It is supposed that this caused the withdrawal of Cardwell's motion to censure the ministry.

The New York Times's correspondent of the same date, says that considerable uneasiness is felt and displayed at the British Embassy in Washington lest a collision should occur in the Gulf between English and American war vessels before Lord Napier's dispatches can reach the British Admiral. These dispatches were to be sent by a special steamer from Halifax to Bermuda.

There was a rumor current—which proved to be unfounded—that a collision had already occurred in the Gulf between the Fulton and the Style.

Murder and Suicide.

A frightful murder and suicide was committed at West Troy, New York, on Saturday evening week. A woman named Catharine Reed, who had left her husband on account of ill treatment, was residing there in the family of a Mr. Mowers.

About 9 o'clock Saturday night Reed came to Mowers's house, and inquired of Mrs. Mowers, who was standing at the door, if Catharine Reed was in. She, seeing that he was excited, and imagining that he was intoxicated, said she was not. Reed uttered an oath; told Mrs. Mowers she lied, and rushed into the inner room on the lower floor, where his wife was partially undressed and preparing to go to bed, with a child of Mrs. Mowers. A long conversation ensued between the parties, which Mrs. Mowers, who was in the next room, did not attend to, although she could hear the voices quite plainly. All at once she heard a scuffle, and rushing into the room, saw that Reed had drawn a dirk with a blade some five inches in length, and was in the act of dealing successive blows with it upon himself and wife. Speechless with horror, she ran out and brought in her husband, who was just entering the gate at the time, and on entering the room, it was found that the wretched man had given himself seven wounds, and was lying in a pool of his own blood. In less than five minutes he expired. The wounds, eight in number, one of which alone would have produced death, were not jagged or rough, but the blade had been ground to a point every time, showing what determined will the wretched suicide must have possessed.

Catharine Reed, his victim, was found to have received distinct stabs, nearly every one in a vital part of the neck, chest and stomach. The poor woman was raised upon the bed in the room, and her wounds were found to be alive. The neighbors were around and sympathized with her. She languished until midnight in great agony, when death took place.
