

Cornell University Library

The original of this book is in the Cornell University Library.

There are no known copyright restrictions in the United States on the use of the text.

<http://archive.org/details/cu31924028854978>

Cornell University Library
F 157W53 A33
+
History of the county of Westmoreland, P

3 1924 028 854 978
olin Overs

HISTORY

OF THE

COUNTY OF WESTMORELAND,

PENNSYLVANIA,

WITH

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES

OF MANY OF ITS

PIONEERS AND PROMINENT MEN.

EDITED BY

GEORGE DALLAS ALBERT.

ILLUSTRATED.

DISCARDED

PHILADELPHIA:

L. H. EVERTS & CO.

1882.

55953

Copyright, 1882, by GEORGE DALLAS ALBERT.

P R E F A C E.

THE rapidity in which these sheets (equivalent to some four thousand manuscript folios) passed through the press and the hands of the editor precluded that careful and close scrutiny which an ordinary work is in all justice entitled to receive, and this by a proof-reader not perplexed with other business affairs. As a consequence there are some typographical errors and perhaps a few inadvertencies, some of which are apparent to us on a final scrutiny. One misstatement which crept into the body of the work from a broken copy, but which was printed in only a very few of the first of the impressions of this edition before we noticed it, we desire to correct. In that part of the ecclesiastical history in which the history of the Roman Catholic Church is given it is said that the Right Rev. Abbott Wimmer was the first prelate to enter the council hall at the Council of the Vatican, etc., when it should be, as it was intended, he was with those prelates, etc. The copy was here wrongly read; hence a discrepancy which we desire to explain. We make this explanation of the correction not with the mere object of righting the misstatement, but from a sense of duty, fully appreciating that no one would be more sensitive to an undue and equivocal exaltation than that right revered prelate himself.

For minor inaccuracies (such as no book is free from)—other than misstatements—we do not apologize nor ask for excuses. We believe the body of the work to be essentially free from mistakes in regard to dates and positive averments. Where dates appear that confuse or create doubt, they are found to be verified or corrected in other portions of the history, and that either by corroborating statements or manifest implication.

In giving copies of old documents and of records they are given literally as they exist, and have not been altered in form or phraseology only where it was proper to do so.

G. D. A.

June 17, 1882.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY—EARLY PROVINCIAL HISTORY.

Prefatory—Necessity of Preserving the Facts of Local History—Chief Sources of Local History—Written Accounts and Traditions—Penn's Grant—His Policy—Success of His Colony—Alexander Spotswood, Governor of Virginia, wants the British Government to make a Line of Forts along the Western Rivers—The French in Canada—Their Policy towards the Indians—Alienation of the Indians from the English—Indians of Western Pennsylvania confined to their Reservations on the Ohio—The Ohio Company—Rivalry between the Governments of Pennsylvania and Virginia respecting the Indian Trade..... 13

CHAPTER II.

THE FRENCH OCCUPANCY OF FORT DUQUESNE.

Conrad Weiser and George Crogan—Weiser's Report on the Tribes about the Ohio—Their Numbers and their Disposition—King Shingass and Queen Alliquippi—Gist's Settlement—George Washington sent by the Governor of Virginia to the Indian Tribes—His First Journey, and the Information he Acquired—The Ohio Company cuts Roads, makes Settlements, erects a Store-House and Fort at Redstone, and takes possession of the Forks of the Ohio River—Its Soldiers and Men are driven away by the French, who erect Fort Duquesne—The Governor of Virginia reinforces Washington, who retires to the Great Meadows, and fights his first Battle at Fort Necessity—Braddock's Campaign projected..... 17

CHAPTER III.

BRADDOCK'S EXPEDITION.

Braddock's Forces at Fort Cumberland—He comes up the Ohio Company's Road, plotted by Washington—Opens the Road to the Youghiogheny, and through our part of Westmoreland to the Monongahela; after crossing which River the Army, in a Defile on the South Bank above Turtle Creek, is Surprised by the French Canadians and Indians from the Fort—The Number of the Enemy and their Leaders—The Virginians cover the Retreat of the British—Washington carries off the Army—The Route, Courses, and Distances of the March—How the Trail may be found at this Day—Effect of Braddock's Defeat on the Pennsylvania Colonists—The Battle-Ground visited by Soldiers under Forbes Three Years after the Battle—The Appearance of the Field..... 20

CHAPTER IV.

ARMSTRONG'S EXPEDITION, 1756—BOUQUET AT LIGONIER, 1758.

The Country overrun by Indians and French after Braddock's Defeat—Settlers flee to the East of the Mountains—Forts and Block-Houses on the Pennsylvania Frontier—Col. John Armstrong's Expedition in 1756 against the Kittanning Town—The Town taken and destroyed, and Capt. Jacobs reported killed—The Tramping-Ground of these Warriors—The French and Indian War carried on under William Pitt—John Forbes commands the New Expedition from Philadelphia against Fort Duquesne—His command—Col. Bouquet brings the Vanguard of the Army across Laurel Hill to the Loyallhanna, where he erects a Stockade, and awaits on the rest of the Army under Washington and Forbes, who were to unite at Raystown, or Bedford..... 25

CHAPTER V.

FORBES' EXPEDITION, 1758.

Maj. Grant is sent out from Fort Ligonier to reconnoitre about Fort Duquesne—Number of Men under Grant, and their Route—Their Encampment on the Nine-Mile Run—Their Trail the first Road of the English-speaking People through Westmoreland from Laurel Hill to the Ohio—Grant arrives at the Hill overlooking Fort Duquesne—Is Surrounded and Defeated—Capt. Bullet carries the Remains of the Command back to the Stockade of Ligonier—The French and Indians fill the Woods about Ligonier, and with their united forces attack Bouquet—The Battle lasts nearly all Day, when the Enemy flee off through the Woods—The whole Army under Forbes at Ligonier—He proposes to advance towards Fort Duquesne—Washington leads the way, and cuts the Old Military or Forbes' Road—Duquesne deserted by the French, and first occupied by the British and Americans—Fort Pitt erected..... 28

CHAPTER VI.

FIRST SETTLEMENTS IN WESTMORELAND—BATTLE OF BUSHY RUN, 1763.

Settlers come into Ligonier Valley, about Fort Pitt, and along the Old Military Road—Their Isolated Situations, their Squalid Huts, Potato Patches, and First Clearings—Condition of Indian Affairs at the Peace between England and France, 1762 and 1763—Pontiac—Fort Ligonier made a General Depot—Officers Commandant at Fort Ligonier—The Great Uprising of the Northwestern Tribes—Fort Pitt and Fort Ligonier surrounded and cut off from connection with the East—Capt. Ourry and his Men from Bedford come to the relief of Ligonier and hold the Fort—Bouquet marches from the East to the relief of Fort Ligonier and Fort Pitt—The Force with him—Bouquet finds the Frontier overrun and the Inhabitants utterly destitute—He reaches Fort Ligonier (1763)—He strengthens the Post, and with his Small Army and a Convoy of Pack-Horses proceeds towards Fort Pitt—He is attacked by the Indians under Kyashuta, the Chief of the Senecas, and fights the Battle of Bushy Run—He Defeats and Scatters his Enemy in the most successful Engagement fought with the Hostiles, and carries his Forces and Provisions into Fort Pitt..... 32

CHAPTER VII.

SETTLEMENT FROM 1759 TO 1769.

Misunderstood Boundaries of the Treaty of 1754 (Albany)—Purchase of 1758 and Boundaries thereunder—British Officers give Permits to Settlers after Forbes' Campaign—Pennsylvania will not give Title to Settlers, but passes Laws to keep Settlers off this Territory—Virginia induces Settlers to migrate hither and locate—The Boundary Line between Pennsylvania and Virginia not definitely known—Settlers come into the Country after Pontiac's war (1764)—They locate at Redstone, on the Youghiogheny, at the Forks of that River, and about Pittsburgh, Ligonier, and along the Great Roads—Mason and Dixon's Line run—Proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania warning these Settlers off—Rev. John Steele sent to them to explain the Law and request them to remove—They refuse to remove—The "New Purchase," under Treaty of Fort Stanwix, of 1768—List of the Earliest Settlements made in Western Pennsylvania to this date (1768)—Clamoring of Emigrants and New Settlers to have Lands granted them by the Province—Special Land Titles—Penn's Manorial Reservations—The Divesting Act—Preliminaries to the opening of the Land Office—Public Notice of the opening given—Land Office opened for Applications in the New Purchase, April 3, 1769..... 36

CHAPTER VIII.

PREDOMINANT NATIONALITIES OF THE SETTLERS.

"New Purchase" in Cumberland County Territory—The Penns appoint Justices of the Peace for that part of Cumberland County west of Laurel Hill—No evidence of any Authority being exercised by these Magistrates—Bedford County created—Township Divisions of that part of Bedford County which later became Westmoreland—Tax-Rolls for Bedford County—Number of Landholders and of Tenants returned

—The Southwestern Boundary of Bedford County—No Actual Jurisdiction of Bedford County Government tolerated by the Settlers—First Courte of Bedford—Those in the first Commission—Number of Applications at the opening of the Land Office in 1769—Prominent Men who took up Land at that date—Different Nationalities of the Settlers: Scotch-Irish, Germans, French Huguenots, English-Americans—Localities of their Settlements—Predominant Nationality of Pennsylvania Settlers before the Revolution—Immigration of the Scotch-Irish, particularly that of 1771-73—Their Nativity, and account of their Denization in the North of Ireland—Their Distinct Characteristics—How they were held by Friends and by Defamers—They and the Dutch, had neighbors—Their Influence in Public Affairs in Western Pennsylvania, and reference therein to the Whiskey Insurrection. 42

CHAPTER IX.

CUSTOMS, MORALS, AND MANNERS PRIOR TO THE ERECTION OF THE COUNTY.

The German Settlers—Whence they Emigrated—In what they Differed from the Scotch-Irish—Their Manners, Habits, etc.—Their Belief in the Supernatural—The Mennonists—Peculiarities of their Religious Belief—Relation of these First Settlers to the Civil Law and Procedure in Courts—The Customs and Laws which they Formulated—Effect of their Religious Belief on their Civil Society—Peculiarity of their Morals blended with their Manners—Southern Portion of the County being rapidly filled up compared with the Northern Portion—Terms of Virginia Titles and terms of Penn's Titles—First Settlements north of the Conemaugh—Early Pittsburgh—Fort Pitt abandoned—Early Efforts of the Settlers to erect a New County after opening of the Pennsylvania Land Office—Bedford County erected..... 47

CHAPTER X.

WESTMORELAND COUNTY ORGANIZED—COURTS ESTABLISHED, ETC.

Justices for Bedford County exercise jurisdiction over the Westmoreland part of the County—Great Distance to the County-Seat—St. Clair as Penn's Agent—Petitions for a New County—Westmoreland County erected by Act of Assembly and organized—Courts authorized and Officers named—List of the County Justices in the first Commission—The first Court—County divided into Townships—The first Grand Jury—Constables and Supervisors appointed and Inn-keepers licensed—The County Offices and Officers—St. Clair the first Prothonotary, etc., and James Brison his Clerk—Huffnagle, St. Clair's Successor, secretes the Records of the County—John Proctor the first Sheriff—Officers returned—Election Districts..... 51

CHAPTER XI.

FIRST JAIL—EARLY PUNISHMENTS—SLAVERY IN 1781.

Erection of the Jail at Hanna's—The Pillory—The Whipping-Post—The Stocks—The First Indictment in the Quarter Sessions—James Brigland and Luke Pickett whipped at the Post—Vestiges of English Judicial Process—Elizabeth Smith whipped at the Post and sentenced to Two Years at Hard Labor with an Inhuman Master for Larceny—Flexible Conscience—Slavery and Servitude in the Old Westmoreland—Bill of Sale for a Negro Woman Slave—Extent of Slavery in the County in 1781—Reference to the List of Slaves made out in Pursuance of an Act of Assembly..... 57

CHAPTER XII.

OLD HANNASTOWN, THE COUNTY-SEAT.

Trustees appointed to locate a County-Seat—Robert Hanna's Settlement—They fix on Hanna's Town—Difference of Opinion as to the expediency of locating the County-Seat there—Description of the Old Town—Opposition to its Location by the People of Pittsburgh—Correspondence on the Subject—Reports of the Trustees—Various Acts of Assembly relative thereto—Troubles at the Place in 1774-75.... 61

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BORDER TROUBLES OF 1774 BEGIN.

Virginia claims part of the Territory of Pennsylvania—Dunmore occupies Fort Pitt—The Claims of Virginia and Pennsylvania summarized—Virginia Colonists willing to fight for the Demands of Virginia—Lord Dunmore, Governor of Virginia—England's Colonial Policy—Virginia's relation to the Ministry—Charge against Dunmore—His Character—Real Causes of Dunmore's or Cresap's War of 1774—How the Indians regarded Western Virginia—John Connolly—He takes possession of Fort Pitt—Issues a Proclamation—Apprehended by St. Clair, and committed to Jail at Hannastown—He returns to Pittsburgh—Is opposed by Penn's Magistrates—He returns with Authority from Dunmore, and appears with Simon Girty and a Rabble at Hannastown—Refuses to allow the Justices to hold Court—The Justices persist, and hold Court to preserve order till the Lines are adjusted..... 63

CHAPTER XIV.

CONNOLLY'S USURPATIONS, INDIAN ALARMS, ETC.

The Pennsylvania Justices further resist Connolly's Usurpation—He sends Three of them in Irons into Virginia—They are released by Dunmore—Commissioners appointed by the Council to visit the House of Burgesses of Virginia—Evil Summer of 1774—Petitions from Early Inhabitants of Westmoreland to Governor Penn—Meeting held at Pittsburgh—The Association first formed—Devereux Smith's Letter to Dr. William Smith—Some acts of Connolly recited—Dunmore opens Offices for the Sale of Land in Pennsylvania Territory—He issues a Proclamation to the People—St. Clair superintends the Military Arrangements—Forte repaired, and list of new ones erected—Rangers organized and posted at various Points—Alarm of the Inhabitants—Many Settlers cross back over the Mountains—They are urged to remain by St. Clair and Others—People of Ligonier Valley gather near the Fort in fear of the Indians crossing the Ohio—Number and Lists of the Signers of the Petitions to Governor Penn—Hempfield Dutch and Pittsburgh Irish..... 66

CHAPTER XV.

DUNMORE'S WAR.

Dunmore's War begun by the Murder of some Friendly Indians, especially Logan's Family—Virginian Army organized—Dunmore at Pittsburgh with Connolly—Great Gathering and Organization of the Indian Tribes—The Campaign of 1774—The Hopes of our People in Col. Lewis—Dunmore and Connolly want to see the Army defeated and the Indians on the Frontiers—Lewis gains the Battle of Point Pleasant—Dunmore's Treaty—Indictment: The People vs. Dunmore—Dunmore through Connolly still tyrannizes over the Pennsylvania Settlers, many of whom talk of leaving their Clearings—Condition of the People in 1775—Leaders in Westmoreland in 1775—The Military Spirit..... 70

CHAPTER XVI.

WESTMORELAND'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, 1775.

Congress and Ticonderoga—Westmoreland listening to the Guns at Lexington Common—Meeting held at Pittsburgh and at Hannastown, May 16, 1775—What they said at Pittsburgh—What they did at Hannastown—Westmoreland's Declaration of Independence—Spirit of the Resolutions Adopted—who wrote them—Similarity between the Declaration and the Resolutions in Expression and in Sentiment—The Military idea of Resistance—Observations and Remarks on the Paper—Westmoreland's Great Glory—The Regiment of Associators.... 73

CHAPTER XVII.

THE AFFAIRS OF WESTMORELAND ON THE EVE OF THE REVOLUTION.

Public Affairs—Connolly and Dunmore still Scheming—Connolly tries to carry the Pennsylvania and Virginia Officers for the King—His Plan to effect this, and to hold the West for Dunmore—Execunt Omnes—Boston Harbor closed—Call for a Meeting at the State-House, July 15, 1774—Hanna and Cavett as Deputies—William Thompson on the Committee of Safety—The Associators—Edward Cook and James Perry Delegates to the Convention of 1776—Special Law allowing Westmoreland Electors to vote for Members of the Convention—The County divided into Two Districts for this Election—One District North and one South of the Youghiogheny—Their Election Officers—Members returned to the Convention of 1776—All Male Inhabitants subject to Military Service, and required to take the Oath of Allegiance—Frame of Government for the State adopted—John Proctor elected first Councilor—Archibald Lochry, the first County Lieutenant, succeeded by Cook and by Col. Campbell—Duties of the County Lieutenant—The West to take care of Itself—British Influence over the Indians—Hatred between the Indians and the Western Virginia Settlers..... 76

CHAPTER XVIII.

WESTMORELAND IN THE REVOLUTION.

First Battalion directed to be raised in Pennsylvania for the United Colonies—Capt. John Nelson's Company from Westmoreland—Ordered to Canada—Services of this Company—Second Pennsylvania Battalion under St. Clair—Capt. William Butler's Company, and Capt. Stephen Bayard's Company—History of the Services of this Battalion in the Expedition into Canada, and in the Retreat to Ticonderoga—The Third Pennsylvania Regiment formed out of Saint Clair's Battalion—Memorial of the Officers of the Third and Ninth Pennsylvania Regiments—Sketch of Capt. James Chrystie, and of Thomas Butler—Pennsylvania Rifle Regiment—Its History—Capt. Joseph Erwin's Company—Their Gallant Services at Long Island—The Company Incorporated into other Commands—State Regiment of Foot—Capt. Carnahan—Capt. Scott's Company—The Second Pennsylvania Regiment—Condition of the Western Frontiers at the Beginning of the Revolution—George Morgan, Indian Agent at Fort Pitt—Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment raised by Authority of Congress—Directed to be raised in Westmoreland and Bedford Counties—Seven Companies raised in Westmoreland—Its Officers—Mustered into Service for the Defense of the Frontiers—They receive Orders from the Board of War to join Washington—Letter from Col. Mackay to President of the Board—Letter from Lieut.-Col. George Wilson to Col. James Wilson—They set out for New Jersey—Their Terrible March—Their Condition on their Arrival at Headquarters—Hon. T. Pickering's Mention of their Distressful Condition—Change in the Officers of the Regiment—Return of June, 1777—Different Returns of 1777—Engagements of the Regiment—Their Losses and Casualties—Valley Forge—Regiment ordered to Pittsburgh in 1778—Col. Brodhead, with the Regiment, make a detour up the West Branch—Remains of the Regiment stationed at Pittsburgh—Extracts from the Order-Book of the Regiment—Morgan's Rifle Regiment—Character and Object of the Organization—Its Officers—Their Services at Saratoga—Col. Richard Butler second in command—Capt. Van Swearingen—First Lieut. Basil Prather—Second Lieut. John Hardin—Anecdote of Van Swearingen—His Subsequent Career—Stony Point—Its Position and Importance—Washington determines to Capture it if possible—Confers with Gen. Wayne—Col. Richard Butler commands one of the Detachments who are detailed for this Service—They carry the Fort at the Point of the Bayonet—Arthur St. Clair's first Services in the Revolution—Biographical Sketches of Col. Eneas Mackay—Of Col. Stephen Bayard—Of Lieut.-Col. George Wilson—Of Col. Daniel Brodhead—The Fighting Butlers: Thomas, Sr., Richard, William, Thomas, Jr., Percival—Other Members of the Butler Family—A anecdotes—Col. James Smith—Col. John Gibson..... 81

CHAPTER XIX.

BORDER WARFARE AND CIVIL DISSENSIONS.

Indians in 1776 and 1777—Effect of Savage Warfare on the Whites—White Renegades and Deserters: Girty, McKee, Elliott—Depravity of some Whites on the Frontier—Murder of Cornstalk—List of Commandants at Fort Pitt—McIntosh's Expedition from Fort Pitt to Beaver—Brodhead's Expedition to Conewago—Other Expeditions from Western Pennsylvania and the West—Clark's Western Expedition and his Westmorelanders—Dates of these Noted Expeditions—Nature of the Indian Warfare in the West—Border Settlement of Westmoreland most Exposed—The County during the Troublous Times divided, one part North and one part South of the Youghiogheny—People along the Youghiogheny acknowledge no Law—Virginia establishes three Counties in Southwestern Pennsylvania—Boundaries and County-seats of Monongalia, Ohio, and Yohogania Counties—Extracts from Yohogania County Records—Their first Election—Primitive Court-House and Jail—Curious Fines and Sentences—When their Jurisdiction ended—Boundaries run and Difficulties settled—Mason and Dixon's Line—Limits of the Actual Jurisdiction of Westmoreland County through the Revolutionary War—Date of the erection of other Counties which have been stricken off from Westmoreland 97

CHAPTER XX.

FORTS, BLOCK-HOUSES, AND INCIDENTS OF WARFARE.

Reliance of Westmoreland in her Militia—Her means of defense—Description of the Early Stockades, Forts, Block-Houses—Block-Cabins and Stations—Fort Ligonier and Capt. Shannon and Col. McDowell—Hannastown Stockade—Fort Hand—Fort Reed—Fort Crawford—Fort

Shippen, at Capt. Proctor's—Fort Allen—Rugh's Block-House—Kepple's Block-House—Miller's Block-House and Station—Palmer's Block-House—Williams' Fort—Fort Waltour—Fort Wallace—Carnahan's Block-House—Barr's Block-House—Shields' Block-House—Miller's Fort on the Sewickley—McDowell's Block-House—Teague Island Fort—Incidents—The Francis Family killed near Waltour's—Attack on Waltour's Fort and death of the Old Man Waltour—The wounded Indian who killed Waltour comes to Fort Pitt—Has his wound dressed—Confesses that he shot Waltour—A Company from about Brush Creek go to the Garrison and demand him, that they may punish him themselves—He is given up to them—He is taken back to Waltour's Fort to be burned at the stake—While they are hunting up a Sheriff and a Jury to hold a mock trial the Indian escapes—He is followed Ninety Miles, and when last heard of had taken to the Allegheny River—Finley's adventure at Fort Wallace..... 102

CHAPTER XXI.

FORAYS AND ADVENTURES.

During the Early Part of the Revolutionary War—The Volunteers—Col. James Smith takes a Detachment up the Allegheny to French Creek or Venango—His Arrangement of the Men while on the March and in their Encampments—His Plan of Fighting the Indians—Brodhead's Expedition to Conewago and Brokenstraw—He cuts off a Party of Forty Indians on their way to the Westmoreland Settlements—Notice of Fort Armstrong, Kittanning—Brodhead sends Capt. Brady into the Seneca Country—Trouble between the Continental Officers and the Militia Officers—Ranging Companies formed during the War by Direction of the State Officials—They are Stationed along the Rivers—Their Officers—Their Manner of Fighting—The Heroic Women of Early Westmoreland: Experience Bozarth, Massy Harbison, Mrs. Margaret Oliver, Mrs. Matthew Jack..... 107

CHAPTER XXII.

LOWER LIGONIER VALLEY DURING THE REVOLUTION.

Ligonier Valley a Favorite Ground for the Indians, and the First Stopping-Place of the Whites—Privations of the Early Settlers along the Four-Mile Run, Mill Creek, the Old Road, and Indian Creek—Murder of the Campbell Family, and Captivity of Robert Campbell (with curious anecdotes)—He is sold to a British Officer—He is exchanged—Killing of the Old Man Harman and three of his Neighbors—James Flack taken Prisoner—Escapes from Montreal, and comes through the Wilderness by means of a Compass—Charles Clifford taken by Indians in Ambush—His Account of the Manners, Habits, and Ways of Living of the Northern Indians—His Master cures him of a Hurt Foot—Peter Maharg taken by the Same Party—Is made to Run the Gauntlet—Clifford taken to Montreal—Is Exchanged after having been with the Indians nearly Three Years—Comes to the Valley, and Dies at Home—James Clifford and his two Dogs, "Whig" and "Tory"—His adventure with the Indian, whom he shoots—Indians lying in wait attack a Party of Five who go to the Fields back of the Fort—They kill Miss Means, Young Means, and Young Reed—Col. McDowell escapes with Miss Reed on his Horse into the Fort—The Bodies of the Others buried by the People of the Fort..... 111

CHAPTER XXIII.

UPPER LIGONIER VALLEY DURING THE REVOLUTION.

The Upper Part of Ligonier Valley—Remains of the Old Indian Fort—The Early Settlers here: the Harmans, Gays, and others—Williams' Block-House the Place of Refuge for these Early Settlers—Different Murders and Captures in this Region—Indians capture Andrew and John Harman along the Four-Mile Run—They kill one of a Neighbor's Horses and take Another—They watch the Cabin and hear the Mother calling the Boys—Carry the Boys towards the North—John Dies—After trying to freeze Andy to Death, and Failing in other ways to kill Him, he at last is trained up with a Chief's Son—He is adopted by that Tribe, the Senecas—Lives with them some Years—Is parted with for a Bottle of Rum to an English Officer—Taken to London as a Servant—After the Peace in 1783 comes Home, after they had long thought him Dead—His Account of their Ways of Farming, of Hunting, and of Fighting, with several Anecdotes of his relating—Capture of Jacob Nicely by the Complanters—He is raised and adopted by them—Marries a Squaw and Dies among them—His Father visits him before his Death..... 115

CHAPTER XXIV.

CAPTAIN BRADY AND HIS EXPLOITS.

Capt. Samuel Brady, the Hero of Western Pennsylvania, is stationed at Pittsburgh in Col. Brodhead's Regiment—When his Family is murdered he swears to wage a War against the Indians long as he lives—He is sent to Sandusky to get Information for the Commander-in-Chief—He gets within sight of the Town and watches the Indians all Day—On his way back he kills a Warrior, and saves Jenny Stupes and her Child—His Companion, the Dutchman Phouts, and his pet Delaware—He and the Dutchman go up the Allegheny to get some News—They follow an Indian Trail—They capture an old Indian who tries to kill Phouts, but who is killed by him—Brady as Captain of the Rangers—Battle of Brady's Bend—Brady kills the Bald Eagle, who had killed his Relatives—Brady watches in the French Creek Country—He and his Men pursue a Returning Party of Indians—Brady's Leap—He follows up a Party which had entered the Sewickley Settlement—His Men attack a Party of Warriors and rout them—His Adventure with Wetzel and the Spies after the General War, as well as all others which have been substantiated or corroborated by Concurrent Accounts..... 118

CHAPTER XXV.

LOCHRY'S EXPEDITION.

The Settlements in 1779 and 1780—Ferocity of the Savages, and Depravity of a Class of Whites—Some Whites from about Hannastown kill Friendly Indians—Kirkpatrick's Cabin attacked by Indians, and therein of the Custom of claiming Scalps—Brodhead ordered to send a Detachment under Maj. Craig from Fort Pitt to reinforce Gen. Clark—Clark's Plan of a Western Campaign—Westmoreland requested to cooperate with Him—Bickerings and Jealousies among the Leaders of the County—Col. Lochry, as County Lieutenant, under Instructions from the Council, raises a force of Volunteers to join with Clark—The Difficulties under which Lochry labored—Clark's Letter to the Officers of Westmoreland, disclosing his Plan of Campaign—Lochry's Friends volunteer—They rendezvous at Carnahan's Block-House—They proceed down the River after Clark to unite with him at Wheeling—Lochry's last Letter—Arriving at Wheeling (Fort Henry), Lochry finds that Clark had gone on down the River—He prepares Boats to follow—Goes to the Mouth of the Kanawha—Capt. Shannon sent forward with a Letter to Clark—He and his Men are captured—The Indians place them on an Island as a Decoy for the other Whites—Lochry's Men land some distance above the Island—Upon landing they are attacked by a large Force of Indians and entirely cut off—Memorial of Two of the Prisoners who were exchanged—Capt. Orr, and his Account of this Expedition—Lieut. Samuel Craig's Narrative of his Captivity—New Volunteers called out towards the end of the Year 1781..... 124

CHAPTER XXVI.

CRAWFORD'S EXPEDITION TO SANDUSKY.

The Moravian Indians—Their Christian Character and their Former History—Their Efforts at Peace-Making between the White and Warring Indians—Description of their Villages—Their Unfavorable Location—They are blamed with harboring Hostile Indians—The Whites of the Southwestern Part of Pennsylvania are instigated to Disperse them—They raise a Force of Volunteers for that Purpose—Col. David Williamson in command—Their Route of March—They come upon the Indians by surprise—Represent themselves as Friends—Get possession of their Villages, and begin the destruction of the Houses, and the murder of the Men, Women, and Children—They are taken out, one after another, and with Clubs, Mallets, and Hatchets murdered while they supplicate for mercy—Their Bodies are then burned—Col. Crawford's Expedition later in 1782 to the Sandusky Towns—He is defeated and his Force scattered—He is taken Prisoner and burned at the Stake—Escape of Dr. Knight..... 131

CHAPTER XXVII.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE IN 1780-81.

Westmoreland County in the Latter Part of the Revolution—Evidences from the Court Records and from Acts of Assembly—The Militia shifted from Place to Place in expectation of Indian Attacks—The Outposts west of Fort Pitt abandoned—Extracts from the Correspondence of Brodhead, Irvine, and Others bearing on the Affairs of the County..... 135

CHAPTER XXVIII.

DESTRUCTION OF HANNASTOWN.

Spring of 1782—The Outposts deserted—Condition of the Hannastown Settlement—The People gather near to the Stations and work at Harvest together—A Party go out to take off the Harvest of Michael Huffnagle, north of Hannastown—One of the Reapers, seeing Indians watching from behind Trees, gives the Alarm, and they flee towards the Fort—The Court at Hannastown adjourns without a Crier—Records taken to the Fort—General Jail Delivery—They all gather into the Stockade—Scouts sent out—Brisson and Shaw pursued by the Indians—Capt. Matthew Jack comes upon the Indians and escapes from them—He rides round the Country and alarms the People—He saves the Love Family—Indians come to the Town—They hold a Consultation, and are seen to have White Men for Commanders, who are dressed like Indians—They plunder the Houses, fire on the Stockade, and mock at the Inmates—They send out a Party towards Miller's Station—The People gather at Allen's, at Rugh's, at Unity—Settlers gather into the Houses and get down their Rifles—Indians come on to the Mowers in the Meadow at Miller's—The Number and Class of Persons collected there—Women and Children gather into the Miller House—John Brownlee called back from attacking the Indians by his Wife—Gives himself up to the Indians—A Young Man takes Brownlee's Child and runs towards George's—Is pursued by a Pack of Indians and hides in a Rye-Field—Singular Escape of a Babe left on the Ground at the Mercy of the Savages—She is found Sleeping in her own Cot the next Morning—She lives to be Married, and dies in Old Age—The Houses at Hannastown burnt down—Captain Jack is too late to alarm the People at Miller's—The Renegades secure the Inmates of the House—They hurt the Houses and shoot down the Cattle—Tie the Hands of the Prisoners and load them with Stolen Goods—Drive the Weeping Women into Captivity—Brownlee carries a Load on his back and has his Little Child on his neck—The Indians recognize Brownlee—One crushes a Tomahawk into his Head and kills his Little Boy, and also a Woman who faints—Affairs about the Fort—Peggy Shaw saves a Little Child—A Ball strikes her in the Breast—The barbarous Medical Treatment she receives while she lingers out her Life—The Two Bodies of Indians unite and go into Camp in the Crabtree Bottom—People collect at the George Farm—At Nightfall a Crowd with Scouts go Armed to assist those in the Fort—They come to the Smouldering Town—Are let into the Stockade and sound an Alarm—The Indians, listening, are scared, thinking Reinforcements have arrived, and after Midnight they leave for the North—Their Route—They are pursued as far as the Kiskiminetas—The People look out on Deserted Homes—They bury the Dead where they were found—To keep them from Starving the State allows them to draw Rations—What became of the Prisoners—Who the Invaders were and where they came from—Gen. Irvine's Letter to Washington—Singular Account from an Indian after the War of the Party which burnt Hannastown—The Heroes of the "Hannastown War"—The Town after its Destruction..... 138

CHAPTER XXIX.

LAST DAYS OF HANNASTOWN—EXECUTION OF MAMACHTAGA.

End of the Revolution—Formation of new Counties, Washington and Fayette—New State Project—Who were at the head of it—Causes of its Inception—Its Prospective Limits—It fails—Act of Congress relative thereto—1783-84—The Last Days of Hannastown—Trial of Mamachtaga, an Indian, for Murder—And also of some other Prisoners at the same Court—He is defended by Brackenridge—The Indian's Department—His Opinion of the Court—His Trial—Is found Guilty of Murder, and wishes to be Shot instead of Hanged—The Prisoners in the Jail want him to kill another Prisoner under Sentence of Death—He refuse to do so—The Jailer's Child takes Sick, when Mamachtaga goes out and gets Herbs to cure it—He returns to the Jail, and goes into Voluntary Confinement—The Day of the Execution arrives—A great Crowd of People assemble—The White Man hung, and then Mamachtaga hung—He dies like a Warrior, after having first painted himself for the Occasion..... 148

CHAPTER XXX.

THE PIONEERS—THEIR HOUSES, FURNITURE, ETC.

The Pioneers—How the Early Settlers came in—Their Object in Emigrating and in Removing—First Settlers near the Forts—How they Built their Houses—House-Raisings—Appearance of their Cabins outside—How they were Furnished—Home-Made Furniture—Description of Ancient Hannastown—The First Frame and Stone Houses in different parts of the County—Dr. Schoepf's visit to Western Pennsylvania after the War..... 153

CHAPTER XXXI.

PRIMITIVE HOUSEKEEPING AND FARMING.

How to commence Housekeeping—Split-Brooms and Gourds—The Spinning-Wheel and Cradle—The Cock-Loft and Stable—Clearing the Forest—Getting to Farming—Resorts and Devices of the Farmer—Wheat Lands—Common Crops—Gardening—Rye Coffee—Mrs. St. Clair's Tea-Parties—The Raising of Flax, and a Description of the Process of its Manufacture—Spinning—Tow in Poetry and in Law—Wool-Carding—The First Carding-Machinee—The old cee of McGinnis versus Giger, in the matter of wrongly Dyeing the Linsey-Woolsey—Dress of the Common People—Going to Church—Nineteen Grooms married in one Blue Coat at different times—Dreec of the Fashionable People—Calico..... 157

CHAPTER XXXII.

BEARS, DEER, WOLVES, ETC.

Fruits and Berries—Game—Maple-Sugar and Molasses—Depredatione of the Bears—How they were trapped and killed—Mitchell shootea Bear on a Sunday—Wolves, and Adventures with them—Moorhead and Kelly—Christian Shockey attacked at Night by Wolvee, climb a Tree and awaits till Morning—Premium for Wolf-Scalpe—Deer-Hunting—Venison used instead of Beef—Squirrels—Birds and Wild Fowl—Pests of the Farmer—Game Lawe, and Premiums offered by Law at Different Times for destroying Animals and Birde—Farming the Chief Dependence and Occupation of the People—How Farming in General was carried on..... 162

CHAPTER XXXIII.

SALT, WHISKEY, EARLY MILLS, AND FURNACES.

Some of their Chief Wante—Salt—First brought from the East, then from Big Beaver, Kentucky, Onondaga—Prices—Methods of bringing it over the Mountains—Its Discovery on the Sewickley and on the Conemaugh—Process of its First Manufacture—Reduction in Price—Scarceness of Money—The Rates as fixed by some of the Early Courts—Prices of other Commodities—Cheapness of Land—Paying their Preachers and Taxes—Rates allowed per Bushel for Wheat, Rye, and Oats—Whiskey-Stills—Manufacture of Whiskey—What they kept in their Storee or Shope—Manner of doing Business—Whiekey the Medium of Exchange—Its Universal Use—Exported and Imported—Tub and Grist-Mille—List of First Mills in the County—Iron—Turnbull & Marmie's Foundry and Furnace—The Westmoreland Furnace—Gen. St. Clair builde Hermitage Furnace—Mount Hope and Ross Furnaces—John Henry Hopkins—The Baldwin Furnace—Other Furnaces—Axe and Nail Manufacture, etc..... 166

CHAPTER XXXIV.

PRIMITIVE ROADS AND METHODS OF TRANSPORTATION.

Something on Roads in Great Britain, and of Indian Trails in America—Knowledge displayed by the Indians in their Selection of Routes—Their Manner of Traveling—Of their Traile East and West, North and South—The Routee of the First Whites westward of the Mountains—Indian Remains along these Routee in Westmoreland, and Memorials of their Presence in Names of Streams, Hills, etc.—Nemacolin's Path—The Catawba War Trail—The Kittanning and Juniata Pathe—The different Termini of the Aboriginal Paths—Of the Indian Villages and Abiding-Places here—The Old Company's Road—Brad-dock's Road—Burd's Road—The National Road—Forbee' Road—Old State Road—Chartered Turnpike—Old Military Roads—Method of Transportation used in the Armies—Want of Roads to the First Settlers—First Road Petitions, 1773—Difficulty in getting to Mill—Importance of keeping the Public Roads in Repair—Manner of Travel and Method of transporting Merchandise on these Roade—Pack-Horses and Pack-Saddles—What a Pack-Saddle is—Ratee for carrying—Remarks on one of the "Lost Arts"—How they went to War, to the Assembly, to the East for Goods, and a-Courting..... 176

CHAPTER XXXV.

TURNPIKES—CONESTOGA WAGONS—PIONEER INNS.

The State assists in making Roads—The Old Pennsylvania State Road—Its Course through the County—The Village built along it—Conestoga Wagone and Hacks—First Load of Merchandise hauled across the Mountaine—How long they were in bringing it—Cost of carrying—First Malls from Pittsburgh East and West—How Papere and the Mail were delivered—First Carriages and Carioles—The Pleasure of Traveling in these Contrivances—The Felgar Road—The Jonee' Mill Road—The Harrieburg and Pittsburgh Turnpike Company incorporated—The Northern Turnpike—The State appropriates Money to the Southern Route—Progress of the Undertaking—Its completion—Public-Housee—Their Great Number along the Turnpikee and in the Villagee—They become Famous in their way—The Old Class of Inn-keepers—The Good Cheer and the Solid Comforts they offered Travelers—Homer gives some Hints as to their Signe—The Sceptre departed from Israel—Regrete of a Certain Class that Railroads have ever been built..... 181

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE LAST OF THE BORDER COMMOTIONS.

New Boundaries of the Purchase of 1784—Emigration of Westmorelanders—Harmar's Campaign—His Defeat—St. Clair, Governor of the Northwest Territory—His Campaign and Defeat—Indians attack Frontier Settlers of Pennsylvania—Condition and Extent of the Frontier of Westmoreland and Allegheny—Unprepared state of the Inhabitants—Westmoreland Militia—The Prominent Men of that Period—The State organizee Rifle Rangee—Appropriations for the Western Counties by Act of Assembly—Government of the United State called on for help—It responds and enliets Men—Correspondence from and between Officers and Military Men relative to the etate of Affaire, and giving Statemante at length of Indian Depredatiou—Particular Incidents—Capture of Charles Mitchell, murder of his Mother, and an account of his Captivity with the Cornplanters—The Epsode of Capt. Sloan, Wallace, Hunt, and Knott, in their Tour of Observation in the Western County—Sloan in command of Fort Hamilton—His able and successful Defense of that Post—Presquo Isle—The laying out of the Town and of the Road along the Allegheny River resisted by the Indians at the instance of the British in Canada—The State takes Active Measures to enforce the Laws—Militia called out from Westmoreland and the other Counties for this Service—Lest of the Indian Troubles in Westmoreland..... 187

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE WHISKEY INSURRECTION.

Excise—Hatred of the Scotch and Irish for the Law—Inequality of the Tax—Effort made by the State to Collect the State Excise in 1785—"The Devil" comes for Collector Graham at Greensburg—Act of Congress levying a Tax on Distilled Spirits—Regulations made for its Collection—First Meeting in Opposition to the Law—Johnson, the Collector for Allegheny and Washington, tarred and feathered—No Place for Officers to be had in Westmoreland and Washington in 1792—Office opened at Greensburg and abandoned—Meeting held at Pittsburg in 1792—President Washington issues a Proclamation—Wells, Collector for Fayette and Westmoreland, attacked in his House—He opens an Office in Philip Reagan's House in 1794—His Son and Reagan fortify the Premises—They are besieged by a Large Party—They capitulate—Capt. Webster, Excise Officer for Somerret, taken and compelled to give up his Commission—Government Officers serve Process upon Delinquent Distillers—Neville and the Marshal driven away after eerving the Writ on one Miller, near Peters Creek—A Party demand the surrender of Neville's Papers—Neville's House defended by a Party of United States Soldiers, who Fire upon the Mob—Their Commander, Macfarlane, is killed—The Excitement increasee—Gathering of the Rabble and Militia at Braddock's Field—They want to attack and burn out the Government Officers and the Friends of Law—Brack-enridge prevail upon them to cross the River—The next Day they disperse—Volunteers and Regulars called out by the President—Commissioners appointed to go to the Scene of the Trouble—The Army at Carlisle—Commissioner appointed by the Delegates at Parkieson's Ferry confer with the President—Commissioners on both sides hold a Conference—Committee meet at Redstone—The Committee pass a resolve to take the sence of the People on the question of submission to the Lawe upon the Terms proposed by the United Statee Commissioners—The Returne Unsatisfactory—The President orders the Army over the Mountains—Change in the Sentiments of the People—Meetings held all over the Country—Report of the Meeting held at Greeneburg—Resolutions—The People subscribe anew to the Tests—The Army withdrawn—Trial of the Offenders—Effects of the Insurrection on Westmoreland—Biographical Sketches of Participants and Documents hearing on the Insurrection..... 196

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

WILLIAM FINDLEY.

William Findley, the First Member of Congress from Westmoreland—His Colleague in the Commission to the President of the United States at the Time of the Whiskey Insurrection, David Redick—His Account of his Early Life and his Motives in settling in Pennsylvania—His Settlement in the Octorara Settlement and his Efforts to remove the Obligations of the Scotch Covenanters in Matters Civil—His Early Advantages—His Opinions on Slavery—Elected Member of the Assembly, of the Council of Censors, Member of the Constitutional Convention of 1790, and Member of Congress—"Modern Chivalry" and Findley Caricatured—His Views on the Federal Constitution—His Answer to Rev. Samuel B. Wylie's Strictures on the American Constitutions—His Account of the Publication and Statements of his "History of the Inurrection"—Antagonism of Brackenridge and Findley—Their Political Opposition and Personal Dislikes of each other—Findley's Contributions to the Register—His Shrewdness and Sagacity as a Politician—Debasement of the Politics of that Day—Instance of Personal and Party Abuse—Other work of Findley—His Industry—His Residence—Its Location—His Death and Grave—His Appearance and Dress—His Neighbors—His Family—His identification with the Whiskey Insurrection, and the important part he acted in it..... 207

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Nativity and Birth—History of his Family in Scotland—Is sent to College, and thence to London to study Medicine—Enters the British Army as an Ensign—Comes to America in the French and Indian War—Serves under Wolfe in Canada—Marries in Boston—Appears in Western Pennsylvania—Commande at Fort Ligonier—Appointed to Office in Bedford County under the Proprietary Government and in Westmoreland County—Takes an active part in the Border Troubles with Virginia, and in Dunmore's War—Agent of the Penns—Accompanies the Congressional Committee to Fort Pitt, 1775—Resolutions of May 16, 1775, at Hannastowu—The Associators—Plan to go against Detroit—Takes part with the Colouisee in the Revolutionary War—Appointed and Commissioned Colonel in Pennsylvania Service—Sent to Canada—At Three Rivers—Services in Canada—Joins Washington—His Services in the Jersey Campaign of 1776—Is sent to Command at Ticonderoga—Campaign of 1777—Burgoyne's Advance—Surrender of Ticonderoga—Court of Inquiry—St. Clair at Yorktown—And with Greene—Enters Civil Life—Member of the Council of Censors—Member of Continental Congress—Elected its President—Erection and Organization of the Northwestern Territory—Appointed its Governor—Enters upon his Duties as Governor—Indian War—Made Major-General and Commander-in-Chief of the American Army—Expedition against the Miami Indians—Account of the Battle and Defeat—His Politics—His Duties as Governor—Is Removed from Office—Return to Ligonier Valley—His Residence—His Financial Embarrassment—Its Causes—Treatment of the Government in regard to these Claims—Is sold out by the Sheriff—Removes from his Home—His Last Daye—His Death, Funeral, and Monument—Chattering over his Grave—Observations on his Character and Misfortunes..... 213

CHAPTER XL.

WAR OF EIGHTEEN-TWELVE.

Causes of the War—Congress declares War with Great Britain—Governor Snyder issues a Proclamation, and directs the Organization of the Pennsylvania Militia—Officers and Arrangement of the Westmoreland Militia under this Plan—British and Indians appear in force on opposite side of Lake Erie—Fears of an Invasion of Northwestern Pennsylvania from Canada—Militia from Western parts of the State ordered to Assemble at Erie—Oliver Hazard Perry—Capt. Bird and his Ballad—Condition of Affairs on the Northwestern Frontiers at the Breaking out of the War—Trouble with the Indians—Gen. Hull, Governor of Michlgan Territory, invades Canada—Surrender of Detroit—The whole West in Arms—Army of the Northwest organized under Gen. Harrison—John B. Alexander and the Rifle Company of Westmoreland—Correspondence between Alexander and the Military Authorities—The Rifles offer their Services to the Government of the United States—They are accepted and Ordered to March—List of Officers and Men—Capt. Joseph Markle's Company of Horse—Muster-Roll of Capt. Markle's Company—These Volunteers attached to the Detachment sent to the Mississinewa Towns—Object of the Expedition—Its entire Success, and the Gallantry of the Westmorelanders—Capt.

Alexander detailed on Special Dnty—Promoted to rank of Major—Winter Campaign of 1813—Fort Meigs—Gallant Condnct of Maj. Alexander and the Pennsylvania Volunteers at Fort Meigs—Opposed to Tecumseh—Termination of the Siege—Conduct of the Westmorelanders mentioned by Gen. Harrison in General Orders to the whole Army—Maj. Crogan at Upper Sanduskey—Orders discharging the Rifles, and Commendatory thanks of the General..... 226

CHAPTER LXI.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

The Presbyterian Church—Reformed Church—Greensburg Seminary—Evangelical Lutheran Church—Ministers of the Early Lutheran Church—United Presbyterian Church—Metbodists—Early Methodism in Greeneburg and Vicinity—United Brethren—The Mennonitee and their Early Settlement—Bspstic Church—Mount Pleasant Institute—Roman Catholic Church—Catholicity in Western Pennsylvania... 233

CHAPTER XLII.

THE PRESS AND LITERATURE.

The "Pittsburgh Gazette"—"Farmer's Register," the First Paper printed in Greensburg—"The Greensburg and Indiana Register"—The "Westmoreland and Indiana Register"—"The Westmoreland Republican and Farmer's Chronicle"—"Greensburg Democrat"—"Republican and Democrat"—"Westmoreland Democrat"—The "Greensburg Gazette"—"Greensburg Gazette and Farmer's and Mechanick's Register"—(And again) "The Greensburgh Gazette"—"The Westmoreland Intelligencer"—"The Sentinel"—The "American Herald"—"The Tribune"—"Tribune and Herald"—"The Pennsylvania Argus"—"Frank Cowan's Paper"—"The Democratic Times"—"The National Issue"—"The Newe"—"The Greensburg Preee"—"The Evening Preee"—German Newspapers: "The Star of the West"—"The Westmoreland News"—"The Ligonier Free Press" alias "The Valley Democrat"—Mount Pleasant "Literary Gazette"—"Latrobe Inquirer"—"Latrobe Advance"—"The Revellie"—The "Irwin Spray"—"The Irwin Chronicle"—The West Newton "Weekly Cycle"—"The West Newton Press"—"The Scottdale Tribune"—The "Miner's Record"—Oddities—Observations—Extracts—Literature—Dr. Frank Cowan's Publications..... 279

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE LEGAL PROFESSION.

Provincial Courts—The County Justices—Distinction of President Judge—William Crawford, the First Presiding Judge—Judge John Moore—Increase in Legal Business—Difference in Practice—First Regular Attorneys—Characteristics of the Early Practice—Judge H. H. Brackenridge—James Roes—John Woods—Steel Semples—Henry Baldwin—William Wilkins—Legal Ability of the Early Practitioners—The Bench—Judge Addison—Judicial Forms, etc.—Judge John Young—Judge Thomas White—Judge J. M. Burrell—Judge J. C. Knox—Judge Joseph Buffington—Judge James A. Logan—Judge James A. Huuter—John Byers Alexander—Alexander William Foeter—The Hanging of Evane—James Findlay—Richard Coulter—John F. Beaver—Albert G. Marchand—Henry D. Foster—A. A. Stewart—E. C. Marchand—Joseph H. Kuhns—James C. Clarke—John Latta—Roll of Attorneys..... 293

CHAPTER XLIV.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

The Profession in the Early Days of the Province and State, and in Westmoreland—Quackery—Dr. James Postlethwaite—John Ormsby, M.D.—Dr. Alfred T. King—Dr. David Alter—The Westmoreland Medical Association and Society—List of Enrolled Practitioners—Dr Henry G. Lomieon—Dr. David Alter—Dr. James A. Fulton—Dr. J. Q. Robinson—Dr. W. J. Kline—Dr. J. T. Krepps—Dr. J. D. Milligan... 344

CHAPTER XLV.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

Condition of Early Instruction in the Early Province and State—Mr. Somerville's School at Greensburg—Country Schools—First Institutes—The Superintendency and the Opinion of the last Generation touching it—First Country Schools in the North of the County—List of County Superintendents: J. S. Walthour, H. M. Jones, J. Silliman, J. R. Spiegel—Present Statue of the Common Schools—The County Institute of 1881..... 371

CHAPTER XLVI.

MEXICO.

Public Excitement on Declaration of War, May 13, 1846—Military Spirit—Companies in Greensburg—Promptness of the Young Men of Westmoreland in responding to the Call for Volunteers—"Westmoreland Guards"—Roll—Affairs about Greensburg before their Departure—The Company's Place in the Army—Account of the War in Mexico, and Particulars of the Campaign of Gen. Scott's Army—Services of the Second Regiment and the "Guards" from Vera Cruz to Mexico—Honors paid the Company on its Return—Sketches of Capt. Simon H. Drum, Lieut. Richard Johnston, Andrew Ross, and other Members of the Company—Casualties and Deaths—Roll of the Company when discharged..... 382

CHAPTER XLVII.

WESTMORELAND IN THE CIVIL WAR.

The Call to Arms—The Response from Westmoreland—The Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers—History of its Colors—Biographical Sketch of Capt. E. H. Gay—The Fourteenth Regiment—The Twenty-eighth Regiment—The Fortieth Regiment ("Eleventh Reserve")—Forty-first Regiment ("Twelfth Reserve")—The Fifty-third Regiment—Sixty-fourth Regiment (Fourth Cavalry)—Seventy-fourth Regiment—Eighty-fourth Regiment—One Hundredth Regiment ("The Bound-Head Regiment")—The One Hundred and Fifth Regiment—One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Regiment (Nine Months' Service)—One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Regiment (Drafted Militia)—Two Hundred and Sixth Regiment (One Year's Service)—Two Hundred and Eleventh Regiment (One Year's Service)—Two Hundred and Twelfth (Sixth Artillery) Regiment—The Militia of 1862—Militia of 1863—Colored Troops, etc..... 388

CHAPTER XLVIII.

CANALS AND RAILROADS.

Remarks on the subject of Transportation—How it was regarded in Pennsylvania—Canals in Pennsylvania—Public Works of the State—First Canal—Boat west of the Mountains—Advantages of the Canal here—Dickens' account of Canal-Boating along the Conemaugh—Steam Railways—The First Railroads in Pennsylvania—A Continuous Line through the State projected—It is finally Constructed—Stations and Distances—Western Pennsylvania Railroad—Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad—Southwest Pennsylvania Railway..... 400

CHAPTER XLIX.

COKE.

Features of the Coke Region—Connellsville Coke Region—Pioneers in the Coke Business—Description of the Coal Business—The Properties of Coked Coal—Questions of Cost—Other Veins of Coal within the Connellsville Region—Growth of the Coke Industry—Statistics—Mount Pleasant Region—Moorewood Mines—Coke Crushing—Standard Mine—Other Companies about Mount Pleasant—East Huntingdon Township Region—Scottdale Iron-Works—Scottdale Coke Region—At Stonersville—Latrobe Region—The Monastery Coke-Works—Latrobe Works—Soxman's Works—Loyalhanna Works—Ridgeview Works—St. Clair Works—Millwood Works—Irwin Region—Westmoreland Coal Company—Penn Gas-Coal Company—Sewickley Region—Cokeville Region..... 403

CHAPTER L.

CIVIL HISTORY, STATISTICS, AND MISCELLANEOUS.

Changes in the Territorial Limits of Westmoreland prior to the erection of Washington and Fayette Counties—Purchase of 1784, and changes in Township and County Lines subsequent thereto—Mississinawa Township—Election Districts, 1881—Tables of Population—List of Judges, Associates, Justices, and County Officers—County Expenses—Big Frost of 1859—Centennials of 1873 and 1875—Resolutions of 1875..... 414

CHAPTER LI.

COUNTY BUILDINGS.

Acts relating to County Buildings—The Old Court-House—Present Court-House—Sheriff's House and County Jail—Poor-House, now County Home—Tables of Expenditures, etc., for County Home—The Cattle Show—Wool-Growers' Association—Westmoreland County Agricultural Society..... 425

CHAPTER LII.

NOMENCLATURE..... 432

CHAPTER LIII.

SPECIAL BIOGRAPHIES.

John Covode—Alexander Johnston—William Freame Johnston—John White Geary—Hon. James Keenan—Richard Coulter Drum—Commodore John Bonnett Marchand—Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner..... 436

APPENDICES..... 447

BOROUGHES AND TOWNSHIPS.

GREENSBURG.....	497
HEMPFIELD.....	528
MOUNT PLEASANT.....	534
NORTH HUNTINGDON.....	552
ROSTRAVER.....	561
FAIRFIELD.....	569
DONEGAL.....	579
DERRY.....	583
WASHINGTON.....	606
FRANKLIN.....	610
SALEM.....	619
UNITY.....	633
SOUTH HUNTINGDON.....	644
ALLEGHENY.....	672
EAST HUNTINGDON.....	679
LIGONIER.....	695
LOYALHANNA.....	702
SEWICKLEY.....	702
LOWER AND UPPER BURRELL.....	710
BELL.....	714
COOK.....	717
PENN.....	721
ST. CLAIR.....	726

BIOGRAPHICAL.

	PAGE		PAGE
Addison, Judge.....	302	Loucks Family.....	687
Alexander, J. B.....	311	Lowry, Hortensius.....	568
Alter, David.....	364	Marchand, A. G.....	323
Ashbaugh, D. B.....	678	Marchand, Henry C.....	328
Baker, Reuben.....	604	Marchand, John B.....	444
Barclay, Thomaæ J.....	524	Marchand Family.....	523
Banghman, Jacob.....	668	Markle, Cyrus P.....	656
Beaver, John F.....	322	Markle, C. C.....	658
Beazell, Benjamin F.....	567	Markle, Joseph.....	653
Bouquet, Henry.....	28	Markle, Shepard B., Jr.....	657
Brady, Hugh Y.....	524	Markle Family.....	703
Brinker, George.....	605	McAfee, James R.....	343
Brinker, Joseiah.....	726	McCall, Franklin.....	533
Buffington, Joseph.....	308	McClanahan, M. P.....	603
Burrell, Jeremiah M.....	333	McCormick, Eli.....	559
Burrell and Knox, Judges.....	307	McCormick Family.....	558
Carlina, A. M.....	709	McFarlane, Andrew L.....	559
Carothers, James P.....	667	McGonigal, John R.....	604
Chambers, William.....	605	McQuilkin Family.....	627
Covode, George H.....	577	Miller, Samuel.....	640
Covode, John.....	436	Milligan, John D.....	370
Cowan, Edgar.....	334	Milligan Family.....	706
Cowan Family.....	557	Moore, J. W.....	528
Croushore, George W.....	532	Morrison, John.....	524
Cummins Family.....	652	Ormsby, John.....	351
Daly, Thomas L.....	566	Overholt, Abraham.....	688
Dick Family.....	651	Overholt, Henry S.....	688
Dillinger, Samuel.....	688	Overholt, Jacob S.....	689
Dillinger Family.....	686	Overholt Family.....	685
Donnelly, William.....	606	Painter, Israel.....	652
Drum, Richard C.....	442	Paul, James L.....	631
Ekin Family.....	557	Paul, Samuel J.....	631
Findlay, James.....	317	Pershing, Samuel.....	726
Foster, A. W.....	316	Plumer, Alexander.....	661
Foeter, Henry D.....	324	Plumer, George.....	658
Fox Family.....	686	Plumer, George, Jr.....	662
Fulton, Jamee A.....	365	Plumer, John C.....	662
Gaffney, Daniel.....	533	Pollock, John.....	701
Galloway, John.....	549	Postlethwaite, James.....	346
Geary, John W.....	440	Reid, E. H.....	693
George, Isaac.....	643	Robertson, Oliver B.....	690
Given, Robert.....	628	Robinson, John Q.....	366
Green, Peter.....	652	Robinson, Robert S.....	660
Greenawalt, Caleb.....	708	Rohrer, Frederick, Sr.....	523
Guffey, William.....	707	Shepler, Joseph.....	566
Hecht Family.....	652	Shields, Robert.....	630
Hough Family.....	651	Shryock, David W.....	526
Huff, George F.....	525	Shupe, Daniel.....	551
Hugue Family.....	628	Sloan, James.....	609
Hunter, Jamee A.....	333	Small, John.....	532
Irwin Family.....	558	Smith, William T.....	641
Jack Family.....	522	Smith Family.....	651
Johnston, Alexander.....	437	Snodgrass, John.....	632
Johnston, John W.....	639	St. Clair, Arthur.....	213
Johnston, W. F.....	439	Sterrett, John.....	692
Jordan Family.....	547	Stewart, A. A.....	327
Keenan, James.....	441	Stoner Family.....	686
King, Alfred T.....	353	Sutton, Lewis.....	609
Kline, Nicholas L. K.....	692	Tarr Family.....	687
Kline, W. J. K.....	367	Thompson, Lewis.....	719
Kline Family.....	628	Tintsmán, A. O.....	547
Krepe, Jacob F.....	664	Toner, Joseph M.....	446
Krepps, James T.....	369	Townsend, John H.....	677
Kuhns, Joseph H.....	329	Turney, Jacob.....	342
Laird, H. P.....	341	Walter, John.....	632
Leighty Family.....	651	Weaver, Willfam.....	720
Lippincott, Joseph.....	550	Weimer, S. B.....	671
Lobingier Family.....	546	Wirsing, James J.....	525
Logan, James A.....	310	Young, John.....	303
Lomleon, Henry G.....	363	Zimmerman, Z.....	629
Loucke, P. S.....	693

ILLUSTRATIONS.

	PAGE		PAGE
Alter, David.....	facing 364	Markle, C. C.....	facing 658
Asbbaugh, D. B.....	" 678	Markle, C. P., Residence and Paper-Mill of.....	" 705
Baker, Reuben.....	" 601	Markle, C. P., & Sons, Paper-Mill of.....	" 648
Baughman, Jacob.....	" 668	Markle, Cyrus P.....	" 656
Bezell, Benjamin F.....	" 568	Markle, Joseph.....	" 653
Bouquet, Henry.....	" 28	Markle, Shepard B., Jr.....	" 657
Brinker, George.....	" 605	Markleton Wood-Pulp Mills.....	" 704
Brinker, Josiab.....	" 726	McAfee, James R.....	" 343
Burrell, Jeremiab M.....	" 333	McCall, Franklin.....	" 533
Carline, A. M.....	" 709	McCall, Franklin, Residence of.....	" 530
Carothers, James P.....	" 667	McClanahan, M. P.....	" 596
Chambers, William.....	" 604	McCormick, Eli.....	" 568
Croushore, George W.....	" 531	McFarlane, Andrew L.....	" 559
Croushore, George W., Residence of.....	" 529	McGonigal, John R.....	" 603
Conemagh Viaduct.....	" 401	Miller, Samuel.....	" 640
County Home.....	" 428	Milligan, John D.....	" 370
Court-House.....	" 425	Moore, J. W.....	" 528
Covode, George H.....	" 577	Overholt, Abram.....	between 688, 699
Covode, John.....	" 436	Overholt, H. S.....	facing 690
Cowan, Edgar.....	" 335	Overholt, J. S.....	between 688, 699
Daly, Thomas L.....	" 566	Painter, Israel.....	facing 652
Dillinger, Samuel.....	" 686	Paul, S. J.....	" 631
Fulton, James A.....	" 365	Perabing, Samuel.....	" 727
Gaffney, D.....	between 532, 533	Plumer, George.....	" 659
Galloway, John.....	facing 549	Plumer, George, Residence of.....	" 647
George, Isaac.....	" 643	Plumer, J. C.....	" 662
Gibsonton Mills.....	between 564, 565	Pollock, John.....	" 701
Given, Robert.....	facing 628	Robertson, O. B.....	" 691
Greenawalt, Caleb.....	" 708	Robinson, John Q.....	" 368
Guffey, William.....	" 707	Robinson, Robert S.....	" 560
Johnston, A.....	" 438	Robinson Coat of Arms.....	367
Johnston, John W.....	" 639	Scottdale Rolling-Mill and Furnace.....	facing 682
Hill & Kenney, Works of.....	" 684	Shepler, Joseph.....	" 567
Hitchman, W. I., Residence of.....	" 544	Shields, Robert.....	" 630
Hnf, George F.....	" 524	Shryock, David W.....	" 526
Hunter, James A.....	" 334	Sbupe, Daniel.....	" 551
Interior St. Clair's House.....	222	Sloan, James.....	" 609
Keener House.....	facing 706	Smail, John.....	" 532
Kline, N. L. K.....	" 692	Smtb, William T.....	" 641
Kline, W. J. K.....	" 368	St. Clair, Artbur.....	" 213
Kreps, Jacob F.....	" 664	St. Clair's Monument.....	224
Krepps, James T.....	" 369	Sterrett, John.....	facing 693
Laird, H. P.....	" 341	St. Xavier's Academy.....	" 276
Lippincott, Joseph.....	" 550	St. Xavier's Academy (East View).....	" 278
Lomison, Henry G.....	" 363	Sutton, Dr. Lewis.....	" 371
Lowry, Hortensius.....	" 569	Thompson, Lewis.....	" 719
Lowry, Hortensius, Residence of.....	" 562	Tintaman, A. O.....	" 547
Map, Outline, of County.....	between 12, 13	Townsend, John H.....	" 677
Map, Geological, of County.....	" 12, 13	Turney, Jacob.....	" 342
Map of Westmoreland as Organized.....	facing 51	Walter, John.....	" 632
Map, Battle of Great Meadows, 1754.....	" 19	Weimer, S. C., Buildings of.....	" 671
Map of Coke Region.....	between 404, 405	Wirsiug, James A.....	" 525
Map, Fort Ligonier.....	" 102, 103	Young, John.....	" 303
Marcband, H. C.....	facing 328	Zimmerman, Z.....	" 629

WESTM

OUTLINE MAP
of ORELAND COUNTY

engraved expressly for this Work.

WESTM

GEOLOGICAL MAP of DRELAND COUNTY

Lesley, State Geologist
Drawn expressly for this Work.

EXPLANATION OF COLORS.

-  Upper Barren Measures.
-  Pittsburgh Bed and Upper Coal Measures.
-  Lower Barren Measures.
-  Upper Freeport Bed and Lower Coal Measures.
-  Conglomerate, XII.
-  Mauch Chunk Red Shale, XI.
-  Pocono Sandstone, X.
-  Catskill, IX.

HISTORY

OF

THE COUNTY OF WESTMORELAND, PENNSYLVANIA.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY—EARLY PROVINCIAL HISTORY.

Prefatory—Necessity of Preserving the Facts of Local History—Chief Sources of Local History—Written Accounts and Traditions—Penn's Grant—His Policy—Success of His Colony—Alexander Spotswood, Governor of Virginia, wants the British Government to make a Line of Forts along the Western Rivers—The French in Canada—Their Policy towards the Indians—Alienation of the Indians from the English—Indians of Western Pennsylvania confined to their Reservations on the Ohio—The Ohio Company—Rivalry between the Governments of Pennsylvania and Virginia respecting the Indian Trade.

We propose in the following pages to collect something of the early history of the county of Westmoreland, a county which has aptly been designated as a mother of counties. What, above all other things, has induced us to this attempt is the fact that nothing of the kind has heretofore been attempted. A local history cannot be compared with a general historical narrative, nor has it been the intention of the writer to show his effort in that direction. He has, however, made a reasonable effort to collect all matter relating to our early history from the written and printed documents accessible, but which are scattered far around, like the mystic leaves which, blown by the blast from the hollow earth, were scattered to all the winds in the cave of the Sibyl. To collect and to illustrate what has been written has been our labor, and we have tried from the first to represent to our contemporaries a truthful picture of our ancestors and their times. In the lapse of well-nigh a hundred years nearly all things change,—laws, customs, habits, manners, society, as well as the physical aspect of the very earth. The Westmorelander of 1773 would no more recognize the Westmoreland of to-day than we should recognize the Westmoreland of 1773.

By the word "history," which we choose in deference to adopt, we mean not only an account of the civil and military affairs of the people who first came into these woods, but a narrative of such individual acts as have been saved from the all-devouring tooth of Time, a description of their cabins and furniture, of their meeting-houses and graveyards, of their apparel and personal appearance, of their house-warm-ings and militia-musters, and a notice of such things generally as, being of local interest, are not usually printed in general collections. We shall, as best we can, arrange our collected material so that the historical matter may be preserved in some chronological order, to the end that a clearer idea may be had of our local affairs as they follow each other. We are conscious that an undertaking of this kind, even in the rudest outline, will be but imperfectly accomplished, and we do not flatter the reader with a prospect fallacious and not to be realized. The history of our county, or indeed that of any single county, of any commonwealth or of any municipality, will, however ably produced, be far short of anything like perfection. This comes from circumstances peculiar to our country in its colonization and development.

The student of our history, even as a student, labors under many and great disadvantages. In writing up a general narrative many most interesting particulars must necessarily be omitted, either as irrelevant to the general text, or as possessing merely a local interest; while, on the other hand, one who attempts to clothe an isolated district with something of historical interest finds extraneous and foreign matter continually obtruded on his attention. In other words, the early history of Western Pennsylvania embraces largely the history of our county, while the history of our county itself has a living interest only to ourselves. It is true that the history of Allegheny County, of Washington, and of Fayette is in part the history of Westmoreland County, but the public mind has so long separated these boundaries and has so localized such places as Fort Pitt, and such times as the Whiskey Insurrection, as to make all matter worthy of note centre in the county where such matter rightly belongs. It would be as unreasonable that the history of Virginia, as bounded in the grants of the great Elizabeth to her sailor adventurers, should embrace the history of the proprietary of Penn or the colony of Calvert. We have therefore considered that we do better in confining our remarks to the local history of Westmoreland as we know it, and to touch on the general history of the State and the West only in so far as it is needed to throw light on the former, or to develop the context. This fact, however, is apparent, that all the local history of that part of Westmoreland which, after the erection of the county of Washington in 1781, belongs to that county was, by the singular troubles which occurred from about the time of the establishment of our county to that date, no more identified with the history of our county, properly considered, than the local history of Augusta County in Virginia is identified with it.

We may make the remarks of a very sagacious and elegant writer¹ our own in observing that indeed the very difficulty at this time encountered in procuring authentic information upon the subject proposed to be treated in this work is strong evidence in itself of the means that exist of redeeming without delay the earlier events of our history from the grasp of forgetfulness. Every passing day increases the labor of research, and a few years will obliterate and consign to utter oblivion all that we should desire to remember and preserve of our past annals. We work, like the lapidary, to replace the scattered dies of a mosaic.

No one can, as we have intimated, be aware of the unseemliness of such a task unless he wanders in the same field. The absolute facts which belong of right to our history are scattered here and there in fragments in books, many of them unworthy indeed, or else they lie in records not yet arranged. A great and most profitable account of our early affairs—and the remark applies to the unwritten history of any other part of our country—might have been found in the memories of the aged; but this source is now, indeed, very unclear and deceptive. It would be useless for us to inquire into the causes of this however much we lament the fact, for by far the most interest attaches to what the older people carry in traditions. The verbal testimony of the peasants of Lancashire, carried from father to son; is that part of Macaulay's account of the battle of Sedgemoor and the Bloody Assizes which most excites the attention of the reader. With us such memorials have been suffered to go in decay. We may remark that great events have often been little regarded by the people who were witnesses to them, and for reasons such as control these, what to us might be a subject of wonder, of admiration, and of pleasure was to even the closest observers of those past times of so trite and trivial a nature as to be below the dignity of a subject for narration. When a later generation observed that accounts of Indian warfare, descriptions of border life, the romantic details attached to instances of single adventures were largely and credulously devoured by the readers of their time, they began to misrepresent the truth and to misstate facts. And it is too true that often what purports to be an account of manners and customs, either of the indians or of the settlers, is far from the truth. White heroines running off with gold-bedecked chieftains was as absurd as to represent Ligonier Fort as a Norman castle with drawbridge, turrets, and donjon. Such are the incongruities of circumstances; while still another disadvantage arises from the bias which our minds are likely to assume in treating of a subject so nearly contemporaneous. We usually run into one of two extremes, and consider that all those of the generations and the times immediately preceding us and ours were either all great heroes or half-civilized old clowns. All we can do is to contribute our mite to the literary store-house of our noble old county.

We shall of necessity have to begin at a time long prior to the formation of our county, as the soil of Westmoreland was dedicated with tears and blood to imperishable renown in the annals of English and American history before her children sat down to the enjoyment of freedom and peace within its borders.

All the vast region of this continent on its discovery was, according to the polity of the English government derived from feudal times, the property of the king. With it, as with all the demesne lands of the realm, he might do as he pleased. Accordingly all the lands not colonized by the state were appropriated to favorites or to dependants. To satisfy a debt owing from the crown to Admiral William Penn, a donation of the tract now commonly known as Pennsylvania was granted to William Penn, son and heir to the creditor, a Quaker in religious persuasion, and a favorite and courtier at the court of Charles the Second. The nature of the grant was that it was given after the fashion of feudal grants, with the feudal strictures somewhat restricted, in conformity with the new usage established at the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne.² Charles Stuart, the king, claimed a title in these lands, inhabited by savages, from discovery and from conquest, as in 1664 all the settlements and possessions of the Dutch along the Delaware River were taken from them by the English. The charter of Penn was signed by the king on March 4, 1681.

It was not till a long time after the establishing of the colony that the boundaries as we now have them were definitely fixed. There were conflicting disputes with the colonial authorities of New York, of Connecticut, of New Jersey, of Maryland, and of Virginia. The dispute between Pennsylvania and Maryland was satisfactorily adjusted in 1769 by compromising on the famous Mason and Dixon's line, a division line which long divided the slave States from the free States. The dispute with Virginia is the only one which interests us. Virginia, from the time that Washington walked over the land under instruction of Dinwiddie, claimed all Western Pennsylvania. At the peace of 1764 the limits of the Province were not marked, and in 1774-75 a county formed by the burgesses of Virginia, and inhabited mostly by Virginians, was established within the territorial limits of what is now Pennsylvania.

¹ David Paul Brown, "The Forum."

² If the reader has any curiosity in this line he will be further satisfied by referring to Hallam's Constitutional History of England.

Governor Penn, before he made a settlement, proposed to purchase of the Indians their title to the occupancy of the land. He early treated with them and gave them valuable consideration for their hunting-grounds. We will briefly repeat the order of these purchases and concessions, so that we may have an idea of how the bounds were increased. By treaty with the Five Nations in 1736 all land within the boundaries of Penn's territories was claimed to have been purchased from the Indians. But owing to some misunderstanding afterwards the Indians did not acquiesce, and separate treaties were made. It is said with some degree of positive assertion that the misunderstanding of these treaties did much to drive the Indians subsequently to take part with the French. By a treaty at Albany in 1754 the Indian leaders of the Five (later the Six) Nations again conveyed to the Penns all the lands westward to the setting of the sun. The dissatisfaction produced by this treaty on the great body of the natives fully justified them in joining with the French in that long and bloody war known as the French and Indian war. The Indians claimed that they did not understand the limits of this purchase, and that lands were conveyed which did not belong to the tribes making the conveyance. By the treaty of Easton (1758), to put a stop to increasing warfare, these lands were surrendered to the Indians on the ground that they had not understood the terms, and the right of the whites to occupancy was confined to the east of the Allegheny Mountains. But by the last great purchase, that of Fort Stanwix in New York, of 1768, all title of the Indians, with a small exception in the northwestern part of the State, was relinquished and passed to the whites. Westmoreland belongs to this purchase, and it will be noted farther on how this treaty operated on the land titles and on the colonization of our county. By the treaty of 1784, at Fort Stanwix again, all the remainder of the land was finally secured. Thus in 1785 all the right of soil belonged to the Province. Before this right was vested, by an act of 1769, it was made highly penal for any one to settle on lands owned by the Indians, or rather not purchased by the authorities from them. The reason was to prevent the Indians from becoming open enemies.

The success of the colony was rapid and great. In one year after the arrival of Penn the number of colonists was estimated as high as four thousand. The Welsh settled along the Schuylkill, and the Germans founded Germantown. The government of Penn had been instituted with one great object. This object was to secure a place where the religious opinions of his sect, the Quakers, might be exemplified; where no enforcement acts of conformity would be in force; and where religious toleration, civil liberty, and unbiased justice to all men were the worthy, philosophical, and Christian doctrines of a practical government.

Hence not only the colonists knew this, but the red men also understood it; and here for more than two generations, the most precarious time in an infant colony, the whites and the Indians lived in undisturbed harmony. The settlers along the Schuylkill and Delaware when they went to bed did not go in dreaded expectation of the night. Here the children were not in deadly fear at the sight of a painted barbarian. Here the outposts of civilization were not marked with piles of ashes, the only remains of a cabin reared in difficulty and with hope. That feeling of security which comes from habit was a fruit of the treaty under the great elm at Kensington. Hence settlers came flocking in numbers, not only from the British Isles and the Low Countries, but from other colonial settlements,—from Connecticut, from Maryland, from Virginia, from North Carolina,—and with those who came in with the laudable desire of making a permanent home came others who were bent on the making of money. These were the traders that followed a business scarcely less honorable than the business of Capt. Kidd,—land-sharks and water-sharks.¹ They treated with the Indians and they cheated them; they dealt in contraband goods, and they pursued their calling in contravention of the instructions of Penn and his plan of dealing with the natives. But it must be acknowledged that they were an important element in the grand scheme of colonization, which with us, after all, is more a matter of fact than of theory.

Under the wise policy instituted by Penn, and carried out by his successors, the colony grew and flourished unprecedentedly for more than sixty years. But as yet all settlements were confined to the east of the Susquehanna.²

In the early part of the eighteenth century, Alexander Spotswood, Governor of Virginia, headed an expedition which went out to explore the limits of their own colony. From the summit of the Allegheny Mountains he first looked out upon that vast expanse of territory theretofore unknown to the whites. He proposed a plan to the British government by which they might anticipate the settlement of this portion of country before any other of the European nations. But, owing to the domestic relations of the government and to the ceaseless war on the continent, the colonies were left to see to their own advancement, and to protect the interests of the mother-country in its most remote boundaries. This politic and far-seeing Governor also, in view of the attitude and in view of the intention of the French government in relation to these colonies, advocated the policy of establishing a chain of forts from the lakes to the Mississippi, for the attitude of France and of England was plainly to be observed. The English saw with jealousy the progress of the French on the St. Lawrence and the lakes. The French were active in reclaiming this unoccupied ground which each claimed, the French by occupancy and discovery, the English by original and earlier charters from their own monarchs, which charters were, it is true, boundless, and took in all the land from the Atlantic to the Great South Sea. It is therefore to be noticed that the country west of the Allegheny chain was not absolutely within the prescribed boundaries of either nation. There was, however, a kind of tacit understanding among the individual traders coming into these regions under protection of the colonial authorities directly to the eastward of them. These traders occasionally, as early as 1720, ventured as far west as Carlisle, and a prominent and fearless one, John Frazer, opened a trading-house at Venango, and afterward, about 1752, on the Monongahela at where Turtle Creek empties. Had these early traders been protected by the proprietary government of Pennsylvania, there is no doubt that the colony would have been greatly benefited by it, and that following discussion, which lasted for many years between the government of Pennsylvania and the government of Virginia, would not have arisen. But the pacific measures which at first were to the advantage of the colony were now working a disadvantage to her own citizens and an advantage to the French, for the colonial system of the French differed greatly from that of the English. The French proceeded on a fixed policy and on instructions sent out from the ministry at Versailles. This policy was enforced by Governors of high rank and executed by willing subordinates. Instead of many colonial establishments, each conflicting with the other on matters arising from misunderstood boundaries and from other matters growing out of deep-seated prejudices, they had one centralized colony, in which all interests were the same, and in which their very missionaries took an active and an effective part in shaping and controlling. The policy of Penn towards the red men was good so long as the red men were left to themselves, for his treatment towards them was eminently just; but the same policy when they were left to the wily influence of the French was certainly not to be admired. The Indians when moved back step by step could not at last understand such justness. And they surely had reason, for in several instances they were unjustly defrauded of their territory or their hunting-grounds; not, indeed, by the agents of Penn, but by their own race, the Indian Yankees of the Six Nations, who, representing themselves to be the owners of territory which belonged to other tribes, drove a thrifty bargain in disposing of it to good advantage to the peaceable representatives of the proprietary. A sufficient instance is that in which this confederacy—who would have sold their own land as well as the land of their neighbors a dozen times a day—ousted the Delawares from their possessions on the head-waters of the Susquehanna.

¹ "There be land rats, and there be water-rats."—Shylock. ² 1745.

But thus it was that through many causes the Indians who claimed these parts were, before the middle of the century (1750), confined to their reservation on the Ohio River, a name which embraced the river we now call Allegheny. Here they were more than ever open to the influence of the French, whose base of operations was at Montreal. These, with a diplomatic policy peculiar to themselves, won the good graces of the Indians by representing that they were their only friends, and effected an alliance at the expense of rum and tobacco, arms for their use and trinkets for their amusement. They also succeeded in forming the various tribes, each with a local enmity towards the other, into one confederacy as against the whites of English birth and against their own natural enemies. No sooner did an English trader open a cabin to deal with the natives than he was peremptorily commanded by the authority of the King of France to leave. Some were treated in a hostile and barbarous manner, although there was no open war. The French, descending the head-waters of the Ohio, at various places put up marks to indicate that the country was of the dominion of the Christian king. In the mean time the English settlements in Pennsylvania were extending westward. The traders, who to an extent were the pioneers of civilization, preceded them, and wherever they could opened a paying trade. The proprietary government made no effort to effect settlements west of the Susquehanna; and even the method of traffic pursued by these traders was not, as we have said, countenanced. But in spite of the strongest prohibitory enactments and the immediate exertions of the Governors themselves there were always many ready to risk life and property in pursuit of this lucrative calling. In time the succeeding proprietaries and executives winked at this breach of faith with the Indians. And thus, between the English under shadow of the colonial government of this province and the French, all the Indian trade was monopolized, and at this juncture (1748) the Ohio Company was organized.

Thomas Lee, one of the Council of Virginia, with twelve others of Virginia and Maryland and a few merchants of London, formed a company with the design of effecting settlements in the wild lands west of the Alleghenies, and under this ostensible project of securing part of the Indian trade. Their grant embraced a portion of five hundred thousand acres lying on the south side of the Ohio between the Monongahela and Kanawha Rivers. The privilege was reserved to the company of embracing a portion of the lands on the north side of the river if deemed expedient. The company had several further beneficiary exemptions, in the nature of freedom from taxation, on condition of their seating settlers on the land within a limited time, and of their building a fort and sustaining a garrison to protect the settlement. As nothing could be done without the assent of the Indians, the government of Virginia was petitioned to invite them to a treaty. The company further resolved to make roads from the head-waters of the Potomac to some point on the Monongahela, to erect houses, and to locate settlements.

And now commenced a rivalry between the government of Pennsylvania and the government of Virginia. Andrew Palmer, president of the Council of the proprietary government, on June 23, 1748, gave instructions under his hand and seal to Conrad Weiser, in which he was to use his utmost diligence to acquire a perfect knowledge of the number, situation, disposition, and strength of all the Indians about the Ohio, whether friends, neutrals, or enemies. Weiser, from his knowledge of the language and dispositions of the Indians, was eminently fit to treat with them on the most favorable terms.

CHAPTER II.

THE FRENCH OCCUPANCY OF FORT DUQUESNE.

Conrad Weiser and George Crogan—Weiser's Report on the Tribes about the Ohio—Their Numbers and their Disposition—King Shingass and Queen Alliquippi—Gist's Settlement—George Washington sent by the Governor of Virginia to the Indian Tribes—His First Journey, and the Information he Acquired—The Ohio Company cuts Roads, makes Settlements, erects a Store-House and Fort at Redstone, and takes possession of the Forks of the Ohio River—Its Soldiers and Men are driven away by the French, who erect Fort Duquesne—The Governor of Virginia reinforces Washington, who retires to the Great Meadows, and Fights his First Battle at Fort Necessity—Braddock's Campaign projected.

WEISER, setting out from Berks County, crossed the Kiskiminetas and came to the Ohio Aug. 25, 1748. He was rendered valuable assistance by George Crogan, a trader and agent in the interest of the Council,¹ who was settled on Beaver Creek, a few miles from where it empties into the Ohio. The number of their men and the various tribes of which they were composed were learned from themselves, who gave Weiser the count in little bundles of twigs or sticks tied to represent the several tribes. They had in all seven hundred and twenty-nine warriors. The Senecas, Wyandots, Delawares, and Shawnees had the most. These were chiefly ruled by the Five Nations.

This celebrated confederation, which had brought under their domination all the other Indian tribes in the middle part of the continent, when they were first known to the whites had their council-fires about the lakes in New York. Having conceded their lands to the whites, they now still held north-western Pennsylvania. These five nations were the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Cayugas, the Onondagas, and the Senecas. They were sometimes called the Six Nations after they had admitted into their family the Tuscaroras, a tribe which was expelled from Carolina in 1712. They were called by the French the Iroquois; they called themselves the Mingoes. They had been engaged in war from times long before they were known to the whites, and such was the force of their combination and their love for war that all native opposition gave way before them. They had, since the Province was in possession of the whites, brought under their control the strongest tribe known to the early settlers. This was the tribe of the Lenni Lenapes, as they called themselves, but who are known in history as the Delawares, a name they received in honor of Lord de la Warr, for whom also the colony of Delaware and the river on which they lived when first known were named. The king of the Delawares, Shingass, lived, at Washington's first visit, 1753, not far from the Allegheny River. The tribe was divided, and some of them always remained friendly to the English. The confederation commanded the Shawanese also, a tribe powerful in war, and which produced many able warriors, of whom Tecumseh and Cornstalk are ranked among the highest. Part of the Shawanese and part of the Delawares early came to the Ohio for the convenience of game. Of all single tribes the Shawanese was the strongest, and when on the war-path the most savage. There were other tribes which had dwindled down to insignificant numbers. They all lived within neighboring distance of each other, but each tribe claimed a distinct hunting ground. One tribe which lived between the Turtle Creek and the Youghiogheny was under the sway of a woman. She was known to the English by the name of Queen Alliquippi, and is the same mentioned by Washington in his journal of 1753. She appears to have been the friend of the English. She had a son who claimed the distinguished title of Prophet, and who professed to see in the future the realization of the most romantic dreams of the red men.

Weiser found that although a few were favorable to the English, and especially to the colonists of Pennsylvania, yet the majority were completely under the influence of the French.

But neither the now active attempts of the government of Pennsylvania nor the attempts of the Ohio Company under the patronage of the government of Virginia effected anything either in conciliating the disaffected Indians or in thwarting the encroachment of the French. The latter still persisted in their scheme of erecting fortifications in a proposed line from their settlements in Canada to their settlements at New Orleans. They had erected forts at Presque Isle,² in Lake Erie, at Le Boeuf, at Venango. These active determinations so quickened the latent spirit of the English that Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia sent a young man of the name of George Washington to ask an explanation of their designs. Washington came out on this expedition, and on the 22^d of November, 1753, stopped at Frazer's, at the mouth of Turtle Creek. We should note this incident, that Washington was one of the first to tread the wilderness where now is Westmoreland. He came on his route by way of Wills Creek to where Gist was settled as agent of the Ohio Company,¹ and thence northwest to Shannopin's, the name of an old Indian town on the Allegheny, about two miles above the Ohio. From here he examined the location at the junction of the river, and reported its situation as favorable for a fortification. He proceeded to Logstown,² where he had called a conference of Indians. In all his efforts and in his object he was thwarted by the influence of the French; but he acquired a great deal of information, learned the number of forts erected and projected, with the number of their garrisons and their equipments. On proceeding to Venango he there, under the French flag, had an interview with the French commander. They there openly disclosed to him their design of holding by force against all intruders the land which they claimed from the discovery of La Salle. The council was peremptorily brought to a close. On his return he narrowly escaped with his life; once an Indian shot at him from the distance of fifteen paces; and again in attempting to cross the Allegheny, then floating with ice.

¹ The executive department of Pennsylvania was composed of the Governor and his Council. These were simply advisory. The entire legislative body consisted of a single body of delegates chosen by the people. The Council is not to be understood as an Upper House of the Legislature.

² Presque Isle is near Erie; Le Boeuf, now Waterford, in Crawford County; Venango, near Franklin; Venango River, now French Creek; Duquesne, now Pittsburgh.

He relates in his journal an amusing incident of his return. He stopped to see Queen Alliquippi. She had expressed concern at their passing her by and not calling. To ease her lacerated feelings he presented her with a watchcoat and a bottle of rum, and he states that the latter was the more acceptable present, and that it entirely mollified her indignation.

But nevertheless the Ohio Company still continued their movements in the West. They had built a block-house at Redstone, now Brownsville, and in the spring of 1754 made arrangements to take permanent possession of the country about the forks of the Ohio. About the middle of February, Trent, Gist, and several others arrived at this point, and there waited on more, to the number of seventy or eighty, to come down the river, the Monongahela, on which Redstone Old Fort was built. They began the formation of a redoubt. Before their work was finished a French officer, Contrecoeur, with a thousand French and Indians and eighteen pieces of cannon, arrived from Venango. They compelled Ensign Ward, commandant in the absence of Trent, to surrender. This was the first open act of a war which desolated the colonies for nine years, and which agitated both continents, but which in the end resulted in favor of the English, and so shaped the destinies of these colonies that they in time equaled in dominion and in power either the empire of King George or the empire of King Louis.

The French, taking possession of this disputed point, built a fort, which they called Fort Duquesne, after the Governor of Canada. They expended much labor upon it and made it a strong fortification; but it was never submitted to the ordeal of a siege. They made to themselves a stronger defense by the alliance of the natives, whom they drew to their interest by favorable treaties. They summoned all the neighboring tribes together and loaded them with presents, guns and ammunition, blankets and beads. And now occurring the treaty of 1754, the alienation of the Indians was made complete. This treaty was held at Albany by order of the king. This had been recommended by the Lords of Trade and Plantations, that all the provinces might be comprised in one treaty. Thus we see how that the interests of all the provinces were affected, and how the subsequent war became one common to all:

The action of the Ohio Company in attempting to build a fort at the Forks of the Ohio River was under authority and assistance of the Virginia government. Governor Dinwiddie, representing the necessity of this procedure, issued a proclamation for recruits. To such as entered the service he gave a bounty of land, appropriating for this purpose two hundred thousand acres on the east side of the Ohio. Under these claims lands were held in the southwestern part of the State; but not all, for some were held by mili-

¹ CHRISTOPHER GIST.—The name of Christopher Gist, a model American pioneer, is inseparably connected with the early settlement of Western Pennsylvania. We shall frequently allude to him and to his services hereafter. He was a native of Maryland, and, like his father, Richard, was a surveyor. He was "a man of excellent character, energetic, fearless, and a thorough woodsman." He was intimate with the foremost men of Maryland and Virginia, and when the Ohio Company was organized they employed Gist as their surveyor and agent. In 1750 he was sent out by them to explore and examine the country bordering on the Ohio and its branches. At the time he received the appointment he was residing at Yalikin, N. C. He immediately set out on his object. With a boy and two horses he arrived at Shannopin's Town, one of the principal Indian towns in this region, to which traders resorted or at which they had store-houses. It was situated on the bank of the Allegheny River, now in the Twelfth Ward in the city of Pittsburgh, between Penn Avenue, Thirtieth Street and Two-Mile Run. About twenty Delaware families occupied the place, under their chief, Shannopin. Although it was a small place, it was one of much importance. From there he went down the Ohio to Beaver Creek, and thence to the eastern parts of Ohio Territory. After exploring the Miami Valley, he returned to North Carolina by way of Kentucky and Southwestern Virginia. In the winter of 1751-52 he was employed by the company in exploring the country bordering on the Youghiogheny and Monongahela and the south side of the Ohio. In the latter part of this summer or fall of 1753 he commenced a settlement for the company at the place since known as Mount Braddock, in Fayette County. Eleven other families settled with him here. This settlement, before Braddock's campaign, was the first settlement of the English-American colonists in Western Pennsylvania. From Wills Creek (Cumberland, Md.) Gist accompanied Washington as his guide to Venango.

² Logstown was a cluster of log houses built by the French for the Indians. They had a trading-house here, and here many conferences were held. There has great dispute arisen lately as to the exact location of the place, some contending that it was situated on the north side and some on the south side of the Ohio. Both sides produce good authorities for their position. The fact appears to be that there were two Logtowns directly opposite each other, one on either side of the river, and one older than the other. The older Log-town appears from good authority to have been situated on the north side of the river, and whether there was or was not another Logstown is not material.

MAP OF THE BATTLE
 of
 GREAT MEADOWS
 July 31 1754

tary permit, and some under the land titles of the colony of Virginia, but all under the belief that the jurisdiction of that colony covered this debatable ground.

But it was not in the nature of those English-American colonists to so easily give in to the demands of an enemy, howsoever well or ill those demands might be founded. And the Governor of Virginia, determining on securing the site so advantageously pointed out by Washington, had in the mean time sent out two companies subject to Washington's orders. Capt. Trent, with one company, had preceded Washington, who was at Wills Creek when he got information of the surrender of Ensign Ward. Washington knew that it was impossible that he could take the position lost, but he resolved to proceed to Redstone, and there fortify himself till the arrival of reinforcements. He hewed a road through the wilderness and over the mountains on an old Indian trail which crossed to the Potomac, and which was pointed out by a friendly Indian in his service called Nemaquin. At the Youghiogheny he was stopped for want of a bridge. This was about half the distance to the Redstone. He here found that the French were advancing to meet him. He therefore hastened on with the purpose of intercepting them at a place called the Great Meadows, which location he knew to be a favorable one for his security.¹ At the dawning of the day on the 28th of May, 1754, they saw the French erecting their tents in a retired valley. A detachment was ordered to surround them; both then fired upon the enemy at the same instant. Their leader was killed, and all, with the exception of one that escaped, were captured. A stockade was here erected, the reinforcements came in in due time, and Washington, by the death of Col. Fry, the commander of the expedition, was left in sole command.

Washington was at this time but twenty-two years of age, but his nature was of a calm, calculating, and heroic kind. He learned from his Indian spies that reinforcements had arrived at Fort Duquesne. It was therefore impossible for him to take it. He retired to his stockade now called Fort Necessity, and there awaited the approach of the enemy. They had scarcely secured themselves when they were attacked by fifteen hundred French and Indians. Nearly all day in the heart of the wilderness the battle raged. So well did Washington defend his handful of men that they were accorded unwonted terms by a capitulation, and allowed to return to their homes, marching off in military order with their baggage.

England and France were now enemies, and the British government resolved on opposing the French in America by aggressive movements. Reinforcements of royal regulars were sent to the colonies. A plan of campaign was adopted, and in this campaign three expeditions were organized. The first, under command of Gen. Edward Braddock, commander-in-chief, was to operate against Fort Duquesne; the second, under Gen. Shirley, against Fort Niagara and Frontenac; the third, under Gen. Johnson, against Crown Point.

The campaign of Gen. Braddock, and the particulars connected with it, are perhaps better known to us than any other incident in our historical annals. This local interest has been heightened by the national interest attached to it. In this campaign Washington first served with something more than ordinary distinction. The magnificent inception of this expedition, the first extensive campaign of regular troops with modern artillery for a battle with the aborigines and their allies; the great expectations formed upon its success; the bloody conflict; the lamentable death of the veteran general flushed with military enthusiasm; the mild, gentlemanly, and heroic behavior of the young Virginia colonel; the rout and retreat; the burying of the body of their commander at midnight, when, as some will romantically have it, the slender Washington, by the uncertain light of torches, read the office of the dead; the care taken by the army to hide his resting-place from the savages by making his grave in the road, that the army wagons driven over it would make it imperceptible, with many more incidents, have been often dwelt upon, and have become to us quite familiar. We will not, therefore, impose upon good nature by being tediously prolix, for we are unable at this day to develop any new facts worthy of notice.

The Province of Pennsylvania was blamed for not taking a more active part in Braddock's campaign.² As the contingent of forces from the Province was not authorized to assist in this expedition, the blame seemed more reprehensible or more apparent. The troops from Pennsylvania were sent to Gen. Shirley, and nearly one whole regiment was recruited, mostly from the western counties. The colony raised a number of horses and wagons, and opened a road from Fort Loudon through Bedford to Fort Cumberland. This was the most westerly road in the Province. Three hundred men were ordered to be employed on this road. The Assembly also gave a full share of funds. The lack of more active measures was not so much due to the spirit of the colonists as to the unwillingness of the hereditary Governors.

² Much undeserved opprobrium has been cast upon Pennsylvania for her backwardness in offering assistance to Braddock. The Governors, under instruction of the proprietaries, would not sanction or approve of any law to raise revenue which would tax the estates of the proprietaries. Hence the Assembly refused to appropriate funds or raise and equip troops so long as these unjust exceptions were insisted upon. Common danger and the wild cries of the people after the defeat of Braddock, under the administration of a new Governor, harmonized the interests. Although this is a matter not of local interest, it is well to be known and not forgotten.

¹ See Note 2, page 21.

CHAPTER III.

BRADDOCK'S EXPEDITION.

Braddock's Forces at Fort Cumberland—He comes up the Ohio Company's Road, piloted by Washington—Opens the Road to the Youghiogheny, and through our part of Westmoreland to the Monongahela; after crossing which River the Army, in a De-file on the South Bank above Turtle Creek, is Surprised by the French Canadians and Indians from the Fort—The Number of the Enemy and their Leaders—The Virginians cover the Retreat of the British—Washington carries off the Army—The Route, Courses, and Distances of the March—How the Trail may be found at this Day—Effect of Braddock's Defeat on the Pennsylvania Colonists—The Battle-ground visited by Soldiers under Forbes Three Years after the Battle—The Appearance of the Field.

This campaign may be briefly summed up.¹ Braddock, on the 20th of April, 1755, left his camp at Alexandria, on the Potomac, in Virginia, and took up his march towards Fort Duquesne. After stopping some days at Fredericktown, Md., he marched by way of Winchester, Va., to Fort Cumberland, on Wills Creek, where he arrived on the 10th of May. He was here delayed by reason of the neglect of the Pennsylvania authorities in furnishing him the necessary wagons and horses needful for the transportation of his stores and munitions of war.² On the day of their arrival, in general orders the appointment of Washington as aide-de-camp to the general was proclaimed to the army.³ He here reviewed his army, and expressed confidence and pride in the scarlet coats, the bright buttons, the brilliant musket-barrels, the red cross of St. George, and the blare of the trumpets that echoed through the woods. He had with him about a thousand regulars,—royal troops, whose perfect movements had helped to make the reputation of that wonderful machine which had marched across the Peninsula,—thirty sailors from the fleet of Admiral Kepple, whose squadron had transported the royalists, and about twelve hundred provincials, mostly from Virginia and New York. In addition to these he was joined by about a hundred and fifty Indians and frontiersmen from the back regions of Pennsylvania, who were dressed like Indians, and who fought after the Indian fashion. These had been encouraged by the colonists to come, and had they been accepted would have been of good service as scouts. Of these forty to fifty were friendly Delawares from under the famous Sca-roo-ya-da, a steadfast friend of Washington and the Americans. Crogan, the interpreter, and "Captain Jack,"⁴ with his bordermen, were also of them; but the offer of their services was rejected with indignation, and they were rather despised than appreciated. Some of these, for the mere love of war or bound by promise, and full of hatred towards the French and their allies, remained in the skirts of the army, and later on that day of disaster did service never to be forgotten, while the rest, with a mutual disgust at the regular gentry, retired to their mountain fastnesses, and remained inactive during the campaign.⁵

¹ Orders were issued from the British ministry in 1754, to the Governors of the provinces, directing them to resort to force to drive the French intruders from their station on the Ohio.

On the 14th of January, 1755, Maj.-Gen. Sir Edward Braddock, who had won great distinction as an able and brave officer and a strict disciplinarian, and who had been appointed commander-in-chief of all the king's forces in America, sailed from Cork, Ireland, with two regiments of royal troops. Each regiment numbered five hundred men. One, the Forty-fourth, was under Col. Dunbar; the other, the Forty-eighth, was under Sir Peter Halket. They arrived at Alexandria, Va., on the 20th of February, 1755.

At a council held at the camp at Alexandria, which was attended by the Governors of the middle and northern colonies, three expeditions were agreed upon,—the first against Fort Duquesne, under command of Braddock in person; the second against Niagara and Frontenac, under Gen. Shirley (Governor of Massachusetts); the third against Crown Point, under Gen. William Johnson.

² The whole campaign was planned with want of foresight, not to say in ignorance. Of all places for a base of supplies for an aggressive campaign, Alexandria was the last to be considered. The country through which the army passed could furnish neither provisions nor carriage. In Pennsylvania the conflict between the Executive and the Assembly was of such a nature and had reached such a height that the confidence of the inhabitants was so shaken as to overlook any inducements held out by the Governors for them to contribute in the absence of legislative enactment; for, as we have said, the Governors were instructed by the proprietaries not to sanction any bill for raising revenue or supplies unless their estates were exonerated. It is well known that Benjamin Franklin, on his individual responsibility, secured a supply of wagons and horses from York and Lancaster Counties, and the necessary drivers to move the army and the supplies. There were no Pennsylvania troops with Braddock; most of those from this Province in that war were with Gen. Shirley.

³ Braddock had orders from the king, dated at St. James, Nov. 12, 1754, respecting the rank of the colonial officers, by which he was to suffer no American field-officer to take command of even a battalion of colonial troops. Washington had resigned in consequence of this order.

—Sparks, vol. ii. p. 68.

⁴ This "Captain Jack" was one of the most peculiar outgrowths of border times. There is a romantic interest attached to his name, especially in the Cumberland district of this State, where his name is localized. What follows here is on the authority of that eminent antiquary and most reliable local historian, Mr. J. D. Rupp, whose reputation for accuracy is of the highest. [History of Cumberland County.]

⁵ Between 1750 and 1755 there figured a character of some note in Cumberland County. Captain Jack, the 'Black Hunter,' the 'Black Rifle,' the 'Wild Hunter of the Juniata,' the 'Black Hunter of the Forest,' was a white man. He entered the woods with a few enterprising companions, built his cabin, cleared a little land, and amused himself with the pleasures of fishing and hunting. He felt happy, for he had no care. But one evening, when he returned from a day of sport, he found his cabin burnt, and his wife and children murdered. From that moment he forsook civilized man, lived in caves, protected the frontier inhabitants from the Indians, and seized every opportunity for revenge that offered. He was a terror to the Indians, a protector to the whites. On one occasion, near Juniata, in the middle of a dark night, a family was suddenly awakened by the report of a gun. They jumped from their beds, and by the glimmering light from their chimney saw an Indian fall to rise no more. The open door exposed to view the 'Wild Hunter.' 'I saved your lives,' he cried, then turned and was buried in the gloom. He never shot without good cause. His look was as unerring as his aim. He formed an association to defend the settlers against savage aggression. On a given signal they would unite. Their exploits were heard of in 1756 on the Conococheague and Juniata. He was sometimes called the 'Half-Indian,' and Col. Armstrong, in a letter to the Governor, says, 'The company under the command of the Half-Indian having left the Great Cove, the Indians took advantage and murdered many.' He also, through Col. Crogan, proffered his aid to Braddock. 'He will march with his hunters,' says the colonel; 'they are dressed in hunting-shirts, moccasins, etc., are well armed, and are equally regardless of heat and cold. They require no shelter for the night; they ask no pay.' What was the real name of this mysterious personage has never been ascertained. It is supposed that he gave the name to 'Jack's Mountain,'—an enduring and appropriate monument.

⁶ There appears to be a slight variation in the statements of various writers respecting the number of Indians engaged on Braddock's side

From here on the 27th of May were sent out five hundred men under Sir John St. Clair¹ and Maj. Chapman to open the road to the Little Meadows, which road had previously been marked out by Washington and his friendly Indian, Nemaquin, and afterwards used by the Ohio Company. The army was divided into two brigades; Halket commanded one, Dunbar the other. On the 8th of June the first brigade under Halket took up its march, and two days after the main body under Braddock followed. On the seventh day after he had started thence he reached the Little Meadows, at the foot of the Allegheny Mountains, on the western side, whither St. Clair had arrived. A small fort erected here was to be a new base of operations and a new station for supplies.²

Here was held a council; and here for the first time was the advice of the "Young Buckskin," as Braddock called Washington, listened to. He had advised that the army dispense with the cumbrous wagons, which undoubtedly would retard their march, and proceed from Cumberland with pack-horses, as the route was mountainous and the way difficult. The march hitherto had shown the correctness of his observations. They had found it difficult to get the wagons along at all, and the train being from three to four miles long took too many men to guard them, who in so doing were so separated that an attack at any one point would be dangerous to the entire army. He here renewed the advice that the heavy artillery and baggage remain with a portion of the army and follow with easy marches, but that the portion of the army effective for fighting, lightly equipped, with a few pieces of light cannon and such stores as were necessary, should press forward to the enemy's fort. The advice was agreed with, and the army was again divided for safety and efficiency. Twelve hundred men with twelve pieces of artillery, selected from the different corps, under Braddock himself, with Halket and his veterans, preceded Dunbar and Chapman, who were to follow by slower and more easy marches with the residue of the two regiments, some independent companies, the heavy artillery and baggage.

Braddock then set forward from the Little Meadows on the 19th of June, taking with him their thirty carriages, including those which were used for the ammunition, and a train of pack-horses, upon whose during the war. There were without doubt some who did effective service, which is attested by Washington [see Sparks], and by the records of a council held at Philadelphia, Aug. 15, 1755, whereat Governor Morris said, "Brethren of the Six Nations, you that are now here, viz.: Scarrooyady [and five other chiefs named], fought under Gen. Braddock, and behaved with spirit and valor during the engagement."

¹ Sir John St. Clair was quartermaster-general of the army.

² The Little Meadows were at the foot of Meadow Mountain. The Great Meadows were about thirty-one miles farther west, and near the eastern foot of Laurel Hill. The Great Meadows mark the site of Fort Necessity, the early scene of Washington's youthful glory. This is the Fayette County region. By "Little Crossings" is meant the ford at Casselman's River, one of the three streams which form the Turkey Foot, now Confluence, Somerset Co. The "Great Crossings" was the passage of the Youghiogheny itself. The Little Crossings were two miles west of the Little Meadows, and the Great Crossings seventeen miles farther west.

backs were borne the baggage and provisions. But they proceeded slowly. On the 23d, their fourth day out, they reached the Youghiogheny at the Great Crossings, only nineteen miles' distance. The route from here to the Great Meadows, or Fort Necessity, was not difficult. On the 30th of June they crossed the Youghiogheny the second time at about a mile or so below where Connellsville now stands. Now in the wilderness, and no road to go by, they appear to have lost their bearings.³ On the 3d of July a council was

³ The tortuous course of Braddock through Westmoreland cannot be accounted for. He seems to have wandered around like a lost man. For the cause of this we venture an explanation. Washington, more than any other man, was the pilot of that expedition. He knew the topography of this section of country better than any man of his day. For his pre-eminent fitness and special knowledge Braddock was induced to give him the appointment he did. Now at the Little Meadows Washington was taken down with a fever, and was left at Col. Dunbar's camp unable to proceed further. He, led by the destiny that leads such men through the world, rejoined Braddock the day before the battle, in time only to save the army from total destruction. He says in a letter (Sparks, vol. ii. p. 85), "On the 8th of July I rejoined in a covered wagon the advance division of the army, under the immediate command of the General. On the 9th I attended him on horseback, though very low and weak."

As the route of Braddock's army is a matter of such local interest, we are able at this day to follow him over the wheat-fields and among the orchards of Westmoreland.

The army first kept on the dividing ridge between the Yough and Cheat Rivers. About a mile west of the Great Meadows, and near the spot of Braddock's grave, the road diverged to the northeast to strike the pass through the Laurel Hill, and to cross the Youghiogheny at a crossing known afterward as Stewart's Crossing, about a mile below Connellsville. They were now off their direct route, which evidently lay along the river, and were in a wilderness. The road next crossed Jacob's Creek at the place known as Welshhause's Mill (later Tinsman's Mill), about a mile and a half below Mount Pleasant, in East Huntingdon township; crossed over the Mount Pleasant and West Newton turnpike below Mount Pleasant, leaving it on the right; thence in a direction a little more westerly it crossed the Big Sewickley near Painter's Salt-Works, now marked by the line of the Southwest Railway, and the point probably between Painterville and Ruffs Dale Stations; thence nearly due north, crossing and recrossing the Pittsburgh and Greensburg turnpike between Greensburg and Irwin, leaving Madison and Jacksonville on the north and east till it reaches the Brush Creek fork of Turtle Creek.

It appears by tracing the route on the map that the course from Connellsville to a distance beyond Mount Pleasant is entirely out of the direction of Fort Duquesne from there. This became apparent to Braddock on the 7th of July, when he had doubts, and when, as before stated, after reflection and examination, he turned into the Long Run Valley near Stewartsville, passing by a mill-seat on that run known since that time as Sampson's Mill.

From the manuscript journal of a soldier who accompanied Braddock, which has been exhumed from the King's Library, London, where it was deposited, we quote the following, recorded while the army was within the limits of our county. The diary for a few days before and after the battle may be found at length in Craig's "Pittsburgh."

"On July 4th they marched six miles to Thicketty Run. On the 6th they marched six miles to 'Monakataca Camp,' called thus from the death of Monakataca's son, who was shot and killed by a party of Indians. The line of carrying-horses extended a great length, and it was almost impossible to keep them from 'insults,' so that the teamsters carried fire-locks. The disposition or arrangement of these horses varied almost every day, but the most common practice was to let them remain on the ground an hour after the march began under a guard of one hundred men. By thus doing there was no confusion. When the roads permitted they were allowed to march on the flanks, between the pickets and a line of soldiery; but when it was rocky, and they were close together, they were made to fall in the rear. There were parties on the flanks at all times and a guard behind. On the 7th they tried to pass Turtle Creek about twelve miles from its mouth to avoid 'The Narrows;' but held at Jacobs Creek to consider the propriety of bringing forward Col. Dunbar with the reserves. Sir John St. Clair urged this, but it was rejected on what was regarded sufficient grounds. On the 7th of July Braddock was in doubt as to the proper way of proceeding. The crossing of Brush Creek, which he had now reached, appeared to be attended with so much hazard that reconnoitring-parties were sent forward.¹ After an examination of the ground he diverged to the left, passed down the valley of Long Run, and after one of the best marches of the campaign camped for the night in a favorable depression between that stream and Crooked Run, about two miles from the Monongahela. This was about four miles from the battle-ground. Their camp-fires were here watched all night by their enemies hid in the bushes. In the morning they approached the Monongahela down the valley of the Crooked Run, and forded the river below the junction of the Youghiogheny, where now is McKeesport. The advance, under Lieut.-Col. Gage, passed over the ford about eight o'clock on the morning of the 9th of July, and continued along by the foot of the hills bordering the broad river-bottom to the second fording of the Monongahela, which when crossed again to the north side left a direct route to the fort. Gage passed over this second ford at about the same time the rear of the main division had come out safely from the first. Many had given up all expectation of meeting the enemy until they came to the fort, and they had some reason to feel elated in spirit. The most exact discipline was rigidly maintained. Washington said afterward that the army marching along this bottom was one of the finest sights he ever saw. The soldiers were neatly dressed, they marched in columns, the musket-barrels reflected the summer morning's sun, the broad tranquil river on their right hand, the high hills, with green foliage to their tops, on their left hand.

here they came to a precipice which it was impossible to descend. Sir John St. Clair, with a captain and one hundred men, some Indian guides, and some light-horse, reconnoitered." The Narrows were described by the guides to be a narrow pass of about two miles in length, with the river on the left and high mountains on the right. With hard labor it could have been made but barely possible for carriages. St. Clair, upon returning, informed the general that he had found a ridge which led the whole way to Duquesne, and which avoided the Narrows and Frazer's, but that some work to be done yet made it impossible to move that day. They then encamped there, and the next morning marched about eight miles to the camp at the Monongahela.

The following orders are preserved in this diary :

"ORDERS AT MONAKATUCA CAMP.

"If it should be ordered to advance the van or send back the rear-guard, the advanced parties detached from them are to remain at their posts facing outwards.

"Whenever there is a general halt, half of each of the subaltern's advanced parties are to remain under arms with fixed bayonets facing outwards, and the other half may sit down by their arms."

"ORDERS AT THE CAMP NEAR MONONGAHELA.

"All the men are to draw and clean their pieces, and the whole are to load to-morrow on the beating of 'the general' with fresh cartridges.

"No tents or baggage are to be taken with Lieut.-Col. Gage's party."

¹ Some of these advanced so far as to kill a French officer within half a mile of Fort Duquesne.

It was about noon when the second or main division began to cross after Gage. They were now about only ten miles from the fort, and the spirit of the men was at the highest. The trail which they followed coming out of the river led through a gradually rising plain to the hills beyond. This plain, or bottom, some four to six feet above the water of the river, extended from the river about half a mile. Where the route crossing this entered the hills a deep ravine ran along each side, which ravines, running from either side of the rising ground, came nearly together near the top of the hill like the two sides of a letter "A." The surface beyond the plain was rocky, and upon all sides except that next the river was covered with high grass, bushes, and large forest-trees. In these ravines and along the banks rising irregularly from them the enemy were lying in wait and quietly watching them. At that crossing on the north side was Frazer's trading-house, near the mouth of Turtle Creek, where Washington had stopped on his first journey. Here the troops under Gage who were not employed in making the banks on their side of the river passable for the artillery and beasts, drawn up in order, were waiting for Braddock to come up. As the main body arrived they drew up the artillery and baggage and huddled the cattle and pack-horses along the beach until the opposite bank was cut down. The advance-guard in this way covered the passages of all the streams. About one o'clock the first detachment of the Forty-fourth Regiment, with their pickets, passed over; the artillery-wagons and carrying-horses followed, then the detachment of the Forty-eighth, with their pickets, who had guarded the heights back of the beach.

At one o'clock all had crossed and the line of march had been arranged again. The advance-guard of some three hundred under Gage took up their march, then followed a column of workmen, two hundred and fifty, under Sir John St. Clair. They were to march on till three o'clock, the general following with the main body, the artillery, and the light baggage. The line began to thread out. Pickets were ordered on either side. While the rear-guard were yet shaking the water from their clothes, the advance-guard under Gage had entered the rising hills beyond the plain. Both the advance-guard, under Gage, and the next division, under Hacket, were within the inclosure represented by the two sides of the letter "A,"—that is to say, the two ravines rising with the ground and approaching together at the top. On a sudden, a rattling volley of musketry, seemingly out of the earth, as no enemy was to be seen, was poured into the faces of those who were in the lead. The next instant into their right flank came another volley. The firing in the front continued excessive, quick, and heavy. The line was ordered to halt, and Lieut.-Col. Burton was ordered forward with the vanguard of the main division. Thus eight hundred men were detached from the line, and four hundred were left for defense of the artillery and baggage. The firing continuing, Braddock moved forward, leaving Halket in care of the reserves. The fire was returned by those in front, but with no effect, yet the enemy sustained a continuous and murderous discharge. The British could see nothing to shoot at, while their men were falling all round. The advance in great confusion fell back. Braddock and his officers hastened forward, but they were met by the broken ranks fleeing bleeding towards them. The attack was so sudden and so destructive, and the panic that seized upon these was so terrible, that before they knew it all—artillery, infantry, pioneers, baggage—were in an inextricable mass. As the advance column were driven back the force guarding the baggage in the clearing was attacked. These seeing the rest of the army driven back in terror scattered. Many of the wagon-drivers and teamsters were killed, many others cutting loose their horses fled on their backs across the river. The cannon did little execution, for the enemy availed themselves of the cover of the heavy woods, in which they were screened and protected. As the British and Americans were on the open place, and the French and Indians in the woods, every good position was speedily taken up by these, not only in the front, but on the sides of the army, and from these positions they fired upon every part, for every part of the army was exposed. But as yet the enemy were not to be seen, nor did they show themselves until the retreat began.

The general was a soldier who did not know fear, and his officers, although not so rash as he, were equally as brave. Once Burton headed, by command of his general, about one hundred royalists of the Forty-eighth, whom he prevailed with to follow him towards a rising ground on the right; but after they had reached the place, he, disabled by wounds, and his men seeing nothing but the prospect of death, turned about and fled. No words, no promises, no threats could now avail along the line. The noise of the army in that slaughter-pen was so horrific that those who escaped never had the recollection of it driven away. The cries of anguish of the men mingled with the shouts and entreaties of the officers. The shouts and ravings of terror, pain, despair, fear, chagrin, madness, ascended within the circle of red fire, with the howls of the Indians, the clashing of arms, the irregular rattling and thudding of musketry and cannon. Thus they stood, the survivors said, for three hours,—but long enough,—huddled together like sheep, sometimes in a mass, sometimes in separate bodies, all the time receiving the fire from the rocks and the trees. In such confusion many were killed by their own men, more indeed than by the enemy. Thus it happened to the provincials whom Washington ordered to fight after the manner of the border warfare. A brave Virginian, Capt. Waggoner, seeing that if he could secure a certain spot on a rising ground where lay a fallen tree of great thickness, his command might possibly turn the fortune of the day, with eighty provincials he clambered up to it with the loss of only three, and when by a well-directed fire from such a secure position he was dislodging a body of Indians in the bottom beyond, the British, taking the smoke of his guns for the sign of an enemy, fired upon his company by platoons, and they were compelled to fall back, leaving him and fifty of his eighty men on the ground.

When it was seen to be impossible to make his men advance, Braddock endeavored to get them to retreat in good order, for they now, wild, bewildered, and dazed, were firing their ammunition in the air and turning upon their officers. Two-thirds of the killed and wounded in this fatal action received their shots from the cowardly and panic-stricken royalists.¹ It was no longer a battle, it was a butchery. By this time half the army that had crossed the river were killed or wounded, many of the best officers had been cut down, and the general, after having five horses shot under him, received, whether at the hands of friend or foe never to be known, a mortal wound.²

No panic was more complete. The desolate cries of the wounded, exposed to the fire of their own brethren, were as terrible as the unearthly yells of the unleashed savages. The royal regulars, when they had shot away their ammunition, were the first to run. All orders henceforth were either not minded or were disobeyed. All by one consent left the field; many threw away their guns, and disencumbered themselves of their habiliments. Some of the soldiers followed the example of the wagoners, and loosing the horses galloped off on their backs. They, intent on saving their own lives, deserted their comrades, and left all their artillery, stores, and the ammunition in their carriages. With difficulty Washington, his coat full of bullet-holes, covered the retreating army with his provincials. With the utmost difficulty, too, it was that the wounded general and his wounded officers were carried off the field by the few who had not forsaken them. Braddock was carried in his scarf. The road to Col. Dunbar's camp on the top of Laurel Hill,

¹ Washington's letter to Governor Dinwiddie.—Sparks, vol. ii. p. 88.

² The stories of particular persons having shot Braddock are not of late origin. We do not credit the Fayette County "Faucet" story. The same kind of a story was related by a Mr. Daniel Adams, of Newbury, who was regarded as a good authority, and who in the Newburyport Herald of 1843 told what he had heard from a Capt. Illsbery, who was with Sir William Johnson. This captain had become acquainted with a man who had served under Braddock, who had told him that a captain in that expedition, after many others had done the same thing, appealed to Braddock advising him to retreat, and that Braddock immediately shot him down. This captain had a brother who was a lieutenant, and who was near at the time, and who saw his brother fall; that this lieutenant raised his carbine and shot Braddock; this occurrence several saw, but none told; that Braddock wore a coat of mail in front, and only a ball from behind could have killed him. This narrative was believed and credited as authentic for a long time, and even inserted into creditable histories; this, too, in the face of the inharmonious narrative, egregiously lame, to wit, that the same French officer (Deskau) who commanded against Johnson had the year previous defeated Braddock. We place the Stewart-Faucet story in the same category. This narrative I have taken from an old paper into which the original was copied.

thirty-six miles away, was strewn with accoutrements. The dead and the dying, all baggage, the money chest, the cattle, and the small-arms were left to the enemy, who, emerging from their hiding-places, took possession of the field. A small body of Indians dogged the rear of the retreating army down to the river-bank, and killed and wounded some as they were in the water, but further they did not pursue or harass the terrified fugitives on the road. Nevertheless their victory was complete.

An attempt was made on the south side of the river to stop the disordered men and form some of the soldiers into a force to cover the retreat. Braddock and some other wounded officers remained there a considerable time, indeed until the rest had all gone by. He still gave his orders from his litter, and directed Washington to speed to Dunbar with orders to send aid for the wounded, and with a small force to meet him on the way. At this side of the first crossing of the Monongahela he was joined by Gage, who had rallied a company. This was all of the army left; the rest were lying on the battle-field, or were along the road. These marched all night and the next day, and on the following night at about ten o'clock came to Gist's, where they halted to dress the wounded and refresh the men.

When the army was collected at the station of Col. Dunbar it was in numbers still formidable; but its spirit was broken, and no attempt was again made to march into the enemy's country or to retrieve their lost fortunes. The panic was infectious, and all discipline was forgotten among even those who had not been engaged in the battle. They hid their heavy cannon in holes in the ground, and made no effort to maintain that post. They did not rest easily till they got back to Fort Cumberland.

The ball that met Braddock penetrated through his arm and lung. He lived four days after he was wounded. During this time when he was talked to he gave orders, but he rapidly sank into a stupor, and his thoughts and expressions were mostly wandering. In the night-time, after a long silence, he said, audible to those around, although in a meditating manner and as speaking with himself, "Who would have thought it! Who would have thought it!" He remained silent again, or at most talked incoherently. On the fourth day, immediately before he died, he said, "We shall better know how to deal with them another time." On the next day, the 14th of July, the second day after the army had left Dunbar's, he was buried in the middle of the road, and they marched and drove their wagons over his grave to make it indistinguishable. Some say that he was buried in the darkness of the early morning.¹

¹ In 1802 the remains were reinterred at the foot of a white oak-tree, and the place suitably marked. This is at Mount Braddock, Fayette Co., some of Braddock's bones, however, passed into the possession of Peale, the great showman, in whose museum in Philadelphia they were exhibited as relics until the destruction of the building by fire.

The enemy that emerged from Fort Duquesne were French, Canadians, and Indians, under command of Capt. Beaujeu.² It appears that the commander of the French was kept well informed by his Indian spies of all the movements of the British, and that it was his intention to await them at the fort. But this Capt. Beaujeu, the commandant of Duquesne, begged permission to march out and surprise his enemy when they were not expecting it. He was seconded by the entreaties of Capt. Dumas and Capt. Lignery and about a dozen subalterns. His force was about six hundred Indians and several detached companies of French and Canadians, in numbers above two hundred. They had great trouble to get the Indians to accompany them, and to do so had to give them much strong drink and offer many promises. They marched out of the fort in the early morning of the 9th of July, and intended to resist Braddock while he was crossing the river. They did not arrive in time for this, for the army was preparing to cross when they came to the hills. They there lay in ambush. At the first regular fire of the British the commander, Beaujeu, was killed. His followers showed signs of fear and confusion. This occasioned the first and only lull in the firing of the French which was noticed by the British. This was the moment, the Americans say, that Braddock or Gage should have taken to push onward to the enemy. But the opportune moment was lost; hence some said Braddock acted as one who had lost his reason. Dumas, however, took the command in place of Beaujeu, and showed the coolness and the skill of a veteran officer. His orders were obeyed, and while he remained with his regular French in the front, his officers deployed the Indians on either flank of the British.

Dunbar conducted the army to Philadelphia, but Washington was the good genius of the retreat. It may be doubted that Washington ever, in defeat or victory, was more impassably himself than in this campaign. What might not be expected from so young a man, who, not expecting anything but victory, should appear to greater advantage when he marched from defeat? In such a school was the man taught who bore the weight of a country for seven restless years.

The completeness of this victory and defeat, although felt, was not fully seen till the detachment

² "The name in full of Beaujeu was Daniel Hincinthe Marie Lionard de Beaujeu. He was the second son of Louis Lionard Sieur de Beaujeu and Therese Mijean de Braussac, his wife, born in Montreal, Aug. 17, 1711. The family was originally from Dauphine, France. Beaujeu had commanded at Detroit and Niagara." (William M. Darlington, Esq., in "Centenary Memorial," p. 263.) See record of his death and burial in the chapter on the religious history in this book.

Mr. Darlington says that "Beaujeu seems to have succeeded Contrecoeur at Fort Duquesne," and in this statement he follows various other authors. But Sparks, citing the best authorities (the French "Archives"), says that Contrecoeur was commander of Fort Duquesne, and Bancroft ("History of the United States") follows him. Contrecoeur was "commander" of all the French in those parts, and all orders came from him. Beaujeu was "commandant" at the fort.

sent out by Forbes, when he took possession of the fort, three years after this, came upon the battle-field to pay the last rites to the mangled bodies of their former companions in arms. They gave a pathetic account of their sorrowful duties, and many have since rewritten it. No words, however, can tell the desolation which they felt, and the devastation which they saw. Nothing before or since in the warful annals of America can be compared with this. The dead had been left to lie as they fell. They saw where the wounded had died uncared for, and found among brush and rocks the skeletons of those who had perished by the tomahawk or through hunger and thirst. The birds and wild beasts had plucked off the naked flesh of the desecrated victims. Blackened ashes told where heathen vengeance had been gratified. Some were lying in heaps; others had dragged themselves in their torments to a distance. Some were found sitting on the trunks of fallen trees and on rocks; others were lying side by side in the embrace of death. A few were identified, and these were interred separately; the bones of many were collected together and buried in one common grave.

The loss of the French and their allies, according to their own report, which may be taken with allowance, was only about thirty, and the most of these met death by accident from the falling timbers in the woods cut by the cannon-balls. Of the British, sixty-four out of eighty-five officers, and about one-half the privates, or about seven hundred, were killed or wounded. Every field or horseback officer except Washington was carried off the field, and he had two horses killed under him.

The Indians may claim the glory of this victory. Those engaged were confederates who were not confined to the tribes about the Ohio, for all under the control of the French throughout the West were brought to the fort. The Wyandots and Southern Ohio tribes were represented, and Pontiac, then a young warrior, headed some of his Ottawas from the Western lakes. Cornplanter was there, too, with the Senecas, and many others since known to fame. As to the exact number of those with the French who fought on that dreadful day we have no authentic account. The number currently reported are as we give them, but it is almost certain there were many more.

Before dismissing this subject we cannot but call attention to, first, the remarkable proportion of officers killed to the number engaged; and, second, to the noticeable distinction to which many of the survivors arrived, from which an idea of the composition of this army may be obtained. Gage became the commander of the British armies at Boston in the beginning of the Revolution; Washington, commander-in-chief of the American army; Horatio Gates, afterwards a major-general in the American army, commanded a company of independent troops from New York; Col. Daniel Morgan, the hero of the Cowpens, drove a wagon of his own, for he was originally a teamster. Among the many others were the Lewises of Virginia, afterwards distinguished and gallant officers, and Col. Hugh Mercer, who died with glory at Princeton.

CHAPTER IV.

ARMSTRONG'S EXPEDITION, 1756—BOUQUET AT LIGONIER, 1758.

The Country overrun by Indians and French after Braddock's Defeat—Settlers flee to the East of the Mountains—Forts and Block-Houses on the Pennsylvania Frontier—Col. John Armstrong's Expedition in 1756 against the Kittanning Town—The Town taken and destroyed, and Capt. Jacobs reported killed—The Tramping-Ground of these Warriors—The French and Indian War carried on under William Pitt—John Forbes commands the New Expedition from Philadelphia against Fort Duquesne—His command—Col. Bouquet brings the Vanguard of the Army across Laurel Hill to the Loyalhanna, where he erects a Stockade, and awaits on the rest of the Army under Washington and Forbes, who were to unite at Baytown, or Bedford.

THE disastrous effect of Braddock's defeat was more sensibly felt in our colony than even in Virginia. An undisturbed peace had existed between the Indians and the Pennsylvania colonists till the war broke out between the two European mother-countries in 1754. One reason which augmented the distress was that, as a general thing, the colonists were averse to war, and had always favored a pacific policy. Some of the citizens, from their religious perceptions, were opposed to warfare on any pretense whatever. Now the whole frontier of the colony was left open to the free ingress of the savages. The frontier county was Cumberland, which extended no farther than the Juniata. Numerous acts of hostility were committed on these settlements. Detached bands of exasperated and bloodthirsty barbarians attacked the stations, and marauding-parties preyed upon the isolated settlers. The Indian nature after being long restrained was let loose. Like the beasts which had got used to living on the flesh of the dead that Braddock left, they thought they had a right to kill all they met. They murdered the men and women, and burnt their pitiful cabins to the ground, so that the harvests were ungathered, and such as had timely warning had to flee for life through a wide stretch of hostile country. During the fall and winter of 1755 the settlements of Great Cove and Conococheague in Cumberland County were overrun and the inhabitants slaughtered. All the settlements surrounding were in great commotion. Many were scattered with their families to all the neighboring places of safety; many were taken in captivity to the depots of the French in Canada. In short, all the horrors of an Indian war were experienced. The authorities were clamored to for relief. It became evident that a long line of block-houses with garrisons would have to be established at the public expense for the protection of the inhabitants who were unable to protect themselves, and thus keep the war from the hearths of all. And, indeed, if timely efforts had not been made to put a stop to this warfare the whole of the frontier to the west of the Susquehanna would have been deserted. It has been estimated that in 1755 this section possessed three thousand fighting-men, and that in the next year, 1756, outside the provincial forces, there were not one hundred. These terrible times continued, with some intermission, till the Indians were partly conciliated by a treaty at Easton in 1758. But now it was evident that what had been reclaimed from nature would have to be protected by the force of arms. The claims of our own colony were not to be despised, for although she had been profuse and liberal both in men and money in the assistance of her sister colonies, her own borders were left open to fire and murder.

The authorities, encouraged by the settlers, had given their assistance in the erection of a number of these block-houses and forts. In July of 1755 preparations were made to erect a fort at Shippensburg, called thus after Edward Shippen, one of the Council. This was completed in the fall. Previous to this time a line of forts had been erected along the Kittatinny hills from the Delaware to Maryland, guarding the principal passes, and each garrisoned by from ten to thirty men. West of the Susquehanna were Fort Louthier, at Carlisle; Fort Franklin, at Shippensburg; Fort Shirley, on the creek which empties into the Juniata; Fort Littleton; Fort Loudon, on the Conococheague, now Franklin County. Fort Shirley was on the Indian path from the West to Fort Augusta, on the Susquehanna. There were many block-houses, some without garrisons, to which the inhabitants might flee on timely notice.

At a time when, on account of the massacres which were horrible beyond description, the despair of the frontier colonists was at the highest and their fear the greatest, a successful expedition was planned and executed. There were on the west side of the Susquehanna eight companies of the First Pennsylvania Regiment, called the Second Battalion, under command of Col. John Armstrong. Two chiefs, Shingass¹ and Jacobs, were considered the instigators of these incursions. Jacobs, with his warriors, had his home at the Delaware Indian town of Kittanning, and here sometimes Shingass abided. Here they had great quantities of ammunition, received from the French, and from here they sallied out on their war-trips.

Hither the English prisoners captured about that time (1755) on the frontiers of Pennsylvania and Virginia were taken. Speaking in the forms of their own language, they with the Shawanese had taken the hatchet against Braddock which was offered them by the French, and went directly to war with whom they called the Virginians, which also of course included the Pennsylvanians. They, however, were influenced to this probably more by the Six Nations, some of whom lived among them.²

While the general-in-chief of the British forces in America, Gen. Shirley the successor of Braddock, and the Governors of the northern provinces were preparing an aggressive campaign with new levies to reduce the posts held by the French immediately after the unsuccessful campaigns of the year previous, by the sudden invasion of New York by Montcalm, the leader of the French in Canada, at the head of a formidable force, the whole attention of Gen. Shirley was directed to resist their farther advance in that direction. Hence during the fall of 1755 and the year 1756 the whole frontier of Pennsylvania was overrun by scalping-parties of Indians assisted by the French. The unexpected change in affairs affected no colony so much as ours.³ King Shingass with his warriors and sub-confederates fell upon the settlers of the Tuscarora Valley, and those of Northampton County, as well as those of Franklin, killed and carried off many persons and destroyed much property, so that whole settlements were deserted, and with the general results as before stated.

About the middle of August, 1756, Col. John Armstrong, who was a militia officer of the Province, and who with the Second Battalion of the provincial militia was about that time stationed on the west side of the Susquehanna, conceiving the idea of suddenly surprising and defeating them on their own ground, made preparations for an expedition against Kittanning. He proposed passing up the Juniata and down the Kiskiminetas, along the path upon which these depredators came out on their excursions. On the 30th of August, 1756, with a force of three hundred and seven men, he left Fort Shirley.⁴

After a laborious march, and by the exercise of the utmost precaution and vigilance, Armstrong reached the town without having been discovered. His last march was thirty miles, and made at night, so that he might attack the place before his men or his movements were discovered. The attack began as the light of day made objects distinguishable in the cornfield lying outside the town, in which many of the warriors slept beside fires built to keep off the gnats, which along the river bottoms were extremely annoying. Captain Jacobs was in the town, and when he discovered the presence of the whites, which was

¹ Shingass (sometimes written Shingast) is described as a small man in stature, but of the utmost activity, prowess, and physical endurance. He, with his mutual friend and neighbor, Captain Jacobs, helped, more than any other of the Western Indians, to devastate the settlements of Conococheague, Great Cove, Sherman's Valley, and the other settlements then along the frontier. Jacobs, an Indian chief, known by the name applied to him by the English-Americans, had his wigwam betimes along the Yough and Jacobs Creek, after whom this stream was called. A large tract of land in East Huntingdon township, not far from Ruff's Station on the Southwest Railway, is designated in old warrants as "Jacobs' Swamp," the best part of that land, now very valuable, having been reclaimed from marsh.

² Statement of George Crogan at the council at Carlisle, Jan. 13-19, 1756.

³ Governor Morris' message, July 24, 1755.

⁴ The best account of this expedition, which account is very interesting in details, is the "Report" of Col. Armstrong himself, which for details is referred to.

made known from the noise of their attack, he gave the war-whoop, and at the same time ordered the squaws and children into the woods. In this singular battle the Indians for the greater part kept to their houses, and fired upon the whites to good advantage from the port-holes and crevices in the walls. From these advantages some of the whites were killed and many were wounded. Seeing that firing upon the houses was ineffectual, Armstrong ordered the houses nearest of access to be set on fire. In doing so many more were wounded, and among them was Armstrong, who received a ball in his shoulder. However, the fire once started burnt with effect, and speedily reached the principal house, in which were Jacobs and the more desperate of his followers. As those in it attempted to escape they were shot down, and Jacobs himself, as Armstrong reported, was killed. He says he was identified by some of the soldiers by his boots, which he had gotten from a French officer, and by his scalp, which they secured, as he dressed his hair in a peculiar manner.¹

The destruction of this town and the death and scatterment of those who inhabited there was a severe blow to the savages. Henceforth they were afraid to leave their villages in any great number together, because they might expect an attack from their enemies as sudden, as unexpected, and as disastrous as this one had been. They had hitherto regarded themselves as safe in their camps and wigwams from any attack by the English on the western side of the mountains. The victory was indeed singularly eventful, because it was a single victory during a time of defeat, disaster, and gloom. Such of the Indians as belonged to Kittanning and had escaped the disaster that had befallen their brethren refused to settle again to the east of Fort Duquesne, and wisely resolved to place that fort and the French garrisons between them and the colonists.²

But the relief expected after this victory was a temporary relief only. The disasters of 1755, 1756, and 1757 were not confined to Pennsylvania. The French and Indian power was everywhere in the ascendant. By the British ministry affairs at home and abroad were conducted illy. The people in England demanded a new ministry, and in June of 1757 William Pitt was created premier. By this change new life was restored to the body politic. His appeals

¹ They said they knew his squaw's scalp also by a particular "bob" in the hair, and by the same token identified a young Indian by the name of "King's Son." It has been questioned whether Jacobs was killed here or not. There is mention of a "Captain Jacobs" (as he signs his name) in "Col. Henry Bouquet's Journal, etc.," in 1764, a chief of the Delawares, but others say this was a son of the former. It at best, at this day, is not worth while to contradict the report or get up argument, for as the report was generally believed at that day it served all purposes for good, and whether the "old original Jacobs" was killed there and then or elsewhere and afterwards, he is now dead enough.

² Gordon's "History of Pennsylvania."—Before the town was destroyed there were about thirty houses in it. . . . Col. Armstrong's loss was seventeen killed, thirteen wounded, and nineteen missing. . . . Armstrong County was named in his honor, very deservedly.

in the interest of the colonies and against their old enemy, the French, were listened to as they had never been listened to before. To the colonies he promised his assistance, and they responded to his requests. Pennsylvania came up promptly. She voted £100,000, put the roads in repair, raised troops, and prepared quarters for others.

In the spring of 1758 came Admiral Boscawen with twelve thousand British soldiers. These, with the other British, the Royal Americans and provincials, made a force of fifty thousand, all employed in the service of the colonies. The campaign of 1758, as that of 1755, embraced three expeditions:—the first against Louisburg, an island in the St. Lawrence; the second against Ticonderoga, a strong fortress between Lake George and Lake Champlain, Northern New York; and the third against Fort Duquesne.

The new expedition against Duquesne was under command of Brigadier John Forbes, a young man and a good soldier, by birth a Scot.³ Philadelphia was made his headquarters. Which was the more available route from here to the West was a matter of debate. Washington advised that the army proceed on the old Braddock road, and Forbes for a long time had not made up his mind. The route through Pennsylvania westward was urged by the provincial authorities with good reasons, but the Virginians objected to it. The authorities of Virginia wanted to cover their frontier by active operations in that portion, and perhaps wanted to make more perfect their claim to the disputed territory. But Bouquet, the chief officer upon whom Forbes depended, who was a soldier of fortune in the service of England, advocated a new route, and prevailed upon Forbes to choose it; and on the 1st of August, 1758, seventeen hundred men were at work west of Bedford in open-

³ JOHN FORBES.*—Forbes was a native of Scotland, born in Pentrief, Fifeshire. Like Arthur St. Clair, he was bred to the profession of medicine. While young he entered into the military service, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in Scott's Gray Dragoons. He won by faithful services the approval of his military superiors,—the Earl of Stair, Lord Ligonier, and other great soldiers with whom he was connected. He was a staff-officer to some of these generals, and was quartermaster-general of the army under the Duke of Bedford. He was about forty-seven or forty-eight when he was appointed to the command in which he distinguished himself. From his indomitable will and tenacious purpose he was called the Head of Iron, or by his followers more commonly "Old Iron-head." As a gallant soldier "seeking the bubble reputation even at the cannon's mouth," he was given to cursing, a vice considered a virtue among the European soldiery of his age,—a vice which they brought with them from Flanders." During the whole campaign he suffered from accumulated infirmities and a general debility, and on his return from Fort Duquesne to Philadelphia was carried the whole way by horses and by men in a litter. More than once, it is reported, he got out of his litter and made things lively. On his return to the city, weakened and broken down with disorders, he died, March 13, 1759, aged forty-nine years. He is buried in the chancel of Christ Church, Philadelphia.

His character has been thus described: As a man, he was just and without prejudices, brave without ostentation, uncommonly warm in his friendship, and incapable of flattery; acquainted with the world and mankind, he was well bred, but absolutely impatient of formality and affectation.

* The Scotch pronounce his name in two syllables, the English in one syllable.

ing out a road across the mountains of Western Pennsylvania.

Forbes' forces in all amounted to about seven thousand men.¹ There were twelve hundred Highlanders, three hundred and fifty Royal Americans, twenty-seven hundred Pennsylvania Provincials, sixteen hundred from Virginia, about one thousand wagoners and laborers, and the rest were from Delaware, Maryland, and North Carolina. The Virginia, North Carolina, and Maryland contingent was to assemble at Winchester under Washington, and the Pennsylvania forces at Raystown, that is Bedford, under Bouquet. Bouquet, the gallant Swiss, brought the regular vanguard of the command to this point in advance of Forbes, who was detained at Philadelphia by sickness. Bedford, as we shall call Raystown, was the most westerly point to which supplies could be sent. A road had been opened from Fort Loudon past here to Fort Cumberland in 1755, on which the Pennsylvania supplies were forwarded to Braddock.

By slow moves Forbes in September, 1758, reached Bedford. By this time the brave Bouquet with twenty-five hundred troops and pioneers had crossed on over Laurel Hill and made his camp on the bank of the Loyalhanna. Making it secure, he here waited until the main body should come up. He made his communication with the post at Bedford and the headquarters of the army secure. He was fifty miles from Duquesne, and he did not choose to advance till the general with the other part of the forces arrived. He remembered Braddock. He, however, was vigilant in all things pertaining to the safety of the men and the success of the expedition. To get information and as a matter of precaution he from here sent out a portion of his command to reconnoitre in the enemy's country.

CHAPTER V.

FORBES' EXPEDITION, 1758.

Maj. Grant is sent out from Fort Ligonier to reconnoitre about Fort Duquesne—Number of Men under Grant, and their Route—Their Encampment on the Nine-Mile Run—Their Trail the first Road of the English-speaking People through Westmoreland from Laurel Hill to the Ohio—Grant arrives at the Hill overlooking Fort Duquesne—Is Surrounded and Defeated—Capt. Bullet carries the Remains of the Command back to the Stockade of Ligonier—The French and Indians fill the Woods about Ligonier, and with their united forces attack Bouquet—The Battle lasts nearly all Day, when the Enemy flee off through the Woods—The whole Army under Forbes at Ligonier—He proposes to advance towards Fort Duquesne—Washington leads the way, and cuts the Old Military or Forbes' Road—Duquesne deserted by the French, and first occupied by the British and Americans—Fort Pitt erected.

THIS expedition which Bouquet sent out was under Maj. Grant. His command consisted of thirty-seven officers and eight hundred and five privates. Grant himself was major and the senior officer in the Highland regiment, which was divided into four companies, two of which he now took with him, and he was supported by Maj. Lewis, of the famous Lewis family of Virginia, with above two hundred Royal Americans, and a body of about fifty Virginia provincials under Capt. Bullet. His instructions were to approach as near the fort as practicable, to avoid a surprise, and chiefly to collect such information as would be of consequence. He left the camp at the Loyalhanna on the 11th of September, the command not being encumbered with baggage or provisions, and having no cannon. Marching from the Loyalhanna camp he the first day passed through a gap of the Chestnut Ridge, and traversing most probably the southeastern part of now Derry township came to the Loyalhanna, which he crossed about half a mile below the Shelving Rocks. He made his camp on the opposite side of Nine-Mile Run, so called from being nine miles from the fort at Ligonier. The site was well chosen, it having on the east the run at the base of a steep bank of twenty feet, on the south a deep ravine. The plateau above was covered with heavy timber. On this plateau where he rested he threw up an earthen wall facing the west and north, running in an angle from one side to the other. The wall was of the height of a man. The ditch from which the earth was cast was on the outside of the wall, and the camp proper was within this triangle so formed by nature and art. We have an exact description of this encampment and the road upon which Grant, following the old Indian path, went. This is in the journal of Christian Post. Post, a childlike missionary, full of the ancient faith, and a man fully competent to conciliate the natives, was sent from his home in Berks County by Governor Denny on two important missions. On his second journey he came in the route of the army of Forbes, and in November of 1758, two months after Grant's march, came to the Loyalhanna, where, leaving Forbes, he traversed the path which Grant had taken thus far. He gives also an exact description of the camping-places of the main army afterwards, having on his return from his mission followed their road. But Post, leaving the camp described, proceeded down along the trading path, as he calls it, five miles below this site. Here the trail divided; Grant followed the western branch, near to which was afterwards the old Hannastown road, while Post passed on down the path which led alongside the Loyalhanna and on to the old Kittanning towns. This particular place was known to the last generation as the Breastwork Hills, and till within a few years musket-balls, flints, old bayonets, and occasionally buckles and rusty sabres were uncarthed. Thirty years ago the breastwork might have been traced, but now it is all leveled and the place cultivated.²

¹ The return on the 25th September, 1758, two months before the taking of the fort, was, on count, five thousand nine hundred and eighty in all, with detachments on the road and stationed on the frontiers of eleven hundred and eighty-seven in addition.

² When the writer was a mere boy he heard famous stories to sleep on about cannons filled with bright gold pieces having been buried along

Henry Bouquet

The second day Grant proceeded twenty-five miles farther, or to within about fifteen miles of the fort. Although the Indians and French were being con-the first roads, and pleasing versions by old superstitious persons, who averred they had heard other persons say that they themselves heard by night the sound of drums and fifes coming from the Breastwork Hills. He recollects of seeing, because it was a part of the field not worked, the last visible remains of the encampment; and it puzzled him exceedingly to know who made it, as this was apparently away from any of the main military roads. The impossibility of getting accurate information from the "oldest people," who are just two generations too late, and the distressing lack in knowledge of such an interesting subject as that of the early roads, have impelled him to compile a chapter on that subject. By noticing attentively he has come to a knowledge who built this earthwork, and unhesitatingly pronounces this to have been the route of the English detachment under Grant, and the first route through the wilderness this side of Laurel Hill after Braddock's. All doubts are dispelled by a comparison of dates, and the taking of Post's Journal for the 9th of November, 1758, while Forbes was lying at Ligonier stockade. We insert part of the diary here.

From the second journal of Christian Frederick Post, 1758, on a message from the Governor of Pennsylvania to the Indians on the Ohio, in the latter part of the same year:

Nov. 7, 1758.—"We rose early and made all haste we could on our journey; we crossed the large creek, Rekonpalin, near Laurel Hill. Upon this hill we overtook the artillery; and came, before sunset, to Loyal Haunting. We were gladly received in the camp by the general, and most of the people. We made our fire near the other Indian camps, which pleased our people. . . .

8th.—"At eleven o'clock the general called the Indians together, the Cherokees and Catawbas being present; he spake to them in a kind and loving manner, and bid them heartily welcome to his camp. . . . After that he drank the king's health, and all that wished well to the English nation; then he drank King Beaver's, Shingas', and all the warriors' healths, and recommended us (the messengers) to their care, and desired them to give credit to what we should say. . . . Our Indians parted in love and well satisfied. And we made all necessary preparations for our journey.

9th.—"Some of the colonels and chief commanders wondered how I came through so many difficulties, and how I could rule and bring these people to reason, making no use of gun or sword. I told them it is done by no other means than faith. Then they asked me if I had faith to venture myself to come safe through with my companions? I told them it was in my heart to pray for them; 'you know that the Lord has given many promises to his servants, and what he promises, you may depend upon, he will perform.' Then he wished us good success. We waited till almost noon for the writing of the general. We were escorted by an hundred men, rank and file, commanded by Capt. Haslet.

"We passed through a tract of good land, about six miles on the old trading path, and came to the creek again, where there is a large fine bottom, well timbered; from thence we came upon a hill, to an advanced breastwork, about ten miles from the camp, well situated for strength, facing a small branch of the aforesaid creek; the hill is steep down, perpendicular about twenty feet, on the south side, which is a great defense; and on the west side the breastwork, about seven feet high, where we encamped that night."

Our Indian companions heard that we were to part in the morning, and that twelve men were to be sent with us, and the others, part of the company, to go towards Fort Duquesne. Our Indians desired that the captain would send twenty men instead of twelve, that if any accident should happen they could be more able to defend themselves in returning back. . . . It began to rain. Within five miles from the breastwork we departed from Capt. Haslet; he kept the old trading path to the Ohio. Lieut. Hays was ordered to accompany us to the Allegheny River with fourteen men. We went along the path which leads along the Loyal Haunting Creek, where there is a rich fine bottom land, well timbered, good springs, and small creeks. At four o'clock we were alarmed by three men in Indian dress, and preparation was made on both sides for defense. Isaac Still showed a white token, and Pisquetomen gave an Indian halloo, after which they threw down their bundles and ran away as fast as they could. We afterwards took up their bundles, and found that it was a small party of our men that had been long out. We were sorry that we had scared them, for they lost their bundles with all their food."

These men, no doubt, were soldiers scattered from Grant's command.

stantly informed of Forbes and Bouquet from the time Bouquet left Bedford, yet Grant succeeded in coming within sight of the fort without being detected. It was nearing dark when he was only a few miles from that spot for which two mighty nations were in contest. Two miles back he had left his baggage and horses under Capt. Bullet with fifty men. In the dusk he approached the fort. In the early part of the night two officers with fifty men were ordered to approach the fort, and if the outposts were not too strong to capture them. They were met by no enemy. They set fire to a store-house, but the fire was seen and put out. In the morning Grant, desirous of securing the victory for himself, sent Maj. Lewis with most of the ammunition and two hundred men half a mile back to secure, he said, the baggage. Believing that the garrison was small he posted his main body, about four hundred men, in a line on the face of the hill, and then sent out a company of fifty, with drums and bagpipes playing, to draw, or rather to drum, the enemy out. And it had the desired effect, for they came out in a hurry. By the noise of martial music the French were aroused from sleep. They knew the ground better than Grant did. Separating their forces into three divisions, two of these skulked out, one along the inner bank of each of the rivers, to surround the British, while the third posted itself in front till the others took up their positions. Securing their vantage-ground, they came in overwhelming numbers and surrounded the Highlanders and provincials on all sides. Hearing the noise of arms, Major Lewis hastened with his force to the rescue. The Indians fought with the tomahawk and scalping-knife; and hastened to closely embrace their old enemies. As they darted out from their coverts they filled the air with their terrific war screams, a sound to which the foreign Scots were unused. The two chief officers, Grant and Lewis, fell into the hands of the French. When many had fallen a retreat commenced. Then it was that the fifty men under the brave Bullet saved from utter annihilation the remains of the detachment. This officer, discovering the rout of the troops in front, dispatched with great prudence the most necessary part of the baggage on strong horses, and with the remainder of his men secured an advantageous position along the road. He had his men well screened, and by a well-directed fire they stopped the violence of the pursuit and thus somewhat checked the tumult of the men. With great coolness he blinded them by a successful stratagem. Seeing that his number was few compared with that of the enemy, he ordered his men, from a previous agreement, to march up to the Indians with arms reversed as if they sued for quarter. The Indians with a treacherous design themselves fell into the snare. When near enough Bullet gave the word; a dreadful volley was discharged into the midst of the wretches, and a charge with the bayonet following, the assailants were effectually discomfited. The remains were thus saved from being cut to pieces. The enemy were baffled, and Bullet covering the retreat, the command was successfully carried back to the Loyalhanna camp. The loss of the British and colonists was about three hundred.¹

The slowness of acting which at first had marked the French and their Indian allies is partially accounted for by Capt. James Smith, at that time a captive among the Indians. He states that reinforcements from the camp-fires at Detroit, expecting the approach of the English in the summer of 1758, left for Fort Duquesne; that they expected to serve Forbes as they had served Braddock; that during all the fall they had full accounts of the army from Indian runners; but that withal Grant had stolen a march on them, they not looking for a thing so improbable. However, after this engagement they had a council, and resolved to march out and meet the army, for the Indians were becoming dissatisfied, and as it was late in the year they were compelled from necessity to go into their own country and get food for their squaws and children that these in the severity of the winter might not starve. Having been so long on the war-path and from their wigwams, many of the helpless ones it is believed had perished during the previous seasons. And in truth the influence of the French over their allies was somewhat waning. So it was proposed to attack the army under Bouquet in their own camp, and if fortunate close the campaign by one battle.

Instead of being disheartened at this unforeseen occurrence, Bouquet resorted to more active measures in securing his camp and holding it till reinforcements came; for, flushed with this victory, it was not unlooked for that the enemy should be emboldened to attack him. This they accordingly did. The repulse of Grant was suffered on the 14th of September, and four weeks from that time all the force of the garrison, which now was composed of more French than Indians, from their desire of holding the position, came out in battle array and filled the woods around the camp at Loyalhanna. The number of the French was estimated at twelve hundred; that of the Indians at above two hundred. They were under command of De Vitri. On Thursday, the 12th of October, 1758, their combined forces attacked Bouquet. The engagement commenced in the forenoon about eleven o'clock, and lasted till three o'clock in the afternoon. The enemy were repulsed on all sides. They again renewed the attack at night, but Bouquet throwing shells from his mortars into the woods among them they were forced to desist. They retreated under cover of the darkness. The loss of the British was 67 rank and file, of which twelve were killed.

¹ "The French had the day before received a reinforcement of four hundred men from Illinois, under Capt. Aubrey, commander in the attack on Grant, who met with a bloody defeat on the hill where our court-house now stands, and along through the woods to where the baggage was kept with a guard on the slope above the Two-Mile Run. Grant was captured but soon exchanged. In 1760 he was Governor of East Florida. He afterwards rose to high rank in the British army, and served in it during part of the war of the Revolution. He was in the battle of Germantown and of Monmouth Court-House; at the latter he commanded, and defeated the American Gen. Lee. He died at his seat at Ballendaloch, near Elgin, Scotland, May 13, 1806, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. At the time of his death he was Governor of Stirling Castle. Capt. Aubrey, the French commander, was taken prisoner the next year at Niagara. He was afterwards Governor of the French colony at New Orleans. Returning to France in February, 1770, he lost his life by the sinking of the vessel off the French coast, near the mouth of the Garonne."—Fin. M. Darlington, Esq., "Pittsburgh in the Last Century."

The Indians now, for the first time in this long and bloody war, showed signs of disaffection. They could not be prevailed upon to carry on the war, but left the war-trail for their hunting-grounds. It had been only by artful promises that they were held so long, and when the first signs began to appear of their warfare being unrewarded with booty they treacherously withdrew. The French were not able of themselves to fight successfully against the English and their auxiliaries.

All the meagre accounts of this engagement at Ligonier that we have yet met with are stated above. Few have paid a more than passing notice to the fact that here in Westmoreland County, in Ligonier Valley, in the heart of a great wilderness, part of the renowned organization which had been perfected by Turenne and Luxemburg, which had sustained glory on the fields of Belgium, had ravaged the Palatinate, and had been marshalled against the Stadtholder king and Marlborough, were brought face to face with their immemorial foemen. But it is true that here, under the lilies of France, the soldiery of Louis again closed in conflict with the soldiery of George under the royal cross of England. Here in miniature was fought over the conflict of Namur and of Landen.

By the 1st of November, 1758, the whole army under Forbes and Washington was around Ligonier stockade. Forbes, of delicate health, was now so feeble that he had to be carried on a litter by the men. It was getting late in the fall, and a council of officers was called to determine on future action. Winter in reality had already set in, and the tops of the Laurel Hill and Chestnut Ridge were covered with snow. It was considered hazardous to attempt an offensive campaign with the winter before them and without a knowledge of the country or the enemy. So it was about concluded that the army go into cantonments about the stockade till the breaking up of the season. But several French and Indians and a few captives falling into the hands of the English, the actual number of their enemy and the disaffection of the Indians were learnt. When this was known it was resolved to hasten forward speedily as possible towards the fort.

Washington, as colonel, was sent forward in advance of the main portion of the army to take command of the division whose employment it was to open the road. On the 12th of November, about three miles from the camp, he fell in with a number of the enemy, and in the attack which followed they killed one man and took three prisoners. One of these was an Englishman named Johnson, who had been captured by the Indians in Lancaster County, and from him was derived full and authentic information of the state of affairs at Duquesne.

Upon this occasion a most unfortunate accident happened the provincial troops. The noise of the firing from the detachment under Washington being heard at the camp, Col. Hugh Mercer, with a number of Virginians, was sent forward to his assistance. The two parties, approaching each other in the dusk of the evening, mistook each other for the enemy. A number of shots were exchanged, by which a lieutenant and thirteen or fourteen Virginians were killed. Washington was in the greatest danger during this melée, for soon as he comprehended the situation he ran in among his men and beat down their guns.¹

On the 13th, Col. Armstrong, with a thousand men, pushed forward to assist Washington in opening the road for the artillery and baggage. On the 17th, Forbes, with four thousand three hundred effective men, pushed forward after leaving strong garrisons at Bedford (Raystown) and the Loyalhanna.

The advance under Washington cut its way through the morasses and over the hills in a more direct course than the course Grant had taken. They crossed the Loyalhanna at where it was afterwards called Cochran's Ford, about two and a half miles from Latrobe. Here they came out on the old Indian path, or Ohio trail, first used by the traders, which, as we have stated, ran direct to Duquesne. They followed the course westward, going past the settlement afterwards of Hannastown, and passing out of the limits of the county near Murrysville; thence, crossing the Turtle Creek, they went straight for the fort, keeping to the foot of the hills. The old Forbes road, or Hannastown road, as it was variously known, may be traced on some old maps of the county. In some places it may be followed by natural marks. In few places is it used any more as a public road. It was, however, for many years after the only highway through our county, or, indeed, except the Braddock road, from the East to the West. But now, as it was opened first to the passage of the army, it may readily be imagined that it was pursued only with the greatest of labor and care. The army, even that portion immediately under Forbes, moved slowly. The pioneers were nine days in going from the Loyalhanna to the Turtle Creek. The weather was chilly and damp, with falling snow and rain intervening. The soldiers were constantly on the alert, and a number of friendly Indians, who by the influence of Post were induced to take arms in the assistance of the English, were out as scouts on all sides. On Friday, the 24th of November, the Indian scouts in the advance saw the smoke arising from the barracks of Fort Duquesne. It had been fired by the French by order of their commander, De Lignery, and then abandoned. The army was about twelve or thirteen miles away. The French, taking boat, fled, some down the Ohio and some to Canada by way of the Allegheny. The garrison was only about four hundred. Forbes sent forward a company of cavalry under Capt. Hazlet to secure, if possible, some of the munition and to extinguish the fire. The works were mostly destroyed, but a large quantity of war stores was saved.

The main body with the general arrived the next day. Sunday, the 26th, was observed by general orders as "A Day of Public Thanksgiving to Almighty God" for their success, and the Rev. Charles Beatty, a Presbyterian minister, and chaplain to Col. Clapham's Pennsylvania regiment, preached a thanksgiving sermon, which was probably the first Protestant sermon preached west of the mountains. On Tuesday, the 28th, a large detachment marched to Braddock's battle field to bury the bones of those still lying there, as the same duties had been done to the stark corpses which lay on Grant's Hill.

And now at last from the smoking walls of Duquesne floated the English standard. A new fort was laid out, which when built was called Fort Pitt, in honor of the distinguished premier, William Pitt. Hugh Mercer, with a garrison of two hundred, was left in command. The army returned to Philadelphia, and in the early part of the next year, 1759, Forbes died. Brigadier John Stanwix succeeded Forbes as commander-in-chief of the middle division of colonies. He arrived at Pittsburgh in August 1759, and on the 3d of September the work of building this "formidable fortification" was commenced by order of the British Secretary of State.

¹ This affair has been greatly misrepresented, and in the traditions of the people of that part of the valley greatly distorted. It is hard to make some understand that Washington did not command there in an engagement against the enemy.

The substance of this occurrence is derived from Sparks' "Washington," and the account there made up from Washington's writings.

I was told by a very old gentleman of this county, now deceased, what was related to him as the substance of a conversation between Washington and William Findley, the first representative in Congress from this district. Findley said that Washington, speaking with him about this skirmish, said he had always considered that he was in more danger then and there than on any other occasion in his military career. At that time, which was long after the occurrence, he remembered the particulars well and described accurately the situation of affairs. He also called Findley's attention to the physical outlines of the entire region between Ligonier and Pittsburgh, and recalled certain observations made at the time he engineered the road, and which he yet attentively retained.

CHAPTER VI.

FIRST SETTLEMENTS IN WESTMORELAND—BATTLE OF BUSHY RUN, 1763.

Settlers come into Ligonier Valley, about Fort Pitt, and along the Old Military Road—Their Isolated Situations, their Squalid Huts, Potato Patches, and First Clearings—Condition of Indian Affairs at the Peace between England and France, 1762 and 1763—Pontiac—Fort Ligonier made a General Depot—Officers Commandant at Fort Ligonier—The Great Uprising of the Northwestern Tribes—Fort Pitt and Fort Ligonier surrounded and cut off from connection with the East—Capt. Ourry and his Men from Bedford come to the relief of Ligonier and hold the Fort—Bouquet marches from the East to the relief of Fort Ligonier and Fort Pitt—The Force with him—Bouquet finds the Frontier overrun and the Inhabitants utterly destitute—He reaches Fort Ligonier (1763)—He strengthens the Post, and with his Small Army and a Convoy of Pack-Horses proceeds towards Fort Pitt—He is attacked by the Indians under Kyashuta, the Chief of the Senecas, and fights the Battle of Bushy Run—He Defeats and Scatters his Enemy in the most successful Engagement fought with the Hostiles, and carries his Forces and Provisions into Fort Pitt.

WITH the army of Forbes and immediately in its train came in the first settlers of Westmoreland. Some clustered about the fort at the Forks of the Ohio, and some remained at Ligonier. The most of them were soldiers who had served in the campaign, and who, with their families, remained. Some chose to settle by location; in other words, they settled on land which they thought they had a right to merely by occupying it; but most were allotted land by the military commandants empowered to do so, and these settled by military permit. One of the earliest of these settlements, after those at the two forts, was the settlement of Andrew Byerly. Byerly's settlement dates from 1759. It was situated on Brush Creek, contiguous to which was the manorial reservation of the Penns. The order for Andrew Byerly's warrant was the thirty-sixth in number, and called for two hundred and thirty acres. On this spot Byerly seated himself by permit from the commandant at Fort Pitt, and before any other settlers had located between Bedford and Pitt. He accommodated express-riders and military agents on this road. Within the next two years there were three or four neighbors to Byerly. Of these one was Christopher Rudabaugh.

Although Western Pennsylvania was then virtually within Cumberland County, yet the colonial authorities did not allow any one to take up land, either by squatting upon it or by purchasing from the Indians. It was not till 1769 that any title was given to those who had located by military permit and to those who received donations of land for service in the Indian war.

But settlers at this date came in cautiously. In rude and squalid huts, crouched close to the stockade at Ligonier and scattered far apart from Frazer's, at the mouth of Turtle Creek, the settlers were always watchful and on the alert. The land, a complete wilderness, was all before them where to choose, and, paradoxically, the "flaming sword" was before them also. The only strip of light through the gloom of the primeval woods was the narrow roadway from the mountains to the rivers. Far southward to the still unpeopled highway of Braddock, and far northward into perpetual winter, was a boundless, rocky, desolate, and gloomy wild. To the left and right beasts of prey crouched in their burrows, birds of ill omen nestled among the cliffs, and barbarians skulked amid the trees or made war-clubs and sharpened their flints in their tepees by the streams and in the vales where the sunshine scarce touched.

As stated, a stockade had been built and a garrison was left at Ligonier Fort. An attempt was made by the soldiers posted here to raise corn and garden vegetables, and with the coming year a few others came in to share the hardships with them. Their huts were built under the shadow of the stockade, and at night they rested in quarters guarded by the soldiers. The old Fort Ligonier stood somewhat back of the site of the present village, on a rise of ground which was the lowermost range of Laurel Hill. The location was well adapted for defense and well calculated to sustain a settlement, for although the mountains surrounding are comparatively unfruitful and unproductive, yet the valleys between are fertile and well watered.

Although the general war was not terminated, yet when the Indians were brought into contact with the English they, from the results of a wise policy, were conciliated. In 1758 a treaty was effected at Easton between the Delawares and Shawanese and the whites. The fury of the Indians, in the eastern part of the State especially, had somewhat abated, but on the western frontiers the Indians, under the French, still committed depredations. From the treaty of Easton the minds of the people had been somewhat at rest. But none knew so well the treachery of that unconquerable race as the settlers themselves. They, taking advantage of the lull in the war, pushed on farther into the West,—the first eddy of the great wave of empire. Point by point was reached and secured. Settlements were re-established along the Monongahela, several on the old Braddock road and at the Turkey Foot. While these were the forerunners of the English civilization in Western Pennsylvania and Virginia, others were worming their way far off in Northwestern Ohio. But all were watchful and on their guard. And good reasons had they to be on their guard. The old enmity between the races was not extinct. The defeat of the Indians had not been complete, it had been only baffled. On the edges of the border warfare had not at any time entirely ceased. The outposts were at any time open to surprise and attack. Far from the West, where the Indians had gathered closer together, came mutterings of war. In restless expectancy did the few settlers of Western Pennsylvania and Virginia pass over a couple of years, from 1759 to 1762 and 1763. As the war between France and England was about terminating in 1762, the storm at length broke out. Nor did the subsequent treaty of peace stop the aggression of these.

There was a daring and noble—if the word noble can be applied to a savage—a noble chieftain, who commanded a confederation of Indians which he himself had organized. This was Pontiac. He was chief of the Ottawas, and his camp-fires were about the lakes at Detroit. Under instigation of the French, and from a love of great actions, he waged an unrelenting and a deathless war on the English whites. He was possessed of an inherent genius both for command and to execute. Besides this he was gifted to a wonderful degree with the power of persuasive oratory. The strength of his organization and the force of his arms were felt all over the colonies. While the fires of one war were covering over, the fires of another war burst out. The natives, under arrangements concerted with this great chieftain, attacked in squads and simultaneously nearly every one of the outer circle of forts and settlements which circled westward from the lakes to the head-waters of the Kentucky. The tribes of Ohio, headed by the main body of the Shawanese, the most powerful of the Mingo confederation, carried the war into the heart of our own State. So unexpected and so fierce was this incursion that the Indians were all through the country before the whites knew.¹ Fort Pitt was completely surrounded. It was feared that the fort would fall, a fear made more intense from a corresponding interest and by the great expectation of the English, who had after so much difficulty wrested it from their enemies, and who, when they had it in possession, boastfully asserted that it should remain in their possession forever. Environing this fort, they penetrated as far eastward as Bedford. At this time Ligonier was the only post between Bedford and Fort Pitt held by the English. In the forts, stockades, and block-houses the settlers sought safety. The alarm spread like wildfire, and the roads in the East were filled with frightened women and children. Ligonier was in a state of siege. From now till the end of the French and Indian war, properly speaking, and even after, all the inhabitants were either driven east of the mountains or else they were cooped up in forts.

Fort Ligonier had now become a general station, at which provisions and munitions of war were collected for the supply of the West. From here, on pack-horses, these were sent forward protected. There was no stated number of the garrison, for it differed at different times. After Forbes left, Lieut. Lloyd was in command for most part of the year 1758. Lieut. Samuel Miles commanded in the latter part of the year 1759, and had twenty men under him picked out of two battalions. At the time of this incursion the depot at Ligonier was in charge of Lieut. Blaine. Capt. Ourry commanded at Bedford. The garrison at both places was small. But to preserve this post was of the utmost importance; for had Fort Pitt and Fort Ligonier fallen the whole of the middle part of Pennsylvania would have been open to another invasion. To here within the walls of the stockade all those around fled. Byerly, in the night, brought in his family, for the Indians were between his station and Fort Pitt. Fort Pitt, with a small garrison under Captain Ecuyer, was isolated. The Indians, under the vigilant control of a bloodthirsty chieftain, Kyashuta, of the Senecas,—the confederate of Pontiac in the East,—had hopes to starve out the garrison before assistance reached them. Amid the commotion and tumult in the East, it was feared that with all their activity in this emergency no relief could be brought to either point. A campaign would have to be first organized, and a long stretch of mountainous country separated them. But the authorities and people appeared willing and able to help. If the besieged places could hold out it would not be long till Bouquet would again be among them. Some thought that all would be massacred before assistance came; others dreaded to hear any news, for their ears were open to that which would be the most sorrowful.

In the mean time affairs were critical about Fort Ligonier. There was the greatest danger and the most widely spread fear of the post falling into the hands of the enemy. A party detached from the main body of the Indians had already attacked it, but by the good management of Lieut. Blaine and the bravery of his men, notwithstanding the fewness of their number and the badness of the stockade, those who attacked it were driven back.

As a matter of fact, the possession of this post was almost if not altogether of as much importance at this conjuncture as the post of Fort Pitt. Its situation was such that it immediately covered the frontiers. But besides this at that particular time there were large quantities of military stores here. Should these fall into the hands of the enemy, they would be able to continue their attack on Fort Pitt, and probably reduce the place before any help could come.

But at the same time in which the greatest apprehension was felt that this post would fall, came reinforcements. Captain Ourry, of Bedford, with a feeling and fearless heart, weakened his own garrison for the relief of this little band. He picked out twenty riflemen, all good woodsmen, and directed them to exert themselves to reach the garrison in all haste. They started across the mountains, and evading the Indians on all sides by coming in on another route, appeared on the hill back of the fort. It was dangerous for the brave men to delay, for fear of being discovered, and it was dangerous for them to run towards the fort, for in doing so they might be mistaken for an enemy and fired upon. But they soon resolved on doing. Under cover of the bushes they crept near to the stockade. They were seen by the Indians and fired at, but under cover of the fire they ran for the entrance of the fort. The garrison recognized them and fired upon their pursuers, and flinging open the gates of the stockade heartily welcomed their arrival.

¹ All the tribes from the Hudson to the Mississippi were in the confederation. So systematic was their attack planned, and so simultaneously was it executed, that out of the eleven or twelve of the principal British forts lying west of the Ohio River by their preconcerted arrangement and their quickness of operation only three were untaken. Le Boeuf, Venango, Presque Isle on Lake Erie, Lea Bay on Lake Michigan, Miami, St. Joseph, Ouachanon, Sandusky, and Michilimackinac had been surprised and the garrisons massacred. Niagara, Detroit, and Fort Pitt alone remained uncaptured, but each was besieged by a large number of savages, who had with them some French Canadians.

The garrison was strengthened at a most critical and opportune time. No one dared now venture outside the limits of the stockade. All such domestic animals as were suffered to wander were destroyed by the besieging party. There were many skirmishes about the fort; indeed, one continuous skirmish, if we trust the reports on good authority handed down to us. Many of the redskins were killed. Among them and urging them on were some renegade French Canadians, although at that time there was no war between the two countries.

The good conduct of Lieut. Blaine is greatly to be extolled. He had his hands full. All the distressed families for a distance of twelve and fifteen miles around had on the first alarm fled to the fort for protection, they having left most of their effects a prey to the savages.¹ Blaine, however, took every precaution to prevent a surprise and to repel another attack. The Indians by this time had become expert in one of the arts of war peculiar to their mode, and this they had practiced during this invasion with gratifying success. They prepared inflammable substances which they bound to their arrows, and these they shot into the roofs of the cabins inside the stockade and wherever else there was combustible material. But Blaine had guards watching incessantly, and otherwise took every known means to render these missiles ineffectual. He had arms enough at hand for the men who had gathered thither, and they he armed and made perform military duty. He formed them into two companies of volunteers, and they did duty with the garrison till the two companies of light infantry which were detached from Bouquet's force arrived.

In the mean time was Col. Bouquet hastening from the East to the distressed posts. All effective troops at command were turned for the support of the more important positions along the northern frontiers, where Britain was maintaining her foothold on the very threshold of her empire. Bouquet was ordered to relieve Fort Pitt with stores and provisions, and to reinforce it and the intermediate posts with his command. His available forces were the shattered remains of two regiments which had just landed at Philadelphia from the campaign in the West Indies,² where they had been fighting Spaniards, the yellow fever, and malaria. Such was the main part of the army on which he had to rely in reaching a post three hundred miles away, cut off and surrounded by enemies of whose disposition the men had no knowledge only from rumor. These in number did not exceed five hundred, of whom many were so weak they were not able to walk, and sixty were carried in wagons to be left at the smaller posts. The government of Pennsylvania had given orders to prepare a convoy of provisions for the forces along the route, and especially at Carlisle; but such was the utter helplessness of the country through which they passed—its crops burnt, its plantations destroyed—that when Bouquet came up nothing had been done. Nay, even the greater portion of Cumberland County was deserted, and the roads were filled with flying refugees. But by delaying at Carlisle for some eighteen days, towards the latter end of July, 1763, and by the unwearied diligence of the colonel, provisions from the neighboring counties were accumulated in sufficiency to allow him to proceed. His small number of sickly troops, who were to fight an enemy not unknown to Braddock, instead of encouraging the inhabitants rather made them dejected the more. Now, after their proffers of assistance and their activity on the first outbreak of the war, they did not in any number volunteer to assist the brave Swiss colonel and his English redcoats.

Bouquet, thoughtful as he always was, and not knowing of the action of Captain Ourry in forwarding the twenty volunteers from Bedford, sent forward, before he left Carlisle, thirty men to join the garrison at Ligonier. This was before July, 1763. They came in a hurried march, and, hazardous as was the undertaking, were not discovered till they came to the fort. Receiving some shot as they ran, they securely entered into the little stockade.

Bouquet toilsomely dragged his little army along. Everywhere he came he heard and saw the signs of Indian atrocities, for their war was not carried on by them in a body, but in many places and at different times. One day a horse laden with merchandise would be captured between Carlisle and Bedford and the driver killed; the next day a settler who had ventured from the stockade at Ligonier would be taken captive and hurried to the Indian country in the West. Even in the rear of the army, as it proceeded, were many waylaid and killed. He could get no idea of their numbers, their positions, their intentions. He could find no enemy to fight; he could hear of no place to attack them. He had expected to venture battle with them at Bedford, for about there they had murdered many, although they did not attack the fort. But when he came there they were all scattered. On the other hand, the Indians, by their fleet runners through the woods, knew of every movement of his.

On the 25th of July it was that Bouquet arrived at Bedford; on the 1st of August he reached Ligonier. His presence here relieved those whom he found in the greatest fear. On reaching Ligonier he determined, according to the narrative, to leave here his wagons and baggage, and proceeding forward with pack-horses, carry such a convoy of provisions as was necessary for his own troops and necessary for the immediate wants of the garrison at Pittsburgh and the needy collected within the fort; for there were a few log houses then built between the fort and the river occupied by traders, and these all fled for protection into the fort, and were under the care of the garrison. To all alike were the scanty supplies doled out.

¹ Rupp's "History Western Pennsylvania," p. 158.

² These were the Forty-second and the Seventy-seventh Regiments.

Bouquet's gallant little band, dignified in history with the fame-sounding appellation of army, halted only for a day at Ligonier fort, and leaving there a strong guard, then struck out on the old Forbes road. It was the road Bouquet himself had helped to make. He knew the country with the knowledge of a thorough military man. The first night they encamped on the west side of the Loyalhanna. It was Bouquet's intention to hasten past Turtle Creek by a forced march of thirty miles the next day, for to the east of Turtle Creek there was, between high banks and hills, a long defile extending some two miles, and this location was considered a dangerous one. In the early morning of August 5, 1763, the men were on the march. The weather was warm, and in the uncleared woods uncomfortably sultry and close, but yet by a little past noon they had marched seventeen miles, and come to within half a mile of Bushy Run, a tributary of Brush Creek, which itself flows into Turtle Creek. He had purposed to halt here to refresh his men till the heat of the day was exhausted, and possibly to evade the Indians by passing the defile before nightfall.

The Indians had left enough of their crew around the beleaguered fort, and without sensibly, or at least apparently, diminishing their number or their effectiveness there, were laying a plan to surprise Bouquet, for on hearing of his march from Ligonier they broke up their camp at the river, and at the most favorable time, under the chieftainship of Kyashuta, came out through the woods to annihilate the army of relief. The Mingoes knew the country well, and it was not unfavorable for ambush and their mode of warfare. The land is either hilly or rolling, and at that time was covered with rocks, thick bushes, and forest-trees. A number of the early inhabitants willingly offered their services to Bouquet at Bedford and at Ligonier. Among the advance as pioneers were Andrew Byerly and some of his neighbors, who volunteered to lead the army. The battle which followed, called the battle of Bushy Run, was fought near Byerly's Station.¹

At about one o'clock in the afternoon, when the small army was nearing Bushy Run, where they pur-

posed to slake their thirst and refresh themselves after their tiresome march, the advance, among whom were Byerly and the volunteer scouts, were suddenly fired upon. They were speedily supported by fresh troops, and the Indians scattered. Such, however, was the preconceived plan of battle, for as soon as the pursuit was ended they returned, and suddenly all along the line they rose up like the grass from their ambush along the sides of the hills. The regular soldiery, unused and all as they were to this kind of warfare, under their skillful commander bravely stood their ground. They resisted every attack of the enemy. Finding their convoy in danger, it being in the rear, they withdrew in order until they had it surrounded. Seeing that firing did not have the desired effect upon the Indians, they were ordered to charge with the bayonet. They did, and the savages fled, for they were never known to withstand this onset from regular troops. But the dispersing them was not victory, for they returned to the fight with persistence. Nor could they by any known method be dislodged or scattered. In this manner the little army withstood the repeated attacks of the emboldened and insolent enemy till night.

Night fell upon the brave band of foreign soldiers in the wilderness, who that long summer afternoon, without rest or refreshment, had been fighting. Worse than all did they suffer from thirst, as there was no stream near and they could not leave their convoy; besides, they were surrounded completely, and entirely cut off from the stream ahead. The night was longer than the day; when the day at last dawned it was only to renew, for them, the battle. Seeing that it must soon terminate some way, Bouquet planned and executed a stratagem.

The army still kept the position they had occupied during the night, close to their convoy. A few companies lay along the road. The convoy, being upon a rise of ground, was protected by the grenadiers and infantry, the horses, teamsters, and baggage being in the midst. In the advance along the road were two companies of grenadiers. Bouquet wanted to leave the impression with the Indians that he was about to begin a retreat. In pursuance of this apparent intention, he ordered the two companies to fall within the circle along the road, and also in reality to pass through between them and take up a position on the road in his rear, where they were hidden from view. They accordingly did so, and the lines opened to receive and then closed upon them. The Indians poured out upon the convoy and prowled through the wood to intercept those on the retreat. At the same time Bouquet ordered out two companies, one of grenadiers and one of light infantry, to lie in wait on the ground which the grenadiers had left. These, unobserved, took up their position. Then the circle around the convoy began to contract, as if indeed the retreat had actually begun. On the road of the retreating companies were also two companies of light infantry to resist the expected attack there. These rising suddenly from their ambush poured volley after volley among the Indians, from which they suffered exceedingly. Panic-stricken themselves, they fled through the woods before the infantry, who followed them with the bayonet, driving them right round towards the other grenadiers and infantry, who met them with their fresh fire, these being posted here to receive them when so driven round. Thus hemmed in between two concentrated and converging fires, the Indians suffered great loss, and being panic-struck beyond measure they fled separately through the woods in all directions. Nor did they once recover. They left upon the field sixty dead, among whom were many reputed their bravest warriors. Many more were wounded so that they died.

¹ See note to Penn township, in which the battle of Bushy Run was fought.

The leader of the Indians in this engagement was said to be Kyashuta. He was chief sachem of the Senecas, and by the power of his cacemah carried the Mingoes and all the Ohio tribes into the war. He made his name as famous almost as the name of his great compeer, Pontiac. He was a savage in every sense of the word. Turbulent and treacherous as he was, he was one of the last to make peace with the whites, and did so only when he was at their mercy. But fierce as he was when on the war-path and as he has been universally considered, yet there are some who have given high praise to his character. Washington, in 1770, when on a tour to the Ohio, stopped to pay his compliments to Kyashuta, and he states that he was treated by him with great kindness. He was one of the Indians who went with Washington to the French at Venango in 1753, before the French and Indian war.

At the time of this defeat the Mingoes had their headquarters at the old town of Logstown, on the Ohio, built for them by the French. After this battle they deserted this place.

Bouquet, collecting his worn-out soldiers, proceeded to Bushy Run, where he encamped. When the danger had seemed the most imminent a number of teamsters hid themselves among the bushes and allowed some of the horses to escape. On this account part of the convoy had to be destroyed. With the rest Bouquet advanced to Fort Pitt, which he reached on the 9th of August, 1763.¹

¹ Henry Bouquet, who made his name famous in American colonial history, and who has had a post-office in Westmoreland County called for him, thus deserving at our hands some notice, was born at Rolle, in the Canton of Berne, Switzerland, about 1719. At the age of seventeen he was received as a cadet in the regiment of Constance, and thence passed into the service of the King of Sardinia, in whose wars he distinguished himself as a lieutenant, and afterwards as adjutant. In 1748 he entered the Swiss Guards as lieutenant-colonel. When the war broke out in 1754 between England and France he was solicited by the English to serve in America. His ability soon got him in great confidence in Virginia and Pennsylvania, and he was employed in various services. He first distinguished himself under Forbes, and was one of his chief advisers. He readily fell into the provincial mode of fighting the Indians, which says more for his military genius than his former services would express. At the time of Pontiac's war, as we have seen at length, he was ordered by Gen. Amherst to relieve the western garrisons, which he

CHAPTER VII.

SETTLEMENT FROM 1759 TO 1769.

Misunderstood Boundaries of the Treaty of 1754 (Albany)—Purchase of 1758 and Boundaries thereunder—British Officers give Permits to Settlers after Forbes' Campaign—Pennsylvania will not give Title to Settlers, but passes Laws to keep Settlers off this Territory—Virginia induces Settlers to migrate hither and locate—The Boundary Line between Pennsylvania and Virginia not definitely known—Settlers come into the Country after Pontiac's war (1764)—They locate at Redstone, on the Youghiogheny, at the Forks of that River, and about Pittsburgh, Ligonier, and along the Great Roads—Mason and Dixon's Line run—Proclamation of the Governor of Pennsylvania warning these Settlers off—Rev. John Steele sent to them to explain the Law and request them to remove—They refuse to remove—The "New Purchase," under Treaty of Fort Stanwix, of 1768—List of the Earliest Settlements made in Western Pennsylvania to this date (1768)—Clamoring of Emigrants and New Settlers to have Lands granted them by the Province—Special Land Titles—Penn's Manorial Reservations—The Divesting Act—Preliminaries to the opening of the Land Office—Public Notice of the opening given—Land Office opened for Applications in the New Purchase, April 3, 1769.

We shall here give some account of the settlements of this region from the time of the occupancy of Fort Duquesne by Forbes in 1759 to the opening of the land office in 1769, a date to be always remembered in the history of the Westmoreland settlements. We shall also give a summary of the rules and regulations by which the land office was guided, and try to get an understanding of the relation between it and the people. It is a subject frequently to be resorted to, for within this period there is such a conflict of law and disobedience, of justice and injustice, of singular friendships and of singular enmities among the settlers and the natives, of misunderstood boundaries and of violated treaties.

The intervening period between these two dates is the date of Pontiac's war (1763). The settlements of this region may be aptly compared to the encroachment of the flow tide upon the beach. Waves of people were borne onward, and then from causes to be explained were driven back, only to be again driven outward with increased and accelerated force and body. From the close of this memorable war, of short duration it is true, but filled with barbarities untold, there was a cessation, and the country was left to comparative peace until the breaking out of Dunmore's war before the Revolution (1774). During this time immigration to the west of the Allegheny did so successfully with such inefficient means. No soldier of foreign birth was so distinguished or so successful in Indian warfare as he was. The next year after this battle, that was in 1764, he was placed at the head of a force of Pennsylvania and Virginia volunteers, which he had organized at Fort Loudon, Pa., with which he penetrated in a "line of battle" from Fort Pitt into the Indian country along the Muskingum. The savages, baffled and unsuccessful in all their attempts at surprise and ambush, sued for peace, and the "Treaty of Bouquet" made then and there, is as notorious in Ohio as the "Battle of Bouquet" is in Pennsylvania. The Assembly of Pennsylvania and the Burgesses of Virginia adopted addresses of gratitude, tendered him their thanks, and recommended him for promotion in His Majesty's services. Immediately after the peace with the Indians was concluded, the king made him brigadier-general and commandant in the Southern colonies of British America. He lived not long to enjoy his honors, for he died at Pensacola, 1767, "lamented by his friends, and regretted universally."

Mountains commenced and continued. Settlements were then started in places and localities which were permanently held. By Bouquet's treaty of 1764 the Indians granted the whites the privilege of erecting forts and trading-houses wherever they pleased, and of traveling the road from sunrise till sunset.¹ Had there been no opposition but that offered by the natives, Western Pennsylvania would have been soon settled; but from circumstances peculiar to this colony the settlements here were delayed and retarded.

We have stated that the authorities of our Province did not allow any one to settle on lands not purchased from the Indians. But it will be remembered that by the treaty of Albany in 1754 all lands lying west of the Susquehanna, and as far in extent as the limits of the Province, were said to have been so purchased. This treaty driving the Indians to take part with the French, as was terribly witnessed by Braddock's defeat and the aggressive war following, compelled Governor Morris in the next year, 1755, to issue his proclamation in which he distinctly asserted that this fraud was apparent to the whole world, and the demand so exorbitant that by it the natives had not a country left to subsist in.² Perhaps the authorities were, as was subsequently given out, as poorly informed as to where the limits extended as the Indians were in comprehending the points of the compass; for it was afterwards found that the boundaries did not by any means extend so far as the actual limits of the Province. But the Indians the more loudly complained of this injustice. Many conferences were held about the region of the Ohio, among which may be noted those of Weiser's, Post's, and Crogan's, a familiarity with the details of which may be acquired from any narrative covering this era and bearing on this section. These all were preliminary, and finally led to the treaty of Easton, October, 1758, which was consummated after the successful expedition of Forbes in capturing Fort Duquesne. In this treaty of 1758 the authorities of the Province surrendered to the Indian Six Nations and their allies all to the northward and westward of the Allegheny Mountains, and finally and indubitably secured all the remainder eastward to the proprietaries.

In the southern part of the State, east of Westmoreland, the purchase of 1758 would have had for its western boundary the line between Somerset and Bedford, Cambria and Blair Counties.

Pennsylvania could thus not claim any of the territory west of that line³ for the purpose of giving lands to her inhabitants, because to have done so would have been in violation of her good faith and of her prior treaties with the natives.

Beyond the franchise of the proprietaries, however, were the reserved privileges of the crown. The king of England, as lord paramount, sent his soldiers through both Virginia and Pennsylvania, as he had a right to do, opened up his military roads and his highways, established his military posts, and kept up his garrisons. From the time of Forbes till after the treaty of 1768 there were British officers and a garrison at Fort Pitt. At Ligonier there was sometimes a regular British officer and sometimes a subaltern in the service of the Province, but who was specially empowered by delegated authority from the officer in his military department over him to grant under certain restrictions permits to occupy parcels of land, as the commandant at Fort Pitt could.

The successful termination of the French and Indian war in 1759 and 1760 gave to England the possession of Canada, as well as the great West. Hence were the fortifications and military posts which had been erected by the French turned over to and occupied by the British. To have ready access to and communication with these posts and from one to the other was a necessity. In encouraging all efforts of the royal deputies in that direction, no one of the old colonies was more ready and active than was Virginia.⁴ Many of her grants had been made before the time of Braddock, and she was now as sedulous as ever in protecting them.

Among those which were regarded as the necessary and special privileges of these royal commandants was that one to which we have alluded, of granting to settlers permission to occupy, settle upon, and cultivate lands, which might be retained afterwards by a compliance with the regulations of the Penns, whose ultimate right in the land was never questioned. The object manifestly was to encourage settlers near the garrisons, whose labor was necessary for the production of necessaries for the use and preservation of the garrison. Soldiers who were married and stationed at these posts kept their families with them. Permits were granted also to certain settlers along the old roads, and at stations on the rivers, where they were of advantage to the military authorities or subserved a useful and needed purpose. As a very wide margin circumscribed the discretion of these officers, it will be readily inferred that these permits were granted for many reasons.⁵

¹ After Bouquet's victory the Indian warriors retreated into the wilderness of Ohio, and did not regard themselves as safe till they stopped at the Muskingum. But Bouquet with new forces pursued them thither, and at the memorable treaty of 1764, on the Muskingum, exacted such terms and restricted those inclined to war to such limits that it has been regarded as the most efficacious of all treaties forced from them at the point of the bayonet.—Craig's "Olden Time."

² At the treaty of Albany, in 1754, the delegates from Pennsylvania secured, as was alleged, irregularly, a great portion of the land to which the title of the Indians was not extinguished, by which many tribes found the ground which had been secured to them by treaties with the Six Nations sold from under their feet. This had been guaranteed to them on their removal thither.

³ See line marking western limits of the purchase of 1749, and purchase of 1736 and prior, on maps of various purchases.

⁴ In 1755, by the books of the Secretary of Virginia, three millions had been granted west of the mountains to her settlers. In 1758 that colony endeavored to encourage by law settlements in the Indian country.

⁵ In 1765 the second town of Pittsburgh was laid out by permission of the commanding officer at Fort Pitt.

The following is a copy of a permit granted by Arthur St. Clair to Many with stout hearts, level heads, and ready hands availed themselves of these privileges, and some by special permit, others by official influence, took up lands in various parts, but especially near the forts. There were others who availed themselves of the power delegated to these commandants, and got their permits to reoccupy lands which they had previously occupied before the time of Braddock, and which they had first possessed under the cover of Virginia, or more directly of the Ohio Company.

The same technicality about titles did not exist in Virginia. And now we touch upon a subject which in the annals of Southwestern Pennsylvania assumes great proportions. The early civil history of this region is the history of conflicting boundary claims.

Virginia by her charter from James the First, 1609, claimed all the territory from the Atlantic Ocean which, bounded by a straight line on the northern limits, extended "up into the land throughout from sea to sea, west and northwest," which line, if now allowed as then claimed, would take in Maryland, most of Southwestern Pennsylvania, Ohio, and all West and Northwest up to 54° 40'. This patent was, in 1624, at the instance of the company, revoked, and although never afterwards restored, was made the pretext by Virginia of great and most arrogant pretensions.¹

The line of Penn's province was, as is well known, from the fortieth degree of north latitude "in a straight line westward" to the limits of five degrees of longitude from the Delaware.² Now a degree of longitude is between sixty-eight and sixty-nine geographical miles, and the five degrees, had they been marked and measured, would have reached, as we see, beyond the Monongahela. But it came to be believed by the authorities of Virginia that these five degrees would not reach over the mountains.³

It would, however, had this question never risen, have been a futile and useless thing to attempt to keep out this class of settlers who wanted to come into these parts from coming in. In the history of Pennsylvania it is noticeable that the settlements mostly preceded the treaties.

Inmigrants, therefore, in spite of all remonstrance and in the face of all dangers, came into this region. Virginia offered inducements; Pennsylvania imposed objections. Those, then, who did come in found arguments ready at hand in favor of sustaining the claims of Virginia. They alleged that Virginia had fought for the land, had organized expeditions against the hostile Indians, had sent Washington with Braddock against the French, and had succeeded most effectually in reclaiming a region to which she had manifest right, and had always watched over her settlers, giving them lands cheap and not burdening them heavily with taxes, and that therefore their allegiance, on all grounds natural as well as civil, was due to her in preference to Pennsylvania.

The region, too, was readier of access through her undisputed territory than through that of Pennsylvania. The Braddock road, used before the time of Pontiac's war (1764) in preference to the Forbes road, was after that time the great highway for emigrants to and through those parts, and many, indeed, from the interior of Pennsylvania preferred it to the other, which was regarded as more difficult and insecure.

In 1765 many emigrants from Maryland and Virginia removed over the mountains for the purpose of settling there.⁴ These settled mostly in the Fayette part of what was then of Cumberland County, between the mountains and the Monongahela River, some about the Turkey Foot (Confluence), some in the river bottoms of Greene and Washington Counties, with a nucleus at Redstone (Brownsville), but most in the southern part of what is now Westmoreland, and by this time the old plantations which had been before deserted were mostly reoccupied.

We then, in short, observe that although the Pennsylvania authorities did not allow to private individuals the privilege of settlement, yet by a resistless impulse they forced themselves upon the forbidden ground. This the Indians complained of, for it was alleged, perhaps with reason, that there were many killed by the whites without provocation, and the Indians being always at war among themselves, it was not improbable that some of them in passing and re-passing from one place to another were thus killed. When we are further acquainted with the character of these settlers it will not seem at all improbable. The authorities, both of Pennsylvania and of Virginia, were active in their professions, in their local treaties, and in their supervising legislation to mollify

Frederick Rorer, the original of which is in the possession of Caleb Cope, Esq.:

"By Arthur St. Clair, late Lieut. in his Majesty's Sixtieth Regt. of foot, having the care of his Majesty's fort at Ligonier.

"I have given Permission to Frederick Rorer to cultivate a certain Piece of Land in the neighborhood of Fort Ligonier, over a certain creek, which empties itself into the Loyal Hanning, known by the name of the Coal Pitt Creek; beginning at a White Oak standing on a spring and marked with the letters F X R and running from thence to another Tree marked with the same letters and standing on another Spring called the Falling Spring, and from these two marked Trees towards the sd [said] Coal Pitt Creek supposed to contain two hund. acres he the said Frederick Rorer being willing to submit to all orders of the Commander in Chief the commanding officer of the District, and of the Garrison.

"Given under my hand at Ligonier this 11th day of April, 1767.

"AR. ST. CLAIR."

¹ By reason of the alleged point from which to start the ideal line, taken from the misprint of John Smith's map, the only one at the date of the charters, which point was placed nineteen miles too far to the south, arose the controversy between the proprietaries of Maryland and Pennsylvania, which after long litigation was finally decided by the Lord Chancellor of England.

² But the Pennsylvania authorities, when they were asked to help expel the French, expressed with some equivocation a doubt, among other stronger objections, whether the intrusion was on their territory.

³ Veitch, "Secular History" in "Cent. Mem.," p. 300, and numerous other authorities.

⁴ This statement takes in its purview those settlers under the Ohio Company's grant and at Gist's.

those disaffected; but they with a grim and stoical persistence always put forward their grievances, and played on the same string. As early as 1766, Crogan complained of the persons settling at Redstone, and insisted that the government pursue vigorous measures to deter the frontier inhabitants from murdering the Indians and from encroaching on their grounds, at least till the boundaries were definitely fixed between the two colonies. Of George Crogan, the Indian agent, it may be said that he was one of the most successful Indian diplomatists that was ever in the service of any State. By his tireless efforts many years of war were averted, and thousands of lives were saved.

The running of Mason and Dixon's line in 1767 as far as to its second crossing at Dunkard Creek, in now Greene County, indicated that all these intruders were within Pennsylvania. The Governor of Virginia (Fauquier) did not gainsay it, and left the proprietaries to fight it out with the intruders as best they could. Governor Penn, in 1768, called the special attention of the Assembly to this, and said their removal was indispensable to avert war.

In these proceedings it is seen that there was a desire on the part of those representing the interests of the government and people to conciliate the Indians and to secure their perpetual friendship. They were thus under obligation to proceed according to the white man's ideas of justice. Surveys made over those lands not alienated by treaty deed were declared to be void and illegal. They professed not to sell any lands beyond those not purchased. Many acts were passed prohibiting any one from thus settling, and by an act of Feb. 3, 1768, any one neglecting to remove from such settlements after legal notice was, after being duly convicted, to be punished with death without benefit of clergy. But this act was not intended to extend to those then settled, or to those who thereafter settled, on the main roads leading through the Province to Fort Duquesne, and so settled with the approbation of the commander-in-chief of His Majesty's forces or their lawfully authorized officers, or in the neighborhood of Fort Pitt under such permission. And any person presuming to enter on such unpurchased lands for the purpose of marking trees or making surveys was to be punished, on conviction, by a fine of fifty pounds and three months' imprisonment. This act was violated by those who settled about Redstone and the Turkey Foot, and perhaps by others farther northward and back of the Forbes road.¹

The reasons for enacting laws so highly penal are recounted at large. From the advices furnished by the officers in charge of the garrisons, and from those who were brought in close contact with the natives, there was at this time immediate danger of another Indian outbreak. Most of these penal laws were temporary only in their effect,—that is, they were made for particular emergencies, and were intended to be in force only for a short time. And as these laws died out many of those who had left when warned off returned, and others intruded themselves on the lands. Some, however, did not leave, either from entreaty or force; such were those at Redstone and at Turkey Foot.² Proclamations were of little effect, and before it was too late it was of necessity that the Indian complaints should be redressed, or at least patiently listened to. So far did the desire of the government extend to keep the Indians at rest, that there was a severe penalty in money and in imprisonment for those who even hunted and pursued wild beasts without the lawful limits.

When those settlers at Redstone and the Turkey Foot remained in open defiance of the act of February, 1768, and of the proclamation commanding them to quit, an effort was made to peaceably induce them to do so. As these settlers were for the greater part Scotch-Irish from their settlements in Pennsylvania, the Rev. John Steele, of Carlisle, and three others, early in March, 1768, were sent to warn them off, and to represent to them the desire and the will of the government of the Province. Shortly after this he was at their settlement. The people hearing of his coming appointed a meeting among themselves. At this meeting he read to them the act of Assembly and the proclamation of the Governor, explaining to them the law and giving the reasons for it, and endeavored to persuade them to comply therewith. He represented that their compliance was the most probable method of getting the favor of the proprietaries.

On the 30th of March (1768) thirty to forty of the settlers met the deputies at Gist's, that being the point designated as the most convenient for those from the Cheat River and Stewart's Crossing (Connellsville), whither messengers had been sent with this request. On the 31st they were at the Great Crossings, from where they sent copies of the proclamation to those at Turkey Foot.³

While at Redstone he was met by a number of Mingoos, who sent by him a speech to the Governor. They said firmly that the whites must go away, but they would wait on the issue of a talk to be held by George Crogan and their great men. The treaty in prospect came off at Fort Pitt in April and May, 1768. Between 1000 and 2000 Indians were there of the Six Nations, Delawares, Shawanese, and other tribes. Hereat many presents were distributed, and, strange and inconsistent as it may appear, the only

² Col. Crawford, in a letter to James Tilghman, Aug. 9, 1771 (Archives, iv. 424), says that he had information that there was a bond or article of agreement entered into between a number of the inhabitants of Monongahela and Redstone that each would join and keep off all officers of the law, under a penalty of £50, to be forfeited by the party refusing to join against all officers whatsoever. See also Col. G. Wilson's letter to A. St. Clair, wherein he mentions the resolves of the inhabitants to oppose Penn's laws, Aug. 14, 1771 (Archives, iv. 437).

³ Ibid.

¹ Steele's Letter to Gov. John Penn, Prov. Records, p. 316.

complaints made were by the Pennsylvania commissioners against the Indians for selling their lands to the settlers, and for the interference of the Mingoes at the Redstone Conference.¹

But the settlers did not remove, nor did any of them "suffer death without benefit of clergy" for remaining, for by this and from other things they felt assured that among them there was no immediate danger of war, for they were a willful-minded, stubborn set of men, inured to roughness all their lives.

But all signs indicated that another Indian war was brewing, a war which promised to be a general one. The hostiles had been quiet as long as was usual, and their mutterings all round the settlements of the whites from Western New York to Western Virginia were audible. To none was it more instinctively perceptible than to Sir William Johnson, the one man to whom more than to any other the Board of Trade and Plantations intrusted the management of the royal and colonial interest arising from trouble with the tribes. This war was thereupon averted by the intervention of Johnson, whose influence over the Six Nations was unbounded. At his suggestion a great council was held at Fort Stanwix, in New York. Here all grievances were redressed, chains brightened, tomahawks buried, etc. By the terms of this treaty made with the Six Nations, November 5, 1768, all the territory extending in a boundary from the New York line on the Susquehanna, past Towanda and Tyadaghton Creek, up the West Branch, over to Kittanning on the Allegheny, and thence down the Ohio and along the Monongahela to the Province line was conveyed to the proprietaries. This was called the NEW PURCHASE. Of the most of this region was afterwards erected Bedford and then Westmoreland Counties.

The New Purchase, or that of 1768, on our map begins at the Susquehanna in Bradford County; thence, following the courses of those local streams which then were designated by their Indian names, the line meanders in a south and west direction through the counties of Tioga, Lycoming, Clinton, to the northeast corner of Clearfield; passing through Clearfield from the northeast to the southwest corner, it reaches a point at Cherry Tree where Indiana, Clearfield, and Cambria meet; thence in a straight line across Indiana County to Kittanning, on the Allegheny River; thence down the Allegheny to the Ohio, and along the Monongahela till it strikes the boundary line of the State on its southern side.

Let us now glance at the settlements of this "most-west-land" at the date of this treaty, 1768. First then there was Christopher Gist, agent and surveyor of the Ohio Company, who enjoys the distinction of being the first white settler west of Laurel Hill, in Pennsylvania, who came to stay. In 1752-53 he located at Mount Braddock, now Fayette County, and induced eleven other families to settle near him, some of whom were his relations. This settlement was not far from Connellsville, and on the Ohio Company's road.

In 1754, when the French expelled the English Virginians from the Ohio and its tributaries, William Trent, George Cogan, Robert Callender, and Michael Teaff were partners in the trading business, and having suffered by their ejection, they applied to the government of Pennsylvania with a carefully prepared statement of their losses. From their account and statement, which was supported by affidavit, they had at that time ten acres of corn, with large fields cleared, near Sharpsburg (at Etna borough), which they were obliged to leave; also, one house at the Sewickley bottom, about twenty-five miles from Fort Duquesne, up the Youghiogeny, with fields fenced and grain in the ground, these last being valued at three hundred pounds.

Previous to 1754 the more southern part, presumed to be in Virginia, we have said, was visited by settlers from Maryland, some of whom remained. Among these was Frederick Waltzer, who lived four miles west of Uniontown. These, with the exception of a few agents among the Indians who for the time being were compelled to abide at some certain place, and of those who settled in Tygart's Valley, are said to have been the first prior to Braddock's expedition (1755). But whatever settlers there then were, after the battle at the Monongahela they had to leave their clearings. Some of them returned soon after, and others not till 1761 or later.

Under Col. Bouquet and the commandants at Fort Pitt, many settlements were made near Pittsburgh in 1760 and 1761, which in 1769 were located. William Jacob settled at the mouth of Redstone Creek in 1761, and by removal in 1763. James Goudin in 1762 raised a house at Eleven-Mile Run, which flows into the Monongahela. The Byerly settlement, near Harrison City, dates from 1758. John Irwin settled at the mouth of Bushy Run, not far from Byerly's, in 1768. John Frazer, John Ormsby, Sr. and Jr., and Oliver Ormsby had made improvements on Turtle Creek prior to 1762.

There is much evidence to make one believe that before the time of Pontiac's war, about 1762, there were more settlers occupying lands at no great distance from the great roads and the military posts than we have any specific or absolute knowledge of. What their numbers or their names were we have no possible account. The Byerly settlement, for instance, had an accession of several families, as is discovered among the decisions of the Supreme Court of the State. Some lands about Fort Ligonier, and even at a distance from the fort on the summit of Chestnut Ridge, were cleared by inhabitants of Cumberland County, who at that date had not yet removed their families hither. On these clearings were raised potatoes and corn, and the product in some instances, and these certainly before 1768, was sent over the mountains for those there. These lands were held by mere occupancy, taken by "tomahawk title," as they called it, after a manner of title partially, under some conditions, allowed by the laws of Virginia, but in this purchase, under the laws of Pennsylvania, being in itself no title. Some lands along the Conemaugh, and in the Ligonier Valley along the Indian trail, and subsequently the main road from Ligonier to Kittanning, and some along the trail by the Loyalhanna, were thus occupied. It is true that warrants were afterwards laid upon many of these improvements, and the titles were confirmed to those who, settling upon them, had a prior claim.¹ But some tracts were passed or sold before they were warranted, or, in other words, before a title could be given. Hence one source of litigation which for two generations engrossed the closest application of the best legal minds in the West, a subject to analyze which, unless to a student of the law, would be unprofitable and a great labor.

¹ Veitch, "Sec. Hist.," p. 303. "Minutes of Conference," etc., Prov. Rec. Rupp, "Hist. Western Pa.," App'x, p. 181, et seq.

It is inferred that up to 1768 no considerable settlements were made in Southwestern Pennsylvania other than those in Fayette and its borders, for none of these were complained of. Mr. Steele estimated their number at that time at one hundred and fifty families, which would not exceed eight hundred souls. In this, however, he did not include many in the Washington County region beyond the Monongahela, but confined his report particularly to the Redstone, the Youghiogheny, and the Turkey Foot settlements.² Of these he reports eight or ten families in the Turkey Foot, which, by the way, he did not visit in person, and "a few families" near the crossings of the Little Yough. This estimate does not include the settlers around Fort Pitt, Fort Burd (Brownsville), Fort Ligonier, and the great roads leading to these forts, who had been allowed military permits, nor Col. Crogan's settlement along the Allegheny. Of these latter the number has been estimated at three hundred.³

And now there began a loud knocking at the door. During this time the eastern portion of the Province was beginning, as they called it, to be "thickly settled." Lands were getting scarce; the younger sons of the older settlers must be provided for, for our ancestors were emphatically an agricultural race, and nothing so satisfied them as an acquisition of land. Besides these there were many emigrants whom petty tyranny, landlordism, misgovernment, and the expectation of betterment drove to these shores, and who were waiting for a place to shelter their heads, willing and over-anxious to begin life in the new. The Indian race could not stand before the white race, and was receding before it. The wandering proclivities of the former and the aggressive proclivities of the latter were mutually understood. But no inducement was offered, for as yet no title could be given to those who wanted to enter upon these vacant lands and make them their own. Public policy, and the irresistible clamor of those on the outside, made it apparent that the peopling of this extensive domain could not much longer be delayed.

It is here proper to state that it was the policy and the practice of the proprietaries—that is, Penn and his heirs and successors—to reserve large portions of land for their personal use in certain districts all over the Province. In the year 1700, Penn issued his warrant to the surveyor-general to reserve for him and his heirs five hundred acres out of every township of five thousand acres. These reservations were called manors, and over them and in them the proprietary had exclusive jurisdiction, both as landlord and as judge in matters of law. In accordance with this order there were two reservations of the Penns within Westmoreland County. One was called the Manor of Denmark, and was situated on Bushy Run. It contained four thousand eight hundred and sixty-one acres. Bouquet's battle of August, 1763, was fought on, afterward, this manor. The station of Manor, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, designates its location. The other reservation was called Penn's Lodge. It contained five thousand five hundred and sixty-eight acres, and lies in the southern part of the county, Sewickley township marking its location. The latter manor lies in a fine agricultural district, while the former is rich in deposits of bituminous coal.⁴ Had

³ Veech, "Sec. Hist.," 303, and "Steele's Letter."

It is generally conceded that Snollett ("Hist. of England") did not know what he was talking about when he said that the erection of Fort Pitt (1759-60) "gave perfect security to about 4000 settlers, who now returned, etc.," which statement has sometimes been quoted. It is not correct, unless he meant to convey the idea that Fort Pitt covered, with its handful of soldiers, the whole of Western Pennsylvania and Western Virginia from the mountains to the rivers, which is simply absurd.

⁴ These were the only manors in Westmoreland proper—our Westmoreland. Those of the New Purchase aggregated some two hundred thousand acres.

¹ Although this law of Feb. 3, 1768, was in a certain sense not regarded, and was soon rendered nugatory and inoperative by this treaty of 1768, yet there are in the records of the Supreme Court cases from Westmoreland County brought up under this law; and some lost all claim they had in lands which they had illegally occupied. In the case of Christopher Rudsbaugh, who had settled on the Forbes road under permit from Col. Bouquet, commandant at Fort Pitt, in 1761, the title to a portion thereof passed from his descendants because he had not availed himself of the privilege of getting a warrant when the land-office was opened in 1769. (See Bioren's Laws of Pennsylvania, title, "Land Office.")

² "The names of inhabitants near Redstone: John Wiseman, Henry Priesser, William Linn, William Colvin, John Vervalson, Abraham Tygard, Thomas Brown, Richard Rodgers, Henry Swatz, Jos. McClean, Jessé Martin, Adam Hatton, John Verwald, Jr., James Waller, Thomas Doster, Captain Colburn, John Delong, Peter Young, George Martin, Thomas Down, Andrew Gudgeon, Phil. Sute, James Crawford, John Peters, Michael Hooter, Andrew Linn, Gabriel Conn, John Martin, Hans Cook, Daniel McCay, Josias Crawford, 'ono' Province.

"Names of those who met us at Gesse's (Christopher Gist's) place:

"Ous Bloomfield, James Lynn, Eze. Johnson, Richard Harrison, Phil. Lute, J. Johnson, Thos. Gesse, Chas. Lindsay, James Wallace, Henry Burkham, Lawrence Harrison, Ralph Hickenbottom.

"Names of the people at Turkey Foot:

"Henry Abrahams, Eze. Dewit, James Spencer, Benjamin Jennings, John Cooper, Eze. Hickman, John Enslow, Henry Enslow, Benjamin Pursley." As reported by Rev. Steels.

these reservations alone been held intact to our time their possessors would be millionaires. But circumstances completely destroyed the claim of the possessors to all title to such real property in Pennsylvania. At the American Revolution the Penns sided with the crown and against the colonies. On the 28th of June, 1779, was passed the Divesting Act, which act divested the title from the Penns and vested it in the Commonwealth. This was not done, of course, without a valuable recompense; and it was considered unreasonable, as indeed it was, that a claim of such boundless authority—for the authority extended to the making of laws, the establishing of courts—baron, and the bestowal of special privileges on favored persons—should be allowed to exist in the midst of a republic of freemen. Accordingly, all titles to proprietary, or manorial, lands within these bounds are traceable to the State, and are not of older date than the year mentioned, 1779.

A warrant is an order from the land office to survey and locate lands applied for.¹ A person desiring land from the Province was required first to make application, get the warrant issued thereon directed to the surveyor-general, who by his deputy mostly surveyed the same, and return it back to the land office, upon which, if there was no irregularity, a patent or deed from the Commonwealth issued under the great seal and superscription of the Governor. Thus, as we have seen, there could be no warrant given out by the civil authorities to any one settled in Westmoreland County prior to 1769, at which date the land office was first opened for this purpose, so far as regards the territory acquired by this treaty which we are still upon. But after this treaty in 1768, by which this land was acquired, it was in order then to grant warrants to such as had settled and such as proposed to settle in the New Purchase.

As the soldiers of the Pennsylvania regiment had served through the preceding wars together, it was now their wish to settle in peace together; for this purpose the Province set apart one hundred and four thousand acres. Then there were also preferences for individuals, such as special grants, the lands donated to officers, and the proprietary reservations.

As there were thousands of applications for land at the land office, the question at once arose how the preference should be given, if, indeed, any preference was allowed; for when the land office should be opened it was to be on a day certain, and after public proclamation. It was impossible to receive applications or to grant a title for the applications now waiting from settlers, from parties proposing to remove into this region, from land speculators, and from foreign immigrants. It was found expedient, therefore, to have the choice made by means of a lottery scheme, a scheme not unknown to the land office department. The choice was thus to be given by lot. By a public advertisement from James Tilgham, secretary of the office, on Feb. 23, 1769, it was made known that the land office would be open on the 3d of April then next, at ten o'clock in the morning, to receive applications from all persons inclined to take up lands in the New Purchase. The terms were five pounds sterling per hundred acres, and one penny per annum quit-rent.

From the records of the land office we derive the facts that, as it was anticipated on the opening of the office on this day great numbers would be ready to give in their locations at the same instant, it was the opinion of the Governor and the agents that the most unexceptionable method of receiving these locations would be, after receiving them from the people, to put them into a box or trunk, and, after mixing them, to draw out and number them in the order drawn. Those who had settled, especially those who had settled by permission of the commanding officers, were allowed to have the preference. This was done in order, and the list following declared those who had so drawn. But up to 1772 there were no warrants issued on application made for lands upon improvements or old surveys.

CHAPTER VIII.

PREDOMINANT NATIONALITIES OF THE SETTLERS.

"New Purchase" in Cumberland County Territory—The Penns appoint Justices of the Peace for that part of Cumberland County west of Laurel Hill—No evidence of any Authority being exercised by these Magistrates—Bedford County created—Township Divisions of that part of Bedford County which later became Westmoreland—Tax-Rolls for Bedford County—Number of Landholders and of Tenants returned—The Southwestern Boundary of Bedford County—No Actual Jurisdiction of Bedford County Government tolerated by the Settlers—First Courts of Bedford—Those in the first Commission—Number of Applications at the opening of the Land Office in 1769—Prominent Men who took up Land at that date—Different Nationalities of the Settlers: Scotch-Irish, Germans, French Huguenots, English-Americans—Localities of their Settlements—Predominant Nationality of Pennsylvania Settlers before the Revolution—Immigration of the Scotch-Irish, particularly that of 1771-73—Their Nativity, and account of their Denization in the North of Ireland—Their Distinct Characteristics—How they were held by Friends and by Defamers—They and the Dutch, bad neighbors—Their Influence in Public Affairs in Western Pennsylvania, and reference therein to the Whiskey Insurrection.

THAT portion of the purchase of 1768 (or the New Purchase) which was afterwards the territory of Westmoreland was between the date of the purchase and the 9th of March, 1771 (the date of the erection of Bedford County), included in the political division of Cumberland County, which had been erected long before (1750).

In May, 1770, some ten months before the erection of Bedford County, Arthur St. Clair, William Crawford, Thomas Gist, and Dorsey Pentecost, all historic names, were among the justices of the peace appointed for Cumberland County. But they have left no trace of any exercise of official functions until after their reappointment for Bedford County, in March, 1771, and again (except Peutecost) for Westmoreland, in 1773.

¹ Lands, the title to which is traceable to Penn's successors who sold by constituted attorney, by provision of act of Assembly, do not need to be patented from the State.

Up until 1771 the settlers here were left to the freedom of their own will, uninfluenced except by the Indians and traders and the agents and feeble garrisons whom the king kept here to control them. No taxes, no courts, no ministers of the law, except those mentioned, nor of the gospel, outside of Fort Pitt, except when sent here on some special mission, as were the Rev. Messrs. Beatty and Duffield in 1766, and Mr. Steele in 1768.¹

The county of Bedford was created March 9, 1771. The reason assigned for the erection of the new county was "the great hardships the inhabitants of the western parts of the county of Cumberland lie under from being so remote from the present seat of judicature and the public offices." The eastern boundary ran along the summit of the Tuscarora Mountains, and the western and southern boundary was the line of the Province, embracing, as will be perceived, the entire southwestern portion of the State from the West Branch of the Susquehanna and the Cove, or Tuscarora Mountains, westward to the Ohio and the Virginia line.

From the old Bedford County tax-rolls it is seen that all that part of Western Pennsylvania which afterwards became Westmoreland County was at that date included in eight townships, and they embraced the territorial areas, as near as need be ascertained for our purpose, as follows: "Armstrong," most of what is now the county of that name and some if not the greater part of Indiana County. "Fairfield" stretched between the Laurel Hill and Chestnut Ridge Mountains. "Hempfield" took in a wide scope around Greensburg. "Mount Pleasant," a large district around the town of that name. "Pitt" embraced about all of Allegheny County between the rivers Allegheny, Monongahela, and Youghiogheny. It makes a poor show. "Rosstrevor" covered all of the Forks of Youghiogheny and reached up into Fayette County. "Springhill" extended over all the southwestern part of Fayette and all that part of Greene and Washington then believed to be in Pennsylvania. "Tyrone" covered all the residue of what is now Fayette on both sides of the Youghiogheny.²

The number of landholders in all was nine hundred and eleven, and the number of tenants one hundred and seventy-four. "Springhill" had the highest number,³ it being assessed with three hundred and eight landholders and eighty-nine tenants. This assessment has been considered too low, for the obvious reason that no perfect assessment could be made, and if ever was made it would be in restriction.

Many of those assessed as landholders were non-residents, as Rev. James Finley, in Rosstrevor, and George Washington, in Tyrone, in which he owned about sixteen hundred acres at and around Perryopolis, in now Fayette, over the river from Layton's Station.

The act erecting Bedford County recognized Mason and Dixou's line as its southern boundary, and this purviewed the extension of this line beyond Maryland; but the act, except in indefinite terms, did not make provision for a western boundary, nor, except on the north and east borders of Greene County as it is now, and in the region touching upon and beyond Pittsburgh, did it ever attempt to reach beyond the Monongahela. The reasons for this we shall elsewhere see.

Although it was subdivided into townships, and had justices appointed, yet its authority was feebly asserted and scarcely obeyed. Most of the settlers shunned it, and those about the Turkey Foot and Redstone and all the disorderly settlers of the Fayette region laughed it to scorn and derided it. Even official surveys slackened, and settlers coming in along the Braddock road squatted without right, and occupied where they pleased, only keeping off the location of prior settlers. Based upon the uncertainty whether they were in Pennsylvania or in Virginia, and fostered by demagogues, by "bloody law," and by the wishes and desires, antipathies and prejudices of these, they had pretexts enough not to conform to the laws of the Province. "When the back line comes to be run," said they, "if we are in Pennsylvania we will submit." There could be no other government but that of Pennsylvania, and these people were very desirous, therefore, that the running of the line be deferred to an indefinite period.

The first Court of Quarter Sessions for Bedford County was held April 16, 1771, "before William Proctor, Jr., Robert Cluggage, Robert Hanna, George Wilson, William Lochrey, and William McConnell, Esqs., Justices of our Lord the King."⁴

When the land office was opened, subsequent to the purchase of 1768, and the flood-gates, so to speak, were up, the flood rushed in in torrents. From the third day of April, 1769, dates the invasion of the white race into the wilderness and woods of Western Pennsylvania. On that day hundreds of locations were ⁴ The other justices appointed and commissioned with the above were John Frazer, Bernard Dougherty, Arthur St. Clair, William Crawford, James Milligan, Thomas Gist, Dorsey Pentecost, Alexander McKee, and George Woods.

The first commissioners were Robert Hanna, Dorsey Pentecost, and John Stevenson; William Proctor was the first sheriff; Arthur St. Clair was appointed first prothonotary, recorder, and clerk of courts by Governor John Penn, March 12, 1771; and deputy register for the probate of wills, 18th of the same month, by Benjamin Chew, register-general.

One word here about the Penns. John Penn (son of Richard, and grandson of William Penn, born Philadelphia, 1728, died 1795) was Governor of the Province from 1763 to 1771, and also from 1773 to the end of the proprietary government in 1776.

Richard Penn was brother of John Penn, and was Lieutenant-Governor from 1771 to 1773, during the absence of John Penn in England.

¹ Veech, Sec. Hist., p. 304.

² Ibid., Appendix No. III.

³ This embraced now Fayette County, and included what was returned from Greene County.

taken up in Westmoreland County. In the first month after the opening of the office there were three thousand two hundred applications. Although a large percentage of these applications was made by speculators, yet the most were made by those who intended to locate here and reside permanently on the land.

It is not possible for us to specify by name and at length those of the earliest settlers under this arrangement, but from the lists which we shall further on give, and from opportune references hereafter in the body of this work and in the notes, the reader shall have to get his information. It is noticeable that nearly all the men who became prominent in this region, either as representatives of the proprietary government or in public affairs under the Commonwealth, took up tracts of land at this time. St. Clair took up large bodies, both in his own name and in the different names of members of his family and of his wife's relations; so also did Hanna, the Proctors, the Lochrys, Gist, Hamilton, Thompson, James Smith, Crawford, and, indeed, nearly all of those with whose names we are familiar as the representative men of the early times, and that whether they had money to pay for them or no.

Of those people who took up land to live upon it, by far the largest proportion were emigrants, or the children of emigrants, of Scotch-Irish descent, themselves called Scotch-Irish. They claimed that they had been only denizens of Ireland, from where they emigrated, and whither they had been transplanted from Scotland, the native country of their ancestors.

These were scattered all over the country, but they were to be found more noticeably in clusters where it was to be presumed that the land would grow more rapidly in value, and where there were more facilities for making money and living by thrift rather than by labor, but not at the expense of labor. There was quite a settlement of them about Pittsburgh, at the Forks of the Ohio, along the Monongahela and the other rivers, and along the main roads. But where were they not?

The next largest class—speaking in reference to their nationality—was of German origin, the offspring of the early settlers of the Berks, Lancaster, and Cumberland region, although some were emigrants from the Palatinate or Rhine provinces, and from Würtemberg. Of these many chose the most dreary slopes of the Chestnut Ridge, and they were the farthest back from the main (Forbes') road, although there was quite a settlement in Hempfield township, and around the Harrold and Byerly locations, between Greensburg and Irwin. These people were not so aggressive as the former, and, as a rule, they laid out a life-work devoted to labor.

There were, too, among these some who were descendants of those French Huguenots who, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, were scattered over Europe, and who having lived for the space of several generations among the neighboring nations who received them, had, from intermarriage and customs, lost not only their language but the most prominent distinctions of their nationality. They had, in fact, ceased to be French, and they had forgotten their sunny vales, and their cottages embowered with vines, where on trestles the purple grapes glistened. But at this day, in Ligonier Valley especially, shall you find French names and people of French lineage as completely Americanized as the descendants of those voyagers who came over in the "Mayflower." The rest were American-English.

Before we begin the narrative of such events as are connected together in the history of our county, properly so speaking, this may be a more proper place to acquire a knowledge of those people who made up the greatest number of its inhabitants, and who have left upon it, both in its organizing state and in its more progressive state, such plain and enduring marks of their presence. By looking at the intervening space between the time when the country was left to peace after the termination of the Indian wars and the opening of the land by the subsequent treaties, and the epoch of 1773, we see, in the aggregate, what is a difficult matter to discern by even the process of tracing up the settlements and the transitions of the settlers from place to place. It is seen that the termination of the French and Indian war (1763) was followed by an extension of settlements in all directions. Where the land was secured to the English, as was all the northern territory of Canada, the only barrier was the occupancy of the Indians. This the English-Americans, as a separate nation or people, which they evidently from many reasons were, did not count on; and in this spontaneous transition nowhere did so great a movement take place as in the parallels which mark Southern Pennsylvania and Virginia, and the northern line of North Carolina. The advance rapidly seated themselves on what was then the other side of the Alleghenies; and notwithstanding that a royal proclamation forbade settlers seating themselves beyond this barrier, yet the banks of the Monongahela were occupied by emigrants from Virginia, Eastern Pennsylvania, and Maryland; and soon after away off in Tennessee and Kentucky were the Long Hunters seeking sites for future opulent towns and cities.

In summing up the nationalities of the inhabitants of the American colonies before the Revolution, as late as the year 1775, Mr. Bancroft states that fully four-fifths of the inhabitants of those thirteen original States had for their mother-tongue the English language. In the other fifth the German element predominated, and predominated to a greater degree in Pennsylvania than in any other of the colonies. Pennsylvania, indeed, from the policy of its founders, became a general receptacle of foreigners of every shade of political opinion. The position which the city of Philadelphia relatively then filled as the metropolis of America was also an allurements for many.

Of the two races of foreigners which largely constituted the growing population of Pennsylvania, the northern Irish, or Scotch-Irish, were more aggressive in their nature than were the plodding Germans. And while the Germans were confined mostly to the eastern part of the State, the Irish spread out towards the western part, and through Maryland and North-western Virginia.

Of this Scotch-Irish element—a people who, wherever they were settled to any extent, had a controlling influence in public affairs—it is stated that the immigration, though not at all regular in either its extent or duration, had reached a considerable current before the Revolution. As early as 1715 a colony of five hundred had settled in North Carolina, and in 1719 a colony from Ulster founded Londonderry, in New Hampshire, and between these two remote points the Irish, in little clusters, were to be found in many places. Between 1750 and 1754, when in strictness there was no Western Pennsylvania or Western Virginia to the English, Virginia had a large accession of these foreigners, who, it is asserted, went there in preference to Pennsylvania, because at that early day they could not succeed so well in that Province as the industrious, frugal, and plodding Dutch, as they were called, while many that were here sold their lands to others and took up locations more remote in either Virginia or Carolina. But still counting on these unaccountable spurts, Pennsylvania was the centre of the Irish immigration up to 1776. In 1729 there was a large migration in this State, and those, forced by domestic troubles in their own country along the early part of the century, coming out preferred the domestic quiet offered by the mild government of the Broadrim. But none of these movements from the northern counties of Ireland was in extent comparable with the movement of 1771 to 1773.¹ And as at this juncture the southern portion of Pennsylvania was opened to the world, a great majority of these found their way hither, and in no place within America have they left such lasting impressions of their peculiar nationality as here. They became the main body of the people. Their manners, their habits, and their morals were largely the inheritance of the people of the four western counties, and they became the centre from which new colonies were started and from which other colonies were recruited.

The Scotch-Irish took their name from being the descendants of those colonists who had, several generations before, been transplanted from Scotland into the north of Ireland. The same king who founded English colonies and the seat of English empire in America planted these Scotch in Ireland. Thus in time the race became a race neither Irish nor Scotch, nor yet a cross between the two. There is not a drop of pure Celtic blood in their veins. With a taint of English blood taken from the soldiers of Cromwell, who after the overthrow of the Commonwealth took refuge in Coleraine, they maintained their lineage unalloyed, and were Scotchmen who for five generations had not been in Scotland. But all that now affined them to Scotland was their common religion and a common tradition. Their land leases and mossy mounds in their graveyards bound them to Ireland. They were in a certain sense analogous to those Virginians who, being the descendants of English-born, retaining the speech, religion, and laws of their ancestors, became, in spite of all contrary assertions, a distinct people.

They thus in their national character evidenced the more marked characteristics of both nationalities. While they possessed the love of liberty, the hatred of tyranny, the ready wit and versatile language of the Irish people, properly speaking, they inherited as well the shrewd cunning, the careful foresight, and the strict Calvinistic morality of the Scotch Covenanters. While they differed from either they reflected the prominent traits of both. So peculiar has been their position in this respect, both at home and abroad, that they have rarely been acknowledged as the representative of either race, nor have they been regarded as the true exponent of the national aim of either. While the page of history shows to the world the great bravery, the undying patriotism, the unflinching courage, and the scrupulous morality of the race, yet it is a singular fact that the battle whose brilliant and decisive victory on Irish soil over foreign and mercenary invaders is

¹ In the emigration of 1771-73 twenty-five thousand are said to have left Ulster. They left Ireland from the high rents and from a spirit of resentment towards the landed proprietors, who at that particular time took occasion to oppress the tenantry. The first great emigration to Pennsylvania, about 1750, and this subsequent one was not on account of religious persecution there. The long leases which had been offered in more remote times to induce the Scotch-Irish to enter and occupy their lands and to colonize there having expired, the landlords took advantage of their situation as denizens and of the accumulation of property which had followed the labors of the colonists and of their descendants in order to advance the rents to such high figures as to be ruinous to many of the tenants and burdensome to all. They thence came to where land was plentiful and taxes were light. A powerful body of these came into Western Pennsylvania and first settled along the rivers and great roads, and with them came others, as we said, from Chester, Lancaster, and York Counties, and some from Cecil County, Md. Findley says ("History of the Insurrection," etc.)—and I think he means the particular region embraced within the limits of the insurrection—"that the great part of the early immigrants in this section were the sons of farmers in the eastern part of the Province." Findley says also that the settlers in certain localities of this region were "generally acquainted with each other, having emigrated together."

There was a class of felons sent from England into Virginia and Maryland, and these found their way to the out-kirts of civilization, gathered around the stations (such as Pittsburgh), and hung on the verge of the Indian trade. The Indian traders used to buy the transported Irish and other colonists as servants, to be employed in carrying up their goods among the Indians. Many of these ran away from their masters and joined the Indians. The ill behavior of these sometimes hurt the character of the English among the Indians.

It was calculated that about the year 1750 not less than from three to four hundred felons were annually sent into Maryland. These went by the general name of "Irish." The sinful part of the burden of the Whiskey Insurrection has been put upon their shoulders, but with what justice let the facts of history decide.

considered by most Irishmen as the most signal defeat Irishmen ever sustained. Neither has the patriotism of the descendants of those warriors been regarded as of any national honor. Not all the glamour and the love which attached to the name of Stuart could draw them when on a foreign soil to take sides with their hereditary king. The son of that hereditary king, remembering Derry and the Boyne, fixed his last hopes on the Highlanders of Scotland, and these with their wild battle-cries followed the Pretender down from Holyrood to Preston Pans. And this strange antipathy has extended and has followed them everywhere. The Scotch-Irish were not beloved in a broad national sense by either the thoroughbred Scot or the pure Irishman. There was as wide a barrier between an Arthur St. Clair and a William Findley as between a Duncan Ferguson and a Teague O'Regan.¹

The Scotch-Irish before leaving Ireland stood in the peculiar relation of a people who had lost all national obligation. They had no national history and no national poetry. For them Burns did not sing, nor did any wild Irish ballad, learned from the lips of an Irish mother, and full of the incense of patriotism and glory, linger in their hearts and in their ears in foreign lands. They brought with them no baby songs redolent of the shamrock and of the dewy meadows, of the banshees and the fairy lore of Erin. They lived in Ireland as the Hebrews lived in Egypt, and as the English Puritans lived in Holland. To the pure Irish the traditions of their hearthstones and the stories of their childhood are never forgotten to their dying day, and a sympathy ever yearns towards the people of their ancestral isle. The Scotch, whether on the banks of the Susquehanna or at Lucknow, are moved to tears at the pibroch and the half-barbaric chant of "Bonnie Doon." But the Scotch-Irish lost all sense and idea of nationality, and remembered Ireland only as their abiding-place, and in the stead of a national reverence and love sucked in with their mothers' milk, they with stoical firmness made an ideal of English literature and the English ideas of civil and personal freedom. Hence has arisen to a prominence what is most noticeable and is indeed admirable in their character,—independence in personal action and a predominance of practical notions of life. These principles and actions pervaded their whole being, and were the motives to all their acts.

It would be no difficult matter to prepare a panegyric or a lampoon on the characteristics of the Scotch-Irish. Both have been skillfully done. Among themselves they have always had those who cunningly and adroitly and with much show of reason have been apt and ready to laud their ancestors to the highest heaven; among their enemies

(and of these they have had full share) there have always been some to pointedly show forth their failings and to hold them up to ridicule. They have been attacked from all sides, but in these attacks they have not suffered. They were, in one word, detested by the Puritans of New England, by the Quakers, and by the Virginians. They could not fraternize with the Quakers any better than they could with the Pennsylvania "Dutch," whom they regarded with abhorrence.²

There was always, in the early settlement of the Province, a bitter feeling existing between the more peaceable of the people of Pennsylvania and the Scotch-Irish settlers. The policy of the Quakers and the Germans was a peaceable one; that of the others was aggressive. It was said with some evidence of truth that these new-comers were the means, from their treatment of the Indians, of much hostility on their part, and of the shedding of much innocent blood. The murderers of the Moravian Christian Indians at the Tuscararus, in 1782, were of the same nationality as the murderers of the Conestoga Indians at Conestoga (by the Paxtang boys) in 1763. Both of these slaughters were wantonly committed in cold blood upon defenseless and inoffensive natives, and this without regard to age or sex, and in notorious violation of all the usages of Christian and civilized people. So, too, did those do who murdered Logan's family, which led to the rising of the tribes and the border war of 1774. The wickedness and the dishonor of these things will never be forgotten, nor shall they ever cease to shame the pages of Pennsylvania's history as long as annals are written and the acts of men remembered.³

Then, on the other hand, one writer says that "the descendants of these first Irish and Scotch, in whatever district they may have cast their lot and fixed their stakes, are amongst the most prominent, virtuous, religious, active, useful, industrious, and enterprising of the country."

The popular prejudice developed against these immigrants, of which we have spoken, found popular expression. Even the deputies of the proprietaries became alarmed at the prospect of affairs touching this matter. To those in authority who had closely watched the changes making in the civil and domestic relations of certain portions of the Commonwealth it was the cause of remark and of comment. The provincial secretary, writing to the proprietaries, said it "looked as if all Ireland is to send all her inhabitants, for last week no less than six ships arrived, and every day two or three arrive also. The common fear is that they thus crowd where they are not wanted."

² Rupp, "Hist. Cumberland County."

³ Among those who along with the Quakers virulently attacked these "lawless people" for the terrible act of the murder of the Conestoga Indians was Benjamin Franklin. In a pamphlet which he wrote and had published, a dialogue therein between "Andrew Trueman" and "Thomas Zenlot" speaks of "Saunders Kent, an elder these thirty years, that gned to duty" (family worship) "just before the massacre, and while he "was saying grace to a pint of whisky a wild lad ran his gully [knife] through the wame of a heathen man." . . . This pamphlet caused Franklin's defeat for the Assembly, in which he had held a seat for fourteen years.

¹ Two caricatures in "Modern Chivalry," one a pure Irishman, the other a pure Scotchman.

In some parts of the older-settled portion of the Province, particularly in the Cumberland Valley, then in York County, the Germans and the Irish came in contact with each other, and difficulties and disturbances rose among them. These feuds had assumed such a serious aspect in 1749 that the proprietaries instructed their agents not to sell any more lands in York County to the Irish, but to offer inducements for them to settle in the north, or Kittatinny Valley. Many of these Irish left these settlements for others farther west before the Revolution, and after the Revolution many others followed.

What they wanted was land. They did not ask, as the sequel shows, who owned or claimed to own the land, whether Penn, or Dunmore, or Shingass. They never paid any regard to the claim of the Indians in the soil. If they did not at first actually keep the border in turmoil, which is hard to prove, they had the best motives and incentives for keeping it in an unsettled condition.

A characteristic of these Irish is demonstrated in their public political acts. These people cherished the teachings of civil and religious liberty more in these woods than did their brethren in Ireland, in Scotland, or in England. They were the first to take active measures in resisting the acts of the kingly viceroy of Virginia, and among the first to protest against the forced military tyranny of the British ministry. And as they were quick to speak and act against their mother-government, so when they had transferred their allegiance to the republic they did not venerate it above what they erroneously thought to be their inherent rights. For evidence, in short, to prove their overruling influence in the affairs of our part of the State up to the close of the last century one single instance is sufficient; for the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794 was attributed almost wholly to the "Irish" of Pittsburgh and the surrounding region in which that sedition arose. The Federalists of New England said they did not in the least envy such a community; and the outspoken Oliver Walcott pointed to this civil commotion to further his opposition to foreign immigration.¹

¹ The observations shaped in the text have been gathered from many sources. Of the many authorities which we have gone over, and which is not tainted with prejudice, is "The First Century of the Republic," by Hon. F. A. Walker.

CHAPTER IX.

CUSTOMS, MORALS, AND MANNERS PRIOR TO THE ERECTION OF THE COUNTY.

The German Settlers—Whence they Emigrated—In what they Differed from the Scotch-Irish—Their Manners, Habits, etc.—Their Belief in the Supernatural—The Meunonists—Peculiarities of their Religious Belief—Relation of these First Settlers to the Civil Law and Procedure in Courts—The Customs and Laws which they Formulated—Effect of their Religious Belief on their Civil Society—Peculiarity of their Morals blended with their Manners—Southern Portion of the County being rapidly filled up compared with the Northern Portion—Terms of Virginia Titles and terms of Penn's Titles—First Settlements north of the Conemangh—Early Pittsburgh—Fort Pitt abandoned—Early Efforts of the Settlers to erect a New County after opening of the Pennsylvania Land Office—Bedford County erected.

IN point of numbers, next to the Scotch-Irish were the Germans; but in no place, with the exception of their settlement in Hempfield and in Huntingdon townships, had these collected so thickly as the former. This particular settlement, however, has retained the distinctive traits of its German origin even to our own day. The Germans lived more isolated than the Scotch-Irish, and they were found scattered all over the county, where effective traces of their presence are still to be discerned. If we compare the names of those of an undoubted German origin who signed the petitions to Governor John Penn in 1774, we find that the German element in some districts, especially in the one to which we have alluded, predominated over the Irish element. And although these were always a strong body in our county, yet, owing to their detached locations and their characteristics in not meddling in public affairs to the detriment or disparagement of their private interests, the whole controlling of affairs in the first years of our history was monopolized by the Scotch-Irish and the Americans of English descent. By and by these two elements began to coalesce, and towards the end of the Revolution there were at the head of county affairs, along with Cook and Jack, Huffnagle and Truby.

The German settlers of Westmoreland were not all of them emigrants from Germany. The major part of them were descendants of settlers in the eastern portion of the Province. These were the Pennsylvania Dutch, a people formed by the admixture of the Germans and the Dutch of the Netherlands with Americans and with other foreigners. These spoke a language which differed as much from pure German as the German language differs from the English. Their characteristics were sobriety, economy, plainness, and honesty. They hastened to progress slowly. They devoted themselves chiefly to agriculture, while the Irish was the first to open taverns, erect mills, manufacture whiskey, and speculate in land. It is noticeable how passive the German settlers were during the times of the troubles arising out of the claims of the two States, of which we shall hereafter speak. This passivity may, however, be reconciled when we recall the friendly terms on which the Virginians and the Germans were from the time the Ohio Company extended the benefits of their privileges to them.

We have spoken of some of the characteristics of the Irish, but to the presence of these Germans do we owe most of those pleasing delusions which make childhood to many so regrettable. The stories of ghosts and goblins, of haunted spots, and of Kriss-Kingles are now all but dispelled,—the shrill whistle of the locomotive has scared them off; “the interesting race has emigrated,”¹—but their descendants in some remote parts yet, from generation to generation, treasure them, and the father transmits to the son the legends that held his boyhood.

The opposition to innovation which was noticed by Tacitus in their ancestors in the woods of old Germany may yet be seen in their offspring. In that age—we mean the early Westmoreland age—many houses had horseshoes nailed to the lintels of the doors to protect the inmates from the power of witches. Brimstone was burnt to keep them from the hen-coop, and the breastbone of a chicken put in a little bag and hung round the necks of the children to ward off the whooping-cough. Horse-nails were carried for good luck, and beaux hunted for four-leaved clovers to get their sweethearts to look upon them favorably. A broth made from dried fox-lungs was given to patients suffering with a consumption, and carrying the rattles of a rattlesnake which had been killed without biting itself would cure the headache and protect from sunstroke. Old women were even blamed for riding the unbroken colts at night, and more than one person incurred displeasure because his neighbor's rye was worse blasted than his own. Many years after the Indians were beyond the Ohio the belated countryman heard faintly the distant war-whoop, the sound of drums and fifes came through the stormy nights from the old block-houses, and many believed that treasure of English coin and battle implements were hidden along the scarcely discernible track made before the Revolution.

These Germans were among the first in our county to establish schools for the instruction and catechisation of the young. Some of their first teachers were from Germany, and it was owing to the instruction which these children received in their schools that the use of the German language has been so long retained as a vehicle of religious instruction, and until a time when the intrinsic utility of it in our county was questionable.

There was a sect of people who settled early in Westmoreland County, but not in such numbers as to be of influence till rather later than the time of which we are writing. This sect has ever stood peculiar to itself. It cannot be said that those who belonged to it were distinct from the Dutch as regards nationality and language, but they were distinct from the rest in the matter of their religious views. They were, strictly speaking, a religious society, amenable to the civil statutes, but governed by laws of their own. These were the Mennonists. Although the Mennonists are not identical with the Omish or the Dunkards, they are usually regarded as the same. Touching their religious views, the Mennonists are a Baptist sect, taking their name from Menno Simonis (born 1496). They reject infant baptism, refuse to take oaths, decline military service, and practice feet-washing. Their polity being congregational, they settle in communities. They originated in Holland, and some of them came into Pennsylvania in the year that Penn made his first settlement. They kept progressing towards the West, and in 1735 there were some five hundred families in Lancaster County. The Omish take their name by corruption from Jacob Amen. They describe themselves rigid Mennonists, but adhere to the decrees of the Council of Dort, which did not sit till fifty-seven years after the death of Menno. Dunkards take their name from the German name tunken, “to dip.” These hold Saturday as their Sabbath. They are all Baptist sects. They are opposed to war upon any pretext. The strongest community of the Mennonists was on Jacobs Creek, and in the southern part of the county,² while the Dunkards were in number the strongest between the Chestnut Ridge and Laurel Hill, in the southern part of Ligonier Valley. Dunkard Creek takes its name from these people. Some of the earliest of these who ventured into Western Virginia and Fayette County fell victims to the savages. Among the traditional annals preserved by descendants of the earliest settlers was one where, at a Dunkard meeting, the Indians made an onslaught. The men received the blows of the tomahawk upon their heads without resistance, praying upon their knees,—a figure, if not of such historical authenticity, yet as grand as that of the Roman senators, who, with their white beards and ivory staves, sitting in their curule chairs in the Forum, accepted death from the barbarian Gauls in the time of Camillus.

Although some Mennonists came out quite early, especially in Fayette, next the line of Westmoreland, there was no community till some time after. But as they were early settlers, and as their descendants have left most prominent marks of their thrift, their energy, their economy, and their citizenship within our county, we cannot well pass over without alluding to them here.

The remark would now be apt that these settlers at first were, in their nationalities, a mixture of mongrels. In the same sense the ancestors of the English, of the Romans, of the Greeks were mongrels.

¹ “Die alten Fabelwesen, sind nicht mehr, Das reizende Geschlecht ist ausgewandert.”

—Wallenstein.

² East Huntingdon township is at present the seat of the only community of Mennonists in the county which has a church and a pastor. The sect is on the decline. See history of East Huntingdon township, i. 3 a.

As regards their relation to the civil authority and with each other, the situation of these all was rather peculiar. As it was impossible for them to go so far east as Cumberland, where the courts were held until the establishing of Bedford, in 1771, and as they were cut off to a great extent from the effective control of the laws, they, in consequence, shaped a law to themselves, which answered, to all ordinary intents, if not so well, yet quite as effective as the civil statutes. These customs extended to embrace the very title to land, for it was not possible that the land of any settler could be laid out in such metes and bounds or protected by such fences as would not allow of infringement or trespass on the part of his neighbor. Rules were thus established unknown to the rules by which lands are holden in any other part. But chiefly did these customs embrace the system by which society is held together. They were, in truth, at this time without any law in this premises, only the law of which they were the makers. And of these customs which obtained there is nothing more apparent than that they were founded upon a strict moral and conscientious code, and were but the preservation and the perpetuation, under unfavorable circumstances, of the laws of civil society which had grown up under a long series of legal enactments and in immemorial usage. It is true that in ordinary instances of trespass the aggrieved party took the law into his own hands, and, without any refining casuistry, we incidentally allude to the fact that it was part of the lex unscripta for every man to take care of himself. In taking the law for a redress of grievances into their own hands, we are apt to look for a vivid demonstration of the law of retaliation,—“an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.” But the world well knows that the inhabitants of these northern, sterile, and chilly climates are not, in their fierce passions, to be compared with the inhabitants of the South. Their temperament did not partake of assassination, torture, and murder. Now and then a vindictive and savage nature was found, but if an act was perpetrated by such a retribution was sure. A robber, a slanderer, a villifier was couidignly and promptly punished; not, indeed, in the way he might reasonably expect, by a hidden shot, by waylaying, by a dagger-thrust in the dark, but he always found it expedient to leave the country or to hide himself from the face of other men as one attainted and shunned. There are well-attested instances where men who, in the heat of passion, having done what they should have been sorry for, left, in utter abhorrence, the very fields their labor had cleared, and never after returned. This method of ostracism was commoner than we at this day are apt to suppose. And it was natural that a course of common law and usage should obtain where there was no regular method of procedure from the want of courts. The standing of these early settlers was in this respect peculiar, as was the status of all modern colonies, and is of those colonies who leave a highly enlightened state. They nearly all had been brought up under the English law, either in the old country or under the colonial system. They therefore had not to grope their way from a state of rude civilization to a state in which law is established by the force of precedent. These men knew their inherent rights as well as any men living. Having been bred under law and order, they brought with them enough of their system to meet the wants of such a rude state. And the very want of courts, which was at first experienced, helped as much as other causes to give a high moral tone to all actions arising in their personal relation. The obligation of law, in truth, rested upon all, and this when, to a great extent, there was no law. This is a strongly marked peculiarity of the civilization brought into these wilds. In this respect the woods of America were sacred to republican institutions; there were no lordlings and no serfs. The consideration of this subject may be far carried, but it may safely be asserted that the authority of the people, as a people, was transcended and firmly grounded into custom long before the fathers of the republic ventured to proclaim to the world the establishment of a democratic form of government.

This manner of life had, in time, an effect upon the morals of the people, as the morals of the people had an effect upon their manner of life. Shut out, as many of them were for years, from connection with any visible church, they did not become less godly. A singular combination of Christian (or religious) and philosophical (or worldly) morality was the result. Touching this subject these facts are observable, that although they, as a general thing, in their religious observances conformed specially to a veneration of the Sabbath day, they did not pay much attention to the rites and ceremonies of established religion as these are usually regarded by those people who profess a strict Christianity. Their graveyards were little lots hedged in in one corner of a field or nook of the woods. Many died without the consolations of religion. Many were suffered to grow to manhood and to die in their beds without baptism. This, of course, has reference to the earliest settlers, and those who, in the more troublous time after, lived detached from the rest. For it is a matter of interest, in contemplating the advance of these people, to notice how sedulous they were to have a Christian teacher among them, and how, under many difficulties, they labored for the instruction of their children. Without entering at all on any polemical observations, and regarding them from an independent stand-point, we may say that there was never so philosophical a Christianity taught or enforced, and followed, as by these men. Locke's theory was here made practical. With their Calvinistic ideas of predestination, election, and free will, these faced death with less dismay than many whose lives had been devoted to the practice of all the Christian duties. The Cromwellian spirit was predominant; and it was not an uncommon thing to see a red-faced, sandy-haired hunter, under the influence of spirits, quote Scripture, and be ready the next minute to defend his argument with his fists, or, as we would conventionally say, "put a head upon" his neighbor. Such a one would, when later the missionary supplies came round, once or twice in the year, take up his position under a tree in the woods, and sit for three hours without moving a muscle, listening to long prayers, prosy psalms, and endless sermons. In these remarks we do not, we are sure, paint highly, but rather with a sparing hand show faintly what we believe the truth, with due regard to them, to our neighbor, and to ourselves. Such were the great majority of the early settlers of our county, such their characteristics, and such is a shadowy outline of the moral and social standing in the time immediately preceding and embracing the formation of our county.

But in 1769 and 1770 not only were the settlements of Gist, Crawford, and Stewart, south of the Youghiogheny, augmented in numbers, but the settlements along the Cheat River and about Wheeling, which had been begun before Braddock's campaign, were again renewed. A fort was erected at the present site of Wheeling, which through the subsequent troubles became a centre for that portion of the country.

The early tide of emigration, before the opening of the Pennsylvania office, was directed, as we have said, to what is now Washington, Fayette, and Greene, and to the adjacent regions southward. These emigrants all came out on the Braddock and Burd roads, and carried their goods and movables on the backs of pack-horses.

One great inducement was the nearness of Fort Redstone and Pittsburgh, but a more accountable and still stronger reason that this region was settled before our county proper was the ease and the facility with which the title to land could be acquired from Virginia. The desire for land was all-prevailing, and that colony passed no further restriction to the settlement of her new territory than was necessary to avoid the confusion of claims. The fee in land could be gotten for a mere trifle; indeed, it came to be that the mere occupancy, with insignificant improvements, was recognized as a right. And a right sanctioned by usage and recognized by that colony was the tomahawk right, which right, it is true, conferred or passed no legal title in the first instance, but was acknowledged, for the benefit of squatters, as a kind of right de facto, and came to be—so strong is custom—recognized as valid, and so decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

The Penns sold for five pounds per hundred acres; Virginia at ten shillings per hundred acres, and that without the present payment of the money. Each colony allowed a pre-emption right by improvement and cultivation and actual residence where and when there was no interference with a prior claim, official grant, or survey, and the settler could postpone the payment until he had perfected his claim. But these privileges were confined to Southwestern Pennsylvania, and while the majority of those settlers in the Forks of the Yough held under Virginia, yet on the opening of the land office in 1769 rights were granted in this triangle and along Chartiers Creek by the Penns.

Thus, under the impression that they were settling in Virginia territory, this region began to be filling up before there were many settlers north of the Forbes road or the Conemaugh. It is true that there early were some squatters in Derry township, and even, somewhat later, a few along the Indian path from Ligonier to Kittanning, as far up as Black Lick, in Indiana County. In 1769 the first settlement had been made at the forks of the Conemaugh and Black Lick, and probably near the same time Moorhead and Kelly commenced improvements near the present town of Indiana, and these are considered among the first settlements in that county.¹

The tide coming out on the Forbes road and the Braddock road still kept along the rivers. From Pittsburgh it crept along the Allegheny northward, and in no long time nearly all the lands in what is now the southern part of Armstrong County were owned. Pittsburgh was slowly improving. Some houses had been built outside the fort after the peace of 1763. At that time it comprised about a score of log cabins down next the river. In 1765 it was laid out in streets. In 1770 it is described by Washington as a town of about twenty houses. As late as 1784, Arthur Lee, giving an account of the small town at the Forks of the Ohio, states that the inhabitants were mostly Scotch and Irish; that they lived in paltry log houses; that they were as dirty as those in the north of Ireland, or even Scotland; but that there was a great deal of trade carried on, they taking in their shops money, wheat, flour, and skins. Within a few years after this part of the State was opened the English authorities concluded that the people must take care of themselves. The old Fort Pitt, which had been erected in 1759 by Gen. Stanwix, had been, up to this time, garrisoned by Royal Americans, and held under the military regulations of the British army. In October, 1772, orders were received by the commandant at Fort Pitt, Maj. Edmondson, from Gen. Gage, commander-in-chief, to abandon the fort and dispose of the material. This was done accordingly, and the post was not held by a military force thereafter until taken possession of by Connolly in 1774. Gage will be remembered as the officer who led the advance against the old Fort Duquesne under Braddock.

But no sooner were those settlers fixed securely, no sooner were they brought in contact with each other, than they felt those wants which are called the blessings of civilization, and which civilization only brings in its train. The series of counties ending with Bed-

¹ See history of Derry township, infra.

1792
 from
 READING HOWELL'S MAP
 of
 PENNSYLVANIA

Canoe Place

ford had been of slow growth, many years having elapsed between the selection of each one. It is alleged that the secret of this slowness was the wish to retain political power in the three old Quaker counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, and Chester, which aggregately had a preponderating influence in the Assembly. But, on the other hand, it would appear to have been of the policy of the proprietaries to establish a county government west of the Laurel Hill over their new purchase as soon as convenient, for the advantage of both the Province and the settlers. As early, therefore, as 1770 efforts were made to organize a new county out of the western part of Cumberland. Petitions being presented to this effect, the county of Bedford, with Bedford Town as the county-seat, was organized in 1771.

CHAPTER X.

WESTMORELAND COUNTY ORGANIZED—COURTS ESTABLISHED, ETC.

Justices for Bedford County exercise jurisdiction over the Westmoreland part of the County—Great Distance to the County-Seat—St. Clair as Penn's Agent—Petitions for a New County—Westmoreland County erected by Act of Assembly and organized—Courts authorized and Officers named—List of the County Justices in the first Commission—The first Court—County divided into Townships—The first Grand Jury—Constables and Supervisors appointed and Inn-keepers licensed—The County Offices and Officers—St. Clair the first Prothonotary, etc., and James Brison his Clerk—Huffnagle, St. Clair's Successor, secretes the Records of the County—John Proctor the first Sheriff—Officers returned—Election Districts.

IN May, 1770, Arthur St. Clair, William Crawford, Thomas Gist, and Dorsey Pentecost were among the justices of the peace appointed for that portion of Cumberland County west of Laurel Hill; but it would appear that these justices left no trace of the exercise of their official functions. When, on the 9th of March, 1771, Bedford was erected over Southwestern Pennsylvania, Mason and Dixon's line was recognized as the southern boundary, but no attempt was made to reach beyond the Monongahela. There were some resident justices appointed, the region west of the Laurel Hill was subdivided into townships, taxes were assessed, and roads were laid out. But all accounts go to show that among the disorderly and turbulent regular combinations were entered into to resist the laws, that the justices of the peace were openly contemned, and that deputy sheriffs were beaten off. Although some roads were made and some indictments preferred against offenders, the authority of the justices was too feeble, and it was too far from the seat of power to make the county jurisdiction efficacious. Bedford Town was a hundred miles from Pittsburgh.

The stream of emigration still continued unabated. At this time there was a growing desire to settle along the Ohio southward, and under the patronage of Virginia Boone and Harrod were threading the wilderness of Kentucky. Pittsburgh became a point from which supplies from the East were sent by river to the Southwest. Many emigrants stopped here, so that it now bore the aspect of a town, and was indeed the first place west of the Alleghenies where civilization and the arts sat enthroned. And besides the fact that all the inhabitants, both those about Pittsburgh and of our own county proper from beyond the Youghiogheny, were compelled to go to Bedford to transact business of law, and to have such affairs settled as fall within the purlieu of legal arbitration, there was a question in dispute which was not settled till long after, and which now impelled the Penns to have a watchful eye on the boundaries of their Province. The influx of emigrants from the Virginia side and the attitude of her Governor no doubt hastened what otherwise might have been delayed. We mean the erection of our county, for we have reached the date when, circumstances concurring, its construction was deemed a necessity. Preparatory to this many of the special friends of the Governors were especially favored, and, judging as directly as we can from presumptive evidences, we are assured they were sent out to manipulate in the interest of the proprietaries. Arthur St. Clair, who had served in the French and Indian war under Gen. Wolfe in Canada, marrying in Boston, and leaving the British service, on coming to Philadelphia got in the good favor of John Penn. He was a magistrate of Cumberland County, and when Bedford County was organized was appointed the first prothonotary to their courts. He acted likewise as mediator between the authorities and the restless tribes, and had much influence over these, they not imputing anything dishonorable to him. He was indefatigable in his services to the Governors, and kept them informed in the affairs of the western portion of the Province. So in 1772, only three years after the opening of the land office, when one would suppose the first settlers scarce had their houses warmed, petitions were in circulation all over the country west of the Laurel Hill praying for the erection of a new county, telling the wants and disadvantages they labored under, and clamoring that justice be brought to their own doors. In the beginning of 1773 the Assembly took the matter into consideration, and in due time, all arrangements having been perfected, it passed the organizing act, and the Governor proceeded to name its officers, which was his right, ex officio.

The time, therefore, had now arrived, and the act by which the county of Westmoreland was legislatively established was passed the 26th of February, 1773. The first section of the act set forth that as it was represented to be necessary by the petition of the signers, inhabitants of that part of Bedford County lying west of the Laurel Hill, a new county be established, the county was thereby created and named Westmoreland, the bounds of which began at where the most westerly boundary line of the Youghiogheny River crossed the boundary line of the Province; thence down the eastern bank of the river till it crossed Laurel Hill, which it followed northeastward till it runs into the Allegheny Mountains; and these it followed along the ridge dividing the Susquehanna from the Allegheny River to the purchase line at the head of the Susquehanna River; from the same due west to the limits of the Province; and by the same to the place of beginning.

The second section of the act enjoined on the inhabitants all the rights and privileges whatsoever enjoyed by the inhabitants of any other county, provided for the election of a representative in the Assembly, and defined the place for holding the election, which was to be at the house of Robert Hanna till a court-house should be built.

The next section declared the authority of the justices of the Supreme Court to be the same in this county as in other counties, and authorized them to deliver the jails of capital and other offenders from time to time as in other counties.

By the last section it was enacted that there should be a competent number of justices authorized by the Governor to hold courts of general Quarter Sessions of the Peace and of Jail Delivery, and courts for holding of Pleas, designated the time for holding said courts, which was to be the Tuesday before the Bedford courts in January, July, and October, and directed that the place for holding said courts should be at the house of Robert Hanna till a court-house should be built. These justices were the county justices, commissioned under the broad seal of the Province, and of these any three could hold court.

There are several sections omitted in the act as printed, but these related to the collection of taxes which had been assessed in Bedford County, the appointment of trustees for building a court-house and prison, for continuing suits previously commenced in Bedford County, and directed the sheriff of Bedford to superintend the first election.

Thus did the county of Westmoreland assume territorial integrity. It was called Westmoreland after the county of Westmoreland in England, a name which geographically described its situation. It was the eleventh of the original provincial counties, and was the last one created under the hereditary proprietors.¹

The bounds as taken in and so described embraced all the western part of the Province. That the actual boundaries were not definitely known is seen from the fact that they were afterwards extended. The authorities did not feel safe in taking in any territory west of the forks of the Ohio River, and although they knew that the Mason and Dixon line would be their southern boundary, yet the line was not yet run.

Pennsylvania thus left the occupancy of the south-southwestern region beyond the most westerly branch of the Youghiogheny to the Virginians, but claimed as far west as to the Ohio and to that affluent. And this part she embraced in Westmoreland.

On the 27th of February, 1773, the next day after the act passed, the Governor sent to the Assembly a list of the names of those he had chosen, and whom he nominated as justices of the county courts and justices of the peace. The names of those in this first commission were James Hamilton, Joseph Turner, William Logan, Richard Peters, Lynford Lardner, Benjamin Chew, Thomas Cadwalader, James Tilghman, Andrew Allen, Edward Shippen, Jr., William Crawford, Arthur St. Clair, Thomas Gist, Alexander McKee, Robert Hanna, William Lochry, George Wilson, William Thompson, Eneas McKay, Joseph Speer, Alexander McLean, James Cavett, William Bracken, James Pollock, Samuel Sloan, and Michael Rugh, Esqs.

On the 6th day of April, 1773, in the reign of our sovereign lord George the Third, by the grace of God of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, was the first court convened at Hanna's. The court was a Quarter Sessions of the Peace, and was organized before William Crawford, Esq., and his associates, justices of the same court. Here, in the low, rickety cabin, overshadowed by the grand old trees of the ancient forest, were the great principles of the English jurisprudence publicly asserted to the people in this wilderness; and this was the first place west of the mountains where justice was administered in virtue of judicial authority.

The first business of the court was to divide the county into townships. There were eleven townships, bounded and mentioned by name, covering the territory from Kittanning to the Youghiogheny, and from the Laurel Hill to the Ohio River. They were named Fairfield, Donegal, Huntingdon, Mount Pleasant, Hempfield, Pitt, Tyrone, Springhill, Mannillin, Rostraver, and Armstrong. An idea of the extent of these separately may be formed by knowing the bounds of two or three. Mount Pleasant township, for instance, ran along the Loyahanna from where it breaks through the Chestnut Ridge to the Crab-Tree Run, which it followed to the main road,—that is, the Forbes or Hannastown road; thence in a due course to Braddock's road, keeping along the Braddock's road to where it crossed Jacobs Creek; thence up Jacobs Creek to the Fairfield township line on the east of Chestnut Ridge. Hempfield began at the mouth of Crab-Tree Run, ran down the Loyahanna to the Conemaugh, and down the Kiskiminetas to its mouth; thence in a straight line to the mouth of Brush Run, and down Brush Run to Brush Creek; thence in a straight line to the mouth of the Youghiogheny, up the Youghiogheny to Jacobs Creek, which it followed to the line of Mount Pleasant. Springhill embraced all within the Youghiogheny to Redstone, and thence was bounded by a straight line to the limits of the Province, the boundary of which it followed on the west and south. Armstrong township was bounded on the south by the Conemaugh and the Loyalhanna, and extended in the wild country to the line of the county on the north, running in a straight line from Kittanning to Black Lick Creek.¹

¹ Westmoreland is pronounced by the English with a primary and secondary accent on the first and last syllables.

"Be patient, gentle Earl of Westmoreland."—King Henry VI., Part III., Act I., S. I.

¹ Minutes of the First Court held in Westmoreland County.

"AT A COURT of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace held at Robert Hanna's Esquire for the County of Westmoreland the sixth day of April in the thirteenth year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord George the third By the Grace of God of Great Britain France and Ireland, King Defender of the Faith &c And in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred & seventy three, before William Crawford Esquire and his associates Justices of the same Court.

"The Court proceeded to divide the said County into the following Townships by the Limits & descriptions hereafter following v.z.

"FAIRFIELD Beginning at the Mouth of a Run known by the Name of the roaring Run and from thence to run down the Loyal Hannan to the Chesnut Ridge, thence with the line of Armstrong Township to the Laurel Hill thence along the Line of the County to where the said Roaring Run crosses that Line, or to a point in said line due east of the head Spring of the said Run thence down the said Run to the Beginning. That part of Armstrong Township that lyes between the Laurel hill & Chesnut Ridge to be added to Fairfield township.

"DONNEGAL to begin where the line of Fairfield Township intersects the Conny line and to run along that line to where the Yonghiogheny crosses the same thence down the North side of Yonghiogheny to the top of the Chesnut Ridge thence along the top of the Chesnut Ridge to the line of Armstrong, thence up the loyal Hannan to the mouth of the big roaring Run & thence up the said Run to the beginning.

"HUNTINGTON to begin at the Mouth of Brush Run where it empty's into Brush Creek and to go along Byerlys Path to Braddocks Road thence along said Road to the line of Mount Pleasant, thence with the lines of Tyrone & Pitt to the Beginning.

"MOUNT PLEASANT Beginning where the Loyal Hannan breaks thro' the Chesnut Ridge and running down the Loyal Hannan to the Mouth of Crabtree Run and up the same to the Main Road thence with a due course to Braddock's Road thence with the south side of that Road to where it crosses Jacobs Creek thence up Jacobs Creek to the line of Fairfield.

"HEMPFIELD Beginning at the Mouth of Crabtree Run and running down the Loyal Hannan to the Junction of Conemaugh thence down the Kiskemenitis to the mouth, thence with a straight line to the head of Brush Run thence down Brush Run to Brush Creek then with a straight line to the mouth of the Yonghiogheny then up Yonghiogheny to the mouth of Jacobs Creek then up Jacobs Creek to the line of Mount Pleasant.

"PITT Beginning at the Mouth of Kiskemenitis and running down the allegeny River to its junction with the Monongahala then down the Ohio to the Western limits of the Province thence up the Western Boundary to the line of Spring hill thence with that line to the mouth of Redstone Creek thence down the Monongahala to the mouth of Yongiogeny thence with the line of Hempfield to the mouth of Brush Run thence with the line of said Township to the Beginning.

"TYRONE Beginning at the mouth of Jacobe Creek and running up that Creek to the line of Fairfield then with that line to the Yonghiogeny thence along the foot of Lawril hill to Gists thence by Birds Road to where it crosses Redstone Creek thence down that Creek to the mouth, thence with a straight line to the Beginning.

"SPRINGHILL Beginning at the Mouth of Redstone Creek and running thence a due west course to the Western Boundary of the Province thence with the Province line to the Southern Boundary of the Province then east with that line to where it crosses the Yonghiogeny then with the Yonghiogeny to Laurel hill then with the line of Tyrone to Gists and thence with that line to the beginning.

"MANALLIN Beginning at the Mouth of Browne Run thence due East to the Top of Laurel Hill And Westward . . . to the Limits of the Province.

"ROSTRAVER Beginning at the Mouth of Jacobs Creek and running down the Yonghiogeny to where it joins the Monongahala then up the Monongahala to the mouth of Redetone Creek and thence with a straight line to the beginning.

By running these lines on a map of Western Pennsylvania it will be seen that some of these townships embraced the territory of two and three of our present counties.

"ARMSTRONG Beginning where the line of the County crosses the Conemaugh then running with that river to the line of Fairfield then along that line to the Loyal Hannon then down the Loyal Hannon and the Kiskemenitis to the allegany then up the allegany to the Kittaning then with a straight line to the head waters of two lick or Blacklick Creek and thence with a straight line to the Beginning.

"GRAND INQUEST.

"1. John Carnachan Foreman; jr; 2. John Carnachan junior jr. 3. Hughley Newal jur; 4. Hugh Bays jur; 5. Samuel McKee jur; 6. Wendel Onrey jur; 7. Garret Fikes affd; 8. Samuel Waddle jur; 9. James Carnachan jur; 10 Hugh Brownlee jur; 11. William Teegarden jur; 12. Garret Thomas jur; 13. John Shields jur; 14. Ezekiel Hickman jur; 15. George McDowell jur;

"FIRST INDICTMENTS.

"The King
v
Garret Pendegrass jr.

"Forcible entry, true Bill Deft. being three times solemnly called appears not (process awarded per Curr.) process issd Al Process iss:

"The King
v
Patrick McGuching, Richard McGuching & Mark McGuching

"Forcible entry, (true Bill) Defts: being three times called appear not (Process awarded per Curr. (4 Process issd: Al Process issd.) (Mark McGuching one of the Dfts. being arraigned pleads non Cal de hoc atty Genl. Simliler & Issue.)

"(Removed by Certiorari)

"Clks fee.....	£ 2. 10. 1
Atty genl.....	0. 18. 0
Shrs.....	0. 15. 9
	4. 3. 10

"The King
v
James McQuiston, Joseph Ager, George Beard, Daniel Mickee, Michael Stockberger, John Levingstone, James Ferguson, William Ferguson, Anthony Walter, William Anderson, Casper Smidley, Nicholas Smidley, John Lydich, Daniel Pamer & Arthur Harrow.

"Forcible entry (true Bill)
"July Sessue, 1780.
"On motion of Mr. Smith By the court this Indictment is quashed

"The King
v
Nathan Frigs, John Swan, Charles Swan, Richard Swan, Henry Vanuetre, William Sheppard, John Philips, Thomas Roach, Jesse Pigman, Isaac Pritchard, Simon Moore, Thomas Hughes, Bernard Neul, Thomas Brown, Joseph Fairman, Edward Murdock, Daniel Murdock, John Rice, William Rice, William Teegarden, Aquilla Martin, George Newlan, William Cowen, and Hugh Hale.

"Forcible entry (true Bill) Defts. being three times called appear not (Process awarded per Curr.) (Process issd. Al Process issd.)

"William Forgeson	tent in	£ 50
Michael Stockberger	tent in	50
George Beard	tent in	50
James McQuiston	tent in	50
Anthony Walter	tent in	50
Casper Smidley	tent in	50
Nicholas Smidley	tent in	50
Daniel Pamer	tent in	50
Joseph Erwin	tent in	25
James Kincade	tent in	25
Abraham Leasure	tent in	20

"Conditioned for the appearance of the said William Forgeson, Michael Stockberger, George Beard, James McQuiston, Anthony Walter, Caspar Smidley, Nicholas Smidley, & Daniel Pamer at the next Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace to be held at Robert Hanna's Esquire for

At the first sessions of the court, after the justices had finished the dividing of the county into townships, they proceeded to still further improve the organization of the county and courts. A grand jury of the county of Westmoreland to answer to a certain Bill of Indictment found against them &c."

ADDITIONAL RECORDS.

"Upon the Petition of a Number of the Inhabitants of the Township of Springhill and of those on the West Side of Monongahela River, In the county of Westmoreland setting forth That we your Petitioners at as present under difficult circumstance for want of a Road leading into any publick Road where we can possibly pass with convenience We therefore Humble request that your Woships would be pleased to Grant a publick Road to begin at or near the Month of a Run known by the Name of the Fish Pott Run about two Miles below the Month of ten Mile Creek on the West side of Monongehela River (It being a convenient place for a ferry as also a good direction for a leading Road to the most western part of the Settlement) thence the nearest and best way to the Forks of Dunlaps Path and General Braddocks Road on the top of Laurel Hill The Court appoints John Moore, Thomas Scott, Henry Beason, Thomas Brownfield, James McLean & Philip Shute to view the said Road, that they or any four of them if they see cause, do lay out the same by courses & distances the nearest & best way & make report of their proceedings to the next Court. Continued untill next Sessions. October Continued. January Contd.

"UPON the Petition of Sundry Inhabitants of the Township of Springhill & Tyrone setting forth: that your Petitioners have found the road leading from Washington's Spring to Sewekly Creek, as it is now opened to be convenient for your Petitioners & others the Inhabitants of the adjacent Townships, and praying your Woships to appoint some persons to view the same & if they find it of publick use to lay out the same by courses & distances. The Court appoints Isaac Pearce, Charles Harrison, Moses Smith, John Vance, William McKee & William Massey to view the said Ground, that they or any four of them if they see cause do lay out the same by courses & distances the nearest & best way & make Report of their proceedings to the next Court.

"UPON the Petition of sundrey of the Inhabitants of the County of Westmoreland setting forth That Whereas the great Road leading from the Town of Bedford to Fort Pitt is hardly passable for the Swamps & logs across the Road, and as the said Road is not laid out by an order of Court the supervisors will not take upon them to mend the said Road. Therefore we pray your Woships to appoint Men to view the said Road from the top of Laurel Hill & to lay out the same by courses and distances the nearest & best way they shall think proper & the least injurious to the Settlements thereabouts The Court appoints Samuel Shannon, Archibald Lochry, Joseph Erwin, John Sampson, Eli Mires & Samuel Moorehead to view the said Road that they or any four of them if they see cause do lay out the same by courses & distances the nearest & best way & make report of their Proceedings to the next Court.

"CONSTABLES.

"John Smith of Fairfield fined 20s remitted John Cavenot of Donnegal do. 20s remitted George Shilling of Huntington jur: to attend John McClellan of Mount Pleasant jur: to attend John Brown of Hempfield jur: to attend Jacob Stinnett of the Town of Pittsburgh jur: to attend John Sampson of Pitt fined 20s remitted William McKee of Tyrone jur: to attend John Masterson of Springbill jur: to attend Nathaniel McCarty of Manillen jur: to attend Baltzer Shilling of Rosstraver jur: to attend Andrew Mitchell of Armstrong jur.

"OVERSEERS OF THE POOR.

"James McKay & James Friend of Manillen Joseph Caldwell & Aron Moore of Springhill John Ormsby & Jacob Bousman of Pitt George Paul & David Allen of Tyrone Daniel Hendricks & James McCurdy of Fairfield Solomon & John Shepperd of Mount Pleasant Samuel Miller & Alexander Thompson of Hempfield Alexander Mitchell & Samuel Biggart of Rosstraver William Mitchell & James Wallace of Armstrong Samuel Shannon and Edward McDowel of Donnegal James Baird & William Marshall of Huntington.

"SUPERVISORS.

"Edward Brownfield of Manellen Jonathan John of Springhill Henry Small of Pitt Valentine Crawford of Tyrone James How of Fairfield James Scott of Mount Pleasant Wendel Oury of Hempfield Eyslam was named, with John Carnahan as foreman, and a list of indictments preferred in the name of the king. A number of constables were appointed, and also supervisors for the care of the roads. The constables Barnet of Rosstraver John Pomeroy of Armstrong George Gleim of Donnegal David Vance of Huntington.

"The following persons were Recommended to sell spirituous liquors by small measure till next term

"Erasmus Bockavus, Joseph Irwin, John Barr, William Elliot, George Kelly.

"Rates for Tavern keepers of Westmoreland County

Whieky	per Gill	4d
West India Rum	per do	6d
Continent	per do	4d
Toddy	per do	1s
A bowl of West India Rum Toddy in which there shall be half a pint with loaf sugar		1s 6d
a bowl of Continent do		1s
Maderia Wine	per bottle	7s 6d
Lisbon Wine	per do	6s
Western Toland Wines	per do	5s
Grain	per quart	2½d
Hay & Stabelling	per Night	1s
Putrage	per Night or 24 hours	6d
Cyder	per Quart	1e
Strong Beer	per do	8d

"The Tavern keepers to be furnished by the Clerk of Sessions with a copy of the above regulation for which they are to pay one shilling & six pence, which Copy they are to fix up in some public part of their respective Houses open to the inspection of all persons."

The first township formed after these original ones was Derry, erected at the April sessions, 1775. It was to begin "at the Loyallanna; thence along Fairfield till it strikes Blacklick; thence along down Twolick Creek till it strikes Connemangh; thence down Connemangh till it strikes Kiskiminetas; thence up Loyallanna to the place of beginning."

At April sessions, 1776: "The court orders that the line between Fairfield and Donegal is to be the Laurel Run, the run next Ligonier, this side Langhlin's plantation, and adjoining the same.

"The court orders that that part of Fairfield township beginning at Galbraith's Run, near his house, being the same house that John Hinkston* formerly occupied to the west of Squirrel Hill, be erected into a township to be called Wheatfield, and it to be a division line between the same township and Fairfield."

At January sessions, 1781: "The Court erect that part of West County included within the following bounds in a township—That is to say, Beginning at the west side of the Monongahela River, at the mouth of Peter's Creek, thence up the said creek to the head thereof, thence with a straight line to the head of Sawmill Creek, thence up the Ohio River to the mouth of the Monongahela, thence up that river to the place of beginning, the same to be called Wharton."

January sessions, 1781:

"The Court considering the large extent of the township of Tyrone, do hereby erect that part of the said township lying south of the Yonglobgheny River into a separate township hereafter to be called Franklin." (This now in Fayette, and not the Franklin in Westmoreland.)

The following excerpts are taken from the oldest records, in addition to those before cited:

This entry at July session, 1779, will indicate in part the duties of the overseers, an office now vacated in our county,—

"William Sbow late Overseer for Hempfield gives Information of the following strays, viz.: One young mare in the possession of Robert Hanna, a bay horse years six old in the possession of John Jackson. A mare in the possession of James Blair and a Creature in the possession of Robert Taylor."

At the April sessioens of 1780 a constable was appointed for Hannastown, as there had previously been one appointed for Pittsburgh.

"At this sessions Captain Nehemiah Stokely [late of the Revolutionary army] was recommended to his excellency the President [of Penna.] for license to sell spirituous liquors by small measure at his house on Sewickley."

* This is Capt. Hinkston, who ran the Indian down and scalped him as related by Capt. Smith. See infra.

were set right to work, and some jurors who had been summoned not attending were fined. A few persons were recommended to sell spirituous liquors, among whom was Joseph Erwin, who kept an inn at Hannastown, near the ancient court-house. Rates regulating the sale of liquors and fixing the price of lodging were published. All liquors and drink were sold by measure. We learn by the rates, still preserved, that whiskey was to be charged for at four pence per gill; strong beer, eight pence per quart; cider, one shilling per quart; pasturage for twenty-four hours, six pence; hay and stabling for the night, one shilling; grain, two and one-half pence per quart. The tavern-keepers were furnished by the clerk with a copy of the regulations on the payment of one shilling six pence, and these were to be fixed in some conspicuous place, open to the inspection of all.

As drink was sold by measure, the custom of those indulging was to sit down by themselves and sip and sip. It was not a social custom to treat each other, which custom with us is, in truth, a modern American one, and even, it is said, does not yet obtain among either the Irish or German, both allowed to be, as a people, rather given to intemperance in drinking.

As to the county offices, there was at first no distinction between the functions of these. One man might hold two or more of the county offices at one time. For many years the duties of prothonotary, clerk of the Court of Quarter Sessions, of the register and recorder were exercised by a single person. St. Clair was appointed the first prothonotary and clerk of the courts which sat at Hannastown.¹ He had

In the October sessions of 1782: "Robert Jackson being brought before the Court and charged with striking the Honorable Christopher Hays, Esq., the said Robert Jackson submits to the Court and is fined in the sum of fifteen Pounds, besides costs of amercement and stand committed until complied with."

At this session, "John Ormsby Recommended to keep a Public House of Entertainment in Pittsburgh."

At the April sessions of 1783, "John Hays, Sr., of Hanna's Town, being brought before the Court and charged of keeping a disorderly House, Encouraging Drunkenness in soldiers and others, it was ordered that the said John Hays be amerced in the sum of Two Pounds for use of Commonwealth, Pay Costs, etc." Among the witnesses for commonwealth were Lieut. John Cummins and Ensign William Cooper.

1 COPY OF ST. CLAIR'S COMMISSION.

In the Common Pleas Docket, 1773.

The Honorable RICHARD PENN, Esquire, Lieutenant-Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Province of Pennsylvania, and Counties of New Castle, Kent, and Sussex on Delaware, to Arthur St Clair, of the County of Westmoreland, within the said Province, Esquire, Greeting, Reposing special Trust and Confidence in your Loyalty, Knowledge, Care, and Fidelity, know that I have ordained, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do ordain, constitute, and appoint you, the said ARTHUR ST. CLAIR, to be PROTHONOTARY or principal clerk of the County Court of Common Pleas of and for the said County of Westmoreland, Giving hereby and Granting you full Power and Authority to execute the said Office of Prothonotary or Principal Clerk of the County Court of Common Pleas of and for the County Aforesaid, In all the several Parts and Branches thereof, and the keeping of all Records, Books, and Writings whatsoever to the said Office belonging. To Hold, Exercise, and Enjoy the said office with all Fees, Profits, Perquisites, Emoluments, and Advanfilled the same offices in Bedford County from 1771 to 1773. He was the custodian of the records of the court; and these, as is said, during some of the dangerous times after, he kept at his house, which, it is alleged, became a custom with succeeding officers. Most of the records of the first courts at Hannastown were written by James Brison, who was employed as clerk by St. Clair, and he did the office-work also for Huffnagle, St. Clair's successor. When Allegheny County was formed out of Westmoreland, Brison was appointed prothonotary of the new county. There cannot be enough said of the legibility and the artistic clearness of these first records. They are yet, after the usage of a hundred years, clear and readable, while many others, extending back no farther than forty or fifty years, are sometimes almost indecipherable. A copy of St. Clair's commission and some of his autographs may be seen in the offices.

The records of the courts, dating from a brief time after their organization, while they were legibly written, were, speaking in a general way, poorly kept, in a loose method, and often by incompetent clerks. Scanty as they were, some of them have been lost, purloined, or destroyed. We look in vain for the records of the dates of the most interest next to the original ones,—the time covering the Revolution, the destruction of Hannastown, and of the removal of the courts to Greensburg. At a time during the Revolution, and at a time subsequent, these records were scattered, and were in the private possession of some of the officers, sometimes, it is true, from apprehended trouble. Huffnagle had been appointed the prothonotary when St. Clair took the field in 1776, and Huffnagle in turn going into the army as a captain, another officer under the new government was appointed in his stead. Huffnagle refused to give up the records, and had them sent out of the county. A demand was made upon him for the books and documents, which demand he thought proper to refuse. President Wharton then laid the matter before Gen. Washington, and requested the general to order Huffnagle before the Council at once to answer for what he termed his audacious insult.² Huffnagle tages from thence lawfully arising, or thereunto of Right in any wise appertaining, until my further Pleasure shall be made known therein.

Given under my Hand and the Great Seal of the said Province at Philadelphia, the twenty-seventh day of February in the thirteenth year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord, George the Third, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth: and in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-three.

RICH'D PENN.

2 PRESIDENT WHARTON TO GENERAL WASHINGTON.

PHILADELPHIA, June 25, 1777.

SIR,—Mr. Michl. Hoffnagle, now a capt. in the 8th Pennsylv. Regiment in the Continental Service, was appointed Deputy Prothonotary for the County of Westmoreland under the late government, but since the establishment of the present another has been appointed to the office of Prothonotary, and a demand made of Mr. Hoffnagle of the Books and publick Records of said County, which he has not only thought proper to refuse, but has, as the Council is informed upon Oath, secreted them in some other County. This is not only a breach of trust and must be attended with great inconveniences to the good people of the Courts, escaped by speedily returning the records, and saved his reputation by bending with the wind. But outside of this particular instance we have every assurance that the prothonotaries kept the records as private property, much as the docketts of the justices of the peace. And, by the way, so flagrant had become the abuse of retaining and secreting official papers that in 1804 (April 3d) was passed a law, by which it was declared the duty of every person appointed to an office to call upon his predecessor and demand all documents belonging to such office, which could not be retained under a severe penalty.

John Proctor, who had been sheriff of Bedford, was appointed the first sheriff of Westmoreland. Proctor for a time lived at Hannastown, but his farm and place of residence were within the present limits of Unity township. St. Clair resided at this time near Ligonier. They were both near the great military road, St. Clair being beside it. He dated all his correspondence from Ligonier. This location was convenient for sending packages and letters both east and west, for it was only by regular or special express-riders that news and documents could then be transmitted. Although not on the road Proctor had easy access to it.

Proctor was commissioned sheriff of the county Oct. 18, 1773. Previous to this time he had exercised his office by virtue of his former commission. You will notice the brotherhood in Proctor's bail bond. William Lochry and Robert Hanna were approved of as sufficient sureties, in presence of and before David Espy and Michael Huffnagle, by Arthur St. Clair, on the 3d of May, 1774.

Of John Proctor history and biography are silent, notwithstanding that he was high in favor with the provincial government, and was by nature a leader of men. The deputy proprietary chose to give him the first commission as sheriff for the county. He, with all this, took sides ardently with the cause of the people. The first regiment, or battalion, of associators was placed under his command, and he was always at the head of a body of militia. During the war he held several offices of responsibility. He was appointed one of the two persons for the county to seize the personal effects of traitors, his colleague being Thomas Galbraith. He was also a member of the Assembly. But he did not rise to prominence in the military service. It is presumed that the latter part of his life was under a cloud, for his property was taken in execution about 1791 and sold, and his family became destitute. He lived close to Archibald Lochry on the Twelve-Mile Run, a small stream which crosses the Stoystown and Greensburg turnpike, and empties into the Fourteen-Mile Run at the foot of the hill on the road from Latrobe to St. Vincent's Monastery and College. Both he and Lochry, with their brothers, took up bodies of land at the opening of the office in 1769, and both were settlers of the county before it was erected. He was in religion a Presbyterian, and entertained with hospitality the missionary fathers who came into the country, notably Dr. McMillan, who in his journal mentions the Proctors. The rude shed called Proctor's tent was the incipient church of the Unity congregation. He lies buried in the old graveyard, now part of Unity cemetery, but his grave is unknown. In the same yard lie the remains of William Findley and many of Proctor's neighbors. If he had left enough to erect a tombstone over his grave, saved out of the profusion of his liberality, the people would have been glad to raise his virtue to the skies. When the citizen-soldier on a late Decoration Day went in procession to publicly decorate the graves of the departed heroes who died for their country in all her glorious wars, they were afraid to scatter lilies over the hollow place which tradition pointed out as the resting-place of Col. Proctor lest it should turn out, which was as probable, that they were hanging garlands on the grave of a suspicious character whose neck was broken by a fall from his horse when running a race for a gallon of whiskey, and who was buried in forma pauperis.

In pursuance of previous arrangements, an election was held for county officers on the 1st of October following. We may observe that most officers were elective, the appointment of some, however, being of the franchise of the Governor, and by him or his deputies thus filled. Joseph Beeler, James Smith, and James Cavett were elected the first commissioners; and John Proctor sheriff, who was succeeded by James Carnahan; James Kinkaid and William Harrison were elected coroners; and Benjamin Davis, Charles Hichman (Hitchman), Christopher Hays, Alexander Barr, James McCleane, and Philip Rogers, assessors. The commissioners were sworn in office by St. Clair. They were to adjust the county debts, and assess and levy the county rates and levies. Among the most prominent who sat on this board was Capt. James Smith, the celebrated Indian captive, who was also returned to a seat in the Assembly, and was a representative for Westmoreland in the Convention in 1776. He lived on Jacobs Creek. William Thompson was chosen the member of Assembly at this election. At all the first elections the whole county voted at the house of Robert Hanna; and at many of these elections the poll fell short of a hundred votes.

In 1784 there were three election districts, for on the erection of Fayette County it was found that the third district of Westmoreland fell within the limits but is a most audacious Insult Offr'd to the State. I therefore request your Excell'y will be so obliging as to order the said Mr. Hoffnagle to attend this Council immediately, to give satisfaction in the premises, relying at the same time that the necessity of this application will plead an excuse for the Council in giving your Excell'y any extraordinary trouble at this very critical juncture. I have the Honor to be with great respect, of the new county, and it was so altered that the electors remaining in Westmoreland should meet at the house of William Moore, in Rostraver township. By the act regulating the general elections of the Commonwealth, passed the 13th of September, 1785, the county was divided into five districts. Those who resided on the north side of the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh were to vote at the house of Daniel Dickson; those bounded by the Laurel Hill, Conemaugh, the Chestnut Ridge, and the Fayette County line should hold their elections at the house of Samuel Jameson; those of Huntingdon and Rostraver townships at the house of William Moore, in Rostraver; the people of the Fort Pitt district were to vote at the house of Devereaux Smith, in the town of Fort Pitt; and all the freemen of the county who were not included in the above boundaries were to vote at Hannastown. But by the act of 19th of September, 1786, the inhabitants of this fifth district were to vote at Greensburg, otherwise Newton, at the court-house, Greensburg having been selected in the mean time by the committee and designated as the proper place for holding the courts.

Your Excell. most obed. Hum. Ser't,
THOS. WILKINSON, JR., President.

See also "Penn. Arch.," 2d Series, vol. iii. p. 108.

By the act of the 29th of September, 1789, Derry township was erected into a separate election district, and the freemen were to vote at the house of Moses Donald.

By an act of the 11th of January, 1803, all that part of Franklin township north of the Frankstown road was annexed to the fifth or Greensburg district, and to vote at the court-house. By act of the 4th of April, 1805, Fairfield township was made a separate district, the voting-place to be at William Ramsay's, best known as "Palmer's Fort;" and by the same act Donegal township was made a district, with the voting-place at the house of Maj. John Ambrose.

CHAPTER XI.

FIRST JAIL—EARLY PUNISHMENTS—SLAVERY IN 1781.

Erection of the Jail at Hanna's—The Pillory—The Whipping-Post—The Stocks—The First Indictment in the Quarter Sessions—James Brigland and Luke Picket whipped at the Post—Vestiges of English Judicial Process—Elizabeth Smith whipped at the Post and sentenced to Two Years at Hard Labor with an Inhuman Master for Larceny—Flexible Consciences—Slavery and Servitude in the Old Westmoreland—Bill of Sale for a Negro Woman Slave—Extent of Slavery in the County in 1781—Reference to the List of Slaves made out in Pursuance of an Act of Assembly.

As soon as the place of justice had been fixed at Hanna's a jail was begun. It was built at first of round unhewn logs, of one story in height, and of one apartment, and in near proximity were soon erected a whipping-post and a pillory. The whipping-post was a large sapling placed in the ground firmly, with a cross-piece fixed at such a height that when the convict to be punished was brought out and his wrists tied together they might be fastened at the length of his arms, above his head, to it. The pillory, an instrument known in the law as an instrument of punishment, but in reality an instrument of torture, is described as a frame-work raised from the ground and made with holes and folding-doors, through which the hands and head of the criminal were passed. By common law anybody passing a prisoner in the pillory for a felony might throw one stone at him. The pillory, therefore, as a place of punishment was a success, but as a place of amusement it is not to be commended. The stocks is an instrument to confine the legs. As there were no stocks available at all times, the lowermost rails of the nearest stake-and-rider fence were used to answer. We may conclude, rationally, that the stocks were, from time to time, demolished, and this not at the ordinary instance of the executives of the law. The miserable condition of the building and its insufficiency called for its condemnation frequently by the grand jury of the county.

In the October sessions of 1773 we have the first record of the whipping-post. James Brigland, arraigned for a felony, pleading guilty and submitting to the court, was ordered to receive ten lashes at the whipping-post the next morning between eight and ten o'clock, and, besides, to pay twenty shillings to the Governor, and make restitution of the stolen property, paying the costs of the prosecution. For another larceny he was to receive twenty lashes the next morning following. On the same day Luke Picket received twenty-one lashes on the bare back, while Patrick John Masterson came off with five fewer.¹

¹ This is the record:

"The King

v

Luke Picket

Felony, (true bill)

Defendant being arraigned pleads non Cul de hoc Att'y Genl. Simileter & issue

"And now a Jury being called came to wit, James Kincaid, William Lyon, John Armstrong, Henry Martin, William Linn, Robert Meeks, James Carnaghan, Joseph McDowell, Lewis Davison, William Davison, John Wright & Alexander Dnglass who being duly impannelled, returned, elected tried chosen sworn and upon their respective Oaths do say that Luke Picket is' Guilty of the Felony whereof he stands Indited.

"Judgment that the said Luke Picket be taken to Morrow Morning (being the 8th Instant) between the hours of eight & ten to the Public Whipping Post and there to receive 21 Lashes on his Bare Back well laid on, that he pay a fine of £32.1.0 to his Honour the Governor that he make Restitution of the Goods stolen to the Owner, pay the Costs of Prosecution and stand committed till complied with."

This is the way they went about aiding the temperance cause:

"It appearing to the Court that John Barr one of the Tavern keepers of this County keeping a disorderly House It is ordered by the Court that the said John Barr is not to sell any Spirituous Liquors for the future in the Township of Mount Pleasant & that he pay a fine of forty Shillings."—Jem. Sess., 1774.

Return of Grand Inquest, April Sess., 1775:

"Westmoreld County ss.

"We the Grand Inquest for the Body of this County Being Called upon by the Sheriff of the County To view the Gaol of this County and upon Examination we find the said Gaol is not fit nor sufficient to confine any Person in without Endangering the life of any Person so confined.

"Joseph Beelor, foreman."

The first mention of the pillory is in the January sessions of 1774. William Howard, the earliest recorded one who suffered this indignity, was, on an indictment for a felony, sentenced to receive thirty lashes on the bare back, well laid on, and afterwards to stand one hour in the common pillory. This in January weather was no doubt as great an inconvenience as prisoners now suffer at that season in the damp cells of our county jail. During these sessions of 1774 and 1775 there are many instances of convicts suffering like Oates suffered in England almost a hundred years earlier, under Jeffreys, for a species of treason. In the October sessions of 1775 one Elizabeth Smith was ordered out to receive fifteen lashes on the bare back. She had, no doubt, committed a trifling offense, for her fine was only eighteen shillings five pence and costs, which, as she pleaded guilty and submitted to the court, could not have been great. And in this case we see some of the worst features of the administration of the law in its comparatively crude state, in a rather primitive age. Elizabeth Smith was servant to James Kinkaid, and the master losing the services of this servant during the time she was awaiting trial in the jail, made application to the court at a private session held at the house of Charles Foreman four days after her legal whipping for compensation, setting forth that he had been put to great charge and expense, and that he had lost the services and labor of his servant for the time. The court, consisting of Hanna, William Lochry, Cavett, and Samuel Sloan, considering his application, ordered that the said Elizabeth Smith should serve the said Kinkaid and his assigns for the space of two years after the expiration of her indenture.

A man might wonder if it were possible that the men who drew up the Resolutions of May, 1775, at Hannastown, alone, with nature and the world, with the God of Christians and the spirit of Pantheism looking down from the sky and out from the rocks at them, were of the same men that lashed helpless women on the back, and then rubbed salt into the cuts to make them smart; that bought negroes and their unborn offspring, and that treated their galley-slaves worse than the average Southern planter treated his blacks! What is conscionable in one man is unconscionable in another. Adam Poe showed a spirit of liberal Christianity when he subscribed one pound sterling to the Rev. Smith's salary when he was first called by his congregation, but the encounter with Big Foot perhaps made him forgetful, for he never paid it. The subscription is yet open.¹ But when killing Indians was a virtue, Adam Poe, like many another whose head was anointed, and whom the arrows of the Amorites could not harm, lived virtuously, died happy, and went with the saints of all the ages to glory everlasting.

Anticipating any loss that might arise from the destruction of the official records, we have turned into print a part of them belonging to the criminal side of the administration of public justice. It will be noticed that the "king" is the public prosecutor, and all indictments on pleas of the crown ran in his name. After the Declaration of Independence indictments were drawn in the name of the "Commonwealth," "Republica," or "Respublica." They now are drawn in the name of the "Commonwealth." . . . An old gentleman from the country districts being once shown these records as curiosities, and not being familiar with the obsolete forms of the English processes, remarked that this man "king" must have been a very quarrelsome man, for he had a case in every court.

We observe that from the reputation of the two individuals, both of them being celebrated "characters" in the history of Westmoreland, the following entry has some curiosity attached:

"(October Sess., 1773.)"

"The King vs. Simon Girty."	} Misdemeanor. (True Bill.) Process awarded. Issued."
-----------------------------------	---

But prosecutions were not confined to such infamous characters as Girty, for the names of some of the ancestors of very highly respectable persons of Western Pennsylvania are to be found in the Quarter Sessions dockets of this date.

The following will show how punishment was meted out, and may help to illustrate a phase of social life with which we are practically unfamiliar:

"JULY SESSIONS, 1773.

"The King vs. John Fisher."	} Assault and battery. (True Bill.) Defendant being arraigned, pleads guilty and submits to the Court.
-----------------------------------	---

"Judgment that he pay a fine of one pound and ten shillings to his Honor the Governor, pay the costs of prosecution, and stand committed till complied with, and likewise give good behavior for his good behavior to all his majesty's leige subjects for one year and day in £100."

"JANU. SESS., 1774.

"The King vs Huen West."	} Felony. (True Bill.) Def. being arraigned, pleads guilty and submits to the Court.
--------------------------------	---

"Judgment that he be taken tomorrow morning between the hours of 8 and 10 to the Public Whipping Post, and there to receive 15 lashes on his bare back, well laid on, that he pay a fine of 20 shillings to his Honor the Governor, pay the costs of prosecution, make restitution of the goods stolen, and stand committed till complied with."

This defendant, found guilty of having stolen goods, was, on another sentence, ordered to be taken on Saturday, the 9th instant, between eight and ten o'clock in the forenoon, to the public whipping-post, receive fifteen lashes, etc., and to pay a fine of £5 to the Governor.

In the April sessions of 1782, James McGill was found guilty of felony, of which he stood indicted, and was sentenced in the following terms:

"That the said James McGill be to-morrow morning taken between the hours of 10 and 12, to the public whipping-post, and there receive — lashes on his bare back well laid on; that he thence be taken to the common pillory, and there to remain; and that he have his right ear cropt; that he be branded on the forehead; that he pay a fine of —," etc.

¹ "Old Redstone."

There is, however, no evidence that this inhuman sentence was carried into execution, for it is noted that on motion a new trial was granted.

But it was reserved for the times of the Commonwealth to have reeorded the most infamous sentence and conviction that disgraces the records of our courts:

"APRIL SESSIONS, 1783.

"Commonwealth vs. John Smith.	} Felony. John Smith, the prisoner at the Bar, being arraigned pleads guilty and submits to the court.
-------------------------------------	---

"Judgment, that the said John Smith, the prisoner at the Bar, be taken to-morrow morning, between the hours of ten and twelve in the forenoon, to the Public Whipping-Post, and there to receive thirty-nine lashes on his Bare Back, well laid on; that his Ears be cut off and nailed to the Common Pillory; that he stand one hour in the Pillory; that he make restitution of the Goods stolen; that he pay a fine of twenty pounds for the use of the commonwealth, and that he stand committed untill this sentence is complied with."

If John Smith had been one of the justices, or a relation of one of them, he probably would have gotten off quite easily, for while assaults upon the justices—and they appear to have been rather frequent—were punished with severity, any ordinary offense by an officer of the court, as appears by these same records, was condoned, and the offender pleading guilty, was usually slightly reprimanded for form's sake, and then discharged upon the payment of a nominal fine. At the April sessions, 1779, "David Sample, Esq., in his proper person comes into court and confesses himself guilty of an assault and battery on the body of Samuel Lewis," for which offense the sentence was that "the said David Sample, Esq., for his offense aforesaid, be fined a sum of twenty shillings lawful money of this State."

The following will show of what stuff these constitution-makers, law judges, law expounders was made of. At the October session of 1773, William Thompson, Esq., was held in bond in £200 "to appear at the Supreme Court to be held at Philadelphia, to answer a Bill of Indictment for Assault and Battery, etc., found against him;" and David Sample, Esq., was held in £100 to give evidence on His Majesty's behalf against William Thompson in said assault.

Anent the civil troubles of 1774, of which hereafter, we see that in July term, Common Pleas, 1775, Robert Hanna brings suit against John Connolly. Capias case; to take bail in £20,000. Defendant appeared and accepted, etc.¹

At the first courts, under the forms of their practice, witnesses were sometimes held in bond, conditioned that they should not depart the county until the next term of court, to testify on behalf of His Majesty.

As such a species of enforced labor as Elizabeth Smith had to undergo is a species of slavery, we may, in this connection, see how far human slavery did actually exist in Westmoreland. There were at first two classes of servants besides those held as slaves. The first were ordinary indentured servants, or those who worked for a term; the other class were those foreigners who, being in poverty, paid for their passage to these golden shores by indenturing themselves at a certain rate till their obligations were paid by their own labor. These were called redemptioners.² The better off sort of our early people purchased the services of these. The condition of these servants was sometimes but little better than the condition of negro slaves, for it is observable of this class, who were for the time being masters, that although in their connection with each other they had high pretensions and integrity unswerving, yet in the treatment of those beneath them they were too often tyrannical. This in part must be attributed to the age and not entirely to their disposition. The custom law, not yet repealed by statute, allowed men to beat their wives with a stick provided it were not thicker than the judge's thumb. Wife-beating, indeed, like fist-cuffing and gouging (as it was ruled in the courts of Kentucky), was part of the common law.³

Vestiges of the aristocratic feeling in the gentry, which in England was but a step from the nobility, had not yet been eradicated. While Bancroft, with the feelings of a Puritan and a New Englander, pointedly asserts that slavery did not hold with its enervating influences those brave settlers in the West who followed Clarke to the capture of Vincennes, he evidently overshot the mark. The versatile Hugh Henry Brackenridge, in a chapter on "Modern Chivalry," a rare work, after presenting in the guise of pleasantries all the arguments for and against slavery, cuts sharply into the fact that in our own county some held slaves who would not for a cow have shaved their beards on a Sunday.⁴ That human slavery did exist in our own county, but in a mitigated form and to a limited extent, the record shows.

² James Annesly, true heir of the estates of Lord Altham, in Ireland, was, when a lad, spirited away from Ireland by the connivance of his uncle and a sea-captain, brought to Philadelphia and sold as a "redemption-tioner," or "slave," as Reade calls him. His accidental discovery at the house of his master, in Lancaster County, by two of his countrymen who had been tenants on his father's estate, and who passing by happened to stop there, and then recognized him, their voluntary and successful efforts to take him back to Ireland and institute legal proceedings, the ultimate determination of which reinstated the much-wronged heir,—these are facts well known. This remarkable story, the text of which is taken from the law-books, is the ground-work of Charles Reade's novel, "The Wandering Heir." The romantic incidents in the career of this heir have also furnished the plot for "Gny Mannering," "Roderick Random," and "Florence MacCarthy," popular novels in their day.

³ Judge Poindexter; quoted in Parton's "Life of Andrew Jackson," vol. iii.

⁴ One of the most striking cases of misplaced confidence of which we have ever heard was of a prominent church elder, a Scotch-Irish justice and a militia captain, declaring in confidence to an old and very esteemed friend of ours that he was the identical person Brackenridge took to make the character of Capt. Furrage, and that the lawyer owed him a grudge from an old court action. What made the resemblance so striking to him was the fact of his having a redemptioner as near like Teague, the captain's servant, as two cherries, so that one would go for the other. The satire all through is a remarkable one, in that it is true not only to nature but to facts.

¹ At No. —, Common Pleas, George Washington was plaintiff in a suit against John Johns. I have seen the records, but cannot now recall the number and term.

The following bill of sale from Valentine Crawford to John Mintor will show how the business was usually done:

"Know all men by these presents, That I, Valentine Crawford, of the County of West Augusta, in Virginia, for and in consideration of the sum of fifty pounds, lawful money of Virginia, to me in hand paid by John Mintor, the receipt whereof I do hereby acknowledge, and myself therewith fully satisfied, have bargained and sold unto the said John Mintor a certain negro woman named Sall, which said negro woman I, the said Valentine Crawford, will forever warrant and defend to the said John Mintor, his heirs and assigns together with increase. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 12th day of April, 1776."

Then follow the signature of Crawford, the seal, and the acknowledgment.¹

The following records are inserted as bearing upon the subject of indentured servants:

From the record for July session, 1773:

"On Motion of Mr. Wilson on behalf of John Campbell setting forth that His Servant Man Michael Heany had been committed to Goal on Suspicion of Felony, and that he had been at sundry expenses about the same to the amount of £2 17s. and 1d., and likewise his loss of time, And praying the Court would adjudge the said Michael Heany to serve him a reasonable time for the same, It is adjudged by the Court that the said Michael Heany do serve his said Master John Campbell four months and a half over and above the time mentioned in his Indenture."

At the same term:

"On motion of Mr. Wilson in behalf of George Paul to the Court setting forth that Margaret Butler his servant girl has a Mulatto Bastard Child Born during her servitude and Praying the Court would adjudge her the said Margaret Butler to serve him a reasonable time for her loss of time and lying in charges. It is adjudged by the Court that the said Margaret Butler do serve her said Master George Paul one year and six months over and above the time mentioned in her Indenture."

At the same term:

"On motion of Mr. Robert Galbraith to the Court in behalf of Andrew Gutcheil, setting forth that Joseph Quillen his servant not doing his duty as a servant and praying the Court would grant him such relief as to them would seem meet, It is ordered by the Court that Joseph Quillen is to be under their custody untill the next sessions and likewise that Summons's be issued against Robert Meek, Alexander Bowling and William Bashers to be and appear at the next Sessions to give sufficient reasons to the Court why they sold the said Joseph Quillen as a servant."

At the April sessions of 1779:

"On motion of Michael Huffnagle, Esq., on behalf of George Godfrey that he had been bought as a servant by Edward Lindsey and by him sold to Edmund Price and by him sold to William Newell and that the term of his servitude is expired, and the said William Newell not attending to show cause to detain the said George Godfrey, The Court on hearing Testimony on this matter do order that the said George Godfrey be discharged from the further service of the said William Newell."

July sessions, 1788:

"Upon the petition of Samuel Sample setting forth that Jane Adamson a servant woman belonging to him the said Samuel Sample hath had a bastard child during the time of her servitude, and praying that

¹ Of record in Book "A," Recorder's Office, p. 328; following is the Jurat:

"Westmoreland County ss. Personally appeared before me the subscriber, one of the Commonwealth's Justices of the peace for said County, Charles Morgan, and made oath on the Holy Evangelical of Almighty God that he saw Valentine Crawford acknowledge the within Bill of sale to be his act and deed, and for use as within mentioned. Sworn and subscribed before me this 1 May, 1783.

"CHARLES MORGAN,

"PROVIDENCE MONTS. [L. S.]"

the Court would add such further time beyond the Term of her Indenture as may be thought a honorable compensation for the Loss and Damages which he sustained by reason of her bearing such Bastard Child. The Court having examined the said Samuel Sample upon oath respecting the premises and being satisfied of the truth thereof, Order that One Year be added to the time mentioned in the said Indenture as a compensation for the Damages and loss so sustained by the said Samuel Sample."

In 1780 slavery was abolished in Pennsylvania. Thus it is seen that in a relative degree only did the evil exist with us, but nevertheless its presence is as well authenticated, and even better, than the proceedings at Hannastown at her immortal declaration of independence. By the act which abolished slavery every one who held negroes or mulattoes as slaves was obliged to deliver to the clerk of the Court of Quarter Sessions of the county in which he resided his or her own name, and the names, number, sex, and age of all slaves holden by him.

The conflicting boundary claims of the two colonies not yet settled occasioned a special act in 1782, by which the time of taking the registry in Westmoreland and Washington Counties was extended.² The list made in pursuance of this act is yet to be seen in the office of the clerk of the courts. It contains the names of three hundred and forty-two males and three hundred and forty-nine females, and four whose sex is not stated, as slaves. Eleven are called mulattoes. The names of the slave-owners are of those who were most prominent in social standing, and of course of those reputed as the more wealthy. Among them are the names of two clergymen, and the greater portion were members of the rigid Scotch Presbyterian Church. It was confined especially to the southern portion of the county, along the rivers and about Pittsburgh. Rev. Joseph Smith, of Washington County, states that at least six of the early ministers, and almost all their elders, were slavholders.³ After the passage of the law some removed to Maryland and Virginia, choosing to carry their slaves thither rather than manumit them at the command of the law. This act, both in its phraseology and in its sentiments of benevolence and civil liberty, no less than in its remedial benefits, stands out prominently as one of the noblest, one of the grandest statutes on the rolls.⁴

² By the act passed 13 April, 1782, to redress certain grievances in Westmoreland and Washington Counties, on account of the trouble between the lines, and from the complaint that they could not get a true account of the number of slaves, owing to the fact that they had no opportunity of entering or registering their slaves, and that a number of the records and papers containing the proceedings of the county courts of Yonghiogheny, Monongahela, and Ohio were yet in the hands of the late clerks, who were not authorized to give exemplified copies of them, it was provided that all negroes and mulattoes who had been held as slaves in that territory were freed; and the registers of deeds of Westmoreland and Washington were empowered to call on the clerks of the other counties for all such papers as related to the oath of allegiance, probates of wills, granting letters of administration, and the registry of deeds or other indentures.

We have not found any records or papers bearing upon this subject matter among the archives of Westmoreland County.

³ "Centenary Memorial." See also "Old Redstone" and "Life of Rev. Maccurdy."

⁴ See Appendix "A."

CHAPTER XII.

OLD HANNASTOWN, THE COUNTY-SEAT.

Trustees appointed to locate a County-Seat—Robert Hanna's Settlement—They fix on Hanna's Town—Difference of Opinion as to the expediency of locating the County-Seat there—Description of the Old Town—Opposition to its Location by the People of Pittsburgh—Correspondence on the Subject—Reports of the Trustees—Various Acts of Assembly relative thereto—Troubles at the Place in 1774-75.

THE trustees appointed to locate and erect the public buildings were Robert Hanna, Joseph Erwin, John Cavet, Samuel Sloan, and George Wilson. Of these Robert Hanna appears, in this instance, to have been the most influential. He was a north-county Irishman who had located on the great Forbes road at the place afterwards called Hannastown. Here he had erected a log house, used by him as a residence. The place being favorable, he converted it into a public-house. He entertained travelers; and near him other emigrants settled a year or so before the organization of the county. In 1773 Hanna's was the chief place between Ligonier and Pittsburgh. In anticipation of the county-seat being fixed here, he, after his appointment as one of the trustees, rented his house to Erwin to carry on the tavern business, and these two, with Sloan, who was a neighbor, being a majority of the committee, made their report favorably to this place for the permanent location of the county buildings and the seat of justice. They represented that it was the most central, the most convenient, and the most desirable to the people. Nor did it seem unreasonable or unapparent. The minority, with St. Clair as their spokesman, reported in favor of Pittsburgh for the county-seat, and put forth the apparent probability that in no long time Pittsburgh would be a place of consequence; and, in addition, represented the fact that it was a matter of policy in the government to fix upon this place, owing to the claims of Virginia and the notoriety of the pretensions of her Governor. St. Clair states in a communication to Governor Penn that Hanna and Erwin were moved to fix upon Hannastown for the reasons we have mentioned. St. Clair himself, with the true fidelity of a public servant,—a fidelity which he never transcended for mercenary interests,—was favorable to Pittsburgh, although at that time the bulk of his property was nearer Hanna's. The report of the trustees was never fully accepted by the executives; and it is doubtful whether, even had affairs gone on smoothly, it would ever have been fixed upon as the place at which to erect the county offices after the true bounds of the Province had been satisfactorily ascertained. But, as it was, the court continued to meet regularly at Robert Hanna's house until, towards the end of the Revolution, the place was destroyed. After the burning of Hannastown other trustees were appointed, who selected Greensburg, then unnamed, and just laid out for buildings on the old Pennsylvania State road.

The reasons why the report of the first trustees was not acted upon immediately are apparent, not counting upon the superior influence of St. Clair. The proprietary government existed under its regular Governors for only three years after the erection of the county in 1773, after which, the troublous times of the Revolution intervening, those in authority did not have occasion for interference in such local affairs.

Along in 1773 and 1774 Hannastown was a collection of about a dozen cabins, built of hewed logs and roofed with clapboards, most of them of one story in height, but a few of two, claiming the name of houses. During the troubles of 1774, under the advice and supervision of St. Clair, a stockade for the protection of the people was here erected; for from such divergent points the settlements extended out, and as early as this year Hempfield township, surrounding Hanna's, was well covered with people, as appears from the petitions of this date, addressed at Hanna's. From the best accessible authority we now have, it would appear that Hannastown never at any time consisted of more than twenty to thirty such cabins. Its most prosperous era must have been from the time of the first court in 1773 to 1776. During this time the emigration to the West was comparatively large, and that through Middle Pennsylvania restricted to this one route. Here, besides the courts, were held the militia musters, the greatest inducement, next to the courts themselves, in drawing the widely scattered people together. But when the war for independence commenced, not only was emigration less regular, but many of the military characters were in arms either in the Continental armies or in the service of Congress in the Western department. Some, indeed, quitted their settlements altogether. The early settlers did not congregate in towns or cities, but the population since the close of the Revolutionary war has gone on ever since increasing in favor of the cities. There was no inducement for them to gather in towns, and every inducement for them to go into the country. Money was scarce indeed; it was hardly in circulation at all among a certain class, and was only absolutely needful to those engaged in a mercantile calling. The Province of Pennsylvania was famous for its paper currency, and too often for its consequent depreciation.

In the old Hannastown there were only one or two shops, where, besides whiskey and gin sold under license by measure, there were kept such commodities as gunpowder and lead, camphor and spice, jack-knives and dye-stuffs, but no fabrics or wares such as we see in country stores at road-crossings now; salt, flour, bacon, and linen were about all traded for. A weaver, a shoemaker, a blacksmith, or a joiner could make perhaps, on the whole, a better living than the great majority of such shop-keepers in the early times.

Tavern-keeping was the only business that brought a corresponding return in money. But as we may reasonably infer that its most prosperous time was just before the civil troubles of 1776, yet it is presumable that towards the end of the war, and immediately before the burning in 1782, it contained more buildings and probably more inhabitants than at any other time. Through fear and necessity consequent on long border commotions, they flocked together in stations, in forts, and in block-houses. These two statements will harmonize, although they appear to conflict.

In a letter dated Pittsburgh, March 3, 1773, from Æneas Mackay to Arthur St. Clair, there are some very disparaging remarks upon the selection of Hanna's as the place for holding the courts of the new county then lately erected. Mackay was a resident of Pittsburgh, and of course was personally interested in having that place the seat of justice. So also, as we said, was St. Clair. In this letter he says,—

"Everybody up this way are well satisfied there is a county granted this side of the hills, altho' I find everybody else, as well as myself, observes with infinite concern that the point in question is not attended with so favorable circumstances as we at this place had reason to expect from the nature of things. I cannot but express my surprise at the point determined in favor of the courts of law first sitting at Hanna's. Pray, may I ask you the question, where is the conveniency for transacting business on these occasions, as there is neither houses, tables, nor chairs? Certainly the people must sit at the roots of trees and stumps, and in case of rain the lawyers' books and papers must be exposed to the weather; yet to no purpose, as they cannot presume to write. Consequently, nothing can be done but that of resising [receiving?] fees, by which means everybody (the lawyers only excepted) going to or attending court must be sufferers. No doubt but Mr. Erwin [he means Joseph Erwin, a resident of the Hanna settlement, and inn-keeper there] and a few more of his party may find their interest in this glaring stretch of partiality; yet we, at this place in particular, are too much interested to look over such proceeding in silence. The whole inhabitants exclaim against the steps already taken to the injury of the county yet in its infancy, and that too before it got its eyes or tongue to speak for itself. . . . My dear friend, if I had as much to say among the great as you, I would declare it as my opinion that it would be absolutely necessary that the commissioners [he means the trustees soon to be appointed] should be nominated in Philada., by which means I think we could not fail to have the point in question carried in our favor; whereas should they be appointed up this way it is ten to one if Joe Erwine and his associates will not prevail."

Under date of Oct. 8, 1773, George Wilson, one of the trustees, in a letter to Governor Penn, says that the trustees had met twice to consult on some things relative to their trust, and that he, apprehending that it was the sense of the Governor and Assembly at the time that the courts should be held at Hanna's house until the unsettled state of the boundary would be perfectly settled, could not join with the other trustees in making their former report.¹

The following is such a characteristic letter from Saint Clair to Joseph Shippen, President of the Council, that we give it entire. It is dated Ligonier, Jan. 15, 1774:

SIR,—This will be delivered by Mr. Hanna, one of the trustees of Westmoreland County. To some manoeuvres of his, I believe, the opposition to fixing the County Town at Pittsburgh is chiefly owing, as it is his interest that it should continue where the law has fixed the courts pro tempore; he lives there, used to keep a public house there, and has now on that Expectation rented his house at an extravagant price, and Erwin, another Trustee, adjoins, and is also public-house keeper. A third trustee [Sloan] lives in the neighborhood, which always makes a majority for continuing the courts at the present place. A passage in the law for erecting the county is that Courts shall be held at the foregoing Place [the house of Hanna] till a Court House and Gaol are built; this puts it in their power to continue them as long as they please, for a little Management might prevent a Court House and Gaol being built these twenty years. I beg you will excuse inaccuracies, as I write in the greatest hurry, Mr. Hanna holding the Horse while I write. I will see you early in the Spring."²

The next report is of the 3d of October, 1774, and is as follows:

"We being appointed Trustees for the County of Westmoreland to make report for a proper place, etc., etc., having accurately examined and considered the same, do report that 'tis our opinion that Hannas Town seems to be the most central & fit to answer the purposes intended. We are further of opinion that should your Honor and the Honorable Council think the Brush Run Manor a more proper place, it cannot be of much disadvantage to the County. We pray your Honor's Sentiments on this Head, which will be thankfully acknowledged by us," etc.

Signed by Robert Hanna, Joseph Erwin, John Cavet, and Samuel Sloan.³

On the 7th of February, 1775, in the morning, before the people of the town were out of bed, a party headed by Benjamin Harrison, son-in-law of William Crawford, and one Samuel Wilson, by order of Crawford, broke open the doors of the jail with a sledge, which they got out of the blacksmith-shop near by, and let out the prisoners therein confined, three in number, telling them to clear the way. On that occasion Mr. Hanna poked his head out of the eck-loft window of his mansion-house, which, never to be forgotten, was also the temple of justice, and made the remark, "Boys, you are up early to-day to buy a rope to hang yourselves." Hanna appeared on the ground, and Sheriff John Carnahan, also there, had the riot act read to the crowd, who jeered at him and made mouths, grimaces, and very disparaging remarks, intended for the Governor's province in general, and the magistrates there present in particular. Hanna had a musket pointed at his head. On the 25th of the month Hanna and Cavet were taken into custody and confined in the guard-room at Fort Pitt, and were there detained in confinement above three months.⁴

In 1775, Pittsburgh, according to the most authentic authorities, did not contain more than twenty-five or thirty houses, so that Hannastown was about as large.

The courts continued to be held at Hannastown, or rather at the house of Robert Hanna after the town was burnt in 1782, until the January term of 1787, when the first court was held at Greensburg.

By act of 10th of April, 1781, the care and custody of the lots appurtenant to Hannastown was vested in the justices of the peace residing in and within two miles of the town, to the end that the lots should be preserved from encroachment and private use, and for the benefit of common to the inhabitants of the town or place, until the same should be appropriated, under the authority of the Legislature, for building, improvement, or other use.

² Ibid., 471.

³ Ibid., 579.

⁴ Depositions of Carnahan, Hanna, et al., in Archives, vol. iv., 604, et seq.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE BORDER TROUBLES OF 1774 BEGIN.

Virginia claims part of the Territory of Pennsylvania—Dunmore occupies Fort Pitt—The Claims of Virginia and Pennsylvania summarized—Virginia Colonists willing to fight for the Demands of Virginia—Lord Dunmore, Governor of Virginia—England's Colonial Policy—Virginia's relation to the Ministry—Charges against Dunmore—His Character—Real Causes of Dunmore's or Cressop's War of 1774—How the Indians regarded Western Virginia—John Connolly—He takes possession of Fort Pitt—Issues a Proclamation—Apprehended by St. Clair, and committed to Jail at Hannastown—He returns to Pittsburgh—Is opposed by Penn's Magistrates—He returns with Authority from Dunmore, and appears with Simon Girty and a Rabble at Hannastown—Refuses to allow the Justices to hold Court—The Justices persist, and hold Court to preserve order till the Lines are adjusted.

SUCH is an outline of the character of the people and the institutions of our county at the date when it came into existence. The stream of emigration was kept unabated, and while many passed on to seat themselves farther west, many others were stopping here. So it was not long till nearly all the land had a determinate owner, but of course it was sparsely settled even in those spots which could be called the centres of population. The settlers got along tolerably well through 1773, and were to all outward prospects in a fair way of becoming a thriving colony; but just as the vigor of this new emigration was being felt unforeseen causes intervened which made trouble and commotion all over Western Pennsylvania, which delayed that natural advancement which it was reasonable to look for, and which, after very nearly involving the people in civil war, did in truth leave them in a state of anxiety and dread and constant alarms.

We have now reached the time when one who chronicles the events of our local history must enter upon a subject not at all attractive, but which fills up a large space in our history. Those who have compiled accounts of Pittsburgh and Allegheny County have dwelt at large upon this subject, but we do not know of any Westmorelander having done the same for his own county. To have a clear conception of the actual state of Westmoreland during the Revolution we must enter more into details than we should wish to, and study it in connection with subsequent events.¹

¹ See Graham's "History of Virginia," and Campbell's "History of Virginia."

As we have had no thread to follow for the narrative as it is in the

In the beginning of 1774 the question of disputed territory, and conflicting claims which had agitated the two colonies for nearly twenty years in regard to the boundary lines of the respective colonies, was now brought forward, and culminated in open dissension. Virginia, it is recollected, claimed that the fort at the Forks of the Ohio was within their charter limits, and in some of her demands she judged, indeed, that Penn's charter government did not extend farther west than Laurel Hill. The actual possession of this point was now by occupancy, and by the bounds drawn by Penn's agent within the claim and under the jurisdiction and control of the proprietaries. Virginia was compelled, therefore, to take the aggressive.

It must be admitted that, with the imperfect knowledge of the Western territory which was then possessed, Virginia's claim to this western territory was consistently founded. Under her early Governor, Spotswood, she had been the first to surmount the Blue Ridge and lay claim to the valley of the Mississippi. Under Dinwiddie, in the person of Washington, she first asserted her claim to that unoccupied region which gave rise to the war which terminated so advantageously for the British in the acquisition of Canada; for this she battled long and courageously. She had held and maintained actual possession of the greater portion of this region south of the Ohio, and was the first to colonize the wild lands of Kentucky, —a region to which no Indian tribe asserted its right.

The claim of Pennsylvania was in her original charter, and in her subsequent purchases from the Indians. There was no question, as was afterwards admitted, that Penn's colony in its integrity embraced all the original charter limits granted to the original proprietary. The dispute was to how far the actual bounds extended. Each claimed, and each made exertion to maintain its point. The boundary of Westmoreland, the latest and most westerly of the counties, did not extend farther southwest than the most westerly branch of the Youghiogheny, nor farther west than the Ohio at Fort Pitt; and summarizing, it is seen that Governor Thomas Penn, as early as 1752, in his instructions to his deputies, advised them to assist the Governor of Virginia in erecting a fort at the point of the Ohio, but to take especial pains that nothing be done to the disparagement of his claims. The notes of the first survey, by Gist, the first settlements on the tributaries of the Ohio, and the attempt at the erection of a fort by the Ohio Company were under the assumption that this point was within the territory of Virginia; and accordingly in 1754 (Feb. 19th) Governor Dinwiddie, to encourage soldiers and three following chapters, we have compared, among others, Withers' "Chronicles," Doddridge's "Notes," Craig's "History of Pittsburgh," "History of the Backwoods," "Border Warfare," Campbell's "History of Virginia," Rupp's "History of Western Pennsylvania," besides the general histories and all excerpts that have come before us. But the old series of Pennsylvania Archives and Colonial Records is the one great source of information for those inquiring further.

settlers, granted, by proclamation, large bodies of land about the forks of the river. In March following, Governor Hamilton, on the part of the proprietaries, wrote to Governor Dinwiddie that, as he had given it his attention, he believed the point to be within Pennsylvania. In Dinwiddie's reply he stated that he was much misled by his surveyors if the point was not within the limits of Virginia. This doubt was not settled till the occupancy of the disputed point by the French and the erection of Fort Duquesne. The French and Indian war and the Indian war in Western Virginia obliged both parties to be united in a common interest. After this for a time there was a lull in the war of words, and from the time when the turbulent Kyashuta laid down the hatchet to Bouquet, in 1764, on the Muskingum, till the treaty of Stanwix, 1768, the southwestern part of Pennsylvania, below the Youghiogheny, was populated under the laws of Virginia, and mostly by settlers from Virginia and Maryland along with the Irish. The establishing of the territorial government of Westmoreland then led the Virginians at this juncture to occupy Fort Pitt and the lands on the northern banks of the Monongahela; and it must be borne in mind that these settlers were ready to fly to arms if need be rather than suffer a doubt to rest upon their title. For men are ready and willing, so strong is the feeling which attaches to one's fields and firesides, to fight for their homes, even in preference, when there is a preference, to their government. The agents of Dunmore had, therefore, willing tools to work with.

Although all unprejudiced minds will not deny that Virginia had asserted this claim and screened her own firesides and the frontier of Pennsylvania in fighting for it, yet to understand the motives which actuated Dunmore, her Governor, at this time, and to appreciate that intense hatred felt even now against him by all Americans, there are other circumstances which force themselves to our attention. The considerate and patriotic men of Virginia have disclaimed any participation by the Old Dominion in these overt and high-handed acts and pretensions, and have in their histories loaded his character with shame and infamy. And this character is justly drawn, as it was justly deserved. Some writers, in the exuberance of patriotic fervor, go so far as to say that his actions hastened to bring to a crisis the troubles between the colonies and the crown, and call them the prelude to the Revolution. Connected so intimately as they are with this great epoch, we shall, in order to understand the part Westmoreland took in that great event, have to refer back to the colonial history of Virginia.

There had been no country so successful in founding foreign colonies as England, and no country that so nurtured and protected them in their infancy. The freedom which they possessed from the time they came into being sprang from the protection of the common law; for the protecting of these, while they were in a state of nurture, was but the protecting of the mother-country herself. Under different dynasties for several generations the colonial policy of England with her American colonies was founded and exercised in eminent justice. She regarded them as her offspring, and in truth as her dependencies; and they were dutiful in their allegiance. At length this policy was changed. Instead of treating them as her near offspring, she chose to deal with them as if they were conquered provinces.

In 1765, nine years before the time of which we are now treating, it was that the British ministry, wanting to increase the revenues of the crown, exacted a tax of the colonists in the shape of a stamp duty on paper and writings, which act is known as the Stamp Act. Discontent was manifested strongly in Massachusetts and Virginia. Hitherto the Virginians had been considered the most loyal of the colonists. Now the people resisted most strongly this unconstitutional act; but the conciliating dispositions of the Governors fortunately appointed, however, kept the people pacified. Lord Botetourt, from 1768 to 1771, did all in his power to advance the colony and to protect the firesides of the people. He died in 1771, and his successor was John Murray, the kingly Governor of New York, known in history as Earl of Dunmore. And this man was a bitter Tory, preferring the interest of the king to the interest of the people. He proceeded by means the most unjust to bind the colony in an impossible allegiance. If we believe history as it describes him in his public capacity, we must conclude that he was one of the most heartless of men.

It does not, in view of the subsequent acts of Dunmore, appear to be at all improbable when it is asserted that he was appointed to the governorship of Virginia to rule them with severity, thus to make them feel their dependence, and to quiet the growing dissension then arising among the colonists in a common interest. It cannot be said exactly whether the troubles which he helped agitate in the western part of Pennsylvania were in pursuance of a fixed policy, or whether they were instigated by his cruel disposition. All, however, agree that he secretly, through his agents, gave a left-handed instigation to the Indians in the course of their warfare. It is true that when he became Governor the frontier settlers were fighting for life with famine, with the severity of long and dismal winters, and with their treacherous enemies; not in a long, open, and general war, but in a war no less destructive. And it is asserted that Dunmore found means to supply the Indians with arms to destroy his own blood, and, scarcely to be believed, furnished money to pay for the scalps of mothers and babes. He, by the means of waging such an inhuman war, wanted, so they declare, to draw the attention of the colonists from the rights of civil liberty to the protection of their very homes, their very lives. Such Virginians as take this view regard the blood shed at the battle of Point Pleasant, the great battle of Dunmore's war of 1774, as the first offering on the altar of liberty.

Dunmore was such a man who, clothed with authority, could not but use it to his own interest, and therefore use it badly. He was a supercilious aristocrat, without a redeeming patrician trait. He was hot-headed, stubborn and tyrannical, and was, on the whole, as unfit a man as could have been gotten to govern Virginia at this juncture.

These assertions when sifted closely will not, perhaps, be literally sustained. But our ancestors, those who suffered and had cause to complain, did not discriminate so closely as we do. It is, in truth, not correct to say that Dunmore instigated this war, but one thing is certain, he played it and its consequences into his own hands, and for what he thought was to the interest of the king. The Indians, both before and after, opposed the advance of the whites in every direction. There was a war of the races everywhere. Every foot of ground from the James River to the Mississippi was fought for. With all this, the loss of so many is laid at his door.

We shall not enter at large into the details of the war which opened and continued through 1774, and which is commonly known as Cressap's war, or Dunmore's war, as it does not, only in a general way, concern our local history. Happily for our infant colony, it did not do much actual harm. But we must consider it in connection with the wide-spread dismay it occasioned among the defenseless inhabitants of the border, the imminent dangers which looked them in the face, and its consequent effect in alternating the relations of the people of Western Pennsylvania with the royalists.

The encroachment of the whites into Kentucky and upon the lands of the Indians along the Ohio, and the influence of the Canadian traders were the general causes of the war. The Indians, from these facts, naturally regarded Western Virginia and Western Pennsylvania as the hive from which swarmed forth these emigrants. Redstone and Fort Pitt were the chief points at which these embarked. The first cabin in Kentucky was built by Harrod, who led out a party from the Monongahela. Both of these places had fortifications erected and garrisons kept up from the time of Pontiac's war, in 1764, to nearly this time. The Indians then watched the route which led into Kentucky, and on the little bands led out to reinforce Boone and his confederates they kept up a harassing war. And while these were the general causes, the immediate causes of this war were the instances of single murder committed, sometimes through apprehension, sometimes in cold blood; and this on both sides. There are instances in which the savages killed the whites, and instances in which the whites inhumanly murdered the Indians. These murders continuing, both parties claimed that they were in retaliation for murders committed by the opposite party.

So far of the troubles of the border in 1773 and 1774. Dunmore early made effort to hold the country round Fort Pitt as part of Virginia. To this end he sent an agent into these parts to proclaim his will. This man was John Connolly, known to the early settlers and to the Indians as Doctor John Connolly.¹ He was a relation of the Governor; was a Pennsylvanian by birth; was a notorious Tory, looking for advancement commensurate with his energy; and was a willing tool of Dunmore, as Dunmore himself was of the ministry. In January, 1774, Connolly took possession of Pittsburgh by an armed force of militia, gotten from the south of the Youghiogheny and Monongahela. He came as the accredited agent of the Governor to hold this point, and to counteract the authority of Penn's magistrates. To the colonists of Pennsylvania he represented that the militia musters which he was holding were for an advance against the Indians, then becoming troublesome; to the Indians he ¹ This John Connolly, the Bonediet Arnold of Western Pennsylvania, was respectably connected. He was half-brother of Gen. James Ewing, of York County, a distinguished officer in the Revolution; he was a nephew of Col. Crogan, the Indian agent; and his wife was a daughter of Samuel Semple, Washington's host at Pittsburgh in 1770. He enjoyed, before his defection, the utmost confidence of Washington, and of all the foremost men of Western Virginia and Western Pennsylvania. He had, after his defection, the secrets of Gage, Dunmore, Sir William Johnson, Sir Guy Carleton (later Lord Dorchester). He was on such familiar terms with all those who moved affairs in the West that he undertook to corrupt, at the breaking out of this Revolutionary war, Col. John Gibson (uncle of Chief Justice Gibson). He had corrupted McKee, Elliott, and Girty.

Of his sagacity, energy, and foresight there is abundance of testimony. He entertained great projects; one of these was to found a colony on the Cumberland River. He, with Col. John Campbell, owned the land upon which this city of Louisville, Ky., is built.

When arrested in Maryland, with two accomplices, he had most of his papers very artfully concealed in the "mattress" of his portmanteau horse. Enough were found to condemn him, and to reveal his purposes. While he was a prisoner, in 1777, Gen. Ewing became bondsman for his good behavior, and took him to his farm to regain his health; but he soon betrayed this confidence, and was recommitted to prison.

In 1781, after his release from prison, he plotted an attack on Pittsburgh and other Western posts. He was to operate from Canada with Sir John Johnson. He had a number of blank commissions to fill in for the Tories whom he should gather round him.

He renewed his efforts against Pittsburgh in 1782, and had gone so far as to have his forces collected at Lake Chatanqua, ready for descent, when a spy reported that Gen. Irvine, who then commanded at Pittsburgh, was ready.

We shall see how some of his forces descended thence, and destroyed Hannastown in July of that year.

His last appearance was in Kentucky, in 1788, in an effort to procure discontented spirits there to join with the Governor of Canada (Lord Dorchester) in the seizure of New Orleans, and the opening of the Mississippi to Western commerce. But he was driven ignominiously away.

At last he forfeited the esteem of all Americans, and his relatives and friends deserted him. But it does not appear that he ever repented of the treason to his native country, but, as has been reported, held Girty in high esteem till he died.

It is probable that not another example like his is to be found in our history, wherein so much that was promising in the career of a man failed of fruition. He had ability, sagacity, influence, opportunity; he availed himself of neither. He lived after his expatriation, and died, on the bounty of the king. His last days were made miserable by disease and intemperance.

His career may be traced through all the documentary annals of his day. For details, Sparks' "Washington," "Penn. Archives and Colonial Records." For his attempt in the Southwest, Albach's "Western Annals," 492, et seq.

represented that it was to hold this part of Virginia against the Pennsylvanians; and to the militia themselves was held out the idea that they were assembled to hold their property against seizure by this Province. Thus from the first he sowed the seeds of dissension among these people. Taking this point without resistance in January, he changed the name to Fort Dunmore, and issuing a proclamation, called the militia of Western Virginia together and asserted the claims of Virginia. At the same time he continued to spread abroad among the people the most unfavorable reports concerning the pretensions of the legitimate Governors and their unwarranted claims. These repeated assertions, put forth in a warlike manner, together with the invasion of the soil of Pennsylvania and the disturbance of the peace, were vigorously opposed by the magistrates and the body of the people.

The body of militia collected at Fort Pitt for the ostensible project of an invasion of the Indian country, but really used by Connolly in enforcing his authority, was, as all militia bodies, a set of Falstaffian ragamuffins, who, in a military capacity, were kept under control by officers, and in a rude military discipline in proportion as their inclinations were gratified. By obeying half the time they could command the other half. These rabble soldiery shot down the cattle and hogs of the peaceful inhabitants as they chose; they pressed in the horses, and, in short, took whatever property they pleased.¹

For the issuing of his proclamation and the calling of the militia together, St. Clair had Connolly arrested on a warrant, brought before him at Ligonier, and committed to jail at Hannastown. Giving bail to answer for his appearance in court, he was released from custody. On being released he went into Augusta County, Va., where at Staunton, the county-seat, he was created a justice of the peace. It was alleged that Fort Pitt was in that county, in the district of West Augusta. This was to give a show of legality to his proceedings, and to cover them with the official sanction of the authority for whom he was acting. When he returned in March it was with both civil and military authority, and his acts from thenceforth were of the most tyrannical and abusive kind.

When the court, early in April, assembled at Hanna's, Connolly, with a force of a hundred and fifty men, armed and with colors, appeared before the place. He placed armed men before the door of the court-house, and refused admittance to the provincial magistrates without his consent. Connolly had had a sheriff appointed for this region. In the meeting between himself and the justices he said that in coming he had fulfilled his promise to the sheriff, and denied the authority of the court, and that the magistrates had any authority to hold a court. He agreed so far as to let the officers act as a court in matters which might be submitted to them by the people, but only till he should receive instructions to the contrary. He wanted to be, and was, tyrannical, but was fearful of bringing the power of the Province upon himself. The magistrates were outspoken and firm. They averred that their authority rested on the legislative authority of Pennsylvania; that it had been regularly exercised; that they would continue to exercise it, and to do all in their power to preserve public tranquillity. They added the assurance that the Province would use every exertion to have the boundary line satisfactorily adjusted, and by fixing a temporary boundary would accommodate differences till one should be ascertained.

CHAPTER XIV.

CONNOLLY'S USURPATIONS, INDIAN ALARMS, ETC.

The Pennsylvania Justicee further resist Connolly's Usurpation—He sends Three of them in Irons into Virginia—They are released by Dunmore—Commissioners appointed by the Council to visit the House of Burgesses of Virginia—Evil Summer of 1774—Petitions from Early Inhabitants of Westmoreland to Governor Penn—Meeting held at Pittsburgh—The Association first formed—Devereux Smith's Letter to Dr. William Smith—Some acts of Connolly recited—Dunmore opens Office for the Sale of Land in Pennsylvania Territory—He issues a Proclamation to the People—St. Clair superintends the Military Arrangements—Forte repaired, and list of new ones erected—Rangers organized and posted at various Points—Alarm of the Inhabitants—Many Settlers cross back over the Mountains—They are urged to remain by St. Clair and Others—People of Ligonier Valley gather near the Fort in fear of the Indians crossing the Ohio—Number and Lists of the Signers of the Petitions to Governor Penn—Hempfield Dutch and Pittsburgh Irish.

AMONG the stanch and firm adherents of Penn about Fort Pitt were Devereux Smith, Alexander Mackay, Æneas Mackay, and Andrew McFarland. These Mackays were early settlers about the fort, and Æneas Mackay was named as county judge among those created at the forming of the county. At the usurpation of Connolly these men specially resisted and opposed his assumption, and stood up manfully, representing in their persons and magisterial capacity the claims of the legitimate Governors. These magistrates kept up a regular correspondence with the Governor and with each other, as indeed did all prominent citizens, and among these in vigilance and in energy none excelled St. Clair. His communications, printed in the archives of the State, are in many instances our chief source of information, and on disputed points these are allowed the preference. This opposition to Connolly was opposed by every reasonable and peaceable manner, and with long suffering. They claimed that it was tyrannical to enforce the authority of Virginia over the territory which they held, and which they had settled under the impression that it was within Penn's jurisdiction. These justices attended court at Hanna's in April, 1774. When they returned home they, with the exception of Alexander Mackay, were arrested by Connolly. They refused to give bail, and were sent under guard to Staunton. Mackay got permission to go by way of Williamsburg, the capital of the State, in order to see Dunmore. The upshot of the interview he had was that the justices were allowed to return home. But when the news of their arrest reached the Council it was determined to send two commissioners to the Burgesses of Virginia to represent to them the consequences which might ensue if such proceedings were continued. These two were James Tilghman and Andrew Allen. Their instructions were to request the government to unite with the proprietaries in a petition to the Council of the king, first, to have a definite boundary line run, and second, to use every exertion to have a temporary boundary line drawn. After a good deal of talk the hot-headed viceroy dismissed the commissioners, and the conference ended in nothing; and when its failure was known Connolly's insolence and oppression increased in accelerated proportion.

¹ Devereux Smith's Letter to Dr. William Smith.—Penn. Archives.

These things occurring in the early summer of 1774, at the very time when word was circulated that an Indian war was uprising, the inhabitants of our county were in a strait betwixt two troubles. It appeared to them that if they remained, either death from the hands of Indians, soon to be upon them, or their very substance eaten out by a set of mercenary militia was their choice; and, further, and of great moment, the title to most part of their land was now brought into question. On account of these confirmed and apprehended dangers the crops of that year were in many places unown, and what was grown was not harvested. For many miles from Pittsburgh eastward the fences were demolished, and the domestic cattle slaughtered or running at large were not reclaimed. Many at this juncture left and returned to the East, some hopeful for better times, and some with no intention of returning. The officers of the county, and many who were the most interested, used every exertion to induce the others to stay. But a panic, constantly extending, was around them on all sides. In the latter end of May and in June public meetings were held at various places, and at these meetings resolutions were adopted which were intended to show their distressful situation, and in which the Governor was petitioned to give the inhabitants assistance. The petitions presented at this time, on the immediate apprehension of an Indian war, are headed from Hannastown, from Allen's, a block-house on the Crab-Tree down towards the Loyalhanna, from Fort Shippen at Capt. John Proctor's on the Twelve-Mile Run, and from Pittsburgh.

The public meeting which met at Pittsburgh, June 14, 1774, signed a petition which differs not much from the others in the statement of their fears, but rather more plainly and forcibly dwelt upon the indignities they had suffered and the privation they were under from Connolly's shameful proceedings.

These, it is true, had suffered more than those in the eastern part. But they said, in effect, that their situation was alarming; that they were deserted by the far greater number of their neighbors; that they had no place of strength to resort to should war be upon them; that labor was at a stand; that their growing crops were destroyed by the cattle; that their flocks were dispersed, and that the minds of the people were disturbed with the fear of falling to the mercies of the barbarous savages. Thus, in distress, next to the Almighty, they looked to his Honor for relief.

The magistrates still continued to exercise their functions in opposition to Connolly. He proceeded to extremes theretofore unknown. He, by his militia, broke open the houses of many citizens, a thing tolerated only under military law. In many instances the inhabitants courageously opposed his rabble. In several instances they were brought face to face, and when defending their houses from illegal visitation and from pillage they showed a bravery which the maudlin crew dared not encounter. An association was even formed for the protection of the people. This association was composed of the most active and influential of the inhabitants, and they proposed to stand together to resist Connolly, and to make preparations for their mutual safety. They called upon the militia, and these, in small forces, were posted at different points.

While this, perhaps, is getting tedious, we would say that the aggressions of Connolly were summed up in a masterly manner by Devereux Smith, in the remarks which he made in a letter to William Smith, in June, 1774. After laying the distress of the inhabitants to the tyrannical conduct of this man in the present dread of an Indian war, he claimed that Connolly first alarmed the Indians by the action of the militia in firing upon a friendly party in the January previous, which party were encamped near Sawmill Run, on the Ohio, when the militia, returning home, some of them under the influence of whiskey, fired upon the party there encamped without provocation.

Further, that Cressap had, in vindication of his conduct in helping to murder the friendly Indians, and in beating up the whites of Virginia to arm, alleged the instigation of Connolly in a circular letter to the people on the Ohio; that he brutally assaulted and abused, after breaking open the doors by force, the persons of Mackay, Smith, and Spear; that with an armed force he surrounded the court-house (Hanna's) at Hannastown; that he transported Æneas Mackay, Smith, and MacFarland, magistrates, in irons, to Staunton jail in Virginia; that he proceeded to shoot down and impress the domestic animals without compensating the sufferers; that with an armed force he attempted to plunder the house of Devereux Smith, but was prevented by a Mr. Butler at the risk of his life; that when a man had died in the fort, and his corpse was robbed by some of his own men, he sent an armed force into the town with a general search-warrant to search every house without exception, and that in the course of the search the militia broke open and took out private property of a citizen, at the same time insulting him; that he sent a party that waylaid a horse laden with gunpowder sent out by William Spear for the use of the inhabitants of the county; and these he declares to be but a few of the many distresses under which they labored, and without speedy protection and redress they could not long support themselves under such tyranny.

It would appear then, when all the testimony is summed together, that this statement, although drawn up by one smarting under the abuse of Connolly, was not an exaggerated statement. Connolly himself, although of untiring energy and some ability, was a drunken, blasphemous wretch, who worked for hire, and the men under him were too apt to follow his leadership. These he supplied with as much whiskey as they wanted, and the only exertion to which they were put was to procure provision and forage, which they tried to get with as little trouble as possible. Dunmore now had opened several offices for the sale of lands in what is now the region embraced in Fayette, Washington, Greene, and Southern Allegheny. The warrants were granted on the payment of two shillings sixpence. The purchase-money was only ten shillings per hundred acres. This was an inducement for settlers to occupy here in preference to going to the Pennsylvania office. He also established, in the latter part of the year, three county courts in this region. Two of these were south of the Monongahela, and one north of this, at old Fort Redstone, the name of which was changed to Fort Burd. And still persisting in his pretensions, Dunmore, when he was at Fort Pitt in September, where he had stopped on his way to reinforce Col. Lewis, issued a proclamation, in which he demanded the unqualified submission of all settlers to his county governments west of Laurel Hill.

During this critical time the agents of the Penns, the magistrates, and the foremost of the people were tireless in their efforts to induce the inhabitants to remain at the homes they were just clearing out of the wilderness, and they used every exertion to infuse confidence into the public mind. The association everywhere urged upon the people to have their arms ready, and at the first call of danger to fly to each other's assistance. St. Clair was recognized as the controlling spirit in the military arrangements. He was in constant communication with the Governor, and the Governor having great confidence in his judgment, left the direction of these executive affairs in great part to him. St. Clair gave his advice and his personal supervision. Stockades and block-houses were erected at every available point where the number of people would justify, and at where it was feared the savages might enter. The stockade at Ligonier was put in repair, and one which had been begun at Hannastown was now hurried up. Kittanning was made a special point, and here it was intended that a large depot of arms and munitions, under the care of a garrison, should be kept up. For St. Clair's idea was to have a road opened from near Ligonier to that point in case the southern portion of country should be overrun, and also he maintained that it was, in a military point of view, a desirable place at which to mass a body of troops for active service on the frontier. By this time quite a number of settlements had been made along the river in what is now the southern part of Armstrong County. It is to this date we trace the erection of the many block-houses which afterwards offered shelter during the Indian depredations through the Revolution, and which were long the landmarks of their respective localities. This season was built Fort Shippen, at John Proctor's; Fort Allen, in Hempfield township between Wendell Ourry's and Christopher Trubee's (who owned the land upon which Greensburg was laid out); one at John Shields' on the Loyallhanna about six miles from Hanna's. Several were built also in the outskirts of the settlements from Ligonier by way of the Conemaugh and Kiskiminetas, and a long line in the southern part of the county, faced by the river-courses which trend towards the Monongahela and the Ohio.

We have seen how the troubles were realized about Pittsburgh. No less was the eastern portion of the county distressed. Under St. Clair a ranging-party of sixty men had been organized at Ligonier; but on every idle report the people sought the shelter of some little fort, and many hundreds, on the testimony of St. Clair, fled out of the county. St. Clair called in the rangers, who had been scattered about, and arranged them to some advantage. Twenty were posted at Turtle Creek, twenty at the Bullock Pens seven miles east of Pittsburgh, thirty at Hannastown, twenty at Proctor's, twenty at Ligonier. These were on the direct frontier towards the Allegheny, all the country between the Forbes road and the river being almost entirely abandoned. A few remained shut up in a block-house on the Conemaugh. To St. Clair it was surprising, and, as he says, shameful, that so great a body of the people should be driven from their possessions without even the appearance of an enemy, for no attempt had been made by the Indians on what was understood to be Pennsylvania. On the 11th of June a report was started that a party of Indians had been seen near Hannastown, and another party on the Braddock road. This set the people going again. St. Clair took horse and rode up to inquire into the facts. He found the reports improbable, but it was impossible to persuade the people so. He states that he is certain he met no fewer than two hundred families and two thousand cattle in twenty miles' riding.

The people of Ligonier Valley had, up to this time, made a stand, but on that day they all moved into the stockade. They all, seized with a strange infatuation, contemplated leaving the country, and so strong was the current that St. Clair says had they left he would have been forced to go with them. Had they gone then, with the scanty harvest just ready to eut, they must undoubtedly have perished by famine. As it was made evident to the settlers of Westmoreland that the projected Indian attack was directed against Virginia, the only hope of the public peace being restored was in the success of the authorities in settling the line of jurisdiction yet unsettled.

The petitions sent by the inhabitants to the Governor are still extant. The one from John Proctor's numbered seventy-eight; the one from Fort Allen, seventy-seven; one from the country at large, dated at Hannastown, one hundred and thirty-four; the one from John Shields', fifty; another from Hannastown, ninety-one.¹

¹ "The petition from Fort Shippen, at Col. (then captain) John Proctor's, on Twelve-Mile Run," was signed by the following: Lot Darling, Andrew Woolf, George Hellingbar, Samuel Sloan, William Caldwell, Robert Bonlston, William Allison, William Cortney, John Patrick, Benjamin Cochran, David Maxwell, William Hughes, Elias Pellet, James Gammel, James Forsyth, Robert Taylor, John Leslie, William Anderson, Joseph Campbell, John McKee, George Moore, William Perry, Charles Mitchell, James Wallace, John Scott, Knight Scott, Robert Stephenson, Andrew Allison, John Cox, William Michel, Joseph Man, George Henry, James Campbell, Josias Campbell, John Lant, Joseph Sapint, Isaac Parr, John Moore, Robert Beislein, John Lydick, Philip Couze, William McCall, George Smilie, Ferguson Moorhead, Richard Jarvis, David Kilgour, John Proctor, Samuel Moorhead, William Lochry, James Hamilton, Arthur Harvey, Patrick Archbald, William Mount, John Davis, John Harry, John Pagan, Robert Marshall, John Campbell, Henry Zane, Robert Caldwell, George Leasure, James Stevenson, Thomas Stevenson, Robert Cochran, John Taylor, William Sloan, William Martin, Andrew Mitchell, David Sloan, James Fulton, Francis McGinnis, James Carnahan, William Thompson, Allen Sloan, Moses Dickie, Nathaniel Bryan.

The one from Fort Allen, in Hempfield township, between Wendell Ourry's and Christopher Truby's, was signed by the following:

Wendell Ourry, Christopher Trubee, Frantz Rapp, Nicholas Sberer, John Lafferty, John Bendeary, Conrad Honeck, James Waterms, John Redeck, Adam George, Nicholas Allimaug, Adam Uhrig, Stofel Urich, John Golden, Peter U ich, Martin Hantz, Michael Konel, Heinrich Kleyn, Conrad Hister, Hans Guckee, Peter Kasner, Peter Uber, John Krauser, Heinrich Schmit, Jacob Kuenel, John Mofey, Adam Brcken, Peter Nannemacher, Philip Klingelschmit, Peter Klingelschmit, Peter Altman, Andoni Altman, Joseph Pankkek, Brent Reis, Baltzer Moyer, Jacob Hanser, Peter Altman, Christian Baum, George Crier, Peter Rosh, Joseph Kutz, Adam Meire, Daniel Wiler, Thomas Williams, Michael Hatz, George Mendarf, William Hauson, William Altman, Marx Breinig, Johannes Breinig, Samuel Lewisch, Andony Walter, Jacob Welcker, George Bender, Nicholas Junnt, Michael Hams, David Marshall, Heinrich Sil, Richard Archbold, Conrad Lunck, Frederick Marschal, Hannes Breynig, Hasper Mickendorf, Jacob Schraber, Daniel Matie, Heinrich Schram, Peter Schelhammer, Jacob Maylin, Dewalt Macklin, Hannes Kostwitz, Jacob Shram, Lutwig Alterman, Hans Sill, Jacob Stroh, Christopher Herolt, Gerhart Tames.

Of these names only twenty-five were written in English, the rest in German; and, perhaps with the exception of Lafferty and Archbold, they were all of German lineage. The names are still preserved in Hempfield, North Huntingdon, and Penn townships, but the spelling has undergone a change, and "Kleyn" is now "Kline," and "Mucklin" is "Meckling."

A similar petition from the county, evidently signed at Hannastown, had the following signatures:

Robert Hanna, Alexander Thompson, William Jack, Joseph Kinkead, Manuel Gall-her, William Shaw, William Jenkins, William Dawson, J. Donne, Joshua Archer, John Gothery, Joseph McGarrangh, William

It is to be noticed that some of the names are repeated in at least two of the petitions, and it has been suspected that a few of the names are not genuine; that is, there was no one in proper person to stand for the signature. What is likewise observable is that the names repeated are those of a German original. Maybe more of them might write their names than their brethren the Irish; and it might be that the signatures were signed in good faith at different times by the petitioners, with the hope of moving the authorities by the unanimous array of names. But feeling a sympathy with them at this late day in their trying times, we cannot help professing astonishment at the peculiar ubiquity of our sturdy Dutch ancestors, which allowed them to be, in time of danger, at different places at the same time. We might be led to infer that they indulged in the pleasing delusion that, being "now here, now there, now everywhere" (like the ghost in Hamlet), they might, like Paddy at Trenton, surround the Indians.

McCutchin, James McCutchin, Jeremiah Lochrey, Joseph Brownlee, Robert Taylor, John Ould, William Riddle, Hugh Brownlee, James Leech, David Crutchlow, James Crutchlow, Peter Castner, David Crutchlow, Jr., John Cristy, Joseph Shaw, David Shaw, William Nelson, John Gunthry, James Dnulp, Robert Riddle, John Riddle, William Gunthry, Charles Wilson, Joseph Studybaker, William Darrangh, James Darrangh, William Thompson, David Dickie, John Thompson, John Glass, John Holmes, Charles Foreman, Samuel Miller, John Shields, Thomas Patton, John Taylor, Samuel Parr, James Case, Adam Maxwell, William Maxwell, William Barnes, James Moore, John Moore, Thomas Burbridge, Martin Cavanagh, Arthur Denworthy, David Larrimore, Thomas Freeman, William Freeman, James Blain, Alexander McClean, John Moore, John Nolder, William Moore, William Hamilton, Thomas Ellis, Mark Ellis, John Ellis, John Adam, Andrew McClain, Robert Bell, William Bell, William Bell, Samuel Craig, John Craig, Alexander Craig, John Cochran, James Wills, Henry McBride, Isaac McBride, James Bently, Jacob Round, Barnabas Brant, William Brant, Edward Brant, Samuel Whiteside, Samuel Leetch, Matthew Miller, Alexander Mers, George Kean, Charles McGinnis, William Kindsey, Thomas Jack, John McAllister, Alexander Thomas, Samuel Couper, John Gourla, Samuel Gourla, James Beatty, Samuel Henderson, John Bryson, Robert Crawford, Alexander Sim-erall, James McClelland, James White, Thomas Dennis, John Shrimpley, Richard Jones, William Moore, Adam Ourry, John Cunningham, John Muckmalon, Peter Stot, William McCord, Andrew Gordin, John Muppin, John Christy, Patrick Colgan, P. Russell, James Neilson, Abraham Pyatt, B. McGeehan, Joseph Thorn, Robert Frier, William Powel, William Carr, Joseph Erwin, John Brownlee, Thomas Lyon.

A petition from John Shields, on the Loyallhanna, about six miles from Greensburg, of the same date, 1774, has the following names:

John Shields, John Nolder, John McIntire, David Henen, Henry Heathly, Manual Gallahan, Isaac Parr, James Parr, Samuel Parr, Arthur Denniston, Archibald Trimble, John Denniston, Lorraine Irwin, John Moore, Isaac Youngsee, Daniel McManane, Patrick Bntler, Daniel McBride, James Blain, John Thompson, James Wills, Andrew Wills, Robert Bell, William Bell, Alexander McClain, Charles McClain, Thomas Burbridge, Andrew McClain, William Brant, Samuel Craig, John Craig, Alexander Brag, James Burns, John Cochran, David Shields, Thomas Freeman, Barnabas Brant, Edward Brant, James Bently, Jacob Round, John Moore, William Barnes, William Cooper, William Hamilton, James Hiall, David Loramer, John Loramer, Alexander Barr.

Another, dated Hannastown, but evidently signed by residents south of that place, contains, among others, Joseph McGaunagh, William Brown, William McGlaughen, Samuel McKee, John McDowell, David McKee, Robert McKee, James Paul, William Sampson, John Brown, Adam Morrow, John Giffen, Isaac Keeth, Dennis McConnel, George Nelson, James King, John Canan, William Shaw, Archibald Leach, James Boveard, Robert Haslet, Joseph Shuw, James Westley, John Calhoun, John Lent, Stephen Groves, John Adams, John Hnys, Charles Sterret, Robert Hays, and John Gothery, Jr.

CHAPTER XV.

DUNMORE'S WAR.

Dunmore's War begun by the Murder of some Friendly Indians, especially Logan's Family—Virginian Army organized—Dunmore at Pittsburgh with Connolly—Great Gathering and Organization of the Indian Tribes—The Campaign of 1774—The Hopes of our People in Col. Lewis—Dunmore and Connolly want to see the Army defeated and the Indians on the Frontiers—Lewis gains the Battle of Point Pleasant—Dunmore's Treaty—Indictment: The People vs. Dunmore—Dunmore through Connolly still tyrannizes over the Pennsylvania Settlers, many of whom talk of leaving their Clearings—Condition of the People in 1775—Leaders in Westmoreland in 1775—The Military Spirit.

It is now time to return to the war itself, which, we have seen, was gathering upon the frontiers in the early part of 1774. Although, as we have said, Dunmore's war was not carried into our county, yet so intimately are our affairs connected with it that to have an understanding of them at all clear a rehearsal of it cannot be omitted. We shall, in as few words as consistent, briefly relate the whole campaign. We know, first, the apprehensions of the settlers in the Southwest. In the latter end of April a party of land adventurers, fleeing from the dangers which threatened them, came in contact with some Indians at the mouth of Captina Creek, sixteen miles below Wheeling. At about the same time happened the affair at Yellow Creek, midway between Pittsburgh and Wheeling. At this time there was a large party of friendly Indians encamped at Yellow Creek. The surrounding inhabitants prepared to flee. A party of these meeting together at the house of one Joshua Baker fired upon some Indians collected there. Among those who were killed were the brother and daughter of Logan. This it was that drove this great warrior to take the war to himself. Hearing the coming storm, such settlers as could go fled to places of safety, and all the block-houses between the Ohio and the Laurel Hill were filled. When this news reached the East the colonial government of Virginia speedily organized a command for the defense of the frontier. An advance force penetrated into Ohio, but as they could not be supplied with necessary provisions they had to retire. The Indians followed, and the time following was a miserable one to the helpless. Logan's actions were imitated by the rest. This renowned Indian did not go with the larger bodies of Indians, but he headed a party of eight Cayuga warriors, and these had mercy on nothing before them. He himself said afterwards that he had fully glutted his vengeance. What the frontiers of Virginia suffered never was and never will be told. Those even in the forts were in a confinement compared to which the confinement of a prison would be liberty. But during this time preparations were going on for the organization and forwarding of the expedition intended for their relief by the House of Burgesses.

The Virginia army raised for the war of 1774 was divided into two divisions. In September the first division, under Col. Lewis, consisting of eleven hundred, marched from the mouth of the Little Kanawha. After a march of nineteen days through the wilds they erected their camp on the Ohio where the Big Kanawha empties. This place was called Point Pleasant. Here the other division of the army under the immediate command of Dunmore himself was to form a junction with the former. For reasons best known to Dunmore and his advisers it failed to do so. While Col. Lewis was awaiting word from the East, he received different news than he had expected. Lewis had reached this point about the 1st of October, and on the 9th he got word that Dunmore, instead of advancing to unite their armies, intended to proceed across the country directly to the Shawanese town, for Dunmore had on organizing his forces proceeded to Fort Pitt. He here consulted with Connolly, and had in his service such men as Simon Girty and Alexander McKee, recognized afterwards as notorious Tories, and while here at this time it was that he further attended to the organization of his civil affairs in these parts, as has been noticed before.

The Indians in the mean time had not been idle. They had organized a large and terrible army, comprised of many nations gathered under one chieftain. These were the flower of the Indian tribes along the Ohio,—the Shawanese, Mingoes, Delawares, Wyandotts, and Cayugas. In number they perhaps exceeded the Virginians. They were all under the command of Cornstalk, a chief of the Shawanese, and king of the Northern Confederacy. He had hesitated long in taking arms against the whites. He was an eloquent man, of great foresight and judgment, and as a warrior is acknowledged on all sides to have been the most consummate Indian commander ever in arms against the whites. The plan of this battle was such as to reflect the highest credit on any general who had made an assiduous study of the science of war. And his arrangements were executed under his eyes with the utmost vigilance and bravery. He had brought his warriors with such secrecy and dispatch as to occupy a large half-circle across the opening where the two rivers flowed to meet each other. He then, under cover of the darkness, stretched his line of red-skinned warriors across the base of this triangle, in which triangle was the army of Virginians. Thus far without the knowledge of the whites, the savages did not count on anything but decisive victory, for their leader did not give his enemy a chance to escape, only by winning the battle. He intended to drive them into the decreasing point, and either to annihilate them before they could cross the rivers, or to cut them to pieces in the retreat. As for his own men, so much did he count on their bravery that he threatened to kill with his own hand any who should attempt to run back, unless he ordered them to do so, feigning themselves defeated. This was his plan, but he had not, in truth, fully secured his position,—not enough to begin the battle,—till the Virginians were warned; for when intelligence had been received by Lewis that Dunmore did not intend to advance to his support, he hastened to break up his camp, and, in pursuance of Dunmore's orders, to march to meet him in the Indians' own country. The next morning, the 10th of October, 1774, he commenced preparations to transfer his army to the opposite side of the Ohio. Scouts were early sent out along the bank of the river. Two of these, at the distance of a few miles, were surprised by a great body of Indians. One was shot dead, and the other returning reported that the savages covered acres of ground. The army was immediately ordered out, and no sooner were they formed into line of battle than they received the shock of the onpouring savages. Some of the most prominent of the subordinate officers falling early in the battle, the main body fell back towards the camp. The line of the enemy now extended almost from river to river, a gap of a small space remaining on the side next the Kanawha. But when it appeared that the Indians were the victors, a bold movement fortunately executed by the whites saved them and changed the fortune of the day. While the Indians were advancing they protected themselves by piles of logs and brush, in some places rolled before them. They held the ground thus secured all day till evening. But Col. Lewis had latterly sent out three companies under cover of the high banks of the Kanawha to fall upon the rear of the enemy. These succeeded in so doing. The Indians, intently engaged on the front, received with tremendous effect the fire behind. Thinking that the reinforcements from the settlements, which they knew to be coming, had now arrived, the Indian lines gave away. As the sun went down they retreated across the Ohio to their huts on the Scioto. The Virginians suffered a loss in dead and wounded amounting to almost one-fifth of their whole number, and it was believed the loss of Indians was in number not much less. The battle was the turning of the war, and in its results effective, for no other battle was fought till Dunmore treated with the chiefs at that memorable council where Logan, by his Patroclus (Jefferson), so eloquently spoke in his own defense.

Dearlly hought as was the victory, yet the complaints were loud that Dunmore made it of no avail; for all that he gained by the conquest, which he claimed falsely as his own, were the closing of the war, an exchange of prisoners, and many liberal promises worth no more than the promises of an Indian. There was the usual amount of talk about hurrying hatchets, brightening chains, smoking pipes, setting suns, dear brethren, "sweet voices;" but the frontier people, who knew whereof they spoke, said that he ought to have destroyed the Indian towns on the rivers, and pushed the tribes back into the far West, which he had in his power.

Those who say that Dunmore was at this early day bidding for the assistance of the Indians as against the colonists, and instigating war for mercenary and unjust purposes, produce these facts, from which they adduce their reasons: While at Fort Pitt he associated with himself such men as Connolly the Tory, Girty the renegade, McKee the deserter; he failed to make the junction with Lewis, which was part of the plan agreed upon; he had knowledge of the intended attack upon Lewis, but neither sent him word nor made an effort to assist him; he drew all the honor of the subsequent treaty of peace between him and the confederate chiefs to himself, although it was apparent that it was owing to the victory of Col. Lewis that they were compelled to accept terms, and not to any act of Dunmore; that the war being but half finished, it did not gain anything, whereas the desire of the fighting men was to destroy the Indian villages, and to leave them not a harboring-place in Eastern Ohio; from the subsequent defection of his chief and most intimate associates, as well as of himself, and the alliance of the Indian tribes with Britain in the war which he helped to effect with the colonies; from the action of Connolly in the year following, 1775; from the known attitude of the colonies and of England, one towards the other; for many instances cited in which Connolly tried to make the Indians believe that the Pennsylvania colonists were their enemies, and in which he oppositely encouraged the whites and the Indians, regardless of consequences, to be in covert war against each other.

It was late in the fall before those settlers who remained in Westmoreland knew they were saved from an Indian war. But their situation was truly pitiable. No sooner had Connolly returned than he continued his tyrannical acts with the magistrates and the people. So unhearable had he become that some of the adherents of Penn about Pittsburgh thought of leaving that place and settling at Kittanning. In November a number of armed men, under Connolly's orders, seized a Mr. Scott, acting under authority of Penn, and carried him to Brownsville, where he was required to enter bail for his appearance at the next court to be holden at Pittsburgh for Augusta County. In November another party of armed men, under Connolly, went to Hannastown, and breaking open the jail, released two prisoners confined under sentence of execution; and in February of 1775 a third party went to Hannastown, again broke open the jail, and released three prisoners. Connolly was not in command of this last party, for a few days before he had started for Williamsburg, the capital of Virginia; but it was under command of Benjamin Harrison, a son-in-law of William Crawford.

There was by this time a distinctive line drawn between the jurisdiction and the claims of the two colonies, and each of these had its adherents. Many of the most prominent had not given up the hope that the disturbances would be settled without difficulty, attributing that the most of the present troubles came from some hot-headed and rash men. But in the state of affairs getting still more complicated, and which had called demands from the Council of the king, and advices from the Continental Congress, it was not unreasonable that men of high character in every respect should be held by the ties which bound them under every consideration to their own colony. We are, therefore, not surprised to know that as strenuously as Penn's settlers and his agents advocated their rights and his claims, so as strenuously on the other side and as naturally did such men as Crawford and Gibson take the side of Virginia. In January of 1775 the Executive Council of Pennsylvania having had information that William Crawford, the president judge of Westmoreland, sided with the Virginians in opposing the justices of Pennsylvania, the Council advised the Governor to supersede him in the office of judge, which was done forthwith.

But of the troubles of the settlers during the fall and winter of 1774 and 1775 these were of the least. During the preceding summer the crops had been neglected, and winter found them unprepared. At the termination of Dunmore's war a goodly number, as was always the case on the frontier, had returned to their former homes, and this accession of inhabitants, who were consumers and not producers, had a distressful effect. They could not have come in a worse time, for the amount of provisions gathered was barely sufficient for those that had remained. The harvest of 1774 at best had been scanty; along the southern border it had not been gathered at all. This season came very near to what the preceding year had been to Western Virginia, a year which in their annuals was long remembered as the "starving year." But with that generosity which was a noble and a prominent trait among the early settlers, each assisted the other. During this winter many must have perished had they not resorted to hunting, and got from the woods enough game to keep them from want. Their small supply of corn, rye, and potatoes they divided among each other. And this was but the prelude to a long era of want and privation, necessity, and constant alarm, which was terminated only with the war which secured the independence of the colonies.

Readers of general history are well conversant with the affairs which were taking place in Massachusetts and at Philadelphia in the early part of 1775. We will pass them over with observing that they were sympathetically responded to and closely watched by our colonists. Already were some, by more ways than one, controlling the actions of all.

From notice of foregoing statements it will be observed that the whole people, as a body, at these early times may readily be separated into two classes, between which was a prominent line of demarkation. Although we alluded incidentally to this distinction before, at no other time is it more suitable to recall it than now. And this distinction is noticeable all through our early affairs, and indeed is noticeable at all times and among all people. We may call them respectively, aristocrats and plebeians, gentry and commonalty; they are, in reality, the leaders and the followers. The class of which the county justices were the most prominent representatives, together with others who, in a military station, were equally prominent, deserves more than a passing notice. These were the ones who shaped the measures which received the approval of the people. As to these justices, we can at almost all times bear testimony to their integrity, and to their good, sound common sense. They reflect honor upon their lineage in the capacity of judges, the arbiters of right and wrong. But besides this knowledge, which it is certain they possessed, an accompanying and an indispensable qualification for a prominent man was that he have some knowledge of arms. Nearly every man of that day distinguished as a leader in civil affairs was also a military man. Indeed, from the incessant wars, to be a man distinguished above the others was to be one who commanded the respect of his followers by having displayed more than ordinary bravery or knowledge of warfare. Of this class of men St. Clair, Capt. James Smith, Capt. Proctor, Col. Lochry were fitting examples with us; while of those at Pittsburgh, Cols. Crawford, John Neville, John Gibson may be noticed. To have acquired a seat in the Assembly, or a nomination as a justice of the peace, or of the quorum, was about as much as to say that the one so specially favored was, or had been, a leader in the militia.

The military organization of the Province had been early attended to, and no less from necessity was it than from a desire of glory that every citizen had a tincture of the manual of arms and of camp discipline. The justices of the peace were usually officers in the militia. St. Clair, Smith, Crawford, Neville had won a sort of pre-eminence in service before they were recognized as leaders in the civil affairs. The ideas of these men at the head of our county at this conjuncture had been enlarged by connection with the more prominent men of the colonies, had been improved by observation, by travel, by reading, and by experience. So they were in manners, in information, in the possession of peculiar privileges and franchises bestowed by the colonial authorities, far above the great body of the people who came hither to earn their bread by drudgery, and clear a patch and rear a thatched cabin to shelter the heads of their ragged offspring; for these people, as a class, were poor to impoverishment. They had made little advancement in refinement, they were of different and distinct nationalities. Of all the early settlers they had no special claim above the others to the boasted liberty of those born under the common law of England. But it is with a peculiar satisfaction that the Westmorelander of to-day contemplates the proceedings of his ancestors in 1775.

CHAPTER XVI.

WESTMORELAND'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, 1775.

Congress and Ticonderoga—Westmoreland listening to the Guns at Lexington Common—Meeting held at Pittsburgh and at Hannastown, May 16, 1775—What they said at Pittsburgh—What they did at Hannastown—Westmoreland's Declaration of Independence—Spirit of the Resolutions Adopted—who wrote them—Similarity between the Declaration and the Resolutions in Expression and in Sentiment—The military idea of Resistance—Observations and Remarks on the Paper—Westmoreland's Great Glory—The Regiment of Associators.

WHAT occurred in Massachusetts after the passage of the bill by Parliament which closed Boston Harbor, when Gen. Gage was reinforced by British soldiers, and when minute-men were enlisting in every village, are matters of general notoriety. On the 19th of April, 1775, the men at Lexington Common laid bare their breasts to the bayonets of the soldiers of Great Britain, the representatives of an empire upon which the sun never went down. The creaking of the rifles of those yeomen "was heard the world around." When it echoed through these woods "it reached the ears of a people who had been suffering under an indirect British oppression, and who were ready to fly to arms for a principle which they recognized as dear to them as their very existence, and for which they were as ready to battle as for their hearths. A thrill of sympathy went indeed through all the English-speaking people when this act was witnessed; for there were many who, to the last moment, could not believe that actual war was imminent, and trusted that the differences between the mother and her offspring would be satisfactorily adjusted without the intervention of arms. Now it was too late for either to retract or recede from their position without sacrificing on the one side their pretensions, on the other side their demands.

Then the people spoke. On the same day on which Congress met from adjournment, May the 10th, 1775, Col. Ethan Allen demanded the surrender of Ticonderoga. The organized committee had by this time extended from the North to the South. Virginia, as well as Massachusetts, was a unit in the cause of the colonies. The spirit of freedom extended to here and to the most remote colonies in the West. From the exertions of those men, who lost for a while all local prejudices and forgot all personal interests, the West, almost unanimously, was carried for the cause of liberty.

We have not, at this day, the means of knowing who were the leaders of the others in Western Pennsylvania, and especially in Westmoreland, in shaping the course which the others with so much honor followed; but the facts as they are preserved in history it is our pleasure to rehearse. Of the local movements in the early part of 1775 we can give no particulars in detail; their whisperings were lost in the great storm which suddenly broke over the land. To us it would be a great satisfaction to know how the news was carried down the slim cartway of the old Forbes trail; how the rider, forwarded, maybe, by the committee at Philadelphia, dashed up the hill at the stockade at Ligonier, and stopped at the door of Capt. St. Clair to deliver his packet; how the word was received by the settlers at Hanna's; how neighbor ran to tell neighbor the greatest news of his life. Of this we know nothing, but we know that so speedily flew the news, and so spontaneous was the emotions of surprise and of fear which it awoke in the hearts of the Westmorelanders, that on the 16th of May, four weeks after the skirmish at Lexington, a meeting was held at Hannastown, and on the same day one at Pittsburgh, in which our inhabitants participated. In these they gave expressions to their views, and in many respects the meeting held at Hannastown was the noblest ever, to our time, held in Westmoreland or in the West.

The resolutions adopted at Hannastown on the 16th of May, 1775, are perhaps better displayed, as all superior excellencies are displayed, by comparison.

The meeting at Pittsburgh may be thus summarized. The inhabitants of the western part of Augusta County¹ meeting together, chose a committee, which committee met and resolved that seven so chosen, or any four of them, should be a standing committee, vested with all the powers of the corresponding committees which had been appointed in nearly all the counties, and after resolving,—

First, That the thanks of the committee were due to their representatives in the Colonial Council, which sat at Richmond.

Second, That the committee, having a high esteem in the behavior of their brethren of New England, they therefore cordially approved of their opposing the invaders of American liberty, and urged upon each one to encourage his neighbor to follow their example. And then taking into consideration the dangers which threatened America by the attack on Massachusetts, and the dangers which threatened themselves by the action of the loyalists in stirring up the Indians against them, they resolved,—

Third, That the recommendation of the Richmond Convention relative to embodying the militia be complied with, and that the recommendation to raise enough money to purchase ammunition be carried into effect.

Then following in a noble appeal to the inhabitants, in the name of God and of everything sacred, to use their utmost to assist in levying the sum, and looking to their personal security, they resolved,—

Fourth, An approval of a resolution of the committee in the other part of the county relative to cultivating friendship with the Indians.

Then it was ordered that the committee secure such arms and ammunition as they could, and deliver them to the militia officers; and resolved,—

Fifth, That a sum definite be raised by subscription for the use of the deputies sent from the colonies to the General Congress.

¹ Representing themselves to be within the jurisdiction of Virginia.

The meeting concluded by a report of the select committee, which was embodied in the form of a circular letter to the other delegates in the Colonial Congress, which statement sets forth only local grievances and local desires, and by an order to have the proceedings certified and published in the Virginia Gazette.

On the same day, in the shade of the old forest-trees at Hannastown, met the backwoodsmen of Westmoreland. There, without any pretensions, but in modesty and with firmness, they subscribed unanimously to a series of resolutions, the substance of which had been written in King John's great charter, and which was subsequently embodied in Jefferson's Declaration of Independence. The record of this meeting, preserved in the second volume of the fourth series of American Archives, sets forth in substance what follows:

At a general meeting of the inhabitants of Westmoreland, held at Hannastown on the 16th of May, 1775, for taking into consideration the very alarming state of the country occasioned by the dispute with Great Britain, it was unanimously resolved that the Parliament by several acts had declared the inhabitants of Massachusetts to be in rebellion, and by endeavoring to enforce those acts the ministry had attempted to reduce the inhabitants to a more wretched state of slavery than existed, or had ever existed, in any State or country. That not content with violating their constitutional and chartered privileges, they would strip them of the rights of humanity by exposing their lives to the wanton sport of a licentious soldiery, and by depriving them of the very means of subsistence. That as there was no reason to doubt but the same system of tyranny and oppression would be extended to all parts of America (provided it met with success in Massachusetts), it had therefore become the indispensable duty of every American, of any man who had any public virtue or love for his country, or any compassion for posterity, to resist and oppose by every means which God had put in his power the execution of this system; and that as for them they would be ready to oppose it with their lives and fortunes. And the better to enable them to accomplish this they agreed to immediately form themselves into a military body, to consist of companies to be made up out of the several townships, under an association declared to be the Association of Westmoreland County.

In words so noble was the preamble set forth, and no less happily conceived were the articles of association.

They asserted that, as dutiful subjects, possessed with the most unshaken loyalty and fidelity to his kingly Majesty George the Third, whom they acknowledged as their lawful and rightful king, and whom they wished to be the beloved sovereign of a free and happy people throughout the whole British empire, they did not by this association mean to deviate from that loyalty which it was their duty to observe; but, animated with a love of liberty, it was no less their duty to maintain and defend their just rights, which of late had been violated by the ministry and Parliament, and to transmit those rights to their posterity. And for this they agreed and associated to form themselves into a regiment, or regiments, and to choose officers to command them; and they promised with alacrity to make themselves masters of the manual exercise, and such evolutions as were necessary to enable them to act in a body with concert; for which end they were to meet at such times and places as might be appointed by the commanding officers; and also agreed that, should the country be invaded by a foreign enemy, or should troops be sent from Great Britain to enforce the acts of Parliament, that they would cheerfully submit to military discipline, and would, to the utmost of their power, resist and oppose them, and would coincide with any plan which might be formed for the defense of America in general or Pennsylvania in particular. They then declared, by way of extenuation, that they did not desire any innovation, but only wished to see things go on in the same way as before the era of the Stamp Act, when Boston grew great and America was happy. In proof of which they would willingly submit to the laws of which they had been accustomed to be governed before that period, and even pledged themselves to be ready, in either their associate or several capacity, to assist the civil magistrates to enforce the same. Finally, when the British Parliament would repeal the obnoxious statutes, and would recede from their unjust claim of taxing them and of making laws for them in any instance, or when some general plan of union and reconciliation had been formed and accepted by America, that then their association should be dissolved; but until then it should remain in full force; and to the observance of it they bound themselves by everything dear and sacred among men. For them there was to be no licensed murder, no famine introduced by law.

The meeting ended by the passing of a resolution for the townships to meet on Wednesday, the twenty-fourth instant, to accede to the said association and choose their officers.

The resolutions stand recorded without the names of the signers attached; neither is there any positive knowledge in so many words who drew them up. The signers without question were all Pennsylvanians. As to the authorship, the strongest presumption—a presumption almost capable of proof—is that St. Clair had the lion's share in it. The only contemporaneous documents to this time made public are two letters, both from St. Clair, written within a few days of this meeting. In the first letter, dated Ligonier, May 18, 1775, to Joseph Shippen, Jr., the fact of the meeting is mentioned:

"Yesterday we had a County Meeting, and have come to resolution to arm and discipline, and have formed an Association, which I suppose you will soon see in the papers. God grant an end may be speedily put to any necessity for such proceedings. I doubt their utility, and am almost as much afraid of success in this contest as of being vanquished."¹

In a letter dated at the same place on the 25th of the month, when it was time some explanation should be given, Governor Penn read the following:

"We have nothing but musters and committees all over the country, and everything seems to be running into the greatest confusion. If some conciliating plan is not adopted by the Congress, America has seen her golden days; they may return, but will be preceded by scenes of horror. An association is formed in this county for defense of American liberty. I got a clause added it by which they bind themselves to assist the civil magistrate in the execution of the laws they have been accustomed to be governed by."

¹ The date, or rather the word "yesterday," which is used, was evidently a slip of the pen. See the chapter on the life and services of St. Clair, in which further evidence is given on this matter.

The idioms of the old English charters; the formulas used by the writers on the constitution and statutes of England; the stereotyped expressions which crop out in the declaration itself; the common law forms; in short, the strong English in which the resolutions are written, as well as the fact which he confesses to his lord paramount, the Governor himself, and the fact of his presence at the meeting, all would indicate that St. Clair had the chiefest part in directing the meeting and presenting the paper. In considering St. Clair as an historical character, we are too apt to regard him in his military capacity alone, while in truth St. Clair was one of that class of men conspicuous in the Revolutionary annals, who blended a knowledge of letters with a desire for martial fame and of active military service. Considered in its right place, the vigor of his mind is better displayed in his political career; for he was a man of fine literary acquirements and of strong parts, having enjoyed the benefits of a collegiate education and moving in good and polished society from early life.

The meeting at Hannastown is remarkable for producing, or at least recording, such ideas as are generally produced only by deliberative assemblies, in which much argument is exhausted, and in which extensive experience and research are brought to bear. The resolutions adopted by masses of people collected together through excitement have, usually, nothing of stability in them. Such meetings have universally been held up to ridicule, and utterances emanating from them are seldom taken as the expressions of the people at large. But these resolutions are singular in this respect; and the meeting is one of the few recorded in which cool, deliberate determination and wise counsel are expressed by a hastily collected crowd, and by men unused to legislative or parliamentary experience.

The instrument has been called Westmoreland's Declaration of Independence. But it is not a declaration in the same sense we are to regard the great paper adopted on the 4th of July, 1776. During 1775 meetings were held all over the colonies, in Massachusetts and in North and South Carolina. In their expressions of sympathy many of these are identical, and they all contain expressions which could only come from a people determined to resist oppression. But in few had the idea of resistance and the theory of an American Union been so prominent. There are sentences in these resolutions and sentences in the Declaration which correspond, word for word, so that had the resolutions been written and promulgated after the Declaration the world would not have detected the sham without critically scrutinizing. But it was as earnest a State paper, and it as clearly defined their causes of complaint and showed the remedy for ministerial mismanagement as any paper ever penned on either side of the Atlantic. Therefore we may surely say that of all the meetings and of all the expressions which were anywhere adopted at them none excelled the meeting at Hannastown, either in a plain statement of grievances, in the assertion of well-defined rights, or in intimating a plan by which these difficulties might be adjusted.

The noblest idea, perhaps, in the whole paper is the idea presented in one of the resolves, which we may well believe was heartily as well as unanimously adopted, in which the men in their hunting-shirts, standing there together beyond the barrier of the mountains, agreed to meet death for principle. They might be subjugated, the country might be overrun by hireling soldiers, nay, the king of England might hang them, but while to the world they acknowledged his rightful claim as their sovereign, yet they pledged their lives not to submit to a corrupt ministry or a venal Parliament that passed laws for them which the privileges of the English constitution did not admit of.

In the prompt manner in which the military idea was brought out we see the secret hand of men who regarded the exercise of arms as part of their legitimate business. Another fact discernible is the parity and the identity of interests which the colonists had with each other. On this patriotic ground stood the colonists of Pennsylvania and of Virginia. Between St. Clair and Crawford, Smith and Gibson, Proctor and Neville there were on this question no conflicting sentiments.

The curiosity of the reader would be drawn to the association that day effected. The association of Westmoreland County was but an identical organization which, under different local arrangements, extended all over the provinces, and which was acknowledged as a loyal and patriotic representation at the first meeting at Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia. The regiment organized first in our own county about Hannastown was under command of Col. Proctor, and its standard, unrolled before the Declaration of Independence and before the colonies had a flag, has been preserved, and was, when the descendants of those men celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of that glorious day at Greensburg, again unfurled to their applause. The standard was of crimson silk, and had in its upper left corner the union-jack of Britain, and on its folds the rattlesnake with thirteen rattles, with the legend below, "Don't tread on me." In a half-circle above were the letters "J. P. F. B. W. C. P.," standing for "John Proctor, First Battalion, Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania."¹ By Col. Proctor it was presented to Gen. Craig, and in his family it has been treasured, along with the sword which the general carried through the Revolution, as a sacred heirloom.

¹ This reminds one of the "S. P. Q. R." on the standards of the Pretorian Guards.

The regiment did not serve in the Continental armies under that organization, but most of those who had been active in forming it served in various capacities, and the associators becoming a regular militia organization by act of the General Assembly, many of the officers were retained, and promotion within its ranks was regular. Some of the men, however, enrolled that day lived through that long war to tell their battles o'er again, and some died heroically on the fields, on the retreat through Jersey, at Brandywine, and with Greene in the South. As for those men who signed the Great Paper, at the last they were scattered all over America. Most of them were freeholders, some were not; but as for all, they had no nationality but the brotherhood of man, no inheritance but the love of liberty, and nothing in common but the traditions of freedom. So in death they had no burial-place in common, unless it was the common earth, and on Decoration Day the little children with garlands and miniature flags do not know where they lie in the old graveyards. Their grassy mounds are scattered over the hills and valleys of Westmoreland, along the Ohio and the Delaware.

Some have tried to throw a doubt upon the originality of these resolutions, asserting, without proof, they were plagiarized. Could these make out a claim as to the insignificance of the characters who wrote and signed them, such position might be met with the observation of a writer of great authority, and one of the closest observers of the characteristics of men. For the great Plutarch, entering upon the life of Demosthenes, pays a noble tribute to virtue and to the natural ability of man. He ridicules the notion that only great men have been born and bred in large cities and in famous places, and declares that virtue, like a strong and hardy plant, will take root in any place where it can find an ingenuous nature and a mind that has no aversion to virtue and discipline. Therefore, if our sentiments or conduct fall short of the point they ought to reach, we must not impute it to the obscurity of the place where we were born, but to our little selves. Thus common sense, no less than philosophy, tells us that the woods of America, as Locke puts it,¹ produce men who, in parts and in natural abilities, are the equals of men born in the capitals of Europe.²

¹ "Essay on the Human Understanding."

² For the text of these resolutions, see Appendix B.

CHAPTER XVII.

CIVIL AFFAIRS IN WESTMORELAND ON THE EVE OF THE REVOLUTION.

Public Affairs—Connolly and Dunmore still Scheming—Connolly tries to carry the Pennsylvania and Virginia Officers for the King—His Plan to effect this, and to hold the West for Dunmore—Essent Omnes—Boston Harbor closed—Call for a Meeting at the State-House, July 15, 1774—Hanna and Cavett as Deputies—William Thompson on the Committee of Safety—The Associators—Edward Cook and James Perry Delegates to the Convention of 1776—Special Law allowing Westmoreland Electors to vote for Members of the Convention—The County divided into Two Districts for this Election—One District North and one South of the Youghiogheny—Their Election Officers—Members returned to the Convention of 1776—All Male Inhabitants subject to Military Service, and required to take the Oath of Allegiance—Frame of Government for the State adopted—John Proctor elected first Councilor—Archibald Lochry, the first County Lieutenant, succeeded by Cook and by Col. Campbell—Duties of the County Lieutenant—The West to take care of Itself—British Influence over the Indians—Hatred between the Indians and the Western Virginia Settlers.

DURING 1775 events followed each other with rapidity. In June the battle of Bunker Hill was fought, which separated forever the colonies from the government of England. But the loyalists were everywhere and in every manner actively engaged in stirring up dissension amongst the colonists to carry with them the interests of the king.

From Withers' "Chronicles" we have the statement that in July of 1775, Connolly presented himself to Dunmore with proposals of a character to be heartily indorsed by the Governor. Dunmore acquiesced in Connolly's plan, and, as it was in his power, offered solid bribes to such officers in the Virginia militia as were loyally inclined, and upon whom he thought he could depend. These were to co-operate with Connolly. Connolly's influence further among the Indians was known to be powerful. The agent went to Gen. Gage at Boston, and disclosed to him the plans fixed upon between himself and the Governor. He was then made colonel of a proposed regiment to be raised on the borders of Virginia and Pennsylvania. Those belonging to it were to be mustered in in the interest of the crown. The plan itself was that these were to proceed to Detroit, then held as a British military post, where they would be supplied and equipped. Then with the co-operation of the Indians, all under command of Connolly, they were to rendezvous at Fort Pitt. From Fort Pitt he was to march through Western Pennsylvania and Virginia, and form a junction with Dunmore in the April following, 1776.

Such was the scheme, but it was frustrated by the taking of Connolly and by the subsequent withdrawal of Dunmore. Connolly was arrested in the latter part of November, 1775, at Fredericktown, Md. He was kept in confinement, and by an order of Congress sent to Philadelphia for security. When nothing more could be apprehended from his mischievous actions he was released. He retired to Canada, where he lived on the bounty of the English government, and there it is said he died. But it must not be omitted that towards the end of the Revolution he made another effort to get the Virginia officers in the West to resign from the colonial and Continental service and raise the standard of a second revolt. Among others, he tried, with many offers, to prevail upon Col. John Gibson. A doubt was at one time thrown upon the patriotism of Gibson, but this doubt has long since been entirely dispelled.

Among those who did remain loyal to the British, and became traitors not only to their country but to their race, were Girty, McKee, and Matthew Elliot. These were mixed up in Connolly's plan, and some time subsequent to this, being apprehended as enemies, were kept in confinement at Fort Pitt, from which they made their escape, and ever after remained in open hostility against the colonists.

Connolly and Dunmore were carried away in that wind which blew over the country in 1775. Glad are we to get rid of them with but one more observation. As to Connolly—a man in a secondary position to Dunmore, as Dunmore was in a secondary position to the ministry—to him, it may be said, the people of Westmoreland and of the West owe in a great measure their political independence. He was to the people west of the Alleghenies in general, and to the people of Westmoreland in particular, what Gage was to the people of Boston. There is no questioning the influence which he left in these parts derogatory to the interest of his master. For years the names of both were detested. Perhaps had it not been for such men as Connolly and Dunmore, Westmoreland would not have been so patriotic and so outspoken in her subsequent resolves and measures.

While these notices refer to general history, we must not forget that the domestic troubles were not yet adjusted. The calm and patriotic men who then passed to the head of affairs in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and whom to name without eulogy is honor enough, regarded these frequent collisions as unworthy the citizens of two great commonwealths. The noise had reached the Continental Congress, and had attracted its notice. On July 25th the delegates, among whom were Jefferson, Henry, and Franklin, united in a circular urging the people in this region to a mutual forbearance. They recommended that all armed men kept by either party should be dismissed, and that all in confinement or on bail should be discharged. Although, as Craig says, the only armed force kept up was by the Virginian authorities, it was so worded to avoid invidiousness. But on the 7th of August, perhaps before the circular had reached the Provincial Convention of Virginia, it passed a resolve which directed Capt. John Neville, with his company of one hundred men, to take possession of Fort Pitt under pay of the colony. Neville did so, and St. Clair, in a letter to John Penn, expressed his apprehension. With a forbearance under this infraction which is worthy of honorable mention, the Penns acquiesced. Neville occu-pled this post not so much as a Virginian as an American, and under direction of the Congress kept it secure to the interests and the cause of the colonies in general. Neville commanded at Fort Pitt till 1777, and settling there became identified with the future prosperity of the city of Pittsburgh, and with the history of the union by his connection with the Whiskey Insurrection.

The spark that kindled the flame was the Boston Port Bill. On the 13th of May, 1774, the town of Boston resolved "that if the other colonies would unite with them to stop all importation from Great Britain and the West Indies until that act should be repealed, it would prove the salvation of the colonies." The act was to go into effect on the 1st of June, and when that day came it was observed throughout the colonies as a fast day. While the excitement consequent on this measure was growing, the Committee of Correspondence for the city of Philadelphia sent out a circular to the principal citizens of the different counties, saying that "the Governor, declining to call a meeting of the Assembly, renders it necessary to take the sentiments of the inhabitants; and for that purpose it is agreed to call a meeting of the inhabitants of the city and the counties at the State-House on the 15th inst., Wednesday, July, 1774." This call was signed by Charles Thompson, clerk of the first Continental Congress. On these suggestions meetings were held in most of the counties, and especially where the Scotch-Irish took the lead. Deputies were chosen from every district in the Province, and these assembled at Philadelphia on the day fixed. To the company of such illustrious men as sat in that convention Westmoreland sent Robert Hanna and James Cavett. These men talked with Thomas Mifflin and Joseph Reed, and joined in the resolutions of that body, and in the instructions which were gratuitously proffered to their representatives in Assembly. They further subscribed to an essay which came from the scholarly pen of Dickinson on the abstract nature of liberty and privileges, and on the king's prerogatives, and which was illuminated with copious extracts from Burlamaqui, Montesquieu, and Blackstone. Hanna had been an innkeeper, and Cavett stood so high that he had been elected one of the first county commissioners. They received their latter honor by the suffrages of the people at a special election. They were then, without dispute, fully capacitated to consider of the learning of Queen Elizabeth's chief justice, and advise the deputies to the next Congress to abate from Great Britain a renunciation of all powers under the statute of the Thirty-fifth, Henry VIII., Chapter II., of internal legislation and of the imposition of taxes.

Congress, at its session in May, 1775, resolved to raise a Continental army. Washington was appointed to command the forces of the colonies. The quota of Pennsylvania was fixed at 4300 men, and the Assembly recommended to the commissioners of the several counties to provide arms and accoutrements for this force. They also directed the officers of the military association to select a number of minute-men equal to the number of arms they had, to be ready to march in case of emergency on the shortest notice. To assist in carrying these measures into effect a Committee of Safety was appointed. William Thompson, who had been the first person returned to the Assembly at the election in 1773, was of this committee from Westmoreland.

This Committee of Safety prepared articles for the government of the associators. Thus the associators, at first merely a voluntary association on the part of those who entered it, was by a resolution of the Assembly which required all able-bodied men to belong to the military organization, made a compulsory militia. The assessors of the several townships were required to furnish the names of all persons of military age capable of bearing arms. On those who had not joined the associators a sum of two pounds ten shillings, besides the regular tax, was levied. By one of the articles for the government of this military body passed by the Assembly, if one of the associators called into actual service should leave a family not able to maintain themselves in his absence, the justices of the peace, with the overseers of the poor, should make provision for their maintenance.

Towards the close of 1775 a further demand was made on the State for four battalions; and of these, one was placed under command of Col. Arthur St. Clair.

The Continental Congress in May, 1776, declared that it was irreconcilable to reason and good conscience that the American people should take the oaths for the support of government under the crown of Great Britain, and that it was necessary that every kind of authority under the crown should be suppressed. A long struggle then ensued between the proprietary interest, represented principally by members of the Assembly, and their opponents, called Whigs. The plan of the Whigs to call a convention was finally successful; and at a conference of the Committees of Observation for the different counties, held at Carpenter's Hall on the 18th of June, 1776, it was resolved that it was necessary to call a Provincial Convention to form a new government in the interest of the people only, and to the members was proposed a religious test.¹ The delegates from Westmoreland to this Provincial Conference were Edward Cook and James Perry.

This organization, under the presidency of Mr. McKean, passed to the consideration of the circular and resolves which had called them together. They then, on the next day, the 29th, unanimously resolved, "That the resolutions of May were approved by the Conference; that the present government of the Province was not competent to the exigencies of affairs; that it was necessary that a Convention of the Province should be called by that Conference for the purpose of forming a State government; and that a committee should be appointed to ascertain the number of members of which the Convention should consist." Of this committee the city of Philadelphia was allowed two, and each county two also, with the exception alone of Westmoreland, which was allowed but one. Cook was appointed of this committee.

The Conference proceeded to make such regulations as regarded the qualifications of the voters for the members to the Convention, and when they began to consider the resolution which made it obligatory on an associator that he should have paid taxes, or should have been assessed before he could vote, it was seen that under that order of things Westmoreland would be totally disfranchised, for Westmoreland had been exempted for three years from the payment of provincial taxes. If it were possible for this state of affairs to be brought around again by any reasonable effort on the part of the tax-payers of the county in this year of grace, there would, no doubt, be a determined effort to make it perpetual. This disability, however, was removed by a resolution allowing it to be no disqualification to the electors of Westmoreland.

For the purposes of this election the whole of the county was divided into two election districts. The first division was of all that part south of the Youghiogeny, the inhabitants of which were to vote at Spark's Fort, on the river, and the other division was of all the rest north of that line, who were to vote at Hannastown.²

Each county for this convention had been allowed eight members. Ours was represented by James Barr, Edward Cook, James Smith, John Moore, John Carmichael, James Perry, James McClellan, and Christopher Lobingier.³ On the 15th of July, 1776,

¹ Oath of Profession :

"I do profess in God the Father and in Jesus Christ the Eternal Son, the true God, and in the Holy Spirit one God blessed evermore, and I do acknowledge the Sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine Inspiration."

Following is the form of the Oath of Allegiance :

"I do swear (or affirm) that I renounce and refuse all allegiance to George the Third, King of Great Britain, his heirs and successors; and that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as a free and independent State, and that I will not at any time do or cause to be done any matter or thing that will be injurious to the freedom and independence thereof, as declared by Congress; and also that I will discover and make known to some one Justice of the peace of said State all treasons or traitorous conspiracies which I now know or hereafter shall know to be formed against this or any of the United States of America."

See Appendix C.

² Judges, First Division.—George Wilson, John Kile, Robert McConnell.

Judges, Second Division.—Barr, James John Moore, Clement McGeary.

³ Biographical Sketches of the Westmoreland Members of the Constitutional Convention of 1776.—James Barr, of Westmoreland County, was born in Lancaster County in 1749. He removed to Westmoreland County prior to its organization, and located in Derry township. At the onset of the Revolution he was energetic in assisting the formation of the associated the Convention, now for the State of Pennsylvania, met, for on the 4th the Congress had declared the colonies independent States.

The members of this Convention took the prescribed battalions both for general and frontier defense; was chosen a member of the Convention of July 15, 1776; served as justice of the peace subsequent thereto, and from 1787 to 1790 was a member of the General Assembly, in which he opposed the calling of the Constitutional Convention of 1790. He was, however, an associate judge of Westmoreland County under that constitution, and in 1802 signed a remonstrance against the impeachment of Judge Addison, then president judge of the district. On the organization of Armstrong County, Judge Barr was in the new county, and was appointed one of the commissioners for laying out the town of Kittanning, the county-seat. He was appointed one of the first associate judges of Armstrong County, an office which he filled until his death, which occurred May 11, 1824.

Edward Cook, of Westmoreland County, was born in 1738, of English parentage, in the Cumberland Valley, on the Conococheague, then in Lancaster, now Franklin County, Pa. In 1772 he removed to the "Fork of Yough," between the Monongahela and Youghiogheny Rivers, now Fayette County, and between that date and 1776 built a stone house, yet standing, where he lived and died. When he first settled in the western part of the State he kept a store, farmed, had a still-house, and owned slaves. He was a member of the Committee of Conference which met at Carpenter's Hall, June 18, 1776, and of the Convention of July 15, 1776. In 1777 he was appointed by the General Assembly one of the commissioners from this State to meet those from the other States, which assembled at New Haven, Conn., Nov. 22, 1777, to regulate the prices of commodities. In 1781 he was in command of a battalion of rangers for frontier defense. He was sub-lieutenant of Westmoreland County, 1780-81, and lieutenant Jan. 5, 1782, which latter office he held at the time of the erection of Fayette County in 1783. On Nov. 21, 1786, Col. Cook was appointed a justice, with jurisdiction including the county of Washington, and Aug. 7, 1791, associate judge of Fayette County. He was a man of influence, and during the Excise troubles in 1794 was chosen chairman of the Mingo Creek meeting, and was largely instrumental in allaying the excitement, and thus virtually ending the so-called Whiskey Insurrection. Col. Cook died on the 28th of November, 1808. His wife was Martha Crawford, of Cumberland, now Franklin County, sister of Col. Josiah Crawford. She died in 1837, aged ninety-four years, in the old stone house into which they moved, as she always said, in "independence year." Col. Cook had but one child, James Crawford Cook, who was born in 1772, and died in 1848.

James Smith, of Westmoreland County, was born in Cumberland, now Franklin County, Pa., in the year 1737. At the age of eighteen (1755) he was taken captive by the Indians during their marauds on the frontiers subsequent to the defeat of Braddock, was adopted into one of their families, and accompanied them in all their wanderings until his escape in 1759. He returned to the Conococheague early in 1760, where he settled at his old home. He was leader of the famous "Black Boys" of 1763 and 1769; served as a lieutenant in Bouquet's expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764, and in 1766 went on an exploring excursion into Southern Kentucky. After the peace of 1768 he removed to Westmoreland County. In 1774, during Dunmore's war, he was appointed captain of a ranging company, and in 1775 major in the associated battalion of the county. He was a member of the Convention of July 15, 1776, and chosen to the Assembly in 1776 and again in 1777. During the latter year he was in command of a scouting party in the Jerseys, and in 1778 commissioned colonel in command on the frontiers, doing excellent service in frustrating the marauds of the Indians. At the close of the Revolution, Col. Smith removed to Kentucky, settling in Bourbon County. In 1788 he was elected a member of the Convention which assembled at Danville to confer about a separation from the State of Virginia, and from that year until 1799 he represented the county either in Convention or Assembly. In 1810 he published two pamphlets against the Shakers,—"Shakerism Developed" and "Shakerism Detected,"—and in 1812, "A Treatise on the Mode and Manner of Indian War," with extracts from his journal of his captivity. He died in Washington County, Ky., in the summer of 1812.

For sketch of life of John Moore, see notes to Chapter XI.

John Carmichael, of Westmoreland County, was a native of Cumberland County, Pa., born about 1751. Previous to 1775 he had settled in what is now Franklin township, Fayette County, on the waters of Redstone Creek, about eight miles from Col. Cook's, where he erected a oath, a copy of which is given in Note 1, p. 78, and besides discussing the plans and perfecting the measures necessary to the adoption of the constitution, assumed the supreme authority in the State.¹ That the delegates went beyond the scope of business intrusted to them by the people, and for which they had been convened, was not at the time questioned, but it afterwards was, without avail, for the people themselves ratified and sanctioned what was done. The old Assembly, in interest with the proprietaries, made a feeble remonstrance against the actions of the Convention, but it was too late, for the old was rung out with the bells swinging in the steeples on the Fourth of July. This body, therefore, among other matters, appointed a Committee of Safety to discharge the executive duties of the new government, approved of the Declaration of Independence, and appointed justices of the peace, who before assuming official functions were each required to take an oath of renunciation of the king's authority and of allegiance to the State, resolved that Pennsylvania was thenceforth a free and independent State, put forth a bill of rights, formed a constitution, and declared a plan or frame of government for the Commonwealth. The constitution went into effect on its adoption, Sept. 28, 1776. The Legislature had previously, about the middle of June, made provisions for the enrollment mill and still-house. He was elected a member of the Convention of July 15, 1776, and of the Assembly in 1777. He died in 1796, leaving a widow and two sons,—James and Thomas.

James Perry, of Westmoreland County, located at an early period on Monongahela River, at the mouth of Turtle Creek, just above what is known as Frazer's cabin, where he took up a large tract of land. He was a member of the Provincial Conference held at Carpenter's Hall June 28, 1776, and of the Convention of July 15th following. From March 21, 1777, to the close of the Revolution he served as one of the sub-lieutenants of Westmoreland County. Of his subsequent history all inquiries have failed to elicit any information, save that he removed either to Kentucky or Missouri at a very early day.

John McClelland, of Westmoreland County, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., in 1734. He emigrated to what is now Fayette County prior to 1770, and took up a tract of land in Franklin township. He was a member of the Convention of July 15, 1776, and of the General Assembly of 1778. He was in active service on the frontiers during the Revolution, and was captain in the First Battalion of Westmoreland militia at the close of the war. He figured with some prominence in the Whiskey Insurrection, during its closing scenes, as chairman of the committee appointed by the meeting at Redstone to confer with the commissioners of the United States and State of Pennsylvania. He died on his farm in February, 1819. Gen. Alexander McClelland was his son.

Christopher Lobengier, of Westmoreland County, the son of Christopher Lobengier, a native of Wittenburg, Germany, was born in Lancaster, now Danphin County, Pa., in the year 1740. He removed in the spring of 1772 to Mount Pleasant township, Westmoreland County. He served on the Committee of Correspondence for the county, 1775-76; and was chosen a member of the Convention of July 15, 1776; and under the constitution of 1790 was a member of the House of Representatives from 1791 to 1793. He died on the 4th of July, 1798. Mr. Lobengier married, in 1766, Elizabeth, daughter of Rudolph Müller, by whom he had four sons and five daughters. She died at Stoystown, Somerset Co., Pa., Sept. 5, 1815, aged seventy-one years. John, the eldest son, was one of the associate judges of Westmoreland County, and served in the General Assembly. Col. Israel Painter and Gen. C. P. Markle, of Westmoreland, are descendants of Christopher Lobengier.—Articles in "Pennsylvania Magazine," by Dr. Wm. H. Egle.

¹ Minutes of Provincial Conference, &c., and Pennsylvania Archives, second series, vol. iii., historical note.

of all persons fit for military duty. The test oath, which was a general one, was a measure considered necessary to restrain the insolence of the Tories, a name applied in general to those who were loyally inclined to the old proprietaries or to the crown. By this enactment all white male inhabitants of the State above the age of eighteen years, except of the counties of Bedford and Westmoreland, should, before the first day of the ensuing July, 1777, and in the excepted counties before the first day of August, take and subscribe to, before some justice of the peace, the prescribed form of oath. On all who neglected or refused to take the oath severe penalties were imposed by law. Nearly all who took a prominent part in the Revolution subscribed to this oath. These subscriptions are not at present accessible. We have inserted all the names we have yet found¹ in the Appendix (which see). The religious test was dispensed with at the adoption of the constitution of 1790.

By the plan or frame of government adopted for the Commonwealth by the Convention of 1776,² the supreme executive power was vested in a President and Council, and the Council was to consist of twelve men, distributed over the State, of which Westmoreland was allowed one, to be chosen by election. John Proctor, who had been appointed by the proprietary the first sheriff in 1773, was elected the first councilor, and as such continued from March 10, 1777, to Nov. 18, 1777; he was succeeded by Thomas Scott, who was settled in the region afterward incorporated into Washington, and whose name frequently appears in the history of that county, he being their first member of Congress under the Federal Constitution. Scott was councilor from the time when Proctor ceased to be one to Nov. 13, 1780, a period of three years, and the time limited for any one to remain in office continuously.³

Under the new state the military affairs were carefully attended to and made more efficient. To facilitate the system, and to give even to civil affairs a martial aspect, several offices were created, the holders of which possessed extensive powers delegated to them. The chief of these was that of county lieutenant. This officer was the chief military officer in the county, and he had both civil and military duties. He distributed arms and clothing among the associates, the Council drew upon him for the amount of the assessments for the army, he could order the militia to any point in time of danger, he could hold courts-martial; his authority, indeed, in these matters was bounded only by the Council itself, or was in abeyance whilst a regular officer in the State or Continental service was in command over his district. Archibald Lochry, one of the Scotch-Irish settlers, and a neighbor when at home of John Proctor, was the first county lieutenant, coming to office March 21, 1777. His time of office was most critical and trying to the fullest, and although he necessarily got into some altercations with officers who wanted to divide their authority, yet he showed great energy in watching and holding the frontiers during those perilous years from 1777 to 1781. That he was a responsible man, and that the officers of the government and the people had confidence in him, is apparent from this, that he remained in office till his death. He not only directed many small expeditions into the country of the Indians towards the north, but himself headed many others, and in the outskirts beyond the settlements they guarded the cabins of the settlers behind. He left his bones, with other of his comrades, at the Miami River in Indiana, where he, leading his Westmorelanders to join Clark, was surrounded by innumerable warriors and killed.

Edward Cook was Lochry's successor, and he was in office Jan. 5, 1782; he held part of the time under a special commission, and did not remain in office long, for he was identified with Fayette and Washington, the latter by this time erected. Cook, however, enjoyed the favor of holding commissions in both, and ex officio a justice of the peace in all at the same time. Cook's successor was Col. Charles Campbell, an active military man, and who was a representative man and a mouth-piece somewhat later. He was often heard from during the troublous times of 1791 and 1792. He was an early settler in Indiana County when it was of Armstrong township, Westmoreland. He lived at Black Lick. He in his day did well, serving his country and generation with watchfulness. Some local information can be gathered from his correspondence, and if a person should see a few of his letters in print he could readily find their fellows, for he spelled as an old Indian-fighter would spell, began every second word with a big letter, and after telling the true state of the "frontiers," signed, with the conventional urbanity of the old time, "With The Greatest Hon'r. Your Most Obt. Hbl. Svt. &c."

At the same time the office of sub-lieutenant was created, but the office being deemed not necessary was soon after abolished.

Pennsylvania was thus fully committed to the cause of the colonies. With them all it now was to do or die; it was either the crown or the halter. Henceforth during all this eventful era all history of a local character is more or less connected with the history of the confederated government. Nor can our narrative during this time be given with any degree of precision or connection. Natural barriers separated the East from the West. The Atlantic seaboard furnished the armies then in actual service, although recruits from the west of the mountains were in the early part of the war forwarded to protect the larger cities from the invaders, but thenceforward to a great extent the West was left to take care of itself. Early in the war the British had made a department, with headquarters at Detroit. They had still retained their ascendancy over the Indians, an ascendancy which had been secured by the most influential man ever employed to effect alliances with them, Sir William Johnson. This influence was yet kept up by the profuse use of money, the distribution of arms and necessaries to the tribes, by the standing reward for scalps, and the influence of renegade whites who remained loyal to the kingly government, and who did not take part with the cause of the colonies. But even had the same influence been exercised by the Continental Congress it would not have had the same results. The American settler had been brought up from his childhood, or at least from early manhood, to regard the Indian as his greatest foe. Nor would an alliance with these have been acceptable to many, even had such an alliance been effected, such were the feelings of hatred indulged by most of the Western settlers, although it was not wise, nor politic, nor consistent with the pretensions and the motives of the general government in them to harbor such feelings.

¹ For form of oath see Note 1, page 78; for list of subscribers see appendix to Chapter XVII., "A."

² Convention sat from July 15, 1776, to Sept. 28, 1776.

³ For list of councilors and other early officers, including officers of the court, etc., see Appendix "D."

CHAPTER XVIII.

WESTMORELAND IN THE REVOLUTION.

First Battalion directed to be raised in Pennsylvania for the United Colonies—Capt. John Nelson's Company from Westmoreland—Ordered to Canada—Services of this Company—Second Pennsylvania Battalion under St. Clair—Capt. William Butler's Company, and Capt. Stephen Bayard's Company—History of the Services of this Battalion in the Expedition into Canada, and in the Retreat to Ticonderoga—The Third Pennsylvania Regiment formed out of Saint Clair's Battalion—Memorial of the Officers of the Third and Ninth Pennsylvania Regiments—Sketch of Capt. James Chrystie, and of Thomas Butler—Pennsylvania Rifle Regiment—Its History—Capt. Joseph Erwin's Company—Their Gallant Services at Long Island—The Company incorporated into other Commands—State Regiment of Foot—Capt. Carnahan—Capt. Scott's Company—The Second Pennsylvania Regiment—Condition of the Western Frontiers at the Beginning of the Revolution—George Morgan, Indian Agent at Fort Pitt—Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment raised by Authority of Congress—Directed to be raised in Westmoreland and Bedford Counties—Seven Companies raised in Westmoreland—Its Officers—Mustered into Service for the Defense of the Frontiers—They receive Orders from the Board of War to join Washington—Letter from Col. Mackay to President of the Board—Letter from Lieut.-Col. George Wilson to Col. James Wilson—They set out for New Jersey—Their Terrible March—Their Condition on their Arrival at Headquarters—Hon. T. Pickering's Mention of their Distressful Condition—Change in the Officers of the Regiment—Return of June, 1777—Different Returns of 1777—Engagements of the Regiment—Their Losses and Casualties—Valley Forge—Regiment ordered to Pittsburgh in 1778—Col. Brodhead, with the Regiment, makes a detour up the West Branch—Remains of the Regiment stationed at Pittsburgh—Extracts from the Order-Book of the Regiment—Morgan's Rifle Regiment—Character and Object of the Organization—Its Officers—Their Services at Saratoga—Col. Richard Butler second in command—Capt. Van Swearingen—First Lieut. Basil Prather—Second Lieut. John Hardin—Anecdote of Van Swearingen—His Subsequent Career—Stony Point—Its Position and Importance—Washington determines to Capture it if possible—Confers with Gen. Wayne—Col. Richard Butler commands one of the Detachments who are detailed for this Service—They carry the Fort at the Point of the Bayonet—

Arthur St. Clair's first Services in the Revolution—Biographical Sketches of Col. Zeues Mackay—Of Col. Stephen Bayard—Of Lieut.-Col. George Wilson—Of Col. Daniel Brodhead—The Fighting Butlers: Thomas, Sr., Richard, William, Thomas, Jr., Percival—Other Members of the Butler Family—Anecdotes—Col. James Smith—Col. John Gibson.

On the 12th day of October, 1775, the Continental Congress passed a resolution requesting the Assembly or Committee of Safety of Pennsylvania to raise one battalion for the services of the United Colonies, on the same terms as those which had been ordered to be raised in New Jersey, and to be officered in like manner.

The captains were recommended by the Pennsylvania Assembly on the 25th of October, and commissioned by Congress on the 27th.

Capt. John Nelson, of Westmoreland County, having in the mean time enlisted a company of independent riflemen, composed for the most part of Westmorelanders, had offered his services to Congress. Congress thereupon, by a resolution dated Jan. 30, 1776, directs that,—

"Capt. Nelson's company of riflemen, now raised, consisting of one captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, and seventy privates, be enlisted for the service in Canada, on the same terms as the other troops ordered for that service."

It was ordered to New York, March 13, 1776. It was, by Gen. Arnold's orders, attached to Col. De Haas' battalion in Canada, and after De Haas' battalion left Ticonderoga, Nov. 17, 1776, it was attached to the Fourth Battalion, Col. Wayne's, and on the 24th of March, 1777, was attached to Col. Francis Johnston's Fifth Pennsylvania.

For the roll of this company see supplementary notes.¹ Their services in Canada will be recalled with that of the other Westmorelanders there under St. Clair. Some of these remained with the Fifth Regiment as it was organized on the Continental establishment, when they fought under the celebrated Richard Butler, then colonel of the regiment, and himself at that time a Westmorelander, but later, on the division of the county, a citizen of Fayette. Col. Butler was in command, under Wayne, in the campaign in the South, in the closing days of the war. They were engaged at Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, Stony Point, and Yorktown.

SECOND PENNSYLVANIA BATTALION.

The Second Pennsylvania Battalion was raised upon the authority of a resolution of Congress, dated 9th of December, 1775, which resolved "that an order issue for raising four battalions more in the colony of Pennsylvania, on the same terms as the one already raised." This was speedily done, and the men were enlisted for one year.

As this battalion was associated with the Fourth Battalion, Col. Wayne, and the Sixth, Col. William Irvine, while in active service, its history mingles with that of theirs.

¹ See Appendix "E."

On the 2d of January, 1776, the Council of Safety, which had been requested by Congress to do so, recommended Cols. St. Clair and Wayne as field-officers, and on the next day they were elected and commissioned by Congress. The lieutenant-colonels and the majors were chosen on the 4th, and a resolution passed that one company of each battalion consist of expert riflemen.

Arthur St. Clair had been busily engaged in organizing the raw levies of Pennsylvania prior to this time, and elsewhere we refer to his individual services more at length than here. But upon the organization of this contingent he was ordered to take part in the expedition to Canada, upon the results of which so much was expected and eloquently predicted.

Two companies from Westmoreland, composed of his friends, acquaintances, neighbors, and compatriots, accompanied him. One of these was under William Butler, his warm bosom friend, who shared with him the toils of the Revolutionary campaign, and who died second in command on the disastrous field on the 4th of November, 1791. The other company was commanded by Stephen Bayard, afterwards lieutenant-colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment in the line, the regiment which was distinctively the Westmoreland regiment.¹

Of the men themselves we shall have occasion to say more hereafter. At present we shall touch on the services of the battalion, and of the subsequent organizations into which the battalion was merged.

On the 16th of February, 1776, the Secret Committee of Congress was directed to furnish Col. St. Clair's battalion with arms, and to write to him to use the utmost diligence in getting his battalion ready, and to march the companies as fast as they were ready, one at a time, to Canada.

On the 13th of March, Lieut.-Col. Allen of the battalion had arrived in New York, and embarked some of the companies for Albany. He here received an order from Gen. Stirling to direct the rest of the companies to proceed to New York, where quarters would be found for them.

On the 6th of May, Lieut.-Col. Allen, with the Second, had passed Deschambault, in Canada, and was within three miles of Quebec, where he met Gen. Thomas with the army retreating from Quebec.

The expedition into Canada was a failure. After one of the most daring and energetic marches through the wilderness and into the very heart of the civilized portion of that province, and after the capture of their city and citadel, the inhabitants proved recreant, failed to rise up, as had been anticipated, and declare their independence of the British crown, and instead of turning upon the British troops they turned upon the Americans, whom they treated as invaders.

Under this state of affairs the Americans could not hold what they had captured. The army of the colonies, then in Canada, had begun their retreat towards the River Sorel. On the 15th of May, 1776, Thomas, the commander of the expedition now after the death of the young Montgomery, arrived at Three Rivers (Trois Rivieres). Here he had about eight hundred men. He left the command here to Col. Maxwell, and continued on to the Sorel. The River Sorel flows from Lake Champlain, in New York, to the St. Lawrence, in Canada. From his position here he issued an order to Maxwell to abandon Three Rivers. This Maxwell did, and with the rear of his army reached the line of the Sorel on the 24th of May, 1776.

Col. Thompson and Col. St. Clair crossed over from Chambly to Montreal, and left the latter place for the Sorel on the 16th. On the 24th, Gen. Thompson was in command there.

The British were in pursuit with a largely superior force. On the 2d of June, Gen. Thompson sent Col. St. Clair from Sorel with over six hundred men to attack the camp of Col. McLean, who had advanced as far as Three Rivers with eight hundred British regulars and Canadians. Gen. Sullivan was at Chambly on the 3d (June), and reached Sorel on the 4th. Gen. Thomas, the commander-in-chief, having died on the 2d, Sullivan assumed command on the fourth day after his arrival.

On the 6th, Gen. Sullivan ordered Gen. William Thompson to march, with Col. Irvine's and Col. Wayne's battalions, with the companies of Col. St. Clair's battalion which were then remaining at Sorel, and with them to join St. Clair at Nicolette, where he was to take command of the whole party, and, unless he found the number of the enemy at Three Rivers to be such as would render an attack upon them hazardous, he should cross the river at the most convenient place he could find and attack them. He advised not to attack if the prospect of success was not much in his favor, as a defeat of his party at the time might prove the total loss of that country.

Something further will be said in another place of the brilliant and entirely successful attack on Three Rivers, in which St. Clair distinguished himself. The imminent danger, the toil, the incessant labor, and the glory of that affair were partaken of and shared by those Westmorelanders who followed St. Clair and Butler; and this night foray and attack has been regarded and treated by all the historians who have written of the expedition to Canada as one of the most brilliant episodes of it.

The British army, however, were gradually pressing back the invaders. They, with an army much superior in numbers to the Americans, composed of regulars, Canadians, and Indians, were under the command of Burgoyne; ours was now under Sullivan.

When the great historical story of the Revolution shall have been written it will be seen that no campaign of the Seven Years' war was fuller of glory, of military heroism, of bravery, of instances of fortitude, or of hardships encountered and surpassed, and of obstacles overcome, than that expedition which, after having taken the capital of the British provinces in the north, walked backwards, their faces and their bayonets towards their enemies, through the winter snows, through the deep, dark wilderness, and through the marshes of Southern Canada and Northern New York.

¹ See Appendix "F" and "G."

The rear of the army, with baggage and stores, reached St. John's on the 18th of June (1776). They were embarked, and moved up the Sorel the same afternoon. The head of Burgoyne's column entered St. Johns on the evening of the 18th, and Gen. Philips' advance-guard on the morning of the 19th. On the 19th, general orders at Isle Aux Noix directed the commands of De Haas, Wayne, St. Clair, and Irvine to encamp on the east side of the island.

Isle Aux Noix proved very unhealthy. Many of the soldiers while there were down sick, and many died. On June 13th one woman from each company of the Pennsylvania battalions who had been left at Ticonderoga were drafted and immediately sent to the general hospital at Fort George to nurse the sick.

On the 27th of June, at Isle La Motte, all the army took vessels for Crown Point, which they reached on the 1st of July (1776). Gen. Horatio Gates arrived here on the evening of the 5th, superseding Gen. Sullivan in command. On the 7th, at a council of war, it was determined to remove the army to Ticonderoga. The battalions of Cols. De Haas, St. Clair, and Wayne arrived there on the 10th.

The army was brigaded by Gen. Gates on the 20th, and the four Pennsylvania battalions were made the Fourth Brigade, Col. Arthur St. Clair commanding.

On August 24th, St. Clair's battalion numbered 429 rank and file, 161 sick, total officers and men 485.

On the 6th of September (1776), Lieut.-Col. Hartley, who was in command at Crown Point, desired Gen. Gates to send him either Gen. Wayne's battalion or the Second—St. Clair's—and he would defend it with them against any attack whatever from the enemy. But Gates gave him positive orders to retreat if the British reached that point.

But the season was too far advanced for the British to make any further progress. After threatening Ticonderoga they retired into winter-quarters.

On the 18th of November, Gen. Gates, putting Gen. Wayne in command of Ticonderoga, proceeded with the larger part of his army to join Washington. The three Pennsylvania battalions whose time would expire on the 5th day of January, 1777, agreed to remain until they were relieved by other troops. On the 29th of November the Second, commanded now by Col. Wood, numbered four hundred and twenty-six officers and men.

On the 4th of December, Col. Wayne writes to the Committee of Safety:

"The wretched condition the battalions are now in for want of almost every necessary, except flour and bad beef, is shocking to humanity, and beggars all description. We have neither beds or bedding for our sick to lay on or under other than their own clothing, no medicine or regimen suitable for them; the dead and dying lying mingled together in our hospital, or rather house of carnage, is no uncommon sight. They are objects truly worthy of your notice, as well as of your most obedient, humble servant, Ant'y Wayne."

On the 24th of January, 1777, the Second Battalion left Ticonderoga, with Gen. Wayne, for their homes.

Many of the privates of the Second re enlisted in the Third Pennsylvania Regiment.

While these companies were at Ticonderoga, the Declaration of Independence, which had been passed on the Fourth of July, was read to the men drawn up in line on the morning of the 17th. By them it was received with loud cheers. Lieut.-Col. Allen, of the Second Battalion, left the service on account of the Declaration. He, however, afterwards again entered it.

THIRD PENNSYLVANIA REGIMENT.

The Third Pennsylvania Regiment in the Continental line was formed on the basis of Col. St. Clair's Second Battalion, in which were the two original companies of Capt. Butler and Capt. Bayard.

It was recruited in December, 1776, and January and February, 1777, and arranged in the Continental service March 12, 1777. The compilers of the New Series of Pennsylvania Archives state that no returns of this regiment have been found, and, with the exception of a few letters that incidentally relate to the regiment, nothing exists upon which to base an account at length.

The health of Col. Joseph Wood, who was in command of the battalion, was impaired by wounds received in the Canada campaign, and this induced his resignation.

After Capt. Butler accepted the position of lieutenant-colonel in Morgan's rifle regiment, the command of his company devolved on Capt. James Chrystie, who succeeded him.

Col. Thomas Craig succeeded to the command of the regiment, retiring only in January, 1783.

By the various arrangements in the Continental establishment, the different companies were from time to time transferred to other regiments, and the officers were given different commands.

Most of Capt. Butler's men re-enlisted under Capt. James Christie into the Third Pennsylvania. We gather these facts from a "Memorial of the Third and Ninth Pennsylvania Regiments,"¹ dated Lancaster, 3d February, 1778, and addressed to the president and members of the Executive Council, and their services may be traced up in the context. The paper set forth that they, the captains in their respective regiments, reported agreeably to instructions, and that they laid before that body the distressed situation of their corps for want of every article of clothing; the men were barefooted, naked, and miserable beyond expression, several brave soldiers having nothing else than a piece of old tent to shield them from the inclemency of the season, and not more than one blanket to six or perhaps eight men. Very few, indeed, were in anywise fit for duty, the clothing of both officers and men having been lost in the course of the campaign, particularly twice, in consequence of general orders for storing them at Concord and at Wilmington, and their blankets lost in the several actions they had had with the enemy. These regiments, with the Sixth and Twelfth Pennsylvania Regiments, were attached to a division composed chiefly of Jersey troops, under the command of general officers not belonging to the State, and these general officers were allowed to have a preference to soldiers from their own State.

¹ In Pennsylvania Archives, Second Series, vol. iii. p. 169.

We have also noticed that Capt. Samuel Miller and Adj. Crawford, from the Eighth Regiment, and Col. Brodhead were ordered on recruiting service from camp at Valley Forge, Feb. 10, 1778. The stations for the recruiting-officers in Westmoreland were at Capt. Francis Moor's, Capt. James Carnahan's, and Lieut. Joseph Brownlee's. The recruits were ordered twenty dollars bounty by Congress, and one hundred dollars by the State, and the county furnishing the recruits had to furnish the money to pay them.

The most of these men who went out at the first call and survived either remained in the Continental service till the war was over, or, coming back here after they were discharged from the command of Col. Brodhead, took part in the defense of the frontier. This they did by enlisting in the militia for short campaigns, or by joining independent companies of rangers for the protection of the posts.

On the 17th of January, 1781, the Third was reorganized under Col. Craig, and after recruiting at Easton, accompanied Gen. Wayne upon the Southern campaign.

Of the officers of the regiment whose names we are familiar with as Westmorelanders are Capt. James Chrystie, Capt. Thomas Butler, Lieut. Daniel St. Clair, Capt. Samuel Brady, Lieut. Ebenezer Denny, besides Col. Richard Butler and Lieut.-Col. Stephen Bayard.

Capt. James Chrystie (sometimes the name appears as "Christy") was born near Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1750; came to Pennsylvania in 1755, and settled in Westmoreland before the Revolution, and there he died. On the discovery of Arnold's plot at West Point, he was detailed specially by Gen. Washington to visit all the posts. He served until the end of the war, and was said to be the oldest captain in service except one. He was the father of Lieut.-Col. James Chrystie, of the Fifteenth United States Infantry, who distinguished himself at Queenstown in the war of 1812. They were both dead in 1824.

Capt. Thomas Butler, at the battle of Brandywine, received the thanks of Gen. Washington on the field for rallying a detachment of retreating troops. He was major at St. Clair's defeat, and had his leg broken by a ball, and it was with difficulty that his surviving brother, Capt. Edward Butler, got him off the field. In 1794 he was promoted lieutenant-colonel commandant to sub-legion, and in 1802, on reduction of the army, he was continued as colonel. He died Sept. 7, 1805, aged fifty-one.

Daniel St. Clair, son of Arthur St. Clair, died in Mifflin County, Feb. 13, 1833. Of those others we shall recall them again.

PENNSYLVANIA RIFLE REGIMENT.

The Pennsylvania Rifle Regiment and the Pennsylvania Regiment of Musketry were embodied strictly for the defense of the Province of Pennsylvania by the House of Representatives, at the suggestion of the Committee of Safety.

The House acted promptly in considering the matter, and on the 4th of March, 1776, appointed a committee to prepare an estimate of the expense of levying a body of one thousand five hundred men, victualing and paying them for one year.

On the 5th of March, on the report of the committee, the House resolved to levy and to take into pay fifteen hundred men, officers included, and that the men be enlisted to serve until the first day of January, 1778, subject to be discharged at any time upon the advance of a month's pay to each man.

On the 6th of March they determined that one thousand of the levies should be riflemen, divided into two battalions of five hundred men each, the remainder to be a battalion of musketmen. The two rifle battalions were to have one colonel, each battalion to consist of six companies, to be officered with one lieutenant-colonel, one major, six captains, eight lieutenants, etc., and the battalion of musketmen to consist of eight companies, officered by a colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, eight captains, etc.

Samuel Miles was commissioned colonel of the rifle companies, and Samuel Atlee colonel of the battalion of musketmen. Nearly the whole of the rifle regiment was raised in about six weeks, and rendezvoused at Marcus Hook for service under Washington, who then had possession of New York and Long Island.

To this rifle regiment belonged the company of Capt. Joseph Erwin, which was raised in Westmoreland, and contained some of the best fighting blood there. This company joined the regiment at Marcus Hook. They were two years' men. Erwin was appointed captain on the 9th of March, 1776, and his commission, as were those of all the other officers, was dated on the 6th of April, 1776.¹

The company served in this regiment until it was transferred to the Thirteenth Pennsylvania, from which it was transferred to the Second Pennsylvania, and was finally discharged at Valley Forge, Jan. 1,

¹ See Appendix "H."

1778, by reason of the expiration of its term of enlistment.

On the 2d of July, 1776, the rifle regiment to which they belonged was ordered up to Philadelphia, and on the 4th one battalion, under Lieut.-Col. Brodhead, ordered to Bordentown, N. J., and on the 5th the whole regiment marched for Trenton, and from thence to Amboy, on the eastern shore of Jersey, under orders to join Gen. Mercer. This it accomplished on the 16th.

Col. Atlee's battalion arrived on the beach at Amboy on the 21st. Col. Miles was ordered over to New York on the 10th of August, and Col. Atlee on the 11th. On the 12th they were brigaded with Grover's and Smallwood's regiment, under the command of Brigadier Lord Stirling.

On the landing of the British army on Long Island, which they did in great force and in brilliant martial array, Col. Miles was ordered with his rifle regiment to watch their motions. He took up a position near the village of Flatbush, where the Highlanders then lay, but these moving away the next morning after to Lord Howe's camp their place was supplied with the Hessians.

On the 27th of August, 1776, was fought the battle of Long Island, so disastrous to the Americans. There Howe, Clinton, Cornwallis, Von Heister, with the most perfectly equipped and appointed army then in the world, the largest British army that ever appeared in the field against the Americans, composed of regulars, marines, Hessians, and sailors, ten to one, sometimes twenty to one, circled round, attacked and drove in the ragged, ill-fed Continentals and militia under Washington, Stirling, Putnam, Sullivan, and Miles.

At one time in this engagement Col. Miles' two battalions of riflemen (to which belonged the Westmorelanders under Erwin), Col. Willis' Connecticut, and a part of Col. Lutz's battalion of the Pennsylvania Flying Camp were opposed to the whole body of the British army, it being round them in a contracting circle, from which they fought their way back with loss but with untarnished glory.¹

The bravery of the men under Brodhead is spoken of with pride in Col. Miles' report of that engagement, and particularly when they succeeded in pushing their way across a mill-dam under a heavy fire, in which some were shot and others drowned, but which did not deter the rest from rushing on and driving the Hessians before them at the point of the bayonet.

That whole battle, as it raged round the Pennsylvania militia at that point, is graphically told by Col. Miles in his report. He says,—

"The main body of the enemy, under the immediate command of Gen. Howe, lay about two miles to my left, and Gen. Grant, with another body of British troops, lay about four miles on my right. There were several small bodies of Americans dispersed to my right, but not a man to my left, although the main body of the enemy lay to my left. This was our situation on the 26th of August. About one o'clock at night, Gen. Grant on the right and Gen. Howe on my left began their march, and by daylight Grant had got within a mile of our intrenchments, and Gen. Howe had got into the Jamaica road, about two miles from our lines. The Hessians kept their position until seven in the morning. As soon as they moved the firing began at our redoubt."

He thus closes his report :

"Finding that the enemy had possession of the ground between us and our lines, and that it was impossible to cut our way through as a body, I directed the men to make the best of their way as well as they could; some few got in safe, but there were 159 taken prisoners. I was myself entirely cut off from our lines, and therefore endeavored to conceal myself with a few men who would not leave me. I hoped to remain until night, when I intended to try to get to Hell Gate and cross the Sound; but about 3 o'clock in the afternoon was discovered by a party of Hessians and obliged to surrender. Thus ended the career of that day."²

In the action of the 27th of August the rifle regiment and musketry battalion were so broken up that Gen. Washington ordered the three battalions to be considered as a regiment under the command of Lieut.-Col. Brodhead,—the lieutenant-colonel of the rifles,—until further orders.

On Thursday, September 19th, the three battalions mutinied and appeared on the parade under arms. After this many of them deserted in parties with their arms. "Their complaints were want of pay, want of clothes, the want of blankets, and the not receiving the particular species of rations; . . . a very great cause of desertion was owing to the loss of their field-officers." But of these deserters, many of whom subsequently returned and did good service, few if any were Westmorelanders.³

By a return dated Sept. 27, 1776, the three battalions were then in Gen. Mifflin's brigade and stationed at Mount Washington.

On the 5th of October the Council of Safety determined that the three battalions should be arranged as follows: two were to be on the Continental establishment, and to serve during the war, the other to be retained in the service of the State until the 1st of January, 1778, unless sooner discharged. This last was to consist of ten companies of one hundred men each, officers included. This they intended ordering home as soon as the condition of the Continental army would admit of it, as they were by arrangement to keep twelve complete battalions in the Continental

² Idem.

FROM COL. ATLEE'S JOURNAL, Penn. Archives, N. S., vol. i., p. 515 :

"I fully expected, as did my officers, that the strength of the British army was advancing in this quarter with intention to have taken this Rout to our Lines, but how greatly were we deceived when intelligence was received that the Centre, composed of the Hessians and the Right wing, were rapidly advancing by our Rear, and that we were nearly surrounded.

"This we were soon convinced of by an exceeding heavy Fire about a mile in our Rear, no Troops being in that Quarter to oppose the march of this Grand Body of the British Army but Col. Miles' 2 Battalions of Rifle men, Col. Willis' Regt. of Connecticut, and a part of Lutz's Battalion of Penna. Flying Camp."

See also Col. Miles' Journal, Penn. Arch., N. S., pp. 1-522.

³ Many marked in some of the old lists as deserters were long after drawing pensions.—See Penn. Arch., New Series, iii. p. 197, et seq.

¹ Journal of Col. Samuel Miles; Penn. Arch., 2d series, vol. i. p. 517, etc.

service. This regiment was thereafter known as "The Pennsylvania State Regiment of Foot."

On the 25th of October, Capt. Erwin's company, which remained in the State establishment, was consolidated under an arrangement then made with other companies, and some of the officers of that company were promoted and transferred to other regiments. Those promoted mostly went into the Continental establishment. But the remains of these battalions thus consolidated followed the fortunes of the Continental army. They served in nearly all the battles of the campaign of 1777.

STATE REGIMENT OF FOOT.

In April, 1777, the Pennsylvania State Regiment of Foot, founded upon the remains of Miles' and Atlee's battalions as a nucleus, was supplied with field- and staff-officers.

The remains of Capt. Erwin's company, under James Carnahan, who had been promoted captain from first lieutenant, was connected with this regiment until the campaign of 1777 was over and the army entered Valley Forge. Erwin had been promoted to a captaincy in the Ninth Pennsylvania in the regular line.

We give the roll of Capt. Carnahan's company as it was mustered at Red Bank, May 9, 1777.¹

Of this regiment John Bull was appointed colonel, Lewis Farmer lieutenant-colonel, and John Murray first major, on May 2, 1777. On the 2d of June, 1777, the regiment was stationed at Fort Mercer.

On the 6th the Supreme Executive Council presented a memorial to the Assembly stating that—

"As Congress had allotted twelve regiments to be raised in Pennsylvania, and has called for a return of the regiments, it was their opinion that it would be imprudent to put into the Continental service and pay the battalion now called 'The State Battalion,' which has been raised chiefly out of the remains of the battalions lately under the command of Col. Proctor, and the company under the command of Capt. Pugh, raised for guarding the Powder Mill."

In compliance with this memorial the Assembly, on the 10th of June, 1777, transferred this regiment, with the artillery company and regiment and company mentioned, to the Continental Congress.

When Col. Bull was appointed adjutant-general of the State, June 17, 1777, Col. Stewart succeeded him in command of the regiment.

Capt. Carnahan's company was the tenth in a return of the regiment on the 20th of June.

Col. Walter Stewart took command on the 6th of July, 1777, and commanded the regiment at Brandywine and at Germantown, where its loss was 16 killed and 22 wounded.

By resolution of Congress, Nov. 12, 1777, Col. Stewart's regiment was to be annexed to the Pennsylvania line and form the Thirteenth Regiment, The Thirteenth in the Continental line was under Col. Stewart from Nov. 12, 1777, to July 1, 1778; but it was known as early as July 6, 1777, as the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Regiment. Although the regiment was incorporated into the Second Pennsylvania on the 3d of April, 1778, the arrangement did not go into effect until July 1, 1778.

Capt. James Carnahan was then transferred to the Eighth Pennsylvania.²

As there were some Westmorelanders in Capt. Scott's company in this regiment, we give the company roll.³

THE SECOND PENNSYLVANIA REGIMENT.

The Second Pennsylvania Regiment was in the Continental service from October, 1776, to Nov. 3, 1783. The names of those Westmorelanders who were of this regiment appear on its returns during the latter part of the war, they being transferred on enlisting for the war to that regiment. Most of the Westmorelanders who fought and fell as privates in the latter and closing campaigns of the war were with this regiment, and the list, imperfect as it is, contains many names familiar to the last generation, who passed their last days here. They were under Wayne and Greene in the South, and took part in the engagements in North and South Carolina, at Guilford Court-House, at Ninety-Six, and at Yorktown. There are no complete lists of this regiment; those which were in existence were destroyed by the fire at the city of Washington, and by the burning of the public buildings, when the city was captured by the British in 1814.

CONGRESS AND THE WESTERN INDIANS.

When the Revolution commenced the most apparent danger menacing our people was from the Indians, although a perpetual menace was maintained by the intrigues of the British in Canada, they waiting for the most favorable opportunity to invade that part of the colony west of Laurel Hill. It was the daring ambition of Connolly to wrest from the colonies the western parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia. In an effort to do so the objective-point must be Pittsburgh. When it was seen that the inhabitants of these parts were not disloyally inclined, and that the plan itself was impracticable, the British resorted to control the Indians to their advantage, at the same time calling to mind the deep-seated enmity between them and the border settlers of Virginia. The most warful tribes at this time occupied the river borders of Ohio, and the hunting-grounds and fishing-places of the Northwestern Territory, having been driven thither by long wars, by specious treaties, and by their natural instincts.

Congress early perceived the necessity of securing the alliance of the tribes, or at least of effecting their neutrality. In April, 1776, Col. George Morgan was appointed Indian agent for the Middle Department of the United States, with headquarters fixed at Pittsburgh. Trouble was apprehended, and in the fall of 1776 a committee appointed by Congress, and stopping there for that purpose, came to the conclusion that an Indian war with the colonists was inevitable, tracing the immediate causes of it to the unbounded influence of the British Governor Hamilton over the Shawanese and Delawares. This committee recommended that all the militia that could be spared go into garrison at Fort Pitt, and that the line of forts long before erected by the French, and after them held by the English, be manned and armed.

² Capt. James Carnahan was drowned in the Allegheny River, 1786-87; he was father of the late Dr. Carnahan, president of Princeton College.

³ See Appendix "K."

¹ See Appendix "L."

EIGHTH PENNSYLVANIA REGIMENT.

The Eighth Pennsylvania was thereupon raised under authority of a resolution of Congress, dated July 15, 1776, for the defense of the western frontier, to garrison the ports of Presque Isle, Le Bœuf, and Kittanning. It was to consist of seven companies from Westmoreland and one from Bedford. On July 20, 1776, the Convention of Pennsylvania, then sitting, having recommended for field-officers Col. Eneas Mackay (written McCoy), Lieut.-Col. George Wilson, and Maj. Richard Butler, they were elected by Congress. Congress having resolved that the committees of the counties in which the companies were to be raised should name the company officers, and they having named them, Congress, Sept. 14, 1776, accepted them, and ordered commissions. On the 23d of September, Congress elected David McClure chaplain, and Ephraim Douglas quartermaster. Nov. 23, 1776, Congress directed the Board of War to order the regiment to march with all possible expedition, by the nearest route, to Brunswick, N. J., or to join Gen. Washington wherever he might be.

The regiment on being raised was mustered in at Pittsburgh, and remained on duty along the frontier of Pennsylvania during that summer and the early part of the fall. But when the American army under Washington, greatly diminished in numbers, prepared to face the large levies landed at New York from England, there was a wild cry to forward all troops that could be spared to the front.

When the orders from the Board of War were received by Col. Mackay, the larger portion of the regiment was stationed at Kittanning. Under date "Kittanning, the 5th December, 1776," Col. Mackay writes to the President of the Board of War:

"SIR,—I last night received your order from the Honorable the Board of War, in consequence of which I have this day issued the necessary orders, and shall march with all possible dispatch to the place directed. . . . I have ordered a general rendezvous on the 15th instant, at a proper place, and from thence shall proceed as ordered. As I would not choose that the battalion should labor under every disadvantage when at Brunswick, being now in need of everything, I shall be obliged to make Philadelphia my route in order to be supplied."

In the day-book of the company, which subsequently fell into the hands of Judge Veech, under date of Dec. 5, 1776, is this entry: "This day received intelligence for the battalion to march to Amboy."

The crotchety Scotch-Irishman, George Wilson, lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, of the same date, writes the following to Col. James Wilson.¹ We preserve all the characteristics of the letter:

"KETANIAN, Decr. 5th, 1776.

"DR. COLONAL: Last Evening we Recd Marching orders, Which I must say is not Disagreeable to me under y^e Circumstances of y^e times, for when I enterd into y^e Service I Judged that if a necessity appeared to call us Below, it would be Don, therefore it Dont come on me By Surprise; But as Both y^e officers and men understood they Were Raised for y^e Defence of y^e Western frontiers, and their familys and substance to be left in so Defenceless a situation in their absence, seems to Give Sensible trouble, altho I Hope We Will Get over it, By leaving sum of ower trifling Officers Behind who Pirtend to Have more Witt than seven men that can Render a Reason. We are ill Provided for a March at this season, But there is nothing hard under snm Circumstances. We Hope Provision Will be made for us Below, Blankets, Campe Kittles, tents, arms, Regementals, etc., that we may not Cut a Dispisable figure, But may be Enabled to answer y^e expectation of ower Countre.

"I Have Warnley Recommended to y^e Officers to lay aside all Personall Resentments at this time, for that it would be construed By y^e World that they made use of that Circumstance to Hide themselves under from y^e cause & y^e countrie, and I hope it Will have a Good Effect at this time. We have ished y^e Necessery orders, and appointed y^e owt Parties to Rendezvous at Hanows Town, y^e 15th instant, and to March Emedly from there. We have Recommended it to y^e Militia to Station One Hundred Men at this post untill further orders.

"I Hope to have y^e Pleasure of Seeing y^e Soon, as we mean to take Philadelphia in ower Rout. In y^e mean time, I am, With Esteem, your Harty Wellwisher and Hble Sert.
G. WILSON."

Up until the 5th of December, 1779, the regiment is styled in the receipts "the Battalion commanded by Col. Eneas Mackay." In those of Dec. 5, 1776, it is first styled "The Eighth Battalion of Penna. troops in the Continental service."

The regiment marched from Kittanning on the 6th of January, 1777, and entered upon that wonderful march across the mountains of Pennsylvania, over the Delaware, into New Jersey in the depth of the winter. From this they suffered more terribly than from any battle. Some died on their march. When they came to Trenton Col. Mackay died, and at Quibbletown, N. J., their lieutenant-colonel, Wilson, died. Here the men were down with fevers and putrid sore throat, contracted from the exposure of their terrible march.²

In the "Life of Timothy Pickering," vol. i. p. 122, is the following reference to the Eighth Pennsylvania:

"MARCH 1, 1777, SATURDAY.

"DR. PUTNAM brought me a billet, of which the following is a copy: "DEAR SIR,—Our Battalion is so unfortunate as not to have a Doctor, and, in my opinion, dying for want of medicine. I beg you will come down to-morrow morning and visit the sick of my compauy, for that favor you shall have sufficient satisfaction from your humble servant, James Pigott, Capt. of 8 Batt. of Pa., Quibbletown, feb. 28, 1777."

"I desired the Dr. by all means to visit them. They were raised about the Ohio, and had travelled near five hundred miles, as one of the soldiers who came for the Dr. informed me, for 150 miles over mountains, never entering a house, but building fires and encamping in the Snow. Considerable numbers unused to such hardships have since died. The Colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel among the dead. The Dr. informed me he found them quartered in cold shattered houses," etc.

¹ Archives, Second Series, x. p. 641.

² See sketch of Col. Eneas Mackay, infra.

Col. Mackay and Lieut.-Col. Wilson having died, under the arrangement of March 12, 1777, Daniel Brodhead became colonel, Richard Butler lieutenant-colonel, and Stephen Bayard major.¹

When Morgan's rifle command was organized, Lieut.-Col. Butler was made lieutenant-colonel of it, and Maj. James Ross, of the First Pennsylvania Regiment, became lieutenant-colonel of the Eighth in place of Butler.

According to a return signed by the latter June 9, 1777, the number of men enlisted between the 9th of August and the 16th of December, 1776, was six hundred and thirty; enlisted since the 16th of December, 1776, thirty-four; making a total of six hundred and eighty-four. The strength of the respective companies then were:

	Sergts.	Rank and File.
Capt. David Kilgore.....	3	55
Capt. Samuel Miller.....	4	82
Capt. Van Swearingen.....	3	71
Capt. James Pigott.....	4	56
Capt. Wendell Ourry.....	4	54
Capt. Andrew Mann.....	4	58
Capt. James Montgomery.....	2	57
Capt. Michael Huffnagle.....	4	70
Capt. Lieut. John Finley.....	2	77
Capt. Lieut. Basil Prather.....	3	69

From the total thirty-six were deducted as prisoners of war, fourteen missing, fifty-one dead, fifteen discharged, one hundred and twenty-six deserted. Lieut. Matthew Jack, absent from April 13th, wounded; Ensign Gabriel Peterson, absent from April 17th, wounded; Capt. Moses Carson, deserted April 21st; First Lieut. Richard Carson, deserted; Aquilla White, ensign, deserted February 23d; Joseph McDolo, first lieutenant, deserted; Thomas Forthay, ensign, deserted; Alexander Simrall, second lieutenant, cashiered; David McKee, ensign, dismissed the service; Ephraim Douglas, quartermaster, taken by the enemy March 18th.

It is a fact well known that the term deserted, as marked on the old military rolls, goes for very little, as in most cases those marked as deserters returned and did active and good service, and afterwards, if living, drew pensions, and their names are found on the pension-lists. It was a custom in the Continental army for the soldiers from time to time to take unceremonious leave, and again return to duty.

A return dated Nov. 1, 1777, shows the strength of the regiment present: Colonel, major, 2 captains, 6 lieutenants, adjutant, paymaster and surgeon, sergeant-major, quartermaster-sergeant and drum-major, 29 sergeants, 9 drums and fifes, 112 rank and file fit for duty, 28 sick present, 77 sick absent, 139 on command,—total, 351. Prisoners of war, 1 sergeant and 58 privates. Capt. Van Swearingen, Lieut. Basil Prather, and Lieut. John Hardin on command with Col. Morgan. Vacant offices: lieutenant-colonel, 4 captains, 2 lieutenants, 8 ensigns, chaplain, and surgeon's mate. Lieut.-Col. Ross resigned after the battles of Brandywine and Germantown.

The regiment suffered severely at Bound Brook, where Maj. Gen. Lincoln, with five hundred men, was attacked by Cornwallis. Some of them also sustained the charge of the bayonets of the British grenadiers at Paoli. They were in the battles of Ash Swamp, at Brandywine, and Germantown.

The regiment was, as all regiments in the line were, from time to time broken and separated. Some of the officers were transferred to other regiments; so also were some of the privates upon re-enlistment. The service of those who participated with Morgan at Saratoga, and with Wayne at Stony Point, shall not be forgotten. Most of them, however, came together again before Valley Forge. When the regiment was ordered to the West, a great portion of those who had enlisted for the war were then assigned to other commands.

On the 5th of March, 1778, the regiment was ordered to Pittsburgh for the defense of the western frontiers. This was necessary by reason of the hostile actions of the Indians and the British military garrison in the Northwest, who controlled them and co-operated with them.

By directions of Gen. McIntosh, Col. Brodhead, about the 12th of July, made a detour up the West Branch to check the savages who were ravaging Wyoming and the West Branch Valley. Of this expedition we give some account later on. But on the 24th he was at Muncy, in Northumberland County, and had ordered Capt. Finley's company into Penn's Valley, where two of the latter's soldiers, Thomas Van Doren and Jacob Shedacre, who had participated in the campaign against Burgoyne under Morgan, were

¹ See Appendix "L."

BOARD OF WAR TO COL. DANIEL BRODHEAD.

"PENNA. BOARD OF WAR, PHILA., March 31, 1777.

"SIR,—By a letter from his excellency General Washington we are informed that, viz.: 'By the promotion of Major Butler, and death of the Colonel and Lieutenant-Colonel, the Eighth Regiment of your State is left without a Field-Officer, I must therefore desire that you will order the three new Field-Officers to join immediately, for I can assure you that no regiment in the Service wants them more from the dissensions that have lately prevailed in that Corps, discipline has been much relaxed, and it will require strict care and attention to both Officers and Men to bring them back to a proper sense of subordination and duty.

"You are therefore ordered to repair to your regiment immediately, and lest there should be any uncertainty of your receiving this order we have dispatched a special messenger with it, and we can have no doubt of your complying punctually herewith, as the public Service requires it.

"By order of the Board, . . .

"OWEN BIDDLE, Chairman."

Col. Brodhead left Reading, Berks Co., April 2, 1777, to join his regiment.—Archives, v. 283.

To settle the question of precedence in reference to the officers of the Ninth Regiment, the four oldest commissioned captains made an arrangement satisfactory to themselves, and making a statement of this to the President of the Council, Aug. 4, 1777, from camp at Germantown, prayed the Council that the arrangement stand, and that any antedated commission under specious pretensions might not supersede theirs. The dates of their former commissions and their rank in the regular service of the State were as follows:

Joseph Erwin, captain, April 6, 1776.

Joseph McClellan, captain, July 15, 1776.

Thomas B. Bowen, eldest lieutenant in three battalions, April 6, 1776.

John Davis, lieutenant, April 6, 1776.—Archives, v. 483.

killed that day, in sight of Potter's Fort, by the Indians. Soon after Col. Hartley with his regiment relieved Col. Brodhead, and he proceeded with the Eighth to Pittsburgh.

Capt. Matthew Jack, in a statement on file, says,—

"They were stationed at Bound Brook, New Jersey, in the winter and spring of 1777, where the British attacked and defeated it [the regiment] with the loss of a number of men. In the year 1778 it was sent to Pittsburgh, to guard the frontier, and placed under the command of General McIntosh. That they went down to the mouth of the Beaver and there built Fort McIntosh, and from that went, upon McIntosh's command, to the head of the Muskingum, and there built Fort Laurens. In the year 1779 went up the Allegheny on Gen. Brodhead's expedition, attacked the Indians and defeated them and burned their towns. On the return of the regiment, its time having expired, it was discharged at Pittsburgh."

The following extracts are from the order-book before referred to :

"August 28, at Bedford, William Graham, brigade major.

"November 2, Capt. Joseph Finley to act as brigade major in Graham's absence.

"At Tuscarawas (Fort Laurens, Ohio), November 21, court-martial ordered, Maj. Frederick Vernon president, to try Capt. Thomas Cook. Tried, not guilty.

"November 25, Capt. Basil Prather, for good conduct yesterday, allowed to hunt with any three men he chooses.

"December 31, at Fort McIntosh. As the Eighth Regiment is deficient in subalterns, the Gen. appoints sergeants John Guthrie, John Clark, Thomas Wiatt, and James Morrison to be ensigns."

During 1779 and 1781 portions of the Ninth and Thirteenth Virginia Regiments were stationed at Fort Pitt. In these two regiments and the Eighth Pennsylvania there were many court-martials. Of the Eighth, Isaac Alkin, theft, guilty, fifty lashes; James Maxwell, refusal to do duty, to ride a wooden horse ten minutes, with a musket to each foot; Edward Wilkie, many offenses, one hundred lashes, and to be drummed out of the regiment as a vagabond, not to appear again on pain of death; Thomas Kelly, five hundred lashes, surgeon to attend the execution.

In a letter from Gen. William Irvine to Gen. Washington, soon after he took command at Fort Pitt, dated Dec. 2, 1781, he says,—

"I have re-formed the remains of the Eighth Penn. into two companies, and call them a detachment from the Penna. Line, to be commanded by Lt. Col. Bayard."

The regiment was kept up by recruits from Westmoreland County until the close of the war.

MORGAN'S RIFLE REGIMENT.

Of the heroes of the Revolutionary war who have in American literature been accorded a full measure of fame, the name of Daniel Morgan, "the wagoner of the Jerseys," the commander of the celebrated "Morgan's Rifles," and the hero of Cowpens, stands conspicuous. Nor has his fame undergone diminution, for it was but the other day that around the memorial statue erected by a grateful commonwealth to commemorate its gratitude to him and his compatriots as to its deliverers the high official dignitaries of the States which had belonged to the original confederation stood with uncovered heads.

It is, however, not generally known in history how much Pennsylvania, and especially the Westmorelanders of the Eighth Regiment, had to do with the historic actions of the justly renowned Rifles. The glory which that corps won in the campaign in the North should be equally divided between Pennsylvania and Virginia, and not given entirely to the latter State, for the corps has usually been regarded as a Virginia corps.

"Morgan's Rifles," as it was usually designated, or "Morgan's Partisan Corps," as it was officially known, was a rifle corps organized by Gen. Washington himself, of which Daniel Morgan, of Virginia, was made colonel; Col. Richard Butler, of the Ninth Pennsylvania, lieutenant-colonel; and Capt. Joseph Morris, of New Jersey, major.

These officers were personally known to Washington, and were indeed on familiar terms with him, as familiar as any man could get to be. His splendid judgment of military character and talent was evinced in the selection of these officers.

This Richard Butler was promoted from major of the Eighth Pennsylvania to lieutenant-colonel and transferred to the First Pennsylvania, and from that regiment was transferred to Morgan's Rifles.

This corps was made up of chosen marksmen, picked out and drafted from the whole army.

Gen. Wilkinson, in his "Memoirs," has a return of Morgan's corps. According to this return the third company was commanded by Capt. Knox (who won promotion and distinction under Wayne at Stony Point), and the fifth company by Capt. Van Swearingen, of the Eighth Pennsylvania. Of Virginians there were 163; of Pennsylvanians, 193; and of Marylanders, 65. There were in all, including sick and absentees, 508. Thus there were more Pennsylvanians in the regiment than of any other State.

There were no better soldiers in the Continental army than the soldiers who made up the command of Morgan and Butler, and they have been highly praised by all historians. Of their services at Stillwater, otherwise Saratoga, Bancroft, in his "History of the United States," says,—

"In concurrence with the advice of Arnold, Gates ordered out Morgan's riflemen and the light infantry. They put a picket to flight at a quarter past one, but retired before the division of Burgoyne. Lending his force unmolested through the woods, and securing his right by thickets and ravines, Morgan next fell unexpectedly upon the left of the British centre division. To support him Gates, at two o'clock, sent out three New Hampshire battalions, of which that of Scammel met the enemy in front, that of Cillee took them in flank. In a warm engagement Morgan had his horse shot under him, and with his riflemen captured a cannon, but could not carry it off."

Gen. Lee, in his "Memoirs of the Revolutionary War in the Southern States," speaks of Col. Richard Butler as "the renowned second and rival of Morgan in the Saratoga encounters."

Capt. Van Swearingen, First Lieut. Basil Prather, and Second Lieut. John Hardin, with their commands, were also with Morgan, and greatly distin-gushed themselves in the series of encounters which resulted in the surrender of Burgoyne. Their commands, as we before have said, consisted of picked men out of all the companies of the Eighth Regiment.

Van Swearingen, as the editors of the Archives remark, was probably the most noted captain in the Eighth Pennsylvania. On the 9th of September (1777) he and a lieutenant and twenty privates were captured in a sudden dash that scattered Morgan's men. He fell into the hands of the Indians who were attached to the British army in this campaign, but was rescued by Gen. Fraser's "batman" (one who takes care of his officer's horse), who took him before the general. The latter interrogated him concerning the number of the American army, but got no answer, except that it was commanded by Gens. Gates and Arnold. He then threatened to hang him. "You may, if you please," said Van Swearingen. Fraser then rode off, leaving him in care of Sergt. Dunbar, who consigned him to Lieut. Aubrey, who ordered him to be placed among the other prisoners, with directions not to be ill treated. Van Swearingen, after Burgoyne's army removed to Virginia, made especial exertions to have Dunbar and Aubrey exchanged.

Immediately, as Gen. Fraser rode on, he was shot by Timothy Murphy, a Pennsylvanian from Northumberland County, of Capt. Parr's company, by Col. Morgan's express direction. This circumstance in all probability saved Van Swearingen's life.

If we knew all the military career of Van Swearingen we should probably say that he was one of the model soldiers of the Continental army. We know that he was brave, fearless, determined, patriotic, had the gift of continuance; encouraged by his voice and means the cause of independence; one who was as much a hero at Valley Forge as at Saratoga. In fixing the date of the death of Maj. Morris, which otherwise was uncertain, we read this:

"It appears from a correspondence in one of the Philadelphia papers of the day, describing a performance gotten up at Valley Forge by Van Swearingen and Hardin, in which their dead compeers of Stillwater were made actors, that Maj. Morris was killed in some engagement in the winter of 1777."

Van Swearingen was the first sheriff of Washington County in 1781; he resided in now Fayette County, opposite Greenfield. His daughter became the wife of the celebrated Capt. Samuel Brady, also of the Eighth Pennsylvania, so conspicuous in the annals of Western Pennsylvania.

Shortly after the battle of Monmouth (June 28, 1778) a detachment of Morgan's Rifles, commanded by Maj. James Parr, was ordered with the Fourth Pennsylvania to Schoharie, to defend the borders of New York from the Six Nations, where, after making connection with Gen. Clinton, they moved to Tioga, and took part in Sullivan's campaign to avenge the massacre of Wyoming.

There were, without question, Westmorelanders with Morgan in South Carolina, but we cannot designate them.

Lieut. Johu Hardin, of the Eighth Pennsylvania, from Westmoreland, was afterwards the celebrated Gen. Hardin, of Kentucky, who was treacherously murdered by a party of Indians near Sandusky, 1791. He took a distinguished part in the Indian border wars of the era of Harmar and St. Clair. When he was a lieutenant of the Eighth, with Morgan, he shot an Indian courier who had letters from Gen. Burgoyne to Gen. Powell, commanding at Ticonderoga.

STONY POINT.

It should also be known that certain Westmorelanders acted a very important part in the capture of Stony Point, one of the most brilliant actions of the war.

Stony Point was a high rocky peninsula, fortified, on the Hudson River, opposite another jutting point of land, fortified, called Verplank's Point, which two fortified posts guarded the King's Ferry. That the Hudson River should be held by the British forces, that thus the New England States should be separated from the other States, was the long-cherished and darling idea of the ministry and of its military advisers. Although they had been unsuccessful in their occupancy of this line under Burgoyne and Clinton, they again determined, in 1779, to renew their efforts, and if possible to successfully accomplish this end. At the close of May, 1779, Sir Henry Clinton in person led an expedition into the Hudson Highlands with this object. With the assistance of large land and river forces he captured these points without serious exertion, for each was garrisoned by only a handful of men. This was a serious disaster to the Americans. The passage at the King's Ferry was closed to them, and the passes of the Highlands menaced. Perceiving this, Washington took immediate steps for the recovery of the points. His army, which had wintered at Middlebrook, N. J., had early in June moved to "The Cove," a fertile valley far in the rear of Haverstraw, and late in the month he made his headquarters at New Windsor, on the Hudson, a few miles above the Highlands, where he perfected plans for an active campaign against the invaders.

Anticipating an attempt to recapture the forts, Sir Henry Clinton had placed strong garrisons in them, and then retiring with his ships and soldiers to New York, he sent them in marauding expeditions along the New England coasts.

Washington had a corps of light infantry composed of picked men, drafted from the various regiments of the Continental army, and organized at that time into four regiments. These were under the command of Cols. Richard Butler, Meigs, Putnam, and Febiger. In the words of Lossing, the historian,—

"Butler was one of a gallant band of four brothers who fought the good fight of American independence from the beginning to the end. He had been Wayne's chief support in his hard conflict on the plain of Monmouth a year before. He was only twenty-five years of age, but was already distinguished for military genius, coolness, and valor. . . . The corps composed of picked men and commanded by these good soldiers were considered the élite of the army, and Washington chose them for his design against Stony Point and Verplank's Point. To Anthony Wayne Washington gave the command of this corps, July 1, 1779."

Wayne on the day after he took command reconnoitred the post, accompanied by Col. Butler and Maj. Stewart, of the Pennsylvania line, in whose command there were, as we have seen, some Westmorelanders. Stewart was a brother-in-law of Wayne, an Irishman by birth, and was considered the handsomest man in the Continental army. Wayne's ardor and confidence were somewhat diminished by his observation, and he reported to Washington that the British works on the western side of the Point, which only they had seen, were too formidable to storm with any hope of success. He suggested that a surprise might be effected, and at his solicitation Washington rode down to his camp, and carefully reconnoitred the works on the 6th of July.

There were many Tories in the neighborhood, and the garrison were on the alert. The works at Stony Point embraced a series of redoubts on the summit of the rocky peninsula. A line of felled trees, their tops outward (called in military parlance an abatis), had been laid across the Point from north to south, and this was defended by four companies of regular infantry, one of Loyal Americans, and a detachment of Royal Artillery. A second row of abatis was formed across the peninsula where it slopes towards the causeway on the western side, and was defended by three redoubts manned by two companies of infantry and two of grenadiers. At five different points pickets were stationed, and the batteries commanded every approach. They might enfilade any advancing column. The whole force was under command of a trusted soldier, Lieut.-Col. H. Johnston. They were ready for an attack from the whole Continental army.

After his reconnoissance, Washington prepared to surprise the fort, and from his headquarters sent instructions on the 12th of July, which were more in the form of suggestions, but which Wayne entirely carried out. After determining to surprise the garrison, he moved from his encampment, about fourteen miles from the fort, about noon, July 15, 1779. Three of the four regiments, those of Butler, Meigs, and Febiger, were with him, and an additional force of light infantry and artillerymen to man the guns when captured. Their route was rugged and in some places almost impassable. They passed the south side of the Donderberg while a heavy thunder-shower was raging on its summit and beyond. They delayed until night-fall before they came out of the mountain region. Every dog found in their way as they approached the river was killed to prevent an alarm. At 8 o'clock in the evening the whole party rendezvoused about a mile and a half below Stony Point. In the gloom Wayne arranged his forces for the attack. They were in two columns. At the head of the right column, and twenty paces from it, 150 men, led by Lieut.-Col. De Fleury, were posted, and just in advance of these were a "forlorn hope" of 20 men to "remove obstructions and secure sentinels," commanded by Lieut. Knox, of the Ninth Pennsylvania Regiment. At the head of the left, in like manner, was posted an advance-guard of 150 picked men, under Maj. Stewart, and a forlorn hope of 20 men, led by Lieut. Gibbons, of the Sixth Pennsylvania Regiment. Meanwhile Wayne had made a final reconnoissance, retired to a house to get supper, made his will, wrote a letter to his brother-in-law, and intrusted his papers to a messenger.

At half-past eleven o'clock the silent march began. The sky was dark with clouds. Wayne was at the head of the right column. A friendly negro, "Pompey," guided Knox at the head of the forlorn hope. Two stout men were with the negro. This "Pompey" brought fruit and eatables to the garrison, and they all knew him, and had given him the countersign. He approached the sentinel and gave the countersign. While "Pompey" was talking with him his two stout companions sprang from the gloom, seized and gagged the soldier. The sentinel at the causeway was served in the same way.

When the tide ebbed so as to allow a passage of the causeway the columns divided. Col. Butler's regiment passed the causeway in water two feet deep. So the tide was not yet down, for Wayne's column had to pass through the water of the marsh to get on the beach. It was past midnight. They were discovered and fired upon by a picket-guard. The garrison flew to arms. The assailing column was now under the walls of the fort. They pressed on in solid order in the face of a tempest from muskets and artillery. Every ledge of rocks above the ascending column was surrounded by British infantry, who poured down an incessant storm of bullets, taunts, and imprecations. But the column under Wayne's directions advanced slowly but surely, step by step. They did not fire a gun. They turned the abatis, pushed on towards the breastworks, cut and tore away the palisades, and cleared the chevaux de frise at the sally-port.

When within the inner abatis the Americans dashed forward with fixed bayonets, the main column following the advance closely. The ramparts were carried. De Fleury, who led the charge, seized the colors of the fort with his own hand, and his assailing column entered the works in triumph, shouting the significant watchword, the countersign of the night, "The fort's our own!" De Fleury, Lieut. Knox, Sergt. Baker, of the Virginia line (with four wounds), Sergt. Spencer, of the same line (with two wounds), and Sergt. Dunlap, of the Pennsylvania line (also twice wounded), were the first five to enter the works and win the reward offered by Wayne, who in his order of battle had engaged to reward the five men who should first enter the works with promotion, honorable mention, and with rewards in money ranging from the sum of five hundred dollars to one hundred dollars.

Almost at the same moment when De Fleury entered the fort, Lieut. Gibbons with the assailing party of the left, closely followed by Maj. Stewart, burst in on the opposite side. The terrified garrison, perceiving resistance to be useless, surrendered immediately, the men, especially the "Loyal Americans," falling on their knees and crying out piteously for mercy. And to the lasting honor of the conquerors it is asserted that not a man of the garrison was injured after they had ceased to resist and begged for quarter.

Of the substantial fruits of this victory history tells. Of this we mention nothing, but much of the honor and the glory of that great and singular capture we claim belongs to our Westmorelanders.

SKETCHES OF REVOLUTIONARY OFFICERS.

ARTHUR SAINT CLAIR.—Of all the characters which Westmoreland sent to the Continental armies, or gave to the history of the American Union, by far the most prominent is Arthur St. Clair. We do not propose here to enter into a notice of his public career, as we have reserved this for a separate sketch, and appended it to the narrative. But his services and his life are so intimately connected with the history of the county that they cannot be disunited. The days of his early manhood were passed here; he was interested directly or indirectly in every movement of interest calculated to further the protection and happiness of the people; his last days were passed here, like Lear's, and here he was buried, and his bones are with us at this day.

"A poor old man, as full of griefs as age,"

In the early part of the war he was appointed a major, and was employed in organizing and forwarding the levies to the general armies till he entered into active service himself. His connection with the public affairs of our county closes here. But what a difference in the circumstances of his leaving Westmoreland and of his returning! Unfortunately distinguished, his example is necessary to complete all the different shades of character made prominent by the vicissitudes of war. Of the heroes that fell by "swiftly-rolling Simois" at Ilium no two are alike, in person, in character, or in fortune. So the epic of the Revolution would not be finished without the persons of Morris and St. Clair. But this is not the place to review his misfortunes. Now young, tall, erect, of a noble bearing, and full of enthusiasm, conscious of the deeds of glory of a long line of ennobled ancestry, he offered his sword to the cause of the colonies and the liberty of mankind. It has long been accounted to his honor and his military sagacity that he suggested the attack on the British at Princeton which proved so opportunely fortunate. In 1777 he was a major-general, so rapid was his military advancement. But a beginning so full of promise was soon, unhappily, crossed by misfortune.

ÆNEAS MACKAY.—We know not the date nor the place of birth of Æneas Mackay. He first appears in authentic history as a citizen of South Carolina. On the 10th of June, 1754, Capt. Æneas Mackay, in command of an independent company of "King's Soldiers," of one hundred men, from South Carolina, joined Washington in the midst of the Great Meadows, where he was constructing Fort Necessity, on his march from Wills Creek to Fort Duquesne. This was a year previous to Braddock's campaign. He being a British officer, and holding a king's commission, could not, in common with his fellow-officers, brook the idea of being the subordinate of a young man like Washington, who only held a commission from a province, and who was regarded by them as a young and inexperienced provincial officer. The question of priority of rank was immediately raised. The difficulty was only settled in a way honorable to all, when the small force of British-Americans were attacked by the much superior force of French and Indians, Washington then took command, and conducted the capitulation. He withdrew his force to Wills Creek, and leaving them there in security, he, in company with Mackay, proceeded to Williamsport to make their military report to the Governor. Washington rejoined his regiment at Alexandria, Va., and Capt. Mackay returned to Wills Creek, and was placed with his company under command of Col. Innes, who was engaged in erecting a fort there, which he called Fort Cumberland, after the Duke of Cumberland.

We next find him at Fort Ligonier, while the garrison was yet commanded by officers of the king. Here he remained for several years, and, according to his family Bible record, here his son Samuel was born on the 20th of July, 1766. In this year he was transferred to Fort Pitt, of which he was afterwards placed in command. While here it is well known he was a leading spirit of the Penns in resisting the claims of Lord Dunmore, of Virginia, and was made one of Penn's magistrates. He, with Devereux Smith and Andrew McFarlane, was appointed a king's justice for Westmoreland. At the breaking out of the Revolution he took sides with the colonies, and received his commission as colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment. He died in the first year of the war, from a fever contracted from fatigue and exposure in their march from Fort Pitt to Treuton in mid-winter. His remains were taken to Philadelphia, and interred in the First Presbyterian burying-ground on the 17th of February, 1777.

In a notice of his death in the Pennsylvania Evening Post of Feb. 18, 1777, and which was evidently written by a loving friend, appears the following:

"On Saturday last Died of a putrid fever at Trenton, New Jersey, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, Æneas Mackay, Esqr, Colonel of the Eighth Regiment of Pennsylvania Continental forces; & yesterday his remains were interred, with the honors of war, in the first Presbyterian Burying-Ground of this city. In him his country has lost a faithful servant & good officer, his widow an uncommonly tender & affectionate husband, his children an indulgent father, and the world an honest man. . . ."

Col. Mackay's wife was a lady of New York, afterwards married to George Adams, Esq., of Pittsburgh. His daughter Elizabeth was married to Stephen Bayard, Esq.

COL. STEPHEN BAYARD, the son of Samuel Bayard and Francina Malden, his wife, was born Jan. 23, A.D. 1744, on the Bohemia Manor, Cecil County, Md. Four necks of land on Bohemia Manor was purchased by his great-grandfather, Peter Bayard, in 1684, a portion of which were in Delaware and a portion in Cecil County, Md. Bohemia Manor was patented to Augustus Herman in 1663 by Cæcilius, first absolute lord and proprietor of Maryland, and confirmed by his son, Lord Baltimore, in 1682. It consisted of twenty thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine acres, four thousand of which were in the State of Delaware.

For a number of years preceding the Revolutionary war Stephen Bayard was engaged in mercantile business with his cousin, John Bubenheim Bayard, of Philadelphia, who was a colonel of cavalry during the Revolution, and afterwards, in 1784, Speaker of the House of Assembly of Pennsylvania (the Legislature then consisting of a single house), and in 1785 was elected a member of the Continental Congress.

At the breaking out of the war Stephen Bayard raised a company in Philadelphia, and was commissioned captain Jan. 5, 1776, and was assigned to Col. Arthur St. Clair's Pennsylvania battalion.

After serving as major of his regiment, the Third Pennsylvania, under Col. Richard Butler, on the 30th of June, 1779, he received his commission as lieutenant-colonel, to take rank as such from the 23d day of September, 1777. In the year 1779 the Third Pennsylvania Regiment formed a portion of Gen. Sullivan's force on his expedition against the hostile tribes of Indians—the Cayugas, Oneidas, and Onondagas—on the Susquehanna River, and at the same time another expedition was fitted out and carried forward from Pittsburgh up the Allegheny River against the equally hostile Mingoes, Munceys, and Senecas. This was the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, of which Daniel Brodhead was the colonel, and Stephen Bayard the lieutenant-colonel. This regiment advanced two hundred miles up the river, and destroyed the Indian villages, cornfields, etc., on its head branches (vide Marshall's History). In 1781, Stephen Bayard was placed in command of this regiment as colonel commanding at Fort Pitt.

Col. Bayard served his country faithfully and honorably from the beginning to the close of the war, participated in many of its battles, hardships, and privations, and after its termination, and on the disbanding of the army, pleased with the Western country, he determined to make it his future home. In company with several Revolutionary officers, he settled in Pittsburgh in 1783, and in the following year formed a partnership with a brother-officer, Maj. Isaac Craig, late of Proctor's artillery regiment, in the mercantile business, with the intention also of dealing in lots and lands. In the year 1784, Craig & Bayard purchased from the Penns the first ground that was sold within the limits of Pittsburgh: three acres upon which old Fort Duquesne stood. They extended their business also by forming a partnership with Messrs. William Turnbull, Peter Marmie, and John Holkar, merchants of Philadelphia.

In the year 1787 an act was passed by the Legislature incorporating the Presbyterian congregation of Pittsburgh. In this act eleven trustees were named, six of whom had been officers in the Revolutionary army, Stephen Bayard being one. He was a devoted member and elder of this branch of the church to the date of his death in 1815. In the spring of 1788 he retired from the mercantile business and settled on his land, of which he had a large tract, on the Monongahela River, fourteen miles above Pittsburgh, and immediately proceeded to lay out a town, which he named Elizabeth, after his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Col. Æneas Mackay, mentioned above, who, in the year 1754, in command of an independent company of king's soldiers from South Carolina, accompanied Washington on his first expedition against the French and Indians of Fort Duquesne. Col. Bayard desired to make Elizabeth a point for boat and ship-building, and to this end brought out from Philadelphia a company of skilled workmen, who built the first vessel launched on the waters of the Monongahela. Her name was the "Monongahela Farmer." Elizabeth continues to be a point where many of our best boats and steamers are built for the Western rivers.

Shortly after the declaration of war in 1812, Col. Bayard's services were again sought by the government. President Madison tendered him a major-general's commission, but advanced age and bodily infirmities required that he should decline its acceptance. A zealous patriot and a fervent Christian, he devoted the best years of his life to the service of his country and his God. He died in Pittsburgh, Dec. 13, 1815, aged seventy-one years, and was buried in the churchyard of the First Presbyterian Church.

GEORGE WILSON, the lieutenant-colonel, was a native of Augusta County, Virginia. He had been an officer in the French and Indian war of 1755 to 1762. He came to the West about 1768 or 1769, and settled on the land where New Geneva now is, owning the land on the river on both sides of Georges Creek. Being from a locality in Augusta County called Springhill, he gave that name to the township in which he resided. He was a Pennsylvania justice of the peace there while it was a part of Bedford County, and his commission was renewed for Westmoreland. He was also one of the trustees to locate a place for the county-seat. During the boundary troubles the Province had no more resolute magistrate than he, allowing himself to be taken in irons to prison rather than abate the pretensions which he thought to be right. He died in the service of his country, as we have seen, at Quibbletown, N. J., in April, 1777.

COL. DANIEL BRODHEAD was born about 1725, his place of birth being probably Albany, N. Y., but as his father made several removals in the early part of his married life, this is uncertain. In 1738 his father migrated to Pennsylvania, settling in now Monroe County. The younger Daniel grew up among the rude experiences of a frontier settlement, and probably had his first experience of actual war when the Indians, after ravaging all the country between the Lehigh and Delaware Rivers north of the Blue Mountains, attacked the Brodhead house at Danbury, which had been hastily fortified, on the 11th of December, 1755. The attack was a fierce one, but it was totally unsuccessful, and the repulse the Indians met ended for a time the war in that section. In 1771 he removed to Reading, and soon after was appointed deputy surveyor under John Lukens, who was then surveyor-general. In July, 1775, he was appointed a delegate from Berks County to the Provincial Convention at Philadelphia. In the beginning of 1776 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the rifle regiment, which was raised in six weeks and given its first rendezvous at Marcus Hook. After the capture of Col. Miles at the battle of Long Island, the command of the remainder of the battalion devolved upon Brodhead. He was thus early in the war brought into contact with Westmorelanders, and was more or less in command of a portion of them till the close of the war. After the loss of Miles he was the senior officer of the remaining part of the Pennsylvania contingent in the army. Shortly after he went home on sick leave, and when he again joined the army it was as colonel of the Eighth. With it he served from 1778 to 1781 in Western Pennsylvania. He made some important treaties with the Indians, but the honor of pushing west into the Indian country was, greatly to his chagrin, devolved upon Col. Clark, a Virginia officer. On the reorganization of the army in 1781 he was made colonel of the First Regiment, his commission dating Sept. 29, 1776, and he seems at a later date to have been appointed a brigadier. He served afterward in the General Assembly of the State, and in 1789 was appointed surveyor-general. He held this office eleven years, and died at Milford, Pike Co., Nov. 15, 1809.

Something more than a passing notice should be taken of the family of Butler, of which two brought such honorable distinction to Westmoreland County. The name of the family has been greatly honored in its representatives in every section of the Union, and in every era of its history. The annals of the military history of the nation from the Revolution to the civil war could not be written without mention of the name and services of some of the members of the family.

Thomas Butler, the father of five "fighting" Butlers, was born in Kilkenny, Ireland.¹ Three of his sons—Richard, William, and Thomas—were born abroad. The eldest, Richard, was, as we know, lieutenant-colonel of Morgan's rifle regiment, and to him it owed much of the high character that gave it a fame of its own. He devoted himself to the drill of his men, and the cool disciplined valor which gave direction to the rifles of the regiment was derived principally from him. As the colonel of a regiment he served with Wayne at Stony Point, and took a prominent part in the closing scenes at Yorktown. In 1790 he was appointed major-general. On the 4th of November, 1791, in Gen. St. Clair's battle with the Indians, there was such a peculiar interest in his fate and in the circumstances attending his death, that a representation of himself and the group surrounding him was exhibited throughout the Union in wax figures. The warmest friendship existed between him and St. Clair, and indeed between all his family and St. Clair. In this battle St. Clair refused to take Butler's advice on the eve of the fatal 4th of November, 1791. "I have some good wine, general; let us eat, drink, and be merry," said Butler, who knew more of Indian warfare than his chief, "for to-morrow we die."²

William Butler, the second son, who accompanied St. Clair to Canada and Ticonderoga, was an officer throughout the Revolutionary war, rose to the rank of colonel, and was in many of the severest battles. He was the favorite of the family, and was boasted of by this race of heroes as the coolest and boldest man in battle they had ever known. When the army was greatly reduced in rank and file, and there were more officers than men, they organized themselves into a separate corps, and elected him to the command. Washington declined receiving this novel corps of commissioned soldiers, but in a proud testimonial did honor to their devoted patriotism.

Thomas Butler, the third son, was a student of law in the office of Judge Wilson, of Philadelphia, when, in 1776, he joined the army as a subaltern. He soon obtained the command of a company, in which he continued to the close of the war. He was in almost every battle fought in the Middle States. At the battle of Brandywine he received the thanks of Washington, through his aide-de-camp, Gen. Hamilton, for his conduct in rallying a detachment of retreating troops. At the battle of Monmouth he received the thanks of Gen. Wayne for defending a defile while Col. Richard Butler's regiment made good its retreat. He commanded a battalion under St. Clair in 1791 in the battle in which his brother fell. Orders were given by St. Clair to charge with the bayonet, and Maj. Butler, though his leg had been broken by a ball, yet on horseback led his battalion in the charge. It was with difficulty his surviving brother, Capt. Edward Butler, removed him from the field. He died Sept. 7, 1805.

¹ Some of these statements are drawn from Francis P. Blair's Biographical Sketch of Gen. W. O. Butler.

² This anecdote is related by many historians, and there appears to be not the least doubt about its being substantially correct, and it well displays the singular bravery and devotion of that officer.

Percival Butler, the fourth son, born at Carlisle, Pa., entered the army as a lieutenant at the age of eighteen; was with Washington at Valley Forge, was in the battle of Monmouth and at the taking of Yorktown, being through the whole series of struggles in the Middle States with the troops under the commander-in-chief, except for a short period when he was attached to a light corps commanded by Lafayette. He emigrated to Kentucky in 1784, and was adjutant-general of Kentucky during the war of 1812.

Edward Butler was too young to join the Revolutionary army at first, but joined it towards the close. He was a captain in St. Clair's army (1791), and adjutant-general of Wayne's army.

Of these five brothers, four had sons, all of whom, with one exception, were engaged in the military or naval service of the country in the war of 1812 or the Mexican war.

Capt. James Butler, of the Pittsburgh Blues, in the campaign of the Northwest under Harrison in 1812, was a son of Col. Richard Butler. Another son, William Butler, died a lieutenant in the navy early in the same war. Mrs. Meason, of Uniontown, Fayette Co., who died but a few years ago at the age of ninety-six, was a daughter of Col. Richard.

It would be too much for us to recount the names and services of the different members of the family as they relate to the war of 1812 and the Mexican war.

This glance at the family, as Francis P. Blair remarks in a biographical sketch of W. O. Butler, shows the character of the race. An anecdote, derived from a letter of an old Pennsylvania friend of the parents, who transplanted it from Ireland, shows that its military instinct was an inheritance:

"While the five sons were absent from home in the service of the country the old father took it into his head to go also. The neighbors collected to remonstrate against it, but his wife said, 'Let him go, I can get along without him, and raise something to feed the army in the bargain, and the country wants every man who can shoulder a musket.'"

It was doubtless this extraordinary zeal of the Butler family which induced Gen. Washington to give the toast "The Butlers and their five sons" at his own table, whilst surrounded by a large party of officers. This anecdote rests on the authority of the late Gen. Findlay, of Cincinnati. A similar tribute of respect was paid to this devoted house of soldiers by Gen. Lafayette in a letter now extant, and in the possession of a lady connected with it by marriage.

Lafayette says, "When I wanted a thing well done, I ordered a Butler to do it."

Col. Richard Butler was at Arnold's side when he was wounded in the terrific assault upon the camp of the Brunswickers.

His name was brought prominently forward in the army at the surrender of Cornwallis. In the last days, Steuben commanded in the trenches when the flag came out with proposals of capitulation. Lafayette's tour of duty arrived while the negotiations were going on, and it was a point of honor who had the right to plant our flag on the captured citadel. Lafayette marched with his division to relieve Steuben, but the latter would not be relieved. Ensign Ebenezer Denny, afterwards of Pittsburgh, was detailed to erect the flag. While he was in the act of planting it Steuben galloped up, took the flag, and planted it himself. Col. Richard Butler resented the supposed affront to the Pennsylvania troops, and sent a challenge to Steuben, and it required all the influence of Washington on one side and Rochambeau on the other to prevent a duel.

COL. JAMES SMITH.—The readers of the history of our part of the State and of the West will often meet with the name of Col. James Smith. We mention him here as one of the defenders of Westmoreland, although his reputation is destined some day to be as lasting as the annals of the republic, for the future historian will, without doubt, draw liberally from his narrative, which already within the time allotted for canonization has, in the simplicity of its style, the purity of the narrative, and the interesting description of a peculiar people, been regarded second only to the master-piece of De Foe. At eighteen years of age Smith was taken this side of Bedford by the Indians, in the year 1755. He was at Fort Duquesne when the French and Indians defeated Braddock, and heard the painted warriors boasting as they went out to meet the English that they would "shoot him down like one pidgeon." He was with them, as an adopted hunter, to 1760, and it is the narrative of this captivity which, in our opinion, is one of the most valuable contributions to our literature. When he was free again he went to the settlements of Franklin County, and remained there for some time. In the war of 1763 he was an ensign, and in 1764 a lieutenant, in the militia of the State. In 1766 he explored the Holstein River and the Kentucky country, and traveled through the Carolinas. After the opening of the land office he purchased some lands along the Youghiogheny and Jacobs Creek. In 1774, the time of Dunmore, he was a captain in the Pennsylvania line, and with St. Clair and Proctor organized the rangers of that date. In 1776 he was a major in the association, and it is only to infer how much he had to do with the resolutions of May the 16th, 1775. When independence was declared he was elected a member from Westmoreland for the Convention, and of the Assembly, as he says, as long as he wished to serve. While attending the Assembly in 1777 he saw on the streets of Philadelphia some of his "old boys," on their way to the Jerseys, who desired him to go along. The House granted him leave of absence to lead a scouting-party. He preceded Washington's army with his "boys," and did service worthy of the highest notice. In 1778 he received a colonel's commission and returned to the West, where he headed an expedition carried on under his own supervision and direction, which we shall notice in its proper place. He was a foremost citizen of our own and Fayette County till 1788, when he removed to Bourbon County, Ky. He was a member of the Assembly of that State nearly continuously from a few years after that date to 1799. He died in the State of his adoption.

COL. JOHN GIBSON.—In the notices of these men, to whom we are indebted for a share of our independence, we cannot pass over the services of Col. John Gibson. It is true that during the early part of the Revolution he was not on the frontier, but in the latter part he was, and his great influence was of much advantage at a most critical time. He was a man of most tenacious purpose, and although he was a Pennsylvanian, born in Lancaster County, yet he took strong sides with Virginia, as we will recollect, in the boundary troubles. He had received a good education. At the age of eighteen he accompanied Forbes' expedition. Settling at Fort Pitt as an Indian trader at the peace, he was subsequently taken prisoner by the Indians, and was saved from burning at the stake by an aged squaw, who adopted him in place of her son, who had been slain in battle. He remained with the Indians a number of years. At the close of hostilities he again settled at Fort Pitt. In 1774 he assisted in negotiating the peace which followed Dunmore's expedition to the Shawanese towns. At the outset of the Revolution he was appointed to the command of a Continental regiment, where he served with the army in New York and in the retreat through the Jerseys. During the latter part of the war he was in command along the western frontier. A controversy arising between him and Brodhead, growing from the claims of each to precedence, was finally settled by the government interposing and superseding both by Gen. Irvine, 1781. Gibson was then known as colonel of the Ninth Virginia. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1790, and subsequently a judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny County. He commanded a regiment in St. Clair's expedition in the West, and was major-general of the militia during the Whiskey Insurrection. In 1800 he was appointed by Jefferson Secretary of Indiana, which office he held until it became a State, and in 1811, 1812, and 1813 was its acting Governor. He was the uncle of Chief Justice John B. Gibson.

These lists and rolls which we give in the text and in the appendices do not contain the names of all those who saw service from our county, either whose homes were here during the time of the war, or who subsequently came into the county. Those who fell in the battle-fields all over the country are not there. Those who dragged their torn limbs home to die in their native valleys are not there. The heaths of New Jersey from Paramus to Freehold, by a line encircling Morristown and Bound Brook, were in the summer of 1777 dotted with graves of the Eighth and Twelfth Pennsylvania Regiments. An historical note touching on this subject says,—

"These regiments from the frontiers of the State, Westmoreland and Northumberland, was the first of the line in the field, though they had come from the Monongahela and the head-waters of the Susquehanna. At Brandywine the Pennsylvanians lost heavily in officers and men, so at Germantown."¹

So there were frontier settlers of Westmoreland who could to their children recount the disastrous march from Long Island, the glories of Princeton and Germantown, and the sufferings of Valley Forge; and there were Westmorelanders as well who had a life-long recollection of the sufferings of the Jersey prison-ships.

Such were the men and their services that Westmoreland furnished to the cause of American independence. But unfortunately the student of our local history will have less data to work from when he inquires into the history of the services of those men, and tries to arrange in order their achievements, who took upon themselves the defense of the cabins and posts, the women and children of those others who from necessity were compelled to remain upon the frontier in their homes and abiding-places. No books or writings contain a continuous narrative of services, or even to any great extent record their names. Their services are only to be gathered from the incidents which are preserved in our local reminiscences, personal recollections, and State archives; and their memories have been held sacred and inviolate for the most part by traditions and episodic narratives. In the treatment of this subject we shall, in another place, so far as we are able, do justice to their patriotism and devotion. In the Appendix² will be found some rolls of some of the militia who served on the frontier in the early days of the war.

¹ For an example: George Frederick Sheibler, of Hempfield township, who died Feb. 28, 1848, aged seventy-nine years seven months and one day, and who had been a resident of the county for fifty years, had enlisted in the Continental army when only fifteen years old. He was taken prisoner by the British at Charlestown, Mass., and shipped on board a British frigate to the West Indies. He escaped from this vessel while it was lying at Kingston, Jamaica, but was recaptured; but after again escaping, with many adventures he regained the United States.

² See Appendix "M."

CHAPTER XIX.

BORDER WARFARE AND CIVIL DISSENSIONS.

Indians in 1776 and 1777—Effect of Savage Warfare on the Whites—White Renegades and Deserters: Girty, McKee, Elliott—Depravity of some Whites on the Frontier—Murder of Cornstalk—List of Commandants at Fort Pitt—McIntosh's Expedition from Fort Pitt to Beaver—Brodhead's Expedition to Conewago—Other Expeditions from Western Pennsylvania and the West—Clark's Western Expedition and his Westmorelanders—Dates of these Noted Expeditions—Nature of the Indian Warfare in the West—Border Settlement of Westmoreland most Exposed—The County during the Troublous Times divided, one part North and one part South of the Youghiogheny—People along the Youghiogheny acknowledge no Law—Virginia establishes three Counties in Southwestern Pennsylvania—Boundaries and County-seats of Monongalia, Ohio, and Yohogania Counties—Extracts from Yohogania County Records—Their first Election—Primitive Court-House and Jail—Curious Fines and Sentences—When their Jurisdiction ended—Boundaries run and Difficulties settled—Mason and Dixon's Line—Limits of the Actual Jurisdiction of Westmoreland County through the Revolutionary War—Date of the erection of other Counties which have been stricken off from Westmoreland.

OWING in part to the showing of force, the general Indian war which had been feared by the Congressional Committee at Pittsburgh in 1776 had not as yet broken out, and later in the fall this fear appeared to be dissipated when some of the neighboring tribes offered assurances of friendship at a council held near the town. But yet more or less during all the time Neville commanded at that point—that is, in 1776 and 1777—small parties of Indians and Virginians were brought in contact, and these collisions became more frequent in 1778.¹ In 1777 boats were built on the Monongahela to transport troops into the Indian country, and during this year and the next those outlaws continued to harass the frontiers along the rivers below Pittsburgh,² and many small parties followed each other as far as the Sewickley settlements and drove the settlers off or chased them into their block-houses.³

It is not to be forgotten that during the seven years' war the Indians had more assistance than that which came direct'y from the British. Their strongest allies were those debased whites who, leaving the civilization of their own race, like uncaged beasts, ran to the wilds, and there associated with wretches more of their own instincts. At no other period was this anomaly so visible as during this war. Many reasons have been given for this, and some, clothing the miserable lives of these abortions with extenuating favor, have tried to cover their sins and their shames with the gauzy mantle of romance. But whatever causes first impelled these men to forsake their color and their kin, and to embrace the savagery of the half-naked red men at a time when they were debasing their own race, and were bringing into contempt all the humane traditions of their progenitors, there is one thing certain, that they became more savage than the veriest savage. To all time will the example of these men remain a subject for the moralist and the philosopher, and their lives a plausible argument that the baseness of man's nature and his innate depravity will and do easily and readily assert themselves. The truth will appear to be that some left the society of the whites from individual quarrels, some through desertion from the American army, and the consequent fear of returning, but most were drawn to such an invidious manner of life by the money and the promises of the British agents. These men fought with the Indians after their mode; they fell into their habits and spoke their language. They became their leaders, and directed the movements of the squads which they accompanied; they were the first to plan a foray, and the most careful in an attack. They could liberate a prisoner at the stake when the fagots were already set on fire, or they could tie up a refractory warrior to a sapling and lash him with a thong till his skin was flayed open. They knew where the colonists were weakest, and the points most desirable to attack; when in command they were implicitly obeyed, and followed with a recklessness which their own leaders could not have commanded. They received the bounty offered for scalps, and gave to the Indians in return their fire-water or their glass beads. They got from the whites the most opprobrious nicknames, and their names were held in abhorrence by those whom they had deserted, and execrated by the wailing households that mourned the death of fathers, or sons, or brothers. They were called renegades, deserters, white savages, cut-throats, dogs. To these renegades the settlers of Westmoreland traced the great source of their trouble.

The three most conspicuous of these renegades were Simon Girty, Alexander McKee, and Matthew Elliott. Girty passed his time mostly with the Mingoes, although he was a privileged character, and wherever he went he was allowed to command. He knew the western part of Pennsylvania well, having been an Indian agent along the Ohio River as early as 1749. He had also been connected with Dunmore's army, as the people of these parts knew to their sorrow, he being in the regular line of promotion after Connolly. He knew all about Hannastown, and it was he who got the blacksmith tools and battered down the door of the jail when the rabble took possession of the public buildings. McKee had also been an Indian agent, and had taken up some of the first land about Pittsburgh. He was something of a shrewd business man, but as a warrior was not to be compared with his illustrious brother, the Coriolanus who swore to "plow Rome and harrow Italy." In 1779, McKee was created agent in the room of Mr. Hays, and lived at Detroit.⁴ There were others of lesser light,

¹ Craig, "History of Pittsburgh."

² Withers' Chronicles.

³ Reports Supreme Court Pennsylvania.

⁴ Letter to Col. Brodhead, June 29, 1779; Archives, vol. iii, N. S., page 306.

but these three won a more than ordinary notoriety, and were called the unholy trinity.

While those who affiliated with the Indians were debased, the white settlers, from such intimate connection with their enemies, were, from force of circumstances, themselves abased, so that during these times things were done which have caused their children's children to blush deeply with shame. The common laws of humanity which immemorially have obtained among all people were disregarded. The very temples of hospitality were sacrilegiously profaned. Red men such as Cornstalk, who possessed some of the noblest traits of genuine manhood, and who were known friends of the colonists, were decoyed into unsuspected places, and in cold blood, without passion, by persons calling themselves men, murdered.¹ The culmination of all was when the Moravian Indians were massacred in 1781, for after all the sufferings of the people they were shocked at the enormity of that deed. When Neville had come from Virginia to hold Pittsburgh against the machinations of Dunmore and Connolly, he was allowed to remain by the sanction of Congress. He held this point till some time in 1777.

During the Revolutionary war the post of Pittsburgh was commanded, after Neville, by Gen. Hand, Gen. McIntosh, Col. Brodhead, and Gen. Irvine, successively, by Continental authority. Their chief duty was to guard the frontiers against the savages, as well as to preserve order among those people who were frontiersmen, and who had but little respect for any kind of legal authority.

¹ THE MURDER OF CORNSTALK.—This ever memorable action, which proved so much to alienate the Indians of Southern Ohio, occurred at Point Pleasant, in the fort erected on the site of Dunmore's, or rather Lewis' great battle. In the spring of 1777 a company of militia garrisoned that post. The celebrated Cornstalk, then in old age, and Red Hawk, a warrior of some notoriety among the powerful Shawanese, and whose tribe had till then kept aloof from the war, visiting the fort in the interest of peace, were under a specious pretext held as hostages. While detained in the fort, Cornstalk one day heard his son, Ellinpsico, calling to him across the river. The young savage, mindful of a filial affection not wanting in his wild nature, knowing not what detained his father, and anxious for him, had come to the fort to find him. He was admitted. It so unfortunately happened on the next day that two of the men about the fort going out to hunt were killed. Then it was that those in the fort, in the vain hope to be revenged, fell upon the helpless unarmed Indians who were under their keeping, whom they attacked, and whom they inhumanly murdered. All those in the fort they killed. Even the school-boys tell how Ellinpsico, when he saw the murderers approach, became agitated, and how his father in his death was no less a historically great man than on that day when his voice was heard over the noise of the battle of the Point. When he had seen the inevitable, he drew his blanket as a toga about him, and said to his son, "The Great Spirit has so willed it, and has sent you to the end that we should die together: let us submit." His words were to this effect; and when the murderers were coming he rose to meet them, and received seven balls in his body. Ellinpsico was shot upon the spot he occupied when the knowledge of his approaching death was first made sure; Red Hawk was shot trying to escape by climbing a chimney; and another Indian with them was killed in a most barbarous manner. This occurrence drove their tribe into open war against the colonists of Virginia, and made them forever their enemies.

As to scalp bounty, see note to Chap. XXX.; as to Moravian massacre, see Chap. XXV.

Taken generally, the policy of the commandants at Fort Pitt was an offensive policy, but their forces were inadequate, and to such extent was the country impoverished that no sustained campaign could be carried on. After each foray or expedition had spent its force it fell back again exhausted. The Virginia emigrants down the Ohio and along the frontier of Kentucky battled bravely against the hordes which poured out of the woods of Northern Indiana and from about the lakes. To give these and our own people some show of public countenance the expedition under Gen. McIntosh had been planned. McIntosh, with portions of the Eighth Pennsylvania and Thirteenth Virginia Regiments, left Pittsburgh by way of the Big Beaver, built a fort on the present site of the town of Beaver, left there a garrison, and thus held the tribes in check for a time. Col. Brodhead, the successor of Gen. McIntosh, in 1779 sent a party up the Allegheny, from which direction came those squads that, crossing the Kiskiminetas, overran the country as far down as the Sewickley. In this campaign Brodhead destroyed the Indian cornfields and the town on the site of Conewago.

But a more successful campaign was planned and carried out by the genius and foresight of one man. George Rogers Clark was a Virginian, and a man destined to be favorably remembered by the success of those acts which were the result of his intrepid boldness, inflexible perseverance, unflinching will, and judicious foresight. He was partly assisted by the private exertions of prominent men in his State, but when he started from Old Redstone on the Monongahela he took with him and his Virginia comrades some Westmorelanders, who remained with him to the last. Then he and his followers, in the great wilderness, hundreds of miles from their babes and homes, began and followed up that series of brilliant movements and successful stratagems which afterwards crowned their efforts with success and themselves with honor, and which, baffling the cunning of the wily Governor, wrenched from Britain her stations on the rivers, and gave to the Union the territory which now forms half a dozen States in the most flourishing part of the Mississippi Valley.²

The most noted of the expeditions into the Indian country were made by troops under McIntosh; Brodhead, 1780; Lochry, 1782; Crawford, 1782. By remembering these dates it will assist to recall smaller and intermediate expeditions more closely concerning us, as we shall only refer to these, as our narrative is necessarily connected with them.

This conflict along the frontier, which may not inaptly be called a conflict between the races, and which began with the war for independence, continued till the war for independence was fully over. And of this conflict it is not to be understood that it was one grand system of attack and defense. Not at all times were the same tribes arrayed against the same settlers. The animosity between the border settlers and the Indians has been noticed more than once, and to the Northwestern tribes the general war was one long, grand holiday of carnage. They were allowed, and indeed incited, to kill as many as they could, to spare no one, and to claim with cheerfulness the price of the scalps brought in, which price the agents got back usually for whiskey. While their war at first was directed against the Virginians, the border settlers of Westmoreland suffered with them, and the only part that escaped was that part behind the rivers, now best known to us as Fayette County. Indian aggression after Braddock's defeat never extended into that region with any profit, for those who inhabited there were so situated that they always had timely warning. But even in the dry decisions of the Supreme Courts, where one would last go to hunt for it, we see that the settlers along the Sewickley had, in 1777 and 1778, to leave their lands and cabins from savage inroads evidently directed against their neighbors.

² Vide Bancroft, vol. x.

The disputed line trouble was at this time an advantage not seen nor dreamed of by those who had at first so actively urged on the controversy to a fever heat, and which was almost the cause of the sword being drawn. So peculiarly are mortal affairs mixed up with circumstances beyond their control, that what at one time is an advantage may at another time be a disadvantage. The line was not adjusted when the Revolutionary war broke out, and the people and the country were divided into two grand divisions. Owing to this separation each part of the old county was better enabled to take care of itself. A system of mutual protection was more readily and more successfully effected than could have been possible had the territory of the county remained whole or intact. The distance from one extreme to the other was too far for concerted and prompt action, and the interests of the people too inharmonious to coalesce. There would have been rivalries in the command, jealousies in the distribution of forces, and bickerings arising from the apportionment of supplies and munitions. As it was, the elements in each division could more readily harmonize and more effectively co-operate; their sense of mutual protection was the more keen, and the ties of community more closely drawn. To divide was to conquer. Those south of the Youghiogheny joined the Virginians in their wars, while those north of the river, and which is of Westmoreland, during all the war sustained the harassing attacks of the savages, and repelled them with the force of their own arms and courage. Along this imaginary and invisible line either fled to the block-houses of the other, and all joined together to follow up the trails of the marauders. They have had the story of their trials told, while our settlers have theirs yet to be related.

Then the legal authority, which at first had promised so auspiciously, was now, by reason of the internal troubles of which we are familiar, all but powerless. While the laws along the southern border were in abeyance, and when the best and bravest of the people were in the army at a remote distance, a favorable pretext was given for a revival of the old question as to whether Virginia was in Pennsylvania or whether Pennsylvania was in Virginia. It will be remembered that when Dunmore laid claim to Southwestern Pennsylvania he embraced the whole of the West in Augusta County, with Staunton as the county-seat, but with the county court sitting sometimes at Staunton and sometimes at Pittsburgh.¹ The county courts of Virginia, at this time established south of the Youghiogheny, meted out a kind of irregular justice among those along the border, who were nearly always at war. Taking advantage of this condition of affairs, the inhabitants on either side had early refused to perform any public military duty; a jury could not be impaneled, nor a constable be got to serve process. Taxes could not be levied nor collected, nor was there a purchaser for land to be found.

Besides the cheapness of land which made these settlers favor the claim of Virginia, the condition of public affairs were incentives to increase this commotion; and these causes, added to the passiveness of Westmoreland, gave Virginia opportunity in 1776 to annex that part of Pennsylvania lying west of the peninsula region, now aptly known to us as Greene County, to the part already in dispute. The more perfectly to accomplish this result, she erected, in October of that year, all these parts, in connection with some of the adjacent territory of what is now West Virginia, into three counties, each with its county-seat and county jurisdiction. These she named Monongalia, Ohio, and Yohogania.² What was left of Westmoreland County was a defenseless frontier, exposed to Canadian-British outlaws, renegades, and savages. While Virginia at home detested Dunmore, she did not look with disfavor on his usurpation abroad, and what he had done for the king she considered as having been done for herself. From 1774 to 1776 the territory in dispute, extending up the Ohio, had been treated by Virginia as of her territory, and as such was incorporated, as we have seen, into Augusta County, and the courts thereof, upon adjournments from Staunton, were held at Pittsburgh till the erection of these other counties. Here, under the cover of Virginia jurisdiction, taxes were levied and collected, roads, mills, taverns, and ferries authorized, lands marked, titles recorded, ministers licensed, fees received for marriage certificates, and judicial functions exercised in court and at chambers, and during this time the only undisputed territory under the jurisdiction of our State and county was confined to a small region around Haunastown, extending to a line which was probably not more than ten or fifteen miles from the Monongahela on this side. Anything like an ordinary state of order was confined to the vicinage of Fort Dunmore (or Pittsburgh), and in the rest of the usurped jurisdiction it was more of a showing of authority than a reality. The state of law and morals in the easterly part of this region down through the Revolution was worse than in any other part. Among the dwellers in the Mesopotamian region—that part of the country now Washington County—there was no law.¹

¹ Brownsville (Fort Burd) was not a county-seat for Augusta County as sometimes erroneously reported.

² For Monongahela, Ohio, and Youghiogheny (as to the variety of spellings), see chapter on nomenclature.

These counties went into operative effect in December. That part of Monongalia County in Pennsylvania included in 1776 a small portion of Washington County upon the Ten-Mile Creek, which flows into the Monongahela, about one-third of the southwestern part of Fayette, and all of Greene. Ohio County embraced about one-third of Washington County, in the west below Cross Creek. As for Yohogania, it covered all the other part of the disputed as well as the undisputed region north and east of the other two in Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette, and was only bounded by the undefined line never adjusted.

The court-house of Monongalia was at New Geneva; that of Ohio at Black's cabin, near West Liberty; and that of Yohogania on the plantation of Robert Heath, on the western bank of the Monongahela, about where the line of Washington and Allegheny Counties strikes that river. The records of the counties of Monongalia and Ohio are not extant, but a part of those of Yohogania are still preserved, and are the only existing monument of its civil existence.²

Its courts, according to Judge Veech, did a large and varied business, civil, criminal, military, and mixed. It had the advantage of a bar of regular lawyers who practiced in the county courts of Western Virginia. Dorsey Pentecost, a formerly appointed justice of the peace for Westmoreland, and the first councilor for Washington County, was chief clerk of the Yohogania arrangement, and stands in about the same relation to that county as St. Clair stands to Westmoreland. Pentecost was an efficient coadjutor of John Connolly when Connolly's favor was presumably worth something. His residence was in the Forks of the Yough. Dorsey Pentecost, like Thomas Scott, redeemed his character for patriotism, but both of them, in their capriciousness, were more unstable than Connolly himself; for whereas Connolly's rabble were as averse to Virginia government as to Pennsylvania government, and patriotically considered that government to be the best which governed least,

¹ "In the section of country where my father lived there was for many years after the settlement of the country neither law nor gospel. During a long period we knew nothing of courts, lawyers, magistrates, sheriffs, or constables. Every one was, therefore, at liberty to do whatever was right in his own eyes."—Rev. Dr. Doddridge.

² We have heard these were in possession of Judge Veech, now deceased, to whose writings we are indebted, in great part, for information on this subject.

Connolly as a man was as fixed and as unchanging as Girty. To Pentecost it was little difference what was the name of the county so he had an office in it, and Scott showed his hand when he began inquiring after boundary lines at the time of the New State project.

In the Appendix may be found the names of the officers of the county.³ Of its sheriffs, representatives, and justices, some were of the most prominent and useful men in our early history.

The data following are collected from the records of the county courts, and begin December the 23d, 1776, and end in 1781.

Their first election came off on a Sunday, which among the Virginians was not an unusual thing. Several justices, in the first place, refused to serve as sheriff because of the uncertainty of the boundary lines, being apprehensive of becoming involved in trouble. For the first eight months the court seems to have sat at Pittsburgh, then for two months at the house of Andrew Heath, and thenceforth at the new court-house on his plantation. From the specifications ordered Aug. 22, 1777, the court-house and jail were to be included in one building of round, sound oak logs, to be two stories high, twenty-four feet long, and sixteen feet wide. The lower story was to be eight feet high, partitioned in the middle with square hewed logs, the doors and windows to be secured with bars and lock. This part was to be the jail. The height of the upper story was to be five feet, with convenient seats prepared for the court and bar, and a table for the clerk. The covering was to be a good cabin roof. This was to remain one room, and a pair of stairs to be erected on the outside to ascend by. In October the building committee ordered a stone chimney to be built in the middle for both the court-house and jail, with three fireplaces, two below and one above, and also that the building be chunked, daubed, and plastered, and a window of four panes, of eight by ten, put in each "glebe" of the court-house. On April 29, 1778, a pair of stocks, whipping-post, and pillory were ordered to be built in the court-house yard, and the order was renewed on Nov. 24, 1778. An addition was also ordered to the building of a room sixteen feet square, one story high, of good logs, cabin roof, and outside wooden chimney, with seats, sheriff's box, and so forth, for a court-room. Every sheriff, as usual, enters his protest against the sufficiency of the jail, and there are repeated appointments of justices to take lists of tithables in designated districts, and to tender the oath of allegiance.

On June 25, 1777, James Johnston was fined twenty shillings for two profane oaths and one curse, and this fine, no doubt, making Mr. Johnston curse louder and deeper, he was further fined the same day the same sum for four oaths. What happened to Robert Hamilton on the 26th of August, 1777, while a prisoner in the sheriff's custody, for "disrespectfully insulting the court" in the person of Richard Yates, gentleman, "in the grocest and most imperlite manner," was that the feet of the said Robert were confined in the lower rails of the fence for the space of five minutes.

³ See Appendix "N."

On June 24, 1778, cotton- and wool-cards were ordered to be distributed in Col. Cox's and Col. Stephenson's battalions according to the number of women therein. On Oct. 28, 1777, it was ordered that the inhabitants of the county have leave to inoculate for the smallpox at their own houses, and at such other convenient places as they might think proper.

As it would be tedious to enter into the details of this controversy still further, we may anticipate events and state how and when these difficulties were adjusted.

All attempts made by the Governors of Pennsylvania with Dunmore to adjust the claims amounted to nothing. The question then lay open for five years, till 1779, when a movement was made to effect a settlement. Five prominent men, three from Pennsylvania and two from Virginia, were appointed to fix upon a boundary. The agreement entered into by these gentlemen on the 31st of August, 1779, was to the effect that they, the committee named, did, in behalf of their respective States, ratify and confirm the agreement to extend Mason and Dixon's line due west five degrees of longitude from the Delaware for the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, and that a meridian line drawn from the western terminus of this Mason and Dixon's line to the northern limit of Pennsylvania should be the western boundary of that State forever. This agreement was confirmed and ratified by the Legislature of Virginia, upon certain conditions, on the 23d of June, 1780, and by a resolution (only) of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania on the 23d of September, 1780. The conditions upon which Virginia confirmed this agreement were that the private property and rights of all persons acquired under, founded on, or recognized by the laws of either county previous to that date should be saved and confirmed to them, although they should be found to fall within the limits of the other; and that in the decision of disputes thereon preference should be given to the older or prior right, whichever of the said States the same should have been acquired under. These conditions were recognized, and the agreement ratified by act of April 1, 1784. And during this year the boundaries were run and marked by stones set in the ground.

This celebrated line of demarkation, by name familiarly known, is the parallel of latitude thirty-nine degrees forty-three and odd minutes, which first was run to separate Pennsylvania from Maryland to settle the dispute between those two colonies. It was drawn by Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, who surveyed the line between 1763 and 1767. At the end of every fifth mile a stone¹ was fixed in the ground, on one side of which was graved the arms of the Penn family, and on the other the arms of Lord Baltimore. From the terminus of this line the stones, which marked the two territories of Pennsylvania and Virginia, had on the northern side the letter P, and on the other side the letter V.

We shall have occasion frequently to notice the deplorable state of affairs which existed along this debatable region even up to the close of the Revolutionary war. The pretext for the evasion of the law and the shirking of duty was always handy; as Falstaff would have said, "If the cook helped to make the gluttony, the people helped to make the disease." Gen. Irvine, writing from Fort Pitt to Washington, March 30, 1782, says that the civil authority was by no means at that date properly established in this country, which the general did not doubt proceeded, in some degree, from the inattention in the executives of the two States in not running the boundary, which was an excuse for neglect of duty of all kinds for a great distance on either side.

And it is seen that the jurisdiction of Westmoreland on its southwestern side, dating from the year of its existence till its jurisdiction was completely taken away by the erection of legitimate counties, was not near so extensive as some have casually inferred. The first of these legitimate counties was the county of Washington, which by act of the Legislature of March 28, 1781, took existence, and which was, in truth, formed out of territory mostly acquired from Virginia as the outcome of the settlement with her. It was bounded on the north by the Ohio River, on the east by the Monongahela, and on the south and west by Virginia.² Prior to the erection of Washington County no attempts were made to exercise jurisdiction west of the Monongahela. Fayette County was next taken out of Westmoreland, by act of Sept. 26, 1783, as to all that part southwest of the Younghigheny; that part northeast of the river having been added by act of Feb. 14, 1784. That part of Allegheny taken from Westmoreland remained in Westmoreland till that county was erected by act of Sept. 24, 1788, when it encroached on the western side between the two rivers, as shown by the lines on the map.

¹ These stones were imported from England.

² Greene County was taken out of Washington Feb. 9, 1796. See chapter on political divisions, infra.

CHAPTER XX.

FORTS, BLOCK-HOUSES, AND INCIDENTS OF WAR-FARE.

Reliance of Westmoreland in her Militia—Her means of defense—Description of the Early Stockades, Forts, Block-Houses—Block-Cabins and Stations—Fort Ligonier and Capt. Shannon and Col. McDowell—Hannastown Stockade—Fort Laud—Fort Reed—Fort Crawford—Fort Shippen, at Capt. Proctor's—Fort Allen—Rugh's Block-House—Keple's Block-House—Miller's Block-House and Station—Palmer's Block-House—Williams' Fort—Fort Waltour—Fort Wallace—Carmahan's Block-House—Barr's Block-House—Shields' Block-House—Miller's Fort on the Sewickley—McDowell's Block-House—Teague Island Fort—Incidents—The Francis Family killed near Waltour's—Attack on Waltour's Fort and death of the Old Man Waltour—The wounded Indian who killed Waltour comes to Fort Pitt—Has his wound dressed—Confesses that he shot Waltour—A Company from about Brush Creek go to the Garrison and demand him, that they may punish him themselves—He is given up to them—He is taken back to Waltour's Fort to be burned at the stake—While they are hunting up a Sheriff and a Jury to hold a mock trial the Indian escapes—He is followed Ninety Miles, and when last heard of had taken to the Allegheny River—Finley's adventure at Fort Wallace.

WHILE such expeditions as Clark's and even McIntosh's to the Muskingum diverted the more remote tribes and kept them at bay, the dangers to the Westmoreland frontiers were more to be apprehended from those Northern Indians that harbored about the upper Allegheny and along the rivers of Eastern Ohio. It is true, likewise, that during all the war a garrison, consisting sometimes of Continental troops, and sometimes of recruits of militia, was kept up at Pittsburgh. At all times, however, the main reliance, both for the safety of the post itself and for the protection of the inhabitants behind it, was in the volunteer militia of our county. Throughout the whole extent of the county, with perhaps the exception of that region between the Youghiogheny and the Monongahela, called the "Mesopotamian" region, the frontier people, from the time of Dunmore's war in 1774, opened their clearings and cultivated their little patches under the protection of their block-houses and with their guns at their sides. It is true that Gibson, Brodhead, Crawford, and Lochry led out organized bodies and punished their enemy, but if there had not been such men as Brownlee, Shannon, Wallace, and Brady there would not have been a cabin left standing west of Laurel Hill. Even the women of that day won a share of the honor for their steadfastness and bravery, and every little community had its heroine, from Experience Bossart, at Dunkard Creek, to Massy Harbison, on the Kiskiminetas. These settlers defended their firesides, fought the British, appointed their own military officers when not in the regular service, erected their own forts, fed and clothed, for the best part, their supplies of troops, kept the families of the poor among them, and bore almost alone the burden of that contest as it was carried on in the West.

Of these forts and block-houses we shall now say something. The name stockade was the name given to those structures which were more mechanically raised and regularly built than the other defensive works, although stockades, forts, block-houses, and block-house cabins are called such without discrimination. The stockades themselves were sometimes called forts and sometimes stockade-forts. The two most complete and best adapted of the old forts, the most important and the best known, were the stockade-forts, the one of Ligonier and the other at Hannastown. The system on which these were built was followed on the far western frontier as well as in those structures erected along the Allegheny and the Monongahela. The stockade proper which gave the name was built of the poles of large trees, split down and cut to the length of ten or twelve feet. These were set upright in the ground and fitted closely together side by side, with the surfaced or faced side of the logs (when they were faced) fronting outward. Those on the inside were pinned with long wooden pins to stout timbers, while other and longer logs fashioned in the same way were firmly fastened against these, running horizontally along the whole length, and supported from the inside by strong timber braces. These perpendicular logs were called the palisades, a word signifying originally stakes, or posts, and coming to mean fence-like, and applied to this arrangement because it somewhat resembled the pickets of a fence, and the pieces were indeed sometimes called pickets. On the outside of the forts of this class the earth was thrown up against the walls, and in some this was done in the inside also. The inclosure was in the instance of these two principal forts sufficiently commodious to contain all that ever might have occasion to seek their shelter.

Ligonier Fort was first laid out and built under the supervision of the engineers with the army of Forbes in 1758.¹ The fort of the Revolutionary times differed somewhat from the first plan, as the first plan was not fully carried out in the construction. It was built for all the purposes of a fort and a military post in the enemy's country, whereas the Hannastown fort was built after the country was to a certain extent inhabited. Ligonier Fort had cabins erected in the inside of the stockade; and while the colony was under the proprietary government, especially after Pontiac's war of 1764, a garrison of from eighteen to thirty soldiers were quartered here. The cabins for the soldiers were on the outside, about one hundred yards from the fort, and within the walls were the officers' quarters, the magazines, the munitions and supplies. When it was garrisoned by the provincial troops there were a couple of howitzers mounted at the angles of the bastions and the walls were pierced for musketry. A covered way led to a spring on the hillside near to the fort. The fort stood on the northern bank of the Loyalhanna, now within the limits of the present borough, between the main street and the creek in the upper part of the village.

¹ Plan of Fort Ligonier in Penn. Archives, old series.

PLAN
 OF FORT LIGONIER
 with part of the RETRANCHMENT.

10 20 30 40 50 60 70 80 90 100 Feet
 Scale of 10 feet to an inch

- C. Powder Magazine*
- D. Store houses*
- E. Officers Barracks*
- F. Officers houses*
- G. Line of communication with the advanced Javine Battery.*

Section thro' 1 B

Scale for the Section is feet to an inch

LOYAL HANON CREEK

The only way of entrance to the fort was through a large and very heavy gate hung on iron hinges, which in time of danger was kept closed and guarded. A narrow ditch, left when the earth was thrown against the wall on the outside, was not intended merely to hold water, although it is said to have been frequently filled with water from a race leading from the creek. It is not to be presumed that this was of much utility for either defense or ward. When the regular garrison was withdrawn the inhabitants of the valley kept the structure from falling into ruin, and occupied it during the Revolutionary war. It appears that Capt. Samuel Shannon, a father-in-law of Col. William McDowell, both of them Revolutioners, was intrusted with the supervision of military affairs at the most critical times along from 1777 to 1780.

The following extracts from authentic documents are not only interesting memorials of the early Fort Ligonier, but give some account of affairs happening in its vicinity which have not found their way into any general history of which we have knowledge. From Col. Miles' Journal we quote:

"In the year 1758 the expedition against Fort Duquesne, now Pittsburgh, was undertaken, and our Battalion joined the British army at Carlisle. At this time Capt. Lloyd had been promoted to the rank of Lt. Col., but retained his company of which I had the command as Capt. Lieutenant, & was left some time in command of the garrison at Shippensburg. On my marching from thence with a brigade of wagons under my charge, at Chamber's about eleven miles from Shippensburg, the men mutinied, & were preparing to march, but by my reasoning with them at the same time threatening them, the most of them consented to resume their march to Fort Londen, where Lieut. Scott was with eight or ten month's pay. While the army lay at Ligonier, we were attacked by a body of French & Indians, & I was wounded in the foot by a spent ball. . . . In the year 1759, I was stationed at Ligonier, & had 25 men picked out of two battalions under my command, &c."¹

The following account of an engagement here during the French and Indian war is from a communication from Adam Stephen to Brig.-Gen. Stanwix, July 7, 1759:²

"Yesterday (July 6, 1759) about one o'clock the Scouts and Hunters returned to camp & reported that they had not seen the least sign of the enemy about; upon which, in compliance with Majr. Tallikin's request, I sent Lieut. Blaine with the Royal Americans to Bedford, and as the party was but small, ordered a sergeant & eighteen chosen woodsmen to conduct him through the woods, to the foot of Laurel Hill on the West side, with directions to return to camp without touching the road.

"About three quarters of an hour after the detachment had marched the enemy made an attempt to surprize the post. I cannot ascertain their numbers, but am certain they were considerably superior to ours. At first I imagined the enemy only intended to amuse the garrison whilst they were engaged with Lieut. Blaine's party, but finding the place invested in an instant, & the enemy rush pretty briskly, I began to entertain hopes of their safety, & was only anxious for the sergeant & eighteen men.

"The enemy made an effort from every quarter, but the fire on the first redoubt was hottest, and in it Capt. Jones was killed.

"We are extremely obliged to Lt. Mitchelson of the Artillery, for his vigilance and application. After a few well placed shells & a brisk fire from the works, the enemy retired into the skirts of the woods, & continued their fire at a distance till night.

"The Sergeant (Packet, of the Virginians) returned about sunset without seeing an enemy until he came within sight of the fort. The party behaved well, fought until they had orders to retreat & got in without the loss of a man.

"P. S.—We have only Capt. Jones killed & three men wounded, & flatter ourselves that their loss is considerable."

The fort at Hannastown was built by those neighbors of Robert Hanna who lived around him at the time of Dunmore's war, 1774, the next year after the erection of the county. It was a hastily constructed affair, hut was strong and durable. A building was first raised fashioned after a great double cabin-house of two stories, the upper stories almost entirely closed, only small holes being left between the logs through which the muzzles of the guns could be pointed. There were no windows in it, and the roof was almost flat, so that it could not be fired from the outside. This upper story was higher than the palisades, which were of the height of about ten feet, and which inclosed the cabins within a square.

Both the forts of Hannastown and of Ligonier were made distributing points for the arms and ammunition furnished to the associators, so that there were usually at least a few spare arms at either place till towards the end of the war, when Hannastown was attacked, and at that time the means of defense were poorer than at any other time.

St. Clair, in his memorial to the Pennsylvania Assembly, says that during the time of Dunmore's war, before the Revolution, the forts which he supplied with arms and means of defense at his own expense were "Taylor's, Wallace's, Ligonier's, Lochry's, Hannastown, Perry's, Walthour's, Carnahan's, and a number of others not now recollected."

As the word fort is applied indiscriminately, so is the word block-house. We therefore make a distinction between a regular block-house and a block-house cabin. Block-houses were erected mostly in some locality easy of approach by those settlers who were too far away from forts, and whose cabins of themselves were insecure. A block-house was a building made of large rough logs, and built after the fashion of a square house, but in size much larger than a house. The logs were notched into each other at the angles of the building, and the height of this square structure was from ten to fourteen feet. At this height was begun another log story, the logs in which extended from four to six feet beyond the square of the structure below it. This story was built up to the height of about six feet. The upper part had in its sides small apertures through which to fire; nor could an attack with advantage be made underneath, for the space underneath the projection was left open. A clapboard roof which terminated in an apex covered all. These block-houses were intended for temporary places of defense. No more provisions could be taken in them than was sufficient for immediate and pressing want. Those who fled thither expected to remain only till the storm had blown over, or until help came.

There was another class of structures built for defense on special emergencies, but which structures were not used continuously as forts, neither were most of them used as cabin-houses, and these we choose to consider by themselves. Of this class was Fort Crawford, built about 1777, on the Allegheny, about seventeen miles up from Pittsburgh, on the southeastern side of the river, a short distance below the mouth of Puckety¹ Creek, where there was a shallow place used by the Indians for a fording. This is now the site of Logan's Ferry. This fort was built on the earnest representations of Col. Crawford, and it was called after him. It was erected by militia sent out from Pittsburgh, assisted by the neighboring inhabitants, who were north of the main road at that time, and now in the limits of Burrell township. It guarded the crossing-place against the squads that came in from the parts west of the river, where the thick primeval woods for half a generation after the war still harbored small tribes and parts of tribes. These defensive posts were, as near as we can obtain, merely large structures, built of heavy logs, with stout doors, roofs almost flat, and inside of which was a double cabin. At Fort Crawford a company of militia was stationed off and on for several years, and there were sometimes a few extra arms there.

¹ Arch., 2d series, 559.

² Archives, vol. iii. 688.

Of this class was Fort Hand, near the confluence of Pine Run with the Kiskiminetas, nearly twenty miles north of Greensburg. It was a block-house, and no residence. It was built by the people about 1778, while Col. Hand commanded at Pittsburgh, and was called in his honor. So also was Reed's block-house or station, on the Allegheny, four miles below the mouth of the Kiskiminetas, and which was a place of refuge so late as the troubles of 1792. There was at times a company of militia on detailed duty here. Block-houses and block-house stations obtained more among the settlers along the southern border, and notably among those of Greene County, then Springhill township, and throughout Western Virginia.

Such also were Fort Shippen, at Col. John Proctor's, near the Loyalhanna in Unity, then Derry township, and Fort Allen in Hempfield township, north of Greensburg, both built in 1774, and Rugh's block-house at Michael Rugh's on Jack's Run, about a mile and a half below Greensburg, built somewhat later.

But the most common defensive structure of all were those strongly barricaded cabins sometimes called stations, but which are more properly known as block-house cabins. Such was the principal house at Miller's farm, about three miles southeast of Hannastown, and not far from George Station, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, east of Greensburg. This was a long, double log house, with heavy doors and windows which could be closed. There were many such, and they were in all parts of the county; and from the fact that they were so frequently the places of refuge they have received the name of fort, which wrongly designates them. These in the catalogue do go for forts, "as hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves are called all by the name of dogs."²

These stations would hold perhaps twenty persons when they huddled together on the fear of danger. Rifle-holes or port-holes were on every side, and the light was admitted through narrow cracks in the gables, as they were chary of window-openings.

One of these block-house cabins was Williams' block-house, near Donegal, on the Four-Mile Run. It stood near the site of that wall of prehistoric times when the oldest settlers say was old when they first came in. This was the centre of the Donegal settlement. Hither fled betimes the Gays, the Harmans, the Hayses, the Campbells, the Pipers. From the neighborhood of this block-house many captives were taken, and near it many others were killed. Another sheltering-place, called Palmer's Fort, opened its arms to those who lived down the valley on the Laurel Hill side. It was five or six miles from Ligonier in that direction, and near the road from Ligonier to Fairfield.

Fort Waltour stood between one and two miles west of Adamsburg, and about the same distance south of Harrison City village, near the old Pennsylvania road. This was one of those block-houses to which the people betimes collected, where they stayed at night, and whence they went in the day to work in the fields. It was erected in very early times, and many stories which partake of the marvelous are treasured among the descendants of the people of that settlement. This was part of the Harrold settlement, a settlement as distinctively German as the Hannastown settlement was distinctively Scotch-Irish. In the history of the old block-house, the old church, the old Dutch school-house, and the burying-ground of the Harrold congregation lie hidden mines of wealth of great value to the industrious student of local and indigenous history.

Among the recollections of the Revolutionary times still preserved about here is the destruction of the cabin home of the Francis family, and the death or captivity of the inmates, which occurred some time previous to the Hannastown affair. This family lived about two miles west of Brush Creek. A squad of Indians coming suddenly upon them gained admission to their cabin. Two of the family were killed, and the rest taken prisoners. One of the prisoners was a girl, who was afterwards married and lived in Hempfield township, where she died. Her brothers and sisters were scattered before they reached Canada. The Indians at the time of the attack set the cabin on fire, and did not remove the bodies of the two dead from where they had been scalped, but the bodies were found near the burnt cabin the next day, one of the bodies lying so near the fire as to be roasted on its one side. They were buried by the neighbors at the garden fence.¹

¹ Indian, Pucketo.

² Macbeth, Act III., Scene I.

There is a peculiar story related of a lame Indian which brings Waltour's Fort into prominence, and which preserves the particulars of the death of the old man Waltour. We give the substance of it here, having taken it in part from a very rare book called "Border Life," now out of print. The authenticity of the narratives in that work is its claim for a matter of fact, and it is believed that the original story came from the pen of Judge Brackenridge, who bedecked even the rough fields of the law with the posies of literature, and in whose hand the crude ore of fact was turned into the refined gold of romance.

About the year 1786 one of those predatory squads coming into Westmoreland made their first demonstration at Waltour's.² The old man Waltour, his daughter, and two sons were at work in the field. They had their guns with them, and on the appearance of the Indians made towards the fort. The daughter was taken, but the old man and his two sons kept up a fire as they retreated, and had got nearly to the fort when the old man, being shot, fell. An Indian ran up and had placed his foot upon him and was about taking his scalp when some one in the fort fired. The Indian gave a frightful yell, and made off limping on one foot. After he had run off a party from the fort pursued him, as well as the others of the squad. He, however, hid himself in the bushes a few yards from the path upon which his pursuers came along.

The Indian lay quiet in this place among the bushes where he had thrown himself, waiting till pursuit was over, fearing that he might be tracked and taken. For three days he remained here. Then venturing out, he crawled along on his hands and one limb till he got a pole in the marsh, which he used to hobble along with. In the mean time he had lived on berries and roots. He thus worked his way around till he came within sight of the post at Turtle Creek, where a detachment of soldiers was stationed. Here he thought of giving himself up, but lay all day on a hill above the place, thinking whether he would or not; but seeing that the soldiers were militia and not regulars, he did not venture to do so; for the Indians knew the distinction between these, and from the militia they expected no quarter.

This Indian at first, so he said, had attempted to cross the Allegheny River at some distance above Pittsburgh, but his strength failing him he wished to gain the garrison where the regular troops were. He had been there before the war, and was known to some.

For thirty-seven days from the affair at Waltour's

Fort this wretched creature had subsisted on plants and roots, and had made his way on one foot by the help of the pole, and then, not knowing what to do with himself, came down into the edge of the town, and sat in a porch of one of the houses, where he was seen in the twilight. To a girl of the house, who first came out, he spoke in broken English, and asked for milk. The girl ran in and returned with others of the family to see such a strange-looking object. It is said that he resembled a walking skeleton, with only the semblance of flesh upon his bones. When he was questioned he appeared too weak to give an account of himself, but still asked for milk. The milk was given him, and word was sent to Gen. Irvine, the commanding officer of the post, who sent a guard, by whom he was taken to the garrison. After having had food, and being able to talk, he was questioned by the interpreter. At first he said that he had been on the Beaver River trapping, and that he there had a difference with a Mingo Indian, who had shot him in the leg, because he had said he wished to come to the white people. He was told that this story was not credible, but that he must tell the truth, and that in so doing he would fare better. He then said that he was one of a party which had struck the settlement in the last moon, had attacked a fort, killed some, and taken some prisoners; there he had received his wound, and in the end related to the interpreter what we have already told.

After the raid on the settlement a party from the fort had pursued the Indians to the Allegheny River, and had found the body of the Waltour girl who had been taken in the field, and who had been tomahawked and left. When this party had come back and heard that the Indian was still at the garrison they joined with others in a crowd, and with Mrs. Waltour, the widow of the man killed and the mother of the murdered girl, went to the garrison, and addressing themselves to the commanding officer demanded that the Indian should be delivered up, that it might be done with him as the widow and mother and relations of the deceased should think proper. After some deliberation it was thought advisable to let the people take him, for it was considered from the mode of war carried on by the Indians that they were not entitled to protection, and the country people were greatly dissatisfied that he was allowed to live after his confession, and as there was a loud clamor all through the settlement consequent on the death of a man so prominent as Waltour, he was delivered to the militia of the party who had come to demand him. He was put upon a horse and carried off with a view of being taken to the fort where the trouble had at first occurred. But as they were carrying him along his leg, the fracture of which had almost healed up by the care of the surgeon, was broken again by a fall from the horse, which awkwardly happened some way in carrying him.

The abridged continuation of the story then is that the intention of the people was to summon a jury of the country and try him, not only for the sake of form, but, as they further alleged, in order to ascertain whether he was the identical Indian that had been of the party at Waltour's Fort, though it is not very probable that he would have had an impartial trial, there having been considerable prejudice against him. The circumstance of his being an Indian was sufficient to have condemned him. The idea was, in case of a verdict against him, which seemed morally certain, to execute him according to the Indian manner, by torture and burning. For the fate of Crawford and others was at that time in the minds of the people, and they thought retaliation a principle of natural justice.

¹ Jacob Detar, father of Simon Detar, Esq., helped to bury them.

² Usually written after the German way Walther.

But while the jury were collecting some time must elapse—that night at least—for he was brought to the block-house in the evening. Accordingly a strong guard was appointed to take care of him, while in the mean time one who had been deputed sheriff went to summon a jury, and others to collect wood and materials for the burning, and to fix upon the place, which was to be the identical spot where he had received his wound while about to scalp Waltour, whom he had shot in the field, just as he was raising the scalp halloo, twisting his hand in the hair of the head, and brandishing his scalping-knife. It is to be presumed that the guard was “off their guard” somewhat on account of the lameness of the prisoner and the seeming impossibility that he could escape; for it so turned out that while engaged in conversation on the burning that was to take place, or by some other cause of inattention, he had been permitted to climb up at a remote corner of the block-house, get to the joists, from thence upon the wall-plate of the block-house, and from thence, as was supposed, to get down on the outside between the roof and the wall-plate. The block-house was so constructed that the roof over-jutted the wall of the house, resting on the ends of the joists, which protruded a foot or two beyond the wall, so that those within could fire down upon the Indians who should approach the house to set fire to it or attempt the door. But towards morning the Indian was missed, and when the jury met there was no Indian to be brought before them.

Search was made by the guard everywhere; the jury joined in the search, and the militia went out in all directions in order to follow his track and regain him. No discovery could be made, and as a consequence the guard were blamed for want of vigilance, although there were some who thought he was let go that they might not be under the necessity of burning him.

The search at length was abandoned; but three days after this, a lad looking for his horses, saw an Indian, with a pole or long stick, just getting on one of them by help of a log or fallen tree. He had made a bridle of bark for the horse's head, and making use of this and a stick in guiding the horse, he set off on a smart trot in a direction towards the frontier of the settlement. The boy was afraid to discover himself or reclaim his horse, but ran home and gave the alarm, on which a party, in the course of the day, were collected and started in pursuit of the Indian again. They tracked the horse until it was dark. In the morning they followed the track as before, but found the course varied, taking into branches of streams to prevent pursuit. By this they were greatly delayed, as they lost time in tracing the stream to find where the horse had come out; and sometimes the tracks of the horse could not be seen when he had taken the hard, dry ridges, and gone in a contrary direction so as to deceive them. In this manner the Indian had gotten to the Allegheny, where they found the horse with the bark bridle, and where it appeared he had been left but a short time before. The sweat was scarcely dry upon his sides, and the distance he had come was about ninety miles. It was presumed the Indian had swam the river into uninhabited country, or those parts called the Indian country, where it was not safe to pursue him. For this reason the pursuit was given up. Others, however, came to the conclusion that he never reached any of the Indian towns, for they had taken pains to inquire, but believed that he was either drowned in the river or had famished in the woods, or that his broken limbs in the hot weather had caused his death.

Fort Wallace, on the farm of Peter Wallace, on McGee's Run, near the Kiskiminetas, about two miles above Blairsville, was in border times a famous station. On the same farm was afterwards a mill known as Wallace's mill; the Wallaces being prominent men in that neighborhood, one of them having been returned to the Assembly. Many stories are told of the men who from time to time defended it; their strength, their agility, and their bravery have been praised to the golden stars. One adventure from a good source appears to be credible; we give it as related.¹

It appears that when the Rev. James Finley, who was frequently intrusted by the Supreme Council of the Province and the State to fill special commissions for it, was on a visit to Western Pennsylvania in 1772, he left his son, Ebenezer Finley, here. This young man, about 1776 or 1777, had gone from Dunlap's Creek on a tour of militia duty along the Kiskiminetas, in the place of another man. While the party were at Fort Wallace, a man on horseback came up in great speed and reported that the Indians had been seen a short distance off; that he had left two men and a woman on foot trying to reach the fort, and that unless they were immediately assisted they would be lost. Young Finley, among eighteen or twenty others, started right out. About a mile and a half from the fort they came upon a considerable body of Indians. After a fire occurred a zigzag running fight began.

¹ The adventure is in “Old Redstone,” page 284.

Some of the party in making their way back to the fort were shot or tomahawked. Finley's gun would not go off. He stopped to pick his flint and fell behind. An Indian was seen leveling his gun at him, but was fortunately shot before he could fire. Finley, being fleet of foot was soon abreast with one of his companions, and in passing round the root of a tree, by a quick motion of his elbow against his comrade's shoulder passed him, and the next moment the comrade fell under the tomahawk. The Indians were again gaining on him, when a man named Moor, seeing his danger from having to cross a bridge exposed, stopped, and by a well-directed aim of his rifle enabled him to cross the bridge safely. After many doublings and turnings, in which the Indians were sometimes in the rear and sometimes in the front of Finley, he reached the fort in safety.¹

Fort Barr was on the farm best known as the Gibson farm, in Derry township, a good mile northwest of New Derry. Further mention is made of these two forts in the chapter on Derry township.

The Carnahan block-house was the cabin-house of one of the Carnahans, possibly John, and its location was a short distance northeast of Perrysville, in Bell township. Shields' block-house was on the Loyalhanna, about six miles from Greensburg. It was in being as early as 1774.

A Miller's Fort, or block-house, was on the Big Sewickley, on the Stokely farm, and Markle's Station was at the mouth of the Sewickley. An old block-house that went by the name of McDowell's Fort was near the site of Madison, and Teague Island Fort about five miles northwest of Greensburg. This series of forts was in connecting distance, and was used as a line of defense for the Sewickley settlement, the people about one warning those about the next. In McDowell's Fort James B. Oliver, Esq.,² late of West Newton, was born, June 2, 1781, while his parents had sought the shelter of that covering during that tempestuous year. Joseph McDowell, the owner of the farm upon which the fort was built, had bought the original tract, embracing four hundred acres, for a rifle gun and a little horse.

¹ This is the narrative. At the time of this adventure the father was three hundred miles away. On that day, he says, he had a strange and unaccountable impression that his son was in danger, but no distinct conception of its nature. He prayed, and at length felt relieved, as though the danger was past. He had never experienced such an extraordinary sensation before, and so he made a note of it. A few weeks afterward he received from his son, who had returned to him, an account of his narrow escape. The time corresponded exactly with Mr. Finley's strange experience.

² Father of the Hon. Mrs. Cowan.

CHAPTER XXI.

FORAYS AND ADVENTURES.

During the Early Part of the Revolutionary War—The Volunteers—Col. James Smith takes a Detachment up the Allegheny to French Creek or Venango—His Arrangement of the Men while on the March and in their Encampments—His Plan of Fighting the Indians—Brodhead's Expedition to Conewago and Brokenstraw—He cuts off a Party of Forty Indians on their way to the Westmoreland Settlements—Notice of Fort Armstrong, Kittanning—Brodhead sends Capt. Brady into the Seneca Country—Trouble between the Continental Officers and the Militia Officers—Ranging Companies formed during the War by Direction of the State Officials—They are Stationed along the Rivers—Their Officers—Their Manner of Fighting—The Heroic Women of Early Westmoreland: Experience Bozarth, Massy Harbison, Mrs. Margaret Oliver, Mrs. Matthew Jack.

IN this chapter we shall hastily run over the events transpiring within and upon the frontiers of the county from the commencement of the war to a period a few years later. In 1775, and the early part of 1776, the inhabitants were not molested to any grievous extent, neither did seed-time or harvest fail. But by the removal of Col. Mackay and his command from Kittanning and the adjacent posts the frontiers of the county were first laid open and exposed to the mercy of the faithless and uncertain savages. The militia were called out for short terms, and were placed by Col. Lochry at the disposal of Col. Hand, the Continental officer in command of the department; for during nearly all the time that officer was in command a company of Westmorelanders was stationed along the Allegheny. It was soon apparent that these were insufficient for the object in view. They were poorly cared for, and whenever they were called upon to leave their posts the savages, taking advantage of their weakness, broke over the lines and made such a war as they pleased. During 1777 there are numerous complaints of their depredations, and the President of the Council at recurring intervals sympathizes with the people, bids them be of good cheer, and promises them that the Council will soon furnish supplies.

The manner of their warfare and of their mutual co-operation about this time may be seen in an account of one of their expeditions.

In the year 1778, Col. James Smith, who had just returned to the county, raised a body of men to pursue some Indians who had made an attack upon the Sewickley settlement. On the second day they overtook and defeated them, taking four scalps,³ and recapturing the horses and plunder stolen. At the time of the attack Capt. John Hinkston pursued an Indian, in the excitement not noticing that both their guns were empty. After the fray was over Hinkston was missing, and while the whites were inquiring about him he came walking back carrying the bloody scalp of the dead savage with him. He had pursued him about a quarter of a mile until he came up with him, when he killed him with his tomahawk.

³ Smith's narrative, "Border Warfare."

Shortly after this, in 1778, a body was raised from the county to go with some of Gen. McIntosh's command up the French or Venango Creek. This force was four hundred strong; they were called riflemen, and Col. Smith was placed in command. In November they got orders from the general to march. From Smith's account,¹ they were poorly equipped, and scarce of provisions. They marched, after an arrangement of Smith's own, in three columns, forty rods from each other; there were flankers on the outside of each column; the men in the columns marched in scattered order, and were each one rod apart; the volunteers marched abreast in the same manner as the flankers, scouring the woods. In case of an attack the men were to face out, and take to trees. This was to keep the Indians from surrounding them, or to have more than one chance at shooting at a man without exposing themselves. Their encampment was formed in a hollow square, inclosing thirty or forty acres. Guards were placed on the outside of the square to watch the enemy and keep the cattle from going out. Smith's tactics in all cases was to keep the Indians from surrounding his party, and he argued that every great defeat suffered at their hands was effected by them in this way.

On proceeding to French Creek they found the town deserted. Smith went farther than his orders called for, but their provisions being about exhausted, they were obliged to return. The only result, therefore, was the keeping the country quiet for some little time after the expedition was organized. Out of it, however, grew a good deal of recriminating talk between Col. Smith and Col. Lochry, the county lieutenant, and their adherents. On charges against Smith, preferred by Lochry in his deposition, he was arraigned before a court-martial; and in a memorial to the Executive Council he recites at large the causes of the complaint, and professes that he was not derelict in his duty.²

The campaign of the Continental army of 1779 did not open favorably. Money was so depreciated that the hope of the Congress was in the liberality of private subscriptions. The credit of the country was so low that men could not be induced on that account to enter the service. Notwithstanding this the commander-in-chief, to break up the Indian aggressions of the Six Nations and their confederates, sent two divisions, one from the Susquehanna under Sullivan, and one from the north under Clinton, which, after forming a junction, were to proceed by the Chemung River to the country of the Senecas and Cayugas.

They fell in with the enemy on the Chemung and routed them, and marching farther into their country, committed much destruction of property and corn and took many prisoners. About the same time Brodhead, leading out a number of Westmoreland volunteers, along with some Continental soldiers under his command from about Pittsburgh, went into the Muncie settlement on the north branch of the Allegheny, and destroyed their crops and burnt their villages about the mouth of the Brokenstraw and above the Conewago. He cut off a party of forty hostiles on their way to the Westmoreland settlements. Smith and Lochry accompanied this expedition. Its result was so effective that for a considerable time afterward no very extensive body of savages ventured to come upon the frontier, but carried on their depredations henceforth in a predatory manner. Some trouble which originated in this expedition between the commanders of the volunteers and the Continental officers gave occasion for the former to withdraw their forces from the latter. This difficulty was the source of much complaint and of much subsequent suffering which the inhabitants had to sustain.

From his headquarters at Pittsburgh, on the 24th of June, 1779, Col. Brodhead writes to President Reed as follows:³

"Lieut.-Col. Bayard, with one hundred and twenty, rank and file, is now employed in erecting a stockade fort at Kittanning, which will more effectually secure the frontiers of Westmoreland and Bedford Counties, provided scouts are employed according to my directions. The Mohicans and Shawnees have sent me a string of white wampum and a speech, requesting me to take pity on them and suffer them to enjoy the blessings of peace. I believe I have frightened them by bringing over to our interest their chief allies, the Hurons, Iowas, Chippewas, and Puttawattomies. By the inclosed letters and speeches your excellency will discover the change, and if I had but a small quantity of Indian goods, I would make them humble the Mingoes and capture many of the English; but unfortunately I am not in possession of a single article to pay them with. I have now a considerable quantity of provisions, and could make a successful campaign up the Allegheny, but I am not at liberty to do it. It would give me pleasure to know what reward might be safely offered for Indian scalps."

From the same letter we get, in a short space, a rather satisfactory idea of how the Indians committed their depredations about this time, and how the whites repelled them. In it he relates these particulars:

"About a fortnight ago three men whom I had sent to reconnoitre the Seneca country returned from Venango, being chased by a number of warriors who were coming down the river in canoes. They continued their pursuit until they came to this side of Kittanning, and the white men narrowly escaped. A few days after they returned, Captain Brady, with twenty white men and a young Delaware chief (his pet), all well mounted, set out towards the Seneca country, and the Indian warriors proceeded towards the settlements. They killed a soldier between Fort Crawford and Fort Hand, and proceeded to the Sewickley settlement, where they killed a woman and her four children, and took two children prisoners. Captain Brady fell in with seven Indians of this party about fifteen miles above Kittanning, where the Indians had chosen an advantageous situation for their camp. He, however, surrounded them, and attacked them at the break of day. The Indian captain, a notorious warrior of the Muncie nation, was killed on the spot, and several more mortally wounded, but the woods were remarkably thick, and the party could not pursue the tracks after they had stopped their wounds, which they always do as soon as possible after receiving them. Captain Brady, however, retook six horses, the two prisoners,⁴ the scalps, and all their

¹ Smith had been so long with the Indians that he was thoroughly infatuated with their mode of warfare. See his famous letter to Washington, advising him how to conduct his campaign against them.

² Pennsylvania Archives, N. S., vol. iii. 328.

³ Archives, vii. 505.

⁴ In a note to the Archives by Hazard, these two children were said to be living then, 1853, one in Westmoreland, and the other in Butler; L. C. Draper having statements from them.

plunder, and took all the Indians' guns, tomahawks, match coats, mocassins, in fine, everything they had except their breech-clouts. Captain Brady has great merit, but none has more distinguished merit in this enterprise than the young Delaware chief, whose name is Nanowland. Before Captain Brady returned, Lieutenant Hardin set out with a party of eleven choice men, and I am certain he will not return without scalps or prisoners from the Seneca country."

As Capt. Brady now comes upon the stage, we shall relate in a separate chapter some of his adventures as they occurred on the frontier border of the county during the most trying and darkest period of her border war. By so doing we can convey a better knowledge of the true state of affairs than by following up an unbroken line of quotations and inferences.

The militia called out on occasions to serve when there was danger of an attack, or to garrison for the time some post, were under the direction and control of the county lieutenants, unless when in actual service, when they were under the command of the officers of the department. This arrangement was a cause of much embarrassment, for often when the lieutenants needed the men for special duty they were, if in service, not allowed to go from the regular command. There are several instances in which Lochry and Brodhead were brought in contact with each other, from which contact the public good was not subserved. The most noticeable of these occurred in 1779, at a time of great apprehension, and when the expectation of assistance from the State was meagre. There were at that time two companies of short-term militia from Westmoreland, stationed the one at Fort Armstrong, Kittanning, the other at Fort Crawford, Puckety. Capt. Thomas Campbell commanded one of these, and Capt. Joseph Erwin, the father-in-law of Lochry, commanded the other. They were then under the control of Brodhead, but Lochry, obtaining the permission of the Council, ordered them back to the line of the Kiskiminetas. When these, therefore, applied to Brodhead for horses and provisions they were refused, which was the occasion of many bitter words and of much complaint on both sides to the president and Council.

Some time in 1780, Col. Lochry was under the necessity of removing the public records of the county from Hannastown to his own house on the Twelve-Mile Run,¹ after consulting with the judge of the court in whose custody they were, who was of the opinion it would be of no prejudice to the inhabitants. This was thought necessary, as Hannastown was then regarded as very weak and on the frontier.

In June of 1780 the president of the Council sent an additional installment of depreciated currency for the use of the people, and also ordered some companies from the eastern counties, but it does not appear that these came. The Council ordered at one time four companies to be raised for the frontiers within the county itself. There was not much difficulty in raising the men, but the money was so valueless that they thought best not to send any commissions, as the State was unable to raise good money. President Reed in a letter to Col. Proctor, says that the Council thought best to issue a proclamation encouraging the young men to turn out in small parties as the enemy did, they being convinced that such parties as these would do more for the real protection of the garrisons and forts than the regular militia.

It was thus that during this time the salvation of the people was in those ranging-parties which the young men chose to join in preference to the militia or to entering the regular service. Of those who, from 1778 to 1780, were prominent in the ranging service we mention James Guthrie, Thomas Stokely, Matthew Jack, Michael Huffnagle, James Smith, Joseph Erwin, William Cooper, Samuel Shannon, Brady, Van Swearingen, the Wallaces, the Barrs, Col. Wilson, the Brownlees, the Shaws.

These ranging companies were formed for the most part of the fighting-men who lived nearest to each. They were dressed in the homespun of their own manufacture, and carried their own rifles, knives, and hatchets. When word came that they were needed they hastened together and put themselves under the orders of their officers. It was their duty to alarm the settlers when an attack had been made or was apprehended, and they were to help off the women and children into some place of safety. These men in time became so expert in this manner of warfare, and all their natural senses became so developed by usage, that they could travel as well by night as by day, could see like a night animal, could distinguish sounds of danger which were unheard by others, could stand endurance and want of food beyond all belief, became agile and swift of foot, dexterous with the rifle, and by usage so accustomed to danger and adventure that their feats and escapes were not only marvelous, but sometimes appeared to be, as they were really regarded, miraculous.

In perpetuating the memory and the acts of the men who ought to flourish in the grateful recollection of their descendants, we must not lightly pass over a notice of the women, who in every sense were heroines. The knowledge of some of these has come down to us from their having been the subject of some noted episode; but it has been the custom to pass them over without notice. The innocent sufferings of Peggy Shaw are, in truth, inseparably connected with the history of Hannastown, but the undoubted acts of bravery of many others have been less fortunately preserved. It has been established upon the testimony of accurate observers² that the women of the early period were, in certain respects, a stronger minded (or stronger willed, if you please) class than their daughters. The graces of womanhood, it is true, could not flourish in their surroundings; and there are well-attested instances where some who had been reared in the refined society of Europe, or of the cities of the East, coming out to share the hardships of pioneer life, either drooped away in disease or fell into imbecile childhood.¹ But this does not detract, but is an illustration of the doctrine of the survival of the fittest. And we advert here to that class who were raised up in the families of the border settlers, and who possessed strong bodies and equally strong minds. These were the women who were fit companions—the wives, the sisters, the mothers—of those men to whom we are indebted for a share of the liberty which we now enjoy.

¹ The Twelve-Mile Run, as we observed, flows into the Fourteen-Mile Run near St. Vincent's Monastery.

² Both physiological and psychological.

To illustrate our point we adduce the instances of a few, and their example will answer for many others, and will serve to reflect the heroism and the hardihood of all.

Possibly the most noted instance of hardihood preserved in our annals is that which is related of Mrs. Experience Bozarth. She lived on Dunkard Creek, now within the limits of Washington County. In the spring of 1779 two or three neighboring families, through fear of danger, took up their abode with her while the men were in the woods. At this time there were two men at the house besides the women and children. On a certain day the children out playing came running towards the house saying they had seen ugly red men. One of the men went to the door. He was shot in the breast and fell backward. The Indian jumped over the prostrate man and grappled with the other. The white man with great strength threw the Indian upon a bed and held him while he called for a knife. All the rest of the women were screaming and in an anguish of fright.

Mrs. Bozarth, not finding a knife, seized an axe, and with a dash of it sank it into the Indian's brain. At that instant another savage who had entered the door shot the white man dead who was tussling with and still holding the Indian on the bed. The brave woman turned upon this Indian and attacked him with the axe. She gave him several ugly gashes, one of which let his bowels out. His yells of pain brought others of the savages from the murder of the children to his rescue. When the first one of these thrust his head inside the door it was cleft in two by the axe, when the body was pulled out by his comrades. Mrs. Bozarth then, with the help of the white man who had been first shot, and who had now somewhat recovered, shut the door upon them and fastened it. The living thus kept the house garrisoned for several days, with the bodies of the dead white and Indian in it. During this time the Indians besieged it. They were finally relieved by a party sent out for that purpose.

The remarkable sufferings and final escape of Massy Harbison are perhaps so well known that they will not bear repetition. We shall not recount the story in her words, but that devotion which is so apparent in all her trials may, we think, with propriety be referred to. At the time she was taken by the Indians she lived within sight of a block-house in Westmoreland, between Pittsburgh and Puckety. This was in May, 1792, after the defeat of St. Clair. A party of savages breaking into her house while she was there with her children, took her from her bed with an infant in her arms and made her follow them. Besides the babe she had two little boys. One of these cried and held back from going along. They killed him by taking him by the heels and dashing his head against the door-post. They set the mother on a stolen horse.

When they crossed the Allegheny they murdered her other boy, who was still crying for his brother, and scalped him. She kept the babe still to her breast. They proceeded past the place where Butler now stands. She had made up her mind to be killed, and to give the Indian who had her a pretext she refused to carry what he put upon her. They, however, only beat her along with the handles of their tomahawks. On the third morning, while the Indian who guarded her dozed, she got up and started into the woods. When she was from their sight she wandered around through fear, resting by day and groping in the darkness, in constant apprehension of being found, for three days more before she came to the Allegheny, where she was taken up by some whites. During this time her sufferings were such as are hardly to be credited. She lived on berries and roots and soft bark; she was exposed to the inclemency of the weather; she was followed, and came near being taken when her child cried, which brought a warrior, who stood listening within a few steps of where she lay hid; she was afraid to sleep lest her babe should cry; she traveled at night and rested by day, and that she might use one hand to grope her way through the thick bushes she carried her babe in her shawl and held the corners of it between her teeth. One stormy night, when she thought she would die, she rested her forehead against the bark of a tree, and as she shielded her little one, received upon her half-covered head the peltings of the pitiless storm. Nevertheless she rose again and began her wanderings anew. She at last came to a deserted house close by the river, and going down to the bank she saw two men on the opposite side, who crossed over to her and took her to their block-house. When she was taken in to the fire she became delirious. Her clothing had been torn well-nigh off her back, and her limbs were lacerated by briars and filled with thorns; there were thorns, indeed, which reached clear through her bare feet. From the good care of the whites and through the attention of the physician at Pittsburgh, to where she was removed, she in time recovered. The barbarity of the Indians towards her offspring and her own sufferings were such that her deposition of the facts, as they are substantially contained in her narrative, was taken before John Wilkins, Esq., father of the Hon. William Wilkins, and published, as much no doubt to arouse the people of the border to act against the savages as for any other purpose. For at that time, after a long peace, the inhabitants had grown backward in providing men for the defense of the frontier settlements, and the hope of the safety of these was in the spies and rangers who volunteered. We doubt whether a more forcible example of a mother's love and devotion can be unearthed from the mines of ancient or modern history; and yet she was but one of many.

¹ See Harriot's Travels in North America.

Of women equally as brave and devoted every locality had some. Among these, perhaps, one might be more distinguished than the rest, and the example of such a one was alone worth many men. For many years the recollection of Mrs. Peggy Oliver, the mother of the late J. B. Oliver, Esq., was fresh among the old inhabitants of the Sewickley settlement. They talked with pride of her whom they had seen when she was a young and beautiful woman, mounted upon a favorite horse day after day during the most distressful time in the middle of the war, riding on a gallop between the block-houses and cabins which reached from up in Hempfield to Marle's, at the mouth of the Sewickley. She appeared to lead a charmed life, for it is said that she ventured to convey news and carry instruction on occasions when no other could be found to do so. At Hannastown such another woman was Mrs. Matthew Jack, whose maiden name was Nancy Wilson. On the day of the attack she is said to have helped to carry and to have superintended the work of removing the records and papers from the court-house to the stockade. Her husband, at that time sheriff, was, as is well known, out giving the alarm among the settlers.

From these instances sufficient may be gathered to form an idea of the spirit of these women. They had become so used to war and horrors that it was their special province to dress the wounds of those who had been hurt; they knew all the simples which cured pains and aches, and in the absence of doctors they did all that doctors are usually presumed to do. They helped to sustain the defense of their cabins by running bullets, cutting patches, and priming the pieces. Many a time has the mother, upon a sudden attack, started up with her babe, while her husband took another child, and each fly to the wood in a different direction. Often they never saw each other again. Yea, sometimes has the mother been found dead, whilst the babe upon her breast was still alive. All could never be told; but certain it is that the wives, mothers, and sisters of these first settlers of Westmoreland were such women as bring forth strong-minded sons and gentle daughters; that they themselves were as boundless in their love and charity as the sea that knows no lessening, and that they possessed all the matronly virtues which, happily to be acknowledged, are everywhere the glory and the honor of their sex.¹

CHAPTER XXII.

LOWER LIGONIER VALLEY DURING THE REVOLUTION.

Ligonier Valley a Favorite Ground for the Indians, and the First Stopping-Place of the Whites—Privations of the Early Settlers along the Four-Mile Run, Mill Creek, the Old Road, and Indian Creek—Murder of the Campbell Family, and Captivity of Robert Campbell (with curious anecdotes)—He is sold to a British Officer—He is exchanged.—Killing of the Old Man Harman and three of his Neighbors—James Flack taken Prisoner—Escapes from Montreal, and comes through the Wilderness by means of a Compass—Charles Clifford taken by Indians in Ambush—His Account of the Manners, Habits, and Ways of Living of the Northern Indians—His Master cures him of a Hurt Foot—Peter Maharg taken by the Same Party—Is made to Run the Gauntlet—Clifford taken to Montreal—Is Exchanged after having been with the Indians nearly Three Years—Comes to the Valley, and Dies at Home—James Clifford and his two Dogs, "Whig" and "Tory"—His adventure with the Indian, whom he shoots—Indians lying in wait attack a Party of Five who go to the Fields back of the Fort—They kill Miss Means, Young Means, and Young Reed—Col. McDowell escapes with Miss Reed on his Horse into the Fort—The Bodies of the Others buried by the People of the Fort.

LIGONIER VALLEY takes its name from the old Fort Ligonier. The valley itself lies between Laurel Hill and Chestnut Ridge, the two westernmost ranges of the great Appalachiau mountain chain. No less from its physical distinction than from its historical association has it always been a prominent portion of the county. In extent it reaches from the dividing ridge between the Conemaugh and Black Lick, in Indiana County, to the Youghiogheny River, in Fayette. It thus passes through the whole breadth of Westmoreland; in length about sixty miles, and in width varying from eight to fourteen miles. No other region near it has finer springs of living water or more numerous streams, nor has any locality produced such quantities of timber as have been taken from its mountain-sides. When it was first peopled by the whites it was almost totally overgrown with monster trees, the latest remains of that mighty forest which scientific men say once hid the light of day from the western slopes of the Alleghenies.

The site of Fort Ligonier was the first stopping-place of English-born in Westmoreland, and the soldiers of the garrison and their families and the settlers that followed in the train of the army were the first settlers. This primitive colony and the settlement succeeding suffered much at all times through privation and from Indian aggression, but they manfully battled against all adversities with the ancient spirit of Anglo-Saxonism.

"Thy spirit, Independence, did they share,
Lord of the Lion heart and Eagle eye;
Thy steps they followed with their bosoms bare,
Nor feared the storm that scowled along the sky."

The slope of the country along the streams and in the valley admitted of easy access between those who had first squatted at the three forks of the Youghiogheny and the later ones about the stockade on the Loyalhanna, which answered to the citadel of the western province. These two incipient settlements approached towards each other, and under the beetling rocks of the high hills and over devious paths coincident with the trails of the old lake warriors the white civilization established a line of communication from sympathy and from wants. For a long time the depot of Ligonier supplied all artificial needs which it was possible to supply. It was the station where all commodities were bartered for, a designated point by the military authorities for the distribution of supplies; to here the settlers came from the Kiskiiminetas and from the Monongahela for their seed-corn and powder, and for many years after, when the word had no meaning, to go to Ligonier was to go to the "fort." From the northern or Fairfield side they went up the valley, and from the Donegal side it was down the valley.

¹ See Appendix "O."

This region had been always, so far as our knowledge goes, a favorite ground for the Indians, and their trails and foot-paths marked it in every direction. But especially was it convenient for those later outlaws that harassed the whole northwestern border of our State, of which our county was at that time the frontier. The lower or northern part of the valley suffered comparatively the most. The savages on their excursions, after taking a prisoner or a scalp, burning a cabin or stealing off a horse, could evade all pursuit by flying into the unapproachable forests of the north.

The sufferings and trials of the people of the valley from the time when Isaac Stimble, "an industrious inhabitant of Ligonier," was shot and scalped on the road to Bedford (of which Bouquet, in 1764, complains), down to 1792, when Mad Anthony had broken them up at the Maumee, and stopped their depredations forever in these parts,—their sufferings during this period, for reasons very apparent, have not been given to the world. They did not tell their griefs, but knew how noble it was to suffer and grow strong. Their fortunes and misfortunes are now but known through an indistinct jumble of exaggerated and misstated local traditions. Out of the crucible of historic truth isolated instances are preserved, and from the public correspondence and the contemporaneous history of adjacent counties we have searched laboriously and compared facts with the stories of the old people that we may say a word in this behalf. Of the general suffering, the fear, the uncertainty, the toil, the poverty, and the patriotism of these people, along with those, in truth, of the whole county, our splendid collection of printed archives will always bear testimony. This, however, is hardly all we want or wish for in a local narrative.

When we pick out a particular time when this general suffering was at the height, we will conclude that from 1777 to 1781 the people of this region were worried more sorely than at any other; one reason of which was that their means of defense were then at the weakest and worst. During 1778 and 1779 they were constantly compelled to seek the shelter of the fort or the adjacent block-houses along either end of the valley. Most of the people anyways near took up their quarters in temporary cabins near the fort, and remained there all through the winter. In the summer, when they had to go forth, it was only to gather their scanty harvests and again prepare for the winter. At those times for weeks together the men only ventured out, carrying their dinner of cold potatoes and hard biscuits with them. In the little meadow patches along the Four-Mile Run and Mill Creek, and in the deadenings on the hills north of the old road, they worked together. At the fort a kind of volunteer military discipline was kept up. The guns were kept primed, bullets cast picked flints handy, the hinges and bolts of the gate in working order, and the storehouse always with some provisions in it, however scarce the last crop.

Of the captivity of Robert Campbell we have the account as given by himself; and the fact of its being preserved is no doubt owing to the celebrity of the peculiar and fervent man, who, far and wide, was known as Elder Robert Campbell, a pious man, and in his day a main prop of the Fairfield Church.

On a day in July, 1776, while the father of this Robert Campbell was from home, a party of Indians came suddenly on this son and his brother William in the field; and while these were taken some others of the Indians ran to the house. The mother, with an infant in her arms, trying to escape, received the blow on her head, when she, falling down, killed the babe in her own arms. They were afterward found and buried in one grave. The rest of the children at the house, three girls and one boy, were made prisoners with the two boys taken in the field. The two youngest of the girls were placed upon horses which the Indians had stolen from the farm, each of the girls behind an Indian. The younger of these, unable to steady herself on the horse, was killed and left on the ground about a mile from their home. The Indians carried them off down out of the valley, crossing somewhere below Saltsburg, and passed on to New York State. The children were separated in Canada. Thomas, the youngest brother, was sold to an English officer and sent to England; the two sisters, after passing four years in captivity, were released, and came back to the valley. William also returned about the close of the war. After sustaining a captivity of about six years, Robert, with another prisoner, succeeded in making his escape. He came back again to the old homestead, lived to a good old age on the farm his father had cleared, and where his mother was killed and buried.¹

Some time later than this was killed the elder Harman, an old inhabitant, who had been of a family settled on Indian Creek with the Turkey Foot settlers as early as 1759, and who lived not far from now Donegal. Harman and three of his neighbors had been down the valley at a sale, and when they were returning they were all shot and killed, sitting in their saddles, by Indians lying in ambush along the road. After they were scalped they were left dying. Their bodies, found the next day, were decently buried.

¹ Further as to Robert Campbell, see township history.

Among the prisoners taken from time to time was James Flack, whose daughter was married to John Woodend, Esq. Flack was carried to Montreal, from whence he made his escape. He found his way through the endless wilderness to the fort by the assistance of a pocket compass which Charles Clifford procured for him when they were prisoners together.

Of the captivity of Charles Clifford we have a continuous account, preserved by his descendants, and which, arranged by them, has been of assistance to the writer. In addition to the narrative to which we have had access, we have secured some illustrations from old manuscript.

Charles Clifford, one of the original stock of the Cliffords of Ligonier Valley, resided on Mill Creek, about two miles northwest of the fort. During the winter they stayed near the fort, and in the spring and summer he and his men, like the rest, all went to work at the crops. On the 27th of April, 1779, Clifford, with two of his sons, went out to his clearing to prepare for spring work. When they came to the deadening they could not find their horses. The boys were set to work, and the father himself went in search of the lost animals. He passed up to some waste fields, to the place afterward known as McDowell's Mill, where he expected to find them, as he had done before. But not finding them there, he continued his search over the deserted clearings till he came out on the old military road running between Hannastown and the fort. From here he concluded to return by the road to the fort. After he came on to the road, he had not proceeded far till he was fired upon by five Indians lying behind a log by the side of the road. One ball passed through his coat, another through his hat, and a third struck the rifle on his shoulder. The savages with fierce yells bounding out, seized him before he could offer resistance. They caught him, and wiping away the blood which flowed from his face, caused either by a fragment of gun-stock cutting him, or by a bullet itself grazing him, were evidently well pleased that he was not injured. One of them, clapping him upon the shoulder, muttered, "You good man; you now go Niagra."

They then stripped him of his hat, coat, vest, and shirt, but left his pants and shoes. One of them, in a ticklish mood, taking his hat and cutting off the rim threw that part away, and put the crown part upon his head. Another tore the skirts from his shirt and put on what remained; a third put on his vest. The coat, however, they gave back to him, and signified that he should put it on. He said that he could not wear the coat next his skin, and wanted his shirt; but he had to submit, for they shook their heads in an unfriendly way and told him he must put it on, as they must go.

The Indians appear to have treated Clifford with all the kindness which their nature would allow. They evidently considered him, from the narrow escape he had made, as a person specially favored. Such seeming miraculous escapes as he had just passed through invariably moved the superstitious instinct in them. So they did not tie his arms as it was their custom to do with prisoners; but at night when they lay down they stretched a leather belt across his breast, and an Indian on either side lay upon the end to draw the belt tightly. As soon as they had lain down they were insensible in sleep. When Clifford was tired lying he gently drew one end of the strap from under the Indian by his side and sat up. The moon was full. He thought he could easily have made his escape had it not been for the Indian sitting upon the stump on watch. There he sat, silent it is true, and motionless as a statue, but he was wide awake; and there the Indian sat all night, not deigning to move till once the prisoner should offer to escape.

This party of Indians joined the main body near where now is Fairfield. There were about fifty-seven of them in all. The chief, according to Clifford's account, had his head and arms covered with silver trinkets. Here they tore down the fences to cook their meat, it being near the close of the day. After so doing they, under the direction of the chief, marched about a mile into the woods, there halted, ate their meal, and lay down for the night.

When they had first come together, Clifford had a curiosity to see how many prisoners there were, and if his sons were among them. They, however, had only one other white man, Peter Maharg. Maharg was then sitting upon a log much dejected. Clifford went to him and said, "Peter, they've got you here too." Maharg did not reply, did not even raise up his head. He had been taken that morning while he was likewise hunting his horses. He might have made his escape had it not been for a little dog that accompanied him. He had seen the Indians before they saw him, but his dog running farther ahead was seen by them. The dog ran back to its master, and they following it came upon Maharg before he got away.

The third morning they left the valley for their homes about the head-waters of the Allegheny. In this incursion they had come more than two hundred miles, had spent several weeks in time, and besides killing only one or two persons, had secured but two prisoners. We have the particulars of their homeward march as preserved by Clifford. They traveled during the day, and camped an hour or two before sunset. All then but eight or ten of them who stayed with the prisoners went hunting. About dusk they brought in their game,—venison, turkeys, birds, or whatever they could get. After feasting they lay down. This method lasted till they had crossed the Allegheny River, when it appears that after that they could not get so much as even a squirrel. Thence they began to suffer much from hunger; at one time for three days and three nights they had nothing to eat except the rind or under bark of the young chestnut, which they took off the saplings with their tomahawks, and which they themselves ate of, and of which they offered their prisoners. Clifford said he could not eat it, when the consolatory reply he got was, "Ah, you fool; you die." When they had got to this state they sent two runners ahead of the main body, when, on the third day, they were met by a number of Indians, both men and squaws, who fetched plenty of beans, hominy, and dried venison. They gave the prisoners as much as they themselves took.

The Indians then divided into two parties, and Clifford was taken to one town and Maharg to another. Those who took Maharg treated him with the greatest cruelty, but this cruelty was no doubt the expression of their disgust or contempt for one who grieved at his captivity, on the same principle that white men are always more unkind to the unfortunate. They made him run the gauntlet, when they all but killed him after he had fallen before reaching the end of the line. He was so badly beaten that he never perfectly recovered from the effects of their treatment, and bore their marks on his body when he was laid in the grave.

Clifford fared better. He had been from the first under the guardianship of a particular Indian, who was called his master. After he had traveled a few days without a shirt, his master, opening his heart and his sack, gave Clifford a shirt and an old hat. The shirt was covered with blood and had two bullet-holes in it. The master also showed him a marked kindness; for Clifford, before he was taken, had been clearing among the bushes and had scratched his instep, and the wound with his traveling had swollen and was much inflamed. One evening after camping he showed the foot to his master and explained how he got it. The Indian listening looked attentively at it, and without saying anything took his tomahawk, and going to a wild cherry-tree took off some bark, which he put into a kettle and of which he made a syrup. With the liquid he bathed the foot, and after laying the boiled bark upon the wound bound it up. It speedily allayed the swelling, and relieved him of the pain.

The Indians kept Clifford about six weeks, when they delivered him to the British at Montreal. During the time he was with them he had an opportunity of seeing how they lived, and of observing closely their curious manners; and being happily gifted with the faculty of telling understandingly of what he had perceived, his narrative was of some information. One of the most striking sights he witnessed among them was that of three or four prisoners running the gauntlet, one of whom was killed. At another time, when a horse which had kicked a lad was shot by the father of the boy, each of the bystanders took a piece of the raw meat, which, eating, they called very good. When at length Clifford was taken to Montreal he shared better than most of the prisoners by getting in favor with an officer of the garrison. While he was there he met Flack, whom, as related, he furnished with the pocket compass, by which he traced his way back home.

Clifford remained at Montreal till he was exchanged, about two years and a half after he was taken there, the whole time of his captivity being very near three years. After he was exchanged he returned to his farm in the valley, where he resided until his death. He lived to a good old age, and died respected by all who knew him. He is buried in the Fairfield or Old White Church graveyard, one among the oldest burying-grounds in the valley.

The next incident preserved from the mass of fabulous and exaggerated stories which we credit sufficiently to insert as authentic and verified is that of James Clifford shooting the Indian.

James Clifford, a son of Charles Clifford, one morning, most likely in 1778, went out from the fort, as was his custom, to shoot game. The young man had trained up two young dogs, one of whom he called Whig, the other Tory. Whig proved good for nothing, but Tory developed wonderful sagacity. It is said he had Tory so well trained that he would follow at his heels for a whole day and not go off till bidden. On this morning Clifford was walking along on a cow-path, when his dog Tory, contrary to habit, ran in front of his master and began to snarl and whine. Clifford knew that something was wrong, but he continued to advance in as cool a manner as possible, but sharply on the lookout. In front of him in his way was a large tree with thick bushes about its stem, behind which he espied an Indian, who, crouching down, was waiting for him to come nearer. He instinctively knew that if he ran back he would be shot at. So he went forward in an unconcerned kind of way, and as he was doing so fetched his rifle down by his side, cocking it. When he had got the first glimpse of the Indian's body he quickly fired. Then he turned and ran, escaping into the fort, while his father and Capt. Shannon were talking about the noise of the gun. The captain lost no time in starting out with a party of fifteen or twenty men to get the body of the Indian if he was killed, or to follow his tracks if he had made off. They did not find him, but they tracked the course he had taken by the blood dropping on the ground, and found on the path corks of twisted leaves, which had been forced into the wound to stop the flow of blood. It was supposed he died within a short time, and that his body was carried off by others who were with him and not far distant at the time. This would be confirmed by a reputed conversation some time after between some renegade white man¹ who

¹ This man was said to be Girty. If the man really told Knox he was Girty, he in all probability was some one who feigned that distinguished had come to the valley and Robert Knox, Sr., in which the stranger asked who it was that killed the Indian, when Knox said it was one of the neighbor boys.

The following also is of reliable authenticity :

On a spring morning in May or June, 1778 or 1779, a party of five left the fort for the hill across the Loyalhanna. The glorious weather and the time of year made the confinement of the fort and the neighboring cabins tiresome, and they forgot their danger in the eagerness with which they climbed the hill which rises up from the stream, and which was then covered with fields of growing flax. The party were a brother and sister Means, a brother and sister Reed, and Col. William McDowell. The colonel was on horseback, and all the men had their rifles with them. They were all going together, and had ascended the hill, when they were fired upon by some Indians lying behind a log. Young Means fell dead, Reed was shot, but ran say twenty rods, and then fell dead. McDowell and Miss Reed made for the fort with the Indians following them. The colonel slackened his horse for the girl, who as she ran along by the side of the horse reached up her hand, which he took, and he lifted her up behind him. The Indians overtook Miss Means, who was stricken with terror, and her they tomahawked and scalped. A rifle-bullet struck the stock of McDowell's gun, and from the glancing ball he carried a hand-wound all his life. Miss Reed alone escaped unhurt. When the whites went from the fort to get the bodies they found those who were killed lying not far apart, the brother and sister Means near together, both of them scalped, but, strange to say, Reed was not scalped.

These instances will, we think, answer our purpose. There are innumerable other captivities and murders, the account of which, as happening round the fort, have been preserved by common report, but we have considered them to be of such a character as would by the repetition be neither interesting nor illustrative. The general situation about these times we have alluded to before, and will have occasion to allude to again. Around the old fort and all through the valley instances like these were common till the end of the Revolution, and in the northern part the people were visited by warlike bands even after the defeat of Harmar and of St. Clair.

personage. After that war Simon set too high a value on his head to risk it among the people of Ligonier Valley or of any other part of Westmoreland.

CHAPTER XXIII.

UPPER LIGONIER VALLEY DURING THE REVOLUTION.

The Upper Part of Ligonier Valley—Remains of the Old Indian Fort—The Early Settlers here: the Harmans, Gays, and others—Williams' Block-House the Place of Refuge for these Early Settlers—Different Murders and Captures in this Region—Indians capture Andrew and John Harman along the Four-Mile Run—They kill one of a Neighbor's Horses and take Another—They watch the Cabin and hear the Mother calling the Boys—Carry the Boys towards the North—John Dies—After trying to freeze Andy to Death, and Failing in other ways to kill Him, he at last is trained up with a Chief's Son—He is adopted by that Tribe, the Senecas—Lives with them some Years—Is parted with for a Bottle of Rum to an English Officer—Taken to London as a Servant—After the Peace in 1783 comes Home, after they had long thought him Dead—His Account of their Ways of Farming, of Hunting, and of Fighting, with several Anecdotes of his relating—Capture of Jacob Nicely by the Coruplanters—He is raised and adopted by them—Marries a Squaw and Dies among them—His Father visits him before his Death.

IN the upper part of the valley the inhabitants, from along Indian Creek, about where now is Donegal, and from down the Four-Mile Run, had erected, as we have observed, a block-house on the place of a man named Williams, which they called Fort Williams. This was along the bottom of the Four-Mile, and the place is nearly midway between Stahlstown and Donegal. During the Revolution this block-house was a point to which the settlers gathered, and when there appeared to be no more danger they went forth again, took down the bars from the low-swung doors, gathered their strayed cattle, and furrowed out a little patch for corn or potatoes.

Among the earliest settlers in that part of the valley were the Hayses, the Williamses, and the Harmans. Some of the settlers in this part had come in in 1767 and 1768, and were of those few who first looked upon the remains of that singular structure which dates back to a prehistoric age. The remains of the Indian fort, as it was called, were still visible forty years ago; it was, no doubt, but a burial-place of some of that race which, antiquarians say, followed or were coetaneous or identical with the historic mound-builders of the Mississippi Valley. The chief evidence of the existence of those people here is drawn from their mural remains; and the plow-share has turned up the bones and buried arms and trinkets from their stone crypts.

The Harmans were perhaps among those who had settled in violation of the laws of the Province, occasioned by the technical quibble as to the rights of property in the ancient lords of the soil. Here among rocks and beasts, and half hidden from the savages and from the light, the elder Harman, an emigrant from Germany, with his grubbing-hoe and rifle, built a hut against a rock, covered it with bark, and began a clearing. Some of those who came at that time saw no other white face than belonged to their own family for more than a year at a time, and often lived for a season on the greens growing in their "stony" garden, and on berries from the woods. When more settlers came in, the settlements from each end of the valley began to meet; but the times were, if anything, growing worse. Then came a time when they were continuously watching and fighting. For the greater part of several years in the middle of the war the helpless children and some of the women were left in the block-houses or at stronger cabins away. In the winter the homes were deserted, and when a family was murdered and a cabin burnt, all flocked into the forts, till the hunters, like the dove of the ark, returning, brought word that the waters were subsiding.

The old man Harman, with three or four of his neighbors, as we have seen, was about 1777 killed when coming from the lower part of the valley. These were all buried where they fell but one, who, after he was shot, threw his arms about his horse's neck that the horse might carry him off out of the reach of the savages. They did not get the scalp of this settler, but he was found dead with his horse standing near him. The Indians took the horses of the others. The families can point out the graves of these buried men at this day.

The widow of Harman was left on the clearing of her husband, now a beautifully lying bottom-land along the creek, where the Laurel Run flows into it, on the main road from Greensburg to Somerset by way of Stahlstown. Then deadened trees stood through the little spots cleared, and stumps and piles of rocks were over more than half the ground. She had three boys,—Andrew, the eldest, fourteen years, and John and Philip. The widow and her children had been at the block-house, and when the spring opened she came back to the cabin with them. One morning the widow heard or saw some neighbor's horses in the lot down next the curve of the stream, and she sent the two oldest boys out to drive them off. From behind the upturned roots of a large tree which the water had washed and the storm had blown out there were three Indians watching. These were but a little way off the great Catawba trail running through the valley, and they were on their way northward. They lay in wait watching, and the boys came down directly towards them. When these were near enough the Indians jumped out and readily captured John, but Andy ran back towards the house as fast as he could. He was followed by one of the red men, and hearing him coming up close, he turned and saw the tomahawk as it glistened in the Indian's hand over his head. Andy threw his hands across his eyes to shut out the sight, expecting on a sudden the tomahawk in his head. The Indian secured him without hurting, took him back to John, and as they could talk a little English, told them not to call or make a noise or they would be killed.

The Indians took the boys, and climbing up the steep hill back of the creek, got to a place from which they could see the cabin and the mother near it, and from where they heard her calling the boys. They dared not answer; and the Indians asked them if there were any men at the cabin. Andy said there were, but there was not. They would have attacked the cabin, pillaged it, and scalped the mother if they had known that she was unguarded. At length they left, and in a lot upon the hill near came upon a horse and mare belonging to a man named Johnson, a neighboring settler. They secured the young horse, but the mare being heavy with foal, and of no use to them, they cut her throat. They loaded the horse with some pelfry which they had along, noticeably a camp-kettle which they used for boiling their meat in when they had any. They began their journey, and on the same day killed a doe. Of the entrails of the doe they made a soup. Andy said he was afraid they would offer some of the broth to him and his brother, but, on the contrary, they reserved this for themselves, eating every morsel with avidity and relish. They cooked over the coals some of the flesh of the deer, which they gave the boys. The first night they lay out on the Ridge not far from Fort Ligonier; they were near enough to hear a noise there, to which the Indians cautiously listened. They gave the boys a deer-skin to lie down on, and made moccasins for their feet out of the same material, for they were in their bare feet, and had left their tracks with those of the Indians in the sand along the creek when they were taken.

These Indians had with them some things which had belonged to the whites, and among these was seen a leather wallet. The boys thought they recognized it, and asked them some questions, or at least showed their curiosity. The Indian who had it then asked Andy if he knew it, and Andy said he did not. The Indian said he got it from a little old Dutchman they had killed the last year in the valley. It was the pocket-wallet of their father, and one of these, at least, was of the party which had waited for the whites and killed them.

When they came to the upper waters of the Susquehanna, which lay in their way, they had some difficulty in crossing. They had a canoe, but only one of them could work it, and in swimming their horse and in the care of the canoe it happened that the boys were left on the one side together with the guns. Andrew said that they might have shot the Indians from where they were then, and perhaps have made their escape, if they had had the presence of mind to do so, but they did not think of it at the time, and of course made no effort.

They at length got to the town of the Senecas, or Cornplanters, as they were called, from the name of a prominent chieftain best known to the whites. This tribe at an early day had many among them who could talk in broken English. They were now under the influence of the British, but remaining on lands reserved by the Commonwealth to their use, their descendants became partly civilized, and Cornplanter, then a young chief, lived among them, and died at an exceeding great age, a friend of the whites. At that time there were many white captives among them. The following summer John, the younger of the two, died of a summer complaint which took off many others, both red men and whites.

Andrew appears to have been one of the fortunate ones. He was taken by a chieftain or prominent man of the nation—some saying by Cornplanter himself—and kept in his family, in which there was a young Indian of about his own age, and these became companions. The Indians, trying to call Andy by his English name, called him "Andus," the name he went by among them altogether. Being young and pliable, and having been brought up hardily, he easily fell into the habits and ways of the Indians, and was treated by them as of their own. His family by adoption and some who liked him would not allow him to be ill treated or abused by the selfish ones.

It was during the second year of his captivity that the attack was made upon the villages and cornfields of the tribes along the Allegheny by Brodhead and others who led out the expeditions of that year from Westmoreland. This occurring in the early part of a severe season caused that improvident people much suffering. At one time, possibly late in the long winter of 1780, they were totally without provisions; and as the snow was deep and the weather severe, they had poor opportunity to get game. "Andus" was kept with them, and he was one more mouth to feed. They could not well dispose of him at the time, and they did not want openly to kill him. But his master wanted to get him out of the way in a manner unknown and unsuspected. One day, therefore, with this object uppermost, he sent his boy, the comrade of Andy, and Andy himself down the river on the frozen ice to another Indian town for corn. The chief was talking with his boy before they started, and Andy heard him say that when they should come to a thin place in the ice, or an air-hole, to thrust Andus in. Andy asked him what he had said, and the chief replied he was telling the boy to put down an old dog which they had and which followed them about. Andy was on his watch, but the young warrior did not make any attempt to do as he was bidden. At another time not far from this he was with his master himself hunting. They were very successful, for the man killed three deer and carried them to a place together before he quit. He then, towards the night, and at a distance away, gathered up one which he had skinned, and took it upon his back to carry it to camp, leaving Andus with the others, and telling him that he would be back soon. It was bitter cold. Andy wrapped himself in the deer-skins, the deer having been placed out of the reach of wolves, and fell asleep. He slept soundly, and in the morning was awakened by the master kicking against him, expecting to find him frozen dead. But under the snow Andus was safe. After that, Harman said, he thought they had made up their mind to treat him as themselves, and not to kill him.

He said likewise that there was one of the Indians of that tribe who was something of a gardener, and that he always had the earliest squashes and cucumbers "in the market." Squashes, it would appear, was this epicure's favorite dish. Andus, too, was fond of them, and the early ones would be a change of diet. So in the dusk of the evening, when the gardener was in bed, Andus went to the patch, and pulling up a mess brought them to the fire and covered them up in the coals. He expected to get up in the morning before any of the others and make his breakfast on them. But man proposes, and so forth; and while Andus slept a dog scratched out the squashes, and being a vegetarian feasted. When Andy got awake he saw the rinds lying about among the ashes and trampled upon. He picked out what he well could to keep them from the sight of the Indian. Nothing was said of it. The gardener soon, however, called Andus to him, having before the fire a nice heap of the forbidden fruit. He asked Andus if he liked squashes, who said he did. He told him to help him cook them. They were all prepared, the fire ready, and they were put on to cook. Andy did not suspect anything, but when he was engaged stooping about the fire, the squashes nearly done, the Arcadian jumped upon his back, cudged him, grabbed him by the throat, and throwing him upon the ground choked and beat him so unmercifully that other ones interfered. With difficulty Andus got away, but he lay for a time almost dead. He said that the resentment of his master and some of the others was so great that if he had died under the beating he believes they would have killed the gardener. And Andus did not wait for the squashes.

Andrew being young when he was captured, and being surrounded all the time by the red men, the knowledge of his home and relatives gradually became dimmer. He became in speech, in manner, and in habit an Indian. With them he feasted, hungered, fished, hunted. He remained with them for somewhat above two years, when he was traded to a British officer. The market perhaps being dull, and the Indian impecunious, his price was a bottle of "lum," the name by which they pronounced rum. By this officer he was carried to England, and remained in London for about two years. Then the peace occurring he was exchanged with other prisoners and allowed to go at large. He left the vessel at New York and found his way back to Ligonier Valley. His mother was still living. He entered her cabin, and a woman who happened to be at the house of Widow Harman on that day related long after the scene which she then witnessed. The old mother, after recognizing her long-lost child, her eldest born, for whom she had for years given up the hope that he was walking among mortals, and who now stepped out, as it were, from the dead, seeing, she uttered a long shriek and fell into the arms of her boy. Her joy, mingled with grief, could not be cou-trolled. In the words of the aged narrator, "she might have been washed in her tears." The news flew fast that little Andy Harman, who had been carried off years ago, was now in his mother's house. On the next Sunday the lowly cabin was crowded the livelong day. From up and down the valley, from the cabins built like aeries on the rocks of the hills, men and boys and women came. The mother and her son, who now took his father's place, lived long together. Andrew Harman, following his early habit of life, was content to pass most of his time in the woods. He was known as one of the best hunters in the whole region. He attended the numerous parties at wood-choppings and clearings, and it was his delight, and the delight of the boys to have him do so, to imitate the wild red men in their war-dances. He would tie a blanket about his head, and taking a tomahawk in one hand and a butcher-knife in the other, would dance and yell and sing to the music of the violin, and at every distortion of his body strike the hatchet and knife till the sparks flew. He could not bear to have the Indians talked badly of. He always took their part, and it is said that he even longed to escape from civilization and rove a half-savage, living as they lived. It is not at all unreasonable, for all experience teaches that it is easier to make an Indian of a white man than a white man of an Indian. In his gait, his style in the woods, in his idioms and gestures one might discern the effect of the habit which makes second nature. These habits themselves remained with him till he died. He was, off and on, always in the woods till infirmity consequent on old age compelled him to take his last bed.

We may also notice that Jacob Nicely, a little child, son of Adam Nicely, a resident on the Four-Mile Run not far from the Loyalhanna, was taken by a squad of those Seneca Indians, but at a time somewhat later, perhaps not earlier than 1791. He was watched by them when he was going from the house, where he had got a light-cake from his mother, to the other children, who were picking berries in the meadow. The children reported of his capture, and the party was followed beyond the Kiskiminetas, but without avail. He had been gone so long that his parents and their friends never expected even to hear of him. Jakey, as the people always spoke of him, was about five years old when taken. He was raised by them and adopted into the tribe. He forgot almost everything about the whites, and could not pronounce his own name when he had heard it. Many years after, when all was peace, a person from the valley, recognizing a similarity between the features and build of this man and a brother, made inquiry, and found that he was an adopted white, and had been carried from Ligonier Valley. This was reported to the father, Adam Nicely, who after weeks of preparation started, about 1828, to see Jakey before he died, for he was now in old age. The mother, too, was still alive. The old gentleman made the journey in safety, and met and lodged with his boy, now to all intents an Indian. He had grown to manhood, had a squaw for a wife, was raising a family, and had abundance of horses, some land, and plenty of hunting and fishing "tools." The old man returned, and "Jakey" promised him to come in the following year to see his mother. He gave his father a rifle for a keepsake, and accompanied him for some distance on his way back. Jakey did not come in as he promised, and they never heard more of him. When the father spoke of him, "his Jakey," tears always filled his eyes. But the motherly yearning of the mother ceased for her idol of a boy only when they laid her whitened head on its earthly pillow to its last and sweetest sleep.

CHAPTER XXIV.

CAPTAIN BRADY AND HIS EXPLOITS.

Capt. Samuel Brady, the Hero of Western Pennsylvania, is stationed at Pittsburgh in Col. Brodhead's Regiment—When his Family is murdered he swears to wage a War against the Indians long as he lives—He is sent to Sandusky to get Information for the Commander-in-Chief—He gets within sight of the Town and watches the Indians all Day—On his way back he kills a Warrior, and saves Jenny Stupes and her Child—His Companion, the Dutchman Phouts, and his pet Delaware—He and the Dutchman go up the Allegheny to get some News—They follow an Indian Trail—They capture an old Indian who tries to kill Phouts, but who is killed by him—Brady as Captain of the Rangers—Battle of Brady's Bend—Brady kills the Bald Eagle, who had killed his Relatives—Brady watches in the French Creek Country—He and his Men pursue a Returning Party of Indians—Brady's Leap—He follows up a Party which had entered the Sewickley Settlement—His Men attack a Party of Warriors and rout them—His Adventures with Wetzel and the Spies after the General War, as well as all others which have been substantiated or corroborated by Concurrent Accounts.

WE come now to take notice of the services of a man who attained great reputation for his acts of bravery and heroism, and who during many years was regarded as the guardian of the border of Westmoreland on the northwest. When, as the savages seemed to increase the more that were killed, when defeat followed defeat, when they had been emboldened, with the nature of the wolf, by success, then, when the men were out on some expedition or serving a term in the army, many a woman quieted the fears of the little ones by telling them that Capt. Brady and his rangers watched the Allegheny River between them and the country of the Indians, over which the red men could not cross while he was there. Brady was to our frontier what Boone was to the frontier of Kentucky, and what Kit Carson was to the California emigrants in the days of the Argonauts. He was the hero of Western Pennsylvania.

Samuel Brady was born at Shippensburg in 1758. In 1775, during the Revolution, he went from the West Fork of the Susquehanna with a company to Boston, where he at his young age displayed on several occasions that coolness and decision which carried him safely through many adventures, and which helped him to win a fame as enduring as the annals of our Commonwealth, or as the history of the Indian race. In 1776 he was appointed lieutenant in a company raised in Lancaster County; and after the battle of Monmouth he was promoted to a captaincy, and ordered with Gen. Brodhead to the headquarters of the West, then Pittsburgh. Brady in the mean time was stopping with his father, who himself was a captain in the Continental army, and who having been wounded at Brandywine was at home. While here he heard of the death of one of his brothers at the hands of the Indians. He stayed with his father till the beginning of 1779, when he joined his regiment at Pittsburgh. While here, not long after he came, he heard of the death of his father, who had been murdered in a horrible massacre by the Indians in April, 1779. When the sufferings of his relatives, especially the delirium and intense agony of his younger brother in dying, came to his knowledge, he was so filled with anguish and a longing for revenge that, it is said, he raised his hand towards heaven, and swore "he would revenge the death of these, and never while he lived be at peace with the Indians of any tribe." And he never altered his mind.

In 1780, while Col. Brodhead was in command at Fort Pitt, the country north and west of the Ohio and Allegheny was in the possession of the Indians, and when information came to Gen. Washington concerning the plans of the British agents and the intentions of the Indians, he wrote to Brodhead to select a suitable officer and dispatch him to Sandusky to examine the place and ascertain the force of the British and Indians assembled there, in order that preparations could be made against attacks expected from that point. Brodhead sent for Brady, whom he knew, and showed him the letter and a draught of the country. The appointment was accepted, and in May, 1780, Brady, with four Chickasaw Indians as guides and a few soldiers, began his march. He was dressed as an Indian warrior, and with the utmost secrecy he led his band in safety to near the Sandusky towns without seeing a hostile savage.

The night before they came to the towns he saw a fire, and approaching found two squaws reposing beside it. He passed them by without harming. Getting now into intimate connection with the enemy, his Chickasaws deserted him, but he proceeded with the rest, and went on till he came to the river upon which the principal town stood. Here he concealed his men, and when this was done he selected one man as his companion, and this one remained with him in nearly all his future adventures. The two waded the river to an island partially concealed, where they remained till the night. The next morning a heavy fog lay over the land till the sun, towards the middle of the day, dissipated it, when the first sight observed was a vast body of Indians—they say several thousand—intensely interested in running or racing horses which they had captured from the Kentuckians, upon whom they had just made a reprisal. Brady noticed particularly a fine gray horse which beat everything against him. They kept the diversion up till towards evening, the gray still the victor of the turf, till when two mounted him at once he was first vanquished in the race.

Brady made all the observations he could during the day; at night he crossed from the island, collected his men, went to the Indian camp he had passed on his way out, and taking the squaws prisoners began his march back. The distance being longer than he had expected, the provisions and ammunition were exhausted. Brady shot an otter, but they could not eat it. They stopped at an old Indian encampment, where they found plenty of strawberries, which they ate and satisfied their hunger. They here saw a deer-track, and Brady, telling his men that he might get a shot at it, followed it. He had gone but a few yards when he saw the deer standing with its side towards him. The last load was in his rifle. When he pulled the trigger the powder flashed in the pan, and he had no more powder. He sat down, picked at the touch-hole, and started on. He was on a path which, at a short distance, made a bend; here he saw an Indian approaching on horseback, with a child before him and its mother behind, and some warriors marching in the rear. He thought of shooting the Indian, but as he raised the gun he observed that the child's head lolled with the motion of the horse. He saw also that it was sleeping and tied to the Indian. He stepped behind the roots of a tree, awaiting a chance to shoot the Indian without danger to the child or its mother. When he had a chance he fired. The Indian fell to the ground, and the child and woman with him. Brady at the instant yelled to his men to surround the Indians; he himself jumped for the dead Indian's powder-horn, but he could not pull it off. The woman, from his dress and from his Indian yell, taking him for an Indian, said, "Why did you shoot your brother?" He disentangled the child and caught it up as he said, "I am Capt. Brady, Jenny Stupes; follow me." He caught her by the hand, and, with the child under his other arm, pulled her along into the woods. They were fired at but not harmed, and the Indians, fearing the approach of the whites, scattered and took to cover. They were, however, in no danger from these, for the men, having no ammunition, on the cry of the captain, themselves fearing massacre, ran away, and the squaws whom he had brought thus far from their camp near the towns, availing themselves of the hubbub, escaped. The men came into Fort McIntosh (Beaver) before the captain, who got in with the woman and child the next day.

Brady being desirous to see the savage he had shot, the officer in command sent out some men with him, and they went to search for the body. They were about quitting the place without finding it, when he heard the yell of his pet Indian, and following it up they came to the grave of the warrior, which the pet had discovered by the withered bushes. For when Brady had left, the companions of the shot Indian picking the body up, carried it to some distance, and laying it in a shallow grave, had neatly replaced sods and grasses upon it, and in the fresh earth stuck green boughs. They did this to hide the grave, but it led to its discovery; for the branches and leaves had withered, and it was this which, showing in the little glade, caught the sight of the tame Indian. Removing the shallow earth, they found the dead brave lying with his arms and trinkets ready, to as limited an extent as their commissary department would admit, to lift the hair-lock and slap the bloody scalp of the darling babe over the face of the weeping pale-faced mother in the eternal dreams of the ghostly spirit land. But his arms and ammunition and the foolish trinkets were taken from him, the twenty-four hours' buried skull was scalped for the trophy, as the boy nails the tails of muskrats to a post to keep count, and the body was again covered with its kindred earth.

Another incident connected with this expedition appears to be worthy of remembrance, being recorded as it was by one who had it, as well as the account of most of the other sallies of this Indian knight errant, from those who had the best opportunities of knowing. This came from the mouth of Capt. Brady himself.

After taking the squaws and commencing their homeward march, he took advantage of every precaution to elude pursuit, keeping, for instance, upon the dryest ridges, and walking over logs and rocks wherever he could. However, he discovered that he was followed, for at several times he saw in the distance an Indian hopping from one tree to another, and then disappearing. He concluded that he could not be followed thus by the sagacity of the Indians alone, but that they were led by a dog which tracked him and his party. He told his men then to go on while he secreted himself among the roots of a chestnut-tree which had fallen down, after walking on the bole of the tree towards the east. He was not long there when a little slut came up to the log at the farther end; she mounted the log, and came toward him, snuffing the track. Not far behind came an Indian. There was a choice now to shoot either the dog or the warrior. Brady chose to shoot the first. He shot the slut and she rolled over dead, and the warrior with a loud whoop sprang into the woods. The party was molested no further by these.

Col. Brodhead had given up the expectation of seeing Capt. Brady again; for, in the first place, the distance was much farther to the towns than it was marked on the chart and currently reported, and of course more time was required in accomplishing the result; and, in the next place, the Chickasaws, who had on going out deserted him, coming back to Pittsburgh, reported that the party had been cut off by Indians before they got to Sandusky. Brady, however, in time came in, and going up the river he was received with military honors. Minute-guns were fired from the time he came in sight till he landed.

Not long after Brady had returned from his Sandusky expedition and made his report, he was observed one evening sitting alone near the barracks in a kind of reverie. He was given to such spells, and would sit brooding for hours together. His temperament either partook of a melancholy turn, or else the great sufferings of unknown and unexpressed passions or griefs slumbered within him. There was at this time about the garrison a Dutchman by the name of Phouts, who was a great Indian-fighter, very brave, something of a backwoodsman, and who looked upon a redskin much as an inhabitant of the Chestnut Ridge would look upon a copperhead. His disposition otherwise partook of kindness, and being credulous he was also sympathetic. Phouts had a great regard for the captain, and noticing him in his dejection, his good heart was grieved at the signs of thought and care plainly visible in his countenance. Approaching him, in the best English of which he was master, he soothingly asked the "gabtan" what ailed him. Brady looked at Phouts for a short time without speaking; he then appeared to be at himself, and said he had been thinking about the redskins, and in his opinion there were some of them above on the river; that he had a mind to visit them, and in the end asked Phouts whether, if he should get the permission of the commandant, he would go along. This was what Phouts above everything else desired, and when Brady was done speaking, he raised himself upon his tip-toes, and bringing his heels down to the ground together, said, "by dunder and lightning," he would rather go with the captain than to the finest wedding in the country. Brady told him to keep quiet about it, not to tell anybody, that none must know of it but the colonel, and that he should call at his tent in an hour. The captain then went to the colonel's headquarters, and disclosed to him his project. It met with the approbation of the commandant, and as any information from the troublesome part of the country about the Allegheny was always acceptable, the captain had his permission to control the actions of the man or men whom he should take along. When Brady came back to his tent he found his friend there talking with a pet Indian. He told him of his success, and said that as it was early in the moon, and they must take advantage of the nights before they should grow brighter, they would start betimes early the next morning.

They immediately went to work to clean their guns, and having prepared ammunition and secured a little salt in a bag, they lay down to sleep. Brady awoke first, and stirring Phouts they started from the town. This was about two hours before daybreak. They were soon in a wood never traveled by either of them before. They kept along the river till near night, when they came to a creek which flowed in on the Pittsburgh side.

They had no provisions along, and concluded first to get something and to remain for the night. Phouts built a fire; and after covering it with leaves, they started up the creek for game. Not far up they came to a lick. Two deer came in soon after, and Phouts shooting one of them, they skinned part of it, and took it back to camp, and during the night jerked some of the rest of it for future use. What remained with the skin on they hung in the branches of a tree, intending to take it on their way home should they get safely back.

The next morning they started early and traveled all day. In the evening they espied a flock of crows hovering above the tree-tops along the river-bank at a distance. Brady said there were either Indians about, or else there was a camp near of some companies which were expected at Pittsburgh from about the Susquehanna. Phouts wanted to go and see for themselves, but Brady said that they would wait till night set in, when fires would be made by the party, whoever they were. They then hid among fallen timber and remained till about ten o'clock at night. Seeing no fire, Brady concluded that a hill or thick wood intervened between them. They decided to go and ascertain the facts. They went cautiously toward the river-bank, and had gone not more than two hundred yards when they observed, on their right, a twinkling fire. At first they thought that the river there made a short bend, but on proceeding they found another stream, which flowed into the river, no doubt the Kiskiminetas. Brady now wanted to go himself, but Phouts wished to go along. With great care they approached the fire together. They judged from appearance that it was an Indian camp, and much too large for them to attack; but, determined to find out all, they approached very near to the fire, and in the low glimmer of the light saw an old Indian sitting beside a tree, either mending or making a pair of moccasins. Phouts, who never thought of danger or of consequences, was for shooting the Indian, but Brady prevented him. After a careful examination the captain concluded that although the camp had been made by a large body, yet that most of them were away. In the morning they would know more, and taking the Dutchman he retired into the woods to await the day. When daylight appeared they returned to the camp, but saw nothing but the old Indian, a dog, and a horse.

Brady was not satisfied yet, and so he kept at a distance from the camp, circled round, and got on the bank of the river above it. Here he found the trail of a large body of Indians, who had gone up the Allegheny, to his judgment, about two days before. He then concluded on going back and capturing the Indian there. He determined to seize the old man alive, fearing that either he might shoot if disturbed, or that if he should himself fire, the report of the gun would alarm any Indians in the neighborhood and bring them down upon them. This he told to his companion, and they again cautiously approached the place. When they came near enough to perceive, the Indian was lying on his back with his head towards them. Phouts was ordered to remain where he was, and not to fire unless the dog made an effort to assist his master; the rest was left to Brady. The plan arranged, Brady dropped his rifle, and taking his tomahawk in his hand crept along the ground towards the Indian. He wormed himself along snake-like till he was within a step or two, when he raised himself up; with a yell he made a spring, and had the old man fast by the throat. The struggling of the Indian did not avail; Brady had his tomahawk over his head; the dog behaved civilly towards the strangers; Phouts came up and they tied the prisoner. They found nothing of value in the camp but some powder and lead, which they threw into the river. When the Indian was told that they intended to take him with them to Pittsburgh he showed them where there was a canoe. They got it, and taking the dog and captive along, floated down the river.

They stopped at their camping-place coming up, for Brady had left his wiping-rod there. They made a fire and went to sleep. At daylight the captain started for where they had left their jerk to have some to eat, leaving Phouts in charge of the prisoner and canoe. These were not long together till the Indian complained to the Dutchman that the cords on his wrist hurt him. The Dutchman with kindness took off the cords, and the Indian appeared to be grateful. Phouts had left his gun standing against a tree, and soon after was busy doing something about the camp. The Indian, seeing his chance when Phouts was not looking, sprang for the gun and had it cocked in an instant. When the Dutchman looked around he saw the muzzle of the gun at his breast. He, in turn, sprang for the Indian with a Dutch whoop. The Indian fired, and the bullet took along with it part of the belt of his loving comrade's shot-pouch. The Dutchman, with one stroke of his tomahawk, almost severed the head from the body.

Brady, hearing the report of the rifle and the yell of Phouts, ran back to the camp, and found the Dutchman sitting upon the body of the dead Indian examining the mutilated shot-pouch. Brady, with surprise, asked him what he had been doing, when the Dutchman held up his belt with the hole in it and said, "Yust look, gabtan, vat dat dam black dog vas apout." He related to Brady what had occurred, and they then taking the scalp of the Indian and his dog, and getting into the canoe, pointed the beak of it down the stream, and arrived at Pittsburgh the fourth day after they had left.

Brodhead had been no long time in command till he saw that the only effective way of fighting the Indians was in organizing large bodies, which either penetrated the wilderness for them, pursued them into their haunts, or directed the force of their attacks at places off from the settlements. In the expedition under the immediate command of Brodhead himself which about this time went up the river, Capt. Brady had command of the advance-guard, which was left entirely to his management. This force proceeded up the Allegheny, and first arrived at the flat land near the mouth of Redbank Creek without seeing an enemy. This place is now known as Brady's Bend. Brady kept his men at all times some distance in front of the main body of soldiers, acting, as they professed, as pioneers or scouts; and he had under his immediate control the men identified with him, all Indian hunters and scouts, called rangers, and from being their leader, Brady has been called the captain of the rangers. These being in front, at some distance discovered a war party of Indians approaching. Brady here displayed some knowledge of tactics. Having reliance in the power of the main body of the army to beat the Indians back when they should come together, and also anticipating that the Indians would return on the same route upon which they came up, he therefore hastened to secure a narrow pass higher up the river, where the perpendicular rocks nearly approached the water, and where a few determined men, such as his, might hold their place against a large force.

The Indians in a short time encountered the main body under Brodhead, and were driven back. They in swift retreat ran pell-mell to gain the pass between the rocks and the river, through which they had come. The pass was occupied by Brady, and when the flying warriors came up they were received with a destructive fire. They were again broken, and were now forced to take to the river. Many were killed on the bank, and many more in the stream. Some got out of the reach of the bullets by swimming, among whom was Cornplanter,¹ then but a young man.

A ludicrous incident occurred. After the Indians were across the river, Brady was standing on the bank wiping out his rifle. An Indian on the opposite side began a conversation with him, in the course of which he called him and his men, in bad English, cowards, squaws, and papposes, and put his body in such postures and attitudes and made such grimaces as to his notion conveyed the most contempt. When the main body of soldiers came up a canoe was manned, and Brady with a few others crossed to where the Indian had been seen. Finding blood on the ground, they followed it up but a short distance, when the Indian, lying in their way, jumped up. As he did so he struck his breast, saying, "I am a man." He was a wounded warrior, and, to be supposed, wanted to die game. Brady wanted to take him prisoner without harming him. But the Indian continuing to repeat, "I am a man," an Irishman who was along in the party, saying, "Yes, by the howley poker, you're a purthy boy," sunk his tomahawk into the Indian's head before Brady could interpose.

In this campaign Brady partially avenged the death of his relatives, for along the West Branch of the Susquehanna, the home of the Bradys, James, the younger brother of Samuel, had gone with others to the help of a neighbor. They were here attacked by Indians, and the young captain, his brother, having been scalped was left for dead. As he was thus lying, a young boy-warrior in training, at the command of the older ones, struck him four times in the head with a hatchet, each stroke leaving a deep gash. With all this the young scout was taken by a party to the fort. Four days he lay delirious; on the fifth his reason returned, and before he died he described minutely the whole affair. From his description of the chiefs it was concluded that the leaders of the party were the Bald Eagle surely, and likely Cornplanter. The Bald Eagle's Nest, as his camp was called, was for a part of the year at the mouth of Bald Eagle Creek,² which empties into the Susquehanna near Great Island. Vengeance was sworn by the sorrowing settlement against this chief. But the gratification of destroying this curse of the whites was left to Brady himself. On that day, at Brady's Bend, the party of Indians which Brady allowed to go into the trap was a body, perhaps a hundred, of Senecas on their way to join others at the Bald Eagle's Nest. Cornplanter was in command, and the Eagle himself was along. Brady thought he recognized him that day in the pass, and so he fired at him, but with what effect he did not know. He had a singular curiosity to see the face of every Indian he killed, and what he looked for no one could tell. When the battle was over he searched for the body and found it. The ball had done its work surely; the Bald Eagle was dead, killed by the man whose province it appeared to be to do so. The place of the battle bids fair to be known for many coming years by the name of the avenger.

Brodhead was one of the best Indian-fighters stationed at the post at Pittsburgh, and his vigilance kept the Indians for a time in a state of forced submission or quietness. The effectiveness of the measures was owing to the employment of the good frontiersmen whom he had constantly about him. Good spies and scouts were kept watching and making report, and between regular campaigns this kind of fighting and harassing was of as great benefit to the frontiers as regularly won battles. Capt. Brady with some of his men had at one time the French Creek country as his field of operations. It was while on duty here that in a foray he came into the region about the Slippery Rock Creek, a branch of the Beaver. To here he had come without seeing an Indian or any sign of one. On the evening, however, he came upon a trail, and this he followed till it was too dark to go farther without coming upon the Indians. But early the next morning he pursued and overtook them while they were about their morning meal. While he was following up with so much energy the party before him, there was a party of hostile Indians following him with a desire as eager. He had, in the first dawn, made his arrangements, fixed his men, and just as they fired upon the party of Indians eating around their fires, he at the same moment was fired upon by the party in the rear. The alarm brought them all to their feet. He and his men were now between two fires, and were far outnumbered. Two of his party fell, his tomahawk was shot from his side, and the battle yell given by the party in the rear was loudly responded to by those in front. There was, therefore, no time to contemplate, there could be no hesitation, and in their present predicament there was no chance for a successful defense. The rangers had to run for their lives; each ran for himself, and the Indians came in close pursuit.

¹ We believe the correct name of this chief was Cornplant, but we follow the usage.

² The ridge in Centre and Huntingdon Counties is called by this name also.

The captain in person was perhaps well known to some of the Indians. He made for the creek. Seeing him going in that direction they felt sure of taking him captive, for they knew the country and he did not. They thought and believed he was going into a trap from which there was no escape. The creek for a considerable distance above and below the point to which he was approaching was washed in its channel to a great depth. In the expectation of catching him there no attention was paid to the other scouts, who escaped safely. Throwing away their guns that they might keep near the swift runner, and drawing their hatchets and knives as they ran, the pack pressed forward with eagerness, ready to overpower and seize him. Brady comprehended their object, and saw at a glance his only chance of escape. The Indians were not to take him alive, that was his mind; and for coolness and determination he was well-nigh stoical. He kept his rifle in his hand. He saw the deep waters and the wide gap between the banks. He measured it with his eye, and concentrating his energy and strength in one effort he sprang into the air, cleared the creek, and stood on the opposite bank. Then he quickly primed and loaded his rifle, and was not done when a large Indian, the foremost in pursuit, came to the bluff opposite, who, when he saw Brady, was astonished beyond expression, else he would not have said admiringly, as Brady averred he did in tolerably good English, "Brady made good jump." He did not, however, stay to offer congratulation, or to contemplate the feat of agility, and recovering from the sensation of admiration by seeing the rifle almost loaded, he took to his heels, and ran as crooked as a worm fence, sometimes leaping high, at others suddenly squatting down. He expected every instant a rifle-ball in his back. Brady and his men had a place designated at which they were to meet in case they got separated. When Brady got there he found the other three. They marched back to Pittsburgh, as they said, half defeated. Of the Indians, they had seen three fall at their first fire. Brady was at the place afterward, and ascertained that his leap was about twenty-three feet, and that the water was about twenty feet deep. This is the place which in geographies and in adventures is still called Brady's Leap.¹

It would appear that there were some jealous bickerings among the emulous officers about Pittsburgh on account of the notoriety which Capt. Brady, from numerous acts, was getting. These complained that they were excluded from such honorable service, and an effort was made with Brodhead to allow them to follow up the Indians after one of their next incursions after a plan more consonant with the regular line of service. The commandant made this known to Brady, with whom he was ever on intimate terms. Brady, knowing his own efficiency and the efficiency of his mode of warfare, acquiesced in the proposed change, we may imagine with something of complacency. The opportunity for testing both plans was soon offered.

The Indians soon after made one of their accustomed incursions into the Sewickley settlement, committing the most barbarous murders of men, women, and children, and destroying such property wherever they went as they could not carry away. The alarm was brought to Pittsburgh, and a party of soldiers under the officers emulous for a chance was sent out to follow the invaders. Brady was left out. But he must fight somehow, and the day after the detachment had marched he got permission of the colonel to take a small party "on their own hook." At first the solicitation was refused, and it was only after much persevering that the final consent was obtained. He was allowed the command of five men, and to this party he added his pet Indian.

He did not move towards Sewickley, as the detachment had done, but crossing the Allegheny at Pittsburgh, he proceeded up the river. He conjectured that the Indians making the incursion had descended the stream in canoes till they were within a convenient distance to strike the settlement, and with this view he carefully examined the mouths of the creeks coming into the river, and particularly from the south-east. At the mouth of Big Mahoning, about six miles above Kittanning, the canoes were seen drawn up on the western bank. This was enough, and he returned down the river and awaited for the night. When it was dark he made a raft, and crossed to the Kittanning side. He proceeded up the creek, and found that the Indians in the mean time had crossed the creek, as their canoes were seen drawn up on the opposite or upper bank. The country about the mouth of the Mahoning on all sides is rough and mountainous. The stream was then high and rapid. Several attempts were made to wade it, and this was at length done three or four miles above the canoes. They made a fire to dry their clothing, and inspected their arms. They then moved for the camp of the Indians, which was made on the second bank of the stream. Brady placed his men on the lower bank. The Indians having brought a fine horse from Sewickley, he was fettered and turned to pasture on this lower bank; and an Indian coming frequently down to him occasioned the party there much annoying trouble. It seemed that the horse, too, wanted to keep their company, and they had to be circumspect in avoiding each. Brady was so provoked that he had a mind to tomahawk the Indian, but reflecting on the possible consequence, his judgment prevailed over his temper.

¹ Slippery Rock is in Butler County.

At length the Indians seemed to be quiet, and Brady determined to pay them a closer visit. He and his pet Indian by his side wormed themselves along the ground till they got quite close to their fires. They were lying asleep. The pet here gave his hair a pluck, which was a sign to retire, for they did not dare to speak to each other. The captain was regardless of danger in his curiosity, but the Indian retired. Having closely inspected the situation, Brady returned, and after posting his men, awaited in silence the approach of day. When the day broke the Indians arose and stood round their fires. At a signal given seven rifles cracked and five Indians fell dead. Brady's war-cry next broke on the air, and his party were among the wounded and dying. The guns of the Indians being empty, some were secured without resistance. The rest of the Indians fled and disappeared in the wood. One was followed by the track of blood, the flow of which, at some distance, he seemed to have stanchd. The pet Indian imitating the cry of a young wolf was answered by the wounded man, and the pursuit was renewed. The wolf cry was given a second time and answered, and the pursuit continued into a windfall. Here he must have espied his pursuers, for he was answered no more. Brady found his remains three weeks after, being led to the place by ravens preying on the carcass.

The horse was unfettered, the plunder gathered, and the party commenced their return to Pittsburgh, some of them descending in the canoes of the Indians. Three days after their return the first detachment came in. They reported that they had followed the Indians closely, but that the latter had got into their canoes and made their escape.

Other adventures he had, but as they were of a later date than the Revolution they need not be inserted here. He devoted himself, in accordance with his desire and in fulfillment of his oath, to war with the Indians, and the fame of his successful encounters no doubt highly exaggerated his reputation as a scout, and the fascination in the wild life of the hunter had drawn to his command some of the most noted characters of the frontier, among them the Wetzels and, it is said, Kenton. When the general war was over, and when there was no longer a commandant at the Pittsburgh post, Brady still kept up his warfare, and as he lived on the frontier, always in advance of the settlers, some of his later deeds happened in the new territory west of the Ohio, where these resolute spies guarded the Southwestern Virginia settlements, a general name for the settlements which extended to the Tennessee River.

Thus have we recounted what has come under our observation touching the life and services of this man, accounts which appear to be worthy of remembrance, and which have the stamp of truth and authenticity. People never, it appears, get tired reading or hearing of the acts of this brave man, and although many of his deeds have been preserved in other books, yet we feel justified in recording them among the annals of our early history.

Brady continued to battle for the white settlers long after the treaties with them at the close of the great war, up to 1793. The Indians, used to war all their lives, still continued to harass the settlers in disregard of treaties of any kind, and only for Brady and such men the West would have borne merely the semblance of peace. But after all, Brady, for an attack upon a camp of Delawares, in return for numerous murders committed by them among the settlers along the Ohio, was tried in a court in Allegheny County before the chief justice for murder, and, strange to say, was assisted by the testimony of Kyashuta. For an account of this trial we refer to the note marked with this chapter.¹

CHAPTER XXV.

LOCHRY'S EXPEDITION.

The Settlements in 1779 and 1780—Ferocity of the Savages, and Depravity of a Class of Whites—Some Whites from about Mannastown kill Friendly Indians—Kirkpatrick's Cabin attacked by Indians, and therein of the Custom of claiming Scapls—Brodhead ordered to send a Detachment under Maj. Craig from Fort Pitt to reinforce Gen. Clark—Clark's Plan of a Western Campaign—Westmoreland requested to cooperate with Him—Bickerings and Jealousies among the Leaders of the County—Col. Lochry, as County Lieutenant, under Instructions from the Council, raises a force of Volunteers to join with Clark—The Difficulties under which Lochry labored—Clark's Letter to the Officers of Westmoreland, disclosing his Plan of Campaign—Lochry's Friends volunteer—They rendezvous at Carnahan's Block-House—They proceed down the River after Clark to unite with him at Wheeling—Lochry's last Letter—Arriving at Wheeling (Fort Henry), Lochry finds that Clark had gone on down the River—He prepares Boats to follow—Goes to the Mouth of the Kanawha—Capt. Shannon sent forward with a Letter to Clark—He and his Men are captured—The Indians place them on an Island as a Decoy for the other Whites—Lochry's Men land some distance above the Island—Upon landing they are attacked by a large Force of Indians and entirely cut off—Memorial of Two of the Prisoners who were exchanged—Capt. Orr, and his Account of this Expedition—Lient. Samuel Craig's Narrative of his Captivity—New Volunteers called out towards the end of the Year 1781.

WHAT the state of our country west of Laurel Hill about the end of 1779 and the beginning of 1780 was may well be imagined. It would fill a volume to repeat all the testimony bearing on this one subject at this particular time. Some of the inhabitants, where it was possible for them to do so, had left, others were in real poverty. When the collector of taxes came round, he saw in some districts nothing but deserted homes, with rabbits running among the ruins of the cabins, and with weeds growing about the fields. At many places the graves of those who had formerly lived there could be seen near the garden fence, now lying down. Those who remained were collected near the forts and block-houses, or in clusters of two and three families, they barricaded one of their cabins for the use of all. Some farther remote dared the Fates, and trusted that they were too far off to be in the way of danger. At the outer edge of the settlements,—that is, along the Kiskiminetas, the Allegheny, and the frontier of Washington,—companies of rangers were formed to protect the rest, who at the hazard of their lives ventured out to gather their scanty crops or to prepare the ground. These were continually being driven in, so that many sowed who did not reap, and famine often stared them in the face. From 1778 to 1782 there was scarcely a community that had bread sufficient to do it from the harvest to the spring. Every few days word came of some depredation. Sometimes it would be a settler who ventured out to dig his potatoes, sometimes it would be a cabin full of children, sometimes a settler would be missed, and nothing heard of him for months, and even years, and frequently never.

¹ See notes Nos. 1 and 2 in Appendix "P."

The never-ending war, and the many causes concurring, led the whites to act worse towards their enemies than at any other time previous, and an incentive further was the standing reward for the scalps of Indians at war, which, offered early by the State authorities to encourage the inhabitants to assist the soldiers, was from time to time increased. As a general thing the settlers did not claim these rewards, but there were some very influential persons who did, and who, to their shame, made it too much of a business. Some light is thrown on this traffic in the notes to this chapter.¹ Col. Brodhead, writing to President Reed in 1781, says that forty Delawares had come in to join the whites in their frontier war, but a party of about forty men from the vicinity of Han-nastown attempted to destroy them, and were only prevented from doing so by the regular soldiers. He says that he could have gotten a hundred if it had not been for such open enmity as this towards all the Indians alike; that he was not a little surprised to find the late Capt. Irwin and Jack, Lieut. Brownlee and Ensign Guthrie concerned in this base attempt; and he supposes that the women and children were to suffer an equal carnage with the men. And although Col. Brodhead made several campaigns against the Indians and succeeded in inflicting punishment upon them, and although he used every exertion in his power, sometimes creditable and sometimes discreditable, yet he has borne testimony that the feelings and acts of the whites themselves were in part provocative of that fearful ferocity which was developed on the part of their red enemies.

We can, perhaps, from one instance see how this connection with the savages changed all the finer instincts of men who, had these same men not been accustomed to such ways as they were, would have shuddered at acts which they themselves did without any compunction:

A pious family named Kirkpatrick lived in a cabin

this time announces to President Reed that he has organized a party to go out after scalps, for although they did not make as much out of a dead Indian as out of a living one, yet it was less trouble and more agreeable to all concerned to shoot him at once. Col. Archibald Lochry, the county lieutenant, writes from Twelve-Mile Run, his place of residence, that there is no doubt the reward offered will answer a good end. In this correspondence he applies for more ammunition, and adds that for the reason mentioned they were to be applied, and at that time was the most needed. Col. Hunter had to report the unsuccessful return of a party after scalps; and in reply the president told him to be of good cheer, and that perseverance would in time produce better effects. Many scalps were sent in, one after another, and at one time as high as thirteen with accompanying certificates were invoiced to claim the premium. This was in 1781 and 1782. (See Col. Records.)

"An incident occurred which led to the repeal of this law before the termination of the war. A party of Indian spies having entered a wigwam on French Creek, supposed to be untenanted, discovered, while breakfasting, an Indian extended on a piece of bark overhead. They took him prisoner, but reflecting that there was no bounty on prisoners they shot him under circumstances which brought the party into disgrace and the scalp bounty law into disrepute." (Judge Wilkeon, in "American Pioneer.")

The inducement of the bounty led some of the whites to kill friendly Indians.

Col. A. Lochry to President Reed, 1780.

"TWELVE-MILE RUN (WEST OF LIGONIER).

"June 1, 1780.

"May it please your Excellency:

"In duty to my country I find it absolutely necessary to hire a gentleman in this county at a very high expense to lay the distressed situation of this county before your Excellency and the Council. Since Mr. Sloan, our representative, left this county we have had three parties of savages amongst us. They have killed and taken five persons two miles from Ligonier; burnt a mill belonging to one Langhlin. They killed two men and wounded one near Bushy Run. They likewise killed two men on Braddock's road, near Brush Creek. Their striking us again in so many different parts of the county has again drove the greatest part of the county on the north of Youghiogheny River into garrison."

¹ SCALP BOUNTY.—Rewards and bounties were offered at different times by the authorities to stimulate the soldiery and the people. How good this was in effect is questionable. In 1756, Governor Morris offered for every male Indian enemy above twelve years taken prisoner and delivered 150 Spanish dollars or pieces-of-eight; for the scalp of every male Indian above twelve years, 130 pieces-of-eight; for every female prisoner and male prisoner under twelve years, 130 pieces-of-eight; for the scalp of every Indian woman produced as evidence of being killed, 50 pieces-of-eight. These bounties were payable on delivery at any of the forte garrisoned by troops in the pay of the Province, or at any of the county towns to keepers of the jails there. In 1764, Governor John Penn proposed as a reward for the capture of every male Indian above ten years of age $150, or for his scalp when killed $134; for every female or every male under ten years of age when captured $130, or for the scalp of such female when killed $50. (Craig.) About 1782 the standing reward was $100 for a dead Indian's scalp, and $150 for an Indian captured alive and brought in at the time the reward was claimed. This sum was also allowed for the capture of every white man like Girty taken prisoner acting with the Indians. The law is said to have been repealed regarding the prisoners, but allowed in force as to the scalps. Col. Samuel Hunter, of Westmoreland, was authorized by President Reed to offer the rewards, as were also Col. Jacob Stroud and others. Col. Hunter about near the fort at Crooked Creek, now in Armstrong County. At that time there were some soldiers stationed at the fort. Two of these were at Kirkpatrick's house of a night along with a neighbor lad. In the morning they had had family worship, as was the custom of the house, and they had arisen from their knees. When Kirkpatrick opened the door an Indian sprang to the opening. The white man pushed him off with his hand against his breast, but as he did so the gun of the Indian in falling was discharged and the ball struck a little girl about eight years old, the daughter of Kirkpatrick. While the men were engaged in securing the doors two of them were mortally wounded by the Indians. Kirkpatrick himself shot one of the savages, when the three others of the party fled. After a time the lad, being let out, got on a horse which was in the stable and galloped to the fort, and on giving the alarm some other soldiers came out. In the mean time the wounded men had no water to drink but that which was left from washing the dishes. There was no surgeon at the post, and both men died that day. When one who had come from the fort was requested to scalp the dead Indian, he said that Kirkpatrick was the more proper person, as the scalp belonged to him who had killed him. Accordingly Kirkpatrick lifted it. Afterwards a piece of bark was procured, upon which the poor suffering child was carried to Shields' Fort, a distance of twenty miles, that it might there get attention; but mortification set in and the child died.

In February, 1781, Brodhead received instruction from the commander-in-chief to detach his field-pieces, howitzers and train, and also a part of his small force then about Pittsburgh, to join Gen. Clark. His own force at that post did not then exceed two hundred men after other troops from Maryland had withdrawn from along the Allegheny.¹ At this time all the Pennsylvania troops which could be gotten together were sent to join the Southern army under Gen. Greene, and at their departure new fears arose that the unprotected state of the country might tempt the British troops at the north to descend, whence all the militia of the State were ordered to hold themselves in readiness.²

In March, 1781, Gen. Clark disclosed to Governor Reed his plan of operations to lay waste the country of the Indians and thus protect the frontiers of Pennsylvania and Virginia. This plan had been previously submitted to Washington and to Jefferson, and met with their approbation. Clark desired the assent of the President of the Council for the volunteers which he said he could get west of Laurel Hill.³ The President in reply said they heartily concurred in his proposed campaign, but that they could offer him no assistance. They had, however, sent word with the member from Westmoreland to encourage the people here to co-operate with him in all respects touching his plan. Christopher Hays was the member of the Council, but he, unfortunately, was opposed to the expedition, and, with Marshall, Cannon, and Pentecost, was blamed⁴ for taking every step to disappoint the good intentions of Col. Lochry, who from the first encouraged Clark, and who took upon himself to promise volunteers. The fear of invasion had not yet put a stop to the wrangling among the leaders of our people, and these jealousies and bickerings were worse at the time when the people were suffering most. This cause of shame was often made apparent to them, and in many letters from the President to their cries of weakness and calls for help their open dissensions were called up against them. The letters of Duncan, Perry, Cook, Lochry, Marshall, and Hays all give evidence of this family quarrel. Every man in a public place had his traducer and villifier. It was no difficult thing for an unscrupulous man to get a dozen of his neighbors to sign a petition in which many vile things were said behind a prominent man's back. Brodhead and Duncan were informed on for speculating with the public money in buying manors and mill-seats; Lochry and Perry for speculating in ammunition and whiskey. It was like a dance where no two are partners at the same time: Brodhead, Gibson; Lochry, Brodhead; Cook and Gibson, and so on. They wrangled as badly as school-boys; yea, if possible, as childishly as a pair of toothless barristers, servientis ad legem.

Somewhat alarmed from the repeated representations of the state of our frontier county, and apprehensive that the aid of the militia would be too slow and tedious, the Council, in the early part of the year 1781, directed Col. Lochry to raise a corps of fifty volunteers to serve for four months, besides voting that a permanent company should be raised for the war. These troops were to be disposed of as Lochry might direct, and were to be supplied through David Duncan, the newly appointed commissioner of supplies in the stead of James Perry. Perry, it would appear, was no better an officer than he might have been, and it was alleged that much of the insufficiency of the militia called out from time to time was blameable to his negligence. President Reed, in a letter to Lochry,⁵ after complaining of the trouble they had in getting the commissioners to report regularly, says, "It is with much concern we hear that when troops are raised for your protection they are permitted to loiter away their time at taverns, or straggling about the country," and he fears there had been some negligence in the officers to whose command they had been intrusted. At another time he complains,⁶ that it does not seem necessary to have the

⁴ Clark to President (or Governor) Reed, Aug. 4, 1782, Penn. Arch.

⁵ Archives, vol. ix., 18, March 17, 1781.

⁶ Id., March 26, 1781.

The following notes from the Archives, confirming the text, are presented:

¹ Craig's History of Pittsburgh, 160.

² Egle's History of Pennsylvania, 201.

³ Penn. Archives, Old Series, vol. ix., 23.

troops staying about Hannastown, and advises the colonel to place them where they would be of more benefit.

Col. Lochry, in sending in his report, in April, 1781, says that the savages had begun their hostilities, having that early struck the western settlements at four different places, taking and killing thirteen persons, two of whom were killed within one mile of Hannastown. Besides this they took away a number of horses and effects. He avers that the county at that time was more depopulated than it had ever been, and that if the savages knew the weakness of the settlement they could easily drive the people over the Youghiogheny. He was doubtful, too, whether they could keep the militia long for want of provisions. There was no ammunition in the county but what was public property, but of which he had given some out to the people with which to defend themselves. He had by this time built a magazine protected by a block-house for the stores near his own house, but this the president did not favor, and directed the stores to be distributed at various posts.

The plan of Clark met with the approval of the commander-in-chief as well as of the president and Council, for it was supposed that offensive operations would keep the Indians at home, and prove a relief more effective to the frontier than that offered by any defensive force whatever. Clark disclosed his plan of campaign in a letter to the officers of Westmoreland, dated the 3d of June, 1781. After stating with what pleasure he heard of the attempt being made by the officers of the county to fall on some mode of distressing the Indians in the coming campaign, either by a separate expedition, as talked of, or by giving assistance to the one he was ordered to execute, he goes on to say that his present object was the Shawanese, Delaware, and Sandusky towns. The Delawares of the Muskingum had removed to the west of the Scioto, and those formerly living up the Allegheny to the Sandusky. If the expedition from Westmoreland attacked the Sandusky towns, he might at the same time make a diversion on the country of the Shawanese and Delawares. Both of these armies by forming a junction might then make some effectual movement which should put an end to the Indian war. Each party might thus facilitate the operations of the other, and so divert the attention of the tribes that they would fall an easy prey. And he advised them that if it was out of their power to get supplies in time for an expedition of such length, it would be advisable to take such measures as would enable the one army to execute the project laid out for the two. If prejudice were laid aside, and all their strength exerted, there was a certainty of peace in the fall.

So spoke Clark, a brave, cool, resolute man of genius, and who had been encouraged by the men who had the good of the country at heart. The people of Westmoreland were, on account of the known ability of Clark, expected to assist him, but when the decisive time came there were but two men of the prominent leaders in all the county who actually offered their services to lead the volunteers. There had been three hundred promised from the two counties of Washington and Westmoreland, and from the encouragement there were hopes that nearly this number would be raised.

By July the four-month militia ordered to be raised had been mustered in, within three weeks after receiving instructions, and the company of volunteers for the war under Capt. Thomas Stokely had above thirty

March 27, 1781.—Brodhead informs President Reed that it was impossible for him to garrison Fort Armstrong and Fort Crawford (Kittanning and Pickety, or Logan's Ferry) until the commander-in-chief should order him to evacuate Fort McIntosh.

Col. Lochry to President Reed.

"TWELVE-MILE RUN, April 2d, 1781.

"I am just returned from burying a man killed and scalped by the Indians at Col. Pomroy's house; one other man is missing, and all Pomroy's effects carried off."

Gen. William Smith, of Carlisle, to President Reed.

"April 18, 1781.

"Mr. Smith will doubtless inform your Excellency how the People of Westmoreland are drove and distressed by the Indians."

James Perry to President Reed.

"WESTMORELAND COUNTY, SEWICKLEY, July 2d, 1781.

"About three weeks ago one James Chambers was taken prisoner about two miles from my house; last Friday two young women were killed in Ligonier Valley, and this morning a small garrison at Philip Chugensmith's, about eight miles from this and four or five miles from Hannastown, consisting of between twenty and thirty women and children, were destroyed, only three making their escape. The particulars I cannot well inform you, as the party that was sent to bury the dead are not yet returned, and I wait every moment to hear of or perhaps see them etlike at some other place. That party was supposed to be about seven-teen, and I am apt to think there are etll more of them in the settlements. Our frontiers are in a very deplorable situation. . . ."

Minutes of a Meeting in Westmoreland County.

"Agreeable to Publick notice given by Coll. Hays to the Principal Inhabitants of the County of Westmoreland to meet at Capt'n John McClellan's on the 18th Day of June, 1781.

"And WHEREAS there was a number of the Principal people met on the 2d Day, and unanimously chose John Proctor, John Pomroy, Charles Cambell, Saml. Moorhead, James Barr, Charles Foreman, Isaac Mason, James Smith, and Hugh Martain a Committee to Enter into resolves for the defence of our frontiers, as they were informed by Christ. Hays, Esq., that their proceedings would be approv'd of by Council.

"1st Resolv'd, that a Campaign be carried on with Genl. Clark.

"2d Resolv'd, that Genl. Clarke be furnished with 300 men out of Pomroy's, Beard's, and Davises Battalion.

"3dly, Resolv'd, that Coll. Archd. Lochry gives orders to sd Colle. to raise their quota by Volunteers or Draught.

"4thly, Resolv'd, that £6 be advanced to every voluntier that marches under the command of Genl. Clark on the propos'd Campaign.

"5th, And for the further Incouragement of Voluntiers, that grain be raised by subscription by the Different Companies.

"6thly, that Coll. Lochry council with the Officers of Virginia respecting the manner of Draughting those that associate in that State and others.

"7th, Resolved, that Coll. Lochry meet Genl. Clark and other officers, and Coll. Crawford, on the 23d Inst, to confer with them the day of Rendezvouse.

"Signed by order of Committee,

"JOHN PROCTOR, President.

—Penn. Archives, vol. ix. p. 559.

Duncan, as commissary, went through every settlement west of Laurel Hill for forage for the expedition, but could not get enough to supply even the troops at Fort Pitt and at the posts, neither would Brodhead let any provisions pass down the river.—Penn. Archives, vol. ix, 190.

men. At that time the enemy were almost constantly in the country, killing and captivating the inhabitants. The subject of the proposed expedition had been much talked of, and a meeting of the foremost men of the county, presided over by Christopher Hays, gave the expression of the people.¹

But all they gave was their expression, and the most of these men in private talk (which really had more weight) expressed their fears at leaving their homes exposed by going off. Brodhead also, from motives of jealousy, retarded the campaign, not only by prohibiting supplies from leaving Pittsburgh, but by giving out that he himself was about organizing an expedition for the Sandusky towns, and calling on the people to assist him.

But Lochry had made up his mind, and no doubt harassed almost to death, wanted to convince the people that he was not what some said he was. Clark determined to wait no longer on volunteers from here, and taking with him what he had and relying on others from Kentucky, he left Fort Pitt down the river.

The whole force of Lochry rendezvoused July 24, 1781, at Carnahan's block-house, about eleven miles northwest of Hannastown. Among them were Capt. Robert Orr, one of the most steadfast of Lochry's friends, who at that time was a captain in the militia, and who, although he had no power to order his men out of the county, not only volunteered to be one of the party to accompany Lochry, who was so warmly entreated by Clark to come, but exerted his influence in inducing others to volunteer. Capt. Thomas Stokely, who was Lochry's right-hand man, and Capt. Samuel Shearer each was at the head of a company of rangers, and Capt. Charles Campbell had a company of horse.

On the next day (July 25, 1781), Lochry in command, they set out for Fort Henry, now Wheeling, by way of Pittsburgh. On the 4th of August, Clark was at Wheeling, and at that time Lochry, with Capt. Stokely's company of rangers, thirty-eight men, and about fifty other volunteers, some of them under Capt. Shearer, was at Mericle's (Casper Markle) mill on his way out. In his letter to the president of the Council of this date he says that others who were expected to join him had been hindered from going. He says he proposed to join Clark at Fort Henry, on the Ohio. This is the last letter of his correspondence.²

The men Lochry took with him were allowed, on all sides, to have been of the very best for Indian fighting. But they were in a deplorable condition to leave home. The company of Capt. Stokely is described as being literally half-naked. An outfit sufficient for these was sent after them by the president through Ensign William Cooper, but it is doubtful whether it reached them. The whole number that left with Lochry was one hundred and seven.

The troops sent from Fort Pitt under the direction of the general of the army were under Capt. Isaac Craig, of the artillery. These proceeded to the Falls of the Ohio, whence, from a disappointment arising from the failure of the Kentucky troops to unite with Clark there, they returned home. Clark was not, therefore, able to prosecute his intended plan of operations, as all the forces he could collect amounted to but seven hundred and fifty men. Lochry was to follow Craig down the river, and under instructions from Clark, they together were to proceed to the mouth of the Miami River. Clark changing his plans did not go that way, but left a small party at the place intended for meeting, with instructions for Lochry to follow him.

When Lochry's force arrived at Fort Henry they found that Clark had gone down the river, leaving for them some provisions and a traveling-boat, with directions for them to follow and join his army at a point twelve miles below. They were, however, detained here some ten days in preparing temporary boats for the transportation of their horses and men.

In time, however, they launched their frail boats and passed down the river; but when they arrived at this second designated point they found that Clark had gone down the river but the day before, leaving a few men with one boat under Maj. Craycroft, but no provisions or ammunition, both of which they were greatly in need of. Clark had promised and left word that at the mouth of the Kanawha he would await their arrival. When they at length came there they found that he, on account of the frequent desertions of his men, in order to prevent more had been obliged to proceed down the river without them. Here they found affixed to a pole a letter from him which directed them to follow.

Their situation now was such as to create alarm. Their provisions and forage were nearly exhausted, there was no source of supply in that country but the military stores of themselves in the care of Clark, the river was low and uncertain, and as they were inexperienced in piloting and unacquainted with the channels they could not hope to overtake him. Lochry then dispatched Capt. Shannon in a boat

William Moore, Esq., President, and the seal of the State, at Philadelphia, 22d of December, 1781.

"Attest,
"J. MATLACK, Sec."

"WM. MOORE, Presd.

This revocation of the commission of Lochry is of record in the recorder's office, Greensburg.

¹ Supra. See note.

² The Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania:

"To all to whom these presents shall come, know, That whereas we have heretofore appointed Archibald Lochry, of the County of Westmoreland, Esquire, to be Prothonotary of the said County of Westmoreland, and commissioned him accordingly; and, whereas, the said Archibald Lochry is said to be deceased or made captive by the Indians, we have therefore thought proper to supersede the said appointment and commission, and do hereby supersede and revoke and make null and void the same, anything in the said commission contained to the contrary here or anywhere notwithstanding.

"Given by order of the Council under the hand of his Excellency with four men, with the hope of overtaking Clark and securing the much-needed supplies. Before they had proceeded very far they were taken prisoners by the Indians. Shannon had been intrusted with a letter from Lochry to Clark, in which was detailed the situation of Lochry's men. About this time, it is also narrated, Lochry waylaid a party of nineteen deserters from Clark's command, and these on being released by him joined with the Indians, probably in order to avail themselves of an opportunity to escape home. Capt. Shearer's company was left in command of Lieut. Isaae Anderson.

The Indians had had knowledge of the expedition, but had been in the belief that the forces of Clark and of Lochry were acting together. Being under this impression they were afraid to attack the main force, as Clark had a piece of field artillery with him. But now being apprised of the actual state of affairs by the capture of Shannon, and learning from the report of the deserters the weakness of Lochry's party, they speedily sent their runners out in all directions, and collected in great numbers at a point designated some distance below the mouth of the Miami River where it empties into the Ohio, and there awaited for the arrival of the whites to destroy them.

They thereupon placed the prisoners whom they had taken in a position on the north side of the river, near the upper end of an island, which at this day is called "Lochry's Island,"¹ where they could be readily observed by those coming down the river. They promised to spare the lives of these prisoners upon the condition that they should hail their companions as they passed and induce them to come to their succor. They were to stand like Demas ("gentleman-like") at the Hill Luere, beckoning the pilgrims.

Lochry's men, however, wearied with their slow progress, in evil heart at their disappointments and continuous misfortunes, and in despair of reaching Clark's army, landed on the shore of the Ohio at a point about three miles on this side of the island where their companions were placed as a decoy. The spot appears to have attracted them by its inviting beauty. It was at the inlet of a creek, which since that day has been called Lochry's Creek, where it empties into the Ohio, between nine and ten miles below the mouth of the Miami.

They drew their boats to the shallow shore, and at about ten-o'clock in the forenoon of the 24th of August, 1781, here landed. After landing they removed their horses ashore, and turned them loose to graze that they might obtain sufficient to keep them alive until they should reach the falls of the river (now Louisville), one hundred and twenty miles distant. Before long one of the men had killed a buffalo, and all the party, except a few who were keeping watch over the horses, were engaged about the fires which they had kindled preparing a meal.

The Indians, however, during that time had their runners out all along the river-banks, so that it was highly dangerous for a landing to be made at any place, for parties could be collected at any point at the shortest warning. So Lochry's men were scarcely well landed on shore when they were attacked. Quick, sharp, effective, as was the wont of the savages in their attacks,—lightning and thunder together,—into the midst of the men from an overhanging bluff came a volley of rifle-balls. On this bluff, above the party of whites, were large trees. On these trees and behind them, having the whites down below them and at their mercy, like bats and vampires clung the savages.

The men seized their arms and defended themselves as long as their ammunition lasted, and as they did so attempted to escape to their boats. But the boats were unwieldy, the water was low and shoaly, and their force much weakened and too unavailable. The Indians, seeing their opportunity, closed in from their side upon the whole party, who being no longer able or in a condition to resist were compelled to be taken prisoners, some of them, with a hope of mercy, surrendering.

The few words with which this disastrous expedition in all general histories of the border is dismissed agree in this, that the lesser number of the whole party escaped death or captivity. All the best authorities say that none at all escaped except those that escaped after they had been taken. Lochry himself was among the first who were killed, falling in defending his countrymen, as he was sworn to, even in the wilderness of a strange and foreign territory.

Orr relates that Lochry, with some other of the prisoners, immediately after being taken was killed. It is probable that an indiscriminate slaughter would have taken place had not the chief who commanded them, or whom they at least obeyed, come up in time. This chief said to the whites that these murders were committed by them in retaliation for those Indians who were killed after they had been taken, as they alleged, by Brodhead on the Muskingum some time before.

Of the one hundred and six or seven of Lochry's party at the time of the surrender forty-two were killed and sixty-four were taken prisoners. The attacking party of Indians was much the larger. These were a mixture of various tribes, and among these various tribes were the prisoners and booty divided in proportion to the number of warriors engaged.

The next day the Indians with their prisoners set out for the Delaware towns. Before they separated they were met by a party of British and Indians under a Maj. Caldwell, with (as is reported) the Girtys and Alexander McKee in their train, they professing to be on their way to the falls to attack Clark. With these the greater number of the Indians who had helped to capture Lochry's men returned to the

¹ Written "Laughrey's Creek," and "Laughrey's Island."

Ohio. A few only remained with the prisoners and spoils, and these when they separated were taken to the various towns to which they had been assigned. The prisoners were held in captivity until the next year, which brought the Revolutionary war to a close. After the preliminary articles of peace were signed, late in the fall of 1782, these prisoners were ransomed by the British officers in command of the northern posts, to be by them exchanged for British prisoners in the hands of the Americans. These were sent to the St. Lawrence. A few of them taken had previously effected their escape, a few deserted from Montreal, and the rest of those who were left sailed in the spring of 1783 from Quebec to New York, and returned home to Westmoreland by way of Philadelphia, these having been absent twenty-two months. But more than one-half of those who left Pennsylvania with Col. Lochry never returned.

After the men left Pittsburgh they were not heard of for many weeks. When Capt. Craig returned he could not be persuaded but that Lochry himself, with his men, had returned home. But the people of Westmoreland waited till at last all hope died. We see from some of the correspondence how the word was at length received, and how hope almost changed into despair. Brigadier William Irvine had been ordered to the command of Fort Pitt on the 24th of September, 1781, and in a letter from him of December 3d to President Moore the result is announced in the following words:

"I am sorry to inform your Excellency that this country has got a severe stroke by the death of Colonel Lochry and about one hundred—it is said—of the best men of Westmoreland, including Captain Stokely and his Rangers. Many accounts agree that they were all killed or taken at the mouth of the Miami River,—I believe chiefly killed. This misfortune, added to the failure of General Clark's expedition, has filled the people with great dismay. Many talk of returning to the east side of the mountain in the spring. Indeed there is great reason to apprehend that the savages, and perhaps the British from Detroit, will push us hard in the spring, and I believe there never were posts of a country in a worse state of defence."¹

In reply to this letter, President Moore said that the loss of Col. Lochry, with his men, and the distressed state of the post and the country round it gave them great pain.

Of those who were carried to Canada were Isaac Auderson, of Capt. Shearer's company, and Richard Wallace, the quartermaster to Lochry's command. In a memorial to the president of the Council they represented that they were inhabitants of Westmoreland County, who had had the misfortune to be made prisoners by the Indians on the 24th of August, the day on which Lochry was surrounded and defeated; that they had been carried to Montreal, and kept in close confinement there till the 22d of May, 1782; and that after a long and fatiguing march they had got into the city on the day before² at three o'clock. As they were destitute of money and clothes, and could not get home without them, they prayed the president and Council to take their case into consideration, and allow them pay from the time they had been taken. They said they were under Lochry when they were taken, and that they had a list of all, officers and privates, of the party who were then prisoners, which information they were ready to give the Council. If the list or any other information was furnished, we do not know where it can be found. It has certainly never been in print.

The particulars of this campaign were subsequently put in print as the narration of Capt. Orr (before referred to), who accompanied Lochry. From the manner it corroborates official documents, it must be allowed a special degree of credence. It is also corroborated by a manuscript account by Ensign Hunter, which Mr. Albach, in his "Annals of the West," refers to, and who has therein published Orr's account.³

Capt. Orr was wounded by having his arm broken in the engagement. He was carried prisoner to Sandusky, where he remained several months. The Indians finding that his wound was stubborn, and that they could not cure it, at length carried him to the military hospital at Detroit. From here in the winter he was transferred to Montreal, and at the end of the war exchanged with other prisoners.⁴

But the only account of individual suffering and of the distress attending the participants in this unfortunate expedition is the one still retained in the family of the Craigs of Derry township. For of those of our frontier men who were distinguished either for personal bravery or on account of their suffering in some way in the interest of the people, we may here with propriety recall Samuel Craig the younger. Craig was a lieutenant in Capt. Orr's company, and was taken prisoner with many others. After they had taken him, and while they were crossing the river with him, or likely taking him to shore from the stream itself, some of the Indians in the boat threw him out intending to drown him. They kept pushing his head under as it emerged out of the water, and as he grasped the sides of the canoe with the tenacity and despair of a drowning man they beat his hands with their paddles to make him let go. Being an expert swimmer he was hard to drown, and seeing this finally, when he was well-nigh exhausted, one of the Indians claimed him for his prisoner and as his property took him into the canoe, and kept him for the time under his own protection.

With these Indians and some few prisoners with them whom they had retained, Craig suffered all the punishment which came in a natural way from hunger and cold upon them all alike. So too he suffered from threats and fears of horrible torture. At times they were all nearly starved. Once when they were

³ "Annals of the West," by James R. Albach, Pittsburgh, W. S. Haven, 1856.

⁴ In 1805 he was appointed an associate judge in Armstrong County, and he held this office until his death in 1833, in his eighty-ninth year.

¹ Archives, vol. ix. p. 458.

² That was Philadelphia, July 2, 1782.

in a famishing condition they by fortune came across a small patch of potatoes. These they dug up and gathered together for a feast. In the night, when the others had fallen asleep, Craig, who was lying between two Indians, and who not yet had the pangs of hunger assuaged, rose up from between them at the risk of his life, and getting at the raw potatoes made what he declared was the greatest feast of his life. He took his place between the Indians without having been detected. At another time they were forced of necessity to make a meal of a wolf's head which was almost carrion when they found it. They boiled it into a soup and ate it with avidity.

This Samuel Craig was possessed of a cheerful nature, and could submit to dangers and hardships with good grace. He was especially fond of music, and was something of a singer. In his captivity he frequently sang his homely songs "to strangers in a strange land." This singing not only pleased the Indians, but actually was the means of sparing his life, for he had not been among them long when all the prisoners were taken out and set upon a log side by side. Their faces were blackened, which was done to indicate the doom of the captives, and the Indians grouped themselves in a circle not far round. At that terrible moment Craig, it is said, retained his self-command; he raised his voice and sang loud and clear the most melodious air perhaps he ever sang. He alone was saved of his companions.

He was sold to the British for the usual consideration, a gallon of whiskey. He was then exchanged and returned home. He subsequently married a daughter of John Shields, Esq., by whom he left a family of five sons and two daughters. He was a fuller, and built a fulling-mill on the bank of the Loyalhanna near New Alexandria.¹

During the remaining part of the year 1781 the Indians in squads approached from many directions, and the county lieutenants received circular letters to hold the militia in constant readiness. By an act of Assembly calling out some companies for the Westmoreland and northern frontiers, those who enlisted were allowed to be exempt from taxes. The country was indeed so impoverished that the troops about Fort Pitt (the name by which the post at Pittsburgh still were) were sent out to shoot game to keep them from hunger. The public good at the same time was sacrificed, as we have seen, by the bickerings and jealousies between Brodhead, while he commanded there, and Gibson and his Virginia followers, for the reason of which Gen. Irvine was sent to that point. That fight was the old fight between Virginia and Pennsylvania.²

¹ Now the property of Mrs. Craig, one of his descendants. He died of hemorrhage caused by the extraction of a tooth.

James Kane, Sr., court-crier under Judge Young, and whom the bar yet traditionally remembers as "Jimmy Kane," was one of the prisoners taken to the Pottowattomies, and who came home from a captivity among them. He died in Derry township in 1845.

² ARCHIBALD LOCHRY.—Very little information has been obtained regarding the life of Archibald Lochry, further than is found in the public

CHAPTER XXVI.

CRAWFORD'S EXPEDITION TO SANDUSKY.

The Moravian Indians—Their Christian Character and their Former History—Their Efforts at Peace-Making between the Whites and Warring Indians—Description of their Villages—Their Unfavorable Location—They are blamed with harboring Hostile Indians—The Whites of the Southwestern Part of Pennsylvania are instigated to Disperse them—They raise a Force of Volunteers for that Purpose—Col. David Williamson in command—Their Route of March—They come upon the Indians by surprise—Represent themselves as Friends—Get possession of their Villages, and begin the destruction of the Houses, and the murder of the Men, Women, and Children—They are taken out, one after another, and with Clubs, Mallets, and Hatchets murdered while they supplicate for mercy—Their Bodies are then burned—Col. Crawford's Expedition later in 1782 to the Sandusky Towns—He is defeated and his Force scattered—He is taken Prisoner and burned at the Stake—Escape of Dr. Knight.

ABOUT this time the whites became involved in troubles with the Moravian Indians. Of these we shall give some account, sufficient to bring them within the range of our narrative and to illustrate subsequent details. The Moravian society, which in contemporaneous papers which so far have been made public and the record of his official services.

He was of North Irish extraction, but was probably born in the Octararo settlement, for in 1763 he was an ensign in the Second Battalion in the provincial service (Arch., N. S., vol. ii, 614), and he was well known to the public when he was appointed one of the justices at the organization of the county, for he had held office along with his brother in Bedford. He took up large bodies of land, one particularly of great extent, whereon he located himself with some of his neighbors from Bedford. This tract lies in Unity township, on the south side of the turnpike going from Greensburg to Ligonier, and near St. Xavier's Convent. The land is now quite valuable, being underlaid with the thick vein of Connellsville coal. He dated his official correspondence at the "Twelve-Mile Run," which was the name of the small stream which flows into the Fourteen-Mile Run before it empties into the Loyalhanna. This name is known only in old records, and is not known as such now.

The name is spelled differently in various localities. The creek and island along the Ohio River in Indiana are written "Langhrey's" Creek, etc., and some people of the same name so write their name. Neither is there uniformity in the spelling of his name in the public records. We have adopted the spelling used by himself.

The issue of Archibald Lochry were two daughters. The first, Elizabeth, married to Nathaniel McBryar, who left issue, three sons and one daughter, to wit: David, Watson, Jobu, and Elizabeth, married to John Duff, Esq., of Washington township. The second daughter, Jane, was married to Samuel Thompson, and left issue, five sons and six daughters, to wit: Alexander, William (father of S. G. Thompson, Esq., of Greensburg, Pa.), David, Watson, Samuel, Mary, married to Andrew Gartley; Elizabeth, married to Joseph McQuicken, Esq., of New Salem; Jane, married to Thomas Adair; Nancy, Lucy, and Lydia.

Archibald Lochry's brother, William Lochry, was one of the county justices, and he presided at the October session, 1774. He had another brother, Jeremiah.

The following is the will of Archibald Lochry and proceedings thereon, as found in the office of the register of wills at Greensburg (Will-Book, i. p. 31):

"In the name of God, Amen. I Archibald Lochry, of Hannas Town in Westmoreland County, &c. being through the goodness of God in sound judgment and memory, therefore Calling to mind the Mortality of my Body and that it is appointed for all men once to die, Do make this my last will and testament that is to say Principally and first of all I give & bequeath my soul to God who gave it Beseeching his most Gracious acceptance of it in and through the merits and mediation of my most Compassionate Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, and my Body I give to the earth nothing Doubting but I shall receive the same again at the General resurrection, And as touching such worldly estate as I am Blessed with in this world it is my will and order that all my Just Debts be fully Paid, and that my public accounts may be settled with all convenient speed. Also it is my will that all and singular my 1769 had established missions among the Indians, had not forsaken them, but, under many discouragements and through many vicissitudes, had kept them together, and after several removals had at length established them along the Tuscarawas River in Ohio. Here these simple-minded Indians, converted from savages, lived at peace with all men, and by that time had developed into a thriving and thrifty community. There were three villages of them, Shoeburn, Gnadenhütten, and Salem. Gnadenhütten was on the east side of the river, the other two were on the west side. Salem and Shoeburn were about Estate Real and Personal shall be equally Divided between my well beloved wife and my only Daughter El. My Land Joining Col. John Proctor to be rented until my said Daughter arrive to the age of twenty-one years, and the half the rents thereof applied for her Boarding and Schooling, the other half for the use of my Wife, and in case any or either of them should Die before my Daughter comes to age or is married the whole estate is to devolve to the survivor, and all my claims or rights to any Lands only the Lands above mentioned I desire may be sold. And I do hereby constitute and appoint John Proctor whole and sole Executor of this my last will and testament to see it duly executed according to my true intent and meaning, revoking and annulling all former Wills Ratifying and confirming this and no other to be my last will and testament. Witness my hand and seal the 26th Novr. 1778.

"A. LOCHRY,

"Signed sealed Pronounced Declared and Confirmed In the Presence of Jeremiah Lochry, David Philson, James Kinkaid.

"Thanks to God I am now in my Proper senses and Do allow this to be my last will and testament except that my Daughter Betsey to receive her equal lots of my estate.

"A. LOCHRY.

"Attest, JEREMIAH LOCHRY, GEORGE HENRY."

"I John Proctor the Executor within named Do by these Presence absolutely freely and voluntarily resign my right of executorship to the within Will. But will for the sake of the Deceased and his relict Join in Administration with the Widow. Witness my hand the Eleventh day of July, 1782.

"JOHN PROCTOR.

"Witness present

"Wm. JACK,

"JOHN PUMROY."

"Proven by Jeremiah Lochry and George Henry the 11th, July 1782 before Jas. Kinkaid."

His daughter Jane was born after this will was written.

Upon the same page of the record is the will of Theodoros Browers, founder of St. Vincent's, and out of which arose the litigation hereafter noted.

Capt. Jeremiah Lochry, brother of Archibald, died on the 21st of January, 1824, at the house of Samuel Moorhead, in Salem township, in the ninety-third year of his age.

Having settled in this country at a very early period, he shared largely in the toils and hardships and perils to which the pioneers of civilization in the Western country were subjected. He was one of the few who escaped the disastrous scenes of Braddock's defeat. In the year 1777 he acted as adjutant to a detachment of militia who were ordered to Now Jorey from this county, under the command of Col. Lochry, his brother. In this situation his merit as an officer soon attracted the attention of his superiors, and in the fall of the same year he was presented with a captain's commission in the regular service. In this capacity he acted during the whole Revolutionary war, being frequently engaged with the enemy, and always acquitting himself with honor and advantage to the cause of his country. Shortly after the close of the war, while engaged with a scouting party on the Allegheny River, a ball was fired at him by an Indian, which glanced from the barrel of his gun and lodged in his neck, and was the cause of an enormous tumor that afterwards grew from the wound.*

thirteen miles apart, the other was midway between, and all three within the present limits of Tuscarawas County, Ohio. But unfortunately their situation for friendly tribes was most unfavorable, for they were just about half-way between the border settlements of Pennsylvania on the east and tribes of ever-warring Delawares and Wyandots of the Sandusky Plains to the west. The whites and Indians at war with each other not infrequently took the route by the mission stations of the friendly Indians, and made this place a half-way stopping-house. The enforced hospitality of these Indians, who wanted to be at peace with all, brought upon them the suspicions of both the warring whites and warring Indians, and in vain were their kindness and hospitality bestowed upon all alike. The Indians of the Sandusky in their incursions against the whites charged them with sympathy when they failed to assist them, and the frontier people knowing of the acts of hospitality extended to their deadly enemies by the Moravian Indians, their dishonorable passions were aroused, and they were urged to an ill-timed and unhonorable revenge.

In the year previous, that is to say in the summer of 1780, Col. Brodhead had made a campaign from Wheeling to Coshocton. At that time he marched to the Muskingum a little below Salem, the Moravian town. On coming there, Brodhead sent a messenger to Rev. Heckewelder, informing him of his arrival. The Indians sent the men provisions of their own free will, and their pastor, Heckewelder, visited the colonel in his camp. At that time an attempt was made by some unprincipled men with the army to fall upon the other towns, but the knowledge of this reaching the colonel he took measures to prevent it, and told the pastor that nothing would give him greater pain than to hear that any of the Moravians had been molested by his troops.

In the latter part of 1781 the militia of the southwestern part of the State, which formerly was, in name, a portion of Westmoreland, but which was now of Washington County, being of the region about the rivers, where the people had suffered so much, came to the conclusion to break up the Indian Moravian villages. Col. David Williamson was the leader of this party, who, as they asserted, was to induce them to remove, or else to suffer themselves to be brought into Fort Pitt. There were some thus brought safely in, and afterwards sent back to their homes, but most of the people thought at that time the Indians ought to have been killed.

These Indians were, in truth, the most unfortunate of creatures. For they had on many occasions warned the whites by their rumors of projected attacks from hostile Indians to the West. The hostile Indians carrying this to the ears of the British, who under the white renegade Tories had control of them, they had their settlement at Sandusky broken up in the fall of 1781. Their villages were almost totally destroyed, and their fields were desolated. Some were sent into the wilderness, some robbed, and some taken prisoners and sent to Detroit. McKee, the British agent, and Girty, it is said, as all horrible things were charged to them, instigated this as the only way of drawing the Christian Indians into war with the Americans.

* From the Gazette, Feb. 6, 1824.

But in the early part of the next year.—that is, in February, 1782,—about a hundred and fifty famished and worn-out and heart-sick creatures, longing with the unseen passion for the light, returned from the Sandusky to their homes on the Muskingum.¹

During this month some murders had been committed by hostile Indians farther to the south, and the returning of the Moravians was made the pretext for charging them with being the guilty party. Accordingly it was no trouble to get a crowd to invade their country, and besides it is said that the whites coveted the horses belonging to these men. For this purpose eighty or ninety men were hastily collected. These were under command of Col. David Williamson, of Washington County, and the men were all from that section and from below Pittsburgh. They encamped the first night on the Mingo Bottom, on the west side of the Ohio River, sixty miles below Pittsburgh, and the second night within one mile of the nearest Moravian town.

Then by representing to the Indians, whom they suddenly came upon, that they were their friends and that they had come to take them to the fort from the power of their enemies, and by many other deceptive promises and representations, the Christian Indians not doubting them, they got possession of the two towns, and secured the men, women, and children as prisoners. Nor were the suspicions of these aroused until they came upon one who had been murdered lying in their way. The captives were confined in two houses. As a squad were hunting the fields towards the farthest town a council was held by the chief men. Many proposed their death, but the officers not being willing to take the odium of such an inhuman revenge had the men drawn up in line. The question was put to them "whether to take the prisoners to Pittsburgh or put them to death." All in favor of saving their lives were to stand out in front of the line. In answer to this question eighteen men came out. The captives were told to prepare for death. Those in the guard-houses on hearing this began singing hymns and praying. To make their offense criminal they were charged with many crimes. They were accused of harboring hostile Indians, and in reply they reminded these of the benefits they had extended to the whites; they were charged with having taken the property of the whites, when they offered to produce everything they had to show that they had taken nothing. They were again told that they had not long to live, when they asked for delay that they might prepare for death as became men who, in their last moments, talked with their God. This was granted them. The time thus allotted them they spent in prayer and in asking forgiveness of one another, and pardon as became creatures who called on God to pardon them. Kneeling they prayed with each other, and for each other, and kissed in tears their friends, hoping in their simple faith for future peace.

While these were so doing the murderers outside were consulting as to the manner of their death. Some wanted to set fire to the houses, and as they were burning to shoot all who attempted to get away; others wanted to kill them in such a way as to get their scalps. Those of the whites who were opposed to these things wrung their hands, and called on God to witness that they were guiltless of shedding this innocent blood. Those withdrew to a distance. The others coming up while the Indians were still praying asked them if they were ready.

They were then led out for execution. One of the murderers took up a mallet, and wondered how that would do the business. He began by hitting one on the head, and continued striking those upon their knees till he had killed fourteen. Then, as his arm was tired, he handed the mallet to another, saying that his arm failed, and told him to go on, for he had done pretty well.²

Of all those who were put in the other house only two escaped. These were boys, one of whom was hid in the cellar, where he saw the blood flow down the walls in streams. The other had been scalped and

² Smucker, "Military Expeditions to the Northwest," and other authorities "too numerous to mention."

The county lieutenant, John Cannon, was along with the expedition, and tradition asserts with the persuasion of truth that the man who brained fourteen Christians with a cooper's mallet held at the very moment he was doing so three commissions in Washington County, viz.: one as commissioner of Washington County, one as sub-lieutenant of the county, and one as justice of the peace for Stralane township, same county. He had held an important commission from Pennsylvania in 1776, and he was after the massacre rewarded as sheriff of the county.

The rapine robbers of the middle ages, dying like cormorants or vultures, with the blood of victims dripping out of their gorged cheeks, made their peace with the world and with their conscience by donating a large portion of their robberies to pious uses. It is not remarkable in this view of humanity that so many churches and places of learning should be founded with such persons about in great number. Certainly no section and no people had more need of the gospel and of the "humanities." Therefore it was in good taste that the academy of Cannonsburg took its name from Col. John Cannon. But if ever the father of his country blest it was in 1781, when he found to what base use a name may come at last by the attaching of his name, the first in all time, to that new-formed county. But to their honor and a fairer fame, and to the honor of all Western Pennsylvania, the descendants of these men long ago redeemed and relettered a name once tarnished.

The gang having killed and scalped all within reach, and plundered a friendly camp of Delaware allies of the United States on their way back, crossed the river to Pittsburgh, where, boasting of their deeds, they sold their ill-gotten plunder at public vendue, and then, before returning home, sent Col. Gibson a message that they would "sculp him." He had incurred their displeasure by showing some evidence that he was a man.

We have recounted this affair at length, actuated more by a sense of justice to the savage than of reflection upon those who were the actors therein.

¹ The Muskingum and Tuccarawas are called so indiscriminately.

left for dead among the pile of bodies above, but recovering he escaped in the night. Both of them lived to be of the witnesses to bear testimony of this unprecedented murder. "By the mouth of two witnesses shall all things be established."

Those in the upper and farther town being apprised of danger made their escape. But the house out of which one lot of the prisoners were taken was filled with the dead bodies of old men, women, and children and set on fire and burnt. When the party of murderers came back to Pittsburgh, even on their way they fell upon a body of friendly Delawares under protection of the government, who were all killed with the exception of a few who escaped to the woods.

It is said that this man Williamson held an office of profit and trust afterwards in Washington County, but that he died in jail as a debtor without a consoling friend. It is also noteworthy that the men who composed this expedition came from that part of the county whose earliest and latest boast has been of their religious and educational advantages, and the intellectual superiority of whose early settlers has been held up at the expense of their neighbors.¹

An effort was afterwards made by the authorities to ferret out and bring to punishment the leaders in this massacre. The best citizens of Washington County, as Pentecost and Cannon were called, conferred with Gen. Irvine, who writing to William Moore, chief magistrate of the State, said that it was impossible to get any information as to the ringleaders, as they would neither confess nor tell on each other.

After this expedition had returned another one under Col. Crawford started out. But the termination of this one was different. In May, 1782, four hundred and eighty men, finding their own horses, equipments, and clothing, mustered at the old Mingo town on the west side of the Ohio. All of them were from the immediate neighborhood of the country and from the Ten-Mile Creek in Washington. They were volunteers, and first proceeded to select their own officers. Col. William Crawford was declared the leader of the expedition by a majority of five votes over Williamson, who accompanied the party. They marched along the river, passing the destroyed towns. A few houses and some of the corn were still standing. Two Indians were taken out of camp. This was no surprise to the Indian tribes, for they had spies out who reported from the time the party left the river, and knew their number and destination. On the 6th of June they came to the site of the old Moravian towns on the Upper Sandusky. But the dwellers had been driven to the Scioto. The place presented the appearance of desolation; it was overgrown with weeds, and high grass was all around the deserted huts. They continued their march for the towns of the living Indians. The next morning they entered the Sandusky Plains. In the afternoon they were attacked by Indians and driven together. The Indians gained possession of small clusters of woods, and the fighting continued till night. Both parties kindled large fires, and retired back of these. The Indians were seen all around them on the Plains the next day, and their numbers seemed to increase. A council was held and the men ordered to return. All the rest of the day preparations were made for a retreat, and the dried grass was burnt over the slight graves of the buried dead. The retreat was to begin at nightfall, but the Indians becoming apprised of the design, they made an attack about sundown, and directed their attacks from all sides, excepting the side next to Sandusky. When the retreat commenced the guides were therefore compelled to take that direction to get out of the Plains. They passed through an opening in the Indians' line, and circling about gained the trail upon which they had come. The main body, consisting of about three hundred, was not molested in their retreat during the day. They encamped at night in safety, and successfully accomplished their march back.

But when the retreat had at first been decided upon there was a difference of opinion as to the method of conducting it, some thinking it better to go in a body, others thinking it better to go in detached parties. The latter opinion prevailed. In this they were in mistake, for the Indians finding this out, instead of pursuing the stronger body, scattered out over the country to intercept the small parties and cut off the straggled and lost. In this they were successful, for the only one of these detached bodies that came safely out was one under Col. Williamson, who late in the night after the battle broke through the Indians' line, and with about forty men joined the main body. Col. Crawford remained at the head of this larger party, which was merely what was left of the army itself. After they had gone some distance, he, missing his son, his son-in-law, and his two nephews, imprudently halted till the line had passed, and still not seeing them, called for them without finding them. When the army had gone by, he was unable to overtake it on account of the weariness of his horse. Falling in with Dr. Knight, a surgeon attached to the command, and two others, they traveled together all night, first towards the north and then towards the east, directing their courses by the stars. The next day they fell in with two other officers. The following night they encamped, and about noon the next day they struck the trail by which the army had advanced. At this they differed in opinion as to the best course, some of the party thinking it better to go through the woods by unfrequented paths, and Crawford and a few others (for the party was six or seven), conjecturing that the pursuit of the main body had been discontinued, were following in the track of the army.

They agreed to do this, but had not proceeded above a mile when several Indians sprang out of the bushes, and presenting their guns at Col. Crawford and Knight, who were in front, ordered them in English to stop. These could do nothing but surrender. Capt. Biggs and Lieut. Ashley, and a wounded man on horseback, by this time coming up were also called on, but Biggs fired, and he and his comrades struck for the woods. They were killed the next day, and the only ones of the party who escaped at this time were those in the rear who fled on the first alarm.

¹ Our account of the Moravian massacre has been collected from many, but in the narrative we have closely followed Doddridge, who himself followed Heckewelder.

Col. Crawford and Dr. Knight, with nine other prisoners, were, on the morning of the 10th of June, conducted by seventeen Indians to the old Sandusky town, about thirty-three miles from where they had first collected. All the prisoners with the exception of the two had been painted black to indicate their doom. Four of these nine were tomahawked and scalped on the way, and the other five, when they arrived at the town, were fell upon by boys and squaws who tomahawked them, foregoing the pleasure of their holiday. For the torture these two, however, were reserved.

We shall not narrate the scene of Crawford roasting alive at the stake. You will see it in all the books. Those who have occasion to know by report of the humanity, the tender nature, and the open hospitality of our first presiding justice must ever be moved by pity at his death. For three hours he endured the most excruciating agonies with the utmost fortitude; then, becoming faint and being almost exhausted, he commended his soul to God, and lay down on his face. He was then scalped, and burning coals being laid on his head and back by one of the squaws, he again rose and attempted to walk, but strength failed him, and he sank into the welcome arms of death. His body was then thrown into the fire and consumed to ashes.¹

¹ In the midst of these sufferings he begged of the infamous Girty to shoot him. Girty replied, "How can I? You see I have no gun," and laughed heartily. During most of the time Girty sat on a log smoking a pipe.

SIMON GIRTY.—This wretch was so notorious in his day, and did so much harm to this portion, that his "life and services" demand further notice. Girty—

"The outlawed white man by Ohio's flood,
Whose vengeance shamed the Indian's thirst for blood,
Whose hellish art surpassed the red man's far,
Whose hate enkindled many a bloody war,
Of which each aged grandame hath a tale
At which man's bosom burns, and childhood's cheeks grow pale—" was a native of one of the middle counties of Pennsylvania. He was an Indian trader in 1744, and was first brought into prominence in Dunmore's war as a spy and hunter. Prior to that time he had been drawing pay as an Indian agent. From his connection and residence for so long a time among the Indians he got familiar with them, delighted to harangue them, and took peculiar pleasure in their scenes of bloodshed, as it is related. He is said to have embraced the cause of the Revolution on the part of the colonists, but he was soon brought over by Dunmore and Connolly. He went in 1778 boldly and bodily over to the Indians, and was adopted by the Wyandots. His Indian name was Ka-te-pa-komen (Bonquet's Journal, 1764, mentions this as Girty's adopted name then). He soon attained great influence over them, and at one time saved Kenton, and at another burnt Crawford. To the frontier whites and the British he went by the assumed name of Simon Butler. He talked the Indian dialect with fluency. He attended the great council held by most of the tribes of the Northwest at Old Chillicothe, celebrated

It is not likely that the description will ever pass away, but for years to come will bear rehearsal to show the customs and barbaric rites of that savage race in the treatment of their enemies taken in war. Crawford's son and son-in-law were also murdered at the towns. It was no wonder that the widow and mother sat for years lonely in the woods by the bank of the Youghiogheny in speechless sorrow, for his melancholy sufferings and death spread a gloom over the countenances of all who knew him.

Dr. Knight was doomed to the same torture for the pleasure of those at the Shawnee town, which lay many miles distant from Sandusky. He was committed to the care of only a single Indian. In the morning of the first night they were out, the gnats being troublesome, Knight asked the Indian to untie his hands that he might help make a fire to keep the insects off. The Indian did so and got down on his hands and knees, and was blowing the fire, when Knight struck him on the back of the head with a short half-burnt stick. The Indian rolled over, but springing to his feet, ran off roaring into the woods. Knight snatched the Indian's rifle to shoot at him, but pulling the hammer back too violently he broke the mainspring of the lock. Knight reached Fort McIntosh (Beaver), on the twenty-second day, in the mean time living on berries, roots, and young birds.

Such are instances of the wanton murders, the sufferings, and the barbarity on both sides during this inhuman war. The murder of Cornstalk at Point Pleasant was paralleled by the torture of Crawford, and we have of necessity recounted the story of the Moravian massacre and the destruction of Gnadenhütten, that we may comprehend its parallel in the death of Peggy Shaw and Brownlee and the burning of Hannastown.

CHAPTER XXVII.

CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE IN 1780-81.

Westmoreland County in the Latter Part of the Revolution—Evidences from the Court Records and from Acts of Assembly—The Militia shifted from Place to Place in expectation of Indian Attacks—The Outposts west of Fort Pitt abandoned—Extracts from the Correspondence of Brodhead, Irvine, and Others bearing on the Affairs of the County.

THE condition of affairs within the county during the latter part of the Revolution and immediately and often mentioned in the annals of the West. He here in a speech eloquently set forth the advantages of the campaign against the whites, which was soon set on foot against the western frontiers. He headed a portion of the Indian forces that proceeded against Kentucky. His next open battle was at the Pequa towns, where at the head of three hundred warriors he held Clark in check for a time. He led or sent many savage parties against the frontiers of Pennsylvania about this time. His name became dreaded, and at one time horror followed the mention of it. We shall see elsewhere that he had something to do with the destruction of Hannastown. He was with the victors at St. Clair's field, 1791, and at the battle of the Fallen Timbers, 1794. After Wayne's treaty he went to Canada, where he became a trader, and towards the close of his life he gave himself up to intoxicating drinks, and by excesses brought on diseases by which he suffered much before he died.

prior to the raid on Hanuastown is also evidenced in the meagre records of the courts.

In 1778 and 1779 it appears there were no constables for many of the townships. Vacancies were frequently noted, and these were at times filled by appointment by the county justices.

At the January sessions, 1780, the constables being called, and none attending, the fines, on account of the severity of the weather, were remitted. At this term there was no grand jury in attendance and no business done.

At the October sessions of 1781 there was only one constable present, and he was from Pittsburgh.

At the January sessions of 1781 here is a jury of the vicinage: William Love, John Guthrey, Joseph Brownlee, William Jack, William Guthrey, Adam Hatfield, Matthew Miller, Samuel Beatty, Lawrence Irwin, William Shaw, Conrad Hawk, and William Maxwell. One is led to exclaim "Injuns!"

That persons who were so unfortunate then as to be in debt should be harassed would be natural to suppose, and this is evidenced by the number of executions issued. In the July term of 1782, being held when the town was raided, there were ninety-two, an excessive number. In the January sessions of 1784 is the following:

"The court having considered the application of David Rankin, he living on the frontiers, excuse him from paying license in the year 1781, and at the same time rule that the several people having sold or continue to sell spirituous liquors living on the frontiers, and may be entitled to the favour of the Court, are discharged from paying license until July Sessions last, agreeable to the directions of the Honorable the Supreme Executive Council."

On the 10th of March, 1780, the Legislature passed an act of a temporary nature, empowering the county commissioners and assessors to obtain the best estimate that they could of the property of such of the inhabitants as had been driven from their habitations, and to exonerate those from taxes who had bona fide suffered by the incursions of the enemy.

In the call for troops in 1780 there was none asked for from Westmoreland. Neither was there an account kept of the supplies from the county, as there was no commissioner; David Duncan, the late commissioner, not having rendered any account, he being unable to purchase anything worth returning.

This is not much to wonder at, for Col. John Boynton, deputy paymaster-general, in a letter to President Reed the year previous, says that he "has served for nearly three years in that remote country [the border of Western Pennsylvania and Virginia], and it has been wholly impracticable to procure such necessities as decency requires."¹

By the act of 3d April, 1781, directing the mode of adjusting and settling the payment of debts and contracts previously entered into, etc., and which fixed a scale of depreciation as a rule to determine the value of the several debts, contracts, etc., it was enacted that the act entitled an act for limitation of actions, which had been passed the 27th day of March, 1713, "should not run or operate during the time the courts of justice were shut in this State, nor during the time of any suspension act of this State, in any action or distress prohibited to be made or brought by such act, under the penalty of taking depreciated money in full payment."²

These acts of the Assembly indicate the poverty and inability of the western country, arising from and due to their border sufferings and consequent distress.

During 1779 the frontier posts west of Fort Pitt, which were garrisoned by the forces under the control of the commandant of the Western Department, had been abandoned by reason of inability to hold them by inadequate forces against a much stronger force of British and Indians. Of these forts the most important were Fort Laurens, in the Ohio country, and Fort McIntosh (Beaver).

The withdrawal of all forces from the Indian country caused great alarm and indignation in the settlements on the border. Early in 1780 a meeting of citizens was held in Westmoreland County, and resolutions passed requesting the reoccupation of the abandoned forts.³ Hence the co-operation of Lochry with Clark in his expedition before narrated. When Clark was compelled to abandon the expedition the whole western frontier was menaced with a British and Indian invasion from Canada. Fully conversant with and appreciating the terrible situation of affairs, both military and civil, about this region, the commander-in-chief, with great care and concern, and after due deliberation, chose Brig.-Gen. William Irvine to take command at Fort Pitt, Sept. 24, 1780. Congress requested the executives of Pennsylvania and Virginia to co-operate with him by supplying militia upon his requisition.

Of the complications which arose out of the divided authority between the commandant at Fort Pitt and the county lieutenant of Westmoreland we have had occasion to refer to, and one inquiring further is referred to the correspondence relating to Westmoreland County, which will be found in the Appendix and in various notes in the preceding part of this book.

The correspondence of Col. Lochry, and his actions as lieutenant of the county, evidence the great danger constantly threatening the frontier of Westmoreland, and also the inability of the people to protect themselves.

Capt. Thomas Campbell's ranging company, under pay of Congress, and subject to Lochry's orders, was stationed in December of 1779 about Hannastown.

² The Courts of Justices were "shut" in Westmoreland during a portion of the Revolutionary war.

³ Col. Brodhead, in a letter to Maj. Slaughter, May 11, 1780, says, "The county of Westmoreland is again infested with the cursed Mingoes. The inhabitants are flying from every quarter, and it will be necessary for you to keep a lookout where you are [Slaughter was then at a post down the Ohio]."—Brodhead's Letter-Book; Archives, xii, p. 232.

This had been allowed by the concurrence of Brodhead. This company, shortly after this, was ordered by Col. Lochry to Wallace's Fort (near the Cone-maugh), but on Campbell's making application to Col. Brodhead for horses and provisions needful for the transportation of his men to that post he was refused both; whereupon he wrote a very caustic letter to Brodhead, who had him arrested for insubordination.¹

It was during this time, as we have seen, that Lochry insisted that the companies of Erwin and Campbell should be kept in Westmoreland for the protection of the posts here, being more needed here than farther on the frontier.²

Upon Erwin, who was father-in-law of Lochry, refusing to let his company go under Brodhead's order to join the Eighth Regiment, Brodhead ordered him as well as Campbell under arrest, and to be tried by a court-martial.³ Brodhead said that when these two companies had been ordered by Lochry to Hannastown and Wallace's Fort, he had to withdraw the garrisons from Fort Armstrong (Kittanning) and Fort Crawford.

Brodhead was certainly not much prepossessed in favor of the officers of the militia of the county. The duplex system of management was unfortunate and led to mischief, which of itself was aggravated when a suspicion was enkindled in the breasts of both parties that the acts of opposition were the result of premeditated and studied malignity.⁴

The correspondence of Col. Brodhead during the time he was in command at Pittsburgh, in 1780 and part of 1781, is of much interest to Westmorelanders inquiring into the history of that time. In May, 1780, he writes to President Reed, "For heaven's sake hurry up the companies voted by the Honorable Assembly, or Westmoreland County will soon be a wilderness."⁵

The ranging companies to which we have referred were raised by the Assembly at the instance of Congress, and were enlisted into the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, whose colonel was Brodhead; but while so enlisted and drawing pay in the Continental service, they were allowed to be under the direction and command of the county lieutenant, as they were primarily intended for the protection of the county. This, we have seen, was the source of much trouble.

¹ Archives, vii, p. 36, O. S.

² Ibid., viii., p. 42, O. S.

³ Ibid., p. 79.

⁴ Col. Daniel Brodhead to President Reed, April 27, 1780.

⁵ "I am much at a loss to guess the cause of prepossession in the Assembly to favor former appointments. They must conceive a mean opinion of my judgment in regard to officers if they know my opinion of these, and they must be sensible that many excellent officers of the State are supernumerary. I will only take the liberty to mention Capt. Stokely, Capt. Hoffnagle, Capt. Swearingen, and Capt. Jack, either Erwin or Campbell. But were I at liberty to recommend officers, I should prefer such who are altogether unconnected with the leading people of the counties, and have neither families nor farms to support or cultivate at an expense they do not choose to pay. The late Capt. Moorhead and others considered their men as their servants, and employed them to labor upon their farms instead of the service for which they were intended by the public."—Archives, viii., p. 210.

⁶ Archives, viii. 246.

Reports from both the Continental and the county officers were continually reaching the ears of the president of the State. In a letter in 1781 from President Reed to Col. Lochry he says that the former quartering of these rangers about Hannastown did not exactly meet the concurrence of the Board, but that he, Lochry, should use his own discretion in bestowing them in the coming campaign.

The plan agreed upon by the representatives of the western counties and Gen. Irvine, held at the convention called at his instance, April the 5th, 1781, was to keep flying bodies of men constantly on the frontiers, marching to and from the different places. The regular troops were to remain in Fort Pitt and Fort McIntosh, since reoccupied. Westmoreland agreed to keep sixty-five men, formed into two companies, constantly ranging along the frontier from the Allegheny to the Laurel Hill. The militia of Washington County was formed into four companies; two of these were placed so as to patrol the Ohio from Pittsburgh to near Wheeling. Every precaution was taken to guard against surprises of the enemy. Nevertheless, it was well understood that a defensive policy, with whatever care plans might be laid, would prove ineffectual against occasional inroads of the wily, prowling savages, who in spite of every precaution frequently crossed the Ohio, fell suddenly upon their helpless victims, and then quickly recrossed that river into the wilderness beyond.⁶

It was the wide-spread and unarguable opinion of the people west of the Laurel Hill that the only way of destroying the Indians was to carry the war against them. Hence the expedition to the Sandusky towns which brought so much additional suffering in its unfortunate termination.

A. Lochry to President Reed, April 17, 1781, writes:

"The savages have begun their hostilities. Since I came from Philadelphia they have struck us in four different places, have taken and killed thirteen persons with a number of horses and other effects of the inhabitants; two of the unhappy people were killed one mile from Hannastown. Our country is worse depopulated than ever it has been."⁷

James Perry to President Reed, 1781:

"SEWICKLEY, July 2, 1781.

"Understanding that an express is going to Philadelphia from Col. Lochry, I shall just inform you our country is in the utmost confusion at present. About three weeks ago one James Chambers was taken prisoner about two miles from my house, last Friday two young women were killed in Ligonier Valley, and this morning a small garrison at Peter Clingensmith's, about eight miles from this and four or five miles from Hannastown, consisting of between twenty and thirty women and children, was destroyed; only three made their escape. The particulars I cannot well inform you, as the party that was sent to bury the dead are not yet returned, and I wait every moment to hear of or perhaps see them strike at some other place. That party was supposed to be about seventeen."⁸

Col. Lochry to President Reed, July 4, 1781:

"We have very distressing times here this summer. The enemy are almost constantly in our country, killing and captivating the inhabitants."⁹

⁶ "Crawford's Campaign against Sandusky," Butterfield, p. 8 For much information on the subject in hand the special reader is referred to the valuable publication quoted.

⁷ Arch., vol. ix., 79.

⁸ Ibid., 240.

⁹ Ibid., 247.

In August, 1781, the detachment of the Seventh Maryland Regiment, which had been serving under Brodhead, left Fort Pitt, and returned over the mountains home.

This season Lochry, the county lieutenant, apprehending an attack on Hannastown or some untoward event, had erected a block-house on his farm on the Twelve-Mile Run, now near the convent in Unity township, whither he had the records removed for safety, and a magazine built for the powder and arms supply for the county of which he had charge. To this, however, the Council objected, and upon their objection he desisted. Their chief ground of objection was that by the collection of war munitions at one place the attention of the enemy would be drawn to that point, and the interests of a large portion of the people be greatly imperiled.

In his letter to Washington of Dec. 3, 1781, Irvine said,—

“At present the people talk of flying, early in the spring, to the eastern side of the mountain, and are daily flocking to me to inquire what support they may expect.”

It was very generally believed, and the commander himself shared in the opinion, that the failure of Clark and Gibson would greatly encourage the savages to fall on the frontiers with double fury in the coming spring.

The month of February, 1782, was one of unusual mildness. War-parties of savages from Sandusky visited the settlements and committed depredations earlier than usual on that account. From the failure of the expeditions against the Western Indians in the previous autumn, there had been a continued fear, a feverish state of feeling, during the winter all along the border; and now that the early melting of the snow had brought the savages at an unwonted season to the settlements, a more than usual excitement upon such an occasion prevailed.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

DESTRUCTION OF HANNASTOWN.

Spring of 1782—The Outposts deserted—Condition of the Hannastown Settlement—The People gather near to the Stations and work at Harvest together—A Party go out to take off the Harvest of Michael Huffnagle, north of Hannastown—One of the Reapers, seeing Indians watching from behind Trees, gives the Alarm, and they flee towards the Fort—The Court at Hannastown adjourns without a Crier—Records taken to the Fort—General Jail Delivery—They all gather into the Stockade—Scouts sent out—Brison and Shaw pursued by the Indians—Capt. Matthew Jack comes upon the Indians and escapes from them—He rides round the Country and alarms the People—He saves the Love Family—Indians come to the Town—They hold a Consultation, and are seen to have White Men for Commanders, who are dressed like Indians—They plunder the Houses, fire on the Stockade, and mock at the Inmates—They send out a Party towards Miller's Station—The People gather at Allen's, at Rugh's, at Unity—Settlers gather into the Houses and get down their Rifles—Indians come on to the Mowers in the Meadow at Miller's—The Number and Class of Persons collected there—Women and Children gather into the Miller House—John Brownlee called back from attacking the Indians by his Wife—Gives him-self up to the Indians—A Young Man takes Brownlee's Child and runs towards George's—Is pursued by a Pack of Indians and hides in a Rye-Field—Singular Escape of a Babe left on the Ground at the Mercy of the Savages—She is found Sleeping in her own Cot the next Morning—She lives to be Married, and dies in Old Age—The Houses at Hannastown burnt down—Captain Jack is too late to alarm the People at Miller's—The Renegades secure the Inmates of the House—They burn the Houses and shoot down the Cattle—Tie the Hands of the Prisoners and load them with Stolen Goods—Drive the Weeping Women into Captivity—Brownlee carries a Load on his back and has his Little Child on his neck—The Indians recognize Brownlee—One crushes a Tomahawk into his Head and kills his Little Boy, and also a Woman who faints—Affairs about the Fort—Peggy Shaw saves a Little Child—A Ball strikes her in the Breast—The barbarous Medical Treatment she receives while she lingers out her Life—The Two Bodies of Indians unite and go into Camp in the Crabtree Bottom—People collect at the George Farm—At Nightfall a Crowd with Scouts go Armed to assist those in the Fort—They come to the Smouldering Town—Are let into the Stockade and sound an Alarm—The Indians, listening, are scared, thinking Reinforcements have arrived, and after Midnight they leave for the North—Their Route—They are pursued as far as the Kiskiminetas—The People look out on Deserted Homes—They bury the Dead where they were found—To keep them from Starving the State allows them to draw Rations—What became of the Prisoners—Who the Invaders were and where they came from—Gen. Irvine's Letter to Washington—Singular Account from an Indian after the War of the Party which burnt Hannastown—The Heroes of the “Hannastown War”—The Town after its Destruction.

THE darkest and most gloomy period in the history of Westmoreland County was from the spring of 1781 to the spring of 1783. This was the night of darkness, the tenebre nocturnum. After the unchristian murder of the Moravian Indians disaster followed disaster. Crawford walking around the stake in his bare feet on the hot cinders, praying to God to have mercy, and beseeching Girty only to kill him; the loss of so many brave men who had gone out with Lochry from about Hannastown and who never returned; the frontier in war; the settlers fleeing back to the mountains; the desertion of the soldiers who were guarding the posts along the Allegheny; the untilled fields,—the memory and knowledge of these things haunted them day and night, and the shadows of death and waut were across well-nigh every door in the land.

Through the greater part of the year 1782 some of the settlers did not pretend to do anything but watch for the others, ready at an instaut's warning to go wherever needed. Those who stayed about the fields and houses gladly worked for the rest, and depended on the fighters guarding the limits of the settlement. Of those in the Hannastown settlement who were looked up to as their foremost men were Capt. Matthew Jack, Col. Campbell, Capt. Love, Lieut. Guthrie, the Brownlees, the Brisons, the Shaws, the Wilsons.

As the times grew darker their sympathies grew closer. At no other time did they live as one family, in a sort of communism, for the fear of apparent death makes all men forget their enmity. Those, in such settlements as this, who worked worked in common. When a patch of rye or wheat was to be cut and gathered in it was a kind of serious frolic. This was so in the region bounded by the old military road and the block-houses around the Sewickley settlement.

We will remember that besides the regular forts and those block-house cabins, such as Fort Waltour and Miller's Station, there were in every locality other designated points to flee to which, being the most convenient, a crowd would most likely be collected at soonest. Such were George's cabin, to the northeast of Miller's about a mile, and Rugh's block-house, near the Beaver Dam on Jack's Run, about a mile to the south of now Greensburg. These were early settlements, the Miller farm having been in the possession of that family from the time it was warranted. At this time this settlement was rather thickly peopled. Large fields had been cleared about the house, and stake-and-rider fences kept the cattle from trespassing.

The militia in the service of the State had deserted from the posts, because they were not paid and were in rags, and the safety of the inhabitants was in their own exertions. While the gloom from repeated disasters still rested upon the people they gathered into the cabins about Hannastown and nearer the block-houses and stations. The whole country north of the Great Road almost to the rivers northwestward of the Derry line was, so to speak, deserted. Fears were apprehended that the Hannastown settlement would be made an objective point, but there was no apparent danger more than a general fear.

On Saturday, the 13th of July, 1782, the settlers next to Hannastown on the north, and those about the fort and the town itself who could be spared, went out to cut the harvest of Michael Huffnagle. Huffnagle was the prothonotary and one of the judges of the Common Pleas. He was one of the most active and best known of the inhabitants. He had been an officer in the Westmoreland regiment, the Eighth in the Continental line, had seen service in the campaign in the Jerseys, and in one of the battles of the Revolution had been wounded in the leg. The wound allowed him to be exempt from military duty, but on his return he had entered actively into the civil service, and had gained much influence. He had a farm about a mile and a half north of the town, and while he was engaged in the duties of his office his neighbors took their turn at his fields. At this time court was being held at the old house, first built by Robert Hanna and used by him. By the records of the Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions it appears that the July term commenced on the second Tuesday of July, 1782, before Edward Cook and his associates, Cook holding these courts in Westmoreland under a special commission.

From an imperfect narrative and from many conflicting accounts we have collated the facts which can be taken as authentic, and which we believe are substantially correct.

The reaping-party had cut down one field and were about finishing it, after they had eaten their dinner in the shade, when one of the reapers crossed over to the farther side next the wood. As he neared the opposite edge of the field where the wood feathered in he espied some Indians watching the party from behind trees as the party were coming out to take their places. The man ran back and gave the alarm that the Indians were coming. The party hurried from the field with all speed, some going towards the place where they had at first collected, others through the woods to alarm the settlers and to reach their homes, but most ran direct for the fort and town. When they came running into the town all was confusion. One, using a familiar form of expression, says that the sudden inroad of the savages that afternoon was like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. The records were taken from the court-house to the stockade; the door of the round-logged jail was opened, and the prisoners confined were allowed to go at large; and while some were running about helping the women and children and decrepit old people, others themselves were hurrying into the fort and making ready to close the big gate cut in the palisades. The suddenness of the onslaught can be imagined when that none made an effort to secure their household treasures, their clothing, or movable stuff.

Before the Indians had yet made their appearance about the town itself, and soon after the news reached there, a kind of a consultation was informally held by some of the men to decide on a plan of action. The people who had remained at the town were now within the shelter of the stockade. There chanced to be about the town then some who would rather have fought Indians than eat dinner, and who would not have slept knowing that any of the settlers were in danger and the woods full of such vermin. Some of these, it is said, volunteered to go out in the direction of the fields, that they might see where the Indians were collected, to get their strength and to report their objective movements. James Brison and David Shaw were of this party. But before these left, and among the first to go out, was Capt. Matthew Jack, who on his good horse, took a circling route to reconnoitre to find something of the intention of the savages, and to alarm the settlements nearest the town. Capt. Jack, although going in a way not directly towards the fields from the fort, was the first to come upon the place where they were collected, not far from where the reapers had left. They were then apparently consulting and agreeing upon a plan of attack. His quick perception took in the whole situation at once. The instant he reined his horse in he was seen. He turned his horse and fled, and they followed. Coming back he met the young men who had started out after he had. He yelled to them to run for their lives, that he would circle round before going to the fort, expecting by the speed of his horse and his knowledge of the land to get back before they should arrive there, or in case of pursuit to evade them, for there was no one ever thought that fear of the Indians ever once possessed him, being by nature fearless and excitable, and having had much experience in the troubles of the frontier. The captain from here kept in a southerly course to the right of the fort, and in the direction of Miller's, although not to Miller's. On his way he came to where the Love family lived, somewhat above a mile from the fort. These he assisted off, taking Mrs. Love and her small babe on the horse behind him, and carrying them, if not to the fort, to some place of safety. Of the day's work of this gallant chevalier this incident is proven in the accounts and well preserved in the traditions of the Hannastown descendants.

The young men whom we have mentioned of, on meeting Capt. Jack, took his word and hurried back towards the town. The Indians caught sight of Shaw and his companions, and no doubt hoping to reach the town before they were expected, came running at full speed after the scouts; for they were surely under the impression that news had not yet reached the village, that they would capture the scouts by running them down, or at least that they would make their attack before the people could have time to get away. Then began the old-fashioned race for life. The scouts were good woodsmen and swift runners, and they knew the ground well; every path, every hollow, every jutting rock was familiar. If they could reach the Crabtree Run, which marked its way through the rough ravine, they might then feel safe, for the Indians would hardly pursue them under cover of the houses. By the time they reached the Creek they could hear the footfalls of their pursuers, and glancing back over their shoulders see through the foliage the sun glistening on the naked backs, and the tufts of hair swinging in the brushing wind. The Indians, not sure of their prey, and evidently not to alarm the town, did not fire. Shaw, on reaching the brow of the hill upon which the town was built, ran to his father's house again to see if the family were out. From here he turned towards the stockade. By this time the foremost of the savages had emerged from the wood, and were showing themselves in the open space between the crown of the hill and the houses. Shaw here stopped, and drawing up his long-barreled, six-foot rifle, with unerring aim dropped one of the wretches in his tracks. He entered through the door-gate of the fort, which was closed behind him.

Thus, luckily, by the time the Indians and renegades came up the inhabitants of Hannastown were safely within the palisades of their stockade. Then, on the testimony of Huffnagle, at about two o'clock in the afternoon, the town, consisting of about thirty cabins and houses, was attacked by above a hundred Indians and white renegades called Tories acting with them.

When the crew saw how that they had been cheated out of a rare butchery they gave utterance to one of those indescribable yells which so closely resembled the cry of a brute in torture, the recollection of which long after chilled the blood of those who escaped. Then dispersing they fell to pillaging the cabins, throwing the goods out and scattering them about. Some of them in view of the fort danced about in derision, brandishing their tomahawks and knives. They were exasperated that the whites should escape, for their very expedition had been specially directed against this place.

When it appeared to the Indians that they had been baffled, they were called together by their leaders, about whom they grouped together to the side of the town and not far from the stockade. Here they powwowed in some sort of consultation, evidently considering about attacking the fort. Their language was loud, and their gestures were wild and impulsive; but they seemed to be well under the control of their leaders, who could be recognized as white men dressed in Indian fashion. It is stated with the utmost showing of authority that during this time they might have been fired upon with effect from the fort. The whites, however, although by insult and injury driven almost to desperation, did not choose to begin the fight, being evidently advised in this, for by so doing the whole force would have been brought down upon them. The Indians, as was afterwards ascertained, had concluded not to make an attack till the following morning; and the hope of salvation in this matter for the whites was in waiting till assistance should come.

When the consultation was ended, a body of Indians and renegades started off in the direction of Miller's. The number of this pack is variously estimated, some placing it at forty or fifty, and it is not probable that it was less than the first number. But for those that remained at the town there was still some occasion for gratification left, and running up and down with a concerted action at the same time, they set fire to the town at a number of places. No obstacle was in the way of the fire, and the favoring wind made by the fire itself was so propitious that the cluster of houses was soon ablaze, and in a short time the town was reduced to ashes, with the exception of the fort and two houses nearest to it and covered by it. One of these houses was Hanna's.

As the flames burst up through the dry clapboard roofs and the logs crackled in the heat, the savages now drunken with whiskey and mad with rage, danced around in the open space between the houses and the fort, not mindless, however, of keeping at a respectful distance out of the range of the guns. But from where they were they mocked in an insulting way those who were pent up, and held up in their view the articles which they had stolen from the houses. One noble warrior had appropriated to his particular self a brilliant military coat which he had found in ransacking a house. He had put it on, and so peacocked out strutted back and forth in rather too close range of the fort, for some one within, drawing a true bead upon him, fired, when the warrior leaped in the air, and thus sacrificed his life to his vanity.

Communication with the outside of the fort was now entirely cut off. The scouts who had not returned could not now get in, and when they heard the noise about the town did not make an effort to do so, but kept alarming the country. The stockade, although a good place of defense, was at this time so poorly manned with all the needful men and munitions that the ultimate safety of these rested more with their friends on the outside than upon their own exertions. That no attack had been previously made upon the settlement was owing to the existence of the fort. Its inmates now for the most part were decrepit old people and women and children.

The incursion had been so sudden that no unusual means had been brought into use for perfecting its capability to withstand a two-days' siege. No munitions were kept here, as what could be spared were sent farther to the front, and the young men who had gone out on the frontiers with the expeditions of the season previous had taken their best rifles with them. A few old, half-worn-out muskets, which had passed through the hands of the county lieutenants, and which were unfit to arm the regulars or the militia with, had found their way hither, and these, with the arms carried in by the people from the town, were all they had. The number of those imprisoned during that day and night has been differently given. Most of the accounts give it by mere conjecture. Perhaps the number of all—men, women, and children—was between forty and fifty, of whom about twenty were fighting-men. Huffnagle says they had only nine guns; of these it is certain they did not have enough to arm all who could have used them.

At Miller's, about two and a half miles southeast of the village through the woods, were collected perhaps twoscore souls.¹ The cabin block-house here was the mansion-house of Capt. Samuel Miller, of the old Eighth Regiment in the service of the Continent, but who had now been dead some four years. The rest of the Miller family, with his widow, now married to one Andrew Cruickshanks, and her family, still lived on the farm. The Miller house was an old landmark; and while the captain was alive he was one of the leaders to whom the neighbors looked as to a father. As it was, the cabin-house was still open to all who came. Here before these times the neighbors had come for years to cut down the harvest, as they were doing now, and here on the smooth puncheon floor of the lower story of the double cabin, on many an evening the young lads and girls danced corn-rows and cut the pigeon-wing to the music of the scratching fiddlc. There had been at this time of great distress some three or four other cabins temporarily erected near the main one for shelter of those who had come to the station. At the beginning of this harvest there were, perhaps, above a dozen families represented at the farm. It has long been credited that a marriage festival was being celebrated at Miller's on that particular day of the incursion, and that some of the party collected there were brought together by this occasion. There seems, indeed, to be good authority for this, but yet with very attentive research and after some exertion in this particular we must conclude that there still remains a doubt on this narration. Some of the best informed had never heard anything about it only from the printed account; others, who late in life read only the printed version, totally denied it, and those who in green old age still preserve the hearsay, and are conversant with no other source of information, can throw no light upon this side of the question. Such a version might readily have arisen and circulated from the fact of the number of people collected together there at that time. There were some there on that occasion from the town itself, among them the two daughters of Robert Hanna, both of whom were taken, and one of whom (Jenett Hanna) married a British officer when they were in Canada.

But these represented the families of the neighboring settlers and farmers, and they had been drawn together from various causes. Some of them were the wives and children of soldiers who, being in service for the rest, had left the protection of their helpless ones to their neighbors; some, indeed, were widows and orphans; some from a distance beyond the main road had gathered hither and taken up their abode, waiting for better times; some to help during the harvest the Millers, the Georges, the Rughs, the Jacks, and any who needed it. Among them were two or three of those hardy backwoodsmen who had seen service of the roughest sort, who were as brave as the bravest, noble as the noblest, brusque in manner and rough in address. Of these we identify John Brownlee, who was known as Capt. Brownlee, a soldier in Capt. Joseph Erwin's company of the Eighth Regiment, under whom he had seen some service in the Jerseys. From the time he was out of the regular service he was a prominent fighter on the frontier, and went out with many parties from that region of country. He was a muscular, stoutish man, and the hero of a chosen circle. To the Indians he was as they, savage, inexorable, and bloodthirsty, sharing to the fullest that peculiar loathsome feeling towards them which appears to be common in those who are brought in contact with them on the outskirts of the West at this day. He regarded an Indian as a "varmint," the lowest thing of God's creation, and on more than one occasion had led parties to intercept and destroy those who, to say all that could be said, were only suspicious. These thought, like Shaw, that a man was in duty bound to shoot an Indian whenever he saw one.¹ Yet in his contact during so many trying and weary months with those objects of his abhorrence he had not lost that exquisite sensitiveness for his own race and kin which so strongly marks the highest civilization. To the women he was a true man, courteous and respectful; to his wife the beau ideal of a husband; and towards the children whom he loved he had that happy faculty of expression which wins and allures by the spontaneous disclosure of the passions and feelings of the heart. During the dark times of 1781 and 1782 we hear of the Brownlees often, the name being well known in frontier times, and it stands yet in old records and petitions, and in the list of that band of immortals who suffered at Valley Forge. Our Brownlee lived when at home on a farm to the northeast of Miller's, better known latterly as the Cope farm.

¹ The old Miller house was near the site of the barn on the farm now owned by William Russell, Esq., of Greensburg, on the right side of the railroad going westward. The same spring that supplies the present house then supplied the old house and the cabins about it. The attack was in all probability from the northeast side, along that part of the hill and sloping valley (or rather depression of ground) which lies in that direction. After leaving the station the Indians passed up along the hillside and near where the barn on the hill back of the present farmhouse now stands.

With all the excitement incident to the sudden appearance of the savages, and with the active exertions of the scouts, the crew were, as we have seen, about the town, and must have been on their way to the station at Miller's before word reached there. In all probability the noise about the fort gave the men in the field the first intimation of danger, for somehow the air was full of forebodings. Away down near Unity Church, where was being held preparatory service to communion, the word was carried that afternoon, and the congregation dispersed homeward, while their pastor, the Rev. Power, who lived long to relate it, hastened towards his home near Mount Pleasant; and the solitary men working in the fields heard on the sultry afternoon the echoes of the guns, and leaving their sickles, suspicious of coming evil, hastened to their cabins, got down their pouches, ran bullets, called their little ones in, and barred the doors. Those near Allou's block-house gathered there. Across the country, at a little block-house, the remains of which are still to be seen about a mile and a half north of Greensburg on the Salem road, lived Kepple, a brother-in-law of Michael Rugh. Kepple was in the field with his team, his dog running towards him, frisking and barking with all signs of fear, and the sound of the far-off crack of the guns made him on the instant strip the gears from his horses and hasten back to the house, built for war and peace, and barricade the openings. A couple of families were sheltered here till the danger was over.

At Miller's the first that were alarmed were the men mowing in a meadow, and to these the noise of the guns brought the first intimation. The men, listening, knew the sounds came from the direction of the fort. They threw down their scythes and ran towards the houses; but before they reached there they heard the war-whoop, and some shots were fired by the foremost Indians, who emerged from the wood and came into the fields and along the fences as the men were going out. No correct portraiture of the scene at the cabins can be given. The people ran about in the utmost distraction. Some, intent only on their own escape, got off, and among these were a few women and children. A little girl, who died an old woman, much beloved and respected, hid herself among the blackberry bushes till the favoring night came down with its kind darkness.

At the Miller house itself were most of the women and children collected. These were irresolute through fear, which the poets say is contagious; and indeed the cries of the helpless increased the panic which had been created by the sudden appearance of danger, the desertion of the men, and the horrid whooping of the red brood yelling their cries of doom. But although it is too true that some men, cowardly at heart, left at the first alarm, yet that instinct of human nature, happily for our kind not to be crushed out or wholly smothered under adversity and in trouble, was forcibly awakened and displayed, to the lasting honor of that hardy race. Could a man, at such a time, leave his wife, his child, his mother, or sister? Nay, we have instances of some not joined by ties of blood or affinity losing their life in the effort to save those who could only be called their friends. Those who started in time made their way over the hills to the Peter George farm. Some escaped to Rugh's block-house, and some by hiding in the fields until night. But there were timid ones who could not be prevailed to put themselves under the protection of the men, and by leaving the roofs for the woods and fields risk the chances of escaping by flight rather than put themselves on the mercy of the savages.

When the alarm was first given, or soon after, Brownlee, as is reported, was in the house. He snatched his rifle and ran to the door, and there seeing a couple of Indians entering the gate, he made at them on a run. It was believed that he could have made his escape, and in all probability would have done so, and not with a selfish motive, well knowing that a chief object of the Indians was booty and prisoners, and resting assured that he and the other whites could recapture their friends. Such a termination would not have been a remarkable event in the frontier annals. But this intent was on the instant changed, for above the confusion and excitement the voice of his wife pierced his ear crying for help,—“Jack, are you going to leave me?” The cry unnerved the man, who, facing half a dozen wild barbarians, by their sudden war-cry would not have been so unnerved. He returned backward with his face towards the Indians, and beside the door gave himself up to their pleasure.

The Indians by this time, coming up in different directions, had surrounded the house, so that its inmates were secured as prisoners, while the scattered fugitives were chased by others close in pursuit. One young man, who on the first alarm ran to the house to warn them and give assistance, snatched up a child which is said chanced to be one of Brownlee's. He had not gone far with it when he saw himself followed by three or four of the Indians. The young man was a swift runner, and his strength, had he not been encumbered with the child, would have enabled him to gain upon them. But as it was now it was a question with him whether he could even keep up the distance between them. Such suspicions ran through his mind, and still he ran on for a distance desperately, looking not in any particular direction, but by his strength gaining on the upland which rises towards the old George place, till suddenly before him rose a thick copse of low growth; beyond that was a rye-field not yet cut down. He reached the thicket, passed through, and for a few moments was lost to their view by the intervening foliage. On the side of the field next the thicket was a worm stake-and-rider fence. Coming to this he climbed it, and jumped out far into the rye. Where he alighted upon his feet he lay down with the child. Then the savages came running up. They looked over the field, leaped over the fence, and ran along the edge of the field on past him where he lay. They had lost sight of their game, and the thicket for an instant had deluded them. The young man heard them coming back. The child lay quiet. With slow steps they repassed within a few steps of the two, muttering expressions of disappointment.

¹ Taking the Irishman's motto at Dounybrook Fair,—“Whenever you see a head, hit it.”

One of the most singularly remarkable incidents of that day is one which has in it more of romance than of the common occurrences of real life. This is the seemingly miraculous escape, or rather preservation, of a small child, almost a babe. The common story which has long obtained, partly from the honorable judge's account,¹ and partly from exaggerated statements bordering upon the marvelous—a clothing in which many common people are but too apt to vest everything out of the ordinary way—deserves correction. It is that of a man who, carrying off his child and assisting his mother, saw the Indians gaining upon him and certain death to all if he did not run the risk of sacrificing one by leaving it and escaping with the other,—that is, either his child or his mother. Then, as the story goes, on the instant he dropped the child, and by helping his mother they both made their escape, and, strange to say, the child the next morning was found safe in its former home. This has been the commonly accepted version. We have taken more than usual pains to trace the story up to its source, and fortunately have been more successful in so doing than in many other instances. The singular deliverance of the child, in which centres the chief interest, was in all narratives the same. The truthfulness of the occurrence is assured. We have traced the version through the family in which the incident occurred; it has been repeated on the testimony of several distinct persons, who are fully entitled to be heard. It has been related by one, a gentleman of good judgment and veracity, himself a descendant of one of the principal actors in that scene, whose assertions are entitled to credence, in that it robs the part which tends to the romantic of its tinsel fringe, and clothes it with the reality of every-day life and passions and fears, and chiefly is it the version that came from the child thus saved in her ripe old age, as she had learned it from voices long since silent.

Among those, then, who made an effort to escape was Mrs. Cruickshanks, who had been Mrs. Miller. She had with her her young child, and she was partially assisted by her brother. The woman seeing they were pursued by a single Indian, and being unable from fright to proceed farther without help, exclaimed to her brother that unless he shot the Indian she would be killed. Cruickshanks then turned and fired, but as he did so the Indian "clamped" a tree, as they called it, that is, threw his arms around it and stuck to it like bark itself. He did not stop to see whether he had killed the Indian, nor did his sister know; but while they escaped the babe was left on the ground. Mrs. Cruickshanks escaped into one of the neighboring block-houses, to where that night her son, and the only surviving son of Capt. Miller, then a lad, also came.²

Whether the Indian was shot, or whether he was afraid to pursue, being somewhat detached from the rest, cannot be told. He certainly did not pursue them farther. The greatest subject of wonder then is what the child did during this time and subsequently; for the next morning, when the whites ventured to inspect the cabins, the child was found in the only cabin left standing, in its own cot, sleeping the sleep of innocent childhood, and all around desolation and death. The simple folk regarded it as a miracle, and loved to dwell upon it to their children, pointing out with simple devotion the providence of God to their fathers in the olden time. The infant grew to womanhood, married a man of the name of Campbell, and died at an advanced age almost a generation after those hardy men who experienced the excitement of that memorable day were food for worms. As to what the Indians had to do with the saving of the child it is, of course, all conjecture. It is reasonable to infer that the Indian when fired at gave up the pursuit, if, indeed, he was not killed. It is more than probable that the child lay undisturbed and unnoticed till the savages had passed away, and that then, finding its way back in the dusk to its own cabin, wearied out, it lay down in its bed and fell asleep. It is not at all probable that it at any time fell to the mercies of those unrelenting savages, who, goaded on by renegades worse than savages themselves, and filled with the memories of wrongs, were seldom known to have compassion on human woes, and who did not distinguish between the scalp-lock of a tender girl and that of a bronzed and grizzled fighter.

¹ Judge Coulton's account, published in Penn. Argus, 1836.

² See biographical sketch of Mr. Samuel Miller, in this book.

With the utmost haste, and at nearly the same time, were these things transpiring. While some of the Indians had scattered about, and were pursuing the fugitive whites, the most of them had surrounded the house. No defense whatever was offered. Capt. Jack, true to his promise, and in his devotedness to the unwarned inhabitants, was too late to give the word of alarm to the people here. He had started for Miller's, and just as Brownlee rested by the door the captain dashed up the lane towards the house. He had been too late, and seeing the Indians about the yard he turned his horse. As he did so their bullets cut his bridle and whistled about his head. He escaped unhurt, and turning his horse about he rode over fences and logs and through the woods and fields on his rare good beast, and fetched up at George's, where were collecting those who escaped that way and the men from the farms.

The Indians, after securing the prisoners, tied the hands of the men behind their backs, huddled them out before the cabin-fort together, and after getting out of the cabins whatever they wanted, set the houses on fire. The chief house, Miller's, was consumed, but it would appear that not all the other sheds or cabins were. The horses and cattle, hogs, sheep, and dogs were shot down where they stood or as they ran about. This is attested by Huffnagle and Duncan, who places the number of cattle so destroyed at about one hundred. Of their prisoners the greater number were women and children. Of the men, Brownlee was the most conspicuous.

The captives were laden with the plunder and goods which themselves had been robbed of. The sobbing women and crying children were driven in a flock before the marauders into a captivity worse than exile. The burdens upon their backs were light to the load upon their hearts. All ties of kindred, of home, of fields familiar indeed in sorrow, but now doubly dear, all were torn asunder. They thought they had seen these for the last time. Some there were who kept up, or seemed to keep up, courage, evidently looking for help from their neighbors. The calm, heroic, and changeless appearance of such as Brownlee among them was a relief to such as these. There was one woman especially who could not help expressing her feelings. Looking through her tears to Brownlee, she said, "I am glad, Capt. Brownlee, that we have got you along with us." These were unfortunate words. Some say that the renegades had recognized Brownlee and knew him all the time. This does not appear reasonable. They knew him by name and by report, but it is not likely they recognized him in person. Brownlee's plan to deceive was perfect. He gave himself up without offering resistance where resistance would have availed nothing, and which show of resistance would, in all probability, have been the certain destruction of the helpless ones. He kept silent during all the time they were about him, while they tied his hands, and while they piled their trumpery upon his back.

There is no doubt that during this time he wished to keep off suspicion, and to disguise his identity by acting with the implicit submission of a coward. Nothing could make the settlers believe but that he contemplated making his escape at the first opportunity, perhaps that night; that he would have found out their strength, and thus told the whites how to attack to the best advantage; that he would have returned upon them, and liberating the rest of the captives, have had more than retributive justice. It is almost certain, then, that they did not know him till about the time the remark was made by the woman, and when it was apparent he was the centre of the band of unfortunates. But so it was that from that instant his fate was sealed. On the mention of his name hasty glances were cast from one to the other of the savages and back upon the prisoner. A couple of them in guttural growlings were seen to consult together, and then evidently they determined upon what was afterwards done. Brownlee trudged on, the centre of a weeping group. He was heavily laden with luggage, and in addition carried upon his back one of his smallest children. At a descending ground he stooped to adjust his child upon his shoulders, drawing its tiny arms more closely about his neck. As he was so doing one of the Indians that had eyed him so closely sneaked up behind him and dashed the hatchet into his head. Brownlee fell headlong, and the child rolled over him. The next instant the child was killed by the same savage with the same hatchet which had laid open the skull of the gentle and tender-hearted father. The wife of Brownlee, full of horror, witnessed the death of her husband and child. Another woman shrieked out as she fell swooning to the ground. And she met the same fate, the Indians, as was supposed, taking her to be the real wife of the dead man.

The band of Indians that had these prisoners in charge moved round and rejoined the company whom they had left about the fort. In the closing twilight the body together left the destroyed place, and removed towards the northeastward of the town, and fixed their camp in the hollow through which flows the Crabtree. They here regaled themselves on what they had stolen, and while some in the darksome shadows were left to watch, the rest were concerting on future action.

The Indians during the afternoon had not made a concerted attack upon the fort; they were evidently afraid to do so. The suspense which those cooped up there during that time sustained may with effort be imagined. Hope, the only medicine for the miserable, was about all left them. If their neighbors should not come to their help during the night, they could expect nothing but captivity if the next morning they should surrender, and if they resisted and fought, possibly a frightful death. The terror of the women part was heightened by the fate of young Peggy Shaw, who lay in agony on a cot in the cabin of the stockade.

The death of this maiden was long the centre of interest in the incursion, and whenever and wherever Hannastown has been talked about among the descendants of these people this episode has been talked of with it. It is not then to be wondered at that more than ordinary interest attaches to the narrative, nor that strange and exaggerated stories should have been coined and passed for current. The story has been told in many ways, but the most simple and truthful way is enough to make her character beautiful, her actions heroic, her life romantic, and her death full of glory.

Margaret Shaw was the sister of David Shaw and Alexander Shaw. Alexander Shaw was the last man to go into the fort on that day, and David was a hunter and scout widely known, one of those rough backwoodsmen who, raised in the wilderness and on the verge of war, knew only the duty of defending the outposts and killing Indians, who could not to his dying day brook the conventionalisms of civilization, and who, in short, belonged to that class who had made a law unto themselves. He had gone, when of age, into the army as a substitute for his father. His term of service being over he was now at home, and almost as much in war as he could have been anywhere, and as much in his element as a wolf in the forest. All knew and remembered how quick he had been to apprehend the danger, and all admired his only devotion in seeing that his old father was in the fort before he himself went in. His sister was of the same blood. She was young at that time, only twelve or thirteen years, but for her age was large and muscular.

After they had gone into the fort, and while yet all was confusion, and each one appearing to be interested in his own personal safety, a little child had crept unnoticed towards the picketing of the stockade. Peggy Shaw seeing it ran to fetch it back. This was under the random fire kept up by the savages. As she stooped to gather it into her arms a bullet struck her in the right breast and penetrated her lung. She did not die suddenly, as is supposed, but lingered for some two weeks. This fortnight must have been one of intense suffering. Instead of having good clinical treatment, she was submitted to the barbarous manipulations of unskilled backwoods surgery. A silk handkerchief was drawn through the incision, and allowed to be continually drawn back and forth as long as any greenish discharge followed. A bullet-wound, from a half-superstitious belief, was thought to be poisonous, and the presence of the poison was taken to be denoted by the pus which exuded from the suppurating sore. In her lingering her body wasted to a mere frame. Her remains were laid to rest in the burying-ground of the old Middle Presbyterian Church, two miles northeast of Mount Pleasant. It was then not to be wondered at that the act was talked of with admiration, and she in her death remembered with pity. Truly she died, as one long ago expressed it, a victim to her kindness of heart.

It is said that the child she saved by her own death lived and grew to womanhood, but the identity is lost in the number who have been so designated.

While these things were going on the country all around was being alarmed. There seems to have been a great noise from the shouting of the Indians and the cracking of guns kept up all the afternoon about the fort. Some say that when the men came together at George's many guns were fired in a volley to arouse the neighborhood. The greatest crowd which collected together at any one place was here. By the evening there were gathered well-nigh forty men, although some by exaggeration say more. Perhaps the force here was stronger than that at the fort. It was decided to make an effort to assist those. Scouts reported that the renegades were remaining together after the two parties had joined.

The long July twilight had gone out, and darkness, with favoring rain-clouds, was gathering over the sombre woods when a party of about thirty, as it is said, left George's for Hannastown. Some of them were on horseback, and all were well armed with rifles. In after-years the suspicion of cowardice was imputed to some who lived thereabout, but the instances were few and hard to be authenticated. For one to skulk off then when the neighbors were crying for help and almost in the clutches of the savages was to incur an odium which would remain and attach to him as long as he lived, and which would taint his memory to his children's children. Their resolution was, therefore, fixed. The scouts reported to the main body as they advanced; those, who had volunteered for that purpose, and who were accustomed to tread the woods like a cat, had given word where the Indians and renegades were encamped. Cautiously advancing the party came within sight of the town, and saw at a distance the dim outline of the stockade. As they approached closer they could see by the fitful gleams of the burning logs, which yet occasionally crackled up in flickering sparks and cast sombre shadows against the dark line of trees, the white-washed walls of the palisades. No Indians were about the piles of ashes or upon the open place next the fort. As they came from the farther side they made themselves known to the inmates, when the gate was thrown open, and at length all were safely within.

The Rev. Richard Lee, a Presbyterian minister, stopping about the vicinity of Hannastown a number of years ago, while some of the persons who had been eye-witnesses to the destruction of the place were still living, and while the memory of those who were the immediate descendants of others who had participated was still green, gathered a number of reminiscences and published them in a Pittsburgh paper. While there are many things in his article which are ultra authentic, there are some statements which, supported by corroborative testimony, are worthy to be remembered. The part which we thus retain was mainly derived through Mrs. Elizabeth Craig from Miss Freeman, one of the persons mentioned, and from Mrs. Alexander Craig, a daughter of James Clark, one of the defenders of the fort.

When the Indians retired at night into the woods to divide their plunder and prisoners they lighted fires and began a distribution. The warriors in their new costumes presented a ludicrous appearance: some of them had shawls tied around their waists, and others had on bonnets and petticoats. One of these, like his cousin, the dark-visaged Othello, "perplex'd in the extreme," was puzzled in trying to encase himself in a silk dress, for the sleeve being very tight, after the fashion, and he trying to force his big foot into it, after the manner of drawing on a stocking or breech-clout, could get his heel no further than the elbow of it. He was thereupon so amazingly pleased, and he made such a laughable appearance as he frisked about on one foot, that, gathering a crowd of companions around him, he got them into right good humor, which possibly inured to the benefit of the captives.

About midnight, upon hearing the noise at the stockade, they held a council, and at the conclusion they seized upon one of their captives, and painting his body with black stripes, tied him to a tree. He had been assigned to torture. The savages, armed with sticks and tomahawks, ranged themselves into two lines, between which some of the other prisoners were to run the gauntlet. The men were put through first, and of these some were badly beaten. Then came the women. Among these were the two daughters of Hanna. From the first Jane, the younger of these, had got the good favor of the warriors. She had, with great tact, extended her hand to the Indian who took her, and greeted him as "brother." She had laughed out at the antic caperings of the warrior trying on the dress, which she recognized, and he no doubt, in a sudden fit of good humor, tried to be worthy. These two young women, on the relation of Miss Freeman, escaped unhurt; the Indian who had taken them and the other who created the sport showing them material aid, but Miss Freeman herself, having red hair, which was a color much disliked by those fastidious gentlemen (of the "bow" monde), was nearly killed. She, however, escaped with her life, and many years after she returned, Dr. Posthlewate attended her when suffering from the blows she had then received upon her skull with the butt end of a tomahawk. They did not have the satisfaction which they had anticipated in torturing the prisoner, for the noise of drums and the clamor in the fort increasing, they tomahawked him at once, and soon after began their retreat.

It was on the part of the whites believed on all sides that an attack would be made in the morning, and so a plan was agreed upon by those in the fort to make the presence of those who had come in during the early night-time known. A couple of old drums found in the fort were braced up, and while the gate was left open the horsemen galloped back and forth over the corduroy bridge across the run at the foot of the hill to the beating of the drums. This was to make believe that reinforcements from Fort Ligonier and from the country had come in in great numbers. The stratagem had the desired effect. The renegades listened with something of apprehension, and they could not but observe the marked change in the acclamations of the inmates. On the ghostly night-air, laden with desolation and fears, these were sounds of doom. They called in all their gang with the sounds of the whippoorwill and the screech-owl. In the after-part of the night they fled, carrying with them whatever booty they could well take on their own backs and on the backs of their prisoners. The number of these captives which they took along was about twenty, and the most of them were women and children. Under the shadows of the morning they trotted along on the dividing path between Congruity Church and Harvey's Five Points, and crossed the Kiskiminetas about the site of Apollo.

The gray morning came in before it was known that the band had left the purlieu of the settlement. A party of well-armed men then took up their trail and followed them to the crossing of the river. The river was swollen at the crossings, it is said, and further pursuit was discontinued. This may be a sufficient reason, but not a plausible one. The force of the whites must have been comparatively weak with that of the retreating party. The invaders went out unmolested, and reaching Canada traded their scalps and prisoners with the British for trinkets, beads, powder, and rum.

The remaining settlers now looked out over their fields desolated, their cabins burned, and the few household goods collected through necessity destroyed or stolen; some houses deserted for good; their little town in ashes; the carcasses of their cattle eaten by crows, and those not killed strayed off; their friends or their kin either dead or in uncertain captivity as much to be dreaded as death. Worried in heart and in body they first paid their duties to the dead. The bodies of Brownlee, his child, and the murdered woman were found. They were buried, as was an old custom, where they fell, and their graves were till lately by tradition pointed out in a field known best as Mcchling's field.

All then gathered in closer to the little fort and to the stations; and the crops were allowed to rot in the fields. As the fall approached the greatest danger of starvation was apprehended, and as the means of getting food became more limited their fears heightened. The State, from a knowledge of their pitiable condition, gave orders that supplies in limited allowance might be distributed to this handful of shelterless, distressed and weary creatures, with the understanding that the men were to enroll themselves under command of Capt. Brice, and draw rations for two months upon their making every exertion in their power to keep the line of the frontier.¹

The prisoners were exchanged by the terms of the treaty between Great Britain and the colonies, and most of them returned to their homes in Westmoreland. A few never came back, and it is said that one of the captives, Robert Hanna's daughter, married a British officer at Niagara.

We have not been able to find who was the leader of the Indians and renegades in this invasion, and the true story will perhaps never be found out. Nearly every general historian, who barely notices this incident, says that Simon Girty commanded; a few say that they were under direction of Kyashuta, the war-chief of the Senecas, and the old enemy of the whites. Most agree that they were under the control of white leaders, but we have not facts enough to warrant us that Girty was along; for shortly after this time Girty is found counseling with the Indians in their attacks on the border settlements of Kentucky, and we believe that during the latter part of the month of July Girty was among those. There is more reason to think that Connolly, as the British agent, instigated the attack, he well knowing the state of the settlement, and harboring a rancorous hate for the round-logged jail where St. Clair had him confined, and also that Kyashuta was with his warriors there. The Indians were for the most part of the Munsies, a tribe which about that time inhabited that part of Pennsylvania now within the limits of Forest County. This tribe was famous for its system of warfare, and had in it some of the most depraved characters of the race at the time of its utmost depravity. The short-lived improvement made upon them by the Moravian missionaries before the Revolution had not changed their brutal instincts. Those of them who had been Christianized left their tribe, and the rest of them, to whom the outlaws of various other tribes and devilish whites resorted, lived as banditti in the almost impenetrable forests of that region in close connection with the British outposts. Indeed, it is said that the fusion of so many ill characters into one tribe was a thing peculiar to that one.

Gen. William Irvine, still in command at Fort Pitt,² writing to Washington in 1788, some six years after the destruction of the town, gives an account of some curious information he had received from a chief of the Seneca tribe, as well as from a Virginian named Matthews who had been taken prisoner at Kanawha in 1777, and who had resided since that time with the Indians. This man was employed as an interpreter, and appeared to be well informed of the country and of the movements of the Indians. The Indian related, through the interpreter, to the general that when the French first established their post at Fort Pitt he was about fourteen years old; that he was with his uncle at that time, who was under the French; that they embarked at Lake Chatauqua, and that they went to Fort Pitt without any obstruction, and that they made the French Creek the medium of their communication from the headquarters of the French in Canada. He further said he was employed under the British in the late war; that in 1782 a detachment of three hundred British and five hundred Indians left on Lake Chatauqua with twelve pieces of artillery to attack Fort Pitt; that the expedition was laid aside from reports having been received of the strength of the garrison; and that they then contented themselves with the usual mode of warfare, namely, by sending out small parties on the frontiers, one of which burnt Hannastown. And this the general corroborates by other evidence, the testimony of which fell under his own observation.

Capt. Matthew Jack and David Shaw long remained the heroes of the "Hannastown war," as they called it. In the phrase of the zealous women, they were of the anointed and led charmed lives. Capt. Jack was one of that class of rough backwoodsmen of which Western Pennsylvania was at that time prolific, and although he could swag off daily his joram and in vehement expression could go beyond the rules prescribed by the Committee of Safety in their regulations for the associators, yet his breast contained the heart of a noble man. In 1782 he was high sheriff of the county, and perhaps was busier that day in "serving executions" than on any term-day he ever saw. Long as he lived he was the centre of a crowd at the militia musters, on court week, or at barn-raising. He was called familiarly Capt. Jack, for the rule is "once a captain always a captain." But sometimes the records style him "honorable," he having been a county judge, and afterwards "general," in deference to his being one of the superior military officers in the county about the time of the Whiskey Insurrection. Many curious anecdotes are related of him, and at reviews held about the country he would show his dexterity and suppleness by placing his hat upon the ground, and lifting it up as he rode by on a gallop; and to show how he rode on the Hannastown day, he would leap his horse over fences and gullies, which, to his admiring applauders, seemed the very height of recklessness.

The burning of Hannastown divides the history of the county into two eras, and closes the account of the place where were held the first courts. Many cities have risen and fallen to decay without leaving so glorious a record as this collection of mud-plastered huts scattered along the old military road among the trees of the primeval forest. Its name only lives in the history of Western Pennsylvania, and the site of those scenes of war and peace is covered with clover blossoms and waving wheat. Over the spot which was their graveyard the weeds and briars crawl among wild flowers.

¹ Col. Edward Cook's correspondence, Col. Rec.

² Craig's History of Pittsburgh.

"There sleep the brave who sank to rest
With all their country's wishes blest.
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallow'd mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.
By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To hless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall a while repair,
To dwell, a weeping hermit, there."

Its claim for remembrance is in this, that it was the first place in all the United States west of the Appalachian mountain chain where justice in the legal forms, sacred in the traditions of the English-speaking people, was first dispensed; this was the capital of Western Pennsylvania, with its rude temple, in which betimes sat the living oracles of English colonial law; in this, that here the backwoodsmen, descendants of a patriotic British ancestry, first raised their voice against ministerial tyranny; in this, that here dwelt the race which, standing a barrier, as a wall of fire, between civilization and barbarism, defended their homes through years of an incessant war with the fiercest enemy ever opposed to the whites. To one given to speculation, the destruction of this place is a subject for reflection. In a certain sense, here was the first place where a public protest was made against the action of Parliament in binding closer the unbreakable chains which they sought to rivet upon their own flesh and blood, and here was the last place in the colonies where the Indians and refugee Tories, under pay of the mother-country, executed their purposes in concert. Nor would it be scrutinizing too finely in observing that the destruction of Hannastown was the price paid for the protest of May, 1775. The penalty of the destruction of the Moravian towns, and the penalty for her disloyalty, were fully exacted and amply paid. For these alike it was well in the sequel of historic narration that Hannastown should lie in ashes. Yea, for us and for all men.¹

¹ The following extracts and observations will illustrate the subject-matter given in the body of this chapter:

Michael Huffnagle to President Moore, 1782.

"FORT REED, July, 1782.

"SIR,—I am sorry to inform your Excellency, that last Saturday at two o'clock in the afternoon, Hanna's Town was attack'd by about one hundred Whites and Blacks. We found several Jackets, the buttons marked with the King's eighth Regiment. At the same time this Town was attack'd, another party attack'd Fort Miller, about four Miles from this Place. Hanna's Town and Fort Miller in a short time were reduced to Ashes, about twenty of the Inhabitants kill'd and taken, about one hundred head of Cattle, a number of horses and hogs killed. Such wanton destruction I never beheld, burning and destroying as they went. The People of this Place behaved brave, retired to the Fort, left their all a prey to the Enemy, and with twenty men only, and nine guns in good order, we stood the attack till dark. At first some of the Enemy

CHAPTER XXIX.

LAST DAYS OF HANNASTOWN—EXECUTION OF MAMACHTAGA.

End of the Revolution—Formation of new Counties, Washington and Fayette—New State Project—Who were at the head of it—Causes of its Inception—Its Prospective Limits—It fails—Act of Congress relative thereto—1783-84—The Last Days of Hannastown—Trial of Mamachtaga, an Indian, for Murder—And also of some other Prisoners at the same Court—He is defended by Brackenridge—The Indian's Deposition—His Opinion of the Court—His Trial—Is found Guilty of Murder, and wishes to be Shot instead of Hanged—The Prisoners in the Jail want him to kill another Prisoner under Sentence of Death—He refuses to do so—The Jailer's Child takes Sick, when Mamachtaga goes out and gets Herbs to cure it—He returns to the Jail, and goes into Voluntary Confinement—The Day of the Execution arrives—A great Crowd of People assemble—The White Man hung, and then Mamachtaga hung—He dies like a Warrior, after having first painted himself for the Occasion.

At length the war was over. The definite treaty of peace with England was ratified by Congress on the 14th of January, 1784, and on the 22d of that month a proclamation to that effect was published.

came close to the Pickets, but were soon obliged to retire farther off. I cannot inform you what Number of the Enemy may be killed, as we see them from the fort carrying off several.

"The situation of the Inhabitants is deplorable, a number of them not having a Blanket to lye on, nor a Second suit to put on their Backs. Affairs are strangely managed here; where the fault lies I will not presume to say. This Place being of the greatest consequence to the Frontiers, to be left destitute of Men, Arms, and ammunition is surprising to me, although frequent applications have been made. Your Excellency, I hope, will not be offended my mentioning that I think it would not be amiss that proper inquiry should be made about the management of the Public affairs in this County, and also to recommend to the Legislative Body to have some provision made for the Poor distressed People here. Your known humanity convinces me that you will do everything in your power to assist us in our distress'd situation.

"I have the Honor to be your Excellency's

"Most obt. Hble. Servt.,

"MICH. HUFFNAGLE."

Indorsed, July 30, 1782.—Penna. Arch., vol. 1x.

This event was narrated in a letter* written by Ephraim Douglass to Gen. James Irvine, dated July 26, 1782, as follows:

"My last contained some account of the destruction of Hanna's Town, but it was an imperfect one; the damage was greater than we then knew, and attended with circumstances different from my representation of them. There were nine killed and twelve carried off prisoners, and instead of some of the houses without the fort being defended by our people, they all retired within the miserable stockade, and the enemy possessed themselves of the forsaken houses, from whence they kept up a continual fire upon the fort from about twelve o'clock till night without doing any other damage than wounding one little girl within the walls. They carried away a great number of horses and everything of value in the deserted houses, destroyed all the cattle, hogs, and poultry within their reach, and burned all the houses in the village except two; these they also set fire to, but fortunately it did not extend itself so far as to consume them; several houses round the country were destroyed in the same manner, and a number of unhappy families either murdered or carried off captives; some have since suffered a similar fate in different parts; hardly a day but they have been discovered in some quarter of the country, and the poor inhabitants struck with terror through the whole extent of our frontier. Where this party set out from is not certainly known; several circumstances induce the belief of their coming from the head of the Allegheny, or towards Niagara, rather than from Sandusky or the neighborhood of Lake Erie. The great number of whites, known by their language to have been in the party, the direction of their retreat when they left the country, which was towards the

* Now in existence, with the "Irvine Papers," in possession of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

The people of our parts and all west of the mountains were then left to rebuild their homes and start out from a new position, somewhat, it is true, in advance of the early colonists. By this time, when the smoke of battle had rolled away, Westmoreland was

Kittanning, and no appearance of their tracks either coming or going having been discovered by the officer and party which the general⁸ ordered on that service beyond the river, all conspire to support this belief, and I think it is sincerely to be wished, on account of the unfortunate captives who have fallen into their hands, that it may be true, for the enraged Delawares renounce the idea of taking any prisoners but for cruel purposes of torture."

"The express," wrote Irvine to Moore on the 16th of July, 1782, "sent by Mr. Hoofnagle, through timidity and other misconduct, did not arrive here until this moment (Tuesday, 10 o'clock), though he left Hannastown Sunday evening, which I fear will put it out of my power to come up with the enemy, they will have got so far away. However, I have sent several reconnoitering parties to try to discover whether they have left the settlements, and what route they have taken. I fear," he continues, "this stroke will intimidate the inhabitants so much that it will not be possible to rally them or persuade them to make a stand."

Gen. Wm. Irvine to President Moore.

"FORT PITT, July 25, 1782.

"The destruction of Hannastown put the people generally into great confusion for some days. The alarm is partly over, and some who fled are returning again to their places; others went entirely off. I have got the lieutenant of the county and others prevailed on to encourage some of the inhabitants to reoccupy Hannas Town, by keeping a post or small guard there."—Penn. Arch., vol. x.

David Duncan to Mr. Cunningham, Member of Council from Lancaster, 1782.

"PITTSBURGH, July 30, 1782.

"DEAR SIR:

"I have taken the Liberty of Writing you the Situation of our Unhappy Country at present. In the first place I make no doubt But you have heard of the Bad success of our Campaign against the Indian Towns, and the Late Stroke the savages have gave to Hannastown, which was all Reduced to ashes except two Houses, exclusive of a small fort, which happily saved all that were so fortunate to get to it. There were upwards of twenty killed and taken, the most of whom were Women & Children. At the same time a small fort four miles from thence was taken, supposed to be by a detachment of the same Party. I assure you that the situation of the frontiers of our County is truly alarming at present, and worthy our most serious Consideration. . . ."—Penn. Arch., vol. ix., 606.

The following letter from Gen. Washington to President Reed is of some significance in this connection:

"HEADQUARTERS, NEW WINDSOR, April 25, 1781.

"SIR:

"Since my letter of the 14th to your Excellency on the subject of an immediate supply of provision for Fort Pitt, I have received the following intelligence through a good channel which makes the measure more indispensably necessary. 'Col. Connolly with his corps to proceed to Quebec as soon as possible, to be joined in Canada by Sir John Johnson, with a number of Tories and Indians said to amount to three thousand. This route to be by Buck Island, Lake Ontario, and Venango. And his object is Fort Pitt and all the adjacent poste. Connolly takes with him a number of Commissaire for persons now residing at Pittsburgh, and several hundred men at that place have agreed to join to make prisoners of Col. Brodhead and all friends of America. His great influence in that country will, it is said, enable him to prevail upon the Indians and inhabitants to assist the British in any measure.' The latter part of this intelligence agrees exactly with a discovery which Col. Brodhead has lately made of a correspondence between prisoners at Fort Pitt and the Commandant at Detroit, some of whom have been seized by him. . . ."

Chataqua Lake, in New York, had been long before the harboring-place for hostile Indians. As early as 1752 the French Governor of Canada had begun the erection of a fort there, which was to be the rendezvous for the French and the Indians in their excursions against the en-circumscribed in its limits and impoverished in purse. From March 28, 1781, the county of Washington had been in successful operation, and from the 17th of February, 1784, the county of Fayette took care of the people as far up as her limits at Jacobs Creek.

crouching of the British along the Allegheny River, then claimed by the French. They then changed their location to one farther to the southwest, viz., Presque Isle, and here they built a permanent fort of large dimensions and great strength, but in 1753 they finished the fort at Chataqua. The portage road which the French cut from Chataqua to Presque Isle (Erie) was one of the earliest works of civilization in the West, made more than twenty years before the battle of Lexington.

He who would write a full history of the destruction of Hannastown and incorporate therein all the traditions and memorabilia of that war would fill a book much larger than this, for the destruction of Hannastown was to the inhabitants of that section what Noah's flood was to the inhabitants of the ancient world. If all reports were to be credited touching the individual claims of those whose ancestors were reported to have been in the fort when the town was burnt, the number would reach such a magnitude that it would cease to be credible.

Of the Shaw family, some members of which bore such a conspicuous part there, much has been preserved and much related. Moses Shaw and Margaret, his wife, had there three sons—David, a young man perhaps twenty years old, Alexander, about eight years, and John, quite young, not above one year—and two daughters, Sarah, about sixteen, and Margaret, or Peggy, about fourteen, who was wounded in the fort and who died about two weeks thereafter. John Shaw was the father of David Shaw Atkinson, Esq., of the Greensburg bar. The family have preserved among themselves the incidents which we now relate. On the day in which Hannastown was burnt, Sarah Shaw, whose descendant now reside below Trees' Mill, on Beaver Run, was washing, and when the attack was made she fled with her parents and the other children into the fort, leaving the pot full of clothes on the fire and the smoothing-iron before the fire. Although the house was burnt, the pot and the iron withstood the fire and are yet in the possession of the Shaw family.

They say also that it was Mrs. Moore's child that Margaret Shaw was carrying when she was shot. Mr. Moore's presence as a child at the fort has been noticed before, of which fact there can be no doubt.

Charles Sterret was killed on the Shaw farm, in Salem township, now owned by a Mr. Longsdorf. David Shaw and William Hays buried him. His grave is pointed out at this day. The graves of two men of the Ourry family, who were buried on their own farm, now owned by Mr. John Kepple, in Salem township, may also be seen, and they are reported to have been killed on that day by the Indians.

It would be very natural for the descendants of the old settlers about the Hannastown region, and even farther away, to connect their ancestors of that date in some particular with the Hannastown era, the subject of conversation about the fireside of two generations in the days of profound peace. To make mention of all the reputed facts touching this subject which have come to our ears would be too much of a work; to profess to believe all would be exhibiting too much credulity.

Of those who took part in the pursuit of the Indians on the next day or the day subsequent to that were doubtless the Craigs, the Sloans, and others from the neighborhood of the fort, and Capt. David Kilgore, with two of his sons, and some of their neighbors from the Upper Sewickley settlement (near Pleasant Unity). These, of course, by name are in addition to those whom we have before mentioned as taking a more early and active part.

Of those within the fort at the time of the incursion and not mentioned was Capt. Ourry. So also was James Moore, of Salem township, who died in 1846, aged seventy-three years. He was a mere child, and was at Hannastown with his widowed mother, who lived there. Their house with all its contents was burnt. His father had died a short time before by disease brought on by hardship and exposure on the frontiers.

At the time the attack was made on "Miller's Station," one of the children of Capt. Samuel Miller, then deceased, was taken captive and detained by the Indians some time. This was the daughter, Dorcas. She at that time was about eight years old, and was at the time of the fray on the hills back of the station gathering berries with her younger brother, Isaac. She heard the noise and saw the Indians depart from the station up over the hill for Hannastown, but did not suspect them to be warful Indians, for instead of hiding herself and her brother she went back towards the station, and the Indians seeing her at a distance

* Gen. Irvine.

The Commonwealth did not claim for the purposes of settlement any territory north and west of the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers, nor from her line of the purchase of 1768, which ran from above Kittanning to the southwest corner of Clearfield County, as we have the map, thence through the middle of Clearfield in a meandering line nearly at right angles to the limit of the State at Bradford County. This remaining part¹ was secured by the last treaty at Fort Stanwix with the Indians on October the 23d, 1784. This is what is called distinctly, and being the latest is now officially thus designated, the New Purchase, out of which have been formed the northwestern counties, ranging from Beaver to Tioga.

No material opposition being offered by the people, now under control of the civil power, the line marking the western divisions of the two States of Pennsylvania and Virginia was finally fixed. Another question which had been a source of commotion for some time previous was also summarily disposed of. During the latter days of the war there was a project on foot which created no little apprehension. Of this we may say something, so intimately connected is it with some subsequent matters in the history of Southwestern Pennsylvania. About 1780 and 1781 among the people of these parts arose what was called the New State project. This was a plan gotten up by a few ambitious and ill-contented men of some influence, taking advantage of the time and imposing upon the credulity of the distressed inhabitants, to form a more perfect State government for themselves out of the territory for which Pennsylvania and Virginia had been so long contending, as well as more undefined territory presumed to belong to neither. It is doubtful whether such a project could have been realized or accomplished, but being stimulated by seditious men in the heat of the war, it became a matter of great consequence. Many causes have been given for the dissatisfaction of these people as evidenced, and for the movement itself, but none of them of themselves entirely satisfactory. It came perhaps from many causes, and those who favored it were led by different interests.

There were two obvious reasons patent to all: first, the uncertainty and inequality of land purchases not yet determined; and next, the abolition of slavery. Of the matter of the first we are conversant; as to the other there were some, indeed a good number of persons of means in the southwestern part of the State, whose chief investment was in human chattels.

In 1780 Pennsylvania abolished slavery within her territory. This was one cause of the emigration at that time into Kentucky. Col. Brodhead wrote on Sept. 23, 1780, from Pittsburgh, that at that time emigration to the new country of Kentucky was incredible. This he lays to the disaffection of the people towards the country here at large, and considers it the remaining dregs of the loyalty to the king. We are not inclined to take this assertion in so broad a sense when we recall the fact that this was the time when Col. Brodhead and Col. Gibson were at variance. For it was to the interest of Col. Brodhead that the cause of this trouble should be credited to the loyalty of the people for the king while Col. Gibson rested under the imputation of disloyalty himself. There were, it is true, many who were proven traitors, and some within our county whose property was confiscated after they themselves had sought safety in flight. The people who entertained the notion of a new commonwealth were identical with the rabble of Connolly, with the murders of the Moravian Indians, and with the boys of the Whiskey war, and cared as little for the king of England as for the Jack of Clubs, and acknowledged at times no government but their own lawlessness.²

It is said by some that the project was much older than of the time we notice it, and that it was in the plan of Dunmore and Connolly to first make the new territorial government, with Pittsburgh as the metropolis and seat of empire. Be this as it may, it has nothing to do with the civil affair, which was bolstered up by another class of men.

Another occurrence favored the plan after it had motioned for her to come, and going toward her took her and her brother captive. The boy was killed that night, but Dorcas was carried to the vicinity of Niagara, where nearly three years afterward she was recognized and ransomed by Col. Butler, a British officer, who had been acquainted with her father. After her restoration to her family she resided, until a few years before her death, upon the farm from which she had been dragged to the horrors of a captivity among savages. She was married to Joseph Russell, and became the mother of a large family, some of which have been of our most highly-esteemed citizens. She died in Greensburg on the 15th of March, 1851, in the seventy-seventh year of her age. She was one of the few who could recount to persons yet living the recollections of one who had witnessed and felt the anguish of that fearful day and night. She was spared to exchange the privations and toils of the early settler's life for the ease and comfort of a rapidly advancing civilization, and surrounded by her children's children, after the vicissitudes of a checkered existence, to sink peacefully in the arms of death.*

¹ Except the Erie Purchase.

* I have got much corroborative information as well as some original facts incorporated into the subject from the descendants of Mrs. Russell, who obtained the facts from her. I am indebted to Wm. Russell, Esq., especially for original and collected papers.

² James Marshall to President Reed.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, JUNE 5, 1781.

"SIR,—Since my arrival in this county I have been making what progress I can in organizing the militia, although as yet deprived of the assistance of the sub-lieutenants by the indefatigable opposition of a certain Mr. Pentecost and a few of his adherents, the old enemies of this government, who immediately on my arrival got together at their courthouse in what they call Youghagana County, which is wholly involved in this and Westmoreland Counties, and to which the government of Virginia has sent no orders for some considerable time past. Notwithstanding they have resolved to go on with the jurisdiction of Virginia, both civil and military, until the line is actually run. Whereupon the said Pentecost swore into an old commission of county lieutenant that he pretended to have by him for a long time, and thereupon assumed the command of the militia. Mr. Cannon (a civil officer under the government of Virginia), one of our sub-lieutenants, publicly declares that government have infringed upon the rights of the people in appointing officers for them before they were represented, and instead of assisting me in organizing the militia, is using all his influence to prevent it. . . ."

been agitated. New York State proposed (1780) to surrender to the general government some of her western territory, and requested the other States that had any to do so also, and out of this new territory to make, or cause to be made, new States in the confederation.

Col. Thomas Scott, a former councilman for Westmoreland, and after the Constitution a member of Congress for Washington, in a letter to President Reed, a little later, talking of this subject, says that the movement met with great countenance; and, alluding to a memorial sent to the Assembly, says "that should that memorial be unsuccessful, he does not think there would be ten men on this side of the mountains that would not lift arms against the State."

Gen. Irvine, writing from Pittsburgh in April, 1782, to Governor Harrison, of Virginia, says that an expedition was much talked of to emigrate and set up a new State. A day had been appointed for those so inclined to meet for that purpose. He says that a man by the name of Johnston, who had been to England since the commencement of the war, was at the head of this emigrating party. He says that everything in the way of forming a new government was in readiness; and, so far as he could find out, the seat of government was to be in the Muskingum. Some time during this year he had occasion to be absent from the post, and when he went he directed Maj. Craig to keep an eye on the safety of the place, as there were men inclined to this scheme who were not too good to get possession of it. In 1782 the most active in the scheme were Col. Pentecost and Col. Cannon.

When first broached in 1780, the limits of the new State were to take in as much east of the Monongahela as it could get, and all northwest of it to the Ohio River; to reach southward into Virginia as far as the Kanawha, and westward to the Scioto and Muskingum Rivers. The bounds of the new State were, in truth, never disclosed. One thing is certain, however, the people of Pittsburgh and east of it above the Youghiogheuy did not ever take much stock in it; it is said they even shunned its embraces.

In December of 1782, Congress passed an act declaring that every attempt to set up a new State, in whole or in part, upon the territory of Pennsylvania should be treason. The Rev. James Finley, who had frequently been intrusted with missions from the State, was sent out by the authorities in 1783 among these people. He was armed with one hundred copies of the act, and of the proclamation, embodying the decision of the tribunal which adjusted the Connecticut claims, which led to the act. In his report he says that, finding the inhabitants east of the Youghiogheuy mostly opposed to the new State, he passed them by. He found a considerable number between that river and the Monongahela in favor of it, but they were led by a few aspiring and ill-designing men.

The project thenceforth, under the advice of the clergy, by the silencing of the partisans, and by the determination of the government to preserve order, gradually passed off from the tongues of the people, and was a thing of the past, and the uprising of the turbulent people of that region was delayed for some years. It was remarked that the new people who came in and purchased the land which the emigrants left were of a better sort.¹

Notwithstanding the village of Hannastown was destroyed, yet the courts still continued to sit at the house of Robert Hanna, and the writs were tested as at the shire-town. One of the most remarkable criminal cases that ever was tried in Western Pennsylvania came off here. As it illustrates the ancient method of procedure under the old penal code, as well as because it is a notable case in itself, we may recount it. To Judge Brackenridge, who was of counsel for the defense, we owe the preservation of the incidents of the trial and execution of the first person who suffered capital punishment in the county under the forms of law. The date of the execution is not accurately fixed, although it took place some time in the latter part of 1785.² In our collection we choose to preserve this account for the sake of the many curious circumstances connected with it.

This Mamachtaga,³ the first person hung at Hannastown, was an Indian of the Delawares. While his tribe under Killbuck had for the most part remained friendly to the Americans, this Indian and a few more were known to have been engaged in war against the

¹ Brodhead's letter of Sept. 23, 1780.

² The Indian Mاماughtaquit killed John Smith, 11th May, 1785. (Huffnagle to Gen. Armstrong.)—Arch., x., 464.

The following has been unearthed among the records :

" Accompt of the Gaol Keeper of Westmoreland County.

" Dr. The County of Westmoreland to John Hanen, gaoler.

" To my sustaining the Prisoner Joseph Ross 306 days at 6d. per day.....	£7 13 9
" To my sustaining the Prisoner Mamaghtaguin, an Indian, 30 days.....	0 18 9
" To Gaol Fees for the above.....	0 5 0
" To Bolting and Unbolting the Indian.....	0 7 6

" Sworn Jan'y, 1786, } before John Moore." }

The following letter would indicate a disposition to hang "Hurricane" first and try him afterwards:

Robert Galbraith to Prest. Dickinson, from Pittsburgh, May 25, 1785, says, "The Indian who is now confined in the garrison at this place is anxious to be tried as Speedily as may be, and receive the doom he so justly deserves. The Militia of Washington County have made two attempts to break the Dungeon where he is confined and Tommilhawk him."

[He then relates of two different attempts as having been made to get at the prisoner, which were frustrated by the coming of officers and some of the people, and then finishes as follows:]

"In this situation I earnestly request your Excellency to Commissionate two more Gentlemen of this place to try the Indian without delay, and if your Excellency and the Honorable Council would think proper to send his Death warrant at the same time by way of Dispatch, it would sooner ease the minds of the people. There can be no doubt of his conviction. I was one of the Inquest held upon the Body of John Smith, and heard all the evidence. The Indian's name is Mاماughtaguin, in English the Hurricane, the most violent and Bloody Catiff of the Delaware Tribe."—Archives, vol. x., 467.

³ This name is also sometimes called and spelled "Mamaghtaguin."

settlements. At the termination of the war and after the peace these Indians came back, and were stopping at Killbuck's Island, under the guns of the fort. While they were here some men, one of them named Smith, went over to the Indians one night, and while three of the men were in the cabin where the murder occurred, Mamachtaga, in liquor, ran in without warning, stabbed Smith so that he died, and fell upon another man named Evans, whom he also stabbed, but who catching him and struggling made a kind of mêlée, in which he also was killed, and the third wounded before the drunken man could be secured.

The Indian, Mamachtaga, made no attempt to escape, but being sober, gave himself up to the guard, affecting not to know what had occurred. Killbuck himself sat upon a log silent, and appeared cast down on the next morning at the time of the visit. The prisoner, on account of the insecurity of the jail or lock-up at Pittsburgh, was taken to the guard-house till the next Court of Oyer and Terminer should be holden at Hannastown for the county.

Brackenridge, then a young attorney, moved by the novelty of having an Indian for a client, was retained as his counsel, under the promise of receiving some beaver-skin for his fee. The account he has left of the whole business transaction is the one we follow. When the Indian gave him an order on another, who held some furs of his, which order he signed with his mark in the shape of a turkey-foot, he was under the notion that it was a kind of satisfaction for his crime, and could not understand how that he should say he was not guilty of the killing of the white man. When Brackenridge had seen the squalid appearance of the wretched man, as he was confined in the black hole, he exchanged the beaver-skin for blankets and food, which he gave the man. But being of a curious and inquiring turn of mind, and always fond of novelties, he got an Indian woman to interpret for him while he questioned the Indian, trying to observe the analogy between the sentiment of a savage and that of a civilized person, or, as he chose to express it, the force of opinion over pain. The woman was loth to broach the subject of death; she was, however, prevailed on, and when at last he was asked what death he preferred, he said he would rather be shot than tomahawked.

The habit of taking the law in their own hands to punish those who had offended had so completely pervaded and possessed the minds of the people that a party, fearing that he possibly might escape, either from bonds or through the finesse of the young attorney and the crooks and quirks of the law, came with their guns into the garrison, and demanded that the prisoner should be given up to them to be shot, and that the attorney should take an oath not to defend him. The officer would not allow this, but prevailed on them to go back, and leave the Indian to the civil authorities.

This Indian was, indeed, when in liquor a bad man, and had forfeited the good will of his tribe by having killed several of them. He had the appearance of great ferocity, but, like all men in the state of nature, his passions were in the extreme; for in and by civilization only are the passions harmonized. He was tall, rough in feature, and of fierce aspect. His name in their language signified "Trees-blown-across," a name given him from the nature of his ungovernable passion.

At the court holden at Hannastown for the county of Westmoreland, McKean, C. J., and Bryan, J., Mamachtaga was brought to trial. The usual formalities were observed, and an interpreter stood by to translate into the Delaware tongue the words of the indictment, the meaning of it, and to explain to him the privilege he had of denying the charge by pleading "not guilty." He could not comprehend the idea in saying he was not guilty, because by this he was telling a lie, a thing unbecoming a warrior. He did not like to say that he had not killed the men, but only that he was drunk, and did not know what he had done; but he "supposed he would know when he was under the ground." The court directed the plea to be entered for him, and he was put upon his trial.

He was then called upon to make his challenge, which was explained to him by the interpreter. This right he exercised by comparing the countenances of the jurymen, and challenging according to the sourness or cheerfulness of their countenances. The jury called to the book, being told in the usual form, "Prisoner, look upon the juror; juror, look upon the prisoner at the bar: are you related to the prisoner?" one of them, a German, the first called, did not take the question aright, and thinking it was a reflection, said, "How in ter teivel might he be related to ter Hingin?" thinking it a very uncivil way of treating decent people, as if he, being a Dutchman, could be a brother or cousin of an Indian. But the matter was explained to him by another German, and he, being satisfied, was sworn.

The only defense of the attorney was that the prisoner, at the time of committing the offense, was in liquor, but this was overruled by the court, as the fact of drunkenness would not excuse murder. The Indian said that he hoped the Good Man above would excuse it. The jury gave their verdict of guilty without leaving the box, and the prisoner was remanded to jail.

Near the ending of the court the prisoners were brought up to receive sentence. When the Indian was asked by the interpreter what he had to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him he said that he would rather "run a while," meaning by this that he ought to be allowed to go free to get some compensation for the man he had killed by way of satisfaction to the relatives of the dead man, as was a custom in his tribe. On the sentence of death being passed upon him he said he would rather be shot.

A man of the name of John Bradly, at the same court, was tried for homicide, and found guilty of manslaughter. He was allowed, as under the old law, his benefit of clergy, but being a simple man did not understand the technical nicety resulting from the pleading of it, and when the first part of the sentence was read, and the hanging part mentioned, he expressed the most abject terror in his looks and voice as he begged for mercy. But when it was explained to him, and the benefit by the common law allowed him, he seemed more composed. Sentence of burning in the hand was then pronounced against him, and the sheriff was sent out for the tools.

It so happened that the sentence of this prisoner occurred before that of the Indian, and the Indian was saying to the court that if it didn't make any difference to them he would rather be shot, when the sheriff came in with the branding-iron and a bed-cord to tie up the hand of the convict for manslaughter, the better to put on the hateful letter. The Indian getting a side glance of the sheriff coming in imagined that he was coming at that instant to enforce the law on his behalf. The idea of horror and the dread of instant death which the savage expressed must have been frightful, and the narrator likens the distortion of his features, black with unspeakable fear and anguish, to the effect of cold water suddenly poured on the human back.

When he saw what the sheriff was about to do he became somewhat calm again. Before he was taken from the bar he wished to say that his trial had been fair, and that he did not desire his tribe to revenge his death or go to war on his account. As the sheriff was taking him back to jail some of those about him asked him whom he thought the judges to be. These sate, as was then the official custom in the trial of capital crimes, in scarlet robes. The Indian said that he thought one was God and the other the Saviour of men, which notion or idea he no doubt got from the Moravians who had had missionary services among the Delawares.

During the time he lay in jail under sentence a child of the jailer had taken sick with a fever. The Indian said he could cure it if he could get some roots from the woods. The jailer made him promise that he would not attempt to make his escape, saying that if he got off, himself would be taken and suffer in his stead. The Indian promised him, and the jailer, taking the irons from his feet, went with him to the woods, where he got the roots which were used in the curing of the child.

All the prisoners were confined in the one room of the jail. Besides these there was a young man who was convicted of larceny, but who being respectably connected was recommended to pardon by the jury who convicted him and by many others. Yet he appears to have been a bad boy. There was also another convicted of an unspeakable crime. This was an extremely simple-minded creature. The young fellow insisted on this creature to allow the Indian to kill him, as he had only to die once, and to die this way would be better than to die on the scaffold. The poor creature, being at last prevailed upon, agreed to do this. The young one had prepared a knife, but when he offered it to the Indian the Indian would not take it, although he was offered whiskey and insisted on still more. He said he had killed white men enough.

The warrant for the execution of the Indian and this white man came together. On the morning of the day set for the hanging the Indian wished to go to the woods to gather roots to paint himself and die as a warrior. The jailer allowed him and went with him. When they returned he painted his face red.

The gallows was made of two stout logs and a cross-piece at the top. The rope hung in the middle, and a ladder rested against the top piece. The prisoner to be hung was taken up the ladder, the rope was adjusted, and he was swung off. The hands were tied that they could not grasp at the ladder. The white man was hanged first. This was done successfully, but when they came to hang the Indian the rope broke when they shook him off and he fell to the ground. He swooned somewhat from the violent change in the circulation of his blood, but rose with a kind of smile. Another rope was procured, and this one with the other was put about his neck, making two, when he went up again. The strength of the ropes supported his body, and, being strangled, he was literally hanged to death.

On the day of the execution a great crowd of settlers had congregated at Hannastown. It was a big day, but the remembrance of it has long ago been dispelled. Men seldom boast of having seen an execution. These men were the first and the last hung at Hannastown. The unhappy, misshapen creature who suffered with the Indian under the inspiration of mediæval superstition, preserved in black letter as part of the common law, ought to have been sent to an asylum for the insane. And for an Indian who got his notion of white men from such as Wetzel it turns tragedy into farce to strangle him like a toothless dog to vindicate the majesty of outraged law.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE PIONEERS—THEIR HOUSES, FURNITURE, ETC.

The Pioneers—How the Early Settlers came in—Their Object in Emigrating and in Removing—First Settlers near the Forts—How they Built their Houses—House-Raisings—Appearance of their Cabins outside—How they were Furnished—Home-Made Furniture—Description of Ancient Hannastown—The First Frame and Stone Houses in different parts of the County—Dr. Schoepf's visit to Western Pennsylvania after the War.

It is now time that we should notice the manner of life of the early settlers as it is seen in their customs, their manners, their amusements; give a description of their furniture and apparel, and make such other observations as distinguish them in their habits and in their intercourse, for they sometimes differ so much from us that they appear a different people altogether. There is, however, one great difficulty in the way, and this, with us, is in our trouble to discriminate times and places. We cannot get at any particular time more than by a passing glimpse, so fast in our country have changes followed each other. But sometimes even such a glimpse may give us a correct idea. We shall, therefore, not attempt to restrict our wandering remarks to any particular era, nor confine them to a set order. And as nearly all the early settlers throughout this region of country lived commonly alike, we have, in pursuance of our plan, collected some of our description from the hasty notes of those men who noticed it from their own observation and experiences, but we have relied chiefly on the testimony of the oldest inhabitants and on the testimony of their descendants.

Our early settlers were, in the true sense, pioneers. And when a pioneer, invited by the boundless expanse of a rich territory in prospect, took a notion to migrate, he was generally young or in middle age. The early settler came into a new country not encumbered by his aged parents or by a numerous family of young and dependent children. If he was unmarried, he first came to inspect the country and to locate some spot to which he removed after going back to the settlement to marry. Then when all things were ready he set out. He mostly had a horse of a poor and undeveloped breed, upon which he set his wife and such household goods as he wished to carry with him into the wilderness. Along each side of the pack-saddle, curiously hung on frames of wicker-work, were a few pots and pans, a rasher of bacon, a small quantity of garden tea, and a few simples which answered for a dispensary, in which were curatives for all ailments, for a griping colic and a cut leg. Every man had a rifle and the accompanying ammunition. In the bullet-pouch a few hard-baked biscuit of wheat or rye-flour, or a johnny-cake¹ of corn-meal, were for his fare till he reached the outposts at some block-house, or till he came in contiguity with some foremost settler; for nearly all the settlements were commenced either in colonies of a few families, or near some post where the government watched over its territory with a small detachment of soldiers. These block-houses or forts, such as Bedford and Ligonier, were made to answer the purposes of the government at first, but were also the places of resort and the citadel of defense for the people in time of danger. Few of these pioneers in such troublous times were hardy enough to venture far away to places almost inaccessible, and far from contact with kindred men. The really isolated ones were those who were isolated in every respect, and those were impelled by far different motives than were those men who loved an embryo civilization. Our colonists did not come to trade and higgler with the Indians, or to follow the wild and daring ambition of roving undisturbed through dangers innumerable, in slaying beasts of the forest and skulking through the woods for red men. They were not impelled by the strange instinct which moved Daniel Boone, Byron's "great backwoodsman, hero of Kentucky," and Samuel Brady, and Simon Kenton, and such to fly, as it were, from the company of other men to pass a life of continual excitement and adventure merely for its own pleasure. They had other ties which bound them to the place they had fixed upon, and to change the rifle for the axe; for when a settler came in he came with the intention of staying. He had left, figuratively, servitude for liberty; he had come from where he could not get along with becoming ease to where he might, in time, have abundance. Here, henceforth, was to be his home. Naturally from this fact he made a virtue of necessity, and grew to love his spot of land with a love not less sincere and intense than the Mantuan loved his hut of hurdles, or the Rhinelander loves his cottage by the river. He was sensitive to one of the finest feelings which enoble human nature, the feeling when, looking out on a tract of land, however barren and unfruitful, of knowing that it was his own, that it was secured, for the greatest part, by the earliest and most simple of titles, that of occupancy, and that all he possessed or might acquire was owing to his energy and his strong arm. Hence were all his feelings and his predilections of a local nature. The longer he stayed, the older he became, the more intensely local did those feelings become.

So near to the forts were the very earliest settlements made, that when a settler began to rear a house he rested at night under the shadow of their walls. In the day he worked with his gun near him, leaning against a tree; at noon, sitting down beside it, he ate his cold dinner. If he was far off, and alone, he made his bed of leaves under rocks or against fallen logs. Then his shelter was the labor of his own hands, but if he had neighbors within three or four miles he could count on them. When his trees were down the neighbors helped to raise it. Often, if circumstances were favorable, the neighbors, meeting together, felled the trees, and raised and finished the skeleton of the house from sunrise to sunset. Such was no uncommon occurrence, and after the settlements were well advanced the building a house was no such difficult affair as to those earlier, for to work hard by day, and sleep hard indeed by night, with no covering over him and only a log on either side, was such an undertaking as but few can now appreciate, and which not many even then but cared to forego.

Their houses being such as were demanded by necessity were surely rude. But few tools were used in their construction. With the axe the trees were felled, when the side intended for the inside of the house was hewed smooth. They were then notched at each end to let the cross-log lie firmly. When enough logs had been so prepared a day was given out for the raising. Then all the neighbors collected together, expecting a holiday, and such days were enjoyed as much and perhaps better than such conventional holidays as leave but few pleasurable recollections. Such occasions as house-raisings had more than a few attractions. Here the old men generally got their whiskey, an article from the earliest records indispensable in every community, and something better than common to eat. Here the young men might show their strength, and ogle and romp with the young women. The very boisterousness of the rough men, half hunters, half farmers, had, to those of a milder nature, something of allurements.¹ And such uproariousness continued from when the first log was laid upon the ground till the whole structure was raised. Soon as the crowd gathered they were divided into two parties, each one of which chose its captain. Thence began an emulation as to which side might excel, an emulation in which strength and determination were as forcibly displayed as emulation has been displayed on the field of battle. These were little Balaklavas and little Waterloos. Every log was pushed up the two long slides and landed home to its place with a cheer; and no sooner was it there than another one was rolling off the hand-spikes of the stalwart young men below, who, directed by the voice and gestures of the captain on the outer wall, were made to work in system and in regular order. No sooner was the house raised to its square, which was from eight to ten feet from the ground, than a shout re-echoed through the woods. Soon the saplings, answering for the rafters, were being laid up. Instead of following the invariable fashion of the houses of the peasantry of Europe in the making of a high and steep roof, the roofs were, on the contrary, made with a low water-shed. One curious to discern the tendency of habit in a people might observe in this a connection with the low huts, covered with bark, built thus in haste and from necessity and without architectural design, which, in the wilds of New England and along the Chesapeake, sheltered the heads of their ancestors a hundred years earlier.

¹ "Johnny-cake" is a corruption from "journey-cake."

It is, indeed, difficult for us to form an intelligible idea of the appearance of the habitations of our ancestors. There are, perhaps, not a dozen of these ancient cabins now standing within the limits of our county, and these few are inaccessible to the great majority of the people. Along the rugged hillsides of the most unfrequented of our mountain ranges they are most likely to be met with. They bear, at a distance, the uninviting appearance of a mud-plastered hovel, with a clap-board roof and a huge clay, turret-shaped chimney at one end. Sometimes the chimney is in the middle of the building, in which instances the houses, being larger, were sometimes occupied by two families. They are dimly lighted by apertures between the logs, which are not infrequently covered with greased paper. In midwinter or on a rainy day objects in them are scarcely discernible. They are such as but few of the common laborers would occupy, and yet they were the castles of our forefathers, a race not wanting in moral, in physical, or in mental qualifications.

The most of the early houses were intended for only one room, and an apartment atop of it called a cock-loft. Sometimes there was no loft, and the whole interior was in one room. On the smoky rafters were hung gammons of meat and small, greasy bags of seeds. The one end, for the height of several feet, was left unclosed till a chimney was built. This was built so that a vacant space large enough to hold a tolerably good-sized saw-log could be dragged up to it and so pried through for a back-log for the fire. The outside wall of the chimney was thus a full step from the end of the house. The openings between the back wall of the chimney and the house were then closed by large flat stones, which could be removed at pleasure. The chimney itself was built of mud and nigger-head stoues, and from the point of the roof carried up by mud and fagots. The interstices were filled up with mud, cobble-stones, chips, or straw. The whole of the building on the outside was daubed with mud. In these buildings there was sometimes no wooden floor, but from the abundance of good timber, and the handiness of the axemen, to put a floor down was the work of little time. The floor so made was of split logs, which, smoothed on their broadest side, were called puncheons. These, fitted closely together and so laid upon the ground, made a firm and durable floor, which from dint of scrubbing and sanding, and from the incessant wear of the feet, became in time tolerably even and smooth, and glistened with a polish like varnished oak. The roof and the upper floor were of clap-boards,—broad pieces of timber split with a frow, and sometimes smoothed with a draw-knife. Sometimes the roofs were thatched. The one room served for all family purposes. The door was hung on wooden hinges, and no improvement had been made in latches since the days of Little Red Riding-hood, who, it will be remembered, on the occasion of the visit to her grandmother was instructed by the wolf to pull the bobbin and the door would open. The doors were nearly always made double, one above and one below, like our stable-doors. The single long window was covered with some translucent material, usually greased paper. Glass was used only by the best off, and was brought in from the East. The bedstead, and nearly all the furniture, was home-made. A few poles laid upon cross rails, resting in auger-holes in the walls and in the notches of an upright post in one end of the room, was the frame upon which were laid the straw and the scanty bedclothes. Their stools were square or round blocks of wood resting on pins for legs. A couple of clap-boards resting on pins driven in the wall was the table. The rifle and pouches and powder-horn were hung over the fireplace or on a rafter, either on wooden pins or on the wide antlers of a mountain deer. To such a memento of the chase was usually attached a long story, which served to beguile the time of the long winter evenings, when a neighbor, perchance, rested beneath the roof. The one side of the room, that next the bed, was reserved for the wardrobe. Here hung the dress to be worn when the preacher came once in a year to preach to the settlement, or when a young neighbor was married. Whatever else was bright in color, or curious for being scarce, whatever might convey the idea of the possessor being in good circumstances in respect to worldly goods, or whatever could feed the vanity of the women part was here displayed. A faded ribbon, a silk handkerchief, a spare patchwork quilt, a miserable daub of a soldier or bunch of unnatural dahlias were articles of vertu. Next the fireplacc, on shelves, were the pans, pots, skillets, pails, tin cups, tin and wooden plates, cooking-ware, rustically carved dippers of gourd, grubbing-hoes, harness, pieces of log-chains, indeed, nearly all the appurtenances and hereditaments. If the house was so fortunate as to possess a small looking-glass, it hung beside the door or opposite it. Environed in rings and wreaths made of colored bird's-eggs and bright red peppers strung on woolen strings, and overtopped by sprigs of green from the garden or the woods, the looking-glass was, to the children of less fortunate neighbors, what the pocket compass of Capt. Smith was to the painted warriors of Powhatan.

¹ All public amusements, celebrations, militia musters, or elections were occasions of much noise. Hallow-eve was celebrated everywhere with Bacchaolian revelry and pandemonian deviltry, and the noise arising from the racket that old and young made when they "shot off the old year" resounded from one farm-house to another all over the land. One old custom long kept up was that of firing guns and all manner of explosive instruments at weddings, which being the lesser image of war has given rise to the observation that this no doubt was originally instituted to remind the nuptial party that the battle of life had then begun.

We may form a more correct idea of the appearance of the early Hannastown by grouping a couple dozen of such cabins along the narrow cartway of the old military road, their huge chimney-tops reaching up among the trees which overarched the highway, leaving the sunlight in in patches. A house of square logs, larger than the others, by itself, and back of it another somewhat stronger, might be recognized as the court-house and jail. The stockade on a gentle rise within a stone's throw of the jail and in the edge of the village. One cabin with a clap-board porch, where, after the old fashion, the idlers drank their toddy or gin under a swinging wooden sign, would be known as the tavern. Among the stumps, with trees for hitching-posts, you would observe the blacksmith-shops, from one of which Connolly's crew, after forcing open, took the smith's hammer to break down the doors of the jail. And this was the ancient capital of Western Pennsylvania, and here was the temple where, betimes, was the visibly enthroned oracle of the English law. Pittsburgh at that date was but little better, only there was more activity there and possibly more sunshine. But in 1774 there was only one shingled house in the town, and that house was long pointed out as an evidence that the arts of enlightenment had at that early day taken up their abode in the far West.

The description given by Dr. McMillen of his early experience in this regard will here bear to be recalled:

"When I came to this country (in 1788) the cabin in which I was to live was raised, hut there was no roof to it, nor any chimney or floor. We had neither bedstead, nor table, nor stool, nor chair, nor hucket. We placed two boxes, one on the other, which served us for a table, and two kegs served us for seats, and having committed ourselves to God in family worship, we spread a hed on the floor and slept soundly till morning. Sometimes, indeed, we had no bread for weeks together, but we had plenty of pumpkins and potatoes and all the necessaries of life; as for luxuries, we were not much concerned about them."

Following the two-story log houses built of hewed timbers came the old stone houses. The abundance of good building material was an early inducement to erect structures of a more durable kind. Accordingly almost every locality can point out either the first square-hewed log house or the first stone house. The history of Old Redstone states that the first squared house in Fayette County was known far and wide, and long after other houses towered above it and the name had no meaning, as the High House. Dr. Power states that for many years after he was settled in the West there was not a stone or frame house within the limits of his congregation, which embraced the best portion of our Westmoreland. This, in a general way, may be correct when it applies to residences merely, or the houses of the common people; but a stone store-house had been built at Redstone by the Ohio Company before 1754. Brick houses were unknown for many years; the first and only one till perhaps after the Revolution was the small brick building still standing near the point in Pittsburgh, built by Bouquet in 1764 of brick sent from England. Dr. Schoepf states that the first stone house in Pittsburgh was built during his visit in the summer of 1783.

David Bradford, one of the first attorneys at the Washington and at the Westmoreland bar, and the famous leader in the Whiskey Insurrection, built the first stone house at Little Washington. This was, perhaps, later than 1783, and it was considered an indication of enterprise. However, by the close of the century there were many stone houses, some of them having been built by the more enterprising class who came in upon the lands left by the settlers who emigrated westward after the close of the war. The stone house built by Thomas Culbertson, near St. Clair Station, was among the first in Derry township. John Irwin, Sr., the uncle of the founder of Irwintown, built on his plantation, which included several of the neighboring modern farms, a stone house, which, with its wide hall and high caves, was long regarded as the marvel of the times, and had a reputation as wide as Philip Reagan's brick house, built about 1800, after the alleged destruction of his first one by the Whiskey Boys. Many of these houses, erected between 1785 and 1812, are still standing, and some of them in remote places. Some of them may be seen on the summit of the Ridge, built upon farms then considered for all purposes the best, and which were the most valuable.

The houses built in the towns were usually of two stories, but the stories were low in height, poorly ventilated, and miserably lighted. The best house erected in Greensburg before 1812 is far from possessing, even with later alterations, the conveniences of many of our modern farm-houses. But some of the old taverns and some gentlemen's seats erected before 1812 are still standing. Of these some have spacious rooms, lofty ceilings, wide entries, are surrounded with broad porches, lighted by wide and tall windows, and have dormer-windows in the roofs over the attics.

CHAPTER XXXI.

PRIMITIVE HOUSEKEEPING AND FARMING.

How to commence Housekeeping—Split-Brooms and Gourds—The Spinning-Wheel and Cradle—The Cock-Loft and Stable—Clearing the Forest—Getting to Farming—Resorts and Devices of the Farmer—Wheat Lands—Common Crops—Gardening—Rye Coffee—Mrs. St. Clair's Tea-Parties—The Raising of Flax, and a Description of the Process of its Manufacture—Spinning—Tow in Poetry and in Law—Wool-Carding—The First Carding-Machines—The old case of McGinnis versus Giger, in the matter of wrongly Dyeing the Lineey-Woolsey—Drees of the Common People—Going to Church—Nineteen Grooms married in one Blue Coat at different times—Dress of the Fashionable People—Calico.

SUCH were the houses and furniture of the majority of our forefathers; and while there were some who had brought with them from the east of the mountains more of the necessaries of civilization, there were others who possessed not so many. There have been instances of newly-married couples commencing housekeeping with only such paraphernalia as their own labor had got together. In one noticeable instance the husband and wife set out for their roughly-raised cabin, which was about a mile from his father's, he with a grubbing-hoe and an iron kettle, and she with a bundle of clothes and a split-broom, upon which, tied by their legs, were a couple of pairs of chickens.

One of the most common utensils about a house, and a common one because it was a necessary one, was the spinning-wheel. The distaff and the knitting-needles were to the women what the rifle and the axe were to the men. The spinning-wheel was, in a newly-formed family, a less indispensable article than the cradle. For the cradle there were many substitutes. Few children were rocked in a more elegant rocker than a trough, which answered alternately for the calves and the babes. Many who became famous among their fellow-men as legislators and divines, who became illustrious in the pages of history and in the reports of law, were hushed to sleep in such a bed, the mother rocking and singing the simple air of "Barbara Allen," or the "Infant in a Manger." Few men have attained to greater eminence in the jurisprudence of their country, in diplomacy, and in oratory which controls senates and attracts the world than Daniel Webster; and the infant head of Daniel Webster rested in a cradle which had answered for a sugar-trough. Thus the rising generation were raised from the very outset in a manner tending to make them rugged, and inuring them to hardship from their earliest years. From such cradles as the shield of the Spartan matrons and the rough bark of the forest-trees of the American mothers went forth such men as Lycurgus and Andrew Jackson.

The maxim of the common law that "every man's house is his castle" obtained in the times when the houses of the Britons were more scantily furnished than the houses of the American pioneers, and before the time when the American pioneer had barely the necessaries of life, but which necessaries would have been reckoned luxuries to the lords of the marshes. But the cabin of the early settler was, in truth, his castle. It surely contained all his availabilities. When a stranger passed over the threshold, his bed for the night was made on the floor before the blazing fire, or in the cock-loft into which he ascended by the never-ending pins driven in the wall, which answered for a ladder. There, among the chickens and the hung-up bacon, the keg of rancid fat and bunches of herbs, —the leaves that bore healing for the nations,—under the low roof, and beside a pile of corn, was made his bed. In fact, what could not be put into this miserable place was left either in the lower room or in the horse-stall. The stalls or stables for the stunted and scraggy brutes of such as were able to starve one or more bore as distant a relationship with the stables and barns of our day as did the houses of that day with the houses of this day. These were made of chestnut saplings, built to the height of a man, the interstices or openings between them being left open, and the top thatched with rye-straw or buckwheat-straw or wilding weeds; the thatch held to its place against storms by the weight of other saplings tied or pinned down, and large stones all over. Yet often the sides were interfilled with straw and leaves, and the low opening for the door closed. This was done by provident settlers to protect their cattle not only from the terribly long and severe winters in this climate, but also to secure their helpless stock from the hunger of the bears and wolves.

This portion of country, when the first settlers came in, was completely covered with a dense forest. The emigrant, of course, seated himself in the woods. Soon as his cabin was finished over his head he commenced to clear the land. He began next his house, and worked his way outward. He chopped the large trees down, split some into rails, and the rest, rolling them in heaps and piling on top the loose and deadened branches, he set on fire and burnt up. He likewise, after selecting a patch which might be more fertile by offering better promise, deadened the standing trees. This was done by cutting a ring around the tree,—“girdling” it, as it was called,—to obstruct the flow of the sap, whence the tree, losing its vital property, naturally withered away in decay. In a couple of days a good axeman could so prepare the trees which, in a few years toppling down, left an opening in the forest for a new field. A forester thus calling nature to his help could in a few years destroy an incredible amount of timber. What would now be considered worthless destruction was from the nature of the case not so then.

There are many now living who can remember when a fine old tree would be cut down to make from its roots a pair of hames; another old oak destroyed to get a crotch for a pack-saddle; or three or four chopped down of a night to get a vagrant coon. But the chief difficulty was to remove the huge boles of the trees now lying upon the ground. To do this when he had no horse, or but poor help, his recourse was to his neighbors. Their assistance would be repaid by his own labor, and perhaps in the next week. Of this day's labor, in the piping times of peace, was made another holiday. Again were feats of strength displayed; again all were made happy, so far as happiness could be enjoyed under such circumstances. It is to be remarked that the very assembling of these people, separated sometimes for weeks, had upon all parties an exhilarating effect. A log-rolling, a house-raising became to the second generation of these settlers as the volunteer parades and the fox-hunts were to the generation following. On these occasions the bottle was again produced to make them feel good in general, and to prevent, they said, the effect of snake-bites in particular. Times change, and what then allayed the fear of snakes is now the most active agent in raising this fear. But hence, from the common way of preserving quaint and curious analogies of language in idioms, the mountaineer from Chestnut Ridge, to this day, when he sees a fellow-creature so limber that he cannot stand erect, and hears him uttering expressions becoming a madman, will express his opinion by remarking that the fellow is either snake-bitten or poisoned.

The land being thus by degrees cleared, and the stones piled in heaps in the curtilage round his cabin, a portion was next fenced in to keep the calves and the few sheep from straying, while the cattle and horses, when not needed, were allowed to wander at large to nibble the grass by the brooks and browse on the tender boughs of the birch and maple. Bells were hung on the necks of the animals so that they could be found when wanted. From this the Indians before and during the Revolution devised a decoy to kidnap the children and shoot the men by taking the bells off the animals and squatting in ambush behind the thick clusters of bushes or in a dark ravine. But the whites became wary, and such devices in a single community were not practiced often in succession. In more tranquil times afterwards the sound of the bells kept off the wild beasts and the troublesome “varmint,” as they called the mischievous smaller beasts. It also warned the children when the cattle were encroaching on the cornfield, or on the little meadow inclosed by a rickety fence of brush, for the cornfield was the chief reliance of the family for their winter's breadstuff. But little wheat was grown till the land was more advanced in cultivation. One reason the oldest settlers had for not improving the lowlands, now our richest and most prolific portion, was that they could not produce wheat upon it. This will, in part, account for the fact which appears to us so unreasonable, the fact that the mountainous lands were the first settled, and settled in preference to that vast body which we now see covered with luxuriant harvests, and which are rich in mineral deposits. At the latter end of the last century a wheat-farm was the most desirable, and the one which the new immigrant tried to get. It was said that the wheat raised upon what are now our best wheat-farms was what they called sick wheat, a wheat which, they said, invariably produced sickness; that the wheat drew this property from the soil, which was yet rank with poisonous vegetation. The end of the wheat-corn was black, and when made into bread and taken into the stomach it produced cramps and vomiting. Nor was it fit for feed. It was not till such land had been reclaimed that it was safe to raise wheat. Their best wheat-lands were along the hills, noticeably the western sides of Chestnut Ridge. Seventy and eighty years ago the farms which would have sold for the most money, and which were regarded the most valuable for wheat-growing, were those which we now regard as of the poorest, and on which the tenants at present live by irregular work and by continuous toil. Rye, therefore, was used in preference to buck-wheat, and as a secondary crop to maize or Indian corn. Nor is this to be wondered at, for the prolific yield of corn in such an abundant ratio, its adaptability to the soil, the little trouble needed in its cultivation were early noted by the red men, who possessed no ideas of agriculture but the most primitive. Not only is this observable in the cultivation of it, but it is also to be noticed that it possesses more nutriment than any of the other of the ordinary cereals, and that as food a given quantity will go much farther for both man and beast. Those used to it affirm that a man can work longer on a meal of baked corn than even, as some contend, on meat. Whether this is born out by analysis is not known, but it is certain that old hunters and those exposed to inclemencies preferred corn as nourishment above rye and above boiled flesh. Neither was the process of making corn into food so intricate as the process by which wheat is converted into bread and cakes. Corn-meal could easily be baked into bread, pone, johnny-cake (journey cake), or made into mush, which, with milk, was a standing dish for at least one meal a day regularly the whole year round. And with corn were early cultivated potatoes and beans, yet no more than was needful for the subsistence of the family till the next year. But the planting of fruit-trees is coetaneous with the erection of some of the first buildings in the county.

Gardening, you may be sure, was not carried on to perfection till long afterwards. Special attention was, however, given to the nurture of sage, which was made into tea, and served as a substitute for imported tea. For from necessity they could not, and from patriotism they would not, pay the exorbitant tax laid upon it, which was one of the immediate causes of the war. When Gen. St. Clair removed his family into Ligonier Valley, Madam St. Clair brought with her a chest of the invigorating leaves. It was talked of far and wide. She was remembered as one of the first who brought it into common use, and the fame of her tea-parties was part of the gossip of the country. Many to whom its properties were totally, or in part, unknown, walked a great distance to see the strange article, and to be cheered by its invigorating qualities. The root of the sassafra, mint, and spice-wood among some, in their season, were also substituted, for coffee was not drank, only once a week, on Sunday. In lieu of this a kind of decoction produced from roasted chestnuts and rye was drank. Genuine coffee was considered a beverage exclusively for the women part of the household. Nor was it coveted by the men, for in this, as in all unnatural wants, it holds true that "use doth breed a habit in the man."

The first of wants to be supplied then, as it always has been from the time our more remote ancestors made their apparel of fig-leaves, was the want of clothing for the body. This was made variously of linen, of linen and wool mixed, and of the dressed and undressed skins of deer. But the great want was met chiefly by the raising and working of flax, and this served when made up for the hunting-shirts of the men and for the gowns of the women, for the coverlet of the bed and for the tapestry of the room. Tow linen was used for the clothing of the living and for the shroud of the dead, and the manufacturing of it was one of the earliest of the mechanical arts practiced by men and women in common.

If you are curious to know of the process by which it was manufactured, we shall briefly relate it. Flax is a fibrous plant which grows prolific in almost any kind of soil, especially if the soil be moist and shaley. The seeds being small and the growth spontaneous, a small quantity of seed is sufficient for sowing an ordinary patch. Not more was raised in early times than was needed for the family's use, for it was not an article of commerce. The seed was sown in the spring, and the flax was pulled in the autumn before the frost. A patch or field of flax in blossom looked beautiful, as the flower was of pale blue, and the top of the stalk itself of a lightish color. The flax, having been first pulled up by the roots, was laid along on the ground in windrows that it might be thoroughly dried by the sun and weather, while care was taken to keep it from getting wet, as the dampness rotted the stems and made it unfit for use. When suitably dried it was tied into bundles, gathered in, and thrashed with flails till the seeds were removed, when it was ready to be broken in a rude breaking-machine. The first part of this work was mostly done by the women and girls, especially if the harvest season was late. A long trough-like box set upon four legs held a lever fastened at one end by a movable pin, and the lever extending the length of the box was fastened to a heavy block something like a mallet. The face of this block was indented with two deep furrows and ridges, which fitted exactly into other furrows and ridges in the bottom of the box. This block, when the lever was raised up and forced down upon the flax under it, "braked," as it was termed, the flax, and loosed the outer covering of the straw, which on account of its coarseness was unfit for use. The flax being thus broken was next "scutched." The machinery of the scutching-machine was not intricate, nor its mechanism difficult. A pointed clap-board was driven in the ground and allowed to extend upward three or four feet. The upward edge of this board was dressed sharp. A wooden beetle, called a knife, and bearing in shape some resemblance to a knife, was used by the person holding it in one hand and the flax in the other, and striking over the edge of the board, under which beating the fibres of the straw were loosened and separated from the thread of the grass more effectively, and the body of the flax still further mutilated and broken. The fibres thus loosened and strewn in piles wanted only to be ridded of all useless particles, when it was ready for the spinning-wheel. To effect this it was taken in small handfuls and drawn rapidly through a hackle, which was a board or block with numerous sharp points of iron from three to five inches in length fastened into it, so that when the fine substance of the flax was drawn quickly over it the chaff, the remaining seeds, and all extraneous substances theretofore adhering were completely removed. Only the tow was then left, which was ready to be spinned.

As to spinning, it was not only a light labor but an amusement. The ideas connected with spinning have given expression to many of the most beautiful sentiments in Hebrew, in Grecian, and in Latin poetry. Hence we learn its antiquity, and gather that spinning, with weaving, was the fine accomplishment of the matrons in the citadel of Priam and in the house of the Tarquins, from those who came out of Egypt and in the wilderness spinned the flax for the linen of the Tabernacle to the princesses of Europe in the last century. Homer compares the life of the race of men in its fleetness to the swiftly-flying shuttle, and Virgil metaphorically says that the "slender thread of life was drawn out from the spindles of the Fates." Milton, in that mournfullest pastoral in English literature, in which he embalms the memory of the shepherd Lycidas, compares life to the finest and slenderest of threads; for when hard-won fame thinks to break out into sudden blaze, alas!

"Comes the blind Fury with the abhorred shears
And slits the thin spinn life."

The allusion to flax in some of the processes of its facture runs, in fact, all through our English world of letters; it is mixed with the dry nomenclature of the law, in the statutes and in the Institutes. Falstaff's men at Coventry stole all the linen off the hedges; and who can forget the melody of Shakespeare in his happiest mood,—

"When shepherds pipe on oaten straws,
And merry larks are plowmen's clocks,
When turtles call, and rooks, and daws,
And maidens bleach their summer smocks."

Franklin preferred the sound of the spinning-wheel to any music he knew of; thousands call its droning sound from the "empty halls of memory," for in these things all are alike, the prince and the peasant.

"Verse sweetens toil, however rude the sound;
All at her work the village maiden sings,
Nor as she turns the giddy wheel around,
Revolves the sad vicissitude of things."¹

Perhaps the organ sounds better outside the church than in it; at any rate, with us spinning is well-nigh a lost art, and the famous music of the wheel might grate on our ears like wretched scannel pipes, "like

¹ So in "The Courtship of Miles Standish" we recollect of Priscilla, "the beautiful Puritan maiden," and John Alden, he holding the skein while she untangles it, and in so doing touches his hands, "sending electrical thrills through every nerve of his body."

So also in "Evangeline" is it a frequent subject. One of the most beautiful pictures in that greatest of American poems is that of the Acadian village in the summer evenings,—

"There in the tranquil evenings of summer, when brightly the sunset Lighted the village street and gilded the vases on the chimneys, Matrons and maidens sat in snow-white caps and in kirtles
Scarlet and blue and green, with distaffs spinning the golden
Flax for the gossiping looms, whose noisy shuttles within doors Mingled their sound with the whirr of the wheels and the songs of the maidens."

Touching the antiquity of this subject it is now established that it was cultivated before history was written. Dr. Oswald Heer, the eminent botanist, and one who has devoted much attention to the structure and history of fossil plants, has lately published an article upon flax and its culture among the ancients, especially the prehistoric races of Europe. The substance of his memoir may be summarized as follows: First, flax was cultivated in Egypt and in Asia Minor at least five thousand years ago, and in Greece in the prehistoric period. Second, it is also met with in the oldest Swiss lacustrine villages, while at the same time no hemp nor fabrics manufactured from wool are there to be found. As the sheep was one of the oldest domestic animals, this is considered remarkable. Third, the lake-dwellers probably received their flax from Southern Europe. The original home of the cultivated flax was therefore along the shores of the Mediterranean. The Egyptians probably cultivated it, and from them its use was doubtless disseminated.

sweet bells jangled out of tune." But the grandmothers of the best families of the Republic were taught in their day to spin and weave, to knit and sew, as they were taught to bake and cook. You will remember of the mother and of the wife of Washington.

But when the tow was spun into threads, the fineness of the thread determined the quality of the cloth. The cloth was woven on looms. Not every family possessed a loom, and it was not until the country was well settled, and till the wants increased, that weaving was followed as a regular business. So the hanks of tow and the cuts of wool were carried by the good man to the neighbor who was prepared to work it. The weaver generally took his pay in toll, keeping a part for his labor. The cloth made from flax was more durable than that made from wool, but was not so warm, to remedy which a mixture of tow and wool was made for winter wear, from whence we have the odd name of linsey-woolsey. The manufacturing of wool was of a simpler process, and with it we are perhaps more familiar. The producing of wool was early attended to, although under great and many disadvantages. The chief trouble was to protect the sheep from wolves and bears, and the young lambs from foxes. But with all this they, persevering under untold difficulties, at last saw themselves more comfortably fixed when, at the beginning of winter, they had a large bale of washed and combed wool stowed in a corner of the mystical cock-loft.

Wool-cards were at one time so scarce, especially during the heat of the war, that they were furnished in some localities at the expense of the State. But later the wool was sent to the carding-machine to be converted into rolls. The rolls were spun, colored, and woven into lye-colored or blue and red cross-bars for the women's wear, or into white or colored cloths for blankets and men's wear.² The fulling-mills were cheap, rude affairs set on some stream. Here the blankets were scoured and made soft, and the cloth was fulled and colored. Dyeing cloth was afterwards a trade by itself.³ The first machines for converting wool into rolls were about Greensburg, and at as early a date there was one at Jones' Mill. In 1807 there were two of these improved machines at the county town, and the importance of the manufacture was made apparent, and the superior advantages of machine-carding set forth in a series of standing advertisements in the Farmer's Register of that date. The price for carding wool into rolls was ten cents per pound; for mixing different colors, twelve and one-half; for breaking, five cents. About the same time a mill was erected in North Huntingdon township on Robinson's Creek. Whilst almost every farmer's house had a spinning-wheel and reel, every third or fourth house had a loom.

² A cheap dye-stuff was made of new-mown hay and of onion-peels, or of walnut-hulls.

³ There was a conspicuous advertisement in the old papers by which the dyers announced their business, viz.: "All trades must live, and some must dye."

Modern machinery has done away with the primitive method of working up the wool and flax. Instead of the lonely matron plying her endless task by the flickering tallow-dip throughout the misty winter nights, now a thousand hooks and fingers grasp the flying threads and weave them in endless sheets of handsome textile fabrics. The combing, the carding, the fulling, the dyeing are all done by silent, dumb hands. While the manufacture of flax has been revolutionized, the manufacture of wool has been developed and perfected.

There is a short saying sprung from the days of homespun clothing, which saying yet obtains among quite a number of the common people of Chestnut Ridge and through the Valley, and which indeed has not been confined to only this locality, but has extended out and found its way into the slang vocabulary of polite society and even into print. Although the idea had existed in different shape, and now exists in different shape, yet the origin of this expression has been so definitely fixed, and it is so plainly traceable to a particular occasion, and on such good authority that we cannot forbear mentioning of it here. Then, in the days when spinsters were truly spinsters, when those virgins that lived in single blessedness to good old age, and beguiled their leisure, not like "Mariana in the moated grange," but rather like virtuous Queen Catherine at the wheel, there lived at the foot of Laurel Hill, in Ligonier Valley, one Betsy Geiger, who did the spinning and weaving, as far as she was able, for the whole neighborhood. Among her customers was a man named McGinnis, who brought to her his quota of wool and flax with orders to have the stripes of the cloth diversified in a pattern peculiar to a fancy of his own. The cloth was duly made in alternate checkers of copperas-colored wool and "snow-white under-linen," after the commonly received pattern and fashion. When McGinnis called for the stuff and saw it he would not take it. He expected, no doubt, as it was supposed, on some such frivolous excuse to get it at a loss to the spinster. But an action was forthwith instituted before a justice of the peace to recover justice for the piece, and that the complainant might have peace. Brought face to face before the squire, the magistrate demanded of the defendant, "What is your reason for not taking this stuff off the hands of this honest woman, the plaintiff?" His reply, addressed to the plaintiff,—we may presume with some Dogberry in it,—was ready and quick, "It isn't the right stripe, Betty, it isn't the right stripe." The word, taken up and carried from mouth to mouth, is now used chiefly to describe the character of such a man as he who involuntarily brought it into use.

The dress and costumes of the early settlers were an admixture of a civilized and a half-civilized description. The Indians approached the whites, and the whites met them half-way. The Indians gained all, and the whites lost a part. The hunting-shirt of the men, the most universal dress for a long time, was a frockish coat which fitted tightly about the waist and shoulders, while the skirt was allowed to reach to the knees. The sleeves were large and roomy, and the lappels on the front were allowed to extend almost the distance of a foot on either side, and were made to button. A heavy cape hung down the back, and all the borders were decorated with a fringe of ravellings of different colors. The material was linsey-woolsey, a name which the early people gave, as we have said, to an admixture of stuff whose component parts were tow or flax and wool; that is, linen-woolen. Often, however, this hunting-shirt was of doeskin, which, if well tanned, would last almost a lifetime. In the bosom of the coat were carried bread, jerk, or tow. The tomahawk or hatchet was fastened to the belt on the right side, and the knife in a sheath to the left. Breeches were the universal dress for the legs, and these mostly were made of buckskin. Yellow (or the natural color) and black were the favorite colors, and these were worn by ministers, attorneys, militia colonels, such indeed as assumed to the quality class. These wore shoes with buckles in the summer, and in the winter high-topped boots, sometimes of raw-hide, and sometimes faced with high-colored cloth. The common people had nothing but moccasins, which were made of a single piece of leather or untanned deerskin. The seam was along the top, and they reached above the ankle.

When at length it became fashionable for men to dress in cloth, the people being poor many inconveniences were suffered. It might be called pride, but we do not know whether it exactly is pride. This, however, is a fact of history: When the first court opened at Catfish,—that is, Washington,—in 1781, a citizen, who as a magistrate was compelled to attend, had to borrow a pair of leather breeches from a respectable neighbor, who himself had been summoned as a grand juror, but who from this interposition had to stay at home.¹ As many as nineteen grooms are known to have been married in the same blue coat with brass buttons; and this for hire, or generous loan.² Such an addition was a striking feature, and on the same principle a very old gentleman, in describing the appearance of Col. Christopher Truby, said that he had "red-topped boots, and wore his hair in a black silk bag."

We have the description of the dress of the gentleman of a later period from a fortunate circumstance. It is old, but we trust it will bear repetition here. President Dunlap, of Cannonsburg Academy, had a son called Joe, who was on intimate terms with old "Cardinal" McMillan. The doctor, meeting the young scapegrace, said, "Joe, can you tell me the difference between you and the devil?" Joe answered, in reply, that the devil wears a cocked hat, a low flapped doublet, a coat of Continental cut, breeches and shoes with knee- and shoe-buckles, and I wear pantaloons and clothing of modern style: he described the doctor. The old gentleman was loth to change in anything, in even his dress, and he wore his cocked hat and shoe-buckles long after others had laid theirs away. Innovations were harsh to him. He insulted Colonel Morgan because his family rode to church in a kind of cariole, and seeing a woman who first used the convenience of an umbrella during a rain, asked what that woman was doing with her petticoat on a stick. He, however, was not alone in his ignorance of the use of, to us, such an indispensable article, for when Alexander Craig was one day carrying an umbrella, which had been presented to his mother by a gentleman of Philadelphia, to meeting at Congruity Church, a good old elder, after vainly surmising what the queer thing could be, accosted Craig with, "Es that the thing ye survey the lan' wi'?"

¹ Old Redstone.

² Centenary Memorial.

The head-dress of the men was usually a beaver or wool hat. These were made by hand, and were so lasting that the heir was never out of the hope of a small share, at least, of his father's personal estate.

We presume that no fashion-writer in a lady's magazine would attempt to describe the attire of a lady under, say two pages octavo, nonpareil, while perhaps twenty lines would be sufficient in which to describe the dress of a gentleman. We shall be compelled, from our dearth of words and sparsity of ideas, to reverse the order without apology.

The universal dress of the women of our early times was a short gown and a petticoat; the material was linsey-woolsey in summer and all wool in winter. Their head-dress was, especially when they traveled or went to town, the same as the men's, that is, a beaver or wool hat. Sometimes a colored handkerchief was curiously tied over the head. A smaller home-made linen handkerchief, tied so that the one point came down from the neck between the shoulders, was a quite common extravagance of vanity at parties or at church. Perhaps the majority of the ancient matrons went barefoot in summer; in winter they wore moccasins, overshoes, or shoe-packs. The better-off sort, who brought their goods with them or had them sent from the East, sometimes wore silk stockings. Among the articles stolen by the Indians from one of the houses at Hannastown at the time of its destruction was a silk dress.¹ Forty years after the first settlements of the county, silk, among the ladies of the gentry, was the dress. Dimity was highly in favor with those who were able, and of it were made gowns, aprons, and caps. The fashionable ladies of the town of Greensburg between 1800 and 1812, when they danced in the ball-rooms of the public-houses or helped to make the audience before the graduating class of the academy, wore silk gowns fitted tightly to the body and arms, the sleeves buttoned to the elbows, had high-heeled shoes, had their hair powdered, and their faces stuck over with black square bits of court-plaster.

It was not, relatively, until a late period that calico became a common or every-day dress for women. For many years after the date which corresponds with our first settlements calico was regarded as an expensive fabric. The manufacture of calico by a system of hand-spinning had originated in England not more than a hundred years before that, and there, during our Revolution, the only place it was manufactured, it was so heavily taxed that it was out of the reach of the poor. At the close of the century in Europe it was neither cheap nor common. It was not till some time after the invention of the spinning-jenny by Arkwright that it came into use at all among the common people. In our county at one time after the war of Eighteen-Twelve calico was one dollar a yard, then, about 1825, it fell to thirty and forty cents, and later rose to fifty. When it took fifty pounds of butter and two barrels of eggs to get a chintz-pattern wrapper, it was nothing to hide away, and we can pardon the vanity which hung such articles of apparel up to public inspection at the head of the bed, not far from the horse-gears.

CHAPTER XXXII.

BEARS, DEER, WOLVES, ETC.

Fruits and Berries—Game—Maple-Sugar and Molasses—Depredations of the Bears—How they were trapped and killed—Mitchell shoots a Bear on a Sunday—Wolves, and Adventures with them—Moorhead and Kelly—Christian Shockey attacked at Night by Wolves, climbs a Tree and awaits till Morning—Premium for Wolf-Scalps—Deer-Hunting—Venison used instead of Beef—Squirrels—Birds and Wild Fowl—Pests of the Farmer—Game Laws, and Premiums offered by Law at Different Times for destroying Animals and Birds—Farming the Chief Dependence and Occupation of the People—How Farming in General was carried on.

THE woods at that time produced many fruits which are now known to us but as luxuries. Besides blackberries and whortleberries, which attained to double the size we now see them and of a corresponding lusciousness, there grew wild plums and haws in such quantities that the ground in places lay covered with them. The peach, sheltered from the frost by the protecting forests, found a kindly soil, and on the new land produced regularly a good crop, in like manner the cherry and the hardier species of apple; while of fox-grapes and chicken-grapes a large quantity was allowed to waste yearly for want of using. The sugar-tree, a species of maple indigenous to our soil, grew thickly on the eastern slopes of the hills and in the valleys. To secure the sap of the tree and render it into sugar and syrup was an easy matter, for the Indians themselves, knowing the saccharine qualities of this fluid, could, with the use of pails to carry it, and of kettles to boil it, manufacture their sugary molasses, into which they dipped their pieces of bear-meat and venison.

¹ See notes to chapter on the Destruction of Hannastown.

In the early spring when the sap was beginning to ascend from the roots, the tree was tapped by chopping into its trunk with a hatchet or by boring a hole into it with an auger. Under the vents were fixed long and hollow reeds, through which, as the sun warmed the bark of the tree, the sap dropped, trickling to the bark troughs or hollow vessels beneath. When the vessels were filled they were carried to the kettles, which during the sugar-making season were kept boiling day and night. The sugar-water boiled to a certain consistence was the syrup; boiled till it lost all fluid properties and dried it was the sugar. In after-years, within our recollection, it has become an article of commerce, and at this day, in some districts, its manufacture is pursued as one of the most remunerative branches of husbandry, and as a commodity in the trade of a great commercial and manufacturing people, has proved a profitable one for labor and invested capital. But until the facilities of transportation were enlarged it was known only as a necessary article of food and not as a delicacy.

It was not only on the scanty product of the fields that the settler depended for subsistence and support. It was nothing unusual for him to be out of corn or rye-bread for days together. Simple and as necessary as meal bread is in civilization to both the rich and poor, to the merchant and the mechanic, yet bread has a very different standard in enlightened and far-advanced societies than it has in a sparsely-settled community, in a new country abounding in game and prolific in the spontaneous production of the woods. It is therefore true that bread might not be absolutely needful to grown-up men and rugged boys used to many hardships, and these could do without it, to let the little they had, in trying times, go as far as it would for the younger children and for more delicate women in a watchful state. If the little stock of meal had dwindled down before the snow fell, blockading all the paths to the settlement, the rest was cherished and used more as a precious medicine than as a great staple necessary for the nourishment of the body.

But at times the chief source of dependence for the family was in the trusty rifle of the father. Every man was presumed to know how to use a gun. Every boy looked forward to the time when he would be the owner of a brand-new one. The rifle was to the ambitious young man of the early settlements what the fast scrub was to his grandsons. To the father it was that which above all things helped to supplement the labor of his hands. The country was overrun with game. This to the Indians had not been a kindly hunting-ground. They could, in passing through it, get enough wild meat to subsist on, and by going more to the northward secure sufficient to do them well through the winter; but the great and prolific fields where elk, bear, and buffalo abounded, and where deer came in droves to the salt-licks, were farther towards the setting sun. The game common to the western parts and native to the clime was therefore allowed to increase undisturbed till the forests remaining became filled. Of these animals the black and brown bear were common, and especially so along the chain of ridges in the southern part of Westmoreland and in the valley and hills betwixt Somerset and Fayette. These were indeed so numerous, and that within the recollection of persons still living, that in the severity of the winter season they would approach the cabin, and from the pens and stables drag off the sheep and calves. Charles Mitchell, who had located upon the right bank of the Loyalhanna, eight miles from Ligonier, saw, in the early time, a bear of enormous size seize a well-grown hog in the field near his house, carry it off, swim the creek with it, and deposit it behind a rock, over which he scraped leaves. The bear was not killed because that it was the Sabbath-day, a day which he, following the teaching of his church, held sacred from things of a secular nature. All the settlements till the close of the century suffered from depredations such as this. Stray bears coming into Ligonier Valley, drawn down by hunger, were killed as late as 1837. Up to 1820 and 1825, in the mountain ranges next to Fayette, many small farmers subsisted through the winter on bear-meat, allowed to be preferable to venison. It is said to be jucier, and many considered it better than beef. It is certain that bear-meat was, with deer-meat, one of the necessaries. The bears were usually hunted with dogs. On being closely pursued they climbed a tree, from which they were shot. Sometimes they were caught in steel traps, and sometimes secured in pens made of stout logs and closed by a dead-fall. But so great is their restlessness under confinement that it is averred they often regained their liberty before the hunter got around by gnawing their paws loose from the jaws of the steel trap. It was not unusual to tame the cubs and rear them about the house.

Besides this it was no trouble at any time to kill deer. These animals were so plentiful that to know their regular paths and the country over which they crossed was enough knowledge of hunting for a good marksman to get at least a few during the season. But deer-meat was not prepared for winter use as bear-meat was, for bear-meat, when salt could be procured, was mostly put up like pork in pickle, but deer-meat was first frozen by exposure in the air and then dried, whence, after undergoing this process or its equivalent, being dried over a slow fire, it was called "jerk," that is, dried meat.

As to smaller animals used for food, there were raccoons, ground-hogs, rabbits, and squirrels in abundance. Seldom, unless for a change, were these hunted; and if ammunition was scarce they were looked upon as unprofitable. Squirrels especially were so numerous they were a pest to the farmer, and a standing bounty was set upon their scalps to encourage their destruction. All these were more usually caught in traps by the boys, or hunted with dogs. The number of squirrels killed in earlier times was amazing. When hunts were gotten up with the intention of bagging these there were often above a hundred killed in a single day by one good marksman. The shooting of them in great numbers was therefore more as a trial of skill than as a profitable day's work. The hunter, after securing a favorable place, waited for the squirrels to pass along, and without removing he generally shot as many as he wished. Rifles were used, and the game was either shot in the head or barked, as they called it, which was when the ball passed between the squirrel and the bark of the limb upon which it was lying. Wild turkeys of large size fed in droves, and pheasants (or grouse), partridges, and wild pigeons that came in innumerable flocks from the warm South, might all have been designated as domestic fowl.

But it was often that the hunter had other use for his gun. The greatest scourge of the farmer in early times was the wolf. When met singly the wolf is a great coward, and as a species they are so averse to mankind that they recede before the appearance of civilization in all directions. The wolf common to Pennsylvania is said to be of a browner color than the species found elsewhere. He hunts by scent, after the manner of the dog; is shy, wary, and cunning. But when the wants of hunger press, gathering together in packs, as they raise their noses from the ground over their heads, they begin a long, continuous howl, the most desolate and terror-striking of sounds to the mountaineer. Becoming bolder they emerge from their retreats in the thick woods along the mountain-sides and in droves rush along the edges of the forests. At such times, coming in the wintry season, the hunter and the family in the cabin heard the sounds with such terror as only the war-whoop of the red men aroused. Nothing living was safe from their fangs. A loose horse or a solitary man benighted, if in their way, was certain to be attacked by the brutes now grown bold. Their long paws, gaunt and sinewy, dragged the prey to the ground in their midst, when their ragged jaws soon tore the flesh in pieces, and while the unsatisfied ones were crunching at the bones and licking their chops, the ravenous herd, now frantic with the taste and smell of blood, with voraciousness fell upon each other.

It is related of Joseph Moorhead and James Kelly, two among the first who attempted to settle within the present limits of Indiana County, about 1772, that one morning after they had erected their cabins, not far from where now is the town of Indiana, Moorhead went over to see Kelly and was astonished at not finding him at the cabin, but seeing near it traces of blood and tufts of human hair, Moorhead believed his neighbor had been killed by the wolves, which with rattlesnakes abounded in that region. In looking for his mangled body he found him sitting by a spring washing the blood from his hair. He had lain down in his cabin at night, and, being asleep, a wolf reached its paws through the cracks between the logs and seized him by the head. The disadvantage under which the wolf labored saved Kelly, for he had time to get awake before the wolf had seriously injured him, but not before he had snatched him partly bald-headed. In our own county, Christian Shockey, an early settler on the Chestnut Ridge in Unity township, at one time about the close of the century was benighted on his way home from hunting. The wolves getting upon his track and surrounding him he had recourse to a large tree which he climbed. The night was bitter cold, and he was all but frozen. The wolves stayed at the foot of the tree, and in their desperation leaped over each other, and with their teeth snapped the tree till its bark long after bore their marks. In the morning they skulked back to their burrows among the rocks. This old settler trapped scores of wolves at a spring not far from his house, which to this day is known by the name of the "Wolf Spring," and was till lately, perhaps, the largest and finest spring of fresh water in the country. Before the spring was disturbed it was near thirty feet across, and is not known to have ever been frozen over. In winter the vapor exhales off its surface; in the summer the water is limpid and icy cold.¹

There is, therefore, no doubt that wolves in great numbers infested all this country when it was yet a wilderness, but as it is their nature to live in a kind of society together, being a gregarious animal, their roving limits were always subject to be changed. With all the war of extermination waged upon them they existed in great numbers about the Laurel Hill at the beginning of the century. There was a standing reward offered by law, which from time to time was increased and diminished, sometimes taken off and again renewed. In 1782 the offer was twenty-five shillings for the scalp or skin of a puppy or whelp, and fifteen dollars for the scalp or skin of a full-grown wolf. This was of course on the standard of the depreciated currency, and so in 1806, to encourage the killing of these, eight dollars was allowed for every wolf killed, and this, by a subsequent law, was further

¹ The following anecdote of the hero of this adventure is "founded on fact."

Christian Shockey, whose father, by the way, was a Revolutioner, and who was wounded at Brandywine, went, about the year 1807, down to Hagerstown with his two horsees laden with pelts and ginseng. When in Hagerstown he, of course, inquired for Mrs. Gruber's Hagerstown Almanack,—the almanac which was currently believed to in some way control the weather. He, having an eye to a business speculation, proposed to get as many as would supply the neighborhood, and as they were offered at a price considerably below the regular price the investment offered profit. He got such a large quantity at such a small figure that he himself was astonished. He thereupon invested a large share of the proceeds of his suppliee in almanacs, half of them German and half English. He, however, was more astonished when, on arriving at home and opening his package, he discovered the contents to be the almanacs for the current ysar, which was then fast waning. He had neglected to bargain for the year approaching, and as the transaction was made, as a matter of course, he could blame no one but himself.

increased to twelve dollars. In addition to all this there were some localities in which, it being more at their mercy, the inhabitants subscribed to a separate fund, or by districts allowed an extra assessment. Thus it was that in some counties the premium was higher than in others; for instance, in Westmoreland the reward was somewhat higher than it was at the same time in Somerset, and the wolves were plentier across the line in Somerset than on this side. This gave occasion to some of the old hunters of the valley to play a game on the wolves and on the commissioners. They would draw the former to this side by baiting them, and one old hand at the business by the name of Dumbold is said to have secured ten wolves drawn to the carrion of a worthless old horse. Besides the scalp-bounty he got one dollar each for the skins.¹

Great inconvenience was suffered by the husbandman from squirrels and crows. When the country was almost a dense wilderness these mischievous pests gathered around the patches of corn and rye and fattened on the labor of the farmer. Numerous devices were conceived of to ward the birds off, and a price was put upon the heads of each of these offenders. By one law Westmoreland and Fayette were allowed to assess any sum not exceeding three hundred dollars in each county to be applied to the squirrel fund. By one of the laws the premium was one cent and a half, which by another act was raised to two cents for the scalp of a squirrel, and three cents for each crow's ¹The diversion of a later generation in their famous fox-hunts was nearly akin to the hunting and trapping of wolves by their grandfathers. Something of this diversion deserves to be recorded, however much out of place here, as it is one so foreign to any of the diversions of the present day. Hunting has well been called the image of war, and a knowledge of the old-time fox-hunte will assuredly lead to a discovery of many points of similarity between it as a diversion and the militia training as a diversion.

These circular hunts were a source of much amusement during the long winter months, and in great part answered to the militia musters in summer, and were to that generation what the county fair and the camp-meeting are to this generation.

When a fox-hunt was projected a meeting was called in the neighborhood, at which the principal inhabitants—men and boys—usually attended. An organization was had, certain resolutions were passed, and committees for sundry purposes appointed. The duties of these committees were to select a suitable region of country over which to scour for foxes, to nominate certain of the foremost men from various localities to lead in the chase, and to prescribe the rules by which all participants were to be governed in the hunt. There are, for example, in the county papers of 1846 notices of a fox-hunt, the line of which began at Greensburg and ran along the road to Weaver's old stand, through Pleasant Unity to Peter Walters'; thence along the Ridge road to Youngstown; thence down the Nine-Mile Run to the Loyalhanna, along the Loyalhanna to Brady's mill, and on to New Alexandria; thence along the old road to George Dickie's, and from Dickie's along the road to Greensburg.

For every one of these sections or divisions were marked off, and captains appointed by name to the number of twelve or fifteen, and marshals eight or ten. These were of the very foremost men in their neighborhood, and indeed of the county. A committee was appointed to stake off the grounds the day previous to the hunt. The marshals had power to supply vacancies when they occurred. Persons taking dogs were to lead them until the ring was formed, when the signal was given to let them loose. The marshals wore badges on their arms. No firearms were to be carried, except pistols by the marshals. The line was to move at nine o'clock in the forenoon of Saturday, the 14th of February. Horn to sound from Peter Walters.

scalp, which were to be delivered before the 1st of November yearly.

In the early annals of the Province, according to Kalm, who has written on the subject, the common blackbirds of Pennsylvania were so plentiful that in order to somewhat lessen their number a bounty was put up for their destruction. The inducement of three pence per dozen was so effective in its result that the birds here were nearly entirely destroyed. This, however, was when only the eastern part of the Province was settled. But it is narrated that, owing to their almost total extermination, the summer of the succeeding year being unusually dry, the insects and grubs so ravaged the growing crops that in some portions the inhabitants were well-nigh starving,—no grass, no grain, no fruit. The law was then allowed to be repealed, and the birds came back again: For years after that the blackbirds as well as the crows, who bobbed in slyly under the credit of their brothers, were allowed to be the friends of man, till they increasing again became a nuisance, and another law was passed which again allowed a small amount per capita for the crows as well as for the squirrels.

At the time when ammunition was scarce and high in price it did not pay to expend powder and shot upon them for the premium. Thence scarecrows of hideous proportions were erected on the stumps about the gardens, pieces of glass or tin were hung on hended sticks, so that when the wind disturbed them they made a ginging noise, the ravelled thread of a woolen stocking was stretched from one stake of the fence to another around the field, while the tattered boys kept up a racket all the days. So that from one cause or the other, or from many or all, they managed to save their garden stuff and the little corn which was to do them through the winter.

Farming, or the working of the fields, was the business upon which all relied, upon which all leaned for support. But how different was the culture of the fields then compared with now. Every branch of the business (if it was susceptible of being divided into branches) was carried on after the most primitive fashion. What they were after was a living, and thus—and it seems almost incredible—the vast body of these lands could scarcely maintain the few inhabitants. The land was merely scratched over, and around the stumps, the deadened trees, the piles of brush and heaps of stones, the scattered grains grew and were cut and harvested by the hardest of manual labor. Grass was cut with scythes and hooks, and wheat, rye, and buckwheat with sickles. The girls helped in the fields. When grain-cradles were introduced they were as great a curiosity and met with as unfavorable a reception as the McCormick reaper afterwards. They were in use for years in cutting buckwheat before the most advanced farmers allowed them to enter their wheat-fields. Their farming implements were mostly home-made. The irons for the plow, the grubbing-hoes, the tines of the manure forks were made by the bungling blacksmith; the beams for the plow, axles for the wagon, hoe and fork handles, yokes and double-trees were made by the farmer himself.

A man who worked a farm must of necessity understand how to handle the axe and the draw-knife; nor need he be sparing of timber. Means were resorted to to hasten the destruction of the forest. Monster trees of the finest varieties were burnt in order that their ashes might enrich the ground, which modern science says is fallacious; and this wantonness and carelessness continued down to our own time, in which valuable trees were thoughtlessly destroyed and hundreds of acres but half tilled. But in the first settlers it was not reprehensible. To them it was not the golden age when the husbandman had merely to scatter abroad the grains and at his leisure take the harvest in under favoring skies. Taking care of the harvest was indeed often the greatest toil. The hay and grain when cut were brought in on sleds and by drags of long grapevines. Nor was the labor at any time undivided, for women made their hand in the field at all times, and helped to do the labor now done entirely by men. The product—corn, grass, and sheaves—was piled in stacks about the log stables, for there were then no such barns to house it in as there are now. The thrashing was done with flails, and this began in the fall after the harvest, and lasted through the winter season. A day's work at all kinds of farm-work was from the time the stars shone in the morning till they shone in the evening. Day's work were seldom charged for among those of the farming community according to set prices or wages. When a neighbor wanted help he was at no loss to get it, provided always he had neighbors, and any one living within three or four miles was considered a neighbor. No account was kept of odd days, for the work was usually given and repaid when needed.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

SALT, WHISKEY, EARLY MILLS, AND FURNACES.

Some of their Chief Wants—Salt—First brought from the East, then from Big Beaver, Kentucky, Onondaga—Prices—Methods of bringing it over the Mountains—Its Discovery on the Sewickley and on the Conemaugh—Process of its First Manufacture—Reduction in Price—Scarceness of Money—The Rates as fixed by some of the Early Courts—Prices of other Commodities—Cheapness of Land—Paying their Preachers and Taxes—Rates allowed per Bushel for Wheat, Rye, and Oats—Whiskey-Still—Manufacture of Whiskey—What they kept in their Stores or Shops—Manner of doing Business—Whiskey the Medium of Exchange—Its Universal Use—Exported and Imported—Tub and Grist-Mills—List of First Mills in the County—Iron—Turnbull & Marmie's Foundry and Furnace—The Westmoreland Furnace—Gen. St. Clair builds Hermitage Furnace—Mount Hope and Ross Furnaces—John Henry Hopkins—The Baldwin Furnace—Other Furnaces—Axe and Nail Manufacture, etc.

FOREMOST of the wants was the want of salt. The want arising from the scarceness of this needful commodity, a necessary ingredient as it is in the living of civilized people, has been the prolific subject of much comment; and a want so generally felt, and so often commented on, could not but have been of the highest consequence. In early times it was so scarce, even in the marketable districts, and these districts were so remote, and the means of getting to and returning from them so filled with dangers, that there were times when whole communities were without any at all.

The scarcity of salt made it at all times of a high merchantable value, subject to change in proportion to its availableness. In general transactions a bushel of salt was an integer of value, and had its nominal purchasing power, just as at other times a whiskey-still, a rifle, or a flask of powder, and as at the present day along the Ridge a cord of bark or a dozen of axe-handles. Col. Brodhead, about the year 1780, writing to President Reed,¹ states that salt will buy meat when money will not, and in the same letter he tells him that he cannot send too much salt. At this time salt was very high, for in the midst of the complicated troubles of Western Pennsylvania the people drove their cattle to the mountains, and meat was so scarce that the soldiers of the garrison at Pittsburgh were sent out to kill game, and the wild meat was salted down for winter use. Ten years later, in the Youghiogheny region, twenty bushels of wheat was not thought an unfair exchange for one bushel of salt.² In the earliest times, and at all times when salt was carried on the backs of pack-horses, it was brought in bags, and the first knowledge we have of its being brought in barrels or in bulk was about the beginning of the century, when Kentucky salt was brought to Pittsburgh in boats, and from thence carried in wagons. These barrels in size were about one-third larger than our common barrels. The price about 1806 was about fourteen dollars per barrel, net, of which two dollars went to the wagon-carriage. It retailed at twelve and a half cents to eighteen cents the quart. But still, from the times of the earliest date down until it was manufactured along the Sewickley and the Conemaugh, salt, as well as iron and merchandise, was brought from the vicinity of Hagerstown and from Winchester and Chambersburg. From the deer-licks along the Big Beaver a deposit of salt was known to exist, and as early as 1779 an effort was made to get enough to supply the wants of those about Pittsburgh and the frontier settlements along the rivers. The result was successful only in part, for, the location being on the hostile border, there was not sufficient produced to in anywise relieve the general want, or to effect a rivalry with the distant market. During the Revolution the salt from the Beaver Springs was not known to our eastern settlers, and when the war was over the means of getting it across the mountains were greatly improved, and there a better market was opened for furs, for ginseng, and for snake-root.

¹ Craig, "History of Pittsburgh."

² Old Redstone.

There are many instances all through the old records of the State, and even among the archives of Congress during the Revolution, of the consideration of this subject by the various executive and legislative bodies. Measures calculated to give relief to the people were passed by the Assembly of the State, by the Committee of Safety, and by Congress.

In 1776 (September 2d), in the distribution of salt taken as confiscated property from the Tories, in compliance with the resolves of the Council sitting at Philadelphia, Westmoreland was given two hundred and thirty-six bushels of fine and eighty-three bushels of coarse salt.

About 1778, owing to the scarcity of salt, the Continental Congress passed a resolution directing against the monopoly of salt, and the Committee of Safety for Pennsylvania purchased a quantity for distribution through the State. Congress even established works in New Jersey, but for some time these works were not remunerative.

In 1779 a "Committee of Salt" was appointed by the authorities of the State to regulate the price and to enforce its distribution out of the hands of the monopolists and from those who wrongfully and with mercenary objects held it. In a "Memorial of Merchants" relative to the seizure of salt (Philadelphia, 23d October, 1779), it is stated by them that they had lately refused two hundred dollars a bushel, delivered, but that they, the memorialists, having consented to deliver it to the public account, complained that they got only thirty pounds per bushel for it, a very inadequate compensation.¹

It was proposed by President Reed, July 24, 1779, to order a quantity of salt and distribute it among the counties in proportion to the flour received from them.²

When whiskey became an article of home manufacture and it was found profitable to export, a market was ready for it in both the East and Southwest. Ventures were sent down the rivers to the Spanish settlements, and in return salt from the exhaustless springs of Kentucky was brought back. During the last decade of the past century and up to the war of 1812, Kentucky salt was sold through Western Pennsylvania. But its high price did not do away with the first mode of securing it. Even at that late day it was customary for two or three neighbors in the fall to each take a spare horse and go for their yearly supply, down, as they said, into Egypt. As late as 1820 farmers sent their boys and horses in a crowd. Their provisions and feed were carried with them, and as they went down a part of this was left on the mountains to supply them when coming back. These crowds were sometimes of a score of men and boys, and just as many horses and nags as could be gotten together. On each horse was a pack-saddle, and their rate of speed was restricted, on the average, to from twenty to thirty miles a day. Some of the men carried their rifles with them, but for a lad to get with a crowd going to Hagerstown was as much as for a young man in the days of steambating to take passage on a coal-raft for New Orleans. Such an one was the local newspaper for a twelve-month.

Along about 1796, James O'Harra, quartermaster-general of the United States army, found that salt from the Onondaga Works in New York could be brought to the Ohio cheaper than from Baltimore. Salt was thus brought down by way of Lake Erie and Le Bœuf and sold at Pittsburgh. In 1810 salt from the Kanawha began to come in competition, and the war of Eighteen-Twelve cut off the supply from the north, never after restored.

It was about the beginning of the century when the discovery of salt water was made along the Conemaugh.³ Great interest was consequently awakened in that locality, and an enterprising citizen named William Johnston was among the first to engage in its manufacture. He built a house and grist-mill at the confluence of the two rivers and located a village. This was then called Point Johnson, and by this name it was long known. The place became of some importance, but with the decline of property after the war with Britain, and the subsequent opening of flat-boat navigation, the prospective town drooped, and about 1816 vanished away, while a town under more favorable auspices began on the opposite side of the river. This was the beginning of Saltsburg, a name the place received from its proximity to the salt-works then in operation.

Johnston at the depth of two hundred and eighty-seven feet found an abundance of salt water. The boring was done by tramp or treadle, the poles being connected with open mortice and tongue, fastened with little bolts. The salt was manufactured by boiling the water in large kettles or "graines," using wood for fuel. It is said that from the opening of new and additional wells some fifty or sixty acres of ³ The discovery of salt in the Conemaugh Valley is traceable to an old lady, who discovered an oozing of salt at low-water mark of that river on the Indiana County side, about two miles above the present town of Saltsburg. This was about 1812 or 1813. With some of this water she made mush which was found to be quite palatable. About 1813, William Johnston, who was a young man of considerable enterprise, a native of Franklin County, commenced boring at the spot where Mrs. Deemer, the lady mentioned, had first discovered the water.

Since writing the text we have come on an interesting article relative to the manufacture of salt in the early times in Western Pennsylvania in Hazard's Register for Dec. 10, 1831. It does not differ materially from our compilation, derived mostly from inquiry. Johnston made, after boring and tubing his well, about thirty bushels a day. It sold readily at a high price, whence others were induced to venture capital and energy, and being successful the competition reduced the price so rapidly that at one time it sold for a dollar a barrel at the works. This was too low, and some abandoned their works and others broke up. A reaction took place, salt advanced, and the business then became profitable. We also find that after the pumps were inserted they were sometimes worked by horse-power. About thirty gallons were usually evaporated to make one bushel of salt.

We have heard said that in times of great scarceness a sprinkling of hickory ashes was used in lieu of salt.

¹ Archives, iii. 327.

² Ibid., 316.

woodland had been consumed for this purpose. The pumping was originally done by blind horses, and the salt sold, as the books show, sometimes at five dollars per bushel, retail, but as the wells multiplied the price fell very considerably. With the increase of trade came new machinery and new appliances for the manufacture. The unwieldy kettles were dispensed with, and large pans of half-inch iron, some twenty feet long, ten to eleven feet wide, and eight inches deep, were used. The blind horses staggered into obscurity, and the steam-engine was henceforth used for boring and pumping. The place was called the Great Conemaugh Salt-Works, and a post-office was soon established there. Four miles on the western side of the river are the James McLanahan and Andrew Boggs wells, a well which is one of the oldest, and which produced a great deal of salt down to 1858, when it was abandoned; next the Samuel Reed well; the M. Johnston and A. Stewart; next the Nathan M. D. Sterrett and David Mitchell wells, both of them good, the last named not abandoned till 1855; the Deep Hollow, Pete Hanmer well, forty rods from the river, rather new, and not considered to be profitable, was abandoned; the Walter Skelton well made a great quantity of salt while in blast; the Winings & Morrison works are of recent date, and produce a small amount of good salt. Of these only two are in blast,—the Waddle group, owned by Samuel Waddle, and the Winings, owned by Winings. The wells enumerated are named after their original owners. The seven wells along the river on the western side were all put down prior to 1822 or 1820, and from that date till 1830 the group of hills on both sides of the river was like a great bee-hive. . . . But it is strange that very few men engaged originally in the production and manufacture of salt attained to affluent circumstances. Most of them died poor. The expenses of production in many instances exceeded the income. The coal and machinery had to be hauled from Pittsburgh by wagon, or brought by the river in keel-boats. These means of transportation were too expensive.

The brackishness of the water and the licks along Jacobs Creek, at one time called "Salt Creek," and in the swamps of the Sewickley were early known to the settlers. The properties were never developed, and it was not till 1808 or 1809 that salt may be said to have been first discovered along the Sewickley. William Beck was the first operator. Its presence there was evinced by the deer-lick and by the gases, which in escaping from the recesses of the earth disturbed the waters of the creek. The first well sunk there was bored by hand. Eight men lifted by force of their arms the boring tools, and letting them drop, these by their own weight bore slowly down towards the deposit. This lies five hundred feet below the surface, and the men working were three years in reaching it. This plan was improved upon by the application of the spring-pole and tread-board and wooden pole-tools. This method continued for twenty-five years before the rope was thought of and used. A well of five hundred feet can now be bored in thirty days. The first well was only two inches at the bottom, now the hole is five and a half inches at the top and four inches at the bottom. The salt at first was boiled down in large kettles, and these continued in use for a number of years, till Col. Israel Painter, the proprietor of the most extensive of these works, with his accustomed sagacity, brought into use the large and shallow pans in which it is now manufactured.

There was of course very little money in circulation among the first settlers. Money was not needed, only for the payment of taxes and for the purchase of a very few of the necessaries, such as salt and powder. The currency legalized during the Revolution was fluctuating in value, and towards 1779 and 1780 had scarcely any purchasing power. From the order-book of the Ohio County Court—one of the three Virginia courts in Pennsylvania—for 1780 it is seen that an order was issued to the ordinary keepers in the county to sell at appended rates, which were as follows: half a piut of whiskey, six dollars; breakfast and supper, four dollars; lodgings, with clean sheets, three dollars; or a horse and hay overnight, three dollars; one gallon of whiskey, six dollars.¹ For the same time in 1780 whiskey was eight dollars and a half per pint. This was of course in Continental money. But this may give an idea of the unstable valuation put upon everything the value of which was regulated by money. In 1779, all things in the way of provisions being scarce, the flour and meat for the garrison at Pittsburgh had to be brought across the mountains. Bacon there was worth one dollar a pound, and deer was bought for the use of the army.² At this time, and the year previous, 1778, flour was worth sixteen dollars a barrel. The money to purchase these things was paid by Congress. Commercial restrictions were tried, and combinations and promises entered into among the officers and business men to make the money go at a stated valuation, but with a useless result. This trouble in the currency and in the worthless value of the money, or what purported to be the money, was as severely felt after the war as during it. The soldiers who had been in the service and the contracts made for the army were paid off in this currency. The people were, in 1783 and 1784, nearly destitute of cash in gold or silver. In good money, in 1785, salt was worth five dollars a barrel, and it was, indeed, no uncommon thing for the price of a bushel of salt to be equivalent to a cow and calf; so five or seven dollars probably in cash would purchase a cow.

These following illustrations are given to show the equivalent of merchantable things with each other and their value in money. Pennsylvania currency was always variable in value. In 1780, in Westmoreland County, in the settlement of the commissioners of that year, confirmed by the court upon the report of the auditors, thirty dollars were said to be equal to three shillings sixpence in specie. Paper money, or the money of legislation, was worth little compared with specie at any time down till after the end of the Revolution. From the changeable prices an idea will be got of the scarceness and consequently of the dearness of money.

¹ For June 6, 1780.

² Craig's History of Pittsburgh.

The terms offered by Franklin for wagons, horses, and wagoners for Braddock's army in 1755 were for each wagou with four good horses and driver fifteen shillings per day, for each able horse with pack-saddle or other saddle and furniture two shillings per day, for each able horse without a saddle eighteen pence per day.¹

President Reed, June 9, 1781, in a letter to David Duncan, the commissioner, etc., writes as follows:

"SIR,—Being appointed a commissioner of purchase for the county of Westmoreland, you are to proceed in that duty with all despatch so as to supply the garrison at Fort Pitt and such troops as may be drawn forth under the authority of Council for the defence of the frontiers. The amount of your yearly purchase is to be limited to 816 barrels flour, 5000 gallons of whiskey, 200,000 pounds beef or pork, 1000 bushels of corn or 2000 bushels of oats, which you will purchase with as much economy as possible, and at such periods as will be most necessary and convenient. Until next harvest you are not to exceed the following prices, viz., flour, 30s. per cwt.; wheat, per bushel, 10s.; Indian corn, 5s.; whiskey, 7s. (ehillings) 6d. (pence) per gall., etc."

David Duncan then in a letter to President Reed, June 9, 1781, says,—

"I have bought stall-fed beef at one shilling per pound, State money. I have bought whiskey at six, and from that to seven shillings per gallon, and have it delivered in the store, and wheat at one dollar, and delivered in the mills. I had men last week in the glades trying to purchase beef, but not one would sell without hard money."

The depreciation of paper currency or Continental money had become towards the latter end of the Revolution a very serious burden to the people all over the country, and great ingenuity was exercised to discover a remedy. Embargoes, commercial restrictions, tender laws, and limitations of prices were all tried, but in vain. Prices still sank. "I had money enough some time ago," said an anonymous writer, "to buy a hogshead of sugar. I sold it again, and got a great deal more money than it cost me; yet when I went into the market again the money would only get me a tierce. I sold that too at great profit, yet the money received would only buy a barrel. I have now more money than ever, yet I am not so rich as when I had less."²

The store-book of William Johnston, Saltsburg, date of 1794, etc., contains some things not uninteresting. Out of a long list of articles, with the current prices, we take the following. The account is kept in pounds, shillings, and pence:

Wool Hat.....	11s.	3d.	1 Pr. Mocksins.....	3s.	9d.
Baudana Hdkf.....	11s.	3d.	½ qr. Paper.....	1s.	6d.
½ lb Cut & Dry.....	1s.	6d.	2 pipes.....		11d.
1 Skillet.....	12s.		½ lb Gunpowder...	5s.	7½d.
½ lb lead.....		11¼d.	2 yds. Calico.....		7s.
½ Bush. Salt.....	6s.	6¼d.	1 lb lead.....	1s.	10¼d.
8½ lbs. Bacon.....	8s.	6d.	2½ yds. Muelin....	9s.	4½d.
1 lb Coffee.....	3s.	6d.	1½ yds. Calico.....	9s.	4½d.
2 hd. Tacke.....	3s.	9d.	47 lbs. Iron.....	£1	19s. 2d.
1 hd. Quills.....	8s.		Whiskey, from 6 to 15	ehillings per gallon.
1 Paper Pins.....	3s.

In 1797, on five consecutive pages, there is counted sixty-nine separate and distinct charges for whiskey.

On Dec. 26, 1798, Charles Campbell (General) is credited with 1 barrel of salt, seven pounds and ten shillings.

During this time wheat was allowed for at 1 shilling per bushel; corn, 6 pence; rye, 1 shilling; buckwheat, 1 shilling; oats, 6 pence; tallow, 2 pence; lard, 2 pence; pork, 4 shillings per hundred weight; beef, 1 to 2 pence per pound.

"Prices of Provisions as Approved by Gen. Lee for the Use of the Army during the Whiskey Insurrection.

"NOVEMBER 1st, 1794.

"We, the undersigned, inhabitants of the counties of Washington, Allegheny, and Westmoreland, requested by the Commander-in-chief of the army now in and near the said counties to declare the price of sundry articles necessary for the army, are of the opinion that the prices undermentioned are sufficient for the following articles, being as much as they usually command in the country:³

Rye, per bushel.....	3/0	Whiskey, per gallon....	3/0 to 3/6
Oats (i.e., 2 ehillings 6 pence).....	2/6	Straw.....
Corn.....	2/6	Mutton, per lb.....	0/3½
Indiau Meal.....	2/6	Fresh Pork, per lb.....	0/3
Flour, common.....	22/6	Bacon.....	0/8
Ditto, fine.....	25/0	Potatoes, per bushel....	2/0
Ditto, superfine.....	27/6	Turnips, per bushel....	0/9 to 0/10
Hay, per ton.....	50/0	Turkeys, each.....	2/6 to 3/9
Cabbage, per 100.....	10/0 to 16/6	Ducks, per head.....
Fowls, each.....	0/6	Geese, per head.....	2/6
Onions, per bushel.....	6/6 to 9/6	Butter, per lb.....	0/8 to 0/9
Cyder, per barrel.....	30/0	Cheese.....	0/8 to 0/9

"The price of transportation of oats, hay, corn, whiskey, flour, and meal is not considered, and must depend on distance; milk not being usually sold, the price is difficult to ascertain; two pence a quart will, however, be an ample price.

"DAVID REDICK,
"THOMAS MORTON,
"WM. FINDLEY."

The people had a great time paying their preachers after they had promised and subscribed for their salary. Sometimes it was impossible, and in the stead of money, to remedy it, they came forward and delivered their farm produce at a rate fixed upon by themselves. From a subscription paper of the congregation of Fairfield in 1789, the subscriptions were to be paid in money or grain, at the rate of, wheat at four shillings per bushel, rye or corn at two shillings and sixpence per bushel. These sums were due quarterly, and to be sued for as lawful debts. From a similar paper of the Sewickley congregation of August, 1792, by which one-half of the subscription was to be paid in cash, and the other half in produce, at these rates, to wit: wheat at four shillings per bushel, rye at three shillings per bushel, and corn at two shillings and sixpence per bushel. The rye here was higher than the corn, for this was in a region where about this time their surplus rye was worked into spirit, and sold in a diluted form as whiskey, in which it fetched a higher price.¹

¹ "Western Pennsylvania," Appendix, 97.

² As to the system of regulations adopted by the offices, etc., at Pittsburg, 1779, to control speculators, etc., see Craig's "Pittsburgh," p. 146, et seq.

³ The figures in the price-list represent shillings and pence.

A good brother in Israel, a Father Laban, has been canonized for a shrewd speculation. Under Rev. Joseph Smith's pastorate at Cross Creek and Upper Buffalo, the congregation getting behind in their salary and no prospect of catching up, this shrewd old elder proposed to take their wheat down the river to the New Orleans market. The wheat at home was worth twelve and a half cents. The venture was successful, and the wheat, ground into flour and sold in that market, fetched twenty-seven dollars the barrel. The elder received three hundred dollars, each of the young men who accompanied him one hundred dollars apiece, the back salary of the minister as well as the salary for the coming year was paid off, and thus the congregation was relieved of its burden.

When the manufacture of whiskey began to be profitably carried on, say 1787 to 1792, a whiskey-still became an article of some value. In 1785 a good still of one hundred gallons might purchase two hundred acres of land, and that even within ten miles of Pittsburgh.²

Land itself was very cheap. The stories told of the purchase and sale of valuable lands are so marvelous that sometimes they are not credible. But any one who goes to the trouble to look over the old records will see by the transfers that in many instances the consideration was merely nominal. A still, a horse, a rifle has been known to be the price paid for farms which now are of the most valuable in our whole county.³

At the time of the Whiskey Insurrection and for some years previous thereto iron and steel cost from fifteen to twenty-five cents a pound, the cost of transportation being from five to ten dollars per hundred-weight.⁴ At that time wheat was so plenty and of so little value that it was the custom to grind the best quality and feed it to the cattle, and as for rye, corn, and barley, it would bring no price for man or beast. The only way, therefore, for the inhabitants to obtain a little money to carry on their farming and to purchase a few needful commodities was by distilling the grain and sending it down the river or over the mountains.

The inns of the old turnpike were called "botels," and the shops "stores." The stores did a business which extended around for many miles. The store-keeper laid in his stock once, or, latterly, twice in the year. This consisted in general of common grocery and the most common fabrics. They had little of anything and a little of everything on their shelves. The goods were sold at an advance averaging, in most cases, an hundred per cent. This was, indeed, a question more of necessity than of conscience, for at even this profit it took all and more than all the money that a shop-keeper would take in from spring to fall to replenish his stock. He was compelled to take for his pay anything which could be traded for,—bacon, flour, beef, wool, butter, and eggs. One old-time store-keeper once wittingly told us that in the winter his customers traded him their bacon and flour for cloth and groceries, and in the summer they exchanged their wool and butter for bacon and flour back again to see them to the fall. In this matter of exchange each community had a specialty. Ligonier Valley, in the earliest times, furnished nearly all the seed potatoes, for which settlers sometimes went a journey of two and three days,⁵ and in later times its staple was maple-sugar. On the western side of the Ridge corn and oats were raised. It was, therefore, at one time customary to exchange the spring production of sugar and molasses for corn and oats.⁶

Up to the end of the century Pennsylvania was the only State with any surplus grain-producing territory west of the mountains. To convert this grain into money was the reasonable object. As a consequence we have the origin of the whiskey manufacture through Western Pennsylvania, which at one time obtained such extensive proportions and the taxing of which, as is well known, led almost to domestic war.

Before and during the Revolution whiskey was a staple article of trade; and in 1784, after the close of the war, Turubull, Marmie & Co., ironmongers of Philadelphia, sent an invoice of stills to Craig, Bayard & Co., merchants of Pittsburgh. At about the same time, in a letter from an agent of the latter house at their salt-works at Beaver, the writer advises them to send him three barrels of whiskey and one of rum, and complains that for his want of these his neighbor gets all the skins and furs. The Philadelphia firm furnished, perhaps, the majority of stills for the western counties, and finding their general business so profitable here they were induced to come out and begin the iron business first in these parts. When coin was almost unknown and paper-money valueless, as it was for some years after the peace, a whiskey-still was as necessary as a mill. If there was no money to buy one, a farm or a part of a farm was traded for one. The net proceeds from a good still before the laying

⁵ Idem.

⁶ Maple- (or home-made) sugar was trucked out on horses. We may thus come to the origin of a common saying, still used, although not frequently, in some parts. It is to be observed that some horses, particularly those raised in a thinly-settled district, have a habit of stopping at every house along the roadside. A horse doing so in the thicker-settled parts was called a "sugar horse," by which it was inferred he was from that region which produced sugar, and was habituated to stop at every door. When we first heard such a usage of the word it had, we confess, no meaning.

¹ Old Redstone.

² Ibid.

³ It was no uncommon thing for parents, in their wills, to bequeath to their children in proportionate shares, for the full extent of their shares as devised, to be delivered by the son or daughter getting the lands, so much wheat, rye, oats, or corn. These in some instances were payable annually until a certain quantity had been made up. These bequests were in lieu of pecuniary ones.

⁴ Rev. Dr. Carnahan, in "American Pioneer."

of the excise was, as we have seen, considerably more than of most farms. There were then still-houses literally anywhere, nearly every fifth or sixth farm having a copper still. Judge Veech states that at one time there were five hundred and seventy-two stills in the western counties. The farmer who had one manufactured the whiskey for his neighbor who had none, on the shares. So much grain was left, and so much whiskey returned. These still-houses were small affairs, sometimes of only one little still, but oftener of two, the one for singlings and the other for doublings. The stills were set up in the cellar, in the upper part of the spring-house, or in a near out-house.

As a consequence the use of whiskey was universal. The quality was good, the taste pleasant, its effect agreeable. Store-keepers kept liquor on their counters and sold it in their stores, and the women customers used it as well as the men. Farmers kept barrels of it in their cellars. It was sometimes drunk with tansy, mint, or maple-sugar, but mostly taken straight. It was good for fevers, it was good for a decline, it was good for ague, it was good for snake-bites. There was nothing named in the materia medica but old whiskey possessed some of its curative properties. On the testimony of Col. Crockett, it made one warm in winter and cool in summer. It was used at all gatherings.¹ Bottles of it were set out on the table at christenings and at wakes. At funerals in the winter season huge coffee-boilers and buckets of warm whiskey-punch were passed around and the people invited to drink, and tin-cups were filled and carried from time to time to the bearers. Ministers drank it. The biographers of Rev. McMullan, who ascribe all virtues to his character, relate the following incident. When on his way to Presbytery in company with the Rev. Joseph Patterson they stopped to water their horses at a public-house, when to compensate the landlord for his courtesy they stopped to take a drink. When the whiskey was poured into the glass Mr. Patterson proposed to ask a blessing before they drank. This was not objected to by the doctor, but as the grace was protracted he not only drank his own glass off but reached for Mr. Patterson's and drank his too. When his brother looked blankly after he had finished, the "cardinal" said to him that he must not henceforth forget to watch as well as pray. On an occasion when Bishop Onderdonk came to Greensburg to administer confirmation, before going to church he went into the bar-room of Rhorer's hotel in full canonicals and called for and drank off a tumbler of strong brandy without giving offense to the faithful. Rev. Father McGirr's drink was whiskey-punch, of which it is said he could drink with any of his day without giving scandal.

These examples are cited merely for the object of illustrating how wide-spread was the custom of using stimulants.

As a consequence whiskey was used by nearly all. The government gave regular rations of it to the soldiers, and these rations were increased at the time of the insurrection, a bait thrown out to the people to do their distilling in accordance with the law. At a time much later than the era of the Revolution, when money was scarce and labor plenty, it is said that many farmers could have the services of laboring men during the whole of the winter season for their bed and board. They went to work with a dram of whiskey and tansy and a piece of bread and butter. On this they worked till breakfast. At every meal the bottle was taken by the neck; for whiskey was all that whiskey is now and coffee, tea, and beer besides.

We may go even farther than we have gone in producing examples to show how wide-spread the habit of using domestic liquors had grown among those people. It was a habit easily acquired, because the use of the spirit was general, its quality attractive, and its constituent substances pure and unadulterated. The heavy overhung skies of their long, dreary winters, their exposed occupations, and the scarceness of attractive or agreeable diversions are sufficient causes for its usage, which although general was not inordinate. In addition to these reasons which are apparent to us they had others of their own. The aptness of quite a majority of these people at quoting Scripture texts, particularly those found in the Hebrew writings, is well known. Some of these texts they had at their tongue's end, and could refer to them on any and every occasion. They therefore doubtless cited the sixth and seventh verses of the thirty-first chapter of Proverbs, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that he of heavy hearts. Let him drink, and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more." This text, by the way, was a familiar one to the Scotch of the time of Burns, and as many of them were familiar with his songs, they no doubt had by heart the one dedicated to Scotch drink:

"Thou clears the head o' doited Lear,
Thou cheers the heart o' droopin' Care,
Thou strings the nerves o' Labor sair
At's weary toil;
Thou ever brightens dark Despair
Wi' gloomy smile."

There was a time in the early history of South-western Pennsylvania when whiskey was the one commodity that had a standard value, and all the mediums of barter and exchange, such as corn, salt, tobacco, and so forth, were valued in accordance with the amount of whiskey they would fetch. "Old rye" was exchanged at the grocery for tea, coffee, household utensils, and farming implements. At all public gatherings it gurgled copiously from all sorts of jugs, and was guzzled by all sorts of men, women, and children.

¹ In an account of the Fourth of July celebration at Washington Furnace in 1811, printed at length in the Register, it says, "After partaking of a handsome and wholesome repast, and drinking some whiskey mixed with pure water," etc. Delicately put, but "O tempora, O mores!"

It bought farms, as now it frequently loses them, and the consideration which passed for many a tract of land now of great value was chiefly made up in whiskey and whiskey-stills. A great proportion of the very foremost men of the early settlements were engaged in its manufacture, of which we shall have occasion to say something in our relation of the Whiskey Insurrection. But this is not all: the contributions to the support of some of the early ministers were paid to church committees, in some instances, in spirits of domestic manufacture, and in the district beyond the Youghiogheny, in that district where churches were more plentiful, they recall instances where it paid the debts of the church.

Its manufacture was in the earliest times immediately under the control of the courts, although an excise law was enacted in Pennsylvania in very early times, as farther on we shall see. But these excise laws were not in force, for upon a prosecution and conviction the State usually remitted the penalties, and during the times of the Revolution the justices from time to time allowed those engaged in the traffic on the frontier to do so without paying the fines which were imposed.¹

The courts, we have seen, licensed the keepers of public-houses, fixed their number, and regulated the price of the several liquors and the price of lodging. It would be a curious diversion to follow up the prices put upon whiskey by the gill from 1773 to the beginning of our century. It would be the "indicator" for all marketable products. Without going over the whole ground, we observe that of the rates fixed at the July sessions of 1783 "diet and meal was one shilling sixpence; oats per quart, two and one-half pence; hay, twenty-four hours, one shilling three pence;" while in 1802 the court fixed whiskey at three pence per gill, oats at two pence by the quart, and hay for a horse by the night one shilling.²

At March sessions in 1795 we see that "the court proceeded to regulate the number of tavern-keepers for the county for the year ensuing." They then al-

¹ In the Quarter Sessions there is the record of several informations made against Edward Cook, Esq., one of the justices, for distilling spirits. These were generally quashed by the court or thrown out by the jury. See July session, 1779.

(Record) July session, 1784:

"Phila., Sat. June 19, 1784. . . . Certain persons convicted of selling spirituous liquors. . . . It was ordered that in consideration of the peculiar distresses to which the Inhabitants on the frontiers have been reduced during the late war, the several & respective fines as judged to be paid to the use of the State by Persons before mentioned be remitted.

"Extract from the Minutes.

"JAMES TRIMBLE for JOHN ARMSTRONG, Junior, Treasurer.
"Copied August 9, 1784, by James Brison."

A justice could not keep an inn or tavern, but their relatives might. Hanna had his daughter, Jean Hauua, recommended to sell spirituous liquors at more than one of the sessions.

² These are the rates for 1783 in full:

Diet and meal.....	1/3	Hay, 24 hours.....	1/3
Spirit toddy and bowl.....	1/6	Oats per quart.....	2 1/2d.
West India rum and bowl....	1/3	Pasture, 24 hours.....	8d.
Whiskey per half pint.....	10d.	Strong beer per quart.....	8d.
Whisky toddy and bowl.....	1/3	Cyder per quart.....	1/.

lowed eight for the town of Greensburg; for the Glade road, inclusive, and south of it, eight; between the Pittsburgh road (the old State road) and the Glade road, six; between the Pittsburgh road, inclusive, and the north, twelve; in all, thirty-four. The number fixed in March, 1796, for the county was forty.³

We do not know whether it arose from observation, experience, or an intimate knowledge of the peculiar connection between our judicial system and our great staple which impelled Achilles Murat, when a visitor here, to say in jest that "whiskey was the best part of the American government." At one time it certainly was a very important element in the government. As a factor in politics, and as a lubricator to assist the civil machinery to run easier, its importance was long recognized. Among the traditions of the bar one still remains how the old-time lawyer kept a bottle in his office, and how, when the attorneys met together in the prothonotary's office to make up the trial-list, there were always a bottle of whiskey set on the table and a hundred toby cigars. The same was invariably done when the sheriff held his inquisition for the extension or partition of real estate, and the whiskey and cigars were all the pay the jurors received, and all they expected to receive. After a time the whiskey was discarded, and they were restricted to dinner and cigars. The only fee the constable looked for in keeping the window on election-day was enough whiskey for himself and for his friends to drink at the expense of the standing candidates; and, indeed, about the only proper expense the candidate was put to was to supply the electors with the stimulant.

That the change in sentiment respecting the use of intoxicating drink has been great, and that the change has been for the better is an averment which perhaps will not be gainsaid. At one time it was here considered to the detriment of a man in public business to be an avowed temperance man. Half the best farms now owned by men who are prohibitionists were once purchased by the proceeds of the whiskey-still. He was an exceptionally prominent man of the neighborhood who did not either manufacture or sell whiskey. The very great proportion of people used whiskey as a beverage without compunction of conscience; and those who had compunction of conscience evidenced a wonderful liability to be bitten by snakes. The frequency of snake-bites was indeed a matter of unexplainable curiosity for a later and more pious generation. But great as are the evils of intemperance at this day, there is no better evidence needed to measure the opinion and the sentiment of the ruling element in that particular than to observe who compose the class now addicted to public intemperance and compare it with the drinking class of fifty and eighty years ago.

³ John M. St. Clair had order issued in June, 1797, for license.

Grist-mills were few compared with whiskey-stills, but there were some of these erected by the earliest settlers. Several were known at points in 1771, but it was not for many years that these mills ground anything like the full amount of grain raised. There were many small hand-mills, which, being movable affairs, were carried about from one part of the country to another. The grist-mills themselves were but one-horse concerns, and truly in some places, where the water-power was not enduring, the wheels were turned by the machinery attached to the tread-wheel. The first mills were called tub-mills, taking the name from the tub-shaped hopper into which the grain was put, and from which we have the names of Tub Run and Tub Creek, given to various streams.

Among the reasons advanced by the petitioners in some of the first petitions for roads was the necessity of having them to get to mill. It is recited in one of these that the inhabitants had to go twenty miles to Henry Beeson's mill, and in all probability they would ever have to do so. This mill was a tub-mill, and the pit of it is still visible in Uniontown. Beeson was a blacksmith, and made his customers dig at the race while they waited till their plow-irons were sharpened. This mill was said to have been the second one in the region now of the county of Fayette, Philip Shute's mill on Shute's Run being the first. These were before 1773.

St. Clair had a mill on Mill Creek, in Ligonier Valley, running about this time. A notice of St. Clair's mill may be seen in the Quarter Sessions' docket for 1774. St. Clair had built a mill some time before that in Cumberland County. About this time William Bracken built a mill on Black Lick, and about 1773, Samuel Moorhead commenced building a mill on Stony Run, on the other side of the Kiskiminetas, but before it was completed the settlers thereabout were driven off by the hostiles. The next year they returned and finished it.

There were several mills about this time along the streams which empty into the Ohio on the south side, and not far from the Point. Saw-Mill Run was known by that name prior to 1771. Among the other mills within our own county or immediately near were Cherry's mill, afterwards Lobingier's, on Jacobs Creek; Machlin's mill, on the Youghiogheny; Deniston's mill and Soxman's mill, both of these on the Loyalhanna, the former on the site of New Alexandria, and the latter below Latrobe; Jones' mill, on Indian Creek; Wallace's mill, on the Conemaugh; Perry's mill, either upon or near to the Kiskiminetas; and Irwin's mill, on Brush Creek. Perhaps not one of these had stone burrs. Judge Addison in his charge to the grand jury of Allegheny County on Sept. 1, 1794, remarking the unprecedented growth and development of the country for some few years, says that three years before, or about 1791, there was hardly a burr mill-stone in this whole country, and then there were perhaps a dozen.

When the boy took his grist to mill he usually waited till it was ground, and sometimes the miller would keep him overnight. The rule was to take a day going to mill. The mention made in the petition quoted of going twenty miles to mill may appear unusual, but it was not unusual, and even fifty years later than the date of that paper a neighbor was thought to be favorably situated who lived within five miles of a mill.

The water-mills could not, on an average, work more than six months in the year. The only intimation we have yet met with of a wind-mill for grinding is in a letter dated at Pittsburgh, July 25, 1784, from Maj Craig, in which he says he is convinced their best plan is to build a wind-mill at the junction of the rivers instead of a horse-mill to do the grinding for their distillery, and at other times for the inhabitants. At that point there was always a breeze up or down the rivers.¹

The pioneer firm in the iron industry of Western Pennsylvania was Turnbull, Marmie & Co., who had been extensively engaged in the metal and hollow-ware business in Philadelphia previously, and who for a time carried on their two establishments in conjunction. Among the first and most enterprising mercantile houses in Pittsburgh was the firm of Craig & Bayard. Soon after the Revolution these formed a copartnership with Turnbull, Marmie & Co., and in addition to putting the stills and mill castings of this latter firm on the market, erected a distillery, built a saw-mill, and controlled the salt-works on the Big Beaver. The marked success which the firm met with in this new region of country induced them to try the venture of a furnace west of the mountains. Accordingly, about 1790, the works of this firm were in process of erection upon Jacobs Creek, four miles from its mouth on the Fayette side, near Garhart's mill-seat. This was the first furnace in the West. It went into blast Nov. 1, 1790. In 1792 they filled an order for four hundred six-pound

¹ In these mills that went by horse-power the farmer had sometimes to furnish the horses as well as pay the toll. Gradually in some parts the mills came to do as much business as the taverns. In some instances they were converted into taverns.

Paul Frowman had a mill near the Monongahela, probably on Chartiers Creek, as appears from the appointment of road viewers, January sessions, 1774. John Cavett's mill is mentioned as early as 1773. It was between Eneas Mackay's plantation ("Dirty Camp") and the Virginia (Braddock's) road, as so styled in petition,—i.e., on Brush Creek.

One of the Perrys had a mill on the east side of the Monongahela quite early, and William Perry's mill was on the Loyalhanna, and the mill-seat and a saw-mill were on a very old improvement. This was afterwards owned by John Kirkpatrick, who purchased it at sheriff's sale in 1792.

Samuel Moorhead commenced building a mill on Stony Creek, as before mentioned (beyond the Conemaugh), in 1773, "where Andrew Dixon's mill was afterwards situated, but before it was completed the settlers were driven off by the Indians. They fled to what was called the Sewickley Settlement." (History of Dauphin County.) Gen. Charles Campbell in 1792 had a mill on Black Lick Creek, now in Indiana County.

Before grain was ground in mills turned by horse- or water-power it was ground in hand-mills or broken in a mortar.

shot for Maj. Craig, for the use of the garrison at Pittsburgh.¹

For some years the furnace did a large business. It was, of course, the centre of capital and labor for that whole region,—a region which, in part, at this day is rugged and uninviting, and which had not from the first attracted to it a community noted for thrift or energy. It controlled the price of labor for the whole locality, and furnished employment for many hands. But the firm went under, for what reason, outside of indiscreet management, is not known, and at this day the half-crumbled-away stone stack, with weeds and hazels and vines growing about it, is as picturesque a sight as one meets with in that country. Connected with it is the romantic story of Marmie, the sporting Frenchman, who committed suicide by jumping into the open mouth of the burning furnace, after driving in his dogs of the chase before him. Shamed in living, and broken in hope, desire, and fortune, he met the fate of the unfortunate, dying by his own hand. Many stories may be gathered from credulous persons in the neighborhood, who have heard them by the winter fires, about the strange sights which have been seen, and the strange noises heard by nights propitious for them in the haunted and abandoned place. Here they will tell you, if not in the language yet in the spirit, how, in the foggy moonlight,

"The spectre huntsman of Onesti's line,
The hell dogs, and their chase,"²

"shadowed their mind's eye." So abhorred and so secluded became the place that—so it is credibly asserted—for a long time a gang of counterfeiters pursued their calling unmolested and unwatched among its ruins.

Between the erection of this furnace and the close of the century there were other furnaces erected in Fayette County, the Oliphants indeed claiming the first one blown in, but we think without sufficient authority.³ Perhaps the first one, after Turnbull & Marmie's, within our county was the Westmoreland Furnace, near Laughlinstown, in Ligonier Valley, on

¹ From a petition at the April session of 1790 it appears that the iron-works at Jacobs Creek were "then erecting," and were known as "Alliance Furnace."

The firm was then composed of Messrs. Halker, Turner, and Marmie, and the ruins of it, as stated, are to be seen at this day. The two former were Philadelphia merchants, and the latter a Frenchman, who came to America during the Revolution as the private secretary of Lafayette, who liked the country and remained in it. The iron manufactured was known as the cold short iron, the only grade then produced from our native ores.

² Don Juan.

³ For much information on the subject of iron industry we are indebted to James M. Swank, Esq.'s very interesting and instructive "History of Iron-Making and Coal-Mining in Western Pennsylvania," wherein the subject is treated to its full extent.

Mr. Swank, on local misinformation, locates Westmoreland Furnace on the Four-Mile Run.

Col. John McFarland, a prominent contractor in his earlier days, but now retired and residing in Ligonier, reported that he used iron made at the Westmoreland.

Laurel Run, a branch of the Loyalhanna, which was built about 1792 by John Probst, who also built a small forge about the same time. Neither the furnace nor the forge was long in operation, both probably ceasing to make iron about 1810. On the 1st of August, 1795, George Anshutz, manager of Westmoreland Furnace, advertised stoves and castings for sale.

Gen. Arthur St. Clair, who prior to that time had engaged in the iron business east of the mountains, built Hermitage Furnace, on Mill Creek, two miles northeast of Ligonier, on the road to Johnstown. The date of the erection of this furnace is not accurately known, but it may be fixed between 1803 and 1806, for the reason that at the first date St. Clair ceased to be Governor of the Northwestern Territory, and in 1806 the furnace was in blast, as is witnessed by an advertisement in the Farmer's Register of Nov. 21, 1806. The advertisement was headed "Hermitage Furnace in Blast," and was signed by Henry Weaver & Son, who were general merchants in Greensburg at that time. It read as follows:

"The subscribers, being appointed agents by Gen. A. St. Clair for the sale of his castings generally, and for the borough of Greensburg exclusively, give notice that they will contract with any person or persons for the delivery of castings and stoves for any number of tons on good terms. Samples of the castings and stoves to be seen at their store in Greensburg any time after the 20th instant."

The ruins of the stack are still lying about the site. They are but a few hundred yards from the former residence of the general, whence he dated his correspondence still preserved in the "Archives." It was by the side of the old military road to Hannastown, and not far off the track of the highway may be discovered along the hillside.

In 1810, in the storm that wrecked the worldly fortunes of this illustrious citizen, Hermitage Furnace passed out of the hands of Gen. St. Clair, and for some time thereafter it stood idle. In 1816 it was again started by O'Harra & Scully, under the management of John Henry Hopkins.⁴ In October, 1817, Mr. Hopkins ⁴ John Henry Hopkins was subsequently the bishop of Vermont, and president bishop of the Episcopal Church in America. He was justly distinguished in his day for learning and piety. He created a great sensation about the breaking out of our civil war by the publication of a work giving a scriptural view of slavery. He was a member of the PAnglican Council at Lambeth Palace, and was created a doctor of civil law by the University of Oxford. In his life by his son there is narrated his experience as clerk and manager at Hermitage Furnace, and a graphic account of his trip from Ligonier to Youngstown, in which their coach broke down in the night, and the party were compelled to walk a distance down the Ridge to the shelter of the village inn.

AXES.—The early axes were rude and clumsy affairs to those which we now have. They were two, three, and four times as large. The first imported ones were the Yankee axe, from about 1812 to 1820. They were sold at from six to ten dollars. They were single-bit, and the double-bit did not come into use till ten years after.

NAILS.—Shortly after the beginning of the century there were in different parts of the county regular "nailers" engaged in the manufacturing of nails for house-work, etc. In 1817 nails were cut in Indiana borough. Here are some of the prices: 2-inch shingling nails, 37½ cents per pound; clap-board, 25 cents per pound; brads, 18 cents per pound.

left the furnace, himself a bankrupt, and it has never since been in operation.

Mount Hope Furnace was built in 1810 in Donegal township, by Trevor & McClurg. Washington Furnace, near Laughlinstown, was built about 1809 by Johnston, McClurg & Co. It was abandoned in 1826, and rebuilt in 1848 by John Bell & Co. It was in blast as late as 1854, and in 1859 was owned by L. C. Hall. Jonathan Maybury & Co. owned Fountain Furnace before 1812. The firm was dissolved Aug. 19, 1812. Kingston Forge, erected in 1811 on Loyalhanna Creek by Alexander Johnston & Co., went in operation early in 1812. Kingston is about two miles northeast of Youngstown on the turnpike, and about three miles east of Latrobe on the Ligonier Valley Railroad.

Ross Furnace, on Tub-Mill Creek, in Fairfield township, was built in 1815 by James Paull, Jr., Col. J. D. Mathiot, and Isaac Meason, Jr., and abandoned about 1850. It made pig-iron stoves, sugar-kettles, pots, ovens, skillets, etc. Another furnace in Fairfield township was built a short distance below Ross Furnace, on Tub-Mill Creek, by John Benninger about 1810. He also built a small forge on the same stream where the borough of Bolivar now stands. Both the furnace and forge ceased to make iron soon after they were built, the forge running until about 1816. When short of pig iron it sometimes made bar iron direct from the ore, which was obtained near by. In 1834 a manufactory of axes and sickles was established at Covodesville, on Tub-Mill Creek, above Bolivar, by William Updegraff. The business was continued for eight years by Mr. Updegraff.

Baldwin Furnace, on Laurel Run, near Ross Furnace, is said to have been built by James Stewart about 1810. It ran but a short time. It was named after Henry Baldwin, afterwards a judge of the United States Supreme Court, but then a leading lawyer of Pittsburgh. He may have helped to build the furnace.

Goldon, in his "Gazetteer of the State of Pennsylvania," states that in 1832 there were in operation in Westmoreland County one furnace, Ross, operated by Col. Mathiot, and one forge, Kingston, operated by Alexander Johnston, Esq. These early furnaces before named shipped pig iron by boats or arks on the Conemaugh and Allegheny Rivers to Pittsburgh, much of which found its way down the Ohio River to Cincinnati and Louisville.

Other furnaces in Westmoreland County were Mount Pleasant, a very early furnace; California, built by Col. J. D. Mathiot and S. Cummins about 1852, on Furnace Run, a branch of the Loyalhanna, about a mile above the mouth of the run; Oak Grove, built in 1854 by Col. John Clifford, near Ligonier, and owned in 1857 by James Tanner, of Pittsburgh; Valley Furnace, at Hillsvie, nine miles south of New Florence and about five miles north of Ligonier, built by L. C. Hall & Co. in 1855; Laurel Hill, about three miles below Baldwin Furnace, on Laurel Run, after its junction with Powder-Mill Run, commenced in 1845 or 1846 by Hezekiah Reed, and finished about 1849 by Judge J. T. Hall, of Centre County, and subsequently owned by various parties; Conemaugh, on the stream of that name, about eight miles west of Johnstown, built in 1847 by John C. Magill, Hon. Henry D. Foster, and Hon. Thomas White, and subsequently operated by George Rhey; Lockport, built in 1844 by William D. and Thomas McKernan, brothers, at the town of that name, twenty miles west of Johnstown, subsequently owned by William McKinney, of Lockport, and finally falling into the hands of Dr. Peter Shoenberger; Ramsey, built in 1847, on the Kiskiminetas, about four miles west of Saltsburg, Indiana Co., by Frederick Overman, for Dr. J. R. Speer, of Pittsburgh, its owner.

These early furnaces made principally all kinds of hollow-ware, such as skillets, pots, kettles, Dutch ovens, stoves, sugar-kettles, as well as grates, andirons, and plow-castings. The high price of iron consequent on the war with Great Britain in 1811 and 1812 led to the erection of those which were put up at that time. The pig from some of these was sent to Pittsburgh to be forged, but others forged their own. The return of peace, and the more advantageous facilities offered by other furnaces near cheap water portage, depressed the industry here. Under more favorable auspices it recovered, but again was the business utterly prostrated, and the first indication of the iron revival within our county was when the Southwest Railway was located and under way of construction.

All the above furnaces have been abandoned. There is only one furnace in the county now in operation, Charlotte, built by Everson, Knapp & Co., at Scottdale, in 1873, where the firm of Everson, Marcum & Co. built a rolling-mill in the same year.

This subject has been brought down to a later time than we have been treating of, but we thought it better to follow this arrangement and elsewhere treat of the iron industry since its revival in more modern times.

CHAPTER XXIV.

PRIMITIVE ROADS AND METHODS OF TRANSPORTATION.

Something on Roads in Great Britain, and of Indian Trails in America—Knowledge displayed by the Indians in their Selection of Routes—Their Manner of Traveling—Of their Trails East and West, North and South—The Routes of the First Whites westward of the Mountains—Indian Remains along these Routes in Westmoreland, and Memorials of their Presence in Names of Streams, Hills, etc.—Nemacolin's Path—The Catawba War Trail—The Kittanning and Juniata Paths—The different Termini of the Aboriginal Paths—Of the Indian Villages and Abiding-Places here—The Ohio Company's Road—Brad-dock's Road—Burd's Road—The National Road—Forbes' Road—Old State Road—Chartered Turnpike—Old Military Roads—Method of Transportation used in the Armies—Want of Roads to the First Set-tlers—First Road Petitions, 1773—Difficulty in getting to Mill—Im-portance of keeping the Public Roads in Repair—Manner of Travel and Method of transporting Merchandise on these Roads—Pack-Horses and Pack-Saddles—What a Pack-Saddle is—Rates for carrying—Remarks on one of the "Lost Arts"—How they went to War, to the Assembly, to the East for Goods, and a-Courting.

WE know of no better means of getting a correct notion of the different stages or eras into which the history of our country has been divided from time to time than by having a knowledge of the different roads and highways. In noticing this subject of roads we will be led into the consideration of such other subjects as are connected with it, or are evolved out of it, such as the methods first used in transportation, the facilities for supplying the wants of the carrying trade, the prices of such carrying, and in general the changes which may be attributed to the roads.

In a community which is constantly undergoing change we can, careful as we may be, scarcely avoid conflicting ideas and associating times and places with other times and places. But in the history of our county we observe one thing, which is this, that from the first settlements to 1775, the beginning of the Revolution, is a distinctly marked era; from that time to the destruction of Hannastown is another era; and from that time to the ending of the Whiskey Insurrection in 1794 another; and so on. And these eras are marked, as it were, by the history of the very roads, and whether we argue that the roads in their changes were but the termination of one stage of improvement or the beginning of another it is but the same. In the early days we have the pack-horse tracks and military roads, coming down to 1784, then the State highways, then the turnpike with its changed travel and traffic, which in turn was followed by the canal and the railroad.

The world has been slow to acknowledge the utility of good, safe, and speedy methods of travel, of the advantages in overcoming distance and time, and in thus adding to the wealth of the people, the advancement of civil society and the revenue of the State. When the Highlands of Scotland and Berkshire were a fortnight's journey from Edinburgh and London, a stranger's life was not safe in those regions. Walter Scott relates that in the reign of George III.¹ travelers were waylaid, robbed, and murdered not a hundred miles from the capital of Scotland. True it is in our own country no such acts in a regular and systematic manner were perpetrated. If we have no remains of Gothic and Noric castles overhanging the fastnesses of our mountain parts, so likewise we have no romantic stories of plumed bandits shooting from behind rocks at passers-by, or dancing minuets with fair prisoners on the greensward of the valley. Isolated instances of highway robbery and of murder for money are scarce, and it is notorious that the perpetrators seldom for any long time defied the authorities with impunity, and seldom, indeed, escaped. The causes of this may be satisfactorily explained with various reasons. There was, it is true, no district in Pennsylvania in which there was a surplusage of population, a part of which might have been driven to commit crimes for a livelihood, nor was there such alluring booty as would turn a romantic lad into a freebooter, after the manner of Robin Hood. There might possibly be a Dave Lewis, but there could not be a Claude Duval. But no reason can be advanced with so much force as this, that while the country was increasing in population and in wealth the roads were getting safer, better, and, of need, more constantly occupied. As it is a subject which may interest us and will interest those who follow, it is our province to consider it.

The red men, following the instinct of nature and traveling with the sun and the rotary motion of the earth, had marked foot-paths and trails which led from hunting- and fishing-grounds to their more permanent homes, to other tribes, to council-places in the East, to outposts, and to traders' posts. These paths were chosen, when it could be so done, along streams and otherwise along the hillsides or mountain slopes, to keep out of the lowlands. Often, when necessary, an undeviating straight line, which took advantage of the unfrequented localities, and which was directed by the unerring sun or by unchanging landmarks, was picked out and followed; for in traversing the country they followed each after the other in a row in a way aptly designated "Indian fashion." They had a singular swinging walk; they did not walk erect as our typical Indian, but with the instinct of the beast predominant, carried their head low, with their shoulders stooped, and their toes turned inward, and when on business, whether in peace or in war, had a peculiar gait, somewhat faster than a walk, but not so rapid as a run, and this gait they tirelessly kept up all day.

There were three principal trails east and west, which the Indians, in connection with each other and with the whites, had made, and were, even after the first settlements in Western Pennsylvania, much traveled by them. One of these led from the Allegheny River by way of the Kiskiminetas along the Juniata to the Susquehanna; the second was the path from the Allegheny across Laurel Hill, or at least to the great north-and-south trail along Ligonier Valley. This path from here eastward was not so much frequented by the traders as the northern trail, but when the army first made a road here it was seen to be a more direct course to the Forks of the Ohio. The third was the one from the Ohio through Southwestern Pennsylvania, called Nemacolin's path. It got this name from the Indian, Nemacolin, who piloted Washington when, at the instance of the Ohio Company, he first went to the forks of the river. Nemacolin was a friendly Delaware; his cabin was at Dunlap's Creek, Fayette. In 1753 this passage-way was a good pack-horse road. Washington made his road over this path previous to Braddock, who improved it and continued it to the river crossing, making what was called the "Braddock road." On this road was Gist's plantation and settlement, and the other settlements of the Ohio Company's first emigrants. The first or northern route usually went by the name of the Kittanning path, and it led past the Indian towns of Conemaugh, Kittanning, and Shanopin's to Logstown, the town built on the Ohio for the Mingoes by the French. On this route the whites, either Indian agents, commissioners, or traders, as Crogan and Frazer, first penetrated to the West, and following on it, Col. Armstrong, when he dashed up from Fort Shirley to the destruction of Capt. Jacobs, in 1756, led the vanguard of soldiers across the hills west of the mountains. "All the roads lead to Rome," and all the Indian trails of Southwestern Pennsylvania led to the forks of the rivers, whence the western trails diverged in all directions. There were many other east-and-west trails bisecting and intersecting each other or the main trails, some of which were known to the whites, and some were almost obliterated when the whites passed into these parts. On the first of these Post came out on his first mission, and in 1758, passing Forbes, then at Ligonier, he followed partly the track of the second trail.

¹ Introduction to Rob Roy.

These Indian trails are noticeable for the peculiarity that they were, as it seemed, the great highways of the Indians, and because over these trails were opened the roads which first became the highways of the whites. The paths which extended north and south were not so well known. Emigration and traffic go east and west. The star of empire, in both the political and intellectual horizon, rising in the east, makes its way after the constellation which nightly sinks into the great western ocean. There was one chief trail, however, which passed through Westmoreland, and this was one of the most noted and prominent trails the Indians had in this part of the continent. This path was formed in Fayette County, by our bounds now, where two other trails came together; one of these branches coming from Florida through the Carolinas and Virginia, and the other through Tennessee and Kentucky, united at the State line, at the mouth of Grassy Run, then northward by a well-defined line past Uniontown, over the Youghiogheny where Braddock crossed at Stewart's Crossing; thence along the side of Chestnut Ridge, through Ligonier Valley, over the Conemaugh and the head-waters of the Susquehanna to the council-fires of the Six Nations in Western New York. This was the Catawba, or Six Nation trail, and it was used by the Indians down to 1792. By such trails intercommunion and a connection were kept up between the stronger tribes and their remote dependent auxiliaries. Along this trail, during the Revolution and later, detached bodies of Indians belonging to many nations traveled at intervals, visiting and revisiting each other. The many captures in the valley were endured mostly from the Indians on this route, who, after hushing the cries of a stolen child, struck into the deep forests of Northern Pennsylvania, into what was called the Indian country, and there evaded all pursuit. The first settlers frequently saw squads of them trotting briskly along over the tops of the hills, darting in and out among the bushes, apparently unconscious of anything when they were going with some object in view. Afterwards, along this route, the ashes of the log cabin and the mutilated remains of the scalped settler marked the direction of this via principia. You can trace its location, too, in some places by the Indian graves and burying-places, and by the marks of more permanent habitations and camping-grounds, which have been found in greater number along it than in any other part of this region between the mountains and the Ohio. The first names used by the whites to distinguish and localize particular places have been preserved to our own time. We have Indian Creek, Indian Fort, Indian Camp Run, Scalp Rock, Indian Spring, and numerous old Indian burying-grounds. Curious remains of pottery, and implements of stone used in the first stages of agriculture as practiced by this nomadic people, weapons of war and of hunting, such as club-heads, arrow-heads, darts, and spear-headed flints, all evidently of aboriginal invention, manufacture, and use, have been picked up, and are now regarded as curious relics in many houses along the hills. This would all tend to the conclusion that there was an intercourse among the various tribes in an age which, although not so remote, may well be regarded as prehistoric.

The Indians inhabiting Westmoreland, including that part north of the Conemaugh and south of the Youghiogheny, were the Delawares and Shawanese. It is supposed that the most of these, especially those of the northern portion, between the Conemaugh and Kittanning, and between the Allegheny River and the Chestnut Ridge, or even to the Susquehanna, settled there after they removed from Standing Stone and from along the Juniata after Forbes' expedition, 1758.

Among the principal points east of the hills whither the Indians were attracted either in times of war or in times of peace, were the first settlements of the whites or the traders' posts, such as Standing Stone, Frankstown, and Harris' Ferry.

The Standing Stone stood in the borough of Huntingdon, and was described by John Harris in 1754 as being fourteen feet high and about six inches square. It was erected by the Indians, a branch of the Six Nations, and was covered with their hieroglyphics.¹

¹ The natives, who seem to have regarded this stone with great veneration, after the treaty of 1754, by which their title to the lands of the valley of the Juniata was relinquished, migrated, and, as it is generally supposed, carried this stone with them. Another stone, soon after erected by the whites, was covered with the names of traders, residents, and colonial officials. It was broken by a carelessly thrown "long hullet."

Distances on the Paths Westward, According to John Harris.

John Harris, who had been westward prior to 1754, notices the following points, with the intermediate distances. "From my ferry (near present site of Harrisburg, on the Susquehanna) to George Croghad's (Crogan), 5 miles; to Kittatinny Mountain, 9 miles; Thomas Mitchell's sleeping-place, 3 miles; Tuscarora, 14 miles; Cove Spring, 10 miles; Shadow of Death, 8 miles; Black Log, 3 miles; 66 miles to this point, the road forks to Raystown (Bedford); to the Three Springs, 10 miles; Sideling Hill Gap, 8 miles; Juniata Hill, 8 miles; Crossings at Juniata, 8 miles; Snake's Spring, 8 miles; Raystown, 4 miles; Shawana Cabins, 8 miles; Allegheny Hill, 6 miles; Edmund's Swamp, 8 miles; Stoney Creek, 6 miles; Kichey Paulin's house (Indian site of Johnstown), 6 miles; Clearfields (The Wheatfields, now East Wheatfield township and vicinity, Indiana County), 7 miles; to the other side of Laurel Hill, 5 miles; Loyal Haning, 6 miles; Big Bottom, 8 miles; Chestnut Ridge, 8 miles; to the parting of the roads, 4 miles; thence one road leads to Shannopin's Town (near the site of Pittsburgh, on Allegheny River, Thirty-second Street), the other to Kiskiminetas Old Town (not far from the Kiskiminetas at Leechburg), to Big Lick, 3 miles; to Beaver Dams, 6 miles; James Dunning's sleeping-place, 8 miles; Cockeye's cabin, 8 miles; Four-Mile Run, 11 miles; Shannopintown, on Allegheny River, 4 miles; to Logstown, down the river, 18 miles; distance down the old road, 246 miles."

Along the Frankstown Road.

"Now beginning at the Black Log.—Frankstown Road to Aughwick, 6; Jack Armstrong's Narrows (so called from his being murdered there, now known as 'Jack's Narrows'), 8; Standing Stone (about 14 feet high and 6 inches square), 10. At each of the last places we crossed Juniata, the next and last crossing of Juniata, 8; Brauch of Juniata, 10; Big Lick, 10; Frank's (Stephen's) Town, 5; Beaver Dams, 10; Allegheny Hill, 4; Clearfields, 6; John Hart's Sleeping-Place, 12; Shawanese Cabins (near Cherrytree, Cause Township, Indiana Co.), 24; Shaver's Sleeping-Place at two large licks (Two Licks, at or near the forks of the Two Licks, in Greene Township, Indiana County), 12; Eighteen-Mile Run, 12; Ten-Mile Lick, 6; to Kiskiminetas (Leechburg, Armstrong Co.) town, on the creek which runs into the Allegheny river six miles down, almost as large as Schuylkill, 10; Chartiers landing on the Allegheny, 8," etc.—From "History of Cumberland County," Rupp.

Hart's Sleeping-Place.

"The man Hart, whose name is perpetuated, in connection with his log, by the valley we have spoken of, was an old German, who followed the occupation of trading among the Indians. He was probably the first permanent white settler along the Juniata west of the Standing Stone, and long before he settled he crossed and recrossed the Allegheny Mountains by the old war-path with his pack-horses.

"John Hart's Sleeping-Place is mentioned in 1756, by John Harris, in making an estimate of the distance between the rivers Susquehanna and Allegheny. Hart's Sleeping-Place is about twelve miles from the junction of the Burgoon and Kittanning Runs, and still retains its name. When he took up his residence along the river he hewed down an immense tree and turned it into a trough, out of which he fed his horses and cattle, hence the name Hart's Log."—Jones' "History of the Juniata Valley."

Most of the old maps, especially those made before the Revolution, are not reliable when it comes to details. From point to point these trails were usually located by hearsay and an imperfect topographical knowledge. They answer the purpose, however, by giving, approxi-

Frankstown was on the Juniata River. It was the seat of an Indian town. The common opinion long was that it was named after an old Indian chief called Capt. Frank, but the truth is that it was named after an old German Indian trader named Stephen Franks, whose post was at this town and who lived contemporaneously with old man Hart, who had a lodging-place now within Indiana County. The Indian name was "Assunepachla." As the Indians could not pronounce or articulate the letter "r," no name unless of English origin with that letter in it appears in their vocabulary.

Frankstown took in a large district of country of which it was the centre. Hence the prominence of the point and its importance. John Harris, or Harris' Ferry, is now Harrisburg.

One of the principal Indian paths was that one which ran from the Kittanning town across the region now of Indiana County to Cherrytree, and thence to the Juniata. Upon this path John Armstrong led his expedition against Kittanning in 1756. This path was crossed at Indiana town by the trail from Cushcheoting to the East. This Kittanning path, which passed through Indiana town, ran northeastward into the trail which came down from Venango. These two united, now in Greene township, Indiana Co. The continuation of the Venango and Kittanning path then passed a little below Cherrytree. At the forks of this trail Armstrong encamped on the night of Sept. 7, 1756.

The trail from Cushcheoting (Coshocton?) to Ligonier came into Indiana County near the northwest corner, ran through the site of Indiana Town, passed through the township of West Wheatfield, and crossed the Conemaugh between New Florence and Nineveh, and thence up the valley.

There were, besides those of which we have memorials, many other trails over the region of our county, but knowledge of these is obscure. Thus one of the chief trails was from Shannopin's Town, on the Allegheny River two miles above the Forks of the Ohio, to Ligonier, where, as we have said, many trails met and crossed. This trail from Ligonier in all probability came westward on the north side of the Loyalhanna through Derry township, until it crossed the creek again a short distance above where the Nine-Mile Run flows into it. It then continued down the west side of the creek, at some distance from the stream, probably trending towards the northwest, for a distance of about five miles, where it forked. One of the branches then went to Shannopin's, and the other to the Kiskiminetas.²

mately, routes. In this respect the map of the State Historical Society is in some instances notoriously incorrect and needs revision. Of the old maps, both those designed by the French and the English, as well as by our State authorities, scarcely any two of them agree.

² Extract from Christian Post's Journal, 1758.

Nov. 9, 1785. . . . "We waited till almost noon for the writing of the general [Forbes, at Ligonier Stockade, whither the army then lay, on their way

The Indians had various villages and abiding-places throughout this region west of the mountains, but none of them was of any magnitude, and they were of such a character that the inhabitants could remove on short notice and without inconvenience. The natives never occupied their villages after the treaty of 1768, nor after the whites came near them.

One of these villages or stopping-places was "Kick-enaupawling's Old Town," two hundred and seventy-six miles from Philadelphia. It was at the junction of Stony Creek with the Conemaugh, and on its site is to-day the city of Johnstown, which took its name from one Joseph Johns, a very early settler there, of German nativity. So was "Punxsutawney," on the Big Mahoning, in Jefferson County, and so also was "Kiskemeneco" (now Kiskiminetas), a Shawanese town near the site of Leechburg, as above mentioned. According to Post there was a "Keckkeknepolin," a village of the Shawanese, along the Kiskiminetas path, east of "Kiskemeneco."

The Indian villages west of Laurel Hill, such as they are known to the whites, were situated along streams, and most of them along the larger tributaries of Allegheny and the Monongahela. Although the archæologist shall discover vestiges of the presence of these natives in places inland, even in Ligonier Valley, no memorial of them exists.

These were the principal Indian trails in our early county, but into them, like cow-paths, others ran for the use of tribes less numerous. The route of the east-and-west trails may at this day be fixed, but it would be almost impossible to trace the north-and-south trail by landmarks other than those which nature has left.¹

It cannot now but be noticed how the great centres of travel were afterwards, by the whites, fixed nearly over these Indian paths, as the first pack-horse roads of the whites, taking immediate advantage of them, marked them out. The road which was cut over the path of the friendly Delaware from the Turkey Foot to the Monongahela quite nearly marked the great international turnpike road from Cumberland to Wheeling, and the road opened by the vanguard of Forbes' army, and known as the Forbes' or Hannastown road, but called by general historians the Pennsylvania road, to distinguish it from the Virginia or Braddock road, after being long used as the only thoroughfare through the middle of the State, relinquished its monopoly to the Pennsylvania State road, which utilized part of its road-bed, and which in its turn was in many places but the bed of the western end of the famous Philadelphia and Pittsburgh turnpike.

What the Appian Way was to the inhabitants of Central Italy, so was the Braddock road to the people of the southern tier of counties, and so was the Forbes road to our county.²

No roads could conveniently be made along the path which touched the Conemaugh and Juniata and hugged the steep, overhanging mountains; but it was the natural route for the canal, and not far from the marks of the feet that now are silent another highway was laid out for men of another race to pass and repass by methods never dreamed of by those. Can you get a more comprehensive idea of what is compressed within a century than from this, that Webster and Dickens followed Weiser and Crogan over the same route that Jacobs and Shingass trotted along with their belts full of bloody scalp-locks?

When the military roads were first opened by the army they were cleared wide enough to allow the pas-

² The Braddock road was first opened by the Ohio Company in their purpose to divert the Indian trade from the West. It was used to travel on as an Indian path in 1748, and before Forbes' time it was preferred by the Pennsylvania traders themselves, who came up the valley to the mouth of the Conococheague, and thence up the river to Wills Creek (Cumberland). The company opened the road in 1753. Troops under Washington in 1754 repaired it to Gist's; in 1755 it was opened and widened by Braddock to within eight or ten miles of Fort Duquesne. A branch of the road went from Gist's to Brownsville. This was opened by Col. James Burd in 1759. Hence you have Fort Burd, another name for Brownsville, otherwise Redstone. From the close of Pontiac's war it became a highway for trade, and nearly all the early settlers in Southern Westmoreland from 1765 to 1770 came on this road from Maryland and Virginia.

Before the Ohio Company adopted this road it was well known by the name of Nemacolin's path, from the fact that the company employed Col. Thomas Cresap, of Old Town, Md., to mark the road, and the colonel hired a well-known Delaware Indian named Nemacolin, who lived at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, to select the best route. It was known to the Indians many years before that, and was used by the traders as early as 1740. It led from the mouth of Wills Creek to the Forks of the Ohio. The Ohio Company marked it in 1750 by blazing the trees, and clearing away the underbrush, and removing the old dead and fallen timber. In 1753 they improved and enlarged it at a considerable expense. It was improved by Washington, as we said, in 1754, in his campaign, and by Braddock in 1755, who left it in good condition as far as the mouth of Turtle Creek.

It should be remembered that Braddock in 1755 did not follow the Indian path or the road cut by Washington on its whole length of his route. He left it to the right before he crossed Jacobs Creek, although afterwards the whole lower road, both the part Braddock opened to the place of divergence and the road from there on to Redstone, which was, as we said, opened by Col. Burd in 1759, was commonly known as Braddock's road.

to Fort Duquesne]. We were escorted by an hundred men, rank and file commanded by Capt. Haselet; we passed through a tract of good land, about six miles on the old trading path, and came to the creek [Loyal-hanna] again, where there is a large fine bottom, well timbered; from thence we came upon a bill, to an advanced breastwork, about ten miles from the camp, well situated for strength, etc. [See Note 2, page 28]. Within five miles from the breastwork we departed from Capt. Haselet; he kept the old trading path to the Ohio. . . . We went the path that leads along the Loyal Hanning Creek. . . . 11th.—We started early, and came to the old Shawanese town, called Keckkeknepolin, grown up thick with weeds, briars, and brush, that we could scarcely get through. Piquetomen (an Indian guide) led us upon a steep hill, that our horses could hardly get up; and Thomas Hickman's horse tumbled, and rolled down the hill like a wheel; on which he (supposed to be Hickman) grew angry, and would go no farther with us, and said he would go by himself. It happened we found a path on the top of the hill. At three o'clock we came to Kiskemeneco, an old Indian town, a rich bottom, well timbered," etc.

¹ The number of such paths was greatly increased after Braddock's defeat. Indeed, it is said that the country about us was almost overrun with Indian trails and devious winding paths. From the time of Braddock to Forbes the French and Indians as well as the Americans in scouting parties made many inroads over the western part of the State, extending east as far as Conococheague, Huntingdon Co.

sage of the cannon and heavy army-wagons, but the undergrowth of the forest spontaneously springing up, and the wash of the mountains, with their periodical floods, choked the ravines with débris, and left at recurring intervals large bodies of logs and stones in the road-beds. With the exception of these two main roads, the first passage-ways were not made for wheeled vehicles. The first vehicles were those used, at times apart, by the government. The common roads, so called, were single narrow paths under the foliage of the trees, with the heavier and lower limbs lopped off, and the stumps left standing, around which the path turned. For many years the great roads were in a barely passable condition, and all of them so much later than 1775. Bouquet, in 1764, had to leave his wagons and heavy baggage at Ligonier on account of the state of the road, and in 1774 Dunmore's army for the same reason had to transport their war materials to the frontier of Western Virginia on horses and mules. One of the first petitions presented to the court in April, 1773, was from the inhabitants along the Great road, who represented that, from the fallen timber and the deep morasses, the road was almost impassable, and they prayed the court to appoint viewers to report; and at several successive sessions viewers were appointed and rates laid. Among other petitions in the matter of roads was one by the inhabitants of Springhill township, west of the Monongahela, for a road from opposite the mouth of Fish-Pot Run (half-way between Ten-Mile and Redstone) to the forks of Dunlap's path and Gen. Braddock's road on the top of Laurel Hill. In the next year the inhabitants of Tyrone, Menallen, and Springhill asked for a road from near Redstone Old Fort to Henry Beeson's mill (Uniontown), and thence to intersect Braddock's road near the forks of Dunlap's road and said road on the top of Laurel Hill; giving as a reason that "We, who at present live on the west side of the Monongahela, are obliged frequently to carry our corn twenty miles to the mill of Henry Beeson, near Laurel Hill, and in all probability at some seasons of the year will ever have to do so."

From the difficulty of making roads in a new country, and one whose surface was so unfavorable, and from the few people there were to make them, it was not possible that good roads could be made and kept in repair. The rates and the labor were not adequate to make them anything like passable from early in the fall to late in the spring. There was no ballast in the bottom of the roads, and movable timber washed in the widening ruts. In the winter they were deep with mire. There were no culverts, and nothing like a respectable bridge. A corduroy affair was thrown over marshy and open places, but all the large streams were forded. There were no fences along the road, but the deep forest came up to the very verge, and the traveler not unfrequently saw crossing his path before him a wild cat with her kittens or a bear with her cubs. In the warmth of spring rank vegetation covered the road-bed in the lower bottoms. Before wagoning, and even after wagons were in use on it, the old road was worse than the worst roads in the mountains now which have been temporarily made to get out bark and ties.

In this stage of the public roads travel by vehicle was to a great extent, of course, unknown. Vehicles did not come into general use till after the State road was made in 1785, although as early as 1782 there was complaint that the old road was not fit for wagon travel. But you may say that wagons were not used till villages had sprung up all along it, and till the country justified the necessity. All travel for both business and pleasure was on horseback, and this method, for its conveniency and speed, remained a favorite method long after it had ceased to be the only one. As the chief part of the carrying trade was accomplished by the same means, the superintending of such transportation became a business. And making allowance for the limited amount of merchandise which could be so transported, it was, withal, we may judge, a profitable business. We are told that about 1784 the rates for carrying from Philadelphia and Baltimore to Pittsburgh was forty-five shillings per hundred-weight. In 1786 the price of carriage to Philadelphia was sixpence per pound. In 1796 it is marked at the same. In the relative value of money we may then say that in round numbers it would cost now at such rates from twelve to fifteen dollars to carry a barrel of flour the length of the Pennsylvania Railroad.¹

These packers went and came in trains. A train consisted of from five to ten, and even more, horses tethered by a hitching-rope one behind the other. Sometimes the horses were so well trained that they followed the leader alone. The master of the train rode before or behind the horses, and directed their movements by his voice. A train could travel fifteen or twenty miles day by day, and each horse could probably carry two hundred-weight.² The furniture

¹ The charge for hauling when wagons first went over the southern route from Hagerstown to Brownville was three dollars a hundred weight, or sixty dollars a ton.

² The operations on the lakes during the war of 1812 called attention again to the cost of transportation, and in 1818 the House directed the Secretaries of War and of the Treasury to report at the next session a list of the internal improvements in progress, and plans for aiding them by appropriations. In the discussion upon this motion it was stated that the expense for the transportation of each barrel of flour to Detroit was not less than sixty dollars, while for every pound of ammunition and other material it was not less than fifty cents.—Hazard's Register.

² Hear what Pietol shoots off:

"Shall pack-horses,
And hollow pampered jadee of Asia,
Which cannot go but thirty miles a day,
Compare with Cæsars, and with Cannibals,
And Trojan Greeke?"

King Henry IV., Second Part, Act II., Scene 4. (The thirty miles were the roads of England.)

At June sessions, 1785, appears the following record:

"May 30, 1785, Received of George Hixon & Philip Bradly six pounds for Breaking Sunday by following their ordinary employment of driving of the horse was a pack-saddle and a halter; and the lead horse had in addition a circling band of iron over his withers from the sides of the saddle, to which were hung the jingling bells, whose interminable tinkling relieved in a kind of way the monotony of the long journeys and kept the other horses from going astray, and called the young tow-heads with their mother to the door of the cabin when they came within hearing.

The pack-saddle then in use was such a piece of workmanship as any man used to handling ordinary tools could with a little ingenuity and application make. To describe it minutely in the interest of those who have never seen one of those caparisons of a past age: it was made of four pieces of wood, two of these being notched limbs; the crotches fit along the horse's back, the front part resting upon the horse's withers; the other two were flat pieces, about the length and breadth of a lap-shingle, say eighteen inches by five, and were to extend along the sides fastened to the ends of the notched pieces. It thus bore some resemblance to a cavalry saddle. The making of pack-saddles was a regular business, and very early there was a saddle-tree maker in Pittsburgh and one at Greensburg. A veritable pack-saddle is now almost as great a curiosity as Mambrino's helmet would be.

When these saddles were used for riding, stirrups were fastened to the sides, and the saddle was held to the horse by a rope, or girth, extending clean around. Pieces of cloth and worn-out blankets were habitually put under the saddle to keep it from chafing the skin. Upon these saddles were packed in divers shapes by curious arrangement all kinds of general merchandise. Bars of iron bent in the middle were hung across, large creels of wicker-work contained babies, bed-clothes, and farming tools; and kegs of powder, caddies of domestic spice, bags of salt, rolls of calico, sacks of charcoal, and boxes of glass were thus fetched across the mountains for the use of the settlers, and pelts and roots and whiskey, when whiskey was manufactured, were sent in return. Shop-keepers from the West went down to Philadelphia and Baltimore in squads of six, ten, or a dozen to lay in their yearly stock of goods. Members of the Assembly and members of Congress, agents, and militia officers thus traveled to the seat of government. Young men went a-courting on expeditions as dangerous as young Lochinvar's, and on such a saddle as graced the back of Petruccio's steed when he went to wed with the Shrew, or with accoutrements similar to those of Sancho Panza's placid and meek Dapple. Ordinarily riding-saddles were but pack-saddles covered with a leather covering.

William Findley, our member of Congress from 1791, with some intermission, down to 1817, performed his journey to the seat of government on a horse which he used for the greater part of his long term. For a couple of weeks before his departure his family were busy preparing his wardrobe and arranging his outfit. Lawyers and judges passed from one county-seat to another on such saddles covered with a tow or worn-out blanket decoration, which answered for housing, cushion, and flap. The change of apparel and the money in silver specie were stowed in the ends of the saddle-bags, or rolled into a wallet and tied behind the furniture of the horse.

This mode of travel continued until the State, taking the management of public roads in hand, completely revolutionized travel and traffic. For it was only when the roads, then bad in comparison with what they are now, but good as to what they had been before, it was only in their improved condition that wagon and stage conveyance completely altered the facilities for transportation, and made intercourse between the East and West safer and easier, and better adapted to the growing needs.

CHAPTER XXV.

TURNPIKES—CONESTOGA WAGONS—PIONEER INNS.

The State assists in making Roads—The Old Pennsylvania State Road—Its Course through the County—The Villages built along it—Conestoga Wagons and Hacks—First Load of Merchandise hauled across the Mountains—How long they were in bringing it—Cost of carrying—First Mails from Pittsburgh East and West—How Papers and the Mails were delivered—First Carriages and Carioles—The Pleasure of Traveling in these Contrivances—The Felgar Road—The Jones' Mill Road—The Harrisburg and Pittsburgh Turnpike Company incorporated—The Northern Turnpike—The State appropriates Money to the Southern Route—Progress of the Undertaking—Its completion—Public-Houses—Their Great Number along the Turnpikes and in the Villages—They become Famous in their way—The Old Class of Inn-keepers—The Good Cheer and the Solid Comforts they offered Travelers—Homer gives some Hints as to their Signs—The Sceptre departed from Israel—Regrets of a Certain Class that Railroads have ever been built.

Up to the time of the burning of Hannastown, 1782, many roads had been made through Westmoreland. At almost every Quarter Sessions petitions for new roads were presented and others passed on. A pack-horses through Hannas Town on Sunday loaded, for the use of the poor.

"£6. 0. 0.

"MICH HUFFNAGLE."

(N. B. The presumption is violent, that it was the fine that was for the "use of the poor," not the load upon the pack-horses.)

We cannot resist the opportunity to recall the quaint words of Smollett, who has better preserved the customs of Great Britain in his novels than in his history:

"There is no such convenience as a wagon in this country, and my finances were too weak to support the expense of hiring a horse; I determined, therefore, to set out with the carriers, who transport goods from one place to another on horseback, and this scheme I accordingly put in execution on the first day of September, 1739, sitting upon a pack-saddle between two baskets, one of which contained my goods in a knapsack. But by the time we arrived at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, I was so fatigued with the tediousness of the carriage, and benumbed with the coldness of the weather, that I resolved to travel the rest of the journey on foot rather than proceed in such a disagreeable manner."—The Adventures of Roderick Random, chap. viii.

list of these is inserted in the notes.¹ These roads were, of course, for the convenience of different neighborhoods, and one or two influential men could have a road from their plantation or ferry to run to some mill, to the county town, or to one of the rivers. Some two prominent points were made the termini, and one of these points was usually Col. So-and-so's house. Perhaps of all the most needful requirements in this line was the necessity of getting a shorter route to a mill when those were few, and when to go and return was the journey of a day. But outside of these local roads there were some roads supported by the county rates which were used for general traffic. We think that the road which in part became the old State road was in some places used previous to its authorization by the act of Assembly, and is the road mentioned in old papers as the road "south of the Main Road." The Forbes road was, however, still the chief road, and remained so for some years later. There were some houses in what was afterwards Greensburg before the State road was located.

¹ Petitions for roads and returns, etc., commencing at January term, 1789, and ending at September sessions, 1795, taken from the Minute Book, Common Pleas, from 1775 to 1804:

Index for Return of Roads.

Return of a road from Patrick Cowan's past Hughes' old place,* March 7, 1789.

Return from Greensburg to the north of Puckety.

- " Kelly's Forging to Greensburg.
- " J. Miller's to Sloan's Mill, thence to Greensburg.
- " A. Sbarp's to the Frankstown Road.
- " Owens' Mill to James Stewart's.
- " Peterson's to Castner's Ferry.
- " Greensburg to Simerel's Ferry (West Newton).
- " Gallagher's Ford to Greensburg.
- " Laurel Hill to Lovinguire's Mill.
- " Elder's to Crooked Creek.
- " Saw-Mill Run to John Wright's (private).
- " C. Hauk's to J. Silvace's.
- " Iron-Works † to Pittsburg road.
- " J. Macklin's to intercept Archibald road.
- " Roaring Run to Denniston's Mill.
- " Greensburg to Jacobs Creek, opposite J. Mason's.
- " Hays' Ferry to Budd's road.
- " Middle Gap to George Arofredt's.
- " Campbell's Mill to intersect Elder's road at Thomas Anderson's.
- " Craig's Mill to Greensburg.
- " Denniston's road to Shoemaker's Mill.
- " From Greensburg to the Broad Forging.
- " William Todd's to Denniston's Mill.
- " Loebrey's to Asa Cook's.
- " Newport to Philip Freeman's.
- " Miracle's Mill to intersect the road to Washington.
- " Old Place to Old Pennsylvania Road.
- " Congruity Meeting-House to Poke Run Meeting-House.
- " Light's Lane to Hays' Ferry.
- " Greensburg to Old Town on the Kiskiminetas River.

The return of a road from Crooked Creek to Col. Charles Campbell's mill on Blacklick was headed "To the Worshipful Bench at Greensburg." June 20, 1789.

Another Petition is for a road "beginning at a 'May-pole,' in the centre of Greensburg." April Session, 1789.

In another petition Greensburg is styled the "Metropolis."

* This road began at Cowan's house, on Budd road, and passed Nehemiah Stokely's. Width of all these roads to be twenty-five feet.

† Turnbull & Marmie's works on Jacobs Creek.

On the 25th of September, 1785, the Assembly passed the act which made the old State road, the road which so long monopolized the through travel, and which in its turn gave way to the chartered turnpike. This act appropriated two thousand dollars of the public money to lay out and make a highway from the western part of Cumberland County to Pittsburg, and authorized the president in Council to appoint commissioners to lay it out. The road was to be made in as straight and direct a manner as the circumstances would admit, to be of the breadth of sixty feet, and was to remain, for all intents and purposes, the State highway between these designated points.² The Council had the power to direct reviews and to finally determine the course and direction of the road. This road being surveyed and partly laid out, was confirmed in Council on the 24th of November, 1787.

The part so confirmed was from the Widow Miller's spring, in Cumberland County, through Shippensburg to Bedford, but a review was ordered of that part from Bedford to Pittsburg. By a resolution of the General Assembly of the 21st November, 1788, the executive was authorized to draw the amount of the expenses to be incurred in making the review, and by an order of the Council of the 14th March, 1789, the surveyors were appointed, who, on the 26th of May, 1790, presented their report.

The wants of the West demanded the road, and where it came along the current of the new emigration from the Eastern and Middle States to the new territories drifted along its sides. Most of the villages which became business towns of the turnpike were started at a tavern stand along the old road. The most noticeable change, however, as the effect of new emigration, was that after the settlement of the troubles arising from the Whiskey Insurrection.

As cities are usually built on large rivers, so towns and villages naturally spring up along highways, whether turnpike roads, canals, or railroads. The courses of this road being very nearly identical with the turnpike, it is known with tolerable precision to most. It entered the county on the east over Laurel Hill beyond the village of Laughlinstown, and passing through the villages, as we have them now, of Ligonier, Youngstown, Greensburg, Adamsburg, and south of Irwin, passed out of the county at Turtle Creek. None of these places of the old road age had any pretension to the name of town except Greensburg. The rest were collections of from half a dozen to a score of log-cabin houses.

It was on this road that pack-horses, strong wagons, and mail-hacks first ran with anything like regularity. We cannot note the change as we would desire, but, thanks to some one who anticipated the curiosity of the coming race, there has been preserved some information which, although not expressly throwing light upon our road, will partly explain the state of travel. Such an innovation was considered worthy to be remembered. For although there were in 1785 five stores in Pittsburgh, and a couple in Brownsville, yet the merchandise was still brought from the East in the usual way by packers. The first load of merchandise unloaded at Brownsville from a wagon which had been loaded beyond the mountains was the event which, with good judgment, has been thought worthy of historical notice; an event, by the way, more worthy to be commemorated than hundreds of other events which go to make up the early histories.

² The old Forbes road was sometimes called the King's highway.

John Hayden, the wagoner, brought out a load of about two thousand pounds' weight, with four horses from Hagerstown, for Jacob Bowman, merchant. The distance was one hundred and forty miles, and the teamster was nearly a month on the way. The route was the Braddock road. This was in 1789. At this time the Northern or Forbes road was described as being in some places so steep that great boughs of trees had to be tied as drags to the wagons, which acted on the principle of the rudder to a ship.

Until some time after the Revolution all correspondence was carried on by express-riders or by casual travelers. About 1786, Mr. James Brison was ordered by the authorities at New York to establish a post from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, and from Winchester to Bedford. In July, 1784, a project had been started by private subscription for a post-rider, but the project fell through.

The next mail spoken of from Pittsburgh was from there to Fort Limestone and Fort Washington, Cincinnati. This was in July, 1794, when a line of steamboats was established to run from Limestone to Wheeling and back once every three weeks. From Wheeling to Pittsburgh it was to be carried on horseback. The men on the boats were armed with muskets.

In the Greensburg and Indiana Register of Nov. 12, 1812, the information is given that a post-route had lately been established from Bedford to Greensburg. The post left Greensburg every Saturday morning, passed through Youngstown, Laughlinstown, and Stoystown, and arrived at Bedford on Sunday evening. Subscribers on that route then were first served with their papers by mail. To that time and much later the paper off the authorized mail-route was carried to designated points at the expense of the subscribers, and from these points distributed around.

It is said that the first of the old-fashioned carriages used on our side of the mountains was one belonging to Col. Morgan, the agent appointed by Congress for Indian affairs. This must have been in the early part of the Revolution. He brought his family out in it, and for years the remembrance of it was vivid among the members of the Chartiers congregation. The honor of having first crossed the mountains in a carriage is, however, contested by Dr. Schoepf in the memorandum he has left of a visit to Pittsburgh. This Dr. Schoepf was a physician and naturalist, and having been employed as surgeon to the German troops in America, he remained in the country some two years after the war was over. He has left an interesting account of this visit in his travels, published at Erlangen in 1788, and since translated into English.

He came to Pittsburgh in 1783, and on arriving in the town his vehicle was the chief object of interest to the "many well-dressed gentlemen and highly-adorned ladies" whom he encountered at the tavern.¹ He says that as his "karriol" drove past lonely houses in the wilderness, its appearance created intense excitement, mothers showing their children something they had never seen before. And ask any of your oldest citizens who is native to the county, and he will tell that he recollects when there were only two or three carriages to be seen at the largest congregations at church, and when a dead body was carried to the burying-ground in a four-horse wagon, not for ceremony, but of necessity, which became formal.

The wagons and hacks, called mail-wagons, used on these roads were clumsy structures to those used on the later turnpike. Every part of it had to be built on the principle of the wonderful "one-hoss shay," each part the strongest. The tires on the wheels were at first put on in pieces of about the length of a felloe, and the bed rested on huge square bolsters. Indeed, nothing else could have stood the roughness and the jolting. The old road in the valleys ran over swamps and marshes; in the mountains over logs, stumps, and rocks, along the sides of the hills, and up and down the walls of precipitous ravines. Sometimes the wheels would fall perpendicularly two to three feet over a rock; again they would swing sideways over the washed-out shale more than fifty yards down a precipitous hill. From the fall to the spring the roads did not have any bottom. In some of the cuts there was not room enough for two wagons to pass each other, then sometimes there was a fight. At other places the driver or the wagoner had to walk on the bank above his team, so narrow was the passage-way. Sticking in the mud was a common amusement. A wagoner had often to spend three nights, one after the other, at the same house, being no nearer it after a day's drive than he was to the next house towards which he journeyed. So bad were the roads frequently that old persons recollect of teams having to be stabled while making the ascent of the "hogback," upon which Greensburg is built, then a miry, narrow way, now known as West Ottonian Street, but which in the first days of the town was far worse than most of the township roads now.

On this road from Philadelphia and the East came those trains of emigrants who proceeded westward to the newly-opened Territories in their own conveyances, and with their arrangements previously made to establish little colonies. Land speculators and business men also made an important element in the travel at this time.

¹ Suppose it was Ormsby's tavern.

About 1804 a through line of coaches from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, by way of Lancaster, Harrisburg, Carlisle, Shippensburg, Bedford, Somerset, and Greensburg was established, and the time occupied in going the entire distance, when it was in successful operation, was about seven days not counting the nights.

In the beginning of May, 1805, the first stage-coach started from Pittsburgh for Chambersburg. Quite a crowd of curiously-inclined idlers had collected to see it roll out from the front of the tavern stand, and under the crack of the whip swing, like a miniature ship, for the East.

After the turnpike was made, and in good condition, the time was wonderfully shortened. Within one generation as much progress was made in the expeditiousness of travel as was made in the next generation which saw the railroad. For some time before 1830 the time occupied by the coach lines in going from one of those cities to the other at either end of the road was from three and a half to four days and nights. The times had brought the necessity for the innovation, and enterprise had made travel by night safe and feasible. There were relays of horses and drivers at convenient distances, mostly not farther apart than about ten miles. About this time the price of passage in one of these coaches from one end of the road to the other was from eighteen and twenty dollars to twenty-two and twenty-three dollars. The freight charges in Conestoga wagons for the full length of the line were from three to five cents per pound.

Then came a new want. The increasing numbers engaged in the carrying business and the augmenting squads of travelers must have frequent places to stop. Hence the wayside inns which were so prominent, not only in the villages, which were usually started by a public-house, but in the favoring points between. On the old State road did St. Clair, an old man, broken with the storms of state, and suffering from the unkindness of his fellow-men, to supply the few wants of age for a few more short years, open a tavern on the most desolate part of Chestnut Ridge, between Youngstown and Ligonier, where he lodged teamsters and travelers. These public-houses did not, as a rule, however, bear any similarity to the spacious and well-attended taverns which a generation later were the boast of Western Pennsylvania.

From the accelerated progress of settlement, especially after the domestic troubles of 1794, when the people, in consequence of the new invasion, were spreading out on all sides, the State was called upon to further assist by appropriating money and locating other roads. In 1805, on the representation that a road was needed from Somerset to Greensburg, and that, owing to the mountainous route, and to the sparsity of people in the region through which the road must pass, the road could not be opened by the usual way, an act was passed appropriating eight hundred dollars, and authorizing the Governor to appoint three persons to locate the road in the most practicable route between these points.¹ This road when finished was largely traveled. From the top of Laurel Hill to Greensburg it was known as the Felgar road, taking this name from a family who kept public-house on the summit of the Hill. Another well-traveled road from 1809 was the Jones' Mill road, which led from Somerset to Mount Pleasant and Connellsville. About 1811 fifteen hundred dollars was appropriated for the road from the White House tavern, Somerset County, to the "Federal or National road" by way of Connellsville.

But the great road of modern times in Westmoreland was the turnpike which runs through it along the line of the old villages, nearly through the middle of the county east and west. This is the road known latterly as the Greensburg and Stoystown turnpike from Greensburg eastward, and the Pittsburgh and Greensburg turnpike from Greensburg westward.

Much as we would now depreciate such works of internal improvement or talk slightly of them when placed in comparison with the magnificent railways, suspension bridges, and viaducts, we underrate them as works of utility. The turnpike, in a mechanical view, was as far from the old military road as the Pennsylvania Railroad is from the turnpike. The construction of the turnpike was, in its day, as great and as successful an undertaking as was the railroad in the middle of this century. For we must bring into account the notions then existing in reference to works of public advantage, the knowledge of engineering skill to devise, the mechanical force to execute, and the capital necessary to carry it on. Through the mountains it had deep cuts and sideings, extensive fills across ravines, arched culverts over the wild ¹ A committee appointed by the Legislature at their session of 1790 made a long and valuable report on 19th of February, 1791, and additional reports later in the session, in which the resolutions of prior examinations and reports were embodied. The members were of opinion, among other things, that a great and general system of internal improvement should be begun and carried on by the State, and, among others, that a turnpike should be made from Philadelphia through Lancaster to the Susquehanna, as well as other roads and canals throughout the State then and there mentioned. This system of internal improvement began under the administration of Governor Mifflin, the first Governor elected by the people, and it held the State in debt for a long time.

From a petition at the April sessions, 1782, for viewors to locate a road from the summit of Laurel Hill (which road had been partly open and in use at that time), "Beginning at Lant's Road, thence extending down the west side of the Laurel Hill to Captain Richard Williams' [near Donegal], thence over the Chestnut Ridge to intersect the Great Road leading from Hannastown to Broadford on the Youghiogheny, at or near Macquin's Mill," that the road was "then already opened to the west side of the Chestnut Ridge, and had been found by experience to be of great utility not only to the Petitioners, but to those persons who had occasion to travel on the Communication from Philadelphia to Fort Pitt, either with wagone or single horses, and was calculated to be of great advantage to the inhabitants of Bedford and Westmoreland Counties."

streams, and wooden bridges over all the creeks and runs. The body of the road was macadamized with hard stone, and there were water tables along the sides.

The history of the road begins on the 24th of February, 1806, when the Assembly authorized the Governor to incorporate a company for making an artificial road from the bank of the river Susquehanna, opposite Harrisburg, to Pittsburgh. The style of the company was to be "The President and Managers of the Harrisburg and Pittsburgh Turnpike Company." By a supplement to this act passed the 31st of March, 1807, a number of separate companies were to be incorporated in the several counties through which the road was to pass, and the route was fixed through Carlisle, Shippensburg, Chambersburg, McConnellstown, Bedford, Somerset, Greensburg, to Pittsburgh. When the road should be completed the separate charters were to be surrendered and the companies to be consolidated into one, agreeable to the first act.

Another road of much importance was the old Frankstown road, which extended from Frankstown, on the North Branch of the Juniata, to Pittsburgh.

By act of Assembly 20th of March, 1787, "to establish a road between the navigable waters of the Frankstown branch of the river Juniata and the river Conemaugh," commissioners were appointed to lay out a State highway between those two points, and the route was surveyed. It ran from Armagh to New Port, west of Blairsville, on the Indiana County side, and then it crossed the river into the Westmoreland side. The road was entered and confirmed by Council 18th December, 1787.¹

Early in 1800 the road was somewhat changed in its courses, after a turnpike company had been chartered, called the Harrisburg, Lewistown, Huntingdon, and Pittsburgh Turnpike Company. This was more familiarly known as the "Northern Turnpike," in distinction from the Greensburg turnpike. Its course was nearly over the old Frankstown road. In Westmoreland it ran from the Conemaugh through New Alexandria, New Salem, Newlansburg, and Murraysville.

But the successful completion of both of these roads was impossible by an act of the Assembly which brought them in contact with each other. This act,² "for the construction of certain great and leading roads," authorized the Governor, as soon as one hundred and fifty thousand dollars should be subscribed to the route which should be determined on, to subscribe three hundred thousand dollars in the stock of the company. Four commissioners appointed by the Governor, of whom Wilson McCandless and Adamson Tannehill, of Pittsburgh, were two, were to go over the route and make their report in favor of either the northern or southern route. The commissioners reported in favor of the southern route, and the time for commencing the construction of the road was extended to three years from the 2d of April, 1811. An advertisement appeared in the Greensburg Register May 20, 1812, signed by commissioners appointed for that purpose, giving notice that the books for subscription to the stock would be opened at the house of Simon Drum, Sr., on Monday, June 3d, at ten o'clock. In March, 1816, an additional advertisement appeared, signed by the manager of the Greensburg and Pittsburgh Turnpike Company, offering contracts of some of the sections. The installments subscribed were then being paid in.

This great work, which promised so much to those who subscribed to the capital stock, never paid them any dividend. It was ultimately put in sequestration, and since that time has been managed and controlled by a few who in each division hold the balance of power by having a majority of shares gathered together at a nominal valuation. The road never filled its original corporate destiny.

Having said so much on the subject of roads, we shall touch upon one in every respect more agreeable, namely (as the scholastic would say), inns or taverns. The public-houses on the old Pennsylvania road, as adverted to, could lay no claim to superior comfort, nor could they offer extra inducements beyond what might be offered in many private houses. But as the roads became more and more traveled, and as the population along them increased, the public-houses became continually better. In all the bigger towns large hostleries were opened, and wherever it might be profitable commodious houses were built. The reason of this is apparent. There was a class of men who lived the better part of their time at public-houses, and this class was mostly made up of those engaged in the carrying business. The number of these was, in the winter season, augmented by the sons of the farmers, who, rigging out a team of horses, themselves took to the road. These usually at home loaded with flour or whiskey, and returned from Philadelphia or Baltimore with merchandise. They, as a set, were jovial fellows, and being free born demanded good victual for their money. But it was of necessity that the tavern should be the home for at least six days in the week of that class which was made up of professional wagoners and coach-drivers. And it was from this that they enjoyed here as much convenience and every comfort that any house could at that day afford. Nor was there much distinction then as to the parties served. The distinction often spoken of originated between the teamsters and the coach-drivers. The coaches got to stopping at houses which were furnished in better style and which charged higher prices. The wagon-houses adhered to the old homely style, in which abundance made up for delicacy, and common manners for conventional urbanity.

This greatest distinction was observed, perhaps, from 1825 to 1845, and during this time everything pertaining to roads and houses had undergone great changes for the better. The low two-storied cabin-house with its four rooms and thatched sheds had given place to the large, rough stone, brick, or frame tavern, each with its suite of eight or a dozen rooms, its bar-room, sitting-room, dining-room, and large stables, barns, and wagon-yards attached. The scene then of a summer evening was like a picture, and truly American. The big Conestoga wagons on coming in took their places along the village street and in the yards. The long troughs which through the day hung at the end of the bed were then placed on the pole of the wagon for the horses to eat their feed from. The wagoners themselves were busied unearthing, currying the horses, carrying bundles of hay or armfuls of straw, while the dogs chased the cattle from the purlieus of the wagons. The scene was not unusually enlivened by a rough-and-tumble, heels-over-head fight at fisticuffs, in which the whole community would abet. In the noise of the feeding horses, and in the long summer twilight, on benches outside sat the resting teamsters, while the scratching fiddle in the dining-room or bar-room was the prelude to the evening's fun.

¹ For all these authorities see acts of Assembly and minutes of Council.

² Act of April 2, 1811.

There were places which had become famous as stopping-places, and where one could have plenty to eat and lots of amusement and enjoyment all night if wanted. Such a place, and one of the most conspicuous, was Youngstown in its pristine days, where the situation of the village made it a natural stopping-place, and the hospitality of its inhabitants an agreeable one. Its good cheer has been made famous by pens that glided more smoothly than our own blunt quill. Our marginal reference is to Bishop Hopkins, D.C.L., Oxon., and to the historiographer of Prof. Donaldson.¹ But it is a fact that wagoners would drive after-night to reach their old stand, and if a wheel was lost it was not considered inconvenient to trudge a mile or so to one of its first-rate inns.

The improvements which have been noticed were, as all improvements are, gradual,² but at all times, dating back to the beginning of the century, the reputation of the public-houses was good. The farmers found a ready sale for their fruits, vegetables, and fowls to the tavern-keeper, who usually paid for them in ready cash. In some districts the bulk of the money in circulation went through the hands of the landlord. As the product was abundant the table depended on the enterprise of the host. A good table was, therefore, the best thing to advertise by. Here roasted the ham and smoked the biscuit, and waffles in the morning swam in maple syrup. Here the wayfarer got a big glass of old Monongahela or apple-jack for three cents; or if he took a meal for a levy, he got a dram to wash it down and a toby cigar. Here were fiddlers always ready to play for a corn-row, and servant-girls ready to dance in a French four; here were large bar-rooms with big grate-fires, such as Johnson and Dryden loved; long low kitchens, with its ten-plated stoves, smoky rafters, as one sees in old German pictures, and small parlors, with the black-framed pictures decorated with ferns, and the fireplace in summer filled with evergreens and furze, in the fashion of the England of the early Georges, celebrated in the verse of Oliver Goldsmith and in the prose of Joseph Addison.

These taverns were known by some peculiar sign which designated them, sometimes by the name of the landlord himself, who gave reputation to the house. These signs which once graced the waysides of the public roads were peculiarities truly in themselves. You may count on your fingers all the old-fashioned signs now in the county. These were of wood, and in size about four feet by six, and hung in a stout frame, and swung in every wind. On a weather-beaten one you might make out a daub once intended for a bear, a bull, a white horse, or a black ox. Like the signs of London made classic in the Spectator, there were green cows and blue stars, red lions couchant and yellow lions rampant, all the signs of the zodiac,—

"The he-goat,
And the man with the watering-pot."

There were animals not classified by Buffon, and owls and fowls whose species would have puzzled Audubon. There was the black duck, the golden swan, the spread eagle, the cross-keys. There the painter had painted all the constellations which the sooty Vulcan had moulded in the forges of the immortals for the shield of Thetis' son, godlike Achilles,—

"There he wrought Earth, Sea, and Heaven,
There he set the unwearied Sun,
And the waxing Moon, and stars that Crown the blue vault every one,— Pleiads, Hyades, strong Orion,
Arctos, high to boot the Wain;
He upon Orion waiting,
Only he of all the train,
Shunning still the baths of Ocean,
Wheels and wheels his round again.

There were Washington and Lafayette, Greene and Putnam, Indian chiefs and shaggy buffaloes. Some taverns were known by the name of the town, some by the name of the county, and many by the name of the host. If the host was a professional landlord and had a good reputation, he found this a capital advertisement and a good way of drawing custom. It was ¹ We refer to the "Biography of Right Rev. John Hopkins," and to the newspaper accounts of the "halloon excursion" from Pittsburgh by Prof. Donaldson in the interest of Barnum's Hippodrome exhibition.

² The remarks of Hon. Alexander Ogle are so applicable here as reflecting popular sentiment at that day in the matter of public improvement that we give them in part. They are from Alexander Ogle's 4th of July speech, 1854, at Somerset, Pa., as reported by Dr. Elder in a little work named "Periscopics," published in Philadelphia in 1854:

"Your grandmothers can tell you what a rumpus the same nineties raised around the first wagon-road made over the mountains to Pittsburgh. It would break up the pack-horse men forsooth, and the tavern-keepers and horse-breeders would be ruined when one wagon could carry as much salt, bar iron, and brandy from Baltimore as a whole caravan of half-starved mountain ponies. But I told them then that of all people in the world fools have the least sense."

money in a man's pocket to have a name that sounded well on a sign-board. Frederick Rhorer, Sr., inn-keeper from Hagerstown, was the first of a reputable family whose praises have been told by many, and the Drums, the Markers, and the Lamars had names which were as well adapted to designate a house as that of Willard or Leland, being, as it were, like Governor Panza to the island, born to it.¹

Around these wayside taverns of the old turnpike centred the interest and the excitement of the community. Here daily either some of the coaches or some of the teams stopped for a meal or to change horses, and about the yards at night were the high white-canvassed wagons filled with merchandise. The wagoners were a class by themselves distinct, and had several marked characteristics. In winter the rooms of the inns were warmed by coal-fire in large open grates, and the kitchen by either open fireplaces or those huge stoves which burnt wood by the cord. Sometimes the kitchen and dining-room were in one. If this was so the room was spacious, and was the room of the most attraction. For the tired traveler, the coachman, or the teamster, exposed from four o'clock in the morning to ten o'clock at night to the biting cold, the mud and snow of our wintry hills, nothing could equal the comfort of this room. The fires leaped gayly and cheerily up the broad chimney; the stout cooks, the landlord's daughters, and the hearty daughters of the small farmers round were busied in every preparation that could increase the inclination or satisfy the taste of the hungry. A poor tavern it was in which food was not furnished in abundance, and where the landlord and the landlady did not show an obliging disposition. The house soon fell in repute and was deserted, and the more enterprising landlord carried business away. While the domestic arrangements were directly under the management of the women, the landlord himself was either enthroned in glory in the tap-room or carrying his portly body about the wagon-yard. From night to morn, from morn to dewy eve, was the door of the tap-room open. The common custom of drinking and the habit of association always drew a share of people to this part of the house with ever-increasing desires. Here collected songsters, and even poetasters, braggarts, bullies, and loafers. How potent the effect of these places and their influence we have abundance of testimony. The epigrams, the flashes of wit and merriment that were wont to set the table in a roar, the jests, the songs of the hard cider and coon campaigns, the tales of the wayside inn are all now things of the past, and are a part and parcel of Vanity Fair.

Before the advent of railroads and speedy travel, which knelled out the old inn system, taverns were recognized as being the most desirable place to while away idle time and enjoy comfort. "Can I not take mine ease in my inn?" was the indignant question not admitting of answer of the ingenuous old boy Falstaff, and no less were the ponderous Samuel and the dainty Pope frequenters of the London coffee-rooms. And to those old persons who constantly take advantage of the present by comparing it with the past, and who will never be happy till the old-fashioned stage-coach be again on the road and the cars are entirely done away with, to those it is a source of the utmost satisfaction to recall the times when these villages of the old turnpike were in their early glory; when, as they declare, labor and pleasure went hand in hand; when every town had one place of amusement for both the stranger and the countryman; when fiddling was an accomplishment; when everybody danced; where the story-teller had the best seat nearest the fire; where even the scullions and stable-boys came in for a share of the fun, and were bountifully fed and well clothed; when, in short, in the language of a great historian, the rich did not grind the faces of the poor, and when the poor did not envy the splendor of the rich.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE LAST OF THE BORDER COMMOTIONS.

New Boundaries of the Purchase of 1764—Emigration of Westmorelanders—Harnar's Campaign—His Defeat—St. Clair, Governor of the Northwest Territory—His Campaign and Defeat—Indians attack Frontier Settlers of Pennsylvania—Condition and Extent of the Frontier of Westmoreland and Allegheny—Unprepared state of the Inhabitants—Westmoreland Militia—The Prominent Men of that Period—The State organizes Rifle Ranges—Appropriations for the Western Counties by Act of Assembly—Government of the United States called on for help—It responds and enlists Men—Correspondence from and between Officers and Military Men relative to the state of Affairs, and giving Statements at length of Indian Depredations—Particular Incidents—Captures of Charles Mitchell, murder of his Mother, and an account of his Captivity with the Cornplanters—The Episodes of Capt. Sloan, Wallace, Hunt, and Knott, in their Tour of Observation in the Western County—Sloan in command of Fort Hamilton—His able and successful Defense of that Post—Presque Isle—The laying out of the Town and of the Road along the Allegheny River resisted by the Indians at the instance of the British in Canada—The State takes Active Measures to enforce the Laws—Militia called out from Westmoreland and the other Counties for this Service—Last of the Indian Troubles in Westmoreland.

SINCE the treaty of 1768 the boundary line of the Indian purchases in the western part of Pennsyl-

¹ The following opinion of this worthy class of citizens was passed by a contemporary. It is from H. M. Brackenridge's "Recollections of the West:"

"I should be guilty of a glaring omission, even in this unshaded outline of by-gone days, if I were to pass in silence that portion of my townsmen who possess so much influence in a land of equality and freedom. I allude to that class who furnish us with militia colonels and generals, and members of Congress, or who contribute most to make them, who do the honors of the town and keep up its reputation for hospitality, although not quite disinterested. I allude to the publicans and sinners. The landlords or tavern-keepers are, in reality, the only lords we have in Pennsylvania; they possess a degree of intelligence and respectability of character which justly gives them an influence dans la chose publique, which very little corresponds with that of mine host in the country of John Bull, which may account for the good jokes of British travelers on our keepers of public-houses, in respect to their political and military importance."

vania ran from the West Branch of the Susquehanna River to its source, thence in a straight line to Kittanning, thence down the Ohio to the limits of the State.

The last treaty held with the Indians at Fort Stanwix took place in October, 1784. The commissioners at this treaty purchased the residue of the Indian lands within the limits of the State, and the deed signed by the chiefs of the Six Nations is dated Oct. 23, 1784. Thus was the whole right of the Indians to the soil of Pennsylvania extinguished.

This last accession of land, as we reminded you, was called by the whites the "New Purchase." When the land office was opened in 1785 settlers rapidly flocked up the West Branch.

On the 8th of April, 1785, the previous boundary line between Westmoreland and Northumberland was definitely ascertained, which until that time had been uncertain, owing to a misconstruction of the Indian names mentioned as points in the description of the ceded lands in the former purchase.

The emigration, which had begun towards the close of the Revolutionary war, was now onward accelerated. One cause of the great migration which took place during the closing years of the war, and for some years succeeding, was, first, the obvious intention of those who were tired of war to escape from military service, and, second, to be exempt from the payment of taxes, which were now becoming a burden, and for the payment of which money was uncertain and dear.

In these times many families left Western Pennsylvania for the new territory opening up along the Ohio. Others, who had borne the brunt of the frontier times here, headed the colonies or belonged to them which went up the rivers in the region of the "New Purchase" and there settled. Thus in that section are sometimes to be found descendants of men whose names are frequently met with in our early history, but whose connection with our history entirely ceased with that era. In Eastern Ohio especially are the descendants and the connections of many Westmorelanders.

From the very nature of the early American settlements and colonies, the foremost of these settlers were in continual contact with the savages. The line of the frontier likewise from time to time became thus changed, for as these settlers were now collecting along the rivers of the new territory in the contiguous west, that part of Pennsylvania which lies north and west of the Allegheny and the Ohio had very few occupants prior to 1792 or 1793. It was somewhat different on the eastern side of the Allegheny, but at the date designated the settlements even there did not extend far back into the wilderness, and not far north of the Kiskiminetas. The cracking of the rifle of the pioneer was therefore heard in the far West, but our own frontier north and west of the Kiskiminetas was in 1791 and 1792 (the time of Harmar and St. Clair), almost as much of a hostile frontier as it was at any time during the border wars of the Revolution.

We would not be justified in taking notice of these border wars (as they are seemingly local) but for the fact that our own people were at that time forming colonies and making settlements to the northwest of our county limits like bees building to the hive. Indeed, our county did directly feel the misery of that time as well, as we shall see.

To have a conception of the sufferings of these people, not only during the Revolutionary war but later, and to understand how these affairs culminated in their final deliverance, one must study local events and the general history together. To preserve anything like a consistent narrative we must constantly follow up the course of public affairs, and in doing so advert to the share Westmoreland had in them, reading as we would a text-book, with constant reference to marginal notes. For instance, the troubles of 1774 would be uninteresting to us if we were in ignorance of the battle of Point Pleasant; Connolly would not be a noteworthy personage had it not been for his connection with Dunmore; Clarke's expedition would have no relation to our history only in this, that Lochry and his men died in the far West trying to join him to protect the lonesome women and their crying children along the Sewickley and the Loyalhanna; nor would we be justified in dwelling upon the horrid murder of the Moravian Indians but that the sequel of that slaughter is to be seen in the burnt houses, the waste fields, and the weeping captives that went out at the burning of Hannastown.

Soon after the close of the Revolution a number of circumstances combined to largely augment the settlement of the western parts of Virginia and Kentucky, as well as those adjoining the Ohio River. But notwithstanding this the depredations of the Indians continued. They failed to obey treaties made with them, particularly the treaties of 1786 and 1787, and they made incessant attacks upon the emigrants into those regions.

In 1787 the Secretary of War ordered detachments of troops to be stationed at different points for the protection of the people within that region, which was now governed directly as a Territory of the United States. In 1789 a block-house called Fort Washington was erected and garrisoned by United States troops on the site of Cincinnati, where a few settlers had erected cabins in the year previous. It seemed to be an important point, and towards the close of the year Gen. Harmar, of the regular army, arrived with 300 more regulars, and with them occupied the post. This was the point at which the Indians from the Northwest crossed the Ohio to ascend the Licking River, whence they made their attacks upon the outskirts of Kentucky. "The old war path" from the British garrison at Detroit along the Maumee and the Miamis to the Indians in the south passed here, and into this Indian highway other paths entered from all directions.

Harmar established forts in various directions through the territory of Ohio, and with his small force, frequently reinforced by the militia of the frontier, carried on an ineffectual war. But the depredations of these continuing, the government determined to trifle no longer, but to put such a force under Harmar and give him such authority in the premises, that by one effective campaign the power of the Indians should be broken and the tribes scattered.

In 1790 a call from Harmar brought to his standard 1133 militia with competent officers from Kentucky, —that is, from the western territory below the Ohio River. His force in all amounted to 1443 men. His campaign was directed towards the Indian villages about the head-waters of the Little Miami. From the towns there he struck across the woods for the Great Miami, where Piqua now stands, and marching forward came to where Fort Laramie was afterwards erected, a location about seventy miles southeast of Fort Wayne.

At this point many Indians were discovered early in the morning viewing his camp. They did not attack, but it was evident they were on the watch for a favorable opportunity of doing so.

Among his effective forces there was a battalion of militia from Kentucky, Western Pennsylvania, and Virginia, under command of Col. Hardin and Maj. James Paul. From here Hardin and Paul with six hundred volunteers preceded Harmar and the rest of the army to some Indian villages a distance ahead. They arrived here on the second day out, and found the town deserted, and the traders' houses and the wigwams in ashes. Four days afterwards Harmar came up. As it was apparent that the Indians had but recently left, Hardin with two hundred and ten men was sent out to overtake them. At a distance of six miles the Indians lay in ambush along a defile. When the whites had well entered this defile, the Indians rose up and so successfully made their attack that the troops who remained to fight were completely surrounded, effectually cut off, and either killed or captured. That night the savages held a war-dance of exultation over the glory and success of the day, and rejoiced greatly in the misery and sufferings of their prisoners.

Harmar had concluded to return to Fort Washington, and had actually begun his march, but on receiving word that the Indians had again taken possession of the town, he ordered a halt, and directed Hardin and Maj. Wyls with three hundred and sixty men to find out the enemy and fight them. They returned to the site of the principal town, and expecting to fight them openly, regarded their forces as sufficient. Soon a small body of Indians appeared, and the volunteers by alert motions fired upon them, when they broke into smaller parties and scattered in different directions. They were pursued by the volunteers, who also broke into small parties. By this stratagem, a large part of the volunteers were delayed in a vain pursuit, and the regulars were left alone. At this point the Indians, the main body of whom were concealed in a favorable position, rose from their hiding-place and with their hand-weapons fell upon the regulars. These fought well and met death bravely, but in the end the Indians were masters of the field. Nor could they be attacked after with any advantage, which Harmar knowing, marched the army back to Fort Washington.

He had left the fort on the 30th of September, and arrived there on the 3d of November, 1790. He had lost nearly two hundred men and half his horses. The army was disconcerted, and the people were dissatisfied, and although as a matter of history there has been no reprehensible blame attached to the commander, who deserved a more fortunate fame, yet his disastrous expedition has since that time to this day been known as "Harmar's Defeat."

Among those who were with Harmar in 1790 with the Pennsylvania Volunteers, and who is favorably mentioned by Harmar in his official report, was Col. Christopher Truhy, who was in command of the Pennsylvania militia. He owned a portion of the land upon which Greensburg was laid out. He lived long after this campaign to take an active part in civil concerns. His body lies in the old German burying-ground at Greensburg.

But the unfortunate defeat of Harmar was followed by the more unfortunate one of St. Clair, on a tributary of the Wabash, whither he had led a large force with the expectation of utterly destroying the savages. This defeat was suffered on the 4th of November, 1791.

For a more extended account of the history of the Northwestern Territory during the time it was governed by Arthur St. Clair, which time embraces the history of his expedition against the Miami Indians, we shall, for the present, refer to our sketch of the life and services of that personage, wherein, as more proper, we shall recall some mention of those West-morlanders who there fell.

From the time of Harmar's defeat till the hostiles were finally silenced by Gen. Anthony Wayne in 1794, our northern frontier was exposed to frequent incursions, and was the scene of repeated raids and of some bloody massacres. Wayne's victory led to the Greenville treaty of 1795, when the Indians removed farther to the West.

As to our own county proper, there did, prior to this, not appear to be anything in the public state of the frontier to create alarm or apprehension. Six or seven years of peace, such as the people of the interior portion of our county experienced from 1783 to 1789, had dispelled all thought of extra precaution for defense, as it had taken away all the visible necessity for it. So when the outbreak of the savages occurred as the natural result of their successful battles over greatly superior forces, and the result as well of an active combination and a new confederation of tribes, our settlers north of the Kiskiminetas and northwest of the Allegheny were left without a regular body of organized militia, and without any places of refuge or defense worth mentioning.

When the result of Harmar's campaign became known, some of the most observant of our leaders gave warning; but the people had got used to alarms and rested in apathy. The State government was even appealed to, but the men like Campbell and Guthrie, who continually spoke out, were called bawlers, such as yell loudly at fires and do not help to put them out. Campbell was our county lieutenant at that time, and in 1791 he had called out a company of militia for the defense, which company was taken along with St. Clair. Findley complains that the people were convinced they had nothing to expect from him, either by way of his industry or attention, but Findley and Campbell were not on the best of terms.

John Irwin, acting for the county lieutenant of Allegheny, who at that time was in the East, says¹ that the gentlemen of Westmoreland were unnecessarily alarmed, as that up to the middle of 1791 only three murders had been committed within our borders, although fourteen persons had certainly been killed in Allegheny. But it was not long till Findley himself was alarmed as well as the gentlemen from about Pittsburgh. The truth is that those from that post made application to the Secretary of War for extra arms and ammunition, and they had less thought about the unprotected settlers up in the Armstrong region than about themselves.

But it was considered unsafe to attempt an immediate settlement beyond the Allegheny, in a country exposed to the inroads of a subtle and vindictive enemy, whose mode of warfare was peculiar, and whose approach was often in secret and could not be guarded against by common precautions. In the year 1792 only two persons, Charles Phillips and Neal McGlaughlin, are known to have resided on the northeast side of the Ohio with the intention of making settlements.² In 1794 no settlements were made across the Ohio and Allegheny. Early in March, 1795, a few individuals removed with their families to the vicinity of Fort Franklin, Cussewago, and Craig's Station, but none settled at a distance or detached from the garrison. It was totally unsafe to remove families into the interior of the country till 1796, when settlements in general took place.³

By an act of the Assembly of March 17, 1791, the sum of four thousand pounds was appropriated for the defense of the western frontiers of the commonwealth. In 1792 the government was empowered to engage three companies of riflemen for the protection of the posts, and a further appropriation was made for that purpose. Some time later three more infantry companies were authorized to be raised and stationed for the protection of Westmoreland, Washington, and Allegheny. In 1796 it was unsafe for families to cross the rivers into the lands purchased by the State in 1784.⁴

4 FROM "PAPERS RELATING TO THE DEFENSE OF THE FRONTIERS" FROM 1790 TO 1791 (PENN. ARCHIVES).

From Col. John Wilkins to Governor Mifflin.

"PITTSBURGH, 31 March, 1791.

". . . The Indians have committed considerable depredations on the people living on the west side of the Allegheny River, which has caused our frontier people, for an extent of fifty miles, to fly. They have abandoned their farms, their stock, and their furniture, and fled with the utmost precipitation. The Indians have killed one man and carried off three people prisoners within five miles of this town, and they have killed nine persons within twelve miles. . ."—Penn. Arch., Secd. Series, vi. 655.

Lieut. Ernest, of the Federal Artillery, to the Secretary of War.

"FORT PRITT, 10th April, 1791.

". . . Mr. Jeffries informed me . . . the contractor's boat having been stopped on its passage to Fort Franklin by the militia of Westmoreland County, on account of there being friendly Indians on board who assisted in navigating her up the Allegheny. These Indians were part of Cornplanter's party who had with them the presents they received from Congress and State of Pennsylvania, which was taken from them and exposed at public sale. The party that did this mischief was under the command of Maj. Guthrie, of Westmoreland."—Penn. Arch., Secd. Series, vi. 659.

[All of which gives rise to the observation that the militia of Westmoreland might have been better employed at that particular time.]

From William Findley to Secretary Dallas.

"APRIL 29, 1791.

"DEAR SIR,—I have just time to inform you by post that yesterday morning the Indians attacked the house of James Kilpatrick, on Crooked Creek, and killed two men and broke a child's leg, etc.; the people, however, supported the house. There were six militiamen stationed at the house, and nine, I understand, at a house in the neighborhood."—Idem, 660.

[See elsewhere this matter recounted at length, and prominence given it for the zeal of Mr. Kilpatrick in scalping the dead Indian for the bounty, the same that was at the killing of the child (for it died). Crooked Creek is near Kittanning].

John Scull to Governor Mifflin.

"PITTSBURGH, May 12, 1791. . . . I take the liberty of inclosing you a Pittsburgh Gazette, which contains some account of the depredations of the Indians, and since publishing which I have received an authentic account that two men were taken on Sunday last about six miles from the Allegheny, in Westmoreland County, and about twenty miles from this place."—Idem, 663.

From Maj. John Irwin to Col. Clement Biddle.

"PITTSBURGH, May 12, 1791. . . . Your letter of the 8th April, by Mr. Dunwoode, with an inclosed Invoice of Military Stores. A certain Mr. William Todd, of Westmoreland County, ten miles from Greensburg, has taken the liberty in the name of the County Lieutenant to take possession of the whole; how he is to account to Government for his conduct the Governor may judge. . . . [This William Todd was colleague of Findley in the Constitutional Convention of 1790-91, and was his neighbor. . . .] We have got perfectly easy on the subject of Tomahawking and Scalping, as it happens every two or three days."—Idem, 663.

Estimate for Defense of Frontiers.

"AUG. 6, 1791.

"Estimate of expenditures for defense under act of Assembly, &c., 1791, April. Sent to Westmoreland, Allegheny, and Washington, 40 quarter-casks powder, bags, etc.; 88 muskets and accoutrements, flints, &c.; 42 rifles; 5 cwt. lead."

¹ Penn. Archives, Second Series, vol. iv., 668.

² Reports Supreme Court, Fourth Dallas, 221.

³ Ibid., 209.

The active forces of Westmoreland during this frontier trouble were embodied in militia companies at first, and subsequently in rifle rangers, which were stationed most of the time at the forts and block-houses along the Allegheny and Kiskiminetas. The officers mentioned are John Guthrie, William Cooper, Samuel Murphy, John Sloan, William Jack, George Smith, Alexander Craig, and William McDowell. The assaults of the Indians were, however, not carried on in bodies, but they made innumerable incursions from many directions. Many were murdered and many taken captive. The inhabitants finally were compelled to resort to the old method of Indian fighting, and these, forming themselves in companies under the command of their most noted scouts, made themselves feared by their enemies. Hence it is that we cannot convey much of an idea of the state of the county at this conjuncture, only by taking it in detail. We preserve a few of the most noteworthy instances of captivity and of bravery, upon which the opinion of the reader can be formed, after having seen the extracts which we give from the correspondence of the day.

But, as we said, we should not be misled in anticipating the settlements which were afterwards of Westmoreland to the north. With the exception of the few families that were within sight of the block-houses along the Armstrong side of the Allegheny, there were very few north of the Kiskiminetas. The best authority for this is the opinion of the justices of the Supreme Court in their adjudication of complex land claims.

Capt. Torrence to Governor Mifflin.

"FAYETTE COUNTY, Aug. 10, 1791. . . . Since my last General Richard Butler called the County Lieutenants of Ohio, Washington, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Fayette to a consultation for the protection of the frontiers in the absence of the Federal troops, which was to be drawn off the 5th instant. We agreed that 300 militia should be kept up. . . ."

Col. Campbell to Governor Mifflin.

"GREENSBURG, August 13, 1791. In Consequence of your Letter to me directed, on the Nineteenth of May, 1791, I Ordered, by Draught, a full Company of Militia of this County to guard the fronteers untill such Time as the General Government would Grant them Protection, and as soon as a part of Coll. Gibson's New Levies was sent on our Fronteers, I went to Major John Clark of the New Levies, who Had the command of the Troops in our County, and Wished to have the whole of the Militia of the County discharged. But as the men under His Command was not sufficient to guard such an Extensive Fronteer, He Wished Me to Continue fifty of the men. . . . I then Agreed with the Lieutenants of Washington, Fayette, and Alegany Counties to furnish for my Quota to guard the Fronteers seventy-five men to give Protection To the fronteers of Westmoreland county, whitch I expected would have been Sufficient, But upon finding the Enemy to be so Mutch On Our fronteers, and so Constantly a stealing of Horsee, But Hath not yet Done Other Damage, But often seen; and as I found one Company of Men was not Sufficient to give Protection to so Extensive a fronteer, I Ordered to their Assistance one Lt and twenty-five men, and with The Whole of them it is as much as I can Get the fronteers Inhabitants Not to Break up. I will do Everything in My Power to give Sattisfaction to the fronteers and Not to let them Move from their Statione. I Have appointed John Deniston Contractor for the Westmoreland County Militia, and is to see him Paid Eight Pence Pr Ration on the account of the Stations being so small. I expect you will order the Expenses to be Paid to William Findley, Esq'r, as my Charecter Is At Stake for the Punctual Payment of the men and provisions. . . ."

But not only was the government of Pennsylvania appealed to for assistance by the foremost men of the western counties of the State, but the government of the United States as well. On the 10th of March, 1791, the Secretary of War, Gen. Knox, inclosed a letter from his department to the lieutenants of Washington, Allegheny, and Westmoreland Counties, in which he informed them that the President of the United States authorized them to embody, at the expense of the United States, as many of the militia as was necessary for the defensive protection of the respective counties. The rangers to be called into service in pursuance of that authority were to be upon the same establishment of pay and rations as the troops of the United States.

In December of 1791 the inhabitants of Westmoreland, Washington, Fayette, and Allegheny Counties, through their regularly appointed committees, presented a memorial to the Governor of the State, Col. Charles Campbell, and John Young, Esq., signing on behalf of the county of Westmoreland. In this paper they laid before the Governor an extended statement of the condition of these frontiers, and stated what occurred to them to be the most speedy and effectual mode of preparation for any emergency. They conceived that eight hundred efficient men, under experienced officers, good partisans, and armed with rifles, were not too many when the extent of the frontier was considered. They also asked for a quantity of arms and ammunition to be distributed among the county lieutenants.¹

As it was not possible to get enough men to volunteer, either in the service of the State or of the United States, to go beyond the confines of their own immediate settlement, the draft was enforced under the act of Assembly, and those drafted during the summer and fall of 1791 were put to garrison duty in the block-houses and stations along the Allegheny River. The rangers, or the militia of the State in service and under pay, were changed from time to time, but these for the most part were inside the lines of the more remote frontier, which was guarded, as we said, by the drafted militia.

The outpost duty forced upon the Westmorelanders was not at all attractive, and their officers found many reasons to offer the authorities of the State on the side of the county as against those who thought the frontier of the State able to take care of itself. Col. Charles Campbell, in his uncouth manner of expression, spoke out in language which, although not classically elegant, or even strictly grammatical, was filled with good common sense. In a letter to Governor Mifflin, in January, 1792, he says,—

"So I have still to Keep out some men to Guard, Whitch is Very Distringing to Our County to Guard It self and Stand As a Barrier for the Interior Parts of the State, when we Were Always Willing to give Our Assistance wheu required. In the time of the Late War With England our Militia Marched into the State of the Jersey to Assist Our fellow Citizens when In distress, And I would be Of the Opinion We have the Same Undoubted Right from those of Our Own State At least."¹

¹ Pa. Arch., Second Series, iv. 672.

Under the act to provide for the immediate defense of the frontier, the general militia law in some respects was suspended, and instead of drafting in classes from the militia, experienced and active riflemen, wherever they could be obtained, were enlisted, and the officers to command them were appointed immediately by the Governor. They were enlisted for six months instead of two, and the pay was liberally estimated by the price of labor, and not by the military allowance established for the troops of the Federal government as theretofore.

The time of this service began on the 1st of March, 1772. Three companies of these ranging riflemen were engaged, each company consisting of seventy-six men. Of these the third company was stationed at Kittanning, and was under the inspection and management of Col. Clement Biddle. John Guthrie was captain, William Cooper, lieutenant, Samuel Murphy, ensign, all of Westmoreland.

Maj. George McCully, in a letter to Col. Biddle, dated at Greensburg, 31st of March, 1792, says,—

"Capt. Paul, with a beautiful company, marched from Pittsburgh on Wednesday, the 28th, to cover the southwest frontier of Washington County.

"Capt. Smith with his company (wanting six privates) are over the Alleganey, scouting with as many as are armed. I cannot send them to their stations until the camp equipage arrives. Ensign Murphy marched on Thursday, 29th, with twenty-eight men of Capt. Guthrie's company, completely armed, to join some who had been sent out before to cover the frontiers of Westmoreland County.

"I am now at Greensburg, on my way to the frontiers of Westmoreland, and shall hurry Capt. Guthrie out with the remainder of his company, with all possible haste."

In the summer of 1792 these troops, regularly officered and under the appointment of the State, were divided into eight parties or stations, and placed at proper distances on the frontier. A garrison was kept up at Fort Crawford, at the mouth of Puckety Creek, and part of Capt. Guthrie's men were there.

In May a party of Indians, about forty in number, attacked Reed's Station, on the Allegheny River, about four miles below the Kiskiminetas. They killed one man and a child, wounded a soldier of McCully's corps, and took a woman and some children prisoners. Ensign Murphy was stationed near that spot.²

On the 22d of May a party came upon William Cooper's station, near the mouth of the Kiskiminetas, and attacked it. They killed one man and wounded one. They did not stay any longer than to take or murder a family within about three hundred yards of the block-house. They then penetrated into the settlement about fifteen miles and killed, wounded, and took prisoners about eleven persons, took about thirty horses, and burned a number of houses. They stayed in the settlement five or six days.³

It was in this raid that the Harbison family were taken. These Indians kept the course of the Kiskiminetas, separating into small squads of five and seven. Many narrow escapes were made from them. At one plantation as far up as above the mouth of the Loyalhanna, they went boldly to the stable and fields and took out horses, killing one which proved unruly, and took off the rest without disturbing the family, who were trembling within.⁴

William Findley, in a letter to Secretary Dallas at that time, says,—

"Hannastown is now the frontier, and they have erected block-houses at Greensburg. Denison's (New Alexandria) is the frontier. You will perceive by the map that Westmoreland is now desolate to near the centre, and the rest much disturbed."

In a letter of a few days later date, he says that

"Col. Pomeroy, one of the best and trustiest officers on this side of the mountain, is now out with six companies of militia. The Indians have improved in the art of eluding pursuit; they always separate after doing mischief, and go two-and-two in every direction, keeping generally to the dry ridges, and at this season the woods are very close, and the country is very broken. A few mornings since the beds of two were found in a meadow near Loyalhanna, the dew not being off; they were trailed to a dry ridge. I am just now informed that a child is found scalped and a number of horses missing six or eight miles within the settlement, north of Conemaugh."

Enough has been produced from the records and from responsible individuals to make a presentation of the times to the reader. These things occurred between the time of St. Clair's defeat and the successful expedition of Gen. Wayne. The government of the United States, with the co-operation and assistance of the militia forces of Kentucky and the Northwestern Territory, were busily arranging for this campaign, and when Wayne began his operations the Indians, partly through necessity and partly by the concentrated and well-organized force which danger had succeeded in establishing and made effectual, were compelled to desert the borders of Pennsylvania, and gather to the villages of the confederate tribes in Northern Ohio. After Wayne's victory they were heard of no more in Westmoreland.

Here belongs a few narratives, the last of the "adventurous age" of American history, with which we close the individual incidents of Indian warfare with our settlers of Westmoreland.

About the year 1792 a party of Cornplanters which had penetrated into the settlement past the outposts while most of the frontiersmen were out and had left their homes unguarded, came down as far as the lower part of Derry township next to the Loyalhanna. It was long currently reported in that neighborhood among the descendants of the old settlers that this party first came to a man by the name of Cleckhorn; that Cleckhorn, in order to save his own life, told them of the defenseless family of Mitchell; that he saved his life by so doing; and that afterwards, when this thing came to be known to the others, he lived a miserable life amongst them, and finally was com-

¹ Penn. Arch., Second Series, iv. 689.

² Presley Neville to Governor Mifflin.—Archives, iv. 720.

³ Col. Campbell to Governor Mifflin.

⁴ William Findley to Secretary Dallas, June 1, 1792.

pelled to sell his place and remove from there to the West, where he died. We pass over this charge and will relate what is known as a matter of fact concerning the escape of Susan Mitchell, the captivity of Charles, and the death of their mother.

The Mitchell family lived on the bank of the Loy-ahanna, neighbors to Capt. John Sloan and the Allisons. Their clearing was about two miles east of now Latrobe, and on the Ligonier Valley Railroad. The family were among the first settlers, having taken up their land before 1773. The father of the house was dead, and the mother with her two children still lived on the farm. On the morning the party of Indians came in the boy and girl were in the stable-loft together. The Indians were attracted to them, but the young ones somehow had knowledge of their coming soon after they were in sight, for the boy attempted to escape. He ran from the stable towards the creek in order to cross it. The lad was about seventeen years of age. The Indians, of whom there were possibly three or four, all ran after him and caught him. While they were in pursuit of him Susan, the sister, who remained in the stable, came down out of the loft, got into the horse-stall, and hid herself by crawling under a large trough used for feeding the horses in. She lay very still, and although the Indians searched for her they did not find her. They went to the house where Mrs. Mitchell was and took her along.

They began their journey back, such being their way when a party like this one had secured a couple of prisoners or scalps at a dash. They had not traveled any great distance and before night set in until they found that Mrs. Mitchell was unable to keep up with them, and scarcely fit to travel in their way at all over the rough ground. They could not leave her alive, that was plain; so a couple of them fell back with her, and the rest went on with Charles. The party ahead soon after this stopped for the evening and kindled a fire. While they were here the others who had loitered behind came up, and one of them had with him the scalp of the murdered woman. He proceeded to stretch it out on a bow made for the purpose, and to dry it over the fire in the presence of the boy, but without discovering any sign of concern. The party together proceeded northward, and nothing worthy of notice occurred till they came to the Mahoning Creek in Armstrong County, where they struck the tracks of two white men at where their course led across a low, wet swampy piece of ground. The tracks of the men before them led off to one side on a ridge. Charles Mitchell and the Indian who was with him saw the two men at a distance, and the boy recognized them. The one was Capt. John Sloan, and the other was Harry Hill, both of them from the same neighborhood he was from. There was at the time light, sticky snow on the ground, and Capt. Sloan, who was a large man, left a big track with his moccasins. It was, indeed, so big that it was a matter of astonishment for the natives. One of them pulled out his ramrod and measured it in length and in width, and when he had done so he exclaimed, with a broad grin on his heroic countenance, "Great sawarick! great sawarick!" by which we suppose he meant something like "great warrior." "Yes," said Mitchell, "that is the big Capt. Sloan, the great Indian-fighter." The crafty and cowardly wretches were by this prevented from making an attempt to capture these or to fight with them, for they avoided the tracks and did not follow them along the hillside. When Sloan and Hill themselves came down off the ridge to the river, they in their turn came upon the tracks of the party which preceded them, and saw among them the tracks of the white boy, their prisoner. They talked over the prospect of success if they should get to the front of the gang and waylay them, as they were unsuspected. They would have attempted this had it been only a matter of safety to themselves, but they were apprehensive of the fate of the captive should their attack be unsuccessful.

Mitchell was taken to the town of the Cornplanters, and was adopted among them by a squaw, who took him in place of her son lost in the war. This woman he called mother, and following their customs from necessity, he obeyed her. He remained with them and subject to her order for some three years. He helped the squaws to do their work, which specially was to hoe the corn and gather it in. He afterwards complained that they sometimes worked too late, frequently after nightfall; and although they all did so, his adopted mother always made him hoe one more row before he quit. At the end of his three years' apprenticeship he was either exchanged or liberated, when he returned to his home, settled on the old farm, married, and raised a respectable family. Although he endured great hardships and saw many horrid things among them, and especially the dreadful death of his mother, which never possibly could have passed from his mind, yet he, like Harman, could never be prevailed upon to speak ill-favoredly of them, nor could he tolerate any one else in so doing.¹

The captivity and the incidental sufferings of Massy Harbisou, who was taken prisoner after St. Clair's defeat, and who resided at that time within the county, was so popular with those who danced our infancy upon their knees that almost every one versed in the Indian lore of the West recollects something of it. Some information regarding the condition of the outer settlers, the location and the instincts of the Indians who infested our northern woods at that time, may be gotten from her account, which we have elsewhere given.

¹ Mitchell used to relate, among other things, of the novel manner the Indians had of crossing the Susquehanna when they came to it and found it uncomfortably or dangerously high. They got a long pole or sapling, and this they rested upon their shoulders and held to it with their hands. Two of their strongest, and presumably their surest-footed, were at the two ends; and it is readily seen that the common safety would thus be reasonably assured.

To this time, too, are referable some instances of murders and captivities in Ligonier Valley, and in the region of the Black Lick, in Indiana County, preserved among their lares and penates.

As applicable at this place we may bring in the adventures of some Westmorelanders in the far West. Both instances show of what mettle the men were of, and both instances are as fully authentic as the best attested ones of their class.

In the fall of 1795, Capt. John Sloan, his nephew, John Wallace, and two others, named Hunt and Knott, all hardy young men and fond of adventure, formed themselves into a company to explore part of the western country, and to make a tour of observation. They were neighbors, as it went then, and lived near the Loyalhanna, in Derry township. They set out after some preparation, taking with them two horses and some provisions; and when their store of provisions became lighter, they walked and rode time about. They had a strong desire to see the Miami country, of which there was so much talk, and went direct for Fort Washington, the site of Cincinnati. That region from this point was a journey of some days farther to the northwest. They proceeded, however, and encamped at night on the banks of the Big Maumee. The next morning they continued on. As they took their turn at riding, it was now Knott and Sloan's time to ride. These were upon the horses when they were fired upon by a large party of Indians who were hid in the path. Knott fell from his horse dead. Sloan was shot through the left side, a ball also going through his shot-pouch. Hunt and Wallace ran for their lives, but Hunt was taken by them without getting off. Wallace was pursued by the pack, but he kept ahead of them till, running at full speed, he tripped on a root and fell headlong, when his gun slipped from his grasp. Sloan had secured the horse from which Knott fell, and notwithstanding his severe wound, still kept upon his own. When Wallace regained his feet he called to his uncle not to leave him. Sloan waited on him. When he came up he tried to get up on the horse's back, but was so exhausted that he fell back. His uncle, Sloan, then took his gun, and holding it and the horse's head, waited till Wallace climbed up. By this the Indians were close upon them. The horses under the excitement galloped off on the trail, and soon left the Indians behind. Then, after they were on their way, Sloan, "like another Lancelot," noticed the blood trickling from his wound down his horse's side. They headed for Fort Washington, which they wished by all means to reach, but they knew of Fort Hamilton, which was somewhat off their way, but between them and the former. Besides this, Sloan said they felt in duty bound to stop there and warn the garrison. They directed their way thither, and in no long time entered this fort. There they stayed that night and related their adventure.

But they were especially anxious to get to Fort

Washington, where medical assistance could be obtained for Sloan. The next morning they were to start, but on opening the gates they saw that the fort was surrounded by Indians. There were said to be many hundreds of them there. At that time there was but a very small and inefficient garrison at this post, there being in all only twenty men, women, and children, while their commandant was a young and inexperienced officer. The Indians, knowing the feeble state of the garrison, and presuming that no defense could be successfully made, demanded their surrender. The officer in command said to Sloan that he could not hold the fort, and told Sloan that if he thought he could make a defense to take command and do what he thought best.

Sloan then, having thus been empowered to talk on the subject, went up to the top of the fort and engaged in a conversation with their leader. He talked by the medium of an interpreter. Close beside the interpreter stood Hunt, the companion of Sloan, who had been taken the day before, and he, too, pleaded with Sloan to give up the fort, for the reason understood that if the Indians did not accomplish their object their prisoner would be tortured. But Sloan told them a nice story of how they had plenty of provisions and ammunition, and how they would soon have a reinforcement to join them, assuring them at the end that they did not propose to surrender at all, but to fight. Then he stepped down.

The next moment they all fired, and the Indians set up their war-whoop, a sign of no quarter. The firing continued all day, but without any effect, for the Indians kept at a good distance, and the whites were well protected. At night an attempt was made to fire the fort, but it was not successful. There was a stable at some distance, where the horses were kept and near which the cattle were fed. During the siege an Indian took Sloan's horse from here, and putting on his head the cocked hat which Sloan had lost the day before he rode in a circle around the fort far enough away to be out of danger, and when the Indians went off they took all the horses with them, and what cattle they had not killed and eaten they shot and left lying.

During the fight an Indian got pretty close to the fort by keeping under the shelter of a corn-crib, where, remaining under cover, he kept up a vigorous fire whenever he saw anything to shoot at. Sloan watched this one attentively. He himself had taken a position near a port-hole, and as his side was troublesome he had a man to load the gun and pass it to him as he needed it. It was at length apparent that the Indian wanted to retire. To accomplish this he pushed betimes the muzzle of his gun beyond the covering, that some one expecting him to show himself would fire at him. Sloan fired; the Indian, as it was expected he would, jumped out, but by this time Sloan had his other gun ready which he also fired, when the Indian fell over dead. This one was too close to the fort to be taken away by the rest, and he was left lying there. All the hostiles finally withdrew, either fearful of reinforcements coming up from the other posts or led away with some other object in view. When they had gone Capt. Sloan went to the Indian whom he had shot, and finding in his belt a scalping-knife he lifted the Indian's scalp. His hair was strung full of beads. Hunt, their companion, was never heard of. Sloan and Wallace, after remaining at Fort Washington, whither they went, for a time, returned home.¹

PRESQUE ISLE.

On the 28th of February, 1794, the Legislature passed an act for raising soldiers for the defense of the river Delaware and of the western frontiers. At the same time efforts were made towards the laying out of a town at Presque Isle, in order to facilitate and promote the settlement with the commonwealth, and to afford additional security to the frontiers.

Prior to this Governor Mifflin had sent to Capt. Ebenezer Denny a commission, giving him the command of the Allegheny company ordered to protect William Irvine, Andrew Ellicott, and Albert Gallatin, who had been appointed commissioners to lay out the town; for the same object a post had been established at Le Bœuf. But the English were fixed in their opposition to the opening of the road to Presque Isle, and instigated the Indians to resist the attempt.

On the 24th of May, Governor Mifflin applied to the President to order out one thousand militia from the western brigades, raised for the frontier defense, to support the commissioners who were authorized to lay out the towns. The brigade inspectors of Westmoreland, Washington, Allegheny, and Fayette accordingly made a draft for that number to co-operate with Capt. Denny's detachment under command of Gen. Wilkins.

Although active preparations were made for carrying out the intentions of the Legislature, an act was subsequently passed to suspend the laying out of a town at Presque Isle, and it was not until the 18th of April, 1795, that all difficulties removed, the same body authorized the laying out of the towns at Le Bœuf, at the mouth of the Conewago Creek, at the mouth of the French Creek, and at Presque Isle.

The Indians having taken up the hatchet again, made some dashes upon the exposed settlers along the rivers. We have in the notes attached given sufficient data for this matter, and need not further advert to the subject here.²

¹ This is from the account given by Capt. Sloan's son, John Sloan, Jr., to Rev. Sharrad, of Steubenville, Ohio, in 1871. Capt. Sloan did not remain in the West, but came back, and was subsequently elected sheriff of this county. He suffered from his wound till he died. He produced this scalp on many public occasions, and I have seen persons who saw it on such occasions. (See local history of Derry township.)

² Charles Campbell to Governor Mifflin.

"GREENSBURG, June 5, 1794.

"SIR,—I Received your Letter of the 24th of May, in Regards of stopping of the draught for the Support of Presqu'Isle Station, which

These Indian troubles were the last in which the frontier settlers of our county were engaged; and these were borne mostly by those along our northern line, or of that part which is of Armstrong and Northern Indiana. Along the Ohio below Pittsburgh, and along the Allegheny County line, the people in this seemeth much to alarm the fronteers of our county, as it discovers to the Indians that we are not able to Maintain that Post. The thirtieth of May the Indians fired on A Cannoe in the Allegany River between the Mouth of Kiscuminitus River and the Cattanian: Killed one man and wounded Two. The evening of the same day, they fired on A Boat that Left my Place to go to Keaintuckey, about Two Miles Below the falls of the Kiscuminitus, Killed three Persons and wounded one, which was all the men that was in the Boat. The Boat then Drifted Down the River till About Twelve Miles above Pittsburgh with the wounded man and the women and Children, when they were seen By some Persons who went to their assistance, and Took the Boat to Pittsburgh. The fronteers seemed to be Much Allarmed at Such unexpected News and the Signs of Indians seen on the fronteers. I Consulted with General Jack, and we Agreed to Order Captain Elliot, of the Rifle Company, on the fronteers, until Sutch Times as I could get An Account from you, to Know if would meet with your aprebation, as it will Be Impossible to keep the fronteers from Breaking unless Being well supported; and if once the one that now makes the Stand Breakes, I Believe it will be Hard to get Any other to stand as well, as it will give so much Encouragement to the enemy, as it Cannot Be Expected that the friendship of the Six Nations will now be Confided in. I Could wish to do Everything in my power for the Benefit of the Publick and the safety of the fronteers. I Remain your Obedient Humble Serv't,

"CHAS. CAMPBELL."

Gen. William Jack to Governor Mifflin.

"GREENSBURG, June 6, 1794.

"SIR,—I beg leave to lay before you a statement of the information I have received of the hostile disposition manifested by the Indians on our Frontiers.

"On Friday last, in the morning of the same day, a canoe was fired on above the mouth of Kiskiminetas, in the Allegheny River, by which one man was killed and two wounded. On the same day, in the evening, Capt. Sharp's Boat was attacked in the Kiskeminetas River, near to Chamber's Station (having just set off for Kentucky), by a party of Indians, supposed to be twelve in number. There was but three men and one boy with the boat when Attacked, and the savages kept up a constant fire on the boat while she kept drifting down the river. It appears that one man and a boy was killed, one made his escape, and Capt. Sharp supposed to be mortally wounded. The boat, with some women and a number of children, miraculously got to Pittsburgh. By a letter just received from Colonel Charles Campbell, he informs me that the Spies had made a discovery of a large trail of Indians on Pine Creek, above the Kittanning, who appear'd by the track to be making for the settlement. By another discovery of the Spies, it appears that three Canoes, with six or seven Indians in each, has crossed the Allegheny River at the mouth of Puckety, in consequence of which the settlement of Pine Run is broken up, And a very general alarm excited on the frontiers.

"Several parties have turned out voluntarily to intercept the enemy if possible, and for the security of the frontiers, but as these are not regular Drafts, it is not to be expected they will remain out more than a few days. There is great reason to believe the Indians are of the Six Nations, and that the frontiers will of course continue to be constantly harrassed. By the best information, it appears that many, even of the frontier Inhabitants are destitute both of Arms and Ammunition, and that a supply at this place would prove extremely useful for the use of such as turn out on occasional Scouts.

"Waiting your pleasure and Direction in the premises, I remain your Excellency's

"Very Humble Servt.

"WM. JACK.

"HIS EXCELLENCY THOMAS MIFFLIN, ESQUIRE."

For the Westmoreland Company to operate with Capt. Denny, John Sloan was captain, John Craig lieutenant, and James McComb ensign, by commission from the Governor. James McComb resigned, and Stephen Mehaffy was commissioned in his stead, on the recommendation of Charles Campbell, then brigade inspector of Westmoreland.

latter disturbance as in the former war were in great affliction and dread. There were some reprisals made, prisoners were taken, and children kidnapped even in the extreme lower end of Ligonier Valley, but such things were only possible at a time when they were not looked for. The inhabitants of Central and Southern Westmoreland were comparatively safe, and were at peace sufficiently to countenance those who in Washington and Fayette about this time were evading the payment of the excise on whiskey, and banding together to tar and feather the collectors of the revenue. This civil commotion will be the subject of some succeeding remarks.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE WHISKEY INSURRECTION.

Excise—Hatred of the Scotch and Irish for this Law—Insquality of the Tax—Effort made by the State to Collect the State Excise in 1785—"The Devil" comes for Collector Graham at Greensburg—Act of Congress levying a Tax on Distilled Spirits—Regulations made for its Collection—First Meeting in Opposition to this Law—Johnson, the Collector for Allegheny and Washington, tarred and feathered—No Place for Officers to be had in Westmoreland and Washington in 1792—Office opened at Greensburg and abandoned—Meeting held at Pittsburgh in 1792—President Washington issues a Proclamation—Wells, Collector for Fayette and Westmoreland, attacked in his House—He opens an Office in Philip Reagen's House in 1794—His Son and Reagen fortify the Premises—They are besieged by a Large Party—They capitulate—Capt. Webster, Excise Officer for Somerset, taken and compelled to give up his Commission—Government Officers serve Process upon Delinquent Distillers—Nevills and the Marshal driven away after serving the Writ on one Miller, near Peters Creek—A Party demand the surrender of Neville's Papers—Nevills's House defended by a Party of United States Soldiers, who fire upon the Mob—Their Commandr, Macfarlane, is killed—The Excitement increases—Gathering of the Rabble and Militia at Braddock's Field—They want to attack and burn out the Government Officers and the Friends of Law—Brackenridge prevails upon them to cross the River—The next Day they disperse—Volunteers and Regulars called out by the President—Commissioners appointed to go to the Scene of the Trouble—The Army at Carlisle—Commissioners appointed by the Delegates at Parkinson's Ferry confer with the President—Commissioners on both sides hold a Conference—Committees meet at Redstone—The Committees pass a resolve to take the sense of the People on the question of submission to the Laws upon the Terms proposed by the United States Commissioners—The Returns Unsatisfactory—The President orders the Army over the Mountains—Change in the Sentiments of the People—Meeting held all over the Country—Report of the Meeting held at Greensburg—Resolutions—The People subscribe anew to the Tests—The Army withdrawn—Trial of the Offenders—Effects of the Insurrection on Westmoreland—Biographical Sketches of Participants and Documents bearing on this Insurrection.

THE sedition known in history as the Whiskey Insurrection in the four western counties is of such a universal character as to be precluded, in itself, from a local history, and the only business we have in considering it is to localize it, touching upon the connection the people of Westmoreland had therewith. In attempting, however, to do so we must outline it, and notice its origin, its character, and its termination. Of the four counties in which this sedition held its sway, the one which was the last in it, and was perhaps ultimately benefited the most, was ours.

Excise, so odious to the English people both on the islands and in America, differs from any other species of raising tax-money or revenue in this, that while direct tax is upon land and landed property, and tariff is an import duty exacted on foreign importations, the excise is a specific form of taxation levied upon the products of domestic manufacture, and collected either at the place where the product is produced or where it is first exposed on sale. Thus from necessity its collection demands a system of surveillance and of espionage on the labor and industries of the people, and it was considered among the peasantry of Scotland, long before the time of Burns, that to kill an exciseman was such a noble deed as would cover a multitude of sins.¹

If the Scotch and Irish brought anything with them to this country, it was a hatred of the excise system of England. Brackenridge, under the guise of satire, has pointedly presented the cause of some of the political troubles which, towards the close of the last century, agitated Western Pennsylvania. He has summarized many instances where the antipathy against institutions of the mother-country are to be traced to their source in Britain herself. Thus the prejudice against the excise tax was a prejudice which had been engendered in Ireland and in Scotland, and which, through many causes, not only from oppression, but from bigotry, ignorance, and obstinacy, drew the people along openly to resist the collection of the revenue.

This region, as we have noted, was specially adapted to the production of grain, and there was at that time nothing produced which was marketable but ginseng, beeswax, snake-root, and whiskey. It is true that some trappers on the Laurel Hill could, by living on mush and milk and bear-meat, get something of a revenue from wolf-scalps, but what was marketable had to be taken over the mountains or two thousand miles down the rivers. The inequality of this excise tax was apparent. Judge Veech puts it thus: that while improved land in Westmoreland could be assessed at five dollars per acre, and in Lancaster at fifty dollars per acre, a percentage of taxation might be fair, but a tax of seven cents per gallon on whiskey made on Chartiers was one-fourth its value, while if made on the banks of the Brandywine it was perhaps less than one-eighth its value. William Findley, a man of eminent sagacity, in a letter to Governor Mifflin in November, 1792, says plainly that the injustice of being obliged to pay as much excise out of two shillings, with difficulty procured, as other citizens better situated have to pay out of perhaps three times that sum, much easier obtained, comes home to the understanding of those who cannot comprehend theories.

Under the confederation the appropriation of Pennsylvania for the allowance to the army, under an act of Congress of 1780, remaining unpaid, an effort was made about 1785 to collect some of the fund still remaining unpaid out of her excise law of 1772. The execution of such laws had met with violent combinations among the inhabitants of neighboring States, and the Pennsylvania law met with great opposition, especially west of the Alleghenies, and there is no evidence that the excise law was ever paid in that section. The excise tax not being collected, gave occasion to the eastern part to grumble, for in June, 1785, a collector by the name of Graham was sent out. With much trouble he collected some in Fayette County, and a little in Westmoreland. But when he was in his hotel at Greensburg, in the darkness of the night, he was called to the door by a man in disguise, who stated to him that he was "Beelzebub, the Prince of Devils," and that he had called for him to hand him over to a legion of lesser devils who were outside awaiting. With some assistance he managed to escape their clutches. He tried to prosecute a man of the town, in whom he thought he recognized the "devil," but the man proved an alibi. Thence he passed over into Washington County, where he fared worse. His pistols were taken and broken in pieces before his face, his commission and papers were thrown in the mud and trampled upon, and he himself forced to tread upon them. They clipped off the hair from the one side of his head, cut off the cockade of his hat, reversed it, shaved his horse's tail, and thus, in the midst of an increasing crowd, started him towards the county line. As they proceeded they called on all the still-houses by the way and treated him gratis. On the border of Westmoreland he was allowed to go free, with many threats if he returned.

¹ See Burns' poem, "The devil danced away wi' the Exciseman."

This State law was repealed, and the people scarcely looked for it again, but in 1791, Congress passed a law levying a tax of four pence per gallon on all distilled spirits. The members from Western Pennsylvania—Smiley, from Fayette, and Findley, from Westmoreland—stoutly opposed it. They knew the feelings of their constituents in this matter. With them they had consulted, and they but expressed the unanimous sentiments of their people, and upon their return were heartily indorsed. Albert Gallatin, who was evidently impressed with the grievance, also opposed it with all his influence. After the law was passed it was with some difficulty that any one could be found willing to accept the office of inspector in the western district, the measure was so unpopular.¹

But suitable regulations were made to secure the collection of the revenue. The districts were apportioned, and inspectors appointed for each. The distiller was to furnish at the nearest office a description of his buildings, which were always subject to examination for the purpose of official visitation.

The first public meeting in opposition to the enforcement of the excise law was held at Redstone, July 27, 1791. Then and there it was agreed that county committees should meet at the county-seats of the four counties of Fayette, Allegheny, Westmoreland, and Washington. On the 23d of August the committee of Washington County passed some resolutions and published them in the Pittsburgh Gazette to the effect that "Any person who had accepted or might accept an office under Congress, in order to carry the law into effect, should be considered inimical to the interests of the country."

It also recommended to the citizens of Washington County to treat every person accepting such office with contempt, and absolutely to refuse all kind of communication or intercourse with him, and to withhold from him all aid, support, or comfort.

Delegates from the four counties met at Pittsburgh on the 7th of September, 1791, and passed severe resolutions against the law. The character of the men who countenanced these measures and who were at the head encouraged the rest, and from this mutual co-operation the uprising was spontaneous and general.

Benjamin Wells, of Fayette County, was the collector for the counties of Westmoreland and Fayette, and Robert Johnson, of Allegheny, for Washington and Allegheny. There was no inspector for either Westmoreland or Washington. Wells, according to the character given him by Addison, was a contemptible and unworthy man, whom the people of the county would not wish to see in any office of trust. Johnson was said to be an honest man, of inoffensive manner and good nature. Johnson's office was about nine miles southwest of Pittsburgh. Wells' office was at his residence, nearly opposite Connellsville, on the southern bank of the Youghiogheny. These were the only two offices prior to June, 1792.

On the 6th of September, 1791, a party armed and disguised waylaid Johnson near Pigeon Creek, in Washington County, tarred and feathered him, cut off his hair, and took away his horse, leaving him to travel on foot in that condition. The man sent by the marshal with process against the presumed offenders was seized, whipped, tarred, and feathered, his money and horse were taken from him, and he was blindfolded and tied in the woods, where he remained five hours.

In May, 1792, some material modification was made in the law. The rates were lowered a little, and distillers were allowed to take and pay for monthly instead of yearly licenses, but the penalty for non-entry was raised from one hundred to two hundred and fifty dollars.

All efforts to get places for offices during the year 1792 in Westmoreland and Washington were unsuccessful. Wells undertook, in June, 1792, to have an office at Greensburg, and another at Uniontown. The one at Greensburg was soon abandoned, without much business having been done at it. Neither did he attend at Uniontown, so the distillers, presuming that he did not mean business, after waiting for him, went home. For a while all was quiet in the "survey," the name by which the district was known to the internal revenue department. Some distillers near the designated places for entering had of their own free will entered their stills, and some quit the business. But there being no offices in two of the largest counties of the survey, perhaps two-thirds of the distilleries were exempt from taxation. The people of the Washington County region who chose not to return their stills shipped their product off by way of the Ohio, but the Youghiogheny and Monongahela borders were under surveillance.¹

¹ Act 3d March, 1791. The tax was reduced, and the terms considerably modified by the law to take effect with the fiscal year of 1794.

On the 21st of August, 1792, a meeting composed of some of the most influential men of that day in all Western Pennsylvania was held at Pittsburgh, in which were passed resolutions in which they expressed it to be their duty to persist in their remonstrance to Congress, and in any other legal measure to obstruct the operation of the law, and a committee of correspondence was appointed to correspond with other committees all through the different counties. On Sept. 15, 1792, President Washington issued his proclamation exhorting and admonishing all to desist and refrain from all unlawful combinations and proceedings tending to obstruct the laws.

The time for entering the stills was fixed for the month of June of each year. The month of entry for 1793 was approaching, and the question was to get offices and officers. The inspector gave notice on the 1st of June in the Gazette that offices for entries were opened at his own house; at the house of Johnson, in Allegheny; at Benjamin Wells' house, in Fayette; and at Philip Reagan's house, in Westmoreland. Secretary Hamilton, in his report, which has been the text for many historians, says that he was unable up to 1794 to establish any office in Westmoreland and Washington, and it is to be inferred that Philip Reagan's house was not used till the time the officer sat there to enter the stills in the following year, 1794.

This man Wells stuck to his collectorship with as much pertinacity as the gentleman of the same name stuck to the destiny of the returning board down in Louisiana. He was publicly insulted and abused whenever he made his appearance, and even at times, while he was away from home, his family were annoyed and exposed to bodily fear. In April, 1792, a party in disguise attacked his house in the night, he being away, and threatened, terrified, and abused his family. On the 22d of November they again attacked his house in the night, compelled him to surrender his commission and hooks, and required him to publish a resignation of his office in the papers within two weeks, under penalty of having his house burned.

In June, 1794, John Wells, a son of Benjamin Wells, and deputy collector for Westmoreland, opened an office at a private house which he had secured previously. This office was in the half-part of a double log house owned by Philip Reagan near the Big Sewickley. Wells put this branch office under the care of this son, John Wells, and Philip Reagan himself. These men appear to have been of some courage, and they knew full well the feeling of the community, and what might be expected. They therefore converted the house into an old-time hlock-house, with port-holes and door and windows which could be closed. They also secured a number of men and a supply of arms. During the month of June they withstood several night attacks, one from a very numerous body of armed people. The party outside fired upon the house for some time, and the firing was vigorously returned from those inside. It is not known that any injury was done on either side. The besieging party then set fire to Reagan's barn, which they burned, and then they withdrew. In the course of a day or two one hundred and fifty men returned to renew the attack. The two parties parleyed for a while, when Reagan proposed to capitulate provided they gave him honorable terms and assurances that they would not molest his person or destroy his property. He promised to give up his commission and never again to act as exciseman. These stipulations were agreed to and put in writing. Reagan then came out and treated them with a keg of whiskey. After some of them had got drunk they said that he had got off too easily, and that he should be set up as a target and shot at. Others were for giving him a coat of tar and feathers; but others saying that he should be allowed to go unmolested because he had behaved as a man, gave occasion for a fight which took place among themselves. After this it was proposed and carried that Reagan should be court-martialed, and that they should go right away to Benjamin Wells' office, in Fayette County, and catch him and try him and Reagan together. They then set out to accomplish what had been proposed, but when they arrived at Wells' house he was not there. They set fire to it and burned it to the ground with all its contents. They left a party to watch in ambush till Wells returned, and then to capture him. During the night Reagan escaped, and Wells being very submissive and the potent effects of their dehauch having passed away, they let him off.

The next attack was made on Capt. Webster, the excise officer for Somerset County, by a company of about one hundred and fifty men from Westmoreland. They took his commission from him, and made him promise never to act again as collector of excise. Taking him with them for a few miles, during which time he was submissive in the extreme, they made him, before releasing him, mount a stump and hurrah three times for "Tom the Tinker." This term, Tom the Tinker, had come into popular use to design-nate opposition to the excise, and it was assumed by the insurgents themselves. Brackenridge traces its origin to a certain John Holcroft, who made the first application of it at the attack on William Coughran, whose still was cut to pieces. This was called mending the still; the menders were tinkers, and the name in a collective sense became Tom the Tinker. Advertisements threatening prominent individuals, admonishing or commanding them, and signed by Tom the Tinker, were put upon trees and in conspicuous places, and menacing letters were sent over the same signature to the Gazette, with threats against the person of the editors if they dared refuse to publish them. At Braddock's Field the exclamations were, "Are you a Tom the Tinker's man?" and "Hurrah for Tom the Tinker."

¹ Veech, Sec. History.

The flame of this uprising spread with an infatuation almost incredible. For a time the voice of reason could not be heard, nor dared scarce be uttered.¹ The minister was only orthodox who took the side of the people, the lawyer was only popular who defended the rabble when accused, and no man of property felt himself safe if he knew of the least suspicion against him. The populace at first were instigated by such men as Gallatin, Findley, Smiley, Brackenridge, Cook, Young, Cannon, and Ross, and then led by such as Bradford and Holcroft.

In June, 1794, the excise law was amended by Congress. The people, however, desired its absolute repeal, and indeed demanded nothing short of it. It was therefore high time that the government should meet the sedition with some opposition. Indictments were found against a few as rioters, but they had the ablest lawyers at the bar of the Western circuit to defend them, and a jury who could not agree. At the same time process issued against a number of non-complying distillers in Fayette and Allegheny. The processes requiring the delinquent distillers to appear in court arrived in the West in mid-harvest. The District Court was held at Philadelphia. The marshal executed his process in Fayette, and in Allegheny he had served all but the last. In the company of Gen. Neville he went, on the 15th of July, 1794, to serve this writ on a distiller named Miller, near Peters Creek. This gave occasion for the first general outbreak. The appearance of Neville, whose official position had made him particularly obnoxious, incensed the men about the fields to such a degree that they, with arms in their hands, pursued the two men for a distance. One gun was fired, but with what intent is not known.

On the day when this occurred there was a military meeting at Mingo Creek for the purpose of drafting men to go against the Indians. This place was seven miles from the inspector's house. The report of the attack on the marshal and the inspector was carried to this meeting, and on the following day about thirty men appeared before the marshal's house and demanded the surrender of his papers. This was refused, and firing commenced. On a general discharge of guns from the negro quarters about the house, for they were all armed, some five or six of the insurgents were wounded, one of them mortally. Upon this the news spread that the blood of a citizen had been shed in the cause of the people, and a call was made on all who valued their lives or their liberty to assemble at the Mingo Creek meeting-house. Thereupon a large number assembled there. Three men among them were appointed to direct the expedition, and Maj. Macfarlane, an old Revolutionary officer, was chosen to command the armed force. A squad of United States soldiers had been sent out to protect Neville's house. The insurgents surrounded the house. Then a parley took place. They again demanded the surrender of Neville and his commissions. But Neville was not there. The women and children were allowed to withdraw from the house, and when this was done the firing began on both sides. When they had fired promiscuously for some time, Macfarlane, the commander of the insurgents, stepped out from behind a tree to confer with Maj. Kirkpatrick, who was in command of the regulars. He had no sooner done so than a ball struck him. He died immediately. The barn and the outhouses were set on fire, and Kirkpatrick and his men were allowed to retire.

The death of Macfarlane increased the excitement. The rabble could not go backward. The post-boy, carrying the United States mail, was waylaid by two men within a mile of Greensburg. The mail-bag was broken open and rifled of its contents. From the headquarters of the insurgents Bradford and others issued circular letters to the colonels of the several regiments, requesting them to assemble their commands at their place of rendezvous, fully equipped with arms, accoutrements, and provisions for four days. From here they were to march to Braddock's Field, so as to arrive there on Friday, the 1st of August. In many instances the order was promptly obeyed. Within three days a vast and excited crowd, numbering not far, as it is well reported, from sixteen thousand, was brought together. Many of the companies had arms. Some were there through inclination, some through fear and from necessity, some from curiosity. Bradford was chosen commander-in-chief, Edward Cook was one of the generals, and Col. Blakenay officer of the day. Bradford proposed to march for Pittsburgh, to take possession of the town, and wreak their vengeance upon such of their enemies as Neville, Gibson, Brison, and Kirkpatrick. When it was seen that it would be useless to oppose such leadership, Cook and Brackenridge (who was along) assented, and urged them to go there by all means. The rabble could not well resist the directions of Brackenridge; he was possessed of wonderful tact and volubility, was one of the first lawyers in the State, and had defended the ringleaders when they were arrested, without money and without charge. "Yes," said he, "let us go there by all means, if for nothing else just to show them that the strictest order can be observed by us; that we are not the rabble they take us for, but the people; that we are asserting our rights. We will do them no danger nor put them in fear. We will march through the town, take a turn, come out again upon the fields by the bank of the river, and after drinking a little whiskey with the inhabitants, who will gladly receive us, the troops will cross over to the other side of the river." A number of people met them before they came to the town, who treated them to drink, and soon after, by good management, the best part of the rabble were gotten across the river without going through the streets. But those that remained were still excited, and wanted to burn the houses of at least Neville and Gibson and a few others. Had this been done, there can be no doubt but that the whole of the town would have lain in ashes, and that blood would have flown as freely as whiskey. Cook, Marshall, and others in command exerted themselves in urging the men to retire, using persuasion and promises big in the eyes of men drunk and capricious. In the day no harm was done, but at night the barn of Maj. Kirkpatrick was burnt. The people of the town passed a night of uneasiness, but the next day the men were scattering off, and the danger was over.

¹ Findley's letter to Secretary Dallas.

Thus the sedition ripened into insurrection. We shall now follow up the course of the general government in its effort to maintain the law. When an account of these tumultuous proceedings reached the authorities of the nation and of the State, they were promptly considered by a mutual conference. Governor Mifflin on the 6th of August, 1794, appointed Chief Justice McKean and Gen. William Irvine to proceed to the West and ascertain the facts, and to present the will of the authorities as to those in opposition. On the 7th President Washington issued a proclamation commanding all persons being insurgents, on or before the first day of September, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes. He at the same time directed troops to be raised to be ready to march into the disaffected part at a moment's warning. The number of volunteers thus called out was fixed at twelve thousand nine hundred and fifty, apportioned among the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia. On the same day Governor Mifflin issued two proclamations, one directing the State quota to be speedily equipped and armed, and another calling the Assembly together in a special session. On the 8th of August the President appointed James Ross, Jasper Yates, and William Bradford to go forthwith into the Western District with full instructions and ample power to confer with such individuals or bodies as were approved or designated to represent those in revolt.

Of the army of volunteer militia and regulars raised under the proclamation of the President, Governor

Henry Lee, of Virginia, was put in command, while the Governors of the other States commanded the volunteers from their respective States.¹ The President, accompanied by the Secretary of War,² the Secretary of the Treasury, and Judge Peters, of the United States District Court for Pennsylvania, set out for Western Pennsylvania on the 1st of October. He joined the main body of the army at Carlisle. While here he held the conference with Redick and Findley, who reported to the meeting which they called together upon their return, and who, with the addition of Ephraim Douglass and Thomas Morton, were reappointed to confer with the President at Bedford. The President left Carlisle on the 11th of October; reached Chambersburg on the same day, and Williamsport on the 13th. From here he went to Fort Cumberland to review the left division of the army, consisting of the Maryland and Virginia volunteers. On the 19th of October he reached Bedford, where he remained two or three days. He came not farther west than Bedford, as has been erroneously reported, but from here returned to the capital, which he reached on the 28th.

A knowledge of the proceedings in the East had not yet reached the West when the meeting of the 14th of August, 1794, was called for at Parkinson's Ferry. This assemblage was composed of two hundred and sixty delegates from the western counties. Edward Cook was chairman, and Albert Gallatin, secretary. The meeting, after, as usual, protesting against the excise law and the enormity of taking inhabitants from their vicinage for trial, appointed committees with instructions as from the people. It was alleged soon after—and subsequent events appear to confirm the assertion—that many of these delegates had been sent with a view to counteract the seditious intentions of the tumultuous mob, and to gain by covert management what could not be accomplished by open opposition. Gallatin, Brackenridge, and James Edgar, an influential elder of the Presbyterian Church in Fayette County, took a prominent part in the discussions. The organic force of the insurrection was condensed into a committee of one from each township, sixty in all; and this committee was again represented by a standing committee of twelve.³ The committee of sixty was to meet at Redstone on

¹ From Judge Lobingier's Lecture before the Temperance Society at Mount Pleasant, 1842:

"The Pennsylvania and Jersey troops came up through Somerset and halted in three divisions on this side of the Chestnut Ridge. The advance came on to where this town [Mount Pleasant] now stands; the second division encamped on Col. Bonnet's farm, and the rear division remained at Lobingier's Mills. They remained in their encampments for the space of about eight days, during which time the cavalry, conducted by the excise officers, were out scouring the country in search of Whiskey Boys. But chiefly all those who had taken an active part in the late insurrectionary movements had either fled or secreted themselves, so that few could be found; I believe not more than one or two. That part of the army which lay in this neighborhood then struck their tents and marched to the Forks of Yough. Whilst there a few more of the insurgents were taken."

² Henry Knox and Alexander Hamilton.

³ See note, infra.

the 2d of September, and the standing committee was to meet any committee that had been or might be appointed by the government, and to report the result of their conference. During the sitting of this meeting the United States commissioners had arrived at Pittsburgh.

The commissioners for the State of Pennsylvania had also arrived at Pittsburgh on the 17th of August. On the 20th these, with the commissioners on the part of the general government, met the committee appointed at Parkinson's. At this conference it was concurrently advanced by both bodies of the legally authorized commissioners that the exercise of the powers vested in them to suspend prosecutions, to engage for a general pardon and oblivion of crimes, must be preceded by a full and satisfactory assurance of a sincere determination in the people to obey the laws of the United States. The committee, on the part of the people, presented their grievances, dwelling at this time principally upon the disadvantages of being sued in a remote court, before judges and jurors who were strangers, beyond the mountains, three hundred miles away from their homes and countrymen. But besides this every argument was advanced against the excise law.

The conference adjourned on the 28th of August to meet the committee at Redstone. There, after a two days' session, the propositions of the commissioners were finally recommended for acceptance by the people. Gallatin and Brackenridge spoke long and eloquently for law and order. Bradford spoke against both, but the votes were against him. Such was the fear of the popular frenzy, however, that it was difficult to get a vote at this meeting. No one would vote by standing up. They would not write yea or nay for fear the handwriting might be discovered. At last an expedient was devised. The words "yea" and "nay" were written by the secretary on the same piece of paper, and the pieces of paper were distributed among the members. Each of the members could thus chew up or destroy the part he had torn off, while he put the other in the box. This resulted in the appointment of another committee to confer with the commissioners, and who were also empowered throughout the several counties to make known the day upon which the sense of the people was expected to be taken upon the question, "Whether the people would submit to the laws of the United States upon the terms proposed by the commissioners of the United States?"

This test of submission was to be signed individually by the citizens throughout the western counties on or before the 11th of September. Till that time it was only ten days. Four of the days passed before the terms were printed, and but six days were left to circulate the information over a region larger than the State of New Jersey.

All the commissioners had returned to Philadelphia before the day appointed for the signing except James Ross. He remained to carry the report. In many places the people did not meet to sign. At a few places the polls were broken up. At other places they had not heard of it in time to give their assent. Bradford and Marshall both signed on the day appointed. Bradford even harangued the people to submit. The report of the commissioners, as a consequence, was so unfavorable that the President determined to send over the mountains the forces he had collected at Carlisle and in the East.

The delegates from the townships which had been appointed by the meeting of the 14th of August assembled at Parkinson's Ferry on the 2d of October. From the resolutions they made public it appeared to be the unanimous opinion of the meeting that if the signatures to the submission were not universal, it was not owing so much to any disposition to oppose the laws as to a want of time and information to get the correct sentiment. They also resolved to submit to the authorities, and to no further oppose and resist the revenue laws. They appointed William Findley, of Westmoreland, and David Redick, of Washington, commissioners to wait on the President and the Governor of Pennsylvania with a copy of the resolutions, and empowered them to explain to the government the present state of the country, and to detail such circumstances as might enable the President to judge whether an armed force would be necessary to support the civil authorities.

These commissioners met the President at Carlisle on the 10th of October, where they had several interviews. They represented that the great body of the people remained quietly at home attending to their business; that they had assurances from all parts of the disaffected region; that the people were everywhere organizing for the suppression of disorder and for the preservation of order; and that, in their opinion, if violence were used it would ruin the country. The President listened to their complaints with attention, but decided that, inasmuch as the army was under marching orders, and had actually started on its way to the disaffected part, the orders would not be countermanded. He assured the delegates that no violence would be used, and that all that was desired was to have the people come back to their allegiance.

It was said that the people of Westmoreland made choice of the most violent men to represent them at the meeting of delegates. These men were John Kirkpatrick, George Smith, and John Powers. It is certain that the common people were easily worked upon. To such an extent was the indignation aroused that it was in this county the United States mail was broken open and robbed, and persons who were known to be with the party of law openly attacked in broad daylight. Col. Gibson, who remained on the side of the government, was, on his arrival at Greensburg from Pittsburgh, at the time when the people were meeting to instruct their delegates to the second meeting at Parkinson's, on alighting at the tavern surrounded by a number of persons, who ordered him to quit the town within half an hour. He took refuge in the house of Gen. William Jack.¹ And by the return of the judges of the general election held in the several townships for the purpose of ascertaining certain assurances required of the citizens by the commissioners on the part of the government, as late as the 11th of September, 1794, it was certified that, in their opinion, it would not be safe to immediately establish an office of inspection therein, as ill-disposed persons could suddenly assemble and offer violence.²

But a change in the sentiments of the people was taking place. They had had enough of mob law. Men who had anything at stake were now moved by all means to have peace, and were for the assertion of the supremacy of the laws. With these it was a matter to reconcile themselves with both sides. The rabble were yet in the ascendant, and had the power in their hands, but there was no doubt that the government would soon assert its authority. Of the result of a conflict between the militia and the regulars there could be but one opinion.

When the two commissioners, Findley and Redick, returned from their visit to the President, they called another meeting of the Committee of Safety at the Ferry for the 24th of October to make report. In the mean time numerous meetings were held to give the delegates assurances of the submission of the inhabitants, and to express their desire for the restoration of order before the commander-in-chief and the soldiers would be among them. We have the record of one of these meetings, held at Greensburg two days before the committee was to sit. This record we give here:³

"At a meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Greensburgh and township of Hempfield, in the county of Westmoreland, on Wednesday, the 22d day of October, 1794, convened for the purpose of giving to the deputies who are to meet at Parkinson's Ferry on the 24th inst. such unequivocal assurances of their disposition for submission to the laws as would enable them to propose and adopt such measures on their behalf as would be decisive in manifesting their sincere regret for and abhorrence of the late violent measures, and of their firm determination to support and yield obedience to the constitutional laws of their country, the following resolutions were proposed and adopted:

¹ Resolved, As the sense of this meeting, that it is the duty of every good citizen to yield obedience to the existing laws of his country.

² That we discountenance all illegal acts of violence, from whatever motive, and that for redress of grievances the privilege and right of the citizen is to petition and remonstrate if necessary.

³ That we will support the civil authority and all officers in the lawful exercise of their respective duties, and assist in securing for legal trial all offenders against the laws when called upon.

"4. That the citizens of this town and township will give no opposition to the opening an office of inspection therein, should the same be contemplated by the government, and that we will use our endeavors to remove improper prejudices, and recommend a pacifiable and general submission.

"5. That a copy of the preceding resolutions be given to one or more of the deputies for the town or township who are to meet at Parkinson's Ferry on Friday, the 24th inst., together with a copy of this assurance paper, signed by the citizens of this meeting, in order that the same may be laid before the members of the said committee, and that another copy be made out for publication in the Pittsburgh Gazette, and that the same be attested by the chairman and clerk of this meeting."

This preamble and the resolutions were signed by David Marchand as chairman, and attested by Thomas Hamilton, the clerk of the meeting. The certificate or paper of assurance which was submitted at the same time to the people was signed in the course of the evening by four hundred and twenty citizens. In a note to this assurance it was said that the same or something similar would be entered into and subscribed in the other townships of the county; in some parts a similar assurance had been given, and in all parts it was expected a compliance would take place immediately.

The two commissioners appointed by the Parkinson committee, on their return, as we have said, called another meeting to which to make report. These were reappointed, and two others with them, to convey to the President the much more favorable outlook of affairs. They expected to find the President at Bedford, but learning that he had left that place and returned to the capital, they proceeded at once to Uniontown to confer with Gen. Lee, who by this time had established his headquarters there, and who had all power to treat with those who were authoritatively delegated. He received them with courtesy, and assured them that no exertion would be wanting on his part to prevent injury to persons or property. He told them to quiet the minds of the people upon that score, and to urge upon them to be as active in restoring order as they had been in bringing about disorder. The report of this conference was printed and widely circulated. Besides this the general published an address to the people of the four western counties recommending them to subscribe to an oath to support the Constitution and obey the laws, and to enter an assurance to aid the officers of the government in their duties. Books were opened at the offices of all the justices of the peace, and notices given that they would receive the tests or oaths of allegiance of all good citizens. Notices were given at the same time for the entering of all stills. The people at once attended to all their obligations. On the 17th of November general orders were issued for the return of all troops, except a detachment under Gen. Morgan, which was directed to remain for the winter about Pittsburgh. A squad of these was stationed at Uniontown and another quartered at Greensburg.

Information was made against many for overt acts of treason, and a formal investigation was held by Judge Peters. Most of these had been guilty, as it was ruled, of no offense against the government. A number were arrested and carried to Pittsburgh. Some of these were released by influential friends, while those who were not were sent to Philadelphia for trial. These were kept in confinement for nearly a year. In the end several were finally tried, and two were convicted, one for arson and the other for robbing the United States mail. Not one was convicted of treason, though the insurgents were in open armed resistance to the laws for nearly two months.

¹ Penna. Arch., vol. iv. p. 157.

² Ibid., 298.

³ See also Gen. Gibson's letter, Penna. Arch., New Series, vol. iv., 157.

Passing over the charges which would increase their criminality and the claims which might extenuate their ill-advised and hasty procedure, we notice that that part of the county which had been in open resistance was ultimately profited by the accession of a large body of new inhabitants, the enhanced value of all real property, and by new facilities and new markets by which they more readily got rid of their surplus manufacture. Possibly our own county was benefited more than any of the others. Many volunteers who had come in the army seeing a better prospect here than in the East removed within a year or two. Young men just entering in the professions of law and medicine chose to cast their lot in a section which bade fair to rapidly advance in population and in wealth. They became identified with all the interests of the county-town and the county, and with few exceptions they became the substantial citizens of a later period. So rapidly did the number of the inhabitants increase and the business interests of the county improve within ten years from this date, that more than a dozen of the old villages and towns once the centre of their respective localities first received their names and began a quasi corporate existence.

Brief notices are herewith given of some of the personages who took an active part in the affair of the Whiskey Insurrection :

JOHN NEVILLE was born on the head-waters of the Ocoquan, Virginia, in the year 1731. He was an officer in the Virginia troops under the ill-fated Braddock. In 1774 he was a delegate to the Provincial Convention of Virginia. He was colonel of the Fourth Virginia Regiment in the Revolution, serving with distinction at Trenton, Princeton, Germantown, and Monmouth. After the war he settled in Pennsylvania, and was elected a member of the Supreme Executive Council. He was subsequently appointed by the President of the United States inspector of revenue for the western counties. It was his residence which was destroyed by the opponents of the excise. He was a gallant soldier and a dutiful citizen. He died at Montour's Island, near Pittsburgh, July 29, 1803.

FRISLEY NEVILLE, son of Gen. John Neville, was born about the year 1756. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1775. He served in the Revolution as aide to Gen. Lafayette, and at the capture of Charleston was made prisoner. He was afterwards brigade inspector of the militia for Allegheny County. He was a member of the Assembly. Col. Neville married a daughter of Gen. Daniel Morgan, who, according to Brackenridge, "blessed him with an offspring as numerous and as beautiful as the children of Niobe;" was a prominent merchant of Pittsburgh for twenty-five years. He died at Fairview, Ohio, on the 1st of December, 1818.

CAPT. JAMES MCFARLANE.—The following epitaph was lately copied from the tombstone in the Mingo Creek graveyard:

"Here lies the body of Capt. James McFarland, of Washington County, Pa., who departed this life the 17th of July, 1794, aged 43 years.

"He served during the war with undaunted courage in defense of American independence against the lawless and despotic encroachments of Great Britain. He fell at last by the hands of an unprincipled villain in the support of what he supposed to be the rights of his country, much lamented by a numerous and respectable circle of acquaintance."

COR. JOHN MARSHALL "had been an early settler in the western counties and a useful citizen during the late war with Britain and the territorial controversy with Virginia. He was successively register, high sheriff, member of the Ratifying Convention (of the Federal Constitution), of the Legislature, county lieutenant, and again register in Washington County, and was respectable for the discretion he displayed in the discharge of the duties of the respective offices he filled. In the Ratifying Convention he voted in favor of amendments previous to ratification, but refused to sign the reasons of the minority. Moderation was thought to have been a leading trait in his character. He was an industrious man, and had amassed considerable property. From these circumstances the part he took in the insurrection was surprising. He had come from the north of Ireland in his youth."—(Findley's History, etc., p. 94.)

BENJAMIN PARKINSON, a Pennsylvanian by birth, had always resided in that State. He also was a Federalist, and had supported Gen. Neville's interest formerly; was reputed a good citizen, a man of influence in his neighborhood; had been a justice of the peace before the revision of the constitution of the State, was president of the Mingo Creek Association, and one of the committee who superintended the operations in the attack on Neville's house.—(Findley's History, etc.)

JOHN CANON (OR CANNON) "was from Chester County, Pa., and had long been a respectable [we pardon you, Hon. William Findley, for the 'respectable,' for you did not know to what extent Mr. Cannon was concerned in the murder of the Moravian Indians] citizen south of the Monongahela, lived in the town called by his name, had attached himself to the government of Virginia, and favored the idea of a new State. He was afterwards a member of the Legislature, and was an early advocate of the Federal Constitution, and a supporter of Gen. Neville's interest in the country."—(Findley's History.)

DAVID BRADFORD, a native of Maryland, was a prominent lawyer in after-years in Washington County. He became extensively known, and wielded an immense influence. He was admitted, as we have seen, in 1782, and the year after was appointed district attorney. He was one of the commissioners for the laying out and sale of lots at Fort McIntosh, now Beaver, in 1792-93. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution he was a zealous Federalist. When the convention of the four western counties met at Pittsburgh, Sept. 7, 1791, Bradford was one of the three representatives from Washington County. He was one of the committee calling the people to rendezvous at Braddock's Field, Aug. 1, 1794. There he was unanimously elected the major-general to command the force of the insurrectionists. When government issued the amnesty proclamation, all the citizens were included except Bradford. He fled to Bayou Sara, in Louisiana territory, then in possession of Spain, and died there about 1809. He erected the first stone house of the county.

He was respectably connected, being a brother-in-law of Judge James Allison, the grandfather of John Allison, late Register of the Treasury of the United States. In Louisiana he became a successful planter, and won his way to wealth and a fair social position (Veech). A granddaughter became the wife of Richard Brodhead, United States senator from Pennsylvania, 1851-57, and a son is said to have married a sister of Jefferson Davis.

EDWARD COOK, whose name we will often meet with somewhat later in the history of Southwestern Pennsylvania, was a native of the State, and one of the early inhabitants of Westmoreland. He was a member of the Committee of Conference which sat at Carpenter's Hall, June, 1776, and of the Constitutional Convention of that year. He took an active part in the defense of the frontier from 1779 to 1782, being a sub-lieutenant in 1781, and lieutenant of the county in 1782, being appointed successor to Lochry. He was in actual command of some of the rangers. He, however, took more interest and was more distinguished in civil than in military affairs. He was a leading county justice under the old system, and although he resided outside the boundary of our county after Washington and Fayette were erected, yet he held special commissions covering our county's jurisdiction for some time after, and presided at the court sitting at Hannastown when it was attacked and burnt by the Indians and Tories. These commissions were from time to time renewed. In 1791 he was associate judge of Fayette under the constitutional regulations of 1790. From 1796 to 1798 he was treasurer of Westmoreland. He took a forward part in the troubles of the Whiskey Insurrection, being recognized then as a man of much influence with the people, so much so, indeed, that he was chosen chairman of the Mingo Creek meeting.

"FULTON was from Maryland; he was not only a Federalist, but an open advocate of the excise law; indeed, the most openly so of any I have met with in the western counties, and was an avowed friend of the inspector (Neville). He kept a large distillery, and expected by the operations of the excise to have considerable advantage over the small distillers. He had also erected a brewery. I have never been able to account for the inconsistency of his conduct."—(Findley's History.)

ALBERT GALLATIN was a native of Geneva, in Switzerland. He was of a good family, had received an excellent education, and came in early youth to the United States; that is, during the Revolutionary war, in which he took a part. He was not bred to any particular profession. His talent for public speaking was developed by circumstance. He at first opposed the Federal Constitution, and it is believed that his mind was cramped by the narrow confederacy in which he was born. In consequence of this, and the reasons it germinated, he was rather opposed to the extension of our territory. His brilliant political career belongs to our national history.

DAVID REDICK was a native of Ireland and a lawyer by profession; admitted to practice in Washington County in 1782, one year after its organization. In 1786 he was elected a member of the Supreme Executive Council, and in 1788 chosen vice-president of Pennsylvania, the duties of which office he continued to exercise until January the 19th, 1789. In October, 1787, he was appointed the agent of the State for communicating to the Governor of New York intelligence respecting Connecticut claims. In 1791, Mr. Redick was appointed prothonotary of Washington County, and the following year clerk of the courts. As a business man he was active and energetic, and we find him exercising the duties of a surveyor, having been appointed to survey the ten islands in the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers, and divide the several tracts of land opposite Pittsburgh into building or town and outlots. At the time of the Whiskey Insurrection he took a prominent part in defense of law, order, and the constitution, and, with Mr. Findley, was appointed, Oct. 2, 1794, to wait upon President Washington and Governor Mifflin to explain the state of affairs in the Western counties. The result of their commission is narrated in the text and the accompanying papers. Mr. Redick died at Washington, Sept. 28, 1805, and was buried with Masonic honors.

WILLIAM IRVINE, who commanded at Fort Pitt during the latter days of the Revolution, and who took such an active part in the civil affairs later, and who has relatives yet residing in Westmoreland County, being uncle to the late Alexander Johnston, of Kingston House, deserves some special notice from Westmorelanders. We meet with his name so frequently in the early history of Western Pennsylvania and of Westmoreland County that we or the reader of our annals must long before this period have of necessity become familiar with his name, to say the least. He was born at Fermanagh, Ireland, Nov. 3, 1741. Educated at the University of Dublin, he studied medicine, and was some time surgeon in the English navy. After the peace of 1763 he removed to Pennsylvania, and settled at Carlisle. He was a member from Cumberland County of the convention which met at Philadelphia on the 15th of July, 1774, and recommended a General Congress. He was a representative in the succeeding conferences of the Province. In 1776 he raised and commanded the Sixth Pennsylvania Regiment, and was captured at Trois Rivières, Canada. On the 3d of August was released on parole; exchanged May 6, 1778. The same year he was appointed colonel of the Second Pennsylvania Regiment, and the 12th of May, 1779, a brigadier-general. He served under Wayne during that and the following year. In the autumn of 1781 he was stationed at Fort Pitt, instructed with the defense of the Northwestern frontier. In 1784 he served as a member of the Council of Censors. In 1785 he was appointed by the President of Pennsylvania an agent to examine the public lands of the State, and suggested the purchase of the "Triangle," thus giving to Pennsylvania an outlet on Lake Erie. He was a member of the old Congress of 1788-89, and of the Constitutional Convention of 1790. In 1794, Governor Mifflin appointed him, with Chief Justice McKean, a commissioner to go to the western counties. He served as member of Congress from 1793 to 1795. He was president of the Pennsylvania Society of the Cincinnati. He died at Philadelphia on the 29th of July, 1804.

The following extracts are from correspondence, contemporaneous histories, official reports, and from "The Papers Relating to the Whiskey Insurrection," Penn. Archives, with observations thereon, etc., as the same especially refers to Westmoreland County:

From William Findley's letter to Governor Mifflin:

"Nov. 21st, 1792.

"When I returned among my constituents I discovered that not only those who had been wavering in their opinion, but those also who had first thought that they could avail themselves of the law to advantage, by running down the occupiers of small stills in disadvantageous situations, and even those who had originally advocated the law, were become unanimous against it; for the more accurately they examine the law, with application to their own local circumstances, they are the more determined and unanimous in their wishes for its repeal."

At a meeting held at Pittsburgh, Sept. 7, 1791, the following gentlemen appeared from the counties of Westmoreland, Washington, Fayette, and Allegheny to take into consideration, etc., namely:

For Westmoreland County, Nehemiah Stokely and John Young, Esquires.

For Washington County, Col. James Marshall, Rev. David Phillips, and David Bradford, Esquires.

For Fayette County, Edward Cook, Nathaniel Brady, and John Oliphant, Esquires.

For Allegheny County, Col. Thomas Morton, John Woods, Esquire, and William Plummer, Esquire.

Edward Cook, Esquire, was voted in the chair, and John Young appointed secretary.

The following persons were present at the meeting held at Pittsburgh on the 21st of August, 1792: President, John Cannon, William Wallace, Shesbazer Bentley, Bazel Bowel, Benjamin Parkinson, John Huey, John Badollet, John Hamilton, John McClellan, Neal Gillespie, David Bradford, Thomas Gaddes, Rev. David Phillips, Albert Gallatin, Matthew Jamison, James Marshall, James Robinson, James Stewart, John Smilie, Robert McClure, Peter Lisle, Alexander Long, Samuel Wilson, and Edward Cook.

Col. John Cannon was placed in the chair, and Albert Gallatin appointed clerk.

Among their resolutions were these:

"Resolved, That David Bradford, James Marshall, Albert Gallatin, Peter Lisle, and David Phillips be appointed for the purpose of drawing a remonstrance to Congress, stating our objections against the law that impose a duty upon spirituous liquors distilled within the United States, and praying for a repeal of the same, etc.

"And whereas, Some men may be found amongst us so far lost to every sense of virtue and feeling for the distressed of this country as to accept office for the collection of the duty,

"Resolved therefore, That in future we will consider such persons as unworthy of our friendship, have no intercourse or dealings with them, withdraw from them every assistance, and withhold all the comforts of life which depend upon those duties that as men and fellow-citizens we owe to each other, and upon all occasions treat them with that contempt they deserve, and that it be, and it is, hereby most earnestly recommended to the people at large to follow the same line of conduct towards them."

Extract from letter of Judge Addison to Governor Mifflin:

"WASHINGTON, 12th May, 1794.

"There are, so far as I have understood, but two Collectors of Excise in the four Counties of Pennyl. on this side of the mountains. Benjamin Wells, of Fayette County, is collector for the Counties of Westmoreland and Fayette. Robert Johnston, of Allegheny County, is collector for the counties of Washington and Allegheny.

"Robert Johnston, so far as I have learnt of him, is an honest man of good character, but more remarkable for simplicity, good nature, and inoffensive manners than for those qualities of spirit, understanding, skill, and address which are necessary for carrying into execution a law odious and opposed where he is charged with its execution.

"Benjamin Wells, so far as I have heard him spoken of, is a contempti-hle and unworthy man, whom, I believe, the people of this country would never wish to see in any office or trust with an object of any importance."

The inhabitants of Westmoreland to Gen. William Jack :

"SIR,—As attempts have been made to raise an armed force to disturb the peace of this County and prevent the due Execution of the Laws, and an attack has been premeditated to be made on the Town of Greensburg, we have thought proper to address you as the Commanding Officer of the Militia on a subject so distressing to the minds of all well disposed Citizens. If such proceedings are not checked in their first Career, it is more easy to imagine than to point out the Calamities which may be the Consequence. We would be happy to have it in our power to say that the disposition to submit to the Laws was so prevalent that any extraordinary exertion of Government for that purpose and protecting well-disposed Citizens in the Enjoyment of their Rights and Liberties was unnecessary. Recent examples convince us to the Contrary. Until that protection can be afforded, we are of opinion that besides Voluntary Associations among such as are well inclined, a small Corps of Militia Volunteers, embodied by your direction, to be kept in service so long as you shall judge the exigency of the case may require, will essentially contribute to maintain the peace, and under the Civil authority to assist in Suppressing Riots and traitorous designs. From the tenor and sentiments manifested by the Executive, we make no doubt that your conduct in calling such a body of men into service for a short time will meet with the most unequivocal approbation, and the Expence he Defrayed out of the public Treasury. We add this our personal assurance of your being reimbursed any expence which may be incurred by you as to the pay and Rations of the officers and men whom you may think proper to call out for the Salutory purposes above mentioned.

"We are, Sir, your Humble Serv'ts,

" William Findley.
Samuel Porter.
William Todd.
Thomas Hamilton.
James Guthrie.
James McKellip.
John Hutcheson.
Peter Tittle.
John Denniston.
George Smith.
Robert Bole.
John Branden.
David Beans.
Conrad Colmer.
James Hill.

Timothy Buell.
John Parker.
Peter Classon.
John Conz.
John Kirkpatrick.
Christopher Truby.
Robert Williams.
Robert Taylor.
Simeon Hovey.
James Perry.
William Magher.
Frederick Rohler.
Terrence Campbell.
Joseph Cook.
Nathan Williams."

(A majority of these were the personal friends and some of them neighbors of Findley. It was no doubt presented at his instance.)

"Tom the Tinker's" notice to John Reed :

"MR. SCULL" [Editor and one of the Proprietors of the Pittsburgh Gazette]:
"I am under the necessity of requesting you to put the following in your next paper. It was found pasted on a tree near my distillery.

"JOHN REEN.

"July 23, 1794.

"ADVERTISEMENT.

"In taking a survey of the troops under my direction in the late expedition against that insolent exciseman, John Nevill, I find there were a great many delinquents, even among those who carry on distilling. It will therefore be observed that I, Tom the Tinker, will not suffer any certain class or set of men to be excluded the service of this my district when notified to attend on any expedition carried on in order to obstruct the execution of the excise law and obtain a repeal thereof.

"And I do declare on my solemn word, that if such delinquents do not come forth on the next alarm, with equipments, and give their assistance as much as in them lies, in opposing the execution and obtaining a repeal of the excise law, he or they will be deemed as enemies, and stand opposed to virtuous principles of republican liberty, and shall receive punishment according to the nature of the offense.

"And whereas a certain John Reed, now resident in Washington, and being at his place near Pittsburgh, called Reedsburg, and having a set of stills employed at said Reedsburg, entered on the excise docket, contrary to the will and good pleasure of his fellow-citizens, and came not forth to assist in the suppression of the execution of said law, by aiding and assisting in the late expedition, have, by delinquency, manifested his approbation to the execution of the aforesaid law, is hereby charged forthwith to cause the contents of this paper, without adding or diminishing, to be published in the Pittsburgh Gazette the ensuing week, under the no less penalty than the consumption of his distillery.

"Given under my hand, this 19th day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

"TOM THE TINKER."

Extract from letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to President Washington :

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, PHILADELPHIA, August 6, 1794.

"Nor were the outrages perpetrated confined to the officers; they extended to private citizens who only dared to show their respect for the laws of their country.

"Some time in October, 1791, an unhappy man of the name of Wilson, a stranger in the county, and manifestly disordered in his intellect, imagining himself to be a collector of the revenue, or invested with some trust in relation to it, was so unlucky as to make inquiries concerning distillers who had entered their stills, giving out that he was to travel through the United States to ascertain and report to Congress the number of stills, etc. This man was pursued by a party in disguise, taken out of his bed, carried about five miles back to a smith's shop, stripped of his clothes, which were afterwards burnt, and having been himself inhumanly hurnt in several places with a heated iron, was tarred and feathered, and about daylight dismissed, naked, wounded, and otherwise in a very suffering condition. . . . The unhappy sufferer displayed the heroic fortitude of a man who conceived himself to be a martyr to the discharges of some important duty."

Gen. Gihson to Governor Miffin :

"CARLISLE, Aug. 14, 1794.

"I arrived here last night, having met on my way down to this place Judge Yeates and Mr. Bradford, ten miles east of Bedford, on Tuesday last in the morning, and Judge McKean and Gen. Irwin near to Littleton the same day, in the evening. On my arrival at Greensburg I found a number of people assembled to choose delegates to attend the general meeting to be held this day. On my alighting at a tavern they surrounded the house, and ordered me to quit the town in half an hour or I must abide the consequences. I then came to Gen. Jack's, and remained the remainder of the day with him. I am much afraid from the present disposition of the people nothing good will result from the present meeting. Gen. Jack assures me in the county of Westmoreland the people have made choice of the most violent men to represent them at the general meeting, and that nothing less than the repeal of the excise law will satisfy them. I wish they may even treat the commissioners with common decency. I shall remain here until the return of the next post from Pittsburgh, as I have left Mrs. Gihson and the family there. Should any violent measures be adopted by the general meeting she will leave that place, and I shall return to meet her. Inclosed is the resolves of the committee and their passport to me.

"Should anything offer in which I can serve my country at the risque of my life and my fortune, I hope your Excellency will command me.

"I have honor to be your Excellency's most obedient humble servant.

"JOS. GIBSON."

Representatives present at the first conference at Parkinson's ferry on the 14th of August, 1794, to confer on the subject of the late opposition to the laws, etc. .

"On the part of the Executive Union: William Bradford, attorney-general of the United States; Jasper Yeates, associate judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; James Ross, senator in the Congress of the United States.

"On the part of the Executive of Pennsylvania.—Thomas McKean, Chief Justice of the State of Pennsylvania; William Irvine, Representative in the Congress of the United States.

"Committee of Conference.—Westmoreland County, John Kirkpatrick, George Smith, John Powers; Fayette County, Edward Cook, Albert Gallatin, James Lang; Washington County, David Bradford, John Marshall, James Edgar; Allegheny County, Thomas Morton, John Lucas, H. H. Brackenridge; Ohio County (Virginia), William M. Kinley, William Sutherland, John Stevenson."

"We, the subscribers, judges of a general election held in the several townships of the county of Westmoreland for the purpose of ascertaining certain assurances required of the citizens by the commissioners on the part of the government, and agreed to on the part of the delegates, having met this day and taken into consideration the returns from said townships (true copies of which have been returned to one of the commissioners), and finding that some gave only general assurances of their submission and disposition for peace, without individually signing the same, and others, in numbers according to the returns by them respectively made, do certify that in our opinion as ill-disposed, lawless persons could suddenly assemble and offer violence, it would not be safe in immediately establishing an office of inspection therein.

"Given under our hands at the court-house in Greensburg this 13th day of September, 1794.

"James McLeau.	John Denniston.
Ebenezer Brady.	Christopher Finley.
Clements Burlleigh.	John Kirkpatrick.
Hugh Martin.	John Young.
James Caldwell.	John Findley.
James Irwin.	Jeremiah Murray.
James Brady.	George Ament."
John Auderson.

Letter from Gen. William Jack to Governor Mifflin.

"GREENSBURG, Sept. 22, 1794.

"SIR,—I think it my duty to transmit your Excellency an account of the situation of this county at the present crisis, and the motives which induced me to call into service a small corps of militia to assist in preserving peace and warding off any attack on the county town, where the public records are kept, and in which the adjoining counties are interested as well as this.

"Until the disturbances took place, soon after the arrival of the federal marshal, the people of this county, altho' generally averse to the duty on spirits, thought very little about it, and I have reason to presume many of the principal distillers would have entered rather than subjected themselves to a prosecution. The flame was soon communicated, and many from different views rather encouraged opposition than otherwise, whilst those who failed of other reasons made use of threats to accomplish their views. The inclosed paper, sent to a distiller in this county, shows the mode of invitation from Washington; but there is reason to suppose that open as well as disguised menaces of burning, &c., had the greatest effect in collecting the small number that went from Westmoreland to Braddock's field.

"The vigorous measures proposed by Government, as well as the just fears of all good citizens, and the danger to persons and property, all had their effect in allaying the ferment. The people, however, revolted at the idea of submitting to the law complained of, as settled with the commissioners met at Pittsburgh. Considerable pains were used at this place to procure the signing required, and, I firmly believe, but for the steady countenance and determination of a few among us no signing at all would have taken place. The Germans, who are thick settled in this neighborhood, being from ignorance of our language more easily imposed upon, were extremely unwilling, and even showed a disposition which I did not expect from those habits of industry to which they are used.

"On the 11th instant, the day fixed, only about eighty came forward to sign out of several hundred met; frequent attempts were made by some to intimidate and create mischief; at length some of the ringleaders attempted to snatch the papers, in order to destroy them, but were prevented. Those who were known to have signed have been more or less threatened ever since by a set of worthless fellows.

"An association was set on foot in the town, the 13th instant, for protection and mutual safety, and was generally agreed to, even by some of those who did not like the declaration to submit to the laws. On the 16th, being assured of an attempt set on foot by Lieut. Straw to raise a party to come to town with the pretense of getting the papers, I thought it most advisable to issue a warrant and committed him to gaol.

"Being joined by a number of friends to peace from the country, I went with a party of about fifty men to a house where the said Straw's party was to collect, about a mile from town, where we found about thirty persons who declared in favor of peace, and not finding some of those among them who had been the most active, we thought it best to be satisfied with their assurances.

"To put a check to further combinations of this kind, it was determined expedient (on a consultation among the citizens of the town, and some who had come from the country, particularly Mr. Findley and Mr. Porter [Rev'd]), to have a party raised to be ready on any emergency.

In consequence I have given instructions for calling out a lieutenant and thirty volunteers, militia, to rendezvous here this week, the number to be augmented if occasion requires; but I hope this will not be necessary, the more especially as the troops ordered by the Executive are now supposed to be on their march.

"For your Excellency's satisfaction I transmit you a copy of the Letter from the Citizens to me, and at the same time request your sanction to the measure I have undertaken.

"I am, sir, your Excellency's most obedient, humble servant,
"WILLIAM JACK."

From notes of the march of the army from Sept. 30th to Oct. 29, 1794:

"JONES' MILL, Oct. 29, 1794.

"I am distressed at the ridiculous accounts sometimes published in our papers. I assure you that there has not been a single shot fired at our troops to my knowledge. The whole country trembles. The most turbulent characters as we advance turn out to assist us, supply forage, cattle, &c. From Washington we hear of little but fear and flight. . . . Our march to Berlin (Somerset County) was one of the severest kind. The ascent of a mountain in fine weather to a single traveler must be laborious, judge then what it must prove in a heavy rain to an army, with all their train of artillery and wagons, each private soldier carrying his arms and knapsack, yet no discontent appeared, and a double allowance of whiskey made them as happy as could be, the only difficulty we have found with them, in relation to the main object, was to restrain them from eagerly apprehending those who were pointed out as Whiskey Boys."

ROUTE OF THE ARMY ON THEIR RETURN.

"The army will make a short movement from Pittsburgh on Tuesday, the 18th. The line of march to be taken up the next day. The following are the stations allotted for each day's march:

	Miles.
1st day's march to Hellman's, from Pittsburgh.....	15
2d, to Dutchman's, two miles west of Greensburg.....	14
3d, to Nine-Mile Run (Youngstown).....	11
4th, two miles east of Ligonier.....	11
5th, Wells' r., foot Laurel r.....	9
6th, Stouy Creek, two miles E.....	11
7th, Ryan's.....	15
8th, Bedford.....	24
9th, Crossings of the Raystown Branch of the Juniata.....	14
10th, E. side of Sideling Hill.....	20
11th, Burd's, Fort Lyttleton.....	12
12th, Stradsburg.....	17
13th, Shippensburg.....	11
14th, Carlisle.....	21

List of persons excepted from pardon by terms of Governor Lee's proclamation, 29th November, 1794:

Benjamin Parkinson.	Daniel Hamilton.
John Holcroft.	William Millar.
Thomas Lapsley.	Edward Wright.
Edward Cook.	David Bradford.
Richard Holcroft.	Alexander Fulton.
John Mitchell.	William Bradford.
Thomas Spiers.	William Hanna.
George Parker.	Thomas Hughes.
Edward Magner, Jr.	Ebenezer Gallagher.
David Lock.	John Shields.
Peter Lyle.	William McElhenny.
William Hay.	Stephenson Jack.
Thomas Patton.	Patrick Jack.
Arthur Gardner.	Andrew Highlands.
	Of the State of Pennsylvania.
William Sutherland.	Robert Stephenson.
William McKinley.	John Moore.
John McCormick.

Of Ohio County, in the State of Virginia.

"As the army returned through Westmoreland two arrests were made in the southern extremity of that country and one in the neighboring parts of Fayette; they were taken to Philadelphia. . . . One of the two prisoners from Westmoreland was found guilty of setting fire to the house of Wells, the collector, and condemned to be hanged, but was afterwards reprieved and then pardoned by the President. He was a very ignorant man, said to be of an outrageous temper, and subject to occasional fits of insanity."—Brackenridge's History of the Insurrection.

John Mitchell was the man who robbed the Pittsburgh mail, and who was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. He was also relieved and pardoned by the President.

It is a curious circumstance that the two persons who were regularly tried and sentenced to death, the one for arson and the other for robbing the mail and murder, should have both committed the crimes within the county of Westmoreland. It was right that they should be pardoned from their punishment when we consider the enormity of the offenses, their magnitude, and their number, which for a full season were perpetrated without punishment in the other portions of the official survey, growing out of the same occasion.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

WILLIAM FINDLEY.

William Findley, the First Member of Congress from Westmoreland—His Colleague in the Commission to the President of the United States at the Time of the Whiskey Insurrection, David Redick—His Account of his Early Life and his Motives in settling in Pennsylvania—His Settlement in the Octorara Settlement and his Efforts to remove the Obligations of the Scotch Covenanters in Matters Civil—His Early Advantages—His Opinions on Slavery—Elected Member of the Assembly, of the Council of Censors, Member of the Constitutional Convention of 1790, and Member of Congress—"Modern Chivalry" and Findley Caricatured—His Views on the Federal Constitution—His Answer to Rev. Samuel B. Wylie's Strictures on the American Constitutions—His Account of the Publication and Statements of his "History of the Insurrection"—Antagonism of Brackenridge and Findley—Their Political Opposition and Personal Dislikes of each other—Findley's Contributions to the Register—His Shrewdness and Sagacity as a Politician—Debasement of the Politics of that Day—Instances of Personal and Party Abuse—Other work of Findley—His Industry—His Residence—Its Location—His Death and Grave—His Appearance and Dress—His Neighbors—His Family—His identification with the Whiskey Insurrection, and the important part he acted in it.

Of the Westmorelanders who were identified with the insurrection, William Findley is the most conspicuous. He was at that time the member of Congress from this district, and his influence and standing are evident from the fact that he with Redick was sent after the meeting at Parkinson's to explain to the President the state of affairs in the western counties, and to arrange a plan by which, if possible, there could be a mutual understanding without the intervention of the army. David Redick, the colleague of Findley, was a native of Ireland, and was by profession a lawyer. He was admitted to the Washington County bar in 1782. In 1786 he was elected a member of the Supreme Executive Council, and in 1788 was chosen vice-president of Pennsylvania. He held other offices of trust, and at the time of the insurrection took an active and prominent part in defense of law, order, and the constitution.

William Findley was born in the north of Ireland in 1741 or 1742, and came to Pennsylvania in 1763. He was a descendant of one of the old signers of the Solemn League and Covenant in Scotland, and another of his ancestors bore a prominent part in the memorable siege of Derry in Ireland. The family was thus Scotch-Irish, and sprang from among those whom the persecutions in Scotland under James the Second impelled to seek shelter elsewhere. It was his first intention to go to Carolina, whither many of his father's countrymen had gone, but he changed his mind, and coming to Pennsylvania a mere lad, made one of that famous Octorara settlement, whose history appears to be the pride of all those who in any way are connected with it. He here early brought himself to notice among these "new American covenanters." He says that the motives which impelled him to come to Pennsylvania in preference to going to Carolina were those which arose out of the question of slavery. He had some scruples of the conscience about this matter, and even at that young age considered both the moral and political effects of slavery on the country. He therefore chose to hold his own plow and reap his own grain here rather than raise a family where slavery prevailed. He determined to have no slaves, and never had any; but he protests that he ever once thought of consigning to perdition, on moral or political grounds, those patriarchs and patriots who held slaves. He defended the course the government of the United States took with regard to the evil, and was apprehensive, as late as 1812, that total abolition in this country would lead to the same results which manumission had led to in Santo Domingo.¹ In this religious community he

¹ Findley's views on slavery appear to be paradoxical, but they may be reconciled. In his remarkable essay, "Observations, etc.," he says, "Before I had a house of my own, I resided in some families, and very pious families too, who held a number of slaves, and was very intimate in others; and I was myself then opposed to slavery, as I have been ever since; but I did not, like the author [Dr. Wylie], oppose it with slander and declamation, but with such views as I had of expediency, and of the moral law and the gospel. I was, however, powerfully combated with the judicial law, the examples of the patriarchs, and of the ancient civilized nations; nor was the curse on Cain forgotten" (p. 236). This whole chapter from which we have taken the above extract is an apology for the institution of slavery as it existed in Pennsylvania. One other extract is pertinent: "But the author [Dr. Wylie] mentions a certain 'portion of them [slaves] being doomed to hopeless bondage.' I deny the charge; at least, as far as it relates to Pennsylvania, it is an infamous slander. No law of the State has doomed any man or class of men to hopeless bondage. There were, indeed, slaves in Pennsylvania under the English government. Those being already by law the property of their owners, the Legislature could not interfere more than they could do with real estates. Such interference would have been an ex post facto law,—a law made after the act was done. The principle is abhorrent both to the laws of God and man."

Mr. Findley's notions, however, would seem to have undergone a change if the record is any evidence thereof:

"August Sessions, 1817.

"ANN FINDLEY.—On the petition of Matthew Jack, of the County of Westmoreland, stating that by Indenture duly executed and bearing date the 9th day of March, A.D. 1799, Ann Findley, a female negro, was in due form bound as a servant to William Findley, Esquire, to serve the said William Findley, his executors, or assigns from the date of the said Indenture for and during the term of nineteen years then next ensuing. And the said William Findley by assignment executed the 2nd day of April, A.D. 1816, did assign and transfer all his right, title, and claim to the said Ann Findley unto the petitioner agreeably to the said Indenture. That the said Ann Findley being a single woman during the time of her servitude did commit fornication, and was pregnant advanced more liberal ideas than had been advanced or even entertained before, and he refused to answer in public, questions of a secular and temporal nature which were interspersed with questions of a religious or spiritual nature, and which he, as a lay officer of the church, was necessitated to answer and to propound. He helped by this and other reasonable innovations to break the traditional obligations which some wanted to make as binding in America as in Scotland.

While he was under his father's roof, he had the advantage of a larger library of books on church history and divinity than was possessed by most of his neighbors. He says that he had also been taught to read the Bible, and that he had inclined to some books on ancient history.¹ The evidence of his application and taste is seen in his subsequent productions, because it was not possible for him, for a length of time after he came to America, to devote himself studiously to literary pursuits.

When the Revolution commenced he took sides with his adopted country and served in the army. He rose to the rank of captain, and he is so designated in some of the old records. About the close of the war, 1782, he came into Westmoreland, and bought the farm upon which he resided until his death. He could not pay for his farm at once, but he was strong-armed, young, and willing to work. His farm, now a beautiful and valuable tract between Latrobe and St. Vincent's, through which the Pennsylvania Railroad passes, had then been just opened out, and more than four-fifths of it was covered with bushes, briars, and swamp-growth. He was a weaver by trade, and he set up his loom in one of the low rooms of his first log cabin, and it remained there till the house was demolished. The community around him was, in religious preference, Presbyterian, and in no long time he was one of the chief members of the church body, a prominent layman, and for many years an elder. Nor was he less prominent in political affairs. He was a born leader, and had from the first not only the confidence of the most substantial citizens of his district, but obtained and held an ascendancy over the common people which was relaxed only with his death. He was, before he had been here any length of time, elected to the Assembly, and was a colleague of Brackenridge there. He was one of the Council of Censors during all the sittings of the board. In this body he voted invariably against with and delivered of three bastard children within the time of her said servitude, one of whom within the period of her servitude with the said petitioner. By reason whereof he has sustained great loss and damage, and praying the Court to order and direct that the said Ann Findley serve the said petitioner such further time beyond the term in the aforesaid Indenture mentioned as the Court might think fit and sufficient to compensate the petitioner for the loss and damage which he sustained as aforesaid. The Court upon due proof and consideration of the premises do adjudge and order that the said Ann Findley do serve the said petitioner, Matthew Jack, for the term of eighteen months from and after the expiration of the term of nineteen years in the said petition mentioned."

¹ "Observations, etc.," p. 234.

the party which professed Federalism, and his vote at all times is found upon the opposite list from St. Clair's, who sat as a censor from Philadelphia. This board sat from November the 10th, 1783, until the Constitution of 1790 was adopted. Findley, with William Todd as his colleague, represented Westmoreland in the Constitutional Convention of 1789-90. In the Convention he introduced a resolution, which he hoped to become a law under the Constitution, to educate the poor gratis.

In 1791 he was elected to Congress from the Westmoreland district, and he sat in the House until 1799, and then, after an interval of two terms, from 1803 to 1817. Some of his old friends say that he would have been returned to this time had he lived. In Congress his political enemies said he was inconsistent, but such was his tact that his constituents never forsook him. He always managed to come out on the side of the people, not only in the matter of his opposition to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, but in the far more serious matter to him and to them of the Whiskey Insurrection, and in the handling of the causes which brought about the war of 1812. He was something of a fluent talker, but not much of a public speaker; his strength lay in the power with which he controlled the people, by going to them while they were at work in the field, treating them to a glass of grog, and giving a push at a house-raising. He seldom, indeed, spoke at public meetings, but none could plan a public meeting or control the ends of one better than he, whence Brackenridge fails not to call him a demagogue, one who temporized with the populace, and who would descend to anything for the sake of the "sweet voices of the people." Party lines were not drawn so finely then as they were somewhat later, and although after the adoption of the Constitution he and Brackenridge were of the same political cast in all essentials, yet neither of them was of the material to follow the other; each of them must be a leader. We can coolly appreciate the feeling with which a man of the temperament, the learning, and the aspiration of Brackenridge, who lately adorned the Supreme Bench with his legal acumen and his philosophy, could look upon a man like Findley, who was self-educated, and used all his life to associate with the commonest kind of common people. In the volubility of his language and the keenness of his wit Brackenridge had the advantage. He has told us in "Modern Chivalry" the kind of popularity Findley longed for and sought after. The character of "Mr. Traddle" at the cross-roads, where the people were collected to fill an occasional vacancy, is intended for Findley. He has a sling at him all through the book. Among the reasons which Capt. Farrago gives for not voting for Traddle, the popular candidate, is this, that he does not object to him "because he is a weaver, but because he is nothing else but a weaver."²

² As a curiosity in literature, and lest no other opportunity should offer to give an extract from this rare book, "Modern Chivalry," to con-

The use of the word demagogue is in our day used interchangeably with the word politician. It is thus that it is sometimes hard to discriminate, and admitting the distinction we cannot sometimes see the difference. Findley was a consummate politician, and something more than a mere puller of threads and a disentangler of skeins. He helped to shape political opinion here as much possibly as any other man in Western Pennsylvania in his day, and as a politician was more effective out of Congress than in it. He had a large personal acquaintance, and his manners were such as to make him a favorite in a democracy. Besides this, he had the sympathy and the influence of the strongest church organization in the country at that day. The Scotch-Irish swore by Findley.

The parties of Federal and anti-Federal, strictly speaking, ended with the adoption of the Federal Constitution, although the name itself which distinguished them was used long after there was any necessity for the distinction which brought it into use, and when in truth the distinction was on account of different causes altogether from those which gave rise to that party appellation. The original elements vey an idea of the satire therein to those to whom it is not accessible, we give the following, which is near the close of the book, the character of "Traddle" itself being introduced very early therein:

"On the third day, renewing their journey, the conversation between the captain and his servant turned on the character and history of the present revenue officer, the late Teague O'Reagan. The captain gave Duncan a relation of what had happened in the case of the attempt to draw him off to the Philosophical Society, to induce him to preach, and even to take a seat in the Legislature of the United States; that had it not been for a certain Traddle, a weaver, whom they had been fortunate enough to substitute for him, the people would most undoubtedly have elected Teague and sent him to Congress.

"'Guid deliver us!' said Duncan; 'do they make Parliament men o' weavers?' this kintra? In Scotland it maun be a duke or a laird that can hae a seat there.'

"'This is a republic, Duncan,' said the captain, 'and the rights of man are understood and exercised by the people.'

"'And if he could be i' the Congress, why did you let him be a gauger?' said Duncan.

"'This is all the prejudice of education, Duncan,' said the captain. 'An appointment in the revenue, or any other under the executive of the United States, ought not to have disgrace attached to it in the popular opinion, not even in the case of the hangman, for it is a necessary, and ought to be held a sacred, duty.'

"'I dinna ken how it is,' said Duncan, 'but I see they hae everything tail foremoet in this kintra to what they hae in Scotland,—a gauger a gentleman, weavers in the Legislature, and even the hangman respectit.'

"Just at this instant was heard by the wayside the ginging of a loom in a small cabin with a window towards the road. It entered the head of Duncan rather indiscreetly to expostulate with the weaver, and to know why it was that he also did not attain a seat in some public body. Advancing to the orifice, as it might be called, he applied his mouth and bespoke him as he sat upon the loom thus: 'Traddle,' said he, giving him the same name that the captain had given the other, 'why is it that ye sit here, treading these twa stecks, and playing wi' your elbows as you throw the thread, when there is one o' your occupation not far off that is now a member of the house o' lords, or commons, in America, and is gane to the Congress o' the United States? Canna you get yoursel elected? or is it because ye dinna offer that ye are left behind in this manner? Ye should be striving, man, while guid posts are gaeing, and no be sitting there wi' your hurdies on a beam. Dinna your neighbours gie ye a vote? Ye should get a chapin o' whiskey, man, and drink till them, and gar them vote, or, ye should gae out and talk politics and mak speeches.'

of these parties became commingled after having been disturbed, and some of the most violent opponents of the Constitution before it was adopted took their stand in support of it when it was adopted, while such as Madison and Brackenridge united with Galatin and Findley in condemning some of the most prominent measures of the first administration. The feelings which actuated this opposition (which appears to have been the strongest from those who were born outside of America), was the fear that that instrument was too republican in its nature; that the people would have so much liberty that in a little time through anarchy they would have none, and that a constitution less democratic, and modeled closer after that of England, would be more durable and less liable to be broken. Findley even published a work in which he vindicated the American constitutions. This work, called "Observations on the Two Sons of Oil," was an answer to the illiberal strictures of the Rev. Samuel B. Wylie, who, in his holy zeal in a work under that title, took occasion to propagate the false doctrine that the written constitutions of these States did not prohibit the violation of the laws of God, and who asserted that because the Church and the State were not united the people were not answerable to the moral law, and that the nation was a nation of infidels, in which, in short, he grossly misrepresented the government of the State and of the United States, while professing his "slippery titled" book to be a commentary on the symbolical vision of the prophecy of Zechariah. Findley, being a prominent churchman, was picked upon as the person to answer the charges of the reverend gentleman. He applied himself laboriously to the task, and brought to bear all his polemical as well as his political knowledge. He took the position that the Church and the State were separate institutions; the one divine and the other human. His answer swelled out to a volume of nearly four hundred pages. He is somewhat prolix, and at times a little stupid, but he goes through a wide range, and supports his assertions and statements by numerous quotations from, and references to, the writers of church history, both modern and patristic, and by texts from the Scriptures.

Findley's "History of the Insurrection" has been quoted by nearly every general and local historian who has written upon that subject. But his treatise, on the whole, was written but to give a partial view of the matter, and as an apology for his own share in it, as was Brackenridge's account, who thought it worth while to recount the affair at large to illustrate and explain his own peculiar course. Findley's account was not in all particulars correct, so his contemporaries said, and he himself afterwards acknowledged that in some matters he had been misinformed, and in others he had relied on vague reports. In writing that history he delayed the work for a year after he had commenced it, in order, as he says, to obtain correct information, and having in the mean time consulted Addison, Hamilton, Redick, Irvine, and others, yet after it was published he found that it was in detail not correct as he intended it should be. A new editor was proposed for a new and corrected edition. Hamilton Rowan, a respectable Irish refugee, while in this country proposed to have it printed in Ireland, where it could be done cheaper at that time than in this country.¹ The author, in revising it, found that his informers had been mistaken or misinformed in some things, and that he must make considerable alteration respecting the conduct of particular persons, such as Addison and Ross. The corrections were sent with the copy, but the ship was taken at sea and both lost, and he himself lost the notes of revision. There was only one edition of the "History" printed, and copies are now scarce, the few extant being in the possession of various historical societies, of biblioplists, or in the State library.

This work is undoubtedly the most substantial and important one he wrote, and treating as it did of a political subject, and giving the views of one of the most active participants in that great civil disturbance, it could not but be a work to which the attention of many should be directed. It has been quoted and drawn upon by eminent legal and historical writers, such as Wharton and Hildreth; while, on the other hand, it has been assailed with virulence by the political opponents of the author, and ridiculed by the New England Federalists. "Shall we match Joël Barlow," exclaimed Fisher Ames, indignantly, "against Homer and Hesiod? Can Thomas Paine contend against Plato? or could Findley's history of his own (Whiskey) insurrection vie with Sallust's narrative of Catiline?"

Touching the criticisms and the attacks his book received, all of his adversaries are free to admit that in the statement of facts he would not knowingly deviate from truth, but they assert that his prejudices were strong, and that his personal enmity biased his judgment.²

Findley and Brackenridge were very bitterly opposed to each other. In the matter of substantial gain and advantage, Findley probably had the best of Brackenridge; but now that they and their generation have passed, Brackenridge still gets the ear of the people in his inimitable satire in which Findley is caricatured.

These two politicians first came into contact in the Assembly. Brackenridge was elected at the instance of the inhabitants of Pittsburgh and that region about, for the avowed object of securing the erection of a new county. Findley then was a member for Westmoreland. Here they came into collision frequently, and especially on the subject of a loan-office, a measure for which the people of the West were clamorous. Findley supported the bill; Brackenridge opposed it. Brackenridge cared little for the opinion of the people on questions upon which he regarded them unable to judge intelligently, and he frequently gave expression to his contempt for them. "What do they know about such things," said he, indignantly. These expressions and the speech on this occasion were reported against him, and much use was made of them. A long paper war then followed between him and Findley, and from the recrimination which passed between them, aggravated by their personal dislikes, was laid the foundation of their personal and political enmity.

In a five-column letter in the Farmer's Register for Nov. 18, 1808, Findley acknowledges himself to be the author of many articles which had been published in that paper for more than three years past under the nom de plume of "Sidney."

He had indeed, from the establishing of the Register in 1798, furnished circular letters from time to time during the whole term of his official career. The paper was pledged to the support of the Democratic-Republican ticket, and it was a powerful instrument in his hands and in the hands of his friends. It was the only paper within the county, and the source of all public news and information. The mildness of its editorial articles did not make it offensive to the general reader, and its political course and preferences were to be gathered from the department of news, from the resolutions of the local meetings, and from the leaders which were disguised under the signature of professedly disinterested correspondents.

Of Findley's articles many appeared between 1805 and 1808. Some of these articles were lengthy and prolix, extending to two numbers of the paper, and filling as many as ten closely printed columns of matter. While there undoubtedly was a censorship exercised over the paper by the editors, there appeared to be a show of fairness in the offer that its columns were open to any one who felt disposed to take exceptions at anything that appeared in it. Probably there was nothing Findley so much counted on as on an outspoken adversary. This offer, it is true, was sometimes taken advantage of, but never without the controversial article being answered, and repaid with full interest in kind. The result in every event was that Findley always carried the election, and this notwith-

¹ The authority for this is Findley himself, in a letter in the Register.

Archibald Hamilton Rowan was a noted Irish patriot who had been imprisoned in his own country on account of his efforts as an agitator. In 1797 he established himself as a calico-printer and dyer on the banks of the Brandywine. Subsequent to this he went to Ireland. (See Harper's Monthly Magazine, January, 1881, article on "Calico-Printing.")

Rowan is mentioned in "The Irish Bar," chap. ix. He there figures as a friend of Simon Butler, a barrister, who, for publishing a libel against the House of Lords (Ireland), was sentenced and fined by the Lord Chancellor. In the course of the sentence words were used which were construed as a personal insult, and Rowan for his friend waited on the Lord Chancellor, John Fitzgibbon, Earl of Clare, who had been something of a duelist. Mr. Rowan is here called "a well-known Irish gentleman."

² Even the editor of Brackenridge's "Whiskey Insurrection" allows the above admission.

standing open charges of time-serving and of apparent changes of principles and measures.¹

The most noted of these changes was from his opposition to his support of James Ross, one of the foremost leaders of the Republican-Democratic party in the West, in his candidacy for Governor. Throughout this region Ross was very popular, and was early acknowledged as a representative man. Findley was charged for supporting McKean for the Governorship as against Ross in 1799, and then for supporting Ross in 1808. In 1799, Findley had been one of a committee which was made up of politicians over all the State to select one who would be the most acceptable candidate for that office. He says that, finding McKean to be without doubt the one, he gave him his support. This change in 1808 opened out many batteries. If the speeches, the resolutions, the publications which passed in that campaign in Western Pennsylvania were before us we should be amused, and then astonished. There has probably been none other like it since that day. Politics had then one element in it which is now, so far as an element that makes results is concerned, totally absent. It was the day when the infidelity of the French encyclopædists and politicians had taken possession of those Americans who professed deism, or downright atheism. We have seen attacks and replies as glibly arranged and far more scurrilous than those of the popular haranguers and writers of the "Free Thought School" of our own day. To repeat these would be to shock the moral sensibilities of any free-thinker or rationalist with whom we are acquainted, and who carries the memory of a Christian father or mother. But in such a controversy, and in such a conflict, it could not be otherwise than that Findley should be the gainer. In the Register, one writer who styles himself the "Friend of Truth," attacked Findley for opposing Ross on religious grounds, ostensibly because Ross had not subscribed to the religious test, and because he, on a current report, had somewhere in Westmoreland County given the sacrament to his dog, in contempt and derision of the most sacred ordinance of Christians. Then Findley gathering his arrows, shot them in showers at Tom Paine and the infidels who attempted to overthrow the Christian religion and to change the Constitution. What argument could resist the political defense that covered itself behind texts from the Scriptures?

In 1812, Findley was opposed in the election for congressman by Thomas Pollock. The announcement of Pollock was in the form of an advertisement, which said that Pollock "was descended from a family well known on the frontiers in times of danger." He had been county commissioner, a justice of the peace, and a member of the Assembly three successive times. Pollock made a strong run, but as the result in the thirteen election districts which made up the congressional district of Westmoreland, Indiana, Jefferson, and Armstrong, Findley had 1260 votes, and Pollock, 1116.

It was indeed a time of vituperation and abuse in politics, and this vituperation and abuse was not confined to the hustings. The evidence of most of this being made public in political speeches and in the common newspapers, is not at present accessible to us. That which found its way into more permanent literature has been in part preserved. The individual and political character of no public man of his day was more bitterly and acrimoniously attacked than that of Findley.

In addition to his "History of the Insurrection of Western Pennsylvania," published in 1796, and "Observations," vindicating religious liberty, published in 1812, he had published previously (1794) "A Review of the Funding System." Upon the question of the Federal Constitution, Findley took sides with Gallatin, and Gallatin was to Jefferson what Hamilton was to Washington. He attacked Hamilton severely in his "History of the Insurrection," and their respective statements sometimes do not coincide. He did not agree with some of the acts of the first Federal administration, but this disagreement was more on the construction of powers than in opposition to their ends. When the vote on Jay's treaty was taken in the House, to avoid giving his vote he left the House, and was brought up by the sergeant-at-arms.

But from the records it is very apparent that Findley was no idler. Besides these productions which we have mentioned there were other contributions of his which appeared in the papers printed in the East. These would indicate that he was a very assiduous and a laborious worker. He was present at every session of Congress. When at home he superintended his farm and overlooked the interests of his children, who were married and who lived near him. He took a very active interest in the affairs of his church, Unity, of which he was for many years an active elder. In the councils of the congregation his voice was all potent.

Findley's residence was in Unity township, and the site of his first house is very nearly indicated by the location of the ovens of the "Monastery Coke-Works" along the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad. That house was lately burnt down. It was built of hewed logs, was two stories in height, and for its day must have been a very credible building. In this house he lived till he became old and infirm, when he took up his abode in the house of his daughter, Mrs. Carothers, which was on a farm taken off the original tract, and was located on the left side of the road going from the monastery to Latrobe, and nearly opposite the residence of John George, Esq. In this house he died. His body was buried in the graveyard of Unity Church, and over it is a plain gray tombstone with the following inscription :

¹ A writer in the Gazette so late as 1823 (August 15th) has this to say: "In 1817 we were required to vote, but were denied the right of choice; we had freedom of thought, speech, and action, but were forbidden to favour opposition to William Findley."

The Venerable
William Findley
DEPARTED THIS LIFE
April 5, 1821
In the 80th year
Of His Age

In size Mr. Findley was a large man; his complexion was florid; he wore no beard, and was very tidy and tasteful in his dress. When at home he dressed in homespun, but on going out in fair weather wore a complete suit of white, with white hat having a broad rim, silk stockings, and cue. In the cold season his dress was the conventional shad-belly coat, long waistcoat, dark knee-breeches, long boots, but always the broad-rimmed white beaver hat. His manners, as one would infer, were agreeable and plain, although when he was busied at work writing upon a subject that kept his attention for days at a time he did not like it when he was disturbed, and when one came even on business he soon dismissed him. He had many visitors. Of his neighbors those who were near and who had taken a more or less active part in public concerns were William Todd, his colleague in the Constitutional Convention of 1789-90; Gen. St. Clair, who usually met Findley at the village of Youngstown, which was intermediate between the two; George Smith, Esq., a noticeable man in the Whiskey Insurrection on the side of law, and afterwards an officer in the War of Eighteen-Twelve; the Sloans and the Craigs, who lived farther down the Loyalhanna; and the Proctors and Lochrys, who lived towards St. Xavier's Convent from his place.

An old lady who passed her childhood in the family of Findley, and to whom we acknowledge indebtedness for items of a personal nature, has said that the periodical occasion of his going to Congress was one of the greatest magnitude not only in the family but in the neighborhood. He went of course on horseback, and on a horse which he used for that purpose only. For weeks before he started arrangements were making, his horse was well housed and well cared for, and none was allowed to use him, and an abundance of the finest white linen was prepared for the use of the congressman until he should get home. On the day which had been fixed for his departure all the neighbors round came to see him off, to lift their hats and say good-by. The women part of the household would always be in commotion, for the journey at that day was great, the distance long, and the goodman would be away so long.

Findley was twice married. His second wife was a widow Carothers, a very beautiful woman, and much younger than he. By his first wife he had three children,—David, an officer in the regular army; Nellie, who married a Carothers, a son of Findley's second wife by her former husband; and Mary, who was married to John Black. If he has any descendants within our own county it is not generally known.

Findley's identification with the Whiskey Insurrection is such that he must ever be regarded one of the principal characters figuring in it. That he accredited himself with honor and as a patriot none at this day would deny. That he was indiscreet, and at first inactive, something of a time-server, and gave the seditious some occasion to think he was for open rebellion and resistance, will likewise not be denied. But in this he went not so far as either Brackenridge, Gallatin, or Cook. From his local habitation and from the situation of his district he was at the outer edge of that whirlpool. He came to his senses quicker than most of the rest, and when he did he, with the greatest tact and with a display of knowledge of human nature rarely exceeded, used all his influence for the establishing of "law, order, and the constitution." In this he was eminently successful, for he had the confidence of Washington probably to almost as great an extent as any man of his day in Western Pennsylvania, and certainly more of the confidence of his constituents than any other man in it. In his plan of settlement he displayed what Macaulay says is the highest statesmanship, the statesmanship that uses every available means for a successful compromise.¹

One extract from his correspondence extending throughout this period will probably give his views on the subject quite as well as the whole of his correspondence together. In a letter written to Governor Mifflin as early as Nov. 21, 1792,² he says,—

"Though Congress is fully vested with the Power of levying Excises, yet the necessity, the time, the subjects of excise, and the People's prejudices respecting it are questions of serious importance to government. For my part, from a consideration of those things, I thought that power was about to be exercised prematurely, and with an honest zeal for the success of the government, exerted myself in my station to prevent it; but being once made and its effects not experienced I did not move last session for a repeal, but endeavoured to procure such alterations as I conceived would have had a tendency to give it effect. The industry and zeal with which, in all my correspondence, I have endeavoured to promote a regular line of conduct among the people has been such as will never occasion me to blush; but that I should, in the present situation of things, undertake to advise the people to go on with distilling and pay the excise, would be lost labour. Thus far, however, I freely declare that I shall certainly continue to use what influence I have to direct the opposition into a regular and orderly channel. And this, I presume, is all that is contemplated by the mass of the People."

¹ Since this sketch of William Findley was written, an autobiographical sketch has appeared in the "Pennsylvania Magazine of History." From this article we give these additional details:

Purposing to go to the frontier of Pennsylvania as early as Bouquet's time, he was prevented by the Indian wars, and taught school in the Octorara settlement for several years, until the office was opened for the sale of western lands. In 1760 he married, and purchased land in now Franklin County. Was elected County Commissioner for two terms of three years each. Came to Westmoreland County about 1781. Shortly after his arrival here refused to be sent to the Assembly, but was sent as one of the Council of Censors. From that time until 1812 (so he writes), he had never been but one whole winter with his family, and that was when he declined serving in Congress. He was then successively elected a member of the Convention that ratified the Federal Constitution; a member of the Supreme Executive Council; a member of the first State Legislature under the Constitution of 1790; a member of the Second Congress; and a member of the State Senate.

² Papers relating to the Whiskey Insurrection, "Penn. Arch.," New Series, vol. iv., 49.

Engraved by E. Williams from a drawing by J. B. Longacre after the original Portrait by C. W. Peale

MAJOR GENERAL ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Arthur St. Clair

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Nativity and Birth—History of his Family in Scotland—Is sent to College, and thence to London to study Medicine—Enters the British Army as an Ensign—Comes to America in the French and Indian War—Serves under Wolfe in Canada—Marries in Boston—Appears in Western Pennsylvania—Commands at Fort Ligonier—Appointed to Office in Bedford County under the Proprietary Government and in Westmoreland County—Takes an active part in the Border Troubles with Virginia, and in Dunmore's War—Agent of the Penns—Accompanies the Congressional Committee to Fort Pitt, 1775—Resolutions of May 16, 1775, at Hannastown—The Associates—Plan to go against Detroit—Takes part with the Colonies in the Revolutionary War—Appointed and Commissioned Colonel in Pennsylvania Service—Sent to Canada—At Three Rivers—Services in Canada—Joins Washington—His Services in the Jersey Campaign of 1776—Is sent to Command at Ticonderoga—Campaign of 1777—Burgoyne's Advance—Surrender of Ticonderoga—Court of Inquiry—St. Clair at Yorktown—And with Greene—Enters Civil Life—Member of the Council of Censors—Member of Continental Congress—Elected its President—Erection and Organization of the Northwestern Territory—Appointed its Governor—Enters upon his Duties as Governor—Indian War—Made Major-General and Commander-in-Chief of the American Army—Expedition against the Miami Indians—Account of the Battle and Defeat—His Politics—His Duties as Governor—Is Removed from Office—Returns to Ligonier Valley—His Residence—His Financial Embarrassment—Its Causes—Treatment of the Government in regard to these Claims—Is sold out by the Sheriff—Removes from his Home—His Last Days—His Death, Funeral, and Monument—Chattering over his Grave—Observations on his Character and Misfortunes.

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR is a historic character, and as such a great part of his public career belongs to the history of the republic. But as he was so intimately connected with the formation of our county, it is natural that any one who inquires into our early history should be interested in the particulars of the life of this man, whose name is met with so often, and who is so inseparably connected with it.

St. Clair was by birth a Scot, and was of a family of early note in their native country, they taking their name itself back in the middle centuries. Arthur was born in 1734,¹ at Thurso Castle, in the county of Caithness, and was the son of William St. Clair, of the same stock as the then Earl of Caithness, from a common ancestry.² The deeds of the ancient family

¹ The day or month is not known.

² A gentleman with a taste for research has thus traced the family of St. Clair down from very early times:

"The St. Clairs of Scotland are descended from a Norman family. Walderne de St. Clair, a Norman knight, married Margaret, daughter of Richard, Duke of Normandy. William de St. Clair, their second son, a brave and adventurous knight, settled in Scotland in the reign of Malcolm Canmore, and obtained from that monarch large grants of land. In the wars about the crown of Scotland between Baliol and Bruce the St. Clairs adhered to the side of Bruce, and on his final success participated in his good fortune by an increase of their domains. John de St. Clair was a member of the first Parliament summoned by Bruce. The chief of the St. Clairs married a Douglass, whose mother was daughter of Robert Bruce. William St. Clair married Elizabeth, daughter of Malice Spar, Earl of Orkney and Strathorne, in whose right their son was created Earl of Orkney by Haco, King of Norway, to which country the Orkney Islands then belonged. The title remained with the family of St. Clair until 1471, when it was annexed to the crown of Scotland by act of Parliament. In exchange for the Orkney Islands and title of their earl, the domains of Ravenscraig were bestowed upon William St. Clair, who was entitled Earl of Caithness. The St. Clairs built the castle of Kirkwall, in the Orkneys, and also the castles of Ravenscraig and Roslin, on the mainland.

were sung to the harp by many of the border minstrels, and the last and sweetest of them all, the "Wizard of the North," in "The Song of Harold," tells of the "storm-swept Orcades, where once St. Clairs held princely sway."³

But through the vicissitudes of fortune the family had lost their once high position, and their ancestral estates, situate mostly in the cold and barren Orkneys, no longer yielded a revenue after the abolition of the feudal tenures, and, like other of the most ancient families of that part of the island, they were of no influence in their native land. The St. Clairs, with

"About 1450 the St. Clairs were at the height of their power and opulence. At that time William St. Clair, the head of the family, was Prince of the Orkneys, Earl of Caithness and Strathorne, Baron of Roslin and Pentland, Lord Chief Justice, Lord Warden of the Marches, and High Chancellor of Scotland. When the chief St. Clair visited the royal court he traveled in great state, with more than a thousand gentlemen in his train, all of whom were his vassals and retainers.

"At length things changed, and Oliver St. Clair, the unworthy favorite of James V., lost by bad conduct the battle of Solway Moss, and so broke the heart of that monarch. From the civil war of 1642, between king and Parliament, in the Scottish rebellion in 1715, the St. Clairs adhered loyally to the house of Stuart, and hence suffered by defeat banishment and confiscation."

Mr. William H. Smith (see "Life and Public Services of Arthur St. Clair") says that the generally accepted opinion that St. Clair was a grandson of the then Earl of Roslin is erroneous, but they were descendants of a common ancestor.

The brief memoir which we contribute was written before the publication of "The St. Clair Papers," published 1882 (Cincinnati: R. Clarke & Co.). We are of opinion that it would not have detracted from the intrinsic worth of that excellent memoir—the most complete yet published, and which we anxiously looked for—if the compiler had expressed his indebtedness to some gentlemen of our own county whose work and labor he has appropriated to such good advantage; who dug out, so to speak, the ore which he cast into the crucible of history.

The title of Earl of Caithness, we may further remark, in the Scottish peerage extends back to 1455, when the family were raised to the nobility by James II. of Scotland, Henry VI. being the king of England. This did not entitle those bearing the name to sit in Parliament, but in June, 1866, the late earl was created Baron Barrowgill, and thus became a member of the House of Lords. This late earl, who died on the 10th of March, 1881, in the city of New York, where he had but just landed intending to make a tour of the United States for pleasure and health, was James Sinclair (the family having long since Anglicized their name), F.R.S., Earl of Caithness and Lord Berriedale in the peerage of Scotland, Baron Barrowgill, of Barrowgill Castle, in that of the United Kingdom, and Baronet of Nova Scotia. He was born Dec. 16, 1821; succeeded his father as fourteenth earl Dec. 24, 1855, and was created Baron Barrowgill June 12, 1866. Like his father, he became Lord Lieutenant of Caithness-shire. Caithness is a maritime county in the extreme north of Scotland; on the west side is a spot of green turf known to all school-boys as John O'Groat's House, one of the extreme ends of Great Britain. Barrowgill Castle, the present home of the family, is in Caithness, and is over six hundred years old, and the possessions include six continuous miles of sea-coast. The other country seats are Tister House, Caithness-shire, and Stagenhoe Park, in Welwyn, and there is a London residence besides. Jam. Satis.

³ "Then from his seat, with lofty air,
Rose Harold, bard of brave St. Clair;
St. Clair, who, feasting with Lord Home,
Had with that lord to battle come.
Harold was born where restless seas
Howl round the storm-swept Orcades;
Where once St. Clair held princely sway
O'er isle and islet, strait and bay:
Still nods their palace to its fall,
Thy pride and sorrow, fair Kirkwall."

See also note in "Lay of the Last Minstrel," Canto VI.; and also Capt. Wedderburn's courtship, "English and Scottish Ballads," vol. viii.

their numerous retainers, remained loyal to the StUARTS during the rebellion, and they were recompensed with banishment and the confiscation of their estates. At length an effort was made to restore in the learned professions some of that honor which had passed to other hands, which distinction was partly theirs when the sword was mightier than the pen, and the dignity of the gown was confined to the yew-tree shade of the cloister.

As Arthur could not inherit any of the landed property entailed in the direct line of primogeniture, being the son of a younger son, he made choice of the medical profession, and to secure his education entered the University of Edinburgh, famous at that day for its prominent schools in that department. After the death of his father he removed to London for the benefits afforded by the clinical practice at the great hospitals of the metropolis, and was there indentured to the celebrated Dr. William Hunter. But the noise of arms then shaking the world, he chose to relinquish his scientific calling and to follow the vocation of the soldier. When he came into the great heart of the world it was throbbing with the anticipation of future glorious actions. The rattling of drums, the blare of bugles, and the measured tramp of the files of soldiers echoed round the street corners of the capital day and night. War had been declared between Great Britain and France,¹ and under the new life infused into the nation by Pitt the young men were everywhere forsaking the pursuits of peace and enlisting. Arthur, with the help of his family, purchased an ensign's commission in the army,² and soon after, in 1758, came to America with the corps of Gen. Amherst, in the fleet under Admiral Boscawen. This was at the commencement of the French and Indian war, which, after enduring for seven years, resulted in the acquisition of the Canadian Provinces, then under the French, by the British to the American appendages of the crown. While in this army he learned the military science under such leaders as Murray, Monckton, and Wolfe, the commander of this expedition. Under Wolfe he served in the campaign against Quebec, and was with that hero when he fell in the moment of victory, after the escalading of Mount Abraham.

After remaining some time at the garrisoned fortress of Quebec, St. Clair went with a part of his regiment to Boston, then the capital town of the Northeast.

In May, 1760, he was married to Miss Phœbe Bayard, in Trinity Church, Boston, by the rector, the Rev. William Hooper. Mrs. St. Clair was born in 1743, and survived her husband some six or seven years. She was the daughter of Balthazer Bayard and Mary Bowdoin, a half-sister of Governor James Bowdoin, of Massachusetts Bay.³ With his wife he got much money.

In 1759 he had been commissioned a lieutenant; this he resigned in April, 1762.⁴ It is very likely that for a few years after his marriage he remained at Boston or Philadelphia, and that he took no further part in the French and Indian war, which terminated in 1764. But shortly after this time he manifestly was in Western Pennsylvania, as he had a parcel of the ground about Fort Pitt, which was granted him by Gen. Gage,⁵ and we believe that from 1765 until 1771 all his attention and time were centred in this region, either in watching his own pecuniary interests or in a supervisory capacity, under the commander-in-chief of the British army in America, with whom he was related, or latterly, and especially after the treaty of 1768, as an agent of the proprietors of the Province. The documentary evidence which we refer to shows that he had charge of Fort Ligonier, then one of His Majesty's forts, and that he was authorized to and did grant permits the same as a regular officer, before the Penns passed titles.⁶ Immediately after the opening of the land office, in 1769, he is identi-

³ She married Balthazer Bayard (or Byard, as they wrote it) in 1727. Died 1780.

⁴ For dates see chronological table at end of this chapter.

⁵ From the date of his resignation in the British army, that is 1762, to 1767 there is a hiatus which has not been satisfactorily filled. The copy of the permit to Frederick Rhoer, which we give in the note to Chapter VII., and which has not before this time been made public, but which fixes a part of the disputed facts, shows that in April, 1767, Arthur St. Clair, "late lieutenant in his Majesty's Sixtieth Regiment of Foot, having the care of his Majesty's fort of Legonier," was employed in these parts. But the dates of his commissions and his resignation correspond with the official records of the British army, from which they were taken. A copy of the "British Army Lists" is in the library of the New York Historical Society, and these exactly agree with those furnished from the British War Office. Many writers say that after the close of the French and Indian war (1764) Gen. Gage (who was a relative, and who afterwards commanded the British at Boston) appointed him to take command of the forts in Western Pennsylvania, and have the military stores contained in those forts removed to the headquarters of the army at New York. (See sketch in National Intelligencer, quoted in Life and Public Services, etc.; also report of Committee of Claims, etc., Senate of the United States, Mr. Brodhead, Chairman, Thirty-fourth Congress, first session; also Day's "Historical Collections," pp. 686 and 687, and Rnpp's "History of Western Pennsylvania," p. 281.) We cannot be led to believe, from the evidence within reach, that he served with Bouquet in 1763-64. There was a Capt. St. Clair with Bouquet, but not Arthur.

⁶ Pennsylvania Archives, vol. x. p. 483. St. Clair to president of Pennsylvania, 1785.

⁷ Fort Ligonier was garrisoned part of the time after Pontiac's war, 1764, by provincial troops, commissioned by the Province. (See Col. Miles' Journal, elsewhere referred to, and in Penn. Arch., Second Series, vol. ii. p. 560.) "In the year 1759 I was stationed at Ligonier, and had twenty-five men, picked out of the two battalions, under my command." At present we are not prepared to say that the Province garrisoned these forts in Western Pennsylvania prior to the purchase of 1763, but think it did not; but that they were garrisoned or at least under command of regular officers.

"His Majesty, the king of Great Britain, having conquered the French in this country, all the forts and settlements the French had is now become the property of the king of England."—Croghan's Journal, 1765.

¹ 1756.

² His mother, upon whom had rested the care of his training, died in the winter of 1756-57. His regiment was the Sixtieth, or Royal American Regiment of Foot. Date of his ensignry, 3d May, 1757. His regiment was projected by the Duke of Cumberland. It consisted of four battalions of one thousand men each. The first battalion was commanded by Monckton, the second by Lawrance. St. Clair belonged to the second battalion. It was organized under act of Parliament, 29 George II., c. v. Col. Bouquet belonged to this regiment.—Penn. Magazine, etc., No. 2, vol. iii.

fied with some transactions as their agent. He then, with his brother-in-law, Capt. Bayard, took up large bodies of land in Ligonier Valley. In the description of boundary lands in old title papers he is sometimes designated as captain and sometimes as lieutenant, but always by a military title.

In May, 1770, he, with Crawford, Thomas Gist, and Pentecost, was among the justices of the peace appointed by the proprietary government for Cumberland County. In March, 1771, he was reappointed for Bedford County, and made prothonotary and chief clerk of the courts when that county was erected at that time. He earnestly advocated the erection of a new county to the west of Laurel Hill, and when Westmoreland was formed in 1773 he was appointed by Richard Penn to the same offices he had held in Bedford. From this time till the beginning of the Revolutionary war he was the outspoken agent of the proprietaries. During 1774 his efficiency is made apparent by the records of the Province. He was in constant communication with those in authority, he advised with them, and the entire management of local affairs was left to him. In the exercise of his trust he became especially obnoxious to Dunmore, the Governor of Virginia, who demanded of the Governor of Pennsylvania that St. Clair be delivered over to him, but the demand was refused, and met with the intimation that the proprietaries were responsible for the official acts of their magistrates. During the excitement of 1774 he was the foremost one in the sight of the people; he rode day and night, and prevailed on the inhabitants not to leave, as they were about to do. But he made them take up arms in their defense; the government could not assist them, so they must assist themselves. He organized a permanent militia, and promised the rangers pay, which was guaranteed by his own obligation. Under his direction and supervision the chain of block-houses along the rivers and the old military road was established. He advised the Penns to open a road for military purposes from Kittanning to Ligonier, and to erect a fort at that point, to be garrisoned by the soldiers of the Province. This point had been pointed out by Forbes as early as 1758 as important in a military view, and was the site of Fort Armstrong.¹

The preservation of the Westmoreland settlements in 1774 is as much to be attributed to St. Clair's influence over the Indian tribes as to any other cause. He spoke to them in manly and plain words, and they had the utmost confidence in him. In one of their conferences when he was not present they called him their friend and the Pennsylvanians their brothers. Afterwards when the agents appointed by Congress came out to visit the tribes about Fort Pitt and to secure their alliance they stopped with St. Clair on their way, and prevailed with him to accompany them.

There is no doubt that St. Clair watched attentively the struggle between the colonies and the crown, and there is likewise no doubt that from the first his mind was made up. With all the traditions of the Scotch uppermost it was not in his strong nature to give in to the latest of the tyrannical rulers of his native country, which the Scotch allowed was at that day held by the tenure of usurpation. And although the war of the Revolution found him busied in domestic relations, yet he was recognized from the first as the friend of the colonies, and was in correspondence with the patriots in the East. That he was instrumental in calling the meeting at Hannastown of May 16, 1775, and that he secured the passage of the remarkable resolutions that day adopted there can be no reasonable doubt.²

DURING THE REVOLUTION.

In that pathetic and heart-moving letter which he wrote in his old age to the Congressional Committee he says that his first connection with the United States began in the year 1775. Congress had appointed commissioners to repair to Fort Pitt to treat with the Indians. On their way they called upon St. Clair, and requested him to accompany them and act as their secretary. He did so, and in the course of the negotiations formed the project of a volunteer expedition to surprise Detroit, which he thought practicable. The commissioners entered into the project warmly, and in a very short time he engaged between four and five hundred young men, who were to furnish their own horses, forage, and provisions. The measure being referred to Congress by the commissioners, was disapproved, for the reason that Gen. Arnold was at that time before Quebec, and its fall was considered certain. But Arnold failed. St. Clair was called to Philadelphia, and, resigning his office, he went to that city for instructions.

We can, in the absence of any memoir, partially trace his career through the war. He first assisted to perfect the Associators in 1775, and on Jan. 1, 1776, in the "Account of the Rules and Regulations" for the Associators sent to the committees of the different counties, there is a memorandum that those for Westmoreland were sent by Col. St. Clair. In the early ² With the extreme modesty and unobtrusiveness which always were characteristic in him, he says in his letter to Governor Penn, May 25, 1775, "I got a clause added, by which they bind themselves to assist the civil magistrates in the execution of the laws they have been accustomed to be governed by." This clause was the fourth, and began, "That we do not wish or advise any innovations," etc. But that he drafted this paper I have little doubt. In his letter to Lieut.-Col. Allen, nearly a year and a half after this (Ticonderoga, Sept. 1, 1776), he says, "If I remember rightly, there were two points on which we were perfectly agreed: First, that independence was not the interest of America if the liberties of America could be otherwise secured; Secondly, if foreign troops were employed to reduce America to absolute submission, that independence or any other mode was justifiable." This letter is a most noble one. Here is the substance of the third and fifth clauses, and part of the conditions for which the colonies went to war. Who else here was likely to talk of a "licentious soldiery" in the same sense as he, from a personal knowledge?

¹ For a full account of these affairs see Penn. Archives, vol. iv.

part of 1776 he was commissioned colonel by Congress in the Continental service, and was stationed in the eastern part of the State, where he was engaged in different capacities in organizing, recruiting, supplying, and provisioning the volunteers.¹ He advanced money to his own detriment in this service, some of which he did not get reimbursed for till many years after the war was over. As fast as the troops could be furnished for campaigning he forwarded them, and being himself ordered with other contingents to cover the retreat of the American army from Canada under Arnold, he recruited and equipped for his own command six full companies without expense to the State, and marched them by the 1st of May to the vicinity of Quebec.²

This campaign had been planned by Gen. Montgomery, but it came to an unfortunate termination. Montgomery was killed before Quebec, and Arnold, the next in command, who himself was wounded, conducted the retreat. St. Clair served with Wayne under Gen. Thompson, the successor of Arnold, but who dying soon after he came to the command was succeeded by Gen. Sullivan. Here his former military knowledge was of much advantage, for he it was who suggested to Gen. Thompson, who was then in command, the practicability of taking post at the village of Three Rivers to prevent the British transports from passing up the river. The plan was approved, and St. Clair was sent to take up a position. Sullivan now having arrived and taken command of the army, detached Thompson with reinforcements to support St. Clair and to take the command. But being overpowered and pushed back, and Thompson having been killed, the command fell to St. Clair, who carried the broken detachment back through the midst of a constantly increasing enemy to the headquarters at Sorel.

The American army now withdrew from Canada in as masterful a manner as it had marched thither. The army went into quarters at Crown Point and Ticonderoga, and there St. Clair remained during the summer in camp duty. On Sunday, the 28th of July, to the soldiers drawn up in long lines, he read the Declaration of Independence which had been adopted by the Congress, when they threw their caps in air and cheered for the cause of the United Colonies.

In August of this year, 1776, he was made a brigadier, and joined Washington, who was then retreating across the Jerseys before the elated British army under Howe. He fought under the eyes of the commander-in-chief in the closing battles of this campaign, at White Plains, at Trenton, and at Princeton,³ and all informed writers agree that he suggested to Washington that ruse of war by which the Hessians were surprised at Princeton.

The campaign of 1777 opened with favor to the British. The fearful retreat from Long Island, and the miserable condition of the Continental army, encouraged the British to push this campaign with energy, and thus speedily crush out this rising sedition.

The plan of the British generals was to divide the colonies by the line of Hudson River, Lake George, and Lake Champlain. Clinton was to go up the river, and above Albany to unite with Burgoyne, who was to come down from Canada. The success of this plan would have been well-nigh fatal to the prospect of American independence. Between Lake Champlain and Lake George was situated the strong fortress of Ticonderoga, the same which Col. Ethan Allen had taken by the authority of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress. This fortress commanded the lakes and the passage of the isthmus. While it was held it debarred Burgoyne from effecting the junction. To hold this point was, therefore, of the utmost importance. St. Clair, who enjoyed the confidence of the commander-in-chief, was raised to the rank of major-general, and superseding Gen. Schuyler, was sent with three thousand men to take command of the post, and at all hazards to hold it.

Burgoyne, passing Lake Champlain, took Crown Point and advanced against Ticonderoga. Gen. Schuyler, before he was transferred, had put the fortress in good order. On the 19th of June, 1777, operations were commenced against the post. On the 20th of July the soldiers of Burgoyne took possession of Mount Defiance, a point on the right of the Americans. This position adjoined and overlooked the fortress, but being deemed inaccessible, it had remained unoccupied by the Continentals. By the use of tackle, cannon were hoisted up its side by the enemy until the arms and the force there were sufficient to dislodge the garrison.

St. Clair called a council of officers, and among them it was unanimously agreed that the hills which ³ Respectively, Oct. 28, 1776, Dec. 26, 1776, and January, 1777. Bancroft goes to extra pains to prove that St. Clair did not advise Washington in this successful engagement, and he labors hard to support a contrary position, but in this he is at issue with numerous authorities. See Wilkinson's "Memoirs," G. W. Greene's "Life of Gen. Nathaniel Greene," and St. Clair's "Narrative." It is not, however, questioned that he directed the details of the march and the incidental preparation (Bryant's "Popular History of the United States," chap. xxi, 532). "Soon after midnight the troops quietly withdrew by detachments, and marching by the right moved upon Princeton. St. Clair's brigade of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Massachusetts troops, with two six-pounders, marched at the head of the column, with which Gen. Washington rode."—"Life and Public Services," etc., vol. i. p. 37, as quoting Wilkinson.

This campaign made him a major-general. In March, 1777, on the resignation of Col. Reed, St. Clair was detailed by Washington as adjutant-general.

¹ The Council of Safety on the 18th of July, 1775, recommended the enrollment of all able-bodied men into regiments or battalions. The militia of Westmoreland were enrolled, and St. Clair was elected colonel. See Memorandum Book of the Committee and Council of Safety for 1776 and 1777, Pa. Arch., Second Series, vol. i., for services in the colony and State. He was commissioned colonel of the Second Battalion Jan. 3, 1776. He with Cols. Sbee, Wayne, and Magaw were in command of the four battalions of Pennsylvania troops to be raised for the Continental Service. For history of the Second Battalion, see Chap. XVIII.

² For his services and the campaign in Canada, see Chapter XVIII.

commanded the fort ought to have been previously fortified; that it was too late for them now to be fortified; that if fortified it would require fully ten thousand men to man and hold them; and that the force at the disposal of the general was not in any way adequate to meet the enemy. It was determined, therefore, to abandon the post.

But the withdrawing the army now was a retreat. The American force retired under cover to Hubbards-town and thence to Castleton, about thirty miles from Ticonderoga, where a stand was made. The British and German light troops had been sent in pursuit, and on the 7th of August overtook the rear-guard under Col. Warner at Castleton. The attack was sharp and bloody, and the British at first were routed, but the Americans not being supported by their comrades, the British and mercenaries renewed their attack, and with the bayonet dispersed the whole force of the rear-guard, with the loss to us of three hundred men. Col. Warner came in with the rest of his troops at Fort Ann. Altogether the loss of the Americans in this, one of the most disastrous retreats of the war, was about one thousand men, killed, wounded, and prisoners.

Of course a clamor was raised. Reasons plenty as blackberries were given why St. Clair should not be shot, hung and quartered, banished. Some said he was incompetent, some cowardly, some treacherous. He said little, but demanded of right an inquiry in due form into his conduct and the circumstances of the surrender. After waiting for a long time a court of inquiry at last was formed, which was composed of some of the best officers in the army, which after sitting and considering the whole affair critically and with deliberation exculpated him from guilt; and some then said that although he lost a fortress he saved a State. Burgoyne was forced to give his sword to Gates at Saratoga, and the two British armies were not, after all, joined together, notwithstanding their sanguine anticipations.¹

¹ From the surrender of Ticonderoga and the retreat a prejudice was raised against St. Clair which he never could get rid of, and which his enemies never ceased to make capital of. Good military men say that no better generalship was displayed throughout the war than that displayed by him in withdrawing his army and saving it from capture. The United States Gazette, a high authority in the army, has said on this subject in a sketch of St. Clair, in speaking of his defense before the court of inquiry, "His defense on that occasion is still extant, and exhibits a sample of profound generalship. Whilst the English language shall be admired, it will continue to be an example of martial eloquence."

Facts dispel illusions. Gen. Burgoyne's army numbered 7863 men, including 200 Canadians and 400 Indians; St. Clair had 2200 men. Burgoyne's artillery numbered 142 guns, and his was the best equipped army for an offensive campaign in the field. The American works were equipped with 100 cannon of indifferent calibre and a small force of inexperienced artillerymen to serve them.—Life and Public Services, etc., p. 60.

St. Clair left the Northern Department on the 20th of August (1777), in obedience to the orders of Congress, to report at headquarters and await an inquiry into his management at the North. Washington still remained faithful to him and never lost confidence in him. He, after St. Clair demanded it, urged the court of inquiry to be held. In September, 1778, a court-martial, of which Maj.-Gen. Lincoln was presi-

During the time which intervened from the surrender till the board of inquiry had finished their sittings he was suspended from any command. He was, however, with the army, and at Brandywine fought as a volunteer, and had a horse shot from under him during the engagement. He was with the army at headquarters at Valley Forge. The court of inquiry not censuring him he was reinstated in public confidence, and was intrusted with the very arduous duties of organizing the levies of Pennsylvania and New Jersey and sending them out to the armies in the field when needed. After the treason of Arnold, St. Clair was detailed by Washington to hold West Point, and he succeeded Gates in command at Philadelphia. On September the 29th, 1780, he sat with Lafayette, Parsons, Clinton, Knox, Huntington, and others, all well known for their uprightness, on the trial of Maj. André, adjutant-general of the British army, who made their unanimous report that André ought to be considered as a spy from the enemy and suffer death.

When the last campaign was closing in the South, St. Clair with Wayne, who together were using all their ingenuity in converting three old long-tailed coats into two short ones, and two old hats into one infantry cap, so that the men would bear some similarity with each other, was assigned with reinforcements to the Southern department, where the war was then raging. When the combined American and French armies circled around the British at Yorktown, St. Clair was there. Having arrived some time before the surrender, he was with that galaxy of illustrious men who stood in the trenches when the cause of the colonies was decided. He was then sent to reinforce Greene with the Pennsylvania troops, and they formed a junction in the beginning of 1782.²

IN CIVIL LIFE.

St. Clair came out of the Revolutionary conflict, not with the glory of some, but with the confidence of his great commander, and with the undiminished respect and esteem of his fellow-officers. He immediately entered into civil affairs. In 1783 he was elected a member of the Executive Council of Pennsylvania, this department of the State government was organized, and after a thorough hearing concluded their finding in the following words:

"The Court having duly considered the charges against Major-General St. Clair and the evidence, are unanimously of opinion that he is not guilty of either the charges preferred against him, and do unanimously acquit him of all and every of them with the highest honor."

² In 1783, at the solicitation of Congress, then in Philadelphia, he went to the new levies (who had marched from Lancaster to the Congress to demand their pay, having refused to accept their discharge until they were paid), and succeeded by his personal influence, together with Lafayette as his colleague, in quieting their mutinous spirit and sending them back to Lancaster.

Feb. 24, 1784, he was made auctioneer of the city of Philadelphia by a resolution of the General Assembly. He got into much trouble from this, as will be seen further on, he having appropriated some of the money he collected to pay individual debts,—bail money. The office was lucrative. On the 13th of April, 1787, he was relieved of the office.

reposing in a Council of Censors. He was returned for the county of Philadelphia, with Frederick A. Muhlenberg as his colleague. He made Philadelphia his home, and his family had resided there while he was in the army. He attended all the sittings of the Council. In its proceedings, and in the proceedings incident to the calling of the Constitutional Convention of 1791, we have the first visible line between the old political parties whose hostility to each other became so great. St. Clair invariably took sides with that party which afterwards was known as the Federal party, and which, under the leadership of Hamilton, antagonized the administration of Jefferson.

In 1785, St. Clair was elected to Congress, the members of that body being returned by the vote of the Assembly. In 1787 he was chosen president of that body. In 1790 he was the Federalist candidate for Governor of the State, but was defeated by Gen. Mifflin. This was at the first election for a chief magistrate under the constitutional form. Mifflin was not only a popular man, but he belonged to the party which was the popular party of the State. But although St. Clair was unfortunate for his own advantage in falling in with the destinies of that party, no one that knows his character would be bold enough to say that he belonged to it without principle. No man could separate principle from consequences better than he.

Under the act of Congress of July 13, 1787, St. Clair was appointed by President Washington and confirmed by Congress Governor of the Northwestern Territory, the Territory embracing all the region of country lying north and west of the Ohio River.¹ On July the 9th, 1788, he arrived at Fort Harmar, now Marietta. At this place, as the seat of the territorial government, he resided with his family.² On the 15th of July he published the order of Congress for the government, and soon after appointed judges and other officers. On January the 2d, 1791, when he arrived at Fort Washington, the site of Cincinnati, previous to his military expedition, he organized Hamilton County, which name he gave it after Alexander Hamilton, the Secretary of the United States Treasury, and the beau ideal of the Federalists. Cincinnati was called in compliment to the Society of the Cincinnati, organized by officers who had seen actual service in the armies of the continent, and of which society St. Clair was an active member.

The Indians being still hostile to the settlers in the western country where these were unable to resist them under their strange confederation and the new leaders who had risen among them, Gen. Harmar was sent out with a body of regulars and militia to subdue them and to destroy their towns. But Harmar was defeated with terrible slaughter among his ranks, and his army was so crippled that a new one had to be organized for further operations. In the following year, 1791, St. Clair, on the recommendation of President Washington, was appointed commander-in-chief of the army, and vested with powers almost dictatorial within his territory. He had a force of two thousand regulars placed at his disposal, and was empowered to call out such reinforcements of militia as might be necessary. In September, 1791, an army the largest and most efficient in officers, in numbers, and in equipage of any yet seen in the West was assembled at Fort Washington, the site of Cincinnati. This was under command of St. Clair. There were three complete regiments of United States infantry, two companies of artillery, and one company of cavalry. There were six hundred militia to join him there, but most of these came up after he had left. They commenced their march on the 17th of September. They cut a road through the wilderness and erected Fort Hamilton, on the Great Miami, some distance above Fort Washington. On the 4th of October they marched twenty miles farther, and built Fort Jefferson. A garrison was left at both posts. On the 24th of October they marched from the latter post. Shortly after they had left one of the militia regiments deserted, as these not infrequently did when about to meet the enemy, not being under regular discipline, called out only for a short time in an emergency, and commanded by officers who disliked superior authority. The First Regiment of regulars was detached in pursuit of these, so that the army was now weakened and did not number above fourteen hundred men. The main body, however, moved forward to where Fort Recovery was afterwards erected by Gen. Wayne, now within the limits of Mercer County, Ohio.

The villages of the Miami Indians were supposed to be only about twelve miles in distance from here. At this place, it being the head-waters of the Wabash River, where a number of small creeks flowed in from various directions, the army encamped. The general had it in view to throw up some earthworks in order to hold a secure position, and to protect his baggage and artillery till the other regiment should come up, before advancing farther in the hostile country. This was on the 3d of November. Late that afternoon, and in the evening, the general was engaged with the engineers in planning the proposed works. At night the sentries were posted, and everything appeared quiet. The army was encamped in two lines. The front of the first line was covered by a creek, the one side by the river, while a creek protected the flank of the second line. During the night there was no alarm whatever, and consequently no suspicion of danger.

¹ The Congress of which he was president passed the ordinance.

² The citizens of Marietta gave special attention to the preparation of a residence for Governor St. Clair, and in the winter of 1790 his son Arthur, twenty-one years of age, and three daughters, Louisa, Jane, and Margaret, with a middle-aged, sensible colored woman, who acted as cook and housekeeper, took possession. Mrs. St. Clair still remained in the East.—(Life and Public Services, etc., p. 160.)

For a description of Louisa St. Clair, the eldest of these daughters, and of the brilliance of her intellectual accomplishments, etc., see Hildreth's "Pioneer History," quoted in "Life and Public Services," etc., p. 160.

Some few hours before daybreak, under the expectation of an attack, or at least to have the men in a state of readiness, the general had the reveille beaten and the troops paraded under arms. They thus stood watchful till daybreak, when they were dismissed to their tents to get some further rest. But the men had scarcely lain down when a rifle fired from some of the militiamen in front was followed by a sharp irregular volley in the same direction. The drums beat, the officers formed the men, the militia came pouring in from the front, and in a few minutes all was stir and confusion. The militia coming in, pursued by swarms of Indians, broke over the ranks of the regulars, and bore down all before them. The Indians themselves penetrated beyond the first ranks, and tomahawked some of the wounded officers who had been carried back to have their wounds dressed. In no long time the whole body of the army was encompassed by a livid stream of fire on all sides round. St. Clair was suffering from a fever, and was unable to mount a horse, but part of the time during the battle was carried from place to place on a litter. False allegations of cowardice were imputed to him; but there is nothing to warrant this. He was not in respect to his person a coward, but the reverse is the truth. During this engagement he had eight bullet-shots through his clothes, and he was among the last to leave the field of battle. He directed the men to carry him to the place where the firing was the heaviest, and where the men were falling on all sides. Here the brave Col. Darke, an officer of Revolutionary distinction, was trying his utmost to allay the consternation of the men and to hold the lines steady. When St. Clair came up he directed the colonel and his men to make a sudden and rapid charge with the bayonet. The charge was made and with some effect, for swarms of the red-backed creatures rose up before the lines of infantry out of the high grass and fled before them. But as the soldiers could not overtake them, they recovered their courage, and soon after from behind every kind of shelter poured such a fire upon the soldiers that they in turn were driven back. A second time was the charge with the bayonet made and followed with the same result. When the artillery was brought up the horses and the men were destroyed before they could do any service.

But we cannot recount the battle at length. It is enough to say that the whites resisted bravely, but were borne back through the wild lands. Discipline availed little. The panic spread to all the troops. Behind every tree was an Indian, and with the bullets came flights of arrows, whose murderous wounds made the men shriek out. It is said the savages never showed more bravery. They ran in screaming, and tomahawked the men in the ranks or among their comrades. The men were sometimes huddled together like sheep, whence the slaughter, in respect of the number engaged, was prodigious. The ranks could not be formed in military order, and the fieldpieces of the regulars were of no use. These were finally captured by the Indians, with the exception of two which were thrown into one of the streams. Many died heroically. Acts of daring and of heroism which have delighted two generations of readers are recorded in the various tales of the border. It was long reported, and it is yet historically asserted, that the water of the creek to the front was reddened with blood. The men at last gave way, and the retreat became a panic. A part of the army reached Fort Washington. Few of the munitions were saved, for the men threw away even their arms. When the second army of Kentucky volunteers which afterwards came out took possession of the battle-field, the found within a little space three hundred skull-bones, and for miles the road was strewn with the remains of the army. From the official lists of the adjutant-general, five hundred and ninety-three were reported¹ dead and two hundred and fourteen wounded.

The chief of the hostiles in this battle was Mishikinakwa, or Little Turtle, a son of a Miami chief by a Mohican woman. He was the chief leader of the warriors of all the tribes in that country. He died in 1812, and his grave is shown to the whites near Fort Wayne. His portrait may be seen in the War Office at Washington.

He has been described by one who saw him at Montreal soon after the defeat. He was at that time a little over forty-five years of age, was six feet high, of a very sour and morose countenance, and appar-

¹ Echoes of the Battle.—"On the day of battle Gen. St. Clair was not in his uniform, but wore a coarse caffo coat and a three-cornered hat. He had a long cue and large locks flowing beneath his heaver. Early in the action, when near the artillery, a ball grazed the side of his face and cut off a portion of one of his locks. During the action eight balls passed through his clothes and hat. After his horses were killed he exerted himself on foot for a considerable time during the action with a degree of alertness that surprised everybody who saw him. After being on foot for some time, and when nearly exhausted, a pack-horse was brought to him. This he rode during the remainder of the day, although he could scarcely prick him out of a walk." He had two horses killed, one after the other, in the act of mounding them.

Narrative of the Campaign.

The great Mohawk chief, Tha-yen-da-ne-ge-a (Joseph Brant, alias Capt. Brant), was, so well-informed historians say, in this battle, although not suspected on account of the professions of friendship for the Americans. This calls to mind the "legend of Louisa St. Clair," in which the story is that young Brant, the son of the great chief, and who was in love with Louisa St. Clair, was there, and that he ordered his warriors to shoot St. Clair's horses but not him. To this was accounted the noteworthy reason of his having so many horses killed about him and himself escaping unhurt. This "legend," being nothing but a romantic love story, was once very popular in the Northwest, and is yet to be met with in republications.—See "Life and Public Services," etc., quoted above.

From the Congressional Committee's Report Appointed to Inquire into the Defeat.

"The committee conceive it but justice to the commander-in-chief to say that in their opinion the failure of the late expedition can in no respect be imputed to his conduct, either at any time before or during the action, but that as his conduct in all the preparatory arrangements was marked with peculiar ability and zeal, so his conduct during the action furnishes strong testimonies of his coolness and intrepidity."

ently very crafty and subtle. His dress was Indian moccasins, a blue petticoat that came half-way down his thighs, a European surtout and waistcoat. His head was bound by an Indian cap, which hung half-way down his back, and almost entirely covered with plain silver brooches, to the number of more than two hundred. He had two ear-rings to each ear. The upper part of each of these was formed by three medals about the size of a dollar; the lower part was formed of quarter-dollars, and fell more than twelve inches from his ears, one from each ear over his breast, the other over his back. He had three very large nose jewels of silver, which were curiously plaited.

St. Clair held the commission of Governor of the Northwestern Territory from 1787 to 1802, a period of fifteen years, when he was removed by President Jefferson. Fault has been found with Jefferson for this act, and those who take exception assert that it was done with a spiteful political spirit. St. Clair was a strong Federalist, an adorer of the political doctrines of Hamilton. He had been indiscreet in his expressions of favor for the unpopular administration of John Adams, who brought contempt and opprobrium upon his party by the countenance he gave the notorious and justly obnoxious alien and sedition laws. But, taken on the whole, we are of opinion it would necessitate a misconstruction of motives and facts and require yet undiscovered testimony to establish authoritatively the assertion that St. Clair's removal was instigated by the malevolence of Jefferson.¹

As Governor of that Territory which now exists as five independent States and includes millions of the foremost citizens of the Republic, his duties were arduous, his toil unceasing, and the results marvelous.

¹ The truth is great opposition had grown up against St. Clair as Governor on account of antagonism to the formation of a State out of a portion of the Territory, which was the nearly unanimous wish and desire of the inhabitants of Ohio, and also on account of his avowed opposition to the new State's constitution, and of his disagreement with a majority of the Legislature of the Territory. His biographer, the Hon. W. H. Smith, who certainly has not countenanced the action of Jefferson in removing St. Clair, says, "It is known that Mr. Jefferson's friendship for St. Clair influenced him, and that it was only after it was reported to him some months later, upon what seemed to be reliable authority, that Governor St. Clair had spoken against Democratic government that he issued the order of removal."—Life and Public Services, etc., vol. i., 240.

"He even entered the lists in a public discussion, and printed a pamphlet in defense of the administration after the blunder of the alien and sedition law, and sent it to Mr. Adams with his compliments."—Ibid., 234.

Announcement of Removal.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, Nov. 22, 1802.

"ARTHUR ST. CLAIR, Esq.:

"SIR,—The President observing in an address lately delivered by you to the Convention held at Chillicothe an Intemperance and Indecorum of language towards the Legislature of the United States, and a disordering spirit and tendency of very evil example, and grossly violating the rules of conduct enjoined by your public station, determines that your commission as Governor of the Northwestern Territory shall cease on receipt of this notification.

"I am, etc.,

"JAMES MADISON."

For an idea of the duties incumbent on him and the large discretionary power vested in him, one should examine the ordinances and the laws of Congress relative to the subject. By these he was made not only the executive but the law-giver of that vast extent of country, as he and his judges in council had the power not only to enforce but to make the laws for its government. But he devoted himself here, as he did elsewhere, wholly to the duties of his trust. The early records of the State of Ohio attest his labors. Although his salary was not adequate to cover even his traveling expenses, he never once relaxed his exertions. He seems to have been well aware of the importance and the magnitude of the trust reposed in him. He established laws, erected counties, selected officers, fixed titles, held treaties with the Indians, and saw that justice was administered in due form of law. He refers to this subject in the answer to the ladies of New York, who in his latter days had presented him with a small sum of money:

"I had fondly hoped," says he, "that my military services had been of benefit to my country; but let that pass. Besides these services, which you have so kindly eulogized, I, at my own expense in a great measure, raised up a colony to the United States from thirty men to sixty thousand; amalgamated the most heterogeneous mass of population; carried law, religion, and manners to the extreme bounds of the Territory; made the people happy, and laid the foundation for the continuance of that happiness to millions yet unborn, in the accomplishment of which every faculty of mind and body were unceasingly employed."

And in this he evidences the prescient wisdom of prophecy.

HIS LAST DAYS.

Upon his removal from the governorship St. Clair came back to Ligonier Valley. Here, in the midst of a large tract of land, he had in the latter part of his official career erected a house in anticipation of the time when he should be relieved of public duties; here part of his family resided before he came back, and here he fondly hoped to pass the remainder of his life in the agreeable ease and rest which the soldier in the camp and the statesman in the council-room always anticipates. The building was regarded as a sumptuous and well-apportioned mansion-house for the time. It was handsomely painted and papered, and besides ordinary apartments had a suite of bedrooms. It was situated about two miles northwest of Ligonier, near Mill Creek. Nothing now remains of the original structure intact except the room which he left with its quaintly-carved mantel-piece and wainscoting. The painting over the fireplace has been destroyed. Here he settled down with his family, and began to build up in his old days his broken fortune. He erected a furnace, and for a time carried on the manufacture of castings, but after a few years leased the works to James Hamilton & Co. at a rental of three thousand dollars per annum. He also got his mill in running order, and continued actively engaged in business until he was crippled by the executions of his creditors.

The history of his financial embarrassment is not devoid of interest. The blind goddess in this as in all things treated him rudely. He got with his wife fourteen thousand pounds (equivalent to seventy thousand dollars). Besides this he had large donations of land from the king, from the Penns, from the State, and from Congress. His investments in real estate, so far as the investments went, were judicious, but these all in his sinister fortune melted away like snow in the sunshiu. He drew salaries and was in the possession of emoluments and perquisites during all his public life, but these scarcely reached from one accounting day to the next. He was always in a position to invest and speculate in remunerative and safe enterprises, but he never tainted his hands with bribes or touched what bore the semblance of peculation. In a letter to his friend, the Hon. William B. Giles, he says that the office of Governor of the Northwestern Territory was forced on him by his friends, who thought it would be an opportunity of replenishing his finances; but it proved otherwise, for he "had neither the taste nor the genius for speculation in land, nor did he consider it consistent with his office." So when he retired here, after his removal from office, he was hopelessly in debt, and some years later was sold out by the sheriff.

It is perhaps true that some of his losses were caused by negligence, and might not have happened had he been more provident, but nearly all his financial embarrassment is chargeable to the zeal with which he served his country, and were debts due and owing by the people of the republic, in whose service he was employed all his life. When he went to the Revolutionary army he left his mill—the first one erected in the West—to his neighbors for their use while he was gone. When he took possession of it on his return he found it a pile of rubbish. In one of his memorials he states that when he went to the army he could not leave his young wife, born and bred in the city of Boston, of the first connections there, and accustomed to the most fashionable circles, on a frontier so hostile, and was thus compelled to dispose of his principal farm, on which he had expended a large amount of money, at great sacrifice. He sold it for £2000, payable in installments, but so rapid was the depreciation of the Continental currency that of this amount he lost £1900. He then had to purchase a house in the East for his family while he was in the service. This he sold at the end of the war; one-half of the price he lost by the bankruptcy and suicide of the purchaser. He indorsed for his friends and fellow-officers, and by this lost large sums, which he paid upon demand so far as he was able.

From 1803 to 1813, at various times, St. Clair presented memorials to Congress and to the Assembly of Pennsylvania for relief. In these memorials he himself gives the cause or occasion which induced him to present them. To the Assembly he says that as early as 1774 he supplied nearly all the forts and block-houses in Westmoreland County with arms and the means of defense at his own expense. When, in the darkest days of the Revolution, Washington, seeing his army melting away like snow, appealed to him to save to him the Pennsylvania line, the flower of the army, St. Clair immediately responded by advancing the money for recruiting and for bounty, and by St. Clair's and Col. William Butler's individual exertions and influence their object was accomplished. To part of this claim the government afterwards pleaded the statute of limitations. He was shut out on this statute by substantially the following argument: "True it is, we, the government of the United States, do justly owe you so and so much, but because you have never asked to be repaid until now the presumption of the law is that you have been repaid." But the indebtedness which was the direct cause of his losing his real property had been contracted during his governorship. During his incumbency of this office he acted as superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory, and in that capacity negotiated several treaties of importance, in the transaction of which to a successful termination it was apparent that the appropriation by Congress was inadequate, whence he was compelled to advance funds out of his own pocket to consummate his ends. In negotiating one of these treaties he expended about $16,000, and for which only $8000 had been appropriated. When the army for the campaign of 1791 had collected together, and it was found that the sum authorized by Congress for the purpose was too small for the exigencies of the project, he personally guaranteed to the quartermaster-general, James O'Harra, the repayment of a large sum in order that the army might be victualed and supplied. When he presented his account in 1799 for payment, he was informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that there "were no moneys appropriated by the Legislature to pay such further disbursements." On this subject St. Clair says that he became personally liable to the contractor, O'Harra, to whom he gave his bond for $7042, on the express promise of the Secretary of the Treasury that it should be repaid with interest. This bond remaining unpaid, suit was brought, and judgment obtained against St. Clair by his own confession for $10,632.17, debt and interest. Upon this judgment execution was from time to time issued, and upon it the entire remaining part unsold, which included all his real estate, was sold. The time of sale could not have happened at a more inopportune time. The embargo had driven money out of the country. The valuation of that part of his real estate levied upon under these executions has been fixed at $50,000; but it did not fetch more than paid the debt and accrued interest upon this one judgment. James O'Harra, by his lawyer, bought all the property.

Judgment was confessed upon the O'Harra bond in August, 1803, and the sheriff, Alexander Johnston, Esq., soon after, by the orders of O'Harra through

Mr. Ross, his attorney, levied upon all the property, but no sales were made until June, 1808. The tract of land, upon which were the mansion-house, grist-mill, and furnace, was sold for four thousand dollars, although at the time it was rented out at three thousand dollars per annum. The last tract was sold Oct. 15, 1810.

Previous to this a nameless, heartless wretch—a Shylock of a neighbor—had bought up all his due-bills, brought suit upon each one separately, and on them sold all his goods and chattels. They took everything from him they could get, and left him only one bed and bedding, a few books of his English and classical library (among which was his favorite Horace), and a bust of John Paul Jones, which had been sent to him by Jones himself from Paris, and which he prized highly.

In his days of adversity the Assembly of Pennsylvania pensioned him with a small amount, which in 1817, the year before his death, was increased to fifty dollars a month. Congress, the year of his death, passed an act allowing him sixty dollars a month, and dated it back one year. Of this he got not one cent, for greedy creditors were watching, and it was attached before it left the fingers of the treasurer. Had it not been for the little he got from the State of Pennsylvania, and what he received through charity, he would not have had enough to relieve the pangs of hunger.

INTERIOR OF ST. CLAIR'S HOUSE.

The last period of his life is a period not pleasing to contemplate. After he was turned out of house and home he removed to the summit of Chestnut Ridge, and there lived in a log house alongside the old State road. The cabin stood on a barren and rocky piece of land which his son Daniel, who had saved some little money, bought as an asylum for his old father and family. Here, to nurse life a little longer, to keep his family together, to care for his wife, now hurt in intellect, and to get coarse bread for his dependent flock of children and grandchildren, he kept tavern for the entertainment of the traveling public.¹ His hereditary disease (the gout) afflicted him greatly, so that his declining days were as full of misery as of grief.

But the lack of bread was of all his ills the least.² Poverty of itself is no disgrace, and to men like him who had given all for others, and who found no one to give him anything, it is a crown of glory though of thorns, around which rests an aureola of never-ending radiance. There is a text in the Holy Scriptures which reads, "At two things my heart is grieved: a man of war fainting through poverty; and a man of sense despised."³ There were those who mocked and jeered at the Samson now shorn of his locks,—these were the asses who came and kicked their heels into the face of the dying lion,—mean, brainless, insulting men, who in their cups sang ditties within his hearing which charged him with the death of those who had fallen in battle, and still more worthless curs who charged him to his face with cowardice.⁴ But no one who was capable of appreciating nobleness, and who could instinctively recognize true manhood, ever stepped beneath his lowly roof without recognizing himself to be in the presence of a gentleman, a scholar, a soldier, a statesman, a patriot.⁵ Nowhere

¹ Arthur St. Clair was recommended for tavern licenses, Jan. 24, 1814.

We may say here, in passing, the Westmoreland court records show among other things that in 1793 (June 11th), St. Clair gave his recognizance for the appearance of some defendants in court. Aug. 30, 1793, his name is at the head of a petition for a road, which being granted the order was lifted in September, 1794, by "Gen. St. Clair." These show that he was in Westmoreland at those dates.

² In his justly admired letter of thanks to the ladies of New York, who had sent him four hundred dollars, which letter is dated "Chestnut Ridge, 4th March, 1813," is this paragraph: "To soothe affliction is certainly a happy privilege, and it is the appropriate privilege of the fair sex, and nobly have the ladies of New York exercised it; and though I feel all I can feel for the relief brought to myself, their attention to my daughters touches me the most. Had I not met with distress I should not have, perhaps, known their worth. Though all their prospects in life (and they were once very flattering) have been blasted, not a sigh, not a murmur has been allowed to escape them in my presence, and all their pains have been directed to rendering my reverses less affecting to me, and yet I can truly testify that it is entirely on their account that my situation ever gave me one moment's pain."

³ Ecclesiasticus, xxvi., 25, 26.—Douay Edition.

⁴ The ballad of St. Clair's defeat was in the early part of this century very popular in Western Pennsylvania. I have heard from old persons that there were some drunken, abandoned creatures who took especial delight in singing at it when St. Clair was in Youngstown or in Ligonier. One verse was this:

"'Twas on the fourth day of November in the year of ninety-one,
We had a sore engagement near to Fort Jefferson;
St. Clair was our commander, which may well remembered be,
For we lost nine hundred men in the Western Ter-ri-to-ree."

Several versions of this ballad still exist, and there are two preserved in Dr. Frank Cowan's "Poems and Ballads," etc.

⁵ The biographer of Gen. Lewis Cass, quoted in "Life and Public Service," etc., p. 252, refers to Cass' acquaintance with St. Clair, and thus describes him: "Gen. St. Clair was a most interesting relic of the Revolutionary period; tall, erect, though advanced in years, well educated, gentlemanly, thoroughly acquainted with the world, and abounding in anecdote descriptive of the men and scenes he had encountered in his eventful career. Lewis Cass saw him for the last time some years before his death in a rude cabin, supporting himself by selling supplies to the

and at no time and under no circumstance did the superior manhood of the man appear to better advantage. Here he forgot that the country had taken from him the best years of his life, and after having taken and appropriated his services and his money when it was needy and helpless, refused to recompense him now that it was able and strong. He even forgot himself, and of all those whose names were subscribed to the institution of the Order of the Cincinnati, of which he was president for the State of Pennsylvania, none could so appropriate the motto which encircled the medallion on the breast of the eagle of their decoration, "Omnia relinquit servare rempublicam."

At length this life, of which want, neglect, contumely, ingratitude and injustice, domestic inquietude and disease so largely made a part, drew to a close. On the 30th of August, 1818, as he was coming down the road from his home to Youngstown, at the foot of the ridge, driving his pony in a rough, jolting wagon, by some means he fell or was thrown out on the ground. The road was rough and very abrupt, and as the turnpike had lately been opened this road was suffered to fall into neglect. When he was found he was insensible. His pony had moved no great distance. He was taken home and cared for; but he never gained consciousness, and on the next day the great soul, overladen with unutterable woe and misery, was at rest for evermore.¹

From a copy of the Register which contains the proceedings of the meetings at Greensburg we obtain the following:²

"When, therefore, the news of the death of the general reached Greensburg, the inhabitants of the town, who held his services and his character in high regard, met in a public meeting at the court-house; James Brady, Esq., was called to preside, and Richard Coulter, Esq., was selected as secretary. At the meeting the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the wishes of the corporation and citizens of Greensburg that the remains of the late Maj.-Gen. Arthur Saint Clair may be interred in the burying-ground in said place be respectfully communicated to the family of the deceased.

"Resolved, That the following gentlemen be a committee of arrangement to superintend the funeral, if the family of the deceased consent to the removal of the remains, Dr. James Postlewaithe, A. W. Foster, John Reed, Simon Drum, Jr., John H. Wise, George Armstrong, Daniel Maclean, and Richard Coulter.

"JAMES BRADY, Chairman.

"RICHARD COULTER, Sec."

The following letter was sent to Mrs. Louisa Robb, the eldest daughter of the general:

"GREENSBURG, August 31st, 1818.

"MADAM:

"In obedience to the resolution of the corporation and citizens of Greensburg, we beg leave respectfully to present to the family of Gen. St. Clair their condolence at the melancholy event of his death. Desirous to express some small token of respect for the memory of a man whose name is conspicuous on the page of our history as one of the heroes who achieved our Independence, we are directed to obtain permission from the family that the body of our lamented friend may be deposited near us.

"Mr. Drum will have all necessary arrangements made at Youngstown, in union with those which are preparing here, to do honor for the occasion.

"We are, Madam, respectfully
(signed by the Committee of Arrangement).

"MRS. LOUISA ROBB."

In addition to the prompt action taken by the citizens of the borough, arrangements had also been made both at Ligonier and at Unity burying-ground, with the expectation that the remains would be laid at one or the other of these places,³ but the consent of the family was finally obtained to have them rest in the graveyard of the Presbyterian congregation at Greensburg.

The committee went to the home of the deceased and accompanied the remains. The funeral was received about a mile from town by the Greensburg Volunteers, commanded by Col. Ely Coulter, and the Masonic lodge joined the procession on the road about half a mile out. The procession halted in the ² The article, in addition to this, gives a biographical sketch of St. Clair, which, we may remark, has furnished the substantial material for every sketch which we have yet met with. That part of it was copied entire and submitted as an original contribution to Morris & Willis' New York Mirror, under the heading of "American Biography," and from thence copied extensively into other periodicals. Although the article is scholarly and elegant, yet in some essentials it is defective, and in some statements, as later research has shown, not exact.

³ Hamlet. "It is not very strange, for my uncle is King of Denmark, and those that would make mouths at him while my father lived give twenty, forty, fifty, a hundred ducats apiece for his picture in little. 'Shlood, there is something in this more than natural, if philosophy could find it out.'"—Hamlet, Act III S. 2.

waggoners who traveled the road, one of the most striking instances of the mutations which chequer life."

The following reminiscence is taken from the celebrated letter of Hon. Elisha Whittlesey to Hon. Richard Brodhead, chairman of the Committee of Claims United States Senate. Mr. Whittlesey, by the way, was the first representative of the Ashtabula District in Ohio in Congress, the Garfield district. Until Mr. Garfield ceased to represent that district it had but three representatives, Mr. Whittlesey, Mr. Joshua Giddings, and Mr. Garfield.

He says, "In 1815 three persons and myself performed a journey from Ohio to Connecticut on horseback in the month of May. Having understood that Gen. St. Clair kept a small tavern on Chestnut Ridge, eight miles east of Greensburg, or the distance may have been greater, I proposed that we stop at his house and spend the night. He had no grain for our horses, and after spending an hour with him in the most agreeable and interesting conversation respecting his early knowledge of the Northwestern Territory, we took our leave of him with deep regret.

"I never was in the presence of a man that caused me to feel the same degree of veneration and esteem. He wore a citizen's dress of black of the Revolution; his hair clubbed and powdered. When we entered he arose with dignity and received us most courteously. His dwelling was a common double log house of the western country, that a neighborhood would roll up in an afternoon. Chestnut Ridge was bleak and barren. There lived the friend and confidant of Washington, the ex-Governor of the fairest portion of creation. It was in the neighborhood, if not in the view, of a large estate at Ligonier that he owned at the commencement of the Revolution, and which, as I have at times understood, was sacrificed to promote the success of the Revolution. Poverty did not cause him to lose self-respect; and were he now living his personal appearance would command universal admiration."

This reminiscence was written May 16, 1856.

¹ When I was quite a boy I often spoke with the old lady who found him on the roadside. She, with another woman, were going out for berries when they came upon him. Her name was Susan Steubarger.

square in the middle of the town, where the family were assisted out of their conveyances, and from here all on foot walked to the grave in the following order: military, by the left, with arms and its colors reversed and drums muffled; citizens generally; committee of arrangement; judges; clergy; coffin containing the remains, with six pall-bearers on each side; relations; officers of the Revolutionary army; corporation of the borough. The body was interred with the rites of the Masonic brotherhood. The monument over his grave was erected some years later by the same fraternity, and the inscription upon it is perhaps the most appropriate one ever yet carved upon granite over any servant of the republic.¹

MONUMENT OF ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

¹ The inscription on the north side:

"THIS STONE is erected over the bones of their DEPARTED BROTHER, by members of the MASONIC SOCIETY,
resident in this vicinity."

Thus much of the public life and services of this distinguished citizen. It has been truly said that the afflicting spectacle of his last days melts the heart with sorrow. Perhaps there was not a prominent character of the Revolutionary period, with the exception of Morris, that gave so much of his life and service and means to the cause of America as did St. Clair, and there was none, with that exception, who was so poorly and so meanly recompensed. It is true that he died poor, but in such poverty there was no shame. "It is true, it is a pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true." A man with a superior education and the instincts of a gentleman, a companion and associate of Lafayette, of Steuben, of Hamilton, and of Washington, and a sharer of their glory, a general-in-chief of the army and a president of Congress, closing his life in neglected solitude! The commencement of the Revolution found him in affluent circumstances, in the vigor of manhood, rising with the destiny of the young Commonwealth, and when his race was run, his course finished, he found himself old and poor, an outcast, at the mercy of men more heartless than wolves, on the summit of the ridge as cold and as desolating as the gratitude of his country, within sight of his former home,—his home?—his home no more, for it too was sold over his head to pay the debt incurred for the liberty of the States. He spoke knowingly who, seeing him as he passed by, was reminded of the Roman exile's reply, "Tell the citizens of Rome that you saw Caius Marius sitting among the ruins of Carthage."

In his social life, before it was saddened, he is said to have felt the tender sympathies of our nature to the fullest extent. His conversation was instructive and interesting, enlivened by wit and embellished with science. His manners never underwent a change, and although age had its power over his body, it could not disturb the high breeding or change the habit of his manners. On meeting a person, as old ones remember, he would bow low in his saddle, and always raise his hat on passing a woman. In his latter days he was given to reflection, to which his exile and loneliness were in a measure conducive. He was often seen walking with his hands behind his back, a posture natural to the great Napoleon when at St. Helena, and to Themistocles when at Argos. He

The inscription on the south side:

"THE Earthly Remains
of Major-General
ARTHUR ST. CLAIR are deposited beneath this humble monument, which is Erected to supply the place of a nobler one
due from his country.
He died August 31st,
1818,
in the 84th year of his age."

would sit for hours together at the table of the back room of the village tavern, absent in thought, apparently lost to the present, and seeing only the past or into the future. He came down almost daily to the village, which was but a few miles from his house. Here he frequently met Findley, the member of Congress from our district, and the most popular politician of his day, and these would talk together, having a time over their glass of punch in the low bar-room of Skyle's tavern. He usually rode upon a small gray horse, but sometimes in a heavy, low-wheeled, wooden-axled carriage. He is described by persons who recollect him as being a tall man, square shouldered, cleanly shaved, his cheek-bones very prominent, and with a certain dignity of carriage and address. He was no longer erect, but there was no mistaking the military bearing of the man.

As an officer he must have been fine-looking and commanding. As ensign he is described as tall, graceful, dignified, with chesnut hair, handsome blue eyes, and blond complexion, master of all the accomplishments of the drawing-room, including the art of entertaining conversation. His portrait in oil, taken at a late date, in the Continental uniform, may now be seen in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

In considering the character of St. Clair there are two incidents which recur to us and illustrate a phase of his character better perhaps than an array of words. When Robert Hanna was using his influence to have his settlement made the abiding-place of justice for the new county, he stopped on his way to the East at St. Clair's house. St. Clair, then the agent of the Penns, taking the opportunity offered to send a communication to the Council, wrote a letter to President Shippen, wherein he stated that it was owing to Hanna's influence and personal interests that he controlled the other trustees to fix on his settlement as the county-seat. "I beg you will excuse inaccuracies," so he writes, "as I write in the greatest hurry, Mr. Hanna holding his horse while I write."

The next incident occurred long after. St. Clair and Findley met together once when the former was well-nigh shelterless and the latter one of the most prominent men of his day. Findley inadvertently, and perhaps through sympathy, said, "I pity your case, general, and heartily sympathize with you;" whereupon the old warrior straightening himself up, with his eyes flashing the fire they were wont to when the bugles blared and the men fell into line, replied, "I am sorry, sir, that I cannot appreciate your sympathy."

The death of St. Clair, surrounded as it was by so many circumstances of neglect, was a fit occasion for writers of the old school to dwell on the romanticism of solitude and exile, and to write essays on the proverbial aphorism respecting the ingratitude of republics. He has been described as the recluse of the Alleghenies, as a hermit, as a philosopher in exile, as a sage in rags. One romancist, who wrote to satisfy the taste of the metropolis, describes his death as occurring in a miserable hut on the mountain top, in the midnight of winter, during such a storm as howls through the Alps, or as that which swept over England and carried off the soul of the great Oliver Cromwell. But there was no romance in his latter end. It is true that the tourist can at this day, standing near his old home, look out upon as fair and romantic a scene as he will see anywhere in America. Perhaps nowhere else could the shade of the dead see a landscape so nearly resembling those which he himself saw when a boy in his own Scotland. On the one side you may take in view the broad Ligonier Valley, with the long-lapping hills losing themselves in the horizon in the far distance. On the other side you shall see the valley which lies between the western slope of the Ridge and the Whortleberry Hills. To the right, within a half-amphitheatre, "green-walled by the hills," is the brisk town of Latrobe, the Ligonier Valley Railroad winding along the basin of the Loyalhanna, which, breaking through the Ridge after devious windings through marshes and around shelving banks, loses itself behind the knolls to the north. You can trace the Pennsylvania Railroad by its burnished rails where it crosses the valley. Down beneath you, you will see the roofs and the long, single street of the old-time village of Youngstown, and trace the gray turnpike as it crawls over the hills eight miles beyond. On an upland, against a background of woods, are the college and cloisters of the Benedictine Monastery of St. Vincent's; to the left the slated roofs, the bay-windows, and red chapel of the Convent of St. Xavier's; innumerable tasty farm-houses and orchards, white barns, square school-houses, and broad expanses of meadow all along alternate as far as you can see, while the abruptness of the broken hills ceases, and their blue tops vanish in an undefinable line into the south, as do the sloping lands which extend far on into the rich heart of the west. It was all different when he stood there. He might have seen when he came there a few poorly-built houses, forming a hamlet on one side, and the same on the other. Here and there the smoke rising above the trees from the cabins of the first settlers, and an almost unbroken forest on all sides, and known a people struggling for a living,—a people who to him were neither kind, nor with sympathy such as he needed, and even without respect. A little cleared patch with its stony soil and deadened trees that stood like giants to sentinel enchanted land, was about his door. The wild animals might yet be heard at night, and the lonesome birds of evil croaked in broad day around the edge of the clearing. Even the mossy rocks covered with ferns and rhododendrons as they sheltered venomous snakes, could not appear to him as they appear to those drawn thither through pleasure or by curiosity. To a place of such surroundings as these it was that the old man, broken with the storms of state, had come to lay his weary bones among us. With him it is all over: he sleeps his last sleep, he has fought his last battle; no sound can awake him to glory again,—

"He now is in his grave;
After life's fitful fever he sleeps well;
Treason has done his worst: nor steel, nor poison,
Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing
Can touch him further."¹

¹ Memorandum of lands taken by St. Clair in Western Pennsylvania: The within is taken from the records of the land-office, and can be relied on as correct.

The lands are divided into three kinds, application, warrant, and donation lands, according to the designation of the original title.

By application dated 23d Nov., 1767, St. Clair got 317 acres, situate one-half mile below the Frankstown road, Bedford County. They were patented Sept. 6, 1785, to Bartholomew Boucher, on the Frankstown road, inclusive of Yellow Springs.

By application dated 3d April, 1769, he got 412 acres, 57 perches, situate four miles above Ligonier, at the great bend of the Loyalhanna. This is now Donegal township, Westmoreland.

By application in right of John Graut, dated 7th April, 1769, he got 270 acres, 80 perches, also in Donegal township. They were patented Oct. 17, 1788. Three hundred and seventy-two perches along Loyalhanna were patented to Daniel St. Clair.

By application dated 23d June, 1769, he got 339 acres. They were patented Oct. 17, 1788. Ninety-two perches along the Loyalhanna Creek were patented to Daniel St. Clair.

By warrant dated 23d Nov., 1773, he obtained 592 acres, situate in Ligonier township, Westmoreland County, being an octagon survey of different dates. It says that he was commandant at the post of Fort Ligonier in April, 1769.

By warrant dated 24th Sept., 1783, he obtained 6219 acres and 35 perches, situated on Chestnut Ridge and Loyalhanna Creek. The tract was patented 22d July, 1794, and got by resolution of the General Assembly.

By warrant dated 16th Nov., 1787, he got 81 acres, situated in the forks of Mill and Loyalhanna Creeks and adjoining the octagon tract.

By warrant dated 19th July, 1793, he got 394 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres, situated in Southampton township, Somerset County. They were patented June 22, 1870, to John, Henry, and Matthias Bausman.

By warrant dated April 30, 1791, he got 256 acres, situated in Fairfield township, Westmoreland County, adjoining his other lands. They were patented 7th May, 1870, to Eliza Denny.

By donation dated February, 1786, Maj.-Gen. Arthur St. Clair obtained from the State of Pennsylvania 2000 acres. There were 1000 acres of this in Crawford County, divided into two tracts; there were 500 in Erie and 500 acres in Lawrence. St. Clair owned 10,881 acres in all, and of these 8270 acres were situated in Westmoreland County.

Chronological Table of Events, etc., in the Career of Gen. St. Clair.

Born, 1734.

Ensign 60th Regt. (Royal Americans) of Foot, May 13, 1757.

With Amherst at Louisburg, Canada, May 28, 1758.

Lieutenant, April 17, 1759.

Capture of Quebec, Sept. 13, 1759.

Married at Boston, May 14, 1760.

Resigned his commission, April 16, 1762.

On special service in a civil capacity in Western Pennsylvania, having charge of Fort Ligonier, 1767-69.

Appointed surveyor for the District of Cumberland by Penn., April 5, 1770.

Appointed county justice and member of the Proprietary Council for Cumberland County, 23d May, 1770.

Appointed justice of the Court (Ded. Pot.), probonotary, register, and recorder for Bedford County, 11th-12th March, 1771.

Appointed to same offices for Westmoreland County, Feb. 27, 1773.

Resolutions at Hannastown, 16th May, 1775.

Colonel under Council of Safety, 1775.

Colonel in the Continental service, 3d Jan., 1776.

Before Quebec, 11th May, 1776.

Brigadier-general, 9th August, 1776.

Major-general, 19th Feb., 1777.

Detailed as adjutant-general, March, 1777.

Member of Council of Censors, 1783.

CHAPTER XL.

WAR OF EIGHTEEN-TWELVE.

Causes of the War—Congress declares War with Great Britain—Governor Snyder issues a Proclamation, and directs the Organization of the Pennsylvania Militia—Officers and Arrangement of the Westmoreland Militia under this Plan—British and Indians appear in force on opposite side of Lake Erie—Fears of an Invasion of Northwestern Pennsylvania from Canada—Militia from Western parts of the State ordered to Assemble at Erie—Oliver Hazard Perry—Capt. Bird and his Ballad—Condition of Affairs on the Northwestern Frontiers at the Breaking out of the War—Troubles with the Indians—Gen. Hull, Governor of Michigan Territory, invades Canada—Surrender of Detroit—The whole West in Arms—Army of the Northwest organized under Gen. Harrison—John B. Alexander and the Rifle Company of Westmoreland—Correspondence between Alexander and the Military Authorities—The Rifles offer their Services to the Government of the United States—They are accepted and Ordered to March—List of Officers and Men—Capt. Joseph Markle's Company of Horse—Muster-Roll of Capt. Markle's Company—These Volunteers attached to the Detachment sent to the Missisnewa Towns—Object of the Expedition—Its entire Success, and the Gallantry of the Westmorelanders—Capt. Alexander detailed on Special Duty—Promoted to rank of Major—Winter Campaign of 1813—Fort Meigs—Gallant Conduct of Maj. Alexander and the Pennsylvania Volunteers at Fort Meigs—Opposed to Tecumseh—Termination of the Siege—Conduct of the Westmorelanders mentioned by Gen. Harrison in General Orders to the whole Army—Maj. Crogan at Upper Sandusky—Orders discharging the Rifles, and Commendatory thanks of the General.

ALONG with the assumption of many peculiar privileges not known to other nations, and to their exercise by the government of Great Britain towards the government of the United States, was particularly the unwarranted power which England assumed in the right to search American vessels for suspected deserters from the British navy. Under cover of the exercise of this privilege the grossest outrages were committed upon American commerce from British privateers and cruisers. These depredations continuing produced among the people the most intense excitement.

In the beginning of this unwarranted demand and its exercise the government of the United States had earnestly protested against the right of search, and as early as 1807 preparations were made by the government for defense in the expectation of a rupture by reason of the illegal restrictions exacted on our commerce by Great Britain, as well as on this issue, and appropriations were made for war purposes.

In 1811 Congress was convened a month earlier. That body seconded the measures which had been adopted by President Madison in declaring offensive measures and calling for troops.

Auctioneer of Philadelphia, 24th Feb., 1784.

Member of Congress (elected), 11th Nov., 1785.

Took his seat, 20th Feb., 1786.

President of Congress, 2d Feb., 1787.

Governor of the Northwestern Territory, chosen by Congress, 5th Oct., 1787.

Candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania, 1790.

Commander-in-chief of the army, 1791.

Battle of the Wabash, Nov. 4, 1791.

Resigns his generalship, 1792.

Removed from government of Northwestern Territory by Jefferson, Nov. 22, 1802.

Died Aug. 31, 1818.

On the 5th of June, 1812, President Madison laid before Congress the correspondence between Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, and the British minister near our government. The correspondence seemed to preclude all hopes of adjusting the two principal points at issue, the orders of Council against our commerce and the impressment of our seamen. President Madison sent a message to Congress, in which our complaints against Great Britain were enumerated with great vigor and force. The Committee on Foreign Relations concurred with the President in recommending war. On the 18th of June (1812), Congress, sitting with closed doors, declared war against Great Britain. On the same day the resolution received the sanction of the President, and on the next day war was publicly proclaimed. Congress authorized the increase of the regular army to thirty-five thousand men, and authorized the raising of a large volunteer force for one year.

Simon Snyder, the Governor of Pennsylvania, a patriotic man of the Revolutionary period, was fully in accord with the executive of the Union and the people. On the 12th of May, 1812, he issued a general order as commander-in-chief of the militia of Pennsylvania, directing their organization on a war basis. The quota of the State was fixed at 14,000 militia, officers and privates, to be formed into two divisions, four brigades, and twenty-two regiments.

The militia was purely the State military force, and they of course are not to be mistaken for the volunteers, who were sworn into the service of the government of the United States, and who did service outside the limits of the State under regular officers.

In this arrangement the militia of Westmoreland was included in the Thirteenth Division of the sixteen in all the State. Of this division David Merchant (Marchand), of Westmoreland, was major-general from 1812 to 1814; Thomas Mason, of Fayette, was brigadier-general; George Armstrong, of Westmoreland, and Uriah Springer, of Fayette, were brigade inspectors in 1812; John Kirkpatrick, of Westmoreland, and George Death, of Fayette, were brigade inspectors in 1814.

The quotas of these divisions were formed into two divisions for service. The quotas of the divisions up to the Eighth Division formed the First Division for active service; those from the Eighth inclusive to the Sixteenth formed the Second Division for service, under command of Gen. Adamson Tannehill, with a brigadier from the Second Division, and a brigadier-general from the Fourth Division of the State.

In July, 1813, the British with an Indian force appearing on the opposite side of Lake Erie, created the greatest alarm in the town and vicinity of Erie Town, and the apprehension was general that there would be an invasion of Pennsylvania by the enemy from Canada. A military division was immediately organized under Gen. John Kelso, and the militia of the western parts were ordered to speedily assemble there.

Hither many of the organized Westmorelanders were speedily sent; but the services there were confined to the brilliant naval exploits and the victory which has made famous the name of Oliver Hazard Perry.

When Perry came to Lake Erie he had first to build and launch a navy, but he and his gallant officers were prepared to make some resistance even before the vessels were built. But his main protection was from the militia of Northwestern Pennsylvania, which was constantly held in readiness to repel any attack that might be made. Even when his ships were ready for sailing, his crew was made up in great part of drafts and volunteers from the militia. While this is a fact of history it appears to be sanctified in romance and in poetry, for one of the purest ballads per se in all American border minstrelsy is that of "James Bird," which, sung to the tune of "The Tempest," was a generation ago one of the most popular ballads in Western Pennsylvania. It has in it all the elements of those master-pieces of lyrical poetry which are yet the flower of the early English romance; it echoes love, paternal respect, maternal affection, devotion to country, and a noble type of manhood which confesses his wrong and his waywardness, and who admits that the sentence that convicts him is right and deserved:

"Hull, you know, his troops surrendered,
And defenseless left the West;
Then our forces quick assembled,
The invader to resist.

"Amongst the troops that marched to Erie
Were the Kingston volunteers;
Captain Thomas then commanded,
To protect our West frontiere."

And so on for twenty-two stanzas in language and meter which Macaulay would not have attempted to criticise, and which any man who never saw a horn-book can understand without explanation.¹

¹ In recalling the circumstance of the execution of Bird and the popular ballad which grew out of his execution we do not claim sympathy for the unfortunate man. Bird was a sergeant in Capt. Thomas' company, raised in the valleys of the North Branch of the Susquehanna, called the Kingston Volunteers, and although he had command of a guard whose duty it was to protect and watch over a government warehouse, he and the guard deserted their post after having done duty, it is true, in the service under Perry. Bird and a private, the guard named Rankin, and also a seaman named Davis were arrested on the charge of desertion, handed over to the military authorities, kept on board the "Niagara," tried by a court-martial while at Detroit, found guilty of the charges, and recommended for mercy. But it was deemed necessary by the government authorities that the sentence should be carried out. The execution of the three men took place on board the "Niagara," in Erie Harbor, October, 1814. Bird and Rankin were shot, and at the same moment Davis was hung at the yard-arm. Their bodies were huried in the sand on the beach, and all traces of their graves have long since been washed away from the receding shore.

These men were undoubtedly punished to be made examples of. Many others were guilty of excesses in drunkenness, neglect of duty, and grave military offenses. It probably would not be just to say that they did not deserve the fate they met, but it is the general opinion that many more deserved a similar fate. They were regarded as martyrs because they had to bear the punishment deserved by many others. They have always been the objects of pity, rather because they were the only ones who were punished than because they did not deserve their punishment. It seldom happens, however, that a person who has met such an ignominious death has been the subject of such posthumous honors.

From time to time the regiments which had been raised in Western Pennsylvania were kept filled by drafts. Some of these drafts were made to reinforce the army about Baltimore and in Maryland, which was counted upon to resist the advance of that British army which under Gen. Ross sacked the capital of the United States, and at one time seriously threatened to invade Pennsylvania. These did not see much service. Most of the drafts, however, were for the army stationed at Erie, and some were for the army of the Northwest under Harrison.

Of these we give the lists, so far as we have been able to gather them, in the subjoined notes to this chapter, which, with the correspondence and other contemporaneous papers annexed, may be of use to those who are inclined to scrutinize more closely the progress of the war viewed from a local stand-point. In some instances, indeed, with fuller details the particulars might not be so agreeable to contemplate, for it has been remarked that of all the wars in which the Americans have been engaged the War of Eighteen-Twelve has a lengthier list of deserters in respect to the number of soldiers enrolled than any other, and it must be owned that of these Westmoreland fell not very far behind in her quota.

But the organized soldiery from Westmoreland who garnered the glory of that war, and probably because they had more and better opportunities of doing so, were the detachments which were connected with Gen. Harrison's army of the Northwest.

At the breaking out of the war, and for some time previous thereto, there were several regularly organized companies in Westmoreland. One of these companies was the Rifles of Greensburg, of which John B. Alexander was captain. This company was among the first to offer its services to the government of the United States. We can probably do no greater service to their memory than to literally transcribe the orders and the correspondence, taken from the originals, which particularly refer to the active service of this company.

It may, however, be proper to first recall the fact that at the very time of the breaking out of this war the western portion of the United States was at war with the Indians, who were assisted and instigated not only by the money and the weapons of the British, but in many instances were under the direction and command of their regular officers. The battle of Tippecanoe had raised William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Northwestern Territory, to the highest point in the estimation of the people of that section as an active and efficient man of military ability and genius.

The disgraceful surrender of Gen. Hull, Governor of Michigan Territory, who, at the head of a large force of volunteers raised for service against the Indians, upon hearing of the declaration of war, imprudently, and with a zeal beyond his ability to perform, led them across the river into Canada, thus invading the country of the enemy. But the British, very adroitly and with sagacity, sent out detachments of effective men, and surprised and captured the very important fort of Michilimackinac, called the Gibraltar of the Lakes, and Fort Chicago, which, by order of Hull directing the forces there to retreat to Fort Detroit, then in great danger, was abandoned. After some successful skirmishes between the detached bodies of the volunteers and the British and Indians of Canada, the Americans were compelled to withdraw from that line, and to fall back to the near vicinity of Detroit. The British soon took up a position opposite that fortification, and began to erect works for its investment. In the mean time a large proportion of the American forces were under orders to convey the provisions and material hither. Gen. Brock commanded the British; Hull commanded the fort. On the 15th of August (1812) a demand was made for the surrender of the post, but the demand was refused. The British opened fire, and throughout the next night threw shells from their batteries. In the morning the British, under cover of their ships, landed on the American shore, and as soon as they were in position advanced towards the fort. But while the Americans were waiting with eagerness for orders to begin firing, and thus to open an offensive battle, a white flag was displayed from the advance posts of the Americans, and a British officer with an escort were seen to advance towards it. It was a flag of truce, under which the commandant and general of the forces, Hull, proposed to surrender. This he did without firing a shot. Seventeen hundred Americans were handed over under the terms of the surrender to a weak force of about seven hundred British and Canadian militia and six hundred Indians. The detachments yet out were also surrendered by these terms, and the enemy came into possession of great quantities of material and provisions which had been gathered there.

Nothing, however, could have so aroused the people of the West to a sense of honor and devotion as this dishonorable and un-American surrender did. All throughout our whole western region rang the cry of war. In many places civil pursuits were for the time abandoned. Western Pennsylvania, with Western Virginia and Ohio, were filled with the greatest enthusiasm. Many of the volunteers could not be accepted, as they appeared too late to be received after the quotas had been made up. Gen. Crooks commanded the troops from Pennsylvania, who were sent out to reinforce the army of Gen. Harrison.

The following documents will give some information respecting the organization of the "Rifles" and their progress in joining the army under Harrison:

On the 3d of August, 1807, a commission was issued to John B. Alexander by Thomas McKean, Governor of Pennsylvania, as captain of the "Rifle Company attached to the First Battalion of the Nineteenth Regiment of the Militia" for the term of four years.

On the 3d of August, 1811, a similar commission issued to the same person as captain of the Rifle Company, by Simon Snyder, Governor of Pennsylvania.

When the war broke out the services of the company were tendered and accepted, as appears by the following correspondence:

"TO HONORABLE WILLIAM EUSTIS, Secretary of War, Washington City.

"GREENSBURG, 6th June, 1812.

"SIR,—In conformity with a resolution of the Company of Riflemen under my command, I have the honor to make the tender of their services to the President of the United States as volunteers, and to ask the acceptance of this offer under the late Act of Congress.

"By an Inspection Return of the company, made on the third of this month, it appears we muster 1 Captain, 2 Lieutenants, 4 Sergeants, 2 Corporals, 2 Musicians, and 45 Rank and file, all uniformed and equipped for service.

"I would beg leave to observe to you, Sir, that altho' the Company under my command is well armed with rifles, such as are ordinarily used by the inhabitants of the Western country, yet those rifles do not appear to be calculated for actual warfare; they are various in appearance, length, weight, and calibre.

"If the President of the United States would arm such Volunteer Corps of Riflemen as may be called into service with the arms of the United States, it would no doubt obviate the inconveniences necessarily to arise from the objections made to the arms now in use.

"I am, Sir, with respect,

"Your obedient Servant,

"J. B. ALEXANDER.

"Capt. Rifle Company, attached to 19th Regiment Penna. Militia."

Indorsed—"Sent copy to Secy., enclosed to Wm. Findley, Esq."

"INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S OFFICE,

"July 14, 1812.

"SIR,—The pleasing duty devolves on me of informing you that the patriotic tender of your services is accepted.

"Be pleased to organize your company, arm and fully equip yourselves for duty, and expect orders to march; on receipt of which your pay and emoluments will commence.

"With perfect respect,

"Your most Obedient,

"ALEXANDER SMYTHE,

"Brigadier and Inspector-General.

"TO CAPTAIN J. B. ALEXANDER, Greensburg."

"PITTSBURGH, Sept. 5, 1812.

"SIR,—The situation of the frontier of the State of Ohio and the Territories adjoining since the capture of General Hull's army will make it necessary that your company should join Capt. Collins and Capt. Philips, also Capt. Markle and Capt. McClelland, two troops of horse, and be in readiness to march at the shortest notice in order to move toward those frontiers, if you should be so ordered by the Secretary at War, and which is expected by the next mail from Washington.

"I am, Sir, Your Ob't Servant,

"JOSEPH WHEATON, Capt., A. D. Q. M.

"CAPT. ALEXANDER."

"PITTSBURGH, 11th Sept., 1812.

"TO CAPT. JOHN B. ALEXANDER:

"You will please to assemble and march your company of volunteers, with all convenient dispatch, to Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, or wherever else the North Western Army shall have rendezvoused, and on your arrival to report yourself to the commanding officer.

"AMOS STODDARD, Maj. 1st Regt. U. S. Artillery."¹

"MUSTER-ROLL OF COMPANY MUSTERED ON THE 16TH SEPTEMBER, 1812:

No.	Names.	No.	Names.
1.	John B. Alexander, captain.	6.	Peter Fleegee, 3d sergeant.
2.	Christian Drum, lieutenant.	7.	Henry Hawkin, 4th sergeant.
3.	Peter Drum, ensign.	8.	Adam Kettering, corporal.
4.	Richard Hardin, 1st sergeant.	9.	William Richards, corporal.
5.	John Jameson, 2d sergeant.	10.	Jacob Gossert, drummer.

¹ For route of the Rifle Company and the Pittsburgh Blues see "Pentland's Journal," Appendix "Q."

Privates.

11. Samuel Singer.
12. Leonard Miller.
13. Henry Miller.
14. Daniel Miller.
15. Jacob Sickafoos.
16. George Sickafoos.
17. George Myers.
18. Adam Williams.
19. Henry Barton.
20. Robert Thompson.
21. Isaac Keck.
22. John Wingart.
23. Jacob Rupert.
24. Frederick Stewart.
25. Jonas Keel.
26. Abraham Weaver.
27. Samuel McLean.
28. William Cassiday.
29. James Thompson.
30. John Rice.
31. Edward Shelletto.
32. John Collins.
33. Jonas Kneemier.
34. James Taylor.
35. Jacob Wingart.
36. Solomon Dehaven.
37. George Sheffler.
38. Benj. Jameson.
39. William Kernes.
40. William Singer.
41. John Mitchel.
42. Daniel Rugh.
43. John Shuey.
44. Peter Walter.
45. William Vandyke."²

The first steps taken by Harrison were to relieve the frontier posts. Several expeditions organized under competent officers were sent out with this object, and their actions have given the greatest interest to the military movements of that campaign. In these they were uniformly successful, although their success was at the expense of brave men and much suffering.

Just prior to one of the most noted of these expeditions the following order was issued to Capt. Alexander:

"CAMP AT FRANKLINTON,
"24 November, 1812.

"SIR,—You will please to be prepared to march to-morrow morning with your Company at nine o'clock, at which time the whole detachment under my command will move.

"Respectfully,

"JOHN B. CAMPBELL,

"Lt.-Col. 19th U. S. Regt.

"CAPT. ALEXANDER."

This was the official order which directed Capt. Alexander to accompany the detachment of six hundred men which Harrison, on the 25th of November, 1812, ordered from his headquarters at Franklinton to march into the Indian country and destroy their towns on the Mississinewa River. This river is one of the tributaries of the Wabash.

² See Appendix "Q" for official roll of the "Rifles" from War Department.

The Greensburg and Indiana Register for Thursday, September 17, 1812, has the following:

"MILITARY MOVEMENTS.

"The Greensburg Riflemen, commanded by Capt. John B. Alexander, marched from this place on Wednesday last to join the Northwestern Army under the command of Governor Harrison. They were as fine a set of men as ever handled a rifle, and we are satisfied will do their duty. The best wishes of their fellow-townsmen and country accompany them."

"HEADQUARTERS, FRANKLINTON,
"Oct. 22, 1812.

"GENTLEMEN,—You will proceed with your companies to this place immediately, and remain here until you receive further orders.

"Very respectfully,

"Yr. H'bl Servant,

"WM. HENRY HARRISON.

"P.S.—Your proper route will be through Lebanon, Zenia, and Springfield.

"W. H. H.

"CAPTS. ALEXANDER AND BUTLER, Pittsburgh."

The company of cavalry which served in the same army under Capt. Joseph Markle, and which was raised for the most part in the southwestern part of the county, and particularly about the Sewickley and the Youghiogheny, was early in the field. We have not the original orders as they were issued to this company, nor can we enter into details regarding its history such as we can in the company of the Rifles.

The following list, obtained from the War Department, is the earliest roll of Capt. Markle's company which we have been able to get.¹

Master-roll of a Troop of United States Volunteer Cavalry, under the Command of Capt. Joseph Markle, in the Squadron Commanded by Maj. James V. Ball, and now in the Service of the United States, from the Commencement of their Service to the Thirty-first Day of October, 1812, inclusive:

No.	NAMES.	Rank.	Dates of Appointment or Enlistment.	To what Time Engaged or Enlisted.
1	Joseph Markle.....	Captain.	Sept. 12, 1812	Sept. 12, 1813
2	Humphrey Fullerton.....	1st Lieut.	" "	" "
3	Daniel Waltz.....	2d Lieut.	" "	" "
4	Jacob Markle.....	Cornet.	" "	" "
1	John C. Plumer.....	1st Sergt.	" "	" "
2	Samuel Miller.....	2d Sergt.	" "	" "
3	Samuel H. Dailey.....	3d Sergt.	" "	" "
4	John Marshall.....	4th Sergt.	" "	" "
5	William Skelly.....	1st Corp.	" "	" "
6	Robert Skelly.....	2d Corp.	" "	" "
7	James Sloan.....	3d Corp.	" "	" "
8	Henry Breneman.....	4th Corp.	" "	" "
9	William Craig.....	Trumpeter.	" "	" "
10	James Smith.....	Saddler.	" "	" "
11	George Fregs.....	Farrier.	" "	" "
12	John Bennett.....	Private.	" "	" "
13	Peter Broadsword.....	"	" "	" "
14	John Beckett.....	"	" "	" "
15	Isaiah Burgan.....	"	" "	" "
16	Robert Campbell.....	"	" "	" "
17	James Conner.....	"	" "	" "
18	Findley Carnahan.....	"	" "	" "
19	Robert Cooper.....	"	" "	" "
20	Joseph Chambers.....	"	" "	" "
21	Samuel Davis.....	"	" "	" "
22	Daniel Fleming.....	"	" "	" "
23	Samuel Hamilton.....	"	" "	" "
24	Stephen Lowry.....	"	" "	" "
25	James McGuffy.....	"	" "	" "
26	John Milligan.....	"	" "	" "
27	William Miller.....	"	" "	" "
28	Findley McGrew.....	"	" "	" "
29	John McCamont.....	"	" "	" "
30	Robert McGuffin.....	"	" "	" "
31	John McClain.....	"	" "	" "
32	Nathan McGrew.....	"	" "	" "
33	John Morrison.....	"	" "	" "
34	Jonathan McClintock.....	"	" "	" "
35	William McClurg.....	"	" "	" "
36	William Logie.....	"	" "	" "
37	William Robison.....	"	" "	" "
38	John Robison.....	"	" "	" "
39	Jonathan Robison.....	"	" "	" "
40	Charles Sholl.....	"	" "	" "
41	Samuel Stolett.....	"	" "	" "
42	James Selby.....	"	" "	" "
43	John Stone.....	"	" "	" "
44	Samuel Shepler.....	"	" "	" "
45	William Thompson.....	"	" "	" "
46	Matthew Thompson.....	"	" "	" "
47	Jacob Weaver.....	"	" "	" "
48	James Alexander.....	"	" "	" "
49	James Guffy.....	"	" "	" "
50	Thompson Carnahan.....	"	" "	" "
51	Thomas McGrew.....	"	" "	" "
52	Stephen Rowan.....	"	" "	" "
53	Samuel Montgomery.....	"	" "	" "

In the Greensburg and Indiana Register for Oct. 1, 1812, is the following:

"On Tuesday evening last the drafted militia for the First Brigade, Thirteenth Division, marched from this place to Pittsburgh."

¹ See additional lists in Appendix "Q."

Elsewhere is the following extract from a letter dated at Pittsburgh, Sept. 24, 1812, in which we have notice of the company:

"Yesterday the 'Pittsburgh Blues,' commanded by Captain Butler, and the 'Greensburg Rifle Company,' Captain J. B. Alexander, left this on their way to join General Harrison. They embarked on board boats, and will proceed by water nearly to Cincinnati. On Tuesday the Westmoreland troop of cavalry, Captain Markle, also left this on the march to Urbana."²

This company of cavalry was regarded by Gen. Harrison, an account of their orderly behavior and military appearance, as the first troop of United States volunteer cavalry in the Northwestern Army. They were connected with the squadron of Maj. James V. Ball, and throughout the entire campaign are frequently mentioned, and never without approbation and honor.

The detachment sent to the Mississinewa towns consisted of Col. Simeral's regiment of Kentucky Volunteers; Maj. James Ball's squadron of United States Dragoons; Capt. John B. Alexander's company of riflemen from Westmoreland; Capt. Joseph Markle's troop of horse, also from Westmoreland; Capt. James Butler's light infantry company of Pittsburgh Blues, and of several other companies and squadrons from Kentucky, Michigan, and Ohio.

These troops were commanded by Lieut.-Col. John B. Campbell, of the Nineteenth United States Regiment. The season of the year was an inclement one, and the route of march was through a wilderness. They, however, about the middle of December reached the Mississinewa. They followed this stream towards its mouth, and when they were within about twenty miles of the first Indian town, Col. Campbell, in a council, asked the advice of his officers. They advised to march all night and take the enemy by surprise. This was agreed to; but when they reached the town one of the Kentucky volunteers giving a war-whoop precluded the intended and expected surprise contemplated by giving warning to the Indians. But notwithstanding this eight of their warriors were killed, and forty-two men, women, and children were taken prisoners.

The detachment then pressed on, and destroyed three other Indian towns farther down. They then returned to the site of the first one.

At this place on the 18th of December they were attacked by several hundred Indians. These were

² In the Greensburg and Indiana Register for Sept. 12, 1812, is the following:

"COMMUNICATION.

"ROBSTOWN, Sept. 3, 1812.

"In consequence of the expected march of Capt. Markle and his troop, the citizens of this place and vicinity met, and agreed to treat the troop to a dinner. Against 3 o'clock they had an Ox of 4 or 500 weight roasted whole, when the troop marched up in order, attended by about 400 citizens, and partook of the good cheer provided. After dinner the following toasts were drank, with many others, amidst the acclamations of the largest concourse of citizens ever seen in this place."

In the issue of the same paper for Oct. 1, 1812, it appears that eleven had deserted from Capt. Markle's company, as he offers a reward therein for their apprehension.

concealed in the edge of the forest, behind fallen trees, and opened fire upon the whites before they were discovered. But a charge was made upon them, and from the advantage the whites had in their squadron of horse, the Indians were dislodged and driven out from their hiding-places and before the troops. Forty dead warriors were left on the field, and the rest were driven off. Twelve of the Americans were killed and about thirty wounded. Among the killed was Lieut. Waltz, of Capt. Markle's troop. The action of this troop, and particularly of Lieut. Waltz, was described as gallant.

The chief object of this expedition was to prevent the Indians from having a harboring-place of safety from which they could issue and intercept the intercourse between the settlements and Fort Wayne, then occupied by our troops, and to drive them towards the St. Joseph's, in Michigan, so that they could not waylay the parties passing and repassing, and that they might not concentrate, as they had been in the habit of doing, on the Maumee. The object in a great measure was accomplished.

The detachment then returned back to the main army, and in their march they suffered intensely from cold, hunger, and fatigue. No less than one hundred and eighty men had their limbs frozen. But the loss of the Indians was terrible, and the success of the campaign prevented them from attempting attacks on the settlements. It has been pronounced on all hands to have been one of the best conducted campaigns of 1812.

The following general order, issued Jan. 9, 1813, especially refers to Capt. Alexander :

"HEADQUARTERS N. W. ARMY, } FRANKLINTON, 9th Jan., 1813."

"GENERAL ORDERS.

"As Capt. Bradford's Company is much reduced, the Detachment under the command of Lieut. Percival will continue to do duty with it.

"Capt. Alexander, of the U. S. 12 Months Volunteers, as senior Captain, will take command of the Battalion composed of his own and Capt. Butler and McRais' companies. Lt.-Col. Campbell will march the Detachment of Regular Troops from his place to Upper Sandusky as soon as that part of it which served on the late expedition to Missisnaway are able to perform that duty.

"Capt. Alexander will receive further orders from the General with regard to the marching of the volunteers.

"L. HASKILL,
"A. S. Dy. Adj. General."

On the 1st of February, 1813, Capt. Alexander was promoted to major of infantry volunteers, and a commission issued to him signed by James Madison, President.

Harrison, in 1813, having determined upon a winter campaign for the recovery of Detroit and the Michigan Territory, determined to occupy a line of forts from Fort Wayne to the foot of the Rapids. Gen. Winchester was to move towards the latter point, erect block-houses, and make arrangements to hold that region. After an advance and a contemplated engagement with Gen. Proctor of the British forces by a force preceding the army, reinforced by other troops, the plan laid out by Winchester was to a certain extent frustrated, so that he was compelled to erect a strong fortification at the Rapids, and there to organize an army to make that a base for supplies for the campaign in the spring. A fortress was here built called Fort Meigs. It was situated on the south-east side of the River Maumee, and near to the battleground where Gen. Wayne defeated the Indians in 1794. The fort was situated on a rising ground, surrounded by a prairie for the distance of a hundred and fifty yards, then by a piece of woods, beyond which was another prairie.

Fort Meigs was left in command of Gen. Leftwitch, with his Virginia troops, and about two hundred and fifty Pennsylvanians. Col. Wood, of the regular army, had charge of the engineering. Gen. Harrison went to Cincinnati to urge forward reinforcements.

Towards the beginning of April, 1813, the enemy were collecting in considerable numbers for the purpose of laying siege to Fort Meigs. Gen. Leftwitch, with his Virginians, left the fort, for what cause is not definitely known; but the Pennsylvania troops, although their term of service had expired, volunteered for its defense. Harrison, on the knowledge of these affairs, and knowing that the post was in danger from a siege on the side of the greatly superior forces of the British and Indians, hastened forward, and on the 11th of April, 1813, arrived at the fort with reinforcements for the relief of the Pennsylvanians, who now composed the garrison. Preparations were made for the approaching siege. The force there now amounted to twelve hundred, and under the directions of the engineers they labored day and night in constructing defenses. On the 28th of April, 1813, the British army appeared in Maumee Bay. Orders were sent out to hasten the arrival of Gen. Greene Clay, who was advancing with twelve hundred Kentucky volunteers. The British landed and, bestowing their Indian allies, began to invest the place. The garrison was ordered on active duty, and while the British were erecting their batteries the Americans were raising their defenses. Skirmishes frequently took place. On the morning of the 1st of May the British were ready to open their batteries. The Americans, removing their tents from the plain outside of the fort, exposed to view a long breast-work which had been erected behind them. On the 3d of May an additional battery from another point was opened upon the fort, and on the 4th another battery was discovered in a position to do much injury. About the middle of that night an officer arrived at the post, and reported that Gen. Clay was at the Rapids, and moving down in open boats with twelve or fifteen hundred men, and that he would be at the fort between three and four o'clock in the morning.

Gen. Harrison saw his opportunity, and determined to raise the siege by defeating the enemy. He sent a message to Clay, ordering him to land a sufficient force on the bank of the river as he came down, which was to attack the enemy's batteries, spike their cannon, and after destroying their carriages and disabling them, to take to boat, cross the Maumee, and enter the fort. The rest of the reinforcements were to land on the side next the river on which was the fort, and to enter it. He at the same time determined to attack the enemy's batteries on that side of the river, while Clay would attack them on the other side.

About eight o'clock the next morning (May 5, 1813), Clay having been delayed, the boats with Clay and that portion of the forces ordered to enter the fort were on landing assailed by a host of savages. Maj. John B. Alexander, with the Pennsylvania and Petersburg Volunteers, were ordered to protect them at the landing. The Indians increased in number, and Maj. Alexander and Col. Boswell charged them with effect, and under cover of their fire Clay and his troops fought their way into the fort, driving the Indians before them for half a mile at the point of the bayonet.

In the mean time, Col. Dudley, who had been ordered to land and attack the British encampment on the other side of the river, marched fearlessly and furiously up to the enemy's cannon. The four batteries were all carried in an instant, and the enemy put to flight. The guns were spiked, the carriages cut in pieces, and the poles bearing the red flag of St. George pulled down, when the victorious soldiery gave way to a real frolic. Dudley ordered a retreat, according to orders, for he had done what he was sent to do. But his men would not retreat, but pushed forward with great impetuosity and recklessness, with loud cries to avenge the slaughtered men at the River Raisin. The enemy had concentrated themselves beyond the sight and hearing of the American officer. Then, while a few Indians drew the attention of the Americans towards them, a much larger force of British and Indians approached the batteries, and after a desperate battle killed about fifty of the Kentuckians, wounded more than seventy, and took five hundred and fifty prisoners. About one hundred and fifty escaped to the boats and reached Fort Meigs. Col. Dudley attempted to cut his way through to the river, but was killed, having himself slain an Indian after he was mortally wounded. The savages then commenced a massacre of the prisoners, unopposed by the British general, Proctor; and this horrid work was continued until the arrival of that magnificent Indian warrior, Tecumpseh, from the batteries on the other side of the river, who stayed his wild men in their work of carnage, declaring it to be a shame to kill defenseless prisoners.

At the moment Col. Dudley began his attack on the enemy's batteries, Gen. Harrison ordered a sortie against them on the southeast side of the river. The force detailed for this sortie was under command of Col. John Miller of the regulars. The whole force numbered three hundred and fifty men, and was composed of regulars and the battalion of Maj. Alexander, who had just before distinguished itself in assisting the debarkation of Gen. Clay's forces. These were the Pittsburgh Blues, the Petersburg Rifles, and Lieut. Drum's detachment of Pennsylvania Volunteers. There were five companies of regular British troops here, and the Indians were under direct command of the Prophet, the brother of Tecumpseh, and Tecumpseh, who, like a great general, as he was, was everywhere on the battle-field where his presence was needed. They charged the motley foe, three times their superior in numbers, and drove them in confusion into the woods. The Indians fought desperately, instigated by their great leaders. The Americans lost several of their men, but the object of the sortie was accomplished, and the victors returned to the fort with forty-three prisoners.

After this sortie Gen. Proctor sent a British officer with a flag of truce, demanding a surrender. He was indignantly sent back to the other side of the river.

The British general now found himself in a crippled condition and unfit to carry on the siege. His artillery was rendered useless, and he had lost in killed, wounded, and prisoners more than the besieged. He therefore agreed to exchange prisoners, and to account for the difference. On the 9th of May, under an incessant discharge of artillery from the fort and the American batteries, the British and their allies moved off with their whole force.

On the same day, May 9, 1813, Gen. Harrison issued a general order from "Headquarters Fort Meigs," and in this order, which was read to the whole army and thence publicly given to the world, the gallant conduct of these three hundred and fifty men is mentioned.¹

Thus terminated the siege of Fort Meigs, one of the most brilliant and memorable actions in American history. To its successful termination how far the volunteer soldiery from Westmoreland contributed let the world judge.

AT FORT SANDUSKY.

On the site of Lower Sandusky there was a stockade fort, then under command of Maj. George Crogan, and hither were transferred some of the Pittsburgh Blues, the Petersburg Volunteers, and some from the different Westmoreland detachments. In all there were one hundred and sixty privates there and some half-dozen officers. Crogan himself was a mere hoy just of age. On the 1st of August (1813) the fort was surrounded by five hundred British soldiers under ¹ The siege of Fort Meigs continued thirteen days. Had the detachment under Col. Dudley obeyed orders, the events of the 5th of May would have been among the brightest in the annals of our country. As it was, it resulted gloriously to the American arms. The loss of the Americans during the siege was eighty-one killed and one hundred and eighty-nine wounded. Sixty-four were killed in the sorties, and one hundred and twenty-four wounded; the rest were killed or wounded in the fort. This does not include the killed and wounded under Col. Dudley.

Proctor and eight hundred Indians, and besides these Tecumta was placed in an ambuscade with a large Indian force to intercept reinforcements directed thither from Seneca Old Town and Fort Meigs. After a disposition had been made of the forces, Proctor sent a flag of truce, demanding the surrender of the fort, and this was accompanied with threats of butchery and massacre if the garrison should hold out. But Maj. Crogan finding out that his companions, mostly young men like himself, would support him to the last, returned the answer that "when the fort should be taken there would be none left to massacre, as it would not be given up while a man was able to fight." During the night a brisk fire was opened on the fort from the artillery in the boats. Crogan discovered that the enemy aimed his guns at one angle of the fort. He ordered Capt. Hunter to place their only cannon in such a position that it would rake the ditch should they attempt to scale the walls. Sergt. Weaver and six privates of the "Pittsburgh Blues" had charge of this gun. The enemy kept up their fire all the next day, but the garrison placed bags of flour and sand on the walls of the angle at which the fire was directed, and thus protected the walls itself. About four o'clock in the evening the enemy concentrated all their guns upon this angle, and under cover of the fire and the smoke they proceeded to make the assault. Two feints were made on the lines at that angle, and three hundred and fifty British soldiers advanced to within sixty feet of the walls. A severe fire of musketry from the fort put them in confusion for a moment, but the enemy under a brave officer were urged forward, and he calling upon them to follow leaped into the ditch. The masked port-hole was now opened, and the six-pounder within thirty feet of the assailants was fired. Lieut.-Col. Short, their commander, and fifty others were instantly killed or wounded. At the same moment Capt. Hunter's troops opened a terrible and effective discharge of rifles upon the other portions of the assailants. They were compelled to retire. It was now dark. The wounded in the ditch were in a desperate condition. They begged for water and their friends could not assist them, but Maj. Crogan and his men handed them water over the pickets, and opened a hole underneath, and encouraged as many as were able to come into the fort.

At three o'clock in the night Proctor and his men made a shameful retreat down the bay, and in their hurry and confusion they left a boat full of valuable materials. They left around the fort seventy stand of arms and several braces of pistols. The Americans lost one killed and seven very slightly wounded. That of the enemy could not have been less than one hundred and fifty; upwards of fifty were found in and about the ditch.

The rifle company was discharged at Seneca upon the expiration of their term of service, as appears by the following :

"HEADQUARTERS, SENECA TOWN,
Aug. 28, 1813.

("After General Orders.)

"The Pittsburgh Volunteers, commanded by Capt. Butler, and those of Greensburg, by Lieut. Drum, of Maj. Alexander's battalion, having performed their services, the general hereby presents them an honorable discharge.

"The general has ever considered this corps as the first in the North Western Army. Equal in point of bravery and subordination, it excelled in every other of those attainments which form complete and efficient soldiers. In battle, in camp, and on the march their conduct has done honor to themselves and their country.

"A. H. HOLMES,
"Asst. Adj. General."

For additional information touching the part sustained by Westmoreland in this war, see the contemporaneous documents cited and copied in Appendix.¹

CHAPTER XLI.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

The Presbyterian Church—Reformed Church—Greensburg Seminary—Evangelical Lutheran Church—Ministers of the Early Lutheran Church—United Presbyterian Church—Methodists—Early Methodism in Greensburg and Vicinity—United Brethren—The Mennonites and their Early Settlement—Baptist Church—Mount Pleasant Institute—Roman Catholic Church—Catholicity in Western Pennsylvania.

As preparatory to the ecclesiastical history of our county, which we propose to consider in this chapter, the following extract we apprehend to be pertinent, throwing light as it does upon the polity of the proprietors of the Province in this regard.

The religious system of Pennsylvania, says Mr. Lodge in "The History of the English Colonies in America," was peculiar to that Province, and was the most remarkable feature of her public policy, for it was the system of Pennsylvania which received the sanction of the Revolutionary Congress and of the Convention of 1789, and which now prevails throughout the United States. There was, with one trifling exception due to secular causes, genuine religious freedom from the beginning. The oppression of New England and Virginia, of Congregationalist and Episcopalian, was unknown, and toleration did not rest on the narrow foundation of expediency, to ¹ We deem it but proper to say that we have consulted many works for the subject matter of this chapter, and that we have followed no particular one, but have lopped off with an unsparing hand the superfluity of each from which we have made extracts. Rupp's account is undoubtedly a very correct one, considering the materials he then had access to. Where our figures differ from his is where his differs from the official reports, for we have followed the figures as they are, recorded in the records of the War Department at Washington, for which our thanks are due to Gen. R. C. Drum, adjutant-general United States army.

We may here make the observation that there were and yet are among us many survivors of the War of Eighteen-Twelve whose names do not appear in the lists we submit. But the reason is obvious. Many who had served from other parts of the State afterwards removed into Westmoreland and became identified and recognized as citizens of the county. On the other hand, there were many native Westmorelanders who enlisted in companies from neighboring counties and saw effective service. It is apparent that both these classes must of necessity be omitted in the consideration of the services performed by those who were truly the representatives of Westmoreland. For further lists see Penn. Archives, Second Series, vol. xii.

which it owed its early adoption in Maryland. The Quakers in power were true to the tenets which they had preached when persecuted. Penn's followers were, however, a religious people, and although they promised to all Christians perfect toleration, a strong tone of religion pervades the "nervous proclamation against vice"¹ and the early laws of the same character. Yet there was little Sabbatarian legislation, such as we find upon the statute-books of both Virginia and Massachusetts, although an unfortunate barber was presented by the grand jury of an early period for "trimming on the first day." There is, however, no indication that Sunday was less observed, or that the morals of the people were worse on this account, and the same may be said in regard to the recognition of marriages solemnized in any religious society whatever. The generous toleration thus afforded attracted all forms and creeds to Pennsylvania, and at the time of the Revolution the facts especially noticed by all observers are the universal toleration and the number and mixture of sects. One writer asserts that religious indifference was a characteristic of the people, owing to this mingling of sects, and his opinion would seem to be borne out by the religious laxity indicated by the prevalence of church lotteries. The forms were certainly less rigid than elsewhere, but the piety was as genuine and religion as wholesome and wide-spread as in any colony.

In the early days of the colony the Quakers were of course much stronger than any other single sect, although they speedily sank from controlling numbers to a minority of the whole population. They had much more religious energy than any other denomination, more fondness for their forms, and maintained with greater solicitude their connection with the parent societies.

The oldest church in the Province was that founded by the first settlers, who were Swedish Lutherans, and this sect maintained itself for more than a century, forming the only connecting link between the worshipers and their mother-country. The ministers were sent from Sweden until the year 1786, when a petition for their discontinuance was sent, because their speech was no longer intelligible. But though the distinctions of race were effaced, the creed survived, was adopted by the Dutch, and extended by the German emigrants of like faith.

The most important sects next to the Quakers were the Lutherans and Presbyterians, the latter supported by the Irish and Scotch settlers, and with an active, able, and energetic ministry, who spread their doctrines through the Province. There were also respectable bodies of Dutch Calvinists, Baptists, Anabaptists, and Moravians. There were also among them many of the strange sects and mystical societies whose members had come from Germany to find peace and quiet here. Of these there were the Dunkards and Mennonists. The Roman Catholics were the latest to come, and in the early days were a small body, principally composed of Irish and Germans.

The only instance of religious persecution, the record of which stains the pages of our colonial history, happened in 1755. It is briefly told. The few Roman Catholics at that time in the Province would have remained contented and unmolested but for the coming of the hapless Acadians, the destruction of whose homes and whose dispersion and exile is told in the beautiful poem of "Evangeline." Many of these came to Philadelphia, where the good Quakers received them kindly. They were French Canadians, and closely following their settlement here came on the French and Indian war. Then the danger of Indian inroads conducted by Frenchmen was enough to rouse the strongest hatred of which a man of English race was at that time capable. In the year 1755 three Frenchmen were arrested for poisoning wells, and the excitement was at its height. The Acadians, by the interposition of certain Huguenot Quakers, were provided for by the Assembly; but they were dispersed among the counties, and, broken by misfortune, sank into poverty and rapidly disappeared. From wild and injurious reports, and because it was said that the Irish were instigated to join the French, the professed adherents of this church were disarmed and their houses searched; they were exempt from the militia and compelled to pay fines. Their number in Philadelphia was not at this time over two thousand, and they were the poorest of the population. Their persecution was, however, only passing, and was due, not to religious bigotry, but to the wave of fear which swept over the English colonies when France let loose the savages upon their borders. With this single exception, the religious system of Pennsylvania was one of perfect toleration, and the condition of religious affairs differed in no essential respect, either social or political, from that which is common to all the United States to-day. With this simple policy of toleration to all, religion in Pennsylvania plays no conspicuous part in her history. There was in the early times, as it has been remarked, little ostentation connected with the varied worship. The churches or meeting-houses were, as a rule, small and plain but neat buildings, and the clergy a respected and respectable class, honored in their calling, but neither a picturesque body, as in Virginia, nor one of great social and political influence, as in Massachusetts.

The first religious services of the English-speaking people west of the mountains were held when Christopher Gist, surveyor and agent for the Ohio Company, on Christmas-day, 1750, read prayers from the prayer-book of the Established Church to the Indians of the Wyandot town of Coshocton, which were interpreted to the natives by Andrew Montour.

During the occupancy of Fort Duquesne by the

¹ Hist. Coll., ix. 12. Penn to Logan, "Prepare a nervous proclamation against vice."

French, religious services were held at the post in accordance with the Roman Catholic ritual. Here were chanted the same rogations which the faithful heard at Notre Dame, and here was observed the time-honored devotion at the sacrament of the mass. Here was kept the chrism for sacramental purposes, and here the priest performed the last office for the dead, which at this day are denoted in the breviary. A registry was kept of the births, baptisms, and deaths of the inmates of the fort for the years 1753, 1754, and 1755. These are still preserved, and are now among the archives in Canada. What strikes us the most interesting of these records is the account of the death and burial of Beaujeu, the commander of the forces that went out to meet Braddock, and who himself was killed as well as his rival. It reads as follows: "Mr. Leonard (Daniel), Esq., Sieur de Beaujeu, captain of infantry, commander of Fort Duquesne, and of the army, on the 9th day of July, in the year 1755, and in the forty-fifth year of his age. The same day, after having confessed and said his devotions, he was killed in battle with the English. His body was interred on the twelfth of the same month, in the cemetery of the Fort Duquesne, at the beautiful river, under the title of the Assumption of the Holy Virgin, and also with all the usual ceremonies by us, Priest Franciscan, Chaplain of the King, and of the above mentioned fort. In testimony of which we have signed. FR. DENYS BARON, P. F. CHAPLAIN."

In the heart of the wilderness, on the upper Allegheny, near the present Tionesta in Forest County, at Goschoschunk, a village of the Munsies though in the Seneca country, David Zeizberger preached to the Indians in the fall of 1767. In the summer of the next year a log mission-house of considerable dimensions was erected, and on June 30, 1768, dedicated. The meetings were attended by great numbers of the Indians, arrayed in their best garments, with their faces painted black and vermilion, and heads decorated with fox-tails. The missionaries removed three miles above, on the north side of the river, and with their converts established a little village of log huts in 1769, named Lamunhanneck. There, on September 1st, they began to build a chapel and dwelling-house, which they occupied before the winter, and by this time they had consecrated the chapel in which was hung a bell sent from Bethlehem,¹ and for the first time the valley of the Allegheny echoed the sound of the church-going bell.²

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The first settlers, however, of Western Pennsylvania were, as is well known, of the Presbyterian faith. These belonged to a church which had an effective missionary arrangement, and which bred among her own people a class of men who were adapted beyond all others to be the pastors of this people. It was such men as the Rev. John Steele, of Carlisle, who, in the spring of 1768, was sent by Governor John Penn to expostulate with the settlers at Redstone, and induce them to remove, as they had violated the law which regulated the settling on lands not purchased of the Indians. As there were some members of that church settled in the West previous to that, Revs. Beatty and Duffield were appointed by the Synod of New York and Philadelphia to visit Fort Pitt, and to pursue missionary enterprises still farther West. The Rev. Charles Beatty had accompanied the Pennsylvania contingent of soldiers as chaplain in 1755, and again under Forbes in 1758, and on the Sunday succeeding the capture of the fort preached a thanksgiving sermon to the soldiers.

In religious persuasion some of the earliest settlers along the rivers, and especially about those settlements which had been formed by the Ohio Company, were Episcopalians, adhering to the establishment as it existed in the Old Dominion; and a majority of those in that part known as Greene County, and noticeably along Dunkard Creek and Muddy Creek, Washington County, were Baptists.³ These latter had fled from odious laws of Virginia, which remained on the statute-book of that State long enough, when Patrick Henry made it the subject of one of his greatest efforts in favor of religious freedom, and which from the day he derided the law which threw a man in prison for preaching only Christ and him crucified became a nullity.⁴ But of the interior settlements of the southwestern part, at the earlier date of colonization, it is estimated that seven-eighths were of the one lineage, and adhered to the Westminster Confession of Faith, sang the songs of Israel, and piously venerated the memory of those men who had brought about the solemn league and covenant.

As we intend to refer to the religious history of our early people as it necessarily forces itself upon us in one view, we do not wish to be misunderstood in saying that we write a religious history in the sense commonly taken. This is not of our province, but it is our duty to notice it so far as it is inseparably connected with our secular history. What we shall say is matter of fact, and our inferences will be drawn only from authenticated data. Of these records there is abundance, and from them, it is claimed, as we have before said, that the first Protestant sermon preached west of the Allegheny Mountains was by Rev. Charles Beatty, who came to Fort Duquesne Nov. 24, 1758, with the army of Forbes, who that day took possession of the fort, after its evacuation by the French, and who the next day or the following preached a thanksgiving sermon to the army.

In 1760, Revs. Messrs. Alexander and Hector Allisou were directed by the Synod of Philadelphia to go

¹ One of the Moravian settlements in the eastern part of the State.

² See the article by William M. Darlington, Esq., in the "Centenary Memorial."

³ A good name for a creek in a Baptist settlement.

⁴ See Parton's "Life of Jefferson."

with the Pennsylvania forces. In 1766, Revs. Messrs. Charles Beatty and George Duffield were sent by the Synod to explore the frontier settlements and ascertain the condition of the Indians. They arrived at Pittsburgh on the 5th of September, finding Chaplain McLagan in spiritual charge of the fort. On the following Sabbath Mr. Beatty preached in the fort, and both the missionaries preached to the people who lived outside the fort. Then they proceeded to the Muskingum, whence they returned to Pittsburgh, and then to their homes in the East.¹

Soon after Mr. Beatty's visit, Mr. Anderson was appointed to visit this region, with the promise of twenty shillings for every Sabbath he should preach "on the other side of the Kittatinny Mountains."

In 1769 the Synod ordered the Presbytery of Donegal to supply the western frontier with ten Sabbaths of ministerial labor.

In 1771, Rev. Finley spent two months in missionary labors west of the Alleghenies. He came on horseback with a single companion, to make a preliminary exploration. He is said to have been the first pioneer missionary who visited the Washington County region. He purchased some land there, and in the assessment of tenants for Bedford County his name appears on the rolls.²

Rev. James Power was the first regularly ordained minister who settled in Western Pennsylvania. He passed through Westmoreland County in 1774, when he spent three months in missionary labor in the settlements. In 1776 he came with his family. He preached to the people at various places, where they afterwards had congregations, and supplied their wants till they organized and got other pastors. In 1779, after five years of missionary work, he became pastor of Mount Pleasant and Sewickley congregations, and of Mount Pleasant he continued pastor till he was incapacitated from age (1817). The other places of his earlier labors were at Dunlap's Creek, Laurel Hill, Tyrone, Unity, and Congruity.

Mount Pleasant Church was about two miles northwest of the present town. The town was called after the name of the meeting-house of the congregation, which name of itself is a familiar Scotch-Irish one, and is applied to various townships and meeting-houses in the earlier settlements of Pennsylvania and Maryland. On the Sabbath³ preceding the burning of Hannastown, Dr. Power was in the neighboring settlement somewhere. It has always been currently reported that he was officiating at Proctor's Tent, the old name for Unity Church, on the fast-day preceding communion services; that the men, as was their usual custom, had come to preaching with their guns, and that on hearing the commotion about the stockade the people dispersed, some of the men going towards the town.⁴

John McMillan, a Princeton man, and a name high-sounding among men, preached in 1775 among the people of our (now Washington) county, and in 1776 he received a call from the Chartiers settlement, the name of the settlement along the Chartiers Creek. He was ordained fifteen days before the signing of the Declaration. In 1778 he removed with his young wife, and from that time devoted the able energies of a long life to active parochial duties and to educa-

⁴ These following five ministers were here before the Redstone Presbytery was organized:

JOHN FINLEY was the first of the pioneer ministers who visited this region. He came on horseback, with a single companion, to explore the country and prepare the way for a permanent settlement. He was at this time in the prime of life, about forty years of age; born in the province of Ulster, Ireland; educated at the Fagg's Manor School. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1752.

In person he was a fat, nervous, florid little man, able to endure hardships, and prepared as soon as circumstances would admit to cast in his lot with the new settlements. He moved thither with his family in 1783, and about two years afterwards became pastor of the churches of Rebooth and Round Hill, first called "Upper and Lower Meeting-Houses." Of these churches he continued pastor until his death, Jan. 6, 1795.

JAMES POWER, D.D., first visited the new settlements in 1774. He was born in Chester County, Pa., in 1746, graduated at Princeton in 1766, licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle June 24, 1772. In 1776 he was ordained by the same Presbytery sine titulo, the reason being assigned that "he was about to remove to the western parts of this Province." Mr. Power moved across the mountains with all his family and household effects packed on horseback. The minister carried the eldest daughter on a pillion behind him, and the youngest in his arms. The two other daughters were seated in baskets hung on either side of another horse, the mother on a third, and the household effects on other horses. After performing missionary work for some five years he became pastor of the churches of Sewickley and Mount Pleasant. In 1787 he was released from the charge of the Sewickley Church, but continued with Mount Pleasant until 1817. He died Aug. 5, 1830, aged eighty-five years. Mr. Power was of medium height, erect, slender, graceful in manner, and extremely neat in dress; as a preacher he was clear, methodical, and evangelical.

JOHN McMILLAN, D.D., was the next man on the ground, of Irish descent, born at Fagg's Manor in 1752, graduated at Princeton, licensed in 1774. He first visited the West in 1775. He returned the next year, but owing to Indian difficulties did not remove his family to now Washington County until 1778, when he took charge of the congregations of Chartiers and Pigeon Creek. From the latter he was dismissed about the year 1800; of the former he continued pastor until about 1830. He died at Cannonburg, Pa., Nov. 16, 1833, in the eighty-first year of his age. Dr. McMillan was rough and brusque in his personal appearance and address, even slovenly. He was six feet in height, rough-hewn in features, and with a voice that was like the rumbling of thunder.

TRANNEUS DODD was born in New Jersey, March, 1740. His parents were from Connecticut. He graduated at Princeton in 1773, licensed in 1775, came to the West in 1777. He became pastor of the churches of "Upper and Lower Ten-Mile," in Washington County. Died May 20, 1793, in the fifty-fourth year of his age.

JOSEPH SMITH was a Marylander, born at Nottingham in 1736, graduated at Princeton in 1764, licensed Aug. 5, 1767, came to the West in 1769. In the following spring he moved out, and became pastor of Buffalo and Cross Creek congregations, Washington County. He preached there until his death, April, 1792, at the age of fifty-six. Although tall and slender, fair in complexion, fine countenance, and brilliant eyes, he spoke so largely of the terrors of the law that he was called "Hellfire Smith."

¹ Some of these ministers came out on a different errand than that of spreading the gospel, as Rev. John Steele, of Carlisle, who commanded a company under Armstrong in the Kittanning Expedition, 1756.

² Without citing authorities for all our statements, we would say we are indebted in general for data for the part which refers to Presbyterialism to "Old Redstone," "Life of Macurdy," "Centenary Memorial," and contemporaneous authoritative documents published by authority of that church.

³ Sunday was always called the "Sabbath," after the custom of the Scotch.

tional interests. In 1779, Rev. Joseph Smith, a Princeton graduate, preached also in that part of the county now of Washington. This was on a prospecting visit, and the next year he received a call. These men supplied the congregations through our part of the county for several years, Dr. McMillan preaching perhaps as early as 1775 to the men in the woods at Proctor's and Lochry's. Of McMillan much has been written and said, and it appears deservedly. Had he lived in the patristic era of Christianity, and been surrounded by such men as Tertullian and Origen, he would have been canonized. As it was, he appears to have gone part of the way, for he received the sobriquet of "Cardinal" at the time he helped to form political opinion in favor of Jefferson.

To these three ministers must be added Rev. Thaddeus Dodd and Rev. Joseph Smith, whose services were more identified with the region beyond the rivers and within the Washington County district. These five had established congregations all through the southwestern portion of Pennsylvania; they came here to stay, and they were the first ministers here at the organization of the famous "Old Redstone Presbytery," the mother of the Presbyteries of the West.

The Presbytery of Redstone was erected by the Synod of New York and Philadelphia on the 16th of May, 1781. It was directed to meet at Laurel Hill, in what is now Fayette County, on the third Monday of September following, at eleven o'clock A.M. The time approached, but the incursions of the Indians in the neighborhood of some of the members of the Presbytery rendered the meeting at Laurel Hill impracticable. The meeting was held at Pigeon Creek, Washington County. There were present the Revs. Messrs. John McMillan, James Power, and Thaddeus Dodd; Elders John Neil, Demas Lindley, and Patrick Scott; absent, Rev. Joseph Smith.

This was the first meeting of Presbytery west of the Allegheny Mountains. The second meeting was a failure, no quorum appearing. The third meeting was also a failure, "owing to the incursions of the savages." Its last meeting as the sole undivided Presbytery of the West was held on the 18th of October, 1793. It held forty-one meetings. Of these in the churches of the Presbytery which were and still are in Westmoreland it met five times at Rehoboth, twice at Mount Pleasant, once at Fairfield, and once at Long Run.

As all these churches, with some others within this Presbytery, were organized so much earlier, and as they have each of them a history, we may be pardoned for calling attention to them here, as we have elsewhere given their history at length.

REHOBOTH, or Upper Meeting-House (as Roundhill was called Lower Meeting-House), is believed to be among the oldest congregations of the Presbyterian denomination in the county. It is in Rostraver township, and about nine miles from Roundhill, which is in Allegheny County. The Rev. James Finley visited this part of the county in 1772, and preached to a few scattered whites living among the Indians. About 1778 he gathered the people here into regularly organized congregations, and in 1784 he took the pastoral charge of them. He died Jan. 6, 1795. After remaining vacant for two years, the Rev. David Smith was installed over them, and he dying Aug. 24, 1803, was succeeded by Rev. William Wylie in 1805. Dr. Wylie continued their pastor till the spring of 1817, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Robert Johnston. These congregations, being on the border, suffered much from the depredations of the savages.

MOUNT PLEASANT Church was organized probably in 1776, when Dr. Power removed to the West. It was supplied by him from that period till the spring of 1779, when he became the pastor of the united congregations of Mount Pleasant and Sewickley. On the 22d of August, 1787, he was dismissed from Sewickley, and continued the pastor of Mount Pleasant till April 15, 1817, when, from age and infirmity, he resigned his charge. It continued vacant till April 18, 1821, when the Rev. A. O. Patterson, D.D., was ordained and installed pastor of the united congregations of Sewickley and Mount Pleasant.

SEWICKLEY Church is supposed to have been organized by Dr. Power in 1776. He continued the pastor, in connection with Mount Pleasant, till August, 1787, when he resigned the pastoral care of Sewickley. The charge continued vacant until, in union with Long Run, it became the pastoral charge of the Rev. William Swan, Oct. 16, 1793. It again became vacant Oct. 18, 1818. In 1821 the congregation united with Mount Pleasant, and called Rev. Patterson to the pastorate.

LONG RUN, it is said, dates as early as the Redstone Presbytery, 1781. It was supplied by the Presbytery till 1793, when it united with Sewickley, and called Rev. William Swan to become their pastor. He continued their pastor till Oct. 18, 1818, when he resigned this united charge, but in the following summer was again installed pastor of Long Run alone, and continued in this relation till, at his request, it was dissolved April 17, 1822.

FAIRFIELD was early organized, and after being supplied by the Presbytery for a number of years, it at length, in connection with Donegal and Wheatfield, obtained as its pastor the Rev. George Hill, who was ordained and installed among them Nov. 13, 1792. He continued the pastor of this church until his death, June 17, 1822. On the 17th of June, 1824, the Rev. Samuel Swan was ordained pastor of Fairfield, in connection with Ligonier and Donegal.

UNITY was organized about 1776. There was preaching here for a number of years before there was a church. The place was known as Proctor's Tent. The present church is the third building of the congregation. Among its first members were the Proctors, the Lochrys, the Sloans, Craigs, and William Findley. They were at first served by supplies.

Their first regular pastor was Rev. John McPerrin, who served for them from 1791 to 1800, who had the congregation of Salem also in his charge. Neither the Salem nor the Congruity Churches had congregations as early as the Unity Church, but they were all organized at about the same time. They were all within the Redstone Presbytery. Rev. Samuel Porter was the first pastor of Congruity and Poke Run congregations. He was ordained in company with the Rev. McPerrin, Sept. 22, 1790, and installed pastor.

To be a missionary then in a region like this, which was in partibus infidelium, was perhaps as much in labors and in fastings as it was in the days when the old missionaries lived, around whose lives centres the halo of unearthly glory. Paul was not in more bodily danger when he preached on Mars' Hill than was Zeisberger among the Indians of Tionesta. These were dependent on charity for their food; they were daily and nightly in danger from wild men and wild beasts. In the depth of the forest they often lay down on the bare earth with stones for pillows, and under the watchful stars gave their souls to God. They suffered from cold, and often from inhospitality, and for a good share of life lived among a rough people in a cheerless climate, and fearful of helpless old age. They preached to half-dressed men in the woods, who stood leaning on their rifles, and the first meeting of their Presbytery, in 1781, was put off on account of the Indian incursions of that year.

The men of the Redstone Presbytery have been praised by some who knew their worth. From Brackenridge to Doddridge is a wide gap, but the doubting philosopher touched his hat with the Doctor of Divinity in the exclusive establishment to the energy, the simplicity, and the sound doctrine of these simple fathers, and admitted that the preachers contributed much to that happy change in the civil state of the border. These men had, indeed, a most wonderful hold on the people, and did shape their civil as well as their moral ends. A great part of this effectiveness was no doubt owing to their way of assimilating with the people. The distinction between minister and layman was never once forgotten. There was a stereotyped difference, and yet the distinction could not casually be observed. No Franciscan that ever begged alms and shrived souls had more influence in a spiritual sense than had these early missionaries and the subsequent pastors. They were respected by that race which owned no allegiance to any prince or potentate—of that race which, in its rags, was as proud as the Castilian Dons. At the same time they coalesced with and became part of the people. They struggled with the first settlers in the fields, in dangers from the Indians, and in all the privations of settling a new country. They had often to work with their hands for their food, and to keep their little ones from crying for bread. But most of them attained to a good old age, and they had the happy satisfaction of seeing the evidence of their work with their own eyes.

Soon after the Redstone Presbytery was organized there were various and successful attempts made to educate young men for the ministry especially, and in general for secular professions;¹ and among the pots and skillets of the early pastors' houses the poetry and eloquence of Greece and Rome were taught, and lectures given on dogmatic theology, where half a generation before the cross-legged Delawares sat jabbering. During the few succeeding years John McPerrin, Samuel Porter, Robert Marshall, George Hill, William Swan, and Thomas Marquis were licensed.²

¹ THE TWO COLLEGES.—Jefferson College began with the Academy and Library Company of Cannoneburg, 1791, with David Johneton its first teacher, Dr. McMillan transferring his Latin school to the chartered company. Col. Cannon built a stone building in 1796; the Pittsburgh Gazette mentions it as a "successful grammar school" in 1792; the trustees petitioned the Legislature for an appropriation, and in 1800 got one thousand dollars, and in 1802 it was granted a charter as Jefferson College, Rev. John Watson, its first president, followed by Dunlap, 1803; Wylie, 1812; William McMillan, 1817; Brown, 1822; Breckinridge, 1845; Crown, 1847; Alden, 1857; Riddle, 1862. The two colleges united under act of March 4, 1865, when Rev. Jonathan Edwards was chosen president, and inaugurated April 4, 1866.

Washington College grew out of the academy; was incorporated in 1806; the Legislature granted five thousand dollars in 1820, and in 1830 gave five hundred dollars yearly, for five years, as a gratuity to young men who desired to qualify for teachers. Its presidents have been Brown, 1806; Wylie, 1817 (closed two years); Elliott, 1830; McConaghey, 1831; Clark, 1850; Brownson, 1852; Scott, 1853; Wilson, 1865; Edwards, 1866,—consolidated. These two institutions and the united college have been of inestimable benefit not only to Washington County, but to the whole country, and to all parts of the world; for ministers of the gospel and lawyers and physicians and business men educated in them are found in all parts of the United States, while missionaries gone out from them have labored or are doing so on every continent.

² SAMUEL PORTER was born in Ireland in 1760. His studies were pursued under direction of Mr. Smith and Rev. McMillan, the latter making no charge for board or tuition, while a friend provided for his family in the mean time. He was licensed Nov. 12, 1789. In the following year he became pastor of the congregations of Poke Run and Congruity. Of the former he was pastor until 1798, of the latter until his death, Sept. 23, 1825, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

GEORGE HILL was born in York County, March 13, 1764. He was licensed to preach Dec. 22, 1791. He was first settled in the congregations of Fairfield, Donegal, and Wheatfield (northern part of Ligonier Valley), Nov. 13, 1792. Six years afterwards he resigned the charge of Wheatfield, and accepted a call for Ligonier. In these charges he labored until his death, June 9, 1822, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He was a man of remarkable vigor of constitution, with a mind to work.

JOHN MCPERRIN was born in York County, now Adams County, Nov. 15, 1757. He learned the languages preparatory to his going to college, under the Rev. Robert Smith, of Pequea, and was graduated May 7, 1788, at Dickinson College, Carlisle; licensed to preach Aug. 20, 1789, by the Presbytery of Redstone, and ordained and installed pastor of the united congregations of Salem and Unity on the 22d of September, 1791; resigned the charge of Unity on the 25th of June, 1800, and on the 20th of April, 1803, that of Salem, and having accepted a call from the united congregations of Concord and Muddy Creek, in the Erie Presbytery, he was dismissed to that Presbytery. He died Feb. 10, 1822.

WILLIAM SWAN was a native of Cumberland County, Pa., and was educated at Cannoneburg; licensed to preach Dec. 22, 1791. He had many calls, but finally accepted the one from Long Run and Sewickley, April 7, 1793, and on the 18th of October following was ordained and installed their pastor. Here he labored for a period of twenty-five years. In October, 1718, he obtained leave to resign the pastoral care of the congregation, but in the following spring, April 20, 1819, he was recalled to Long Run. Here he labored for three years longer, but by reason of declining health the pastoral relation was dissolved finally April 17, 1822. Under a slow pulmonary consumption his health continued to decline, and on the 27th of November, 1827, he died, in the sixty-third year of his age.

From the necessity of the thing our remarks are more directed to the polity of the Presbyterian Church as it existed in the early Westmoreland than to any other. Its relation to the people now cannot be compared with its relation to them then, but it forms such an element in the secular history, that we, to understand something at any rate of the customs and manners of our founders, are led into an extended article. The Calvinistic tendencies of all the early churches of Western Pennsylvania being in one direction, and their polity somewhat identical, their customs may be called the same. Besides this, much of our early history is illustrated by their records.

The meetings then of the early pastors with the people, before there were regularly-organized congregations, were in the open air.

"The groves

Were God's first temples, ere man learned to hew
The shaft, or lay the architrave."

A pulpit of logs was temporarily erected, and log seats resting on the ground upon stones answered for those who wished to sit, but it was commonly the custom of the men and boys to remain standing, leaning against trees. The pulpit when covered with boards was called a tent. In warm weather, clothing being very scarce, the men frequently came to meeting without coats, and the preacher, before reading the psalm, usually took off his coat and spoke in his shirt-sleeves. In cold or inclement weather the people brought with them blankets and coverlets, and greatcoats, and they sometimes built huge fires. When the catechumens had assembled at the Old Brush Creek Church before one Easter, it being raw and cold, the pastor, Rev. Weber, directed the young men to build a brush-heap near the church and fire it during the intermission between the forenoon and afternoon sessions, that they might gather around it and warm themselves till they were called back to the cold building.

Preaching in cabins was perhaps cotemporaneous with preaching in the woods, but where they expected to have frequent services, and where they had these, were the places which they called tents. In a community the most accessible, and which marks the site or location of many of the early churches, these permanent arrangements were made. Here a platform-pulpit like a shed was made to protect the preacher from rain and the sun. This was erected on a declivity among tall trees. A board in front of the preacher was the reading-desk; the back and sides were closely boarded. Logs and puncheon-seats arranged against the incline of the ground served for the congregation. To such occasions of public worship are to be traced those peculiar revivals which are recorded in the ecclesiastical history of Western Pennsylvania and Western Virginia.

None of the earlier churches tell the date of their construction nor of their organization. But the first churches were the round log cabins made double, with the logs joined to each other along the sides. There are instances of churches being built in a single day. The recess left in the middle of such buildings was occupied on one side by the pulpit. In the earliest buildings no fire was used, and when fire was first utilized it was sometimes made in an earthen vessel in the centre of the building.

On Sept. 13, 1775, Dr. McMillan preached at a meeting-house at Long Run, and Judge Veech, after giving the subject some reflection, states that there were doubtless meeting-houses at Mount Pleasant, Sewickley, Laurel Hill,¹ Dunlap's Creek (the scene of Dr. Power's early labors), not later than 1777. The first house in which Mr. Power preached for the Sewickley congregation stood on the road leading from Markle's paper-mill towards Pittsburgh, about half-way between the Big Sewickley and the Little Sewickley. It was a clapboard-roofed cabin, with openings in the logs covered with glazed linen for the windows. The clapboards were kept to their place by saplings or split logs. The seats were cleft logs raised on blocks; the door and windows had been cut out after the house was built, and the door was hung on wooden hinges.

The old translation of the psalms, called Rouse's, was the only one tolerated, and Watts' version was slow in superseding it. The clerk lined out (precented) the lines of the psalm or hymn from his place under the pulpit. He also published the banns of marriage. He managed to sing and talk through his nose in a monotonous monotone. At first all the congregation sang the air only, but gradually the other parts were introduced,—the treble, the counter, and the bass. The number of tunes were few, and were known to all evangelical sects from Virginia to Massachusetts. These were called the twelve tunes of David. Parson, in his "Life of Jefferson," says that the psalmody of early Virginia for almost two hundred years was restricted to a fewer number of airs than this. When the notes to them were used they were such as afterwards were called by an irreverent generation "buckwheat" characters; in size these were about the circumference of a grain of buckwheat, which, in truth, they somewhat resembled.

The first innovation in psalmody is blamed to those Yankees of New England who passed the winter of 1788 along the Yough awaiting to embark in the spring for the new lands along the Ohio, and whom Dr. Hildreth has made famous. These had among them the proverbial Yankee singer and fiddler, who followed in the wake of their great prototype, Ichabod Crane, to smash hearts, and, Orpheus-like, "to wake the woods of Rodope, when rocks and trees had ears to rapture." These, it is said, first introduced the bass viol to chord with the human voice in the choir; whence we have an idea of the effect of this innovation in the direction of the old minister to "let us feedle and sing" such and such a psalm. Those people of passage introduced here a wonderful variety of tunes, and first, from among the hidden mysteries, disclosed the beauty of the "fugue" tunes in which our old people when they were young took so much enjoyment. The peculiarity of the fugue tunes will be remembered by those who have heard them, hut it is hard to explain. After the four parts into which the music was divided had been passed over together for the first two lines of the verse, they were separated, each portion of the congregation then singing for itself, and each following the other and taking up the line as the preceding portion ended on it. The nicety of it was that they all managed to come out together, and in this was the art. We have heard some very respectable old persons say this manner of singing could not give a reverently- and spiritually-inclined creature a very forcible notion of the celestial harmony of the beatific spheres, for each part had to sing the highest, the loudest, and the strongest.

¹ Now Connellsville, Fayette County.

The Presbytery of Redstone, increasing in population and in the number of pastors and churches, was from time to time changed in bounds and extent. In 1830 the Presbytery of Blairsville was erected from the territory of Redstone, embracing the ministers and congregations north of the Pittsburgh and Stoystown turnpikes, viz.: Rev. Messrs. J. W. Henderson, Francis Laird, David Barclay, James Graham, John Reed, Samuel Swan, Jesse Smith, Thomas Davis, John H. Kirkpatrick, Samuel McFarren, Elisha D. Barrett, James Campbell, and Watson Hughes, with their respective charges. The new Presbytery held its first meeting at Ebenezer, Rev. Francis Laird, presiding.

The old churches in the county which originally belonged to the Redstone Presbytery, hut which now belong to the Blairsville Presbytery, are Fairfield, Donegal, Salem, Unity, and Poke Run. Those in existence in 1830, when the Presbytery was organized, were Greensburg, Plum Creek (first called Ebenezer), Congruity, and Ligonier. Those which have since been added are Murraysville, New Alexandria, Latrobe, Penn, Parnassus, Irwin, and Derry.

The Presbyterian Churches in Westmoreland County are as follows:

Name of Church.	Name of Minister.	No. of Members.
Laird.....	Rev. John Kerr, S.S.....	83
Fairfield.....	" W. M. Donaldson, P.....	130
Union.....	" " " ".....	80
New Alexandria.....	" F. L. Lenour, P.....	215
Pine Run.....	" John M. Jones, P.....	147
Harrison City.....	Vacant.....	105
Manor.....	Rev. James Kirk, P.....	100
Unity.....	" D. W. Townsend, P.....	157
Greensburg.....	" W. W. Moorhead, P.....	400
Poke Run.....	" Henry Bain, P.....	360
Latrobe.....	" Thomas B. Anderson, P.....	225
Livermore.....	" James S. Woodburn, P.....	121
New Salem.....	" J. L. Thompson, P.....	212
Ligonier.....	" E. G. McKinley, P.....	120

Name of Church.	Name of Minister.	No. of Members.
Salem.....	Rev. D. R. McCaslin, P.....	95
Derry.....	" " " ".....	125
Congruity.....	" E. S. Robinson, P.....	221
Irwin.....	" A. Z. McGogney, P.....	143
Murraysville.....	" John I. Blackburn, P.....	251
Parnassus.....	Vacant.....	157
Pleasant Grove.....	Mr. E. H. Dickinson, S.S.....	115
Centreville.....	Vacant.....	29
Mt. Pleasant Reunion.....	Rev. Spencer L. Finney, P.....	130
Long Run.....	" W. P. Moore, P.....	175
West Newton.....	" John C. Meloy, P.....	170
Scottdale.....	" J. H. Stevenson, P.....	111
Mt. Pleasant.....	" Wm. F. Ewing, P.....	191
Sewickley.....	Vacant.....	100
Pleasant Unity.....	Rev. A. A. Hough, P.....	93
Rehoboth.....	" A. F. Boyd, P.....	134

REFORMED CHURCH.

The German settlers on coming out did not bring ministers with them, nor did they have any for many years; but they had in nearly every settlement, after the German custom, a schoolmaster who instructed the children in the catechism, and taught them reading and writing, who baptized the babes and read the prayers at the grave, who married young couples and who visited the sick. The school-house, later, was erected alongside of the church; or if the school-house had been first the church was erected near it, so that services were often held in those buildings before they had church buildings.

And so it was the custom long after this to make the house or outhuilding of some prominent Lutheran or German Reformed the centre of a congregation for a place of worship. Hither the pastor came and preached, held communion services, and catechised. These periodical services sometimes lasted for a week.

The German branch of Protestantism which rose from the Reformation in the sixteenth century resolved itself into two distinct communions, the "Reformed" and the "Lutheran." The Reformed Church in the United States, up until the General Synod held in Philadelphia in 1869, was officially known and is sometimes yet popularly called the German Reformed Church, hut at that meeting of the Classis the word "German" was officially dropped from the title of the church. The Reformed is sometimes confounded with the Presbyterian Church, hy being considered the German branch of that church, hut they differ chiefly in this, that the latter is less liturgical and more rigidly Calvinistic than the former.

The original members of both the Reformed and Lutheran Churches came from the German nations of Europe, and they were bound together by many ties, of which the strongest were lineage, language, intermarriage, a commonality of liturgies, of pastoral authority, of profession of faith, and of symbolical observances and formulas. It would appear to a disinterested observer that the theology of the Heidelberg Catechism was not so strictly taught then as later, and that in its views of the sacraments of the Lord's Supper and of baptism the church differed not so much from the Lutheran, for it now professes to be in these two questions more with Geneva than with Augsburg. But we make these remarks merely as an observer and without authority, and advance them to explain the commonality of these two communions as it is observed of their respective histories in our county in the primordial days.

In the government of their churches they are both Presbyterian, in distinction to Episcopal, Papal, or Congregational, and so called because it is a government of elders; that is, as they say, by the "ministers and the congregational officers elected by the respective congregations for certain temporal and spiritual needs." These form the first body for church organization and business, while larger bodies formed together in a representative capacity, which larger bodies are called by some Presbyteries, but by these, "Classis," and so on.

In the early days of the colony, and particularly in the region outside of the more thickly populated parts, the rising generation of the German Protestants first found little in these two different churches to disagree in. They therefore frequently intercommuned together, the common or nearest pastor performed the first and last rites of their ministerial functions to those in need without regard to church connection, and they both mutually assisted each other.

There was originally in both these churches a great disparity between the population holding these religious preferences and the number of pastors to supply their spiritual wants.¹

At an early date the members of the two German churches, the Reformed and the Lutheran, were accustomed to meet in respective localities at the houses of some of their members, and here they held religious services. These services were at first conducted without a minister, and consisted in singing from their German hymn-books, reading the Bible, and offering prayers from their German prayer-books. Among the Lutherans especially, and also, as we have seen, among the Reformed, when they had a schoolmaster, who they usually brought with them, it was part of his duty to catechise and to administer the sacramental rite of baptism. By this means they got along for some years, and when each denomination at first got its pastor he was sufficient to supply the spiritual wants of a large district. Thus, when the pastor at the old Brush Creek congregation gathered his class of catechumens, the settlers brought or sent their children a distance of above twenty miles. Hither they came for catechisation from the Alemann settlement in Butler County, from Puckety, and beyond the Kiskiminetas.

¹ Rev. Schlatter, who arrived in America in 1746, brought the congregations together and formed a Synod. At the first meeting of that body, Sept. 29, 1747, it consisted of five ministers and twenty-six elders, and yet the Reformed population was estimated to be about 30,000.

² "History of Reformed Church within the Bounds of the Westmoreland Classis." We have consulted this publication, and it is our authority for local data and statistics.

The two churches likewise bought nearly all their church property in common. They worshiped together in one house, and not infrequently performed and administered the sacraments of the church each for the other. The members of their congregations intermarried, and were buried side by side.

The distinctive congregational polity of the orthodox German churches is nowhere more apparent than it is among those older congregations. They at first secured land at moderate rates sufficient for church purposes, and frequently glebe-land for the pastor's support; they built a house for their schoolmaster; they erected their churches with their own hands, and nearly every congregation had a stone-cutter who raised head- and foot-stones over the graves of the dead.

The old graveyard of the Harrold congregation, with its mural remains of memorial tablets, rudely carved tombstones and modern monumental pillars, tells the whole story. For many years, and until very lately, it supported its own stone-cutters, who on the dressed flag-stones of the neighboring quarries carved the most grotesque figures, and made for weeping friends most melancholy epitaphs which soothed the widow's anguish, and even at this day bid the by-passer stop and ponder. These graven images did not conduce to idolatry, for they were not the likeness of anything in heaven above, in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. Touching the designs on the pyramids and obelisks, on the mausoleums and sarcophagi of all people who hold the dead in memory, these are all in a sense symbolical. The moderns follow in the footsteps of the ancients, and the latest is but a refinement on the earliest. Thus on these you have stars for the Chaldeans, triangles for the Hebrews, corbels for the Parsees, the sacred lotus for the Egyptians, urns for the Greeks, and for the Latins, lilies such as Father Anchises in Elysium, speaking to the pious Æneas, wanted to scatter over the shade of the youthful Marcellus. The commonest ornamentation of these tombstones is a curling vine around the upper disk terminating in broad leaves. In the centre where these begin is a flower which we incline to think was intended for an imitation of the tulip; a flower that carried the memory back to the straight walks, the trim gardens, the cozy cottages, and the bridal wreaths of the bride along the Rhine. These flowers and vines have been painted, and some are green, some blue, some yellow, and others red.² Dear friends have scattered the seed of summer-savory and coriander, which springing up in thick beds scarce allows room for the periwinkle and golden-rod, and which when trod upon emits a strong odor.

² For fear some antiquary should in future time attribute some emblematic significance to these characters, we would hint that they were merely put upon the stones for ornamentation. These old ones, covering many years' time, were blocked out and chiseled upon by a man named Hines, as appears by the token.

"Yet even these bones from insult to protect
 Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
 With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture deck'd,
 Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

"Their names, their years, spelt by the unletter'd muse,
 The place of fame and elegy supply;
 And many a holy text around she strews,
 To teach the rustic moralist to die."¹

The first Gernian Reformed congregation in the county was the Harrold congregation. Balthazer Meyer, their schoolmaster, has left some of the records of the names of the children baptized by him before they had a minister. Among the first in the list was "Peter the son of Antony and Elizabeth Walter born 11th September, 1771—Baptised, August 2d, 1772." The last child baptized was "Susanna, daughter of John and Christina Rudabaugh, born 30th May, 1782, baptized 4th June, 1782."

In 1782 or 1783 requests were sent from the county to the Coetus (or Synod) for a Reformed minister to be sent them. Answering them, the Rev. John William Weber came as a missionary, and remained their first pastor. In June, 1783, when he entered on his work he had four congregations to serve,—Harrold's, or Saint John's, and the Brush Creek, both in Hempfield township; Kintig's, in Mount Pleasant township; and the Ridge Church, about one mile south of Pleasant Unity, in Unity township. He also preached at Pittsburgh. Besides these regular places of service, he held services and gave instructions in Ligonier Valley, and to the scattered Germans of both his own church and the Lutheran Church all over the southern part of the county in nearly every locality where later has been a congregation.

In respect to its church organization, all those of the Reformed Church in Western Pennsylvania belonged to the Old Synod of the United States. The first missionaries hither were the Revs. John William Weber, Henry Habbiston, and William Winel, who were sent to Westmoreland County and the contiguous regions by this Synod, and reported to it from year to year. The first Classis was formed by the ministers and charges located west of the eastern line of Bedford County, and was named the Western Pennsylvania Classis, and was part of the Synod of the United States. In 1836 this Classis was allowed to unite with the Synod of Ohio and adjacent States. In 1839 the name of this Classis was changed to the Eastern District Synod of Ohio. In 1842 this Synod was changed or divided into two Classes, to be thenceforth known as the Westmoreland and the Erie Classes.²

In 1850, by the Ohio Synod, the pastors and charges north of the Kiskiminetas River, and belonging to the Westmoreland Classis, were permitted to organize a new Classis. Westmoreland remained with the Ohio Synod up to the formation of the Pittsburgh Synod, Feb. 12, 1870.

In October, 1871, the Pittsburgh Synod granted a request to the Westmoreland Classis to divide again into three parts, to be known by the names of Westmoreland, Somerset, and Allegheny Classes. This division went into effect in June, 1872.

The first meeting of the Classis was held at New Salem (Delmont P. O.) in June, 1872. Rev. John I. Swander (now of Ohio) was elected president; Rev. J. F. Snyder, stated clerk; and Rev. John W. Love, treasurer.

We give the statistical report for the Westmoreland Classis for 1881 :

MINISTERS.	Congregat'ns.	CHARGES.	Members.	Unconfirmed Members.
Jacob F. Snyder.....	2	Emmanuel.....	339	293
John W. Love	3	Second, Greensburg.....	289	267
David B. Lady	2	Brush Creek.....	550	432
John McConnell.....	2	Salina	103	78
Samuel Z. Beam.....	4	Mount Pleasant.....	228	132
Cyrus R. Dieffenbacher.	2	First, Greensburg.....	480	400
George D. Gurley.....	1	Latrobe.....	65	50
Benjamin B. Ferer.....	3	Pleasant Unity.....	315	235
John Dotterer.....	1	Pine Run.....	129	80
Albert E. Truxal.....	1	Irwin	200	165
Charles W. Good.....	2	Salem.....	243	178
Prof. Lucian Cort.....		Principal Greensburg Female Sem.....
James Grant.....		Without charge.....
Supplied by Rev. Good.	1	St. James Congregation.....	45	20
Wm. H. Bates.....	1	Johnstown.....	50
Total, 15.....	25		3036	2340

In the mutation of things, the history of the Reformed Church in Westmoreland County has a chapter full of matter for melancholy reflection. This is the one devoted to the sketches of those congregations which are now extinct. Of these there were five,—namely, the Mühleisen (now called by its English name, the Milliron), Donegal, Indian Creek, Barren Run, and the Forks congregations. These were all located in the southeastern part of Westmoreland and the northeastern part of Fayette County. The dates of their organization are not known, and very little

² Accordingly, the first meeting of Westmoreland Classis proper convened by appointment of Synod at Kindigh's, or St. John's Church, near Mount Pleasant, Pa., May 28th, 1843. There were present at this meeting six ministers and seven elders, namely: Revs. N. P. Hacke, William Conrad, H. A. Ibeken, William Winel, H. E. P. Voigt, H. Knepper; and Elders John Wentzel, Henry Smith, Michael Ruby, Benjamin Countryman, M. Zimmerman, Peter Whitehead, and David Stemble. There were absent: Rsvs. H. Kocb, G. Lidy, P. Zeiser, and J. Altbouse. Rev. William Conrad was elected President; Rsv. H. A. Ibeken, Secretary, and Elder Peter Whitehead, Treasurer."

¹ On a tombstone in the Brush Creek graveyard is the following line (inter alia).

fair
 "She was young, she was ~~poor~~"

"Poor" has been engraved for fair, and then crossed out and "fair" engraved above.

In another graveyard, a widow, after telling of the virtues of her deceased husband, reminds the world that,

"This stone is erected
 Out of the Gratitude
 Of his Consort."

Truly, "the force of satire could no further go."

of their history, as no documentary history has been preserved.

These were, no doubt, the result of Rev. Weber's missionary labors in that region during his ministrations. Probably some of them are of a later date, as the first record of these congregations, as referred to in the "History of the Reformed Church," is found in the minutes of the Eastern District Synod of Ohio for the year 1841. With the exception of the Milliron congregation, there is no written record of any of them prior to this date. Tradition, however, reports that they were served by the Rev. Weber and his successors, Revs. Weinel and Voight. The record for that year shows that these congregations, except that of Barren Run, were a part of the Mount Pleasant charge, of which Rev. Voight was pastor. In 1845 the name of the Forks is dropped, and that of Barren Run appears for the first time. But from the following year it does not appear again upon the record. The number only, and not the names of the other congregations, appear after 1849, but some of them still are continued till 1859. From this time there is no further notice taken in the records of the Classes of any of them.

Of these it may be said that there is no evidence they were ever in a prosperous condition, that they seem to have been weak and unpromising interests from the start, and that organized in remote localities, they could not receive the necessary pastoral services to make them prosperous, even under more favorable circumstances. For many years the organizations were kept up, and served with difficulty by the pastors, until they died from neglect. The membership was scattered, and some being absorbed in other denominations.

The Rev. C. C. Russell is reported as the last Reformed minister who preached at Indian Creek and Barren Run. He visited the congregations for the purpose of reorganizing them, but found the material entirely lost to the Reformed Church. The Rev. J. A. Heller stopped preaching at Donegal, while he was pastor at the Mount Pleasant charge, about 1870-72. This is the last account of any services held in any of these congregations.

The Mühleisen, or Milliron, congregation shall have something more said of it in the local history of the township to which it belongs. In their "Gottes-Acker" they hold the bones of their first missionary, John William Weber. And strange, while the congregation itself has passed into the "unseen forever," the old church, with its old octagonal pulpit, now covered with spider-webs, and the old "pastor's house," still remain deserted but not desecrated, while the little graveyard, with many unmarked graves, is yet kept cleanly and neatly, and over all is the granite monument erected by the Westmoreland Classis to the memory of their pioneer missionary.

REV. JOHN WILLIAM WEBER.—Rev. John William Weber was born in the province of Witzzenstein, Germany, on the 4th of March, 1735. He was a school-teacher in the fatherland. He emigrated to America probably in 1764, and in the "Coetal" (synodical) minutes of 1771 he is mentioned as a "school-master, who appeared with the request that he might be examined as to his knowledge of Divine things." The examination proving satisfactory, he was authorized to preach. His first charge must have been in Northampton County, or rather in that part of it which constitutes Monroe County in this State. The German traveler Schoepf, who passed through there in 1782, says in the account of his journey, "After we left Eckhardt's we missed the way which we were to take to Brinker's Mill, turning to the left; in this way, however, we came past several farms, for which we would not have looked in this region. They lay scattered in the woods, and are settled for the most part by Germans; for these are inclined mostly to locate in remote places, where they can obtain land at a low price. We passed a small log church, which has been built by the Lutheran and German Reformed, whom it served alternately as a place of worship. Rev. Pastor Weber last served this congregation. We went to Pittsburgh."

In a document drawn up by Mr. Weber himself, he says that he came to Westmoreland County in September, 1782, and that he preached in Pittsburgh before the 18th of October in the same year, when he was officially called to the charge at a salary of £116 in money, one hundred bushels of wheat, a free house, and firewood annually. The traveler, Schoepf, refers again to Mr. Weber, when he was at Pittsburgh, in October, 1782. Speaking of this city he says, "Public buildings, as houses for worship, there are as yet none here. There is, nevertheless, a German preacher here who ministers for believing persons of different confessions." These "believing persons" Mr. Weber no doubt organized into a congregation very soon afterwards, as the records of 1783 and his own constant language clearly imply. His labors extended over a large territory, and continued for many years. He preached much. He catechised the young regularly in all the congregations. He laid the foundation of his church in these parts broad and deep, and upon them a structure has been raised worthy of the man. He is described by Dr. Harbaugh: "In personal appearance Mr. Weber was a good-looking, portly, well-formed man, blessed with a strong and vigorous constitution, and to undergo a great deal of labor and fatigue. He was of an ardent, quick temperament, free spoken, rapid, but clear and distinct, in his enunciation while preaching, and in the habit of what is generally termed 'calling things by their right names.'" His labors in Pittsburgh appear to have extended to the year 1812. He continued his labors in the country congregations until almost the day of his death, in July, 1816. He reached the ripe old age of nearly eighty-two.

His name is mentioned in the still remaining fragmental congregational records. More particular reference to his labors here we have in his journal and in the papers referred to in his biography. A pretty full account of his life and services is contained in the second volume of Harbaugh's "Fathers of the Reformed Church," from page 208 to 221.

REV. NICHOLAS P. HACKE, D.D.—This eminent divine departed this life on Monday, Aug. 26, 1878. His remains were interred in the German burying-ground, in Greensburg, on Thursday, August 29th, in the presence of a very large assemblage of citizens, ministers, and professional men. The Rev. Thomas G. Apple, D.D., president and professor in the theological seminary in Lancaster, Pa., was present, and preached the funeral sermon in the old German Church in Greensburg, where the remains of the deceased were placed during the funeral ceremonies, in which several distinguished clergymen participated.

The closing of the business houses and the unusually large number of people who assembled to pay the last sad homage of respect to the memory of Dr. Hacke, evinced the profound respect that was felt for the deceased. Dr. Hacke was born in Baltimore, but educated in Germany. When he was about sixteen years of age he returned to America and studied divinity in Baltimore under the care of a Reformed minister. At the age of about nineteen years he came to Greensburg, in Westmoreland County, and soon after took charge of the German Reformed congregations in Greensburg, at Harrold's and at Brush Creek. The old German meeting-house in Greensburg, erected at the joint expense of the Lutheran and Reformed congregations, was a log building, erected in 1796 or shortly before that time, on the parsonage lot where Dr. Hacke lived previous to his death. Prior to his coming to Greensburg, the old brick Lutheran and Reformed German meeting-house, on the west side of Main Street, was commenced, but not finished when Dr. Hacke came out here, and it is said he preached his first sermon in Greensburg in the old court-house. He was the cotemporary of six of the president judges of Westmoreland County, namely, Judges Young, White, Knox, Burrell, Buffington, and Logan, and has survived all of them but two, and of all the members of the bar who were practicing law in 1819, when Dr. Hacke first came to Greensburg, but one is now surviving. At different periods of his life he had charge of at least nine congregations, namely, Greensburg, Harrold's, Brush Creek, Ridge, Ligonier, Youngstown, Hill's, Seanor's, and Manor.

No man in the county had intimate social relations with so large a number of respectable and influential citizens, and hence when Dr. Hacke was in the vigor of life he was himself a power in the county, and young men entering upon a professional career sought his friendship as a passport to success. His learning was accurate, solid, and comprehensive, and his conversation varied, chaste, mirthful, and entertaining. His judgment of capacity and character was excellent.

A superficial, pretentious outside appearance never deceived him. In fact, all such characters soon discovered that it was useless and damaging to subject their shallow assumptions and pretended knowledge to the clear sunlight of his great discernment. By some law of our rational natures, men of great ability, although of very dissimilar talents, naturally gravitate towards each other. With such there is an inherent law of friendship and cordial feeling when this tendency is not overcome by some stronger motive of competition or ambitious aims. Not to speak of the living, we may refer to two of the eminent men of Greensburg, now deceased, as a striking illustration of what has just been remarked upon. The Hon. J. M. Burrell, formed by nature for politics rather than for the law, and Dr. Alfred T. King, the naturalist, both of whom were pre-eminent in their respective positions, were strongly attached to Dr. Hacke, and entertained for him the most profound respect; and he, on his part, seems to have reciprocated this sentiment of devotion. There was nothing in their professional or religious tendencies that led to this. It existed in spite of these causes of divergence. Dr. Hacke was not only a Christian theologian, but also a religious philosopher, who in any age and in any country—on the banks of the Ganges, the Nile, or the Obi—would have "understood by the things that are made" the eternal power and divinity of the Creator, and his right to the homage, respect, and veneration of all intelligent creatures. It is said of Spinoza that he was a mystic, drunk with God. Dr. Hacke was the reverse of all this. His mind was practical rather than speculative. In the sphere of the things of the world he demanded proof or clear, logical demonstration based upon known facts. While this was the tendency of his mental structure, it is evident that he was not wholly satisfied with this piecemeal and rodent process of attaining a knowledge of the facts in nature, because he read incessantly and with eagerness, but with great discrimination, the advanced thought and profound speculations of educated writers in every department of learning.

There is one trait of character without which no man can be great, whatever may be his ability. It is that inflexible firmness of purpose that moves along the whole stage of life without vacillation. The soul so habilitated is founded on a rock, and when the popular humor of the hour is spent is spared the mortification of having floated on a bubble, a retrospect of which is hardly consistent with enduring self-respect. Dr. Hacke possessed in a remarkable degree this trait of character. New measures, transient outbursts of popular fervor in advocacy of one virtue to the oversight of others equally important, did not enlist his sympathies or disturb the even tranquillity of his steadfast and immovable disposition, and then when the ephemeral excitement had passed away, even those who had fallen in with the current of the abnormal movement could see and appreciate "how much happier is he who remains immovable, and smiles at the madness of the dance about him." For fifty-eight years of active ministerial life Dr. Hacke sustained this solid character of temperateness, even in doing good, and when the community was surprised by radical and passionate popular movements in politics, morals, religion, and temperance, many learned to wait and hear what Dr. Hacke would say. This steadfastness indicated no indisposition to legitimate progress. Dr. Hacke was a great reader, and kept himself well informed on all scientific questions, and doubtless this had the effect of modifying his earlier convictions in regard to scientific truth. Perhaps the most difficult trial that he had to undergo in his ministerial capacity was the transition from German to English. The old members of his congregations of course insisted on adhering to German preaching and services in the churches, while the younger members, some of whom understood but little German, insisted on English preaching. Here was a dilemma hard to reconcile. Dr. Hacke was a man of large foresight, and doubtless was convinced that sooner or later the transition must come; but while he lived he was anxious to preserve the unity and harmony of all his church-members, and could not, with propriety, take a very decided stand on either side, and some were uncharitable enough, perhaps, to say, "Yaw, der Hacke will auch Irish werden." But this was a great mistake. Dr. Hacke was a thorough German, proud of his Saxon ancestry. He had spent his youth at Bremen, on the Weser, which takes its rise near Detmold, where Arminius, his countryman, in the ninth century had annihilated the legions of Varus, the Roman consul, and where, at a later period, Wittekind, a man of illustrious descent and immense estates, in the eighth century resisted for several years the armies of Charlemagne. Their character was that of wild, obstinate freedom, and they were the last of the German tribes to accept the Christian religion; but within a generation after they had accepted it they became the most devoted followers of the Saviour.

And now, concludes his biographer to whom we are indebted, after fifty-eight years of active ministerial service, the old patriarch, descended from this noble stock, has bid adieu to all the active pursuits of this world. In a good old age, crowned with honor and respect, he has been gathered unto his fathers, and will not rise "till the heavens be no more."

THE GREENSBURG SEMINARY.

Greensburg Seminary is located at Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., Pa., thirty-one miles east of Pittsburgh, on the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad. At a meeting of the "Board of Trustees of Literary Institutions" of the Pittsburgh Synod of the Reformed Church, held March 3, 1874, this institution was established by the action of that body. In accordance with this action the preliminary steps were immediately taken to put the institution on foot, and the idea of a permanent female seminary, which had been attempted at different times before, was now about to be realized. The Rev. Lucian Cort, of Martinsburg, Pa., was called to take charge of the enterprise. Although engaged in an important work in the institution over which he presided at the time, he was induced by the earnest appeals and solicitations of the friends of the new enterprise to accept the call. After due consideration of the risks and the financial responsibilities of commencing and carrying forward such an undertaking, he entered upon the work in good faith, and the erection of the necessary buildings was accordingly commenced without delay. On the 18th of April a suitable location was purchased on elevated grounds overlooking the town and surrounding country. On this beautiful site a large, elegant, and commodious building of the most substantial structure was erected for the accommodation of boarding pupils and school purposes. The formal opening of the institution took place with appropriate services on the 7th of April, 1875. Thus in less than one year from the time of commencing the erection of the buildings they were entirely completed, and the institution went into full operation. It took its origin, as may be seen on the one hand, from a deep-felt want in the minds of many of the citizens of Greensburg and surrounding community of a school of a high grade in their midst for the education of their daughters, and on the other hand from the positive enactment of the Synod of the Reformed Church, in order to meet the educational wants of her own membership. The institution is thus brought into close relation to the church, which gives it a broader basis and a more permanent character than a merely private project. It secures not only the support but the sanction of the church, without which no institution of learning can expect permanently to prosper. Whilst it is thus under the fostering care of the Reformed Church, it is not sectarian, but only denominational and distinctively Christian. Its advantages are not exclusive, but free and open to all. With such a wide scope in view, it hopes to subserve the general interests of Christian education, as well as the special wants of the particular denomination under whose care and direction it was more especially established.

The general object and character of the institution is set forth in a circular letter published before the opening, and is as follows:

"The object of this institution is to afford to young ladies the advantages of a Christian education as distinguished from a mere secular training. It aims to accomplish this important end not by cultivating their mental powers only, but their moral, social, and aesthetic nature as well, thus developing the female character in broad, beautiful, and harmonious proportions. Her education should be such as to fit her for the duties of her appropriate sphere. She may have an important mission to accomplish in the more public or literary arena, but she wields a far greater power and influence in the social and domestic relations of life, which is undoubtedly her appropriate sphere of action.

"It will be the constant aim of the principal to develop all those powers of mind and character which will fit her to move with dignity, grace, and effect in the various relations of life. While the solid branches of an education will always be made a principal object, those of a more ornamental character, such as music, painting, drawing, etc., will also receive special attention. The cultivation of correct taste and good manners will always be insisted upon as an important element in female education. These attainments, with the grace of Christian piety, form the crowning virtues of the female character. The course of studies is broad and liberal, such as to meet all the demands of a good education.

"The instructions will be thorough, scientific, and practical. The very best facilities and advantages for gaining a first-class education will thus be afforded those availing themselves of its provisions."

In accordance with this design and purpose the institution was opened, and the work of education commenced and carried forward under most favorable auspices. All the departments of instruction were filled with able and competent teachers, which at once gave character to the institution, and was a means of attracting pupils. From the beginning the school enjoyed a respectable patronage, and the pupils have always come from the more substantial class of our citizens. It has grown in favor and in confidence with the pupils and people gradually until it has attained to the character and reputation of a first-class school. While many of the older schools in the country were compelled, on account of the pressure of hard times, to suspend their exercises temporarily, or to close entirely, Greensburg Seminary maintained itself successfully beyond the expectation of its most sanguine friends. It is no more a doubtful experiment but an accomplished fact,—a successful enterprise, and ranks among the best schools of the land. The annual examinations of the various classes, the elegant entertainments by the young ladies in the department of music, the splendid exhibitions of the art department, and especially the creditable exercises of the annual commencement, are the best evidence of the character and efficiency of the work accomplished for the cause of higher education by this young but vigorous institution. It assuredly is a matter of great gratification to the principal and friends of the institution to see so much evidence of the good work accomplished, and to know that their efforts in behalf of the cause of female education have been, at least to some extent, appreciated by the public. It is, therefore, hoped that the seminary will continue to receive the patronage and support its merits so justly deserve, and that its future will be as successful as its past history. Young ladies completing the prescribed course of study and passing the final examinations will be awarded diplomas by the authorities of the institution.

It will be perceived from the foregoing sketch that Greensburg Seminary is not merely an ordinary select or high school, but an institution of a high grade, in which young ladies may acquire all the branches of a polite and liberal education.

The school was originally established as a female seminary exclusively, and as such was carried forward successfully for four years. To meet the want of a good school for young men, it was then thought best to open a male department in connection with the seminary by so changing its original design as also to extend its privileges and advantages to young men. This opened the institution to a wider sphere of usefulness and more extended operations. Accordingly, suitable departments of instruction were provided for both sexes.

It was, however, not intended by this change to interfere with the seminary course proper for young ladies, but so to enlarge and arrange the curriculum of study as to allow also of a course for young men. While the primary object of the institution, the education of young ladies, will thus be reached, the advantages of a higher collegiate education will also be afforded to young men. These departments constitute two distinct but co-ordinate courses of instruction. The one was not merged into the other by promiscuously mixing the sexes together in the same course of study. While some branches might be pursued with advantage to both in the same recitations, the interests of the higher education of both sexes demand that other branches should be pursued separately, according to the respective wants and requirements of each. Hence distinct courses are maintained for the several departments so as not to interfere with each other.

The object of the male department, as given in the first circular, is to afford young men the advantages of a liberal education. The course of study is broad and comprehensive, including all the branches of a good English education, as well as those of a higher or collegiate course. It corresponds substantially with that of our best colleges, and may be pursued with advantage by those desiring it to the junior year.

The attendance in this department has been good from the beginning. The number of students enrolled for the present term is forty-six. The outlook for the future is encouraging. A great proportion of the students are in the regular course. The study of the languages is a prominent feature of this department, while mathematics and the sciences receive their full measure of attention.

Thus the work of education has been carried forward for the last four years in the interest of both sexes. The general cause of higher education has thus been subserved, and the usefulness of the institution greatly enlarged.

The seminary proper has lost nothing by the change, but the institution has gained much by extending its operations in offering its advantages to young men. The institution is doing a good work not only for Westmoreland County, but for Western Pennsylvania. The number of pupils in attendance in both departments is about one hundred. While the majority are from Westmoreland, there are some from five or six adjacent counties. The institution is now in the eighth year of its history. It has had its trials to contend with, such as are incident to all enterprises of the kind, especially during the hard times we have lately passed through. These have all been overcome, and the future of the institution is looming up with brightest visions of prosperity. The expenses of the institution have necessarily been great, but by economy and proper management these have been met, and the institution saved from financial embarrassment. The institution to-day stands on good footing, and enjoys the confidence and patronage of the public, and promises to be a blessing to future generations.

It speaks well for the institution that three members of the faculty as it was originally constituted are still of membership, and are the most active of its professors.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church is that body of Christian believers who hold the doctrines of the gospel as restored to the church and taught by the great reformer, Martin Luther, and as contained in the Augsburg Confession, which was written by Philip Melancthon, and read and published before Charles V., at the Diet of Augsburg, on the 25th of June, 1530.

This Confession has passed into the literature of the Christian world, has been translated into almost every modern language, and now is confessed by more than forty millions of believers. The Lutheran Church in the United States dates back to the colonial times. Confessors of this faith came to this country from Holland in 1626, one hundred and fifty years before the Declaration of Independence, and Lutheran emigrants came from Sweden in 1636, and German emigrants came to this country early in the eighteenth century. At this present time the Lutheran Church in the United States numbers one million communicants, with a population of at least three millions.

The history of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in our county reaches back over one hundred years, but its early beginnings are difficult to trace, as only very imperfect records of those early times have been preserved.

Its origin here is like the course of a mountain stream, that winds its way unseen amid woods and forests till it comes into the open country. Lutheran families came from eastern counties and from their fatherland to this part of our State before Westmoreland County was erected. The Detars, the Rughs, the Millers, the Gangawares, the Harrolds, the Altmans, and Longs settled in Hempfield township between 1762 and 1770. There were also settlements of Lutheran families in several other localities soon after the county was formed, namely, Brush Creek, Manor, Kintigs, Ridge, Brandts; and the history of the Lutheran Church runs parallel with the history of the county itself.

The meagre and imperfect records of those early times render it very difficult to give a satisfactory account of the Lutheran Church, and make it impossible to trace the origin and progress of those old congregations with minuteness and accuracy.

We know that congregations existed; we know, too, that they were early founded, and we conclude from the best information that we can gain that where members of the Lutheran Church (and other churches) settled in sufficient numbers in the same vicinity they soon associated themselves together into a religious assembly and engaged in Christian worship, and by common consent constituted themselves into a Christian Church, without a formal organization by passing resolutions or the adoption of a written constitution; for in many of these congregations we can find neither written constitutions, nor records of the organization and official acts of the congregation for the early years of their history.

At first they met at private houses, and in the absence of regularly ordained ministers the services were not unfrequently conducted by laymen, especially by schoolmasters who acted as evangelists. These services consisted of reading the Scriptures, singing and prayer, reading a sermon, or making some suitable remarks.

Baptisms were often performed by these evangelists. In the congregations at Harrold's and Brush Creek, in Hempfield township, which were commenced quite early, baptisms were performed and religious services conducted by these schoolmasters for a number of years.

At Harrold's (Zion's Church) a congregation was gathered as early as 1771, and there is a record of baptisms by such an evangelist as we have spoken of above. Balthazer Meyer, a schoolmaster, conducted services and baptized children from 1772 till 1782, during which time this congregation was without a regular settled pastor.

In the Brush Creek congregation, which commenced, perhaps, a few years later than Harrold's, similar services were conducted by these evangelists until a permanent pastor was secured.

The first Lutheran minister who was settled in this county was Rev. A. Ulrich Lütje.¹ He was a German by birth and education, who came to the Harrold's Church about the year 1782, just one hundred years ago. He served the Zion's Church at Harrold's about ten years, which he more fully organized, and finished the first church, which was built of logs with floor of puncheon, rough benches instead of pews, and very primitive in all its arrangements.

He secured for Harrold's Church a tract of land by patent as a glebe, which the Lutheran and Reformed congregations now hold in common, on which there is a cemetery, or "God's acre," and a church which was built in 1829. The farm of seventy acres of land is under the control of the trustees of the two congregations. Rev. Lütje also ministered to the people at Brush Creek and several other points, but as only few records of his work have been preserved we cannot speak of it with minuteness.

¹ Pronounced "Loot-ye."

In 1791, Rev. John M. Steck, a native of Germany, came to Westmoreland County from the eastern part of our State, and settled in or near Greensburg. He carried on the work that had been commenced by his predecessor with energy and success, for he was then in the prime of life. He was thirty-five years of age when he came to Westmoreland County, and labored here for thirty-eight years. He died the 14th of July, 1830, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and after a long and successful ministry. His mantle fell upon his son, Rev. Michael J. Steck, who was so well and favorably known in this county, and was successor to his father in the Greensburg charge.

Rev. John M. Steck was really the patriarch of the Lutheran Church in this county, for he organized most of the old congregations and laid the foundations for others organized later, and was the only settled Lutheran minister here for twenty-five years. When he located at Greensburg he found two congregations that had been organized by his predecessors, namely, Harrold's and Brush Creek. A few years after his arrival he organized the first German congregation of Greensburg. Early in the present century (1809) Manor Church was organized; also St. James' and Hankey's a little later, in the north of the county; also St. John's (Kintig), Swope's, Ridge, and Youngstown, south and east of Greensburg. These congregations and a number of stations constituted Father Steck's charge during the many years of his ministry. He served all these congregations and ministered to the spiritual wants of these people as far as possible for many long and weary years. Occasionally he received a little aid from other ministers and theological students. His son, Michael J., rendered some assistance for a short time before he accepted a call to Lancaster in 1817.

Rev. Jonas Mechling also rendered him some assistance whilst yet a theological student, and after his licensing, in 1820, became his co-worker in this large field. He took charge of the St. James and Hankey's Churches in the north of the county, and of the Forks and West Newton and Barren Run in the western part, and Donegal and Brandt's in the southern, and the rest of the county constituted the Greensburg charge during the remaining part of Father Steck's ministry; but the principal congregations of this important charge were the First German Church at Greensburg, Harrold's, Brush Creek, and Manor. A brief notice of these will not be out of place here, inasmuch as they exerted an important influence on other churches, and their history gives us the history of the church in general.

The first German Lutheran congregation of Greensburg was commenced soon after Rev. J. M. Steck settled in this county. Baptisms are recorded in 1792, but there is no record of communion till several years later. No precise date can be fixed when this congregation was formally organized, and we believe that it grew gradually into the stature of a Christian congregation without a formal organization, like Harrold's and Brush Creek. In the latter end of the last century a log church was erected, which was built after the style of the log church at Harrold's, and corresponded with it in all its appointments. This church stood until the present one was built, commenced in 1815 and completed in 1819.

This congregation has now a history of ninety years, has had a wide field of usefulness, and has no doubt exerted an important influence on other congregations. It now numbers over four hundred members, and Zion's (English) congregation, that went out from it in 1848 on the ground of language, numbers three hundred (for at that time the services in the parent church were all conducted in the German language).

Brush Creek congregation, which was founded before the one at Greensburg, also had a log church built after the same plan, and had the same kind of furniture as the Harrold's Church, which was replaced by a new brick church in 1820, and which is still in good condition.

The Manor congregation, which was founded in 1809, completed the present church in 1815.

These four congregations were associated during the long pastorates of Revs. J. M. Steck, Michael J., his son, and Jonas Mechling, covering a period of seventy-five years.

Father J. M. Steck served them from the time of their organization into a charge till his death, in 1830, and Rev. M. J. Steck became his father's successor, and continued to be pastor of this charge till his death, in 1848, and then Rev. Jonas Mechling became pastor in 1848, and continued to work in this field till the Master called him to his rest, in 1868.

In Father Steck's time the Greensburg charge had control of the whole county, and he was bishop of Westmoreland County and adjacent parts, and during the ministry of Rev. M. J. Steck, St. James, Hankey's, Seanor's, and other points were connected with this charge, but during the ministry of Rev. Jonas Mechling the charge consisted of these four congregations.

Since his death the charge has again been divided. Now Greensburg and Harrold's Churches are under one pastor; Brush Creek and Manor are joined to Adamsburg and Salem respectively.

The pastors who have served this charge under its present arrangement are Revs. G. A. Brenger and Enoch Smith, and the present pastor is Rev. J. C. Kuntzman.

Brush Creek has been served by Rev. J. S. Fink, and Manor by Revs. Brenger, Bauman, Smith, Ulery, and Roth.

The history of the Greensburg charge gives us a comprehensive view of the history of the Lutheran Church in the county, and its growth and development is an index of the general development of the church. At the beginning of this century there was only one charge in the whole county. In 1820 the first division was made, when Rev. Jonas Mechling took charge of the remote congregations that had been hitherto served by Father Steck, and thus became his co-worker.

In 1841, when Rev. Jacob Zimmerman took charge of several churches in the northern part of the county, a still further division was made of the field. He served the following congregations in Westmoreland, namely, Klingensmith's Church (near Leechburg), Hill's, and Hankey's, in Franklin township. The last two he served from 1843 till 1849, and he served the first till he was compelled to quit the active duties of the ministry on account of his failing health.

In 1847, Rev. W. S. Emery was called to West Newton and Seanor's charge, formed out of part of Rev. J. Mechling's and Rev. M. J. Steck's charge. He labored in this field with acceptance and success till 1859, when he was called to Indiana, Pa.

In the autumn of 1847, Rev. J. Ruge came to Greensburg with a view of forming an English congregation, and in January, 1848, a small English organization was founded of members belonging principally to the German Church, and soon after a similar organization was founded at Adamsburg of members from the Brush Creek congregation, and these two congregations constituted the Greensburg and Adamsburg charge, to which Rev. Michael Eyster was called in the autumn of 1848, and in which he continued to labor with remarkable success till death summoned him from his toils on earth to his reward in heaven.

Thus we see that the history of the Lutheran Church in Westmoreland County records considerable growth since its beginning. Instead of a few feeble congregations they have a goodly number of large ones, and instead of one or two lonely pastors they have a whole conference. Then also it must be borne in mind that many members have removed to adjoining counties and neighboring States, where they have been instrumental in forming and strengthening new and other congregations. But gratifying as the growth and development of this church is, it would have been much greater but for two things, the lack of efficient English ministers and the reluctance on the part of the fathers of the Lutheran Church to give up the German language.

The present condition of the church may be briefly stated as follows:

There are now twelve pastoral charges in this county, and there ought, in the opinion of their clergy, to be three or four more, but it is not considered wise to form new charges when pastors cannot be found for some that have been formed.

1. The Greensburg charge, consisting now of the First German congregation of Greensburg and Harold's Church, Hempfield township. Rev. J. C. Kuntzman, pastor.

2. Zion's Lutheran Church, Greensburg. Rev. W. T. Ulery, pastor.

3. Mount Pleasant charge, consisting of Mount Pleasant congregation, St. John's, Swope's, and Ridge's. Rev. S. L. Harkey, pastor.

4. Donegal charge, consisting of Donegal congregation, Franklin, Donegal township, and Bethel, in Cook township. Rev. D. Earhart, pastor.

5. Ligonier, consisting of Ligonier congregation, Latrobe, Youngstown, and Derry. Rev. H. L. McMurry, pastor.

6. Saltsburg charge, consisting of St. James', Fennelton, and Saltsburg. Rev. R. M. Zimmerman, pastor.

7. Delmont charge, consisting of Salem and Manor Churches. Rev. J. D. Roth, pastor.

8. Brush Creek and Adamsburg charge, consisting of Brush Creek, Adamsburg, and Irwin congregations. Rev. G. E. Lund, pastor.

9. West Newton charge, consisting of West Newton, Barren Run or Hoffman's charge. Vacant. Rev. A. G. Wenzel, stated supply.

10. Seanor's and Stanton. Vacant.

11. Hankey's and Brinton. Vacant.

12. Swedish pastorate, Irwin and Braddock's. Vacant.

13. Hill's Church. Rev. A. D. Potts, pastor.

There are twenty-six Lutheran congregations and three thousand eight hundred communicants in this county, with a Lutheran population of about eight thousand.

MINISTERS OF THE EARLY LUTHERAN CHURCH.

REV. MICHAEL J. STECK, one of the founders of the Pittsburgh Synod and its first president, was the son of Rev. John M. Steck, for many years pastor of the Lutheran Churches of Greensburg and vicinity. He was born in Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., Pa., on the 1st of May, 1793. He early desired to be a preacher in the church of his baptism, and his father availed himself of every suitable advantage to give him a liberal education. After finishing his preliminary education at the old academy at Greensburg he commenced the study of theology under his father's supervision; but inasmuch as the pastoral duties of his father left him but little time for instructing his pupil, he sent him to the Rev. Jacob Scharle, pastor of the German Lutheran Church at Pittsburgh, under whose care he pursued his theological studies with great diligence and success. In June, 1816, he was licensed by the Synod of Pennsylvania, which held its sessions at Philadelphia. After the meeting of Synod he returned to Greensburg and became an assistant to his father. In this capacity he labored for a short time, preaching mainly to the remote congregations of his father's large field.

In December, 1816, he received and accepted a call to Lancaster, Ohio, then in the backwoods. He served congregations in the town of Lancaster and vicinity for twelve years with a degree of acceptance and success that is seldom equaled. At his father's earnest request he returned to Greensburg in 1828, to assist him in his declining years in the onerous duties of his large and promising charge.

In 1830, when his father, the Rev. John M. Steck, died, his son became his successor. In that field he labored till his death in 1848.

It is difficult for one at this day to conceive how great were the toils connected with his ministry. His vast field, and his mode of travel over it to points thirty miles distant from his home, and the number of his congregations and preaching-stations would sufficiently indicate the nature of some of those toils.

He served regularly eleven congregations, besides preaching at a number of stations. His journal for nineteen years shows a succession of pastoral duties in his numerous congregations scarcely credible to one unacquainted with his active ministry. He often preached four times in one day, traveling in the mean time many miles. He not unfrequently incurred no little danger in filling some of his distant appointments. It has been estimated that during his ministry of thirty-two years he preached eight thousand sermons, baptized five thousand children, and received two thousand persons into the communion of the church by the solemn rite of confirmation.

From his social and pastoral intercourse with so many people, and from his agreeable and gentle manner, his name and character were perhaps more widely and more favorably known than those of any other minister of his day in this county. To many of his parishioners he was the ideal of a Christian minister. His ministerial work is even yet, by the older members of his communion, spoken of with marked affection and approbation.

It has been observed that in some of the congregations in which he labored he lived his ministry over again in the eyes of some of his devoted followers. Thus when one of his successors therein would say or do something that pleased such well, they would give it their most hearty sanction by saying: "So hat es der Fader Steck gemacht."

He was eminently practical, and saw clearly what were the true interests of his church. He labored with untiring zeal for the introduction of the English language into the services of the church, and did much towards the organization of the English congregations in Greensburg and vicinity. The qualifications of a good preacher and successful pastor he united in a more than ordinary or common degree. His appearance in the pulpit was prepossessing, his enunciation was distinct, his voice melodious, his manner natural, earnest, and impressive, his style simple and practical, his matter evangelical, and his appeals to the sinner affectionate and earnest. Pride and self-esteem were far removed from him. As a lesson to young men who might be disposed to be elated with apparent success, he often related an incident which, he said, cured him of all vanity as to the effect or results of his preaching. On a certain occasion, before his licensure, he was sent out by his instructor to attend a funeral. The services were to be held at the house of the deceased. The young novice was very timid, and during most of the service kept his eyes fixed on the floor. Finally, however, venturing to raise them, he observed an old man with whom he was well acquainted, who, sitting in one corner of the room, was moved to tears. Thinking that his remarks had made such an impression he took courage afresh, and finished his discourse with increasing energy. After the services were closed the old man came to him and said, "O Mike, ich bin doch so froh dass du glücklich fertig worde bist, ich war doch so lang du thätst stecke bleibe, ich hat müste heule."¹

He held the office of president of the Pittsburgh Synod for five successive years.

One of his biographers, speaking of his ministerial duties, says, "Though almost constantly overwhelmed with labor, yet he never neglected a single call. He was always ready to go to his distant congregations, or convey the peace of the gospel to the abodes of disease and poverty. By day and by night, even when oppressed by the infirmities of age, or weighed down by sickness, or worn out by constant mental and physical exertion, he would forsake the comforts of home and fly to the post of duty, preaching the gospel, instructing the young, and administering the consolations of religion to the sick and dying, burying the dead, and comforting the widow and fatherless in their afflictions. Venerable man! No wonder that the widow's heart leaped for joy, and the sorrowful felt a sweet relief, and the dying saint revived again as thy feet entered the abode of suffering. Thy tender sympathy was too real not to shed its balm on the wounded heart, and the consolations of thy lips were as life to the departing soul."

His last sermon was a funeral sermon. His own death was commemorated by a discourse delivered by Rev. W. A. Passavant, from the text, "And devout men carried Stephen to his burial and made great lamentation over him."

In the cemetery of the German Lutheran Church at Greensburg, on a plain simple stone, is the following inscription:

"Here sleeps in Jesus the body of the Rev. Michael J. Steck, for nineteen years the faithful Pastor of the Evangelical Lutheran Churches of Greensburg and vicinity. Born May 1, 1793, died Sept. 1, 1848, aged 55 years and 4 months. He was a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, and much people were added unto the Lord."

Rev. M. J. Steck was the father of eleven children.

¹ Literally—"O Mike, I am so very glad that you were lucky in getting through, for for a long time I thought you would stick, and I couldn't help but cry."

Some of his descendants reside in Westmoreland County, and are worthy progeny of so noble a father.

REV. JONAS MECHLING was born in Hempfield township, Westmoreland County, on the 14th of August, 1798, and died on the 2d of April, 1868, in the seventieth year of his age, and in the forty-eighth year of his ministry, dating from the time of his licensure.

At a very early age he was inclined to the office of the ministry, and began his preparatory studies as soon as opportunity was afforded him. After his preliminary studies were completed he pursued the study of theology, under the care of Rev. Pastor Schnee, of Pittsburgh, and finished his theological course under the care of Rev. Father Steck, of Greensburg.

After having passed a creditable and successful examination, he was licensed on the 19th of September, 1820, by the District Synod of Ohio. After his licensure he immediately became a co-worker with Father Steck, whose field had now become very large and imperatively demanded additional laborers. He was a missionary rather than a settled pastor, for he served congregations and preached at points which were quite remote from each other. He took charge of St. James' and Hankey's, in the northern part of the county, Barren Run and Forks Church in the western part, Kindig's and Swope's in the central part, and Donegal's and Brandt's in the southern part of the county. At these different points so distant from each other he labored for several years with fidelity and success.

In 1827 he was relieved of the congregations in Bell and Franklin townships, and took charge of the churches at the Ridge and Youngstown. He served these congregations till the autumn of 1848, when he became pastor of the Greensburg charge. He now resigned the churches in Ligonier Valley, and as soon as a suitable pastor could be found he gave up the churches west of the Ridge.

His whole ministerial life was spent in Westmoreland County, serving a large number of congregations in different sections of the county and remote from each other, but the last twenty years of his life were devoted to the Greensburg charge, including the First German Church, Greensburg, Harrold's, Brush Creek, and Manor.

Rev. Jonas Mechling was well and favorably known in this county, and as a minister has exerted an important influence on the Lutheran Church. Many of those to whom he ministered in holy things kindly remember him and bless his memory for his self-denial and earnest fidelity on their behalf. His simplicity of manners, his amiable disposition, and his even temper, together with his social culture and Christian character, won him many friends, and has embalmed his name in the hearts of those who knew him well.

His fidelity to his Master, and his zeal and earnestness in the performance of his official duties, may be gleaned in some measure from a brief abstract of his ministerial acts. His official record, kept with the greatest care, furnishes sufficient evidence of his zeal for God and his success in the work of the church. During the forty-eight years of his ministry he preached six thousand three hundred and twenty-seven sermons, not including many hundreds of funeral sermons. He baptized six thousand two hundred and eighty-six persons, confirmed two thousand and thirty-nine, and performed eight hundred and ninety marriages.

Devoted to his work in the church, he was also faithful to his family and society. He was an affectionate husband, a kind father, a worthy and good citizen. Joined to a woman of true Christian virtue and grace of spirit, and devoted to her by the tenderest affections, he was happy in his family relations. His wife, a woman of most amiable disposition and Christian character, and five children, four sons and one daughter, survive him, and now that he has been gathered to his fathers his name and memory is held in high esteem by his family and friends, and by all who knew him when he was among them.

THE PITTSBURGH SYNOD.—The Rev. Mr. Ulery, pastor of the English Lutheran congregation at Greensburg, collected some very pleasing memoirs of the early founders and ministers in the Pittsburgh Synod, and in a discourse to his congregation gave his labors. This discourse dwells at length on the life and services of fourteen ministers who had been members of the Synod, but who were then dead. From the labors of Mr. Ulery we give the following sketches:

REV. MICHAEL EYSTER was born in York County, Pa., 16th May, 1814, and died 11th August, 1853, in the fortieth year of his age. At the age of thirteen he was sent from his father's farm to the town of York to stand as a clerk in a store. While engaged in this occupation he resolved to devote himself to the gospel ministry. He entered Marshall College, then located at York, and pursued his studies there until the college was removed to Gettysburg, whence he also followed it, and where he finished his literary and theological course. In the fall of 1838 he was licensed to preach by the Western Pennsylvania Synod. He soon after accepted a call from the Williamsburg pastorate, in Huntingdon County, Pa. Here he labored for eight years. In 1846 he removed to Greencastle, Franklin Co., Pa., where he discharged the duties of his calling with the same fidelity which had characterized his former pastorate. Here his wife died, and this led to his removal. In 1849 he received a call from the churches at Greensburg, Adamsburg, and Salem Cross-Roads, this county. In the fall of 1849 he removed to Greensburg, and continued his labors in the Greensburg pastorate, as the successor of Rev. M. J. Steck, until his death in 1853. The bodies of these two pastors lie side by side in the German burying-ground.

His character has been portrayed in the words as we quote them: "He was a man of decided views and deep Christian experience. His faith was as simple as that of a child, and his piety as sincere as his faith was simple. He was a man of uncommon purity of character and uprightness of purpose. He possessed a kind, genial, catholic spirit, but he was not afraid to avow his opinions because they might conflict with those of his fellow-men. It mattered not to him who were with him or who were against him; it was enough to know he was right, and with this conviction he was prepared to stand up against the world. As a preacher he was solid, clear, fluent, logical, and convincing. Both his manner and matter were original. He spoke often with much pathos and affection, and had great power over his audience. The effect he left was generally abiding. Few men could speak so fluently, and yet so profoundly, on any subject that might be presented."

REV. HERMAN MANTZ was born in Magdeburg, Prussia, Aug. 11, 1821. In his twenty-sixth year he was sent by Father Gosner, of Berlin, as a candidate for the ministry. Soon after his arrival he spent several years at Zellenople, where he spent some time in studying English and theology under the direction of Rev. Gottlieb Bassler. In May, 1848, he was licensed by the Pittsburgh Synod, and accepted a call from the German churches at Prospect, St. John's, and Petersburg. Died Dec. 15, 1853.

REV. SAMUEL B. LAWSON was born on the 27th of August, 1808, and died on the 7th of February, 1864, in his fifty-seventh year. After finishing his theological course he was licensed in 1844 by the Allegheny Synod, and was regularly ordained by the same body in 1846. He labored for some time in Somerset County in connection with that Synod. In 1853 he removed to Fryburg, Clarion Co., and took charge of congregations in the Pittsburgh Synod. In 1859 he removed to West Newton, Westmoreland Co., and continued to labor there until his death.

REV. FREDERICK RUTHRAUFF, son of Rev. John Ruthrauff, of Greencastle, Pa., was born on the 25th of October, 1796. In 1820 he commenced the study of theology under the care of Dr. J. G. Lochman. In 1822 he was licensed by the Maryland and Virginia Synod to preach. His first charge was at Williamsport, Pa. He then preached successively at Elizabeth, Lancaster Co., Pa., at Manchester, Md., and at Loysville, Centreville, Milton, and Worthington. To the last place he removed in 1858, and thus became a member of the Pittsburgh Synod. He died Sept. 18, 1859, in his sixty-third year.

REV. JOHN A. DELO was born in Clarion County, Pa., April 16, 1826, and died Nov. 1, 1864, in his thirty-ninth year. He studied for the ministry under the oversight of Rev. S. D. Wilt, of that county, and in 1849 was licensed by the Allegheny Synod. He, however, accepted a call in 1860 from the Apollo charge, Armstrong County. He filled a chaplaincy in the Federal army during the war, and afterwards removed to North Washington, where he died.

REV. DANIEL GARVER was born in Washington County, Md., Jan. 9, 1830; was educated at the Pennsylvania College; licensed June, 1852, by the Synod of Pennsylvania. From his graduation until 1858 he had occupied a professor's chair, had been engaged in missionary labor in the West, and had passed one year in Europe. In 1859 was pastor of the congregation at Canton, Ohio. In 1863 was called by the congregation at Greensburg, for whom he labored until his death, Sept. 30, 1865, in the thirty-fifth year of his age and the fourteenth of his ministry.

REV. SAMUEL D. WITT became a member of the Synod in 1835, and remained in it until his death at Circleville, Ohio, Aug. 27, 1851, in his thirty-eighth year.

REV. GOTTLIEB BASSLER was born in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, Dec. 10, 1813, but came to America with his parents when quite young. They settled in Butler County, Pa. When fourteen years of age he walked in his bare feet to Greensburg to learn the printing trade with Jacob Steck. He afterwards entered Pennsylvania College, was graduated in 1840 with honor, and the same year commenced his studies at the seminary; licensed in 1842. In the spring of 1845 he took a prominent part in the organization of the Pittsburgh Synod, became principal of the academy then established by the Synod. He also labored in the churches in Butler County, and established new congregations. In 1852 he became associated with Rev. Passavant in the orphans' work, and continued in that department until his death in 1868, October 3d, in his fifty-fifth year.

REV. JOHN RUGAN was born in Philadelphia, on the 27th day of January, 1817. He spent a portion of his youth in that city, and after having received a preparatory education he entered Pennsylvania College, situated at Gettysburg, in this State, where he graduated in the fall of 1843. After his graduation he spent two years in the theological seminary at Hartwick, N. Y., in the study of theology, and in the year 1845 he was licensed by the ministerium of the State of New York, which met at Albany. After his licensure he received a call to the pastorate at Sandy Lake, near Troy, where he remained, performing all the duties pertaining to the pastoral office, for about two years, until the autumn of 1847, at which time he was called to become co-pastor with Rev. Michael J. Steck, at Greensburg. He also took charge of St. James' Church, situated in the northern part of the county. In this field he labored with great success. In January, 1848, he organized Zion's Evangelical Lutheran congregation at Greensburg with forty members, and the following spring he organized Trinity Evangelical Lutheran congregation at Adamsburg, which he served as pastor till the following autumn. After resigning Greensburg and Adams-burg congregations he devoted his time to St. James' and Salem for several years. Then he removed to Somerset, Ohio. He labored a number of years in Ohio with good success. His last field of labor was Vandalia, Ill., where he built up a flourishing congregation, and in this field he labored until his death.

Besides these, continued the manuscript from which we have derived these brief memorials, there were four other clergymen who had been numbered with the Pittsburgh Synod at that time whose names and memories are even yet dear to the members of their church. These were Revs. John Esensee, Charles H. Hersh, Adam Long, and Christian D. Ulery.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

We regret that we have not been able to give a more detailed history of the United Presbyterian Church of Western Pennsylvania and of Westmoreland than it is possible for us to give here. We are, however, not in blame, for the documentary records which we have looked over contain little of interest or information to us. The reader must, for further information, turn to the history of the different congregations in the local department of this work. But a church which has produced such an able pioneer ministry, and shaped the morals of such a large number of our people, should lose no time in collecting and arranging their early congregational and ecclesiastical history, that it may be preserved.

The only Presbytery of this church in Pennsylvania down to 1776 was the "Associate Presbytery of Pennsylvania," and the earliest preserved record of its proceedings which we can find is dated "Oxford, June 27, 1762." But at a meeting on May 20, 1776, the Presbytery resolved to divide into two, the one to be called the Associate Presbytery of Pennsylvania, consisting of the following ministers: Revs. James Proudfoot, Matthew Henderson, William Marshall, John Rodgers, John Smith, James Clarkson, James Martin, and John Murray; the other to be called the Associate Presbytery of New York, consisting of Revs. John Mason, Robert Anan, Thomas Clark, William Logan, and Andrew Patton.

From the original manuscript minutes of the Presbytery to which this region of Pennsylvania belonged, it is seen that Mr. Proudfoot supplied Westmoreland in the fall of 1775. There is also this entry: "At Oxford, Nov. 4, 1775. . . . Petition received and read from Fairfield, in Westmoreland County, craving supply and ordination of elders, together with the dispensation of Baptism and the Lord's Supper." There were many other petitions of a similar nature, and upon their consideration the Presbytery "agreed that Mr. Murray and Potter supply New York Province, Mr. Logan at Fort Pitt, and the vacancies in Cumberland and Northumberland Counties be supplied with an actual minister. Appointed Messrs. Henderson, Rodgers, and Smith as a committee to draw up a scheme of appointments to be laid before next side-runt." Mr. Logan was announced for Fairfield in December, and for the Yough on January 6th following.

The following also appears: "At Mr. Miller's house, May 8, 1777, 9 o'clock A.M., at which time and place the Presbytery being met and constituted, etc., a motion was made and supported that the Presbytery now reconsider the clauses in the petitions from Westmoreland and Northumberland respecting a minister's settlement among them; accordingly the commissioner from Northumberland presented a petition for a moderation, which was read. A committee was appointed to converse with Mr. Patton, which having done this reported that his present inclinations rather lay towards the people in Tobit and Buffalo townships, for which reason the Presbytery did and hereby do grant to these people in said places the moderation of a Call, and also to the people in Westmoreland, the moderation in Northumberland to be held on the 9th of September (by Mr. Logan), and at Chartiers on the 15th of said month by Mr. Proudfoot."

This extract from the "Minutes of Proceedings of the Second Associate Reformed Presbytery of Pennsylvania" gives the account of the formal division of the Presbytery:

"YOUGH MEETING-HOUSE, JUNE 24, 1793.

"After a sermon preached by Mr. Adam Rankin from Eph. ii. 19, 'Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners,' etc., the Second Associate Reformed Presbytery of Pennsylvania met and constituted with prayer by the moderator, by virtue of a resolution of the Associate Reformed Synod, which is as follows: June 3, 1793, Resolved, That the Presbytery of Pennsylvania be divided into two by the names of the First and Second Associate Reformed Presbytery of Pennsylvania, the Second to consist of Mr. Jamison, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Warwick, and Mr. Rankin, with their elders, and that they meet and constitute, the senior minister preaching and presiding, at such time and place as they will find most convenient.

"ROBERT ANNAN,

Moderator of Synod.

"Present, Messrs. Rankin, Henderson, and Warwick, ministers; Messrs. Richard Steel, James Wilson, and Jeremiah Pearce, ruling elders. Appointed Mr. Henderson clerk pro tempore. . . ."

The next meeting was held at Laurel Hill Meeting-House 12th August, 1793, Jamison, Henderson, and Warwick, ministers, and James Wilson and James Findley, elders, present. "Received and read a call, including a petition, for the Rev. John Jamison from the united congregations of Brush Creek, Hannah's Town, and Connemaugh. Heard a verbal petition from Short Creek, Three Ridges, and Buffalo, by Messrs. Stuart and Sharp, praying for a supply of preaching. . . Presented the call to Mr. Jamison, which he accepted. Appointed the sacrament of the Supper at Loyal-Hanning the last Sabbath of this month, Mr. Jamison to preside and Mr. Henderson to assist.

¹ The denominational name, "United Presbyterian," for this church in North America dates from 1858, when the Associate Presbyterian (from 1754) and the Associate Reformed (from 1782) were united under that name.

“Resolved, That Mr. Jamison’s edict be served at Loyal-Hanning the Monday after by Mr. Henderson.

“Appointed the sacrament of the Supper at Brush Creek the second Sabbath of October. Mr. Jamison’s installment the Friday preceding; Mr. Warwick to preside and Mr. Henderson to assist.

“Appointed Mr. Henderson to Three Ridges the third Sabbath of September. Adjourned to meet at Loyal-Hanning the 26th inst.”

At next session “heard a verbal petition from Ligonier Valley by Robert Henwell (?) for a supply of preaching,” but no action was taken upon it at that sitting.

The next session of Presbytery was held at Brush Creek Meeting-House, Oct. 11 and 14, 1793.

Brush Creek Church, afterwards Bethel, was the third in the county, organized 1796-97. Its first pastor was Rev. Matthew Henderson. Additional information on this church and its early history within the county will be found in the local department of this work, and especially in the history of the Fairfield Church, Fairfield township.

METHODIST.

The first Methodist society in the United States was formed in New York in 1766, by some Irish emigrants. The history of the church from that day to this in the United States is one of the marvels of modern times. From the peculiar organization of its clerical body it was pre-eminently the proselyting church of the latter day. Its itinerant preachers followed the people in all directions, and even to the very utmost bounds of civilization. The doctrine which they preached was calculated to arouse the slumbering passions of a people who had gotten at their mother’s knee the first ideas of the Christian doctrines of future punishment and future felicity.

Of Methodism we see more and know less than of any other religious denomination. The growth of this church organization has been regarded by all contemplative philosophers as one of the marvels of later times. The most philosophical of modern historians—himself a statesman of enlarged and just views, and a man not affined to the founders or the cause of Methodism—has said that no man since the time of Cardinal Richelieu has been the equal of John Wesley as an organizer of latent forces. But when one familiar with the status of the Methodist Church to-day observes that it is not much from a century since John Whitefield preached in the shade STATISTICS from the Minutes of the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Churches, 1881. These churches are all within the Westmoreland Presbytery.

Ministers and Correspondents for Vacancies.	Post-Office and State.	Presbytery.	Communicants.	Increase.			Baptism.		Sabbath-Schools.
				Profession.	Certificate.	Decrease.	Infant.	Adult.	Months Open.	Officers and Teachers.	Number of Scholars.
Oliver Katz.....	Saltsburg.	Saltsburg, 1/3.....	58	2	3	12	4	40
“	“	N. Alexandria, 1/3.....	55	3	6	1	8	45
A. I. Young.....	Turtle Creek.	Turtle Creek.....	192	10	4	11	19	1	12	12	125
Wm. R. Stevenson.....	West Newton.	West Newton, 2/3.....	126	5	4	1	6	12	9	80
“	“	Sewickley, 1/3.....	60	3	1	1	3	12	7	60
E. Z. Thomas.....	Negley.	Unity.....	150	13	5	8	15	3	12	20	218
Wm. H. Vincent, S. C.....	Ligonier.	Fairfield (2).....	162	6	4	6	10	1	12	24	160
M. M. Patterson.....	Parnassus.	Puckety, 2/3.....	138	10	20	3	1	12	7	60
“	“	Allegheny, 1/3.....	76	2	8	12	8	7	45
J. N. Dick, D.D.....	Irwin’s Station.	Bethel (Westmoreland).....	115	1	4	4	4	12	6	45
R. B. Taggart.....	Mount Pleasant.	Mount Pleasant, 2/3.....	80	2	4	2	5	12	7	40
“	“	Scottdale, 1/3.....	38	1	8	3	12	4	23
Josiah Stevenson.....	Greensburg.	Greensburg, 1/2.....	51	2	7	1	6	12	8	40
“	“	Latrobe, 1/2.....	85	5	12	7	12	5	40
S. B. McBride.....	Laurel Hill.	Laurel Hill.....	93	4	3	2	1	12	8	65
A. R. Rankin.....	Murrayville.	Murrayville, 1/4.....	77	4	3	4	3	1	12	5	40
“	“	Beulah, 1/4.....	41	5	2	6	5	30
D. M. Thorn.....	Buena Vista.	Buena Vista.....	100	7	3	13	3	12	9
C. B. Hatch.....	Irwin’s Station.	Irwin.....	135	16	15	14	3	4	12	22	130
Correspondents.			Vacancies.
Joseph Ross.....	Youngstown.	Donegal.....	57	3	7	2	2
D. Alter, M.D.....	Parnassus.	Logan’s Ferry.....	63	5	8	4	3	12	3	20
B. L. Calhoun, M.D.....	“	Parnassus.....	22	14	12	3	30
John Shaw.....	Stewart’s Station.	Stewart’s Station.....	131	5	7	6	12	6	50
George W. Kelley.....	Watt’s Mills.	Madison.....	45	31	3	12	6	30
Without Charge.
A. Young, D.D., LL.D., Professor.....	Parnassus.
S. B. Stewart.....	Paulton.
J. A. Scroggs—22.....	Latrobe.
Licentiates, 1.			Students, 0. of the forest-trees to the straggling hearers around him in the eastern portions of the United States, the conclusion is reached without argument.

But from the very nature of the Methodist system is one precluded from writing its local history, especially if that extends over any length of time, for they in early days kept no records in their churches, nor minutes such as were to be preserved and treasured. Their itinerant preachers were, generally speaking, uneducated, if not illiterate, and in this they much prided, for they openly discouraged classical education and the higher grade of colleges, and under the plan of changing their pastors it was seldom that any one pastor remained more than a very few years at one charge. But from the same and other causes may we partially come at the causes of its wonderful numerical advancement. The early church started out with the motto of John Wesley, "My parish is the world," and entered into the world filled with missionary zeal and the hope of success. Laying hold of the common people by adapting itself to their capacity and circumstances, and gathering them together and setting them at work in class-meetings, camp-meetings, revivals, and in all sorts of ways, it has reached out and gathered in a large number of all classes of people. It then preached only Christ, and it cared not when or where or how. So, too, did it give its meeting-houses for any preacher of any Christian Church in which to preach, and it is narrated that the first missionary priests on frequent occasions said mass in their meeting-houses. But nothing could abate the zeal of their early ministers, both clerical and lay. Whatever may be said of the illiteracy of its itinerants it is evident that they were peculiarly adapted to their calling, and that they labored with success. Of wages and hire they got little or nothing. They passed and repassed up and down the whole land and had no abiding-place, for they knew, with the early apostles, that if the earthly house of their tabernacle were dissolved, they had a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

From the days of the earliest settlements west of Laurel Hill the country was not without law, neither was it without the gospel. The Methodist preachers were here the very first year of their church organization; but not so early as the Presbyterians or the Baptists. This whole region into which the Methodist itinerants came was named in their ecclesiastical divisions the Redstone field. In 1784, John Cooper and Solomon Breeze stand in the minutes for Redstone; in 1785, Peter Moriarty, J. Fidler, Wilson Lee; for 1786, John Smith, Robert Ayres, Enoch Matson, elder. They made their entrance at Uniontown, in the immediate neighborhood of which were many Church of England people and a few Methodists. But they had been preceded by Robert Worster, a local preacher of piety and considerable talent.

The growth of this communion here is a subject of wonderment. Many of the earliest settlers of Western Pennsylvania were churchmen, zealously attached to the forms and beliefs of the Episcopal or mother-church of England. But this conservative church did not provide means for the protection and perpetuation of congregational worship. The flocks were left without a shepherd. The Presbyterians would not give them the sacrament, or baptize their children, unless they would subscribe to the Westminster Confession, and promise to bring up their children in that faith; the Baptists would not permit them to commune, except they would renounce their baptism and become immersed. No wonder that clear-sighted old John Wesley, seeing what was to be done, and how it was to be done, made haste "to provide," to use his own words, "for those poor sheep in the wilderness." And so the itinerant heralds, running up and down in every direction, gathered the flocks into new folds, and working with their whole heart and souls gathered bread where others would have gathered stones. They went to and fro watching, and wherever they found an open door there they entered.

The footsteps of these early preachers—Worster, Cooper, and Breeze—were traced a score of years afterwards by an observant man, himself, later on, a missionary farther west,¹ from Uniontown, where the first society was raised. Their labors were followed to the Youghiogheny, near the Broad Ford, from thence down that stream to the Forks, in Westmoreland County, where a large society was early raised of men eminent for worth and piety, most of whom had been churchmen. They were thence traced along the Monongahela into Washington County, through some of the northwestern regions of Virginia, and so on back to Uniontown, whence they started.

In 1787 an annual conference was held at Uniontown in the month of July. Bishop Asbury officiated as a plain Presbyter, in gown and band, assisted by Richard Whatcoat, elder, in the same habit. Michael Lord was ordained, of whom it was said he could repeat the whole of the New Testament off the book and large portions of the Old Testament. The morning service was read as abridged by Wesley. That was the last time that priestly robes and prayer-book were seen on like occasions in those parts.

In 1788 the Redstone field seems to have been divided into four circuits,—Clarksbury, Ohio, Pittsburgh, and Redstone. To this field of labor seven preachers were appointed. Under them and their assistants societies were formed farther north in Westmoreland, and particularly in Ligonier Valley.

The Rev. James Quinn,² in his own words, speaking of his life and labors, says of these societies as they existed in the latter part of the last century,—

¹ "Sketches of the Life and Labors of James Quinn, who was nearly Half a Century a Minister of the Gospel in the M. E. Church." Cincinnati, 1851.

² Quoted supra.

"I now must cross over Laurel Hill and make my way into the head of Ligonier Valley. There was a small society at A. McLean's, from Shippensburg or Carlisle, and another at Enos King's, son of the old local preacher. These, however, at that time were of recent date, and the prospect not flattering. But near old Fort Ligonier was raised a large and flourishing society. Here the father of the venerable Bishop Roberts and his extensive family, although church people, fell into the ranks of Methodism. Ah, old mother missed it in not having a missionary bishop here, and some one to take care of the poor sheep in the wilderness. . . . Here, too, were the Shaws and Fishers, the latter of Quaker origin. Here, also, was the devout Cornelius Riley and his excellent wife, Abigail, father and mother of James and Tobias Riley, of the Baltimore Conference. Little did I think at the time I received them into the church and wrote their names on the class-paper at old Brother John Roberts', brother of the bishop, that I should live and be effective till the lads should become senior ministers in the mother-conference.

"This society suffered much by emigration to the West, as most of the societies in the mountains did; for when the rich lands of the West came into market, the mountaineers made a general rush, as if the bears, panthers, wolves, Indians, rattlesnakes, and fire had all broke loose upon them, and, poor things, many of them lost their religion and their lives in the scuffle.

"There was another good society still farther down the valley, which met at the house of Brother Howell. Here James Talbot was a prominent and useful local preacher, and the father and mother of Brother Stewart, of Cincinnati, with their numerous family, were prominent in the membership. Here we leave the valley, and crossing a mountain or very high hill and passing over Conemaugh River, we arrive at a pretty extensive settlement at Black Lick. Here a handful of corn had been placed in the earth by the pioneers, and a good society sprang up, which met at the house of James Wakefield. This man was a local preacher. I am told he still lives (1843). He taught me some good things, and I loved him.

"We now leave the Black Lick settlement and direct our course west, and on the top of Chestnut Ridge the handful of corn had produced a good society, which met at the house of Father Wakefield, father of James. To his class belonged the venerable Martin Fate, his deeply-pious wife, three or four sons, and as many daughters. A son and grandson of this family became preachers, one local and the other itinerant."

Passing on down southward through Westmoreland, he says, "There was a door opened for preaching on Jacobs Creek, among the Masons and Ragans, and a small society raised, which, however, passed off westward by emigration, leaving scarcely a vestige behind.

"A few miles distant from Ragau's [Reagan's], on the Youghiogheny River, and near the foot of the mountains, they obtained a preaching-place at one Flaugherty's and Hain's, on a farm belonging to Zachariah Connell. Here a society was raised by Jacob Lurtan, and his numerous family attended and became members; and the farm itself became the site of the town of Connellsville, and Connellsville is now the emporium of Methodism in an extensive tract of country."

Such is one view, circumscribed it is true, of early Methodism in Westmoreland. We shall get another view from a different source, chiefly traditional, and still another in the extracts which we make use of, taken from the minute-book of the Greensburg Church records. Wherever these accounts differ, it will be seen they do not differ materially; and, taken together, they well enough agree to present an intelligible view of the early history of the church here.

The first Methodist preaching in the county was in 1785, at "Fell's Settlement," in Rostraver township, some two miles east of the Monongahela River. Here preaching was had by itinerants sent out by the Baltimore Conference. The surrounding region was settled by Scotch-Irish, who worshiped at "Rehoboth" Presbyterian Church, built nine years previous. But the Fell and several other Maryland Methodist families had settled on the rich lands between the Youghiogheny and Monongahela Rivers, and soon the zeal of the pioneer itinerants found them and began their ministerial labors. "Fell's Meeting-House," a log structure, was built in 1785-86, and was the first Methodist Church erected west of the Alleghenies. In it the great Bishop Asbury often preached, and in the second one, afterwards built, the eloquent Bishop Bascom and other distinguished divines of the Methodist Episcopal Church expounded the word of God.

The second Methodist preaching in Westmoreland County was in 1798, not far from Ligonier, at the residence of the Riley family, where was the second preaching appointment for the earliest traveling circuit riders, of whom Rev. Isaac Conway was the first here. The third place of preaching was at Mr. Stuart's, in Fairfield (some of whose descendants reside in Irwin). These two families were perhaps the earliest of the Methodists in all this region. The fourth preaching appointment was near Greensburg, about 1812, in the families of Squire Ross, the Mellons, and McCutchens. The next was at Jacobs Creek and Mount Pleasant, both in 1817. The first three circuit riders at the latter point were Revs. Jacob Dowell, Orville Wilson, and William Barnes. Shortly afterwards preaching was had at Greensburg and on the Big Sewickley,—at the former at the house of Samuel Bushfield, and at the latter at Mr. Slatterbach's dwelling. The appointments were made at Mr. Miller's, on the "Manor." All these were up to 1825, and were included in one charge, and generally by two pastors, who traveled on horseback, preaching every day in the week, and seldom reaching an appointment oftener than once in two weeks. The whole county was then part of one circuit (Connellsville), and was under the Baltimore Conference. Among the first preachers was Rev. Valentine Cook, presiding elder, whose district extended from the "Virginia line" to Erie, Pa. He was born in 1765, in Monroe County, Va., and in 1788 received into the itinerancy, having his first appointment on the Calvert Circuit in Maryland. During 1792 he became engaged in a newspaper controversy, touching the leading principles of Methodism, with Rev. Samuel Porter, D.D., and with Rev. Jamison, a Scotchman, a minister of the Seceders' Church. He became presiding elder, and in 1798 was transferred to Kentucky, where he died in 1820. He was among the first Methodist preachers in the county. Among the most prominent to follow him were Revs. James Riley, Thornton Fleming, James Wilson, Henry Baker, Samuel V. Gillespie, and the venerable Samuel Wakefield.

Another of the pioneer and famous local preachers was Mr. Wirsing, grandfather of Capt. Wirsing, late county treasurer. He was born in Germany, and had been a commissioned officer in the army of his fatherland, being in the dragoons. He was an educated gentleman of fine address and great powers of language. He was the ablest and most eloquent exhorter of his day, and people came in vast numbers to hear him speak at camp-meetings, quarterly meetings, revivals, etc. Under his preaching the venerable Rev. Samuel Wakefield was converted and embraced religion, and there are yet living many old people of Israel who in their youth sought the altar of mercy under this famous exhorter's preaching. He was in the zenith of his fame in 1820, and five years later removed to near Petersburg, Somerset Co., where he died about 1835. Daniel and Conrad Pershing, brothers, were local preachers of note, and Isaac Pershing, a son of the former, still lives at Derry, at a very advanced age. Rev. James Wakefield, uncle of Rev. Samuel Wakefield, was a minister of much celebrity, and preached all over this and the adjoining counties from 1800 to about 1845. He was a man of fine attainments and a successful revivalist, and possessed a power of influencing his hearers hardly excelled in his day.

The oldest Methodist preacher in the county, and with only two exceptions in the Pittsburgh Conference, is Rev. Samuel Wakefield, D.D., of Mount Pleasant. This patriarch and pioneer of his church was born in Huntingdon County in 1799. His father, Thomas Wakefield, was a native of Ireland, and married Elizabeth Morton, who was born in Chester County. They removed in 1800 to Indiana County, where their son Samuel resided until twenty-one years of age, when he entered on the ministry. His first preaching appointment was in Fayette County (Fayette Circuit), embracing half of that county and a part of West Virginia; his next, Somerset Circuit; his third, Connellsville Circuit, which then embraced all of this (Westmoreland) county. He was then made for four years presiding elder of the Union-town district, which also included this county. He has been fifty-nine years in the ministry, twelve as a local preacher and forty-seven as an itinerant. He retired some two years ago from regular preaching, although he yet preaches on special occasions, such as dedications, and at funerals. There is probably no minister in America who has traveled so far on horseback, preached so many sermons, married so many couples, administered so many sacraments and baptisms, and attended so many funerals as Rev. Samuel Wakefield. About 1854, Allegheny College, in recognition of his great learning, conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. He has written largely for the religious press, and is the author of a work on "Theology," which has been introduced into the course of study for young ministers and been extensively circulated. He also served four years as presiding elder of the Allegheny District. He was married Aug. 23, 1821, to Miss Elizabeth Hough, through which union have been born ten children,—five sons and five daughters,—all living. One of them, Rev. John F. Wakefield, is the Methodist Episcopal pastor of Latrobe station. Dr. James B. Wakefield is a physician in Mount Pleasant, and Dr. Alfred N. Wakefield a physician at Johnstown. Mr. Wakefield and his wife have lived together sixty-one years, in which time the church, to which he has in all that period been a faithful minister, has increased its numbers and strength in this county to wonderful proportions, which is largely attributable to his zeal and ability and to his ever-watchful care for its growth and promotion.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE CONNELLSVILLE CIRCUIT UNTIL THE FORMATION OF THE LIGONIER CIRCUIT, 1820-34.¹

Feb. 16, 1820, Connellsville* (Fayette County), Greensburg,* Mount Pleasant,* McNutt's, McCue's, Mellon's (afterward Ross'), Slatterbeck's† (sometimes written Sloderbeck), King's,*† Fisher's (near Ligonier), Hopewell, Stuart's† (Jacob, Ligonier Valley), Wakefield's (James).

June 20, 1820, Adams', Arnel's, Wilson's, Shepard's,† Sherrick's (Jacobs Creek, not far from Scottdale), Shumard's, McAnelly's.

Sept. 16, 1820, Wakefield's.

Dec. 2, 1820, Harrold's.

June 2, 1821, Wade's, Doty's, Bracken's (Indiana County?).

Sept. 29, 1821, Trout's, Ross'* (near Crabtree, Unity township).

Dec. 8, 1821, Williams'.

June 29, 1822, Miller's.*

Sept. 13, 1823, Vanausdoll's, Harvey's (or Harry's).

Feb. 28, 1824, Sterrett's Salt-works.

¹ At the formation of the Ligonier Circuit, in the summer of 1834, the preachers on the Connellsville Circuit had served the appointments during the previous year in those congregations or stations marked with an asterisk (*). The appointments marked with a dagger (†) and perhaps others were thereafter included in the Ligonier Circuit.

- May 21, 1825, Funk's.
 November, 1825, Blairsville, McKissen's, Enfield's.
 April 29, 1826, Ross' Furnace* (Ligonier Valley), Galbreath's (Ligonier Valley), Palmer's (Ligonier Valley).
 Oct. 28, 1826, Black Lick (Indiana County).
 April 14, 1827, Stiffy's, Riggs'* (near Markle's Paper-Mill).
 Oct. 27, —, Mardice's, or Mardus'.
 Dec. 27, 1828, Morrison's, Allander's.
 Oct. 9, 1830, Pershing's*† (John), northeast of Pleasant Unity, Unity School-house, near Pleasant Unity, Pershing's*† (Daniel).
 Jan. 9, 1831, McLane's,† Boner's, Livermore, McCutcheon's (or McCue's?).
 April 2, 1831, Ligonier*† (instead of Fisher's).
 June 11, 1831, Fairfield.*†
 Sept. 10, 1831, Asbury Chapel*† (perhaps instead of Hopewell).
 March 17, 1832, Randolph* (three and a half miles east of Greensburg).
 June 9, 1832, Armaugh (Indiana County).
 Nov. 10, 1832, Bethel*† (Pleasant Unity), Youngstown.*†
 Feb. 2, 1833, Tarr's,* Frick's,* Longenecker's,* Laughlinstown.*†
 April 20, 1833, Donegal,† Hatfield's, Hartzel's† (near Pleasant Unity).
 Oct. 12, 1833, Salem.*
 Jan. 18, 1834, Denniston Town* (New Alexandria).

PRESENT PASTORAL CHARGES.

After 1825 several new pastoral charges sprang up, and in that year all Western Pennsylvania was detached from the Baltimore and made into the Pittsburgh Conference, which embraced West Virginia, Western Pennsylvania, and part of Ohio. In 1840 the Erie Conference was made out of it, and in 1844 that of West Virginia. The following are the present preaching appointments (stations and circuits) in the county: Circleville, Jacobs Creek, Lebanon, Ligonier, Cokeville, Latrobe, Irvine, Sardis, West Newton, Rostraver, Mount Pleasant, Pleasant Unity, Donegal, New Derry, Greensburg, Manor, and Madison. Each of these is a separate pastoral charge, embracing from one to four preaching-places.

To this imperfect sketch of the Methodist Church of the county may be added a few words touching the Loyalhanna camp-meeting grounds. In the summer of 1874 the East Pittsburgh District of the Methodist Episcopal Church appointed a committee to select ground on which to hold a camp-meeting. The committee selected, out of quite a number proposed, the present site now occupied, one and a half miles east of Latrobe, and this they have improved by erecting suitable buildings and accommodations. The ground was leased for twenty years, and has been laid off in lots fronting sixteen feet, and back forty feet. There are two tiers of lots around the entire camp; on these are the cottages, and in summer temporary tents, facing towards the square devoted to religious services, or upon the avenues that pass parallel to the sides and ends of this square. The seats in front of the preacher's stand will accommodate five thousand people. When camp-meeting is in progress—it lasting usually two weeks in August of each year—the grounds and the whole town of Latrobe are crowded with people. An admission-fee is charged, and these aggregate a considerable amount. Many owners of cottages with their families reside on the grounds during the heated season.

EARLY METHODISM IN GREENSBURG AND VICINITY.

The following minutiae cannot but be of interest to the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church throughout the county, although it relates particularly to the establishment of the church at Greensburg, and to the history of the congregation there. For the most part of this material we are indebted to William Robinson, Esq., one of the oldest citizens of the town and members of the congregation there, who has with a due regard to the desires of posterity, and in anticipation of the interest they will take in the matter, committed his personal knowledge and his acquired information in this regard to paper. To his valuable manuscript we have had access, and the substance of it is here reproduced.

Greensburg, from the time when first at all regularly supplied with Methodist preaching, received this through the Pittsburgh Circuit until Pittsburgh became a station and the Connellsville Circuit was formed, about 1811, then in connection with the latter until 1816, when Pittsburgh was thrown into a circuit again (Pittsburgh and Connellsville), until about 1819, since which there has been no such circuit as the "Pittsburgh and Connellsville." Greensburg was then in the Connellsville Circuit until 1851, when it became detached by the formation of a new circuit embracing Greensburg, New Alexandria, Ross', Mount Pleasant, and Pleasant Unity.

The great local "public discussion of the leading points of difference between the Calvinistic and Armenian systems," by Rev. John Jamison, of the Seceder, and Rev. Valentine Cook, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, came off on Wednesday, June 12, 1793, a few miles distant from Greensburg, in some outdoor woodland, where a great number of seats had been prepared and a pulpit erected, and where when the time arrived "a vast concourse of people were in attendance," some of whom came as far as fifty miles. Tradition fixes the place at Congruity. Rev. Samuel Porter, who then had charge of the Presbyterian Church at Congruity, and who had a hand in bringing on the debate, saying "truth was suffering, and I must defend it or own it defenseless," hastened on the succeeding Sabbath, June 16, 1793, to give his "opinion" in two discourses "On the Decrees of God, the Perseverance of the Saints, and Sinless Perfection."

In 1792, Samuel Bushfield and wife (formerly Miss Catharine Taylor) came from Ireland, and after stopping a while in Lancaster and Huntingdon Counties, settled at Greensburg in 1799. They were Methodists before they came hither, and soon after they came, by their efforts Methodist preaching was secured. In 1799-1800 the first class at Greensburg was formed, embracing Samuel Bushfield and wife Catharine, Jacob Kern and wife Susanna, and John Kern and wife.

The early Methodist meetings at Greensburg up to 1830 were usually held at Bushfield's house. In it, too, was the "Prophet's Chamber." These places were, first, a wooden house, in part still standing on the north side of Pittsburgh Street, on the second lot west of the northwest corner of Pittsburgh and Joseph Streets, and a few yards eastward of the spring which rises about midway up Bunker Hill. The western end of the building was then a one-story kitchen. This was the birthplace, so to speak, of Methodism in Greensburg and parts adjacent.

After living a year or two in the house designated, Bushfield removed to a red, weather-boarded house which stood on West Pittsburgh Street, at the foot of the street, somewhere below the present residence of Hon. E. Cowan. About 1806-8 he removed to a log house on the north side of the road, and on the west bank of the spring run which passes from Ludwick to the Williams' (or old fair-ground) farm. Nearly opposite this house, on the south side of the road, is the old log barn, which was used for preaching instead of the house "in fine summer weather." This property he owned. In 1829 he removed to a house a short distance eastward from the spring, and as he moved he carried the visible church with him. To this house the venerable writer to whom we are indebted says that at the age of eleven he accompanied his father one Sunday when preaching was expected, but no preacher was there. Aaron Hill then led a class. From there Bushfield in 1830 removed to the town of Greensburg, and there in 1832 he died. His wife, married at eighteen to Bushfield, died Dec. 28, 1856, in the eighty-fourth or eighty-fifth year of her age, and having been for above seventy years a member of the church.

Meetings were also held at the house of Jacob Kern before he moved West in 1817. He lived on Main Street, on a lot just north of the present church building. Sometimes, especially for night preaching, the court-house was used. This was before 1830, and more generally from 1830 to 1833. In 1832, Rev. Charles Cook came over from Uniontown, and held a protracted meeting here, at which a number joined the church, and after which the project of building a meeting-house was agitated. From 1830 until their first meeting-house was built class-meetings were still held in Bushfield's house and at the house of Joseph Kern.

On Feb. 2, 1833, the Quarterly Conference appointed Rev. Wesley Kinney, Samuel B. Bushfield (son of Samuel Bushfield, deceased), and George T. Ramsay a committee to make an estimate of the amount necessary to build a house of worship in the borough of Greensburg, and, if deemed expedient, to secure a suitable lot of ground for the purpose. To secure the first "Methodist Episcopal Meeting-House" in Greensburg, which was built in 1833, two members of the society subscribed each fifty dollars, other members smaller sums, some citizens gave liberally (or what might be called so at the time), and Rev. John White, preacher in charge, collected around the circuit seventy dollars. The lot was bought of John Y. Barclay, Esq., for one hundred dollars. The first trustees were George T. Ramsay, Samuel B. Bushfield, Aaron Hill, Daniel H. Barnes, and Joseph Kern. The agreement between these and John Hartzell, house carpenter, for the erection of the meeting-house was dated Feb. 16, 1833, and stipulated for a brick building, forty-two feet long and thirty feet wide, one story fourteen feet in height, three windows on each side and two in each end, each of twenty-four lights of eight-by-ten glass; one double door in centre of front end four feet wide in the clear. The building was to be completed by the 1st of the next July. It is thought the pulpit, altar, and pews were put in some time afterwards, and therefore were not covered by Hartzell's claim for the building, which was $638.85. The first seating was benches made of slabs and boards, and the first lighting was by candles in candlesticks and in sconces hung against the walls. Afterwards lard lamps were used for lighting. A debt for its erection was left on the hands of the trustees, which gave them some trouble until it was paid in 1839.

The building was situated on Main Street, and adjoined the present Presbyterian Church property. It was sold by the trustees to the school directors of the Greensburg public schools in 1849. In rebuilding, pilasters and a second story were added. This building is still standing in good preservation, and is now occupied as a dwelling.

Previous to the erection of the new church building and after the sale of the first one, a small brick church, formerly used by the Presbyterians, and standing in a corner of now St. Clair Cemetery, together with the court-house, were used for preaching in. The first class met in this little church, and the second and other classes, when formed in 1834 and 1835 and thereafter, met principally at private houses until their own church was built. These private houses were those of William Gorgas, Jane McKinney, David Cook, John McGeary, William Robinson, and Hugh Arters, and besides these places, prayer-meetings and revival meetings were also held at the houses of Jacob Myers, Samuel B. Bushfield, Samuel S. Turney, Robert W. Turney, William S. Brown, and others. Meetings were held at some of these even when the first church was in use.

Dec. 14 and 15, 1850, the Second Quarterly Meeting Conference for Connellsville Circuit was held in the church on the cemetery grounds.

In 1849 the pastor in charge, Rev. J. G. Sansom, suggested that the meeting-house be enlarged or a new one built to accommodate the increasing congregation. The suggestion was acted upon, and in September the trustees appointed a committee of three—C. J. Kenley, William Robinson, and William A. Cook—to open a subscription and ascertain how much money could be raised for a new church building. The money raised therewith, together with that realized from the sale of their old edifice, was used in purchasing a lot and building a new church. Early in 1850 the lot on the northeast corner of Main and Second Streets was purchased from Jehu Taylor. The building was begun on this lot in 1851. The basement was completed so as to be used for worship in 1852, and the audience-room was finished the following fall, and on Nov. 25, 1852, the building was dedicated by Bishop Simpson.

At a meeting of the members of the church and a few friends, held Oct. 14, 1835, the first "Methodist Sabbath-School Society of Greensburg" was organized, with Rev. David Sharp as president; Rev. Jeremiah Knox as vice-president; John W. Barr, superintendent; George T. Ramsey, assistant superintendent and treasurer; William McKinney, secretary; and Charles F. Kenley, librarian. In 1871 it acquired an organ for the use of the school.

UNITED BRETHREN.

The church of the "United Brethren in Christ" began its existence among the Germans of America soon after the middle of the eighteenth century.¹

The ecclesiastical literature of this denomination ardently proclaims that divine Providence greatly favored this people at that time by raising up ministers of the gospel filled with grace and zeal and the disposition and ability to go out among their widely-scattered population and preach in such a manner as to gather many to their standard.

Prominent among those evangelists were William Otterbein, Martin Boehn, George A. Geeting, and Christian Newcomer.

Those men obeying what they took to be a call from the Lord, their labors were blest of the Lord. Excellent societies were formed in many places, and congregations, after the manner of the Methodists, were established wherever they went. As the spirit of revival and reformation prevailed, their sphere of action spread more and more, so that they soon found it necessary to seek fellow-laborers to work in the fields, where the harvest was plenteous and the laborers were few. So the number of consecrated workmen was rapidly increased.

The number of believers multiplied, and the reformation spread through the States of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania.

From the year 1766 to 1789, a period of twenty-three years, the preachers, who felt that they were "united brethren," and who were co-operating in the revival movement, met together as often as once a year, and generally at a great meeting, where in mutual and brotherly counsel they attended to such business as properly belonged to a Presbytery, a Classis, or a Conference. As the number of laborers increased, and as applications for authority to preach from those whom, as it was regarded, God had manifestly called and qualified for the work multiplied, these informal Conferences became more necessary and important. Mr. Otterbein, being eminently qualified, usually presided, and his counsels and instructions, especially to the rising ministry, were in a high degree useful.

At length, however, a formal Conference was deemed necessary; the work had become so far extended that it became impracticable to attend to the necessary business of the church at the great meetings. Accordingly the first Conference, regularly convened, was held in Baltimore in 1789. Fourteen preachers were recognized as members.

The second regular Conference was convened in 1791, in York County, Pa. Nine additional laborers were recognized, making in all twenty-three.

After this period it was found necessary to hold Conferences annually, in order to more closely unite the preachers and to establish a better plan for their labors.

At these Conferences the preachers who could give their whole time in traveling were assigned particular fields of labor, wherein they worked as itinerants. Others were appointed to hold revival meetings designated at the Conferences, in different sections of the country, and to devote as much of their time to the work of evangelization as circumstances would permit.

At a Conference held in Maryland in the year 1800, the name "United Brethren in Christ" was adopted. Up until this period the church had passed under the name of "United Brethren," an appellation very appropriate considering that converted Mennonists, Reformed Lutherans, Tunkers, and Amish were drawn together and compressed into this one harmonious ecclesiastical organization. The additional words "in Christ" were appended to the former name in order to give distinctness as a denomination, and to avoid any legal difficulty which might arise in making deeds, wills, and other legal instruments. In the year 1815, at a General Conference, composed of representatives of the entire church organization East and West, a discipline was adopted setting forth the doctrines and rules of the church according as they were taken to be, as based on the word of God, so that harmony and peace might be preserved both in doctrine and practice as the church increased.

The polity of the church is a very modified episco-

¹ My thanks for assistance in this sketch are due to Rev. F. Fisher and Rev. J. C. Shearer.

pany, in which the bishops are elected quadriennially and are not ordained to a superior order, but chosen as superintendents of the church.

All ecclesiastical authority is vested in a General Conference, consisting of elders elected by vote of the members of the church congregations from every Conference district. The bishops are elected by this body, and are its presiding officers. They superintend the Annual Conferences in the respective districts over which they are appointed. They officiate in ordinations, and assist in stationing the preachers, according to the itinerant plan.

The conditions of membership in this church body are profession of faith in Christ and an experience of pardon of sin and peace with God.

The denomination now numbers one hundred and sixty thousand members, mostly English-speaking people. In our county they comprise a generally intelligent and respectable portion of the people.

The first United Brethren preachers who came to this county were Christian Newcomer, George A. Geeting, Abraham Draksel, Charles Berger, and Andrew Zeller.

These ministers came on extensive missionary tours from Eastern Pennsylvania and Maryland, visiting the county at intervals of three or four months, preaching in the houses, barns, and groves of those members of their communion who had moved from the East. Christian Newcomer, afterwards third bishop of the church, was the first to come to this county on those long preaching tours. His journal is still preserved, and shows that he visited this county and preached in it as early as 1800. He says,—

"Oct. 22, 1800. From thence I came to Mr. George Mumma's, a relation of mine in Westmoreland County, and stayed for the night. 23d. This morning set off on my way very early; fed at a public-house in Ligonier [Ligonier] Valley," [this was at the old May's tavern stand, on the turnpike between Donegal and Laurelville]. Another extract will show the route by which these preachers traveled to this country from the East:

"Nov. 8, 1803. We traveled about thirty miles over a very mountainous section of country; preached at Mr. Guth's, near Berlin. . . . 9th. To-day we pursued our journey across Laurel Hill, where we lodged with Henry Filger, in Ligonier Valley. 10th. We held a meeting at Mr. Weible's. The word made great impression. At night we preached at Mr. Bonnett's [one mile east of Mount Pleasant], an intelligent German [but of French extraction]. Here I spoke from Heb. ii. 3. I had not spoken long before some of my hearers fell to the floor, others stood trembling and crying so loud that my voice could scarcely be heard." Six years later he writes,—

"June 20, 1809. This forenoon we had meeting at Walter's; in the afternoon I spoke at Swartz's; lodged here for the night." [This was near Pleasant Unity, at the house of John Swartz, grandfather of Mrs. John Gibbs and Mr. Paul Swartz, of Mount Pleasant.]

"21st. This day we preached in Greensburg, in the court-house; Geeting preached in the German, myself in the English language."

Six years later he writes of being at the General Conference at Mount Pleasant:

"June 5th [1815]. Came to Worman's. 6th. This day the General Conference commenced at old Brother Draksel's. . . . Lodged with John Shupe" [ancestor of Mr. Oliver Shupe, of Mount Pleasant].

His visits are recorded as late as 1827, having been kept up with more or less frequency for a period of twenty-seven years. At page 313 of his printed "Journal" is the following entry: "June 22, 1827. Came to Daniel Worman's. 23d. Lodged at Bonnett's. 24th. This forenoon I preached here from Luke xxiv. 45-47."

At the first General Conference held in this region, above alluded to, were present the following ministers: Revs. Abraham Mayer, Henry Kumler, John Snyder, Abraham Draksel, and Christian Berger, of the State of Pennsylvania; Revs. — Newcomer and Jacob Baulus, of Maryland; Revs. Christian Crum, Isaac Niswander, and H. G. Spayth, of Virginia; and Revs. Andrew Zeller, A. Hiestand, Daniel Tryer, and George Benedum, of Ohio.

Thus it will be seen that the church in this county has considerable historic interest, and the old house wherein was held this early church meeting is now a Mecca for the pilgrims of this faith. Every reasonable effort has been made to preserve it from demolition, and it has been photographed and produced in all kinds of engravings, and in print hangs on many walls. It is certainly a commendable trait of respect and veneration now that the denomination has grown rich and influential that its members should set such store by old landmarks so full of interest.

The first resident United Brethren minister in the county was Rev. Abraham Draksel, or Draksell (now Truxell). He owned and lived upon the farm now occupied by David Miller, near Mount Pleasant. His grandson, Rev. J. H. Pershing, has charge of Ligonier Circuit, and resides at New Florence. Notable among the names of the pioneer ministers of the church in this county is that of Henry Spayth, who moved to Mount Pleasant and became resident pastor there about the year 1815. Besides performing the laborious pastoral work of more than half a century, he wrote a history of the church, and assisted largely in the preparation of a denominational hymn-book. Few men did more than he to shape the polity of the church during a period of thirty years, from 1815 to 1845.

The first preaching-places in the county were the one designated above, near Mount Pleasant, and others at Donegal, West Newton, Madison, Greensburg, and Pleasant Unity.

The first regular organizations were at Mount Pleasant, Madison, and near West Newton.

Among the oldest of living preachers who labored for the church in this county during the last half-century are Rev. J. L. Baker, now seventy-two, still traveling a circuit afoot, and preaching with youthful clearness and force, and Rev. William Beighel, still in charge of a circuit and resident at Pleasant Unity.

Peter Walter, of Lycippus, is the oldest member of the church in the county. He was converted, in a religious sense, and joined the church, then in a barn near Pleasant Unity, at the age of eighteen, and has now belonged to the church as a member for seventy years. He attended the first General Conference at Mount Pleasant in 1815, and knew all the early preachers that came to this section.

David Keister, an early member of Mount Pleasant, now above seventy, retains a large store of the traditional history of his church, and remembers distinctly many of the fathers. He has a complete file of the Religious Telescope, the denominational organ of the church.

The early growth of the United Brethren Church was slow, owing to the fact that its early ministers were evangelists rather than organizers; hence it is a matter of complaint that, although their labors were abundant and their converts numerous, yet these fruits were often garnered by more skillful organizers of other denominations. These early preachers spoke German, and seldom preached English; hence, as the children of the families learned English at school and began to lose the use of the German, they preferred English preaching, and consequently joined other churches.

There are now six pastoral charges in this county,—Mount Pleasant station, in charge of Rev. J. C. Sharer; Westmoreland Circuit, with the venerable Rev. Isaac Potter as pastor; Madison Circuit, Rev. J. S. Buell, pastor; Greensburg, under pastoral care of Rev. J. L. Jones; Ligonier Circuit, Rev. J. H. Pershing pastor; the west half of Ligonier Circuit is served by Rev. A. Davidson.

These pastoral charges consist of seventeen organized churches, worshiping in fourteen meeting-houses, and having a total membership of twelve hundred and ninety-five members.

THE MENNONISTS—THEIR SETTLEMENT IN THE COUNTY.

The Mennonist Church is one of the fragments into which the mother-church of Rome was shivered by reforming hands in the Middle Ages, and is accordingly one of the many Protestant sects. The founder of the Mennonite—more preferably “Mennonist”—sect was Menno Simon, who was in Friesland in 1495 or '96, three years after the discovery of America by Columbus. He was contemporary with Luther, Zwinglius, Bucer, Calvin, Bullinger, and Melancthon. His doctrines were accepted by great numbers, who became persecuted, and largely dispersed into Prussia, Poland, Denmark, Holland, and Russia. In 1683 a number of Mennonist families came to America and settled in and about Germantown (now Philadelphia), and at subsequent times other bodies of them came and located near the original settlement. In 1736 five hundred settled in Lancaster County, and from this region they gradually dispersed into various States. In the last part of the eighteenth century the first Mennonist families settled in Westmoreland County, and as years rolled by its settlement received several additions from the Eastern hives. With an eye to plenty and prosperity, the Mennonist pioneers settled in East Huntingdon township, one of the most beautiful and fertile sections of the county, at the same time one rich in minerals. In the same valley, but across Jacobs Creek and in Fayette County, another settlement of Mennonists came. To this settlement came principally Lancaster County families, while to West Overton came generally families from Bucks County.

Among the subscribers to “The Christian Confession of Faith,” published at Philadelphia in 1727, occur the surnames Kolb, Ziegler, Gorgas, Conerads, Hirchi, Bear, Bowman, Langenecker, Beghtly. These surnames are to be found in Westmoreland, with such phonetic changes as point unmistakably to their derivation from the former. Thus Kolb has become Culp and Gulp; Ziegler, Zigler; Conerad, Coonrad; Hirchi, Harshey and Hershey; Langenecker, Longnecker. In other documents occur the surnames Oberholtzer, now Oberholt; Kendigs, now Kintig; Miller, Funk, Bowman still the same in this county. In the original list of subscribers to this Confession of Faith, “done and finished in our united churches in the city of Dortrecht, 21st April, A.D. 1632,” occur the surnames Jacobs, Willisemsen, now Williamson; Winkelmans, now Winkleman; Zimmerman, now the same, or translated into Carpenter; Shoomaker, now Shoe-, Shu- and Shoonmaker; Moyers, now the same, or Meyer, Meyers; Koenig, now King; Bom, now Baum; Claeson, now Clawson; Petersen, now Peterson; Segerts, now about the same; Haus, now pronounced Houtz; op de Graff, now Updegraff. Thus the connection is shown between the Westmoreland Mennonists of the latter half of the nineteenth century and the Dortrecht, Utrecht, Leyden, Rotterdam, and Amsterdam Mennonists of more than two hundred years ago.

In this county the sect is on the decline. At one time their communicants were here numbered by hundreds, while now there are less than forty, and not one of these under the age of forty. The Mennonist Church is in East Huntingdon township (which chapter see for its history), about midway in a line running north and south between West Overton and Bethany, and about midway in a line running east and west between Mount Pleasant and Reagentown. Its last minister was John Overholt, who resided on the eastern flank of the hilly range that farther north in the county is the well-defined Randolph or Dry Ridge. Since their settlement here the Mennonists have been distinguished for their moral worth, thrift, industry, and intelligence, and no portion of the county excels the part originally settled by them and still almost entirely owned and occupied by their numerous and forehanded descendants.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Salem Baptist Church, located near West Newton, is the oldest of this faith in Westmoreland County.¹ There are not more than three in the western part of the State that antedate it, and it may be there is but one. It was constituted nineteen years before the First Baptist Church in Pittsburgh. Unfortunately the records of its constitution, if there were ever any kept, have been lost. Yet the history that antedates its constitution, and for some years after, was kept in the attentive memory of Brother J. P. Weddell. Richard Pritchard, his grandfather, was a member of the Presbyterian Church, but from his study of the Scriptures was convinced that his baptism was not apostolic. The only Baptist Church that he could attend was in Washington County. Henry Speers was their pastor, and baptized him into the fellowship of that church. His wife soon after obeyed in the same ordinance. Soon after this Elder Speers began to preach in their house occasionally, on the farm now owned by Thomas Ray, where Elders Beatty and Corbley also preached. These meetings were held in memory by Father J. P. Weddell, who a short time since died.

The first persons baptized in that place were Joseph Budd and wife, and Nathaniel Hayden and wife, with some others whose names are forgotten.

The old meeting-house was built on the same spot where the present one now stands. It was built in the year 1792, and continued to be their place of worship until their present house was erected in the year 1842.

Among the early ministers were Lucy, Fry, and Phillips, and Elder Stone, pioneer preachers of Western Pennsylvania. Dr. James Estep preached to this church in his youth, in his prime, and even in his old age. He was their first regular pastor. He served them as a supply and pastor for almost half a century.

William Shadrach, D.D., when but a boy, with his youthful eloquence led many to connect themselves with this church, some of whom are still members of the church.

Revs. Rockefeller, George I. Miles, and Dr. William Penny, earnest ministers of the church, have gone to their rest, and their labors do follow them. The latter of these was baptized and received into the fellowship of this church. For thirty years previous to the great revival under the preaching of Rev. Isaac Wynn, in 1841, was a dark page in the history of this church. They had no pastor and no preaching, except when some traveling minister came among them. James Estep, generally once or twice a year, came and administered the sacrament. The members were few, but they were firm and true. They never ceased holding their prayer-meetings, and, like those of old, "They feared the Lord, and spake often one to another." At the latter part of this period there was a revival, which resulted in the conversion of over fifty persons, who were added to the church.

After Rev. Isaac Wynn closed his labors with the church, Rev. E. T. Brown took charge; then succeeded Revs. Milton Sutton, R. R. Sutton, and J. K. Cramer, the latter of whom preached for them over twelve years. After he left the church was without a pastor for several years. Revs. A. N. Dye and S. Washington each supplied them about six months. Rev. Daniel Webster was their pastor from June, 1869, till January, 1871. Rev. Aaron Wilson, their present pastor, entered upon his labors about April 1st. The Elizabeth, McKeesport, Mars Hill, and Olive Branch were organized chiefly from the Salem Church.

The parsonage was built by Rev. A. Wilson.

Rev. A. Wilson closed his pastorate in April, 1873. Rev. W. T. Hughes entered upon pastorate in May, 1873. During his pastorate a branch was organized in West Newton, and a house built.

Rev. W. T. Hughes closed his pastorate, May, 1875. Rev. J. J. Leightburn became pastor November, 1875. He resigned in 1880. Now without a pastor, have a good church property and parsonage, worth $8000.

1882, Pastor, — — —; Deacons, Nelson Weddell, Nathan M. Grew, J. M. Montgomery; Clerk, J. M. Montgomery. Sunday-school of thirty.

MOUNT PLEASANT BAPTIST CHURCH.

Organized November, 1828. Rev. William Shadrach the first pastor, and only surviving constituent member. W. Shadrach ordained same year, and Abram Shallenberger ordained first deacon in February, 1829. The next deacon was Jonathan Neumeyer. Both of these deacons have had sons ordained deacons of the same church.

Rev. Leroy Stephens resigned in 1879, having served the church about seven years, being the longest pastorate in the history of the church. Rev. N. L. Reynolds began his pastorate in 1880, and is still in charge of the church.

Few churches have had a more peaceful and prosperous career for the last eighteen or twenty years.

It was through the members of this church and their efforts that the institute was located at Mount Pleasant, and they have given a liberal portion of the funds which have made it what it is.

MOUNT PLEASANT INSTITUTE.

The Baptists purchased the old Mount Pleasant College in 1870, and opened what is now known as the "Western Pennsylvania Classical and Scientific

¹ From "Minutes of the Pittsburgh Baptist Association for 1871."

Institute" in September, 1873, under A. K. Bell, D.D., as president, and J. Jones, A.M., principal. The growth has been gradual but constant. Beginning with forty-six the first year, it has now reached one hundred and fifty, nearly all regular students. The institute is equaled by very few intermediate schools in its full courses of study. There is a three-years' course to prepare for college, besides a three-years' scientific and a four-years' literary course.

There are now eight teachers besides the various lecturers. The property consists of a fine three-acre campus on one of the highest spots in the community, and covered with a beautiful grove of forest-trees, in full view of Chestnut Ridge. There are two large brick buildings, the one used as a ladies' dormitory building having cost twenty thousand dollars.

The graduates of the school are beginning to occupy positions of influence, and are giving evidence of the thorough work the school has done.

DONEGAL BAPTIST CHURCH.

The Baptist Church at Donegal was constituted June 14, 1834. The following are the names of the members: John R. Lohr, John Robison, Sr., John Robison, Jr., Samuel White (afterward removed to Iowa), Catharine Robison, Agnes Lohr, Margaret White, Julian Robison, Mary Lohr, Eleanor Shadrach, Catharine Lohr, Mary Lohr (the younger), Lydia Weimer, Mary Berg, Elcanor Keslar. All these, with the exception of John R. Lohr, Samuel White, and Eleanor Keslar, are now dead. The church was organized by the Revs. John P. Rockefeller and Levi Griffith, on the date above given, at which time the Rev. Rockefeller was chosen pastor, John R. Lohr, deacon, and John Robison, church clerk. It remained under the care of this pastor until April 1, 1835, when he resigned. On the 18th of that month Rev. Levi Griffith was chosen pastor, and he remained in charge until the 1st of March, 1837, when he was succeeded by Rev. Rockefeller, who was again pastor till March 31, 1838. He was then followed by these in their order: Rev. Milton Sutton, till Feb. 20, 1841; Rev. Garret R. Patton, from July 10, 1841, till 19th December, 1843; Rev. Caleb Russell, till March 7, 1846; Rev. Albert G. Eberhart, till March 20, 1847; Rev. W. W. Hickman, till April 20, 1850; Rev. John Parker, from Aug. 17, 1850, till March 13, 1852; Rev. J. K. Cramer, till Dec. 19, 1857; Rev. John Scott, till June 18, 1859; Rev. John Williams, from April 1, 1860, till April 1, 1861; Rev. O. P. Hargrave, from June 18, 1862, till December, 1863; Rev. James R. Brown, from May 5, 1866, till May 5, 1867; Rev. N. B. Crichfield, from July 12, 1867, till Aug. 19, 1871; Rev. Z. C. Rush, from Sept. 10, 1871, till June 19, 1875; Rev. David Williams, for six months thereafter; Rev. W. T. Galloway, preached for six months in 1877 as supply; Rev. W. S. Wood, for six months in 1878 as supply, and six months in 1869 as pastor; Rev. John C. Skinner, for three months from November, 1829, as supply; Rev. G. D. Knox, for six months in 1880 as supply; Rev. W. T. Galloway, pastor in 1881, from April 1st till September 1st; and Rev. W. W. Robison, from September, 1881, as supply, who is now their pastor for one year.

The deacons of the Donegal Baptist Church, with the dates of their ordination, are as follows: John R. Lohr, June 14, 1834; Samuel White, March 14, 1835; John Robison, Sr., March 2, 1838; William Fligor, June 17, 1854; Rice Boyd, June 30, 1870.

MARS HILL CHURCH.

Organized in 1839. Resulted from special services held by Rev. Milton Sutton, then pastor at McKeesport, but residing in Connellsville.

Passing by the place now known as Mars Hill, he was requested to hold services in the school-house by an aged lady of the Baptist faith by the name of Mrs. Tilbrook, the mother of John and Thomas Tilbrook, both now deceased, but well known in this county. Rev. Mr. Sutton assented, and continued to stop and preach on Friday P.M., at two o'clock, and in the evenings. As a result a number of persons were baptized, and on Oct. 31, 1840, the church was recognized by Council. The following names appear as connected with this early history: Mrs. Tilbrook, John Tilbrook and wife Anna, Thomas Copeland and wife (father and mother of B. and J. Copeland, merchants of Irwin), Johu Dinsmore and wife (parents of J. McCoy Dinsmore, of Irwin), John Kearns and wife, Jacob Grennewalt and wife, Henry Grennewalt and wife (Col. Jacob Grennewalt's father and mother), Abram Leatherman and wife (sister of David Tinsman), Mrs. Col. Bigham Copeland, Mrs. Emily Grennewalt (mother of Capt. Grennewalt, Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers), Matthew Linu and wife (parents of James Linn, McKeesport).

A number of others might be named. The first candidates for baptism were Mrs. Diana Kearns, Miss Polly McQuade; the first pastor, Rev. Milton Sutton; deacons, Jacob Grennewalt, John Tilbrook. The first house (a Union Church building) was erected in 1841 at a cost of some fifteen hundred dollars. The ground for building and cemetery purposes was donated by John Tilbrook.

The pastors of the church since its organization have been Revs. Milton Sutton, R. R. Sutton, J. P. Rockefeller, Gabriel Lanham, O. P. Hargrave (eight years), Daniel Webster (three years), R. C. Morgan (one year), O. P. Hargrave (nine years). The last, O. P. Hargrave, has been pastor for seventeen years in June, 1882, an interval of five years intervening between 1868 and 1873.

The present church building was erected in 1875, and dedicated May 28, 1876. Sermon by Rev. J. K. Cramer, assisted by Rev. J. J. Lightburn.

The official members in 1882 are as follows: Pastor, Rev. O. P. Hargrave; Deacons, John Fretz, Danicl Grennewalt; Church Clerk, John Ogg; Trustees, Nathan Fullerton, Christian Fretz, Capt. Caleb Grennewalt, Dr. James Penny, Samuel Grennewalt; Sunday-school Superintendent, Alexander Wiley.

Value of church property, $4000; membership, 1881, 85; average yearly expenditures, $500; Sabbath-school members, 60.

The history of the church has been similar to most organizations. In 1868 it numbered 153 members; to-day 85. While weaker numerically, it is stronger financially.

The Irwin, Greensburg, and Coulterville Baptist Churches were in part formed from this church.

The early association of this church was with the Monongahela Association.

IRWIN BAPTIST CHURCH.

Organized in 1872. Recognized by Council Dec. 10, 1872. Received into the Association (Pittsburgh) June, 1873, reporting sixty members. Rev. R. C. Morgan, pastor; I. D. Evans, clerk; J. M. Dinsmore, J. G. Steiner, deacons. Dedicated house of worship October, 1874. Rev. R. C. Morgan resigned May, 1876. Rev. J. W. Evans became pastor Dec. 1, 1876; resigned November, 1878. Rev. G. D. Knox became pastor May, 1878, and resigned Jan. 26, 1879. Financial embarrassment, and house sold for debt in 1879. Rev. J. Gemple served as supply for a few months, closing his labors January, 1880. During his ministry the church changed its name to the Shafton Baptist Church. Rev. H. Jeffreys became pastor in March, 1881, and still remains in charge. J. J. Jones, deacon; J. Mountain, clerk. Membership last report, 68.

The Second Baptist Church of Irwin was organized in 1879, and recognized by Council Aug. 14, 1879, with 30 members. Rev. G. W. Baker preached as a supply for a few months, closing his labors April, 1880. The church now is without a pastor.

First Baptist Church membership: 1873, 60; 1874, 114; 1875, 169; 1876, 198; 1877, 163; 1878, 107; 1879, 53.

Value of church property when sold, 1879, $5000. A Sunday-school with an average attendance of 150 pupils was kept up for several years.

Benevolent contributions and home-work:

1872.....		1877.....	$2,089.00
1873.....	$3,298.50	1878.....	859.37
1874.....	2,809.00	1879.....	375.62
1875.....	1,806.98
1876.....	1,689.50		$13,647.97

This is an average of $1949.71 in the seven years.

The outlook for the future is not encouraging for either the Irwin or Shafton Baptist Churches. There is some good material in both, and they may again arise in strength.

GREENSBURG BAPTIST CHURCH.

Organized April 5, 1873. Recognized by Council May 13, 1873, with 33 members. Received into the Pittsburgh Association June, 1873. Rev. R. C. Morgan, pastor; Philip Clingerman, A. P. Smith, deacons; John Mensch, clerk. Rev. R. C. Morgan resigned pastorate April 1, 1874. Rev. O. P. Hargrave became pastor July 1, 1874, and is still in charge, 1882. Dedicated their first meeting-house Oct. 13, 1875. Dedication sermon by Rev. B. F. Woodburn, assisted by Rev. Leroy Stephens, Rev. J. K. Cramer, and Rev. J. S. Hutson. Sunday-school organized January, 1873. Has been a successful school under the superintendencies of A. P. Smith, John Mensch, and H. W. Walkinshaw, who is now in charge. Membership in 1874, 57; 1881, 55. Near a hundred scholars have been in attendance some years. As in 1878 there was 93 pupils, other schools have reduced this one.

Officers in 1882: O. P. Hargrave, pastor; P. Clingerman, J. Mensch, D. B. Weaver, deacons; H. W. Walkinshaw, clerk. Church membership, 94; value of church property, $3000.

There has been baptized into this church 115 persons, 86 during the present pastorate.

Benevolence and home-work:

1874.....	$442.25	1879.....	$609.43
1875.....	627.13	1880.....	542.10
1876.....	1206.05	1881.....	2154.90
1877.....	442.25
1878.....	448.05		$6472.16

This is an average of $809.02 for the eight years.

There has been connected with this church since its organization by baptism, 115; letter, 18; experience, 30; total, 163. Only 12 by letter and 17 by experience in eight years. Not much help from abroad.

NEW STANTON BAPTIST CHURCH.

In 1840 the Rev. Siegfried, of Mount Pleasant, commenced to preach in New Stanton, and a Union Church edifice was built at that place the same year.

In April, 1842, there was a church organized at that place numbering about 37 members. The Rev. Siegfried continued to preach here for about two years.

In 1844 the church undertook and erected a stone edifice of its own, costing two thousand dollars. The Rev. Siegfried resigned his charge about this time, and Rev. A. Eberhart was called to the pastorate, and served the church two years. The Rev. Morris then took charge of the church and served it for some time. He was followed by Rev. Richard Sutton, who served for two years.

Rev. George White was pastor for some length of time. Rev. Lanham served the church for three or four years. Rev. John Williams, of Turkey Foot, was pastor for some time.

The Rev. John E. Thomas preached for a period of about six years. He preached his last sermon at this place from the text, "Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets." Since that time the Rev. George Ames has officiated.

The Rev. (Forger) Jones served as pastor for two years. The Rev. Wood preached for some time, but had no discipline. He was followed by the Rev. Z.

C. Rush. The last regularly engaged pastor of the church was the Rev. John Knox, who resigned about five months ago (Dec. 1881). Since that time the church has had no preaching at all. The present membership is 26. Those who assisted the church in protracted efforts were such men as Dr. Estep, W. Wood, Sr., George I. and Ed. Miles, Job and Kaleb Rossel, etc.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

There was no Roman Catholic congregation in Western Pennsylvania for many years after its settlement. In the early days of our local history some few emigrants from Germany and Ireland, who still clung to the faith of their fathers, had settled in the East, but it was remarked that even the priests were foreign-born, and that few could speak in English. The rise and growth of the church in that part of the State west of the mountains is especially noticeable from the time of the construction of the great public works, such as the canals, the portage, and the railroads, when the labor was mostly done by those who had lately crossed the ocean hither.

Up until this century was well advanced the little Catholic Church known as the "Hill Church"—that one which preceded the present St. Vincent's—was the Mecca of the faithful for a region of country of which the eastern portion of this county was a large but not the entire part. There are persons still living who remember when this congregation was made up of worshipers who had been gathered together from beyond Blairsville, in Indiana County, to beyond the head-waters of Indian Creek, in Fayette County. But even when so gathered together from such widely-separated distances the congregation was small. In some districts Roman Catholics were so few that each one was known in person. It is with feelings of shame that the majority of intelligent people of the present generation are apt to contemplate the prejudices of their ancestors, most of whom from the force of circumstances knew nothing of the ceremonial of the church, and little of its evangelical doctrines and history but what they got from Fox's "Book of Martyrs."

Among the more liberal, however, such as had little or no bigotry, there is ample evidence to satisfy the inquirer that perhaps there was never a time in our local history when those of a kindred sentiment and who were not held in the bonds of ignorance did not meet on equal ground. The first priests were hospitably entertained at the houses of their German or their Irish Protestant friends. They ate at their tables and lodged under their roofs.¹ Two foreigners meeting had a bond of sympathy outside their religious preferences not known to native-born. Times change, and it is perhaps not worth the saying that now the ceremonies of the many Catholic Churches all over the land are sometimes as well comprehended by Protestant youth as by Catholic youth, although they may in general be more familiar to the one than to the other. To such the Miserere in its matchless eloquence increases the faith of the penitent; in the Office of the Dead the sweet memory of departed friends comes back; to most of them it is known that in the darkness and gloom of Passion Week, through the watches of the nights which ends with that of Good Friday, the deacons chant the office of the tenebræ; and the edifices are crowded on Easter Sundays by a promiscuous crowd, who know that then is celebrated with "mass and rolling music" the memory of the risen Lord. But there was a time when the gown of a Benedictine was thought to hold the incarnate spirit of evil, when the singing of the asperges was in a language never spoken by Christian men, and when a simple countryman would as leave be bitten by a mad dog as get a dip of holy-water.

The history of the Roman Catholic Church in Westmoreland County is so peculiarly connected with the history of Catholicity in Western Pennsylvania, and, indeed, in one respect, with Catholicity in the United States, that it is deserving of a more than ordinary notice at our hands. One observation alone, to a contemplative person, indicates that its annals possess much interest, for the Right Rev. Abbot Wimmer, of St. Vincent's, as known in the hierarchy of the church, was with those prelates who entered the Council Hall of the Basilica, in which met the Ecumenical Council of the Vatican. This prelate, to whom in 1869 was accorded the enviable honor and distinction of joining the procession of cardinals, patriarchs, clerical princes, and notables of the Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church throughout the whole world, was the abbot of a monastery erected on a spot which in 1769 was in the midst of a great wilderness. And this monastery is certainly a place of much interest to our people, and its institution something in which they may well feel an honorable pride.

CATHOLICITY IN WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Before giving a detailed history of Catholicity in Western Pennsylvania we find it expedient to revert to its cradle in the East, namely, to Philadelphia and its vicinity.

The first traces of Catholic worship in Pennsylvania are found in the public celebration of holy mass in Philadelphia in the year 1708, based upon the following quotation from a letter of Sir William Penn, then in England, to his Colonial Governor in America, James Logan: "There is a complaint against your government that you suffer public mass in a scandalous manner. Pray send the matter of fact, for ill use of it is made against me here."² In a subsequent letter he adverts to the same subject, saying, "It has become a reproach to me here with the officers of the crown that you have suffered the scandal of the mass to be publicly celebrated."¹

¹ The inquirer will perhaps be agreeably disappointed to discover how numerous are the family traditions among our early and most influential class of people hearing upon this subject.

² Memoire of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, vol. x.; Penn and Logan Correspondence, vol. ii. p. 294.

The priests celebrating the holy masses in Philadelphia, according to historical documents, could have been no other than the Franciscan Friars Minor, Polycarp Wicksted, or James Haddock.² The former came to America in the year 1674, and died before April, 1725, and the latter arrived in the year 1700, and died in Maryland in or before 1720.

The first Catholic Church that history records in Pennsylvania was St. Joseph's, erected by the Jesuits. Eight of the zealous missionaries with their superior, Rev. F. Segura, came to America in 1570. Betrayed into the hands of hostile Indians by an Indian convert, the treacherous Don Luis, all were murdered without mercy; but forty-six years later two other heroic fathers of the same society, Revs. Andrew White and John Altham, landed in Maryland with Lord Baltimore on March 25, 1634, and were soon followed by other self-sacrificing confrères, one of whom was Rev. Josiah Greacon, whose glorious memory is honored in history for having brought in 1730 from Maryland to the Catholics in Philadelphia the consolation of their religion.³

The number of Catholics in Philadelphia and vicinity at this time cannot be ascertained; but in April, 1757, they amounted to thirteen hundred and sixty-five, scattered over Chester, Philadelphia, Berks, Northampton, Bucks, Lancaster, Cumberland, and York Counties.⁴

Five German Catholic families, for reasons not known, but presumably to better their worldly condition, left these Eastern settlements in the years 1787 and 1788 for Westmoreland County, having previously arranged for the reception of occasional visits and the consolations of religion with priests from the German settlements at Goschenhoppen, Berks Co., Conewago,⁵ and Philadelphia. After leaving their Eastern homes they journeyed through Huntingdon County to Hollidaysburg, crossing the main ridge of the Allegheny Mountains and settled in Unity township, Westmoreland Co. The following are the names of the heads of these families: John Propst, John Jung, Patrick Archbold, Simon Ruffner, Christian Ruffner, and George Ruffner. They were joined in the year 1789 by Mr. Henry Kubn, from Goschenhoppen, Berks Co., Pa. Having settled here and there in Unity township, they went to Greensburg in March, 1789, to buy a lot on which to erect a temporary church and lay out a graveyard. The land, however, was presented to them, as they had only five shillings in cash.

According to agreement, Rev. John Bpt. Causey, a missionary from Conewago, came to Greensburg in the following June to confer upon the few settlers the consolation of their religion. Finding no more suitable locality, he celebrated the mysteries of the Catholic faith in the humble residence of Mr. John Propst, lying on the Pittsburgh turnpike, ten miles east of Greensburg. This was perhaps the first celebration of holy mass west of the Alleghenies, save that at Fort Duquesne, at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, in which a French chaplain celebrated the mysteries of the Catholic religion for the soldiers of this belief in 1754. Father J. Causey's missionary territory was too extensive to allow him much rest, hence he departed on the following day.

These pioneers were also visited by Rev. Peter Heilbron (or Hellbron) in 1787, pastor of Goschenhoppen and vicinity, and in 1789 pastor of St. Mary's parish in Philadelphia. While pastor at Goschenhoppen he laid, in the fall of the aforesaid year, at a place called "Sportsman's Hall,"⁶ in Unity township, Westmoreland Co., the foundation of the first permanent Catholic settlement, on the spot where St. Vincent's Abbey and College now stands. More Catholics soon flocked to this point on account of a Catholic priest residing there by the name of Theodore Brouwers.

This reverend gentleman, a native of Holland, and a Franciscan Friar Minor, came to Philadelphia before August, 1789, and for a time enjoyed the hospitality of Rev. P. Heilbron. The parishioners, hearing that their pastor, Rev. F. Th. Brouwers, had a goodly sum of money to dispose of, tried their best to keep him among them, that the heavy debts on their church might be the sooner removed. Rev. F. Th. Brouwers, however, did not yield to their solicitations, but positively declared his intention of going and erecting a church for Catholics destitute both of means and pastor. Having heard of the poor settlers in Westmoreland County, he resolved to go thither, and before leaving Philadelphia purchased a farm of one hundred and sixty-two acres and forty-three perches in Derry township, on the eastern bank of the Loyalhanna River, designated in the patent as "O'Neal's

¹ Watson's Annals of Philadelphia.

² Rev. A. Lambing. The Catholic Church in the Diocese of Pittsburgh and Allegheny, p. 525.

³ The first Catholic settlement within the bounds of what is now the Northern United States was made in Maryland, March 25, 1634. In 1774 Baltimore was a station, visited once a month by a priest from White-marsh, who brought with him his vestments and altar service. In 1784, Rev. John Carroll, of Maryland, was made superior of the clergy in the United States, and afterwards bishop.

⁴ Rev. A. Lambing, as above. In a map of "Philadelphia and Parts Adjacent" as it was in 1749, and which is hung in Independence Hall, in the list of public buildings is "One Mass House."

⁵ The station at Conewago, northeast of Gettysburg, in York County, was among the first in Pennsylvania. It was established in 1741, and served from that time on. This was the centre of a large region, from which the priests at intervals went out to visit the pioneer families of the faithful, when they slept in the woods, made meals of cold potatoes, and said mass over the rough clapboard tables of their parishioners. Many years after, when they had no churches of their own, it was no uncommon thing for mass to be said, when the priest came, in partibus, in the Methodist meeting-houses. (See "Life of A. D. Gallitzin," by Sarah Brownson, for material used in part of this sketch.)

⁶ "Sportsman's Hall" was the name of the tract of land in the patent.

Victory." Arriving in Greensburg and not finding a suitable residence, he boarded during winter with Mr. Christian Ruffner, who resided about three miles east of the town. Early in the following spring he intended to build on his farm a residence for himself, and a chapel for the Catholics, but finding the land not very fertile and the place too distant from the settlement, he followed the advice of Mr. H. Kuhn, and bought the farm of three hundred and thirteen acres and eight perches, on April 16, 1790, known as "Sportsman's Hall." By the aid of an industrious carpenter he soon reared a humble frame building of seventeen by seventeen feet, one and one-half stories high, which he henceforth inhabited. A few years after a little log house was put up as an addition to the priest's house. Previous to this the confessional and the chapel were in the oratory of the priest who was incumbent. The new building had at first no seats but a few stools for the aged. The young and the middle-aged were required to stand, and expected to kneel upon the floor and bow their heads at the elevation. For a long time there was no stove in the building, so that in winter it is said to have been intolerably cold.¹

The hardships of a trying missionary career, however, soon wore out the zealous priest, and he died prematurely on the 29th of October, 1790, having bequeathed to his successor in the capacity of a duly authorized pastor of this Catholic settlement the properties of "O'Neal's Victory" and "Sportsman's Hall" for his maintenance. Many serious troubles and litigations have in the course of time arisen on account of the two properties, but the settlement became the parent of numerous other congregations, and was long considered a station for colonists going farther West.²

¹ Life of Rev. Gallitzin.

² The desire of Father Brouwers—his name is variously written, Browsers, Brauer, and Brouwers, the first is the English form—in making this purchase was to have it become a residence for devoted priests and the headquarters of the religious, who from it would attend the surrounding missionary stations. With this object he wished to bequeath the land to his spiritual successor, with the injunction that they should say every year one mass for the repose of his soul and three for his intention, but his will was so worded by the person who drew it up that a doubt was left, whence the will fell into litigation, and after running a number of years through the courts of the State, during which time the land was held and used by the regular clergy, it was finally adjudged and determined with due regard to the intention of the testator.

By act of Assembly of March 7, 1827, legalizing this will, the congregation of St. Vincent's Church were made the owners in trust for the use of the pastor of this real estate and appurtenances.

The will is here given verbatim:

WILL OF THEODORAS BROWERS.

In the name of God Amen. I, the Reverend Theodoras Browsers, being weak in Body, but of sound mind, memory, and understanding, and calling to mind the mortality of my Body Do make ordain & constitute this to be my last will and testament, viz., first I recommend my soul to God who gave it, my body to the Earth to be Buried in a decent Christian manner on the Place I now live on Called "Sportsman Hall," and a small neat stone wall to be Built around my Grave. All my Just Debts and funeral Expences is next to be Paid. Item, I give and Bequeath to my Beloved Sister Gartrudæ Browere fifty dollars, all the Many immigrants coming from the East and wishing to settle in Western Pennsylvania followed the above-mentioned route through Huntingdon County to Hollidaysburg, but crossing the main ridge of the Allegheny Mountains, settled in the north of it, in the vicinity of Bellefonte and Huntingdon; others found homes farther south in the vicinity of Newry, whilst a few settled on the route or near it in Sinking Valley and the contiguous region. The Catholics here were attended by Rev. F. O'Reilly, who also erected churches in Newry, Huntingdon, and Bellefonte.

The settlement in Unity township increased in the number of its inhabitants every year, despite the contentions caused by some avaricious men on account of the two properties. These litigations induced Rev. F. Lanigan, a recent arrival in the colony in 1797, to lead a body of men of the same mind as he himself to West Alexander, Washington Co., and there to establish a branch colony; but finding the land unsuitable for agriculture they disposed of it, and moved southeast to Waynesburg, Greene Co. In spite aforesaid Expenses and Legacies is to be paid by my Executor herein after named out of the money I have in the Bank of Philadelphia. Item, all my Horees, Cows and all other Farming Utensils to be left on the Place I now live on for the use thereof until Christian Andrie year ehall expire, then to be sold and the money arising therefrom to be appropriated to the payment of said Chrs. and Wife. And if the aforesaid articles should amount to more than will pay the aforesaid sums the remaining to be applied by my executors to the Payment of the Place. Item, I give and Bequeath all my books Clothing and furniture and all the residue of my Personal estate that shall not otherwise be disposed of to James Pennanc in trust and for the use of the Poor Roman Catholic Priest that does or shall live at the Chapel on Connewagge. Item I Give & Bequeath all my Real Estate, viz., my Place on which I now live Called Sportsman Hall, and one other Tract of Land on Loyalhanna Creek Called "O Neal's Victory" with their appurtenances to a Roman Catholic Priest that ehall succeed me in this said place to be intailed to him and to his successors in trust, and so left by him who shall succeed me to his successor and so in trust for the uses herein mentioned in succession forever. And the said Priest for the time being shall strictly and faithfully say four Masses each and every year forever, viz, one for the Soul of the Reverend Theodoras Browsers on the day of his death in each and every year forever, and three others the following days in each year as aforesaid at the request of the Reverend Theodore Browsers, & furthermore it is my Will that the Priest for the time being shall transmit the land so left him in trust as aforesaid to his successor clear of all incumbrance as aforesaid. And I Do Nominate Constitute & appoint Christian Ruffner & Henry Coons Executors to this my last Will and testament.

R. Mr. Theodore Browsers M [seal].

R. Mr. John Baptist Causo

Signed Sealed Published Pronounced and Declared by the said Theodore Browsers to be his last Will and testament this twenty-fourth day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety. In presence of us Christian Andris, William McGee.

Westmoreland County, ss. Be it remembered that on the fifth day of November came Personally before me Wm. Maghee D. R., for said County of Westmoreland, the R. Mr. John Baptist Causo and Christian Andris and being solemnly sworn agreeably to Law saith they were present and saw the Revd. Mr. Theodoras Browsers, the Testator within named sign seal Pronounce & declare the within Instrument of Writing as his last Will and testament, that at the time of his so doing he was of sound mind memory and understanding to the heet of their judgments. I agree to the above being personally Present.

Wm. Maghee.

Jamee Hamilton, Esq., Reg.

The case is at December term, 1798, Common Pleas, and is captioned thus:

The Lessee of the Executors, &c., of Theodoras Browsers, Dec'd, vs. Franciscus Fromm, Tenant.

of this separation the Unity township colony still remained the largest of all the settlements, and Rev. Peter Heilbron having been appointed pastor of Sportsman's Hall, in the fall of 1799, had under his charge in November of the same year seventy-five communicants.¹

Besides the route mentioned as taken by the first settlers of Westmoreland there was another, followed by some immigrants leaving Conewago, tending south-east to Shade Gap, and turning again into the first route near Hollidaysburg, and thence leading to Unity township, in Westmoreland, or branching off to Loretto, in Cambria County, where they knew there were Catholic Churches.

Some immigrants naturally inclined to mountainous habitations directed their steps to the eastern Allegheny range. The most of these immigrants came from Maryland by way of Bedford, along the eastern slope crossed by the first route. Almost all the colonists of Bedford, Harman Bottom, Loretto, and vicinity came by that way. Loretto especially attracted the attention of immigrants on account of her renowned and illustrious apostle, Dr. Demetrius Augustine Gallitzin.

The fourth route of immigrants into Western Pennsylvania was that offered by the Braddock road. This route, crossing the mountains, extended from Cumberland by way of Uniontown and Youghiogheny River to Pittsburgh. Nearly all the colonists of Armstrong and Butler Counties, the largest settlements of Western Pennsylvania in the beginning of this century, came that way.² Brownsville, the upper Monongahela Valley, and Jacobs Creek were also peopled by the same route, but they attained no great importance for a considerable time, Pittsburgh itself being for a long time very insignificant, and its Catholic population small. The first priest to make his appearance in that town was, in all probability, the Rev. Father Whalen, who had been sent in 1787 by Bishop Carroll, of Baltimore, to the Catholics in Kentucky. The usual road to the West in those early days was by flat-boats down the Monongahela to Pittsburgh and thence down the Ohio.

The following fact, however, proves more conclusively the statistics of the Catholics in Pittsburgh in those early days. Bishop Carroll in May, 1792, ordered a young French priest, Benedict Joseph Flaget, the future Bishop of Bardstown and Louisville, to take charge of the Catholics in Vincennes and its surroundings. Having come to Pittsburgh, he was on account of the high waters of the Ohio detained there six months, during which time he resided with a descendant of the French Huguenots, who had married an American Protestant lady, and was treated most respectfully by both. He said mass daily in his benefactor's residence, instructed the few Catholics of the French tongue, and also the soldiers in Fort Pitt, the headquarters of Gen. Wayne. His charity in tending to the wants of the sick and those of the troops stricken with the pestilential malady of smallpox regardless of creed, and the apostolic zeal which he displayed when four deserters had been condemned to death, one of whom he converted to the Catholic faith, endeared him to the general, as the following evidence proves. Among those four deserters was a French infidel, who refused every religious admonition and service. When their last hour arrived the good priest accompanied his convicts to the place of execution. The condition of his unfortunate countryman so much moved him that he fell into a swoon, which induced the general to grant him the pardon of the impenitent. This noble missionary left Pittsburgh in November in a flat-boat for Louisville.³

Rev. F. Peter Heilbron paid occasional visits to Pittsburgh's few Catholics.⁴

Rev. Dr. Demetrius Aug. Gallitzin found there in 1804 only fifteen Catholics. In October, 1808, however, we find in Pittsburgh a resident priest, Rev. F. X. O'Brian, who laid the foundation of St. Patrick's Church, which appears to have been finished before the close of 1811. This is evidently concluded from the fact that Rt. Rev. Bishop Egan, of Philadelphia, visited the city in the latter part of the year 1811, when it was not entirely finished, for he gave confirmation in a private house. This was the first visit of a bishop to Western Pennsylvania. Father F. X. O'Brian worked zealously in his mission until 1820, when he retired, as it is said, to Maryland. Before coming to Pittsburgh he resided in Brownsville, and was succeeded in Pittsburgh by Rev. Charles B. McGuire.

This reverend gentleman, a native of Ireland, was born Dec. 16, 1770, at Dungannon, Tyrone County. He was a Franciscan Friar by vow, had studied at St.

³ Sketches of the Life of Right Rev. B. J. Flaget, by Rev. M. J. Spalding, D.D., p. 31.

⁴ For a number of years after the death of Father Brouwers, Oct. 29, 1790, his flock was without a shepherd. During the trouble attending the settlement of the will many families intending to join the first settlement about Greensburg discouraged at the religious situation there, or induced by motives of worldly advantage, scattered themselves in the woods from Conewago along to Greensburg. Then Rev. Brosius and Father Pellentz, from the missions in the East, made a few pilgrimages to the settlers on the top of the mountains, and as far as to the families in Westmoreland. Mr. Fromm had in the mean time intruded on the estate left by Father Brouwers, while the Rev. Whalen attended to the spiritual necessities of the little flocks here, living during his short pastorate in the greatest destitution and poverty. In 1799 the bishop of the church had the remote McGuire settlement on the top of the mountains, now Loretto, and Sportsman's Hall, now St. Vincent, provided for, the first by the prince-priest, Demetrius Gallitzin, and the last by Mr. Heilbron. At McGuire's the young priest had, indeed, with the assistance of his parishioners, built "a little lonely church in days of yore," and on the Christmas-eve, when the snow lay waist-deep over all the hills, the heir of a noble house as a priest sang the Gloria in Excelsis in the first mass in the first church of the congregation at Loretto.—See in detail Life of Rev. Gallitzin, quoted supra.

¹ Rev. A. A. Lamhing, "History of the Dioceses of Pittsburgh and Allegheny," p. 25.

² Ibid., pp. 25-27.

Isidore's Monastery in Rome, and had after the completion of his studies occupied a professor's chair. After his arrival in America in 1812, he resided as pastor from 1817-20 at Sportman's Hall, and then moved to Pittsburgh, where the population was increasing, and Father Terrence McGirr became pastor at Sportsman's Hall. While Father McGuire had been charged with pastoral functions in Pittsburgh, he laid the foundation of St. Paul's Church, the present cathedral.

In the year 1828 or 1829 a colony of Poor Clare nuns opened a house of their order in Allegheny. With this colony of nuns came Rev. Vincent Raymacher, O.S.D., as their chaplain. He was succeeded in the fall of 1830 by Rev. A. F. Van de Wejer, of the same order, and assisted Father McGuire, who was in the course of years also assisted by Rev. Anthony Kenny. Father Patrick Rafferty was Father McGuire's assistant in 1830, in which year, about June 26th, Bishop Kenrick and Bishop Conwell passed through the town, according to the "United States Catholic Miscellany." About this time twelve hundred and fourteen persons are recorded as having received the sacrament of baptism during the previous ten years in that mission; forty-three converts had been received into the Catholic Church in 1828, and twenty-seven in the year 1829. Bishop Conwell gave confirmation in St. Patrick's on Sunday, June 27, 1829. Rev. John Grady and Rev. Thomas Gagon were also among Father McGuire's assistants. His active missionary life consumed his bodily strength, and he died in 1833, without having finished his noble undertaking. Rev. John O'Reilly having been his assistant since 1831, succeeded him as pastor and finished the church.

As in Pittsburgh so in many other towns and settlements had churches to be built on account of the increase of the Catholic population and clergy. This increase necessarily demanded suitable government with full jurisdiction. The fifth Provincial Council of Baltimore, convoked May 14, 1843, therefore recommended to the Pope a division of the diocese of Philadelphia, which had been suggested to the Pope in January, 1836, and which now received his approval.¹ The division was confirmed, and Pittsburgh was chosen to be the See of the new diocese, under the title of "Western Pennsylvania," having for its eastern boundary Bedford County. Rev. Dr. M. O'Connor, vicar-general of Pittsburgh and pastor of St. Paul's, was appointed first Bishop, and consecrated in Rome Aug. 15, 1843. He sailed for America November 12th, and arrived in Pittsburgh December 3d.² Soon after his arrival he, taking a census of his whole diocese, found fourteen priests, thirty-three churches, and a Catholic population of about twenty-five thousand.

The Catholic increase was proportionate in the Northwest. The first permanent settlements were made in 1795, under the patronage of the "Pennsylvania Population Company," which was organized in March, 1793. The pioneer settlers repaired the old military roads cut by the French along the shore of Lake Erie, and from Erie to Fort Le Bœuf, while new roads were opened by the agents of the Population Company. In 1805 the Erie and Waterford Turnpike Company was organized, and four years later the road leading from Lake Erie to the Allegheny River at Waterford, a distance of fifteen miles, was completed. These roads connected the lakes on the north with the Ohio River at Pittsburgh, and favored immigration in no small degree. After the departure of the French troops from Fort Le Bœuf in 1759, the country remained in the exclusive possession of the Indians until 1767, when a Moravian missionary, Rev. David Zeisberger, from Wyalusing, penetrated the dense forests of the Northwest, and preached the gospel to the natives. In the following year other missionaries from Bethlehem joining Father Zeisberger, formed a settlement on the banks of the Allegheny. But a war breaking out in April, 1770, among the Indians so endangered their lives that, abandoning their village and huts, they passed down the river in boats, and entering Beaver Creek founded upon its banks a new settlement, which they called Friedenstadt (signifying a town of peace).³

The Northwest becoming by degrees accessible was soon the scene of an almost boundless speculative furor on account of its petroleum springs, which, attracting also the Catholic population, caused settlements to be founded, churches erected, and the number of Catholics increased, and their clergy to be greatly increased. The missionary territory having become too large, Right Rev. Dr. M. O'Connor handed in a petition to Rome for the division of the diocese of "Western Pennsylvania," and for the erection of a new diocese, having Erie City as its Episcopal See. The petition was granted in 1853. The counties of Erie, Crawford, Mercer, Venango, Forest, Clarion, Jefferson, Clearfield, Cameron, Elk, McKean, Potter, and Warren composed its diocesan district, and Right Rev. O'Connor was transferred by his own request to that See in the year 1853, but was returned to his former See by Rome, at the request of the clergy of the Pittsburgh diocese, in the following year, 1854. Rev. J. M. Young, pastor of Lancaster, Ohio, who had been appointed for the See of Pittsburgh, became his successor in the Erie diocese, and was consecrated April 23, 1854.

Right Rev. J. M. Young was a native of Shapleigh, Me., born Oct. 29, 1808, of old New England stock. He became a convert to the Catholic religion while pursuing the avocation of a printer. His zeal, sincerity, and consistency as a Catholic when employed in the Catholic Telegraph office in Cincinnati induced Bishop J. B. Purcell to exhort him to study for the church, and upon the completion of his studies to confer upon him holy orders. He worked zealously for many years in and about Lancaster, Ohio, until he was called to the See of Erie, where he died suddenly, Sept. 28, 1866, in his episcopal residence.¹

¹ Lives of the Deceased American Bishops, vol. i. p. 500.

² Rev. A. A. Lambing, "The Catholic Church in the Diocese of Pittsburgh and Allegheny," pp. 57-60.

³ Sypher's School History of Pennsylvania, pp. 228 to 234.

He was succeeded by Rt. Rev. Tobias Mullen, formerly vicar-general of the diocese of Pittsburgh, who was consecrated Aug. 2, 1868. The Erie diocese counts at present 84 parishes, 11 chapels, and 31 stations where mass is occasionally said. The total amount of the Catholic population numbers 45,000.²

Having viewed the rapid progress of Catholicity in Northwestern Pennsylvania, we return to that part of Western Pennsylvania constituting the diocese of Pittsburgh. The progress of Catholicity here is even greater. That the Rt. Rev. M. O'Connor was ever active in the administration of his diocese is attested by his many labors, and his indomitable will and lofty spirit are particularly evinced by that superb structure known as St. Paul's Cathedral in Pittsburgh, whose grandeur shall mirror to the future the nobility of the man. Cares and anxieties having brought on a softening of the brain, Pope Pius IX. was induced to accept his resignation in May, 1860. After his recovery he entered the Society of Jesus, and died Oct. 18, 1872, at Woodstock, Md., a model of humility and piety. He was born Sept. 27, 1810, near the city of Cork, Ireland. His classical education he received at Queenstown, and his sacred studies he completed at the Propaganda in Rome, where he was appointed after his ordination to the priesthood, June 1, 1833, Professor of Sacred Scriptures and Vice-Rector of the Irish College. Having spent some years in Ireland, he came to America in 1839 to assist Bishop Kenrick, of Philadelphia, in educating young men for the holy ministry at St. Charles Borromeo College, of which he was president until he was appointed vicar-general, and soon after Bishop, of Western Pennsylvania. He was succeeded by Rt. Rev. Michael Domenec, D.D., a native of Spain, and of the Lazarist Order, who was consecrated Dec. 9, 1860. Known for his energy, zeal, charity, and politeness, he was esteemed by all. Finding the yoke of the diocese of Pittsburgh too heavy, he requested the Holy See to divide the diocese and create the new See of Allegheny, comprising that part of Allegheny County north of the Allegheny River, together with the counties of Butler, Armstrong, Indiana, Westmoreland, Cambria, Blair, Huntingdon, and Bedford. This request was granted, and the new diocese confirmed Jan. 11, 1876. He was appointed by Pope Pius IX. first Bishop of that See, whilst Rt. Rev. J. Tuigg, D.D., for many years a zealous missionary in Altoona, succeeded him to the See of Pittsburgh, comprising that part of Allegheny County north of the Ohio and south of the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers, together with Lawrence, Beaver, Washington, Greene, Fayette, and Somerset Counties. Rt. Rev. J. Tuigg was consecrated March 19, 1876. A lawsuit between the two dioceses on account of the financial administration of Rt. Rev. Bishop M. Domenec broke the latter's heart. He died at Tarragona, Spain, Jan. 5, 1878.

That Rt. Rev. Monseigneur was born of wealthy parents in the city of Ruez, near Tarragona, in the northeast of Spain, in 1816. He received his classical education at Madrid, and at a college in the southern part of France, whither he retired on account of the Carlist war. His sacred studies he pursued partly in Paris, where he formed the acquaintance of the Lazarists, whom he afterwards joined, and partly at Barrens Seminary, Missouri. He came to America Oct. 15, 1837, with Rev. J. Timon, Visitor-General of the Congregation, and arrived at Barrens, in Missouri, Feb. 10, 1838. Here he finished his studies, and was raised to the dignity of the priesthood June 29, 1839. Two years later he was sent to Cape Girardeau, where he built a college in 1842. Having returned to the seminary at Barrens, and having been employed in missionary life till 1845, he was with some other Lazarists sent to take charge of the diocesan seminary of Philadelphia. After this he became an active missionary in Nicetown and Germantown, in which latter place he erected a handsome church, when he was called to the See of Pittsburgh, where he worked zealously for eighteen years. The unfortunate lawsuit, which ended in his favor at Rome in January, 1882, under the plea of his Vicar-General, Father J. Hickey, perfected the reunion of the Allegheny and Pittsburgh dioceses, which took place Aug. 3, 1877. The two now form a Catholic population of 125,000, 130 churches, and 44 chapels. Pittsburgh alone, with 22 churches, has a Catholic population of 49,015.

Westmoreland County, the seat of Catholicity in former times, has now become almost the least. The parishes, with the number of Catholics in it, are the following: Chestnut Ridge, 65; Florence, 60; Greensburg, 350; Irwintown, 950; Latrobe, 700; Ligonier, 15; New Derry, 350; Penn Station, 150; Suter's Station, 412; and Sportsman's Hall, now St. Vincent, 750.

St. Vincent, the parent of all the churches in Westmoreland County, Suter's Station alone excepted, is, compared with many others, in the minority as to numbers, but in regard to predominant prerogatives superior to all, as the meaning of its very name ("one being victorious") sufficiently indicates. It adopted that name from the Patron Saint of the church, which Rev. A. Stillinger, from the beginning of November, 1829, the successor to Rev. F. McGirr, erected. Its dimensions were 87 by 51½, and though begun in 1833, was not completed until July 19, 1835, on which day it was blessed by Rt. Rev. Bishop Kenrick. Old age prevented the zealous Father Stillinger from performing his pastoral functions in so extensive a district, and he was therefore transferred at his own request to Blairsville by Rt. Rev. M. O'Connor, Bishop of Pittsburgh, in 1845. His successor at St. Vincent was Rev. F. Gallagher, who transferred the parish in the fall of 1846 to Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer, O.S.B., now mitred Abbot and President of the Americo-Casinsian Benedictine Congregation. This Rt. Rev. and Most Illustrious Prelate made St. Vincent the field of his energetic labors, the success of which the following pages will show.

¹ New History of the Catholic Church, etc., by John Gilmary Shea.

² Sadler's Directory, 1882.

The Benedictine Order was founded by St. Benedict, of Nursia, an Italian, who was born in the year 480. To this order, as is well known to the students of history, the Christianization and consequently the civilization of the largest part of Europe, and especially of England, is due. This fact of itself is sufficient to give us an idea of the debt of gratitude which the world owes to the Benedictine Order. But for it the treasures of science and literature of classic Greece and Latium were lost to us, and it is not easy to see how even the Bible itself could well have been preserved had not the monks of St. Benedict taken care to multiply it by manuscripts. Facts as these must necessarily correct many mistaken views about monkish ignorance and superstition. Many of the flourishing towns and cities of Europe have grown simply from the foundation of a Benedictine monastery, around which people would settle and form a civic community. The spread of Benedictine monasticism thus became a most vital element, as said, in civilizing the nations of Europe. We may add that these monasteries, in times of darkness, superinduced by the flood of heathen nations pouring into Europe from Asia during centuries, were the rallying-points of Christianity, the bulwarks of civilization, the refuge of piety and learning. But especially is it worthy of remark that the influence of Benedictine monasticism was the most potent factor in bringing about a gradual release of the populace from the bonds of slavery.

RT. REV. ABBOT BONIFACE WIMMER, O.S.B.

ST. VINCENT'S ABBEY AND COLLEGE.

This Rt. Rev. Prelate was born Jan. 14, 1809, in Thalmassing, a town near Ratisbon, in Bavaria, and received in baptism the name of Sebastian, being the Benjamin of a large family by two different mothers. Displaying bright talents in early boyhood his parents sent him to a high school in Ratisbon to receive a classical education. After having finished his course of eight academical years with great success, he went to the university in Munich in the fall of 1827 to study jurisprudence. During his philosophical course, however, he changed his mind, and at the close of the year abandoned the law for theology, and was raised to the priesthood on the 1st of August, 1831.

Having been employed for a year after his ordination at Altoetting, in the diocese of Passau, performing pastoral duties, he entered the Benedictine monastery "Metten," in Bavaria, and there received the habit of the order and the name, in religion, of Boniface. Four young priests followed his example, among whom were Gregory de Scherr, the lately deceased Archbishop of Munich, and Rupert Leiss, Abbot of Scheyern, in Bavaria, who has also passed away. After having taken his religious vows, Dec. 29, 1833, he was appointed assistant priest in a town called Edenstetten, near the Abbey Metten, till October, 1835. From October, 1835, till June, 1836, he was employed as professor of St. Stephen's Gymnasium, in Augsburg, when one of the Benedictine fathers of the Abbey Metten dying suddenly, and as their number was still small, he was recalled from the Gymnasium in Augsburg and once more instated the assistant in the town of Edenstetten. But his stay was brief. He was next appointed pastor of Stephansposching, in Bavaria, where he remained two years. Scheyern was reopened about this time, and he was sent there as procurator, and in September, 1840, was promoted to a professorship in the Louis Gymnasium, Munich, to which the aristocratic institute of Mr. Holland was attached. To this was added the office of prefect of discipline, and in the absence of the rector he became his representative.

The number of inhabitants of North America, amounting at that time to about 20,000,000 in the different States, was continually increasing. The German immigrants clamored loudly for Catholic priests, and churches were not to be found sometimes at a less distance than thirty or forty miles.

In order to cover the want of the forsaken Catholics, Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer resolved to establish a Benedictine Abbey in America for educating young men for the priesthood. In general his plan was not well received in Germany, but there were not wanting staunch and influential friends to encourage him in this noble enterprise, and to tender him material aid. The first in rank who gave his approval to this plan was King Louis I., of Bavaria, next the Papal Nuncio Morichini, Bishop Count de Reisach, and the illustrious mystic theologian Joseph Goerres. The "Louis Mission Union," organized for the propagation of faith, also promised its assistance upon the realization of the project. The matter long mooted in private circles finally reached the press, whereupon four students of theology and fifteen young men of different professions offered themselves as willing associates with the reverend gentleman in his noble undertaking.

King Louis I. did not deem such self-sacrificing men unworthy of his royal favors. Example, when set by royalty, is quickly followed, and this was no exception; so the Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer was soon furnished with all the necessaries, and left Munich for America on July 25, 1846, after having assisted at the holy sacrifice of mass, offered up for their success by Bishop Count de Reisach. From Rotterdam they embarked on the steamer "Iowa," and landed in New York Sept. 16, 1846.

A few days were consumed in rest and visits to friends before proceeding farther, during which time they met Rev. Henry Lemke, then pastor of Carrolltown, Cambria Co., Pa., who, having heard from Germany of the intention of Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer and his associates, had come to New York to extend them welcome. In the course of a brief conversation this reverend gentleman offered the colony his property in Carrolltown for a moderate compensation, and persuaded them to his settlement. But before entering into a bargain Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer consulted Bishop O'Connor, of Pittsburgh, and upon his advice he took charge of St. Vincent, forty miles east of the city. His first visit thither disclosed the above-mentioned church, built of brick, a pastor's residence of the same material, a little school-house, and a frail log barn. On Oct. 18, 1846, he and his companions took possession of the place. The foundation of the future monastery was laid Oct. 24th of the same year by the conferring of the religious habit on his subjects. Nineteen were to be invested, and there were only six habits. The difficulty, however, was overcome by the first invested returning to the sacristy and transferring their habits to the next in rank. The same poverty was witnessed at table, some having to wait for the dishes until their companions had taken their repast. Unshaken courage and fervent zeal for the good cause, however, animating all elevated them above the circumstances, and none was found to regret the step he had taken. Their first care was to sow some wheat in the hurriedly cultivated soil for the next year's consumption. In this kind of manual labor the Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer set a most heroic example; he felled many a proud tree, and shrank not from any hardship. Thus his stern steadfastness contributed not a little to animate and encourage the sinking spirits of some when in the next summer all means were exhausted and scarcely a spark of hope remained. But when in the direst extremity a letter came from Munich to St. Vincent, in the beginning of August, 1847, announcing the arrival of Rev. Dr. Peter Lechner, O.S.B., from Scheyern, with a purse of five thousand gulden, a donation from the "Louis Mission Union," with the further promise of a yearly contribution of two thousand gulden in case of success, fear and anxiety gave place to joy and gladness when the reverend gentleman and twenty aspirants to the Benedictine Order arrived on 17th of August at St. Vincent.

The brothers, young and old alike, of that infant monastic body now set to work with redoubled energy, despite of their half-starved condition, and an unshaken trust in the providence of God was ever after their guide and stay.

Their immediate wants being now supplied, the Rev. Superior's attention was next directed to other difficulties almost as trying to his heart. One of these was the lack of priests. He himself was obliged to administer to the wants of Catholics in Greensburg, Saltsburg, and Indiana, Pa., but the labor was too great, the time allotted too short, and the neglect of his monastic family on their account far too serious to be long endured. He therefore raised to the priesthood on the 18th of March, 1847, Martin Geyerstanger, who took the name of Charles in religion, and who had finished his ecclesiastical studies in Germany. This was the first ordination of a Benedictine in America. Rev. Dr. Peter Lechner and the young priest were now his collaborators. The latter having passed away April 22, 1881, a short sketch of his life will, we hope, not be taken amiss.

Rev. F. Charles Martin Geyerstanger, born Nov. 20, 1820, at Salzburg, Austria, was of medium height and broad-shouldered, with a choleric, sanguine temperament. In his active sacerdotal career his services were truly heroic. His childlike simplicity, meekness, and affability won many friends, and zealous as he was, all looked upon him as an angel of peace. Uniform in bearing towards all, even to the unjust, selfish, and proud, he possessed a keen sense of humor and an eccentricity that brought on inconveniences which greater prudence might have avoided. A good theologian and an excellent historian, he was without an equal in sacred liturgy.

The arrival of Rev. Dr. Peter Lechner with the twenty aspirants to the Benedictine Order, although encouraging, incommoded in no slight degree the young monastic family, the buildings being too small for such a number. The Rev. D. Superior therefore commenced the erection of a new one, one hundred by forty feet. The foundation was laid on the 28th of September, 1848. But as the winter had set in early and was unusually severe, the new edifice, barely under way, was provided with a temporary roof, which was so defective that some were compelled, while taking their scanty meals, to protect themselves with the umbrella against rain and snow. They often awoke in the morning covered with snow or drenched with rain. These trials, however, far from discouraging, served but to strengthen their resolution, and their self-sacrificing Rev. D. Superior as ever animated their zeal in the noble enterprise by his glorious example. Hope at length began to dawn, and its resplendent rays, penetrating the mists of a cloudy horizon, became more substantial when the Rt. Rev. Bishop O'Connor, of Pittsburgh, offered to the Rev. D. Superior the administration of Carrolltown, in Cambria County, which was gladly accepted, and the purchase of the property of Rev. H. Lemke was soon consummated. In the same year, 1848, the foundation of the present Priory, of which Rev. Dr. Peter Lechner and P. Charles Geyerstanger took charge, together with the neighboring missions, was laid.

Being now the only priest at home, and the adjacent Catholic settlements again falling under his charge, the Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer had those ecclesiastical students, who had in the mean time finished their studies under his direction, and who, having made their religious vows on April 15, 1849, raised to the priesthood, which was done on the 20th of the same month. They were, however, unequal to the demand, in consequence of which the Rev. D. Superior wrote to the Abbey of Metten, in Bavaria, for assistance, but obtained only one priest. Seeing then the necessity of a seminary on a larger scale for the education of young men aspiring to the priesthood, he, on the arrival of several German students far advanced in their studies, was the sooner enabled to obtain his object. Good prospects led him to found, in the following year (1850), the Priory in St. Mary's, Elk Co., Pa.

The news of this zealous and indefatigable laborer in the Lord's vineyard had in the mean while reached Rome, and Pope Pius IX. raised the young Benedictine colony to the rank of a monastery. This flattering recognition aroused the zeal of the Rev. D. Superior still more, and the demand for priests being now supplied, his paternal heart found another channel in which to direct his energies, namely, to supply the lack of competent Catholic teachers in the different parishes, who would instill into the tender hearts of the young good and sound moral principles. With this view he wrote to the venerable Mother Superior of the Benedictine nuns in Dryopolis (Eichstaett), Bavaria, but only three sisters responded, arriving in St. Mary's, Elk Co., Pa., July 22, 1852. They opened an academy in the same year, and taught the parochial school, and having in the course of time received many novices, now count five hundred members in fifteen convents and thirteen mission-houses located in eleven different States.¹

Prosperity now flourishing throughout the missions, the Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer undertook a journey to Rome in 1854, partly to return his humble thanks to the Sovereign Pontiff for the favors bestowed upon the young colony, and partly to explain matters more fully, in order, if possible, to have the new monastery raised to the dignity of an Abbey, and his journey was not made in vain. His Holiness received him kindly and cheerfully granted his request; and without any voucher, previous election, or petition from his subjects conferred on him the dignity of abbot for three years, a favor in such cases seldom granted. The Pope, moreover, allowed him to propagate, with the consent of the respective Bishops, the Benedictine Order in any diocese of the Union.

Thus favored and empowered he returned to America, and received from his subjects and friends a cordial reception. Such an opportunity for the propagation of his order in other dioceses was soon acted upon on the reception of a kind invitation from the Right Rev. Dr. J. Cretin, Bishop of St. Paul, Minn. On the strength of this invitation he founded a Priory in Stearns County the same year, 1856, and named it St. Louis, in token of gratitude towards his royal benefactor, Louis I., King of Bavaria. This Priory has since through the favor of the Sovereign Pontiff been raised to the dignity of an Abbey, July 17, 1866, with the Rev. D. Rupert Seidenbush, at that time Prior in St. Vincent's Abbey, as its first Abbot, and since June 30, 1875, Bishop of Halia I. P. I., and Vicar-Apostolic of Northern Minnesota. He was succeeded by Rev. D. Alexius Edelbrock, president of St. John's College, which was attached to the Abbey.

When the generous King Louis I. of Bavaria had been informed by Rt. Rev. D. Boniface Wimmer that this Abbey was named after his Majesty, he wrote, having been his regular correspondent, as several letters which are preserved in the archives of St. Vincent show, the following letter, which we shall subscribe in full:

"LEOPOLDSKRON, SALZBURG, Aug. 29, 1867.

"LORD ABBOT P. BONIFACE WIMMER.

"FOR the good wishes tendered me on the anniversary of my birthday, and that of the Saint whose name I bear, contained in your letter dated the 10th, I kindly thank you. I know well how to appreciate the grateful sentiments of the Benedictines in America. It pleased me very much to hear that the new Abbey in Minnesota bears my name. I wish the best prosperity to it, to you, and to the whole Benedictine Order in America.

"With profound esteem, and devoted to you as ever,

"Yours most sincerely,

LOUIS I."

Under such good auspices and wishes the Rt. Rev. Prelate steered forward on the ocean of life with expanded sails for other conquests. Another Priory was erected in Atchison, Kan., under the directorship of Rev. Augustine Wirth, in the same year, 1856, and in time raised to the same dignity. Unforeseen difficulties, however, somewhat retarded his plans. The Rev. D. Augustine Wirth resigned his office, and was succeeded by Rev. D. Louis Fink, who was shortly after promoted to the Episcopal See of Leavenworth, Kan. His successor was Rev. D. Giles Christoph, who was in turn succeeded three years later by Rev. D. Oswald Moosmiller, under whose directorship the Priory prospered until March 23, 1876, when the Rev. Dr. Innocent Wolf, then Prior at St. Vincent, was elected its first Abbot, September 29th, and consecrated October 20th of the same year.

After having accomplished so much, Rev. Boniface Wimmer next turned his attention to the South, and in the years 1876 and 1877 he purchased and established colonies in the States of Louisiana, North Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and later, in the year 1881, at Wetaug, Pulaski, in Southern Illinois, twenty miles north of Cairo. In Georgia he erected on Skidaway Island, near Savannah, an agricultural school for colored boys under the directorship of the able Rev. D. Oswald Moosmiller, who has since built in Savannah for the negroes the Sacred Heart Church, with a Catholic school in the basement frequented by sixty colored children. As their number is daily increasing, he is contemplating the erection of a larger building exclusively for school purposes.

¹ In the year 1853 the Legislature of the State incorporated the monks at St. Vincent under the title "The Benedictine Society of Westmoreland County."

But the path of the kind Abbot Boniface Wimmer was not always strewed with roses. Thorns and thistles often sprouted up to wound his tender heart and disturb the tranquillity of his mind. His term of office, prolonged by Rome, having in the mean time expired, and being accused in Rome, on account of a certain individual of his flock, by name Paul Keck, a religious fraud, of favoring and promoting Spiritualism, he was compelled to take a second journey to Rome in 1865 to free himself of the charge. Having proved to the satisfaction of all the falsity of the accusation, he established in the Eternal City the College of St. Elizabeth, to afford the most talented of his young ecclesiastical students an opportunity for acquiring greater perfection in the sciences, and for attaining honorable academic degrees. About this time, in accordance with a previous election by his subjects, he was confirmed in Rome, July 27, 1866, Abbot of St. Vincent and Praeses of the Benedictines under his charge, forming the Americo-Casinensian Congregation, for life. On his arrival home he received an invitation to the second Plenary Council in Baltimore, which was to begin on the first Sunday in October, 1866; but as the Vatican Council in Rome was announced soon after, he, as Praeses, having an assessment-right and suffrage-vote, was invited to attend, and accordingly set out for Rome a third time, arriving there Oct. 20, 1869. But as the council could not be continued on account of the war between Germany and France, and as the political atmosphere of Rome itself was rather gloomy, he dissolved his College of St. Elizabeth, sending two young priests to the University of Innsbruck, in the Tyrol, to finish their course, and returned with the three others, who had received the diplomas of Doctors, to St. Vincent. Previous toils and the effects of old age now began to tell upon his constitution, though he was still unceasingly active in the interests of his order, of his Monasteries and Abbeys, and for the welfare of the Catholic Church in America. To him is due the first impulse of the now past-celebration of the fourteenth centenary of the Benedictine Order. The principal celebration of the feast-giving epoch in the history of the Benedictines was announced to take place on Pentecost, in 1880, at Monte Casino, in Italy, the shrine of St. Benedict, the founder of the Benedictine Order. On that occasion the Rt. Rev. Prelate went to Rome for the fourth time, and reopened the College of St. Elizabeth in the Eternal City. Shortly after his return to St. Vincent, he sent to Rome, on Sept. 30, 1880, four young men, two priests and two clerics, who were joined by two more in the fall of 1881, and placed them all under the directorship of Rev. D. Adalbert Mueller, Phil., Dr. L., who was provided with an introductory letter to His Eminence Cardinal Simeoni, Prefect of the Propaganda. His Eminence replied in the following terms:

"RT. REV. SIR:

"Your letter of September 29th has been received, and perused with exceeding joy upon the intelligence of your having sent to Rome two priests and two clerics to study philosophy and theology. It affords me great pleasure to offer you my congratulations and to confer upon you the well-merited praise, for I think that you have done a very good work for the Church in America by opening for your monks a house where they are enabled to attain a greater perfection in their sacred studies. Rightly and meritoriously you acted, for from here are drawn purer Apostolic traditions of the Church, and as Rome is the head of Catholicity and the See of the Roman Pontiff, doctors of the highest note from every quarter of the globe make it their abode. I hope, therefore, you will reap richer fruit, and, if possible, that more young clerics from the United States shall come to Rome to finish their philosophical course, and become more proficient in sacred discipline. The Catholic Church would then surely shine with greater lustre in America. But as far as you are concerned, you have done a good work, and I will pray to God that he may preserve you long.

"ROME, AT THE PROPAGANDA, Jan. 2, 1881.

"Your devoted brother,

"JOHN CARD. SIMEONI, Prefect.

"J. MASOTTI, Secretary."

"RT. REV. BONIFACE WIMMER, Abbot, O.S.B., "Westmoreland.

Having viewed the venerable prelate's tireless life in many States and climes, let us now turn our attention to the home of his labors, St. Vincent. If the progress of the order was rapid and material abroad, it was no less so at home. The old frame barn has been replaced by a new one built of brick, two hundred and twenty-two by sixty-seven feet, and the arrangement of this huge structure, under the immediate supervision of Ven. Brother Andrew Binder, is complete in every detail. The brewery and a flour-mill, with three stones, are well known. The old parochial residence, forty by forty feet, has given place to an Abbey of four hundred by two hundred and ten feet, which, though not in the latest or best style, is withal commodious and well adapted to its purpose. The Seminary, small and deficient in many respects when founded in 1848, was advancing slowly but surely under Rev. D. Alphonse Heimler, until it attained perfection under the directorship of the Rev. Dr. Hilary Pfraengle, which the qualifications of the board of professors and great crowd of students, to the number of three hundred and fifty, yearly testify.

On the 24th of August, 1855, Pope Pius IX., by Apostolic Brief, erected the religious community at St. Vincent into an Abbey, the effect of which action was to give to the community a well-defined status in the ecclesiastical organization of the Catholic religion, and to raise its Superior to the dignity of a Prelate, which is a dignity somewhat akin to that of a Bishop. By an act of the Assembly of Pennsylvania of April 28, 1870, the institution was incorporated with the power of conferring academical degrees. The course of studies is the theological, classical, and commercial. The college possesses a large library of sixteen thousand volumes, a chemical and philosophical cabinet, a herbarium of fourteen thousand species, a collection of shells, fossils, and a coin collection of five thousand rare specimens.

Art, too, has found a fostering influence in the young Ahbey, and has been cultivated by prominent professors, as the many paintings in the art gallery and at the different Priors attest. A photographic atelier is numbered among the latest additions to St. Vincent. Art-joinery there in the different styles of altars, by Ven. Brother Cosmas Wolf, has attained a high state of perfection, as those in St. Vincent, in the convent of the Franciscan Sisters in Covington, Ky., and in St. Francis' Church in Cincinnati, and in many other cities and towns plainly certify.

The musical acquirements of many of the professors are known far and wide, and some have even received the flattering appellation of virtuosos.

Ranking next to art and science, and closely connected with the latter, is the printing department. This was from its very beginning the favorite idea of the Venerable Prelate, though not realized till the year 1865, when a printing-machine was procured, which has ever since been of the greatest service. For some years back it has kept three type-setters continually busy, and is presided over by the Very Reverend D. Sebastian Arnold. With this is connected a book-binding establishment, in which two men are constantly engaged.

Tradesmen of all kinds are found among the Benedictines. The tailoring department is run by four very diligent men, under the direction of a worthy Brother. In the shoe-shop three brothers ply the awl and last from morn till night, and are sometimes, as is often the case with the tailors, unable to satisfy the demands of the inmates of the Ahbey and College. A harness-maker is kept busy doing justice to himself and trade. Carpenters and masons, black-, tin-, and locksmiths always have their hands full of work. Bakery and hutchery are carried on by the Ahbey's own inmates, and cannot be less active, considering the great number of students, its own members, and the never-diminishing number of wayfarers.

All these achievements owe their origin to the Venerable Prelate, and their culmination and mystical sanctification to the open and disinterested religious tendency which he has sown in the hearts of his subjects from the day he invested the first nineteen in the habit of the order. This tendency, or, more strictly, spirit, based upon the evangelical counsels, is identical with that of their founder, the great St. Benedict. In virtue of these counsels the Venerable Prelate, Boniface Wimmer, is by ecclesiastical authority the spiritual father and physician, the teacher and high priest of his flock with plenary jurisdiction. This he kindly exercises over those subjects under his immediate care, resident in thirteen States of the Union, numbering 106 priests, 1 deacon, 35 clerics in minor orders, 11 novices, 116 lay-brothers, and 85 scholastics, together with 8 Priors, 17 parishes, and 14 missions. Adding to these the Abbey of St. Louis (having lately changed its name to St. John B.), in Minnesota, St. Benedict, in Atchison, Kan., and St. Malachy, in Iowa, with their Priors and parishes, whose founder and Praeses is the Venerable Prelate, we have his whole work spread over sixteen States, counting 3 abbeys, 1 independent Priory, 11 depending Priors, 45 parishes, and 43 missions, all of which contain 151 active priests, 60 clerics, 19 novices, 177 lay-brothers, and 150 scholastics. The number of the parishioners under the care of the Benedictines in the United States is about 42,000. Their colleges, in which are taught the different arts and sciences, are 6, and the number of pupils frequenting them every year average 500. The number of priests having completed their studies at St. Vincent alone, comprising regulars and seculars, is about 400. The catalogues of the different years contain many names of students who are now prominent lawyers and physicians, esteemed clerks and respectable citizens. They all proudly acknowledge St. Vincent as their "alma mater," and profoundly reverence, duly respect, and sincerely love her founder and their benefactor, the Rt. Rev. and Most Illustrious Prelate, Lord Boniface Wimmer, O.S.B.¹

ST. XAVIER'S CONVENT AND SEMINARY.

The Convent and Young Ladies' Academy of St. Francis Xavier, being the religious house and seminary of the Sisters of Mercy, is situated about three miles from Latrobe, in Unity township, Beatty being its post-office and railroad station, and St. Vincent its telegraph-office.

The Order of Mercy was founded by Catherine McAuley, in the city of Dublin, Ireland, in the year 1831. This generous and philanthropic lady was endowed by nature with qualities of rare value of both mind and heart, which fitted her for the important mission she was called upon to fill. As soon as she came into the possession of her ample fortune she hastened to relieve the suffering and distress of her own neighborhood. A few years' experience showed her how much she might be able to do in preserving the innocent, reclaiming the erring, and instructing the ignorant by assembling around her a few pious and educated ladies who could aid her in the good work, her own means being sufficient for the building of a school, an orphan asylum, and a home for destitute servant-girls when out of situations. These buildings were erected in Baggot Street, Duhlin. Soon Miss McAuley was joined by several young ladies, who were attracted by the good works they saw carried on in their midst. These pious ladies now began to visit the sick in their houses as well as in the hospitals. The Archbishop of Duhlin being greatly pleased with the good accomplished by the little congregation, and wishing to make it permanent, advised Miss McAuley and two of her companions to retire to a convent and make a novitiate, after which they made the three vows of poverty, charity, and obedience, assumed a ¹ We are under obligation for courtesies and favors to Rev. Father Paulinus, O.S.B., and Rev. Father Aug. Schneider, O.S.B., of St. Vincent, for much assistance herein.

Exact Front View.

ST. XAVIER'S ACADEMY,
UNITY TOWNSHIP, WESTMORELAND CO., PA.

religious dress, and returned to their duties in Baggot Street. Miss McAuley, now Sister Mary Catherine, drew up rules and constitutions for their government, which were confirmed by the Holy See in July, 1841. This last act placed the Order of Mercy among the religious orders of the Catholic Church. In a few years so rapid was the spread of the order that it had houses in almost every part of the world.

In June, 1841, Rev. M. O'Connor, D.D., was appointed pastor of St. Paul's Church, on Grant Street, Pittsburgh. He labored zealously for two years in his new mission, when he obtained permission to visit Rome, where he hoped to enter the Society of Jesus, and thus realize the desire of his earlier years. In this he was disappointed, as Pennsylvania had in the mean time been divided into two dioceses, and Pittsburgh named as the new See, for which Dr. O'Connor was appointed first Bishop. Disappointed in his hopes, and grieved at his elevation, he humbly submitted to the appointment of the Holy See, and was consecrated Bishop on the 15th of August, 1843. The new diocese was well known to its Bishop; he had seen during his pastorate at St. Paul's the great need of instruction and education for the growing population; therefore he resolved to bring with him on his return a foundation of a religious order devoted to the training of youth. For this purpose he visited Ireland, and seeing the new Order of Mercy suited to the wants of his people, he obtained a foundation of seven Sisters. These generous ladies had farewell to the land of their birth, and immediately set sail for the New World, encouraged by the hope of leading to God or aiding in their journey heavenward the children of the far West. On the morning of December the 21st, 1843, the sun arose for the first time on the Sisters of Mercy in Pittsburgh. They received a cordial welcome from the leading members of St. Paul's congregation, and a suitable house was arranged for their temporary use. In the course of a few months the daughters of some of the first families in the twin cities became acquainted with the Sisters, and, being pleased with their mode of life, sought permission to join them in their good works. The first candidate that entered the Order of Mercy in the United States was Miss Eliza J. Tiernan, of Allegheny City. This young lady brought to the little community rare virtue, bright accomplishments, and a liberal fortune, all of which were most acceptable, and enabled the Sisters to extend their usefulness. Several other young ladies following the example of Miss Tiernan, a school was opened on Penn Street, and later on the Sisters rented the then well-known "Concert Hall," which they fitted up for an hospital. The next year they took charge of an orphan asylum.

Although all these benevolent works had been undertaken within the short space of eighteen months, yet there were some Sisters waiting an opportunity to establish another school. In the spring of 1845, Henry Kuhn, an old gentleman from the central part of Westmoreland County, Pa., called on the Sisters and offered them a farm on very liberal terms for the purpose of establishing an academy for young ladies. Encouraged and directed by the hishop, their true friend, the Sisters accepted the conditions, as the academy would supply a want which was much felt in Western Pennsylvania. The farm lay forty miles east of Pittsburgh, on the line of the Pittsburgh and Philadelphia turnpike, a favorable circumstance before the construction of railroads. A more beautiful location could not be desired, as the surface was unbroken, and sloping gradually towards the morning sun. There were, however, no buildings on the farm, so the pastor of St. Vincent's Church, which was about a mile distant, generously offered his residence for the temporary accommodation of the Sisters and their first pupils, whilst he located himself in the sacristy of the church. Thus was formed the nucleus of the academy since known as St. Xavier's. The first pupils were Misses N. Shoemaker, of Ehensburg; S. Myers, A. and A. McCaffrey, of Pittsburgh; A. and P. Ihmsen, M. and E. Mulvaney, of Birmingham.

The infant academy began to attract attention, and several new pupils applied for admission, which made it necessary to procure more ample accommodations. In the autumn of 1845 preparations were commenced for building on the farm. As their means were limited the Sisters could not attempt to build on a grand scale. They therefore contracted for a plain three-story building, which in after-years would stand as the right wing of a more imposing edifice. The site of the new building was most favorably chosen, as it commanded an extensive view of the Chestnut Ridge, with its irregular outlines, causing an enchanting variety of light and shade to cling around its forest-clad summit, with the fertile valley of the Loyalhanna as a foreground.

All things being prepared, the building was commenced early in 1846, and to the great joy of both Sisters and pupils its progress was so rapid that the closing year found it near completion. When the bright spring days of 1847 brought forth the huds and hlossoms, the Sisters took their youthful charge out for a ramble in the fields and a visit to the new building. What was their delight to find that in a few days it would be ready for their accommodation. The transfer was now the all-absorbing topic at recreation. May the 14th, the anxiously looked for day, dawned bright and beautiful, and after an early breakfast the work of transportation began. Some of the kind neighbors lent their wagons to aid in the moving; towards noon a procession might have been seen wending its way towards the new academy, and before the sun went down the Sisters and the pupils were settled in their new home, which, in honor of the apostle of the Indies, received the name of "St. Francis Xavier."

The increased accommodation was appreciated by the patrons of the institution, and the opening of the next session found many new pupils added to the little band of the previous year. About this time a permanent standing was given to the new institution by the incorporation of the Sisters under the title of "The Sisters of Mercy" by the Legislature of the State.

More care had been taken to procure a good view than pleasant recreation-grounds, for the academy was located in a field without a tree to shelter it from the summer sun, while on the adjoining farm only a few rods distant stood a charming grove of original forest-trees. This luxury, so near at hand and yet impossible of attainment, caused the young ladies to feel their own privation all the more keenly. Shade-trees had, it is true, been planted, but what were these diminutive saplings compared with the lordly oaks and giant maples of the grove, many of which had seen two hundred summers, and no doubt had formed a shelter for the red man ages before? This trial was not of long duration; the farm with the tempting grove was offered for sale in the year 1852, and although the funds of the corporation at the time were inadequate to the undertaking, yet as the advantage was so important and the time of payment extended, the farm was purchased. Soon the boundary fence was removed, and the grove with all its attractions added to the recreation-grounds. Where nature had been so lavish, it was an easy matter to render the surroundings of the academy what they have often been termed by visitors, "a little Paradise."

About this time the Pennsylvania Railroad was completed, uniting the eastern with the western part of the State, and passing within two miles of St. Xavier's, rendering it easy of access from the principal cities of the State. Two or three additions were made to the buildings, which were needed for the increasing number of pupils. In 1861 a chapel was contracted for at a cost of about $40,000, the basement of which was to serve as a hall for the academic commencements. Owing to the scarcity of laborers during the Rebellion the chapel was not completed until 1866. In the mean time a neat two-story building, known as the Guest House, was erected, about three hundred yards distant from the academy, for the accommodation of the pupils' friends when visiting them during the year.

The academy grounds were artistically laid out, and many improvements made in the appearance of the institution, when, in the space of one short afternoon, there was nothing left of the vast pile of buildings, including the beautiful chapel, but smouldering ruins. At 2 P.M., Feb. 1, 1868, the terror-stricken cry of fire rang through the academy, and large volumes of flame were already rolling out from the roof of the middle building. The directress immediately collected the pupils and left the building in safety. Every effort was made to save a part of the building, but in vain, no water but that furnished by ordinary pumps being on the premises. The neighbors, on seeing the fire, ran to the rescue, and through their kindness a great amount of bedding and household furniture was saved, as well as sixteen pianos. The young ladies' trunks and wardrobes were all preserved through the untiring exertions of the Sister under whose charge they had been placed. Nothing was saved in the Sisters' part of the house, as every effort was directed to the well-being of the pupils and the preservation of their effects. The weather being intensely cold, and the snow unusually deep, the scene of desolation was most distressing. Night was coming on, so nothing remained to be done but to procure as many sleds as possible and take the Pittsburgh children to the station to meet the night train. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company kindly gave free transportation to Sisters and pupils, and placed their carriages at the disposal of the frightened wayfarers to convey them to the convent in Webster Street, where they remained until the following morning. As many as the Guest House could accommodate remained there and had a miniature academy on a very homelike plan. The Sisters saw the labor and gathering of years swept away in a few hours, and, what was more to be regretted, their insurance was very light, only $20,000, while the chapel alone cost $36,000.

Great sympathy was manifested by all classes for the Sisters' loss, and substantial encouragement given to rebuild the academy, as liberal donations were made to a building fund by the friends of the ill-fated institution. The Sisters sold some property, which brought a good price, and also made arrangements for a loan of money when needed, so that no delay might arise in the progress of the building. By the 1st of March all things were in readiness for the commencement of a new building, to take the place of the one just swept away. The plans were drawn by J. W. Kerr, the architect of Pittsburgh City Hall. The new structure was to be erected on the site of its predecessor, to be semi-Gothic and of irregular outline, with a front to the east of seventy-four feet by forty feet deep. Left wing, running northwest, one hundred and seventy feet by forty-four; right wing, running south, one hundred feet by fifty. The chapel to connect with the front building and run parallel with the left wing. This portion of the building was to be Gothic, seventy-four feet by thirty-four, the foundation to be prepared with those of the other building, and the edifice erected in the future. The estimate for its completion was $20,000, and that of the academy $100,000.

Work commenced early in April, and was vigorously carried on during the following summer, when from sixty to eighty workmen were engaged in its erection. September, 1869, saw the new academy ready to accommodate the pupils at the usual time for resuming studies. Each part of the institution having been arranged to suit its intended purpose, and the whole building erected at once, gave it a perfection of which the old one could not boast, and added much

East and Northwest View.

ST. XAVIER'S ACADEMY,

(Under the charge of Sisters of Mercy.)

UNITY TOWNSHIP, WESTMORELAND CO., PA.

to the convenience and comfort of the pupils. The chapel was erected in 1870, which completed the replacement of the buildings swept away by the fire of Feb. 1, 1868.

The new academy received the same liberal patronage that favored its predecessor. Although the number of boarding-schools had been increased in Western Pennsylvania, yet the spacious study hall and ample class-rooms of the academy are graced by a goodly number of the daughters of influential families, not only of this State but of various other States. The academy continues to impart a solid English education, together with a knowledge of the languages and fine arts, and to prepare its pupils to go forth accomplished members of society. Many of the pupils of St. Xavier's may be found in different parts of the country filling with credit the various positions which only an educated Christian lady can advantageously fill. A few return to their alma mater and join their teachers in the various works of mercy peculiar to their mode of life. Of their efficient services to suffering humanity the sick and wounded soldiers of the civil war have had sufficient proof, as many of the Sisters who ministered to their wants in the Stanton and Douglas Hospitals of Washington and the West Penn Hospital of Pittsburgh were graduates of St. Xavier's.

The museum of the academy contains a well-arranged collection of minerals, embracing different ores and rock-forms, some handsome cameos and mosaics, a fine selection of quartz crystals, Amazon stones, spars, etc., besides fossils of different ages, and a valuable set of coins and medallions. For these the institution is indebted to its friends. It also possesses a fine library, comprising many of the standard works of English literature, besides several book-cases filled with encyclopædias, books of reference, etc., so placed as to be accessible to the various classes at suitable hours. The most of these works have been the gifts of the reverend clergy of this and other dioceses.

The course of studies, according to the last prospectus of the academy, embraces the various branches of elementary training, together with those which constitute the higher departments of a finished education. Reading, writing, astronomy, algebra, chemistry, history, geology, geometry, belles-lettres, book-keeping, practical and rational arithmetic, geography, grammar, rhetoric, botany, natural and moral philosophy, vocal and instrumental music, logic, French, German, Italian, Latin, drawing, painting, plain sewing, etc. Music, singing, drawing, French, German, Italian, Latin, wax-work, and ornamental needle-work are extra branches, and will be taught at the option of the parents. Letters written or received by the young ladies are examined by the directress previous to their delivery. The scholastic year commences September 1st, and terminates on the 1st of July. It is divided into two sessions. If a pupil be removed before the close of the session for which she has entered full payment will be required for the whole, except in case of sickness.

CHAPTER XLII.

THE PRESS AND LITERATURE.

The "Pittsburgh Gazette"—"Farmer's Register," the first paper printed in Greensburg—"The Greensburg and Indiana Register"—"The Westmoreland and Indiana Register"—"The Westmoreland Republican and Farmer's Chronicle"—"Greensburg Democrat"—"Republican and Democrat"—"Westmoreland Democrat"—"The Greensburg Gazette"—"Greensburg Gazette and Farmer's and Mechanick's Register"—(And again) "The Greensburg Gazette"—"The Westmoreland Intelligencer"—"The Sentinel"—"The American Herald"—"The Tribune"—"Tribune and Herald"—"The Pennsylvania Argus"—"Frank Cowan's Paper"—"The Democratic Times"—"The National Issue"—"The News"—"The Greensburg Press"—"The Evening Press"—German Newspapers: "The Star of the West"—"The Westmoreland News"—"The Ligonier Free Press alias 'The Valley Democrat'"—"Mount Pleasant 'Literary Gazette'"—"Latrobe Inquirer"—"Latrobe Advance"—"The Reveille"—"The Irwin Spray"—"The Irwin Chronicle"—The West Newton "Weekly Cycle"—"The West Newton Press"—"The Scottdale Tribune"—"The Miner's Record"—Oddities—Observations—Extracts—Literature—Dr. Frank Cowan's Publications.

ABOUT the time the old court-house was completed, and before the town of Greensburg was made a borough by incorporation, the printing-press—the light and the life of modern civilization—made its appearance. The occasion was favorable, for up to that time the only printing-office in Western Pennsylvania was the office of Scull & Hall, the proprietors of the Gazette, at Pittsburgh. John Scull and Joseph Hall established the Pittsburgh Gazette and issued their first number on the 26th of July, 1786. At their office all the printing which was done in the West was executed. The writs used in court, the summons and executions used by the justices, sale bills were printed at their office until one was established at Greensburg.

The Farmer's Register was the first venture in newspaper literature west of the mountains after the establishment of the Pittsburgh Gazette. The first number made its appearance about the beginning of the year 1798, and it was published and edited by John M. Snowden. A man by the name of McCorkle was said to have had some connection with the paper, and to have been associated with Snowden, but most probably he was the printer only, and had nothing to do with the paper either as proprietor or manager. Mr. Snowden was a native of Philadelphia, and his venture here was not unprofitable. He disposed of the paper to William S. Graham about 1808. He remained in the county till some time after that, and was elected to serve several offices of trust. He removed hence to Pittsburgh, where in 1812 he succeeded J. C. Gilleland in the management of the Sunday Mercury, the ancestor, as one might say, of the Pittsburgh Post. He was a professional printer. He was uncle of John M. Laird, Esq., the Nestor of the Westmoreland press of our day, and under him Mr. Laird served his apprenticeship in the printing business.

The paper continued to be called the Farmer's Register till 1808, when the name was changed to The Greensburg and Indiana Register, and again later to The Westmoreland and Indiana Register. The occasion of this was the increasing circulation of the paper in Indiana County, and the fact that it was the medium for the public advertisements of that county. As the headings were of movable types, and as these types were sometimes used in job-work, the arbitrary title of the paper was not infrequently so of necessity, which occasion was usually explained by an apology. In the issue of July the 9th, 1812, it was explained that, from having been disappointed in receiving the proper kind of type, they had to change the name to Greensburg instead of Westmoreland. For extra jobs they had to use the head-line of the paper.

The mechanical part of the paper was good; the type was large and distinct, and the earlier volumes had the old-fashioned ff. The paper material was heavy and durable, and the few old copies extant, notwithstanding the sear and yellow withered leaves of age turning, as they are, into irrecoverable dust, are well preserved. In 1811 the paper was printed on paper manufactured at the paper-mill of Markle & Doum, on the Sewickley, twelve miles west of Greensburg, which had then but recently been built.

The paper in size was nine and one-half inches by thirteen inches. There were four pages of four columns each in clear type and closely set. The price of subscription was two dollars and a quarter per year. The news was mostly made up of foreign intelligence, or of reports of Congress, and of new treaties with the Indians. Each number contained about five columns of advertisements, and, on an average, one column of short extracts from exchanges. Under the head of news were given Jefferson's addresses, report of the trial of Aaron Burr for treason, sickness of Bernadotte, and a new battle gained by Bonaparte. There were no professional cards among the advertisements, but there was a standing notice that rags would be taken at the highest market price in payment for the subscription to the paper. What might be called editorials were scarce. The political and social course of the paper was shaped by articles in the form of correspondence, so that an editor might make an attack on a political opponent or cry down an evil under some nom de plume. But besides these collections there were papers and contributions on political subjects of from five to seven columns. Findley wrote incessantly for the paper from the time of its establishment, and it was suspected that he helped to carry it on, not only with his influence but with his money. The paper politically was Jeffersonian-Republican, and the articles which Findley furnished for electioneering purposes were in vindication of his political career. These were sometimes addressed to his constituents, explanatory of his course in Congress in reference to the embargo and on the prospect of war with Great Britain. William S. Graham, purchasing the establishment from Snowden in the beginning of 1808, continued its publication after changing its name to the Westmoreland and Indiana Register. Graham was something of an enterprising man, and besides publishing from time to time cheap works, as "The Constitution of the United States" and "Watts' Hymns" in sheep, he kept a collection of books, pamphlets, and stationery on sale. Here could be purchased "Valentine and Orson," and "The Englishman's Right, or a Dialogue between a Barrister-at-Law and a Juryman."¹ But the young student who wanted "Robertson's History," and the young miss who wanted the poems of Ossian, had to send with Randall McLaughlin or some of the store-keepers when they went East.

From 1812 a change may be noticed in the style of the paper. Interspersed with editorial notes of from twelve to twenty lines are seen an account of the red-haired fat boy, of the hog that told fortunes and cast accounts, the latest antidote for the bite of a mad dog, and a description of the execution of eight negroes at one time somewhere in the South. About this time appeared the first advertisements of patent medicines: The Elixir of Perpetual Adolescence, and Doctor Blank's Anti-Bilious Compound. Invalids were cured by the big words. By such slow degrees have we arrived at our present civilization.

The style of such articles as were original was usually more dignified and conventional than one would look for in a newspaper now. But there are many defects in them compared with our papers, and more than one hiatus. We look in vain for mention of matters of interest to us; such, for instance, as a biographical notice on the death of Truby or Hanna, a description of the early town, who were building the latest houses, and when the old court-house was completed; such notices, in short, as make the very being of a country paper. The expenditures of the county were, it is true, published in the current numbers, whence we get the information that the expenses for the year 1808 were $7165.12, and that John B. Alexander received one hundred dollars for his year's salary as clerk to the commissioners.

As there were no regular mails for many years after the paper began to be published, and then at first only along the old State road and turnpike, the subscribers had to make such arrangements as they could agree upon to have their papers forwarded to them. The bundle for a community was usually left at some store, where the subscribers called for them. In 1812, on the establishment of a post-route from Bedford to Greensburg, it was stated that the subscribers on that route could now be served by mail.

The Westmoreland and Indiana Register continued to be published by Graham till his death in 1815, when it was carried on by his widow, Mrs. James Graham,¹ with the assistance of Mr. Peterson and Mr. Underwood respectively as foremen, till September, 1818, when it was transferred to other owners and the name changed. The identity of the Register ended at that time, but as it was the paper upon which the subsequent series of Democratic papers was founded, its existence was perpetuated in them.

¹ This valuable and instructive little work may be found as an appendix to Binu's "Justice."

The Register did not purport to be a political paper, although it is apparent now that its leaning was in one direction. In 1811 the first political paper ostensibly such was established by the Federalists, and called the Greensburg Gazette. In 1818 the Democrats resolved on having a paper for party purposes, and some of the leaders forming a company, with Frederick A. Wise as manager, purchased the Register, which, in a new dress, made its appearance in the first week of April, 1819, as The Westmoreland Republican and Farmer's Chronicle.

Frederick A. Wise had been born and brought up in Greensburg, but at that time was working in Baltimore at the printing trade, which he had learned. He took charge of the paper with the understanding that he was to be the sole manager, and also the owner and manager, on the repayment of the purchase money to the joint-stock company which had bought the Register. Of the paper Mr. Wise continued editor till 1830, when it was sold to Joseph Russell, Esq. In 1841, Mr. Russell took in partnership David K. Marchand, Esq., a practical printer; in April, 1844, Mr. Marchand became sole editor and proprietor, and continued as such until July, 1856, when he sold an interest to Andrew Graham, a farmer of Ligonier Valley, and something of a local politician and office-holder. In 1861, Mr. Graham became sole editor and proprietor. Mr. Graham continued in the management only till Jan. 1, 1862, when James F. Campbell & Co. succeeded Mr. Graham as proprietors of the Republican. Under this management it remained but a short time. In January, 1863, James F. Campbell retiring, it became the property of William A. Stokes, Esq., a prominent member of the bar, and an officer for a time in the regular army, but whose tastes followed the profession of the pen rather than that of the sword. Mr. Stokes had contributed very extensively to the paper previously to the time when it passed to Campbell & Co., and had been responsibly connected with it during the time it was carried on under that management, he being the "company." He then published the Republican until August, 1864, when he sold it to Mr. W. W. Keenan, then proprietor of the Greensburg Democrat, who combined the two establishments into one.

As the Republican exists in the Westmoreland Democrat of to-day, we shall here give the history of the Democrat prior to the consolidation of those two papers, and then from that time the history of that one which was formed out of both.

The first number of

THE GREENSBURG DEMOCRAT

made its appearance November the 18th, 1853.² E. J. Keenan and John Klingensmith, Jr., were editors and proprietors. The paper had been established to represent and give expression to that wing of the Democracy which advocated the renomination of William Bigler to the governorship, and which indorsed his administration. This was the second time in the political history of the county that a newspaper had in heated occasions been established as a party organ. As the other two papers which were devoted to the cause of that party—the Argus and the Republican—were at that time opposed to the re-election of Mr. Bigler and were committed to his defeat, and as the paper was established with the object stated, its advent was heralded with many marks of displeasure by the press whose policy it opposed, by great gratification by its friends in the faction whose interests it represented, and by the approbation and encouragement of the opposition, whose best policy was to give it notoriety. Besides this the gentlemen at the head and back of the paper were well known throughout the county, and had become personally identified with the Democratic party in all local issues and interests.

The salutatory was novel in its way. Under the caption "Liberty of the Press" the editors in this leader struck out in an entirely new vein. The writer, after proclaiming their devotion to the principles of the Democratic party, declared that their course should be independent of all cliques and factions. The editorial and business management of the paper was conducted by E. J. Keenan, Esq. The paper from the first evidenced labor and talent.

Mr. Klingensmith died in 1854, and the paper then passed into the hands, as it had really till that time been under the control, of Mr. Keenan. By him it was published and edited till the commencement of 1857, when William W. Keenan, Esq., brother of E. J. Keenan, became the local editor and manager. In 1857 the style of the management was E. J. Keenan & Bro. In June, 1858, it was purchased by James Keenan & Co., James Keenan then being the ostensible head of the paper, and his brother representing the company. James Keenan, Esq., was at that time United States consul at the port of Hong Kong, China; and the paper, so far as its practical management was concerned, was still conducted by his brothers here, and was the same as it had been before that. James Keenan died in 1862; his brother, E. J. Keenan, had entered into the active service of the United States in the army; and William W. Keenan became entire and sole manager and editor of the paper.

² In the prospectus for this paper it was originally called the Westmoreland Democrat, but on account of the smaller size and neater appearance of the words, and to give more room for the vignette, it was changed to the Greensburg Democrat.

¹ Mrs. Graham was sister of the late Dr. John Morrison, of Greensburg.

Probably no local paper in this section of the State rose with the same rapidity or attracted so much attention, both from friends and from opponents, as did the Democrat under the practical management of E. J. Keenan. It had many characteristics which are incident to a successful newspaper. It was zealous in its friendship and bitter in its enmity. The editor was assailed in every place of attack by his political opponents,—in the courts, in the press, even in the church. But opposition is one of the very essentials of a successful party newspaper. The reputation of a political organ is established, and the paper is fixed on a permanent basis only when it is denounced by the opposition and attacked from all sides.

Some of the articles which appeared in the Democrat at that time have in the virulence of their attack perhaps been never paralleled in the history of our provincial press. The article denouncing William A. Cook for his alleged renegading from the Democratic to the opposition party (at that time the Know-Nothing organization), and for his acceptance of the candidacy of an office on the ticket, was one of the most caustic and hitter personal and political attacks probably ever printed on the page of any newspaper in the whole State. It, however, resulted in a libel suit, which of course gave the more prominence to the paper. The editor was mulcted in six and a fourth cents damages and the costs of the suit.

But the most unique issue was that of July 13, 1859. The second page of this number was almost entirely filled with wood-cuts and double-leaded matter, resembling very much the "broadsides" of an earlier day. This matter was arranged in the ordinary columns, and was headed "Cameron & Co.'s Combined Circus, Menagerie, and Diorama." It was a political utterance, and in it all the prominent politicians of the party in opposition, either national, State, or county, were caricatured, travestied, or hurled. It was a highly sensational article, but there were many who questioned the opportuneness of the brochure, and it is more than probable that the editor, both in person and in estate, suffered from the bitterness engendered by this effusion, and which ceased not to be effectively felt until long after.

Edward J. Keenan had barely reached his majority when he assumed the entire control of the Democrat. He had a peculiarity of expression on paper, so that his articles were, to one conversant with his style, readily distinguishable. He used good English, went right to the point, and although he sometimes professed the pathetic, yet a vein of humor is readily discerned running through all his productions. He was a master of the art of ridicule. In his manner he was companionable, and spared no effort to be agreeable. He therefore had many friends. He was open-hearted, forgiving, and generous beyond all belief, pitied all phases of suffering and misery, and no one ever appealed to him for charity in vain. Within certain limits it may be truly said that he fed the hungry, clothed the naked, and ministered to those who were sick and in prison. Physically he was weakly, and he bore in his body the seeds of disease. After his return from the army he devoted himself to the practice of the law. For a short period it is true he gave some of his attention to a new paper called the Democratic Times, but this attention was only supervisory. Under an accumulation of diseases he died, Friday, June 1, 1877.¹

It was announced in the Democrat of July the 12th, 1862, that the interest of James Keenan in the establishment had been purchased by Alexander Allison, a practical printer, who had been connected with the office, and that the publication of the Democrat would thenceforward be conducted under the style of William W. Keenan & Alexander Allison. It was also announced that the editorial department would remain as before. So that the publishers or editors of the paper were of those who had been connected in one capacity or another with it from shortly after its establishment. Alexander Allison retired March 6, 1863, having disposed of his interest to William W. Keenan.

THE REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRAT.

In August, 1864, W. W. Keenan, the proprietor of the Democrat, purchased the Republican from W. H. Stokes, and the two papers were consolidated under the name of the Republican and Democrat, in which E. J. Keenan became again interested. The first number of this consolidation was issued on the 31st of August in that year. The paper continued under the proprietorship of the Messrs. Keenan and under the management of W. W. Keenan, with a ¹ Edward J. Keenan died Friday June 1, 1877.

When about sixteen years of age he accompanied his brother, Thomas J. Keenan, then European law agent, on a trip to Europe, and spent some eight months in the British Isles. Of his experience and observations there he furnished some very interesting sketches. At about eighteen he established the Democrat. He served a term as register and recorder, having previously conducted the affairs of the office as deputy under his brother, Gen. James Keenan. In the civil war he served as first lieutenant of infantry, in the Eleventh Pennsylvania Reserve Veteran Corps, from which he was transferred to the Signal Corps, and advanced to higher position because of his superior ability. During his services in that department he made some suggestions of important improvements which were afterwards adopted. After the war he resumed the practice of the law in Greensburg, and had a large business. He stood among the foremost in his profession, and was remarkable for his acumen, culture, and humor. He also engaged in oil operations in the oil regions of Pennsylvania, and amassed considerable wealth. But his generous nature and careless forethought involved him in, so that when the panic came, his relentless creditors having no mercy, he was compelled to sacrifice his real estate to their mercy. On several occasions before his death he acted as chairman of the Democratic County Committee, and for a time was editor of the Times. When Hon. William Wallace was chairman of the Democratic State Committee, he, with the advice and consent of the committee, made Mr. Keenan deputy chairman for the western portion of the State, embracing some twenty or more counties, and gave to him complete control of this campaign therein. Some of his fiercest political contests were with the Hon. John Covode, and while politically at dagger's points, they were, it seems, personal friends. He was married to a daughter of Hon. Joseph H. Kuhns, and at his death left a widow and three children.

short exception, when he associated with himself James H. Clarke, who had been the local editor of the Republican in 1863. Near the close of 1871, Kline & Co. purchased the Republican and Democrat, and assumed the proprietorship and editorial control of the same on the first day of January, 1872. The firm consisted of Dr. W. J. K. Kline and S. A. Kline, Esq., who at once enlarged the paper from a twenty-eight to a thirty-two-column sheet, and issued the first number on the tenth day of January in a new dress. S. A. Kline disposed of his interest to A. B. Kline, who succeeded him on the 1st of October, 1873, when the style of the firm was changed to Kline & Bro., who are still at this time the editors and proprietors of the establishment. On the 1st of January, 1876, they dropped the word "Republican" as a part of the name, and adopted the title Westmoreland Democrat, which is identical with one of the original names when the word Republican was synonymous with Democrat.

Under its present management it has kept pace in general and local news with the improvements in journalism, enlarged its circulation, and has taken a leading part in the political controversies of the day, with such a distinctive apprehension of the varied issues that it has preserved and increased the respect and good will of the Democracy of the county, as well as that of many who are not in sympathy with its political creed.

In Collins & McLeester's Proof-Sheet for 1873, a publication for practical printers, in an account of the various newspapers of the State, Greensburg was remarked for the journalistic distinction of having odd or contradictory titles for at least three of its then existing newspapers, as witness the Tribune and Herald, the Republican and Democrat, and Frank Cowan's Paper.

THE GREENSBURG GAZETTE.

The Tribune and Herald of to-day traces the history of its press to the Gazette. The Greensburg Gazette, which was established by David McLean as the organ of the Federal party, was the first political paper in the county ostensibly and professionally so. It began its existence in 1811. Mr. McLean was succeeded by Frederick J. Cope, Esq., in 1822.

The first number of the Gazette edited by Mr. Cope was dated Friday, October the 11th, 1822. In closing his editorial duties with that number of the paper, Mr. McLean stated that "notwithstanding he had commenced business under very unfavorable circumstances, the generosity of his friends had given him all the prosperity he could wish." He had then made arrangements to continue in business at Pittsburgh, and had already moved his family there.

The Gazette of the early day was a four-column sheet, and as such continued till 1823. April 25th of that year (at No. 29, Vol. I., New Series, and Vol. XII., Whole Number 612, regularly) another column was added to the page, making it a five-column paper.

The advertising matter was slowly but certainly increasing in extent and in proportion to the contents of the paper. In size the page, as it was set up in type, was eighteen by eleven and a half inches, with a very small margin, not half an inch, around.

The contents and make-up of the Gazette differed not much (mutatis mutandis) from the Register, or from other papers of the day. In the Gazette some story partaking largely of the romantic style of literature then in vogue, under such a heading as "The Pirate's Treasure," "The Count's Secret," "The Mystery of Norwood Castle," was usually printed on the last page to the exclusion of other matter. Under the heading "Domestick" was given the local and provincial news.

The politics of the paper was, as we said, opposite to that of the Republican. The Gazette first advocated the election of Jackson to the Presidency. But it must be also remembered that Jackson for a long time was claimed by the Federalists. When Jackson was taken up and supported by the Democratic-Republicans it then opposed him.

After the fashion and the usage of the newspaper and other publishing concerns—a fashion traceable to England—the country editors sold books and stationery of ordinary kind at their establishments, and even printed books and pamphlets, and carried on the bookbinding business in connection therewith. At the office of the country paper, indeed, was the only place to get the current literature of the day. Among the publications which the Gazette in 1824 proposed to put in press was "Divine Breathings; or, a Pious Soul Thirsting after Christ, in one hundred Pathetick Meditations, &c., to contain 128 pages of 16's. Price, 37½ cents, full bound and gilded."

On February the 1st, 1828, the Gazette establishment passed out of the hands of Mr. Cope¹ into those of John Black & Son (Mr. Morrow not being known to the public as connected with the paper), with the number which commenced the second half of the seventeenth volume. The junior member of this firm was then engaged in learning the printing business in the office, and the management of the office was left to him. The latter end of the name of the paper was dropped, and it was called again merely The Greensburg Gazette.

¹ Frederick J. Cope, who is still living, was born in Greensburg, Oct. 14, 1801, and is the oldest person living here born in this place. He was the son of William and Elizabeth (Rohrer) Cope, who came from Hagerstown, Md. His grandfather was Caleb Cope, who early settled in Western Maryland, and his great-grandfather was Oliver Cope, who came over with William Penn in 1681, in which year he erected in Chester County his log house, still standing in 1863. The subject of this sketch was born in a house that stood where Baughman's Block now is on Main Street. He learned the printer's trade with David McLean, then proprietor of the Greensburg Gazette. The latter went to Pittsburgh and purchased the Pittsburgh Gazette (now Commercial Gazette) of John Scull, its founder. Mr. Cope then purchased the Greensburg Gazette, Aug. 23, 1822, and published it until Sept. 29, 1826. It was a small sheet (semi-paper) of four pages, each of four columns. He enlarged it one column before he sold it to Paul Morrow, then cashier of the bank here. His paper was distributed by the mails and often by carriers. The cost of the raw paper was then much higher than now, and in those times the printers employed were such as could be picked up, and oftentimes of but little experience. He traded his printing-office to Paul Morrow for the farm he has since owned, which was patented and owned by John Brownlee before the burning of Hannastown in 1782. Mr. Cope is one of the oldest printers in the State, but has not worked at the trade for fifty-six years. For the last quarter of a century he has contributed largely to the agricultural and educational press, and the articles thus contributed have given him great celebrity.

In 1829, there being then no longer any use for the Federal party, it lost its identity in the anti-Masonic which sprang up like a mushroom. The Gazette then became anti-Masonic.

Mr. Black, Sr., conducted the editorial management, and directed the course of the Gazette in politics until 1832, when he retiring on account of ill health the editorial management was transferred to his son, William F. Black. The name of the paper was then changed to The Westmoreland Intelligencer. After the death of Mr. Black, Jr., the control of the paper passed into the hands of Reece C. Fleeson, subsequently and for many years one of the proprietors of the Pittsburgh Dispatch.¹ From Fleeson it passed to John Ramsey, upon whose death in 1839 the paper was purchased by John Armstrong, Esq., the father of John Armstrong, Esq., of the Westmoreland bar, and of Col. James Armstrong, both present citizens of Greensburg. For more than ten years Mr. Armstrong, with the more active and personal superintendence of his son, a practical printer, edited and controlled the paper.

¹ The Intelligencer was yet owned by the widow of William F. Black, but under the management of Mr. Fleeson. It professed to be "Democratic anti-Masonic," and in 1834-35 supported, or rather advocated, William H. Harrison for President, and Francis Granger for Vice-President. It was printed every Friday on Market Street. The Intelligencer was in size larger than the Gazette, and the types were bigger.

From the Gazette, Friday, April 23, 1824:

"The GAZETTE OFFICE and BOOK-BINDERY have been removed to the house lately occupied by Mr. Gallagher as a hatter's shop, between Mr. Brown's and Mr. Mowry's stores, and opposite the Post-Office, where subscribers and others are respectfully requested to call."

From the Gazette, July 16, 1824:

"PRINTING.

THE EDITOR

Having Procured From

NEW YORK AND PHILADELPHIA,

An addition to his former assortment,

A Variety of Elegant

PLAIN AND ORNAMENTED

TYPES,

He is enabled to execute

HAND-BILLS,

PAMPHLETS, CARDS, BLANKS, etc.,

In a superior style at a short notice.

"Book-Binding is neatly and expeditiously executed at the Bindery attached to the Printing-Office.

"Old Books will be substantially rebound at moderate charges.

" A number of Books, long since bound, remain on hand. The Owners are requested to call for them, or they will be sold to pay for the binding."

THE SENTINEL.

It is here necessary to make a digression from the regular line of succession and take up one of the collateral branches, so to speak.

In 1840 a new political paper was started in Greensburg called The Sentinel. John F. Beaver, Esq., a lawyer in practice, was at the head and back of this concern, while Jonathan Row, a practical printer, a man of ability, and a native of Indiana County, was the editor and manager. It was partly a matter of private enterprise, and partly a political speculation. It was not till the campaign of that year that all the discordant elements in opposition to what was called the Democratic-Republican party effectually coalesced and united. Hence there was a struggle for all in opposition to become "organs." In either aspect the Sentinel was not a success, and after a short but vigorous existence the concern was purchased by Mr. Armstrong, the proprietor of the Westmoreland Intelligencer, and being merged into that paper lost all identity.

In November, 1850, Mr. Armstrong sold the Intelligencer to D. W. Shryock, Esq., who had been brought up to the printing business.

When the next phase of opposition in politics took shape, and one of the parties was known as the Democratic, the other as the Know-Nothing or True American party, the name of the Intelligencer was changed to the American Herald. After the dissolution of the Know-Nothing organization the name of the paper was changed to The Greensburg Herald, and thenceforth became the organ of the Republican party. As such it continued for some years. Its editor and proprietor, Mr. Shryock, in the ascendancy of his party was remembered by the administration in power. He was appointed revenue collector for the Twenty-first District at a time when the office was very profitable.

THE TRIBUNE.

The political course of the Herald had, however, in time raised opposition within the party in the county on local questions. The leader in this opposition was James R. McAfee, Esq., at the present time deputy secretary of the Commonwealth. Mr. McAfee was a lawyer at the bar, was a well-known Republican politician, had been superintendent of the common schools, and a member of the Assembly. In 1870 he established The Tribune in opposition to the Herald, and as the organ and the political exponent of the party in the county. The first number made its appearance on the 23d of July of that year.

These two papers were published in opposition to each other for about eighteen months. The prosperity of the Herald was visibly affected by The Tribune, and the editor, in all probability wearied with the cares and activity of a lengthy and laborious professional service, sold his establishment to Messrs. Atkinson and Weddell. These gentlemen were the law partners of Mr. McAfee, and in reality they represented that gentleman as well as themselves. A month after the sale and purchase, or in February, 1872, the two papers were consolidated, and under the style of the were published by McAfee, Atkinson, & Weddell. Upon the retiring of Mr. Weddell, the paper, then the undisputed organ of the Republican party in Westmoreland, was, and has been till this time, conducted by Messrs. McAfee & Atkinson.

TRIBUNE AND HERALD

Mr. Shryock, the gentleman who established the business prosperity of the Herald, was, as we said, a professional printer, a native of Greensburg, and resided in the town continuously until he accepted the position of cashier of the National Bank at Mount Pleasant, Pa., when he moved to the business-place of the bank. There he resided until the beginning of the current year (1881), when, upon the establishing of the Merchants' and Farmers' National Bank of Greensburg, Pa., he was elected cashier of that bank, which position he at present occupies.

All the papers represented in the Tribune and Herald were founded and have been in opposition to the Democratic party. They have been successively Federal, anti-Masonic, Whig, Know-Nothing, American, and Republican.

THE PENNSYLVANIA ARGUS.

The Pennsylvania Argus, although in a certain aspect more modern than the other papers just mentioned (which are in a certain sense the representatives of the first two newspapers of Westmoreland), yet in another aspect it is the oldest paper in the county. It still retains the name it was first called, and it has now been edited and managed by the same proprietor (with the co-operation latterly of his sons) from a period dating farther back than the actual existence of any other of the papers named.

The Pennsylvania Argus was established in 1831 by Jacob S. Steck and George Rippy. It was Democratic in politics, and represented as the disaffected of their day "the outs." These had thought that the Westmoreland Republican exhibited a disposition to domineer over the opinions, and to monopolize the patronage of the Democratic party, and thus the establishment of the Argus was regarded as a necessity.

The Democratic party at that conjuncture was divided on the question of State politics. George Wolf, Democrat, had been elected Governor in 1829 by a very large majority over Joseph Ritner, the Whig and anti-Masonic candidate. In 1832, on an increased vote, the same candidates running, Wolf was elected it is true, but by a very small majority. The friends of Wolf determined to prove that he was still popular as ever, and that he could be, as Simon Snyder had been, elected a third time. But the friends of other candidates protesting they were afraid to take so many chances against Wolf as the nominee of their party, and being in reality opposed to his candidacy, when the nominating convention was held the friends of one of them, Henry A. Muhlenberg, appeared in such numbers and took such a determined stand that a bitter quarrel ensued, the Democracy divided, and both Muhlenberg and Wolf were nominated, one by each wing of the party. The Whigs and anti-Masons again nominated Joseph Ritner, whom Wolf had twice defeated. The divided Democracy carried on the campaign as if there were no other candidates to elect or defeat but those of the two factions. They denounced the candidates of the opposing faction without stint or mercy, and the opposition they waged against Ritner was mild compared with the opposition they waged against each other. The result was as expected. Ritner was elected, not by a majority but by a plurality vote. One of the most memorable incidents of Ritner's administration was the Buckshot war.

In this division of the Democratic party in 1835 the Argus became the friend, advocate, and supporter of Henry A. Muhlenberg. For this reason, long after that campaign, and when its asperities were somewhat forgotten, the Argus was considered by a majority of the party in the county rather heterodox.

After the death of Mr. Rippy, the Argus was continued by Mr. Steck. The establishment becoming involved in pecuniary matters owing to a want of active support, it was sold at sheriff's sale about 1839, and J. M. Burrell, Esq., afterwards president judge of this district, became the purchaser.

About the middle of the year 1841 the Argus came into the hands of Messrs. Joseph Cort and James Johnston as editors and proprietors, and Samuel S. Torney as printer and publisher. With the number for May 26, 1843, Mr. Johnston retired from the editorial management of the Argus, and the editorial duties thenceforth devolved on Mr. Cort until July, 1844. Mr. Cort then sold his interest to Messrs. S. S. Torney (or Turney) and William H. Hacke. The former of these gentlemen was lately the postmaster at Greensburg, and the latter is foreman of the Tribune and Herald office. The paper was carried on by these gentlemen as editors and proprietors.

The old files of the Argus previously to and up to this time evidence that the paper was heartily committed to the cause of the Democratic party. Some of the political articles of the paper which came from the pen of Mr. Burrell while he was in control were widely circulated, and were met in reply by Horace Greeley in the Log Cabin, one of his first newspaper ventures in New York. Under the control of Messrs. Cort and Johnston the Argus strenuously advocated the nomination to the Presidency of Col. Richard M. Johnston,—he of Kentucky who had killed Tecumseh. The selections for the paper were made with taste and singular discretion, and were not restricted to matter of an exclusive partisan character, for the oration of Daniel Webster at the unveiling of the Bunker Hill monument, and the remarks of Mr. Clay at the close of his career in the Senate, were given a place as conspicuous as was any other subject matter of general information or instruction.

In 1849, John M. Laird, Esq., purchased the Argus, and since that time it has been under his management.

Regarding the ancestry or descent, etc., prior to his parentage of the venerable John Moore Laird, of Greensburg, the oldest printer, publisher, and editor (in consecutive years in the craft), reference may be had to the biographical sketch elsewhere in this work of his brother, the Hon. Harrison Perry Laird.¹

John M. Laird found in his father a private tutor of rare qualifications, and under him and in the common schools when open he passed the early years of his youth, acquiring a knowledge of geometry and surveying, etc., and finally spent some time in a classical school at Pittsburgh, and in his seventeenth year was taken into the printing-office of his uncle by marriage, John M. Snowden, of that place, and who established the first paper in Westmoreland County, the Register, toward the close of the last century. There he learned the printer's trade, and after journey-working a while was called to Somerset, Perry Co., Ohio, where he conducted a newspaper for three years. He then removed to Steubenville, Jefferson Co., Ohio, and became part owner of a paper which he soon bought out, and conducted it alone till his own sickness under fever and ague and the death of his wife induced him to return to Pennsylvania in 1831. While at Steubenville, Edwin M. Stanton, a "bright, active boy, a profitable adjunct of the office," and who became the most famous of War Ministers as secretary under Lincoln and Johnson, entered Mr. Laird's office and learned the printer's trade. Mr. Laird preserves memories of Edwin, which ought to be put in permanent form. Soon after returning to Pennsylvania, Mr. Laird took part in the re-establishment of the Pennsylvania Argus, with which he has since continued, and of which he has long been the sole owner; a paper from the beginning Democratic in politics, ever maintaining loyalty to the Constitution, so markedly, indeed, in the times of the late war as to provoke the bitter anathemas of its foes, who in their hot zeal at times threatened to demolish the office in which it was published and kill the editor himself. But while papers or presses less pronounced in their devotion to the Constitution were suppressed, Mr. Laird's paper remained active, fulminating when and what it would; and here the chronicler discovers an instance of that peculiar concatenation of things which are not always visible to first sight. The printer's apprentice at Steubenville was then but the "makings of the man," who in the times of which we were just speaking wielded the military forces of the land, and stretched out the arms of the government's protection over whom he would, and he had not forgotten his dear old printer-master, the man who did much to encourage Edwin into a practical career in his young days, and who was his and his father's warm friend.

A peculiar characteristic of Mr. Laird's business sense of propriety, his love of independence in political action, as well as moral discrimination between his duties to creditors and the public, demands notice here, and is evinced in the fact that whenever, especially in early days, he needed to borrow money to carry on his paper, he always sought persons of the opposing political party as leaders, in order that he might the better preserve the independence of the leaders of the party which he favored, and which might come to think, if its members supplied the "munitions" of his arsenal, that it owned its ordnance, his press, and so had a right to dictate the character of his paper.

For forty years of his life Mr. Laird held the office of justice of the peace, and in the exercise of his magisterial functions was noted for his good offices towards the peaceful adjustment of the contentions which he was called upon to consider. He has also held the offices of coroner and of register and recorder.

Jan. 12, 1830, Mr. Laird married Ellen Marton, of Cadiz, Ohio, who died Aug. 19, 1831, leaving a daughter, Ellen M. Laird, still living, and the wife of G. W. Hanney, of Franklin township, Westmoreland Co.

Sept. 8, 1835, he married Rebecca Moore. She died July 5, 1874, leaving three sons and one daughter. His son William died Nov. 29, 1876, aged thirty-one years. His surviving sons, James Moore Laird and Francis Van Buren Laird, have the chief management of the Argus newspaper and job-office, the political character of the Argus being under the exclusive control of the proprietor.

FRANK COWAN'S PAPER.

This journal was founded by Dr. Frank Cowan, who issued his first number May 22, 1872, in folio form, size of sheet being twenty-eight by forty-two inches.

It was devoted to the material interests of Southwestern Pennsylvania,—coal, coke, iron, oil, railroads, manufactories, etc.

With the completion of the first year of the paper's existence the form was changed from a four-page to an eight-page paper, the size of sheet remaining the same. In October, 1873, during the Westmorland County Fair, Frank Cowan's Daily was published for four days in connection with the weekly. The daily was the same size as the weekly, and netted the publisher, in the brief period of its being, four hundred dollars.

¹ John M. Laird is the latter's oldest brother. Their father and mother, Rev. Francis Laird, D.D., and Mary Moore, were married in April, 1800, and became the parents of eight children, who were born in the order of their names following: John Moore Laird (editor of the Pennsylvania Argus, and connected with that paper for fifty-one years), born Sept. 8, 1802; William, born in December, 1803, died in the fall of 1881 from an injury received from a vicious horse; Jane, born in 1805, and who intermarried with Zachariah Gammell Stewart, M.D., and died in 1879; Eliza Moore, born 1807, became the wife of James R. Johnson, both dying some years ago, leaving two sons, both of whom have since died; Francis, born 1809, and now residing at Saltsburg, Indiana County; Harrison Perry Laird, born 1811, a leading lawyer of the Greensburg bar, and present State senator; Robert, born 1813, died in Tennessee in 1845; Mary Moore, born in 1815, intermarried with the Rev. Thomas S. Leasson, of Brookville, Jefferson Co., Pa.

In the spring of 1874 the publication of the paper was transferred to Pittsburgh, the printing-office remaining in Greensburg. At the same time an agency was opened in London, England, at the office of The Monetary and Mining Gazette. The scope of the paper was further increased by the publication by the editor and proprietor of a Christmas story called "Zomara, a Romance of Spain," and a "Map of Southwestern Pennsylvania," size twenty-eight by thirty-three inches, printed in three colors, illustrating the coal, iron, coke, railroads, rivers, and towns of an arc about one hundred and twenty miles in diameter, with Greensburg in the centre.

In the spring of 1875 the form of the paper was changed from an eight- to a sixteen-page, the size of sheet remaining the same, and in August of the same year its publication was concluded on account of the broken health of Mr. Cowan.

The paper was a marvel for the time for neatness of appearance, typographical distinction, and fine selections. Much more original matter appeared in its columns than was customary to be seen in county papers, and the selections were all made with great care, judgment, and labor. Even the advertisements gave evidence of scrutiny and a regard for harmony.

The first number opened with an original article, contributed by the Hon. Edgar Cowan, on "Woman: her rights, her wrongs, and her remedies." It was a learned and an exhaustive exposition of the legal status of married women under the laws of Pennsylvania, as well as a treatise on the social and domestic relations of women in general in the economy of the day.

In size Frank Cowan's Paper was as large as any of the other papers of Greensburg. There was no end to the devices and the ingenuity of the editor. The second form of this paper, which was an eight-page, was so arranged that each of the sides of the press-work showed for an outside page and opened on editorial matter.

The title-head of his daily was noted for its singularity, being an enlarged fac-simile of his own handwriting, having the appearance "as if it had been put on with a split brush and tar."

The motto of his paper was "To come home to men's business and bosoms," a quotation from Bacon.

In the fall of 1875 the printing-office was sold by Mr. Cowan to a company styled "The Democratic Times Company," composed of Edward J. Keenan, Frank Vogel, William P. Fisher, and Ulam Rohrer, for three thousand dollars, who began the publication in the office of the Paper of The Democratic Times. This paper was continued for a little more than a year, when, the company failing to make their second and third payments, the office passed back into the hands of Mr. Cowan, and the Times was discontinued.

In the winter of 1878, the Argus office being destroyed by fire, the Argus was printed for several weeks in the office of the Paper, with the material of the same.

In the summer of 1878, Dr. Cowan opened a job-office and published a duodecimo volume of four hundred and twenty-four pages entitled "Southwestern Pennsylvania in Song and Story."

In September, 1878, Mr. Cowan sold the office to Messrs. John T. Fulton, John Rugh, George W. Rumbaugh, William Armbrust, and F. L. Armbrust for two thousand dollars, who soon after established The National Issue as the organ of the Greenback party, under the management of F. L. Armbrust, Esq.

Under that arrangement Mr. Armbrust continued the publication of The National Issue under its various sizes until July 1, 1880, when C. A. Light, Esq., and Mr. L. F. Armbrust published it during the Presidential campaign. On the 17th of November it was sold to a co-operative company, and the Rev. Uriel Graves was appointed editor, and C. A. Light, Esq., local editor. By these gentlemen the Issue was conducted until April 1, 1881. It then fell into the hands of John T. Fulton and Rev. Graves, who continued the same employés, and who commenced the publication of The Daily Evening News in connection with The Weekly National Issue. The News was an independent paper, while the National Issue was the organ of the Greenback party. The Issue was an eight-page paper, and the News a four-page five-column paper.

In May, 1881, the owners of the National Issue sold it with all rights and privileges and a subscription-list of about eight hundred to Messrs. J. H. Ryckman and J. B. Laux, who at once changed its name and political character. It is now known as The Greensburg Press, a weekly Republican paper, and The Evening Press, a daily independent journal. The first number of the Evening Press was issued May 18th, and the first number of the weekly June 6, 1881.

Under the able editorship of James B. Laux, Esq., the Press soon became known as a brilliant exponent of Republican doctrines as well as a journal of a high standard of excellence in its literary and scientific departments. It took high rank at once, and has grown in favor and influence ever since.

The partnership existing between the publishers, covering a period of a little more than three months, was ended September 1st, when Hilary J. Brunot, Esq., purchased the interest of Mr. Ryckman.

Since that time he has become sole owner, and under the management of Mr. Laux, as editor and manager, the circulation of the paper has wonderfully increased.

The Evening Press he has also made a success, demonstrating to those who prophesied its failure that his faith was well founded. It is the only daily published in the county, and the only one published in the congressional district composed of Greene, Fayette, and Westmoreland Counties.

On Sunday, July 3, 1881, the day following the tragic shooting of President Garfield, a Sunday edition was issued, the first Sunday paper ever issued in Westmoreland County. By this enterprise the people of surrounding towns received full particulars of that sad event without being compelled to wait for the Monday papers. The papers sold readily at twenty-five cents apiece in some places, in one instance a dollar being offered for a copy.

Both the daily and weekly have had surprising success, enjoying the confidence of a large and influential class of citizens by reason of their judicious treatment of public questions.

Mr. Laux is a staunch disciple of Alexander Hamilton, believing with his whole soul in the principle of nationality as opposed to State sovereignty. The motto he has given the Press shows the tenor of his political belief, "The Nation: first, foremost, and always."

The following extract from his "greeting" in the first number of the Press will show more strongly his political ideas:

"It will do its utmost to develop the growth of a strong feeling for nationality among the people, believing it to be the only true way of finally uniting all sections of the country as one people. It will advocate uniform laws for the whole nation, making crime as disreputable and punishable in one State as it is in another. It will advocate a code of laws whereby the ends of justice cannot be evaded or delayed by the technicalities of different State laws."

GERMAN NEWSPAPERS.

At one time there were two newspapers published in the German language in Greensburg. One was published by Frederick A. Cope, along about 1828, in connection with the Gazette. This was subsequently published by John Armbrust. It was called in German The Star of the West. It was subsequently removed to Adamsburg, whercat its publication was continued for some time. The other one was published by Jacob S. Steck, in connection with the Argus, but it existed but for a short time, and during that time its circulation was limited.

In 1862 a paper called the Westmoreland News was started in Greensburg by John B. Crooks. In politics it was Republican, and although it was edited with considerable ability, was handsomely printed, and bore a neat typographical appearance, yet the next year, 1863, its publication was discontinued for want of support. The subscription-list was sold to the Herald, and the materials to James F. Campbell, who removed them to Johnstown, and with them there established the Johnstown Democrat.

So much of the papers of the county town, and now let us go into the "provinces."

THE LIGONIER FREE PRESS,

edited and published by Mr. S. A. Armour, was established about the 1st of June, 1845, at Ligonier. It was neutral in politics, and "devoted to literature, morality, agriculture, news, finances, miscellany," and several other things. The Press, however, had not been long diffusing light and knowledge until it began to show a preference for the Democratic party. In the beginning of the year 1854 it openly forsook its so-called independent course, and henceforward sailed under Democratic colors. The editor in announcing to the public the future course of the paper on political subjects says that the increased number of his subscribers and their political preferences had mostly urged him to this course. But he gave additional reasons why he should make his paper a party paper. It then supported William Bigler for the governorship. This was the beginning of the ninth year of the Press. With the number for the 10th of January, 1854, the Free Press on that day took the name of The Valley Democrat, and was issued every two weeks.

The paper varied in size, capability, and evidences of judicious supervision with the varying career and fanciful tastes of its eccentric editor. Complete files of the paper must be rare. We do not know if any exists. At one time the project promised much, but time at last told upon it; and owing to the irregularity of its appearance, and the lack of sufficient support at the hands of a generation whose attention was diverted by the deceitfulness of riches and the cares of the world, the Valley Democrat for a long time languished, and languishing did die. Mr. Armour was compelled more than once, that the paper of his choice—the child of his invention—should live, to walk to Pittsburgh and carry his paper on his back to Ligonier. He was a great walker, and could walk with ease the distance, which was fifty miles, in one day, and return the next.

Of those numbers of the Press and Valley Democrat which we have seen, the first number of the Democrat will serve as a sample of the rest. This is Vol. IX., No. 1, dated Ligonier, Penna., Tuesday, Jan. 10, 1854, S. A. Armour, editor and proprietor. Terms, one dollar per year. The paper has six columns to a page, and each page is about eighteen by fourteen inches. The matter throughout is widely spaced, but the letter-press is legible and the paper not bad. The caption of the first column is "Fearful End of a Rum Drinker." The next column has at its head the wood-cut of a sailing steamship, as formerly the other papers had one of a newsboy riding at a gallop, and underneath the ship, in heavy broad letters, "Highly Important from Russia & Turkey," which two nations were at that time at war. In this column the glad news was brought to the housed-up inhabitants of the Chestnut Ridge and Laurel Hill that "an insurrection had broken out in Nickchivan; that Prince Woronzoff, the Russian commander, had been surrounded at Tiflis; that Schanyl, the Circassian leader, and Selim Pasha were gradually approaching each other; and that Admiral Machinoff had (literally) 'got the hulge' on Vice-Admiral Osman Bey." A great deal of such stuff was scattered throughout the whole paper. Prohahly one-third was taken up with advertisements; of local items there were few, of editorial comments scarcely any. Under the column for "Poetry" was that fine hallad, so illustrative of the Western border annals, called "The Arkansas Gentleman, Close to the Choctaw Line," which filled a column and a quarter; while in another number appeared that other equally fine and pathetic hallad of "Joe Bowers."

From these selections you may get an appropriate idea of the facetiousness and of the humorous characteristics of the editor. But the papers were no doubt at one time treasured among the penates of many a household. For if the paper had, as all such papers have, an interest, this interest was for the locality in which it circulated. Although its local news was meagre, it was always of a "startling" character, and worthy to be remembered. It contained the records of the hirths and deaths as they occurred in the Valley, touching observations on deceased friends, and much other local information, which if collected and arranged might at this day be of a very satisfactory kind. The most valuahle of the contributions to Mr. Armour's publications which we can recall are some relating to the early times about Fort Ligonier, and personal recollections and narrations of some of the old inhabitants hearing upon the Indian wars, which in early times reached the Valley. So too might items relative to the industrial and productive interests be gathered which might possibly be useful. In a number printed during the winter of 1854 it is said that the furnaces of the Valley were doing an "immense business that season."

MOUNT PLEASANT PAPERS.

There has always been an interest manifested in Mount Pleasant in newspaper literature. Some of the ventures, it is true, have not been successful. In the early part of 1843, Norval Wilson Truxal was editor and proprietor of the Literary Gazette. He had been a former publisher of the Freeport Columbian. In April, 1843, The Democratic Courier began its existence, with Mr. Truxal as editor, and D. H. H. Wakefield as assistant editor. The paper advocated Democratic principles, and had for its motto, "Measures, not men." Mr. Truxal got knocked off his feet somehow, hut afterwards got up again, and in 1846-47 established The Ranchoero, at Third and Market Streets, Pittshurgh; hut the Courier had ceased to gladden the hearts of its former patrons.¹

LATROBE PAPERS.

The Latrobe Inquirer, W. R. Boyers and J. G. W. Yeater publishers, was first issued in March, 1861.

It was a six-column, four-page paper, and contained considerable local news. It was a had time, however, to start a newspaper,—just at the beginning of the war. It did not long continue in existence.

The Latrobe Advance was established by C. B. Fink and F. A. Benford, and its first issue appeared Aug. 6, 1873. Mr. Benford retired from the copartnership September 30th same year, since when Mr. Fink has continued the publication alone. The Advance is independent in all things and neutral in nothing. It is devoted largely to the interests of Latrobe and vicinity, and to general and local news. It is an eight-column sheet, makes a neat appearance, and is ably edited.

The Reveille is the name of a paper established Feb. 1, 1882, by C. T. Athearn. It is published semi-monthly, and is a four-page sheet of three columns each. It is largely devoted to the interests of the Grand Army of the Republic, and is fast winning its way into popular favor.

IRWIN PAPERS.

The Irwin Spray was the first journal ever started in Irwin, and was founded by B. M. McWilliams, who issued its first number Aug. 20, 1875. It was a four-page sheet of twenty-four columns, devoted to the interests of the borough. Its office was on Third, south of Main Street. Its publication was continued nearly three weeks, when the office was burned, and the paper was never revived. It was a neat paper in typographical appearance and well edited. It was published every Friday, and had attained a respectable circulation and patronage.

The Irwin Chronicle is the second newspaper ever established in the town, and was founded by W. H. Johnston, who issued its first number April 15, 1881. Its motto is, "A chiel's amang ye takin' notes, an' faith he'll prent it." It is a four-page sheet of twenty-four columns, and is independent in sentiment and tone. It is largely devoted to local news, and especially to home interests. It is well edited, and receives a large advertising patronage from the business men of the place. It is printed every Saturday at one dollar per year. Mr. Johnston is sole editor, publisher, and proprietor.

WEST NEWTON PAPERS.

The first newspaper published in West Newton Town was The Weekly Cycle, established by O. H. Harrison, who issued its first number June 20, 1855. Its publication was continued about a year. It was a four-page sheet of twenty-eight columns, and was devoted to agriculture, home interests, news of the day, and general miscellany, and was independent, hut not neutral. It was published every Thursday morning, and had its printing-office on Main Street, opposite A. Lowry's hotel. Its terms were $1.50 per annum in advance, or $2 at the end of the year. It had a fair share of home advertising, with considerable from the

¹ See history of Mount Pleasant borough in this work.

Pittsburgh merchants, still its support was not adequate to the outlay of its publisher, who discontinued it.

The West Newton Press was established Nov. 28, 1878, by E. C. Hough and W. L. Rankin. At the end of three months Mr. Hough bought out his partner, and from that time to the present has been its sole proprietor, publisher, and editor. At first it was ten by fourteen inches in size, but six months after its establishment Mr. Hough enlarged it to its present dimensions, twenty-six by forty. It is a four-page sheet of thirty-two columns. Its motto is, "The Press, the people's paper, independent in all things, neutral in nothing." It is published every Thursday morning at its well-equipped office on First Street, near the railroad station. It is an ably-edited journal, and especially devoted to home and local news and interests. It has a large circulation, and its columns are well patronized by the best business advertisers of the town and valley. Mr. Hough, its editor, was born and raised here, and is largely identified with the best interests of the community, to the moral, social, intellectual, and business tone of which his journal has greatly contributed.

SCOTSDALE PAPERS.

The Scottdale Tribune is a neat four-page paper of twenty-four columns, established Dec. 22, 1880, by its present editors and publishers, I. M. Newcomer & Co. It is published every Thursday, is devoted to local news and interests of the town, and has a circulation of some eight hundred. It is an independent sheet, and is edited with ability.

The Miner's Record is a twenty-four-column newspaper, published on Wednesdays, with A. O. Welshban and J. R. Byrne as editors. It is a consolidation of the Brownsville Labor Advocate and the Miner's Semi-Weekly Record. Its office is in Campbell Block. It is the official organ of the miners and coke-drawers of the "Connellsville coke region," and is published exclusively in their interests. It was established June 1, 1881, as a one-page sheet of eight columns, has been five times enlarged, and is now on the point of still greater enlargement. It has twelve hundred subscribers, and is devoted to the interests of the "Knights of Labor." One of its editors, J. R. Byrne, is secretary for this region, under D. R. Jones, head secretary, of Pittsburgh.

ODDITIES.

In the number of the Gazette for March 25, 1825, there was a wood-cut representing a locomotive and three truck-cars laden with coal. There is a lengthy article taken from the Baltimore American, which filled three columns of the papers, which was a description of the new motive-power, then but recently utilized in this method in England. But, oh! such a locomotive, and such cars! Above the wood-cut was the following: "A Section of a Rail Road, with a view of a LOCOMOTIVE STEAM ENGINE, having in tow three transportation wagons. Upon the railroad, fifty tons may be conveyed by a ten-horse power at the rate of 12 or 14 miles per hour."

The following appeared in the editorial column, referring to the subject:

"We have prepared and placed on the first page of our paper an engraving representing a loco-motive steam engine, having in tow three transportation wagons, accompanied by an explanation from another paper. We are indebted to the United States Gazette for a copy of the plate. It would be impossible, we think, considering the kind of country through which our road passes, to bring the steam wagon into successful operation between the east and west. It requires too many stationary engines to propel the wagons over our numerous hills. It would be necessary to have half a dozen in sight of this town, for we are situated on a hill, and surrounded by them on all sides."

In the latter part of 1861 and 1862 the county papers generally issued a half-sheet. They were led to this from the scarcity of printers and of printing paper of the proper size. For the time it was also noticeable that the advertising patronage fell off. In instances where these half-sheets were issued the type was generally reduced in size, so that very nearly as much news was furnished then as before. Then it became common for the paper to be issued in half-sheets and sent twice a week. The demand for news was at the highest possible point, and as the county newspapers then printed letters from the volunteers in camp, and were particular in giving the casualties of the Westmoreland soldiers, all the papers, when the flurry of the first excitement was over, saw themselves with larger lists of paying subscribers, and a growing trade in advertising which far exceeded anything in the past experience of newspaper men here.

OBSERVATIONS.

Near every change in the management of these papers was, in regard to the mechanical or composition part, to the advantage of the public. The papers grew in size as they grew older. With such editors as Wise and Cope, Burrell and Fleeson, Stokes and Armstrong, men of known ability and ardent politicians, and with such contributors as Judges Coulter and Young, Drs. Postheltwaite and King, Revs. James I. Brownson and J. A. Stillinger, lawyers as A. G. Marchand and A. W. Foster, littérateurs as James Johnston and William A. Stokes, the old files of these papers cannot but be interesting and instructive. As a class, the professional men of the old school cultivated the art of expression beyond those of a later day. The reason is obvious: their professional duties were not so laborious, there was a method of reaching the ears and attracting the notice of the people not practiced now, and, lastly, journalism has since their day become a profession of itself. Within the time we have marked, several noted discussions on political, on religious, and on scientific subjects were carried on in elegant and forcible language, in which the knowledge of the moderns was embellished and adorned by quotations and illustrations from the poetry and philosophy of the ancients. Besides those articles, which were valuable contributions to the current literature, and which, to an extent, invited scientific research, the papers of that date contained the effusion of those sentimental creatures, who, "sighing o'er Delphi's long-deserted shrine," prowl and howl around the outskirts of Helicon and Parnassus. These enriched the lyrical department of belles-lettres with acrostics spelt out on their fingers, with political songs set to the air of the "Camptown Races," with monodies after the style of Macpherson's "Ossian," and with odes on the Huckleberry Hills after the favorite metres in Tom Moore's melodies.

A close reader who compares the original productions, particularly the essays on scientific and political subjects, and the finer productions in biography, history, and poetry, will conclude that in relative merit the common newspapers of to-day will suffer by the comparison. The present generation has read nothing like the political controversy between Coulter and Postlethwaite, in which the measures of Quincy Adams' administration were discussed; the scientific and historical debates between Dr. King and Rev. Stillinger; or the various brochures of Coulter, or the poetry of Edward Johnston.

Some of the poems which appeared in the olden papers, whose authors are unknown, are indeed gems, and deserve a better fate than they met. Violets they were that wasted their sweetness on the desert air. One poem which we recall, but cannot give, in which the verses ran as freely as in any of Shelley's, was headed, "Lines written on the presentation of Washington's sword and Franklin's staff." Another one, called "My Father's House," had an ease and grace of diction not unworthy of Addison. The following little waif appeared in the Pennsylvania Argus of Feb. 26, 1846:

"For the Pennsylvania Argus.

"FRIENDSHIP.

"BY S. S. M.

"Friendship, thou dost not seek eplendor,
Princely domes allure not thee;
Mitre'd heads would oft surrender
Every gem to purchase thee.
Kindly thou dost seek the lowly,
And around the cottage fire,
Zest all pure and love all holy
In each heart thou dost inspire.
Lest thy presence ever cheer me,
Even now I woo thy form,
Surely thou wilt deign to hear me,
Surely thou wilt ever charm.
Insolence must bow before thee,
Mighty in thy magic spell;
Oh be mine, I now implore thee,
Till I hid the world farewell."

LITERATURE.

Closely affined to the newspaper history is the literature which in a strict sense belongs to the county.

In 1878 there was published at Greensburg a book from the pen of Dr. Frank Cowan, in which an attempt was made to embody in verse the salient features and prominent characters of the history of Southwestern Pennsylvania, in a setting of similes, figures, and formulas in keeping with the mountains and rivers, the plants and animals, and the climatic peculiarities of the country. Its title, "Southwestern Pennsylvania in Song and Story," inadequately gives an idea of its scope. Suffice it here that it involves in an ideal form a great part of the history of Westmoreland County, and as such has entered into the general history of the county in a way that, in part at least, it must be incorporated in this book, and as a whole commended to the reader who has an appreciation for the poetic and romantic of history.

The contents of the volume are arranged under six heads,—“Prehistoric,” “Under the Crown of France, 1679–1758,” “Under the Crown of Great Britain, 1758–1776,” “Under the Flag of the United States, 1776–1878,” “Miscellaneous,” and “Evolution.”

In the first group is found one of the most graphic of the narrative ballads of Mr. Cowan's, a philosophic poem, entitled "The Last of the Mammoths," in which the victory of man over the greatest of his four-footed rivals, and of mind over matter, is depicted in a very ingenious and artistic manner. The scene is laid along the route followed by Gen. Forbes and Col. Bouquet from Hannastown westward, and the termination of the conflict occurs on the ice at the confluence of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, where, in 1875, two teeth and several large bones of the skeleton of a mammoth were discovered by a dredger. In the concluding stanzas the former river is made to typify man, and the latter woman, and the Ohio (which according to Mr. Cowan signifies the bloody, or the river of blood) the stream of life, while the mammoth is metamorphosed into the aggregate of the organic life of the past ages of the world, as follows:

"A Mammoth's tooth, off the Pittsburgh Point,
In the eddying, swirling flood,
Where the two waters meet and embracing greet,
As one in the River of Blood—

"Like Man, the river that rolls from the North,
From a head with an icy mouth;
Like Woman, the flood with the warmth of her blood
That comes from a heart in the South—

"Where the two rivers meet, and like man and wife greet,
In the flood from the East to the West,
That flows on forever to the Gulf of the Giver,
And the Sea of Eternal Rest.

"While in their bed are laid the dead,
Of the first and of the last,
Who have swelled the flood of the River of Blood,
In the Mammoth of the Past!"

In the second group we have "The Myth of Brad-dock's Gold," a ballad in which a ghastly scene is presented to the imagination, impressing on the reader an idea of the retribution for greed and crime with a shudder. The foundation for the story is the fact that Braddock on the day of his disastrous defeat had twenty-five thousand pounds in specie in his military chest, and from that day to this nothing authentic has come to light with respect to the large sum of money, although there is scarcely a mile of Braddock's road that has not been broken with the mattock at midnight to discover it. In the ballad, however, the possible but most improbable treasure is supposed to have been found by two brothers, the only survivors of a family who for three generations had been engaged in the impoverishing and debasing search.

The second needs no introduction, being entitled "St. Clair," but it is worthy of note that, in admiration of the character of the brave old soldier, and in commemoration of his deeds, Mr. Cowan dedicated his book in the following striking summary, "To the memory of Arthur St. Clair, by whose life Southwestern Pennsylvania has been associated with Scotland, England, and France, the savages of America, the filibusters of Virginia, the formation of local, State, and national governments, and the great men of America for half a century, and by whose death Southwestern Pennsylvania will be associated with the ingratitude of republics forever."

From the fifth group, or "Miscellaneous," we select the stirring song which has become a part of the popular literature of the county, and given a familiar epithet to the river far and wide.

"THE DARE-DEVIL YOUGH.

"Where the bluff Alleghenies rise rugged and rough,
And fetters and bars for a continent forge,
There dashes defiant the dare-devil Yough,
Through rocky ravine, deep dell, and grim gorge.
To this river I drink; for akin to my blood
Is its torrent so bold, and so buoyant and free;
Braving bowlder and crag with impetuous flood,
As onward resistless it rolls to the sea!

"And here's to the man with a will like the Yough,—
A will that would wield as a weapon the world,
Daring all, and defying even Death with a scoff,
When over the brink of decision he's hurled!
'Tis the man that I love, the bold and the brave,
Converging his might to the channel of aim;
From the mountain of life to the gulf of the grave,
Rolling on like the Yough to the ocean of Fame!

"And here's to the woman afood with the tide
That bursts from the mountain-height's fountain of love,
On whose billow the barks of futurity glide
Until anchored in bliss in Eternity's cove!
'Tis the woman I love; and the free bounding wave
That breaks in the course of my hot, throbbing blood
Is the might of the love in return that she gave,—
A might that's akin to the Yough's rushing flood!"

Supplemental to this book, entitled "Southwestern Pennsylvania in Song and Story," Mr. Cowan, in 1881, published another work called "An American Story-Book," short stories from studies of life in Southwestern Pennsylvania, pathetic, tragic, humorous, and grotesque. As stated in the preface, however, the book was written before the publication of the volume of poems. It contains twenty-four stories, the scenes of most of which are laid in Westmoreland. In "The Old Man of Beulah" the phenomena of mid-winter on the summit of the Allegheny Mountains are personified, the moaning of the wind becoming his voice, the drifting snow his long white beard, and the shadows of the hemlocks his great gray cloak; the widow of Llewellyn Lloyd standing in the same relation to the sights and sounds around her as Peggy in the "Tale of Tom the Tinker's Time" to the distressing incidents of the Whiskey Insurrection. In "The Coal King" the mining of coal on the Monongahela River is wrought into a romance of the mockeries of life. In "The Railroad" a feud of Ireland is laid in the grave of America as the result of the battle between the Fardownians and Corkonians at Hillside during the construction of the road-bed of the Pennsylvania Railroad. In "The Grist-Mill" the old mill at the falls of Jacobs Creek is reconstructed and peopled anew with the bashful, burly miller, Ebenezer Mix, and the rosy, rollicking, royal Widow Garvey, in a most provoking plight to themselves, but quite the reverse to all others. In "The Pack-saddle Gap" the profile of the human face that appears in the outlines of the rocks on the mountain-side is invested with the stern significance of the features of Fate cut in the living rock. In "The Fiddle-faced Hog" the humors of the early settlers are depicted in a facetious trial about a monstrous hog before a trio of arbitrators of the most extraordinary proportions. In "The White Deer" the effect of superstition is illustrated in the fate of twin brothers, one of whom by chance kills an albino fawn while hunting on the mountain. In "The Steamboat" a peculiarity of the river service is personified in Capt. Godfrey Gildenscunny, who gets his just deserts in falling into the clutches of a fully-developed and accomplished old maid, Miss Arabella Guilk. In "The Devil in a Coal-Bank" a number of curious incidents and episodes are dove-tailed into a story, the moral of which is that there is a just punishment for every crime committed against the laws of man and God. In "The Oil Derrick" the ups and downs of the operator in oil are described in two laconic worthies who are alternately princes and paupers. In "The Ridger" the peculiarities of the inhabitants of the several ridges of Westmoreland and adjacent counties are set forth in a humorous manner in the dialect peculiar to the region of rocks and rattlesnakes in which the people referred to live, and among whom the author declares himself to be the chief, by birth and habitation at least, in addition to his being their expression in the art of the story-teller. In "The Erdspiegel" the story of two lost children on one of the ridges of the Laurel Hill is graphically and very pathetically told. In "The Towscape" the old superstition of the caul is made the foundation of a curious tale, in which the credulity and timidity of the Ridger is made the background to reveal the mysterious terrors of the life and death of the unknown murderer. In "The Log Cabin" the innocence and purity, the health and happiness of the humble cabin on the Ridge are put in contrast with the vice and crime, disease and death of the gilded saloons of sin in the towns and cities. In "Yony Waffle" a humorous personification is made of the idea of art evolving from accident, our hero becoming in his adventures and achievements the embodiment and expression of a thousand oddities. In "The Road Wagon" the trials of the German immigrants in the olden time are related, the sad fate of Gretchen and the sympathetic Hans being touching in the extreme. In "The Printer Tramp" a worthy with whom the author in his capacity as an editor doubtless became personally acquainted is introduced in a dual state to the reader, at the same time on earth and in heaven. In "The Coke-Oven" the dark side of the negro's character in superstition and crime is revealed to the reader in a very curious story. In "The Red Squirrels" a parable is told in illustration of the effect of greed and selfishness when time at last sets all things even. In "The Cow Doctor" the relationships between man and the ox in Southwestern Pennsylvania are summarized in a humorous account of the adventures of Jackson Rummell. In "The Blaze and the Block" a very curious story is told, involving the craft of the old-time surveyor in the backwoods and the use made of it in a court of justice. In "The Bully Boy with the Glass Eye" the mother-in-law of popular facetiousness deservedly comes to a tragical end. In "Old Helgimite," one of the most highly wrought and artistic of the characteristic creations of our author, the writer is revealed in a measure himself in the imaginative and voluble Dr. Ott, who, as he is described to be, "if he was exceptional in one thing and extraordinary in another, it was in his ability to idealize luxuriantly and express his thoughts exuberantly," while in "The Proof-Reader," the last of the series, the shortcomings of him who should be infallible in the eyes of an author are recounted in a humorously malignant manner, the description of the "Proof-Reader," "in feature, form, and function," being remarkable as a specimen of the grotesque in the literature of American humorists.

Dr. Cowan has published also a collection of ballads, poems, and songs pertaining to the "Little World," which he has made in a measure his own in literature as an appendix to his "Southwestern Pennsylvania in Song and Story," entitled "The Battle Ballads and Other Poems of Southwestern Pennsylvania." This collection includes the curious "Description of Pennsylvania" in 1692, by Richard Frame, the rare ballad of Crawford's defeat, several poems on the defeat of St. Clair, and poems by David Bruce, H. H. Brackenridge, Sally Hastings, Samuel Little, A. F. Hill, John Greiner, and William O. Butler.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE LEGAL PROFESSION.

Provincial Courts—The County Justices—Distinction of President Judge—William Crawford, First Presiding Judge—Judge John Moore—Increase in Legal Business—Difference in Practice—First Regular Attorneys—Characteristics of the Early Practice—Judge H. H. Brackenridge—James Ross—John Woods—Steel Semple—Henry Baldwin and William Wilkins—Legal Ability of the Early Bar—The Bench—Judge Addison—Old Judicial Forms, etc.—Judge John Young—Judge Thomas White—Judge J. M. Burrell—Judge J. C. Knox—Judge Joseph Buffington—Judge James A. Logan—Judge James A. Hunter—John Byers Alexander—Alexander William Foster—The Hanging of Evans—James Findlay—Richard Coulter—John F. Beaver—Albert G. Marchand—Henry D. Foster—A. A. Stewart—H. C. Marchand—Joseph H. Kuhns—James C. Clarke—John Latta—Roll of Attorneys.

PROVINCIAL COURTS.

THE judicial system of Pennsylvania, to quote the language of a forcible and accurate writer, Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge,¹ was above the colonial standard, both as regards bench and bar. The early Quaker scheme of peace-makers to act as arbitrators and prevent lawsuits seems to have met with little success, and at the time of the Revolution there was an adequate and efficient organization for the administration of the common law, which prevailed in Pennsylvania as elsewhere, except when modified by statutes, imperial or provincial. All judges were appointed by the Governor. The lowest court was that of the local magistrate or justice of the peace, competent to try cases involving less than forty shillings. The next was the county court, or Court of Quarter Sessions, composed of three justices, who sat by special commission as a Court of Common Pleas, while the highest tribunal was the Supreme Court, consisting of a chief justice and three puisne judges, with general appellate jurisdiction, and combining the functions of the English Courts of Common Pleas, King's Bench, and Exchequer. They held two terms, and were also empowered to sit as a Court of Oyer and Terminer and hold a general jail delivery, a power rarely exercised. Causes involving more than fifty pounds could be carried up from the Supreme Court to the king in council. There was no Court of Chancery. Keith had succeeded in establishing one, with himself as chancellor, under the charter, but after his rule it was suppressed, and such equity jurisdiction as was required was exercised by the common law courts. There was a register-general of probate and administration at Philadelphia, and recorders of deeds appointed at an early period in each county.²

The bar in Pennsylvania was exceptionally good, and had always received full recognition. Practice was simple, and attorneys were admitted by the justices after slight examination; but the law, as a profession, had many excellent representatives in the colony, and drew to its ranks many men of learning and ability. Andrew Hamilton, who defended Zenger, was the first American lawyer who gained more than a local reputation, whose ability was recognized in England, and the only one whose reputation and ability in colonial times was so recognized.

¹ History of the English Colonies in America, p. 232.

² There was an old English Court of Vice-Admiralty, from which there was an appeal to England, but this court was so unpopular that the judge at one time complained that he could not perform the duties of his office. The judiciary of Delaware was similar in arrangement, but formed an independent organization.—Ibid.

Touching the subject of crimes and offenses in the colony in the eighteenth century, Lodge, in the "History of the English Colonies in America," writes:

"At last the new theory of criminal legislation was abandoned in the year 1718. Work-houses and jails were established, the number of capital offenses was increased from one to fourteen; every felony, except larceny, was made capital on a second offense, and matters went on in Pennsylvania in the ordinary fashion of the time. At the time of the Revolution, while, as compared with England, the amount of crime was trifling, it was, as compared with the other colonies, very considerable, and although infrequent, there was much variety. About the middle of the century there was a great deal of hanging for house-breaking, horse-stealing, and counterfeiting. Highway robbery was not unknown, and informers were tarred and feathered in the back counties by a population loyal to the cause of untaxed liquore. . . . The habit of rioting spread to the other towns [i.e., from Philadelphia], and the brutal massacre by the Scotch-Irish "Paxton Boys" of the Indians at Conestoga was the most notorious result of this turbulent disposition. The rioters and the criminals were almost wholly Irish. Not one native or Englishman was found in any ten of the inmates of jails, and the unfortunate prominence of Pennsylvania in this respect was attributable to the character of a large portion of her immigrants."

THE COUNTY JUSTICES.

The act under which the judiciary was regulated was of old date (May 22, 1722). Under it a Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace and Jail Delivery was to be holden in every county of the Province four times in a year. The Governor or his lieutenant commissioned the justices who held the courts. Any three of the justices could hold private or special courts, and in or out of session they were empowered to take recognizances. The authority of these county justices was modeled after the authority of the justices of the sessions in England, as the justices of the Supreme Court, under this law, had full authority to exercise the judicial powers of the justices of the courts at Westminster.

The jurisdiction of the judges of these county courts was extensive. Thus they were empowered to lay out cartways to the public roads, to appoint viewers of partition fences, to superintend the erection of bridges and the laying out of highways. No member of a court of justice was allowed to sit while his own cause was on trial. They were empowered to appoint persons to receive the claims for the reward offered for the killing of such birds and animals as upon which a bounty was laid by law. They could also grant writs of replevin, could issue writs of attachment, and award process for taking lands in execution, and to recover on mortgage. They had authority to recommend for tavern licenses. They had the acknowledging of deeds, the probating of wills, and jurisdiction to recover small debts. In their magisterial capacity they were hedged in by laws protecting them, as well as the constables, if they exceeded their commission. In such cases as fall within the penal code they had likewise an extensive judicial power. Although they could not take cognizance of such offenses as were capital, yet they could sentence a felon to imprisonment, to the pillory and stocks, and amerce him in correspondingly large pecuniary fines and forfeitures.

Besides the county justices there were other legally appointed justices of the peace with powers not so extensive. They had, and exercised ordinarily, such powers as are exercised by our justices of the peace. These were sometimes armed with a special commission, called a dedimus potestatem. With all these privileges, therefore, these justices were an influential class, a class, in fact, in many respects apart from the rest. We cannot, indeed, appreciate or rightly comprehend their position in the social scale by comparing them with our present justices of the peace. The standard was relatively much higher. From the judicial system of the colonies, they stood for lawyer and for judge. The county justice was not only the highest judicial officer in the county, and as such sat at the sessions to decide causes, but to him was referred all such controversies as arose among his neighbors. This in his civil capacity; while in the military arrangement he was usually an officer. His education, such as it was, his tastes, his distinction, and the custom of the early colonists all forced him to be a military man. The magistrates were looked upon as of a separate class, although not distinguished from the others by landed wealth or by any superiority in dress or equipage. They lived among the people and as the people. Their houses were ordinarily log houses, with perhaps few supplementary articles of furniture. But there was among these undoubtedly a higher standard of sociability and a finer polish than among the common classes; and this standard is either traceable to usage and contact with the society of the older settlements of the East, or it was a vestige of old-world manners. As a class they were high-toned, punctilious in honor, of integrity; and in such a sense they held their heads high over those who were beneath them. The magistrates of the early colony were to the common people what the justices of the peace in England were to the common people two hundred years ago.

Those penal laws, of which we first spoke, modeled after those of England, were, beyond our imagining, severe. The most trifling offense was punished by imprisonment under wretched diet and in unhealthful pens. Many of the crimes or misdemeanors for which a convict would now be sent to the penitentiary, the county jail, or the work-house were then capital. Under this head were arson (that is, the burning of dwellings or public buildings), robbery, manslaughter by stabbing, counterfeiting, witchcraft. Although this is a true statement, we perceive, as Judge William Bradford says, that the severity of our criminal laws is a foreign plant, and not the native growth of Pennsylvania.¹ It was endured, but was never a favorite. Under them the county justice could, if he chose to, punish a person found judicially guilty as severely as our military laws now punish unruly soldiers when in actual service, and in such a manner as is now utterly unknown to our civil laws. Such a recital may give us an idea of the plenary power vested in these magistrates. But although their proceedings may, when we read the reports preserved to us, excite in us astonishment, yet we may observe that they seldom exercised their full authority. We may likewise reasonably conclude that they were, as compared with the same class vested with the same power in other parts of the colonies, humane men.

Touching the manner of conducting suits at law and the results of the system under the county justices, we have the observation of a distinguished person, and this in a place where one would scarcely go to hunt it if he were on that errand. St. Clair, when Governor of the Northwestern Territory, made some lengthy observations on extending the jurisdiction of a single magistrate in the trial of small causes in the Legislature of the Territory on the motion of Judge Symmes. The Governor was opposed to the motion, and probably had his preconceived notions of opposition from his notice of the practical workings of the county courts under the colonial and ante-revolutionary period. That he was describing the system as he had seen it in vogue at Hannastown there can be no reasonable doubt.² He says, "A worse mischief is still behind,—this kind of jurisdiction fosters a contentious, revengeful spirit among the people. I have seen some of the meetings before magistrates in the United States on their law days, as they call them, when the business was transacted with little or no solemnity, and where a looseness was allowed for abuse and recrimination that had a bad effect, not only on the manners of the parties litigating, but on those of all the auditors, and the very considerable numbers attending them, especially on the afternoons of Saturdays, the time generally chosen by those who had no manner of business, and they seldom failed of returning worse citizens, worse neighbors, and worse men, and in settling one dispute the seed of a great many were sown, besides much extortion is practiced, to be convinced of which it is only necessary to look into the statute-book of any of the States, where numerous laws are to be found for preventing and correcting it."

In the array of the names of those nominated as conservators of the peace we have a list of men who, as a general thing, were upright in character, of the strictest integrity, fearless in facing danger and opposing tyranny, of simple but dignified manner, of good general information, and of special knowledge in the cardinal principles of English liberty. There were of course among them some who did not relatively stand so high as others. These were, however, kept in a secondary position, and of them we have no knowledge for either good or evil.

DISTINCTION OF PRESIDENT JUDGE.

By the records of the Quarter Sessions and Common Pleas Courts, from the correspondence in the Colonial Records, and from the Minutes of the Council, it would appear that it was the custom to distinguish one of the justices on the bench as the president or presiding justice, and the others as his associates. This nominal distinction appears to have misled many. The status of the president judge was not indeed clearly presented till the lapse of a hundred years, and was first discussed when Westmoreland celebrated her centenary, in 1773. It is thence concluded that when any particular one is mentioned as president judge it was as a matter of mere formality, that it was following the organization of the Supreme Court, that the justice who sat thus distinguished had no actual precedence over the others, and that the nominal precedence was mostly conferred upon William Crawford when he was present, although in some instances Lochry, Foreman, Gist, Hanna, and Moore are named as presiding justices.³

WILLIAM CRAWFORD, FIRST PRESIDING JUDGE.

William Crawford appears to have been a man who, even in his younger years and at that day, stood high among the people of the frontier and with those in authority, both in our own Province and in Virginia. He was one of the early settlers on the old Braddock road, having taken up lands in 1767. He chose the spot where Braddock had crossed the Youghiogeny in 1755. The place of his residence was called Stewart's Crossing. His house stood nearly opposite Connellsville.⁴ He was identified with the

³ It would appear that the justices elected or selected one of their number from time to time to preside. It is generally conceded that the presiding officer did not thus sit by virtue of any legislative provision prior to the act of 23th January, 1777. The only instance I have met with evidencing by record their official compliance with this act of 1777, which enacted that "The President and Council shall appoint one of the Justices in each County to preside in the respective courts, and in his absence the justices who shall attend the court shall choose one of themselves President for the time being," is an order of record at the October sessions, 1781, Quarter Sessions docket, to wit:

"Rule that no Cause whatever be Removed from this Court into the Supreme Court after this Term until the Respective write necessary for the Removal thereof be produced at Bar.

"By the Court,

"CHARLES FOREMAN, Pres't Elect."

That court, however, was held "before Edward Cook, Esquire, and his associate, Justices of the same Court," and it would seem that in the absence of any appointment made by the president or Council the judges "elected" one of themselves to preside.

At the January Sessions, 1776, Edward Cook was, for the first time, styled "Precedent Judge. . ." The Court of Quarter Sessions held 6th January, 1778, was held "before Edward Cook, Esq., Precedent, and his Associates, justices of the same court."

⁴ This was in Augusta County, Va., as claimed by that Commonwealth; afterwards in the district of West Augusta, and finally in Yohogania County until 1779, when Virginia relinquished her claim to what is now

¹ See Smith's or Bioren's "Laws," title Criminal Procedure.

² See St. Clair Papers, vol. ii. p. 361.

government of Virginia, both before this time and till his death. He was recognized as the chief county justice until the beginning of 1775, when, preferring to side with Virginia in the civil troubles, he was displaced by order of the Governor, which order recognizes him as the presiding justice. It is therefore presumable that the appointment of him at first was from the consideration of these facts, for he was only about forty-two years old at the time. But it is certain that he was a natural-born gentleman of the old school, and a patriot without dissimulation. He was personally acquainted with Washington, and on intimate terms with him from long before Washington was a public personage until they were separated by death. Washington mentions him in several places in his journals and correspondence. He served under Braddock with Washington, who procured him an ensigncy. He was remarkable for his hospitality, none passing his door without a hearty welcome in. He was said to be of a singular good nature and great humanity, tender-hearted and charitable, was possessed of sound judgment, and was a brave and tried soldier. He was among those inhabitants of Western Pennsylvania calling themselves citizens of West Augusta County, who in 1775 met at Pittsburgh to give expression to their views on the troubles then appearing. Crawford, as a prominent citizen, was placed upon the committee to which was intrusted the defense and protection of the people there. When actual hostilities began he raised a regiment of Western Virginians and Westmorelanders, and received a colonel's commission in the Continental army. In the course of the war, such men as he being more needed where better known, he returned to his home. During the latter end of the Revolution his energies were interested in protecting the western border, in devising methods for its protection, and in watching against the British and Indians in the West. Under his instruction the fort called Crawford's Fort was built on the Allegheny, at the mouth of Puckety Creek. So high did he stand that in 1782 he was chosen to command the expedition against the Indian towns on the Sandusky, for after much suffering the inhabitants jointly volunteered to carry the war into the hive itself. This expedition, called Crawford's expedition, stands out prominently on the page of border history, and the success of the Indians, the capture of Crawford, his terrible death at the stake witnessed by Dr. Knight, the fiendish joy of the savages avenging the death of their former comrades by the most horrid torture ever depicted or related, the cool, calculating, unrelenting picture of that man Girty (who escaped immortality from being unknown to Dante), these help to form the last scene in the life of Crawford, the first of the colonial judges, above the rest honored by his fellow-citizens as the first presiding judge of Westmoreland County.

In regard to the distinction of president judge,—“Precedent Judge,” as it was written,—it is to be observed that at the change of the government into other hands at the time of the Revolution a law was enacted which regulated anew the judicial system. This law¹ authorized the president and Council to appoint one of the justices in each county to preside in the respective courts, in whose absence the justices present could choose one of themselves for the time being. But it would seem that no appointment was made for Westmoreland till October, 1785, when, as appears by a minute of the Council of that day, John Moore was appointed president of the Courts of Common Pleas, Quarter Sessions, and Orphans' Court for the county of Westmoreland.² Moore, at the time he received the appointment, was on the bench as one of the justices, under a previous commission, embracing Christopher Truhy, John Moore, and William Jack. Moore first sat as president judge at Greensburg. Five years later, by the constitution of 1790 as the organic law of the State, these president judges were to be professional lawyers, or learned in the law. Judge Addison, who has left a number of reports, frequently referred to as good authority, was the first legal-learned judge, being the first under the Constitution. He sat on the bench of this judicial district from 1791 to 1803, when he was succeeded by Judge Roberts.

JUDGE JOHN MOORE.

John Moore, of Westmoreland County, the son of William Moore and Jennett Wilson, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., in 1738. His father died when John was a small boy, and his mother, in company with her brothers, Charles and John Wilson, removed to the district of Westmoreland County as early as 1757. At the commencement of the Revolution John Moore was engaged in cleaning out and cultivating a large farm of four hundred acres on Crabtree Run, a branch of the Loyalhanna; two miles south of New Alexandria. A comfortable stone dwelling, still in pretty good condition, marks the place of his residence, and indicates a man in advance of the rude civilization of that day. He was a member of the Convention of July 15, 1776, and appointed by that body on the Committee of Safety. In 1777 he was appointed a justice of the peace, and subsequently surveyor of the public lands in Westmore-

¹ Act 28 January, 1777.

² George Baird, Esq., was at the time also on the bench under a commission dated 20th November, 1784. Moore's commission is recorded in book "A," p. 544, recorder's office. Moore presided the last time at the July term, 1791. At the October term, 1791, Alexander Addison opened his commission. He sat as president judge, with William Todd and William Jack as second and third judges. While Addison was president judge, the courts were sometimes carried on in his absence by the other judges, his associates on the bench.

Southwestern Pennsylvania. As claimed by Pennsylvania it was, in 1767, in Cumberland County, subsequently in Bedford, afterwards in Westmoreland, and finally in Fayette County, when, on the 26th of September, 1783, the latter was formed.

Much information about Crawford will be found in "Crawford's Expedition against Sandusky," by Butterfield.

land County. In 1779 he was commissioned one of the justices of the several courts of Westmoreland, and in 1785 was presiding judge. Under the constitution of 1790, Judge Moore was retired from the bench, being succeeded by the celebrated Judge Addison. In 1792 he was chosen to the State Senate from the district of Allegheny and Westmoreland. He died in 1812, aged seventy-three years, and is buried at Congruity Church. Judge Moore married a daughter of Isaac Parr, of New Jersey, a woman of intelligence, vivacity, and fine personal appearance. She survived her husband many years. In personal appearance Judge Moore was a man full six feet in height, straight and erect, had large brown eyes, brown hair, and nose rather aquiline. He had two sons and four daughters. One of his sons was county surveyor of Westmoreland, the other, a civil engineer, died in Kentucky. His daughters were respectively married to Maj. John Kirkpatrick, a merchant of Greensburg; John M. Snowden, of Allegheny County, mayor of Pittsburgh, and associate judge of the county; Rev. Francis Laird, D.D., father of Hon. Harrison P. Laird and John M. Laird, Esq., of Greensburg; and the fourth, James McJunkin, a farmer of Westmoreland County.¹

INCREASE IN LEGAL BUSINESS.

But the change in the system of litigation has been as marked as any change within the county in the hundred years of its existence. Perhaps the difference between the early practice and the practice at this day is as great—to make use of a strained metaphor—as the difference between the log house of Robert Hanna and the court-house at Greensburg. It has been observed that in petty States and narrow territories fewer laws suffice than in larger and more populous districts, because there are fewer objects on which the law can operate. It is also noticeable that the amount of litigation is increased, not so much by the difficulty of deciding questions of law as by determining matters of fact. These changes have been imperceptibly brought about and in a way unconsciously, as the change from boyhood to manhood is unconscious. The amount of legal business of the county of Westmoreland as it is now, since almost a score of other counties have been taken from its original limits, has increased, within the hundred years, probably tenfold. The number of cases entered in the Common Pleas docket in the first three years after the organization of the county in 1773 aggregated 1330. One-half of this number was embraced in the first four terms, and which made up the first year's business. It must be remembered that there was an accumulation of business awaiting to be disposed of. The number of cases on the continuance docket in the same court, beginning with February term, 1873, and including the first twelve terms, aggregate 7851. The average number for each term of the first twelve terms, beginning in 1773, is 111. But probably the most correct average for possibly the first twenty years would be the average per term from July term, 1774, to April term, 1776, which was about 65. The average per term for the first twelve terms after 1873—that is to say, from the February term, 1873, to February term, 1876, inclusive—is 650, while the average number per term of the eight terms which correspond with the eight just mentioned is about 790, or above twelve times as many.

DIFFERENCE IN PRACTICE.

And great as the difference seems merely in the number of cases, the difference in the practice is equally as great. The forms of the early practice and pleadings, as has been observed by Chief Justice Agnew, were simple. The body of the civil law was not laden with technicalities. Trespass on land or cattle, on the person or on the effects of the settler, violations of petty contract, contests for land in the most common way and in the simplest form were usually the subject of forensic dispute, and the actions themselves were in trespass, trover, and assumpsit, covenant, replevin, and in ejectment. Now that the land is filled with business of new kinds, new agents for its execution, and new forms of contract, new laws have been passed and novel forms of procedure introduced, new wrongs have been occasioned and new remedies have come with them, so that now we have feigned issues, bills of discovery, bills for injunction, writs of mandamus and quo warranto, of error coram nobis et vobis. We have what you call the corporation lawyer, the divorce lawyer, the Quarter Sessions lawyer, the proctor, the counselor, the solicitor, the master in chancery. This is all changed since Michael Huffnagle pleaded at the bar before the Hon. Charles Foreman, "Precedent of our Court of Common Pleas."

By the rules regulating the admission of attorneys, adopted at the January sessions of 1783, the applicant was required, if above twenty-one years of age, to have read for three years; was to have been a resident of some one of the United States at least one year previous, and was to take the oath of allegiance imposed by act of Assembly before he could practice. By this time the bar of Western Pennsylvania had some very good local practitioners, and the requisites for admission were somewhat more imperative. Under the old colonial arrangement the qualifications necessary for a practicing attorney at the county courts were not extensive, neither was there much responsibility attached to him in a professional capacity outside the practice in the higher courts.

As there is no list of the early practitioners at the Westmoreland bar extant, we have gathered together all that we could find, some appearing and conducting suits the evidence of whose admission is not accessible. We have taken the names from the old appearance dockets in the office of the prothonotary and out of the minutes of the Quarter Sessions Court. We give the dates of admission when so stated, and otherwise the terms at which we find their first appearance respectively, although these dates do not invariably correspond with the dates of admission. Sometimes, indeed, attorneys from neighboring counties were admitted, on motion, at several successive terms.

¹ From sketch by William H. Egle, M.D., in Penn. Hist. Magazine.

FIRST REGULAR ATTORNEYS.

The first regular attorney whose admission at this bar is noticed is Francis Dade, who was admitted on Aug. 3, 1773. In the April term of 1774 we find the names of Epsy, Irwin (written, properly, Erwin), Smiley, Galbraith, and Wilson; in October term, 1774, Megraw, and sometimes St. Clair, conducts cases. Mr. Wilson makes the motions of record in the Quarter Sessions during 1773. At the January sessions of 1779, on motion of David Sample, himself of course a practitioner, Samuel Erwin was admitted to practice. Sample was State's attorney in 1779. Michael Huffnagle was admitted in 1779, on motion of David Semple. The only observation touching the professional career of this very prominent citizen which we have yet come across is contained in a letter from St. Clair to President Reed, dated March 26, 1781. On the consideration of the bill to erect Washington County, Gen. St. Clair recommended Huffnagle to the office of prothonotary, as "a young gentleman now in the practice of the law in Westmoreland," and who, he said, was a man of probity, and capable of filling the office with propriety. He had served a regular apprenticeship (the old word used around the temple) to Mr. Shippen, of Lancaster, and had come to St. Clair strongly recommended. He had worked in the office with Brison and as private clerk to St. Clair for a number of years, and during the time he served him (so the general continues) he gave satisfaction not only to him, but very generally to everybody who had business at the office.

In the April sessions of 1780, Robert Galbraith and Thomas Smith were admitted. At January term, 1785, Ross and Young appear; at April term, Scott; and at October term, Thompson. Ross and Woods mostly appear together, they being located at Pittsburgh at that time. Hugh Henry Brackenridge, afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, was admitted at a court held before Edward Cook on the second Tuesday of April, 1781, on motion of Mr. Smith. On the same day James Berwick was also admitted and sworn. In the January sessions of 1782, James Hamilton was admitted; in the January sessions of 1783, Thomas Duncan and George Thompson; in 1784, John Woods. On the second Tuesday of April, 1782, on motion of Brackenridge, Mr. David Bradford was admitted an attorney at this court, he having read under Mr. Chaw, of Maryland. This man was afterwards the head and front of the Whiskey Insurrection, and died, self-expatriated, a wealthy planter on the lower Mississippi, after having made his name both famous and infamous.¹

These attorneys were among the first, and they practiced while yet the courts were held at Hannastown, and before the removal of the county-seat, about 1785. Of these, Andrew Ross, Magraw, Galbraith, David Sample, James Wilson, and Epsy were lawyers belonging to the Bedford County bar. James Ross and Bradford were first of the Washington County bar, although Ross afterwards removed to Pittsburgh. Brackenridge had located at Pittsburgh in 1781.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE EARLY PRACTICE.

There were, therefore, in the early days no regular resident lawyers while yet Hannastown was the county-seat, and the bar was made up when the court came together. The practice which a regular professional lawyer might have acquired would not have been a profitable one. His pay for the most part would have been in truck (quid pro quo), such as turkey, venison, cordwood, and pelts. The eminent jurist, Hugh H. Brackenridge, when a young attorney, received for his retainer in defending the Indian Mamachtaga, hung at Hannastown for murder, a quantity of beaver-skins. From the fact of there having been so few resident attorneys at Hannastown has, in all probability, arisen the delusion, still cherished by the oldest settlers, that the "Hannastown Age" was the golden age, vainly, vainly hoped for by mortals to come again. The lawyers then followed in the train of the itinerant justices of the State (and afterwards with the president judges of the Common Pleas) when they came out on their circuits. It is said that when court was opened many of these awaited at the steps of the court-house for clients, and their appearance was frequently entered on the day of the trial. The bench and the bar—judges, clerks, and lawyers—traveled together on horseback. Some of these early practitioners who thus came out at first as the country progressed settled at different county-seats in Western Pennsylvania. Westmoreland embraced Pittsburgh till 1788, and there were resident lawyers there as early as 1781, and in 1786 there were three,—Brackenridge, Ross, and Woods. These had to come to Hannastown and Greensburg before Allegheny County was erected, and when that event occurred there was already the nucleus of a bar gathered around Robert Hanna's house, which ever since its organization has held a distinguished place among the bars of the Commonwealth.

The appearance of the court, such as it was, at Hannastown, when the justices opened their commissions, was not such, we may imagine, as would conduce to the dignity of county trials. The judges sat on common hickory chairs, raised by way of eminence on a clapboard bench. As the room was small there was no separate place either for the bar or the people, but all sat promiscuously together. So, from the same inconvenience, they sometimes filled the jail building so full with prisoners that they had either to let some go without serving an imprisonment, or else make them pay up in the pillory or at the post.¹ As all the officers of the court were ordinarily well known to most of the citizens, part of that dignity which a separate profession brings was necessarily lost. But, on the other hand, when the chief justice came round and took his seat in the Criminal Court, his dignified demeanor and his scarlet robe commanded a reverence which was wanting in the county sessions. In many instances those rough parties, with bullying propensities, resisted the hand of the constables under the eyes of the county judges. "Give him a fair chance and clear him of the law, and he would lick any of them." To such it was necessary, as in the instance mentioned by Brackenridge,² to call in the posse comitatus, the power of the county, to carry him to the nearest stable or pig-pen, so that he was kept in custody till the dignity of the law was fully recognized.

¹ Bradford was a Marylander, having come into Washington County while it was under the Virginia regime, and represented one of its counties in the Legislature of that Commonwealth. He was a brother-in-law of Judge James Allison (grandfather of Hon. John Allison, late register of United States Treasury), and of Judge Charliss Porter, of Fayette. A granddaughter became the wife of Richard Brodhead, United States senator from Pennsylvania, 1851-57, and a son is said to have married a sister of Jefferson Davis.—Veech in Centenary Memorial.

The principal part of the early law business was of a civil nature, or of such ordinary transactions as arise between man and man, and which, by far, are the most numerous of causes arising among citizens. Our ancestors were not, in the sense we form the idea, a litigious people. If one had committed an offense against the peace he was apprehended on the warrant of a justice and taken to the county jail. If he could get bail he was, of course, bailed out. When the sessions met and he had been convicted of a larceny or house-breaking, the punishment was summary. He was taken out of the court-house, so called, and flogged, or compelled to stand in the pillory. As the fines belonged, in part, to the revenue, these pecuniary fines laid upon offenders amounted, in the relative value of money, to a considerable sum, and they were exacted in nearly every instance. But if he had no money and no means of getting any, he had to make up for his fine by so many stripes, the precise value of which severally, without inquiring minutely, we are unable to state. As the jail or prison-house was often insufficient for all offenders, it became absolutely necessary, when it was full, for a general delivery. Nor would it have been in Christian keeping to have let them loose without some special mark put upon them to remind them, and all, of the power of the justices and of the inflexibility of justice. It was not always that the jail held those that were taken, and it was not always that an offender could be taken. It was no difficult matter for one of the mountaineers to evade, nay, to resist, the officers. In some districts process of law could not be served.

Thus, even after law was established, from the necessity of the thing there had arisen a kind of unwritten law, which obtained with all the force of written law, and of which one may find, if he is curious to discover, traces at this day. The status of a people who commence colonies in a civilized State and age is different from the status of those who, by slow and almost imperceptible advances, have arisen out of original barbarism by their own developments. This is logically and elegantly put by Adam Smith in his "Wealth of Nations," and we advert to it here as fitting. And, indeed, had there been no law commanding this and forbidding that, yet would these very colonists have been guided by certain and invariable customs as easily determinable as any written obligation. Our early court-rolls are not encumbered with long criminal calendars. In proportion to the ordinary civil cases, affrays, riots, sureties of the peace, assaults and batteries, and such like misdemeanors are, in comparison, few. Even in such a state we have no evidences of the compounding of felonies; nay, literally there was more "pounding" than compounding.

H. H. BRACKENRIDGE.

Hugh Henry Brackenridge fills such a large space in our history that we shall meet with his name and have occasion to make observations upon some of his actions in various as well as numerous instances. We shall advert to him in his character of lawyer and individual.³

Judge Brackenridge was indeed an extraordinary man, and differed much in many things from other men. Nature had done everything for him, and yet he labored as if she had done nothing. His person, voice, and manner would have rendered him a star of the first order on the stage. His eye, his glance, the sound of his voice would sometimes make the blood run cold in the veins. His mind was of the highest poetic order, but of the most astonishing versatility.¹ He could at perfect command excite a tragic horror or occasion peals of laughter, but he seldom attempted the pathetic. His imagination ascended the highest heaven of invention. When he began to speak he frequently labored under great embarrassment. He has thus been compared to an eagle rising from level ground, but as he proceeded he rose by degrees, and when he poured himself upon his career he seemed to range through heaven, earth, and sea.² Some of his flights were as wonderful as those of Bourdaloue or Curran. The fame of his wonderful powers is confined to the few who witnessed them, and to a feeble tradition. It was his misfortune to display his talents on an obscure and circumscribed theatre, and on subjects seldom fitted to call them forth.

³ HUGH HENRY BRACKENRIDGE.—Hugh H. Brackenridge was a native of Scotland, born in Campbellton in 1748. At the age of five he came with his father to Pennsylvania. He became a tutor at Princeton, having graduated at that college in 1771, and was master of an academy in Maryland when the Revolution broke out. He removed to Philadelphia, and having studied divinity became a chaplain in the army. Relinquishing the pulpit for the bar, he edited for a time the United States Magazine. In 1781 he settled at Pittsburgh. In 1786 he was sent to the Legislature to attain the establishment of the county of Allegheny. Was made a judge in 1789, when he was appointed to the vacancy caused by the election of McKean Governor, and from 1799 until his death was judge of the Supreme Court of the State. The part he took in the Whiskey Insurrection made him prominent. He vindicated his course in that affair in his "History of the Whiskey Insurrection," published the year after. Washington, Hamilton, and Mifflin well understood his position. He published a poem on the "Rising Glory of America," 1774; "Eulogium on the Brave who fell in the Contest with Great Britain," delivered at Philadelphia, July 4, 1779; "Modern Chivalry, or the Adventures of Capt. Farrago," 1796, an admirable satire; "Oration," July 4, 1793; "Gazette Publicatione Collected," 1806. He died at Carlisle on the 25th of June, 1816 (Archives, Second Series, vol. iv., et seq.). The eulogium may be found in Niles' "Register."

¹ A common saying, "from post to pillar," is a corruption traceable to this original.

² "Recollections," by H. M. Brackenridge.

But fortunately for us we still have as a blessed heritage his contributions to the literature of Western Pennsylvania,—contributions of value untold, and which are growing more precious day by day. In his occasional contributions to the periodicals of his day we have preserved many facts which are now the capital stock of the provincial annalist, while the articles which, as a young man, for his amusement he submitted for publication are, as it were, brands snatched out of the fire. In them are sentences here and there which the future historian will seize upon as texts and quote as authority. But his "Modern Chivalry" is undoubtedly one of the happiest hits ever made in that range of American literature. It not only exposes with a keen wit the abuses of our popular form of government, but it preserves many of the customs, provincialisms, and manners of the people of that day and generation. The most prominent and notorious of the political and religious characters of Southwestern Pennsylvania are therein caricatured. Thus Findley, our member of Congress, appears as Traddle; James Ross and Woods as Valentine and Orson; many of the expressions Capt. Fargo uses are merely the expressions and the opinions of Brackenridge himself, and doubtless in almost every chief character therein delineated he intended to, and actually did, portray or make allusion to some prominent actor in the farce of the Whiskey Insurrection, if we only had the clew to find it out.

As to his style, it is pleasing, and his writings abound with apt allusions to the history, poetry, and mythology of the ancients. He excelled in repartee, and a shadow of regret cannot but pass along when we think how many brilliant jests, pathetic appeals, and ornate sentences were lost among the brown rafters of Robert Hanna's rickety log cabin.

The personal habits and individual characteristics of distinguished men are always matters of curiosity and interest. Some of these characteristics in Brackenridge were marked. He never dined out or invited to dinner, and was unwilling to see company until after tea. This, therefore, was the time for persons to drop in to hear his conversation. In this none excelled him; although during the day it was difficult to get him to say a word, except on business. It was a treat to hear him speak when he chose to unbend. He could relate a story where the illusion was so perfect that the hearer would suppose there were half a dozen characters on the stage. The famous Jeffrey, in one of the numbers of the Edinburgh Review, says that Matthews, the English comedian, was inferior to him in relating a story; and of all men competent to judge, Jeffrey was perhaps the most competent.³ He generally walked about as he conversed, and likewise when he was speaking he was constantly moving himself. It has been remarked that what he said on the bench while seated had nothing of his usual eloquence, and when he was eloquent there, which was but seldom, he rose upon his feet.

JAMES ROSS.

We regard ourselves fortunate in having access to the personal recollections of a lawyer of Western Pennsylvania, one of the principal practitioners at the bar at an early day and a judge of no mean reputation. Of these recollections and of his observations therein we shall, so far as they refer to our subject, make full use.

Judge H. M. Brackenridge, son of H. H. Brackenridge, or the "old" judge, the lawyer to whom we refer, in his "Recollections of the West" says that Mr. James Ross was at that time—the beginning of the present century—decidedly at the head of the Western bar.⁴ His reputation was, however, not confined to the town of Pittsburgh or State of Pennsylvania. He had occupied the point of display on the largest theatre America affords, the Senate of the United States, and there he had ranked as the equal of Bayard, Gouverneur Morris, and Giles. He had a large

³ See "Reminiscences of Thomas Carlyle," by Froude.

⁴ JAMES ROSS was a Pennsylvanian, born in York County, July 12, 1762. He was educated at Pequea, under Rev. Dr. Robert Smith, and taught at Cannonsburg. He studied law in Philadelphia, and was admitted to the bar in 1784. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1790, and an able defender of the Federal Constitution. He was United States senator from 1794 to 1803, and a commissioner of the United States to the Western insurgents. He died at Pittsburgh, Nov. 27, 1847. He published "Speech on the Free Navigation of the Mississippi," 1803.

THOMAS SMITH, one of the early practitioners at Hannastown, was a native of Scotland. He emigrated to America at an early age; was a lawyer by profession. He was appointed deputy surveyor Feb. 9, 1769, and established himself at Bedford. He was prothonotary, clerk of the sessions, and recorder of Bedford County, colonel of the militia in the Revolution, member of the Convention of 1776, member of the State Legislature, member of the Old Congress, 1780-82, president judge of the judicial district of Cumberland, Mifflin, Huntingdon, Bedford, and Franklin Counties, 1791-94, judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1794 to 1809. He died at Bedford June, 1809.—Arch., N. S., iv.

¹ The poet Bruce, of Washington County, thus describes him:

"In an auld bigging dwalt a starling
Wha was o' ilka bird the darling."

² "Per omnes terrasque, tractumque maris, coelumque profundum."

and noble frame, and a head of Homeric cast, indicating his capacious mind. His voice was clear and full, while his thoughts and action flowed in a majestic stream. He was remarkable for the clear and perspicuous manner of treating his subject, and he possessed a perfect command over his hearers by the self-possession which he always displayed. Sometimes he would thunder, sometimes indulge in a vein of pleasantry, but he must be classed among those prodigies of mind who, like Webster and the orators of a later day, bent the will of men by appealing to their reason, and who instruct where they do not convince by the depth of their thought and the extent of their knowledge. He never tripped or appeared at a loss for an expression. Every sentence might be written down as it was spoken, the result probably of careful preparation at first, which became a second nature.

JOHN WOODS.

The reputation of Mr. Woods as a skillful lawyer was also high. His person was fine, and his dress and manner bespoke the gentleman, although there was a touch of aristocratic pride about him which lessened his popularity. His voice was rather shrill and unpleasant, especially when contrasted with his manly appearance, but, like John Randolph, his ear-piercing voice often gave effect to a powerful invective. Few lawyers could manage a case with more skill. He was deeply versed in the subtleties of the law of tenures and ejection causes. Being possessed of a handsome fortune, he rather shunned than courted practice, but in a difficult case the suitor thought himself fortunate when he could secure his assistance.

STEEL SEMPLE.

But the great favorite of the younger members of the bar was Steel Semple, who ought to be considered at the head of the corps of regular practitioners. In stature he was a giant of "mighty bone," and possessed a mind cast in as mighty a mould. Personally he was timid and sluggish. As a speaker his diction was elegant, sparkling, and classical. His wit was genuine. He was at the same time a prodigy of memory, a gift imparted to him in kindness to supply the want of industry, although it is not every indolent man who is thus favored. Mr. Semple was conversant with all the polite and fashionable literature of the day, and was more of a modern than his distinguished competitors. It is no less strange than true that for the few first years of his appearance at the bar his success was very doubtful. His awkward manner, his hesitation and stammering, his indolent habits occasioned many to think that he had mistaken his vocation. Judge Brackenridge, the elder, was almost the only person who saw his future eminence. He was unfortunately carried off when he had just risen to distinction. He fell a victim to that vice which unhappily has too often overtaken the most distinguished in every profession. He died when a little turned of forty. His fame had not traveled far from the display of his powers, which is usually the case in professions which must be seen and felt to be appreciated.

HENRY BALDWIN AND WILLIAM WILKINS.

Two younger members of the bar were at that time rapidly rising and taking the lead in the practice of the court at Allegheny, and each of these had a respectable clientage in Westmoreland as long as they continued to practice here. They were Mr. Henry Baldwin and Mr. William Wilkins, the first afterwards distinguished as a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, the other as a politician, a member of Congress, a cabinet officer, and a foreign minister. The first appearance of both these gentlemen was attended with brilliant success, although they were entirely unlike each other. Mr. Baldwin was a deeply-read lawyer and an excellent scholar, but in his person and manner remarkably plain and unstudied. He was a warm, rapid, and cogent speaker, at the same time close, logical, and subtle. He invariably exhausted his subject, but studiously avoided all ornament or unnecessary verbiage. He entered at once in medias res, and ended without peroration when he had nothing more to say. Mr. Wilkins was more than genteel in his person; his features were cast in the Roman mould, and his dress always neat and even elegant. His manner was excellent, his voice and enunciation clear and distinct. He was diffuse in his speeches, and wanted method, argument, and depth of philosophical acumen; but he knew those whom he addressed, as the musician knows the instrument he touches. He was, therefore, a successful and a justly popular advocate.

LEGAL ABILITY OF THE EARLY BAR.

With knowledge of these one should, therefore, greatly err if he should measure the standard of professional ability of the lawyers who then traveled on the circuit and pleaded in these backwoods and the justices of the Supreme Court of that day who came out with them to deliver the jails, with the standard of professional ability of those attorneys who pleaded before the county justices and with the county justices themselves. At no time in the history of the Pennsylvania bar has the professional ability of those regular lawyers been rated higher than it is now. With St. Clair for prothonotary in a court in which Brackenridge, Espy, Ross, and Smith pleaded before McKean and Yeates there might have been, as there were, some lawyers of mediocre talent and attainments, but they were not all of mediocre talent and attainments.

At that day, and much later, the attention of the student was chiefly directed to the law of terms and the books of reports. The course of study embraced the more abstruse branches of the profession, such as are almost obsolete at the present day, and perhaps required a more intense strain upon the reasoning powers. They may be called the arcana of the law, far too deep for the reach of common sense, distinctions so refined and subtle as to require to be seen through the microscope of mental vision.

In the early courts the law was not so much settled as made by the most plausible and ingenious reasoner. At this day in our practice the pleadings are closer, the professional training more technical, and the bounds and limits of the law more definite and less varying.

These lawyers whom we have named were regular practitioners at the Westmoreland courts and belonged to this bar. Each of them had a clientage here, they appeared regularly at the sittings of the court, and they were personally well acquainted with many of our people. But something shall now be said of those who were citizens of Westmoreland in every sense, who were here located and resident, who had their offices here, who had come to remain, and who were, strictly speaking, the bar of the county. And first as to the bench.

THE BENCH.

The judges learned in the law who have presided over the courts of Westmoreland since the adoption of the constitution of 1789-90, with their respective terms, have been as follows: Alexander Addison, from 1790 to 1803; Samuel Roberts, from 1803 to 1805; John Young, 1806-36; Thomas White, 1836-47; Jeremiah M. Burrell, 1847-48; John C. Knox, 1848-50, J. M. Burrell, 1851-55; Joseph Buffington, 1855-71; James A. Logan, 1871-79; and James A. Hunter, the present incumbent.

Of these, Judge Burrell, Judge Logan, and Judge Hunter were natives of the county, and were practitioners at this bar at the time of their elevation to the bench. Judge Young was a native of Scotland, but located in Westmoreland, and was a practitioner here when he was made judge.

JUDGE ADDISON.

Alexander Addison was a native of Ireland, born 1759. He was educated at Edinburgh, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Aberlowe, Scotland. He emigrated to Pennsylvania, and on Dec. 20, 1785, applied to the Presbytery of Redstone to be taken under their care. The examination did not prove altogether satisfactory, but permission was granted him to preach in the bounds of the Presbytery, application having been made from the town of Washington for the stated labors of Mr. Addison. Shortly after he gave up preaching and gave his attention to the law. He finally settled at Pittsburgh as a lawyer. He was president judge of the district which included the four western counties engaged in the Whiskey Insurrection, and sat on the bench for twelve years. He was removed by impeachment, through political rancor. He was an accomplished scholar and cultivated writer. He published "Observations on Gallatin's Speech," 1798; "Analysis of the Report of a Committee of the Virginia Assembly," 1800; "Pennsylvania Reports," 1800. Dr. Carnahan says of him, "A more intelligent, learned, upright, and fearless judge was not to be found in the State." His charge to the grand jury during the insurrection is a noble monument of his talents and worth. He died Nov. 24, 1807.

OLD JUDICIAL FORMS, Etc.

The judges of the Supreme Court and of the District Court in early times appeared in black gowns when they sat in the civil courts, but in scarlet gowns when they sat in the criminal court. The late Alexander Johnston, Esq., of Kingston House, used to say that when he was sheriff of the county (1808) it was customary, and had been so before his incumbency, for the sheriff, at the head of the tipstaves, to go to the house at which the judge stopped, or the residence where he lived, and on the opening day of the term escort him thence to the court-house. The sheriff, at the head of the procession, carried a white wand or rod.

The early judges were close observers of the old forms of the English procedure, and especially so in the forms of the criminal practice. The jurors were not provided with chairs till some time during Judge Young's term, but they were compelled to stand from the beginning to the end of a long, tedious trial. The only manner in which they could get relief from the weariness of a long-continued posture was for them, time about, to rest upon the shoulders of each other by bearing their weight on their hands.

Under the judicial system of 1790 two associate laymen composed a part of the bench. The old associate judges were sometimes men of some ability and aptitude in the law, although this character of the gentlemen was not the rule but the exception. They could and ordinarily did transact the occasional business of the courts in the absence of the president judge. Thus at February term, 1841, in the Common Pleas minutes for Monday, Feb. 15, 1841, is this entry: "The Hon. Thomas White, having just recovered from an attack of smallpox, thought it not prudent to attend as president of our court on this week, and John Lobingier, Esq., one of his associates, being in attendance, and having received the foregoing intimation from Judge White by letter, took the bench, called the jurors, and adjourned till 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Tuesday morning, 16th, Judge Pollock in attendance with Judge Lobingier. Grand jurors called, sworn, and charged by Judge Pollock, constables' returns made, etc., and proceeded to business in the Quarter Sessions."

These associates were sometimes called assistants; for instance, the record in 1793 says, "At a court held before Hon. Alexander Addison and his assistants."

Of Judge Samuel Roberts we know little. His term was short, and was not marked by any unusual

Eng. by A. H. Payne

Yours sincerely John Young event. He first presided at June term, 1803, the term beginning on the third Monday, the 20th day of the month, and presided for the last time at December term, 1805. For those terms, as well likewise at subsequent terms, jurors were drawn on the panel from Armstrong County, and from Indiana County, to sit and try causes which were tried here at Greensburg from their vicinage.

JUDGE JOHN YOUNG

was born in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, on the 12th of July, 1762. He was a member of an ancient Scottish family, distinguished for its wealth, learning, and high rank, branches of it having been ennobled before the reign of the unhappy Mary, Queen of Scots.

Mr. Young's father and grandfather were both surnamed John. He had three brothers, named Thomas, Douglass, and William, and one sister, named Mary. They were all liberally educated. The father of Judge Young was a wealthy merchant of Glasgow, and lived in a style becoming his station and wealth, and gained a reputation for great liberality and kindness of heart, which qualities his son inherited in an eminent degree.

Through the generous impulses of a nature ever ready to serve his friends and relatives he became financially involved. He bailed his brother William for a large amount, for which debt his property was all sold, and he died in ten days after in consequence of the anxiety of mind which that event caused him.

At the time of his father's death Mr. Young was a student at law, and a clerk in the office of Sir Walter Scott's father. After he had procured places for his younger brothers, he emigrated to this country, and arrived in Philadelphia when about seventeen years of age, with, it is said, but one English shilling in his pocket. Here he attracted the notice and secured the favorable attention of Mr. Duponceau, then a notary public and sworn interpreter of foreign languages. He entered his office as a student-at-law on the 1st of January, 1784. On the 28th of January, 1785, Mr. Duponceau certifies that he derived great and valuable assistance from Mr. Young in his office, both in respect to legal matters and the French language.

Mr. Young afterwards entered the office of Judge Wilson, and studied law under him until his admission to the bar, Jan. 8, 1786, after which he practiced for some time in the Philadelphia and Chester County courts previous to his removal to Westmoreland County.

The high character of the Scotch and Scotch-Irish settlements in the western part of the State and their great prosperity induced Judge Young in 1789 to settle in Westmoreland County. He opened an office in Greensburg, then recently made the county-seat, and soon gained a large practice in this and adjoining counties by reason of his ability as a lawyer and his absolute integrity of character.

His extensive practice frequently called Mr. Young to the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore. In Philadelphia his predilections for the teachings of Swedenborg often brought him into association with Mr. Francis Bailey and his estimable family. In this family he became acquainted with a Miss Maria Barclay, an orphan girl, to whom he was so drawn by the attraction of congenial tastes that he ultimately made her his wife. He was past twenty-four and she was past twenty-one years of age when they were married in Philadelphia by the Rev. Nicholas Collin, then rector of the Swedish Churches in Pennsylvania, with whom he had become acquainted in his inquiries about Swedenborg, whom Mr. Collin had personally known in Sweden. From the certificate of Mr. Collin it appears that Mr. Young and Miss Barclay were "joined in the banns of holy wedlock" "on the 12th day of November, in the year of Christ 1794." With this lady he lived in the strongest bonds of mutual attachment for many years, having had by her the issue of eight children,—three sons and five daughters. After the decease of this lady, beloved and respected by all, the judge contracted a second marriage with Miss Statira Barclay, a cousin of his former wife, by whom he had two children,—a son and a daughter.

Judge Young in Westmoreland County soon became known as a man of force and discretion. He was chosen in 1791, with Nehemiah Stokely, a survivor of the Revolutionary period, as a delegate to the first meeting at Pittsburgh called to consider the troubles occasioned by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1791, which imposed a duty upon spirits distilled within the United States. The revolt against the "excise act," as it was called, has been known ever since as the "Whiskey Insurrection."

Judge Young's participation in the negotiations between the contending parties added largely to his popularity and materially increased his clientage.

In the years 1792 and 1793, when the Indians were troublesome in the western parts of Pennsylvania, Judge Young served two terms of two months each in a military capacity. He was in some subordinate command, a captaincy it is believed, but not now positively known. He had, however, no passion for military pursuits, and soon and gladly returned to the more congenial walks of civil life in Greensburg.

Judge Young continued the practice of the law with eminent success till the year 1805. In that year a vacancy occurred in the president-judgeship of the Tenth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, then composed of the counties of Somerset, Cambria, Indiana, Armstrong, and Westmoreland. At that period Thomas McKean was Governor of the State. There were many applicants for the office, and among them lawyers of the first eminence at the Greensburg bar. Letters of solicitation were forwarded by the friends of Mr. Young, and it was currently reported that the Governor said he would appoint him, because he knew him to be qualified by his firmness, integrity, and great legal acquirements to preside over that talented though turbulent bar, but he did not like his religion!

Mr. Young was in fact appointed president judge of said district, his commission bearing date at Lancaster, the 1st of March, 1806, and held that office until the latter part of 1837, a period of thirty-one years, when, admonished by bodily infirmities, he resigned official station, and retired to private life to enjoy the repose appropriate to advanced age, and sweetened by the retrospections of a long and successful career of distinguished activity and usefulness.

When Mr. Young was appointed judge he was realizing from his legal engagements and his agencies an annual income of about five thousand dollars. This income he was reluctant to relinquish, and accepted the judgeship only on the earnest solicitations of his friends. He was generally employed in all the larger cases in the civil courts of this and the adjoining counties where titles to land were the subjects of legal adjudication. His proficiency in this branch of the law and his habits as a lawyer were notably displayed in one celebrated case. When the right to the land upon which the Roman Catholic Church and Monastery near Beatty Station now stands was in dispute between the secular and the regular clergy, Mr. Young was employed on one side, and H. H. Brackenridge, Esq., the father of Judge H. M. Brackenridge, of Tarentum, and himself afterwards a judge of the Supreme Court of the State, was employed on the other. Brackenridge had been educated for the ministry, and on the trial there was a great display of ecclesiastical law and learning. The bulls of Popes and the decrees of Councils were read in the original Latin, and explained in this case with ease and accuracy, and the exact extent to which canon law was acknowledged by the common and statute law.

Judge Young was at this time considered the best special pleader at the Western bar. His anxiety to sustain this nice though intricate practice in law brought him into collision with some of the members of the bar at an early day of his judicial career, which was one of the causes of an impeachment that was then gotten up against him, but which was not sustained by the Legislature. It was an abortive attempt to degrade a man whose integrity, benevolence, and general excellence of character wrung approving testimony from even his most active political opponents.

The person who preferred the charges in the articles of impeachment, and who was mainly instrumental in giving them currency and in preparing the way for their introduction, was one of the leading lawyers of the Westmoreland bar, Maj. John B. Alexander.

Judge Young showed his magnanimity of character in his courteous treatment of his accuser in their intercourse after the failure to impeach. As a judge he was noted for the clearness of his charges and instructions. His exposition of the law was so sound that in nearly all his cases his decisions were affirmed by the Supreme Court.

As a criminal judge, he invariably leaned to the side of mercy, and that the prisoner might have a fair and impartial trial he always manifested the utmost patience and anxiety to have the very words of the witness, which oftentimes produced collisions between him and the bar. And in all cases he tempered justice with every allowable lenience. He has been known to decide causes against persons who afterwards treated him with gross disrespect, and yet, when his decision had been affirmed in the Supreme Court on writ of error, to advance moneys to the very individuals who had showered upon him indecent reproaches and abuse to relieve them from the difficulties occasioned by the decision. He was ever the warm friend and devoted advocate of women in distress, and especially of widows and orphans. A case occurred in Camhria County in the year 1831. A man by the name of Fitzgihhons, a Catholic in religion, poor, but honest and industrious, had bought a piece of land and paid for it. But afterwards it appeared that a mortgage had been recorded against the land, of which he was not aware when he made the purchase. On that mortgage the land was advertised to be sold. The judge, when going into court one day, had his attention arrested by a woman crying, with two or three young children about her. He inquired the cause, and learning from her that her husband's land was to be sold on the mortgage, besides making himself acquainted with the facts in other quarters, he directed a Mr. McCabe to buy it in his own name with money which he advanced to him. Her husband, who was then lying at home sick, was told to meet him at the next court, at which time he gave him a lease at a low rate, and contracted to reconvey to him his land for the amount he gave the sheriff at the sale, on long payments, without interest, although he had been repeatedly offered a considerable advance on what he had paid for the land, on account of its value being increased by the proximity of the State improvements to it.

Judge Young survived his resignation a little over three years, dying Oct. 6, 1840. His remains were buried in the Greensburg burying-ground, which is now called the St. Clair Cemetery. Judge Young was in many respects a remarkable man, and might be called eccentric in some of his habits, an evidence, however, of his originality. He was a man of deep and varied learning in fields outside of his profession. He was master of seven languages, one of which he acquired after he was seventy years of age.

He was well versed in mathematics, moral and political philosophy, and polite literature. He was a brilliant Latin scholar, speaking the language fluently. He occasionally visited the Greensburg Academy when Thomas Will was the master, and the two learned men would frequently converse in the Latin tongue. He also spoke French with fluency. When James Johns, who had been educated at St. Omers, in France, was preceptor in the academy, Judge Young frequently visited him, and the two conversed with equal readiness in French and English. When Victor Noel, a Frenchman, was arrested and imprisoned in the Somerset County jail for the murder on the Allegheny Mountains of Mr. Pollock of Ligonier Valley, Judge Young presided at the trial, because his knowledge of the French language would secure the prisoner a fair trial. He explained the indictment and other forms of the trial to the prisoner in French, who had the satisfaction to be sentenced to be hanged in the polished language of his native land. Judge Young was remarkably well informed on church history and denominational beliefs, and with the best thought in the metaphysical world. In addition to his extensive law library, he left a large collection of miscellaneous books, magazines, and pamphlets, the best kind of evidence of scholarly tastes.

The religious opinions of Judge Young were in consonance with the teachings of that wonderful man, Emanuel Swedenborg. In common with many who have studied the teachings of Swedenborg, he saw in him a great teacher. When one reads what Emerson, one of the greatest philosophers of this age, has said of him, it will not be surprising why Judge Young, with his lofty ideal of justice and right living, embraced the tenets of the great Swede. Emerson says, "By force of intellect and in effect he is the last father in the church, and is not likely to have a successor. No wonder that his depth of ethical wisdom should give him influence as a teacher. To the withered traditional church yielding dry catechisms he let in nature again, and the worshiper, escaping from the vestry of verbs and texts, is surprised to find himself a party to the whole of his religion. His religion thinks for him and is of universal application. He turns it on every side, it fits every part of life, interprets and dignifies every circumstance. . . . The moral insight of Swedenborg, the correction of popular errors, the announcement of ethical laws take him out of comparison with any other modern writer, and entitle him to a place vacant for some ages among the lawgivers of mankind."

Judge Young, though he became devotedly attached to his adopted country, still retained a strong affection for the mother-country. The Albion, a handsome paper published in New York, was edited by a man named John Young, and it was intended to defend the interests and express the sentiments of British subjects resident in the United States. Its heading was adorned with a handsome engraving of the "rose, shamrock, and thistle," and its motto was expressed in the following Latin words: "Cælum, non animum, mutant, qui trans mare currunt" ("They change their sky, not their affections, who cross the sea"). Of this paper Judge Young was a patron, admirer, and reader.

By the failure of heirs in the direct line to the estate of Easter Culmore, in the county of Stirling, Scotland, Judge Young became Laird of Forrester, being next of kin in collateral degree. He was thus an American judge and Scottish laird at the same time.

A romantic interest is attached to the story of this inheritance, uniting as it does in the same individual the republican simplicity of a new world and the ancestral pride of the old, which compelled him to assume the name of Forrester in addition to that of Young.

The revenues of this Scotch estate amounted during the first half of the century to about three hundred pounds sterling, or fifteen hundred dollars yearly. When Judge Young emigrated to this country money was very scarce and lands very cheap. He made judicious investments, accepting land for fees, and in the course of a long life acquired a large amount of landed property in this country, besides holding stock in a number of corporations. His children were left wealthy.

The residence of Judge Young was on Main Street, opposite the present Methodist church building. It was a plain, unpretentious structure, weather-boarded and painted white. He dispensed a liberal hospitality; as a host was fond of entertaining company, and was especially partial to the society of learned men and travelers. His character and disposition were of the most amiable kind. His kindness to the poor and destitute was proverbial. During a time of great scarcity he sent a wagon-load of flour to the poor in one of the counties in which he presided as judge. He never permitted a poor man to leave his house without giving him something. He silenced all suggestions that he might possibly be giving to unworthy objects by fearing lest some one who was really needy might be turned away unaided. In short, so benevolent and kind-hearted was the judge to all who came within his sphere that all who knew him loved him, and so marked was he by integrity, truth, and uprightness that all respected him, despite of what many regarded as the eccentricities of his character and the errors of his religion. So, in closing an obituary notice of him in a Greensburg newspaper a neighbor of his said, "The affluence with which providence blessed the labors of Judge Young enabled him to gratify those kindly feelings for the wants of others which it was well known formed a prominent trait in his character. No one ever went from his door who sought charity without having reason to invoke the blessings of heaven upon the kindness of his heart. No juror ever sat in judgment upon a culprit without being reminded by the judge that it was better to let ninety-nine guilty ones go unpunished than that one innocent person should suffer. He was as remarkable for his politeness and courtesy as he was distinguished for the extent of his literary acquirements. Profound as a jurist, courteous as a citizen, affectionate as a father, upright as a judge, he discharged all those duties to his kindred, his country, and society, which will make him long remembered as a Christian, a philanthropist, and a patriot."

For the last few months that immediately preceded the close of his life on earth, he gave evident tokens that these qualities of his heart and life had eminently fitted him to die the death of the Christian.

Judge Young was at one time the owner of several slaves, but freed them before the time required by law. With their liberty he gave them also enough of money to start them in the world.

Judge H. M. Brackenridge, in his "Recollections," in recalling the days when he opened an office in Somerset, says that he spent a week in Greensburg at Judge Young's. "Here I enjoyed the society of the judge, and of my friend, Walter Forward, and the kind attentions of the best of women, Mrs. Young."

The sweet little villa, "Skara Glen," as the country residence of the judge was called, became the subject of one of the elder Brackenridge's poetic effusions. "Skara Glen" is now in the possession of his grandson, Frank Y. Clopper, Esq.

Judge Young was about six feet in height, of delicate mould, and of a dignified bearing, stooping slightly in his walk, occasioned by his contemplative habits. He usually dressed in plain black, with the conventional swallow-tailed coat and ruffled shirt worn by the English gentry of his time. He retained the fashion of wearing his hair in a cue. His face was well formed, the nose long and straight, his color "the pale cast of thought," and his expression always grave and thoughtful. His forehead was high and smooth, and his manner cool and impressive. Although he would sometimes unbend to smile, yet he was seldom known to laugh outright. In company he was very quiet—was a good listener rather than a fluent talker.

There are persons still living who saw the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, of that day, with Roger B. Taney as the chief of the one, and John Bannister Gibson as the chief of the other, and they all invariably bear testimony to the fact that no one of them inspired more respect, by personal appearance or deportment, than the Hon. John Young. An excellent portrait of him was painted by the celebrated artist Gilbert Stuart, the painter of the famous portrait of Washington known as the Stuart picture. This portrait of Judge Young corroborates all that has been said of his personal appearance. It is now the property of his grandson, Frank Y. Clopper, Esq., who has also one of his grandmother's, the wife of Judge Young, also painted by Stuart. They are both fine examples of Stuart's best work, and are with justice highly prized by their fortunate possessor.¹

¹ Judge Young retired from the bench at the end of November term, 1836. On that occasion he delivered a valedictory address to the grand jury. Alexander Johnston, Esq., was the foreman of the jury, and at

JUDGE THOMAS WHITE.

Immediately upon the resignation of Judge Young, Thomas White, Esq., of Indiana County, was commissioned president judge of the Tenth Judicial District, composed of the counties of Westmoreland, his request the valedictory was furnished to the public. It has never till now appeared in any book. It is a fair sample of the judge's style, and we insert it in behalf of those who still venerate his memory.

Mr. Johnston replied in the following remarks:

"The grand jury have unanimously called upon me, as their foreman, to express their high estimation of your services, impartiality, and integrity, and to say that you have their warm wishes, that peace and happiness may attend your retirement from public life, and also that a copy of your excellent valedictory address be furnished for publication.

"For myself, who have been long acquainted with you in private life, and intimately connected with the court in several ministerial capacities, I cordially unite with my fellow grand jurors in their feelings and wishes, and heartily join in their solicitation.

"To the Hon. JOHN YOUNG, president of the Tenth Judicial District:

"The grand jury, whom you have made the medium of addressing your fellow-citizens of Westmoreland County for the last time, among whom you have been long respected and beloved, and over whom you have presided in your official capacity for more than thirty years with impartiality and dignity, respectfully request a copy of your excellent address for publication.

"A. JOHNSTON, Foreman.

"GREENSBURG, Nov. 23, 1836."

ADDRESS.

"GENTLEMEN:

"Before I conclude, permit me to take this opportunity of announcing my intention to retire from public life on the rising of the present court. During thirty years as president of the Tenth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, which for about the half of that period comprehended Somerset, together with the four counties of Westmoreland, Armstrong, Indiana, and Cambria, it has been my study to discharge the duties of my office according to the best of my judgment without respect of either persons or parties. Neither ambition nor emolument could have induced me to accept of it. No efforts were used on my part to attain one attended with so much labor as well as responsibility as it was and has been. It was committed to me by the then Governor (McKean), whose character for independence of mind and high legal talents is justly entitled to respectful commemoration.

"That in various instances I have erred I am well aware. Such is the frailty of human nature, and of all civil institutions and laws, opening a wide field for construction, with the uncertainty and occasionally the conflict of evidence, every human tribunal cannot but be more or less fallible. From the very scope of the duties incumbent on me to afford satisfaction to every person was impracticable. Nor have I ever attempted to please any, or to court what is usually called popularity, which in the administration of justice would have been contrary to Sacred Writ, as well as sound reason. By this course I have lost nothing in the good opinion of the intelligent and impartial portion of the public, although it may have occasionally excited umbrage. Protected, as I gratefully acknowledge to have been, by the Divine Providence, the ebullitions of calumny (to which all holding public trusts are liable) have done me no real harm. I cheerfully take this occasion to declare that I cherish the Christian duty of forgiving all that may have intended any. I shall always remember the general favor of my fellow citizens for little short of half a century since my abode among them. My best wishes for their individual welfares and that of the community at large shall never be wanting.

"Let us, gentlemen, ever bear in mind that we must sooner or later be accountable for the due exercise of all our faculties. Liberty has been bestowed for beneficial ends. When abused it becomes a mere cloak to licentiousness, and is generally accompanied by the contempt of piety and virtue. This abuse leads to anarchy, the worst species of tyranny, followed by the overthrow of all genuine liberty. It ought, therefore, to be under the guidance of sound reason, and regulated by Divine Revelation, the fountains of all wisdom and intelligence,—'the light and the life of men.'

"I conclude with the best wishes for all my fellow-creatures, independent of external distinctions. We are all the children of one common Father, who causes the sun of His love and the rays of His wisdom to shine upon all."

Indiana, Armstrong, and Cambria. His commission was dated the 13th of December, 1836. On February the 20th, 1837, his commission was read in the Greensburg courts, when he took his seat on the bench here. He presided in these courts until the beginning of 1847, when J. M. Burrell, Esq., was appointed and commissioned his successor. Thomas White studied law in the office of the celebrated jurisconsult, William Rawle, in Philadelphia, and in 1821 commenced the practice of law at Indiana. He was then aged about twenty-one years. He soon obtained a good practice. He was also agent of George Clymer, who owned a large quantity of land in Indiana County, and particularly about the town of Indiana. He presided over the courts of this judicial district from 1836 to 1846. Early in the Rebellion he served as one of the commissioners in what was called the "Peace Convention," which met at Washington. He was of medium height; in manner polite and affable, but dignified. He took a great interest in agriculture, and was one of the projectors and supporters of the Indiana Agricultural Society, one of the most successful associations of the kind in the State. He died on the 23d of July, 1866, aged sixty-seven.

JUDGE BURRELL AND JUDGE KNOX.

On the 27th of February, 1847, Judge White's term as judge of the Tenth Judicial District expired, and on that day Governor Shunk nominated Jeremiah M. Burrell, an attorney of the Greensburg bar, to the Senate for the vacancy. The Senate not confirming the nomination, the Governor then sent in the names of Mr. Gilmore and Mr. McCandles, but the Whig Senate refused to confirm any other than Judge White, the late incumbent. The Governor, however, would send no other names in; went beyond any precedent existing in the history of the State growing out of a disagreement of the two co-ordinate powers to fill such a vacancy, and early in 1847 commissioned Mr. Burrell.

The question whether the Governor had power to fill the vacancy, and which arose upon the contemplation of the Governor to commission Mr. Burrell, was amply discussed. There had been only two legal expositions of parallel cases under the Constitution of the United States, which in the clause prescribing the method of supplying certain vacancies was identical with the Constitution of Pennsylvania. These expositions and opinions had been given by Mr. Wirt and by Mr. Taney, attorneys-general of the United States. These legal views were all the legal precedents, although there had been at least three actual precedents set by Presidents identical with this case. Upon the opinion based upon the authorities cited, the Governor unhesitatingly filled the commission.

The record of the Common Pleas Court has this minute:

"Monday morning, 24th May, A.D. 1847. Jeremiah M. Burrell, Esq., appeared on the bench and presented his commission from the Governor of Pennsylvania, dated 27th March, 1847, appointing him president judge of the Tenth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, composed of the counties of Cambria, Indiana, Armstrong, and Westmoreland, which being read, the courts were opened at eleven o'clock; Hons. John Moorhead and James Bell, associate judges, being also on the bench."

Jeremiah Murry Burrell was born near Murrysville, in Westmoreland County. His father was a Dr. Burrell, a native of Dauphin County, Pa., and his mother was a daughter of Gen. Murry, one of the founders of Murrysville. He was an only son. His parents were wealthy, and he received a liberal education. He was prepared for college by a learned Scotchman, Thomas Will, at the Greensburg Academy, and finished his education at Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, Pa. He studied law with the Hon. Richard Coulter, afterwards one of the Supreme judges of the State, and opened a law-office in Greensburg after his admission to the bar on the 14th of July, 1835. Some time about 1839 he bought the Pennsylvania Argus, and became its editor. He was an active politician, and he secured the paper for political purposes. He made the paper even more Democratic than it had been. In the hot political campaign of 1840 he established his name as a writer of high ability, and made a State reputation for the paper. Some of his articles on political topics were copied in other papers all over the Union. Horace Greeley in the Log Cabin, on the side of the opposition, took issue with some of the articles, and gave them still wider circulation by replying to them in the fulminating style which later made him one of the most celebrated political journalists of the age. In the campaign of 1844 he was one of the most efficient speakers and writers in the State in behalf of Col. Polk, his political friends pitting him against such men as Thomas Williams, who was afterwards selected by Congress to deliver the eulogium upon Abraham Lincoln. He was subsequently elected to the State Assembly. Here he soon distinguished himself, and there was a heated rivalry between him and Thomas Burnside, Jr., a son of Judge Burnside of the Supreme Court, and a son-in-law of Simon Cameron, then a Democrat, for the position of leader of the Democratic party in the House. In this competition Burrell was victorious, and it is admitted by both friends and political opponents that he was the ablest partisan and the most eminent orator in the Pennsylvania Legislature.

At that time in Pennsylvania the nominations for the judiciary were made by the Governor and confirmed by the Senate, and a vacancy occurring in Burrell's district, the Governor sent in his name to the Senate for president judge. After a contest he was, as we have before said, rejected in that body through political motives and probably through some personal dislikes. It was deemed expedient to vacate this appointment, which being done, John C. Knox, of Tioga, was appointed, confirmed by the Senate, and commissioned in his stead.

Judge John C. Knox presided for the first time in the Westmoreland courts at May term, 1848. The minutes contain the following entry:

"At 11 o'clock A.M., 22d May, 1848, the Court met. John C. Knox, of Tioga County, appeared in court, and was conducted to the Bench by Judge Burrell, when the commission of the said John C. Knox from the Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsyl., appointing him President Judge of the Tenth Judicial District of Penna., composed of the counties of Westmoreland, Cambria, Indiana, and Armstrong, dated the 11th day of April, 1848, was read."

When the courts opened Judge Burrell then practiced before Judge Knox.

In 1850 the constitution of the State was amended so as to place the election of the judges in the hands of the people. Judge Burrell was nominated by his party and easily elected.

Then for November the 17th, 1851, is this minute:

"Immediately after adjournment the Members of the Bar met in the Court-House, for the purpose of giving J. C. Knox a complimentary dinner. H. D. Foster, Esq., was called to the chair, and H. Byers Kuhns was appointed secretary. On motion, J. M. Burrell, W. A. Stokes, and Alexander McKinney appointed a committee to select the place and make all necessary arrangements."

In the year 1851, Judge Knox was elected judge for the counties of Venango, Clarion, Jefferson, and Forrest.¹ In 1853 he was appointed to the Supreme

¹ "MONDAY, NOV. 17, 1851.

"TO THE HON. J. C. KNOX:

"SIR,—The members of the Bar of Westmoreland County, desirous to express on your retirement from the Bench of this District their feelings of warm attachment for the courtesy which you have uniformly shown them, their admiration for your ability, their appreciation of your professional learning, their confidence in your integrity, and their high sense of those private virtues and legal accomplishments which have given them, during your Presidency in this District, a delightful friend, and have secured to the people an administration of Justice speedy, certain, and impartial.

"We desire you ever to rely on our kindly sentiments. Among us you will always be welcomed as an old and sacred friend; absent from us we shall regard with deep interest your future course, and hope that it will be prosperous and happy.

"To testify to those feelings, we respectfully request your acceptance of a Public Dinner at such time as may suit your convenience.

"With much respect, your friends,

"H. D. Foster.	Jas. C. Clarke.	John Armstrong.
Jos. H. Kuhns.	H. Byers Kuhns.	Jac. Turney.
J. M. Burrell.	H. C. Marchand.	R. Coulter.
Edgar Cowan.	Jas. M. Carpenter.	Wm. A. Cook.
Will. A. Stokes.	J. F. Woods.	Alex. M'Kinney.
W. H. Markle.	S. B. M'Cormick.	T. J. Barclay.
Jno. Armstrong, Jr.	Aug. Drum.	Wm. J. Williams."
H. P. Laird.	G. W. Clark.

"TUESDAY, NOV. 18, 1851.

"TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BAR OF WESTMORELAND COUNTY:

"GENTLEMEN,—Your kind note of invitation to a public dinner has just been presented to me, and a perusal of its contents has afforded me the most lively satisfaction.

"It is to me a source of great pleasure to learn that you approve of the manner in which I have performed the duties of my office during the time that I have presided in your county. And I assure you, gentle-

Bench to the vacancy caused by the death of Pennsylvania's most eminent jurist, Hon. John Bannister Gibson. He resigned from this position to become attorney-general under Governor Pollock, and in 1861 he went to Philadelphia to practice law with David Webster. He soon after became afflicted with softening of the brain; and was sent to the asylum, and is now (1882) an insane inmate of the State Insane Asylum at Norristown.

On the morning of Feb. 16, 1852, the new commissions of J. M. Burrell, president judge, and of James Bell and David Cook, associate judges, being read, court opened. Judge Burrell acted as judge in this district until 1855, when he was appointed judge of the District Court of the United States for Kansas, then one of the Territories.

Judge Burrell's wife was Miss Anna Richardson, a woman of great beauty in her youth, of liberal accomplishments, and of handsome fortune. He left a family of a widow and several children. In religion his family were Old-School Presbyterian. He was a man of taste and refinement, and what he did he did well. He built a fine house at Greensburg for a residence, and its excellent location, tasteful grounds, and convenient appurtenances are duly appreciated by its present owner and occupant. He had a well-selected library, and played with singular skill upon the violin. He had splendid social qualities, but a delicate constitution. From the first as a judge he created a favorable impression in every court in which he presided, and gave general satisfaction.

Judge Kimmell, of Somerset, and Judge Agnew, afterwards Chief Justice of Pennsylvania, presided in these courts at sundry times in the adjudication of causes in which Judge Burrell was disqualified during his tenure of office.

JOSEPH BUFFINGTON, for many years president judge of the district of which Westmoreland County was a part (the "old Tenth"), was born in the town of West Chester, Chester Co., Pa., on the 27th day of November, 1803, and died at Kittanning on the 3d day of February, 1872. The ancestors of Judge Buffington were Friends or Quakers, who left the county of Middlesex, England, and men, that, so far as the intention is concerned, you do me no more than justice. As to acts, I am conscious that your partiality has induced you to bestow commendations by no means deserved.

"To you, as members of the Bar, I am under obligations that I can only repay by keeping them in constant remembrance. Coming amongst you a stranger, I was received as a familiar friend, and in our intercourse, professional and personal, I have been treated in the kindest manner. I am proud of your good opinion, and hope ever to retain it, and although our official relation is about to be severed, my earnest wish is that the tie that connects us as men and members of the same noble profession may never be weakened or destroyed.

"I cannot forego the pleasure of meeting you at the festive board, and therefore accept your invitation, and name Friday evening of this week as the most convenient time.

"With sentiments of high regard,

"I remain, gentlemen, truly your friend, came to the Province of Pennsylvania shortly before the proprietary, and settled near Chadd's Ford, in Chester County, near the site of the battle of the Brandywine, where his grandfather, Jonathan Buffington, had a grist-mill during the Revolution. His father, Ephraim Buffington, kept a hotel at West Chester, at a tavern stand known as "The White Hall," a venerable hostelry, and celebrated through that region for many years. It was here that the subject of this sketch was born and lived until his tenth year, when his father, in hopes of bettering his fortunes in the West, left West Chester, came over the mountains, and settled at Pine Creek, about five miles above Pittsburgh, on the Allegheny River. It was during this journey that the travelers passed through Greensburg, and it was at the old Rohrer House (afterwards the McQuaide House, and for many years his favorite stopping-place), that Judge Buffington first saw a soft-coal fire. When about eighteen years of age he entered the Western University at Pittsburgh, then under the charge of Dr. Bruce, at which place he also enjoyed the instructions of the venerable Dr. Joseph Stockton. After pursuing a liberal course of studies he went to Butler, Pa., and for some time prior to studying law he edited a weekly paper, called the Butler Repository, and in company with Samuel A. Purviance, afterwards a well-known attorney of Allegheny County and attorney-general of the Commonwealth, he engaged in keeping a small grocery-store. Soon afterwards he entered as student-at-law the office of Gen. William Ayres, at that time one of the most celebrated lawyers in Western Pennsylvania, under whose careful training he laid a thorough foundation for his chosen life-work. During his student life he married Miss Catharine Mechling, a daughter of Hon. Jacob Mechling, a prominent politician of that region, and for many years a member of the House of Representatives and Senate of Pennsylvania. Mr. Mechling was originally a native of Westmoreland County, and was married to Miss Drum, an aunt of Hon. Augustus Drum, M.C. from Westmoreland, of Gen. Richard Drum, U.S.A., and of Maj. Simon Drum, who was killed in the Mexican war.

"JOHN C. KNOX."

In the month of July, 1826, he was admitted to practice in Butler County, and in the Supreme Court on Sept. 10, 1828. He remained at the Butler bar for about a year, but finding at length that the business was largely absorbed by the older and more experienced practitioners, he determined to seek some new field of labor, and finally settled upon Armstrong County, to which place he removed and settled at Kittanning, where he resided continuously until his death. Here his industry, integrity, and close application soon brought him to the front of the bar, and although the first years of his professional life were ones of hardship and narrow means, yet in a few years he was in possession of a practice that absorbed all his time and afforded a good income.

From coming to manhood Judge Buffington took a strong interest in politics. At the inception of the anti-Masonic party in 1831, or thereabouts, he became one of its members, and served as one of the delegates to the National Convention of that body which met at Baltimore in 1832 and nominated William Wirt for the Presidency. During those years he was several times nominated for the position of State senator or member of the House of Representatives, but without success, his party being largely in the minority.

In 1840 he joined the Whig party, taking an active part in the election of Gen. Harrison, and serving as one of the Presidential electors on the Whig ticket.

During the years that intervened from his coming to Kittanning until 1843, Judge Buffington was closely engaged in the line of his profession. Patient, laborious, and attentive, full of zeal and energy for his clients' causes, he had acquired an extensive practice. He was constantly in attendance upon the courts of Clarion, Jefferson, Armstrong, and Indiana, and his services were often in demand in other counties. He was connected in all the important land trials of that region, and his knowledge of this intricate branch of the law was thorough and exhaustive. Said one of his life-long friends, "To speak of Judge Buffington's career as a lawyer would be a history of the judicial contests in this section of the State for more than a quarter of a century. He had a large practice in Armstrong, Jefferson, Clarion, and Indiana Counties, the courts of which counties he regularly attended. It was my pleasure to be with him, either as assisting or opposing counsel, in many of these counties. It may not be forgotten that in those early times in the judicial history of middle Western Pennsylvania the bar constituted a kind of peripatetic association, all and each contributing his share to the social enjoyments of the occasion, and to the instruction of the unlearned in law, of the obligations which were imposed upon them. These unions at different places created necessarily many happy reminiscences. But, like the schoolmaster of the village, 'the very spot where once they triumphed is forgot.'

"It cannot be forgotten or denied that Judge Buffington was a conscientious, fair-dealing, and upright lawyer. He had imbibed so largely of the privileges and excellencies of the profession, knew so much of it and the rightful manner of pursuing it, that to him chicanery was fraud; technicality, folly; and injustice a crime."

In the fall of 1843, Judge Buffington was elected a member of Congress as the Whig candidate in the district composed of the counties of Armstrong, Butler, Clearfield, and Indiana, his competitor being Dr. Lorain, of Clearfield County. In 1844 he was re-elected, his competitor being Mr. McKennan, of Indiana County. During his service in the House he acted with the Whigs in all important measures, among others voting against the admission of Texas on the ground of opposition to the extension of slave territory.

His fellow-townsmen and warm personal friend, Hon. W. F. Johnston, having been elected Governor, he appointed Judge Buffington, in 1849, to the position of president judge of the Eighteenth Judicial District, composed of the counties of Clarion, Elk, Jefferson, and Venango. This position he held until 1851, when he was defeated in the judicial election by Hon. John C. Knox, the district being largely Democratic.

In 1852 he was nominated by the Whig State Convention for the judgeship of the Supreme Court. In the general overthrow of the Whig party that resulted in the defeat of Gen. Scott for the Presidency that year, Judge Buffington was defeated, his competitor being the late Chief Justice Woodward, of Luzerne County.

The same year he was appointed by President Fillmore chief justice of Utah Territory, then just organized. He was strongly urged by the President personally to accept, as the position was a trying one, and the administration wished it to be filled by some one in whom it had confidence. Its great distance from civilization and the customs of the country, which were so abhorrent to his ideas, led him, however, to decline the proffered honor.

On the resignation of Hon. J. Murry Burrell, judge of the Tenth District, he was appointed to that position, in the fall of 1855, by Governor Pollock, with whom he had been a fellow-member of Congress, and with his appointment commenced a close and intimate acquaintance with Westmoreland County and its citizens that lasted until his death.

In the fall of 1856 he was elected to fill the position to which he had been appointed for a term of ten years. In this election he had no contestant, the opposition declining to nominate through the advice of their then candidate for the Presidency, James Buchanan, a special friend of the judge's for many years. This position he held until 1866, when he was again elected to fill the judgeship for another term of ten years.

This he resigned in 1871, when failing health admonished him that the judicial labors, already beyond the power of any man, were too great for one who had passed the meridian of life and had borne the heat and burden of the day, whilst others more vigorous had fallen by his side. It was hard, indeed, for one whose mind was skilled to greatness and trained to labor to listen to the demands of a feeble frame whilst yet that mind was in the vigor and strength of maturity. But, sustained by the consciousness of duty well done, and cheered by the united voice from without proclaiming his life's mission to the public nobly performed, he left the battlefield of life and lived (as was his wont) amid the brighter joys of social and domestic love, himself the centre around which the affections of a dear home clustered. He was again in private life after forty-six years' connection with the bench and bar of the Commonwealth, to the thoroughness and industry of which the State Reports for the forty years preceding bear silent but eloquent witness.

Surrounded by friends and every comfort of life, the following year passed quickly, but, as in the case of many an overworked professional man, the final summons came without warning. On Saturday, Feb. 3, 1872, he was in his usual health, and on rising from dinner went to an adjoining room, across which he commenced walking as was his wont. His wife coming in five minutes afterwards found him lying on the sofa in the sleep that knows no waking. He was buried with the services of the Episcopal Church, of which he had been an attendant, officer, and liberal supporter for many years. Of Judge Buffington as a lawyer we have spoken; as a citizen he was public-spirited, and as a neighbor he was kind and sympathetic; all his intercourse with his fellow-men was marked with a courtesy and quiet dignity that impressed one as being in the presence of one who was a gentleman in the true sense of the word. His memory is a rich legacy to friends who survive.

JUDGE JAMES A. LOGAN.

On Monday morning, May 8, 1871, accompanied by Judge M. P. McClannahan, one of the associate judges, and the only one in the county at that time, his colleague, Judge Robert Given, being in California, Judge Logan took his seat upon the bench, and directed the crier to open the courts. He then handed his commission from Governor Geary, appointing him president judge of the Tenth Judicial District, to the prothonotary to be read. The commission empowering him to hold the said office until the first Monday of the next December was then read.

Judge Logan was a native of Westmoreland County, born in the limits of Burrell township. He received his education at Elder's Ridge Academy, a preparatory school in Indiana County, and studied law with William A. Stokes, Esq., and with the Hon. H. P. Laird, and on motion of W. H. Markle, Esq., was admitted to practice on the 16th of May, 1863. After his admission to the bar he entered into partnership with Mr. Markle, and remained with him until the senior member of the firm was appointed collector of United States revenue of this congressional district. He was shortly after his admission appointed solicitor of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and after the Southwest Railway was incorporated was selected to manage the legal affairs of that road, of which he was also a director.

He applied himself with diligence to the study of the law, and soon evidenced legal talents of more than ordinary degree. He acquired a good practice, and was prominent as a rising politician in the Republican party, and was mentioned as a candidate for Congress a year or two prior to his appointment as judge.

Judge Logan presiding with satisfaction in each of the three counties of his district under this appointment, was nominated by the Republican party as its candidate for election, and was easily elected over Silas M. Clark, Esq., of Indiana, his competitor in the Democratic party, his party having a majority in the district. He presided after his election over all the courts of the district until Westmoreland was made a separate judicial district by the Constitution of 1874, when he was retained as judge of this county alone. Over the courts of this county he presided with eminent ability, firmness, and skill until he resigned, in 1879, to accept the position of Assistant General Solicitor of the Pennsylvania Railroad, a position in the legal department of that corporation which he was the first to occupy.

JUDGE JAMES A. HUNTER.

The Hon. James A. Hunter, the present incumbent of this distinguished office, upon the vacancy occurring by the resignation of Judge Logan, was commissioned as president judge of the Tenth Judicial District by Governor Hoyt, July 12, 1879, his commission running to the first Monday of January, 1880. On the 14th of July, 1879, Judge Hunter took his oath of office. In the election of the fall of 1879 to fill this vacancy Judge Hunter was elected by the people of Westmoreland their law judge for ten years.¹

JOHN BYERS ALEXANDER.

At the beginning of the present century, Westmoreland, relatively speaking, was yet in the backwoods. At that time there were no turnpikes, not to say canals or railroads. Although the people were industrious and energetic, yet they were, as is always the case in like circumstances, in too many instances inclined to be quarrelsome and fond of litigation. The class which made up the great majority of the early inhabitants were proverbially fonder of the sight of a court-house than a church. Its county town was, therefore, taking all things together, a good location for a young lawyer of able body and practical mind—characteristics and acquirements which nearly all the eminent lawyers of that day possessed in a marked degree. Among these first lawyers was John B. Alexander.

John Byers Alexander was born in Carlisle, Cumberland Co., Pa., and emigrated to Greensburg early in the present century. He was admitted to the Westmoreland bar on motion of William Wilkins, Esq., at the December term of court, 1804. He opened his first office here, engaged in the practice of the law, and resided here until the war of Eighteen-Twelve commenced. Mr. Alexander had been liberally educated, having been graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, when that institution had a first-class reputation. He was a good Latin scholar, readily reading and explaining old law writers to the court. In his old age he was heard to quote Horace in the original in ordinary conversation with gentlemen of culture. But Coke says that the law is a jealous mistress, and requires an undivided attention. Alexander was of the same opinion, and had little regard for any literary pursuit outside of his profession. He was no politician, and read no newspapers, novels, magazines, or histories. His sole literary recreation was the reading of Shakspeare. This he knew so well that he quoted it regularly in court, and could repeat whole scenes without any mistake, and with proper manner and pronunciation. And to him, in his profession, the great dramatist was undoubtedly of great use, and particularly in this, that it supplemented him with a fund of quotations with which in addressing juries he could relieve the dryness and dullness of professional language.

His father having a large family to support, he, after having received his collegiate education, was thrown upon his own resources. He studied much, worked hardly and carefully, and as a return rose to the front rank at the bar, and gained the best practice in the county.

Only on two occasions did he allow his mind to be drawn away or diverted from the practice of his profession, in which he was making money and gaining reputation. The first of these occasions was the war of Eighteen-Twelve. When that war with Great Britain commenced he collected a company of volunteers, and served with credit under Gen. Harrison in several engagements with the British and Indians. The name of his company was "The Greensburg Rifles," and an account of its services in that campaign will be found in the chapter of this book in which the subject of that war is treated of.

After his return he resumed the practice of the law, rose to the head of the Greensburg bar, and obtained a lucrative practice in this and the adjoining counties. But notwithstanding his peaceful profession, Alexander still retained a taste for military display. His town of Carlisle had been the site of a British barracks and a military rendezvous, and hence there had grown up among the inhabitants an admiration of a soldier's character and a fondness for a soldier's life. But in the case of Alexander, he was born with the instincts of the soldier, and members of his family had raised the name to distinction in the military annals of the Revolutionary era on the side of the colonies. The title for which he felt a fondness and expressed a preference was the familiar one of "Major," by which he was known all over the State, and which he justly and honorably had earned in the field.

Moved by this military taste, Alexander raised a company of artillery for "parade duty," when

"No war or battle's sound
Was heard the world around;
The idle spear and shield were high up hung;
The hooked chariot stood,
Unstain'd with human blood;
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng."

¹ See Biographical sketch of Judge Hunter.

The company was the model company of the military division in which the militia of the State was divided, and was truly a fine one in appearance. The men were handsomely uniformed, were all over six feet in height, and their two handsome brass cannons were drawn by large gray horses. The rank and file consisted of substantial farmers and stout mechanics and laborers. In rich and gaudy uniform, Alexander always commanded in person, and he expended a large sum of money in equipments, horses, and donations. He, with his company, turned out in honor of Lafayette when he passed through the southwestern part of our county, and he commanded this company in person at the execution of Joseph Evans.

Alexander not only encouraged the profession of arms by his example, but he went so far as to acknowledge the code of honor in theory and practice. He fought a duel with a Mr. Mason, of Uniontown, Fayette Co. They exchanged shots, but neither was wounded. Both desired a second fire, but the seconds refused on the ground that the point of honor for which they fought did not require another interchange of deadly missiles, and neither had the satisfaction of putting a bullet-hole into the body of his antagonist.

This fondness for military parade and display thus became rather a weakness with Alexander. As he grew older he became vain of military titles and reputation, and was easily cajoled and flattered on this point.

His military reputation, however, rested on a more substantial foundation. Of his popularity, based upon his military exploits, is related a curious incident. Some time about 1838, when Sanford, who introduced upon the stage the "Jim Crow" minstrelsy, intended to dance and sing, Alexander was in Pittsburgh, attending the Supreme Court. He went to the theatre, and on his appearance in the boxes it was suggested to Sanford to make him a compliment. Jim Crow improvised the following:

"Ole Gen'ral Harrison,
He was the big commander,
And the next big hero there Was Major Alexander!
"So wheel about," etc.

This drew attention to the box of Alexander, and was received with uproarious applause. The old Major was highly gratified.

But on his return from the war he quietly returned to his profession, not using his military reputation as a stepping-stone to popular favor. His military services were such as to have made him a distinguished citizen of the county had they not been very largely lost sight of in his more brilliant reputation as an eminent lawyer. In this character shall we chiefly regard him in this sketch.

The second and less fortunate occasion which drew off his attention from the agreeable toil of the office and the bar was his election to the State Assembly.

Prior to that, and until the advent of Gen. Jackson into the political arena, he had taken no part in politics. At that time he avowed himself a strong Jackson man. The individuality and the upright and simple character of that remarkable leader drew to his support many of contrary political opinions and preferences. On the first evidences of the popularity of that military citizen he was claimed by both parties which were then in antagonism, and probably the Federalists, or Whigs, had more right to class him with those in their faith than had the Democrat-Republicans. But Alexander, although a Federalist of Federalists, was among the first of Jackson's supporters in Westmoreland, and remained the friend of his administration, without the hope of preferment or of party patronage.

In 1834 one of the representatives of Westmoreland in the General Assembly, James Findlay, having been appointed Secretary of the Commonwealth by Governor Wolf, a vacancy was made in the representation, which was filled at a special election by returning Maj. Alexander.

The professions of the law and of arms have from times of high antiquity been regarded as inimical professions. Inter arma silent leges. But Alexander was attached to both of them. It may be said of him too, as it was said of another, that law was his business and arms was his recreation, in relative degrees. For politics, however, he had no predilection. It is seldom that eminent lawyers are successful as politicians or as legislators, and especially when they enter public life advanced in years. The political and legislative careers of such eminent jurists as William L. Meredith and James M. Porter, of Rufus Cboate and Horace Binney, were in nowise successful, and certainly added nothing to their reputation as lawyers.

Alexander was unanimously elected to fill the vacancy, and thereupon went to Harrisburg. It was admitted by all that his representative career was a failure. He was like a fish out of water. He there came in contact with men who, although they could scarcely have spelled their way through the horn-book, could have bought him and sold him in legislative trickery every hour in the day. For those he had the utmost contempt, and he appeared to regard the whole legislative body somewhat as Gulliver regarded a similar assemblage in Lilliput. Before the session closed he left them in disgust, mounted old "Somerset," and rode home.

Thenceforth he took no part in politics whatever until 1840, when his old commander was nominated for the Presidency. During that campaign he consented to preside at a Harrison meeting at Greensburg. He was then on the verge of eternity, and died shortly after, in the same year.

The position of Mr. Alexander at the Westmoreland bar for a period of about twenty years is generally admitted to have been at its head. There were then at the bar other lawyers who rose to eminence after his day, and at his day there were gentlemen who were justly regarded as able lawyers, but these were mostly younger and less experienced. Richard Coulter, a younger man, was his superior in eloquence, Alexander Foster in extensive reading and discursive knowledge, and several others in general accomplishments, but when he was in the full vigor of his intellectual manhood, as a learned lawyer he had no superior. But in the end his inclination and ability for work decreasing with lost vigor, his former position was secured by others.

Probably the great secret of the success of Alexander as a lawyer was his sedulous and exclusive devotion to the profession of his choice. More than one of the text-writers and expositors of the English jurisprudence have, in giving their experience and advice, laid stress on the observation that to succeed at the law all thought of advancement elsewhere must be abandoned. Bacon, who undoubtedly was vain of his intellectual powers, admitted the superiority of Coke, his one-time rival for the enviable distinction of being the oracle of that code which, taking shape in the Institutes, soon after came to be regarded as a not unworthy rival of the imperial jurisprudence, the code of the civil law of the Latin civilization; and this superiority which Bacon admitted in Coke he attributed not to superior intellect or attainments, but to a closer and more exclusive study of the groundwork and superstructure of the English common and statute law. It is said by Chitty, the elder, that the law as a jealous mistress submits to no division of affection. It was a well-known apothegm, traceable to the earliest of the law-writers of England, and which Blackstone regards with the veneration due to a saying so old, and which he has made part of the text of the Commentaries, that to make a good lawyer, a lawyer sufficient to judge the laws, requires the ceaseless lucubrations of twenty years; and all his disciples know that before the master entered upon that course of study which qualified him to expound the laws of his country, and to lay out the plan of a new academical science, he bade adieu to polite literature in elegant and expressive verse, entitled "The Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse," and which began "Shakspeare no more."

In one particular the writer of the Commentaries seems in his actual literary experience to have been at issue with his own advice, for notwithstanding this adieu, and although he did devote himself to the mastery of the law, yet Blackstone really never did abandon his Shakspeare, but was in his lifetime regarded one of the best Shaksperian scholars in England, and found time to annotate, correct the text, and offer valuable suggestions for an edition of the dramatist's works, edited by a friend towards the end of his life. But he read Shakspeare as a lawyer would read it.

This advice Alexander followed in all parts. Shakspeare he did not and could not forego,—it was his vade-mecum. In Blackstone he saw the perfection of human reason, in Shakspeare the perfection of human wisdom. From the one he obtained his knowledge of law, and from the other his knowledge of human nature. In his speeches before the jury he constantly drew from the serious portions, the proverbial expressions, and the didactic moral passages of his author; and in his peculiar humor, when away from professional restriction, he acted, with appropriate "Fore-God-well-said-my-lord-, and-with-a-proper-accent-and-manner," the comic scenes.

The high reputation of Alexander as a lawyer was well deserved. His mind was a legal one, clear, logical, and practical, and from early life he had been a close and severe student. Once, when complimented upon his legal knowledge as if coming by nature, he replied, "I owe my legal knowledge, whatever may be its extent, to hard study. I rose and studied when others were in their beds." This habit of study he retained until old age. It was said that he read Blackstone every year, and at all favorable opportunities refreshed his memory with the other standard law authorities. In short, he read nothing but law-books and Shakspeare.

As a sound and well-read lawyer he had, as we said, no equal at the Westmoreland bar, and in the special branch of the law relating to land title he had no superior in Western Pennsylvania. He was retained as counsel in many cases of disputed title in the court of last resort in the State, and even in some cases of a like character which were adjudicated in the highest court of the United States. He was the counsel in one particularly heavy land-title case on an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, wherein his adversary was the celebrated William Wirt. Alexander gained his cause, and the argument displayed such legal acumen that he astonished the bench as well as the bar. At its conclusion he was complimented by Mr. Wirt and by Daniel Webster, who was present, and who expressed in his warm-hearted way his approbation of the manner he had handled his case, of his exposition of the law, and the profundity of his legal reasoning and learning. It is said, furthermore, that Alexander recognized these marks of approbation by such an expression as left a questionable doubt as to his appreciation of them; for, as he was reputed one of the best lawyers, so he was reputed one of the best cursers in the State.

In the intricate and abstruse practice of the land law of Pennsylvania Alexander was, without doubt, the superior of Wirt. Wirt was a politician, an orator, and a literary man, but to the law alone had Alexander devoted an almost entire attention. If Wirt were the Bacon, Alexander was the Coke.

His contemporaries used to relate many instances of his success at the bar in the management of his cases, and many anecdotes illustrative of his peculiar characteristics. Some of these have come down to our own times.

A young lawyer of Armstrong County once secured the services of Alexander in an important land trial. Alexander took the case, made an examination of it, and prepared a memorandum and brief. He duly attended the Armstrong court when the case was set for trial; but having met an old acquaintance there, who, like himself, was of a convivial disposition, the Major became so intent in "fighting his battles o'er again" that he did not care whether court kept or no. The Armstrong lawyer became uneasy, went to Alexander, whom he found in bed, told him that everything depended on his assistance, and that his client was anxious for the trial to proceed. Thereupon the Major asked for his saddle-bags, and opening them he took out a bundle of papers. "Take these papers," said he, with a hasty imprecation, "go into court, and if you cannot win the case upon them you are not much of a lawyer." The young lawyer did so; he went into court, and entirely upon the precedents and authorities cited in the papers drawn up by Alexander obtained a verdict in favor of his client. When the term of court was over the young attorney called upon Alexander, who still remained in his room with his old military companion, and asked him what was his fee and what the services of both should be. "Why, you may charge as little as you please," he replied; "but I'm not going to have all this trouble and toil for less than one hundred dollars."

We have been told that the fees of Alexander were fair, moderate, and never exorbitant. He was no professional shark. Notwithstanding all the great land trials in which he was engaged, the largest fee he ever secured was one of a thousand dollars.

He greatly distinguished himself in one of the most remarkable cases ever tried in the Westmoreland courts. A negro man named Tom Morgan had been charged with an attempt to commit a rape upon a girl who was weak in intellect if not actually imbecile. The outrage excited such indignation in Greensburg that a party of stout men armed themselves with cowhides and wattles, dragged the black man from his house, and so beat and whipped him that nothing saved his life but the sheriff and the posse, who took him out of the hands of the mob, lodged him in jail, and placed a guard round the jail building. Before yet the excitement had subsided the negro was indicted in the Oyer and Terminer Court. Eminent counsel, at private expense, was secured to assist the Commonwealth in the prosecution. Conway, one of the first lawyers of Cambria County, and Coulter, one of the first lawyers of Westmoreland, both of them eloquent advocates, were with the deputy attorney-general.

When the case came on to be heard the negro was brought into court. A more pitiable appeal to a sensitive mind of our generation could not well be made than did this despised, friendless negro. But at that day a negro was regarded even in Pennsylvania as more a beast than a man. Popular prejudice was against him, and this popular prejudice was instigated and then influenced by all arts and all arguments. The character of the prosecutor was lost sight of in the wide-spread opinion of the guilt of the prisoner.

Mr. Alexander was designated by the court to take the cause of the defense. Among the first questions raised was the question of the competency of the prosecutor to testify. The question was one of the greatest importance in the trial of the cause, as her testimony was necessary for a conviction. To gain this position and allow the testimony both Conway and Coulter spoke, and doing so they addressed much of their discourse to the jury and to the audience, although towards the judge. They argued the point with ability and eloquence. A latitude was given the argument unknown in ordinary trials, for it was more than an ordinary trial. The court-house was filled with people, and the audience was in sympathy with the orators. Coulter acquitted himself with more than ordinary satisfaction. He displayed the highest gifts of the orator. In his peroration he addressed himself to the subject of his eloquent labor, and drew all eyes and all hearts to the girl as she sat there within the bar. She alone was unmoved, and there was something in her half-idiotic look which with the words and manner of the counsel drew all hearts to her in pity, so that the cause of the girl was made the cause of the people. The advocate had, from the pathetic and tragic rendition of his story, the bench, the jury, the audience, many of the bar, and even the prisoner in tears, and it was evident that if the point had been at the ruling of those who heard him their sympathy would have carried all before it.

Mr. Alexander then rose to take exception at the court ruling for the admission of the testimony of the prosecutor in the case under reason of the law. He said that he had never, as counsel, been spoken to by the negro; that he cared nothing for him, whether he was white or black; nor did he wish to extenuate his guilt if he were guilty; but that he desired to see the law vindicated. He then examined the condition of the girl. Where the counsel for the prosecution had raised pity he raised doubt; and where the one had appealed to sympathy the other appealed to reason. Those who listened soon began to perceive from the evidences of their own senses that the poor girl was but a demented creature, whose ideas of discriminating right and wrong were vague, and whose notions of female chastity were still vaguer; and so the accused and the accuser stood on the same ground.

But the counsel for the prisoner did not stop at this. He lost sight of his client in the magnitude of the cause. He brought to his case his stored-up learning of the common law, he recalled old judicial decisions, quoted black-letter authority from the law-Latin and Norman-French text-books of the Middle Ages, marshaled together all the maxims of the common law bearing on the capacity and the incapacity of witnesses to testify, drew the legal distinction of idiocy, lunacy, and dementia, and brought the court from the fountain sources of legal wisdom down through a long series of English decisions to a modern date, and examining into the law of evidence as it was recognized in Pennsylvania, he applied his argument to the case in hand; and in the end ruled the court by quoting a recent decision of the president judge, where, in a similar case, the testimony of the main witness had been rejected. To the astonishment of the bystanders, who had expected that the prisoner would go to the penitentiary to serve out in solitary confinement the rest of his days, Tom Morgan walked out of the court-house a free man.

As most everything connected with the life of such a distinguished man has some interest, we shall now have something to say on the family relations, the personal appearance, and the habits of Maj. Alexander.

His ancestors were Scotch-Irish, and they had emigrated to this country before the Revolution. His father, Peter Alexander, was born in Cumberland County, Pa. The family were Whigs and patriots during the war of the Revolution. The wife of John B. was a Miss Smith, of Cumberland County, a sister of the wife of Dr. Postlethwaite. He had no children. Two of his sisters married in Westmoreland; one was married to Joseph Kuhns, Esq., and the other to Eli Coulter, Esq., the father of Gen. Richard Coulter and Alexander Coulter, Esq., of Greensburg. His wife survived him, and on her death the property went to the collateral heirs. Besides two sisters he had two brothers, Samuel Alexander, who was a leading lawyer of the Carlisle, Cumberland County, bar, and Thomas Alexander, who once lived with his brother in Greensburg, and who was never married.

In personal appearance he was a large, fat man. His height was about five feet ten inches, and his weight about the year 1834 must have been about two hundred and forty pounds. Of his personal appearance there is one thing which has been remarked by all those who remember him. He had a most remarkable head, and a description of it may not be uninteresting to the students of phrenology. It was unusually large, but not well rounded. It was elongated from the occiput to the sinciput, that is to say, it was inordinately long from the hind part of the skull to the forehead, and in this direction it was disproportionate to the height. It was large and prominent in front of the ears, extended far behind them, but was not developed in proportion above the ears. It seemed—from this description and judging scientifically—to be deficient in veneration and the moral sentiments.

In the vigor of his life and manhood he had been well formed and muscular, but in his old age he had become very corpulent. His nose was large and straight, and his complexion between fair and florid. In his younger years he was undoubtedly a good-looking man, but the exposure of an active campaign, and careless and unwatched habits in eating and drinking had in time made his skin and features rough. Yet even in his old age when in good humor he had a pleasant and genial smile, and when he chose his manners were polished and genteel. In company with women no man could be more gentle and good-humored. His rudeness belonged in great part to the times and the society around him.

Alexander rose the year round at the break of day, studied his cases, answered his letters, and did the heavy part of his business before breakfast. When his business did not absorb his attention he read in some law-book. After breakfast he visited the offices and taverns, and chatted with clients and acquaintances. Although he kept a sideboard with liquors for callers, he treated at the taverns. He was no churl, and was popular with inn-keepers and drinking men. Although he has had, among a certain class, a reputation for using blackguard expressions, yet he never descended to relate obscene stories or retail low gossip. In warm weather he slept in the afternoon, and had the habit of reading his favorite author in bed at night.

In business transactions the integrity of Alexander was inflexible. He was never known to do a dishonest or dishonorable action. No man could say that he ever defrauded him of a dollar. His handsome fortune was all gained by honorable professional toil. In his marital relation he was a pattern. No lady in the days of chivalry was ever treated with more attention and courtesy than Mrs. Alexander. His character was really an elevated one, and it was only when the "times were out of joint" that he was, as he was commonly reported, rude, overbearing, or quarrelsome.

He resided for years in a large brick house on Main Street, diagonal to the Methodist Church. This house with many alterations is now and has long been used for hotel purposes, and during the civil war obtained the name of the "Richmond House." His law-office was in the same building. Some time between 1830 and 1840 he removed to the township. Then both his residence and law-office were in a house half a mile southwest of the borough. Every business day he rode into town on a beautiful sorrel horse with a silvery mane and tail, called "Somerset." He employed and amused himself in agriculture and horticulture, and in the improvement of the breed of cattle and poultry. The culture of the fields became with him quite a hobby, and with all the modesty of his profession he always maintained that his apples, hogs, turkeys, and chickens were the best in Westmoreland.¹

¹ ACTION OF THE COURT ON THE DEATH OF JOHN B. ALEXANDER, ESQ.

May term, 1840.

From the Record for Saturday morning, May 23, 1840:

The court being in session, the Hon. Richard Coulter rose and announced to the court the death of John Byers Alexander, Esq., the eldest brother of this bar.

ALEXANDER WILLIAM FOSTER.

Alexander William Foster was the son of Rev. William Foster, pastor of Octorara Church, in Sadsbury township, Chester County, Pa., and was born October, 1771. He studied law under Edward Burd, Esq., in Philadelphia, and became a member of the bar in 1793. In 1796 the Foster family removed from Chester County to Meadville, in Crawford County. In the same year he was employed as agent and lawyer by the Holland Land Company. He soon acquired such a reputation in his profession that his practice extended from Pittsburgh to Erie. In 1812 he was retained to go to Greensburg to try a cause, and he so favorably impressed some litigants with his conducting of the case that he was retained by a number of suitors. He thereupon, instead of removing to Pittsburgh to locate permanently, as he had intended, settled in Greensburg, where he remained and practiced law until 1831, a period of nearly twenty years.

Upon settling here he soon obtained a first-class practice, which, after the manner of the time, extended to the counties of Indiana and Armstrong. He was considered one of the best of his profession in this judicial district, and along with Coulter and Alexander formed the trio of leading lawyers at the bar of Westmoreland.

A personal friend has thus described some of his professional characteristics. Mr. Foster did not possess the impassioned and florid eloquence of Richard Coulter, or the legal profundity of John B. Alexander, but his professional attainments were said to have been more extensive than those of the former, and he had a mental acumen and a power of extorting truth from witnesses beyond the ability of the latter. But if his oratorical powers were not splendid, yet he had great copiousness of language, and with a fluency without error or hesitation could express his ideas in words suitable to the subject. The fault of his oratory was that it was not concise and chaste, but in-

That the members of the bar unanimously desire the ordinary business of the court be suspended for this day, that they may pay a merited and just tribute of respect to the memory of their deceased brother, and have an opportunity of attending his funeral:—Mr. Coulter said it was customary to give testimonials of respect to the memories of distinguished members of the bar by a suspension of the business on account of their decease, and he felt unmingled pleasure in offering to the court the full and entire concurrence of all the members of the bar in that practice. He said the brethren of the bar all acknowledged their indebtedness to Maj. Alexander for the many advantages they individually and collectively derived from their intercourse at the bar with him. They recollected his vigorous intellect, which seized with a giant's grip every cause in which he was professionally engaged; they recollected many passages of pleasant professional intercourse with the deceased, and now when he was removed from among them they desire to bear to his memory the token of respect which was accorded by the profession to their eminent brethren. He therefore moved the court to adjourn over this day.

Per curiam. We have pleasure in announcing to you our cordial approval of the practice suggested, and sincerely join with the members of the bar in their merited tribute to the memory of the deceased.

The court then adjourned.

clined to verbosity. If Foster was not profoundly learned in the law like Alexander, yet he was a well-read lawyer, and could always use, like ready change, all his legal information. Although inferior to Alexander before the court, he was superior before a jury. Here on an average he was equal to Coulter. He could not so readily move to wrath and tears, but could always expose knavery, detect fraud, and try to attain the truth in such a way as to force attention, excite mirth, and move to laughter. He had too much of the milk of human kindness in his bosom to be bitterly sarcastic, but his speeches were often enlivened with humor and anecdote.

Mr. Foster was of a kindly, genial disposition, fond of company and conversation. His office was said to have been the best ever in Greensburg for the study of the law. While other lawyers were reserved, taciturn, and often overbearing and supercilious, Foster was affable, courteous, and fond of communicating information. He frequently conferred with his students, put cases to them, and held in his office a kind of moot court. It was reported of several of Foster's students who rose to distinction in their profession that they learned more law orally from him than they had ever got by reading his books. Among his students were John Riddell, of Erie, Thomas Struthers, of Warren County, and Calvin Mason, of Fayette County, who in 1813 fought a duel with pistols with John B. Alexander. He practiced in Philadelphia, and died in that city. John F. Beaver also learned in the office of Mr. Foster all that legal chicanery which, added to his natural shrewdness; caused him to be considered the acutest attorney in the district, and it was in his office where Henry D. Foster, his nephew, got his law, upon whom the mantle of his uncle descended.

Mr. Foster delighted in the subjects of agriculture, horticulture, and engineering; wrote many articles on the practical applicability of chemistry to farming, and delivered many orations at the county fairs, then held at Greensburg.

In 1820 and 1822 he was the Federalist candidate for Congress in the district composed of Westmoreland, Indiana, Armstrong, and Jefferson Counties. He was twice defeated because he was on the unpopular side. In 1820, in the strong Democratic county of Westmoreland, he obtained a small majority. After the dissolution of the Federalist party he became an anti-Mason, and after the collapse of that party he became a Whig.

In person he was of middle size and weight, rather inclined to leanness than corpulency. His face was good, but it ordinarily wore a mild, amiable, and rather melancholy expression. His temperament was nervo-bilious, and his complexion sallow, with a tendency to pallor. He was greatly addicted to smoking. The cigar was his constant companion, and it was probably for his own use that he had hot-houses for the growth and cultivation of Spanish tobacco.

THE HANGING OF EVANS.

No event in the history of the county was so much talked of and so long remembered as the hanging of Joseph Evans for murder in 1830.

From an old copy of The Republican, dated 23d April, 1830, we briefly abstract the statement of the condemned man, made six days previous to his execution, which took place on Tuesday, 20th April, 1830, on a hill east of the town, and between the Southwest Railway and the Main Street, and was witnessed by several thousand people, who had gathered on the hillsides from far and near to see the law commit murder.

Evans at the time of his execution was scarcely twenty-two years of age. He was even then somewhat wild, having been engaged repeatedly in fights, and in tarring and feathering and riding on a rail a man who had been guilty of beating his wife, cleaning out a house of ill fame, riding on a rail, shaving the heads, and tarring and feathering two married men there caught, and breaking the jaw of a son of one of these men for inquiring into the matter, burning down another house of ill fame for two dollars, shaving the mane and tail of the horse of a Methodist preacher, and "lathering" the preacher so that he was laid up for two weeks. He assisted in riding on a rail and tarring and feathering a man and a woman who were cohabiting together in violation of the commandments, and in a manner which did violence to Evans' moral principles.

These little extravaganzas gave zest to his life in his travels, and finally he landed in Derry township, where, one Sunday evening, he got into a dispute with Cissler about stealing a pair of shoes, but over a pint of apple brandy they became good friends.

The night before Christmas he amused himself by whistling the "Boyne Water," and was rewarded for his music by a vigorous attack from three gentlemen who did not fancy the tune; but it seems he was able to cope successfully with all three, and from this appears to date the real trouble which resulted in his accidentally taking the life of Cissler, and in consequence thereof losing his own.

On the morning before New Year he and others amused and regaled themselves with cards and whiskey, and finally a quarrel ensued, whereupon several of the party fell on Evans (who does not seem to have been a favorite) to beat him. He seized the fire-shovel and swung it back and forth to keep them off, when Cissler, who was not in the mêlée, came up to stop the fight, and accidentally received a blow on the forehead from the shovel, and fell back upon a large iron kettle. He breathed only a few times, but never spoke.

Evans made no effort to escape; but when a large crowd had gathered, and attempted to tie him, he resisted so violently that they desisted and kept out of his reach. He then took the rope and tied his legs, when the crowd beat and abused him considerably, upon which he got himself loose, and "slashed" around indiscriminately.

After the inquest he was taken to Bairdstown, before Esquire Scott, and on the 2d of January, 1830, was lodged in jail in this place, and on the 18th of February, 1830, he was tried and found "guilty of murder in the first degree."

In his comments upon portions of the evidence he is very severe, and alleges that it contains not one word of truth.

At the execution he was perfectly calm, and remarked to the sheriff, on surveying the assembled multitude, that "there were not so many people present as he had seen at such places." During the whole time from the time he left the jail, following the cart which contained his coffin, until the drop fell there was no sign of weakness or trepidation. Indeed, at the last moment he handed to some one on the platform below a drum, which he had used for a seat while the preparations were being perfected to launch him into eternity.

At the scaffold the people, estimated to number seven or eight thousand, were addressed by Revs. Laird, Hacke, and Steck, and, at request of Evans, a hymn was sung. He addressed the crowd, warning them against the vices of which he had been guilty, asserting the injustice done him by some of the witnesses, but forgiving all as he hoped for forgiveness. He seemed to be entirely resigned to his fate, and manifested no desire to live.

This, with the two executions at Hannastown at a very early period, when that place was the county-seat, were the only ones that had taken place in this county until a generation after; and now, after fifty years, it is the general judgment that the conviction and execution of Joseph Evans was more the result of clamor and prejudice, with also a considerable amount of false swearing, than from any regard for justice.

JAMES FINDLAY, ESQ.—At the time of the trial of Evans the prosecuting attorney was James Findlay. The result showed that he only did his duty too well for justice and humanity, and it is a matter of regret that he could not have been retained for the defense of the unfortunate prisoner.

At that time the bar of Greensburg possessed high character and great ability. It was dignified by the profound legal erudition of John B. Alexander, resplendent with the florid eloquence of Richard Coulter, adorned by the extensive attainments and enlivened by the wit and humor of Alexander Foster. Other gentlemen of talent contributed to elevate the character of the profession by mathematical knowledge, and rapid and accurate habits of business, so that the bar of Westmoreland was second to none outside of Philadelphia.

Prominent among these gentlemen—primus inter pares—was James Findlay, Esq. The mention of his name in the Evans trial suggested the idea that a brief biographical sketch would be an appropriate and respectful contribution to the memory of one so worthy that he deserved a monument.

Although James Findlay possessed the undoubted ability to make a permanent reputation, yet he was so careless of future fame that he did nothing to perpetuate his memory with posterity. He "never wrote a book, built a house, planted a tree, or begot a child." For more than a generation his body has been mouldering in the clay of a cemetery.

James Findlay, Esq., was born in 1801, on a farm that belonged to his father, about three miles from Mercersburg, in Franklin County. It was situated about one-half mile from the Presbyterian Church of West Conococheague, of which Dr. John King was pastor, by whom James Findlay was baptized. By the way, the reputation of Dr. King has extended far beyond the Alleghenies, and his memory is still held in respect by many, to the spiritual wants of whose ancestors this gentleman had administered.

In the fall of 1813, and in the twelfth year of James Findlay's age, his father removed his family to Harrisburg, which had become the seat of State government. James Findlay resided at Harrisburg, and was a pupil at the best school in town until 1820, when he was matriculated at Princeton College, which was then regarded as one of the best institutions of learning in the United States, and whereat his brother Archibald and other relations had graduated.

William Findlay had lived in a style of old-fashioned hospitality at Harrisburg, and in consequence of stringency in his pecuniary affairs he could not afford to keep James at Princeton until he graduated. He was forced to leave his alma mater and return to Harrisburg, where he became a student of law in the office of Francis R. Shunk, who was married to his only sister, who afterwards became so well known as the matronly lady that with such case and dignity presided over the hospitality of the executive mansion at Harrisburg.

After his admission to the bar by the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin County, James Findlay opened a law-office at York, in Eastern Pennsylvania. But York was an old county, her land titles well settled, and the litigation comparatively unimportant. So Mr. Findlay removed to Westmoreland County. On motion of George Armstrong, Esq., was admitted to the bar of Greensburg, Aug. 23, A.D. 1824.

Greensburg was a good location for Mr. Findlay. The legal business was abundant and remunerative. Lawyers from Pittsburgh and other counties attended the courts of Westmoreland. The natural talents, liberal education, and thorough legal training of Mr. Findlay would soon have placed him at the head of his profession. In politics he had open to him a primrose path to honor and emolument.

Upon his location in Greensburg he received the appointment of prosecuting attorney, the duties of which he discharged with integrity and ability. During his term of office there was no composition of felony, and no escape of wealthy criminals by flaws in indictments.

The name of Findlay was identified with Democracy, Gen. Jackson had been elected President of the United States, and Wolf Governor of Pennsylvania. And so nation, State, district, and county were all in the hands of Mr. Findlay's political friends. To the public coffers his name was an "open sesame." Had James Findlay been ambitious of political distinction he needed but remain in Westmoreland and adhere to his party, and every round of the political ladder was accessible to his footsteps. He could early have attained any position ever held by his worthy and honored father.

In 1831, Mr. Findlay was elected to the Legislature. He was re-elected in 1832 and 1833. In December, 1833, Samuel McLean, who was Secretary of the Commonwealth, was elected to the Senate of the United States. Such was the reputation of James Findlay that Governor Wolf at once tendered him the vacant office. He resigned his seat in the Lower House, of which he was then Speaker, and accepted the office of Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The old citizens of Westmoreland will remember that in the winter of 1834 there was a special election for a member of the Lower House to supply the vacancy caused by the appointment of Mr. Findlay. It was currently reported and believed that Governor Wolf had expressed a personal wish that Westmoreland would honor herself and the State by sending to the Legislature a man qualified in talent and reputation to succeed James Findlay.

"Suppose," said the leading citizens, "that Westmoreland surprises and pleases the Governor by sending a better man?"

The notion tickled the political gossips, and so, amid much firing of cannon, wild roaring of the rabblement, and great guzzling of powerful potatoes, Maj. John B. Alexander was unanimously returned to the Legislature.

Historians inform us Caligula, Emperor of Rome, gave his horse a place in the Senate, and had him proclaimed First Consul. As Maj. Alexander held the opinion that our legislators belong to the equine genus as clearly as donkeys, he astonished the Governor and natives by riding his splendid horse, Somerset, to Harrisburg, and by doing nothing apparently while there but instructing the animal in the mysteries of legislation. It is said that after staying a few days in Harrisburg, and looking at and mingling with the members of the House, he mounted his splendid steed and came away, stating in language considerably more emphatic than elegant that they were a set of ignoramuses, and he would have nothing to do with them.

James Findlay remained at Harrisburg, discharging the duties of the office of Secretary of State; until the inauguration of Governor Ritner. In the early part of 1836 he removed to Pittsburgh and recommenced the practice of his profession. In politics there were many things unsuited to the mind and manners of Mr. Findlay. Their intrigues, violence, selfishness, and rancor must have often disgusted his candor, disturbed his equanimity, and shocked his refinement. His pecuniary affairs demanded some attention, and so instead of returning to Westmoreland he located himself in Pittsburgh and devoted himself to the duties of his profession. In a short time he rose to prominence, gained the deep respect of his fellow-members of the bar and the confidence of clients.

Francis R. Shunk, a gentleman of an old and respectable family in Eastern Pennsylvania, had married Miss Findlay, opened a law-office in Harrisburg, and filled several public offices. In January, 1839, he was appointed Secretary of State to Governor Porter. He held this office until 1842, when he removed to Pittsburgh, and entered into partnership with his brother-in-law, James Findlay. The partners admirably suited each other. The superb penmanship, habits of order and industry, knowledge of forms, and strong constitution well fitted Shunk for the manual labor of the profession, while Findlay could readily and amply supply the logic, rhetoric, and legal erudition necessary for success before court and jury. Of the pair it might be safely said, without an iota of irony, par nobile fratrum. The firm was on the high road to pre-eminent professional success, when, unfortunately, James Findlay took sick and died in 1843, in the forty-second year of his age, about a twelvemonth before Francis R. Shunk was elected Governor of Pennsylvania.

It is somewhat singular that Mr. Findlay never married. He was so amiable in disposition, so regular in habits and domestic in manners that he was well adapted to receive and confer happiness upon a proper partner.

The personal appearance of Mr. Findlay was very agreeable. He was rather over than under middle height, straight, and well proportioned. His complexion was fair, his hair light brown, his forehead broad and high, and his features very pleasant, because constantly expressive of kindness and good humor. His mouth was rather too large, but it was filled with regular and beautiful teeth as white as ivory. He dressed plainly, but with good taste, and, as he was very near-sighted, he always wore silver spectacles. His manners were courteous, and about all that he did there was an air of refinement. In this country, where there is no aristocracy, no gentry, no arbitrary distinctions, so that a proper classification of society becomes difficult, if not impossible, and yet there was about James Findlay that nescio quid, that peculiar je ne sais quoi, which makes even a total stranger feel that this is a gentleman.

His morals were as pure as a virgin snow-drift. Coarse profanity and witty obscenity were common and, with some, commendable in his profession. Although not disposed to be rigidly righteous, Mr. Findlay held both swearing and blackguarding to be contra bonos mores,—against good morals and good manners. He was not a member of any church, but his amiable disposition and enlightened conscience produced all the effects of true and heartfelt religion, namely, decency, integrity, and charity. "If cleanliness be godliness," then Mr. Findlay was a model Christian, for he was never guilty of a dirty skin, dirty garment, dirty trick, or dirty expression.

The status of Mr. Findlay in his profession was highly respectable for one of his age. His mind was logical and discriminating, and his memory so good that he retained whatever he read. Wherever he practiced, he was employed against the best men of his professional cotemporaries. A legal friend, who knew him long and intimately, thus speaks of him:

"I think I may say that no one ever enjoyed in a greater degree the respect and affection of his professional brethren. This was strikingly manifested at the time of his death. The gentlemen of the Pittsburgh bar paid him the unusual, it may be the unprecedented, mark of respect of closing their offices during his funeral."¹

RICHARD COULTER, JUSTICE S. C.

Richard Coulter was born in Allegheny County, Pa., in what is now Versailles township,² in March, 1788. He was early sent to Jefferson College, but he did not remain there for graduation. He read law with John Lyon, Esq., at Uniontown, Fayette Co., and on the 19th of November, 1810, was admitted to practice in the courts of that county.³ On Feb. 18, 1811, on motion of John B. Alexander, Esq., he was admitted an attorney of the courts of Westmoreland. In 1816 and 1817 he was elected to the Assembly on the ticket in opposition to the then Republican ¹ William Findlay, the father of James, was an active and leading politician, whose services were intimately connected with the history of the State of Pennsylvania. In 1790 he was a member of the Convention which framed the constitution of the State and continued to be the fundamental law until 1838. In 1807 he was chosen to be treasurer of the State. In 1817 he was elected Governor of Pennsylvania, beating Joseph Hester, the Federalist candidate, by a majority of several thousands. In 1820 he was again a candidate for Governor against the same man, and at this election he was defeated. In 1821, William Findlay was elected United States senator, and was a member of that body until the end of his senatorial term in 1827.

The gentleman from whose reminiscences of Findlay we have so largely drawn thus wanders into the clouds:

"James Buchanan and James Findlay were both of Scotch-Irish descent, and were born at the same locality of Conococheague, near Mercersburg. Both had been born and bred Presbyterians, and were both baptized by the same pastor, Dr. John King. They were both Democrats, one by conversion and the other by inheritance. They were both liberally educated, and both lawyers by profession. They were both bachelors. They were both moral men. They were both gentlemen in dress and manners. Had Buchanan died at the age of forty-two, he might have been esteemed to be a kind-hearted and generous gentleman, a good lawyer and patriotic citizen. Had Findlay lived until threescore and ten, he might have been President of the United States and been as much denounced as James Buchanan."

² There is now a coal town located near this spot called Coulterville.

³ His examining committee were James Ross, of Pittsburgh; Parker Campbell, of Washington; and Thomas Meason, of Uniontown.

party. In 1818 he was on what was called by the opposition the Federal ticket, and was elected to the same office, and was the only one elected on that ticket. So, also, in 1819. In 1820 he was a candidate on what was called the Independent Republican ticket for the same office, and was the only one elected on that ticket, the Democratic ticket going through for the rest. In 1821 he was defeated by ninety-three votes. In 1826 he was nominated as an independent candidate for Congress, James Clarke being the regular Democratic nominee, and was elected. In 1828 he was elected without opposition. He was also elected in 1830 and 1832, then as the regular Democratic nominee, but in 1834 was defeated by Mr. John Klingensmith.

In the mean time he had practiced law until Sept. 16, 1846, when he was appointed a justice of the Supreme Court by Governor Shunk, and again, after the approval of the Senate, Feb. 17, 1847, from which time his commission ran for fifteen years. Under the then new constitution, Oct. 2, 1851, he was elected and commissioned associate justice for fifteen years, he having drawn the long term. He died Tuesday, April 20, 1852, at Greensburg, Pa.

What follows may convey something of an impression, although an inadequate one, of the political, legal, and literary character, as they are evidenced in the public career of this distinguished citizen.

When, in 1832, Mr. Coulter was sent to Congress, he was sent as the leader of the Democratic party in the county. He was the best speaker and writer in his party here, and he had made such a reputation in Congress that the Democrats at home were proud of their representative. But most unfortunately Mr. Coulter disagreed with his constituents and with the Jackson administration on the subject of the United States Bank and the custody of the public money. As he was a strong advocate of the recharter of a national bank, the Democrats of his district refused to renominate him, when he offered himself to the people as a volunteer candidate. The congressional district was then composed of Westmoreland and Indiana, and it was thought that he, by his eloquence and personal popularity, would overcome the usual Democratic majority in Westmoreland. The Democrats put in nomination against him John Klingensmith, a plain man of German descent, but an active and insinuating party man of some influence among his own class. He was chosen as the strongest man in the county. There was at that time in those districts wherein this German element predominated a marked clannish or national feeling. A man of German descent, who spoke the German language, would always receive more than his party vote. It was held that Klingensmith would receive the votes of all his freundschaft, and of persons who, although not Democrats, were of Teutonic descent. Indiana was an anti-Masonic county. Coulter was a well-known Mason, who in the violent disputes with the anti-Masons had been put forward as a champion of the "brethren of the mystic tie." To obtain the vote of Indiana County he openly renounced Masonry. His letter of renunciation will be found in the old files of the Greensburg papers. The election was hot; his political opponents used every argument and every incentive to defeat him when it was possible to do so by dissension in his own party; and notwithstanding his own high character and the great exertions of his friends he was defeated. He was a man of courage and of unquestioned talent, but he could not stem the strong current of Jackson Democracy.

After his defeat Mr. Coulter withdrew from politics, and gave his whole time and attention to his profession. His defeat in all probability was beneficial to him in more than one point. His engagement in active political life had caused him to neglect his business pursuits. His habits henceforth became more even, and his attention ceasing to be distracted by the fascination of political life, he shortly obtained one of the most, if not altogether the most, lucrative practices at the bar. His defeat helped to make him a wealthy man, and in all probability prolonged his life. For the habits of a public life, such as it then was at the seat of government, were entirely different from those which prevailed about a county-seat of justice, and necessitated a continuous and tireless mental activity, and one scarcely ever in harmony with a judicial cast of mind.

But although he had withdrawn from politics, it was generally known that he sympathized with the anti-Democratic party, which had then assumed the name of Whig. He voted in 1840 for Gen. Harrison, and in 1844 he was chosen chairman of the Clay and Markle County Committee. In this position he wrote and published a handsome, nervous address to the voters, which will be found in the files of the Greensburg Intelligencer. To the astonishment of the public, shortly before the election he changed sides and openly voted for Shunk and Polk.

The power of appointment of judges was then vested in the Governor. Some time in 1846 a vacancy occurred in the Supreme Court. Governor Shunk was petitioned to appoint Coulter to the vacancy. Among these petitioners the most active were the members of the Westmoreland bar without respect of party. They had some outside influence and co-operation in their efforts. The Rev. James Brownson, the pastor of the Presbyterian Church to which Coulter and his family were attached, was a nephew of Governor Shunk by marriage, his mother being a full sister of Mrs. Shunk. As Westmoreland had given the Governor some two thousand majority, he could not well refuse the solicitation of the party leaders here. Coulter was therefore appointed by Governor Shunk associate justice of the Supreme Court in the stead of Justice Kennedy, deceased Jan. 8, 1847.

In 1850 the constitution was amended so as to give the election of judges to the people. Among the vacancies to be filled at the election of 1851 was that of chief justice and an associate justice of the Supreme Court. John Bannister Gibson and James Campbell were nominated for these offices by the Democrats, and William L. Meredith and Richard Coulter by the Whigs. All the Whig candidates—Governor and judges—were defeated except Richard Coulter, who was elected by a majority of some thousands over James Campbell. Mr. Campbell was a lawyer of Philadelphia, and was subsequently Postmaster-General under President Pierce.

The opinions of Judge Coulter while he was on the bench by appointment, and his upright conduct, were regarded by honest and religious men with so much favor that the Whigs tendered him the nomination without any intrigue or personal solicitation from his friends or himself.

He early distinguished himself on the bench in an elaborate opinion in the case of David Hummell et al. versus Dr. Mercer Brown et al., in which he at great length defined and gave judicial status to the legislative power of the State in the creation and control of corporations, particularly those of an eleemosynary character. At the time of its rendition, 1847, it was regarded by lawyers as one of the ablest and most eloquent opinions ever delivered from the bench of the Supreme Court.

The character of Mr. Coulter as a judge was highly respectable. As a lawyer he may not have been equal to Gibson, but he was equal to Bell, of Chester, and superior to Rogers and Burnside. He was incorruptible, and his course was such as to enlarge the confidence of appellants. While other judges were more or less controlled by the mastery of Gibson, Coulter was sternly independent. For example, on the Sunday law question he disagreed with all the other judges. On this question being brought before them they rested the observance of Sunday on the laws of Pennsylvania. Judge Coulter regarded it as a Christian Sabbath, and rested its observance on positive command from Almighty God. He assumed, in short, the higher law position. The arguments and opinions are found in the reports, and should be read by students.

As a politician, Coulter was charged with inconsistency and whimsical changes of opinion and party. But perhaps there were good sense and sound judgment at the bottom. He had been a Federalist, and became a Democrat under the wing of Jackson. The Jackson Democrats a long time maintained sound Federalist measures,—a protective tariff, a national bank, and a general system of internal improvements. The highest protective tariff bill that any of the old Congresses ever passed was signed by Andrew Jackson in 1828. But when Jackson adopted the opinions of the States' Rights men, and used the veto power to derange the financial system of the country, Coulter had the courage to resist the administration and maintain a consistent position. His conduct in 1844 appeared very strange, but it was afterwards seen to be politic. It was understood by intelligent politicians that if Binney and Le Moynes, the anti-slavery candidates for President and Governor, remained in the field Clay and Markle would be defeated. The election was to be decided by combinations and arrangement. Of this Coulter was fully aware, and no doubt knew that in maintaining a consistent position he was doing no good to Clay and Markle, and was only condemning himself to obscurity and the monotonous life of a dull country town. His influence with the leading Democratic leaders in the county was still strong; the past was forgotten, and they came to his aid when he called upon them.

Mr. Coulter was fiercely and coarsely assailed for his renunciation of what Voltaire calls the "tomfoolery of Freemasonry" when he was a candidate for re-election to Congress. But he could not have obtained a majority in Indiana County unless he had renounced Masonry, and his connection with the Masons was broken off for the patriotic purpose, as was said, of serving the substantial interests of the whole country. It must be remembered that as a representative in Congress he occupied a front position. The election in this district was regarded with anxiety throughout the State, and his defeat was deplored by the opponents of the administration. A leading opposition paper lamented his defeat in the following language: "Poor Pennsylvania! she is the Bœotia of the Union! Where else could such a man as Richard Coulter have been defeated by such an unknown and illiterate person as his antagonist?"

Judge Coulter was well read in politics, theology, law, and literature. His private library, both law and literary, was excellent. The evidences of his scholarship will be found in his political controversy with Dr. Postlethwaite, his miscellaneous writings,—such as "The Burning of Hannastown," "Address" to the Whigs in 1844,—and in his reported opinions when on the Supreme Bench. The controversy with Dr. Postlethwaite may be found in the old files of the county newspapers. While in Congress he made a very long speech for the recharter of the Bank of the United States, a copy of which in manuscript has been retained in his family.¹ His letter of renunciation of Masonry is beautifully written, and worthy of republication by reason of its literary merit. His speeches, addresses, and select miscellanies would fill a well-sized volume. His style, easy and good, is also flowery, ornate, and oratorical. But he was a bachelor and fond of poetry and novels. Of all the lawyers at the Greensburg bar he was the greatest orator. Traditions of his powers and of his wonderful effect over jurors and even large assemblages are still preserved, and it is likely that no man of orinary intellect who heard his celebrated speech on the trial of Tom Morgan will ever forget its effect.

¹ We have had access to this, and we regard it as a patriotic, scholarly, and profound argument, and an able presentation of that side of the controversy.

Great as a lawyer as Judge Coulter was, those who are well informed as to his talents and parts are of opinion he might have been still greater and have been able to attain a higher position in his profession had he given all his time and abilities to that profession. He was the best general scholar of all the lawyers at the Greensburg bar, and a better one than any of the judges on the bench of the Supreme Court.

In touching upon the moral character of Judge Coulter it may well be said that he had will-power sufficient to break away from the customs and habits which, although at that time were with professional men not bad, yet common, and such as were not regarded without a certain degree of favor. But oppositely all his influence was on the side of morality and religion. His professional character was stainless. He was upright, truth-telling, and honorable, and made money by fair labor in his profession. In all the hot political contests he was never charged with meanness, chicanery, or the exaction of exorbitant fees. Although sometimes whimsical and charged with ill temper, he was a person of humanity, and disposed to protect the weak and friendless. Altogether he was an upright, moral man and a patriotic citizen.

JOHN F. BEAVER.—The story of the life and professional services of John F. Beaver is so well told in the following article, which appeared upon the announcement of his death, and which was written by an able member of this bar and an intimate friend of Mr. Beaver, that we might mar it by adding anything to it that we have collected from other sources.

John F. Beaver died at his residence at Newton Falls, Ohio, on the 12th of June, 1877.

Although more than thirty years had gone by since Mr. Beaver left here, his name, fame, and person were still fresh in the recollection of many of our people. In fact, it was not possible for any who once knew him ever to forget him, as his genial character and exuberant flow of animal spirits rendered him conspicuous in every company.

He was born near Stoystown, in Somerset County, his maternal grandfather, Daniel M. Stoy, Esq., having given a name to that village as its original proprietor. His father, Henry Beaver, removed some years after, with his family, to Grapeville, in this county, where the subject of this sketch continued to live till about 1843 or 1844, when he removed to the place where he died. He left a widow and one son to enjoy a large estate, the fruit of his industry and economy. His physical organization was remarkable, and he excelled all his fellows in athletic sports and exercises which required strength and precision of muscular action.

In his prime his weight was about two hundred and twenty-five pounds, bone and muscle, and old men still tell of his wonderful feats of skill and strength, which were always accompanied with some humorous freak to attract the crowd. For a wager he would stipulate to pitch a quoit into the hat of his antagonist fourteen times out of fifteen a distance of forty yards. Having won at the expense of the hat he would console the owner by buying him a new one. With the rifle he was unerring, anything but the centre being with him an exceptional accident. Hearing, upon one occasion, of a match to shoot for a bear in a remote part of the county, he dropped in, and was solicited to take a stake to make up the match, which he could not decline, for fear of spoiling the fun. The first trouble was to fix the distance from the mark. This he appeased by proposing that each marksman should put down his number of yards, then divide the aggregate by the number of the stakes. He was the clerk and entered last, putting down one yard, wanting, he said, to get as nigh as possible to the target. On footing up and dividing the result was what he expected and brought about, but there was no suspicion. The next difficulty was his want of a gun, and his awkwardness was so apparent that none of the company liked to intrust him with one. A boy was, however, discovered on the road at some distance with a ponderous, rusty-looking firelock, which after much haggling he agreed to lend for the occasion, provided they would not tell his father. The firing then commenced, and when Beaver's turn came they kindly volunteered to show him how to hold the weapon, how to look through the sights, and so on. He was very unsteady, but somehow or other the nail was driven and the paper fell. This was rare sport, and the luck of the lawyer was marvelous. The second round was followed by the same result. Then there was not so much laughing, and the suspicion increased when some of the bystanders saw a chain hanging out of the boy's pocket. He was equally nervous and equally successful on the last round, when the boy chained the bear to lead him away. He was Beaver's boy, with Beaver's gun and chain.

The finishing stroke was to furnish the whole party with a good dinner, and secure them as friends and clients ever after.

At about the age of twenty-one Beaver cut himself with an axe, and was confined to his house for some weeks. This was intolerable to his active spirit, and he must do something, and there was only one thing he could think of. He was utterly illiterate, barely able to read, but seeing a copy of "Smith's Laws," which had belonged to his grandfather Stoy when a justice of the peace, he determined to attack them, dry as they were. This he did with so much zeal and vigor that by the time his wound healed he was the confidential adviser of all his neighbors in the law. He then learned surveying, and after mastering that art practically he concluded to study law regularly, and for this purpose put himself under the direction of A. W. Foster, Esq., a good tutor and eminent lawyer, who thought he saw in this young Hercules something better even than muscle, and he encouraged him to persevere.

He read law for five years, boarding all that time in Grapeville, four miles from Greensburg, and walking in and out every day. He was admitted to the bar in February, 1833, and was soon in a large practice.

He was first an anti-Mason in politics, and afterwards a Whig, then one of the original Free-Soil party. He ran for Congress in 1840 as a Whig, but was defeated by A. G. Marchand, Esq. The senior editor of the Argus, John M. Laird, Esq., was during the campaign chairman of the Democratic County Convention to prepare resolutions of the sense of that body. He and Beaver stopped at the same hotel. Laird called his committee and had his resolutions already "cut and dry" for the meeting in the afternoon. His head was about thirty inches, more or less, and Beaver's was of the same size, and when Laird went to dinner he mistook his hat, and put his resolutions in Beaver's hat. Beaver went into court, and among other things presented to the court was Laird's resolutions, denouncing him (Beaver) as a scamp and unworthy of any respectable citizen's support. The court (Judge White), as fond of fun as anybody, gravely decided that he had no jurisdiction of the matter, and the resolutions were returned to Mr. Laird and duly passed by the convention.

Such was the good humor and fun of our old men forty years ago. About this time he did a good deal of professional business in Allegheny, and in 1842 sold his library and office furniture to Edward Cowan, Esq., with whom he was a short time in partnership, but removed to Ohio in a year or two thereafter. His success at the bar and in the Supreme Court was very marked, being a great favorite with the judges on account of his fair and candid hearing towards them.

As soon as he was qualified in Ohio he was elected to the Senate of that State, and attracted great attention and consideration by his size, dress, and singular ability. The Senate was a tie without him, and he was looked for with great anxiety when that body met. He arrived just in the nick of time, his wagon having broken down on the way; he had walked twelve miles that morning. He was a stranger, covered with mud, and as he strode into the chamber he was greeted with cheers, and his "boots" became famous in song and story for years after. He was leader for some time, but he could not work well in the harness of party, and he gave up his chances for promotion to enjoy independence of thought and action in the practice of his profession, which he continued till the last.

In the mean time he was industriously enlarging the boundaries of his knowledge in every direction, and continued his efforts through life, until at last he had few equals in all the fields of human learning.

His memory was astonishing, extending to the minutest details, even dates and figures in all his business transactions; and he has been known to reproduce a draught of the courses and distances of a tract of land he had surveyed years before by mere force of his recollection.

He was a fearless inquirer and thinker, and, like all men of great energy and full of animal spirits, he was prone to be a reformer by remodeling the world according to modern ideas. Nor did failure seem to discourage him, as a new scheme was at hand always and ready for adoption.

His manners were easy and entirely unaffected, and no amount of provocation could disturb the equanimity of his temper or give him a second thought. He treasured no malice, and seemed incapable of hating anybody for any length of time. He had no vanity or pride, took no thought of himself or his person, and if clothes had been indestructible he would have worn the same suit forever. Mr. Cowan once having in various ways got his measures, procured for him a new suit of fashionable clothes, based upon a pair of polished boots, and surmounted by a great white "stove-pipe" hat. There was some coaxing necessary to get him to don the "rig," but once on and in the street the town turned out to give him an ovation. He was the hero par excellence of the young men. His great physique, kind and genial disposition had for them irresistible attractions, and they followed him for instruction as well as entertainment.

He belonged to a class of men produced in Western Pennsylvania, of nearly the same age, and who were equal, at least, to any of a like area in the Union. Ogle, Black, and Elder were of Somerset—"frosty sons of thunder;" Black, still wielding his ponderous spear, now without a rival; Ewing, Veech, Patterson, and Kaine sustained the old renown of Fayette, while Coulter, Thomas Williams, Governor Johnston, and Foster gave fame and credit to old Westmoreland. Some have disappeared, and the rest are fast disappearing; but they are not forgotten, and will not be as long as genuine merit has admirers.

ALBERT GALLATIN MARCHAND was born Feb. 26, 1811, and died Feb. 5, 1848, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. The disease of which he died made itself known but a few months before his death, but it had been secretly undermining his constitution for a long time prior to that.

At a very early age he went into the prothonotary's office as an assistant to his father, Dr. David Marchand. He even then displayed remarkable business talents; but the urbanity and politeness of his manner, his obliging and kind and courteous disposition, always manifesting itself towards those who were brought into business intercourse with him, secured for him the admiration, confidence, and esteem of the foremost business men and litigants of the county.

He came to the bar in 1833, and when he did so he at once succeeded to a much larger practice than is usual with beginners in this profession. This continued until his death.

To this profession he devoted very respectable legal talents, considerable learning, great zeal, and untiring industry. No man's cause was left in his hands without receiving the carefulest and most critical attention, and when it was necessary to carry it to the bar he was assiduous in his preparation, and there advocated or defended with manly zeal and vigorous eloquence. His intercourse with members of the bar was characterized with scrupulous integrity, a high sense of honor, and a candid frankness; and these traits were evidenced in his intercourse with his fellow-men generally. He thus attained, for one of his age, a very high eminence in those qualities that confer dignity and honor on his profession. The clients who intrusted business to him had all confidence that everything would be done for them. His integrity was beyond a question, and his word as good as his bond.

He was early and sincerely attached to his party, the Democratic, and his fellow-citizens recognizing his worth, early conferred upon him honorable office. In 1840, when in his twenty-eighth year, he was elected to Congress in the district composed of Westmoreland and Indiana Counties. When he first took his seat, during the administration of Harrison, he was the youngest member except one. In 1842 he was elected for another term.

He possessed those strong traits of character very prominent in his family, a love for home and for the domestic circle, and preferred the endearments of wife and children and of devoted relations above the loud voice of popular applause.

His loss was deeply felt, for when one so young, so talented, so honored, and so beloved, a patriot so ardent and a friend so true as he was thus so suddenly called away from the circle in which he moved, the hearts of all were clouded with grief, and with these his memory was long sacredly treasured.

HON. HENRY DONNELL FOSTER.

But scant justice can be done in the limits of a sketch like this to the memory of a man who filled so large a place while living in the esteem and affection of the community in which his life's work was done, one so distinguished as a lawyer, statesman, and jurist.

Henry Donnell Foster was born in Mercer, Mercer Co., Pa., Dec. 19, 1808. He was a descendant of distinguished Scottish, English, and Dutch stock. The Fosters were noted for their learning and ability generations before they came to this country, more than a century and a half ago. They were of that God-fearing liberty-loving race which fought so long and so fearlessly against the religious intolerance which devastated Scotland in the bloody years before the time of Cromwell.

They were among the refugees who fled to the North of Ireland for peace and safety, and where they soon became a family of note and influence among the Scotch-Irish colonists. From this stock came Alexander Foster, the ancestor of the subject of this sketch, who, with his three young sons, William, James, and John, emigrated from Londonderry in the year 1725, and settled in Freehold, N. J.

On the maternal side, Mr. Foster was descended from the English Lords Townley, who were prominent Roman Catholics, and lived in Lancashire, where they held large estates. The maternal ancestor of the Fosters who first came to this country was Mary Townley, the wife of William Lawrence. She was a sister of the then Lord Townley, the head of the family. Mary became a Protestant, and married William Lawrence, which so scandalized her Roman Catholic brother that he forbade her ever entering his house again. She went with her husband and many others in that famous emigration to Holland which preceded the Puritan emigration to the bleak shores of New England.

After a residence of two years, she and her husband set sail from the harbor of Delft Haven for America, with Plymouth, Mass., as their destination. Their reckoning became lost in a severe storm during the passage, and they were compelled to land at the mouth of the Hudson, among the Dutch settlements.

Their eldest son, William, married and settled at Flushing, Long Island. The daughter married a Van Hook, and lived on the Hudson near New York, or New Amsterdam, as it was then called. Their son, Lawrence Van Hook, was a judge of the court in that city. His daughter Frances married the Rev. Samuel Blair. She was the great-grandmother of Mr. Foster.

Of the three sons who came to America with their father, Alexander Foster, James, when grown, went to Washington County, Pa., where he made extensive purchases of lands and became a farmer. He was the grandfather of the celebrated American musical composer, Stephen C. Foster, also of William B. Foster, Jr., at one time vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and of Morrison Foster, of Allegheny City.

John went South and settled in Tennessee, where his descendants have been distinguished citizens, eminent in the councils of their State, and before the civil war in those of the nation.

William, the remaining son, the grandfather of Mr. Foster, studied for the ministry and settled in Octotara township, Chester Co., Pa., where he preached the gospel until the time of his death. He was born in Little Britain township, Lancaster Co., in 1740. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1764, having for his cotemporaries in that institution David Ramsay, the historian, Judge Jacob Rush, Oliver Ellsworth, Nathaniel Niles, and Luther Martin. He was taken under the care of the Presbytery of New Castle as a probationer for the ministry, Oct. 23, 1766, and was licensed to preach by that Presbytery, April 21, 1767. He accepted a call from the congregations of Upper Octorara and Doe Run, and was installed Oct. 19, 1768, being then about twenty-eight years of age.

Soon after his licensure he married Hannah, a daughter of Rev. Samuel Blair, formerly of Fagg's Manor, and a granddaughter of Lawrence Van Hook, Esq., formerly one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas of New York, who was among the first settlers from the United Netherlands.

