It is a picture of profound peace, and unbroken silence, and power everlasting. You fancy Rob Roy could have stood here when he said, "Were I to lose sight of my native hills, my heart would sink and my arm would wither like a fern i' the winter blast." A few rods down the steep side, as if it had halted for breath on the Gothic roof, and would make a new bound and over the eaves in a minute, is a trace of crashing roar and grinding strength ages ago. It is a boulder as big as a house. It has had battles with icebergs. Arctic bears may have clambered up on it, and shaken their white jackets in the feeble sun of the North. The bears and the bergs have vanished, but the rock remains like a great altar of sacrifice. Beneath the rock are two burrows. Reynard the fox dwells in the basement, and feasts like a traveling elder upon the chickens of the land. It is the Valley of Rasselas. Life is an unruffled flow. People live on into the fourscore and ten. You see a veteran laying stone wall under the blazing sun, and he is seventy-seven. Yonder in the meadow is a man "raking after," and he is eighty. You get your first glimpse of a hay-tedder. It is a quadruped. Each foot has a pair of long, crooked claws. Its office is to shake up the mown grass, and kick it all over the lot. It is as vicious as a mule, and the champion kicker of Christendom. It provokes a smile every time it goes into a spasm. You see a hop-yard and a bean-field. Life in the valley is like the hop and the vine of "Jack the Giant-Killer." It runs noiselessly, and it always runs one way,—left to right is the hop's route. Right to left is the bean's,—isn't it? And if it is, why?

Sing of the pines and the palms and the cedars of Lebanon, but grass is the very grandest clothing of the globe. Without it animal life would dwindle to "a feeble folk," and the earth would be a desert. It might have been worse for the ancient king, after all, than to be turned out to grass. The hill counties never have so rich a look as in haying time. Such velvets as the shorn fields show you,—golden green with the touches of the sun,—are never seen anywhere else out of kings' palaces.

Among the most exquisite features of the hill country are the elms, with their Corinthian crowns of green sculpture. They are sprinkled everywhere;—now drawn against the sky and clear of the world, from the top ridge of a hill, and now planted all about in the valley pastures like the columns of temples begun. Oaks are rugged, maples hide whole summers in their leafy recesses, but for airy grace and enduring beauty the elm excels them all. It is the lady-like tree of the woods.

SEVEN LAKES.

There are seven pieces of fog just tangled in the top of the forest. Unlike the article coveted by Jason, the wool dealer of old times, they are silver instead of golden. The writer stood in his boyhood about where we stand to-day, and with him one who guided his uncertain steps. Those seven fleeces were there then! That faithful friend and guide bade the child count them, and then he said, "Those little clouds are a sort of picture in the air. Beneath each one in the depth of the woods is a lake. You cannot see it, but it is there, and it will be there,—its silver picture yet hung above it,—when you and I are gone." With that we came silently down the stairs, and the boy longed to be twenty-one, that he might do the first man's business of his life,—penetrate that wilderness and look upon the mysterious originals of those aerial phantoms. One of the twain long ago went away to be at rest, which is far better, and the other is here to-day. There is not a stain upon those untarnished pictures. Like the Clouds of Magellan, they are everlasting. Though the writer has never yet seen the calm and shaded waters, he knows that they are there. He believes those lips that never told him wrong; and behold here the seven witnesses to bear testimony every sunny, summer morning! The lesson of the wilderness is worth bearing away into the thronged world,—the lesson of faith in the things unseen and eternal!

VILLAGE ROOSTERS.

You pass little villages in the valleys. There is a period in the life of small villages, as of small girls, called the "hateful age," when kitchen smokes are distinguishable and instructive;—that woman had fish for breakfast, and this one flesh;—where everybody dwells in a glass-house, and is about as conspicuous as if he lived in a lighted lantern. If you want to be inventoried, walk the streets of such a village, and the pagans will "take" you like a photographer. You'll be a stereoscopic object in spite of yourself. Doors will be ajar with noses in them, and the sharpest eye they have. Faces will be framed and glazed in the window-panes. You will be fairly surrounded by observant pagans. It has occurred to you how many more people there are in a little hamlet that resemble a disabled milking-stool, "without any visible means of support," than there are in larger towns. See the front steps of that village store, this minute. One, three, five, eight,—there are nine persons, like the ancient blackbirds, "all in a row." They have gone to roost, but they are as observant as magpies. A lady is coming down the street. Those nine heads, carrying eighteen eyes, turn to the right and watch her. As she nears them those heads swing slowly around. As she passes they are all front-face. They see her from top-knot to-gaiter-button. Then slowly to the left those eyes revolve. They follow at her heels like spaniels. They run up her dress to the nape of her neck like mice.

When Robert Raikes with his Sabbath schools began upon the London gamins, he commenced with sermons, but he couldn't get at them. He must unearth them first. So he revised his practice and tried soap and water, got down to the boys and succeeded. Every such village should introduce hydropathy for the health of store-door and tavern-step roosters. It should buy a hand fire-engine, not for the purpose of putting out fires, but extinguishing loafers. I should like to help man the brakes in some of those villages where they keep the featherless poultry on the door-steps!

“RETIRED FARMERS.”

Many of the villages in the hill counties are blessed — or otherwise — with the kind of man called “a retired farmer.” I am quite aware that I am treating of “the bone and sinew” of the land; that politicians, in their rural raids on the eve of elections, carry the idea that because a man has permanently crooked his back at the plow he must therefore be morally straight as a ramrod; that a soft white hand and a smutty heart are one pair, and a horny, sun-browned palm and great cleanliness in the left breast are another. Concede it all, and yet what business has a stout, hearty farmer to “retire,” and sell his home where his children were born and his fields made abundant answer, and go to the nearest village, and get his milk from a tin cow, and buy a rickety piano for his girl, and sit on dry-goods boxes and whittle sticks? That a man who has lived in a stone pen half his days, and had a brick earth under his feet, and a strip of sky a hundred feet wide and half a mile long over his head, should sigh to shut day-book and ledger, and go away into the clean country, and have a round horizon to himself, and a sky not cut in slices like a card of General Training gingerbread, is no mystery. But the begira in the opposite direction is incomprehensible. The farmer depreciates when he “retires.” He is worth less to the world than he was before. The day he transplants himself he has done growing and doing. To be sure, he underbids the village day-laborer sometimes, and so takes the money out of the father's hands and the bread out of the children's mouths; but unless this be a contribution to the community, he is not distinguished as a benefactor. In fact, "retiring" is not quite safe for anybody who desires length of days. About the driest sticks imaginable are statis-tics, but they tell a grave truth when they show that where a man voluntarily withdraws from his life-work he is about done living. As a rule, "he died in the harness" is a pretty good epitaph for man or horse.

AN OLD HOMESTEAD.

American homes are, generally, about as ephemeral as a morning-glory, and furnish quite as eloquent a sermon as can be preached, upon the evanescence of earthly things.

A home where a grandmother smiles down the generations like a small, benignant providence; where rooms here and there all over the house are hallowed by births and deaths and weddings and contented toil; where bits of old furniture keep you from forgetting you were ever a child, and whither you escape as to an altar of refuge from the heat, hurry and heartlessness of the big world, and grow better and younger for it all,—such a home is an ordained preacher; but, alas, how often, in this land of change, is it "silenced," and ignobly banished from the ministry!

Just the place for old relics and heirlooms is this hospitable homestead where I write. "The olive-branches" are all scattered and gone but one, and she brightens up the house for the tall father and the faithful mother "and the stranger within the gates." Just the place for hair-trunks, red, brindled and white, and worn in spots as if they had been chafed by a harness; trunks trimmed with brass nails, and lettered upon the cover with the same "O.S.," which may well mean old style, for lack of a better rendering. A little hand-trunk, about the size of a large woodchuck, is brought out, girt with a little leather strap. It is older than reader and writer together. It is fat with papers going back into the babyhood of the century. Here is the colonel's commission, signed by a dead governor, attested by a dead secretary; and here another, showing his right to be called captain; and there, close by war, is love! Here is a woman's writing, neat and regular, wherein she berates him in quaint verse for his attentions to another girl. Girl? Bride, mother, dead, dust, near half a century ago! And here is the rhyming answer, on yellow paper withered as an autumn leaf. But they kissed and were friends. Just the place for old daybooks and ledgers. Here are fifty pounds of them, written in a hand as plain as a guide-board. Pages covered with the names of dead men and dead women that were transferred, many a year ago, to gray slabs and marble monuments among these mountains, and away to the West where the red skies promise a glorious morrow; accounts for ribbons and calico of patterns as dead as the Pharaohs. We turn the big books back beyond the $ Cts. Mills, of Federal money, and here we are among the £ S. D. of the old world!

The sight of these relics quickens the memory, and stories are passed about, the latest of which is no chicken, not one of them being less than twenty-five years old. The faithful wife and mother, younger at sixty-nine than the Dolly Vardens of a single score, brings out the cards with which she won many a game aforetime. A pair of aces with handles to them is that "lone hand" of hers — a brace as mysterious to modern eyes as anything unearthed at Pompeii, for they are the old-time tools for carding wool. And so the talk and the show run on, giving glimpses that grow rarer every year of the sturdier times, when the Adams "delved" and the Eves "span"; when men fought wolf and wilderness, and women marched abreast with men.

Almost every old house among the mountains is haunted by gray-headed stories, as jolly as so many sparkling Octobers. You can hardly stand by the grave of a pioneer where a laughing anecdote does not mar the solemnity of the weedy and silent place.

But our rambles in the woods are ended for the year. As an Irishman might be charged with saying, wood is one of the most precious of metals. "From the Ark on Ararat to the Cross on Calvary," wood has been instrumental in the salvation of two worlds. Did you see the precious woods in the Brazilian department at the Centennial? The clouded marbles right from the tree; the rose-tinted, amber-colored surfaces, just as they grew, ranging almost from ebony to alabaster, and richer than any work of art?

But to me there is no more beautiful wood than the hard maple, the rock maple, the sugar maple, that sweetens thought with memories of the bubbling kettles in the faint-blue, smoky woods, with the soft April moon over the right shoulder, and the promise of resurrection showing here and there in the leafy loam at the edge of the snow-drifts; and the little camp with its roof of mighty barks and its couch of hemlock boughs; and the early eggs tumbling about like dolphins in a baby kettle of sap; and the girls chattering by the fire, seated upon a divan of straw; and the men looking like quaint pictures of "Libra the Scales." But the maples are down, and so are the patient wearers of the wooden yokes, and so are the girls, and a trampled street runs over the site of the camp-fire, and corn waves and gardens smile where squirrels and vines ran up and down the rugged maples at their own sweet will. If memories are deathless, as some men think, then there will be stray recollections of the sugar-bush where they sing the New Song.

But beyond the flavor of the maples is the sight of them; now, when they roll up their clouds of green in the summer, and now, when winter has blown away the leafy tempest, and the trees are logs, and the logs are cleft, and built up in the old fireplace, and the splendor of fire takes possession of the log hut fit for rabbits to hide in, and the rudeness becomes radiance, and the homely heap a palace.

I have a looking-glass that has had in it a whole generation of shadows, and the frame of it I saw in the living tree, and it was as full of birds'-eyes as a pigeon-roost in full feather; and there is a maple ruler somewhere that a leaden plummet followed when I drew lines to write "compositions" by, about "Spring," and "Health," and such things: an implement that was applied sometimes to my open palm in a warming, if not a welcome, fashion; and that ruler is as full of curls as the head of a golden-haired Saxon, and about the color of it. Ah, South America is gorgeous, but North America is glorious!

CHAPTER IX.

FUNERAL EXTRAVAGANCE.

THE OLD GARDEN.

IT was a long time ago, but the picture is plain as yesterday. A little village like a bird's nest among the leaves. A house, low-browed and double-chimneyed, where lilacs blossomed by the door-stone, and roses looked in at the green window-panes. On one side, an orchard with robins and seek-no-further— they used to call them signifyders? On the other, a garden with a broad walk down the middle, bordered with pinks and garden sorrel, four-o'clocks and nasturtiums. There were columns of carrots and battalions of beets and companies of parsnips and regiments of onions, and a row of cabbages, a squad of green recruits, all stupidly standing, wrapped in their voluminous ears, awaiting orders. There was a sort of general's staff of sweet-corn in a corner, all with drawn swords and tassels of silk; and a plumed troop of asparagus in the rear; and a picket line of damson-plums and currant bushes along the fence. There were sage and summer-savory in their little beds, while an Indian tribe of painted poppies drowsily camped among the families of dill, caraway and coriander, for Sitting Bull was not yet. Watermelons green as an earth with perpetual summer, and muskmelons marked like an artificial globe with meridian lines, and conical-shot of cucumbers that were trying their best to be cactuses and soured into pickles at failing, composed the garden artillery, while peas in white favors that carried plump knapsacks of green, and their cousins the beans, those pets of the Fabii, that climbed the poles with the agility of Darwin's own private grandfather, made up the commissary corps of the garden. The balmy shadow of a great Gilead fell upon the path by the gate and sweetened all the air.

THE BOY'S FUNERAL.

In the little door-yard were two Lombardy poplars, married by a grape-vine that aproned its clusters and swung over the path and shed sun and rain like a roof. In that shadow on a summer's day stood a tea-table, with a coffin of cherry upon it, and just as much silver about it as a chrysalis has. Upon a little pillow within lay the head of a dead boy—verily, a pillow of perfect rest—one of that countless multitude of whom the Savior had said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." I am afraid the mother disobeyed and forbade, but the child heeded the invitation and went.

The neighbors stood reverently around, the minister beside the coffin. He read a chapter; said a few words to "the mourners," as was the fashion of the day; he told us all to be even as little children, and invited us all in the name of the Master. And then "they sang a hymn and went out," as the disciples did from the supper — out into the yellow road, and away to the grave-yard. There was no plumed hearse, that carriage for one, and glossy as anthracite out of the mine, but only "bearers." All walked but the aged, the feeble and the dead boy. The grave-yard was as full of gray slabs as a quarry, and they leaned this way and that, and bore dates that went back into the seventeen hundreds, and texts of scripture, and quaint little couplets that limped into the grass and crept under the moss and were lost. They were the very "sermons in stones" of the old play. Some family graves were like the strings of David's harp,— father, mother, children, side by side. But summer |||| was doing its best to cover everything up with luxuriant life.

Beside the gate stood a bier,— a lean, black frame with four handles. It stood there winter and summer, always waiting, always ready. Some seasons the grass grew up rank and tall around it, as if to hide the thing from passers-by, but it never could be lost. Death was sure to find it. And so the boy was buried out of sight. All was done decently and in order. The funeral was not a ceremonial, but a simple, neighborly, loving service.

SETTING OFF DEATH.

I do not mean to say that in these crowded times any such method is possible. I have no grudge against the undertakers, and the makers of caskets, and the drivers of mourning coaches, and the ostriches that lend their feathers; but I do mean that the ostentatious and the rich are setting a deplorable example to the world. Nobody of ordinary means can afford to die, or at least to be buried, at present prices. It is a piece of extravagance not to be indulged in. It is something strange how it comes to cost so much to get into the world before you have begun to be of any use, and to get out of the world after you have ceased to be of any use.

I mean to say that the extravagance of the age follows us to the grave; that many a widow has robbed herself of daily bread to give her poor husband as grand a funeral as her neighbor's, that he might ride for once in state who never rode at all. A little late for him to enjoy it, the demonstration is for people who never cared for him when alive, and who shall cry, "A splendid funeral!" as the procession creeps by, like dots of shadow in the sunshine; or, if not that, then because she takes this way of relieving her heart and expressing her sorrow, even as the Indian widow sometimes voluntarily sacrifices herself on the funeral pile of her dead husband. And neither of them is a reason. I know of a funeral, only yesterday, of a poor laboring man of two hundred and forty dollars a year, whose funeral cost eight months' wages. It was as if he had cut off the total income of his wife and children in an instant, and taken away with him two-thirds of a year's wages besides. It certainly would have been very unkind of him, if he could have avoided it; he would not have died if he could have had his own way. But the unkindness comes in somewhere all the same. It is fathered upon the public sentiment, fostered by vanity and pride, and not by grief and affection, that a man must be treated better after he is dead than he ever was in his life.

Our Irish fellow-citizens make a pageant of a funeral, if not a festival. They yield to nobody in their demonstrations of respect for the dead. Their processions are drawn out like an Alexandrine line, and their funerals are a success. "Who is dead?" asked somebody, as twenty or thirty carriages filed along the street. And the reply was, "It is either some public dignitary or an Irishman. I'll inquire," and it proved to be a porter in a down-town store! The love of an Irish mother for her children is a proverb, and I must respect the feeling with which she robs herself of the necessaries of life to give her darling what the world shall pronounce a fitting burial.

But, say the objectors, "what would you have? Shall we not honor our dead? May we not do as we please with our own?" And the answer is just this: let the funeral obsequies be conducted appropriately and well, but shut out vulgar extravagance from the severe presence of death. Let not the lavish expenditure of the rich invest dying with two terrors for the poor: first, the dread of death itself; and second, the dread of how they shall defray the cost of the funeral.

FLORAL OFFERINGS.

Flowers are beautiful and significant. Placed in the hand or on the breast of the dead, strown upon the coffin and gracefully disposed about it, they become sinless preachers in whom is no guile. It is pleasant to see a young girl lying amid the flowers she loved,—the flowers that are so like her. It is suggestive to see the strong man shorn of his strength holding a little flower in his dead fingers. How strikingly the likeness of the earthly fate of the two comes out when we see them together! But even this is carried to an excess that calls for censure. Costly exotics are fairly stormed down upon the dead in oppressive profusion. It is a wholesale slaughter of the innocents because one man has died. I have no satisfactory statistics at command, and if I had they would be more unsatisfactory still, but it is safe to assume that money enough is annually expended in this country in the purchase of flowers for excessive funeral decoration, and for princely casket and cortège, to support fifty thousand orphans for a round year, and to fill the failing cruise of fifty thousand widows. And so there is some show of justice in saying that this prodigality produces the suffering it does not relieve.

Somehow the purchase of floral offerings for our own dead always seemed to me a little like the paid mourners and weepers of earlier English times. But when these gifts come spontaneously from friends, just as they sprang from the earth, all thought of commercial values is happily banished from the mind. One December day, Lizzie, one of the loveliest girls in all the world, died at Hamilton, New York. She was the light of the household, and a challenging angel that summoned out all the better qualities in everybody around her. I do not know why she died. Does any one? It was gray winter weather, and the floral glory of open-air gardens was gone. But flowers came from here and there throughout the village. One plucked the solitary calla-lily she was cherishing for a Christmas festival. Another severed the rosebuds that should never blossom. The windows even of humble homes were bereft of their fragrant occupants, and so they came in hands and baskets—and may I not say, in hearts, withal?—through the chill air, and made all beautiful and summer-like around the dear little girl as she slept. Ah, there was no ostentation here, but a tribute as simple and unaffected as the flowers themselves. It reminded me of that other funeral with which I began this article—the out-door obsequies of her far-away uncle, “the little boy that died.”

The beautifying of the last sleeping-places of mankind is a noble and an ennobling work. I would not have it diminished if I could. The loveliness is for all, and when poor men and women “take their places in the silent halls,” they share and share alike, as do the heirs in an equitable will. Perhaps the shadow of some great man’s monument may fall upon their graves, for at last they are admitted into what the world calls good society. Only this: If dying, a man cannot relieve the distresses of the poor immediately around him, and have at the same time the costliest of monuments, let his executors direct that the proposed shaft be shortened a few feet below the original design, and a sculptured angel or two be left out, and the sum they would have cost be given to the poor. So shall they be angels indeed.

A girl on the threshold of womanhood died, lovely, loving and beloved. Her life was like sunshine in shady places. Her resting-place is marked by a plain marble, recording her name and the dates of birth and death. You must look elsewhere for her monument, and you will find it. Her father built a church-edifice free to the poor, and a school-room beside it, and he named them both for her. And finding it, you can take up the inscription for Sir Christopher Wren: "If you would see my monument, look around!"

Let men set forth their tables with a service of silver if they can, and garnish their halls with pictures and statues, and all things of beauty that are joys forever. So far they need not consult the comparative poverty of the majority, or pay it homage; but in this matter of dying, all men and women are precisely equal before God and the world. The burial is a common necessity, and for this reason, if for no other, these barbaric funeral extravagances of wealth should be held "more honored in the breach than the observance," for the sake of those who are weaker and poorer than they.

CHAPTER X.

“MINE INN.”

THERE is a quaint, old-world flavor about that Anglo-Saxon word inne—inn. Direct, simple as mother-tongue can make it, the word tells all that is worth telling. Painted in black letters across a sign, oval and white as an egg—an anomalous egg, with little ringlets of sheet iron around the curve—and the sign set upon a post that leans a little, as if to give the word Italic emphasis, it is at once an announcement and a card of invitation: “INN.” The unhappy William Shenstone, who said he found his “warmest welcome in an inn,” would have understood it, warmed to it, and accepted it.

“Tavern” is the next homeliest word, with a democratic touch to it that gives it little favor. Apply it and see: Astor’s tavern, St. Nicholas tavern! And yet, why not? “The old London Tavern” had more wit and genius within its walls in some dead day or two than was ever congregated at the St. Nicholas or the Astor in a round year. The word brings up the picture of the bare broad table printed off in circles with flagons; of a mighty cheese, overcome and sagging with its own richness; of the pipes of clay rolling up the smoke of their narcotic offerings; of breezy-voiced Englishmen and “God save the King.”

“Caravansary”—a tavern for caravans—brings up a far-away Oriental scene, with a four-footed train just filing in from the sands. The very word suggests turbans and spices and silver-tailed horses, and a gloomy court that looms up with camels.

“Hotel” is as French as a frog. It is second cousin to palaces. It is applied to everything in America that “takes in” strangers. It means anything by the roadside that promises “entertainment for man and beast.”

“House” is also an aristocratic, almost a royal, appellation. The House of Hanover, which glitters with coronets and crowns and magnificent possibilities, may designate a hemlock tavern in the West, where a tempestuous runner shouts “All aboard for the Hanover House!” Landlords are often “left” to give their own names to hotels, and sometimes they are singularly absurd. A man named Hatch built a house and proposed to call it after himself, but it never occurred to him how precisely it would designate a residence for incubating poultry, till somebody put the words together before his eyes: “Hatch House.” Ming—a name that Dickens might have invented—bestowed the patronymic upon his house in Missouri, and everybody about the place fell to talking through his nose. The big dinner-bell said nothing but “ming”; a dusty, snuffling affair, jangled with a wire, called "ming" in a querulous, nasal way, and ming it was until, a few months ago, the old house was burned down, and even then it was ming, for it ming-led with the elements. You cannot burn such a name out of anything!

There is a public-house in Ohio whose name, if shouted at any educated and edible fowl less tough and overdone than a tailor's goose, would throw it into fits. Think of yourself following off a fellow who had roared "The American Eagle" at you, and some gamin in the crowd about the depot crying after you, "There goes a bite for the 'Merican Eagle!" If like Jupiter's bird you could clasp a talon on him, nothing but the law against cruelty to animals would prevent your making a thunderbolt of him. American is very well, and Eagle will do, but American Eagle measures too much from tip to tip.

There is a funny little affectation of grandeur in the way of announcing arrivals at modern caravansaries. Thus you read that A. B. has "taken rooms" at the Cosmopolitan. You call on A. B. and you find him in number 196, fourth floor back, quite above the jurisdiction of the State, and higher than you have ever gotten since you took the pledge; one chair, one pillow, and eyed, like a cyclops, with one window; a room as hopelessly single as Adam seemed in his bachelorhood. But "rooms" is statelier, and we all enjoy it except A. B., who skips edgewise to and fro between trunk and bed, as if he were balancing to an invisible partner. But things double and magnify in an atoning way when he comes to pay the bill, and finds the footing as high as the room, altogether a high-toned institution from clerk to closet.

THE BUSTLER.

I saw him to-day—the bustler. He bustled into the hotel dining-room—the long, quiet, decorous apartment where everything is subdued into pleasant murmurs—and lifted up his brassy voice, so that everybody looked and felt as if a big bumblebee had come blundering in, that they wanted to drive out with the broom. He talked as if he knew more about conversing with a herd of cattle than with civil people. And he accompanied himself with a knife-and-fork tattoo, and took two tines of the latter in his teeth like a country singing-master getting the pitch, when the only pitch for him should have been the pitch out-of-doors. He was a vivacious animal, and suggested a stall or a pen, or a yard with a high fence; was as breezy as a March morning, and just as disagreeable. And how he stared at you like a bull’s-eye! He should have been made to shut up like a policeman’s lantern, and then kept shut. He snapped his fingers for the dining-room girls, as if he had lived in a kennel, and gave a little whistle like an impudent wind at a keyhole. What he meant by all this was, that it was he himself, that he was there,—that he was made a little first, and then this world was gotten ready for him as soon as possible. He is the man to overwhelm the average hotel clerk, buzz him down and get number 2, while the mildly-spoken gentleman who is not a bumblebee gets number 182, and no elevator. Bustler could do nothing without noise. Had he happened to be a tailor, his needle would have creaked like a swinging sign. I do not see how, but it would. When he drank you heard him. When he ate, his jaws rattled, and you might have inferred from his shaggy manner that he had taken a turn-about with Romulus and Remus, and been suckled by a wolf. I always suspect that such a man had no sisters, in the gentle sense of the word; and that if he had any at all, they were only boys in petticoats.

ADONIS.

The hotel clerk, who equitably parts his hair in a hemicranian way, and waves it out in two pinions till he looks a little like Mercury when he puts on his winged cap and gets ready to fly; who wears white porcelain shirt bosoms and a seal ring, with a stone in it big enough to kill Goliath if little David had the handling of it; who looks you over in a supercilious way, and puts you on the fifth floor back because there is a dent in your hat, and your coat shows the ghost of a chalk-mark on a seam or two — this fragrant bandbox of a man always terrifies me. The higher he puts me up, the lower he puts me down. He degrades me in the sight of the bell-boys, the porters, the chambermaids and the office loungers. Even the bit of a bell-boy that shows me skyward, goes leaping up the four flights of stairs like a ship's monkey up the ratlines, and sometimes he is out of sight altogether.

Had I been assigned to room "10," he would have paced demurely before me like a little man, and I should have given him a quarter. Nobody whips a brush out from under his arm, and pursues me and whisks my coat here and there, as if he were seeing how near he could come to it and not touch it, and the reason is that I am the man in "240." Then my bell is so far off and so faint that no one hears it, and, if heard, it gives no one any trouble. It is as useless as a Canterbury-bell with a string to it. Even the waiters in the dining-room have found me out. They know the man from "240," and they treat me as if I were an object of charity. They never look my way, and the ear that happens to be next to me as they pass is always a little out of order. They do not suspect that I am the victim of the vicious geography of that capillary Adonis in the office. But everything corresponds, and when the bill is presented it proves to be on the same floor. It is a high-toned proceeding altogether. What shall be done with that clerk? If there were only one of him, a shilling's worth of halter would do, but who can afford to keep a ropewalk running for the manufacture of halters for the execution of Adonises?

An Adonis refused John J. Audubon, the ornithologist, a room at a Niagara hotel. He stood and lied to him with a regretful smile that the rooms were all taken. And it was simply because Mr. Audubon's boots lacked a shine, and the best side of him was not the outside of him. James G. Percival, the poet, was put into a sky-parlor in Galena, because there wasn't brass enough in him to make a pin, and Adonis was a fool. But then Mr. Percival would hardly have cared had they assigned him quarters above the eaves. And when the writer, seeing his name upon the register, inquired for him, and explained who and what he was, Adonis was reprimanded by the proprietor, and the proprietor apologized to the poet, and reduced him to the first floor in half an hour, but Mr. Percival just ate his breakfast and went away. Adonis mistook Lord Morpeth's valet for Lord Morpeth's self at Detroit. You get that clerk's idea of nobility when he mistook the man for the master, and himself for a gentleman. But all hotel clerks are not Adonises.

A BORDER TAVERN.

Were you ever a guest at a border tavern? The landlord is a tall Kentucky hunter. Blooded dogs—lean, liver-colored, and as full of points as a hedgehog—lie gaping about the floor, or hunting in their dreams with yelps that die in their throats. A peddler enriches the animal kingdom; one of those fellows that possess all a blue-jay's impudence and none of its beauty. Some rough fellows just out of the golden mountains, breeched in buckskin, frocked and beited; a knife in a leather sheath, depending like

Macbeth's ghostly dagger, "the handle toward my hand"; tangled and tawny, as to beard and hair, as the tail of a motherless colt on a burry common, snuffing the supper, pace the piazza with the springy gait of tigers before feeding-time. At the first click of the supper-room door latch there is a plunge of the sharp-set crowd for the tables, one or two being just too late for a plate, and turning their surly faces toward the board as they retreat, to wait their turn, with much the expression of a little dog driven away from a coveted bone by a big one. And this brings me to say that if you are going a journey in regions where it is "first come first served," the most serviceable piece of baggage you can take with you is a woman. If you have none, then marry one, for you are not thoroughly equipped for the road till you do. When dinner is ready you follow in her blessed wake, and are snugly seated beside her and exactly opposite the platter of chickens, before the hirsute crowd, womanless as Adam was till he fell into a deep sleep, are let in at all. There you are, and there they are. You twain-one, with the two best chairs in the house, served and smiled on. Look down the table at the unhappy fellows, some of them actually bottoming the chairs they occupy, and the arms and hands reaching in every direction across the table like the tentaculæ of a gigantic polypus. When night comes, it is not you that shift uneasily from side to side on the bar-room floor. If there is any best bed she gets it. More than all this, a woman keeps you "upon your honor"; you are pretty sure to behave yourself all the way.

The conclusion is as strong as a lariat, that traveling bachelors have forgotten something, and that if a woman hears a man sneer about her troublesome sex, and their inevitable band-box, and then in some weak moment he says to her, "Will you?"—an she be wise she will be cautious. Men are not a tithe of the help to women on a journey that the latter, in their modesty or their ignorance—I beg pardon, which?—are always conceding. Blessed be nothing! A lone woman can make the transit of the American continent like Venus crossing the sun, without either insult or danger.

THE OLD LANDLORD AND THE NEW.

Honest and thoroughly English words are landlord and landlady, and used to fit what they were meant for, like Alexandre's gloves. They name a pair of bread-keepers and loaf-givers who feed travelers. In fact, in a nice, white wheaten sense, they are a brace of loafers. But in pretentious hotels the landlady is about as nearly extinct as the mastodon. She has been succeeded by the housekeeper. The landlord is not utterly abolished, but he is often gilt-edged, bound in Turkey and profusely illustrated. No longer does he carve the succulent pig and the noble roast. No longer do the fowls, breasted like dead knights in armor on a monument, fall to pieces beneath the dexterous hints of the carving knife. No longer, when the guests are served, does he wash his hospitable hands in invisible water before their eyes, and wish that “good digestion may wait on appetite, and health on both.” He is succeeded by a clerk and a steward.

In the dining-room swarm a head-waiter and his underlings in black and white, to wit: faces and aprons, who stand behind your chair and regard your organ of self-esteem and look down the back of your neck, and watch your fork and your spoon and your plate and yourself, and never wink once. When you have done they have done. They know you as an omnivorous animal ab ovo usque ad mala—from the egg to the apples. No need to say or sing, “Get thee behind me, Satan,” for that is the mischief of it: he is there already and all the time.

The first landlord I ever saw is but just dead, and he was an old man in the beginning—my beginning. He kept a stage-house on the old State Road, as far north as the Black River Country. It was an old-time inn with a long, low, hospitable stoop, pulled down over the lower row of front windows like a broad-brimmed hat, a world too big, fallen over an urchin’s eyebrows. Along the wall beneath this stoop was a hospitable bench. Within the wide door was the bar-room, with a great hospitable Franklin and chuckle-headed andirons with slender crooked necks craning away from the maple logs as if they were afraid of burning their brains out. Across the room from the fiery cavern was “the bunk,” a seat by day and a bed by night. Above it hung a stage-driver's whip, with an open-mouthed tin horn in the act of swallowing the handle, and the stock coiled about like the hapless Laocoon by a long and snaky lash with a pink-silk tail. Beside the whip a shaggy overcoat, a long red muffler, a buffalo robe, and a tin lantern tattooed like a Polynesian. Upon the wall the tatter of an old menagerie show-bill, where a spotted leopard, partly loosened from the plaster, wagged his tail in a strangely familiar way in the little breaths of air from the ever-opening door. But the marvel of the place was the bar—a cage of tall, sharp pickets, and within it “black spirits and white, blue spirits and gray.” In the fence was a wicket window that lifted like a portcullis; and upon the little ledge beneath it a half-grown tumbler of green glass was set forth, and a portly decanter of some amber liquid, wherein rolled lazy lemons or cherries, or sprigs of tansy a little pale from drowning—or a blood-red port that came across the sea, or something bluish from the Indies. “Crusaders” were not yet.

In the dining-room there were no sable waiters, and no bills of fare with impossible combinations of letters naming improbable things, but good and abundant food—sugar that looked as if it had been quarried, and white as Parian marble; pure coffee fit for Turks, and tea for mandarins; and withal a hearty welcome. When bedward bound, a pair of sheepskin slippers were produced from a closet in the bar, and “the brief candle” that Shakspeare mentions, and you were shown to a bed fat as Falstaff, to which whole flocks of geese paid feathery tribute. Mattresses were not yet.

That first landlord was a hero to me. He linked the small village to the big world. He was to strangers what the mayor is now. He extended them the freedom of the city for two shillings a meal. There were shillings as well as "giants in those days." By the way: when an American tradesman tells you an article is a shilling, knowing that a single shilling is a fiction and a delusion, he is joking at your expense, and lacks but very little of being an honest man, for he comes within half a cent of it!

CHAPTER XI.

CARAVAN.

IT was from that old village stage-house the writer went abroad,—to Bengal, Asia, Africa and the Brazils,—went and returned the same day! Attached to the inn was a shed for the sheltering of farmers' horses on rainy days and Sundays. Through that shed wide doors opened into a stable-yard, walled in on all sides by barns. In that yard the Caravan was exhibited. Think of that, ye Barnums and Forepaughs of the four-footed and far-fetched! The ring for the pony and his smutty-faced Darwinian rider was tan-barked off in the middle of the small area; the cages were drawn up around like a corral; the elephant was in the great barn, with a chain about his hind-foot, marking time, but never marching, after the manner of chained elephants, and feeling through the cracks between the loose boards overhead for stray wisps of hay. And so, for a silver shilling, I went to foreign lands.

Everybody has a golden age. It is childhood. Mankind and poultry are alike,—both happiest and tenderest when spring chickens. In the golden age happiness is the cheapest thing going. You have seen the time you could buy it for sixpence, and have change coming. I have bought perfect bliss for a cent. It looked like a basswood whistle, but it was bliss. The E-flat bugle of that lark among players in the Marine Band at Washington never sounded half so sweet to me as that bit of piping basswood. The day I am writing of, happiness cost one shilling, and every village boy got the worth of his money.

There was a hyena that looked a little like a famished and angry hog, with a hoarse, rough snort, like a saw-mill. He snapped at the keeper when he touched him with a rawhide; snapped when he gave him his dinner. In fact, the keeper said the creature could act more like a human being than any other beast in the Caravan. Ingratitude generally goes on two feet, but here it had taken to all fours, and turned quadruped.

THE HEAD KEEPER.

The head keeper inspired us with great respect, and we thought he had captured the beasts with his own hand. He had a red face, and a loud voice with a brogue and an R in it. When he roused a great fellow in a striped jacket he said, "Ladies and gentlemen, this is the R-royal Bengal tiger-r of Asia, nine year-rs owld," and the subject of the biography gave a growl. "He is car-rnivor-rous and cr-ruel as the gr-rave, and is said to have devour-red sever-ral women and childr-ren in his native jungles. He was taken when full grown and subdued with r-red hot ir-rons." Here there was a sensation in the audience, and the tiger swung open his jaws, that creaked in the hinges with a sort of rusty growl, displayed a set of cutlery, and gave a great yawn, as if he were tired of the account of himself. But then he had heard it before, and we never had. It was all new to us, and horrible and good!

THE LIONS.

And so the keeper made the tour of the monsters of foreign lands, and threw us little ragged scraps of Goldsmith's Animated Nature, much as he fed the animals after a while with poor beef. He stirred up the lion, and when Leo shook himself and stood up on his feet, what with his imposing front lighted with two great yellow eyes, his mighty mane, and not much of any body to back it up, he looked like a four-footed head. Nature took so much pains with the hair that she seems to have hurried the work and brought the beast to a premature end. That hair not only saves the lion from contempt, but inspires respect for what would otherwise be a much exaggerated and unpleasant cat. Touched up and rounded out, here and there, with abundant curls, the color of Petrarch's Laura's tresses, he looks stately as a full-wigged lord-mayor of London, and wise enough to sit upon the Queen's Bench.

The young lion of Timnath that Samson unhinged, if we may believe the old Bible picture, and made a bee-hive of, and propounded the first recorded riddle thereon, "out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness," and offered everybody two and a-half dozen shirts if they found it out in a week,—that lion was put to the next best use that lion could possibly be; the very best being to catch him and cage him and show him to boys! Rampant, he shows well on royal arms. As an emblem he is splendid, but personally he is unwholesome and discreet. When the ass masqueraded in a lion's skin, he had the best of the beast on his shoulders.

There are several kinds of lions the keeper never named. There are the lion of St. Mark, and Gustavus Adolphus the lion of the north, and the Cape of Good Hope the lion of the sea, and Richard Cœur de Lion, and Æsop's lion that the mouse befriended, and the British lion. The keeper had only one variety, but he made the most of him, for he let him begin to swallow him, by putting his head into the beast's mouth, and he bade him roar. A sound like a wind in a cave sent a chilly wave down our unaccustomed spinal marrows. Somehow we seemed to hear it with the "small of the back!" Then the man looked as complacent as if he himself had done the roaring, and our nervous start gave him great delight, and we were glad because we had been scared, and so everybody was satisfied. There are many lions not dwelling in deserts and not kept in cages.

LEOPARDS AND THEIR HUMAN LIKES.

Then the keeper thrust his whip into the leopards' cage, and they leaped over it to and fro, to and fro, as lightly as a yellow-bird flies over a currant-bush. How gracefully they walked, with a long free stride, as we think Apollo walked when he went forth for a little archery practice. They purred like the hum of a little wheel, and their fawn-colored fur was dotted off with clusters of black cherries, and their throats were as white as a lady's chemisette, and their long, fine whiskers were just a stealthy touch longer than their bodies were wide, so that what the feelers could not clear the bodies wouldn't try to. The velvet in the foot and the nerve in the whisker told what they were made and meant for! There are folks, whose family name is not leopard, with the sensitive mustache and the still step. They never make a bold break, but go feeling noiselessly about. The best way to trust them is to make a Thomas of yourself and doubt them.

About feet: forget a mule's ears and look at his feet. No Arabian barb ever had a foot so small and lady-like. It is as handsome as a sea-shell. There is a belief that small feet do not naturally belong to large understandings. They say that great men almost always have large feet, though large men often get about in "number fives." However this may be, there is something lacking in a hale, hearty man who goes shuffling about the streets in slippers, and I don't think it is leather. A Christian boy's first manly aspiration is boots. Ethan Allen would hardly have chucked Ticonderoga into his game-bag just by asking for it. It was less a question of battle than of boots and breeches. What could the bare-footed, Highlander-legged commander of the rugged old fortress do, when summoned, but surrender and dress himself? He might have been brave as several Cæsars, but what if Allen had trodden on his toes with those jack-boots of his! Figuratively and literally, a man is manliest in boots. You hear his coming; the firm, unmuffled step. His trail is not dim, like a savage's. He makes a legible track. There is nothing of stealth or long whisker or velvet feet about him. In nature and in name he is not a leopard.

THE ELEPHANT—THEN AND SINCE.

Then the big barn-doors were opened, and an elephant,—it was Romulus or Columbus or Hannibal,—was led forth by a man armed with a pike-staff, and all the boys held their breath. Two dusty leather aprons without strings were hung each side of his head for ears, and two small crevices for eyes were punctured in the smoky plaster dead wall of his countenance; and he carried a couple of tusks at trail arms in front of him, and his tail depended like a bell-rope behind him, and the general expression of his body was that of an overgrown outdoor oven, and he went around the ring in a make-haste-slowly, shambling way. Then he knelt, and his backbone was lined with little boys as thick as they could stick, and he got up, a fourth at a time, and when he was all up and had given the fellows a short ride, he was commanded to shake them off. The ashen hide, rigged upon rollers, apparently, for the sake of equalizing the wear, rolled around him a couple of times at the word, and those boys fell off like apples from a clubbed tree, and scudded back into the crowd like quails into tall grass. Then the keeper lay upon his tusks, as in an ivory cradle, and was rocked up and down in an airy and oriental way. Last, we were told about the elephant's sagacity and tenderness and general loftiness of character, and a number of other qualities that he never was guilty of, and the creature spoke for himself and lifted his trunk and trumpeted, and shambled back to the barn and drank a barrel of water. We have all seen the elephant since. Some of us have had one, and it has generally proved the most costly and worthless of all our possessions. An elephant in the parlor has been known to eat up the owner's kitchen and credit. An elephant in the state has beggared the people. An elephant of a doctrine in the church has given it more trouble sometimes than all the religion it could muster. Elephants generally are architecturally Gothic and spiritually Goths.

THE MONKEY.

The charm and wonder of the day came last. Into the ring dashed a Shetland pony, all mane and tail and lively as a grig, and upon him "Captain Jack,"—not the Modoc, but the monkey. The sooty-faced burlesque was in uniform of a curious combination of cut and color, for while the coat was a wide-flapped old Continental affair, it flared as red as a British trooper's jacket, and the tip of a tail showing below the skirt behind gave a sinister, not to say satanic, touch to his figure. Upon his head, that bobbed about like a cocoanut in rough water, was a cocked hat with a feather in it. And this fellow handled the reins and stood erect upon the saddle, while the master's whip cracked like a pistol, and around the ring the pony buckled, and the bugles blew and the drums rolled, and the crowd shouted and everybody was pleased and nobody was ashamed to show it. Monkeys are just as popular and quite as absurd as they ever were, but people regard them covertly, out of the corners of their eyes. "Captain Jack" has ceased to be a hero. How we all envied that monkey the possession of the pony! I think we could have mustered a dozen boys who were in doubt whether they would rather have the monkey without the pony, or be the monkey and have the pony! For three months we all "played caravan" on Saturday afternoons. We were tigers, lions and leopards by turns. The biggest of us made poor elephants, while the most of us were fleet of foot as the Shetlander; but in one thing we were a triumph, for we all made excellent monkeys!

Gone is the old Caravan. The elephant unpacked his trunk long ago, but among all my landlord's guests none hold a brighter place in memory than the guests that halted in the barnyard, for so it was that I went to Bengal, Asia, Africa and the Brazils.

CHAPTER XII.

EXCURSIONS.

EXCURSION means getting out of yourself in a hurry. That is what everybody is doing in summer days. A man will make a more violent effort to rest than to do anything else under the sun. And it is a luxury because he makes it for nothing, while the average efforts of his life are made for money. When the excursion fit is on, it is not the least like hydrophobia, for everybody takes to water like a duck,—salt water, fresh water, spring water, mineral water, cold water, hot water, and if not water then mountains. He turns into a chamois, and goes skipping among the cliffs. When a man is about to rest, he sits up all night to be ready to go in the morning. He is whisked off fifty or a hundred miles, and trodden on and rained on, and squeezed and punched, and he spoils his hat, and his shirt-collar wilts, and he is half-starved, and he sees water and pays five dollars and is happy. But he has a girl with him,—perhaps an old one, perhaps not. And she wears a white dress and a blue sash and a saucy hat, and her hair flies, and little rivers of dusty perspiration are mapped upon her pretty face, and she wilts like a morning-glory.

Trains pass every day bound for Niagara, Chautauqua Lake, Watkins Glen,—everywhere. One of thirty-six cars and half a mile long, pushed and pulled by a couple of engines that looked as if they were quarreling about who should have the train, passed yesterday. It carried twenty-two hundred excursionists, who represented at least five thousand dollars' worth of solid comfort and profound rest. They hung out of windows and piled upon platforms like swarms of young bees upon apple-tree limbs. Their faces were widened out with satisfaction,—they looked as crumpled as tea-leaves, and were as dusty as millers. They had a band with them, marked like a flock of bobolinks, and you heard the trombone growling in his sleep.

“JACK.”

The man is always on board who wears his best clothes and his other hat. He looks like a tailor's pattern that has been stepped on in a damp day. His hat is the color of a badger, he has got a cinder in his eye, some heel has had a snap at one of his patent-leathers and left a little semicircle of what looks like teeth-prints, he has lost his handkerchief, and furtively wipes his happy face with a coat-cuff. He has stood up for the last twenty miles. He might have edged in, if he could have found an edge of himself anywhere, but he was afraid somebody would offer to sit on him, and he should wrinkle his coat-skirts, and make the knees of his pantaloons look like a couple of stove-pipe elbows. Such people would be handier if the ends of a kettle-bail were slipped into their ears, that so they might be hung up out of harm's way.

“GILL.”

There is the woman to match him,—the Gill of the Jack aforesaid. She is attired at once in company dress, and company manners. She looks as if she had been sent to the laundry by mistake,—washed, half-dried, and never ironed. She pulls herself together on this side and that with an air, when anybody jostles her. But then if she didn't want to be squeezed, she shouldn't have been a lemon.

Yonder is a man in an Ulster duster, whose material once sported blue blossoms. It is linen, and he is sensible; but then it hangs about him much as if he had clothed himself in a loose family umbrella, and altogether he resembles a specimen of unhusked corn with a withered ear in it. Like Desdemona's handkerchief, he is “too little.” There, is a lady under a low-browed straw roof, as comfortable to live in as a maple shadow in a sultry day. Here is a girl with her elegant apparel pinned back so far that you might think she was dressed for posterity, instead of the present generation. Had she pinned her garments back a trifle farther, she would have left home without them, and worn something more becoming. She has declined three chances to sit down. But yonder is a pair in cool, clean linen throughout, dust-proof, and pleasant to look at as a couple of water-lilies.

THE POETRY OF PICNICS.

Excursions frequently end in that disaster called a picnic. A sublime contempt for comfort, and plenty of spirits, are essential to its enjoyment. The particular brand referred to is "Youthful Spirits." If a man hasn't a boy in his jacket,—if a woman has traveled life's road so long that she is out of sight of herself in pantalets and calico frock, then let the twain read this authentic history of picnics and remain at home.

Quite everybody now is munching something under a tree, that is such a mixture of cake, sandwiches, pickles, and cheese, that it has about as many flavors as that blessed city of Cologne had odors, not one of which was cologne. The munching is diversified by discovering long-bodied ants in the jelly-cup,—ants that instead of "going to," as directed in the Bible, you immediately go for. Then Uncle Toby's fly, that he sweetly said there was room for, is floating in the iced tea; and one of those darting spiders that outlines chain-lightning has you by the nape of the neck; and a wood-tick has begun to picnic on that part of you commonly called calf, as if, considering where you have been "left" to go, the tick could have nibbled you anywhere without encountering veal! Then the log where you sit is about as pleasant as a moss-grown fog-bank would be, and a bug has gone into "the fearful hollow" of your ear, and a catarrh has entered your head, and you wet your feet in the boat, and you are so mussed and mottled with two kinds of jam that you resemble a New Zealander in full tattoo, after a fight. You wear good clothes and take good victuals, and spoil them all. And then it rains! You get under a tree, but, as with a pea-straw roof, it rains harder there than anywhere else; and you begin to show out your character by turning green where you knelt in the splashed grass. But that brand of spirits sustains you, and the more mishaps there are, the jollier you grow. In a word, the misery of the thing is the pleasure of it.

Picnics are sometimes made for the "benefit" of some good cause, but never of the performers. That pitiful picture of poor Mrs. Rogers, "nine small children and one at the breast," following Mr. Rogers on his way to the stake, was a sort of picnic with one martyr, while in the picnics I write of there are many.

There is an aboriginal streak in men and women, a bit of undeveloped savage. Thus a number of residents of La Porte, Indiana, went and camped out for a week in plain sight of the city! It was a sort of chipyard picnic. Had they been houseless gypsies, it would have been no marvel, but they all deserted comfortable homes, and, like Nebuchadnezzar, went out to grass without being turned out. It was a little like going to the washtub to fish.

Seriously, there may be worse social devices than picnics. They let stilted people down and timid people out, for a bashful man is never so bold as in that well-dressed and well-disposed mob called a picnic party. And then they act more like themselves out-of-doors in the woods than they do in parlors. People who eat rice by the kernel with a fork, and taste things here and there in a delicate way, delight to return to primeval fingers, and bravely grasp a drumstick or gnaw some other bone. They act as live clams do that you keep in the cellar sometimes. When in the dark they open their uneloquent mouths, but the moment you approach with a light, click, click, go the closing bivalves, and they are all snug as an oyster again. Some persons are clams. It is only in the shady places of picnics that you really see and hear them at all. Only there can it be said of one of them, clamavit.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE "NORTH WOODS" MEETING-HOUSE.

I SEE the church,—“meeting-house” then,—in the village of Lowville, as it stands on the edge of my life’s eastern horizon. It was humble as a barn, but hallowed as an altar. The pulpit, with the architecture of a grain-bin and two stories high,—they kept the fuel in the lower one,—was about big enough for the twelve disciples to meet in. A broad ledge ran all around it, whereon the Bible and the hymn-book had place. Not an inch of carpet or velvet or cushion anywhere about it, if we except a little cushion of green cloth, plump with the plumage of geese, and looking like a young feather-bed not quite ripe. It was as guiltless of upholstery as Haman’s gallows. For a time the Sunday-school library was piled in one corner. The entrance to it was by a little closed stairway. The minister went in and up and was out of sight, for whoever sat down in that pulpit was invisible till he stood up. A bench of unpainted wood was fastened along the wall for the minister and his “visiting brethren.” And what a shining host at one time and another have I seen there!—Kendrick, Peck, Bennett, Card, Cook, Cornell, Galusha, Smitzer, Moore, Morgan, Hascall, Comstock, Elliott. They make me think of the big trees of California. They were few, but how mighty they were! A formidable breastwork had that pulpit, and fronting it like a battlement was the gallery where stood and sang the choir.

(My father led the choir. I can see the wooden pitch-pipe, with a mouth like a whip-poor-will,—I saw it a few months ago, blackened with age, and treasured for the lips that have touched it,—as he adjusted it to some letter where "mi is in E," or some other member of the musical alphabet, and blew a slender note that had a plaintive cry something like a plover's, and they all "pitched in" and sang one of the golden songs of day before yesterday, while Sister Green rose and fell with the notes as she stood, like a boat at its moorings lifted by the tide. There was a girl in that choir from the "Number Three" road that always matched her eyes with her ribbons, and the ribbons were always blue. She seemed to me about the sweetest singer in all Israel. Where are the eyes and the tones to-day? I fear me those have grown cloudy and these sad since then. Let us hope not.

For some reason well known to my father, and so I never mentioned it to him, a place was assigned me, during the services, in that gallery, and within easy reach of his paternal hand. I didn't sing. I never could sing. When I do sing, I depart into waste places.) Admiring many tunes, I was never sufficiently familiar with any of them to take liberties and call them by name, except Yankee Doodle, Hail Columbia, Ode to Science, Bonaparte Crossing the Rhine,—is he crossing it yet?—“and such.” But I knew Mear and Old Hundred and Heber’s Hymn, and all the rest of them, enough to love them when I heard them, and passing sweet did they sound to me then,—yesterday, to-day and forever.

Just behind me was the bass-viol, played upon by a Christian man whose memory is yet sweet,—Melancthon Merrill, of the “West Road.” That carnal instrument, portly and florid, was not admitted into that gallery without argument. Some of the silver-gray brethren and sisters would have had no objection to psaltery and harp, and even tinkling cymbals, for were they not all Bible instruments wherewith to make “a joyful noise” before the Lord?—but that father of fiddles,—well, they associated it with the corn-pop measures of Money Musk, and the total depravity of “The Devil among the Tailors,” and the profane rhyme of “Old Rosin the Bow,” if old Rosin was old enough.

As I remember it, Elder Blodgett read psalms and hymns as we are commanded to sing them,—“with the spirit and the understanding,”—read them as if they were something he loved and believed in, and wanted everybody else to do likewise. You have heard some terrific reading. So have I. Witness the man whom I heard “give out” the hymn, and you may judge how he read it by what he said about it:

"Sing the two fust vusses and the three last," as if the hymn were a hay-fork at one end and a trident at the other. Perhaps the order of importance in the clergyman's mind should be, first the text; second the prayer; third the praise; last the sermon. Make this universal, and there will be less hustling through the hymn, as a brisk fellow wipes his feet on a husk door-mat.

(In those old days I think there were none in the choir but "professors." But in the Presbyterian stone church up the street,—the Baptist edifice was nothing but wood,—you could not quite distinguish the saints from the singers in the choir, because they had all been sprinkled into salvation in the genesis of things,—"in the beginning.") But I fancy they should have let the sinners sing. It might have been good for them. Praise is next to prayer.

By the way: do you know any civilized places where they have sacrilegiously degraded "Ninety-and-Nine," "Hold the Fort," and "Jesus of Nazareth Passeth By," to dancing-tunes under the thin title of waltzes? I do. To steal a communion service for the purposes of a drinking bout would be a companion picture.

(The beauty of that old meeting-house was invisible to the natural eye. It had none at all. It was as angular as an elbow, and as square as a checker-board. Its frescoes are all memories. The grace of its pews was lent by them who sat therein.) Under the brow of the mighty pulpit sat Deacon Bachelder and Deacon Moses Waters. One was a fine specimen of a lean deacon, and the other as rotund as one of his own Pound Sweetings, for he was the man who gave me Rhode Island Greenings out of his Sunday-noon lunch, wrapped in a clean red bandana handkerchief. I see the men and women and slips of girls and boys, a goodly company, in the garments of forty years ago. I see green calashes and vandykes and hats of beaver, and cloaks with overlapping capes like scales upon a speckled trout, and gowns with balloons of sleeves, and high waists and skirts hanging like flags in calms, and low morocco shoes with glint of buckles, and caps with borders like white moonbeams frilled. I see the long tune-books fluttering along the top of the gallery as they opened them to the tune. I hear footstoves tinkling down the aisle in winter, each swung in a black-gloved hand by its little bail. I smell caraway and roses and dill in the summer. I smell crape both summer and winter, for alàs! Death "hath all seasons for his own." I hear voices that have died forever out of a voiceful world. I hear the simple, fervent, childlike petition of Elder Blodgett. I see the dusty slants of the afternoon sunshine sloping down through the western windows. I hear them sing

Praise God from whom all blessings flow;
 Praise Him all creatures here below;
 Praise Him above, angelic host;
 Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost!

As the congregation rises, I hear the rustling of garments like a breath of wind in a leafy wood. I hear the Elder with outspread hands pronounce the benediction: "Now may the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all forevermore, AMEN!" And so that goodly congregation pass slowly out with hand-clasps as they leave the doors. They have almost all gone out of life. The dear voices in the gallery are quite all hushed. Dust upon lips, dust upon brows,—everywhere dust!

And the gentle, faithful shepherd of the old-time flock has departed. "The prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended!"

CHAPTER XIV.

WINKS AND WINKERS.

I LOVE an even winker, where the fringed lids come down like little sleeps, and then lift regularly off. Not lazily, but firmly, if it may be said of a thing so delicate as a live window-curtain. It betokens the staid and quiet temperament of a man not easily moved, but when moved, strong. Distrust a man's nerve who, when thwarted or opposed, gives long shivering winks with both eyes, like an ox threatened over the head with a goad. The woman who snaps her eye-lashes as if they were whips will never be successfully likened to "Patience on a monument." Boys sometimes call them "eye-lashers," and that names hers precisely.

My neighbor across the way has a single wink if he is pleased at what you say, or pleased at what he says. If he utters a smart thing, wink goes that eye as if he had fired off his joke with it, and you happened to see the flash. But it is always the right eye. I have just been trying it with the left eye, but it isn't so handy. The lid does not shut down so much like a percussion lock, nor fly open so easily. People are right-eyed as well as right-handed. We are conscious that when we want to bore a hole in an obscure sentence, so as to see through it, the right eye is the tool we do it with.

When some people are trying to remember a thing, they give five or six winks as fast as possible, as if they would thus fan the smouldering recollections into a blaze, and then they intermit. They are fluttering winkers.

The locomotive, like the Cyclops, has but one head-light, and I am glad of it. Just fancy an engine with two round O's of eyes side by side, glaring through the night, and trailing its jointed body, sinuous as a sea-serpent, with its shining square scales, and something like a glittering fin lying along the back! It would frighten civilization out of sight. When a man has two right eyes, and I mistrust very few have, he is about as well equipped as an observatory. He is a telescope of himself. One of the most popular speakers in the State, and one of the wittiest withal, used to lower his right eyelid when he drove an argumentative nail home, and clinched it with a hammer-headed story. The laugh in that eye set off the audience like a spark of fire in a bag of gunpowder. The left eye seemed to be left out of the transaction entirely. I am afraid my neighbor of the single wink is not as noble as a Roman. That one wink shuts the cover down upon all hope of his nobility, and smothers it, but a woman with that lonely wink is—well, whatever she is, she is not a lady.

It is wonderful how much you can find out about a man by watching the way he uses his handy eyelid. When he employs it to hint with, there is a trace of fox in him. Contemplate George Washington's square block of a face, and fancy his right eye giving a cunning wink! It would extinguish your respect, besides half frightening you to death. Voluntary winkers are not troubled with courage. A flap of the lid is stealthier and safer than a swing of the tongue. There is a proverb, a little coarse and very old, about a wink being as good as a kick. It is better, for it is possible to commit assault and battery with an eyelid. It is cheaper ruffianism than a fist, and there is no law against it. It is the meanest weapon a man can carry, and calls for legislation.

CHAPTER XV.

HUMAN FIGS.

THE people who have reared large families of children without any boys and girls among them are unfortunate. There are such people. A child without any childhood is a miserable little animal, and the poorest compliment that can be paid to a boy—if it is a true one—is that he is “a little man.” I have read somewhere—perhaps it is a mistake—that a fig makes its appearance upon the tree a fig, suffering no progressive changes except to grow bigger. Once a fig, always a fig. I do not think we want any more human figs. First the baby, then the breezy boy, then the boots, then the bother, then the young man, then the hope of the homestead—that is the good old-fashioned order of development. Not having the delight of sitting under my “own vine and fig-tree,” perhaps my knowledge of figs is imperfect, but yet I insist upon the boy. We do not want him wise and profound and owl-like and right-angle-triangular. What becomes of the precocious children seven or eight years older at their heads than they are at their heels? Once in a hundred times do they turn into anything at all—say into men? Call the roll and see.

The writer knew a boy who never learned to swim because the water will drown,—never learned to ride a horse because horses run away,—never touched a gun because powder explodes,—never played with the boys because he would tear his clothes,—never got farther than “barn-ball,” which means throwing a ball at the gable and catching it when it returns. He played that—and they let him—because he could play it alone. In fact, in pretty nearly all his plays he had a “lone hand.”

Then there were several “because,” that were never explained. He never went to children’s parties, because——. He never went sleigh-riding with the girls, because——. He never learned to skate, because——. Somebody exclaims, What did the fellow know? Was he an idiot? By no means. He could fulminate Pitt’s reply to somebody about “the atrocious crime of being a young man,” and repeat “Campbell’s Pleasures of Hope,” and “My name is Norval.” He knew some Latin and some Greek, and a little about Jupiter and the Styx; but the sticks he knew most about were sticks of stove-wood that he piled in the wood-house on Saturday afternoons, when other boys were kicking up their heels in a frolic. Not that he was ever overworked. By no means. He had the kindest father and the most loving mother in all Christendom, but then he was to be a little fig. Boy nature cropped out, and he fell in love with a girl. Of course, like Desdemona's handkerchief, he was "too little" for any such nonsense, and so an extinguisher night-cap was put upon the flicker of flame, and out it went!

Now this boy, as I have heard, was not an unhappy boy. He had a blessed childhood, but the trouble was, he peopled that childhood with things of his own creation. He dreamed in the daytime. He grew sensitive, timid, shy. He was not like the kind of turtle whose voice "is heard in the land," but the other sort, that draws its head into its shell and never says a word. He fell in love again, with a woman old enough to be his—aunt, and who thought no more about him than she would think of a tree-frog. He fell in love with—it sounds incredible, and is absurd, but it is true—with her black stockings! That color, of all others, in or out of the solar spectrum! He was fond of reading encyclopædias. He read Nicholson's old twelve-volume fellow by the month. He happened upon the article "consumption," and he had the symptoms. "The liver complaint," and that too. The article on "the heart" fairly scared him. His own turned over and bounded about after an unruly fashion, and he was sure he had heart-disease. In fact, he was a chameleon, and took the color of the thing he alighted upon. He had everything that he read human beings could have, except, perhaps, a young family.

The dark was as populous as London. The distant woods he longed to wander in, and never could, were filled as full of fancies of his own make as a sunbeam is of midges. If he had possessed tops, whips, trumpets, dogs, birds, squirrels—it is immaterial what, if only they were material—he would have had something more wholesome to play with than idle fancies and vain imaginings. A stray dog followed that boy home one day—not, perhaps, without certain sly and friendly snaps of the thumb and finger, for the lad had never learned to whistle—a small colored cur, that carried his tail to one side like a helm put to starboard. He smuggled him into the wood-house, and hid him and fed him, and managed to keep him out of sight, and the boy's mother aided and abetted, and the dog helped him to recover from consumption and liver-complaint and black stockings—and was running down his morbid fancies and shaking them to pieces as if they were chipmucks, when, one unlucky day, that dog impudently barked at the boy's father! The father exclaimed against the strange dog, instituted an investigation, condemned the boy and banished the dog, and the fancies returned and the unhealthy longings, and the evil symptoms out of the encyclopædia. I have heard him say that, a quarter of a century afterward, he often caught himself stopping in the street to stare after some little dingy cur with a particularly short trot, and that carried his tail to starboard, and think of poor "Watch," who, he hopes, has gone with Pope's Indian dog to some "equal sky." Dogs are good for boys, and so are robins and rabbits.

THE USE OF USELESSNESS.

A healthful pet for a boy, to be perfectly satisfactory, must be worthless financially, useless practically, and troublesome generally. Indeed, it must be a great deal like the boy himself. Your average youngster cannot be brought to consider a cow a pet, particularly if he has to be a calf by brevet, and do the housekeeping for the cow. Likewise a pig. A fan-tailed pigeon is more to him than a coopful of the most industrious laying hens that ever proclaimed an egg. Unless he is Poor Richard's Boy!

As we go along in life many of us forget something that is well worth retaining, and one of the most difficult things for a man to remember is this one fact he knew all about when he was a boy, viz: certain things may be very useful because they are utterly useless—financially. The young robin that opens a mouth with a nankeen lining to its boy god-father for the vulgar fraction of angle-worm he holds in thumb and finger; the pansies that make quaint faces at you from the garden border; the shingle rooster in a macaw's jacket that the lad has fashioned with his knife, taking little slices from his fingers now and then, and with infinite clambering and climbing, and loss of buttons and a rent in his pantaloons like that in great Cæsar's mantle, and peril to neck and limb, has fastened triumphantly upon the highest peak of the barn; the clipper mill on the top of the wood-shed that runs at the wind's will, and faces about to catch it like a distracted devil'sdarning-needle, and grinds no grists and makes an idle clatter;—all these and such as these are valuable because they have no value at all.

Distrust the man who goes about with an iconoclastic hammer at a random swing. It is a sort of “skilled labor” that requires no apprenticeship, and not much of any brains. But, for all that, I should like one clip at the almanac of the immortal tallow-chandler and kite-flier, “Benjamin Franklin, printer.” Had he said a little less about silver change in that almanac, and a little more about lunar change, it might have been as well. “A pin a day a groat a year” is true, as pins went and groats were counted, but we do not want to hear it all the time. If industry is really a virtue, then the sluggard’s school-ma’am must be about the most virtuous individual in the world. Industry is a wholesome and blessed necessity. Like hunger, it is a piquant sauce to our enjoyments. Of the three men, he who need do nothing, he who wishes to do nothing, he who has nothing, the last is by far the happiest. About three people since Adam’s time, whose name was good for much on a note of hand, have made a raid upon riches, and nobody has praised poverty so heartily as he who wrote his eulogy upon a table of gold that he had paid for and was able to keep. But do not let us cover the world with a penny, as they hide the full moon with a nickel. A sordid boy, to whom nothing is of value that he cannot turn into money, is of all boys the most pitiful.

CHAPTER XVI.

“THE HILL OF SCIENCE.”

WEBSTER'S Spelling-Book is the only American classic. Give way, ye legions of poets and scholars, before the little books that, thick as locusts, swarmed and settled upon the whole land! Webster is to America what Burns is to Scotland,—everybody knows a bit of him. You may quote Bryant at five hundred thousand intelligent men, and not a wink of recognition. You may name Homer to another five hundred thousand, and no more kindling interest in the eyes of a man of them than there is in a couple of bone buttons.

But try them with the old Spelling-Book, battered and tattered. Recall the skirmish line led off by “Baker, Briar, Cider,” that widened and lengthened into marching columns, and moved in a stately way through the book like a triumphant army. Bring out a fable or two from the commissary department that brought up the rear of that polysyllabic host. Mention the dreamy girl with the milking-pail, to whose complexion “green” was as suited as the green husk jacket is to the young corn, “and green it shall be!” Do any of these things, and about a million will brighten and smile, and help you out with your reminiscences, and have a warmer feeling in their hearts for you than if you had shied at them the Book of Song, or Froude's History of England, or Abbott's Napoleon, or any other work of poetry or fiction.

But why the spell of the Spelling-Book among the hills? Before me is a horizon knobbed like an old-time vault-door. Dark and strong and grim as a prison, it is thirty miles away, and every knob is a Herkimer hill. Behind me is a swell of ambitious earth that was always there. I love it for its constancy, and fancy it resembles the first pictured hill that you and I ever saw. It embellished that Spelling-Book, and was called

“THE HILL OF SCIENCE.”

That frontispiece is as unforgettable as the mother that bore you. I am disposed to think the rocky, wooded billow behind me is the original. To be sure it has no temple upon its summit, with Corinthian columns; and no long-haired youth in a nightgown at its base, looking up at the risk of breaking his neck; and no attenuated angel pointing the ambitious youngster to the radiant steep, but then the hill is here in its rugged magnitude. The boy is a man, the temple a ruin, and the angel fled. Was it good Dr. Beattie who wrote those lines for “us boys” to speak, that we delivered in the roundabouts with two rows of brass buttons down before?

“Ah, who can tell how hard it is to climb
 The steep where Fame’s proud temple shines afar?
 Ah, who can tell how many a soul sublime
 Has felt the influence of malignant star
 And waged with fortune an eternal war?”

But then that was not precisely the way we said it, but in this wise:

Ah, whokn tell howard it ’tis t’ climb
 The stee pwhere Fame sproud tempul shines effar;

and then the rest of the syllables tumbled over each other like a flock of frightened sheep over a stone wall. And how dreadful it all was about the “soul sublime” and the “malignant star” and the “eternal waw,” as we rendered it, and nobody to say, “Let us have peace!” But the best of it was that not a biped of us knew what it all meant.

“SPEAKING PIECES.”

Those were the days when we uttered morsels of Demosthenes and the frisky Dr. Young and the playful Blair’s Sermons, and the Devil,—John Milton’s,—and other merry old boys. Do you remember the Belshazzar quake you had, when called out to—make a fool of yourself and the man you misrepresented? How you kept swallowing with nothing to eat, as if the “piece” you were rendering came from your stomach, and you were doing your best to keep it down? Get out of yourself and look at yourself as you stood there, working with both thumbs and forefingers at the two outside seams of your pantaloons; and casting scared glances at the girls, as if they were hungry ogres and you a tender titbit; and hearing something under the left side of your jacket thud, thud, like the old-fashioned "pounder" on blue Mondays; and snapping your little bow,—o as in cow,—at the school, and going to your seat as limp as a wet handkerchief. And so America is filled with orators "even until this day."

ELOCUTIONARY COMPETITION.

Writing of speaking: was it ever your blessed lot to give an address at an agricultural fair, or to make a speech at a poultry show? The writer being a practical farmer who makes "bouts" upon foolscap with steel-pen plows, was unfortunately invited to address the farmers. But no sooner had he begun to say something sweet and green about rural life and glorify the farmer, and mention "the sage of Monticello,"—meaning Thomas Jefferson,—which a good old lady, after the address, said she should like to get a root of, if it was any better than the old kind that grew in her "garding,"—"the sage of Monticello" as being a farmer; and gone on and introduced a plowman by the name of Cincinnatus, who had been dead so long that not a soul there present knew he had ever been born,—no sooner had all this been done, than an exaggerated rooster, several feet high in his claws, took it into his head to crow and flap his wings like a couple of mainsails; and somebody bigger and hoarser answered him, and that set off the turkeys and roused the geese and rallied the ducks. Then there would be a lull, and the unhappy speaker would proceed to give some lively statistics from the latest Report of the Patent Office, and be just adorning them, even as little Chester Whites are tricked out with ringlets of tails, with pleasant allusions to the farmers' blooming daughters there present, when a perverse Bantam, a dozen ounces of fowl depravity, would set up an incisive crow of defiance as sharp as a needle, and all the feathered Babel take up the challenge, until gobble, cackle, crow, quack and blooming daughters were inextricably mingled. The girls were fairly fed out to the poultry.

The speaker's appeal to the young men to stay in the country and keep up the fences was seconded by some malicious beast of Bashan in an adjoining stall who exploded all the vowels like a professor of elocution, and certain plaintive nasal Cotswolds went through their a, b, abs in concert. But when a touching and entirely new apostrophe to the farmer's house, as being the one place on all the broad acres where the most precious stock was reared,—the boys and girls of the homestead,—and the crowd was just ready to cheer, a creature, with ear enough to equip a small audience with that organ, that had been watching the speaker from a shed near by, set up his hideous, sardonic laugh of two syllables united by a rusty hinge with a creak to it, and threw the audience into convulsions and covered the orator with confusion. It was one too many at once; the biped retired, the band played, and the base-drum drowned out the quadruped.

I called on the execrable Bantam in his coop; the creature that set the feathered tribe cackling through my sentences, and he was but little bigger than a stout robin. Anybody, no matter how diminutive, or how small the type you set him in, can raise a disturbance that nobody can quiet. It must just die out by the law of limitation.

SQUARE STEPPERS.

Two-footed or four-footed, everybody likes a square stepper. Job's horse was one of them. The Vermont Morgan is another. I had a chat with a wilderness pioneer to-day, who is never so much at home as when he is abroad. He has camped out so much with his feet to the fire that he smells smoky. It would do you good to see him walk. Lightly, firmly, squarely, just as much purpose in one foot as there is in the other. His tracks in the damp sand are as even as fine press-work. He has his philosophy of "being lost." When a man is certain whither he is bound, he throws out his left foot as assuredly as he does his right,—the regular militia drill, "hay-foot, straw-foot"; but when there is a kink in his brain, the left foot, burdened with a doubt as well as a boot, takes a little shorter step than the right, and so, in his bewilderment, he describes a curve to the left, and keeps coming about to the place of beginning. He ceases to be a square stepper.

The feeling known as being "turned round" is more painful than a pain; when the sun persists in rising in the north and setting in the south, and the engine of the visible universe is reversed. No reasoning will set a man right and mend his broken compass; but if he will just return to the place where the cardinal points are in position, and then carry the reckoning in his head back to the doubtful region, the horizon will swing around where it belongs, and the man and the world will be as nicely adjusted as ever.

There is a world of left-leg marching in church and state. It has traced the haunts of men with crooked paths, and impeded true progress. Dr. Kincaid, the great missionary, was a square stepper. He struck out upon an unknown and rugged route as if it had been the highway of nations. It was no left-foot gait that took him within ear-shot and heart-reach of the King of Ava. He made a march of an hundred years in as many days. It was a grand specimen of square stepping. Literally and figuratively, the left foot wants watching.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE COUNTRY "CORNERS."

THE BLACKSMITH.

THERE is a smithy at the Corners. All day long, clear and cloudy, I hear the ring of hammer upon anvil, and the sullen roar of the fire. Sauntering over, I enter the shop. The bellows crouched beside the forge, with its long nose—a family nose—thrust in the ashes out of sight. Now and then it lifts its back as if about to get up, but just blowing a long breath that brightens the fire, it lies down again. There are cinders, odds and ends of everything in iron, bits of steel, horse-shoes, and a water-trough full of tongs.

The blacksmith is just picking up a lumbering farm-horse's foot as you would pick up a penny, and he lays it in his leather apron; and cuts and carves as if he made the feet to fit the shoes. Children—his children—seven of them, are playing about, and he feeds and clothes them all with a hammer. It is a plain case of hammer and tongs. The bit of ribbon catching up that little girl's hair came out of the fire, and has not so much as the smell of smoke upon it. He feeds nine mouths with a mixture of nails, rings, horse-shoes, chains, rods, bars. For a steady diet, iron and steel must be a tremendous tonic. But the blacksmith has the most powerful of all tonics—the love of wife and children—that keeps that tired arm swinging and that forge glowing.

Let us consolidate the nine mouths to be fed with a hammer. Let us say they will equal one mouth a foot and four inches in width—more stupendous in the human economy than the mouth of the Mississippi. Let the blacksmith fashion a spoon thirteen inches broad to fit it. Twenty mouthfuls at a meal are anchoritish rations for growing children. Sixty times a day that mighty spoon must travel from plate and platter, kettle and tureen, every ounce of it won with a hammer in a single hand. Everything they want and wear is multiplied by the magic number, nine. But never think the tired blacksmith would apply the arithmetical rule for "casting out the nines," if he could. Busy and happy as the day is long, he never murders time. He needs no drowsy drugs to sleep. He drops off like a log when the fire is out and the day is done. He falls into line with Tubal and Jubal, Elihu Burritt, Robert Collyer and "the lame Lemnian," and unlike Vulcan, he is not nine days distant from heaven, when he is busy and all are well. He is a blacksmith.

I listen to his hammer as to a pleasant bell. When I think what it rings for—"Shoes for baby," "Gown for wife," "Christmas gifts for nine, nine, nine"—the clink, clang, clink, grows sweet as the chimes of old Trinity the first time my "next best friend" and

I heard them. It was a calm, clear summer morning. The great roar of the mart had not begun. Then, as we walked together down Broadway, with more years before us than there are to-day, there fell down through the still air, as if from another world, the sweet chiming of the bells in "Life let us cherish." It is the very tune the hammer and the anvil play; and so from belfry to blacksmith, from high and low, the grateful bells and pulses beat—"Life let us cherish!"

Among the things strown about the blacksmith's shop are traps for such "small deer" as mink and fox, and now and then a bear. A trap is a pair of jaws and teeth waiting to catch a body. The Frenchman said that a theory is a trap to catch a truth. It is generally the inventor, however, that is trapped, and not the truth. Be this as it may, here are traps, and there is yet need of them. Bears are unbearably many. There never were more in the Canton of Berne. They make mutton and pork of what was neither before, within a stone's throw of farm-houses. I think a bear has a comic look, so fringed and ragged with fur everywhere, as if he were made coarse on purpose to be sold cheap, and yet with ears so round, close-clipped and neat, as if somebody had finished him off finer at one end than the other, just for a joke, and then laid down the shears.

The two Old Testament bears, good for twenty children apiece, gave me in very early life a wholesome respect for bald heads and bears! So when, in broad day, one of these dogs of Herod came down my favorite ravine for wandering, and crossed the road, the bare possibility of something Bruin has since kept me out from among the shadows and evergreens of the gulf. But enough of Ursa, Major and Minor, lest the bear shall be a bore.

MY FIRST BIRDS.

Here now am I, a small volume of very modern history indeed, and yet I point you to that rank old meadow across the road, where the mower can make an unobstructed sweep, with nothing in the way but timothy and grasshoppers, and I tell you that when on the farther edge of boyhood I remember it a tangled swamp.

Village-born, I was caught out in the country one soft spring evening, and passed it. The fireflies' twinkling constellations had risen above it, and no cloud of forgetfulness has ever dimmed their beauty. Then out of the swamp came strange, sweet sounds, as of many filberts of sleigh-bells afar off, when the wearers strike into a merry trot. The first birds I remember to have heard sing were frogs! Nothing in all the music of childhood and manhood ever impressed me as did the trill of those fellows in green tights, and to this day, whenever it is heard, a feeling of loneliness and sadness, yet not of pain, possesses me, and beside the dead, drawn by a dead man's horse, in a dead spring night of "the long ago," a boy is riding to a home now desolate, through the gray and ghostly shadows, by the starry glimmer of fireflies, to the unstrung bells of frogs. I look up, and the maple is glory and the poplar gold. The sweeps of rain loosen the frail tenure of the leaves, and they snow slowly down, scarlet and crimson, gold and foliomort, to the waiting and patient and ever-ready earth. "We all do fade as a leaf." But then, "leaves have their time to fall," but "thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!"

THE COUNTRY STORE.

Just the place among these hills for the old-time country store that, like Noah's Ark, contains a little of all sorts. You look for it at some lazy four-corners, within hearing of an anvil's ring, and the grind of a mill where the creek plays in a wheel like a caged squirrel. And you find it, the variety store of a hundred years ago, where needles and crowbars, goose-yokes and finger-rings, liquorice-stick and leather, are to be had for cash or "dicker." In the corner yonder, stands the spindle-legged desk, behind a breast-work of barrels, and a bastion of codfish criss-crossed, a big blotter spread open upon the lid, goose-quill pens, a sand-box and a pewter inkstand within reach.

Here is the wooden bench beside the stove, covered with jack-knife sculpture, awkward H's like a pair of leaning bar-posts with one bar, and B's like ox-yokes. It is here that in rainy days and winter nights the whittlers, smokers, spitters and talkers gather in and lay their blue-and-white mittens beneath the stove to dry; perhaps a village doctor with his saddle-bags and pink-and-senna nimbus; perhaps a country lawyer who practices at the county bar in court time and the tavern bar the year around, with his dogmatic way and his tobacco atmosphere. Here Unions are saved, States constructed, stories told, and pig-tail gnawed. Here "fore-handed" farmers talk pig and potatoes, and buxom country girls smell of peppermint, and warm their rosy fingers that match their ripe cheeks for color. Here clouds of smoke from clay pipes float up among the bed-cords and brooms and tin-lanterns and cowhide boots suspended overhead. And the stove, with its red mouth close to the hearth, roars and reddens in the howling nights, and the black nail-heads in the floor are worn silver-bright by stamping and uneasy feet. A boy, tipped with red as to fingers, nose, ears and toes, stands before a short row of speckled glass jars in brimless hats of covers, wherein lean a few streaked sticks of childish happiness at a penny apiece, and gazes with watering mouth that keeps him swallowing in blissful expectancy.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE.

Down the road, beside a wild spring, is a stone school-house with deep windows, and walls like a castle. It is as bare of ornament as a Quaker. Neither map nor chart hides its walls, blank as the face of astonishment. The seats are a sort of wooden rheumatism — right-angled, hard as Jacob's pillow in the wilderness, and no angel ever in sight but the school-ma'am. It is the very bones of the modern school-house. Now and then I wander there, for much of the time it is as empty as the cave of Machpelah. But there is something human about it that reconciles me. It smells of old geographies and spelling-books, and readers with ragged edges like the ears of "the under dog" in the fight. There is a faint suspicion of noontime dinners in the notched and lettered desks. There are pellets of chewed paper upon the walls, like cannon-shot in some old fort. There are nightmare faces upon the seats, and beasts that never came out of the Ark, for they could by no possibility have ever got in, and prints of obliterating thumbs inkier than Ethiopia.

But the limestone fortress has other uses. Nights, and Sundays, it is a depot for doctrines. There are not many varieties of Christians among the hills, and again there are many that seem rather to delight in being sinners. But for all this, during the fortnight I have been dreaming and looking nature full in the face, nature as unshaven, unshorn and unkempt as a Tunker, there have been seven sorts of doctrine set forth in the old school-house, to about the same congregation. Just here I rise to explain why Tunker is used instead of the name by which that sect is best known. Some time during the past summer, a grand convention of Dunkards was held in a little town in Illinois, and no end of papers had it that five thousand Drunkards were assembled, setting the Good Templars packing their satchels for a pilgrimage, in the hope of catching some of the flock before they could get away.

An Episcopalian, two kinds of Methodists, a Presbyterian, an Adventist, a Soul-Sleeper and a Baptist march in doctrinal procession through the fortnight—dry, damp, sprinkled, immersed; bringing prayer-books, hymn-books, camp-meeting songs; preaching "each after his kind." What will happen to that over-fed company of doctrine-lappers, going through such a bill of fare from grace to almonds, and apparently delighted with each clean plate! "They pay their money, and they take their choice," but it is the most religiously-dissipated community extant.

ANCIENT HISTORY.

How would you like to be a volume of Ancient History, substantially bound in calf or—something—be live history, and go about upon two feet? In the hill country the chances are good for it. You can meet a man any day in the street, going about his business, who will tell you things that he saw in the year of grace 1800. And it will not be a man on three or four legs that will do it, but one who at sight could beat Weston at honest walking. Nearly every man of them is about as certain to have a panther, bear or wolf story, as he is to have a shadow when he goes out in the sunshine. "The almond-tree" of Ecclesiastes shines here. The order of the silver hair—thanks to clean water, pure air, simple habits and a kind Providence—is as numerous here as in an audience the writer once had in little Rhody, where quite one-half wore the silver crown. The congregation looked as if they had been out bareheaded in a snow-storm, and the flakes had not all melted. But they were not feeble, tremulous people of the “lean and slippered pantaloon,” but sturdy-legged and full-fronted, and faces so frosty and ruddy that they made you think of October apples. Many of them had been sailors and sea-captains, and breathed salt air, and been drenched in salt water till they were fairly pickled and apt “to keep.”

WHO ARE PIONEERS?

Within a month these young old boys have put the wilderness all back upon these cleared fields for me, and built up the woods, and peopled them with things unchristian and uncanny. They talk as familiarly of 1805 as if it were last week, and they fancy they were the first settlers. Perhaps not. Man does his best to make indelible evidences of his existence, and to leave them upon the earth. Nature watches him awhile, and then amuses herself with effacing his records, and sifting fine mould and seeds and leaves upon his highways, and smoothing over his graves, and the young forests spring up, cultivation relapses into wilderness, and the globe is as ready as a clean slate for a new set of pioneer boys. When the scouts of civilization first struck northern Indiana, they found forests that the sun never shone in, where Indian trails grew dusky in the great solitude. They were the Christopher Colons of Indiana. But one day a surveyor, running a government line, struggled through twilight thickets as dense as a cane-brake, and broke out at once into a — vineyard! A breadth of some twenty acres was purple and golden with grapes. Choice varieties from the Rhine, they were brought thither by forgotten hands in some immemorial year. Men had lived here then. Women had sung the vine-dresser's song in this wilderness. Children had grasped the rich clusters with stained fingers. Whoever they were, they had gone. The young forest had asserted its ancestral right to the old soil, and the vines had clung to it and surmounted the tallest trees, and swelled like the great billows of a green sea. Make that surveyor a little later in his work, and no trace would have remained of the children of the Rhine. But for years the new race of "pioneers" bore away in the mellow autumns the luscious produce that foreign hands had planted for they knew not whom. So Nature makes room for the marching generations.

CHAPTER XVIII.

AQUARIUS THE WATER-BEARER.

IT rains! It is the paradise of Batrachians. Batrachians are frogs, and frogs are rana. Hence rainy, and there you have a derivation crazier than Horne Tooke's. The waves at Chadwick's Bay come galloping in from the sea like plumed troopers, and the white-caps "show a light" away out to the edge of the horizon. The broad leaves of the basswood by my window droop and drip in the rain like the ears of a meditative hound. Little children are running to and fro with little yelps of delight, and a spare skirt flung over their heads from behind like a squirrel's tail. A woman stands in the door of a house with her arms akimbo, trying to get her eye upon one of them. You have met akimbo people. Their elbows are sharp. They are deadly weapons. Such folks should live in scabbards. If she gets hold of the "one of them" she will make the little midge acquainted with the stern realities of life. Yonder is a rooster wet down to a peak. His scimeter tail is only a single dagger of a feather. He looks sorry. The crow is washed out of him.

You keep wiping the window-panes on the inside

because they are filmed with water on the outside. You know better, and so does the man who feels in his pockets for something that is not in them. Right vest pocket, left vest pocket, right breast pocket, left breast pocket, right hind pocket, left hind pocket, right pantaloons pocket, left pantaloons pocket. He will stand there and make the rounds once, twice, thrice, and then whip off his hat and find it there! He is not logical. None of us are.

Eaves are busy, water-spouts jolly, and gutters congested. There is a splashing in little puddles, a drumming on tin pans, a tinkling in cisterns, and a tattoo upon roofs. It is a mass-meeting of rains,—perpendicular, oblique, horizontal, and no rainbow in a fortnight! Engines hardly have to stop to take water!

You look down from your window on two currents of umbrellas. Forget there is anybody under them, and it is as queer as a dream born of a Welsh rarebit at midnight. It resembles a stream of mildewed, animated and locomotive toadstools from Brobdignag. They drift against each other, then part and float away. There are sleek silken ones that shine as if it rained copal. There are great blue ones with a border, and big enough for dog-tents, that move in a lumbering way. Old folks underneath. They say “umbrill.” There are faded ones, the color of a Confederate soldier’s jacket. There are wrecks of fellows with their slender bones thrust through the dingy surface,—bad cases of compound fracture. There’s a parasol scudding along amid the tumefied dinginess, like a bright little flower afloat on a very turgid current. It dodges in and out among the troughs of the sea. Every overgrown umbrella is a threatening billow. Poor little fair-weather flower, and dreadfully wilted and pelted by the rain. Its owner was caught out. You see a white flicker of skirts as she scuds.

“ARIES THE RAM.”

There goes an umbrella drawn down over the owner's eyes. He lowers his brow and forges ahead without minding who is coming. He is as bad to meet as a Texas steer, with his unicorn of an umbrella. Umbrella or no umbrella, he butts his way through the world. Clear the track when you see him, unless you are carrying a ladder. If so, just swing it around endwise and make for him! He is always in the sign Aries. Everybody knows him. When he argues he only butts, and when he butts he shuts his eyes. Intelligent adversary! He is a heavy-weight wherever he is. He might do for ballast, if only he would keep still.

“Aries” does not like flowers. He calls them “posies.” A moss-rose bud would be about as much at home in his button-hole as it would in an elephant's ear. He has no taste, except it be a beefsteak taste. His flower is a sunflower. He is coarse, hard, hearty, and he succeeds. What is success? Not that I do not respect sunflowers,—those big rosettes with their curious mosaic and Nicholson-pavement of seeds. I think of them in the same thought with the just-ready-to-wilt poppy, and the china-asters and the sweet-williams and the hollyhocks,—the dear old tribes of our grandmothers' day.

“GEMINI THE TWINS.”

How many young fellows there are in the street, armed with umbrellas every one, and looking for somebody. Watch the girls dart out of store-doors, and make for cover like startled hares. There they go, arm in arm, like two-thirds of the triple link badge of Odd-Fellowship: “friendship, love and truth,” the umbrella lowered modestly down so that their two heads are in the garret of it, and drifting very slowly indeed. It is a pleasant day beneath it. Had they been in the ark,—they two,—they would not have thought it rained. Umbrellas have determined destinies.

It rains, and the sea of umbrellas is yet ebbing and flowing. There goes a high stepper. You know it by the way the umbrella bobs up and down, like the cork of a line with something nibbling at the hook. Yonder is a man who walks with his elbows when he is in a hurry, for he lifts them whenever he “crooks the pregnant hinges of the knee,” just as a horse works his ears every time he swallows. Here comes a glider. The umbrella floats evenly along. There a man carries his umbrella at half-cock. It hangs down his back like a peddler's pack. He hails you. He hails everybody. He flings scraps of talk this side and that as he goes. He is a pleasant friend, if you don't mind that love-token of a slap in the back he is always giving.

“AND JULIET IS THE SUN!”

The clouds “hold up.” The sun throws off his wet blankets, and touches up the glittering signs, and the glossy water-proofs that are executed at store-doors, and the open umbrellas swung up by the peak, to give you a damp whisk and challenge a buyer. The little Othellos of bootblacks, their “occupation gone,” that have been casting disconsolate looks all day at the splashed leather as it spattered by, brighten up a little, reflecting in their faces some faint fore-glimmer of a “shine.” The wet arrow on the neighboring church gives a flash as if somebody brandished it. The crowd fold their tents like the Arabs. The umbrella sea subsides, and the people come to the surface. But the character of the picture is not gone, only changed. One holds out his closed umbrella by the tip of the handle, much as you swing up a rabbit by the ears. Another grasps it around the waist, and carries it at trail arms. A third reverses it, as if he were a soldier at a funeral. Another never stops to button the umbrella, but makes a cane of it, the cambric corners untidily flapping as he goes. But the most miserable of men comes yonder. He has chucked his umbrella under his arm, with the ferrule thrust out behind, like a bowsprit at the wrong end of the craft, and trained at precisely the right angle to put out an eye for the next man behind him, who has no idea that he is charging on a pike. He is a two-footed hornet. Can you think of anything more uncomfortable than an umbrella in your eye? Many a man has had a beam in it without knowing it, but an umbrella, never! That human hornet is a selfish man. His umbrella points out his character like a finger-post. His maxim is vulgar and profane. It is "the devil take the hindmost."

A rainy day is a good day to see in,—better than when the sun shines. As to-day grows duller and dimmer, yesterday grows brighter and nearer. We can look a long way into the past when it rains. We remember. It is pleasant. It is sad. It is like the music of Ossian. It is both.

CHAPTER XIX.

HILL COUSINS.

HUNTING health and hunting happiness are alike. You seldom find them where you seek them. They come to you by the way at unexpected times and places. The devil is credited with a great deal of mischief that the stomach is guilty of. Many a gloomy doctrine is born, not of theology, but of cold dumplings and toasted cheese at bedtime. The writer has been looking for strength among the hills where the roads are set upon one end and paved, you would think, by old torrents. He rambled without much of any purpose,—a sort of gypsying,—and he found cousins.

There are three kinds of cousins in America. In Scotland there are forty. They are reckoned by numbers,—first, second and third. In cousins I am specially gifted, for I have sixty, and the most of them are sprinkled among the hills of New York, in the counties of Oneida, Lewis, Herkimer and Otsego. Take them as a race, the average distance between the cradle and the grave is about four miles. They have read the proverb of “the rolling stone,” and most of them have gathered moss. Children generally set great store by uncles and aunts, always excepting "the Babes in the Woods," whom Robin Redbreast "did cover them with leaves." When these are gone, and the year wanes into autumn, cousins are in their prime. They last till snow comes, and sometimes into the dead of winter. Hence cousins are a desirable kind of relative to have. As pomologists say, they are "good keepers."

As you get older, cousins rise in value, because they grow scarce, but you must not let very long intervals elapse between meetings. That is, you must not wait over twenty years. I waited thirty. The changes are suggestive. Should you meet a cousin you had not set eyes upon since "cats wore fillets," which means "ever so long," do not straighten up into an exclamation-point and cry out over the ravages of time. Just consider that you are only contemplating yourself in a looking-glass made of a cousinly face, and you will grow quiet as an oyster. When people fall to telling one another, after a score of years of absence, that neither has changed, that they should know each other anywhere, swear them and see! Twenty to one they are both lying in a sort of harmless, feeble way, in an attempt to make themselves believe that the Old Haymaker has fallen asleep in a fence-corner, with his scythe hanging upon an apple-tree over his head.

Remember a girl-cousin of sixteen, round as a ring and fair as the moon, with glittering teeth and voice cheery as a morning song, and hair that tumbles down her shoulders like a capillary cataract. Leave her to time for a couple of dog's-ages, and then meet her somewhere, and if Adam's-apple does not take a start for a late growth in that throat of yours, then you must have bolted the troublesome fruit in your childhood. You scan the face for traces of the girl that was; you pick up a few scattered features here and there, and try to reconstruct them into some semblance of the old-time cousin, but it is a failure. And all the while you are doing this, Jane is busy taking you to pieces and building you over, and there is a twin failure. Then she nerves herself up to mention her grandchildren, and you recall a joke dead forty years ago, and so you make the best of it and laugh, "as it were," across the graves of a generation, and bid each other good-by, and this dice-box of a world gives another shake, and you meet no more.

When first-cousins give out, there is a stock of the "second" sort ready to your hand. In fact, kind nature seems to make provision for a fresh crop of consins as the years go on. As a rule, they "hold out" better than nearer relatives, and "stick to" faster and longer. A brother is a good thing. Likewise a sister. But we get to know each other uncomfortably well, and live so long in the same house and wrangle over the same doughnut, that unless we are of the good children that die young, there is not much chance for anybody's quoting and saying, "Behold how these brethren love one another." The probabilities of fraternal affection increase, I think, with the number of brothers and sisters; that is, the relations among the many are less intimate than they are among the few. Nobody can endure the steady stare of a microscope without suffering, if he can without flinching. "The fewer we are the more let us love one another," is a kind of sentimental twaddle. Remember Cain and Abel! Consider the Siamese twins! As a rule, Damon and Pythias are not brothers. We used to read in the first book of Latin a conversation between a lion and a certain insignificant animal, wherein the little one taunted the big one with having a small family. The reply was a cross of cheap magnificence, partly leonine, and the rest Roman: "One, but a lion!"

LIVING IN MICROSCOPES.

Writing of magnifiers: a man might as well live in a microscope, with an eye at it that never winks, as to be a clergyman. The public turns itself into a policeman in plain clothes to "shadow" the minister. His patience is tested, his temper is tried, his indignation aroused, and he has incessant temptations to talk tomahawk and forget to be a gentleman. The virtue of the Toledo blade was not in its keenness, but its temper; that, though you bent the point to the hilt, it never flew to pieces. There is no such thing as a fragment, a vulgar fraction of a gentleman. He is gentleman ad unguem — to the claw — or not at all. The temper of the blade is the spirit of the man, and how refined it must be in celestial fire to maintain its integrity! It seems to me peculiarly true of clergymen that they have nothing earthly to fear but their friends. They are in more danger from them than from their enemies or the devil.

There are merciful laws for the preservation of game. There are times and seasons when it is wicked to slay it. Clergymen enjoy no such legislation. They appear to be game all the year round. We are quite worn out with hearing of ecclesiastical falls and clerical wolves in woolen clothes. Let the lawyers have a chance, for there are more bones of Little Red Riding Hoods in the courts of the law than there are in the courts of the Lord. Let a physician take a tumble, now and then. Let some merchant be a cataract. Let us not have all the Niagaras rolling down the pulpit stairs. Those people who waste their time in "stalking" ministers are generally poachers themselves.

Back to the cousins: there are few lions among them, and not a mouthful of Latin. Such quail-like broods of cousins in the same nest! Eight, eleven, thirteen, and they kick the beam all the way from one hundred and forty to two hundred and thirty, and as a rule, they pull together. Have you heard of any battle in the Empire State? When two fall out it is a quarrel, but when many come to blows it is a war.

When the Waldenses were made to sing, "For the strength of the hills we bless Thee," it was a true song in more senses than one. They furnished the Christians with caves and rugged fastnesses as shelter from the persecuting Sauls. They furnish you with a more vigorous play of muscle and a freer respiration. Wherever you are in Otsego the horizon is scalloped with hills. They roll grandly, carrying huge boulders up to the sky-line as if they were bubbles, and tossing the hemlocks and pines, the beeches and maples, as if they were lily leaves on stormy water. Otsego county has pleasant memories to tens of thousands. To "H. and E. Phinney, Cooperstown," the child-world has been indebted for small parcels of happiness, — those blessed little primers, filled with pictures of birds and beasts and good boys and angelic girls. Think of happiness, — "price one cent!" The writer has a little menagerie, to-day, in a blue paper cover, bearing the imprint of the Cooperstown firm, that was purchased with a Spanish sixpence that had been bitten to test it, and lost in the street and trodden on, and carried in a buckskin purse and a red morocco pocket-book, and knotted up in a bandana handkerchief, and paid out for candy and blackberries and jewsharps; but it never bought quite so much perfect delight as when it was exchanged for H. and E. Phinney's "Book of Beasts and Birds," and it remains to-day a precious souvenir of a ruder, simpler time.

Many of the descendants of them that ticked their way into the county with an axe — the woodman's clock — yet remain among the pleasant hills, and the blood of the old stock yet courses in the veins of many stalwart men and pleasant women. After dark, one night, a wagon-load of cousins climbed rocky hills, and drove through a ravine black as a wolf's mouth, and wound up to the summit of the hill, where, in a spacious home, dwell a pair that pull down the steelyards at about four hundred pounds; the house lively with three generations, and there might easily be four without working a miracle. A hearty welcome and — feather-beds, fat as if they had been direct importations from Amsterdam or Rotterdam or Potsdam, or some other profane region, awaited us. A great wavy farm lay around us, eighty acres of meadow, and regiments of corn, and a sea of pasture. The milk of two hundred cows is struck off into cheese, and dated like medallions. The curd squeaks in your teeth as it did forty years ago, when they made cheeses about as big as a dinner-plate. Spring water comes down from the hills of its own accord, and runs into the house, the barn, everywhere. The breakfast-table is broad and long and laden. You think the prayer for "our daily bread" means far more than you ever dreamed it did, when you see how the sections disappear by the loaf. The hills are a hungry place. They talk at breakfast of the owls they heard last night, of the hundred turkeys killed by foxes on the farm this summer. It is a new world. Breakfast over, the family scatter like a bell-mouthed musket. A boy is driving away a flock of geese. A dog is taking the cows to pasture. The mower begins to tick like a gigantic locust in the hill-meadow. The girls are busy with the great white sea in the cheese factory.

There is a spot, just over the ridge, you hasten to see. It is "a city set on a hill, that cannot be hid"—the silent acres where "the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep." Near it stands the "Taylor Hill Meeting-House," with a rusty "1822" served up on a wooden platter in the gable,—a house without spire or belfry, and unchanged since the day of dedication, when preachers rejoiced and thanked God, who joined the church triumphant many a long year ago, and men and women sang Old Hundred and Coronation who have learned the New Song. The church has neither pastor nor people. The front door is locked with a stick of stove-wood. You open it and enter the simple sanctuary. On that raised seat along the wall sat the singers—the leader a gray-haired deacon who pitched the tune for forty years. Girls, wives, grandmothers, dead. And there is the pulpit, like the half of an old-fashioned wine-glass fastened against the wall. Two little flights of stairs, straight as "the narrow way," lead up to it. If Elder Bennett ever stood in it, he must have looked like an oak with its foot in a door-yard vase. You enter the little Zion's look-out. On the narrow ledge, guiltless of trimming as a wooden bread-tray, lies the Bible. Like the church, it bears the date of 1822. The bare board seat is as it was in the days of the fathers.

THE OLD ELDER.

You remember in childhood seeing the little old preacher, Elder Stephen Taylor, who said goin' and comin' and praisin'—but what matters a worthless “g” or so?—stand in that pulpit and preach. It was a sermon, as you recall it now, full of good sense and pure doctrine, and quaint, apt illustration, and decided power. You remember how earnest he became, and how his bald head grew red like “the old man eloquent’s” in Congress, as he made for some blundering “gentleman from” somewhere, and pelted him with facts and dates, and chapter and verse, as if they were so many cobble-stones. One of his illustrations you will never forget. He was talking of living “above the world,” and he said: “Haven’t you seen, my brethren, an eagle when attacked by a flock of little birds, any one of which he could have killed with a stroke of his talon or a blow of his beak? But they are too many for him. They dart up beneath him and vex him. They pounce upon him from above. They scream around his head and bewilder him. He sits upon the tall hemlock as long as he can, and then spreads his great wings. Does he fly down and hide in the bush? Does he waste his strength in attempting to fight an enemy that he cannot number? Oh, no, dear friends, he gives a sweep or two, and up he goes above the hills and the trees. The flock of little birds struggle up after him, but higher and higher he rises into clearer, thinner air; he leaves his busy enemies one after another. They weary of wing, and sink panting back to their native woods again. He is alone in the sky; he is too high to cast a shadow. That eagle, brethren and sisters, is the human soul, and those little birds are the sins and temptations that vex us. Never tarry to fight them. Never think to destroy them, but just put forth the strength that God gives you to rise above them all, and so you shall be nearer to heaven and God. This is bein', as the poet says, 'while in, above the world!'"

The years that are gone throng in at the open door. You descend from the pulpit, and take a parting look at the old church. On that cross-beam is the wreck of a bird's nest. Not so widely scattered is the brood she hovered over as they who once gathered within these walls. You pass thoughtfully out into the sunshine, and stand in the shade of the old church. What is this that grows so rank, and rattles its ripened sprigs in the morning wind? The air is sweet with its aromatic breath. It is caraway! In the days that are gone the congregation brought their luncheon in summer-time, and sat in the shadow of the wall between sermons and talked and ate. The mothers and the girls brought their inevitable clusters of caraway, and seeds were scattered here, and have sprung up self-sown year after year, "even until this day." What a sermon upon human life is this! The caraway remains, but the fingers that strewed it are nerveless with age, or have forgotten their cunning altogether.

They propose to repair and modernize the old meeting-house, but let them not lay desecrating hands upon the pulpit. It is as quaint as one of old Herrick's poems. Let them carpet and cushion and stain and grain pew and aisle as they will; but farther than renewing the simple coat of white, let them not touch that queer little watchman's box for the sentry of the Lord.

A HEALTH AT BRIDGEWATER.

We have been riding to-day on the heavy swells of Herkimer and Otsego. The streams through all the region have an errand and a voice as they run along their rough McAdams. Every one of them is as busy as a haymaker. You cross the Unadilla — as pretty a name for a girl as it is for a river — fringed with willows that are forever looking at themselves in the glancing water, as if some gigantic naiad had stitched the bank with double willows and left the foliage waving free in the water and the air. "The daughters of Judah" could not have hung their harps in a prettier place. You go through the old village of Bridgewater, that has grown like a candle — less as it grows older; busier, if not bigger, forty years ago than it is to-day. Bridgewater has a memory.

Many a year ago one of the dead presidents of Madison University was a student at Hamilton College. He had just been graduated. He had taken the valedictory. He was on his way to his hill-top home in Edmeston, and he halted at Bridgewater for dinner. There were with him the girl he was going to marry, her brother, and a young sister of his own. I must lay that clod of a word upon them all to-day. I must say they are dead. At that dinner the young student, as was the fashion sixty years ago, called for a bottle of wine, and filled the glasses, and stood up and drank to the days to come. That was fifty-six years ago, and all the future they were thinking of as they drank has slipped silently and solemnly into the past. A son of the student and the girl halted a moment to-day in front of the old tavern where they met, and this world looked very narrow and very perishable indeed—just an isthmus covered with grass and roughened with many graves.

CHAPTER XX.

JAW.

SAMSON was the most eloquent man of ancient times. He overwhelmed his Philistine audience with jaw, albeit it was the jaw of an ass. Why not? Balaam's beast saw what his master could not discern. He had an angelic vision, and spoke right out. Jaws go in pairs, as Noah's menagerie went into the ark, but it is only the under-jaw that has a character in all creatures but the shark. As for him, that compound adjustment of levers bringing the two rows of cutlery together and setting them wide like the blades of a pair of shears, gives his countenance an open expression that is winning if not amiable.

I once visited a rolling-mill where iron runs about like quicksilver, and railroad bars,—a lift for four knotty-armed men,—glide between the rollers, and thin out as they glide, as smoothly as satin ribbons run over a shop-girl's forefinger. I happened there when a row of boarders, chuckle-headed like young robins, were eating a lunch of cold iron, and snipping off the ponderous bars that were fed to them as easily and noiselessly as a rabbit nips a clover blossom. It was an exhibition of jaw that Samson would have enjoyed.

When a man's head slopes up to the ridge of self-esteem, and then tumbles abruptly down behind, you know he is a man given to reflection,—in a looking-glass; that he has the grace of charity,—for himself; and you envy him a little. But you do not quite know a man until you have measured his lower jaw. When it retreats meekly away, as if it had some notion of slipping down through his cravat into his bosom, you expect to hear him apologizing for his existence. He came into the world with a snaffle-bit in his mouth that holds him back by the jaw, and never slips out. What can we do for a horse that neither pulls by the bit nor draws by the traces?

But when that jaw juts squarely and boldly out like a promontory, and closes upon its neighbor like a vise, as much as to say, "Bring on your walnuts if they want cracking," he has what is called grip in a bulldog, and tenacity in a general. The only way to coax him is to kill him. You have seen a man with such an osseous formation. It took a small lime-kiln to make it. Like the antlers of an elk, it is the most wonderful part of him. Moreover, his superciliary arches are very much arched indeed, and he has a way of lifting the fringe of eyebrow at times that provokes the suspicion that he can slip his scalp off back over his head like a nightcap, if he tries. Then exactly over the eyes, that look as if they were not fast colors, and had been washed in two waters, and exactly over the arches that are nearly sharp enough to be Gothic, and halfway up the slope, rest his spectacles, like a couple of dormer-windows. It is a sort of two-story face, with two rows of windows in it. Then his long hair flows away behind his ears, and rolls down the nape of his neck and ripples over his coat-collar in a kind of John-in-the-wilderness way. This is the sort of front he presents when anybody opposes him. His voice has a twang to it, and twangs prolonged make whines. It has a quaver likewise. He has inherited Samson's own weapon, and with it he sets the doctrine of "ruling majorities" at defiance. He resembles the son of Manoah in two ways: he treats opposing brethren as if they were so many Philistines, and when they are too much for him he bows himself upon the pillars, if so be he may bring down the temple in which he cannot reign.

But the most aggravating thing is yet to be told. Having applied the purchase of that jaw to a question, and held on as vicious as a vise to his own opinion, and worried people until they give in from sheer exhaustion, this man will rise up and bring his two hands together at the finger-tips like a V, and raise his voice and his eyebrows, and extol the beauty of harmony, and say, "Behold, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity," when he never agreed with anybody in all his life! Poor Philistines! Jawed to death, and then congratulated upon the disaster.

This man is no fiction, neither is he a stranger. He is in church and state and social life. If on a jury, prayers for the hapless eleven are in order. If leading an army, he pays the highest price demanded for a victory, and never counts the cost. You can pick him out as you could Samson in the temple, for he is the man with the jawbone. There is nothing like an appropriate text when such men let go their hold: "With the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, with the jawbone of an ass have I slain a thousand men."

CHAPTER XXI.

JUST AND GENEROUS.

THE OLD GUARD.

THERE he paces, to and fro, his red signal of danger furled under his arm. He encounters water in every form. Rain, snow, sleet, hail, fog and steam. He is blown upon by thirty-two winds. Fire tries him summers, and frost takes him in hand winters — and in foot, too, for that matter — but he never flinches. How many men, women and children he has saved from mutilation and death; how many horses from the hands of the knacker, and how many vehicles from the fate of kindling-wood, nobody knows; but then I should like his roll of achievements better than the soldier's who had killed four times as many. He has seen millions of people go by, and cattle from a thousand hills, and there he stands as faithful as a lighthouse. But he cannot last forever. Some day he must surrender the little red flag. He has been the company's servant about as long as Jacob served to get Rachel. The law of his life is duty. He knows engines by their talk, and freight by its number. He never stole a rod of railroad, or pocketed a switch. But will the great corporation ever put him upon the retired list, and pension him? And yet some people seem to think well of faithfulness, and several eulogies in prose and verse have been pronounced upon honesty by men who would "bear watching" themselves.

STEALING.

Honesty is a respectable virtue, but it is prodigiously homely. If a man practices it but little, he praises it a great deal, and so does his duty by it as a sort of poor relation. Agur was afraid to be poor, and he did not dare to be rich. He feared he should swear in the one case and steal in the other. He was a timid man, was Agur. People have grown braver since his time. There are several courageous men in Washington. Now and then there is a lion among them, and that's what he does. Lie on and steal on go in couples. It is a horrible pun, but it is good enough for the subject. If Agur had been an Indian, and his prayer had been answered, some of them would have made off with the answer and left him to pray again. They would have made a sort of trap of him, to catch answers for them to steal! Stealing is never respectable unless it is atrocious. When the depredation is so large that twenty per cent of it will establish his innocence, the man is a success. Nearly everybody steals something, even if it is only a march or a glance. What a choir it would be, if all who could sing it with the spirit, should join in on the first half line of that familiar hymn, and stop definitely where it is dangerous to halt a second:

"I love to steal!"

FAIRS.

The average fair for the sale of worthless articles for noble causes is a place where you are robbed by your own consent, and smiled on by the banditti. You pay a dollar for a pen-wiper, not because a young Kickapoo lacks a blanket, or the pulpit a cushion, but because the lady who halts you in the highway of Vanity Fair has invested a dime in it, and challenges you to make it a dollar, or ——. Well, you “stand and deliver.” Somebody gives ten cents in the disguise of a woolen heart, to be pounced upon by steel pens, as that old Greek’s was by vultures, and asks you to give ninety. This is the unpopular side of the question, but I submit that I have not left the subject. Why should a fair do for a good sake what an honorable merchant could not do for any sake? Is it fair?

I met a suitable motive for a small fair last Sunday. It was a boy that looked as if his clothes had been torn to pieces by tigers in the interest of tailors out of business. They were so thoroughly ventilated that their natural home was the rag-bag, and yet he contrived to keep them flapping about him as a sleight-of-hand fellow keeps a half dozen balls going up and coming down and never touching ground. He was barefooted, and his hair grew out of the chinks in his hat. That was his best suit, except the tights he was born in. Whenever a well-dressed lad came within contrasting distance, his tattered decency went into a more dismal eclipse than ever. Now, he wants a fair, and there are more of him, and girls to match. Suppose Dorcas should make garments and have a fair, and smile people into buying at honest prices, and then give tatterdemalion the Sunday suit and the new frock, and be rewarded by tatterdemalion's wonder and delight, and have the profits besides, for the aisle carpet, the pulpit cushion, or "India's coral strand." And then you have given the boy a moral jog, as well as a braided jacket, for anybody is apt to behave better in good clothes. There is many a man who cannot conduct himself like a christian simply because he is dressed like a beggar.

THE ART OF GIVING.

The Golden Rule is a section of "the higher law." It requires more than a spirit of obedience to obey it. "Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you." That is all of it—easily read, but not easily done. It implies the possession of some imagination, but there are men who are not proprietors of a particle. To step out of yourself and be somebody else, think the whole matter over, and then step quietly back again—all this is involved in it. But did you ever hear a man thank the Lord for his imagination, or pray for a little more? He sometimes names the dinner he is about to eat, but he gives imagination the go-by. He has no idea that he needs any, and associates it with short lines that trot, amble or gallop, as the gait happens to be—short lines, with a capital letter at one end, and a capital jingle at the other, tricked out, as it were, with "bells on their toes." It is a costly rule, and therefore golden. It costs a thoughtful self-sacrifice, for which nobody will commend you. Now a just or a generous act committed in a moment of enthusiasm, when a man shies a plump pocket-book at an object, in a sort of Fourth-of-July fervor, is a very different thing from that same act performed after deliberate premeditation. It means more, for it is significant of the man. The one is a principle, the other an impulse. Generosity is a contagious disease, and is always most violent in great crowds. Men have thus won, in the heat of the moment, the reputation of being munificent, who directly set about cheating somebody to supply the deficiency.

THE USES OF IMAGINATION.

Most men lack imagination. You never saw a person yet who did not volunteer the information, that should he come into a liberal fortune, of which there was no probability, he would give you at least ten per cent. out of hand,—ten thousand on a hundred thousand, and if a million, then the cool hundred! And you try to believe he would do it, and you call him a generous fellow, and he returns the compliment when, in like manner, you bestow a few thousands upon him. But such men have no imagination. They cannot put themselves in the rich man's place, or if at all, so badly damaged in the transportation that they do not know themselves when they get there. Benevolence is an easy virtue, but beneficence is quite another thing.

Giving "blesses him that gives and him that takes" is Shakespeare, but not absolute truth. If the gift costs the giver a temporary privation or an extra effort; if he accompanies the gift and sees it actually appropriated, and the comfort and gratitude and happiness it brings; or if he has imagination enough to follow it to its destination, and see with his eyes shut all he would see if actually present, then indeed the act "blesses him that gives and him that takes." The art of giving is one of the fine arts, and not well understood. You have met the lady who embroiders beautiful tidies for the poor, when they all sit upon stools, and elegant little cloaks for children who have nothing to wear when they get them. It resembles the thoughtful kindness of her who sends a tailor's goose for their Christmas dinner, or skates and a buffalo-robe to a Polynesian.

It is a standing wonder that murderers on execution eve sleep soundly, and that, in most instances, they go to their death with unfaltering and sometimes unassisted steps. They are like Pope's lamb in one thing:

"The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play!"

It is a lack of sense in the lamb, and of imagination in the criminal. He never mentally rehearses the catastrophe or the crime, and thinks deliberately through the terrible details. If he did, and when he does, his strength always departs from him. Eugene Aram was a man of imagination. He committed the murder over and over, and death to him was a comfort.

The woman that always sees things with her eyes shut will take a table laden with flowers, and see the room decorated with them without touching a bud; and then, before you know it, make the apartment a beautiful picture. So with furniture and adornings. Tumble the whole into the middle of the floor, and she will see them all out of chaos into a fitness of position that could not be improved with a month's thinking, and not lay a hand on them at all. It is not taste alone that inspires her. It is imagination also.

There are other women who keep things revolving like the bits of broken glass in a kaleidoscope. Beds, bureaus, chairs and mirrors go round and round like the broom in the riddle, though they do not "pop behind the door," but it would not matter if they did. They are the women that put china cats on the mantlepiece face to face, and lay the show-books like spokes of wheels on the center-table, and back every chair up squarely against the wall, and put one ostrich feather over the looking-glass so, /, and another ostrich feather over the looking-glass so, \, that the combined effect may be thus, X, and so balance everything that the room resembles a donkey between two panniers, or a country doctor's saddle-bags, or any other thing that is distressingly symmetrical. These are the people who want everything to "compare," whatever that may mean.

CHAPTER XXII.

STITCHING LANDSCAPES.

DISTANCE, with nothing swift to conquer it, renders the impressive grouping of geographical facts almost impossible. The world lies about in loose leaves. We pick up one here and there, but it is only when the locomotive whips through the miles like a cambric needle along a hem, and stitches those leaves together in a book we can have at once under our eyes, that such facts grow eloquent. Take, some spring day, at Chicago, an express needle on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, which is the locomotive. You cling to the thread, which is the train, and within twenty hours you may see men plowing the fields for corn, planting corn, hoeing corn, the three eras in the work grouped upon one illustrated page. You can see lilacs in leaf, lilacs in bud, lilacs in blow, as you cross line after line of longitude as a boy ticks with a stick along the slats of a picket fence. You feel as if you were reading a chapter of prophecy backward.

Those September days, broad, bright and round — the weather that “makes corn,” as farmers say — I came east over the New York Central. It was hot and dusty along the track, but the world was not dusty, and the green fields and woods looked cool. The most African and smothering thing I saw was a man riding upon the yellow road that danced up and down with the heat, in a "devil's-hornpipe" sort of way, perched on a load of fleeces; the suggestion of woolen clothes, oily wool and muttonish odor all simmering together, with a red-faced man in a narrow hat-brim, like a house without a cornice, frying in the middle of the mess, made thoughts as hot as a canal-boat kitchen in dog-days. Association mercifully helps you in such a case, and you think of ice tinkling in tumblers, and cool nooks in the woods, and feel refreshed. I glanced out of the window after a look at that man mounted upon sheep's jackets, saw a girl under a willow by a brookside, with her white feet dangling in the running water and the shadows falling cool upon her, and I was comforted.

The next minute a strong peppermint breeze blew into the window. The fields, ridged with rolls of green, showed the route of the mowers, and a peppermint-still threw off its fragrant volumes that sweetened the air laden with coal smoke, and was far fresher than cologne. The oil, which is a staple of several sections of western New York—Lyons is one of them—is only gold in disguise, and meets a ready European sale. Mint farming seems to me pleasant, though less emotional than onion-raising, and kinder to the spinal column.

Writing of Lyons: "the Lady of Lyons" came on board—she and two friends. They may not be residents of that excellent town. They were of the species called chatterers. Taking seats in front and rear of an inoffensive and modest man, they fairly surrounded him, and began to talk loud and sharp as a driver's horn. They seemed to look directly at him as they faced about, but their talk shot by him, just missing now his right ear and now his left. Then the volley would be returned, and take him in the back. Then the third lioness, or what not, took diagonal aim and grazed his nose. It was a triangular voluble duel. The poor man was bewildered. At first he thought they meant him, and he looked this way and that, as the words flew like shuttle-cocks, but he soon discovered that he had gotten into a rook's nest. And so they continued talking around him, over him, through him, making him of no more account than a gate-post. Chatterers are many. They are not liable to consumption, neither are the bellows of blacksmiths. They are not readers of Shakespeare. They do not know that a gentle voice is "an excellent thing in woman." Their answers are not of Job's sort that "turneth away wrath."

NICKNAMES.

When people make books and quote Shakespeare, let them not abridge the poacher's name, and end such a passage as "The quality of mercy is not strained" with Shak. Think of a pair of sentences like this: "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer! Shak!" Why not quote the author of "The Task" as Cow, or a line from Titsworth as Tit, or the poet of Amesbury as Whit? If the writer has left himself no room for anything but a nickname, let him leave it to the wits of his readers to ascertain whether "my name is Norval on the Grampian hills," or anywhere else.

There is such a miserable monotony of names given to children, that when there is a spark of originality it is as pleasant as a ray of light in a dull place. One of the best I know of is a composite, manufactured for a daughter, by an old resident of Gilboa, Schoharie county, New York. It was a Shakespearean christening. The father made all his naming preparations for a boy. Such things are not safe, however. The name he had ready for the stranger was Romeo. The proposed owner arrived. To be sure, it came within one of being a boy, but it was a girl! The father was not to be balked, so he never went out of the play of Romeo and Juliet at all, but he took that classic couple and he blended a word, and he called the little blunder Romiette, and she bears the name "even until this day."

We pass the Montezuma Marshes, and the harvest of rushes in tall, narrow-waisted bundles, and remember the rush-bottomed chairs and the rush-lights of the old days, and them that lighted the one and sat upon the other. They were the salt of the earth; and almost before we were done thinking of them, the wooden parallelograms of pans, with the salt showing white in the sun, were at right of us and left of us, as we passed the great Salt Licks of New York.

Out of Syracuse, after taking a stitch under the canal through that eyelet-hole of a tunnel, we whipped fifty-four miles across country after one of those temperate engines that drink only twice or so in a hundred miles, to the modern Utica, that is not "pent-up" except as the president of the New York Central has fenced a piece of it. Then keeping company with the Mohawk, we fly by a million or two of wild brooms, the clean and yellow plumage of the broom-corn sweeping the sun-bright air, that shall by-and-by be girded into besoms for kitchen floors and whisks for garments, and be soiled and worn out in less time than it took them to grow. Those acres of Mohawk levels bear all the poetry there is about "Buy a Broom!" Then the flat Mohawk gets up a little at its old battle-place, Little Falls, where it had, some day, a desperate fight with rocks, that came finally off the worse for wear.

At Schenectady the cars are reinforced by a crowd of human miscellany. Some Dutchmen, built like the churns of their foremothers, broad at the base and tapering out at the top; some specimens of the tribe of Saratoga accompanying the trunks they had been living in; some school-girls loaded with log-chains in ebony and gold, just to help the attraction of gravitation a little; last and worst, the man and woman that open the window ahead of you, and let in upon you the storm of smoke, cinders and dust, while they escape the tempest and are comfortable. You shade your eyes with your hand. You cease to see the bright world going the other way. You catch a cinder in your ear. You breathe smoke. You are a dirt-eater. At last an angel of a cinder gets into that woman's eye, and she weeps for the cinder if not for the sin. Down comes the window, and you betake yourself to breathing a few cubic feet of atmospheric air, damaged, to be sure, but then no ash-man would pay as much for it as he might for the article you had just done with.

The train stitches a few of the streets of Albany together,—Albany, where, according to the old chronicler, the inhabitants once stood “with their gable-ends to the street,” and we found the Hudson River train in harness awaiting us. The River trains always remind me of blooded horses, rather lean and not well groomed. Compared with their western kindred they are dusty and plebeian-looking things, but they can make time. I like all brakemen, especially air-brakemen. They are live brakemen on the Hudson, but they fail in articulation. Their words are like the tails of the Manx cats—all brought to premature ends. One of them opened the car door before the wheels had done rumbling, and said, “Alas, poor!” In a few minutes he opened it again, and flung through the crack, “Yorick!” And what he said in the two spasms was straight from Hamlet, “Alas, poor Yorick!” Consulting my guide, I found that “Alas, poor” was brakemanese for Castleton, and that “Yorick” meant Schodack. He had a way, too, when a name was too long, of catching it in the door and making an insect of it. Thus he gave “Livingston” a vicious pinch thus:  “Liviston!” It was a cheap way of getting at it, and saved breath, but then nobody but a scholar could tell what he meant.

Hudson could not have left his name to a finer thing than that splendid river. There it lay glassy in the sun, cities and villages sitting upon the banks to watch it; mountains in blue cloaks keeping everlasting ward; steamers plying in their direct fashion to and fro; winged craft zigzagging up the river and feeling for wind with slanting canvas palms, or grasping the breeze with a square hold as they swept down toward New York; walls, battlements, towers, that no man builded. Talk of “sermons in stones.” O Shakespeare!—but what are your lithoidal preachers to the shrieking dervishes of traffic they have made of cliff and rock all along the river? “Plantation Bitters—S. T. 1860 X!” “Pills!” “Powders!” “Ready Relief!” cry out at you in great letters on every side. They are worse than the Hebrew highwaymen of the old Bowery; worse than Italian bandits. They make a terror of the landscape. But the worst and most impudent of all are those huge, bilious, yellow letters basking on the rocks like rattlesnakes in the sun, within sight of the cars,—“GARGLING OIL!” Is it poison? Will it strangle the proprietor? Will twelve bottles kill him scientifically, and make a sardine of him? It is worth trying, and if successful, let the rocky faces of nature along the Hudson be washed clean of the oleaginous defilement. One of that man's grandfathers must have been a banker in the Temple when that writ of ejectment was served. "Gargling Oil," indeed!

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE COUNTRY BALL-ROOM.

WAS there a troop of strolling players? That ball-room was the scene of their histrionic achievements. Did old Braham, the sweet singer of English ballads,—who, as the frogs piped through the reigns of all the Pharaohs, sang through the reigns of several British lions, not to say lionesses, and then at seventy had a voice as flexible as a girl's,—did he give them an evening of Island melody till the nightingales and the larks seemed singing at once? That ball-room was the music-box for the minstrelsy. One day there came a hungry-looking man,—he came from Hungary,—and brought a sort of harp with him, out of whose strings he pulled the battle of Waterloo; guns and groans, battle-cheer and rallying cry, drums and bugles, wailing and sobbing, dirge and anthem, and then, last and best, the song of peace. I do not remember his name, and could not spell it if I did, but he was a wonderful artist, and he stood at one end of the low-ceiled ball-room, and shut his eyes and touched those strings and bent a listening ear, as if he had never heard it before in his life, and we all sat in rows within range of the battle of Waterloo!

You should have seen that ball-room on a Fourth of July night, when it was trimmed with asparagus, fresh flowers, and a national flag, and lighted with lamps whose oil came "round the Horn" from the Pacific; when the "grand marshal of the day," and general of militia likewise, led off the dance, a double-handful of gold bullion shining upon his shoulders, and the fringed ends of his sash of crimson silk falling to his knee; when men in blue coats with taper tails and gilded buttons, and dames in caps that flared like full-blown hollyhocks, moved through the graceful measure of the minuet with the coupee, the high step and the balance, amid an atmosphere of lavender, cologne and lamp-smoke; when the air was dizzy with Virginia reels, and as full of "Money Musk" as a Russian lady's handkerchief, and everything was aswing with contra-dances and gay with quadrilles. Not a bearded face among the men, though there was but one barber in the village, and he shaved notes and never left a whisker!

Writing of the general: the glitter and tinsel of war's livery is not altogether like Goldsmith's broken china, "kept for show," and it lessens the vanity of the thing a little when we think what the epaulet was really for,—not the modern badge with its modest hint of rank, that would not turn the thrust of a vicious musquito, but the old-fashioned yellow-ringed shoulder-crest, a sort of mop without a handle, that could dull the downward stroke of sword or saber, and save an arm sometimes. So with the sash. Un-wound from the waist of the wounded owner, the elastic web of silk lengthened and widened, and there you had the hammock whereon the soldier could be borne away.

Then you recall some other night when, in cutters by twos, in sleighs by clusters, the young men and maidens from the country round about, thronged in for a dance to the old ball-room, and what a medley it was of morocco shoes, "pumps," red, white and blue, cheeks, dresses and ribbons, palpitation, pomatum, peppermint, and happiness, as bright as a bed of tulips. And weddings came of the dancings, and they paired off for the long promenade. And the names of some of them are on gray slabs of stone, and some are forgotten altogether. Did you ever see a rainbow die?—the sort of architecture that must be repaired every second, or it will crumble into atoms of colorless rain? And so the drops one by one fall into their places, the arch changing each instant and always the same, until the rain comes slow and the tints grow faint and the bow goes out, and the cloud is as bare as if God had never put a seal to the Cove-

AN OLD-FASHIONED "FOURTH."

The tavern dining-room on that old Fourth was the scene of high festivity. The roast pig, with a sprig of parsley in his mouth, graced the head of the board. He was as much a belonging of "the day we celebrate" as the inedible poultry of the flag. It was pig and patriotism. Before that pig sat the president of the day, blossomed out, as to his broad bosom with snowy ruffles, in vest of buff and coat of blue, and his legs being under the table his pantaloons are out of sight. On either hand is an old soldier of the Revolution, as genuine as a flint-lock: somebody who had seen Washington, and was a captain; somebody who had fought at Bennington, and was a private. And after a while came the stately old toasts, unchangeable as the Book of Genesis, that were drank to the President and the People, the Army, the Navy, the old Soldiers, the Ladies, and the Day. Then they all stood up, and drank in silence to the Dead. After the immemorial thirteen, they toasted each other and "the rest of mankind," and what with the heat of the day, the dinner and the toasting, they grew warm, while the anvil in the street grew hot, and a gun that had bellowed at Sacket's Harbor gave tongue, and the air was full of smoke and glory and Seventy-Six, — Seventy-Six, that had not then sunk so far below the horizon that the twilight splendors of the first Fourth of July that was thought worth mentioning, were not refracted still. Possibly that dinner was fifty cents. Probably it was free. Surely it was grand!

Out in front of the door was a grizzly drummer with his drum, who had beaten the long roll somewhere, because Baron Steuben or General Stark — Molly's husband — told him to; and a fifer to match, who whistled away like a blackbird in a hedge, and the boys kept step to the measure, and everybody marked time with head or toe or cane, and so all mentally marched back fifty years, when the music meant business. But the fife was given to grandchildren for a plaything, and Time slashed a hole in the drum with a careless cut of his scythe, and the mice gnawed off the snare, and there are two tablets, each with a stone willow thereon, and both tablets cry out with one voice: "A Patriot of the Revolution." Sic transit gloria mundi ad immortalitatem — So passes the glory of the world to immortality.

The Fourth of July has worn on into the deep night. The fifth will soon dawn. The guests are gone. The lights are out. The old inn is silent as an empty church. And so I say to the memory of the old day, "Out! brief candle!"

THE FLAG REMEMBERED.

Forty years ago flags were fewer, and so, to be sure, were folks. The pagans that dwelt in villages seldom saw any except at "General Training" and on the Fourth of July, and on those occasions their name was not legion. Not then, as now, did each omnibus horse sport a little flag between his ears upon gala days. It used to be that a boy's first sight of the glorious standard almost took his breath away. A boy's tenth-wave passion is for martial "pomp and circumstance," provided he has ever seen any. Boys are monkeys. So much for Darwin!

Your first sword was forged from a shingle and tipped with the blood of the belligerent strawberry. Your first flag was made of a yard square of cotton cloth, that mayhap had helped to do duty upon a trundle-bed, and was hemmed by a mother's fingers. Upon it was tethered with needle and thread an eagle of blue broadcloth. That eagle was hatched by the same loving hands and the help of a pair of shears. It was a fowl of such proportions as Agassiz would have wondered over. Beside it were thirteen stars of blue upon a cotton-white heaven—all "deeply, darkly, beautifully blue," but just the thing that should have been cerulean. It was a defiant flag, for it bleached out the sky and put all the color in bird and stars. A disabled broom furnished the staff, and altogether it was the ensign of no State in the Union but the State of Perfect Happiness. Long ago, the moths devoured the eagle and the mice ate up the flag, and the staff turned into legs for a milking-stool, but the memory and the glory remain "even until this day."

CHAPTER XXIV.

A THANKSGIVING-DAY FLIGHT.

BY invitation I rode hundreds of miles to reach New York, for the sake of flying back to Chicago by the Fast White Mail when such things were. That is all there was of it. Three o'clock Thanksgiving morning found me riding up Broadway to the Grand Central Depot.

The city had fallen asleep in her diamonds the night before,—the careless, magnificent creature! Chains of brilliants and necklaces of light and double rows of jewelry down every street, like double rows of gems along a Persian seam, fairly clothed her with trinkets as with a garment. She is grand when she goes to bed as a princess going to Court. But New York sleeps with one eye open. The mantle of slumber is as short as a Scotch kilt, and the cloak of forgetfulness shrinks to a jacket when she puts it on. Nowhere else in America is a man reduced from an integer to a pitiful vulgar fraction as he is in New York. He sees himself through the other end of the glass; he shrivels like a last year's filbert; he wonders the census-taker cares to reckon him in, the three-ninths of a man that he has become. That feeling of fragmentary humanity and loneliness proves, without the help of mathematics, that a mart has achieved genuine greatness. Boston is Athenian; Baltimore is monumental; Philadelphia is centennial; Chicago is wonderful, but New York is NEW YORK.

“THE WORD GO.”

Not a minute too soon, we found the White Mail just ready to leave. It had an unreal, a spectral look in the flicker of the lamps, and so had the white four-in-hand, attached to the ponderous wagon, whence the last of the mail-bags were tumbling into the cars. It was a scene for lamplight and starlight rather than for broad day. Number 84, the engineer in the saddle, was ready to run, and, as the clock marked fifteen minutes past four, the conductor gave the word “go,” and we went. The crew had come aboard, the engine had made ready, the driver had taken aim, and the conductor said “fire!” That was how it was. There were four cars, four gallant governors in line,—their Excellencies Hendricks, Fairchild, Beveridge and Buckingham,—brave in their white, orange and gold, blazoned with shielded eagles, and gay to look at as so many waiting lords in the king’s livery. Ah! it was a Jewell of a train.

And the first thing it did was to plunge ignobly into a hole two miles long, burrow like a gopher, and jar away under the city streets that ribbed it overhead like the bars of a gridiron. And the next thing it did was to dash across Harlem river, and make the switches snap like flint-locks in a skirmish, and set the lamp-posts about as near as a row of wax lights on a mantelpiece, and out it dashed as if bound for a plunge-bath in the Hudson. But it changed its mind in a minute and doubled capes of curves, and thundered under the hills, threw lights on the water, and glimmers on the rock, and glares on the rail. It swung like a cradle and shot like an arrow, and whipped through the tunnels as if it were stitching for life, with Starvation's ivory grin looking in at the door. Figures started out in the flash of the head-light as we rounded a promontory, and slunk back in the darkness like guilty things as we passed. The train ran as light and swift, with its thirty-five tons of mail, as a rejoicing herald that used to run before the king. It cleft the shadows that lay heaped upon the track, as if Night had disrobed, left its clothes upon the rails, and gone into the river to swim; ghosts of precipices and doubles of trees and mantles of mountains. The furnace door played like a fan in a fever. The clouds above the engine turned white and crimson and black every two minutes. It was a medley of sunsets and midnights. It seemed like flying, and had we heard the flap of a pair of wings as big as a mainsail close to our ears, and the Governors had all left the track in a flock and flown, not into the ditch, but over the Palisades or Wolfert's Roost, or the Catskills, or the bridge of Anthony's nose, it would have astonished nobody very much.

We had strung a dozen villages as nimble girls string beads, when day broke and the sun touched up the wavy sky-line of the mountains, and Father Hudson showed himself, icy at the edges like the tips of an old man's ears and fingers in a frosty morning, but traveling seaward as sturdily as Sir Hendrick saw him many a year ago. Now we caught one steamer with the steady see-saw of her walking-beam, and showed her a light pair of heels in three seconds; and now we met another with a brood of barges about her like a hen with a small family of exaggerated Bramahs; and now a pair of schooners wing and wing like a couple of gulls. The villages across the river kept dressing to the right, like a row of school-children ranged for a spelling-match, as we flew. The engine was incessantly giving two little whistles to itself, as it cleft hamlet, highway and hill, and the bell swung like a pendulum with a tongue in it, and we pulled up at Poughkeepsie. The wheels tolled along under the train at the blow of the testing hammers before we fairly halted; five minutes and we were away. It is the most penurious train on the road. It puts eighty minutes into sixteen little packages for its sixteen halts in a thousand miles, and it doles out these five-minute nickels one at a time along the way.

THE FLIGHT.

It was a splendid day. The sun shone like an Easter sun. It was Thanksgiving. And to think that we were making the transit of six States before men should begin to say, "Yesterday was Thanksgiving;"—that New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, should slip away beneath the wheels like a map of sovereignties under a nimble finger;—that we were gliding through an atmosphere of five hundred thousand turkeys done to a golden brown and lying like dead knights in armor, ready for the glad solemnities of Thanksgiving, and not so much as a "merry-thought" wherewith to bless ourselves;—that there we were, chasing a cup of coffee across the Empire State, telegraphing Utica from Albany and Syracuse from Utica, and catching the slow-footed Mercurys before they had delivered the message;—calling for a drop of Java or Mocha or "peas, beans and barley O," through a flight of two hundred miles, as plaintively as aguish Cæsar called for drink when he was in Spain;—that we were to catch at Buffalo at last and have our small Thanksgiving;—that we were doing the twenty-six days' work of the pioneers in as many hours;—that we were in effect bringing Chicago to sit by the shore of Lake Erie, and Buffalo to the banks of the Mohawk, and Utica for a neighborly gossip with the old city of the Knickerbockers at tide-water, setting sober-going watches in the wrong and making them bear false witness without lying.

GEOGRAPHY JUMBLED.

The train takes Holland in a trice of hours and captures the savages in a trice more. It is Spuyten Duyvil, Yonkers, Sing Sing and no music; it is Crugers and Peekskill, Fishkill and Catskill; it is Staatsburg, Rhinebeck, Germantown, Stuyvesant, Batavia and Amsterdam. It flashes by the sturdy Dutchmen a hundred years old, whose rugged walls shed Revolutionary bullets and flint-headed arrows as ducks shed rain.

It is Tribes Hill and Oriskany, Oneida, Canastota, Canaseraga, Chittenango and White Pigeon. And there's your poor Indian! It takes Rome before it is done with it, and rattles geography together in a hopeless jumble in twenty-six hours.

“TRUE AS A DIE.”

Did you ever see a woman weave, and watch the play of the shuttle to and fro through the countless threads and never a tangle or catch?—to and fro, here and there, with a swing of the bar? The Hudson River Railroad is a loom mightier and busier. See the sixty trains out of New York flying hither and yon and keeping the rails jarring night and day to the music. See the scores of trains dashing out of the West. See them pulling into “the piece” all along the way. These are the threads. Then see the white shuttle of the Fast Mail,—white that everybody may know it,—flashing to and fro amid the warp and woof of trains, never colliding or blundering or waiting. New York throws it with a will in the morning and Chicago sends it back in the evening. Shuttles meet and pass and part with the accuracy of the stars.

There is a point on the New York Central between Batavia and a place-no-place called Croft's. The Mail from New York and the Mail from Chicago, nine hundred and eighty-six miles apart, are due there at the same moment,—nineteen minutes past two p. m. We, westward-bound, are careering at fifty-six miles an hour. We shall strike the point on time. Will our twin from the West be there to meet us? Watches in hand we look ahead. A cloud no bigger than a man's hand. It might be a fleece from Mary's little lamb. It grows, till it is like a ship showing everything that will draw. It is the train! Two seventeen — seventeen and a half — eighteen — a quarter — half — three-quarters — nineteen! The train is here, is there, is gone! We met on the instant. It was an aggregate motion the trains made of one hundred and twelve miles an hour. It was like brushing one palm with the other in the twinkling of an eye. A man may build the great clock of Strasburg that could never make a time-table.

A MILE A MINUTE — HOW IT SEEMS.

Of a truth it is a splendid day! Engine 317, H. S. Shattuck, engineer, awaits us at Buffalo. He is of age on the rail, having been an engineer his twenty-one years. We climb into the howdah, and doesn't 317 shine in her brazen harness, like the near wheel-horse of Phœbus! She has done her mile in fifty-two seconds, and never "turned a hair." The engineer is as quiet as the keeper of a light-house. He is not noisy. Engineers seldom are. He is reticent. He is not a stage-driver. He is a gunner. He says, "I use my ears as much as I do my eyes. I hear every click and clip of engine and train. If there's a jingle out of place anywhere, I can't help hearing it. Once I could not have heard it had I tried." He talks one way and looks another. He has his hand on the iron bridle, his eye on the track, his heart on the West. He sees the world bearing down upon him like a ship before a mighty wind. He brings his engine down to her steady work. The day is as calm as old Herbert's blessed Sunday, but the wind blows here in the saddle full fifty miles an hour. A couple of young hurricanes are following at the heels of the train. Give them a wide berth, or they will waltz you in upon the track to the tune of the devil's hornpipe. We are making a mile in fifty-nine seconds, fifty-eight seconds, fifty-six seconds, fifty-four seconds. Sheridan's ride at Read's rhythmic paces from Winchester to glory, "only twenty miles away," was a Sabbath-day's jog in a decorous way.

The track sometimes lifts to the edge of the sky, and it doesn't look as if it were a very heavy grade to heaven either. The telegraph poles come together like a V, and fence the track in the distance. The wires droop and swing and shorten up like clothes-lines to hang sheet lightning on, if you please! The great steel S's of curves glitter like silver in the sun. The bell, shaped like the tall hats we see in pictures finishing up the Pilgrims that stand freezing round the rock of Plymouth, keeps on the swing, rung by the tireless hand of steam. The engine talks to a crossing, hails a station, screams at a track-man. The little oscillations and petty jolts disappear. The thing runs like a shaft in a polished groove. All minor motions are resolved into the one forward plunge. As the rifle-bullet hurries round and round and out of its spiral hall of steel, so speeds the train. It runs as true as the aim of a dead shot. The steady stillness is suspicious. If you think of it and what it means, it tugs at your nerves and draws them taut as the little string of a violin. It is seventy feet at a clock-tick, eighty feet at a heart-beat, forty miles in forty-three minutes. It means that a minute makes a mile, when it does not mean more. Fifteen minutes late is twelve miles late, and a stern chase is a wild chase.

A MAN HATCHED AND RECONSIDERED.

There's a dot on the track about the size of a Darwinian primal egg. It begins to hatch! It develops legs and arms and feet and head. It is as tall as a pen-holder, a walking-stick, a man. It is a man, and the man stands not "upon the order of his going," but goes at once, bolts the track and makes for the fence. We pass him, and behold he shuts up like a telescope and diminishes by swift degrees and rolls back into an egg, a dot, a nothing. The track is clear behind us for all such animalculæ as he. It is as if he had never been hatched at all!

The talk of engineer, fireman, conductor, brakeman, is "speed." Watches are in hand, and mile-posts read like a book. No vain girl with a pretty face ever consulted her looking-glass so often as are the time-pieces on the train, and it isn't the hour hand they are after, but the minutes and the seconds. Under the wheels of a fifty-six miler time is ground exceeding small, and it takes a finger as delicate as a second hand to pick it up. Speed has a bead on it. It is exhilarating as sparkling Catawba. It quickens pulses and lifts the spirits. It is the very antipodes of death, for the swiftest motion is the intensest life.

We have done our thousand miles between sun and sun, our Thanksgiving-day flight is finished, and we say to ourself, as we leap from the train, with some grateful feeling befitting the day we had spent in flying,

Chicago! and we kept the track!

And what have they all done in the twenty-six hours? Scattered to the four winds, and precisely where they belong, 157,000 papers, 119,420 letters,—276,420 pieces in all, and an average of 9,214 to the man,—the work of thirty-five men in a round day!

Chicago, six fifty-five, twenty-six hours from New York, and a cloudy morning! The waiting trains are in harness. It is Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Wisconsin, the Silver State, the Golden State, the Picket Post of Civilization. On rush the tidings. It is Green Bay before bed-time. It is Dubuque before sundown. The old fifty-eight hours from Boston to Burlington are forty-five. The old seven days to San Francisco are fused into a bright new six, and a Sabbath to spare! Where are the people that bade each other good-by, as for a lasting farewell, when the mail was chucked into the boot of the Concord coach at Chicago, and trod upon by the driver and lurched away to Galena for ninety-six hours?

Eloquence may be grand, but this is grander. Poetry may be fine, but this is finer still. War may be glorious, but there is no blood on the white array of the Governors' Train. It has swung through an arc of nine hundred and eighty-five miles. It has traversed twenty cities with an aggregate population of two millions. It has flashed along a great highway bordered with half a million more who are within stone's throw or ear-shot of its lively wheels. It was the pendulum of the new Centennial Clock sweeping six States at a vibration.

CHAPTER XXV.

“RIVERSIDE” AND “LAKESIDE.”

AMERICA has a lake and a river that are classic. The one is the Hudson, and the other, Otsego. If anybody thinks there should be more, let him make more, and no man shall forbid him. Happily Washington Irving and Fennimore Cooper were eldest sons, and so heirs to whatever of literary name and fame was worth inheriting. They had no rivals and few imitators. They entered into peaceable possession when the world was less troubled with angels than it now is,—the angels that are incessantly saying “Write!”

Born fifty years later, they would have been anachronisms, and might about as well have not been born at all. The world grows more difficult to be caught every day of its life, but there is a chance for the man who is born too soon. The quick world may overtake him and honor him with a monument, though it has quite forgotten where he was buried. That coroners can hold an inquest upon departed merit, without having a body to sit upon, is a blessed thing for printers and marble-workers and everything but the departed merit. Few are they who, like Professor Morse, witness the unveiling of their own statues.

In this, Cooper and Irving were alike: both loved England filially — faithfully. The one bestowed upon her his benedictions; the other was as much an Islander as he could be in the heart of a continent. Both were insular in their tastes. They would have been contented with an asteroid if they could have taken the choicest of this great lumbering earth with them; if they could have had at command a small marine to carry their manuscripts to the mainland. They were neither sordid nor selfish, but then they did not like to be jostled.

It is not long since Irving's Sketch-Book and Cooper's Leather-Stocking were in everybody's hand, when "everybody" meant less and more than it means now; less, because readers were fewer; more, because the few read as the saints are charged to sing, "with the spirit and the understanding also." How Smith would fare to-day as the author of Irving's Broken Heart, or what publisher would be gracious to Jones, author of Cooper's Pioneers, is a curious inquiry. Whether the Ledger, wherein Henry Ward Beecher writes a hay-fever serial, would accept them, or yet any magazine yield them a place with The Luck of Roaring Camp, is not certain. Let us give the men of Lakeside and Riverside the benefit of the doubt.

Among the ways of estimating literary fame are the time-table and long measure. An exemplary dog ordinarily lives longer than a book. Twelve years is a great while in the ephemeral generations of print, and the Methuselahs are rare. A work that can stand the ravages of a century, and then come up somewhere in a man's path like a fresh flower in the spring, and brighten his way and gladden his heart, and with human nature enough in it to live another hundred, has achieved a fame that men agree to call immortality,—a sort of infant immortality in swaddling bands.

As a rule, a popular writer appears greater and grander at a thousand miles than he does at your elbow. He looms. The eagerness of people to subject a favorite to the damaging microscope of daily observation almost always brings its own punishment in one idol less and more bits of broken pottery. The paths of some, to-day, are as rough with them as the road to Jordan. Death and distance are great illusionists, and many a man owes the glamour of his fame to one or the other, and for the same reason,—it keeps him out of sight.

But why these dealings with the dead? Are there not livelier, fresher themes going? The works of Irving and Cooper have long since taken their allotted places in the world of letters. Brave in turkey and gilding they are drawn up in thousands of glittering lines; a little more like Joseph, perhaps, with the strange king upon the throne who knew him not; a little more dust upon them, a little oftener, than there was twenty years ago; but what matters it? When the fine wines in the cob-webbed bottles come up from the bin, there is a brush with the corkscrew ready to your hand. The amber, the crimson, and the golden set themselves aright, and show the drowned sunshine all the same. So, the delicate touch, the apt word, the finished English, the quaint and quiet humor of Irving, are still there. The salty breeze of Cooper's sea-stories has not lost its savor. Natty Bumppo, Leatherstocking, Hawkeye, the Scout, the Pathfinder, the Trapper,—the many-sided man of Otsego,—yet counts five in the roll of manhood.

And this is why. October has a thoughtful way with it. Pansies should be born in October. The woods, trying to remember the colored splendors of the going year, have taken fire, and yet are unconsumed. Maple, poplar, beech and ash tell the story, every one in its own way, and thus it is that there are "tongues in trees." With their dying leaves they repeat the marigolds. They suggest the blush-roses. They rehearse the summer-sunsets. October is a good time for a pilgrimage, and I have just made one to Cooperstown. What you can find in a geography or a tourist's guide, or anybody's Field Book of anything, cannot be found here.

Striking out by an unwonted route from Richfield Springs, where people drink disagreeable water and fan themselves all summer, twelve miles to Cooperstown as the crow flies, if he flies straight, you pass little hamlets you never heard of, noted on the map with a fly-speck of a dot, as Cooperstown might have been but for Cooper and his creations. There is something breezy about hills, even when no wind is blowing. They suggest billows.

As long ago as I hid "The Last of the Mohicans" under the fat copy of Virgil spread open before me in school-time,—Virgil, with a blessed "Ordo" running down the edge of the text, the clew of the labyrinth to take a fellow through the dove-tail terminations out into English light and Latin sense,—before that, Cooperstown was a Mecca to me,—and not to me only, but to thousands. I fancied it was about a mile from the Celestial Gate, and stored with countless wealth. Thence came the books of birds and beasts, the blessed primers thin as gold leaf and quite as precious,—"price one cent;" "price two cents;" "price six cents." But, ah! the last was magnificence, at the cost of a Spanish sixpence, the scale from a little silver fish that had been mentally taken to pieces ever so often, resolved into cents, reduced to mills, and there they were, all rounded into the small flake from the white mines of Peru! Since then I have spent delighted hours before Audubon's Book of Birds, as it leaned up against the wall like a pier-glass. Had the partridge began to drum, nobody could have wondered. But never did that wondrous mimicry of nature give me half the joy that one of those bits of blue-covered primers did, with the imprint, "H. & E. PHINNEY." And here, a while ago, I was riding into Cooperstown in the October sunshine of a perfect day, and, passing along the street, an ancient landmark of a store caught my eye, and across its front was a wooden sign, like a railway passenger with his ticket in his hat-band, and the words upon it were familiar as a nursery rhyme. It was as if somebody you had thought dead full forty years ago should meet you with the old greeting. The sign was "in words and letters following, to wit": H. & E. PHINNEY. The pack of care and time I had been carrying tumbled off in an instant, like Christian Pilgrim's knapsack of sin, and again I was the beatified master of a silver sixpence. This was the place, then, whither the jingling treasures in the pockets of my blue-striped trousers found their way, and whence, in the old time, came those thin-leaved tracts of boyish happiness! The modern stores, the fine old mansions, the grand hotels, all faded out like a mirage, and, for the moment, nothing remained of Cooperstown but the old sign.

We passed an ancient church-yard, where, like lambs around the door, stood the white tablets of the forefathers. But the slabs leaned hither and thither, as if they would lay the heavy emphasis of marble Italics upon human forgetfulness. And there lies the dust of the novelist! The living world has closed around the disused acre, but I had found the resting-place of him with whom, many a year ago, by the magic of his story, I had wandered in the wilderness; who had halted my heart many a time in hours of mystery and danger; had quickened it to exultation in the triumphing right, and inspired me with a love for American scenery by forest and prairie, by valley and mountain; with an admiration for American purpose and prowess everywhere, that have never perished. His pictures were appeals for things noble and lovely, and of good report. He suggested no evil. He mosed over no wrong. In all English-speaking lands he compelled recognition of the truth that an American could write an American novel, that, owing nothing to the old world, should spring as naturally from the soil as the elms and pines of Otsego. A gay and gilded omnibus rattled by, blazoned with HOTEL FEN-NIMORE. Italics and great capitals,—weeds unrebuked and the pride of life. “So runs the world away!”

The last trace of the old Cooper mansion is obliterated. Fire began it. Innovation completed it. Nothing remains but to sow it with salt. The classic grounds have been virtually slashed with a public street, as a saber-stroke seams and disfigures a noble face, and houses stand about, and look foolishly at each other, as if they were ashamed of it. Even some of the old ancestral trees, they say, have been deemed cumberers of the ground, and have gone up sooty kitchen-chimneys in smoke. Nothing of all this is half so wonderful as where the willing hands were folded, that the spot was not rescued from oblivion; and where the taste had vanished that would have made a Leatherstocking Park, and thronged it with the creations of Cooper’s genius; embodied his characters in marble and bronze, civilized, savage and sailor, the red, white and blue of his stories, and deeded it all to the people forever.

Then we crossed a picturesque ravine, and wound along the base of the wooded hills, Otsego’s classic water at the left, turned golden wine in the descending sun; and, terrace above terrace, the city of the silent at the right. The very water where the canoes of the wilderness glided with an arrow's silence. The very city where, among the sighing pines, and the flickering shadows blown about upon the ground and spotted with fallen leaves by October winds, Cooper's monument stands forth. It is an eloquent piece of work. Eloquent, not so much in what is graven as in what is left unsaid. No word but COOPER. No name his mother called him by. No date of birth or death. Why should there be? In everything that makes true living he is not dead. Leatherstocking, in his fringed hunting-suit and frowzy cap,—as classic, every whit, as the robe of the Roman,—his faithful friends, the dog and rifle, bearing company, surmount the shaft. Emblems of Cooper's works by ship and shore emboss the monument with brief biography. The word Otsego had a meaning once, of salutation and honor. The red-man's courtesy is in order to-day, and so let me say, Otsego to Cooper!

Miles of hill and dale lay between us and rest; the sun was going down, and taking one look more at lake and hill and sky and monument I turned silently away. I had come on a pilgrimage to what men call the Dead. Eating salt at no man's table, entering no abode of the living, welcomed by none, I left Coopers-town, and before many miles were made, night fell down upon all the hills.

CHAPTER XXVI.

CHECKS.

THE CONDUCTOR'S CHECK.

WRITING of checks: I was a passenger on the Cincinnati and Sandusky railroad, where the conductor gives no check, but takes your ticket, looks you over for a second and passes on. It is a great comfort all around. It saves you the annoyance of a conductor's feeling about for some place to stick a label, red, white, blue, or yellow as a daisy, as if you were a package of goods consigned to somebody. It always gives me a bit of spiteful satisfaction when the conductor finds a hat without any band, or a band stitched so snugly that he cannot embellish it with a check. It delights me to see him give little jabs with his parallelogram of pasteboard around that hat's equator without finding a place to put it, and then irritably hand it to the passenger with a gesture of expostulation.

Did you ever watch a woman look for her check when the conductor demands it? She has no hat-band, thank fortune and fashion! but what to do with it is a conundrum. She holds the representative of money paid and miles to ride in her hand a little while. Then, tired of that, she wedges it between her glove and the palm of her hand; or she puts it in her portemonnaie or her reticule or her lunch-basket or her handbox or her pocket. If very primitive, she thrusts it in her bosom or knots it up in a corner of her handkerchief, as old grandmothers used to tie up their money. Perhaps she gives it to the baby for amusement, and the youngster plays paper-mill with half of it. She sticks it in a crack of the window for security, and it slips down upon the floor. She steps out into the aisle, adjusts her skirts, and makes a dip and a plunge under the seat for it. Rescued, she impales it with a pin upon the side of the car, and it jars out into her lap in a mile. She catches it, and gropes for her basket, overturns a sandwich, two pickles, a stratum of cheese and a doughnut, and deposits it in the very bottom of the geological formations. That miserable bit of paper is the most troublesome of all her possessions.

She is glad it is an "Indian gift," that the conductor did not present it to her outright, that he will relieve her of it in due time, but by-and-by she is sorry she was glad. There he stands, and he wants that check. She has forgotten what she did with it! She nervously examines her portemonnaie, she overhauls her reticule, she feels in her glove, her pocket, her bosom. She wishes the conductor wouldn't watch her. She could find it quicker if he only wouldn't. At last she unearths it from the big basket, smelling of vinegar and cheese and nutcakes, and stained with a drop of jelly, like "the damned spot" upon the little hand of Shakespeare's monster, Lady Macbeth, that would not "out," and presents it with a sigh of relief to the impatient official. Nibbled at one end and soiled at the other, he tears it in three pieces, and hastens along; and the woman wonders why upon earth he troubled her to keep it, when he didn't want it himself.

Yonder is a young woman who has traveled. She pins the check upon her shawl the minute she gets it, like an order of nobility, and thinks no more about it. She does not care the pin that holds it whether the conductor ever gets it or not. All the timid women and the elderly women envy her. Here is a man who consigns that check to his tin tobacco-box, and snaps the cover together with a click. Unhappy is he whose check the conductor took from his hat-band while he nodded, as even Homer is said to do; taken as was the rib from Adam, but with no hope of a recompense so pleasant as Eve. He wakens with a start, throws up a hand instinctively to his hat, for he knows he has been "in the land of Nod," feels nothing, whips off the castor, and gives it three complete revolutions before he is convinced that the check has utterly gone, and then falls to searching in all his pockets and around the neighborhood, glances suspiciously at its inhabitants to see who took it, gives the hat another hopeless twirl, and then waits helplessly for the conductor that never comes back, and so the passenger escapes safely from the car at his destination, ignorant what became of that check.

THE BANK CHECK.

Of all checks bank checks are the pleasantest. Almost every boy has written out one of them for a million or so, upon the Bank of Nowhere, and put his name to it just to see how it would look. I wonder how a man feels who can fill in a slip of paper with such words and figures, to wit, as "ten thousand dollars—$10,000," and have some paying teller wet his fingers and count them out the minute it is presented. It must be a warming sort of sensation, like a mustard-plaster applied to a cold place. Is that why wealthy men are called "warm"?

Girls never do that. They never write make-believe checks, for they hope to live till somebody pens genuine checks for them, and saves them the trouble and the—expense.

Are you ever made game of by autograph-hunters? Do they come at you with a pen, a pocket-inkstand with a screw cover, and a narrow book containing everybody's name "his mother called him by"? Are you an impecunious poet or a peripatetic lecturer, or something of that sort? If you are, then you have. That putting your signature to nothing is a flattering business before twenty-five and a stupid one after two-score. The writer hopes the reader's name is not found in many autograph albums, belauzeled, bedoved and beharped on the covers, and gilt-edged, like Orange county butter, because, as a rule, you don't find a name good for much on a bank-check flourishing in an album. Whether or not it is because the owner is afraid somebody will steal the autograph and put it where "it will do the most good," I cannot tell.

It must be pleasant to be able to make a check. It is something like earning the money, and then issuing the currency yourself. I am not quite sure it would not be a luxury to put a dollar into some bank just for the sake of checking it out. But there is always a time in a man's life, and it is not in the beginning of it, when these slips of paper, even with seven figures on them besides the pair for cents, look microscopically worthless, and that is when, in language more current than classic, he is summoned "to pass in his checks"; when the word is "checkmate!" and the end comes. A man has recently gone who could have drawn a check that would have bought Louisiana at its old price, and fenced Rhode Island, and filled a great State with homes for the poor, and founded a great library. He dealt in hot water, boiling water, winged water, all his days, and steamed with unparalleled swiftness to a fortune so stupendous that he reckoned his life not by years, but by millions. He checked out a church and a university as if they had been trifles. But then he was a long time on the track. He bought and sold speed as if it were a commodity, but he could not "make time" himself.

TRUNK CHECKS.

There is a jingle as of dull bells, and a man enters the car, dragging after him a frame hung with geography tumbled to pieces, picked up, graven upon bits of brass, and hung upon leather straps. And the man says, "Check y'r baggage!" Your thought climbs a flight of garret stairs somewhere, and stands by a little calfskin trunk with the hair on, and your name lettered with brass nails on the cover, "A. B. C." That was all the check anybody had thirty years ago. Fancy a man — fancy two hundred men — looking for "A. B. C." in a through baggage-car! Put a brass ornament on that home-body of a trunk, and, calf as it is, it will reveal powers of going abroad that are marvelous. It will travel like a thing with brains, in a sort of intelligent manner, from Maine to the Florida reefs, and there you will find it waiting for you, chafed as to its epidermis, weak and jingling of a hinge, perhaps, but then there.

How many men have themselves checked through a line of policy, regardless of friends, foes or consequences! Put brazen labels on their heresies and set thém going!

BLUE CHECK.

In Ohio I saw a girl in a span-clean checked apron that went around her waist with a string; the old-fashioned sort, made of numberless and undivided checker-boards, with the little blue and white squares alternating with mathematical precision. The sight of that apron would have taken you back to an older wearer of a similar garment, who brought apples from the orchard in it, and white maple-chips from the woodpile, and picked peas in it upon a pinch, and gathered eggs in it from the haymow, and spread it smoothly and decorously over her lap when she sat, and her knitting-work reposed in it; and sometimes a cat, marked like her best Sunday comb, would assay a slumber upon its checkered existence, and be whisked off in a second. You have seen that apron flung over its owner's head like "the knitted cloud" of modern times, when she went to the next neighbor's. That apron has wiped away the tears of your childish sorrow, when they ran down your face, and your clamorous tongue ran out at each corner of your mouth between the syllables of lamentation and licked them in! You see where she laid it when its work was done. You saw where they laid her when her work was done. There is a whole system of mnemonics in those blue and white checks.

"CHECK."

So says the reader who has come bravely on to this paragraph, and check it is.

Check!

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 012 226 527 4

