POETICAL WORKS

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

PREFACE.

AT the age of sixty-three I have undertaken to collect and edite my Poetical Works, with the last corrections that I can expect to bestow upon them. They have obtained a reputation equal to my wishes; and I have this ground for hoping it may not be deemed hereafter more than commensurate with their deserts, that it has been gained without ever accommodating myself to the taste or fashion of the times. Thus to collect and revise them is a duty which I owe to that part of the Public by whom they have been auspiciously received, and to those who will take a lively concern in my good name when I shall have departed.

The arrangement was the first thing to be considered. In this the order wherein the respective poems were written has been observed, so far as was compatible with a convenient classification. Such order is useful to those who read critically, and desire to trace the progress of an author's mind in his writings; and by affixing dates to the minor pieces, under whatever head they are disposed, the object is sufficiently attained.

Next came the question of correction. There was no difficulty with those poems which were composed after the author had acquired his art, (so far as he has acquired it,) and after his opinions were matured. It was only necessary to bear in mind the risk there must ever be of injuring a poem by verbal alterations made long after it was written; inasmuch as it must be impossible to recall the precise train of thought in which any passage was conceived, and the considerations upon which not the single verse alone, but the whole sentence, or paragraph, had been constructed: but with regard to more important changes, there could be no danger of introducing any discrepance in style. With juvenile pieces the case is different. From these the faults of diction have been weeded, wherever it could be done without more trouble than the composition worth. But inherent faults of conception and structure are incurable; and it would have been mere waste of time to recompose what it was impossible otherwise to amend.

If these poems had been now for the first time to be made public, there are some among them which, instead of being committed to the press, would have been consigned to the flames; not for any disgrace which could be reflected upon me by the crude compositions of my youth, nor for any harm which they could possibly do the reader, but merely that they might not cumber the collection. But "nescit vox missa reverti." Pirated editions would hold out as a recommendation, that they contained what I had chosen to suppress, and thus it becomes prudent, and therefore proper, that such pieces should be retained.

It has ever been a rule with me when I have imitated a passage, or borrowed an expression, to acknowledge the specific obligation. Upon the present occasion it behoves me to state the more general and therefore more important obligations which I am conscious of owing either to my predecessors or my contemporaries.

My first attempts in verse were much too early to be imitative ; but I was fortunate enough to find my way, when very young, into the right path. I read the "Jerusalem Delivered" and the "Orlando Furioso," again and again, in Hoole's translations; it was for the sake of their stories that I perused and re-perused these poems with evernew delight; and by bringing them thus within my reach in boyhood, the translator rendered me a service which, when I look back upon my intellectual life, I cannot estimate too highly. I owe him much also for his notes, not only for the information concerning other Italian romances which they imparted, but also for introducing me to Spenser; - how early, an incident which I well remember may show. Going with a relation into Bull's circulating library at Bath, (an exceloriginally cost, and than the piece itself was lent one for those days,) and asking whether they had the "Faery Queen," the person who managed the shop said, "Yes, they had it, but it was in obsolete language, and the young gentleman would not understand it." But I, who had learned all I then knew of the history of England from Shakespear, and who had moreover read Beaumont and Fletcher, found no difficulty in Spenser's English, and felt in the beanty of his versification a charm in poetry of which I had never been fully sensible before. From that time I took Spenser for my master. I drank also betimes of Chancer's well. The taste which had been acquired in that school was confirmed by Percy's "Reliques" and Warton's "History of English Poetry;" and a little later by Homer and the Bible. It was not likely to be corrupted afterwards.

My school-boy verses savored of Gray, Mason, and my predecessor Warton; and in the best of my juvenile pieces it may be seen how much the writer's mind had been imbued by Akenside. I an conscious also of having derived much henefit at one time from Cowper, and more from Bowles; for which, and for the delight which his poems gave me at an age when we are most susceptible of such delight, my good friend at Bremhill, to whom I was then and long afterwards personally unknown, will allow me to make this grateful and cordial acknowledgment.

My obligation to Dr. Sayers is of a different kind. Every one who has an ear for metre and a heart for poetry, must have felt how perfectly the metre of Collins's "Ode to Evening" is in accordance with the imagery and the feeling. None of the experiments which were made of other unrhymed stanzas proved successful. They were either in strongly-marked and well-known measures, which unavoidably led the reader to expect rhyme, and consequently balked him when he looked for it; or they were in stanzas as cumbrous as they were ill constructed. Dr. Sayers went upon a different principle, and succeeded admirably. I read his "Dramatic Sketches of Northern Mythology" when they were first published, and convinced myself, when I had acquired some skill in versification, that the kind of verse in which his choruses were composed was not less applicable to narration than to lyrical poetry. Soon after I had begun the Arabian romance, for which this measure seemed the most appropriate vehicle, "Gebir" fell into my hands; and my verse was greatly improved by it, both in vividness and strength. Several years elapsed before I knew that Walter Landor was the author, and more before I had the good fortune to meet the person to whom I felt myself thus beholden. The days which I have passed with him in the Vale of Ewias, at Como, and lastly in the neighborhood of Bristol, are some of those which have left with me "a joy for memory."

I have thus acknowledged all the specific obligations to my elders or contemporaries in the art, of which I am distinctly conscious. The advantages arising from intimate intercourse with those who were engaged in similar pursuits cannot be in like manner specified, because in their nature they are imperceptible; but of such advantages no man has ever possessed more or greater, than at different times it has been my lot to enjoy. Personal attachment first, and family circumstances afterwards, connected me long and closely with Mr. Coleridge; and three-and-thirty years have ratified a friendship with Mr. Wordsworth, which we believe will not terminate with this life, and which it is a pleasure for us to know will be continued and cherished as an heir-loom by those who are dearest to us both.

When I add, what has been the greatest of all advantages, that I have passed more than half my life in retirement, conversing with books rather than men, constantly and unweariably engaged in literary pursuits, communing with my own heart, and taking that course which, upon mature consideration, seemed best to myself, I have said every thing necessary to account for the characteristics of my poetry, whatever they may be.

It was in a mood resembling in no slight degree that wherewith a person in sound health, both of body and mind, makes his will and sets his worldly affairs in order, that I entered upon the serious task of arranging and revising the whole of my poetical works. What, indeed, was it but to bring in review before me the dreams and aspirations of my youth, and the feelings whereto I had given that free utterance which by the usages of this world is permitted to us in poetry, and in poetry alone? Of the smaller pieces in this collection there is scarcely one concerning which I cannot vividly call to mind when and where it was composed. I have perfect recollection of the spots where many, not of the scenes only, but of the images which I have described from nature, were observed and noted. And how would it be possible for me to forget the interest taken in these poems, especially the longer and more ambitious works, by those persons nearest and dearest to me then, who witnessed their growth and completion? Well may it be called a serious task thus to resuscitate the past! But, serious though it be, it is not painful to one who knows that the end of his journey cannot be far distant, and, by the blessing of God, looks on to its termination with sure and certain hope.

PREFACE TO JOAN OF ARC.

EARLY in July, 1793, I happened to fall in conversation, at Oxford, with an old schoolfellow upon the story of Joan of Arc; and it then struck me as being singularly well adapted for a poem. The long vacation commenced immediately afterwards. As soon as I reached home I formed the outline of a plan, and wrote about three hundred lines. The remainder of the month was passed in travelling; and I was too much engaged in new scenes and circumstances to proceed, even in thought, with what had been broken off. In August I went to visit my old schoolfellow, Mr. Grosvenor Bedford, who, at that time, resided with his parents at Brixton Causeway, about four miles on the Surrey side of the metropolis. There, the day after completing my nineteenth year, I resumed the undertaking, and there, in six weeks from that day, finished what I called an Epic Poem in twelve books.

My progress would not have been so rapid had it not been for the opportunity of retirement which I enjoyed there, and the encouragement that I received. In those days London had not extended in that direction farther than Kennington, beyond which place the scene changed suddenly, and there was an air and appearance of country which might now be sought in vain at a far greater distance from town. There was nothing indeed to remind one that London was so near, except the smoke which overhung it. Mr. Bedford's residence was situated upon the edge of a common, on which shady lanes opened leading to the neighboring villages (for such they were then) of Camberwell, Dulwieh, and Clapham, and to Norwood. The view in front was bounded by the Surrey hills. Its size and structure showed it to be one of those good houses built in the early part of the last century by persons who, having realized a respectable fortune in trade, were wise enough to be contented with it, and retire to pass the evening of their lives in the enjoyment of leisure and tranquillity. Tranquil indeed the place was; for the neighborhood did not extend beyond half a dozen families, and the London style and habits of visiting had not obtained among them. Uncle Toby himself might have enjoyed his rood and a half of ground there, and not have had it known. A forecourt separated the house from the foot-path and the road in front; behind, there was a large and well-stocked garden, with other spacious premises, in which utility and ornament were in some degree combined. At the extremity of the garden, and under the shade of four lofty linden trees, was a summer-house looking on an ornamented grassplot, and fitted up as a conveniently habitable room. That summer-house was allotted to me, and there my mornings were passed at the desk. Whether it exists now or not, I am ignorant. The property has long since passed into other hands. The common is enclosed and divided by rectangular hedges and palings; rows of brick houses have supplanted the shade of oaks and elms; the brows of the Surrey hills bear a parapet of modern villas, and the face of the whole district is changed.

I was not a little proud of my performance. Young poets are, or at least used to be, as ambitious of producing an epic poem, as stage-stricken youths of figuring in Romeo or Hamlet. It had been the earliest of my day-dreams. I had begun many such; but this was the first which had been completed, and I was too young and too ardent to perceive or suspect that the execution was as crude as the design. In the course of the autumn I transcribed it fairly from the first draught, making no other alterations or corrections of any kind than such as suggested themselves in the act of transcription. Upon showing it to the friend in conversation with whom the design had originated, he said, "I am glad you have written this; it will serve as a store where you will find good passages for better poems." His opinion of it was more judicious than mine; but what there was good in it or promising, would not have been transplantable.

Toward the close of 1794, it was announced as to be published by subscription in a quarto volume, price one guinea. Shortly afterwards I became acquainted with my fellow-townsman, Mr. Joseph Cottle, who had recently commenced business as a bookseller in our native city of Bristol. One evening I read to him part of the poem, without any thought of making a proposal concerning it, or expectation of receiving one. He, however, offered me fifty guineas for the copyright, and fifty copies for my subscribers, which was more than the list amounted to; and the offer was accepted as promptly as it was made. It can rarely happen that a young author should meet with a bookseller as inexperienced and as ardent as himself, and it would be still more extraordinary if such mutual indiscretion did not bring with it cause for regret to both. But this transaction was the commencement of an intimacy which has continued, without the slightest shade of displeasure at any time, on either side, to the present day.

At that time, few books were printed in the country, and it was seldom indeed that a quarto volume issued from a provincial press. A font of new types was ordered for what was intended to be the handsomest book that Bristol had ever yet sent forth; and when the paper arrived, and the printer was ready to commence his operations, nothing had been done toward preparing the poem for the press, except that a few verbal alterations had heen made. I was not, however, without misgivings, and when the first proof-sheet was brought me, the more glaring faults of the composition stared me in the face. But the sight of a well-printed page, which was to be set off with all the advantages that fine wove paper and hot-pressing could impart, put me in spirits, and I went to work with good-will. About half the first hook was left in its original state; the rest of the poem was re-cast and re-composed while the printing went on. This occupied six months. 1 corrected the concluding sheet of the poem, left the Preface in the publisher's hands, and departed for Lisbon by way of Coruña and Madrid.

The Preface was written with as little discretion as had been shown in publishing the work itself. It stated how rapidly the poem had been produced, and that it had been almost re-composed during its progress through the press. This was not said as taking merit for haste and temerity, nor to excuse its faults, - only to account for them. But here I was liable to be misapprehended, and likely to be misrepresented. The public indeed care neither for explanations nor excuses; and such particulars might not unfitly be deemed unbecoming in a young man, though they may be excused, and even expected, from an old author, who, at the close of a long career, looks upon himself as belonging to the past. Omitting these passages, and the specification of what Mr. Coleridge had written in the second book, (which was withdrawn in the next edition,) the remainder of the Preface is here subjoined. It states the little which I had been able to collect concerning the subject of the poem, gives what was then my own view of Joan of Arc's character and history, and expresses with overweening confidence the opinions which the writer entertained concerning those poets whom it was his ambition not to imitate, but to follow. - It cannot be necessary to say, that some of those opinions have been modified, and others completely changed, as he grew older.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

The history of Joan of Arc is as mysterious as it is remarkable. That she believed herself inspired, few will deny; that she was inspired, no one will venture to assert; and it is difficult to helieve that she was herself imposed upon by Charles and Dunois. That she discovered the King when he disguised himself among the courtiers to deceive her, and that, as a proof of her mission, she demanded a sword from a tomb in the church of St. Catharine, are facts in which all historians agree. If this had been done by collusion, the Maid must have known herself an impostor, and with that knowledge could not have performed the enterprise she undertook. Enthusiasm, and that of no common kind, was necessary, to enable a young maiden at once to assume the profession of arms, to lead her troops to battle, to fight among the foremost, and to subdue with an inferior force an enemy then believed invincible. It is not possible that one who felt herself the puppet of a party, could have performed these things. The artifices of a court could not have persuaded her that she discovered Charles in disguise; nor could they have prompted her to demand the sword which they might have hidden, without discovering the deceit. The Maid then was not knowingly an impostor; nor could she have been the instrument of the court ; and to say that she believed herself inspired, will neither account for her singling out the King, or prophetically claiming the sword. After crowning Charles, she declared that her mission was accomplished, and demanded leave to retire. Enthusiasm would not have ceased here; and if they who imposed on her could persnade her still to go with their armies, they could still have continued her delusion.

This mysteriousness renders the story of Joan of Arc peculiarly fit for poetry. The aid of angels and devils is not necessary to raise her above mankind; she has no gods to lackey her, and inspire her with courage, and heal her wounds: the Maid of Orleans acts wholly from the workings of her own mind, from the deep feeling of inspiration. The palpable agency of superior powers would destroy the obscurity of her character, and sink her to the mere heroine of a fairy tale.

The alterations which I have made in the history are few and triffing. The death of Salisbury is placed later, and of the Talbots earlier than they occurred. As the battle of Patay is the concluding action of the Poem, I have given it all the previous solemnity of a settled engagement. Whatever appears miraculous is asserted in history, and my authorities will be found in the notes.

It is the common fault of Epic Poems, that we feel little interest for the heroes they celebrate. The national vanity of a Greek or a Roman might have been gratified by the renown of Achilles or Æneas; but to engage the unprejudiced, there must be more of human feelings than is generally to be found in the character of a warrior. From this objection, the Odyssey alone may be excepted. Ulysses appears as the father and the husband, and the affections are enlisted on his side. The judgment must applaud the well-digested plan and splendid execution of the Iliad, but the heart always bears testimony to the merit of the Odyssey: it is the poem of nature, and its personages inspire love rather than command admiration. The good herdsman Eumæns is worth a thousand heroes. Homer is, indeed, the best of poets, for he is at once dignified and simple ; but Pope has disguised him in fop-finery, and Cowper has stripped him naked.

There are few readers who do not prefer Turnus to Æneas - a fugitive, suspected of treason, who negligently left his wife, seduced Dido, deserted her, and then forcibly took Lavinia from her betrothed husband. What avails a man's piety to the gods, if in all his dealings with men he prove himself a villain? If we represent Deity as commanding a bad action, this is not exculpating the man, but criminating the God.

The ill-chosen subjects of Lucan and Statius have prevented them from acquiring the popularity they would otherwise bave merited; yet in detached parts, the former of these is perhaps unequalled, certainly unexcelled. 1 do not scruple to prefer Statius to Virgil; with inferior taste, he appears to me to possess a richer and more powerful imagination; his images are strongly conceived, and clearly painted, and the force of his language, while it makes the reader feel, proves that the author felt himself.

The power of story is strikingly exemplified in the Italian heroic poets. They please universally, even in translations, when little but the story remains. In proportioning his characters, Tasso has erred; Godfrey is the hero of the poem, Rinaldo of the poet, and Tancred of the reader. Secondary characters should not be introduced, like Gyas and Cloanthus, merely to fill a procession; neither should they be so prominent as to throw the principal into shade.

The lawless magic of Ariosto, and the singular theme as well as the singular excellence of Milton, render it impossible to deduce any rules of epic poetry from these authors. So likewise with Spenser, the favorite of my childhood, from whose frequent perusal I have always found increased delight.

Against the machinery of Camoens, a heavier charge must be brought than that of profaneness or incongruity. His floating island is but a floating brothel, and no beauty can make atonement for licentiousness. From this accusation, none but a translator would attempt to justify him; but Camoens had the most able of translators. The Lusiad, though excellent in parts, is uninteresting as a whole : it is read with little emotion, and remembered with little pleasure. But it was composed in the anguish of disappointed hopes, in the fatigues of war, and in a country far from all he loved; and we should not forget, that as the Poet of Portugal was among the most unfortunate of men, so he should be ranked among the most respectable. Neither his own country or Spain Le Mystere du Siege d'Orleans. In these modern has yet produced his equal : his heart was broken by calamity, but the spirit of integrity and independence never forsook Camoens.

I have endeavored to avoid what appears to me the common fault of epic poems, and to render the Maid of Orleans interesting. With this intent l have given her, not the passion of love, but the remembrance of subdued affection, a lingering of human feelings not inconsistent with the enthusiasm and holiness of her character.

The multitude of obscure epic writers copy with the most gross servility their ancient models. If a tempest occurs, some envious spirit procures it from the God of the winds or the God of the sea. Is there a town besieged? the eyes of the hero are opened, and he beholds the powers of Heaven assisting in the attack; an angel is at hand to heal his wounds, and the leader of the encmy in his last combat is seized with the sudden cowardice of Hector. Even Tasso is too often an imitator. But notwithstanding the censure of a satirist, the name of Tasso will still be ranked among the best heroic poets. Perhaps Boileau only condemned him for the sake of an antithesis; it is with such writers, as with those who affect point in their conversation - they will always sacrifice truth to the gratification of their vanity.

I have avoided what seems useless and wearying in other poems, and my readers will find no dcscriptions of armor, no muster-rolls, no geographical catalogues, lion, tiger, bull, bear, and boar similes, Phæbuses or Auroras. And where in battle I have particularized the death of an individual, it is not, I hope, like the common lists of killed and wounded.

It has been established as a necessary rule for the epic, that the subject should be national. To this rule I have acted in direct opposition, and chosen for the subject of my poem the defeat of the English. If there be any readers who can wish success to an unjust cause, because their country was engaged in it, I desire not their approbation.

In Millin's National Antiquities of France, 1 find that M. Laverdy was, in 1791, occupied in collecting whatever has been written concerning the Maid of Orleans. I have anxiously looked for his work, but it is probable, considering the tumults of the intervening period, that it has not been accomplished. Of the various productions to the memory of Joan of Arc, I have only collected a few titles, and, if report may be trusted, need not fear a heavier condemnation than to be deemed equally bad. A regular canon of St. Euverte has written what is said to be a very bad poem, entitled the Modern Amazon. There is a prose tragedy called La Pucelle d'Orleans, variously attributed to Benserade, to Boyer, and to Menardiere. The abbé Daubignac published a prose tragedy with the same title in 1642. There is one under the name of Jean Baruel of 1581, and another printed anonymously at Rouen, 1606. Among the manuscripts of the queen of Sweden in the Vatican, is a dramatic piece in verse called times, says Millin, all Paris has run to the theatre of Nicolet to see a pantomime entitled Le Fameux Siege de la Pucelle d'Orleans. I may add, that, after the publication of this poem, a pantomime upon the same subject was brought forward at Covent-Garden Theatre, in which the heroine, like Don Juan, was carried off by devils and precipitated alive into hell. I mention it, because the feelings of the audience revolted at such a catastrophe, and, after a few nights, an angel was introduced to rescue her.

But among the number of worthless poems upon this subject, there are two which are unfortunately notorious, - the Pucelles of Chapelain and Voltaire. I have had patience to peruse the first, and never have been guilty of looking into the second ; it is well said by George Herbert,

> Make not thy sport abuses, for the fly That feeds on dung, is colored thereby.

On the eighth of May, the anniversary of its deliverance, an annual fête is held at Orleans; and monuments have been erected there and at Rouen to the memory of the Maid. Her family was ennobled by Charles; but it should not be forgotten in the history of this monarch, that in the hour of misfortune he abandoned to her fate the woman who had saved his kingdom.

BRISTOL, November, 1795.

The poem, thus erudely conceived, rashly prefaced, and prematurely hurried into the world, was nevertheless favorably received, owing chiefly to adventitious circumstances. A work of the same class, with as much power and fewer faults, if it were published now, would attract little or no attention. One thing which contributed to bring it into immediate notice was, that no poem of equal pretension had appeared for many years, except Glover's Athenaid, which, notwithstanding the reputation of his Leonidas, had been utterly neglected. But the chief cause of its favorable reception was, that it was written in a republican spirit, such as may easily be accounted for in a youth whose notions of liberty were taken from the Greek and Roman writers, and who was ignorant enough of history and of human nature to believe, that a happier order of things had commenced with the independence of the United States, and would be accelerated by the French Revolution. Such opinions were then as unpopular in England as they deserved to be; hut they were cherished by most of the critical journals, and conciliated for me the good-will of some of the most influential writers who were at that time engaged in periodical literature, though I was personally unknown to them. They bestowed upon the poem abundant praise, passed over most of its manifold faults, and noticed others with indulgence. Miss Seward wrote some verses upon it in a strain of the highest eulogy and the bitterest invective; they were sent to the Morning might have been had it been planned and execu-

Chronicle, and the editor (Mr. Perry) accompanied their insertion with a vindication of the opinions which she had so vehemently denounced. Miss Seward was then in high reputation; the sincerity of her praise was proved by the severity of her censure; and nothing could have been more serviceable to a young author than her notice, thus indignantly, but also thus generously, bestowed. The approbation of the reviewers served as a passport for the poem to America, and it was reprinted there while I was revising it for a second edition.

A work, in which the author and the bookseller had engaged with equal imprudence, thus proved beneficial to both. It made me so advantageously known as a poet, that no subsequent hostility on the part of the reviews could pull down the reputation which had been raised by their good offices. Before that hostility took its determined character, the charge of being a hasty and eareless writer was frequently brought against me. Yet to have been six months correcting what was written in six weeks, was some indication of patient industry; and of this the second edition gave further evidence. Taking for a second motto the words of Erasmus, Ut homines ita libros, indies scipsis meliores fieri oportet, I spared no pains to render the poem less faulty both in its construction and composition; I wrote a new beginning, threw out much of what had remained of the original draught, altered more, and endeavored, from all the materials which I had means of consulting, to make myself better acquainted with the manners and circumstances of the fifteenth century. Thus the second edition differed almost as much from the first, as that from the copy which was originally intended for publication. Less extensive alterations were made in two subsequent editions; the fifth was only a reprint of the fourth; by that time I had become fully sensible of its great and numerous faults, and requested the reader to remember, as the only apology which could be offered for them, that the poem was written at the age of nineteen, and published at one-and-twenty. My intention then was, to take no further pains in correcting a work of which the inherent defects were incorrigible; and I did not look into it again for many years.

But now, when about to perform what at my age may almost be called the testamentary task of revising, in all likelihood for the last time, those works by which it was my youthful ambition "to be forever known," and part whereof I dare believe has been "so written to after times as they should not willingly let it die," it appeared proper that this poem, through which the author had been first made known to the public, two-and-forty years ago, should lead the way; and the thought that it was once more to pass through the press under my own inspection, induced a feeling in some respects resembling that with which it had been first delivered to the printer - and yet how different! for not in hope and ardor, nor with the impossible intention of rendering it what it ted in middle life, did I resolve to correct it once | An old man and a maid awaited him more throughout; but for the purpose of making it more consistent with itself in diction, and less inconsistent in other things with the well-weighed opinions of my maturer years. The faults of effort, which may generally be regarded as hopeful indications in a juvenile writer, have been mostly left as they were. The faults of language which remained from the first edition have been removed, so that in this respect the whole is sufficiently in keeping. And for those which expressed the political prejudices of a young man who had too little knowledge to suspect his own ignorance, they have either been expunged, or altered, or such substitutions have been made for them as harmonize with the pervading spirit of the poem, and are nevertheless in accord with those opinions which the author has maintained for thirty years, through good and evil report, in the maturity of his judgment as well as in the sincerity of his heart.

TO EDITH SOUTHEY

EDITH ! I brought thee late a humble gift, The songs of earlier youth ; it was a wreath With many an unripe blossom garlanded And many a weed, yet mingled with some flowers Which will not wither. Dearest ! now I bring A worthier offering; thou wilt prize it well, For well thou know'st amid what painful cares My solace was in this : and though to me There is no music in the hollowness Of common praise, yet well content am I Now to look back upon my youth's green prime, Nor idly, nor unprofitably past, Imping in such adventurous essay The wing, and strengthening it for steadier flight.

THE FIRST BOOK.

THERE was high feasting held at Vaucouleur, For old Sir Robert had a famous guest, The Bastard Orleans; and the festive hours, Cheer'd with the Trobador's sweet minstrelsy, Pass'd gayly at his hospitable board. But not to share the hospitable board And hear sweet minstrelsy, Dunois had sought Sir Robert's hall ; he came to rouse Lorraine, And glean what force the wasting war had left For one last effort. Little had the war Left in Lorraine, but age, and youth unripe For slaughter yet, and widows, and young maids Of widow'd loves. And now with his great guest The Lord of Vaucouleur sat communing On what might profit France, and found no hope, Despairing of their country, when he heard

In the castle-hall. He knew the old man well, His vassal Claude; and at his bidding Claude Approach'd, and after meet obeisauce made, Bespake Sir Robert.

"Good my Lord, I come With a strange tale; I pray you pardon me If it should seem impertinent, and like An old man's weakness. But, in truth, this Maid Hath with such boding thoughts impress'd my heart, I think I could not longer sleep in peace Gainsaying what she sought. She saith that God Bids her go drive the Englishmen from France ! Her parents mock at her and call her crazed, And father Regnier says she is possess'd; -But I, who know that never thought of ill Found entrance in her heart, - for, good my Lord, From her first birth-day she hath been to me As mine own child, - and I am an old man, Who have seen many moon-struck in my time, And some who were by evil Spirits vex'd,-I, Sirs, do think that there is more in this. And who can tell but, in these perilous times, It may please God, - but hear the Maid yourselves, For if, as I believe, this is of Heaven, My silly speech doth wrong it."

While he spake, Curious they mark'd the Damsel. She appear'd Of eighteen years; there was no bloom of youth Upon her cheek, yet had the loveliest hues Of health with lesser fascination fix'd The gazer's eye; for wan the Maiden was, Of saintly paleness, and there seem'd to dwell In the strong heauties of her countenance Something that was not earthly.

"I have heard

Of this your niece's malady," replied The Lord of Vaucouleur, "that she frequents The loneliest haunts and deepest solitude, Estranged from human kind and human cares With loathing like to madness. It were best To place her with some pious sisterhood, Who duly, morn and eve, for her soul's health Soliciting Heaven, may likeliest remedy The stricken mind, or frenzied or possess'd."

So as Sir Robert ceased, the Maiden cried, "I am not mad. Possess'd indeed I am! The hand of Gon is strong upon my soul, And I have wrestled vainly with the Lorn, And stubbornly, I fear me. I can save This country, Sir! I can deliver France! Yea-I must save the country !- Gon is in me : I speak not, think not, feel not of myself. HE knew and sanctified me ere my birth, HE to the nations hath ordained me; And whither HE shall send me, I must go; And whatso HE commands, that I must speak : And whatso is ms will, that I must do; And I must put away all fear of man, Lest HE in wrath confound me.'

At the first With pity or with scorn Dunois had heard The Maid inspired; but now he in his heart Felt that misgiving which precedes belief

I have loved thee Even from thy childhood, Joan ! and 1 shall lose	Till all grew dim upon her dizzy eye. "Oh what a blessed world were this!" she cried, "But that the great and honorable men Have seized the earth, and of the heritage Which God, the Sire of all, to all had given, Disherited their brethren! Happy those Who in the after days shall live, when Time Hath spoken, and the multitude of years Taught wisdom to mankind !— Unhappy France ! Fiercer than evening wolves thy bitter foes Rush o'er the land, and desolate, and kill ; Long has the widow's and the orphan's groan Accused Heaven's justice ;— but the hour is come !
Lorraine can raise to Chinon follow us; And with the tidings of this holy Maid, Sent by the Lorn, fill thou the country; soon Therewith shall France awake as from the sleep Of death. Now, Maid ! depart we at thy will." "Gon's blessing go with ye !" exclaim'd old Claude, "Good Angels guard my girl !" and as he spake The tears stream'd fast adown his aged cheeks. "And if I do not live to see thee more, As sure I think I shall not, — yet sometimes Remember thine old Uncle. " A simple tale," the mission'd Maid replied :

JOAN OF ARC.

The Meuse, that in its winding mazes shows, As on the farther bank, the distant towers Of Vaucouleur? there in the hamlet Arc My father's dwelling stands;8 a lowly hut, Yet nought of needful comfort did it lack, For in Lorraine there lived no kinder Lord Than old Sir Robert, and my father Jaques In flocks and herds was rich; a toiling man, Intent on worldly gains, one in whose heart Affection had no root. I never knew A parent's love; for harsh my mother was, And deem'd the care which infancy demands Irksome, and ill-repaid. Severe they were, And would have made me fear them; but my soul Possess'd the germ of inborn fortitude, And stubbornly I hore unkind rebuke And angry chastisement. Yet was the voice That spake in tones of tenderness most sweet To my young heart; how have I felt it leap With transport, when my Uncle Claude approach'd!

BOOK I.

For he would take me on his knee, and tell Such wondrous tales as childhood loves to hear, Listening with eager eyes and open lips Devoutly in attention. Good old man! Oh, if I ever pour'd a prayer to Heaven Unhallow'd by the grateful thought of him, Methinks the righteous winds would scatter it ! He was a parent to me, and his home Was mine, when in advancing years I found No peace, no comfort in my father's honse. With him I pass'd the pleasant evening hours, By day I drove my father's flock afield,⁹ And this was happiness.

" Amid these wilds Often to summer pasture have I driven The flock ; and well I know these woodland wilds, And every bosom'd vale, and valley stream Is dear to memory. I have laid me down Beside yon valley stream, that up the ascent Scarce sends the sound of waters now, and watch'd The beck roll glittering to the noon-tide sun, And listen'd to its ceaseless murmuring, Till all was hush'd and tranquil in my soul, Fill'd with a strange and undefined delight That pass'd across the mind like summer clouds Over the vale at eve; their fleeting hues The traveller cannot trace with memory's eye, Yet he remembers well how fair they were, How beautiful.

" In solitude and peace Here I grew up, amid the loveliest scenes Of unpolluted nature. Sweet it vas, As the white mists of morning roll'd away, To see the upland's wooded heights appear Dark in the early dawn, and mark the slope With gorse-flowers glowing, as the sun illumed Their golden glory ¹⁰ with his deepening light; Pleasant at noon beside the vocal brook To lay me down, and watch the floating clouds, And shape to fancy's wild similitudes Their ever-varying forms; and oh how sweet! To drive my flock at evening to the fold, And hasten to our little hut, and hear The voice of kindness bid me welcome home. "Amid the village playmates of my youth Was one whom riper years approved a friend. A gentle maid was my poor Madelon; I loved her as a sister, and long time Her undivided tenderness possess'd, Until a better and a holier tie Gave her one nearer friend; and then my heart Partook her happiness, for never lived A happier pair than Arnaud and his wife.

"Lorraine was call'd to arms, and with her youth Went Arnaud to the war. The morn was fair, Bright shone the sun, the birds sung cheerfully, And all the fields seem'd joyous in the spring ; But to Domremi wretched was that day, For there was lamentation, and the voice Of anguish, and the deeper agony That spake not. Never can my heart forget The feelings that shot through me, when the horn Gave its last call, and through the castle-gate The banner moved, and from the clinging arms Which hung on them, as for a last embrace, Sons, brethren, husbands, went.

"More frequent now Sought I the converse of poor Madelon, For now she needed friendship's soothing voice. All the long summer did she live in hope Of tidings from the war; and as at eve She with her mother by the cottage door Sat in the sunshine, if a traveller Appear'd at distance coming o'er the brow, Her eye was on him, and it might be seen By the flush'd cbeek what thoughts were in her heart,

And by the deadly paleness which ensued, How her heart died within her. So the days And weeks and months pass'd on ; and when the leaves

Fell in the autumn, a most painful hope That reason own'd not, that with expectation Did never cheer her as she rose at morn, Still linger'd in her heart, and still at night Made disappointment dreadful. Winter came, But Arnaud never from the war return'd ; He far away had perish'd; and when late The tidings of his certain death arrived, Sore with long anguish underneath that blow She sunk. Then would she sit and think all day Upon the past, and talk of happiness That never could return, as though she found Best solace in the thoughts which minister'd To sorrow : and she loved to see the sun Go down, because another day was gone, And then she might retire to solitude And wakeful recollections, or perchance To sleep more wearying far than wakefulness, Dreams of his safety and return, and starts Of agony ; so neither night nor day Could she find rest, but pined and pined away

" DEATH ! to the happy thou art terrible; But how the wretched love to think of thee, Oh thou true comforter, the friend of all Who have no friend beside ! ¹¹ By the sick bed Of Madelon I sat when sure she felt The hour of her deliverance drawing near; I saw her eye kindle with heavenly hope, I had her latest look of earthly love, I felt her hand's last pressure. — Son of Orleans! I would not wish to live to know that hour, When I could think upon a dear friend dead, And weep not; but they are not bitter tears, — Not painful now; for Christ hath risen, first fruits Of them that slept; and we shall meet again, Meet, not again to part: the grave hath lost Its victory.

"1 remember, as her bier Went to the grave, a lark sprung up aloft, And soar'd amid the sunshine, earolling So full of joy, that to the mourner's ear More mournfully than dirge or passing bell, The joyons carol came, and made us feel That of the multitude of beings, none But man was wretched.

"Then my soul awoke, For it had slumber'd long in happiness, And never feeling misery, never thought What others suffer. I, as best 1 might, Solaced the keen regret of Elinor; And much my cares avail'd, and much her son's, On whom, the only comfort of her age, She eentred now her love. A younger birth, Aged nearly as myself was Theodore, An ardent youth, who with the kindest care Had sooth'd his sister's sorrow. We had knelt By her death-bed together, and no bond In closer union knits two human hearts Than fellowship in grief.

" It chanced as once Beside the fire of Elinor I sat, The night was comfortless, the loud blast howl'd, And as we drew around the social hearth, We heard the rain beat hard. Driven by the storm A warrior mark'd our distant taper's light; We heapt the fire, and spread the friendly board. "T is a rude night,' the stranger eried: 'safe housed Pleasant it is to hear the pelting rain. I too could be content to dwell in peace, Resting my head upon the lap of love, But that my country calls. When the winds roar, Remember sometimes what a soldier suffers, And think on Conrade.' "Theodore replied, Success go with thee ! Something we have known Of war, and tasted its calamity; And I am well content to dwell in peace, Albeit inglorious, thanking the good God Who made me to be happy." " Did that God,' Cried Conrade, 'form thy heart for happiness, When Desolation royally eareers Over thy wretched country? Did that God Form thee for Peace when Slaughter is abroad, When her brooks run with blood, and Rape, and Murder, Stalk through her flaming towns? Live thou in peace,

Young man! my heart is human : I must feel For what my brethren suffer.' While he spake Such mingled passions character'd his face Of fierce and terrible benevolence, That I did tremble as I listen'd to him ; And in my heart tumultuous thoughts arose Of high achievements, indistinct, and wild, And vast, — yet such they were as made me pant As though by some divinity possess'd.

" 'But is there not some duty due to those We love?' said Theodore; 'is there an employ More righteons than to cheer declining age, And thus with filial tenderness repay Parental care?'

"Hard is it,' Conrade cried, 'Ay, hard indeed, to part from those we love; And I have suffer'd that severest pang. I have left an aged mother; I have left One upon whom my heart has fasten'd all Its dearest, best affections. Should I live Till France shall see the blessed hour of peace, I shall return; my heart will be content, My duties then will have been well discharged, And I may then be happy. There are those Who deem such thoughts the fancies of a mind Strict beyond measure, and were well content, If I should soften down my rigid nature Even to inglorious ease, to honor me. But pure of heart and high in self-estcem I must be honor'd by myself: all else, The breath of Fame, is as the unsteady wind Worthless.'

"So saying from his belt he took The encumbering sword. I held it, listening to him, And wistless what I did, half from the sheath Drew forth its glittering blade. I gazed upon it, And shuddering, as I touch'd its edge, exclaim d, How horrible it is with the keen sword To gore the finely-fibred human frame ! I could not strike a lamb.

"He answer'd me, 'Maiden, thou sayest well. I could not strike A lamb !--- But when the merciless invader Spares not gray age, and mocks the infant's shriek As it doth writhe upon his cursed lance, And forces to his foul embrace the wife Even where her slaughter'd husband bleeds to death. Almighty God! I should not be a man If I did let one weak and pitiful feeling Make mine arm impotent to cleave him down. Think well of this, young man ! '12 he cried, and took The hand of Theodore ; 'think well of this; As you are human, as you hope to live In peace, amid the dearest joys of home, Think well of this! You have a tender mother; As you do wish that she may die in peace, As you would even to madness agonize To hear this maiden call on you in vain For help, and see her dragg'd, and hear her scream In the blood-reeking soldier's lustful grasp, Think that there are such horrors ! 13 that even now, Some city flames, and haply, as in Roan, Some famish'd babe on his dead mother's breast Vet hangs and pulls for food ! 14 — Woe be to those By whom the evil comes! And wee to him,

For little less his guilt, - who dwells in peace, When every arm is needed for the strife!'

"When we had all betaken us to rest, Sleepless I lay, and in my mind revolved The high-soul'd warrior's speech. Then Madelon Rose in remembrance; over her the grave llad closed; her sorrows were not register'd In the rolls of fame; but when the tears run down The widow's cheek, shall not her cry be heard In Heaven against the oppressor? Will not God In sunder smite the unmerciful, and break The sceptre of the wicked ? 15 - Thoughts like these Possess'd my soul, till at the break of day I slept; nor did my heated brain repose Even then; for visions, sent, as I believe, From the Most High, arose. A high-tower'd town Hemm'd in and girt with enemies, I saw, Where Famine on a heap of carcasses, Half envious of the unutterable feast, Mark'd the gorged raven clog his beak with gore. I turn'd me then to the besieger's camp, And there was revelry : a lond, lewd laugh Burst on mine ear, and I beheld the chiefs Sit at their feast, and plan the work of death. My soul grew sick within me ; 1 look'd up, Reproaching Heaven, - lo! from the clouds an arm As of the avenging Angel was put forth, And from his hand a sword, like lightning, fell.

"From that night I could feel my burden'd soul Heaving beneath incumbent Deity. I sate in silence, musing on the days To come, unheeding and unseeing all Around me, in that dreaminess of thought When every bodily sense is as it slept, And the mind alone is wakeful. I have heard Strange voices in the evening wind; strange forms Dimly discover'd throng'd the twilight air. The neighbors wonder'd at the sudden change ; They call'd me crazed; and my dear Uncle, too, Would sit and gaze upon me wistfully, A heaviness upon his aged brow, And in his eye such sorrow, that my heart Sometimes misgave me. 1 had told him all The mighty future laboring in my breast, But that the hour, methought, not yet was come.

"At length I heard of Orleans, by the foe Wall'd in from human help: thither all thoughts, All hopes were turn'd; that bulwark beaten down, All were the invaders. Then my troubled soul Grew more disturb'd, and shunning every eye, I loved to wander where the woodland shade Was deepest, there on mightiest deeds to brood Of shadowy vastness, such as made my heart Throb loud: anon I paused, and in a state Of half expectance, listen'd to the wind.

"There is a fountain in the forest call'd The Fountain of the Fairies:¹⁶ when a child With a delightful wonder I have heard Tales of the Elfin tribe who on its banks Hold midnight revelry. An ancient oak, The goodliest of the forest, grows beside; Alone it stands, upon a green grass plat, By the woods bounded like some little isle. It ever hath been deem'd their favorite tree; They love to lie and rock upon its leaves,¹⁷ And bask in moonshine. Here the Woodman leads His boy, and showing him the green-sward mark'd With darker circlets, says their midnight dance Hath traced the rings, and bids him spare the tree. Faney had east a spell upon the place Which made it holy; and the villagers Would say that never evil thing approach'd Unpunish'd there. The strange and fearful pleasure Which fill'd me by that solitary spring, Ceased not in riper years; and now it woke Deeper delight, and more mysterious awe.

"A blessed spot ! Oh, how my soul enjoy'd Its holy quietness, with what delight Escaping from mankind 1 hasten'd there To solitude and freedom ! Thitherward On a spring eye I had betaken me, And there I sat, and mark'd the deep red clouds Gather before the wind - the rising wind, Whose sudden gusts, each wilder than the last, Appear'd to rock my senses. Soon the night Darken'd around, and the large rain-drops fell Heavy; anon tempestuously the gale Swept o'er the wood. Methought the thundershower Fell with refreshing coolness on my head, And the hoarse dash of waters, and the rush Of winds that mingled with the forest roar. Made a wild music. On a rock I sat ; The glory of the tempest fill'd my soul; And when the thunders peal'd, and the long flash Hung durable in heaven, and on my sight Spread the gray forest, memory, thought, were All sense of self annihilate, I seem'd [gone,19

"At length a light Approach'd the spring; I saw my Uncle Claude; Ilis gray locks dripping with the midnight storm. He came, and caught me in his arms, and cried, 'My God! my ehild is safe!'

Diffused into the seene.

" I felt his words Pierce in my heart; my soul was overcharged; I fell upon his neck and told him all; Gon was within me; as I felt, I spake, And he believed.

"Ay, Chieftain ! and the world Shall soon believe my mission; for the LORD Will raise up indignation and pour on't His wrath, and they shall perish who oppress." ¹⁹

THE SECOND BOOK.

AND now beneath the horizon westering slow Had sunk the orb of day : o'er all the vale A purple softness spread, save where some tree Its lengthen'd shadow stretch'd, or winding stream Mirror'd the light of Heaven, still traced distinct When twilight dimly shrouded all beside. A grateful coolness freshen'd the calm air, And the hoarse grasshoppers their evening song Sung shrill and ceaseless,²⁰ as the dews of night Descended. On their way the travellers wend, Cheering the road with converse, till at length They mark a cottage lamp, whose steady light Shone though the lattice ; thitherward they turn. There came an old man forth ; his thin gray locks Moved to the breeze, and on his wither'd face The characters of age were written deep. Them, lonting low with rustic courtesy, He welcomed in; on the white-ember'd hearth Heapt up fresh fuel, then with friendly care Spread out his homely board, and fill'd the bowl With the red produce of the vine that arch'd His evening seat; they of the plain repast Partook, and quaff'd the pure and pleasant draught.

"Strangers, your fare is homely," said their Host, "But such it is as we poor countrymen Earn with our toil: in faith ye are welcome to it! I too have borne a lance in younger days; And would that I were young again to meet These haughty English in the field of fight; Such as I was when on the fatal plain Of Agincourt I met them."

"Wert thon then A sharer in that dreadful day's defeat?" Exclaim'd the Bastard. "Didst thou know the Lord Of Orleans?"

"Know him?" cried the veteran, "I saw him ere the bloody fight began Riding from rank to rank, his beaver up, The long lance quivering in his mighty grasp. His eye was wrathful to an enemy, But for his countrymen it had a smile Would win all hearts. Looking at thee, Sir Knight, Methinks I see him now; such was his eye, Gentle in peace, and such his manly brow."

"No tongue but speaketh honor of that name!" Exclaim'd Dunois. "Strangers and countrymen Alike revered the good and gallant Chief. His vassals like a father loved their Lord; His gates stood open to the traveller; The pilgrim when he saw his towers rejoiced, For he had heard in other lands the fame Of Orleans. — And he lives a prisoner still! Losing all hope because my arm so long Hath fail'd to win his liberty!"

He turn'd

His head away, hiding the burning shame Which flush'd his face. "But he shall live, Dunois,"

The mission'd Maid replied; " but he shall live To hear good tidings; hear of liberty, Of his own liberty, by his brother's arm Achieved in well-won battle. He shall live Happy; the memory of his prison'd years²¹ Shall heighten all his joys, and his gray hairs Go to the grave in peace."

"I would fain live To see that day," replied their aged host : "How would my heart leap to behold again The gallant, generous chieftain ! I fought by him, When all our hopes of victory were lost, And down his batter'd arms the blood stream'd fast From many a wound. Like wolves they hemm'd us in,

Fierce in unhoped for conquest: all around Our dead and dying countrymen lay heap'd; Yet still he strove; — I wonder'd at his valor ! There was not one who on that fatal day Fought bravelier.''

"Fatal was that day to France," Exclaim'd the Bastard; "there Alençon fell, Valiant in vain; there D'Albert, whose mad pride Brought the whole ruin on. There fell Brabant, Vaudemont, and Marle, and Bar, and Faquenberg, Our noblest warriors; the determin'd foe Fought for revenge, not hoping victory, Desperately brave; ranks fell on ranks before them;

The prisoners of that shameful day out-summ'd Their conquerors ! '' 22

"Yet believe not," Bertram cried, "That cowardice disgraced thy countrymen ! They, by their leader's arrogance led on With heedless fury, found all numbers vain, All effort fruitless there ; and hadst thou seen, Skilful as brave, how Henry's ready eye Lost not a thicket, not a hillock's aid ; From his hersed bowmen how the arrows flew ²³ Thick as the snow-flakes and with lightning force ; Thou wouldst have known such soldiers, such a chief,

Could never he subdued.

"But when the field Was won, and they who had escaped the fight Had yielded up their arms, it was foul work To turn on the defenceless prisoners The cruel sword of conquest.24 Girt around I to their mercy had surrender'd me, When lo ! I heard the dreadful cry of death. Not as amid the fray, when man met man And in fair combat gave the mortal blow ; Here the poor captives, weaponless and bound, Saw their stern victors draw again the sword, And groan'd and strove in vain to free their hands, And bade them think upon their plighted faith, And pray'd for mercy in the name of God, In vain : the King had bade them massacre, And in their helpless prisoners' naked breasts They drove the weapon. Then I look'd for death, And at that moment death was terrible, -For the heat of fight was over; of my home I thought, and of my wife and little ones In hitterness of heart. But the brave man, To whom the chance of war had made me thrall, Had pity, loosed my hands, and hade me fly It was the will of Heaven that I should live Childless and old to think upon the past, And wish that I had perish'd !"

The old man

Wept as he spake. "Ye may perhaps have heard Of the hard siege that Roan so long endur'd. I dwelt there, strangers: I had then a wife, And I had children tenderly beloved, Who I did hope should cheer me in old age And close mine eyes. The tale of misery

18

Mayhap were tedious, or I could relate Much of that dreadful time.'

The Maid replied, Wishing of that devoted town to hear. Thus then the veteran :

" So by Heaven preserved, From the disastrous plain of Agincourt 23 I speeded homewards, and abode in peace. Henry, as wise as brave, had back to England 26 Led his victorious army ; well aware That France was mighty, that her warlike sons, Impatient of a foreigner's command, Might rise impetuous, and with multitudes Fread down the invaders. Wisely he return'd, For our proud barons in their private broils Wasted the strength of France. I dwelt at home, And with the little I possess'd content, Lived happily. A pleasant sight it was To see my children, as at eve I sat Beneath the vine, come clustering round my knee, That they might hear again the oft-told tale Of the dangers I had past : their little eyes Would with such anxious eagerness attend The tale of life preserved, as made me feel Life's value. My poor children! a hard fate Had they ! But oft and bitterly I wish That God had to his mercy taken me In childhood, for it is a heavy lot To linger out old age in loneliness !

"Ah me! when war the masters of mankind, Woe to the poor man! if he sow his field, He shall not reap the harvest; if he see His offspring rise around, his boding heart Aches at the thought that they are multiplied To the sword! Again from England the fierce foe Came on our rayaged coasts. In battle bold, Merciless in conquest, their victorious King Swept like the desolating tempest round. Dambieres submits; on Caen's subjected wall The flag of England waved. Roan still remain'd. Embattled Roan, bulwark of Normandy; Nor unresisted round her massy walls Pitch'd they their camp. I need not tell, Sir Knight, How oft and boldly on the invading host We burst with fierce assault impetuous forth, For many were the warlike sons of Roan.²⁷ One gallant Citizen was famed o'er all For daring hardihood preëminent, Blanchard. He, gathering round his countrymen, With his own courage kindling every breast, Had made them vow before Almighty God 28 Never to yield them to the usurping foe. Before the God of Hosts we made the vow; And we had baffled the besieging power, Had not the patient enemy drawn round His wide intrenchments. From the watch-tower's top

In vain with fearful hearts along the Seine We strain'd the eye, and every distant wave Which in the sunbeam glitter'd, fondly thought The white sail of supply. Alas! no more The white sail rose upon our aching sight; For guarded was the Seine, and our stern foe Had made a league with Famine.29 How my heart | That I might lose remembrance !

Sunk in me when at night I carried home The scanty pittance of to-morrow's meal ! You know not, strangers, what it is to see The asking eye of hunger !

"Still we strove.

Expecting aid; nor longer force to force, Valor to valor, in the fight opposed, But to the exasperate patience of the foe, Desperate endurance.³⁰ Though with Christian zeal Ursino would have pour'd the balm of peace Into our wounds, Ambition's ear, best pleased With the war's clamor and the groan of death, Was deaf to prayer. Day after day pass'd on; We heard no voice of comfort. From the walls Could we behold their sayage Irish Kerns,³¹ Ruffians half-clothed, half-human, half-baptized,32 Come with their spoil, mingling their hideous shouts

With moan of weary flocks, and piteous low Of kine sore-laden, in the mirthful camp Scattering abundance; while the loathliest food We prized above all price; while in our streets The dying groan of hunger, and the cries Of famishing infants echoed, - and we heard, With the strange selfishness of misery, We heard, and heeded not.

"Thou wouldst have deem'd Roan must have fallen an easy sacrifice, Young warrior ! hadst thou seen our meagre limbs. And pale and shrunken cheeks, and hollow eyes, Yet still we struggled bravely ! Blanchard still Spake of the obdurate temper of the foe, Of Harfleur's wretched people driven out³³ Houseless and destitute, while that stern King Knelt at the altar, and with impious prayer³⁴ Gave God the glory, even while the blood That he had shed was reeking up to Heaven. He bade us think what mercy they had found Who yielded on the plain of Agincourt, And what the gallant sons of Caen, by him In cold blood slaughter'd: 35 then his scanty food Sharing with the most wretched, he would bid us Bear with our miseries manfully.

"Thus press'd,

Lest all should perish thus, our chiefs decreed Women and children, the infirm and old, All who were useless in the work of war, Should forth and take their fortune. Age, that makes

The joys and sorrows of the distant years Like a half-remember'd dream, yet on my heart Leaves deep impress'd the horrors of that hour. Then as our widow-wives clung round our necks, And the deep sob of anguish interrupted The prayer of parting, even the pious priest As he implored his God to strengthen us, And told us we should meet again in Heaven, He groan'd and eurs'd in bitterness of heart³⁶ That merciless King. The wretched crowd pass'd ont

My wife - my children - through the gates they pass'd,

Then the gates closed - Would I were in my grave,

"What is man That he can hear the groan of wretchedness And feel no fleshly pang! Why did the All-Good Create these warrior scourges of mankind, These who delight in slaughter? I did think There was not on this earth a heart so hard Could hear a famish'd woman ask for food, And feel no pity. As the outcast train Drew near, relentless Henry bade his troops Drive back the miserable multitude.³⁷ They drove them to the walls; — it was the depth Of winter, — we had no relief to grant. The aged ones groan'd to our foe in vain, The mother pleaded for her dying child, And they felt no remorse !"

The mission'd Maid Rose from her seat, — "The old and the infirm, The mother and her babes !— and yet no lightning Blasted this man!"

"Aye, Lady," Bertram cried, "And when we sent the herald to implore His mercy ³⁸ on the helpless, his stern face Assum'd a sterner smile of callous scorn, And he replied in mockery. On the wall I stood and watch'd the miscrabie outcasts, And every moment thought that Henry's heart, Hard as it was, would melt. All night I stood,— Their deep groans eame upon the midnight gale; Fainter they grew, for the cold wintry wind Blew bleak; fainter they grew, and at the last All was still, save that ever and anon Some mother raised o'er her expiring child A cry of frenzying anguish.³⁹

"From that hour On all the busy turnoil of the world I look'd with strange indifference; bearing want With the sick patience of a mind worn out. Nor when the traitor yielded up our town⁴⁰ Aught heeded 1 as through our ruin'd streets, Through putrid heaps of famish'd carcasses, The pomp of triumph pass'd. One pang alone I felt, when by that cruel King's command The gallant Blanchard died:⁴¹ calmly he died, And as he bow'd beneath the axe, thank'd God That he had done his duty.

"I survive, A solitary, friendless, wretched one, Knowing no joy save in the certain hope That I shall soon be gather'd to my sires, And soon repose, there where the wicked cease ⁴² From troubling, and the weary are at rest."

"And happy," cried the delegated Maid, "And happy they who in that holy faith Bow meekly to the rod! A little while Shall they endure the proud man's contumely, The injustice of the great: a little while Though shelterless they feel the wintry wind, The wind shall whistle o'er their turf-grown grave, And all be peace below. But woe to those, Woe to the Mighty Ones who send abroad Their ministers of death, and give to Fury The flaming firebrand; these indeed shall live The heroes of the wandering ministrel's song; But they have their reward; the innocent blood Steams up to lleaven against them : God shall hear The widow's groan."

"I saw him," Bertram cried, "Henry of Agincourt, this mighty King, Go to his grave. The long procession pass'd Slowly from town to town, and when I heard The deep-toned dirge, and saw the banners wave A pompous shade,⁴³ and the tall torches cast In the mid-day sun a dim and gloomy light,⁴⁴ I thought what he had been on earth who now Was gone to his account, and blest my God I was not such as he!"

So spake the old man, And then his guests betook them to repose.

THE THIRD BOOK.

FAIR dawn'd the morning, and the early sun Pour'd on the latticed cot a cheerful gleam, And up the travellers rose, and on their way Hasten'd, their dangerous way,⁴⁵ through fertile tracts

Laid waste by war. They pass'd the Auxerrois; The autumnal rains had beaten to the earth ⁴⁶ The unreap'd harvest; from the village church No even-song bell was heard; the shepherd's dog Prey'd on the scatter'd flock, for there was now No hand to feed him, and upon the hearth Where he had slumber'd at his master's feet Weeds grew and reptiles erawl'd. Or if they found Sometimes a welcome, those who welcomed them Were old and helpless creatures, lingering there Where they were born, and where they wish'd to die,

The place being all that they had left to love. They pass'd the Yonne, they pass'd the rapid Loire, Still urging on their way with cautious speed, Shunning Auxerre, and Bar's embattled wall, And Romorantin's towers.

So journeying on, Fast by a spring, which welling at his feet With many a winding crept along the mead, A Knight they saw, who there at his repast Let the west wind play round his ungirt brow. Approaching near, the Bastard recognized That faithfu. friend of Orleans, the brave chief Du Chastel; and their mutual greeting pass'd, They on the streamlet's mossy bank reclined Beside him, and his frugal fare partook, And drank the running waters. "Art thou bound

For the Court, Dunois?" exclaim'd the aged Knight;

"I thought thou hadst been far away, shut up In Orleans, where her valiant sons the siege Right loyally endure !"

"I left the town," Dunois replied, "thinking that my prompt speed Might seize the enemy's stores, and with fresh force Reënter. Fastolffe's better fate prevail'd,⁴⁷ And from the field of shame my maddening horse Bore me, an arrow having piereed his flank.

Worn out and faint with that day's dangerous toil, My deep wounds bleeding, vainly with weak hand I check'd the powerless rein. Nor aught avail'd When heal'd at length, defeated and alone Again to enter Orleans. In Lorraine I sought to raise new powers, and now return'd With strangest and most unexpected aid. Sent by high Heaven, I seek the Court, and thence To that beleaguer'd town shall lead such force, That the proud English in their fields of blood Shall perish."

" I too," Tanneguy reply'd, In the field of battle once again perchance May serve my royal Master; in his cause My youth adventur'd much, nor can my age Find better close than in the clang of arms To die for him whom I have lived to serve.⁴⁸ Thou art for the Court. Son of the Chief I loved ! Be wise by my experience. He who seeks Court-lavor, ventures like a boy who leans Over the brink of some high precipice To reach the o'erhanging fruit.⁴⁹ Thou seest me here

A banish'd man, Dunois ! ⁵⁰ so to appease Richemont, who, jealous of the royal ear, With midnight murder leagues, and down the Loire Sends the black careass of his strangled foe.⁵¹ Now confident of strength, at the King's feet He stabs the King's best friends, and then demands, As with a conqueror's imperious tone, The post of honor. Son of that good Duke Whose death my arm avenged,⁵² may all thy days Be happy; serve thy country in the field, But in the hour of peace anid thy friends Dwell thou without ambition."

So he spake. But when the Bastard told his wondrous tale, How interposing Heaven had its high aid Vouchsafed to France, the old man's eyes flash'd fire,

And rising from the bank, his ready steed That grazed beside he mounted. "Farewell, friend, And thou, the Delegate of Heaven !" he cried. "I go to do my part, and we shall meet At Orleans." Saying thus, he spurr'd away. They journey on their way till Chinon's towers Rose on the distant view; the royal seat Of Charles, while Paris with her servile sons, A headstrong, mutable, ferocious race, Bow'd to the invader's yoke; City even then Above all Cities noted for dire deeds! Yet doom'd to be the scene of blacker guilt, Opprobry more enduring, crimes that call'd For heavier vengeance, than in those dark days When the Burgundian faction fill'd thy streets With carnage.53 Twice hast thou since then been made

A horror and a warning to all lands; When kingly power conspired with papal craft To plot and perpetrate that massacre, Which neither change of kalendar, nor lapse Of time, shall hide from memory, or efface; And when in more enlighten'd days, — so deem'd, So vaunted, — the astonish'd nations saw A people, to their own devices left, Therefore as by judicial frenzy stricken, Lawless and godless, fill the whole wide realm With terror, and with wickedness and woe, — A more astounding judgment than when Heaven Shower'd on the cities of the accursed plain Its fire and sulphur down.

In Paris now The Invader triumph'd. On an infant's head Had Bedford placed the crown of Charlemagne, And factious nobles bow'd the subject knee, And own'd an English infant for their King, False to their own liege Lord.

"Beloved of Heaven," Then said the Son of Orleans to the Maid, " Lo these the walls of Chinon, this the abode Of Charles our monarch. Here in revelry He of his armies vanquish'd, his fair towns Subdued, hears careless and prolongs the dance. And little marvel I that to the cares Of empire still he turns the unwilling ear, For loss on loss, defeat upon defeat, His strong holds taken, and his bravest Chiefs Or slain or captured, and the hopes of youth All blasted, have subdued the royal mind Uudisciplined in Fortitude's stern school. So may thy voice arouse his sleeping virtue!"

The mission'd Maid replied, "Do thou, Dunois, Announce my mission to the royal ear. I on the river's winding bank the while Will roam, collecting for the interview My thoughts, though firm, yet troubled. Who essays Achievements of great import will perforce Feel the heart heave; and in my breast I own Such perturbation."

On the banks of Vienne Devious the Damsel turn'd, while through the gate The Son of Orleans press'd with hasty step To seek the King. Him from the public view He found secluded with his blameless Queen, And his partaker of the unlawful bed, The lofty-minded Agnes.

"Son of Orleans!" So as he enter'd cried the haughty fair, "Thou art well come to witness the disgrace, The weak, unmanly, base despondency Of this thy Sovereign Liege. He will retreat To distant Dauphiny and fly the war! Go then, unworthy of thy rank ! retreat To distant Dauphiny,54 and fly the war, Recreant from battle ! I will not partake A fugitive's fate; when thou hast lost thy erown Thou losest Agnes. - Do'st not blush, Dunois ! To bleed in combat for a Prince like this, Fit only, like the Merovingian race On a May morning deck'd with flowers,55 to mount His gay-bedizen'd car, and ride abroad And make the multitude a holiday. Go, Charles ! and hide thee in a woman s garb, And these long locks will not disgrace thee then ! " 50

- "Nay, Agnes!" Charles replied, "reproach me not!
- I have enough of sorrow. Look around,

See this fair country ravaged by the foe, My strong holds taken, and my bravest friends Fallen in the field, or captives far away. Dead is the Douglas; cold thy gallant heart, Illustrious Buchan! ye from Scotland's hills, Not mindless of your old ally distress'd, Came to his succor; in this cause ye fought; For him ye perish'd. Rash, impetuous Narbonne ! Thy mangled corse waves to the winds of Heaven.57 Cold, Graville, is thy sinewy arm in death; Fallen is Ventadaur; silent in the grave Rambouillet sleeps. Bretagne's unfaithful chief Leagues with my foes; and Richemont,58 or in arms Defies my weak control, or from my side, A friend more dreaded than the enemy, Scares my best servants with the assassin's sword. Soon must beleaguer'd Orleans fall. - But now A truce to these sad thoughts ! We are not yet So utterly despoil'd but we can spread The friendly board, and giving thee, Dunois, Such welcome as befits thy father's son, Win from our public cares a day for joy.

Dunois replied, "So may thy future years Pass from misfortune free, as all these ills Shall vanish like a vision of the night ! I come to thee the joyful messenger Of aid from Heaven; for Heaven hath delegated A humble Maiden to deliver France. That holy Maiden asks an audience now; And when she promises miraculous things, I feel it is not possible to hear And disbelieve."

Astonish'd by his speech Stood Charles. "At one of meaner estimation I should have smiled, Dunois," the King replied; "But thy known worth, and the tried loyalty Of thy father's house, compel me even to this To lend a serious ear. A woman sent To rescue us, when all our strength hath fail'd ! A humble Maiden to deliver France ! One whom it were not possible to hear, And disbelieve !—Dunois, ill now bescems Aught wild and hazardous. And yet our state Being what it is, by miracle alone Deliverance can be hoped for. Is my person Known to this woman?"

"That it cannot be, Unless it be by miracle made known," Dunois replied; " for she hath never left Her native hamlet in Lorraine till now."

" Here then," rejoin'd the King, " we have a test Easy, and safe withal. Abide thon here; And hither by a speedy messenger Summon the Prophetess. Upon the throne Let some one take his seat and personate My presence, while I mingle in the train. If she indeed be by the Spirit moved, That Spirit, certes, will direct her eyes To the true Prince whom she is sent to serve : But if she prove, as likeliest we must deem, One by her own imaginations erazed, Thus failing and convinced, she may return Unblamed to her obscurity, and we Be spared the shame of farther loss incurr'd By credulous faith. Well might the English scoff,⁵⁰ If on a frantic woman we should rest Our last reliance." Thus the King resolved, And with a faith half-faltering at the proof, Dunois despatch'd a messerger, to seek Beside the banks of Vienne, the mission'd Maid.

Soon is the court convened : the jewell'd crown Shines on a courtier's head. Amid the train The Monarch undistinguish'd takes his place, Expectant of the event. The Virgin comes, And as the Bastard led her to the throne, Quick glancing o'er the mimic Majesty, With gesture and with look like one inspired, She fix'd her eye on Charles:⁶⁰ "Thou art the King!"

Then in a tone that thrill'd all hearts, pursued ; " I come the appointed Minister of Heaven, To wield a sword before whose fated edge, Far, far from Orleans shall the English wolves Speed their disastrous flight. Monarch of France ? Send thou the tidings over all the realm, Great tidings of deliverance and of joy ; The Maid is come, the mission'd Maid, whose hand Shall in the consecrated walls of Rheims Crown thee, anointed King."⁶¹

In wonder mute The courtiers heard. Astonish'd Charles exclaim'd, "This is indeed the agency of Heaven ! Hard, Maiden, were I of belief," he said, " Did 1 not now, with full and confirm'd faith, Receive thee as a Prophetess raised up For our deliverance. Therefore, not in doubt Of Providence or thee do I delay At once to marshal our brave countrymen Beneath thy banner; but to satisfy Those who at distance from this most clear proof Might hear and disbelieve, or yield at best A cold assent. These fully to confirm, And more to make thy calling manifest, Forthwith with all due speed f will convene The Doctors of Theology,62 wise men, And learned in the mysteries of Heaven. By them thy mission studied and approved, As needs it must, their sanction to all minds Will bring conviction, and the sure belief Lead on thy favor'd troops to mightiest deeds, Surpassing human possibility."

Well pleas'd the Maiden heard. Her the Kir.g leads

From the disbanding throng, meantime to dwell With Mary. Watchful for her Lord's return She sat with Agnes; Agnes proud of heart, Majestically fair, whose large full eye Or flashing anger, or with scornful scowl Too oft deform'd her beauty. Yet with her The lawless idol of the Monarch's heart, The Queen, obedient to her husband's will, Dwelt meekly in accord. With them the Maid Was left to sojourn; by the gentle Queen With cordial affability received; By Agnes courteously, whose outward show Of graciousness concealed an inward awe,

For while she hoped and trusted through her means Charles should be reëstablish'd in his realm,	Adjure I that foul spirit to depart From his deluded prey."
She felt rebuked before her.	Slowly he spake,
Through the land Meantime the King's convoking voice went forth, And from their palaces and monasteries The theologians came, men who had grown In midnight studies gray; Prelates, and Priests,	And sprinkled water on the virgin's face. Indignant at the unworthy charge, the Maid Felt her check flush; but soon, the transient glov Fading, she answer'd meck. "Most holy Sires,
And Doctors: teachers grave, and with great names,	Ye reverend Fathers of the Christian church, Most catholic ! I stand before you here
Seraphic, Subtile, or Irrefragable,	A poor weak woman; of the grace vonchsafed,
By their admiring scholars dignified.	How far unworthy, conscious ; yet though mean Innocent of fraud, and call'd by Heaven to be
They met convened at Chinon, to the place	Its minister of aid. Strange voices heard,
Of judgment, in St. Katharine's fane assign'd.	The dark and shadowing visions of the night,
The floor with many a monumental stone	And feelings which I may not dare to doubt,
Was spread, and brass-ensculptured effigies Of holy abbots honor'd in their day,	These portents make me certain of the God Within me; He who to these eyes reveal'd
Now to the grave gone down. The branching arms	My royal Master, mingled with the crowd
Of many a ponderous pillar met aloft,	And never seen till then. Such evidence
Wreath'd on the roof emboss'd. Through storied	Given to my mission thus, and thus confirm'd panes	By public attestation, more to say,
Of high arch'd windows came the tinctured light;	Methinks, would little boot, — and less become
Pure water in a font beneath reflects	A silly Maid."
The many-color'd rays ; around that font The fathers stand, and there with rites ordain'd	"Thou speakest," said the Priest "Of dark and shadowing visions of the night.
And signs symbolic strew the hallowing salt,	Canst thou remember, Maid, what vision first
Wherewith the limpid water, consecrate,	Seem'd more than fancy's shaping ? From such
So taught the Church, became a spell approved	tale,
Against the fiends of Satan's fallen erew;	Minutely told with accurate circumstance,
A licit spell of mightier potency	Some judgment might be form'd."
Than e'er the hell-hags taught in Thessaly ; Or they who sitting on the rifled grave,	The Maid replied "Amid the mountain valleys I had driven
By the blue tomb-fire's lurid light dim seen,	My father's flock. The eve was drawing on,
Share with the Gonls their banquet.	When by a sudden storm surprised, I sought
This perform'd,	A chapel's neighboring shelter; ruin'd now,
The Maid is summon'd. Round the sacred font,	But I remember when its vesper bell
Mark'd with the mystic tonsure and enrobed	Was heard among the hills, a pleasant sound,
In sacred vests, a venerable train,	That made me pause upon my homeward road,
They stand. The delegated Maid obeys Their summons. As she came, a blush suffused	Awakening in me comfortable thoughts Of holiness. The unsparing soldiery
Her pallid cheek, such as might well beseem	Had sack'd the hamlet near, and none was left
One mindful still of maiden modesty,	Duly at sacred seasons to attend
Though to her mission true. Before the train	St. Agnes' chapel. ⁶³ In the desolate pile
In reverent silence waiting their sage will,	I drove my flock, with no irreverent thoughts,
With half-averted eye she stood composed.	Nor mindless that the place on which I trod
So have I seen a single snow-drop rise	Was holy ground. It was a fearful night!
Amid the russet leaves that hide the earth In early spring, so seen it gently bend	Devoutly to the virgin Saint I pray'd, Then heap'd the wither'd leaves which autumn
In modest loveliness alone amid	winds
The waste of winter.	Had drifted in, and laid me down upon them,
By the Maiden's side	And sure I think I slept. But so it was
The Son of Orleans stood, prepared to vouch	That, in the dead of night, Saint Agnes stood
That when on Charles the Maiden's eye had fix'd,	Before mine eyes, such and so beantiful
As led by power miraculons, no fraud,	As when, amid the house of wickedness,
Nor juggling artifice of secret sign Dissembled inspiration. As he stood	The Power whom with such fervent love she served Veil'd her with glory. ⁶⁴ And I saw her point
Steadily viewing the mysterious rites,	To the moss-grown altar, and the crucifix

Half hid by weeds and grass ; - and then I thought

I could have wither'd armies with a look, For from the present Saint such divine power I felt infused — 'Twas but a dream perhaps.

And yet methought that when a louder peak

Burst o'er the roof, and all was left again

Utterly dark, the bodily sense was clear

Steadily viewing the mysterious rites, Thus to the attentive Maid the President Severely spake.

"If any fiend of Hell Lurk in thy bosom, so to prompt the vaunt Of inspiration, and to mock the power Of God and holy Church, thus by the virtue Of water hallowed in the name of God

And accurate in every circumstance Of time and place."

Attentive to her words Thus the Priest answer'd:

"Brethren, ye have heard The woman's tale. Behoves us now to ask Whether of holy Church a duteous child Before our court appears, so not unlike Heaven might vouchsafe its gracious miracle; Or misbelieving heretic, whose thoughts, Erring and vain, easily might stray beyond All reason, and conceit strange dreams and signs Impossible. Say, woman, from thy youth Hast thou, as rightly mother Church demands, Confess'd at stated times thy secret sins, And, from the priestly power conferr'd by Heaven, Sought absolution?"

"Father," she replied, "The forms of worship in mine earlier years Waked my young mind to artificial awe, And made me fear my GoD. Warm with the glow Of health and exercise, whene'er 1 pass'd The threshold of the house of prayer, I felt A cold damp chill me; I beheld the tapers That with a pale and feeble glimmering Dimm'd the noon-light; I heard the solemn mass, And with strange feelings and mysterious dread Telling my beads, gave to the mystic prayers Devoutest meaning. Often when I saw The pictured flames writhe round a penanced soul, I knelt in fear before the Crueifix, And wept and pray'd, and trembled, and adored A Gop of Terrors. But in riper years, When as my soul grew strong in solitude, I saw the eternal energy pervade The boundless range of nature, with the sun Pour life and radiance from his flamy path, And on the lowliest floweret of the field The kindly dew-drops shed. And then I felt That HE who form'd this goodly frame of things Must needs be good, and with a FATHER's name l call'd on Him, and from my burden'd heart Pour'd ont the yearnings of unmingled love. Methinks it is not strange then, that I fled The house of prayer, and made the lonely grove My temple, at the foot of some old oak Watching the little tribes that had their world Within its mossy bark ; or laid me down Beside the rivulet whose murmuring Was silence to my soul,65 and mark'd the swarm Whose light-edged shadows on the bedded sand Mirror'd their mazy sports, --- the insect hum, The flow of waters, and the song of birds Making a holy music to mine ear : Oh ! was it strange, if for such scenes as these, Such deep devoutness, such intense delight Of quiet adoration, I forsook The house of worship? strange that when I felt How God had made my spirit quick to feel And love whate'er was beautiful and good, And from aught evil and deform'd to shrink Even as with instinct ; -- father ! was it strange That in my heart I had no thought of sin, And did not need forgiveness?"

The Doctors stood astonish'd, and some while They listen'd still in wonder. But at length A Monk replied,

"Woman, thou seem'st to scorn The ordinances of our hely Church ; And, if I rightly understand thy words, Nature, thou say'st, taught thee in solitude Thy feelings of religion, and that now Masses and absolution and the use Of the holy wafer, are to thee unknown. But how could Nature teach thee true religion, Deprived of these? Nature doth lead to sin, But 'tis the Priest alone can teach remorse, Can bid St. Peter ope the gates of Heaven, And from the penal fires of purgatory Set the soul free. Could Nature teach thee this? Or tell thee that St. Peter holds the keys, And that his successor's unbounded power Extends o'er either world? Although thy life Of sin were free, if of this holy truth Ignorant, thy soul in liquid flames must rue Its error.'

Thus he spake; applauding looks Went round. Nor dubious to reply the Maid Was silent.

"Fathers of the holy Church, If on these points abstruse a simple maid Like me should err, impute not you the crime To self-will'd reason, vaunting its own strength Above eternal wisdom. True it is That for long time I have not heard the sound Of mass high-chanted, nor with trembling lips Partook the holy wafer : yet the birds Who to the matin ray prelusive pour'd Their joyous song, methought did warble forth Sweeter thanksgiving to Religion's ear In their wild melody of happiness, Than ever rung along the high-arch'd roofs Of man : - yet never from the bending vine Pluck'd I its ripen'd clusters thanklessly, Or of that God unmindful, who bestow'd The bloodless banquet. Ye have told me, Sirs, That Nature only teaches man to sin ! If it be sin to seek the wounded lamb, To bind its wounds, and bathe them with my tears, This is what Nature taught ! No, Fathers, no¹ It is not Nature that doth lead to sin : Nature is all benevolence, all love, All beauty! In the greenwood's quiet shade There is no vice that to the indignant cheek Bids the red current rush; no misery there; No wretched mother, who with pallid face And famine-fallen hangs o'er her hungry babes, With such a look, so wan, so woe-begone, As shall one day, with damning eloquence, Against the oppressor plead ! - Nature teach sin ! Oh blasphemy against the Holy One, Who made us in the image of Himself, Who made us all for happiness and love, Infinite happiness, infinite love, Partakers of his own eternity.'

Solenn and slow the reverend Priest replied, "Much, woman, do I doubt that all-wise Heaven Would thus vouchsafe its gracious miracles

As she spake

BOOK IV.

On one foredoom'd to misery ; for so doom'd Is that deluded one, who, of the mass Unheeding, and the Church's saving power, Deems Nature sinless. Therefore, mark me well ! Brethren, I would propose this woman try The holy ordeal. Let her, bound and search'd, Lest haply in her clothes should be conceal'd Some holy relic so profaned, be cast In some deep pond; there if she float, no doubt The fiend upholds; but if at once she sink, It is a sign that Providence displays Her free from witchcraft. This done, let her walk Blindfold and bare o'er ploughshares heated red, And o'er these past, her naked arm immerse In scalding water. If from these she come Unhurt, to holy father of the church, Most blessed Pope, we then refer the cause For judgment : and this Chief, the Son of Orleans, Who comes to vouch the royal person known By her miraculous power, shall pass with her The sacred trial."

"Grace of God!" exclaim'd The astonish'd Bastard; "plunge me in the pool, O'er red-hot ploughshares make me skip to please Your dotard fancies! Fathers of the church, Where is your gravity? what! eider-like Would ye this fairer than Susannah eye? Ye call for ordeals; and I too demand The noblest ordeal, on the English host By victory to approve her mission sent From favoring Heaven. To the Pope refer Forjudgment! Know ye not that France even now Stands tottering on destruction !"

Starting then With a wild look, the mission'd Maid exclaim'd, "The sword of God is here! the grave shall speak To manifest me!"

Even as she spake, A pale blue flame rose from the trophied tomb Beside her; and within that house of death A sound of arms was heard, as if below A warrior, buried in his armor, stirr'd.

" Hear ye !" the Damsel cried; " these are the arms

Which shall flash terror o'er the hostile host. These, in the presence of our Lord the King, And of the assembled people, I will take Here from the sepulchre, where many an age, They, incorruptible, have lain conceal'd, For me reserved, the Delegate of Heaven."

Recovering from anaze, the Priest replied : "Thou art indeed the Delegate of Heaven ! What thou hast said surely thou shalt perform. We ratify thy mission. Go in peace."

THE FOURTH BOOK.

THE feast was spread, the sparkling bowl went round,

And in the assembled court the minstrel harp'd 4 A song of other days. Sudden they heard The horn's loud blast. "This is no time for cares; Feast ye the messenger without!" cried Charles, "Enough hath of the wearying day been given To the public weal."

Obedient to the King The guard invites the way-worn messenger. "Nay, I will see the monarch," he replied, "And he must hear my tidings; duty-nrged, I have for many a long league hasten'd on, Not thus to be repell'd." Then with strong arm Removing him who barr'd his onward way, The hall he enter'd.

"King of France! I come From Orleans, speedy and effectual aid Demanding for her gallant garrison, Faithful to thee, though thinn'd in many a fight, And now sore pressed by want. Rouse thou thyself,

And with the spirit that becomes a King Responsive to his people's loyalty, Bring succor to the brave who in thy cause Abide the extremity of war."

He said, And from the hall departing, in amaze At his audacious bearing left the court. The King exclaim'd, "But little need to send Quick succor to this gallant garrison, If to the English half so firm a front They bear in battle !"

"In the field, my liege," Dunois replied, "yon Knight hath serv'd thee well. Him have I seen the foremost of the fight, Wielding so manfully his battle-axe, That wheresoe'er he turn'd, the affrighted foe Let fall their palsied arms with powerless stroke, Desperate of safety. I do marvel much That he is here: Orleans must be hard press'd To send the bravest of her garrison On such commission."

Swift the Maid exclaim'd, "I tell thee, Chief, that there the English wolves Shall never raise their yells of victory! The will of God defends those fated walls, And resting in full faith on that high will, I mock their efforts. But the night draws on; Retire we to repose. To-morrow's sun, Breaking the darkness of the sepulchre, Shall on that armor gleam, through many an age There for this great emergency reserved." She said, and rising from the board, retired.

Meantime the herald's brazen voice proclaim'd Coming solemnity, and far and wide Spread the glad tidings. Then all labor ceased; The plonghman from the unfinish'd furrow hastes; The armorer's anvil beats no more the din Offuture slaughter. Through the thronging streets The buzz of asking wonder hums along.

On to St. Katharine's sacred fane they go; The holy fathers with the imaged cross Leading the long procession. Next, as one Suppliant for mercy to the King of kings, And grateful for the benefits of Heaven,

The Monareh pass'd, and by his side the Maid; Her lovely limbs robed in a snow-white vest, Wistless that every eye on her was bent, With stately step she moved; her laboring soul To high thoughts elevate; and gazing round With a full eye, that of the circling throng And of the visible world unseeing, seem'd Fix'd upon objects seen by none beside. Near her the warlike Son of Orleans came Preëminent. He, nerving his young frame With exercise robust, had sealed the eliff, And plunging in the river's full-swollen stream, Stemm'd with broad breast its current; so his form, Sinewy and firm, and fit for deeds of arms, Tower'd above the throng effeminate. No dainty bath had from his hardy limbs Effaced the hauberk's honorable marks; 66 His helmet bore of hostile steel the dints Many and deep; upon his pictured shield A Lion vainly struggled in the toils, Whilst by his side the cub with pious rage, Assail'd the huntsman. Tremouille followed them, Proud of the favor of a Prince who seem'd Given up to vain delights; conspicuous he In arms with azure and with gold anneal'd, Gaudily graceful, by no hostile blade Defaced, nor e'er with hostile blood distain'd; Trimly accoutred court-habiliments, Gay lady-dazzling armor, fit to adorn Tourney, or tilt, the gorgeous pageantry Of mimic warfare. After him there eame A train of courtiers, summer flies that sport In the sunbeam of favor, insects spring From the court dunghill, greedy blood-suckers, The foul corruption-gender'd swarm of state.

As o'er some flowery field the busy bees Fill with their happy hum the fragrant air, A grateful music to the traveller, Who in the shade of some wide-spreading tree Rests on his way awhile; or like the sound Of many waters down some far-off steep Holding their endless course, the murmur rose Of admiration. Every gazing eye Dwelt on the Prophetess; of all beside, The long procession and the gorgeous train, Though glittering they with gold and sparkling gemes,

And their rich plumes high waving to the air, Heedless.

The consecrated dome they reach, Rear'd to St. Katharine's holy memory. Her tale the altar told; how Maximin, His raised lip kindled with a savage smile, In such deep fury bade the tenter'd wheel Rend her life piecemeal, that the very face Of the hard executioner relax'd With pity; calm she heard, no drop of blood Forsook her check, her steady eye was turn'd Heaven-ward, and hope and meekest piety Beam'd in that patient look. Nor vain her trust; For lo! the Angel of the Lorn descends, And crumbles with his fiery touch the wheel! One glance of holy triumph Katharine cast, Then bow'd her to the sword of martyrdom.⁶⁷ Her eye averting from the pictured tale, The delegated damsel knelt and pour'd To Heaven her earnest prayer.

A trophied tomb Stood near the altar where some warrior slept The sleep of death beneath. A massy stone And rude-enseulptured effigy o'erlaid The sepulchre. In silent wonderment The expectant multitude with eager eye Gaze, listening as the mattock's heavy stroke Invades the tomb's repose : the heavy stroke Sounds hollow: over the high-vaulted roof Roll the repeated echoes: soon the day Dawns on the grave's long night, the slant sunbeam Falls on the arms inshrined, the crested helm, The bauldrick, and the shield, and sacred sword.69 A sound of awe-repress'd astonishment Rose from the crowd. The delegated Maid Over her robes the hallowed breastplate threw, Self-fitted to her form; on her helm'd head The white plumes nod, majestically slow; She lifts the buckler and the sacred sword, Gleaning portentous light.

The wondering crowd Raise their loud shout of transport. "God of Heaven," The Maid exclaim'd, "Father all merciful! Devoted to whose holy will, I wield The sword of vengeance; go before our host! All-just avenger of the innocent, Be thou our Champion! God of Peace, preserve Those whom no lust of glory leads to arms."

She ceased, and with an eager hush the crowd Still listen'd; a brief while throughout the dome Deep silence dwelt; then with a sudden burst Devout and full, they raised the choral hymn, "Thee LORD we praise, our GOD!" the throng without Catch the strange tidings, join the hymn of joy, And thundering transport peals along the heaven.

As through the parting crowd the Virgin pass'd, He who from Orleans on the yesternight Demanded succor, clasp'd with warmth her hand, And with a bosom-thrilling voice exclaim'd, "Ill-omen'd Maid! victim of thine own worth, Devoted for this king-curst realm of France, Ill-omen'd Maid, I pity thee!" so saying, Ile turn'd into the crowd. At his strange words Disturb'd, the warlike Virgin pass'd along, And much revolving in her troubled mind, Retrod the court.

And now the horn announced The ready banquet; they partock the feast,⁶⁰ Then rose and in the cooling water cleansed Their hands, and seated at the board again Enjoy'd the bowl, or scented high with spice, Or flavor'd with the fragrant summer fruit, Or luscious with metheglin mingled rich.⁷⁰ Meantime the Trouveur struck the harp; he sung Of Lancelot du Lake, the truest Knight That ever loved fair Lady; and the youth Of Cornwall ⁷¹ underneath whose maiden sword The strength of Ireland fell; and he who struck

JOAN OF ARC.

The dolorous stroke,⁷² the blameless and the brave, | And pale and breathless hid her head convulsed In the Maid's bosom. Who died beneath a brother's erring arm. " King of France !" he said, Ye have not perish'd, Chiefs of Carduel ! "She loved me, and by mutual word and will The songs of earlier years embalm your fame . And haply yet some Poet shall arise, We were betroth'd, when, in unhappy hour, Like that divinest Tuscan,73 and enwreathe I left her, as in fealty bound, to fight The immortal garland for himself and you. Thy battles. In mine absence thou didst come To tempt her then unspotted purity -The harp still rung beneath the high-arch'd roof, For pure she was. - Alas! these courtly robes And listening eager to the favorite lay, Hide not the indelible stain of infamy ! The guests sat silent, when into the hall Thou canst not with thy golden belt put on An honorable name,⁷⁴ O lost to me, The Messenger from that besieged town, Reënter'd. " It is pleasant, King of France," And to thyself, forever, ever lost, Said he, " to sit and hear the harper's song : My poor polluted Agnes! - Charles, that faith Almost is shaken, which should be henceforth Far other music hear the men of Orleans ! My only hope: thou hast thy wicked will, Famine is there : and there the imploring cry Of Hunger ceases not." While I the victim of her guilt and thine, Though meriting alike from her and thee "Insolent man!" Exclaim'd the Monarch, "cease to interrupt Far other guerdon, bear about with me Our hour of festival; it is not thine A wound for which this earth affords no balm, And doubt Heaven's justice.' To instruct me in my duty." Of reproof

Careless, the stranger to the minstrel cried, "Why harpest thou of good King Arthur's fame Amid these walls? Virtue and genins love That lofty lay. Hast thou no loose, lewd tale To pamper and provoke the appetite? Such should procure thee worthy recompense ! Or rather sing thou of that wealthy Lord, Who took the ewe lamb from the poor man's bosom, That was to him even as a daughter ! Charles, This parable would 1 tell, prophet-like, And look at thee and say, 'Thou art the man !."

He said, and with a quick and troubled step Withdrew. Astonish'd at his daring gnise, The guests sat heedless of the lay awhile, Pondering his words mysterious, till at length The Court dispersed. Retiring from the hall, Charles and the delegated damsel sought The inner palace. There the gentle Queen Awaited them : with her Joan lov'd to pass Her intervals of rest; for she had won The Virgin's heart by her mild melancholy, The calm and dutcous patience that deplored A husband's cold half-love. To her she told With what strange words the messenger from Orleans

Had roused uneasy wonder in her mind; For on her ear yet vibrated his voice, When lo! again he eame, and at the door Stood scowling round.

"Why dost thou haunt me thus," The monarch cried; "is there no place secure From thy rude insolence? unmanner'd man! I know thee not!"

"Then learn to know me, Charles!" Solemnly he replied; "read well my face, That thon may'st know it on that dreadful day, When at the Throne of God I shall demand His justice on thee!" Turning from the King, To Agnes as she entered, in a tone More low, more mournfully severe, he eried, "Dost thou too know me not!"

So he said, and frown'd Austere as he who at Mahommed's door Knock'd lond and frequent, at whose dreadful mien Stricken with terror, all beholders fled. Even the prophet, almost terrified, Scarcely could bear his presence; for he knew That this was the Death-Angel AZRAEL, And that his hour was come. Conscious of guilt The Monarch sate, nor could endure to face His bosom-probing frown. The Maid of Arc Meantime had read his features, and she cried "I know thee, Conrade !" Rising from her seat, She took his hand, for he stood motionless, Gazing on Agnes now with steady eye, Severe though calm : him from the Court she drew, And to the river side, resisting not, Both sad and silent, led; till at the last As from a dream awaking, Conrade look'd Full on the Maid, and falling on her neck, He wept.

"I know thee, Damsel!" he exclaim'd "Dost thou remember that tempestuous night, When J, a weather-beaten traveller, sought Your hospitable door? Ah me! I then Was happy! You too sojonrn'd then in peace. Fool that I was! I blamed such happiness, Arraign'd it as a guilty, selfish sloth, Unhappily prevailing, so I fear me, Or why art thou at Chinon?"

Him the Maid

So as he said,

Answering, address'd: "I do remember well, That night; for then the holy Spirit first, Waked by thy words, possess'd me."

Conrade cried, "Poor Maiden, thou wert happy! thou hadst lived Blessing and blest, if I had never stray'd, Needlessly rigid, from my peaceful path. And thou hast left thine home then, and obey'd The feverish fancies of an ardent brain ! And hast thou left him too, the youth whose eye Forever glancing on thee, spake so well Affection's eloquent tale?"

She glanced on him, Rush'd the warm purple to the Virgin's cheek

JOAN OF ARC.

воок іу

"1 am alone," she answered, "for this realm	Was as a pilgrim ⁷⁸ — Conrade ! rouse thyself !
Devoted." Nor to answer more the Maid	Cast the weak nature off! 79 A time like this
Endured, for many a melancholy thought	Is not for gentler feelings, for the glow
Throng'd on her aching memory. Her mind seye
Beheld Domremi and the fields of Are:	There is oppression in thy country, Conrace !
Her burden'd heart was full; such grief she felt,	There is a eause, a holy cause, that needs
Yet such sweet solaeing of self-applause,	The brave man's aid. Live for it, and enjoy
As cheers a banish'd Patriot's lonely hours	Earth's noblest recompense, thine own esteem;
When Faney pictures to him all he loved,	Or die in that good cause, and thy reward
'Till the big tear-drop rushes o'er its orb,	Shall sure be found in Heaven."
And drowns the soft enchantment.	He answer'd not.
With a look	But pressing to his heart the virgin's hand,
That spake solicitous wonder, Conrade eyed	Hasten'd across the plain. She with dim eyes
The silent Maid; nor would the Maid repress	For gushing tears obscured them — follow'd him and the second sec
The thoughts that swell'd within her, or from him	Till lost in distance. With a weight of thought
Hide her soul's workings. "'Twas on the last day	Opprest, along the poplar-planted Vienne
Before I left Domremi; eve had closed;	Awhile she wander'd, then upon the bank
I sat beside the brook; my soul was full,	She laid her down, and watch'd the tranquil stream
As if inebriate with Divinity.	Flow with a quiet murmuring, by the clouds
Then, Conrade! I beheld a ruffian herd	Of evening purpled. The perpetual flow,
Circle a flaming pile, where at the stake	The ceaseless murmuring, hull'd her to such dreams
A woman stood; the iron bruised her breast,	As memory in her melancholy mood
And round her limbs, half-garmented, the fire	Loves best. The wonted scenes of Arc arose;
Curl'd its fierce flakes. I saw her countenance,	She saw the forest brook, the weed that waved
I knew Myself." ⁷⁵ Then, in a tone subdued	Its long green tresses in the stream, the crag
Of calmness, "There are moments when the soul	Which overbrow'd the spring, and that old yew
From her own impulse with strange dread recoils,	Which through the bare and rifted rock had forced
Suspicious of herself; but with a full,	Its twisted trunk, the berries cheerful red
And perfect faith I know this vision sent	Starring its gloomy green. Her pleasant home
From Heaven, and feel of its unerring truth,	She saw, and those who made that home so dear,
As that God liveth, that I live myself,	Her lov'd lost friends. The mingled feelings fill'd
The feeling that deceives not."	Her eyes, when from behind a voice was heard -
By the hand	"O Lady ! canst thou tell me where to find
Her Conrade held and cried, " Ill-fated Maid,	The Maid whom Heaven hath sent to rescue
That I have torn thee from affection's breast,	France? "
My soul will groan in anguish. Thou wilt serve,	Thrill'd by the well-known tones, she started up,
Like me, the worthless Court, and having served,	And fell upon the neck of Theodore.
In the hour of ill abandon'd, thou wilt curse
The duty that deluded. Of the world	"Have I then found thee!" cried the impas-
Fatigued, and loathing at my fellow-men,	sioned youth;
I shall be seen no more. There is a path ⁷⁶ —	" Henceforth we part no more; but where thou
The eagle hath not mark'd it, the young wolf	goest
Knows not its hidden windings : I have trod	Thither go I. Beloved! in the front
That path, and found a melancholy den,	Of battle thou shalt find me at thy side ;
Fit place for penitence and hopeless woe,	And in the breach this breast shall be thy shield
Where sepulchred, the ghost of what he was,	And rampart. Oh, ungenerous! Why from me
Conrade may pass his few and evil days,	Conceal the inspiration ? why from me
Waiting the wish'd-for summons to lay down	Hide thy miraculous purpose? Am 1 then
His weary load of life."	So all-unworthy that thou shouldst set forth
But then the Maid	Beneath another's guidance ?"
	Thus he cried,
Fix'd on the warrior her reproving eye;
"I pass'd the fertile Auxerrois," she said;	Mingling reproach with tenderness, yet still
"The vines had spread their interwoven shoots	Clasping in warm embrace the maid beloved.
Over the unpruned vineyards, and the grape	She of her bidding and futurity
Rotted beneath the leaves; for there was none	Awhile forgetful, patient of the embrace,
To tread the vintage, and the birds of Heaven	With silent tears of joy bedew'd his neck.
Had had their fill. I saw the eattle start	At length, "I hope," she cried, "thou art not come
As that due hoar the loud normalis holl 77	With heavier fault and breach of nearer tie!
	How did thy mother spare thee, — thou alone
And with a pitcous moaning vainly seek
And with a piteous moaning vainly seek	The stay and comfort of her widowed age?
And with a pitcous moaning vainly seek To fly the coming slaughterers. I look'd back	The stay and comfort of her widowed age? Did she upon thy parting steps bestow
As they did hear the loud alarum-bell, ⁷⁷ And with a pitcous moaning vainly seek To fly the coming shaughterers. I look'd back Upon the cottage where 1 had partaken The peasant's meal,—and saw it wrapt in flames.	Did she upon thy parting steps bestow Her free-will blessing? or hast thou set forth,
And with a piteous moaning vainly seek To fly the coming slaughterers. I look'd back Upon the cottage where 1 had partaken	Did she upon thy parting steps bestow
And with a piteous moaning vainly seek To fly the coming slaughterers. I look'd back Upon the cottage where 1 had partaken The peasant's meal, — and saw it wrapt in flames.	Did she upon thy parting steps bestow Her free-will blessing? or hast thou set forth,
And with a piteous moaning vainly seek To fly the coming slaughterers. I look'd back Upon the cottage where 1 had partaken The peasant's meal, — and saw it wrapt in flames. And then I thank'd my God that 1 had burst	Did she upon thy parting steps bestow Her free-will blessing? or hast thou set forth,

BOOK V.

Yet conscious of his unrepented fault, With countenance flush'd, and faltering in reply: "She wept at my departure; she would fain Have turned me from my purpose, and my heart Perhaps had fail'd me, if it had not glow'd With ardor like thine own; the sacred fire With which thy bosom burns had kindled me; High in prophetic hope, I hade her place Her trust in Heaven; I bade her look to hear Good tidings soon of glorious victory; I told her I should soon return, — return With thee, and thou wouldst be to her old age What Madelon had been."

As thus he spake, Warm with the imaginary bliss, he clasp'd The dear one closer to his yearning heart. But the devoted Virgin in his arms Started and shudder'd, for the flaming pile Flashed on remembrance now, and on her soul The whole terrific vision rose again. A death-like paleness at the dreadful thought Wither'd her cheek; cold damps suffused her brow. And falling on the neck of Theodore, Feeble and faint she hung. His eager eye Concentring all the anguish of the soul, And strain'd in anxious love, gazed fearfully With wondering anguish; till ennobling thoughts Of her high mission roused her, and her soul Collected, and she spake.

"My Theodore, Thou hast done ill to quit thy mother's home ! Alone and aged she will weep for thee, Wasting her little that is left of life In anguish. Now go back again to Arc, And cheer her wintry hours of widowhood, And love my memory there. '

Swift he exclaim'd, "Nay, Maid! the pang of parting is o'erpast, And my dear mother looks for the glad hour When we shall both return. Amid the war How many an arm will seek thy single life, How many a sword and spear! I will go with thee And spread the guardian shield "

" Nay," she replied, "I shall not need thy succor in the war. Me, Heaven, if so seem good to its high will, Will save. I shall be happier, Theodore, Thinking that thou dost sojourn safe at home, And make thy mother happy."

The youth's check A rapid blush disorder'd. "Oh! the court Is pleasant then, and thou wouldst fain forget A humble villager, who only boasts The treasure of the heart!"

She look'd at him With a reproaching eye of tenderness: "Injurious man! devoted for this realm, I go a willing victim. The dark veil Hath been withdrawn for me, and I have seen The fearful features of Futurity. Yes, Theodore, I shall redeem my country, Abandoning for it the joys of life, Yea, life itself!" Then on his neck she fell, And with a faltering voice, "Return to Arc' I do not tell thee there are other maids As fair; for thou wilt love my memory, Hallowing to me the temple of thy heart. Worthy a happier, not a better love,⁸⁰ My Theodore!"—Then, pressing his pale lips, A last and holy kiss the virgin fix'd, And fled across the plain.

She reach'd the court Breathless. The mingled movements of her mind Shook every fibre. Sad and sick at heart, Fain to her lonely chamber's solitude The Maiden had retired; but her the King Met on the threshold. He of the late scene Forgetful and his crime, as cheerful seem'd As though there had not been a God in Heaven! "Enter the hall," he said, "the maskers there Join in the dance. Why, Maiden, art thou sad? Has that rude madman shook thy gentle frame With his strange speeches?"

Ere the Maid replied, The Son of Orleans came with joyful speed, Poising his massy javelin. "Thou hast roused The sleeping virtue of the sons of France; They crowd around the standard," eried the chief. "Our brethren, pent in Orleans, every moment Gaze from the watch-tower with the sickening eye Of expectation."

Then the King exclaim'd, "O chosen by Heaven! defer one day thy march, That humbled at the altar we may join The general prayer. Be these our holy rites To-morrow's task; — to-night for merriment!"

The Maid replied, "The wretched ones in Orleans,

In fear and hunger and expiring hope, Await my succor, and my prayers would plead In Heaven against me, did they waste one hour When active duty calls. For this night's mirth Hold me excused; in truth I am not fit For merriment; a heavy charge is on me, And I must put away all mortal thoughts."⁸¹ Her heart was full, and pausing, she repress'd The unbidden anguish. "Lo! they crowd around The standard! Thou, Dunois, the chosen troops Marshal in speed, for early with the dawn We march to rescue Orleans from the foe."

THE FIFTH BOOK.

SCARCE had the early dawn from Chinon's towers Made visible the mist that curl'd along The river's winding way, when from her couch The martial Maid arose. She mail'd her limbs; The white plumes nodded o'er her helmed heac She girt the sacred falchion by her side, And, like a youth who from his mother's arms, For his first field impatient, breaks away, Poising the lance went forth.

Twelve hundred men, Rearing in order'd ranks their glittering spears, Await her coming. Terrible in arms Before them tower'd Dunois, his manly face

O'ershadow'd by the helmet's iron cheeks.	Wilt his beloved to the youth restore;
The assembled court gazed on the marshall'd train,	And trust me, Maid ! the miserable feel
And at the gate the aged prelate stood	When they on others bestow happiness,
To pour his blessing on the chosen host.	Their happiest consolation."
And now a soft and solemn symphony	She replied,
Was heard, and chanting high the hallow'd hymn,	Pressing the damsel's hand, in the mild tone
From the near convent came the vestal maids.	Of equal friendship, solacing her cares.
A holy banner, woven by virgin hands,	"Soon shall we enter Orleans," said the Maid;
Snow-white they bore. A mingled sentiment	A few hours in her dream of victory
Of awe and eager ardor for the fight,	England shall triumph, then to be awaked
Thrill'd through the army, as the reverend man	By the loud thunder of Almighty wrath !
Took the white standard, and with heaven-ward eye	Irksome meantime the busy camp to me
Call'd on the God of Justice, blessing it.	A solitary woman. Isabel,
The Maid, her brows in reverence unhelm'd,	Wert thou the while companion of my tent,
Her dark hair floating on the morning gale,	Lightlier the time would pass. Return with me ;
Knelt to his prayer, and stretching forth her hand	I may not long be absent."
Received the mystic banner. From the host	So she spake.
A loud and universal shout burst forth,	The wanderer in half-utter'd words express'd
As rising from the ground, upon her brow	Grateful assent. "Art thou astonish'd, then,
She placed the plumed casque, and waved on high	That one though powerful is benevolent?
The banner'd lilies. On their way they march, And dim in distance, soon the towers of Chinon Fade from the eye reverted. The sixth sun, Rureling the shu with his dilated light	In truth thou well mayst wonder!" Conrade cried. "But little cause to love the mighty ones Hath the low cottager; for with its shade
Purpling the sky with his dilated light,	Too oft doth PowEn, a death-dew-dropping tree,
Sunk westering; when embosoni'd in the depth	Blast every herb beneath its baleful boughs !
Of that old forest, which for many a league	Tell thou thy sufferings, Isabel ! Relate
Shadow'd the hills and vales of Orleannois,	How war'd the chieftains, and the people died.
They pitch their tents. The hum of occupation	The mission'd Virgin hath not heard thy woes ;
Sounds ceaseless. Waving to the evening gale	And pleasant to mine ear the twice-told tale
The streamers flutter; and ascending slow	Of sorrow."
Beneath the foliage of the forest trees,	Gazing on the martial Maid
With many a light hue tinged, the curling smoke	She read her wish, and spake. "A wanderer now,
Melts in the impurpled air. Leaving her tent,	Friendless and hopeless, still I love to think
The martial Maiden wander'd through the wood;	Upon my native home, and call to mind
There, by a streamlet, on the mossy bank	Each haunt of careless youth; the woodbined wall,
Reclined, she saw a damsel, her long locks	The jessamine that round the straw-roof'd cot
With willow wreathed; upon her lap there lay A dark-hair'd man, listening the while she sung Sad ditties, and enwreathed to bind his brow The melancholy garland. At the sound	Its fragrant branches wreathed, beneath whose shade1 wont to sit and watch the setting sun,And hear the thrush's song. Nor far remote,
Of one in arms approaching, she had fled;	As o'er the subject landscape round I gazed,
But Conrade, looking upward, recognized	The towers of Yenville rose upon the view.
The Maid of Arc. "Nay, fear not, Isabel,"	A foreign master holds my father's home !
Said he, "for this is one of gentle kind,	I, far away, remember the past years,
Whom even the wretched need not fear to love." So saying, he arose and took her hand, And press'd it to his bosom. "My weak heart,	And weep. "Two brethren form'd our family ; Humble we were, and happy ; honest toil Procured our homely sustenance ; our herds
Though school'd by wrongs to loath at human kind,	Duly at morn and evening to my hand
Will beat, rebellious to its own resolves.	Gave their full stores; the vineyard we had rear'd
Come hither, outcast one ! and call her friend,	Purpled its clusters in the southern sun,
And she will be thy friend more readily	And, plenteous produce of my father's toil,
Because thou art unhappy."	The yellow harvest billow'd o'er the plain.
Isabel	How cheerfully around the blazing hearth,
Saw a tear starting in the virgin's eye,	When all the labor of the day was done,
And glancing npon Conrade, she too wept,	We past the evening hours; for they would sing
Wailing his wilder'd senses.	Or merry roundelay, or ditty sad
"Mission'd Maid !"	Of maid forsaken and the willow weed,
The warrior cried, "be happy ! for thy power	Or of the doughty Paladins of France
Can make this sufferer so. From Orleans driven,	Some warlike fit, the while my spinning-wheel
Orphan'd by war, and of her only friend	A fitting music made.
Bereft, I found her wandering in the wilds,	"Thus long we lived,
Worn out with want and wretchedness. Thou,	And happy. To a neighboring youth my hand,
Joan,	In holy wedlock soon to be consign'd,

Was plighted : my poor Francis!" Here she paused, O And here she wept awhile.

"We did not think The desolating stream of war would reach To us; but soon as with the whirlwind's speed Ruin rush'd round us.⁸² Mehun, Clery, fell, The banner'd Leopard waved on Gergeau's wall; Baugenci yielded; soon the foe approach'd The towers of Yenville.

"Fatal was the hour To me and mine : for from the wall, alas ! The rusty sword was taken, and the shield Which long had moulder'd on the mouldering nail, To meet the war repair'd. No more was heard The ballad, or the merry roundelay; The clattering hammer's clank, the grating file Harsh sounded through the day a dismal din; I never shall forget their mournful sound !

"My father stood encircling his old limbs In long-forgotten arms. 'Come, boys,' he cried; 'I did not think that this gray head again Should bear the helmet's weight; but in the field Better to bravely die a soldier's death, Than here be tamely butcher'd. Isabel, Go to the abbey! if we should survive, We soon shall meet again; if not, my child, There is a better world!'

In broken words, Lifting his eyes to Heaven, my father breathed His blessing on me. As they went away, My brethren gazed on me, and wrung my hand In silence, for they loved their sister well. From the near cottage Francis join'd the troop. Then did 1 look on our forsaken home, And almost sob my very soul away; For all my hopes of happiness were fled, Even like a dream !"

"Perish these mighty ones," Cried Conrade, "these who let destruction loose, Who walk elated o'er their fields of fame, And count the thousands that lie slaughter'd there, And with the bodies of the innocent, rear Their pyramid of glory ! perish these, The epitome of all the pestilent plagues That Egypt knew ! who send their locust swarms O'er ravaged realms, and bid the brooks run blood. Fear and Destruction go before their path, And Famine dogs their footsteps. God of Justice, Let not the innocent blood ery out in vain !"

Thus while he spake, the murmur of the camp Rose on their ear; first like the distant sound When the full-foliaged forest to the storm Shakes its hoarse head; anon with louder din; And through the opening glade gleam'd many a fire. The Virgin's tent they enter'd; there the board Was spread, the wanderer of the fare partook, Then thus her tale renew'd: ---

"Slow o'er the hill Whose rising head conceal'd our cot I past, Yet on my journey paused awhile, and gazed And wept; for often had I cross'd the hill With cheerful step, and seen the rising smoke Of hospitable fire; alas! no smoke

Curl'd o'er its melancholy chinneys now ! Orleans I reach'd. There in the suburbs stood The abbey; and ere long I learnt the fall Of Yenville.

"On a day, a soldier ask'd For Isabel. Searce could my faltering feet Support me. It was Francis, and alone — The sole survivor of that company !

"And soon the foes approach'd: impending war Soon sadden'd Orleans.⁸³ There the bravest chiefs Assembled: Thouars, Coarase, Chabannes, And the Sire Chapelle,⁸⁴ in successful war Since wounded to the death; and that good Knight Giresme of Rhodes, who in a better cause Can never wield the erucifix that hilts His hallowed sword; ⁸⁵ and Xaintrailles ransom'd now,

And Fayette late released, and that young Duke ⁵⁶ Who at Verneuil senseless with many a wound Fell prisoner, and La Ilire, the merriest man ⁵⁷ That ever yet did win his soldiers' love ; And over all for hardihood renown'd The Bastard Orleans.

"These within the town Expect the foe. Twelve hundred chosen men, Well tried in war, uprear the guardian shield Beneath their banners. Dreadful was the sight Of preparation. The wide suburbs stretch'd Along the pleasant borders of the Loire, Late throng'd with multitudes, now feel the hand Of ruin. These preventive care destroys, Lest England, shelter'd by the friendly walls, Securely should approach. The monasteries Fell in the general waste. The holy monks Unwillingly their long-accustom'd haunts Abandon, haunts where every gloomy nook Call'd to awaken'd memory some trace Of vision seen, or sound miraculous. Trembling and terrified, their noiseless cells, For the rude uproar of a world unknown, The nuns desert : their abbess, more composed, Collects her maids around, and tells her beads, And pours the timid prayer of piety. The pioneers, by day and night employ'd, Throw up the violated earth, to impede The foe : the hollow chambers of the dead Echo'd beneath their stroke. The brazen tomb Which late recorded death, in the furnace cast Is made to inflict it now. Sad sight it was To see so wide a waste; the aged ones Hanging their heads, and weeping as they went O'er the fallen dwellings of their happier years ; The stern and sullen silence of the men Musing on vengeance : and but ill represt, The mother's fears as to her breast she clasp'd Her ill-doom'd infant. Soon the suburbs lay One ample ruin; ⁸⁸ whence the stones were borne Within the town to serve in its defence.

"And now without the walls the desolate space Appear'd, a rough and melancholy waste, With uptorn pavements and foundations deep Of many a ruin'd dwelling. Nor within Less dreary was the scene; at evening hour

No more the merry viol's note was heard; ⁸⁹ No more the aged matron at her door Humm'd cheery to her spinning-wheel, and saw Her children dancing to the roundelay. The chieftains strengthening still the ancient walls, Survey them every where with prying eye; The eager youth, in anxious preparation, Practise the arts of war; silent and stern, With the hurrying restlessness of fear, they urge Their gloomy labors. In the city dwelt An utter silence of all pleasant sounds; But all day long the armore's beat was heard, And all night long it echoed.

"Soon the foe Led to our walls the siege : as on they move The clarions clangor, and the cheerful fife, Accordant to the thundering drum's deep sound, Direct their measured march. Before the ranks Salisbury was seen, Salisbury, so long the scourge Of France; and Talbot towered by his side, Talbot, at whose dread name the froward child Clings mute and trembling to his nurse's breast. Suffolk was there, and Hungerford, and Scales, And Fastolffe, victor in the frequent fight. Dark as the autumnal storm they roll'd along, A countless host! From the high tower I mark'd The dreadful scene; I saw the iron gleam Of javelins sparkling to the noontide sun, Their banners tossing to the troubled gale, And - fearful music - heard upon the wind The modulated step of multitudes.

" There in the midst, shuddering with fear, I saw The dreadful stores of death; tremendous roll'd Over rough roads the harsh wheels; the brazen tubes Flash'd in the sun their fearful splendor far, And, last, the loaded wagons creak'd along.

"Nor were our chieftains, whilst their care procured

Human defence, neglectful to implore
That heavenly aid, deprived of which the strength
Of man is weakness. Bearing through our streets
The precious relics of the holy dead,
The monks and nuns pour'd 'many an earnest prayer,
Devoutly join'd by all. Saint Aignan's shrine
Was throng'd by supplicants, the general voice
Call'd on Saint Aignan's name ⁹⁰ again to save
His people, as of yore, before he past

Into the fulness of eternal rest;

When by the Spirit to the lingering camp Of Ætius borne, he brought the timely aid, And Attila, with all his multitudes, Far off retreated to their field of shame."

And now Dunois — for he had seen the camp Well-order'd — enter'd. "One night more in peace England shall rest," he cried, "ere yet the storm Burst on her guilty head! then their proud vaunts Forgotten, or remember'd to their shame, Vainly her chiefs shall curse the hour when first They pitch'd their tents round Orleans."

" Of that siege," The Maid of Arc replied, "gladly I hear The detail. Isabel, proceed! for soon Destined to rescue this devoted town, The tale of all the ills she hath endured I listen, sorrowing for the past, and feel Joy and contentment in the merciful task For which I am sent forth."

Thus spake the maid. And Isabel pursued. "And now more near The hostile host advancing pitch their tents. Unnumber'd streamers wave, and clamorous shouts, Anticipating conquest, rend the air With universal uproar. From their camp A herald came; his garb emblazon'd o'er With leopards and the lilies of our realm — Foul shame to France ! The summons of the foe He brought."

The Bastard interrupting cried, " I was with Gaucour and the assembled chiefs, When by his office privileged and proud That herald spake, as certain of success As he had made a league with Victory. 'Nobles of France rebellious ! from the chief Of yon victorious host, the mighty Earl Of Salisbury, now there in place of him Your Regent John of Bedford : in his name I come, and in our sovereign Lord the King's, Henry. Ye know full well our master's claim, Incontrovertible to this good realm, By right descent, and solemnly confirm'd By your great monarch and our mighty king Fifth Henry, in the treaty ratified At Troyes,⁹¹ wherein your monarch did disclaim All future right and title to this crown, His own exempted, for his son and heirs Down to the end of time. This sign'd and seal'd At the holy altar, and by nuptial knot Of Henry and your princess, gives the realm, Charles dead and Henry, to his infant son Henry of Windsor. Who then dares oppose My master's title, in the face of God, Of wilful perjury, most atrocious crime, Stands guilty, and of flat rebellion 'gainst The Lord's anointed. He, at Paris crown'd With loud acclaim of duteous multitudes, Thus speaks by me. Deliver up your town To Salisbury, and yield yourselves and arms, So shall your lives be safe : and such his grace, If of your free accord to him you pay Due homage as your sovereign Lord and King, Your rich estates, your houses shall be safe, And you in favor stand, as is the Duke, Philip of Burgundy. But - mark me well ! If, obstinately wilful, you persist To scorn his proffer'd mercy, not one stone Upon another of this wretched town Shall then be left; and when the English host Triumphant in the dust have trod the towers Of Orleans, who survive the dreadful war Shall die like traitors by the hangman's hand. Ye men of France, remember Caen and Roan !'

"He ceased : nor Gaucour for a moment paused To form reply.

"'Herald! to all thy vaunts Of English sovereignty let this suffice

For answer : France will only own as King	Allow'd the dews of night free passage there ;
Her own legitimate Lord. On Charles's brow,	And ever and anon the ponderous stone,
Transmitted through a long and good descent,
	Ruining where 'er it fell, with hideous erash
The crown remains. We know no homage due	Came like an earthquake, ⁹⁵ startling from his sleep
To English robbers, and disclaim the peace	The affrighted soldier. From the brazen slings
Inglorious made at Troyes by factious men	The wild-fire balls hiss'd through the midnight
Hostile to France. Thy master's proffer'd grace	sky; ⁹⁶
Meets the contempt it merits. Ilerald, yes,	And often their huge engines cast among us
Be sure we shall remember Caen and Roan!	The dead and loathsome cattle of their eamp,
Go tell the mighty Earl of Salisbury,	As though our enemies, to their deadly league
That as like Blanchard, Gaucour dares his power,
	Forcing the common air, would make us breathe
Like Blanchard, he can brave his eruelty,	Poisonous pollution. ⁹⁷ Through the streets were
And triumph by enduring. Speak I well,	seen
Ye men of Orleans?'	The frequent fire, and heaps of dead, in haste
"Never did 1 hear	Piled up and streaming to infected Heaven.
A shout so universal as ensued	For ever the incessant storm of death
Of approbation. The assembled host	Pours down, and crowded in unwholesome vaults 🕿
As with one voice pour'd forth their loyalty,
	The wretched females hide, not idle there,
And struck their sounding shields; and walls and	Wasting the hours in tears, but all employ'd,
towers	Or to provide the hungry soldier's meal,
Echoed the loud uproar. The herald went.	Or tear their garments to bind up his wounds :
The work of war began."	A sad equality of wretchedness !
"A fearful scene,"
Cried Isabel. " The iron storm of death	" Now came the worst of ills, for Famine came
Clash'd in the sky ; the mighty engines hurl'd	The provident hand deals out its seanty dole,
Huge stones, which shook the ground where er	Yielding so little a supply to life they fell.
	As but protracted death. The loathliest food
Then was there heard at once the clang of arms,	Hunted with eager eye and dainty deem'd,
The thundering cannons, and the soldier's shout,	The dog is slain, that at his master's feet
The female's shriek, the affrighted infant's cry,	Howling with hunger lay; with jealous fear,
The groan of death, - discord of dreadful sounds	Hating a rival's look, the husband hides
That jarr'd the soul.	His miserable meal; the famish'd babe

With deep-dug moats and bridges drawn aloft,	Thinking of you amid the waste of war,
Where over the strong gate suspended hung	I could in bitterness have cursed the great
The dread portcullis. Thence the gunner's eye	Who made me what I was, a helpless one,

The women and the infirm must from the town Go forth and seek their fate.

" I will not now Reeall the moment, when on my poor Francis With a long look I hung. At dead of night, Made mute by fear, we mount the secret hark, And glide adown the stream with silent oars: Thus thrown upon the mercy of mankind, I wandered reckless where, till wearied out, And cold at heart, I laid me down to die; So by this warrior found. Him I had known And loved, for all loved Conrade who had known him;

Nor did I feel so pressing the hard hand Of want in Orleans, ere he parted thence On perilous envoy. For of his small fare —"

"Of this enough," said Conrade. "Holy Maid! One duty yet awaits me to perform. Orleans her envoy sent me, to demand Aid from her idle sovereign. Willingly Did I achieve the hazardous enterprise, For rumor had already made me fear The ill that hath fallen on me. It remains, Ere I do banish me from human kind, That I reënter Orleans, and announce Thy march. 'Tis night, and hark! how dead a silence!

Fit hour to tread so perilous a path ! "

So saying, Conrade from the tent went forth.

THE SIXTH BOOK.

THE night was ealm, and many a moving cloud Shadow'd the moon. Along the forest glade With swift foot Conrade past, and now had reach'd The plain, where whilome by the pleasant Loire, Cheer'd with the song, the rustics had beheld The day go down upon their merriment: No song of peace now echoed on its banks. There tents were pitch'd, and there the sentinel, Slow pacing on his sullen rounds, beheld The frequent corse roll down the tainted stream. Conrade with wider sweep pursued his way, Shunning the camp, now hush'd in sleep and still. And now no sound was heard save of the Loire, Murmuring along. The noise of coming feet Alarm'd him; nearer drew the rapid steps As of pursuit; anon — the clash of arms! That instant breaking through a rifted eloud The moonlight show'd, where two with force eombined I'rest on a single foe, who, warding still Their swords, retreated in unequal fight, As he would make the city. Hastening With timely help to save him, Conrade sped. One with an unexpected stroke he slew; The other fled: "Now let us speed our best, Frenchman!" he eried. On to the Loire they ran, And making way with practised arms across, Ere long in safety gain'd the opposite shore. "Whence art thou?" cried the warrior; "and on what Commission'd ? "

"Is it not the voice of Conrade?' Francis replied; " and dost thou bring to us Tidings of succor? oh! that it had come A few hours earlier! Isabel is gone!'"

"Nay, she is safe," cried Conrade; "her I found Bewilder'd in the forest, and consign'd her To the protection of the holy Maid, Whom Heaven hath sent to rescue us. Now say Wherefore alone? A fugitive from Orleans, Or sent on dangerous service from the town?"

"There is no food in Orleans," he replied, "Scarce a meal more. The assembled chiefs resolve,

If thou shouldst bring no tidings of near aid, To eut their way to safety, or by death Prevent the pang of famine.¹⁰¹ One they sought, Who, venturing to the English lines, should spy Where best to venture on this desperate chance, And I, believing all l loved was lost, Offer'd myself."

So saying, they approach'd The gate. The sentinel, soon as he heard Thitherward footsteps, with uplifted lance Challenged the darkling travellers. At their voice Ite drew the strong bolts back, and cautiously Open'd the wicket. To the careful chiefs Who sate in midnight council, they were led, And Conrade thus address'd them :

"Sirs, the Lord, In this our utmost need, hath sent us aid. A holy Maid hath been raised up by Heaven; Her mission is by miraeles confirm'd, And hither, with twelve hundred chosen men, Led by Dunois, she comes. I am myself A witness to the truth of what I tell; And by to-morrow's noon, before these walls Her banner will be seen "

Thereat the chiefs Were fill'd with wonder and with joy, by doubt Little repress'd. "Open the granaries!" Xaintrailles exclaim'd; "give we to all the host With hand unsparing now a plenteous meal; To-morrow we are safe! for Heaven all-just Hath seen our sufferings and decreed their end. Let the glad tidings echo through the town ! God is with us!"

"Be not too confident," Graville replied, "in this miraculous aid. Some frantic woman this, who gives belief To idle dreams, and with her madness then Infects the simple ! That Dunois is there, Leading in arms twelve hundred chosen men, Affords a better hope; yet lavish not Our stores, lest in the enterprise he fail, And Orleans then be fain to bear the yoke Of England !"

"Chief! I tell thee," Conrade cried, "I did myself behold the sepulchre, Fulfilling what she spake, give up those arms Which surely for no common end the grave

JOAN OF ARC.

Through many an age bath held inviolate. She is the Prophetess of the Most High, And will deliver Orleans !"

Gaucour then, "Be it as thou hast said. For I must think, That surely to no vulgar tale these chiefs Would yield a light belief; and our poor stores Must speedily, ye know, be clean consumed. Spread then the joyful tidings through the troops That God hath to deliver the oppress'd, As in old time, raised up a Prophetess, And the belief itself will make them fight With irresistible courage."

Thus the chief, And what he said seem'd good. The men of Orleans, Long by their formen bay'd, such transport felt, As when the Mexicans,¹⁰² with eager eye Gazing to Huixachtla's distant top, On that last night, doubtful if ever morn Again shall cheer them, mark the mystic fire Flame on the breast of some brave prisoner, A dreadful altar. As they see the blaze Beaming on Iztapalapan's near towers, Or on Tezcuco's calmy lake flash'd far, Songs of thanksgiving and the shout of joy Wake the loud echo; the glad husband tears The mantling aloe from his consort's face, And children, now deliver'd from the dread Of everlasting darkness, look abroad, Hail the good omen, and expect the sun Uninjur'd still to run his flaming race.

While thus in Orleans hope had banished sleep, The Maiden's host perform'd their evening prayer, And in the forest took their rest secure. And now the morning came. At earliest dawn Lightly upstarting, and bedight in arms, The Bastard moved along, with provident eye Marshalling the troops. All high in hope they march :

And now the sun shot from the southern sky His noontide radiance, when afar they hear The hum of men, and see the distant towers Of Orleans, and the bulwarks of the foe, And many a streamer wantoning in air. These as they saw and thought of all the ills Their brethren had endured, closely pent there For many a month, such ardor for the fight Burnt in each bosom, as young Ali felt Then when Mohammed of the assembled tribe Ask'd who would be his Vizir. Fierce in faith. Forth from the race of Hashem stept the youth, "Prophet of God! lo - I will be the man!" And well did Ali merit that high post, Victorious upon Beder's fertile vale, And on mount Ohud, and before the walls Of Chaibar, when down-cleaving to the chest His giant foe, he grasp'd the massy gate, Shook with strong arm and tore it from the fort, And lifted it in air, portentous shield !

"Behold the towers of Orleans," cried Dunois, "Lo! this the vale where on the banks of Loire, Of yore, at close of day the rustic band Danced to the roundelay. In younger years As oft I glided down the silver stream, Frequent upon the lifted oar I paused, Listening the sound of far-off merriment. There wave the hostile banners ! martial Maid. Give thou the signal ! — let us fall upon These merciless invaders, who have sack'd Village and town, and made the hamlet haunts Silent, or hearing but the widow's groan. Give but the signal, Maiden ! "

Her dark eye

Fix'd sadly on the foe, the holy Maid Answer'd him ; "Ere the avenging sword be drawn, And slaughter be let loose, befits us send Some peaceful messenger, who shall make known The will of Heaven : so timely warn'd, our foes Haply may yet repent, and quit in peace Besieged Orleans, for I fain would spare The bloody price of victory."

So she said ;

And as she spake, a soldier from the ranks Came forward. "I will be thy messenger, O Prophetess ! and to the English camp Will bear thy bidding."

"Go," the Virgin cried; "Say to the Lord of Salisbury, and the chiefs Of England, Suffolk, Fastolffe, Talbot, Scales, Invaders of the country, say, thus says THE MAID OF ORLEANS: ' With your troops retire In peace. Of every captured town the keys Restore to Charles; so bloodless you may seek Your native island; for the God of Hosts Thus hath decreed. To Charles the rightful heir, By long descent and by the willing choice Of duteous subjects, hath the Lord assign'd The kingdom. In His name the Virgin comes Arm'd with the sword, yet not of mercy void. Depart in peace : for ere the morrow dawns, Victorious upon yonder wall shall wave Her holy banner.' " To the English camp Fearless the herald went.

At mid-day meal, With all the dissonance of boisterous mirth, The British chiefs caronsed and quaff'd the bowl, When by the sentinel conducted there The Maiden's herald came.

" Chiefs," he began, "Salisbury, and ye the representatives Of the English King, usurper of this realm, To ye the leaders of the English host I come, no welcome messenger. Thus saith THE MAID OF ORLEANS : ' With your troops retire In peace. Of every captured town the keys Restore to Charles; so bloodless you may seek Your native island; for the God of Hosts Thus hath decreed. To Charles the rightful heir, By long descent and by the willing choice Of duteous subjects, hath the Lord assign'd The kingdom. In His name the Virgin comes, Arm'd with the sword, yet not of mercy void. Depart in peace : for ere the morrow dawns, Victorious upon yonder wall shall wave Her holy banner.' "

Wonder made a pause; To this a laugh succeeds. "What !" Fastolffe cried, "A virgin warrior hath your monarch sent

Go down ! Ye English mothers, mourn ye now ! To save devoted Orleans? By the rood, I thank his grace. If she be young and fair, Daughters of England, weep! for, hard of heart. No worthless prize, my lords ! Go, tell your Maid, Still your mad leaders urge this impious war ; Joyful we wait her coming." And for their folly and their wickedness, There was one Your sons, your husbands, by the sword must fall Among the English chiefs who had grown old Long-suffering is the Lord, and slow to wrath, In arms, yet had not age unnerved his limbs, But heavy are his judgments ! " But from the flexile nimbleness of youth He who spake To unyielding stiffness braced them. One who saw Was young and comely; had his cheek been pale Him seated at the board, might well have deem'd With dread, and had his eye look'd fearfully, That Talbot with his whole collected might Sure he had won compassion; but the blood Wielded the sword in war, for on his neck Gave now a livelier meaning to his cheek, The veins were full,¹⁰³ and every muscle bore As with a prophet's look and prophet's voice The character of strength. He his stern eye He raised his ominous warning : they who heard Fix'd on the herald, and before he spake Wonder'd, and they who rear'd the stake perform'd His silence threaten'd.104 With half-unwilling hands their slacken'd toil, "Get thee gone !" exclaim'd And doubted what might follow. The indignant chief: "away! nor think to scare Not unseen With girlish phantasies the English host Rear'd they the stake, and piled around the wood; That scorns your bravest warriors. Hie thee thence, In sight of Orleans and the Maiden's host, ¹⁰⁶ Had Suffolk's arrogant fierceness bade the work And tell this girl she may expect to meet The mockery of the camp ! Of death be done. The Maiden's host beheld; At once in eager wrath they raised the loud "Nay, seare her not," And general clamor, "Lead us to the foe !" Replied their chief: "go, tell this Maid of Orleans, That Salisbury longs to meet her in the fight. "Not upon us, O Gop !" the Maid exclaim'd, Nor let her fear that cords or iron chains "Not upon us cry out the innocent blood !" And bade the signal sound. In the English camp Shall gall her tender limbs; for I myself Will be her prison, and -The clarion and the trumpet's blare was heard; " Contemptuous man ! In haste they seize their arms, in haste they form, Some by hold words seeking to hide their fear No more!" the herald cried, as to his cheek Rush'd the red anger : "bearing words of peace Even from themselves, some silently in prayer, And timely warning came I to your camp; For much their hearts misgave them. But the rage And here have been with insolent ribaldry Of Suffolk swell'd within him. "Speed your Received. Bear witness, chieftains! that the work ! ' French, Exclaim'd the injurious earl; "kindle the pile, Free from blood-guiltiness, shall meet the war." That France may see the fire, and in defeat " And who art thou?" cried Suffolk, and his eye Feel aggravated shame!" Grew fierce and wrath-inflamed : "What fool art And now they bound The herald to the stake : he cried aloud, thou. Who at this woman's bidding comest to brave And fix'd his eye on Suffolk, "Let not him Who girdeth on his harness boast himself The host of England? Thou shalt have thy meed ! " As he that puts it off ! 107 They come ; they come ! Then turning to the sentinel he cried, "Prepare a stake! and let the men of Orleans, God and the Maid!" And let this woman who believes her name The host of France approach'n. May privilege her herald, see the fire And Suffolk eagerly beheld the fire Consume him.¹⁰⁵ Plant a stake ! for by my God Brought near the pile; when suddenly a shout Toward Orleans call'd his eye, and thence he saw He shall be kalendared of this new faith A man-at-arms upon a barded steed First martyr.' As he spake, a sudden flush Come thundering on. Came o'er the herald's cheek, and his heart beat As when Chederles comes 108 With quicker action; but the sudden flush, To aid the Moslem on his deathless horse, Nature's instinctive impulse, faded soon Swaying the sword with such resistless arm, To such a steady hue as spake the soul Such mightiest force, as he had newly quaff'd Roused up with all its powers, and unsubdued, The hidden waters of eternal youth, And strengthen'd for endurance. Through the Till with the copious draught of life and strength eamp, Inebriate; such, so fierce, so terrible, Soon as the tidings spread, a shout arose, Came Conrade through the camp. Aright, aleft, A hideous shout, more savage than the howl The affrighted formen seatter from his spear; Of midnight wolves, around him as they throng'd, Onward he comes, and now the eircling throng To gaze upon their victim. He pass'd on ; Fly from the stake, and now he checks his course, And as they led him to the appointed place And cuts the herald's bonds, and bids him live Look'd round, as though forgetful of himself, To arm, and fight, and conquer.

And cried aloud, " Oh ! woe it is to think

So many men shall never see the sun

"Haste thee hence To Orleans," cried the warrior. "Tell the chiefs

BOOK VI.

There is confusion in the English camp. Bid them come forth." On Conrade's steed the youth Leapt up, and hasten'd onward. He the while Turn'd to the war.

Like two conflicting clouds, Pregnant with thunder, moved the hostile hosts. Then man met man, then on the batter'd shield Rung the loud lance, and through the darken'd sky Fast fell the arrowy storm. Amid his foes The Bastard's arm dealt irresistibly The strokes of death; and by his side the Maid Led the fierce fight, the Maid, though all unused To such rude conflict, now inspired by Heaven, Flashing her flamy falchion through the troops, That like the thunderbolt, where'er it fell, Seatter'd the trembling ranks. The Saracen, Though arm'd from Cashbin or Damaseus, wields A weaker sword; nor might that magic blade Compare with this, which Oriana saw Flame in the ruffian Ardan's robber hand, When, sick and cold as death, she turn'd away Her dizzy eyes, lest they should see the fall Of her own Amadis. Nor plated shield, Nor the strong hauberk, nor the crested easque, Stay that descending sword. Dreadful she moved Like as the Angel of the Lord went forth And smote his army, when the Assyrian king, Haughty of Hamath and Sepharvaim fallen, Blasphemed the God of Israel.

Yet the fight Hung doubtful, where exampling hardiest deeds, Salisbury struck down the foe, and Fastolffe strove, And in the hottest doings of the war Towered Talbot. He, remembering the past day When from his name the affrighted sons of France Fled trembling, all astonish'd at their force And wontless valor, rages round the field Dreadful in anger; yet in every man Meeting a foe fearless, and in the faith Of Heaven's assistance firm.

The clang of arms Reaches the walls of Orleans. For the war Prepared, and confident of victory, Forth speed the troops. Not when afar exhaled The hungry raven snuffs the steam of blood That from some carcass-cover'd field of fame Taints the pure air, flies he more eagerly To feed upon the slain, than the Orleanites, Impatient now for many an ill endured In the long siege, to wreak upon their foes

Due vengeance. Then more fearful grew the fray; The swords that late flash'd to the evening sun¹⁰⁹ Now quench'd in blood their radiance. O'er the host

Howl'd a deep wind that ominous of storms Roll'd on the lurid elouds. The blacken'd night Frown'd, and the thunder from the troubled sky Roar'd hollow. Javelins clash'd and bucklers rang;

Shield prest on shield; loud on the helmet jarr'd The ponderous hattle-axe; the frequent groan Of death commingling with the storm was heard, And the shrill shrick of fear. Even such a storm Before the walls of Chartres quell'd the pride

Of the third Edward, when the heavy hail Smote down his soldiers, and the conqueror heard Gop in the tempest, and remembered then With a remorseful sense of Christian fear What misery he had caused, and in the name Of blessed Mary vowed a vow of peace.¹¹⁰

Lo! where the holy banner waved aloft, The lambent lightnings play. Irradiate round, As with a blaze of glory, o'er the field It stream'd miraculous splendor. Then their hearts Sunk, and the English trembled; with such fear Possess'd, as when the Canaanites beheld The sun stand still on Gibeon, at the voice Of that king-conquering warrior, he who smote The country of the hills, and of the south, From Baal-gad to Halak, and their chiefs, Even as the Lord commanded. Swift they fled From that portentous banner, and the sword Of France; though Talbot with vain valiancy Yet urged the war, and stemm'd alone the tide Of battle. Even their leaders felt dismay ; Fastolffe fled first, and Salisbury in the rout Mingled, and all impatient of defeat, Borne backward Talbot turns. Then echoed loud The cry of conquest, deeper grew the storm, And darkness, hovering o'er on raven wing, Brooded the field of death.

Nor in the camp Deem themselves safe the trembling fugitives; On to the forts they haste. Bewilder'd there Amid the moats by fear and the thick gloom Of more than midnight darkness, plunge the troops, Crush'd by fast-following numbers, who partake The death they give. As swol'n with vernal snows A mountain torrent hurries on its way, Till at the brink of some abrupt descent Arrived, with deafening clamor down it falls, Thus borne along, tumultuously the troops Driven by the force behind them, plunge amid The liquid death. Then rose the dreadful cries More dreadful, and the dash of breaking waters That to the passing lightning as they broke Open'd their depth.

Nor of the host so late Exultant in the pride of long success, A remnant had escaped, had not their chief, Slow as he moved unwilling from the field, What most might profit the defeated ranks Bethought him. He, when he had gain'd the fort Named from St. John, there kindled up on high The guiding fire. Not unobserved it rose ; The watchful guards on Tournelles, and the pile Of that proud city in remembrance fond Call'd London, light their beacons. Soon the fires Flame on the summit of the circling forts, Which, with their moats and crenellated walls, Included Orleans. Far across the plain They cast a lurid splendor; to the troops Grateful, as to the way-worn traveller, Wandering with parch'd feet o'er Arabian sands, The far-seen cistern ; he for many a league Travelling the trackless desolate, where heaved With tempest swell the desert billows round, Pauses, and shudders at his perils past,

Then wild with joy speeds on to taste the wave So long bewail'd.

Swift as the affrighted herd Scud o'er the plain, when rattling thunder-cracks Upon the bolted lightning follow close, The English hasten to their sheltering forts, Even there of safety doubtful, still appall 'd And trembling, as the pilgrim who by night On his way wilder'd, to the wolf's deep howl Hears the wood echo, when from close pursuit Escaped, the topmost branch of some tall tree He grasps close clinging, still of the wild beast Fearful, his teeth jar, and the cold sweat stands Upon his clammy limbs.

Nor now the Maid Greedy of vengeance presses the pursuit. She bids the trumpet of retreat resound; A welcome note to the affrighted foe Blew that loud blast, whereat obedicntly The French, though eager on the invaders' heads To wreak their wrath, stay the victorious sword.

Loud is the cry of conquest as they turn To Orleans. There what few to guard the town Unwilling had remain'd, haste forth to meet The triumph. Many a blazing torch they held, Which raised aloft amid the midnight storm Flash'd far a festive light. The Maid advanced; Deep through the sky the hollow thunders roll'd;¹¹¹

Innocuous lightnings round the hallowed banner Wreath'd their red radiance.

Through the city gate Then, as the laden convoy pass'd, was heard The shout of exultation ; and such joy The men of Orleans at that welcome sight Possess'd, as when from Bactria late subdued, The mighty Macedonian led his troops Amid the Sogdian desert, where no stream Wastes on the wild its fertilizing waves, Fearful alike to pause, or to proceed; Scorch'd by the sun, that o'er their morning march Steam'd his hot vapors, heart-subdued and faint; Such joy as then they felt, when from the heights Burst the soul-gladdening sound, for thence was seen

The evening sun silvering the fertile vale, Where Oxus roll'd below.

Clamors of joy

Echo along the streets of Orleans, wont Long time to hear the infant's feeble cry, The mother's frantic shrick, or the dread sou..d, When from the cannon burst its stores of death. Far flames the fire of joy on ruin'd piles And high heap'd carcasses, whence seared away From his abhorred meal, on clattering wing Rose the night-rayen slow.

In the English forts Sad was the scene. There all the livelong night Steal in the straggling fugitives; as when Past is the storm, and o'er the azure sky Serenely shines the sun, with every breeze The waving branches drop their gather'd rain, Renewing the remembrance of the storm.

THE SEVENTH BOOK.

STRONG were the English forts,¹¹² by daily toil Of thousands rear'd on high, when to insure His meditated conquest Salisbury Resolved from Orleans to shut out all means Of human succor. Round the city stretch'd Their line continuous, massy as the wall Erst by the fearful Roman on the bounds Of Caledonia raised, when soul-enslaved The race degenerate fear'd the car-borne chiefs Who moved from Morven down.

Broad battlements Crested the bulwark, and safe standing place For archer or for man-at-arms was there. The frequent buttress at just distance rose Declining from its base, and sixty forts Seem'd in their strength to render all secure. But loftier and massier than the rest, As though of some large castle each the keep, Stood six square fortresses with turrets flank'd, Piles of unequall'd strength, though now deem'd weak

'Gainst purssance more than mortal. Safely thence The skilful bowman, entering with his eye ¹¹³ The city, might, himself the while unseen, Through the long opening aim his winged deaths. Loire's waves diverted fill'd the deep-dug moat Circling the whole ; a bulwark vast it was As that which round their camp and stranded ships The Achaians raised, a common sepulchre Os the words claudited and the deem'd death

Of thousands slaughter'd, and the doom'd deathplace

Of many a chief, when Priam's virtuous son Assail'd them, then in hope, with favoring Jove

But cowering now amid their sheltering forts Trembled the invading host. Their leader's care In anxious vigilance prepares to ward The assault expected. Rightly he ared The Maid's intent, but vamly did he seek To kindle in their breasts the wonted flame Of valor, for, by prodigies unmann'd, They wait the morn. The soldiers' pride was gone; The blood was on their swords, their bucklers lay Defiled and unrepair'd,¹¹⁴ they sharpen'd not

Defiled and unrepair'd,¹¹⁴ they sharpen'd not Their blunted spears, the affrighted archer's hand Relax'd not his bent bow. To them, confused With fears of unknown danger, the long night Was dreadful, but more dreadful dawn'd the day

The morning came ; the martial Maid arose ; Lovely in arms she moved. Around the gate, Eager again for conquest, throng the troops. High tower'd the Son of Orleans, in his strength Poising the ponderous spear. His batter'd shield, Witnessing the fierce fray of yesternight, Hung on his sinewy arm.

"Maiden of Arc," So as he spake approaching, cried the chief, "Well hast thou proved thy mission, as by words And miracles attested when dismay'd The grave theologists dismiss'd their doubts,

His prowess knew the foes, and his fair fame Acknowledged, since before his stripling arm Fled Warwick; Warwick, he whose wide renown Greece knew, and Antioch, and the holy soil Of Palestine, since there in arms he went On gallant pilgrimage ; yet by Dunois Baffled, and yielding him the conqueror's praise. And by his side the martial Maiden pass'd,

But there the war Raged fiercest where the martial Maiden moved A minister of wrath; for thither throng'd The bravest champions of the adverse host. And on her either side two warriors stood Protecting her, and aiming at her foes Watchful their weapons, of themselves the while Clean through the hanberk drove.

Little regarding : on the one side he Who to the English had her bidding borne; Firmly he stood, untired and undismay'd, Though many a spear against his burgonet Was thrust, and on his arm the buckler hung Heavy, thick-bristled with the hostile shafts, Even like a porcupine, when in his rage Roused, he collects within him all his force, Himself a quiver. On the other hand, Competing with him to protect the Maid, Conrade maintain'd the fight; at all points arm'd, A jazerent of double mail he wore; Its weight in little time had wearied one Of common strength ; but unencumber'd he, And unfatigued, alertly moved in it, And wielded with both hands a battle-axe, Which gave no second stroke ; for where it fell, Not the strong buckler nor the plated mail Might save, nor crested casque. On Molyn's head, As at the Maid he aim'd his javelin, Forceful it fell, and shiver'd with the blow The iron helm, and to his brain-pan drove The fragments. At his fall the enemy, Stricken with instantaneous fear, gave way. That instant Conrade, with an active bound, Sprung on the battlements; 123 and there he stood, Keeping the ascent. The herald and the Maid Follow'd, and soon the exulting cry of France Along the lists was heard, as there they saw Her banner planted. Gladdisdale beheld, And hastened from his well-defended post, That where immediate danger more required There he might take his stand; against the Maid He bent his way, and hoped one happy blow Might end at once the new-raised hopes of France, And by her death, to the English arms their old Ascendency restore. Nor did not Joan Areed his purpose, but with lifted shield Prepared she stood, and poised her sparkling spear. The English chief came on ; he raised his mace ; With circling force the iron weight swung high,¹²⁴ And Gladdisdale with his collected strength Impell'd the blow. The man of lowly line That instant rush'd between, and rear'd his shield, And met the broken stroke, and thrust his lance Clean through the gorget of the English knight. A gallant man, of no ignoble line, Was Gladdisdale. His sires had lived in peace; They heap'd the hospitable hearth, they spread The feast, their vassals loved them, and afar The traveller told their fame. In peace they died, And to their ancient burial-place were borne With book and bell, torches, and funeral chant; And duly for their souls the neighboring monks The solemn office sung. Now far away Their offspring falls, the last of all his race, Slain in a foreign land, and doom'd to share A common grave. Then terror seized the host,

Their chieftain dead. And lo ! where on the wall Maintain'd of late by Gladdisdale so well, The Son of Orleans stands, and sways around His falchion, keeping thus at bay the foe, Till on the battlements his comrades climb And raise the shout of conquest. Then appall'd The English fled: nor fled they unpursued, For mingling with the foremost fugitives, The gallant Conrade rush'd; and with the throng The knights of France together o'er the bridge Press'd forward. Nor the garrison within Durst let the ponderous portcullis fall, For in the entrance of the fort the fight Raged ficrcely, and together through the gate The vanquish'd English and their eager foes Pass'd in the flying conflict.

Well I deem

And wisely did the heroic Spaniard act At Vera Cruz, when he his yet sound ships Dismantling, left no spot where treacherous fear Might still with wild and wistful eye look back For knowing no retreat, his desperate troops In conquest sought their safety; victors hence At Tlascala, and o'er the Cholulans, And by Otompan, on that bloody field When Mexico her patriot thousands pour'd, Fierce in vain valor, on their dreadful foes. There was a portal in the English fort Which open'd on the wall; 125 a speedier path In the hour of safety, whence the soldier's eye Might overlook the river's pleasant course. Fierce in the gate-way raged the deadly war; For there the Maiden strove, and Conrade there, And he of lowly line, bravelier than whom Fought not in that day's battle. Of success Desperate, for from above the garrison (Lest upon friend and enemy alike The indiscriminating blow should light) Could give no aid, the English of that way Bethought them; by that egress they forsook St. Loup's, and the Orleanites with shouts of joy Beheld the Virgin's banner on its height In triumph planted. Swift along the wall The English haste to St. John's neighboring fort, Flying with fearful speed. Nor from pursuit The victors ceased, but with the fugitives Mingled and waged the war; and combatants, Lock'd in each other's grasp, together fell Precipitate.

But foremost of the French, Dealing destruction, Conrade made his way Along the wall, and to the nearest fort Came in pursuit; nor did not then the chief What most might serve bethink him; but he took His stand in the portal, and first looking back, Lifted his voice aloud; three times he raised, Cheering and calling on his countrymen, That voice o'er all the uproar heard afar, Then to the strife addrest himself, assail'd By numerous foes, who clamorously now Menaced his single person. He the while Stood firm, not vainly confident, or rash, But in his vantage more than his own strength Trusting; for narrow was the portal way, To one alone fit passage, from above Not overbrow'd by jutting parapet,126 Whence aught might crush him. He in double mail Was arm'd; a massy burgonet, well tried In many a hard-fought field, behning his head; And fenced with iron plates, a buckler broad Hung from his neck. Nor to dislodge the chief

BOOK VII.

But terrified

Could the English bring their numbers, for the way By upward steps presented from the fort A narrow ascent, where one alone could meet The war. Yet were they of their numbers proud, Though useless numbers were in that strait path, Save by assault nuceasing to ontlast A single warrior, who at length must sink Fatigued with slaughter, and by toil foredone Succumb.

There was amid the garrison A gallant knight who at Verneuil had fought, And good renown for feats of arms achieved Had gain'd in that day's victory. For him His countrymen made way, and he his lance Thrust upward against Conrade, who perceived The intent, and, as the weapon touch'd his shield, Smote with his battle-axe the ashen shaft; Then plucking from the shield the severed head, He threw it back.¹²⁷ With wary bend the foe Shrank from the flying death; yet not in vain From that strong hand the fate-fraught weapon flew : Full on the corselet of a meaner man ¹²⁸ It fell, and pierced him where the heaving lungs, In vital play distended, to the heart Roll back their brighten'd tide: from the deep wound

The red blood gush'd; prone on the steps he fell, And in the strong, convulsive grasp of death Grasp'd his long pike. Of unrecorded name The soldier died; and yet he left behind One who then never said her daily prayers Of him forgetful; who to every tale Of the distant war lending an eager ear, Grew pale and trembled. At her cottage door The wretched one shall sit, and with fix'd eye Gaze on the path, where on his parting steps Her last look hung. Nor ever shall she know Her husband dead, but cherishing a hope, Whose falsehood inwardly she knows too well, Feel life itself with that false hope decay ; And wake at night from miserable dreams Of his return, and weeping o'er her babe, Too surely think that soon that fatherless child Must of its mother also be bereft.

Dropping his broken spear, the exasperate knight Drew forth the sword, and up the steps advanced, Like one who disregarded in his strength The enemy's vantage, destined to abide That rashness dearly. Conrade stood prepared, Held forth his bnekler, and his battle-axe Uplifted. Where the huckler was beneath Rounded, the falchion struck, a bootless blow To pierce its plated folds; more forcefully Full on his crested helm the battle-axe Descended, driving in both crest and crown; From the knight's eyes, at that death-stroke, the blood Started; with blood the chambers of the brain Were fill'd; his breastplate with convulsive throes Heaved as he fell. Victorious, he the prize At many a tournament had borne away In mimic war; happy, if so content With bloodless glory, he had never left The mansion of his sires. The English stood, nor durst adventure now Near that death-doing foe. Amid their host Was one who well could from the stubborn yew Send his sharp shafts; well skill'd in wood-craft he Even as the merry outlaws who their haunts In Sherwood held, and bade their bugles rouse The sleeping stag, ere on the web-woven grass The dew-drops sparkled to the rising sun. He safe in distance at the warrior aim'd The feather'd dart; with force he drew the bow; Loud on his bracer struck the sounding string, And swift and strong the well-fledged arrow flew. It pierced the shield, and reach'd, but reach'd in vain, The breastplate : while he fitted to the bow A second arrow, Conrade raised his voice, Shonting for timely succor to secure The entrance he had gain'd. Nor was the call Unheard, nor unobey'd; responsive shouts Announced assistance nigh; the Orleanites From St. Loup's captured fort along the wall Sped to support him; cheering was the sound Of their near footsteps to the chief; he drew His falchion forth, and down the steps he went. Then terror seized the English, for their foes Press'd through the open portal, and the sword Of Conrade was among them making way. Not to the Trojans when their ships were lost More dreadful the Rutilian hero seem'd, Then hoping well to right himself in arms; Nor with more fury through the streets of Paris Rush'd the fierce king of Sarza, Rodomont, Clad in his dragon mail.

Like some tall rock, Around whose billow-beaten foot the waves Spend their vain force, unshaken Conrade stood, When, drawing conrage from despair, the foe Renew'd the contest. Through the throng he hew'd His way unhurt amid the arrowy shower, Though on his shield and helm the darts fell fast, As the sear'd leaves that from the trembling tree The autumnal whirlwind shakes. Nor did he panse Till to the gate he came, and with strong hand Seized on the massy bolts. These as he drew, Full on his helm a weighty English sword Descended; swift he turn'd to wreak his wrath, When lo! the assailant gasping on the ground, Cleft by the Maiden's falchion : she herself To the foe opposing with her herald's aid, For they alone, following the adventurous steps Of Conrade, still kept pace as he advanced, Shielded him while with eager hand he drew The bolts: the gate turn'd slow; forth leapt the chief. And shiver'd with his battle-axe the chains That held on high the bridge : down fell the bridge Rebounding; the victorious troops rush'd in; And from their walls the Orleanites with shouts And tears of joy beheld on Fort St. John The lilies wave.

"On to Fort London ! on !" Cried Conrade; "Xaintrailles! while the day endures

Once more advance to certain victory ! Force ye the lists, and fill the moat, and bring The battering-ram against their gates and walls

BOOK VII

Anon I shall be with you. Thus he said; Then to the damsel. "Maid of Are! awhile Let thou and I withdraw, and by short rest Renew our strength." So saying he his helm Unlaced, and in the Loire's near thowing stream Cool'd his hot face. The Maid her head unhelm'd, And stooping to the stream, reflected there Saw her white plumage stain'd with human blood ! Shudaring she saw, but soon her steady soul Collected : on the banks she laid her down, Freely awhile respiring, for her breath Still panted from the fight : silent they lay, And gratefully the cooling breezes bathed Their throbbing temples.

Eve was drawing on : The sunbeams on the gently-waving stream Danced sparkling. Lost in thought the warrior lay ; Then as if wakening from a dream he said, "Maiden of Are ! at such an hour as this, Beneath the o'erarching forest's checker'd shade, With that lost woman have I wander'd on, Talking of years of happiness to come ! Oh ! hours forever fled ! delightful hopes Of the unsuspecting heart ! I do believe If Agnes on a worthier one had fix'd Her love, that though my heart had nurst till death Its sorrows, I had never on her choice Cast one upbraiding — but to stoop to him ! A harlot !— an adulteress ! '' ¹²⁹

In his eye Fierce anger flash'd; anon of what she was Ere the contagious vices of the court Polluted her, he thought. "Oh, happy age !" He cried, "when all the family of man Freely enjoy'd their goodly heritage, And only bow'd the knee in prayer to God! Calm flow'd the unruffled stream of years along, Till o'er the peaceful rustic's head the hair Grew gray in full of time. Then he would sit Beneath the coetaneous oak, while round, Sons, grandsons, and their offspring join'd to form The blameless merriment; and learnt of him What time to yoke the oxen to the plough, What hollow moanings of the western wind Foretell the storm, and in what lurid clouds The embryo lightning lies. Well pleased, he taught, A heart-smile glowing on his aged cheek, Mild as the summer sun's decaying light. Thus quietly the stream of life flow'd on, Till in the shoreless ocean lost at length. Around the bed of death his numerous race Listen'd, in no unprofitable grief, His last advice, and eaught his latest sigh : And when he died, as he had fallen asleep, In his own ground, and underneath the tree Which, planted at his birth, with nim had grown, And flourish'd in its strength when he decay'd, They delved the narrow house: where oft at eve Their children's children gathered round to hear The example of his life and death impress'd. Maiden : and such the evening of my days Fondly I hoped; and would that I had lived In those old times,¹³⁾ or till some better age Slumber'd unborn; for this is a hard race, An evil generation • nor by day

Nor in the night have respite from their cares And wretchedness. But I shall be at rest Soon, in that better world of peace and love Where evil is not: in that better world, Joan! we shall meet, and he too will be there, Thy Theodore."

Soothed by his words, the Maid Had listen'd sadly, till at that loved name She wept. "Nay, Maid!" he eried, "I did not think To wake a tear; — yet pleasant is thy grief! Thou know'st not what it is, around thy heart To have a false one wreathe in viper folds. But to the battle! in the elang of arms, We win forgetfulness."

Then from the bank He sprung, and helm'd his head. The Maid arose, Bidding awhile adieu to gentle thoughts. On to the fort they speed, whose name recall'd England's proud capital to the English host, Now half subdued, anticipating death, And vainly wishing they from her white cliffs Had never spread the sail. Cold terror creeps Through every nerve : already they look round With haggard eyes, as seeking where to fly, Though Talbot there presided, with their chief, The dauntless Salisbury.

" Soldiers, tried in arms!"

Thus, hoping to revive with gallant speech Their courage, Salisbury spake; "Brave countrymen, Victorious in so many a hard-fought fight, What -- shrink ye now dismay'd? Oh call to mind The plains of Agincourt, where vanquish'd France Fled with her thousands from your fathers' arms? Have ye forgotten how our English swords, On that illustrious day before Verneuil, Cut down the flower of all their chivalry ? Then was that noble heart of Douglas pierced,¹³¹ Bold Buchan bit the earth, and Narbonne died, And this Alençon, boaster as he is, Cried mercy to his conqueror. Shall I speak Of our victorious banner on the walls Of Yenville and Baugenei triumphing ; And of that later hour of victory When Clermont and the Bastard plied their spurs? Shame ! shame ! that beaten boy is here in arms, And ye will fly before the fugitives, ---Fly from a woman! from a frantic girl! Who with her empty mummeries tries to blast Your courage; or if miracles she bring, Aid of the Devil! Who is there among yon False to his country, - to his former fame, To your old leader who so many a time Hath led ye on to glory?

From the host There eame a heartless shout; then Talbot's cheek Grew red with indignation. "Earl !" said he, Addressing Salisbury, "there is no hope From these white-liver'd dastards, and this fort Will fall an easy conquest. We must out And gain the Tournelles, better fortified, Fit to endure a siege : that hope in view, Cow'd as they are, the men from very fear May gather what will do for this poor turn The work of courage."

BOOK VII.

Bravely thus he spake, Advising well, and Salisbury replied: "Rightly thou say'st. But, Talbot, could we reach The sorceress in the battle, one sure blow Might give us hack, this hour, the mastery So marvellously lost: nor difficult To meet the wench, for from the battlements I have beheld her foremost in attack, Playing right valiantly the soldier's part. In her the enemy have their strength; with her Their strength wouldfall. And had we her butonce Within arm-stroke, witch though she be, methinks Her devilry could neither blunt the edge Of thy good sword, or mine."

Thus communed they, And through the host the gladdening tidings ran, That they should seek the Tournelles. Then their hearts

Gather'd new strength, placing on those strong walls

Dependence; oh vain hope! for neither wall, Nor moat, nor fort can save, if fear within Palsy the soldier's arm.

Them issuing forth, As from the river's banks they pass'd along, The Maid beheld "Lo! Conrade!" she exclaim'd, "The foe advance to meet us — look ! they lower The bridge! and now they rush upon the troops : — A gailant onset! Dost thou mark the man Who all this day has by our side endured The hottest conflict? Often 1 beheld His feats with wonder, but his provess now Makes all his actions in the former fight Seem as of no account: knowest thou him? There is not one, amid the host of France, Of fairer promise."

"He," the chief replied, "Wretched and prodigal of life, achieves The exploits of despair; a gallant youth, Widow'd like me of hope, and but for whom I had been seen among mankind no more. Maiden ! with me thy comrade in the war, His arm is vow'd to heaven. Lo ! where he stands Bearing the battle's hrunt !"

Nor paused they now In further converse, to the perilous fray Speeding, not unobserved ; for Salisbury saw And call'd on Talbot. Six, the bravest knights, And sworn with them, against the Virgin's life Address'd their course. She by the herald's side Now urged the war, when on her white-plumed helm The hostile falchion fell. On high she lifts That hallowed sword, which in the tomb for her Age after age, by miracle reserved, Had lain, which time itself could not corrode, How then might shield, or breastplate, or close mail Retund its edge ? Beneath that edge her foe Fell; and the knight who to avenge him came, Smitten by Conrade's battle-axe, was fell'd Upon his dying friend. With Talbot here The daring herald urged unequal fight; For, like some oak that in its rooted strength Defies the storm, the undaunted Earl endured llis quick assault. The herald round him wheels Rapidly, now on this side, now on that,

With many a feign'd and many a frustrate aim Flashing his falchion; now, as he perceives With wary eye the Earl's intended stroke, Bending, or leaping, lithe of limb, aside, Then quick and agile in assault again. Ill-fated man! one deed of glory more Shall with the short-lived lightning's splendor grace

This thy death-day; for SLAUGHTER even now Stands o'er thy loom of life, and lifts his sword

Upon her shield the martial Maid received An English warrior's blow, and in his side, Beneath the arm upraised, in prompt return Pierced him: that instant Salisbury sped his sword. Which, glancing from her helm, fell on the folds That arm'd her neck, and making there its way, Stain'd with her blood its edge. The herald saw And turn'd from Talbot, heedless of himself, And lifting up his falchion, all his force Concentred. On the breast of Salisbury It fell, and cleft his mail, and through the plate Beneath it drove, and in his heart's blood plunged Lo ! as he struck, the mighty Talbot came, And smote his helmet: slant the weapon fell; The strings gave way, the helmet dropt, the Earl Repeated on that head disarm'd his blow : Too late to interpose the Maiden saw, And in that miserable moment knew Her Theodore.

Him Conrade too had seen, And from a foe whom he had beaten down Turn'd terrible in vengeance. Front to front They stood, and each for the death-blow prepared His angry might. At once their weapons fell, The Frenchman's battle-axe and the good sword Of Talbot. He, stunn'd by the weighty blow, Sunk senseless, by his followers from the field Convey'd with timely speed : nor had his blade Fallen vainly on the Frenchman's crested helm, Though weak to wound ; for from his eyes the fire Sparkled, and back recoiling with the blow, He in the Maiden's arms astounded fell.

But now their troops, all captainless, confused, Fear seized the English. Not with more dismay, When over wild Caffiaria's wooded hills Echoes the lion's roar, the timid herd Fly the death-boding sound. The forts they seek, Now reckless which, so from that battle's rage A present refuge. On their flying ranks The victors press, and mark their course with blood.

But loud the trumpet of retreat resounds, For now the westering sun with many a hue Streak'd the gay clouds.

"Dunois!" the Maiden cried, "Form now around yon stronger pile the siege, There for the night encamping." So she said. The chiefs to Orleans for their needful food, And enginery to batter that huge pile, Dismiss'd a troop, and round the Tournelles led The host beleaguering. There they pitch their tents, And plant their engines for the morrow's war, Then, to their meal, and o'er the cheerful bowl

BOOK VIII

Recount the tale of danger; soon to rest Betaking them; for now the night drew on.

THE EIGHTH BOOK.

Now was the noon of night, and all was still, Save where the sentinel paced on his rounds Humming a broken song. Along the camp High flames the frequent fire. The Frenchmen there,

On the bare earth extended, rest their limbs Fatigued; their spears lay by them, and the shield Pillow'd the helmed head: ¹³² secure they slept, And busy in their dreams they fought again The fight of yesterday.

But not to Joan, But not to her, most wretched, came thy aid, Soother of sorrows, Sleep! no more her pulse, Amid the battle's tumult throbbing fast, Allow'd no pause for thought. With clasp'd hands now

And with fix'd eyes she sat, and in her mind The spectres of the days departed rose, A melancholy train! Upon the gale The raven's croak was heard; she started then, And passing through the eamp with hasty step, She sought the field of blood.

The night was calm;

Nor ever clearer welkin canopied Chaldea, while the watchful shepherd's eye Survey'd the host of heaven, and mark'd them rise Successive, and successively decay, Lost in the stream of light, as lesser springs Amid Euphrates' current. The high wall Cast a deep shadow, and the Maiden's feet Stumbled o'er carcasses and broken arms ; And sometimes did she hear the heavy groan Of one yet struggling in the pangs of death. She reach'd the spot where Theodore was slain Before Fort London's gate ; but vainly there Sought she the youth, on every clay-cold face Gazing with such a look as though she fear'd The thing she sought.133 And much she marvell'd then,

For there the victim of his vengeful arm, And close beside where he himself had fallen, Known by the buckler's blazon'd heraldry, Salisbury lay dead. So as the Virgin stood Looking around the plain, she mark'd a man Pass slowly on, as burden'd. Him to aid She sped, and soon with unencumber'd speed O'ertaking, thus bespake him: "Dost thou bear Some slaughter'd friend? or is it one whose wounds Leave yet a hope of life? oh! if he lives, I will with earnest prayer petition Heaven To shed its healing on him!"

So she said, And as she spake stretch'd forth her careful hands To ease the burden. "Warrior!" he replied, "Thanks for thy proffer'd aid. but he bath ceased To suffer, and my strength may well suffice To bear him hence for burial. Fare thee well!

The night is far advanced; thou to the camp Return: it fits not darkling thus to stray."

"Conrade!" the Maid exclaim'd, for well she knew

His voice : - With that she fell upon his neck

And cried, "My Theodore !- But wherefore thus Through the dead midnight dost thou bear his corse?"

"Peace, Maiden!" Conrade cried, "collect thy soul!

He is but gone before thee to that world Whither thou soon must follow ! Yestermorn, Ere yet from Orleans to the war we went, He pour'd his tale of sorrow on mine ear. Lo, Conrade, where she moves! beloved Maid ! Devoted for the realm of France she goes, Abandoning for this the joys of life, Yea-life itself! Yet on my heart her words Vibrate. If she must perish in the war, I will not live to bear the thought that I Perhaps might have preserved her. I will go In secret to protect her. If I fall, -And trust me I have little love of life,— Do thou in secret bear me from the field. Lest haply 1 might meet her wandering eye A mangled corpse. She must not know my fate. Do this last act of friendship, and in the stream Cast me, - she then may think of Theodore Without a pang.' Maiden, I vow'd with him To take our place in battle by thy side, And make thy safety our peculiar care. And now I hoped thou hadst not seen him fall."

Saying thus, he laid the body on the ground. With steady eye the wretched Maiden view'd That life-left tenement: his batter'd arms Were with the night-dews damp; his brown hair clung

Gore-clotted in the wound, and one loose lock Play'd o'er his cheek's black paleness.¹³⁴ "Gallant youth!"

She cried, "I would to God the hour were come When I might meet thee in the bowers of bliss! No, Theodore! the sport of winds and waves, Thy body shall not float adown the stream! Bear him with me to Orleans, there to rest In holy ground, where priests may say their prayers And hymn the requiem to his parted soul. So will not Elinor in bitterness Lament that no dear friend to her dead ehild Paid the last office."

From the earth they lift Their mournful burden, and along the plain Pass with slow footsteps to the city gate. The obedient sentinel, knowing Conrade's voice, Admits them at that hour, and on they go, Till in the neighboring abbey's porch arrived They rest the lifeless load.

Loud rings the bell, The awaken'd porter turns the heavy door. To him the Virgin : "Father, from the slain On yonder field, a dear-loved friend we bring Hither for Christian sepulture • chant ye

JOAN OF ARC.

The requiem to his soul: to-morrow eve I will return, and in the narrow house Will see him laid to rest." The father knew The Prophetess, and humbly how'd assent.

Now from the city, o'er the shadowy plain, Backward they bend their way. From silent thoughts

The Maid awakening cried, "There was a time, When thinking on my closing hour of life, Though with a mind resolved, some natural fears Shook my weak frame; but now the happy hour, When this emancipated soul shall burst The cumbrous fetters of mortality, I look for wishfully. Conrade ! my friend, This wounded heart would feel another pang Shouldst thou forsake me." "Jaan !" the chief replied,

" Along the weary pilgrimage of life Together will we journey, and beguile The painful way with hope, — such hope as, fix'd On heavenly things, brings with it no deceit, Lays up no food for sorrow, and endures From disappointment safe."

Thus communing They reach'd the camp, yet hush'd; there separating, Each in the post allotted restless waits The day-break.

Morning came : dim through the shade The twilight glimmers; soon the brightening clouds limbibe the rays, and o'er the landscape spread The dewy light. The soldiers from the earth Arise invigorate, and each his food Receives, impatient to renew the war. Dunois his javelin to the Tournelles points -"Soldiers of France! behold, your foes are there!" As when a band of hunters, round the den Of some wood-monster, point their spears, elate In hope of conquest and the future feast, When on the hospitable board their spoil Shall smoke, and they, as foaming bowls go round, Tell to their guests their exploits in the chase, They with their shouts of exultation make The forest ring; so elevate of heart, With such lond clamors for the fierce assault The French prepare. Nor, keeping now the lists Dare the disheartened English man to man Meet the close conflict. From the barbican,125 Or from the embattled wall 136 at random they Their arrows and their death-fraught enginery Discharged; meantime the Frenchmen did not cease

With well-directed shafts their loftier foes To assail: behind the guardian pavais fenced,¹³⁷ They at the battlements their arrows aim'd, Showering an iron storm, whilst o'er the bayle, The bayle now levell'd by victorious France, The assailants pass'd with all their mangonels;¹³⁸ Or tortoises,¹³⁹ beneath whose roofing sale, They, filling the deep moat, might for the towers Make fit foundation; or with petraries, War-wolves, and beugles, and that murderous sling The matafund, from whene the ponderous stone Made but one wound of him whom in its way

It met; no pious hand might then compose The crush'd and mangled corpse to be conveyed To where his fathers slept: a dreadful train ¹⁴⁰ Prepared by Salisbury o'er the town besieged For hurling ruin; but that dreadful train Must hurl its ruin on the invader's head; Such retribution righteous Heaven decreed.

Nor lie the English trembling, for the fort Was ably garrison'd. Glacidas, the chief, A gallant man, sped on from place to place Cheering the brave ; or if an archer's hand, Palsied with fear, shot wide his ill-aim'd shaft, Driving him from the ramparts with reproach And shame. He bore an arbalist himself, A weapon for its sure destructiveness Abominated once; 141 wherefore of yore The assembled fathers of the Christian church Pronounced the man accursed whose impious hand Should use the murderous engine. Such decrees Befitted them, as ministers of peace, To promulgate, and with a warning voice, To cry aloud and spare not, 'Woe to them Whose hands are full of blood !'

An English king,

The lion-hearted Richard, their decree First broke, and rightly was he doom'd to fall By that forbidden weapon; since that day Frequent in fields of battle, and from far To many a good knight bearing his death wound From hands unknown. With such an instrument Arm'd on the ramparts, Glacidas his eye Cast on the assailing host. A keener glance Darts not the hawk when from the feather'd tribe He marks his prey.

A Frenchman for his aim He chose, who kneeling by the trebuchet, Charged its long sling with death.¹⁴² Him Glaeidas, Secure behind the battlements, beheld, And strung his bow; then bending on one knee, He in the groove the feather'd quarrel placed,¹⁴³ And levelling with sure eye, his victim mark'd. The bow-string twang'd, swift on its way the dart Whizz'd, and it struck, there where the helmet's clasps

Defend the neck; a weak protection now, For through the tube which draws the breath of life Pierced the keen shaft; blood down the unwonted way

Gush'd to the lungs, prone fell the dying man Grasping, convulsed, the earth ; a hollow groan In his throat struggled, and the dews of death Stood on his livid check. The days of youth He had pass'd peaceful, and had known what joys Domestic love bestows, the father once Of two fair children ; in the city hemm'd During the siege, he had beheld their cheeks Grow pale with famine, and had heard their cries For bread. His wife, a broken-hearted one, Sunk to the cold grave's quiet, and her babes With hunger pined, and follow'd; he survived A miserable man, and heard the shouts Of joy in Orleans, when the Maid approach'd, As o'er the corpse of his last little one He heap'd the unhallowed earth. To him the foe

Perform'd a friendly part, hastening the hour And happy in beholding happiness, Grief else had soon brought on. Not meditating death : the bowman's art The English chief, Therefore he little knew, nor was he wont Pointing again his arbalist, let loose To aim the arrow at the distant foe, The string; the quarrel, by that impact driven, But uprear in close conflict, front to front, True to its aim, fled fatal : one it struck His battle-axe, and break the shield and helm, Dragging a tortoise to the moat, and fix'd First in the war of men. There too the Maid Deep in his liver; blood and mingled gall Awaits, impatient on the wall to wield Her falchion. Onward moves the heavy tower, Flow'd from the wound, and writhing with keen pangs, Slow o'er the moat and steady, though the foe lleadlong he fell. He for the wintry hour Showered there their javelins, aimed their engines Knew many a merry ballad and quaint tale, there, A man in his small circle well beloved. And from the arbalist the fire-tipt dart None better knew with prudent hand to guide Shot burning through the sky.150 In vain it flamed The vine's young tendrils, or at vintage time For well with many a reeking hide secured, To press the full-swollen clusters; he, heart-glad, Passed on the dreadful pile, and now it reached Taught his young boys the little all he knew, The wall. Below, with forceful impulse driven, Enough for happiness. The English host The iron-headed engine swings its stroke, Laid waste his fertile fields : he, to the war, Then back recoils; while they within who guide, By want compelled, adventured, in his gore In backward step collecting all their strength, Now weltering. Anon the massy beam with stronger arm Nor the Gallic host remit Drive full and fierce. So rolls the swelling sea Their eager efforts; some, the watery fence, lts eurly billows to the unmoved foot Beneath the tortoise roofed, with engines apt Of some huge promontory, whose broad base Drain painful;¹⁴⁴ part, laden with wood, throw Breaks the rough wave ; the shivered surge rolls there baek, Their buoyant burdens, laboring so to gain Till, by the coming billow borne, it bursts Firm footing: some the mangonels supply, Again, and foams with ceaseless violence : Or charging with huge stones the murderous The wanderer, on the sunny elift outstretched, sling,145 llarks to the roaring surges, as they rock Or petrary, or in the espringal His weary senses to forgetfulness. Fix the brass-winged arrows : 146 hoarse around The uproar and the din of multitudes But nearer danger threats the invaders now, Arose. Along the ramparts Gargrave went, For on the ramparts, lowered from above The bridge reclines.¹⁵¹ A universal shout Cheering the English troops; a bow he bore; Rose from the hostile hosts. The exultant French The quiver rattled as he moved along. He knew aright to aim his feathered shafts, Break out in loud rejoicing, whilst the foe Well skilled to pierce the mottled roebuek's side, Raise a responsive ery, and call aloud O'ertaken in his speed. Him passing on, For speedy succor there, with deafening shout A ponderous stone from some huge martinet,147 Cheering their comrades. Not with louder din Struck : on his breastplate falling, the huge weight The mountain torrent flings precipitate Shattered the bone, and to his mangled lungs Its bulk of waters, though amid the fall Shattered, and dashing silvery from the rock. Drove in the fragments. On the gentle brow Of a fair hill, wood-eireled, stood his home, A stately mansion, far and wide from whenee Lo! on the bridge forth comes the undaunted man, The sight ranged unimpeded, and surveyed Conrade! the gathered foes along the wall Streams, hills, and forests, fair variety ! Throng opposite, and on him point their pikes, The traveller knew its hospitable towers, Cresting with armed men the battlements. For open were the gates, and blazed for all He undismayed, though on that perilous height, The friendly fire. By glory lured, the youth Stood firm, and hurled his javelin; the keen point Went forth; and he had bathed his falchion's edge Pierced through the destined victim, where his arm In many a Frenchman's blood; now crush'd beneath Joined the broad breast: a wound which skilful eare The ponderous fragments' force, his lifeless limbs Haply had healed; but, him disabled now Lie quivering For further service, the unpitying throng Lo! towards the levelled moat, Of his tumultuous comrades from the wall A moving tower, the men of Orleans wheel 148 Thrust headlong. Nor did Conrade cease to throw Four stages elevate. Above was hung, His deadly javelins fast, for well within Equalling the walls, a bridge ; in the lower stage The tower was stored with weapons, to his hand A battering-ram : within a chosen troop Quickly supplied. Nor did the missioned Maid Of archers, through the opening, shot their Rest idle from the combat; she, secure, shafts.149 Aimed the keen quarrel; taught the crossbow's use In the loftiest part was Conrade, so prepared By the willing mind that what it well desires To mount the rampart; for, no hunter he, Gains aptly : nor amid the numerous throng,

Though haply erring from their destined mark,

Sped her sharp arrows frustrate. From the tower

He loved to see the dappled foresters

Browze fearless on their lair, with friendly eye,

BOOK VIII.

Ceaseless the bow-strings twang: the knights below, Each by his pavais bulwarked, thither aimed Their darts, and not a dart fell woundless there; So thickly thronged they stood, and fell as fast As when the monarch of the East goes forth From Gemna's banks and the proud palaces Of Delhi, the wild monsters of the wood Die in the blameless warfare : closed within The still-contracting circle, their brute force Wasting in mutual rage, they perish there, Or by each other's fury lacerate, The archer's barbed arrow, or the lance Of some bold youth of his first exploits vain, Rajah or Omrah, in the war of beasts Venturous, and learning thus the love of blood.

Shouts of alarm ring now along the wall, For now the French their scaling-ladders place, And bearing high their bucklers, to the assault Mount fearless: from above the furious troops Fling down such weapons as inventive care Or frantic rage supplies: huge stones and beams Crush the assailants; some, thrust from the height, Fall living to their death; tormented, some, And writhing wildly as the liquid lead Consumes their flesh, leap desperately down, To end their pain by death. Still others mount, And by their fellows' fate unterrified, Still dare the perilous way. Nor dangerless To the English was the fight, though where they stood The vantage-place was theirs; for them amidst Fast fled the arrows there ; and brass-wing'd darts,

There driven resistless from the espringal, Keeping their impulse even in the wound, Whirl as they pierce the victim.¹⁵³ Some fall crush'd

Beneath the ponderous fragment that descends The heavier from its height: some the long lance, Whizzing impetuous on its viewless way, Transfix'd. The cannon ever and anon With thunder rent the air; conflicting shouts And war-cries French and English rung around, And Saints and Devils were invoked in prayers And excertions, Heaven and Hell adjured.

Conrade, meantime, who stood upon the bridge, With many a well-aim'd javelin dealing death, Made way upon the rampart, and advanced With wary valor o'er his slaughter'd foes. Two youths, the boldest of the English host, Essay'd to thrust him from that perilous height; At once they press'd upon him : he, his axe Dropping, the dagger drew : one through the throat He pierced, and swinging his broad buckler round, Struck down his comrade. Even thus unmoved, Stood Corineus 153 the sire of Guendolen, When, grappling with his monstrous enemy, He the brute vastness held aloft, and bore, And headlong hurl'd, all shatter'd to the sea, Down from the rock's high summit, since that day Him, hugest of the giants, chronicling, Called Langoemagog.

Behold, the Maid Bounds o'er the bridge, and to the wind displays Her hallowed banner. At that welcome sight A general shout of acclamation rose, And loud, as when the trumpest-tossing forest Roars to the roaring wind. Then terror seized The garrison; and fired anew with hope, The fierce assailants to their prize rush on Resistless. Vainly do their English foes Hurl there their beams, and stones, and javelins, And firebrands; fearless in the escalade, The assailants mount, and now upon the wali Wage equal battle.

Burning at the sight With indignation, Glacidas beheld His troops fly scatter'd; fast on every side The foe up-rushing eager to their spoil; The holy standard waving; and the Maid Fierce in pursuit. "Speed but this arrow, Heaven!"

The chief exclaim'd, "and I shall fall content." So saying, he his sharpest quartel chose, And fix'd the bow-string, and against the Maid Levelling, let loose : her arm was raised on high To smite a fugitive ; he glanced aside, Shunning her deadly stroke, and thus received The chieftain's arrow : through his ribs it pass'd, And cleft that vessel whence the purer blood Through many a branching channel o'er the frame Meanders.

"Fool!" the exasperate knight exclaim'd, "Would she had slain thee! thou hast lived too long."

Again he aim'd his arbalist: the string Struck forceful: swift the erring arrow sped Guiltless of blood, for lightly o'er the court Bounded the warrior Virgin. Glacidas Levell'd his bow again; the fated shaft Fled true, and difficultly through the mail Pierced to her neck, and tinged its point with blood "She bleeds! she bleeds!" exulting cried the chief;

"The sorceress bleeds ! nor all her hellish arts Can charm my arrows from their destin'd course." Ill-fated man ! in vain with eager hand Placing thy feather'd quarrel in its groove, Dream'st thou of Joan subdued ! She from her neck Plucking the shaft unterrified, exclaim'd, "This is a favor ! ¹⁵⁴ Frenchmen, let us on ' Escape they cannot from the hand of God

But Conrade, rolling round his angry eyes, Beheld the English chieftain as he arm'd Again the bow: with rapid step he strode; And Glacidas, perceiving his approach, At him the quarrel turn'd, which vainly sent, Fell blunted from his buckler. Conrade came And lifting high the deadly battle-axe,

Through pouldron and through shoulder deeply driven

Buried it in his bosom: prone he fell; The cold air rush'd upon his heaving heart. One whose low lineage gave no second name Was Glacidas,¹⁵⁵ a gallant man; and still His memory in the records of the foe Survives.

And now, dishearten'd at his fall,

The vanquish'd English fly towards the gate, She said : when Conrade cast his eyes around, Seeking the inner court, 156 as yet in hope And saw from man to man where Francis ran, To abide a second siege, and with their friends Bidding them spare the vanquish'd; him he hail'd. Find present refuge there. Mistaken men ! "The Maid hath bade me choose a leader forth The vanquish'd have no friends! defeated thus, To guard the prisoners; thou shalt be the man: Press'd by pursuit, in vain with eager voice For thou wilt guard them with due diligence, They call their comrades in the suppliant tones Yet not forgetful of humanity." Of pity now, now with the bitter curse Of fruitless anger; they indeed within Meantime the garrison of that stronghold, Who, lest the French should enter, had exposed Fast from the ramparts cast upon the French Beams, stones, and javelins,-but the gate is Their comrades to the sword, sustain'd the siege barr'd, In desperate valor. Fast against the walls The huge portcullis down! The battering-ram was driven; the mangonels Then terror seized Plied at the ramparts fast; the catapults Their hopeless hearts: some, furious in despair, Drove there their dreadful darts; the war-wolves Turn on their foes; fear-palsied some await there The coming death; some drop the useless sword, Hurl'd their huge stones; and, through the kindled And cry for mercy. sky, Then the Maid of Arc The engines shower'd their sheets of liquid fire.157 Took pity on the vanquish'd; and she call'd Aloud, and cried unto the host of France, "Feel ye not, comrades, how the ramparts And bade them cease from slaughter. They obey'd shake?" The delegated Damsel. Some there were Exelaim'd a daring Englishman. " Our foes, Apart who communed murmuring, and of those In woman-like compassion, have dismiss'd Graville address'd her. " Prophetess! our troops A powerful escort, weakening thus themselves, Are few in number; and to well secure And giving us fair hope, in equal field, These many prisoners such a force demands, Of better fortune. Sorely here annoy'd, As should we spare might shortly make us need And slaughter'd by their engines from afar, The mercy we bestow ; not mercy then, We perish. Vainly may the soldier boast Rather to these our soldiers, cruelty. Undaunted courage and the arm of strength, Justice to them, to France, and to our king, If thus pent up, like some wild beast he falls, And that regard wise nature hath in each Mark'd for the hunter's arrows. Let us out Implanted of self-safety, all demand And meet them in the battle, man to man, Either to conquer, or at least to die Their deaths." "Foul fall such evil policy !" A soldier's death." The indignant Maid exclaim'd. "I tell thee, chief, "Nay, nay - not so," replied GOD is with us! hut GOD shall hide his face One of less hopeful courage. "Though they point From them, short-sighted they, as hard of heart, Their engines here, our archers not in vain Who, disregarding all that mitigates, Discharge their quarrels. Let the walls and works All that ennobles dreadful war, shed blood Still be defended; it will then be time Like water; who, in the deceitful scales To meet them in the battle man to man, Of worldly wisdom, dare to counterpoise When these shall fail us." The right with the expedient, and resolve Scarcely had he said, Without compunction, as the beam inclines When a huge stone, thrown from some petrary Smote him upon the breast, and with dismay Held in a faltering or a faithless hand. Fill'd all around; for as it shattered him, These men shall live to see their homes again, Some to be welcomed there with tears of joy His blood besprinkled them, and they beheld By those who to the latest hour of life His mangled lungs lie quivering. Will in their grateful prayers remember us. "Such the fate And when that hour shall come to us, that comes Of those who trust them to their walls' defence!' To all, how gladly should we then exchange Again exclaim'd the soldier: "Thus they fall, Renown, however splendid, for the thought Betray'd by their own fears. Courage alone That we have saved one victim from the sword,-Can save us." Nor to draw them from the fort If only one, - who begs for us from Heaven 'That mercy which to others we have shown !" Now needed eloquence ; with one accord They hade him lead the onset. Forth they rush'd Impetuous. With such fury o'er the plain, Turning to Conrade, then she said, "Do thou Swollen by the autumnal tempest, Vega rolls Appoint an escort for the prisoners. 'fhou need'st not be reminded they are men, His rapid waters, when the gathered storm, On the black heights of Hatteril bursting, swells Rather by fortune, or by fate, than choice,

> The tide of desolation. Then the Maid Spake to the Son of Orleans, " Let our troops Fall back, so shall the English in pursuit Leave this strong fortress, thus an easy prey."

Brought hither from their homes to work our bale, And for their own not less; but yielded thus Whom we must neither treat as enemies Nor trust as friends, but in safe-keeping hold, Both for their own security and ours."

Time was not for long counsel. From the court, Obedient to Dunois, the French retire As if at the irruption of their foes Dishearten'd; they, with shouts and loud uproar, Haste to their fancied conquest : Joan, the while Placing a small but gallant garrison, Bade them secure the gates ; then sallying forth, With such fierce onset charged them in the rear, That terror smote the English, and they wish'd Again that they might hide them in their walls Rashly abandoned, for now wheeling round Dunois attack'd their flank. All captainless, Ill-marshall'd, ill-directed, in vain rage They waste their furious efforts, falling fast Before the Maid's good falchion and the arm Of Conrade: loud was heard the mingled sound Of arms and men; the soil, that, trampled late By multitudes, sent up its stifling clouds Of dust, was miry now with human blood.

On the fort's summit Talbot mark'd the fight, And calling for his arms impatiently, Eager to issue forth, was scarce withheld; For now, dishearten'd and discomfited, The troops took flight.

Upon the bridge there stood A strong-built tower, commanding o'er the Loire. The traveller sometimes linger'd on his way, Marking the playful tenants of the stream, Seen in its shadow, stem the sea-ward tide; This had the invaders won in hard assault, Before the delegate of Heaven came forth And made them fear who never fear'd till then. Thither the English troops with hasty steps Retired, not utterly defeated yet, But mindful of defence: the garrison Them thus retreating saw, and open threw Their guarded gates, and on the Gallic host, Covering their vanquish'd fellows, pour'd their shafts.

Check'd in pursuit they stop. Then Graville cried, "III, Maiden, hast thou done ! those valiant troops Thy womanish pity has dismiss'd, with us Conjoin'd, might press upon the vanquish'd foe, Though aided thus, and plant the lilied flag Victorious on you tower."

"Dark-minded man !" The Maid of Orleans answer'd; "to act well Brings with itself an ample recompense. I have not rear'd the Oriflamme of death — ¹⁵⁸ Now God forbid! The banner of the Lord Is this, and come what will, me it behoves, Mindful of Him whose minister I am, To spare the fallen foe : that gracious God Sends me a messenger of mercy forth, Sends me to save this ravaged realm of France, To England friendly as to all the world, Orly to those an enemy, whose lust Of sway makes them the enemies of man."

She said, and suddenly threw off her helm; Her bosom heaved,—her cheek grew red,—her eves

Beam'd with a wilder lustre. "Thou dost deem That I have illy spared so large a band, Disabling from pursuit our weaken'd troops; — God is with us!" she cried — "God is with us! Our Champion manifest!"

Even as she spake, The tower, the bridge, and all its multitudes, Sunk with a mighty crash.¹³⁹

Astonishment

Seized on the French; an universal ery Of terror burst from them. Crush'd in the fall. Or by their armor hopelessly weigh'd down, Or while they plied their unencumber'd arms, Caught by some sinking wretch, who grasp'd them fast,

Shrieking they sunk, while frequent fragments huge Fell in the foaming current. From the fort Talbot beheld, and gnash'd his teeth, and cursed The more than mortal Virgin; whilst the towers Of Orleans echoed to the loud uproar,

And all who heard trembled, and cross'd their breasts,

And as they hasten'd to the city walls, Told fearfully their beads.

'T was now the hour When o'er the plain the fading rays of eve Their soher light effuse; when the lowing herd, Slow as they move to shelter, draw behind Their lengthening shadows; and toward his nest, As heavily he flaps the dewy air, The hoarse rook breathes his melancholy note. " Now then, Dunois, for Orleans!" cried the Maid " And give we to the flames these monuments Of sorrow and disgrace. The ascending flames Will to the dwellers of yon rescued town Rise with a joyful splendor, while the foe Behold and tremble."

As she spake, they ran To burn the forts; they shower their wild fire there, And high amid the gloom the ascending flames Blaze up; 160 then joyful of their finish'd toil The host retire. Hush'd is the field of fight As the calm'd ocean, when its gentle waves Heave slow and silent, wafting tranquilly The shatter'd fragments of some midnight wreck

THE NINTH BOOK.

FAR through the shadowy sky the ascending flames Stream'd their fierce torrents, by the gales of night Now curl'd, now flashing their long lightnings up That made the stars seem pale ; less frequent now Through the red volumes briefer splendors shot. And blacker waves roll'd o'er the darken 'o neaven. Dismay'd amid the forts which yet remain'd The invaders saw, and clamor'd for retreat, Deeming that aided by invisible powers The Maid went forth to conquer. Not a sound Moved on the air but fill'd them with vague dread Of unscen dangers; if a sudden blast Arose, through every fibre a deep fear Crept shivering, and to their expecting minds Silence itself was dreadful.¹⁶¹ One there was Who, learning wisdom in the hour of ill,

JOAN OF ARC.

BOOK IX.

Exclaim'd, "I marvel not that the Most High Hath hid his face from England ! Wherefore thus Quitting the comforts of domestic life, Came we to desolate this goodly land, Making the drench'd earth rank with human blood, Scatter pollution on the winds of Heaven? Oh! that the sepulchre had closed its jaws On the proud prelate, that blood-guilty man, Who, trembling for the church's ill-got wealth, Bade our Fifth Henry claim the crown of France ! 162 Oh! that the grave had swallow'd him, ere he Stirr'd up the sleeping elaim, and sent him forth To slaughter! Sure that holy hermit spake The Almighty's bidding,163 who in his career Of eonquest met the King, and bade him cease The work of death, before the wrath divine Fell heavy on his head. - Full soon it fell, And sunk him to the grave ; - and soon that wrath On us, alike in guilt, alike shall fall; For thousands and ten thousands, by the sword Cut off, and sent before the Eternal Judge, With all their unrepented crimes upon them, Cry out for vengeance; for the widow's groan, Though here she groan unpitied or unheard, Is heard in Heaven against us; o'er this land For hills of human slain, unsepulchred, Steam pestilence, and cloud the blessed sun ! The wrath of God is on us, - God hath raised This Prophetess, and goes before her path ; --Our brethren, vainly valiant, fall beneath them, Clogging with gore their weapons, or in the flood Whelm'd like the Egyptian tyrant's impious host, Mangled and swollen, their blacken'd careasses Float on the tainted current ! We remain, -For yet our rulers will pursue the war,-We still remain to perish by the sword, Soon to appear before the throne of God, Conscious, too late, of folly and of guilt, Uninjured, unprovoked, who dared to risk The life His goodness gave us, on the chance Of war, and in obedience to our chiefs Durst disobey our God."

Then terror seized The troops and late repentance ; and they thought The spirits of the mothers and their babes Famish'd at Roan sat on the clouds of night,¹⁶⁴ Circling the forts, to hail with gloomy joy The hour of vengeance.

Nor the English chiefs Heard these loud murmurs heedless; counselling They met despondent. Suffolk, now their chief, Since Salisbury fell, began.

"It now were vain Lightly of this our more than mortal foe To speak contemptuous. She hath vanquish'd us, Aided by Hell's leagued powers, nor aught avails Man unassisted 'gainst Infernal powers To dare the conflict.¹⁶⁵ Were it best remain Waiting the doubtful aid of Burgundy, Doubtful and still delay'd? or from this place, Scene of our shame, retreating as we may, Yet struggle to preserve the guarded towns Of the Orleannois?"

He eeased, and with a sigh, Struggling with pride that heaved his gloomy breast, Then the Maid started at that mortal sound,

Talbot replied, " Our council little boots; For by their numbers now made bold in fear 106 The soldiers will not fight; they will not heed Our vain resolves, heart-wither'd by the spells Of this accursed sorceress. Soon will come The expected host from England; even now Perchance the tall bark seuds across the deep That bears my son : young Talbot comes, - he comes To find his sire disgraeed ! But soon mine arm, By vengeance nerved, and shame of such defeat, Shall from the erest-fallen eourage of yon witch, Regain its ancient glory. Near the coast Best is it to retreat, and there expect The coming succor." Thus the warrior spake. Joy ran through all the troops,¹⁶⁷ as though retreat Were safety. Silently in order'd ranks They issue forth, favor'd by the thick clouds Which mantled o er the moon. With throbbing hearts Fearful they speeded on ; some in sad thoughts Of distant England, and now wise too late, Cursing in bitterness the evil hour That led them from her shores; some in faint hope Thinking to see their native land again; Talbot went musing on his former fame, Sullen and stern, and feeding on dark thoughts, And meditating vengeance. In the walls Of Orleans, though her habitants with joy Humbly acknowledged the high aid of Heaven, Of many a heavy ill and bitter loss Mindful, such mingled sentiments they felt As one from shipwreek saved, the first warm glow Of transport past, who contemplates himself Preserved alone, a solitary wretch, Possess'd of life indeed, but reft of all That makes man love to live. The chieftains shared The social bowl,¹⁶⁸ glad of the town relieved. And communing of that miraeulous Maid, Who came the savior of the realm of France, When, vanquish'd in the frequent field of shame, Her bravest warriors trembled. Joan the while Fasting and silent to the convent pass'd, Conrade with her, and Isabel; both mute, Yet gazing on her oft with anxious eyes, Looking the consolation that they fear'd To give a voice to. Now they reach'd the dome : The glaring torches o'er the house of death Stream'd a sad splendor. Flowers and funeral herbs Bedeek'd the bier of Theodore, - the rue, The dark green rosemary, and the violet,

The dark green rosemary, and the violet, That pluck'd like him wither d in its first bloom. Dissolved in sorrow, Isabel her grief Pour'd copiously, and Conrade also wept : Joan only shed no tears; from her fix'd eye Intelligence was absent; and she seem'd, Though listening to the dirge of death, to hear And eomprehend it not, till in the grave, — In his last home, — now Theodore was laid, And earth to earth upon the coffin thrown; Then the Maid started at that mortal sound,

BOOK IX.

JOAN OF ARC.

And her lip quiver'd, and on Isabel, Trembling and faint, she leant, and pale as death.

Then in the priest arose an earnest hope, That, weary of the world and sick with woe, The Maid might dwell with them a virgin vow'd. "Ah, damsel!" slow he spake, and cross'd his breast,

"Ah, damsel! favor'd as thou art of Heaven, Let not thy soul beneath its sorrow sink Despondent: Heaven by sorrow disciplines The froward heart, and chastens whom it loves. Therefore, companion of thy way of life, Shall sorrow wean thee from this faithless world, Where happiness provokes the traveller's chase, And like the midnight meteor of the marsh Allures his long and perilous pursuit, Then leaves him dark and comfortless. O Maid ! Fix thou thine eyes upon that heavenly dawn Beyond the night of life ! Thy race is run, Thou hast deliver'd Orleans: now perfect Thyself, accomplish all, and be the child Of God. Amid these sacred haunts the groan Of wee is never heard ; these hallow'd roofs Reecho only to the pealing quire, The chanted mass, and virgin's holy hymn, Celestial sounds ! Secluded here, the soul Receives a foretaste of her joys to come ; This is the abode of piety and peace ; Oh! be their inmate, Maideu! Come to rest, Die to the world, and live espoused to Heaven !"

Then Courade answered, "Father! Heaven has call'd

This Maid to active duties."

"Active !" cried The astonish'd Monk ; " thou dost not know the toils This holy warfare asks; thou dost not know How powerful the attacks that Satan makes By sinful Nature aided ! Dost thou think It is an easy task from the fond breast To root affection out? to burst the cords Which grapple to society the heart Of social man? to rouse the unwilling spirit, That, rebel to devotion, faintly pours The cold lip-worship of the wearying prayer? To fear and tremble at Him, yet to love A God of Terrors? Maid beloved of Heaven, Come to this sacred trial! share with us The day of penance and the night of prayer ! Humble thyself; feel thine own worthlessness, A reptile worm, before thy birth condemn'd To all the horrors of thy Maker's wrath, The lot of fallen mankind ! Oh, hither come ! Humble thyself in ashes. So thy name Shall live amid the blessed host of saints, And unborn pilgrims at thy hallowed shrine Pour forth their pious offerings.'

"Hear me, father!" Exclaim'd the awaken'd Maid. "Amid these tombs, Cold as their clayey tenants, know, my heart Must uever grow to stone! Chill thou thyself, And break thy midnight rest, and tell thy beads, And labor through thy still repeated prayer; Fear thou thy God of Terrors; spurn the gifts He gave, and sepulchre thyself alive! But far more valued is the vine that bends Beneath its swelling clusters, than the dark And joyless ivy, round the cloister's wall Wreathing its barren arms. For me, I know That I have faithfully obey'd my call, Confiding not in mine own strength, but His Who sent me forth to suffer and to do His will; and in that faith I shall appear Before the just tribunal of that God Whom grateful love has taught me to adore!"

Severe she spake, for sorrow in her heart Had wrought unwonted sternness. From the dome They pass'd in silence, when, with hasty steps, Seut by the chiefs, a messenger they met, Who, in alarm, the mission'd Virgin sought, A bearer of ill tidings.

" Holy Maid !"

He said, "they ask thy counsel. Burgundy Comes in the cause of England, and his troops Scarce three leagues from the walls, a fearful power, Rest tented for the night."

"Say to the chiefs, At moru I will be with them," she replied; "And to this urgency will give meantime My nightly thoughts."

So saying, on she went In thoughtful silence. A brief while she mused, Brief, but sufficing to excite her soul, As with a power and impulse not its own,

To some great purpose. "Conrade!" then she said, "I pray thee meet me at the eastern gate With a swift steed prepared, — for I must hence."

Her voice was calm, and Conrade through the gloom

Saw not the flush that witness'd on her cheek Inward emotion at some thought conceived. She to her quarters hastily repair'd, There with a light and unplumed casquetel ¹⁶⁹ She helm'd her head; hung from her neck the shield,¹⁷⁰

And forth she went. Her Conrade by the gate Awaited. "May I, Maiden, ask unblamed Whither this midnight journey? may I share The peril?" cried the warrior. She rejoin'd, "This, Conrade, must not be. Alone I go. That impulse of the soul which comes from God Sends me. But thou of this remain assured, If aught that I must enterprise required Associate firmness, thou shoulds the the man, Best, — last, — and only friend!"

So up she sprung And left him. He beheld the warden close The gate, and listen'd to her courser's tramp, Till soon upon his ear the far-off sound Fell faintly, and was lost.

Swift o'er the vale Sped the good courser; eagerly the Maid Gave the loose rein; and now her speed attain'd The dark encampment. Through the sleeping ranks

Onward she past. The trampling of her steed

Or mingled with the soldier's busy dreams, Or with vague terrors fill'd his startled sense, Prompting a secret prayer.

So on she past To where in loftier shade arose the tent Of Burgundy : light leaping from her seat She enter'd.

On the earth the chieftain slept, His mantle searft around him; near him hung His helmet and his shield, and at his side Within hand-reach his sword. Profound he slept, Nor heard the coming courser's sounding hoof, Nor entering footstep. "Burgundy!" she cried, "What, Burgundy ! awake !" He started up, And saw the gleam of arms, and to his sword Reach'd a quick hand. But what he now beheld Thrill'd him, for full upon her face the lamp Cast its deep glare, and in her solemn look Was an unearthly meaning. Pale she was; And in her eye a saintly lustre beam'd, And that most ealm and holiest confidence That guilt knows never. " Burgundy, thou seest THE MAID OF ORLEANS !"

As she spake, a voice Exclaim'd, "Die, sorceress!" and a knight rush'd in,

Whose name by her illustrated yet lives, Franquet of Arras. With uplifted arm Furious he came; her buckler broke the blow, And forth she flash'd her sword, and with a stroke Swift that no eye could ward it, and of strength No mail might blunt, smote on his neck, his neck Unfenced, for he in haste aroused had east An armet¹⁷¹ on; resistless there she smote, And to the earth prone fell the headless trunk Of Franquet.

Then on Burgundy she fix'd Her eye severe. "Go, chief, and thank thy God That he with lighter judgments visits thee Than fell on Sisera, or by Judith's hand He wrought upon the Assyrian! Thank thy God, That when his vengeance smote the invading sons Of England, equal though thou wert in guilt, Thee he has spar'd to work by penitence And better deeds atonement."

Thus she spake, Then issued forth, and bounding on her steed Sped o'er the plain. Dark on the upland bank The hedge-row trees distinct and colorless Rose on the gray horizon, and the Loire Form'd in its winding way islands of light Amid the shadowy vale, when now she reach'd The walls of Orleans.

From the eastern clouds The sun came forth, as to the assembled chiefs The Maiden pass'd. Her bending thitherwards The Bastard met. "Now perils threaten us," He said, "new toils await us; Burgundy, —"

"Fear not for Burgundy!" the Maid replied, "Him will the Lord direct. Our earliest secuts Shall tell his homeward march. What of the troops Of England?"

"They," the Son of Orleans cried, "By darkness favor'd, fled; yet not by flight Shall these invaders now escape the arm Of retribution. Even now our troops, By battle unfatigned, unsatisfied With conquest, clamor to pursue the foe."

The delegated Damsel thus replied : "So let them fly, Dunois ! But other work Than that of battle, now must be perform'd. We move not in pursuit, till we have paid The rites of burial to our countrymen, And hymn'd our gratitude to that All-just Who gave the victory. Thou, meantime, despatch Tidings to Chinon : let the King set forth, That crowning him before assembled France, In Rheims delivered from the enemy, I may accomplish all."

So said the Maid, Then to the gate moved on. The assembled troops Beheld her coming, and they smote their shields, And with one voice of greeting bless'd her name, And pray'd her to pursue the flying foe. She waved her hand, and silently they stood, Attentive while she spake; — "Fellows in arms! We must not speed to joyful victory, And leave our gallant comrades where they lie, For dogs, and wolves, and carrion-birds a prey; Ere we advance, let us discharge to them The duty that is due."

So said the Maid; And as she spake, the thirst of battles dies In every breast, such awe and love pervade The listening troops. They o'er the corse-strewn plain Speed to their sad employment: some dig deep The house of death; some bear the lifeless load; Others the while search carefully around, If haply they may find surviving yet Some wounded wretches. As they labor thus, They mark far off the iron-blaze of arms; See distant standards waving on the air, And hear the elarion's clang. Then spake the Maid To Conrade, and she bade him haste to espy The coming army; or to meet their march With friendly greeting, or if foes they came With such array of battle as short space Allow'd: the warrior sped across the plain, And soon beheld the banner'd lilies wave.

Their chief was Richemont: he when as he heard What rites employed the Virgin, straightway bads His troops assist in burial; they, though grievea At late arrival, and the expected day Of conquest past, yet give their willing aid: They dig the general grave, and thither bear English or French, alike commingled now, And heap the mound of death.

Amid the plain

There was a little eminence, of old Raised o'er some honored chieftain's narrow house. His praise the song had ceased to celebrate, And many an unknown age had the long grass Waved o'er that nameless mound, though barren now

Beneath the frequent tread of multitudes There elevate, the martial Maiden stood, BOOK X.

Her brow unhelm'd, and floating on the wind Her long, dark locks. The silent troops around Stood thickly throng'd, as o'er the fertile field Billows the ripen'd corn. The passing breeze Bore not a murmur from the numerous host, Such deep attention held them. She began.

"Glory to those who in their country's cause Fall in the field of battle ! Countrymen, I stand not here to mourn these gallant men, Our comrades, nor, with vain and idle phrase Of sorrow and compassion, to console The friends who loved them. They indeed who fall Beneath oppression's banner, merit well Our pity; may the God of Peace and Love Be merciful to those blood-guilty men Who came to desolate the realm of France, To make us bow the knee, and crouch like slaves Before a foreign master. Give to these, And to their wives and orphan little ones That on their distant father vainly cry For bread, give these your pity !- Wretched men, Forced or inveigled from their homes, or driven By need and hunger to the trade of blood; Or, if with free and willing mind they came, Most wretched, - for before the eternal throne, Guilty alike in act and will, they stand. But our dead comrades for their country fought; No arts they needed, nor the specious bribes Of promise, to allure them to this fight, This holy warfare ! them their parents sent, And as they raised their streaming eyes to Heaven, Bade them go forth, and from the ruffian's sword Save their gray hairs : them their dear wives sent out.

Fix'd their last kisses on their armed hands,¹⁷² And bade them in the battle think they fought For them and for their children. Thus inflamed, By every milder feeling, they went forth : They fought, they conquer'd. To this holy ground The men of Orleans in the days to come Shall bring their boys, and tell them of the deeds Their countrymen achieved, and bid them learn Like them to love their country, and like them, Should usurpation pour again its tide Of desolation, to step forth and stem, Fearless, the furious torrent. Men of France, Mourn not for these our comrades ! boldly they Fought the good fight, and that Eternal One, Who bade the Angels harbinger his Word With ' Peace on earth,' rewards them. We survive, Honoring their memories to avenge their fall Upon the unjust invaders. They may drain Their kingdom's wealth and lavishly expend Its blood, insanely thinking to subdue This wide and populous realm; for easier were it To move the ancient mountains from their base, Than on a nation knowing its own strength To force a foreign yoke. France then is safe. My glorious mission soon will be fulfill'd, My work be done. But, oh ! remember ye, And in their generation let your sons Transmit to theirs the all-concerning truth, That a great people, wrongfully assail'd, If faithful to themselves, and resolute

In duty to the last, betide what may, — Although no signs be given, no miracles Vouchsafed, as now, no Prophetess ordain'd, May yet with hope invineible hold on, Relying on their courage, and their cause, And the sure course of righteous Providence."

THE TENTH BOOK.

THUS to the martyrs in their country's cause The Maiden gave their fame; and when she ceased, Such murmur from the multitude arose, As when at twilight honr the summer breeze Moves o'er the cimy vale. There was not one Who mourn'd with feeble sorrow for his friend, Slain in the fight of freedom; or if chance Remembrance with a tear suffused the eye, The patriot's joy shone through.

And now the rites Of sepulture perform'd, the hymn to Heaven They chanted. To the town the Maid return'd, Dunois with her, and Richemont, and the man Conrade, whose converse most the Virgin loved. They of pursuit and of the future war Sat communing; when loud the trumpet's voice Proclaim'd a herald's coming.

" To the Maid," -Such was his errand, - " and to thee, Dunois, Son of the chief he loved, Du Chastel sends Greeting. The aged warrior hath not spared All active efforts to partake your toil, And serve his country; and though late arrived, He share not in the fame your arms acquire, His heart is glad that he is late arrived, And France preserved thus early. He were here To join your host, and follow the pursuit, But Richemont is his foe. To that high Lord Thus says my master : We, though each to each Be hostile, are alike the embattled sons Of our dear country. Therefore do thou join The conquering troops, and prosecute success; I will the while assault what guarded towns Bedford yet holds in Orleannois : one day, Perhaps the Constable of France may learn He wrong'd Du Chastel."

As the herald spake, Richemont's check redden'd, partly with a sense Of shame, and partly anger half supprest. "Say to thy master," eagerly he said, "I am the foe of those court parasites Who poison the King's ear. Him who shall serve Our country in the field, I hold my friend : Such may Du Chastel prove."

So said the chief

And pausing as the herald went his way, Turn'd to the Virgin: "If I guess aright, It is not from a friendly tongue's report, That thou hast heard of me."

Dissembling not The unwelcome truth, "Yes, chieftain!" she "Report bespeaks thee haughty, violent, replied,

Suffering no rival, brooking no control, And executing by unrighteous means The judgments of thine own unlawful will."

"But hear me, Maid of Orleans!" he exclaim'd: "Should the wolf enter thy defenceless flock, Were it a crime if thy more mighty force Destroy'd the fell destroyer? If thy hand Had slain a ruthan as he burst thy door Prepared for midnight murder, should'st thou feel The weight of blood press heavy on thy soul? I slew the wolves of state, the murderers Of thousands. Joan! when rusted in its sheath The sword of justice hung, blamest thou the man That lent his weapon for the righteous deed?"

Conrade replied, "Nay, Richemont, it were well To slay the ruffian as he burst thy doors; But if he bear the plunder safely thence, And thou should'st meet him on the future day, Vengeance must not be thine : there is the law To punish; and the law alloweth not, That the accuser take upon himself The judge's part; still less doth it allow That he should execute upon the accused Untried, unheard, a sentence, which so given Becomes, whate'er the case, itself a crime."

"Thou hast said wisely," cried the Constable; "But there are guilty ones above the law, Men whose black crimes exceed the utmost bound Of private guilt; court vermin that buzz round, And fly-blow the King's car, and make him waste, In this most perilous time, his people's wealth And blood; immersed one while in sensual sloth, Heedless though ruin threat the realm they rule ; And now projecting some mad enterprise, Sending their troops to sure defeat and shame. These are the men who make the King suspect His wisest, faithfulest, best counsellors; And for themselves and their dependents, seize All places, and all profits ; and they wrest To their own ends the statutes of the land, Or safely break them; thus, or indolent, Or active, rninous alike to France. Wisely thou sayest, warrior, that the Law Should strike the guilty; but the voice of Justice Cries out, and brings conviction as it cries, Whom the laws cannot reach, the dagger should."

The Maid replied, "It seemeth then, O Chief, That reasoning to thine own conviction thus, Thou standest self-acquitted of all wrong, Self-justified, yea, self-approved. I ask not Whether this public zeal hath look'd askaunt To private ends; men easily deceive Others, and oft more easily themselves. But what if one reasoning as thou hast done Had in like course proceeded to the act, One of the people, one of low degree, In whom the strong desire of public good Had grown to be his one sole sleepless thought, A passion, and a madness; raised as high Above all sordid motives as thyself; Beneath such impulses of rivalry

And such amhitious projects, as perforce Men will impute to thee? had such a man Stood forth the self-appointed minister To execute his own decrees of death. The law on him had rightfully enforced That sentence, which the Almighty hath enjoin'd Of life for life. Thou, chief, art 'oy thy rank And power exempted from the penalty: What then hast thou exampled, --- right and wrong Confounding thus, and making lawless might The judge in its own quarrel? Trust me, chief, That if a people sorely are oppress'd, The dreadful hour of overthrow will come Too surely and too soon! He best meanwhile Performs the sage's and the patriot's part, Who in the ear of rage and faction breathes The healing words of love.'

Thus communed they. Meantime, all panic-struck and terrified. The English urge their flight; by other thoughts Possess'd than when, elate with arrogance, They dreamt of conquest, and the crown of France At their disposal. Of their hard-fought fields, Of glory hardly earn'd, and lost with shame, Of friends and brethren slaughter'd, and the fate Threatening themselves, they brooded sadly, now Repentant late and vainly. They whom fear Erst made obedient to their conquering march, Rise on them in defeat, while they retire, Marking their path with ruin, day by day Leaving the weak and wounded destitute To the foe's mercy; thinking of their home, Though to that far-off prospect scarcely hope Could raise a siekly eye. Oh then what joy Inspired anew their bosoms, when, like clouds Moving in shadows down the distant hill, They saw their coming succors ! In each heart Doubt raised a busy tumult; soon they knew The English standard, and a general shout Burst from the joyful ranks : yet came no joy To Talbot: he, with dark and downward brow, . Mused sternly, till at length aroused to hope Of vengeance, welcoming his gallant son, He brake a sullen smile.173

"Son of my age, Welcome young Talbot to thy first of fields. Thy father bids thee welcome, though disgraced, Baffled, and flying from a woman's arm ! Yes, by my former glories, from a woman ! The sconrge of France, the conqueror of men, Flying before a woman ! Son of Talbot, Had the winds wafted thee a few days sooner, Thou hadst seen me high m honor, and thy name Alone had scatter'd armies; yet, my son, I bid thee welcome ! here we rest our flight-And face again the foe "

So spake the chief; And well he counsell'd: for not yet the sun Had reach'd meridian height, when o'er the plain Of Patay, they beheld the troops of France Speed in pursuit. Soon as the troops of France Beheld the dark battalions of the foe Shadowing the distant plain, a general shout Burst from the expectant host, and on they pres: Elate of heart and eager for the fight,

With clamors ominous of victory.

JOAN OF ARC.

Thus urging on, one from the adverse host Advanced to meet them: they his garb of peace Knew, and they halted as the herald spake His bidding to the chieftains. "Sirs!" he cried, "I bear defiance to you from the Earl William of Suffolk. Here on this fit ground, He wills to give you battle, power to power, So please you, on the morrow." "On the morrow We will join battle then," replied Dunois, "And God befriend the right!" Then on the herald A robe rich-furr'd and embroider'd he bestow'd,¹⁷⁴ A costly gnerdon. Through the army spread The unwelcome tidings of delay; possess'd With agitating hopes they felt the hours Pass heavily; but soon the night waned on, And the loud trumpets' blare from broken sleep Ronsed them; a second time the thrilling blast Bade them be arm'd, and at the third long sound They ranged them in their ranks.¹⁷⁵ From man to man With pions haste hurried the confessors To shrive them,¹⁷⁶ lest with souls all unprepared They to their death might go. Dunois meantime Rode through the host, the shield of dignity 177 Before him borne, and in his hand he held The white wand of command. The open helm Disclosed that eye which temper'd the strong lines Of steady valor, to obedient awe Winning the will's assent. To some he spake Of late-earn'd glory ; others, new to war, He bade bethink them of the feats achieved When Talbot, recreant to his former fame, Fled from beleaguer'd Orleans. Was there one Whom he had known in battle? by the hand Him did he take, and bid him on that day " Summon his wonted courage, and once more Support his chief and comrade. Happy he

Who caught his eye, or from the chieftain's lips Heard his own name! joy more inspiriting Fills not the Persian's soul, when sure he deems That Mithra hears propitionsly his prayer, And o'er the seattered cloud of morning pours A brighter ray responsive.

Then the host Partook due food, this their last meal belike Receiving with such thoughtful doubts as make The soul, impatient of uncertainty, Rush eager to the event; being thus prepared, Upon the grass the soldiers laid themselves, Each in his station, waiting there the sound Of onset, that in undiminish'd strength Strong, they might meet the battle;¹⁷³ silent some Pondering the chances of the coming day, Some whiling with a careless gayety The fearful pause of action.

Thus the French In such array and high in confident hope Await the signal; whilst with other thoughts, And ominous awe, once more the invading host Prepare them in the field of fight to meet The Prophetess. Collected in himself Appear'd the might of Talbot. Through the ranks lle stalks, reminds them of their former fame, Their native land, their homes, the friends they loved,

All the rewards of this day's victory. But awe had fill'd the English, and they struck Faintly their shields; for they who had beheid The hallowed banner with celestial light Irradiate, and the mission'd Maiden's deeds, Felt their hearts sink within them at the thought Of her near vengeance; and the tale they told Roused such a tumult in the new-come troops, As fitted them for fear. The aged Earl Beheld their drooping valor, and his brow, Wrinkled with thought, bewray'd his inward donbts:

Still he was firm, though all might fly, resolved That Talbot should retrieve his old renown, And end his life with glory. Yet some hope Inspired the veteran, as, across the plain Casting his eye, he mark'd the embattled strength Of thousands; archers of unequalled skill, Brigans and pikemen, from whose lifted points A fearful radiance flash'd, and young esquires, And high-born warriors, bright in blazon'd arms.

Nor few, nor fameless were the English chiefs. In many a field victorions, he was there, The garter'd Fastolffe; Hungerford, and Scales, Men who had seen the hostile squadrons fly Before the arms of England; Suffolk there, The haughty chieftain, tower'd ; blest had he fallen Ere yet a courtly minion he was mark'd By public hatred, and the murderer's guilt! There too the son of Talbot, young in arms, Heir of a noble race and mighty name : At many a tilt and tournament had he Approved his skill and prowess; confident In strength, and jealous of his future fame, His heart beat high for battle. Such array Of marshall'd numbers fought not on the field Of Cressy, nor at Poietiers; nor such force Led Henry to the fight of Agincourt, When thousands fell before him.

Onward move

The host of France. It was a goodly sight To see the embattled pomp, as with the step Of stateliness the barded steeds came on, — To see the pennons rolling their long waves Before the gale, and banners broad and bright ¹⁷⁹ Tossing their blazonry, and high-plumed chiefs, Vidames, ¹⁵⁰ and Seneschalls, and Chastellains, Gay with their buckler's gorgeons heraldry, And silken surcoats to the mid-day sun Glittering.¹⁸¹

And now the knights of France dismount, For not to brutal strength they deem'd it right To trust their fame and their dear country's weal;¹⁸² Rather to manly conrage, and the glow Of honorable thoughts, such as inspire Ennobling energy. Unhorsed, unspur'd, Their javelins shorten'd to a wieldy length,¹⁸³ They to the foe advanced. The Maid alone, Conspicuous on a coal-black courser, meets The war. They moved to battle with such sound As rushes o'er the vaulted firmament,

56 JOAN O	OF ARC. BOOK X.
When from his seat, on the utmost verge of heaven	By the random arrow's point, or fierce-thrust lance,
That overhangs the void, the Sire of Winds,	Or siss, all battered by the ponderous mace:
Hræsvelger starting, ¹⁸⁴ rears his giant hulk,	Some from their coursers thrown, lie on the earth,
And from his eagle pinions shakes the storm.	Helpless because of arms, that weak to save, Lengthened the lingering agonies of death.
High on her stately steed the martial Maid	But most the English fell, by their own fears
Rode foremost of the war; her burnish'd arms	Betray'd, for fear the evil that it dreads
Shone like the brook that o'er its pebbled course	Increaseth. Even the chiefs, who many a day
Runs glittering gayly to the noon-tide sun.	Had met the war and conquer'd, trembled now,
The foaming courser, of her guiding hand	Appall'd before the Maid miraculous.
Impatient, smote the earth, and toss'd his mane,	As the blood-nurtur'd monarch of the wood,
And rear'd aloft with many a froward bound,	That o'er the wilds of Afric in his strength
Then answered to the rein with such a step,	Resistless ranges, when the mutinous clouds
As, in submission, he were proud to show	Burst, and the lightnings through the midnight sky
His spirit unsubdued. Slow on the air	Dart their red fires, lies fearful in his den,
Waved the white plumes that shadow'd o'er her helm.	And howls in terror to the passing storm.
Even such, so fair, so terrible in arms,	But Talbot, fearless where the bravest fear'd,
Pelides moved from Seyros, where, conceal'd,	Mow'd down the hostile ranks. The chieftain stood
He lay obedient to his mother's fears	Like a strong oak, amid the tempest's rage,
A scenily damsel; thus the youth appear'd	That stands unharm'd, and while the forest falls
Terribly graceful, when upon his neck	Uprooted round, lifts his high head aloft,
Deidameia hung, and with a look	And nods majestic to the warring wind.
That spake the tumult of her troubled soul,	He fought, resolved to snatch the shield of death ¹⁸⁶
Fear, anguish, and upbraiding tenderness,	And shelter him from shame. The very herd
Gazed on the father of her unborn babe,	Who fought near Talbot, though the Virgin's name Made their cheeks pale and drove the curdling blood
An English knight, who, eager for renown, Late left his peaceful mansion, mark'd the Maid. Her power miraculous and portentous deeds	Back to their hearts, caught from his daring deeds New force, and went like eaglets to the prey
Her power inflations and porchous accus He from the troops had heard incredulous, And scoff'd their easy fears, and vow'd that he,	Beneath their mother's wing: to him they look'd, Their tower of strength, ¹⁸⁷ and follow'd where his
Proving the magic of this dreaded girl	sword
In equal battle, would dissolve the spell,	Made through the foe a way. Nor did the son
Powerless opposed to valor. Forth he spurr'd	Of Talbot shame his lineage; by his sire
Before the ranks; she mark'd the coming foe,	Emulous he strove, like the young lionet
And fix'd her lance in rest, and rush'd along.	When first he bathes his murderous jaws in blood. They fought intrepid, though amid their ranks
Midway they met; full on her buckler driven, Shiver'd the English spear: her better force Drove the brave foeman senseless from his seat.	Fear and confusion triumph'd; for such dread Possess'd the English, as the Etruscans felt,
Headlong he fell, nor ever to the sense	When self-devoted to the infernal gods The awful Decius stood before the troops,
Of shame awoke; for crowding multitudes	Robed in the victim garb of sacrifice,
Soon crush'd the helpless warrior.	And spake aloud, and call'd the shadowy powers
Then the Maid	To give to Rome the conquest, and receive
Rode through the thickest battle; fast they fell,	Their willing prey; then rush'd amid the foc,
Pierced by her forceful spear. Amid the troops Plunged her strong war-horse, by the noise of arms	And died upon the hecatombs he slew.
Elate and roused to rage, he tramples o'er, Or with the lance protended from his front, ¹⁸⁵ Thrusts down the thronging squadrons. Where she turns,	But hope inspired the assailants. Xaintrailles there Spread fear and death, and Orleans' valiant son
The foe tremble and die. Such ominous fear	Fought as when Warwick fled before his arm.
Seizes the traveller o'er the trackless sands,	O'er all preëminent for hardiest deeds
Who marks the dread Simoom across the waste	Was Conrade. Where he drove his battle-axe,
Sweep its swift pestilence : to earth he falls,	Weak was the buckler or the helm's defence,
Nor dares give utterance to the inward prayer,	Hanberk, or plated mail; through all it pierced, Resistless as the fork'd flash of heaven.
Deeming the Genins of the desert breathes The purple blast of death.	The death-doom'd foe, who mark'd the coming chief,
Such was the sound	Felt such a chill run through his shivering frame,
As when a tempest, mingling air and sea,	As the night-traveller of the Pyrenees,
Flies o'er the uptorn ocean : dashing high	Lone and bewilder'd on his wintry way,
Their foamy heads amid the incumbent clouds,	When from the mountains round reverberates
The madden'd billows with their deafening roar Drown the loud thunder's peal. In every form Of horror, death was there. They fal., transfix'd	The hungry wolves' deep yell: on every side, Their fierce eyes gleaming as with meteor fires,

The famish'd pack come round; the affrighted Careering fierce in conquest, and the hope mule Of glory rose within him. Her to meet

Snorts loud with terror, on his shuddering limbs The big sweat starts, convulsive pant his sides, Then on he gallops, wild in desperate speed. Him dealing death an English knight beheld, And spurr'd his steed to crush him: Conrade leap'd Lightly aside, and through the warrior's greaves Fix'd a deep wound: nor longer could the foc, Disabled thus, command his mettled horse, Or his rude plunge endure ; headlong he fell, And perish'd. In his castle hall was hung On high his father's shield, with many a dint Graced on the glorious field of Agincourt. His deeds the son had heard; and when a boy, Listening delighted to the old man's tale, His little hand would lift the weighty spear In warlike pastime : he had left behind An infant offspring, and had fondly deem'd He too in age the exploits of his youth Should tell, and in the stripling's bosom rouse The fire of glory.

Conrade the next foe Smote where the heaving membrane separates The chambers of the trunk. The dying man, In his lord's castle dwelt, for many a year, A well-beloved servant: he could sing Carols for Shrove-tide, or for Candlemas, Songs for the wassail, and when the boar's head, Crown'd with gay garlands and with rosemary, Smoked on the Christmas board: ¹⁸⁵ he went to war Following the lord he loved, and saw him fall Beneath the arm of Conrade, and expired, Slain on his master's body.

Nor the fight Was doubtful long. Fierce on the invading host Press the French troops impetuous, as of old, When pouring o'er his legion slaves on Greece, The castern despot bridged the Hellespont, The rushing sea against the mighty pile Roll'd its full weight of waters; far away The fearful Satrap mark'd on Asia's coasts The floating fragments, and with ominous fear Trembled for the great king.

Still Talbot strove, His foot firm planted, his uplifted shield Feneing that breast which never yet had known The throb of fear. But when the warrior's eye, Glancing around the fight, beheld the Freneh Pressing to conquest, and his heartless troops Striking with feebler force in backward step, Then o'er his cheek he felt the indignant flush Of shame, and loud he lifted up his voice, And cried, "Fly, cravens! leave your aged chief Here in the front to perish! his old limbs Are not like yours, so supple in the flight.¹⁸⁹ Go tell your countrymen how ye escaped When Talbot fell!"

In vain the warrior spake; In the uproar of the fight his voice was lost; And they, the nearest, who had heard, beheld The Prophetess approach, and every thought Was overwhelm'd in terror. But the son Of Talbot mark'd her thus across the plain

Careering fierce in conquest, and the hope Of glory rose within him. Her to meet He spurr'd his horse, by one decisive deed Or to retrieve the battle, or to fall With honor. Each beneath the other's blow Bow'd down; their lances shiver'd with the shock: To earth their coursers fell: at once they rose, He from the saddle-bow his falchion caught ¹⁹⁰ Rushing to closer combat, and she bared The lightning of her sword.¹⁹¹ In vain the youth Essay'd to pierce those arms which even the power Of time was weak to injure: she the while Through many a wound beheld her foeman's blood

Ooze fast. "Yet save thyself!" the Maiden cried. "Me thou canst not destroy: be timely wise, And live!" He answer'd not, but lifting high His weapon, smote with fierce and forceful arm Full on the Virgin's helm: fire from her eyes Flash'd with the stroke: one step she back recoil'd, Then in his breast plunged deep the sword of death.

Talbot beheld his fall; on the next foe, With rage and anguish wild, the warrior turn'd; His ill-directed weapon to the earth Drove down the unwounded Frank: he strikes again,

And through his all-in-vain imploring hands Cleaves the poor suppliant. On that dreadful day The sword of Talbot,¹⁹² clogg'd with hostile gore, Made good its vaunt. Amid the heaps his arm Had slain, the chieftain stood and sway'd around His furious strokes: nor ceased he from the fight, Though now, disconfited, the English troops Fled fast, all panie-struck and spiritless, And mingling with the routed, Fastolffe fled, Fastolffe, all fierce and haughty as he was,¹⁹³ False to his former fame; for he beheld The Maiden rushing onward, and such fear Ran through his frame, as thrills the African, When, grateful solace in the sultry hour, He rises on the buoyant billow's breast, And then beholds the inevitable shark Close on him, open-mouth'd.

But Talbot now A moment paused, for bending thitherward He mark'd a warrior, such as well might ask His utmost force. Of strong and stately port The onward foeman moved, and bore on high A battle-axe,¹⁰⁴ in many a field of blood Known by the English chieftain. Over heaps Of slanghter'd, he made way, and bade the troops Retire from the bold Earl: then Contrade spake. "Vain is thy valor, Talbot! look around, See where thy squadrons fly! but thou shalt lose No honor, by their cowardice subducd, Performing well thyself the soldier's part."

"And let them fly !" the indignant Earl exclaim'd,

"And let them fly! and bear thon witness, chief That guiltless of this day's disgrace, 1 fall. But, Frenchman! Talbot will not tamely fall, Nor unrevenged."

So saying, for the war

He stood prepared : nor now with heedless rage	His master's arms, "Alas! and is it you,
The champions fought, for either knew full well	My lord?" he cried. "God pardon you your sins!
His foeman's prowess: now they aim the blow	1 have been forty years your officer,

His battle-axe; that instant on his helm	Seek for the Maid of Orleans, bid her haste
The sword of Talbot fell, and with the blow	Hither, and thou shalt gain what recompense
It broke. "Yet yield thee, Englishman!" exclaim'd	It pleaseth thee to ask,"
The generous Frank : " vain is this bloody strife :	The herald soon,
Me should'st thou conquer, little would my death	Meeting the mission'd Virgin, told his tale.
Avail thee, weak and wounded ! "
	Trembling she hasten'd on, and when she knew
" Long enough	The death-pale face of Conrade, scarce could Joan
Talbot has lived," replied the sullen chief:	Lift up the expiring warrior's heavy hand.
"His hour is come; yet shalt not thou survive	And press it to her heart.
To glory in his fall!" So, as he spake,	"1 sent for thee,
He lifted from the ground a massy spear,	My friend !" with interrupted voice he cried,
And came again to battle.	"That I might comfort this my dying hour
Now more fierce	With one good deed. A fair domain is mine;
The conflict raged, for careless of himself,	Let Francis and his Isabel possess
And desperate, Talbot fought. Collected still	That, mine inheritance." He paused awhile,
Was Conrade. Wheresoe'er his foeman aim'd	Struggling for utterance; then with breathless
The well-thrust javelin, there he swung around	speed,
His guardian shield: the long and vain assault	And pale as him he mourn'd for, Francis came,
Exhausted Talbot now; foredone with toil,	And hung in silence o'er the blameless man,
He bare his buckler low for weariness;	Even with a brother's sorrow : he pursued, the second se
The buckler, now splinter'd with many a stroke,195	"This, Joan, will be thy care. I have at home
Fell piecemeal; from his riven arms the blood	An aged mother — Francis, do thou soothe Stream'd fast: and now the Frenchman's battle-	Her childless age. Nay, weep not for me thus :
axe	Sweet to the wretched is the tomb's repose!"
Came unresisted on the shieldless mail.
But then he held his hand. "Urge not to death	So saying, Conrade drew the javelin forth,
This fruitless contest!" he exclaim'd: "oh chief!	And died without a groan.
Are there not those in England who would feel	By this the scouts,
Keen anguish at thy loss? a wife perchance	Forerunning the king's march, upon the plain
Who trembles for thy safety, or a child	Of Patay had arrived, of late so gay
Needing a father's care ! ''	With marshall'd thousands in their radiant arms,
Then Talbot's heart	And streamers glittering in the noon-tide sun,
	And blazon'd shields and gay accoutrements,
think	The pageantry of war; but now defiled
That life is worth preserving, hie thee hence,	With mingled dust and blood, and broken arms,
	And mangled bodies. Soon the monarch joins
And save thyself: I loathe this useless talk."
	His victor army. Round the royal flag,
So saying, he address'd him to the fight,	Uprear'd in conquest now, the chieftains flock,
Impatient of existence: from their arms	Proffering their eager service. To his arms,
Fire flash'd, and quick they panted; but not long	Or wisely fearful, or by speedy force
Endured the deadly combat. With full force	Compell'd, the embattled towns submit and own
Down through his shoulder even to the chest,	Their rightful king. Baugenci strives in vain;
	Yenville and Mehun yield; from Sully's wall
Conrade impell'd the ponderous battle-axe;
And at that instant underneath his shield	Hurl'd is the banner'd lion : on they pass,
Received the hostile spear. Prone fell the Earl,	Auxerre, and Troyes, and Chalons, ope their gates,
	And by the mission'd Maiden's rumor'd deeds
Even in his death rejoicing that no foe
Should live to boast his fall.	Inspirited, the citizens of Rheims
Then with faint hand	Feel their own strength; against the English troops
Conrade unlaced his helm, and from his brow	With patriot valor, irresistible,
Wiping the cold dews ominous of death,	They rise, they conquer, and to their liege lord
He laid him on the earth, thence to remove,	Present the city keys.
While the long lance hung heavy in his side,	The morn was fair
	When Rheims reëchoed to the busy hum
Powerless. As thus beside his lifeless foe
He lay, the herald of the English Earl	Of multitudes, for high solemnity
With following ston drow near and when he saw	Accombled To the holy fabric moves

The long procession, through the streets bestrewn With flowers and laurel boughs. The courtier throng

Were there, and they in Orleans, who endured The siege right bravely; Gaucour, and La Hire, The gallant Xaintrailles, Bonssac, and Chabannes, Alencon, and the bravest of the brave, The Bastard Orleans, now in hope elate, Soon to release from hard captivity His dear-beloved brother; gallant men, And worthy of eternal memory, For they, in the most perilous times of France, Despair'd not of their country. By the king The delegated Damsel pass'd along Clad in her batter'd arms. She bore on high Her hallow'd banner to the sacred pile, And fix'd it on the altar, whilst her hand Ponr'd on the monarch's head the mystic oil,197 Wafted of yore, by milk-white dove from heaven, (So legends say,) to Clovis when he stood At Rheims for baptism ; dubious since that day, When Tolbiac plain reek'd with his warrior's blood, And fierce upon their flight the Almanni prest, And rear'd the shont of triumph; in that hour Clovis invoked aloud the Christian God And conquer'd: waked to wonder thus, the chief Became love's convert, and Clotilda led Her husband to the font.

The mission'd Maid Then placed on Charles's brow the crown of France, And back retiring, gazed upon the king One moment, quickly scanning all the past, Till, in a turnult of wild wonderment, She wept aloud. The assembled multitude In awful stillness witness'd; then at once, As with a tempest-rushing noise of winds, Lifted their mingled clamors. Now the Maid Stood as prepared to speak, and waved her hand, And instant silence followed.

"King of France!" She cried, "at Chinon, when my gifted eye Knew thee disguised, what inwardly the spirit Prompted, I promised, with the sword of God, To drive from Orleans far the English wolves, And crown thee in the rescued walls of Rheims. All is accomplish'd. I have here this day Fulfill'd my mission, and anointed thee King over this great nation. Of this charge, Or well perform'd or earelessly, that God Of Whom thon holdest thine anthority Will take account; from Him all power derives. Thy duty is to fear the Lord, and rule, According to His word and to the laws, The people thus committed to thy charge : Theirs is to fear Him and to honor Thee, And with that fear and honor to obey In all things lawful; both heing thus alike By duty bound, alike restricted both From wilful license. If thy heart be set To do His will and in His ways to walk, I know no limit to the happiness Thou may'st create. I do beseech thee, King !" The Maid exclaim'd, and fell upon the ground, And clasp'd his knees, "I do beseech thee, King! By all the thousands that depend on thee,

For weal or woe, - consider what thou art, By Whom appointed ! If thou dost oppress Thy people, if to aggrandize thyself [them Thou tear'st them from their homes, and sendest To slaughter, prodigal of misery; If when the widow and the orphan groan In want and wretchedness, thou turnest thee To hear the music of the flatterer's tongue; If, when thou hear'st of thonsands who have fallen, Thon say'st, 'I am a King ! and fit it is That these should perish for me; '--- if thy realm Should, through the counsels of thy government, Be fill'd with woe, and in thy streets he heard The voice of mourning and the feeble cry Of asking hunger; if in place of Law Iniquity prevail; if Avarice grind The poor; if discipline be utterly Relax'd, Vice charter'd, Wickedness let loose, Though in the general ruin all must share, Each answer for his own peculiar guilt, Yet at the Judgment-day, from those to whom The power was given, the Giver of all power Will call for righteous and severe account. Choose thou the better part, and rule the land In righteousness; in righteousness thy throne Shall then be stablish'd, not by foreign foes Shaken, nor by domestic enemies, But guarded then by loyalty and love, True hearts, Good Angels, and All-seeing Heaven.

NOTES.

Note 1, p. 13, col. 1. - The Bastard Orleans.

"Lewes duke of Orleance murthered in Paris, by Jhon duke of Burgoyne, was owner of the castle of Concy, on the frontiers of Fraunce toward Arthoys, whereof he made constable the lord of Canny, a man not so wise as his wife was faire, and yet she was not so faire, but she was as well beloved of the duke of Orleance, as of her husband. Betwene the duke and her husband (I cannot tell who was father), she conceived a child, and brought furthe a prety boys called Jhon, whiche child beying of the age of one yere, the duke deceased, and not long after the mother and the lord of Cawny ended their lives. The next of kynne to the lord Cowny chalenged the inheritaunce, which was worth foure thousande cronnes a yere, alledgyng that the hoye was a bastard ; and the kynred of the mother's side, for to save her honesty, it plainly denied. In conclusion, this matter was in contension before the presidentes of the parliament of Paris, and there hang in controversie till the child came to the age of eight years old. At whiche tyme it was demanded of hym openly whose sonne he was; his frendes of his mother's side edvertised hym to require a day, to be advised of so great an answer, whiche he asked, and to hym it was granted. In the mean season, his said frendes persuaded him to claime his inberitance as sonne to the lorde of Cawny, whiche was an honorable livyng, and an auncient patrimony, affirming that if he said contrary, he not only slaundered his mother, shamed hymself, and stained his bloud, but also should have no livyng, nor any thing to take to. The scholemaster thinkyng that his disciple had well learned his lessnn, and would rehearse it according to his instruccion, brought hym before the judges at the dais assigned, and when the question was repeted to hym again, he boldly answered, " My harte geveth me, and my tonge celleth me, that I am the sonne of the noble duke of Orleaunce, I more glad to be his bastarde, with a meane livyng, than the lawful sonne of that coward cuckolde Cawny, with his four thousand crownes." The judges much marveiled at his bolde answere, and his mother's cosyns detested hym for shamyng of his mother, and his father's supposed kinne rejoysed in gaining the patrimony and possessions. Charles duke of Orleaunce heryng of this judgment, took hym into his family, and gave hym greate offices and fees, whiche he well deserved, for (during his captivitie), he defended his landes, expulsed the Englishmen, and in conclusion, procured his deliverance. - Hall, f. 104.

There can be no doubt that Shakespeare had this anecdote in his mind when he wrote the first scene wherein the bastard Falconbridge is introduced.

When the duke of Orleans was so villanously assassinated hy order of the duke of Burgundy, the murder was thought at first to have been perpetrated by sir Aubert de Cauny, says Monstrellet, (Johnes's translation, vol. i. p. 198,) from the great hatred he bore the duke for having carried off his wife ; but the truth was soon known who were the guilty persons, and that sir Aubert was perfectly innocent of the crime. Marietta d'Enguien was the name of the adulteress.

" On rapporte que la duchesse d'Orleans, Valentine de Milan, princesse célébré par son esprit et par son courage, ayant d la nouvelle de la morte sanglante de son épour, rassemblé toute sa maison et les principaux seigneurs de son parti, leur addressa ces paroles : ' Qui de vous marchera le premier pour venger la mort du frère de son Roy?' Frappé de terreur, chacun gardait un morne silence. Indigné de voir que personne ne répondit d ce noble appel, le petit Jean d' Orleans (Dunois), alors âgé de sex ans et demi, s'avança tout à coup au milieu de l'assemblée, et s'ècriu d'une voiz animée : ' Ce sera moy, madame, et je me monstreray digne d'estre son fils.' Depuis ce moment, Valentine oubliant la naissance illégitime de ce jeune prince, urait conçu pour lui une affection vraiment maternelle. On lui avait entendu dire au lit de la mort, et par une espece de presentiment de la grandeur future de ce heros, ' Qu'il luy avoit esté emblé, et qu'il n'y avoit nul de ses enfans qui fust si bien taillé à venger la mort de son pére.' Cotte ardeur de vengeance l'entraîna même d'abord trop loin, et c'est à peu près l'unique reproche qu'on puisse faire à la jounesse de ce guerrier. Il se vanta quelquefois, dans la première moitie de sa vie d'avoir immolé de sa main dix mille Bourguignons aux manes de son père."

NOTE 3, p. 13, col. 2 - Gainsaying what she sought.

The following account of Joan of Arc is extracted from a history of the siege of Orleans, prise de mot à mot, sans aucun changement de langage, d'un vieil exemplaire escrit a lu main en parchemin, et trouvé en la maison de la dicte ville d'Orleans. Troyes. 1621.

Des quelles parolles in ne faisant que rire et se mocquer et la reputoit incensee : toutesfois elle persevera tant et si longuement qu'il luy bailla un gentelhomme, nommé Ville Robert, et quelque nombre de gens, les quels la menerent devers le Roy que pour lors estoit a Chinon."

NOTE 4, p. 13, col. 2. - Of eighteen years.

This agrees with the account of her uge given by Helinshed, who calls her "a young wench of an eighteene years old ; of favour was she counted likesome, of person stronglie made and manlie, of courage great, hardie, and stout withall; an understander of counsels though she were not at them, greet semblance of chastitic both of bodie and behaviour, the name of Jesus in hir mouth about all her businesses, bumble, obedient, and fasting divers days in the weeke."- Holinshed, 600.

De Serres speaks thus of her: "A young maiden named Joan of Arc, born in a village upon the Marches of Barre called Domremy, neere to Vancouleurs, of the age of cighteene or twenty years, issued from base parents, her father was named James of Arc, and her mother Isabel, peore country folkes, who had brought her up to keep their cattell. She said with great boldnesse that she had a revelation how to succour the king, how he might be able to chase the English from Orleance, and after that to cause the king to be cruwaed at Rheims, and to put him fully and wholly in possession of his realme.

"After she had delivered this to her father, mother, and their neighbors, she presumed to go to the lord of Baudricourt, provost of Vaucouleurs ; she holdly delivered unto him, after an extraordinary manner, all these great mysteries, as much wished for of all men as not hoped for : especially coming from the mouth of a poore country maide, whom they might with more reason heleeve to he possessed of some melancholy humour, than divinely inspired ; being the instrument of so many excellent remedies, in so desperat a season, after the vaine striving of so great and famous persooages. At the first he mocked and reproved her, but having heard her with more patience, and judging by her temperate discourse and modest countenance that she spoke not idely, in the end he resolves to present her to the king for his discharge. So she arrives at Chinon the sixt day of May, attired like a man.

"She had a modest countenance, sweet, civill, and resolute . her discourse was temperate, reasonable and retired, her actions culd, shewing great chastity. Having spoken to the king, or noblemen with whom she was to negociate, she presently retired to her lodging with an old woman that guided her, without vanity, affectation, babling or courtly lightnesse. These are the manners which the Original attributes to her."

Edward Grimeston, the translator, calls her in the margin, " Joane the Virgin, or rather Witch."

NOTE 5, p. 13, col. 2. - Lest he in wrath confound me.

Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, "Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations."

Then said I, Ah, LORD GOD, behold I cannot speak, for I am a child.

But the Lord said unto me, Say not, I Bm a child, for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee, thou shalt speak.

Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise, and speak unto them all that I command thee : be not dismayed at their faces, lest I confound thee before them. - Jeremiah, chap. i.

NOTE 7, p. 14, col. 2. - Rush o'er the land, and desolate, and kill.

"While the English and French contend for dominion, sovereignty and life itself, men's goods in France were vielently taken by the license of war, churches spoiled, men every where murthered or wounded, others put to death or tortured, matrons ravished, maids forcibly drawn from out their parents arms to be deflowered; towns daily taken, daily spoyled, daily defaced, the riches of the inhabitants carried whether the conquerors think good; houses and villages round about set on fire, no kind of cruelty is left unpractised upon the miserable French, omitting many huadred kind of other calamities which all at once oppressed them. Add here noto that the com-monwealth, being destitute of the help of laws (which for the most part are mute in times of war and mutiny), floateth up and down without any anchorage at right or justice. Neither was England herself void of these mischiefs, who every day heard the news of her valiant children's funerals, slain in perpetual skirmishes and bickerings, her general wealth continually ebbed and wained, so that the evils seemed almost equal, and the whole western world echoed the groans and sighs of either nation's quarrels, being the common argument of speech and compassion through christendom." - Speed.

NOTE 8, p. 15, col. 1. — there, in the hamlet Arc, My father's dwelling stands.

When Montaigne saw it in 1580, the front of the house was covered with paiotings representing the history of the Mnid. Ile says, Ses descendans furent annohis par faveur du Roi, et nous monstrarent les armes que le Rouleur donna, qui sont d'azur à un' espée droite couronnée et poignée d'or, et deux fleurs de lis d'or ou coté de ladite espée; de quoy un receveur de Vaucouleur donna un escusson peint à M. de Caselis. Le devant de la maisonnette où elle naquit est toute peinte de ses gestes; mais Pauge en a fort corrumpu la peinture. Il y a aussi un abre lé long d'une vigne qu'on nomme l'abre de la Pucelle, qui n'a nulle aitre chose d'remerquer. — Foyoges de Montaigne, i. p. 17.

Ce n'etait qu'une maisonnette; et cependant elle a subsiste jusqu' à nos jours, grâce au zêle national du maire et des habitans de Domremy, qui pendont les dernières anuées du gouvernement impérul, voyant qu'on refusait de leur allouer la somme nécessaire pour son entretien, y suppléérent par une souscription volontaire; tant le respect et la vénération que les vertus inspirent, peuvent quelquefois prolonger la durée des monumens les plus simples et les plus fragiles. — Le Brun de Charmettes, t. i. 241.

It appears, however, that whatever might be the respect and veneration of the inhabitants for this illustrious heroine and martyr, they allowed the cottage in which she was born to he villaneously descerated, very soon after their national feeling had been thus praised. The author, whose hook was published only in the second year (1817) after the overthrow of the Imperial Government, adds the following note to this passage : Depuis Vépoque où ce passage a été écrut, il paraît que les choses sont fort changées. On lit ce qui suit dans le Narrateur de la Meuse: "Les chambres où logèrent cette héroïae et ses parens sont converties en étables ; de vils animaux occupent Vemplacement du lit de Jeanne d'Are, son armoire vermoulue renferme des ustensiles d'écurie."

NOTE 12, p. 16, col. 2. - Think well of this, young man!

Dreadful indeed must have been the miscries of the French from vulgar plunderers, when the manners of the highest classes were marked by hideous grossness and vices that may not be nitered.

" Of acts so ill examples are not good."

Sir William Alexander.

Yet it may be right to justify the saying in the text by an extract from the notes to Andrews's History of Great Britain. "Agricola quilibet, sponsam juvenem acquisitus, ac in vicinia alicujus iri nobilis et prepotentis habitans, crudelissime veratabur. Nempenonnunquam in ejus domum irrueus iste optimas, magnâ comitante catero3, pretium ingens refemplionis engeret, ac ei non protitus solveret colonus, istum misserum in magna area protrudens, venuste ac tenere uvori sua (super upam aream prostrata) vim vir nobilis adferret; voce exclamans horrenda, "Audine Rustice! jamjam, super hanc aream constupratur dileta tua sponsal." atque peracto hoc seelere nefando relinqueretur (horresco refereus) sufficatione expirans maritus, nisi magno pretio sponsa nuper vitiata liberationem ejus redmeret."—J. de Paris.

Let us add to this the detestable history of a great commander under Charles VII. of France, the bastard of Bourbon, who (after having committed the most excerable erimes during a series of years with impunity) was drowned in 1441, by the constable Richemont, (a treacherons assassin bimself, but a mirror of justice when compared to some of his contemporaries,) on its being proved against him "Quad super psum maritum ri prostratum, urori, frustra repugnanti, vim addulerat. Eusuite il acoit fuit battre et decouper le mari, tant que c'etoit pitie a voir." — Mén. de Richemont.

Note 13, p. 16, col. 2. - Think that there are such horrors.

I translate the following anecdote of the Black Prince from Froissart : —

The Prince of Wales was about a month, and not longer, before the city of Lymoges, and he did not assault it, but always continued mining. When the miners of the prince had finished their work, they said to him, "Sir, we will throw down a great part of the wall into the most whenever it shall please you, so that you may enter into the city at your ease, without danger." These words greatly pleased the prince, who said to them, " I chuse that your work should be manifested to-morrow at the hour of day-break." Then the miners set fire to their mines the next morning as the prince had commanded, and overthrew a great pane of the wall, which filled the moat where it had fallen. The English saw all this very willingly, and they were there all armed and ready to enter into the town; those who were on foet could enter at their ease, and they entered and ran to the gate and beat it to the earth and all the barriers also; for there was no defence, and all this was done so suddenly, that the people of the town were not upon their guard. And then you might have seen the prince, the duke of Lancaster, the count of Canterbury, the count of Pembroke, Messire Guischart Dangle, and all the other chiefs and their people who entered in ; and ruffians on fout who were prepared to do mischief, and to run through the town, and to kill men and women and children, and so they had been commanded to do. There was a full pitiful sight, for men and women and children cast themselves on their knees before the prince and cried "mercy !" but he was sn coffanied with so great rage, that he heard them not; neither man nor woman would he hear, but they were all put to the sword wherever they were found, and these people had not been guilty. I know not how they could have no pity upon poor people, who had never been powerful enough to do any treason. There was no heart so hard in the city of Lymoges which had any remembrance of God, that did not lament the great mischief that was there; for more than three thousand men and women and children were put to death that day; God has their souls, for indeed they were martyred. In entering the town a party of the English went to the palace of the bishop and found him there, and took him and led him before the prince, who looked at him with a marderous look, (felanneusement,) and the best word that be could say to him was that his head should be cut off, and then he made him be taken from his presence. - 1, 225.

The crime which the people of Lymoges had committed was that of surrendering when they had been besieged by the duke of Berry, and in consequence turning French. And this crime was thus punished at a period when no versatility of conduct was thought dishonorable. The phrases tourner Anglois - tourner François - retourner Anglois, occur repeat. edly in Froissart. I should add that of all the heroes of this period the Black Prince was the most generous and the most humane.

After the English had taken the town of Montereau, the seignent de Guitery, who commanded there, retired to the castle; and Heary V. threatened, unless he surrendered, to bang eleven gentlemen, taken in the towo. These poor menettreated the governor to comply, for the sake of saving their lives, letting him at the same time know how impossible it was that his defence could be of any avail. He was not to be persuaded; and when they saw this, and knew that they must die, some of them requested that they might first see their wives and their friends. This was allowed; la y cut de pitcut regrets au preadre congré, says Pierre de Fanin, and on the following morning they were executed as Henry had threatened. The governor held out for fifteen days, and then yielded by a capitulation which secured himself. — (Coll. des Mémoires, .v. p. 456.)

In the whole history of these dreadful times I remember but one man whom the cruelty of the age had not contaminated, and that was the Portugueze hero Nuno Alvares Pereira, a man who appears to me to have heen a perfect example of patriotism, heroism, and every noble and lovely quality, above all others of any age or country.

Atrocious, however, as these instances are, they seem as nothing when compared to the atrocities which the French exercised upon each other. When Soissons was captured by Darles VI. (1414) in person, "in regard to the destruction committed by the king's army (says Monstrellet), it cannot be estimated; for after they had plundered all the inhabitants, and their dwellings, they despoiled the churches and monasteries. They even took and robbed the most part of the sacred shrines of many bodies of saints, which they stripped of all the precious stones, gold and silver, together with many other jewels and holy things appertaining to the aforesaid churches. There is not a christian but would have shuddered at the atrocious xcesses committed by the soldiery in Soissons: married women violated before their husbands; young damsels in the presence of their parents and relatives; holy nuns, gentlewomen of all ranks, of whom there were many in the town; all, or the greater part, were violated against their wills by divers nobles and others, who after having satiated their own hurtal passions, delivered them over without mercy to their servants: and there is no remembrance of such disorder and havore being done by christians, considering the many persons of high rank that were present, and who made ao efforts to eheck them. There were also many gentlemen in the king's army who had relations in the town, as well secular as churchnnen; hut the disorder was not the less on that account."— Vol. iv. p. 31.

What a national contrast is there between the manner in which the English and French have conducted their eivil wars ! Even in the wars of the Fronde, when all parties were alike thoroughly unprincipled, cruelties were committed on both sides which it might have been thought nothing but the strong feelings of a perverted religious principle could have given birth to.

NOTE 16, p. 17, col. 1. - The Fountain of the Fairies.

In the Journal of Paris in the reigns of Charles VI. and VII. it is asserted that the Maid of Orleans, in answer to an interrogatory of the doctors, whether she had ever assisted at the assemblies held at the Fountain of the Fairies near Doorprein, round which the evil spirits dance, confessed that she had often repaired to a beautiful fountain in the country of Lorraine, which she named the good Fountain of the Fairies of our Lord. — From the notes to the English version of Le Grand's Fablicar.

NOTE 18, p. 17, col. 2. - Memory, thought, were gone.

"In this representation which I made to place myself near to Christ (says St. Teresa), there would come suddenly upon me, without either expectation or any preparation on my part, such an evident feeling of the presence of God, as that I could by no means doubt, but that either he was within me, or else I all engulifed in him. This was not in the manner of a vision, but I think they call it Mistical Theology; and it suspends the soul in such sort, that she seems to be wholly out of herself. The Will is in act of loving, the Memory seems to be in a manner lost, the understanding, in my opinion, discourses not; and although it be not lost, yet it works not as I was saying, but remains as it were amazed to consider how much it understands." — Life of St. Teresa, written by herself.

Teresa was well acquainted with the feelings of enthusiasm. I had, however, described the sensations of the Maid of Orleans before I had met with the life of the saint.

According to Holinshed, the English army consisted of only 15,000 men, harassed with a tedious march of a month, in very bad weather, through an enemy's country, and for the most part sick of a flux. He states the number of French at 60,000, of whom 10,000 were slain, and 1500 of the higher order taken prisoners. Some historians make the disproportion in numbers still greater. Goodwin says, that among the slain there were one archbishop, three dukes, six earls, ninety barons, fifteen hundred knights, and seven thousand esquires or gentlemen.

Note 23, p. 18, col. 2. — From his hersed bowmen how the arrows flew.

This was the usual method of marshalling the bowmen. At Cressy "the archers stood in manner of an herse, about two hundred in front and but forty in depth, which is undoubtedly the best way of embattling archers, especially when the enemy is very numerous, as at this time: for by the breadth of the front the extension of the enemies front is matched; and by reason of the binness in flank, the arrows do more certain exceution, being more likely to reach home." — Barnes.

The victory at Poictiers is chiefly attributed to the herse of archers. After mentioning the conduct and courage of the English leaders in that battle, Baroes says, "But all this courage had been thrown away to no purpose, had it not been seconded by the extraordinary gallantry of the English archers, who behaved themselves that day with wonderful constancy, alacrity, and resolution. So that by their means, in a meaner, all the French battails received their first foil, being by the harhed arrows so galled and terrified, that they were easily opened to the men of arms."

"Without all question, the guns which are used now-a-days are neither so terrible in battle, nor do such execution, nor work such confusion as arrows can do : for bullets being not seen only hurt when they hit, but arrows enrage the horse, and break the array, and terrify all that behold them in the bodies of their neighbors. Not to say that every archer can shoot thrice to a gunner's once, and that whole squadrons of hows may let fly at one time, when only one or two files of musqueteers can discharge at once. Also, that whereas guas are useless when your pikes join, because they only do execution point blank, the arrows which will kill at random, nay do good service even behind your men of arms. And it is autorious, that at the famous battle of Lepanto, the Turkish hows did more mischief than the Christian artillery. Besides it is not the least observable, that whereas the weakest may use guas as well as the strongest, in those days your lusty and tall veomen were chosen for the how; whose hose being fasteaed with one point, and their jackets long and easy to shoot in, they had their limbs at full liberty, so that they might easily draw bows of great strength, and shoot arrows of a yard long beside the head." - Joshua Barnes.

Note 24, p. 18, col. 2. — To turn on the defenceless prisoners The cruel sword of conquest

During the heat of the combat, when the English had gained the upper hand, and made several prisoners, news was brought to king Henry that the French were attacking his rear, and had already captured the greater part of his bog sage and sumpter-horses. This was indeed true, for Robinet de Bournonville, Rifflart de Clamasse, Ysambart d'Azincourt, and some other men at arms, with about six hundred peasants, had fallen upon and taken great part of the king's brigguge. and a number of horses, while the guard was occupied in the battle. This distressed the king very much, for he saw that though the French army had been routed, they were collecting on different parts of the plain in large bodies, and he was afraid they would resume the hattle : he therefore caused instant proclamation to be made by sound of trampet, that every one should put his prisoners to death, to prevent them from aiding the enemy, should the combat he renewed. This caused an instantaneous and general massacre of the French prisoners, occasioned by the disgraceful conduct of Robinet de Bournonville, Ysambart d'Azincourt, and the others, who were afterwards punished for it, and imprisoned a very long time by duke John of Burgundy, notwithstanding they had made a present to the count de Charolois of a most precious sword ornamented with diamonds, that had belonged to the king of England. They had taken this sword, with other rich jewels, from king Henry's baggage, and had made this present, that is case they should at any time be called to an account for what they had done, the count might stand their friend. - Monstrelet, vol. iv. p. 180.

When the king of England had on this Saturday begun his march towards Calais, many of the French returned to the field of hattle, where the hodies had been turned over more than once, some to seek for their lords, and earry them to their awn countries for burial, others to pillage what the English had left. King Henry's army had only taken gold, silver rich dresses, helmets, and what was of value, for which reason the greater part of the armor was untouched, and on the dead bodies ; but it did not long remain thus, for it was very soon stripped off, and even the shirts and all other parts of their dress were carried away by the peasants of the adjoining villages.

The bodies were left exposed as naked as when they came into the world. On the Saturday, Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the corpses of many princes were well washed and raised, namely, the dukes of Brabant, Bar, and Alençon, the counts de Nevers, de Blaumont, de Vaudemont, de Faulquemberge, the lord de Dampierre, admiral sir Charles d'Albreth, constable, and buried in the clurch of the Friars Minors at Hesdin. Others were carried by their servants, some to their own countries, and others to different churches. All who were recognized were taken away, and buried in the clurches of their manors.

When Philippe count de Charolois heard of the unfortunate and melancholy disaster of the French, he was in great grief; more especially for the death of his two uncles, tho dake of Brabant and count de Nevers. Moved by compassion, he caused all that had remained exposed on the field of battle to he interred, and commissioned the abbot de Roussianville and the bailiff of Aire to have it done. They measured out a square of twenty-five yards, wherein were dug three trenches twelve feet wide, in which were buried, by an account kept, five thousand eight hundred men. It was not known how many had been carried away by their friends, nor what number of the wounded had died in hospitals, towas, villages, and even in the adjacent woods; but, as 1 have before said, it must have been very great.

This square was consecrated as a burying-ground by the bishop of Guines, at the command and as procurator of Louis de Luxembourg, bishop of Theroune. It was surrounded by a strong hedge of thorns, to prevent wolves or dogs from catering it, and tearing up and devouring the hodies.

In consequence of this sad event, some learned clerk of the realm made the following verses :

- A chief by dolorous mischance oppress'd,
- A prince who rules by arbitrary will,
- A royal house by discord sore distress'd, A council prejudiced and partial still,

Subjects by prodigality hrought low, Will fill the land with beggars, well we trow.

Nobles made noble in dame Nature's spite A timorous clergy fear, and truth conceal; While humble commoners forego their right, And the harsh yoke of proud oppression feel: Thus, while the people mourn, the public wee Will fill the land with beggars, well we trow.

Ah feeble woe ! whose impotent commands The very vassals boldly dare despise : Ah helpless moarch ! whose enervate hands And wavering counsels dare no high emprize, Thy hapless reign will cause our tears to flow, And fill the land with beggars, well we trow. Johnes's Monstelet, vol. iv. p. 195.

According to Pierre de Fenin, the English did not bury their own dead; but their loss was so small that this is very unlikely. He says, Après cette douloureuse journée, et que toutes les deux parties se furent retirées, Louys de Luxembourg, qui estoit Evesque de Teroitane, fit faire en la place où la bataille avoit esté donnée plusiuers charniers, où il fit assembler tous les morts d'un coste et d'autre ; et la les fit enterrer, puis il bénit la place, et la fit enclore de fortes hayes tout autour, pour la garantir du bestial.

After the hattle of Agincourt Henry lodged at Maisoncelle; le lendemain au matin il en deslogea, et alla passer tout au milieu des morts qui avoient esté tuce: en ce combai; ld il s'arresta grand espace de temps, et tirèrent ses gens encor des prisonniers hors du nombre des morts, qu'ils emmenèrent avec eux. — Coll. des Mémoires. t. v. p. 384.

Perhaps one consequence of the victory at Agincourt is not generally known Immediately on his return Henry sent his legates to the council of Coostance : " at this councell, by the assent of all nations there present, it was authorised and ordained, that England should obtaine the name of a nation, and should be said one of the five nations that owe their devotion to the church of Rome, which thing untill that time men of other nations, for envy, had delayed and letted." — Store, Elmham.

Note 26, p. 19, col. 1. — Henry, as wise as brave, had back to England.

Henry judged, that by fomenting the troubles of France, he should procure more certain and lasting advantages than by means of his arms. The truth is, by pushing the French vigorously, he tan the risk of uniting them all against him; in which case, his advantages, prohably, would have been inconsiderable; but by granting them some respite, he gave them opportunity to destroy one another: therefore, contrary to every one's expectation, he laid aside his military affairs for near eighteen months, and betook himself entirely to negotiation, which afforded him the prospect of less doubtful advantages. --Rapin.

"Yet although the armie was strong without, there lacked not within both hardie capteins and manfull soldiers, and as for people, they had more than inough: for as it is written by some that had good cause to know the truth, and no occasion to erre from the same, there were in the citie at the time of the siege 210,000 persons. Dailie were issues made out of the cite at diverse gates, sometime to the losse of the one partie and sometimes of the other, as chances of warre in such adventures happen." — Holumshed, 566.

NOTE 29, p. 19, col. 1. - Had made a league with Famine.

"The king of England advertised of their hautie courages, determined to conquer them by famine which would not be tamed by weapon. Wherefore he stopped all the passages, both by water and land, that no vittels could be conveied to the citie. He cast trenches round about the walls, and sat them full of stakes, and defended them with archers, so that there was left neither waie for them within to issue out, nor for anie that were abroad to enter in without his license. — The king's coorine germane and alie (the king of Portugale) sent a great navie of well-appointed ships unto the mouth of the river Seine, to stop that no French vessel should enter the river and passe up the same, to the aid of them within Rouen.

"Thus was the faire citie of Rouen compassed about with enemies, both by water and land, having neither comfort nor aid of king, dolphin, or dake." — Holinshed, 566.

King Henry of England marched a most powerful army, accompanied by a large train of artillery and warlike stores, in the month of June, before the noble and potent town of Rouen, to prevent the inhabitants and garrison from being supplied with new corn. The van of his army arrived there at midnight, that the garrison might not make any sally against them. The king was lodged at the Carthusian convent; the duke of Gloucester was quartered before the gate of St. Hilaire ; the duke of Clarence at the gate of Caen ; the earl of Warwick at that of Martinville ; the duke of Exeter and earl of Dorset at that of Beauvais: in front of the gate of the castle were the lord marshal and sir John de Cornwall. At the gate leading to Normandy were posted the earls of Huntingdon, Salisbury, Kyme, and the lord Neville, son to the carl of Westmoreland. On the hill fronting St. Catherine's were others of the English barons. Before the English could fortify their quarters, many sallies were made on them, and several severe skirmishes passed on both sides. But the English, so soon as they could, dug deep ditches between the town and them, on the top of which they planted a thick hedge of thorns, so that they could not otherwise be annoyed than by cannon shot and arrows. They also built a jette on the banks of the Seine, about a cannon shot distant from the town, to which they fastened their chains, one of them half a foot under the water, another level with it, and a third two feet above the stream, so that no boats could bring provision to the town, nor could any escape from it that way. They likewise dug deep galleries of communication from one quarter to another, which completely sheltered those in them from cannon or other warlike machines. - Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 40.

Note 30, p. 19, col. 2. - Desperate endurance.

"After he had prosecuted the siege of this place for some time, the cardinal Ursino repaired to his camp, and endeavored to persuade him to moderate his terms, and agree to an equitable peace: but the king's reply plainly evinced his determination of availing himself of the present situation of public affairs; 'Do you not see,' said he, 'that God has brought me hither, as it were by the hand? The throne of France may be said to be vacant; I have a good title to that crown; the whole kingdom is involved in the utmost disorder and confusion; few are willing, and still fewer are able, to resist me. Can I have a more convincing proof of the interposition of heaven in my favor, and that the Supreme Ruler of all things has decreed that I should ascend the throne of France?"-

Note 31, p. 19, col. 2. - Could we behold their savage Irish Kerns.

"With the English sixteen hundred Irish Kernes were enrolled from the prior of Kilmainham; able men, but almost aaked; their arms were targets, darts, and swords; their horses little, and bare no saddle, yet nevertheless nimble, on which upon every advantage they plaied with the French, in spoiling the country, rifeling the houses, and carrying away children with their baggage upon their cowes backs." -- Speed, p. 638.

The king of England had in his army numbers of Irish, the greater part of whom were on foot, having only a stocking and shoe on one leg and foot, with the other quite naked. They had targets, short javelins, and a strange sort of knives. These who were on horseback had no saddles, but rode excellently well on small mountain horses, and were mounted on such panniers as are used by the carriers of corn in parts of France. They were, however, miserably accoutred in comparison with the English, and without any arms that could much hurt the French whenever they might meet them.

These Irish made frequent excursions during the siege over Normandy, and did infinite mischiefs, carrying back to their camp large booties. These on foot took men, and even children from the credle, with beds and furniture, and placing them on cows, drove all these things before them, for they were often met thus by the French. - Monstrelet, v. p. 42.

NOTE 33, p. 19, col. 2. - Of Harfleur's wretched people driven out.

This act of barbarity was perpetrated by Henry, that he might people the town with English inhabitants. " This doth Anglorum prælia report, saleng (not without good ground I believe), as followeth :

Tum flentes tenera cum prole parentes Virgineusque chorus veteres liquêre penates : Tum populus cunctus de portis Gallicus exit Mæstus, inarmatus, vacnus, miser, æger, inopsque, Utque novas sedes quærat migrare coactus : Oppidulo belli potientur jure Britanni ! " - Holinshed.

There is a way of telling truth so as to convey falsehood. After the capture of Harfleur, Stowe says, " All the soldiers and inhabitants, both of the towne and towers, were suffered to goe freely, unharmed, whither they would." -- 348. Henry's conduct was the same at Cacn : he "commanded all women and children to bee avoyded out of the towne, and so the towne was inhabited of new possessors." - Stowe.

Note 38, p. 20, col. I. - And when we sent the herald to implore His mercy.

At this period, a priest of a tolerable age, and of clear understanding, was deputed, by those besieged in Rouen, to the king of France and his council. On his arrival at Paris, he caused to be explained, by an Augustin dector, named Eustace de la Paville, in presence of the king and his ministers, the miserable situation of the besieged. He took for his text, " Domine, quid facientus ? " and harangued upon it very ably end elequently. When he had finished, the priest addressed the king, saying, " Most excellent prince and lord, I am enjoined by the inhabitants of Rouen to make loud complaints against you, and against you duke of Burgundy, who govern the king, for the oppressions they suffer from the English. They make known to you by me, that if, from want of being succored by you, they are forced to become subjects to the king of England, you will not have in all the world more bitter enemics; and if they can, they will destrey you and your whele congregation." With these or with similar words did this priest address the king and his council. After he had been well received and entertained, and the duke of Burgundy had promised to provide succors for the town of Rouen as speedily as possible, he returned the best way he could to carry this news to the besieged. - Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 54.

One of the deputed citizens, "showing himself more rash than wise, more arrogant than learned, took upon him to show wherein the glorie of victorie consisted ; advising the king not to show his manhood in famishing a multitude of poore simple and innocent people, but rather suffer such miserable wretches as laie betwixt the walls of the citie and the trenches of his siege, to passe through the camp, that theie might get their living in other places; then if he durst manfullie assault the place, and by force subdue it, he should win both worldlie fame, and merit great meed from the hands of Almightie God, for having compassion of the poore, needle, and indigent people. When this orator had said, the king with a fierce countenance and bold spirit, reproved them for their malapert presumption, in that they should seeme to go about to teach him what belonged to the dutie of a conqueror, and therefore since it oppeared that the same was unknown to them, he declared that the goddesse of battell called Belloun had three handmaidens, ever of necessitie attending upon her, as Blood, Fire, and Famine, and whereas it laie in his choice to use them all three, he had appointed onelie the meekest maid of those three damsels to punish them of that citie till they were brought to reason. This answer put the French ambassador in a great studie, musing much at his excellent wit and hawtinesse of courage." - Holinshed.

While the court resided at Beauvais, four gentlemen and four citizens of Rouen were sent to lay before the king and council their miserable state : they told them that thousands of persons were already dead with hunger, within their town ; and that from the beginning of October, they had been forced to live on horses, dogs, cats, mice, and rats, and other things uofit for human creatures. They had nevertheless driven full twelve thousand poor people, men, women, and children, out of the place, the greater part of whom had perished wretchedly in the ditches of the town. That it had been frequently necessary to draw up in baskets new-born children from mothers who had been brought to bed in these ditches, to have them baptized, and they were afterwards returned to their mothers; many, however, had perished without christen. ing -all which things were grievous and pitiful to be related. They then added, "To you our lord end king, and to you noble duke of Burgundy, the loyal inhabitants of Rouen have before made known their distress: they now again inform you how much they are suffering for you, to which you have not yet provided any remedy according to your promises. We are sent to you for the last time, to announce to you, on the part of the besieged, that if within a few days they are not relieved, they shall surrender themselves and their town to the English king, and thenceforward renounce all allegiance, uke, and council, courteously replied, that the king's forces vere not as yet adequate to raise the siege, which they were xceedingly sorry for; but, with God's pleasure, they should ery soon he relieved. The deputies asked by what time; the duke answered, before the fourth day after Christmas. They then returned to their tows with difficulty, from the great danger of being taken by the besiegers, and related all that had passed.

The besieged now saffered the greatest distress; and it is impossible to recount the miseries of the common people from famine: it was afterward knows that upwards of fifty thousund had perished of hunger. Some, when they saw meat carried through the street, in despair, ran to %eize it, and so doing, allowed themselves to be severely beaten, and even wounded. During the space of three months no provisions were seen in the markets, but every thing was sold secredly; and what before the siege was worth a farthing, was add for twenty, thirty, or even forty; but those prices were too high for the common people, and hence the great mortality I have mentioned. — Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 61.

The sames of our Edwards and Henries are usually cited together, but it is disgracing the Black Prince and his father to mention them with Henry of Monmouth. He was a hardhearted man. We have seen what was his conduct to the famished fugitives from Roan. The same circumstance occurred at the siege of Calais, and the difference between the monarchs cannot be better exemplified than in the difference of their conduct upon the same occasion. "When sir John de Vienne perceived that king Edward intended to lia long there, he thought to rid the town of as many useless mouths as he could; and so on a Wednesday, heing the 13th of September, he forced out of the town more than seventeen hundred of the poorest and least necessary people, old men, women, and children, and shut the gates upon them: who heing demanded, wherefore they came out of the town, answered with great lamentation, that it was because they had nothing to live on. Then king Edward, who was so fierce in battle, showed a truly royal disposition by considering the sad condition of these forlorn wretches; for he not only would not force them back again into the town, whereby they might help to consume the victuals, but he gave them all a dinner and two pence a-piece, and leave to pass through the army without the least molestation: whereby he so wrought upon the hearts of these poor creatures, that many of them prayed to God for his prosperity." - Joshua Barnes.

"When all things necessary were prepared for the conveyance of the dead king into England, his body was laid in a chariot, which was drawn by four great horses: and above the dead corpse, they laid a figure made of boiled hides, or leather, representing bis person, as near to the semblance of him as could be devised, painted curiously to the similituda of a living creature ; upon whose head was set an imperial diadema of gold and precious stones, on his body a purple robe furred with ermine, end in his right hand he held a acoptre royal, and in his left hand a ball of gold, with a cross fixed thereon. And in this manner adorned, was this figure laid in a bed in the said cheriot, with his visage uncovered towards the heaven: and the coverture of his hed was red silke beaten with gold; and besides that, when the hody should passe through any good towne, a canopy of marvellous great value was horne over the chariot by men of great worship. In this manner, accompanied of the king of Scots and of all princes, lords, and kaights of his house, he was brought from Roane to Ahville, where the corpse was set in the church of Saint Ulfrane. From Abville he was brought to Hedia and from thence to Monstrueil, so to Bulloigne, and so to Calice. In all this journey were many men about the chariot clothed all in white, which bare in their hands torches hurning: after whome followed all the household servants in blacke, and after them came the princes, lords, and estates of the king's blood, adorned in vestures of mourning; and after all this, from the said corpse the distance of two English myles, followed the queene of England right honorably accompanyed In this manner they entered Calice."- Stowe.

At about a league distant followed the queen, with a numerous attendance. From Calais they embarked for Dover, and passing through Canterbury and Rochester, nrrived at London un Martinmas-day.

When the funeral approached London, fifteen bishops dressed in pontifications, several mitred abhots and churchmen, with a multitude of persons of all ranks, came out to meet it. The churchmon clusted the service for the dead as it passed over London-bridge, through Lombard-street, to St. Paul's cathedral. Near the car were the relations of the late king, uttering load lumentations. On the collar of the first hurse that drew the car were emblazoned the ancient arms of England ; on that of the second, the arms of France and England quartered the same as he bore during his lifetime; on that of the third, the arms of France simply; on that of the fourth horse were painted the arms of the noble king Arthur, whom no one could conquer: they were three crowns or, on a shield azure.

When the funeral service had been royally performed in the cathedral, the body was carried to be interred at Westminster abbey with his ancestors. At this funeral, end in regard to every thing concerning it, greater pomp and expanse were made than had been done for two handred years at the interment of any king of England; and even now as much honor and reverence is daily paid to his tomb, as if it were certain he was a saint in Paradise.

Thus ended the life of king Henry in the flower of his age, for when he died he was but forty years old. He was very wise and able in every business he undertook, and of a determined character. During the seven or eight years he ruled in France, he made greater conquests than any of his predecessors had done: it is true he was so feared by his princes and captains, that none dared to disobey his orders, however nearly related to him, more especially his English subjects. In this state of obedience were his subjects of France and England in general; and the principal cause was, that if any person transgressed his ordinances, he had him instantly punished without favor or mercy. — Manstrelet, vol. v. p. 375.

A noble knight of Picardy used a joking expression to his herald respecting king Henry, which was afterwards often repeated. Sir Sarrasin d' Arly, uncle to the Vidame of Amiens, who might be about sixty years of age, resided in the castle of Achere, which he had with his wife, sister to the lord d'Offemont, near to Pas in Artois. He was laid up with the gout, but very eager in his inquiries after news of what was going on. One day his poursuivant, named Haurenas, of the same aga as himself, and who had long served him, returned from making the usual inquiries; and on sir Sarrasin questioning him and asking him if he had heard any particulars of the death of the king of England, he said that he had, and had even seen his corpse at Abbeville, in the church of St. Ulfran; and then related how he was attired, nearly as has been before described. The knight then asked him on his faith if he had diligently observed him ? On his answering that he had, "Now, on thy oath, tell me," added sir Sarrasia,

"if he had his boots on?" "No, my lord, by my faith he had not." The knight then cried out, "Haurenas, my good friend, never believe me if he has not left them in France !" This expression set the company a laughing, and then they talked of other matters. - Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 377.

The effect of this contest upon Eogland was scarcely less rninous. "In the last year of the victorious Henry V, there was not a sufficient number of gentlemen left in England to carry on the business of civil government.

"But if the victories of Henry were so fatal to the population of his country, the defeats and disasters of the succeeding reign were still more destructive. Richemont caused De Giac to be strangled in his bed, and thrown into the Loire, to punish the negligence that had occasioned him to be defeated by an inferior force at Avranches. The constable had laid siege to St. James de Beuvron, a place strongly garrisoned by the English. He had been pronised a convoy of money, which De Giac, who had the management of the treasury, purposely detained to mortify the constable. Richemont openly accused the treasurer, and revenged himself thus violently. After this, he boldly declared that he would serve in the same manner any person whatsoever that should endcavor to engross the king's favor. The Camma of Becaulien accepted De Gine's place, and was by the constable's means assassinated in the king's oresence.

Note 52, p. 21, col. 1. - Whose death my arm avenged.

"The duke of Orleans was, on a Wednesday, the feast-day of pope St. Clement, assassinated in Paris, obout seven o'clock in the evening, on his return from dinner. The nurder was committed by about eighteen men, who had lodged at an hotel having for sign the image of our Lady, near the Porte Barbette, and who, it was afterwards discovered, had for several days intended this essassination.

On the Wednesday before mentioned, they sent one named Scas de Contrcheuze, vaiet de chambre to the king, and one of their accomplices, to the duke of Orleans, who had gone to visit the queen of France at an hotel which she had lately purchased from Montagu, grand master of the king's household, situated very near the Porte Barbette. She had lain in there of a child, which had died shortly after its birth, and bad not then accomplished the days of her purification.

Scas, on his seeing the duke, said, by way of deceiving him, " My lord, the king sends for you, and you must instantly hasten to him, for he has business of great importance to you and him, which he must communicate to you." The duke, on hearing this message, was eager to obey the king's orders although the monarch knew nothing of the matter, and immediately mounted his mule, attended by two esquires on one horse, and four or five valets on foot, who followed behind bearing torches; but his other attendents made no haste to follow him. He had made this visit in a private manner, notwithstanding at this time he had within the city of Paris six hundred knights and esquires of his retinue, and at his expense.

On his serival at the Porte Barbette, the eighteen men, all well and secretly armed, were waiting for him, and were lying in ambush under shelter of a penthouse. The night was pretty dark, and as they sallied out against him, one cried out, "Put him to death !" and gave him such a blow on the wrist with his battle-axe as severed it from his arm.

The duke, astonished at this attack, cried out, "I am the duke of Orleans!" when the assassias continuing their blows, answered, "You are the person we were locking for." So many rushed on him that he was struck off his mule, and his scull was split that his brains were dashed on the pavement. They turned him over and over, and massacred him that he was very soon completely dead. A young esquire, a German by birth, who had been his page, was murdered with him : seeing his mester struck to the ground, he threw himself on his body to protect him, but in vain, and he suffered for his generous courage. The horse which carried the two esquires that preceded the duke, seeing so many armed men advance, hegan to snort, and when he passed them set on an gallep, so that it was some time before he could be checked.

When the esquires had stopped their horse, they saw their lord's mule following them full gallop: having caught him, they fancied the duke must have fallen, and were bringing it back by the bridle; but on their arrival where their lord lay, they were menaced by the assassing, that if they did not instantly depart they should share his fate. Seeing their lord had been thus basely murdered, they hastened to the hotel of the queen, crying out, Murder! Those who had killed the duke, in their turn, bawled out, Fire! and they had arranged their plan that while some were assassing the duke, others were to set fire to their beinges. Some mounted on horseback, and the rest on foot made off as they could, throwing hehind them broken glass and sharp points of iron to prevent their heing pursued.

Report said that many of them went the back way to the hotel d'Artois, to their master the duke of Burgundy, who had commanded them to do this deed, as he afterwards publicly confessed, to inform him of the success of their murder; when instantly afterward they withdrew to places of safety.

The chief of these assessins, and the conductor of the business, was one called Rollet d²Auctonville, a Norman, whom the duke of Orleans had a little before deprived of his office of commissioner of taxes, which the king had given to him at the request of the late duke of Burgundy: from that time the said Rollet had been considering how he could revenge himself on the duke of Orleans. His other accomplices were William Courteheuze and Seas Courteheuze, before mentioned, from the country of Guines, Juhn de la Motte, and others, to the amount of eighteen.

Within half an hour the household of the duke of Orleans, hearing of this horrid murder, made lond complaints, and with great crowds of nobles and others hastened to the fatal spot, where they found him lying dead in the street. His knights and esquires, and in general all his dependants, made grievons lamentations, seeing him thus wounded and disfigured. With many groans they raised the hody and carried it to the hotel of the lord de Rieux, marshal of France, which was hard by; and shortly afterward the hody was covered with a white pall, and conveyed most honorably to the Guillemias, where it lay, as being the nearest church to where the murder had been committed.

Soon afterward the king of Sicily, and many other princes, knights and esquires, having heard of this foul murder of the only brother of the king of France, came with many tears to visit the body. It was put into a leadea coffia, and the monks of the church, with all the late duke's household, watched it all night, saying prayers, and singing psalms over it. On the morrow his servants found the hand which had heen cut off, and collected much of the hrains that had heen sentered over the street, all of which were enclosed in a leaden case and placed by the coffin.

The whole of the princes who were at Paris, except the king and his children, namely, the king of Sicily, the dukes of Berry, Burguady, and Bourbon, the marquis du Pont, the counts de Nevers, de Clermont, de Vendôme, de St. Pol, de Dammartin, the constable of France, and several others, having assembled with a large body of the clergy and nobles, and a multitude of the citizens of Paris, went in a body to the church of the Guillemins. Then the principal officers of the late duke's household took the body and bore it out of the church, with a great number of lighted torches carried by the esquires of the defunct. On each side of the body were in due order, uttering groans and shedding tears, the king of Sicily, the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, each holding a corner of the pall. After the body followed the other princes, the clergy and barons, according to their ranks, recommending his soul to his Creator; and thus they proceeded with it to the church of the Celestines. When a most solemn service had been performed, the body was interred in a beautiful chapel he himself had founded and built. After the service all the princes, and others who had attended it, returned to their homes. - Monstrelet, vol. i. p. 192.

NOTE 53, p. 21, col. 1. — When the Burgundian faction filled thy streets

With carnage.

About four o'clock on the 12th day of June, the populace of Paris rose to the amount of about sixty thousand, fearing (as they said) that the prisoners would be set at liberty, although the new provost of Paris and other lords assured them to the contrary. They were armed with old mallets, hatchets, staves, and other disorderly weapons, and paraded through tha streets shonting, " Loog live the king and the duke of Burgundy !" toward the different prisons in Paris, namely, the Palace, St. Magloire, St. Martin des Champs, the Chatelet, the Temple, and to other places wherein any prisouers were confined. They forced open all their doors, and killed Chepier and Chepiere, with the whole of the prisoners, to the amount of sixteen hundred or thereabouts, the principal of whom were the count de Armagnac, constable of France, master Lenry de Marle, chancellor to the king, the bishops of Coutances, of Bayeux, of Evreux of Senlis, of Saintes, the count de Grand-Pre, Raymonnet de la Guerre, the abbot de St. Conille de Compiegne, sir Hector de Chartres, sir Enguerrand de Marcoignet, Charlot Poupart, master of the king's wardrobe, the members of the courts of justice and of the treasury, and in general all they could find: among the number were several even of the Burgundian party confined for debt.

In this massacre several women were killed, and left on the spot where they had been put to death. This cruel butchery lasted until ten o'clock in the morning of the following day. Those confined in the grand Chatelet, having arms, defended themselves valiantly, and slew many of the populace; but on the morrow by means of fire and smoke they were conquered, and the moh made many of them leap from the battlements of the towers, when they were received on the points of the spears of those in the streets, and crnelly mangled. At this dreadful business were present the new provost of Paris, sir John de Luxembourg, the lord de Fosseaux, the lord de PIsle-Adam, the vidame of Amiens, the lord de Chevreuse, the lord de Chastellus, the lord de Cohen, sir James de Harcourt, sir Emond de Lombers, the lord d'Auxois, and others. to the amount of upward of a thousand combatants, armed and on horseback, ready to defend the murderers should there be any necessity. Many were shocked and astonished at such ernel conduct; but they dared not say any thing except, "Well, my boys !" The bodies of the constable, the chancellor, and of Raymonnet de la Guerre were stripped naked, tied together with a cord, and dragged for three days by the blackguards of Paris through the streets; the body of the constable had the breadth of two fingers of his skin cut off crosswise, like to a bend in heraldry, by way of derision: and they were thus publicly exposed quite naked to the sight of all; on the fourth day they were dragged out of Paris on a hurd's and buried with the others in a ditch called la Louviere.

Notwithstanding the great lords after this took much pains to pacify the populace, and remonstrated with them, that they ought to allow the knwe's justice to take its regular course against offenders, they would not desist, but went is great erowds to the houses of such as had favored the Armagnaes, or of those whom they disliked, and killed them without mercy, carrying away all they could find. In these times it was enough if one man hated another at Paris, of whatever rank he might be, Burguedian or not, to say, "There goes an Armagnae," and he was instantly put to death without further inquiry being made. — Monstrelt, vol. v. p. 20.

To add to the tribulations of these times the Parisians again assembled in great numbers, as they had before done, and went to all the prisons in Paris, broke into them, and put to death full three hundred prisoners, many of whom had been confined there since the last butchery. In the number of those murdered were sir James de Mommor, and sir Louis de Corail, chamberlain to the king, with many nobles and churchmen. They then went to the lower court of the bastille of St. Anthony, and demanded that six prisoners, whom they samed, should be given up to them, or they would attack the place : in fact, they began to pull down the wall of the gate, when the duke of Burgundy, who lodged near the bastille, vexed to the heart at such proceedings, to avoid worse, ordered the prisoners to be delivered to them, if any of their leaders would promise that they should be conducted to the Chatelet prison, and suffered to be punished according to their deserts by the king's court of justice. Upon this they all departed, and by way of glossing over their promise, they led the prisoners near to the Chatelet, when they put them to death, and stripped them naked. They then divided into several large companies and paraded the streets of Paris, entering the houses of many who had been Armagnacs, plundering and murdering all without mercy. In like manner as instantly; and their principal leader was Cappeluche, the hangman of the city of Paris.

The duke of Burgundy, alarmed at these insurrections, sent for some of the chief citizens, with whom he remonstrated on the consequences these disturbances might have. The citizons excused themselves from being any way concerned, and said they were much grieved to witness them : they added, they were all of the lowest rank, and hud thus risen to pillage the more wealthy; and they required the duke to provide a remedy by employing these men in his wars. It was then proclaimed, in the names of the king and the duke of Burgundy, under pain of death, that no person should tumultuously assemble, nor any more murders or pillage take place; but that such as had of late risen in the insurrection should prepare themselves to march to the sieges of Montlehery and Marcoussi, now held by the king's enemies. The commonalty made reply, that they would cheerfully do so if they had proper ceptains appointed to lead them.

Within a few days, th avoid similar tumults in Paris, six thousand of the populace were sent to Montlehery under the command of the lord de Cohen, sir Walter de Ruppes and sir Walter Raillart, with a certain number of men at arms, and store of esonon and ammunition sufficient for a siege. These knights led them to Montlehery, where they made a 'sharp attack on the Dauphinois within the castle.

The duke of Burgundy, after their departure, arrested several of their accomplices, and the principal movers of the late insurrection, some of whom he caused to be belieaded, others to be hanged or drowned in the Seine; even their leader Cappeluche, the hangman, was beheaded in the market-place. When news of this was carried to the Parisians who had been sent to Montlehery, they marched back to Paris to raise another rebellion, but the gates were closed against them, so that they were forced to return to the siege.

"Charles, in despair of collecting an army which should dare to approach the enemy's entrenchments, not only gave the city of Orleans for lost, but began to entertain a very dismal prospect with regard to the general state of his affairs. He saw that the country in which he had hitherto, with great difficulty, subsisted, would be laid entirely open to the invasion of a powerful and victorious enemy, and he already entertained thoughts of retiring with the remains of his forces into Longuedoc and Dauphiny, and defending himself as long as possible in those remote provinces. But it was fortunate for this good prince, that as he lay under the dominion of the fair, the women whom he consulted had the spirit to support his sinking resolution in this desperate extremity. Mary of Anjou, his queen, a princess of great merit and prodence, vehemently opposed this measure, which she foresow would discourage all his partisans, and serve as a general signal for deserting a prince who seemed himself to despair of success: his mistress too, the fair Agnes Sorel, who lived in entire amity with the queen, seconded all her remonstrances." - Hume.

L'autorité qu'il avoit par sa charge de connétuble, jointe à sa fermeté naturelle, lui donna moyen de tenir la main à l'observation des ordonnances publicés par le roi pour la discipline militaire ; et les examples de sévérité qu'il fit d cet égard, lui firent donner le surnom de justicier. The matter (says De Serres) was found ridiculous both by the king and his councell, yet must they make some triall. The king takes upon him the habit of a countriman to be disguised: this maid (being brought into the chamber) goes directly to the king in this attire, and salutes him with so madest a countenance, as if she had been bred up in court all her life. They telling her that she was mistaken, she assured them it was the king, although she had never seene him. She begins to deliver unto him this new charge, which, she sayes, she had received from the God of Heaven; so as she turned the eyes and minds of all men upon her."

"King Henry 111, of England, being desirous to know what was wrought in a king by his unction, consulted by letter about it with that great scholler of the age Robert Grossetest bishop of Lincoln, who answered him thus : - ' Quod antem in fine litera vestra nobis mandastis, videlicet quod intimaremus quid unctionis sacramentum videatur adjicere regiæ dignitati, cum multi sint reges qui nullatenus unctionis munera decorentur, non est nostræ modicitatis complete hoc. Acta Sanct. tom. ii. p. 352, Jan. 21. Vita S. Agnetis. Auct. S. Ambrosio.

They have a legend in Cornwall that St. Agnes "escaped out of the prison at Rome, and taking shipping, landed at St Piran Arwothall, from whence she travelled on foot to what is now her own parish. But being several times tempted by the Devil on her way, as often as she turned about to rebuke him, she turned him into a stone, and indeed there are still to be seen on the Downs, between St. Piran and St. Agnes, several large moor stones, pitched on end, in a straight line, about a quarter of a mile distant one from the other, doubtless put there on some remarkable account." There lived then in that part of the country a famous Wrath or Giant, by name Bolster, of that ilk. He got hold of the Saint, and obliged her to gather up the stones on his domain; she carried them in three apron-fulls to the top of the hill, and made with them three great heaps, from which the hill is now called, sometimes Carne Breanich, sometimes St. Agnes' Beacon. At last this Giant or Wruth attempted to seduce her; she pretended to yield, provided he would fill a hole which she showed him with his blood : he agreed to this, not knowing that the hole opened into the sea; she thus cunningly bled him to death, and then tumbled him over the cliff. This they still call the Wrath's Hole. It is on the top of the eliff, not far from St. Agnes' chapel and well ; and, enlarging as it goes downward, opens into a cave fretted-in by the sea, and, from the nature of the stone, streaked all over with bright red streaks like blood. After this she lived some time here, and then died, having first built her chapel and her well. The water of this well is excellent ; and the pavement, they tell you, is colored with her own blood, and the more you rub it, the more it shows, - such being, indeed, the nature of the stone. She likewise left the mark of her foot on a rock, not far from it, still called St. Agnes' foot, which they tell you will fit a foot of any size ; and indeed it is large enough so to do. These monkish stories caused a great resort here in former days, and many cures are pretended to have been dooe by the water of this well, so blest by her miraculous blood." - Poluhele's History of Cornwall, i. 176-7. - N.

St. Agnes, St. Catharine, and St. Margaret, were the saints more particularly reverenced by the Maid of Orleans.

Such is the legend of St. Katharine, princess of Alexandria, whose story has been pictured upon sign-pests and in churches, but whose memory has been preserved in this country longer by the ale-house than by the altar. The most extravagant perhaps of Dryden's plays is upon this subject. In the first edition, I had, ignorantly, represented Katharine as dying upon the wheel, and the description of her sufferings was far too minute. Dryden has committed the last fault in a far greater degree; the old martyrologies particularize no cruelties more revolting to the reader than he has detailed in the speech of Maximi when he orders her to execution.

From a passage in the Jerusalem Conquistada it should seem that St. Katharine was miraculously betrothed to ber heavenly spouse. As the crusaders approach Jerusalem, they visit the holy places on their way;

> Qual visita el lugar con llanto tierno, Donde la hermosa virgen Caterina Se desposo con el Espasa cterno, La Angelica Rachel siendo madrina; Aquel Esposo, que el nevado invierno Se cubrio con escarcha matutina, El que tiene los ojos de palomas Y del lubio de lirio vierte aromás. — Lope de Vega.

The marginal note adds La Virgen fuc Madrina en los despo rios de Caterina y Christo.

Of St. Margaret, the other favorite Saint of the Maid, I find recorded by Bergomensis, that she called the pagan Præfect an impudent dog, that she was thrown into a dungeon, where a horrible dragon swallowed her, that she crossed herself, upon which the dragon immediately hurst and she came out safe, and that she saw the devil standing in the coroer like a black man, and seized him and threw him down.

Absurd as this legend is, it ence eccusioned a very extraordinary murder. A young Lombard, ofter hearing it, proyed so earnestly for an opportunity of fighting with the devil like St. Margaret, that he went into the fields in full expectation that his desire would be gratified. A hideous old dumh woman come by: he mistook her for the tempter; her inarticulate noises confirmed him in this opinion, and he knocked her dawn and trampled upon her. The poor wretch died of her braises; but a miraele was wronglt to save her nurderer, in consideration that his madness was a pious madness, and hefore she died, she spoke to excuse the mistake. This tale is told in that strange collection of ludicrons stories upon religions subjects, the Pia IHlaria. The authority referred to is Petr. Rausani IIist. lib. 35.

The viol played with a bow, and wholly different from the vielle, whose tenes are produced by the friction of a wheel, which indeed performs the part of a bow, was very early in favor with the inhabitants of France.

He run up round the city sixty forts. How great seever this work might be, nothing could divert him from it, since the success of the siege entirely depended upon it. In vain would be have pursued his attack, if the enemies could continually introduce fresh supplies. Besides, the season, now far advanced, suggested to him, that he would be forced to pass the winter in the camp, and during that time be liable to many insults. Among the sixty forts, there were six much stronger than the rest, upon the six principal avenues of the city. The French could before with ease introduce convoys into the place, and had made frequent use of that advantage. But after these forts were huilt, it was with extreme difficulty that they could, now and then, give some assistance to the besieged. Upon these six redeabts the general erected batteries, which thundered against the walls." - Rapin.

The Persians say, that Alexander coming to understand, that in the mountain of Kaf there was a great cave, very black and dark, wherein ran the water of immortality, would needs take a journey thither. But heing afraid to lose his way in the cave, and considering with himself that he had committed a great oversight in leaving the more aged in cities and fortified places, and keeping about his person only young people, such as were not able to advise him, he ordered to be brought to him some old man, whose counsel he might follow in the adventure he was then upon. There were in the whole army but two brothers, named Chidder and Elias, who had brought their father along with them, and this good old man hade his sons go and tell Alexander, that to go through with the design he had undertaken, his only way were to take a mare that had a colt at her heels, and to ride upon her into the cave, and leave the colt at the entrance of it, and the mare would infallibly bring him back again to the same place without any trouble. Alexander thought the advice so good, that he would not take any other person with him in that journey but those two brothers, leaving the rest of his retinne at the entrance of the cave. He advanced so far that he came to a gate, so well polished, that notwithstanding the great darkness, it gave light enough to let him see there was a bird fastened thereto. The bird asked Alexander what he would have? He made answer that he looked for the water of immortality. The bird asked him, what was done in the world? Mischief enough, replies Alexander, since there is no vice or sin but reigns there. Wherenpon the hird getting loose and flying away, the gate opened and Alexander saw an Angel sitting, with a trumpet in his hand, holding it as if he were going to put it to his month. Alexander asked him his name. The Angel made answer his name was Raphael, and that he only staid for a command from God to blow the trumpet and to call the deal to judgment. Which having said, he asks Alexander who he was? I am Alexander, replied he, and I seek the water of immortality. The Angel gave him a stone, and said to him, go thy wayes, and look for another stone of the same weight with this, and then thou shalt find immortality. Whereupon Alexander asked how long be had to live. The angel said to him, till such time as the heaven and the earth which encompass thee be turned to iron. Alexander, being come out of the cave, sought a long time, and not meeting with any stone just of the same weight with the other, he put one into the balance which he thought came very near it, and finding but very little difference, he added thereto a little earth, which made the scales even; it being Ged's intention to shew Alexander thereby, that he was not to expect immortality till he himself were put into the earth. At last Alexander having one day a fall off his horse in the harren ground of Gbur, they laid him upon the coat he wore over his armour, and covered him with his buckler to keep off the heat of the sun. Then he began to comprehend the prophecy of the Angel, and was satisfied the hour of his death was at hand ; accordingly he died.

They add to this fable, that the two brothers Chidder and Elias druak of the water of immortality, and that they are still living but invisible, Elias upon the earth, and Chidder in the water; wherein the latter latt so great power, that those who are in danger of being destroyed by water, if they earnestly pray, vowing an offering to him, and firmly believing that he can relieve them, shall escape the danger.

Ambassudor's Travels.

Kidir and Eluss occupy a distinguished place in the legion of prophets. The name of the first signifies verdant, alluding to the power which he possessed of producing, wherever he trod, the most beautiful and enchanting verdure. These two are regarded as the protectors and tutelary gods of travellers; the former upon the sea, the latter upon the land; and they are through to be incessantly employed in promoting these solutary objects. In their rapid and uniform courses, they are believed to meet once a year at Mua, in the environs of Mecca, the day on which the pilgrms are assembled.

NOTE 112, p. 38, col. 1. - Strong were the English forts

The patience and perseverance of a besieging army in these ages appear almost incredible to us now. The camp of Fer dinand before Granada swelled into a city. Edward HI made a market town before Calais. Upon the captain's refusal to surrender, says Barnes, "the began to entrench himself strongly about the city, setting his own tent directly against the clicif gates at which he intended to cater ; then he placed bastions between the town and the river, and set out regular streets, and rearred up decent buildings of strong timber between the trenches, which he covered with thatch, | reed, broom and skins. Thus he encompassed the whole town of Calais, from Risban on the northwest side to Courgaine on the northeast, all along by Sangate, at Purt and Fort de Nicolay, commonly by the English called Newlandb-idge, down by Hammes, Colugne and Marke ; so that his camp looked like a spacious city, and was usually by strangers, that came thither to market, called New Calais. For this prince's reputation for justice was so great, that to his markets (which he held in his camp twice every week, viz. on Tuesdays and Saturdays for flesh, fish, bread, wine and ale, with cloth and all other necessaries,) there came not only bis friends and allies from England, Flanders and Aquitain, but even many of king Philip's subjects and confederates conveyed thither their cattle and other commodities to be sold."

Vegetius says, that the balista discharged darts with such rapidity and violence, that nothing could resist their force. This eagine was used particularly to discharge darts of a surprising length and weight, and often many small ones together. Its form was not unlike that of a broken bew; it had two arms, but straight and aot curved like those of a cross-bow, of which the whole acting force consists in bending the bow. The hayle or lists was a space on the outside of the ditch surrounded by strong palisades, and sometimes by a low embattled wall. In the attack of fortresses, as the range of the machines then in use did not exceed the distance of four stadia, the besiegers did not carry on their approaches by means of treaches, but begue their operations above ground, with the attack of the hayle or lists, where many feats of chivalry were performed by the knights and men at arms, who considered the assault of that work as particularly belonging to them, the weight of their armor preventing them from scaling the walls. As this part was attacked by the knights and men at arms, it was also defended by those of the same tank in the place, whence many single conhats were fought here. This was at the first investing of the place, — Gross.

In the enlightened and free states of Greece, every soldier was well provided with defeosive arms. In Rome, a civic wreath was the reward of him who should save the life of a citizen. But to use the words of Dr. Gillies, "the miserable peasants of modern Europe are expused without defence as without remorse, by the ambition of men, whom the Greeks would have styled tyrants."

The nature of this barrier has been explained in a previous note. The possibility of leaping upon it is exemplified in the following adventure, which is characteristic of the period in which it happened, (1370.)

"At that time there was done an extraordinary feat of arms by a Scotch knight, named sir John Assueton, being one of those men of arms of Scotland, who had now entered king Edward's pay. This man left his rank with his spear in his hand, his page riding behind him, and went towards the barriers of Noyon, where he alighted, saying, 'Here held my horse, and stir not from hence ;' and so he came to the bar-There were there at that time sir John de Rove, and sir Lancelot de Lorris, with ten or twelve more, who all wondered what this knight designed to do. He for his part being close at the barriers said unto them, 'Gentlemen, I am come hither to visit you, and because I see you will not come forth of your barriers to me, I will come in to you, if I may, and prove my knighthood against yon. Win me if yon can.² And with that he leaped over the bars, and hegan to lay about him like a lion, he at them and they at him; so that he alone fought thus against them all for near the space of an hour, and hurt several of them. And all the while those of the town beheld with much delight from the walls and their garret windows his great activity, strength and courage ; but they offered not to do him any hurt, as they might very easily have done, if they had been minded to cast stones or darts at him; but the French knights charged them to the contrary, saying 'how they should let them alone to deal with him. When matters had continued thus about ao hour, the Scotch page came to the harriers with his master's horse in his hand, and said in his language, 'Sir, pray come away, it is high time for you to leave off now; for the army is marcaed nff out of sight.' The knight heard his man, and then gave two or three terrible strokes about him to clear the way, and so, armed as he was, he leaped back again over the barriers and mounted his horse, having not received any hurt; and turning to the Frenchmen, said, 'Adieu, sirs! I thank you for my diversion.' And with that he rode after his man upon the spinr towards the army." - Joshun Barnes, p. 801.

The precaution recommended by Vitruvins had not been observed in the construction of the English walls. On each side of every tower, a small door opened upon the wall; and the garrison of one tower are represented in the paem as flying by this way from one to shelter themselves in the other. I have met with one instance in English history, and only one, of throwing the spear after the manner of the ancients. It is in Stowe's chronicle. "1442. The 30th of January, a challenge was done in Smithfield within lists, before the king; the one sir Philip de Beawse of Arragon, a knight, and the other an esquire of the king's house called John Ausley or Astley. These comming to the fielde, tooke their tents, and there was the knight's sonne made knight by the king, and so brought again to his father's tent. Then the heralds of armes called them by name to doe their battel, and so they came both all armed, with their weapons; the knight came with his sword drawn, and the esquire with his speare. The esquire cast his speare against the knight, but the knight avoiding it with his sword, cast it to the ground. Then the esquire took his axe and went against the knight suddenly, on whom he stroke many strokes, hard and sore upon his basenet, and on his hand, and made him loose and let fall his axe to the ground, and brast up his limbes three times, and caught his dagger and would have smitten him in the face, for to have slaine him in the field; and then the king cried hoo, and so they were departed and went to their tents, and the king dubbed John Astley knight for his valiant torney, and the knight of Arragon offered his armes at Windsor."

NOTE 129, p. 42, col. 1. - A harlot ! - an adultcress !

This woman, who is always respectably named in French history, had her punishment both in herself and in her child.

"This fair Agnes had been five years in the service of the queen, during which she had enjoyed all the pleasures of life, in wearing rich clothes, forred robes, golden chains, and precious stones; and it was commonly reported that the king often visited her, and maintained her m a state of concubinage, for the people are more inclined to speak ill than well of their superiors.

"The affection the king showed her was as much for her gaiety of temper, pleasing manners, and agreeable conversation, as for her beauty. She was so beautiful that she was called the Fairest of the Fair, and the Lady of Beauty, as well on account of her personal charms, as because the king had given her for life the castle of Beauti enar Faris. She was very charitable, and most liberal in her alms, which she distributed among such churches as were out of repair, and to beggars. It is true that Agnes had a daughter who lived but a short time, which she said was the king's, and gave it to him as the proper father; but the king always excessed himself as not having any claim to it. She may indeed have called in help, for the matter was variously talked of.

⁴⁴ At length she was seized with a howel complaint, and was a long time ill, during which she was very contrite, and sincerely repented of her sins. She often remembered Mary Magdalene, who had been a great sinner, and devoutly invoked God and the virgin Mary to her aid like a true eatholic : after she had received the sacraments, she called for her hosk of prayers, in which she had written with her own hand the verses of St. Bernard to repeat them. She then made many gifts (which were put down in writing, that her executors might fulfil them, with the other articles of her will), which including alms and the payment of her servants might amonat to nearly sixty thousand crowns.

"Her executors were Jacques Cænr, conneellor and master of the wardrohe to the king, master Robert Poictevin physician, and master Stephen Chevalier treasurer to the king, who was to take the lead in the fulfilment of her will should it be his gracious pleasure.

"The fair Agnes, perceiving that she was daily growing weaker, said to the lord de la Trimonille, the lady of the seneschal of Poiton, and one of the king's equerries called Gouffier, in the presence of all her damsels, that our fragile life was but a stinking ordure.

"⁶ She then required that her confessor would give her absolution from all her sins and wickedness, conformable to an absolution, which was, as she said, at Loches, which the confossor on her assurance complied with. After this she uttered a load shriek, and called on the mercy of God and the support of the blessed virgin Mary, and gave up the glost on Monday the 9th day of February, in the year 1449, about six o'clock in the afternoon. Her body was opened, and her heart interred in the church of the said ablay, to which she had been a most liberal benefactres; and her body was conveyed with many honors to Loches, where it was interred in the collegiate church of our Lady, to which also she had made many handsome donations and several foundations. May God have mercy on her soul, and admit it into faradise."

On the 13th day of Jnne, the seneschal of Normandy, count of Manlevrier, and son to the late sir Pierre de Breze, killen at the battle of Montlehery, went to the village of Romiers, near Dourdan, which belonged to him, for the sake of hunting. He took with him his lady, the princess Charlotte of France, natural daughter of the late king Charles the VII by Agnes Sorel. After the chace, when they were returned to Romiers to sup and lodge, the seneschal retired to a singlehedded room for the night; his lady retired also to another chamber, when moved by her disorderly passions (as the hus hand said) she called to her a gentleman from Poitou, named Pierre de la Vegne, who was head huntsman to the seneschal, and made him lie with her. This was told to the senescha! by the master of his household, called Pierre PApothicaire; when he instantly arose, and taking his sword, broke open the door of the chamber where his lady and the huntsman were in hed. The huntsman started up in his shirt, and the seneschal gave him first a severe blow with his sword on the head.

The heart of Bruce was, by his own dying will, intrusted to Douglas to bear it to Jerusalem. This is one of the finest stories in the whole age of chivalrous history. Douglas inshrined the heart in a golden case, and wore it round his neck; he landed in Spain on his way, and stopped to assist the Castillians against the Moors, — probably during the siege of Algeriras. There, in the heart of action, he took the heart from his neck, and east it into the thick of the enemy, exclaining, as Barbour has it,

> " Now pass thou forth before As thou wast wont in fight to be,

And I shall follow or else die."

And I shall follow of else die.

In this action he perished, and from that time the bloody heart has been borne by the family.

Next the bayle was the ditch, foss, graff, or mote : generally where it could be a wet one, and pretty deep. The passage over it was by a draw-bridge, covered by an advonce work called a barbican. The barbican was sometimes beyond the ditch that covered the draw-bridge, and in towns and large fortresses had frequently a ditch and draw-bridge of its own. Grose.

Note 136, p. 45, col. 1. - The embattled wall.

The outermost walls enclosing towns or fortresses were commonly perpendicular, or had a very small external tains. They were flanked by semi-circular, polygonal, or square towers, commonly about forty or fifty yards distant from each other. Within were steps to mount the terre-pleine of the walls or rampart, which were always defended by an embattled or crenellated parapet. — Grose.

The fortifications of the middle ages differed in this respect from those of the ancients. When the besiegers had gauaed the summit of the wall, the descent on the other side was safe and easy. But "the ancients did not generally support their walls on the inside with earth in the manner of the talus or slope, which made the attacks more dangerous. For though the enemy had gained some footing upon them, he could not assure himself of taking the city. It was necessary to get down, and to make use of some of the ladders hy which he had mounted ; and that descent exposed the soldier to very great danger." — Rollin.

NOTE 137, p. 45, enl. 1. - Behind the guardian pavais fenced.

The pavais, or pavache, was a large shield, or rather a portable mantlet, capable of covering a man from head to foot, and probably of sufficient thickness to resist the missive weapons then in use. These were in sieges earried by servants, whose business it was to cover their masters with them, whilst they, with their bows and arrows, shot at the enemy on the ramparts. As this must have been a service of danger, it was that perhaps which made the office of scutifer honorable. The pavais was rectangolar at the bottom, hat rounded off above : it was sometimes supported by props. — Grast.

Note 139, p. 45, col. 1. - Tortoises

The tortoise was a machine composed of very strong and solid timber work. The height of it to its highest heam, which sustained the roof, was twelve feet. The base was square, and each of its fronts twenty-five feet. It was covered with a kind of quilted mattress made of raw hides, and prepared with different drugs to prevent its being set on fire by combustibles. This heavy machine was supported upon four wheels, or perhaps upon eight. It was called tortoise from its serving as a very strong covering and defence against the enormous weights thrown down on it; those under it being safe in the same manner as a tortoise under his shell It was used both to fill up the fosse, and for sapping. It may not be improper to add, that it is believed, so enormous a weight could not be moved from place to place on wheels, and that it was pushed forward on rollers. Under these wheels or rollers, the way was laid with strong planks to facilitate its motion, and prevent its sinking into the ground, from whence it would have been very difficult to have removed it. The ancients have observed that the roof had a thicker covering, of hides, hurdles, sea-weed, &c. than the sides, as it was exposed to much greater shocks from the weights thrown upon it by the besieged. It had a door in front, which was drawn up by a chain as far as was necessary, and covered the soldiers at work in filling up the fosse with fascines. - Rollin.

This is the tortoise of the ancients, but that of the middle ages differed from it in nothing material.

The garnson on their part essayed by the discharge of machines, cross end long bows, to keep the enemy at a distance." - Grose.

This weapon was again introduced into our armies by Richard I., who being slain with a quarrel shot from one of them, at the siege of the castle of Chaluz in Normandy, it was considered as a judgment from heaven inflicted upon him for his impiety. Guillaume le Breton, relating the death of this king, puts the following into the month of Atropos :

The following extract from the History of Edward III, by Joshua Barnes contains a full account of these moving towers. « Now the earl of Darby had layn before Reulo more than savages breaking in emong them, began on the sudden another nice weeks, in which time he had made two vest beliroys or bastilles of massy timber, with three stages or floors ; each of the belfroys running on four huge wheels, bound about with thick hoops of iron; and the sides and other parts that any ways respected the town were covered with raw hides, thick loid, to defend the engines from fire and shot. In every one of these stages were placed an hundred archers, and between the two bastilles, there were two hundred men with pickaxes and mattocks. From these six stages six hundred archers shot so fiercely all altogether, that no man could appear at his defence without a sufficient punishment: so that the belfroys being brought upon wheels by the strength of men over a part of the ditch, which was purposely niede plain and level by the faggots and earth and stones cast upon them, the two hundred pioneers plyed their work so well under the protection of these engines, that they made a considerable breach through the walls of the town."

Note 149, p. 46, col. 1. - Archers, through the opening, shot their shafts.

Note 151, p. 46, col. 2. - On the ramparts lowered from nhare

The bridge reclines.

These bridges are described by Rollin in the account of the moving towers which he gives from Vegetius : - " The moving towers are made of an assemblage of heams and strong planks, not unlike a house. To secure them against the fires thrown by the besieged, they are covered with raw hides, or with pieces of cloth made of hair. Their height is in proportion to their base. They are sometimes thirty feet square, and sometimes forty or fifty. They are higher than the walls or even towers of the city. They are supported upon several wheels according to mechanic principles, by the means of which the machine is essily made to move, how great soever it may he. The town is in great danger if this tower can approach the walls; for it has stairs from one story to another, and includes different methods of attack. At bottom it has a ram to batter the wall, and on the middle story a draw-bridge, made of two heams with rails of basket-work, which lets down easily upon the wall of a city, when within the reach of it. The besiegers pass upon this bridge, to make themselves masters of the wall Upon the higher stories are soldiers armed with pertisans and missive weapons, who keep a perpetual discharge upon the works. When offairs are in this posture, a place seldom held out long. For what can they hope who have nothing to confide in but the height of their ramparts, when they see others suddenly appear which command them? "

The towers or belfreys of modern times rarely exceeded three or four stages or stories.

"And here, with leave bespoken to recite a grand fable, though dignified by our best poets, while Brutus on a certain festival day, solemnly kept on that shore where he first landed, was with the people in great jollity and mirth, a crew of these sort of game than at such a meeting was expected. But at length by many hands overcome, Goemagog the hugest, in beight twelve cubits, is reserved alive, that with him Corineous who desired nothing more, might try his strength; whom in a wrestle the giant catching aloft, with a terrible lugg broke three of his ribs: nevertheless Corineus enraged heaving him up by main force, and on his shoulders hearing him to the next high rock, three kim headlong all shattered into the sea, and left his name on the cliff, called ever since Langoemagog, which is to say, the giant's leap.'' — Miton's Hist. of England.

The expression brate vastness is taken from the same work of Milton, where he relates the death of Morindus. "Well fitted to such a beastial ernelty was his end; for hearing of a huge monster that from the Irish sea infested the coast, and in the pride of his strength foolishly attempting to set mauly valor against a brute vastness, when his weapons were all in vain, by that horrible month he was catched up and devoured."

Note 154, p. 47, col. 2. - This is a favor.

"The tournelles adjoining to the bridge was kept by Glaeidas (one of the most resolute captains among the English,) having well encouraged his men to defend themselves and to fight for their lives.

"The skirmish begins at nine of the clock in the morning, and the ladders are planted. A storm of English arrows falls upon our men with such violence as they recoiled. 'How now !' saith the Virgin, 'have we begin so well to cud so ill? let us charge! they are our own, seeing God is on our side!' so every one recovering his forces, flocks about the Virgin. The English double the storm upon the thickest of the troops. The Virgin fighting in the foremost ranks and encouraging her men to do well was shot through the arm with an arrow; she, nothing amazed, takes the arrow in one hand and her sword in the other, 'This is a favor!' says she, 'het us go on! they cannot escape the hand of GOD!'"

Chapelain has dilated this exclamation of the Maid into a ridiculous speech.

Quoy! volcureux Guerriers, quoy! dans vostre avantage Un peu de sang perdu vous fait perdre courage! Pour moy, je le repute a supreme bonheur, Et dans ee petit mal je trouve un grand honneur; Le succes, bien qu'heureux, n'east en rien d'honnorable, Si le Ciel n'eust permis un coup si favorable ; Fous n'en verrez pas moins vos bras vietorieux, P'en verrey sculement mon nom plus glorieux. - L. 111.

The importance attached to a second name is well exemplified by an extract in Selden, relating to "the creation of Rubert carle of Glocester natural some to king Henry I. Then the assault was renewed much hotter than ever, till at last the prince saw there was no likelihood of prevailing that way. Wherefore presently he gave order to raise certain engines, wherewith they east combustible matter enflamed after the manner of wild fire into the base court so fast, and in such quantities, that at last the whole court seemed to be one huge fire. Wherenpon the excessive heat prevailed so, that it took hold of the roof of a great tower, which was covered with reed, and so began to spread over all the eastle. Now therefore when these valiant captains within saw, that of necessity they must either submit entirely to the prince's courtesy, or perish by the most merciless of elements, they all together came down and yielded themselves absolutely to his grace." - Joshua Barnes.

The oriflamme was a standard erected to denote that no quarter would be given. It is said to have been of red silk, adorned and beaten with very broad and fair lilies of gold, and bordered about with gold and vermilion. Le Moyne has given it a suitable escort :

Ensuite l'oriflamme ardent et luminense, Marche sur un graud char, dont la forme est affreuse. Quatre enormes dragons d'un or ombre ceaillez, Et de pourpre, d'aur, et de vert emailles, Dans quelque occasion que le besoin le porte, Luy font une pompeuse et formidable escorte Dans leur terribles yeux des grenns arrondis, De leur feu, de leur sang, font peur aux plus hardis, Et si ce feu paroist allumer leur andace, Aussi paroist ce sang animer leur menace. Le char roulant sous eux, il semble au roulement, Qu'il les fasse voler avecque siffement : Et de la poudre, en l'air, il se fsit des functes A leur bouches du vent et du bruit animées. Philip is said by some historians to have creeted the ori-famme at Cressy, where Edward in return raised up his burning dragon, the English signal for no quarter. The oriflammo was originally used only in wars against the Infidels, for it was a sacred banner, and believed to have been sent from Heaven.

Our men, greatly encouraged by the Virgin, | ran fiercely on the project, especially when clapt on with run headlong to the hastion and force a point thereof; then fire and stones rain so violently, as the English being amazed, forsake their defences : some are slain upon the place, some throw themselves down headlong, and fly to the tower upon the bridge. In the end this brave Glacidas abandons this quarter, and retires into the base court upon the bridge, and after him a great number of his soldiers. The bridge greatly shaken with artillery, tryed by fire, and uvercharged with the weight of this multitude, sinks into the water with a fearful cry, carrying all this multitude with it. - De Scrres.

This circumstance has been magnified into a miracle. "The French, for the most part, draw the iostitution of the order of St. Michael principally from a purpose that Charles had to make it, after the apparition of the archangel upon Orleans bridge, as the tutelary angell of France assisting against the English in 1428." - Selden's Titles of Honor.

The expressions are somewhat curious in the patent of this erdre de Monsieur St. Michael Archange. Louis XI. instituted it "d la gloire et louange de Dieu nostre createur tout puissant, et reverence de la glorieuse vierge Marie, à l'honneur et reverence de St. Michuel, premier chevalier, qui par la querelle de Dicu, battaile contre l'ancien enemy de l'humain lignage, et le fit tresbucher de Ciel."

Note 162, p. 59, col. 1. - . . . the proud prelate, that bloodguilty man,

Who, trembling for the church's illgot wealth.

Bade our Fifth Henry elaim the crown of France.

But the first terrible blow in England given generally to all Orders, was in the Lay Parliament, as it is called, which did wholly Wicclifize, kept in the twelfth year of king Henry the Fourth, wherein the Nobles and Commons assembled, signified to the King, that the temporal possessions of Abbots, Priors, &c. lewdly spent within the Realm, would suffice to find and austain 150 Earls, 1500 Knights, 6200 Esquires, 100 Hospitals, more than there were. But this motion was maul'd with the king's own hand, who dash'd it, personally interposing Himself contrary to that character, which the jealous Clergy had conceived of Him, that coming to the Crown He would be a great enemy to the Church. But though Henry Plantagenet Duke of Lancaster was no friend to the Clergie, perchance to ingratiate himself with the people, yet the same Henry king of England, His interest being altered, to strengtheo Him with the considerable power of the Clergy, proved a Patron yea a Champion to defend them. However we may say, that now the Ace is laid to the root of the tree of Abbeys ; and this stroke for the present, though it was so far from hurting the body, that it scarce pierced the bark thereof, yet bare attempts in such matters are important, as putting into people's heads a feasihility of the project formerly conceived altogether impossible.

Few years after, namely, in the second year of king Henry the Fifth, another shrewd thrust was made at English Abbeys, but it was finely and cleverly put aside by that skilful State-Fencer Henry Chickesly Archbishop of Canterbury. For the former Bill against Abbeys, in full Parliament was revived, when the Archbishop minded king Henry of his undoubted Title to the fair and flourishing kingdom of France. Hereat, that king who was a spark in Himself, was enflamed to that design by this Prelate's persuasian : and his native courage conscience and encouragement from a church man in the lawfulness thereof. An undertaking of those vast dimensions, that the greatest covetousness might spread, and highest amhition reach itself within the bounds thereof. If to promote this project, the Abbeys advanced not only large and liberal, but vast and incredible sums of money, it is no wonder if they were contented to have their nuils pared close to the quick thereby to save their fingers. Over goes king Henry into France, with many martial spirits attending him, so that putting the king upon the seeking of a new Crown, kept the Abbots' old Mitres upon their heads; and Monasteries tottering at this time, were (thank a politic Archbishop) refixed on the firm foundations, though this proved rather a reprieve than a pardon unto them. - Faller's Church History, B. 6, p. 302.

The archbishop of Bourges explained to the king, in the hall of the hishop of Winchester, and in the presence of the dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Gloucester, brothers to the king, and of the lords of the council, clergy, chivalry and populace, the objects of his embassy. The archbishop spoke first in Latin, and then in the Walloon lauguage, sn eloquently and wisely, that both English and French who heard him were greatly surprised. At the conclusion of his harangue he made offers to the king of a large sum of ready money on his marriage with the princess Catherine, but on condition that he would disband the army he had collected at Southamptan, and at the adjacent seaports, to invade France ; and that by these means an eternal peace would be established between the two kingdoms.

The assembly broke up when the archbishop had ended his speech, and the French ambassadors were kindly entertained at dinner by the king, who then appointed a day for them to receive his answer to their propositions by the mouth of the archbishop of Canterbury.

In the course of the archbisbop's speech, in which he replied, article hy article, to what the archhishop of Bourges had offered, he added to some and passed over others of them, so that he was sharply interrupted by the archbishop of Bourges, who exclaimed, "I did not say so, but such were my words." The conclusion, however, was, that unless the king of France would give, as a marriage-portion with his daughter, the duchies of Acquitaine, of Normandy, of Anjon, of Tours, the counties of Ponthieu, Maine and Poitou, and every other part that had formerly belonged to the English monarchs, the king would not desist from his intended invasion of France, but would despoil the whole of that kingdom which had been unjustly detained from him; and that he should depend on his aword for the accomplishment of the above, and for depriving king Charles of his crown.

The king avowed what the erchbishop had said, and added that thus, with God's aid, he would act ; and promised it on the word of a king. The archbishop of Bourges then, according to the custom in France, demanded permission to speak and said, "O king! how canst then, consistently with honor and justice, thus wish to dethrone and iniquitously destroy the most Christian king of the French, our very dear lord and most excellent of all the kings in christendom ? O king ! with all due reverence and respect, dost thou think that he has offered by me such extent of territory, and so large a sum of money with his daughter in marriage, through any fear of thee, thy subjects or allies ? By no means ; but, moved by pity and his love of peace, he has made these offers to avoid the shedding of innocent blood, and that Christian people may not be overwhelmed in the miseries of war; for whenever thon shalt make thy promised attempt he will call upon God, the blessed Virgin, and on all the saints, making his appeal to them for the justice of his cause ; and with their aid, and the support of his loyal subjects and faithful allies, thou wilt be driven out of his dominions, or thou wilt be made prisoner, or thou wilt there suffer death hy orders of that just king whose ambassadors we are.

"We have now only to intreat of thee that thou wouldst have us safely conducted out of thy realm; and that thou wouldst write to our said king, under thy hand and seal, the answer which thou hast given to us."

The king kindly granted their request; and the ambassadors, having received handsome presents, returned hy way of Dover to Calais and theace to Paris.

Monstrelct, vol. iv. p. 129.

Within a few days after the expiration of tha truce, king Henry, whose preparations were now completed, sent one of his heralds, called Glocester, to Paris, to deliver letters to the king, of which the contents were as follows.

"To the very noble prince Charles, our cousin and adversory of France, Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and of France. To give to every one what is their due, is a work of inspiration and wise council, very noble prince, our cousin and adversary. The noble kingdoms of England and France were formerly united, now they are divided. At that time it was customary for each person to exalt his name hy glorious victories, and by this single virtue to extol the honor of God, to whom holiness belongs, and to give peace to his church, by subjecting in battle the enemies of the public weal; but alas! good faith among kindred and brotherly love have been perverted, and Lot persecutes Abraham by human imputation, and Dissention, the mother of Anger, has been raised from the dead.

"We, however, appeal to the sovereign Judge, who is neither swayed by prayers nor gifts from doing right, that we bave, from pure affection, done every thing in our power to preserve the peace; and we must now rely on the sword for regaining what is justly our heritage, and those rights which have from old time belonged to us; and we feel such assurance in our courage, that we will fight till death in the cause of justice.

"The written law in the hook of Deuteronomy ordains, that before any person commences an attack on a city he shall first offer terms of peace; and although violence has detained from us our rightful inheritances, charity, however, induces us to attempt, by fuir means, their recovery; for should justice be denied us, we may then resort to arms

"And to avoid baving our conscience affected by this matter, we make our personal request to you, and exhort you, by the bowels of Jesus Christ, to follow the dictates of his evangelical doctrice. Friend, restore what thou owest, fir such is the will of God to prevent the effusion of the blood of man, who was created in his likeness. Such restitution of rights, cruelly torn from us, and which we have so frequently demanded by our ambassadors, will be agreeable to the supreme God, and secure peace on earth.

"From our love of peace we were inclined to refuse fifty thousand golden crowns lately offered us; for being more desirous of peace than riches, we have preferred enjoying the patrimony left us hy our venerable ancestors, with our very dear consin Catherine, your noble daughter, to iniquitously multiplying our treasures, and thus disgracing the honor of our crown, which God forbid !

While Henry V. lay at the siege of Dreux, an honest hermit unknown to him, came and told him the great evils he brought upon christendom by his unjust ambition, who usarped tho kingdom of France, against all manner of right, and contrary to the will of God; wherefore in his holy name he threatened him with a severe and sudden punishment, if he desisted not from his enterprise. Henry took this exhortation either as an idly whimsey, or a suggestion of the Dauphin's, and was but the more confirmed in his design. But the blow soon followed the threatening; for within some few months after, he was smitten in the fundament with a strange and incurable disease. Meteray.

The shield was often worn thus. "Among the Frenchmen there was a young lusty esquire of Gascoigne, named William Marchant, who came out among the foremost into the field, well mounted, his shield about his neck, and his spear in his hand." — Barnes.

This is frequently alluded to in romance. "Then the knight of the hurning sword stept forward, and lifting up his arm as if he would strike Cynocephal on the top of his head, seized with his left hand on the shield, which he pulled to him with so much strength, that plucking it from his neck he brought him to the ground."—Amadis de Greece.

Sometimes the shield was laced to the shoulder.

The shield of the middle ages must oot be confounded with that of the ancients. The knight might easily bear his small shield around his neck; but the Greeian warrior stood protecting his thighs and his legs, his breast also and his shoulders with the body of his broad shield.

"Ao herald of the duka of Gueldres, heing well skilled in the French tengue, was sent on this errand : he rede forth till he came to the Freach host, where being admitted before the king and his council, he spake alond these words, ' Sir, the king of Eogland is here hard by in the fields, and desires to fight you power against power; and if you please to appoint him a day he will not fail to meet you upon the word of a king.' This message being thus delivered, king Philip yielded either to give or taka battle two days after, and in token of his acceptance of the news, richly rewarded the herald with furred gowns, and other gifts bestowed on him, as well by himself as others, tha princes and lords of his host, and so dismissed him again."-Barnes.

Religious ceromonies seem to have preceded all settled engagements at this period. On the night before the battle of Cressy, "King Edward made a supper in his royal pavilion for all his chief barons, lords and captains : at which he appeared wonderful chearful and pleasant, to the great encouragement of his people. But when they were all dismissed to their several quarters, the king himself retired into his private oratory, and came before the altar, and there prestrated himself to almighty God and devoutly prayed, 'That of his infinita goodness he would vouchsafe to look down on the justice of his cause, and remember his unfeigned endeavors for a recoecilement, although they had all been rendered frustrate by his enemies : that if he should be brought to a battle the next day, it would please him of his great mercy to grant him the victory, as his trust was only in him, and in the right which be had given him.' Being thus ermed with faith, about midoight he laid himself upon a pallet or mattress to take a little repose ; but he arose again betimes and heard mass, with his son the young prince, and received absolution, and the body and blood of his Redeemer, as did the prince also, and mest of the lords and others who were so disposed." - Barnes.

The conduct of the Eoglish oe the morning of the battle of Cressy is followed in the text. "All things being thus ordered, avery lord and captain under his own banner and pennon, and the ranks duly settled, the valoarous young king monnted on a losty white bobby, and with a white wond in his hand, rode betwee his two marshalls from rank to rank, and from one battalia unto another, exhorting and eccouraging every men that day to defend and maintein his right and honour; and this he did with so chearful a countenance, and with such weet and obliging words, that even the most faint-bearted of the army were sufficiently assured thereby. By that time the English were thus prepared, it was nine e'clock in the morning, end then the king commanded them all to teke their morning, end then the king commanded them all to teke their disturbance they ell repsired to their colours again, end then laid themselves in their order upon the dry and warm grass, with their bows and helmets by their side, to be more fresh end vigorous upon the approach of the enemy." — Barnes.

The English before the battle of Agincourt "fell prostrate to the ground, and committed themselves to God, every of them tooke in his month a little piece of earth, in remembrance that they were mortall end made of earth, es also in remembrance of the holy communion." - Stave.

An incident before the battle of Najara exemplifies this. "As the two armies spproached near together, the prince went over a little hill, in the descending whereof he saw plainly his enemies marching toward him : wherefore when the whole army was come over this mountain, he commanded that there they should make an halt, sod so fit themselves for fight. At that instant the lord Jobn Chendos brought his ensign folded up, and offered it to the prince, saying, 'Sir, here is my guidon; I request your highness to display it abroad, and to give me leave to raise it this day as my banner; for I thank God and your highness, I have lands and possessions sufficient to maintain it withall.' Then the prince took the pennon, and having cut off the tail, made it a square hanner, and this done, both he and king Don Pedro for the greater honour, helding it between their hands displayed it abroad, it being Or, a sharp pile Gules : and then the prince delivered it unto the lord Chandos again, saying, ' Sir John, behold here is your banner. God send you much joy and honour with it." And thus being made a knight benneret, the lord Chandos returned to the head of his men, and anid, ' Here, gentlemen, behold my banner and yours ! Take and keep it, to your honour and mine !' And so they took it with a shout, and said by the grace of God and St. George they would defend it to tha best of their powers. But the banner remained in the hands of a gallant English esquire nemed William Allestry, who bere it ell that day, end ecquitted himself in the servica right honourably." - Barnes.

Thus also at Poictiers, "there you might have behold a most ocautiful sight of fair harness, of shining steel, feathered crests of glittering helmets, and the rich embroidery of silken aurcoate of arms, together with golden standards, banners and pennons gloriously moving in the air."

And at Najara "the sun being now risen, it was a ravishing sight to behold the armies, and the sun reflecting from their bright steel and shining armour. For in those days the cavalty were generally armed io mail or polished steel at all points, and besides that, the nobility wore over their armour rich surcoats of silk and satin embroidery, whereon was curiously sticht or beaten, the arms of their house, whether in endour or metal."

It was not uncommon to bear a motto upon the sword. Lope de Vega describes that of Aguilar as bearing inlaid in gold, a verse of the paalms. It was, he says,

The Vision of the Maid of Orleans.

In the first edition of Joan of Are this Vision formed the ninth book, allegorieal machinery having been introduced throughout the poem as originally written. All that remained of such machinery was expunged in the second edition, and the Vision was then struck out, as no longer according with the general design.

THE FIRST BOOK.

ORLEANS was hush'd in sleep. Stretch'd on her eouch The delegated Maiden lay; with toil Exhausted, and sore anguish, soon she closed Her heavy eyelids; not reposing then, For busy phantasy in other scenes Awaken'd: whether that superior powers, By wise permission, prompt the midnight dream, Instructing best the passive faculty;¹

Or that the soul, escaped its fleshly elog, Flies free, and soars amid the invisible world,

And all things are that seem.² Along a moor, Barren, and wide, and drear, and desolate, She roam'd, a wanderer through the cheerless night. Far through the silence of the unbroken plain The bittern's boom was heard; hoarse, heavy, deep, It made accordant music to the scene. Black clouds, driven fast before the stormy wind, Swept shadowing; through their broken folds the moon Struggled at times with transitory ray, And made the moving darkness visible, And now arrived beside a fenny lake She stands, amid whose stagnate waters, hoarse The long reeds rustled to the gale of night. A time-worn bark receives the Maid, impell'd By powers unseen; then did the moon display Where through the crazy vessel's yawning side The muddy waters oozed. A Woman guides, And spreads the sail before the wind, which moan'd As melancholy mournful to her ear, As ever by a dungeon'd wretch was heard Howling at evening round his prison towers. Wan was the pilot's countenance, her eyes Hollow, and ber sunk cheeks were furrow'd deep, Channell'd by tears; a few gray loeks hung down Beneath her hood; and through the Maiden's veins Chill crept the blood, when, as the night-breeze pass'd, Lifting her tatter'd mantle, coil'd around She saw a serpent gnawing at her heart. The plumeless bats with short, shrill note flit by, And the night-raven's scream eame fitfully, Borne on the hollow blast. Eager the Maid Look'd to the shore, and now upon the bank Leapt, joyful to escape, yet trembling still In recollection.

There, a mouldering pile Stretch'd its wide ruins, o'er the plain below Casting a gloomy shade, save where the moon Shone through its fretted windows: the dark yew, Withering with age, branch'd there its naked roots, And there the melancholy eypress rear'd Its head; the earth was heaved with many a mound, And here and there a half-demolish'd tomb.

And now, amid the ruin's darkest shade. The Virgin's eye beheld where pale blue flames Rose wavering, now just gleaming from the earth, And now in darkness drown'd. An aged man Sate near, seated on what in long-past days Had been some senlptured monument, now fallen And half-obscured by moss, and gather'd heaps Of wither'd yew-leaves and earth-mouldering bones. His eye was large and rayless, and fix'd full Upon the Maid ; the tomb-fires on his face Shed a blue light; his face was of the hue Of death; his limbs were mantled in a shroud. Then with a deep heart-terrifying voice, Exclaim'd the spectre : " Welcome to these realms, These regions of Despair, O thou whose steps Sorrow hath guided to my sad abodes! Welcome to my drear empire, to this gloom Eternal, to this everlasting night, Where never morning darts the enlivening ray, Where never shines the sun, but all is dark, Dark as the bosom of their gloomy King."

So saying, he arose, and drawing on, Her to the abbey's inner ruin led, Resisting not his guidance. Through the roof Once fretted and emblazed, but broken now In part, elsewhere all open to the sky, The moon-beams enter'd, checker'd here, and here With unimpeded light. The ivy twined Round the dismantled columns; imaged forms Of saints and warlike chiefs, moss-canker'd now And mutilate, lay strown upon the ground, With erumbled fragments, crueifixes fallen, And rusted trophies. Meantime overhead Roar'd the loud blast, and from the tower the ow Scream'd as the tempest shook her secret nest. He, silent, led her on, and often paused, And pointed, that her eye might contemplate At leisure the drear seene.

He dragg'd her on

Through a low iron door, down broken stairs; Then a cold horror through the Maiden's frame Crept, for she stood amid a vault, and saw,

BOOK I.

By the sepulchral lamp's dim, glaring light, The fragments of the dead. "Look here!" he cried.

"Damsel, look here ! survey this house of death ; O, soon to tenant it; soon to increase These trophies of mortality -- for hence Is no return. Gaze here ; behold this skull, These eyeless sockets, and these unflesh'd jaws, That with their ghastly grinning seem to mock Thy perishable charms; for thus thy cheek Must moulder. Child of grief! shrinks not thy soul, Viewing these horrors? trembles not thy heart At the dread thought that here its life's-blood soon Shall stagnate, and the finely-fibred frame, Now warm in life and feeling, mingle soon With the cold clod? thing horrible to think, --Yet in thought only, for reality Is none of suffering here; here all is peace; No nerve will throb to anguish in the grave. Dreadful it is to think of losing life, But having lost, knowledge of loss is not, Therefore no ill. Oh, wherefore then delay To end all ills at once?"

So spake Despair. The vaulted roof echoed his hollow voice, And all again was silence. Quick her heart Panted. He placed a dagger in her hand, And cried again, "Oh, wherefore then delay ! One blow, and rest forever!" On the fiend Dark scowl'd the Virgin with indignant eye, And threw the dagger down. He next his heart Replaced the murderous steel, and drew the Maid Along the downward vault.

The damp earth gave A dim sound as they pass'd : the tainted air Was cold, and heavy with unwholesome dews. "Behold !" the fiend exclamid, "how loathsomely The fleshly remnant of mortality Moulders to clay!" then fixing his broad eye Full on her face, he pointed where a corpse Lay livid; she beheld with horrent look The spectacle abhorr'd by living man.

"Look mere ! " Despair pursued ; " this loathsome mass

Was once as lovely, and as full of life As, Damsel, thou art now. Those deep-sunk eyes Once beam'd the mild light of intelligence, And where thou seest the pamper'd flesh-worm trail, Once the white bosom heaved. She fondly thought That at the hallow'd altar, soon the priest Should bless her coming union, and the torch Its joyful lustre o'er the hall of joy, Cast on her nuptial evening : earth to earth That priest consign'd her, for her lover went By glory lured to war, and perish'd there ; Nor she endured to live. Ha ! fades thy check ? Dost thou then, Maiden, tremble at the tale ? Look here ! behold the youthful paramour ! The self-devoted here ! "

Of Theodore. In thoughts unspeakable, Convulsed with horror, o'er her face she clasp'd Her cold, damp hands. "Shrink not," the phantom cried;

"Gaze on!" and unrelentingly he grasp'd Her quivering arm : "this lifeless, mouldering clay, As well thou know'st, was warm with all the glow Of youth and love ; this is the hand that cleft Proud Salisbury's crest, now motionless in death, Unable to protect the ravaged frame From the foul offspring of mortality That feed on heroes. Though long years were thine,

Yet never more would life reanimate This slaughter'd youth; slaughter'd for thee! for thou Didst lead him to the battle from his home, Where else he had survived to good old age;

In thy defence he died: strike then! destroy Remorse with life."

The Maid stood motionless, And, wistless what she did, with trembling hand Received the dagger. Starting then, she cried, "Avaunt, Despair! Eternal Wisdom deals Or peace to man, or misery, for his good Alike design'd; and shall the creature cry, 'Why hast thou done this?' and with impious pride Destroy the life God gave?"

The fiend rejoin'd, "And thou dost deem it impious to destroy The life God gave? What, Maiden, is the lot Assign'd to mortal man? born but to drag, Through life's long pilgrimage, the wearying load Of being; care-corroded at the heart; Assail'd by all the numerous train of ills That flesh inherits; till at length worn out, This is his consummation ! — Think again ! What, Maiden, canst thou hope from leng then'd life, But lengthen'd sorrow? If protracted long, Till on the bed of death thy feeble limbs Stretch out their languid length, oh, think what thoughts,

What agonizing feelings, in that hour, Assail the sinking heart! slow beats the pulse, Dim grows the eye, and clammy drops bedew The shuddering frame; then in its mightiest force, Mightiest in impotence, the love of life Seizes the throbbing heart; the faltering lips Pour out the impious prayer that fain would change The Unchangeable's decree; surrounding friends Sob round the sufferer, wet his cheek with tears, And all he loved in life imbitters death.

"Such, Maiden, are the pangs that wait the hour Of easiest dissolution ! yet weak man Resolves, in timid piety, to live; And veiling Fear in Superstition's garb, He calls her Resignation ! "Coward wretch! Fond coward, thus to make his reason war Against his reason ! Insect as he is. This sport of chance, this being of a day, Whose whole existence the next cloud may blast, Believes himself the care of heavenly powers; And preaching thus of power and providence, Will crush the reptile that may cross his path!

"Fool that thou art! the Being that permits Existence, gives to man the worthless boon; A goodly gift to those who, fortune-blest, Bask in the sunshine of prosperity, And such do well to keep it. But to one Sick at the heart with misery, and sore With many a hard, unmerited affliction, It is a hair that chains to wretchedness The shave who dares not burst it!

"Thinkest thou,

The parent, if his child should unrecall'd Return and fall upon his neck, and cry, 'Oh! the wide world is comfortless, and full Of fleeting joys and heart-consuming cares; I can be only happy in my home With thee — my friend! — my father!' Thinkest thou,

That he would thrust him as an outcast forth? Oh! he would clasp the truant to his heart, And love the trespass."

Whilst he spake, his eye Dwelt on the Maiden's cheek, and read her soul Struggling within. In trembling doubt she stood, Even as a wretch, whose famish'd entrails crave Supply, before him sees the poison'd food In greedy horror.

Yet, not silent long, "Eloquent tempter, cease !" the Maiden cried; "What though affliction be my portion here, Thinkest thou I do not feel high thoughts of joy, Of heart-ennobling joy, when I look back Upon a life of duty well perform'd, Then lift mine eyes to heaven, and there in faith Know my reward ? --- I grant, were this life all, Was there no morning to the tomb's long night, If man did mingle with the senseless clod, Himself as senseless, then wert thou indeed A wise and friendly comforter ! - But, fiend, There is a morning to the tomb's long night, A dawn of glory, a reward in heaven, He shall not gain who never merited. If thou didst know the worth of one good deed In life's last hour, thou wouldst not bid me lose The precious privilege, while life endures To do my Father's will. A mighty task Is mine, - a glorious call. France looks to me For her deliverance.

"Maiden, thou hast done Thy mission here," the unbattled fiend replied : "The foes are fled from Orleans: thou, perchance Exulting in the pride of victory, Forgettest him who perish'd : yet albeit Thy harden'd heart forget the gallant youth, That hour allotted canst thou not escape, That dreadful hour, when contumely and shame Shall sojourn in thy dungeon. Wretched Maid ! Destined to drain the cup of bitterness, Even to its dregs, — England's inhuman chiefs Shall scoff thy sorrows, blacken thy pure fame, Wit-wanton it with lewd barbarity, And force such burning blushes to the cheek Of virgin modesty, that thou shalt wish The earth might cover thee. In that last hour, When thy bruis'd breast shall heave beneath the chains

That link thee to the stake, a spectacle For the brute multitude, and thou shalt hear Mockery more painful than the circling flames Which then consume thee; wilt thou not in vair. Then wish my friendly aid? then wish thine ear Had drank my words of comfort? that thy hand Had grasp'd the dagger, and in death preserved Insulted modesty?"

Her glowing cheek Blush'd crimson; her wide eye on vacancy Was fix'd; her breath short panted. The cold fiend Grasping her hand, exclaim'd, "Too timid Maid, So long repugnant to the healing aid My friendship proffers, now shalt thou behold The allotted length of life."

He stamp'd the earth And dragging a huge coffin as his car, Two Gouls came on, of form more fearful-foul Than ever palsied in her wildest dream Hag-ridden Superstition. Then Despair Seized on the Maid whose eurdling blood stood still And placed her in the seat, and on they pass'd Adown the deep descent. A meteor light Shot from the demons, as they dragged along The unwelcome load, and mark'd their brethrer. feast

On carcasses.

Below, the vault dilates

Its ample bulk. "Look here!" — Despair addrest The shuddering Virgin; "see the dome of Death!" It was a spacious cavern, hewn amid The entrails of the earth, as though to form A grave for all mankind: no eye could reach Its distant bounds. There, throned in darkness, dwelt

The unseen power of Death.

Here stopt the Gouls, Reaching the destined spot. The fiend stept out, And from the coffin as he led the Maid, Exclaim'd, "Where mortal never stood before, Thou standest: look around this boundless vanlt; Observe the dole that Nature deals to man, And learn to know thy friend."

She answer'd not, Observing where the Fates their several tasks Plied ceaseless. "Mark how long the shortest web Allow'd to man!" he cried; "observe how soon, Twined round yon never-resting wheel, they change Their snowy lue, darkening through many a shade, Till Atropos relentless shuts the shears."

Too true he spake, for of the countless threads, Drawn from the heap, as white as nnsunn'd snow, Or as the spotless lily of the vale, Was never one beyond the little span Of infancy untainted; few there were But lightly tinged : more of deep crimson hue, Or deeper sable dyed.³ Two Genii stood, Still as the web of being was drawn forth, Sprinkling their powerful drops. From ebon urn, The one unsparing dash'd the bitter drops Of woe; and as he dash'd, his dark-brown brow

Relax'd to a hard smile. The milder form Shed less profusely there his lesser store; Sometimes with tears increasing the scant boon, Compassionating man; and happy he Who on his thread those precions tears receives; If it be happiness to have the pulse That throbs with pity, and in such a world Of wretchedness, the generons heart that aches With anguish at the sight of human woe.

To her the fiend, well hoping now success, "This is thy thread; observe how short the span; And little doth the evil Genius spare His bitter tincture there." The Maiden saw Calmly. "Now gaze !" the tempter fiend exclaim'd, And placed again the poniard in her hand, For Snperstition, with a burning torch, Approach'd the loom. "This, Damsel, is thy fate ! The hour draws on — now strike the dagger home ! Strike now, and be at rest!"

The Maid replied, "Or to prevent or change the will of Heaven, Impious I strive not: let that will be done!"

THE SECOND BOOK.

SHE spake, and lo ! celestial radiance beam'd Amid the air, such odors wafting now As erst came blended with the evening gale, From Eden's bowers of bliss. An angel form Stood by the Maid; his wings, ethereal white, Flash'd like the diamond in the noon-tide sun, Dazzling her mortal eye: all else appear'd Her Theodore.

Amazed she saw: the fiend Was fled, and on her ear the well-known voice Sounded, though now more musically sweet Than ever yet had thrill'd her soul attnned, When eloquent affection fondly told The day-dreams of delight.

"Beloved Maid! Lo! I am with thee, still thy Theodore! Hearts in the holy bands of love combined, Death has no power to sever. Thou art mine' A little while and thou shalt dwell with me, In scenes where sorrow is not. Cheerily Tread thou the path that leads thee to the grave, Rough though it be and painful, for the grave Is but the threshold of eternity.

"Favor'd of Heaven, to thee is given to view These secret realms. The bottom of the abyss Thon treadest, Maiden. Here the dungeons are Where bad men learn repentance. Souls diseased Must have their remedy; and where disease Is rooted deep, the remedy is long Perforce, and painfnl."

Thus the spirit spake, And led the Maid along a narrow path, Dark gleaming to the light of far-off flames, More dread than darkness. Soon the distant sound Of clanking anvils, and the lengthen'd breath Provoking fire are heard; and now they reach A wide expanded den where all around Tremendous furnaces, with hellish blaze, Were burning. At the heaving bellows stood The meagre form of Care; and as he blew To augment the fire, the fire augmented scorch'd His wretched limbs; sleepless forever thus He toil'd and toil'd, of toil no end to know But endless toil and never-ending woe.

An aged man went round the infernal vault, Urging his workmen to their ceaseless task; White were his locks, as is the wintry snow On hoar Plinlimmon's head. A golden staff His steps supported : powerful talisman, Which whose feels shall never feel again The tear of pity, or the throb of love. Tonch'd but by this, the massy gates give way, The buttress trembles, and the guarded wall, Guarded in vain, submits. Him heathens erst Had deified, and bowed the suppliant knee To Plutus. Nor are now his votaries few, Even though our blessed Savior hath hinself Told us, that easier through the needle's eye Shall the huge camel pass,⁴ than the rich man Enter the gates of heaven. "Ye cannot serve Your God and worship Mammon."

"Mission'd Maid!' So spake the spirit, "know that these, whose hands Round each white furnace ply the unceasing toil, Were Mammon's slaves on earth. They did not spare

To wring from poverty the hard-earn'd mite; They robb'd the orphan's pittance; they could see Want's asking eye unmoved; and therefore these. Ranged round the furnace, still must persevere In Mammon's service, scorch'd by these fierce fires. Nor seldom by the overboiling ore Caught; yet retaining still, to punishment Converted here, their old besetting sin, Often impatiently to quench their thirst Unquenchable, large draughts of molten gold ⁵ They drink insatiate, still with pain renew'd, Pain to destroy.''

So saying, her he led Forth from the dreadful cavern to a cell Brilliant with gem-born light. The rugged walls Part gleam'd with gold, and part with silver ore In milder radiance shone. The carbuncle There its strong lustre like the flamy sun Shot forth irradiate; from the earth beneath, And from the roof there stream'd a diamond light Rubies and amethysts their glows commix'd With the gay topaz, and the softer ray Shot from the sapphire, and the emerald's nne, And bright pyropus.

There, on golden seats, A numerous, sullen, melancholy train Sat silent. "Maiden, these," said Theodore, "Are they who let the love of wealth absorb All other passions; in their souls that vice Struck deeply-rooted, like the poison-tree That with its shade spreads barrenness around. These, Maid! were men by no atrocious crime Blacken'd, no fraud, nor ruthan violence;

THE VISION OF THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

BOOK II-

Men of fair dealing, and respectable On earth, but such as only for themselves Heap'd up their treasures, deeming all their wealth Their own, and given to them, by partial Heaven, To bless them only : therefore here they sit, Possess'd of gold enough, and by no pain Tormented, save the knowledge of the bliss They lost, and vain repentance. Here they dwell, Loathing these useless treasures, till the hour Of general restitution."

Thence they past, And now arriv'd at such a gorgeous dome, As even the pomp of Eastern opulence Could never equal : wandered through its halls A numerous train ; some with the red-swollen eye Of riot, and intemperance-bloated check ; Some pale and nerveless, and with leeble step, And eyes lack-lustre.

"Maiden!" said her guide, These are the wretched slaves of Appetite, Curst with their wish enjoy'd. The epicure Here pampers his foul frame, till the pall'd sense Loathes at the banquet; the voluptuous here Plunge in the tempting torrent of delight, And sink in misery. All they wish'd on earth Possessing here, whom have they to accuse But their own folly, for the lot they chose? Yet, for that these injured themselves alone, They to the house of Penitence may hie, And, by a long and painful regimen, To wearied Nature her exhausted powers Restore, till they shall learn to form the wish Of wisdom, and Almighty Goodness grants That prize to him who seeks it."

Whilst he spake, The board is spread. With bloated paunch, and eyes

Fat-swollen, and legs whose monstrous size disgraced

The human form divine, their caterer, Hight Gluttony, set forth the smoking feast. And by his side came on a brother form, With fiery cheek of purple hue, and red And scurty-white, mix'd motley; his gross bulk, Like some huge hogshead shapen'd, as applied. Him had antiquity with mystic rites Adored; to him the sons of Greece, and thine, Imperial Rome, on many an altar pour'd The victim blood, with god-like titles graced, Bacchus, or Dionusus; son of Jove, Deem'd falsely, for from Folly's idiot form He sprung, what time Madness, with furious hand, Seized on the laughing female. At one birth She brought the brethren, menial here below, Though sovereigns upon earth, where oft they hold High revels. 'Mid the monastery's gloom, Thy palace, Gluttony, and oft to thee The sacrifice is spread, when the grave voice Episcopal proclaims approaching day Of visitation; or church-wardens meet To save the wretched many from the gripe Of poverty; or 'mid thy ample halls Of London, mighty Mayor! rich Aldermen, Of coming feast hold converse.

For though allied in nature as in blood, They hold divided sway, his brother lifts His spongy sceptre. In the noble domes [mind Of princes, and state-wearied ministers, Maddening he reigns; and when the affrighted Casts o'er a long career of guilt and blood Its eye reluctant, then his aid is sought To lull the worm of conscience to repose. He too the halls of country squires frequents; But chiefly loves the learned gloom that shades Thy offspring Rhedycina, and thy walls, Granta! nightly libations there to him Profuse are pour'd, till from the dizzy brain Triangles, circles, parallelograms, Moods, tenses, dialects, and demigods, And logic and theology, are swept By the red deluge.

Unmolested there He revels; till the general feast comes round, The sacrifice septennial, when the sons Of England meet, with watchful care, to choose Their delegates, wise, independent men, Unbribing and unbribed, and chosen to guard Their rights and charters from the encroaching grasp Of greedy power; then all the joyful land

Of greedy power; then all the joyful land Join in his sacrifices, so inspired To make the important choice.

The observing Maid Address'd her guide : "These, Theodore, thou say'st Are men, who, pampering their foul appetites, Injured themselves alone. But where are they, The worst of villains, viper-like, who coil Around deluded woman, so to sting The heart that loves them?"

"Them," the spirit replied, "A long and dreadful punishment awaits. For when the prey of want and infamy, Lower and lower still the victim sinks, Even to the depth of shame, not one lewd word, One impious imprecation from her lips Escapes, nay, not a thought of evil lurks In the polluted mind, that does not plead Before the throne of Justice, thunder-tongued, Against the foul seducer."

Now they reach'd The house of Penitence. Credulity Stood at the gate, stretching her eager head As though to listen; on her vacant face, A look that promised premature assent; Though her Regret behind, a meagre fiend, Disciplined sorely.

Here they enter'd in, And now arrived where, as in study tranced, They saw the mistress of the dome. Her face Spake that composed severity, that knows No angry impulse, no weak tenderness, Resolved and calm. Before her lay the Book, Which hath the words of life; and as she read, Sometimes a tear would trickle down her cheek, Though heavenly joy beam'd in her eye the while.

Leaving her undisturb'd, to the first ward Of this great lazar-house the Angel led The favor'd Maid of Orleans. Kneeling down

Otherwhere,

EOOK II.

On the hard stone which their bare knees had worn, In sackcloth robed, a numerous train appear'd : Hard-featured some, and some demurely grave ; Yet such expression stealing from the eye, As though, that only naked, all the rest Were one close-fitting mask. A scoffing fiend — For fiend he was, though wisely serving here — Mock'd at his patients, and did often strow Ashes upon them, and then bid them say Their prayers aloud, and then he louder laugh'd : For these were hypocrites, on earth revered As holy ones, who did in public tell Their beads, and make long prayers, and cross themselves, And call themselves most miserable sinners, That so they might be deem'd most pious saints; And go all filth, and never let a smile Bend their stern muscles; gloomy, sullen men, Barren of all affection, and all this To please their God, forsooth ! And therefore Seorn Grinn'd at his patients, making thêm repeat Their solemn farce, with keenest raillery Tormenting; but if earnest in their prayer, They pour'd the silent sorrows of the soul To heaven, then did they not regard his mocks Which then came painless, and Humility Then rescned them, and led to Penitence, That she might lead to Heaven.

From thence they came, Where, in the next ward, a most wretched band Groan'd underneath the bitter tyranny Of a fierce demon. His coarse hair was red, Pale-gray his eyes, and bloodshot; and his face Wrinkled by such a smile as Malice wears In ecstasy. Well-pleased he went around, Plunging his dagger in the hearts of some, Or probing with a poison'd lance their breasts, Or placing coals of fire within their wounds; Or seizing some within his mighty grasp, He fix'd them on a stake, and then drew back And laugh'd to see them writhe.

"These," said the spirit, "Are taught by Cruelty, to loathe the lives They led themselves. Here are those wicked men Who loved to exercise their tyrant power On speechless brutes; bad husbands undergo A long purgation here; the traffickers In human fiesh here, too, are disciplined, Till by their suffering they have equall'd all The miseries they inflicted, all the mass Of wretchedness caused by the wars they waged, The villages they burnt, the widows left In want, the slave or led to suicide, Or murder'd by the foul, infected air Of his close dungeon, or, more sad than all, His virtue lost, his very soul enslaved, And driven by woe to wickedness.

"These next,

Whom thou beholdest in this dreary room, With sullen eyes of hatred and of fear Each on the other scowling, these have been False friends. Tormented by their own dark thoughts,

Here they dwell: in the hollow of their hearts There is a worm that feeds, and though thou seest | Cæsar was crown'd, the great liberticide ;

That skilful leech who willingly would heal The ill they suffer, judging of all else By their own evil conscience, they suspect The aid he vainly proffers, lengthening thus By vice its punishment."

"But who are these," The Maid exclaim'd, "that robed in flowing lawn And mitred, or in searlet, and in caps Like cardinals, I see in every ward, Performing menial service at the beck Of all who bid them?"

Theodore replied, "These men are they who in the name of Christ Have heap'd up wealth, and arrogating power, Have made kings kiss their feet, yet call'd themselves

The servants of the servants of the Lord. They dwelt in palaces, in purple clothed, And in fine linen; therefore are they here; And though they would not minister on earth, Here penanced they perforce mnst minister : Did not the Holy One of Nazareth Tell them, his kingdom is not of the world?"

So saying, on they past, and now arrived Where such a hideous ghastly group abode, That the Maid gazed with half-averting eye, And shudder'd: each one was a loathly corpse; The worm was feeding on his putrid prey; Yet had they life and feeling exquisite, Though motionless and mute.

"Most wretched men Are these," the angel cried. "Poets thou seest Whose loose, lascivious lays perpetuated Their own corruption. Soul-polluted slaves, Who sate them down, deliberately lewd, So to awake and pamper lust in minds Unborn; and therefore fonl of body now As then they were of soul, they here abide Long as the evil works they left on earth Shall live to taint mankind. A dreadful doom. Yet amply merited by all who thus Have to the Devil's service dedicated The gift of song, the gift divine of heaven!"

And now they reach'd a linge and massy pile, Massy it seem'd, and yet with every blast As to its min shook. There, porter fit, Remorse forever his sad vigils kept. Pale, hollow-eyed, emaciate, sleepless wretch, Inly he groan'd, or, starting, wildly shriek'd, Ave as the fabrie tottering from its base, Threaten'd its fall, and so expectant still Lived in the dread of danger still delay'd. They enter'd there a large and lofty dome, O'er whose black marble sides a dim, drear light Struggled with darkness from the unfrequent lamp. Enthroned around, the murderers of mankind, Monarchs, the great, the glorious, the august, Each bearing on his brow a crown of fire, Sat stern and silent. Nimrod, he was there, First king, the mighty hunter ; and that chief Who did belie his mother's fame, that so He might be called young Ammon. In this court

BOOK HI. THE VISION OF THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

Peaceful, pure spirit, be thy sojourn here, And short and soon thy passage to that world Where friends shall part no more!

Does thy soul own No other wish? or sleeps poor Madelon Forgotten in her grave? — Seest thou yon star," The spirit pursued, regardless that her eye Reproach'd him; "seest thou that evening star Whose lovely light so often we beheld From yonder woodbine porch? How have we gazed

Into the dark, deep sky, till the baffled soul, Lost in the infinite, return'd, and felt The burden of her bodily load, and yearn'd For freedom! Maid, in yonder evening star Lives thy departed friend. I read that glance, And we are there!"

He said, and they had past The immeasurable space.

Then on her ear The lonely song of adoration rose, Sweet as the cloister'd virgin's vesper hymn, Whose spirit, happily dead to earthly hopes, Already lives in heaven. Abrupt the song Ceased, tremulous and quick a cry Of joyful wonder roused the astonish'd Maid, And instant Madelon was in her arms; No airy form, no unsubstantial shape, She felt her friend; she prest her to her heart; Their tears of fapture mingled.

She drew back,

And eagerly she gazed on Madelon, Then fell upon her neek and wept again. No more she saw the long-drawn lines of griet, The emaciate form, the hue of sickliness, The languid eye: youth's loveliest freshness now Mantled her cheek, whose every lineament Bespake the soul at rest, a holy calm, A deep and full tranquillity of bliss.

"Thou then art come, my first and dearest friend !"

The well-known voice of Madelon began, "Thou then art come! And was thy pilgrimage So short on earth? and was it painful too, Painful and short as mine? but blessed they Who from the crimes and miseries of the world Early escape!"

"Nay," Theodore replied, "She hath not yet fulfill'd her mortal work. Permitted visitant from earth she comes To see the seat of rest; and oftentimes In sorrow shall her soul remember this, And patient of its transitory woe, Partake again the anticipated joy."

"Soon be that work perform'd!" the Maid exelaim'd,

"O Madelon! O Theodore! My soul, Spurning the cold communion of the world, Will dwell with you. But I shall patiently, Yea, even with joy, endure the allotted ills Of which the memory in this better state Shall heighten bliss. That hour of agony, When, Madelon, I felt thy dying grasp, And from thy forehead wiped the dews of death, The very anguish of that hour becomes A joy for memory now."

"O earliest friend !

I too remember," Madelon replied, "That hour, thy looks of watchful agony, The supprest grief that struggled in thine eye Endearing love's last kindness. Thou didst know With what a deep and earnest hope intense I felt the hour draw on: but who can speak The unutterable transport, when mine eyes, As from a long and dreary dream, unclosed Amid this peaceful vale, — unclosed upon My Arnaud! He had built me up a bower, A hower of rest. — See, Maiden, where he comes, His manly lineaments, his beaming eye, The same, but now a holier innocence Sits on his cheek, and loftier thoughts illume The enlighten'd glanee."

They met; what joy was theirs He best can feel, who for a dear friend dead Hath wet the midnight pillow with his tears.

Fair was the scene around; an ample vale Whose mountain circle at the distant verge Lay soften'd on the sight; the near ascent Rose bolder up, in part abrupt and bare, Part with the ancient majesty of woods Adorn'd, or lifting high its rocks sublime. A river's liquid radiance roll'd beneath ; Beside the bower of Madelon it wound A broken stream, whose shallows, though the waves Roll'd on their way with rapid melody, A child might tread. Behind, an orange grove Its gay, green foliage starr'd with golden fruit. But with what odors did their blossoms load The passing gale of eve! Less thrilling sweets Rose from the marble's perforated floor, Where kneeling at her prayers, the Moorish queen Inhaled the cool delight,7 and whilst she ask'd The prophet for his promised paradise, Shaped from the present bliss its utmost joys. A goodly scene! fair as that fairy land Where Arthur lives, by ministering spirits borne From Camelot's bloody banks; or as the groves Of earliest Eden, where, so legends say, Enoch abides; and he who, rapt away By fiery steeds and charioted in fire, Past in his mortal form the eternal ways; And John, beloved of Christ, enjoying there The beatific vision, sometimes seen, The distant dawning of eternal day, Till all things be fulfilled.

"Survey this scene i

So Theodore address'd the Maid of Arc; "There is no evil here, no wretchedness; It is the heaven of those who nurst on earth Their nature's gentlest feelings. Yet not here Centring their joys, but with a patient hope, Waiting the allotted hour when capable Of loftier callings, to a better state They pass; and hither from that better state Frequent they come, preserving so those ties Which through the infinite progressiveness Complete our perfect bliss.

BOOK IIL

Even such, so blest, Save that the memory of no sorrows past Heighten'd the present joy, our world was once, In the first era of its innocence, Ere man had learnt to bow the knee to man. Was there a youth whom warm affection fill'd, He spake his honest heart; the earliest fruits His toil produced, the sweetest flowers that deck'd The sunny bank, he gather'd for the maid, Nor she disdain'd the gift; for Vice not yet Had burst the dungeons of her Hell, and rear'd Those artificial boundaries that divide Man from his species. State of blessedness! Till that ill-omen'd hour when Cain's true son Delved in the bowels of the earth for gold, Accursed bane of virtue, - of such force As poets feign dwelt in the Gorgon's loeks, Which whose saw, felt instant the life-blood Cold curdle in his veins, the creeping flesh Grew stiff with horror, and the heart forgot To beat. Accursed hour ! for man no more To Justice paid his homage, but forsook Her altars, and bow'd down before the shrine Of Wealth and Power, the idols he had made. Then Hell enlarged herself, her gates flew wide, Her legion fiends rush'd forth. Oppression eame, Whose frown is desolation, and whose breath Blasts like the pestilence; and Poverty, A meagre monster, who with withering touch Makes barren all the better part of man, Mother of Miseries. Then the goodly earth Which God had framed for happiness, became One theatre of woe, and all that God Had given to bless free men, these tyrant fiends His bitterest curses made. Yet for the best Have all things been appointed by the All-wise ! For by experience taught shall man at length Dash down his Moloch-idols, Samson-like, And burst his fetters. Then in the abyss Oppression shall be chain'd, and Poverty Die, and with her, her brood of miseries: And Virtue and Equality preserve The reign of Love, and earth shall once again Be Paradise, where Wisdom shall secure The state of bliss which Ignorance betray'd,"

" Oh age of happiness !" the Maid exclaim'd, "Roll fast thy current, Time, till that blest age Arrive ! and happy thou, my Theodore, Permitted thus to see the sacred depths Of wisdom !"

"Such," the blessed spirit replied, "Beloved! such our lot; allowed to range The vast infinity, progressive still In knowledge and increasing blessedness, This our united portion. Thou hast yet A little while to sojourn amongst men : I will be with thee; there shall not a breeze Wanton around thy temples, on whose wing I will not hover near; and at that hour When from its fleshly sepulchre let loose, Thy phœnix soul shall soar, O best-beloved ! I will be with thee in thine agonies, And welcome thee to life and happiness, Eternal, infinite beatitude!"

He spake, and led her near a straw-roof'd cot, Love's palace. By the Virtues eircled there The Immortal listen'd to such melodies, As aye, when one good deed is register'd Above, reëcho in the halls of heaven. Labor was there, his crisp locks floating loose; Clear was his cheek, and beaming his full eye, And strong his arm robust; the wood-nympli Health Still follow'd on his path, and where he trod Fresh flowers and fruits arose. And there was Hope, The general friend; and Pity, whose mild eye Wept o'er the widow'd dove; and, loveliest form, Majestic Chastity, whose sober smile Delights and awes the soul; a laurel wreath Restrain'd her tresses, and upon her breast The snow-drop hung its head,⁹ that seem'd to grow Spontaneous, cold and fair. Beside the maid Love went submiss, with eye more dangerons Then fancied basilisk to wound whoe'er Too bold approach'd; yet anxious would he read Her every rising wish, then only pleased When pleasing. Hymning him, the song was raised.

"Glory to thee whose vivifying power Pervades all Nature's universal frame ! Glory to thee, Creator Love ! to thee, Parent of all the smiling Charities, That strow the thorny path of life with flowers ' Glory to thee, Preserver ! To thy praise The awakened woodlands echo all the day Their living melody; and warbling forth To thee her twilight song, the nightingale Holds the lone traveller from his way, or charms The listening poet's ear. Where Love shall deign To fix his seat, there blameless Pleasure sheds Her roseate dews; Content will sojonrn there, And Happiness behold Affection's eye Gleam with the mother's smile. Thrice happy he Who feels thy holy power! he shall not drag, Forlorn and friendless, along life's long path To age's drear abode; he shall not waste The bitter evening of his days unsooth'd; But Hope shall cheer his hours of solitude, And Vice shall vainly strive to wound his breast That bears that talisman; and when he meets The eloquent eye of Tenderness, and hears The bosom-thrilling music of her voice, The joy he feels shall purify his soul, And imp it for anticipated heaven."

NOTE 2, p. 86, col. 1. - And all things are that seem.

I have met with a singular tale to illustrate this spiritual theory of dreams.

Guntrum, king of the Franks, was liberal to the poor, and he himself experienced the wonderful effects of divine libera.ity For one day, as he was hunting in a forest, he was separated from his companions, and arrived at a little stream of water with only one comrade of tried and approved fidelity. Here he found himself opprest by drowsiness, and, reclining his heed upon the servant's lap, went to sleep. The servant witnessed a wonderful thing, for he saw a little beast creep out of the mouth of his sleeping master, and go immediately to the streamlet, which it vainly attempted to cross. The servant drew his sword, and laid it across the water, over which the little beast easily past, and crept into a hole of a mountain on the opposite side ; from whence it made its appearance again in an hour, and returned by the same means into the king's mouth. The king then swakened, and told his companion that he had dreamt that he was arrived upon the bank of an immense river, which he had crossed by a bridge of iron, and from thence came to a mountain in which a great quantity of gold was concealed. When the king had concluded, the servant related what he had beheld, and they both went to examine the mountain, where, upon digging, they discovered an immense weight of gold.

I stumbled upon this tale in a book entitled SPHINX, Theologico-Philosophica. Authore Johanne Heidfeldio, Ecclesiaste Ebersbachiano. 1621.

The same story is in Matthew of Westminster; it is added that Guntrum applied the treasures thus found to pious uses.

For the truth of the theory there is the evidence of a monkish miracle. When Thurcillus was about to follow St. Julian and visit the world of souls, his guide said to him, "Let thy body rest in the bed, for thy spirit only is about to depart with me; and lest the body should appear dead, I will send into it a vital breach."

The body, however, by a strange sympathy, was affected like the spirit; for when the foul and fetid smoke which arose from the tithes withheld on earth had nearly suffocated Thureillus, and made him cough twice, those who were near his body said that it coughed twice about the same time.

NOTE 3, p. 88, col. 2. - Or deeper sable dyed.

These lines strongly resemble a passage in the Pharonnida of William Chamberlayne, a poet who has told an interesting story in uncouth rhymes, and mingled sublimity of thought and besuty of expression, with the quaintest conceits and most awkward inversions.

On a rock more high Than Nature's common surface, she beholds The mansion house of Fate, which thus unfolds Its sacred mysteries. A trine within A quadrate placed, both these encompast in A perfect circle was its form ; but what Its matter was, for us to wonder at, Is undiscovered left. A tower there stands At every engle, where Time's fatal hands The impartial Parce dwell ; i' the first she sees Clothe the kindest of the Destinies, From immaterial essences to cull The seeds of life, and of them frame the wool For Lachesis to spin ; about her flie Myriads of souls, that yet want flesh to lie Warmed with their functions in, whose strength bestows That power by which man ripe for misery grows.

ller next of objects was that glorious tower Where that swift-fingered nymph that spares no hour From mortals' service draws the various threads Of life in several lengths; to weary beds Of age extending some, whilst others in Their infancy are broke : some blackt in sin, Others, the favorites of Heaven, from whence Their origin, candid with unnocrace ; Some purpled in afflictions, others dyrd In sanguine pleasures : some in glittering pride Spun to adorn the earth, whilst others wear Rags of deformity, but knots of care No thread was wholly free from. Next to this Fair glorious tower, was placed that black abyss Of dreadful Atropos, the baleful seat Of death and horrour, in each room repleat With lazy damps, loud groans, and the sad sight Of pule grim ghosts, those terrours of the night. To this, the last stage that the winding clew Of life can lead mortality unto, Fear was the dreadful porter, which let in All guests sent thither by destructive sin.

It is possible that I may have written from the recollection of this passage. The conceit is the same, and I willingly attribute it to Chamberlayne, a poet to whom I am indebted fur many hours of delight.

NOTE 4, p. 89, col. 2. - Shall the huge camel pass.

I had originally written cable instead of camel. The alteration would not be worth noticing were it not for the reason which occasioned it. Facilias elephas per foramca acus, is among the Hebrew edages collected by Drusius; the same metaphor is found in two other Jewish proverbs, end this confirms beyond all doubt the common reading of Matt. xix.24

NOTE 5, p. 89, col. 2. - Large draughts of molten gold.

The same idea, and almost the same words, are in one of Ford's plays. The passage is a very fine one :

> Ay, you are wretched, miserably wretched, Almost condemn'd alive ! There is a place, (List, daughter !) in a black and hollow vault, Where day is never seen ; there shines no sun, But flaming horror of consuming fires; A lightless sulphur, choaked with smoaky foggs Of an infected darkness. In this place Dwell many thousand thousands sundry sorts Of never-dying deaths ; there damned souls Resr without pity, there are gluttons fed With toads end adders : there is burning oil Pour'd down the drunkard's throat, the usurer Is forced to sup whole draughts of molten gold : There is the murderer for ever stabh'd, Yet he can never die ; there lies the wanton On racks of burning steel, whilst in his soul He feels the torment of his raging lust.

'Tis Pity she's a Whore.

I wrote this passage when very young, and the ides, trite as it is, was new to me. It occurs I believe in most descriptions of hell, end perhaps owes its origin to the fate of Crassus.

Note 6, p. 92, col. 1. - Titus was here.

During the siege of Jerusalem, "the Roman commander, with a generous elemency, that inseparable attendant on true hereism, labored incessantly, snd to the very last moment, to preserve the place. With this view, he again end again entreated the tyrants to surrender and save their lives. With the same view also, ofter carrying the second wall, the siege was intermitted four days : to rouse their fears, prisoners, to the number of five hundred or more, were crucified daily before the walls; till space, Josephus says, was wanting for the crosses, and crosses for the captions." - Charton's Bampton Lectures

If any of my readers should inquire why Titus Vespasian, the delight of mankind, is placed in such a situation, -1 answer, for this instance of "i his generous elemency, that inseparable attendant on true heroise" 96

Nore 7, p. 93, col. 2. - Inhaled the cool delight.

In the cabinet of the Alhambra, where the queen used to dress and say her prayers, and which is still ao eochanting sight, there is a slab of marble full of small holes, through which perfumes exhaled that were kept constantly burning beneath. The doors and windows are disposed so as to afford the most agreeable prospects, and to throw a soft yet lively light upon the eyes. Fresh currents of air, too, are admitted, so as to renew every instant the delicious coolness of this apartment Sketch of the History of the Spanish Moors, prefixed to Florian's Gonsalvo of Cordova.

Juvenile and Minor Poems.

VOL. I.

What I was, is passed byWITHER.

PREFACE.

THE earliest pieces in these Juvenile and Minor Poems were written before the writer had left school; between the date of these and of the latest there is an interval of six and forty years : as much difference, therefore, may be perceived in them, as in the different stages of life from boyhood to old age.

Some of the earliest appeared in a little volume published at Bath in the autumn of 1794, with this title : - "Poems containing the Retrospect, &c. by Robert Lovell and Robert Southey, 1795;" and with this motto : -

Minuentur atræ Carmine cure. - HORACE.

At the end of that volume, Joan of Arc was annonneed as to be published by subscription.

Others were published at Bristol, 1797, in a single volume, with this motto from Akenside : ---

> Goddess of the Lyre, with thee comes Majestic Truth ; and where Truth deigns to come, His sister Liberty will not be far.

A second volume followed at Bristol in 1799, after the second edition of Joan of Are, and commencing with the Vision of the Maid of Orleans. The motto to this was from the Epilogue to Spenser's Shepherds' Calendar : ---

The better, please ; the worse, displease : I ask no more.

In the third edition of Joan of Are, the Vision was printed separately, at the end; and its place was supplied in the second edition of the Poems by miscellaneous pieces.

A separate volume, entitled " Metrical Tales and other Poems," was published in 1805, with this advertisement: — " These Poems were published some years ago in the Annual Anthology. (Bristol, 1799, 1800.) They have now been revised and lection bear an inconsiderable proportion to those printed in this collected form, because they have pleased those readers whom the author was most desirous of pleasing. Let them be considered as the desultory productions of a man sedulously employed upon better things."

These various pieces were re-arranged in three volumes, under the title of Minor Poeins, in 1815, with this motto, and they were published a second time in the same form, 1823.

Nos hac novimus esse nihil;

The Ballads and Metrical Tales contained in those volumes belong to a different part of this collection ; their other contents are comprised here ; and the present volume consists, with very few exceptions, of pieces written in youth or early manhood. One of these, written in my twentieth year, not having been published at the time, would never have been made public by my own act and deed ; but as Wat Tyler obtained considerable notoriety upon its surreptitious publication, it seemed proper that a production which will be specially noticed whenever the author shall be delivered over to the biographers, should be included here. They who may desire to know more than is stated in the advertisement now prefixed to it, are referred to a Letter addressed to William Smith, Esq. M. P., 1817, reprinted in the second volume of my Essays Moral and Political, 1832.

The second volume of this part of the Collection contains one juvenile piece, and many which were written in early manhood. The remainder were composed in middle or later life, and comprise (with one exception that will more conveniently be arranged elsewhere) all the odes which as Poet Laureate | have written upon national occasions. Of these the Carmen Triumphale, and the Carmina Aulica, were separately published in quarto in 1814, and reprinted together in a little volume in 1821.

The Juvenile and Minor Poems in this Col-

of substantive length: for a small part only of my youthful effusions were spared from those autosda-fe in which from time to time piles upon piles have been consumed. In middle life works of greater extent, or of a different kind, left me little leisure for occasional poetry; the impulse ceased, and latterly the inclination was so seldom felt, that it required an effort to call it forth.

Sir William Davenant, in the Preface to Gondibert, "took occasion to accuse and condemn all those hasty digestions of thought which were published in his youth; a sentence, said he, not pronounced out of melancholy rigour, but from a cheerful obedience to the just authority of experience. For that grave mistress of the world, experience (in whose profitable school those before the Flood stayed long, but we, like wanton children, come thither late, yet too soon are called out of it, and fetched home by death) hath taught me that the engenderings of unripe age become abortive and deformed; and that 't is a high presumption to entertain a nation (who are a poet's standing guest, and require monarchical respect) with hasty provisions; as if a poet might imitate the familiar despatch of faulconers, mount his Pegasus, unhood his Muse, and, with a few flights, boast he hath provided a feast for a prince. Such posting upon Pegasus I have long since foreborne." Yet this eminently thoughtful poet was so far from seeking to suppress the crude compositions which he thus condemned, that he often expressed a great desire to see all his pieces collected in one volume ; and, conformably to his wish, they were so collected, after his decease, by his widow and his friend Herringman the bookseller.

Agreeing with Davenant in condemning the greater part of my juvenile pieces, it is only as crudities that I condemn them; for in all that I have written, whether in prose or verse, there has never been a line which, for any compunctious reason, living or dying, I could wish to blot.

Davenant had not changed his opinion of his own youthful productions so as to overlook in his age the defects which he had once clearly perceived; but he knew that pieces which it would indeed have been presumptuous to re-produce on the score of their merit, might yet be deemed worthy of preservation on other grounds; that to his family and friends, and to those who might take any interest in English poetry hereafter, they would possess peculiar value, as characteristic memorials of one who had held no inconsiderable place in the literature of his own times; feeling, too, that he was not likely to be forgotten by posterity, he thought that after the specimen which he had produced in his Gondibert of a great and elaborate poem, his early attempts would be regarded with curiosity by such of his successors as should, like him, study poetry as an art, - for as an art it must be studied by those who would excel in it, though excellence in it is not attainable by art alone.

The cases are very few in which any thing more can be inferred from juvenile poetry, than that the aspirant possesses imitative talent, and the power of versifying, for which, as for music, there must be a certain natural aptitude. It is not merely because "they have lacked culture and the inspiring aid of books," "that so many poets who have been "sown by Nature," have "wanted the accomplishment of verse," and brought forth no fruit after their kind. Men of the highest culture, of whose poetical temperament no doubt can be entertained, and who had "taken to the height the measure of themselves," have yet failed in their endeavor to become poets, for want of that accomplishment. It is frequently possessed without any other qualification, or any capacity for improvement; but then the innate and incurable defect that renders it abortive, is at once apparent.

The state of literature in this kingdom during the last fifty years has produced the same effect upon poetry that academics produce upon painting; in both arts every possible assistance is afforded to imitative talents, and in both they are carried as far as the talent of imitation can reach. But there is one respect in which poetry differs widely from the sister arts. Its fairest promise frequently proves deceitful, whereas both in painting and music the early indications of genius are unequivocal. The children who were called musical prodigies, have become great musicians; and great painters, as far as their history is known, have displayed in childhood that accuracy of eye, and dexterity of hand, and shaping faculty, which are the prime requisites for their calling. But it is often found that young poets, of whom great expectations were formed, have made no progress, and have even fallen short of their first performances. It may be said that this is because men apply themselves to music and to painting as their professions, but that no one makes poetry the business of his life. This, however, is not the only reason: the indications, as has already been observed, are far less certain; and the circumstances of society are far less favorable for the moral and intellectual culture which is required for all the higher branches of poetry, - all, indeed, that deserves the name.

My advice, as to publishing, has often heen asked by young poets, who suppose that experience has qualified me to give it, and who have not yet learnt how seldom advice is taken, and how little therefore it is worth. As a general rule, it may be said that one who is not deceived in the estimate which he has formed of his own powers, can neither write too much in his youth, nor publish too little. It cannot, however, be needful to caution the present race of poetical adventurers against hurrying with their productions to the press, for there are obstacles enough in the way of publication. Looking back upon my own career, and acknowledging my imprudence in this respect, I have, nevertheless, no cause to wish that I had pursued a different course. In this, as in other circumstances of my life, I have reason to be thankful to that merciful Providence which shaped the ends that I had roughly hewn for myself

TO EDITH SOUTHEY.

WITH way-worn feet, a traveller woe-begone, Life's upward road I journey'd many a day, And framing many a sad yet soothing lay, Beguiled the solitary hours with song. Lonely my heart and rugged was the way, Yet often pluck'd I, as I past along, The wild and simple flowers of poesy; And sometimes, unreflecting as a child, Entwined the weeds which pleased a random eye. Take thou the wreath, BELOVED! it is wild And rudely garlanded; yet scorn not thou The humble offering, where dark rosemary weaves

Amid gay flowers its melancholy leaves, And myrtle gathered to adorn thy brow.

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

The Subject of this Poem is taken from the third and fourth Chapters of the First Book of Esdras.

TO MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT.

THE lily cheek, the "purple light of love," The liquid lustre of the melting eye, — Mary ! of these the Poet sung, for these Did Woman triumph; —turn not thou away Contemptuous from the theme. No Maid of Arc Had, in those ages, for her country's cause Wielded the sword of freedom; no Roland Had borne the palm of female fortitude; No Cordé, with self-sacrificing zcal, Had glorified again the Avenger's name, As erst when Cæsar perish'd: haply too Some strains may hence be drawn, befitting me To offer, nor unworthy thy regard.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Bristol, 1795.

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

GLAD as the weary traveller tempest tost To reach secure at length his native coast, Who wandering long o'er distant lands hath sped, The night-blast wildly howling round his head, Known all the woes of want, and felt the storm Of the bleak winter parch his shivering form; The journey o'er and every peril past Beholds his little cottage-home at last, And as he sees afar the smoke curl slow, Feels his full eyes with transport overflow; So from the scene where Death and Misery reign, And Vice and Folly drench with blood the plain, Joyful I turn, to sing how Woman's praise Avail'd again Jerusalem to raise,

Call'd forth the sanction of the Despot's nod, And freed the nation best beloved of God.

Darius gives the feast; to Persia's court, Awed by his will, the obedient throng resort: Attending Satraps swell their prince's pride, And vanquish'd Monarchs grace the Conqueror's side.

No more the warrior wears the garb of war, Girds on the sword, or mounts the scythed car; No more Judæa's sons dejected go, And hang the head, and heave the sigh of woe. From Persia's rugged hills descend the train, From where Orontes foams along the plain, From where Choaspes rolls his royal waves, And India sends her sons, submissive slaves. Thy daughters, Babylon, for this high feast Weave the loose robe, and paint the flowery vest, With roseate wreaths they braid the glossy hair, They tinge the cheek which nature form'd so fair, Learn the soft step, the soul-subduing glance, Melt in the song, and swim adown the dance. Exalted on the Monarch's golden throne, In royal state the fair Apame shone; Her form of majesty, her eyes of fire, Chill with respect, or kindle with desire ; The admiring multitude her charms adore, And own her worthy of the rank she bore.

Now on his couch reclined Darius lay, Tired with the toilsome pleasures of the day; Without Judæa's watchful sons await, To guard the sleeping idol of the state. Three youths were these of Judah's royal race, Three youths whom Nature dower'd with every grace,

To each the form of symmetry she gave, And haughty genius cursed each favorite slave; These fill'd the cup, around the Monarch kept, Served when he spake, and guarded while he slept.

Yet oft for Salem's hallow'd towers laid low The sigh would heave, the unbidden tear would flow;

And when the dull and wearying round of power Allow'd Zorobabel one vacant hour, He loved on Babylon's high wall to roam, And lingering gaze toward his distant home; Or on Euphrates' willowy banks reclined Hear the sad harp moan fitful to the wind. [light

As now the perfumed lamps stream wide their And social converse cheers the livelong night, Thus spake Zorobabel: "Too long in vain For Zion desolate her sons complain; All hopelessly our years of sorrow flow, And these proud heathen mock their captives woe While Cyrus triumph'd here in victor state A brighter prospect cheer'd our exiled fate; Our sacred walls again he bade us raise, And to Jchovah rear the pile of praise. Quickly these fond hopes faded from our eyes, As the frail sun that gilds the wintry skies, And spreads a moment's radiance o'er the plain, Soon hid by clouds which dim the scene again.

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

"Opprest by Artaxerxes' jeabous reign, We vainly pleaded here, and wept in vain. Now when Darius, chief of mild command, Bids joy and pleasure fill the festive land, Still shall we droop the head in sullen grief, And sternly silent shun to seek relief? What if anid the Monarch's mirthful throng Our harps should echo to the cheerful song?"

"Fair is the occasion," thus the one replied; "Now then let all our tuneful skill be tried. And while the courtiers quaff the smiling bowl, And wine's strong fumes inspire the gladden'd soul, Where all around is merriment, be mine To strike the lute, and praise the power of Wine."

"And while," his friend rejoin'd, "in state alone, Lord of the earth, Darius fills the throne, Be yours the mighty power of Wine to sing, My lute shall sound the praise of Persia's King."

To them Zorobabel: "On themes like these Seek ye the Monarch of Mankind to please; To Wine superior, or to Power's strong arms, Be mine to sing resistless Woman's charms. To him victorious in the rival lays Shall just Darins give the meed of praise; A purple robe his honor'd frame shall fold, The beverage sparkle in his cup of gold; A golden couch support his bed of rest, The chain of honor grace his favor'd breast; His the rich turban, his the car's array, On Babylon's high wall to wheel its way; And for his wisdom seated on the throne, For the King's Cousin shall the Bard be known."

Intent they meditate the future lay, And watch impatient for the dawn of day. The morn rose clear, and shrill were heard the flute, The cornet, sackbut, dulcimer, and lute ; To Babylon's gay streets the throng resort, Swarm through the gates, and fill the festive court. High on his throne Darius tower'd in pride, The fair Apame graced her Sovereign's side : And now she smilled, and now with mimic frown Placed on her brow the Monarch's sacred crown. In transport o'er her faultless form he bends, Loves every look, and every act commends.

And now Darius bids the herald call Judæa's Bards to grace the thronging hall. Hush'd are all sounds, the attending crowd are mute,

And then the Hehrew gently touch'd the lute :

When the Traveller on his way, Who has toil'd the livelong day, Feels around on every side The chilly mists of eventide, Fatigued and faint his weary mind Recurs to all he leaves behind; Ile thinks upon the well-trimm'd hearth, The evening hour of social mirth, And her who at departing day Weeps for her husband far away. Oh give to him the flowing bowl ! Bid it renovate his soul ! Then shall sorrow sink to sleep, And he who wept no more shall weep; For his care-clouded brow shall clear, And his glad cye will sparkle through the tear.

When the poor man heart-opprest Betakes him to his evening rest, And worn with labor thinks in sorrow *On the labor of to-morrow; When repining at his lot He hics him to his joyless cot, And loathes to meet his children there, The rivals for his scanty fare; Oh give to him the flowing bowl ! Bid it renovate his soul ! The generous juice with magic power Shall cheat with happiness the hour, And with each warm affection fill The heart by want and wretchedness made chill

When, at the dim close of day, The Captive loves alone to stray Along the haunts recluse and rude Of sorrow and of solitude ; When he sits with mournful eye To mark the lingering radiance die, And lets distempered fancy roam Amid the ruins of his home ;— Oh give to him the flowing bowl! Bid it renovate his soul ! The bowl shall better thoughts bestow, And lull to rest his wakeful woe, And joy shall gild the evening hour, And make the Captive Fortune's conqueror.

When the wearying cares of state Oppress the Monarch with their weight, When from his pomp retired alone He feels the duties of the throne, Feels that the multitude below Depend on him for weal or woe; When his powerful will may bless A realm with peace and happiness, Or with desolating breath Breathe ruin round, and woe, and death ; Oh give to him the flowing bowl! Bid it humanize his soul ! He shall not feel the empire's weight ; He shall not feel the cares of state ; The bowl shall each dark thought beguile, And Nations live and prosper from his smile.

Hush'd was the lute, the Hebrew ceased the song, Long peals of plaudits echoed from the throng; All tongues the liberal words of praise repaid, On every check a smile applauding play'd; The rival Bard approach'd, he struck the string, And pour'd the loftier song to Persia's King.

Why should the wearying cares of state Oppress the Monarch with their weight? Alike to him if peace shall bless The multitude with happiness;

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

Alike to him if frenzied War Career triumphant on the embattled plain, And rolling on o'er myriads slain, With gore and wounds shall clog his scythed car. What though the tempest rage? no sound Of the deep thunder shakes his distant throne; And the red flash that spreads destruction round Reflects a glorious splendor on the crown.

Where is the Man who with ennobling pride Regards not his own nature? where is he Who without awe can see
The mysteries of the human mind, The miniature of Deity?
For Man the vernal clouds descending Shower down their fertilizing rain; For Man the ripen'd harvest bending
Waves with soft murmur o'er the plenteous plain. He spreads the sail to eatch the favoring gale, Or sweeps with oars the main;
For him the winds of heaven subservient blow, Earth teems for him, for him the waters flow,
He thinks, and wills, and acts, a Deity below !

Where is the King who with elating pride Sees not this Man, this godlike Man his slave? Mean are the mighty by the Monarch's side; Alike the wise, alike the brave With timid step and pale, advance, And tremble at the royal glance; Suspended millions watch his breath, Whose smile is happiness, whose frown is death.

Why goes the Peasant from that little cot, Where Peace and Love have blest his humble life? In vain his wretched wife With tears bedews her husband's face, And clasps him in a long and last embrace; In vain his children round his bosom creep, And weep to see their mother weep, Fettering their father with their little arms! What are to him the war's alarms? What are to him the distant foes? He at the earliest dawn of day To daily labor went his way, And when he saw the sun decline, He sat in peace beneath his vine. The King commands, the peasant goes, From all he loved on earth he flies, And for his monarch toils, and fights, and bleeds, and dies.

What though yon eity's castled wall Cast o'er the darken'd plain its crested shade? What though her Priests in earnest terror call On all their host of Gods to aid? Vain is the bulwark, vain the tower ! In vain her gallant youth expose Their breasts, a bulwark, to the foes ! In vain at that tremendous hour, Clasp'd in the savage soldier's reeking arms, Shrieks to deaf Heaven the violated Maid ! By the rude hand of Ruin scatter'd round, Their moss-grown towers shall spread the desert ground Low shall the mouldering palace lie, Amid the princely halls the grass wave high, And through the shatter'd roof descend the in clement sky.

Gay o'er the em sattled plain Moves yonder warrior train; Their banners wanton on the morning gale, Full on their bucklers beams the rising ray; Their glittering helms give glory to the day; The shout of war rings echoing o'er the vale. Far reaches as the aching eye can strain The splendid horror of their wide array Ah! not in vain expectant, o'er Their glorious pomp the vultures soar! Amid the Conqueror's palace high Shall sound the song of victory; Long after journeying o'er the plain The traveller shall with startled eye [ter sky See their white bones then blanched by many a win

Lord of the earth ! we will not raise The temple to thy bounded praise; For thee no victim need expire, For thee no altar blaze with hallow'd fire; The burning City flames for thee, Thine Altar is the field of victory ! Thy sacred Majesty to bless Man a self-offer'd victim freely flies; To thee he sacrifices happiness, And peace, and Love's endearing ties; To thee a Slave he lives, for thee a Slave he dies.

Hush'd was the lute, the Hebrew ceased to sing; The shout burst forth, " Forever live the King ! Loud was the uproar, as when Rome's decree Pronounced Achaia once again was free; Assembled Greece enrapt with fond belief [Chief. Heard the false boon, and bless'd the treacherous Each breast with freedom's holy ardor glows, From every voice the cry of rapture rose ; Their thundering clamors rend the astonished sky, And birds o'erpassing hear, and drop, and die. Thus o'er the Persian dome their plaudits ring, And the high hall recehoed - " Live the King!" The mutes bow'd reverent down before their Lord, The assembled Satraps envied and adored, Joy sparkled in the Monarch's conscious eyes, And his pleased pride already doom'd the prize.

Silent they saw Zorobabel advance : He to Apame turn'd his timid glance ; With downward eye he paused, a moment mute, Then with light finger touch'd the softer lute. Apame knew the Hebrew's grateful cause, And bent her head, and sweetly smiled applause.

Why is the warrior's check so red? Why downward droops his musing head? Why that slow step, that faint advance, That keen yet quick retreating glance? That crested head in war tower'd high; No backward glance disgraced that eye, No flushing fear that check o'erspread, When stern he strode o'er heaps of dead :

Strange tumult now his bosom moves, — The Warrior fears because he loves.

Why does the Youth delight to rove Arnid the dark and lonely grove? Why in the throng where all are gay, With absent eyes from gayety distraught, Sits he alone in silent thought? Silent he sits, for far away His passion'd soul delights to stray;

Recluse he royes as if he fain would shun All human-kind, because he loves but One !

Yes, King of Persia, thou art blest ! But not because the sparkling howl To rapture elevates thy waken'd soul ; But not because of power possest; Nor that the Nations dread thy nod, And princes reverence thee their earthly God ! Even on a monarch's solitude Will Care, dark visitant, intrude ; The bowl brief pleasure can bestow ; The purple cannot shield from woe ; But, King of Persia, thou art blest, For Heaven who raised thee thus the world above, Hath made thee happy in Apame's love !

Oh! I have seen him fondly trace The heavenly features of her face, Rove o'er her form with eager eye, And sigh and gaze, and gaze and sigh. See! from his brow with mimic frown Apame takes the sacred crown; Those sparkling eyes, that radiant face, Give to the diadem new grace: And subject to a Woman's laws, Darius sees, and smiles applause !

He ceased, and silent still remain'd the throng, While rapt attention own'd the power of song. Then, loud as when the wintry whirlwinds blow, From every voice the thundering plaudits flow ; Darius smiled, Apame's sparkling eyes Glanced on the King, and Woman won the prize.

Now silent sate the expectant crowd : Alone The victor Hebrew gazed not on the throne ; With deeper hue his cheek distemper'd glows, With statelier stature loftier now he rose ; Heavenward he gazed, regardless of the throng, And pour'd with awful voice sublimer song.

"Ancient of days! Eternal Truth! one hymn, One holier strain the Bard shall raise to Thee, Thee Powerful! Thee Benevolent! Thee Just! Friend! Father! All in all!—The Vine's rich blood, [charms, The Monarch's might, and Woman's conquering These shall we praise alone?—O ye who sit Beneath your vine, and quaff at evening hour The healthful bowl, remember 11im whose dews, Whose rains, whose sun, matured the growing fruit, Creator and Preserver!—Reverence Him, O Thou who from thy throne dispensest life And death, for He hath delegated power, And thou shalt one day at the throne of God Render thy strict account ! - And ye who gaze Enrapt on Beauty's fascinating form, Gaze on with love; and loving beauty, learn To shun abhorrent all the mental eye Beholds deform'd and fonl; for so shall Love Climb to the source of goodness. God of Truth ! All Just ! All Mighty : I should ill deserve Thy noblest gift, the gift divine of song, If, so content with ear-deep melodies To please all-profitless, I did not pour Severer strains, - of Truth - eternal Truth, Unchanging Justice, universal Love. Such strains awake the Soul to loftiest thoughts ; Such strains the blessed Spirits of the Good Waft, grateful incense, to the Halls of Heaven."

The dying notes still murmur'd on the string, When from his throne arose the raptured King. About to speak he stood, and waved his hand, And all expectant sate the obedient band.

Then just and generous, thus the Monarch cries, "Be thine, Zorobabel, the well-earn'd prize. The purple robe of state thy form shall fold, The beverage sparkle in thy cup of gold, The golden couch, the car, and honor'd chain, Requite the merits of thy favor'd strain, And raised supreme the ennobled race among, Be call'd My Cousin for the victor song. Nor these alone the victor song shall bless ; Ask what thou wilt, and what thou wilt possess.'

"Fallen is Jerusalem!" the Hebrew cries, And patriot anguish fills his streaming eyes, "Hurl'd to the earth by Rapine's vengeful rod, Polluted lies the temple of our God; Far in a foreign land her sons remain, Hear the keen taunt, and drag the galling chain; In fruitless woe they wear the weary years, And steep the bread of bitterness in tears. O Monarch, greatest, mildest, best of men, Restore us to those ruin'd walls again ' Allow us to rebuild that sacred dome, To live in liberty, and die at Home."

So spake Zorobabel. — Thus Woman's praise Avail'd again Jerusalem to raise, Call'd forth the sanction of the Despot's nod, And freed the Nation best beloved of God.

WAT TYLER;

A DRAMA.

TWENTY years ago, upon the surreptitions publication of this notable Drama, and the use which was made of it, I said what it then became me to say in a letter to one of those gentlemen who thought proper to revile me, not for having entertained democratical opinions, but for having outgrowa theos, and learnt to appreciate and to defend the institutions of my country.

- flad I written lewdly in my youth, like Beza, -- like Beza, I would ask pardon of God and man; and no considerations should induce me to reprint what I could never think of without sorrow and shame. Had I at any time, like St. Augustine, taught doctrines which I afterwards perceived to be erroneous, - and if, as in his case, my position in society, and the estimation in which I was held, gave weight to what I had advanced, and made those errors dangerous to others, --- like St. Augustine, I would publish my retractations, and endeavor to counteract the evil which, though erringly, with no evil intention, I had caused.
- Wherefore then, it may be asked, have I included Wat Tyler in this authentic collection of my poetical works? For these reasons, -- that it may not be supposed I think it any reproach to have written it, or that f am more ashamed of having been a republican, than of having been a boy. Quicunque ista lecturi sunt, non me imitentur errantem, sed in melius proficientem. Invenirt enim furtasse, quomodo scribendo profecerim, quisquis opnscula mea, ordine quo scripta sunt, legerit.*
- I have endeavored to correct in my other juvenile pieces such faults as were corrigible. But Wat Tyler appears just as it was written, in the course of three mornings, in 1794; the stolen copy, which was committed to the press twentythree years afterwards, not having undergone the slightest correction of any kind.

ACT L

SCENE. A Blacksmith's shop; Wat Tyler at work within ; a May-pole before the door.

ALICE, PIERS, &C.

SONG.

CHEERFUL on this holiday, Welcome we the merry May.

On every sunny hillock spread, The pale primrose lifts her head; Rich with sweets, the western gale Sweeps along the cowslip'd dale; Every bank, with violets gay. Smiles to welcome in the May.

The linnet from the budding grove Chirps her vernal song of love. The copse resounds the throstle's notes ; On each wild gale sweet music floats; And melody from every spray Welcomes in the merry May.

Cheerful on this holiday, Welcome we the merry May. [Dance.

[During the dance, Tyler lays down his hammer, and sits mournfully down before the door.

Hob Carter. Why so sad, neighbor? - do not these gay sports,

This revelry of youth, recall the days

When we too mingled in the revelry,

And lightly tripping in the morris dance, Welcomed the merry month?

Tyler. Ay, we were young; No cares had quell'd the heyday of the blood ; We sported deftly in the April morning,

* St. Augustine.

Nor mark'd the black clouds gathering o'er our Nor fear'd the storm of night. [noon, Beshrew me, Tyler, Hob.

But my heart joys to see the imps so cheerful! Young, hale, and happy, why should they destroy

These blessings by reflection ? Tyler. Look ye, neighbor -

You have known me long.

Since we were boys together, Hob. And play'd at barley-brake, and danced the morris. Some five-and-twenty years!

Was not I young, Tyler. And hale, and happy?

Hob. Cheerful as the best. fman? Tyler. Have not I been a staid, hard-working Up with the lark at labor; sober, honest,

Of an unblemish'd character?

Hob.

Who doubts it? There's never a man in Essex bears a better.

Tyler. And shall not these, though young, and hale, and happy,

Look on with sorrow to the future hour? Shall not reflection poison all their pleasures? When I - the honest, staid, hard-working Tyler, Toil through the long course of the summer's day, Still toiling, yet still poor! when with hard labor Scarce can I furnish out my daily food,

And age comes on to steal away my strength, And leave me poor and wretched! Why should this be?

My youth was regular - my labor constant -1 married an industrions, virtuous woman; Nor while I toil'd and sweated at the anvil, Sat she neglectful of her spinning-wheel. Hob! I have only six groats in the world,

And they must soon by law be taken from me.

Hob. Curse on these taxes - one succeeds an other-

Our ministers, panders of a king's will, Drain all our wealth away, waste it in revels, And lure, or force away our boys, who should be The props of our old age, to fill their armies, And feed the crows of France. Year follows year. And still we madly prosecute the war;

Draining our wealth, distressing our poor peasants, Slaughtering our youths - and all to erown our chiefs

With glory ! - I detest the hell-sprung name. Tyler. What matters me who wears the crown of France?

Whether a Richard or a Charles possess it? They reap the glory - they enjoy the spoil -We pay-we bleed! The sun would shine as The rains of heaven as seasonably fall, [cheerly, Though neither of these royal pests existed. Hob. Nay, as for that, we poor men should fare better ; No legal robbers then should force away

The hard-earn'd wages of our honest toil.

The Parliament forever cries more money;

The service of the state demands more money.

Just heaven ! of what service is the state ?

Tyler. Oh, 'tis of vast importance ! who should The luxuries and riots of the court? [pay for Who should support the flaunting courtier's pride,

The mighty multitude shall trample down	'When Adam delved and Eve span,
The handful that oppress them.	Who was then the gentleman?'
Tyler. Have ye heard
So soon then of my murder?	Wretched is the infant's lot,
Hob. Of your vengeance.	Born within the straw-roof d cot;
Piers ran throughout the village: told the news -	Be he generous, wise, or brave,
Cried out, To arms! — arm, arm for liberty;	He must only be a slave.
For Liberty and Justice !	Long, long labor, little rest,
Tyler. My good friends,	Still to toil to be oppress'd;
Heed well your danger, or be resolute !	Drain'd by taxes of his store,
Learn to laugh menaces and force to seorn,	Punish'd next for being poor :
Or leave me. 1 dare answer the bold deed —	This is the poor wretch's lot,
Death must come once : return ye to your homes,	Born within the straw-roof'd cot.
Protect my wife and child, and on my grave
Write why I died; perhaps the time may come,	While the peasant works, - to sleep,
	What the peasant sows, — to seep,
When honest Justice shall applaud the deed.	On the couch of ease to lie,

Night at our productorus feet we have too long	ine vinani, be ne tool,
Obey'd their orders, bow'd to their caprices,	Still to hold despotic rule,

When Adam delved and Eve span, Who was then the gentleman?

Jack Straw. The mob are up in London - the proud courtiers

Begin to tremble.

Ay, ay, 'tis time to tremble : Tom Miller.

- Who'll plough their fields, who'll do their drudgery now,
- And work like horses to give them the harvest? Jack Straw. I only wonder why we lay quiet so long.

We had always the same strength; and we deserved

The ills we met with for not using it.

Hob. Why do we fear those animals call'd lords? What is there in the name to frighten us? Is not my arm as mighty as a Baron's?

Enter PIERS ond JOHN BALL.

Piers, (to Tyler.) Have I done well, my father? I remember'd

This good man lay in prison.

Tyler. My dear child, Most well; the people rise for liberty,

And their first deed should be to break the chains That binds the virtuous : - Oh, thou honest priest, How much hast thou endured !

John Ball. Why, ay, my friend ! These squalid rags bespeak what I have suffer'd.

I was reviled, insulted, left to languish

In a damp dungeon ; but I bore it cheerily --

My heart was glad - for I had done my duty.

I pitied my oppressors, and I sorrow'd

For the poor men of England.

Tyler.

Their strength : look round this heath ; 'tis throng'd with men

They have felt

Ardent for freedom : mighty is the event

That waits their fortune.

John Ball. I would fain address them. Tyler. Do so, my friend, and preach to them their duty.

Remind them of their long-withholden rights. What ho! there; silence!

Piers. Silence, there, my friends; This good man would address you.

Ay, ay, hear him; Hob. He is no mealy-mouth'd court-orator,

To flatter vice, and pamper lordly pride.

John Ball. Friends, brethren ! for ye are my brethren all;

Englishmen, met in arms to advocate

The cause of freedom, hear me; pause awhile

In the career of vengeance !- It is true I am a priest, but, as these rags may speak,

Not one who riots in the poor man's spoil,

Or trades with his religion. I am one

Who preach the law of Christ; and, in my life,

Would practise what he taught. The Son of God Came not to you in power : humble in mien, Lowly in heart, the man of Nazareth Preach'd merey, justice, love : "Woe unto ye,

Ye that are rich: if that ye would be saved,

Sell that ye have, and give unto the poor." 14

So taught the Savior. Oh, my honest friends, Have ye not felt the strong, indignant throb Of justice in your bosoms, to behold The lordly Baron feasting on your spoils ? Have you not in your hearts arraign'd the lot That gave him on the conch of luxury To pillow his head, and pass the festive day In sportive feasts, and ease, and revelry? Have you not often in your conscience ask'd, Why is the difference ; wherefore should that man, No worthier than myself, thus lord it over me, And bid me labor, and enjoy the fruits? The God within your breasts has argued thus : The voice of truth has murmur'd. Came ye not As helpless to the world? Shines not the sun With equal ray on both? Do ye not feel The self-same winds of heaven as keenly pareh ye? Abundant is the earth-the Sire of all Saw and pronounced that it was very good. Look round: the vernal fields snile with new flowers,

The budding orchard perfumes the sweet breeze, And the green corn waves to the passing gale. There is enough for all; but your proud Baron Stands up, and, arrogant of strength, exclaims, "I am a Lord - by nature I am noble These fields are mine, for 1 was born to them; I was born in the castle - you, poor wretches, Whelp'd in the cottage, are by birth my slaves. Almighty God ! such blasphemies are utter'd :

Almighty God ! such blasphemies believed ! Tom Miller. This is something like a sermon. Where's the bishop Jack Straw.

- Would tell you truths like these? [apostles Hob. There never was a bishop among all the John Ball. My brethren -
- Silence; the good priest speaks Piers. John Ball. My brethren, these are truths, and weighty ones;

Ye are all equal: nature made ye so.

Equality is your birthright. - When I gaze

On the proud palace, and behold one man

In the blood-purpled robes of royalty,

Feasting at ease, and lording over millions,

Then turn me to the hut of poverty,

And see the wretched laborer, worn with toil,

Divide his scanty morsel with his infants,

I sicken, and, indignant at the sight,

" Blush for the patience of humanity."

Jack Straw. We will assert our rights.

Tom Miller. We'll trample down These insolent oppressors.

In good truth, John Ball.

Ye have cause for anger: but, my honest friends, Is it revenge or justice that ye seek?

Mob.

Justice ! Justice ' John Ball. Oh, then remember mercy;

And though your proud oppressors spare not you. Show you excel them in humanity.

They will use every art to disunite you ;

To conquer separately, by stratagem,

Whom in a mass they fear ; - but be ye firm;

Boldly demand your long-forgotten rights,

Your sacred, your inalienable freedom.

Be bold - be resolute - be merciful

And while you spurn the hated name of slaves, Show you are men.

 Mob.
 Long live our honest priest.

 Jack Straw.
 He shall be made archbishop.

 John Ball.
 My brethren, I am plain John Ball, your friend, Your equal : by the law of Christ enjoin'd

To serve you, not command.

To serve you, not con

Jack Straw. March we for London. Tyler. Mark me, my friends — we rise for Liberty —

Justice shall be our guide : let no man dare To plunder in the tumult.

Mob. Lead us on. Liberty ! Justice !

[Excunt, with crics of Liberty ! No Poll-tax ! No War.

SCENE IJ. The Tower.

KING RICHARD, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, SIR JOHN TRESILIAN, WALWORTH, PHILPOT.

King. What must we do? the danger grows more imminent.

The mob increases.

Philpot. Every moment brings Fresh tidings of our peril.

Kiag. It were well To grant them what they ask.

Archbishop. Lull them by promises — hespeak Go forth, my liege — spare not, if need requires

A solemn oath to ratify the treaty.

King. I dread their fury.

Archbishop. 'T is a needless dread ; There is divinity about your person ;

It is the sacred privilege of Kings,

Howe'er they act, to render no account

To man. The people have been taught this lesson, Nor can they soon forget it.

King. I will go — I will submit to every thing they ask ;

My day of triumph will arrive at last. [Shouts without.

Enter Messenger.

 Messenger. The mob are at the eity gates.

 Archbishop.
 Haste ! Haste !

 Address them ere too late.
 I'll remain here,

 For they detest me much.
 [Shouts again.]

Enter another Messenger

 Mess. The Londoners have open'd the eity gates;

 I ne rebels are admitted.
 [mayor,

 King. Fear then must give me courage. My lord

 Come you with me.

SCENE III. Smithfield.

WAT TYLER, JOHN BALL, PIERS, &c. Mob.

Piers. So far triumphant are we. How these nobles,

These petty tyrants, who so long oppress'd us, Shrink at the first resistance !

Hob. They were powerful Only because we fondly thought them so. Where is Jack Straw?

Tyler. Jack Straw is gone to the Tower To seize the king, and so to end resistance.

John Ball. It was well judged; fain would I spare the shedding

Of human blood : gain we that royal puppet, And all will follow fairly ; deprived of him, The nobles lose their pretext, nor will dare Rebel against the people's majesty.

Enter Herald.

Herald. Richard the Second, by the grace of God, Of England, Ireland, France, and Scotland, King, And of the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, Would parley with Wat Tyler. Tyler. Let him know

Wat Tyler is in Smithfield. [Exit Herald.] - I will parley

With this young monarch : as he comes to me, Trusting my honor, on your lives I charge you Let none attempt to harm him.

John Ball. The faith of courts Is but a weak dependence. You are honest — And better is it even to die the victim Of credulous honesty, than live preserved

By the cold policy that still suspects.

Enter KING, WALWORTH, PHILPOT, S.C.

King. I would speak to thee, Wat Tyler: bid Retire awhile. [the mob Piers. Nay, do not go alone. Let me attend you. Wherefore should I fear? Tyler. Am I not arm'd with a just eause? Retire, And I will boldly plead the cause of Freedom. [Advances. King. Tyler, why have you kill'd my officer, And led my honest subjects from their homes, Thus to rebel against the Lord's anointed ? Tyler. Because they were oppress'd. King. Was this the way To remedy the ill? You should have tried By milder means - petition'd at the throne -The throne will always listen to petitions. King of England, Tyler. Petitioning for pity is most weak -The sovereign people ought to demand justice. I kill'd your officer, for his lewd hand Insulted a maid's modesty. Your subjects I lead to rebel against the Lord's anointed, Because his ministers have made him odious ; His yoke is heavy, and his burden grievous. Why do we carry on this fatal war, To force upon the French a king they hate, Tearing our young men from their peaceful homes, Forcing his hard-earn'd fruits from the honest John Bull. Piers, I am so. [bishop, Jack Straw has forced the tower; seiz'd the Archpeasant, Distressing us to desolate our neighbors? And beheaded him. The curse of insurrection. Why is this ruinous poll-tax imposed, Piers. But to support your court's extravagance, John Ball. Ay, Piers, our nobles level down their vassals, And your mad title to the erown of France? Shall we sit tamely down beneath these evils Keep them at endless labor, like their brutes, Degrading every faculty by servitude, Petitioning for pity ? King of England, Repressing all the energy of mind : Why are we sold like cattle in your markets -We must not wonder, then, that, like wild beasts, Deprived of every privilege of man? When they have burst their chains, with brutal Must we lie tamely at our tyrant's feet, And, like your spaniels, lick the hand that beats us? rage You sit at ease in your gay palaces ! They revenge them on their tyrants. This Archbishop, The costly banquet courts your appetite; Piers. Sweet music soothes your slumbers : we, the while, He was oppressive to his humble vassals: Scarce by hard toil ean earn a little food, [wind; Proud, haughty, avaricious -And sleep scarce shelter'd from the cold night John Ball. Even whilst his unforgiving hand distress'd The Parliament forever asks more money ; Ilis honest tenants. We toil and sweat for money for your taxes: Where is the benefit, what good reap we Piers. He deserved his fate, then. From all the counsels of your government? John Ball. Justice can never link with cruelty. Think you that we should quarrel with the French? Is there among the catalogue of crimes What boots to us your vietories, your glory? A sin so black that only Death can explate? We pay, we fight, you profit at your ease. Will reason never rouse her from her slumbers, And darting through the veil her eagle eye, Do you not elaim the country as your own? Do you not call the venison of the forest, See in the sable gaments of the law Revenge conceal'd? This high priest has been The birds of heaven, your own ? - prohibiting us, Even though in want of food, to seize the prey haughty; Which nature offers. King ! is all this just ? He has oppress'd his vassals : tell me, Piers, Think you we do not feel the wrongs we suffer? Does his death remedy the ills he caused? The hour of retribution is at hand, Were it not better to repress his power And tyrants tremble - mark me, King of England ! Of doing wrong, that so his future life Walworth, (comes behind him, and stabs him.) Might remedy the evils of the past, Insolent rebel, threatening the King ! And benefit mankind? Piers. Vengeance ! Vengeance ! Piers. But must not vice Be punish'd? Hob. Seize the King. King. I must be bold. (.Advancing.) John Ball. Is not punishment revenge? The momentary violence of anger My friends and loving subjects, May be excused : the indignant heart will throb I will grant you all you ask; you shall be free -The tax shall be repeal'd - all, all you wish. Against oppression, and the outstretch'd arm Your leader menaced me; he deserv'd his fate: Resent its injured feelings. The Collector Insulted Alice, and roused the keen emotions Quiet your angers : on my royal word Of a fond father. Tyler murder'd him. Your grievances shall all be done away; Piers. Murder'd ! - a most harsh word. Your vassalage abolish'd. A free pardon Yes, murder'd him: Allow'd to all : So help me God, it shall be John Ball. Cut him at once from all the joys of life, All shall be justly done. All hopes of reformation — to revenge The deed his punishment cannot recall? My blood boil'd in me at the fate of Tyler, Vet I reveng'd not. ACT III. Piers. Oh, my Christian father, They would not argue thus humanely on us, SCENE I. Smithfield. Were we within their power. POEMS CONCERNING THE SLAVE TRADE.

SONNET I.

HOLD your mad hands! forever on your plain Must the gorged vulture clog his beak with blood? Forever must your Niger's tainted flood Roll tu the ravenous shark his banquet slain? Hold your mad hands! and learn at length to know,

And turn your vengeance on the common foe, Yon treacherous vessel and her godless crew ! Let never traders with false pretext fair Set on your shores again their wicked feet : With interdiet and indignation meet Repel them, and with fire and sword pursue ! Avarice, the white, cadaverous fiend, is there, Who spreads his toils accursed wide and far, And for his purveyor calls the demon War.

SONNET II.

Wuv dost thou beat thy breast and rend thine hair, And to the deaf sea pour thy frantic eries? Before the gale the laden vessel flies; The Heavens all-favoring smile, the breeze is fair; Hark to the elamors of the exulting erew! Hark, how their cannon mock the patient skies! Why dost thou shriek, and strain thy red-swollen eyes,

As the white sail is lessening from thy view? Go, pine in want, and anguish, and despair; There is no mercy found in human-kind! Go, Widow, to thy grave, and rest thee there! But may the God of Justice bid the wind Whelm that curst bark beneath the mountain wave, And bless with liberty and death the Slave!

SONNET III.

On, he is worn with toil ! the big drops run Down his dark check; hold—hold thy mercilese hand,

Pale tyrant! for beneath thy hard command O'erwearied nature sinks. The scorching sun, As pitiless as proud Prosperity,

Darts on him his full beams; gasping he lies Arraigning with his looks the patient skies,

While that inhuman driver lifts on high

The mangling scourge. O ye who at your case Sip the blood-sweeten'd beverage, thoughts like these Haply ye scorn: I thank thee, gracious God, That I do feel upon my cheek the glow Of indignation, when beneath the rod A sable brother writhes in silent woe.

SONNET IV.

'Tis night; the unrelenting owners sleep As undisturb'd as Justice; but no more The o'erwearied slave, as on his native shore, Rests on his reedy couch : he wakes to weep. Though through the toil and anguish of the day No tear escaped him, not one suffering groan Beneath the twisted thong, he weeps alone In bitterness; thinking that far away While happy Negroes join the midnight song, And merriment resounds on Niger's shore, She whom he loves, far from the cheerful throng Stands sad, and gazes from her lowly door With dim-grown eye, silent and woe-begone, And weeps for him who will return no more.

SONNET V.

Dip then the Negro rear at last the sword Of vengeance? Did he plunge its thirsty blade In the hard heart of his inhuman lord? Oh, who shall blame him? in the midnight shade There came on him the intolerable thought Of every past delight; his native grove, Friendship's best joys, and liberty and love, Forever lost. Such recollections wrought His brain to madness. Wherefore should he live Longer with abject patience to endure His wrongs and wretchedness, when hope can give No consolation, time can bring no cure? But justice for himself he yet could take, And life is then well given for vengeance' sake.

SONNET VI.

HIGH in the air exposed the slave is hung, To all the birds of heaven, their living food ! He groans not, though awaked by that fierce sun New torturers live to drink their parent blood : He groans not, though the gorging vulture tear The quivering fibre. Hither look, O ye Who tore this man from peace and liberty ! Look hither, ye who weigh with politic care The gain against the guilt ! Beyond the grave There is another world !— bear ye in mind, Ere your decree proclaims to all mankind The gain is worth the guilt, that there the Slave, Before the Eternal, "thunder-tongued shall plead Against the deep damnation of your deed."

TO THE GENIUS OF AFRICA.

O THOU, who from the mountain's height Rollest thy clouds with all their weight Of waters to old Nile's majestic tide; Or o'er the dark, sepulchral plain Recallest Carthage in her ancient pride, The mistress of the Main; Hear, Genius, hear thy children's cry ! Not always shouldst thou love to brood Stern o'er the desert solitude Where seas of sand heave their hot surges high; Nor, Genius, should the midnight song Detain thee in some milder mood The palmy plains among, Where Gambia to the torches' light Flows radiant through the awaken'd night.

Ah, linger not to hear the song ! Genius, avenge thy children's wrong ! The demon Avarice on your shore Brings all the horrors of his train; And hark ! where from the field of gore Howls the hyena o'er the slain ! Lo ! where the flanning village fires the skies, Avenging Power, awake ! arise !

Arise, thy children's wrongs redress ' Heed the mother's wretchedness, When in the hot, infectious air O'er her sick babe she bows opprest,— Hear her when the Traders tear The suffering infant from her breast ! Sunk in the ocean he shall rest ! Hear thou the wretched mother's cries, Avenging Power ! awake ! arise !

By the rank, infected air That taints those cabins of despair; By the scourges blacken'd o'er, And stiff and hard with human gore By every groan of deep distress, By every groan of deep distress; The vices and the crimes that flow From the hopelessness of woe; By every drop of blood bespilt, By Afric's wrongs and Europe's guilt, Awake ! arise ! avenge !

[plains And thou hast heard ! and o'er their blood-fed Sent thine avenging hurricanes, And bade thy storms with whirlwind roar Dash their proud navies on the shore ; And where their armies claim d the fight Wither'd the warrior's might ; And o'er the unholy host, with baneful breath, There, Genius, thou hast breathed the gales of Death.

Bristol, 1795.

THE SAILOR,

WHO HAD SERVED IN THE SLAVE TRADE.

In Septemher, 1798, a Dissenting Minister of Bristol discovered a sailor in the neighborhood of that City, groaning and praying in a cow-house. The circumstance which occasioned his agony of mind is detailed in the annexed ballad, without the slightest addition or alteration. By presenting it as a Poem, the story is made more public; and such stories ought to be made as public as possible.

IT was a Christian minister, Who, in the month of flowers, Walk'd forth at eve amid the fields Near Bristol's ancient towers, —

When, from a lonely out-house breathed, He heard a voice of woe, And groans which less might seem from pain,

Than wretchedness, to flow.

Heart-rending groans they were, with words Of bitterest despair; Yet with the holy name of Christ Pronounced in broken prayer.

The Christian Minister went in; A Sailor there he sees, Whose hands were lifted up to Heaven, And he was on his knees.

Nor did the Sailor, so intent, His entering footsteps heed, But now "Our Father" said, and now His half-forgotten creed ;—

And often on our Savior call'd With many a bitter groan, But in such anguish as may spring From deepest guilt alone.

The miserable man was ask'd Why he was kneeling there, And what had been the crime that caused The anguish of his prayer.

"I have done a cursed thing !" he cried; "It haunts me night and day; And I have sought this lonely place Here undisturb'd to pray.

POEMS CONCERNING THE SLAVE TRADE.

Aboard 1 have no place for prayer, So I came here alone, That I might freely kneel and pray, And call on Christ, and groan.

If to the main-mast head I go, The Wicked One is there; From place to place, from rope to rope, He follows every where.

I shut my eyes -- it matters not --Still, still the same I see, --And when I lie me down at night, 'Tis always day with me !

He follows, follows every where, And every place is Hell ! O God — and I must go with Him In endless fire to dwell ?

He follows, follows every where ; He's still above — below ! Oh, tell me where to fly from him !

Oh, tell me where to go !" "But tell thou," quoth the stranger then, "What this thy crime hath been ;

So haply I may comfort give To one who grieves for sin."

"Oh cursed, cursed is the deed!" The wretched man replies;

" And night, and day, and every where, "Tis still before my eyes.

I sail'd on board a Guinea-man, And to the slave-coast went;— Would that the sea had swallow'd me When I was innocent!

And we took in our cargo there, Three hundred negro slaves, And we sail'd homeward merrily Over the ocean-waves.

But some were sulky of the slaves, And would not touch their meat, So therefore we were forced by threats And blows to make them eat.

One woman, sulkier than the rest, Would still refuse her food, — O Jesus God! I hear her cries! I see her in her blood!

The Captain made me tie her up, And flog while he stood by; And then he cursed me if I stayed My hand to hear her cry.

She shriek'd, she groan'd, — I could not spare, For the Captain he stood by; — Dear God ! that I might rest one night From that poor creature's cry !

What woman's child a sight like that Could bear to look upon ! And still the Captain would not spare — But made me still flog on. She could not be more glad than 1, When she was taken down : A blessed minute ! --- 't was the last

That I have ever known

 I did not close my eyes all night, Thinking what I had done;
 I heard ber groans, and they grew faint Towards the rising sun.

She groan'd and moan'd, but her voice grew Fainter at morning tide; Fainter and fainter still it came, Until at noon she died.

They flung her overboard; — poor wretch, She rested from her pain, — But when — O Christ! O blessed God!— Shall 1 have rest again?

 saw the sea close over her; Yet she is still in sight;
 I see her twisting every where; I hear her day and night.

Go where I will, do what I can, The Wicked One I see : Dear Christ, have merey on my soul ! O God, deliver me !

Oh, give me comfort, if you can ! Oh, tell me where to fly ! Oh, tell me if there can be hope For one so lost as 1 ! ''

What said the Minister of Christ? He bade him trust in Heaven, And call on Him for whose dear sake All sins shall be forgiven.

He told him of that precious blood Which should his guilt efface; Told him that none are lost, but they Who turn from proffer'd grace.

He bade him pray, and knelt with him, And join'd him in his prayers: —— And some who read the dreadful tale Perhaps will aid with theirs.

VERSES

SPOREN IN THE THEATRE AT OXFORD, UPON THE INSTALLATION OF LORD GRENVILLE.

GRENVILLE, few years have had their course, since last

Exulting Oxford view'd a spectacle

Like this day's pomp; and yet to those who throng'd

These walls, which echo'd then with Portland's praise, [spring

What change hath intervened! The bloom of

POEMS CONCERNING THE SLAVE TRADE.

Is fled from many a cheek, where roseate joy
And beauty bloom'd; the inexorable Grave
Hath claim'd its portion; and the band of youths,
Who then, collected here as in a port,
From whence to launch on life's adventurous sea,
Stood on the beach, cre this have found their lots
Of good or evil. Thus the lapse of years,
Evolving all things in its quiet course,
Hath wrought for them; and though those years have seen
Fearful vicissitudes, of wilder change
Than history yet had learnt, or old romance
In wildest mood imagined, yet these too,

In wildest mood imagined, yet these too, Portentous as they seem, not less have risen, Each of its natural cause the sure effect, All righteously ordain'd. Lo! kingdoms wreck'd, Thrones overturn'd, built up, then swept away Like fabrics in the summer clouds, dispersed By the same breath that heap'd them; rightful kings,

Who, from a line of long-drawn ancestry, Held the transmitted sceptre, to the axe Bowing the anointed head; or dragg'd away To eat the bread of bondage; or escaped Beneath the shadow of Britannia's shield, There only safe. Such fate have vicious courts, Statesmen corrupt, and fear-struck policy, Upon themselves drawn down; till Europe, bound In iron chains, lies bleeding in the dust, Beneath the feet of upstart tyranny: Only the heroic Spaniard, he alone Yet unsubdued in these degenerate days, With desperate virtue, such as in old time Hallow'd Saguntum and Numantia's name, Stands up against the oppressor undismay'd. So may the Almighty bless the noble race, And crown with happy end their holiest cause '

Deem not these dread events the monstrous birth Of chance! And thou, O England, who dost ride Serene amid the waters of the flood, Preserving, even like the Ark of old, Amid the general wreck, thy purer faith, Domestic loves, and ancient liberty, Look to thyself, O England ! for be sure, Even to the measure of thine own desert, The cup of retribution to thy lips Shall soon or late be dealt !- a thought that well Might fill the stoutest heart of all thy sons With awful apprehension. Therefore, they Who fear the Eternal's justice, bless thy name, Grenville, because the wrongs of Africa Cry out no more to draw a curse from Heaven On England !- for if still the trooping sharks Track by the scent of death the accursed ship Freighted with human anguish, in her wake Pursue the chase, crowd round her keel, and dart Toward the sound contending, when they hear The frequent carcass, from her guilty deck, Dash in the opening deep, no longer now The guilt shall rest on England; but if yet There be among her children, hard of heart And sear'd of conscience, men who set at nought Her laws and God's own word, upon themselves Their sin be visited !- the red-cross flag,

Redeem'd from stain so foul, no longer now Covereth the abomination. 113

This thy praise, O Grenville, and while ages roll away This shall be thy remembrance. Yca, when all For which the tyrant of these abject times Hath given his honorable name on earth, His nights of innocent sleep, his hopes of heaven When all his triumphs and his deeds of blood, The fretful changes of his feverish pride, His miduight murders and perfidious plots, Are but a tale of years so long gone by, That they who read distrust the hideous truth, Willing to let a charitable doubt Abate their horror; Grenville, even then Thy memory will be fresh among mankind; Afric with all her tongues will speak of thee, With Wilberforce and Clarkson, he whom Heaven, To be the apostle of this holy work, Raised up and strengthen'd, and upheld through all His arduous toil. To end the glorious task, That blessed, that redeeming deed was thine : Be it thy pride in life, thy thought in death, Thy praise beyond the tomb. The statesman's fame Will fade, the conqueror's laurel crown grow sear; Fame's loudest trump upon the ear of Time Leaves but a dying echo; they alone Are held in everlasting memory, Whose deeds partake of heaven. Long ages hence Nations unborn, in cities that shall rise

Along the palmy coast, will bless thy name; And Senegal and secret Niger's shore, And Calabar, no longer startled then With sounds of murder, will, like Isis now, Ring with the songs that tell of Grenville's praise

I

ELINOR.

TIME, Morning. SCENE, The Shore.

ONCE more to daily toil, once more to wear The livery of shame, once more to search With miserable task this savage shore! O thou, who mountest so triumphantly In yonder Heaven, beginning thy career Of glory, O thou blessed Sun ! thy beams Fall on me with the same benignant light Here, at the farthest limits of the world, And blasted as I am with infamy, As when in better years poor Elinor Gazed on thy glad uprise with eye undimm'd By guilt and sorrow, and the opening morn

BOTANY-BAY ECLOGUES.

Woke her from quiet sleep to days of peace. In other occupation then I trod The beach at eve; and then, when I beheld The billows as they roll'd before the storm Burst on the rock and rage, my timid soul Shrunk at the perils of the boundless deep, And heaved a sigh for suffering mariners; — Ah ! little thinking I myself was doom'd To tempt the perils of the boundless deep, An outcast, unbeloved and unbewail'd.

Still wilt thou haunt me, Memory ! still present The fields of England to my exiled eyes, The joys which once were mine. Even now I see The lowly, lovely dwelling; even now Behold the woodbine clasping its white walls, Where fearlessly the red-breasts chirp'd around To ask their morning meal: and where at eve I loved to sit and watch the rook sail by, And hear his hollow tone, what time he sought The church-yard elm, that with its ancient boughs Full-foliaged, half-conceal'd the house of God; That holy house, where I so oft have heard My father's voice explain the wondrous works Of Heaven to sinful man. Ah! little deem'd His virtuous bosom, that his shameless child So soon should spurn the lesson, - sink, the slave Of Vice and Infamy,-the hireling prey Of brutal appetite ; - at length worn out With famine, and the avenging scourge of guilt, Should share dishonesty, - yet dread to die !

Welcome, ye savage lands, ye barbarous climes, Where angry England sends her outcast sons; I hail your joyless shores! My weary bark, Long tempest-tost on Life's inclement sea, Here hails her haven; welcomes the drear scene, The marshy plain, the brier-entangled wood, And all the perils of a world unknown. For Elinor has nothing new to fear From cruel Fortune; all her rankling shafts Barb'd with disgrace, and venom'd with disease, Have pierced my bosom, and the dart of death Has lost its terrors to a wretch like me.

Welcome, ye marshy heaths, ye pathless woods, Where the rude native rests his wearied frame Beneath the sheltering shade; where, when the storm

Benumbs his naked limbs, he flies to seek The dripping shelter. Welcome, ye wild plains Unbroken by the plough, undelved by hand Of patient rustic; where for lowing herds, And for the music of the bleating flocks, Alone is heard the kangaroo's sad note Deepening in distance. Welcome, wilderness, Nature's domain ! for here, as yet unknown The comforts and the crimes of polish'd life, Nature benignly gives to all enough, Denies to all a superfluity. What though the garb of infamy I wear, Though day by day along the echoing beach I gather wave-worn shells; yet day by day l earn in honesty my frugal food, And lay me down at night to calm repose;

No more condemned, the mercenary tool Of brutal lust, while heaves the indignant heart Abborrent, and self-loathed, to fold my arms Round the rank felon, and for daily bread To hug contagion to my poison'd breast ! On these wild shores the saving hand of Grace Will probe my secret soul, and cleanse its wounds. And fit the faithful penitent for Heaven.

HUMPHREY AND WILLIAM.

TIME, Noon.

HUMPHREY.

SEE'st thou not, William, that the scorching sun By this time half his daily race hath run? The savage thrusts his light canoe to shore, And hurries homeward with his fishy store. Suppose we leave awhile this stubborn soil, To eat our dinner and to rest from toil.

WILLIAM.

Agreed. Yon tree, whose purple gum bestows A ready medicine for the sick man's woes, Forms with its shadowy boughs a cool retreat To shield us from the noontide's sultry heat. Ah, Humphrey! now upon old England's shore The weary laborer's morning work is o'er. The woodman there rests from his measured stroke, Flings down his axe, and sits beneath the oak; Savor'd with hunger there he eats his food, There drinks the cooling streamlet of the wood. To us no cooling streamlet winds its way, No joys domestic erown for us the day; The felon's name, the outcast's garb we wear, Toil all the day, and all the night despair.

HUMPHREY.

Aye, William! laboring up the furrow'd ground, I used to love the village clock's old sound, Rejoice to hear my morning toil was done, And trudge it homeward when the clock went one. 'Twas ere I turn'd a soldier and a sinner! Pshaw! curse this whining — let us fall to dinner.

WILLIAM.

I too have loved this hour, nor yet forgot The household comforts of my little eot; For at this hour my wife with watchful care Was wont her humble dainties to prepare; The keenest sauce by hunger was supplied, And my poor children prattled at my side. Methinks I see the old oak table spread, [bread · The clean white trencher, and the good brown The cheese, my daily fare, which Mary made, For Mary knew full well the housewife's trade; The jug of cider, — cider I could make; — And then the knives, — I won 'em at the wake. Another has them now! I toiling here Look backward like a child, and drop a tear.

BOTANY BAY ECLOGUES.

HUMPHREY.

I love a dismal story : tell me thine : Meantime, good Will, I'll listen as I dine : I too, my friend, can tell a piteous story When I turn'd hero how I purchased glory.

WILLIAM.

But, Humphrey, sure thou never canst have known

"he comforts of a little home thine own; A home so snug, so cheerful too, as mine; 'Twas always clean, and we could make it fine. For there King Charles's Golden Rules were seen, And there — God bless 'em both! the King and Queen. The pewter plates, our garnish'd chimney's grace, So bright, that in them you might see your face; And over all, to frighten thieves, was hung, Well clean'd, although but seldom used, my gun.

Ah! that damn'd gun! I took it down one morn, — A desperate deal of harm they did my corn! Our testy Squire, too, loved to save the breed, So covey upon covey ate my seed. I mark'd the mischievous rogues, and took my aim; I fired, they fell, and — up the keeper came. That cursed morning brought on my undoing; I went to prison, and my farm to ruin. Poor Mary! for her grave the parish paid; No tomb-stone tells where her remains are laid! My children — my poor boys —

HUMPHREY.

Come ! - grief is dry -You to your dinner; - to my story I. For you, my friend, who happier days have known, And each calm comfort of a home your own, This is bad living: I have spent my life In hardest toil and unavailing strife, And here, (from forest ambush safe at least,) To me this scanty pittance seems a feast. I was a plongh-boy once, as free from woes And blithesome as the lark with whom I rose. Each evening at return a meal I found; And though my bed was hard, my sleep was sound. One Whitsuntide, to go to fair I drest, Like a great bumpkin, in my Sunday's best; A primrose posy in my hat I stuck, And to the revel went to try my luck. From show to show, from booth to booth I stray, See, stare, and wonder all the live-long day. A sergeant to the fair recruiting came, Skill'd in man-catching, to beat up for game ; Our booth he enter'd, and sat down by me; -Methinks even now the very scene I see ! The canvass roof, the hogshead's running store, The old blind fiddler seated next the door, The frothy tankard passing to and fro, And the rude rabble round the puppet-show. The sergeant eyed me well; the punch-bowl comes, And as we laugh'd and drank, up struck the drums. And now he gives a bumper to his wench; God save the King! and then, God damn the French !

How many wounded and how many s.ain, Flags flying, cannons roaring, drums a-beating, The English marching on, the French retreating -"Push on - push on, my lads! they fly before ye; March on to riches, happiness, and glory ! At first I wonder'd, by degrees grew bolder, Then cried, "'Tis a fine thing to be a soldier !'' "Aye, Humphrey!" says the sergeant, -- "that's your name? 'Tis a fine thing to fight the French for fame ! March to the field, - knock out a Mounseer's brains, And pick the scoundrel's pocket for your pains. Come, Humphrey, come! thou art a lad of spirit; Rise to a halbert, as I did, — by merit ! Wouldst thon believe it? even I was once As thou art now, a plough-boy and a dunce ; But courage raised me to my rank. How now, boy ! Shall Hero Humphrey still be Numps the ploughboy? A proper-shaped young fellow ! tall and straight ! Why, thou wert made for glory ! - five feet eight ! The road to riches is the field of fight! -Didst ever see a guinea look so bright? Why, regimentals, Numps, would give thee grace; A hat and feather would become that face; The girls would crowd around thee to be kiss'd ! ---Dost love a girl?" - "Odd Zounds!" I cried, " 1'll list ! " So pass'd the night; anon the morning came, And off I set a volunteer for fame. "Back shoulders, turn out your toes, hold up your head, Stand easy !" - so I did - till almost dead.

Then tells the story of his last campaign,

O how I long'd to tend the plough again, Trudge up the field, and whistle o'er the plain, When tired and sore, amid the pitcous throng, Hungry, and cold, and wet, I limp'd along, And growing fainter as I pass'd, and colder, Cursed that ill hour when I became a soldier! In town I found the hours more gayly pass, And time fled swiftly with my girl and glass;

The girls were wondrous kind and wondrous fair;

They soon transferr'd me to the Doctor's care; The Doctor undertook to cure the evil,

And he almost transferr'd me to the Devil.

'Twere tedious to relate the dismal story

Of fighting, fasting, wretchedness, and glory.

At last discharged, to England's shores I came,

Paid for my wounds with want instead of fame;

Found my fair friends, and plunder'd as they bade me;

They kiss'd me, coax'd me, robb'd me, and betray'd me.

Tried and condemn'd, His Majesty transports me; And here in peace, I thank him, he supports me. So ends my dismal and heroic story;

And Humphrey gets more good from guilt than glory.

Oxford, 1794.

JOHN, SAMUEL, AND RICHARD.

TIME, Evening.

JOHN.

"Tis a calm, pleasant evening; the light fades away, And the sun going down has done watch for the day.

To my mind we live wondrous well when transported;

It is but to work, and we must be supported.

Fill the can, Dick! Success here to Botany Bay!

RICHARD.

Success, if you will, - but God send me away !

JOHN.

You lubberly landsmen don't know when you're well!

Hadst thou known half the hardships of which I can tell!

The sailor has no place of safety in store;

From the tempest at sea, to the press-gang on shore !

When Roguery rules all the rest of the earth,

God be thank'd, in this corner I've got a good berth.

SAMUEL.

Talk of hardships! what these are the sailor don't know;

'Tis the soldier, my friend, that's acquainted with woe;

Long journeys, short halting, hard work, and small pay,

To be popt at like pigeons for sixpence a day! — Thank God I'm safe quarter'd at Botany Bay.

JOHN.

Ah! you know but little: I'll wager a pot I have suffer'd more evils than fell to your lot. Come, we'll have it all fairly and properly tried, Tell story for story, and Dick shall decide.

SAMUEL.

Done.

JOHN.

Done. 'Tis a wager, and I shall be winner; Thou wilt go without grog, Sam, to-morrow at dinner.

SAMUEL.

1 was trapp'd by the Sergeant's palavering pretences,

He listed me when I was out of my senses;

So I took leave to-day of all care and all sorrow,

And was drill'd to repentance and reason tomorrow.

JOHN.

I would be a sailor, and plough the wide occan, But was soon sick and sad with the billows' commotion;

So the boatswain he sent me aloft on the mast,

And cursed me, and hade me cry there, --- and hold fast!

SAMUEL.

After marching all day, faint and hungry and sore, [moor,

I have lain down at night on the swamps of the Unshelter'd and forced by fatigue to remain, All chill'd by the wind and benumb'd by the rain.

JOHN.

I have rode out the storm when the billows beat high,

And the red gleaming lightnings flash'd through the dark sky;

When the tempest of night the black sea overcast, Wet and weary I labor'd, yet sung to the blast.

SAMUEL.

I have march'd, trumpets sounding, drums beating, flags flying,

Where the music of war drown'd the shrieks of the dying;

When the shots whizz'd around me, all dangers defied;

Push'd on when my comrades fell dead at my side; Drove the foe from the mouth of the cannon away, Fought, conquer'd, and bled, all for sixpence a-day.

JOHN.

And I too, friend Samuel, have heard the shots rattle !

But we seamen rejoice in the play of the battle;

Though the chain and the grape-shot roll splintering around,

With the blood of our messmates though slippery the ground,

The fiercer the fight, still the fiercer we grow ; We heed not our loss, so we conquer the foe ; And the hard battle won, if the prize be not sunk,

The Captain gets rich, and the Sailors get drunk.

SAMUEL

God help the poor soldier when backward he goes, In disgraceful retreat, through a country of foes ! No respite from danger by day or by night, He is still forced to fly, still o'ertaken to fight;

Every step that he takes he must battle his way,

He must force his hard meal from the peasant away :

No rest, and no hope, from all succor afar, —

God forgive the poor soldier for going to the war!

JOHN.

But what are these dangers to those I have past, When the dark billows roar'd to the roar of the blast;

When we work'd at the pumps, worn with labor and weak,

And with dread still beheld the increase of the .eak? Sometimes as we rose on the wave could our sight, From the rocks of the shore, catch the light-house's light;

In vain to the beach to assist us they press .

We fire faster and faster our guns of distress;

Still with rage unabating the wind and waves roar; ---

How the giddy wreck reels, as the billows burst o'er '

BOTANY BAY ECLOGUES.

Leap, leap ; for she yawns, for she sinks in the wave ! Call on God to preserve — for God only can save !

SAMUEL

There's an end of all troubles, however, at last ! And when I in the wagon of wounded was cast, When my wounds with the chilly night-wind smarted sore,

And I thought of the friends I should never see more,

No hand to relieve, scarce a morsel of bread,

Sick at heart I have envied the peace of the dead. Left to rot in a jail, till by treaty set free,

Old England's white cliffs with what joy did I see ! I had gain'd enough glory, some wounds, but no good,

And was turn'd on the public to shift how I could. When I think what I've suffer'd, and where I am now,

I curse him who snared me away from the plough.

JOHN.

When I was discharged, I went home to my wife, There in comfort to spend all the rest of my life. My wife was industrious; we earn'd what we spent, And though little we had, were with little content; And whenever I listen'd and heard the wind roar, I bless'd God for my little snug cabin on shore. At midnight they seized me, they dragg'd me away, They wounded me sore when 1 would not obey, And because for my country I'd ventured my life, I was dragg'd like a thief from my home and my wife.

Then the fair wind of fortune chopt round in my face, And want at length drove me to guilt and disgrace. Butall's for the best; — on the world's wide sea cast, 1 am haven'd in peace in this corner at last.

SAMUEL.

Come, Dick ! we have done — and for judgment we call.

RICHARD.

And in faith I can give you no judgment at all, But that as you're now settled, and safe from foul weather,

You drink up your grog, and he merry together.

Oxford, 1794.

IV.

FREDERIC.

TIME, Night. SCENE, The Woods.

WHERE shall I turn me? whither shall I bend My weary way? thus worn with toil and faint, How through the thorny mazes of this wood Attain my distart dwelling? That deep cry That echoes through the forest, seems to sound My parting knell: it is the midnight how! Of hungry monsters prowling for their prey! Again! O save me — save me, gracious Heaven! I am not fit to die! Thon coward wretch, Why palpitates thy heart? why shake thy limbs Beneath their palsied burden? Is there aught So lovely in existence? wouldst thou drain Even to its dregs the bitter draught of life? Stamp'd with the brand of Vice and Infamy, Why should the felon Frederic shrink from Death?

Death ! Where the magic in that cmpty name That chills my inmost heart ? Why at the thought Starts the cold dew of fear on every limb ? There are no terrors to surround the Grave, When the calm Mind collected in itself Surveys that narrow house : the ghastly train That haunt the midnight of delirious Guilt Then vanish : in that home of endless rest All sorrows cease ! — Would I might slumber there !

Why then this panting of the fearful heart? This miser love of life, that dreads to lose Its cherish'd torment? Shall a man diseased Yield up his members to the surgeon's knife, Doubtful of succor, but to rid his frame Of fleshly anguish; and the coward wretch, Whose ulcerated soul can know no help, Shrink from the best Physician's certain aid? Oh, it were better far to lie me down Here on this cold, damp earth, till some wild beast Seize on his willing victim.

If to die

Were all, 'twere sweet indeed to rest my head On the cold clod, and sleep the sleep of Death But if the Archangel's trump at the last hour Startle the ear of Death, and wake the soul To frenzy? - Dreams of infancy; fit tales For garrulous beldames to affrighten babes ! What if I warr'd upon the world? the world Had wrong'd me first: I had endured the ills Of hard injustice ; all this goodly earth Was but to me one wide waste wilderness; I had no share in Nature's patrimony ; Blasted were all my morning hopes of youth, Dark Disappointment followed on my ways, Care was my bosom inmate, Penury Gnaw'd at my heart. Eternal One, thou know'st How that poor heart, even in the bitter hour Of lewdest revelry has inly yearn'd For peace.

My Father! I will call on thee, Pour to thy mercy-seat my earnest prayer, And wait thy righteous will, resign'd of soul. O thought of comfort ! how the afflicted heart, Tired with the tempest of its passions, rests On you with holy hope ! The hollow how! Of yonder harmless tenant of the woods Comes with no terror to the sober'd sense. If I have sinned against mankind, on them Be that past sin; they made me what I was. In these extremest climes Want can no more Urge me to deeds of darkness, and at length Here I may rest. What though my hut be poor -The rains descend not through its humble roof: --Would I were there again! The night is cold; And what if in my wanderings I should rouse The savage from his thicket!

Hark ! the gun ! And lo, the fire of safety ! I shall reach My little hut again ! again by toil Force from the stubborn earth my sustenance, And quick-ear'd Guilt will never start alarm'd Amid the well-earn'd meal. This felon's garb — Will it not shield me from the winds of Heaven ? And what could purple more ? O strengthen me Eternal One, in this serener state !

Cleanse thou mine heart, so Penitence and Faith Shall heal my soul, and my last days be peace.

Oxford, 1794.

SONNETS.

I.

Go, Valentine, and tell that lovely Maid Whom fancy still will portray to my sight, How here I linger in this sullen shade, This dreary gloom of dull, monastic night; Say, that from every joy of life remote At evening's closing hour I quit the throng, Listening in solitude the ring-dove's note, Who pours like me her solitary song; Say, that her absence calls the sorrowing sigh; Say, that of all her charms I love to speak, In fancy feel the magic of her eye, In fancy view the smile illume her check, Court the lone hour when silence stills the grove, And heave the sigh of memory and of love.

THINK, Valentine, as speeding on thy way Homeward thou hastest light of heart along, If heavily creep on one little day The medley erew of travellers among, Think on thine absent friend; reflect that here On life's sad journey comfortless he roves, Remote from every scene his heart holds dear, From him he values, and from her he loves. And when, disgusted with the vain and dull, Whom chance companions of thy way may doom, Thy mind, of each domestic comfort full, Turns to itself and meditates on home, Ah, think what cares must ache within his breast, Who loathes the road, yet sees no home of rest.

III.

Nor to thee, Bedford, mournful is the tale Of days departed. Time in his career Arraigns not thee that the neglected year Hath past unheeded onward. To the vale Of years thou journeyest; may the future road Be pleasant as the past; and on my friend Friendship and Love, best hlessings, still attend, Till full of days he reach the ealm abode Where Nature slumbers. Lovely is the age Of virtue : with such reverence we behold The silver hairs, as some gray oak grown old That whilome mock'd the rushing tempest's rage, Now like a monument of strength decay'd, [shade. With rarely-sprinkled leaves casting a trembling 1794.

IV. CORSTON.

As thus I stand beside the murmuring stream, And watch its current, memory here portrays Seenes faintly form'd of half-forgotten days, Like far-off woodlands by the moon's bright beam Dimly descried, but lovely. I have worn Amid these haunts the heavy hours away, When childhood idled through the Sabbath-day; Risen to my tasks at winter's earliest morn; And when the summer twilight darken'd here, Thinking of home, and all of heart forlorn, Have sigh'd and shed in secret many a tear. Dream-like and indistinct those days appear, As the faint sounds of this low brooklet, borne Upon the breeze, reach fitfully the ear. 1794.

V. THE EVENING RAINBOW. MILD arch of promise, on the evening sky Thou shinest fair with many a lovely ray Each in the other melting. Much mine eye Delights to linger on thee; for the day, Changeful and many-weather'd, seemed to smile, Flashing brief splendor through the clouds awhile, Which deepen'd dark anon and fell in rain; But pleasant is it now to pause, and view Thy various tints of frail and watery hue, And think the storm shall not return again. Such is the smile that Piety bestows On the good man's pale cheek, when he, in peace Departing gently from a world of woes, Anticipates the world where sorrows cease. 1794.

VI.

Wirm many a weary step, at length 1 gain Thy summit, Lansdown; and the cool breeze plays Gratefully round my brow, as hence I gaze Back on the fair expanse of yonder plain. 'T was a long way and tedious; to the eye Though fair the extended vale, and fair to view The autumnal leaves of many a faded hue, That eddy in the wild gust moaning by, Even so it fared with life: in discontent Restless through Fortune's mingled scenes I went. Yet wept to think they would return no more. But cease, fond heart, in such sad thoughts to roam, For surely thou ere long shalt reach thy home; And pleasant is the way that lies before. 1794.

VII.

FAIR is the rising morn when o'er the sky The orient sun expands his roseate ray, And lovely to the musing poet's eye Fades the soft radiance of departing day; But fairer is the smile of one we love, Than all the scenes in Nature's ample sway, And sweeter than the musie of the grove, The voice that bids us welcome. Such delight, Entrn! is mine, escaping to thy sight From the cold converse of the indifferent throng: Too swiftly then toward the silent night, Ye hours of happiness, ye speed along, Whilst I, from all the world's dull cares apart, Pour out the feelings of my burden'd heart. 1794.

VIII.

How darkly o er yon far-off mountain frowns The gather'd tempest. from that lurid cloud The deep-voiced thunders roll, awful and loud, Though distant; while upon the misty downs Fast falls in shadowy streaks the pelting rain. I never saw so terrible a storm ! Perhaps some way-worn traveller in vain Wraps his thin raiment round his shivering form, Cold even as hope within him. I the while Pause here in sadness, though the sun-beams smile Cheerily round me. Ah! that thus my lot Might be with Peace and Solitude assign'd, Where I might from some little quiet cot Sigh for the erimes and miseries of mankind. 1794.

O THOU sweet Lark, who, in the heaven so high Twinkling thy wings, dost sing so joyfully, I watch thee soaring with a deep delight; And when at last I turn mine aching eye That lags below thee in the Infinite, Still in my heart receive thy melody. O thou sweet Lark, that I had wings like thee ! Not for the joy it were in yon blue light Upward to mount, and from my heavenly height Gaze on the creeping multitude below ; But that I soon would wing my eager flight To that loved home where Fancy even now Hath fled, and Hope looks onward through a tear, Counting the weary hours that hold her here. 1796.

Х.

Thou lingerest, Spring! still wintry is the scene; The fields their dead and sapless russet wear; Scaree doth the glossy celandine appear Starring the sunny bank, or early green The elder yet its circing tufts put forth. The sparrow tenants still the caves-built nest Where we should see our martin's snowy breast Oft darting out. The blasts from the bleak north, And from the keener east, still frequent blow. Sweet Spring, thou lingerest; and itshould be so,— Late let the fields and gardens blossom out! Like man when most with smiles thy face is drest,

'Tis to deceive, and he who knows ye best, When most ye promise, ever most must doubt. Westbury, 1799.

XI.

BEWARE a speedy friend, the Arabian said, And wisely was it he advised distrust: The flower that blossoms earliest fades the first. Look at yon Oak that lifts its stately head, And dallies with the autumnal storm, whose rage Tempests the great sea-waves; slowly it rose, Slowly its strength increased through many an age, And timidly did its light leaves disclose, As doubtful of the spring, their palest green. They to the summer cautiously expand, And by the warmer sun and season bland Matured, their foliage in the grove is seen, When the bare forest by the wintry blast Is swept, still lingering on the boughs the last. 1798.

XII. TO A GOOSE

IF thou didst feed on western plains of yore; Or waddle wide with flat and flabby feet Over some Cambrian mountain's plashy moor; Or find in farmer's yard a safe retreat From gypsy thieves, and foxes sly and fleet; If thy gray quills, by lawyer guided, trace Deeds big with ruin to some wretched race, Or love-sick poet's sonnet, sad and sweet, Wailing the rigor of his lady fair; Or if, the drudge of housenaid's daily toil, Cobwebs and dust thy pinions white besoil, Departed Goose! I neither know nor care. But this 1 know, that we pronounced thee fine, Season'd with sage and onions, and port wine. London, 1798.

XIII.

I MARVEL not, O Sun! that unto thee In adoration man should bow the knee, And pour his prayers of mingled awe and love, For like a God thou art, and on thy way Of glory sheddest, with benignant ray, Beauty, and life, and joyance from above. No longer let these mists thy radiance shrond, These cold, raw mists, that chill the comfortless day, But shed thy splendor through the opening cloud, And cheer the earth once more. The languid flowers Lie scentless, beaten down with heavy rain; Earth asks thy presence, saturate with showers; O Lord of Light! put forth thy beams again. For damp and cheerless are the gloomy hours.

XIV.

FAIR be thy fortunes in the distant land, Companion of my earlier years and friend ! Go to the Eastern world, and may the hand Of Heaven its blessing on thy labor send.

SONNETS.

And may I, if we ever more should meet, See thee with affluence to thy native shore Return'd; —1 need not pray that 1 may greet The same untainted goodness as before. Long years must intervene before that day; And what the changes Heaven to each may send, It boots not now to bode: O early friend ! Assured, no distance e'er can wear away Esteem long rooted, and no change remove The dear remembrance of the friend we love 1796.

XV.

A WRINKLED, crabbed man they picture thee, Old Winter, with a rugged beard as gray As the long moss upon the apple-tree; Blue-lipt, an icc-drop at thy sharp, blue nose, Close muffled up, and on thy dreary way, Plodding alone through sleet and drifting snows. They should have drawn thee by the high-heapt hearth,

Old Winter! seated in thy great arm'd chair, Watching the children at their Christmas mirth; Or circled by them as thy lips declare Some merry jest, or tale of murder dire, Or troubled spirit that disturbs the night, Pausing at times to rouse the mouldering fire, Or taste the old October brown and bright.

Westbury, 1799.

XVI.

PORLOCK, thy verdant vale so fair to sight, Thy lofty hills which fern and furze embrown, The waters that roll nusically down Thy woody glens, the traveller with delight Recalls to memory, and the channel gray Circling its surges in thy level bay. Porlock, 1 also shall forget thee not, Here by the unwelcome summer rain confined; But often shall hereafter call to mind How here, a patient prisoner, 'twas my lot To wear the lonely, lingering close of day, Making my Sonnet by the alchouse fire, Whilst Idleness and Solitude inspire Dull rhymes to pass the duller hours away.

STATELV yon vessel sails adown the tide, To some far distant land adventurous bound; The sailors' busy cries from side to side, Pealing among the echoing rocks, resound: A patient, thoughtless, much-enduring band, Joyful they enter on their ocean way, With shouts exulting leave their native land, And know no care beyond the present day. But is there no poor mourner left behind, Who sorrows for a child or husband there? Who at the howling of the midnight wind Will wake and tremble in her boding prayer? So may her voice be heard, and Heaven be kind⁴ Go, gallant Ship, and be thy fortune fair! Westbury, 1799.

XVIII.

O Gop! have mercy in this dreadful hour On the poor mariner! in comfort here Safe shelter'd as I am, I almost fear The blast that rages with resistless power. What were it now to toss upon the waves, The madden'd waves, and know no succor near, The howling of the storm alone to hear, And the wild sea that to the tempest raves; To gaze amid the horrors of the night, And only see the billow's gleaming light; Then in the dread of death to think of her Who, as she listens sleepless to the gale, Puts up a silent prayer and waxes pale? — O God! have mercy on the mariner!

Westbury, 1799.

XIX.

SHE comes majestic with her swelling sails, The gallant Ship; along her watery way Homeward she drives before the favoring gales; Now flirting at their length the streamers play, And now they ripple with the ruffling breeze. Hark to the sailors' shouts! the rocks rebound, Thundering in echoes to the joyful sound. Long have they voyaged o'er the distant seas; And what a heart-delight they feel at last, So many toils, so many dangers past, To view the port desired, he only knows Who on the stormy deep for many a day Hath tost, aweary of his watery way, And watch'd, all anxious, every wind that blows.

Westbury, 1799.

XX.

FAREWELL my home, my home no longer now, Witness of many a calm and happy day; And thou, fair eminence, upon whose brow Dwells the last sunshine of the evening ray, Farewell! These eyes no longer shall pursue The western sun beyond the farthest height, When slowly he forsakes the fields of light. No more the freshness of the falling dew, Cool and delightful, here shall bathe my head, As from this western window dear, I lean, Listening, the while I watch the placid scene, The martins twittering underneath the shed. Farewell, dear home! where many a day has past In joys whose loved remembrance long shall last Westbury, 1799.

MONODRAMAS.

SAPPHO.

SCENE. The Promontory of Leucadia.

This is the spot: — 'tis here, tradition says, That hopeless Love from this high, towering rock Leaps headlong to oblivion or to death. Oh, 'tis a giddy height! my dizzy head Swims at the precipice! — 'tis death to fall!

Lie still, thou coward heart ! this is no time To shake with thy strong throbs the frame convulsed.

To die, — to be at rest, — oh, pleasant thought ! Perchance to leap and live; the soul all still, And the wild tempest of the passions husht In one deep calm; the heart, no more diseased By the quick ague fits of hope and fear, Quietly cold !

Presiding Powers, look down! In vain to you I pour'd my earnest prayers, In vain I sung your praises : chiefly thou, Venus! ungrateful Goddess, whom my lyre Hymn'd with such full devotion. Leshian groves, Witness how often, at the languid hour Of summer twilight, to the melting song Ye gave your choral echoes! Grecian maids, Who hear with downcast look and flushing cheek, That lay of love, bear witness! and ye youths, Who hang enraptured on the impassion'd strain, Gazing with eloquent eye, even till the heart Sinks in the deep delirium ! And ye, too, Ages unborn ! bear witness ye, how hard Her fate who hymn'd the votive hymn in vain! Ungrateful Goddess! I have hung my lute In yonder holy pile; my hand no more Shall wake the melodies that fail'd to move Obdurate Phaon !- yet when rumor tells How, from Leucadia, Sappho cast herself, A self-devoted victim, - he may melt Too late in pity, obstinate to love.

Oh! haunt his midnight dreams, black Nemesis! Whom,* self-conceiving in the inmost depths Of Chaos, blackest Night long laboring bore, When the stern Destinies, her elder brood, [birth And shapeless Death, from that more monstrous Leapt shuddering : Haunt his slumbers, Nemesis! Scorch with the fires of Phlegethon his heart, Till, helpless, hopeless, heaven-abandon'd wretch, He too shall seek beneath the unfathom'd deep To hide him from thy fury.

How the sea Far distant glitters as the sun-beams smile, And gayly wanton o'er its heaving breast! Phæbus shines forth, nor wears one cloud to mourn His votary's sorrows. God of Day, shine on !----By man despised, forsaken by the Gods, I supplicate no more.

* Ου τινι κοιμηθεισα θεα τεκε ΝΥΞ ερεβεννη. -- Hestoo. 16 How many a day, O pleasant Lesbos! in thy secret streams Delighted have I plunged, from the hot sun Screen'd by the o'erarching grove's delightful shade,

And pillow'd on the waters! Now the waves Shall chill me to repose.

Tremendous height ' Scarce to the brink will these rehellious limbs Support me. Hark ! how the rude deep below Roars round the rugged base, as if it call'd Its long-reluctant victim ! I will come ! — One leap, and all is over ! The deep rest Of death, or tranquil apathy's dead calm, Welcome alike to me. Away, vain fears ! Phaon is cold, and why should Sappho live ? Phaon is cold, or with some fairer one — Thought worse than death !

She throws herself from the precipice.

XIMALPOCA.

The story of this Mexican King is related by Torquemada in his Monarquia Indiana, 1. ii. c. 28, and by the Abate Clavigero, Storia Antica del Messico, t. i. 1. iii. p. 199. The sacrifice was not completed ; a force sent by his enemy arrived in time to prevent the eatastrophe; he was curried off ceptive, and destroyed himself in prison.

SCENE. The Temple of Mexitli.

SUBJECTS! friends! children! I may call you children,

For I have ever borne a father's love Towards you; it is thirteen years since first You saw me in the robes of royalty, — Since here the multitudes of Mexico Hail'dme their King. I thank you, friends, that now, In equal numbers and with equal love, You come to grace my death.

For thirteen years What I have been, ye know; that with all care, That with all justness and all gentleness. Seeking your weal, I govern'd. Is there one Whom I have injured? one whose just redress I have denied, or baffled by delay? Let him come forth, that so no evil tongue Speak shame of me hereafter. O my people, Not by my sins have I drawn down upon me The wrath of Heaven.

The wrath is heavy on me! Heavy! a burden more than I can bear! I have endured contempt, insult, and wrongs From that Acolhuan tyrant. Should I seek Revenge? Alas, my people, we are few, — Feeble our growing state; it hath not yet Rooted itself to bear the hurricane; It is the lion-cub tkat tempts not yet The tiger's full-aged fury. Mexicans, He sent to bid me wear a woman's robe, — When was the day that ever I took'd back

MONODRAMAS.

In battle? Mexicans, the wife I loved, To faith and friendship trusted, in despite Of me, of Heaven, he seized, and spurn'd her back Polluted ! -- Coward villain ! and he lurks Behind his armies and his multitudes, And mocks my idle wrath ! - It is not fit -It is not possible that I should live !-Live! and deserve to be the finger-mark Of slave-contempt ! - His blood 1 cannot reach, But in my own all stains may be effaced; It shall blot out the marks of infamy, And when the warriors of the days to come Tell of Ximalpoca, it shall be said He died the brave man's death ! Not of the God Unworthy, do 1 seek his altar thus, A voluntary victim. And perchance The sacrifice of life may profit ye, My people, though all living efforts fail'd By fortune, not by fault. Cease your lament! And if your ill-doom'd King deserved your love, Say of him to your children, he was one Who bravely bore misfortune; who, when life Became dishonor, shook his body off, And join'd the spirits of the heroes dead. Yes! not in Miclanteuctli's dark abode With cowards shall your King receive his doom : Not in the icy caverns of the North Suffer through endless ages. He shall join The Spirits of the brave, with them at morn Shall issue from the eastern gate of Heaven, And follow through his fields of light the Sun; With them shall raise the song and weave the dance; Sport in the stream of splendor; company Down to the western palace of his rest The Prince of Glory; and with equal eye Endure his centred radiance. Not of you Forgetful, O my people, even then; But often in the amber cloud of noon Diffused, will I o'erspread your summer fields, And on the freshen'd maize and brightening meads Shower plenty. Spirits of my valiant Sires, I come! Mexitli, never at thy shrine Flow'd braver blood ; never a nobler heart Steam'd up to thee its life! Priests of the God, Perform your office ! Westbury, 1798. THE WIFE OF FERGUS. Fergusius 3, periit veneno ab uxore dato. Alii scribunt cum uxor sæpe exprohrasset ei matrimonii contemptum et pellicum greges, neque quicquam profecisset, tandem noctu dormientem ab ea strangulatum. Quæstione de morte ejus habită, cum amicorum plurimi insimularentur, nec quisquam ne in gravissimis quidem tormentis quisquam fateretur, mulier, alioqui ferox, tot innoxiorum capitum miserta, in medium processit, ac e superiore loco cædem a se factum

confessa, ne ad ludibrium superesset, pectus cultro transfo-dit : quod ejus factum varie pro cujusque ingenio estacceptum, ac perinde sermonibus celebratum. BUCHANAN.

SCENE. The Palace Court. The Queen speaking from the Battlements.

CEASE — cease your torments ! spare the sufferers ! Scotchmen, not theirs the deed; — the crime was mine.

Mine is the glory.

Idle threats: I stand Secure. All access to these battlements Is barr'd beyond your sudden strength to force; And lo! the dagger by which Fergus died!

Shame on ye, Scotchmen, that a woman's hand Was left to do this deed ! Shame on ye, Thanes, Who with slave-patience have so long endured The wrongs and insolence of tyranny ! Cowardly race !- that not a husband's sword Smote that adulterons King! that not a wife Revenged her own pollution ; in his blood Wash'd herself pure, and for the sin compell'd Atoned by righteous murder! -- O my God ! Of what beast-matter hast thou moulded them To bear with wrongs like these? There was a time When if the Bard had feign'd you such a tale, Your eyes had throbb'd with anger, and your hand, In honest instinct would have grasp'd the sword. O miserable men, who have disgraced Your fathers, whom your sons must blush to name '

Ay, - ye can threaten me! ye can be brave In anger to a woman! one whose virtue Upbraids your coward vice; whose name will live Honor'd and praised in song, when not a hand Shall root from your forgotten monuments The cankering moss. Fools! fools! to think that death Is not a thing familiar to my mind; As if I knew not what must consummate My glory! as if aught that earth can give Could tempt me to endure the load of life !--Scotchmen! ye saw when Fergus to the altar Led me, his maiden Queen. Ye blest me then, I heard you bless me, - and I thought that Heaven Had heard you also, and that I was blest; For I loved Fergus. Bear me witness, God ! With what a heart and soul sincerity My lips pronounced the unrecallable vow That made me his, him mine ; bear witness, Thou ! Before whose throne I this day must appear Stain'd with his blood and mine! My heart was his. -His in the strength of all its first affections. In all obedience, in all love, I kept Holy my marriage-vow. Behold me, Thaues! Time hath not changed the face on which his eye So often dwelt, when with assiduous care He sought my love, with seeming truth, for one, Sincere herself, impossible to doubt. Time hath not changed that face ! - 1 speak not now With pride of beauties that will feed the worm

MONODRAMAS.

To-morrow; but with honest pride I say, That if the truest and the purest love Deserved requital, such was ever mine. How often recking from the adulterous bed Have I received him ! and with no complaint. Neglect and insult, cruelty and scorn, Long, long did 1 endure, and long curb down The indignant nature.

Tell your countrymen, Scotcamen, what I have spoken! Say to them Ye saw the Queen of Scotland lift the dagger Red from her husband's heart; that in her own She plunged it. Stabs herself.

Tell them also, that she felt No guilty fear in death.

Westbury, 1793.

LUCRETIA.

SCENE. The House of Collatine.

WELCOME, my father! good Valerius, Welcome! and thou too, Brutus! ye were both My wedding guests, and fily ye are come. My husband — Collatine — alas! no more Lucretia's husband, for thou shalt not clasp Pollution to thy bosom, — hear me on ! For ' yeast 'el! 'hee all.

I sat at eve Spinning amid my maidens as I wont, When from the camp at Ardea Sextus came. Curb down thy swelling feelings, Collatine ! I little liked the man ! yet, for he came From Ardea, for he brought me news of thee, I gladly gave him welcone ; gladly listen'd,— Thou canst not tell how gladly—to his tales Of battles, and the long and perilons siege ; And when I laid me down at night to sleep, 'Twas with a lighten'd heart,—I knew thee safe ; My visions were of thee.

Nay, hear me ont! And be thon wise in vengeance, so thy wife Not vainly shall have suffer'd. I have wrought My soul up to the business of this hour, That it may stir your noble spirits, and prompt Such glorious deeds that ages yet unborn Shall bless my fate. At midnight I awoke; The Tarquin was beside me ! O my husband, Where wert thou then ! gone was my rebel strength —

All power of utterance gone ! astonish'd, stunn'd, I saw the coward ruffian, heard him urge His wicked suit, and bid me tamely yield, — Yield to dishonor. When he proffer'd death, — Oh, I had leap'd to meet themerciful sword ! But that with most accursed vows he vow'd, That he would lay a dead slave by my side, Murdering my spotless honor. — Collatine, From what an anguish have I reseued thee ! And thon, my father, wretched as thon art, Thou miserable, childless, poor old man, — Think, father, what that agony had been ! Now thou mayst sorrow for me, thou mayst bless The memory of thy poor, polluted child. Look if it have not kindled Brutus' eye: Mysterious man! at last I know thee now; I see thy dawning glorics! — to the grave Not unrevenged Lucretia shall descend; Not always shall her wretched conntry wear The Tarquin's yoke! Ye will deliver Rome, And I have comfort in this dreadful hour.

Thinkest thou, my husband, that I dreaded death?

O Collatine ! the weapon that had gored My bosom had been ease, been happiness,— Elysium, to the hell of his hot grasp. Judge if Lucretia could have fear'd to die !

LA CABA

This monodrama was written several years before the author had any intention of treating at greater length the portion of Spanish history to which it relates. It is founded upon the following passage in the Historia Verdadera del Rey Don Rodrigo, which Miguel de Luna translated from the Arabic. Aviendose despedido en la Ciudad de Cordoba el Conde Don Julian de aquellos Generales, recogió toda su gente, deudos y criados; y porque sus tierras estavan tan perdidas y maltratadas, se feu à un lugar pequeño, que està fubricudo cu la ribera del mar Mediterraneo, en la provincia que llaman Vandalucia, à la qual nombraron los Christianos en su lengua Villaviciosa. Y avicado llegado à ella, dió orden de embiar por su muger, y hijo, que estavan detenidas en aquellas partes de Africa, en una Ciudad que està en la ribera del mar, la qual se llama Tanjer, para desde alli aguardar el sucesso de la conquista de España en que avia de parar : las gaales llegadas en aquella Villa, el Conde D. Julian las recibió con mucho contento, porque tenia bien sentida su larga ausencia. Y aviendo descansado, desde alli el Conde dava orden con mucha diligencia para poblar y restaurar sus tierras, para ir à vivir à ellas. Su hija estava muy triste y ufiigida; y por mucho qac su padre y madre la regalavan, nunca la podian contentar, ni alegrar. Imaginava la grande perdida de España, y la grande destruicion de los Christianos, con tantas muertes, y cautiversos, robadas sus haziendas, y que ella huviesse sido causa principal, cabeza, y ocasion de oquella perdicion ; y subre todo ello le crecian mas sus pesadumbres en verse deshonrada, y sin esperanza de tener estado, segun clla descara. Con esta imaginucion, cagañada del demonio, determinó entresi de morir desesperada ; y un dia se subió à una tocre, cerrando la puerta della por dedentro, porque no fuesse estorvada de aquel hecho que queria hazer ; y divo à una ama suya, que le llamasse à su padre y madre, que les queria dezir un poco. Y siendo renidos, desde lo alto de aquella torre les hizo un razonamiento muy lastimoso, diziendoles al fin dél, que muger tan desdichada comu ella era, y tan desventurada, no merecia vivir en ej munda con tanta deshonra, mayormente aviendo sido causa de tanto mal y destruicion. Y luego les dizo, Pudres, en memoria de mi desilicha, de aqui adelante no se llame esta Ciudad, Villa. viciosa, sino Malaca: Oy se acaba en ella la mas mala muger que huro en el mundo. Y acabadas estas palabras, sin mas oir à sus padres, ni à nadie de los que estavan presentes, por muchos vargos que la hizieron, y amonestaciones que no se echasse ubaro, se derò caer en el suelo ; y llevada medio muerta, vivió como tres dias, y luego murió. — Fue causa este desastre y desesperacion de mucho escandulo, y notable memoria, entre los Moros y Christianos : y desde alle adelaute se llamo aquella Ciudad Malaga corruptamente por los Christianos ; y de los Arabes fue llamada Malaca, en memoria de aquellas palabras que dira quando se cebó de la torre, no se llame Villariciosa, sino Malaca, porque ca, en lenguaje Español quiere dezir porque ; y porque dizo, ca, oy se acaba ca ella la nuas mala muger que huvo en el mundo, se compuso este nombre de Mala y ca. --Cap, xviii. pp. 81, 83.

Stabs herself.

Bleda, who has incorporated Miguel de Luna's story in his Cronica de los Moros de España, pp 193, 194, has the following curious passage concerning La Caba.

Fae la hermosura desta dama no ménos dañosa à España, que la de Elena à Troya. Llamaronla los Moros por mal nombre La Caoa; y nota el Padre Fray Estavan de Salazar, Cartuzo, en los discursos doctissimos sobre el Creido, que esto no fue sin 'mysterio: porque el nombre de nuestra primera madre en el Hebreo no se pronuncia Era, sino Cavah: de surrte que tuvieron un mesmo nombre dos mugeres que fueron rayna de los hombres, la una en todo el mundo, y la otra en España. - BEDOA, p. 146.

Morales supposes that the Gate at Malaga derived its name not from the death of Lu Caha, but from her having passed through it on her way to Africa.

En Malaga he visio la puerta en el muro; que llaman de La Cava, y dicen le quedò aquel nombre, habiendo salido esta vez por ella embarcarse. Y la gran desventura que luego sucedió, deró tristemente notable aquel lugar. — MORALES, l. xii. cap. Ixvii. § 4.

The very different view which I have taken of this subject when treating it upon a great scale, renders it proper to substitute for Julian, in this earlier production, the name of Illan, for which the Coronica de España affords authority, and to call his danghter as she is named in that spirited Ode by P. Luis de Leon, of which a good translation may be found in Russell's poems.

FATHER! Count Illan! here — what here I say, — Aloft—look up!—ay, father, here I stand, Safe of my purpose now! The way is barr'd; — Thou need'st not hasten hither!—Ho! Count Illan,

I tell thee I have barr'd the battlements! I tell thee that no human power can curb

A desperate will. The poison and the knife — These thou couldst wrest from me; but here I stand

Beyond thy thrall—free mistress of myself. Though thou hadst wings, thou couldst not overtake

My purpose. I command my destiny. Would I stand dallying on Death's threshold here, If it were possible that hand of man Could pluck me back?

Why didst thou bring me here To set my foot, reluctant as I was, On this most injured and unhappy land? Yonder in Afric - on a foreign shore, I might have linger'd out my wretched life -I might have found some distant lurking place, Where my accursed tale was never known; Where Gothic speech would never reach my ear, -Where among savages I might have fled The leprous curse of infamy ! But here -In Spain, - in my own country ; - night and morn Where all good people curse me in their prayers; Where every Moorish accent that I hear Doth tell me of my country's overthrow, Doth stab me like a dagger to the soul; Here - here - in desolated Spain, whose fields Yet reek to Heaven with blood, - whose slaughter'd sons Lie rotting in the open light of day, My victims; -- said I, mine? Nay -- Nay, Count

Illan, They are thy victims! at the throne of God Their spirits call for vengeance on thy head; Their blood is on thy soul, — even I, myself, I am thy victim too, — and this death more Must yet be placed in Hell to thy account.

O my dear country ! O my mother Spain ! My cradle and my grave ' — for thou art dear; And nursed to thy undoing as I was, Still, still I am thy child — and love thee still; I shall be written in thy chronicles The veriest wretch that ever yet betray'd Her native land ! From sire to son my name Will be transmitted down for infamy ! — Never again will mother call her child La Caba, — an Iscariot curse will lie Upon the name, and children in their songs Will teach the rocks and hills to echo with it Strumpet and traitoress !

This is thy work, father Nay, tell me not my shame is wash'd away — That all this ruin and this misery Is vengeance for my wrongs. I ask'd not this, — I call'd for open, manly, Gothic vengeance. Thou wert a vassal, and thy villain lord Most falsely and most foully broke his faith; Thou wert a father, and the lustful king By force abused thy child ! — Thou hadst a sword; Shame on thee to call in the cimeter To do thy work! Thou wert a Goth—a Christian—

Son of an old and honorable house, — It was my boast, my proudest happiness, To think I was the daughter of Count Illan. Fool that I am to call this African By that good name! O do not spread thy hands To me! — and put not on that father's look! Moor! turbaned misbeliever! renegade! Circumeised traitor! Thou Count Illan, Thou! — Thou my dear father? — cover me, O Earth? Hell, hide me from the knowledge!

THE AMATORY POEMS

ABEL SHUFFLEBOTTOM.

SONNET I.

DELIA AT PLAY.

SHE held a Cup and Ball of ivory white, Less white the ivory than her snowy hand! Enrapt, I watch'd her from my secret stand, As now, intent, in innocent delight, Her taper fingers twirl'd the giddy ball, Now tost it, following still with EAGLE sight, Now on the pointed end infix'd its fall. Marking her sport I mused, and musing sigh'd. Methought the BALL she play'd with was my HEART;

(Alas! that sport like that should be her pride!) And the keen paint which steadfast still she eyed Wherewith to pierce it, that was CUPID's dart; Shall I not then the cruel Fair condemn Who an that dart IMPALES my BOSOM'S GEM?

LOVE ELEGIES.

SONNET II.

TO A PAINTER ATTEMPTING DELIA'S PORTRAIT.

RASH Painter! canst thou give the ORB OF DAY In all its noontide glory? or portray The DIAMONO, that athwart the taper'd hall Flings the rich flashes of its dazzling light? Even if thine art could boast such magic might, Yet if it strove to paint my Angel's EVE, Here it perforce must fail. Cease! lest I call Heaven's vengeance on thy sin. Must thou he told The CRIME it is to point DIVINITY? Rash Painter! should the world her charms behold, Dim and defiled, as there they needs must be, They to their old idolatry would fall, And bedore her form the pogan knee, Fairer than VENUS, DAUGHTER OF THE SEA.

SONNET III

HE PROVES THE EXISTENCE OF A SOUL FROM HIS LOVE FOR DELIA.

Some have denied a soul! THEY[®]NEVER LOVED. Far from my Delia now by fate removed, At home, abroad, I viewed her every where; Her ONLY in the FLOOD OF NOON I see, My Goadess-Maid, my OMNIPRESENT FAIR, For LOVE onufhilates the world to mc! And when the weary SoL around his bed Closes the SABLE CURTAINS of the night, SUN OF MY SLUMBERS, on my dazzled sight SHE shines confest. When crery sound is dead, The spirit of HER voice comes then to roll The surge of music o'er my wavy brain. Far, far from her my Body drags its chain, But sure with Delia I crist A soul '

SONNET IV.

THE POET EXPRESSES HIS FEELINGS RESPECTING A PORTRAIT IN DELIA'S PARLOR.

I WOULD I were that portly Gentleman With gold-laced hat and golden-headed cane, Who hangs in Delia's parlor! For whene'er From book or needlework her looks arise, On him converge the SUN-BEAMS of her eyes, And he unblamed may gaze upon MY FAIR, And oft MY FAIR his favor'd form SURYEYS. O HAPPY PICTURE! still on HER to gaze ; I envy him! and jealous fear alarms, Lest the STRONG glance of those divinest charms WARM HIM TO LIFE, as in the ancient days, When MARBLE MELTED in Pygmalion's arms. I would I were that portly Gentleman With gold-laced hat and golden-headed cane.

LOVE ELEGIES.

ELEGY I.

THE POET RELATES HOW HE ORTAINED DELIA'S POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF.

'Tis mine ! what accents can my joy declare ? Blest he the pressure of the thronging rout ! Blest be the hand so hasty of my fair, That he the the rest for a manufacture and the

That left the tempting corner hanging out !

I envy not the joy the pilgrim feels, After long travel to some distant shrine, When at the relic of his saint he kneels, For Delia's POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF IS MINE.

When first with filching fingers I drew near, Keen hope shot tremulous through every vem And when the finish'd deed removed my fear, Scarce could my bounding heart its joy contain

What though the Eighth Commandment rose to nind,

It only served a moment's qualm to move; For thefts like this it could not be design'd; [LOVE! The Eighth Commandment WAS NOT MADE FOR

Here when she took the macaroons from me, She wiped her mouth to clean the crumbs so sweet! Dear napkin ! yes, she wiped her lips in thee ! Lips sweeter than the macaroons she eat.

And when she took that pinch of Mocabaw, That made my Love so delicately snceze, Thee to her Roman nose applied I saw, And thou art doubly dear for things like these.

No washerwoman's filthy hand shall e'er, Sweet pocket-handkerchief! thy worth profane;

For thou hast touch'd the rubies of my fair, And I will kiss thee o'er and o'er again.

ELEGY II.

THE POET INVOKES THE SPIRITS OF THE ELEMENTS TO APPROACH DELIA. — HE DESCRIBES HER SINGING.

YE SYLFHS, who banquet on my Delia s blush, Who on her locks of FLOATING GOLD repose, Dip in her cheek your GOSSAMERY BRUSH, And with its bloom of beauty tinge THE ROSE.

Hover around her lips on rainbow wing, Load from her honey'd breath your ricwless feet, Bear thence a richer fragrance for the Spring, And make the lily and the violet sweet.

Ye GNOMES, whose toil through many a dateless year | Its nurture to the infant gem supplies, From central caverns bring your diamonds here, To ripen in the SUN OF DELIA'S EYES. And ye who bathe in Etna's lava springs. Spirits of fire ! to see my love advance ; Fly, SALAMANDERS, on Asbestos' wings, To wanton in my Delia's fiery glanee. She weeps, she weeps ! her eye with anguish swells, Some tale of sorrow melts my FEELING GIRL! NYMPHS ! eatch the tears, and in your lucid shells Enclose them, EMBRYOS OF THE ORIENT PEARL. She sings ! the Nightingale with envy hears, The CHERUB listens from his starry throne, And motionless are stopp'd the attentive SPHERES, To hear more heavenly music than their own. Cease, Delia, cease ! for all the ANGEL THRONG, Hearkening to thee, let sleep their golden wires ! Cease, Delia, cease that too surpassing song, Lest, stung to envy, they should break their lyres. Cease, ere my senses are to madness driven By the strong joy ! Cease, Delia, lest my soul, Enrapt, already THINK ITSELF IN HEAVEN, And burst the feeble Body's frail control. ELEGY III. THE POET EXPATIATES ON THE BEAUTY OF DELIA'S HAIR.

THE comb between whose ivory teeth she strains The straitening eurls of gold so beamy bright, Not spotless merely from the touch remains, But issues forth more pure, more milky white.

The rose-pomatum that the FRISEUR spreads Sometimes with honor'd fingers for my fair No added perfume on her tresses sheds,

But borrows sweetness from her sweeter hair.

Happy the FRISEUR who in Delia's hair With licensed fingers uncontroll'd may rove ! And happy in his death the NANCING BEAR, Who died to make pomatum for my LOVE.

Oh could I hope that e'er my favor'd lays Might eurl those lovely locks with conscious pride.

Nor Hammond, nor the Mantuan Shepherd's praise,

I'd envy then, nor wish reward beside.

Cupid has strung from you, O tresses fine, The bow that in my breast impell'd his dart; From you, sweet locks! he wove the subtile line

Where with the urchin angled for MV HEART.

Fine are my Delia's tresses as the threads That from the silk-worm, self-interr'd, proceed;

Fine as the GLEAMY GOSSAMER that spreads Its filmy web-work o'er the tangled mead.

Yet with these tresses Cupid's power elate My captive heart has hondcuff'd in a chain, Strong as the cables of some huge first-rate, That bears Britannia's thunders o'ef. the Main.

The SYLPHS that round her radiant locks repair, In flowing lustre bathe their brightening wings; And ELFIN MINSTRELS with assiduous care The ringlets rob for FAERY FIDDLE-STRINGS.

ELEGY IV.

THE FOET RELATES HOW HE STOLE A LOCK OF DELLA'S HAIR, AND HER ANGER.

OH! be the day accurst that gave me birth! Ye Seas, to swallow me in kindness rise! Fall on me, Mountains! and thou merciful Earth, Open, and hide me from my Delia's eyes!

Let universal Chaos now return, Now let the central fires their prison burst, And EARTH, and HEAVEN, and AIR, and OCEAN burn —

For Delia FROWNS - SHE FROWNS, and I am curst!

Oh! I could dare the fury of the fight, Where hostile MILLIONS sought my single life; Would storm VOLCANO BATTERIES with delight, And grapple with GRIM DEATH in glorious strife.

Oh! I could brave the bolts of angry JOVE, When ceaseless lightnings fire the midnight skies: What is his wrath to that of NER I love? What is his LIGHTNING to my DELLA'S EVES?

Go, fatal lock ! I cast thee to the wind ; Ye serpent CURLS, ye poison-tendrils, go ! Would I could tear thy memory from my mind, ACCURSED LOCK, — thou cause of all my woe !

Seize the CURST CURLS, ye Furies, as they fly! Demons of Darkness, guard the infernal roll, That thence your cruel vengeance, when I die, May knit the KNOTS OF TORTURE for my SOUL.

Last night, — Oh hear me, Heaven, and grant my prayer !

The BOOK OF FATE before thy suppliant lay, And let me from its ample records tear Only the single FAGE OF VESTERDAY!

Or let me meet OLD TIME upon his flight, And I will STOP HIM on his restless way; Omnipotent in Love's resistless might, Fll force him back the ROAD OF VESTERDAY.

Last night, as o'er the page of Love's despair, My Delia bent deliciously to grieve,

I stood a treacherous loiterer by her chair, And drew the FATAL SCISSORS from my sleeve: And would that at that instant o'er my thread The SHEARS OF ATROPOS had open'd then; And when I reft the lock from Delia's head, Had cut me sudden from the sons of men! She heard the scissors that fair lock divide, And whilst my heart with transport panted big, She cast a FURY frown on me, and cried, "Youstupid Puppy,—you have spoil'd my Wig!" Westbury, 1799.	Bear me in spirit where the field of fight Scatters contagion on the tainted gale, When, to the Moon's faint beam, On many a carcass shine the dews of night, And a dead silence stills the vale, [scream Save when at times is heard the glntted Raven's Where some wreck'd army from the Conqueror's Speed their disastrons flight, [might With thee, fierce Genius! let me trace their way, And hear at times the deep heart-groan Of some poor sufferer left to die alone; And we will panse, where, on the wild, The mother to her breast, On the heap'd snows reclining, clasps her child, Not to be pitied now, for both are now at rest.
LYRIC POEMS ΤΟ HORROR. Τιν γάρ ποτα είσομαι τάν καὶ σκύλικες τρομέοντι Ἐρχομέναν νεκύων ἀνά τ' ἡριά, και μέλαν αίμα ΤΗΒΟΟΚΗΤUS.	Black HORROR! speed we to the bed of Death, Where one who wide and far Hath sent abroad the myriad plagues of war Struggles with his last breath; Then to his wildly-starting eyes The spectres of the slaughter'd rise; Then on his frenzied ear Their calls for vengeance and the Demons' yell In one heart-maddening chorus swell; Cold on his brow convulsing stands the dew, And night eternal darkens on his view.
DARK Horror ! hear my call ! Stern Genius, hear from thy retreat On some old sepulchre's moss-canker'd seat, Beneath the Abbey's ivied wall That trembles o'er its shade ; Where wrapt in midnight gloom, alone, Thou lovest to lie and hear The roar of waters near, And listen to the deep, dull groan Of some perturbed sprite,	 HORRON! I call thee yet once more ! Bear me to that accursed shore, Where on the stake the Negro writhes. Assume thy sacred terrors then ! dispense The gales of Pestilence ! Arouse the oppress'd; teach them to know their power; Lead them to vengeance ! and in that dread hour When ruin rages wide, I will behold and smile by MERCY's side.
 Borne fitful on the heavy gales of night Or whether o'er some wide waste hill Thou see'st the traveller stray, Bewilder'd on his lonely way, When, loud, and keen, and chill, The evening winds of winter blow, Drifting deep the dismal snow. Or if thou followest now on Greenland's shore, With all thy terrors, on the lonely way Of some wreek'd mariner, where to the roar Of herded bears, the floating ice-hills round Return their echoing sound, And by the dim, drear Boreal light Givest half his dangers to the wretch's sight. FAINT gleams the evening radiance through the sky, The sober twilight dimly darkens round; In short quick circles the shrill bat flits by, And the slow vapor curls along the ground.
Or if thy fury form,	Now the pleased eye from yon lone cottage sees

Or if thy fury form, When o'er the midnight deep The dark-wing'd tempests sweep, Beholds from some high cliff the increasing storm, Watching with strange delight, As the black billows to the thunder rave, When by the lightning's light Thou see'st the tall ship sink beneath the wave.

On the green mead the smoke long-shadowing play; The Red-breast on the blossom'd spray Warbles wild her latest lay; And lo! the Rooks to yon high-tufted trees Wing in long files vociferous their way. Calm CONTEMPLATION, 'tis thy favorite honr' Come, tranquillizing Power !

LYRIC POEMS.

I view thee on the calmy shore When Ocean stills his waves to rest; Or when slow-moving on the surges hoar Meet with deep, hollow roar, And whiten o'er his breast; And when the Moon with softer radiance gleams, And lovelier heave the billows in her beams.

When the low gales of evening moan along, I love with thee to feel the calm, cool breeze, And roam the pathless forest wilds among, Listening the mellow murmur of the trees Full-foliaged, as they wave their heads on high, And to the winds respond in symphony.

Or lead me where, amid the tranquil vale, The broken streamlet flows in silver light; And I will linger where the gale O'er the bank of violets sighs, Listening to hear its soften'd sounds arise, And hearken the dull beetle's drowsy flight, And watch the tube-eyed snail Creep o'er his long, moon-glittering trail, And mark where radiant through the night Shines in the grass-green hedge the glow-worm's living light.

Thee, meekest Power ! I love to meet, As oft with solitary pace The ruin'd Abbey's hallowed rounds I trace, And listen to the echoings of my feet. Or on some half-demolish'd tomb, Whose warning texts anticipate my doom, Mark the clear orb of night Cast through the ivied arch a broken light.

Nor will I not in some more gloomy hour Invoke with fearless awe thine holier power, Wandering beneath the sacred pile When the blast moans along the darksome aisle, And clattering patters all around The midnight shower with dreary sound.

But sweeter 'tis to wander wild, By melancholy dreams beguiled, While the summer moon's pale ray Faintly guides me on my way To some lone, romantic glen, Far from all the haunts of men; Where no noise of uproar rude Breaks the calm of solitude; But soothing Silence sleeps in all, Save the neighboring waterfall, Whose hoarse waters, falling near, Load with hollow sounds the ear, And with down-dash'd torrent white Glean hoary through the shades of night.

Thus wandering silent on and slow, I'll murse Reflection's sacred woe, And muse upon the happier day When Hope would weave her visions gay, Ere Fancy, chill'd by adverse fate, Left sad Reality my mate. O CONTEMPLATION! when to Memory's eyes The visions of the long-past days arise, Thy holy power imparts the best relief, And the calm'd Spirit loves the joy of grief.

Bristol, 1792.

TO A FRIEND

Oh my faithful Friend ! Oh early chosen, ever found the same, And trusted and beloved ! once more the verse Long destined, always obvious to thine ear, Attend indulgent. AKENSIDE.

AND wouldst thou seek the low abode Where Peace delights to dwell? Pause, Traveller, on thy way of life! With many a snare and peril rife Is that long labyrinth of road! Dark is the vale of years before; Pause, Traveller, on thy way, Nor dare the dangerous path explore Till old Experience comes to lend his leading ray.

Not he who comes with lantern light Shall gnide thy groping pace aright With faltering feet and slow; No! let him rear the torch on high, And every maze shall meet thine eye, And every snare and every foe; Then with steady step and strong, Traveller, shalt thon march along.

Though Power invite thee to her hall, Regard not thon her tempting call, Her splendor's meteor glare; Though courteous Flattery there await, And Wealth adorn the dome of State, There stalks the midnight spectre Care : Peace, Traveller, doth not sojourn there.

If Fame allure thee, climb not thou To that steep mountain's craggy brow Where stands her stately pile; For far from thence doth Peace abide, And thou shalt find Fame's favoring smile Cold as the feeble Sun on Hecla's snow-clad side

And, Traveller! as thou hopest to find That low and loved abode,
Retire thee from the thronging road,
And shun the mob of human-kind.
Ah! hear how old Experience schools —
"Fly, fly the crowd of Knaves and Fools,
"And thou shalt fly from woe!
"The one thy heedless heart will greet "With Judas-smile, and thon wilt meet "In every Fool a Foe!"

So safely mayst thou pass from these, And reach secure the home of Peace,

LYRIC POEMS.

REMEMBRANCE.

The remembrance of Youth is a sigh ALL.

MAN hath a weary pilgrimage As through the world he wends, On every stage from youth to age Still discontent attends; With heaviness he casts his eye Upon the road before, And still remembers with a sigh The days that are no more.

To school the little exile goes, Torn from his mother's arms, — What then shall soothe his earliest woes, When novelty hath lost its charms? Condemn'd to suffer through the day Restraints which no rewards repay, And cares where love has no concern, Hope lengthens as she counts the hours Before his wish'd return. From hard control and tyrant rules, The unfeeling discipline of schools, In thought he loves to roam, And tears will struggle in his eye While he remembers with a sigh The comforts of his home.

Youth comes; the toils and cares of life Torment the restless mind;
Where shall the tired and harass'd heart Its consolation find?
Then is not Youth, as Fancy tells, Life's summer prime of joy?
Ah no! for hopes too long delay'd
And feelings blasted or betray'd, Its fabled bliss destroy;
And Youth remembers with a sigh The careless days of Infancy.

Maturer Manhood now arrives, And other thoughts come on, But with the baseless hopes of Youth Its generous warmth is gone; Cold, calculating cares succeed, The timid thought, the wary deed, The dull realities of truth; Back on the past he turns his eye, Remembering with an envious sigh Tbe happy dreams of Youth. So reaches he the latter stage Of this our mortal pilgimage, With feeble step and slow ; New ills that latter stage await, And old Experience learns too late That all is vanity below. Life's vain delusions are gone by ; Its idle hopes are o'er ; Yet Age remembers with a sigh The days that are no more.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE.

DACTYLICS.

WEARY way-wanderer, languid and sick at heart, Travelling painfully over the rugged road, [one ! Wild-visaged Wanderer ! God help thee, wretched Sorely thy little one drags by thee barefooted; Cold is the baby that hangs at thy bending back, Meagre, and livid, and screaming for misery.

* Woe-begone mother, half anger, half agony, As over thy shoulder thou lookest to hush the babe, Bleakly the blinding snow beats in thy haggard face.

Ne'er will thy husband return from the war again, Cold is thy heart, and as frozen as Charity! [forter! Cold are thy children.—Now God be thy com-Bristol, 1795.

THE WIDOW.

SAPPHICS.

COLD was the night wind, drifting fast the snow fell, Wide were the downs, and shelterless and naked, When a poor Wanderer struggled on her journey, Weary and way-sore.

Drear were the downs, more dreary her reflections, Cold was the night-wind, colder was her bosom; She had no home, the world was all before her, She had no shelter.

Fast o'er the heath a chariot rattled by her, " Pity me!" feebly cried the lonely wanderer, " Pity me, strangers! lest with cold and hunger Here 1 should perish.

"Once I had friends, — though now by all forsaken Once I had parents, — they are now in heaven! I had a home once — I had once a husband — Pity me, strangers!

"I had a home once — I had once a husband I am a widow, poor and broken-hearted!" Loudblew the wind; unheard was her complaining, On drove the chariot.

* This stanza was written by S. T. COLERIOGE.

Then on the snow she laid her down to rest her; She heard a horseman; "Pity me!" she groan'd out;

Loud was the wind; unheard was her complaining; On went the horseman.

Worn out with anguish, toil, and cold, and hunger, Down sunk the Wanderer; sleep had seized her senses;

There did the traveller find her in the morning; Gop had released her.

THE CHAPEL BELL.

Lo I, the man who from the Muse did ask Her deepest notes to swell the Patriot's meeds, Am now enforced, a far unfitter task, For cap and gown to leave my minstrel weeds; For yon dull tone, that tinkles on the air,

Bids me lay by the lyre and go to morning prayer.

O how I hate the sound ! it is the knell That still a requiem tolls to Comfort's hour; And loath am I, at Superstition's bell, To quit or Morpheus' or the Muse's bower:

Better to lie and doze, than gape amain, Hearing still mumbled o'er the same eternal strain.

Thou tedious herald of more tedious prayers, Say, dost thou ever summon from his rest One being wakening to religious cares? Or rouse one pious transport in the breast?

Or rather, do not all reluctant creep To linger out the time in listlessness or sleep?

 love the bell that calls the poor to pray, Chiming from village church its cheerful sound, When the sun smiles on Labor's holy-day, And all the rustic train are gather'd round, Each deftly dizen'd in his Sunday's best,
 And pleased to hail the day of piety and rest.

And when, dim shadowing o'er the face of day, The mantling mists of even-tide rise slow, As through the forest gloom I wend my way, The minster curfew's sullen voice I know, And pause, and love its solemn toll to hear, As made by distance soft it dies upon the ear.

Nor with an idle nor unwilling ear Do I receive the early passing-bell; For, sick at heart with many a secret care, When I lie listening to the dead man's knell, I think that in the grave all sorrows cease, And would full fain recline my head and be at peace.

But thou, memorial of monastic gall! What fancy sad or lightsome hast thou given? Thy vision-scaring sounds alone recall

The prayer that trembles on a yawn to heaven, The snuffling, snaffling Fellow's nasal tone, ad Romish rites retain'd, though Romish faith be flown.

Oxford, 1793.

TO HYMEN.

God of the torch, whose soul-illuming flame Beams brightest radiance o'er the human heart, Of many a woe the cure, Of many a joy the source;

To thee I sing, if haply may the Muse Pour forth the song unblamed from these dull haunts, Where never beams thy torch To cheer the sullen scene.

I pour the song to thee, though haply doom d Alone and unbeloved to pass my days; Though doom'd perchance to die Alone and unbewail'd.

Yet will the lark, albeit in cage enthrall'd, Send out her voice to greet the morning sun, As wide his cheerful beams Light up the landscape round;

When high in heaven she hears the caroling, The prisoner too begins her morning hymn, And hails the beam of joy, Of joy to her denied.

Friend to each better feeling of the soul, I sing to thee, for many a joy is thine, And many a Virtue comes To join thy happy train.

Lured by the splendor of thy sacred torch, The beacon-light of bliss, young Love draws near, And leads his willing slaves To wear thy flowery chain.

And chasten'd Friendship comes, whose mildest sway

Shall cheer the hour of age, when fainter burn The fading flame of Love, The fading flame of Life.

Parent of every bliss, the busy hand Of Fancy oft will paint in brightest lives How calm, how clear, thy torch Illumes the wintry hour;

Will paint the wearied laborer at that hour, When friendly darkness yields a pause to toil, Returning blithely home To each domestic joy;

Will paint the well-trimm'd fire, the frugal meal Prepared with fond solicitude to please; The ruddy children round Climbing the father's knee.

And oft will Fancy rise above the lot Of honest Poverty, and think how man Nor rich, nor poor, enjoys His best and happiest state;

When toil no longer irksome and constrain a By hard necessity, but comes to please,

To vary the still hour Of tranquil happiness.

Why, Fancy, wilt thou, o'er the lovely scene Pouring thy vivid hues, why, sorceress bland, Soothe sad reality With visionary bliss?

Turn thou thine eyes to where the hallowed light Of Learning shines; ah, rather lead thy son Along her mystic paths To drink the sacred spring.

Lead calmly on along the unvaried path To solitary Age's drear abode; — Is it not happiness That gives the sting to Death?

Well then is he whose unimbitter'd years Are waning on in lonely listlessness; If Life hath little joy, Death hath for him no sting.

WRITTEN

ON THE FIRST OF DECEMBER.

THOUGH now no more the musing ear Delights to listen to the breeze, That lingers o'er the green-wood shade, I love thee, Winter! well.

Sweet are the harmonics of Spring ; Sweet is the Summer's evening gale ; And sweet the Antumnal winds that shake The many-color'd grove.

And pleasant to the sober'd soul The silence of the wintry scene, When Nature shrouds herself, entranced In deep tranquillity.

Not undelightful now to roam The wild heath sparkling on the sight; Not undelightful now to pace The forest's ample rounds; —

And see the spangled branches shine; And mark the moss of many a hue That varies the old tree's brown bark, Or o'er the gray stone spreads;—

And see the cluster'd berries bright Amid the holly's gay green leaves; The ivy round the leafless oak That clasps its foliage close.

So Virtue, diffident of strength, Clings to Religion's firmer aid; So, by Religion's aid upheld, Endures calamity. Nor void of beauties now the spring, Whose waters hid from summer-sun Have soothed the thirsty pilgrim's ear With more than melody.

Green moss shines there with ice incased; The long grass bends its spear-like form; And lovely is the silvery scene When faint the sun-beams smile.

Reflection, too, may love the hour When Nature, hid in Winter's grave, No more expands the bursting bud, Or bids the floweret bloom;

For Nature soon in Spring's best charms, Shall rise revived from Winter's grave, Expand the bursting bud again,

And bid the flower re-hloom.

COME, melancholy Moralizer, come ! Gather with me the dark and wintry wreata; With me engarland now The Sepulchre of Time.

Come, Moralizer, to the funeral song ! I pour the dirge of the Departed Days; For well the funeral song Befits this solemn hour.

But hark ! even now the merry bells ring round With clamorous joy to welcome in this day, This consecrated day To Joy and Merriment.

Mortal ! while Fortune with benignant hand Fills to the brim thy cup of happiness, Whilst her unclouded sun Illumes thy summer day,— Canst thou rejoice, — rejoice that Time flies fast? That night shall shadow soon thy summer sun? That swift the stream of Years Rolls to Eternity?

If thou hast wealth to gratify each wish, If power be thine, remember what thou art ! Remember thou art Man, And Death thine heritage !

Hast thou known Love! Doth Beauty's better sun Cheer thy fond heart with no capricious smile, Her eye all eloquence, All harmony her voice?

Oh state of bappiness ! — Hark ! how the gale Moans deep and hollow through the leafless grove ! Winter is dark and cold ; Where now the charms of Spring !

Say'st thou that Fancy paints the future scene In hues too sombrous? that the dark-stoled Maid With frowning front severe Appalls the shuddering soul?

And wouldst thou bid me court her fairy form, When, as she sports her in some happier mocd, Her many-colored robes Float varying in the sun?

Ah! vainly does the Pilgrim, whose long road Leads o'er a barren mountain's storm-vex'd height, With wistful eye behold Some quiet vale, far off.

And there are those who love the pensive song, To whom all sounds of Mirth are dissonant; Them in accordant mood This thoughtful strain will find.

For hopeless Sorrow hails the lapse of Time, Rejoicing when the fading orb of day Is sunk again in night, That one day more is gone.

And he who bears Affliction's heavy load With patient piety, well pleased he knows

The World a pilgrimage, The Grave his inn of rest.

Go thou and seek the House of Prayer ! I to the woodlands wend, and there In lovely Nature see the God of Love. The swelling organ's peal Wakes not my sonl to zeal, Like the sweet music of the vernal grove. The gorgeous altar and the mystic vest Excite not such devotion in my breast, As where the noon-tide beam, Flash'd from some broken stream, Vibrates on the dazzled sight; Or where the cloud-suspended rain Sweeps in shadows o'er the plain; Or when, reelining on the cliff's huge height, I mark the billows burst in silver light.

Go thou and seek the House of Prayer ! 1 to the Woodlands shall repair, Feed with all Nature's eharms mine eyes, And hear all Nature's melodies. The primrose bank will there dispense Faint fragrance to the awaken'd sense; The morning beams that life and joy impart, Will with their influence warm my heart, And the full tear that down my check will steal, Will speak the prayer of praise I feel.

Go thou and seek the House of Prayer! I to the Woodlands bend my way, And meet Religion there !

She needs not haunt the high-arch'd dome to pray, Where storied windows dim the doubtful day; At liberty she loves to rove,

Wide o'er the healthy hill or cowslip'd dale · Or seek the shelter of the embowering grove,

Or with the streamlet wind along the vale. Sweet are these scenes to her; and when the Night Pours in the North her silver streams of light, She wooes reflection in the silent gloom, And ponders on the world to come.

THE RACE OF BANQUO.

A FRAGMENT.

"FLY, son of Banquo! Fleance, fly! Leave thy guilty sire to die!" O'er the heath the stripling fled, The wild storm howling round his head: Fear, mightier through the shades of night, Urged his feet, and wing'd his flight; And still he heard his father's cry, "Fly, son of Banquo! Fleance, fly!"

"Fly, son of Banquo! Fleance, fly! Leave thy guilty sire to die!" On every blast was heard the moan, The anguish'd shriek, the death-fraught groan Loathly night-hags join the yell, And lo!—the midnight rites of Hell!

"Forms of magic! spare my life! Shield me from the murderer's knife! Before me, dim in lurid light, Float the phantoms of the night— Behind 1 hear my father cry, Fly, son of Banquo—Fleanee, fly!"

"Parent of the sceptred race, Boldly tread the circled space, Boldly, Fleance, venture near, Sire of monarchs, spurn at fear. Sisters, with prophetic breath, Pour we now the dirge of Death!"

WHEN at morn, the Muleteer With early call announces day, Sorrowing that early call I hear, Which scares the visions of delight away For dear to me the silent hour When sleep exerts its wizard power, And busy fancy, then let free, Borne on the wings of Hope, my Edith, flies to thee

2.

When the slant sunbeams crest The mountain's shadowy breast; When on the upland slope Shines the green myrtle wet with morning dew, And lovely as the youthful dreams of Hope, The dum-seen landscape opens on the view,

I gaze around, with raptured eyes, On Nature's charms, where no illusion lies, And drop the joy and memory mingled tear, And sigh to think that Edith is not here.

At the cool hour of even, When all is calm and still, And o'er the western hill A richer radiance robes the mellow'd heaven, Absorb'd in darkness thence, When slowly fades in night The dim, decaying light, Like the fair day-dreams of Benevolence; Fatigued, and sad, and slow Along my lonely way I go, And muse upon the distant day,

And sigh, remembering Edith far away.

When late arriving at our inn of rest, Whose roof, exposed to many a winter's sky, Half shelters from the wind the shivering guest; By the lamp's melancholy gloom, I see the miserable room, And musing on the evils that arise From disproportion'd inequalities, Pray that my lot may be Neither with Riches, nor with Poverty, But in that happy mean, Which for the soul is best, And with contentment blest, In some secluded glen

To dwell with Peace and Edith far from men.

TO RECOVERY.

RECOVERV, where art thou? Daughter of Heaven, where shall we seek thy help? Upon what hallow'd fountain hast thou laid, O Nymph adored, thy spell?

By the gray ocean's verge, Daughter of Heaven, we seek thee, but in vain; We find no healing in the breeze that sweeps The thymy mountain's brow.

Where are the happy hours, The sunshine where, that cheer'd the morn of life ? For Health is fled, and with her fled the joys Which made existence dear.

I saw the distant hills Smile in the radiance of the orient beam, And gazed delighted that anon our feet Should visit scenes so fair I look'd abroad at noon,

The shadow and the storm were on the hills, The crags which like a facry fabric shone Darkness had overcast.

On you, ye coming years, So fairly shone the April gleam of hope; So darkly o'er the distance, late so bright, Now settle the black clouds.

Come thou, and chase away Sorrow and Pain, the persecuting Powers Who make the melancholy day so long, So long the restless night.

Shall we not find thee here, Recovery, on the salt sea's breezy strand? Is there no healing in the gales that sweep The thymy mountain's brow?

I look for thy approach, O life-preserving Power! as one who strays Alone in darkness o'er the pathless marsh, Watches the dawn of day.

YOUTH AND AGE.

WITH cheerful step the traveller Pursues his early way, When first the dimly-dawning east Reveals the rising day.

He bounds along his craggy road, He hastens up the height, And all he sees and all he hears Administer delight.

And if the mist, retiring slow, Roll round its wavy white, He thinks the morning vapors hide Some beauty from his sight.

But when behind the western clouds Departs the fading day, How wearily the traveller Pursues his evening way !

Sorely along the craggy road His painful footsteps creep, And slow, with many a feeble pause, He labors up the steep.

And if the mists of night close round, They fill his soul with fear ;

He dreads some unseen precipice, Some hidden danger near.

So cheerfully does youth begin Life's pleasant morning stage; Alas! the evening traveller feels The fears of wary age!

THE OAK OF OUR FATHERS.

ALAS for the Oak of our Fathers, that stood In its beauty, the glory and pride of the wood !

It grew and it flourish'd for many an age, And many a tempest wreak'd on it its rage; But when its strong branches were bent with the blast,

It struck its root deeper, and flourish d more fast.

Its head tower'd on high, and its branches spread round; [sound; For its roots had struek deep, and its heart was The bees o'er its honey-dew'd foliage play'd, And the heasts of the forest fed under its shade.

The Oak of our Fathers to Freedom was dear; Its leaves were her crown, and its wood was her spear. Alas for the Oak of our Fathers, that stood In its beauty, the glory and pride of the wood!

There crept up an ivy and clung round the trunk; It struck in its mouths and the jnices it drunk; The branches grew sickly, deprived of their food, And the Oak was no longer the pride of the wood.

The foresters saw and they gather'd around; The roots still were fast, and the heart still wassound; They lopp'd off the boughs that so beautiful spread, But the ivy they spared on its vitals that fed.

No longer the bees o'er its honey-dews play'd, Nor the beasts of the forest fed under its shade; Lopp'd and mangled the trunk in its rnin is seen, A monument now what its beauty has been.

The Oak has received its incurable wound; They have loosen'd the roots, though the heart may be sound; [see, What the travellers at distance green-flourishing Are the leaves of the ivy that poison'd the tree.

Alas for the Oak of our Fathers, that stood In its beanty, the glory and pride of the wood !

THE BATTLE OF PULTOWA.

Os Vorska's glittering waves The morning sunbeams play; Pultowa's walls are throng'd With eager multitudes; Athwart the dusty vale They strain their aching eyes, Where to the fight moves on The Conqueror Charles, the iron-hearted Swede.

flim Famine hath not tamed, The tamer of the Arave; Him Winter hath not quell'd; Wher man hy man his veteran troops sunk down, Frozen to their endless sleep, He he : :ndaunted on Him Pain hath not subdued; What though he mounts not now The fiery steed of war? Borne on a litter to the field he goes.

Go, iron-hearted King ! Full of thy former fame — Think how the humbled Dane Crouch'd underneath thy sword ; Think how the wretched Pole Resign'd his conquer'd crown ; Go, iron-hearted King ! Let Narva's glory swell thy haughty breast, —

The death-day of thy glory, Charles, hath dawn'd! Proud Swede, the Sun hath risen That on thy shame shall set !

Now, Patkul, may thine injured spirit rest ' For over that relentless Swede Ruin hath raised his unrelenting arm ; For ere the night descends, His veteran host destroyed, His laurels blasted to revive no more, He flies before the Moscovite.

Impatiently that haughty heart must hear Long years of hope deceived; Long years of idleness That sleepless soul must brook. Now, Patkul, may thine injured spirit rest To him who suffers in an honest cause No death is ignominious; not on thee, But upon Charles, the cruel, the unjust, Not upon thee, — on him The ineffaceable reproach is fix'd, The infamy abides. Now, Patkul, may thine injured spirit rest

THE TRAVELLER'S RETURN.

SWEET to the morning traveller The song amid the sky, Where, twinkling in the dewy light, The skylark soars on high.

And cheering to the traveller The gales that round him play, When faint and heavily he drags Along his noon-tide way

And when beneath the unclouded sun Full wearily toils he, The flowing water makes to him

A soothing melody.

And when the evening light decays, And all is calm around, There is sweet music to his ear

In the distant sheep-bell's sound.

But oh! of all delightful sounds Of evening or of morn,

The sweetest is the voice of Love, That welcomes his return.

THE OLD MAN'S COMFORTS,

AND HOW HE GAINED THEM.

You are old, Father William, the young man cried; The few locks which are left you are gray; You are hale, Father William, a hearty old man; Now tell me the reason, I pray.

In the days of my youth, Father William replied, I remember'd that youth would fly fast, And abused not my health and my vigor at first,

That I never might need them at last.

You are old, Father William, the young man cried, And pleasures with youth pass away;

And yet you lament not the days that are gone ; Now tell me the reason, I pray.

In the days of my youth, Father William replied, I remember'd that youth could not last;

I thought of the future, whatever I did, That I never might grieve for the past.

You are old, Father William, the young man cried, And life must be hastening away;

You are cheerful, and love to converse upon death; Now tell me the reason, I pray.

1 am cheerful, young man, Father William replied; Let the cause thy attention engage; In the days of my youth I remember'd my God! And He hath not forgotten my age.

TRANSLATION OF A GREEK ODE ON ASTRONOMY,

WRITTEN BY S. T. COLERIDGE, FOR THE PRIZE AT CAMBRIDGE, 1793.

HAIL, venerable NIGHT! O first-created, hail! Thou who art doon'd in thy dark breast to veil The dying beam of light, The eldest and the latest thou, Hail, venerable NIGHT! Around thine ebon brow, Glittering plays with lightning rays A wreath of flowers of fire. The varying clouds with many a hue attire Thy many-tinted veil. Holy are the blue graces of thy zone! But who is he whose tongue can tell The dewy lustres which thine eyes adorn? Lovely to some the blushes of the morn ; To some the glories of the Day, When, blazing with meridian ray, The gorgeous Sun ascends his highest throne; But I with solemn and severe delight Still watch thy constant car, immortal NIGHT '

2.

For then to the celestial Palaces Urania leads, Urania, she The Goddess who alone Stands by the blazing throne, Effulgent with the light of Deity. Whom Wisdom, the Creatrix, by her side Placed on the heights of yonder sky, And smiling with ambrosial love, unlock'd The depths of Nature to her piercing eye. Angelic myriads struck their harps around, And with triumphant song The host of Stars, a beauteous throng, Around the ever-living Mind In jubilee their mystic dance begun ; When at thy leaping forth, O Sun 1 The Morning started in affright, Astonish'd at thy birth, her Child of Light !

Hail, O Urania, hail! Queen of the Muses! Mistress of the Song! For thou didst deign to leave the heavenly throng As earthward thou thy steps wert bending, A ray went forth and harbinger'd thy way All Ether laugh'd with thy descending. Thou hadst wreath'd thy hair with roses, The flower that in the immortal bower Its deathless bloom discloses. Before thine awful mien, compelled to shrink, Fled Ignorance, abash'd, with all her brood, Dragons, and Hags of baleful breath, Fierce Dreams, that wont to drink The Sepulchre's black blood : Or on the wings of storms Riding in fury forms, Shriek to the mariner the shriek of Death.

I boast, O Goddess, to thy name That I have raised the pile of fame; Therefore to me be given To roam the starry path of Heaven, To charioteer with wings on high, And to rein-in the Tempests of the sky.

5.

Chariots of happy Gods ! Fountains of Light! Ye Angel-Temples bright! May I unblamed your flamy thresholds tread ? I leave Earth's lowly scene; I leave the Moon serene, The lovely Queen of Night; I leave the wide domains, Beyond where Mars his fiercer light can fling, And Jupiter's vast plains, (The many-belted king;) Even to the solitude where Saturn reigns,

Like some stern tyrant to just exile driven ; Dim-seen the sullen power appears In that cold solitude of Heaven, And slow he drags along The mighty circle of long-lingering years.

Nor shalt thou escape my sight, Who at the threshold of the sun-trod domes Art trembling, — youngest Daughter of the Night! And you, ye fiery-tressed strangers! you, Comets who wander wide, Will I along your pathless way pursue, Whence bending I may view The Worlds whom elder Suus have vivified.

7.

For Hope with loveliest visions soothes my mind, That even in Man, Life's winged power, When comes again the natal hour, Shall on heaven-wandering feet, In undecaying youth, Spring to the blessed seat; Where round the fields of Truth The fiery Essences forever feed; And o'er the ambrosial mead, The breezes of serenity Silent and soothing glide forever by.

8.

There, Priest of Nature ! dost thou shine, NEWTON ! a King among the Kings divine. Whether with harmony's mild force, He guides along its course The axle of some beauteous star on high, Or gazing, in the spring Ebullient with creative energy, Feels his pure breast with rapturous joy possess'd, Inchriate in the holy cestasy.

9.

I may not call thee mortal then, my soul! Immortal longings lift thee to the skies: Love of thy native home inflames thee now, With pious madness wise. Know then thyself! expand thy wings divine ! Soon, mingled with thy fathers, thou shalt shine A star amid the starry throng, A God the Gods among.

GOOSEBERRY-PIE.

A PINDARIC ODE.

1.

GOOSEBERRY-PIE is best. Full of the theme, O Muse, begin the song ! What though the sunbeaus of the West Mature within the Turtle's breast Blood glutinous and fat of verdant hue? What though the Deer bound sportively along O'er springy turf, the Park's elastic vest? Give them their honors due, — But Gooseberry-Pie is best.

2.

Behind his oxen slow The patient Ploughman plods, And as the Sower followed by the clods Earth's genial womb received the living seed. The rains descend, the grains they grow; Saw ye the vegetable ocean Roll its green ripple to the April gale? The golden waves with multitudinous motion Swell o'er the summer vale?

3.

It flows through Alder banks along Beneath the copse that hides the hill; The gentle stream you cannot see, You only hear its melody, The stream that turns the Mill. Pass on a little way, pass on, And you shall eatch its gleam anon; And hark! the loud and agonizing groan, That makes its anguish known, Where tortured by the Tyrant Lord of Meal The Brook is broken on the Wheel !

Blow fair, blow fair, thou orient gale ' On the white bosom of the sail, Ye Winds, enamor'd, lingering lie ! Ye Waves of ocean, spare the bark, Ye tempests of the sky ! From distant realms she comes to bring The sugar for my Pie. For this on Gambia's arid side The Vulture's feet are scaled with blood, And Beelzebub beholds with pride His darling planter brood.

5.

First in the spring thy leaves were seen, Thou beauteous bush, so early green! Soon ceased thy blossoms' little life of love O safer than the gold-fruit-bearing tree, The glory of that old Hesperian grove, — No Dragon does there need for thee With quintessential sting to work alarms, Prepotent guardian of thy fruitage fine, Thou vegetable Porcupine! — And didst thou seratch thy tender arms, O Jane! that I should dine!

The flour, the sugar, and the fruit, Commingled well, how well they suit ! And they were well bestow'd. O Jane, with truth 1 praise your Pie, And will not you in just reply Praise my Pindaric Ode?

Exeter, 1799.

TO A BEE.

1.

THOU wert out betimes, thou busy, busy Bee ! As abroad I took my early way, Before the Cow from her resting-place Had risen up and left her trace On the meadow, with dew so gray, Saw I thee, thou busy, busy Bee.

Thou wert working late, thou busy, busy Bee ! After the fall of the Cistus flower, When the Primrose-of-evening was ready to hurst, I heard thee last, as I saw thee first; In the silence of the evening hour, Heard I thee, thou busy, busy Bee.

Thou art a miser, thou busy, busy Bee ! Late and early at employ; Still on thy golden stores intent, Thy summer in heaping and hoarding is spent What thy winter will never enjoy ; Wise lesson this for me, thou busy, busy Bee !

4.

Little dost thou think, thou busy, busy Bee ! What is the end of thy toil. When the latest flowers of the ivy are gone, And all thy work for the year is done, Thy master comes for the spoil. Woe then for thee, thou busy, busy Bee!

Westbury, 1799.

TO A SPIDER.

SPIDER! thou need'st not run in fear about To shun my curious eyes; I won't humanely crush thy bowcls out Lest thou shouldst eat the flies; Nor will 1 roast thee with a damn'd delight Thy strange instinctive fortitude to see, For there is One who might One day roast me.

Thou art welcome to a Rhymer sore-perplex'd, The subject of his verse; There's many a one who, on a better text, Perhaps might comment worse. Then shrink not, old Free-Mason, from my view, But quietly like me spin out the line; Do thou thy work pursue, As I will mine.

Weaver of snares, thou emblemest the ways Of Satan, Sire of lies; Hell's huge black Spider, for mankind he lays His toils, as thou for flies. 18

When Betty's husy eye runs round the room, Woe to that nice geometry, if seen ! But where is he whose broom The earth shall clean?

Spider ! of old thy flimsy webs were thought -And 'twas a likeness true -To emblem laws in which the weak are caught, But which the strong break through : And if a victim in thy toils is ta'en, Like some poor client is that wretched fly, I'll warrant thee thou'lt drain His life-blood dry.

And is not thy weak work like human schemes And care on earth employ'd? Such are young hopes and Love's delightful dreams So easily destroy'd !

So does the Statesman, whilst the Avengers sleep, Self-deem'd secure, his wiles in secret lay ; Soon shall destruction sweep His work away.

Thou busy laborer ! one resemblance more May yet the verse prolong, For, Spider, thou art like the Poet poor, Whom thou hast help'd in song. Both busily our needful food to win, We work, as Nature taught, with ceaseless pains, Thy bowels thou dost spin,

I spin my brains.

THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM

THE rage of Babylon is roused, The King puts forth his strength; And Judah bends the bow And points her arrows for the coming war.

Her walls are firm, her gates are strong, Her youth gird on the sword ; High are her chiefs in hope, For soon will Egypt send the promised aid.

But who is he whose voice of woe Is heard amid the streets? Whose ominous voice proclaims

Her strength, and arms, and promised succors vain?

His meagre cheek is pale and sunk, Wild is his hollow eye, Yet awful is its glance ; And who could bear the anger of his frown ?

PROPHET of GOD ! in vain thy lips Proclaim the woe to come; In vain thy warning voice Summons her rulers timely to report !

The Ethiop changes not his skin. Impious and reckless still The rulers spurn thy voice, And now the measure of their crimes is full.

For now around Jerusalem The countless foes appear; Far as the eye can reach Spreads the wide horror of the circling siege.

Why is the warrior's cheek so pale ? Why droops the gallant youth Who late in pride of heart Sharpen'd his javelin for the welcome war?

'Tis not for terror that his eye Swells with the struggling woe; Oh! he could bear his ills, Or rush to death, and in the grave have peace.

His parents do not ask for food, But they are weak with want; His wife has given her babes Her wretched pittance, — she makes no complaint.

The consummating hour is come ! Alas for Solyma ! How is she desolate, — She that was great among the nations, fallen !

And thou — thou miserable King — Where is thy trusted flock, Thy flock so beautiful, Thy Father's throne, the temple of thy God?

Repentance brings not back the past; It will not call again Thy murder'd sons to life, Nor vision to those eyeless sockets more.

Thou wretched, childless, blind, old man, Heavy thy punishment; Dreadful thy present woes, Alas, more dreadful thy remember'd guilt!

Westbury, 1798.

THE DEATH OF WALLACE.

Joy, joy in London now ! He goes, the rebel Wallace goes to death ; At length the traitor meets the traitor's doom, Joy, joy, in London now !

He on a sledge is drawn, His strong right arm unweapon'd and in chains, And garlanded around his helmless head The laurel wreath of scorn.

They throng to view him now Who in the field had fled before his sword, Who at the name of Wallace once grew pale And falter'd out a prayer. Yes! they can meet his eye, That only beams with patient courage now; Yes! they can look upon those manly limbs. Defenceless now and bound.

And that eye did not shrink As he beheld the pomp of infamy; Nor one ungovern'd feeling shook those limbs, When the last moment came.

What though suspended sense Was by their legal cruelty revived; [life What though ingenious vengeance lengthen'd To feel protracted death?

What though the hangman's hand Grasped in his living breast the heaving heart ?--In the last agony, the last, sick pang, Wallace had comfort still.

He call'd to mind his deeds Done for his country in the embattled field; He thought of that good eause for which he died, And it was joy in death.

Go, Edward ! triumph now ! Cambria is fallen, and Scotland's strength is crush'd;

On Wallace, on Llewellyn's mangled limbs, The fowls of Heaven have fed.

Unrivall'd, unopposed, Go, Edward, full of glory to thy grave ! The weight of patriot blood upon thy soul, Go, Edward, to thy God !

Westbury, 1798.

THE SPANISH ARMADA.

CLEAR shone the morn, the gale was fair, When from Coruña's crowded port With many a cheerful shout and loud acelaim The huge Armada past.

To England's shores their streamers point, To England's shores their sails are spread. They go to triumph o'er the sea-girt land, And Rome hath blest their arms.

Along the ocean's echoing verge, Along the mountain range of rocks, The clustering multitudes behold their pomp, And raise the votive prayer.

Commingling with the ocean's roar Ceaseless and hoarse their murmurs rise, And soon they trust to see the winged bark That bears good tidings home.

The watch-tower now in distance sinks, And now Galicia's mountain rocks Faint as the far-off clouds of evening lie, And now they fade away.

Each like some moving citadel, On through the waves they sail sublime; And now the Spaniards see the silvery cliffs, Behold the sea-girt land !

O fools. to think that ever foe Should triumph o'er that sea-girt land ! O fools ! to think that ever Britain's sons Should wear the stranger's yoke !

For not in vain hath Nature rear'd Around her coast those silvery cliffs; For not in vain old Ocean spreads his waves To guard his favorite isle!

On come her gallant mariners ! What now avail Rome's boasted charms? Where are the Spaniard's vaunts of eager wrath? His hopes of conquest now?

And hark ! the angry Winds arise ; Old Ocean heaves his angry Waves ; 'The Winds and Waves against the invaders fight, To guard the sea-girt land.

Howling around his palace-towers The Spanish despot hears the storm; He thinks upon his navies far away, And boding doubts arise.

Long, over Biscay's boistcrous surge The watchman's aching eye shall strain ! Long shall he gaze, but never wing'd bark Shall bear good tidings home.

Westbury, 1798.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.

THE night is come; no fears disturb The dreams of innocence; They trust in kingly faith and kingly oaths; They sleep, — alas! they sleep!

Go to the palace, wouldst thou know How hideous night can be; Eye is not closed in those accursed walls, Nor heart at quiet there.

The Monarch from the window leans, He listens to the night, And with a horrible and eager hope Awaits the midnight bell.

Oh, he has Hell within him now ! God, always art thou just ! For innocence can never know such pangs As pierce successful guilt.

He looks abroad, and all is still. Hark!—now the midnight bell Sounds through the silence of the night alone,— And now the signal gun! Thy hand is on him, righteous God! He hears the frantic shrieks, He hears the glorying yells of massacre, And he repents, — too late.

He hears the murderer's savage shout, He hears the groan of death; In vain they fly,—soldiers defenceless now, Women, old men, and babes.

Righteous and just art thou, O God! For at his dying hour Those shrieks and groans reachoed in his ear, He heard that murderous yell!

They throng'd around his midnight couch, The phantoms of the slain ; — It prey'd like poison on his powers of life : Righteous art thou, O God !

Spirits! who suffer'd at that hour For freedom and for faith, Ye saw your country bent beneath the yoke, Her faith and freedom crush'd.

And like a giant from his sleep Ye saw when France awoke; Ye saw the people burst their double chain, And ye had joy in Heaven!

Westbury, 1798.

THE HOLLY-TREE.

1.

O READER! hast thou ever stood to see The Holly-Tree?

The eye that contemplates it well perceives Its glossy leaves

Order'd by an intelligence so wise,

As might confound the Atheist's sophistries.

Below, a circling fence, its leaves are seen Wrinkled and keen;

No grazing cattle through their prickly round Can reach to wound;

But as they grow where nothing is to fear, Smooth and unarm'd the pointless leaves appear.

1 love to view these things with curious eyes, And moralize;

And in this wisdom of the Holly-Tree Can emblem sec

Wherewith perchance to make a pleasant rhyme, One which may profit in the after time.

Thus, though abroad perchance i might appear Harsh and austere,

To those who on my leisure would intrude Reserved and rude,

Gentle at home amid my friends I'd be

Like the high leaves upon the Holly-Tree.

And should my youth, as youth is apt, I know, Some harshness show, All vain asperities I day by day

Would wear away, Till the smooth temper of my age should be Like the high leaves upon the Holly-Tree.

And as, when all the summer trees are seen So bright and green, The Holly leaves a sober hue display Less bright than they; But when the bare and wintry woods we see, What then so cheerful as the Holly-Tree?

7.

So serious should my youth appear among The thoughtless throng;

So would 1 seem amid the young and gay More grave than they,

That in my age as cheerful I might be As the green winter of the Holly-Tree.

Westbury, 1798.

THE EBB TIDE.

SLOWLY thy flowing tide Came in, old Avon! scarcely did mine eyes, As watchfully 1 roam'd thy green-wood side, Perceive its gentle rise.

With many a stroke and strong The laboring boatmen upward plied their oars; Yet little way they made, though laboring long Between thy winding shores.

Now down thine ebbing tide The unlabor'd boat falls rapidly along; The solitary helmsman sits to guide, And sings an idle song.

Now o'er the rocks that lay So silent late, the shallow current roars; Fast flow thy waters on their seaward way Through wider-spreading shores.

Avon! I gaze and know The lesson emblem'd in thy varying way: It speaks of human joys that rise so slow, So rapidly decay.

Kingdoms which long have stood, And slow to strength and power attain'd at last, Thus from the summit of high fortune's flood They ebb to ruin fast.

Thus like thy flow appears Time's tardy course to manhood's envied stage; Alas! how hurryingly the ebbing years Then hasten to old age !

THE COMPLAINTS OF THE POOR

AND wherefore do the Poor complain? The Rich Man ask'd of me; — Come walk abroad with me, 1 said, And 1 will answer thee.

'Twas evening, and the frozen streets Were cheerless to behold,

And we were wrapp'd and coated well, And yet we were a-cold.

We met an old, bare-headed man; His locks were thin and white; I ask'd him what he did abroad In that cold winter's night.

The cold was keen indeed, he said, But at home no fire had he, And therefore he had come abroad To ask for charity.

We met a young, bare-footed child, And she begg'd loud and bold;

I ask'd her what she did abroad When the wind it blew so cold.

She said her father was at home, And he lay sick a-bed; And therefore was it she was sent Abroad to beg for bread.

We saw a woman sitting down Upon a stone to rest; She had a baby at her back, And another at her breast.

I ask'd her why she lotter'd there When the night-wind was so chill; She turn'd her head and bade the child That scream'd behind, be still;—

Then told us that her husband served, A soldier, far away,

And therefore to her parish she Was begging back her way.

We met a girl; her dress was loose, And sunken was her eye,

Who with a wanton's hollow voice Address'd the passers-by.

1 ask'd her what there was in guilt That could her heart allure

To shame, disease, and late remorse : She answer'd, she was poor.

I turn'd me to the Rich Man then, For silently stood he,—

You ask'd me why the poor complain, And these have answer'd thee !

TO MARY.

MARY! ten checker'd years have past Since we beheld each other last; Yet, Mary, I remember thee, Nor canst thou have forgotten me.

The bloom was then upon thy face; Thy form had every youthful grace; I too had then the warmth of youth, And in our hearts was all its truth.

We conversed, were there others by, With common mirth and random eye; But when escaped the sight of men, How serious was our converse then!

Our talk was then of years to come, Of hopes which ask'd a humble doom, Themes which to loving thoughts might move, Although we never spake of love.

At our last meeting sure thy heart Was even as loath as mine to part; And yet we little thought that then We parted — not to meet again.

Long, Mary! after that adieu, My dearest day-dreams were of you, In sleep I saw you still, and long Made you the theme of secret song.

When manhood and its cares came on, The humble hopes of youth were gone; And other hopes and other fears Effaced the thoughts of happier years.

Meantime through many a varied year Of thee no tidings did I hear, And thon hast never heard my name Save from the vague reports of fame.

But then, I trust, detraction's lie Hath kindled anger in thine eye; And thou my praise wert proud to see, — My name should still be dear to thee.

Ten years have held their course; thus late I learn the tidings of thy fate; A Husband and a Father now, Of thee, a Wife and Mother thou.

And, Mary, as for thee I frame A prayer which hath no selfish aim, No happier lot can I wish thee Than such as Heaven hath granted me.

London, 1802.

TO A FRIEND,

INQUIRING IF I WOULD LIVE OVER MY YOUTH AGAIN.

Do I regret the past? Would I again live o'er The morning hours of life? Nay, William! nay, not so! In the warm joyance of the summer sun, I do not wish again The changeful April day. Nay, William ! nay, not so ! Safe haven'd from the sea, I would not tempt again The uncertain ocean's wrath. Praise be to Him who made me what I am, Other I would not be.

Why is it pleasant then, to sit and talk Of days that are no more? When in his own dear home The traveller rests at last, And tells how often in his wanderings, The thought of those far off Hath made his eyes o'erflow With no unmanly tears; Delighted he recalls [trod; Through what fair scenes his lingering feet have But ever when he tells of perils past And troubles now no more, His eyes are brightest, and a readier joy Flows thankful from his heart.

3.

No, William! no, I would not live again The morning hours of life; I would not be again The slave of hope and fear; I would not learn again The wisdom by Experience hardly taught.

4.

To me the past presents No object for regret; To me the present gives All cause for full content. The future?—it is now the cheerful noon, And on the sunny-smiling fields I gaze With eyes alive to joy; When the dark night descends, I willingly shall close my weary lids, In sure and certain hope to wake again.

THE DEAD FRIEND.

Nor to the grave, not to the grave, my Soul, Descend to contemplate The form that once was dear! The Spirit is not there Which kindled that dead eye, Which throbb'd in that eold heart, Which in that motionless hand Hath met thy friendly grasp. The Spirit is not there ! It is but lifeless, perishable flesh That moulders in the grave, Earth, air, and water's ministering particles

SONGS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

Now to the elements Resolved, their uses done. Not to the grave, not to the grave, my Soul, Follow thy friend beloved ; The Spirit is not there !

Often together have we talk'd of death; How sweet it were to see All doubtful things made clear; How sweet it were with powers Such as the Cherubim, To view the depth of Heaven ! O Edmund! thou hast first Begun the travel of Eternity ' I look upon the stars, And think that thou art there, Unfetter'd as the thought that follows thee.

3.

And we have often said how sweet it were With unseen ministry of angel power, To watch the friends we loved. Edmund! we did not err! Sure I have felt thy presence! Thou hast given A birth to holy thought, Hast kept me from the world unstain'd and pure. Edmund! we did not err! Our best affections here They are not like the toys of infancy; The Soul outgrows them not; We do not cast them off; O, if it could be so, It were indeed a dreadful thing to die!

Not to the grave, not to the grave, my Soul, Follow thy friend beloved ! But in the lonely hour, But in the evening walk, Think that he companies thy solitude; Think that he holds with thee Mysterious intercourse; And though remembrance wake a tear, There will be joy in grief.

THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

THE HURON'S ADDRESS TO THE DEAD.

BROTHER, thou wert strong in yonth! Brother, thou wert brave in war! Unhappy man was he For whom thou hadst sharpen'd the tomahawk's edge!

Unhappy man was he On whom thinc angry eye was fix'd in fight. And he who from thy hand Received the calumet, Blest Heaven, and slept in peace.

When the Evil Spirits seized thee, Brother, we were sad at heart: We bade the Jongler come And bring his magic aid; We circled thee in mystic dance, With songs and shouts and crics, To free thee from their power. Brother, but in vain we strove; The number of thy days was full.

3.

Thou sittest amongst us on thy mat; The bear-skin from thy shoulder hangs, Thy feet are sandall'd ready for the way Those are the unfatigueable feet That traversed the forest track; Those are the lips that late Thunder'd the yell of war; And that is the strong right arm Which never was lifted in vain. Those lips are silent now; The limbs that were active are stiff; Loose hangs the strong right arm !

And where is That which in thy voice The language of friendship spake? That gave the strength of thine arm? That fill'd thy limbs with life? It was not Thou, for Thou art here, Thou art amongst us still, But the Life and the Feeling are gone. The Iroquois will learn That thou hast ceased from war; 'Twill be a joy like victory to them, For thon wert the scourge of their nation.

Brother, we sing thee the song of death; In thy coffin of bark we lay thee to rest; The bow shall be placed by thy side, And the shafts that are pointed and feather'd for flight. To the country of the Dead Long and painful is thy way; Over rivers wide and deep Lies the road that must be past, By bridges narrow-wall'd, Where scarce the Soul can force its way, While the loose fabric totters under it.

6.

Safely may our brother pass ! Safely may he reach the fields, Where the sound of the drum and the shell Shall be heard from the Country of Souls ! The Spirits of thy Sires Shall come to welcome thee :

SONGS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

The God of the Dead in his Bower Shall receive thee, and hid thee join The dance of eternal joy.

Brother, we pay thee the rites of death; Rest in thy Bower of Delight!

THE PERUVIAN'S DIRGE OVER THE BODY OF HIS FATHER.

REST in peace, my Father, rest! With danger and toil have 1 borne thy corpse From the Stranger's field of death. I bless thee, O Wife of the Sun, For veiling thy beams with a cloud, While at the pious task Thy votary toil'd in fear. Thou hadest the clouds of night Enwrap thee, and hide thee from Man; But didst thou not see my toil, And put on the darkness to aid, O Wife of the visible God ?

Wretched, my Father, thy life! Wretched the life of the Slave! All day for another he toils; Overwearied at night he lies down, And dreams of the freedom that once he enjoy'd. Thou wert blest in the days of thy youth, My Father! for then thou wert free. In the fields of the nation thy hand Bore its part of the general task; And when, with the song and the dance, Ye brought the harvest home, As all in the labor had shared, So justly they shared in the fruits.

Thou visible Lord of the Earth, Thou God of my Fathers, thou God of my heart, O Giver of light and of life! When the Strangers came to our shores, Why didst thou not put forth thy power? Thy thunders should then have been hurl'd, Thy fires should in lightnings have flash'd !--Visible God of the Earth, The Strangers mock at thy might! To idols and beams of wood They force us to bow the knee; They plunge us in caverns and dens, Where never thy blessed light Shines on our poisonous toil! But not in the caverns and dens, O Sun, are we mindless of thee ! We pine for the want of thy beams, We adore thee with anguish and groans.

My Father, rest in peace ! Rest with the dust of thy Sires! They placed their Cross in thy dying grasp; -They bore thee to their burial-place, And over thy breathless frame Their bloody and merciless Priest Mumbled his magic hastily. Oh! could thy bones be at peace In the field where the Strangers are laid?-Alone, in danger and in pain, My Father, I bring thee here . So may our God, in reward, Allow me one faithful friend To lay me beside thee when I am released ! So may he summon me soon, That my Spirit may join thee there, Where the strangers never shall come !

SONG OF THE ARAUCANS

DURING A THUNDER-STORM.

THE storm-cloud grows deeper above, Araucans! the tempest is ripe in the sky; Our forefathers come from their Islands of Bliss, They come to the war of the winds

The Souls of the Strangers are there, In their garments of darkness they ride through the heaven :

Yon cloud that rolls luridly over the hill Is red with their weapons of fire.

Hark! hark! in the howl of the wind The shout of the hattle, the clang of their drums; The horsemen are met, and the shock of the fight

Is the blast that disbranches the wood.

Behold from the clouds of their power The lightning,—the lightning is lanced at our sires!

And the thunder that shakes the broad pavement of Heaven!

And the darkness that quenches the day !

Ye Souls of our Fathers, he brave ! Ye shrunk not before the invaders on earth, Ye trembled not then at their weapons of fire ;

Brave Spirits, ye tremhle not now !

We gaze on your warfare in hope, We send up our shouts to encourage your arms !

Lift the lance of your vengeance, O Fathers, with force,

For the wrongs of your country strike home !

Remember the land was your own When the Sons of Destruction came over the seas, That the old fell asleep in the fulness of days, And their children wept over their graves;

SONGS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

Till the Strangers came into the land With tongues of deceit and with weapons of fire : Then the strength of the people in youth was cut off, And the father wept over his son.

It thickens - the tumult of fight! Louder and louder the blast of the battle is heard !---Remember the wrongs that your country endures ! Remember the fields of your fame !

Joy ! joy ! for the Strangers recoil, -They give way, - they retreat, - they are routed, they fly;

Pursue them ! pursue them ! remember your wrongs!

Let your lances be drunk with their wounds.

The Souls of your wives shall rejoice As they welcome you back to your Islands of Bliss; Aud the breeze that refreshes the toil-throbbing brow Waft thither the song of your praise.

SONG OF THE CHIKKASAH WIDOW.

Twas the voice of my husband that came on the gale;

His unappeased Spirit in anger complains; Rest, rest, Ollanahta, be still ! The day of revenge is at hand.

The stake is made ready, the captives shall die; To-morrow the song of their death shalt thou hear; To-morrow thy widow shall wield The knife and the fire ; - be at rest !

The vengeance of anguish shall soon have its course, -

The fountains of grief and of fury shall flow, -1 will think, Ollanahta! of thee, Will remember the days of our love.

Ollanahta, all day by thy war-pole I sat, Where idly thy hatchet of battle is hung; I gazed on the bow of thy strength As it waved on the stream of the wind.

The scalps that we number'd in triumph were there, And the musket that never was levell'd in vain,-What a leap has it given to my heart To see thee suspend it in peace!

When the black and blood-banner was spread to the gale.

When thrice the deep voice of the war-drum was heard, l remember thy terrible eyes How they flash'd the dark glance of thy joy.

I remember the hope that shone over thy cheek, As thy hand from the pole reach'd its doers of death; Like the ominous gleam of the cloud, Ere the thunder and lightning are born

He went, and ye came not to warn him in dreams Kindred Spirits of Him who is holy and great ! And where was thy warning, O Bird, The timely announcer of ill?

Alas! when thy brethren in conquest return'd: When I saw the white plumes bending over their heads,

And the pine-boughs of triumph before, Where the scalps of their victory swung,-

The war-hymn they pour'd, and thy voice was not there ! [brought;

I call'd thee, - alas, the white deer-skin was And thy grave was prepared in the tent Which I had made ready for joy !

Ollanahta, all day by thy war-pole I sit, -Ollanahta, all night I weep over thy grave ! To-morrow the victims shall die, And I shall have joy in revenge.

THE

OLD CHIKKASAH TO HIS GRANDSON

Now go to the battle, my Boy! Dear child of my son, There is strength in thine arm, There is hope in thy heart, Thou art ripe for the labors of war. Thy Sire was a stripling like thee When he went to the first of his fields.

He return'd, in the glory of conquest return'd : Before him his trophies were borne, These sealps that have hung till the Sun and the Have rusted their raven locks. [rain Here he stood when the morn of rejoicing arrived, The day of the warrior's reward ; When the banners sunbeaming were spread, And all hearts were dancing in joy To the sound of the victory-drum. The Heroes were met to receive their reward; But distinguish'd among the young Heroes that day, The pride of his nation, thy Father was seen : The swan-feathers hung from his neck, His face like the rainbow was tinged, And his eye, - how it sparkled in pride ! The Elders approach'd, and they placed on his brow The crown that his valor had won, And they gave him the old honor'd name. They reported the deeds he had done in the war, And the youth of the nation were told To respect him and tread in his steps.

My Boy ! I have seen, and with hope, The conrage that rose in thine eye When I told thee the tale of his death. His war-pole now is gray with moss,

His tomahawk red with rust; His bowstring, whose twang was death, Now sings as it euts the wind; But his memory is fresh in the land, And his name with the names that we love.

Go now and revenge him, my Boy! That his Spirit no longer may hover by day O'er the hut where his bones are at rest, Nor trouble our dreams in the night. My Boy, I shall watch for the warrior's return, And my soul will be sad

Till the steps of thy coming I see.

OCCASIONAL PIECES.

I.

THE PAUPER'S FUNERAL.

WHAT! and not one to heave the pious sigh? Not one whose sorrow-swollen and aching eye, For social scenes, for life's endearments fled, Shall drop a tear, and dwell upon the dead? Poor wretched Ontcast! I will weep for thee, And sorrow for forlorn humanity. Yes, I will weep; but not that thou art come To the cold Sabbath of the silent tomb: For pining want, and heart-consuming eare, Soul-withering evils, never enter there. I sorrow for the ills thy life has known, As through the world's long pilgrimage, alone, Haunted by Poverty and woe-begone, Unloved, unfriended, thou didst journey on; Thy youth in ignorance and labor past, And thine old age all barrenness and blast! Hard was thy Fate, which, while it doom'd to woe, Denied thee wisdom to support the blow; And robb'd of all its energy thy mind, Ere yet it cast thee on thy fellow-kind, Abject of thought, the victim of distress, To wander in the world's wide wilderness.

Poor Outeast, sleep in peace! the wintry storm Blows bleak no more on thine unshelter'd form; Thy woes are past; thou restest in the tomb; l pause,—and ponder on the days to come.

THE SOLDIER'S FUNERAL.

It is the funeral march. I did not think That there had been such magic in sweet sounds! Hark! from the blacken'd cymbal that dead tone!— It awes the very rabble multitude;

They follow silently, their earnest brows

Lifted in solemn thought. 'Tis not the pomp And pageantry of death that with such force Arrests the sense; — the mute and mourning train, The white plnme nodding o'er the sable hearse, Had past unheeded, or perchance awoke A serious smile upon the poor man's cheek At pride's last triumph. Now these measured sounds,

This universal language, to the heart Speak instant, and on all these various minds Compel one feeling.

But such better thoughts Will pass away, how soon ! and these who here Are following their dead comrade to the grave, Ere the night fall will in their revelry Quench all remembrance. From the ties of life Unnaturally rent, a man who knew No resting-place, no dear delights of home, Belike who never saw his children's face, Whose children knew no father, - he is gone, -Dropp'd from existence, like a blasted leaf That from the summer tree is swept away, Its loss unseen. She hears not of his death Who bore him, and already for her son Her tears of bitterness are shed; when first He had put on the livery of blood, She wept him dead to her.

We are indeed Clay in the potter's hand ! One favor'd mind, Searce lower than the Angels, shall explore The ways of Nature, whilst his fellow-man, Framed with like miraele, the work of God, Must as the unreasonable beast drag on A life of labor; like this soldier here, His wondrous faculties bestow'd in vain, Be moulded by his fate till he becomes A mere machine of murder.

And there are Who say that this is well ! as God has made All things for man's good pleasure, so of men The many for the few ! Court-moralists, Reverend lip-comforters, that once a week Proclaim how blessed are the poor, for they Shall have their wealth hereafter, and though now Toiling and troubled, they may pick the erumbs That from the rich man's table fall, at length In Abraham's bosom rest with Lazarus. Themselves meantime secure their good things here.

And feast with Dives. These are they, O Lord[†] Who in thy plain and simple Gospel see All mysteries, but who find no peace enjoin'd, No brotherhood, no wrath denounced on them Who shed their brethren's blood, — blind at noonday

As owls, lynx-eyed in darkness!

O my God'

I thank thee, with no Pharisaie pride I thank thee, that I am not such as these; I thank thee for the eye that sees, the heart That feels, the voice that in these evil days, Amid these evil tongues, exalts itself, And crice aloud against iniquity

ON A LANDSCAPE OF GASPAR POUSSIN.

GASPAR! how pleasantly thy pictured scenes Beguile the lonely hour! I sit and gaze With lingering eye, till dreaming Fancy makes The lovely landscape live, and the rapt soul From the foul haunts of herded human-kind Flies far away with spirit speed, and tastes The untainted air, that with the lively hue Of health and happiness illumes the cheek Of mountain Liberty. My willing soul All eager follows on thy facry flights, Fancy ! best friend ; whose blessed witcheries With cheering prospects cheat the traveller O'er the long wearying desert of the world. Nor dost thou, Fancy! with such magic mock My heart, as, demon-born, old Merlin knew, Or Alquif, or Zarzafiel's sister sage, Who in her vengeance for so many a year Held in the jacinth sepulchre entranced Lisnart, the pride of Grecian chivalry. Friend of my lonely hours! thou leadest me To such calm joys as Nature, wise and good, Proffers in vain to all her wretched sons, -Her wretched sons who pine with want amid The abundant earth, and blindly bow them down Before the Moloch shrines of Wealth and Power, Authors of Evil. Well it is sometimes That thy delusions should beguile the heart, Sick of reality. The little pile That tops the summit of that eraggy hill Shall be my dwelling : craggy is the hill And steep; yet through yon hazels upward leads The easy path, along whose winding way Now close embower'd I hear the unseen stream Dash down, anon behold its sparkling foam Gleam through the thicket; and ascending on, Now pause me to survey the goodly vale That opens on my prospect. Half way up, Pleasant it were upon some broad, smooth rock To sit and sun myself, and look below, And watch the goatherd down yon high-bank'd path Urging his flock grotesque; and bidding now His lean, rough dog from some near cliff go drive The straggler; while his barkings, loud and quick, Amid their tremulous bleat, arising oft, Fainter and fainter from the hollow road Send their far cchoes, till the waterfall, Hoarse bursting from the eavern'd cliff beneath, Their dying murmurs drown. A little yet Onward, and I have gain'd the upmost height. Fair spreads the vale below · I see the stream Stream radiant on beneath the noontide sky. A passing cloud darkens the bordering steep, Where the town-spires behind the eastle-towers Rise graceful; brown the mountain in its shade, Whose circling grandeur, part by mists conceal'd, Part with white rocks resplendent in the sun, Should bound mine eyes, - ay, and my wishes too, For I would have no hope or fear beyond. The empty turmoil of the worthless world, Its vanities and vices, would not vex

My quiet heart. The traveller, who beheld The low tower of the little pile, might deem It were the house of God; nor would he err So deeming, for that home would be the home Of peace and love, and they would hallow it To Him. Oh, life of blessedness! to reap The fruit of honorable toil, and bound Onr wishes with our wants! Delightful thoughts, That soothe the solitude of weary Hope, Ye leave her to reality awaked, Like the poor captive, from some fleeting dream Of friends, and liberty, and home restored, Startled, and listening as the midnight storm Beats hard and heavy through his dungeon bars

WRITTEN

ON CHRISTMAS DAY, 1795.

How many hearts are happy at this hour In England! Brightly o'er the cheerful hall Flares the heaped hearth, and friends and kindred meet,

And the glad mother round her festive board Beholds her children, separated long Amid the wide world's ways, assembled now --A sight at which affection lightens up With smiles the eye that age has long bedimm'd. I do remember, when I was a child, How my young heart, a stranger then to care, With transport leap'd upon this holyday, As o'er the house, all gay with evergreens, From friend to friend with joyful speed I ran, Bidding a merry Christmas to them all. Those years are past; their pleasures and their pains Are now like yonder convent-crested hill That bounds the distant prospect, indistinct, Yet pictured upon memory's mystic glass In faint, fair hues. A weary traveller now I journey o'er the desert mountain tracks Of Leon, wilds all drear and comfortless, Where the gray lizards in the noontide sun Sport on the rocks, and where the goatherd starts, Roused from his sleep at midnight when he hears The prowling wolf, and falters as he calls On Saints to save. Here of the friends I think Who now, I ween, remember me, and fill The glass of votive friendship. At the name Will not thy cheek, Beloved, change its hue, And in those gentle eyes uncall'd-for tears Tremble? I will not wish thee not to weep; Such tears are free from bitterness, and they Who know not what it is sometimes to wake And weep at midnight, are but instruments Of Nature's common work. Yes, think of me, My Edith, think that, travelling far away, Thus I beguile the solitary hours With many a day-dream, picturing scenes as fair Of peace, and comfort, and domestic bliss, As ever to the youthful poet's eye Creative Fancy fashion'd. Think of me.

Though absent, thine; and if a sigh will rise, And tears, unbidden, at the thought steal down, Sure hope will cheer thee, and the happy hour Of meeting soon all sorrow overpay.

WRITTEN AFTER VISITING

THE CONVENT OF ARRABIDA,

NEAR SETUBAL, MARCH 22, 1796.

HAPPY the dwellers in this holy house; For snrely never worldly thoughts intrude On this retreat, this sacred solitude, Where Quiet with Religion makes her home. And ye who tenant such a goodly scene, How should ye be but good, where all is fair, And where the mirror of the mind reflects Serenest beauty? O'er these mountain wilds The insatiate eye with ever-new delight Roams raptured, marking now where to the wind The tall tree bends its many-tinted boughs With soft, accordant sound; and now the sport Of joyous sea-birds o'er the tranquil deep, And now the long-extending stream of light Where the broad orb of day refulgent sinks Beneath old Ocean's line. To have no cares That eat the heart, no wants that to the earth Chain the reluctant spirit, to be freed From forced communion with the selfish tribe Who worship Mammon, - yea, emancipate From this world's bondage, even while the soul Inhabits still its corruptible clay, -Almost, ye dwellers in this holy house, Almost I envy you. You never see Pale Misery's asking eye, nor roam about Those huge and hateful haunts of crowded men, Where Wealth and Power have built their palaces, Fraud spreads his snares secure, man preys on man, Iniquity abounds, and rampant Vice, With an infection worse than mortal, taints The herd of human-kind.

I too could love,

Ye tenants of this sacred solitude, Here to abide, and when the snn rides high, Seek some sequestered dingle's coolest shade; And at the breezy hour, along the beach Stray with slow step, and gaze upon the deep, And while the breath of evening fann'd my brow, And the wild waves with their continuous sound Soothed my accustom'd ear, think thankfully That I had from the crowd withdrawn in time, And found a harbor — Yet may yonder deep Suggest a less unprofitable thought, Monastic brethren. Would the mariner, Though storms may sometimes swell the mighty waves,

And o'er the reeling bark with thundering crash Impel the mountainous surge, quit yonder deep, And rather float upon some tranquil sea, Whose moveless waters never feel the gale, In safe stagnation? Rouse thyself, my soul! No season this for self-deluding dreams; It is thy spring-time; sow, if thou wouldst reap; Then, after honest labor, welcome rest, In full contentment not to be enjoy'd Unless when duly earn'd. Oh, happy then To know that we have walked among mankind More sinn'd against than sinning! Happy then To muse on many a sorrow overpast. And think the business of the day is done. And as the evening of our lives shall close, The peaceful evening, with a Christian's hope Expect the dawn of everlasting day

ON MY OWN MINIATURE PICTURE,

TAKEN AT TWO YEARS OF AGE.

AND I was once like this! that glowing cheek Was mine, those pleasure-sparkling eyes; that brow Smooth as the level lake, when not a breeze Dies o'er the sleeping surface ! - twenty years Have wrought strange alteration ! Of the friends Who once so dearly prized this miniature, And loved it for its likeness, some are gone To their last home; and some, estranged in heart, Beholding me, with quick-averted glance Pass on the other side. But still these hues Remain unalter'd, and these features wear The look of Infancy and Innocence. I search myself in vain, and find no trace Of what I was: those lightly-arching lines Dark and o'erchanging now; and that sweet face Settled in these strong lineaments! - There were Who form'd high hopes and flattering ones of thee, Young Robert! for thine eye was quick to speak Each opening feeling : should they not have known, If the rich rainbow on a morning cloud Reflects its radiant dyes, the husbandman Beholds the ominous glory, and foresees Impending storms ! - They argued happily, That thou didst love each wild and wondrous tale Of facry fiction, and thine infant tongue Lisp'd with delight the godlike deeds of Greece And rising Rome; therefore they deem'd, forsooth, That thou shouldst tread Preferment's pleasant path. Ill-jndging ones! they let thy little feet Stray in the pleasant paths of Poesy, [crowd. And when thou shouldst have press'd amid the There didst thou love to linger out the day, Loitering beneath the lanrel's barren shade. SPIRIT OF SPENSER! was the wanderer wrong?

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVORITE OLD SPANIEL.

And they have drown'd thee, then, at last ! poor Phillis !

The burden of old age was heavy on thee,

Was dim, and watch'd no more with eager joy The wonted call that on thy dull sense sunk With fruitless repetition? The warm Sun Might still have cheer'd thy slumbers ; thou didst love To lick the hand that fed thee, and though past Youth's active season, even Life itself Was comfort. Poor old friend, how earnestly Would I have pleaded for thee ! thou hadst been Still the companion of my boyish sports; And as I roam'd o'er Avon's woody cliffs, From many a day-dream has thy short, quick bark Recall'd my wandering soul. I have beguiled Often the melancholy hours at school, Sour'd by some little tyrant, with the thought Of distant home, and I remember'd then Thy faithful fondness; for not mean the joy, Returning at the happy holidays, I felt from thy dumb welcome. Pensively Sometimes have I remark'd thy slow decay, Feeling myself changed too, and musing much On many a sad vicissitude of Life. Ah, poor companion ! when thou followedst last Thy master's parting footsteps to the gate Which closed forever on him, thou didst lose Thy truest friend, and none was left to plead For the old age of brute fidelity. But fare thee well! Mine is no narrow creed; And HE who gave thee being did not frame The mystery of life to be the sport Of merciless Man. There is another world For all that live and move -a better one ! Where the proud bipeds, who would fain confine INFINITE GOODNESS to the little bounds Of their own charity, may envy thee.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A DAY'S JOUR-NEY IN SPAIN.

Not less delighted do I call to mind, Land of Romance, thy wild and lovely scenes, Than I beheld them first. Pleased I retrace With memory's eye the placid Minho's course, And catch its winding waters gleaming bright Amid the broken distance. I review Leon's wide wastes, and heights precipitous, Seen with a pleasure not unmix'd with dread, As the sagacious mules along the brink Wound patiently and slow their way secure ; And rnde Galicia's hovels, and huge rocks And mountains, where, when all beside was dim, Dark and broad-headed the tall pines erect Rose on the farthest eminence distinct, Cresting the evening sky.

Rain now falls thick, And damp and heavy is the unwholesome air ; I by this friendly hearth remember Spain,

And yet thou shouldst have lived ! What though [And tread in fancy once again the road, Where twelve months since I held my way, and thought

Of England, and of all my heart held dear, And wish'd this day were come.

The morning mist. Well I remember, hovered o'er the heath, When with the earliest dawn of day we left The solitary Venta.* Soon the Sun Rose in his glory; scatter'd by the breeze The thin fog roll'd away, and now emerged We saw where Oropesa's castled hill Tower'd dark, and dimly seen ; and now we pass'd Torvalva's quiet huts, and on our way Paused frequently, look'd back, and gazed around; Then journey'd on, yet turn'd and gazed again, So lovely was the scene. That ducal pile Of the Toledos now with all its towers Shone in the sunlight. Half way up the hill, Embower'd in olives, like the abode of Peace, Lay Lagartina; and the cool, fresh gale, Bending the young corn on the gradual slope, Play'd o'er its varying verdure. I beheld A convent near, and could almost have thought The dwellers there must needs be holy men, For as they look'd around them, all they saw Was good.

But when the purple eye came on, How did the lovely landscape fill my heart ! Trees scatter'd among peering rocks adorn'd The near ascent; the vale was overspread With ilex in its wintry foliage gay, Old cork-trees through their soft and swelling bark Bursting, and glaucous olives, underneath Whose fertilizing influence the green herb Grows greener, and with heavier ears enrich'd The healthful harvest bends. Pellucid streams Through many a vocal channel from the hills Wound through the valley their melodious way And o'er the intermediate woods descried, Naval-Moral's church tower announced to us Our resting-place that night, -a welcome mark Though willingly we loiter'd to behold In long expanse Plasencia's fertile plain, And the high mountain rauge which bounded it, Now losing fast the roseate hue that eve Shed o'er its summit and its snowy breast; For eve was closing now. Faint and more faint The murmurs of the goatherd's scattered flock Were borne upon the air, and sailing slow The broad-wing'd stork sought on the church tower top

His consecrated nest. O lovely seenes ! I gazed upon you with intense delight, And yet with thoughts that weigh the spirit down. I was a stranger in a foreign land, And knowing that these eyes should never more Behold that glorious prospect, Earth itself Appear'd the place of pilgrimage it is.

TO MARGARET HILL.

WRITTEN FROM LONDON. 1798.

MARGARET ! my Cousin, - nay, you must not smile, I love the homely and familiar phrase : And I will call thee Cousin Margaret, However quaint amid the measured line The good old term appears. Oh! it looks ill When delicate tongues disclaim old terms of kin, Sir-ing and Madam-ing as civilly As if the road between the heart and lips Were such a weary and Laplandish way, That the poor travellers came to the red gates Half frozen. Trust me, Cousin Margaret, For many a day my memory hath play'd The creditor with me on your account, And made me shame to think that I should owe So long the debt of kindness. But in truth, Like Christian on his pilgrimage, I bear So heavy a pack of business, that albeit I toil on mainly, in our twelve hours' race Time leaves me distanced. Loath indeed were I That for a moment you should lay to me Unkind neglect; mine, Margaret, is a heart Thatsmokes not; yet methinks there should be some Who know its genuine warmth. I am not one Who can play off my smiles and courtesies To every Lady of her lap-dog tired Who wants a plaything; I am no sworn friend Of half-an-honr, as apt to leave as love ; Mine are no mushroom feelings, which spring up At once without a seed, and take no root, Wiseliest distrusted. In a narrow sphere, The little circle of domestic life, I would be known and loved : the world beyond Is not for me. But, Margaret, sure I think That you should know me well; for you and I Grew up together, and when we look back Upon old times, our recollections paint The same familiar faces. Did I wield The wand of Merlin's magic, I would make Brave witchcraft. We would have a faery ship, Ay, a new Ark, as in that other flood Which swept the sons of Anak from the earth ; The Sylphs should waft us to some goodly isle Like that where whilom old Apollidon, Retiring wisely from the troublous world, Built up his blameless spell ; and I would bid The Sea-Nymphs pile around their coral bowers, That we might stand upon the beach, and mark The far-off breakers shower their silver spray, And hear the eternal roar, whose pleasant sound Told us that never mariner should reach Our quiet coast. In such a blessed isle We might renew the days of infancy, And life, like a long childhood, pass away, Without one care. It may be, Margaret, That I shall yet be gather'd to my friends; For I am not of those who live estranged Of choice, till at the last they join their race In the family vanit. If so, if I should lose,

Like my old friend the Pilgrim, this huge pack So heavy on my shoulders, I and mine Right pleasantly will end our pilgrimage. If not, if I should never get beyond This Vanity-town, there is another world Where friends will meet. And often, Margaret, I gaze at night into the boundless sky, And think that I shall there be born again, The exalted native of some better star; And, like the untaught American, I look To find in Heaven the things I loved on earth.

Х.

AUTUMN.

NAY, William, nay, not so! the changeful year, In all its due successions, to my sight Presents but varied beauties, transient all, All in their season good. These fading leaves, That with their rich variety of hues Make yonder forest in the slanting sun So beautiful, in you awake the thought Of winter, - cold, drear winter, when the trees Each like a fleshless skeleton shall stretch Its bare, brown boughs; when not a flower shall spread lts colors to the day, and not a bird Carol its joyance, - but all nature wear One sullen aspect, bleak and desolate, To eye, ear, feeling, comfortless alike. To me their many-color'd beauties speak Of times of merriment and festival, The year's best holiday : I call to mind The school-boy days, when in the falling leaves I saw with eager hope the pleasant sign Of coming Christmas; when at morn I took My wooden ealendar, and counting up Once more its often-told account, smoothed off Each day with more delight the daily notch. To you the beauties of the autumnal year Make mournful emblems, and you think of man Doom'd to the grave's long winter, spirit-broken, Bending beneath the burden of his years, Sense-dull'd and fretful, "full of aches and pains," Yet elinging still to life. To me they show The calm decay of nature when the mind Retains its strength, and in the languid eye Religion's holy hopes kindle a joy That makes old age look lovely. All to you Is dark and cheerless; you in this fair world See some destroying principle abroad, Air, carth, and water full of living things, Each on the other preying ; and the ways Of man, a strange, perplexing labyrinth, Where crimes and miseries, each producing each, Render life loathsome, and destroy the hope That should in death bring comfort. Oh, my friend, That thy faith were as mine ! that thou couldst sce Death still producing life, and evil still Working its own destruction ; couldst behold The strifes and troubles of this troubled world With the strong eye that sees the promised day

Dawn through this night of tempest! All things, then,

Would minister to joy, then should thine heart Be heal'd and harmonized, and thon wouldst feel Gop, always, every where, and all in all.

THE VICTORY.

HARK - how the church-bells, with redoubling peals,

Stun the glad ear! Tidings of joy have come, Good tidings of great joy! two gallant ships Met on the element, — they met, they fought A desperate fight! — good tidings of great joy! Old England triumph'd! yet another day Of glory for the ruler of the waves! [cause, — For those who fell, — 'twas in their country's They have their passing paragraphs of praise, And are forgotten.

There was one who died In that day's glory, whose obscurer name No proud historian's page will chroniele. Peace to his honest soul ! I read his name, -'Twas in the list of slaughter, - and thank'd God The sound was not familiar to mine car. But it was told me after, that this man Was one whom lawful violence had forced From his own home, and wife, and little ones, Who by his labor lived ; that he was one Whose uncorrupted heart could keenly feel A husband's love, a father's anxiousness; That from the wages of his toil he fed The distant dear ones, and would talk of them At midnight when he trod the silent deck With him he valued, -- talk of them, of joys Which he had known, - oh God! and of the hour When they should meet again, till his full heart, His manly heart, at times would overflow, Even like a child's, with very tenderness. Peace to his honest spirit! snddenly It came, and merciful the ball of death, That it came suddenly and shatter'd him, Nor left a moment's agonizing thought On those he loved so well.

He ocean-deep Now lies at rest. Be Thou her comforter, Who art the widow's friend! Man does not know What a cold sickness made her blood run back When first she heard the tidings of the fight! Man does not know with what a dreadful hope She listened to the names of those who died; Man does not know, or knowing will not heed, With what an agony of tenderness She gazed upon her children, and beheld His image who was gone. O God! be Thou, Who art the widow's friend, her comforter !

HISTORY.

Thou chronicle of crimes ! I read no more; For I am one who willingly would love His fellow-kind. O gentle Poesy, Receive me from the court's polluted scenes, From dungeon horrors, from the fields of war, Receive me to your haunts, — that I may nurse My nature's better feelings; for my sonl Sickens at man's misdeeds !

I spake, when lo !

There stood before me, in her majesty, Clio, the strong-eyed Muse. Upon her brow Sate a calm anger. Go, young man, she cried, Sigh among myrtle bowers, and let thy soul Effuse itself in strains so sorrowful sweet, That love-sick Maids may weep upon thy page, Soothed with delicious sorrow. Oh shame ! shame Was it for this I waken'd thy young mind? Was it for this I made thy swelling heart Throb at the deeds of Greece, and thy boy's eye So kindle when that glorious Spartan died? Boy! boy! deceive me not ! - What if the tale Of murder'd millions strike a chilling pang; What if Tiberius in his island stews, And Philip at his beads, alike inspire Strong anger and contempt; hast thou not risen With nobler feelings, - with a deeper love For freedom ? Yes; if righteously thy soul Loathes the black history of human crimes And human misery, let that spirit fill Thy song, and it shall teach thee, boy ! to raise Strains such as Cato might have deign'd to hear, As Sidney in his hall of bliss may love

WRITTEN IMMEDIATELY AFTER READING

THE SPEECH OF ROBERT EMMET,

ON HIS TRIAL AND CONVICTION FOR HIGH TREASON SEPTEMBER, 1803.

"LET no man write my epitaph; let my grave Be uninscribed, and let my memory rest Till other times are come, and other men, Who then may do me justice." *

Emmet, no !

No withering curse hath dried my spirit up, That I should now be silent, — that my soul Should from the stirring inspiration shrink, Now when it shakes her, and withhold her voice,

* These were the words in his speech: "Let there be no inscription upon my tomb. Let no man write my epitaph. No man can write my epitaph. I am here ready to die. I am not allowed to vindicate my character; and when I am prevented from vindicating myself, let no man date to calumniate me. Let my character and my motives repose in obsenrity and peace, till other times and other men can do them justice. Then shall my character be vindicated; then may my epitaph be written. I HAVE DONE."

Of that divinest impulse never more Worthy, if impious 1 withheld it now, Hardening my heart. Here, here in this free Isle, To which in thy young virtue's erring zeal Thou wert so perilous an enemy, Here in free England shall an English hand Build thy imperishable monument; Oh, — to thine own misfortune and to ours, By thine own deadly error so beguiled, Here in free England shall an English voice Raise up thy mourning-song. For thou hast paid The bitter penalty of that misdeed; Justice hath done her unrelenting part, If she in truth be Justice who drives on, Bloody and blind, the chariot wheels of death.

So young, so glowing for the general good, Oh, what a lovely manhood had been thine, When all the violent workings of thy youth Had passed away, hadst thou been wisely spared, Left to the slow and certain influences Of silent feeling and maturing thought ! How had that heart, - that noble heart of thine, Which even now had snapp'd one spell, which beat With such brave indignation at the shame And guilt of France, and of her miscreant Lord, -How had it clung to England ! With what love, What pure and perfect love, return'd to her, Now worthy of thy love, the champion now For freedom, - yea, the only champion now, And soon to be the Avenger. But the blow Hath fallen, the indiscriminating blow, That for its portion to the Grave consign'd Yonth, Genius, generous Virtue. Oh, grief, grief! Oh, sorrow and reproach ! Have ye to learn, Deaf to the past, and to the future blind, Ye who thus irremissibly exact The forfeit life, how lightly life is staked, When in distempered times the feverish mind To strong delusion yields? Have ye to learn With what a deep and spirit-stirring voice Pity doth call Revenge? Have ye no hearts To feel and understand how Mercy tames The rebel nature, madden'd by old wrongs, And binds it in the gentle bands of love, When steel and adamant were weak to hold That Samson-strength subdued!

Let no man write Thy epitaph ! Emmet, nay; thou shalt not go Without thy funeral strain! Oh, young, and good, And wise, though erring here, thou shalt not go Unhonor'd nor unsung. And better thus Beneath that indiscriminating stroke, Better to fall, than to have lived to mourn, As sure thou wouldst, in misery and remorse, Thine own disastrous triumph; to have seen, If the Almighty at that awful hour 11ad turn'd away his face, wild Ignorance Let loose, and frantic Vengeance, and dark Zeal, And all bad passions tyrannous, and the fires Of Persecution once again ablaze. How had it sunk into thy soul to see, Last curse of all, the ruffian slaves of France In thy dear native country lording it ! How happier thus, in that heroic mood

That takes away the sting of death, to die, By all the good and all the wise forgiven ! Yea, in all ages by the wise and good To be remember'd. mourn'd, and honor'd still.

THANKSGIVING FOR VICTORY.

[Written for Music, and composed by Shield.]

GLORY to thee in thine omnipotence, O Lord, who art our shield and our defence, And dost dispense, As seemeth best to thine unerring will, (Which passeth mortal sense,) The lot of Victory still; Edging sometimes with might the sword unjust; And bowing to the dust The rightful cause, that so such seeming ill May thine appointed purposes fulfil; Sometimes, as in this late auspicious hour For which our hymns we raise, Making the wicked feel thy present power;

Glory to thee and praise,

Almighty God, by whom our strength was given ' Glory to thee, O Lord of Earth and Heaven !

STANZAS

1.

SOMETIMES, in youthful years, When in some ancient ruin I have stood, Alone and musing, till with quiet tears I felt my checks bedew'd, A melancholy thought hath made me grieve For this our age, and humbled me in mind, That it should pass away and leave No monuments behind.

2.

Not for themselves alone Our fathers lived; nor with a niggard hand Raised they the fabrics of enduring stone, Which yet adorn the land; Their piles, memorials of the nighty dead, Survive them still, majestic in decay; But ours are like ourselves, I said, The creatures of a day.

3.

With other feelings now, Lowther! have I beheld thy stately walls, Thy pinnacles, and broad, embattled brow, And hospitable halls.

The sun those wide-spread battlements shall crest, And silent years unharming shall go by, Till centuries in their course invest Thy towers with sanctity.

But thou the while shalt bear, To after-times, an old and honored name, And to remote posterity declare

Thy Founder's virtuous fame. Fair structure! worthy the triumphant age Of glorious England's opulence and power, Peace be thy lasting heritage,

And happiness thy dower !

STANZAS

ADDRESSED TO W. R. TURNER, ESQ., R. A., ON HIS VIEW OF THE LAGO MAGGIORE FROM THE TOWN OF ARONA.

1.

TURNER, thy pencil brings to mind a day When from Laveno and the Beuscer hill I over Lake Verbanus held my way,

In pleasant fellowship, with wind at will; Smooth were the waters wide, the sky screne, And our hearts gladden'd with the joyful scene;

Joyful, — for all things minister'd delight, — The lake and land, the mountains and the vales;

The Alps their snowy summits rear'd in light, Tempering with gelid breath the summer gales;

And verdant shores and woods refresh'd the eye That else had ached beneath that brilliant sky.

3.

'To that elaborate island were we bound, Of yore the scene of Borromean pride,-

Folly's prodigious work ; where all around, Under its coronet and self-belied,

Look where you will, you cannot choose but see The obtrusive motto's proud "HUMILITY !"

4.

Far off the Borromean saint was seen, Distinct, though distant, o'er his native town, Where his Colossus with benignant mien

Looks from its station on Arona down :

To it the inland sailor lifts his eyes, From the wide lake, when perilous storms arise.

5.

But no storm threaten'd on that summer-day; The whole rich scene appear'd for joyance made;

With many a gliding bark the mere was gay, The fields and groves in all their wealth array'd; I could have thought the Sun beheld with smiles Those towns, and palaces, and populous isles. 6.

From fair Arona, even on such a day, When gladness was descending like a shower, Great painter, did thy gifted eye survey

The splendid scene; and, conscious of its power, Well hath thine hand inimitable given

The glories of the lake, and land, and heaven.

ON A PICTURE BY J. M. WRIGHT, ESQ.

1.

THE sky-lark hath perceived his prison-door Unclosed; for liberty the captive tries; Puss eagerly hath watched him from the floor, And in her grasp he flutters, pants, and dies

Luey's own Puss, and Lucy's own dear Bird, Her foster'd favorites both for many a day, That which the tender-hearted girl preferr'd, She in her fonduess knew not, sooth to say.

3.

For if the sky-lark's pipe were shrill and strong, And its rich tones the thrilling ear might please, Yet Pussybel could breathe a fire-side song As winning, when she lay on Lucy's knees.

4.

Both knew ner voice, and each alike would seek Her eye, her smile, her fondling touch to gain : How faintly, then, may words her sorrow speak, When by the one she sees the other slain.

5.

The flowers fall scatter'd from her lifted hand; A cry of grief she utters in affright; And self-condemn'd for negligence she stands

Aghast and helpless at the cruel sight.

Come, Lucy, let me dry those tearful eyes; Take thou, dear child, a lesson not unholy, From one whom nature taught to moralize, Both in his mirth and in his melancholy

7.

I will not warn thee not to set thy heart Too fondly upon perishable things;

In vain the earnest preacher spends his art Upon that theme; in vain the poet sings.

It is our nature's strong necessity, And this the soul's unerring instincts tell Therefore I say, let us love worthily,

Dear child, and then we cannot love too well.

Better it is all losses to deplore,

• Which dutiful affection can sustain, Than that the heart should, in its inmost core, Harden without it, and have lived in vain.

10.

This love which thou hast lavish'd, and the woe Which makes thy lip now quiver with distress, Are but a vent, an innocent overflow,

From the deep springs of female tenderness.

11.

And something I would teach thee from the grief That thus hath fill'd those gentle eyes with tears, The which may be thy sober, sure relief,

When sorrow visits thee in after years.

I ask not whither is the spirit flown That lit the eye which there in death is seal'd; Our Father hath not made that mystery known; Needless the knowledge, therefore not reveal'd.

13.

But didst thou know, in sure and sacred truth, It had a place assign'd in yonder skies, There, through an endless life of joyous youth,

To warble in the bowers of Paradise, -

14.

Lucy, if then the power to thee were given In that cold form its life to reëngage, Wouldst thou eall back the warbler from its Heaven

To be again the tenant of a cage?

15.

Only that thou mightst cherish it again, Wouldst thou the object of thy love recall To mortal life, and chance, and change, and pain, And death, which must be suffered once by all?

16.

Oh, no, thou say'st: oli, surely not, not so! I read the answer which those looks express; For pure and true affection, well I know, Leaves in the heart no room for selfishness.

17.

Such love of all our virtnes is the gem; We bring with us the immortal seed at birth: Of heaven it is, and heavenly; woe to them Who make it wholly earthly and of earth!

18.

What we love perfectly, for its own sake We love, and not our own, being ready thus Whate'er self-sacrifice is ask'd, to make;

That which is best for it, is best for us.

19,

O Lucy! treasure up that pions thought! It hath a baby for sorrow's deadliest darts; 20 And with true comfort thou wilt find it fraught, If grief should reach thee in thy heart of hearts.

Buckland, 1828.

My days among the Dead are past; Around me I behold, Where'er these casual eyes are cast, The mighty minds of old; My never-failing friends are they,

With whom I converse day by day

2.

With them I take delight in weal, And seek relief in woe; And while I understand and feel How much to them I owe, My cheeks have often been bedew'd With tears of thoughtful gratitude.

3.

My thoughts are with the Dead ; with them I live in long-past years ;

Their virtues love, their faults condemn, Partake their hopes and fears, And from their lessons seek and find Instruction with an humble mind.

4.

My hopes are with the Dead; anon My place with them will be, And I with them shall travel on Through all Futurity: Yet leaving here a name, 1 trust, That will not perish in the dust.

IMITATED FROM THE PERSIAN.

LORD ! who art merciful as well as just, Incline thine ear to me, a child of dust ! Not what I would, O Lord ! I offer thee, Alas! but what I ean. Father Almighty, who hast made me man.

And bade me look to Heaven, for Thou art there Accept my sacrifice and humble prayer.

Four things which are not in thy treasury, I lay before thee, Lord, with this petition : ----

My nothingness, my wants, My sins, and my contrition.

THE RETROSPECT.

THE RETROSPECT.

- Corston is a small village about three miles from Bath, a little to the left of the Bristol road. The manor was parted with by the monks of Bath, abnot the reign of Henry L, to Sir Roger de St. Lo, in exchange. It continued in his family till the reign of Edward ft., when it passed to the family of luge, who are said to have been domestics to the St. Los for several generations. In process of time, it came to the Harringtons, and was by them sold to Joseph Langton, who de daughter and heiress brought it in marriage to William Gore Langton, Esq.
- The church, which, in 1292, was valued at 7 marks, 9s. 4d., was appropriated to the prior and convent of Bath; and a vicaringe ordained here by Bishop John de Drokensford, Nov. 1, 1321, decreeing that the vicar and his successors in perpetuum should have a hall, with chambers, kitchen, and hakehouse, with a third part of the garden and curtilage, and a pigeon-house, formerly belonging to the parsonage; that he should have one acre of stable land, consisting of three parcels, late part of the demesne of the said parsonage, together with common pasturage for his swine in such places as the rector of the said church used that privilege ; that he should receive from the prior and convent of Bath one quarter of bread-corn yearly, and have all the altarage, and all small tithes of heans and other blade growing in the cottage enclosures and cultivated curtilages throughout the parish; that the religious aforesaid and their successors, as rectors of the said church, should have all the arable land, with a park belonging to the land, (the nere above mentioned only excepted,) and receive all great tithes, as well of corn as of hay; the said religious to sust in all burdens, ordinary and extraordinary, incumbent on the church as rectors thereof. The prior of Bath had a yearly pension out of the vicarage of 4s. - Collinson's Hist. of Somersetshire, vol. iii. pp. 341-347.

Ox as I journey through the vale of years, By hopes enliven'd, or depress'd by fears, Allow me, Memory, in thy treasured store, To view the days that will return no more. And yes! before thine intellectual ray The clouds of mental darkness melt away! As when, at earliest day's awakening dawn, The hovering mists obscure the dewy lawn, O'er all the landscape spread their influence chill, Hang o'er the vale and wood, and hide the hill ; Anon, slow-rising, comes the orb of day; Slow fade the shadowy mists and roll away; The prospect opens on the traveller's sight, And hills and vales and woods reflect the living light.

O thon, the mistress of my future days, Accept thy minstrel's retrospective lays; To whom the minstrel and the lyre belong, Accept, my EDITH, Memory's pensive song. Of long-past days I sing, ere yet I knew Or thought and grief, or happiness and you; Ere yet my infant heart had learnt to prove The cares of life, the hopes and fears of love.

Corston, twelve years in various fortunes fled Have past with restless progress o'er my head, Since in thy vale, beneath the master's rule, I dwelt an inmate of the village school. Yet still will Memory's busy eye retrace Each little vestige of the well-known place; Each wonted haunt and scene of youthful joy, Where merriment has cheer'd the careless boy; Well-pleased will faney still the spot survey Where once he triumph'd in the boyish play, Without one care where every morn he rose, Where every evening sunk to calm repose.

Large was the house, though fallen in course, of fate,

From its old grandeur and manorial state. Lord of the manor, here the jovial Squire Once call'd his tenants round the erackling fire; Here while the glow of joy suffused his face, He told his ancient exploits in the chase, And, proud his rival sportsmen to surpass, He lit again the pipe, and fill'd again the glass.

Bnt now no more was heard at early morn The echoing clangor of the huntsman's horn; No more the eager hounds with deepening cry Leap'd round him as they knew their pastime nigh;

The Squire no more obey'd the morning eall, Nor favorite spaniels fill'd the sportsman's hall; For he, the last descendant of his race, Slept with his fathers, and forgot the chase. There now in petty empire o'er the school The mighty Master held despotic rule; Trembling in silence all his deeds we saw, His look a mandate, and his word a law; Severe his voice, severe and stern his mien,

And wondrous strict he was, and wondrous wise I ween.

Even now through many a long, long year I trace The honr when first with awe I view'd his face; Even now recall my entrance at the dome, — 'Twas the first day I ever left my home! Years intervening have not worn away The deep remembrance of that wretched day, Nor taught me to forget my earliest fears, A mother's fondness, and a mother's tears; When close she press'd me to her sorrowing As loath as even I myself to part; [heart, And I, as I beheld her sorrows flow, With painful effort hid my inward woe.

But time to youthful troubles brings relief, And each new object weans the child from grief. Like April showers the tears of youth descend; Sudden they fall, and suddenly they end, And fresher pleasure cheers the following hour, As brighter shines the sun after the April shower.

Methinks even now the interview I see, The Mistress's glad smile, the Master's glee; Much of my future happiness they said, Much of the easy life the scholars led, Of spacious play-ground and of wholesome air, The best instruction and the tenderest care; And when I followed to the garden-door My father, till through tears I saw no more, How civilly they soothed my parting pain! And never did they speak so civilly again.

Why loves the soul on earlier years to dwell, When Memory spreads around her saddening spell,

When discontent, with sullen gloom o'ereast, Turns from the present, and prefers the past? Why calls reflection to my pensive view Each triffing act of infancy anew, Each triffing act with pleasure pondering o'er, Even at the time when triffes please no more? Yet is remembrance sweet, though well 1 know The days of childhood are but days of woe; Some rnde restraint, some petty tyrant sours What else should be our sweetest, blithest hours; Yet is it sweet to call those hours to mind,— Those easy hours forever left behind; Ere care began the spirit to oppress, When ignorance itself was happiness.

Such was my state in those remember'd years, When two small acres bounded all my fears; And therefore still with pleasure, I recall [hall, The tapestried school, the bright, brown-boarded The murmuring brook, that every morning saw The due observance of the cleanly law; The walnuts, where, when favor would allow, Full oft I wont to search each well-stripp'd bough ; The erab-tree, which supplied a secret hoard With roasted erabs to deck the wintry board; These trifling objects then my heart possess'd, These trifling objects still remain impress'd; So when with nnskill'd hand some idle hind Carves his rude name within a sapling's rind, In after years the peasant lives to see The expanding letters grow as grows the tree; Though every winter's desolating sway Shake the hoarse grove and sweep the leaves away,

That rude inscription nneffaced will last, Unalter'd by the storm or wintry blast.

Oh, while well pleased the letter'd traveller roams Among old temples, palaees, and domes, Strays with the Arab o'er the wreck of time Where erst Palmyra's towers arose sublime, Or marks the lazy Turk's lethargie pride, And Greeian slavery on Hyssus' side, Oh, be it mine, aloof from public strife, To mark the changes of domestic life, The alter'd scenes where once I bore a part, Where every change of fortune strikes the heart. As when the merry bells with echoing sound Proclaim the news of victory around, Rejoieing patriots run the news to spread Of glorious conquest and of thousands dead, All join the loud huzza with eager breath, And triumph in the tale of blood and death; But if extended on the battle-plain, Cut off in conquest some dear friend be slain, Affection then will fill the sorrowing eye, And suffering Nature grieve that one should die.

Cold was the morn, and bleak the wintry blast Blew o'er the meadow, when I saw thee last. My bosom bounded as 1 wandered round, With silent step, the long-remember'd ground,

Where I had loiter'd out so many an hour, Chased the gay butterfly, and cnil'd the flower, Sought the swift arrow's erring course to trace, Or with mine equals vied amid the chase. I saw the church where I had slept away The tedious service of the summer day; Or, hearing sadly all the preacher told, In winter waked and shiver'd with the cold. Oft have my footsteps roam'd the sacred ground Where heroes, kings, and poets sleep around ; Oft traced the mouldering castle's ivied wall, Or aged convent tottering to its fall; Yet never had my bosom felt such pain, As, Corston, when I saw thy scenes again; For many a long-lost pleasure came to view, For many a long-past sorrow rose anew; Where whilom all were friends I stood alone, Unknowing all I saw, of all I saw unknown.

There, where my little hands were wont to rear With pride the earliest salad of the year; Where never idle weed to spring was seen, Rank thorns and nettles rear'd their heads obscene.

Still all around and sad, I saw no more The playful group, nor heard the playful roar; There echoed round no shout of mirth and glee; It seem'd as though the world were changed like me!

Enough! it boots not on the past to dwell,— Fair scene of other years, a long farewell! Rouse up, my soul! it boots not to repine; Rouse up! for worthier feelings should be thine; Thy path is plain and straight,—that light is given,—

Onward in faith, — and leave the rest to Heaven. Oxford, 1794.

HYMN TO THE PENATES.

Remove far from me vanity and lies ; give me neither poverty nor riches ; feed me with food convenient for me.

The words of Acun. ΟΙΚΟΙ βελτερον ειναι, επει βλαβερον το θυρηφι.

HESTOD.

YET one Song more ! one high and solemn strain Ere, Phæbus ! on thy temple's ruin'd wall I hang the silent harp : there may its strings, When the rude tempest shakes the aged pile, Make melancholy music. One song more ! PENATES, hear me ! for to you I hymn The votive lay; whether, as sages deem, Ye dwell in inmost * Heaven, the Counsellors † Of Jove; or if, Supreme of Deities, All things are yours, and in your holy train Jove proudly ranks, and Juno, white-arm'd Queen,

* Hence one explanation of the name Penates, because they were supposed to reign in the inmost heavens.

† This was the belief of the ancient Hetrusci, who called them Concertes and Complices.

HYMN TO THE PENATES.

And wisest of Immortals, the dread Maid Athenian Pallas. Venerable Powers, [rites Hearken your hymn of praise! Though from your Estranged, and exiled from your altars long, I have not ceased to love you, Household Gods! In many a long and melancholy hour Of solitude and sorrow, hath my heart With earnest longings pray'd to rest at length Beside your hallow'd hearth, - for Peace is there ! Yes, I have loved you long! I call on ye Yourselves to witness with what holy joy, Shunning the common herd of human-kind, I have retired to watch your lonely fires, And commune with myself : - delightful hours, That gave mysterious pleasure, made me know Mine inmost heart, its weakness and its strength, Taught me to cherish with devoutest care Its deep, unworldly feelings, taught me too The best of lessons — to respect myself.

Nor have I ever ceased to reverence you, Domestic Deities! from the first dawn Of reason, through the adventurous paths of youth, Even to this better day, when on mine ear The uproar of contending nations sounds But like the passing wind, and wakes no pulse To tumult. When a child, (for still I love To dwell with fondness on my childish years,) When first, a little one, I left my home, I can remember the first grief I felt, And the first painful smile that clothed my front With feelings not its own : sadly at night I sat me down beside a stranger's hearth; And when the lingering hour of rest was come, First wet with tears my pillow. As I grew In years and knowledge, and the course of time Developed the young feelings of my heart, When most I loved in solitude to rove Amid the woodland gloom; or where the rocks Darken'd old Avon's stream, in the ivied cave Recluse to sit and brood the future song, ---Yet not the less, PENATES, loved I then Your altars; not the less at evening hour Loved I beside the well-trimm'd fire to sit, Absorb'd in many a dear, deceitful dream Of visionary joys, - deceitful dreams, -And yet not vain; for painting purest bliss, They form'd to Fancy's mould her votary's heart.

By Cherwell's sedgy side, and in the meads Where Isis in her calm, clear stream reflects The willow's bending bonghs, at early dawn, In the noon-tide hour, and when the night-mist rose, I have remember'd you; and when the noise Of lewd Intemperance on my lonely ear Burst with loud tumult, as recluse I sate, Musing on days when man should be redeem'd From servitude, and vice, and wretchedness. 1 blest you, Household Gods! because I loved Your peaceful altars and serener rites. Nor did I cease to reverence you, when driven Amid the jarring crowd, an unfit man To mingle with the world; still, still my heart Sigh'd for your sanctuary, and inly pined ; And loathing human converse, I have stray'd

Where o'er the sea-beach chilly howl'd the blast, And gazed upon the world of waves, and wish'd That 1 were far beyond the Atlantic deep, In woodland haunts, a sojourner with Peace.

Not idly did the ancient poets dream, Who peopled earth with Deities. They trod The wood with reverence where the Dryads dwelt; At day's dim dawn or evening's misty hour They saw the Oreads on their mountain haunts, And felt their holy influence; nor impure Of thought, nor ever with polluted hands,* Touch'd they without a prayer the Naiad's spring Nor without reverence to the River God Cross'd in unhappy hour his limpid stream. Yet was this influence transient ; such brief awe Inspiring as the thunder's long, loud peal Strikes to the feeble spirit. Household Gods, Not such your empire ! in your votaries' breasts No momentary impulse ye awake; Nor fleeting, like their local energies, The deep devotion that your fanes impart. O ve whom Youth has wilder'd on your way, Or Pleasure with her siren song hath lured, Or Fame with spirit-stirring trump hath call'd To climb her summits, - to your Household Gods Return ; for not in Pleasure's gay abodes, Nor in the unquiet, unsafe halls of Fame Doth Happiness abide. O ye who grieve Much for the miseries of your fellow-kind, More for their vices ; ye whose honest eyes Scowl on Oppression, - ye whose honest hearts Beat high when Freedom sounds her dread alarm; O ye who quit the path of peaceful life Crusading for mankind - a spaniel race That lick the hand that beats them, or tear all Alike in frenzy; to your Household Gods Return ! for by their altars Virtue dwells, And Happiness with her ; for by their fires Tranquillity, in no unsocial mood, Sits silent, listening to the pattering shower; For, so Suspiciont sleep not at the gate Of Wisdom, Falsehood shall not enter there.

As on the height of some huge eminence, Reach'd with long labor, the way-faring man Pauses awhile, and gazing o'er the plain With many a sore step travell'd, turns him then Serious to contemplate the onward road,

 Μηδε ποτ' αεναων ποταμων καλλιρροον ύδωρ Ποσοι περαν, πριν γ' ευξη ιδων ες καλα βεεθρα, Χειρας νιψαμενος πολυησικής ύδατι λεικός,

Whene'er thy feet the river ford essay, Whose flowing current winds its limpid way, Thy hands amid the pleasant waters lave; And lowly gazing on the beauteons wave, Appease the River God: if thou perverse Pass with unsprinkled hands, a heavy curse Shall rest upon thee from the observant skies, And after-woes retributive arise. † Oft though Wisdom wake, Suspicion sleeps At Wisdom's gate, and to Simplicity Resigns her charge, while Goodness thinks no ill Where no ill seems. Μιστοκ.

And calls to mind the comforts of his home, And sighs that he has left them, and resolves To stray no more: I on my way of life Muse thus, Penates, and with firmest faith Devote myself to you. I will not quit, To mingle with the erowd, your calm abodes, Where by the evening hearth Contentment sits And hears the cricket chirp; where Love delights To dwell, and on your altars lays his torch, That hurns with no extinguishable flame.

Hear me, ye Powers benignant! there is one Must be mine inmate, - for I may not choose But love him. He is one whom many wrongs Have sicken'd of the world. There was a time When he would weep to hear of wickedness, And wonder at the tale; when for the oppress'd He felt a brother's pity, to the oppressor A good man's honest anger. His quick eye Betray'd each rising feeling; every thought Leap'd to his tongue. When first among mankind He mingled, by himself he judged of them, And loved and trusted them, to Wisdom deaf, And took them to his bosom. Falsehood met Her unsuspecting victim, fair of front, And lovely as Apega's * senlptured form, Like that false image caught his warm embrace, And pierced his open breast. The reptile race Clung round his bosom, and with viper folds Encircling, stung the fool who foster'd them. His mother was Simplicity, his sire Benevolence; in earlier days he bore Ilis father's name; the world who injured him Call him Misanthropy. I may not choose But love him, Household Gods! for we grew up Together, and in the same school were bred, And our poor fortunes the same course have held, Up to this hour.

Penates! some there are Who say, that not in the inmost heaven ye dwell, Gazing with eye remote on all the ways Of man, his Guardian Gods; wiselier they deem A dearer interest to the human race Links you, yourselves the Spirits of the Dead. No mortal eye may pierce the invisible world, No light of human reason penetrate The depths where Truth lies hid. Yet to this faith My heart with instant sympathy assents; And I would judge all systems and all faiths By that best touchstone, from whose test Deceit Shrinks like the Arch-Fiend at Ithuriel's spear; And Sophistry's gay, glittering bubble bursts, As at the sponsals of the Nereid's son, When that false Florimel,[†] with her prototype Set side by side, in her unreal charms, Dissolved away.

* One of the ways and means of the tyrant Nabis. If one of his subjects refused to lend him money, he commanded him to embrace his Apega — the statue of a heantiful woman, so formed us to clasp the victim to her breast, in which a pointed dagger was concealed.

⁺ Then did he set her by that snowy one, Like the true saint beside the image set, Of both their beauties to make paragone And trial whether should the bonor get;

Nor can the halls of Heaven Give to the human soul such kindred joy, As hovering o'er its earthly haunts it feels, When with the breeze it dwells around the brow Of one beloved on earth; or when at night In dreams it comes, and brings with it the Days And Joys that are no more; or when, perchance With power permitted to alleviate ill And fit the sufferer for the coming woe, Some strange presage the Spirit breathes, and fills The breast with ominous fear, preparing it For sorrow, pours into the afflicted heart The halm of resignation, and inspires With heavenly hope. Even as a child delights To visit day by day the favorite plant His hand has sown, to mark its gradual growth, And watch all-anxious for the promised flower; Thus to the blessed spirit in innocence And pure affections like a little child, Sweet will it be to hover o'er the friends Beloved; then sweetest, if, as duty prompts, With earthly care we in their breasts have sown The seeds of Truth and Virtue, holy flowers Whose odor reacheth Heaven.

When my sick Heart (Sick * with hope long delay'd, than which no eare Weighs on the spirit heavier) from itself Seeks the best comfort, often have I deem'd That thou didst witness every inmost thought, SEWARD! my dear, dead friend! For not in vain,

O early summon'd on thy heavenly course, Was thy brief sojourn here; me didst thou leave With strengthen'd step to follow the right path, Till we shall meet again. Meantime I southe The deep regret of nature, with belief, O EDMUND ! that thine eye's celestial ken Pervades me now, marking with no mean joy The movements of the heart that loved thee well !

Such feelings Nature prompts, and hence your rites,

Domestic Gods! arose. When for his son With ceaseless grief Syrophanes bewail'd, Mourning his age left childless, and his wealth Heap'd for an alien, he with obstinate eye Still on the imaged marble of the dead Dwelt, pampering sorrow. Thither from his wrath, A safe asylum, fled the offending slave, And garlanded the statue, and implored His young lost lord to save. Remembrance then Soften'd the father, and he loved to see The votive wreath renew'd, and the rich smoke Curl from the costly censer slow and sweet. From Egypt soon the sorrow-soothing rites

Streightway so soone as both together met, The enchanned damsell vanish'd into nought; Her snowy substance melted as with heat; Ne of that goodly hew remayned ought

But the empty girdle which about her wast was wrought. SPENSER.

PREFACE TO MINOR POEMS, VOL. II.

Divulging spread; before your idol forms* By every hearth the blinded Pagan knelt, Pouring his prayers to these, and offering there Vain sacrifice or impious, and sometimes With human blood your sanctuary defiled. Till the first Brutus, tyrant-conquering chief, Arose : he first the impious rites put down, He fitliest, who for Freedom lived and died, The friend of human-kind. Then did your feasts Frequent recur and blameless; and when eame The solemn festival,† whose happiest rites Emblem'd Equality, the holiest truth, Crown'd with gay garlands were your statues seen; To you the fragrant censer smoked ; to you The rich libation flowed : vain sacrifice ! For not the poppy wreath, nor fruits, nor wine Ye ask, Penates! nor the altar eleansed With many a mystic form; ye ask the heart Made pure, and by domestic Peace and Love Hallow'd to you.

Hearken your hymn of praise, Penates! to your shrines I come for rest, There only to be found. Often at eve, As in my wanderings I have seen far off Some lonely light that spake of comfort there, It told my heart of many a joy of home, When I was homeless. Often, as I gazed From some high eminence on goodly vales, And cots, and villages embower'd below, The thought would rise that all to me was strange Amid the scene so fair, nor one small spot Where my tired mind might rest, and call it Home. There is a magic in that little word: It is a mystic circle that surrounds

* It is not certainly known under what form the Penates were worshipped; according to some, as wooden or brazen rods shaped like trampets; according to others, they were represented as young men.

† The Saturnalia.

Comforts and virtues never known beyond The hallowed limit. Often has my heart Ached for that quiet haven ! Haven'd now, I think of those in this world's wilderness Who wander on and find no home of rest Till to the grave they go: them Poverty, Hollow-eyed fiend, the child of Wealth and Power, Bad offspring of worse parents, aye afflicts, Cankering with her foul mildews the chill'd heart; ---Them Want with seorpion seourge drives to the den

Of Guilt; - them Slaughter for the price of death Throws to her raven brood. Oh, not on them, -God of eternal Justice! not on them Let fall thy thunder !

Household Deities! Then only shall be Happiness on earth When man shall feel your sacred power, and love Your tranquil joys; then shall the city stand A huge void sepulchre, and on the site Where fortresses and palaces have stood, The olive grow, there shall the Tree of Peace Strike its roots deep and flourish. This the state Shall bless the race redeem'd of Man, when Wealth, And Power, and all their hideous progeny Shall sink annihilate, and all mankind Live in the equal brotherhood of love. Heart-calming hope, and sure ! for hitherward Tend all the tumults of the troubled world, Its woes, its wisdom, and its wickedness Alike ; - so He hath will'd, whose will is just.

Meantime, all hoping and expecting all In patient faith, to you, Domestic Gods ! Studious of other lore than song, I come. Yet shall my Heart remember the past years With honest pride, trusting that not in vain Lives the pure song of Liberty and Truth.

Que fol ou que sage on m'estime, Et que je sois Pocte ou non, Toutefois si j'aime la rime, J'aime beaucoup micux la raison. JEAN DU NESME

PREFACE.

IN a former Preface my obligations to Akenside of a later date bear a nearer resemblance to the in a style more accordant with my own judgment.

general character of Chiabrera's epitaphs. Those which relate to the Peninsular War are part of a series which I once hoped to have completed. The were aeknowledged, with especial reference to the epitaph for Bishop Butler was originally composed Hymn to the Penates; the earliest of my Inscrip- in the lapidary style, to suit the monument in tions also originated in the pleasure with which Bristol Cathedral: it has been remodelled here, I perused those of this favorite author. Others that I might express myself more at length, and

One thing remains to be explained, and I shall then have said all that it becomes me to say concerning these Minor Poems.

It was stated in some of the newspapers that Walter Scott and myself became competitors for the Poet-Laureateship upon the death of Mr. Pye; that we met accidentally at the Prince Regent's levee, each in pursuit of his pretensions, and that some words which were not over-courteous on either side passed between us on the occasion; - to such impudent fabrications will those persons resort who make it their business to pander for public curiosity. The circumstances relating to that appointment have been made known in Mr. Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter. His conduct was, as it always was, characteristically generous, and in the highest degree friendly. Indeed, it was neither in his nature nor in mine to place ourselves in competition with any one, or ever to regard a contemporary as a rival. The world was wide enough for us all.

Upon his declining the office, and using his influence, without my knowledge, to obtain it for me, his biographer says,* "Mr. Southey was invited to accept the vacant laurel ; and to the honor of the Prince Regent, when he signified that his acceptance must depend on the office being thenceforth so modified as to demand none of the old formal odes, leaving it to the Poet-Laureate to choose his own time for celebrating any great public event that might occur, his Royal Highness had the good sense and good taste at once to acquiesce in the propriety of this alteration. The office was thus relieved from the burden of ridicule which had, in spite of so many illustrious names, adhered to it." The alteration, however, was not brought about exactly in this manner.

I was on the way to London when the correspondence upon this subject between Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Croker took place: a letter from Scott followed me thither, and on my arrival in town I was informed of what had been done. No wish for the Laureateship had passed across my mind, nor had I ever dreamt that it would be proposed to me. My first impulse was to decline it; not from any fear of ridicule, still less of obloquy, but because I had ceased for several years to write occasional verses: the inclination had departed; and though willing as a bee to work from morn till night in collecting honey, I had a great dislike to spinning like a spider. Other considerations overcame this reluctance, and made it my duty to accept the appointment. I then expressed a wish to Mr. Croker that it might be placed upon a footing which would exact from the holder nothing like a school-boy's task, but leave him at liberty to write when, and in what manner, he thought best, and thus render the office as honorable as it was originally designed to be. Upon this, Mr. Croker, whose friendliness to me upon every occasion I gladly take this opportunity of acknowledging, observed that it was not for us to make terms with the Prince Regent. "Go you," said he, "and write your Ode for the New Year. You can never have a better subject than the present state of the war affords you." He added that some fit time might be found for representing the matter to the Prince in its proper light.

* Vol. iii. p. 81.

My appointment had no sooner been made known, than I received a note with Sir William Parsons's compliments, requesting that I would let him have the Ode as soon as possible, Mr. Pyc having always provided him with it six weeks before the New Year's Day. I was not wanting in punctuality; nevertheless, it was a great trouble to Sir William that the office should have been conferred upon a poet who did not walk in the ways of his predccessor, and do according to all things that he had done; for Mr. Pye had written his odes always in regular stanzas and in rhyme. Poor Sir William, though he had not fallen upon evil tongues and evil times, thought he had fallen upon evil ears when he was to set verses like mine to music.

But the labor which the Chief Musician bestowed upon the verses of the Chief Poet was so much labor lost. The performance of the Annual Odes had been suspended from the time of the King's illness, in 1810. Under the circumstances of his malady, any festal celebration of the birthday would have been a violation of natural leeling and public propriety. On those occasions it was certain that nothing would be expected from me during the life of George 111. But the New Year's performance might perhaps be called for, and for that, therefore, I always prepared. Upon the accession of George IV. 1 made ready an Ode for St. George's Day, which Mr. Shield, who was much better satisfied with his yoke-fellow than Sir William had been, thought happily suited for his purpose. It was indeed well suited for us both. All my other Odes related to the circumstances of the passing times, and could have been appropriately performed only when they were composed; but this was a standing subject, and, till this should be called for, it was needless to provide any thing else. The annual performance had, however, by this time fallen completely into disuse; and thus terminated a custom which may truly be said to have been more honored in the breach than in the observance.

ENGLISH ECLOGUES.

The following Eclogues, I helieve, bear no resemblance to any poems in our language. This species of composition has become popular in Germany, and I was induced to attempt it by what was told me of the German Idyls by my friend Mr. William Taylor of Norwich. So far, therefore, these pieces may be deemed imitations, though I am not acquainted with the German language at present, and have never seen any translations or specimens in this kind.

With bad Eclogues I am sufficiently acquainted, from Tityrus and Corydon down to our English Strephons and Thirsisses. No kind of poetry can boast of more illustrious names, or is more distinguished by the servile dulness of imitated nonsense. Pastoral writers, "more silly than their sheep," have, like their sheep, gone on in the same track one after another. Gay struck into a new path His eclogues were the only ones which interested me when I was a boy, and did not know they were burlesque. The subject would furnish matter for an essay, but this is not the place for it. 1799.

THE OLD MANSION-HOUSE.

STRANGER.

OLD friend! why, you seem bent on parish duty, Breaking the highway stones, — and 'tis a task Somewhat too hard, methinks, for age like yours!

OLD MAN.

Why, yes! for one with such a weight of years Upon his hack !— I've lived here, man and boy, In this same parish, well nigh the full age Of man, being hard npon threescore and ten. I can remember, sixty years ago, The beautifying of this mansion here, When my late Lady's father, the old Squire, Came to the estate.

STRANGER.

Why, then you have outlasted All his improvements, for you see they're making Great alterations here.

OLD MAN.

Ay — great indeed ! And if my poor old Lady could rise up — God rest her soul ! — 'twould grieve her to behold What wicked work is here.

STRANGER.

They've set about it in right good earnest. All the front is gone; Here's to be turf, they tell me, and a road [too Round to the door. There were some yew trees Stood in the court —

OLD MAN.

Ay, Master ! fine old trees ! Lord bless ns ! 1 have heard my father say His grandfather could just remember back When they were planted there. It was my task To keep them trimm'd, and 'twas a pleasure to me ; All straight and smooth, and like a great green wall !

My poor old lady many a time would come And tell me where to clip, for she had play'd In childhood under them, and 'twas her pride To keep them in their beauty. Plague, I say, On their new-fangled whimseys! we shall have A modern shrubbery here stuck full of firs And your pert poplar-trees; — I could as soon Have plough'd my father's grave as cut them down!

STRANGER.

But 'twill be lighter and more cheerful now; A fine smooth turf, and with a carriage road That sweeps conveniently from gate to gate. I like a slrubbery too, for it looks fresh; And then there's some variety about it. In spring the lilac, and the snow-ball flower, And the laburnum with its golden strings Waving in the wind; and when the autumn comes, The bright red berries of the mountain-ash, With pines enough in winter to look green, And show that something lives. Sure this is better Than a great hedge of yew, making it look All the year round like winter, and forever Dropping its poisonous leaves from the under Wither'd and hare. [boughs,

OLD MAN.

Ay! so the new Squire thinks; And pretty work he makes of it! What 'tis To have a stranger come to an old house'

STRANGER.

It seems you know him not?

OLD MAN.

No, Sir, not I. They tell me he's expected daily now; But in my Lady's time he never came But once, for they were very distant kin. If he had play'd about here when a child In that fore court, and eat the yew-berries, And sate in the porch, threading the jessamine flowers, Which fell so thick, he had not had the heart

To mar all thus!

STRANGER.

Come! come! all is not wrong; Those old dark windows --

OLD MAN.

They're demolish'd too, — As if he could not see through casement glass ' The very red-breasts, that so regnlar Came to my Lady for her morning crumbs, Won't know the windows now !

STRANGER.

Nay, they were small, And then so darken'd round with jessamine, Harhoring the vermin; — yet I could have wish'd That jessamine had been saved, which canopied, And bower'd, and lined the poreli.

OLD MAN.

It did one good

To pass within ten yards, when 'twas in blossom. There was a sweet-brier, too, that grew beside; My Lady loved at evening to sit there And knit; and her old dog lay at her feet And slept in the sun; 'twas an old favorite dog,— She did not love him less that he was old And feeble, and he always had a place By the fire-side: and when he died at last, She made me dig a grave in the garden for him. For she was good to all! a woful day 'Twas for the poor when to her grave she went!

STRANGER.

They lost a friend then?

OLD MAN.

You're a stranger here, Or you wouldn't ask that question. Were they sick?

She had rare cordial waters, and for herbs She could have taught the Doctors. Then at winter, When weekly she distributed the bread In the poor old porch, to see her and to hear The blessings on her ! and I warrant them They were a blessing to her when her wealth Had been no comfort else. At Christmas, Sir! It would have warm'd your heart if you had seen Her Christmas kitchen, - how the blazing fire Made her fine pewter shine, and holly boughs So cheerful red, -and as for mistletoe, -The finest bush that grew in the country round Was mark'd for Madam. Then her old ale went So bountiful about ! a Christmas eask, And 'twas a noble one !- God help me, Sir ! But I shall never see such days again.

STRANGER.

Things may be better yet than you suppose, And you should hope the best.

OLD MAN.

It don't look well, — These alterations, Sir! I'm an old man, And love the good old fashions; we don't find Old bounty in new houses. They've destroy'd All that my Lady loved; her favorite walk Grubb'd up, — and they do say that the great row Of elms behind the house, which meet a-top, They must fall too. Well! well! I did not think To live to see all this, and 'tis perhaps A comfort I shan't live to see it long.

STRANGER.

But sure all changes are not needs for the worse, My friend?

OLD MAN.

Mayhap they mayn't, Sir; — for all that, I like what I've been used to. I remember All this from a child up; and now to lose it, 'Tis losing an old friend. There's nothing left As 'twas; — I go abroad, and only meet With men whose fathers I remember boys; The brook that used to run before my door, That's gone to the great pond; the trees I learnt To climb are down; and I see nothing now That tells me of old times, — except the stones In the churchyard. You are young, Sir, and I hope

Have many years in store, —but pray to God You mayn't be left the last of all your friends.

STRANGER.

Well! well! you've one friend more than you're aware of.

If the Squire's taste don't suit with yours, I warrant | mad.

That's all you'll quarrel with: walk in and taste His beer, old friend! and see if your old Lady E'er broach'd a better cask. You did not know me, But we're acquainted now. 'Twould not be casy To make you like the outside; but within, That is not changed, my friend! you'll always find The same old bounty and old welcome there.

THE GRANDMOTHER'S TALE.

JANE.

HARRY! I'm tired of playing. We'll draw round The fire, and Grandmamma, perhaps, will tell us One of her stories.

HARRY.

Ay — dear Grandmamma ! A pretty story ! something dismal now ; A bloody murder.

JANE.

Or about a ghost.

GRANDMOTHER.

Nay, nay, I should but frighten ye. You know The other night, when I was telling ye [bled Abont the light in the churchyard, how you trem-Because the screech-owl hooted at the window, And would not go to bed.

JANE.

Why, Grandmamma, You said yourself you did not like to hear him. Pray now! — we won't be frightened.

GRANDMOTHER.

Well, well, children ! But you've heard all my stories.— Let me see,— Did I never tell you how the smuggler murder'd The woman down at Pill ?

HARRY.

No-never! never!

GRANDMOTHER. Not how he cut her head off in the stable?

HARRY.

Oh - now ! - do tell us that !

GRANDMOTHER.

You must have heard Your mother, children ! often tell of her. She used to weed in the garden here, and worm Your uncle's dogs," and serve the house with coal;

* I know not whether this cruel and stupid custom is common in other parts of England. It is supposed to prevent the dogs from doing any mischief, should they afterwards become mad.

And glad enough she was in winter time To drive her asses here! It was eold work To follow the slow beasts through sleet and snow; And here she found a comfortable meal, And a brave fire to thaw her; for poor Moll Was always welcome.

HARRY.

Oh! 'twas blear-eyed Moll, The collier woman, — a great, ugly woman; I've heard of her.

GRANDMOTHER.

Ugly enough, poor sonl! At ten yards' distance, you could hardly tell If it were man or woman, for her voice Was rough as our old mastiff's, and she wore A man's old coat and hat : — and then her face ! There was a merry story told of her, How, when the press-gang eame to take her husband, As they were both in bed, she heard them coming, Dress'd John up in her night-cap, and herself Put on his clothes, and went before the captain.

JANE.

And so they press'd a woman !

GRANDMOTHER.

'Twas a trick

She dearly loved to tell; and all the country Soon knew the jest, for she was used to travel For miles around. All weathers and all hours She cross'd the hill, as hardy as her beasts, Bearing the wind, and rain, and drifting snow. And if she did not reach her home at night, She laid her down in the stable with her asses, And shept as sound as they did.

HARRY.

With her asses!

GRANDMOTHER.

Yes; and she loved her beasts. For though, poor wretch,

She was a terrible reprobate, and swore Like any trooper, she was always good To the dnmb creatures; never loaded them Beyond their strength; and rather, I believe, Would stint herself than let the poor beasts want, Because, she said, they could not ask for food. I never saw her stiek fall beavier on them Than just with its own weight. She little thought This tender-heartedness would eause her death ! There was a fellow who had oftentimes, As if he took delight in ernelty, Ill used her beasts. He was a man who lived By smuggling, and, — for she had often met him, Crossing the down at night, — she threaten'd him, If ever he abused them more, to inform Of his unlawful ways. Well — so it was —

'Twas what they both were born to! he provoked her:

She laid an information; and one morning They found her in the stable, her throat cut From ear to ear, till the head only hung Just by a bit of skin. JANE. Oh dear! oh dear!

HARRV.

I hope they hung the man!

GRANDMOTHER.

They took him up; There was no proof; no one had seen the deed; And he was set at liberty. But God, Whose eye beholdeth all things, He had seen The murder; and the murderer knew that God Was witness to his crime. He fled the place,— But nowhere could he fly the avenging hand Of Heaven, —but nowhere could the murderer rest;-

A guilty conscience haunted him ; by day, By night, in company, in solitude, Restless and wretched, did he bear upon him The weight of blood. Her eries were in his ears ; Her stifled groans, as when he knelt upon her, Always he heard; always he saw her stand Before his eyes ; even in the dead of night, Distinctly seen as though in the broad sun, She stood beside the murderer's bed, and yawn'd Her ghastly wound; till life itself became A punishment at last he could not bear, And he confess'd it all, and gave himself To death ; so terrible, he said, it was To have a guilty conscience !

HARRY.

Was he hung, then?

GRANDMOTHER.

Hung and anatomized. Poor wretched man! Your uncles went to see him on his trial; He was so pale, so thin, so hollow-eyed, And such a horror in his meagre face, They said he look'd like one who never slept. He begged the prayers of all who saw his end, And met his death with fears that well might warn From guilt, though not without a hope in Christ.

Westbury, 1798.

HANNAH.

PASSING aeross a green and lonely lane, A funeral met our view. it was not here A sight of every day, as in the streets Of some great eity; and we stopp'd and ask'd Whom they were bearing to the grave. A girl, They answer'd, of the village, who had pined Through the long eourse of eighteen painful months, With such slow wasting, that the hour of death Came welcome to her. We pursued our way To the house of mirth, and with that idle talk Which passes o'er the mind and is forgot, We wore away the time. But it was eve When homewardly I went, and in the air

Was that cool freshness, that discoloring shade Which makes the eye turn inward : hearing then Over the vale the heavy toll of death Sound slow, it made me think upon the dead; I question'd more, and learnt her mournful tale.

She bore unhusbanded a mother's pains, And he who should have cherish'd her, far off Sail'd on the seas. Left thus a wretched one, Scorn made a mock of her, and evil tongues Were busy with her name. She had to bear The sharper sorrow of neglect from him Whom she had loved too dearly. Once he wrote; But only once that drop of comfort came To mingle with her cup of wretchedness; And when his parents had some tidings from him, There was no mention of poor Hannah there, Or 'twas the cold inquiry, more unkind Than silence. So she pined and pined away, And for herself and baby toil'd and toil'd; Nor did she, even on her death-bed, rest From labor, knitting there with lifted arms, Till she sunk with very weakness. Her old mother Omitted no kind office, working for her, Albeit her hardest labor barely earn'd Enough to keep life struggling, and prolong The pains of grief and sickness. Thus she lay On the sick bed of poverty, worn out With her long suffering and those painful thoughts Which at her heart were rankling, and so weak, That she could make no effort to express Affection for her infant; and the child, Whose lisping love perhaps had solaced her, Shunn'd her as one indifferent. But she too Had grown indifferent to all things of earth. Finding her only comfort in the thought Of that cold bed wherein the wretched rest. There had she now, in that last home, been laid, And all was over now, - sickness and grief, Her shame, her suffering, and her penitence,-Their work was done. The school-boys, as they sport

In the churchyard, for awhile might turn away From the fresh grave till grass should cover it; Nature would do that office soon; and none Who trod upon the senseless turf would think Of what a world of woes lay buried there !

THE SAILOR'S MOTHER.

WOMAN.

SIR, for the love of God, some small relief To a poor woman !

TRAVELLER.

Whither are you bound? 'Tis a late hour to travel o'er these downs, No house for miles around us, and the way Dreary and wild. The evening wind already Makes one's teeth chatter; and the very Sun, Setting so pale behind those thin white clouds, Looks cold. 'Twill be a bitter night!

WOMAN.

Ay, Sir,

'Tis cutting keen! I smart at every breath; Heaven knows how I shall reach my journey's end, For the way is long before me, and my feet, God help me! sore with travelling. I would gladly, If it pleased God, at once lie down and die.

TRAVELLER.

Nay, nay, cheer up ! a little food and rest Will comfort you; and then your journey's end May make amends for all. You shake your head, And weep. Is it some mournful business then That leads you from your home?

WOMAN.

Sir, I am going To see my son at Plymouth, sadly hurt In the late action, and in the hospital Dying, I fear me, now.

TRAVELLER.

Perhaps your fears Make evil worse. Even if a limb be lost, There may be still enough for comfort left; An arm or leg shot off, there's yet the heart To keep life warm; and he may live to talk With pleasure of the glorious fight that maim'd him, Proud of his loss. Old England's gratitude Makes the maim'd Sailor happy.

WOMAN.

'Tis not that, — An arm or leg — I could have borne with that. It was no ball, Sir, but some cursed thing

Which bursts* and burns, that hurt him. Something, Sir,

They do not use on board our English ships, It is so wicked !

TRAVELLER.

Rascals! a mean art Of cruel cowardice, yet all in vain!

WOMAN.

Yes, Sir! and they should show no mercy to them For making use of such unchristian arms. I had a letter from the hospital; He got some friend to write it; and he tells me That my poor boy has lost his precious eyes, Burnt out. Alas! that I should ever live To see this wretched day! — They tell me, Sir, There is no cure for wounds like his. Indeed

* The stink-pots used on board the French ships. In the engagement between the Mars and L'Hercule, some of our sailors were shockingly mangled by them: one, in particular, as described in the Eclogue, lost both his eyes. It would be right and humane to employ means of destruction, could they be discovered, powerful enough to destroy fleets and armies, hut to use any thing that only inflicts additional torture upon the sufferers in war, is altogether wicked.

Tis a hard journey that 1 go upon Fo such a dismal end !

TRAVELLER.

He yet may live. But if the worst should chance, why, you must bear

The will of Heaven with patience. Were it not Some comfort to reflect your son has fallen Fighting his country's cause? and for yourself, You will not in unpitied poverty Be left to mourn his loss. Your grateful country, Amid the triumph of her victory, Remembers those who paid its price of blood, And with a noble charity relieves The widow and the orphan.

WOMAN.

God reward them ! God bless them ! It will help me in my age, --But, Sir ! it will not pay me for my child !

TRAVELLER.

Was he your only child?

WOMAN.

My only one, The stay and comfort of my widowhood, A dear, good boy !— When first he went to sea, I felt what it would come to, — something told me I should be childless soon. But tell me, Sir, If it Le true that for a hurt like his There is no cure. Please God to spare his life, Though he be blind, yet I should be so thankful! I can remember there was a blind man Lived in our village, one from his yonth up Quite dark, and yet he was a merry man; And he had none to tend on him so well As I would tend my boy !

TRAVELLER.

Of this be sure — His hurts are look'd to well, and the best help The land affords, as rightly is his due, Ever at hand. How happen'd it he left you? Was a seafaring life his early choice?

WOMAN.

No, Sir! poor fellow, — he was wise enough To be content at home, and 'twas a home As confortable, Sir! even though I say it, As any in the country. He was left A little boy when his poor father died, Just old enough to totter by himself, And call his mother's name. We two were all, And as we were not left quite destitute, We bore up well. In the summer time I work'd Sometimes a-field. Then I was famed for knitting; And in long winter nights my spinning-wheel Seldom stood still. We had kind neighbors too, And never felt distress. So he grew up A comely lad, and wondrous well disposed. I taught him well; there was not in the parish A child who said his prayers more regular, Or answered readier through his Catechism. If I had foreseen this! but 'tis a blessing We don't know what we're born to!

TRAVELLER.

But how came it

He chose to be a Sailor?

WOMAN.

You shall hear, Sir.

As he grew up, he used to watch the birds In the corn, — child's work, you know, and easily done.

'Tis an idle sort of task; so he built up A little hut of wicker-work and clay Under the hedge, to shelter him in rain ; And then he took, for very idleness, To making traps to catch the plunderers; All sorts of cunning traps that boys can make, -Propping a stone to fall and shut them in, Or crush them with its weight, or else a springe Swung on a bough. He made them cleverly-And I, poor foolish woman! I was pleased To see the boy so handy. You may guess What follow'd, Sir, from this unlucky skill. He did what he should not when he was older: I warn'd him oft enough; but he was caught In wiring hares at last, and had his choice, The prison or the ship.

TRAVELLER.

The choice at least Was kindly left him; and for broken laws This was, methinks, no heavy punishment.

WOMAN.

So I was told, Sir. And I tried to think so; But 'twas a sad hlow to me ! I was used To sleep at nights as sweetly as a child; — Now, if the wind blew rough, it made me start, And think of my poor boy tossing about Upon the roaring seas. And then I seem'd To feel that it was hard to take him from me For such a little fault. But he was wrong, Oh, very wrong, — a murrain on his traps ! See what they've hrought him to !

TRAVELLER.

Well! well! take comfort

He will be taken care of, if he lives; And should you lose your child, this is a country Where the brave Sailor never leaves a parent To weep for him in want.

WOMAN.

Sir, I shall want No succor long. In the common course of years I soon must be at rest; and 'tis a comfort, When grief is hard upon me, to reflect It only leads me to that rest the sooner.

THE WITCH.

NATHANIEL.

FATHER! here, father! I have found a horse-shoe! Faith, it was just in time; for t'other night I laid two straws across at Margery's door; And ever since I fear'd that she might do me A mischief for't. There was the Miller's boy, Who set his dog at that black cat of hers, — I met him upon crutches, and he told me "Twas all her evil eve.

FATHER.

'Tis rare good luck ! I would have gladly given a crown for one, [it? If 'twould have done as well. But where didst find

NATHANIEL.

Down on the common; I was going a-field, And neighbor Sannders pass'd me on his mare; He had hardly said "Good day," before I saw The shoe drop off. "Twas just upon my tongue To call him back;—it makes no difference, does it, Because I know whose 'twas?

FATHER.

Why, no, it can't. The shoe's the same, you know; and you did find it.

NATHANIEL.

That mare of his has got a plaguy road To travel, father; — and if he should lame her, — For she is but tender-footed, —

FATHER,

Ay, indeed !

I should not like to see her limping back, Poor beast !- But charity begins at home; And, Nat, there's our own horse in such a way This morning !

NATUANIEL.

Why, he han't been rid again. Last night I hung a pebble by the manger, With a hole through, and every body says That 'tis a special charm against the hags.

FATHER.

It could not be a proper, natural hole then, Or 'twas not a right pebble ; — for I found him Smoking with sweat, quaking in every limb, And panting so! Lord knows where he had heen When we were all asleep, through bush and brake, Up-hill and down-hill all alike, full stretch At such a deadly rate ! —

NATHANIEL.

By land and water, Over the sea, perhaps! — I have heard tell 'Tis many thousand miles off at the end Of the world, where witches go to meet the Devil. They used to ride on broomsticks, and to smear Some ointment over them, and then away Out at the window! but 'tis worse than all To worry the poor beast so. Shame upon it That in a Christian country they should let Such creatures live !

FATHER.

And when there's such plain proof! I did but threaten her because she robb'd Our hedge, and the next night there came a wind That made me shake to hear it in my bed. How came it that that storm unroof'd my barn, And only mine in the parish? - Look at her, And that's enough; she has it in her face !-A pair of large, dead eyes, sunk in her head, Just like a corpse, and pursed with wrinkles round; A nose and chin that scarce leave room between For her lean fingers to squeeze in the snuff; And when she speaks ! I'd sooner hear a raven Croak at my door ! - She sits there, nose and knees, Smoke-dried and shrivell'd over a starved fire, With that black cat beside her, whose great eyes Shine like old Beelzebub's; and to be sure It must be one of his imps! - Ay, nail it hard.

NATHANIEL.

I wish old Margery heard the hammer go ! She'd curse the music !

FATHER.

Here's the Curate coming, He ought to rid the parish of such vermin! In the old times they used to hunt them out, And hang them without mercy; but, Lord bless us' The world is grown so wicked!

CURATE.

Good day, Farmer Nathaniel, what art nailing to the threshold ?

NATHANIEL.

A horse-shoe, Sir; 'tis good to keep off witchcraft And we're afraid of Margery.

CURATE.

Poor old woman '

What can you fear from her?

FATHER.

What can we fear !

Who lamed the Miller's boy? who raised the wind That blew my old barn's roof down? who d'ye think Rides my poor horse a'nights? who mocks the hounds?

But let me catch her at that trick again, And I've a silver bullet ready for her, One that shall lame her, double how she will.

NATHANIEL.

What makes her sit there moping by herself, With no soul near her but that great black cat ² And do but look at her !

CURATE.

Poor wretch ! half blind

And crooked with her years, without a child
Or friend in her old age, 'tis hard indeedThat she
And blesTo have her very miseries made her crimes !
I met her but last week in that hard frost
Which made my yonng limbs ache, and when I ask'dAnd blesWhich made my yonng limbs ache, and when I ask'dWell, GeWhat brought her out in the snow, the poor old womanIn the blTold me that she was forced to crawl abroad
And pick the hedges, jnst to keep herself
From perishing with cold, — because no neighbor
Had pity on her age; and then she cried,
And said the children pelted her with snow-balls,
And wish'd that she were dead.And take

FATHER

I wish she was ! She has plagued the parish long enough !

CURATE.

Shame, Farmer ! Is that the charity your Bible teaches?

FATHER.

My Bible does not teach me to love witches. I know what's charity; who pays his tithes And poor-rates readier?

CURATE.

Who can better do it? Yon've been a prudent and industrious man, And God has blest yonr labor.

FATHER.

Why, thank God, Sir, I've had no reason to complain of fortune.

CURATE.

Complain? why, you are wealthy ! All the parish Look up to you.

FATHER.

Perhaps, Sir, I could tell Guinea for guinea with the warmest of them.

CURATE.

You can afford a little to the poor; And then, what's better still, you have the heart To give from your abundance.

FATHER.

God forbid

1 should want charity !

CURATE.

Oh! 'tis a comfort To think at last of riches well employ'd ! I have been by a death-bed, and know the worth Of a good deed at that most awful hour When riches profit not.

Farmer, I'm going To visit Margery. She is sick, I hear; — Old, poor, and sick ! a miserable lot; And death will be a blessing. You mightsend her Some little matter, something comfortable,

That she may go down easier to the grave, And bless you when she dies.

FATHER.

What ! is she going Well, God forgive her then, if she has dealt In the black art ! I'll tell my dame of it, And she shall send her something.

CURATE.

And take my thanks for hers.

So I'll say ; [Goes.

FATHER.

That's a good man, That Curate, Nat, of onrs, to go and visit The poor in sickness; but he don't believe In witchcraft, and that is not like a Christian.

NATHANIEL.

Shame, Farmer ! And so old Margery's dying !

FATHER. Bnt you know She may recover : so drive t'other nail in.

Westbury, 1798.

THE RUINED COTTAGE.

Ar, Charles ! I knew that this would fix thine eye; ---

This woodbine wreathing round the broken porch. Its leaves just withering, yet one autumn flower Still fresh and fragrant; and yon hollyhock That through the creeping weeds and nettles tall Peers taller, lifting, column-like, a stem Bright with its roseate blossoms. I have seen Many an old convent reverend in decay, And many a time have trod the castle courts And grass-green halls, yet never did they strike Home to the heart such melancholy thoughts As this poor cottage. Look ! its little hatch Fleeced with that gray and wintry moss ; the roof Part moulder'd in ; the rest o'ergrown with weeds, House-leek, and long thin grass, and greener moss; So Nature steals on all the works of man; Sure conqueror she, reclaiming to herself His perishable piles.

I led thee here, Charles, not without design; for this hath been My favorite walk even since I was a boy; And I remember, Charles, this ruin here, The neatest comfortable dwelling-place! That when I read in those dear books which first Woke in my heart the love of poesy, How with the villagers Erminia dwelt, And Calidore for a fair shepherdess Forsook his quest to learn the shepherd's lore, My fancy drew from this the little hut Where that poor princess wept her hopeless love, Or where the gentle Calidore at eve

Of her long journey near. But then her child Soon to be left alone in this bad world, — That was a thought which many a winter night Had kept her sleepless; and when prudent love In something better than a servant's state Had placed her well at last, it was a pang Like parting life to part with her dear girl.

One summer, Charles, when at the holydays Return'd from school, I visited again My old, accustom'd walks, and found in them A joy almost like meeting an old friend, I saw the cottage empty, and the weeds Already crowding the neglected flowers. Joanna, by a villain's wiles seduced, Had play'd the wanton, and that blow had reach'd Her grandam's heart. She did not suffer long; Her age was feeble, and this mortal grief Brought her gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

I pass this ruin'd dwelling oftentimes, And think of other days. It wakes in me A transient sadness; but the feelings, Charles, Which ever with these recollections rise, I trust in God they will not pass away.

THE LAST OF THE FAMILY.

JAMES.

WHAT, Gregory, you are come, I see, to join us On this sad business.

GREGORY.

Ay, James, I am conv But with a heavy heart, God knows it, man ! Where shall we meet the corpse ?

JAMES.

Some hour from hence By noon, and near about the elms, I take it. This is not as it should be, Gregory, Old men to follow young ones to the grave ! This morning, when I heard the bell strike out, I thought that I had never heard it toll So dismally before.

GREGORY.

Well, well ! my friend, 'Tis what we all must come to, soon or late. But when a young man dies, in the prime of life One born so well, who might have blest us all Many long years ! ---

JAMES.

And then the family Extinguish'd in him, and the good old name Only to be remember'd on a tomb-stone ! A name that has gone down from sire to son So many generations ! — Many a time

Poor master Edward, who is now a corpse, When but a child, would come to me and lead me To the great family-tree, and beg of me To tell him stories of his ancestors, Of Eustace, he that went to the Holy Land With Richard Lion-heart, and that Sir Henry Who fought at Cressy in King Edward's wars; And then his little eyes would kindle so To hear of their brave deeds ! I used to think The bravest of them all would not out-do My darling boy.

GREGORY.

This comes of your greatschools And college-breeding. Plague upon his guardians, That would have made him wiser than his fathers !

JAMES.

If his poor father, Gregory, had but lived, Things would not have been so. He, poor good man, Had little of book-learning; but there lived not A kinder, nobler-hearted gentleman, One better to his tenants. When he died There was not a dry eye for miles around. Gregory, I thought that I could never know A sadder day than that; but what was that, Compared with this day's sorrow?

GREGORY.

I remember,

Eight months ago, when the young Squire began To alter the old mansion, they destroy'd The martins' nests, that had stood undisturb'd Under that roof, — ay ! leng before my memory. I shook my head at seeing it, and thought No good could follow.

JAMES.

Poor young man! 1 loved him Like my own child. I loved the family! Come Candlemas, and I have been their servant For five-and-forty years. I lived with them When his good father brought my Lady home; And when the young Squire was born, it did me good To hear the bells so merrily announce An heir. This is indeed a heavy blow — I feel it, Gregory, heavier than the weight Of threescore years. He was a noble lad; I loved him dearly.

GREGORY.

Every body loved him ; Such a fine, generous, open-hearted Youth ! When he came home from school at holydays, How I rejoiced to see him ! He was sure To come and ask of me what birds there were About my fields; and when I found a covey, There's not a testy Squire preserves his game More charily, than I have kept them safe For Master Edward. And he look'd so well Upon a fine, sharp morning after them, His brown hair frosted, and his cheek so flush'd With such a wholesome ruddiness, — ah, James, But he was sadly changed when he came down To keep his birth-day.

JAMES.

Changed! why, Gregory, 'Twas like a palsy to me, when he stepp'd Out of the carriage. He was grown so thin, His cheek so delicate sallow, and his eyes Had such a dim and rakish hollowness; And when he came to shake me by the hand, And spoke as kindly to me as he used, I hardly knew the voice.

GREGORY.

It struck a damp On all our merriment. 'Twas a noble Ox That smoked before us, and the old October Went merrily in everflowing cans; But 'twas a skin-deep merriment. My heart Seem'd as it took no share. And when we drank His health, the thought came over me what cause We had for wishing that, and spoilt the draught. Poor Gentleman! to think, ten months ago He came of age, and now!—

JAMES.

I fear'd it then ! He look'd to me as one that was not long For this world's business.

GREGONY.

When the Doctor sent him Abroad to try the air, it made me certain That all was over. There's but little hope, Methinks, that foreign parts can help a man When his own mother-country will not do. The last time he came down, these bells rung so, I thought they would have rock'd the old steeple down; And now that dismal toll! I would have staid Beyond its reach, but this was a last duty : I am an old tenant of the family,

Born on the estate; and now that I've outlived it, Why, 'tis but right to see it to the grave.

Have you heard aught of the new Squire?

JAMES.

But little,

And that not well. But be he what he may, Matters not much to me. The love I bore To the old family will not easily fix Upon a stranger. What's on the opposite hill? Is it not the funeral?

GREGORY.

'Tis, I think, some horsemen. Ay! there are the black cloaks; and now I see The white plumes on the hearse.

JAMES.

Between the trees; -

'Tis hid behind them now.

GREGORY.

Ay! now we see it, And there's the coaches following; we shall meet About the bridge. Would that this day were over ' I wonder whose turn's next.

A little while.

JAMES.

God above knows. When youth is summon'd, what must age expect! God make us ready, Gregory, when it comes!

Westbury, 1799.

VIII.

THE WEDDING.

TRAVELLER.

I PRAY you, wherefore are the village bells Ringing so merrily?

WOMAN.

A wedding, Sir, — Two of the village folk. And they are right To make a merry time on't while they may ! Come twelve-months hence, I warrant them they'd go To church again more willingly than now,

If all might be undone.

TRAVELLER.

An ill-match'd pair, So I conceive you. Youth perhaps and age?

WOMAN.

No, - both are young enough.

TRAVELLER.

Perhaps the man, then, A lazy idler, — one who better likes The alehonse than his work?

WOMAN.

Why, Sir, for that,

He always was a well-condition'd lad, One who'd work hard and well; and as for drink, Save now and then, mayhap, at Christmas time, Sober as wife could wish.

TRAVELLER.

Then is the girl A shrew, or else untidy; — one to welcome Her husband with a rude, unruly tongue, Or drive him from a foul and wretched home To look elsewhere for comfort. Is it so?

WOMAN.

She's notable enough; and as for temper, The best good-humor'd girl! You see yon house, There by the aspen-tree, whose gray leaves shine In the wind? she lived a servant at the farm. And often, as I came to weeding here, I've heard her singing as she milk'd her cows So cheerfully. I did not like to hear her, Because it made me think upon the days When I had got as little on my mind, And was as cheerful too. But she would marry. And folks must reap as they have sown. God help her!

Why, Mistress, if they both are well inclined, Why should not both be happy?

WOMAN.

They've no money.

TRAVELLER.

But both can work; and sure as cheerfully She'd labor for herself as at the farm. And he won't work the worse because he knows That she will make his fire-side ready for him, And watch for his return.

WOMAN.

All very well,

TRAVELLER.

And what if they are poor? Riches can't always purchase happiness; And much we know will be expected there Where much was given.

WOMAN.

All this I have heard at church! And when I walk in the church-yard, or have been

By a death-bed, 'tis mighty comforting. But when I hear my children cry for hunger, And see them shiver in their rags, — God help me ' I pity those for whom these bells ring up So merrily upon their wedding-day, Because I think of mine.

THAVELLER.

You have known trouble; These haply may be happier.

WOMAN.

Why, for that,

I've had my share; some sickness and some sorrow. Well will it be for them to know no worse. Yet I had rather hear a daughter's knell Than her wedding-peal, Sir, if I thought her fate Promised no better things.

TRAVELLER.

Sure, sure, good woman, You look upon the world with jaundiced eyes! All have their cares; those who are poor want wealth;

They who have wealth want more; so are we all Dissatisfied; yet all live on, and each Has his own comforts.

WOMAN.

Sir! d'ye see that horse Turn'd out to common here by the way-side? He's high in bone; you may tell every rib Even at this distance. Mind him! how he turns His head, to drive away the flies that feed On his gall'd shoulder! There's just grass enough To disappoint his whetted appetite. You see his comforts, Sir!

TRAVELLER.

A wretched beast!

Hard labor and worse usage he endures From some bad master. But the lot of the poor Is not like his.

WOMAN.

In truth it is not, Sir ! For when the horse lies down at night, no cares About to-morrow vex him in his dreams : Ile knows no quarter-day ; and when he gets Some musty hay or patch of hedge-row grass, He has no hungry children to claim part Of his half-meal !

TRAVELLER.

'Tis idleness makes want, And idle habits. If the man will go And spend his evenings by the alehonse fire, Whom can he blame if there be want at home?

WOMAN.

Ay! idleness! the rich folks never fail To find some reason why the poor deserve Their miseries ! -- Is it idleness, I pray you, That brings the fever or the ague fit? That makes the sick one's sickly appetite From dry bread and potatoes turn away? Is it idleness that makes small wages fail For growing wants ? - Six years agone, these bells Rung on my wedding-day, and I was told What I might look for; but I did not heed Good counsel. I had lived in service, Sir; Knew never what it was to want a meal; Lay down without one thought to keep me sleepless, Or trouble me in sleep; had for a Sunday My linen gown, and when the pedler eame, Could buy me a new ribbon. And my husband, ---A towardly young man, and well to do, -He had his silver buckles and his watch; There was not in the village one who look'd Sprucer on holydays. We married, Sir, And we had children; but while wants increased, Wages stood still. The silver buckles went; So went the watch; and when the holyday coat Was worn to work, no new * one in its place. For me - you see my rags ! but I deserve them, For wilfully, like this new-married pair, I went to my undoing.

THAVELLER.

But the parish -

WOMAN.

Ay, it falls heavy there; and yet their pittance

* A farmer once told the author of Malvern Hills, "that he almost constantly remarked a gradation of changes in those men he had been in the habit of employing. Young men, he said, were generally neat in their appearance, active and cheerful, till they became matried and had a family, when he had observed that their silver huttons, buckles, and watches gradually disappeared, and their Sunday clothes became common, without any other to supply their place, but, said he, some good comes from this, for they will then work for whatever they can get."

Note to COTTLE's Malvern Hills.

Just serves to keep life in. A blessed prospect, To slave while there is strength; in age the workhouse;

A parish shell at last, and the little bell Toll'd hastily for a panper's finneral!

TRAVELLER.

Is this your child?

WOMAN.

Ay, Sir; and were he dress'd

And clean'd, he'd be as fine a boy to look on As the Squire's young master These thin rags of his Let comfortably in the summer wind; But when the winter comes, it pinches me To see the little wretch. I've three besides; And, — God forgive me! but I often wish To see them in their coffins — God reward you! God bless you for your charity!

TRAVELLER.

Yon have taught me To give sad meaning to the village bells!

Bristol, 1300.

THE ALDERMAN'S FUNERAL.

STRANGER.

WHOM are they ushering from the world, with all This pageantry and long parade of death?

TOWNSMAN.

A long parade, indeed, Sir, and yet here Yon see but half; round yonder bend it reaches A furlong further, carriage behind carriage.

STRANGER.

'Tis but a mournful sight; and yet the pomp Tempts me to stand a gazer.

TOWNSMAN.

Yonder schoolboy, Who plays the truant, says the proclamation Of peace was nothing to the show; and even

STRANGER.

Then he was born

Under a lucky planet, who to-day Puts mourning on for his inheritance.

TOWNSMAN.

When first I heard his death, that very wish Leap'd to my lips; but now the closing scene

Of the comedy hath waken'd wiser thoughts; And I bless God, that, when I go to the grave, There will not be the weight of wealth like his To sink me down.

STRANGER.

The camel and the needle,---Is that then in your mind?

TOWNSMAN.

Even so. The text Is Gospel-wisdom. I would ride the camel,— Yea, leap him, flying, through the necdle's eye, As easily as such a pamper'd soul Could pass the narrow gate.

STRANGER.

Your pardon, Sir, But sure this lack of Christian charity Looks not like Christian truth.

TOWNSMAN.

Your pardon too, Sir, If, with this text before me, I should feel In the preaching mood! But for these barren figtrees.

With all their flourish and their leafiness, We have been told their destiny and use, When the axe is laid unto the root, and they Cumber the earth no longer.

STRANGER.

Was his wealth Stored fraudfully, — the spoil of orphans wrong'd, And widows who had none to plead their right?

TOWNSMAN.

All honest, open, honorable gains, Fair, legal interest, bonds and mortgages, Ships to the East and West.

STRANGER.

Why judge you then

So hardly of the dead?

TOWNSMAN.

For what he left

Undone; — for sins, not one of which is written In the Ten Commandments. He, I warrant him, Believed no other Gods than those of the Creed; Bow'd to no idols, but his money-bags; Swore no false oaths, except at the custom-house; Kept the Sabbath idle; built a monument To honor his dead father; did no murder; Never sustain'd an action for crim-eon; Never pick'd pockets; never bore false witness; And never, with that all-commanding wealth, Coveted his neighbor's house, nor ox, nor ass!

STRANGER.

You knew him, then, it seems?

TOWNSMAN.

As all men know The virtues of your hundred-thousanders; They never hide their lights beneath a bushel.

STRANGER.

Nay, nay, uncharitable Sir! for often Doth bounty, like a streamlet, flow unseen, Freshening and giving life along its course.

TOWNSMAN.

We track the streamlet by the brighter green And livelier growth it gives; — but as for this — This was a pool that stagnated and stunk; The rains of heaven engendered nothing in it But slime and foul corruption.

STRANGER.

Yet even these Are reservoirs whence public charity

Are reservoirs whence public charity Still keeps her channels full.

TOWNSMAN.

Now, Sir, you touch Upon the point. This man of half a million Had all these public virtues which you praise : But the poor man rung never at his door, And the old beggar, at the public gate, Who, all the summer long, stands hat in hand, He knew how vain it was to lift an eye To that hard face. Yet he was always found Among your ten and twenty pound subscribers, Your benefactors in the newspapers. His alms were money put to interest In the other world, -- donations to keep open A running charity account with Heaven, -Retaining fees against the Last Assizes, When, for the trusted talents, strict account Shall be required from all, and the old Arch-Lawyer Plead his own cause as plaintiff.

STRANGER.

I must needs Believe you, Sir: — these are your witnesses, These monrners here, who from their carriages Gape at the gaping crowd. A good March wind Were to be pray'd for now, to lend their eyes Some decent rheum; the very hireling mute Bears not a face more blank of all emotion Than the old servant of the family ! How can this man have lived, that thus his death Costs not the soiling one white handkerchief?

TOWNSMAN.

Who should lament for him, Sir, in whose heart Love had no place, nor natural charity? The palor spaniel, when she heard his step, Rose slowly from the hearth, and stole aside With creeping pace; she never raised her eyes To woo kind words from him, nor laid her head Upraised upon his knee, with fondling whine. How could it be but thus? Arithmetic Was the sole science he was ever taught; The multiplication-table was his Creed, His Pater-noster, and his Decalogue. When yet he was a boy, and should have breathed The open air and sunshine of the fields, To give his blood its natural spring and play, He in a close and dusky counting-house

COOL REFLECTIONS

DURING A MIDSUMMER WALK FROM WARMINSTER TO SHAFTESBURY, 1799.

O SPARE me—spare me, Phœbus! if indeed Thou hast not let another Phaëton Drive earthward thy fierce steeds and fiery car; Mercy! I melt! I melt! No tree, no bush, No shelter, not a breath of stirring air East, West, or North, or South! Dear God of day, Put on thy nightcap; crop thy locks of light, And be in the fashion; turn thy back upon us, And let thy beams flow upward; make it night Instead of noon; — one little miracle, In pity, gentle Phœbus!

What a joy, Oh what a joy, to be a seal and flounder On an ice island! or to have a den With the white bear, cavern'd in polar snow! It were a comfort to shake hands with Death, — Ile has a rare cold hand! — to wrap one's self In the gift shirt Dejanira sent, Dipt in the blood of Nessus, just to keep The sun off; or toast cheese for Beelzebuh, — That were a cool employment to this journey Along a road whose white intensity Would now make platina uncongealable Like quicksilver.

Were it midnight, I should walk SclFlantern'd, saturate with sunheams. Jove ! O gentle Jove ! have mercy, and once more Kick that obdurate Phœbus out of heaven; Give Boreas the wind-cholic, till he roar For cardamum, and drink down peppermint, Making what's left as precious as Tokay; Send Mercury to salivate the sky Till it dissolve in rain. O gentle Jove ! But some such little kindness to a wretch Who feels his marrow spoiling his best coat, — Who swells with calorique as if a Prester Had leaven'd every limb with poison-yeast; — Lend me thine eagle just to flap his wings And fan me, and I will build temples to thee, And turn true Pagan.

Not a cloud nor breeze, -O you most heathen Deities! if ever My bones reach home (for, for the flesh upon them, It hath resolved itself into a dew,) I shall have learnt owl-wisdom. Thou vile Phæbus, Set me a Persian sun-idolater Upon this turnpike road, and I'll convert him With no inquisitorial argument But thy own fires. Now woe be to me, wretch, That I was in a heretic country born ! Else might some mass for the poor souls that bleach, And burn away the ealx of their offences In that great Purgatory erucible, Help me. O Jupiter ! my poor complexion ! I am made a copper-Indian of already; And if no kindly cloud will parasol me, My very cellular membrane will be changed, -I shall be negrofied. A brook ! a brook !

O what a sweet, cool sound !

'Tis very neetar !

It runs like life through every strengthen'd limb! Nymph of the stream, now take a grateful prayer.

THE PIG.

A COLLOQUIAL POEM.

JACOB ! 1 do not like to see thy nose Turn'd up in scornful curve at yonder Pig. It would be well, my friend, if we, like him, Were perfect in our kind ! — And why despise The sow-born grunter ? — He is obstinate, Thou answerest; ugly, and the filthiest beast That banquets upon offal. — Now, I pray you, Hear the Pig's Counsel.

Is he obstinate? We must not, Jacob, be deceived by words; We must not take them as unheeding hands Receive base money at the current worth, But with a just suspicion try their sound, And in the even balance weigh them well. See now to what this obstinacy comes; A poor, mistreated, democratic beast, He knows that his unmerciful drivers seek Their profit, and not his. He hath not learnt That Pigs were made for Man, -born to be brawn'd And baconized; that he must please to give Just what his gracious masters please to take; Perhaps his tusks, the weapons Nature gave For self-defence, the general privilege; Perhaps, - hark, Jacob! dost thou hear that horn?

Woe to the young posterity of Pork ! Their enemy is at hand.

Again. Thou say'st The Pig is ugly. Jacob, look at him ! Those eyes have taught the Lover flattery. His face, -nay, Jacob, Jacob ! were it fair To judge a Lady in her dishabille ? Fancy it dress'd, and with saltpetre rouged. Behold his tail, my friend; with curls like that The wanton hop marries her stately spouse : So crisp in beauty Amoretta's hair Rings round her lover's soul the chains of love. And what is beauty, but the aptitude Of parts harmonious ? Give thy fancy scope, And thou wilt find that no imagined change Can beautify this beast. Place at his end The starry glories of the Peacock's pride, Give him the Swan's white breast; for his hornhoofs Shape such a foot and ankle as the waves Crowded in eager rivalry to kiss When Venus from the enamor'd sea arose;-Jacob, thou canst but make a monster of him ! All alteration man could think, would mar His Pig-perfection. The last charge, - he lives A dirty life. Here I could shelter him With noble and right-reverend precedents, And show by sanction of authority That 'tis a very honorable thing To thrive hy dirty ways. But let me rest On better ground the unanswerable defence : The Pig is a philosopher, who knows

No prejudice. Dirt?—Jacob, what is dirt? If matter, — why the delicate dish that tempts An o'ergorged Epicure to the last morsel That stuffs him to the throat-gates, is no more. If matter be not, but, as Sages say, Spirit is all, and all things visible Are one, the infinitely modified, Think, Jacob, what that Pig is, and the mire Wherein he stands knee-deep !

And there! the breeze Pleads with me, and has won thee to a smile That speaks conviction. O'er yon blossom'd field Of beans it came, and thoughts of bacon rise.

THE DANCING BEAR.

RECOMMENDED TO THE ADVOCATES FOR THE SLAVE-TRADE.

RARE music! I would rather hear cat-courtship Under my bed-room window in the night, Than this scraped catgut's screak. Rare dancing too!

Alas, poor Bruin! How he foots the pole, And waddles round it with unwieldy steps, Swaying from side to side! — The dancing-master And thou shalt do no murder, Nicholas!

Hath had as profitless a pupil in him As when he would have tortured my poor toes To minuet grace, and made them move like clock-In musical obedience. Bruin! Bruin! [work Thou art but a clumsy hiped!— And the mob With noisy merriment mock his heavy pace, And laugh to see him led by the nose!— themselves Led by the nose, embruted, and in the eye Of Reason from their nature's purposes As miserably perverted.

Bruin-Bear ! Now could I sonnetize thy piteous plight, And prove how much my sympathetic heart Even for the miserics of a beast can feel, In fourteen lines of sensibility. But we are told all things were made for man; And I'll be sworn there's not a fellow here Who would not swear 'twere hanging blasphemy To doubt that truth. Therefore, as thou wert born, Bruin ! for Man, and Man makes nothing of thee In any other way, — most logically It follows, thou wert born to make him sport; That that great snout of thine was form'd ou

That that great shout of thine was form'd ou purpose

To hold a ring; and that thy fat was given thee For an approved pomatum !

To demur

Were heresy. And politicians say (Wise men who in the scale of reason give No foolish feelings weight) that thou art here Far happier than thy brother Bears who roam O'er trackless snow for food; that being born Inferior to thy leader, unto him Rightly belongs dominion; that the compact Was made between ye, when thy clumsy feet First fell into the snare, and he gave up His right to kill, conditioning thy life Should thenceforth be his property ; - besides, 'Tis wholesome for thy morals to be brought From savage climes into a civilized state, Into the decencies of Christendom -Bear ! Bear ! it passes in the Parliament For excellent logic, this! What if we say How barbarously Man abuses power? Talk of thy baiting, it will be replied, Thy welfare is thy owner's interest, But were thou baited it would injure thee, Therefore thou art not baited. For seven years Hear it, O Heaven, and give ear, O Earth ! For seven long years this precious syllogism Hath baffled justice and humanity!

THE FILBERT.

 N_{AY} , gather not that Filbert, Nieholas, There is a maggot there, —it is his house, His castle, —oh, commit not burglary! Strip him not naked, — 'tis his clothes, his shell, His bones, the case and armor of his life, And thou shalt do no murder, Nieholas!

NONDESCRIPTS.

It were an easy thing to crack that nut, Or with thy craekers or thy double teeth; So easily may all things be destroy'd ! But 'tis not in the power of mortal man To mend the fracture of a filbert shell. There were two great men once amused themselves Watching two maggots run their wriggling race, And wagering on their speed; but, Nick, to us It were no sport, to see the pamper'd worm Roll out and then draw in his folds of fat, Like to some Barber's leathern powder-bag Wherewith he feathers, frosts, or cauliflowers Spruce Beau, or Lady fair, or Doctor grave. Enough of dangers and of enemies Hath Nature's wisdom for the worm ordain'd; Increase not thou the number! Him the Mouse; Gnawing with nibbling tooth the shell's defence, May from his native tenement eject; Him may the Nut-hatch, piercing with strong bill, Unwittingly destroy; or to his hoard The Squirrel bear, at leisure to be crack'd. Man also hath his dangers and his foes, As this poor Maggot hath; and when I muse Upon the aches, anxieties, and fears, The Maggot knows not, Nicholas, methinks It were a happy metamorphosis To be enkernell'd thus; never to hear Of wars, and of invasions, and of plots, Kings, Jacobines, and Tax-commissioners; To feel no motion but the wind that shook The Filbert Tree, and rock'd us to our rest; And in the middle of such exquisite food To live luxurious! The perfection this Of snugness! it were to unite at once Hermit retirement, Aldermanic bliss, And Stoic independence of mankind.

THE CATARACT OF LODORE.

DESCRIBED IN RHYMES FOR THE NURSERY.

"How does the Water Come down at Lodore?" My little boy ask'd me Thus, once on a time ; And moreover he task'd me To tell him in rhyme. Anon at the word, There first came one daughter, And then came another, To second and third The request of their brother, And to hear how the Water Comes down at Lodore. With its rush and its roar, As many a time They had seen it before. So I told them in rhyme, For of rhymes I had store;

And 'twas in my vocation For their recreation That so I should sing; Because I was Laureate To them and the King. From its sources which well In the Tarn on the fell; From its fountains In the mountains. Its rills and its gills; Through moss and through brake, It runs and it creeps For awhile, till it sleeps In its own little Lake. And thence at departing, Awakening and starting, It runs through the reeds, And away it proceeds, Through meadow and glade, In sun and in shade, And through the wood-shelter, Among crags in its flurry, Helter-skelter, Hurry-scurry. Here it comes sparkling, And there it lies darkling; Now smoking and frothing Its tumult and wrath in, Till in this rapid race On which it is bent, It reaches the place Of its steep descent.

The Cataract strong Then plunges along, Striking and raging As if a war waging Its caverns and rocks among; Rising and leaping, Sinking and creeping, Swelling and sweeping, Showering and springing, Flying and flinging, Writhing and ringing, Eddying and whisking. Spouting and frisking, Turning and twisting, Around and around With endless rebound : Smiting and fighting, A sight to delight in ; Confounding, astounding, Dizzying and deafening the ear with its sound

> Collecting, projecting, Receding and speeding, And shocking and rocking, And darting and parting, And threading and spreading, And whizzing and hissing, And dripping and skipping. And shining and shitting, And shining and battling, And shaking and quaking,

And glittering and frittering, And gathering and feathering, And whitening and brightening, And quivering and shivering, And hurrying and sknrrying, And thundering and floundering;

Dividing and gliding and sliding, And falling and brawling and sprawling, And driving and riving and striving, And sprinkling and twinkling and wrinkling, And sounding and bounding and rounding, And bubbling and troubling and doubling, And grumbling and rumbling and tumbling, And clattering and battering and shattering ;

Retreating and beating and meeting and sheeting, Delaying and straying and playing and spraying, Advancing and prancing and glancing and dancing, Recoiling, turmoiling and toiling and boiling, And gleaming and streaming and steaming and beaming,

And rushing and flushing and brushing and gushing, And flapping and rapping and clapping and slapping, And curling and whirling and purling and twirling, And thumping and plumping and bumping and jumping,

And dashing and flashing and splashing and clashing;

And so never ending, but always descending, Sounds and motions forever and ever are blending, All at once and all o'er, with a mighty uproar, And this way the Water comes down at Lodore.

ROBERT THE RHYMER'S

TRUE AND PARTICULAR ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF.

ROBERT the Rhymer, who lives at the Lakes, Describes himself thus, to prevent mistakes; Or rather, perhaps, be it said, to correct them, There being plenty about for those who collect them. He is lean of body, and lank of limb;

The man must walk fast who would overtake him. His eyes are not yet much the worse for the wear, And time has not thinn'd nor straighten'd his hair, circumstance ; or to his own veracity, being, as we said, quite

Notwithstanding that now he is more than halfway On the road from Grizzle to Gray. He hath a long nose with a bending ridge; It might be worthy of notice on Strasburg bridge. He sings like a lark when at morn he arises, And when evening comes he nightingalizes, Warbling house-notes wild from throat and gizzard, Which reach from A to G, and from G to Izzard. His voice is as good as when he was young, And he has teeth enough left to keep-in his tongue. A man he is by nature merry, Somewhat Tom-foolish, and comical, very; Who has gone through the world, not mindful of pelf,

Upon easy terms, thank Heaven, with himself, Along by-paths and in pleasant ways, Caring as little for censure as praise; Having some friends whom he loves dearly, And no lack of foes, whom he laughs at sincerely, And never for great, nor for little things, Has he fretted his guts to fiddle-strings. He might have made them by such folly Most musical, most melancholy.

THE DEVIL'S WALK.

ADVERTISEMENT.

AFTER the Devil's Thoughts had been published by Mr Coleridge in the collection of his Poetical Works, and the statement with which he accompanied it, it might have been supposed that the joint anthorship of that Siamese production had been sufficiently authenticated, and that no supposititious claim to it would again be advanced. The following extract, however, appeared in the John Bull of Feb. 14, 1830 : -

"In the Morning Post of Tuesday, we find the following letter:--- " To the Editor of the Morning Post.

"' Str., - Permit me to correct a statement which appeared in a recent number of the John Bull, wherein it is made to appear that Dr. Southey is the author of the Poem entitled The Devil's Walk. I have the means of settling this question, since I possess the identical MS. copy of verses, as they were written by my uncle, the late Professor Porson, during an evening party at Dr. Beloe's.

"I am, Sir, your very obedient servant,

" R. C. Porson.

" Bayswater Terrace, Feb. 6, 1830."

"We are quite sure that Mr. Porson, the writer of the above letter, is convinced of the truth of the statement it contains; but although The Devil's Walk is perhaps not a work of which either Mr. Southey or Mr. Porson need he very proud, we feel it due to ourselves to restate the fact of its being from the pen of Mr. Southey. If we are wrong, Mr. Porson may apply to Mr. Southey ; for although Mr. Porson's eminent uncle is dead, the Poet Laureste is alive and merry.

"The Lines-Poem they can scarcely be called-were written by Mr. Sonthey one morning before breakfast, the idea having struck him while he was shaving; they were subsequently shown to Mr. Coleridge, who, we believe, pointed some of the stanzas, and perhaps added one or two.

"We beg to assure Mr. R. C. Porson that we recur to this matter out of no disrespect either to the memory of his nucle, which is not likely to be affected one way or another, by the assured that he believes the statement he makes: our only object is to set ourselves right."

"Our readers, perhaps, may smile at the following, which appears in yesterday's Court Journal : --

"" We have received a letter, signed "W. Marshall," and dated "York ;" claiming for its writer the long-contested authorship of those celebrated verses, which are known by the title of The Decil's Walk on Earth, and to which attention has lately been directed anew, by Lord Byron's imitation of them. There have been so many mystifications connected with the authorship of these clever verses, that, for any thing we know to the contrary, this letter may be only one more."

* * * * * * * * * A week afterwards there was the following notice: -"We cannot waste any more time about The Decit?s Walk. We happen to know that it is Mr. Southey's; but as he is nlive, we refer any body, who is not yet satisfied, to the eminent person himself - we do not mean the Devil - but the Doctor.''

The same newspaper contained the ensuing advertisement: — "On Tuesday next, uniform with Robert Cruikshank's Monsieur Tonson, price one shilling: The Devil's Walk, a Poem, by Professor Purson. With additions and variations by Southey and Coleridge: illustrated by seven engravings from R. Cruikshank. London, Marsh and Miller, 137, Oxford Street; and Constable and Co., Edinburgh."

Professor Porson² never had any part in these verses as a writer, and it is for the first time that he now appears in them as the subject of two or three stanzas written some few years ago, when the fabricated story of his having composed them during an evening party at Dr. Vincent's (for that was the original habitat of this falsehood) was revived. A friend of one of the authors, more jealoos for him thun he has ever been for himself, urged him then to put the matter out of doubt, (for it was before Mr. Coleridge had done so;) and as much to please that friend as to amuse himself and his domestic circle, in a sportive mood, the part which relates the rise and progress of the Poem was thrown off, and that also touching the uforesaid Professor. The old vein having thus been opened, some other passages were added; and so it grew to its present length.

FROM his brimstone bed at break of day A walking the Devil is gone, To look at his little, snug farm of the World, And see how his stock went on.

2.

Over the hill and over the dale, And he went over the plain; And backward and forward he swish'd his tail, As a gentleman swishes a cane

3.

How then was the Devil dress'd? Oh, he was in his Sunday's best; His coat was red, and his breeches were blue, And there was a hole where his tail came through.

4.

A lady drove by in her pride, In whose face an expression he spied, For which he could have kiss'd her; Such a flourishing, fine, clever creature was she, With an eye as wicked as wicked can be : I should take her for my Aunt, thought he; If my dam had had a sister.

23

He met a lord of high degree,— No matter what was his name, —

- Whose face with his own when he came to compare The expression, the look, and the air,
 - And the character too, as it seem'd to a hair, -
 - Such a twin-likeness there was in the pair, That it made the Devil start and stare;
 - That it made the Devil Start and Stare;
- For he thought there was surely a looking-glass there But he could not see the frame.

6.

He saw a Lawyer killing a viper On a dunghill beside his stable; Ho! quoth he, thou put'st me in mind

Of the story of Cain and Abel.

7.

An Apothecary on a white horse Rode by on his vocation ; And the Devil thought of his old friend

Death in the Revelation.

8.

He pass'd a cottage with a double coach-house, A cottage of gentility;

And he own'd with a grin

That his favorite sin

Is pride that apes humility.

9.

He saw a pig rapidly Down a river float;

The pig swam well, but every stroke Was cutting his own throat; --

10.

And Satan gave thereat his tail A twirl of admiration; For he thought of his daughter War And her suckling babe Taxation.

11.

Well enough, in sooth, he liked that truth, And nothing the worse for the jest; But this was only a first thought; And in this he did not rest; Another came presently into his head; And here it proved, as has often been said, That second thoughts are best 12.

For as Piggy plied, with wind and tide, His way with such celerity, And at every stroke the water dyed With his own red blood, the Devil cried Behold a swinish nation's pride In cotton-spun prosperity '

13.

He walk'd into London leisurely; The streets were dirty and dim; But there he saw Brothers the Prophet, And Brothers the Prophet saw him.*

* "After this I was in a vision, having the angel of God near me, and saw Satan walking leisurely into London." -Brothers' Prophecies, part i. p. 41.

THE DEVIL'S WALK.

He entered a thriving bookseller's shop; Quoth he, We are both of one college, For I myself sate like a Cormorant once Upon the Tree of Knowledge.

15.

As he passed through Cold-Bath Fields, he look'd At a solitary cell;

And he was well-pleased, for it gave him a hint For improving the prisons of Hell.

16.

He saw a turnkey tie a thief's hands With a cordial tug and jerk; Nimbly, quoth he, a man's fingers move When his heart is in his work.

17.

He saw the same turnkey unfettering a man With little expedition; And he chuckled to think of his dear slave trade, And the long debates and delays that were made Concerning its abolition.

He met one of his favorite daughters By an Evangelical Meeting; And forgetting himself for joy at her sight, He would have accosted her outright, And given her a fatherly greeting.

19.

But she tipp'd him a wink, drew back, and cried, Avaunt! my name's Religion! And then she turn'd to the preacher, And leer'd like a love-sick pigeon.

20.

A fine man and a famous Professor was he, As the great Alexander now may be, Whose fame not yet o'erpast is; Or that new Scotch performer Who is fiercer and warmer, The great Sir Arch-Bombastes;

21.

With throbs and throes, and ahs and ohs, Far famed his flock for frightening; And thundering with his voice, the while His eyes zigzag like lightning.

22.

This Scotch phenomenon, I trow, Beats Alexander hollow; Even when most tame, He breathes more flame Than ten Fire-Kings could swallow 23.

Another daughter he presently met With music of fife and drum, And a consecrated flag, And shout of tag and rag, And march of rank and file, Which had fill'd the crowded aisle Of the venerable pile, From church he saw her come.

-24

He call'd her aside, and began to chide, For what dost thou here? said he; My city of Rome is thy proper home, And there's work enough there for thee.

25.

Thou hast confessions to listen, And bells to christen, And altars and dolls to dress; And fools to coax, And sinners to hoax, And beads and bones to bless; And great pardons to sell For those who pay well, And small ones for those who pay less.

26.

Nay, Father, I boast, that this is my post, She answered; and thon wilt allow, That the great Harlot, Who is clothed in searlet, Can very well spare me now.

27.

Upon her business I am come here, That we may extend her powers; Whatever lets down this church that we hate. Is something in favor of ours.

28.

You will not think, great Cosmoerat ! That I spend my time in fooling; Many irons, my Sire, have we in the fire, And I must leave none of them eooling; For you must know state-councils here Are held which I bear rule in. When my liberal notions Produce mischievons motions, There's many a man of good intent, In either house of Parliament, Whom I shall find a tool in; And I have hopeful pupils too Who all this while are schooling.

29.

Fine progress they make in our liberal opinions, My Utilitarians,
My all sorts of — inians And all sorts of — arians; My all sorts of — ists,
And my Prigs and my Whigs, Who have all sorts of twists,
Train'd in the very way, I know,
Father, you would have them go, High and low,
Wise and foolish, great and small, March-of-Intellect-Boys all.

THE DEVIL'S WALK.

30.

Well pleased wilt thou be at no very far day, When the caldron of mischief boils, And I bring them forth in battle array, And bid them suspend their broils,
That they may unite and fall on the prey, For which we are spreading our toils.
How the nice boys all will give mouth at the call, Hark away ! hark away to the spoils !
My Macs and my Quacks and my lawless-Jacks, My Shields and O'Connells, my pious Mac-Donnells,
My Humes and my Broughams, My Humery old Jerry,
My Lord Kings, and my Doctor Doyles !

31.

At this good news, so great The Devil's pleasure grew, That with a joyful swish he rent The hole where his tail came through.

32.

His countenance fell for a-moment When he felt the stitches go; Ah! thought he, there's a job now That I've made for my tailor below.

33.

Great news! bloody news! cried a newsman; The Devil said, Stop, let me see! Great news? bloody news? thought the Devil, The bloodier the better for me.

34.

So he bought the newspaper, and no news At all for his money he had. Lying varlet, thought he, thus to take in old Nick ! But it's some satisfaction, my lad,

To know thou art paid beforehand for the trick, For the sixpence I gave thee is bad.

35.

And then it came into his head, By oracular inspiration, That what he had seen and what he had seid, In the course of this visitation, Would be published in the Morning Post For all this reading nation.

36.

Therewith in second-sight he saw The place, and the manner and time, In which this mortal story Would be put in immortal rhyme.

37.

That it would happen when two poets Should on a time be met In the town of Nether Stowey,

In the shire of Somerset.

38.

There, while the one was shaving, Would he the song begin; And the other, when he heard it at breakfast, In ready accord join in.

39.

So each would help the other, Two heads being better than one; And the phrase and conceit Would in unison meet, And so with glee the verse flow free In ding-dong chime of sing-song rhyme, Till the whole were merrily done.

40.

And because it was set to the razor, Not to the lute or harp, Therefore it was that the fancy Should be bright, and the wit be sharp.

41.

But then, said Satan to himself, As for that said beginner, Against my infernal Majesty There is no greater sinner.

42.

He hath put me in ugly ballads With libellous pictures for sale; He hath scoff'd at my hoofs and my horns, And has made very free with my tail.

43.

But this Mister Poet shall find I am not a safe subject for whim; For I'll set up a School of my own, And my Poets shall set upon him.

44.

He went to a coffee-house to dine, And there he had soy in his dish; Having ordered some soles for his dinner, Because he was fond of flat fish.

45.

They are much to my palate, thought he, And now guess the reason who can, Why no bait should be better than place, When I fish for a Parliament-man.

46.

But the soles in the bill were ten shillings, Tell your master, quoth he, what I say, If he charges at this rate for all things, He must he in a pretty good way.

47.

But mark ye, said he to the waiter, I'm a dealer myself in this line, And his business, between you and me, Nothing like so extensive as mine.

48.

Now soles are exceedingly cheap; Which he will not attempt to deny, When I see him at my fish-market, I warrant him, by and by.

49.

As he went along the Strand Between three in the morning and four, He observed a queer-looking person Who stagger'd from Perry's door.

50.

And he thought that all the world over In vain for a man you might seek, Who could drink more like a Trojan, Or talk more like a Greek.

51.

The Devil then he prophesied It would one day be matter of talk, That with wine when smitten, And with wit moreover being happily bitten, This erudite bibber was he who had written The story of this Walk.

52.

A pretty mistake, quoth the Devil; A pretty mistake, I opine! I have put many ill thoughts in his mouth; He will never put good ones in mine.

53.

And whoever shall say that to Porson These best of all verses belong, He is an untruth-telling whoreson, And so shall be call'd in the song.

54.

And if seeking an illicit connection with fame, Any one else should put in a claim In this comical competition, That excellent poem will prove A man-trap for such foolish ambition, Where the silly rogue shall be caught by the leg, And exposed in a second edition.

55.

Now the morning air was cold for him, Who was used to a warm abode; And yet he did not immediately wish, To set out on his homeward road.

56.

For he had some morning calls to make Before he went back to 11ell;So, thought he, I'll step into a gaming-house, And that will do as well;But just before he could get to the door A wonderful chance befell.

57.

For all on a sudden, in a dark place, He came upon General ————'s burning face; And it struck him with such consternation, That home in a hurry his way did he take, Because he thought by a slight mistake

'Twas the general conflagration.

FOR A COLUMN AT NEWBURY.

CALLEST thou thyself a Patriot? — On this field Did Falkland fall, the blameless and the brave, Beneath the banners of that Charles whom thou Abhorrest for a Tyrant. Dost thou boast Of loyalty? The field is not far off Where, in rebellious arms against his King, Hambden was kill'd, that Hambden at whose name The heart of many an honest Englishman Beats with congenial pride. Both uncorrupt, Friends to their common country both, they fought, They died in adverse armies. Traveller! If with thy neighbor thon shouldst not accord, Remember these, our famous countrymen, And quell all angry and injurious thoughts.

FOR A CAVERN THAT OVERLOOKS THE RIVER AVON.

ENTER this cavern, Stranger! Here, awhile Respiring from the long and steep ascent, Thou mayst be glad of rest, and haply too Of shade, if from the summer's westering sun Shelter'd beneath this beetling vault of rock. Round the rude portal clasping its rough arms The antique ivy spreads a canopy, From whose gray blossoms the wild bees collect In autumn their last store. The Muses love This spot; believe a Poet who hath felt Their visitation here. The tide below Rising or refluent scarcely sends its sound Of waters up; and from the beights beyond, Where the high-hanging forest waves and sways Varying before the wind its verdant hues, The voice is music here. Here thon mayst feel How good, how lovely, Nature! And when hence Returning to the city's crowded streets, Thy sickening eye at every step revolts From scenes of vice and wretchedness, reflect That Man creates the evil he endures.

FOR A TABLET AT SILBURY-HILL,

THIS mound, in some remote and dateless day Rear'd o'er a Chieftain of the Age of Hills,

May here detain thee, Traveller! from thy road Not idly lingering. In his narrow house Some Warrior sleeps below, whose gallant deeds Haply at many a solemn festival The Scald hath sung; but perish'd is the song Of praise, as o'er these bleak and barren downs The wind that passes and is heard no more. Go, Traveller, and remember, when the pomp Of earthly Glory fades, that one good deed, Unseen, unheard, unnoted by mankind, Lives in the eternal register of Heaven.

FOR A MONUMENT IN THE NEW FOREST.

This is the place where William's kingly power Did from their poor and peaceful homes expel, Unfriended, desolate, and shelterless, The habitants of all the fertile track Far as these wilds extend. He levell'd down Their little cottages; he bade their fields Lie waste, and forested the land, that so More royally might he pursue his sports. If that thine heart be human, Passenger ! Sure it will swell within thee, and thy lips Will mutter curses on him. Think thou then What cities flame, what hosts unsepulchred Pollute the passing wind, when raging Power Drives on his blood-hounds to the chase of Man; And as thy thoughts anticipate that day When God shall judge aright, in charity Pray for the wicked rulers of mankind.

FOR A TABLET ON THE BANKS OF A STREAM.

STRANGER ! awhile upon this mossy bank Recline thee. If the Sun rides high, the breeze, That loves to ripple o'er the rivulet, Will play around thy brow, and the cool sound Of running waters soothe thee. Mark how clear They sparkle o'er the shallows, and behold Where o'er their surface wheels with restless Yon glossy insect, on the sand below [speed How its swift shadow flits. In solitude The rivulet is pure, and trees and herbs Bend o'er its salutary course refresh'd; But passing on amid the haunts of men. It finds pollution there, and rolls from thence A tainted stream. ROUSSEAU Loved these calm haunts of Solitude and Peace; Here he has heard the murmurs of the lake, And the soft rustling of the poplar grove, When o'er its bending boughs the passing wind Swept a gray shade. FOR A MONUMENT IN THE VALE OF EWIAS.

HERE was it, Stranger, that the patron Saint Of Cambria pass'd his age of penitence, A solitary man; and here he made His hermitage, the roots his food, his drink Of Hodney's mountain stream. Perchance thy youth

Has read with eager wonder how the Knight Of Wales in Ormandine's enchanted bower Slept the long sleep; and if that in thy veins Flow the pure blood of Britain, sure that blood Hath flow'd with quicker impulse at the tale Of David's deeds, when through the press of war His gallant comrades follow'd his green erest Tovictory. EPITAPH ON ALGERNON SYDNEY.

HERE Sydney lies, he whom perverted law, The pliant jury, and the bloody judge, Doom'd to a traitor's death. A tyrant King Required, an abject country saw and shared The crime. The noble cause of Liberty He loved in life, and to that noble cause In death bore witness. But his Country rose Like Samson from her sleep, and broke her chains, And proudly with her worthies she enroll'd Her murder'd Sydney's name. The voice of man Gives honor or destroys; but earthly power Gives not, nor takes away, the self-applause Which on the scaffold suffering virtue feels, Nor that which God appointed its reward.

FOR THE CELL OF HONORIUS, AT THE CORK CONVENT, NEAR CINTRA.

HERE, cavern'd like a beast, Honorius pass'd, In self-affliction, solitude, and prayer, Long years of penance. He had rooted out

All human feelings from his heart, and fled With fear and loathing from all human joys. Not thus in making known his will divine Hath Christ enjoin'd. To aid the fatherless, Comfort the sick, and be the poor man's friend, And in the wounded heart pour gospel-balm, — These are the injunctions of his holy law, Which whoso keeps shall have a joy on earth, Calm, constant, still increasing, preluding The eternal bliss of Heaven. Yet mock not thou, Stranger, the Anchorite's mistaken zeal! He painfully his painful duties kept, Sincere, though erring. Stranger, do thou keep Thy better and thine easier rule as well.

But not unpitied, nor of God Unseen, the innocent suffered; not unheard The innocent blood cried vengeance; for at length The indignant Nation in its power arose, Resistless. Then that wicked Judge took flight, Disguised in vain : --- not always is the Lord Slow to revenge! A miserable man, He fell beneath the people's rage, and still The-children curse his memory. From the throne The obdurate bigot who commission'd him, Inhuman Jamés, was driven. He lived to drag Long years of frustrate hope, he lived to load More blood upon his soul. FOR A TABLET AT PENSIJURST.

ARE days of old familiar to thy mind, O Reader? Hast thou let the midnight hour Pass unperceived, whilst thou in fancy lived With high-born beauties and enamor'd chiefs, Sharing their hopes, and with a breathless joy Whose expectation touch'd the verge of pain, Following their dangerous fortunes? If such lore Hath ever thrill'd thy boson, thou wilt tread, As with a pilgrim's reverential thoughts, The groves of Penshurst. Sydney here was born, Sydney, than whom no gentler, braver man His own delightful genius ever feign'd, filustrating the vales of Aready

With courteous courage and with loyal loves Upon his natal day an acorn here Was planted: it grew up a stately oak, And in the beauty of its strength it stood And flourish'd, when his perishable part Had moulder'd, dust to dust. EPITAPH.

This to a mother's sacred memory Her son hath hallow'd. Absent many a year Far over sea, his sweetest dreams were still Of that dear voice which soothed his infancy; And after many a fight against the Moor And Malabar, or that fierce cavalry Which he had seen covering the boundless plain, Even to the utmost limits where the eye Could pierce the far horizon, - his first thought In safety was of her, who, when she heard The tale of that day's danger, would retire And pour her pious gratitude to Heaven In prayers and tears of joy. The lingering hour Of his return, long-look'd-for, came at length, And full of hope he reach'd his native shore. Vain hope that puts its trust in human life ! For ere he came, the number of her days Was full. O Reader, what a world were this, How unendurable its weight, if they Whom Death hath sunder'd did not meet again '

EPITAPH.

HERE, in the fruitful vales of Somerset, Was Emma born, and here the Maiden grew To the sweet season of her womanhood, Beloved and lovely, like a plant whose leaf, And bud, and blossom, all are beautiful. In peacefulness her virgin years were past; And when in prosperous wedlock she was given, Amid the Cumbrian mountains far away She had her summer Bower. 'Twas like a dream Of old Romance to see her when she plied Her little skiff on Derwent's glassy lake; The roseate evening resting on the hills, The lake returning back the hues of heaven, Mountains, and vales, and waters, all imbued With beauty, and in quietness; and she, Nymph-like, amid that glorious solitude A heavenly presence, gliding in her joy. But soon a wasting malady began To prey upon her, frequent in attack, Yet with such flattering intervals as mock The hopes of anxious love, and most of all

The sufferer, self-deceived. During those days Of treacherous respite, many a time hath he, Who leaves this record of his friend, drawn back Into the shadow from her social board, Because too surely in her cheek he saw The insidions bloom of death ; and then her smiles And innocent mirth excited deeper grief Than when long-look'd-for tidings came at last, That, all her sufferings ended, she was laid Amid Madeira's orange groves to rest. O gentle Emma! o'er a lovelier form Than thine Earth never closed; nor e'er did Heaven Receive a purer spirit from the world

FOR A MONUMENT AT ROLISSA.

TIME has been when Rolissa was a name Ignoble, by the passing traveller heard, And then forthwith forgotten ; now in war It is renown'd. For when to her ally, In bondage by perfidious France oppress'd, England sent succor, first within this realm The fated theatre of their long strife Confronted, here the hostile nations met. Laborde took here his stand; upon yon point Of Mount Saint Anna was his Eagle fix'd; The veteran chief, disposing well all aid Of height and glen, possess'd the mountain straits, A post whose strength thus mann'd and profited Seem'd to defy the enemy, and make The vantage of assailing numbers vain. Here, too, before the sun should bend his course Adown the slope of heaven, so had their plans Been timed, he look'd for Loison's army, rich With spoils from Evora and Beja sack'd. That hope the British Knight, areeding well, With prompt attack prevented; and nor strength Of ground, nor leader's skill, nor discipline Of soldiers practised in the ways of war, Avail'd that day against the British arm. Resisting long, but beaten from their stand, The French fell back ; they join'd their greater host To suffer fresh defeat, and Portugal First for Sir Arthur wreathed her laurels here.

FOR A MONUMENT AT VIMEIRO.

This is Vimeiro; yonder stream, which flows Westward through heathery highlands to the sea, Is call'd Maceira, till of late a name, Save to the dwellers of this peaceful vale, Known only to the coasting mariner; Now in the bloody page of war inscribed. When to the aid of injured Portugal Struggling against the intolerable yoke Of treacherous France, England, her old ally, Long tried and always faithful found, went forth, The embattled hosts in equal strength array'd And equal discipline, encountered here. Junot, the mock Abrantes, led the French, And, confident of skill so oft approved, And vaunting many a victory, advanced Against an untried foe. But when the ranks Met in the shock of battle, man to man, And bayonet to bayonet opposed, The flower of France, cut down along their line, Fell like ripe grass before the mower's scythe, For the strong arm and rightful cause prevail'd. That day deliver'd Lisbon from the yoke, And babes were taught to bless Sir Arthur's name

AT CORUÑA

WHEN from these shores the British army first Boldly advanced into the heart of Spain, The admiring people who beheld its march Call'd it "the Beautiful." And surely well Its proud array, its perfect discipline, Its ample furniture of war complete, Its powerful horse, its men of British mould, All high in heart and hope, all of themselves Assured, and in their leaders confident, Deserved the title. Few short weeks elapsed Ere hither that disastrous host return'd, A fourth of all its gallant force consumed In hasty and precipitate retreat, Stores, treasure, and artillery, in the wreck Left to the fierce pursuer, horse and man Founder'd, and stiffening on the mountain snows But when the exulting enemy approach'd, Boasting that he would drive into the sea The remnant of the wretched fugitives, Here, ere they reach'd their ships, they turn'd at bay Then was the proof of British courage seen; Against a fee far overnumbering them, An insolent foe, rejoicing in pursuit, Sure of the fruit of victory, whatsoe'er Might be the fate of battle, here they stood, And their safe embarkation - all they sought -Won manfully. That mournful day avenged Their sufferings, and redeeni'd their country s And thus Coruña, which in this retreat [name. Had seen the else indelible reproach Of England, saw the stain effaced in blood.

EPITAPH.

HE who in this unconsecrated ground Obtain'd a soldier's grave, hath left a name Which will endure in history: the remains Of Moore, the British General, rest below. Ilis early prowess Corsica beheld, When, at Mozello, bleeding, through the breach

He passed victorious; the Columbian isles Then saw him tried; upon the sandy downs Of Holland was his riper worth approved; And leaving on the Egyptian shores his blood, He gathered there fresh palms. High in repute A gallant army last he led to Spain, In arduous times; for moving in his strength, With all his mighty means of war complete, The Tyrant Bonaparte bore down all Before him; and the British Chief beheld, Where'er he look'd, rout, treason, and dismay, All sides with all embarrassments beset, And danger pressing on. Hither he came Before the far outnumbering hosts of France Retreating to her ships, and close pursued; Nor were there wanting men who counsell'd him To offer terms, and from the enemy Purchase a respite to embark in peace, At price of such abasement, -even to this, Brave as they were, by hopelessness subdued. That shameful counsel Moore, in happy hour Remembering what was due to England's name, Refused: he fought, he conquer'd, and he fell.

TO THE

MEMORY OF PAUL BURRARD,

MORTALLY WOUNDED IN THE BATTLE OF CORUÑA.

MYSTERIOUS are the ways of Providence !---Old men, who have grown gray in camps, and wish'd,

And pray'd, and sought in battle to lay down The burden of their age, have seen the young Fall round, themselves untouch'd; and balls beside The graceless and the unblest head have past, Harmless as hail, to reach some precious life, For which clasp'd hands, and supplicating eyes, Duly at morn and eve were raised to Heaven; And, in the depth and loneness of the soul, (Then boding all too truly,) midnight prayers Breathed from an anxious pillow wet with tears. But blessed, even amid their grief, are they Who, in the hour of visitation, bow Beneath the unerring will, and look toward Their Heavenly Father, merciful as just! They, while they own his goodness, feel that whom He chastens, them he loves. The cup he gives, Shall they not drink it? Therefore doth the dranght Resent of comfort in its bitterness, And carry healing with it. What but this Could have sustain'd the mourners who were left, With life-long yearnings, to remember him Whose early death this monumental verse Records? For never more auspicious hopes Were nipp'd in flower, nor finer qualities From goodliest fabric of mortality Divorced, nor virtues worthier to adorn Ftime The world transferr'd to heaven, than when, ere Had measured him the space of nineteen years,

Paul Burrard on Coruña's fatal field Received his mortal hurt. Not unprepared The heroic youth was found; for in the ways Of piety had he been trained; and what The dutiful child upon his mother's knees Had learnt, the soldier faithfully observed. In chamber or in tent, the Book of God Was his beloved manual; and his life Beseem'd the lessons which from thence he drew For, gallant as he was, and blithe of heart, Expert of hand, and keen of eye, and prompt In intellect, religion was the crown Of all his noble properties. When Paul Was by, the scoffer, self-abased, restrain'd The license of his speech; and ribaldry Before his virtuous presence sate rebuked. And yet so frank and affable a form His virtue wore, that wheresoe'er he moved, A sunshine of good-will and cheerfulness Enliven'd all around. Oh! marvel not, If, in the morning of his fair career, Which promised all that honor could bestow On high desert, the youth was summon'd hence. His soul required no further discipline, Pure as it was, and capable of Heaven. Upon the spot from whence he just had seen His General borne away, the appointed ball Reach'd him. But not on that Gallician ground Was it his fate, like many a British heart, To mingle with the soil; the sea received His mortal relics,- to a watery grave Consign'd so near his native shore, so near Ilis father's house, that they who loved him best, Unconscious of its import, heard the gun Which fired his knell. - Alas! if it were known, When, in the strife of nations, dreadful Death Mows down with indiscriminating sweep His thousands ten times told, - if it were known What ties are sever'd then, what ripening hopes Blasted, what virtues in their bloom cut off; How far the desolating scourge extends; How wide the misery spreads ; what hearts beneath Their grief are broken, or survive to feel Always the irremediable loss, -Oh! who of woman born could bear the thought: Who but would join with fervent piety The prayer that asketh in our time for peace? ----Nor in our time alone !--- Enable us, Father which art in heaven! but to receive And keep thy word: thy kingdom then should come, Thy will be done on earth; the victory Accomplished over Sin as well as Death, And the great scheme of Providence fulfill'd.

INSCRIPTIONS.

No sight so joyful ever had been seen Fsent From Douro's banks, - not when the mountains Their generous produce down, or homeward fleets Entered from distant seas their port desired; Nor e'er were shouts of such glad mariners So gladly heard, as then the cannon's peal, And short, sharp strokes of frequent musketry, By the delivered habitants that hour. For they who, beaten then and routed, fled Before victorious England, in their day Of triumph, had, like fiends let loose from hell, Fill'd yon devoted city with all forms Of horror, all unutterable crimes ; And vengeance now had reach'd the inhuman race Accurs'd. Oh, what a scene did Night behold Within those resened walls, when festal fires, And torches, blazing through the bloody streets, Stream'd their broad light where horse and man in death Unheeded lay ontstretch'd! Eyes which had wept

In bitterness so long, shed tears of joy, And from the broken heart thanksgiving, mix'd With anguish, rose to Heaven. Sir Arthur then Might feel how precious in a righteous cause Is victory, how divine the soldier's meed When grateful nations bless the avenging sword !

Yox wide-extended town, whose roofs, and towers, And poplar avenues are seen far off, In goodly prospect over scatter'd woods Of dusky ilex, boasts among its sons Of Mariana's name, - he who hath made The splendid story of his country's wars Through all the European kingdoms known. Yet in his ample annals thou eanst find No braver battle chronicled, than here Was waged, when Joseph, of the stolen crown, Against the hosts of England and of Spain His veteran armies brought. By veteran chiefs Captain'd, a formidable force they came, Full fifty thousand. Victor led them on, A man grown gray in arms, nor e'er in aught Dishonored, till by this opprobrious cause. He, over rude Alverche's summer stream Winning his way, made first upon the right llis hot attack, where Spain's raw levies, ranged In double line, had taken their strong stand In yonder broken ground, by olive groves Cover'd and flank'd by Tagns. Soon from thence, As one whose practised eye could apprehend All vantages in war, his troops he drew; And on this hill, the battle's vital point. Bore with collected power, outnumbering The British ranks twice told. Such fearful odds Were balanced by Sir Arthur's master mind And by the British heart. Twice during night The fatal spot they storm'd, and twice fell back,

Before the bayonet driven. Again at morn They made their fiery onset, and again Repell'd, again at noon renew'd the strife. Yet was their desperate perseverance vain, Where skill by equal skill was countervail'd. And numbers by superior courage foil'd; And when the second night drew over them Its sheltering cope, in darkness they retired, At all points beaten. Long in the red page Of war shall Talavera's famous name Stand forth conspienons. While that name endurcs Bear in thy soul, O Spain, the memory Of all thou suffered'st from perfidious France, Of all that England in thy cause achieved

FOR THE DESERTO DE BUSACO.

READER, thon standest upon holy ground, Which Penitence hath chosen for itself, And war, disturbing the deep solitude, Hath left it doubly sacred. On these heights The host of Portugal and England stood, Arrayed against Massena, when the chief, Proud of Rodrigoo and Almeida won, Press'd forward, thinking the devoted realm Full sure should fall a prey. He in his pride Scorn'd the poor numbers of the English foe, And thought the children of the land would fly From his advance, like sheep before the wolf, Scattering, and lost in terror. Ill he knew The Lusitanian spirit ! Ill he knew The arm, the heart of England ! Ill he knew Her Wellington ! He learnt to know them here, That spirit and that arm, that heart, that mind, Here on Busaco gloriously display'd, When hence repulsed the beaten boaster wound Below his course circuitous, and left His thousands for the beasts and ravenous fowl. The Carmelite who in his cell recluse Was wont to sit, and from a skull receive Death's silent lesson, wheresoe'er he walk, Henceforth may find his teachers. He shall find The Frenchmen's bones in glen and grove, on rock And height, where'er the wolves and carrion birds Have strewn them, wash'd in torrents, bare and bleach'd

By sun and rain, and by the winds of heaven.

XXVII.

FOR THE LINES OF TORRES VEDRAS.

THROUGH all Iberia, from the Atlantic shores To far Pyrene, Wellington hath left His trophics; but no monument records To after-time a more enduring praise, Than this which marks his triumph here attain'd By intellect, and patience to the end Holding through good and ill its course assign'd

The stamp and seal of greatness. Here the chief Pereeived in foresight Lisbon's sure defence, A vantage ground for all reverse prepared, Where Portugal and England might defy All strength of hostile numbers. Not for this Of hostile enterprise did he abate, Or gallant purpose : witness the proud day Which saw Soult's murderous host from Porto driven :

Bear witness, Talavera, made by him Famous forever; and that later fight When from Busaco's solitude the birds, Then first affrighted in their sanctuary, Fled from the thunders and the fires of war. But when Spain's feeble counsels, in delay As erring, as in action premature, Had left him in the field without support, And Bonaparté having trampled down The strength and pride of Austria, this way turn'd His single thought and undivided power, Retreating hither the great General came And proud Massena, when the boastful chief Of plundered Lisbon dreamt, here found himself Stopp'd suddenly in his presumptuous course. From Ericeyra on the western sea, By Mafra's princely convent, and the heights Of Montiehique, and Bueellas famed For generous vines, the formidable works Extending, rested on the guarded shores Of Tagus, that rich river who received Into his ample and rejoieing port The harvests and the wealth of distant lands, Secure, insulting with the glad display The robber's greedy sight. Five months the foe Beheld these lines, made inexpugnable By perfect skill, and patriotic feelings here With discipline conjoin'd, courageous hands, True spirits, and ene comprehensive mind All overseeing and pervading all. Five months, tormenting still his heart with hope, He saw his projects frustrated; the power Of the blaspheming tyrant whom he served Fail in the proof; his thousands disappear, In silent and inglorious war consumed ; Till hence retreating, madden'd with despite, Here did the self-styled Son of Victory leave, Never to be redeem'd, that vaunted name

XXVIII.

AT SANTAREM.

Four montus Massena had his quarters here, When by those lines deterr'd where Wellington Defied the power of France, but loath to leave Rich Lisbon yet unsack'd, he kept his ground, Till from impending famine, and the force Array'd in front, and that consuming war Which still the faithful nation, day and night, And at all hours, was waging on his rear, He saw no safety, save in swift retreat. Then of his purpose frustrated, this child Of Hell— so fitlier than of Victory call'dGave his own devilish nature scope, and let His devilish army loose. The mournful rolls That ehroniele the guilt of human-kind, Tell not of aught more hideous than the deeds With which this monster and his kindred troops Track'd their inhuman way — all cruelties, All forms of horror, all deliberate crimes, Which tongue abhors to utter, ear to hear. Let this memorial bear Massena's name For everlasting infamy inseribed.

XXIX

AT FUENTES D'ONORO.

THE fountains of Onoro, which give name To this poor hamlet, were distain'd with blood, What time Massena, driven from Portugal By national virtue in endurance proved, And England's faithful aid, against the land Not long delivered, desperately made His last fierce effort here. That day, bestreak'd With slaughter Coa and Agueda ran, So deeply had the open veins of war Purpled their mountain feeders. Strong in means, With rest, and stores, and numbers reënforced, Came the ferocious enemy, and ween'd Beneath their formidable eavalry To trample down resistance. But there fought Against them here, with Britons side by side, The children of regenerate Portugal, And their own erimes, and all-beholding Heaven. Beaten, and hopeless thenceforth of success, The inhuman Marshal, never to be named By Lusitanian lips without a eurse Of elinging infamy, withdrew and left These Fountains famous for his overthrow.

AT BARROSA.

THOUGH the four quarters of the world have seen The British valor proved triumphantly Upon the French, in many a field far-famed, Yet may the noble Island in her rolls Of glory write Barrosa's name. For there, Not by the issue of deliberate plans Consulted well, was the fieree conflict won, Nor by the leader's eye intuitive, Nor force of either arm of war, nor art Of skill'd artillerist, nor the discipline Of troops to absolute obedience train'd; But by the spring and impulse of the heart, Brought fairly to the trial, when all else Seem'd, like a wrestler's garment, thrown aside ; By individual courage and the sense Of honor, their old country's, and their own, There to be forfeited, or there upheld ; -This warm'd the soldier's soul, and gave his hand The strength that carries with it victory.

More to enhance their praise, the day was fought Against all circumstance; a painful march, Through twenty hours of night and day prolong'd, Forespent the British troops; and hope delay'd Had left their spirits pall'd. But when the word Was given to turn, and charge, and win the heights,

The welcome order came to them, like rain Upon a traveller in the thirsty sands. Rejoicing, up the ascent, and in the front Of danger, they with steady step advanced, And with the insupportable bayonet Drove down the foe. The vanquished Victor saw And thought of Talavera, and deplored His eagle lost. But England saw, well-pleased, Her old ascendency that day sustained; And Scotland, shouting over all her hills, Among her worthies rank'd another Graham.

XXXI.

FOR A MONUMENT AT ALBUHERA.

SEVEN thousand men lay bleeding on these heights,

When Beresford in strenuous conflict strove Against a fee whom all the accidents Of battle favored, and who knew full well To seize all offers that occasion gave. Wounded or dead, seven thousand here were stretch'd,

And on the plain around a myriad more, Spaniard, and Briton, and true Portuguese, Alike approved that day; and in the cause Of France, with her flagitious sons compelled, Pole and Italian, German, Hollander, Men of all climes and countries, hither bronght, Doing and suffering for the work of war. This point, by her superior cavalry, France from the Spaniard won, the elements Aiding her powerful efforts; here awhile She seemed to rule the conflict; and from hence The British and the Lusitanian arm Dislodged with irresistible assault The enemy, even when he deem'd the day Was written for his own. But not for Soult, But not for France was that day in the rolls Of war to be inscribed by Victory's hand, Not for the inhuman chief, and cause unjust; She wrote for after-times, in blood, the names Cf Spain and England, Blake and Beresford.

XXXII.

TO THE MEMORY OF SIR WILLIAM MYERS.

SPANIARD or Portuguese ! tread reverently Upon a soldier's grave; no common heart Lies mingled with the clod beneath thy feet. To honors and to ample wealth was Myers In England born ; but leaving friends beloved, And all allurements of that happy land, His ardent spirit to the field of war Impell'd him. Fair was his career. He faced The perils of that memorable day, When through the iron shower and fiery storm Of death, the dauntless host of Britain made Their landing at Aboukir ; then not less Illustrated, than when great Nelson's hand, As if insulted Heaven, with its own wrath, Had arm'd him, smote the miscreant Frenchmen's fleet,

And with its wreck wide-floating many a league, Strew'd the rejoicing shores. What then his youth Held forth of promise, amply was confirmed When Wellesley, npon Talavera's plain, On the mock monarch won his coronet : There, when the trophies of the field were reap'd, Was he for gallant bearing eminent When all did bravely. But his valor's orb Shone brightest at its setting. On the field Of Albuhera he the fusileers Led to regain the heights, and promised them A glorious day ; a glorious day was given ; The heights were gained, the victory was achieved, And Myers received from death his deathless erown.

Here to Valverde was he borne, and here Ilis faithful men, amid this olive grove, The olive emblem here of endless peace, Laid him to rest. Spaniard or Portuguese, In your good cause the British soldier fell; Tread reverently upon his honor'd grave.

XXXIII.

EPITAPH.

STEEP is the soldier's path; nor are the heights Of glory to be won without long toil And arduous efforts of enduring hope, Save when Death takes the aspirant by the hand, And, cutting short the work of years, at once Lifts him to that conspicuous eminence. Such fate was mine. - The standard of the Buffs I bore at Albuhera, on that day When, covered by a shower, and fatally For friends misdeem'd, the Polish lancers fell Upon our rear. Surrounding me, they claimed My precious charge. - "Not but with life!" I eried, And life was given for immortality. The flag which to my heart I held, when wet With that heart's blood, was soon victoriously Regain'd on that great day. In former times, Marlborough beheld it borne at Ramilies; For Brunswick and for liberty it waved Triumphant at Culloden; and hath seen The lifies on the Caribbean shores Abased before it. Then, too, in the front

Of battle did it flap exultingly,

When Douro, with its wide stream interposed, Saved not the French invaders from attack.

Discomfiture, and ignominious rout. My name is Thomas: undisgraced have I Transmitted it. Ile who in days to come May bear the honor'd banner to the field, Will think of Albuhera, and of me.

XXXIV.

FOR THE WALLS OF CIUDAD RODRIGO.

HERE Craufurd fell, victorious, in the breach, Leading his countrymen in that assault

Which won from haughty France these rescued walls;

And here entomb'd, far from his native land And kindred dust, his honor'd relics rest. Well was he versed in war, in the Orient train'd Beneath Cornwallis; then, for many a year, Following through arduous and ill-fated fields The Austrian banners; on the sea-like shores Of Plata next, still by malignant stars Pursued; and in that miserable retreat, For which Cornña witness'd on her hills The pledge of vengeance given. At length he saw,

Long woo'd and well-deserved, the brighter face Of Fortune, upon Coa's banks vouchsafed, Before Almeida, when Massena found The fourfold vantage of his numbers foil'd, Before the Briton, and the Portugal, There vindicating first his old renown, And Craufurd's mind that day presiding there. Again was her auspicious countenance Upon Busaco's holy heights reveal'd; And when by Torres Vedras, Wellington, Wisely secure, defied the boastful French, With all their power; and when Onoro's springs Beheld that execrable enemy Again chastised beneath the avenging arm. Too early here his honorable course He closed, and won his noble sepulchre. Where should the soldier rest so worthily As where he fell? Be thou his monument, O City of Rodrigo, yea, be thou, To latest time, his trophy and his tomb! Sultans, or Pharaohs of the elder world, Lie not in Mosque or Pyramid enshrined Thus gloriously, nor in so proud a grave

XXXV

TO THE MEMORY OF MAJOR-GENERAL MACKINNON.

Son of an old and honorable house, Henry Mackinnon from the Hebrides Drew his descent, but upon English ground An English mother bore him. Dauphiny Beheld the blossom of his opening years; For hoping in that genial clime to save A child of feebler frame, his parents there Awhile their sojourn fix'd: and thus it chanced That in that generous season, when the heart Yet from the world is pure and undefiled, Napoleon Bonaparté was his friend. The adventurous Corsican, like Henry, then Young, and a stranger in the land of France, Their frequent and their favor'd guest became, Finding a cheerful welcome at all hours, Kindness, esteem, and in the English youth Quick sympathy of apprehensive mind And lofty thought heroic. On the way Of life they parted, not to meet again. Each follow'd war, but, oh ! how differently Did the two spirits, which till now had grown Like two fair plants, it seem'd, of kindred seed, Develop in that awful element! For never had benignant nature shower'd More bounteously than on Mackinnon's head Her choicest gifts. Form, features, intellect, Were such as might at once command and win All hearts. In all relationships approved, Son, brother, husband, father, friend, his life Was beautiful; and when in tented fields, Such as the soldier should be, in the sight Of God and man, was he. Poor praise it were To speak his worth evineed upon the banks Of Douro, Talavera's trophied plain, Busaco's summit, and what other days, Many and glorious all, illustrated His bright career. Worthier of him to say That in the midst of eamps his manly breast Retain'd its youthful virtne; that he walk'd Through blood and evil uncontaminate. And that the stern necessity of war But nurtured with its painful discipline Thoughtful compassion in that gentle soul, And feelings such as man should cherish still For all of woman born. He met his death When at Rodrigo on the breach he stood Triumphant; to a soldier's wish it came Instant, and in the honr of victory. Mothers and maids of Portugal, oh bring Your garlands here, and strew his grave with flowers;

And lead the children to his monument, Gray-headed sires, for it is holy ground ! For tenderness and valor in his heart, As in your own Nunalures, had made Their habitation; for a dearer life Never in battle hath been offered up, Since in like cause, and in unhappy day, By Zutphen's walls the peerless Sydney fell. 'Tis said that Bonaparté, when he heard How thus among the multitude, whose blood Cries out to Heaven upon his guilty head, His early friend had fallen, was toueh'd with grief. If aught it may avail him, be that thought, That hrief recurrence of humanity In his hard heart, remember'd in his hour

XXXVI.

FOR THE AFFAIR AT ARROYO MOLI-NOS.

HE who may chronicle Spain's arduous strife Against the Intrnder, hath to speak of fields Profuselier fed with blood, and victories Borne wider on the wings of glad report; Yet shall this town, which from the mill-stream takes Its humble name, be storied as the spot Where the vain Frenchman, insolent too long Of power and of success, first saw the strength Of England in prompt enterprise essayed, And felt his fortunes ebb, from that day forth Swept back upon the refluent tide of war. Girard lay here, who late from Caceres, Far as his active cavalry could scour, Had pillaged and oppress'd the country round; The Spaniard and the Portuguese he scorn'd, And deem'd the British soldiers all too slow To seize occasion, unalert in war, And therefore brave in vain. In such belief Secure at night he laid him down to sleep, Nor dreamt that these disparaged enemies With drum and trumpet should in martial charge Sound his reveille. All day their march severe They held through wind and drenching rain; all [night The autumnal tempest unabating raged, While in their comfortless and open camp They cheer'd themselves with patient hope: the storm

Was their ally, and moving in the mist, When morning open'd, on the astonish'd foe They burst. Soon routed horse and foot, the French,

On all sides scattering, fled, on every side Beset, and every where pursued, with loss Of half their numbers captured, their whole stores, And all their gathered plunder. 'Twas a day Of surest omen, such as fill'd with joy True English hearts. No happier peals have e'er Been roll d abroad from town and village tower Than gladden'd then with their exultant sound Salopian vales; and flowing cups were brinm'd All round the Wrekin to Sir Rowland's name

WRITTEN IN AN UNPUBLISHED VOL-UME OF LETTERS AND MISCELLA-NEOUS PAPERS, BY BARRÉ CHARLES ROBERTS.

Nor often hath the cold, insensate earth Closed over such fair hopes, as when the grave Received young Barré's perishable part; Nor death destroyed so sweet a dream of life. Nature, who sometimes lavisheth her gifts With fatal bounty, had conferred on him Even such endowments as parental love

Might in its wisest prayer have ask'd of Heaven . An intellect that, choosing for itself The better part, went forth into the fields Of knowledge, and with never-sated thirst Drank of the living springs; a judgment calm And clear; a heart affectionate; a soul Within whose quiet sphere no vanities Or low desires had place. Nor were the seeds Of excellence thus largely given, and left To struggle with impediment of clime Austere, or niggard soil; all circumstance Of happy fortune was to him vouchsafed; His way of life was as through garden-walks Wherein no thorns are seen, save such as grow, Types of our human state, with fruits and flowers. In all things favored thus auspiciously, But in his father most. An intercourse So beautiful no former record shows In such relationship displayed, where through Familiar friendship's perfect confidence, The father's ever-watchful tenderness Meets ever in the son's entire respect Its due return devout, and playful love Mingles with every thing, and sheds o'er all A sunshine of its own. Should we then say The parents purchased at too dear a cost This deep delight, the deepest, purest joy Isaw Which Heaven hath here assign'd us, when they Their child of hope, just in the May of life, Beneath a slow and cankering malady, With irremediable decay consumed, Sink to the untimely grave? Oh, think not thus! Nor deem that such long anguish, and the grief Which in the inmost soul doth strike its roots There to abide through time, can overweigh The blessings which have been, and yet shall he! Think not that He in whom we live, doth mock Our dearest aspirations ! Think not love, Genius, and virtue should inhere alone In mere mortality, and Earth put out The sparks which are of Heaven! We are not left In darkness, nor devoid of hope. The Light Of Faith hath risen to us: the vanquish'd Grave To us the great consolatory truth Proclaim'd that He who wounds will heal; and Death Opening the gates of Immortality, Opening the gates of Immortality, The spirits whom it hath dissevered here, In everlasting union reunite.

EPITAPH.

TIME and the world, whose magnitude and weight Bear on us in this Now, and hold us here To earth enthrall'd, — what are they in the Past? And in the prospect of the immortal Soul How poor a speck! Not here her resting-place, Her portion is not here; and happiest they Who, gathering early all that Earth can give,

Shake off its mortal coil, and speed for Heaven. Such fate had he whose relics moulder here. Few were his years, but yet enough to teach Love, duty, generous feelings, high desires, Faith, hope, devotion : and what more could length Of days have brought him? What, but vanity, Joys frailer even than health or human life; Temptation, sin and sorrow, both too sure, Evils that wound, and cares that fret the heart. Repine not, therefore, ye who love the dead.

XXXIX.

EPITAPH.

Some there will be to whom, as here they read, While yet these lines are from the chisel sharp, The name of Clement Francis, will recall His countenance benign; and some who knew What stores of knowledge and what humble thoughts,

What wise desires, what cheerful piety, In happy union form'd the character Which faithfully impress'd his aspect meek. And others too there are, who in their hearts Will bear the memory of his worth enshrined, For tender and for reverential thoughts, When grief hath had its course, a life-long theme. A little while, and these, who to the truth Of this poor tributary strain could bear Their witness, will themselves have past away, And this cold marble monument present Words which can then within no living mind Create the ideal form they once evoked; This, then, the sole memorial of the dead. So be it. Only that which was of earth Hath perish'd; only that which was infirm, Mortal, corruptible, and brought with it The seed connate of death. A place in Time Is given us, only that we may prepare Our portion for Eternity : the Soul Possesseth there what treasures for itself, Wise to salvation, it laid up in Heaven. O Man, take thou this lesson from the Grave! There too all true affections shall revive, To fade no more; all losses be restored, All griefs be heal'd, all holy hopes fulfill'd.

1. AT CLACHNACHARRY.

ATHWART the island here, from sea to sea, Between these mountain barriers, the Great Glen Of Scotland offers to the traveller, Through wilds impervious else, an easy path, Along the shore of rivers and of lakes, In line continuous, whence the waters flow Dividing east and west. Thus had they held For untold centuries their perpetual course Unprofited, till in the Georgian age This mighty work was plann'd, which should unite The lakes, control the innavigable streams, And through the bowels of the land deduce A way, where vessels which must else have braved The formidable Cape, and have essayed The perils of the Hyperborean Sea, Might from the Baltic to the Atlantic deep Pass and repass at will. So when the storm Careers abroad, may they securely here, Through birchen groves, green fields, and pastoral hills, Pursue their voyage home. Humanity May boast this proud expenditure, begun By Britain in a time of arduous war; Through all the efforts and emergencies Of that long strife continued, and achieved After her triumph, even at the time When national burdens bearing on the state Were felt with heaviest pressure. Such expense Is best economy. In growing wealth, Comfort, and spreading industry, behold The fruits immediate! And, in days to come. Fitly shall this great British work be named With whatsoe'er of most magnificence For public use, Rome in her plenitude Of power effected, or all-glorious Greece, Or Egypt, mother-land of all the arts.

Thou who hast reach'd this level where the glede, Wheeling between the mountains in mild air, Eastward or westward, as his gyre inclines, Descries the German or the Atlantic Sea, Pause here; and, as thou seest the ship pursue Her easy way serene, call thou to mind By what exertions of victorious art The way was open'd. Fourteen times upheaved, The vessel hath ascended, since she changed The salt sea water for the highland lymph; As oft in imperceptible descent Must, step by step, he lower'd, before she woo The ocean breeze again. Thou hast beheld What basins, most capacious of their kind, Enclose her, while the obedient element Lifts or depones its burden. Thou hast seen The torrent, hurrying from its native hills, Pass underneath the broad canal inhumed, Then issue harmless thence; the rivulet, Admitted by its intake peaceably, Forthwith by gentle overfall discharged : And haply too thou hast observed the herds Frequent their vaulted path, unconscious they That the wide waters on the long, low arch Above them lie sustained. What other works

Science, audacious in emprise, hath wrought, Meet not the eye, but well may fill the mind. Not from the bowels of the land alone, From lake and stream hath their diluvial wreck Been scoop'd to form this navigable way; Huge rivers were controll'd, or from their course Shoulder'd aside; and at the eastern mouth, Where the salt ooze denied a resting-place, There were the deep foundations laid, by weight On weight immersed, and pile on pile down-driven, Till steadfast as the everlasting rocks The massive outwork stands. Contemplate now What days and nights of thought, what years of toil, What inexhaustive springs of public wealth The vast design required; the immediate good, The future benefit progressive still; And thou wilt pay thy tribute of due praise To those whose counsels, whose decrees, whose eare,

For after ages formed the generous work.

Telford it was, by whose presiding mind The whole great work was plann'd and perfected; Telford, who o'er the vale of Cambrian Dee, Aloft in air, at giddy height upborne, Carried his navigable road, and hung High o'er Menat's straits the bending bridge; Structures of more ambitious enterprise Than minstrels in the age of old romance To their own Merlin's magic lore ascribed, Nor hath he for his native land perform'd Less in this proud design; and where his piers Around her coast from many a fisher's creek Unshelter'd else, and many an ample port, Repel the assailing storm; and where his roads In beautiful and sinuous line far seen, Wind with the vale, and win the long ascent, Now o'er the deep morass sustain'd, and now Across ravine, or glen, or estuary, Opening a passage through the wilds subdued.

EPITAPH IN BUTLEIGH CHURCH.

DIVIDED far by death were they, whose names In honor here united, as in birth, This monumental verse records. They drew In Dorset's healthy vales their natal breath, And from these shores beheld the ocean first, Whereon, in early youth, with one accord They chose their way of fortune; to that course By Hood and Bridport's bright example drawn, Their kinsmen, children of this place, and sons Of one, who in his faithful ministry Inculcated within these hallowed walls The truths in mercy to mankind reveal'd. Worthy were these three brethren each to add New honors to the already honor'd name; But Arthur, in the morning of his day, Perish'd amid the Caribbean sea, When the Pomona, by a hurricane Whirl'd, riven and overwhelmed, with all her crew Into the deep went down. A longer date To Alexander was assign'd, for hope, For fair ambition, and for fond regret, Alas, how short ! for duty, for desert, Sufficing; and, while Time preserves the roll Of Britain's naval feats, for good report A boy, with Cook he rounded the great globe; A youth, in many a celebrated fight With Rodney had his part; and having reach'd Life's middle stage, engaging ship to ship, When the French Hercules, a gallant foe, Struck to the British Mars his three-striped flag, He fell, in the moment of his victory. Here his remains in sure and certain hope Are laid, until the hour when Earth and Sea Shall render up their dead. One brother yet Survived, with Keppel and with Rodney train'd In battles, with the Lord of Nile approved. Ere in command he worthily upheld Old England's high prerogative. In the east, The west, the Baltic and the Midland seas, Yea, wheresoever hostile fleets have plough'd The ensanguined deep, his thunders have been heard,

His flag in brave defiance hath been seen ; And bravest enemies at Sir Samuel's name Felt fatal presage, in their inmost heart, Of unavertible defeat foredoom'd. Thus in the path of glory he rode on, Victorions alway, adding praise to praise ; Till full of honors, not of years, beneath The venom of the infected clime he sunk, On Coromandel's coast, completing there His service, only when his life was spent.

To the three brethren, Alexander's son, (Sole scion he in whom their line survived,) With English feeling, and the deeper sense Of filial duty, consecrates this tomb.

To Butler's venerable memory, By private gratitude for public worth, This monument is raised, here where twelve years Meekly the blameless Prelate exercised His pastoral charge; and whither, though removed A little while to Durham's wider See,

His mortal relics were conveyed to rest. Born in dissent, and in the school of schism Bred, he withstood the withering influence Of that unwholesome nurture. To the Church, In strength of mind mature and judgment clear, A convert, in sincerity of heart Seeking the truth, deliberately convinced, And finding there the truth he sought, he came. In honor must his high desert be held While there is any virtue, any praise; For he it was whose gifted intellect First apprehended, and developed first The analogy connate, which in its course And constitution Nature manifests To the Creator's word and will divine ; And in the depth of that great argument Laying his firm foundation, built thereon Proofs never to be shaken of the truths Reveal'd from Heaven in mercy to mankind; Allying thus Philosophy with Faith, And finding in things seen and known the type And evidence of those within the yeil.

DEDICATION OF THE AUTHOR'S COLLOQUIES ON THE PROGRESS AND PROSPECTS OF SOCIETY.

TO THE

MEMORY OF THE REV. HERBERT HILL,

Formerly Student of Christ Church, Oxford; successively Chaplain to the British Factories at Porto and at Lisbon; and late Rector of Streatham; who was released from this life, Sept. 19, 1823, in the 80th year of his age.

Not upon marble or sepulchral brass Have I the record of thy worth inscribed, Dcar Uncle ! nor from Chantrey's chisel ask'd A monumental statue, which might wear Through many an age thy venerable form. Such tribute, were I rich in this world's wealth, Should rightfully be rendered, in discharge Of grateful duty, to the world evinced When testifying so by outward sign Its deep and inmost sense. But what I can Is rendered piously, prefixing here Thy perfect lineaments, two centuries Before thy birth by Holbein's happy hand Prefigured thus. It is the portraiture Of More, the mild, the learned, and the good; Traced in that better stage of human life, When vain imaginations, troublous thoughts, And hopes and fears have had their course, and left The intellect composed, the heart at rest, Nor yet decay hath touch'd our mortal frame. Such was the man whom Henry, of desert Appreciant alway, chose for highest trust ; Whom England in that eminence approved; Whom Europe honored, and Erasmus loved.

Such was he ere heart-hardening higotry Obscured his spirit, made him with himself Discordant, and contracting then his brow, With sour defeature marr'd his countenance. What he was, in his best and happiest time, Even such wert thou, dear Uncle ! such thy look Benign and thoughtful; such thy placid mien; Thine eye serene, significant, and strong, Bright in its quietness, yet brightening oft With quick emotion of benevolence, Or flash of active fancy, and that mirth Which ave with soher wisdom well accords. Nor ever did true Nature, with more nice Exactitude, fit to the inner man The fleshly mould, than when she stamp'd on thine Her best credentials, and bestow'd on thee An aspect, to whose sure benignity Beasts with instinctive confidence could trust, Which at a glance obtain'd respect from men. And won at once good will from all the good.

Such as in semblance, such in word and deed Lisbon beheld him, when for many a year The even tenor of his spotless life Adorn'd the English Church, - her minister, In that stronghold of Rome's Idolatry, To God and man approved. What Englishman, Who in those peaceful days of Portugal Resorted thither, curious to observe Her cities, and the works and ways of men, But sought him, and from his abundant stores Of knowledge profited? What stricken one, Sent thither to protract a living death, Forlorn perhaps, and friendless else, but found A friend in him? What mourners, - who had seen The object of their agonizing hopes In that sad cypress ground deposited, Wherein so many a flower of British growth, Untimely faded and cut down, is laid, In foreign earth compress'd, - but bore away A life-long sense of his compassionate care, His Christian goodness? Faithful shepherd he, And vigilant against the wolves, who, there, If entrance might be won, would straight beset The dying stranger, and with merciless zeal Bay the death-bed. In every family Throughout his fold was he the welcome guest, Alike to every generation dear, The children's favorite, and the grandsire's friend, Tried, trusted and beloved. So liberal, too, In secret alms, even to his utmost means, That they who served him, and who saw in part The channels where his constant bounty ran, Maugre their own uncharitable faith, Believed him, for his works, secure of Heaven. It would have been a grief for me to think The features, which so perfectly express'd That excellent mind, should irretrievably From earth have past away, existing now Only in some few faithful memories Insoul'd, and not by any limner's skill To be imbodied thence. A blessing then On him, in whose prophetic counterfeit Preserved, the children now, who were the crown Of his old age, may see their father's face,

CARMEN TRIUMPHALE.

Here to the very life portray'd, as when Spain's mountain passes, and her ilex woods, And fragant wildernesses, side by side, With him I traversed, in my morn of youth, And gather'd knowledge from his full discourse. Often, in former years, I pointed out, Well-pleased, the casnal portrait, which so well Assorted in all points; and haply since, While lingering o'er this meditative work, Sometimes that likeness, not unconsciously, Hath tinged the strain; and therefore, for the sake Of this resemblance, are these volumes now Thus to his memory properly inscribed.

O friend! O more than father! whom I found Forbearing alway, alway kind; to whom No gratitude can speak the debt I owe; Far on their earthly pilgrimage advanced Are they who knew thee when we drew the breath Of that delicions clime! The most are gone; And whoso yet survive of those who then Were in their summer season, on the tree Of life hang here and there like wintry leaves, Which the first breeze will from the bough bring down.

1, too, am in the sear, the yellow leaf. And yet (no wish is nearer to my heart) One arduous labor more, as unto thee In duty bound, full fain would 1 complete, (So Heaven permit,) recording faithfully The heroic rise, the glories, the decline, Of that fallen country, dear to us, wherein The better portion of thy days was past; And where, in fruitful intercourse with thee, My intellectual life received betimes The hias it hath kept. Poor Portugal, In us thou harboredst no ungrateful gnests ! We loved thee well; Mother magnanimons Of mighty intellects and faithful hearts, -For such in other times thou wert, nor yet To be despair'd of, for not yet, methinks, Degenerate wholly, - yes, we loved thee well! And in thy moving story, (so but life Be given me to mature the gathered store Of thirty years,) poet and politic, And Christian sage, (only philosopher Who from the Well of living water drinks Never to thirst again,) shall find, I ween, For fancy, and for profitable thought, Abundant food.

Alas ⁺ should this be given, Such consummation of my work will now Be but a mournful close, the one being gone, Whom to have satisfied was still to me A pure reward, outweighing far all breath Of public praise. O friend revered, O guide And fellow-laborer in this ample field, How large a portion of myself hath past With thee, from earth to heaven ! — Thus they who reach Gray hairs die piecemeal. But in good old age

Thou hast departed; not to be bewail'd, — Oh no! The promise on the Mount vouchsafed, Nor abrogate by any later law Reveal'd to man, — that promise, as by thee Full pionsly deserved, was faithfully In thee fulfill'd, and in the land thy days Were long. I would not, as I saw thee last, For a king's ransom, have detain'd thee here, — Bent, like the antique sculptor's limbless trunk, By chronic pain, yet with thine eye unquench'd, The ear undimm'd, the mind retentive still, The heart unchanged, the intellectual lamp Burning in its corporeal sepulchre. No; not if human wishes had had power To have suspended Nature's constant work, Would they wno loved thee have detain'd thee thus, Waiting for death.

That trance is over. Thou Art enter'd on thy heavenly heritage ; And I, whose dial of mortality Points to the eleventh hour, shall follow soon. Meantime, with dutiful and patient hope, I labor that onr names conjoin'd may long Survive, in honor one day to be held Where old Lisboa from her hills o'erlooks Expanded Tagus, with its populous shores And pine woods, to Palmella's crested height Nor there alone ; but in those rising realms Where now the offsets of the Lusian tree Push forth their vigorous shoots, — from central plains,

Whence rivers flow divergent, to the gulf Southward, where wild Parana disembogues A sea-like stream; and northward, in a world Of forests, where huge Orellana clips His thousand islands with his thonsand arms.

CARMEN TRIUMPHALE,

FOR THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE YEAR 1814

Illi justitiam confirmavere triumphi, Præsentes docuere Deos.

CLAUDIAN.

1.

In happy hour doth he receive The Laurel, meed of famous Bards'of yore, Which Dryden and diviner Spenser wore,— In happy hour, and well may he rejoice, Whose earliest task must be To raise the exultant hymn for victory, And join a nation's joy with harp and voice, Pouring the strain of triumph on the wind, Glory to God, his song, Deliverance for Mankind !

11.

Wake, lute and harp! My soul, take up the stram!
Glory to God! Deliverance for Mankind!
Joy — for all Nations, joy! But most for thee,
Who hast so nobly fill'd thy part assign'd,
O England! O my glorious native land!
For thon in evil days didst stand
Against leagued Europe all in arms array'd,
Single and undismay'd,
Thy hope in Heaven and in thine own right hand.

CARMEN TRIUMPHALE.

Now are thy virtuous efforts overpaid; Thy generous counsels now their gnerdon find; Glory to God! Deliverance for Mankind!

III.

Dread was the strife; for nighty was the foe Who sought with his whole strength thy overthrow. The Nations bow'd before him; some in war Subdued, some yielding to superior art; Submiss, they follow'd his victorious car. Their Kings, like Satraps, waited round his throne, For Britain's ruin and their own, By force or frand in monstrous league combined. Alone, in that disastrous hour, Britain stood firm, and braved his power; Alone she fought the hattles of mankind.

IV.

O virtue which, above all former fame, Exalts her venerable name! O joy of joys for every British breast! That with that mighty peril full in view, The Queen of Ocean to herself was true! That no weak heart, no abject mind possess'd Her counsels, to abase her lofty crest, (Then had she sunk in everlasting shame,) But ready still to succor the oppress'd, Her Red Cross floated on the waves unfurl'd, Offering Redemption to the groaning world.

v.

First from his trance the heroic Spaniard woke, His chains he broke,
And casting off his neck the treacherous yoke, He call'd on England, on his generous foe For well he knew that wheresoe'er Wise policy prevail'd, or brave despair,
Thither would Britain's liberal succors flow, Her arm be present there.
Then, too, regenerate Portugal display'd Her ancient virtue, dormant all-too-long. Rising against intolerable wrong, On England, on her old ally, for aid' The faithful nation call'd in her distress : And well that old ally the call obey'd,
Well was that faithful friendship then repaid.

V1.

Say, from thy trophied field, how well, Vimeiro! Rocky Douro, tell ! And thou, Busaco, on whose sacred height The astonished Carmelita, While those unwonted thunders shook his cell, Join'd with his prayers the fervor of the fight. Bear witness those Old Towers, where many a day Waiting with foresight calm the fitting hour,

The Wellesley, gathering strength in wise delay, Defied the Tyrant's undivided power. Swore not the boastful Frenchman, in his might, Into the sea to drive his Island foe? Tagus and Zezere, in secret night, Ye saw that host of rnfians take their flight! And in the Sun's broad light Onoro's Springs beheld their overthrow.

VII.

Patient of loss, profuse of life, Meantime had Spain endured the strife, And though she saw her cities yield, Her armies scatter'd in the field, Her strongest bulwarks fall; The danger undismay'd she view'd, Knowing that nought could e'er appal The Spaniard's fortitude. What though the Tyrant, drunk with power, Might vaunt himself, in impious hour,

Lord and Disposer of this earthly ball? Her cause is just, and Heaven is over all.

VIII.

Therefore no thought of fear debased Her judgment, nor her aets disgraced. To every ill, but not to shame resign'd, All sufferings, all calamities she bore She bade the people call to mind Their heroes of the days of yore, Pelayo and the Campeador, With all who, once in battle strong, Lived still in story and in song. Against the Moor, age after age, Their stubborn warfare did they wage; Age after age, from sire to son, The hallowed sword was handed down , Nor did they from that warfare cease, And sheathe that hallowed sword in peace Until the work was done

IX.

Thus, in the famous days of yore, Their fathers triumph'd o'er the Moor. They gloried in his overthrow, But touch'd not with reproach his gallant name; For fairly, and with hostile aim profest, The Moor had rear'd his haughty crest, An open, honorable foe; But as a friend the treacherous Frenchman came, And Spain received him as a guest.

Think what your fathers were! she cried; Think what ye are, in sufferings tried; And think of what your sons must be — Even as ye make them —slaves or free!

Х.

Strains such as these from Spain's three seas, And from the farthest Pyrenees, Rung through the region. Vengeance was the word;

One impulse to all hearts at once was given; From every voice the sacred cry was heard, And borne abroad by all the winds of Heaven. Heaven, too, to whom the Spaniards look'd for aid,

A spirit equal to the hour bestow'd; And gloriously the debt they paid, Which to their valiant ancestors they owed: And gloriously against the power of France Maintain'd their children's proud inheritance. Their steady purpose no defeat could move, No horrors could abate their constant mind; Hope had its source and resting-place above,

CARMEN TRIUMPHALE.

And they, to loss of all on earth resign'd, Suffer'd, to save their country and mankind. What strain heroic might suffice to tell How Zaragoza stood, and how she fell? Ne'er since yon sun began his daily round, Was higher virtue, holier valor, found, 'Than on that consecrated ground

XI.

Alone the noble Nation stood, When from Cornña, in the main, The star of England set in blood. Erelong on Talavera's plain, That star resplendent rose again; And though that day was doom'd to be A day of frustrate victory, Not vainly bled the brave; For French and Spaniard there might see That England's arm was strong to save; Fair promise there the Wellesley gave, And well in sight of Earth and Heaven, Did he redeem the pledge which there was given.

XII.

Lord of Conquest, heir of Fame, From rescued Portugal he came. Rodrigo's walls in vain oppose; In vain thy bulwarks, Badajoz; And Salamanca's heights proclaim The Conqueror's praise, the Wellesley's name. Oh, had the sun stood still that hour, When Marmont and his broken power Fled from their field of shame ! Spain felt through all her realms the electric blow; Cadiz in peace expands her gates again; And Betis, who, to bondage long resign'd, Flow'd mournfully along the silent plain, Into her joyful bosom unconfined, Receives once more the treasures of the main.

XIII.

What now shall check the Wellesley, when at length Onward he goes, rejoicing in his strength? From Donro, from Castile's extended plain, The foe, a numerous band, Retire; amid the heights which overhang

Dark Ebro's bed, they think to make their stand. He reads their purpose, and prevents their speed; And still, as they recede, Impetuously he presses on their way; Till by Vittoria's walls they stood at bay, And drew their battle up in fair array.

XIV.

Vain their array, their valor vain: There did the practised Frenchman find A master arm, a master mind! Behold his veteran army driven Like dust before the breath of Heaven, Like leaves before the automnal wind! Now, Britain, now thy brow with larrels blind; Raise now the song of joy for rescued Spain! And, Enrope, take thou up the awakening strain — Glory to God! Deliverance for Mankind! XV.

From Spain the living spark went forth: The flame hath caught, the flame is spread ! It warms, - it fires the farthest North. Behold ! the awaken'd Moscovite Meets the Tyrant in his might; The Brandenburg, at Freedom's call, Rises more glorious from his fall; And Frederic, best and greatest of the name, Treads in the path of duty and of fame. See Austria from her painful trance awake ! The breath of God goes forth, - the dry bones shake Up, Germany !- with all thy nations, rise ! Land of the virtuous and the wise, No longer let that free, that mighty mind Endure its shame ! She rose as from the dead, She broke her chains upon the oppressor's head -Glory to God! Deliverance for Mankind!

XVI.

Open thy gates, O Hanover ! display Thy loyal banners to the day; Receive thy old illustrious line once more ! Beneath an Upstart's yoke oppress'd, Long hath it been thy fortune to deplore That line, whose fostering and paternal sway So many an age thy grateful children blest. The yoke is broken now : - A mightier hand Hath dash'd - in pieces dash'd - the iron rod. To meet her Princes, the deliver'd land Pours her rejoicing multitudes abroad; The happy bells, from every town and tower, Roll their glad peals upon the joyful wind; And from all hearts and tongues, with one consent, The high thanksgiving strain to Heaven is sent, -Glory to God! Deliverance for Mankind!

XVII.

Egmont and Horn, heard ye that holy cry, Martyrs of Freedom, from your seats in Heaven? And William the Deliverer, doth thine eye Regard from yon empyreal realm the land For which thy blood was given a What ills hath that poor Country suffer'd long ! Deceived, despised, and plunder'd, and oppress'd, Mockery and insult aggravating wrong ! Severely she her errors hath atoned, And long in anguish groan'd, Wearing the patient semblance of despair, While fervent curses rose with every prayer; In mercy Heaven at length its ear inclined; The avenging armies of the North draw nigh; Joy for the injured Hollander ! - the cry Of Orange rends the sky! All hearts are now in one good cause combined, Once more that flag triumphant floats on high, -Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !

XVIII.

When shall the Dove go forth? Oh, when Shall Peace return among the Sons of Men? Hasten, benignant Heaven, the blessed day! Justice must go before,

And Retribution must make plain the way;

NOTES TO CARMEN TRIUMPHALE.

Force must be crushed by Force, The power of Evil by the power of Good, Ere Order bless the suffering world once more, Or Peace return again. Hold then right on in your auspicions course, Ye Princes, and ye People, hold right on ! Your task not yet is done; Pursue the blow, -ye know your foe, -Complete the happy work so well begun. Hold on, and be your aim, with all your strength, Londly proclam'd and steadily pursued; So shall this fatal Tyranny at length Before the arms of Freedom fall subdued. Then, when the waters of the flood abate, The Dove her resting-place secure may find; And France restored, and shaking off her chain, Shall join the Avengers in the joyful strain, Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !

NOTES

That no weak heart, no abject mind possessed Her counsels. - 1V.

"Can any man of sense," said the Edinburgh Review, "does any plain, unaffected man, above the level of a drivelling courtier, or a feeble financic, dare to say he can look at this impending contest, without trembling, every inch of him, for the result?"—No. XXIV. p. 441.

With all proper deference to so eminent a critic, I would venture to observe, that trembling has been usually supposed to be a symptom of feebleness, and that the case in point has certainly not helied the received opinion

Onoro's Springs .- V.

Fuentes d'Onoro. This name has sometimes been rendered Fountains of Honor, by an easy mistake, or a pardonable license.

Bear witness, those Old Towers. - VI.

Torres Vedras. Turres Veteres,—a name so old as to have been given when the Latin tongue was the language of Portugal. This town is said to bave been founded by the Turduli, a short time before the commencement of the Christian era.

In remembering the lines of Torres Vedras, the opinion of the wise men of the North ought not to be forgotten—" If they (the French) do not make an effort to drive us out of Portugal, it is because we are better there than any where else. We fear they will not leave us on the Tagus many days longer than suits their own purposes."—Edinburgh Rev. No. XXVII. p. 263.

The opinion is delivered with happy precision of language -Our troops were indeed, to use the same neat and felicitous expression, 'better there than any where else.'

> And thou, Busaco, on whose sacred height The ostonished Carmelte, While those unwonted thunders shook his cell, Join¹ d with his prayers the fervor of the fight. — VI.

Of Busaco, which is now as memorable in the military, as it has long been in the monastic history of Portugal, I have given as account in the second volume of Onniana. Doña Bernarda Ferreira's poem upon this venerable place contains much interesting and some heautiful description. The first intelligence of the battle which reached England was in a letter written from this Convent by a Portuguese Commissary. "I have the happiness to acquaint yon," said the writer, " that this night the French lost nine thousand men near the Convent of Basaco. — I heg you not to consider this news as a faction, — for 1, from where I am, saw them fall. This place appears like the antechamber of Hell." — What a contrast to the images which the following extracts present¹

> Es pequeãa aquella Iglesia, Mas para pobres bastante ; Pobre de todo adereço Con que el rico suele ornarse No ay alli plata, ni oro, Telas y sedas oo valeo Donde reyna la pobreza, Que no para en bienes talea Asperando a los del Cielo Los demas tiene por males, Y rica de altos desseos Menosprecia vanidades En el retablo se mira El soberano estandarte, Lecho donde con la Iglesia Quiso Christo desposarse ; La tabla donde se salva El misero naufragante Del pielago de la culpa, Y a puerto glorioso sale. Con perfecion y concierto Se adereçan los altares (por manos de aquellos santos) De bellas flores suaves. En toscos vasos de corcho Lustran texidos con arte Los variados ramilletes Mas que en el oro el esmalta. La florida rama verde Que en aquellos bosques nace, Da colgaduras al templo, Y los brocados abate En dias de mayor fiesta Esto con excessos hazen, Y al suelo por alcatifas Diversas flores reparten. Huele el divino aposento. Hurtando sutil el avre A las rosas y boninas Mil olores que derrame. Humildes estan las celdas De aquellos humildes padres, Cercando al sacro edificio Do tienen su caro amante Cada celda muy pequeña Encierra pobreza grande, Que en competencia sus dueños Gustan de mortificarse. Despues que alli entre el silenclo, No quiso que mas sonasse Ruydo que aquel que forma. Entre lus ramos el ayre ; El de las fuentes y arroyos, Y de las parleras aves, Porque si ellos por Dios lloran, Ellas sus lagrimas caoten. De corcho tosco las puertas, Tambien de pobreza imagen, Son mas hellas en sus ojos Que los Toscanos portales. Es su cama estrecha tabla Do apenas tendidos caben, Porque hasta en ella durmiendo, Crucificados descansen. Una Cruz, y calavara Que tienen siempre delante, Con asperas disciplinas Teõidas de propria sangre,

Son alhajas de su casa ; Y en aquellas soledades Hablando con sabios mudos

Suclen tal vez aliviarse ; Que a los hijos de Theresa Tanto les libres aplacen, Que en los yernos mas remotos Les dan del dia una parte. Fiene cada qual un huerto (porque en el pueda ocuparse) De arbeles de espino, y flores Siempre de olor liberales. Libres ansi del tumulto Que embaraça los mortales, Ferveresas oraciones Mandan a Dies cada instante Sus devetos exercicios No ae les perturha nadie ; Ni sus penitencias hallan Testigos que las estrañen. Qual con cadenas de puas Tan duras como diamantes. Agudas y rigurosas Ciñe su afligida carne ; Quel con cilicios y sogas Asperrimas, intractables, De que jamas se les quitan Las cavernosas senales. * * *

Aquel divine desierto Que Busace denomina. Y es tambien denominado Del arbol de nuestra vida, Se muestra sembrado a trechos De selitarias Ermitas, Que en espacios desiguales Unas de las otras distan. Parece tocan las nubes, Para servirles de sillas, Las que coronando peñas Apenas toca la vista, Yazen otras per les valles En las entraçãos benignas De nuestra madre comun Que humilde se las inclina Qual en las concavidades De las rocas escondida, Que labro naturaleza Con perfecioa infinita. Qual entre las arboledas De verde rama vestida. Informandoles de gracias Sus formas vegetativas. Qual del cristalino arroyo Las bellas margenes pisa, Per lavar les pies descalços Entre sus candidas guijas, Qual en el tronco del arbol Dentro en sus cortezas mismas, Per vencer en gracia al arte Naturaleza fabrica. Unas aprieta con lazos Aquella planta lasciva Que hasta las piedras abraça Con ser tan duras y frias. Otras de amarillos nunsgos Por el techo se matizan, Verdes, obscuros, y negres, Y de color de ceniza. Toscos alli los portales De yerva y moho se pintan, Y de salitre se labran Que en getas al agua imite Cada Ermitaño e la puerta Tiene una pequeña esquila. En el rame de algun arbol Donde pendiente se arrima O en el resquicio gracieso De alguna piedra metida, Y quando toca la Iglesia Todas a tocar se aplican.

Tagus and Zezere, in secret night, Ye saw the haffled raffian take his flight !- VI.

Beacens of infamy, they light the way Where cowardice and cruelty unite, To dama with double shame their ignoninious flight. O, trimmph for the Fiends of Inst and wrath? No'er to be told, yet ne'er to be forgot, What wanton herrors mark their wrackful path? The peasant butcher'd io his ruin'd cot, The heary priest even at the altar shet, Childhood and age given o'er to sword and flame, Woman to infamy; nu crime forgot, By which inventive demons might proclaim Immortal hate to Man, and scern of God's great name. The rudest sextinel, in Britain born, With herror pansed to view the havock done Gave his poor crust to feed some wretch forlern, Wiped his stern eye, then fiercer grasp³d his gun. Scorr's Vision of Don Roderick.

No cruelties recorded in history exceed those which were systematically committed by the French during their retreat from Portugal. "Their conduct, (says Lord Wellington, in his despatch of the 14th of March, 1811,) throughout this retreat, has been marked by a barbarity seldom equalled, and never surpassed.

" Even in the towns of Torres Novas, Thomar, and Pernes, in which the head-quarters of some of the corps had been for four months, and in which the inhabitants had been induced, by premises of good treatment, to remain, they were plundered, and many of their houses destroyed on the night the enemy withdrew from their position; and they have since hurnt every town and village through which they have passed. The Convent of Alcobaça was burnt by order from the French head-quarters. The Bishop's Palace, and the whole town of Leyria, in which General Dreuet had had his head-quarters, shared the same fate; and there is not an inhabitant of the country, of any class or description, who has had any dealing or communication with the French army, who has not had reason to repent of it, or to complain of them. This is the mode in which the promises have been performed, and the assurances have been fulfilled, which were held out in the proclamation of the French commander-in-chief, in which he told the inhabitants of Portugal, that he was not come to make war upon them, but with a powerful army of one hundred and ten thousand men to drive the English into the sea. It is to be hoped that the example of what has occurred in this country will teach the people of this and other nations what value they ought to place on such promises and assurances, and that there is no security for life, or for any thing that renders life valuable, except in decided resistance to the enemy."

As exact an account of these atrocities was collected as it was possible to obtain, - and that record will forever make the French name detested in Portugal. In the single diocese of Coimbra, 2969 persons, nien, women, and children, were murdered, - every one with some shocking circumstance of aggravated cruelty. - New huma só das 2969 mortes commettidas pelo inimigo, deixou de ser atroz e dolorosissima. (Breve Memoria dos Estragos Causados no Bispado de Coimhra pelo Exercite Francez, commandado peln General Massena. Extrahide das Enformaçõens que deram os Reverendos Parocos, e remettida a Junta dos Socorros da Subscripsam Britannica, pelo Reverendo Provisor Governador do mesmo Bispado, p. 12.) Some details are given in this brief Memorial A de tel forfaits, says J. J. Rousseau, celui qui ditourne sts regards est un lâche, un deserteur de la justice : la veritable humanité les envisage pour les connoitre, pour les juger, pour les detester. (Le Levite d'Ephraim.) I will not, however, in this place repent abominations which at once outrage humanity and disgrace human nature.

When the French, in 1792, entered Spire, some of them began to commit excesses which would soon have led to a general sack. Custine immediately ordered a captain, two officers, and a whole company to he shot. This dreadfal example, he told the National Convention, he considered as the only means of saving the honor of the French nation, and it met with the approbation of the whole army. But the It was reserved for Bonaperte to render them infamous, as well as to lead them to destruction.

The French soldier, says Capmany, is executioner and "obher at the same time : he leaves the unhappy wretch, who is delivered ever to his mercy, noked to the skin, - stripping off the clothes that they may not be torn by the musket-shot ! -- The pen falls from my hand, and I cannot proceed !

Para que se junte a esta crueldad la mayor infamia, el soldado Frances es verdugo y ladron en una pieza ; dexa en cueros vivos al malaventurado que entregan o su discrecion, quitandole la ropa antes que los fusilazos se la destrozen. La pluma se cae de la mano, y no pucde proseguir. - Centinela, contra Franceses, P. 2, p. 35.

Yet the Edinburgh Review says, " The hatred of the name of a Frenchman in Spain has been such as the reality will by no means justify; and the detestation of the Freach government has, emong the inferior orders, been carried to a pitch wholly unanthorized by its proceedings towards them." No. XXVII. p. 262. This passage might be read with astonishment, if any thing absurd, any thing mischievous, or any thing false, could excite surprise when it comes from that quarter.

> What though the Tyrant, drunk with power, Might vaunt himself, in impious hour, Lord and Disposer of this earthly ball ? - VII.

Lo he dicho vurias veces, y lo repito ahora, que las tres epocas terribles en los annales del mundo son, el deluvio universal, Mahoma, y Buonaparte. Aque pretendia convertir todas las religiones en una, y este todas las naciones, para ser el su cabeza. Aquel predicaba la unidad de Dios con la cimiturra; y este no le nombra uno ni trino, pues solo predica, o huce predicar su propia divinidad, dezandose dar de sus infames y sacrilegos adoradores, los periodistas Franceses, el dictado de Todo-poderoso. El mismo se ha llegado a crecr tal, y se ha hecho creer la cobardia y vileza de las naciones que se han dexado subyugar. Solo la España le ha obligado a reconnocerse, que no cra antes, ni es ahora, sino un hombre, y hombre muy pequeno, a quien la fortuna ciega ha hecho grande a los ojos de los pueblos espantados del terror de su nombre, que miden la grandeza del poder por la de las atrocidades. - Centinela, contra Franceses, p. 48.

" I have sometimes said, and I repeat it now, that the three terrible epochs in the annals of the World are the General Deluge, Mahommed, and Bonaparte. Mahommed pretended to cenvert all religions into one, and this man all nations into one, in order to make himself their head. Mahommed preached the unity of God with the cimeter; and this man neither his Unity nor his Trinity, for he neither preaches, ner causes to be preached, any thing except his own Divinity, letting his infamous and sacrilegious adorers, the French journalists, give him the appellation of Almighty. He has gone so far as to believe himself such, and the cowardice and haseness of the nations who have suffered themselves to be subdued, have made him believe it. Spain alone has compelled him to know himself, that he neither was formerly nor is now any thing more than a mere man, and a very little one, whom blind Fortune has made appear great in the eyes of people astonished at the terror of his name, and measuring the greatness of his power by that of his atrocities."

Knowing that nought could ever appall The Spaniard's fortitude. - VII.

"The fate of Spain, we think, is decided, and that fine and misguided country has probably yielded, by this time, to the fate which has fallen on the greater part of continental Europe. Her European dominions have yielded already to the unrelaxing grasp of the insatiable conqueror." - Edinburgh Review, No. XXVI. p. 298.

"The fundamental position which we ventured to lay down respecting the Spanish question was this : - that the spirit of the people, however enthusiastic and universal, was in its nature more uncertain and short-lived, more likely to be extinguished by reverses, or to go out of itself amidst the delays of a protracted contest, than the steady, regular, mod-

French armies had not theo been systematically brutalized. [them under known leaders, and supplies them by systematic arrangements : - a proposition so plain and obvious, that if it escaped ridicale as a truism, it might have been reasonably expected to avoid the penalties of heresy and paradox The event has indeed wofully proved its truth." - Edinburgh Rev. No. XXVII. p. 246.

These gentlemen could see no principle of permanence in the character of the Spaniards, and no proof of it in their history ; - and they could discover ne principle of dissolution in the system of Bonaparte ; - a system founded upon force and falsehood, in direct opposition to the interests of his own subjects and to the feelings of human nature.

The Campeador. - VIII.

The Cid, Rodrige Diaz de Bivar. The word has been variously explained, but its origin seems to be satisfactorily traced by Verstegan in his explanation of some of our English surnames.

"Cemp or Kemp, properly one that fighteth hand to hand, whereunte the name in Teutonic of Kemp-fight accordetl., and in French of Combat.

" Certain among the ancient Germans made profession of being Camp-fighters or Kemp-fighters, for all is one; and among the Danes and Swedes were the like, as Scarcater, Arngrim, Arnerod, Haldan, and sundry ethers. They were also called Kempanas, whereof is derived our name of Campion, which, after the French orthography, some pronounce Champion.2

"Dene or Den is the termination of sundry of our surnames, as for example of Camden, which I take anciently to have been Campden, and signifieth the Dene or Dale belonging to some Cemp or Camp-fighter (for both is one) in our now used language called a Champion, but in the Teutonic a Campion. A Campdeo may also have been some place appointed for Campions, Combat-fighters, or men of arms to encounter each other. And so the place became afterward to he the surname of him and his family that owned it, as others in like sort have done."

This feeling is forcibly expressed by Capmany. O Visperas Sicilianas tan famosas en la historia, quando os podremos acompanar con completas, para que los Angeles canten laudes en el cielo. - Centinela, contra Franceses, p. 96.

Ecce iterum Crispinus ! What says the Edinburgh Review concerning Russia? "Considering how little that power has shown itself capable of effecting for the salvation of Europe - how wretched the state of its subjects is under the present government - how trifling an acquisition of strength the common enemy could expect to obtain from the entire possession of its resources - we acknowledge that we should contemplate with great composure any change which might by the foundation of future improvement, and scatter the forces of France over the dominion of the Czars." - No. XXVIII. p. 460.

This is a choice passage. The reasoning is worthy of the writer's judgment, the feeling perfectly consistent with his liberality, and the conclusion as consistent with his politics.

who are the most impatient of her yoke, as amongst the inhabitants of Bourdeaux, or the conscripts of the years 1808 and 1809. In making this comparison, we are indeed putting the case much more strongly egainst France than the facts warrant; for, with the exception of Holland, and the States into which the conscription has been introduced, either immediately, or by means of large requisitions of men made to their Governments,* the changes effected by the French invasion have been favorable to the individual happiness of the inhabitants,* so that the hatred of France is liable to considerable diminution, inasmuch as the national antipathy and spirit of independence are gradually undermined by the solid benefits which the change of masters has conferred."—No. XXVIII, p. 458.

Great as a statesman, profound as a philosopher, amiable as an optimist of the Pangloss school, --- but not altogether fortanate as a Prophet !

POSTSCRIPT.

1821.

As a proper accompaniment to the preceding Notes, non their republication, I subjoin an extract from a William-Smithic epistle, begun a few years ago npon sufficient provocation, but left nufinished, because better employments delayed its completion till the offence, gross as it was, seemed no longer deserving of a thought.

My fortune has been somewhat remarkable in this respect, that, bestowing less attention than most men upon contemporary literature, I am supposed to concern myself with it in a degree which would leave me no time for any worthier occupation. Half the persons who are wounded in the Quarterly Review fix upon me as the object of their resentment ; some, because they are conscions of having deserved chastisement at my hands ; others because they give credit to an empty report, a lying assertion, or their own conceited sagacity in discovering a writer by his style. As for the former, they flatter themselves egregiously in supposing that I should throw away my anger upon such subjects. But by the latter I would willingly have it understood, that I heartily disapprove the present fashion of criticism, and sincerely wish that you, Sir, and your friend, had taken out an exclusive patent for it, when you brought it into vogue.

With regard to literary assailants, I should as little think of resenting their attacks in anger, as of making war upon midges and mosquitoes. I have therefore never noticed your amiable colleague in his critical capacity. Let him blander, and misquote, and misrepresent, and contradict himself in the same page, or in the same sentence, with as much ingenity as he will: "Tis his vocation, Hal!" and some allowances must be made for habit. I remember what Lord Anson's linguist said to him at Canton, upon the detection of some notable act of dislonesty: Chananan very great regue truly: but hab fushion: no can help. Concerning me, and any composition of mine, it is impossible that this gentleman can write wisely unless his nature should undergo a radical change, for it is written in the wisest book which ever proceeded from mere huminity, that "into a malicions soul wisdom shall not enter."

You may have seen a mastiff of the right English breed assailed by a little impertinent, noisy, medalling cur, who runs behind him, snapping and barking at his beels, and sometimes gets staggered by a chance-whisk of his tail. The mastiff continues his way peaceably; or, if he condescends to notice the yelper, it is only by stopping half a minute, and litting his leg over him. Just such, Sir, is the notice which I bestow upon your colleague in his critical character.

But for F. J. Philomath, and Professor of the Occult Sciences, he is a grave personage, whose political and prophetical pretensions entitle him to high consideration in these days. He

• N. B. These little exceptions include all the countries which were annexed to the French Empire, all Italy, and all the States of the Couldderation of the Rhine.

† Particularly the commercial part of them, is as great a man as Lilly in the time of the Commonwealth or as Pararidge after him. It is well known what infinite pains he bestowed in casting the nativities of Lord Wellington, Bonaparte, and the Emperor of Rassia, - all for the good of mankind ! and it is also noturious that he mistook the aspects, and made some very unfortunate errors in his predictions. At a time when he was considerably indisposed in consequence of this mortification, I took the liberty of administering to him a dose of his own words, mixed, perhaps, Sir, with a few of yours, for you were his fellow-student in astrology, and are known to have assisted him in these his colculations. The medicine was given in the form of extract ; but the patient could not have used more wry faces had it been extract of coloquintida. And indeed it produced a most unpleusant effect. Ever since that time his paroxysms have been more violent, and he has been troubled with occasional ravings, accompanied with periodical discharges of bile in its most offensive state. Nevertheless, dreadfully bilious as he is, and tormented with acrid humors, it is hoped that by a coo diet, by the proper use of refrigerants, above all, by paying due attention to the state of the primæ viæ, and observing a strict abstinence from the Quarterly Review, the danger of a cholera morbus may be averted.

I have not been travelling out of the record while thus incidentally noticing a personage with whom yon, Sir, are more naturally and properly associated than I have been with Mr. Wordsworth, this your colleague and yon heing the Gog and Magog of the Edinburgh Review. Had it not been for a difference of opinion upon political points between myself and certain writers in that journal who laid claim to the facally of the second sight, I suspect that I should never have ineurred your hestility. What those points of difference were, I must here be permitted to set forth for the satisfaction of those readers who may not be so well acquainted with them as you are : they related to the possibility of carrying on the late war to an honorable and successful termination.

It was in our state of feeling, Sir, as well as in our state of knowledge that we differed, in our desires as much as in our judgment. They predicted for us nothing but disgrace and defeat: predicted is the word; for they themselves assured us that they were "seriously occupied with the destinics of Europe and of mankind:" —

"As who should say, I am Sir Oracle !"

They ridiculed " the romantic hopes of the English nation," and imputed the spirit by which the glory of that nation has been raised to its highest point, and the deliverance of Europe accomplished, to " the tricks of a paltry and interested party." They said that events had "verified their predictions," had " more than justified their worst forebodings." They told us in 1810 that the fate of Spain was decided, and that that " misguided " country (misguided in having ventured to resist the most insolent usurpation that ever was attempted) " had yielded to the Conqueror." This manner of speaking of an event in the preter-pluperfect tense, before it has come to pass, may be either a slight grammatical slip, or a prophetical figure of speech ; but, as old Dr. Eachard says, "I hate all small ambiguous surmises, all quivering and mincing conjectures: give me the lasty and bold thinker, whe, when he undertakes to prophesy, decs it punctually." " It would be blood-thirsty and cruel," they said, " to foment petty insurrections, (meaning the war in Spain and Portugal,) after the only contest is over from which any good can spring in the present concerts over from anise any gene concerning the property of the property of the metanoladity truth. Shut our eyes to it as we many, there can be no doubt about the matter. For the present, pcace and submission must be the lot of the vanquished." " Let us hear no more of objections to a Bonaparte ruling in Spain."

"Harry, the wish was father to that thought !"

They told as that if Lord Wellington was not driven out of Portugal, it was because the Frenck government thought lim "better there than any where dse." They told us they were prepared to "contemplate with great composure the conquest of Russia, by Bonaparte, as a "change which would lay the foundation of future improvement in the dominions of tha Casts'' = -

" Si mens sit læta tibi crederis esse propheta," eave an old Leonine rhymester. - And as for expecting "a MUTINY (hear Germany ! for so they qualified it !) amongst the rassal states of France, it would be as chimerical," they said, " as to expect one amongst the inhabitants of Bourdeaux." And here these lucky prophets were peculiarly felicitous; the inhabitants of Bourdeoux having been the first people in France who threw off the yoke of Bonaparto's tyranny, and mounted the white cockade.

" Omnia jam funt, fieri que posse negabam."

Poor Oracle ! the face is double-bronzed ; and yet it is but a wooden head !

I stood upon firm ground, while they were sticking in the Slough of Despond. Hinc ille lacryme ! I charged them at the time with ignorance, presumption, and pusillanimity. And now, Sir, I ask of you, were they or were they not ignorant? Hero are their assertions !- Were they or were they not presumptuous ? Here are their predictions !- Were they or were they not pusillanimous? Have they or have they not been confuted, and confounded, and exposed, and shamed, and stultified, by the event?

They who know me will bear witness, that, before a rumor of war was heard from the Peninsula, I had looked toward that quarter as the point where we might hope first to see the horizon open ; and that, from the hour in which the struggle commenced, I never doubted of its final success, provided England should do its duty : this confidence was founded upon a knowledge of the country and the people, end upon the principles which were then and there first brought into action against the enemy. At the time when every effort was made (as you, Sir, well kaow) to vilify and disgust our ellies, to discourage the public, to impede the measures of government, to derange its finances, and thereby cut off its means, to poralvze the arm and deaden the heart of England ; - when we were told of the irresistible power and perfect policy of Bonaparte, the consummate skill of his generals, and the invincibility of his armies, my language was this : " The one husiness of Eogland is to abate the power of France : that power she ounst beat down, or fall herself; that power she will beat down, if she do but strenuously put forth her own mighty means." And again, - "For our soldiers to equal our seamen, it is They only necessary for them to be equally well commanded. have the same heart and soul, as well as the same flesb and blood. Too much, indeed, may be exacted from them in a retreat; but set their face toward a foe, and there is nothing within the reach of human achievement which they cannot perform." And again, - "Carry on the war with all the heart, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, of this nighty empire, and you will heat down the power of France.' Was 1 wrong, Sir? Or has the event corresponded to this confidence `

Bear witness, Torres Vedras, Salamanca, and Vittoria ! Bear witness, Orthies and Thunlouse ! Bear witness, Waterloo, and that miserable tyront, who was then making ond unmaking kings with a breath, and now frets upon the rock of St. Helena, like a tiger in his cage !

ODE,

WRITTEN DURING THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH BONAPARTE, IN JANUARY, 1814.

1.

Who counsels peace at this momentous hour, When God hath given deliverance to the oppress'd, And to the injured power?

Who counsels peace, when Vengeance, like a flood, 26

Rolls on, no longer now to be repress'd; When innocent blood

From the four corners of the world cries out For justice upon one accursed head;

When Fredoom hath her holy banners spread Over all nations, now in one just cause United; when, with one sublime accord, Europe throws off the yoke abhorr'd,

And Loyalty, and Faith, and Ancient Laws Follow the avenging sword!

Woe, woe to England! woe and endless shame, If this heroic land,

False to her feelings and unspotted fame, Hold out the olive to the Tyrant's hand ! Woe to the world, if Bonaparté's throne

Be suffer'd still to stand !

For by what names shall Right and Wrong be known,-

What new and courtly phrases must we feign

For Falsehood, Murder, and all monstrous crimes, If that perfidious Corsican maintain

Still his detested reign,

And France, who yearns even now to break her chain,

Beneath his iron rule be left to groan? No! by the innumerable dead,

Whose blood hath for his lust of power been shed, Death only can for his foul deeds atone;

That peace which Death and Judgment can bestow, That peace be Bonaparté's, --- that alone !

3.

For sooner shall the Ethiop change his skin, Or from the Leopard shall her spots depart, Than this man change his old, flagitious heart. Have ye not seen him in the balance weigh'd,

And there found wanting? On the stage of blood Foremost the resolute adventurer stood; And when, by many a battle won,

He placed upon his brow the crown,

Curbing delirious France beneath his sway, Then, like Octavius in old time,

Fair name might he have handed down, Effacing many a stain of former crime.

Fool! should he cast away that bright renown! Fool! the redemption proffer'd should he lose ! When Heaven such grace vouchsafed him that the way

To Good and Evil lay Before him, which to choose.

4.

But Evil was his Good, For all too long in blood had he been nursed, And ne'er was earth with verier tyrant cursed Bold man and bad,

Remorseless, godless, full of fraud and lies, And black with murders and with perjuries,

Himself in Hell's whole panoply he clad; No law but his own headstrong will he knew,

No counsellor but his own wicked heart. From evil thus portentous strength he drew, And trampled under foot all human ties,

All holy laws, all natural charities.

5. O France! beneath this fierce Barbarian's sway Disgraced thou art to all succeding times; Rapine, and blood, and fire have mark'd thy way,

All loathsome, all unutterable crimes. A curse is on thee, France! from far and wide It hath gone up to Heaven. All lands have cried

For vengeance upon thy detested head! All nations curse thee, France! for wheresoe'er, In peace or war, thy banner hath been spread, All forms of human woe have follow'd there. The Living and the Dead

Cry out alike against thee! They who bear, Crouching beneath its weight, thine iron yoke Join in the bitterness of secret prayer The voice of that innumerable throng, Whose slaughter'd spirits day and night invoke The Everlasting Judge of right and wrong, How long, O Lord! Holy and Just, how long !

A merciless oppressor hast thou been, Thyself remorselessly oppress'd meantime; Greedy of war, when all that thou couldst gain Was but to dye thy soul with deeper erine, And rivet faster round thyself the chain. Oh! hlind to honor, and to interest blind, When thus in abject servitude resign'd To this barbarian upstart, thou couldst brave God's justice, and the heart of human-kind! Madly thou thoughtest to enslave the world, Thyself the while a miserable slave. Behold, the flag of vengeance is unfurl'd! The dreadful armies of the North advance; While England, Portugal, and Spain combined, Give their triumphant banners to the wind, And stand victorious in the fields of France.

7.

One man hath been for ten long, wretched years The eause of all this blood and all these tears; One man in this most awful point of time Draws on thy danger, as he eaused thy orime. Wait not too long the event, For now whole Europe comes against thee bent; His wiles and their own strength the nations know : Wise from past wrongs, on future peace intent, The People and the Princes, with one mind, From all parts move against the general foe; One act of justice, one atoning blow, One execrable head laid low,

Even yet, O France ! averts thy punishment. Open thine eyes !— too long hast thou been blind ; Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind !

France! if thou lovest thine ancient fame, Revenge thy sufferings and thy shame! By the bones which bleach on Jaffa's beach; By the blood which on Doningo's shore Hath elogg'd the carrion-birds with gore; By the flesh which gorged the wolves of Spain, Or stiffen'd on the snowy plain Of frozen Moscovy; By the bodies, which lie all open to the sky,

ODES.

Tracking from Elbe to Rhine the Tyrant's flight By the widow's and the orphan's cry; By the childless parent's misery; By the lives which he hath shed; By the ruin he hath spread; By the prayers which rise for curses on his head,— Redeem, O France! thine ancient fame, Revenge thy sufferings and thy shame, Open thine cyes!—too long hast thou been blind; Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind!

9.

By those horrors which the night Witness'd when the torehes' light To the assembled nurderers show'd Where the blood of Condé flow'd; By thy murder'd Piehegru's fame; murder'd Weicht – on Endish new

By murder'd Wright — an English name ; By murder'd Palm's atrocious doom ;

By murder'd Hofer's martyrdom,— Oh! by the virtuous blood thus vilely spilt, The Villain's own peculiar, private guilt,

Open thine eyes !- too long hast thou been bline, Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind !

ODE,

WRITTEN DURING THE WAR WITH AMERICA, 181

1.

WHEN shall the Island Queen of Ocean lay The thunderbolt aside,

And, twining olives with her laurel erown, Rest in the Bower of Peace?

Not long may this unnatural strife endure Beyond the Atlantie deep; Not long may men, with vain ambition drunk, And insolent in wrong, Afflict with their misrule the indignant land Where Washington hath left His awful memory A light for after-times ! Vile instruments of fallen Tyranny In their own annals, by their countrymen, For lasting shame shall they be written down Soon may the better Genius there prevail !

Then will the Island Queen of Ocean lay The thunderbolt aside,

And, twining olives with her laurel crown, Rest in the Bower of Peace.

But not in ignominious ease, Within the Bower of Peace supine, The Ocean Queen shall rest! Her other toils await,— A holier warfare,— nobler victories; And amaranthine wreaths, Which, when the laurel crown grows sere, Will live forever green.

ODES.

4. Hear me, O England ! rightly may I elaim Thy favorable audience, Queen of Isles, My Mother-land revered; For in the perilous hour, When weaker spirits stood aghast, And reptile tongues, to thy dishonor hold, Spit their dull venom on the public ear, My voice was heard, - a voice of hope, Of confidence and joy, ---Yea, of such prophecy As wisdom to her sons doth ave youchsafe, When with pure heart and diligent desire They seek the fountain springs, And of the Ages past Take counsel reverently.

5.

Nobly hast thon stood up Against the foulest Tyranny that ere, In elder or in later times, Hath outraged human-kind. O glorious England ! thou hast borne thyself Religiously and bravely in that strife; And happier victory hath blest thine arms Than, in the days of yore, Thine own Plantagenets achieved, Or Marlborough, wise in council as in field, Or Wolfe, heroic name. Now gird thyself for other war; Look round thee, and behold what ills, Remediable and yet unremedied, Affliet man's wretched race ! Put on the panoply of faith ! Bestir thyself against thine inward foes, Ignorance and Want, with all their brood Of miseries and of crimes.

6.

Powerful thou art: imperial Rome, When in the Augustan age she closed The temple of the two-faced God, Could boast no power like thine. Less opulent was Spain, When Mexico her sumless riches sent To that proud monarchy; And Hayti's ransack'd caverns gave their gold ; And from Potosi's recent veins The unabating stream of treasure flow'd. And blest art thou, above all nations blest, For thou art Freedom's own beloved Isle! The light of Science shines Conspicuous like a beacon on thy shores; Thy martyrs purchased at the stake Faith uncorrupt for thine inheritance ; And by thine hearths Domestie Purity, Safe from the infection of a tainted age, Hath kept her sanctuaries. Yet, O dear England ! powerful as thou art, And rich, and wise, and blest, Yet would I see thee, O my Mother-land!

Mightier and wealthier, wiser, happier still!

For still doth Ignorance Maintain large empire here, Dark and unblest amid surrounding light; Even as within this favor'd spot, Earth's wonder and her pride, The traveller on his way Beholds with weary eye Bleak moorland, noxious fen, and lonely heath, In drear extension spread, Oh grief! that spirits of celestial seed, Whom ever-teeming Nature hath brought forth, With all the human faculties divine Of sense and sonl endued, — Disherited of knowledge and of bliss, Mere creatures of brute life, Should grope in darkness lost'

Must this reproach endure ? Honor and praise to him The universal friend, The general benefactor of mankind; He who from Coromandel's shores His perfected discovery bronght; Ile by whose generous toils This foul reproach ere long shall be effaced, This root of evil be eradicate ! Yea, generations yet unborn Shall owe their weal to him, And future nations bless The honor'd name of Bell.

9.

Now may that blessed edifice Of public good be rear'd Which holy Edward traced, The spotless Tudor, he whom Death Too early summon'd to his heavenly throne. For Brunswick's line was this great work reserved. For Brunswick's fated line; They who from papal darkness, and the thrall Of that worst bondage which doth hold The immortal spirit chain'd, Saved us in happy hour. Fitly for them was this great work reserved : So, Britain, shall thine aged monarch's wish Receive its due accomplishment -That wish which with the good (Had he no other praise) Through all succeeding times would rank his name, That all within his realms Might learn the Book, which all Who rightly learn shall live.

10.

From public fountains the perennial stream Of public weal must flow. O England! wheresoe'er thy churches stand, There on that sacred ground, Where the rich harvest of mortality Is laid, as in a garner, treasured up, There plant the Tree of Knowledge! Water it With thy perpetual bounty! It shall spread Its branches o'er the venerable pile, Shield it against the storm, And bring forth fruits of life.

11.

Train up thy children, England ! in the ways Of righteousness, and feed them with the bread Of wholesome doctrine. Where hast thou thy nines

But in their industry ? But in their industry ? Thy bulwarks where, but in their breasts ? Thy might, but in their arms ? Shall not their numbers therefore be thy wealth, Thy strength, thy power, thy safety, and thy pride ? O grief then, grief and shame, If, in this flourishing land, There should be dwellings where the new-born babe Doth bring unto its parents' soul no joy ' Where squalid Poverty Receives it at its birth, And on her wither'd knees Gives it the scanty food of discontent '

12.

Queen of the Seas! enlarge thyself; Redundant as thou art of life and power, Be thou the hive of nations, And send thy swarms abroad ! Send them, like Greece of old, With arts and science to enrich The uncultivated earth; But with more precious gifts than Greece, or Tyre, Or elder Egypt, to the world bequeath'd --Just laws, and rightful polity, And, crowning all, the dearest boon of Heaven, Its word and will reveal'd. Queen of the Seas ! enlarge The place of thy pavilion. Let them stretch The curtains of thine habitations forth ; Spare not; but lengthen thou Thy cords, make strong thy stakes.

13.

Queen of the Seas ! enlarge thyself; Send thou thy swarins abroad ! For in the years to come, Though centuries or millenniums intervene, Where'er thy progeny, Thy language, and thy spirit shall be found, -If on Ontario's shores, Or late-explored Missouri's pastures wide, Or in that Austral world long sought, The many-isled Pacific, - yea, where waves, Now breaking over coral reefs, affright The venturous mariner, When islands shall have grown, and eities risen Where'er thy language lives, By whatsoever name the land be call'd, That land is English still, and there Thy influential spirit dwells and reigns. Thrones fall, and Dynasties are changed; Empires decay and sink Beneath their own unwieldy weight; Dominion passeth like a cloud away · The imperishable mind Survives all meaner things.

14.

Train up thy children, England, in the ways Of righteousness, and feed them with the bread Of wholesome doctrine. Send thy swarms abroad Send forth thy humanizing arts, Thy stirring enterprise, Thy liberal polity, thy Gospel light! Illume the dark idolater, Reclaim the savage! O thou Ocean Queen! Be these thy toils when thou hast laid The thunderbolt aside : He who hath blest thine arms

Will bless thee in these holy works of Peace ! Father ! thy kingdom come, and as in Heaven Thy will be done on Earth !

CARMINA AULICA,

WRITTEN IN 1814, ON THE ARRIVAL OF THE AL-LIED SOVEREIGNS IN ENGLAND.

> "Εχω καλά τε φράσαι, τόλμα τέ μοι Εύθεῖα χλῶσσαν ὄρνύει λέγειν. Ρινόλκ, Οίμμρ. Χιμ.

ODE

TO HIS ROYAL INGUNESS THE PRINCE REGENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

1.

PRINCE of the mighty Isle! Proud day for thee and for thy kingdoms this, When Britain round her spear The olive garland twines, by Victory won.

2.

Rightly mayst thou rejoice, For in a day of darkness and of storms, An evil day, a day of woe, To thee the sceptre feel. The Continent was leagued, Its numbers wielded by one will, Against the mighty Isle; All shores were hostile to the Red Cross flag, All ports against it closed; Save where, behind their ramparts driven, The Spaniard, and the faithful Portugal, Each on the utmost limits of his land, Invincible of heart, Stood firm, and put their trust In their good cause and thee.

3.

Such perils menaced from abroad; At home worse dangers compass'd thee, Where shallow counsellors, A weak but clamorous crew, Pester'd the land, and with their withering breath Poison'd the public ear

CARMINA AULICA.

For peace the feeble raised their factious cry ; Oh, madness to resist The Invincible in arms! Seek the peace-garland from his dreadful band ! And at the Tyrant's feet They would have knelt to take The wreath of aconite for Britain's brow. Prince of the mighty Isle ! Rightly mayst thou rejoice, For in the day of danger thou didst turn From their vile counsels thine indignant heart ; Rightly mayst thou rejoice, When Britain round her spear The olive-garland twines, by Victory won 4.

Rejoice, thou mighty Isle, Queen of the Seas! rejoice; Ring round, ye merry bells, Till every steeple rock, And the wide air grow giddy with your joy ! Flow, streamers, to the breeze ! And, ye victorious banners, to the sun Unroll the proud Red Cross! Now let the anvil rest; Shut up the loom, and open the school-doors, That young and old may with festivities Hallow for memory, through all after years, This memorable time; This memorable time, When Peace, long absent, long deplored, returns. Not as vile Faction would have brought her home, Her countenance for shame abased, In servile weeds array'd, Submission leading her, Fear, Sorrow, and Repentance following close; And War, scarce deigning to conceal Beneath the mantle's folds his armed plight, Dogging her steps with deadly eye intent, Sure of his victim, and in devilish joy Laughing behind the mask.

5.

Not thus doth Peace return !---A blessed visitant she comes, -Honor in his right hand Doth lead her like a bride; And Victory goes before; Hope, Safety, and Prosperity, and Strength, Come in her joyful train. Now let the churches ring With high thanksgiving songs, And the full organ pour Its swelling peals to Heaven, The while the grateful nation bless in prayer Their Warriors, and their Statesmen, and their Prince, Whose will, whose mind, whose arm Have thus with happy end their efforts crown'd. Prince of the mighty Isle, Rightly mayst thou rejoice, When Britain round her spear The olive-garland twines, by Victory won.

> 6. Enjoy thy triumph now, Prince of the mighty Isle!

Enjoy the rich reward, so rightly due, When rescued nations, with one heart and voice, Thy counsels bless and thee. Thou, on thine own Firm Island, seest the while, As if the tales of old Romance Were but to typify these splendid days, Princes, and Potentates, And Chiefs renown'd in arms, From their great enterprise achieved, In friendship and in joy collected here 7.

Rejoice, thou mighty Isle ! Queen of the Scas! rejoice; For ne'er in elder nor in later times Have such illustrious guests Honor'd thy silver shores. No such assemblage shone in Edward's hall, Nor brighter triumphs graced his glorious reign. Prince of the mighty Isle, Proud day for thee and for thy kingdoms this ' Rightly mayst thou rejoice, When Britain round her spear The olive-garland twines, by Victory won.

3.

Yet in the pomp of these festivities One mournful thought will rise within thy mind – The thought of Him who sits In mental as in visual darkness lost. How had his heart been fill'd With deepest gratitude to Heaven, 'Had he beheld this day! O King of kings, and Lord of lords, Thou, who hast visited thus heavily The anointed head, Oh! for one little interval, One precious hour, Remove the blindness from his soul, That he may know it all, And bless thee ere he die.

9.

Thou also shouldst have seen This harvest of thy hopes, Thou, whom the guilty act Of a proud spirit overthrown Sent to thine early grave in evil hour ! Forget not him, my country, in thy joy; But let thy grateful hand With laurel garlands hang The tomb of Perceval. Virtuous, and firm, and wise The Ark of Britain in her darkest day He steer'd through stormy seas; And long shall Britain hold his memory dear, And faithful Ilistory give His meed of lasting praise.

10.

That earthly meed shall his compeers enjoy, Britain's true counsellors, Who see with just success their counsels crown'd They have their triumph now, to him denied; Proud day for them is this ! Prince of the mighty Isle ! Proud day for them and thee, When Britain round her spear The olive-garland twines, by Victory won.

ODE

TO HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY, ALEXANDER THE FIRST, EMPEROR OF ALL THE RUSSIAS.

1.

CONQUEROR, Deliverer, Friend of human-kind! The free, the happy Island welcomes thee; Thee, from thy wasted realms, So signally revenged; From Prussia's rescued plains; i'rom Dresden's field of slaughter, where the ball, Which struck Moreau's dear life. Was turn'd from thy more precious head aside; From Leipsic's dreadful day, From Elbe, and Rhine, and Seine, In thy career of conquest overpast; From the proud Capital Of haughty France subdued, Then to her rightful line of Kings restored; Thee, Alexander ! thee, the Great, the Good, The Glorious, the Beneficent, the Just. Thee to her honor'd shores The mighty Island welcomes in her joy.

Sixscore full years have past, Since to these friendly shores Thy famous ancestor, Illustrious PETER, came. Wise traveller he, who over Europe went, Marking the ways of men; That so to his dear country, which then rose Among the nations in uncultured strength, He might bear back the stores Of elder polity. Its sciences and arts. Little did then the industrious German think,-The soft Italian, lapp'd in luxury, ---Helvetia's mountain sons, of freedom proud, -The patient Hollander, Prosperous and warlike then,--Little thought they that, in that farthest North, From PETER's race should the Deliverer spring, Destined by Heaven to save Art, Learning, Industry, Beneath the bestial hoof of godless Might All trampled in the dust. As little did the French, Vaunting the power of their Great Monarch then, (His schemes of wide ambition yet uncheck'd,) As little did they think, That from rude Moscovy the stone should come, To smite their huge Colossus, which bestrode The subject Continent; And from its feet of clay, Breaking the iron limbs and front of brass, Strew the rejoicing Nations with the wreck.

3.

Roused as thou wert with insult and with wrong, Who should have blamed thee if, in high-wrought mood Of vengeance and the sense of injured power,

Thou from the flames which laid The City of thy Fathers in the dust, Hadst bid a spark be brought, And borne it in thy tent, Religiously by night and day preserved, Till on Montmartre's height, When open to thine arms, Her last defence o'erthrown. The guilty city lay, Thon hadst call'd every Russian of thine host To light his flambeau at the sacred flame, And sent them through her streets. And wrapt her roofs and towers, Temples and palaces. Her wealth and boasted spoils, In one wide flood of fire, Making the hated Nation feel herself The miseries she had spread ?

Who should have blamed the Conqueror for that deed? Yea, rather would not one exulting cry Have riscn from Elbe to Nile. How is the Oppressor fallen ! Moscow's re-rising walls Had rung with glad acclaim ; Thanksgiving hymns had fill'd Tyrol's rejoicing vales; How is the Oppressor fallen ! The Germans in their grass-grown marts had met To celebrate the deed; Holland's still waters had been starr'd With festive lights, reflected there From every house and hut, From every town and tower; The Iberian and the Lusian's injured realms, From all their mountain-holds, From all their ravaged fields, From cities sack'd, from violated fanes, And from the sanctuary of every heart, Had pour'd that pious strain -How is the Oppressor fallen! Righteous art thou, O Lord ! Thou, Zaragoza, from thy sepulchres Hadst join'd the hymn ; and from thine ashes thou, Manresa, faithful still ! The blood that calls for vengeance in thy streets, Madrid, and Porto thine, And that which from the beach Of Tarragona sent its cry to Heaven, Had rested then appeased. Orphans had clapp'd their hands, And widows would have wept exulting tears, And childless parents, with a bitter joy, Have blest the avenging deed.

5.

But thou hadst seen chough Of horrors, — amply hadst avenged mankind.

CARMINA AULICA.

Witness that dread retreat, When God and nature smote The Tyrant in his pride ' No wider ruin overtook Sennacherib's impious host; Nor when the frantic Persian led His veterans to the Lybian sands; Nor when united Greece O'er the barbaric power that victory won Which Europe yet may bless. A fouler Tyrant cursed the groaning earth, -A fearfuler destruction was dispensed. Victorious armies followed on his flight; On every side he met The Cossack's dreadful spear; On every side he saw The injured nation rise, Invincible in arms. What myriads, victims of one wicked will, Spent their last breath in curses on his head ! There, where the soldiers' blood Froze in the festering wound; And nightly the cold moon Saw sinking thousands in the snow lie down, Whom there the morning found Stiff as their icy bed.

6.

Rear high the monument ! In Moscow and in proud Petropolis, The brazen trophy build; Cannon on cannon piled, Till the huge column overtop your towers ' From France the Tyrant brought These instruments of death To work your overthrow; He left them in his flight To form the eternal record of his own Raise, Russia, with thy spoils, A nobler monument Than e'er imperial Rome Built in her plenitude of pride and power ' Still, Alexander ! on the banks of Seine, Thy noblest monument For future ages stands ----PARIS SUBDUED AND SPARED.

Conqueror, Deliverer, Friend of human-kind, The free, the happy Island welcomes thee! Thee, Alexander! thee, the Great, the Good, The Glorions, the Beneficent, the Just! Thee to her honor'd shores The mighty Island welcomes in her joy.

ODE

TO HIS MAJESTY, FREDERICK WILLIAM THE FOURTH, KING OF PRUSSIA.

1.

WELCOME to England, to the happy Isle, Brave Prince of gallant people! Welcome Thou, In adverse as in prosperous fortunes tried, Frederick, the well-beloved! Greatest and best of that illustrious name, Welcome to these free shores! In glory art thou come, Thy vietory perfect, thy revenge complete 2.

Enough of sorrow hast thou known, Enough of evil hath thy realm endured, Oppress'd, but not debased, When thine indignant soul, Long suffering, bore its weight of heaviest wee. But still, through that dark day, Unsullied honor was thy counsellor; And Hope, that had its trust in Heaven, And in the heart of man Its strength, forsook thee not. Thou hadst thy faithful people's love, The sympathy of noble minds; And wistfully, as one Who through the weary night has long'd for day, Looks eastward for the dawn, So Germany to thee Turn'd in her bondage her imploring eyes.

3.

Oh, grief of griefs, that Germany, The wise, the virtuous land, The land of mighty minds, Should bend beneath the frothy Frenchman's yoke; Oh, grief of griefs, to think That she should groan in bonds, She who had blest all nations with her gifts ! There had the light of Reformation risen, The light of Knowledge there was burning clear, Oh, grief, that her unhappy sons Should toil, and hleed, and die, To quench that sacred light, The wretched agents of a tyrant's will ! How often hath their blood In his accursed cause Reek'd on the Spaniard's blade ! Their mangled bodies fed The wolves and eagles of the Pyrenees; Or stiffening in the snows of Moscovy, Amid the ashes of the watch-fire lay, Where dragging painfully their frozen limbs, With life's last effort, in the flames they fell.

4.

Long, Frederick, did'st thou bear Her sorrows and thine own; Seven miserable years In patience didst thou feed thy heart with hope; Till, when the arm of God Smote the blaspheming Tyrant in his pride, And Alexander, with the voice of power, Raised the glad cry, Deliverance for Mankind, First of the Germans, Prussia broke her chains.

5.

Joy, joy for Germany, For Europe, for the World, When Prussia rose in arms!

CARMINA AULICA.

Oh, what a spectacle For present and for future times was there, When, for the public need, Wives gave their marriage rings, And mothers, when their sons The Band of Vengeance join'd, Bade them return victorious from the field, Or with their country fall.

6.

Twice o'er the field of death The trembling scales of Fate hung equipoised; For France, obsequions to her Tyrant still, Mighty for evil, put forth all her power; And still, beneath his hateful banners driven, Against their father-land, Unwilling Germans bore unnatural arms. What though the Boaster made his temples ring With vain thanksgivings for each doubtful day — What though, with false pretence of peace, His old insidions arts he tried, — The spell was broken ! Austria threw her sword Into the inclining seale, And Leipsic saw the wrongs Of Germany avenged.

7.

Ne'er till that awful time had Europe seen Such multitudes in arms; Nor ever had the rising Sun beheld Such mighty interests of mankind at stake ; Nor o'er so wide a scene Of slaughter e'er had Night her enrtain closed. There, on the battle-field, With one accord the grateful monarchs knelt. And raised their voice to Heaven; "The cause was thine, O Lord ! "O Lord! thy hand was here!" What Conquerors e'er deserved So proud, so pure a joy ! It was a moment when the exalted soul Might almost wish to burst its mortal bounds. Lest all of life to come Vapid and void should seem After that high-wrought hour.

8.

But thou hadst yet more toils, More duties and more triumphs yet in store. Elbe must not bound thine arms, Nor on the banks of Rhine Thine eagles check their flight; When o'er that barrier stream Awakened Germany Drove her invaders with such rout and wreck As overtook the impious Gaul of old, Laden with plunder, and from Delphi driven.

9.

Long had insulting France Boasted her arms invincible, Her soil inviolate;

At length the honr of retribution eomes! Avenging nations on all sides move on; In Gascony the flag of England flies, Triumphant, as of vore, When sable Edward led his peerless host. Behold the Spaniard and the Portngal For cities burnt, for violated fanes, For murders, massaeres, All monstrous, all unutterable crimes, Demanding vengeance with victorious cries, Pour from the Pyrenees. The Russian comes, his eye on Paris fix'd, The flames of Moscow present to his heart, The Austrian to efface Ulm, Austerlitz, and Wagram's later shame ; Rejoicing Germany, With all her nations, swells the avenging train, And in the field and in the triumph first, 10.

Thy banner, Frederick, floats.

Six weeks in daily strife The veteran Blucher bore the brunt of war. Glorious old man, The last and greatest of his master's school, Long may he live to hear The people bless his name ! Late be it ere the wreath That crowns his silver hair Adorn his monument! Glorious old man. How oft hath he discomfited The boasted chiefs of France, And foil'd her vaunting Tyrant's desperate rage Glorious old man, Who, from Silesia's fields, O'er Elbe, and Rhine, and Seine, From victory to victory marching on, Made his heroic way; till at the gates Of Paris, open'd by his arms, he saw His King triumphant stand.

11.

Bear back the sword of Frederick now ! The sword which France amid her spoils display d Prond trophy of a day ignobly won. With laurels wreath the sword; Bear it in trimmph back, Thus gloriously regain'd; And when thou lay'st it in its honor'd place, O Frederick, well-beloved, Greatest and best of that illustrious name, Lay by its side thine own, A holier relic there !

I2.

Frederick, the well-beloved ! Welcome to these free shores ; To England welcome, to the happy Isle ! In glory art thou come, Thy victory perfect, thy revenge complete

THE BATTLE OF ALGIERS

1.

ONE day of dreadful occupation more, Ere England's gallant ships Shall, of their beanty, pomp, and power disrobed, Like sea-birds on the sunny main, Rock idly in the port.

2.

One day of dreadful occupation more! A work of righteousness, Yea, of sublimest mercy, must be done; England will break the oppressor's chain, And set the captives free.

3.

Red cross of England, which all shores have seen Triumphantly displayed, Thou sacred banner of the glorious Isle, Known wheresoever keel hath cut The navigable deep, — 4.

Ne'er didst thou float more proudly o'er the storm Of havock and of death, Than when, resisting fiercely, but in vain, Algiers, her moony standard lowered, And sign'd the conqueror's law.

5.

Oh, if the grave were sentient, as these Moors In erring credence hold; And if the victims of captivity Could in the silent tomb have heard The thunder of the fight; —

6.

Sure their rejoicing dust upon that day Had heaved the oppressive soil, And earth been shaken like the mosques and towers, When England on those guilty walls Her fiery vengeance sent.

7.

Seldom hath victory given a joy like this, — When the delivered slave Revisits once again his own dear home, And tells of all his sufferings past, And blesses Exmouth's name.

8.

Far, far and wide along the Italian shores, That holy joy extends; Sardinian mothers pay their vows fulfill'd; And hymns are heard heside thy banks, O Fountain Arethuse! 27 9.

Churches shall blaze with lights, and ring with praise, And deeper strains shall rise From many an overflowing heart to Heaven; Nor will they in their prayers forget The hand that set them free.

ODE

ON THE DEATH OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE.

1.

DEATH has gone up into our Palaces! The light of day once more Hath visited the last abode Of mortal royalty, The dark and silent vault.

2.

But not as when the silence of that vault Was interrupted last Doth England raise her loud lament, Like one by sudden grief Surprised and overcome.

3.

Then, with a passionate sorrow, we bewail'd Youth on the untimely bier; And hopes, which seem'd like flower-buds full, Just opening to the sun, Forever swept away.

4.

The heart then struggled with repining thoughts With feelings that almost Arraign'd the inscrutable decree, Imbittered by a sense Of that which might have been.

5.

This grief hath no repining; all is well, What hath been, and what is. The Angel of Deliverance came To one who, full of years, Awaited her release.

6.

All that our fathers in their prayers desired, When first their chosen Queen Set on our shores her happy feet,— All by indulgent Heaven Had largely been vouchsafed.

7.

At Court the Household Virtues had their place Domestic Purity Maintain'd her proper influence there; The marriage bed was blest, And length of days was given.

ODES.

8.

No cause for sorrow then, but thankfulness; Life's business well performed, When weary age full willingly Resigns itself to sleep, In sure and certain hope '

9.

Oh, end to be desired, whene'er, as now, Good works have gone before, The seasonable fruit of Faith, And good Report and good Example have survived.

10.

Her left hand knew not of the ample alms Which her right hand had done; And, therefore, in the awful hour, The promises were hers To secret bounty made.

11.

With more than royal honors to the tomb Her bier is borne; with more Than Pomp can claim, or Power bestow, With blessings and with prayers From many a grateful heart.

12.

Long, long then shall Queen Charlotte's name be dear; And future Queens to her As to their best exemplar look, Who imitates her best May best deserve our love.

ODE

FOR ST. GEORGE'S DAY

1.

WILD were the tales which fabling monks of old Devised to swell their hero's holy fame, When in the noble army they enroll'd St. George's doubtful name. Of arrows and of spears they told, Which fell rebated from his mortal mould; And how the burning, fiery furnace blast To him came tempered like a summer breeze, When at the hour of evening it hath past O'er gurgling tanks, and groves of lemon-trees : And how the reverential flame, Condensing like a garb of honor, play'd In gorgeous folds around his glorious frame; And how the Heathen, in their frantic strife, With water then alike in vain essay'd His mextinguishable life.

What marvel if the Christian Knight Thus for his dear Redeemer's sake Defied the purpled Pagan's might?

Such boldness well might he partake, For he, beside the Libyan lake Silene, with the Infernal King Had coped in actual fight. The old Dragon on terrific wing Assail'd him there with Stygian string, And arrowy tongne, and potent breath, Exhaling pestilence and death. Dauntless in faith the Champion stood, Opposed against the rage of Hell The Red-Cross shield, and wielding well His sword, the strife pursued : First with a wide and rending wound Brought the maim'd monster to the ground, Then, pressing with victorious heel Upon his scaly neck subdued, Plunged and replunged the searching steel, Till from the shameful overthrow, Howling, the incarnate Demon fled, And left that form untenanted, And hid in Hell his humbled head, Still trembling in the realm below, At thought of that tremendous foe.

Such tales monastic fablers taught; Their kindred strain the minstrels caught A web of finer texture they Wrought in the rich, romantic lay; Of magic caves and woods they sung, Where Kalyb nursed the boy divine, And how those woods and caverns rung With cries from many a demon tongue, When, breaking from the witch's cell, He bound her in her own strong spell; -And of the bowers of Ormandine, Where, thrall'd by art, St. David lay, Sleeping inglorious years away, Till our St. George, with happier arm Released him, and dissolved the charm. But most the minstrels loved to tell Of that portentous day When Sabra at the stake was bound, Her brow with sweetest garlands crown'd, The Egyptian Dragon's prey; And how for her the English knight, Invincible at such a sight, Engaged that fiendish beast in fight, And o'er the monster, triple-scaled, The good sword Askalon prevail'd.

Such legends monks and minstrels feign'd, And easily the wondrous tales obtain'd, In those dark days, belief; Shrines to the Saint were rear'd, and temples rose, And states and kingdoms for their patron chose The Cappadocian Chief. Full soon his sainted name hath won In fields of war a wide renown; Spain saw the Moors confounded fly, Before the well-known slaughter cry, St. George for Aragon! And when the Catalans pursued Their vengeful way with fire and blood,

The Turk and treacherous Greek were dearly taught That all-appalling shout, For them with rage and ruin fraught In many a dolorous rout. 'Twas in this heavenly Guardian's trusted strength, That Malta's old heroic knights defied The Ottoman in all his power and pride. Repulsed from her immortal walls at length, The baffled Misbeliever turn'd with shame ; And when in after years in dreams he heard That all-too-well remembered battle-word, Woke starting at St. George's dreadful name, And felt cold sweats of fear suffuse his trembling frame.

But thou, O England ! to that sainted name Hast given its proudest praise, its loftiest fame. Witness the field of Cressy, on that day, When volleying thunders roll'd unheard on high; For, in that memorable fray, Broken, confused, and scatter'd in dismay, France had ears only for the Conqueror's cry, St. George, St. George for England ! St. George and Victory ! Bear witness, Poictiers! where again the foe From that same hand received his overthrow. In vain essay'd, Mont Joye St. Denis rang From many a boastful tongue, And many a hopeful heart in onset brave; Their courage in the shock of battle quail'd, His dread reponse when sable Edward gave, And England and St. George again prevail'd. Bear witness, Agincourt, where once again The bannered lilies on the ensanguin'd plain Were trampled by the fierce pursuers' feet; And France, doom'd ever to defeat Against that foe, beheld her myriads fly Before the withering cry, St. George, St. George for England ! St. George and Victory '

6.

That cry, in many a field of Fame, Through glorious ages held its high renown, Nor less hath Britain proved the sacred name Auspicious to her crown. Troubled too oft her course of fortune ran, Till, when the Georges came, Her happiest age began. Beneath their just and liberal sway, Old feuds and factions died away; One feeling through her realms was known, One interest of the Nation and the Throne. Ring, then, ye bells, upon St. George's Day, From every tower in glad accordance ring; And let all instruments, full, strong, or sweet, With touch of modulated string, And soft or swelling breath, and sonorous beat, The happy name repeat,

While heart and voice their joyous tribute bring, And speak the People's love for George their King.

WRITTEN AFTER THE KING'S VISIT TO IRELAND.

1.

How long, O Ireland, from thy guilty ground Shall innocent blood Arraign the inefficient arm of Power?

How long shall Murder there,

Leading his banded ruffians through the land, Range unrepress'd?

How long shall Night

Bring to thy harmless dwellers, in the stead Of natural rest, the feverish sleep of fear, Midnight alarms, Horrible dreams, and worse realities? How long shall darkness cover, and the eye Of Morning open, upon deeds of death?

In vain art thou, by liberal Nature's dower, Exuberantly blest; The Seasons, in their course, Shed o'er thy hills and vales The bounties of a genial clime in vain; Heaven hath in vain bestowed Well-tempered liberty, (Its last and largest boon to social man,) If the brute Multitude, from age to age, Wild as their savage ancestors, Go irreclaim'd the while, From sire to son transmitting still, In undisturb'd descent, (A sad inheritance !) Their errors and their crimes 3.

Green Island of the West¹ Thy Sister Kingdom fear'd not this, When thine exultant shores Rung far and wide of late, And grateful Dublin first beheld her King, First of thy Sovereigns he Who visited thy shores in peace and joy 4.

Oh what a joy was there ' In loud huzzas prolong'd, Surge after surge the tide Of popular welcome rose; And in the intervals alone Of that tumultuous sound of glad acclaim, Could the deep cannon's voice Of duteous gratulation, though it spake In thunder, reach the ear. From every tower the merry bells rung round, Peal hurrying upon peal, Till with the still reverberating din The walls and solid pavement seem'd to shake, And every bosom with the tremulous air Inhaled a dizzy joy.

5.

Age, that came forth to gaze, That memorable day

Felt in its quicken'd veins a pulse like youth; And lisping babes were taught to bless their King; And grandsires bade the children treasure up The precious sight, for it would be a tale The which in their old age Would make their children's children gather round Intent, all ears to hear

-6.

Were then the feelings of that generous time Ephemeral as the joy? Pass'd they away like summer clouds, Like dreams of infancy, Like glories of the evening firmament, Which fade, and leave no trace? Merciful Heaven, oh, let not thou the hope Be frustrate, that our Sister Isle may rcap, From the good seed then sown, Full harvests of prosperity and peace; That perfect union may derive its date From that auspicious day, ' And equitable ages thence Their lasting course begin !

7.

Green Island of the West, While frantic violence delays That happier order, still must thou remain In thine own baleful darkness wrapp'd; As if the Eye divine, That which beholdeth all, from thee alone In wrath had turn'd away!

But not forever thus shalt thou endure, To thy reproach, and ours, Thy misery, and our shame ' For Mercy shall go forth To stablish Order, with an arm'd right hand; And firm Authority, With its all-present strength, control the bad, And, with its all-sufficient shield, Protect the innocent: The first great duty this of lawful Power, Which holds its delegated right from Heaven.

9.

The first great duty this; but this not all; For more than comes within the scope Of Power, is needed here; More than to watch insidious discontent, Curb, and keep curb'd, the treasonable tongue, And quell the madden'd multitude : Labors of love remain; To wee: put noxious customs rooted deep In a rank soil, and long left seeding there; Pour balm into old wounds, and bind them up; Remove remediable ills, Improve the willing mind, And win the generous heart Afflicted Country, from thyself Must this redemption come ; And thou hast children able to perform This work of faith and hope 10.

O for a voice that might recal! To their deserted hearths Thy truant sons ! a voice Whose virtuous cogency Might with the strength of duty reach their souls; A strength that should compel entire consent, And to their glad obedience give The impulse and the force of free good-will ! For who but they can knit The severed links of that appointed chain, Which when in just cohesion it unites Order to order, rank to rank, In mutual benefit, So binding heart to heart, It then connecteth Earth with Heaven, from whence The golden links depend.

11.

Nor when the war is waged With Error, and the brood Of Darkness, will your aid Be wanting in the cause of Light and Love, Ye Ministers of that most holy Church, Whose firm foundations on the rock Of Scripture rest secure ! What though the Romanist, in numbers strong, In misdirected zeal And bigotry's blind force, Assail your Fortress; though the sons of Schism Join in insane alliance with that old, Inveterate enemy, Weening thereby to wreak Their covenanted hatred, and effect Your utter overthrow; What though the unbelieving crew, For fouler purpose, aid the unnatural league ; And Faction's wolfish pack Set up their fiercest yell, to augment The uproar of assault; Clad in your panoply will ye be found, Wielding the spear of Reason, with the sword Of Scripture girt; and from your shield of Truth Such radiance shall go forth, As when, unable to sustain its beams On Arthur's arm unveil'd, Earth-born Orgoglio reel'd, as if with wine ; And, from her many-headed beast cast down, Duessa fell, her cup of sorcery spilt, Her three-crown'd mitre in the dust devolved, And all her secret filthiness exposed.

12.

O thou fair Island, with thy Sister Isle Indissolubly link'd for weal and woe; Partaker of her present power, Her everlasting fame; Dear pledges hast thou render'd and received Of that eternal union ! Bedell's grave Is in thy keeping; and with thee Deposited doth Taylor's holy dust Await the Archangel's call. O land profuse of genius and of worth, Largely hast thou received, and largely given

Green Island of the West, The example of unspotted Ormond's faith To thee we owe ; to thee Boyle's venerable name ; Berkeley the wise, the good ; And that great Orator who first Unmask'd the harlot sorceress Anarchy, What time, in Freedom's borrowed form profaned, She to the nations round Her draught of witchcraft gave ; And him who in the field O'erthrew her giant offspring in his strength, And brake the iron rod. Proud of such debt, Rich to be thus indebted, these, Fair Island, Sister Queen Of Ocean, Ireland, these to thee we owe.

Shall I then imprecate A curse on them that would divide Our union?—Far be this from me, O Lord! Far be it! What is man, That he should scatter curses?—King of Kings, Father of all, Almighty, Governor Of all things! unto Thee Humbly I offer up our holier prayer ! I pray Thee, not in wrath, But in thy mercy, to confound These men's devices. Lord! Lighten their darkness with thy Gospel light, And thus abate their pride, Assuage their malice thus'

ODE

WRITTEN AFTER THE KING'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

1.

Ar length hath Scotland seen The presence long desired; The pomp of royalty Hath gladden'd once again Her ancient palace, desolate how long ' From all parts far and near, Highland and lowland, glen and fertile carse, The silent mountain lake, the busy port, Her populous cities, and her pastoral hills, In generons joy convened By the free impulse of the loyal heart Her sons have gather'd, and beheld their King.

2.

Land of the loyal, as in happy hour Revisited, so was thy regal seat In happy hour for thee Forsaken, under favoring stars, when James His valediction gave, And great Eliza's throne Received its rightful heir, The Peaceful and the Just.

3.

A more auspicious union never Earth From eldest days had seen, Than when, their mutual wrongs forgiven, And gallant enmity renounced With honor, as in honor foster'd long, The ancient Kingdoms formed Their everlasting league.

4.

Slowly by time matured A happier order then for Scotland rose, And where inhuman force, And rapine nnrestrain'd Had lorded o'er the land, Peace came, and polity, And quiet industry, and frugal wealth, And there the household virtues fix'd Their sojourn undisturb'd.

5.

Such blessings for her dowry Scotland drew From that benignant union ; nor less large The portion that she brought. She brought security and strength, True hearts, and strennous hands, and noble minds. Say, Ocean, from the shores of Camperdown, What Caledonia brought ! Say thou, Egypt ! Let India tell ! And let tell Victory From that Brabantine field, The proudest field of fame !

6.

Speak ye, too, Works of peace , For ye too have a voice Which shall be heard by ages! The proud Bridge, Through whose broad arches, worthy of their name And place, his rising and his refluent tide Majestic Thames, the royal river, rolls; And that which, high in air, A bending line suspended, shall o'erhang Menai's straits, as if By Merlin's mighty magic there sustain'd; And Pont-Cyssylté, not less wondrons work; Where, on gigantie columns raised Aloft, a dizzying height, The laden barge pursues its even way, While o'er his rocky channel the dark Dee Hurries below, a raging stream, scarce heard And that huge mole, whose deep foundations, firm As if by Nature laid, Repel the assailing billows, and protect The British fleet, securely riding there, Though southern storms possess the sea and sky, And, from its depths commoved, Infuriate ocean raves. Ye stately monuments of Britain's power. Bear record ye what Scottish minds Have plann'd and perfected ! With grateful wonder shall posterity See the stupendous works, and Rennie's name, And Telford's shall survive, till time Leave not a wreck of sublunary things.

7.

Him too may I attest for Scotland's praise, Who seized and wielded first The mightiest element That lies within the scope of man's control; Of evil and of good, Prolific spring, and dimly yet discern'd The immeasurable results. The mariner no longer seeks Wings from the wind; creating now the power Wherewith he wins his way, Right on across the ocean-flood he steers Against opposing skies; And reaching now the inmost continent, Up rapid streams, innavigable else, Ascends with steady progress, self-propell'd

Nor hath the Sister kingdom borne In science and in arms Alone, her noble part; There is an empire which survives The wreck of thrones, the overthrow of realms, The downfall, and decay, and death Of Nations. Such an empire in the mind Of intellectual man Rome yet maintains, and elder Greece, and such, By indefeasible right, Hath Britain made her own. How fair a part doth Caledonia elaim In that fair conquest! Wheresoe'er The British tongue may spread, (A goodly tree, whose leaf No winter e'er shall nip,) Earthly immortals, there, her sons of fame, Will have their heritage. In eastern and in occidental Ind; The new antarctic world, where sable swans Glide upon waters call'd by British names, And plough'd by British keels; In vast America, through all its length And breadth, from Massachusett's populous coast To western Oregan; And from the southern gulf, Where the great river with his turbid flood Stains the green Ocean, to the polar sea.

9.

There nations yet unborn shall trace In Hume's perspicuous page, How Britain rose, and through what storms attain'd Her eminence of power. In other climates, youths and maidens there Shall learn from Thomson's verse in what attire The various seasons, bringing in their change Variety of good, Revisit their beloved English ground. There, Beattie! in thy sweet and soothing strain Shall youthful poets read Their own emotions. There, too, old and young, Gentle and simple, by Sir Walter's tales Spell-bound, shall feel Imaginary hopes and fears Strong as realities, And, waking from the dream, regret its close.

10.

These, Scotland, are thy glories; and thy praise Is England's, even as her power And opulence of fame are thine. So hath our happy union made Each in the other's weal participant, Enriching, strengthening, glorifying both.

11.

O House of Stuart, to thy memory still For this best benefit Should British hearts in gratitude be bound ' A deeper tragedy Than thine unhappy tale hath never fill'd The historic page, nor given Poet or moralist his mournful theme. O House severely tried, And in prosperity alone Found wanting, Time hath closed Thy tragic story now ! Errors, and virtues fatally betrayed, Magnanimous suffering, vice, Weakness, and headstrong zeal, sincere, tho' blind Wrongs, calumnies, heart-wounds, Religious resignation, earthly hopes, Fears, and affections, these have had their course, And over them in peace The all-ingulfing stream of years hath closed. But this good work endures; 'Stablish'd and perfected by length of days, The indissoluble union stands.

12.

Nor hath the sceptre from that line Departed, though the name hath lost Its regal honors. Trunk and root have fail'd: A scion from the stock Liveth and flourisheth. It is the Tree Beneath whose sacred shade, In majesty and peaceful power serene, The Island Queen of Ocean hath her seat; Whose branches far and near Extend their sure protection; whose strong roots • Are with the Isle's foundations interknit; Whose stately summit, when the storm careers Below, abides unmoved, Safe in the sunshine and the peace of Heaven.

And with the sacred food Of meditation and of lore divine Hast fed thy heavenly part; Take up thy monitory strain. O son of song, a strain severe Of warning and of woe'

O Britain, O my Mother Isle, Occan's imperial Queen, Thou glory of all lands ! Is there a curse upon thee, that thy sons Would rush to ruin, drunk With sin, and in infuriate folly blind ? Hath Hell enlarged itself, And are the Fiends let loose To work thine overthrow?

3.

For who is she That, on the many-headed Beast Triumphantly enthroned, Doth ride abroad in state, The Book of her Enchantments in her hand? Her robes are stain'd with blood, And on her brazen front Is written BLASPHEMY.

4.

Know ye not then the Harlot? know ye not Her shameless forehead, her obdurate eye, Her meretricious mien, Her loose, immodest garb, with slaughter foul ' Your Fathers knew her; when delirious France, Drunk with her witcheries, Upon the desecrated altar set The Sorceress, and, with rites Inhuman and accurst, O'er all the groaning land Perform'd her sacrifice

5.

Your Fathers knew her! when the nations round Received her maddening spell, And call'd her Liberty, And in that name proclaim'd A jubilee for guilt; When their blaspheming hosts defied high Heaven, And wheresoe'er they went let havock loose; Your Fathers knew the Sorceress! They stood firm, And, in that hour of trial faithful found, They raised the Red Cross flag.

6.

They knew her; and they knew That not in scenes of rapine and of blood, In lawless riotry, And wallowing with the multitude obscene, Would Liberty be found ! Her in her form divine, Her genuine form, they knew; For Britain was her home; With Order and Religion there she dwelt; It was her chosen seat, Her own beloved Isle. Think not that Liberty From Order and Religion e'er will dwell Apart; companions they Of heavenly seed connate.

7.

Woe, woe for Britain, woe ! If that society divine, By lewd and impious uproar driven, Indignantly should leave The land that in their presence hath been blest! Woe, woe! for in her streets Should gray-hair'd Polity Be trampled under foot by ruffian force, And Murder to the noon-day sky Lift his red hands, as if no God were there, War would lay waste the realm; Devouring fire consume Temples and Palaces; Nor would the lowliest cot Escape that indiscriminating storm, When Heaven upon the guilty nation pour'd The vials of its wrath.

8.

These are no doubtful ills ! The unerring voice of Time Warns us that what hath been again shall be ; And the broad beacon-flame Of History casts its light Upon Futurity 9.

Turn not thy face away, Almighty ! from the realm By thee so highly favored, and so long. Thou who in war hast been our shield and strength, From famine who hast saved us, and hast bade The Earthquake and the Pestilence go by, Spare us, O Father ! save us from ourselves ! From insane Faction, who prepares the pit In which itself would fall; From rabid Treason's rage, -The poor priest-ridden Papist's erring zeal, -The lurking Atheist's wiles, -The mad Blasphemer's venom, - from our foes, Our follies and our errors, and our sins, Save us, O Father! for thy mercy's sake, Thou who ALONE canst save !

Keswick, 1819.

ODE 11.

1.

ls a vision l was seized,
When the elements were hush'd
In the stillness that is felt
Ere the Storm goes abroad;
Through the air J was borne away;
And in spirit I beheld
Where a City lay beneath,
Like a valley mapp'd below,
When seen from a mountain top

2.

The night had closed around, And o'er the sullen sky Were the wide wings of darkness spread, The City's myriad lamps Shone mistily below, Like stars in the bosom of a lake; And its murmurs arose Incessant and deep, Like the sound of the sea Where it rakes on a stony shore.

3.

A voice from the darkness went forth, "Son of Man, look below! This is the City to be visited; For as a fountain Casteth its waters, So casteth she her wickedness abroad! Mine eyes were opened then, And the veil which conceals The Invisible World was withdrawn look'd, and, behold !

 As the Patriarch, in his dream, Saw the Angels to and fro Pass from Heaven to Earth, On their ministry of love, So saw I where a way From that great City led To the black abyss of bale,
 To the dolorous region of Death.

5.

Wide and beaten was the way, And deep the descent To the Adamantine Gates, Which were thrown on their hinges back Wailing and Woe were within, And the gleam of sulphurous fires, In darkness and smoke involved.

6.

And through those open gates The Fiends were swarming forth; Hastily, joyfully, As to a jubilee, The Spirits accurst were trooping up; They fill'd the streets, And they bore with them curses and plagues; And they scattered lies abroad, Horrors, obscenities, Blasphemies, treasons, And the seeds of strife and death, 7.

"Son of Man, look up!" said the Voice I look'd and beheld The way which angels tread, Seen like a pillar of light That slants from a broken sky. That heavenly way by clouds was closed, Heavy, and thick, and dark, with thunder charged; And there a Spirit stood, Who raised, in menacing act, his awful arm; He spake aloud, and thrill'd My inmost soul with fear.

8.

"Woe! Woe!

Woe to the city where Faction reigns! Woe to the land where Sedition prevails! Woe to the nation whom Hell deceives ' Woe! Woe! They have eyes, and they will not see!

They have ears, and they will not bee! They have ears, and they will not bear! They have hearts, and they will not feel! Woe to the People who fasten their ears! Woe to the People who harden their hearts! Woe to the People who harden their hearts! Woe ! Woe ! The vials are charged; The measure is full, 9.

But from that City then, behold, A gracious form arose ! Her snow-white wings, upon the dusky air, Shone like the waves that glow Around a midnight keel in liquid light. Upward her supplicating arms were spread, And, as her face to heaven In eloquent grief she raised, Loose, like a Comet's refluent tresses, hung Her heavenly hair dispersed 10.

"Not yet, O Lord! not yet, Oh, merciful as just! Not yet!" — the Tutelary Angel cried;
"For 1 must plead with thee for this poor land, Guilty — but still the seat Of genuine piety, —
The mother, still, of noble minds, — The nurse of high desires! Not yet, O Lord, not yet, Give thou thine anger way! Thon, who hast set thy Bow Of Mercy in the clouds, Not yet, O Lord, pour out The vials of thy wrath !

Π.

"Oh, for the sake Of that religion, pure and undefiled, Here purchased by thy Martyrs' precious blood,--Mercy, O mercy, Lord ! For that well-order'd frame of equal laws, Time's goodliest monument, O'er which thy guardian shield So oft hath been extended heretofore, --Mercy, O mercy, Lord ! For the dear charities, The household virtues, that in secret there, Like sweetest violets, send their fragrance forth, Mercy, O mercy, Lord

ODE ON THE PORTRAIT OF BISHOP HEBER.

"Oh, wilt thou quench the light That should illuminate
The nations who in darkness sit, And in the shadow of death? — Oh, wilt thou stop the heart Of intellectual life? —
Wilt thou seal the eye of the world? – Mercy, O mercy, Lord¹

13.

"Not for the guilty few , Nor for the erring multitude, The ignorant many, wickedly misled, – Send thou thy vengeance down Upon a land so long the dear abode Of Freedom, Knowledge, Virtue, Faith, approved, Thine own beloved land ! Oh, let not hell prevail Against her past deserts, — Against her actual worth, — Against her actual worth, — Against the prayers that rise From righteous hearts this hour '

14.

"Plead with me, O ye dead! whose sacred dust Is laid in hope within her hallow'd soil, ---Plead with me for your country, suffering now Beneath such loathsome plagues As ancient Egypt in her slime And hot corruption bred. Plead with me at this hour, All wise and upright minds, All honorable hearts, -For ye abhor the sins Which o'er the guilty land Have drawn this gather'd storm ! Plead with me, Souls unborn, Ye who are doomed upon this fateful spot To pass your pilgrimage, Earth's noblest heritors, Or children of a ruin'd realm, to shame And degradation born,-(For this is on the issue of the hour !) Plead with me, unborn Spirits! that the wrath

Deserved may pass away !

"Join in my supplication, Seas and Lands, -I call upon you all! Thou, Europe, in whose cause, Alone and undismay'd, The generous nation strove ; For whose deliverance, in the Spanish fields, Her noblest blood was pour'd Profusely; and on that Brabantine plain, (The proudest fight that e'er By virtuous victory Was hallowed to all time.) Join with me, Africa! For here hath thy redemption had its birth ;---Thou, India, who art blest With peace and equity Beneath her easy sway ; -28

And thou, America, who owest The large and inextinguishable debt Of filial lore ! — And ye, Remote Antarctic Isles and Continent, Where the glad tidings of the Gospel truth, Her children are proclaiming faithfully ;— Join with me now to wrest The thunderbolt from that relenting arm ! — Plead with me, Earth and Ocean, at this hour, Thou, Ocean, for thy Queen, And for thy benefactress, thou, O Earth !"

The Augel ceased , The vision fled ; The wind arose, The clouds were rent, They were drifted and scatter'd abroad ; And as I look'd, and saw Where, through the clear blue sky, the silver Moon Moved in her light serene, A healing influence reach'd my heart, And I felt in my soul That the voice of the Angel was heard

O D E

ON

1.

YES, - such as these were Heber's lineaments; Such his capacious front, His comprehensive eye, His open brow serene. Such was the gentle countenance which bore Of generous feeling, and of golden truth, Sure Nature's sterling impress; never there Unruly passion left Its ominous marks infix'd, Nor the worse die of evil habit set An inward stain ingrain'd. Such were the lips whose salient playfulness Enliven'd peaceful hours of private life; Whose eloquence Held congregations open ear'd, As from the heart it flow'd, a living stream Of Christian wisdom, pure and undefiled.

2.

And what if there be those Who in the cabinet Of memory hold enshrined A livelier portraiture, And see in thought, as in their dreams, His actual image, verily produced? Yet shall this counterfeit convey To strangers, and preserve for after-tune, All that could perish of him,— all that else

ODE ON THE PORTRAIT OF BISHOP HEBER.

Even now had past away; For he hath taken with the Living Dead His honorable place, ---Yea, with the Saints of God His holy habitation. Hearts, to which Through ages he shall speak, Will yearn towards him; and they, too, (for such Will be,) who gird their loins With truth to follow him, Having the breastplate on of righteousness, The helmet of salvation, and the shield Of faith, - they too will gaze Upon his effigy With reverential love, Till they shall grow familiar with its lines. And know him when they see his face in Heaven.

Ten years have held their course Since last I look'd upon That living conntenance, When on Llangedwin's terraces we paced Together, to and fro. Partaking there its hospitality, We with its honored master spent, Well-pleased, the social hours; His friend and mine, - my earliest friend, whom I Have ever, through all changes, found the same From boyhood to gray hairs, In goodness, and in worth and warmth of heart. Together then we traced The grass-grown site, where armed feet once trod The threshold of Glendower's embattled hall; Together sought Melangel's lonely Church. Saw the dark yews, majestic in decay, Which in their flourishing strength Cyveilioc might have seen; Letter by letter traced the lines On Yorwerth's fabled tomb; And curiously observed what vestiges, Mouldering and mutilate, Of Monacella's legend there are left, A tale humane, itself Well-nigh forgotten now : Together visited the ancient house Which from the hill-slope takes Its Cymric name euphonious; there to view, Though drawn by some rude limner inexpert, The faded portrait of that lady fair, Beside whose corpse her husband watch'd, And with perverted faith, Preposteronsly placed, Thought, obstinate in hopeless hope, to see The beautiful dead, by miraele, revive.

4.

The sunny recollections of those days Full soon were overcast, when Heber went Where half this wide world's circle lay Between us interposed. A messenger of love he went, A true Evangelist; Not for ambition, nor for gain, Nor of constraint, save such as duty lays Upon the disciplined heart, Took he the overseeing on himself Of that wide flock dispersed, Which, till these latter times, Had there been left to stray Neglected all too long. For this great end, devotedly he went, Forsaking friends and kin, His own loved paths of pleasantness and peace, Books, leisure, privacy, Prospects (and not remote) of all wherewith Authority could dignify desert; And, dearer far to him, Pursuits that with the learned and the wise Should have assured his name its lasting place.

5.

Large, England, is the debt Thou owest to Heathendom; To India most of all, where Providence, Giving thee thy dominion there in trust, Upholds its baseless strength. All seas have seen thy red-cross flag In war triumphantly display'd; Late only hast thou set that standard up On pagan shores in peace ! Yea, at this hour the cry of blood Riseth against thee from beneath the wheels Of that seven-headed Idol's car accursed; Against thee, from the widow's funeral pile, The smoke of human sacrifice Ascends, even now, to Heaven.

6.

The debt shall be discharged ; the crying sin Silenced ; the foul offence Forever done away. Thither our saintly Heber went, In promise and in pledge That England, from her guilty torpor roused, Should zealously and wisely undertake Her awful task assign'd : Thither, devoted to the work, he went, There spent his precions life, There left his holy dust.

7.

How beantiful are the feet of him That bringeth good tidings, That publisheth peace, That bringeth good tidings of good, That proclaimeth salvation for men. Where'er the Christian Patriarch went, Honor and reverence heralded his way, And blessings followed him. The Malabar, the Moor, the Cingalese, Though unillumed by faith, Yet not the less admired The virtue that they saw. The European soldier, there so long Of needful and consolatory rites Injuriously deprived, Felt, at his presence, the neglected seed Of early piety Refresh'd, as with a quickening dew from Heaven

Native believers wept for thankfulness, When on their heads he laid his hallowing hands; And, if the Saints in bliss Be cognizant of aught that passeth here, It was a joy for Schwartz To look from Paradise that hour Upon his earthly flock.

Ram boweth down, Creeshna and Seeva stoop; The Arabian Moon must wane to wax no more; And Ishmael's seed redeem'd. And Esau's - to their brotherhood, And to their better birthright then restored, Shall within Israel's covenant be brought. Drop down, ye Heavens, from above ! Ye skies, pour righteousness ! Open, thou Earth, and let Salvation be brought forth ! And sing ye, O ye Heavens, and shout, O Earth, With all thy hills and vales, Thy mountains and thy woods; Break forth into a song, a jubilant song ; For by Himself the Lord hath sworn That every tongue to Him shall swear, To Him that every knee shall bow.

9.

Take comfort, then, my soul ! Thy latter days on earth, Though few, shall not be evil, by this hope Supported, and enlighten'd on the way. O Reginald, one course Our studies, and our thoughts, Our aspirations held, Wherein, but mostly in this blessed hope, We had a bond of union, closely knit In spirit, though, in this world's wilderness, Apart our lots were cast. Seldom we met; but I knew well That whatsoe'er this never-idle hand Sent forth would find with thee Benign acceptance, to its full desert. For thou wert of that audience, -- fit, though few, For whom I am content To live laborious days, Assured that after-years will ratify Their honorable award.

10.

Hadst thou revisited thy native land, Mortality, and Time, And Change, must needs have made Our meeting mournful. Happy he Who to his rest is borne, In sure and certain hope, Before the hand of age Hath chill'd his faculties, Or forrow reach'd him in his heart of hearts! Most happy if he leave in his good name A light for those who follow him, And in his works a living seed Of good, prolitie still.

11.

Yes, to the Christian, to the Heathen world, Heber, thou art not dead, — thou canst not die Nor can 1 think of the as lost. A little portion of this little isle At first divided us ; then half the globe ; The same earth held us still ; but when, O Reginald, wert thou so near as now? 'Tis but the falling of a withered leaf, — The breaking of a shell, — The breaking of a shell, — The rending of a veil! Oh, when that leaf shall fall, — That shell be burst, — that veil be rent, — may then My spirit be with thine '

EPISTLE

ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

WELL, Heaven be thank'd! friend Allan, here I am, Once more to that dear dwelling-place return'd, Where I have past the whole nid stage of life, Not idly, certes; not unworthily, — So let me hope; where Time upon my head Hath laid his frore and monitory hand; And when this poor, frail, earthly tabernacle Shall be dissolved, — it matters not how soon Or late, in God's good time, — where I would fain Be gathered to my children, earth to earth.

Needless it were to say how willingly I bade the huge metropolis farewell, Its din, and dust, and dirt, and smoke, and smut, Thames' water, paviors' ground, and London sky ; Weary of hurried days and restless nights, Watchmen, whose office is to murder sleep When sleep might else have weigh'd one's eyelids down,

Rattle of carriages, and roll of carts, And tramp of iron hoofs; and worse than all,— Confusion being worse confounded then, With coachumen's quarrels and with footmen's shouts,—

My next-door neighbors, in a street not yet Maeadamized, (me miscrable!) at home; For then had we, from midnight until morn, House-quakes, street-thunders, and door-batteries. O Government! in thy wisdom and thy want, Tax knockers; —in compassion to the sick, And those whose sober habits are not yet Inverted, topsy-turvying night and day, Tax them more heavily than thou hast charged Armorial bearings and bepowder'd pates. And thou, O Michael, ever to be praised, Angelic among Taylors! for thy laws Antifuliginous, extend those laws Till every chimney its own smoke consume, And give thenceforth thy dinners unlampoon'd. Escaping from all this, the very whirl Of mail-coach wheels bound outward from Ladlane, Was peace and quietness. Three hundred miles Of homeward way seem'd to the body rest, And to the mind repose. Donne * did not hate More perfectly that city. Not for all Its social, all its intellectual joys,-Which having touch'd, I may not condescend To name aught else the Demon of the place Might for his lure hold forth; --- not even for these Would I forego gardens and green-field walks, And hedge-row trees, and stiles, and shady lanes, And orchards, were such ordinary scenes Alone to me accessible as those Wherein I learnt in infancy to love The sights and sounds of Nature; - wholesome sights, Gladdening the eye that they refresh; and sounds Which, when from life and happiness they spring, Bear with them to the yet unharden'd heart A sense that thrills its cords of sympathy; Or, when proceeding from insensate things, Give to tranquillity a voice wherewith To woo the ear and win the soul attuned; -Oh, not for all that London might bestow, Would 1 renounce the genial influences, And thoughts, and feelings to be found where'er We breathe beneath the open sky, and see Earth's liberal bosom. Judge then by thyself, Allan, true child of Scotland, - thou who art So oft in spirit on thy native hills, And yonder Solway shores, - a poet thou, Judge by thyself how strong the ties which bind A poet to his home; when - making thus Large recompense for all that haply else Might seem perversely or unkindly done -Fortune hath set his happy habitacle Among the ancient hills, near mountain streams And lakes pellucid, in a land sublime And lovely as those regions of Romance Where his young fancy in its day-dreams roam'd, Expatiating in forests wild and wide, Loëgrian, or of dearest Faery-land. Yet, Allan, of the eup of social joy No man drinks freelier, nor with heartier thirst, Nor keener relish, where I see around Faces which I have known and loved so long, That, when he prints a dream upon my brain,

That, when he prints a dream upon my brain, Dan Morpheus takes them for his readiest types. And therefore, in that loathed metropolis, Time measured out to me some golden hours. They were not leaden-footed while the elay Beneath the patient touch of Chantrey's hand Grew to the semblance of my lineaments. Lit up in memory's landscape, like green spots

* This poet begins his second Satire thus : -

Of sunshine, are the mornings, when, in talk With him, and thee, and Bedford, (my true friend Of forty years,) I saw the work proceed, Subject the while myself to no restraint, But pleasurably in frank discourse engaged; Pleased too, and with no unbecoming pride, To think this countenance, such as it is, So oft by rascally mislikeness wrong'd, Should faithfully to those who in his works Have seen the inner man portray'd, be shown, And in enduring marble should partake Of our great sculptor's immortality.

I have been libell'd, Allan, as thou knowest. Through all degrees of calumny; but they Who fix one's name for public sale beneath A set of features slanderously unlike, Are the worst libellers. Against the wrong Which they inflict Time hath no remedy. Injuries there are which Time redresseth best. Being more sure in judgment, though perhaps Slower in process even than the court Where justice, tortoise-footed and mole-eyed, Sleeps undisturb'd, fann'd by the lulling wings Of harpies at their prey. We soon live down Evil or good report, if undeserved. Let then the dogs of Faction bark and bay-Its bloodhounds, savaged by a cross of wolf; Its full-bred kennel, from the Blatant-beast; And from my lady's gay veranda, let Her pamper'd lap-dog, with his fetid breath, In bold bravado join, and snap and growl, With petulant consequentialness elate, There in his imbecility at once Ridiculous and safe : though all give ery, Whiggery's sleek spaniels, and its lurchers lean, Its poodles, by unlueky training marr'd, Mongrel, and eur, and bob-tail, let them yelp Till weariness and hoarseness shall at length Silence the noisy pack: meantime be sure I will not stoop for stones to cast among them. The foumarts and the skunks may be secure In their own seent; and for that viler swarm, The vermin of the press, both those that skip, And those that creep and crawl, I do not catch And pin them for exposure on the page : Their filth is their defence.

But I appeal Against the limner's and the graver's wrong ; Their evil works survive them. Bilderdijk, Whom 1 am privileged to call my friend, Suffering by graphic libels in like wise, Gave his wrath vent in verse. Would I could give The life and spirit of his vigorous Dutch, As his dear consort hath transfused my strains Into her native speech, and made them known On Rhine and Yssel, and rich Amstel's banks; And wheresoe'er the voice of Vondel still Is heard, and still Antonides and Hooft Are living ageneies; and Father Cats, The household poet, teacheth in his songs The love of all things lovely, all things pure; Best poet, who delights the cheerful mind Of childhood, stores with moral strength the heart

[&]quot; Sir, though (I thank God for it) I do Inte Perfectly all this town, yet there's one state In all if things to excellently best, That hate towards them breeds pity towards the rest."

Of youth, with wisdom maketh mid-life rich, And fills with quict tears the eyes of age.

Hear then in English rhyme how Bilderdijk Describes his wicked portraits, one by one.

- " A madman who from Bedlam hath broke loose ; An honest fellow of the numskull race ;
- And pappyer-headed still, a very goose Staring with eyes aghast and vacant face ;
- A Frenchman who would mirthfully display On some poor idiot his malicious wit;
- And lastly, one who, train'd up in the way Of worldly craft, hath not forsaken it,
- But hath served Mammon with his whole intent, A thing of Nature's worst materials made,
- Low-minded, stupid, base and insolent.
- I-I a Poet have been thus portray'd. Can ye believe that my true effigy
- Among these vile varieties is found ? What thought, or line, or word, hath fallen from me
- In all my numerous works whereon to ground The opprobrious notion ? Safely I may smile
- At these, acknowledging no likeness here. But worse is yet to come ; so, soft awhile !
- For now in potter's earth must I appear,
- And in such workmanship, that, sooth to say, Humanity disowns the imitation,
- And the dolt image is not worth its clay. Then comes there one who will to admiration
- In plastic wax my perfect face present ; And what of his performance comes at last?
- Folly itself in every lineament !
- Its consequential features overcast With the coxcomical and shallow laugh
- Of one who would, for condescension, hide, Yet in his best behavior, can but half
 - Suppress the scornfulness of empty pride."

"And who is Bilderdijk ?" methinks thou sayest ; A ready question ; yet which, trust me, Allan, Would not be ask'd, had not the curse that came From Babel clipt the wings of Poetry. Napoleon ask'd him once, with cold, fix'd look, "Art thou, then, in the world of letters known?" " I have deserved to be," the Hollander Replied, meeting that proud, imperial look With calm and proper confidence, and eye As little wont to turn away abash'd Before a mortal presence. He is one Who hath received upon his constant breast The sharpest arrows of adversity ; Whom not the clamors of the multitude, Demanding, in their madness and their might, Iniquitous things, could shake in his firm mind; Nor the strong hand of instant tyranny From the straight path of duty turn aside; But who, in public troubles, in the wreck Of his own fortunes, in proscription, exile, Want, obloquy, ingratitude, neglect, And what severer trials Providence Sometimes inflicteth, chastening whom it loves, In all, through all, and over all, hath borne An equal heart, as resolute toward

The world, as humbly and religiously Beneath his beavenly Father's rod resign'd. Right-minded, happy-minded, righteous man, True lover of his country and his kind; In knowledge and in inexhaustive stores Of native genius rich; philosopher, Poet, and sage. The language of a State Inferior in illustrious deeds to none, But circumscribed by narrow bounds, and now Sinking in irrecoverable decline, Hath pent within its sphere a name wherewith Europe should else have rung from side to side.

Such, Allan, is the Hollander to whom Esteem and admiration have attach'd My soul, not less than pre-consent of mind, And gratitude for benefits, when, being A stranger, sick, and in a foreign land, He took me like a brother to his house, And ministered to me, and made a time, Which had been wearisome and careful else, So pleasurable, that in my calendar There are no whiter days. 'Twill be a joy For us to meet in Heaven, though we should look Upon each other's earthly face no more. — This is this world's complexion! "Cheerful thoughts Bring sad thoughts to the mind; " and these again Give place to calm content, and steadfast hope, And happy faith assured. — Return we now, With such transition as our daily life Imposes in its wholesome discipline, To a lighter strain; and from the gallery Of the Dutch Poet's mis-resemblances Pass into mine; where I shall show thee, Allan, Such an array of villanous visages, That if, among them all, there were but one Which as a likeness could be proved upon me, It were enough to make me, in mere shame, Take up an alias, and forswear myself.

Whom have we first? A dainty gentleman, His sleepy eyes half-closed, and countenance To no expression stronger than night suit A simper, capable of being moved: Sawney and sentimental; with an air So lack-thought and so lackadaysical, You might suppose the volume in his hand Must needs be Zimmermann on Solitude.

Then comes a jovial landlord, who hath made it Part of his trade to be the shoeing horn For his commercial customers. God Bacchus Hath not a thirstier votary. Many a pipe Of Porto's vintage hath contributed To give his checks that deep carmine ingrain d, And many a runlet of right Nantes, I ween, Hath suffered percolation through that trunk, Leaving behind it, in the boozey eyes, A swollen and red suffusion, glazed and dim.

Our next is in the evangelical line, A leaden-visaged specimen; demure, Because he hath put on his Sunday's face.

Dull by formation, by complexion sad, By bile, opinions, and dyspepsy sour. One of the sons of Jack, - I know not which, For Jack hath a most numerous progeny, ----Made up for Mr. Colburn's Magazine, This pleasant composite; a bust supplied The features; look, expression, character Are of the Artist's fancy and free grace. Such was that fellow's birth and parentage The raseal proved prolifie; one of his breed, By Docteur Pichot introduced in France, Passes for Monsieur Sooté; and another, -An uglier miscreant too, - the brothers Schumann, And their most cruel copper-scratcher Zschoch, From Zwickau sent abroad through Germany. I wish the Schumen and the copper-scratcher No worse misfortune, for their recompense, Than to encounter such a cut-throat face In the Black Forest or the Odenwald.

And now is there a third derivative From Mr. Colburn's composite, which late The Arch-Pirate Galignani hath prefix'd, A spurious portrait to a faithless life, And bearing lyingly the libell'd name Of Lawrence, impudently there insculp'd.

The bust that was the innocent forefather To all this base, abominable brood, I blame not, Allan. 'Twas the work of Smith, A modest, mild, ingenious man, and errs, Where erring, only because over-true, Too close a likeness for similitude; Fixing to every part and lineament Its separate character, and missing thus That which results from all.

Sir Smug comes next, Allan, I own Sir Smug! I recognize That visage, with its dull sobriety ; I see it duly as the day returns, When at the looking-glass, with lather'd chin And razor-weapon'd hand, I sit, the face Composed and apprehensively intent Upon the necessary operation About to be perform'd, with touch, alas, Not always confident of hair-breadth skill. Even in such sober sadness and constrain'd Composure cold, the faithful Painter's eye Ilad fix'd me like a spell, and I could feel My features stiffen as he glanced upon them. And yet he was a man whom I loved dearly, My fellow-traveller, my familiar friend, My household guest. But when he look'd upon me, Anxious to exercise his excellent art,

The countenance he knew so thoroughly Was gone, and in its stead there sate Sir Smug.

Under the graver's hand, Sir Smug became Sir Smouch — a son of Abraham. Now, albeit Far rather would I trace my lineage thence Than with the oldest line of Peers or Kings Claim consanguinity, that cast of features Would ill accord with me, who, in all forms Of pork — baked, roasted, toasted, boil'd, or broil'd; Fresh, salted, pickled, seasoned, moist, or dry; Whether ham, bacon, sausage, souse, or brawn; Leg, bladehone, baldrib, griskin, chine, or chop — Profess myself a genuine Philopig.

It was, however, as a Jew whose portion Had fallen unto him in a goodly land Of loans, of omnium, and of three per cents, That Messrs. Percy, of the Anecdote-firm, Presented me unto their customers. Poor Smouch endured a worse Judaization Under another hand. In this next stage He is on trial at the Old Bailey, charged With dealing in base eoin. That he is guilty No Judge or Jury could have half a doubt When they saw the culprit's face; and he himself, As you may plainly see, is comforted By thinking he has just contrived to keep Out of rope's reach, and will come off this time For transportation.

Stand thou forth for trial, Now, William Darton, of the Society Of Friends called Quakers ; thou who in 4th month Of the year 24, on Holborn Hill, At No. 58, didst wilfully, Falsely, and knowing it was falsely done, Publish upon a card, as Robert Southey's, A face which might be just as like Tom Fool's, Or John, or Richard Any-body-else's! What had I done to thee, thou William Darton, That thou shouldst, for the lucre of base gain, Yea, for the sake of filthy fourpences, Palm on my countrymen that face for mine ! O William Darton, let the Yearly Meeting Deal with thee for that falseness! All the rest Are traceable; Smug's Hebrew family; The German who might properly adorn A gibbet or a wheel, and Monsieur Sooté, Sons of Fitzbust the Evangelical ; -I recognize all these unlikenesses, Spurious abominations though they be, Each filiated on some original; But thou, Friend Darton, and - observe me, man, Only in courtesy, and quasi Quaker, I call thee Friend ! - hadst no original; No likeness, or unlikeness, silhouette, Outline, or plaster, representing me, Whereon to form thy misrepresentation. If I guess rightly at the pedigree Of thy bad groatsworth, thou didst get a barber To personate my injured Laureateship; An advertising barber, - one who keeps A bear, and, when he puts to death poor Bruin, Sells his grease, fresh as from the carcass cut, Pro bono publico, the price per pound Twelve shillings and no more. From such a barber, O unfriend Darton ! was that portrait made, I think, or peradventure from his block.

Next comes a minion worthy to be set In a wooden frame; and here I might invoke Avenging Nemesis, if I did not feel, Just now, God Cynthius pluck me by the ear.

But, Allan, in what shape God Cynthius comes, And wherefore he admonisheth me thus, Nor thou nor I will tell the world; hereafter The commentators, my Malones and Reids, May, if they can. For in my gallery Though there remaineth undescribed good store, Yet "of enough enough, and now no more," (As honest old George Gascoigne said of yore,) Save only a last couplet to express That I am always truly yours,

Thalaba the Destroyer.

Ποιηματων ακρατης η ελευθερια, και νομος εις, το δοξαν τω ποιητη. Lucian, Quomodo Hist Scribenda.

PREFACE.

It was said, in the original Preface to Joan of Arc, that the Author would not be in England to witness its reception, but that he would attend to iberal criticism, and hoped to profit by it in the pomposition of a poem upon the discovery of America by the Welsh prince Madoc.

That subject I had fixed upon when a school-boy, and had often conversed upon the probabilities of the story with the school-fellow to whom, sixteen years afterwards, I had the satisfaction of inscribing the poem. It was commenced at Bath in the autumn of 1794; but, upon putting Joan of Arc to the press, its progress was necessarily suspended, and it was not resumed till the second edition of that work had been completed. Then it became my chief occupation during twelve months that 1 resided in the village of Westbury, near Bristol. This was one of the happiest portions of my life. I never before or since produced so much poetry in the same space of time. The smaller pieces were communicated by letter to Charles Lamb, and had the advantage of his animadversions. I was then also in habits of the most frequent and intimate intercourse with Davy, then in the flower and freshness of his youth. We were within an easy walk of each other, over some of the most beautiful ground in that beautiful part of England. When I went to the Pneumatic Institution, he had to tell me of some new experiment or discovery, and of the views which it opened for him; and when he came to Westbury there was a fresh portion of Madoe for his hearing. Davy encouraged me with his hearty approbation during its progress; and the bag of nitrous oxyde, with which he generally regaled me upon my visits to him, was not required for raising my spirits to the degree of settled fair, and keeping them at that elevation.

In November, 1836, I walked to that village with my son, wishing to show him a house endeared to me by so many recollections; but not a vestige of it remained, and local alterations rendered it impossible even to ascertain its site — which is now included within the grounds of a Nunnery! The bosom friends with whom I associated there have all departed before me; and of the domestic circle in which my happiness was then centred, I am the sole survivor.

When we removed from Westbury at Midsum- for its publication with Messrs. Longman and Rees. mer, 1799, I had reached the penultimate book of 1t was printed at Bristol by Biggs and Cottle, and Madoc. That poem was finished on the 12th of July following, at Kingsdown, Bristol, in the house of an old lady, whose portrait hangs, with that of my own mother, in the room wherein I am now writing. The son who lived with her was one of my dearest friends, and one of the best men I ever knew or heard of. In those days I was an early riser: the time so gained was usually employed in earrying on the poem which I had in hand; and when Charles Danvers came down to breakfast on the morning after Madoe was completed, I had the first hundred lines of Thalaba to show him, fresh from the mint.

But this poem was neither crudely conceived nor hastily undertaken. I had fixed upon the ground, four years before, for a Maliommedan tale; and in the course of that time the plan had been formed, and the materials collected. It was pursued with unabating ardor at Exeter, in the village of Burton, near Christ Church, and afterwards at Kingsdown, till the ensuing spring, when Dr. Beddoes advised me to go to the south of Europe, on account of my health. For Lisbon, therefore, we set off; and, hastening to Falmouth, found the packet in which we wished to sail detained in harbor by "Six days we watched the westerly winds. weathercock, and sighed for north-easters. Ι walked on the beach, caught soldier-erabs, admired the sea-anemones in their ever-varying shapes of oeauty, read Gebir, and wrote half a book of Thalaba." This sentence is from a letter written on our arrival at Lisbon; and it is here inserted because the sea-anemones (which I have never had any other opportunity of observing) were introduced in Thalaba soon afterwards; and hecause, as already stated, I am sensible of having derived great improvement from the frequent perusal of Gebir at that time.

Change of eircumstances and of climate effected an immediate eure of what proved to be not an organic disease. A week after our landing at Lisbon I resumed my favorite work, and I completed it at Cintra, a year and six days after the day of its commencement.

A fair transcript was sent to England. Mr. Rickman, with whom I had fallen in at Christ Church in 1797, and whose friendship from that time I have ever accounted among the singular advantages and happinesses of my life, negotiated for its publication with Messrs. Longman and Rees. It was printed at Bristol by Biggs and Cottle, and the task of correcting the press was undertaken for me by Davy and our common friend Danvers, under whose roof it had been begun.

The copy which was made from the original draught, regularly as the poem proceeded, is still in my possession. The first corrections were made as they occurred in the process of transcribing, at which time the verses were tried upon my own ear, and had the advantage of being seen in a fair and remarkably legible hand-writing. In this transcript the dates of time and place were noted, and things which would otherwise have been forgotten have thus been brought to my recollection. Herein also the alterations were inserted which the poem underwent before it was printed. They were very numerous. Much was pruned off, and more was ingrafted. I was not satisfied with the first part of the concluding book; it was therefore crossed out, and something substituted altogether different in design; but this substitution was so far from being fortunate, that it neither pleased my friends in England nor myself. 1 then made a third attempt, which succeeded to my own satisfaction and to theirs.

I was in Portugal when Thalaba was published. Its reception was very different from that with which Joan of Arc had been weleomed: in proportion as the poem deserved better, it was treated worse. Upon this occasion my name was first coupled with Mr. Wordsworth's. We were then, and for some time afterwards, all but strangers to each other; and certainly there were no two poets in whose productions, the difference not being that between good and bad, less resemblance could be found. But I happened to be residing at Keswick when Mr. Wordsworth and I began to be acquainted; Mr. Coleridge also had resided there; and this was reason enough for classing us together as a school of poets. Accordingly, for more than twenty years from that time, every tyro in criticism who could smatter and sneer, tried his "prentice hand" upon the Lake Poets; and every young sportsman, who carried a popgun in the field of satire, considered them as fair game.

PREFACE

THE FOURTH EDITION.

Is the continuation of the Arabian Tales, the Domdaniel is mentioned — a seminary for evil magicians, under the roots of the sea. From this seed the present romance has grown. Let me not be supposed to prefer the rhythm in which it is written, abstractedly considered, to the regular blank verse — the noblest measure, in my judgment, of which our admirable language is capable. For the following Poem I have preferred it, because it suits the varied subjects it is the Arabesque ornament of an Arabian tale.

The dramatic sketches of Dr. Sayers, a volume which no lover of poetry will recollect without pleasure, induced me, when a young versifier, to practise in this rhythm. I felt that while it gave the poet a wider range of expression, it satisfied the ear of the reader. It were easy to make a parade of learning, by enumerating the various feet which it admits: it is only needful to observe that no two lines are employed in sequence which can be read into one. Two six-syllable lines, it will perhaps be answered, compose an Alexandrine: the truth is, that the Alexandrine, when harmonious, is composed of two six-syllable lines.

One advantage this metre assuredly possesses —the dullest reader cannot distort it into discord : he may read it prosaically, but its flow and fall will still be perceptible. Verse is not enough favored by the English reader: perhaps this is owing to the obtrusiveness, the regular Jew'sharp twing-twang, of what has been foolishly called heroic measure. I do not wish the improrisatore tune; —but something that denotes the sense of harmony, something like the accent of feeling, —like the tone which every poet necessarily gives to poetry.

THE FIRST BOOK.

- Worse and worse, young Orphane, be thy payne, If theu due vengeance doe forbeare, Till guiltie blood her guerdon do obtayne. Faery Queen, B. 2, Can. 1 1.

How beautiful is night ! A dewy freshness fills the silent air ; No mist obscures, nor cloud, nor speck, nor stain, Breaks the serene of heaven : In full-orb'd glory yonder Moon divine Rolls through the dark-blue depths. Beneath her steady ray The desert-circle spreads, Like the round ocean, girdled with the sky. How beautiful is night '

2.

Who, at this untimely hour, Wanders o'er the desert sands? No station is in view, Nor palm-grove, islanded amid the waste The mother and her child, The widow'd mother and the fatherless boy, They, at this untimely hour, Wander o'er the desert sands.

- 3.

Alas! the setting sun Saw Zeinab in her bliss, Hodeirah's wife beloved. Alas! the wife beloved,

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

The fruitful mother late, Whom when the daughters of Arabia named, They wish'd their lot like hers, She wanders o'er the desert sands A wretched widow now; The fruitful mother of so fair a race, With only one preserved, She wanders o'er the wilderness.

4.

No tear relieved the burden of her heart; Stunn'd with the heavy woe, she felt like one Half-waken'd from a midnight dream of blood. But sometimes, when the boy Would wet her hand with tears, And, looking up to her fix'd countenance, Sob out the name of Mother! then she groan'd. At length collecting, Zeinab turn'd her eyes To heaven, and praised the Lord; "He gave, he takes away!" The pious sufferer cried, "The Lord our God is good!"

5.

"Good is he !" quoth the boy; "Why are my brethren and my sisters slain? Why is my father kill'd? Did ever we neglect our prayers, Or ever lift a hand unclean to Heaven? Did ever stranger from our tent Unwelcomed turn away? Mother, He is not good!"

6.

Then Zeinab beat her breast in agony, — "O God, forgive the child ! He knows not what he says; Thou know'st 1 did not teach him thoughts like these; O Prophet, pardon him !"

7.

She had not wept till that assuaging prayer; The fountains of her grief were open'd then, And tears relieved her heart. She raised her swinning eyes to Heaven, "Allah, thy will be done ! Beneath the dispensations of that will I groan, but murmur not. A day will come, when all things that are dark Will be made clear;—then shall I know, O Lord ! Why in thy mercy thou hast stricken me; Then see and understand what now My heart believes and feels."

8

Young Thalaba in silence heard reproof; His brow in manly frowns was knit, With manly thoughts his heart was full. "Tell me, who slew my father?" cried the boy. Zeinab replied and said, "I knew not that there lived thy father's foe. The blessings of the poor for him Went daily up to Heaven; In distant lands the traveller told his praise ; — I did not think there lived Hodeirah's enemy."

9.

"But I will hunt him through the world!" Young Thalaba exclaim'd. "Already I can bend my father's bow; Soon will my arm have strength To drive the arrow-feathers to his heart."

10.

Zeinab replied, "O Thalaba, my child, Thou lookest on to distant days, And we are in the desert, far from men!"

11.

Not till that moment her afflicted heart Had leisure for the thought. She cast her eyes around; Alas! no tents were there Beside the bending sands; No palm-tree rose to spot the wilderness; The dark-blue sky closed round, And rested like a dome Upon the circling waste. She cast her eyes around; Famine and Thirst were there; And then the wretched Mother bowed her head, And wept upon her child 12.

A sudden cry of wonder From Thalaba aroused her, She raised her head, and saw Where, high in air, a stately palace rose Amid a grove embower'd Stood the prodigious pile; Trees of such ancient majesty Tower'd not on Yemen's happy hills, Nor crown'd the lofty brow of Lebanon Fabric so vast, so lavishly enrich'd, For Idol, or for Tyrant, never yet Raised the slave race of man, In Rome, nor in the elder Babylon, Nor old Persepolis, Nor where the family of Greece Hymn'd Eleutherian Jove.

13.

Here, studding azure tablatures, And ray'd with feeble light, Star-like the ruby and the diamond shone, Here on the golden towers The yellow moon-beam lay; Here with white splendor floods the silver wall Less wondrous pile, and less magnificent, Sennamar built at Hirah, though his art Seal'd with one stone the ample edifice, And made its colors, like the serpent's skin, Play with a changeful beanty : him, its Lord, Jealous lest after-effort might surpass The then unequall'd palace, from its height Dash'd on the payement down.

BOOK I.

They enter'd, and through aromatic paths Wondering they went along. At length, upon a mossy hank, Beneath a tall mimosa's shade, Which o'er him bent its living canopy, They saw a man reclined. Young he appear'd, for on his cheek there shone The morning glow of health, And the brown heard curl'd close around his chin. He slept, but, at the sound Of coming feet awaking, fixed his eyes In wonder on the wanderer and her child. "Forgive us," Zeinab cried; "Distress hath made us bold. Relieve the widow and the fatherless ! Blessed are they who succor the distress'd; For them hath God appointed Paradise."

15.

IIe heard, and he look'd up to heaven, And tears ran down his cheeks; "It is a human voice! I thank thee, O my God!— How many an age hath past Since the sweet sounds have visited my ear ' I thank thee, O my God! It is a human voice!"

16.

To Zeinab turning then, he said, "O mortal, who art thou, Whose gifted eyes have pierced The shadow of concealment that hath wrapt These bowers, so many an age, From eye of mortal man? For countless years have past, And never foot of man The bewers of Irem trod,— Save only 1, a miserable wretch From Heaven and Earth shut out ''

17.

Fearless, and scarce surprised, For grief in Zeinab's soul All other feebler feelings overpower'd, She answer'd, "Yesterday I was a wife beloved, The fruitful mother of a numerous race I am a widow now; Of all my offspring this alone is left. Praise to the Lord our God, He gave, He takes away!''

18.

Then said the stranger, "Not by Heaven unseen, Nor in unguided wanderings, hast thou reach'd This secret place, be sure ! Nor for light purpose is the veil, That from the Universe hath long shut out These ancient bowers, withdrawn. Hear thou my words, O mortal; in thine heart Treasure what I shall tell; And when amid the world Thou shalt emerge again, Repeat the warning tale. Why have the fathers suffer'd, but to make The children wisely safe?

19.

"The Paradise of Irem this, And this that wonder of the world, The Palace built by Shedad in his pride. Alas! in the days of my youth, The hum of mankind Was heard in yon wilderness waste; O'er all the winding sands The tents of Ad were pitch'd; Happy Al-Ahkaf then, For many and brave were her sons, Her daughters were many and fair.

20.

"My name was Aswad then — Alas! alas! how strange The sound so long unheard! Of noble race I came, One of the wealthy of the earth my sire A hundred horses in my father's stall Stood ready for his will; Numerous his robes of silk; The number of his camels was not known. These were my heritage, O God! thy gifts were these; But better had it been for Aswad's soul, Had he ask'd alms on earth, And begg'd the crumbs which from his table fell, So he had known thy Word.

21.

"Boy, who hast reach'd my solitude, Fear the Lord in the days of thy youth ' My knee was never taught To bend before my God;
My voice was never taught To shape one holy prayer.
We worshipp'd Idols, wood and stone; The work of our own foolish hands We worshipp'd in our foolishness. Vainly the Prophet's voice Its frequent warning raised, 'REFENT AND BE FORGIVEN!' — We mock'd the messenger of God;
We mock'd the Lord, long-suffering, slow to wrath

22.

"A mighty work the pride of Shedad plann'd— Here in the wilderness to form A Garden more surpassing fair Than that before whose gate The lightning of the Cherub's fiery sword Waves wide to bar access, Since Adam, the transgressor, thence was driven. Here, too, would Shedad build A kingly pile sublime, The Palace of his pride. For this exhausted mines Supplied their golden store; For this the central caverns gave their gems For this the woodman's axe

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Open'd the cedar forest to the sun, The silkworm of the East Spun her sepulchral egg; The hunter Afri Provoked the danger of the Elephant's rage; The Ethiop, keen of scent, Detects the ebony, That, deep-inearth'd, and hating light, A leafless tree and barren of all fruit, With darkness feeds its boughs of raven grain Such were the treasures lavish'd in yon pile Ages have past away, And never mortal eye Gazed on their vanity.

23.

"The Garden, - copious springs Blest that delightful spot, And every flower was planted there That makes the gale of evening sweet. He spake, and bade the full-grown forest rise, His own creation; should the King Wait for slow Nature's work? All trees that bend with luscious fruit, Or wave with feathery boughs, Or point their spiring heads to heaven, Or spreading wide their shadowy arms, Invite the traveller to repose at noon, ---Hither, uprooted with their native soil, The labor and the pain of multitudes, -Mature in beauty, bore them. Here frequent in the walks The marble statue stood Of heroes and of chiefs. The trees and flowers remain, By Nature's care perpetuate and self-sown The marble statues long have lost all trace Of heroes and of chiefs; Huge, shapeless stones they lie, O'ergrown with many a flower.

24.

"The work of pride went on; Often the Prophet's voice Denounced impending woe; We mock'd at the words of the Seer, We mock'd at the wrath of the Lord. A long-continued drought first troubled us; Three years no cloud had form'd, Three years no rain had fallen; The wholesome herb was dry, The corn matured not for the food of man. The wells and fountains fail'd. O hard of heart, in whom the punishment Awoke no sense of guilt! Headstrong to ruin, obstinately blind, We to our Idols still applied for aid ; Sakia we invoked for rain. We called on Razeka for food; They did not hear our prayers, they could not hear No cloud appear'd in Heaven, No nightly dews came down.

25.

"Then to the Place of Concourse messengers Were sent, to Mecca, where the nations came, Round the Red Hillock kneeling, to implore God in his favor'd place. We sent to call on God; Ah fools ' unthinking that from all the earth The soul ascends to him. We sent to call on God; Ah fools ! to think the Lord Would hear their prayers abroad, Who made no prayers at home !

26.

" Meantime the work of pride went on, And still before our Idols, wood and stone, We bow'd the impious knee. 'Turn, men of Ad, and call upon the Lord, The Prophet Houd exclaim'd: 'Turn, men of Ad, and look to Heaven, And fly the wrath to come.' -We mock'd the Prophet's words; ----' Now dost thou dream, old man, Or art thou drunk with wine? Future wee and wrath to come Still thy prudent voice forebodes; When it comes, will we believe; Till it comes, will we go on In the way our fathers went. Now are thy words from God? Or dost thou dream, old man, Or art thou drunk with wine?"

27.

"So spake the stubborn race, The unbelieving ones. l, too, of stubborn, unbelieving heart, Heard him, and heeded not. It chanced my father went the way of man, He perish'd in his sins. The funeral rites were duly paid ; We bound a Camel to his grave, And left it there to die, So, if the resurrection came, Together they might rise. I past my father's grave; I heard the Camel moan. She was his favorite beast. One who had carried me in infancy, The first that by myself I learn'd to mount. Her limbs were lean with famine, and her eyes Ghastly, and sunk, and dim. She knew me as I past; She stared me in the face ; My heart was touch'd, - had it been human else ? I thought that none was near, and cut her honds, And drove her forth to liberty and life. The Prophet Houd had seen; He lifted up his voice -' Blessed art thou, young man, Blessed art thou, O Aswad, for the deed ' In the day of Visitation, In the fearful hour of Judgment, God will remember thee ! '

28.

"The Day of Visitation was at hand; The fearful Hour of Judgment hastened on. Lo! Shedad's mighty pile complete,

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

The Palaee of his pride. Would ye behold its wonders, enter in ! I have no heart to visit it. Time hath not harm'd the eternal monument ; Time is not here, nor days, nor months, nor years, An everlasting Now of solitude !-- 29.

"Ye must have heard their fame; Or likely ye have seen The mighty Pyramids,— For sure those awful piles have overlived The feeble generations of mankind. What though unmoved they bore the deluge weight, Survivors of the ruined world? What though their founder fill'd with miraeles And wealth miraeulous their spacious vaults? Compared with yonder fabric, and they shrink The baby wonders of a woman's work.

30.

"Here emerald columns o'er the marble courts Shed their green rays, as when amid a shower The sun shines loveliest on the vernal corn. Here Shedad bade the sapphire floor be laid, As though with feet divine To tread on azure light, Like the blue pavement of the firmament. Here, self-suspended, hangs in air, As its pure substance loathed material touch, The living earbundle; Sun of the lofty dome, Darkness hath no dominion o'er its beams; Intense it glows, an ever-flowing spring Of radianee, like the day-flood in its source.

31.

"Impious! the Trees of vegetable gold, Such as in Eden's groves Yet innocent it grew; Impious! he made his boast, though Heaven had hid So deep the baneful ore, That they should branch and bud for him. That art should force their blossoms and their fruit, And re-ereate for him whate'er Was lost in Paradise. Therefore at Shedad's voice Here tower'd the palm, a silver trunk, The fine gold net-work growing out Loose from its rugged boughs. Tall as the cedar of the mountain, here Rose the gold branches, hung with emerald leaves, Blossom'd with pearls, and rich with ruby fruit.

32.

"O Ad! my country! evil was the day That thy unhappy sons Croueh'd at this Nimrod's throne, And placed him on the pedestal of power, And laid their liberties beneath his feet, Robbing their children of the heritanee Their fathers handed down. What was to him the squander'd wealth? What was to him the burden of the land, The lavish'd misery? He did but speak his will, And, like the blasting Siroc of the sands, The ruin of the royal voice Found its way every where. I marvel not that he, whose power No earthly law, no human feeling curb'd, Moek'd at the living God !

33

"And now the King's command went forth Among the people, bidding old and young, Husband and wife, the master and the slave, All the collected multitudes of Ad, Here to repair, and hold high festival, That he might see his people, they behold Their King's magnificence and power. The day of festival arrived; Hither they came, the old man and the boy, Husband and wife, the master and the slave, Hither they eame. From yonder high tower top, The loftiest of the Palace, Shedad look'd Down on his tribe: their tents on yonder sands Rose like the countless billows of the sea; Their tread and voices like the ocean roar, One deep confusion of tumultuons sounds. They saw their King's magnificence, beheld His palace sparkling like the Angel domes Of Paradise, his Garden like the bowers Of early Eden, and they shouted out, 'Great is the King! a God upon the Earth !'

34.

" Intoxicate with joy and pride, He heard their blasphemies; And, in his wantonness of heart, he bade The Prophet Houd be brought; And o'er the marble courts, And o'er the gorgeous rooms, Glittering with gems and gold, He led the Man of God. ' Is not this a stately pile?' Cried the monarch in his joy. ' Hath ever eye beheld, Hath ever thought conceived, Place more magnificent? Houd, they say that Heaven imparteth Words of wisdom to thy lips; Look at the riches round, And value them aright, If so thy wisdom ean.'

35.

"The Prophet heard his vaunt, And, with an awful smile, he answer'd him --'O Shedad! only in the hour of death We learn to value things like these aright.'

36.

" ' Hast thou a fault to find In all thine eyes have seen? ' With unadmonish'd pride, the King exclaum'd ' Yea!' said the Man of God; ' The walls are weak, the building ill secure Azrael ean enter in!

"I was beside the Monarch when he spake, Gentle the Prophet spake, But in his eye there dwelt A sorrow that disturb'd me while I gazed. The countenance of Shedad fell, And anger sat upon his paler lips. He to the high tower-top the Prophet led, And pointed to the multitude, And as again they shouted out, 'Great is the King! a God upon the Earth!' With dark and threatful smile to Houd he turn'd, Say they aright, O Prophet? is the King Great upon earth, a God among mankind?' The Prophet answer'd not; Over that infinite multitude He roll'd his ominous eyes, And tears which could not be suppress'd gush'd forth.

"Sudden an uproar rose, A cry of joy below; "The messenger is come ' Katl from Meeca comes; He brings the boon obtain'd ' 39.

"Forth as we went, we saw where overhead There hung a deep-black cloud, To which the multitude With joyful eyes look'd up, And blest the coming rain. The Messenger address'd the King, And told his tale of joy.

40.

""To Meeea I repair'd, By the Red Hillock knelt, And call'd on God for rain. My prayer ascended, and was heard; Three clouds appear'd in Heaven, One white, and like the flying cloud of noon, One red, as it had drunk the evening beams, One black and heavy with its load of rain A voice went forth from Heaven,— 'Choose, Kail, of the three !' I thank'd the gracious Power, And chose the black cloud, heavy with its wealth. 'Right! right!' a thousand tongues exclaim'd; And all was merriment and joy.

41.

"Then stood the Prophet up, and cried a.oud, 'Woe, woe to Irem! woe to Ad. DEATH is gone up into her palaces! Woe! woe! a day of guilt and punishment; A day of desolation!"—As he spake, His large eye roll'd in horror, and so deep His tone, it seem'd some Spirit from within Breathed through his moveless lips the unearthly voice.

42.

"All looks were turn'd to him. 'O Ad!' he cried, 'Dear native land, by all remembrances Of childhood, by all joys of manhood dear; O Vale of many Waters; morn and night My age must groan for you, and to the grave Go down in sorrow. Thou wilt give thy fruits, But who shall gather them? thy grapes will ripen, But who shall tread the wine-press? Fly the wrath, Ye who would live and save your souls alive! For strong is his right hand that bends the Bow, The Arrows that he shoots are sharp, And err not from their aim !'

43.

"With that a faithful few Press'd through the throng to join him. Then arose Mockery and mirth; 'Go, bald head!' and they mix'd Curses with laughter. He set forth, yet once Look'd back:—his eye fell on me, and he call'd, 'Aswad!'—it startled me—it terrified;— 'Aswad!' again he call'd—and I almost Had follow'd him.—O moment fied too soon' O moment irrecoverably lost! The shouts of mockery made a coward of me ; He went, and I remain'd in fear of Max!

44.

"He went, and darker grew The deepening cloud above. At length it open'd, and — O God! O God! — There were no waters there! There fell no kindly rain! The Sarsar from its womb went forth, The fey Wind of Death. — 45.

"They fell around me; thonsands fell around; The King and all his people fell; All! all! they perish'd all!
1 — only 1 — was left.
There came a Voice to me, and said,
'In the Day of Visitation,
In the fearful Hour of Judgment,
God hath remember'd thee.'

46.

"When from an agony of prayer 1 rose, And from the scene of death Attempted to go forth, The way was open; I could see No barrier to my steps. But round these bowers the arm of God Had drawn a mighty chain, A barrier that no human force might break. Twice I essay'd to pass; With that a Voice was heard,-"O Aswad, be content, and bless the Loid ! One charitable deed hath saved Thy soul from utter death. O Aswad, sinful man ! When by long penitence Thou feel'st thy soul prepared, Breathe up the wish to die,

And Azrael comes in answer to thy prayer.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

47.

"A miserable man, From Earth and Heaven shut out, I heard the dreadful Voice. I look'd around my prison place; The bodies of the dead were there; Where'er I look'd they lay, They moulder'd, moulder'd here, — Their very bones have crumbled into dust, So many years have past! So many weary ages have gone by' And still I linger here, Still groaning with the burden of my sins, Not yet have dared to breathe The prayer to be released.

48.

"Oh! who can tell the unspeakable misery Of solitude like this! No sound hath ever reach'd my ear, Save of the passing wind, The fountain's everlasting flow, The forest in the gale, The pattering of the shower -Sounds dead and mournful all. No bird hath ever closed her wing Upon these solitary bowers, No insect sweetly buzz'd amid these groves, From all things that have life, Save only me, conceal'd. This Tree alone, that o'er my head Hangs down its hospitable boughs, And bends its whispering leaves As though to welcome me, Seems to partake of life : I love it as my friend, my only friend¹ 49.

"I know not for what ages I have dragg'd This miserable life : How often I have seen These ancient trees renew'd ! What countless generations of mankind Have risen and fallen asleep, And I remain the same ! My garment hath not waxen old, And the sole of my shoe is not worn.

50.

"Sinner that I have been, I dare not offer up a prayer to die O merciful Lord God!— But when it is thy will, But when I have atoned For mine iniquities, And sufferings have made pure My sonl with sin defiled, Release me in thine own good time :— I wilt not cease to praise thee, O my God!"

51.

Silence ensued awhile; Then Zeinab answer'd him; "Blessed art thou, O Aswad! for the Lord, Who saved thy soul from Hell, Will call thee to him in his own good time. And would that when my soul Breathed up the wish to die, Azrael might visit me ! Then would I follow where my babes are gone, And join Hodeirah now !"

52.

She ceased; and the rushing of wings Was heard in the stillness of night, And Azrael, the Death-Angel, stood before them His countenance was dark, Solemn, but not severe; It awed, but struck no terror to the heart. "Zeinab, thy wish is heard! Aswad, thine hour is come!" They fell upon the ground, and blest the voice; And Azrael from his sword

Let fall the drops of bitterness and death.

53.

"Me too! me too!" young Thalaba exclaim'd. As, wild with grief, he kiss'd His Mother's livid hand, His Mother's livid lips; "O Angel! take me too!"

54.

"Son of Hodeirah!" the Death-Angel said, "It is not yet the hour. Son of Hodeirah, thou art chosen forth To do the will of Heaven ; To avenge thy father's death, The nurder of thy race ; To work the mightiest enterprise That mortal man hath wrought. Live ! and REMEMBER DESTINY HATH MARK'D THEE FROM MANKIND!"

55.

He ceased, and he was gone. Young Thalaba look'd round; The Palace and the Groves were seen no more; He stood amid the Wilderness, alone and of all his precepts it is that which his followers have best observed : it is even the vice of the East. It had been easy to have made Zeigab speak from the Koran, if the tame language of the Koran could be remembered by the few who have toiled through its dull tautology. I thought it better to express a feeling of religion in that language with which our religious ideas are connected.

The magnificent Mosque at Taüris is faced with varnished bricks, of various colors, like most fine buildings in Persia, says Tavernier. One of its domes is covered with white flower-work upon a green ground; the other has a black ground, spotted with white stars. Gilding is also common upon Oriental buildings. At Boghar io Bactria our old traveller Jenkinson* saw "many houses, temples, and monuments of stone, sumptuously builded and gilt."

In Pegu "they consume about their Varely or idol houses great store of leafe-gold, for that they overlay all the tops of the houses with gold, and some of them are covered with gold from the top to the foote ; in covering whercof there is a great store of gold spent, for that every ten years they new overlay them with gold, from the top to the foote, so that with this vanitie they spend great aboundance of golde. For every ten years the rain doth consume the gold from these houses." - Cæsar Frederick, in Hakluyt.

A waste of ornament and labor characterizes all the works of the Orientalists. I have seen illuminated Persian manuscripts that must each have been the toil of many years, every page painted, not with representations of life and manners, but usually like the curves and lines of a Turkey carpet, conveying no idea whatever, as absurd to the eye as nonsense-verses to the ear. The little of their literature that has reached us is equally worthless. Our barbarian scholars have called Ferdusi the Oriental Homer. Mr. Champion has published a specimen of his poem ; the translation is said to be had, and certainly must be unfaithful, for it is in rhyme ; but the vilest copy of a picture at least represents the subject and the composition. To make this Hiad of the East, as they have sacrilegiously styled it, a good poem, would be realizing the dreams of alchemy, and transmuting lead into gold.

The Arabian Tales certainly abound with genins ; they have lost their metaphorical rubbish in passing through the filter of a French translation.

Sennamar built at Hirah, &c. - 13, p. 226.

The Arabians call this palace one of the wonders of the world. It was built for Nôman-al-Aôuar, one of those Arabian Kings who reigned at Hirah. A single stone fastened the whole structure ; the color of the walls varied frequently in a day. Nôman richly rewarded the architect Sennamar; but, recollecting afterwards that he might build palaces equal or superior in beauty for his rival kings, ordered that he should be thrown from the highest tower of the edifice. -D' Herbelot.

An African colony had been settled in the north of Ireland long before the arrival of the Neimhedians. It is recorded, that Neimheidh had employed four of their artisans to erect for him two sumptuous palaces, which were so highly finished, that, jealous lest they might construct others on the same, or perhaps a grander plan, he had them privately made away with, the day after they had completed their work.

The Paradise of Irem, &c. - 19, p. 227.

The tribe of Ad were descended from Ad, the son of Aus

one. Resignation is particularly inculcated by Mahommed ; | or Uz, the son of Irem, the son of Shem, the son of Noah, who, after the confusion of tongnes, settled in Al-Ahkaf, or the Winding Sands, in the province of Hadramant, where his posterity greatly multiplied. Their first King was Shedad, the son of Ad, of whom the Eastern writers deliver many fabulous things, particularly that he finished the magnificent eity his father had begun; wherein he built a fine palace, adorned with delicions gardens, to embellish which he spared neither cost nor labor, proposing thereby to create in his subjects a superstitious veneration of himself as a God. This garden or paradise was called the garden of Irem, and is men tioned in the Koran, and often alluded to by the Oriental writers. The city, they tell us, is still standing in the deserts of Aden, being preserved by Providence as a monument of divine justice, though it be invisible, unless very rarely, when God permits it to be seen-a favor one Colabah pretended to have received in the reign of the Khalif Moawiyah, who sending for him to know the truth of the matter, Colabah related his whole adventure ; that, as he was seeking a camel he had lost, he found himself on a sudden at the gates of this city, and entering it, saw not one inhabitant ; at which being terrified, he staid no longer than to take with him some five stones, which he showed the Khalif. - Sale.

The descendants of Ad, in process of time, falling from the worship of the true God into idolatry, God sent the prophet Houd (who is generally agreed to be Heber) to preach the unity of his essence, and reclaim them. Houd preached for many years to this people without effect, till God at last was weary of waiting for their repentance. The first punishment which he inflicted was a famine of three years' continuance, during all which time the heavens were clused upon them. This, with the evils which it cansed, destroyed a great part of this people, who were then the richest and most powerful of all in Arabia.

The Adites, seeing themselves reduced to this extremity, and receiving no succor from their false gods, resolved to make a pilgrimage to a place in the province of Hegiaz, where at present Mecca is situated. There was then a hillock of red sand there, around which a great concourse of different people might always be seen; and all these nations, the faithful as well as the unfaithful, believed that by visiting this spot with devotion, they should obtain from God whatever they petitioned for, respecting the wants and necessities of life.

The Adites, having then resolved to undertake this religious journey, chose seventy men, at whose head they appointed Mortadh and Kaïl, the two most considerable per onages of the country, to perform this duty in the name of the whole nation, and hy this means procure rain from Heaven, without which their country must be ruined. The deputies departed, and were hospitably received by Moawiyah, who at that time reigned in the province of Hegiaz. They explained to him the occasion of their journey, and demanded leave to proceed and perform their devotions at the Red Hillock, that they might procure rain.

Mortadh, who was the wisest of this company, and who had been converted by the Prophet Houd, often remonstrated with his associates, that it was useless to take this journey for the purpose of praying at this chosen spot, unless they had previously adopted the truths which the Prophet preached, and seriously repented of their unbelief. For how, said he, can you hope that God will shed upon us the abundant showers of his mercy, if we refuse to hear the voice of him whom he hath sent to instruct us?

Kaïl, who was one of the most obstinate in error, and consequently of the Prophet's worst enemies, hearing the discourses of his colleague, requested king Moawiyah to detain Mortadh prisoner, whilst he and the remainder of his companions proceeded to make their prayers upon the Hillock. Moawiyah consented, and, detaining Mortadh captive, permitted the others to pursue their journey, and accomplish their yow.

Kaïl, now the sole chief of the deputation, having arrived at the place, prayed thus : Lord, give to the people of Ad such rains as it shall please thee. And he had scareely finished when there appeared three clouds in the sky, one white, one red, the third black. At the same time, these words were heard to proceed from Heaven -- Choose which of the three thou wilt. Kaïl chose the black, which he imagined the fullest, and most abundant in water, of which they were in f extreme want. After having chosen, he immediately quitted the place, and took the read to his own country, congratulating himself on the happy success of his pilgrinage.

As seen as Kail arrived in the valley of Magaith, a part of the territory of the Adites, he informed his countrymen of the favorable asswer he had received, and of the cloud which was soon to water all their lands. The senseless people all came out of their houses to receive it; but this cloud, which was hig with the divine vengeauce, produced only a wind, most cold and most violent, which the Arabs call Sarsar; it coatinued to blow for seven days and seven nights, and exterminated all the unhelievers of the country, leaving only the Prophet Hond alive, and those who had heard him and turned to the faith, — $D^{*}Herbelot$.

Meeca was thus called. Mahommed destroyed the other superstitions of the Arabs, but he was obliged to adopt their old and rooted veneration for the Well and the Black Stone, and transfer to Meeca the respect and reverence which he had designed for Jerusalem.

" Mecca is situated in a barren place (about one day's journey from the Red Sea) in a valley, or rather in the midst of many little hills. The town is surrounded for several miles with many thousands of little hills, which are very near one to the other. I have been on the top of some of them, near Mecca, where I could see some miles about, but yet was not able to see the farthest of the hills. They are all stoay-rock, and blackish, and pretty near of a bigness, appearing at a distance like cocks of hay, but all pointing towards Mocca. Some of them are half a mile in circumference, &c., but all near of one height. The people here have as odd and foolish sort of tradition concerning them, viz. That when Abraham weat shout building the Beat-Allah, God by his wonderfel providence did so order it, that every mountain in the world should contribute something to the building thereof; and accordingly every one did send its proportion. Though there is a mountain near Algiers, which is called Corra Dog, i. e. Black Mountain ; and the reason of its blackness, they say, is, because it did not send any part of itself towards building the Temple at Mocca. Between these hills is good and plain travelling, though they stand near one to another."

A faithful Account of the Religion and Manners of the Mahomedans, &c. by Joseph Pitts of Exon.

Adam, after his fall, was placed upon the mountain of Vassem in the eastern region of the globe. Eve was banished to a place, since called Djudda, which signifies the first of methers, (the celebrated port of Gedda, on the coast of Arabia.) The Serpent was cast into the most horrid desert of the East, and the spiritual tempter, who seduced him, was exiled to the coasts of Eblehk. This fall of our first parent was followed by the infidelity and sedition of all the spirits, Djian, who were spread over the surface of the earth. Then God sent against them the great Arasil, who, with a legion of angels, chased them from the continent, and dispersed them among the isles, and along the different coasts of the sea. Some time after, Adam, conducted by the spirit of God, travelled into Arabia, and advanced as far as .Necca. His footsteps diffused on all sides abundance and fertility. His figure was enchanting, his stature lefty, his complexion brown, his hair thick, loag, and curled; and he then wore a beard and mustachies. After a separation of a hundred years, he rejoined Eve on Mount Arafaith, near Mecca - an event which gave that mount the name of Arofaith, or Arefe, that is, the Place of Remembrance. This favor of the Eternal Deity was accompanied by another not less striking. By his orders the angels took a teat, Khayme, from Paradise, and pitched it on the very spot where afterwards the Keube was erected. This is the most sacred of the tabernacles, and the first temple which was consecrated to the worship of the Eternal Deity by the first of men, and by all his posterity. Seth was the founder of the Sacred Keabe; in the same place where the angels had pitched the celestial tent, he erected a stone edifice, which he consecrated to the worship of the Eternal Deity .--D' Ohsson.

Bowed down by the weight of years, Adam had reached the limit of his earthly existence. At that moment he longed eagerly for the fruits of Paradise. A legion of angels attended upon his latest sigh, and, by the command of the Eternal Being, received his soal. He died on Friday, the 7th of April, Missaa, at the age of nina hundred and thirty years. The angels washed and purified his body; which was the origin of funeral ablations. The archangel Michael wrapped it in a sheet, with perfumes and aromatics; and the archangel Gabriei, discharging the daties of the Imameth, performed, at the head of the whole legien of angels, and of the whole family of this first of the puriarchs, the Salat?hul-Dienaze; which gave birth to funeral puayers. The bedy of Adam was deposited at Ghar'ul-Kenz, (the grotte of trensure.) upon the mountain Djebel-Eb'y Caubeyss, which overlooks Mecca. His descendants, at his death, amounted to forty thousand scols. $-D^*Oksson$.

When Neah entered the ark, he took with him, by the command of the Eternal, the body of Adam, enclosed in a box-coffia. After the waters had abated, his first care was to deposit it in the same grotte from whence it had been removed. $D^{*}Ohsson$.

So if the resurrection came. - 27, p. 228.

Some of the Pagan Arabs, when they died, had their Camel tied by their Sepulchre, and so left without meat or drink to perish, and accompany them to the other world, lest they should be obliged at the Resurrection to go on foot, which was accounted very scandalous.

She stared me in the face. - 27, p. 228.

This lice is one of the most beautiful passages of our old ballads, so full of beauty. I have never seen the ballad in print, and with some trouble have procured only an imperfect copy from memory. It is accessary to insert some of the preceding stanzas. The title is,

OLO POULTER'S MARE.

At length old age came on her, And she grew faint and poor; Her master he fell out with her, And turn'd her out of door, Saying, If thou with not labor, I prithee go thy way, — And aever let me see thy face Until thy dying day. These words she took unkind, And on her way she went,

For to fulfil her master's will Always was her intent; The hills were very high, The valleys very bare, Old Ponlter he grew sorrowful, Aod said to his kinsman Will, I'd have thee go and seek the Mare O'er valley and o'er hill; Go, go, go, go, says Ponlter, And make haste back again, For until thoo hast found the Mare, In greef I chall remain.

Away went Will so willingly, And all day long he sought; Till when it grew towards the night, He in his mind bethought, He would go home and rest him, And come again to-morrow; For if he could not find the Mare, His heart would break with sorrow

He went a little farther, And turn'd bis head aside, And just hy goodman Whitheld's gate, Oh, there the Mare he spied. He ask'd her how she did; She stared him in the face, Fhen down she laud her head again — She was in wretched case.

What though unmoved they bore the delage weight. - 29, p. 229.

Concerning the Pyramids, "I shall put down," says Greaves, "that which is confessed by the Arabian writers to be the most probable relation, as is reported by Ibn Abd Albokm, whose words, out of the Arabic, are these : - " The greatest part of chronologers agree, that he which built the Pyramids was Sanrid Iba Salbonk, King of Egypt, who lived three hundred years before the flood. The occasion of this was, because he saw, in his sleep, that the whole earth was turned over with the inhabitants of it, the men lying upon their faces, and the stars falling down and striking one another, with a terrible noise ; and heing troubled, he conceiled it. After this, he saw the fixed stars falling to the earth, in the similitude of white fowl, and they snatched up men, carrying them between two great mountains; and these mountains closed upon them, and the shining stars were made dark. Awaking with great fear, he assembles the chief priests of all the provinces of Egypt, an hundred and thirty priests; the chief of them was called Aclimom. Relating the whole matter to them, they took the altitude of the stars, and, making their prognostication, foretold of a deluge. The King said, Will it come to our country? they unswered, Yea, and will destroy it. And there remained a certain number of years for to come, and he commanded, in the mean space, to build the Pyramids, and a vault to be made, into which the river Nilus entering, should run into the countries of the west, and into the land Al-Said. And he filled them with telesmes,* and with strange things, and with riches and treasures, and the like. He engraved in them all things that were told him by wise mea, as also all profound sciences, the names of alakakirs, † the uses and hurts of them; the science of astrology, and of arithmetic, and of geometry, and of physic. All this may be interpreted by him that knows their characters and language. After he had given order for this building, they cut out vast columns and wonderful stones. They fetcht massy stones from the Æthiopians, and made with these the foundation of the three Pyramids, fastening them together with lead and iron. They built the gates of them forty cubits under ground, and they made the height of the Pyramids one hundred royal cubits,

 That which the Arabians commonly mean by telesmes are certain eigilla or amulets, made under such and such an aspect, or configuration of the stars and planets, with several characters accordingly inscribed.

† Alakavir, amongst other significations, is the name of a precious stone; and, therefore, in Abulfeda, it is joined with yacut, a ruby. I imagine it here to signify some magical spell which, it may be, was engraven on this stone. which are fifty of ours, in these times; he also made each sida of them an hundred royal cubits. The beginning of this building was in a fortunate horoscope. After that he had finished it, he covered it with colored sotin from the top to the bottom; and he appointed a solemn festival, et which were present all the inhabitants of his kingdom. Then ha built, in the western pyramid, thirty treasures, filled with store of riches and utensils, and with aignatures made of precious stones, and with instruments of iron, and vessels of earth, and with arms that rust not, and with glass which might be bended and yet not broken, and with several kinds of alakakirs, single and deable, and with deadly poisons, and with other things besides. He made also in the east Pyramid divers celestial spheres and stars, and what they severally operate in their aspects, and the perfomes which are to be used to them, and the books which treat of these matters. He also put in the colored Pyramid the commentaries of the Priests in chests of black murble, and with every Priest a book, in which were the wonders of his prefession, and of his actions, and of hie nature, and what was done in his time, and what is, and what shall be, from the beginning of time to the end of it. He placed in every Pyramid a treasurer. The treasurer of the westerly Pyramid was a statue of marble stone, standing upright with a lance, and upon his head a serpent, wreathed. He that came near it, and stood still, the serpent bit him of one side, and wreathing round about his threat and killing him, returned to his place. He made the treasurer of the east Pyramid, an idel of black agate, his eyes open and shining, sitting upon a throne with a lance : when any looked upen him, he heard of one side of him a voice, which took away his sense, so that he fell prestrate upon his face, and ceased not till he died. He made the treasurer of the colored Pyramid a statue of stone, called Albut, sitting : he which looked towards it was drawn by the statue, till he stuck to it, and could not he separated from it, till such time as he died. The Coptites write in their books, that there is an inscription eagraven upon them, the exposition of which, in Arabic, is this, I KING SAURIO built the Pyramids in such and such a time, and finished them in six years : he that comes after me, and says that he is equal to me, let him destroy them in six hundred years; and yet it is known, that it is easier to pluck down, than to build up : I also covered them, when I had finished them, with sattin; and let him cover them with matts. After that ALMAMON the Calif entered Ægypt, and saw the Pyramids, he desired to know what was within, and therefore would have them opened. They told him it could not possibly be done. He replied, I will have it certainly done. And that hole was opened for him, which stands open to this day, with fire and vinegar. Two smiths prepared and sharpened the iron and engines, which they forced in, and there was a great expense in the opening of it. The thickness of the walls was found to be twenty cubits; and when they came to the end of the wall, behind the place they had digged, there was an ewer of green emerald: in it were a thousand dinars very weighty, every dinar was an onnce of our ounces; they wondered at it, but knew not the meaning of it. Then ALMAMON said, Cast up the account how much hath been spent in making the entrance, they cast it up, and lo it was the same sum which they found ; it neither exceeded nor was defective. Within they found a square well, in the square of it there were doors, every door opened into a house, (or vault.) in which there were dead hodies wrapped up in linea. They found towards the top of the Pyramid, a chamber, in which there was a hollow stone : in it was a statue of stone like a man, and within it a man, upon whom was a breastplate of gold set with jewels ; upon his breast was a sword of invaluable price, and at his head a carbuncle of the bigness of an egg, shining like the light of the day; and upon him were characters written with a pen, no man knows what they signify. After ALMAMON had opened it, men entered into it for many years, and descended by the slippery passage which is in it; and some of them came out safe, and others died." "-Greaves's Pyramidographia.

en account of its wonderful properties as in a pussage of Thuanus, quoted by Stephanius in his Notes to Saxo-Grammaticus.

"Whilst the King was at Bologns, a stone, wonderful in its species and nature, was brought to him from the East Indies, by a man unknown, who appeared by his manners to he a Barbarian. It sparkled as though all burning with an incredible splendor: flashing radiance, and shooting on every side its beams, it filled the surrounding air to e great distance with a light scarcely by any eyes endurable. In this also it was wonderful, that being most impatient of the earth, if it was confined, it would force its way, and immediately fly aloft; neither could it be contained by sny art of man in a narrow place, but appeared only to love those of ample extent. It was of the utmost purity, stained by no sail nor spot. Certain shape it had none, for its figure was inconstant ond momentarily changing, and though at a distance it was beautiful to the eye, it would not suffer itself to be handled with impunity, but hurt those who obstinately struggled with it, as many persons before many spectators experienced. If by chance any part of it was broken off, for it was not very hard, it become nothing less. "*- Thuanus, lib. 8.

In the Mirror of Stones, Carbuncles are said to be male and female. The females throw out their brightness: the stars appear burning within the males.

Like many other jewels, the Carbuncle was supposed to be an animal substance, formed in the serpent. The scrpent's ingenious method of preserving it from the song of the charmer, is related in an after-note. Book 9.

Yet innocent it grew. - 31, p. 229.

Adam, says a Moorish author, after having eaten the forbidden fruit, sought to hide himself under the shade of the trees that form the bowers of Paradise: the Gold and Silver trees refused their shade to the father of the human race. God asked them why they did so? Because, replied the Trees, Adam has transgressed against your commandment. Ye have done well, answered the Creator; and that your fidelity may be rewarded, 'tis my decree that men shall hereafter become your slaves, and that in search of you they shall dig into the very bowels of the earth. — Chemier.

The black-lead of Borrodale is described as lying in the mine in the form of a tree; it hath a body or root, and veins or brunches fly from it in different directions: the root or body is the finest black-lead, and the branches at the extremities the worst the farther they fly. The veins or branches sometimes shoot out to the surface of the ground. — Hatchinson's Hist, of Cumberland.

They have founde by experience, that the vein of golde is a living tree, and that the same hy all waies that it spreadeth and springeth from the roote by the softe pores and passages of the earth, putteth forth branches, even unto the uppermost parts of the earth, and cesseth not until it discover itself unto the open aire ; at which time it sheweth for he certaine beautiful colours in the steede of floures, round stones of golden earth in the steede of fruites ; and thinne plates insteede of leaves. They say that the mote of the golden tree extendeth to the center of the earth, and there taketh norishment of increase: for the deeper that they dig, they finde the trunkes thereof to be so much the greater, as farre as they may followe it, for abundance of water springing in the mountains. Of the branches of this tree, they finde some as small as a thread, and others as bigge os a man's finger, according to the largeness or straightnesse of the riftes and cliftes. They have sometimes chanced upon whole caves, sustained and borne up as it were with golden pillers, and this in the waies by the which the branches ascende : the which being filled with the substance of the trunke creeping from heneath, the branche maketh itself waie by whiche it mare pass out. It is oftentimes divided, by encountring with some kinde of harde stone; yet is it in other cliftes nourished by the exhalations and virtue of the roote, - Pietro Martire.

Metals, says Herrera, (5, 3, 15,) are like plants hidden in the bowels of the earth, with their trunk and boughs, which ore the vains; for it appears in a certain manner, that like plants they go on grawing, not because they have any inward life, but because they are produced in the entrails of the earth by the virtue of the sun and of the planets; and so they go on increasing. And as metals are thus, as it were, plants hidden in the earth; so plants are animals lixed to one place, sustained by the aliment which Nature has provided for them at their birth: And to animals, as they have a more perfect being, a sense and knowledge hath been given, to go about and seek their oliment. So that barren earth is the support of metal, and fertile eorth of plants, and plants of animals: the less perfect serving the more perfect.

The fine gold nct-work, & c. - 31, p. 229.

A great number of stringy fibres seem to stretch out from the boughs of the Palm, on each side, which cross one another in such a manner, that they take out from hetween the boughs a sort of bark like close net-work, and this they spin out with the hand, and with it make cords of all sizes, which are mostly used in Egypt. They also make of it a sort of brush for clothes. — Powerke.

Crouch'd at this Nimrod's throne. - 32, p. 229.

Shedad was the first King of the Adites. I have ornamented his palace less profusely than the Oriental writers who describe it. In the notes to the Bahar Danush is the following account of its magnificence from the Tafat al Majalis.

A pleasant and elevated spot being fixed upon, Shuddand dispatched an hundred chiefs to collect skilful artists and workmen from all countries. He also commanded the monarchs of Syria and Ormus to send him all their jewels and precious stones. Forty camel-loads of gold, silver, and jewels, were daily used in the building, which contained a thousand spacious quadrangles of many thousand rooms. In the areas were artificial trees of gold and silver, whose leaves were emeralds, and fruit clusters of pearls and jewels. The ground was strowed with ambergris, musk, and saffron. Between every two of the artificial trees was planted one of delicious fruit. This romantic abode took up five hundred years in the completion. When finished, Shuddaud marched to view it; and, when arrived near, divided two hundred thousand youthful slaves, whom he had brought with him from Damascus, into four detachments, which were stationed in cantonments prepared for their reception on each side of the garden, towards which he proceeded with his favorite courtiers. Suddenly was heard in the sir a voice like thunder, and Shuddaud, looking up, heheld a personage of majestic figure and stern aspect, who said, "I am the Angel of Death, commis-sioned to seize thy impure soul." Shuddaud exclaimed, "Give me leisure to enter the garden," and was descending from his horse, when the seizer of life snatched away his impure spirit, and he fell dead upon the ground. At the samo time lightnings flashed, and destroyed the whole army of the infidel; and the rose-garden of Irim became concealed from the sight of man.

O Shedad! only in the hour of death .- 35, p. 229.

Lamai relates, that a great Monarch, whom he does not name, having creeted a superb Palace, wished to show it to every man of talents and taste in the city; he therefore invited them to a hanquet, and after the repast was finished, asked them if they knew any building more mignificent, and more perfect, in the architecture, in the ornaments, and in the furniture. All the guests contented themselves with expressing their admiration, and hynshing praise, except one, who led a retired and austere life, and was one of those persons whom the Arabians call Zakgd.

This man spoke very freely to the Prince, and said to hum, I find a great defect in this building ; it is, that the foundation is not good, nor the walls sufficiently strong, so that Azrael [•] Since this note was written, I have found in Feyjoo the hystory of this fable. It was invented as a riddle or allegory of fice, by a Freuch physician, called Ferrelio by the Spanish autor, and published by him in a Dialogue, De abditie rerum causies. From hence it was extracted, and sent as a trick to Mixaldo, another physician, who had written a credulous work, De Arcanis NATURE; and a copy of this letter came into the hands of Thumus. He discovered the deseption too har, for a second edition of ais history had been previously published at Frankfirt.

can enter on every side, and the Sarsar can easily pass through. And when they showed him the walls of the Palace ornamented with azure and gold, of which the marvellous workmanship surpassed in costliness the richness of the materials, he replied, There is still a great inconvenience here; it is, that we can never estimate these works well, till we are laid backwards. Signifying by these words, that we never understand these things rightly, till we are upon our death-hed, when we discover their vanity. — D'Herbelot.

There are several trees or shrubs of the genus Mimosa. One of these trees drops its branches whenever any person approaches it, seeming as if it saluted those who retire under 's shade. This mute hospitality has so endeared this tree to the Arabians, that the injuring or entting of it down is strictly prohibited. — N tebudr.

Let fall the drops of bitterness and death. - 52, p. 231.

The Angel of Death, say the Rabbis, holdeth his sword in his hand at the bed's head, having on the end thereof three drops of gall; the sick man spying this deadly Angel, openeth his mouth with fear, and then those drops fall in, of which one killeth him, the second maketh him pale, the third rotteth and purifieth. — Parchus. THE SECOND BOOK.

Sint licet expertes vite sensusque, capessant Jussa tamen superum venti. MAMBRUNI CONSTANTINUS.

Nor in the desert, Son of Hodeirah, Thou art abandon'd ! The co-existent fire, Which in the Dens of Darkness burnt for thee, Burns yet, and yet shall burn.

2.

In the Doudaniel caverns, Under the Roots of the Ocean, Met the Masters of the Spell. Before them in the vault, Blazing unfuell'd from its floor of rock, Ten magic flames arose. "Burn, mystic fires," Abdaldar cried;

"Burn while Hodeirah's dreaded race exist. This is the appointed hour,

The hour that shall secure these dens of night.

3.

"Dim they burn!" exclaim'd Lobaba; "Dim they burn, and now they waver! Okba lifts the arm of death; They waver,—they go out!"

4.

"Curse on his hasty hand!" Khawla exclaim'd in wrath, The woman-fiend exclaim'd;

"Curse on his hasty hand, the fool hath fail'd; Eight only are gone out."

A Teraph stood against the cavern side, A new-born infant's head, Which Khawla at its hour of birth had seized, And from the shoulders wrung. It stood upon a plate of gold, An unclean Spirit's name inscribed beneath. The cheeks were deathy dark, Dark the dead skin upon the hairless skull; The lips were bluey pale; Only the eyes had life; They gleam'd with demon light.

6.

"Tell me!" quoth Khawla, "is the Fire gone out That threats the Masters of the Spell?" The dead lips moved and spake, "The Fire still burns that threats The Masters of the Spell."

7.

" Curse on thee, Okba!" Khawla cried, As to the den the Sorcerer came; He bore the dagger in his hand, Red from the murder of Hodeirah's race.
" Behold those unextinguish'd flames! The Fire still burns that threats The Masters of the Spell! Okba, wert thou weak of heart? Okba, wert thou blind of eye ' Thy fate and ours were on the lot, And we believ'd the lying Stars, That said thy hand might seize the auspicious hour !

Curse thee, curse thee, Okba !"

8.

The Murderer, answering, said, "O versed in all enchanted lore, Thou better knowest Okba's soul! Eight blows I struck, eight home-driven blows; Needed no second stroke From this envenom'd blade. Ye frown at me as if the will had fail'd; As if ye did not know

BOOK II.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

My double danger from Hodeirah's race, The deeper hate I feel, The stronger motive that inspired my arm! Ye frown as if my hasty fault, My ill-directed blow, Had spared the enemy; And not the Stars, that would not give, And not your feeble spells, That could not force, the sign Which of the whole was he. Did ye not bid me strike them all? Said ye not root and branch should be destroy'd? I heard Hodeirah's dying groan, I heard his Children's shriek of death, And sought to consummate the work ; But o'er the two remaining lives A cloud unpierceable had risen, A cloud that mock'd my searching eyes. I would have probed it with a dagger-point; The dagger was repell'd: A Voice came forth, and said, Son of Perdition, cease! Thou canst not change What in the Book of Destiny is written.'"

9.

Khawla to the 'Teraph turn'd — "Tell me where the Prophet's hand Hides our destined enemy." The dead lips spake again — "I view the seas, I view the land, I search the Ocean and the Earth! Not on Ocean is the Boy, Not on Earth his steps are seen."

10.

"A mightier power than we," Lobaba cried, "Protects our destined foe. Look! look! one Fire burns dim! It quivers! it goes out!"

11.

It quiver'd; it was quench'd. One Flame alone was left, A pale blue Flame that trembled on the floor, A hovering light, upon whose shrinking edge The darkness seem'd to press. Stronger it grew, and spread Its lucid swell around, Extending now where all the ten had stood, With lustre more than all.

12.

At that portentous sight, The Children of Evil trembled, And terror smote their souls. Over the den the Fire Its fearful splendor cast, The broad base rolling up in wavy streams, Bright as the summer lightning when it spreads Its glory o'er the midnight heaven. The Teraph's eyes were dimm'd, Which, like two twinkling stars, Shone in the darkness late. 'The Sorcerers on each other gazed, And every face, all pa'e with fear, And ghastly, in that light was seen, Like a dead man's, by the sepulchral lamp.

13.

Even Khawla, fiercest of the enchanter brood, Not without effort drew Her fear-suspended breath. Anon a deeper rage Inflamed her reddening eye. "Mighty is thy power, Mahommed !" Loud in blasphemy she cried; "Bnt Eblis would not stoop to Man, When Man, fair-statured as the stately palm, From his Creator's hand Was undefiled and pure. Thou art mighty, O Son of Abdallah ! But who is he of woman born That shall vie with the might of Eblis? That shall rival the Prince of the Morning?"

14.

She said, and raised her skinny hand As in defiance to high Heaven, And stretch'd her long, lean finger lorth, And spake alond the words of power. The Spirits heard her call, And lo! before her stands Her Demon Minister. "Spirit!" the Enchantress cried, "Where lives the Boy, coeval with whose life Yon magic Fire must burn?"

15

DEMON. Mistress of the mighty Spell, Not on Ocean, not on Earth; Only eyes that view Allah's glory-throne, See his hiding-place. From some believing Spirit, ask and learn.

16.

"Bring the dead Hodeirah here," Khawla cried, "and he shall tell!" The Demon heard her bidding, and was gone. A moment pass'd, and at her feet Hodeirah's corpse was laid; His hand still held the sword he grasp'd in death, The blood not yet had clotted on his wound.

17.

The Sorceress look'd, and, with a smile That kindled to more fiendishness Her hideous features, cried, "Where art thou, Hodeirah, now? Is thy soul in Zemzem-well? Is it in the Eden groves? Waits it for the judgment-blast In the trump of Israfil? Is it, plumed with silver wings, Underneath the throne of God? Even though beneath His throne, Hodeirah, thou shalt hear, Thou shalt obey my voice!''

18.

She said, and mutter'd charms which Hell in fear And Heaven in horror heard. Soon the stiff eye-balls roll'd, The muscles with convulsive motion shook, The white lips quiver'd. Khawla saw; her soul Exulted, and she cried, "Prophet! behold my power' Not even death secures Thy slaves from Khawla's spell' Where, Hodeirah, is thy child?"

19.

Hodeirah groan'd and closed his eyes, As if in the night and the blindness of death He would have hid himself.

20.

"Speak to my question "" she exclaim'd, "Or in that mangled body thou shalt live Ages of torture . answer me! Where can we find the boy ?"

21.

"God! God!" Hodeirah cried, "Release me from this life, From this intolerable agony!"

22.

"Speak!" cried the Sorceress, and she snatch'd A Viper from the floor, And with the living reptile lash'd his neck. Wreathed round him with the blow, The reptile tighter drew her folds, And raised her wrathful head, And fix'd into his face Her deadly teeth, and shed Poison in every wound. In vain! for Allah heard Hodeirah's prayer, And Khawla on a corpse Had wreak'd her bafiled rage. The fated Fire moved on, And round the Body wrapt its funeral flames, The flesh and bones in that portentous pile Consumed; the Sword alone, Circled with fire, was left.

23.

Where is the Boy for whose hand it is destined? Where the Destroyer who one day shall wield The Sword that is circled with fire? Race accursed, try your charms! Masters of the mighty Spell, Mutter o'er your words of power! Ye can shatter the dwellings of man; Ye can open the womb of the rock; Ye can shake the foundations of earth, But not the Word of God: But not one letter ean ye change Of what his Will hath written!

24.

Who shall seek through Araby Hodeirah's dreaded son? They mingle the Arrows of Chance, The lot of Abdaldar is drawn. Thirteen moons must wax and wane Ere the Sorcerer quit his quest. He nust visit every tribe That roam the desert wilderness, Or dwell beside perennial streams; Nor leave a solitary tent unsearch'd, Till he hath found the Boy, — The dreaded Boy, whose blood alone

Can quench that fated Fire.

25.

A crystal ring Abdaldar wore, The powerful gem condensed Primeval dews, that upon Caucasus Felt the first winter's frost. Ripening there it lay beneath Rock above rock, and mountain ice up-piled On mountain, till the incumbent mass assumed, So huge its bulk, the Ocean's azure hue.

26. ,

With this he sought the inner den, Where burnt the Eternal Fire. Like waters gushing from some channell'd rock, Full through a narrow opening, from a chasm The Eternal Fire stream'd up. No eye beheld the spring Of that up-flowing Flame, Which blazed self-nurtured, and forever, there. It was no mortal element; the Abyss Supplied it, from the fountains at the first Prepared. In the heart of earth it lives and glows Her vital heat, till, at the day decreed, The voice of God shall let its billows loose, To deluge o'er with no abating flood Our consummated World: Which must from that day in infinity Through endless ages roll, A penal orb of Fire.

Unturban'd and unsandal'd there, Abdaldar stood before the Flame, And held the Ring beside, and spake The langnage that the Elements obey. The obedient Flame detach'd a portion forth, Which, in the crystal entering, was condensed, Gem of the gem, its living Eye of fire. When the hand that wears the spell Shall touch the destined Boy, Then shall that Eye be quench'd, And the freed Element Fly to its sacred and remember'd Spring.

28.

Now go thy way, Abdaldar ! Servant of Eblis, Over Arabia Seek the Destroyer ! Over the sands of the scorching Tehama, Over the waterless mountains of Naÿd; In Arud pursue him, and Yemen the happy, And Hejaz, the country beloved by believers, Over Arabia, BOOK II.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Servant of Eblis, Seek the Destroyer !

29.

From tribe to tribe, from town to town, From tent to tent, Abdaldar pass'd. Him every morn the all-beholding Eye Saw from his couch, unhallow'd by a prayer, Rise to the scent of blood; And every night lie down, That rankling hope within him, that by day Goaded his steps, still stinging him in sleep, And startling him with vain accomplishment From visions still the same. Many a time his wary hand To many a youth applied the Ring; And still the imprison'd Fire Within its crystal socket lay compress'd, Impatient to be free.

30.

At length to the cords of a tent, That were stretch'd by an Island of Palms, In the desolate sea of the sands, The seemly traveller came. Under a shapely palm, Herself as shapely, there a Damsel stood; She held her ready robe, And look'd towards a Boy, Who from the tree above, With one hand clinging to its trunk, Cast with the other down the cluster'd dates.

31

The Magician approach'd the Tree; He lean'd on his staff, like a way-faring man, And the sweat of his travel was seen on his brow. He ask'd for food, and lo! The Damsel proffers him her lap of dates; And the Stripling descends, and runs to the tent, And brings him forth water, the draught of delight.

32.

Anon the Master of the tent, The Father of the family, Came forth, a man in years, of aspect mild. To the stranger approaching he gave The friendly saluting of peace, And bade the skin be spread. Before the tent they spread the skin, Under a Tamarind's shade, That, bending forward, stretch'd Its boughs of beauty far.

33.

They brought the Traveller rice, With no false colors tinged to tempt the eye, But white as the new-fallen snow, When never yet the sullying Sun Hath seen its purity, Nor the warm zephyr touch'd and tainted it. The dates of the grove before their guest They laid, and the luscious fig, And water from the well.

34.

The Damsel from the Tamarind-tree Had pluck'd its acid fruit, And steep'd it in water long; And whoso drank of the cooling draught, He would not wish for wine. This to their guest the Damsel brought, And a modest pleasure kindled her check, When, raising from the cup his moisten'd lips, The stranger smilled, and praised, and drank again 35.

Whither is gone the Boy? He had pierced the Melon's pulp, And closed with wax the wound; And he had duly gone at morn, And watch'd its ripening rind, And now all joyfully he brings The treasure now matured; His dark eyes sparkling with a boy's delight, As out he pours its liquid lusciousness, And proffers to the guest.

36.

Abdaldar ate, and he was satisfied : And now his tongue discoursed Of regions far remote, As one whose busy feet had travell'd long The Father of the family, With a calm eye and quiet smile, Sate pleased to hearken him. The Damsel who removed the meal, She loiter'd on the way, And listen'd, with full hands, A moment motionless.

37.

All eagerly the Boy Watches the Traveller's lips; And still the wily man, With seemly kindness, to the eager Boy Directs his winning tale. Ah, cursed one! if this be he, If thou hast found the object of thy search, Thy hate, thy bloody aim, -Into what deep damnation wilt thou plunge Thy miserable soul!-

38.

Look ' how his eye delighted watches thine '-Look ! how his open lips Gape at the winning tale !-And nearer now he comes, To lose no word of that delightful talk. Then, as in familiar mood, Upon the stripling's arm The Sorcerer laid his hand, And the Fire of the Crystal fled.

39.

While the sudden shoot of joy Made pale Abdaldar's cheek, The Master's voice was heard— "It is the hour of prayer : My children, let us purify ourselves,

NOTES TO THALABA THE DESTROYER.

And praise the Lord our God!" The Boy the water brought : After the law they purified themselves, And bent their faces to the earth in prayer; 40.

All, save Abdaldar; over Thalaba He stands, and lifts the dagger to destroy. Before his lifted arm received Its impulse to descend, The Blast of the Desert came. Prostrate in prayer, the pious family Felt not the Simoon pass. They rose, and lo! the Sorcerer lying dead, Holding the dagger in his blasted hand.

A Teraph stood against the cavern side. - 5, p. 236.

The manner how the Teraphim were made is fondly conceited thus emong the Rabhies. They killed a man that was a first-horn son, and wrong off his head, and seasoned it with salt and spices, and wrote upon a plate of gold the name of an unclean spirit, and put it under the head upon a wall, and lighted candles before it, and worshipped it. — Godwyn's Masse and Anron.

By Rabbi Eleazar, it is said to be the head of a child.

Eblis. - 13, p. 237.

The Devil, whom Mahommed names Ehlis, from his despair, was once one of those angels who are nearest to God's presence, called Azazil; and fell (according to the doctrine of the Koran) for refusing to pay homage to Adam at the command of God. $\rightarrow Sale$.

God created the body of Adam of Salzal, that is, of dry but unbaked clay; and left it forty nights, or, according to others, forty years, lying without a soul; and the Devil came to it, and kicked it, and it sounded. And God hreathed into it a soul with his breath, sending it in at the cyes; and he himself saw his nose still dead clay, and the soul running through him, it ill it reached his feet, when he stood upright.—Maracci.

In the Nuremburg Chronicle is a print of the creation of Adam; the hedy is half made, growing out of a heap of clay under the Creator's hands. A still more absurd print represents Eve half way out of his aide.

The fullest Mahommedan Genesis is to be found in Rabadan the Morisco's Poem.

God, designing to make known to his whole choir of Angels, high and low, his scheme concerning the Creation, called the Archangel Gabriel, and delivering to him a pen and paper, commanded him to draw out an instrument of fealty and homage; in which, as God had dictated to his Secretary Gabriel, were specified the pleasures and delights he orderined to his creatures in this world; the term of years he would allot them; and how, and in what exercises, their time in this life was to he employed. This being done, Gabriel said, Lord, what more must I write? The pen resisteth, and refuseth to he guided forwards ! God then took the deed, and, before he folded it, signed it with his sacred hand, and affixed thereunto his royal signet, as an indication of his incontestable and irrevocable promise and covenant. Then Gabriel was commanded to convey what he had written throughout the hosts of Angels ; with orders that they all, without exception, should fall down and worship the same : and it was so abundantly replenished with glory, that the angelical potentates universally reverenced and paid homage thereunto. Gabriel, returning, said, O Lord ! I have obeyed thy commands; what else am I to do? God replied, Close up the writing in this crystal; for this is the inviolable covenant of the fealty the mortals I will hereafter create shall pay unto me, and by the which they shall acknowledge me. El Hassan tells us, that no sconer had the blessed Angel closed the said crystal, but so terrible and astonishing a voice issued out thereof, and it cast so unusual and glorious a light, that, with the surprise of so great and unexpected a mystery, the Angel remained fixed and immovable; and although he had a most ardent desire to be let into tha secret arcana of that wonderful prodigy, yet all his innate courage and heavenly magnanimity were not sufficient to furnish him with ossurance, or power, to make the inquiry.

All being now completed, and put in order, God said to his Angels, "Which of you will descend to the Earth, and bring me up a handful thereof?" When immediately such infinite numbers of celestial spirits departed, that the universal surface was covered with them ; where, consulting among themselves, they unanimously confirmed their loathing and abhorrence to touch it, saying, How dare we be so presumptuous as to expose, before the throne of the Lord, so glorious and sovereign as ours is, a thing so filthy, and of a form and composition so vile and despicable ! and in effect, they all returned, fully determined not to meddle with it. After these went others, and then more ; but not one of them, either first or last, dared to defile the purity of their hands with it. Upon which Azaracl, an Angel of an extraordinary stature, flew down, and, from the four corners of the Earth, brought up a handful of it which God had commanded. From the south and the north, from the west and from the east, took he it; of all which four different qualities, human bodies are composed.

The Almighty, perceiving in what manner Azaraci had signalized himself in this affair, beyond the rest of the Angels, and taking particular notice of his goodly form and stature, said to him, ⁶⁴ O Azaraci, it is my pleasure to constitute thee to be Death itself; thou shalt be him who separate th the souls from the hodies of those creatures I om about to make; thou hencefurth shalt be called Azarael Malee d Mout, or Azaraci, the Angel of Death.⁷⁹

Then God caused the Earth, which Azarael had hrought, to be washed and purified in the fountains of Hearen; and El Hassan tells us, that it became so resplendently clear, that it cast a more shuning ond beautiful light than the Sun in its utmost glory. Gabriel was then commanded to convey this lovely, though as yet inanimate, lump of clay, throughout the Heavens, the Earth, the Centres, and the Seas; to the intent, and with a positive injunction, that whatsoever had life might behold it, and pay honor and reverence thereauto.

When the Angels saw all these incomprehensible mysteries, and that so beautiful an image, they said, " Lord ! if it will be pleasing in thy sight, we will, in thy most high and mighty name, prostrate ourselves before it : " To which voluntary proposal, God replied; I am content you pay adoration to it; and I command you so to do :- when instantly they all bowed, inclining their shining celestial countenances at his feet ; only Eblis detained himself, obstinately refusing ; proudly and arrogantly valuing himself upon his heavenly compo-sition. To whom God sternly said, "Prostrate thyself to Adam." He made a show of so doing, but remained only upon his knees, and then rose up, before he had performed what God had commanded him. When the Angels helield his insolence and disobedience, they a second time prostrated themselves, to complete what the haughty and presumptuous Angel had left undone. From hence it is, that in all our prayers, at each inclination of the body, we make two pros trations, one immediately after the other. God being highly incensed against the rebellious Ehlis, said unto him, " Why didst thou not reverence this statue which I have made, us the other Angels all have done?" To which Eblis replied, "I will never lessen or disparage my grandeur so much, as to humble myself to a piece of clay; I, who am an immortal Scraphim, of so apparently a greater excellency than that; I, whom thou didst create out of the celestial fire, what an indignity would it be to my splendor, to pay homage to a thing composed of so vile a metal !" The irritated Monarch, with a voice of thunder, then pronounced against him this direful anothema and malediction : Begone, enemy ; depart, Rebel, from my abode! Thou no longer shalt continue in my celestial dominions. - Go, thou accursed flaming thunderbolt of fire ! My curse pursue thee ! My condemnation overtake thee! My torments afflict thee! And my chastisement accompany thee !- Thus fell this enemy of God and mankind, both he, and all his followers and abettors, who sided or were partakers with him io his pride and presumptuous disobedience-

God new was pleased to publish and make manifest his design of animating Man, out of that beautiful and respleadent crystal; and accordingly commanded Gabriel to breathe into the body of clay, that it might become flesh and blood ; Bot at the instant, as the immaculate Spirit was going to enter therein, it returned, and humbling itself before the Lord, said, O Merciful King ! for what reason is it that thon intendest to enclose ma in this loathsome prison? 1, who am thy servant, thou shottest up within mine enemy, where my parity will be defiled, and where, against my will, I shall disobey thee, without being able to resist the instigation and power of this rebellious flesh ; whereby I shall become liable to soffer thy rigorous punishment, insupportable and unequal to my strength, for having perpetrated the enormities obnoxious to the frailty of human flesh : Spare me, O Lord : spare ma! suffer me not to taste of this bitter draught! To thee it belongs to command, and to me to supplicate thee.

Thus spoke the pure and unspotted Spirit, when God, to give it some satisfaction to these complaints, and that it might contentedly resign itself to obey his commands, ordered it aheald be conducted near his throne, where, io innumerable and infinite parts thereof, it beheld certain letters deciphered up and down, importing, Mahomet the triumphat leader ! And over all the seven heavens, on their gates, and io all their books, he saw those words stamped, exceedingly bright and resplendent. This was the blazon which all the Angels and other celestial beings carried between their beautifol eyes, and for their devices on their apparel.

The Spirit, having seen all this, returned to the throne of glory, and being very desirous to understand the signification of those ciphers and characters, he asked, What name was that which shined so in every place? To which question God answered, Knew, that from thee, and from that fiesh, shall proceed a chieftain, a leader, who shall bear that name, and use that language; by whom, and for whose sake, I the Lord, the heavens, the earths, and the seas, shall be honored, as shall likewise all who believe in that name.

The Spirit, hearing these wooders, immediately conceived so mighty a love to the body, a love not to be expressed, nor even imagined, that it longed with impatience to enter into it ; which it bad no sconer done, but it miracalously and artificially was influenced and distilled into every individual part and member thereof, wherehy the body became animated. — Rabadan.

It is to be regretted, that the original of this very curious peem has not been published, and that it did not meet with a more respectable translator. How well would the eradition of Sale have been employed in elucidating it !

Where art thou, Hodeirah, now ? - 17, p. 237

These lines contain the various epinions of the Mahammedans respecting the intermediate state of the Blessed, till the Day of Judgment.

Is thy soul in Zemzem-well ? - 17, p. 237.

Hagar, being near her time, and not able any longer to endure the ill-treatment she received from Sara, resolved to run away. Ahraham, coming th hear of her discontent, and fearing she might make away with the child, especially if she came to be delivered without the assistance of some other women, followed her, and found her already delivered of a son ; who, dancing with his little feet upon the ground, had made way for a spring to break forth. But the water of the spring came forth in such abundance, as also with such violence, that Hagar could make no use of it to quench her thirst, which was then very great. Abraham, coming to the place, commanded the spring to glide more gently, and to suffer that water might he drawn out of it to drink ; and having thereupon stayed the course of it with a little bank of sand, ha took of it, to make Hagar and her child drink. The said spring is to this day called Semsem, from Abraham making use of that word to stay it. - Olearius.

And with the living reptile lush'd his neck. - 22, p. 238.

Excepting in this line, I have avoided all resemblance to the powerful poetry of Lucan.

Aspicit astantem projecti corporis umbram, Exanimes artus, invisaque claustra timentem Carceris antiqui; pavet ire in pectus apertum, Visceraque, et ruptas letali vulnere fibras. Percussæ gelido trepidant sub pectore fibræ ; Et nova desuetis subrepens vita modullis, Miscetur morti : tunc omnis palpitat artus ; Tenduntur nervi; nec se tellure cadaver Paulutim per membra levat, terraque repulsam est, Erectumque simul. Distento lumina rictu Nudantur. Nondum facies viventis in illo, Jam morientis erut ; remanct pallorque rigorque, Et stupet illatus mundo. LUCAN.

A curious instance of French taste occurs in this part of Brebenf's translation. The re-animated corpse is made the corpse of Burrhos, of whose wife, Octavia, Sextus is enamored. Octavia hears that her hushand has fallen in battle; ahe seeks his body, but in vaio. A light at length leads her to the scene of Erichtho's incantations, and she beholds Burrhus; to all appearance, living. The witch humanely allows them time for a long conversation, which is very complimentary on the part of the hushand.

Brehenf was a man uf genius. The Phursalia is as weltuld in his version as it can be in the detestable French heroir couplet, which epigrammatizes every thing. Ile had courage enough, though a Frenchman, to admire Lucan, — and yet could not translate him without iotroducing a love-story.

They mingle the Arrows of Chance. - 24, p. 238.

This was one of the auperstitions of the Pagan Arabs for bidden by Mahommed.

The mode of divining by arrows was seen by Pietro Dells Valle at Aleppo. The Mahommedan coojater made two persons sit down, one faciog the other, and gave each of them four arrows, which they were to hold perpendicularly, the point toward the ground. After questioning them concerning the business of which they wished to be informed, he mut tered his invocations; and the eight arrows, by virtue of these charms, altered their posture, and placed themselves point to point. Whether those on the left, or those on the right, were above the others, decided the question

The powerful gem, &c. - 25, p. 238.

Some imagine that the crystal is snow turned to ice, which has been hardening thirty years, and is turned to a rock by age. — Morror of Stones, by Camillus Teonardus, physician of Pisuro, dedicated to Casar Borgia.

In the cabinet of the Prince of Monaco, among other rarities, are two pieces of crystal, each larger than both hands clinched together. In the middle of one is about a glass-full of water, and in the other is some moss, naturally enclosed there when the crystals congealed. These pieces are very corious. — Tavernier.

Crystal, precious stones, every stone that has a regular figure, and even flints in small masses, and consisting of concentric coats, whether found in the perpendicular fissures of rocks, or elsewhere, are only exudations, or the concreting juices of flint in large masses; they are, therefore, new and spurious productions, the genuine stalactites of flint or of granite. — Buffon.

Gem of the gem, &c. - 27, p. 238.

Burguillos, er Lope de Vega, makes an odd metapher from such an illustration :

Es Verbo de Dios diamante En el anillo de cobre De nuestro circulo pobre.

Before the tent they spread the skin. - 32, p. 239.

With the Arabs either a round skin is laid on the ground for a small company, or large, coarse woollen cloths for a great number, spread all over the room, and ahout ten dishes repeated six or seven times over, laid round at a great feast, and whole sheep and lambs boiled and roasted in the middle. When one company has done, another sits round, even to the meanest, till all is consumed. And an Arah Frince will often dine in the street before his door, and call to all that pass, even beggars, in the usual expression, Bismillah, that is, in the name of God ; who come and sit down, and when they have done, give their Hamdellilah, that is, God be praised ; for the Arabs, who are great levellers, put every body on a footing with them, and it is by such generosity and hospitality that they maintain their interest. — Pococke.

With no false colors, &cc. - 33, p. 239.

²Tis the custom of Persia to hegin their feasts with fruits and preserves. We spent two hours in eating only those and trinking beer, hydromel, and aquavite. Then was brought ap the meat in great silver dishes; they were full of rice of divers colors, and upon that, several sorts of meat, boiled and roasted, as beef, mutton, tame fowl, wild ducks, fish, and ther things, all very well ordered, and very delicate.

The Persians use no knives at table, but the cooks send up the meat ready cut up into little bits, so that it was no trouble to us to accustom ourselves to their manner of cating. Rice serves them instead of bread. They take a monthful of it, with the two fore-fingers and the thumh, and so put it into their mouths. Every table had a carver, whom they call Suffretzi, who takes the meat brought up in the great dishes, to put it into lesser ones, which he fills with three or four aorts of meat, so as that every dish may serve two, or at most three persons. There was but little drank till towards the end of the repast, and then the cups went about roundly, and the dinner was concluded with a vessel of porcelane, full of a hot, blackish kind of drink, which they call Kahawa, (Caffee.) — Ambassador's Travels.

They haid upon the floor of the Amhassador's room a fine silk cluth, on which there were set one and thirty dishes of silver, filled with several sorts of conserves, dry and liquid, and raw fruits, as Melons, Citrons, Quinces, Pears, and some others not known in Europe. Some time after, that cloth was taken away, that another might be laid in the room of it, and upon this was set rice of all sorts of colors, and all sorts of meat, boiled and roasted, in above fifty dishes of the same metal. — Ambassador's Travels.

There is not any thing more ordinary in Persia than rice soaked in water; they call it Plau, and eat of it at all their meals, and serve it up in all their dishes. They sometimes put thereto a little of the jnice of pomegranates, or cherries and saffron, insomuch that commonly you have rice of several colors in the same dish.— Ambassador's Travels.

And manage arank of the cooling draught. - 34, p. 239.

The Tomarind is equally useful and agreeable; it has a pulp of a vincus taste, of which a wholesome, refreshing liquor is prepared; its shade shelters houses from the torrid heat of the sun, and its fine figure greatly adorns the accurry of the country. -Niebuhr.

He had pierced the Melon's pulp, --- 35, p. 239.

'Of pumpkins and melons, several sorts grow naturally in the woods, and serve for feeding camels. But the proper melons are planted in the fields, where a grent variety of them is to be found, and in such abundance, that the Arabians of all ranks use them, for some part of the year, as their principal article of food. They afford a very agreeable liquor. When its fruit is nearly ripe, a hole is pierced into the pulp; this hole is then stopped with wax, and the melon left upon tha stalk. Within a few days the pulp is, in consequence of this process, converted into a delicious liquor. — Niebuhr.

And listened, with full hunds. - 36, p. 239.

It is the hour of prayer. - 39, p. 239.

The Arabians divide their day into twenty-four hours, and reckon them from one setting sun to another. As very few among them know what a watch is, and as they conceive but imperfectly the duration of an hour, they usually determina time almost as when we say, it happened about noon, about evening, &c. The moment when the sun disappears is called Maggrib; about two hours afterwards they call it El ascha; two hours later, El Marfa ; midnight, Nus el lejl ; the dawn of morning, El fedsjer ; sunrise, Es subhh. They eat about nine in the morning, and that meal is called El ghadda ; noon, Ed duhhr ; three hours after noon, El asr. Of all these divisions of time, only noon and midnight are well ascertained ; they both fall upon the twelfth hour. The others are earlier or later as the days are short or long. The five hours appointed for prayer are Maggrib, Nus el lejl, El fedsjer, Duhhr, and El asr. - Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie.

The Turks say, in allusion to their canonical hours, that prayer is a tree which produces five sorts of fruit, two of which the sun sees, and three of which he never sees. — Pictro della Falle.

After the law they purified themselves. - 39, p. 240.

The use of the bath was forbidden the Moriscocs in Spain, as being an anti-Christian custom! I recollect no superstition but the Romish in which mastiness is accounted a virtue; "as if_j " says Jortin, "piety and filth were synonymous, and religion, like the itch, could be caught by wearing foul clothes."

Felt not the Simoom pass. - 40, p. 240.

The effects of the Simoom are instant suffocation to every living creature that happens to he within the sphere of its activity, and immediate patrefaction of the carcasses of the dead. The Arabians discern its approach by an unusual redness in the air, and they say that they feel a smell of sulphur as it passes. The only means by which any person can preserve himself from suffering by these novious blasts, is by throwing himself down with his face upon the earth, till this whirlwind of poisonous exhalations has blown over, which always moves at a certain height in the atmosphere. Instinct even teaches the brutes to incline their heads to the ground on these occasions. — Niebukr.

The Arabs of the desert call these winds Scmoum, or poison, and the Turks Shamyela, or wind of Syria, from which is formed the Samiel.

Their heat is sometimes so excessive, that it is difficult to form any idea of its violence without having experienced it; but it may be compared to the heat of a large oven at the moment of drawing out the bread. When these winds begin to blow, the atmosphere assumes an alarming aspect. The sky, at other times so clear in this climate, becomes dark and heavy; the sun loses his splendor, and appears of a violet color. The air is not cloudy, but gray and thick, and is in fact filled with an extremely subtile dust, which penetrates every where. This wind, always light and rapid, is not at first remarkably hot, but it increases in heat in proportion as it continues. All animated bodies soon discover it, by that change it produces in them. The lungs, which a too rarefied air no longer expands, are contracted, and become painful. Respiration is short and difficult, the skin parched and dry, and the hody consumed by an internal heat. In vain is recourse had to large draughts of water ; nothing can restore perspiration. In vain is coolness sought for; all bodies in which it is usual to find it, deceive the hand that touches them. Marble, iron, water, notwithstanding tha sun no lunger appears, are hot. The streets are deserted, and the dead silence of night reigns every where. The inhabitants of houses and villages shut themselves up in their houses, and those of the desert in their tents, or in pits they dig in the earth, where they wait the termioation of this destructive heat. It usually lasts three days ; but if it exceeds that time, it becomes insupportable. Woe to the traveller whom this wind surprises remote from shelter! he must suffer all its dreadful consequences, which sometimes are mortal. The danger is most imminent when it blows in squalls, for then the rapidity of the wind increases the heat to such a degree as to cause sudden death. This death is a real sufficiation ; the lungs, being empty, are convulsed, the circulation disordered, and the whole mass of blood driven by the heart towards the head and breast ; whence that hamorrhage at the nose and mouth which happens after death. This wind is especially fatal to persons of a pletboric habit, and those in whum fatigue has destroyed the tone of the muscles and the vessels. The corpse remaios a long time warm, swells, turns blue, and is easily separated ; all which are signs of that putrid fermentation which takes place in animal bodies when the humors become stagnant. These accidents are to be avoided by stopping the nose and mouth with handkerchiefs; an efficacious method likewise is that practised by the camels, who bury their noses in the sand, and keep them there till the squall is over.

Another quality of this wind is its extreme andity; which is such, that water sprinkled on the floor evaporates in a few minutes. By this extreme dryness, it withers and strips all the plants; and by exhaling too suddenly the emanations from animal bodies, crisps the skin, closes the pores, and causes that feverish heat which is the invariable effect of suppressed perspiration. — Volkey.

MOALLAKAT. Poem of Tarafa.

1.

THALABA.

ONEIZA

O yes — yes ! A wicked man! whate'er is his must needs Be wicked too '

THALABA

But see, — the sparkling stone ' How it hath caught the glory of the Sun, And shoots it back again in lines of light!

ONEIZA.

Why do you take it from him, Thalaba? — And look at it so close? — it may have charms To blind, or poison; — throw it in the grave! I would not touch it?

> THALABA. And around its rim Strange letters —

ONEIZA. Bury it---oh! bury it!

THALABA.

It is not written as the Koran is : Some other tongue perchance ; — the accursed man Said he had been a traveller.

> MOATH, (coming from the tent.) Thalaba, What hast thou there?

> > THALABA.

A ring the dead man wore; Perhaps, my father, you can read its meaning.

MOATH.

No, Boy ;- the letters are not such as ours. Heap the sand over it! a wicked man Wears nothing holy

THALABA.

Nay ! not bury it ! It may be that some traveller, who shall enter Our tent, may read it ; or if we approach Cities where strangers dwell and learned men, They may interpret

MOATH.

It were better hid Under the desert sands. This wretched man, Whom God hath smitten in the very purpose And impulse of his unpermitted crime, Belike was some magician, and these lines Are of the language that the Demons use.

ONEIZA.

Bury it! bury it, dear Thalaba '

MOATH.

Such cursed men there are upon the earth, In league and treaty with the Evil powers, The covenanted enemies of God And of all good; dear purchase have they made Of rule and riches, and their life-long sway, Masters, yet slaves of Hell. Beneath the roots Of Occan, the Domdaniel caverns lie, Their impious meeting; there they learn the words

Unitterable by man who holds his hope Of heaven; there brood the pestilence, and let

The earthquake loose.

THALABA.

And he who would have kill'd me Was one of these '

MOATH.

I know not; -- but it may be That on the Table of Destiny, thy name Is written their Destroyer, and for this Thy life by yonder miserable man So sought; so saved by interfering Heaven.

THALABA.

His ring has some strange power then ?

MOATH.

Every gem,

So sages say, hath virtue; but the science, Of difficult attainment; some grow pale, Conscions of poison, or with sudden change Of darkness, warn the wearer; some preserve From spells, or blunt the hostile weapon's edge; Some open rocks and mountains, and lay bare Their buried treasures: others make the sight Strong to perceive the presence of those Beings Throngh whose pure essence, as through empty air,

The unaided eye would pass; And in yon stone I deem Some such mysterious quality resides.

THALABA.

My father, I will wear it

MOATH.

Thalaba '

THALABA.

In God's name, and the Prophets! be its power Good, let it serve the righteous; if for evil, God, and my trust in Him, shall hallow it.

2.

So Thalaba drew on . The written ring of gold. Then in the hollow grave They laid Abdaldar's corpse, And levell'd over him the desert dust.

3.

The Sun arose, ascending from beneath The horizon's circling line. As Thalaba to his ablutions went, Lo! the grave open, and the corpse exposed ! It was not that the winds of night Had swept away the sands which cover'd it; For heavy with the undried dew The desert dust lay dark and close around; And the night air had been so calm and still, It had not from the grove Shaken a ripe date down.

Amazed to hear the tale, Forth from the tent came Moath and his child. Awhile he stood contemplating the corpse Silent and thoughtfully; Then turning, spake to Thalaba, and said, "I have heard that there are places by the abode Of holy men, so holily possess'd, That should a corpse be laid irreverently Within their precincts, the insulted ground, Impatient of pollution, heaves and shakes The abomination out. Have then in elder times the happy feet

Have then in elder times the happy feet Of Patriarch, or of Prophet bless'd the place, Ishmael, or Houd, or Saleah, or, than all, Mahommed, holier name? Or is the man So foul with magic and all blasphemy, That Earth, like Heaven, rejects him? It is best Forsake the station. Let us strike our tent. The place is tainted — and behold The Vulture hovers yonder, and his scream Chides us that still we scare him from the prey. So let the accursed one, Torn by that beak obscene, Find fitting sepulchre."

Then from the pollution of death With water they made themselves pure ; And Thalaba drew up The fastening of the cords; And Moath furl'd the tent; And rom the grove of palms Oneiza led The Camels, ready to receive their load.

6.

The dews had ceased to steam Toward the climbing sun, When from the 1sle of Palms they went their way, And when the Sun had reach'd his southern height, As back they turn'd their eyes, The distant Palms arose Like to the top-sails of some fleet far-off Distinctly seen, where else The Ocean bounds had blended with the sky ! And when the eve came on, The sight returning reach'd the grove no more. They planted the pole of their tent,

And they laid them down to repose.

7.

At midnight Thalaba started up, For he felt that the ring on his finger was move He call'd on Allah alond, And he call'd on the Prophet's name. Moath arose in alarm ; "What ails thee, Thalaba?" he cried ; "Is the robber of night at hand?" "Dost thou not see," the youth exclaim'd, "A Spirit in the tent?" Moath look'd round and said, "The moon-heam shines in the tent; I see thee stand in the light, And thy shadow is black on the ground."

-8

Thalaba answer'd not. "Spirit!" he cried, "what brings thee here In the name of the Prophet, speak. In the name of Allah, obey'

He ceased, and there was silence in the ten⁴ "Dost thou not hear?" quoth Thalaba; The listening man replied, "I hear the wind, that flaps The curtain of the tent."

BOOK III.

10.

"The Ring! the Ring!" the youth exclaim'd. "For that the Spirit of Evil comes; By that 1 see, by that 1 hear. In the name of God, 1 ask thee, Who was he that slew my Father?"

DEMON.

Master of the powerful Ring ! Okba, the dread Magician, did the deed.

THALABA. Where does the Murderer dwell?

DEMON. In the Domdaniel caverns, Under the Roots of the Ocean.

THALABA. Why were my Father and my Brethren slain?

DEMON.

We knew from the race of Hodeirah The destined Destroyer would come.

> THALABA. Bring me my Father's sword '

DEMON.

A Fire surrounds the fatal sword, No Spirit or Magician's hand Can pierce that fated Flame.

THALABA. Bring me his bow and his arrows!

11.

Distinctly Moath heard the youth, and She Who, through the Veil of Separation, watch'd The while in listening terror, and suspense All too intent for prayer. They heard the voice of Thalaba; But when the Spirit spake, the motionless air Felt not the subtile sounds, Too fine for mortal sense.

12.

On a sudden the rattle of arrows was heard, And a quiver was laid at the feet of the youth, And in his hand they saw Hodeirah's bow. He eyed the bow, he twang'd the string, And his heart bounded to the joyous tone. Anon he raised his voice and cried, " Go thy way, and never more, Evil Spirit, haunt our tent! By the virtue of the Ring, By Mahommed's holier might, By the holiest name of God, Thee, and all the Powers of Hell, I adjure and I command Never more to trouble ns!"

13.

Nor ever from that hour

Did rebel Spirit on the tent intrude; Such virtue had the Spell.

14.

Thus peacefully the vernal years Of Thalaba past on, Till now, without an effort, he could bend Hodeiran's stubborn bow. Black were his eyes, and bright; The sunny hue of health Glow'd on his tawny cheek ; His lip was darken'd by maturing life; Strong were his shapely limbs, his stature tall ; Peerless among Arabian youths was he.

15.

Compassion for the child Had first old Moath's kindly heart possess'd, An orphan, wailing in the wilderness; But when he heard his tale, his wondrous tale, Told by the Boy, with such eye-speaking truth, Now with sudden bursts of anger, Now in the agony of tears, And now with flashes of prophetic joy, What had been pity became reverence then, And, like a sacred trust from Ileaven, The Old Man cherish'd him. Now, with a father's love, Child of his choice, he loved the Boy, And, like a father, to the Boy was dear. Oneiza call'd him brother; and the youth More fondly than a brother loved the maid, The loveliest of Arabian maidens she. How happily the years Of Thalaha went by !

16.

It was the wisdom and the will of Heaven, That in a lonely tent had cast The lot of Thalaba; There might his soul develop best Its strengthening energies, There might he from the world Keep his heart pure and uncontaminate, Till at the written hour he should be found Fit servant of the Lord, without a spot.

17.

Years of his youth, how rapidly ye fled In that beloved solitude ! Is the morn fair, and doth the freshening breeze Flow with cool current o'er his cheek ? Lo! underneath the broad-leaved sycamore With lids half-closed he lies, Dreaming of days to come. Ilis dog beside him, in mute blandishment, Now licks his listless hand, Now licks his listless hand, Now lifts an anxious and expectant eye, Courting the wonted caress.

18.

Or comes the Father of the Rains From his caves in the utterniost West? Comes he in darkness and storms?

BOOK IIL

When the blast is loud : When the waters fill The traveller's tread in the sands; When the pouring shower Streams adown the roof; When the door-curtain hangs in heavier folds : When the out-strain'd tent flags loosely: Within there is the embers' cheerful glow, The sound of the familiar voice, The song that lightens toil, -Domestic Peace and Comfort are within. Under the common shelter, on dry sand, The quiet Camels ruminate their food; The lengthening cord from Moath falls, As patiently the Old Man Entwines the strong palm-fibres; by the hearth The Damsel shakes the coffee-grains, That with warm fragrance fill the tent; And while, with dexterous fingers, Thalaba Shapes the green basket, haply at his feet Her favorite kidling gnaws the twig, Forgiven plunderer, for Oneiza's sake.

19.

Or when the winter torrent rolls Down the deep-channel'd rain-course, foamingly, Dark with its mountain spoils, With bare feet pressing the wet sand, There wanders Thalaba; The rushing flow, the flowing roar, Filling his yielded faculties, A vague, a dizzy, a tumultuous joy 20.

Or lingers it a vernal brook Gleaming o'er yellow sands? Beneath the lofty bank reclined, With idle eye he views its little waves, Quietly listening to the quiet flow ; While in the breathings of the stirring gale, The tall canes bend above, Floating like streamers on the wind Their lank, uplifted leaves.

21.

Nor rich, nor poor, was Moath; God hath given Enough, and blest him with a mind content. No hoarded gold disquieted his dreams; But ever round his station he beheld Camels that knew his voice, And home-birds, grouping at Oneiza's call, And goats that, morn and eve, Came with full udders to the Damsel's hand. Dear child! the tent beneath whose shade they dwelt, It was her work; and she had twined His girdle's many hues; And he had seen his robe Grow in Oneiza's loom. How often, with a memory-mingled joy Which made her Mother live before his sight, He watch'd her nimble fingers thread the woof! Or at the hand-mill, when she knelt and toil'd, Toss'd the thin cake on spreading palm, Or fix'd it on the glowing oven's side, With bare, wet arm, and safe dexterity.

22.

'Tis the cool evening hour: The Tamarind from the dew Sheathes its young fruit, yet green. Before their tent the mat is spread; The Old Man's solemn voice Intones the holy Book. What if beneath no lamp-illumined dome Its marble walls bedeck'd with flourish'd truin, Azure and gold adornment? Sinks the word With deeper influence from the Imam's voice, Where, in the day of congregation, crowds Perform the duty-task? Their Father is their Priest, The Stars of Heaven their point of prayer, And the blue Firmament The glorious Temple, where they feel The present Deity.

23.

Yet through the purple glow of eve Shines dimly the white moon. The slacken'd bow, the quiver, the long lance, Rest on the pillar of the Tent. Knitting light palm-leaves for her brother's brow, The dark-eyed dansel sits; The Old Man tranquilly Up his curl'd pipe inhales The tranquillizing herb. So listen they the reed of Thalaba, While his skill'd fingers modulate The low, sweet, soothing, melancholy tones.

24.

Or if he strung the pearls of Poesy, Singing with agitated face, And eloquent arms, and sobs that reach the heart, A tale of love and woe; Then, if the brightening Moon that lit his face, In darkness favor'd hers, Oh! even with such a look as fables say The Mother Ostrich fixes on her egg, Till that intense affection Kindle its light of life, Even in such deep and breathless tenderners Oneiza's soul is centred on the youth, So motionless, with such an ardent gaze,-Save when from her full eyes She wipes away the swelling tears That dim his image there.

25.

She call'd him Brother; was it sister-love For which the silver rings Round her smooth ankles and her tawny arms Shone daily brighten'd? for a brother's eye Were her long fingers tinged, As when she trimm'd the lamp, And through the veins and delicate skin The light shone rosy? that the darken'd hds Gave yet a softer lustre to her eye? That with such pride she trick'd Her glossy tresses, and on holyday Wreathed the red flower-erown round Their waves of glossy jet?

BOOK III.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

How happily the days Of Thalaba went by ! Years of his youth, how rapidly ye fled !

26.

Yet was the heart of Thalaba Impatient of repose; Restless he ponder d still The task for him decreed, The mighty and nysterious work announced. Day by day, with youthful ardor, He the call of Heaven awaits; And oft in visions, o'er the murderer's head, He lifts the avenging arm; And oft, in dreams, he sees The Sword that is circled with fire.

One morn, as was their wont, in sportive mood, The youth and damsel bent Hodeirah's bow; For with no feeble hand, nor erring aim, Oneiza could let loose the obedient shaft. With head back-bending, Thalaba Shot up the aimless arrow high in air, Whose line in vain the aching sight pursued, Lost in the depth of Heaven. "When will the hour arrive," exclaim'd the youth, "That I shall aim these fated shafts To vengeance long delay'd? Have I not strength, my father, for the deed? Or can the will of Providence Be mutable like man? Shall I never be call'd to the task?"

23.

"Impatient boy!" quoth Moath, with a smile: "Impatient Thalaba!" Oneiza cried, And she too smiled; but in her smile A mild, reproachful melancholy mix'd.

29.

Then Moath pointed where a cloud Of locusts, from the desolated fields Of Syria, wing'd their way. " Lo! how created things Obey the written doom!"

30.

Onward they came, a dark, continuous cloud Of congregated myriads numberless, The rushing of whose wings was as the sound Of some broad river, headlong in its course, Plunged from a mountain summit; or the roar Of a wild ocean in the autumnal storm, Shattering its billows on a shore of rocks. Onward they came; the winds impell'd them on; Their work was done, their path of ruin past, Their graves were ready in the wilderness.

3F.

"Behold the mighty army !" Moath cried ; "Blindly they move, impell'd . By the blind Element. And yonder birds, our welcome visitants, See ! where they soar above the imbodied host, Pursue their way, and hang upon the rear, And thin the spreading flanks, Rejoicing o'er their banquet ! Deemest thou The scent of water on some Syrian mosque Placed with priest-mummery.and fantastic rites Which fool the multitude, hath led them here From far Khorassan ? Allah, who appoints Yon swarms to be a punishment of man, These also hath he doom'd to meet their way, Both passive instruments Of his all-acting will, Sole mover He, and only spring of all.

32.

While thus he spake, Oneiza's eye looks up Where one toward her flew, Satiate — for so it seem'd — with sport and food. The Bird flew over her, And as he past above, From his relaxing grasp a Locust fell ;— It fell upon the Maiden's robe, And feebly there it stood, recovering slow.

33.

The admiring girl survey'd His outspread sails of green ; His gauzy underwings, One closely to the grass-green body furl d, One ruffled in the fall, and half unclosed She view'd his jet-orb'd eyes, His glossy gorget bright, Green-glittering in the sun, His plumy, pliant horns, That, nearer as she gazed, Bent tremblingly before her breath. She mark'd his yellow-circled front With lines mysterious vein'd; And, "Know'st thou what is here inscribed, My father ? " said the Maid. "Look, Thalaba! perchance these lines Are in the letters of the Ring, Nature's own language written here."

34.

The youth bent down, and suddenly He started, and his heart Sprung, and his cheek grew red, For these mysterious lines were legible : — WHEN THE SUN SHALL BE DARKENED AT NOON, Son OF HODEIRAH, DEPART. And Moath look'd, and read the lines aloud; The Locust shook his wings and fled, And they were silent all.

35.

Who then rejoiced but Thalaba? Who then was troubled but the Arabian Maid? And Moath, sad of heart, Though with a grief suppress'd, beheld the youth Sharpen his arrows now, And now new-plume their shafts, Now, to beguile impatient hope, Feel every sharpen'd point.

36.

"Why is that anxious look," Oneiza ask'd,
"Still upward cast at noon? Is Thalaba aweary of our tent?"
"I would be gone," the youth replied,
"That I might do my task,
And full of glory to the tent return,
Whence I should part no more."

37.

But on the noontide sun, As anxious and as oft, Oneiza's eye Was upward glanced in fear. And now, as Thalaba replied, her check Lost its fresh and lively hue; For in the Sun's bright edge She saw, or thought she saw, a little speck. The sage Astronomer, Who, with the love of science full, Trembled that day at every passing cloud, — He had not scen it, 'twas a speck so small 38.

Alas! Oneiza sees the spot increase ! And lo! the ready youth Over his shoulder the full quiver slings, And grasps the slacken'd bow. It spreads, and spreads, and now Hath shadow'd half the sun, Whose crescent-pointed horns Now momently decrease.

-39.

The day grows dark ; the birds retire to rest ; Forth from her shadowy haunt Flies the large-headed screamer of the night. Far off the affrighted African, Deeming his God deceased, Falls on his knees in prayer, And trembles as he sees The fierce hyena's eyes Glare in the darkness of that dreadful noon.

40.

Then Thalaba exclaim'd, "Farewell, My father! my Oneiza!" the Old Man Felt his throat swell with grief. "Where wilt thou go, my child?" he cried; "Wilt thou not wait a sign To point thy destined way?" "God will conduct me!" said the faithful youth. He said, and from the tent, In the depth of the darkness departed. They heard his parting steps, The quiver rattling as he pass'd away.

NOTES TO BOOK III.

Every gem hath virtue. - 1, p. 244.

From the Mirror of Stones I extract a few specimens of the absurd ideas once prevalent respecting precious stones.

The Amethyst drives away drinkenness ; for, heing bound on the navel, it restrains the vapor of the wine, and so dissolves the ebucty.

Alcetoria is a stone of a crystalline color, a little darkish, somewhat resembling limpid water; and sometimes it hus veins of the color of flesh. Some call it Gallinaccus, from the place of its generation, the intestines of capens, which were castrated at three years old, and had lived seven; before which time the stone ought not to be taken out, for the older it is, so much the better. When the stone is become perfect in the capon, he don't drink. However, it is never found higger than a large bean. The virtue of this stone is, to render hum who carries it invisible. Being held in the moath, it allays thirst, and therefore is proper for wrestlers; in makes a woman agreeable to her husband; bestows honors, and preserves those already acquired; it frees such as are be witched; it helps to regain a lost kingdom, and acquire a foreign one.

Boraz, Nosa, Crapondinus, are names of the same stone, which is extracted from a toad. There are two species; that which is the best is rarely found; the other is black nr dnn with a cerulean glow, having in the middle the similitude of an eye, and must be taken out while the dead toad is yet panting; and these are better than those which are extracted from it after a long continuance in the ground. They have a wonderful efficacy in poisons. For wheever has taken poison, let him swallow this; which being down, it rolls about the bowels, and drives out every poisonous quality that is lodged in the intestines, and then passes through the fundament, and is preserved.

Corvia, or Corvina, is a stone of a reddish color, and accounted artificial. On the calends of April boil the eggs, taken out of a crow's nest, till they are hard; and being cold, let them be placed in the nest as they were before. When the crow knows this, she flies a long way to find the stone; and having found it, returns to the nest; and the eggs being touched with it, they become fresh and prolific. The stone must immediately be snatched out of the nest. Its virtue is to increase riches, to bestow honors, and to foretell many future events.

Kinocetus is a stone not wholly useless, siece it will cast out devils.

Conscious of poison, & c. - 1, p. 244.

Giafar, the founder of the Barmecides, being obliged to fly from Persia, his native country, took refuge at Damaseus, and implored the protection of the Caliph Soliman. When he was presented to that Prince, the Caliph solidenly changed color, and commanded him to retire, suspecting that he had poison about him. Soliman had discovered it by means of ten stones which he wore upon his arm. They were fastened there like a bracelet, and never failed to strike one against the other, and make a slight noise when any poison was near. Upon impury it was found, that Giafar carried poison in his ring, for the purpose of self-destruction, is case he had heen taken by his enomine.

taken by his enemies. — Marigny. These foolish old superstitutions have died away, and gems are now noither pounded as poison, nor worn as antidutes But the old absurdities respecting poisons have been renewed, in our days, by authors who have revived the calumnies alleged against the Knights-Templar, as if with the hope of exciting a nore extensive persecution.

Some blant the hostile weapon's edge. - 1, p. 244.

In the country called Panten, or Tathalamasin, " there be canes called Cassan, which overspread the earth like grasse, and out of every knot of them spring fourth certaine branches, which are continued upon the ground almost for the space of a mile. In the sayd canes there are found certaine stones, one of which stones whosoever carryeth about with him, cannot be wounded with any yron; and therefore the men of that country for the most part carry such stones with them, whithersoever they goe. Many also cause one of the armes of their children, while they are young, to be launced, putting one of the said stones into the wound, healing also, and closing up the said wound with the powder of a certain fish, (the name whereof I do not know,) which powder doth immediately consolidate and cure the said wound. And hy the vertue of these stones, the people aforesaid doe for the most part triumph both on sea and land. Howbeit there is one kind of stratageme which the enemies of this nation, knowing namely, they provide themselves armour of yron ur steele against their arrowes, and weapons also poisoned with the payson of trees; and they carry in their hands wooden stakes most sharp and hard-pointed, as if they were yron : likewise they shoot arrowes without yron heades, and so they confound and slay some of their unarmed foes, trusting too securely unto the vertue of their stones." - Odoricus in Hakluyt.

We are obliged to jewellers for our best accounts of the East. In Tavernier there is a passage curiously characteristic of his profession. A European at Delhi complained to him that he had polished and set a large diamond for Oreng-zebe, who had never paid him for his work. But he did not understand his trade, says Tavernier ; for if he had been a skilful jeweller, he would have known how to take two or three pieces out of the stone, and pay himself better than the Mogul would have done.

•••••• places by the abode Of holy men - holily possessed. - 4, p. 244.

Aod Elisha died, and they buried him. And the bands of the Moabites invaded the land at the coming in of the year.

And it came to pass as they were burying a man, that behold they spied a band of men; and they cast the man ioto the sepulchre of Elisha : and when the man was let down, and touched the hones of Elisha, he revived and stood up on his feet. - 2 Kings, xiii. 20, 21.

" It happened the dead corpse of a man was cast ashore at Chatham, and, heing taken up, was buried decently in the cburch-yard. Now there was an image or rood in the church, called our Lady of Chatham. This Lady, say the Monks, went the next night and roused up the clerk, telling him that a sinful person was buried near the place where she was worshipped, who offended her eyes with his ghastly grinning; aod unless he were removed, to the great grief of good people she must remove from thence, and could work no more miracles. Therefore she desired him to go with her to take him up, and throw him into the river again: which being done, soon after the body floated again, and was taken up and buried in the church-yard; but from that time all miracles ceased, and the place where he was buried did continually sink downwards. This tale is still remembered by some aged people, receiving it by tradition from the Popish times of darkness and idolatry." - Admirable Curiosities, Rarities, and Wonders in England.

When Alboquerque wintered at the isle of Camaram, in the Red sea, a man at arms, who died suddenly, was thrown overboard. In the night the watch felt several shocks, as though the ship were striking on a sand-bank. They put out the boat, and found the dead hody clinging to the keel by the rudder. It was taken up end buried on shore; and in the morning, it was seen lying on the grave. Frey Francisco was then consulted. He conjectured, that the deceased had died under excommunication, and therefore absolved him. They interred him again, and then he rested in the grave. -Joam de Barros. Dec. 2. 8. 3.

So foul, that Earth rejects him. - 4, p. 244.

Matthew of Westminster says, the story of the Old Woman of Berkeley will not appear incredible, if we read the dialogue of St. Gregory, in which he relates how the body of a man buried in the church was thrown out by the Devils. Charles Martel also, because he had appropriated great part of the tithes to pay his soldiers, was most miserably, by the wicked Spirits, taken bodily out of his grave.

The Turks report, as a certain truth, that the corpse of Heyradin Barbarossa was found, four or five times, out of the ground, lying by his sepulchre, after he had been there inhumed: nor could they possibly make him lie quiet in his grave, till a Greek wizard counselled them to bury a black dog together with the body ; which done, he lay still and gave them no farther trouble. - Morgan's History of Algiers.

In supernatural affairs, seals and dogs seem to possess a edative virtue. When peace was made, about the year A70, between the Earls of Holland and Flanders, "it was Count Floris having taken possession of the isle of Walcharen, returned into Holland, from whenco hee sent the best workmen he could find in all his countries into Flanders, to make dikes and causeies, and to stop the hole neere unto this Dam, or Sluce, and to recover the drowned land. These diggers being come to the place, they found at the entrie of this bottomless hole, a Sea-dog, the which for six dayes together, did nothing but crie out and howle very fearfully. They, not knowing what it might signifie, having consulted of this accident, they resolved to cast this dog into the hole. There was a mad-headed Hollander among the rest, who going into the bottome of the dike, tooke the dogge by the taile, and cast him into the middest of the gulfe; then speedily they cast earth and torfe into it, so as they found a bottome, and by little and little filled it up. And for that many workmen came to the repairing of this dike, who, for that they would not be far from their worke, coucht in Cabines, which seemed to be a pretie towne, Count Philip gave unto all these Hollanders, Zeelanders, and others, that would inhabit there, as bruch land as they could recover from Dam to Ardenbourg, for them and their successors, forever, with many other immunities and freedoms. By reason whereof many planted themselves there, and in succession of time, made a good towae there, the which by reason of this dog, which they cast into the hole, they named Houdtsdam, that is to say, a dog's sluce; Dam in Flemish signifying a sluce, and Hondt dog; and therefore at this day, the said towne (which is simply called Dam) carrieth a dog in their armes and blason."- Grimestone's Historie of the Netherlands, 1608.

The Vulture hovers yonder, &c. - 4, p. 244.

The Vulture is very serviceable in Arabia, clearing the earth of all carcasses, which corrupt very rapidly in hot countries. He also destroys the field mice, which multiply so prodigiously in some provinces, that, were it not for this assistance, the peasant might cease from the culture of the fields as absolutely vain. Their performance of these important services induced the ancient Egyptians to pay those birds divine honors, and even at present it is held unlawful to kill them in all the countries which they frequent. \rightarrow Nucbuhr.

His dog beside him, &c. --- 17, p. 245.

The Bedonins, who at all points, are less superstitions than the Turks, have a breed of very tall greyhounds, which likewise mount guard around their tents; but they take great care of these useful servants, and have such an affection for them, that to kill the dog of a Bedonin would be to endanger vonr own life. - Sonnini.

Shapes the green basket, &cc. - 18, p. 246.

The Doum, or wild palm-tree, grows in abundance, from which these people, when necessity renders them industrious, find great advantage. The shepherds, mule-drivers, cameldrivers, and travellers, gather the leaves of which they make mats, fringes, baskets, hats, shooaris, or large wallets to carry corn, twine, ropes, girths, and covers for their pack-saddles. This plant, with which also they heat their ovens, produces a mild and resinous fruit, that ripens in September and October. It is in form like the raisin, contains a kernel, and is astringent, and very proper to temper and counteract the effects of the watery and laxative froits, of which these people in summer make an immoderate use. That Power which is ever provident to all, has spread this wild plant over their deserts to sapply an infinity of wants that would otherwise heavily burden a people so poor. — Chenier.

Or lingers it a vernal brook. - 20, p. 246.

We passed two of those valleys so common in Arabia, which, when heavy rains fail, are filled with water, and are then called wadi, or rivers, although perfectly dry at other times of the year. — We now drew nearer to the river, of which a braneb was dry, and having its channel filled with reeds growing to the height of 20 feet, served as a line of road, which was agreeably shaded by the reeds. — Nebuhr.

Nor rich, nor poor, was Moath. - 21, p. 246.

The simplicity, or, perhaps, more properly, the poverty, of he lower class of the Bedouins, is proportionate to that of their chiefs. - All the wealth of a family coesists of movables, 'f which the following is a pretty exact investory : - A few male and female camels, some goats and poultry, a mare and her bridle and saddle, a tent, a lance sixteen feet long, a crooked sabre, a rusty musket, with a flint or matchlock; a pipe, a portable mill, a pot for cooking, a leathern bucket, a small coffee-roaster; a mat, some clothes, a mantle of black woollen, and a few glass or silver rings, which the women wear upon their legs and arms ; if none of these are wanting, their furniture is complete. But what the poor man stands most in need of, and what he takes most pleasure in, is his mare; for this animal is his principal support. With his mare the Bedouin makes his excursions against hostile tribes, or seeks plender in the country, and on the highways. The mare is preferred to the horse, because she does not neigh, is more docile, and yields milk, which, on occasion, satisfies the thirst and even the hunger of her master. - Folncy.

The Sheik, says Volney, with whom I resided in the country of Gaza, about the end of 1784, passed for one of the most powerful of those districts ; yet it did not appear to me that his expenditure was greater than that of an opulent farmer. His personal effects, consisting in a few pelisses, carpets, arms, horses, and camels, could not be estimated at more than fifty thousand livres, (a little above two thousand pounds;) and it must be observed, that is this calculation, four mares of the breed of racers are valued at six thousand livres, (two hundred and fifty pounds,) and each camel at ten pounds sterling. We must not therefore, when we speak of the Bedouine, affix to the words Prince and Lord the ideas they usually convey; we should come nearer the trath, by comparing them to substantial farmers, in mountainous countries, whose simplicity they resemble in their dress, as well as in their domestic life and manaers. A Sheik, who has the command of five hundred horse, does not disdain to saddle and bridle his own, nor to give him his barley and chopped straw. In his teat, his wife makes the coffee, kneads the dough, and superintends the dressing of the victuals. His daughters and kinswomen wash the linen, and go with pitchers on their heads, and veils over their faces, to draw water from the fountaio. These manners agree precisely with the descriptions in Homer, and the history of Abraham, in Genesis. But it must be owned, that it is difficult to form a just idea of them without having ourselves here eye-witnesses. -Volney.

No hoarded gold disquieted his dreams. - 21, p. 246.

Thus confined to the most absolute necessaries of life, the Arabs have as little industry as their wants are few; all their arts consist in weaving their clumsy tents, and in making mats and butter. Their whole commerce only extends to the exchanging camels, kids, stallions, and milk, for orms, clothing, a little rice or corn, and maney, which they bury. -- Folney.

And he had seen his robe Grow in Oneiza's loom. - 21, p. 246.

The chief manufacture among the Arabs is the making of Hykes, as they call woollen blankets, and webs of goat's hair for their tents. The women slone are employed in this work, as Andromache and Penelope were of old; who make no use of a shuttle, but conduct every thread of the woof with their fingers. - Shaw.

Then let my wife gried unto another. - Job xxxi. 9, 10.

With bare, wet arm, &c. - 21, p. 246.

I was much amused by observing the dexterity of the Arab women in baking their bread. They have a small place built with clay, between two and three feet high, having a hole at the hottom, for the convenience of drawing out the ashes, something similar to that of a lime-kilu. The oven (which I think is the most proper name for this place) is usually about fifteen inches wide at the top, and gradually grows wider to the bottom. It is heated with wood, and when sufficiently hot, and perfectly clear from smoke, having nothing but clear embers at hottom, (which continue to reflect great heat,) they prepare the dough in a large bowl, and mould the cakes, to the desired size, on a board or stone placed near the oven. After they have kneaded the cake to a proper consistence, they pat it a little, then toss it about with great dexterity in one hand, till it is as thin as they choose to make it. They then wet one side of it with water, at the same time wetting the hand and arm, with which they put it into the oven. The wet side of the cake adheres fast to the side of the oven till it is sufficiently baked, when, if not paid sufficient attention to, it would fall down among the embers. If they were not exceedingly quick at this work, the heat of the oven would burn the skin from off their hands and arms; but with such amazing dexterity do they perform it, that one woman will continue keeping three or four cakes at a time in the oven till she has done baking. This mode, let me add, does not require half the fuel that is made use of in Europe. - Jackson.

The Tamarind sheathes its young fruit, yet green. - 22, p. 246.

Tamarinds grow on great trees, full of branches, whereof the leaves are not bigger than, nor unlike to, the leaves of pimpernel, only something longer. The flower at first is like the peaches, but at last turns white, and puts forth its fruit at the end of certain strings; as soon as the sun is set, the leaves close up the fruit, to preserve it from the dew, and open as soon as that luminary appears again. The fruit at first is green, but ripening it becomes of a dark-gray, drawing towards a red, enclosed in husks, brown or taway, of taste a little bitter, like our prunelloes. The tree is us big as a walnut tree, full of leaves, bearing its fruit, at the branches, like the BOOK III.

Intones the holy Book. - 22, p. 246.

I have often, says Niebahr, heard the Sheiks sing passages from the Koran. They never strain the voice by attempting to raise it too high; and this natural music pleased me very much.

The sirs of the Orientals are all grave and simple. They choose their singers to sing so distinctly, that every word may be compreheaded. When several instruments are played at once, and accompanied by the voice, you hear them all reader the same melody, noless some one mingles a running base, either singing or playing, always in the same key. If this music is not greatly to our taste, ours is as little to the taste of the Orientals. — Nichuhr.

Its marble walls, &c. - 22, p. 246.

The Mosquea, which they pronounce Mesg-jid, are built exactly in the fashion of our churches, where, isstead of such seats and beaches as we make use of, they noly strew the floor with mats, upon which they perform the several sittings and prostrations that are cajoined in their religion. Near the middle, particularly of the principal Mosque of each city, there is a large pulpit erected, which is balustraded round, with about half-a-dozen steps leading up to it. Upon these (for I am told none are permitted to enter the pulpit) the Mufty, or one of the Im-ams, placeth himself every Friday, the day of the congregation, as they call it, and from thence either explaincth some part or other of the Korao, or else exhorteth the people to piety and good works. That end of these Mosques, which regards Mecca, whither they direct themselves throughout the whole course of their devotions, is called the Kiblah, in which there is commonly a niche, representing, as a judicious writer conjectures, the presence, and at the same time the invisibility of the Deity. There is usually a square tower crected at the other end, with a flag-staff upon the top of it. Hither the crier ascends at the appointed times, and, displaying a small flag, advertiseth the people, with a loud voice from each side of the battlements, of the hour of prayer. These places of the Mahometan worship, together with the Mufty, Im-ams, and other persons belonging to them, are maintained out of certain revenues arising from the rents of lands and houses, either left by will or set apart by the public for that use. - Shaw.

All the Mosques are built nearly in the same style. They are of an oblong square form, and covered in the middle with a large dome, on the top of which is fixed a gilt crescent. In front there is a handsome portico covered with several small cupplas, and raised one step above the pavement of the court. The Turks sometimes, in the het season, perform their devotions there; and between the columns, upon cross iron bars, are suspended a number of lamps, for illuminations on the Thursday nights, and on all festivals. The entrance into the Mosque is by one large door. All these edifices are solidly huilt of freestone, and in several the domes are covered with lead. The minarets stand on one side, adjoining to the body of the Mosque. They are sometimes square, but more commonly round and taner. The gallery for the maazeen, or criers, projecting a little from the column near the top, has some resemblance to a rude capital ; and from this the spire, tapering more in proportion than before, soon terminates in a point crowned with a crescent. - Russell's Aleppo.

The Stars of Heaven their point of prayer. - 22, p. 246.

The Keahê is the point of direction, and the centre of union for the prayers of the whole human race, as the Beïth-mâmour * s for those of ail the celestial heings; the Kursy† for those of the four Arch-augels, and the Arsch* for those of the cherabims and scraphims who guard the throne of the Almighty. The inhabitants of Mecca, who enjoy the happiness of contemplating the Keabé, are obliged, when they pray, to fix their eyes upon the sanctuary; but they who are at a distance from this valuable privilege, are required only, during prayer, to direct their attention towards that hallowed edifice. The believer who is ignorant of the position of the Keabé must use every endeavor to gaia a knowledge of it; and efter he has shown great solicitude, whatever be his success, his prayer is valid. $-D^2 Ohsson$.

Rest on the pillar of the Tent. - 23, p. 246.

The Bedoweens live in tents, called Hymas, from the shade they afford the inhabitants, and Beet el Shar, Honses of Hair, from the matter they are made of. They are the same with what the entients called Mapalia, which being then, as they are to this day, secured from the heat and inclemency of the weather, by a covering only of such hair-cloth as our coal sacks are made of, might very justly be described by Virgi' to have thin roofs. When we find any number of them together, (and I have seen from three to three hundred,) then they are usually placed in a circle, and constitute a Don-war. The fashion of each tent is the same, heing of an oldnug figure, not unlike the bottom of a ship turned upside down, as Sallust hath long age described them. However, they differ in bigness, according to the number of people who live in them; and are accordingly supported, some with one pillar, others with two or three; whilst a curtain or carpet placed, upon occasion, at each of these divisions, separateth the whole into so many spartments. The pillar, which I have mentioned, is a straight pole, 8 or 10 feet high, and 5 or 4 inches in thickness, serving not only to support the tent. but being full of hooks fixed there for the purpose, the Arabs hang upon it their clothes, baskets, saddles, and accoutrements of war. Holofernes, as we read in Judith, xiii. 6, made the like use of the pillar of his tent, by hanging his fauchion upon it : it is there called the pillar of the bed, from the custom, perhaps, that hath always prevailed, of having the upper end of the carpet, mattrass, or whatever else they lie upon, turned from the skirts of the tent that way. But the Κωνωπειον, Canopy, as we render it, (ver. 9,) should, 1 presume, be rother called the gnat or muskeeta net, which is a close curtain of gauze or fine linen, used all over the Levant, by people of better fashion, to keep out the flies. The Arabs have nothing of this kind; who, in taking their rest, lie horizontally upon the ground, without bed, mattrass, or pillow, wrapping themselves up only in their Hykes, and lying, us they find room, upon a mat or carpet, in the middle or corner of the tent. Those who are married, have each of them a corner of the tent, cantoned off with a curtain.-Shaw.

The tents of the Moors are somewhat of a conic form, are seldom more than 8 or 10 fect high in the centre, and from 20 to 25 in length. Like those of the remotest antiquity, their figure is that of a ship overset, the keel of which is only seeo. These tents are made of twine, composed of goal's hair, camel's wool, and the leaves of the wild palm, so that they keep out water; but, being black, they produce a disagreeable effect at a distant view. — Chemicr.

The music of the Bedoweens rarely consists of more than one strain, suitable to their homely instruments, and to their simple invention. The Arabebbah, os they call the bladder and string, is in the highest vogue, and doubtless of great antiquity; as is also the Gasaph, which is only a common reed, open at each end, having the side of it bored, with three or more heles, according to the ability of the person who is to touch it ; though the compass of their tunes rarely or never exceeds an octave. Yet sometimes, even in this simplicity of harmony, they observe something of method and ceremony; for in their historical Cantatas especially, they have their preludes and symphonies ; each stanza being introduced with a flourish from the Arabebbah, while the narration itself is accompanied with the softest touches they are able to make, upon the Gasaph. The Tarr, another of their instruments, is made like a Sive, consisting (as Isidore describeth the Tympanum) of a thin rim, or heop of wood, with a skin of parchment stretched over the top of it. This serves for the bass in all their concerts, which they accordingly touch very artfully with their fingers, and the knuckles or palms of their hands, as the time and measure require, or as force and softness are to be communicated to the several parts of the performance. The Tarr is undoubtedly the Tympanum of the Antients, which appears as well from the general use of it all over Barbary, Egypt, and the Levant, as from the method of playing upon it, and the figure of the instrument itself, being exactly of the same fashion with what we find in the hands of Cybele and the Bacchanals among the Basso Relievos and Statues of the Antients. - Shaw,

How great soever may have been the reputation the Libyans once had of being famous musicians, and of having invented the pipe or flute, called by Greek authors Hippophorbos, I fancy few of them would be now much liked at our Opera. As for this tibicen, flute or pipe, it is certainly lost, except it be the gayta, somewhat like the hauthois, called zurna, in Turkish, a martial instrument. Julius Pollux, in a chapter entitled De tibiarum specie, says Hippophorbos, quam quidem Libyes Scenetes invenerunt ; and again, showing the use and quality thereof, here vero apud equorum pascua utuntur, ejusque materia decorticata laurus est, cor cuim ligni extructum acutissimam dat sonum. The sound of the gayta agrees well with this description, though not the make. Several poets mention the tibicen Libucus and Arabicus ; and Athenaeus quotes Duris, and says, Libycas tibia Poetæ appellant, ut inquit Duris, libre secundo de rebus gestis Agathoelis, quod Scirites, primus, ut credunt, tibicinum artis inventor, é gente Nomadum Libycorum fuerit, primusque tibia Cerealium hymnorum cantor. - Ib.

This is a favorite Oriental figure. ⁴⁵ After a little time, lifting his head from the collar of reflection, he removed the talisman of science from the treasure of speech, and scattered skitts-foll of brilliant gens and principly pearls before the company in his mirth-exciting deliveries.³⁷ — Bahar Danusk.

Abu Temam, who was a celebrated poet himself, used to say, that "fine sentiments, delivered in prose, were like gems scattered at random; but that when they were confined in a poetical measure, they resembled bracelets and strings of pearls." — Sir W. It seems the Arabs are still great rhymers, and their verses are sometimes rewarded; but I should not venture to say, that there are great Poets annong them. Yet I was ossured in Yemen that it is not uncommon to find them among the wandering Arabs in the country of Dsjäf. It is some few years since a Sheik of these Arabs was in prison at Sana: seeing by chance a bird upon a roof opposite to him, he recollected that the devout Mahommedans believe they perform an action agreeable to God in giving liberty to a bird encaged. He thought therefore he had as much right to liberty as a bird, and made a poem upon the subject, which was first learnt by his guards, and then became so popular, that at last it reached the Imam. He was so pleased with it, that he liberated the Sheik, whom he had arrested for his robberies.— Nichhr, Desc. de l'Arabie.

A tale of love and woe. - 24, p. 246.

They are fond of singing with a forced voice in the high tones, and one must have lungs like theirs to support the effort for a quarter of an hour. Their airs, in point of character and execution, resemble nothing we have heard in Europe, except the Seguidillas of the Spaniards. They have divisions more labored even than those of the Italians, and cadences and inflections of tone impossible to be imitated by European throats. Their performance is accompanied with sighs and gestures, which paint the passions in a more lively manner than we should venture to allow. They may be said to excel most in the melancholy strain. To behold an Arnb with his head inclined, his hand applied to his ear, his eyebrows knit, his eyes languishing; to hear his plaintive tones, his lengthened notes, his sighs and sobs, it is almost impossible to refrain from tears, which, as their expression is, are far from bitter: and indeed they must certainly find a pleasure in shelding them, since, among all their sougs, they constantly prefer that which excites them most, as, among all accomplishments, singing is that they most admire. - Volney.

All their literature consists in reciting tales and histories in the meaner of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. They have a peculiar passion for such stories; and employ in them almost all their leisure, of which they have a great deal. In the evening they seat themselves on the ground at the door of their tents, or under cover if it he cold, and there, ranged in a circle round a little fire of dung, their pipes in their mouths, and their legs crossed, they sit awhile in silent meditation, till, on a sudden, one of them breaks forth with, Once upon a time, -- and continues to recite the edventures of some young Shaik and female Bedouin; he relates in what manner the youth first got a secret glimpse of his mistress, and how he became desperately enamored of her: he minutely describes the lovely fair, extols her black eyes, as large and soft as those of the gazelle ; ber languid and impassioned looks ; her arched eyebrows, resembling two hows of ebony ; her waist, straight and supple as a lance ; he forgets not her steps, light as those of the young filley, nor her eyelashes blackened with knhl, nor her lips painted blue, nor her gails tinged with the goldencolored henna, nor her breasts, resembling two pomegranates, nor her words, sweet as honey. He recounts the sufferings of the young lover, so wasted with desire and passion, that his body no longer yields any shadow. At length, after detailing his various attempts to see his mistress, the obstacles on the part of the parents, the invasions of the enemy, the captivity of the two lovers, &c., he terminates, to the satisfaction of the audience, by restoring them, united and happy, to the paternal tent, and by receiving the tribute paid to his eloquence, in the masha allah * he has merited. The Hinna, says the translator of the Bahar-Danush, is esteemed not meroly ornamental, but medicinal; and I have myself often experienced in India a most refreshing coolness through the whole habit, from an embrocation, or rather plaster of Hinna, applied to the soles of my feet, by prescription of a native physician. The effect lasted for some days. Bruce says it is used not only for ornament, but as an astringent to keep the hands and feet dry.

The large locusts, which are near three inches long, are not the most destructive ; as they fly, they yield to the current of the wind, which hurries them into the sea, or into sandy deserts, where they perish with hunger or fatigue. The young locusts, that cannot fly, are the most ruinous ; they are about fifteen lines in length, and the thickness of a goose quill. They creep over the country in such multitudes that they leave not a blade of grass behind ; and the noise of their feeding announces their approach at some distance. The devastations of locusts increase the price of provisions, and often occasion famines , but the Moors find a kind of compensation in making food of these insects ; prodigious quantities are brought to market, salted and dried, like red herrings. They have an oily and rancid taste, which hahit only can render agreeable : they are eat here, however, with pleasure. - Chenier.

In 1778, the empire of Morocco was ravaged by these insects. In the summer of that year, such clouds of locusts came from the south, that they darkened the air, and devoured a part of the harvest. Their offspring, which they left on the ground, committed still much greater mischief. Locusts appeared, and brod anow in the following year, so that in tho spring the country was wholly covered, and they crawled one over the other in search of their subsistence.

It has heen remarked, in speaking of the climate of Marocco₃ that the young locusts are those which are the most mischievous; and that it seems almost impossible to rid the land of these insects and their ravages, when the country once becomes thus afflicted. In order to preserve the houses and gardens in the neighborhood of cities, they dig a ditch two feet in depth, and as much in width. This they palisade with reeds close to each other, and inclined inward toward the ditch; so that the insects, unable to climb up the slippery reed, full hack into the ditch, where they devou rone another.

This was the means by which the gardens and vineyards of Rabat, and the city itself, were delivered from this scourgo, in 1779. The intrenchmont, which was, at least, a league in extent, formed a semicircle from the sea to the river, which separates Rabat from Sallee. The quantity of young locusts here assembled was so prodigious, that, on the third day, the ditch could not be approached, because of the stench. The whole country was eaten up, the very bark of the fig, pomegranate, and orange tree, — bitter, hard, and corrosive as it was, — could not escape the voracity of these insects.

The lands, ravaged throughout all the western provinces, produced no harvest; and the Moors, being obliged to live on their stores, which the exportation of corn (permitted till 1774) had drained, began to feel a dearth. Their eattle, for which they make no provision, and which, in these climates, have no other subsistence than that of daily grazing, died with hanger; nor could any be preserved hut those which were in the neighborhood of mountains, or in matshy grounds, where the re-growth of pasturage is more rapid.

In 1780, the distress was still further increased. The dry winter had checked the products of the earth, and given birth to a new generation of locusts, who devoured whatever had escaped from the inclemency of the season. The husbandman did not reap even what he had anowed, and found himself destitute of food, cattle, or seed corn. In this time of extreme wretchedness, the poor felt all the horrors of famine. They were seen wandering over the country to devour roota, and, perhaps, abridged their days, by diggiog into the entrails of the earth in search of the crude means by which they might be preserved.

Vast numbers perished of indigestible food and want. I have beheld country people in the roads, and in the streets, who haddied of hunger, and who were thrown across asses to be taken and buried. Fathers sold their children. The hushand, with the consent of his wife, would take her into another province, there to bestow her in marriage, as if she were his sister, and afterwards come and reclaim her when his wants were no longer so great. I have seen women and children run after cannels and rake in their dung, to seek for some indigested grain of barley, which, if they found, they devoured with avidity. — Chenier.

From far Khorassan ? - 31, p. 247.

The Abmelec, or cater of locusts, or grasshoppers, is a bird which better deserves to be described, perhaps, than most others of which travellers have given us an account, because the facts relating to it are not only strange in themselves, but so well and distinctly attested, that however surprising they may seem, we cannot but afford them our belief. The food of this creature is the locust, or the grasshopper ; it is of the size of an ordinary hen, its feathers black, its wings large, and its flesh of a grayish color. They fly generally in great flocks, as the starlings are wont to do with us. But the thing which renders these birds wonderful is, that they are so fond of the water of a certain fountain in Corasson, or Bactria, that whereever that water is carried, they follow ; on which account it is carefully preserved ; for wherever the locusts fall, the Armenian priests, who are provided with this water, bring a quantity of it and place in jars, or pour it into little channels in the fields: the next day whole troops of these birds arrive, and quickly deliver the people from the locusts. - Universal History.

Sir John Chardin has given us the following passage from an ancient traveller, in relation to this bird. In Cyprus, about the time that the corn was ripe for the sickle, the earth produced such a quantity of cavalettes, or locusts, that they obscured sometimes the splendor of the son. Wherever these came, they burnt and eat up all. For this there was no remedy, since, as fast as they were destroyed, the earth produced more : God, however, raised them up a means for their deliverance, which happened thus. In Persia, near the city of Cuerch, there is a fountain of water, which has a wonderful property of destroying these insects; for a pitcher full of this being carried in the open air, without passing through house or vault, and being set on an high place, certain birds which follow it, and fly and cry after the men who carry it from the fountain, come to the place where it is fixed. These birds are red and black, and fly in great flocks together, like starlings; the Turks and Persians call them Mussulmans. These birds no sooner came to Cyprus, but they destroyed the locusts with which the island was infested: but if the water he spilt or lost, these creatures immediately disappear; which accident fell out when the Turks took this island : for one of them going up into the steeple of Famagusta, and finding there a pitcher of this water, he, fancying that it contained gold or silver, or some precious thing, broke it, and spilt what was therein : since which the Cypriots have been as much tormented as ever hy the locusts.

On the confines of the Medes and of Armenia, at certain times, a great quantity of hirds are seen who resemble our hlackhirds, and they have a property sufficiently curious to make me mention it. When the corn in these parts begins to grow, it is astonishing to see the number of locusts with which all the fields are covered. The Armenians have no other method of delivering themselves from these insects, than by going in procession round the fields, and sprinkling them with a particular water, which they take care to preserve in their houses, for this water comes from a great distance. They fetch it from a well belonging to one of their convents near the frontiers, and they say that the bodies of many Christian martyrs were formerly thrown into this well. These processions, and the sprinkling, continue three or four days; after which, the birds that I have mentioned come in great flights ; and whether it he that they eat the locusts, or drive them away, in two or three days the country is cleared of them. -Tavernier.

At Mosul and at Haled, says Niebuhr, I heard much of the locust bird, without seeing it. They there call it Samarmar, or, as others pronounce it, Samarmog. It is said to he black, larger than a sparrow, and no ways pleasant to the palate. I am assured that it every day destroys an incredible number of locusts; they pretend, nevertheless, that the locusts sometimes defend themselves, and devour the bird with its feathers, when they have overpowered it by numbers. When the chil-dren in the frontier towns of Arabia catch a live locust, they place it before them and cry Samarmog! And because it stoops down terrified at the noise, or at the motion of the child, or clings more closely to its place, the children believe that it fears the name of its enemy, that it hides itself, and attempts to throw stones. The Samarmog is not a native of Mosul or Haleb, but they go to seek it in Khorasan with much ceremony. When the locusts multiply very greatly, the government sends persons worthy of trust to a spring near the village of Samarun, situated in a plain between four mountains, by Mesched, or Musa er ridda, in that province of Persia. The deputies, with the ceremonies prescribed, fill a chest with this water, and pitch the chest so that the water may neither evaporate nor be spilt before their return. From the spring to the town whence they were sent, the chest must always be between heaven and earth; they must neither place it on the ground, nor under any roof, lest it should lose all its virtue. Mosul being surrounded with a wall, the water must not pass under the gateway, but it is received over the wall, and the chest placed upon the Mosque Nebbi Gurgis, a building which was formerly a church, and which, in preference to all the other buildings, has had from time immemorial the honor to possess this chest upon its roof. When this precious water has been brought from Khorasan with the requisite precautions, the common Mahommedans, Christians, and Jews of Mosul, believe that the Samarmog follows the water, and remains in the country as long as there is a single drop left in the chest of Nebbi Gurgis. Sceing one day a large stork's nest upon this vessel, I told a Christian of some eminence in the town, how much I admired the quick smell of the Samarmog, who perceived the smell of the water through such a quantity of ordure ; he did not answer me, but was very much scandalized that the government should have permitted the stork to make her nest upon so rare a treasure, and still more angry, that for more than nine years, the government had not sent to procure fresh water. - Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie.

Dr. Russel describes this hird as about the size of a starling; the body of a flesh color, the rest of its plumage black, the bill and legs black also

For these mysterious lines were legible. - 34, p. 247.

The locusts are remarkable for the hieroglyphic that they hear upon the forehead; their color is green throughout the whole body, excepting a little yellow rim that surrounds their head, which is lost at their eyes. This insect has two upper wings, pretty solid; they are green, like the rest of the body, except that there is in each a little white spot. The locust keeps them extended like great sails of a ship going before the wind; it has besides two other wiogs underneath the former, and which resemble a light transparent stuff pretty much like a cobweb, and which it makes use of in the maoner of smack sails that are along a vessel; but when the locust reposes herself, she does like a vessel that lies st anchor, for she keeps the second sails furled under the first. — Norden.

The Mahommedans believe some mysterious meaning is contained in the lines upon the locust's forehead.

I compared the description in the poem with a locust which was caught in Leicestershire. It is remarkable that a single insect should have found its way so far inland.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Glare in the darkness of that dreadful noon. - 39, p. 248.

In the ninth volume of the Spectator is an account of the total Eclipse of the Sun, Friday, April 22, 1715. It is in a strain of vile bombast; yet some circumstances are so fine, that even such a writer could not spoil them : "The different modifications of the light formed colors the eye of man has been five hundred years unacquainted with, and for which I can find no name, unless I may be allowed to call it a dark, gloomy sort of light, that scattered about a more sensible and genuine herror, than the most consemmate darkness. All the birds were struck dumb, and hung their wings in moody sorrow; some few pigeons, that were on the wing, were afraid of being benighted even in the morn, alighted, and took shel-ter in the houses. The heat went away by degrees with the light. But when the rays of the sun broke out afresh, the juy and the thanks that were in me, that God made to us these signs and marks of his power before he exercised it, were exquisite, and such as never worked upon me so sensibly before. With my own ears I heard a cock crow as at the dawn of day, and he welcomed with a strange gladness, which was plainly discoverable by the cheerful notes of his voice, the sen at its second rising, and the returning light."

The Paper is signed B., and is perhaps by Sir Richard Blackmore.

In the eve he arrived at a Well; An Acacia bent over its side, Under whose long light-hanging boughs He chose his night's abode. There, due ablutions made, and prayers perform'd, The youth his mantle spread, And silently produced His solitary meal. The silence and the solitude recall'd Dear recollections; and with folded arms, Thinking of other days, he sate, till thought Had left him, and the Acacia's moving shade Upon the sunny sand Had caught his idle eye; And his awaken'd ear Heard the gray Lizard's chirp, The only sound of life.

OLD MAN.

Son, thou hast seen the Traveller in the sands Move through the dizzy light of hot noon-day, Huge as the giant race of elder times;

And his Camel, than the monstrous Elephant Seem of a vaster bulk.

THALABA.

A frequent sight.

OLD MAN.

And hast thou never, in the twilight, faneled Familiar object into some strange shape And form uncouth?

THALABA.

Ay! many a time.

OLD MAN.

Even so Things view'd at distance, through the mist of fear, By their distortion terrify and shock The abused sight.

BOOK IV.

800K IV.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THALABA. But of these Angels' fate Thus in the uncreated book is written.

OLD MAN. Wisely from legendary fables Heaven Inculcates wisdom.

THALABA.

How then is the truth? Is not the dungeon of their punishment By ruin'd Babylon ?

OLD MAN. By Babylon Haruth and Maruth may be found.

THALABA. And there Magicians learn their impious sorcery?

OLD MAN.

Son, what thou say'st is true, and it is false. But night approaches fast; I have travell'd far, And my old lids are heavy; --- on our way We shall have hours for converse; --- let us now Turn to our due repose. Son, peace be with thee!

10.

So in his loosen'd cloak The Old Man wrapt limself, And laid his limbs at length; And Thalaba in silence laid him down. Awhile he lay, and watch'd the lovely Moon, O'er whose broad orb the boughs A mazy fretting framed, Or with a pale, transparent green Lighting the restless leaves, The thin Acacia leaves that play'd above. The murmuring wind, the moving leaves, Soothed him at length to sleep, With mingled lullabies of sight and sound.

11.

Not so the dark Magician by his side, Lobaba, who from the Domdaniel caves Had sought the dreaded youth. Silent he lay, and simulating sleep, Till, by the long and regular breath he knew, The youth beside him slept. Carefully then he rose, And bending over him, survey'd him near ; And secretly he cursed The dead Abdaldar's ring, Arm'd by whose amulet He slept from danger safe 12.

Wrapt in his mantle Thalaba reposed, His loose right arm pillowing his easy head. The Moon was on the Ring, Whose crystal gem return'd A quiet, moveless light. Vainly the Wizard vile put forth his hand, 33 And strove to reach the gem ; Charms, strong as hell could make them, kept it safe. He call'd his servant-fiends, He bade the Genii rob the sleeping youth By the virtue of the Ring,

By Mahommed's holier power, By the holiest name of God, Had Thalaba disarm'd the evil race 13.

Baffled and weary, and convinced at length, Anger, and fear, and rancor gnawing him, The accursed Sorcerer ceased his vain attempts, Content perforce to wait Temptation's likelier aid. Restless he lay, and brooding many a wile, And tortured with impatient l.ope, And envying with the bitterness of hate The innocent youth, who slept so sweetly by 14.

The ray of morning on his eyelids fell, And Thalaba awoke, And folded his mantle around him, And girded his loins for the day ; Then the due rites of holiness observed. His comrade too arose. And with the outward forms Of righteousness and prayer insulted God. They fill'd their water skin, they gave The Camel his full draught. Then on the road, while yet the morn was young, And the air was fresh with dew, Forward the travellers went, With various talk beguiling the long way. But soon the youth, whose busy mind Dwelt on Lobaba's wonder-stirring words, Renew'd the unfinish'd converse of the night.

15.

THALABA

Thon said'st that it is true, and yet is false, That men accurst attain at Babylon Forbidden knowledge from the Angel pair :---How mean you ?

LOBABA

All things have a double power, Alike for good and evil. The same fire That on the comfortable hearth at eve Warm'd the good man, flames o'er the house at night; Should we for this forego The needful element? Because the scorching summer Sun Darts fever, wouldst thou quench the orb of day? Or deemest thou that Heaven in anger form'd Iron to till the field, because when man Had tipt his arrows for the chase, he rush'd A murderer to the war?

> THALABA. What follows hence ?

LOBABA.

That nothing in itself is good or evil, But only in its use. Think you the man Praiseworthy, who by painful study learns The knowledge of all simples, and their power, Healing or harmful?

THALABA.

All men hold in honor The skilful Leech. From land to land he goes Safe in his privilege; the sword of war Spares him; Kings welcome him with costly gifts; And he who late had from the couch of pain Lifted a languid look to him for aid, Beholds him with glad eyes, and blesses him In his first thankful prayer

LOBABA.

Yet some there are Who to the purposes of wickedness Apply this knowledge, and from herbs distil Poison, to mix it in the trusted draught.

THALABA.

Allah shall cast them in the eternal fire Whose fuel is the cursed! there shall they Endure the ever-burning agony, Consuming still in flames, and still renew'd.

LOBABA. But is their knowledge therefore in itself Unlawful?

THALABA.

That were foolishness to think.

LOBABA.

Oh, what a glorious animal were Man, Knew he but his own powers, and, knowing, gave them

Room for their growth and spread ! The Horse obevs

His guiding will; the patient Camel bears him Over these wastes of sand; the Pigeon wafts

His bidding through the sky; --- and with these triumphs

He rests contented ! — with these ministers,— When he might awe the Elements, and make Myriads of Spirits serve him !

THALABA.

But as how? By a league with Hell, a covenant that binds The soul to utter death ¹

LOBABA.

Was Solomon Accurst of God? Yet to his talismans Obedient, o'er his throre the birds of Heaven, Their waving wings his : un-shield, fann'd around hin

The motionless air of noon; from place to place, As his will rein'd the viewless Element, He rode the Wind; the Genii rear'd his temple, And ceaselessly in fear while his dread eye O'erlook'd them, day and night pursued their toil So dreadful was his power.

THALABA.

But 'twas from Heaven His wisdom came ; God's special gift, — the guerdon Of early virtue

LOBABA.

Learn thou, O young man . God hath appointed wisdom the reward Of study! 'Tis a well of living waters, Whose inexhaustible bounties all might drink , But few dig deep enough. Son! thou art silent, -Perhaps I say too much, - perhaps offend thee.

THALABA.

Nay, I am young, and willingly, as becomes me, Hear the wise words of age.

LOBABA

ls it a crime

To mount the Horse, because, forsooth, thy feet Can serve thee for the journey? — Is it sin, Because the Hern soars upward in the sky Above the arrow's flight, to train the Falcon Whose beak shall pierce him there? The powers which Allah

Granted to man, were granted for his use : All knowledge that befits not human weakness Is placed beyond its reach. — They who repair To Babylon, and from the Angels learn

Mysterious wisdom, sin not in the deed

THALABA.

Know you these secrets?

LOBABA.

I? alas! my Son, My age just knows enough to understand

How little all its knowledge! Later years, Sacred to study, teach me to regret

Youth's unforceseing indolence, and hours That cannot be recall'd! Something I know The properties of herhs, and have sometimes Brought to the afflicted comfort and relief By the secrets of my art; under His blessing Without whom all had fail'd! Also of Gemus I have some knowledge, and the characters That tell beneath what aspect they were set.

THALABA.

Belike you can interpret then the graving Around this Ring !

LOBABA.

My sight is feeble, Son, And 1 must view it closer; let me try!

16.

The unsuspecting Youth Held forth his finger to draw off the spell. Even whilst he held it forth, There settled there a Wasp, And just above the Gem infix'd its dart;

BOOK 1V.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

All purple-swollen, the hot and painful flesh Rose round the tighten'd Ring. The baffled Sorcerer knew the hand of Heaven, And inwardly blasphemed.

17.

Ere long, Lobaba's heart, Fruitful in wiles, devised new stratagem. A mist arose at noon, Like the loose, hanging skirts Of some low cloud, that, by the breeze impell'd, Sweeps o'er the mountain side. With joy the thoughtless youth That grateful shadowing hail'd; For grateful was the shade, While through the silver-lighted haze, Guiding their way, appear'd the beamless Sun. But soon that beacon fail'd; A heavier mass of cloud, Impenetrably deep, Hung o'er the wilderness. "Knowest thou the track ?" quoth Thalaba, "Or should we pause, and wait the wind To scatter this bewildering fog? The Sorcerer answer'd him -"Now let us hold right on; for if we stray, The Sun to-morrow will direct our course." So saying, he toward the desert depths Misleads the youth deceived.

18.

Earlier the night came on, Nor moon, nor stars, were visible in heaven; And when at morn the youth unclosed his eyes, He knew not where to turn his face in prayer. "What shall we do?" Lobaba cried; "The lights of heaven have ceased To guide us on our way. Should we remain and wait More favorable skies, Soon would our food and water fail us here; And if we venture on, There are the dangers of the wilderness!"

19.

"Sure it were best proceed !" The chosen youth replies; "So haply we may reach some tent, or grove Of dates, or station'd tribe. But idly to remain, Were yielding effortless, and waiting death." The wily sorcerer willingly assents, And farther in the sands, Elate of heart, he leads the credulous youth.

20.

Still o'er the wilderness Settled the moveless mist. The timid Antelope, that heard their steps, Stood doubtful where to turn in that dim light; The Ostrich, blindly hastening, met them full. At night, again in hope, Young Thalaba lay down; The morning came, and not one guiding ray Through the thick mist was visible, The same deep moveless mist that mantled all.

21.

Oh for the Vulture's scream, Who haunts for prey the abode of human-kind Oh for the Plover's pleasant cry To tell of water near ! Oh for the Camel-driver's song ! For now the water-skin grows light, Though of the draught, more eagerly desired, Imperious prudence took with sparing thirst. Oft from the third night's broken sleep, As in his dreams he heard The sound of rushing winds, Started the anxious youth, and look'd abroad In vain ! for still the deadly calm endured. Another day pass'd on; The water-skin was drain'd; But then one hope arrived, For there was motion in the air ! The sound of the wind arose anon, That seatter'd the thick mist. And lo! at length the lovely face of Heaven!

22.

Alas! a wretched scene Was open'd on their view. They look'd around; no wells were near, No tent, no human aid! Flat on the Camel lay the water-skin, And their dumb servant difficultly now, Over hot sands and under the hot sun, Dragg'd on with patient pain 23.

But, oh, the joy ! the blessed sight ! When in that burning waste the Travellers Saw a green meadow, fair with flowers besprent, Azure and yellow, like the beautiful fields Of England, when amid the growing grass The blue-bell bends, the golden king-cup shines, And the sweet cowslip scents the genial air, In the merry month of May ! Oh, joy ! the Travellers Gaze on each other with hope-brighten'd eyes, For sure through that green meadow flows The living stream ! And lo ! their famish'd beast

Sees the restoring sight ! Hope gives his feeble limbs a sudden strength ;

He hurries on !-

24

The herbs so fair to eye Were Senna, and the Gentian's blossom blue, And kindred plants, that with unwater'd root Fed in the burning sand, whose bitter leaves Even frantic Famine loathed.

25.

In uncommunicating misery Silent they stood. At length Lobaba said, "Son, we must slay the Camel, or we die For lack of water! thy young hand is firm,- Draw forth the knife and pierce him!" Wretch accurst!

Who that beheld thy venerable face, Thy features stiff with suffering, the dry lips, The feverish eyes, could deem that all within Was magic ease, and featlessness secure, And wiles of hellish import? The young man Pansed with reluctant pity; but he saw His comrade's red and painful countenance, And his own burning breath came short and quick,

And at his feet the grasping beast Lies, over-worn with want.

26.

Then from his girdle Thalaba took the knife With stern compassion, and from side to side Across the Camel's throat Drew deep the crooked blade. Servant of man, that merciful deed Forever ends thy suffering; but what doom Waits thy deliverer? "Little will thy death Avail us!" thought the youth, As in the water-skin he pour'd The Camel's hoarded draught; It gave a scant supply, The poor allowance of one prudent day.

Son of Hodeirah, though thy steady soul Despair'd not, firm in faith, Yet not the less did suffering nature feel Its pangs and trials. Long their craving thirst Struggled with fear, by fear itself inflamed; But drop by drop, that poor, That last supply is drain'd. Still the same burning sun! no cloud in heaven! The hot air quivers, and the sultry mist Floats o'er the desert, with a show Of distant waters, mocking their distress.

The youth's parch'd lips were black, His tongue was dry and rough, His eyeballs red with heat. Lobaba gazed on him with looks That seem'd to speak of pity, and he said, "Let me behold thy Ring; It may have virtue that can save us yet!" With that he took his hand, And view'd the writing close, Then cried with sudden joy, "It is a stone that whoso bears, The Genii must obey! Now raise thy voice, my Son, And bid them in His name that here is written Preserve us in our need."

29.

"Nay!" answer'd Thalaba; "Shall I distrust the providence of God? Is it not He must save? If Allah wills it not, Vain were the Geuii's aid."

30.

Whilst he spake, Lobaba's eye, Upon the distance fix'd, Attended not his speech. Its fearful meaning drew The looks of Thalaba; Columns of sand came moving on; Red in the burning ray, Like obelisks of fire, They rush'd hefore the driving wind. Vain were all thoughts of flight! They had not hoped escapc, Could they have back'd the Dromedary tnen, Who, in his rapid race, Gives to the tranquil air a drowning force.

31.

High — high in heaven upcurl'd The dreadful sand-spouts moved; Swift as the whirlwind that impell'd their way They came toward the travellers! The old Magician shriek'd, And lo! the foremost bursts, Before the whirlwind's force, Scattering afar a burning shower of sand. "Now by the virtue of the Ring, Save us!" Lobaba cried, "While yet thou hast the power, Save us! O save us! now!" The youth made no reply, Gazing in awful wonder on the scene.

32.

"Why dost thou wait?" the Old Man exclaim'd; "If Allah and the Prophet will not save, Call on the Powers that will!"

33.

"Ha! do I know thee, Infidel accurst?" Exclaim'd the awaken'd youth. "And thou hast led me hither, Child of Sin" That fear might make me sell My sonl to endless death!"

34.

"Fool that thon art !" Lobaba cried, "Call upon Him whose name Thy charmed signet bears, Or die the death thy foolishness deserves !"

35.

"Servant of Hell! die thou!" quoth Thalaba. And leaning on his bow, He fitted the loose string, And laid the arrow in its resting-place. "Bow of my Father, do thy duty now!" He drew the arrow to its point; True to his eye it fled, And full upon the breast It smote the Sorcerer. Astonish'd Thalaba beheld The blunted point recoil.

> 36. A proud and bitter smile Wrinkled Lobaba's cheek.

BOOK IV.

"Try once again thine earthly arms!" he cried. | planet Venus, to that which says the planet Venus descended "Rash Boy! the Power I serve Abandons not his votaries. It is for Allah's wretched slaves, like thou, To serve a master, who in the hour of need Forsakes them to their fate ! I leave thee ! "- and he shook his staff, and call'd The Chariot of his charms.

37.

Swift as the viewless wind, Self-moved, the Chariot came ; The Soreerer mounts the seat. "Yet once more weigh thy danger!" he resumed; "Ascend the ear with me, And with the speed of thought We pass the desert bounds." The indignant youth vouelsafed not to reply ; And lo! the magic car begins its course!

38.

Hark ! hark ! - he shrieks - Lobaba shrieks ! What, wretch, and hast thou raised The rushing terrors of the Wilderness To fall on thine own head? Death ! death ! inevitable death ! Driven by the breath of God, A column of the Desert met his way.

NOTES TO BOOK IV.

How great our fathers were, how little wc. - 9, p. 256.

The Mussulmans are immutably prepossessed, that as the Earth approaches its dissolution, its sons and daughters gradunlly decrease in their dimensions. As for Dagjial, they say he will find the race of mankind dwindled into such diminutive pigmies, that their habitations in cities, and all the best towns, will be of no other fabric than the shoes and slippers made in these present ages, placed in rank and file, in scemly and regular order ; allowing one pair for two round families. - Morgan's Hist. of Algiers.

The Cody then asked me, "If I knew when Hagiuge was to come ?" "I have no wish to know any thing about him," said I; "I hope those days are far off, and will not heppen in my time." "What do your books say concerning him?" says he, affecting a look of great wisdom. "Do they agree with ours ?" "I don't know that," said I, " till I hear what is written in your books." " Hagiuge Magiuge," says he, " are little people not so big as bees, or like the zimb, or fly of Sennaar, that came in great swarms out of the earth, ay, in multitudes that cannot be counted ; two of their chiefs are to ride upon an ass, and every hair of that ass is to be a pipe, and every pipe is to play a different kind of music, and all that hear and follow them are to he carried to hell." "I know them not," said I; "and in the name of the Lord, I fear them not, were they twice as little as you say they are, and twice as numerous. I trust in God I shall never be so fond of music as to go to hell after an ess, for all the tunes that he or they can play." - Bruce.

These very little people, according to Thevenet, are to he great drinkers, and will drink the sea dry.

In the mild lustre, &c. - 9, p. 256.

The story of Haruth and Maruth, as in the Poem, may be found in D'Herbelot, and in Sale's notes to the Koran. Of the different accounts, I have preferred that which makes Zohara originally a woman, and metamorphoses her into the as Zohara to tempt the Angels.

The Arabians have so childish a love of rhyme, that when two names are usually coupled, they make them jingle, as in the case of Haruth and Maruth. Thus they call Cain and Abel, Abel and Kabel. 1 am informed that the Koran is crowded with rhymes, more particularly at the conclusion of the chapters.

> A previous price, the knowledge of the name Of God. --9, p. 256.

The Ism-Ablah - The Science of the Name of God.

They pretend that God is the lock of this science, and Mahommed the key; that consequently none but Mahommedans can attain it; that it discovers what passes in distant countries; that it familiarizes the possessors with the Genii, who are at the command of the initiated, and who instruct them; that it places the winds and the seasons at their disposal; that it heals the bite of serpents, the lame, the maimed, and the hlind. They say, that some of their greatest Saints, such as Abdulkadir, Cheilani of Bagdad, and Ibn Alwan, who resided in the south of Yemen, were so far advanced in this science by their devotion, that they said their prayers every noon in the Kuba of Mecca, and were not absent from their own houses any other part of the day. A merchant of Mecca, who had learnt it in all its forms from Mahommed el Dsjanådsenji, (at present so famous in that city,) pretended that he himself, heing in danger of perishing at sea, had fastened a billet to the mast, with the usual ceremonies, and that immediately the tempest ceased. He showed me, at Bomhay, but at a distance, a book which contained all sorts of figures and mathematical tables, with instructions how to arrange the billets, and the appropriate prayers for every circumstance. But he would neither suffer me to touch the book, nor copy the title.

There are some Mahommedans who shut themselves up in a dark place without eating and drinking for a long time, and there with a loud voice repeat certain short prayers till they faint. When they recover, they pretend to have seen not only a crowd of spirits, but God himself, and even the Devil. But the true initiated in the Ism-Allah do not seek these visions. The secret of discovering hidden treasures belongs also, if I mistake not, to the Ism-Allah. - Niebuhr.

Huge as the giant race of elder times. - 9, p. 256.

One of the Arahs, whom we saw from afar, and who was mounted upon a camel, seemed higher than a tower, and to be moving in the air ; at first this was to me a strange appearance; however, it was only the effect of refraction; the Camel, which the Arab was upon, touching the ground like all others. There was nothing then extraordinary in this phenomenon, and I afterwards saw many appearances exactly similar in the dry countries. - Niebuhr.

"They surprised you, not indeed by a sudden assault; but they advanced, and the sultry vapor of noon, through which you saw them, increased their magnitude,"- Moallakat. Poem of Hareth.

So in his loosen'd cloak

The Old Man wrapt himself. - 10, p. 257.

One of these Hykes is usually six yards long and five or six feet broad, serving the Arab for a complete dress in the day, and for his bed and covering in the night. It is a loose but troublesome kind of garment, being frequently disconcerted and falling upon the ground, so that the person who wears it is every moment obliged to tuck it up, and fold it anew about his body. This shows the great use there is for a girdle in attending any active employment, and, in consequence thereof, the force of the Scripture injunction alluding thereunto, of having our loins girded. The method of wearing these garments, with the use they are at other times put to, in serving for coverlets to their beds, should induce us to take the finer sort of them, at least, such as are worn by the ladies and persons of distinction, to be the prplus of the ancients. It is very probable likewise, that the ouse folding garment (the Tuga I take it to be) of the Romans was of this kind ; for if the drapery of their statues is to instruct us, this is actually no other than what the Arabs appeur in, when they are folded up in their Hykes. Instead of the fibula, they join together, with thread or a wooden bodkin, the two upper corners of this garment, which being first placed over one of their shoulders, they fold the rest of it afterwards round their bodies. - Shaw.

The employment of the women is to prepare their wool, spin, and weave in looms hung lengthways in their tents. Those looms are formed by a list of an oll and a half long, to which the threads of the warp are fixed at one end, and at the other on a roller of equal length ; the weight of which, being suspended, keeps them stretched. The threads of the warp are so hung as to be readily intersected. Instead of sbuttles, the women pass the thread of the woof through the warp with their fingers, and with an iron comb, baving a handle, press the woof to give a body to their cloth. Each piece, of about five ells long, and an ell and a half wide, is called a haick ; it receives neither dressing, milling, nor dyeing, but is immediately fit for use. It is the constant dress of the Moors of the country, is without seam, and incapable of varying, according to the caprices of fashion : when dirty, it is washed. The Moor is wrapped up in it day and night; and this haick is the living model of the drapery of the ancients. - Chemier.

If thon at all take thy neighbor's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the Sun goeth down.

For that is his covering only ; it is his raiment for his skin : wherein shall he sleep ? - Exodus, xxii. 26, 27.

Consuming still in flames, and still renew'd. - 15, p. 258.

Fear the fire, whose fuel is men and stones prepared for the unbelievers. - Koran, Chap. 2.

Verily, those who disbelieve our signs, we will surely cast to be broiled in hell-fire ; so often as their skins shall be well burned, we will give them other skins in exchange, that they may take the sharper torment. - Koran, Chap. 4.

Their waving wings his sun-shield. - 15, p. 258.

The Arabians attribute to Solomon a perpetual ennity and warfare egainst wicked Genii and Giants ; on the subject of They his wonder-working Ring, their tales are innumerable. have even invented a whole race of Pre-Adamite Solomons, who, according to them, governed the world successively, to the number of 40, or, as others affirm, as many as 72. All these made the evil Genii their unwilling drudges. - D'Herbelot.

Anchieta was going in a canoe to the mouth of the river Aldea, a delightful spot, surrounded with mango-trees, and usually abounding with birds called goarazes, that breed there. These birds are about the size of u hen, their color a rich purple inclining to red. They are white when hatched, and soon become black; but as they grow larger, lose that color, and take this rich and beautiful purple. Our navigators had reached the place, but when they should have enjoyed the fine prospect which delights all who pass it, the sun was excessively hot; and this eye-pleasure was purchased dearly, when the whole body was in a profuse perspiration, and the rowers were in a fever. Their distress called upon Joseph, and the remedy was no new one to him. He saw three or four of these birds perched upon a mango, and calling to them in the Brazilian lauguage, which the rowers understood, said, Go you, call your companions, and come to shade these hot servants of the Lord. The hirds stretched out their necks as if in obedience, and away they went to seek for others, and in a short time they came flying in the shape of an elegant cloud, and they shadowed the canoe a good league out to sea, till the fresh sea-breeze sprung up. Then he told them they might go about their husiness; and they separated with a clamor of rude, but joyful sounds, which were only understood by the Author of Nature, who created them. This was a greater miracle than that of the cloud with which God defended his chosen people in the wilderness from the heat of the sun, inasmuch as it was a more elegant and fanciful parasol. Acho que fou maior portento este que o da nuvem, com que Deos defendeo no deserto a seu Povo mimoso do calor do sol, tanto quanto mais tem de gracioso et aprusivel este chapeo de sol, que aquelle.

This was one of Anchieta's common miracles. Biderman has an epigram upon the subject, quoted in the Jesuit's Life.

> Hesperii peterent cum barbara littora myste. Et socis æger pluribus unus erat, Ille suum extincto, Phæbi quiu lampadis æstu Occultoque uri, questus ab igne capat ; Quasiit in prora, si quam durct angulus umbram, Nulla scd in prora partibus umbra fuit. Quasht in puppi, nihil umbra puppis habebat, Samma sed urebant solis, et ima faces. His capiens Anchieta malis succurrere, solam Acra per medium tendere vidit avem. Vidit, ei socias, ait, i, quare cohortes, Aliger atque redux cum legione veni. Dieta probavit avis, celerique cutatior Euro, Cognatum properat, quærere jussa gregem, Mulleque mox sociis comitata revertitur alis, Mille sequi visæ, mille præire ducem. Mille supra, et totidem, jurtaque, infraque volabant, Omnis ad Anchieta turba rocata preces. Et simul expansis fucta testudine pennis, Desuper in tostas incubuere rates. Et procul inde diem, et lucem pepulere diei, Debile dum mollis conderct umbra caput. Scilicet hac fierent, ut canopea repente Anchieta artifices esse coegit necs.

Vida do Veneravel Padre Joseph de Anchieta, da Companhia de Jesu, Taumatargo do Noro Mando, na Provincia do Brasil. composta pello P. Simam de Vasconcellos, da mesma Companhia - Lisboa. 1672.

The Jesuits probably stole this miracle from the Arabian story of Solomon ; not that they are by any means deficient in invention; but they cannot be suspected of ignorance.

In that rare book, the Margarita Philosophica Basilia, 1535, is an account of a parasol more convenient, though not in so elegant a taste, as that of the wonder-working Anchieta. There is said to be a nation of one-legged men; and one of these unipeds is represented in a print, lying on his back, under the shade of his own great foot.

The most curious account of Solomon's wisdom is in Du Bartas.

Hee knowes -

Whether the Heaven's sweet-sweating kisse appear To he Pearls parent, and the Oysters pheer, And wbether, dusk, it makes them dim withall, Cleer breeds the cleer, and stormy brings the pale ; Whether from sea the amber-greece he sent, Or be some fishes pleasant excrement; He knowes why the Earth's immoveable and round, The lees of Nature, centre of the mound ; Hee knows her measure ; and hee knows beside How Coloquintida (duely apply'd) Within the darknesse of the Conduit-pipes, Amid the winding of our inward tripes, Can so discreetly the white humour take.

Sylvester's Du Bartas.

He rode the wind, &c. - 15, p 258.

"And we made the wind * subject unto Solomon ; it blew in the morning for a month, and in the evening for a month. And we made a fountain of molten brass to flow | for him. And some of the Genii were obliged to work in his presence, by the will of his Lord; and whoever of them turned aside from our command, we will cause him to taste the pain of

. They say that he had a carpet of green silk, on which his throne was placed, being of a prodigious length and breadth, and sufficient for all his forces to stand on, the men placing themselves on his right hand, and the spirits on his left; and that when all were in order, the wind, at his command, took up the carpet and transported it, with all that were upon it, and flowed three days in a month.

And when we had decreed that Solomon should die, nothing discovered his death usto them, except the creeping thing of the earth, which gnawed his staff.

Oh for the Plover's pleasant cry. - 21, p. 259.

In places where there was water, we found a beautiful variety of the plover .- Niebuhr.

Oh for the Camel-driver's song. - 21, p 259.

The camels of the hot countries are not fastened one to the tail of the other, as in cold climates, but suffered to go at their will, like herds of cows. The camel-driver follows singing, and from time to time, giving a suddee whistle. The londer he sings and whistles, the faster the camels go; and they stop as soon as he ceases to sing. The camel drivers, to relieve each other, sing alternately; and when they wish their beasts to browse for half on hour on what they can find, they amuse themselves by smoking a pipe ; after which, beginning again to sing, the camels immediately proceed. - Tavernier.

Even.frantic Famine loathed. - 24, p. 259.

At four in the afternoon, we had an unexpected entertainment, which filled our hearts with a very short-lived joy. The whole plais before us seemed thick covered with green grass and yellow daisies. We advanced to the place with as much speed as our lame condition would suffer us; but how terrible was our disappointment, when we found the whole of that verdure to consist in senna and coloquintida, the most nauseous of plants, and the most incapable of being substituted as food for man or beast ! - Bruce,

Then from his girdle Thalaba took the knife. - 26, p. 260.

The girdles of these people are usually of worsted, very artfully weven into a variety of figures, and made to wrap

. We will cause him to taste the pain of hell-fire ; or, as some expound the words, we caused him to taste the pain of burning; by which they understand the correction the disobedient Genii received at the hands of the Angel set over them, who whipped them with a whip of fire.

† Statues. Some suppose these were images of the Angels and Prophets, aud that the making of them was not forbidden, or else that they were not such images as were forbidden by the law. Some say these Spirits made him two fions, which were placed at the foot of his throne, and two eagles, which were set above it; and that when he mounted it, the lions stretched out their paws, and when he sat down, the eagles shaded him with their wings.

‡ Dishes like fish-ponds; being so monstrously large, that a thousand men night cat out of each of them at once.

§ And caldrons standing firm on their trevets. - These caldrons, they ay, were cut out of the mountains of Yeman, and were so vastly big, that they could not be moved ; and people went up to them by steps.

Nothing discovered his death but the creeping thing of the earth which gnawed his staff. - The commentators, to explain this passage, tell us, that David, having laid the foundations of the temple of Jerus which was to be in fieu of the tabernacle of Moses, when he died, left it to be finished by his son Solomon, who employed the Genii in the work: that Solomon, before the edifice was completed, perceiving his end drew uigh, begged of God that his death might be concealed from the Genii, bil they had entirely finished it; that God therefore so ordered it, that Solomon died as he stood at his prayers, leaning on his staff, which supported the body in that posture a full year; and the Genii, supposing hi to be alive, continued their work during that term; at the expiration whereof, the temple being perfectly completed, a worm, which had gotten into the staff, are it through, and the corpse fell to the ground, and discovered the king's death.

Possibly this fable of the temple being built by Genil, and not by men, might take its rise from what is mentioned in Scripture, that the house was built of stone, made ready before it was brought thither; so that there was neither hammer nor axe, nor tool of iron heard in the house while it was building.

hell-fire.* They made for him whatever he pleased, of | several times about their bodies; one end of them, by being doubled and sewn along the edges, serves them for a purse, agreeable to the acceptation of the word $Z\omega\nu\eta$ in the Holy Scriptures : the Turks and Arabs make a further use of their girdles, by fixing their knives and poniards in them; whilst the Hojias, i. e. the writers and secretaries, are distinguished hy having an inkhern, the badge of their office, suspended in the like situation. - Shaw.

Across the Camel's throat. - 26, p. 260.

On the road we passed the skeleton of a camel, which now and then happens in the desert. These are poor creatures that have perished with futigue; for those which are killed for the sustenance of the Arabs, are carried away, bones and all together. Of the hides are made the soles of the slippers which are worn in Egypt, without any dressing but what the sun can give them. The circumstances of this animal's death, when his strength fails him on the road, have something in them affecting to humanity. Such are his patience and perseverance, that he pursues his journey without flagging, as long as he has power to support its weight ; and such are his fortitude and spirit, that he will never give out, until nature sinks beneath the complicated ills which press upon him. Then, and then only, will he resign his burden and body to the ground. Nor stripes, nor caresses, nor food, nor rest, will make him rise again ! His vigor is exhausted, and life ebbs out apace. This the Arabs are very sensible of, and kindly plunge a sword into the breast of the dying beast, to shorten his pangs. Even the Arab feels remorse when he commits this deed; his hardened heart is moved at the loss of a faithful servant. - Eyles Irwin.

In the Monthly Magazine for January, 1800, is a letter from Professor Heering recommending the introduction of these animals at the Cape ; but the camel is made only for level countries. "The animal is very ill qualified to travel upon the snow or wet ground: the breadth in which they carry their legs, when they slip, often occasions their splitting themselves ; so that when they fall with great burdens, they seldom rise egain."- Jonas Hanway.

The African Arabs say, if one should put the question, Which is hest for you, O Camel, to go up hill or down ? he wil. make unswer, God's curse light on 'em both, wheresoever they are to be met with .- Morgan's Hist. of Algiers.

No creature seems so peculiarly fitted to the climate in which it exists. We cannot doubt the nature of the one has been adapted to that of the other by some disposing intelligence. Designing the camel to dwell in a country where he can find little nourishment, nature has been sparing of her materials in the whole of his formation. She has not bestowed apon him the plump fleshiness of the ox, horse, or elephant; but limiting herself to what is strictly necessary, she has given him a small head without ears, at the end of a long neck without flesh. She has taken from his legs and thighs every muscle not immediately requisite for motion; and, in short, has bestowed on his withered body only the vessels and tendons necessary to connect his frame together. She has furnished him with a strong jaw, that he may grind the hardest aliments ; but lest he should consume too much, she has contracted his stomach, and obliged him to chew the end. She has lined his foot with a lump of flesh, which, sliding in the mud, and being no way adapted for climbing, fits him only for a dry, level, and sandy soil, like that of Arabia. She has evidently destined him likewise to slavery by refusing him every sort of defence against his enemies. Destitute of the horns of the bull, the hours of the horse, the tooth of the elephant, and the swiftness of the stag, how can the camel resist or avoid the attacks of the lion, the tiger, or even the wolf? To preserve the species, therefore, nature has concealed him in the depths of the vast deserts, where the want of vegetables can attract no game, and whence the want of game repels every voracious animal. Tyranny must have expelled man from the habitable parts of the earth, before the camel could have lost his liberty. Become domestic, he has rendered habitable the most barren soil the world contains. He alone supplies all his master's wants. The milk of the camel nourishes thr family of the Arab, under the various forms of curds, cheese, and butter; and they often feed upon his flesh. Slippers and barness are made of his skin, and tents and clothing of his hair. Heavy burdeus are transported by his means, and when the carth denies forage to the horse, so valuable to the Bedouin, the she-camel supplies that deficiency by her milk, at no other cost, for so many advantages, than a few stalks of hrambles or wormwood, and pounded date-kernels. So great is the importance of the camel to the desert, that were it deprived of that useful animal, it must infallably lose every inhabitant. — Folnen.

Of distant waters, &c. - 27, p. 260.

Where any parts of these deserts is sandy and level, the horizon is as fit for astronomical observations as the sea, and appears, at a small distance, to be no less a collection of water. It was likewise equally surprising to observe, in what an extraordinary manner every object appeared to be magnified within it; insomuch that a shrub seemed as big as a tree, and a flock of Achbobbas might he mistaken for a caravan of camels. This seeming collection of water always advances about a quarter of a mile before us, whilst the intermediate space appears to be in one continued glow, occasioned by the quivering, undulating motion of that quick succession of vapors and exhalations, which are extracted by the powerful influence of the sun, — Shae.

In the Bahar Danush is a metaphor drawn from this optical deception. "It is the ancient custom of fortune, and time has long established the habit, that she at first bewilders the thirsty travellers in the path of desire, by the misty vapors of disappointment; but when their distress and misery has reached extremity, suddenly relieving them from the dark windings of confusion and error, she conducts them to the fountains of enjoyment."

⁶ The burning heat of the sun was reflected with double violence from the hot sand, and the distant ridges of the hills, seen through the ascending vapors, seemed to wave and fluctuate like the unsettled sen? — Mango Park.

"I shake the lash over my camel, and she quickens her pace, while the sultry vapor rolls in waves over the burning cliffs,"-- Moallakat, Poem of Tarafa.

His tongue was dry and rough. - 28, p. 260.

Perhaps no traveller but Mr. Park ever survived to relate similar sufferings.

"I pushed on as fast ns possible, in bopes of reaching some watering-place in the course of the night. My thirst was, by this time, become insufferable; my mouth was parched and inflamed; a sudden dimness would frequently come over my eyes, with other symptoms of finiting; and my horse being very much fatigued, I began seriously to apprehend that I should perish of thirst. To relieve the barning pain in my mouth and threat, I chewed the leaves of different shrubs, but found them all bitter, and of no service to me.

"A little before sunset, having reached the top of a gentle rising, I climbed a high tree, from the topmost branches of which I cast a melancholy look over the barren wilderness, but without discovering the most distant trace of a human dwelling. The same dismal uniformity of shrubs and sand every where presented itself, and the horizon was as level and uninterrupted as that of the sea.

"Descending from the tree, I found my horse devouring the stubble and brushwood with great avidity ; and us I was now too faint to attempt walking, and my horse too much fatigued to carry me, I thought it but an act of humanity, and perhaps the last I should even have it in my power to perform, to take off his bridle, and let him shift for himself; in doing which I was suddenly affected with sickness and giddiness, and falling upon the sand, felt as if the bour of death was fast approaching. Here then, thought I, after a short, hut ineffectual straggle, terminate all my hopes of being useful in my day and generation; bere must the short span of my life come to an end. $-\mathbf{I}$ cast (as I believed) a last look on the surrounding scene, and whilst I reflected on the awful change that was about to take place, this world, with its enjoyments, seemed to vanish from my recollection. Nature, however, at length, resumed its functions ; and on recovering may senses, I found myself stretched upon the sand, with the hridle still in my hand, and the sun just sinking behind the trees. I now summoned all my resolution, and determined to make another effort to prolong my existence. And as the evening was somewhat cool, I resolved to travel as far as my limbs would carry me, in hopes of reaching (my only resource) a wateringplace. With this view I put the bridle on my horse, and driving him before me, went slowly along for about an hour, when I perceived some lightning from the north-east - a most delightful sight, for it promised rain. The darkness and lightning increased very rapidly; and in less than an hour I heard the wind roaring among the bushes. I had already opened my mouth to receive the refreshing drops which I expected, but I was instantly covered with a cloud of sand, driven with such force by the wind, as to give a very disagreeable sensation to my face and arms, and I was obliged to mount my horse and stop under a bush to prevent being sufficiented. - The sand continued to fly in amazing quantities, for near an hour, after which I again set forward, and travelled with difficulty until ten o'clock. About this time, I was agreeably surprised hy some very vivid flashes of lightning, followed by a few heavy drops of rain. In a little time, the sand ceased to fly, and I alighted, and spread out all my clean clothes to collect the rain, which at length I saw would certainly fall. - For more than an bour it rained plentifully, and I quenched my thirst by wringing and sucking my clothes." - Park's Travels in the Interior of Africa.

Could they have back'd the Dromedary, &c. - 30, p. 260

All the time I was in Barbary, I could never get sight of above three or four Dromedaries. These the Arabs call Mehera ; the singular is Meheri. They are of several sorts and degrees of value, some worth many common Camels, others scarce worth two or three. To look on, they seem little different from the rest of that species, only I think the excrescence on a Dromedary's back is somewhat less than that of a Camel. What is reported of their sleeping, or rather seeming scarce alive, for some time after coming into this world, is no fable. The longer they lie so, the more excellent they prove in their kind, and consequently of higher price and esteem. None lie in that trance more than ten days and nights. Those that do are pretty rare, and are called Aashari, from Aashara, which signifies ten, in Arabic. I saw one such, perfectly white all over, belonging to Lella Oumane, Princess of that noble Arab Neja, named Heyl ben Ali, I spoke of, and upon which she put a very great value, never sending it abroad but upon some extraordinary occasion, when the greatest expedition was required ; having others, inferior in swiftness, for more ordinary messages. They say that one of these Aasharies will, in one night, and through a level country, traverse as much ground as any single horse can perform in ten, which is no exaggeration of the matter, since many have affirmed to me, that it makes nothing of holding its rapid pace, which is a most violent hard trot, for four-and-twenty hours upon a stretch, without showing the least sign of weariness, or inclination to hait, and that having then swallowed a ball or two of a sort of paste, made up of barley-meal, and may be a little powder of dates among it, with a howl of water, or Camel's milk, if to be had, and which the courier seldom forgets to be provided with, in skins, as well for the sustenance of himself as of his Pegasus, the indefatigable animal will seem as fresh as at first setting out, and ready to continue running at the same scarce credible rate, for as many hours longer, and so on from one extremity of the African Deserts to the other, provided its rider could hold out without sleep or other refreshment. This has been averred to me, by, I believe, more than a thousand Arabs and Moors, all agreeing in every particular.

I happened to be, once in particular, at the tent of that Princess, with Ali ben Mahamoud, the Bey, or Vice-Roy of the Algerine Eastern Province, when he went thither to celebrate his nuptials with Ambarca, her only daughter, if I mistake not. Among other cutertainments she gave her guestag, the favorite white Dromedary was bronght forth, ready saddied and bridled. I say bridled, because the thong, which serves instead of a bridle, was put through the hole purposely [made in the gristle of the creature's nose. The Arab appointed to mount, was straitly laced, from the very leins quite to his throat, in a strong leathern jacket, they never riding these animals any otherwise accoutred ; so impetuously violent are the concussions the rider undergoes, during that rapid motion, that were he to be loose, I much question whether a few hours such unintermitting agitation would not endanger the hursting of some of his entrails; and this thn Arabs scruple not to acknowledge. We were to be diverted with seeing this fine Aashari ron against some of the swiftest barbs in the whole Neja, which is famed for having good ones, of the true Libyan breed, shaped like greyhounds, and which will sometimes run down an ostrich ; which few of the very best can pretend to do, especially upon a hard ground, perfectly level. We all started like racers, and for the first spirt, most of the best mounted among us kept up pretty well, but our grass-fed horses soon flagged : several of the Libyan and Numidian runners held pace till we, who still followed upon a good round hand-gallop, could no longer discorn them, and then gave out ; as we were told after their return. When the Dromedary had been out of our sight about an half an hour, we again espied it flying towards us with an amazing velocity, and in a very few moments was among us, and seemingly nothing concerned ; while the horses and mares were all in a foam, and scarce able to breathe, as was, likewise, a fleet, tall greybound bitch, of the young Princes, who had followed and kept pace the whole time, and was no sooner get back to us, but lay down panting as if ready to expire. I cannot tell how many miles we went, but we were near three hours in coming leisurely hack to the tents, yet made no stop in the way. The young Prince Hamet ben al Guydem ben Sakhari, and his younger brother Messoud, teld their new brother-in law, that they defied all the potentates of Africa to show him such an Aashari; and the Arab who rode it, challenged the Bey to lay his lady a wager of 1000 ducats, that he did not bring him an answer to a letter from the Prince of Wargela, in less than four days, though Leo Africanus, Marmol, and several others, assure us, that it is no less than forty Spanish leagues, of four miles each, south of Tuggart, to which place, upon another occasion, as I shall observe, we made six tedious days march from the neighborhood of Biscara, north of which we were then, at least thirty hours riding, if I remember rightly. However, the Boy, who was a native of Biscara, and consequently well acquainted with the Sahara, ourst not take him up. By all circumstances, and the description given us, besides what I know of the matter myself, it could not be much less than 400 miles, end as many back again, the fellow offered to ride, in so short a time ; nay, many other Arabs boldly proffered to venture all they were worth in the world, that he would perform it with all the ease imaginable. - Morgan's History of Algiers.

Chenier says, "The Dromedury can travel 60 leagues in a day; his motion is so rajid, that the rider is obliged to be girthed to the saddle, and to have a handkerchief before his month, to break the current of the wind." These accounts are probably much exaggerated.

"The royal couriers in Persia wear a white sash girled from the shoulders to their waist many times round their bodies, by which means they are enabled to ride for many days without great fatigue." — Hanway.

The dreadful sand-spouts moved. - 31, p. 260.

We were here at once surprised and terrified by a sight sorely the most magnificent in the world. In that vast expanse of descrit, from W. and to N. W. of us, we saw a number of prodigions pillars of sand at different distances, at times moving with great celerity, at others stalking with a majestic slowness; at intervals we thought they were coming in a very few moments to everwhelm us, and small quantities of sand did actually, mere than once, reach us. Again they would retreat so as to be almost out of sight, their tops reaching to the very clouds. There the tops often separated from the bodies, and these, once disjointed, dispersed in the air, and did not appear mere. Sometimes they were breken near the middle, as if struck with a large cannon-shot. About noon, they began to advace with considerable swiftness upon us, the wind being very strong at north. Eleven of them ranged alongside of us, about the distance of three miles. The greatest diameter of the largest appeared to me, at that distance, as if it would measure ten feet. They retired from us with a wind at S. E., leaving an impression upon my mind to which I can give no mane; though surely one ingredient in it was fear, with a considerable deal of wonder and astonishment. It was in vain to think of flying; the swiftest horse, or the fastest-sailing ship, could be of no use to carry us out of this danger; and the full persuasion of this rivetted me as if to the spot where I stood.

On the 15th, the same appearance of moving pillars of sand presented themselves to us, only they seemed to be more in number, and less in size. They came several times in a direction close upon us; that is, I believe, within less than two miles. They began immediately after sunrise, like a thick wood, and almest darkened the sun. His rays shining through them for near an hour, gave them an appearance of pillars of fire. Our people now became desperate; the Greeks shrieked out, and said it was the day of judgment. Ismael prenounced it to be hell, and the Tucorories that the world was on fire. — Bruce

THE FIFTH BOOK.

Thou hast girded me with strength anto the hattle ; thun hast subdued under me those that rose up against me. Psalm xviii, 39.

1.

WHEN Thalaba from adoration rose, The air was cool, the sky With welcome clouds o'ercast, Which soon came down in rain. He lifted up his fever'd face to heaven,

And bared his head, and stretch'd his hands To that delightful shower,

And felt the eoolness permeate every limb, Freshening his powers of life.

2.

A loud, quick panting! Thalaba looks up; He starts, and his instinctive hand Grasps the knife hilt; for elose beside A Tiger passes him. An indolent and languid eye The passing Tiger turn'd; His head was hanging down, His dry tongne lolling low, And the short panting of his breath Came through his hot, parch'd nostrils painfully The young Arabian knew The purport of his hurried pace, And following him in hope, Saw joyful from afar The Tiger stoop and drink.

3.

A desert Peliean had built her nest In that deep solitude ; And now, return'd from distant flight, Franght with the river-stream, Her load of water had disburden'd there Her young in the refreshing bath

Dipp'd down their callow heads,

Fill'd the swollen membrane from their plumeless throat Pendent, and bills yet soft; And buoyant with arch'd breast, Plied in unpractised stroke The oars of their broad feet. They, as the spotted prowler of the wild Laps the cool wave, around their mother erowd, And nestle underneath her outspread wings. The spotted prowler of the wild Lapp'd the cool wave, and satiate, from the nest, Guilless of blood, withdrew.

The mother-bird had moved not, But, cowering o'er her nestlings, Sate confident and fearless, And watch'd the wonted guest. But, when the human visitant approach'd, The alarmed Pelican, Retiring from that hostile shape, Gathers her young, and menaces with wings, And forward thrusts her threatening neck, Its feathers ruffling in her wrath, Bold with maternal fear. Thalaba drank, and in the water-skin Hoarded the precious element. Not all he took, but in the large nest left Store that sufficed for life; And journeying onward, blest the Carrier Bird, And blest, in thankfulness, Their common Father, provident for all.

5.

With strength renew'd, and confident in faith, The son of llodeirah proceeds; Till, after the long toil of many a day, At length Bagdad appear'd, The City of his search. He, hastening to the gate, Roams o'er the city with insatiate eyes; Its thousand dwellings, o'er whose level roofs Fair cupolas appear'd, and high-domed mosques, And pointed minarets, and cypress groves, Every where scatter'd in unwithering green.

-6.

Thou too art fallen, Bagdad! City of Peace, Thou too hast had thy day; And loathsome Ignorance and brute Servitude Pollute thy dwellings now, Erst for the Mighty and the Wise renown'd.

O yet illustrious for remember'd fame, — Thy founder the Victorious, — and the pomp Of Haronn, for whose name, by blood defiled, Yahia's, and the blameless Barmeeides',

Genius hath wrought salvation, — and the years When Science with the good Al-Maimon dwelt: So one day may the Crescent from thy Mosques Be pluck'd by Wisdom, when the enlighten'd arm

Of Europe conquers to redeem the East !

7.

Then Pomp and Pleasure dwelt within her walls; The Merchants of the East and of the West

Met in her arch'd Bazars; All day the active poor Shower'd a cool comfort o'er her thronging streets; Labor was busy in her looms; Through all her open gates Long troops of laden Camels lined the roads, And Tigris bore upon his tameless stream Armenian harvests to her multitudes.

But not in sumptuous Caravansary The adventurer idles there, Nor satiates wonder with her pomp and wealth; A long day's distance from the walls Stands ruined Babylon; The time of action is at hand; The hope that for so many a year Hath been his daily thought, his nightly dream, Stings to more restlessness. He loathes all lingering that delays the hour When, full of glory, from his quest return'd, He on the pillar of the Tent beloved Shall hang Hodeirah's sword.

9,

The many-colored domes Yet wore one dusky hue; The Cranes upon the Mosque Kept their night-clatter still; When through the gate the early Traveller past. And when at evening o'er the swampy plain The Bittern's boom came far, Distinct in darkness seen Above the low horizon's lingering light, Rose the near ruins of old Babylon.

10.

Once from her lofty walls the Charioteer Look'd down on swarming myriads; once she flung

Her arches o'er Euphrates' conquer'd tide, And through her brazen portals when she pour'd Her armies forth, the distant nations look'd As men who watch the thunder-cloud in fear, Lest it should burst above them. She was fallen, The Queen of cities, Babylon, was fallen! Low lay her bulwarks; the black Scorpion bask'd In the palaee courts; within the sanctuary The She-Wolf hid her whelps. Is yonder huge and shapeless heap, what once Hath been the aerial Gardens, height on height Rising like Media's monntains crown'd with wood, Work of imperial dotage? Where the fame Of Belus? Where the Golden Image now, Which, at the sound of dulcimer and lute, Cornet and sacbut, harp and psaltery, The Assyrian slaves adored? A labyrinth of ruins, Babylon Spreads o'er the blasted plain : The wandering Arab never sets his tent Within her walls; the Shepherd eyes afar Her evil towers, and devious drives his flock.

Alone unchanged, a free and bridgeless tide, Euphrates rolls along,

Eternal Nature's work.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

11.

Through the broken portal, Over weedy fragments, Thalaba went his way. Cautious he trod, and felt The dangerons ground before him with his bow. The Jaekal started at his steps; The Stork, alarm'd at sound of man, From her broad nest npon the old pillar top, Affrighted fled on flapping wings; The Adder, in her hannts disturb'd, Lanced at the intruding staff her arrowy tongue.

12.

Twilight and moonshine dimly mingling gave An awful light obscure, Evening not wholly elosed, The Moon still pale and faint; An awful light obscure, Broken by many a mass of blackest shade; Long column stretching dark through weeds and moss, Broad length of lofty wall, Whose windows lay in light, And of their former shape, low arch'd or square, Rude outline on the earth Figured, with long grass fringed.

13.

Reclined against a column's broken shaft, Unknowing whitherward to bend his way, He stood, and gazed around. The Ruins closed him in; It seem'd as if no foot of man For ages had intruded there.

14.

Soon at approaching step Startling, he turn'd and saw A Warrior in the moon-beam drawing near. Forward the Stranger came, And with a curious eye Perused the Arab youth 15.

"And who art thou," the Stranger cried, "That, at an hour like this, Wanderest in Babylon? A way-bewilder'd traveller, seekest thou The rninons shelter here? Or comest thou to hide The plunder of the night? Or hast thou spells to make These rnins, yawning from their rooted base, Diselose their secret wealth?'

16.

The youth replied, "Nor wandering traveller, Nor robber of the night, Nor skill'd in spells an 1. I seek the Angels here, Haruth and Maruth. Stranger, in thy turn, Why wanderest thou in Babylon, And who art thou, the questioner?"

17.

The man was fearless, and the temper'd pride Which toned the voice of Thalaba Displeased not him, himself of haughty heart Ileedless he answered, "Knowest thou Their cave of punishment?"

18.

THALABA. Vainly I seek it.

STRANGER. Art thou firm of foot To tread the ways of danger?

> THALABA. Point the path !

STRANGER.

Young Arab! if thou hast a heart ean beat Evenly in danger; if thy bowels yearn not With human fears at scenes where, undisgraced, The soldier, tried in battle, might look back And tremble, follow me!—for I am bound Into that cave of horrors.

19.

Thalaba

Gazed on his conrade : he was young, of port Stately and strong ; belike his face had pleased A woman's eye; but the youth read in it Unrestrain'd passions, the obdurate soul Bold in all evil daring ; and it taught, By Nature's irresistible instinet, doubt Well-timed and wary. Of himself assured, Fearless of man, and firm in faith, "Lead on!" cried Thalaba. Mohareb led the way ; And through the ruin'd streets, And through the farther gate, They pass'd in silence on.

20.

What sound is borne on the wind? Is it the storm that shakes The thousand oaks of the forest? But Thalaba's long locks Flow down his shoulders moveless, and the wind In his loose mantle raises not a fold. Is it the river's roar Dash'd down some rocky descent? Along the level plain Euphrates glides unheard. What sound disturbs the night, Loud as the summer forest in the storm, As the river that roars among rocks?

21.

And what the heavy clond That hangs upon the vale, Thick as the mist o'er a well-water'd plain, Settling at evening when the eooler air Lets its day-vapors fall; Black as the sulphur-cloud, That through Vesuvius, or from Heela's mouth, Rolls up, ascending from the infernal fires?

From Ait's bitumen-lake That heavy cloud ascends; That everlasting roar From where its gushing springs Boil their black billows up. Silent the Arabian youth, Along the verge of that wide lake, Follow'd Mohareb's way, Toward a ridge of rocks that bank'd its side, There, from a cave, with torrent force, And everlasting roar, The black bitumen roll'd. The moonlight lay upon the rocks; Their crags were visible, The shade of jutting cliffs, And where broad lichens whiten'd some smooth spot, And where the ivy hung Its flowing tresses down. A little way within the cave The moonlight fell, glossing the sable tide That gush'd tumultuous out. A little way it entered then the rock Arching its entrance, and the winding way, Darken'd the unseen depths.

23.

No eye of mortal man, If unenabled by enchanted spell, Had pierced those fearful depths; For mingling with the roar Of the portentous torrent, oft were heard Shrieks, and wild yells that scared The brooding Eagle from her midnight nest. The affrighted countrymen Call it the Mouth of Hell; And ever, when their way leads near, They hurry with averted eyes, And dropping their beads fast, Pronounce the Holy Name.

24.

There pausing at the eavern-mouth, Mohareb turn'd to Thalaba : "Now darest thou enter in ?" "Behold !" the youth replied, And leading in his turn the dangerous way, Set foot within the cave.

25.

"Stay, Madman!" eried his comrade "wouldst thou rush Headlong to certain death? Where are thine arms to meet The Keeper of the Passage?" A loud shriek, That shook along the windings of the cave, Scatter'd the youth's reply.

26.

Monareb, when the long rečchoing ceased, Exclaim'd, "Fate favor'd thee, Young Arab! when she wrote upon thy brow The meeting of to-night; Else surely had thy name This hour been blotted from the Book of Life'" 27.

So saying, from beneath His cloak a bag he drew : "Young Arab! thou art brave," he eried; "But thus to rush on danger unprepared As lions spring upon the hunter's spear, Is blind, brute courage. Zohak keeps the cave Against that Giant of primeval days: No force can win the passage." Thus he said, And from his wallet drew a human hand, Shrivell'd, and dry, and black; And fitting, as he spake, A taper in its hold, Pursued : "A murderer on the stake had died; I drove the Vulture from his limbs, and lopp'd The hand that did the murder, and drew up The tendon-strings to close its grasp, And in the sun and wind Parch'd it, nine weeks exposed. The Taper, - but not here the place to impart, Nor hast thou undergone the rites That fit thee to partake the mystery. Look ! it burns clear, but with the air around Its dead ingredients mingle deathiness. This when the Keeper of the Cave shall feel, -Maugre the doom of Heaven, --The salutary spell Shall lull his penal agony to sleep, And leave the passage free."

Thalaba answer'd not. Nor was there time for answer now, For lo! Mohareb leads, And o'er the vanited cave, Trembles the accursed taper's feeble light. There, where the narrowing chasm Rose loftier in the hill, Stood Zohak, wretched man, condemn'd to keep His Cave of punishment. His was the frequent scream Which when, far off, the prowling Jackal heard, He howl'd in terror back : For from his shoulders grew Two snakes of monster size, Which ever at his head Aim'd their rapacious teeth, To satiate raving hunger with his brain. He, in the eternal conflict, oft would seize Their swelling necks, and in his giant grasp Bruise them, and rend their flesh with bloody nails, And howl for agony,

Feeling the pangs he gave; for of himself Co-sentient and inseparable parts, The snaky torturers grew.

29.

To him approaching now, Mohareb held the wither'd arm, The taper of enchanted power. The unhallow'd spell, in hand unholy held, Then minister'd to mercy ; heavily The wretch's eyelids closed ; And welcome and unfelt,

Like the release of death, A sudden sleep surprised his vital powers.

30.

Yet though along the cave relax'd Lay Zohak's giant limbs, The twin-born serpents kept the narrow pass, Kindled their fiery eyes, Darted their tongues of terror, and roll'd out Their undulating length, Like the long streamers of some gallant ship Buoy'd on the wavy air, Still struggling to flow on, and still withheld. The scent of living flesh Inflamed their appetite.

31.

Prepared for all the perils of the cave, Mohareb came. He from his wallet drew Two human heads, yet warm. O hard of heart! whom not the visible power Of retributive Justice, and the doom Of Zohak in his sight, Deterr'd from equal erime ! Two human heads, yet warm, he laid Before the scaly guardians of the pass; They to their wonted banquet of old years Turn'd eager, and the narrow pass was free.

32.

And now before their path The opening cave dilates; They reach a spacious vault, Where the black river-fountains burst their way. Now as a whirlwind's force Had centred on the spring, The gushing flood roll'd up; And now the deaden'd roar Echoed beneath, collapsing as it sunk Within a dark abyss, Adown whose fathomless gulfs the eye was lost 33.

Blue flames that hover'd o'er the springs Flung through the cavern their uncertain light; Now waving on the waves they lay, And now their fiery curls Flow'd in long tresses up, And now contracting, glow'd with whiter heat Then up they shot again, Darting pale flashes through the tremulous air; The flames, the red and yellow sulphur-smoke, And the black darkness of the vault, Commingling indivisibly.

34.

'Here,'' quoth Mohareb, "do the Angels dwell, The Teachers of Enchantment." Thalaba Then raised his voice, and eried,
'Haruth and Maruth, hear me! Not with rites Accursed, to disturb your penitence, And learn forbidden lore, Repentant Angels, seek I your abode; But sent by Allah and the Prophet here, Obediently I come;

Their chosen servant I ; Tell me the Talisman"—

35.

"And dost thou think," Mohareb eried, as with a smile of seorn He glanced upon his comrade, "dost thou think To triek them of their secret? For the dupes Of human-kind keep this lip-rightscusness! "Twill serve thee in the Mosque And in the Market-place; But Spirits view the heart. Only hy strong and torturing spells enforced, Those stubborn Angels teach the charm By which we must descend "

36.

"Descend?" said Thalaba. But then the wrinkling smile Forsook Mohareb's cheek, And darker feelings settled on his brow. "Now, hy my soul," quoth he, "and I believe, Idiot! that I have led Some eamel-kneed prayer-monger through the cave ! What brings thee hither? Thou shouldst have a hut By some Saint's grave beside the public way, There to less-knowing fools Retail thy Koran-seraps, And, in thy turn, die civet-like, at last, In the dung-perfume of thy sanctity !---Ye whom I seek! that, led by me, Feet uninitiate tread Your threshold, this atones !---Fit sacrifice he falls!" And forth he flash'd his eimeter, And raised the murderous blow.

37.

There ceased his power; his lifted arm, Suspended by the spell, Hung impotent to strike. "Poor hypoerite!" cried he, "And this then is thy faith In Allah and the Prophet! They had fail'd To save thee, but for Magic's stolen aid; Yea, they had left thee yonder Serpent's meal, But that, in prudent cowardice, The chosen Servant of the Lord came in,

Safe follower of my path!"

38.

"Blasphemer! dost thou boast of guiding me?' Quoth 'Thalaba, with virtuous pride inflamed. "Blindly the wieked work The righteous will of Heaven! Sayest thou that, diffident of God, In Magie spells I trust? Liar! let witness this!" And he drew off Abdaldar's Ring, And cast it in the gulf. A skinny hand came up, And caught it as it fell,

And peals of devilish laughter shook the Cave

39.

Then joy suffused Mohareb's cheek, And Thalaba beheld The blue blade gleam, descending to destroy.

40.

The undefended youth Sprung forward, and he seized Mohareb in his grasp, And grappled with him breast to breast. Sinewy and large of limb Mohareb was, Broad-shoulder'd, and his joints Knit firm, and in the strife Of danger practised well. Time had not thus matured young Thalaba; But high-wrought feeling now, The inspiration and the mood divine, Infused a force portentous, like the strength Of madness through his frame. Mohareb reels before him; he right on, With knee, with breast, with arm, Presses the staggering foe; And now upon the brink Of that tremendous spring, --There with fresh impulse and a rush of force, He thrust him from his hold. The upwhirling flood received Mohareb, then, absorb'd, Engulf'd him in the abyss.

41.

Thalaba's breath came fast; And, panting, he breathed out A broken prayer of thankfulness. At length he spake and said, "Haruth and Maruth! are ye here? Or hath that evil guide misled my search? I, Thalaba, the Servant of the Lord, Invoke you. Hear me, Angels! so may Ileaven Accept and mitigate your penitence! I go to root from earth the Sorcerer brood; Tell me the needful Talisman!"

42.

Thus, as he spake, recumbent on the rock Beyond the black abyss, Their forms grew visible. A settled sorrow sate upon their brows — Sorrow alone, for trace of guilt and shame None now remain'd; and gradual, as by prayer The sin was purged away, Their robe of glory, purified of stain, Resumed the lustre of its native light.

To enable het to perform this necessary office, Nature has provided her with a large sack, which extends from the tip of the under mandible of her hill to the throat, and holds as much water as will supply her brood for several days. This water she pours into the nest, to cool her young, to allay their thirst, and to teach them to swim. Lions, Tygers, and other rapacions animals resort to these nests, and drink the water, and are said not to injure the young. — Smellie's Philosophy of Natural History.

It is perhaps from this power of carrying a supply of water that the Peliean is called Jimmel et Balars, the Camel of the River. Bruce notices a entions blunder upon this subject in the translation of Norden's travels. "On looking into Mr. Norden's Voyage," says he, "I was struck at first sight with this paragraph: 'We saw, this day, abundance of camels jbut they did not come near enough for us to shoot them.' I thought with myself, to shoot camels in Egypt would be very little better than to shoot mene, and that it was very locky for him the camels did not come near, if that was the only thing that prevented him. Upon looking at the note, I see it is a small mistake of the translator, who says, that in the original it is Chameaux dreau, Water Camels ; bat whether they ore a particular species of camels, or a different kind of animal, he does not kow."

These prominent features of an Oriental city will be found in all the views of Sir John Chardin.

The mosques, the minarets, and numerous cupolas, form a splendid spectacle; and the flat roofs of the houses, which are situated on the hills, rising one behind another, present a succession of hanging terraces, interspersed with eypress and poplar trees. — Russel's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo.

The circuit of Ispahan, taking in the suburbs, is not less than that of Paris; but Paris contains ten times the number of its inhabitants. It is not, however, astonishing that this eity is so extensive and so thinly peopled, because every family has its own honse, and almost every house its garden; so that there is much void ground. From whatever side you arrive, you first discover the towers of the mosques, and then the trees which surround the houses; at a distance, Ispahan resembles a forest more than a town. — Tavernier.

Of Alexandria, Volney says, "The spreading palm-trees, the terraced honses, which seem to have no roof, the lofty, slender noinarets, all announce to the traveller that he is in another world."

Thou too art fallen, Bagdad ! City of Peace. - 6, p. 266.

Almanzor, riding one day with his courtiers along the banks of the Tigris, where Scleucia formerly stood, was so delighted with the beauty of the country, that he resolved there to build his new capital. Whils the was conversing with his attendants upon this project, one of them, separating from the rest, met a Hermit, whose cell was near, and entered into talk with him, and communicated the design of the Caliph. The Hermit replied, he well knew, by a tradition of the contry, that a city would one day be built in that plain, but that its founder would be a man called Moelas, a name very different from both thises of the Caliph, Giaffar and Almanzor.

The Officer rejoined Almanzor, and repeated his conversation with the Hermit. As soon as the Caliph heard the name of Moclas, he descended from his horse, prostrated himself, and returned thanks to God, for that ha was chosen to execute his orders. His courtiers waited for an explanation of this conduct with eagencess, and the Caliph told them thus: — During the Caliphate of the Ommindes, my brothers and myself being very young, and possessing very little, were obliged to live in the country, where each in rotation was to provide sustemance for the whole. On one of my days, as I was without money, and had no means of procuring food, I took a bracelet belonging to my nurse, and pawned it. This woman made a great outery, and, after much search, discovered that I had been the thef. In her anger she alused me plentifully, and, among other terms of reproach, she called me Moclas, the name of a famous robher

Thy founder the Victorious, &c. - 6, p. 266.

Almanzor signifies the Victorions.

Bagdad was founded in consequence of a singular superstition A sect called Ravendiens conceived, that they ought to render those honors to the Caliphs which the Moslem hold should only be paid to the Deity. They therefore came in great numbers to Haschemia, where the Caliph Almaozor usually resided, and made around his palace the same processions and ceremonies which the Moslem make around the Temple at Mecca. The Caliph prohibited this, commanding them not to prefane a religious ceremony which ought to be reserved solely to the Temple at Mecca. The Ravendiens did not regard the prohibition, and continued to act as before.

Alexanzor, seeing their obstinacy, resolved to conquer it, and began by arresting a hundred of these fanatics. This astonished them; but they soon recovered their courage, took arms, marched to the prison, forced the doors, delivered their friends, and then returned to make their procession round the palace in reverence of the Caliph.

Eoraged at this insolence, the Caliph put himself at the head of bis guards, and edvanced against the Ravendiens, expecting that his appearance would immediately disperse them. Instead of this, they resisted, and repulsed him so vigorously, that he had nearly falled a victim. But timely succors arrived, and after a great slaughter, these fanatics were expelled the town. This singular rebellion, arising from excess of loyalty, so disgusted Almanzor, that he determined to forsake the town which had witnessed it, and accordingly laid the foundation of Bagdad. - Marigny.

Met in her arch'd Bazars. -- 7, p. 266.

The houses in Persia are not in the same place with their shops, which stand for the most part in long and large arched streets, forty or fifty feet high, which streets are called Basar, or the Market, and make the heart of the city, the houses being in the ont-parts, and having almost all gardens belonging to them. - Chardin.

At Tauris, he says, " there are the fairest Basars that are in any place of Asia ; and it is a lovely sight to see their vast extent, their largeness, their heantiful Duomos, and the arches over them."

At Bagdad the Bazars are all vanited, otherwise the merchants could not remain in them on account of the heat. They are also watered two or three times a day, and a number of the poor are paid for rendering this service to the public. -Tavernier.

And Tigris bore upon his tameless stream. - 7, p. 266.

On the other side of the river, towards Arabia, over against the city, there is a faire place or towne, and in it a fair Bazarr fer merchants, with very many lodgings, where the greatest part of the merchants strangers which come to Babylon do lie with their merchandize. The passing over Tygris from Babylon to this Borough is by a long bridge, made of boates, chained together with great chaines, provided, that when the river waxeth great with the abundance of raine that falleth, then they open the bridge in the middle, where the one-halfe of the bridge falleth to the walles of Babylon, and the other to the brinks of this Borough, on the other side of the river; and as long as the bridge is open, they passe the river io small boats, with great danger, because of the smallness of the hoats, and the overlading of them, that with the fiercenesse of the stream they be overthrowen, or els the streame doth carry them away; so that by this meanes many people are lost and drowned. - Casar Frederick in Haklunt.

Kept their night-clatter still. - 9, p. 200.

At Bagded are many crones, who build their nests upon the tops of the minarets, and the loftiest houses.

At Adanaqui, cranes are so abundant, that there is scarcely a house which has not several nests upon it. They are very tame, and the inhabitants never molest them. When any thing disturbs these hirds, they make a violent clatter with their long beaks, which is some time repeated by the others all over the town ; and this noise will sometimes continue for several minutes. It is as load as e watchman's rattle, and not much unlike it in sound. - Jackson.

The cranes were now arrived at their respective quarters, and a couple had made their nest, which is bigger in circumference than a bushel, on a dome close by our chamber. This pair stood, side by side, with great gravity, showing no concern at what was transacting beneath them, but at intervals twisting about their long necks, and elattering with their beaks, turned behind them upon their backs, as it were in concert. This was continued the whole night. An owl, a bird also numelested, was perched hard by, and as frequently hooted. The crane is tall, like a heron, but much larger; the body white, with black pinions, the neck and legs very long, the head small, and the bill thick. The Turks call it fricod and brother, believing it has an affection for their nation, and will accompany them into the countries they shall conquer. In the course of our journey we saw one hopping on a wall with a single leg, the maimed stump wrapped in linen. -- Chandler's Travels in Asia Minor.

Of Belus ? &c. - 10, p. 266.

Our early travellers have given us strange and circumstantial accounts of what they conceive to have been the Temple of Belus.

The Tower of Nimrod, or Babel, is situate on that side of Tygris that Arabia is, and in a very great plaine distant from Bahylou seven or eight miles : which tower is ruinated on every side; and with the falling of it there is made a great mountaine, so that it hath no forme at all; yet there is a great part of it standing, which is compassed, and almost covered, with the sforesayd fallings. This Tower was builded and made of foure-square brickes; which brickes were made of earth, and dried in the Sunne in maner and forme following : First they layed a lay of brickes, then a mat made of canes, square as the brickes, and, instead of lime, they danhed it with earth. These mats of canes are at this time so strong, that it is a thing wonderful to beholde, being of such great antiquity. I have gone round about it, and have not found any place where there bath bene any door or entrance. It may be, in my judgment, in circuit about a mile, and rather lesse than more.

This Tower, in effect, is contrary to all other things which are seene after off; for they seeme small, and the more nere a man commeth to them, the bigger they be: hut this tower, after off, seemeth a very great thing, and the nerer you come to it the lesser. My judgement and reason of this is, that because the Tower is set io a very great plaine, and hath nothing more about to make any shew saving the ruines of it, which it hath made round about; and for this respect, descrying it afarre off, that piece of the Tower which yet standeth with the mountaine that is made of the substance that hath fillen from it, maketh a greater shew than yon shall finde coming neere to it. — Casar Frederick.

John Eldred notices the same deception: "Being upon a plaine grounde, it seemeth sfarre off very great; but the nerer you come to it, the lesser and lesser it appeareth. Sundry times I have gone thither to see it, and found the remnants yet standing, about a quarter of a mile in compasse, and almost as bigh as the stone-worke of St. Paul's steeple in London, but it sheweth much bigger." - Haklayt.

In the middle of a vast and level plain, about a quarter of a league from the Euphrates, which in that place runs westward, appears a heap of ruined buildings, like a huge mountain, the materials of which are so confounded together, that one knows not what to make of it. Its figure is square, and rises in form of a tower or pyramid, with four fronts, which answer to the four quarters of the compass; but it seems longer from north to south than from east to west, and is, as far as I could judge by my pacing it, a large quarter of a league. Its situation and form correspond with that pyramid which Strabo calls the tower of Belus; and is, in all likelihood, the tower of Nimrod in Babylon, or Babel, as that place is still called. In that author's time it had nothing remaining of the stairs, and other ornaments mentioned by Herodotus, the greatest part of it having been ruined by Xerxes; and Alexander, who designed to have restored it to its former lustre, was prevented by death. There appear no marks of ruins without the compass of that huge mass, to convince one that so great a city as Bahylon had ever stood there ; all one discovers within fifty or sixty paces of it, being only the remains, here and there, of some foundations of buildings; and the country round about it is so flat and level, that one can hardly believe it should be chosen for the situation of so great and noble a eity as Babylon, or that there were ever any remarkable buildings on it. But, for my part, I am astonished there appears so much as there does, considering it is at least 4000 years since that city was built; and that Diodorus Siculus tells us, it was reduced almost to nothing in his time. The height of this mountain of ruins is not in every part equal, hut exceeds the highest palace in Naples. It is a misshapen places it rises in points, is craggy and inaccessible; in others it is smoother, and is of easier ascent; there are also tracks of torrents from the top to the bottom, caused by the rains; and both withinside, and upon it, one sees parts some ligher and some lower. It is not to be discovered whether ever there were any steps to ascend it, or any doers to enter into it; whence one may easily judge that the stairs ran winding about on the outside; and that being the less solid parts, they were sourcest demolished, so that not the least sign of any eppears at present.

Withinside one finds some grottos, but so ruined that ona can make nothing of them, whether they were built at the same time with that work, or made since by the peasants for shelter; which last seems to be the most likely. The Mahommedans believe that these caverns were appointed by Ged as places of punishment for Harut and Marut, two angels, who they suppose were sent from Heaven to judge the crimes of men, but did not execute their commissions as they ought. It is evident from these ruins, that the tower of Nimrod was built with great and thick bricks, as I corefully observed, causing holes to be dog in several places for the purpose ; but they do not appear to have been burnt, but dried in the sun, which is extreme hot in those parts. In laying these bricks, neither lime nor sand was employed, but only earth tempered and petrified ; and in those parts which made the floors, there had been mingled with that earth, which served instead of lime, bruised reeds, or hard straw, such as large mats are made of, to strengthen the work. Afterwards one perceives at certain distances, in diverse places, especially where the strongest buttresses were to be, several other bricks of the same size, but more solid, and burnt in a kiln, and set in good lime, or bitumen ; nevertheless, the greatest number consists of those which are only dried in the sun.

I make no doubt but this ruin was the ancient Babel, and the tower of Ninrod; for, besides the evidence of its situation, it is acknowledged to be such by the people of the country, being vulgarly called Babil by the Arabs.— Pietro delle Valle. Universal Hist.

Eight towers arise, Each above each, immeasurable height, A monument, at once, of Eastern pride And slavish superstition. Round, a scale Of circling steps cutwines the conic pile; And at the bottom, on vast hinges grato Four brazen gates, toward the four winds of heaven, Placed in the solid square.

The stupid superstition of the Turks, with regard to hidden treasures, is well known; it is difficult, or even dangerous, for a traveller to copy an inscription in sight of those barbarians.

On a rising ground, at a league's distance from the river Shelliff, is Memoun-turroy, as they cell an old square tower, formerly a sepulchral monument of the Romans. This, like many more ancient edifices, is supposed by the Arabs to have been built over a treasure; agreeably to which secount, they tell us, these mystical lines were inscribed upon it. Prince Maimoun Trea wrote this upon his tower: —

> My Treasure is in my Shade, And my Shade is in my Treasure. Search for it ; despair not : Nay, despair ; do not search.

The Treasure of Tubnah lyeth under the shade of what is sheded. Dig fur it: alas! it is not there. - Shaw.

From Ait's bitumen-lake, &c. - 22, p. 268.

The springs of bitumen called Ogun Hit, the fountains of Hit, are much celebrated by the Arobs and Persians; the atter call it Chesmeh kir, the fountain of pitch. This liquid bitumen they call Nafta: end the Turks, to distinguish it from pitch, give it the name of hara sakiz, or black mastich. A Persian geographer says, that Nafta issues out of the rprings of the earth, as embergrise issues out of the to of the so of the so of the sca. All the modern travellers, except RauerAf, who went to Persia and the Indies by the way of the Explorates, hefter the discovery of the Cape of Good Hape, mention this fountain of liquid bitumen as a strange thing. Some of them take notice of the river mentioned by Herodotus, and assure us, that the people of the country have a tradition, that, when the tower of Babel was building, they brought the bitamen from hence; which is confirmed by the Arab and Persian historians.

Hit, Heit, Eit, Ait, or Idt, as it is variously written by travellers, is a great Turkish town, situate upon the right or west side of the Euphrates, and has a castle ; to the south-west of which, and three miles from the town, in a valley, are many springs of this black substance ; each of which makes a noise like a smith's forge, incessantly puffing and blowing out the matter so loud, that it may be heard a mile off ; wherefore the Moors and Arabs call it Bab al Jehennam, that is, hell gate. It swallows up all heavy things; and many camels, from time to time, fall into the pits, and are irrecoverably lost. It issues from a certain lake, sending forth a filthy smoke, and continually boiling over with the pitch, which spreads itself over a great field, that is slways full of it. It is free for every one to take : they use it to calk or pitch their boats, laying it on two or three inches thick, which keeps out the water: with it also they pitch their houses, made of palm-tree branches. If it was not that the inundations of the Euphrates carry away the pitch, which covers all the sands from the place where it rises to the river, there would have been mountains of it long since. The very ground and stones thereabouts afford bitumen; and the fields abundance of saltpetre. - Universal History.

And dropping their beads fast, &c. - 23, p. 268.

The Mussulmauns use, like the Roman Catholics, a rosary of beads, called Tusbah, or implement of praise. It consists, if I recollect aright, of oinety-nine beads; in dropping which through the fingers, they repeat the attributes of God, as, "O Creator, O Merciful, O Forgiving, O Omnipotent, O Omniseient," &c. &c. This act of devotion is called Taleel, from the repetition of the letter L, or Laum, which occurs in the word Allah, (God,) slways joined to the epithet or attribute, as Ya Allah Khalick, O God, the Creator; Ya Allah Kerreem, O God, the Merciful, &c. &c. The devotees may he eeen multering their heads as they walk the streets, and in the intervals of conversation in company. The rosaries of persons of fortune and rank have the heads of diamonds, pearls, rubies, and emeralds. Those of the humble are strung with berries, coral, or glass-heads. — Note to the Bahar-Danush.

The ninety-nine heads of the Mahommedan rosory are divided into three equal lengths, by a little string, at the end of which hangs a long piece of coral, and a large bead of the same. The more devout or hypecritical Turks, like the Catholics, have usually their bead-string in their hands.— Tavernic.

" Young Arab! when she wrote upon thy brow," &c. - 26, p. 268.

"The Mahunmedans believe, that the decreed events of every man's life are impressed in divine characters on his forehead, though not to be seen by mortal eye. Hence they use the word Nusseeb, anglicé, stamped, for destiny. Most probably the idea was taken up by Mahummed from the sealing of the elect, mentioned in the Revelations." — Note to the Bahar-Damush.

The Spanish physiognomical phrase, tracrib escrite en la frente, to have it written on the forehead, is perhaps of Arabian origin.

Rajah Chunder, of Cashmeer, was blessed with a Vizier, endowed with wisdom and fidelity; but the wicked, envying his virtues, propagated unfavorable reports regarding him On these occasions, the great are generally staggered in their opinions, and make no use of their reason ; forgetting every thing which they have read in history on the direful effects of envy. Thus Rajah Burgin gave car to the stories fabricated against als Vizier, and dismissed him from his office. 'I he faithful Vizier bore his disgrace with the atmost submission but his enemics, not satisfied with what they compassed egainst him, represented to the Rajah that he was plotting to raise himself to the throne; and the deluded prince ordered him to be crucified. A short time after the execution, the Vizier's peer (his spiritual guide) passed the corpse, and read it decreed in his forehead, as follows : "That he should be dismissed from his office, be sent to prison, and then crucified ; but that, after all, he should he restored to life, and obtain the kingdom." Astonished at what he beheld, he rook down the body from the cross, and carried it to a secret place Here he was incessantly offering up prayers to heaven for the restoration of his life, till one night the aerial spirits assembled together, and restored the body to life hy repeating incantations. He shortly after mounted the throne, but, despising worldly pomp, soon abdicated it. - Ayeen Akbery.

------ " Zohak keeps the cave," &c. - 27, p. 268.

Zohak was the fifth king of the Pischdadian dynasty, lincally descended from Shedad, who perished with the tribe of Ad. Zohak murdered his predecessor, and invented the punishments of the cross, and of flaying alive. The devil, who had long served him, requested, at last, as a recompense, permission to kiss his shoulders; immediately two serpents grew there, who fed upon his flesh, and endeavored to get at The devil now suggested a remody, which was to his brain. quiet them, by giving them every day the brains of two men, killed for that purpose : this tyranny lasted long ; till a blacksmith of Ispahan, whose children had been nearly all slain to feed the king's scrpents, raised his leathern apron as the standard of revolt, and deposed Zohak. Zohak, say the Persians, is still living in the cave of his punishment ; a sulphureous vapor issues from the place ; and, if a stone he flung in, there comes out a voice and cries, Why dust thou fling stones at me? This cavern is in the mountain of Demawend, which reaches from that of Elwend, towards Teheran. - D'Herbelot. Olearis.

" The salutary spell," &c. - 27, p. 268.

I shall transcribe, says Grose, a foreign piece of superstition, firmly helieved in many parts of France, Germany, and Spain. The account of it, and the mode of preparation, appears to have been given by a judge: in the latter there is a striking resemblance to the charm in Macbeth :--

Of the Hand of Glory, which is made use of by house-breakers, to enter into houses at night, without fear of opposition.

I acknowledge that I never tried the secret of the Hand of Glory, but I have thrice assisted at the definitive judgment of certain criminals, who, under the torture; confessed having used it. Being asked what it was, how they procured it, and what were its uses and properties, they answered, first, that the use of the Hand of Glory was to stupefy those to whom it was presented, and to render them motionless, insomuch that they could oct stir, any more than if they were dead; secondly, that it was the hand of a hanged man; and, thirdly, that it must be prepared in the manner following: —

Take the hand, left or right, of a person hanged, and exposed on the highway; wrap it up in a piece of a shroud on winding-sheet, in which let it be well-squeezed, to get out any small quantity of hlood that may have remoined in it; then put it into an earthen vessel with Zimat saltpetre, salt, and long pepper, the whole well powdered; leave it fifteen days in that vessel; afterwards take it out, and expose it to the non-tide sun in the dog-days, till it is thoroughly dry; and if the sun is not sufficient, put it into an oven heated with fern and vervain. Then compose a kind of candle with the fat of a hanged man, virgin wax, and sisame of Lapland. The Hand of Glory is used as a candlestick to hold this candle when lighted. Its properties are, that wheresoever any one goes with this dreadful instrument, the persons to whom it is presented will be deprived of all power of motion. On being asked if there was no remedy or antidote, to counteract this charm, they said the Hand of Glory would cease to take effect, and thieves could not make use of it, if the threshold of the door of the house, and other places by which they might enter, were anointed with an unguent composed of the gall of a black cat, the fat of a white hen, and the blood of a screechowl; which mixture must necessarily he prepared during the dog-days. - Grose, Provincial Glossary and Popular Superstitions.

Something similar is recorded by Torquemada of the Mexican thieves. They carried with them the left hand and arm of a woman who had died in her first childbed; with this they twice struck the ground before the house which they designed to rob, and the door twice, and the threshold twice; and the inhabitants, if alseep, were hindered from waking by this charm; and, if awake, stupefied and deprived of speech and motion while the fatal arm was in the house. — Lib. xiv. c. 29.

"Some camel-kneed prayer-monger through the cave!"-36, p. 269.

I knew not, when I used this epithet in derision, that the likeness had been serionaly applied to St. James. His knees were, after the guise of a camel's knee, benumbed and herekt of the sense of feeling, by reason of his continual kneeling in supplication to God, and petition for the people. — Hegesippus, as quoted by Easthus.

William of Malmsbury says of one of the Conqueror's daughters, who was affianced to Alphonsus, king of Galicia, but obtained from God a virgin death, that a hard substance, which proved the frequency of her prayers, was found npon her knees after her decease.

" By some Saint's grave beside the public way," &c. - 36, p. 269.

The habitations of the Saints are always beside the sanctuary or tomb of their ancestors, which they take care to odorn. Some of them possess, close to their houses, gardens, trees, or cultivated grounds, and particularly some spring or well of water. I was once travelling in the south in the beginning of October, when the season happened to be exceedingly hot, and the wells and rivulets of the country were all dried up. We had neither water for ourselves nor for our horses; and, after having taken much fruitless trouble to obtain some, we went and paid homage to a Saint, who at first pretended a variety of semples before he would suffer infidels to approach; but, an promising to give him ten or twelve shillings, he became exceedingly humane, and supplied us with as much water as we wanted ; still, however, vausting highly of his charity, and particularly of his disinterestodness. - Chenier.

" Retail thy Koran-scraps." - 36, p. 269.

No nation in the world is so much given to superstition as the Arabs, or even as the Mahometans in general. They hang about their children's necks the figure of an open hand, which the Turks and Moors paint upon their ships and houses, as an antidote and counter-charm to an evil eye; for five is with them an unlucky number; and five (fingers perhaps) in your eyes, is their proverb of cursing and definec. Those who are grown up, carry always about with them some paragraph or other of their Koran, which, like as the Jews did their phylacteries, thoy place upon their breast, or sew under themselves from sickness and misfortunes. The virtue of these charms and scrolls is supposed likewise to be so far universal, that they suspend them upon the necks of their cattle, horses, and other beasts of burdea. — Shava.

The hand-spell is still common in Portugal; it is called the figa; and thus probably our vulgar phrase — "a fig for him," is derived from a Moorish amulet.

Their robe of glory, purified of stain, &c. - 42, p. 270.

In the Vision of Thurcillus, Adam is described as beholding the events of the world with mingled grief and joy; bis original garment of glory gradnally recovering its lastre, as the number of the elect increases, till it be fulfilled. — Matthew Paris.

This is more beautifully conceived than what the Arelbisbop of Taledo describes in his account of Mahommed's journey to Heaven: "Also in the first heaven I found a venerable man sitting upon a seat, and to him were shown the souls of the dead; and when he beheld souls that did not heave him, he turned away his eyes, saying, Ah' surful sou, thon hast departed from an unhappy body; and when a soul appeared which pleased him, then he said with applause, O happy Spirit, thou art come from a good body. I asked the Angel concerning a man so excellent, and of such reverence, who he should be; and he said it was Adam, who rejoiced in the good of his generation, hut turned away his face from the evil."— Roder. Yimenes.

THE SIXTH BOOK.

Then did I see a pleasant Paradise, Full of sweet flowers and daintiest delights, Such as on earth man could not more devise With pleasures choice to feed his cheerful sprights; Not that which Merlio by his magic slights Made for the gentle squire to entertain His fair Belphæbe, could this garden stain.

SPENSER. Ruins of Time.

1.

So from the inmost cave Did Thalaba retrace The windings of the rock. Still on the ground the giant limbs Of Zohak lay dispread; The spell of sleep had ceased, And his broad eyes were glaring on the youth; Yet raised he not his arm to bar the way, Fearful to rouse the snakes Now lingering o'er their meal.

2.

Oh, then, emerging from that dreadful cave, How grateful did the gale of night Salute his freshen'd sense ! How full of lightsome joy, Thankful to Heaven, he hastens by the verge Of that bitumen-lake, Whose black and heavy fumes, Surge heaving after surge, Roll'd like the billowy and tumultuous sea.

3.

The song of many a bird at morn Aroused him from his rest. Lo! at his side a courser stood; More animate of eye,

BOOK VI.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Of form more faultless never had he seen, More light of limbs and beautiful in strength, Among the race whose blood, Pure and unmingled, from the royal steeds Of Solomon came down.

I. .

The chosen Arab's eye Glanced o'er his graceful shape, If is rich caparisons, His crimson trappings gay. But when he saw the mouth Uncurb'd, the unbridled neck, Then his heart leap'd, and then his cheek was flush'd; For sure he deem'd that Heaven had sent A courser, whom no erring hand might guide. And lo! the eager Steed Throws his head and paws the ground, Impatient of delay! Then up leap'd Thalaba, And away went the self-govern'd courser.

5.

Over the plain Away went the steed; With the dew of the morning his fetlocks were wet; The foam froth'd his limbs in the journey of noon; Nor stay'd he till over the westerly heaven The shadows of evening had spread. Then on a shelter'd bank The appointed Youth reposed, And by him laid the docile courser down Again in the gray of the morning Thalaba bounded up; Over hill, over dale, Away goes the steed. Again at eve he stops, Again the Youth alights; His load discharged, his errand done, The courser then bounded away.

6.

Heavy and dark the eve; The Moon was hid on high; A dim light tinged the mist That cross'd her in the path of Heaven All living sounds had ceased; Only the flow of waters near was heard, A low and hulling melody.

7.

Fasting, yet not of want Percipient, he on that mysterious steed Had reach'd his resting-place, For expectation kept his nature up. Now, as the flow of waters near Awoke a feverish thirst, Led by the sound he moved To seek the grateful wave.

8.

A meteor in the hazy air Play'd before his path : Before him now it roll'd A globe of living fire ; And now contracted to a steady light, As when the solitary hermit prones His lamp's long undulating flame ; And now its wavy point Up-blazing rose, like a young eypress-tree Sway'd by the heavy wind ; Anon to Thalaba it moved, And wrapt him in its pale, innocuous fire ; Now, in the darkness drown'd, Left him with eyes bedimm'd, And now, emerging, spread the scene to sight.

9.

Led by the sound and metcor-flame, The Arabian youth advanced. Now to the nearest of the many rills He stoops; ascending steam Timely repels his hand, For from its source it sprung, a boiling tide. A second course with better hap he tries : The wave, intensely cold, Tempts to a copious draught. There was a virtue in the wave: His limbs, that, stiff with toil, Dragg'd heavy, from the copious draught received Lightness and supple strength. O'erjoyed, and weening the benignant Power, Who sent the reinless steed, Had blest these healing waters to his use, He laid him down to sleep, Lull'd by the soothing and incessant sound, The flow of many waters, blending oft With shriller tones, and deep, low murmurings, Which, from the fountain caves, In mingled melody, Like faery music, heard at midnight, came.

10.

The sounds which last he heard at night Awoke his recollection first at morn. A scene of wonders lay before his eyes. In mazy windings o'er the vale A thousand streamlets stray'd, And in their endless course Had intersected deep the stony soil, With labyrinthine channels islanding A thousand rocks, which seem'd, Amid the multitudinous waters there, Like clouds that freckle o'er the summer sky, The blue ethereal ocean circling each And insulating all.

11.

Those islets of the living rock Were of a thousand shapes, And Nature with her various tints Diversified anew their thousand forms; For some were green with moss; Some ruddier tinged, or gray, or silver white; And some with yellow lichens glow'd like gold; Some sparkled sparry radiance to the sun. Here gush'd the fountains up, Alternate light and blackness, like the play Of sunbeams on a warrior's burnish'd arms. Yonder the river roll'd, whose ample bed, Their sportive lingerings o'er, Received and bore away the confluent rills.

12.

This was a wild and wondrous scene, Strange and beautiful, as where By Oton-tala, like a sea of stars, The hundred sources of Hoangho burst. High mountains closed the vale, Bare rocky mountains, to all living things Inhospitable; on whose sides no herb Rooted, no insect fed, no bird awoke Their echoes, save the Eagle, strong of wing, A lonely plunderer, that afar Sought in the vales his prey.

13.

Thither toward those mountains Thalaba Following, as he believed, the path prescribed By Destiny, advanced. Up a wide vale that led into their depths, A stony vale between receding heights Of stone, he wound his way. A cheerless place! the solitary Bee, Whose buzzing was the only sound of life, Flew there on restless wing, Seeking in vain one flower, whereon to fix.

14.

Still Thalaba holds on ; The winding vale now narrows on his view, And steeper of ascent, Rightward and leftward rise the rocks ; And now they meet across the vale. Was it the toil of human hands Had hewn a passage in the rock, Through whose rude portal-way The light of heaven was seen? Rude and low the portal-way ; Beyond, the same ascending straits Went winding up the wilds.

15.

Still a bare, silent, solitary glen, A fearful silence, and a solitude That made itself be felt; And steeper now the ascent, A rugged path, that tired The straining muscles, toiling slowly up. At length, again a rock Stretch'd o'er the narrow vale; There also had a portal-way been hewn, But gates of massy iron bar'd the pass, Huge, solid, heavy-hinged.

I6.

There hung a horn beside the gate, Ivory-tipp'd and brazen-mouth'd. He took the ivory tip, And through the brazen mouth he breathed ; Like a long thunder-peal, From rock to rock rebounding rung the blast; The gates of iron, by no human arm Unfolded, turning on their hinges slow, Disclosed the passage of the rock. He enter'd, and the iron gates fell to, And with a clap like thunder closed him in 17.

It was a narrow, winding way; Dim lamps, suspended from the vault, Lent to the gloom an agitated light. Winding it pierced the rock, A long, descending path, By gates of iron closed; There also hung a horn beside, Of ivory tip and hrazen mouth; Again he took the ivory tip, And gave the brazen mouth its voice again Not now in thunder spake the horn, But breathed a sweet and thrilling melody The gates flew open, and a flood of light Rush'd on his dazzled eyes.

18.

Was it to earthly Eden, lost so long, The fated Youth had found his wondrous way? But earthly Eden boasts No terraced palaces, No rich pavilions bright with woven gold, Like these, that, in the vale, Rise amid odorous groves. The astonish'd Thalaba, Doubting as though an unsubstantial dream Beguiled him, closed his eyes, And open'd them again; And yet uncertified, He press'd them close, and, as he look'd around, Question'd the strange reality again. He did not dream; They still were there -The glittering tents, The odorous groves, The gorgeous palaces.

19.

And lo! a man, reverend in comely age, Advancing greets the youth. "Favor'd of Fortune," thus he said, "go taste The joys of Paradise! The reinless steed, that ranges o'er the world, Brings hither those alone for lofty deeds Mark'd by their horoscope; permitted thus A foretaste of the full beatitude, That in heroic acts they may go on More ardent, eager to return and reap Endless enjoyment here, their destined meed Favor'd of Fortune thou, go taste The joys of Paradise!"

-20.

This said, he turn'd away, and left The Youth in wonder mute; For Thalaba stood mute, And passively received The ming!ed joy which flow'd on every seuse. Where'er his eye could reach, Fair structures, rainbow-hued, arose; And rich pavilions, through the opening woods

BOOK VI.

Gleam'd from their waving eurtains sunny gold; And, winding through the verdant vale, Went streams of liquid light; And fluted cypresses rear'd up Their living obelisks; And broad-leav'd plane-trees, in long colonnades, O'er-arch'd delightful walks, Where round their trunks the thousand tendrill'd vine Wound up and hung the boughs with greener wreaths, And clusters not their own. Wearied with endless beauty, did his eyes Return for rest? beside him teems the earth With tulips, like the ruddy evening streak'd; And here the lily hangs her head of snow ; And here, amid her sable cup, Shines the red eye-spot, like one brightest star, The solitary twinkler of the night; And here the rose expands Her paradise of leaves.

BOOK VI.

Then on his ear what sounds Of harmony arose ! Far music and the distance-mellow'd song From bowers of merriment; The waterfall remote; The murnuring of the leafy groves; The single nightingale Perch'd in the rosier by, so richly toned, That never from that most melodious bird, Singing a love-song to his brooding mate, Did Thracian shepherd by the grave Of Orpheus hear a sweeter melody, Though there the Spirit of the Sepulchre All his own power infuse, to swell The incense that he loves.

22.

And oh! what odors the voluptuous vale Scatters from jasmine bowers, From yon rose wildeness, From cluster'd henna and from orange groves, That with such perfumes fill the breeze, As Peris to their Sister bear, When from the summit of some lofty tree She hangs eneaged, the captive of the Dives They from their pinions shake The sweetness of celestial flowers, And, as her enemies impure From that impervious poison far away Fly groaning with the torment, she the while Inhales her fragrant food.

23.

Such odors flow'd upon the world, When at Mohammed's nuptials, word Went forth in Heaven, to roll The everlasting gates of Paradise Back on their living hinges, that its gales Might visit all below; the general bliss Thril'd every bosom, and the family Of man, for once, partook one common joy. 24.

Full of the bliss, yet still awake To wonder, on went Thalaba; On every side the song of mirth, The music of festivity, Invite the passing youth. Wearied at length with hunger and with heat, He enters in a banquet room, Where, round a fountain brink, On silken carpets sate the festive train. Instant through all his frame Delightful coolness spread; The playing fount refresh'd The agitated air; The very light came cool'd through silvering panes Of pearly shell, like the pale moon-beam tinged; Or where the wine-vase fill'd the aperture, Rosy as rising morn, or softer gleani Of saffron, like the sunny evening mist Through every hue, and streak'd by all, The flowing fountain play'd. Around the water-edge Vessels of wine, alternate placed, Ruby and amber, tinged its little waves. From golden goblets there The guests sate quaffing the delicious juice Of Shiraz' golden grape.

But Thalaba took not the draught; For rightly, he knew, had the Prophet forbidden That beverage, the mother of sins ; Nor did the urgent guests Proffer a second time the liquid fire, When in the youth's strong eye they saw No movable resolve. Yet not uneourteous, Thalaba Drank the cool draught of innocence, That fragrant from its dewy vase Came purer than it left its native bed ; And he partook the odorous fruits, For all rich fruits were there; Water-melons rough of rind, Whose pulp the thirsty lip Dissolved into a draught; Pistachios from the heavy-eluster'd trees Of Malavert, or Haleb's fertile soil; And Casbin's luscious grapes of amber hue. That many a week endure The summer sun intense, Till, by its powerful heat, All watery particles exhaled, alone The strong essential sweetness ripens there. Here, cased in ice, the apricot A topaz, crystal-set; Here on a plate of snow, The sunny orange rests; And still the aloes and the sandal-wood, From golden censers, o'er the banquet-room Diffuse their dying sweets.

26.

Anon a troop of females form'd the dance, Their ankles bound with bracelet-bells, That made the modulating harmony. Transparent garments to the greedy eye Exposed their harlot limbs, Which moved, in every wanton gesture skill'd.

27.

With earnest eyes the banqueters Fed on the sight impure . And Thalaba, he gazed, But in his heart he bore a talisman, Whose blessed alchemy To virtuous thoughts refined The loose suggestions of the scene impure. Oneiza's image swam before his sight, His own Arabian Maid. He rose, and from the banquet-room he rush'd; Tears coursed his burning check; And nature for a moment woke the thought, And murmur'd, that, from all domestic joys Estranged, he wander'd o'er the world, A lonely being, far from all he loved. Son of Hodeirah, not among thy crimes That momentary murmur shall be written !

From tents of revelry. From festal bowers, to solitude he ran : And now he came where all the rills Of that well-water'd garden in one tide Roll'd their collected waves, A straight and stately bridge Stretch'd its long arches o'er the ample stream. Strong in the evening and distinct its shade Lay on the watery mirror, and his eye Saw it united with its parent pile, One huge, fantastic fabric. Drawing near, Lond from the chambers of the bridge below, Sounds of carousal came and song, And unveil'd women bade the advancing youth Come merry-make with them ! Unhearing, or unheeding, he Past o'er with hurried pace, And sought the shade and silence of the grove.

29.

Deserts of Araby ! His soul return'd to you. He cast himself upon the earth, And closed his eyes, and eall'd The voluntary vision up. A ery, as of distress, Aroused him; loud it eame, and near ! He started up, he strung his bow, He pluck'd an arrow forth. Again a shriek - a woman's shriek ! And lo! she rushes through the trees; Her veil is rent, her garments torn ! The ravisher follows close. "Prophet, save me! save me, God! Help! help me, man !" to Thalaba she cried : Thalaba drew the bow. The unerring arrow did its work of death Then, turning to the woman, he beheld Ilis own Oneiza, his Arabian Maid.

NOTES TO BOOK VI.

Of Solomon came down. - 3, p. 275.

The Arabian horses ere divided into two great branches; the Kadischi, whose descent is uskoown, and the Kothlani, of whom a written genealogy has been kept for 2000 years. These last are reserved for riding solely; they are highly esteemed, and consequently very dear ; they are said to derive their origin from King Solomon's studs ; however this may be, they are fit to bear the greatest fatigues, and can pass whole days without food ; they are also said to show uncommon courage egainst an enemy; it is even asserted, that when a horse of this race finds himself wounded, and unable to bear his rider much longer, he retires from the fray, and conveys him to a place of security. If the rider falls upon the ground, his horse remains beside him, and neighs till assistanco is brought. The Kochlani are neither large nor handsome, but amazingly swift ; the whole race is divided into several families, each of which has its proper name. Some of these have a higher reputation than others, on account of their more ancient and uncootaminated nebility. - Niebuhr

And now, emerging, &c. - 8, p. 275.

In travelling by night through the valleys of Moun. Ephraim, we were attended, for above the space of an hour, with an Ignis Fatuus, that displayed itself in a variety of extraordinary appearances. For it was sometimes globular, or like the flame of a candle ; immediately after it would spread itself, and involve our whole company in its pale, inoffensive light; then et once contract itself and disappear. But, in less than a minute, it would again exert itself as at other times; or else, ruoning along from one place to another with a swift progressive motion, would expand itself, at certain intervals, over more than two or three acres of the adjacent mountains. The atmosphere, from the beginning of the evening, had been remarkably thick and hazy; and the dew, as we felt it upon our bridles, was unusually clammy and unctuons. In the like disposition of the weather, I have observed those luminous bodies, which at sea skip about the masts and yards of ships, and are called Corpusanse* by the mariners. - Shaw,

And in their endless course, &cc. - 10, p. 275.

The Humman Meskouteen, the Silent or Inchanted Baths, are situated on a low ground, surrounded with mountains. There are several fountains that furnish the water, which is of an intense heat, and falls afterwards into the Zenati. At a small distance from these hot fountains, we have others, which, upon comparison, are of as intense a coldness; and a little below them, somewhat nearer the banks of the Zenati, there are the ruins of a few houses, built perhaps for the conveniency of persons who came hither for the benefit of the waters.

Besides the strong, sulphureous streams of the Hammam † Meskouteen, we are to observe further of them, that their water is of so intense a heat, that the rocky ground it runs over, to the distance sometimes of a hundred feet, is dissolved, or rather calcined by it. When the substance of these rocks is soft and uniform, then the water, by making every way equal impressions, leaveth them in the shape of cones or hemispheres; which being six feet high, and a little more or less of the same diameter, the Arabs maintain to be so many tents of their predecessors turned into stone. But when these rocks, hesides their usual soft, chalky substance, contain likewise some layers of harder matter, not so easy to be dissolved then, in proportion to the resistance the water is thereby to meet with, we are entertained with a confusion of traces and channels, distinguished by the Arabs into sheep, camels horses, nay, into men, women, and children, whom they suppose to have undergone the like fate with their habitations.

[•] A corruption of Cuerpo Sauto, as this meteor is called by the Spaniards.

[†] They call the Therma of this country Hummans, from whence our Hummans.

I observed that the fountains which afforded this water, had been frequently stopped up; or rather cessing to run at one place, broke ont immediately in another; which circumstance aeems not only to account for the number of cones, but for that variety likewise of traces, that are continued from one or other of these cones or fountains, quite down to the river Zenati.

This place, in riding over it, giveth back such a hollow sound, that we were afraid every moment of sinking through it. It is probable, therefore, that the ground below us was hellow; and may not the air, then, which is pent up within these caverns, afford, as we may suppose, in escaping contunually through these fountains, that mixture of shrill, murmuring, and deep sounds, which, according to the direction of the winds and the motion of the external air, issue out along with the water? The Arabs, to quote their strength of imagination once more, affirm these sounds to be the music of the Jenourae, Fairies, who are supposed, in a particular manner, to make their shodes at this place, and to be the grand agents in all these extraordinary appearances.

There are other natural curiosities likewise at this place. For the chalky stone being dissolved into a fine impalpable powder, and carried down afterwards with the stream, lodgeth liself upon the sides of the channel, nay, sometimes upon the lips of the fonntains themselves; or else embracing twigs, strews, and other bodies in its way, immediately herdeneth, and shoots into a bright fibrous substance, like the Asbestos, forming itself at the same time into a variety of glittering figures and beautiful crystallizations. — Share.

By Oton-tala, like a sea of stars. - 12, p. 276.

In the place where the Whang-ho rises, there are more than an hundred springs which sparkle like stars, whence it is called Hotun Nor, the Sea of Stars. These sources form two great lakes, called Hala Nor, the black sca or lake. Afterwards there appear three or four little rivers, which joined, form the Whang-ho, which has eight or nine hranches These sources of the river are called also Oton-tala. It is in Thihet. - Gaubil. Astley's Collect. of Voy. and Travels.

The Whang-ho, or, as the Portuguese call it, Hoamho, i.e. the Vellow River, rises not far from the source of the Ganges, in the Tartarian mountains west of China, and having run through it with a course of more than six hundred leagues, discharges itself into the eastern sea. It hath its name from a yellow mud which always stains its water, and which, after rains, composes a third part of its quantity. The watermen clear it for use by throwing in alum. The Chinese say its waters cannot become clear in a thousand years; whence it is a common proverb among them for any thing which is never likely to happen, "When the Yellow River shall run clear." -- Note to the Chinese Tale, Hon Kron Chean.

Beyond, the same ascending straits, &c. - 14, p. 276.

Among the mountains of the Beni Abbess, four leagues to the S. E. of the Welled Mansoure, we pass through a narrow, winding defile, which, for the space of near half a mile, lieth on each side under an exceeding high precipice. At every winding, the rock or stratum that originally went across it, and thereby separated one valley from another, is cut into the fashion of a door-case six or seven feet wide, giving thereby the Araba an occasion to call them Berban, the Gates ; whilst the Turks, in consideration of their strength and ruggedness, know them by the additional appellation of Donuer Cappy, the Gates of Iron. Few persons pass them without horror, a handful of men heing able to dispute the passage with a whole army. The rivulet of salt water which glides through this valley, might possibly first point out the way which art and necessity would afterwards improve. — Shaw.

No rich parilions bright with woven gald. - 18, p. 276.

In 1568, the Persian Sultan gave the Grand Seigneur two most stately pavilions made of one piece, the curtains being interlaced with gold, and the supporters embroidered with the

And broad-leav'd plane-trees, in long colonnades. - 20, p. 277.

The expenses the Persians are at in their gardens is that wherein they make greatest ostentation of their wealth. Not that they much mind furnishing of them with delightful flowers, as we do in Europe ; but these they slight as an excessive liberality of nature, by whom their common fields are strewed with an infinite number of tulips and other flowers . but they are rather desirous to have their gardens full of all sorts of fruit-trees, and especially to dispose them into pleasant walks of a kind of plane or poplar, a tree not known in Europe, which the Persians call Tzinnar. These trees grow up to the height of the pine, and have very broad leaves, not much unlike those of the vine. Their fruit has some resemblance to the chestnut, while the outer coat is about it, but there is no kernel within it, so that it is not to be eaten. The wood thereof is very brown, and full of veins; and the Persians use it in doors and shutters for windows, which, being rubbed with oil, look incomparably hetter than any thing made of walnut-tree, nay, indeed, than the root of it, which is now * so very much esteemed. - Amb. Travels.

With tulips, like the ruddy evening streak'd. - 20, p. 277.

Major Scott informs us, that scars and wounds, by Persian writers, are compared to the streaky tints of the tulip. The simile here employed is equally obvious, and more suited to its place.

And here amid her sable cup. - 20, p. 277.

"We pitched our tents among some little hills where there was a prodigious number of lilies of many colors, with which the ground was quite covered. None were white; they were mostly either of a rich violet, with a red spot in the midst of each leaf, or of a fine black, and these were the most esteemed. In form, they were like our lilies; but much larger." — Tavernier.

Her paradise of leaves. - 20, p. 277.

This expression is borrowed from one of Ariosto's smaller poems.

Tal è proprio a veder quell'amorosa Fiamma, che nel bel visa Si sparge, vnd' ella con soave riso Si va di sue bellezie innamorando ; Qual' è a vedere, qual' hor vermiglia rosa Senopra il bel Paradiso De le sue foglie alhor che 'l sol diviso De l'Oriente sorge il giorna alcanda.

Of Orpheus hear a sweeter melady. - 21, p. 277.

The Thracians say, that the nightingales which huild their nests about the sepulchre of Orpheus, sing sweeter and londer than other nightingales. — Pausanias.

Gongora has addressed this hird with somewhat more than his usual extravugance of absurdity : ---

Con diferencia tul, con gracia tanta Aquel Ruisenor llora, que sospecho, Que tiene atros cien mil dentro del pecho, Que alternan su dolor por su garganta.

With such a grace that nightingale hewails, That I suspect, so exquisite his note,

An hundred thousand other nightingales,

Within him, warble sorrow through his throat.

Marini has the same conceit, but has expressed it less extravagantly : —

Sovra Vorlo d'un rio lucido e netto, Il cunto soavissimo scieglica Musico rossignuol, ch³ aver parea E mille voci e mille augelli in petto.

In the Caherman Nameh, the Dives, having taken in war some of the Peris, imprisoned them in iron cages, which they lung from the highest trees they could find. There, from time to time, their companions visited them with the most precious odors. These odors were the usual food of the Peris, and procured them also another advantage, for they prevented the Dives from approaching or molesting them. The Dives could not hear the perfumes, which rendered them gloomy and melancholy whenever they drew near the cage in which a Peri was suspended. $-D^{11}Herbdot$.

On silken carpets sate the festive train. - 24, p. 277.

Solymus II. received the ambassadors sitting upon a pallet which the Turks call Mastabe, used by them in their chambers to sleep and to feed upon, covered with carpets of sitk, as was the whole door of the chamber also.—Knolles.

Among the presents that were exchanged between the Persian and Ottoman sourceigns in 1568, were curpets of silk, of camel's harr, lesser ones of silk and gold, and some called Teflich, made of the finest lawn, and so large that seven men could scarcely carry one of them. — Knolles.

In the heartiful story of Ali Beg, it is said, Cha Sefi, when he examined the house of his father's favorite, was much surprised at seeing it so badly furnished with plain skins and coarse carpets, whereas the other nobles in their houses trud only upon carpets of silk and gold. — Tacerner.

In the Chinese Novel Hau Kion Choann, we read, that Shuey-ping-sin ordered her servants to hang up a curtain of mother-of-peurl across the hall. She commanded the first table to be set for her guest without the curtain, and two lighted tapers to be placed upon it. Afterwards she ordered a second table, but without any light, to be set for herself within the curtain, so that she could see every thing through it, unseen herself.

Master George Tubervile, in his letters from Muscovy, 1558, describes the Russian windows : --

They have no English glasse ; of slices of a rocke

Hight Sluda they their windows make, that English glasse doth mocke.

They cut it very thinne, and sow it with a thred

In pretic order like to panes, to serve their present need. No other glasse, good faith, doth give a better light,

And sure the rock is nothing rich, the cost is very slight. Haklayt.

Or where the wine-vase, &c. - 24, p. 277.

The King and the great Lords have a sort of cellar for magnificence, where they sometimes drink with persons whom they wish to regale. These cellars are square rooms, to which you descend by only two or three steps. In the middle is a small cistern of water, and a rich carpet covers the ground from the walls to the cistern. At the four corners of the cistern are four large glass bottles, each containing about twenty quarts of wine, one white, another red. From one to the other of these, smaller bottles are ranged of the same material and form, that is, round, with a long neck, holding about four or five quarts, white and red alternately. Round the cellar are several rows of niches in the wall, and in each niche is a bottle, also of red and white alternately. Some niches are made to hold two. Some windows give light to the apartment, and all these bottles, so well ranged with their various colors, have a very fine effect to the eye. They are always kept full, the wine preserving better, and therefore are replenished as fast as they are emptied. - Tavermer.

The Cuptzi, or king of Persia's merchant, treated us with a collation, which was served in, in plate, vermilion gilt.

They export from Com earthen ware both white and varnished ; and this is peculiar to the white ware which is thence transported, that in the summer it cools the water wonderfully and very auddenly, by reason of continual transpiration. So that they who desire to drink cool and deliciously, never drink in the same pot above five or six days at most. They wash it with rose-water the first time, to take away the ill smell of the earth, and they hang it in the air, full of water, wrapped up in a moist linen cloth. A fourth part of the water transpires in six hours the first time; after that, still less from day to day, till at last the pores are closed up by the thick matter contained in the water which stops in the pores. But so suon as the pores are stopped, the water stinks in the pots, and you must take new ones.— Chardin.

In Egypt people of fortune burn Scio mastic in their cups; the penetrating odor of which pervades the porous substance, which remains impregnated with it a long time, and imparts to the water a perfume which requires the aid of habit to render it pleasing. — Somaini.

strong and sweet wines usually are. This incomparable grape grows only upon the young braaches, which they never water. So that, for five months together, they grow in the heat of summer, and under a scorching sun, without receiving a drop of water, either from the sky or otherwise. When the viotage is over, they let in their cattle to browse in the vineyards; afterwards they cut off all the great wood, and leave only the young stocks about three feet high, which need no propping up with poles as in other places, and therefore they never make use of any such supporters. - Chardin.

Of the Indian dancing women who danced before the Ambassadors at Ispahan, "some were shod after a very strange manner. They had above the isstep of the foot a string tied, with little bells fastened thereto, whereby they discovered the exactness of their cadence, and sometimes corrected the music itself; as they did also by the Tzarpanes or Castagaets, which they had in their hands, in the managing whereof they were very expert."

C'est de quoy les Sultanes et les femmes des Grands Seigneurs, se font des chemises, et des robes pour la chaleur, et le Roy et les Grands se plaisent a les voir au travers de ces chemises fines, et d les faire danser. - Tavernier.

Loud from the chambers of the bridge below. - 28, p. 278.

I came to a village called Cupri-Kent, or the Village of the Bridge, because there is a very fair bridge that stands not far from it, built upon a river called Tabadi. This bridge is placed between two mountains, separated only by the river, and supported by four arches, unequal both in their height and breadth. They are built after an irregular form, in regard of two great heaps of a rock that stand in the river, upon which they laid so many arches. Those at the two ends are hollowed on both sides, and serve to lodge passengers, wherein they have made to that purpose little chambers and porticoes, with every one a chimney. The arch in the middle of the river is hollowed quite through, from one part to the other, with two chambers at the eads, and two large balconies covered, where they take the cool air is the summer with great delight, and to which there is a descent of two pair of stairs hown out of the rock. There is not a fairer bridge in all Georgia. -Chardin.

Over the river Isperuth "there is a very fair bridge, built on six arches, each whereof hath a spacious room, a kitchen, and several other conveniences, lying even with the water. The going down into it is by a stone pair of stairs, so that this bridge is able to find entertainment for a whole coravanne." -Amb. Tr.

The most magnificent of these bridges is the bridge of Zulpha at Ispahan. 36

THE SEVENTH BOOK.

Now all is done; bring home the Bride again, Bring home the triumph of our victory! Bring home with you the glory of her gain, With joyance bring her, and with jollity. Never had man more joyful day than this, Whom Heaven would heap with bliss.

SPENSER'S Epithalamium.

FROM fear, and from amazement, and from joy, At leugth the Arabian Maid, recovering speech, Threw around Thalaba her arms, and eried, "My father! O my father!" - Thalaba, In wonder lost, yet fearing to inquire, Bent down his check on hers, And their tears met, and mingled as they fell.

2.

ONEIZA.

Thou wert not near, - and yet, when in their grasp 1 woke, my shriek of terror called on thee.

My father could not save me, - an old man!

And they were strong and many ; - O my God, The hearts they must have had to hear his prayers, And yet to leave him childless '

THALABA.

We will seek him: We will return to Araby

ONEIZA.

Alas!

We should not find him, Thalaba! Our tent Is desolate ! the wind hath heap'd the sands Within its door ; the lizard's track is left Fresh on the untrodden dust; prowling by night, The tiger, as he passes, hears no breath Of man, and turns to search the vacancy. Alas! he strays a wretched wanderer, Seeking his child! old man, he will not rest,-He eannot rest, - his sleep is misery, -His dreams are of my wretchedness, my wrongs. O Thalaba ! this is a wicked place !

Let us be gone !

THALABA.

But how to pass again The iron doors, that, opening at a breath, Gave easy entrance? Armies in their might Would fail to move those hinges for return.

ONEIZA.

But we can elimb the mountains that shut in This dreadful garden.

THALABA.

Are Oneiza's limbs Equal to that long toil?

ONEIZA. Oh, I am strong, Dear Thalaba! for this — fear gives me strength, And you are with me!

3.

So she took his hand, And gently drew him forward, and they went Toward the mountain chain.

4.

lt was broad moonlight, and obseure or lost The garden beauties lay, But the great boundary rose, distinctly mark'd. These were no little hills, No sloping uplands lifting to the sun Their vineyards, with fresh verdure, and the shade Of ancient woods, courting the loiterer To win the easy ascent: stone monntains these, Desolate rock on rock, The burdens of the earth, Whose snowy summits met the morning beam When night was in the vale, whose feet were fix'd In the world's foundations. Thalaba beheld The heights precipitous, Impending crags, rocks unascendible, And summits that had tired the eagle's wing; "There is no way!" he said; Paler Oneiza grew, And hung upon his arm a feebler weight.

But soon again to hope Revives the Arabian maid, As Thalaba imparts the sudden thought. "I past a river," cried the youth, "A full and copious stream. The flowing waters cannot be restrain'd, And where they find or force their way, There we perchance may follow; thitherward The current roll'd along." So saying, yet again in hope Quickening their eager steps, They turn'd them thitherward.

6.

Silent and calm the river roll'd along, And at the verge arrived Of that fair garden, o'er a rocky bed, Toward the mountain-base, Still full and silent, held its even way. But farther as they went, its deepening sound Louder and louder in the distance rose, As if it forced its stream Struggling through erags along a narrow pass. And lo! where raving o'er a hollow course The ever-flowing flood Foams in a thousand whirlpools! There, adown The perforated rock, Plunge the whole waters; so precipitous, So fathomless a fall, That their earth-shaking roar eame deaden'd up Like subterranean thunders.

BOOK VI.

"Allah save us!" Oneiza cried; "there is no path for man From this accursed place!" And as she spake, her joints Were loosen'd, and her knees sunk under her "Cheer up, Oneiza!" Thalaba replied; "Be of good heart. We cannot fly The dangers of the place, But we can conquer them!"

And the young Arab's soul Arose within him. "What is he," he cried, "Who hath prepared this garden of delight, And wherefore are its snares?"

9,

The Arabian Maid replied, "The Women, when 1 enter'd, welcomed me To Paradise, by Aloadin's will Chosen, like themselves, a Houri of the Earth. They told me, credulons of his blasphemies, That Aloadin placed them to reward His faithful servants with the joys of Heaven. O Thalaba, and all are ready here To wreak his wicked will, and work all crimes ! How then shall we escape?"

10.

"Woe to him!" cried the Appointed, a stern smile Darkening with stronger shades his conntenance; "Woe to him! he hath laid his toils

To take the Antelope;

The Lion is come in!"

11.

She shook her head — "A Sorcerer he, And gnarded by so many! Thalaba,— And thou but one!"

12.

He raised his hand to Heaven — "Is there not God, Oneiza? I have a Talisman, that, whoso bears, Him, nor the Earthly, nor the Infernal Powers Of Evil, can cast down. Remember, Destiny Hath mark'd me from mankind! Now rest in faith, and I will guard thy sleep!

13.

So on a violet bank The Arabian Maid laid down, Her soft check pillow'd upon moss and flowers She lay in silent prayer, Till prayer had tranquillized her fears, And sleep fell on her. By her side Silent sate Thalaba, And gazed upon the Maid, And, as he gazed, drew in New courage and intenser faith, And waited calmly for the eventful day.

BOOK VII.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

14.

Loud sung the Lark; the awaken'd Maid Beheld him twinkling in the morning light, And wish'd for wings and liberty like his. The flush of fear inflamed her cheek; But Thalaba was calm of soul, Collected for the work. He ponder'd in his mind How from Lobaba's breast His blunted arrow fell. Aloadin, too, might wear Spell perchance of equal power To blunt the weapon's edge.

I5.

Beside the river-brink Grew a young poplar, whose unsteady leaves Varying their verdure to the gale, With silver glitter caught His meditating eye. Then to Oneiza turn'd the youth, And gave his father's bow, And o'er her shoulders slung The quiver arrow-stored. "Me other weapon suits," said he; "Bear thou the Bow : dear Maid, The days return upon me, when these shafts, True to thy guidance from the lofty palm Brought down its eluster, and thy gladden'd eye, Exulting, turn'd to seek the voice of praise. Oh! yet again, Oneiza, we shall share Our desert-joys!" So saying, to the bank He moved, and, stooping low, With double grasp, hand below hand, he clinch'd, And from its watery soil Uptore the poplar trunk.

I6.

Then off he shook the clotted earth, And broke away the head, And boughs, and lesser roots; And lifting it aloft, Wielded with able sway the massy club. "Now for this child of Hell!" quoth Thalaba; "Belike he shall exchange to-day His dainty Paradise For other dwelling, and its cups of joy For the unallayable bitterness Of Zaccoum's fruit accurs'd."

17

With that the Arabian youth and maid Toward the centre of the garden went. It chanced that Aloadin had convoked The garden-habitants, And with the assembled throng Oneiza mingled, and the Appointed Youth Unmark'd they mingled; or if one With busier finger to his neighbor notes The quiver'd Maid, "Haply," he says, "Some daughter of the Homerites, Or one who yet remembers with delight Her native tents of Ilimiar." "Nay!" rejoins His comrade, "a love-pageant! for the man Mimics with that fierce eye and knotty club Some savage lion-tamer ; she forsooth Must play the heroine of the years of old !

18.

Radiant with gems upon his throne of gold Sat Aloadin; o'er the Sorcerer's head Hover'd a Bird, and in the fragrant air Waved his wide, winnowing wings, A living canopy. Large as the hairy Cassowar Was that o'ershadowing Bird; So huge his talons, in their grasp The Eagle would have hung a helpless prey. His beak was iron, and his plumes Glitter'd like burnish'd gold, And his eyes glow'd, as though an inward fire Shone though a diamond orb.

19.

The blinded multitude Adored the Sorcerer, And bent the knee before him, And shouted forth his praise; "Mighty art thou, the bestower of joy, The Lord of Paradise!" Then Aloadin rose, and waved his hand, And they stood mute and moveless, In idolizing awe.

20.

" Children of Earth," he said, "Whom I have guided here By easier passage then the gate of Death, The infidel Sultan, to whose lands My mountains stretch their roots, Blasphemes and threatens me. Strong are his armies; many are his guards, Yet may a dagger find him. Children of Earth, I tempt ye not With the vain promise of a bliss unseen, With tales of a hereafter Heaven, Whence never Traveller hath return'd ' Have ye not tasted of the cup of joy That in these groves of happiness Forever over-mantling tempts The ever-thirsty lip? Who is there here that by a deed Of danger will deserve The eternal joys of actual Paradise ? "

21.

"1!" Thalaba exclaim'd ; And springing forward, on the Sorcerer's head He dash'd his knotty club.

22.

Aloadin fell not, though his skull Was shattered by the blow, For by some talisman His miserable life imprison'd still Dwelt in the body. The astonish'd crowd Stand motionless with fear, Expecting to behold Immediate vengeance from the wrath of Heaven And lo! the Bird—the monster Bird,—

Soars up — then pounces down To seize on 'Thalaba! Now, Oneiza, bend the bow, Now draw the arrow home ! — True fled the arrow fron Oneiza's hand; It pierced the monster Bird, It broke the Talisman,— Then darkness cover'd all,— Earth shook, Heaven thunder'd, and amid the yells Of evil Spirits perished The Paradise of Sin.

At last the earth was still; The yelling of the Demons ceased; Opening the wreck and ruin to their sight, The darkness roll'd away. Alone in life, Amid the desolation and the dead, Stood the Destroyer and the Arabian Maid. They look'd around; the rocks were rent, The path was open, late by magic closed : Awe-struck and silent, down the stony glen They wound their thoughtful way.

24.

Amid the vale below Tents rose, and streamers play'd, And javelins sparkled to the sun; And multitudes encamp'd Swarm'd, far as eye could travel o'er the plain. There in his war-pavilion sat In council with his Chiefs The Sultan of the Land. Before his presence there a Captain led Oneiza and the Appointed Youth.

25.

"Obedient to our Lord's command," said he, "We past toward the mountains, and began The ascending strait; when suddenly Earth shock, And darkness, like the midnight, fell around, And fire and thunder came from Heaven, As though the Retribution-day were come. After the terror ceased, and when, with hearts Somewhat assured, again we ventured on, This youth and woman met us on the way. They told us, that from Aloadin's hold They came, on whom the judgment stroke hath fallen, He, and his sinful Paradise, at once Destroy'd by them, the agents they of Heaven.

Therefore I brought them hither, to repeat The tale before thy presence : that as search Shall prove it false or faithful, to their merit Thon mayst reward them.'' "Be it done to us,''

Thalaba answer'd, "as the truth shall prove!"

26.

The Sultan, while he spake, Fix'd on him the proud eye of sovereignty; "If thou hast play'd with us, By Allah and by Ali, Death shall seal The lying lips forever! But if the thing Be as thou say'st, Arabian, thou shalt stand Next to ourself ! "-Hark ! while he speaks, the cry, The lengthening cry, the increasing shout Of joyful multitudes ! Breathless and panting to the tent The bearer of good tidings comes, -"O Sultan, live forever ! be thy foes Like Aloadin all ! The wrath of God bath smitten him !"

27.

Joy at the welcome tale Shone in the Sultan's cheek; "Array the Arabian in the robe Of honor," he exclaim'd, "And place a chain of gold around his neck, And bind around his brow the diadem, And mount him on my steed of state, And lead him through the camp, And let the Heralds go before and cry, Thus shall the Sultan reward The man who serves him well!"

28.

Then in the purple robe They vested Thalaba, And hung around his neck the golden chain, And bound his forehead with the diadem, And on the royal steed They led him through the camp, And Heralds went before and cried, "Thus shall the Sultan reward The man who serves him well!"

29.

When, from the pomp of triumph, And presence of the King, Thalaba sought the tent allotted him, Thonghtful the Arabian Maid beheld His animated eye, Ilis cheek inflamed with pride. "Oneiza!" cried the youth, "The King hath done according to his word And made me in the land Next to himself be named !— But why that serions, melancholy smile?— Oneiza, when I heard the voice that gave me Honor, and wealth, and fame, the instant thought Arose to fill my joy, that thon woulds hear

The tidings, and be happy."

ONEIZA.

Thalaba, Thou wouldst not have me mirthful ! Am I not An orphan, — among strangers ?

> THALABA. But with me !

ONEIZA. My Father ! —

THALABA. Nay, be comforted! Last night To what wert thou exposed ! in what a peril

NOTES TO THALABA THE DESTROYER.

The morning found us!—safety, honor, wealth, These now are ours. This instant who thou wert The Sultan ask'd. 1 told him from our childhood We had been plighted;—was 1 wrong, Oneiza? And when he said with bounties he would heap Our nuptials,—wilt thou blame me if I blest His will, that bade me fix the marriage day!— In tears, my love?—

ONEIZA.

Remember, Destiny Hath mark'd thee from mankind ¹

THALABA.

Perhaps when Aloadin was destroy'd The mission eeased; and therefore Providence With its rewards and blessings strews my path Thus for the accomplish'd service.

Thalaba

THALABA.

Or if haply not, yet whither should 1 go? Is it not prudent to abide in peace Till 1 am summon'd?

ONEIZA. Take me to the Deserts '

THALABA.

But Moath is not there; and wouldst thou dwell In a stranger's tent? thy father then might seek In long and fruitless wandering for his child.

ONEIZA.

Take me then to Meeca !

There let me dwell a servant of the Temple. Bind thou thyself my veil, —to human eye It never shall be lifted. There, whilst thou Shalt go upon thine enterprise, my prayers, Dear Thalaba! shall rise to succor thee, And I shall live, — if not in happiness, Surely in hope.

THALABA

Oh, think of better things! The will of Heaven is plain: by wondrons ways It led us here, and soon the common voice Will tell what we have done, and how we dwell Under the shadow of the Sultan's wing; So shall thy father hear the fame, and find us What he hath wish'd us ever. — Still in tears! Still that unwilling eye! nay — nay — Oneiza —

l dare not leave thee other than my own, — My wedded wife. Honor and gratitude As yet preserve the Sultan from all thoughts That sin against thee; but so sure as Heaven

Hath gifted thee above all other maids With loveliness, so surely would those thoughts Of wrong arise within the heart of Power.

If thou art mine, Oneiza, we are safe; But else, there is no sanctuary could save.

ONEIZA.

Thalaba ! Thalaba !

30.

With song, with music, and with dance, The bridal pomp proceeds. Following the deep-veil'd Bride Fifty female slaves attend In costly robes that gleam With interwoven gold, And sparkle far with gems. A hundred slaves behind them bear Vessels of silver and vessels of gold, And many a gorgeous garment gay, The presents that the Sultan gave. On either hand the pages go With torches flaring through the gloom, And trump and timbrel merriment Accompanies their way; And multitudes with loud aeclaim Shout blessings on the Bride. And now they reach the palaee pile, The palace home of Thalaba, And now the marriage feast is spread, And from the finish'd banquet now The wedding guests are gone.

NOTES TO BOOK VII.

Within its door ; the lizard's track is left, &c. - 2, p. 281.

The dust which overspreads these beds of sand is so fine, that the lightest animal, the smallest insect, leaves there, os on snow, the vestiges of its track. The varieties of these impressions produce a pleasing effect, in spots where the saddened soul expects to meet with nothing but symptoms of the proscriptions of nature. — It is impossible to see any thing more beautiful than the traces of the passage of a species of very small lizards, extremely common in these deserts. The extremity of their tail forms regular sinuosities, in the middle of two rows of delineations, also regularly imprinted by their four feet, with their five slender toes. These traces are maltiplied and interworen near the subterranean retreats of these little animals, and present a singular assemblage, which is not woid of beauty. — Sonnini.

In the world's foundations, &c. - 4, p. 282.

These lines are feebly adapted from a passage in Bornet's Theory of the Earth.

Hi sunt primæva et immortales illi nontes, qui non aliunde, quam ex fraeta mundi compage ortum suum ducere potuerunt, nec nisi cum cadem perituri sunt.

The whole chapter demontibus is written with the elequence of a poet. Indeed, Gibbon bestowed no exaggerated praise or Burnet in saying, that he had "blended Scripture, history, and tradition, into one magnificent system, with a sublimity of imagination scarcely inferior to Milton himself." This work abould be read in Latin; the author's own translation is misorably inferior. He lived in the worst age of English prose.

Zaccoum's fruit accurs'd. - 16, p. 283.

The Zaccoum is a tree which issueth from the bottom of Hell; the fruit thereof resembleth the heads of devils; and the danned shall cat of the same, and shall fail their bellies therewith; and there shall be given them thereon a mixture of boiling water to drink; afterwards shall they return to Hell. — Koran, chap. 37.

This hellish Zaccoum has its name from a thorny tree in Tehanna, which bears finit like an ulmond, but extremely biter; therefore the same name is given to the infernal tree, - Sale.

Some daughter of the Homerites. - 17, p. 283.

When the sister of the famous Derar was made prisoner before Damascus with many other Arabian women, she excited them to mutiny, they seized the poles of the tents, and attacked their captors. This bold resolution, says Marigny, was not inspired by impotent anger. Most of these women had military inclinations already ; particularly those who were of the tribe of Himiar, or of the Homerites, where they are early exercised in riding the horse, and in using the bow, the hance, and the javetin. The revolt was successful, for, during the engagement, Derar came up to their assistance. — Mariany.

The Paradise of Sin. - 22, p. 284.

In the N. E. parts of Persia there was an old man named Aloadia, a Mahumetan, which had inclosed a goodly valley, situate between two hilles, and furnished it with all variety which nature and art could yield; as fruits, pictures, rillsof milk, wine, honey, water, pallaces and beautiful damosells, richly attired, and called it Paradise. 'To this was no passage but by an impregnable castle ; and deily preaching the pleasures of this Paradise to the youth which he kept in his court, sometimes he would minister a sleepy drinke to some of them, and then conveigh them thither, where, being entertained with these pleasures four or five days, they supposed themselves rapt into Paradise, and then being again cast into a trance by the said drink, he caused them to be carried forth, and then would examine them of what they had seene, and by this delusion would make them resolute for any enterprise which he should appoint them ; as to murther any prince his enemy, for they feared not death in hope of their Mahumetical Paradise. But Haslor or Ulan, after three years' siege, destroyed him, and this his fool's Paradise. - Purchas.

In another place, Purchas tells the same tale, but calls the impostor Aladenles, and says that Selim the Ottoman Emperor destroyed his Paradise.

The story is told by many writers, but with such difference of time and place, as wholly to invalidate its truth, even were the circumstances more probable.

Travelling on further towards the south, I arrived at a certaine countrey called Melistorte, which is a very pleasant and fertile place. And in this countrey there was a certaine aged man called Senex de Monte, who, round ahout two mountaines, had built a wall to enclose the sayd mountaines. Within this wall there were the fairest and most chrystall fountaines in the whole world; and about the sayd fountaines there were most heautiful virgins in great number, and goodly horses also; and, in a word, every thing that could be devised for bodily solace and delight, and therefore the inhabitants of the countrey call the same place by the name of Paralise.

The sayd olde Senex, when he saw any proper and valiant yong man, he would admit him into his paradise. Moreover by certaine conducts, he makes wine and milk to flow admadantly. This Senex, when he hath a minde to revenge himselfe, or to slay any king or baron, commandeth him that is governor of the sayd Paradise to bring thereunto some of the acquaintance of the sayd king or baron, permitting him a while to take his pleasure therein, and then to give him a certeine potion, being of force to cast him into such a slumber as should make him quite void of all sense, and so being in a profounde sleepe, to convey him out of his paradise; whe being awaked, and seeing himselfe thrust out of the paradise. would become so sorrowfull, that he could not in the world devise what te do, or whither te turne him. Then would he go unto the forsaide old mao, beseeching him that he might be admitted againe iote his paradise; whe soith noto him, you cannot be admitted thither, unlesse you will slay such or such a man for my sake, and if you will give the attempt onely, whether you kill him or no, I will place you againe in paradise, that there you may remaine alwayes. Then would the party, without faile, put the same in execution, indeavoring to murther all those against whom the sayd olde men had conceived any hatred. And therefore all the kings of the East stood is awe of the sayd olde man, and gave unto bim great tribute.

And when the Tartars had subdued a great part of the world, they enne unto the sayd olde men, and tooks from lim the custody of his paradise; who, being incensed thereat, seat abroad divers desperate and resolute persons out of his forenamed paradise, and caused many of the Tartarian nobles to be slain. The Tartars, seeing this, went and besieged the city wherein the sayd olde man was, tooke him, and put him to a most cruell and ignominious death. — Odoricus.

The most particular account is given by that undaunted liar, Sir John Maundeville.

" Beside the Yle of Pentexoire, that is, the Lond of Prestre John, is a gret Yle, long and brode, that men clepen Milsterak ; and it is in the Lordschipe of Prestre John. In that Yle is gret plentee of godes. There was dwellinge sometyme a ryche man; and it is not long sithen, and men clept him Gatholonabes; and he was full of cauteles, and of setylle disceytes; and had a fulle fair castelle, and a strong, in a mountayne, so strong and so noble, that no man cowde devise a fairere, ne a strengere. And he had let muren all the mountayne aboute with a stronge walle and a fair. And withinne the walles he had the fairest gardyn that ony man might behold; and therein were trees hervnge all manner of frutes that ony man cowde devyse, and therein were also alle maner vertuous herbes of gode smelle, and all other herbes also that heren fair floures, and he had elso in that gardyn many faire welles, and beside the welles he had lete make faire halles and faire chambres, depeyated alle with gold and azure. And there weren in that place many dyverse thinges, and many dyverse stories ; and of bestes and of bryddes that songen fulle delectabely, and moveden he craft that it semede that thei weren quyke. And he had also in his gardyn all maner of fowles and of bestes, that ony man might thinke on, for to have pley or desport to beholde hem. And he had also in that place, the faireste damyseles that mighte ben founde nader the age of 15 zere, and the fairest zonge striplynges that men myghte gete of that same age; and all thei weren clothed in clothes of gold fully rychely, and he seyde that the weren angeles. And he had also let make three welles faire and noble end all envyround with ston of jaspre, of cristalle, dyapred with gold, and sett with precious stones, and grete orient perles. And he had made a conduct under erthe, so that the three welles, at his list, on scholde renne milk, another wyn, and another hony, and that place he clept paradys. And whan that ony gode knyght, that was hardy and noble, came to see this Rialtee, he would lede him into his paradys, and schewen him theise wondirfulle thinges to his desport, and the marveyllous and delicions song of dyverse bryddes, and the faire Jamyseles and the faire welles of mylk, wyn, and honey plenteyous rennynge. And he woulde let make dyverse instruments of musick to sownen in nn high tour, so merily, that it was joye for to here, and no man scholde see the craft thereof; and tho, he sayde, weren Aungeles of God, and that place was paradys, that God had behyghte to his friendes, saying, Dabo robis terram fluentem lacte et melle. And thanne welde he makes hem to drynken of certeyn drynk, whereof anon thei sholden be dronken, and thanne wolde hem thinken gretter delyt than thei hadden before. And then wolde he seye to hem, that zif thei wolde dyen for him and for his love, that after hire dethe thei scholde come to his paradys, and thei scholde ben of the age of the damyseles, and thei scholde pleyen with hem and zit ben maydenes. that zit scholdo he putten hem in a fayrere paradys, where that thai scholde see God of nature visibely in his magestee and in his blisse. And than wolde he schewe hem his entent and seve hem, that zif thei wolde go sle such a lord, or such a man, that was his enemye, or contrarious to his list, that thei scholde not drede to don it, and for to he sleyn therefore hemselfe ; for aftir hire dathe he wolde putten hem into another paradys, that was an bundred fold fairere than ony of the tothore; and thera scholda thei dwellen with the most fairest damyseles that myghte be, and pley with hem ever more. And thus wenten many dyverse lusty bacheleres for to sle grete lords, in dyverse countrees, that weren his enemyes, and maden himself te ben slayn in hope to have that paradys. And thus often tyme he was revenged of his enemyes by his sotylle disceytes and false cauteles. And whan the worthe men of the contree hadden perceyved this sotylle falshod of this Gathnlunabes, thei assembled hem with force, and assayleden his castelle and slowen him, and destroyden all the faire places, and alle the nobletees of that paradys. The place of the welles, and of the walles, and of many other thinges, bene zit apertly sene ; but the richesse is voyded clene. And it is not long gon sithen that place was destroyed." — Sir John Maundeville.

Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear, and the horse that the king rideth upon, and the crownroyal which is set upon his head.

And let this apparel and horse he delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, that they may array the man withal whom the king delighteth to honor, and bring him on horsehack through the street of the city, and proclaim before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor. — Esther, vi. 8, 9.

Take me then to Mecca !- 29, p. 285.

The Sheik Kotbeddin discusses the question, whether it be, upon the whole, an advantage or disadvantage to live at Macca; for all doctors agree, that good works performed there have double the merit which they would have any where else. He therefore inquires, whether the guilt of sins must not be augmented in a like proportion. — Notices des MSS de la Bibl. Nat. t. 4. 541.

WOMAN.

Go not among the Tombs, Old Man! There is a madman there.

> OLD MAN. Will he harm me if I go?

WOMAN.

Not he, poor miserable man ! But 'tis a wretched sight to see His utter wretchedness. For all day long he lies on a grave, And never is he seen to weep, And never is he heard to groan, Nor even at the hour of prayer Bends his knee nor moves his lips. I have taken him food for charity, And never a word he spake; But yet so ghastly he look'd, That I have awaken'd at night With the dream of his ghastly eyes. Now, go not among the Tombs, Old Man '

OLD MAN.

Wherefore has the wrath of God So sorely stricken him?

WOMAN.

He came a stranger to the land, And did good service to the Sultan, And well his service was rewarded. The Sultan named him next himself, And gave a palace for his dwelling, And dower'd his bride with rich domains. But on his wedding night There came the Angel of Death Since that hour, a man distracted Among the sepulchres he wanders. The Sultan, when he heard the tale, Said that for some untold crime, Judgment thus had stricken him, And asking Heaven forgiveness That he had shown him favor, Abandon'd him to want.

OLD MAN.

A Stranger did you say !

WOMAN.

An Arab born, like you. But go not among the Tombs, For the sight of his wretchedness Might make a hard heart ache!

OLD MAN.

Nay, nay, I never yet have shunn d A countryman in distress; And the sound of his dear native tongue May be like the voice of a friend.

2.

Then to the Sepulchre Whereto she pointed him, Old Moath bent his way. By the tomb lay Thalaba, In the light of the setting eve; The sun, and the wind, and the rain, Had rusted his raven locks; His checks were fallen in, His face-bones prominent; Reclined against the tomb he lay, And his lean fingers play'd, Unwitting, with the grass that grew beside.

3.

The Old Man know him not, But drawing near him, said, "Countryman, peace be with thee!" The sound of his dear native tongue Awaken'd Thalaba; He raised his countenance, And saw the good Old Man, And he arose and fell upon his neck, And groan'd in bitterness. Then Moath knew the youth, And fear'd that he was childless; and he turn'd His asking eyes, and pointed to the tomb. "Old Man!" cried Thalaba, "Thy search is ended here!"

4.

The father's cheek grew white, And his lip quiver'd with the misery ; Howbeit, collectedly, with painful voice He answer'd, "God is good! His will be done!"

5.

The woe in which he spake, The resignation that inspired his speech, They soften'd Thalaba. "Thou hast a solace in thy grief," he cried, "A comforter within! Moath! thou seest me here, Deliver'd to the Evil Powers, A God-abandon'd wretch."

6.

The Old Man look'd at him incredulous. "Nightly," the youth pursued, "Thy daughter comes to drive me to despair. Moath, thou thinkest me mad; But when the Crier from the Minaret Proclaims the midnight hour, Hast thou a heart to see her?"

7.

In the Meidan now The clang of clarions and of drums Accompanied the Sun's descent. "Dost thou not pray, my son?" Said Moath, as he saw The white flag waving on the neighboring Mosque : Then Thalaba's eye grew wild "Pray!" echoed he, "I must not pray!" And the hollow groan he gave Went to the Old Man's heart. And bowing down his face to earth, In fervent agony he cali'd on God.

8.

A night of darkness and of storms ! Into the Chamber of the Tomb, Thalaba led the Old Man, To roof him from the rain. A night of storms ! the wind Swept through the moonless sky, And maan'd among the pillar'd sepulchres ; And in the pauses of its sweep They heard the heavy rain Beat on the monument above. In silence on Oneiza's grave Her Father and her husband sat.

9.

The Crier from the Minaret Proclaim'd the midnight hour. "Now, now !" cried Thalaba; And o'er the chamber of the tomb There spread a lurid gleam, Like the reflection of a sulphur fire; And in that hideous light Oneiza stood before them. It was She, -Her very lineaments, - and such as death Had changed them, livid cheeks, and lips of blue; But in her eyes there dwelt Brightness more terrible Than all the loathsomeness of death. "Still art thon living, wretch?" In hollow tones she cried to Thalaba; "And must I nightly leave my grave To tell thee, still in vain, God hath abandon'd thee?"

10.

"This is not she !" the Old Man exclaim'd; "A Fiend; a manifest Fiend!" And to the youth he held his lance; "Strike and deliver thyself!" "Strike nER!" cried Thalaba, And, palsied of all power, Gazed fixedly upon the dreadful form. "Yea, strike her!" cried a voice, whose tones Flow'd with such sudden healing through his soul. As when the desert shower From death deliver'd him; But, unobedient to that well-known voice, His eye was seeking it, When Moath, firm of heart, Perform'd the hidding : through the vampire corpse He thrust his lance ; it fell, And, howling with the wound,

Its fieldish tenant fled. A sapphire light fell on them, And garmented with glory, in their sight Oneiza's Spirit stood.

11.

"O Thalaba!" she cried, "Abandon not thyself! Wouldst thou forever lose me? — O my husband, Go and fulfil thy quest, That in the Bowers of Paradise I may not look for thee In vain, nor wait thee long."

12.

To Moath then the Spirit Turn'd the dark lustre of her heavenly eyes "Short is thy destined path, O my dear Father! to the abode of bliss. Return to Araby; There with the thought of death Comfort thy lonely age, BOOK VIII.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

And Azrael, the Deliverer, soon Will visit thee in peace."

13.

They stood with earnest eyes, And arms outreaching, when again The darkness closed around them. The soul of Thalaba revived; He from the floor his quiver took, And as he bent the bow, exclaim'd, "Was it the overruling Providence That in the honr of frenzy led my hands Instinctively to this? To-morrow, and the snn shall brace anew The slacken'd cord, that now sounds loose and damp; To-morrow, and its livelier tone will sing In tort vibration to the arrow's flight. 1-hut I also, with recovered health Of heart, shall do my duty. My Father ! here I leave thee then !" he cried, "And not to meet again, Till, at the gate of Paradise, The eternal union of our joys commence. We parted last in darkness !" - and the youth Thought with what other hopes; But now his heart was calm, For on his soul a heavenly hope had dawn'd.

14.

The Old Man answered nothing, but he held His garment, and to the door Of the Tomb Chamber followed him. The rain had ceased; the sky was wild, Its black clouds broken by the storm. And, lo! it chanced, that in the chasm Of Heaven between, a star, Leaving along its path continuous light, Shot eastward. "See ny guide!" quoth Thalaba; And turning, he received Old Moath's last embrace, And the last blessing of the good Old Man.

15.

Evening was drawing nigh, When an old Dervise, sitting in the sun At the cell door, invited for the night The traveller; in the sun He spread the plain repast, Rice and fresh grapes; and at their feet there flow'd The brook of which they drank.

16.

So as they sat at meal, With song, with musie, and with dance, A wedding train went by; The deep-veil'd bride, the female slaves, The 'torches of festivity, And trump and timbrel merriment Accompanied their way. The good old Dervise gave A blessing as they past; But Thalaba look'd on, And breathed a low, deep groan, and hid his face. The Dervise had known sorrow, and he felt 37 Compassion; and his words Of pity and of piety Open'd the young man's heart. And he told all his tale.

17.

"Repine not, O my Son !" the Old Man replied, "That Heaven hath chasten'd thee. Behold this vine: I found it a wild tree, whose wanton strength Had swollen into irregular twigs And bold excrescences, And spent itself in leaves and little rings, So, in the flourish of its outwardness, Wasting the sap and strength That should have given forth fruit. But when I pruned the plant, Then it grew temperate in its vain expense Of useless leaves, and knotted, as thou seest, Into these full, clear clusters, to repay The hand that wisely wounded it. Repine not, O my Son ! In wisdom and in mercy Heaven inflicts Its painful remedies."

18.

Then pausing, — "Whither goest thou now?" he ask'd. "I know not," answered Thalaba• "My purpose is to hold Straight on, secure of this, That, travel where I will, I cannot stray, For Destiny will lead my course aright."

19.

"Far be from me," the Old Man replied, "To shake that pious confidence; And yet, if knowledge may be gain'd, methinks Thy course should be to seek it painfully. In Kaf the Simorg hath his dwelling-place, The all-knowing Bird of Ages, who hath scen The World, with all its children, thrice destroy'd. Long is the path, And difficult the way, of danger full; But that unerring Bird Could to a certain end Direct thy weary search."

20.

Easy assent the youth Gave to the words of wisdom; and hehold, At dawn, the adventurer on his way to Kaf. And he hath travelled many a day And many a river swum over, And many a mountain ridge hath cross'd, And many a measureless plain; And now, amid the wilds advanced, Long is it since his eyes Have seen the trace of man.

21.

Cold ! cold ! 'tis a chilly clime That the youth in his journey hath reach'd, And he is aweary now, And faint for lack of food.

Cold! cold! there is no Sun in heaven; A heavy and uniform eloud Overspreads the face of the sky, And the snows are beginning to fall. Dost thou wish for thy deserts, O Son of Hodeirah? Dost thou long for the gales of Arabia? Cold! cold! his blood flows languidly, His hands are red, his lips are blue, His feet are sore with the frost. Cheer thee! cheer thee! Thalaba! A little yet bear up!

All waste ! no sign of life But the track of the wolf and the bear ! No sound but the wild, wild wind, And the snow crunching under his feet ! Night is come ; neither moon, nor stars, Only the light of the snow ! But behold a fire in a cave of the hill, A heart-reviving fire ; And thither, with strength renew'd, Thalaba presses on.

23.

He found a Woman in the cave, A solitary Woman, Who by the fire was spinning, And singing as she spun. The pine boughs were cheerfully blazing, And her face was bright with the flame; Her face was as a Damsel's face, And yet her hair was gray. She bade him welcome with a smile, And still continued spinning, And singing as she spun. The thread the woman drew Was finer than the silkworm's, Was finer than the gossamer; The song she sung was low and sweet, But Thalaba knew not the words.

24.

He laid his bow before the hearth, For the string was frozen stiff; He took the quiver from his neck, For the arrow-plumes were iced. Then, as the cheerful fire Revived his languid limbs, The adventurer ask'd for food. The Woman answer'd him, And still her speech was song: "The She Bear she dwells near to me, And she hath cubs, one, two, and three; She hunts the deer, and brings him here, And then with her I make good cheer; And now to the chase the She Bear is gone, And she with her prey will be here anon."

25.

She ceased her spinning while she spake; And when she had answer'd him, Again her fingers twirl'd the thread, And again the Woman began,

In low, sweet tones to sing, The unintelligible song.

26.

The thread she spun it gleam'd like gold In the light of the odorous fire ; Yet was it so wondrously thin, That, save when it shone in the light, You might look for it closely in vain. The youth sat watching it, And she observed his wonder, And then again she spake, And still her speech was song : "Now twine it round thy hands, I say, Now twine it round thy hands, I pray ; My thread is small, my thread is fine, But he mmst be A stronger than thee, Who can break this thread of mine!"

27.

And up she raised her bright blue eyes, And sweetly she smiled on him, And he conceived no ill; And round and round his right hand, And round and round his left, He wound the thread so fine. And then again the Woman spake, And still her speech was song: "Now thy strength, O Stranger, strain ' Now then break the slender chain."

28.

Thalaba strove ; but the thread By magic hands was spun, And in his cheek the flush of shame Arose, commix'd with fear. She beheld, and laugh'd at him, And then again she sung : "My thread is small, my thread is fine, But he must be A stronger than thee, Who can break this thread of mine!"

29.

And up she raised her bright blue eyes, And fiercely she smiled on him: "I thank thee, I thank thee, Hodeirah's son! I thank thee for doing what can't be undone For binding thyself in the chain I have spun Then from his head she wrench'd A lock of his raven hair, And east it in the fire, And east it in the fire, And cried aloud as it burnt, "Sister! Sister! hear my voice! Sister! Sister! come and rejoiee! The thread is spun, The work is done, For I have made captive Hodeirah's Son.'

30.

Borne in her magic car The Sister Sorceress came,

BOOK VIII. NOTES TO THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Khawla, the fiercest of the Sorcerer brood. She gazed upon the youth; She bade him break the slender thread; She laugh'd aloud for scorn; She clapp'd her hands for joy.

31.

The She Bear from the chase came in ; She bore the prey in her bloody mouth ; She laid it at Maimuna's feet ; And then look'd up with wistful eyes, As if to ask her share. "There ! There !" quoth Maimuna, And pointing to the prisoner-youth, She spurn'd him with her foot, And bade her make her meal. But then their mockery fail'd them, And anger and shame arose ; For the She Bear fawn'd on Thalaba, And quietly lick'd his hand.

32.

The gray-hair'd Sorceress stamp'd the ground, And call'd a Spirit up; "Shall we bear the Enemy To the dungeon dens helow?"

SPIRIT.

Woe! woe! to our Empire woe! If ever he tread the caverns below.

MAIMUNA.

Shall we leave him fetter'd here With hunger and cold to die?

SPIRIT.

Away from thy lonely dwelling fly ! Here I see a danger nigh, That he should live, and thou shouldst die.

MAIMUNA.

Whither then must we bear the foe?

SPIRIT.

To Mohareb's island go; There shalt thou secure the foe, There prevent thy future woe.

33.

Then in the Car they threw The fetter'd Thalaba, And took their seats, and set Their feet upon his neck; Maimuna held the reins, And Khawla shook the scourge, And away! away!

34.

They were no steeds of mortal race That drew the magic car With the swiftness of feet and of wings. The snow-dust rises behind them; The ice-rock's splitters fly; And hark, in the valley below The sound of their chariot wheels,— And they are far over the mountains! Away! away! away! The Demons of the air Shout their joy as the Sisters pass; The Ghosts of the Wicked that wander by night Flit over the magic car.

35.

Away! away! away! Over the hills and the plains, Over the shalls and the plains, Over the sands of the shore The waves of ocean heave Under the magic steeds; With unwet hoofs they trample the deep, And now they reach the Island eoast, And away to the city the Monarch's abode. Open fly the city gates, Open fly the iron doors, The doors of the palace-court. Then stopp'd the charmed car.

36.

The Monarch heard the chariot wheels, And forth he came to greet The mistress whom he served. He knew the captive youth, And Thalaba beheld Mohareb in the robes of royalty, Whom erst his arm had thrust Down the bitumen pit.

NOTES TO BOOK VIII.

" But when the Crier from the Minaret," &c. - 6, p. 288.

As the celestial Apostle, et his retreat from Medina, did not perform always the five canonical prayers at the precise time, his disciplea, who often neglected to join with him in the Namaz, assembled one day to fix upon some method of announcing to the public those moments of the day and night when their master discharged this first of religious duties. Flags, hells, trumpets, and fire, were successively proposed as signels. None of these, however, were admitted. The flags were rejected as unsuited to the sanctity of the object; the balls, on account of their being used by Christiens ; the trumpets, as appropriated to the Hebrew worship; the fires, as having too near an analogy to the religion of the pyrolators. From this contrariety of opinions, the disciples separated without any determination. But one of them, Abdullah ibn Zeid Abderyê, saw, the night following, in a dream, a celestial being, clothed in green : he immediately requested his advice, with the most zealous earnestness, respecting the object in dispute. 1 am come to inform you, replied the heavenly visitor, how to discharge this important duty of your religion. Ha then ascended to the roof of the house, and declared the Ezann with a loud voice, and in the same words which have been ever since used to declare the canonical periods. When he awoke, Abdullah ran to declars his vision to the prophet, who loaded him with blessings, and authorized that moment Bilal Habeschy, another of his disciples, to discharge, on the top of his house, that august office, by the title of Muezzinn.

These are the words of the Ezann: Most high God! most high God! most high God! I acknowledge that there is no other except God; I acknowledge that there is no other except God! I acknowledge that Mohammed is the Prophet of God! come to prayer! come to prayer! come to the temple of salvation. Great God! Great God! there is no God except God.

This declaration must be the same for each of the five canonical periods, except that of the morning, when the Muerzian ought to add, after the words, come to the temple of saleation, the following: prayer is to be preferred to sleep, prayer is to be preferred to sleep.

This addition was produced by the zeal and piety of Bilal Habeschy: as he announced, one day, the Ezana of the dawn in the prophet's antechamber, Aische, in a whisper, informed him, that the celestial envoy was still asleep; this first of Muerizims then added these words, prayer is to be preferred to sleep; when he awoke, the prophet applauded him, and commanded Belal to insert them in all the morning Ezanas.

The words must be chanted, but with deliberation and gravity, those particularly which constitute the profession of the faith. The Muezzian must pronounce them distinctly; he must pay more attention to the articulation of the words than to the melody of his voice ; he must make proper intervals and pauses, and not precipitate his words, but let them be clearly understood by the people. He must be interrupted by no other object whatever. During the whole Ezann, he must stand with a finger in each ear, and his face turned, as in prayer, towards the Keabe of Mecca. As he utters these words, come to prayer, come to the temple of salvation, he must turn his face to the right and left, because he is supposed to address all the nations of the world, the whole expanded universe. At this time, the auditors must recite, with a low voice, the Tehhlul, - There is no strength, there is no power, but what is in God, in that Supreme Being, in that powerful Being. - D' Ohsson.

In the Meidan now, &c. - 7, p. 288.

In the Meidan, or great place of the city of Tauris, there are people appointed every evening when the sun sets, and every morning when he rises, to make during half an hour a terrible concert of trumpets and drums. They are placed on one side of the square, in a gallery somewhat elevated; and the same practice is established in every city in Persia.— Taurenier.

Into the Chamber of the Tomb, &c. -8, p. 288.

If we except a few persons, who are buried within the precincts of some sanctuary, the rest are carried out at a distance from their cities and villages, where a great extent of ground is allotted for that purpose. Each family hath a particular portion of it, walled in like a garden, where the bones of their ancestors have remained undisturbed for many generations. For in these enclosures * the graves are all distinct and separate ; having each of them a stone, placed upright, both at the head and feet, inscribed with the name of the person who lieth there interred ; whilst the intermediate space is either planted with flowers, bordered round with stone, or paved all over with tiles. The graves of the principal citizens are further distinguished by some square chamhers or cupolas † that are built over them.

Now, as all these different sorts of tombs and sepulchres, with the very walls likewise of the enclosures, are constantly kept clean, whitewashed, and heantified, they continue, to this day, to be an excellent comment upon that expression of our Savior's, where he mentions the garnishing of the sepulchres, and again, where he compares the acribes, pharisees, and hypocrites, to whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's banes and all uncleanness. For the space of two or three months after any person is interred, the female relations go once a week to weep over the grave, and perform their parentalia upon it. — Shaw.

About a quarter of a mile from the town of Mylasa is a sepulchre of the species called, by the ancients, Distrga, or Double-raofed. It consisted of two square rooms. In the lower, which has a door-way, were deposited the urns, with the ashes of the deceased. In the upper, the relations and friends solemnized the anniversary of the funeral, and per-

St. Anthony the Great once retired to the sepulchres ; a brother shut him in, in one of the tombs, and regularly brought him food. One day he found the doors of the tomb broken, and Anthony lying upon the ground as dead the devil had so mauled him. Once a whole army of devils attacked him; the place was shaken from its foundation, the walls were thrown down, and the crowd of multiform fiends rushed in. They filled the place with the shapes of lions, and bulls, and wolves, asps, serpents, scorpions, pards, and bears, yelling and howling, and threatening, and flogging and wounding him. The brave saint defied them, and upbraided them for their cowardice in not attacking him one to one, and defended himself with the sign of the cross. And lo, a light fell from above, which at once put the hellish rabble to flight, and healed his wounds, and strengthened him; and the walls of the sepulchre rose from their ruins. Then knew Anthony the presence of the Lord, and the voice of Christ proceeded from the light to comfort and applaud him.

The Egyptian saints frequently inhabited sepulchres. St. James the hermit found an old sepulchre, made in the form of a cave, wherein many bones of the dead had been deposited, which, by length of time, were now hecome as dust. Entering there, he collected the bones into a heap, and laid them in a corner of the monument, and closed upon himself the old door of the cave.

In the Lettres Juives is the following extract from the Mercure Historique et Politique. Octob. 1736.

We have had in this country a new scene of Vampirism, which is duly attested by two officers of the Tribunal of Belgrade, who took cognizance of the affair on the spot, and by an officer in his Imperial Majesty's troops at Gradisch, (in Sclaconia.) who was an eye-witness of the proceedings.

In the beginning of September, there died at the village of Kisilova, three loagues from Gradisch, an old man of above threescore and two ; three days after he was buried, he appeared in the night to his son, and desired he would give him somewhat to eat, and then disappeared. The next day the son told his neighbors these particulars. That night the father did not come, but the next evening he made him another visit, and desired something to eat. It is not known whether his son gave him any thing or not, but the next morning the young man was found dead in his bed. The magistrate or bailiff of the place had notice of this; as also that the same day five or six persons fell sick in the village, and died one after the other. He sent an exact account of this to the tribunal of Belgrade, and thereupon two commissioners were despatched to the village, attended by an executioner, with instructions to examine closely into the affair. An officer in the Imperial service, from whom we have this relation, went also from Gradisch, in order to examine personally an affair of which he had heard so much. They opened, in the first place, the graves of all who had been buried in six weeks. When they came to that of the old man, they found his eyes open, his color fresh, his respiration quick and strong; yet he appeared to be stiff and insensible. From these signs, they concluded him to be a notorious Vampire. The executioner thereupon, by the command of the commissioners, struck a stake through his heart ; and when he had so done, they made a bonfire, and therein consumed the carcass to ashes. There were no marks of Vampirism found on his son, or on the bodies of the other persons who died so suddenly.

Thanks be to God, we are as far as any people can be from giving into credulity; we acknowledge that all the lights of physic do not enable us to give any account of this fact, nor do we pretend to eater into its causes. However, we cannot avoid giving credit to a matter of fact juridically attested by competent and unsuspected witnesses, especially since it is far from being the only one of the kind. We shall here annex an instance of the same sort in 1732, already inserted in the Gleaner, No. 18.

In a certaio town of Hungary, which is called, in Latin, Oppida Heidonum, on the other side Tibiscus, vulgatly called the Teysse, that is to say, the river which washes the celebrated territory of Tokay, as also a part of Transylvania, the people known by the name of Heydakes believe that certain deal persons, whom they call Vampires, suck the blood of the living, momuch that these people appear like skeletons, while the dead bodies of the suckers are so full of blood, that it runs out at all the passages of their bodies, and even at their very pores. This old opinion of theirs they support by a multitude of facts, attested in such a manner, that they leave no room for doubt. We shall here mention some of the most considerable.

It is now about five years ago, that a certain Heyduke, an inhabitant of the village of Medreiga, whose name was Arnold Paul, was bruised to death by a hay-cart, which ran ever him. Thirty days after his death, no less than four persons died suddenly in that manner, wherein, according to the tradition of the country, those people generally die who are sucked by Vampires. Upon this, a story was called to mind that this Arnold Paul had told in his lifetime, viz. that at Cossova, on the frontiers of the Turkish Servia, he had been tormented by a Vempire ; (now the established opinion is, that a person sucked by a Vampire becomes a Vampire himself, and sucks in his turn ;) but that he had found a way to rid himself of this evil by esting some of the earth out of the Vampire's grave, and rubbing himself with his blood. This precaution, howhis body being taken up forty days after his death, all the marks of a notorious Vampire were found thereon. Ilis cemplexion was fresh, his hair, nails, and beard were grown; he was full of fluid blood, which ran from all parts of his body upon his shroud. The Hadnagy or Bailiff of the place, who was a person well ocquainted with Vampirism, cansed a sharp stake to be thrust, as the custom is, through the heart of Arnold Paul, and also quite through his body; whereupon he cried out dreadfully, as if he had been alive. This done, they cut off his head, burnt his hody, and threw the ashes thereof into the Sauve. They took the same measures with the bodies of those persons who had died of Vampirism, for fear that they should fall to sucking in their turns.

All these prudent steps did not hinder the same mischief from breaking out again about five years afterwards, when several people in the same village died in a very odd manner. In the space of three months, seventeen persons of all ages and sexes died of Vampirism, some suddenly, and some after two or three days' suffering. Amongst others, there was one Stanoska, the daughter of a Heyduke, whose name was Jovitzo, who, going to bed in perfect health, waked in the middle of the night, and making a terrible outery affirmed, that the son of a certain Heyduke, whose name was Millo, and who had heen dead about three weeks, had attempted to strangle her in her sleep. She continued from that time in a languishing condition, and in the space of three days died. What this girl had said, discovered the son of Millo to be a Vampire, They took up the body, and found him so in effect. The principal persons of the place, particularly the physician and surgeens, began to examine very narrowly, how, in spite of all their precautions, Vumpirism had again broke out in so terrible a manner. After a strict inquisition, they found that the deceased Arnold Paul had not only sucked the four persons before mentioned, but likewise several heasts, of whom the new Vampires had eaten, particularly the son of Millo. In duced by these circumstances, they took a resolution of digging up the bodies of all persons who had died within a certain They did so, and amongst forty bodies, there were time. found seventeen evidently Vampires. Through the hearts of these they drove stakes, cut off their heads, burnt their bodies, and threw the ashes into the river. All the informations we trave been speaking of were taken in a legal way, and all the executions were so performed, as appears by certificates drawn up in full form, attested by several officers in the neighboring garrisons, by the surgeous of several regiments, and the principal inhabitants of the place. The verbal process was sent towards the latter end of last January, to the council of war at Vienna, who therenpon established a special commission to examine into these facts. Those just now mentioned were attested by the Hadnagi Barriarer, the principal Heyduke of the village, as also by Battuer, first lieutenant of prince Alexander of Wirtemberg, Flickstenger, surgeon-major of the regiment of Furstemberg, three other surgeons of the same regiment, and several other persons.

This superstition extends to Greece.

The man, whose story we are going to relate, was a peasant of Mycone, naturally ill-natured and quarrelsome ; this is a circumstance to be taken notice of in such cases. He was murdered in the fields, nobody knew how, or by whom. Two days after his being buried in a chapel in the town, it was noised about that he was seen to walk in the night with great haste, that he tumbled about peeple's goods, put out their lamps, griped them behind, and a theusand other monkey tricks. At first the story was received with laughter ; but the thing was looked upon to be serious when the better sort of people began to complain of it; the Papas themselves gave credit to the fact, and no doubt had their reasons for so doing ; masses must be said, to be sure : but for all this, the peasant dreve his old trade, and heeded nothing they could do. After divers meetings of the chief people of the city, of priests, and monks, it was gravely concluded, that it was necessary, in consequence of some musty ceremonial, to wait till nine days after the interment should be expired.

On the tenth day, they said one mass in the chapel where the body was laid, in order to drive out the Demon which they imagined was got into it. After mass, they took up that hody, and got every thing ready for pulling out its heart. The butcher of the town, an old clumsy fellow, first opens the belly instead of the breast ; he groped a long while among the entrails, but could not find what he locked for; at last, somebody told him he should cut up the diaphragm. The heart was then pulled out, to the admiration of all the spectators. In the mean time, the corpse stunk so abominably, that they were obliged to burn frankineense; but the smoke mixing with the exhalations from the careass, increased the stink, and began to muddle the poor people's pericranies. Their imagination, struck with the spectacle before them, grew full of visions. It came into their noddles that a thick smoke came out of the body; we durst not say it was the smoke of the incense. They were incessantly bawling out Vroucolacas, in the chapel, and place before it ; this is the name they give to these pretended Redivivi. The noise bellowed through the streets, and it seemed to be a name invented on purpose to rend the roof of the chapel. Several there present averred, that the wretch's blood was extremely red ; the butcher swora the body was still warm; whence they concluded that the deceased was a very ill man for not being thoroughly dead, or, in plain terms, for suffering himself to be reanimated by Old Nick; which is the notion they have of Vroncolacas. They then roared out that name in a stupendous manner. Just at this time came in a flock of people, loudly protesting, they plainly perceived the bedy was not grown stiff, when it was carried from the fields to church to be buried, and that consequently it was a true Vroucolacas; which word was still the burden of the song.

I don't doubt they would have sworn it did not stink, had not we been there ; so mazed were the poor people with this disaster, and so infatuated with their notion of the dead being reanimated. As for us, who were got as close to the corpse as we could, that we might be more exact in our observations, we were almost poisoned with the intelerable stink that issued from it. When they asked us what we thought of this body, we told them we believed it to be very thoroughly dead. But as we were willing to cure, or at least not to exasperate their prejudiced imaginations, we represented to them, that it was no wonder the butcher should feel a little warmth when he groped among outrails that were then rotting, that it was no extraordinary thing for it to emit fumes, since dung turned np will do the same; that as for the pretended redness of the blood, it still appeared by the butcher's hands to be nothing but a very stinking, nasty smear.

After all our reasons, they were of opinion it would be their wisest course to burn the dead man's heart on the sea shore, but this execution did not make him a bit more tractable; he went on with his racket more furiously than ever; he was accused of beating folks in the night, breaking down doors and even roofs of houses, clattering windows, tezring elethes, amptying bottles and vessels. It was the most thirsty devil! I believe he did not spare any body but the Consul, in whose house we lodged. Nothing could be more miscrable than the condition of this island; all the inhabitants seemed frighted out of their senses; the wiscat among them were stricken like the rest; it was an epidemical disease of the brant, as dangerous and infectious as the madness of dogs. Whole families quitted their houses, and brought their tent ieds from the farthest parts of the town into the public place, there to spend the night. They were every instant complaining of some new insult; nothing was to be heard but sighs and growns at the approach of night; the better sort of people retired into the country.

When the prepossession was so general, we thought it our best way to hold our tongues. Had we opposed it, we had not only been accounted ridiculous blockheads, but Atheists and Infidels; how was it possible to stand against the madness of a whole people? Those that believed we doubted the truth of the fact, came and apbraided as with our incredulity, and strove to prove that there were such things as Vroucolacasses, by citations out of the Buckler of Faith, written by F. Richard, a Jesuit Missionary. He was a Latin, say they, and consequently you ought to give hum credit. We should have got nothing by denying the justness of the consequence : it was as good as a concely to us every morning to hear the new follies committed by this night bird ; they charged him with being guilty of the most abominable sure.

Some citizens, that were most zealous for the good of the public, fancied they had been deficient in the most material part of the ceremony. They were of opinion that they had been wrong in saying mass before they had pulled out the wretch's heart: had we taken this precaution, quoth they, we had bit the devil as sure as a gun ; he would have been hanged before he would ever have come there ag in ; whereas, saying mass first, the cunning dog fled for it awhile, and came back again when the danger was over.

Notwithstanding these wise reflections, they remained in as much perplexity as they were the first lay: they neet night and morning, they delate, they nuck processions three days and three nights; they oblige the Papas to fast; you night see them running from house to house, holy-water-brush in hand, sprinkling it all about, and washing the doors with it; nay, they ported it into the month of the poor Vroucolacas.

We so often repeated it to the magistrates of the town, that in Christendom we should keep the strictest watch a-nights upon such an occasion, to observe what was done, that at last they caught a few vagabonds, who undoultedly had a hand in these disorders; but either they were not the chief ringleaders, or alse they were released too soon. For two days afterwards, to make themselves amends for the Lent they had kept in prisoo, they fell fool again upon the wine-tubis of those who were such fools as to leave their houses empty in the night: so that the people were forced to betake themselves again to their prayers.

One day, as they were hard at this work, after having stuck I know not how many naked swords over the grave of this corpse, which they took up three or four times a-day, for any man's whim, an Albaneze that happened to be at Mycone took upon him to say, with a voice of authority, that it was in the last degree ridiculous to make use of the swords of Christians in a case like this. Can you not conceive, blind as ye are, says he, that the handles of these swords, being made like a cross, hinders the devil from coming out of the body ? Why do you not rather take the Turkish sabres? The advice of this learned man had no effect : the Vroucolacus was incorrigible, and all the inhabitants were in a strange consternation; they knew not now what saint to call upon, when, of a sudden, with one voice, as if they had given each other the hint, they fell to bawling out all through the city, that it was intolerable to wait any longer; that the only way left was to burn the Vroucolacas entire ; but after so doing, let the devil lurk in it if he could; that it was better to have recourse to this extremity than to have the island totally deserted; and, indeed, whole families began to pack up, in order to retire to Syre or Tinos. The magistrates therefore ordered the Vroucolacas to be carried to the point of the island St. George, where they prepared a great pile with pitch and tar, for fear the wood, as dry as it was, should not burn fast enough of itself. What they had before left of this miserable carcase was thrown into this fire and consumed presently.—It was on the lst of January, 1701. We saw the flame as we returned from Debos; it might justly be called a bonfire of joy, since after this nu more complaints were heard against the Vroucolaces; they said that the devil had now met with his match, and some ballads were made to turn him into ridicule.—Tournefort.

In Dalmatia, the Morlachians, before a foneral, cut the hamstrings of the corpse, and mark certain characters upon the body with a hot iron; they then drive nails or pins into different parts of it, and the sorcerers finish the ceremony by repeating certain mysterious words; after which they rest confident that the deceased cannot return to the earth to shed the blond of the living. — Cassas.

The Turks have an opinion, that men that are buried have a 'sort of life in their graves. If any man makes affidavit before a judge, that he beard a noisa in a man's grave, he is, by order, dug up, and chopped all to pieces. The merchants, at Constantinople, once airing on horseback, had, as usual, for protection, a Janizary with them. Passing by the burying place of the Jews, it happened that an old Jew sat by a sepulchre. The Janizary rode up to him, and rated him for stinking the world a second time, and commanded him to get into his grave again. — Roger North's Life of Sir Dudley North.

"That Heaven has chasten'd thee. Behold this vine."-17, p. 289.

In these lines, I have versified a passage in Bishop Taylor's Sermons, altering as little as possible his unimprovable language.

"For so have I known a luxuriant vine swell into irregular twugs and bold excressences, and spend itself in leaves and little rings, and afford but trilling clusters to the wine-press, and a faint return to his heart which longed to be refreshed with a full vintage; but when the Lord of the vine had caused the dressers to cut the wilder plant, and made it bleed, it grew temperate in its vain expense of useless leaves, and knotted into fair and juicy branches, and made accounts of that loss of blood, by the return of fruit."

"And difficult the way, of danger full." - 19, p. 269.

It appears from Hafiz, that the way is not easily found out. He says, "Do not expect faith from any one; if you do, doceive yourself in searching for the Simorg and the philosopher's stone."

And away ! away ! away ! - 33, p. 291.

My readers will recollect the Lenora. The unwilling resemblance has been forced upon me by the subject. I could not turn aside from the road, because Burger had travelled it before. The "Old Woman of Berkeley" has been foolishly called an :mitation of that inimitable ballad; the likeness is of the same kind as between Macedon and Monmouth. Both are ballads, and there is a horse in both.

Mohareb in the robes of royalty, &c. -- 36, p. 291.

How came Mohareb to be Sultan of this island? Every one who has read Don Quixote, knows that there are always islands to be had by adventurers. He killed the former Sultan, and reigned in his stead. What could not a Domdanielite perform? The narration would have interrupted the flow of the main story.

BOOK VIII

THE NINTH BOOK.

Conscience ! --Poor plodding priests, and preaching friars, may make Their hollow pulpits and the empty aisles Of churches ring with that round word; but we, That draw the subtile and more piercing air In that sublimed region of a court, Know all is good we make so, and go on Secured by the prosperity of our crimes. B. JONSON. MORTIMER'S FALL

1.

"Go up, my Sister Mannuna, Go up, and read the stars"

2.

Lo[†] on the terrace of the topmost tower She stands; her darkening eyes, Her fine face raised to Heaven; Her white hair flowing like the silver streams That streak the northern night.

3.

They hear her coming tread, They lift their asking eyes; Her face is serious, her unwilling lips Slow to the tale of ill. "What hast thou read?" Quoth Khawla in alarm. "Danger — death — judgment!" Maimuna replied.

4.

Is that the language of the lights of Heaven ?" Exclaim'd the sterner Witch;
"Creatures of Allah, they perform his will, And with their lying menaces would daunt Our credulous folly. Maimuna,
I never liked this uncongenial lore ! Better befits to make the Sacrifice Of Divination; so shall I Be mine own Oracle.
Command the victims thou, O King ! Male and female they must be; Thou knowest the needful rites Meanwhile I purify the place."

5.

The Sultan went; the Soreeress rose, And North, and South, and East, and West, She faced the points of Heaven; And ever where she turn'd She laid her hand upon the wall; And up she look'd, and smote the air; And down she stoop'd, and smote the floor. "To Eblis and his servants I consecrate the place; Let enter none but they! Whatever hath the breath of life, Whatever hath the say of hife, Let it be blasted and die!" Now all is prepared; Mohareb returns, The Circle is drawn, The Victims have bled, The Youth and the Maid. She in the circle holds in either hand, Clinch'd by the hair, a head, The heads of the Youth and the Maid. "Go out, ye lights!" quoth Khawla; And in darkness began the spell.

6.

With spreading arms she whirls around Rapidly, rapidly, Ever around and around; And loudly she calls the while, "Eblis! Eblis!" Loudly, incessantly, Still she ealls, "Eblis! Eblis!" Giddily, giddily, still she whirls, Loudly, incessantly, still she calls; The motion is ever the same, Ever around and around; The ealling is still the same, Still it is, "Eblis ! Eblis ! " Till her voice is a shapeless yell, And dizzily rolls her brain; And now she is full of the Fiend. She stops, she rocks, she reels! Look! look! she appears in the darkness' Her flamy hairs curl up, All living, like the Meteor's locks of light Her eyes are like the sickly Moon '

8.

It is her lips that move, Her tongue that shapes the sound; But whose is the Voice that proceeds? "Ye may hope, and ye may fear; The danger of his stars is near. Sultan! if he perish, woe! Fate hath written one death-blow For Mohareb and the Foe! Triumph. triumph! only she That knit his bonds can set him free."

9.

She spake the Oracle, And senselessly she fell. They knelt in eare beside her, — Her Sister and the King; They sprinkled her palms with water, They wetted her nostrils with blood.

10.

She wakes as from a dream, She asks the utter'd voice; But when she heard, an anger and a grief Darken'd her wrinkling brow. "Then let him live in long captivity!" She answer'd: but Mohareb's quicken'd eye Perused her snllen countenance, That lied not with the lips. A miserable man!

What boots it that, in central caves, The Powers of Evil at his Baptism pledged The Sacranent of Hell! His death secures them now. What boots it that they gave Abdaldar's guardian ring, When, through another's life, The blow may reach his own?

11.

He sought the dungeon cell Where Thalaba was laid. 'Twas the gray morning twilight, and the voice Of Thalaba, in prayer, With words of hallow'd import, smote his ear. The grating of the heavy linge Roused not the Arabian youth; Nor lifted he his earthward face, At sound of coming feet. Nor did Mohareb with nnholy speech Disturb the duty: silent, spirit-awed, Envious, heart-humbled, he beheld The peace which piety alone can give.

12.

When Thalaba, the perfect rite perform'd, Raised his calm eye, then spake the Island-Chief: "Arab! my guidance through the dangerons Cave Thy service overpaid, An unintended friend in enmity. The Hand that caught thy ring Received and hore me to the scene I sought. Now know me grateful. 1 return That amulet, thy only safety here."

13.

Artful he spake, with show of gratitude Veiling the selfish deed. Lock'd in his magic chain, Thalaba on his passive powerless hand Received again the Spell. Remembering then with what an ominous faith First he drew on the ring, The youth repeats his words of augury; "In God's name and the Prophet's! be its power Good, let it serve the righteous! if for evil, God and my trust in 11im shall hallow it. Blindly the wicked work The righteous will of Heaven!' So Thalaba received again The written ring of gold.

Thoughtful awhile Mohareb stood, And eyed the captive youth. Then, building skilfully sophistic speech, Thus he began : "Brave art thou, Thalaba; And wherefore are we foes? — for I would buy Thy friendship at a princely price, and make thee To thine own welfare wise. Hear me ! in Nature are two hostile Gods, Makers and Masters of existing things, Eqnal in power : — nay, hear me patiently ! — Equal — for look around thee ! The same Earth Bears fruit and poison; where the Camel finds

His fragant food, the horned Viper there Sucks in the juice of death : the Elements Now serve the use of man, and now assert Dominion o'er his weakness: dost thou hear The sound of merriment and nuptial song? From the next house proceeds the mourner's ery, Lamenting o'er the dead. Say'st thou that Sin Enter'd the world of Allah? that the Fiend, Permitted for a season, prowls for prey? When to thy tent the venomous serpent ereeps, Dost thon not crush the reptile? Even so, Be sure, had Allah crush'd his Enemy, But that the power was wanting. From the first, Eternal as themselves their warfare is; To the end it must endure. Evil and Good, What are they, Thalaba, but words? in the strife Of Angels, as of Men, the weak are guilty; Power must deeide. The Spirits of the Dead, Quitting their mortal mansion, enter not, As falsely ye are preach'd, their final seat Of bliss, or bale; nor in the sepulchre Sleep they the long, long sleep : each joins the host Of his great leader, aiding in the war Whose fate involves his own. Woe to the vanquish'd then ! Woe to the sons of man who follow'd him! They, with their Leader, through eternity, Must howl in central fires. Thou, Thalaba, hast chosen ill thy part, If choice it may be call'd, where will was not, Nor searching doubt, nor judgment wise to weigh. Hard is the service of the Power beneath Whose banners thou wert born ; his discipline Severe, yea, cruel; and his wages, rich Only in promise; who hath seen the pay? For us, the pleasures of the world are ours, Riches and rule, the kingdoms of the Earth. We met in Babylon adventurers both, Each zealous for the hostile Power he serv'd; We meet again; thou feelest what thou art, Thou seest what I am, the Sultan here, The Lord of Life and Death. Abandon him who has abandon'd thee, And be, as I am, great among mankind !

The Captive did not, hasty to confute, Break off that subtle speech;

But when the expectant silence of the King Look'd for his answer, then spake Thalaba.

"And this then is thy faith ! this monstrous creed ' This lie against the Sun, and Moon, and Stars, And Earth, and Heaven ! Blind man, who canst not see

How all things work the best! who wilt not know That in the Manhood of the World, whate'er Of folly mark'd its Infancy, of vice Sullied its Youth, ripe Wisdom shall cast off, Stablished in good, and, knowing evil, safe.

Sultan Mohareb, yes, ye have me here In chains; but not forsaken, though oppress'd; Cast down, but not destroy'd. Shall danger daunt, Shall death dismay his soul, whose life is given

For God, and for his brethren of mankind? Alike rewarded, in that holy cause,

And out the Tyrant rushes, And all-impatient of the thoughts That canker'd in his heart, Seeks, in the giddiness of boisterous sport, Short respite from the avenging power within 17.

What Woman is she So wrinkled and old, That goes to the wood? She leans on her staff With a tottering step, She tells her head-string slow Through fingers dull'd by age. The wanton boys bemock her; The bahe in arms that meets her Turns round with quick affright, And clings to his nurse's neck.

18.

Hark ! hark ! the hunter's ery ; Mohareb has gone to the chase. The dogs, with eager yelp, Are struggling to be free ; The hawks, in frequent stoop, Token their haste for flight ; And couchant on the saddle-bow, With tranquil eyes and talons sheathed, The ounce expects his liberty.

19.

Propp'd on the staff that shakes Beneath her trembling weight, The Old Woman sees them pass. Halloa! halloa! The game is up ! The dogs are loosed, The deer bounds over the plain : The dogs pursue Far, far behind, Though at full stretch, With eager speed, Far, far behind. But lo! the Falcon o'er his head Hovers with hostile wings, And buffets him with blinding strokes! Dizzy with the deafening strokes, In blind and interrupted course, Poor beast, he struggles on; And now the dogs are nigh ! How his heart pants! you see 38

The panting of his heart; And tears like human tears Roll down, along the big veins fever-swollen; And now the death-sweat darkens his dun hide; His fear, his groans, his agony, his death, Are the sport, and the joy, and the triumph!

Halloa! another prey, The nimble Antelope ! The ounce is freed; one spring, And his talons are sheathed in her shoulders. And his teeth are red in her gore. There came a sound from the wood, Like the howl of the winter wind at night, Around a lonely dwelling; The ounce, whose gums were warm in his prey, He hears the summoning sound. In vain his master's voice, No longer dreaded now, Calls and recalls with threatful tone; Away to the forest he goes; For that Old Woman had laid Her shrivell'd finger on her shrivell'd lips, And whistled with a long, long breath; And that long breath was the sound Like the howl of the winter wind, at night, Around a lonely dwelling.

Mohareb knew her not, As to the chase he went, The glanee of his proud eye Passing in scorn o'er age and wretchedness. She stands in the depth of the wood, And panting to her feet, Fawning and fearful, ereeps The ounce by charms constrain'd. Well mayst thou fear, and vainly dost thou fawn Her form is changed, her visage new, Her power, her art the same ! It is Khawla that stands in the wood.

22.

She knew the place where the Mandrake grew, And round the neck of the ounce, And round the Mandrake's head, She tightens the ends of her cord. Her ears are closed with wax, And her press'd finger fastens them, Deaf as the Adder, when, with grounded head, And circled form, both avenues of sound Barr'd safely, one slant eye Watches the charmer's lips Waste on the wind his baffled witchery. The spotted ounce, so beautiful, Springs forceful from the scourge With that the dying plant, all agony, Feeling its life-strings erack, Utter'd the unimaginable groan That none can hear and live.

23.

Then from her victim servant Khawla loosed The precious poison. Next, with naked hand,

She pluck'd the boughs of the manchineel; And of the wormy wax she took, That, from the perforated tree forced out, Bewray'd its insect-parent's work within 24.

In a cavern of the wood she sits, And moulds the wax to human form; And, as her fingers kneaded it, By magic accents, to the mystic shape Imparted with the life of Thalaba, In all its passive powers, Mysterious sympathy. With the mandrake and the manchineel She builds her pile accursed. She lays her finger to the pile, And blue and green the flesh Glows with emitted fire, A fire to kindle that strange fuel meet.

25.

Before the fire she placed the imaged wax; "There waste away!" the Enchantress cried, "And with thee waste Hodeirah's Son!"

26.

Fool! fool! go thaw the everlasting ice, Whose polar mountains bound the human reign. Blindly the wicked work The righteous will of Heaven ! The doom'd Destroyer wears Abdaldar's ring ; Against the danger of his horoscope Yourselves have shielded him ; And on the sympathizing wax, The unadmitted flames play powerlessly As the cold moon-beam on a plain of snow.

27.

Curse thee ! eurse thee ! '' cried the fiendly woman,
" Hast thou yet a spell of safety ? ''
And in the raging flames
She threw the imaged wax
It lay amid the flames,
Like Polycarp of old,
When, by the glories of the burning stake
O'er-vaulted, his gray hairs
Curl'd, life-like, to the fire
That haloed round his saintly brow.

28.

"Wherefore is this!" cried Khawla, and she stamp'd Thrice on the cavern floor: "Maimuna! Maimuna!" Thrice on the floor she stamp'd, Then to the rocky gateway glanced Her eager eyes, and Maimuna was there. "Nay, Sister, nay!" quoth she; "Mohareb's life Is link'd with Thalaba's! Nay, Sister, nay! the plighted oath! The common sacrament!"

29.

" Idiot ! " said Khawla, " one must die, or all ! Faith kept with him were treason to the rest. Why lies the wax like marble in the fire ?

What powerful amulet Protects Hodeirah's Son?"

30.

Cold, marble-cold, the wax Lay on the raging pile, Cold in that white intensity of fire. The Bat, that with her hook'd and leathery wings Clung to the cave-roof, loosed her hold, Death-sickening with the heat; The Toad, which to the darkest nook had crawl'd, Panted fast, with fever pain; The Viper from her nest came forth, Leading her quicken'd brood, That, sportive with the warm delight, roll'd out Their thin curls, tender as the tendril rings, Ere the green beauty of their brittle youth Grows brown, and toughens in the summer sun. Cold, marble-cold, the wax Lay on the raging pile, The silver quivering of the element O'er its pale surface shedding a dim gloss.

31.

Amid the red and fiery smoke, Watching the portent strange, The blue-eyed Soreeress and her Sister stood, Seeming a ruined Angel by the side Of Spirit born in hell. Maimuna raised at length her thoughtful eyes "Whence, Sister, was the wax? The work of the worm, or the bee? Nay, then, 1 marvel not! It were as wise to bring from Ararat The fore-world's wood to build the magic pile, And feed it from the balm bower, through whose veins

The Martyr's blood sends such a virtue out That the fond mother from beneath its shade Wreathes the horn'd viper round her playful child. This is the eternal, universal strife! There is a Grave-wax,—1 have seen the Gouls Fight for the dainty at their banqueting."— 32.

" Excellent Witch !" quoth Khawla; and she went To the cave-arch of entrance, and scowl'd up, Mocking the blessed Sun: " Shine thou in Heaven, but I will shadow Earth ' Thou wilt not shorten day, But I will hasten darkness ! " Then the Witch Began a magic song, One long, low tone, through teeth half-elosed, Through lips slow-moving, muttered slow; One long-continued breath, Till to her eyes a darker yellowness Was driven, and, fuller swollen, the prominent veins On her loose throat grew black. Then, looking upward, thrice she breathed Into the face of Heaven. The baneful breath infected Heaven ; A mildewing fog it spread Darker and darker; so the evening sun Pour'd his unentering glory on the mist, And it was night below

BOOK IX

33.

• Bring now the wax," quoth Khawla, "for thou know'st The mine that yields it. Forth went Maimuna; in mist and darkness went the Sorceress forth; And she hath reach'd the Place of Tombs, And in their sepulchres the Dead Feel feet unholy trampling over them.

34.

Thou startest, Maimuna, Because the breeze is in thy lifted locks! Is Khawla's spell so weak? Sudden came the breeze and strong; The heavy mist, wherewith the lungs, oppress'd, Were laboring late, flies now before the gale, Thin as an infant's breath, Seen in the sunshine of an autumn frost. Sudden it came, and soon its work was done, And suddenly it ceased; Cloudless and calm it left the firmament, And beautiful in the blue sky Arose the summer Moon.

35.

She heard the quicken'd action of her blood;
She felt the fever in her cheeks.
Daunted, yet desperate, in a tomb
Entering, with impious hand she traced
Circles, and squares, and trines,
And magic characters,
Till, riven by her charms, the tomb
Yawn'd, and disclosed its dead;
Maimuna's eyes were open'd, and she saw
The secrets of the Grave.

36.

There sat a Spirit in the vault, In shape, in hue, in lineaments, like life; And by him couch'd, as if intranced, The hundred-headed Worm that never dies.

37.

"Nay, Sorceress! not to-night!" the Spirit cried; "The flesh in which I sinn'd may rest to-night From suffering; all things, even I, to-night, Even the Damn'd, repose!"

38.

The flesh of Maimuna Crept on her bones with terror, and her knees Trembled with their trembling weight. "Only this Sabbath! and at dawn the Worm Will wake, and this poor flesh must grow to meet The gnawing of his hundred poison-mouths! God! God! is there no mercy after death!"

39.

Soul-struck, she rush'd away; She fled the Place of Tombs; She cast herself npon the earth, All agony, and tumult, and despair. And in that wild and desperate agony Sure Maimuna had died the utter death, If aught of evil had been possible On this mysterious night; For this was that most holy night When all Created Things adore The Power that made them; Insects, Beasts, and Birds, The Water-Dwellers, Herbs, and Trees, and Stones, Yea, Earth and Ocean, and the infinite Heaven, With all its Worlds. Man only doth ne know

The universal Sabbath, doth not join With Nature in her homage. Yet the prayer Flows from the righteous with intenser love; A holier ealm succeeds, and sweeter dreams Visit the slumbers of the penitent.

40.

Therefore on Maimuna the Elements Shed healing; every breath she drew was balm. For every flower sent then in incense up Its richest odors; and the song of birds Now, like the music of the Scraphim, Enter'd her soul, and now Made silence awful by their sudden pause. It seem'd as if the quiet Moon Pour'd quietness; its lovely light Was like the smile of reconciling Heaven.

41.

Is it the dew of night That on her glowing cheek Shines in the moon-beam? Oh! she weeps-she weeps ! And the Good Angel that abandon'd her At her hell-baptism, by her tears drawn down, Resumes his charge. Then Maimuna Recall'd to mind the double oracle; Quick as the lightning flash Its import glanced upon her, and the hope Of pardon and salvation rose, As now she understood The lying prophecy of truth. She pauses not, she ponders not; The driven air before her fann'd the face Of Thalaba, and he awoke and saw The Sorceress of the Silver Locks.

42.

One more permitted spell ! She takes the magic thread. With the wide eye of wonder, Thalaba Watches her snowy fingers, round and round, Unwind the loosening chain. Again he hears the low, sweet voice, The low, sweet voice, so musical, That sure it was not strange, If in those unintelligible tones Was more than human potency, That with such deep and undefined delight Fill'd the surrender'd soul. The work is done; the song hath ceased; He wakes as from a dream of Paradise, And feels his fetters gone, and with the burst Of wondering adoration, praises God.

43.

Her charm hath loosed the chain it bound, But massy calls and iron gates Confine Hodeirah's Son.

Heard ye not, Genii of the Air, her spell, That o'er her face there flits The sudden flush of fear? Again her londer lips repeat the charm; Her eye is anxious, her cheek pale, Her pulse plays fast and feeble. Nay, Maimnna! thy power hath ceased, And the wind scatters now The voice which ruled it late.

44.

"Be comforted, my sonl!" she cried, her eye Brightening with sudden joy, "be comforted! We have burst through the bonds which bound us down

To ntter death; our covenant with Hell Is blotted out! The Lord hath given me strength!

Great is the Lord, and mereiful! Hear me, ye rebel Spirits! in the name Of Allah and the Prophet, hear the spell!"

45.

Groans then were heard, the prison walls were rent, The whirlwind wrapt them round, and forth they flew,

Borne in the chariot of the Winds abroad.

NOTES TO BOOK IX.

" His fragrant food, the horned Viper there," &c. - 14, p. 296.

In this valley we found plenty of provender for our cattle; rosemary bushes, and other shruhs of uncommon fragrance, which, being natives of the desert, are still perhaps without a name. Through these scented plants are the usual food of the camel, it is remarkable that his breath is insufferably nausous. But, when he is pushed by hunger, he devours thistles and prickles indiscriminately, without the least damage to his month, which seems proof to the sharpest thorns.— Eyles Irwin.

novers with hostile wings, &c. - 19, p. 297.

The hawk is used at Aleppo in taking the hare. " As soon as the hare is put up, one, or a brace of the nearest greyhounds are slipped, and the falconer, galloping after them, throws off his hawk. The hare cannot run long, where the hawk hehaves properly; but sometimes getting the start of the dogs, she gains the next hill, and escapes. It now and then happens when the hawk is fierce and voracious in an unusual degree, that the hare is struck dend at the first stroke, but that is very uncommon; for the hawks preferred for hare-hunting are taught to pounce and buffet the game, not to seize it; and they rise a little hetween each attack, to descend again with firsth force. In this manner the game is confused and retarded, till the greyhounds come in." – Russell.

The Shaheen, or Falcon Gentle, flies at a more dangerous game. Were there not, says the elder Russell, several gentlemen now in England to bear witness to the truth of what 1 am going to relate, I should hardly venture to assert that, with this bird, which is about the size of a pigeon, they sometimes take large eagles. The hwk, in former times, was taught to seize the eagle under his pinion, and thus, depriving him of the use of one wing, both birds fell to the ground together. But 1 am informed, the present mode is to teach the hawk to fix on the back between the wings, which has the same effect, only that, the bird tumbling down more slowly, the falconer has mora time to oome in to his hawk's assistance: but, in either case, if he be not very expeditious, the falcon is inevitably destroyed.

Dr. Patrick Russell says, this sport was disused in his time, probably from its ending more frequently in the death of the falcon than of the cagle. But he had often seen the shaheen take herons and storks. "The hawk, when thrown off, fice for some time in a horizontal line, not six feet from the ground, then mounting perpendicularly with astonishing swiftness, he seizes his prey under the wing, and both together come tumbling to the ground. If the falconer is not expeditious, the game soon disengages itself."

We saw about twenty antelopes, which, however, were so very shy, that we could not get near enough to have a shot, nor do I think it possible to take them without hawks, the mode usually practised in those countries. The swiftest greybounds would be of no use, for the antelopes are much swifter of foot than any animal I ever saw before. — Jackson's Journey over Land.

The Persians train their hawks thus : — They take the whole skin of a stag, of the head, body, and legs, and stuff it with straw to the shape of the animal. After fixing it in the place where they usually train the bird, they place his food upon the head of the stuffed stag, and chiefly in the two cavities of the eyes, that the bird may strike there. Having accustomed lum for several days to eat in this manner, they fasten the fret of the stag to a plank which runs upon wheels, which is drawn by cords from a distance ; and from day to day they draw it faster, insensibly to accustom the bird not to quit his prey ; and at last they draw the stag by a horse at full speed. They do the same with the wild boar, the ass, the fox, the hare, and other beasts of chase. They are even taught to stop a horseman at full speed, nor will they quit him till the falcener recults them, and shows them their food. — Tavernier.

As the Persians are very patient, and not deterred by difficulty, they delight in training the crow in the same manner as the hawk. — Tavernier.

I do not recollect in what history or romance there is a tale of two dogs trained in this manner to destroy a tyrant; but I believe it is an historical fiction. The same stratagen is found in Chao-shi-cu-el, the Orphan of the Houve of Chao.

The farmers in Norway believe that the eagle will sometimes attack a deer. In this enterprise, he makes use of this stratagem; he soaks his wings in water, and then covers them with sand and gravel, with which he flies against the deer's face, and blinds him for a time; the pain of this sets him running about like a distracted creature, and frequently he tumbles down a rock or some steep place, and breaks his neek; thus he becomes a prey to the eagle. — Posteppidan.

In the arms of Garibay, the historian, a stag, with an eagle or hawk on his back, is thus represented. This species of falconry has therefore probably been practised in Europe.

And now the death-swcat darkens his dun hide ! - 19, p. 297.

I saw this appearance of death at a bull-fight, the detestable amusement of the Spaniards and Portuguese. To the honor of our country, few Englishmen visit these spectracles a second time.

The ounce is freed; one spring, &c. - 20, p. 297.

They have a beast called an Ounce, spotted like a tiger, but very gentle and tame. A horseman carries it; and on perceiving the gazelle, lets it loose; and though the gazelle is incredibly swift, it is so nimble, that in three bounds it leaps upon the neck of its prey. The gazelle is a sort of small antelope, of which the country is full. The ounce immediately strangles it with its sharp talons; but if unluckily it misses its blow, and the gazelle escapes, it remains upon the spot nalumed and confused, and at that moment a child might take or kill it without its attempting to defend itself. — Tavernier.

The kings of Persia are very fond of the chase, and it is principally in this that they display their magnificence. It happened one day that Sha-Sei wished to entertain all the ambassudors who were at his court, and there were then ministers there from Tartary, Museovy, and India. He led them to the chase; and having taken in their presence a great number of large animals, stags, does, hunds, and wild boars, he had them all dressed and enten the same day; and while they were eating, an architect was ordered to erect a tower in the middle of Ispahan, only with the heads of these animals: the remains of it are yet to be seen. When the tower was raised to its proper height, the architect came exultingly to the king, who was then at the banquet with the ambassadors, and informed him that nothing was wanting to fnish the work wel, but the head of some large beast for the point. The Prince, in bis drunkenness, and with a design of showing the ambassadors how absolute he was over his subjects, turned sternly to the architect — You are right, said he, and I do not know where to find a better head than your awa. The unhappy man was obliged to lose his head, and the royal order was immediately executed. — Tavernier.

Waste on the wind his baffled witchery. - 22, p 297 A serpeot which that aspidis Is cleped, of his kinde hath this, That he the stone, noblest of all, The whiche that men carbnnele call, Bereth in his head above on hight. Does not "the deaf adder, that heareth not the voice of the charmer, charm be naver so wisely," allude to some snake that cannot be enticed by music, as they catch them in Egypt?

That, from the perforated tree forced out. - 23, p. 298.

As for the wax, it is the finest and whitest that may be had, though of bees; and there is such plenty as serves the whole empire. Several provinces produce it, but that of Huquam exceeds all the others, as well in quantity as whiteness. It is gathered in the province of Xantung, upon little trees ; but in that of Huquam, upon large ones, as big as those of the Indian pagods, or chestnut-trees in Europe. The way nature hos found to produce it, to us appears strange enough. There is in this province a creature or insect, of the higness of a flea, so sharp at stinging, that it not only pierces the skins of men and beasts, but the boughs and bodies of the trees. Those of the province of Xantnug are much valued, where the inhabitants gather their eggs from the trees, and carry them to sell in the province of Huquam. In the spring, there come from these eggs certain worms, which, about the beginning of the summer, they place at the foot of the tree, whence they creep up, spreading themselves wonderfully over all the branches. Having placed themselves there, they gnaw, pierce, and bore to the very pith, and their nonrishment they convert into wax, as white as snow, which they drive out of the month of tho ho o they have made, where it remains congealed in drops by the wind and cold. Then the owners of the trees gather it, and make it into cakes as we do, which are sold about China. Gemelli Careri.

Du Halde's account is somewhat different from this; the worms, he says, fasten on the leaves of the tree and in a shett time form combs of wax, much smaller than the honeycombs.

A fire to kindle that stronge fuel meet. - 24, p. 298.

It being notorious that fire enters into the composition of a Episcopacy.

devil, because he breathes smoke and flames, there is an obvious propriety in supposing every witch her own tinderbox, as they approximate to diabolic nature. I am sorry that I have not the Hierarchie of the Blessed Angels to refer to; otherwise, by the hest anthorities, I could show that it is the trick of Beelzebub to paredy the costume of religion. The inflammability of saints may be abundantly exampled.

It happened upon a tyme, before St. Elfled was chosen Abbesse, that being in the church at mattins, before day, with the rest of her sisters, and going into the middest, according to the costume, to read a lesson, the candle where with she saw to read, chonced to be put out; and therenpon wanting light, there came from the fugers of her right hand such an exceeding brightnesse npon the suddaine, that not only herselfe, but all the rest of the quire also, oright read by it.— English Martyreloge, 1608.

Dead saints have frequently possessed this phosphoric quality, like rotten wood or dead fish. "St. Bridget was interred at the towne of Dunne, in the province of Ulster, in the tombe togeather with the venerable bodyes of St. Patricke and St. Columbe, which was afterwards miraculously reveyled to the bishop of that place, as he was praying one night late in the church, about the yeare of Christ 1176, over which there shined a great light." — English Martyrologe.

So, when the nurse of Mohammed first entered the chamber of Amena, his mother, she saw a coruscriting splendor, which was the light of the infant prophet, so that Amena never kindled her lamp at night, — Maracci.

Another Mohammedan mirecle, of the same genus, is no weys improbable. When the head of Hesein was brought to Conffah, the governor's gates were closed, and Hanla, the benrer, took it to his own house. He awoke his wife, and told her what hed so speedily brought him home. I bring with me, said he, the most valuable present that could possibly be made to the Caliph. And the woman asking eagerly what it could be? The head of Hosein, he answered ; here it is ; I am sent with it to the governor. Immediately she sprung from the bed, not that she was shocked or terrified at the sight, for the Arabian women were accustomed to follow the ermy, and habitnated to the sight of blood and massacre ; but Hosein, by Fetima, his mother, was greadson of the prophet, and this produced an astonishing effect upon the mind of the woman. By the apostle of God ! she exclaimed, I will never again lie down with a man who has brought me the head of his grandson. The Moslem, who, according to the custom of bis nation, had many wives, sent for another, who was not so conscientious. Yet the presence of the head, which was placed upon a table, prevented her from sleeping, because, she said, she saw a great glory playing around it all night. - Marigny.

After Affonso de Castro had been martyred in one of the Molneca islands, his hody was thrown into the sea. Bot it was in a few days brought back by Providence to the spot where he had suffered, the wounds fresh as if just opened, and so strange and beautiful a splendor flowing from them, that it was evident the fountain of such a light must be that budy whose spirit was in the enjoyment of eternal happiness.

The Moors interpreted one of these phasphoric miracles, with equal ingenuity, to favor their own creed. A light was seen every night over the tomh of a Moronite whom they had martyred; and they said the priest was not only tortured with fire in hell, but his very body burnt in the grave.— Vasconcellas.

" There, waste away!" the Enchantress cried. - 25, p. 298.

A well-known ceremony of witchcraft, old as classical superstition, and probably not yet wholly disbelieved.

It lay amid the flames, &c. - 27, p. 298.

Beautifully hath Milton pointed this legend. "The fre, when it came to proof, would not do his work; but starting off like a full sail from the mast, did but reflect a golden light upon his unviolated limbs, exhaling such a sweet odor, as if all the incense of Arabia had been burning." — Of Prelotical Episopage, " The fore-world's wood to build the magic pile." - 31, p. 298.

On Mount Ararat, which is called Lubar, or the descending place, is an abbey of St. Gregorie's Munks. These Monks, if sny list to believe them, say that there remains the yet some part of the arke, kept by angels; which if any seeke to ascend, carrie them backe as farre in the night, as they have climbed in the day. — Purchas.

" Wreath is the horn'd viper rown l her playful child." - 31, p. 298.

A thicket of halm-trees is said to have sprung up from the blood of the Moslem slain at Beder.

Alianus avoucheth, that those vipers which breed in the provinces of Arabia, although they do bite, yet their biting is not venomous, because they doe feede on the baulme-tree, and sleepe under the shadow thereof. — Treasury of Ancient and Modern Tames.

The balsam-tree is nearly of the same size as a sprig of myrtie, and its leaves are like those of the herh sweet marioram. Vipers take up their residence about these plants, and are in some places more numerous than in others ; for the juice of the balsom-tree is their sweetest food, and they are delighted with the shade produced by its leaves. When the time therefore arrives for gathering the juice of this tree, the Arabians come into the sacred grove, each of them holding two twigs. By shaking these, they put to flight the vipers; for they are unwilling to kill them, hecause they consider them as the sacred inhabitants of the halsam. And if it happens that any one is wounded by a viper, the wound resembles that which is made by iron, but is not attended with any dangerous consequences; for these animals being fed with the juice of the balsam-tree, which is the most odoriferous of all trees, their poison becomes changed from a deadly quality into one which produces a milder effect. - Pausonias.

The inhabitants of Helicon say, that none of the herbs or roots which are produced in this mountain, are destructive to mankind. They add, that the pastures here even debilitate the venom of screents; so that those who are frequently hit by screents in this part, escape the danger with greater esse than if they were of the nation of the Psylli, or had discovered an antidote against poison. — Pausanias.

"There is a Grave-wax, - I have seen the Gouls," &c. - 31, p. 298.

The common people of Englind have long been acquainted with this change which muscular fibre undergoes. Before the circumstance was known to philosophers, I have heard them express a dislike and loathing to spermaceti, because it was dead men's fat.

Feel feet unholy trampling over them. - 33, p. 299.

The Persians are strangely superstitious about the hurial of their kings. For, fearing lest, by some magical art, any enchantments should be practised upon their bodies to the prejudice of their children, they conceal, as much as in them lies, the real place of interment.

To this end, they send to several places several coffins of lead, with others of wood, which they call Tahoat, and bury all altke with the same magnificance. In this nanner they dehale the curiosity of the people, who cannot discern, by the outside, in which of the coffins the real body should be. Not but it might be discovered by such as would put themselves to the expense and trouble of doing it. And thus it shall be related in the life of Ilabas the Great, that twelve of these coffins were conveyed to twelve of the principal Mosques, not for the sake of their riches, but of the person which they enclosed; and yet nobody knew in which of the twelve the king's body was laid, though the common belief is, that it was deposited at Ardevil.

It is also said in the life of Sefie L, that there were three coffins carried to three severa, places, as if there had been a triple production from one body, though it were a thing almost certainly known, that the coffin where the body was laid, was carried to the same city of Kum, and to the sama place where the decensed king commanded the body of his deceased father to be corried. — Chardm.

They imagine the dead are capable of pain. A Portuguese gentleman had one day ignorantly strayed among the tombs, and a Moor, after much wrongling, obliged him to go before the Cadi. The gentleman complained of violence and asserted he had committed no crime; but the judge informed him he was mistaken, for that the poor dead suffered when trodden on by Christian feet. Muley Ishmael once had occasion to bring one of his wives through a burial-ground, and the peeple removed the bones of their relations, and murmuning, said, he would neither suffer the living nor the dead to rest in peace. — Chenier. Additional Chap. by the Translater.

Were the Moorish superstition true, there would have been some monkish merit in the last request of St. Swithin — " when he was ready to depart out of this world, he commanded (for humilityes sake) his hody to he buried in the church-yord, whereon every one might tread with their feet." — English Martyrologe.

There is a story recorded, how that St. Frithstone was wont every day to say massa and office for the dead; and ona evening, as he walked in the church-yard, reciting the said office, when he came to requiescont in pace, the voyces in the graves round about made answere aloud, and said, Amen. — English Martyrologe.

I observed at Damascus, says Thevenot, that the Turks leave a hole, of three fingers' breudth in diameter, on the top of their tombs, (where there is a channel of earth over the dead body.) that serves to cool the dead; for the women, going thither on Thursday to pray, which they never fail to do every week, they pour in water by that hole to refresh them, and quench their thirst; and at the end of the grave, they stick in a large branch of hox, and leave it there, to keep the dead cool. They have another no less pleasant custom, and that is, when a woman hath lost her hushand, she still asks his counsel about her affairs. For instance, she will go to his grave, and tell him that such a person hath wronged her, or that such a man would marry her, and thereupon asks his counsel what she should do; having done so, she returns home, expecting the answer, which her late husband fails not to come and give her the night following.

" The grawing of his hundred poison-mouths!" &c.-38, p. 299.

The Mohammedan tradition is even more horrible than this. The corpse of the wicked is gnawed and stong till the resurrection by ninety-nine dragons, with seven heads each ; or, as others say, their sins will become venomous beests, the grievons ones stinging like dragons, the smaller like scorpions, and the others like serpents; circumstances which some understand in a figurative sense. — Sale's Preliminary Discourse.

They also believe, that after a man is buried, the soul returns to the body; and that two very terrible angels come into the grave, the one called Munkir, and the other Guanequir, who take him by the head, and make him kneel, and that, for that reason, they leave a tuft of heir on the crown of their head, that the angels who make them kneel may take hold of it. After that, the angels examine him in this manner : Who is thy God, thy religion, and prophet? and he nnswers thus: My God is the true God; my religion is the true re-ligion; and my prophet is Mahomet. But if that man find himself to be guilty, and, being afraid of their tortures, shall say, You are my God and my prophet, and it is in you that I believe, - at such an answer, these angels smith him with a mace of fire, and depart; and the earth squeezes the poer wretch so hard, that his mother's milk comes running out of his nose. After that come two other angels, bringing an ugly creature with them, that represents his sins and bad deeds, changed into that form ; then, opening a window, they depart into hell, and the man remains there with that ugly creature, being continually tormented with the sight of it, and the common miseries of the damned, until the day of judgment. when both go to hell together. But if he hath lived well, and made the first answer above mentioned, they bring him a lovaly creature, which represents his good actions, changed into that form; then the angels, opening a window, go eway to paradise, and the lovely creature remains, which gives him a great dical of content, and stays with him until the day of judgment, when beth are received into paradise. — Therenot. Monkish ingenuity has invented something not unlike this Molanimed an article of faith.

St. Elphege, saith William of Malmesbury, in his tender years took the monastic habit at Dirherst, then a small monastery, and now only an empty monument of antiquity. There, after he had continued awhile, aspiring to greater perfection, he went to Bath, where, enclosing himself in a secret cell, he employed his mind in contemplation of celestial things. To him there, after a short time, were congregated a great number of religious persons, desiring his instructions and directions : and among them, heing many, there were some who gave themselves to licentious feasting and drinking in the night time, their spiritual father, St. Elphege, not knowing of it. But Almighty God did not a long time suffer this their license ; but, at midnight, struck with a sudden death one who was the ringleader in this licentiousness, in the chamber where they practised such excesses. In the mean time, the holy man, being at his prayers, was interrupted by a great noise, proceeding out of the same chamber, and wondering at a thing so unaccustomed, be went softly to the door, looking in through certain clefts, he saw two devils of a vast stature, which, with frequent atrokes as of hammers, tormented the liveless carkeys ; from whence, notwithstanding, proceeded loud clamors, as desiring help. But his termentors answered, Thou didst not obey God, neither will we thee. This, the next morning, the holy man related to the rest; and no wonder if his companions became afterward more abstentious. - Cressy.

There is another ceremony to be undergooe at tha time of deatn, which is described in a most barbarous mixture of Arabic and Spanish. The original is given for its singularity.

Sepa todo Moslim que quando viene n la muerte, que lenvia Allah eineo Almalaques. El pirimero viene quando lurruh (la alma) esta en la garganta, y dize le, yo fijo de Adam que es de tu cuerpo el forçudo, que tan falaco es oy ? y que es de tu lengua la fublante, como se ennudercido el dia de oy? y que es de tu con-paniu y parientes? oy te desaran solo. Y viene lalmalac segondo, quando le meten la mortaja, y dize le, ye fijo de Adam, que es de lo que tenias de la requeza para la povreza? y que es de lo que alçaste del poblado para el yermo ? y que es de lo que alçaste del solaço para la soledad ? Y viene lalmalac tercero quando lo ponen en lanaas (las andas), y dize le, Ye fijo de Adum, oy caminaras camino que nunca lo camines mas luente qu'el; el dia de oy veras jente que nunca la veyerte nunca jamas; el dia de oy entararas en casa que nunca entaraste en mas esterecha qu' ella jamas ni mas escura. Y viene lalmalac quarto, quando lo meten en la fuessa y quirida, y dize, Ye fijo de Adam, ayer eras sobre la carra de la tierra alegre y goyoso, oy seras en su vientre; y buen dia te vino si tu eres en la garacia de Allah, y mal dia te vino si tu cres en la ira de Allah. Y viene lalmalac cinqueno quando esta soterrado y quirida, y dize, Ye fijo de Adam oy quedaras solo y aunque quedaremos con tu no aporovejariamos ninguna cosa ; a spelegada ellalgo y desas lo para otri ; el dia de oy seras en laljenna (parayso) vicyuso, o en el fuego penoso. Aquestos cinco Almalaques vienen por mandamiento de Allah a todo peresona en el paso de la muerte. Rogemos de Allah nos ponga por la rogarye y alfadhila (merecimiento) de nuestoro alnahi (profete) Mohammad (salla allaho alayhi vasallam) nos ponga de los siervos obidientes, que merescamos ser seguros del espanto de la fuessa y destos cincos almalaques por su santo alrahma (miserecordia) y peadad. Let every Moslem know, that when he comes to die, Allah sends five Almalaques to him.* The first comes when the soul is in the throat, and says to him, New, son of Adam, what is become of thy body, the strong, which is to-day so feeble? And what is become of thy tongue, the talker, that is thus made dumb te-day? And where are thy companions and thy kin? To-day they have left thee alone. And the second Almalac comes when they put on the winding-sheet, and says, Now, son of Adam, what is become of the riches which thou hadst, in this poverty? And where are the

* I suppose this means angels, from the Hebrew word for king.

peopled lands which were thine, in this desolation? And where are the pleasures which were thine, in this solitari ness? And the third Almalac comes when they place him upon the bier, and says, New, son of Adam, to-day theu shalt travel a journey, than which, thou hast never travelled longer; to-day thou shalt see a people, such as thou hast never seen before; to-day thou shalt enter a house, than which, thou hast never entered a norrower nor a darker. And the fourth Almalac comes when they put him in the grave, and says, Now, son of Adam, yesterday thou wert upon the face of the earth, blithe and joyous, to-day thou art in its bowels ; a good day is to betide thee, if thou art in the grace of Allah, and an ill day will betide thee if thou art in the wrath of Allah. And the fifth Almalac comes when he is interred, and says, Now, son of Adam, to-day thou will be left alone, and though we were to remain with thee, we should profit thee nothing, as to the wealth which thou hast gathered together, and must now leave to another. To-day thou wilt be rejoicing in paradise, or tormented in the fire. These five Almalaques come by the command of Allah, to every person in the pass of death. Let us pray to Allah, that, through the mediation and merits of our prophet Mahommed, he may placa us among his obedient servents, that we may be worthy to be safe from the terror of the grave, and of these five Almalaques, through his holy compassion and mercy. Amen.

For this was that most holy night, &c. - 39, p. 299.

The night, Leileth-ul-cadr, is considered as being particularly consecrated to ineffable mysteries. There is a prevailing opinion, that a thousand accret and invisible prodigies are performed on this night; that all the inanimate beings then pay their adoration to God; that all the waters of the sea lose their soltnors, and become fresh at these mysterious moments; that such, in fine, is its sanctity, that prayers said during this night are equal in value to all those which can be said in a thousand successivo months. It has not, however, pleased God, says the author of the celebrated theological work entitled Ferkann, to reveal it to the faithful: no prophet, no saint has been able to discover it; hence, this night, so august, so mysterious, so favored by Heaven, has hitherte remained undiscovered. — D^2 Oksson.

They all hold, that sometime on this night, the firmament opens for a moment or two, and the glory of God appears visible to the eyes of those who are so happy as to behold it; at which juncture, whatever is asked of God by the fortunata beholder of the mysteries of that critical minute, is infallibly granted. This sets many credulous and superstitious people apon the watch all night long, till the morning begins to dawn. It is my opinion, that they go on full as wise as they come off ; I mean, from standing sentinel for so many hours. Though many stories are told of people who have enjoyed the privilege of seeing that miraculous opening of the Heavens ; of all which few have had power to speak their mind, till it was too late, so great was their eastasy. But one passage, pleasant enough, was once told me by a grave, elderly gentlewoman, at Constantina, in Barbary. There was, not many years before my time, said she, in this town, a Mulatta wench, belonging to such a great family, (naming one of the best in the town,) who being quite out of love with her woolly locks, and imagining that she wanted nothing to make her thought a pretty girl, but a good head of hair, took her supper in her hand presently after sunset, and, without letting any hody into her secret, stole away, and shut herself up in the uppermost apartment in the house, and went upon the watch. She had the good fortuno to direct her optics towards the right quarter, the patience to look so long and so steadfastly, till she plainly beheld the beams of celestial glory darting through the amazing chasm in the divided firmament, and the resolution to cry out, with all her might, Ya Rabbi Kubbar Rassi; i.e. O Lord, make my head big! This expression is, figuratively, oot improper to pray for a good head of hair. But, unhappily for the poor girl, it seems God was pleased to take her words in the literal sense; for, early in the morning, the neighbors were disturbed by the terrible noise and bawling she made ; and they were forced to hasten to her assistance with tools proper to break down the walls about her ears, in order to get her head in at the window, it being grown to a monstrous magnitude, bigger in circumference than several hushels; I don't remember exactly how many; cor am I certain whether she survived her misfortune or not. — Morgan. Note to Rabadan. According to Francklin, it is believed, that whatever Mos-

According to Francklin, it is believed, that whatever Moslem die during the month of Ramadan, will most assuredly enter into paradise, because the gates of Heaven then stand open, by command of God. — Tour from Bengal to Persia, p. 136.

During the Asciur, the ten days of festive ceremony for Hosein, the Persians believe that the gates of paradise are thrown open, and that all the Moslem who die find immediate admittance. — Pietro delle Valle.

And the Good Angel that abandon'd her, &c. - 41, p. 299.

The Turks also acknowledge guardian angels, but in far greater number than we do; for they say, that God hath appointed threescore and ten angels, though they be invisible, for the guard of every Mussulman, and nothing befalls any body but what they attribute to them. They have all their several offices, one to guard one member, and another another; one to serve him in such an affeir, and another in another. There sre, among all these angels, two who are the dictators over the rest; they sit one on the right side, and the other on the left; these they call Kerim Kiatib, that is to say, the merciful scribes. He on the right side writes down the good actions of the men whom he has in tuition, and the other on the left hand, the bad. They are so merciful that they spare him if he commit a sin hefore he goes to sleep, hoping he'll repent ; and if he does not repent, they mark it down ; if he does repent, they write down, Estig fourillah, that is to say, God pardons. They wait upon him in all places, except when he does his needs, where they let him go alone, staying for him at the door till he come out, and then they take him into possession egain ; wherefore, when the Turks go to the house-ofoffice, they put the left foot foremost, to the end the angel who registers their sins, may leave them first ; and when they come out, they set the right foot before, that the angel who writes down their good works, may have them first under his protection. -- Thevenot

THE TENTH BOOK.

And the Angel that was sent unto me said, Thinkest then to comprehend the way of the Most High?—Then said I, Yea, ny Lord. And he answered me, and said, I am sent to shew thee three ways, and to set ferth three similitudes hefore thee; where of if then canst declare mo ene, I will shew thee also the way that then desirest to see, and I shall shew thee from whence the wicked heart cometh. And I said, Tell on, my Lord. Then said he unto me, Go thy way, weigh me the weight of the fire, or measure me the blast of the wind, or call me again the day that is past Esoras, ii. 4.

1.

ERE there was time for wonder or for fear, The way was past; and lo! again, Amid surrounding snows, Within the cavern of the Witch they stand.

2.

Then came the weakness of her natural age At once on Maimuna; The burden of her years Fell on her, and she knew That her repentance in the sight of God Had now found favor, and her hour was come. Her death was like the righteous: "Turn my face To Mecca!" in her languid eyes The joy of certain hope Lit a last lustre, and in death A smile was on her check.

3.

No faithful crowded round her bier, No tongne reported her good deeds; For her no mourners wail'd and wept; No Iman o'er her perfumed corpse For her soul's health intoned the prayer; Nor column, raised by the way-side, Implored the passing traveller To say a requiem for the dead. Thalaba laid her in the snow, And took his weapons from the hearth; And then once more the youth began His weary way of solitude.

4.

The breath of the East is in his face, And it drives the sleet and the snow ; The air is keen, the wind is keen; His limbs are aching with the cold; His eyes are aching with the snow; His very heart is cold, His spirit chill'd within him. He looks on If aught of life be near; But all is sky, and the white wilderness, And here and there a solitary pine, Its branches broken by the weight of snow His pains abate; his senses, dull With suffering, cease to suffer. Languidly, languidly, Thalaba drags along ; A heavy weight is on his lids; His limbs move slow for heaviness, And he full fain would sleep. Not yet, not yet, O Thalaba ! Thy hour of rest is come ! Not yet may the Destroyer sleep The comfortable sleep: His journey is not over yet, His course not yet fulfill'd !-Run thou thy race, O Thalaba ' The prize is at the goal.

5.

It was a cedar-tree Which woke him from that deadly drowsmess, Its broad, round-spreading branches, when they felt The snow, rose upward in a point to heaven, And standing in their strength erect, Defied the baffled storm. He knew the lesson Nature gave, And he shook off his heaviness, And hope revived within him.

6.

Now sunk the evening sun, A broad and beamless orb, Adown the glowing sky; Through the red light the snow-flakes fell like fire Louder grows the biting wind, And it drifts the dust of the snow.

The snow is clotted in his hair; The breath of Thalaba Is iced upon his lips. He looks around; the darkness, The dizzy floating of the feathery sky, Close in his narrow view.

At length, through the thick atmosphere, a light Not distant far appears. He, doubting other wiles of sorcery, With mingled joy and fear, yet quicken'd step, Bends thitherward his way.

It was a little, lowly dwelling-place Amid a garden whose delightful air Was mild and fragrant as the evening wind Passing in summer o'er the coffee-groves Of Yemen and its blessed bowers of bahn. A fount of Fire, that in the centre play'd, Roll'd all around its wondrous rivulets, And fed the garden with the heat of life. Every where magic! the Arabian's heart Yearn'd after human intercourse. A light!-the door unclosed!-All silent - he goes in.

9.

There lay a Damsel, sleeping on a couch His step awoke her, and she gazed at him With pleased and wondering look, Fearlessly, like a happy child, Too innocent to fear. With words of courtesy The young intruder spake. At the sound of his voice, a joy Kindled her bright black eyes; She rose and took his hand; But at the touch the joy forsook her cheek "Oh ! it is cold ! " she cried; ¹⁶ I thought I should have felt it warm, like mine; But thou art like the rest!"

10.

Thalaba stood mute awhile, And wondering at her words: "Cold? Lady!" then he said; "I have travell'd long In this cold wilderness, Till life is well-nigh spent!"

11.

LAILA. Art thou a Man, then?

THALABA.

Nay - I did not think Sorrow and toil could so have alter'd me, As to seem otherwise.

And thou eanst be warm Sometimes? life-warm as I am? 39

THALABA.

Surely, Lady, As others are, I am, to heat and cold Subject like all. You see a Traveller, Bound upon hard adventure, who requests Only to rest him here to-night, - to-morrow He will pursue his way.

LAILA.

Oh - not to-morrow ! Not like a dream of joy, depart so soon ' And whither wouldst thou go? for all around Is everlasting winter, ice and snow, Deserts unpassable of endless frost.

THALABA.

He who has led me here, will still sustain me Through cold and hunger.

"Hunger?" Laila cried: She clapp'd her lily hands, And whether from above, or from below, It came, sight could not see, So suddenly the floor was spread with food.

LAILA.

Why dost thou watch with hesitating eyes The banquet? 'tis for thee! I bade it come.

THALABA.

Whence came it?

LAILA.

Matters it from whence it came ? My Father sent it: when I call, he hears. Nay, - thou hast fabled with me ! and art like The forms that wait upon my solitude, Human to eye alone ; - thy hunger would not Question so idly else.

THALABA.

I will not eat ! It came by magic! fool, to think that aught But fraud and danger could await me here. Let loose my cloak !--

LAILA.

Begone then, insolent ! Why dost thou stand and gaze upon me thus? Ay ! eye the features well that threaten thee With fraud and danger! in the wilderness They shall avenge me, - in the hour of want, Rise on thy view, and make thee feel How innocent I am : And this remember'd cowardice and insult, With a more painful shame, will burn thy cheek, Than now heats mine in anger!

THALABA.

Mark me, Lady ! Many and restless are my enemies. My daily paths have been beset with snares Till 1 have learnt suspicion, bitter sufferings

BOOK X.

Teaching the needful vice. If I have wrong'd you,--For yours should be the face of innocence,--I pray you pardon me ! In the name of God And of his Prophet, I partake your food.

> LAILA. Lo, now! thou wert afraid of sorcery, And yet hast said a charm!

THALABA. A charm?

LAILA.

And wherefore? ---Is it not delicate food? -- What mean thy words? I have heard many spells, and many names, That rule the Genii and the Elements, But never these.

> THALABA. How ! never heard the names Of God and of the Prophet?

LA1LA.

Never — nay, now ! Again that troubled eye? — thou art a strange man, And wondrous fearful — but I must not twice Be charged with fraud ! If thou suspectest still, Depart and leave me !

THALABA.

And you do not know The God that made you?

LAILA.

Made me, man ! — my Father Made me. He made this dwelling, and the grove, And yonder fountain-fire; and every morn He visits me, and takes the snow, and moulds Women and men, like thee; and breathes into them Motion, and life, and sense, — but to the touch They are chilling cold; and ever when night closes They melt away again, and leave me here Alone and sad. Oh, then how 1 rejoice When it is day, and my dear Father comes, And cheers me with kind words and kinder looks ! My dear, dear Father ! — Were it not for him, I am so weary of this loneliness, That I should wish I also were of snow, That I might melt away, and cease to be.

THALABA.

And have you always had your dwelling here Amid this solitude of snow?

LAILA.

I think so.

I can remember, with unsteady feet Tottering from room to room, and finding pleasure In flowers, and toys, and sweetmeats, things which long

Have lost their power to please; which, when I see them,

Raise only now a melancholy wish, I were the little trifler once again, Who could be pleased so lightly !

THALABA. Then you know not Your Father's art?

LAILA.

No. 1 besought him once To give me power like his, that where he went I might go with him; hut he shook his head, And said, it was a power too dearly bought, And kiss'd me with the tenderness of tears.

THALABA.

And wherefore hath he hidden you thus far From all the ways of human-kind?

LAILA.

'Twas fear,

Fatherly fear and love. He read the stars, And saw a danger in my destiny, And therefore placed me here amid the snows, And laid a spell that never human eye, If foot of man by chance should reach the depth Of this wide waste, shall see one trace of grove, Garden or dwelling-place, or yonder fire That thaws and mitigates the frozen sky. And, more than this, even if the Enemy Should come, I have a Guardian here.

THALABA.

A Guardian?

LAILA.

'Twas well that when my sight unclosed upon thee, There was no dark suspicion in thy face, Else l had called his succor ! Wilt thou see him ? But, if a woman can have terrified thee, Ilow wilt thou bear his unrelaxing brow, And lifted lightnings ?

THALABA.

Lead me to him, Lady '

I4.

She took him by the hand, And through the porch they past Over the garden and the grove The fountain-streams of fire Pour'd a broad light, like noon; A broad, unnatural light, Which made the rose's blush of beauty pale, And dimm'd the rich geranium's scarlet blaze The various verdure of the grove Wore here one undistinguishable gray, Checker'd with blacker shade. Suddenly Laila stopp'd. "I do not think thou art the enemy" She said, "but He will know' If thou hast meditated wrong,

I would not lead thee to thy death."

15.

She turn'd her gentle eyes Toward him then with anxious tenderness. "So let him pierce my breast," cried Thalaba, "If it hide thought to harm you!"

BOOK X.

BOOK X.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

LAILA.

'Tis a figure Almost I fear to look at !--- yet come on. 'Twill ease me of a heaviness that seems To sink my heart; and thou mayst dwell here then In safety; for thou shalt not go to-morrow, Nor on the after, nor the after day, Nor ever ! It was only solitude Which made my misery here; And now, that I can see a human face, And hear a human voice ---Oh no ! thou wilt not leave me !

THALABA.

Alas, I must not rest ! The star that ruled at my nativity Shone with a strange and blasting influence. O gentle Lady ! I should draw upon you A killing curse !

LAILA.

But I will ask my Father To save you from all danger; and you know not The wonders he can work; and when I ask, It is not in his power to say me nay. Perhaps thou knowest the happiness it is To have a tender Father?

THALABA.

He was one,

Whom, like a loathsome leper, I have tainted With my contagious destiny. One evening He kiss'd me, as he wont, and laid his hands Upon my head, and blest me ere I slept. His dying groan awoke me, for the Murderer Had stolen upon our sleep!—For me was meant The midnight blow of death; my Father died; The brother playmates of my infancy, The baby at the breast, they perish'd all,— All in that dreadful hour!—but I was saved To remember, and revenge.

16.

She answer'd not; for now, Emerging from the o'er-arch'd avenue, The finger of her upraised hand Mark'd where the Guardian of the garden stood. It was a brazen Image, every limb, And swelling vein, and muscle true to life; The left knee bending on, The other straight, firm planted, and his hand Lifted on high to hurl The lightning that it grasp'd.

17.

When Thalaba approach'd, 'The enchanted Image knew Hodeirah's son, And hurl'd the lightning at the dreaded foe. But from Mohareb's hand Had Thalaba received Abdaldar's Ring. Blindly the wicked work The righteous will of Heaven. Full in his face the lightning-bolt was driven; The scattered fire recoil'd; Like the flowing of a summer gale he felt Its ineffectual force; His countenance was not changed, Nor a hair of his head was singed.

18.

He started, and his glance Turn'd angrily upon the Maid. The sight disarm'd suspicion ; — breathless, pale, Against a tree she stood ; Her wan lips quivering, and her eyes Upraised, in silent, supplicating fear.

19,

Anon she started with a scream of joy, Seeing her Father there, And ran and threw her arms around his neck. "Save me!" she cried, "the Enemy is come! Save me! save me! Okba!"

20.

"Okba!" repeats the youth; For never since that hour, When in the tent the Spirit told his name, Had Thalaba let slip The memory of his Father's murderer; "Okba!" — and in his hand, He grasp'd an arrow-shaft, And he rush'd on to strike him.

21.

"Son of Hodeirah !" the Old Man replied, "My hour is not yet come;" And putting forth his hand, Gently he repell'd the Youth. "My hour is not yet come ! But thou mayst shed this innocent Maiden's blood, That vengeance God allows thee !"

22.

Around her Father's neck Still Laila's hands were clasp'd, Her face was turn'd to Thalaba; A broad light floated o'er its marble paleness, As the wind waves the fountain fire. Her large, dilated eye, in horror raised, Watch'd every look and movement of the Youth "Not upon her," said he, "Not upon her, Hodeirah's blood cries out For vengeance!" and again his lifted arm Threaten'd the Sorcerer; Again withheld, it felt A barrier that no human strength could burst.

23.

"Thou dost not aim the blow more eagerly," Okba replied, "than I would rush to meet it ! But that were poor revenge. O Thalaba, thy God Wreaks on the innocent head His vengeance; — I must suffer in my child ! Why dost thou pause to strike thy victim? Allah Permits, — commands the deed."

24.

" Liar ! " quoth Thalaba. And Laila's wondering eye

BOOK X.

Look'd up, all anguish, to her father's face. "By Allah and the Prophet," he replied, " I speak the words of truth. Misery ! misery ! That I must beg mine enemy to speed The inevitable vengeance now so near! I read it in her horoscope ; Her birth-star warn'd me of Hodeirah's race. I laid a spell, and call'd a Spirit up; He answered, one must die, Laila or Thalaba -Accursed Spirit! even in truth Giving a lying hope! Last, I ascended the seventh Heaven, And on the Everlasting Table there, In characters of light, I read her written doom. The years that it has gnawn me! and the load Of sin that it has laid upon my soul ! Curse on this hand, that, in the only hour The favoring Stars allow'd, Reek'd with other blood than thine. Still dost thou stand and gaze incredulous? Young man, be merciful, and keep her not Longer in agony."

25.

Thalaba's unbelieving frown Scowl'd on the Sorcerer, When in the air the rush of wings was heard, And Azrael stood before them. In equal terror, at the sight, The Enchanter, the Destroyer stood, And Laila, the victim Maid.

26.

"Son of Hodeirah!" said the Angel of Death, "The accursed fables not. When from the Eternal Hand I took The yearly Scroll of Fate, Her name was written there ;— Her leaf hath wither'd on the Tree of Life. This is the hour, and from thy hands Commission'd to receive the Maid I come."

27.

28.

"Remember," answer'd Azrael, "all thou say'st Is written down for judgment! every word In the balance of thy trial must be weigh'd!"

- 29.

"So be it!" said the Youth: "He who can read the secrets of the heart, Will judge with righteousness! This is no doubtful path, The voice of God within me cannot lie.-I will not harm the innocent " 30.

He said, and from above, As though it were the Voice of Night, The startling answer came. "Son of Hodeirah, think again! One must depart from hence, Laila, or Thalaba; She dies for thee, or thou for her; It must be life for life! Son of Hodeirah, weigh it well, While yet the choice is thine!"

3I.

He hesitated not, But, looking upward, spread his hands to Heaven. "Oneiza, in thy bower of Paradise, Receive me, still unstain'd !"

32.

"What!" exclaim'd Okba, "darest thou disobey, Abandoning all claim To Allah's longer aid?"

33.

The eager exultation of his speech Earthward recall'd the thoughts of Thalaba. "And dost thou triumph, Murderer? dost thou deem, Because I perish, that the unsleeping lids Of Justice shall be closed upon thy crime? Poor, miserable man! that thou canst live

With such beast-blindness in the present joy, When o'er thy bead the sword of God Hangs for the certain stroke ! '' these Mosquos, from whence it is accompanied by the greatest part of the congregation to the grave. Their processions, at these times, are not so slow and solemu as in most parts of Christendom; for the whole company make what haste they can, singing, as they go along, some select verses of their Koran. That absolute submission which they pay to the will of God, allows them not to use any consolatory words upon these occusions; no loss or misfortune is to be hereupon regretted or complained of: instead likewise of such expressions of sorrow and condolence, as may regard the deceased, the compliments turn upon the person who is the nearest concerned, a blessing (say his friends) be upon your head. — Share.

All Mahometans inter the dead at the hour set apart for prayer; the defunct is not kept in the house, except he expires after sunset; but the body is transported to the Mosque, whither it is carried by those who are going to prayer; each, from a spirit of devotion, is desirous to carry in his turn. Women regularly go on Friday to weep over, and pray at the sepulchres of the dead, whose memory they hold dear. — Chemier.

This custom of crowding about a funeral contributes to spread the plague in Turkey. It is not many years since, in some parts of Worcestershire, the mourners were accustomed to kneel with their heads upon the coffin during the burial service.

The fullest eccount of a Mohammedan funeral is in the Lettres sur la Gréce, of M. Guys. Chance made him the spectator of a ceremony which the Moslem will not suffer an infidel to profame by his presence.

"About ten in the morning I saw the grave-digger at work; the slaves and the women of the family were seated in the barial-ground, many other women arrived, and then they all began to lament. After this prelude, they, one after the other, embraced one of the little pillars which are placed upon the graves, crying out, Ogloum, ogloum, sana Mussaphir gueldi, My son, my son, a goest is coming to see thee. At these words their tenrs and sobs began nnew; but the storm did not continue long; they all seated themselves, and entered into conversation.

At noon 1 heard a confused noise, and cries of lamentation; it was the funeral which arrived. A Turk preceded it, bearing upon his head a small chest; four other Turks carried the hier upon their shoulders; then came the father, the relations, and the friends of the dead, in great numbers. Their cries ceased at the entrance of the burialground, but then they quarrelled -and for this : The man who hore the chest opened it; it was filled with copies of the Koran ; a crowd of Turks, young and old, threw themselves upen the books, and scrambled for them. Those who succeeded ranged themselves around the Iman, and all at once hegan to recite the Koran, almost as boys say their lesson. Each of the readers received ten parats, about fifteen sols, wrapt in paper. It was then for these fifteen pence, that these pious assistants had quarrelled, and in our own country you might have seen them fight for less,

The bier was placed by the grave, in which the grave-digger was still working, and perfomes were burat by it. After the reading of the Koran, the Iman chanted some Arabic prayers, and his full chant would, no doult, have appeared to you, as it did to me, very ridiculous. All the Turks were standing; they held their hands open over the grave, and nuswered Amen to all the prayers which the Iman addressed to God for the decensed.

The prayers finished, a large chest was brought, about six feet long, and three broad; its boards were very thick. The coffin is usually made of cypress; thus, literally, is verified the phrase of Horace, that the cypress is our last possession :

> Neque harum, quas colis, arborum, Te, proter invisas cupressus, Ulla brevem dominum seguctur.

The cometeries of the Turks are usually planted with these trees, to which they have a religious attachment. The chest, which was in loose pieces, having heen placed in the grave, the coffia was haid in it, and above, planks, with other pieces of wood. Then all the Turks, taking spanles, cast earth upon the grave to cover it. This is a part of the ceromony at which all the bystanders assisted in their turn.

Before the corpse is buried, it is carried to the Mosque. Then, after having recited the Fatka (a prayer very similar to our Lord's prayer, which is repeated by all present) the Iman asks the congregation what they have to testify concerning the life and morals of the deceased ? Each then, in his turn, relates those good actions with which he was acquainted. The body is then washed, and wrapped up like a mummy, so that it cannot be seen. Drugs and spices are placed in the bier with it, and it is carried to interment. Before it is lowered into the grave, the Iman commands silence, saying, " Cease your lamentations for a moment, and let me instruct this Moslem how to act, when he arrives in the other world." Theo, in the car of the corpse, he directs him how to answer the Evil Spirit, who will not fail to question him, respecting his religion, &c. This lesson finished, he repeats the Fatka, with all the assistants, and the body is let down into the grave. After they have thrown earth three times upon the grave, as the Romans used, they retire. The Iman only remains; he approaches the grave, stoops down, inclines his ear, and listens to hear if the dead man disputes when the Angel of Death comes to take him: then he bids him farewell; and in order to be well paid, never fails to report to the family the hest news of the deceased.

As soon as the ceremony of interment is concluded, the Imaum, sented with his legs hent under his thighs, repeats a short prayer; he then calls the decensed three times by his name, mentioning also that of his mother, but without the smallest allusion to that of his father. What will be considered as infinitely more extraordinary is, that should the Imaum be ignorant of the name of the mother, it is usual for him to substitute that of Mary, in honor of the Virgin, provided the decensed be a male, and that of Eve, in ease the deceased he a female, in honor of the common mother of mankind. This custom is so invariable, that even at the interment of the Sultans, it is not neglected ; the Imaum calling out, Oh Mustaphe! Son of Mary! or, Oh Fatimah! Daughter of Eve !

Immediately afterwards, he repeats a prayer, called Telkeen, which consists of the following words : - " Remember the moment of thy leaving the world, in making this profession of faith. Certainly there is no God but God. He is one, and there is no association in Him. Certainly Mohammed is the prophet of God. Certainly Paradise is real. Certainly the resurrection is real; it is indisputable. Certainly God will bring to life the dead, and make them leave their graves. Certainly thou hast acknowledged God for thy God , Islamism for thy religion; Mohammed for thy prophet; the Koran for thy priest; the sanctuary of Mecca for thy Kibla; and the faithful for thy brethren. God is my God ; there is no other God but he. He is the master of the august and sacred throne of Heaven. Oh Mustaphah! (or any other name,) say that God is thy God, (which the Innum repeats thrice.) Say there is no other God but God, (also repeated thrice.) Say that Mohammed is the prophet of God ; that thy religion is Islam, and that thy prophet is Mohammed, upon whom be the blessing of salvation, and the mercy of the Lord. O God, do not ahandon us." After this ejaculation, the ceremony is concluded by a chapter of the Koran, and the party returns home.

As soon as the grave was filled up, each friend planted a sprig of cypress on the right, and another on the left hand of the deceased, and then took his leave. This was to ascertain by their growth whether the deceased would enjoy the happiness promised by Mohammed to all true believers, or whether he would forever be denied the bliss of the Houris The former would occur should the sprigs on the right hand take root, and the latter would be ascertained if the left only should flourish. If both succeeded, he would be greatly favored in the next world; or if both failed, he would be tormented by black angels, until, through the mediation of the prophet, he should be rescued from their persecutions.

The graves are not dug deep, but separated from each other carefully, that two bodies may not be placed together. The earth is raised, to prevent an unhallowed foot from treading upon it; and, instead of a plain, flat stone heing placed over it, one which is perforated in the centre is most commonly used, to allow of cypress-trees, or odoriferous herbs, being planted immediately over the corpse. Occasionally a square stone, hollowed ont, and without a cover, is preferred; which being filled with mould, the trees or herbs are cultivated in it." | - Griffiths.

Nor column raised by the way-side, &c. - 3, p. 304.

The Turks bury not at all within the walls of the city, but the great Turkish Emperors themselves, with their wives and children about them, and some few other of their great Bassaes, and those only in chapels by themselves, built for that purpose. All the rest of the Torks are buried in the fields; some of the better sort, in tombs of marble; but the rest, with tomh-stones laid upon them, or with two great stones, one set up at the head, and the other at the feet of every grave; the greatest part of them being of white marble, brought from the lsle of Marmora.

They will not bury any man where another hath been buried, accounting it impiety to dig up another man's bones; by reason whereof, they cover all the best ground about the city with such great white stones; which, for the infinite number of them, are thought sufficient to make another wall about the city. — Knolles.

The Tarks bury by the way-side, believing that the passengers will pray for the souls of the dead. - Tavernier.

His eyes are aching with the snow. - 4, p. 304.

All that day we travelled over plains all covered with snow, as the day before ; and indeed it is not only troublesome, but very dangerous, to travel through these deep snows. The mischief is, that the beams of the sun, which lie all day long upon it, molest the eyes and face with such a scorebing heat, as very much weakens the sight, whatever remedy a man can apply, by wearing, as the people of the country do, a thin handkerchief of green or black silk, which no way abates the annovance. — Chardin.

When they have to travel many days through a country covered with snow, travellers, to preserve their sight, cover the face with a silk kerchief, made on purpose, like a sort of black crape. Others have large furred bounets, bordered with goat-skin, and the long goat-hair, hanging over the face, is as serviceable as the crape. — Tavernier.

An Abyssinian historian says, that the village called Zinzenam, rain upon rain, has its name from an extraordinary circumstance that once happened in these parts; for a shower of rain fell, which was not properly of the nature of rain, as it did not run upon the ground, but remained very light, having scarce the weight of feathers, of a benutful white color, like flour; it fell in showers, and occusioned a darkness in the air more than rain, and liker to mist. It covered the face of the whole country for several days, retaining its whiteness the whole time, then went away like dew, without leaving any amell, or unwholesome effect behind it. — Brace.

The Dutch were formerly expelled from an East Indian settlement, because their consul, in narrating to the Prince of the country the wonders of Europe, chunced to say, that in his own country, water became a solid holy once a-year, for some time; when men, or even horses, might pass over it without sinking. The Prince, in a rage, said, that he had hitherto listened to his tales with patience, but this was so palpable a lie, that he would never more he connected with Europeans, who only could assert such monstrous falschoods,

Its broad, round-spreading branches, when they felt, &c. 5, p. 304.

A strange account of the cedars of Lebanon is given by De la Roque, Voyage de Syrie et du Mont Liban, 1772,

"This little forest is composed of twenty cedars, of a prodigious size; so large, indeed, that the finest planes, sycamores, and other large trees which we had seen, could not be compared with them. Besides these principal cedars, there were a great number of lesser ones, and some very small, mingled with the large trees, or in little clumps near them. They differed not in their foliage, which resembles the juniper, and is green throughout the year; but the great cedars spread at their summit, and form a perfect round, whereas the small ones rise in a pyramidal form like the cypress. Both diffuse the same pleasant odor; the large ones only vield fruit, a large cone, in shape almost like that of the pine, but of a brower color, and compacter shell. It gives a very plensant odor, and contains a sort of thick and transparent balm, which oozes out through small apertures, and falls drop by drop. This fruit, which it is difficult to separate from the stalk, contains a nut like that of the cypress; it grows of the end of the boughs, and turns its point apwards.

The nature of this tree is not to elevate its trunk, or the part between the root and the first branches; for the largest cedars which we saw did not, in the height of their trunks, exceed six or seven fect. From this low but enormously thick hody, prodigious branches rise, spreading as they rise, and forming, by the disposition of their boughs and leaves, which point upward, a sort of wheel, which appears to be the work of art. The bark of the cedur, except at the trunk, is smooth and shining, of a brown color; its wood white and soft, immediately under the bark, but hard and red within, and very bitter, which renders it incorruptible, and almost immortal. A fragrant gum issues from the tree.

The largest cedar which we measured was seven feet in circumference, wanting two inches; and the whole extent of its branches, which it was easy to measure, from their perfect roundness, formed a circumference of about 120 feet.

The Patriarch of the Maronites, fully persuaded of the rarity of these trees, and wishing, by the preservation of those that remain, to show his respect for a forest so celebrated in Scripture, has pronounced canonical pains, and even excommunication, against any Christians who shall dare to cot them; scarcely will be permit a little to be sometimes taken for crucifixes and little tabernocles in the chapels of our missionaties.

The Maronites themselves have such a veneration for these cedars, that on the day of transfiguration, they celebrate the festival nuder them with great solemnity; the Patriarch officiates, and says mass pontifically; and, among other exercises of devotion, they particularly honor the Virgin Mary there, and sing her praises, because she is compared to the cedars of Lebanon, and Lebanon itself used as a metaphor for the mother of Christ.

I have procured more particular information of this fact, and it has been confirmed by the testimony of many persons, who have often witnessed it. This is what the secretary of the Maronite Patriarch wrote to me in one of his letters, which I think it right to give in his own words. Cedri Lihani quos plantavit Deus, ut Psalmista loquitur, sita sunt in planitie quâdam, aliquantulum infra altissimum Montis Lihani cacumen, ubi tempore hyemali maxima nivium quantitus descendit, tribusque et ultra mensibus mordaciter dominatur. Cedri in altum ascendunt extensis tomen ramis in gyrum solo parallelis, conficientibus suo gyro fere umbellam solarem. Sed superreuiente nive, quia coacerraretur in magnà quantitate eas desuner. neque possent pati tantum pondus tanto tempore premens, sine certa fractionis discrimine, Nutura, rerum omnium provida mater, ipsis concessit, ut adveniente hyeme et descendente nive, stutim rami in altum assurgant, et secum invicem uniti constituant quasi conum, ut melius sese ab adveniente hoste tucautur. Nutura enim ipsa verum est, virtutem quamlibet unitam simul reddi fortiorem

The cedars of Lebanon, which, as the Psalmist says, God himself planted, are situated in a little plain somewhat below the loftiest summit of Mount Lebanon, where, in the winter, o great quantity of snow falls, and continues for three months, or longer. The cedars are high, but their bonghs spread out parallel with the ground into a circle, forming almost a shield against the sum. But when the snow falls, which would be heaped upon them in so great a quantity, that they could on endure such a weight so long a time, without the certain danger of breaking; Nature, the provident mother of all, has endued them with power, that when the winter comes, and the saow descends, their boughs immediately rise, and, uniting together, form a cone, that they may be the better defended from the coming enemy. For in nature itself, it is true, that virtue, as it is united, becomes stronger."

Passing in summer o'er the coffee groves, &c. - 8, p. 305.

The coffee plant is about the size of the orange-tree. The flower, in color, size, and smell, resembles the white jessamine. The berry is first green, then red, in which ripe state it is gathered.

Olearius's description of coffee is amusing. "They drink a certain black water, which they call cahwa, made of a fruit brought out of Egypt, and which is in color like ordinary wheat, and is aste like Tarkish wheat, and is of the bigness of a little bean. They fry, or rather hurn it in an iron pan, without any liquor, beat it to powder, and boiling it with fair water, they make this drink thereof, which hath as it were the taste of a burst crust, and is not pleasant to the palate."—Amb. Travels.

Pietro della Valle liked it better, and says he should introduce it into Italy. If, said be, it were draak with wine instead of water, I should think it is the Nepenthe, which, according to Homer, Helen brought from Egypt, for it is certain that coffee comes from that country; and as Nepenthe was said to assuage trouble and disquietude, so does this serve the Turks as an ordinary pastime, making them pass their hours in conversation, and occasioning pleasant discourse, which induces forgetfulness of care.

He read the stars, &c. -- 13, p. 306.

It is well known how much the Orientalists are addicted to this pretended science. There is a curious instance of public fally in Sir John Chardin's Travels,

"Sephie-Mitza was born in the year of the Egire 1057. For the superstition of the Persians will not let us know the month or the day. Their addiction to astrology is such, that they carefully conceal the moments of their princes' birth, to prevent the casting their antivities, where they might meet perhaps with something which they should be unwilling to know."

At the coronation of this prince two astrologers were to be present, with an astrolabe in their hands, to take the fortunate hour, as they term it, and observe the lucky moments that a happy constellation should point out for proceedings of that importance.

Sephie-Mirza having by debauchery materially injured his health, the chief physician was greatly alarmed, " in regard his life depended upon the king's ; or if his life were spared, yet he was sure to lose his estate and his liberty, as happens to all those who attend the Asiatic Sovereigns, when they die under their care. The queen-mother too accused him of treason or ignorance, believing that since he was her son's physician, he was obliged to cure him. This made the physician at his wit's end, so that, all his receipts failing him, he bethought himself of one that was peculiarly his own invention, and which few physicians would ever have found out, as not being to be met with neither in Galen nor flippocrates. What does he then do, but out of an extraordinary fetch of his wit, he begins to lay the fault upon the stars and the king's astrologers, crying out, that they were altogether in the wrong. That if the king lay in a languishing condition, and could not recover his health, it was because they had failed to observe the happy hour, or the aspect of a fortunate constellation at the time of his coronation." The stratagem succeeded, the king was re-crowned, and by the new name of Solyman !-Chardin.

It was a brazen Imoge, every limb, &c. - 16, p. 307.

We have now to refute their error, who are persuaded that brazen heads, made under certain constellations, may give answers, and be as it were guides and counsellers, upon all occasions, to those that had them in their possession. Among these is one Yepes, who affirms that Heory de Villena made such a one at Madrid, broken to pieces afterwards hy order of John II., king of Castile. The same thing is affirmed by Bartholomew Sibillus, and the author of the Image of the World, of Virgil; by William of Malmsbury, of Sylvester; by John Gower, of Robert of Lincoln ; by the enminon people of England, of Roger Bacon ; and by Tostatus, hishop of Avila, George of Venice, Delrio, Sibillus, Raguseus, Delancre, and others, too many to mention, of Albertus Magnus ; who, as the most expert, had made an entire man of the same metal. and had spent thirty years without any interruption in forming him under several aspects and constellations. For example, he formed the eyes, according to the said Tostatus, in his Commentaries upon Exodus, when the sun was in a sign of the Zodiac correspondent to that part, casting them out of divers metals mixed together, and marked with the characters of the same signs and planets, and their several and necessary aspects. The same method he observed in the head, occk, shoulders, thighs, and legs, all which were fashioned at several times, and being put and firstened together in the form of a man, had the faculty to reveal to the said Albertus the solutions of all his principal difficulties. To which they add, (that nothing he lost of the story of the Statue,) that it was battered to pieces by St. Thomas, merely because he could not endure its excess of prating.

But, to give a more rational account of this Androides of Albertus, as also of all these miraculous heads, I conceive the original of this faole may well be deduced from the Teraph of the Hebrews, by which, as Mr. Selden affirms, many are of opinion, that we must understand what is said in Genesis concerning Laban's gods, and in the first book of Kings, concerning the image which Michal put into the bed in David's place. For R. Eleazer holds, that it was made of the head of a male child, the first-born, and that dead-born, under whose tongue they applied a lamen of gold, whereon were engraved the characters and inscriptions of certain planets, which the Jews superstitiously wandered up and down with, instead of the Urim and Thummim, or the Ephod of the high-priest. And that this original is true and well deduced, there is a manifest indicium, in that Henry D'Assia, and Bartholomæus Sibillus affirm, that the Androides of Albertus, and the head made by Virgil, were composed of flesh and bone, yet not by nature, hut by art. But this being judged impossible by modern authors, and the virtue of images, annulcts, and planetary Sigills, being in great reputation, men have thought eversince, (taking their opinion from Trismegistus, affirming in his Asclepion, that of the gods, some were made hy the Sovereign God, and others by men, who, by some art, had the power to unite the invisible spirits to things visible and corporeal, as is explained at large by St. Augustine,) that such figures were made of copper or some other metal, whereon men had wrought under some favorable aspects of Heaven and the planets.

My design is not absolutely to deny that he might compose some head or statue of man, like that of Menmon, from which proceeded a small sound and pleasant noise, when the trign sun came, by his heat, to rarify and force out, by certain small conduits, the air which, in the cold of the night, was condensed within it. Or, haply, they might be like those statues of Boetius, whereof Cassiodorus, speaking, said, Metella mugiant Diomedis in are grues buccinant, anews angues insidlat, aves simulate fritinniunt, it que propriam vocem nescunt, ab are dalcedimen probantar emittre cantlene i for such, I doubt not, but may be made by the help of that part of natural magic which depends on the mathematics. — Davies's History if Magic.

And on the Everlasting Table there, &c. - 24, p. 308.

This table is suspended in the Seventh Heaven, and guarded from the demons, lest they should change or corrupt may thing thereon. Its length is so great as is the space between heaven and earth, its breadth equal to the distance from the cast to the west, and it is made of one pearl. The divine pen was created by the finger of God; that also is of pearl, and of such length and breadth, that a swift horse could scarcely gallop round it in five hundred years. It is so endowed, that, selfmoved, it writes all things, past, present, and to come. Light is its ink, and the language which it uses, only the angel Seraphael understands. — Maracci.

In the balance of thy trial must be weigh'd ! - 28, p. 308

The yearly Scroll of Fate, &c. - 26, p. 308.

They celebrate the night Leileth-ul-beraeth, en the 15th of the month of Schabann, with great apprehension and terror, because they consider it as the tremendous night on which the angels Kiramenn-keatibinn, placed on each side of mankind, to write down their good and had actions, deliver up their books, and receive fresh ones for the continuance of the same employment. It is believed, also, that on that night, the archangel Azrail, the angel of death, gives up ulso his records, and receives another book, in which are written the names of all these destined to die in the following year. — D'Oksson.

Her leaf hath wither'd on the Tree of Life. - 26, p. 308.

Here, in the Fourth Heaven, I beheld a most prodigious angel, of an admirable presence and aspect, in whose awful countenance there appeared neither mirth nor sorrow, but an undescribable mixture of both. He neither smiled in my face, nor did he, indeed, scarce turn his eyes towards me to look upon me, as all the rest did, yet he returned my salutation after a very courteous, obliging manner, and said, "Welcome to these mansions, O Mahomet; thou art the perfections of nature; and upon whom he, of his immense goodness, hath heen pleased to bestow the utmost of his divine graces."

There stood before him a most beautiful table, of a vast magnitude and extent, written all over, almost from the top to the bottom, in a very close, and scarce distinguishable character, upon which written table his eyes were continually fixed ; and so exceedingly intent he was upon that his occupation, that, though I stond steadfastly observing his countenance, I could not perceive his cyclids once to move Casting my eyes towards the left side of him, I beheld a prodigious large shady tree, the leaves whereof were as innumerable as the sands of the ocean, and upon every one of which were certain characters inscribed. Being extremely desirous of knowing the secret of this wonderful mystery, I inquired of Gabriel the meaning of what I was examining with my eyes with so anxious a curiosity. The obliging angel, to satisfy my longing, said, That person, concerning whom thou art so very inquisitive, is the redoubtable Azarael, the Angel of Death, who was never yet known either to laugh, smile, or be merry; for, depend upon it, my beloved Mahomet, had he been capable of smiling, or looking pleasant upon any creature in nature, it would assuredly have been upon thee alone. This table, upon which thou beholdest him so attentively fixing his looks, is called Et Lough El Mahofoud, and is the register upon which are engraven the names of every individual sonl breathing; and, notwithstanding the inspection of that register taketh up the greatest part of his time, yet he more particularly looketh it all over five times a-day, which are at those very same instants wherein the true believers are obliged to offer up their adorations to our Omnipotent Lord. The means whereby he understandeth when the thread of each individual life is run out and expired, is to look upon the branches of that vast tree thou there beholdest, upon the leaves whereof are written the names of all mortals, every one having his peculiar leaf; there, forty days before the time of any person's life is expired, his respective leaf beginning to fade, wither, and grow dry, and the letters of his name to disappear; at the end of the fortieth day they are quite blotted out, and the leaf fulleth to the ground, by which Azaracl certainly knoweth that the breath of its owner is ready to leave the body, and hasteneth away to take possession of the departing soul.

The size or stature of this formidable angel was so incomprehensibly stopendous, so innecessionally great, that if this earthly globe of ours, with all that is thereon contained, were to be placed in the palm of his hand, it would seem no more than one single grain of mustard-seed (though the smallest of all seeds) would do if haid upon the surface of the earth.— Rabadan.

The balance of the dead is an article in almost every creed Mahemmed borrowed it from the Persians. I know not from whence the Monks introduced it; prohably they were ignorant enough to have invented the obvious fiction.

In the Vision of Thurcillus, the ceremony is accurately described. " At the end of the north wall, within the ehurch, sate St. Paul, and opposite him, without, was the devil and his angels. At the feet of the devil, a burning pit flamed up, which was the mouth of the pit of hell. A balance, equally poised, was fixed upon the wall, between the devil and the apostle, one scale hanging before each. The apostle had two weights, a greater and a less, all shining, and like gold, and the devil also had two smeky and black ones. Therefore, the souls that were all black, came one after another, with great fear and trembling, to behold the weighing of their good and evil works; for these weights weighed the works of all the souls, according to the good or evil which they had done. When the scale inclined to the spostle, he took the soul, and introduced it, through the eastern gate, into the fire of Purgatory, that there it might explate its crimes. But when the scale inclined and sunk towards the devil, then he aad his angels snatched the soul, miserably howling and cursing the father and mother that begot it, to eternal torments, and cast it, with laughter and grinning, into the deep and fiery pit which was at the feet of the devil. Of this balance of good and evil, much may be found in the writings of the Hely Fathers," - Matthew Paris.

Concerning the salvation of Charlemagne, Archbishop Turpia, a man of hely life, wrote thus: " I, Turpin, Archbishop of Rheims, being in my chamber, in the city of Vienna, saying my prayers, saw a legion of devils in the air, who were making a great noise. I adjured one of them to tell me from whence they came, and wherefore they made so great an uproar. And he replied that they came frem Aix la Chapelle, where a great lord had died, and that they were returning in anger, because they had not been able to carry away his soul, 1 asked him who the great lord was, and why they had not been able to carry away his soul. He replied, That it was Charlemagne, and that Santiago had been grently against them. And I asked him how Santiago had been against them; and he replied, We were weighing the good and the evil which he had done in this world, and Santiago brought so much timber, and so many stones from the churches which he had founded in his name, that they greatly overbalanced all his evil works; and so we had no power over his soul. And having said this, the devil disappeared."

We must understand from this vision of Archbishop Turpin, that they who build or repair cluttches in this world, erect resting-places and inns for their salvation. — Historia do Imperador Carlos Magno, et dos Daze Pares de França.

Two other corollaries follow from the vision. The devil'a way home from Aix la Chape-lle lay through Vienna; and as churches go by weight, an architect of Sir John Vanbrugh's school should always be employed.

This halance of the dead was an easy and apt metaphor, but clumsily imagined as an actual mode of trial.

- " For take thy ballaunce, if thou be so wise, And weigh the winde that under heaven doth blow ;
- Or weigh the light that in the east doth rise; Or weigh the thought that from man's mind doth flow,
- But if the weight of these thou canst not shuw, Weigh but one word which from thy lips doth fall."

And Azracl, from the hands of Thalaba, &c. - 35, p. 308.

This double meaning is in the spirit of oracular prediction The classical reader will remember the equivocations of Apollo. The fable of the Young Man and the Luon meter Tapestry will be more generally recollected. We have many buildings in England to which this story has been applied. Cooke's Folly, near Bristol, derives its name from a similar tradition.

The History of the Buccancers affords a remarkable instance of prophecy occasioning its own accomplishment.

BOOK XI.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

"Bolure my first going over into the South Seas with Captain Sharp (and indeed before any privateers, at least since Drake and Oxenghum) had gone that way which we afterwards went, except La Sound, a French captain, who, by Captain Wright's instructions, had ventured as far as Chiapo town with a body of men, but was driven back again; I being then on board Captain Coron, in company with three or four more privateers. about four leagues to the east of Portobel, we took the packets bound thither from Carthagenu. We opened a great quantity of the merchants' letters, and fuund the contents of many of them to be very surprising; the merchants of several parts of Old Spain thereby informing their correspondents of Panama and elsewhere, of a certain prophecy that went about Spain that year, the tenor of which was, that there would be English privateers that year in the West Indies, who would make such great discoveries, as to open a door into the South Seas, which they supposed was fastest shut ; and the letters were accordingly full of cautions to their friends to be very watchful and careful of their coasts.

This door they spake of, we all concluded must be the passage over-land through the country of the Indians of Darien, who were a little before this become our friends, and had lately fallen out with the Spaniards, breaking off the intercourse which for some time they had with them. And upon calling also to mind the frequent invitations we had from those Indians a little before this time, to pass through their country and fall upon the Spaniards in the South Scas, we from henceforward began to entertain such thoughts in earnest, and soon came to a resolution to make those attempts which we afterwards did with Captains Sharp, Coron, &c. So that the taking these letters gave the first life to those bold undertakings; and we took the advantage of the fears the Spaniards were in from that prophecy, or probable conjecture, or whatever it were; for we sealed up most of the letters again, and sent them ashore to Portobel." — Dampier.

THE ELEVENTH BOOK

Those, Sir, that traffic in these seas, Franght not their bark with fears. Sir Robert Howaro.

1.

O FOOL, to think thy human hand Could check the chariot-wheels of Destiny ! To dream of weakness in the all-knowing Mind, That its decrees should change ! To hope that the united Powers Of Earth, and Air, and Hell, Might blot one letter from the Book of Fate, Might break one link of the eternal chain ! Thou miserable, wieked, poor old man ! Fall now upon the body of thy child ; Beat now thy breast, and pluck the bleeding hairs From thy gray beard, and lay Thine ineffectual hand to close her wound, And call on Hell to aid, And eall on Heaven to send lts mereiful thunderbolt!

2.

The young Arabian silently Beheld his frantic grief. The presence of the hated youth 'Fo raging anguish stung The wretched Sorcerer. "Ay! look and triumph'" he exclaim'd, 40 "This is the justice of thy God! A righteous God is he, to let His vengeance fall upon the innocent head!---Curse thee, curse thee, Thalaba!"

3.

All feelings of revenge Had left Hodeirah's son. Pitying and silently he heard The victim of his own iniquities; Not with the officious hand Of consolation, fretting the sore wound He could not hope to heal.

4.

So as the Servant of the Prophet stood. With sudden motion the night-air Gently fann'd his cheek. 'Twas a Green Bird, whose wings Had waved the quiet air. On the hand of Thalaba The Green Bird pereh'd, and turn'd A mild eye up, as if to win The Adventurer's confidence; Then, springing on, flew forward; And now again returns To court him to the way; And now his hand perceives Her rosy feet press firmer, as she leaps Upon the wing again.

Obedient to the eall, By the pale moonlight Thalaba pursued, O'er trackless snows, his way; Unknowing he what blessed messenger Had come to guide his steps, — That Laila's spirit went before his path. Brought up in darkness, and the child of sin, Yet, as the meed of spotless innocence, Just Heaven permitted her by one good deed To work her own redemption after death; So, till the judgment day. She might abide in bliss, Green warbler of the Bowers of Paradise.

The morning sun came forth, Wakening no eye to life In this wide solitude; His radiance, with a saffron hue, like heat, Suffused the desert snow. The Green Bird guided Thalaba; Now oaring with slow wing her upward way, Descending now in slant descent On outspread pinions motionless; Floating now, with rise and fall alternate, As if the billows of the air Heaved her with their sink and swell. And when beneath the noon The iev glitter of the snow Dazzled his aching sight, Then on his arm alighted the Green Bird, And spread before hiseyes Her plumage of refreshing hue.

Evening came on ; the glowing clouds Tinged with a purple ray the mountain ridge That lay before the Traveller. Ah! whither art thou gone, Guide and companion of the youth, whose eye Has lost thee in the depth of Heaven? Why hast thou left alone The weary wanderer in the wilderness? And now the western clouds grow pale, And night descends upon his solitude.

The Arabian youth knelt down, And bow'd his forchead to the ground, And made his evening prayer. When he arose, the stars were bright in heaven, The sky was blue, and the cold Moon Shone over the cold snow. A speck in the air ! Is it his guide that approaches? For it moves with the motion of life ! Lo ! she returns, and scatters from her pinions Odors diviner than the gales of morning Waft from Sabea.

9.

Hovering before the youth she hung, Till from her rosy feet, that at his touch Uncurl'd their grasp, he took The fruitful hough they bore. He took and tasted: a new life Flow'd through his renovated frame; His limbs, that late were sore and stiff, Felt all the freshness of repose; His dizzy brain was calm'd, The heavy aching of his lids was gone; For Laila, from the Bowers of Paradise, Had borne the healing fruit.

10.

So up the mountain steep, With untired foot he past, The Green Bird guiding him, Mid crags, and ice, and rocks, A difficult way, winding the long ascent. How then the heart of Thalaba rejoiced, When, hosom'd in the mountain depths, A shelter'd Valley open'd on his view ! It was the Simorg's vale, The dwelling of the Ancient Bird.

11.

On a green and mossy bank, Beside a rivulet, The Bird of Ages stood. No sound intruded on his solitude ; Only the rivulet was heard, Whose everlasting flow, From the birth-day of the World, had made The same unvaried murmuring. Here dwelt the all-knowing Bird In deep tranquillity, His eyelids ever closed In full enjoyment of profound repose Reverently the Youth approach'd That old and only Bird; And cross'd his arms upon his breast, And bow'd his head, and spake — "Earliest of existing things, Earliest thou, and wisest thou, Guide me, guide me, on my way! I am bound to seek the Caverns Underneath the roots of Ocean, Where the Sorcerers have their seat; Thou the eldest, thou the wisest, Guide me, guide me, on my way!"

13.

The Ancient Simorg on the youth Unclosed his thoughtful eyes, And answer'd to his prayer — "Northward by the stream proceed; In the Fountain of the Rock Wash away thy worldly stains; Kneel thou there, and seek the Lord, And fortify thy soul with prayer. Thus prepared, ascend the Sledge; Be hold, be wary; seek and find. God hath appointed all." The Ancient Simorg then let fall his lids, Relapsing to repose.

14.

Northward, along the rivulet, The adventurer went his way; Tracing its waters upward to their source. Green Bird of Paradise, Thou hast not left the youth !---With slow associate flight, She companies his way; And now they reach the Fountain of the Rock 15.

There, in the cold, clear well, Thalaba wash'd away his earthly stains, And bow'd his face before the Lord, And fortified his soul with prayer. The while, upon the rock, Stood the celestial Bird, And pondering all the perils he must pass, With a mild, melancholy eye, Beheld the youth beloved.

16.

And lo! beneath yon lonely pine, the sledge :-There stand the harness'd Dogs,
Their wide eyes watching for the youth,
Their ears erect, and turn'd toward his way.
They were lean as lean might be;
Their furrow'd ribs rose prominent;
And they were black from head to foot,
Save a white line on every breast,
Curved like the crescent moon.
Thalaba takes his seat in the sledge;
His arms are folded on his hreast;
There is fear in the eyes of the Dogs,
There is fear in their pitiful moan;

BOOK XI.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

And now they turn their heads, And secing him seated, away!

17.

The youth, with the start of their speed, Falls back to the bar of the sledge; His hair floats straight in the stream of the wind, Like the weeds in the running brook. They wind with speed their upward way, An icy path through rocks of ice: His eye is at the summit now, And thus far all is dangerless; And now upon the height The black Dogs pause and pant; They turn their eyes to Thalaha, As if to plead for pity; They moan and whine with fear 18.

Once more away! and now The long descent is seen, A long, long, narrow path; Ice-rocks aright, and hills of snow Aleft the precipice. Be firm, be firm, O Thalaba ! One motion now, one bend, And on the crags helow Thy shatter'd flesh will harden in the frost. Why howl the Dogs so mournfully? And wherefore does the blood flow fast All purple o'er their sable skin? His arms are folded on his breast; Nor scourge nor goad hath he; No hand appears to strike; No sounding lash is heard; But piteously they moan and whine, And track their way with blood.

19.

Behold! on yonder height A giant Fiend aloft Waits to thrust down the tottering avalanche ! If Thalaba looks back, he dies; The motion of fear is death. On - on - with swift and steady pace, Adown that dreadful way ! The Youth is firm, the Dogs are fleet, The sledge goes rapidly; The thunder of the avalanche Re-echoes far behind. On - on - with swift and steady pace, Adown that dreadful way! The Dogs are fleet, the way is steep, The Sledge goes rapidly; They reach the plain below.

20.

A wide, blank plain, all desolate; Nor tree, nor bush, nor herb! On go the Dogs with rapid course; The Sledge slides after rapidly; And now the sun went down. They stopp'd and look'd at Thalaba; The Youth perform'd his prayer; They knelt beside him while he pray'd; They turn'd their heads to Mecca, And tears ran down their cheeks. Then down they laid them in the snow, As close as they could lie, They laid them down and slept. And backward in the sledge, The Adventurer laid himself; There peacefully slept Thalaba, And the Green Bird of Paradise Lay nestling in his breast.

21.

The Dogs awoke him at the dawn; They knelt and wept again; Then rapidly they journey'd on; And still the plain was desolate, Nor tree, nor bush, nor herb! And ever, at the hour of prayer, They stopp'd, and knelt, and wept; And still that green and graceful Bird Was as a friend to him by day, And, ever when at night he slept, Lay nestling in his breast.

22.

In that most utter solitude, It cheer'd his heart to hear Her soft and soothing voice. Her voice was soft and sweet; It rose not with the blackbird's thrill, Nor warbled like that dearest bird that holds The solitary man A loiterer in his thoughtful walk at eve But if it swell'd with no exuberant joy, It had a tone that touch'd a finer string, A music that the soul received and own'd. Her bill was not the beak of blood; There was a human meaning in her eye When fix'd on Thalaba; He wonder'd while he gazed, And with mysterious love Felt his heart drawn in powerful sympathy.

Oh joy ! the signs of life appear -The first and single Fir That on the limits of the living world Strikes in the ice its roots. Another, and another now ; And now the Larch, that flings its arms Down-curving like the falling wave ; And now the Aspin's seatter'd leaves Gray-glittering on the moveless twig; The Poplar's varying verdure now, And now the Birch so beautiful, Light as a lady's plumes. Oh joy ! the signs of life ! the Deer Hath left his slot beside the way; The little Ermine now is seen, White wanderer of the snow; And now from yonder pines they hear The clatter of the Grouse's wings. And now the snowy Owl pursues The Traveller's sledge, in hope of food; And hark ! the rosy-breasted bird,

The Throstle of sweet song ! Joy ! joy ! the winter-wilds are left ! Green bushes now, and greener grass, Red thickets here, all berry-bright, And here the lovely flowers !

When the last morning of their way was come, After the early prayer, The Green Bird fix'd on Thalaba A sad and supplicating eye, And speech was given her then : "Servant of God, I leave thee now; If rightly I have guided thee, Give me the boon I beg!"

25.

"O gentle Bird!" quoth Thalaba, "Guide and companion of my dangerons way, Friend and sole solace of my solitude, How can I pay thee benefits like these? Ask what thou wilt, that I can give, O gentle Bird, the poor return Will leave me debtor still!"

26.

" Son of Hodeirah !" she replied, When thou shalt see an Old Man bent beneath The burden of his earthly punishment, Forgive him, Thalaba ! Yea, send a prayer to God in his behalf!"

27.

A flush o'erspread the young Destroyer's check; He turn'd his eye towards the Bird As if in half repentance; for he thought Of Okba; and his Father's dying groan Came on his memory. The celestial Bird Saw and renew'd her speech; "O Thalaba, if she who in thine arms Received the dagger-blow, and died for thee, Deserve one kind remembrance, — save, O save The Father that she loves from endless death!"

28.

"Laila! and is it thou?" the youth replied.
"What is there that I durst refuse to thee? This is no time to harbor in my heart
One evil thought; —here I put off revenge, The last rebellious feeling — Be it so!
God grant to me the pardon that I need, As I do pardon him! —
But who am I, that I should save The sinful soul alive?"

29.

"Enough !" said Laila. "When the hour shall come, Remember me ! My task is done. We meet again in Paradise !"

She said, and shook her wings, and up she soar'd With arrowy swiftness through the heights of Heaven.

30,

It is aching eye pursued her path, When starting onward went the Dogs; More rapidly they hurried now, In hope of near repose. It was the early morning yet, When by the well-head of a brook They stopp'd, their journey done. The spring was clear, the water deep; A venturons man were he, and rash, That should have probed its depths; For all its loosen'd bed below Heaved strangely up and down; And to and fro, from side to side, It heaved, and waved, and toss'd; And yet the depths were clear,

And yet no ripple wrinkled o'er The face of that fair Well.

31.

And on that Well, so strange and fair, A little boat there lay, Without an oar, without a sail; One only seat it had, one seat, As if for only Thalaba. And at the helm a Damsel stood, A Damsel bright and bold of eye ; Yet did a maiden modesty Adorn her fearless brow ; Her face was sorrowful, but sure More beautiful for sorrow. To her the Dogs look'd wistful up ; And then their tongues were loosed — "Have we done well, O Mistress dear ' And shall our sufferings end ?"

32.

The gentle Damsel made reply -"Poor servants of the God I serve, When all this witchery is destroy'd, Your woes will end with mine A hope, alas! how long unknown! This new adventurer gives; Now God forbid, that he, like you, Should perish for his fears! Poor servants of the God I serve, Wait ye the event in peace.' A deep and total slumber, as she spake, Seized them. Sleep on, poor sufferers ! be at rest Ye wake no more to anguish : --- ye have borne The Chosen, the Destroyer! - soon his hand Shall strike the efficient blow; And shaking off your penal forms, shall ye, With songs of joy, amid the Eden groves,

Hymn the Deliverer's praise.

33,

Then did the Damsel say to Thalaba, "The morn is young, the Sun is fair, And pleasantly through pleasant banks Yon quiet stream flows on — Wilt thou embark with me? Thou knowest not the water's way; Think, Stranger, well! and night must come,—

BOOK XI.

BOOK XI.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Darest thou embark with me? Through fearful perils thou must pass, — Stranger, the wretched ask thine aid! Thou wilt embark with me !" She smiled in tears upon the youth; — What heart were his, who could gainsay That melancholy smile? "I will," quoth Thalaba, "I will, in Allah's name!"

34.

He sat him on the single seat; The little boat moved on. Through pleasant banks the quiet stream Went winding pleasantly; By fragrant fir-groves now it past, And now, through alder-shores, Through green and fertile meadows now It silently ran by. The flag-flower blossom'd on its side, The willow tresses waved, The flowing current furrow'd round The water-lily's floating leaf, The fly of green and gauzy wing, Fell sporting down its course; And grateful to the voyager The freshness that it breathed, And soothing to his ear Its murmur round the prow. The little boat falls rapidly Adown the rapid stream.

35.

But many a silent spring, meantime, And many a rivulet and rill, Had swollen the growing stream; And when the southern Sun began To wind the downward way of heaven, It ran a river deep and wide, Through banks that widen'd still. Then once again the Damsel spake -"The stream is strong, the river broad ; Wilt thou go on with me? The day is fair, but night must come -Wilt thou go on with me? Far, far away, the sufferer's eye For thee hath long been looking,-Thou wilt go on with me !' "Sail on, sail on," quoth Thalaba, "Sail on, in Allah's name !" The little boat falls rapidly Adown the river-stream.

36.

A broader and yet broader stream, That rock'd the little boat! The Cormorant stands upon its shoals, His black and dripping wings Half open'd to the wind. The Sun goes down, the crescent Moon Is brightening in the firmament; And what is yonder roar, That sinking now, and swelling now, But evermore increasing, Still londer, louder, grows? The little boat falls rapidly Adown the rapid tide; The Moon is bright above, And the great Ocean opens on their way 37.

Then did the Damsel speak again — "Wilt thou go on with me? The Moon is bright, the sea is calm, I know the ocean-paths; Wilt thou go on with me? — Deliverer! yes! thou dost not fear! Thou wilt go on with me!"

"Sail on, sail on !" quoth Thalaba, "Sail on, in Allah's name !"

38.

The Moon is bright, the sea is calm, The little boat rides rapidly Across the ocean waves; The line of moonlight on the deep Still follows as they voyage on; The winds are motionless; The gentle waters gently part In dimples round the prow. He looks above, he looks around, The boundless heaven, the boundless sea, The crescent moon, the little boat, Nought else above, below.

39.

The Moon is sunk ; a dusky gray Spreads o'er the Eastern sky ; The stars grow pale and paler ;— Oh, beautiful! the godlike Sun Is rising o'er the sea! Without an oar, without a sail, The little boat rides rapidly ;— Is that a cloud that skirts the sea? There is no cloud in heaven! And nearer now, and darker now— It is—it is—the Land! For yonder are the rocks that rise Dark in the reddening morn; For loud around their hollow base The surges rage and foam.

40.

The little boat rides rapidly, And pitches now with shorter toss Upon the narrow swell; And now so near, they see The shelves and shadows of the cliff, And the low-lurking rocks, O'er whose black summits, hidden half, The shivering billows burst; -And nearer now they feel the breaker's spray. Then said the Damsel - "Yonder is our path Beneath the cavern arch. Now is the ebb; and till the ocean flow We cannot override the rocks. Go thou, and on the shore Perform thy last ablutions, and with prayer Strengthen thy heart - I too have need to pray."

41.

She held the helm with steady hand Amid the stronger waves; Through surge and surf she drove The adventurer leap'd to land.

NOTES TO BOOK XI.

Green warbler of the Bowers of Paradise. - 5, p. 313.

The souls of the blessed are supposed by some of the Mahummedans to animate green birds in the groves of paradise. Was this opinion inverted to conciliate the Pagan Arabs, who believed, that of the blood near the dead person's brain was formed a bird named Humah, which once in a hundred years visited the sepalehre?

To this there is an allusion in the Moallakat. "Then I knew with certainty, that in so fierce a contest with them, many a heavy blow would make the perched birds of the brain Ay quickly from every skull." — Poen of Antara.

In the Bahar-Danush, parrots are called the green-vested resemblers of Heaven's dwellers. The following passages in the same work may, perhaps, allode to the same supersition, or perhaps are merely metaphorical, in the usual style of its true Oriental bombast. "The bird of understanding fled from the nest of my brain." "My joints and members accented as if they would separate from each other, and the bird of life would quit the nest of my body." "The bird of my sool became a captive in the net of her glossy ringlets."

I remember in a European Magazine two similar lines by the author of the Lives of the Admirals :

- " My beating bosom is a well-wrought cage,
 - Whence that sweet goldfinch Hope shall ne'er elope ! "

The grave of Francisco Jorge, the Maronite martyr, was visited by two strange birds of unusual size. No one knew whence they came. They emblemed, says Vasconcellos, the purity and the indefatigable ectivity of bis soul.

The inhabitants of Otaheite have assigned a less respectahle part of the body as the seat of the soul.

The disembowelling of the body there, is always performed in great secrecy, and with much religious superstition. The bowels are, hy these people, considered as the immediate organs of sensation, where the first impressions are received, and by which all the operations of the mind are carried on ; it is therefore natural to conclude, that they may esteem and venerate the intestines, as bearing the greatest affinity to the immortal part. I have frequently held conversations on this subject, with a view to convince them that all intellectual operations were carried on in the head ; nt which they would generally smile, and intimate that they had frequently seen men recover whose skulls had been fractured, and whose heads had otherwise been much injured ; but that, in all cases in which the intestines had been wounded, the persons on a certainty died. Other arguments they would also advance in favor of their belief; such as the effect of fear, and other passions, which caused great agitation and uneasiness, and would sometimes produce sickness at the stomach, which they attributed entirely to the action of the bowels. - Fancouver.

Had borne the healing fruit. - 9, p. 314.

When Hosein, the son of Ali, was sick of a grievous disorder, he longed for a pomegranate, though that fruit was not then in season. Ali went out, and diligently inquiring, found a single one in the possession of a Jew. As he returned with it, a sick man met him and begged half the pomegranate, saying it would restore his health. Ali gave him half, and when he had eaten it, the man requested he would give him the other half, the sooner to complete his recovery. Ali benignantly complied, returned to his son, and told him what had happened, and Hosein approved what his father had done

Immediately behold a miracle ! as they were talking to gother, the door was gently knocked at. He ordered the woman servant to go there, and she found a nua, of all men the most beautiful, who had a plate in his band, covered with green silk, in which were ten pomegraantes. The womas was astonished at the beauty of the man and of the pomegraantes, and she took one of them and hid it, and carried the other nime to Ali, who kissed the present. When he had counted them he found that one was wanting, and said so to the servant; she confessed that she had taken it on account of its excellence, and Ali gave her her liberty. The pomegraantes were from paradise; Hosein was cured of his disease only hy their odor, and rose np immediately, recovered, and in full strength. — Maracci.

I suspect, says Maracci, that this is a true miracle wrought by some Christian saint, and falsely attributed to Ali. However this may be, it does not appear absurd that God should, hy some especial favor, reward an act of remarkable charity, even in an infidel, as he has sometimes, by a atriking chastisement, punished enormous crimes. But the assertion, that the pomegranates were sent from paradise, exposes the fable.

Maracci, after detailing and ridicaling the Mahammedan miracles, contrasts with them, in an appendix, a few of the real end permanent miracles of Christianity, which are proved by the testimony of the whola world. He selects five as examples. 1. The chapel of Loretto, brought by angels from Nazareth to Illyricom, and from Illyricom to Italy; faithful messengers having heen sent to both places, and finding in both its old foundations, in dimensions and materials exactly corresponding.

2. The cross of St. Thomas at Meliapor. A Bramin, as the saint was extended upon his cross in prayer, slew him. On the anniversary of his martyrdom, during the celebration of mass, the cross gradually becomes lummous, till it shines one white glory. At clevating the bost, it resumes it a natural color, and sweats blood profusely; in which the faithful dig their clothes, by which many miracles are wrought.

 Certissimum quia evidentissimum. — At Bari, on the Adriatic, a liquot flows from the bones of St. Nicholas; they call it St. Nicholas's manna, which, being preserved in bottles, never corrupts or hreeds worms, except the possessor be corrupt hinself, and daily it works miracles.

4. At Tolentino in the March of Anconia, the arms of St. Nicholas swell with blood, and pour out copions atreams, when any great calamity impends over Christendom.

5. The blood of St. Januarius at Naples.

These, says Maracci, are miracula perseverantia, permanent miracles; and it connot be said, as of the Mahommedan ones, that they are tricks of the devil.

From the birth-day of the world, &c. - 11. p. 314.

The birth-day of the world was logically ascertained in a provincial council held at Jerusalem, against the Quartodecimans by command of Pope Victor, about the year 200. Venerable Bede (Comm. de Æquinoct. Vern.) supplies the mode of proof. "When the multitude of priests were assembled together, then Theophylus, the bishop, produced the authority sent unto him by Pope Victor, and explained what had been enjoined him. Then all the bishops made answer, Unless it be first examined how the world was at the beginning, nothing salutury can be ordained respecting the observations of Easter. And they said, What day can we believe to have been the first, except Sunday? And Theophylus said, Prove this which ye say. Then the bishops said, According to the authority of the Sc-iptures, the evening and the morning were the first day; and, in like manner, they were the second, and the third, and the fourth, and the fifth, and the sixth, and the seventh ; and on the seventh day, which was called the Sabhath, the Lord rested from all his works; therefore, since Saturday, which is the Sabbath, was the last day, which but Sunday can have been the first? Then said Theophylus, Lo, ye have proved that Sunday was the first day; what say ye now concerning the seasons - for there are four times or seasons in the year, Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter ; which of these was the first ? The bishops answered, Spring. And Theophylus said, Prove this which ye say. Then the bishops said, It is written, the earth brought forth grass, and horh yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind; but this is in the spring. Then said Theophylus, When do you believe the beginning of the world to have been, in the begineing of the season, or in the middle, or in the end? And the bishops answered, at the Equinox, on the eighth of the kalends of April. And Theophylus snid, Prove this which ye say. Then they answered, It is written, God mode the light, and called the light day, and he made the darkness, and called the darkness night, and he divided the light and the darkness inte equal parts. Then said Theophylus, Lo, ye have proved the day and the season. What think ye now concerning the Moon ; was it created when increasing, or when full, or on the wane? And the bishops answered, At the full. And he said, Prove this which ya say. Then they answered, God made two great luminaries, and placed them in the firmament of the Heavens, that they might give light upon the earth ; the greater luminury in the beginning of the day, the lesser one in the beginning of the night. It could not have been thus unless the moon were at the full. Now, therefore, let us see when the world was created; it was made upon a Sunday in the spring, at the Equinex, which is on the eighth of the kalends of April, and at the full of the moon."

BOOK XII.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

According to the form of a horder-oath, the work of creation began by night. "You shall swear by Heaven above you, Hell beneath you, by your part of Paradise, by all that God made in six days and seven nights, and by God hinself, you are whart out sackless of art, part, way, witting, ridd, kenniog, having or recetting of any of the goods and chattells named ia this bill. So help you God." (Aicholson and Burn, 1. xxv.) This, however, is assertion without preof, and would not have been admitted by Theophylus and his bisheps.

That old and only Bird. - 12, p. 314.

Simorg Anka, says my friend Mr. Fox, in a note to his Achmed Ardebeili, is a bird or griffon of extraordinary strength and size, (as its name imports, siguifying as large as thirty eagles,) which, according to the Eastern writers, was sent by the Supreme Being to subdue and chastise the rebellious Dives. It was supposed to possess rational faculties, and the gift of speech. The Caherman Nameh relates, that Simorg Anka, being asked his age, replied, this world is very ancient, for it has already been seven times replenished with beings of Adam, in which we now are, is to endure seven thousand years, making a great cycle; that binself had seen twelve of these revolutions, and knew not how many more he had to see.

I are afraid that Mr. Fox and myself have fallen into a grievous heresy, both respecting the unity and the sex of the Simerg. For this great bird is a hen; there is indeed a cock also, but he seems to be of some inferior species, a sort of Prince George of Denmark, the Simorg's consort, not the cock Simorg.

In that portion of the Shah-Nameh which has been put into English rhyme by Mr. Champion, some anecdotes may be found concerning this all-knowing bird, who is there represented as possessing one species of knowledge, of which she would not be readily suspected. Zalzer, the father of Rustam, is exposed in his infancy by his own father, Saum, who takes him for a young devilling, because his hody is black, and his hair white. The infant is laid at the foot of Mount Elburs, where the Simorg has her nest, and she takes him up, and breeds him with her young, who are very desirous of eating him, but she preserves him. When Zalzer is grown up, and leaves the nest, the Simorg gives him one of her feathers, telling him, whenever he is in great distress, to burn it, and she will immediately come to his assistance. Zalzer marries Rodahver, who is likely to die in childing ; he then burns tha feather, and the Simorg appears and orders the Cæsarean operation to be performed. As these stories are not Ferdusi's invention, but the old traditions of the Persians, collected and arranged by him, this is, perhaps, the earliest fact concerning that operation which is to be met with, earlier probably than the fable of Semele. Zalzer was ordered first to give her wine, which acts as a powerful opiate, and after sewing up tha incision, to anoint it with a mixture of milk, musk, and grass, pounded together, and dried in the shade, and then to rub it with a Simorg's feather,

In Mr. Fox's collection of Persic books, is an illuminated copy of Ferdusi, containing a picture of the Simorg, who is there represented as an egly dragon-looking sort of bird. I should be loath to believe that she has so had a physiognomy; and as, in the same volume, there are blue and yellow horses, there is good reason to conclude that this is not a genuine portrait.

When the Genius of the Lamp is ordered by Aladia to bring a roc's egg, and hang it up in the hall, he is violently entaged, and exclaims, Wretch, wouldst thou have me hang up my master? From the manner in which rocs are usually mentioned in the Arabian Tales, the reader feels as much surprised at this indignation as Aladin was hinself. Perhaps the original may have Simorg instead of roc. To think, indeed, of robbing the Simorg's nest, either for the sake of drilling the eggs, or of poaching them, would, in a believer, whether Shiah or Sunni, be the height of human impicty.

Since this note was written, the eighth volume of the Asiatic Researches has appeared, in which Captain Wilford identifies the roc with the Simorg. "Sinbad," he says, "was exposed to many dangers from the hirds called Rocs or Simorgs, the Garudas of the Pantanics, whom Persian Rnmancers represent as living in Madagasear, according to Marco Polo." But the Roc of the Arabian Tales has none of the charocteristics of the Simorg; and it is only in the instance which I have noticed, that any mistake of one for the other can be suspected.

The spring was clear, the water deep. - 30, p. 316.

Some travellers may perhaps be glad to know, that the spring from which this description was taken, is near Bristol, about a mile from Stokes-Croft turnpike, and known by the name of the Boiling-Well. Other, and larger springs, of the same kind, called the Lady Pools, are near Shobdon, in Herefordshire.

It ran a river deep and wide. - 35, p. 317.

A similar picture occurs in Miss Baillie's Comedy, "Tho Second Marriage." "By Heaven, there is nothing so interesting to me as to trace the course of e prosperous man through this varied world. First, he is seen like a little stream, wearing its shallow bed through the grass, circling and winding, and gleaning up its treasures from every twinkling rill, as it passes; further on, the brown sand fences its margin, the dark rushes thicken on its side; further on still, the broad flags shake their green ranks, the willows bend their wide boughs o'er its course; and yonder, at last, the fair river appears, spreading his bright waves to the light."

THE TWELFTH BOOK.

Why should be that loves me, sorry be For my deliverance, or at all complain My good to hear, and toward joys to see? I go, and long desired have to go; I go with gladness to my wished rest. SPENSER'S Daphnaida.

1.

THEN Thalaba drew off Abdaldar's ring, And cast it in the sea, and cried aloud, "Thou art my shield, my trust, my hope, O God! Behold and guard me now, Thou who alone canst save. If, from my childhood up, I have look'd on With exultation to my destiny;

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

If, in the hour of anguish, I have own'd The justice of the hand that chasten'd me; If, of all selfish passions purified, I go to work thy will, and from the world Root up the ill-doing race, Lord! let not thou the weakness of my arm Make vain the enterprise!"

2.

The Snn was rising all magnificent, Ocean and Heaven rejoicing in his beams. And now had Thalaba Perform'd his last ablutions, and he stood And gazed upon the little boat Riding the billows near, Where, like a sea-bird breasting the broad waves, It rose and fell upon the surge, Till from the glitterance of the sunny main He turn'd his aching eyes; And then upon the beach he laid him down, And watch'd the rising tide. He did not pray; he was not calm for prayer; His spirit, troubled with tumultuous hope, Toil'd with futurity; His brain, with busier workings, felt The roar and raving of the restless sea, The boundless waves that rose, and roll'd, and rock'd: The everlasting sound Oppress'd him, and the heaving infinite :

He closed his lids for rest.

Meantime, with fuller reach and stronger swell, Wave after wave advanced; Each following billow lifted the last foam That trembled on the sand with rainbow hues; The living flower that, rooted to the rock, Late from the thinner element Shrunk down within its purple stem to sleep, Now feels the water, and again Awakening, blossoms out All its green anther-necks.

4.

Was there a Spirit in the gale That fluttered o'er his cheek? For it came on him like the new-risen sun, Which plays and dallies o'er the night-closed flower, And wooes it to unfold anew to joy; For it came on him as the dews of eve Descend with healing and with life Upon the summer mead; Or like the first sound of seraph song And Angel greeting, to the soul Whose latest sense had shuddered at the groan Of anguish, kneeling by a death-bed side.

5.

11e starts, and gazes round to seek
The certain presence. "Thalaba!" exclaim'd The Voice of the Unseen;
"Father of my Oneiza!" he replied,
'And have thy years been number'd? art thou, too, Among the Angels?" — "Thalaba!"

A second and a dearer voice repeats, "Go in the favor of the Lord, My Thalaba, go on ! My husband, I have dress'd our bower of bliss. Go, and perform the work ; Let me not longer suffer hope in Heaven '

6.

He turn'd an eager glance toward the sea. "Come!" quoth the Damsel, and she drove Her little boat to land. Impatient through the rising wave, He rush'd to meet its way; His eye was bright, his cheek was flush'd with joy. "Hast thou had comfort in thy prayers?" she ask'd. "Yea," Thalaba replied,

"A heavenly visitation." "God be praised!" She answer'd; "then I do not hope in vain!" And her voice trembled, and her lip Quiver'd, and tears ran down.

7.

"Stranger," said she, "in years long past Was one who vow'd himself The Champion of the Lord, like thee, Against the race of Hell. Young was he, as thyself, Gentle, and yet so brave ! A lion-hearted man. Shame on me, Stranger! in the arms of love I held him from his calling, till the hour Was past; and then the Angel who should else Have crown'd him with his glory-wreath, Smote him in anger. - Years and years are gone, And in his place of penance he awaits Thee, the Deliverer: surely thon art he ! It was my righteous punishment, In the same youth unchanged, And love unchangeable, Sorrow forever fresh, And bitter penitence,

That gives no respite night nor day from grief, To abide the written hour, when I should waft The Doom'd Destroyer and Deliverer here. Remember thou, that thy success affects No single fate, no ordinary woes."

As thus she spake, the entrance of the cave Darken'd the boat below. Around them, from their nests, The screaming sea-birds fled, Wondering at that strange shape, Yet unalarm'd at sight of living man, Unknowing of his sway and power misused The clamors of their young Echoed in shriller cries, Which rung in wild discordance round the rock And farther as they now advanced, The dim reflection of the darken'd day Grew fainter, and the dash Of the out-breakers deaden'd; farther yet, And yet more faint the gleam; And there the waters, at their utmost bound,

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Silently rippled on the rising rock. They landed and advanced, and deeper in, Two adamantine doors Closed up the cavern pass.

Reclining on the rock beside, Sat a gray-headed man, Watching an hour-glass by. To him the Damsel spake -" Is it the hour appointed?" The Old Man Nor answer'd her awhile, Nor lifted he his downward eye; For now the glass ran low, And, like the days of age, With speed perceivable, The latter sands descend; And now the last are gone. Then he look'd up, and raised his hand, and smote The adamantine gates.

10

The gates of adamant. Unfolding at the stroke, Open'd, and gave the entrance. Then she turn'd To Thalaba, and said, "Go, in the name of God! I cannot enter, -1 must wait the end In hope and agony. God and Mahommed prosper thee, For thy sake and for ours!"

11.

He tarried not, - he past The threshold, over which was no return. All earthly thoughts, all human hopes And passions now put off, He cast no backward glance Toward the gleam of day. There was a light within, A yellow light, as when the autumnal Sun, Through travelling rain and mist, Shines on the evening hills: Whether from central fires effused, Or that the sunbeams, day by day, From earliest generations, there absorb'd, Were gathering for the wrath-flame. Shade was none In those portentous vaults; Crag overhanging, nor columnal rock Cast its dark outline there; For with the hot and heavy atmosphere The light incorporate, permeating all, Spread over all its equal yellowness. There was no motion in the lifeless air; He felt no stirring as he past Adown the long descent; He heard not his own footsteps on the rock, That through the thick stagnation sent no sound. How sweet it were, he thought, To feel the flowing wind ! With what a thirst of joy He should breathe in the open gales of heaven ! 41 12.

Downward, and downward still, and still the way, The lengthening way is safe. Is there no secret wile, No lurking enemy? His watchful eye is on the wall of rock, -And warily he marks the roof, And warily surveys The path that lies before. Downward, and downward still, and still the way, The long, long way is safe; Rock only, the same light. The same dead atmosphere, And solitude and silence like the grave.

13.

At length the long descent Ends on a precipice ; No feeble ray enter'd its dreadful gulf: For in the pit profound, Black Darkness, utter Night, Repell'd the hostile gleam, And o'er the surface the light atmosphere Floated, and mingled not. Above the depth, four over-awning wings, Unplumed, and huge, and strong, Bore up a little car; Four living pinions, headless, bodiless, Sprung from one stem that branched below In four down-arching limbs, And elineh'd the ear-rings endlong and athwart With claws of griffin grasp.

14.

But not on these, the depth so terrible, The wondrous wings, fix'd Thalaba his eye For there, upon the brink, With fiery fetters fasten'd to the rock, A man, a living man, tormented lay, The young Othatha: in the arms of love He who had linger'd out the auspicious hour, Forgetful of his call. In shuddering pity, Thalaba exclaimed, "Servant of God, can I not succor thee?" He groan'd, and answered, "Son of Man, I sinn'd, and am tormented; I endure In patience and in hope. The honr that shall destroy the Race of Hell, That hour shall set me free."

15.

" Is it not come?" quoth Thalaba. "Yea! by this omen!" - and with fearless hand He grasp'd the burning fetters, -" in the name Of God!" - and from the rock Rooted the rivets, and adown the gulf Dropp'd them. The rush of flames roar'd up, For they had kindled in their fall The deadly vapors of the pit profound ; And Thalaba bent on and look'd below But vainly he explored The deep abyss of flame, That sunk beyond the plunge of mortal eye, Now all ablaze, as if infernal fires

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Illumed the world beneath. Soon was the poison-fuel spent; The flame grew pale and dim; And dimmer now it fades, and now is quench'd; And all again is dark, Save where the yellow air Enters a little in, and mingles slow.

16.

Meantime, the freed Othatha clasp'd his knees, And cried, "Deliverer!" Struggling then With joyful hope, "And where is she," he cried, 'Whose promised coming for so many a year —" "Go!" answer'd Thalaba, "She waits thee at the gates." "And in thy triumph," he replied, There thou wilt join us?"— The Deliverer's eye Glanced on the abyss; way else was none — The depth was unascendable. "A wait not me," he cried; 'My path hath been appointed! go — embark! Return to life, — live happy!"

отнатна,

But thy name? — That through the nations we may blazon it, — That we may bless thee!

THALABA. Bless the Merciful!

17.

Then Thalaba pronounced the name of God, And leap'd into the car. Down, down it sunk, - down, down, -He neither breathes nor sees; His eyes are closed for giddiness, His breath is sinking with the fall. The air that yields beneath the car Inflates the wings above. Down-down-a measureless depth!-downdown, Was then the Simorg with the Powers of ill Associate to destroy? And was that lovely Mariner A fiend as false as fair? For still the car sinks down; But ever the uprushing wind Inflates the wings above, And still the struggling wings Repel the rushing wind. Down-down-and now it strikes.

18.

He stands and totters giddily; All objects round awhile Float dizzy on his sight; Collected soon, he gazes for the way. There was a distant light that led his search; The torch a broader blaze, The unpruned taper flares a longer flame, But this was strong, as is the noontide sun, So, in the glory of its rays intense, It quiver'd with green glow. Beyond was all unseen; No eye could penetrate That unendurable excess of light.

19.

It veil'd no friendly form, thought Thalaba · And wisely did he deem, For at the threshold of the rocky door, Hugest and fiercest of his kind accurs'd, Fit warden of the soreery-gate, A rebel Afreet lay; He scented the approach of human food, And hungry hope kindled his eye of fire. Raising his hand to screen the dazzled sense, Onward held Thalaba. And lifted still at times a rapid glance; Till the due distance gain'd, With head abased, he laid An arrow in its rest. With steady effort and knit forehead then, Full on the painful light He fix'd his aching eye, and loosed the bow.

20.

A hideous yell ensued ; And sure no human voice had scope or power For that prodigious shrick Whose pealing echoes thundered up the rock. Dim grew the dying light; But Thalaba leap'd onward to the doors, Now visible beyond, And while the Afreet warden of the way Was writhing with his death-pangs, over him Sprung and smote the stony doors,

And bade them, in the name of God, give way!

2L

The dying Fiend beneath him, at that name, Toss'd in worse agony, And the rocks shudder'd, and the rocky doors Rent at the voice asunder. Lo! within— The Teraph and the Fire, And Khawla, and, in mail complete, Mohareb for the strife. But Thalaba, with numbing force, Smites his raised arm, and rushes by ; For now he sees the fire, amid whose flames, On the white ashes of Hodeirah, lies Hodeirah's holy Sword.

22.

He rushes to the Fue. Then Khawla met the youth, And leap'd upon him, and with elinging arms Clasps him, and calls Mohareb now to aim The effectual vengeance. O fool! fool! he sees His Father's Sword, and who shall bar his way? Who stand against the fury of that arm That spurns her to the ground? --She rises half, she twists around his knees, --A moment -- and he vainly strives To shake her from her hold; Impatient then he seized her leathery neek With throttling grasp, and as she loosed her hold, Thrust her aside, and unimpeded now Springs forward to the Sword.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

23.

The co-existent Flame Knew the Destroyer; it encircled him, Roll'd up his robe, and gather'd round his head: Condensing to intenser splendor there, His Crown of Glory and his Light of Life, Hover'd the irradiate wreath.

24.

The instant Thalaba had laid his hand Upon his Father's Sword, The Living Image in the inner cave Smote the Round Altar. The Domdaniel rock'd Through all its thundering vaults; Over the surface of the reeling Earth, The alarum shock was felt; The Sorcerer brood, all, all, where'er dispersed, Perforce obey'd the summons; all, — they came Compell'd by Hell and Heaven; By Hell compell'd to keep Their baptism-covenant, And with the union of their strength Oppose the common danger; forced by Heaven To share the common doom.

25.

Vain are all spells ! the Destroyer Treads the Domdaniel floor. They crowd with human arms and human force To crush the single foe. Vain is all human force ! He wields his Father's Sword, The vengeance of awaken'd Deity. But chief on Thalaba Mohareb press'd The Witch, in her oracular speech, Announced one fatal blow for both ; And, desperate of self safety, yet he hoped To serve the cause of Eblis, and uphold Ilis empire, true in death.

26.

Who shall withstand the Destroyer? Seatter'd before the sword of Thalaba The Sorcerer throng recede, And leave him space for combat. Wretched man, – What shall the helmet or the shield avail Against Almighty anger? - Wretched man, Too late Mohareb finds that he hath chosen The evil part! - He rears his shield To meet the Arabian's sword; Under the edge of that fire-hardened steel, The shield falls sever'd; his cold arm Rings with the jarring blow : -He lifts his eimeter; A second stroke, and lo! the broken hilt Hangs from his palsied hand : And now he bleeds, and now he flies, And fain would hide himself amid the troop; But they feel the sword of Hodeirah; But they also fly from the ruin, And hasten to the inner eave, And fall all fearfully Around the Giant Idol's feet, Seeking protection from the Power they served.

It was a Living Image, by the art Of magic hands, of flesh and bones composed, And human blood, through veins and arteries That flow'd with vital action. In the shape Of Eblis it was made;

Its stature such, and such its strength, As when among the sons of God Preëminent he raised his radiant head, Prince of the Morning. On his brow A coronet of meteor flames, Flowing in points of light. Self-poised in air before him Hung the Round Altar, rolling like the World On its diurnal axis, like the World Checker'd with sea and shore, The work of Demon art. For where the sceptre in the Idol's hand Touch'd the Round Altar, in its answering realm, Earth felt the stroke, and Ocean rose in storms, And shatter'd Cities, shaken from their seat, Crush'd all their habitants. Ilis other arm was raised, and its spread palm Sustain'd the ocean-weight, Whose naked waters arch'd the sanctuary, Sole prop and pillar he.

Fallen on the ground, around his feet, The Sorcerers lay. Mohareb's quivering arms Clung to the Idol's knees; The Idol's face was pale; And calm in terror he beheld The approach of the Destroyer.

29.

Sure of his stroke, and therefore in pursuit Following, nor blind, nor hasty, on his foe Moved the Destroyer. Okba met his way, Of all that brotherhood

He only fearless, miserable man, The one that had no hope.

"On me, on me," the childless Sorcerer cried, Let fall the weapon! 1 am he who stole Upon the midnight of thy Father's tent; This is the hand that piecced Hodeirah's heart, That felt thy brethren's and thy sisters' blood Gush round the dagger-hilt. Let fall on me The fated sword! the vengeance-hour is come Destroyer, do thy work!"

30.

Nor wile, nor weapon, had the desperate wretch, He spread his bosom to the stroke.
"Old Man, I strike thee not!" said Thalaba;
"The evil thou hast done to me and mine Brought its own b tter punishment.
For thy dear Daughter's sake I pardon thee, As I do hope Heaven's pardon. — For her sake
Repent while time is yet! — Thou hast my prayers To aid thee; thou poor sinner, cast thyself Upon the goodness of offended God!
I speak in Laila's name; and what if now Thou canst not think to join in Paradise

Her spotless Spirit, -- hath not Allah made

NOTES TO THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Al-Araf, in his wisdom? where the sight Of Heaven may kindle in the penitent The strong and purifying fire of hope, Till, at the Day of Judgment, he shall see The Mercy-Gates unfold."

31.

The astonish'd man stood gazing as he spake; At length his heart was soften'd, and the tears Gush'd, and he sobb'd aloud. Then suddenly was heard The all-beholding Prophet's voice divine — "Thou hast done well, my Servant! Ask and receive thy reward!"

32.

A deep and awful joy Seem'd to dilate the heart of Thalaba; With arms in reverence cross'd upon his breast, Upseeking eyes suffused with tears devout, He answered to the Voice — "Prophet of God, Holy, and good, and bountiful ! One only earthly wish have 1, to work Thy will; and thy protection grants me that. Look on this Sorcerer ! Heavy are his erimes; But infinite is mercy ! If thy servant Have now found favor in the sight of God, Let him be touch'd with penitence, and save His soul from utter death."

33.

"The groans of penitence," replied the Voice, "Never arise unheard! But, for thyself, prefer the prayer; The treasure-house of Heaven Is open to thy will."

34.

"Prophet of God !" then answered Thalaba, "I am alone on earth;

Thou knowest the secret wishes of my heart! Do with me as thou wilt! Thy will is best."

35.

There issued forth no Voice to answer him; But lo! Hodeirah's Spirit comes to see
His vengeance, and beside him, a pure form Of roseate light, his Angel mother hung.
* My Child, my dear, my glorious, blessed Child, My promise is perform'd — fulfil thy work '" 36.

Thalaba knew that his death-hour was come; And on he leap'd, and springing up, Into the Idol's heart Hilt-deep he plunged the Sword. The Ocean-vault fell in, and all were crush'd. In the same moment, at the gate Of Paradise, Oneiza's Houri form Welcomed her Husband to eternal bliss.

NOTES TO BOOK XII.

A rebel Afreet lay. - 19, p. 322.

One of these evil Genii is thus described in the Bahar Danush: — On his entrance, he beheld a black demon heaped on the ground like a mountain, with two large horns upon his head, and a long proboscis, fast asleep. In his head the Divine Creator had joined the likenesses of the elephant and the wild bull. His teeth grew out as the tusks of a boar, and all over his monstrous carcass hung shaggy hairs, like those of the bear. The eye of mortal-born was dimmed at his appearance, and the mind, at his horrible form and frightful figure, was confounded.

He was an Afrect, created from mouth to foot by the wrath of God.

His hair like a bear's, his teeth like a boar's. No one ever beheld such a monster.

Crook-backed, and crabbed-faced; he might be scented at the distance of a thousand fersungs.

His nostrils were like the ovens of brick-burners, and his mouth resembled the vat of the dyer.

When his breath came forth, from its vehemence the dust rose up as in a whirlwind, so as to leave a chasm in the earth; and when he drew it in, chaff, sand, and pebbles, from the dis tance of some yards, were attracted to his nostrils.

Bahar Dunush.

Al-Araf, in his wisdom? &c. 30, p.º 324.

Araf is a place between the Paradise and the Hell of tha Mahammedans; some deen it a veil of separation, some a strong wall. Others hold it to be a Purgatory, in which those helievers will remain, whose good and evil works have been so equal, that they were neither virtunus enough to enter Paradise, nor guilty enough to be condemned to the fire of Hell. From whence they see the glory of the blessed, and are near enough to congratulate them; but their ardent desire to partake the same happiness becomes a great pain. At length, at the day of judgment, when all men, before they are judged, shall be cited to render homage to their Creator, those who are hera coufined shill prostrate themselves before the face of the Lord, in adoration; and by this act of religion, which shall be accounted a merit, the number of their good works will exceed their evil ones, and they will enter into glory.

Saadi says, that Araf appears a Hell to the happy, and a Paradisa to the dammed. $-D^{*}Herbelot$.

PREFACE TO MADOC.

Mador.

"OMNE SOLUM FORTI PATRIA."

TO CHARLES WATKIN WILLIAMS WYNN,

THIS POEM

WAS ORIGINALLY INSCRIBED, IN 1805,

AS A TOKEN OF SIXTEEN YEARS OF UNINTERRUPTED FRIENDSHIP;

AND IS NOW RE-INSCRIBED, WITH THE SAME FEELING,

AFTER AN INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO.

PREFACE.

WHEN Madoc was brought to a close, in the summer of 1799, Mr. Coleridge advised me to publish it at once, and to defer making any material alterations, if any should suggest themselves, till a second edition. But four years had passed over my head since Joan of Are was sent to the press, and I was not disposed to commit a second imprudence. If the reputation obtained by that poem had confirmed the confidence which I felt in myself, it had also the effect of making me perceive my own deficiencies, and endeavor, with all diligence, to supply them. I pleased myself with the hope that it would one day be likened to Tasso's Rinaldo, and that, as the Jerusalem had fulfilled the promise of better things, whereof that poem was the pledge, so might Madoc be regarded in relation to the juvenile work which had preceded Thinking that this would probably be the it. greatest poem I should ever produce, my intention was to bestow upon it all possible care, as indeed I had determined never again to undertake any subject without due preparation. With this view it was my wish, before Madoc could be considered as completed, to see more of Wales than I had vet seen. This I had some opportunity of doing in the autumn of 1801, with my old friends and schoolfellows, Charles Wynn and Peter Elmsley. And so much was I bent upon making myself better acquainted with Welsh scenery, manners, and traditions, than could be done by books alone, that if I had succeeded in obtaining a house in the Vale of Neath, for which I was in treaty the year following, it would never have been my fortune to be classed among the Lake Poets.

Little had been done in revising the poem till the first year of my abode at Keswiek : there, in the latter end of 1803, it was resumed, and twelve months were diligently employed in reconstructing ıt.

which had been made in Joan of Arc, and much more extensive. In its original form, the poem consisted of fifteen books, containing about six thousand lines. It was now divided into two parts, and enlarged in the proportion of a full third. Shorter divisions than the usual one of books, or cantos, were found more convenient; the six books, therefore, which the first part comprised, were distributed in seventeen sections, and the other nine in twenty-seven. These changes in the form of the work were neither capriciously made, nor for the sake of novelty. The story consisted of two parts, almost as distinct as the Iliad and Odyssey; and the subdivisions were in like manner indicated by the subject. The alterations in the conduct of the piece occasioned its increase of length.

When Matthew Lewis published the Castle Spectre, he gave as his reason for introducing negro guards in a drama which was laid in feudal times, that he thought their appearance would produce a good effect; and if the effect would have been better by making them blue instead of black, blue, said he, they should have been. He was not more bent upon pleasing the public by stage effect, (which no dramatist ever studied more successfully,) than I was upon following my own sense of propriety, and thereby obtaining the approbation of that fit audience, which, being contented that it should be few, I was sure to find. Mr. Sotheby, whose Saul was published about the same time as Madoc, said to me a year or two afterwards, "You and I, Sir, find that blank verse will not do in these days; we must stand upon another tack." Mr. Sotheby considered the decision of the Pie-Poudre Court as final. But my suit was in that Court of Record, which, sooner or later, pronounces unerringly upon the merits of the case.

Madoc was immediately reprinted in America in numbers, making two octavo volumes. About The alterations were more material than those nine years afterwards, there appeared a paper in the Quarterly Review, which gave great offence to the Americans; if I am not mistaken in my recollections, it was the first in that journal which had any such tendency. An American author, whose name I heard, but had no wish to remember, supposed it to have been written by me; and upon this gratuitous supposition, (in which, moreover, he happened to be totally mistaken,) he attacked me in a pamphlet, which he had the courtesy to send me, and which I have preserved among my Curiosities of Literature. It is noticed in this place, because, among other vituperative accusations, the pamphleteer denounced the author of Madoc as having "meditated a most serious injury against the reputation of the New World, by attributing its discovery and colonization to a little vagabond Welsh Prince." This, he said, " being a most insidious attempt against the honor of America and the reputation of Columbus."*

This poem was the means of making me personally acquainted with Miss Seward. Her encomiastic opinion of it was communicated to me through Charles Lloyd, in a way which required some courteous acknowledgment; this led to an interchange of letters, and an invitation to Lichfield, where, accordingly, I paid her a visit, when next on my way to London, in 1807. She resided in the Bishop's palace. I was ushered up the broad brown staircase by her cousin, the Reverend Henry White, then one of the minor canons of that cathedral, a remarkable person, who introduced me into the presence with jubilant but appalling solemnity. Miss Seward was seated at her desk. She had just finished some verses, to be "Inscribed on the blank leaves of the Poem Madoc," and the first greeting was no sooner past, than she requested that I would permit her to read them to me. It was a mercy that she did not ask me to read them aloud. But she read admirably herself. The situation, however, in which I found myself, was so ridiculous, and I was so apprehensive of catching the eye of one person in the room, who was equally afraid of meeting mine, that I never felt it more difficult to control my emotions, than while listening, or seeming to listen, to my own praise and glory. But, bending my head, as if in a posture of attentiveness, and screening my face with my hand, and occasionally using some force to compress the risible muscles, I got through the scene withou; any misbchavior, and expressed my thanks, if not in terms of such glowing admiration as she was accustomed to receive from others, and had bestowed upon my unworthy self, yet as well as I could. I passed two days under her roof, and corresponded with her from that time till her death.

Miss Seward had been crippled by having repeatedly injured one of her knee-pans. Time had taken away her bloom and her beauty; but her fine countenance retained its animation, and her eyes could not have been brighter nor more expressive in her youth. Sir Walter Scott says of them, "they were auburn, of the precise shade and hue of her hair. In reciting, or in speaking with animation, they appeared to become darker, and as it were to flash fire. I should have hesitated," he adds, "to state the impression which this peculiarity made upon me at the time, had not my observation been confirmed by that of the first actress on this or any other stage, with whom I lately happened to converse on our deceased friend's expressive powers of countenance." * Si Walter has not observed that this peculiarity was hereditary. Describing, in one of her earlier letters, a scene with her mother, she says, "I grew so saucy to her, that she looked grave, and took her pinch of snuff, first at one nostril, and then at the other, with swift and angry energy, and her eyes began to grow dark and to flash. 'Tis an odd peculiarity; but the balls of my mother's eyes change from brown into black, when she feels either indignation or bodily pain."†

Miss Seward was not so much overrated at one time, as she has since been unduly depreciated. She was so considerable a person when her reputation was at its height, that Washington said no circumstance in his life had been so mortifying to him as that of having been made the subject of her invective in her Monody on Major André. After peace had been concluded between Great Britain and the United States, he commissioned an American officer, who was about to sail for England, to call upon her at Lichfield, and explain to her, that, instead of having cansed André's death, he had endeavored to save him; and she was requested to peruse the papers in proof of this, which he sent for her perusal. " They filled me with contrition," says Miss Seward, "for the rash injustice of my censure."#

An officer of her name served as lieutenant in the garrison at Gibraltar during the siege. To his great surprise, - for he had no introduction which could lead him to expect the honor of such notice, -he received an invitation to dine with General Elliot. The General asked him if he were related to the author of the Monody on Major André. The Lieutenant replied that he had the honor of being very distantly related to her, but he had not the happiness of her acquaintance. "It is sufficient, Mr. Seward," said the General, "that you bear her name, and a fair reputation, to entitle you to the notice of every soldier who has it in his power to serve and oblige a military brother. You will always find a cover for you at my table, and a sincere welcome; and whenever it may be in my power to serve you essentially, I shall not want the inclination." §

These anecdotes show the estimation in which she was, not undeservedly, held. Her epistolary style was distorted and disfigured by her admiration of Johnson; and in her poetry she set, rather than followed, the brocade fashion of Dr. Darwin. Still there are unquestionable proofs of extraordinary talents and great ability, both in her letters and her poems. She was an exemplary daughter, a most affectionate and faithful friend. Sir Walter has estimated, with characteristic skill, her powers of criticism, and her strong prepossessions upon literary points. And believing that the more she was known, the more she would have been esteemed and admired, I bear a willing testimony to her accomplishments and her genius, to her generous disposition, her frankness, and her sincerity and warmth of heart.

PREFACE

THE FIRST EDITION.

THE historical facts on which this Poem is founded may be related in a few words. On the death of Owen Gwyneth, king of North Wales, A. D. 1169, his children disputed the succession. Yorwerth, the elder, was set aside without a struggle, as being incapacitated by a blemish in his face. Hoel, though illegitimate, and born of an Irish mother, obtained possession of the throne for a while, till he was defeated and slain by David, the eldest son of the late king by a second wife. The conqueror, who then succeeded without opposition, slew Yorwerth, imprisoned Rodri, and hunted others of his brethren into exile. But Madoc, meantime, abandoned his barbarous country, and sailed away to the West in search of some better resting-place. The land which he discovered pleased him : he left there part of his people, and went back to Wales for a fresh supply of adventurers, with whom he again set sail, and was heard of no more. Strong evidence has been adduced that he reached America, and that his posterity exist there to this day, on the southern branches of the Missouri,* retaining their complexion, their language, and, in some degree, their arts.

About the same time, the Aztecas, an American tribe, in consequence of certain calamities, and of a particular onen, forsook Aztlan, their own country, under the guidance of Yuhidthiton. They became a mighty people, and founded the Mexican empire, taking the name of Mexicans, in honor of Mexitli, their tutelary god. Their emigration is here connected with the adventures of Madoc, and their superstition is represented as the same which their descendants practised, when discovered by the Spaniards. The manners of the Poem, in both its parts, will be found historically true. It assumes not the degraded title of Epic: and the question, therefore, is not whether the story is formed upon the rules of Aristotle, but whether it be adapted to the purposes of poetry.

KESWICK, 1805.

Three things must be avoided in Poetry; the frivolous, the obscure, and the superfluous.

The three excellencies of Poetry; simplicity of language, simplicity of subject, and simplicity of invention.

The three indispensable purities of Poetry; pure truth, pure language, and pure manners.

Three things should all Poetry be; thoroughly erudite, thoroughly animated, and thoroughly natural.

Triads.

COME, LISTEN TO A TALE OF TIMES OF OLD! COME, FOR YE RNOW ME. I AM HE WHO SANG THE MAID OF ARC, AND I AM HE WHO FRAMED OF THALABA THE WILD AND WONDROUS SONG. COME, LISTEN TO MY LAY, AND YE SHALL HEAR HOW MADOC FROM THE SHORES OF ERITAIN STREAD THE ADVENTUROUS SALL, EXPLORED THE OCEAN PATHS, AND QUELLED BARBARIAN POWER, AND OVERTHREW THE BLOODY ALTARS OF IDOLATRY, AND PLANTED IN ITS FAMES TRIUMPHANTLY THE CROSS DF CHRIST. COME, LISTEN TO MY LAY!

PART I.

MADOC IN WALES.

I.

THE RETURN TO WALES.

FAIR blows the wind, - the vessel drives along Her streamers fluttering at their length, her sails All full, - she drives along, and round her prow Scatters the ocean spray. What feelings then Fill'd every bosom, when the mariners, After the peril of that weary way, Beheld their own dear country ! Here stands one Stretching his sight toward the distant shore ; And as to well-known forms his husy joy Shapes the dim outline, eagerly he points The fancied headland, and the cape and bay, Till his eyes ache o'erstraining. This man shakes His comrade's hand, and bids him welcome home, And blesses God, and then he weeps aloud : Here stands another, who, in secret prayer, Calls on the Virgin, and his patron Saint, Renewing his old vows of gifts, and alms, And pilgrimage, so he may find all well. Silent and thoughtful, and apart from all, Stood Madoe; now his noble enterprise Proudly remembering, now in dreams of hope,

Anon of bodings full, and doubt, and fear. Fair smiled the evening, and the favoring gale Sung in the shrouds, and swift the steady bark Rush'd roaring through the waves.

The sun goes down :

Far off his light is on the naked crags Of Penmanmawr, and Arvon's ancient hills; And the last glory lingers yet awhile, Crowning old Snowdon's venerable head, That rose amid his mountains. Now the ship Drew nigh where Mona, the dark island, stretch'd Her shore along the ocean's lighter line. There, through the mist and twilight, many a fire, Up-flaming, stream'd upon the level sea Red lines of lengthening light, which, far away, Rising and falling, flash'd athwart the waves. Thereat, full many a thought of ill disturb'd Prince Madoc's mind; — did some new conqueror seize

The throne of David ? had the tyrant's guilt Awaken'd vengeance to the deed of death ? Or blazed they for a brother's obsequies, The sport and mirth of murder ? — Like the lights Which there upon Aberfraw's royal walls Are waving with the wind, the painful douht Fluctuates within him.— Onward drives the gale,— On flies the bark ; — and she hath reach'd at length Her haven, safe from her unequall'd way ! And now, in louder and yet louder joy Clamorous, the happy mariners all-hail Their native shore, and now they leap to land.

There stood an old man on the beach, to wait The comers from the ocean ; and he ask'd, Is it the Prince? And Madoc knew his voice, And turn'd to him, and fell upon his neck ; For it was Urien, who had foster'd him, Had loved him like a child; and Madoc loved, Even as a father, loved he that old man. My sister? quoth the Prince. — Oh, she and I Have wept together, Madoc, for thy loss, — That long and cruel absence ! — she and I, Hour after hour, and day by day, have look'd Toward the waters, and with aching eyes, And aching heart, sat watching every sail.

And David and our brethren? cried the Prince, As they moved on. — But then old Urien's lips Were slow at answer; and he spake, and paused In the first breath of utterance, as to choose Fit words for uttering some unhappy tale. More blood, quoth Madoc, yet? Hath David's fear Forced him to still more cruelty? Alas — Woe for the house of Owen !

Evil stars, Replied the old man, ruled o'er thy brethren's birth, From Dolwyddelan driven, his peaceful home, Poor Yorwerth sought the church's sanctuary; The murderer follow'd; — Madoc, need I say Who sent the sword? — Llewelyn, his brave boy, Where wanders he? in this his rightful realm, Houseless and hunted; richly would the king Gift the red hand that rid him of that fear! Ririd, an outlaw'd fugitive, as yet Eludes his deadly purpose; Rodri lives, A prisoner he, -1 know not in what fit Of natural mercy from the slaughter spared. Oh, if my dear old master saw the wreck And scattering of his house ! — that princely race The beautiful band of brethren that they were !

Madoc made no reply, — he closed his eyes, Groaning. But Urien, for his heart was full, Loving to linger on the woe, pursued: I did not think to live to such an hour Of joy as this! and often, when my sight Turn'd dizzy from the ocean, overcome With heavy anguish, Madoc, I have prayed That God would please to take me to his rest.

So as he ceased his speech, a sudden shout Of popular joy awakened Madoc's ear; And calling then to mind the festal fires, He ask'd their import. The old man replied, It is the giddy people merry-making, To welcome their new Queen; unheeding they The shame and the reproach to the long line Of our old royalty! — Thy brother weds The Saxon's sister.

What ! — in loud reply Madoc exclaim'd, hath he forgotten all ? David ! King Owen's son, — my father's son, — He wed the Saxon, — the Plantagenet !

Quoth Urien, He so dotes, as she had dropp'd Some philtre in his cup, to lethargize The British blood that came from Owen's veins. Three days his halls have echoed to the song Of joyance.

Shame! foul shame! that they should hear Songs of such joyance! cried the indignant Prince : Oh, that my Father's hall, where I have heard The songs of Corwen, and of Keiriog's day, Should echo this pollution! Will the chiefs Brook this alliance, this unnatural tie ?

There is no face but wears a courtly smile, Urien replied : Aberfraw's ancient towers Beheld no pride of festival like this, No like solemnities, when Owen came In conquest, and Gowalchmai struck the harp. Only Goervyl, careless of the pomp, Sits in her solitude, lamenting thee.

Saw ye not then my banner? quoth the Lord Of Ocean; on the topmast-head it stood To tell the tale of triumph; — or did night Hide the glad signal, and the joy hath yet To reach her?

Now had they almost attain'd The palace portal. Urien stopp'd, and said, The child should know your coming ; it is long Since she hath heard a voice that to her heart Spake gladness ;— none but 1 must tell her this. So Urien sought Goervyl, whom he found Alone, and gazing on the moonlight sea.

Oh, you are welcome, Urien ! cried the maid. There was a ship came sailing hitherward --I could not see his banner, for the night

Closed in so fast around her ; but my heart Indulged a foolish hope !

The old man replied, With difficult effort keeping his heart down, God, in his goodness, may reserve for us That blessing yet 'I have yet life enow To trust that I shall live to see the day, Albeit the number of my years well nigh Be full.

Ill-judging kindness! said the maid. Have I not nursed, for two long, wretched years, That miserable hope, which every day Grew weaker, like a baby sick to death, Yet dearer for its weakness day by day? No, never shall we see his daring bark! I knew and felt it in the evil hour When forth she fared! I felt it then ! that kiss Was our death-parting!—And she paused to curb The agony : anon,—But thou hast been To learn their tidings, Urien?—He replied, In half-articulate words,—They said, my child, That Madoc lived,—that soon he would be here.

She had received the shock of happiness: Urien! she cried — thou art not mocking me! Nothing the old man spake, but spread his arms, Sobbing aloud. Goervyl from their hold Started, and sunk upon her brother's breast.

Recovering first, the aged Urien said — "Enough of this, — there will be time for this, My children ! better it behoves ye now To seek the King. And, Madoc, I beseech thee, Bear with thy brother ! gently bear with him, My gentle Prince ! he is the headstrong slave Of passions unsubdued ; he feels no tie Of kindly love or blood ; — provoke him not, Madoe ! — It is his nature's malady.

Thou good old man' replied the Prince, be sure I shall remember what to him is due, What to myself; for 1 was in my youth Wisely and well train'd up; nor yet hath time Effaced the lore my foster-father taught.

[heart Haste, haste! exclaim'd Goervyl; — for her Smote her in sudden terror at the thought Of Yorwerth, and of Owen's broken house; — I dread his dark suspicions!

Not for me Suffer that fear, my sister! quoth the Prince; Safe is the straight and open way 1 tread; Nor hath God made the human heart so bad That thou or I should have a danger there. So saying, they toward the palace gate Went on, ere yet Aberfraw had received The tidings of her wanderer's glad return.

II.

THE MARRIAGE FEAST.

The guests were seated at the festal board; Green rushes strowed the floor; high in the hall 42 Was David; Emma, in her bridal robe, In youth, in beauty, by her husband's side Sat at the marriage feast. The monarch raised His eyes; he saw the mariner approach; Madoc! he cried; strong nature's impulses Prevail'd, and with a holy joy he met His brother's warm embrace.

With that, what peaks Of exultation shook Aberfraw's tower! How then reëchoing rang the home of Kings, When from subduëd Ocean, from the World That he had first foreseen, he first had found, Came her triumphant child! The mariners, A happy band, enter the clamorous hall; Friend greets with friend, and all are friends; one joy Fills with one common feeling every heart, And strangers give and take the welcoming Of hand, and voice, and eye. That boisterous joy At length allay'd, the board was spread anew; Anew the horn was brimm'd, the central hearth Built up anew for later revelries. Now to the ready feast! the seneschal Duly below the pillars ranged the crew; Toward the guest's most honorable seat The King himself led his brave brother ; - then, Eveing the lovely Saxon as he spake, Here, Madoc, see thy sister! thou hast been Long absent, and our house hath felt the while Sad diminution; but my arm at last Hath rooted out rebellion from the land; And I have stablished now our ancient house, Grafting a scion from the royal tree Of England on the sceptre; so shall peace Bless our dear country.

Long and happy years Await my sovereigns ! — thus the Prince replied, — And long may our dear country rest in peace ! Enough of sorrow hath our royal house Known in the field of battles, — yet we reap'd The harvest of renown.

Ay, - many a day,

David replied, together have we led The onset. — Dost thou not remember, brother, How in that hot and unexpected charge On Keiriog's bank, we gave the enemy Their welcoming?

And Berwyn's after-strife ! Quoth Madoc, as the memory kindled him : The fool that day, who in his mask attire Sported before King Henry, wished in vain Fitlier habiliments of javelin proof ! And yet not more precipitate that fool Dropp'd his moek weapons, than the archers cast Desperate their bows and quivers-full away, When we leap'd on, and in the mire and blood Trampled their banner !

That, exclaimed the king, That was a day indeed, which I may still Proudly remember, proved as I have been In conflicts of such perilous assay, That Saxon combat seem'd like woman's war. When with the traitor Hoel I did wage The deadly battle, then was I in trnth Put to the proof; no vantage-ground was there,

Nor famine, nor disease, nor storms to aid,	Of grief, and solitude, and wretched hope.
But equal, hard, close battle, man to man,	Where is Cadwallon? for one hark alone
Briton to Briton. By my soul, pursued	I saw come sailing here.
The tyrant, heedless how from Madoe's eye	The tale you ask
Flash'd the quick wrath like lightning, - though	Is long, Goervyl, said the mariner,
I knew	And 1 in truth am weary. Many moons
The rehel's worth, his prowess then excited	Have wax'd and waned, since from that distant
Unweleome wonder; even at the last,	world,
When stiff with toil and faint with wounds, he	The country of my dreams, and hope, and faith,
raised	We spread the homeward sail; a goodly world,
Feebly his broken sword,	My Sister! thou wilt see its goodliness,
Then Madoc's grief	And greet Cadwallon there. — But this shall be
Found utterance; Wherefore, David, dost thou	To-morrow's tale ;indulge we now the feast !
rouse	You know not with what joy we mariners
The memory now of that unhappy day,	Behold a sight like this.
That thou shouldst wish to hide from earth and Smiling he spake,
heaven ?	And turning, from the sewer's hand he took
Not in Aberfraw, — not to me this tale !	The flowing mead. David, the while, relieved
Tell it the Saxon !- he will join thy triumph,-	From rising jealousies, with better eye
He hates the race of Owen !- but I loved	Regards his venturous brother. Let the Bard,
My brother Hoel, -loved him? - that ye knew!	Exclaim'd the king, give his accustom'd lay;
I was to him the dearest of his kin,	For sweet, I know, to Madoc is the song
And he my own heart's brother.	He loved in earlier years.
David's cheek	Then, strong of voice,
Grew pale and dark; he bent his broad, black hrow	The officer proelaim'd the sovereign will,
Full upon Madoc's glowing countenance;	Bidding the hall be silent; loud he spake,
Art thou return'd to brave me? to my teeth	And smote the sounding pillar with his wand,
To praise the rebel bastard? to insult	And hush'd the hanqueters. The chief of Bards
The royal Saxon, my affianced friend?	Then raised the ancient lay.
I hate the Saxon! Madoe eried; not yet
	Thee, Lord! he sung,
Have I forgotten, how from Keiriog's shame	O Father! Thee, whose wisdom, Thee, whose
Flying, the coward wreak'd his eruelty	power,
On our poor brethren !- David, seest thou never	Whose love - all love, all power, all wisdom, Thou!
Those eyeless spectres by thy bridal bed?	Tongue cannot utter, nor can heart conceive.
Forget that horror? - may the fire of God	He in the lowest depth of Being framed
Blast my right hand, or ever it be link'd	The imperishable mind : in every change,
With that accursed Plantagenet's '	Through the great circle of progressive life,
The while,
	He gnides and guards, till evil shall be known,
Impatience struggled in the heaving breast	And being known as evil, cease to be;
Of David; every agitated limb	And the pure soul, emaneipate by Death,
Shook with ungovernable wrath; the page,	The Enlarger, shall attain its end predoom'd,
Who chafed his feet, in fear suspends his task;	The eternal newness of eternal joy.
In fear the guests gaze on him silently;
His eyeballs flash'd; strong anger choked his voice;	He left this lofty theme ; he struck the harp
He started up - Him Emma, by the hand	To Owen's praise, swift in the course of wrath,
Gently retaining, held, with gentle words	Father of Herocs. That proud day he sung,
Calming his rage. Goervyl, too, in tears	When from green Erin came the insulting host,
Besought her generous brother : he had met	Lochlin's long burdens of the flood, and they
Emma's reproaching glance, and, self-reproved,	Who left their distant homes in evil hour,
While the warm blood flush'd deeper o'er his cheek,	The death-doom'd Normen. There was heaviest
Thus he replied; I pray you pardon me,	toil,
My Sister-Queen! nay, you will learn to love	There deeper tumult, where the dragon race
This high affection for the race of Owen,	Of Mona trampled down the humbled head
Yourself the daughter of his royal house	Of haughty power; the sword of slaughter carved
By better ties than blood.
	Food for the yellow-footed fowl of heaven,
Grateful the Queen	And Menai's waters, burst with plunge on plunge,
Replied, by winning smile and eloquent eye,	Curling above their banks with tempest-swell,
Thanking the gentle Prince : a moment's pause	Their bloody billows heaved.
Ensued; Goervyl then with tunely speech	The long-past days
Thus to the wanderer of the waters spake :	Came on the mind of Madoc, as he heard
Madoc, thou hast not told us of the world	That song of triumph; on his sun-burnt brow
Beyond the ocean and the paths of man.	Sat exultation : other thoughts arose,
A lovely land it needs must be, my brother,	As on the fate of all his gallant honse

Mournful he mused; oppressive memory swell'd His bosom; over his fix'd eye-ball« swam

A lovely land it needs must be, my brother, Or sure you had not sojourn'd there so long, Of me forgetful, and my heavy hours

The tear's dim lustre, and the loud-toned harp Rung on his ear in vain; — its silence first Roused him from dreams of days that were no more.

111.

CADWALLON.

THEN on the morrow, at the festal board, The Lord of Ocean thus began his tale : -

[wind,

My heart beat high, when, with the favoring We sail'd away; Aberfraw! when thy towers, And the huge headland of my mother isle, Shrunk and were gone.

But, Madoc, I would learn, Quoth David, how this enterprise arose, And the wild hope of worlds beyond the sea; For at thine outset being in the war, I did not hear from vague and common fame The moving cause. Sprung it from bardic lore, The hidden wisdom of the years of old, Forgotten long? or did it visit thee In dreams that come from Heaven? The Prince replied, Thou shalt hear all; —but if, amid the tale, Strictly sincere, I haply should rehearse Aught to the King ungrateful, let my brother Be patient with the involuntary fault.

I was the guest of Rhys at Dinevawr, And there the tidings found me, that our sire Was gather'd to his fathers : - not alone The sorrow came ; the same ill messenger Told of the strife that shook our royal house, When Hoel, proud of prowess, seized the throne Which you, for elder claim and lawful birth, Challenged in arms. With all a brother's love, l on the instant hurried to prevent The impious battle : - all the day I sped ; Night did not stay me on my eager way -Where'er I pass'd, new rumor raised new fear-Midnight, and morn, and noon, I hurried on, And the late eve was darkening when I reach'd Arvon, the fatal field. - The sight, the sounds, Live in my memory now, - for all was done ! For horse and horseman, side by side in death, Lay on the bloody plain ; - a host of men, And not one living soul, - and not one sound, One human sound ; - only the raven's wing, Which rose before my coming, and the neigh Of wounded horses, wandering o'er the plain.

Night now was coming on; a man approach'd And bade me to his dwelling nigh at band. Thither I turn'd, too weak to travel more; For I was overspent with weariness, Aud, having now no hope to bear me up, Trouble and bodily labor master'd me. I ask'd him of the battle: — who had fallen He knew not, nor to whom the lot of war Had given my father's sceptre. Herc, said he, I came to seek if haply I might find Some wounded wretch, abandon'd else to death. My search was vain; the sword of civil war Had bit too deeply.

Soon we reach'd his home, A lone and lowly dwelling in the hills, By a gray mountain stream. Beside the hearth There sat an old blind man; his head was raised As he were listening to the coming sounds, And in the fire-light shone his silver locks. Father, said he who guided me, I bring A guest to our poor hospitality; And then he brought me water from the brook, And homely fare, and I was satisfied : That done, he piled the hearth, and spread around The rushes of repose. I laid me down; But worn with toil, and full of many fears, Sleep did not visit me : the quiet sounds Of nature troubled my distemper'd sense; My ear was busy with the stirring gale, The moving leaves, the brook's perpetual flow.

So on the morrow languidly I rose, And faint with fever; but a restless wish Was working in me, and I said, My host, Wilt thou go with me to the battle-field, That I may search the slain? for in the fray My brethren fought; and though with all my speed I strove to reach them ere the strife began, Alas, I sped too slow !

Grievest thou for that? He answer'd; grievest thou that thou art spared The shame and guilt of that unhappy strife, Briton with Briton in unuatural war? Nay, I replied, mistake me not! I came To recoucile the chiefs; they might have heard Their brother's voice.

Their brother's voice? said he, Was it not so? — And thou, too, art the son Of Owen ! — Yesternight I did not know The cause there is to pity thee. Alas, Two brethren thou wilt lose when one shall fall ! — Lament not him whom death may save from guilt; For all too surely in the conqueror Thou wilt find one whom his own fears henceforth Must make to all his kin a perilous foe.

I felt as though he wrong'd my father's sons, And raised an angry eye, and auswer'd him — My brethren love me.

Then the old man cried, Oh, what is Princes' love? what are the ties Of blood, the affections growing as we grow, If but ambition eome? — Thou deemest sure Thy brethren love thee; — ye have play'd together In childhood, shared your riper hopes and fears, Fought side by side in battle : — they may be Brave, generous, all that once their father was, Whom ye, I ween, call virtuous.

At the name, With pious warmth I cried, Yes, he was good, And grezt, and glorious ! Gwyneth's ancieut annals Boast not a name more noble. In the war Fearless he was, — the Saxon found him so. Wise was his counsel ; and uo supplicant For justice over from his palace-gate

Unrighted turned away. King Owen's name	Oh! there is healing in the bitter cup!
Shall live to after-times without a blot!	Go yonder, and before the unerring will Bow, and have comfort! To the hut I went,
There were two brethren once of kingly line,	And there, beside the lonely mountain-stream,
The old man replied; they loved each other well;	I veil'd my head, and brooded on the past.
And when the one was at his dying hour,
It then was comfort to him that he left	He tarried long; I felt the hours pass by,
So dear a brother, who would duly pay	As in a dream of morning, when the mind,
A father's duties to his orphan boy.	Half to reality awaken'd, blends
And sure he loved the orphan, and the boy	With airy visions and vague phantasies
With all a child's sincerity loved him,	Her dim perception; till at length his step
And learnt to call him father: so the years	Aroused me, and he came. 1 question'd him -
Went on, till when the orphan gain'd the age	Where is the body? hast thou bade the priests
Of manhood, to the throne his nucle came.	Perform due masses for his soul's repose?
The young man claim'd a fair inheritance,
His father's lands; and — mark what follows,	He answer'd me — The rain and dew of heaven
Prince! —	Will fall upon the turf that covers him,
At midnight he was seized, and to his eyes	And greener grass will flourish on his grave.
The brazen plate was held - He cried aloud;	But rouse thee, Prince ! there will be hours enough
He look'd around for help; - he only saw	For mournful memory ; - it befits thee now
His Uncle's ministers, prepared to do	Take counsel for thyself; - the son of Owen
Their wicked work, who to the red-hot brass	Lives not in safety here.
Forced his poor eyes, and held the open lids,	I bow'd my head,
Till the long agony consumed the sense;	Oppress'd by heavy thoughts; all wretchedness
And when their hold relax'd, it had been worth	The present; darkness on the future lay;
The wealth of worlds if he could then have seen,	Forful and gloomy both. I answer'd not.
	rearrui and groomy boui. Tanswer a not.
Dreadful to him and hideous as they were,
Their ruffian faces! - 1 am blind, young Prince,	llath power seduced thy wishes? he pursued,
And I can tell how sweet a thing it is	And wouldst thon seize upon thy father's throne?
To see the blessed light !	Now God forbid ! quoth 1. Now God forbid !
Must more be told?	Qnoth he; - but thou art dangerous, Prince ! and
What further agonies he yet endured?	what
Or hast thou known the consummated crime,	Shall shield thee from the jealous arm of power?
And heard Cynetha's fate?	Think of Cynetha ! — the unsleeping eye
A painful glow	Of justice hath not closed upon his wrongs;
Inflamed my cheek, and for my father's crime	At length the avenging arm is gone abroad, -
I felt the shame of guilt. The dark-brow'd man	One woe is past, - woe after woe comes on, -
Beheld the burning flush, the uneasy eye,	There is no safety here, - here thou must be
That knew not where to rest. Come ! we will	The victim of the murderer! Does thy heart search	Shrink from the alternative? look round!-
The slain, arising from his seat, he said ;	behold
I follow'd; to the field of fight we went,	What shelter, - whither wouldst thou fly for peace?
And over steeds, and arms, and men, we held	What if the asylum of the Church were safe, —
	Were there no better purposes ordain'd
Our way in silence. Here it was, quoth he,
The fiercest war was waged; lo! in what heaps	For that young arm, that heart of noble hopes? Son of our kings, — of old Cassibelan,
Man upon man fell slaughter'd! Then my heart
Smote me, and my knees shook; for I beheld	Great Caratach, immortal Arthur's line,
Where, on his conquer'd foemen, lloel lay.	Oh, shall the blood of that heroic race
	Stagnate in cloister-sloth? — Or wouldst thou leave
He paused ; his heart was full; and on his tongue	Thy native isle, and beg, in awkward phrase,
The imperfect utterance died; a general gloom	Some foreign sovereign's charitable grace, -
Sadden'd the hall, and David's cheek grew pale.	The Saxon or the Frank, - and earn his gold,
Commanding first his feelings, Madoc broke	The hireling in a war whose cause thou know st not,
The oppressive silence.	Whose end concerns not thee?
Then Cadwallon took	I sat and gazed,
My hand, and, pointing to his dwelling, cried,	Following his eye with wonder, as he paced
Prince, go and rest thee there, for thou hast need	Before me to and fro, and listening still,
Of rest; the care of sepulture be mine.	Though now he paced in silence. But anon,
Nor did 1 then comply, refusing rest,	The old man's voice and step awakened us,
Till I had seen in holy ground inearth'd	Each from his thought; I will come out, said he,
My poor, lost brother. Wherefore, he exclaim'd,	That I may sit beside the brook, and feel
(And I was awed by his severer eye,)	The comfortable sun. As forth he came,
Wouldst thou be pampering thy distempered mind?	I could not choose but look upon his face :
Affliction is not sent in vain, young man,	Gently on him had gentle nature laid
From that good God, who chastens whom he loves.
r tom that good God, who chastens whom he loves.	and weight or years, an passions that distant

Were past away; the stronger lines of grief Softened and settled, till they told of grief By patient hope and piety subdued : His eyes, which had their hue and brightness left, Fix'd lifelessly, or objectless they roll'd, Nor moved by sense, nor animate with thought. On a smooth stone beside the stream he took His wonted seat in the sunshine. Thou hast lost A brother, Prince, he said - or the dull ear Of age deceived me. Peace be with his soul ! And may the curse that lies upon the house Of Owen turn away! Wilt thou come hither, And let me feel thy face ? - I wondered at him : Yet while his hand perused my lineaments, Deep awe and reverence fill'd me. O my God, Bless this young man ! he cried ; a perilous state Is his; - but let not thou his father's sins Be visited on him!

I raised my eyes, Inquiring, to Cadwallon; Nay, young Prince, Despise not thou the blind man's prayer ! he cried; It might have given thy father's dying hour A hope, that sure he needed — for, know thou, It is the victim of thy father's crime, Who asks a blessing on the !

At his feet I fell, and clasp'd his knees : he raised me up; ---Blind as I was, a mutilated wretch, A thing that nature owns not, I survived, Loathing existence, and with impious voice Accused the will of Heaven, and groan'd for death. Years pass'd away; this universal blank Became familiar, and my soul reposed On God, and I had comfort in my prayers. But there were blessings for me yet in store Thy father knew not, when his bloody fear All hope of an avenger had cut off, How there existed then an unborn babe, Child of my lawless love. Year after year I lived a lonely and forgotten wretch, Before Cadwallon knew his father's fate, Long years and years before I knew my son; For never, till his mother's dying hour, Learnt he his dangerous birth. He sought me then ;

He woke my soul once more to human ties; — I hope he hath not wean'd my heart from Heaven, Life is so precious now !—

Dear, good old man !

And lives he still? Goervyl ask'd, in tears; Madoc replied, I scarce can hope to find A father's welcome at my distant home. I left him full of days, and ripe for death; And the last prayer Cynetha breathed upon me Went like a death-bed blessing to my heart!

When evening came, toward the echoing shore I and Cadwallon walk'd together forth: Bright with dilated glory shone the west; But brighter lay the ocean-flood helow, The burnish'd silver sea, that heaved and flash'd Its restless rays, intolerably bright. Prince, quoth Cadwallon, thou hast rode the waves In triumph, when the invaders felt thine arm. Oh, what a nobler conquest might be won,

There, — upon that wide field !— What meanest thon ?

I cried. — That yonder waters are not spread A boundless waste, a bourne impassable ! — That man should rule the Elements ! — that there Might manly courage, manly wisdom find Some happy isle, some undiscovered shore, Some resting-place for peace. — Oh that my soul Could seize the wings of Morning ! soon would 1 Behold that other world, where yonder sun Speeds now, to dawn in glory !

As he spake, Conviction came upon my startled mind, Like lightning on the midnight traveller. I caught his hand; — Kinsman, and guide, and friend,

Yea, let us go together ! — Down we sat, Full of the vision, on the echoing shore; One only object fill'd ear, eye, and thought: We gazed upon the awful world of waves, And talk'd and dreamt of years that were to come.

IV.

THE VOYAGE.

Nor with a heart unmoved I left thy shores, Dear native isle ! oh — not without a pang, As thy fair uplands lessened on the view, Cast back the long, involuntary look ! The morning cheer'd our outset; gentle airs Curl'd the blue decp, and bright the summer snn Play'd o'er the summer ocean, when our barks Began their way.

And they were gallant barks, As ever through the raging billows rode; And many a tempest's buffeting they bore. Their sails all swelling with the eastern breeze, Their tighten'd cordage clattering to the mast, Steady they rode the main; the gale aloft Sung in the shrouds, the sparkling waters hiss'd Before, and froth'd, and whiten'd far behind. Day after day, with one auspicious wind, Right to the setting sun we held our course. My hope had kindled every heart; they blest The unvarying breeze, whose unabating strength Still sped us onward; and they said that Heaven Favor'd the bold emprise.

How many a time, Mounting the mast-tower-top, with eager ken They gazed, and fancied in the distant sky Their promised shore, beneath the evening cloud, Or seen, low lying, through the haze of morn. I, too, with eyes as anxious watch'd the waves, Though patient, and prepared for long delay; For not on wild adventure had I rush'd With giddy speed, in some delirious fit Of faney; but in many a tranquil hour Weigh'd well the attempt, till hope matured to faith. Day after day, day after day the same,— A weary waste of waters! still the breeze Hung heavy in our sails, and we held on One even course : a second week was gone,

And now another past, and still the same, Waves beyond waves, the interminable sea! What marvel, if at length the mariners Grew sick with long expectance? I beheld Dark looks of growing restlessness; I heard Distrnst's low murmurings; nor avail'd it long To see and not perceive. Shame had awhile Repress'd their fear, till, like a smother'd fire, It burst, and spread with quick contagion round, And strengthen'd as it spread. They spake in tones Which might not be mistaken; — They had done What men dared do, ventured where never keel Had cut the deep before; still all was sea, The same unbounded ocean! — to proceed Were tempting Heaven.

I heard with feign'd surprise, And, pointing then to where our fellow bark, Gay with her fluttering streamers and full sails, Rode, as in triumph, o'er the element, I ask'd them what their comrades there would deem Of those so bold ashore, who, when a day, Perchance an hour, might crown their glorious toil, Shrunk then, and coward-like return'd to meet Mockery and shame? True, they had ventured on In seas unknown, beyond where ever man Had plough'd the billows yet: more reason so Why they should now, like him whose happy speed Well nigh hath run the race, with higher hope Press onward to the prize. But late they said, Marking the favor of the steady gale, That Heaven was with us; Heaven vouchsafed us still Fair seas and favoring skies; nor need we pray For other aid; the rest was in ourselves; Nature had given it, when she gave to man Courage and constancy.

They answer'd not. Awhile obedient; but I saw with dread The silent sullenness of cold assent. Then, with what fearful eagerness I gazed, At earliest daybreak, o'er the distant deep ! How sick at heart with hope, when evening closed, Gazed through the gathering shadows !--- but I saw The sun still sink below the endless waves, And still at morn, beneath the farthest sky, Unbounded ocean heaved. Day after day Before the steady gale we drove along, -Day after day! The fourth week now had past; Still all around was sea, - the eternal sea! So long that we had voyaged on so fast, And still at morning where we were at night, And where we were at morn, at nightfall still, The centre of that drear circumference, Progressive, yet no change ! - almost it seem'd That we had pass'd the mortal bounds of space, And speed was toiling in infinity. My days were days of fear ; my hours of rest Were like a tyrant's slumber. Sullen looks, Eyes turn'd on me, and whispers meant to meet My ear, and loud despondency, and talk Of home, now never to be seen again, -I suffer'd these, dissembling as I could, Till that avail'd no longer. Resolute The men came round me. They had shown enough Of courage now, enough of constancy;

Still to pursue the desperate enterprise Were impious madness! they had deem'd, indeed, That Heaven in favor gave the unchanging gale ; ---More reason now to think offended God, When man's presumptuous folly strove to pass The fated limits of the world, had sent His winds, to waft us to the death we sought. Their lives were dear, they bade me know, and they Many, and I, the obstinate, but one. With that, attending no reply, they hailed Our fellow bark, and told their fix'd resolve. A shout of joy approved. Thus, desperate now, I sought my solitary cabin; there Confused with vague, tumultuous feelings lay, And to remembrance and reflection lost, Knew only I was wretched.

Thus entranced Cadwallon found me; shame, and grief, and pride, And baffled hope, and fruitless anger swell'd Within me. All is over! I exclaim'd; Yet not in me, my friend, hath time produced These tardy doubts and shameful fickleness; I have not fail'd, Cadwallon! Nay, he said, The coward fears which persecuted me Have shown what thou hast suffer'd. We have yet One hope — I pray'd them to proceed a day, — But one day more; — this little have I gain'd, And here will wait the issue; in yon bark I am not needed, — they are masters there.

One only day !— The gale blew strong, the hark Sped through the waters; but the silent hours, Who make no pause, went by; and centred still, We saw the dreary vacaney of heaven Close round our narrow view, when that brief term, The last, poor respite of our hopes, expired. They shorten'd sail, and call'd with coward prayer For homeward winds. Why, what poor slaves are we !

In bitterness I cried; the sport of chance; Left to the mercy of the clements, Or the more wayward will of such as these, Blind tools and victims of their destiny ! Yea, Madoc ! he replied, the Elements Master indeed the feeble powers of man ! Not to the shores of Cambria will thy ships Win back their shameful way !—or H_E , whose will Unchains the winds, hath bade them minister To aid us, when all human hope was gone, Or we shall soon eternally repose From life's long voyage.

As he spake, I saw The clouds hang thick and heavy o'er the deep, And heavily, upon the long, slow swell, The vessel labor'd on the laboring sea. The reef-points rattled on the shivering sail; At fits the sudden gust howl'd ominous, Anon with unremitting fury raged; High roll'd the mighty billows, and the blast Swept from their sheeted sides the showery foam. Vain now were all the scamen's homeward hopes, Vain all their skill ! — we drove before the storm

'Tis pleasant, hy the cheerful hearth, to hear Of tempests and the dangers of the deep,

And pause at times, and feel that we are safe; Then listen to the perilous tale again, And with an eager and suspended soul, Woo terror to delight us. — But to hear The roaring of the raging elements, — To know all human skill, all human strength, Avail not, — to look round, and only see The mountain wave incumbent with its weight Of bursting waters o'er the reeling bark, — Oh God, this is indeed a dreadful thing ! And he who hath endured the horror once Of such an hour, doth never hear the storm Howl round his home, but he remembers it, And thinks upon the suffering mariner.

Onward we drove: with unabating force The tempest raged; night added to the storm New horrors, and the morn arose o'erspread With heavier clouds. The weary mariners Call'd on Saint Cyric's aid; and 1, too, placed My hope on Heaven, relaxing not the while Our human efforts. Ye who dwell at home, Ye do not know the terrors of the main ! When the winds blow, ye walk along the shore, And as the curling billows leap and toss, Fable that Ocean's mermaid Shepherdess Drives her white flocks afield, and warns in time The wary fisherman. Gwenhidwy warned When we had no retreat! My secret heart Almost had fail'd me. - Were the Elements Confounded in perpetual conflict here, Sea, Air, and Heaven? Or were we perishing Where at their source the Floods, forever thus, Beneath the nearer influence of the Moon, Labor'd in these mad workings ? Did the Waters Here on their outmost circle meet the Void, The verge and brink of Chaos? Or this Earth, --Was it indeed a living thing, -- its hreath The ebb and flow of Ocean? and had we Reached the storm rampart of its Sanctuary, The insuperable boundary, raised to guard Its mysteries from the eye of man profane?

Three dreadful nights and days we drove along; The fourth, the welcome rain came rattling down; The wind had fallen, and through the broken cloud Appeared the bright, dilating blue of heaven. Imbolden'd now, I call'd the mariners : — Vain were it should we bend a homeward course, Driven by the storm so far : they saw our barks, For service of that long and perilous way, Disabled, and our food belike to fail. Silent they heard, reluctant in assent; Anon, they shouted joyfully.—I look'd And saw a bird slow sailing overhead, His long, white pinions by the sunbeam edged, As though with burnish'd silver; — never yet Heard I so sweet a music as his cry!

Yet three days more, and hope more cager now, Sure of the signs of land, -- weed-shoals, and birds Who flock'd the main, and gentle airs which breathed,

Or seemed to breathe fresh fragrance from the shore. On the last evening, a long, shadowy line

Skirted the sea; — how fast the night closed in ! I stood upon the deck, and watch'd till dawn. But who can tell what feelings fill'd my heart, When, like a cloud, the distant land arose Gray from the ocean, — when we left the ship, And cleft, with rapid oars, the shallow wave And stood triumphant on another world '

V.

LINCOYA.

MADOC had paused awhile; but every eye Still watch'd his lips, and every voice was hush'd. Soon as I leap'd ashore, pursues the Lord Of Ocean, prostrate on my face I fell, Kiss'd the dear earth, and pray'd with thankful tears

Hard by a brook was flowing; — never yet, Even from the gold-tipp'd horn of victory, With harp and song, amid my father's hall, Pledged I so sweet a draught, as lying there, Beside that streamlet's brink ! — to feel the ground, To quaff the cool, clear water, to inhale The breeze of land, while fears and dangers past Recurr'd and heighten'd joy, as summer storms Make the fresh evening lovelier !

To the shore The natives throng'd; astonish'd, they beheld Our winged barks, and gazed with wonderment On the strange garb, the bearded countenance, And the white skin, in all unlike themselves. I see with what inquiring eyes you ask, What men were they? Of dark-brown color, tingeo With sunny redness; wild of eye; their brows So smooth, as never yet anxiety Nor busy thought had made a furrow there; Beardless, and each to each of lineaments So like, they seem'd but one great family. Their loins were loosely cinctured, all beside Bare to the sun and wind; and thus their limbs, Unmanacled, display'd the truest forms Of strength and beauty. Fearless sure they were, And, while they eyed us, grasp'd their spears, as if, Like Britain's injured but unconquer'd sons, They too had known how perilous it was To let a stranger, if he came in arms, Set foot upon their land.

But soon the guise Of men nor purporting nor fearing ill Gain'd confidence; their wild, distrustful looks Assumed a milder meaning; over one I cast my mantle, on another's head The velvet bonnet placed, and all was joy. We now besought for food; at once they read Our gestures; but I cast a hopeless eye On hills and thickets, woods, and marshy plains, A waste of rank luxuriance all around. Thus musing, to a lake I follow'd them, Left when the rivers to their summer course Withdrew; they scatter'd on its water drugs Of such strange potency, that soon the shoals, Coop'd there by Nature prodigally kind, Floated inebriate. As I gazed, a deer Sprung from the bordering thicket; the true shaft Scarce with the distant victim's blood had stain'd Its point, when instantly he dropp'd and died, Such deadly juice inblued it; yet on this We made our meal unharm'd; and I perceived The wisest leech that ever in our world Cull'd herbs of hidden virtue, was to these A child in knowledge.

Sorrowing we beheld The night come on; but soon did night display More wonders than it veil'd: innumerous tribes From the wood-cover swarm'd, and darkness made Their beauties visible; one while they stream'd A bright blue radiance upon flowers which closed Their gorgeous colors from the eye of day; Now, motionless and dark, ehuded search, Self-shrouded; and anon, starring the sky, Rose like a shower of fire.

Our friendly hosts Now led us to the hut, our that night's home, A rude and spacious dwelling : twisted boughs, And canes, and withies formed the walls and roof; And from the unhewn trunks which pillar'd it, Low nets of interwoven reeds were hung. With shouts of honor here they gather'd round me, Ungarmented my limbs, and in a net With softest feathers lined, a pleasant couch, They laid and left me.

To our ships return'd, After soft sojourn here, we coasted on, Insatiate of the wonders and the charms Of earth, and air, and sea. Thy summer woods Are lovely, O my mother isle! the birch Light bending on thy banks, thy elmy vales, Thy venerable oaks! - But there, what forms Of beauty clothed the inlands and the shore ! All these in stateliest growth, and mixt with these Dark spreading eedar, and the cypress tall, Its pointed summit waving to the wind Like a long beacon flame; and loveliest Amid a thousand strange and lovely shapes, The lofty palm, that with its nuts supplied Beverage and food; they edged the shore, and crown'd

The far-off highland summits, their straight stems Bare, without leaf or bough, erect and smooth, Their tresses nodding like a crested helm, The plumage of the grove.

Will ye believe The wonders of the ocean? how its shoals Sprang from the wave, like flashing light, — took wing, And, twinkling with a silver glitterance,

Flew through the air and sunshine? yet were these To sight less wondrous than the tribe who swam, Following like fowlers with uplifted eye Their falling quarry — language cannot paint Their splendid tints; though in blue ocean seen, Blue, darkly, deeply, beautifully blue, In all its rich variety of shades, Suffused with glowing gold.

Heaven, too, had there Its wonders: — from a deep, black, heavy cloud, What shall I say? — a shoot, — a trunk. — an arm Came down : — yea! like a Demon's arm, it seized The waters; Ocean smoked beneath its touch, And rose like dust before the whirlwind's force. But we sail'd onward over tranquil seas, Wafted by airs so exquisitely mild, That even to breathe became an act of will, And sense, and pleasure. Not a cloud, by day, With purple islanded the dark-blue deep; By night the quiet billows heaved and glaneed Under the moon, — that heavenly moon ! so bright, That many a midnight have I paced the deck, Forgetful of the hours of due repose; Yea, till the Sun, in his full majesty, Went forth, like God beholding his own works.

Once, when a chief was feasting us on shore, A captive served the food : I mark'd the youth, For he had features of a gentler race; And oftentimes his eye was fix'd on me, With looks of more than wonder. We return'd At evening to our ships; at night a voice Came from the sea, the intelligible voice Of earnest supplication : he had swum To trust our mercy; up the side he sprang, And look'd among the erew, and singling me, Fell at my feet. Such friendly tokenings As our short commerce with the native tribes Had taught, I proffer'd, and sincerity Gave force and meaning to the half-learnt forms For one we needed who might speak for us; And well I liked the youth, - the open lines Which character'd his face, the fearless heart, Which gave at once and won full confidence. So that night at my feet Lincova slept.

When 1 display'd whate'er might gratify, Whate'er surprise, with most delight he view'd Our arms, the iron helm, the pliant mail, The buckler strong to save; and then he shook The lance, and grasp'd the sword, and turn'd to me With vehement words and gestures, every limb Working with one strong passion ; and he placed The falchion in my hand, and gave the shield, And pointed south and west, that I should go To conquer and protect; anon he wept Aloud, and clasp'd my knees, and falling, fain He would have kiss'd my feet. Went we to shore? Then would he labor restlessly to show A better place lay onward; and in the sand To south and west he drew the line of coast, And figured how a mighty river there Ran to the sea. The land bent westward soon, And, thus confirm'd, we voyaged on to seek The river inlet, following at the will Of our new friend : and we learnt after him, Well pleased and proud to teach, what this was eall'd, What that, with no unprofitable pains.

Nor light the joy I felt at hearing first The pleasant accents of my native tongue, Albeit in broken words and tones uncouth, Come from these foreign lips. At length we came

Where the great river, amid shoals, and banks, And islands, growth of its own gathering spoils,

Through many a branching channel, wide and full,	Ga
Rush'd to the main. The gale was strong; and safe,	Aı
Amid the uproar of conflicting tides,	Ha
Our gallant vessels rode. A stream as broad	Me
And turbid, when it leaves the Land of Hills,
Old Severn rolls; but banks so fair as these Old Severn views not in his Land of Hills,
Nor even where his turbid waters swell,
And sully the salt sea.
So we sail'd on
By shores now cover'd with impervious woods,
Now stretching wide and low, a reedy waste,
And now through vales where earth profusely	Tł

pour'd Her treasures, gather'd from the first of days. Sometimes a savage tribe would welcome us, By wonder from their lethargy of life Awaken'd; then again we voyaged on Through traets all desolate, for days and days, League after league, one green and fertile mead, That fed a thousand herds.

A different scene Rose on our view, of mount on mountain piled, Which when I see again in memory, Star-gazing Idris's stupendous seat [haunts, Seems dwarf'd, and Snowdon, with its eagle Shrinks, and is dwindled like a Saxon hill.

Here, with Cadwallon and a chosen band, I left the ships. Lineoya guided us A toilsome way among the heights, at dusk We reach'd the village skirts; he bade us halt, And raised his voice; the elders of the land Came forth, and led us to an ample hut, Which in the centre of their dwellings stood, The Stranger's House. They eyed us wondering; Yet not for wonder eeased they to observe Their hospitable rites; from hnt to hut The tidings ran that strangers were arrived, Fatigued, and hungry, and athirst; anon, Each from his means supplying us, eame food And beverage, such as cheers the weary man.

VI.

ERILLYAB.

AT morning their high-priest, Ayayaea, Came with our guide : the venerable man With reverential awe accosted us, For we, he ween'd, were children of a race Mightier than they, and wiser, and by Heaven Beloved and favor'd more: he came to give Fit welcome, and he led us to the Queen. The fate of war had reft her of her realm; Yet with affection, and habitual awe, And old remembrances, which gave their love A deeper and religious character, Fallen as she was, and humbled as they were, Her faithful people still, in all they could, Obey'd Erillyab. She, too, in her mind Those recollections cherish'd, and such thoughts As, though no hope allay'd their bitterness, we to her eye a spirit and a strength, id pride to features which belike had borne, id they been fashion'd by a happier fate, eaning more gentle and more womanly, t not more worthy of esteem and love. e sat upon the threshold of her hut; r in the palace where her sires had reign'd e conqueror dwelt. Her son was at her side, boy now near to manhood; by the door, re of its bark, the head and branches shorn, ood a young tree with many a weapon hung, r husband's war-pole, and his monument ere had his quiver moulder'd, his stone-axe Had there grown green with moss, his bow-string [there Sung as it cut the wind.

She welcom'd us With a proud sorrow in her mien; fresh fruits Were spread before us, and her gestures said That when he lived whose hand was wont to wield Those weapons, - that in better days, - that ere She let the tresses of her widowhood fus Grow wild, - she could have given to guests like A worthier welcome. Soon a man approach'd, Hooded with sable, his half-naked limbs Smear'd black : the people at his sight drew round, The women wail'd and wept, the children turn'd And hid their faces on their mothers' knees. He to the Queen address'd his speech, then look'd Around the children, and laid hands on two, Of different sexes, but of age alike, Some six years each, who at his touch shrick'd out. But then Lincoya rose, and to my feet Led them, and told me that the conquerors claim'd These innocents for tribute; that the Priest Would lay them on the altar of his god, Pluck out their little hearts in sacrifice, And with his brotherhood, in impious rites, Feast on their flesh ! - I shudder'd, and my hand Instinctively unsheathed the avenging sword, As he with passionate and eloquent signs, Eye-speaking carnestness, and quivering lips, Besought me to preserve himself, and those Who now fell suppliant round me, --- youths and maids,

Gray-headed men, and mothers with their babes.

I eaught the little vietims up, I kiss'd Their innocent cheeks, I raised my eyes to neaven, I eall'd upon Almighty God to hear And bless the vow I made; in our own tongue Was that sworn promise of protection pledged – Impetuous feeling made no pause for thought. Heaven heard the vow; the suppliant multitude Saw what was stirring in my heart; the Priest, With eye inflamed and rapid answer, raised His menacing hand; the tone, the bitter smile, Interpreting his threat.

Meanwhile the Queen, With watchful eye and steady countenance, Had listen'd; now she rose, and to the Priest Address'd her speech. Low was her voice and As one who spake with effort to subdue [calm, Sorrow that struggled still; but while she spake, Her features kindled to more majesty, Her eye became more animate, her voice Rose to the height of feeling ; on her son She call'd, and from her husband's monument His battle-axe she took ; and I could see, That when she gave the boy his father's arms, She call'd his father's spirit to look on And bless them to his vengeance.

Silently The tribe stood listening as Erillyab spake; The very Priest was awed: once he essayed To answer; his tongne fail'd him, and his lip Grew pale and fell. He to his countrymen, Of rage, and shame, and wonder full, return'd, Bearing no victims, for their shrines aecurs'd, But tidings that the Hoamen had cast off Their vassalage, roused to desperate revolt By men in hue, and speech, and garment strange, Who, in their folly, dared defy the power Of Aztlan.

When the King of Aztlan heard The unlook'd-for tale, ere yet he ronsed his strength, Or pitying our rash valor, or perhaps Curious to see the man so bravely rash, He sent to bid me to his court. Surprised, I should have given to him no credulous faith, But fearlessly Erillyab bade me trust Her honorable foe. Unarm'd l went, Lineoya with me to exchange our speech So as he could, of safety first assured; For to their devilish idols he had been A victim doomed, and, from the bloody rites Flying, been earried captive far away.

From early morning till the midnoon hour We travell'd in the mountains; then a plain Open'd below, and rose upon the sight, Like boundless ocean from a hill-top seen. A beautiful and populous plain it was; Fair woods were there, and fertilizing streams, And pastures spreading wide, and villages In fruitful groves embower'd, and stately towns, And many a single dwelling specking it, As though for many a year the land had been The land of peace. Below us, where the base Of the great mountain to the level sloped, A broad, blue lake extended far and wide Its waters, dark beneath the light of noon. There Aztlan stood upon the farther shore ; Amid the shade of trees its dwellings rose, Their level roofs with turrets set around, And battlements all burnish'd white, which shone Like silver in the sunshine. I beheld The imperial city, her far-circling walls, Her garden groves and stately palaces, 'Her temple's mountain-size, her thousand roofs ; And when I saw her might and majesty, My mind misgave me then.

We reach'd the shore ; A floating islet waited for me there, The beautiful work of man. I set my feet Upon green-growing herbs and flowers, and sat Embower'd in odorous shrubs ; four long, light boats, Yoked to the garden, with accordant song, And dip and dash of oar in harmony, Bore me aeross the lake.

Then in a car

Aloft by human bearers was I borne; And through the city gate, and through long lines Of marshall'd multitudes who throng'd the way, We reach'd the palace court. Four priests were there;

Each held a burning censer in his hand, And strew'd the precious gum as I drew nigh, And held the steaming fragrance forth to me, Honoring me like a god. They led me in, Where, on his throne, the royal Azteca Coanocotzin sat. Stranger, said he, Welcome; and be this enming to thy weal ! A desperate warfare doth thy courage court; But thou shalt see the people and the power Whom thy deluded zeal would call to arms; So may the knowledge make thee timely wise. The valiant love the valiant. - Come with me ! So saying, he rose ; we went together forth To the Great Temple. 'Twas a huge, square hill, Or rather like a rock it seemed, hewn out And squared by patient labor. Never yet Did our forefathers, o'er beloved chief Fallen in his glory, heap a monument Of that prodigious bulk, though every shield Was laden for his grave, and every hand Toil'd unremitting at the willing work From morn till eve, all the long summer day.

The ascent was lengthen'd with provoking art, By steps which led but to a wearying path Round the whole structure; then another flight, Another road around, and thus a third, And yet a fourth, before we reach'd the height. Lo, now, Coanocotzin cried, thou seest The cities of this widely-peopled plain; And wert thon on yon farthest temple-top, Yet as far onward wouldst thou see the land Well husbanded like this, and full of men. They tell me that two floating palaces Brought thee and all thy people; — when I sound The Tambour of the God, ten Cities hear Its voice, and answer to the call in arms.

In truth, I felt my weakness, and the view Had wakened no unreasonable fear, But that a nearer sight had stirr'd my blood; For on the summit where we stood, four Towers Were piled with human skulls, and all around, Long files of human heads were strung to parel And whiten in the sun. What then I felt Was more than natural courage — 'twas a trust In more than mortal strength — a faith in God — Yea, inspiration from him ! — I exclaimed, Not though ten Cities ten times told obey'd The King of Aztlan's bidding, should I fear The power of man !

Art thou then more than man: He answered; and I saw his tawny cheek Lose its life-color as the fear arose: Nor did I undeceive him from that fear, For sooth I knew not how to answer him, And therefore let it work. So not a word Spake he, till we again had reach'd the conrt, And I, too, went in silent thoughtfulness: But then when, save Lincoya, there was none

To hear our speech, again did he renew The query, — Stranger! art thou more than man, That thou shouldst set the power of man at nought?

Then I replied, Two floating Palaces Bore me and all my people o'er the seas. When we departed from our mother-land, The Moon was newly born ; we saw her wax And wane, and witnessed her new birth again ; And all that while, alike by day and night, We travell'd through the sea, and caught the winds, And made them bear us forward. We must meet In battle, if the Hoamen are not freed From your accursed tribute, - thou and I, My people and thy countless multitudes. Your arrows shall fall from us as the hail Leaps on a rock, - and when ye smite with swords, Not blood, but fire, shall follow from the stroke. Yet think not thou that we are more than men ! Our knowledge is our power, and God our strength, God, whose almighty will created thee, And me, and all that hath the breath of life. He is our strength ; - for in His name 1 speak, -And when I tell thee that thou shalt not shed The life of man in bloody sacrifice, It is His holy bidding which I speak : And if thou wilt not listen and obey, When I shall meet thee in the battle-field, It is II is holy cause for which I fight, And 1 shall have His power to vanquish thee !

And thinkest thou our Gods are feeble ? cried The King of Aztlan; thinkest thou they lack Power to defend their altars, and to keep The kingdom which they gave us strength to win? The Gods of thirty nations have opposed Their irresistible might, and they lie now Conquer'd, and eaged, and fetter'd at their feet. That we who serve them are no coward race, Let prove the ample realm we won in arms : -And 1 their leader am not of the sons Of the feeble ! As he spake, he reached a mace, The trunk and knotted root of some young tree, Such as old Albion and his monster-brood From the oak-forest for their weapons pluck'd, When father Brute and Corineus set foot On the White Island first. Lo this, quoth he, My club! and he threw back his robe; and this The arm that wields it ! - 'Twas my father's once : Erillyab's husband, King Tepollomi, He felt its weight .- Did I not show thee him ? He lights me at my evening banquet. There, In very deed, the dead Tepollomi Stood up against the wall, by devilish art Preserv'd; and from his black and shrivell'd hand The steady lamp hung down.

My spirit rose At that abomination; I exclaim'd, Thou art of noble nature, and full fain Would I in friendship plight my hand with thine; But till that body in the grave be laid, Till thy polluted altars be made pure, There is no peace between us. May my God, Who, though thou knew'st him not, is also thine, And after death will be thy dreadful Judge,

May it please II in to visit thee, and shed His merey on thy soul ! — But if thy heart Be harden'd to the proof, come when thou wilt ! I know thy power, and thou shalt then know mine.

VII.

THE BATTLE.

Now, then, to meet the war! Erillyab's call Roused all her people to revenge their wrongs; And at Lineoya's voice, the mountain tribes Arose and broke their bondage. I, meantime, Took counsel with Cadwallon and his sire, And told them of the numbers we must meet, And what advantage from the mountain-straits I thought, as in the Saxon wars, to win. Thou saw'st their weapons then, Cadwallon said; Are they like these rude works of ignorance, Bone-beaded shafts, and spears of wood, and shields

Strong only for such strife?

We had to cope With wiser enemies, and abler arm'd. What for the sword they wielded was a staff Set thick with stones athwart; you would have deem'd The uncouth shape was cumbrous ; but a hand Expert, and practised to its use, could drive The sharpen'd flints with deadly impulse down. Their mail, if mail it may be eall'd, was woven Of vegetable down, like finest flax, Bleach'd to the whiteness of the new-fallen snow, To every bend and motion flexible, Light as a warrior's summer-garb in peace; Yet in that lightest, softest habergeon, Harmless the sharp stone arrow-head would hang. Others, of higher office, were array'd In feathery breastplates of more gorgeous hue Than the gay plumage of the mountain cock, Or pheasant's glittering pride. But what were these,

Or what the thin gold hauberk, when opposed To arms like ours in battle? What the mail Of wood fire-harden'd, or the wooden helm, Against the iron arrows of the Sonth, Against our northern spears, or hattle-axe, Or good sword, wielded by a British hand?

Then, quoth Cadwallon, at the wooden helm, Of these weak arms the weakest, let the sword Hew, and the spear be thrust. The mountaineers. So long inured to erouch beneath their yoke, We will not trust in battle; from the heights They with their arrows may annoy the foe; And when our closer strife has won the fray, Then let them loose for havoek.

O my son, Exclaimed the blind old man, thou counsellest ill' Blood will have blood, revenge beget revenge, Evil must come of evil. We shall win, Certes, a cheap and easy victory In the first field; their arrows from our arms Will fall, and on the hauberk and the helm The flint-edge blunt and break; while through their limbs, Naked, or vainly fenced, the griding steel Shall shear its mortal way. But what are we Against a nation ? Other hosts will rise In endless warfare, with perpetual fights Dwindling our all-too-few ; or multitudes Will wear and weary us, till we sink subdued By the very toil of conquest. Ye are strong; But he who puts his trust in mortal strength, Leans on a broken reed. First prove your power; Be in the battle terrible, but spare The fallen, and follow not the flying foe: Then may ye win a nobler victory, So dealing with the captives as to fill Their hearts with wonder, gratitude, and awe, That love shall mingle with their fear, and fear 'Stablish the love, else wavering. Let them see, That as more pure and gentle is your faith, Yourselves are gentler, purer. Ye shall be As gods among them, if ye thus obey God's precepts.

Soon the monntain tribes, in arms, Rose at Lincoya's call; a numerous bost, More than in numbers, in the memory Of long oppression, and revengeful hope, A formidable foe. 1 station'd them Where, at the entrance of the rocky straits, Sceure themselves, their arrows might command The coming army. On the plain below We took our stand, between the mountain-base And the green margin of the waters. Soon Their long array came on. Oh, what a pomp, And pride, and pageantry of war was there ! Not half so gaudied, for their May-day mirth, All wreathed and ribanded, our youths and maids, As these stern Aztecas in war attire ! The golden glitterance, and the feather mail, More gay than glittering gold; and round the helm

A coronal of high, upstanding plumes, Green as the spring grass in a sunny shower; Or scarlet bright, as in the wintry wood The cluster'd holly; or of purple tint, — Whereto shall that be liken'd? to what gem Indiadem'd, — what flower, — what insect's wing? With war-songs and wild music they came on; We, the while kneeling, raised with one accord The hymn of supplication.

Front to front, And now the embattled armies stood : a band Of priests, all sable-garmented, advanced; They piled a heap of sedge before our host, And warn'd us, — Sons of Ocean! from the land Of Aztlan, while ye may, depart in peace! Before the fire shall be extinguish'd, hence! Or, even as yon dry sedge amid the flame, So ye shall be consumed. — The arid heap They kindled, and the rapid flame ran up, And blazed, and died away. Then from his bow, With steady hand, their chosen areher loosed The Arrow of the Omen. To its mark The shaft of divination fled; it smote Cadwallon's plated breast; the brittle point Rebounded. He, contemptuous of their faith, Stoop'd for the shaft, and while with zealous speed To the rescue they rushed onward, snapping it Asunder, toss'd the fragments back in scorn.

Fierce was their onset; never in the field Encounter'd I with braver enemies. Nor marvel ye, nor think it to their shame, If soon they stagger'd, and gave way, and fied, So many from so few ; they saw their darts Recoil, their lances shiver, and their swords Fall ineffectual, blunted with the blow. Think ye no shame of Aztlan that they fled, When the bowmen of Deheubarth plied so well Their shafts with fatal aim ; through the thin gold, Or feather-mail, while Gwyneth's deep-driven spears Pierced to the bone and vitals; when they saw The falchion, flashing late so lightning-like, Quench'd in their own life-blood. Our mountaineers Shower'd from the heights, meantime, an arrowy storm, Themselves secure ; and we who bore the brunt Of battle, iron men, impassable, Stood in our strength unbroken. Marvel not If then the brave felt fear, already impress'd That day by ominous thonghts to fear akin ; For so it chanced, high Heaven ordaining so, The King, who should have led his people forth, At the army-head, as they began their march, Was with sore sickness stricken ; and the stroke Came like the act and arm of very God, So suddenly, and in that point of time.

A gallant man was he, who, in his stead, That day commanded Aztlan; his long hair, Tufted with many a cotton lock, proclaim'd Of princely prowess many a feat achieved In many a field of fame. Oft had he led The Aztecas, with happy fortune, forth ; Yet could not now Yuhidthiton inspire His host with hope : he, not the less, that day, True to his old renown, and in the hour Of rout and ruin, with collected mind, Sonnded his signals shrill, and in the voice Of loud reproach, and anger, and brave shame, Call'd on the people. - But when nought avail'd Seizing the standard from the timid hand Which held it in dismay, alone he turn'd, For honorable death resolved, and praise That would not die. Thereat the braver chiefs Rallied : anew their signals rung around ; And Aztlan, seeing how we spared her flight, Took heart, and roll'd the tide of battle back. But when Cadwallon from the chieftain's grasp llad cut the standard-staff away, and stunn'd And stretch'd him at his merey on the field ; Then fled the enemy in utter rout, Broken and quell'd at heart. One chief alone Bestrode the body of Yuhidthiton ; Bareheaded did young Malinal bestride His brother's body, wiping from his brow, With the shield-hand, the blinding blood away, And dealing franticly, with broken sword, Obstinate wrath, the last resisting foe. Him, in his own despite, we seized and saved.

Then, in the moment of our victory, We purified our hands from blood, and knelt, And pour'd to Heaven the grateful prayer of praise, And raised the choral psalm. Triumphant thus To the hills we went our way; the mountaineers With joy, and dissonant song, and antie dance; The captives sullenly, deeming that they went To meet the certain death of sacrifice, Yet stern and undismay'd. We bade them know Ours was a law of mercy and of love ; We heal'd their wounds, and set the prisoners free. Bear ye, quoth I, my bidding to your King; Say to him, Did the Stranger speak to thee The words of truth, and hath he proved his power? Thus saith the Lord of Ocean, in the name Of God, Almighty, Universal God, Thy Judge and mine, whose battles I have fought, Whose bidding I obey, whose will I speak; Sked thou no more in impious sacrifice The life of man; restore unto the grave The dead Tepollomi ; set this people free, And peace shall be between us.

On the morrow

Came messengers from Aztlan, in reply. Coanocotzin with sore malady Hath, by the Gods, been stricken: will the Lord Of Ocean visit his sick hed? — He told Of wrath, and as he said, the vengeance came: Let him bring healing now, and 'stablish peace.

VIII.

THE PEACE.

AGAIN, and now with better hope, I sought The city of the King: there went with me lolo, old Iolo, he who knows The virtue of all herbs of mount, or vale, Or greenwood shade, or quiet brooklet's bed; Whatever lore of science, or of song, Sages and Bards of old have handed down. Aztlan that day pour'd forth her swarming sons, To wait my coming. Will he ask his God To stay the hand of anger? was the cry, The general cry, - and will he save the King? Coanocotzin too had nursed that thought, And the strong hope upheld him : he put forth Ilis hand, and raised a quick and anxious eye, ls it not peace and mercy? - thou art come To pardon and to save !

I answer'd him — That power, O King of Aztlan, is not mine ! Such help as human cunning can bestow, Such human help I bring; but health and life Are in the hand of God, who at his will Gives or withdraws; and what he wills is best. Then old Iolo took his arm, and felt The symptom, and he bade him have good hope, For life was strong within him. So it proved; The drugs of subtle virtue did their work; They quell'd the venom of the malady, And from the frame expell'd it, — that a sleep Fell on the King, a sweet and natural sleep, And from its healing he awoke refresh'd, Though weak, and joyful as a man who felt The peril past away.

Ere long we spake Of concord, and how best to knit the bonds Of lasting friendship. When we won this land, Coanocotzin said, these fertile vales Were not, as now, with fruitful groves embower'd, Nor rich with towns and populous villages, Abounding, as thou seest, with life and joy: Our fathers found bleak heath, and desert moor, Wild woodland, and savannahs wide and waste, Rude country of rude dwellers. From our arms They to the mountain fastnesses retired, And long with obstinate and harassing war Provoked us, hoping not for victory, Yet mad for vengeance : till Tepollomi Fell by my father's hand; and with their King, The strength and flower of all their youth cut off, All in one desolating day, they took The yoke upon their necks. What wouldest thou That to these Hoamen 1 should now concede? Lord of the Ocean, speak !

Let them be free ! Quoth I. I come not from my native isle To wage the war of conquest, and east out Your people from the land which time and toil Have rightly made their own. The land is wide ; There is enough for all. So they be freed From that accursed tribute, and ye shed The life of man no more in sacrifice, In the most holy name of God I say, Let there be peace between us !

Thou hast won

Their liberty, the King replied ; henceforth, Free as they are, if they provoke the war, Reluctantly will Aztlan raise her arm. Be thou the peace-preserver. To what else Thou say'st, instructed by calamity, I lend a humble ear; but to destroy The worship of my fathers, or abate Or change one point, lies not within reach And scope of kingly power. Speak thou hereon With those whom we hold holy, with the sons Of the Temple, they who commune with the Gods; A we them, for they awe me. So we resolved That when the bones of King Tepollomi Had had their funeral honors, they and I Should by the green-lake side, before the King, And in the presence of the people, hold A solemn talk.

Then to the mountain-huts, The bearer of good tidings, I return'd, Leading the honorable train who bore The relies of the King; not parch'd and black, As I had seen the unnatural corpse stand up, In ghastly mockery of the attitude And act of life; — his bones had now been blanch'd With decent reverence. Soon the mountaineers Saw the white deer-skin shroud; the rumor spread;

They gather'd round, and followed in our train.

Before Erillyab's hut the bearers laid Their burden down. She, calm of countenance, And with dry eye, albeit her hand the while Shook like an aguish limb, unrolled the shroud. The multitude stood gazing silently, The young and old alike all awed and hush'd Under the holy feeling, -and the hnsh Was awful; that hnge multitude so still, That we could hear distinct the mountain-stream Roll down its rocky channel far away ; And this was all; sole ceremony this, The sight of death and silence, - till at length, In the ready grave his bones were laid to rest. 'Twas in her hnt and home, yea, underneath The marriage bed, the bed of widowhood, Her husband's grave was dug; on softest fur The bones were laid, with fur were covered o'er, Then heap'd with bark and boughs, and, last of all, Earth was to earth trod down.

And now the day Appointed for our talk of peace was come. On the green margin of the lake we met, Elders, and Priests, and Chiefs ; the multitude Around the Circle of the Council stood. Then, in the midst, Coanocotzin rose, And thus the King began : Pabas, and Chiefs Of Aztlan, hither ye are come to learn The law of peace. The Lord of Ocean saith, The Tribes whom he hath gathered underneath The wings of his protection, shall be free; And in the name of his great God he saith, That ye shall never shed in sacrifice The blood of man. Are ye content? that so We may together here, in happy hour, Bury the sword.

Hereat a Paba rose, And answer'd for his brethreu :— He hath won The Hoamen's freedom, that their blood no more Shall on our altars flow; for this the Lord Of Ocean fought, and Aztlan yielded it In battle. But if we forego the rites Of our forefathers, if we wrong the Gods, Who give us timely sun and timely showers, Their wrath will be upon ns; they will shut Their ears to prayer, and turn away the eyes Which watch for our well-doing, and withhold The hands dispensing our prosperity.

Cynetha then arose, between his son And me supported, rose the blind old man. Ye wrong us, men of Aztlan, if ye deem We bid ye wrong the Gods; accurs'd were he Who would obey such bidding, — more accurs'd The wretch who should enjoin impiety. It is the will of God which we make known, Your God and ours. Know ye not Him who laid The deep foundations of the earth, and built The arch of heaven, and kindled yonder sun, And breathed into the woods, and waves, and sky, The power of life?

We know Ilim, they replied, The great For-Ever One, the God of Gods, Ipalnemoani, He by whom we live ! And we too, quoth Ayayaca, we know And worship the Great Spirit, who in clouds

And storms, in monntain caves, and by the fall Of waters, in the woodland solitude, And in the night and silence of the sky, Doth make his being felt. We also know, And fear, and worship the Beloved One.

Our God, replied Cynetha, is the same, The Universal Father. He to the first Made his will known; but when men multiplied, The Evil Spirits darken'd them, and sin And misery came into the world, and men Forsook the way of truth, and gave to stocks And stones the incommunicable name, Yet with one chosen, one peculiar Race, The knowledge of their Father and their God Remain'd, from sire to son transmitted down. While the bewildered Nations of the earth Wander'd in fogs, and were in darkness lost, The light abode with them; and when at times They sinn'd, and went astray, the Lord hath put A voice into the mouths of holy men, Raising up witnesses unto himself, That so the saving knowledge of his name Might never fail; nor the glad promise, given To our first parent, that at length his sons, From error, sin, and wretchedness redeem'd, Should form one happy family of love. Nor ever hath that light, howe'er bedimm'd, Wholly been guenched; still in the heart of mau A feeling and an instinct it exists, His very nature's stamp and privilege, Yea, of his life the life. I tell ye not, O Aztecas! of things unknown before; 1 do but waken up a living sense That sleeps within ye ! Do ye love the Gods Who call for blood? Doth the poor sacrifice Go with a willing step, to lay his life Upon their altars? - Good must come of good, Evil of evil; if the fruit be death, The poison springeth from the sap and root, And the whole tree is deadly; if the rites Be evil, they who claim them are not good, Not to be worshipp'd then; for to obey The cyil will is evil. Aztecas ! From the For-Ever, the Beloved One, The Universal, Only God, 1 speak, Your God and mine, our Father and our Judge. Hear ye his law, - hear ye the perfect law Of love, "Do ye to others, as ye would That they should do to you ! " He bids us meet To praise his name, in thankfulness and joy; He bids us, in our sorrow, pray to him, The Comforter; love him, for he is good ; Fear him, for he is just; obey his will, For who can bear his anger?

They stood with open mouth, and motionless sight, Watching his countenance, as though the voice Were of a God; for sure it seem'd that less Than inspiration could not have infused That eloquent passion in a blind man's face. And when he ceased, all eyes at once were turn'd Upon the Pabas, waiting their reply, If that to that acknowledged argument Reply could be devised. But they themselves

While he spake,

Toward their chief and mouth-piece, the High Priest

Tezozomoc; he, too, was pale and mute, And when he gather'd up his strength to speak, Speech fail'd him, his lip falter'd, and his eye Fell utterly abash'd, and put to shame. But in the Chiefs, and in the multitude, And in the King of Aztlan, better thoughts Were working; for the Spirit of the Lord That day was moving in the heart of man. Coanocotzin rose : Pabas, and Chiefs, And men of Aztlan, ye have heard a talk Of peace and love, and there is no reply. Are ye content with what the Wise Man saith? And will ye worship God in that good way Which God himself ordains? If it be so, Together here will we in happy hour Bury the sword.

Tezozomoc replied, This thing is new, and in the land till now Unheard : --- what marvel, therefore, if we find No ready answer? Let our Lord the King Do that which seemeth best.

Ynhidthiton, Chief of the Chiefs of Aztlan, next arose. Of all her numerous sons, could Aztlan boast No mightier arm in battle, nor whose voice To more attentive silence hush'd the hall Of council. When the Wise Man spake, quoth he, I ask'd of mine own heart if it were so, And, as he said, the living instinct there Answer'd, and own'd the truth. In happy hour, O King of Aztlan, did the Ocean Lord Through the great waters hither wend his way; For sure he is the friend of God and man.

With that an uproar of assent arose From the whole people, a tumultuous shout Of universal joy and glad acclaim. But when Coanocotzin raised his hand, That he might speak, the clamor and the buzz Ceased, and the multitude, in tiptoe hope, Attent and still, await the final voice. Then said the Sovereign, Hear, O Aztecas, Your own united will ! From this day forth No life upon the altar shall be shed, No blood shall flow in sacrifice; the rites Shall all be pure, such as the blind Old Man, Whom God hath taught, will teach. This ye have will'd:

And therefore it shall be !

The King hath said ! Like thunder the collected voice replied : Let it be so!

Lord of the Ocean, then Pursued the King of Aztlan, we will now Lay tes war-weapon in the grave, and join In right-hand friendship. By our custom, blood Should sanctify and bind the solemn act; But by what oath and ceremony thou Shalt proffer, by the same will Aztlan swear. Nor oath, nor ceremony, I replied, O King, is needful. To his own good word The good and honorable man will act;

Stricken by the truth, were silent; and they look'd | Oaths will not curb the wicked. Here we stand In the broad day-light; the For-Ever one, The Every-Where beholds us. In his sight We join our hands in peace : if e'er again Should these right hands be raised in enmity, Upon the offender will his judgment fall.

> The grave was dug; Coanocotzin laid His weapon in the earth; Erillyab's son, Young Amalahta, for the Hoamen, laid His hatchet there; and there I laid the sword.

Here let me end. What follow'd was the work Of peace, no theme for story; how we fix'd Our sojourn in the hills, and sow'd our fields, And, day by day, saw all things prospering. Thenee have I come, Goervyl, to announce The tidings of my happy enterprise; There 1 return, to take thee to our home. I love my native land; with as true love As ever yet did warm a British heart, Love I the green fields of the beautiful Isle, My father's heritage ! But far away, Where nature's booner hand has bless'd the earth, My lot hath been assign'd; beyond the seas Madoc hath found his home; beyond the seas A country for his children hath he chosen, A land wherein their portion may be peace

IX.

EMMA.

BUT while Aberfraw echoed to the sounds Of merriment and music, Madoc's heart Mourn'd for his brethren. Therefore, when no eas Was nigh, he sought the King, and said to him, To-morrow, for Mathraval I set forth; Longer I must not linger here, to pass The easy hours in feast and revelry, Forgetful of my people far away. I go to tell the tidings of success, And seek new comrades. What if it should chance That, for this enterprise, our brethren, Foregoing all their hopes and fortunes here, Would join my banner? - Let me send abroad Their summons, O my brother! so, secure, You may forgive the past, and once again Will peace and concord bless our father's house.

Hereafter will be time enow for this, The King replied; thy easy nature sees not, How, if the traitors for thy banner send Their bidding round, in open war against me Their own would soon be spread. I charge thee, Madoe, Neither to see nor aid these fugitives, The shame of Owen's blood.

Sullen he spake, And turn'd away; nor further commune now Did Madoc seek, nor had he more endured; For bitter thoughts were rising in his heart, And anguish, kindling anger. In such mod

Ile to his sister's chamber took his way. She sat with Emma, with the gentle Queen, For Emma had already learnt to love The gentle maid. Goervyl saw what thoughts Troubled her brother's brow. Madoe, she cried, Thou hast been with the King, been rashly plead-For Ririd, and for Rodri !— He replied, [ing I did but ask him little, — did but say, Belike our brethren would go forth with me, To voluntary exile; then, methought, His fear and jealousy might well have ceased, And all be safe.

And did the King refuse? Quoth Emma; I will plead for them, quoth she, With dutiful warmth and zeal, will plead for them; And surely David will not say me nay.

O sister ! cried Goervyl, tempt him not ! Sister, you know him not ! Alas, to touch That perilous theme is, even in Madoe here, A perilous folly. Sister, tempt him not ! You do not know the King !

But then a fea Fled to the eheek of Emma, and her eye, Quickening with wonder, turn'd toward the Prince, As if expecting that his manly mind Would mould Goervyl's meaning to a shape Less fearful, would interpret and amend The words she hoped she did not hear aright. Emma was young ; she was a saerifice To that cold king-craft, which, in marriage-yows Linking two hearts, unknowing each of each, Perverts the ordinance of God, and makes The holiest tie a mockery and a curse. Her eye was patient, and she spake in tones So sweet, and of so pensive gentleness, That the heart felt them. Madoe ! she exclaimed, Why dost thou hate the Saxons? O my brother, If I have heard aright, the hour will come When the Plantagenet shall wish herself Among her nobler, happier countrymen, From these unnatural enmities escaped, [ven ! And from the vengeance they must call from Hea-

Shame then suffused the Prince's countenance. Mindful how, drunk in anger, he had given His hatred loose. My sister Queen, quoth he, Marvel not you that with my mother's milk I suck'd that hatred in. Have they not been The scourge and the devouring sword of God, The curse and pestilence which he hath sent To root us from the land? Alas, our erimes Have drawn this dolorous visitation down ! Our sun hath long been westering; and the night, And darkness, and extinction are at hand. We are a fallen people ! - From ourselves The desolation and the ruin come : In our own vitals doth the poison work -The House that is divided in itself, How should it stand?-A blessing on you, Lady ! But in this wretched family the strife Is rooted all too deep; it is an old And cankered wound, - an eating, killing sore, For which there is no healing. - If the King Should ever speak his fears, (and sure to you

All his most inward thoughts he will make known,) Counsel him then to let his brethren share My enterprise, to send them forth with me To everlasting exile. — She hath told you Too hardly of the King; I know him well; He hath a stormy nature; and what germs Of virtue would have budded in his heart,

Cold winds have check'd, and blighting seasons nipp'd,

Yet in his heart they live. — A blessing on you, That you may see their blossom and their fruit !

x.

MATHRAVAL.

Now for Mathraval went Prince Madoe forth: O'er Menai's ebbing tide, up mountain-paths, Beside gray mountain-stream, and lonely lake, And through old Snowdon's forest-solitude, He held right on his solitary way. Nor paused he in that rocky vale, where oft Up the familiar path, with gladder pace, His steed had hastened to the well-known door, --That valley, o'er whose erags, and sprinkled trees, And winding stream, so oft his eye had loved To linger, gazing, as the eve grew dim, From Dolwyddelan's Tower; - alas! from thenee, As from his brother's monument, he turn'd A loathing eye, and through the rocky vale Sped on. From morn till noon, from noon till eve, He travelled on his way; and when at morn Again the Ocean Chief hestrode his steed, The heights of Snowdon on his backward glance Hung like a cloud in heaven. O'er heath, and hill, And barren height he rode ; and darker now, In loftier majesty, thy mountain-seat, Star-loving Idris, rose. Nor turn'd he now Beside Kregennan, where his infant feet Had trod Ednywain's hall; nor loitered he In the green vales of Powys, till he came Where Warnway rolls its waters underneath Ancient Mathraval's venerable walls, Cyveilice's princely and paternal seat

But Madoe sprung not forward now to gree The chief he loved, for from Cyveilioe's hall The voice of harp and song commingled came; It was that day the feast of victory there; Around the Chieftain's board the warriors sat; The sword, and shield, and helmet, on the wall And round the pillars, were in peace hung up; And, as the flashes of the central fire At fits arose, a dance of wavy light [late Play'd o'er the reddening steel. The Chiefs, who So well had wielded in the work of war Those weapons, sat around the board, to quaff The beverage of the hrave, and hear their fame. Mathraval's Lord, the Poet and the Prince, Cyveilioe, stood before them, - in his pride; His hands were on the harp, his eyes were closed, His head, as if in reverence to receive The inspiration, bent; anon, he raised

His glowing countenance and brighter eye, And swept with passionate hand the ringing harp.

Fill high the Hirlas Horn ! to Grufydd bear Its frothy beverage, — from his erimson lance The invader fled; — fill high the gold-tipp'd Horn ! Heard ye in Maelor the step of war — The hastening shout — the onset? — Did ye hear The clash and clang of arms — the battle-din, Loud as the roar of Ocean, when the winds At midnight are abroad? — the yell of wounds — The rage — the agony? — Give to him the Horn Whose spear was broken, and whose buckler pierced With many a shaft, yet not the less he fought And conquered; — therefore let Ednyved share The generous draught; give him the long, blue Horn !

Pour out again, and fill again the spoil Of the wild bull, with silver wrought of yore; And bear the golden lip to Tudyr's hand, Eagle of battle ! For Moreiddig fill The honorable Hirlas !— Where are They? Where are the noble Brethren? Wolves of war, They kept their border well, they did their part, Their fame is full, their lot is praise and song — A mournful song to me, a song of woe !— Brave Brethren ! for their honor brim the cup, Which they shall quaff no more.

We drove away

The strangers from our land; profuse of life, Our warriors rush'd to battle, and the Sun Saw from his noontide fields their manly strife. Pour thou the flowing mead! Cup-bearer, fill The Hirlas! for hadst thou beheld the day Of Llidom, thou hadst known how well the Chiefs Deserve this honor now. Cyveilioe's shield Were they in danger, when the Invader came; Be praise and liberty their lot on earth, And joy be theirs in heaven !

Here ceased the song; Then from the threshold on the rush-strown floor Madoc advanced. Cyveilioc's eye was now To present forms awake, but even as still He felt his harp-chords throb with dying sounds ; The heat, and stir, and passion had not yet Subsided in his soul. Again he struck The loud-toned harp - Pour from the silver vase, And brinn the honorable Horn, and bear The draught of joy to Madoc, - he who first Explored the desert ways of Ocean, first Through the wide waste of sea and sky held on Undaunted, till upon another World The Lord and Conqueror of the Elements, He set his foot triumphant! Fill for him The Hirlas! fill the honorable Horn ! This for Mathraval is a happy hour, When Madoc, her hereditary guest, Appears within her honor'd walls again, Madoe, the British Prince, the Ocean Lord, Who never for injustice rear'd his arm; Whose presence fills the heart of every foe With fear, the heart of every friend with joy ; Give him the Hirlas Horn; fill, till the draught Of joy shall quiver o'er the golden brim ! In happy hour the hero hath return'd!

In happy hour the friend, the brother treads Cyveilioc's floor !

He sprung to greet his guest; The cordial grasp of fellowship was given ; So in Mathraval there was double joy On that illustrious day; they gave their guest The seat of honor, and they fill'd for him The Hirlas Horn. Cyveilioc and his Chiefs, All eagerly, with wonder-waiting eyes, Look to the Wanderer of the Water's tale. Nor mean the joy which kindled Madoc's brow, When as he told of daring enterprise Crown'd with deserved success. Intent they heard Of all the blessings of that happier clime ; And when the adventurer spake of soon return, Each on the other gazed, as if to say, Methinks it were a goodly lot to dwell In that fair land in peace.

Then said the Prince

Of Powys, Madoe, at a happy time Thou hast toward Mathraval bent thy way; For on the morrow, in the eye of light, Our bards will hold their congress. Seekest thou Comrades to share success? proclaim abroad Thine invitation there, and it will spread Far as our fathers' ancient tongue is known.

Thus at Mathraval went the Hirlas round; A happy day was that! Of other years. They talk'd, of common toils, and fields of war, Where they fought side by side; of Corwen's scene Of glory, and of comrades now no more — Themes of delight, and grief which brought its joy. Thus they beguiled the pleasant hours, while night Waned fast away; then late they laid them down, Each on his bed of rushes, stretch'd around The central fire.

The Sun was newly risen When Madoc join'd his host, no longer now Clad, as the conquering chief of Maelor, In princely arms, but in his nobler robe, The sky-blue mantle of the Bard, arrayed. So for the place of meeting they set forth; And now they reached Melangell's lonely church Amid a grove of evergreens it stood, A garden and a grove, where every grave Was deck'd with flowers, or with unfading plants O'ergrown, sad rue, and funeral rosemary. Here Madoc paused. The morn is young, quoth he ; A little while to old remembrance given Will not belate us. - Many a year hath fled, Cyveilioc, since you led me here, and told The legend of the Saint. Come!-be not loath! We will not loiter long. - So soon to mount The bark, which will forever bear me hence, I would not willingly pass by one spot Which thus recalls the thought of other times, Without a pilgrim's visit.

Thus he spake, And drew Cyveilioc through the church-yard porch, To the rude image of Saint Monacel. Dost thou remember, Owen, said the Prince, When first I was thy guest in early youth, That once, as we had wandered here at eve, You told, how here a port and hunted hare Ran to the Virgin's feet, and look'd to her For life? — I thought, when listening to the tale, She had a merciful heart, and that her face Must with a saintly gentleness have beam'd, When beasts could read its virtue. Here we sat Upon the jutting root of this old yeugh — Dear friend! so pleasant didst thou make those days, That in my heart, long as my heart shall beat,

That in my heart, long as my heart shall beat, Minutest recollections still will live, Still be the source of joy.

As Madoc spake, Ilis glancing eye fell on a monument, Around whose base the rosemary droop'd down, As yet not rooted well. Sculptured above, A warrior lay; the shield was on his arm; Madoc approach'd, and saw the blazonry, — A sudden chill ran through him, as he read, Here Yorwerth lies — it was his brother's grave.

Cyveilioc took him by the hand: For this, Madoc, was I so loath to enter here! He sought the sanctuary, but close upon him The murderers follow'd, and by yonder copse The stroke of dcath was given. All I could Was done; ---I saw him here consign'd to rest, Daily due masses for his soul are sung, And duly hath his grave been deck'd with flowers.

So saying, from the place of death he led The silent Prince. But lately, he pursued, Llewelyn was my guest, thy favorite boy. For thy sake and his own, it was my hope That at Mathraval he would make his home; He had not needed then a father's love. But he, I know not on what enterprise, Was brooding ever; and those secret thoughts Drew him away. God prosper the brave boy ! It were a happy day for this poor land If e'er Llewelyn mount his rightful throne.

X1.

THE GORSEDD.

THE place of meeting was a high hill-top, Nor bower'd with trees nor broken by the plough, Remote from human dwellings and the stir Of human life, and open to the breath And to the eye of Heaven. In days of old, There had the circling stones been planted; there, From earliest ages, the primeval lore, [down. Through Bard to Bard with reverence handed They whom to wonder, or the love of song, Or reverence of their fathers' ancient rites, Drew thither, stood without the ring of stones. Cyveilioc entered to the initiate Bards, Himself, albeit his hands were stained with war, Initiate; for the Order, in the lapse Of years and in their nation's long decline From the first rigor of their purity Somewhat had fallen. The Masters of the Song

Were clad in azure robes, for in that hue Deduced from Heaven, which o'er a sinful world Spread its eternal canopy serene, Meet emblem did the ancient Sages see Of unity, and peace, and spotless truth.

Within the stones of Federation there, On the green turf, and under the blue sky, A noble band, the Bards of Britain stood, Their heads in reverence bare, and bare of foot. A deathless brotherhood! Cyveilioc there, Lord of the Hirlas; Llyware there was seen, And old Cynddelow, to whose lofty song, So many a time amid his father's court Resigning up his soul, had Madoe given The flow of feeling loose. But Madoc's heart Was full; old feelings and remembrances, And thoughts from which was no escape, arose: He was not there to whose sweet lay, so oft, With all a brother's fond delight, he loved To listen, - Hoel was not there ! - the hand That once so well, amid the triple chords, Moved in the rapid maze of harmony, It had no motion now; the lips were dumb Which knew all tones of passion ; and that heart, That warm, ebullient heart, was cold and still, Upon its bed of elay. He look'd around, And there was no familiar countenance, None but Cynddelow's face, which he had learnt In childhood; and old age hath set its mark, Making unsightly alteration there. Another generation had sprung up, And made him feel how fast the days of man Flow by, how soon their number is told out. He knew not then, that Llyware's lay should give His future fame; his spirit, on the past Brooding, beheld with no forefeeling joy The rising sons of song, who there essay'd Their eaglet flight. But there, among the youth In the green vesture of their earliest rank, Or with the aspirants clad in motley garb, Young Benvras stood ; and, one whose favored race Heaven with the hereditary power had blest, The old Gowalehmai's not degenerate child; And there another Einion; gifted youths, And heirs of immortality on earth, Whose after-strains, through many a distant age, Cambria shall boast, and love the songs that tell The fame of Owen's house.

There, in the eye Of light, and in the face of day, the rites Began. Upon the Stone of Covenant First, the sheathed sword was laid; the Master then Upraised his voice, and cried, Let them who seek The high degree and sacred privilege Of Bardic science, and of Cimbrie lore, Here to the Bards of Britain make their claim! Thus having said, the Master bade the youths Approach the place of peace, and merit there The Bard's most honorable name. With that, Heris and transmittors of the ancient light, The youths advanced; they heard the Cimbric lore, From earliest days preserved; they struck their harps,

And each in due succession raised the song.

Last of the aspirants, as of greener years, Young Caradoe advanced; his lip as yet Scarce darken'd with its down, his flaxen loeks Wreathed in contracting ringlets waving low; Bright were his large blue eyes, and kindled now With that same passion that inflamed his check; Yet in his cheek there was the sickliness Which thought and feeling leave, wearing away The hue of youth. Inclining on his harp, Ile, while his comrades in probation song Approved their elaim, stood hearkening, as it And yet like unintelligible sounds [seem'd, He heard the symphony and voice attuned; Even in such feelings as, all undefined, Come with the flow of waters to the soul, Or with the motions of the moonlight sky. But when his bidding came, he, at the call Arising from that dreamy mood, advanced, Threw back his mantle, and began the lay.

Where are the sons of Gavran? where his tribe The faithful? Following their beloved Chief, They the Green Islands of the Ocean sought; Nor human tongue hath told, nor human ear, Since from the silver shores they went their way, Hath heard their fortunes. In his crystal Ark, Whither sail'd Merlin with his band of Bards, Old Merlin, master of the mystic lore? Belike his erystal Ark, instinct with life, Obedient to the mighty Master, reach'd The land of the Departed; there, belike, They in the clime of immortality, Themselves immortal, drink the gales of bliss, Which o'er Flathinnis breathe eternal spring, Blending whatever odors make the gale Of evening sweet, whatever melody [halls, Charms the wood-traveller. In their high-roof'd There, with the Chiefs of other days, feel they The mingled joy pervade them? - Or beneath The mid-sea waters, did that crystal Ark Down to the secret depths of Ocean plunge Its fated crew? Dwell they in coral bowers With Mermaid loves, teaching their paramours The songs that stir the sea, or make the winds Hush, and the waves be still? In fields of joy Have they their home, where central fires maintain Perpetual summer, and an emerald light Pervades the green translucent element?

Twice have the sons of Britain left her shores, As the fledged eaglets quit their native nest; Twice over ocean have her fearless sons Forever sail'd away. Again they launch Their vessels to the deep. — Who mounts the bark? The son of Owen, the beloved Prince, Who never for injustice rear'd his arm. Respect his enterprise, ye Ocean Waves! Ye Winds of Heaven, waft Madoc on his way! The Waves of Ocean, and the Winds of Heaven, Became his ministers, and Madoc found The World he sought.

Who seeks the better land? Who mounts the vessel for a world of peace? He who hath felt the throb of pride, to hear Our old illustrious annals; who was taught To lisp the fame of Arthur, to revere Great Caratach's unconquer'd soul, and call That gallant chief his countryman, who led The wrath of Britain from her chalky shores To drive the Roman robber. He who loves His country, and who feels his country's shame; Whose bones amid a land of servitude Could never rest in peace; who, if he saw His children slaves, would feel a pang in heaven, ---He mounts the bark, to seek for liberty.

Who seeks the better land? The wretched one, Whose joys are blasted all, whose heart is sick, Who hath no hope, to whom all change is gain, To whom remember'd pleasures strike a pang That only guilt should know, — he mounts the bark The Bard will mount the bark of banishment; The harp of Cambria shall in other lands Remind the Cambrian of his fathers' fame: — The Bard will seek the land of liberty, The World of peace — O Prince, receive the Bard !

He ceased the song. His cheek, now fever flush'd,

Was turn'd to Madoe, and his asking eye Linger'd on him in hope; nor linger'd long The look expectant; forward sprung the Prince, And gave to Caradoc the right-hand pledge, And for the comrade of his enterprise, With joyful welcome, hail'd the joyful Bard.

Nor needed now the Searcher of the Sea Announce his enterprise, by Caradoc In song announced so well; from man to man The busy murmur spread, while from the Stone Of Covenant the sword was taken up, And from the Circle of the Ceremony The bards went forth, their meeting now fulfill'd. The multitude, unheeding all beside, Of Madoc and his noble enterprise Held stirring converse on their homeward way, And spread abroad the tidings of a Land, Where Plenty dwelt with Liberty and Peace.

XII.

DINEVAWR.

So in the court of Powys pleasantly, With hawk and hound afield, and harp in hall, The days went by; till Madoe, for his heart Was with Cadwallon, and in early spring Must he set forth to join him over-sea, Took his constrain 'd farewell. To Dinevawr He bent his way, whence many a time with Rhys Had he gone forth to smite the Saxon foe. The Son of Owen greets his father's friend With reverential joy; nor did the Lord Of Dinevawr with cold or deaden'd heart Welcome the Prince he loved; though not with joy Unmingled now, nor the proud consciousness Which in the man of tried and approved worth Could bid an equal hail. Henry had seen The Lord of Dinevawr between his knees Vow homage; yea, the Lord of Dinevawr Had knelt in homage to that Saxon king, Who set a price upon his father's head, That Saxon, on whose soul his mother's blood Cried out for vengeance. Madoe saw the shame Which Rhys would fain have hidden, and, in grief For the degenerate land, rejoiced at heart That now another country was his home.

Musing on thoughts like these, did Madoe roam Alone along the Towy's winding shore. The beavers in its bank had hollow'd out Their social place of dwelling, and had damm'd The summer-current, with their perfect art Of instinct, erring not in means nor end. But as the floods of spring had broken down Their barrier, so its breaches unrepair'd Were left; and round the piles, which, deeper driven,

Still held their place, the eddying waters whirl'd. Now in those habitations desolate One sole survivor dwelt: him Madoe saw, Laboring alone, beside his hermit house; And in that mood of melaneholy thought, — For in his boyhood he had loved to wateh Their social work, and for he knew that man In bloody sport had well-nigh rooted out The poor community, — the ominous sight Became a grief and burden. Eve came on; The dry leaves rustled to the wind, and fell And floated on the stream; there was no voice Save of the mournful rooks, who overhead Wing'd their long line; for fragrance of sweet flowers,

Only the odor of the autumnal leaves; ----All sights and sounds of sadness - And the place To that despondent mood was ministrant; -Among the hills of Gwyneth, and its wilds, And mountain glens, perforce he cherish'd still The hope of mountain liberty; they braced And knit the heart and arm of hardihood ; -But here, in these green meads, by these low slopes And hanging groves, attemper'd to the scene, His spirit yielded. As he loiter'd on, There came toward him one in peasant garb, And call'd his name ; - he started at the sound, For he had heeded not the man's approach; And now that sudden and familiar voice Came on him, like a vision. So he stood Gazing, and knew him not in the dim light, Till he again cried, Madoc !- then he woke, And knew the voice of Ririd, and sprang on, And fell upon his neck, and wept for joy And sorrow.

O my brother ! Ririd cried, Long, very long it is since 1 have heard The voice of kindness ! — Let me go with thee ! 1 an a wanderer in my father's land, — Hoel he kill'd, and Yorwerth hath he slain ; Llewelyn hath not where to hide his head In his own kingdom; Rodri is in chains; — Let me go with thee, Madoe, to some land Where I may look upon the sun, nor dread The light that may betray me; where at night I may not, like a hunted beast, rouse up, If the leaves rustle over me.

The Lord Of Ocean struggled with his swelling heart. Let me go with thee? - but thou didst not doubt Thy brother? - Let thee go? - with what a joy, Ririd, would I collect the reinnant left, ---The wretched remnant now of Owen's house, And mount the bark of willing banishment, And leave the tyrant to his Saxon friends, And to his Saxon yoke !- 1 urged him thus, Curb'd down my angry spirit, and besought Only that I might bid our brethren come, And share my exile ; - and he spurn'd my prayer ! Thou hast a gentle pleader at his court; She may prevail; till then abide thou here; -But not in this, the garb of fear and guilt. Come thou to Dinevawr, -- assume thyself; --The good old Rhys will bid thee welcome there, And the great Palace, like a sanctuary, Is safe. If then Queen Emma's plea should fail, My timely bidding hence shall summon thee, When I shall spread the sail. - Nay, hast thou learnt Suspición? — Rhys is noble, and no deed Of treachery ever sullied his fair fame !

Madoe then led his brother to the hall Of Rhys. I bring to thee a supplicant, O King, he eried; thou wert my father's friend! And till our barks be ready in the spring, I know that here the persecuted son Of Owen will be safe.

A welcome guest⁺ The old warrior cried; by his good father's soul, He is a welcome guest at Dinevawr ! And rising as he spake, he pledged his hand In hospitality. -- How now! quoth he; This raiment ill beseems the princely son Of Owen ! - Ririd at his words was led Apart; they wash'd his feet; they gave to him Fine linen, as beseem'd his royal race, The tunic of soft texture woven well, The broider'd girdle, the broad mantle edged With fur and flowing low, the bonnet last, Form'd of some forest martin's costly spoils. The Lord of Dinevawr sat at the dine With Madoe, when he saw him, thus array'd, Returning to the hall. Ay! this is well! The noble Chief exclaim'd; 'tis as of yore, When in Aberfraw, at his father's board, We sat together, after we had won Peace and rejoicing with our own right hands, By Corwen, where, commix'd with Saxon blood, Along its rocky channel the dark Dee Roll'd darker waters. - Would that all his house Had, in their day of trouble, thought of me, And honor'd me like this! David respects Deheubarth's strength, nor would respect it less, When such protection leagued its cause with Heaven.

I had forgot his messenger! quoth he, Arising from the dice. Go, bid him here! He came this morning at an ill-starr'd hour,

To Madoe he pursued; my lazy grooms Had let the hounds play havock in my flock, And my old blood was chafed. I' faith, the King Hath chosen well his messenger : - he saw That, in such mood, I might have render'd him A hot and hasty answer, and hath waited, Perhaps to David's service and to mine, My better leisure.

Now the Messenger Enter'd the hall; Goagan of Powys-land, He of Caer-Einion was it, who was charged From Gwyneth to Deheubarth - a brave man, Of copious speech. He told the royal son Of Gryffidd, the descendant of the line Of Rhys-ab-Tudyr mawr, that he came there From David, son of Owen, of the stock Of kingly Cynan. I am sent, said he, With friendly greeting; and as I receive Welcome and honor, so, in David's name, Am I to thank the Lord of Dinevawr.

Tell on ! quoth Rhys, the purport and the cause Of this appeal.

Of late, some fugitives Came from the South to Mona, whom the King Received with generous welcome. Some there were Who blamed his royal goodness; for they said, These were the subjects of a rival Prince, Who, peradventure, would with no such bounty Cherish a northern suppliant. This they urged, I know not if from memory of old feuds, Better forgotten, or in envy. Moved Hereby, King David swore he would not rest Till he had put the question to the proof, Whether with liberal honor the lord Rhys Would greet his messenger; but none was found

Of all who had instill'd that evil doubt, Ready to bear the embassy: I heard it, And did my person tender, - for I knew

The nature of Lord Rhys of Dinevawr.

Well! quoth the Chief, Goagan of Powysland.

This honorable welcome that thou seekest, Wherein may it consist?

In giving me, Goagan of Powys-land replied, a horse Better than mine, to bear me home; a suit Of seemly raiment, and ten marks in coin, With raiment and two marks for him who leads My horse's bridle.

For his sake, said Rhys, Who sent thee, thou shalt have the noblest steed

In all my studs. - I double thee the marks,

And give the raiment threefold. More than this, -

Say thou to David, that the guests who sit At board with me, and drink of my own cup, Are Madoe and Lord Ririd. Tell the King, That thus it is Lord Rhys of Dinevawr Delighteth to do honor to the sons

Of Owen, of his old and honor'd friend.

XIII.

LLEWELYN.

FAREWELL, my brother, cried the Ocean Chief; A little while farewell! as through the gate Of Dinevawr he pass'd, to pass again That hospitable threshold never more. And thou too, O thou good old man, true friend Of Owen, and of Owen's house, farewell ! 'Twill not be told me, Rhys, when thy gray hairs Are to the grave gone down; but oftentimes In the distant world I shall remember thee, And think that, come thy summons when it may, Thou wilt not leave a braver man behind. Now God be with thee, Rhys!

The old Chief paused A moment ere he answer'd, as for pain ; Then shaking his hoar head, I never yet Gave thee this hand unwillingly before ! When for a guest I spread the board, my heart Will think on him, whom ever with most joy It leap'd to welcome : should I lift again The spear against the Saxon, - for old Rhys Hath that within him yet, that could uplift The Cimbric spear, - I then shall wish his aid, Who oft has conquer'd with me: when I kncel In prayer to Heaven, an old man's prayer shall beg A blessing on thee !

Madoe answer'd not, But press'd his hand in silence, then sprang up And spurr'd his courser on. A weary way, Through forest and o'er fell, Prince Madoc rode; And now he skirts the bay whose reckless waves Roll o'er the plain of Gwaelod : fair fields, And busy towns, and happy villages, They overwhelm'd in one disastrous day; For they by their eternal siege had sapp'd The bulwark of the land, while Seithenyn Took of his charge no thought, till, in his sloth And riotous cups surprised, he saw the waves Roll like an army o'er the levell'd mound. A supplicant in other courts, he mourn'd His crime and ruin; in another's court The kingly harp of Garanhir was heard, Wailing his kingdom wreck'd; and many a Prince, Warn'd by the visitation, sought and gain'd A saintly crown — Tyneio, Merini, Boda, and Brenda, and Aëlgyvarch, Gwynon, and Celynin, and Gwynodyl.

To Bardsey was the Lord of Ocean bound --Bardsey, the holy Islet, in whose soil Did many a Chief and many a Saint repose, His great progenitors. He mounts the skiff; Her canvass swells before the breeze ; the sea Sings round her sparkling keel; and soon the Lord Of Ocean treads the venerable shore.

There was not, on that day, a speek to stain The azure heaven; the blessed Sun alone, In unapproachable divinity, Career'd, rejoicing in his fields of light. How beautiful, beneath the bright blue sky,

The billows heave! one glowing green expanse, Save where along the bending line of shore Such hue is thrown, as when the peacock's neck Assumes its proudest tint of amethyst, Embathed in emerald glory. All the flocks Of Ocean are abroad; like floating foam, The sea-gulls rise and fall upon the waves; With long, protruded neck, the cormorants Wing their far flight aloft, and round and round The plovers wheel, and give their note of joy. It was a day that sent into the heart A summer feeling : even the insect swarms From their dark nooks and coverts issued forth, To sport through one day of existence more; The solitary princrose on the bank Seem'd now as though it had no cause to mourn Its bleak autumnal birth; the Rocks, and Shores, The Forest, and the everlasting Hills, Smiled in that joyful sunshine, - they partook The universal blessing.

To this Isle, Where his forefathers were to dust consign'd, Did Madoc come for natural piety, Ordering a solemn service for their souls. Therefore for this the Church that day was dress'd : For this the Abbot, in his alb arrayed, At the high altar stood; for this infused, Sweet incense from the waving thuribule Rose like a mist, and the gray brotherhood Chanted the solemn mass. And now on high The mighty Mystery had been elevate, And now around the graves the brethren In long array proceed : each in his hand, Tall as the staff of some wayfaring man, Bears the brown taper, with their daylight flames Domming the cheerful day. Before the train The Cross is borne, where, fashion'd to the life In shape, and size, and ghastly coloring, The awful Image hangs. Next, in its shrine Of gold and crystal, by the Abbot held, The mighty Mystery came; on either hand Three Monks uphold above, on silver wands, The purple pall. With holy water next A father went, therewith from hyssop branch Sprinkling the graves; the while, with one accord, The solemn psalm of mercy all entoned.

Pure was the faith of Madoc, though his mind To all this pomp and solemn circumstance Yielded a willing homage. But the place Was holy ;- the dead air, which underneath Those arches never felt the healthy sun, Nor the free motion of the elements, Chilly and damp, infused associate awe : The sacred odors of the incense still Floated; the daylight and the taper-flames Commingled, dimming each, and each bedimm'd; And as the slow procession paced along, Still to their hymn, as if in symphony, The regular foot-fall sounded : swelling now, Their voices, in one chorus, loud and deep, Rung through the echoing aisles; and when it ceased.

The silence of that huge and sacred pile Came on the heart. What wonder if the Prince Yielded his homage there? The influences Of that sweet autumn day made every sense Alive to every impulse, - and beneath The stones whereon he stood, his ancestors Were mouldering, dust to dust. Father! quoth he, When now the rites were ended, - far away It hath been Madoc's lot to pitch his tent On other shores; there, in a foreign land, Far from my father's burial-place, must I Be laid to rest; yet would I have my name Be held with theirs in memory. 1 beseech you, Have this a yearly rite for evermore, As I will leave endowment for the same, And let me be remember'd in the prayer. The day shall be a holy day with me, While I do live; they who come after me, Will hold it holy; it will be a bond Of love and brotherhood, when all beside Hath been dissolved; and though wide ocean rolls Between my people and their mother Isle, This shall be their communion ; They shall send, Link'd in one sacred feeling at one hour, In the same language, the same prayer to Heaven, And, each remembering each in piety, Pray for the other's welfare.

The old man Partook that feeling, and some pious tears Fell down his aged cheek. Kinsman and son, It shall be so! said he; and thou shalt be Remember'd in the prayer: nor then alone; But till my sinking sands be quite run out, This feeble voice shall, from its solitude, Go up for thee to Heaven!

And now the bell Rung out its cheerful summons; to the hall, In seemly order, pass the brotherhood : The serving-men wait with the ready ewer; The place of honor to the Prince is given, The Abbot's right-hand guest ; the viands smoke, The horn of ale goes round : and now, the cates Removed, for days of festival reserved Comes choicer beverage, clary, hippocras, And mead mature, that to the goblet's brim Sparkles, and sings, and smiles. It was a day Of that allowable and temperate mirth Which leaves a joy for memory. Madoc told His tale; and thus, with question and reply, And cheerful intercourse, from noon till nones The brethren sat; and when the quire was done, Renew'd their converse till the vesper bell.

But then the Porter called Prince Madoc out, To speak with one, he said, who from the land Had sought him and required his private ear. Madoc in the moonlight met him: in his hand The stripling held an oar, and on his back, Like a broad shield, the coracle was hung. Uncle ! he cried, and with a gush of tears, Sprung to the glad embrace.

O my brave boy ! Llewelyn ! my dear boy ! with stifled voice, And interrupted utterance, Madoc cried ; And many times he clasp'd him to his breast, And many times drew back and gazed upon him, Wiping the tears away which dimm'd the sight,

And told him how his heart had yearn'd for him, As with a father's love, and bade him now Forsake his lonely haunts, and come with him, And sail beyond the seas, and share his fate.

No! by my God! the high-hearted youth replied, It never shall be said Llewelyn left His father's murderer on his father's throne ! I am the rightful king of this poor land. Go thou, and wisely go; but I must stay, That I may save my people. Tell me, Uncle, The story of thy fortunes; I can hear it Here in this lonely Isle, and at this hour, Securely.

Nay, quoth Madoc, tell me first Where are thy haunts and coverts, and what hope Thou hast to bear thee up? Why goest thou not To thy dear father's friend in Powys-land? There at Mathraval would Cyveilioc give A kinsman's welcome; or at Dinevawr, The guest of honor shoulds thou be with Rhys; And he belike from David might obtain Some recompense, though poor.

What recompense? Exclaim'd Llewelyn; what hath he to give, But life for life? and what have 1 to claim But vengeance, and my father Yorwerth's throne? If with aught short of this my soul could rest, Would I not through the wide world follow thee, Dear Uncle ! and fare with thee, well or ill, And show to thine old age the tenderness My childhood found from thee! — What hopes I have Let time display. Have thon no fear for me ! My bed is made within the ocean caves, Of sea-weeds, bleach'd by many a sun and shower; I know the mountain dens, and every hold And fastness of the forest; and I know,— What troubles him by day and in his dreams,— There's many an honest heart in Gwyneth yet! But tell me thine adventure; that will be A joy to think of in long winter nights, When stormy billows make my hullaby.

So as they walk'd along the moonlight shore, Did Madoe tell him all; and still he strove, By dwelling on that noble end and ain, That of his actions was the heart and life, To win him to his wish. It tonch'd the youth; And when the Prince had ceased, he heaved a sigh, Long-drawn and deep, as if regret were there. No, no! he cried, it must not be! lo, yonder My native monntains, and how beantiful They rest in the moonlight! I was nurs'd among them;

They saw my sports in childhood, they have seen My sorrows, they have saved me in the hour Of danger; — 1 have vowed, that as they were My cradle, they shall be my monument ! — But we shall meet again, and thou wilt find me, When next thou visitest thy native Isle, King in Aberfraw !

Never more, Llewelyn, Madoc replied, shall I behold the shores Of Britain, nor will ever tale of me Reach the Green Isle again. With fearful care l choose my little company, and leave No traces of our path, where Violence, And bloody Zeal, and bloodier Avarice, Might find their blasting way.

If it be so, -

And wise is thy resolve—the youth replied, Thou wilt not know my fate; —but this be sure, It shall not be inglorious. I have in me A hope from Heaven. Give me thy blessing. Uncle!

Llewelyn, kneeling on the sand, embraced His knees, with lifted head and streaming eyes Listening. He rose, and fell on Madoc's neck, And clasp'd him, with a silent agony, — Then launch'd his coracle, and took his way A lonely traveller on the moonlight sea

LLAIAN.

Now hath Prince Madoc left the holy Isle, And homeward to Aberfraw, through the wilds Of Arvon, bent his course. A little way He turn'd aside, by natural impulses Moved, to behold Cadwallon's lonely hut. That lonely dwelling stood among the hills, By a gray monutain-stream; just elevate Above the winter torrents did it stand, Upon a craggy bank; an orchard slope Arose behind, and joyons was the scene In early summer, when those antic trees Shone with their blushing blossoms, and the flax Twinkled beneath the breeze its liveliest green. But save the flax-field and that orchard slope, All else was desolate; and now it wore One sober hue; the narrow vale, which wound Among the hills, was gray with rocks, that peer'd Above its shallow soil; the mountain side Was loose with stones bestrown, which oftentimes Clattered adown the steep, beneath the foot Of straggling goat dislodged; or tower'd with erags, One day when winter's work hath loosen'd them, To thunder down. All things assorted well With that gray mountain live; the low stone lines, Which scarcely seem'd to be the work of man, The dwelling rudely rear'd with stones unhewn, The stubble flax, the crooked apple-trees Gray with their fleecy moss and mistletoe, The white-bark'd birch, now leafless, and the ash, Whose knotted roots were like the rifted rock, Through which they forced their way. Adown the vale, Broken by stones, and o'er a stony bed, Roll'd the lond mountain-stream.

When Madoc came, A little child was sporting by the brook, Floating the fallen leaves, that he might see them Whirl in the eddy now, and now be driven Down the descent, now on the smoother stream Sail onward far away. But when he heard

The horse's tramp, he raised his head and watch'd The Prince, who now dismounted and drew nigh. The little boy still fix'd his eyes on him, His bright blue eyes; the wind just moved the curls That cluster'd round his brow; and so he stood, His rosy cheeks still lifted up to gaze In innocent wonder. Madoc took his hand, And now had ask'd his name, and if he dwelt There in the hut, when from that cottage-door A woman came, who, seeing Madoc, stopp'd With such a fear, - for she had cause for fear, -As when a bird, returning to her nest, Turns to a tree beside, if she behold Some prying boy too near the dear retreat. Howbeit, advancing soon, she now approach'd The approaching Prince, and timidly inquired, If on his wayfare he had lost the track, That thither he had strayed. Not so, replied The gentle Prince ; but having known this place, And its old habitants, I came once more To see the lonely hut among the hills. Hath it been long your dwelling ?

Some few years, Here we have dwelt, quoth she, my child and I. Will it please you enter, and partake such fare As we can give? Still timidly she spake, But gathering courage from the gentle mien Of him with whom she conversed. Madoc thank'd Her friendly proffer, and toward the hut They went, and in his arms he took the boy. Who is his father? said the Prince, but wish'd The word unutter'd; for thereat her cheek Was flush'd with sudden heat and manifest pain ; And she replied, He perish'd in the war.

They enter'd now her home ; she spread the board, And set before her guest soft curds, and cheese Of curd-like whiteness, with no foreign dye Adniterate, and what fruits the orchard gave, And that old British beverage which the bees Had toil'd to purvey all the summer long. Three years, said Madoc, have gone by, since here I found a timely welcome, overworn [years ! With toil, and sorrow, and sickness — three long 'Twas when the battle had been waged hard by, Upon the plain of Arvon.

She grew pale, Suddenly pale; and seeing that he mark'd The change, she told him, with a feeble voice, That was the fatal fight which widow'd her.

O Christ, cried Madoc, 'tis a grief to think How many a gallant Briton died that day, In that accursed strife ! I trod the field When all was over, — I beheld them heap'd — Ay, like ripe corn within the reaper's reach, Strown round the bloody spot where Hoel lay; Brave as he was, himself cut down at last, Oppress'd by numbers, gash'd with wounds, yet still Clinching in his dead hand the broken sword ! — But you are moved, — you weep at what I tell. Forgive me, that, renewing my own grief, I should have waken'd yours ! Did you then know Prince Hoel?

She replied, Oh, no! my lot Was humble, and my loss a humble one; Yet was it all to me! They say, quoth she, — And, as she spake, she struggled to bring forth With painful voice the interrupted words, — They say, Prince Hoel's body was not found; But you, who saw him dead, perchance can tell Where he was laid, and by what friendly hand.

Even where he fell, said Madoc, is his grave; For he who buried him was one whose faith Reck'd not of boughten prayers, nor passing bell There is a hawthorn grows beside the place, A solitary tree, nipp'd by the winds, That it doth seem a fitting monument For one untimely slain. — But wherefore dwell we On this ungrateful theme?

He took a harp Which stood beside, and passing o'er its chords, Made music. At the touch the child drew nigh, Pleased by the sound, and lean'd on Madoc's knee, And bade him play again. So Madoc play'd, For he had skill in minstrelsy, and raised His voice, and sung Prince Hoel's lay of loye.

I have harness'd thee, my Steed of shining gray, And thou shalt bear me to the dear white walls. I love the white walls by the verdant bank, That glitter in the sun, where Bashfulness Watches the silver sea-mew sail along. I love that glittering dwelling, where we hear The ever-sounding billows; for there dwells The shapely Maiden, fair as the sea-spray, Her cheek as lovely as the apple flower, Or summer evening's glow. I pine for her ; In crowded halls my spirit is with her; Through the long, sleepless night I think on her; And happiness is gone, and health is lost, And fled the flush of youth, and I am pale As the pale ocean on a sunless morn. I pine away for her, yet pity her, That she should spurn so true a love as mine.

He ceased, and laid his hand upon the child, — And didst thou like the song? The child replied, — Oh, yes! it is a song my mother loves, And so I love it too. He stoop'd and kiss'd The boy, who still was leaning on his knee, Already grown familiar. I should like To take thee with me, quoth the Ocean Lord, Over the seas.

Thou art Prince Madoc, then !— The mother cried, thou art indeed the Prince ! That song — that look — and at his feet she fell, Crying — Oh take him, Madoc ! save the child ! Thy brother Hoel's orphan !

Long it was

Ere that in either agitated heart The tumnlt could subside. One while the Prince Gazed on the child, tracing intently there His brother's lines; and now he caught him up, And kiss'd his cheek, and gazed again till all Was dim and dizzy,— then blest God, and vow'd That he should never need a father's love.

At length, when copious tears had now relieved Her burden'd heart, and many a broken speech In tears had died away, O Prince, she cried, Long hath it been my dearest prayer to Heaven, That I might see thee once, and to thy love Commit this friendless boy ! For many a time, In phrase so fond did Hoel tell thy worth, That it hath waken'd misery in me Fo think I could not as a sister claim Thy love ! and therefore was it that till now Thou knew'st me not: for I entreated him That he would never let thy virtuous eye Look on my guilt, and make me feel my shame. Madoc, I did not dare to see thee then, Thou wilt not scorn me now, - for I have now Forgiven myself; and, while I here perform'd A mother's duty in this solitude, Have felt myself forgiven.

With that she clasp'd His hand, and bent her face on it, and wept. Anon collecting, she pursued, - My name Is Llaian : by the chance of war I fell Into his power, when all my family Had been cut off, all in one hour of blood. He saved me from the ruffian's hand, he sooth'd, With tenderest care, my sorrow. - You can tell How gentle he could be, and how his eyes, So full of life and kindliness, could win All hearts to love him. Madoc, I was young ; I had no living friend ; - and when I gave This infant to his arms, when with such joy He view'd it o'er and o'er again, and press'd A father's kiss upon its cheek, and turn'd To me, and made me feel more deeply yet A mother's deep delight, - oh ! I was proud To think my child in after years should say, Prince Hoel was his father !

Thus I dwelt

In the white dwelling by the verdant bank,-Though not without my melancholy hours,-Happy. The joy it was when I beheld His steed of shining gray come hastening on, Across the yellow sand !- Alas ! ere long, King Owen died. 1 need not tell thee, Madoc, With what a deadly and forefeeling fear I heard how Hoel seized his father's throne, Nor with what ominous woe I welcomed him, In that last, little, miserable hour Ambition gave to love. I think his heart, Brave as it was, misgave him. When I spake Of David and my fears, he smiled upon me; But 'twas a smile that came not from the heart, -A most ill-boding smile ! - O Madoc ! Madoc ! You know not with what misery I saw His parting steps, --- with what a dreadful hope I watch'd for tidings !-- And at length it came, -Came like a thunderbolt ! - I sought the field ! O Madoc, there were many widows there, But none with grief like mine ! I look'd around ; I dragg'd aside the bodies of the dead, To search for him, in vain; --- and then a hope Seized me, which it was agony to lose !

Night came. 1 did not heed the storm of night; But for the sake of this dear babe, 1 sought 45 Shelter in this lone hut: 'twas desolate; And when my reason had return'd, I thought That here the child of Hoel night be safe, Till we could claim thy care. But thou, meantime, Didst go to roam the Ocean; so I learn'd To bound my wishes here. The carkanet, The embroider'd girdle, and what other gauds Were once my vain adornments, soon were changed For things of profit, goats and bees, and this, The tuneful solace of my solitude. Madoc, the harp is as a friend to me; I sing to it the songs which Hoel loved, And Hoel's own sweet lays; it comforts me, And gives me joy in grief.

Often 1 grieved, To think the son of Hoel should grow up In this unworthy state of poverty; Till Time, who softens all regrets, had worn That vain regret away, and I became Humbly resign'd to God's unerring will. To him I look'd for healing, and he pour'd His balm into my wounds. I never form'd A prayer for more, — and lo ! the happiness Which he hath, of his mercy, sent me now !

THE EXCOMMUNICATION.

Ox Madoc's docile courser Llaian sits, Holding her joyful boy; the l'rince beside Paces afoot, and, like a gentle Squire, Leads her loose bridle; from the saddle-bow His shield and helmet hang, and with the lance, Staff-like, he stay'd his steps. Before the sun Had climb'd his southern eminence, they left The mountain-feet; and hard by Bangor now, Travelling the plain before them they espy A lordly cavalcade, for so it seem'd, Of hericity with herek in hered and herede i

Of knights, with hawk in hand, and hounds in leash,

Squires, pages, serving-men, and armed grooms, And many a sumpter-beast and laden wain, Far following in their rear. The bravery Of glittering bauldricks and of high-pluned crests, Embroider'd surcoats and emblazon'd shields, And lances whose long streamers play'd aloft; Made a rare pageant, as with sound of trump, Tambour and cittern, proudly they went on; And ever, at the foot-fall of their steeds, The tinkling horse-bells, in rude symphony, Accorded with the joy.

What have we here? Quoth Madoc then to one who stood beside The threshold of his osier-woven hut. 'Tis the great Saxon Prelate, he return'd, Come hither for some end, I wis not what, Only be sure no good ! --- How stands the tide ? Said Madoc; can we pass? --- 'Tis even at flood, The man made answer, and the Monastery Will have no hospitality to spare For one of Walcs to-day. Be ye content To guest with us.

He took the Prince's sword :	To our most pious warfare piously
The daughter of the house brought water then,	Pledging his kingly sword. Do thou the like,
And wash'd the stranger's feet; the board was	And for this better object lay aside
spread,	Thine other enterprise, which, lest it rob
And o'er the bowl they commun'd of the days	Judea of one single Christian arm,
Ere ever Saxon set his hateful foot	We do condemn as sinful. Follow thou
Upon the beautiful Isle.	The banner of the church to Palestine,
As so they sat,	So shalt thou explate this rash offence,
The bells of the Cathedral rung abroad	Against the which we else should fulminate
Unusual summons. What is this? exclaim'd	Our ire, did we not see in charity,
Prince Madoc; let us see! — Forthwith they went, He and his host, their way. They found the rites	And therefore rather pity than resent, The rudeness of this barbarous land.
Begun; the mitred Baldwin, in his hand	At that,
Holding a taper, at the altar stood.	Scorn tempering wrath, yet anger sharpening
Let him be cursed !— were the words which first	scorn,
Assail'd their ears, - living and dead, in limb	Madoe replied - Barbarians as we are,
And life, in soul and body, be he curs'd	Lord Prelate, we received the law of Christ
Here and hereafter ! Let him feel the curse	Many a long age before your pirate sires
At every moment, and in every act,	Had left their forest dens: nor are we now
By night and day, in waking and in sleep !	To learn that law from Norman or from Dane,
We cut him off from Christian fellowship;	Saxon, Jute, Angle, or whatever name
Of Christian sacraments we deprive his soul;	Suit best your mongrel race ! Ye think, perchance
Of Christian burial we deprive his corpse;	That like your own poor, woman-hearted King,
And when that carrien to the Fiends is left	We, too, in Gwyneth are to take the yoke
In unprotected earth, thus let his soul	Of Rome upon our necks; - but you may tell
Be quench'd in hell!	Your Pope, that when I sail upon the seas,
He dash'd upon the floor	I shall not strike a topsail for the breath
His taper down, and all the ministering Priests	Of all his maledictions !
Extinguish'd each his light, to consummate	Saying thus,
The imprecation.	He turn'a away, lest further speech might call
Whom is it ye curse,	Further reply, and kindle further wrath,
Cried Madoc, with these horrors? They replied,	More easy to avoid than to allay.
The contumacious Prince of Powys-land,	Therefore he left the church; and soon his mind To gentler mood was won, by social talk
Cyveilioc. What I sugth Madoe and his over	And the sweet pratile of that blue-eyed boy,
What! quoth Madoc,—and his eye Grew terrible,—who is he that sets his foot	Whom in his arms he fondled.
In Gwyneth, and with hellish forms like these	But when now
Dare outrage here Mathraval's noble Lord?	Evening had settled, to the door there came
We wage no war with women nor with Priests;	One of the brethren of the Monastery,
But if there be a knight amid your train,	Who called Prince Madoc forth. Apart they wen
Who will stand forth, and speak before my face	And in the low, suspicious voice of fear,
Dishonor of the Prince of Powys-land,	Though none was nigh, the Monk began. Be calm
Lo! here stand 1, Prince Madoc, who will make	Prince Madoc, while I speak, and patiently
That slanderous wretch cry craven in the dust,	Hear to the end! Thou know'st that, in his life,
And eat his lying words!	Becket did excommunicate thy sire
Be temperate !	For his unlawful marriage; but the King,
Quoth one of Baldwin's Priests, who, Briton born,	Feeling no sin in conscience, heeded not
Had known Prince Madoc in his father's conrt;	The inefficient censure. Now, when Baldwin
It is our charge, throughout this Christian land,	Beheld his monument to-day, impell'd,
To call upon all Christian men to join	As we do think, by anger against thee,
The armies of the Lord, and take the cross;	He swore that, even as Owen in his deeds
That so, in battle with the Infidels,	Disown'd the Church when hving, even so
The palm of victory or of martyrdom,	The Church disown'd him dead, and that his eorps No longer should be suffer'd to pollute
'Glorious alike, may be their recompense.	The Sanctuary. — Be patient, I beseech,
This holy badge, whether in godless scorn,	And hear me out. Gerald, at this, who felt
Or for the natural blindness of his heart, Cyveilioc hath refused; thereby incurring	A natural horror, sought — as best he knew
The pain, which, not of our own impulse, we	The haughty Primate's temper — to dissuade
Inflict upon his soul, but at the will	By politic argument, and chieffy urged
Of our most holy Father, from whose word	The quick and fiery nature of onr nation,-
Lies no appeal on earth.	How, at the sight of such indignity,
'Tis well for thee,	They would arise in arms, and limb from limb
Intemperate Prince ! said Baldwin, that our blood	Tear piecemeal him and all his company.
Flows with a calmer action than thine own!	So far did this prevail, that he will now
Thy brother David hath put on the cross,	Commit the deed in secret; and, this night,

Thy father's body from its resting-place,	And now with spade and mattock have they broken
O Madoc! shall be torn, and cast aside	Into the house of death, and now have they
In some unhallow'd pit, with foul disgrace And contumelious wrong.	From the stone coffin wrench'd the iron cramps, When sudden interruption startled them,
Sayest thou to-night?	And clad in complete mail from head to foot,
Quoth Madoc. Ay, at midnight, he replied,	They saw the Prince come in. Their tapers
Shall this impiety be perpetrated.	Upon his visage, as he wore his helm [gleam'd
Therefore hath Gerald, for the reverence	Open; and when in that pale countenance, —
He bears to Owen's royal memory, Sent thee the tidings. Now, be temperate	For the strong feeling blanch'd his cheek, — they His father's living lineaments, a fear [saw
In thy just anger, Prince ! and shed no blood.	Like ague shook them. But anon that fit
Thou know'st how dearly the Plantagenet	Of scared imagination to the sense
Atones for Becket's death; and be thou sure,	Of other peril yielded, when they heard
Though thou thyself shouldst sail beyond the storm, That it would fall on Britain.	Prince Madoc's dreadful voice. Stay! he ex- claim'd,
While he spake,	As now they would have fled; stir not a man,
Madoc was still; the feeling work'd too deep	Or if I once put breath into this horn,
For speech or visible sign. At length he said,	All Wales will hear, as if dead Owen call'd
What if amid their midnight sacrilege	For vengeance from that grave. Stir not a man,
I should appear among them? It were well;	Or not a man shall live! The doors are watch'd, And ye are at my mercy!
The Monk replied, if, at a sight like that,	But at that,
Thon canst withhold thy hand.	Baldwin from the altar seized the crncifix,
Oh, fear me not!	And held it forth to Madoc, and cried out,
Good and true friend, said Madoc. I am calm,	He who strikes me, strikes Him; forbear, on pain
And calm as then beholdest me will prove In word and action. Quick I am to feel	Of endless — Peace! quoth Madoc, and profane not
Light ills, — perhaps o'er-hasty : summer gnats,	The holy Cross, with those polluted hands
Finding my cheek unguarded, may infix	Of midnight sacrilege !- Peace ! I harm thee
Their skin-deep stings, to vex and irritate;	not,
But if the wolf or forest boar be nigh,	Be wise, and thon art safe. — For thee, thon know'st,
I am awake to danger. Even so Bear I a mind of steel and adamant	Prior, that if thy treason were divnlged, David would hang thee on thy steeple top,
Against all greater wrongs. My heart hath now	To feed the steeple daws. Obey and live !
Received its impulse; and thou shalt behold	Go, bring fine linen and a coffer meet
How in this strange and hideous circumstance	To bear these relics; and do ye, meanwhile,
I shall find profit — Only, my true friend, Let me have entrance.	Proceed upon your work. Thou at his word
At the western porch,	They at his word Raised the stone cover, and display'd the dead,
Between the complines and the matin-bell,	In royal grave-clothes habited, his arms
The Monk made answer: thou shalt find the door	Cross'd on the breast, with precious gums and spice
Ready. Thy single person will suffice;	Fragrant, and incorruptibly preserved.
For Baldwin knows his danger, and the hour Of guilt or fear convicts him, both alike	At Madoc's bidding, round the corpse they wrap The linen web, fold within fold involved;
Opprobrious. Now, farewell!	They laid it in the coffer, and with cloth
Then Madoc took	At head and foot filled every interval,
His host aside, and in his private ear	And press'd it down compact; they closed the lid,
Told him the purport, and wherein his help	And Madoc with his signet seal'd it thrace.
Was needed. Night came on; the hearth was heap'd;	Then said he to his host, Bear thou at dawn This treasure to the ships. My father's bones
The women went to rest. They twain, the while,	Shall have their resting-place, where mine one day
Sat at the board, and while the untasted bowl	May moulder by their side. He shall be free
Stood by them, watch'd the glass whose falling	In death, who living did so well maintain sands Told out the meany hours. The hour is some t	His and his country's freedom. As for ye,
Told out the weary hours. The hour is come ; Prince Madoc helm'd his head, and from his neck	For your own safety, ye, I ween, will keep My secret safe. So saying, he went his way.
He slung the bugle-horn; they took their shields,
And lance in hand went forth. And now arrived,
The bolts give back before them, and the door
Rolls on its heavy hinge.	XVI.

The lordly Primate's will. They stood and watch'd Now hath the Lord of Ocean once again Their ministers perform the irreverent work. Set foot in Mona. Llaian there receives Sisterly greeting from the royal maid, Who, while she tempers to the public eye Her welcome, safely to the boy indulged In fond endearments of instinctive love. When the first flow of joy was overpast, How went the equipment on, the Prince inquired. Nay, brother, quoth Goervyl, ask thou that Of Urien; - it hath been his sole employ Daily from cock-crow until even-song, That he hath laid aside all other thoughts, Forgetful even of me! She said and smiled Playful reproach upon the good old man, Who in such chiding as affection loves, Dallying with terms of wrong, return'd rebuke. There, Madoc, pointing to the shore, he cried, There are they moor'd; six gallant barks, as trim And worthy of the sea as ever yet Gave canvass to the gale. The mariners Flock to thy banner, and the call hath roused Many a brave spirit. Soon as Spring shall serve, There need be no delay. I should depart Without one wish that lingers, could we bear Ririd from hence, and break poor Rodri's chains. Thy lion-hearted brother ; - and that boy, If he were with us, Madoc! that dear boy, Llewelyn !

Sister, said the Prince at that, How sped the Queen?

Oh, Madoc! she replied,

A hard and unrelenting heart hath he. The gentle Emma told me she had fail'd, And that was all she told; but in her eye I could see sorrow struggling. She complains not, And yet, I know, in bitterness laments The hour which brought her as a victim here.

Then I will seek the Monarch, Madoc cried; And forth he went. Cold welcome David gave, Such as might chill a suppliant; but the Prince Fearless began. I found at Dinevawr Our brother Ririd, and he made his suit That he might follow me, a banish'd man. He waits thine answer at the court of Rhys. Now I beseech thee, David, say to him, His father's hall is open !

Then the King Replied, I told thee, Madoc, thy request Displeased me heretofore; I warn'd thee, too, To shun the rebel; yet my messenger Tells me, the guests at Dinevawr who sat At board with Rhys, and drank of his own cup, Were Madoc and Lord Ririd. — Was this well, This open disobedience to my will, And my express command?

Madoc subdued His rising wrath. If I should tell thee, Sire, He answered, by what chance it so fell out, I should of disobedience stand excused, Even were it here a crime. Yet think again, David, and let thy better mind prevail. I am his surety here; he comes alone; The strength of yonder armament is mine; And when did I deceive thee? — I did hope, For natural love and public decency, That ye would part in friendship — let that pass! He may remain, and join me in the hour Of embarkation. But for thine own sake, Cast off these vile suspicions, and the fear That makes its danger! Call to mind, my brother, The rampart that we were to Owen's throne! Are there no moments when the thoughts and loves Of other days return? — Let Rodri loose; Restore him to his birth-right! — Why wouldst thou Hold him in chains, when benefits would bind His noble spirit?

Leave me! cried the King; Thou know'st the theme is hateful to my car. I have the mastery now, and idle words, Madoc, shall never thrust me from the throne, Which this right arm in battle hardly won. There must he lie till nature set him free, And so deliver both. Trespass no more !

A little yet bear with me, Madoc cried. I leave this land forever : let me first Behold my brother Rodri, lest he think My summer love be withered, and in wrath Remember me hereafter.

Leave me, Madoc ! Speedily, ere indulgence grow a fault, Exclaim'd the Monarch. Do not tempt my wrath ! Thou know'st me !

Ay! the Ocean Prince replied, I know thee, David, and I pity thee, Thou poor, suspicious, miserable man! Friend hast thou none except thy country's foe, That hateful Saxon, he whose bloody hand Pluck'd out thy brethren's eyes; and for thy kin, Them hast thou made thy perilous enemies. What if the Lion Rodri were abroad? What if Llewelyn's banner were display'd? The sword of England could not save thee then. Frown not, and menace not! for what am I, That I should fear thine anger?—And with that He turn'd indignant from the wrathful king.

THE DEPARTURE.

WINTER hath pass'd away; the vernal storms Have spent their rage, the ships are stored, and now To-morrow they depart. That day a Boy, Weary and foot-sore, to Aberfraw came, Who to Goervyl's chamber made his way, And caught the hem of her garment, and exelaim'd, A boon, — a boon, — dear Lady! Nor did he Wait more reply than that encouragement, Which her sweet eye and lovely smile bestow'd; I am a poor, unhappy, orphan boy, Born to fair promises and better hopes, But now forlorn. Take me to be your page !— For blessed Mary's sake, refuse me not ! I have no friend on earth nor hope but this.

The boy was fair; and though his eyes were swollen,

And cheek defiled with tears, and though his voice	And, yielding to its yearnings, in that mood
Came chok'd by grief, yet to that earnest eye	Of awful feeling, he call'd forth the King,
And supplicating voice so musical,	And led him from the palaee-poreh, and streten'd
It had not sure been easy to refuse	His hand toward the ocean, and exclaim'd,
The boon he begg'd. I cannot grant thy suit,	To-morrow over yon wide waves I go;
Goervyl eried, but I can aid it, boy !	To-morrow, never to return, I leave
Go ask of Madoc ! - And herself arose,	My native land! O David, O my brother,
And led him where her brother on the shore	Turn not impatiently a reckless ear
That day the last embarkment oversaw.	To that affectionate and natural voice
Mervyn then took his mantle by the skirt,	Which thou wilt hear no more ! Release our
And knelt and made his suit; she too began	brethren ;
To sue; but Madoe smiling on the Maid,	Recall the wanderers home; and link them to thee
Won by the virtue of the countenance	By cordial confidence, by benefits
Which look'd for favor, lightly gave the yes.	Which bless the benefactor. Be not thon
Will an erect they Caredon when that fair how	As is the black and melancholy yew That strikes into the grave its baleful roots,
Where wert thou, Caradoe, when that fair boy
Told his false tale ? for hadst thou heard the voice,	And prospers on the dead ! — The Saxon King, — Think not I wrong him now; — an hour like this
The gentle voice, so musically sweet, And seen that earnest eye, it would have heal'd	Hath soften'd all my harsher feelings down;
Thy wounded heart, and thou hadst voyaged on,	Nor will I hate him for his sister's sake,
The happiest man that ever yet forsook	Thy gentle Queen, — whom, that great God may
His native country! He, on board the bark,	bless,
Lean'd o'er the vessel-side, and there he stood	And, blessing her, bless thee and our dear country,
And gazed, almost unconscious that he gazed,	Shall never be forgotten in my prayers;
Toward you distant mountains where she dwelt,	But he is far away; and should there come
Senena, his beloved. Caradoe,	The evil hour upon thee, - if thy kin,
Senena, thy beloved, is at hand !	Wearied by suffering, and driven desperate,
Her golden locks are clipp'd, and her blue eye	Should lift the sword, or young Llewelyn raise
Is wandering through the throng in search of thee,	His banner, and demand his father's throne, -
For whose dear sake she hath forsaken all.	Were it not trusting to a broken reed,
You deem her false, that her frail constancy	To lean on England's aid? - I urge thee not
Shrunk from her father's anger, that she lives	For answer now; but sometimes, O my brother!
Another's victim bride ; but she hath fled	Sometimes recall to mind my parting words,
From that unnatural anger; hath escaped	As 'twere the death-bed counsel of the friend
'The unnatural union ; she is on the shore,	Who loved thee best!
Senena, blue-eyed Maid, a seemly boy,	The affection of his voice,
To share thy fortunes, to reward thy love,	So mild and solemn, soften'd David's heart;
And to the land of pages to follow theo
And to the land of peace to follow thee,	He saw his brother's eyes, suffused with tears,

Thriee echoed their acclaim.

He never more should share the feast, nor hear The echoing harp again ! His heart was full;

There lie the ships, Their sails all loose, their streamers rolling out With sinnous flow and swell, like water-snakes, Curling aloft; the waves are gay with boats, Pinnace, and barge, and coracle, - the sea Swarms like the shore with life. Oh, what a sight Of beauty for the spirit unconcern'd, If heart there be which unconcern'd could view A sight like this ! - how yet more beautiful For him whose soul can feel and understand The solemn import ! Yonder they embark -Youth, beauty, valor, virtue, reverend age; Some led by love of noble enterprise, Others, who, desperate of their country's weal, Fly from the impending yoke; all warm alike With confidence and high heroic hope, And all in one fraternal bond conjoin'd By reverence to their Chief, the best beloved That ever yet on hopeful enterprise Led gallant army forth. He, even now Lord of himself, by faith in God and love To man, subdues the feeling of this hour, The bitterest of his being.

At this time, Pale, and with feverish eye, the King came up, And led him somewhat from the throng apart, Saying, I sent at day-break to release Rodri from prison, meaning that with thee He should depart in peace; but he was gone, This very night he had escaped !-- Perchanee ---As I do hope --- it was thy doing, Madoc ? Is he aboard the fleet?

I would he were ! Madoe replied; with what a lighten'd heart Then should I sail away ! Ririd is there Alone — alas! that this was done so late !

Reproach me not ! half sullenly the King, Answering, exclaim'd; Madoc, reproach me not ! Thou know'st how hardly 1 attain'd the throne; And is it strange that I should guard with fear The precious prize? — Now — when 1 would have taken Thy counsel — be the evil on his head ! Blame me not now, my brother, lest sometimes I call again to mind thy parting words In sorrow !

God be with thee! Madoc cried; And if at times the harshness of a heart, Too prone to wrath, have wrong'd thee, let these tears

Efface all faults. 1 leave thee, O my brother, With all a brother's feelings !

So he said,

And grasp'd, with trembling tenderness, his hand, Then calm'd himself, and moved toward the boat. Emma, though tears would have their way and sighs Would swell, suppressing still all words of woe, Follow'd Goervyl to the extremest shore. But then as on the plank the maid set foot, Did Emma, staying her by the hand, pluck out The erucifix, which next her heart she wore In reverence to its relic, and she cried, Yet, ere we part, change with me, dear Goervyl,— Dear sister, loved too well, or lost too soon !—

I shall betake me often to my prayers, Never in them, Goervyl, of thy name Unmindful;—thou too wilt remember me Still in thine orisons;—but God forefend That ever misery should make thee find This Cross thy only comforter!

She said, And kiss'd the holy pledge, as each to each Transferr'd the mutual gift. Nor could the Maid Answer, for agony, to that farewell; She held Queen Emma to her breast, and close She elasp'd her with a strong, convulsive sob, Silently. Madoe too in silence went, But press'd a kiss on Emma's lips, and left IJis tears upon her cheek. With dizzy eyes Gazing she stood, nor saw the boat push off,-The dashing of the oars awaken'd her; She wipes her tears away, to view once more Those dear, familiar faces ; - they are dim In the distance : never shall her waking eye Behold them, till the hour of happiness, When death hath made her pure for perfect bliss!

Two hearts alone of all that company, Of all the thousands who beheld the seene, Partook unmingled joy. Dumb with delight, Young Hoel views the ships, and feels the boat Rock on the heaving waves; and Llaian felt Comfort, — though sad, yet comfort, — that for her No eye was left to weep, nor heart to mourn.

Hark ! 'tis the mariners, with voice attuned, Timing their toil ! and now, with gentle gales, Slow from the holy haven they depart.

RODRI.

Now hath the evening settled, the broad Moon Rolls through the rifted clouds. With gentle gales Slowly they glide along, when they behold A boat with press of sail and stress of oar Speed forward to the fleet; and now, arrived Beside the Chieftain's vessel, one inquires If Madoe be aboard. The answer given, Swift he ascended up the lofty side. With joyful wonder did the Ocean Lord Again behold Llewelyn; but he gazed Doubtfully on his comrade's countenance, -A meagre man, severe of brow, his eye Stern. Thou dost view me, Madoc, he exclaim'd. As 'twere a stranger's face. I marvel not! The long afflictions of my prison-house Have changed me.

Rodri! eried the Prince, and fell Upon his neck; — last night, subdued at length By my solicitations, did the King Send to deliver thee, that thou shouldst share My happy enterprise; — and thou art come, Even to my wish!

Nay, Madoc, nay, not so ' He answered, with a stern and bitter smile;

NOTES TO MADOC IN WALES

This gallant boy hath given me liberty, Prince Madoc sail'd with all his company. And I will pay him with his father's throne ; No nobler crew filled that heroic bark, Ay, by my father's soul !- Last night we fled The house of bondage, and in the sea-caves By day we lurk'd securely. Here I come, Only to see thee once before I die, And say farewell, - dear brother ! The palace of Gwynedd, or North Wales. Rhodri Mawr, about the year 873, fixed the seat of government here, which had formerly been at Dyganwy, but Intterly at Caer Seiont in Arvon, near the present town of Caernarvon. " It is strange," says Warrington, " that he should desert a country where every mountain was a natural fortress, and in times of such difficulty and dauger, should make choice of a residence so exposed and defenceless." But this very danger may have been his motive. The Danes, who could make no impression upon England against the great Alfred, had turned their arms upon Wales; Mona was the part most open to their ravages and it may have been an act as well of policy as of courage in the king to fix his abode there. He fell there, at length, in battle against the Saxons. A barn now stands upon the site of the palace, in which there are stones that, by their better workmanship, appear to have belonged to the original building

The order of the royal hall was established by law.

"The men to whom the right of a seat in the hall belongs tre fourteen, of whom four shall sit in the lower, and ten in the upper part of the hall. The king is the first ; he shall sit at the pillar, and next him the chancellor ; and after him the guest, and then the heir apparent, and then the master of the hawks. The foot-beater shall sit by the dish opposite the king, and the mead-maker at the pillar behind him. The priest of the household shall be at another pillar, who shall bless the meat, and chant the pater noster. The crier shall strike the pillar above the king's head. Next him shall be the judge of the palace, and next to him the musician, to whom the right of the seat belongs The smith of the palace shall be at the bottom, before the knees of the priest. The master of the palace shall sit in the lower hall, with his left hand towards the door, with the serving-men whom he shall choose, and the rest shall be at the other side of the door, and at his other hand the musician of the household. The master of the horse shall sit at the pillar opposite the king, and the muster of the hounds at the pillar opposite the priest of the household." - Laws of Hocl Dha'.

"1165. The king gathered another armie of chosen men, through all his dominions, as England, Normandy, Anjow, Gascoine, and Gwyen, sending for succours from Flanders and Brytain, and then returned towards North Wales, minding utterlie to destroy all that had life in the laud; and coming to Cross Oswalt, called Oswald's Tree, incamped there. On the contratic side, Prince Owen and his brother Cadwallader, with all the power of North Wales ; and the Lord Rees, with the power of South Wales; and Owen Cyveilioc and the sounes of Madoc ap Meredyth, with the power of Powyss, and the two sonnes of Madoc ap Ednerth, with the people betwixt Wye and Seavern, gathered themselves togither and came to Corwen in Edeymeon, proposing to defend their country. But the king understanding that they were high, being wonderful desirous of battell, came to the river Ceircoc, and caused the woods to be hewn down. Whereupon a number of the Welshmen understanding the passage, anknown to their captains, met with the king's ward, where were placed the picked men of all the armie, and there began a hote skirmish, where diverse worthic men were slaine on either side; but in the end the king wanne the passage, and came to the mountain of Berwyn, where he laid in campe certaine days, and so both the armies stood in awe of each other; for the king kept the open plains, and was afraid to be intrapped in straits; but the Welshmen watched for the advantage of the place, and kept the king so straitlie, that neither forage nor victuall might come to his camp, neither durst anie soldiour stir abroad. And to augment their miseries there fell such raine, that the king's men could scant stand upon their feete upon those slipperie hilles. In the end, the king was compelled to return home without his purpose, and that with great loss of men and munition, besides his charges. Therefore in a great choler he caused the pledges eies, whom he had received long before that, to be put out; which wera Rees and Cawdwalhon the sonnes of Owen, and Cynwrie and Meredith the sonnes of Rees, and other." - POWELL.

During the military expedition which King Heory II, made in our days against South Wales, an old Welshman at Peneaduir, who had faithfully adhered to him, being desired to give an opinion about the royal army, and whether he thought that of the rebels would make resistance, and what would be the final event of this war, replied :— "This Nation, O king, may now, as in former time, be harassed, and in a great measure weakened and destroyed by you and other powers, and it will often prevail by its laudahle exertions ; but it can never be totally subdued through wrath of man, unless the wrath of God shall concur. Henry, in his attempt upon Wales, 1165, "did justice on the sons of Rhys, and also on the sons and daughters of other noblemen that were his accomplices, very rigorously; causing the eyes of the young striplings to be pecked out of their heads, and their noses to be cut off or slit; and the cares of the young gentlewomen to be stuffed. But yet I find in other authors that in this journey King Henry did not greatly prevail against his enemies, but rather lost many of his men of war, both horsemen and footmen; for by his severe proceeding against them he rather made them more eager to seek revenge, than quieted them in any tunult."—HOLINSTED. The chief of Bards Then raised the ancient lay. - II. p. 330, col. 2.

The lines which follow represent the Bardic system, as kild down in the following Triads of Bardism.

"12. There are three Circles of Existence: the Circle of Infinity, where there is nothing but God, of living or dead, and none but God can traverse it; the Circle of Inchoation, where all things are by Nature derived from Death, — this Circle hath been traversed by mae; and the Circle of Inppiness, where all things spring from Life, — this man shall traverse in Heaven.

" 13. Animated Beings have three States of Existence : that of Inchontion in the Great Deep, or Lowest point of Existence; that of Liherty in the state of Humanity; and that of Lave, which is Happiness in Heaven.

"14. All animated Beings are subject to three Necessities ; beginning in the Great Deep ; Progression in the Circle of Incheation ; and Plenitude in the Circle of Happiness. Without these things nothing can possibly exist but God.

"15. Three things are necessary in the Circle of Inchoation; the least of all animation, and thence Beginning; the materials of all things, and thence Increase, which cannot take place in any other state; the formation of all things out of the dead mass, and thence Discriminate Individuality.

"16. Three things cannot but exist towards all animated Beings from the nature of Divise Justice: Co-sufferance in the Circle of Inchoation, because without that none could attain to the perfect knowledge of any thing; Co-participation is the Divise love; and Co-ultimity from the nature of God's Power, and its attributes of Justice and Mercy.

¹⁴ 17. There are three necessary occasions of Inchoation: to collect the materials and properties of every nature; to collect the knowledge of every thing; and to collect power towards subduing the Adverse and the Devastative, and for the divestation of Evil. Without this traversieg every mode of animated existence, no state of animation, or of any thing in nature, can attain to Plenitude."

Till evil shall be known,

And, being known as evil, cease to be. - 11. p. 330, col. 2.

"By the knowledge of three things will all Evil and Death be diminished and subdued: their nature, their cause, and their operation. This knowledge will be obtained in the Cirele of Happines.¹⁹ — Triads of Bardism, Tr. 35.

"Three things none but God can do: endure the Eternities of the Circle of Infinity; participate of every state of Existence without changing; and reform and renovate every thing without the loss of it.

"The three Plenitudes of Happiness: Participation of every nature, with a plenitude of One predominant; conformity to every cast of genius and character, possessing superior excellence in One; the Love of all Beings and Existences, but chiefly concentred in one object, which is God: and in the predominant One of each of these will the Plenitude of Happiness consist." — Triads of Bardism, 40, 38, 45

"And for as much as I have made mention of their houses, it shall not be greatly from my purpose to describe in what manner they are builded : they are made round, like hells or round pavilions. They cover them with the leaves of date trees and other trees strongly compact and hardened, wherewith they make them close from winde and weather. At the short posts or proppes, within the house, they tie ropes of the cotton of gossampine trees, er other ropes made of certain long and rough roots, much like unto the shrubbe called Spartum, whereof in old time they used to make bands for vines, and gables and ropes for shippes. These they tie overthwart the house from post to post; on these they lay as it were certain mattresses made of the cotion of gossampine trees, which grow plentifully in these islandes. Will ye believe The wonders of the ocean? how its shoals Sprang from the wave. - V. p. 336, col. 1.

I have somewhere seen an anecdote of a sailor's mother, who believed all the strange lies which he told her for his ornusement, hut never could he persunded to believe there could be in existence such a thing as a flying fish. A Spanish author, who wrote before the voyage of Columbus, describes these fish as having been seen on the const of Flanders. "Hay all unar pescados que vuelon sobre el agua ; algunos dellos atravesabau volando por eneima de las galeras, e aun algunos dellos acian dentra." — Coronica de D. PERO NINO.

A still earlier author mentions such a sight in the Straits us a miracle. "As they solled from Algeziras, a fish came flying through the uir, and fell upon the deck of the Infante's Galley, with which they had some fresh food that day; and heccuse I, who write this history, have never heard or seen of any like thing, I here recount it, because it appears to me a thing marvellous, and in my judgment out of the course of nature."— GOMES EANNES.

"At Barbadoes the negroes, after the example of the Charaibs, take the flying fish very successful — in the dark; they spread their nets before a light, and dist — b the water at a small distance; the fish, rising engerly, fl — owards the light, and are intercepted by the nets."— Λ (INNER.—These flying fishes, says the writer of Sir Thomas Roe's Voyage, are like men professing two trades, and thrive at neither.

Atkins, with some feeling, describes the Dolphin as a glorions-colored fish. A labored description of its beauty would not have conveyed so lively a sense of admiration. Herbert has given this fish a very extraordinary character, upon the authority of the ancients.

" The dolphin is no higger than a salmon, it glitters in the ocean with a variety of heautiful colors ; has few scales ; from its swiftness and spirit metonymically sirnamed the Prince and Arrow of the sea; celebrated by many learned Pens in sundry Epithets ; Philanthropoi, for affecting men, and Monogamoi, for their turtle constancy ; generated they be of sperme, nourisht like men, imbrace, join, and go 10 months great. "The war-pole is a small peeled tree painted red, the top and boughs cut off short. It is fixed in the ground opposite the door of the dead warrior, and all his implements of wa. are hung on the short houghs of it till they rot." — Apairs.

This author, who knew the manners of the North American Indians well, though he formed a most wild theory to account for them, describes the rites of mourning. "The widow, through the long term of her weeds, is compelled to refrain from all public company and diversions, at the penalty of an adulteress, and likewise to go with flowing hair, without the privilege of oil to anoint it. The nearest kinsmen of the decensed husband keep a very watchful eye over her conduct in this respect. The place of interment is also calculated to wake the widow's grief, for he is entombed in the house under ber bed; and if he was a war-leader, she is obliged, for the first moon, to sit in the day-time under his mourning war-pole, which is decked with all his martial trophies, and must he heard to cry with hewailing notes. But none of them are fond of that month's supposed religious duty, it chills, or sweats and wastes them so exceedingly, for they are allowed no shade or shelter."

Like silver in the sunshine. — VI. p. 338, col. 1.

So dazzlingly white were the houses at Zempoalla, that one of the Spaniards gailopped back to Cortes to tell him the walls were of silver. — BERNAL DIAZ, 30.

Torquemada also says, "that the temple and palace courts at Mexico were so highly polished, that they actually shone like burnished gold or silver in the sun." — T. 1, p. 251.

I have described Aztlan like the cities which the Spaniards found in New Spain. How large and how magnificent they were may be learned from the True History of the Conquest of Mexico, hy Bernal Diaz. This delightful work has been abridged into English hy Mr. Keating, and if the reader has not seen it, he may thank me for recommending it to his notice.

Gomara's description of Zempoallan will show that cities, as splendid in their appearance as Aztlan, did exist among the native Americans.

"They descried Zenpoallan, which stoode a myle distant from them, all beset with fayre Orchardes and Gardens, verye pleasaunte to beholde : they used alwayes to water them with shinces when they pleased. There proceeded out of the Towne many persons to behold and receyve so strange a people unto them. They came with smiling countenance, and presented unto them divers kinde of floures and sundry fruites which none of our menne had heretofore seene. These penple came without feare among the ordinance; with this pompe, triumphe, and joy, they were received into the Citie, which seemed a heautiful Garden : for the trees were so greene and high that scarcely the houses appeared.

"Sixe horsemen, which hudde gone hefore the army to discover, returned back as Cortez was entering into the Cite, saying that they had seene a great house and court, and that the walles were garnished with silver. Cortez commanded them to proceed ou, willing them not to show any token of wonder of any thing that they should see. All the streetes were replenished with people, which stood gaping and wondering at the horses and straugers. And passing through a great market-place, they saw, on their right hand, a great walled house made of lyme and stone, with loupe holes and towers, whited with playster that shined lyke silver, being so well burnished and the sunne glistering upon it, and that was the thing that the Spaniards thought had beene walles of silver. I doe helieve that with the imagination and great desire which they had of golde and silver, all that shined they deemed to be of the same metall."—Conquest of the Weast India.

Cortes himself says of Cholula, that he counted above four hundred temple towers in that eity; and the eity of Extapalapa, he says, contained from 12,000 to 15,000 inhabitants.— Carta de Relacion, 16, 20.

A floating islet. - VI. p. 338, col. 1.

Islets of this kind, with dwelling huts upon them, were common upon the Lake of Mexico. They were moved at pleasure from bay to bay, as the inhabitants wanted sunshine or shelter. — CLAVIGERO.

Each held a burning censer in his hand. - V1. p. 338, col. 1.

Tendilli, soys the old translater of Gomara, according to their usance, did his reverence to the Captaine, hurning frankincense, and little strawes touched in bloud of his own bodie. And at Chiauizthan, the Lord toke a little chafyngdishe in his hande, and cast into it a certaine gum, whyche savaured in sweete smel much like anto frankincense; and with a censer he smoked Cortez, with the ceremonye they use in theyr salutations to theyr Gods and nobilitie. So also the Tlascallan Embassadors burnt copal before Cortes, having thrice made obeisance, and they touched the ground with their hands and kissed the earth.

The nexte day in the morning, the Spaniards came to Chololla, and there came out near ten thousand Indians to receyve him with their Captaynes in good order. Many of them presented unto him bread, foules and roses; and every Captayne as he approached, welcomed Cortes, and then stood asile, that the rest, in order, mighte come unto him; and when he came entering into the citie, all the other citizens receyved him, marvelling to see such men and horses.

After all this came ont, all the religious menne, as Priests and Ministers to the idols, who were many and strange to behold, and all were clothed in white, lyke unto surplices, and hemmed with common threede; some brought instruments of misicke like into Cornettes, others brought instruments made of bones; others an instrument like a keel covered with skin; some brought chafing-dishes of coals, with perfumes; others brought idols covered; and, finally, they al come singing in their language, which was a terrible noyse, and drew smelles in their sensers. With this pomp of solemnitie, which truely was great, they brough him unto the cittle. — Conquest of the Weast India.

Gage's account of Mexico is copied verbatim from this old translation, even, in some places, to the literal error of using the hard c instead of z, which the ç with the cedilla represents.

The Great Temple. 'Twas a huge, square hill. - VI. p. 338, col. 2.

The great Cu of Mexico, for thus these mounds were called, had 114 steps to the summit; that of Tezcuco, 115; of Choluh, 120. Gold and jewels, and the different seeds of the country, and human blood, were thrown in the foundations. The Spaniards found great treasures when they levelled the Cu at Mexico, to make room for a church to Santiago. — BER-NAL DIAZ.

The lines which follow describe its structure, as related by Clavigero and by the Spanish Conquerors. The Tower of Babel is usually painted with the same kind of circuitous ascent.

The Tambour of the God. - VI. p. 338, cel. 2.

Gumilla (c. 36) describes a prodigious drum used as a signal to assemble the people in time of danger, by some of the Orinoco tribes, especially by the Caverres, to whom the mvention is ascribed. It is a hollowed piece of wood, in thickness about an inch, in girth as much as two men can clasp, in length about eleven or twelve feet. This is suspended by a withe at each end from a sort of gallows. On the upper surface are three apertures like those in a fiddle, and in the bottom of the instrument, immediately under the middle of the middle aperture, which is shaped like a holf-moon, a flint about two pounds in weight is fastened with gum. This is said to be necessary to the sound. Both ends of this long tube are carefully closed, and it is beaten on the middle aperture with a pellet which is covered with a sort of gum called Currucay. Gumilla positively affirms, and on his own knowledge, that its sound may be heard four leagues round. This is scarcely possible. I doubt whether the loudest gong can be heard four miles, and it is not possible that wood can be made as sonorous as metal.

Ten Cities hear Its voice. — VI. p. 338, col. 2.

"There, in the great Cu, they had an exceeding large drum; and when they beat it, the sound was such and so dismal, that it was like an instrument of hell, and was heard for more than two leagues round. They said that the cover of that drum was made of the skin of huge serpents." — BERNAL DIAZ.

After Cortes had been defeated, he always heard this drum when they were offering up the reeking hearts of his men. The account in Bernal Diaz, of their midnight sacrifice, performed by torch-light, and in the sight of the Spanish army is truly terrific.

Four Towers

Were piled with human skulls. - VI. p. 338, col. 2.

These skull-built temples are delineated in Picart's great work; I suppose be copied them from De Bry. They are de scribed by all the historians of Mexico. Human heads have often been thus employed. Tavernier and Hanway had seen pyramids of them in Persia erected as trophies. The Casa dos Ossos at Evora gave me an idea of what these Mexican temples must have been. It is built of skulls and thigh-henes in alternate layers, and two whole bodies, dried ond shrivelled are hung up against the walls, like armor in an old baror hall.

He lights me at my evening banquet. - VI. p. 339, col. 1

The King of Chalco having treacherously taken and slain two scops of the King of Tetzcuco, had their hodies dried, and placed as candelabras in his palace, to hold the lights. — Tor QUEMAON, 1, 151.

This same king wore round his neck a choin of human hearts set in gold — the hearts of the bravest men whom he had slain, or taken, and sacrificed. — 1b. 152.

The more usual custom was to stuff the skin of the royal, or noble prisoner, and suspend it as a trophy in the palace, or the house of the priest. Gemara's account of this custom is a dreadful picture of the most harharous superstition which ever yet disgraced mankind. " On the last day of the first month, a hundred slaves were sacrificed : this done, they pluckt off the skinnes of a certaine number of them, the which skinnes so many ancient persons put, incontinent, upon theat naked bodies, all fresh and bloudy as they were fleane from the dead carcases. And being open in the backe parte and shoulders, they used to lace them, in such sort that they came fitte nponn the bodies of those that ware them : and being in this order attired, they came to daunce among many others. In Mexico the King himself did put on one of these skinnes, heing of a principall captive, and daunced among the other disguised persons, to exhalte and honour the feast ; and an infinite num her followed him, to hehold his terrible gesture ; although some hold opinion, that they followed him to contemplate his grente devotion. After the sacrifice ended, the owner of the slaves did carry their hadies home to their houses, to make of their fleshe a solemne feaste to all their friendes, leaving their heads and heartes to the Priests, as their dutie and offering: and the skinnes were filled with cotton wool, or strawe, to be hung in the temple and kyng's palayce for a memorie." - Conquest a the Weast India.

After the Inga Yupangui had successfully defended Cuzco against the Chancas, he had all of them who were slam skinned, and their skins stuffed and placed in various attitudes, some heating tambours, others blowing flutes, &c., in a large huilding which he erected as a monument for those who had fallen in defending the city. - HERRERA, 5, 3, 12.

Oh, what a pomp, And pride, and pageantry of war. - VII. p. 340, col. I.

Gemara thus describes the Tlascellan ermy: "They were trimme fellowes, and wel ermed, according to their use, although they were paynted so, that their faces shewed like divels, with great tuffes of feathers and triumphed gallantry. They had also slinges, staves, speares, swordes, bowes, and arrowes, skalles, splintes, gantlettes, all of wood, gilte, or else covered with feathers, or leather ; their corslets were made of cotton woole, their targettes and bucklers, gallont and strong, made of weede covered with leather, and trimmed with laten and feathers; theyr swordes were staves, with an edge of fint stone cunningly jnyned into the staffe, which would cutte very well, and make a sore wounde. Their instruments of warre were hunters' hornes, and drummes, called attabals, made like a caldren, and covered with vellum." - Conquest of the Weast India.

In the inventory of the treasure which Grijalva brought from his expedition are, a whole harness of furniture for an armed man, of gold, thin heaten; enother whole armor of wood, with leaves of gold, garnished with little black stones; four pieces of armor of wood, made for the knees, and covered with golden leaf. And among the presents designed for the king, were five targets of feathers and silver, and 24 of feathers and gold, set with pearls, both curious and gallant to behold.

They piled a heap of sedge before our host. - VII. p. 340, col. 1.

When the Spaniards discovered Campeche, the Indians heaped up a pile of dry sedge, and ranged themselves in troops. Ten Priests then came from a temple with censers and copal, wherewith they incensed the strangers; and then told them by signs to depart, hefore that pile, which they were about to kindle, should be hurnt out. The pile was immediately lighted; the Priest withdrew without another word or motion, and the people began to whistle and sound their shells. The Spaniards were weak, and many of them wounded, and they prudently retired in peace. - BERNAL DIAZ, 3.

At the sacring of the Popes, when the new-elected Pope passeth (as the manner is) before St. Gregory's chapel, the Master of the Ceremonies goeth before him, bearing two dry reeds, at the end of the one a burning wax candle tied, and at the end of the other a handfull of flax, the which he setteth on fire, snying, with a loud voice, Pater Sancte, sic transit gloria mundi, - CAMERARIUS.

The Arrow of the Omen. - VII. p. 340, col. 1.

The Tiaxcalteeas had two arrows, which they regarded with great reverence, and used to augur the event of a battle. Two of their bravest Chiefs were to shoot them at the enemy, and recover them or die. If the arrow struck and wnended, it was held on omen that the fight would be prosperous; but if they neither struck, nor drew blood, the army retired.-Torquemada, i. 34.

This is more particularly noticed by Gomara. "In the warres the Tlascallans use their standerde to he carried hehynde the army; but when the battyle is to be fought, they place the standerde where all the hoste may see it; and he that commeth not incontinent to hys ancient, payeth a penaltie, Their standerde hath two crossehow arrowes set thereon, whiche they esteeme as the relikes of their ancestors. Thys standerde two olde soldiers, and valiant menne, being of the chiefest Captaynes, have the charge to earrie; in the which standerde, an abusion of southsaying, eyther of losse or vic--ory, is noted. In this order they shote one of these arrowes their hatchet, hargoon lances, with mushclaw, and other neces| against the first encinies that they meete; and if with that errowe they do eyther kill or hurte, it is a token that they shall have the victorie; and if it neyther kill nor hurte, then they assuredly believe that they shall lose the field."- Conquest of the Weast India.

" Sunt autem his in partibus (Ardudwy) lanca longissima : sicut enim arcu prevalet Sudwallia, sic lanceis prævalet Venedotia, adco ut ictum hic lancen cominus datum ferrea lorica tricatura minime sustineat." - GIBALOUS CAMBRENSIS Thus also Trevisa, in his lame rhymes :

The white deer-skin shroud, - VIII, p. 341, col. 2.

"The Indians use the same ceremonies to the hones of their dead, as if they were covered with their former skin, flesh, and ligaments. It is but a few days since I saw some return with the bones of nine of their people, who had been two months before killed by the enemy. They were tied in white deer-skins separately, and when carried by the door of one of the houses of their family, they were laid down opposite to it, till the female relations convened, with flowing hair, and wept over them about half an hour. Then they carried them home to their friendly magazines of mortality, wept over them again, and then buried them with the usual solemnities. The chieftains earried twelve short sticks tied together in the form of a quadrangle, so that each square consisted of three. The sticks were only peeled, without any painting; but thero were swan feathers tied to each corner. They called that frame the White Circle, and placed it over the door while the women were weeping over the bones." - ADAIR.

On softest fur The bones were laid. - VIII. p. 342, col. 1.

When the hody is in the grave, they take care to cover it in such a manner, that the earth does not touch it. It lies as in a little eave, fined with skins, much neater, and better adorned, than their cabins. - CHARLEVOIX.

Adair was present at one of their funerals. " They laid the corpse in his tomh in a sitting posture, with his feet towards the east, his head anointed with bear's oil, and his face painted red ; but not streaked with black, because that is a constant emblem of war and death. He was drest in his finest apparel, having his gun and pouch, and trusty hiccory bow, with a young panther's skin full of arrows, alongside of him, and every other useful thing he had been possessed of, that when he rises again they may serve him in that track of land which pleased him best before he went to take his long sleep. His tomb was firm and clean inside ; they covered it with thick logs so as to hear several tiers of cypress bark, and such a quantity of clay, as would confine the putrid smell, and be on a level with the rest of the floor. They often sleep ove these tombs ; which, with the loud wailing of the women at the dusk of the evening, and dawn of the day, on henches close by the tombs, must awake the memory of their relations very often; and if they were killed by an enemy, it helps to irritate, and set on such revengeful tempers to retaliate blood for blood."

> 'Twas in her hut and home, yea, underneath The marriage bed, the bed of widowhood, Her husband's grave was dug. - VIII. p. 342, col. 1.

"The Mosqueto Indians, when they die, are buried in their houses, and the very spot they lay over when alive, and have saries, huried with them ; but if the defunct leaves behind him a gun, some friend preserves that from the earth, that would soon damnify the powder, and so render it nuserviceable in that strange journey. His hoat, or dorea, they cut in pieces, and lay over his grave, with all the rest of his household goods, if he hath any more. If the deceased leave behind him no children, hothers, or parents, the cousins, or other his relations, cut up, or destroy his plantations, lest any living should, as they esteem it, rob the dead." — The Mosqueto Indian and his Golden River, by M. W. LINDOR and OSAON'S Collection.

Pabas. -- VIII. p. 342, col. 1.

Papa is the word which Bernal Diaz uses when he speaks of the Mexican priests; and in this he is followed by Purchas. The appellation in Torquenada is Quaquil. I am not certain that Bernal Diaz did not mean to call them Popes, and that Purchas has not mistaken his meaning. An easy alteration made it more suitable for English verse, than the mere accurate word weuld have been.

l perceive by Herrera (3, 2, 13) that the word is Mexican, and that the Devil was the author of it, in imitation of the Church.

Ipalnemoaui, by whom we live. - VIII. p. 442, cel. 1.

The Mexicans had some idea, though a very imperfect one, of a supreme, absolute, and independent being. They represented him in a external form, because they believed him to be invisible; and they named him only by the common appellation of God, or in their language Teal; a word resembling still more in its meaning than its pronunciation, the $\theta \epsilon \sigma s$ of the Greeks. But they applied to bim certain epithets, which were highly expressive of the grandenr and power which they conceived him to possess; Ipalnemaani, "He by whom we hve:" and Tloque Nahuaque, "He who has all in himself." – CLATIGERO.

Torquemada has a very characteristic remark upon these appellations: —" Although," says he, "those blinded men went astray in the knowledge of God, and adored the Devil in his stead, they did not err in the names which they gave him, those being truly and properly his own; the Devil using this cunning with them, that they should apply to him these, which, by nature and divine right, are God's; his most holy Majesty permitting this on account of the enormity and shamefuncess of their depraved enstoms, and the multitude of their imputites." — L. vi. c. 8.

> The Great Spirit, who in clouas And storms, in mountain cares, and by the falls Of waters, in the woodland solitude, Doth make his bring felt. - VIII. p. 442, col. 2.

" About thirty miles below the falls of St. Anthony, is a remarkable cave, of an amazing depth. The Indians term it Wakon-teebe ; that is, the dwelling of the Great Spirit. The entrance into it is about ten feet wide ; the arch within is near fifteen feet high, and about thirty feet broad. The bottom of it consists of fine clean sand. About twenty feet from the entrance begins a lake, the water of which is transparent, and extends to an unsearchable distance; for the darkness of the cave prevents all attempts to acquire a knowledge of it. I threw a small pebble towards the interior parts of it, with my utmost strength ; I could hear that it fell into the water, and, notwithstanding it was of so small a size, it caused an astonishing and horrible noise, that reverberated through all those gloomy regions. I found in this cave many Indian hieroglyphics, which appeared very ancient, for time had nearly covered them with moss. They were cut in a rude manner upon the inside of the walls, which were composed of a stone so extremely soft, that it might easily be penetrated with a knife : a stone every where to be found near the Mississippi. The cave is only accessible by ascending a narrow, steep passage, that lies near the brink of the river." - CARVER.

"The Prince had no sooner gained the point that overlooks this wenderful cascade (the fulls of St. Anthony) than he began with an audible voice to address the Great Spirit, one of whose places of residence he supposed this to he. He told him he had come a long way to pay his adorations ta him, and now would make him the hest offerings in his power. He accordingly first threw his pipe into the stream; then tha roll that contained his tobacce; after these, the bracelets he wore on his arms and wrists; next, an ornament that encircled his neck, composed of beads and writers; and at last, the earrings from his ears: in short, he presented to his God every part of his dress that was valuable; during this he frequently smote his hreast with great violence, threw his arms about, and appeared to be much agitated.

"All this while he continued his adorations, and at length concluded them with fervent petitions that the Great Spirit would constantly afford us his protection on our travels, giving us a bright sun, a blue sky, and clear, untroubled waters; nor would he leave the place till we had smoked together with my pipe in honor of the Great Spirit." — CARVEN

The Spirit of the Lord

That day was moving in the heart of man. -- VIII. p. 343, col. 1

There is a passage in Bede which well illustrates the different feelings whereby harbarians are induced to accept a new religion.

"Edwin of Northambria had summoned his chiefs and counsellors to advise with him concerning his intended conversion. The first person who delivered his opinion was Coifi, the Chief Priest of the Idols. 'For this which is preached to us,' said he, ' do you, O King, see to it, what it may be. I will freely confess to you what I have learnt, that the religion which we have held till now has no virtue in it. No one of your subjects has devoted himself to the worship of our Gods more earnestly than I, and yet many there are who have received greater bounties and greater favors from your hand, and have prospered better in all their undertakings and desires. Now, if our Gods could have done any thing, they would rather have assisted me than them.' To this another of the nobles added, 'The present life of man upon earth, when compared with the future, has appeared to me, O King, like as when you and your Chiefs and servants have been seated at your supper, in winter time, the hearth blazing ia the centre, and the viands smoking, while without it is storm, or rain, or snow, and a sparrow flics through the hall, entering at one door and passing out at another ; while he is within, in that little minute he does not feel the weather, but after that instant of calm, he returns again to winter as from winter he came, and is gone. Such and so transitery is the life of man, and of what follows it or what preceded it we are altogether ignorant. Wherefore, if this new doctrine should bring any thing more certain, it well deserves to be followed." "-Lih. 2, c. 13.

John Wesley has preserved a very interesting dialogue between himself and the Chicasaws.

"Q. Do you believe there is One above, who is over all things? — Panstoobee answered, We believe there are four Beloved Things above, the Clouds, the Sun, the Clear Sky, and He that lives in the Clear Sky

"Q. Do you believe there is but one that lives in the Clear Sky?

".A. We believe there are Two with him ; three in all.

" Q. Do you think He made the Sun and the other Beloved Things?

"A. We cannot tell. Who hath seen ?

"Q. Do you think He made you?

".A. We think He made all men at first.

" Q. How did He make them at first?

"A. Out of the ground.

" Q. Do you believe He loves you?

"A. I do not know. I cannot see him.

" Q. But has He not often saved your life ?

"A. He has. Many bullets have gone on this side, and many on that side, but he would never let them hurt me. And mony bullets have gone into these young men, and yet they are alive.

" Q. Then cannot He save you from your enemics now ?

"A. Yes, but we know not if he will. We have now so many enemies round about us, that I think of nothing but death; and if I am to die, I shall die, and I will die like a man. But if He will hava ma to live, I shall live. Though I had ever so many ecomies, He can destroy them all.

"Q. How do you know that?

"A. From what I have seen. When our enemies came against us before, then the Beloved Clouds came for us; and often much rain and sometimes hail has come upon them, and that in a very hot day. And I saw when many French and Choctaws, and other nations came against one of our towns, and the ground made a noise under them, and the Beloved Ones in the air behind them, and they were afraid, and went away, and left their meat and their dink, and their guns. I tell no lie, all these saw it, too.

" Q. Have you heard such noises at other times?

"A. Yes, often ; before and after almost every hattle.

" Q. What sort of noises were they?

"A. Like the noise of drums, and guos, and shouting.

" Q. Have you heard any such lately?

"A Yes; four days after our last battle with the French.

" Q. Then you heard nothing before it?

"A. The night before, I dreamed I heard many drums up there, and many trumpets there, and much stamping of feet and shouting. Till then, I thought we should all die; but then I thought the Beloved Ones were come to help us. And the next day I heard above a hundred gons go off before the fight began, and I said, When the Sun is there, the Beloved Ones will help us, and we shall conquer our enemies; and we did so.

" Q. Do you often think and talk of the Beloved Ones?

"A. We think of them always, wherever we are. We talk of them and to them, at home and ahroad, in peace and in war, before and after we fight, and indeed whenever and wherever we meet together.

"Q. Where do you think your souls go, after death ?

"A. We believe the souls of red men walk up and down near the place where they died, or where their bodies lie, for we have often heard cries and noises near the place where any prisoners had been bornt.

" Q. Where do the souls of white men go after death?

"A. Wa cannot tell; we have not seen.

"Q. Our belief is, that the souls of bad men only walk up and down; but the souls of good men go up.

".A. I believe so, too; but I told you the talk of the nation.

"Mr. Andrews. They said, at the burying, they knew what you was doing. You was speaking to the Beloved Ones above to take up the soul of the young woman.

"Q. We have a book that tells us many things of the Beloved Ones above ; would you be glad to know them?

".4. We have no time now, but to fight. If we should ever be at peace, we should be glad to know.

"Q. Do you expect ever to know what the white men know?

"Mr. Andrews. They told Mr. O., they believe the time will come when the red and white men will be one.

" Q. What do the French teach you?

"A. The French Black Kings (the Priests) never go ont. We see you go about: we like that; that is good.

"Q. How came your nation by the knowledge they have?

" \hat{A} . As soon esever the ground was sound and fit to stand upon, it came to us, and has been with us ever since. But we are young men, our old men know more; but all of them do not know. There are but a few whom the Beloved One chooses from a child, and is in them, and takes care of them, and teaches them. They know these things, and our old men practise, therefore they know: but I do not practise, therefore I know little." - WESLEY's Journal, No. 1, 39.

Dolwyddelan. - X. 3 344, col. 2.

"Dolwyddelan is situated in a rocky valley which is sprinkled with atunted trees, and watered by the Lleder. The boundaries are rude and barren mountains, and among others, the great hending mountain, Seabod, often conspicences from most distant places. The castle is placed on a high rock, precipitous on one side, and insulated: it consists of two square towers, one 40 feet by 25, the other, 32 by 20; each nad formerly three floors. The materials of this fortress are the shattery stone of the country; yet well squared, the masonry good, and the mortar hard; the castle yard lay between the towers." - PENNANT'S Snowdon.

The rudeness and burrenness of the aurrounding mountains I can well testify, having been bewildered and benighted upon them.

" In the beginning of Edward the Fourth his reign, Dolwyddelan was inhabited by Howell ap Evan ap Rhys Gethin, a base son, captain of the country, and an outlaw. Against this man, David ap Jenkin rose and contended with him for the sovereignty of the country, and heing superior to him in the end, he drew a draught for him, and took him in his bed at Penanonen with his concubine, performing by craft what he could not by force ; for after many bickerings between Howell and David, David being too weak was fayna to fly the country and to goe to Ireland, where he was a year or thereabouts ; in the end he returned, in a aummer time, having himself and all his followers clad in greene ; which, being come into the country, he dispersed here and there among his friends, lurking by day and walking by night, for fear of his adversaries; and such of the country as happened to have a sight of him and of his followers, said they were fayries, and so ran away." - GWYDIE HISTORY.

Nor turn'd he now Beside Kregennan, where his infant feet Had trod Ednywain's hall. — X. p. 344, col. 2.

At some distance beyond, the two pools, called Llynian Cregenan, in the neighborhood of Cader Idris, near the river Kregennan, I saw the remains of Llys Bradwen, the Court or Palace of Ednowain, chief of one of the filteen tribes of North Wales, either in the reign of Gruffydd ap Cynan, or soon after. The relics are about thirty yards square: the entrance about seven feet wide, with a large, upright stone on each side, by way of door-case; the walls, with large atones, uncemented by any mortar; in short, the structure of this palace shows the very low state of architecture in those times; it may be paralleled only by the artless fabric of a cattle-house.³² — PENNANT'S Snowdon.

The Hirlas. - X. p. 345, col. 1.

Mr. Owen, to whose indefatigable industry Cymbric literature is so much indebted, has favored me with a literal version of this remarkable poem.

When the dawn uprose, a shout was given; Foes were sending a luckless destiny.

Mangled with ruddy wounds, our men, after heavy toil, were seen scattered about the wall of the Vala of Maelor.

I chased away the strangers inpred to contention, dauntless in the conflict, with red stained weapons.

Who insults the brave, let him beware his presence !

the result of molesting him is a source of effliction.

Pour ont, thou cup-bearer, thus yielding pleasure, the horn in the hand of Rhys, in the hall of the director of bounty, the hall of Owen, that has ever been maintained on spoil, the feasting of a thousand, thou mayest hear; open are the gates.

Cup-bearer! I am sad and silent : has he not left me ?

Reach then the horn for mutual drinking ;

Full of sorrow am I for the leader of the hue of the ninth wave;*

long and blue its characteristic, gold its cover :

so bring it forth with Bragod, a liquor of exalted pledge, into the hand of the froward Gwgan, to requite his deed. The whelps of Goronwy are mighty in the path of wrath, aptly springing whelps, confident their feet,

men who claim a reward in every difficulty;

men in the shout greatly valued, of mighty deliverance.

⁴ The ninth wave is an expression much used by the Weish Poeta. It occurs in the Hoienau of Myrddin. ¹⁰ I will prophesy before the ninth wave.¹⁰ — Arch. p. 133. So in the eulogy on Eva. ¹⁰ Eva, of the hue of the spraying foam before the ninth wave.¹⁰ — Arch. p. 217.

368 The Shepherd of Havern (Severn) it elates the soul to hear Oh my Christ! how sad am I from these wounds! them By the loss of Moreiddig greatly is his absence felt. sounding the Horns of mead that greatly rouse desire. Pour thou out the Horn, for they do not sigh for me! Pour out thou the Horn covered with a yellow top, the Hirlas, cheeringly in the hand of Morgant, honorably drunk with over-frothing mead ; a man who deserves the homage of peculiar praiso. and if thou seekest life to one year's close, Like poison to the happy is the track of his spear, diminish not its respect, since it is not meet; a matter accursed is the abiding his blade, And bear to Grufydd, the crimson-lanced foe, smooth its two sides, keen its edges. wine with pellucid glass around it; the dragon of Arwstli, safeguard of the borders, Pour out, thou Cup-bearer, from a silver vessel the dragon of Owen, the generous, of the race of Cynvyn, the solemn festive boon with due respect. n dragon from his beginning, and never seared by a conflict of triumphant slaughter, or afflicting chase. To baffle Goronwy were a task for a hundred men; Men of combat departed for the acquirement of fame, the warriors a mutual purpose did accomplish there, supporters of the hattle, heedless of life. armed sons of the banquet with gleaming weapons; they requited well their mead, like Belyn's men of yore; fairly did they toil while a single man was left. the ses : Pour out thou the Horn, for it is my purpuse a magnanimous prisoner they fetched away, that its potent sway may incite a sprightly conversation, Mairyc son of Grafydd, the theme of prophetic song : in the right hand of our leader of devastation, Were they not all bathed in sweat when they returned, gleaming beneath the broad, light shield ; for full of sunshine were the extended hill and dale ? in the hand of Ednyved, the lion of his land irreproachable ; all dexterous in the push of spears, shivered away his shield. Pour thou out the Horn to the mutually toiling ones, The tumult hurries on the two fearless of nature ; they would break as a whirlwind over a fair retreat, they would pour abroad in a noted spot with opposing fronts in the comhat of battle, a store where the glittering irons go rehounding ; where the face of the gold-bespangled shield they would Madoe and Meiler, men nurtured in depredation, quickly break. for iniquity the stemming opponents, Thoroughly stained, their shafts, after head-cleaving blows, the instructors for tumult of a shield-hearing host, Thoroughly active in defending the glory-bounded Garthran, and there was heard in Maelor a great and sudden outcry, with horrid scream of men in agony of wounds, traeth : and thronging round the carnage they interwove their paths. apright their purpose with keen-edged weapons; As it was in Bangor round the fire of spears, the train of Mynyddoc, for their being consigned to sleep, when two sovereigus over horns made discord, obtained their recording, leaders of a wretched fray ! when there was the banquet of Morae Morvran. Maelor, -Four thon out the florn, for I am contemplating where they defend both their mead and their country. Selve the undagated, of the station of Gwygyr, look to it, who insults him of eagle heart ! And Madoe's only son, the generous Tudyr of high renown, and the claim of the wolf, a slayer with gleaming shafts. Two heroic ones, two lions in their onset, two of cruel energy, the two sons of Ynyr ; two, unrestrained in the day of battle their onward course, of irresistible progress and of matchless feat. The stroke of the fierce lions fiercely cut through warriors of battle-leading forms, red their ashen thrusters of violence, bending in pursuit with ruthless glory. The shivering of their two shields may be likened to the loud-voiced wind, over the green-sea brink checking the incessant waves; so seemed the scene of Talgarth.

Pour out, thou Cup-bearer, seek not death, the Horn with honor in festivals. The long blue bugle of high privilege, with ancient silver that covers it, with opposite lips, and bear to Tudyr, eagle of conflicts, a prime heverage of the blushing wine. If there come not in of mead the best of all the liquor from the bowl, thy head is forfeit to the hand of Moreiddig the encourager of songs; may they become old in fame before their cold depositure ! Brothers hlameless! of highly soaring minds, of dauntless vigor earning your deserts, warriors who for me have achieved services, not old with unsightliness, but old in dexterity, toilers, impellers, leaders that are wolves of the cruel foremost rank, with gory limbs. Brave captains of the men of Mocnant, a Powysian land, both possess the prowess of the brave ; the deliverers in every need, ruddy are their weapons, securely they would keep their bounds from turnalt praise is their meed, they who are so blest. -Cry of death was it ? be the two to me then changed!

On the plain of Great Gwestun I saw the raw throbbing The exalted chief did meet the dispersed ones of slaughter, a governor was slain, burnt was a fort on the flood mark of the whelps of Owen with connected spears in united lesp; and froward conductors of subjects trained for conflicts. It is heard how from the feast of mead went the chief of Ca-

None achieved what my warriors did in the hard toil of the release of a prisoner belongs to the harmonious eulogy.

Four out, thou Cup-bearer, sweet mead distilled of spear-impelling spirit in the sweating toil, from bugle horns proudly overlaid with gold to requite the pledge of their lives. Of the various distresses that chieftains endure no one knows but God and he who speaks. A man who will not pay, will not pledge, will abide no law, Daniel the auxiliary chief, so fair of loyalty. Cop-bearer, great the deed that claims to be honored, of nice refraining not from death if they find not hospitality. Cup-bearer, a choicest treat of mead must be served us together, an ardent fire bright, a light of ardently bright tapers. Cup-bearer, thou mightest have seen a house of wrath in Lledwn land, a sullenly subjected prey that shall be highly praised. Cup-bearer, I cannot be continued here : nor avoid a separation ; Be it in Paradise that we be received ; with the Supreme of Kings long be our abode, where there is to be seen the secure course of truth.

The passage in the poem would have stood very differently had I seen this literal version before it was printed. I had written from the faithless paraphrase of Evans, in which every thing characteristic or heautiful is lost.

Few persons who read this song can possibly doubt its authenticity. They who chose to consider the Welsh poems as spurious had never examined them. Their groundless and impudent incredulity, however, has been of service to literature, as it occasioned Mr. Turner to write his Vindication, which has settled the question forever.

Saint Monacel. - X. p. 345, col. 2.

"In Pennant-Melangle church was the tomb of St. Monacella, who, protecting a hare from the pursuit of Brocwell Yscythbrog, Prince of Powis, he gave her land to found a religious house, of which she became first Abbess. Her hard hed is shown in the cleft of a neighboring rock, her tomh was in a little chapel, now the vestry, and her inuage is still to be seen in the churchyard, where is also that of Edward, cldest son of Owea Gwynedh, who was set aside from the succession on account of a hocken nose, and flying here for safety, was slain not far off, at a place called Buckh Cross Forwerth. On his shield is inscribed, Hie jacet Etward." — GOUGH's Camden.

Mr. Gongle has certainly been mistaken concerning one of these monuments, if not both. What he supposed to be the Image of St. Monacel is the monumental stone of some female of distinction, the figure being recumbent, with the hands joined, and the fect resting upon some animal. And the letters which he read for Etward, are plainly Et Mado.

The place of meeting was a high hill-top. - XI. p. 346, col. 1.

The Bardic meetings, or Gorseddau, were held in the open air, on a conspicuous place, while the sun was above the horizon; for they were to perform every thing in the eye of ight, and in the face of the sun. The place was set apart by forming a Circle of Stones, with a large stone in the middle, heside which the presiding Bard stood. This was termed $Cyl_{\mathcal{G}}$ Cyngrair, or the Circle of Federation, and the middle stone Macn Llog, the Stone of Covenant.

Mr. Owen's very carious introduction to his translation of Llywarc Hea has supplied me with materials for the account of the Gorsedd, introduced in the poem. That it might be as accurate as possible, he himself and Edward Williams the Bard did me the favor of examining it. To their knowledge, and to that of Mr. Turner, the historian of the Anglo-Saxons, and to the liberality and friendliness with which they have ever been willing to assist me therewith, I am greatly and variously indebted.

The Bard at these meetings wore the distinguishing dress of his order — a robe of sky blue, as an emblem of truth, being unicolored, and also as a type, that, amid the storms of the moral world, he must assume the serenity of the unclouded sky. The dress of the Oxydd, the third order, or first into which the candidate could be admitted, was green. The Auenyddion, the Disciples, wore a variegated dress of blue, green, and white, the three Bardic colors, white being the dress of the Druids, who were the second order. The hards stood within the circle, bareheaded and harefooted, and the ceremony opened by sheathing a sword and laying it on the Stone of Covenant. The Bardic traditions were then recited, > Himself, albeit his hands were stain'd with war, Initiate; for the Order, in the lapse Of years, and in their nation's long decline, From the first rigor of their purity Somewhat had fallen. - XI. p. 346, col. 1.

"By the principles of the Order a Bard was never to hear arms, nor in any other manner to become a party in any dispate, either political or religious; nor was a naked weapon ever to be held in his presence, for under the title of Bardd Ynys Prydain, Bard of the Isle of Britain, he was recognized as the sacred Herald of Peace. He could pass nonnolested from one country to anuther, where his character was known; and whenever he appeared in his unicolored rohe, ottention was given to him on all occasions; if it was even between armies in the heat of action, both parties would instantly desist." - Owen's Llycource Hen.

Six of the elder Bards are enumerated in the Triads as having borne arms in violation of their Order; but in these latter days the perversion had become more frequent. Meiler, the Bard of Grufydd ab Cynan, distinguished burself in war; Cynddelw, Brydydd Mawr, the Great Bard, was eminent for his valor, and Gwalchmai boasts in one of his poems that he had defended the Marchea against the Saxons.--WARNINGTON.

The Bard's most honorable name. - X1. p. 346, col. 2.

No people seem to have understood the poetical character so well as the Welsh ; witness their Triads. 47

"The three primary requisites of poetical Genius; an eye that can see Nature, a heart that can feel Nature, and a resolution that dares follow Nature.

"The three foundations of Genius ; the gift of God, man's exertion, and the events of life.

"The three indispensables of Genius; understanding, feeling, and perseverance.

"The three things which constitute a poet; genius, knowledge, and impulse.

"The three things that carich Genius; contentment of mind, the cherishing of good thoughts, and exercising the memory." - E. WILLIAMS'S Poems. OWEN'S Llyware Hen.

Cimbric lore. - XI. p. 346, col. 2.

"The Welsh have always called themselves Cymry, of which the strictly literal meaning is Aborigines. There can be no doubt that it is the same word as the Cimbri of the oncients; they call their language Cymraeg, the Primitive Tongue." — E. WILLIAMS's Poems.

Where are the sons of Gavran ? where his tribe, The faithful ? - XI. p. 347, col. 1.

"Gavran, the son of Aeddan Vradog ab Dyvnwal Hen, a chieftain of distinguished celebrity in the latter part of the fifth century. Gavran, Cadwallon, and Gwenddolau were the heads of the three faithful tribes of Britain. The family of Gavran obtained that title by accompanying him to sea to discover some islands, which, by a traditionary memorial, were known by the name of Gwerdonnau Llion, or the green Islands of the Ocean. This expedition was not heard of afterwards, and the situation of those islands became lost to the Britons. This event, the voyage of Merddin Emrys with the twelve Bards, and the expedition of Madoc, were called the three losses by disappearance." — Cambrian Eiography.

Of these Islands, or Green Spots of the Floods, there are some singular superstitions. They are the abode of the Tylwyth Teg, or the Fair Fomily, the souls of the virtuous Druids, who, not having been Christians, cannot enter the Christian heaven, but enjoy this heaven of their own. They, however, discover a love of mischief, neither becoming happy spirits, nor consistent with their original character; for they love to visit the earth, and, seizing a man, inquire whether be will travel above wind, mid wind, or below wind; above wind is a gidly and terrible passage; below wind is through bush and brake; the middle is a sufe course. But the spell of secarity is, to catch hold of the grass. for these beings have not power to destroy a blade of grass. In their better moods they come over and carry the Welsh in their boats. He who visits these islands imagines on his return that he has been absent unly a few hours, when, in truth, whole centuries have passed away.

If you take a turf from St. David's church-yard, and stand upon it on the sea-shore, you behold these islands. A mar, once, who had thus obtained sight of them, immediately put to sea to find them; but they disappeared, and his search was ir, vain. He returned, looked at them again from the enchantecturf, again set seil, and failed again. The third time he took the turf into his vessel, and stood upon it till he reached them "The inhabitants of Arran More, the largest of the south isles of Arran, on the coast of Galway, are persuaded that is a clear day they can see Hy Brasail, the Enchanted Island, from the coast, the Paradise of the Pagan Irish." — Collectanea de Rebus Hidernicis. BEAUFORD's Ancient Topography of Ireland.

General Vallancey relates a different history of this superstition. "The old Irish," he says, "say, that great part of Ireland was awallowed up by the sea, and that the sunken part often rises, and is frequently to be see on the horizon from the Northern coast. On the North-west of the island they call this enchanted country Tir Hadi, or the city of Hud, believing that the city stands there which once possessed all the riches of the world, and that its key lies buried under some druidical monument. When Mr. Burton, in 1765, went io search of the Ogham monument, called Conane's Tomh, on Callan mountain, the people could not be convinced that the search was made after an inscription, but insisted that he was seeking after an Enchanted Key that lay buried with the Hero, and which, when found, would restore the Enchanted City to its former splendor, and convert the moory heights of Callan mountein into rich and fruitful plains. They expect great riche: wheoever this city is discovered."

This enchanted country is celled O Breasil, or O Brazil, which, according to General Vallancey's interpretation, signifies the Royal Island. He says it is evidently the lost eity of Arabian Story, visited by their fabulous prophet Heud, — the City and Paradise of Irem ! He compares this tradition with the remarks of Whitchnest on the Giant's Causeway, and suspeets that it refors to the lost Atlantis, which Whitehurst thinks perhaps existed there.

Is that remarkable phenomenon, known in Sicily by the name of Morgaine le Fay's works, ever witnessed on the coast of Ireland? If so, the superstition is explained by on actual apparition. I had not, when this note was written, seen Mr. Lathan's account of a similar phenomenon at Hastings, (Phil. Trans. 1798.) which completely establishes what I had here conjectured. Mr. Nicholson, in his remarks on it, says the same thing has been seen from Brondstairs, and that these appearances are much more frequent and general than has usually been supposed.

In his crystal Ark, Whither sail'd Merlin with his band of Bards,

Old Merlin, master of the mystic lore? - XI. p. 347, col. 1.

The name of Merlin has been so canonized by Ariosto and our diviner Spenser, that it would have been a heresy in poetry to have altered it to its genuine orthography.

Merddin was the berd of Emrys Wledig, the Ambrosius of Saxon history, by whose command he erected Stonehenge, in memory of the Plot of the Long Knives, when, by the treachery of Gwrytheyrn, or Vortigern, out the Saxons, three hundred British chiefs were measured. He built it on the site of a former Circle. The structure itself affords proof that it cannot have been raised much earlier, inasmuch as it deviates from the original principle of Bardic circles, where no appearance of art was to be edmitted. Those of Avebury, Stanton-Drew, Keswick, &c. exemplify this. It is colled by the Welsh Guaith Emrys, the work of Anhrosias. Drayton's reproach, therefore, is ill founded.

Ill did those mighty men to trust thee with their story,

Thou hast forgot Ucir names, who reared thee for their glory.

The Welsh traditions say that Merddin made a House of Glass, in which he went to sea, accompanied by the Nine Cylvoirdl Bards, and was never heard of more. This was one of the Three disappearances from the isle of Britain. Merddin is also one of the Three principal Christian Bards of Britain; Merddin Wyllt and Taliesin are the other two. — Cambrian Biography.

A diving House of Glass is also introduced in the Spanish Romance of Alexander, written about the middle of the 13th century, by Joan Lorenzo Segura de Astorga.

> Unas facianas suclen les gentes retruer, Non yaz en escrito, è es grave de creer; Si es verdat o non, yo non he y que veer, Pero no lo quiero en olvido poner.

Dicen que por saber que facen los pescados, Como viven los chicos entre los mas granados, Fizo cubu de vidrio con puntos bien cerrados, Metios en ella dentro con dos de sus criados.

Estos furon catados de todos los meiores, Por tal que non oviessen dona los tracdores, Ca que el o que ellos avrien aguardadores, Non farien d sus guisas los malos revoltores.

Fu de bona betume la cuba aguisada, Fu con bonas cadenas bien presa è caltada, Fu con priegos firmes à las naves pregada, Que fonder non se podicese è estodiesse colgada.

Mando que quinze dias lo derassen hy durar, Las naves con todesto pensassen de lost andor, Assaz podrie en esto saber e mesurar, Metria en escrito los secretos del mar. Lu cuba fue fecha en quel Rey acia, A los unos pesaba, à los otros placia: Bien cuidaban algunos que nunca ende saldria. Mas destaiado era que en mar non moriria.

Andabal bon Rey en su casa cerrada, Seia grant corazon en angosta posada; Veia toda la mar de pescados poblada, No es bestia nel siegle que non fus y trobada.

Non vive en el mundo nenguna creatura Que non cria la mar semejante figura; Traen enemizades entre si por natura, Los fuertes a los flacos danles mala ventura.

Estonce vio el Rey en aquellas andadas Como echan los unos a los otros celadas Dicen que ende furon presas è sossacadas, Furon desent aca por el sieglo usadas.

Tanto se acogien al Rey los pescados Como si los ovies el Rey por subiugados, Venien fasta la cuba todos cabezcolgados, Tremian todos antel como mozos moiades.

Juraba Alexandre per lo su diestro llado, Que nunca fura domes meior accompannado : De los pueblos del mar tovose por pagado, Contaba que avie grant emperio ganado.

Otra facuana vio en essos pobladores, Vio que los maiores comien à los menores, Los chicos à los grandes tenienos por sennores, Maltraen los mas fuertes à los que sou menores

Diz el Rey, soberbia es en todolos lugares, Forcia es enua tierra è dentro ennos mares : Las aves essos mismo non se catan por pares, Dios confunda tal vicio que tien tantos lugares,

Nacio entre los angelos è fizo muchos caer, Arramólos Dos per la tierra, e dioles grant poder, La mesnada non puede su derecho aver Ascondio la cabeza, non osada parecer.

Quien mas puede mas foce, non de bien, mas de mal, Quien mas à aver mas quier, è morre por ganal ; Non veeria de su grado nengano so igual : Mal peccado, nenguno no es à Dios leal.

Las uves e las bestias, los omes, los pescados, Todos son entre si a bandos derramados; De vicio è de soberbia son todos entregados, Los flacos de los fuertes andan desafiados.

Se como sabel Rey bien todesto osmar, Quísiesse assinismo à derechas iulgar, Bien debie un poco su lengua referar, Que en tant fieras grandúas non quísiesse andar.

De su gradul Rey mas oviera estado Mas a sus criatones faciesles pesado; Temiendo la ocasion que suel venir privado, Sacaroulo bien ante del termino passado.

The sweet flow of language and metre in so early a poem is very remarkable; but no modern language can busst of monuments so early and so valuable as the Spanish. To attempt to versify this passage would be laborious and onprofitable. Its import is, that Alexander being desirous to see how the Fish lived, and in what manner the great Fish behaved to the little ones, ordered a vessel of glass to be made, and fastared with long chains to bis sbips, that it might not sink too deep. He entered it with two chosen servants, leaving orders that the ships should continue their conrese, and draw bim up at the end of fifteen days. The vessol had heen made perfectly watertight. He descended, and found the fish as carious to see him as he had been to see the fish. They erowded round his machine, and trembled befora him as if he had been their con queror, so that he thought he had acquired another empire. But Alexander perceived the same system of tyranny in the water as on the laod, the great eat the little, and the little eat the less; upon which tyranoy he made sundry moral observations, which would have come with more propriety from any other person than from himself. However, he observed the various devices which were used for catching fish, and which, in consequence of this discovery, have been used io the world ever since. His people were afraid some accident might happen, and drew him up long before the fifteen days were expired.

The Poet himself does not believe this story. "People say so," he says, "but it is not in writing, and it is a thing difficult to believe. It is not my business to examine whether it be true or not, but I do not choese to pass it over unnoticed." The same story was pointed out to me by Mr. Coleridge in one of the oldest German poems; and what is more remarkable, it is mentioned by one of the old Welsh Burds. — DAvIES'S Celtic Researches, p. 196. Jests, and the fictions of romance and superstition, seem to have travelled every where.
