*WHILE yet from far we hear the sullen waves
 That beat along the weary shores of life,
 And still the murmur of the coming strife
 Is but a sound for us, we that still be Within the precincts of thine old grey walls,
 O Haileybury, give thee heartfelt thanks ;
 Thanks for the manhood thou hast striven to raise,
 Thanks for the word, perchance in other days
 To blossom into deed ; and when, as men, Mayhap grown grey of years, we come again
 And wander through the playing fields once more,
 And hear the boyish laughter as of yore,
 Or turn aside with eyes and heart half-sad
 That such sweet idle hours are done for us ;
 And enter where the shadowed dome of prayer
 Stands golden-crossed aloft in sunny air,
 Then shall grey-headed manhood kneel and pray
 That, 'ere the peril of his future way,
 Each lad may learn to choose the noblest goal,
 And grave thy "Sursum Corda" on his soul.*

SOLITUDE.

THE sun had dipt behind, an Alpine crest, Leaving one blush on the last belt of snow,
That softly lay against the cold clear west.

All else was dark ; no sound of streamlet's flow Rose from the depths of the ravine below.
The slumb'rous pines became weird shadowy forms,
And in the death-deep calm forgot past storms.

Then, slowly 'merging from the hollow gloom,
On dusky pinions flapping round and round
With sudden swoop, two mountain vultures loom Above the precipices silence-bound,
Wheeling this way and that, as though they found No other scope for their ill-boding flight
But in the awful spaces of the night.

Until at length a smile of dawn began
To flicker on the snows, and as it stole
From peak to peak and quite removed the ban,
The mountains, like some great sad human soul,
From which long-brooding clouds of sorrow roll,
Looked up upon the sky's fresh face above,
All happy for the sweet return of love.

THE SLUGGARD.

AWAY with the Sluggard, who drowsily sleeps Till the chapel warningly rings,
Then quick from the mattress he hurriedly leaps,
And hastens to pull on his things.

He tugs at his boots with a strength of despair, Gets perfectly wild with the laces ;
The labouring linen subsides in a tear,
And crack go the much-mended braces.

Then a hunt for the tooth-brush, till losing all hope,

He discovers it under his bed ;

Just a swish of the sponge, and a twirl of the soap,
And he hurriedly towels his head.

Then the buttons fly here and the collar stud there,

As he enters his shirt with a rush ;

And, supposing there's time, he will favour his hair

With a cursory sweep of the brush.

Then his tie must be tied, and his waistcoat pulled on,

And his cap (which was lost in the fray) ;

And his coat, but the buttoning needn't be done :
It will do very well on the way.

Then away to the chapel ; he's nearly got there,

When the pitiless clock sounds his knell,

And Campbell stands by with a business-like air, Triumphantly tinkling his bell.

THE RIVER.

DOWN from the rocks with music making murmur, Then through the green fields, bubbling o'er the pebbles ;
Swelled here and there by other little streamlets, Flows on the river.

Now through some garden full of coloured flowers,
Where, in the summer, basking in the shadows,
Birds, of a plumage brilliant, pour their ditties
Into the welkin.

Now through the woodlands, where the sacred Naiads
Lead up their dances on thy mossy margin ;
Then when they've finished, dip their virgin bodies
Into the water.

Here now a grayling sleeps among the rushes ;
Here on thy waters floats a swan majestic :
Thus flows the fleeting river, till at length it Reaches the ocean.

THOMAS PERCY SWIFT.

The nurse of the children ward.

FORGIVEN, NOT FORGOTTEN.

CHILD of the dark eyes, do you know What it is makes me kiss you so?
 'Tis that your eyes are dark and deep,
 And Love in their low depths seems to sleep
 As in those of my love when he kissed me so,
 Long ago, ah, long ago!

Child of the dark hair, can you guess
 Why from your head I cut a tress?
 Because his lock of the same dark hue
 I burnt in scorn when he proved untrue;
 But now I could look on it calmly, so,
 It was so long, so long ago!

ISAMON.

so dear to my foolish fancy grew

SONG.

So long have I missed thee, come once more,
 Spirit of holy wonder ;
 Bring back to this dull cold heart of mine
 The magic glow of the soft sunshine
 And the cataract's voice of thunder.
 Show me new depths of mystic lore
 In the heart of the sea, on the face of the shore ;
 Spirit of wonder, come once more !

Thou that dost haunt the child's still mind
 As the dawn of his years is breaking,
 And the eyes of womankind fathomless,
 Through a depth of love they would fain express,
 When first love's voice is speaking :
 Come to the older world-worn mind,
 Lest a film spread over and make it blind
 To all that is fair before and behind.

HERODOTUS AT ATHENS.

FROM "HERODOTUS," PRIZE POEM, 1876.

* * * * *

AND, when the plaudits of the crowd are still,
 A stranger rises, whom they do not know.
 With thrilling voice, and words that seem to fill Each heart with eager longing, till they grow
 All wrapt in listening, and the words still flow In limpid eloquent streams, he leads them on Through all their history's maze, till o'er him slow

Outspreads the radiance of the setting sun, While peals his clear voice out the tale of Marathon.

And they had sat long hours until this,
 The climax of his story; they had heard
 Of giant town and giant wilderness,
 With wistful wonder, till that magic word Burst from his lips. Then, with one impulse stirred,

Ten thousand tongues were loosed with shouts that fell

Upon the evening air, and undeterred

For all he waved them back, the rushing swell

As one in triumph bore him to the citadel.

They gave him talents of the golden dower

That Athens treasured, crowned his flowing hair,

Unshorn from many wanderings ; his hour

Of triumph dawned at last, to make repair

For all the toils that he had vowed to bear.

Alas for earthly joys so soon o'erthrown !

Alas for man's ingratitude ! so near

The goal of happiness, that was to crown

The cycle of his toils, and yet 'twas ne'er his own.

For glory is not lasting until death

Has set his seal upon it ; so it fell

That he was stricken by the envious breath

That jealousy out-poured. O was it well ?

O Athens ! Athens ! did thy pride rebel,

And turn from him thou shouldst have adored ?—

His throne should have been in thy citadel,

His feast for ever at thy public board,

Among the heroic band thou lovest to reward.

* * * * *

Yet shalt thou be remembered, for the birth
Of History was with thee ; and so, where'er
Men read the story of this ancient earth,
To thee their hearts turn fondly, to revere Thy greatness, and to pay thy wrongs a tear.
Hadst thou not been, then all those things of yore
Were perished quite ; but now from year to year
Men build on stones that thou hast laid before,
And echo in new tales thy word for evermore.

SESQUIPEDALIA.

O WONDERS sure will never cease,
 For words it seems do still increase,
 We're all so good and wise and grand ;
 But Sesquipedalian crack-jaw jargon, Cunningly hodge-podged Latin and Greek,
 In bombastical twaddle we're all so far gone,
 With our modern enlightened bubble and squeak !

There once was a town called London, they say,
 But that place has long been improved away,
 And we worship with pride black leagues of streets,
 Where all that is modern and civilised meets.

Our "great metropolis" glorious jargon, etc.

If a more than usually muddled noddle
 On things in general pours out twaddle, Setting right everything under the sun,
 Oh no ! of him we never make fun.

For it's "Sociology" wonderful jargon, etc.

The "mob" is a term we never repeat,
 And the "rabble" has long been obsolete ;

For the ruling class that we all adore
Must have their syllables, five or more.

As the "Proletariat," Frenchified jargon, etc.

We've no "Dissenters"—syllables three Won't do for those excellent men, you see,
So we give them a much more imposing name,
Though the sense, to be sure, is precisely the same.

Of "Nonconformity," pompous jargon, etc.

Ah, great was the man, surpassingly great,
Who coined from his Sesquipedalian pate
A word that should dazzle and awe and stun That word of power, that wonderful "Un-Denominationalism,"—for jargon, etc.

Then hail to the quacks that are mending our tongue,

To the scribes that have scribbled, the bards that have sung,

To Moses and Son, and to Rowland and Co.,
And may civilisation unceasingly grow.

With its Sesquipedalian mouth-filling jargon, Cunningly hodge-podged Latin and Greek,

In bombastical twaddle we're all so far gone,

With our modern enlightened bubble and squeak!

SONG.

I REMEMBER low on the water,
They hung from the dripping moss ;
In the broken shrine of some stream-god's daughter,
Where the North and South roads cross.
And I plucked some sprays for my love to wear,
Some tangled sprays of the maidenhair.

So you went North with the swallow,
Away from this southern shore,
And the summers pass and the winters follow,
And the years, but you come no more.—
You have roses now in your breast to wear,
And you have forgotten the maidenhair.

And the sound of echoing laughter,
The songs that we used to sing ;
To remember these in the days long after,
May seem but a foolish thing.
Yet I know to me they are always fair,
My withered sprays of the maidenhair.

A HAILEYBURY YARN.

DID you ever hear tell of the chivalrous feat Performed long ago by a 'Burian lad, Who challenged, and battled, and managed to beat

In a fair stand up fight a big Hertfordshire cad.

It isn't recorded at all that I know of,
 But though unrecorded its something to crow of:
 And if you will pardon the faults of writing,
 I'll spin you the yarn of this wonderful fighting.

'Sixty-three was the year,
 There was terrible feud,
 'Twixt the boys at the school
 And the Bucolic brood ;
 And rarely there passed
 The half of a day,
 But news would be told
 Of a terrible fray.

At night, in the studies, shins damaged were bared,

Bruised noses exhibited, black eyes compared ;

Although all was done both by Prefect and Master,
 The war went on fiercer and hot blood ran faster, Till at length it became quite the recognized thing
 If college met cad—to go at it full swing.

One day in December, Anno 'Sixty-three A small college boy with the house cap at Price—
 (Now called, I think "Colvin") in innocent glee Was sliding about on the "College Arms" ice.
 He slid and he whistled, his heart was so light,
 Nor had he the remotest idea of fight :
 But as ill-luck would have it, there came by that way,
 Some young men of Hertford, all ripe for a fray ;
 And they spotted the college boy sliding in glee, Young, blooming, and joyous, as schoolboy should be.
 Said they, "Here's a lark ! He's alone, and we're ten,
 He is but a kid, all of us here are men ;
 We've most of us suffered at one time or other
 From the fists and the stones of the college ;

Let's have our revenge without any more bother,
And spifflicate him out of knowledge."

But the young 'un was wary and saw their device,
And, whistling nonchalantly, slipped off the ice,
And sauntered away with a hand in each pocket,
When whiz!—there came by with the force of a rocket

A stone-weighted snowball, a mummified cat,
A shower of stones, and a nasty brickbat.

"Ten to one," thought the young 'un, "that's rather long odds,

But those who die young are beloved of the gods,
And if they must swash me, why, let 'em come now,

I can't get away, so I'll hazard the row."

So he cocked his Price cap with an action defiant,
As if they were pigmies and he was a giant,
And faced them—"Look here, I can't quite fight the lot,

But you'll see what I'll do with the biggest you've got."

At first they all whispered, for nobody dared, When a big doughty baker stepped forth and prepared,

By tucking up sleeves and anointing his fists,
To batter the college boy out of the lists.

II.

Like the sail of a windmill
Round went the cad's arm :.
But the young 'un smiled calmly,
Nor felt he alarm,
For Campbell had taught him that Beef's worth is nil
When brought against science and pluck in a mill.
So the brave little champion danced like a cork,
And let the cad pump himself out with hard work :
Which he did very much, to his backer's chagrin,
Who brought him a pint from the "College Arms" Inn,
And didn't improve his condition, for soon
He wobbled about like a wounded balloon ;
And the young 'un, all smiles, was as fresh as a lark,
And keeping his muscles and wind in the dark, Till he saw a good chance, then he let out his right,
And landed it on his foe's organ of sight ; Then he danced out of reach on the tips of his toes,
And tapped him a playful one straight on the nose.

The Baker-man pounded and blustered and swore,
And ran perspiration at every pore ;
He couldn't get near the small 'Burian boy,
If he had—he'd have crushed him, of course, like a toy.

With halloo and cry,
His friends standing by Endeavoured to put some pluck into his soul ;

But the blows came so fast,
And his wind wouldn't last,
And one eye was no good,
And a torrent of blood

From his nose down his waistcoat began for to roll.

The little white fists went home at each blow ;

The Baker went in and attempted a throw ;

But the young 'un was quick, and in less than a trice

Brought the Hertfordshire cad with a thump on the ice.

Then mark!—and please blush as the deed I record—

Like a chivalrous knight who abandons his sword
When his rival is down, and who stoops by his side
To stem with his kerchief the fast ebbing tide,
The College boy stooped where the baker still lay Inert, without breath, like a carcass of clay,

And lifted his head. With an oath the great brute Kicked the lad on the face with his iron-shod foot !
And the chivalrous friends who were standing around,
With a triumphant howl bore the boy to the ground.
He would ne'er have got up, but two prefects came by,
Saw the hubbub, and both heard the boy's piteous cry ;
Right and left 'mongst the cowards they hammered about,
And bore the young hero triumphantly out.

So ended the fight, and no Hertfordshire cad
For years dare encounter a 'Burian lad :
And altho' the story is well-nigh forgot,
At the "College Arms" Inn they still show you the spot Where the young 'un of Price's won deathless renown,
By knocking the big Hertford Bakerman down ;
And some, who are Old Haileyburians now, Will p'raps, when they read this, remember the row.

OLIM HAILEYBURYENSIS.

IN MEMORIAM.

LIEUTENANTS MELVILL AND COGHILL, KILLED JANUARY 22ND, 1879.

THEY died,
Their glory won ;
Honour was satisfied
And duty done !

We found them with the colours of their land, Untarnished by the murderous Zulu's band ;
And England's mighty bosom glows with pride
To know how well her gallant striplings died.

Why weep ?

We all must die,
And in the dreamless sleep
Of destiny

Those who would rest the calmest sure are they Whom duty unto death hath called away ;
Whose glorious deeds, through Fame's emblazoning pen,
Inspire the minds and touch the hearts of men.

O Grave !
At Honour's beck
The spirits of our brave Despise thy check !
The fadeless star of many a gory plain O'er Isandula's battle gleams again ;
And still for England will her soldiers ride
To do and die, as Melvill, Coghill, died !

THE BUTTERFLY'S EPITAPH.

MOURN him ! ye lilies pure,
Oft hath his blood-hued wing
Lain on your snowy breast,
Or in the sunset light
Flaunted its beauty.
Mourn him ! ye twilight airs ;
Fold up those broidered wings Softly and tenderly,
For they shall never more

Waver from bud to bud,
Hang, like a breathing flower,
Over the gardens.
Mourn him ! ye velvet bees ;
Hither bring incense sweet
From your cool-shaded haunts,
That on its fragrancy
He may float upward ;
Up from the murm'ring fields,
Over the far, white clouds,
Into the sunny blue ;
Into that dreamy land Where poets dwell, and where Butterflies die not.

TOM and Will
Had ate their fill.
In ten minutes and a quarter,
Tom outstripped
Poor Will, who slipped
And ran and got the court, ah !

Goosey goosey gander, Whither shall I wander?
 On the heath,
 Or down to Smeath?
 Of the last I think I'm fonder.

Georgie Porgie
 In the remove,
 For fagging thinks He'll show no love.
 When the boys come out to play
 Georgie Porgie runs away.

He-haw!
 Fingers sore!
 I cannot write any faster,
 I shall get
 More lines to-day
 Because I've not finished my last, ah!

Boy asleep,
 His place can't keep,
 And don't know how to find it;
 Leave him alone
 And hear him groan,
 When he goes on a page behind it.

“Ba ! Ba ! black sheep
 Do you know the rule ?”
 “Yes, Sir ! N’no S-s-sir !”
 “EXTRA SCHOOL.”

“Why go you so slowly, my little fag ?”
 “Cause I make it a rule on an errand to lag.”
 “Where have you been to, my little fag ?”
 “Been to the grub shop, Sir, for a bag.”
 “What is there in it, my little fag ?” “Don’t you wish you may get it,” replied the small wag.

Holloa across !
 Shout till you’re hoarse !
 Encourage the Twenty the goal-line to cross !
 Rings on their jerseys
 And rings on their hose,
 They shall be famous wherever they goes.

 Old yet wary,
 Where is it your milkcans grow ?
 With the milk you sells,
 Amid shouts and yells,
 To the study-jugs all in a row.

SEA PICTURES.

I.

SUNSET.—CORNWALL.

ONE autumn even from the westmost steep
 I watched the daylight passing o'er the deep ;
 Down from the setting sun the great waves rolled Along its seaward path of molten gold ;
 All the dark ocean-rocks like capes of brass Gleamed where the foam had washed them, and the grass
 Grew glorious with that light, and the long swell, Line after line that followed, rose and fell
 And shattered into frosted gold ; the sky Arched splendour over splendour,—isles that lie
 Of crimson cloudland in pale lakes of blue,— Red bars of flame with one star peering through, Silent for glory, and the sea's monotone Grew past with silence ;—the great world rolled on And the sun watched along the waves, until The glow died upwards on the western hill,
 And the shade saddened over all the sea
 Reaching away, starward, away from me
 Into the twilight and eternity.

TWILIGHT.—NORMANDY.

Late even now, and overclouded skies,
To-night we shall not see the young moon rise ;
The twilight grows, away on either hand
The cliffs are lost in mystic shadowland.
Only low sound of breakers as they die,— Pale shimmer of waters, and a pale still sky,
Where darkness gathers on the moving sea,
And yet the child laughs light of heart with me.
Still deeper now ;—one little brown-sailed bark Glides past us seaward drifting into dark
The only light is on the white sea-foam,
And the lamp by the crucifix :—come home !

“INSCRIPTION ON A BUDDHIST BELL, YEZO, JAPAN.”

ALL things are transient
And being born must die ;
And being born are dead,
And being dead are glad To be at rest.

ἅπαντα ρεῖ· κούδεν μένει πέφυκε γὰρ θανείσθαι· πεφυκότα τέθνηκε, θανόντα κεχάρηκε τυχόνθ' ἔκηλα κείσθαι.

αὔριον ἄδιον.

THE TURN OF THE TIDE.

THE tide is on the turn ; the uncertain sea,
With heavy swell, is swaying listlessly ;
The wandering waves, with soft and gentle plash, Scarce dare to break the stillness, and the wash
Back from the shelving shore, with dreamy rush
Of pebbles, dying to a dreamy hush,

Seems as the faintest echo of the roar
Of beating surf, that crashed upon the shore
But three brief hours ago. With weird, wild cry
The gulls sweep circling through the troubled sky;
All else seems held in mystic silence still,
As 'neath the power of an enchanter's will.

But, lo! from where the craggy forelands bound
The limits of the bay, a rushing sound
Is sudden borne upon the breeze, and wakes
The sea from slumber, and like magic, breaks
The spell that holds the waves. Each billow's crest

Is filled with life, and strives above the rest To rear his frothy top; then rushes on,
In foaming haste, until the shore is won;
To waste its fury 'gainst some sea-worn rock
That countless ages has withstood the shock
Of rushing waves, and hurled them back again
To meet the inflowing current of the main.

BABEL.

HUSHED into stillness lay the midnight plain,
And dark against the purple sky
In lonely majesty,
Towered that wondrous pile—the effort vain
Of a mad world to live in memory.
Rising in tier on tier, and yet again
In gallery on golden gallery,
Sombre and still the proud presumptuous mass
Awaited the loud tumult, and the hand
Of countless workers yet to overpass
All bounds of time, mortality, to stand
Its head among the planets' whirl, its base Firm-fixed to be the wonder of each land.

Around the side ran, sculptured fair,
Old stories of primeval world,
The dark earth wondering at the starry line,
The glory of the orb of day, and there
Those heaven-aspiring angels earthward hurled ;
And rich and rare
The storied walls rose upward, with a stair Enwreathed around them, like the vine,
Close to the windy elm-tree curled,

And drooping in the pauses of the wind Her sunny leaves about the glowing bunches twined.

Far as the verge of sky did reach
The tented myriads lay,
Innumerable as on the rock-bound beach
In some deep-brooding bay,
Before the confusion and rush of the wind
The storm-breakers burst in feathery spray,
And prelude the fury that lingers behind
The utter cloud-darkness in battle array.

Is it a star ! a star !
Or meteor rushing bright !
That shines where constellations are
And grows in light,
Opening, opening like a rose,
Wings are beating the gloom, and close,
And closer an angel silvery white,
With thunder about his feet,
With the beat
Of thunder about his wingéd feet !

He stands on the tower, his eagle eyes
Are fixed on the slumbering plain ;
He sees the farthest tent that glimmering lies,
Dimly shown,
And the wilderness lone

Beyond the uttermost mortal gaze ;
Then his hand he lays On the crown incomplete of the tower ; the first pallid rays
Of the dawn touched his wings, as in thunder he says :—

“ The swift-footed days
Have numbered a time and half a time ;
The Author Sublime
Hath scattered thy glory and shattered thy praise.

“ Confusion and tumult henceforth be thy name,
And the flame
Of discord sever with Babel of sound,
And the flying of camels to find A land beyond the Sun's golden bound,
And to speed on the wings of each hurrying wind, Till after many mad wildering years All ocean and earth shall be calmed, and the blind

Struggle after the vain be lost, and all tears Wiped away in the love of the Infinite Mind,
And the flush of the morning that never dies
From the roseate depths of marvellous skies.”

A flash in the night ! He is gone !
And the plain,
Where the morning is cleaving his way alone

From under a fire-fringed cloud, with a sword
Dew-dripping, and scattering diamond rain Far abroad,
Is shaken with rushing, hurrying feet,
And a clamour as loud as the cry that is blown
From the ocean line of birds, when they beat
The wild breeze,
That roars from over the wind-driven seas,
When they seek like an arrow voluptuous lands
Of low red sunsets and gold-scattered sands,
Where over the valley the mountain stands,
And the incense of flowers ascends up to God,
Where the shadowy spirit of morning hath trod.

Madly they glared at each other ; the blast
Of Heaven's displeasure cold-withering blew,
And at last
The long laden line of camels swift flew,
Some east and some west ;
And the babel of sound
All the still blazing noon
Roared ever around
The motionless pile, till the moon
Gazed down on the ruin of hopes and the ground Bestrewn with the weary unable to fly,
—Over all the deep sky,
And the fire-panting stars that never can die.

CARTHAGE.

FROM "CARTHAGE," PRIZE POEM, 1879.

IMPERIAL city, seated by the flood,
That murmurs 'neath thy palaces and towers,
Where colonnade on colonnaded tier
Lies wavering in the azure tide below,
Not like great Ilion did thy mighty walls Loom into vastness o'er the wondering plain,
To those sweet notes that from his silver lyre Apollo poured, but with laborious toil
Of myriad workers rose the lofty height,
Piled up with marble and barbaric gold,
The wealth of ages. On the southern side
The loving earth spread out, and robbed the sea
Of her embrace, that girdled all the rest.
The ocean in submission kissed her feet,
And rolled the glories of each orient shore
To fill her spacious harbours, where the ships Close-thronged the sky with forests of dark masts, Where toiled the hardy sailor. Through her gates Streamed every morning, when the mighty sun
Awoke the city's roar, a countless throng

Of every nation underneath the sky,
One Babel of innumerable tongues, .
That roared and tossed along the stately streets.
And every morn a hundred victims fell
To Baal, as the glorious God of the day,
And incense from a thousand censers curled
Its smoke to heaven in his stately shrine,
That rose to catch the earliest kiss the sun Glowed on the city. And when the evening star Told of day ended, and the moon upreared
Her cold sad orb, pealed out the hymn of praise,
That incense-wafted soared upon the air
To hail Astarte goddess of the night.

R. H. DOMENICHETTI.

A FACE.

A BROW upon whose broad expanse a toil-worn sorrow lingered,
Yet noble in serenity as ever sculptor fingered, Grave-shadowed eyes, within whose depths a mighty will lay shining, As kindly as a woman's eyes, without their soft repining.
A man in truest truth wert thou, as strong and simple-hearted
As ever martyr, for Christ's sake, to doom and death departed.
O thin grey hairs, grown grey for me, when life and hope were broken, Ye held for me a sanctity unfading though unspoken.
O steadfast eyes, that now are blind to Earth in quiet sleeping, Ye sadden now no more, I trust, at human woe and weeping.
O lips, whose kindly words are dumb to answer
my faint greeting,
I pray that in some future day there be another meeting,
That, with the mists of Earth forgot, in an unclouded weather,
Within the golden courts of God we stand again together.

NIGHT AT AVIGNON.

No cloud between the myriad stars and me,— Soft music waving o'er a sleeping land
 Of winds that fret about the cypress tree,
 And Rhone's swift rapids rippling past the sand.
 Arch over arch, and tower on battled wall,
 Against the violet deepness of the skies ;—
 And one grey spire set high above them all,
 Where round the hill the moon begins to rise.
 An hour's knell rings softly out once more,
 From unseen cloister where the misty bridge
 Fades in the distance of the further shore,
 And nearer spires repeat it o'er and o'er ;
 One great blue star peers through the seaward ridge ;
 A hollow footfall up the echoing street
 Goes wandering out to silence, and the breeze Drops faint and fainter, here beneath my feet
 The grass is all with violets overstrewn ;
 Oh listen, listen, there beneath yon trees
 Do you not hear the lute that lovers use !
 One sets the discord of its strings atune :—
 And in the dreamland of the rising moon
 They sing some olden love-song of Vaucluse.

RENNELL RODD.

SUNSET.

THE shipwrecked sun lay stranded on gloom, Flaming and sinking down to its doom,
With rent cloud-cordage and shattered mast,
Beaten and tost, and vanishing fast
In a billowing stretch of fiery flood,
Where the rugged cliffs of the sky-island stood.
It has sunk ; and the utmost horizon-line
Is feathered and rough with a golden brine, Till softly the heaven's slow-wavering breast,
In a liquid amethyst lulls to its rest,
And deepens to violet-darkening bars,
And, cluster on cluster, the wondering stars
Steal out from the purple immensity ;
And last, like some pinnacle on tropical sea,
By palm-covered islands where nightingales sing,
The mighty moon drifts forth with a swing ;
Then, as though by a soon-wearied wing of wind driven,
Lies bright and becalmed on a fathomless heaven.

"THE POET'S DREAM."

SOME have held that truest motion of the bosom's flight of praise,

With the purest soul-devotion may be caught in Nature's ways.

I remember how a yearning to express her songs aright,

With the summer moons returning, drove me forth into the night.

But the zephyr's soft reproving drove away all touch of pride,

And I felt my doubts removing as I paced the river side :

Watched the pale stars faintly shiver with the gentlest winds that blow,

Till the deep abyss of river seemed afire beneath their glow.

Weeping-willows kissed the ripple as it curled amid the weeds

To a never-ceasing drip of the water in the reeds.

And the night-bird wildly thrilling, with a mind to cleave the sky,
All my raptured soul was filling with a flood of melody.
For the breath of night inspiring to such harmony gave birth,
That it seemed the never-tiring song of heaven,
not of earth.
So I listened to her pealing as I lay in moss and dew,
Till there stole o'er me a feeling such as dreamer never knew.
For a mellow light was streaming from the slowly-rising moon, Showing all the woodland gleaming as in summer's brightest noon ;
Then arose a distant humming as of flower-wooing bees,
And a murmur "we are coming" gently breathéd thro' the trees.
Came about me a bright chorus of a myriad glancing wings
Mid a symphony sonorous raised aloft on clear-toned strings.
"Say what make ye in the gloaming?" "We are spirits of the flowers,

And we drink sweet pleasure roaming thro' our peaceful hallowed bowers.

Now we celebrate the wedding of the lily and the rose ;—

Come! Oh, come and do our bidding, for the brief night quickly goes.

Well we know thou art a poet, with a fancy free and bright ;

Thou hast loved us and we know it; we will make thee ours to-night."

So they led me not unwilling to their deepest, wildest glen,

Where that bird's impassioned trilling caught my wond'ring soul again.

Birds and flowers gaily thronging made a scene
so passing fair,

That my rapt sight knew no longing but to linger ever there.

Loud the harps of flowers were ringing: each shrill warbler tuned his lute ;

Till a hush fell on their singing, and the grove of song was mute.

Then in state upon the waters did I see the lily glide,

While all summer's fairest daughters lay in waiting on their bride.

Some there were, choice fairies, rowing her small bark of reeds and ferns ;

Some with tresses loosely flowing paying homage as she turns.

While he, rosy consort, standing on the mossy bank to grace

His own lily maiden standing, locks her firm in love's embrace.

Long their hymeneal dances wakened echoes in the glen,

Never marred with blighting chances such as cross the ways of men !

Till their queen with aspect loving—"Longer here we may not stay,

For a breath of morn is moving on the eyelids of the day.

To the past has been given what the worldly never see,

Such sweet dreams on summer even in the heart of nature free.

Write of us in burning pages—for thine insight now is true,—

That will live into the ages with a beauty ever new."

Then the spirits with her speaking faded, singing, into air,

And the dawn with golden streaking found me lying lonely there.
To my mind the flowers seemed brighter as they opened to the day,
And the song of birds rang lighter, and the meadows smiled more gay.
With a happier step retreating where I wandered moody last,
I could feel a holy beating in the sunbeams as I passed.

ORPHEUS' SONG.

FROM "THE SIRENS," PRIZE POEM, 1880.

HARK! hark! to the battle the clarions sound, Each warrior prepares him, each steed paws the ground!
Soon, soon shall the earth shake and tremble beneath,
And the eye flashing courage be darkened in death.
O see ye yon field where the valiant lie slain, Where the shield and the sword are strewn thick on the plain?

There chariot and charger are weltering in gore,
And the heroes that slumber shall wake never more.

O give me the life of the helmet and shield,
And the quick-coming death on the corpse-covered field.

'Tis the life of the noble, the life of the brave,
The happiest end, the most glorious grave.
This, this be my lot when the trumpets are pealing,
When rider and steed all around me are reeling,
When brave men stand fast and the timorous fly,
In the thick of the battle to live and to die.

Then sing not of love and of pleasure to me, What rest or what peace have the bold and the free ?

Keep your magic and spells for the coward and slave,

Your mystic enchantments, they charm not the brave.

For there lies a sure talisman deep in the heart,
From the straight path of honour ne'er, ne'er to depart ;

Where danger doth threaten and duty command,
There we fight, there we fall, foot to foot, hand to hand.

LUCCIOLE.¹

FOLLOW where the night-fire leads
 Of the winged Lucciolá,
 Where through waving river seeds
 Water-mirrors wreathed of reeds
 Catch its glimmer from afar ;

Where the falling water plays,
 Up the hillside, ever higher
 In the pathless forest ways
 Every branch is in a blaze
 With the glint of magic fire.

Are they fairies that have flown Stealing glamour from a star, Flitting where wild weeds o'ergrown
 Keep the forest all their own ?
 Tell me of the Lucciolá.

Love, they are as we to-night
 In the branches tossed above,
 Only longing in their flight
 That the moon and stars be bright,
 And the night be long for love.

¹ Fireflies.

Once the Love-God seemed to sorrow
For the tears that he had cost ;
Lending love to those that borrow,
But to lose him on the morrow ;
And the labour he had lost.

Fretting more that true love's sighs,
Go forgotten with the rest,
Fretting that his best work dies,
All the longing of the eyes,
And the thrill from breast to breast.

So, of all good things the giver,
Love gave lovers this fair thing,
That their vows should live for ever
In the lights that glance and quiver
Through the summer night, and spring.

So the loves that rest unbroken Evermore recorded are,
Every word of longing spoken,
Every love-song has its token,
Living in the Lucciolá.

“THE OLD CRIMEA.”

I.

WE were three in a mess together,
 Jack and old Tom and I ;
 Each loved each as a brother,
 Each for the other would die ;
 And now our thoughts oft fly backward
 To the graves where our friends lie low,
 And we think of our old companions
 Who died with their face to the foe.
 Then we drink to the Queen and country :
 We drink to all loved ones dear ;
 And we drink to each old and absent friend,
 But the toast we decree to be kept to the end
 Is “The days of the Old Crimea !”

II.

But Jack's got a wooden leg, lads,
 And old Tom's minus an arm,
 And I am the only one, lads,
 Who escaped without serious harm ;

But I'm not as strong as I was, lads,
 And I've got some proud scars to show,
 For you'll find that a Russian ball, lads, Leaves a mark where it's chanced to go
 Then we drink to, etc.

III.

And here we all sit together,
 Together we mess as of yore,
 And talk of the days gone by, lads,
 The days that shall come no more ;
 And the tear rises up unbidden,
 As we think of those lonely graves
 On the wild bleak shore of the old Crimea, Washed by the Black Sea waves.
 Then we drink to, etc.

FROM THE HILL OF GARDENS.

THE outline of a shadowy city spread Between the garden and the distant hill—
 And o'er yon dome the flame-ring lingers still,
 Set like the glory on an angel's head :

The light fades quivering into evening blue Behind the pine-tops on Janiculum ;
The swallow whispered to the swallow, "Come!"
And took the sunset on her wings, and flew.

One rift of cloud the wind caught up suspending
A ruby path between the earth and sky ;
Those shreds of gold are angel wings ascending
From where the sorrows of our singers lie ;¹
They have not found those wandering spirits yet,
But seek for ever in the red sunset.
Pass upward, angel wings ! Seek not for these,
They sit not in the cypress planted graves ;
Their spirits wander over moonlit waves,
And sing in all the singing of the seas ;
And by green places in the spring-tide showers,
And in the re-awakening of flowers.
Some pearl-lipped shell, still dewy with sea foam,
Bear back to whisper where their feet have trod ;
They are the earth's for evermore ; fly home !
And lay a daisy at the feet of God.

MORNING ON THE THAMES.

'TIS early morning on the Thames. The sky
 Is cloudless, but a haze o'er all on high Lies brooding,—as it were a lovely maid
 In all her wedding bravery arrayed, Drooping around her head, a veil of white
 Can scarce conceal her beauty from our sight.
 The sun is shining softly through the mist ;
 So warm and kind, as if in love he kissed
 The veil which part obscured his daughter's charms,
 And, melting it away, sprang to her arms.
 Around, the eye a fairy forest marks
 The masts and rigging of the countless barks That lie asleep, as if with labour spent.
 How shall we tell whence each one's course was bent ?
 Perchance this sailed from Ind or Araby, Making long furrows in the fitful sea ;
 Or from those regions where the Icy Queen Sits undiscovered midst the North Star's sheen.

But look! the air is clearing,—bathed in gold,
The fringing of the curtain that has rolled
From off the scene, tower and fretted spire
Each gleam and flash and glow as if on fire;
And fairest of all those that meet our sight
Westminster stands, the home of law and right.
There that vast fane lifts up its shapely dome,
So dear a sight to all who know a home
In happy England;—here a different scene Looms through the distance,—many a king and queen,
And many a scion of a noble race
Have here met death's grim horrors face to face;
The Tower of London looking sternly down
Over the water with relentless frown.
And that dark gate, like ogre's fangèd jaws, Through which poor wretches that forsook the laws
Of Justice and their Nation sadly passed, Knowing full well that journey was their last.
Here anchored calmly by the river's side,
Their service done, watching with father's pride England's young seamen, who are called to keep Unsullied her bright name upon the deep,
Lie the vast hulks of warrior ships, that bore
The brunt of battle and the cannon's roar.

But see! far out beyond this busy rush Of men and ships, stilled in a quiet hush,
The mouth of the great river,—all is rest ;
Some scattered boats lie on the water's breast ;
The river shimmers in the dancing light,
Reflecting their bright canvas ;—'tis a sight
Might well be honoured by the painter's art ;
Such calm repose would soothe the troubled heart, Plunging all woe and sorrow's gnawing pain
Into deep Lethe, ne'er to rise again.

“Y^E ANCIENTE CRICKET MATCH.”

ONCE on a time the Heroes sent to the gods in Heaven
 A challenge (so the legend goes) to play with their Eleven
 A match at cricket. 'Tis of this of which I mean to tell,
 And beg you listen patiently to all that then befell.

 Which made all Heaven's well-wishers with satisfaction gleam ;
 That post to old Odysseus, the heroes did assign,
 Who upon earth was held to be the “champion”
 of that time.
 Punctual at noon Odysseus, he of the many wiles,
 Came up to Zeus to toss, his face all wreathed in smiles—

Up from his finger spun the coin, "Heads!
Heads!" cried Zeus, like thunder, But down upon the grass it fell with tails up and heads under.

Odysseus stooped and from the grass his drachma up did pick,
Which he had weighted cunningly—though 'twas a dirty trick.

"We'll take first innings, Zeus," he said, "the ground is nice and fast, But Styx is likely to overflow, and then it will not last."

(For Pluto offered his own ground, by Charon kept so trim,
His worthy ground-man, who for years and years had lived with him.)

"Now, Heracles," Odysseus said, "in first we two will go,
And break the bowling of the gods, that is the thing you know."

So to the wickets first they went to face the skilful bowling
Of Pluto with his "undergrounds" and Zeus' round-arm trolling.

Pluto began and rattled down three maiden daisy-cutters,

The fourth sharply returned to him the trundler badly butters,
For straight from Heracles' bat it flew with fearful force,
And, to say truth, old Pluto feared a bit to stay its course ; Straight to the boundary it flies (the umpire callesth four),
But trying to repeat the stroke, he is out "leg before."
Then out came Philoctetes, a very steady bat,
A dodgy bowler too, who once ere this had bowled a hat ;
Ajax too came to run for him, as he had hurt his foot,
Indeed he suffered no slight pain in putting on a boot,
But Zeus objecting said, it was not what he called cricket,
So Philoctetes had to run himself between the wicket.
Soon in the middle of the pitch Laertes' wily son, Placing the ball judiciously, quick started for a run,

“Yes, yes,” he shouted, “No, no, no,” the other did exclaim,

“Those short ones, really, I can’t run, I am so very lame.”

“Come on, come on ;” “No, no, go back ; I cannot start so soon,

I cannot do it even yet (he said, οὐδὲ καὶ νῦν.)”

“’Tis no use now,” Odysseus said, “ὄλωλα, I’m undone,

But if you’d only come at first there was an easy
run.”

So next in comes Prometheus, he who had great forethought,

Who not alone men fire did give, but also cricket taught.

“Good morning, Philoctetes, I see you’re very lame,

But Æsculapius, if you ask, will put you right again.”

Quickly the great physician came running from long-leg,

“Tell me,” said he, “the boon from me which you would beg.

Ah, yes,” he said, “I see, your state we’ll quickly alter,

By the mere application of sawdust and cold water.”

Thus did his great Forethought restore the bats-man's toes,

Truly the poet says all boons are ἐκ προμηθέως Well did these two now bat and quickly raise the score,

By ones and twos, by threes and fours, till it was eighty-four.

Change after change was tried, but still the runs came fast,

Till Zeus again the leather took, and then their day was past.

With fearful force he bumped them down in front of his own toes,

And straight for poor Prometheus' head the whizzing leather goes.

Insensible upon the ground the wounded batsman fell—

Yet that Zeus pleased at this did feel, 'tis only right to tell,

“Take that,” he muttered, “and next time don't you be so officious ;

If I can do ditto again, why that will be delicious.”

So poor Prometheus from the ground they bore but scarce alive,

And to his name was registered “retired hurt, thirty-five.”

His place was filled by Briareus, who snicked a lucky four,
But was not destined after this to add unto his score :
A bumpy one from Zeus just grazed a stragglng hand,
In truth, 'twas hard to miss that limb, so wide it did expand ;
Proteus, who stands behind the stumps six yards or thereabout, Catches the ball, appeals "How's that?" and Minos gives it "out."
Ajax and Atreus, who came next, did nothing worth relating ;
But Philoctetes' play was fine, especially his placing.
Still he received but poor support, till Polyphemus came,
The cricket shewed by Sisyphus and Atlas being tame :
The first amassed a careful "duck ;" the second only four,
And thus, with two more to go in, at 90 stood
the score.
But now another stand was made, and ringing are the cheers,

As on the board, at half-past one, the century appears.

Old Polyphemus did not take much time to get his eye in :

He had but one, a big one though, and that there's no denying.

To all points of the field he hit, right lustily and hard,

Yet to the rules by most observed, paid not the least regard.

Wides to the off sped by long-on, and straight ones to long-leg,

Yet never to the bowler says, "Your pardon I would beg."

He only chuckles, and says, "I make my runs where'er I can ;

You say I pull, but I merely hit παρὰ προσδοκίαν."

At length, in rushing out to hit a full-pitch to the ropes,

He misses, but not it his stumps (alas for human hopes !).

The veteran Nestor now whipped in, but stayed not very long,

But after making four more runs, unluckily played on.

Thus to one hundred and two score the total did amount,
Of which as much as sixty-two are due to the account
Of Philoctetes, who went in when the first wicket fell,
And ever since had played the game both pluckily and well.

And now the bell for luncheon rings, but it were long to tell
All that in this important match each cricketer
befell ;
How, when the gods came out to bat, Zeus hit in wondrous style,
And with Pan's aid and careful play defied their foes awhile ;
How Bacchus came upon the ground in a disgraceful state—
How much he drank at luncheon-time, 'twere shocking to relate ;
How all the time he shouts, "ὦ παῖ, ὦ παῖ, bring me to quaff
Another cotyl—mind it's iced—of foaming shandygaff ;"
How to the wicket in his turn, a sorry sight, he reeled,

But soon returned for having been "obstructive to the field ;"

How, after this, among the gods a panic then set in,

Each one returning back again, as fast as he went in.

Suffice to say that, when it seemed the gods must be disgraced,

Old Tantalus, the team's last hope, fearless his captain faced.

Slowly but surely mounts the score ; at length they want but three—

They win, they lose, a hundred times, whichever will it be ?

"Back up, back up," is heard around, from the excited crowd :

It reaches Tantalus' ears,—Fools that ye spake so loud.

But see Odysseus takes the ball, and to the wicket hies,

As if to bowl. Out of his ground rashly the batsman flies.

Round on his heel Odysseus spins, the ball still in his hand ;

In vain poor Tantalus turns back, he slips, he cannot stand,

And now upon the turf he falls, and as he helpless lies,

Trumphantly Laertes' son unto the Heroes cries,
"I think, my boys, we've won this match!" and off he whips the bails;

And then with wingéd words of scorn the fallen god thus rails:—

"Well art thou named Tantalus, for rueful must it be,

To lose a match so nearly won, all for the lack of three."

Then quoth old Nestor, laughingly, "I think 'tis also true

That πολύμητις, after all, ain't a bad name for you;
And should I ever play again, my only wish will be,

To have as captain Odysseus, and win by only three."

THREE VOICES.

THE song of the fishers is heard afar,
 As they homeward glide with a lazy oar,
 Chanting a melody, quaint and low,
 Of brave deeds many a year ago,
 Till the keel grates up on the yellow shore.

The fisherman's daughter doth ply her wheel,
 And gaily she singeth a love-song free,
 And the soft wind bearing her carol sweet,
 Thro' the flow'rs that bend 'neath his passing feet,
 Blows down to the waves of the sun-lit sea.

The hymn of the sky-lark goes up to God,
 Far up in the blue of the cloudless heaven,
 Yet of his minstrelsy sweet and clear,
 For the raptured sense of the list'ning ear,
 Is the distant strain to us mortals given.

The fishermen chant of the storied Past,
 While the maiden sings of her sailor lad ;
 But, out of sight, in the blue-domed height,
 The bird seemed to tell, on his heavenward flight,
 Of a Future, unseen, but strangely bright,
 And his faint, sweet singing maketh me glad.

SONNET.

SWIFT, swift but silent slips away the stream
 Beneath the bridge by which the willows weep ; Athwart the windy sky the thin clouds sweep,
 And through them, scarcely veiled, the white moonbeam
 Touches the water with a mournful gleam ;
 Beside the level lawn's moon-silvered sleep,
 The tall limes toss their boughs with sighings deep,
 And moanings as of one in weary dream.
 Still mid the wind the moon looks through the night
 With the faint misty halo round her spread Like some Madonna at her dear Son's feet, Pictured upon the artist's canvas bright.
 A shining glory round about her head
 So calm, so sorrowful, so wondrous sweet.

THE DEATH OF JUDAS MACCABÆUS.

FROM "JUDAS MACCABÆUS," PRIZE POEM, 1882.

* * * * *

ALAS, that grief should shadow joy so soon !
 But the brief waning of one winter moon,
 And, on those barren hills he loved so well,
 The noblest life that lived for Israel
 Gave its great spirit to the Heaven o'erhead, Judas, the brave, the beautiful, was dead.
 Fallen had he upon a desperate field,
 Died with a noble calm that scorned to yield,
 Died, fronting death, and in the foremost place,
 Died, with the light of God upon his face.
 Homeward they bare him on their dented shields
 To rest at Modin, 'neath his father's fields,
 And voices hushed along the village street,
 As mournfully, with slow and solemn feet,
 Down at his father's side they came to lay
 What yesterday was life, and dust to-day.
 Rest, thou great heart, thy troubled war is past, Still thy brave pulses into peace at last ;

The work is finished thou hast wrought so well,
And through the centuries thy name shall dwell Linked with the memory of Judah's needs,
Of weary strugglings, and of golden deeds.
Let us, that share the faith thou purifiedst,
A cause as great as that for which thou diedst,
Lift hearts as earnest to some glorious end,
Leaving the passing hours we have to spend
Not all forgotten, as we follow thee Up Time's dim stair into Eternity.
