Flathinnis. - XI. p. 347, col. 1.

Flath-innis, the Noble Island, lies surrounded with tempests in the Western Ocean. I fear the account of this Paradise is but apecryphal, as it rests upon the evidence of Macpherson, and has every internal mark of a modern fiction.

In former days there lived in Skerr * a magician \dagger of high renown. The blast of wind waited for his commands at the gate; he rode the tempest, and the troubled wave offered itself as a pillow for his repose. His eye followed the sun by day; his thoughts travelled from star to star in the season of night; he thirsted after things unseen; he sighed over the narrow circle which surrounded his days; he eften sat in silence beneath the sound of his groves; and he blamed the careless billows that rolled between him and the Green Isle of the West.

One day as the Magician of Skerr sat thoughtful upon a rock, a storm arose on the sea: a cloud under whose squally skirts the foaming waters complained, rushed suddenly inte the hay, and from its dark womb at once issued forth a boot, with its white sails bent to the wind, and hung around with a hundred moving cars. But it was destitute of mariners, itself sceming to live and move. An unusual terror seized the aged oagician; he heard a voice, though he saw oo human form. "Arise! heheld the boat of the herces! arise, and see the Green Isle of those who have passed away!"

He felt a strange force on his limbs; he saw up person; but he moved to the boat; immediately the wind changed; in the bosom of the cloud he sailed away. Seven days gleamed fainty round him, seven nights added their gloom to his darkness: his ears were stunned with shrill voices; the dull murmurs of winds passed him on either side; he slept not, but his eyes were not heavy; he ate not, but he was not hungry: on the eighth day the waves swelled into mountains; the boat was rocked violently from side to side; the dukness thickened around him, when a thousand voices at once cried aloud, The Isle! the Isle! The billows opened wide before him; the calm land of the departed rushed in light on his eyes.

It was not a light that dazzled, but a pure, distinguishing, and placid light, which called forth every object to view in their most perfect form. The isle spread large before him, like a pleasing dream of the soul, where distance fades not on the sight, where nearness fatigues not the eye. It had its gently-aloping hills of green, nor did they whelly want their clouds ; but the clouds were bright and transpareot, and each involved in its besom the source of a stream, - a beauteous stream, which, wandering down the steep, was like the faint notes of the half-touched harp to the distant ear. The valleys were open and free to the ocean ; trees leaded with leaves, which scarcely waved to the light breeze, were scattered on the green declivities and rising ground : the rude winds walked net on the mountain; no aterm took its course through the sky. All was calm and bright; the pure sun of Autumn shene from his blue sky on the fields ; he hastened not to the west for repose, nor was he seen to rise from the East : ha sits in his mid-day height, and looks obliquely on the Nebla Isle.

In each valley is its slow-moving stream; the pure waters swell over the hank, yet abstain from the fields; the showers disturb them not, nor are they lessened by the heat of the sun. On the rising hill are the halls of the departed — the high-reofed dwelling of the herees of old.

The departed, according to the Tale, retuined, in the midst of their happiness, a warm affection for their country and living friends. They sometimes visited the first; and by the latter, as the Bard expresses it, they were transiently seen in the hour of peril, and especially on the near approach of death; it was then that at midnight the death devoted, to use the words of the Tale, were suddenly awakened by a strange knocking at their gates; it was then that they heard the indistinct voice of their departed friends calling them away to the Noble Isle; "a sudden jay rushed in upon their minds, and that pleasing melancholy which looks forward to happiness in a distant land. — MACHMERSON'S Introduction to the History of Great Britain.

"The softer sex, among the Celts," he adds, " passed with their friends to the fortunate isles; their beauty increased with the change, and, to use the words of the Bard, they were ruddy lights in the Island of Joy."

And an emerald light

Pervades the green translucent element. - XI. p. 347, col. I.

I have supplied Merlin with light when he arrived at his world of Mermankind, but not for his submarine voyage; let Paracelsus do this.

" Urim and Thummim were the Philosopher's Stone, and it was this which gove light in the Ark.

"For God commanded Noah to make a clear light in the Ark, which some take for a window. But since the Text suith, Day and night shall no more cease; it seems it did then cease, and therefore there could be no exterior light.

"The Rabbis say, that the Hebrew word Zohar, which the Chaldees translate Neher, is only to be found in this place. Other Hebrew doctors believe it to have been a precious stone hung up in the Ark, which gave light to all living creatures therein. This the greatest carbunele could not do, nor any precious stone which is only natural. But the Universal Spirit, fixed in a transparent body, shines like the suu in glory, and this was the light which God commanded Noah to make." — PARACELEUS "Urim and Thummin.

Was one of the bravest, wisest, most liberal, and most celebrated of the princes of South Wales – He is thus praised in the Pentarchia : —

> Quis queat heroem calamo describere tantum, Quantus ut ipse fuit, modo civibus Hectoris tustar, Fortis in hostiles modo turmas instar Achillis. Ultus avos patria fere sezaginta per annos, Quot fusas acies, quot castra recepta, quot urbes, Spes patria, columen pacis, luz urbis et orbis, Gentis honos, decus armorum, fulmenque duelli, Quo neque pace prior, neque fortior alter in armis.

In Hearne's Collection of Curious Discourses, are these funeral verses upon Lord Rhys, as preserved by Camdon :----

Nobile Cambrensis cecidit diadema decoris, Hoc est Rhesus obiil, Cambria tota genit. Subtrahitur, sed non moritur, quiu semper habetur Ipsius egregium nomen in orbe nonum. Hie tegitur, sed detegitur, quia fama perennis Non sinit illustrem voce latere ducem Excessit probitate modum, sensu probitatem, Eloquio sensum, moribus eloquium.

Rhys ap Gryffith, say the Chronicles, was no less remarkable in courage, than in the stature and lineaments of his body wherein he exceeded most men. — Royal Tribes.

Beavers. - XII. p. 348, col. 1.

When Giraldus Cambrensis wrete, that is, at the time whereaf the poem treats, the only Beavers remaining in Wales or England were in the Towy. Inter universos Cambria, seu etum Loegrie fluxios, solus hie (Trivi) castores habet.

The Beaver is mentioned also in the laws of Hoel Dha, and ene of those dark deep resting-places or pits of the river Conwey, which the Spaaiards call the renansos del rio, is called the Beavers' pool.

Goagan of Powys-land. -- XII. p. 349, col. 1.

Properly Gwgan; but I have adapted the orthography to an English eye. This very cheracteristic story is to be found, es narrated in the poem, in Mr. Yorke's curious work upen the Royel Tribes of Wales. Gwgan's demand was for five pounds, instead of ten marks; this is the only liberty I have taken with the fact, except that of fitting it to the business of the poem, by the last part of Rhys's reply. The ill humor in which the Lord of Dinvawr confesses the messenger had surprised him, is mentioned more bluntly by the historian. "Gwgan found him in a foriens temper, beating his servants ond hanging his dogs," I have not lest the character of the anecdote, by relating the cause of his enger, instead of the effects.

A large tract of fenny country, called Cantrev y Gwaeled, the Lowland Canton, was, about the year 500, inundated hy the sea; for Seithenyn, in a fit of drunkenness, let the sea through the dams which secured it. He is therefore distinguished, with Geraint and Gwrtheyrn, under the appellation of the Three arrant Drunkards. This district, which forms the present Cardigan Bay, contained sixteen principal towns of the Cymry, the inhabitants of which, who survived the inundation, fled into the mountainous parts of Meirion end Arvon, which were till then nearly uncultivated. Gwyddno Garanhir, one of the petty Princes, whose territories were thus destroyed, was a poet. There were lately (and I helieve, says Edmund Williams, are still) to be seen in the sands of this hay large stones with inscriptions on them, the characters Roman, but the language unknown. E. WILLIAMS's Poems, -Cambrian Biography.

The two other arrent Drunkerds were both Princes; the one set fire to the standing corn in his country, and so occasioned a famine; Gwrtheyrn, the other, is the Vortigern of Saxon history, thus distinguished for ceding the 1sle of Thanet, in his drunkenness, as the price of Rowena. This worthless King is also recorded as one of the Three disgraceful men of the Island, and one of the Three treacnerous conspirators, whose families were forever divested of privilege. — Camsrian Biography.

Bardsey. - XIII. p. 349, col. 2.

"This little island," says Giraldus, "is inhabited by cernin monks of exceeding piety, whom they call Culdees, (Calibes vel Colideos.) This wonderful property it hath, either from the salubrity of its air, which it partakes with the shores of Ireland, or rather from some miracle by reason of the merits of the Saints, that diseases are rarely known there, and seldom or never does any one die till worn out hy old age. Infinite numbers of Saints are huried there."

Like a broad shield, the coracle was hung. - XIII. p. 350, col. 2.

"The corecles are generally five feet and a half long and four broad, their bottom is a little rounded, and their shape nearly oval. These boats are ribbed with light laths, or spli twigs, in the manner of basket-work, and are covered with a raw hide or strong canvass, pitched in such a mode as to prevent their leaking; a seat crosses just above the centre, towards the breader end; they seldem weigh more than between 20 and 30 pennds. The men paddle them with one hand while they fish with the other, and when their work is completed, they throw the coracles over their shealders, and without difficulty return with them heme.

"Riding through Abergwilly we saw several of these phenomena resting with their bettems upwards against the houses, and resembling the shells of so many enormeus turtles; and indeed a traveller, at the first view of a coracle on the shoulders of a fisherman, might fancy he saw a tortoise walking on his hinder legs." — WINDHAM.

Andrew Marvell, in his poem culled "Appleton House," describes the coracle as then used in Yorkshire : --

And now the selmen-fishers moist Their leathern beats begin to hoist; And, like Antipedes in shoes, Have shod their heads in their cances.

How Torteise-like, hut not so slow, These rational amphihii gn ! Let's in; for the dark hemisphere Dees now like ene of them appear.

The Saxon pirates ventured to sea in vessels of basket-work covered with skins: they were used also by the ancient Spaciards; perhaps the coracle succeeded the cance, implying more skill than is necessary to scoop out a tree, or hellow it with fire, and less than is required to build a beat. The beats of bark, which the savages of Canada use, ore equally ingenieus, and pessess the same advontages.

Prince Hoel's lay of love. -- XIV. p. 352, cel. 2.

Eight poems by Prince Hoel are preserved : they are here given in Mr. Owen's translation.

My choice is a lady, elegant, slender, and fair, whose lengthened white form is seen through the thin hlue veil; and my choicest faculty is to muse on superior female excellence, when she with diffidence atters the hecoming sentiment; and my choicest participation is to become united with the maid, and to share mutual confidence as to thoughts and fortune. I choose the bright he of the spreading wave, thou who at the most discreet in thy country, with thy pure Welsh speech, chosen by me art thou; what am I with thee? how? dost thou refrain from speaking? ah! thy silence even is fair! I have chosen a maid, so that with me there should be no hesitation; it is right to choose the choicest fair one; choose, fair maid ?

I love the white glittering walls on the side of the bank, clothed in fresh verdancy, where bashfulness loves to observe the modest sea-mew's course; it would be my delight, though I have met with no great return of love in my much-desired visit on the sleek white steed, to behold my sister of flippant smile; to talk of love since it has come to my lot; to restore my ease of mind, and to renew her slighted troth with the nymph as fair as the hue of the shore-beating wave.

From her country, who is hright as the coldly-drifted snow upon the lofty hill, a censure has come to us, that I should be so treated with disdain in the Hall of Ogyrvan.

Playful, from her promise was new-born expectation; she is gone with my soul away: I am made wretched ! - Am I not become for love like Garwy Hir to the fair one of whom I am debarred in the Hallof Ogyrvan!

I love the castle of prond workmanship in the Cyvylci, where my own assuming form is wont to intrude: the high of renown, in full bustle, seek admittance there, and hy it speaks the mad resounding wave.

It is the chosen place of a luminary of splendid qualities and fair; glorious her rising from the verge of the torrent, and the fair one shines upon the now progressive year, in the its fair landscape, its dales, its water, and its vales, its white wild of Arvon, in the Snowdonian hills.

The tent does not attract; the glossy silk is not looked on oy her I love, with passing tenderness : if her conquest could be wrought by the muse's aid, ere the night that comes, I should next to her be found.

I have harnessed thee to-day, my steed of shining gray; 1 will traverse on thee the fair region of Cynlas; and I will hold a hard dispute before death shall cut me off in obstructing sleep, and thus obstructing health; and on me it has been a sign, no longer being the honored youth, the complexion is like the pule blue waves.

Oppressed with longing is my memory in society; regret for her by whom 1 am hated; whilst I confer on the maid the honored eulogy; she, to prosper pain, deigns not to return the consolation of the slightest grace.

Broken is my heart! my portion is regret, caused by the form of a slender lady, with a girdle of ruddy gold; my treatment is not deserved, she is not this day where my appointed place was fixed. Son of the God of Heaven! if before a promise of forbearance she goes away, we to me that 1 am not slain

When the ravens rejoice, when blood is hastening, when the gore runs bubbling, when the war doth rage, when the houses redden in Ruzlau, when the red hall is hurning, when we glow with wrath; the ruddy flame it blazes up to heaven; our abode affords no shelter; end plainly is the bright conflagration seen from the white walls upon the shore of Menai

They perished on the third day of May, three hundred ships of a fleet roving the ocean; and ten hundred times the number the sword would put to flight, leaving not a single heard on Menai.

Five evening tides were celebrated when France wes saved, when barbarian chiefs were made to fly, when there was pressure round the steel-chad bodies; should a weapon yet be brandished round the heard, a public trumph would my wrath procure, scouring the bounds of Loegyr, and on her habitation hurling ruin; there should be the hand of the hastening host upon the cross, the keen edge slaughtering, the blade recking with blood, the blood hue over the abject throng, a blood veil hiding its place of falling, and a plain of blood, and a cheek suffused with gore.

I love the time of summer; then the gladly-exulting steed of the werrior prances before a gallant chief; the wave is crowned with foam; the limb of the active more quickly moves; the apple-tree has arrayed itself in another livery; bordered with white is my shield on my shoulder, prepared for violence. I have loved, with ardency of desire, the object which I have not obtained.

Ceridwen, fair and tall, of slowly languid gait, her complexion view with the warm dawn in the evening hour, of a splendid delicate form, beautifully mild and white hued presence; in stepping over a rush oaerly fulling seems the little tiny fair one; gentle in her air, she appears hut scarcely older than a tenth year infant. Young, shapely, and full of gracefulness, it were a congenial virtue thet she should freely give ; but the youthful female does more emharmas good fortune by a suile, than an expression from her lips checks impertinence.

A wurshipping pilgrim, she will send me to the celestial presence; how long shall I worship thee? stop and think of thine office! If I am unskilful through the dotage of love, Jeaus, the well-informed, will not rebuke me.

Fair foam-crowned wave, spraying over the sacred tomb of Ruvon the brave, the chief of princes, behold this day I love the utmost hate of England, a flat and unergetic land, with a race involved in every wile. I love the spot that gave me the much-desired gift of mead, where the seas extend a tedions conflict. I love the society and thick inhabitants therein, and which, obedient to its lord, directs its view to peace. I love the sea-coast and its mountains, its city bordering on its forest, its fair landscape, its dales, its water, and its vales, its white sea-mews, and its becuteous women. I love its warriors and its well-trained steeds, its woods, its strong-holds, and its social domicil. I love its fields clothed with tender trefoil, where I had the glory of a mighty triumph. I love its cultivated regions, the prerogative of heroism, and its far-extended wild, and its sports of the chase, which, Son of God. have been great and wonderful: how sleek the melodious deer, and in what plenty found ! I achieved by the push of a spear au excellent deed between the chief of Powys and happy Gwynez, and upon the pale-hued element of ever-struggling motion may I eccomplish a liberation from exile. I will not take breath until my party comes; a dream dechares it, and God wills it to he so, fair foam-crowned wave spraying over the grave.

Fair foam-crowned wave, impetuous in thy course, like in color to the hoer when it accumulates; I love the sea-coast in Meirionyz, where I have had a white arm for a pillow. 1 love the nightingale upon the privet-brake in Cymmer Denzur, a celebrated vale. Lord of heaven and earth, the glory of the blest, though so far it is from Ceri to Caerhwelyz, I mounted the yellow steed, and from Maelienyz reached the land of Reged between the uight and day. Before I am in the grave, may I enjoy a new blessing from the land of Tegyngyl of fairest aspect! Since I am a love-wight, one inured to wander, may God direct my fate, fair foam-crowned wave of impetuous course!

I will implore the Divine Supreme, the wonderful in subjugating to his will, as king, to create an excelling muse for a song of preise to the women, such as Merzin sung, who have claimed my bardic lore so long, who are so tardy in dispensing grace. The most eminent in all the west I name, from the gates of Chester to the port of Ysgewin : The first is the nymph who will be the subject of universal praise, Gwenliant, whose complexion is like the summer's day. The second is another of high state, far from my embrace, adorned with golden necklace, fair Gweirvyl, from whom nor token nor confidence have I obtained, nor has any of my race; though I might be slain by two-edged blades, she whose foster brother was a king, should he my theme. And next for the handsome Gwladys, the young and modest virgin, the idol of the multitude, I utter the secret sigh; I will worship her with the yellow blossoms of the furze. Soon may I see my vigor rouse to combat, and in my hand my blade, bright Leucu, my companion, laughing, and whose husband laughs not from anxiety. Great anxiety oppresses me, makes me sad; and longing, alas ! is habitual for fair Nest, for her who is like the apple-tree blossom ; and for Perwewr, the centre of my desire ; for Generys the chaste, who grants not a smile for me ; may continence not overcome her! for Hunyz, whose fame will last till the day of doom; for Hawis, who claims my choicest eulogy. On a memorable day 1 had a nymph; 1 had a second, more he their pruise ; I had a third and a fourth with prosperity; I had a fifth of those with a skin white and delicate; I had a sixth bright and fair, avoiding not the temptation, above the white walls did she arrest me ; I hed a seventh, and this was saticty of love; I had eight in recompeuse for a little of the praise which I sung; but the teeth most opportunely har the tongue.

Even as Owen in his deeds Disowned the Church when living, even so The Church disowned him dead. — XV. p. 354, col. 2.

Owen Gwyneth was buried at Bangor. When Baldwin, Archhishop of Canterbury, coming to preach the crusade against the Saracens, saw his tomb, he charged the Bishop to remove the body out of the Cathedral, when he could find a fit opportunity so to do; in regard that Archbishop Becket had excommunicated him heretofore, because he had married his first cousin, the daughter of Grono ah Edwyn, and that notwithstanding he had continued to live with her till she died. The Bishop, in obedience to the charge, made a passage from the valut through the south wall of the church, under ground, and so secretly shoved the body into the churchyard. — ROYAL TAIRES. From the HENGWAR MS.

One of the first things we asked to see was the tomb of Potenkin All Europe has heard that he was buried in Cherson; and a magnificent sepulchire might naturally be expected for a person so renowned. The reader will imagine our surprise, when, in answer to our inquiries concerning his remains, we were told that no one knew what was become of them.

Potemkin, the illustrious, the powerful, of all the princes that ever lived the most princely, of all imperial favorites the most favoreal, had not a spot which might be called his grave. He, who not only governed all Russia, but even made the haughty Catherine his suppliant, had not the distinction possessed by the humblest of the human race. The particulars respecting the ultimate disposal of his body, as they were communicated to me upon the spot, on the most credible testimony, merit eursory detail.

The corpse, suon after his death, was brought to Cherson, and placed beneath a dome of the small church helonging to the fortress opposite to the altar. After the usual ceremony of interment, the vault was covered, merely hy restoring to their former situation the planks of wood belonging to the floor of the huilding. Many inhabitants of Cherson, as well as English officers in the Russian service, who resided in the neighborhood, had seen the coffin: this was extremely ordiranry; but the practice of showing it to strangers prevailed for some years after Potenkin's decease. The Empress Catherine either had, or preteuded to have, an intention of erecting a speth monument to his memory; whether at Cherson or elsewhere, is unknown. Her sudden death is believed to have prevented the completion of this design.

The most extraordinary part of the story remains now to be related: the coffin itself has disappeared: instead of any answer to the various inquiries we made concerning it, we were cautioned to be silent. No one, sail a countryman of ours, living in the place, dares to mention the name of Potenkin. At length we received intelligence that the verger could satisfy our curiosity, if we would venture to ask him.

We soon found the means of encouraging a little communication on his part ; and were then told, that the body, by the Emperor Paul's command, had been taken up, and thrown into the ditch of the fortress. These orders were implicitly obeyed. A hole was dug in the fosse, into which his remains were thrown with as little ceremony as if they were those of a dead dog ; but this procedure taking place during the night, very few were informed of the disposal of the body. An eyewitness of the fact assured me that the coffin no longer existed in the vault where it was originally placed; and the Verger was actually proceeding to point out the place where the body was abandoned, when the Bishop himself, happening to arrive, took away my guide, and with menaces but too likely to be fulfilled, prevented our being more fully informed concerning the obloquy at present involving Potemkin. -CLARKE's Trurels, vol. i. p. 602.

PART II.

MADOC IN AZTLAN.

THE RETURN TO AZTLAN.

Now go your way, ye gallant company ; God and good Angels gnard ye as ye go ! Blow fairly, Winds of Heaven ! Ye Ocean Waves, Swell not in anger to that fated fleet ! For not of conquest greedy nor of gold, Seek they the distant world. — Blow fairly, Winds ' Waft, Waves of Ocean, well your blessed load !

Fair blew the Winds, and safely did the Wavea Bear that beloved charge. It were a tale Would rouse adventurous courage in a boy, Making him long to be a mariner, That he might rove the main, if I should tell How pleasanty, for many a summer day, Over the sunny sea, with wind at will, Prince Madoc sail'd; and of those happy Isles, Which, had he seen ere that appointed storm Drove southward his slope course, there he had pitch'd

His tent, and blest his lot that it had fallen In land so fair; and human blood had reek'd Daily on Aztlan's devilish altars still. But other doom was his, more ardnous toil

Yet to achieve, worse danger to endure, Worse evil to be quell'd, and higher good Which passeth not away educed from ill; Whereof all unforesceing, yet for all Prepared at heart, he over ocean sails, Wafted by gentle winds o'er gentle waves, As if the elements combined to serve The perfect Prince, by God and man beloved. And now how joyfully he views the land, Skirting like morning clouds the dusky sea ! With what a searching eye recalls to mind Foreland, and creek, and cape ! how happy now Up the great river bends at last his way !

No watchman had been station'd on the height To seek his sails, - for with Cadwallon's hope Too much of doubt was blended and of fear: Yet thitherward, whene'er he walk'd abroad, His face, as if instinctively, was turn'd; And duly, morn and eve, Lincoya there, As though religion led his duteous feet, Went up to gaze. He on a staff had scored The promised moons and days; and many a time Counting again its often-told account, So to beguile impatience, day by day Smooth'd off with more delight the daily notch. But now that the appointed time was nigh, Did that perpetual presence of his hope Haunt him, and mingle with his sleep, and mar The natural rest, and trouble him by day, That all his pleasure was at earliest light To take his station, and at latest eve, If he might see the sails where, far away, Through wide savannahs roll'd the silver stream. Oh, then with what a sudden start his blood Flow'd from its quicken'd spring, when far away He spied the glittering topsails ! For a while Distrustful of that happy sight, till now Slowly he sees them rise, and wind along Through wide savannahs up the silver stream. Then with a breathless speed he flies to spread The joy; and with Cadwallon now descends, And drives adown the tide the light canoe, And mounts the vessel-side, and once again Falls at the Ocean Lord's beloved feet.

First of the general weal did Madoc ask ; Cadwallon answer'd, All as yet is well, And by this seasonable aid secured, Will well remain, — Thy father? quoth the Prinee. Even so, replied Cadwallon, as that eye Of hesitation augurs, — fallen asleep. The good old man remember'd thee in death, And blest thee ere he died.

By this the shores And heights were throng'd ; from hill to hill, from rock

To rock, the shouts of welcome rung around. Forward they press to view the man beloved, Britons and Hoamen with one common joy Hailing their common friend. Happy that day Was he who heard his name from Madoc's voice; Happy who met the greeting of his eye; Yea, happy he who shared his general smile, Amid the unacknowledged multitude.

Caermadoc - by that name Cadwallon's love Call'd it in memory of the absent Prince-Stood in a mountain vale, by rocks and heights, A natural bulwark, girt. A rocky stream, Which from the fells came down, there spread itself Into a quiet lake, to compass which Had been a two hours' pleasurable toil; And he, who from a well-strung bow could send His shaft across, had needs a sinewy arm, And might from many an archer, far and near Have borne away the bell. Here had the Chief Chosen his abiding-place, for strength preferr'd, Where vainly might a host in equal arms Attempt the difficult entrance; and for all That could delight the eye and heart of man ; Whate'er of beauty or of usefulness Heart could desire, or eye behold, being here. What he had found an idle wilderness Now gave rich increase to the husbandmen, For Heaven had blest their labor. Flourishing He left the happy vale ; and now he saw More fields reclaim'd, more habitations rear'd, More harvests rising round. The reptile race, And every beast of rapine, had retired From man's asserted empire; and the sound Of axe, and dashing oar, and fisher's net, And song-beguiling toil, and pastoral pipe, Were heard, where late the solitary hills Gave only to the mountain-cataract Their wild response.

Here, Urien, cried the Prince, These craggy heights and overhanging groves Will make thee think of Gwyneth. And this hut, Rejoin'd Cadwallon, with its roof of reeds, Goervyl, is our palace : it was built With lighter labor than Aberfraw's towers; Yet, Lady, safer are its wattled sides Than Mona's kingly walls.— Like Gwyneth, said he? Oh no! we neighbor nearer to the Sun,

Oh no! we neighbor nearer to the Sun, And with a more benignant eye the Lord Of Light beholds us here.

So thus did they Cheerfully welcome to their new abode These, who, albeit aweary of their way, And glad to reach at length the place of rest, Felt their hearts overborden'd, and their eyes Ready to overflow. Yet not the less The buzz of busy joy was heard around, Where every dwelling had its guest, and all Gave the long eve to hospitable mirth.

But when the Lord of Ocean from the stir And tumult was retired, Cadwallon then Thus render'd his account.

The Prinee replied, I did but hear a broken tale. Tell on !

mong the Gods of yon unhappy race, calipoca as the chief they rank, with the Chief co-equal; Maker he, l Master of created things esteem'd. sits upon a throne of trophied skulls, eous and huge; a shield is on his arm, l with his hlack right hand he lifts, as though wrath, the menacing spear. His festival, all this wicked nation's wicked rites, h most solemnity, and circumstance, pomp of hellish piety, is held. m all whom evil fortune hath subdued their inhuman thraldom, they select a whom they judge, for comely countenance, shapely form, and all good natural gifts, rthiest to be the victim; and for this s young Lincoya chosen, being in truth flower of all his nation. For twelve months, ir custom is, that this appointed youth as the Idol's living image held. b'd therefore like the Demon Deity, ene'er he goes abroad, an antic train h music and with dance attend his way; crowd before him fall and worship him; l those infernal Priests who guard him then, be their victim and their feast at last, norning and at evening incense him, d mock him with knee-reverence. Twenty days ore the bloody festival arrive, twere to make the wretch in love with life, r maids, the loveliest of the land, are given pousals. With Lincoya all these rites y were kept; and at the stated time, r maids, the loveliest of the land, were his. hese was one, whom even at that hour learnt to love, so excellently good s she; and she loved him and pitied him. is the daughter of an aged Priest; tentimes have seen her; and in truth, apared with Britain's maids, so beautiful, with the dark-eyed daughters of the South, would be lovely still. Her cotton vest s to the knee, and leaves her olive arms e in their beauty; loose, luxuriant, long, v the black tresses of her glossy hair; is her eye's jet lustre; and her voice!oul which harbor'd evil never breathed h winning tones.

Thou know'st how manfully These tribes, as if insensible to pain, Welcome their death in battle, or in bonds Defy their torturers. To Lincoya's mind Long preparation now had made his fate Familiar; and, he says, the thought of death Broke not his sleep, nor mingled with his dreams, Till Coätel was his. But then it woke; — It hung, — it press'd upon him like a weight On one who scarce can struggle with the waves; And when her soul was full of tenderness, That thought recurring to her, she would rest Her check on his, and weep.

The day drew nigh;	Had then been offer'd up, and secret yows
And now the eve of sacrifice was come	Vow'd with mysterious horror: That but late,
What will not woman, gentle woman, dare,	When to her father of the days to come
When strong affection stirs her spirit up?	She spake, and of Lincoya and her lot
She gather'd herbs, which, like our poppy, bear	Among the strangers, he had frown'd, and strove,
The seed of sleep, and with the temple-food	Beneath dissembled anger, to conceal
Mingled their power; herself partook the food,	Visible grief. She knew not what to fear;
So best to lull suspicion; and the youth,	But something dreadful surely was at hand,
Instructed well, when all were laid asleep,	And she was wretched.
Fled far away.	When I heard these things,
After our eonquering arms	Yuhidthiton and the Priest Helhua
Had freed the Hoamen from their wretched yoke,	Were in our dwellings. Them I call'd apart -
Lincoya needed but his Coatel	There should be peace between us, I began;
To fill his sum of earthly happiness.	Why is it otherwise?
Her to the temple had her father's vow	The Priest replied,
Awhile devoted, and some moons were still	1s there not peace, Cadwallon? Seek we not
To pass away, ere yet she might become	More frequent and more friendly intercourse,
A sojourner with us, Lincoya's wife,	Even we, the servants of our Country-Gods,
When from the Paba's wiles his watchful mind	Whose worship ye have changed, and for whose
Foreboded ill. He hade me take good heed,	sake
And fear the sudden kindness of a foe.	We were, and would have been, your enemies?
I started at his words; - these artful men,	But as those Gods have otherwise ordain'd,
Hostile at heart, as well we knew they were,	Do we obey. Why, therefore, is this doubt?
These were lip-lavish of their friendship now,
And courted confidence, while our tried friend	The Power who led us hither, I replied, r, I replied, Over the world of waters, who hath saved, And who will save his people, warns me now. Then on Yuhidthiton I fix'd my eye. Danger is near! I eried; I know it near! It comes from Aztlan.

His disorder'd cheek, And the forced and steady boldness of his eye, Which in defiance met the look it fear'd, Confess'd the crime. I saw his inward shame; Yet with a pride like angry innocence Did he make answer, 1 am in your hands, And you believe me treacherons ! - Kill me now !

Not so, Yuhidthiton ! not so ! quoth I ; You were the Strangers' friend, and yet again That wisdom may return. We are not changed ; -Lovers of peace, we know, when danger comes, To make the evil on the guilty head Fall heavily and sure ! With our good arms, And our good cause, and that Almighty One, We are enough, had we no other aid, We of Caermadoe here, to put to shame Aztlan, with all her strength and all her wiles. But even now is Madoe on the seas; He leads our brethren here; and should he find That Aztlan hath been false, - oh ! hope not then, By force or fraud, to baffle or elude Inevitable vengeance ! While ye may, Look to your choice; for we are friends or foes, Even to your own desert.

So saying, I left The astonish'd men, whose unprovided minds Fail'd them; nor did they aim at answer more, But homeward went their way. Nor knew I then -

For this was but a thing of yesterday -How near the help I boasted. Now I trust Thy coming shall discomfit all their wiles.

Young Malinal had from the hour of peace Been our in-dweller, studious to attain Our language and our arts. To him I told My doubts, assured of his true love and truth; For he had learnt to understand and feel Our holy faith, and tended like a son Cynetha's drooping age, and shared with me His dying benediction. He, thus long Intent on better things, had been estranged From Aztlan and her councils; but at this He judged it for ber welfare and for ours, Now to resume his rank ; - belike his voice Might yet be heard, or, if the worst befell,

His timely warning save us from the snare.

Yuhidthiton, estranged, a seldom guest,

Of twilight voices, nor the unholy cloud

this?

Sullen and joyless, seem'd to bear at heart Something that rankled there. These things were

The omens too had ceased; - we heard no more

Steam'd from the morning incense. Why was

But in their secret councils Malinal No longer bore a part; the Chiefs and King Yielding blind reverence to the Pabas now, Deluded or dismay'd. He sent to say, Some treachery was design'd, and bade me charge His brother with the crime. On that same day, Lincoya came from Aztlan; he had found Coatel laboring with a wretchedness She did not seek to hide; and when the youth Reveal'd his fear, he saw her tawny eheek Whiten, and round his neck she clung and wept. She told him something dreadful was at hand, She knew not what: That, in the dead of night, Coanocotzin at Mexitli's shrine Had stood with all his nobles; human blood

NEOLIN.

Nor yet at rest, my Sister! quoth the Prince, As at her dwelling-door he saw the Maid Sit gazing on that lovely moonlight seene : — To bed, Goervyl. Dearest, what hast thou To keep thee wakeful here at this late hour, When even I shall bid a truce to thought, And lay me down in peace? — Good night, Goervyl!

Dear sister mine, - my own dear mother's child !

She rose, and bending on with lifted arms, Met the fond kiss, obedient then withdrew. Yet could not he so lightly as he ween'd Lay wakeful thoughts aside; for he foresaw Long strife and hard adventure to achieve, And forms of danger vague disturb'd his dreams.

Early at morn the colonists arose; Some pitch the tent-pole, and pin down the lines That stretch the o'er-awning eanvass; to the wood Others, with saw, and axe, and bill, for stakes And undergrowth to weave the wicker walls; These to the ships, with whom Cadwallon sends The Elk and Bison, broken to the yoke.

Ere noon Erillyab and her son arrived, To greet the Chief. She wore no longer now The lank, loose locks of careless widowhood; Her braided tresses round her brow were bound, Bedeck'd with tnfts of gray and silvery plumes, Pluck'd from the eagle's pennons. She, with eye And countenance which spake no feign'd delight, Welcomed her great deliverer. But her son Had Nature character'd so legibly, That, when his tongue told fair, his face bewray'd The lurking falsehood; sullen, slow of speech, Savage, down-looking, dark, that at his words Of welcome, Madoc in his heart conceived Instinctive ennity.

In a happy hour Did the Great Spirit, said Erillyab, Give bidding to the Winds to speed thee here ! For this I made my prayer; and when He sent For the Beloved Teacher, to restore him Eyesight and youth, of him I then besought, As he had been thy friend and ours on earth, That he would intercede. - Brother, we know That the Great Spirit loves thee; He hath blest Thy going and thy coming, and thy friends Have prosper'd for thy sake; and now, when first The Powers of Evil do begin to work, Lo! thou art here ! - Brother, we have obeyed Thy will, and the Beloved Teacher's words Have been our law; but now the Evil Ones Cry out for blood, and say they are athirst, And threaten vengeance. I have brought the Priest To whom they spake in darkness -- Thou art wise, And the great Spirit will enlighten thee ; -We know not what to answer - Tell thy tale, Neolin !

Hereat did Madoc fix upon him A searching eye; but he, no whit abash'd, Began with firm effrontery his speech. The Feast of the Departed is at hand, And I, in preparation, on the Field Of the Spirit past the night. It came to me In darkness, after midnight, when the moon Was gone, and all the stars were blotted out; It gather'd round me, with a noise of storms, And enter'd into me, and I could feel It was the Snake-God roll'd and writhed within; And I, too, with the inward agony, Roll'd like a snake, and writhed. Give ! give ! he eried :

I thirst ! — His voice was in me, and it burnt Like fire, and all my flesh and bones were shaken; Till, with a throe which seem'd to rend my joints Asunder, he past forth, and I was left, Speechless and motionless, gasping for breath.

Then Madoc, turning to Ayayaea, Inquired, Who is the man? — The good old Priest Replied, He hath attended from his youth The Snake-God's temple, and received for him His offerings, and perform'd his sacrifice, Till the Belov'd Teacher made ns leave The wicked way.

Hear me ! quoth Neolin, With antic gesture and lond vehemence; Before this generation, and before These ancient forests,— yea, before yon lake Was hollow'd out, or one snow-feather fell On yonder mountain-top, now never bare, — Before these things I was, — where, or from whence, I know not,— who ean tell? But then I was,

And in the shadow of the Spirit stood ; And I beheld the Spirit, and in him Saw all things, even as they were to be; And I held commune with him, not of words, But thought with thought. Then was it given me That I should choose my station when my hour Of mortal birth was come, - hunter, or chief, Or to be mightiest in the work of war, Or in the shadow of the Spirit live, And He in me. According to my choice, Forever, overshadow'd by his power, I walk among mankind. At times I feel not The burden of his presence; then am 1 Like other men; but when the season comes, Or if I seek the visitation, then He fills me, and my soul is carried on, And then do I forelive the race of men, So that the things that will be, are to me Past.

Amalahta lifted then his eyes A moment; --- It is true, he cried; we know He is a gifted man, and wise beyond The reach of mortal powers. Ayayaca Hath also heard the warning.

As I slept,

Replied the aged Priest, upon the Field Of the Spirit, a loud voice awaken'd me, Crying, I thirst! Give,—give! or I will take! And then I heard a hiss, as if a snake

Were threatening at my side. — But saw you nothing?

Quoth Madoc. — Nothing; for the night was dark. And felt you nothing? said the Ocean Prince. He answered, Nothing; only sudden fear. — No inward struggle, like possession? — None. I thought of the Beloved Teacher's words, And cross'd myself, and then he had no power.

Thou hast slept heretofore upon the Field, Said Madoc; didst thon never witness voice, Or ominous sound? Ayayaca replied, Certes the Field is holy ! it receives, All the year long, the operative power Which falleth from the sky, or from below Pervades the earth; no harvest groweth there, Nor tree, nor bush, nor herb, is left to spring; But there, the virtue of the elements Is gathered, till the eircle of the months Be full; then, when the Priest, by mystic rites, Long vigils, and long abstinence prepared, Goeth there to pass the appointed night alone, The whole collected influence enters him. Doubt not but I have felt strange impulses On that mysterious Field, and in my dreams Been visited; and have heard sounds in the air, I knew not what; - but words articulate Never till now. It was the Wicked One ! He wanted blood.

Who says the Wicked One? It was our fathers' God! cried Neolin. Sons of the Ocean, why should we forsake The worship of our fathers? Ye obey The White Man's Maker; but to us was given A different skin, and speech, and land, and law. The Snake-God understands the Red Man's prayer, And knows his wants, and loves him. Shame be to us,

That since the Stranger here set foot among us, We have let his lips be dry !

Enough! replied Madoc, who, at Cadwallon's look, repress'd His answering anger. We will hold a talk Of this hereafter. Be ye sure, meantime, That the Great Spirit will from Evil Powers Protect his people. This, too, be ye sure, That every deed of darkness shall be brought To light, — and woe be to the lying lips!

IV.

AMALAHTA.

Soon as the coming of the fleet was known, Had Queen Erillyab sent her hunters forth. They from the forest now arrive, with store Of venison; fires are built before the tents, Where Llaian and Goervyl for their guests Direct the feast; and now the ready board With grateful odor steams. Bnt while they sat At meat, did Amalahta many a time Lift his slow eye askance, and eagerly Gaze on Goervyl's beauty; for whate'er In man he might have thought deformed or strange Seemed beautiful in her, - her golden curls, Bright eyes of heavenly blue, and that clear skin, Blooming with health, and youth, and happiness. He, lightly yielding to the impulse, bent His head aside, and to Erillyab spake; Mother, said he, tell them to give to me That woman for my wife, that we may be Brethren and friends. She, in the same low tone, Rebuked him, in her heart too well aware How far unworthy he. Abash'd thereby, As he not yet had wholly shaken off Habitual reverence, he sat sullenly, Brooding in silence his imagined wilcs, By sight of beauty made more apt for ill; For he himself being evil, good in him Work'd evil.

And now Madoc, pouring forth The ripe metheglin, to Erillyab gave The horn of silver brim. Taste, Queen and friend, Said he, what from our father-land we bring, The old beloved beverage. Sparingly Drink, for it hath a strength to stir the brain, And trouble reason, if intemperate lips Abuse its potency. She took the horn, And sipp'd with wary wisdom.— Canst thou teach us

The art of this rare beverage? quoth the Queen, Or is the gift reserved for ye alone, By the Great Spirit, who hath favor'd ye In all things above us? - The Chief replied, All that we know of useful and of good Ye also shall be taught, that we may be One people. While he spake, Erillyab past The horn to Amalahta. Sparingly ! Madoc exclaim'd; but when the savage felt The luscious flavor, and the poignant life, He heeded nought beyond the immediate joy. Deep did he drink, and still with elinehing hands Struggled, when from his lips, unsatisfied, Erillyab pluck'd the horn with sharp reproof, Chiding his stubborn wilfulness. Erelong The generous liquor flush'd him : he could feel His blood play faster, and the joyful dance Of animal life within him. Bolder grown, He at Goervyl lifts no longer now The secret glance, but gloats with greedy eye; Till, at the long and loathsome look abash'd, She rose, and nearer to her brother drew, On light pretence of speech, being half in fear. But he, regardless of Erillyab now, To Madoe cried aloud, Thou art a King, And I a King !- Give me thy sister there, To be my wife, and then we will be friends, And reign together.

Let me answer him, Madoc! Cadwallon cried. I better know Their language, and will set aside all hope, Yet not incense the savage. — A great thing, Prinee Amalahta, hast thou ask'd! said he. Nor is it in Lord Madoc's power to give, Or to withhold; for marriage is with us The holiest ordinance of God, whereop The bliss or bane of human life depends. Love must be won by love, and heart to heart

Link'd in mysterious sympathy, before And on Priest Neolin; they plot against us; We pledge the marriage-vow; and some there are, Your fall and mine do they alike conspire, Who hold, that, e'er we enter into life, Being leagued with Aztlan to destroy us both. Soul hath with soul been mated, each for each Thy son will not remember that his lips Especially ordain'd. Prince Madoc's will Have let the treason pass. Be wary then, Avails not, therefore, where this secret bond And we shall eatch the crafty in the pit Hath not been framed in Heaven. Which they have dug for us. The skilful speech Erillyab east Which, with wild faith and reason, thus confirm'd, A look of anger, made intense by grief, Yet temper'd the denial, for a while On Amalahta. - Cursed be the hour Silenced him, and he sat in moody dreams Wherein I gave thee birth ! she eried; that pain Was light to what thy base and brutal nature Of snares and violence. Soon a drunken thirst, And longing for the luscious beverage, Hath sent into my soul. - But take thou heed! Drove those dark thoughts aside. More drink ! I have borne many a woe and many a loss, quoth he. My father's realm, the husband of my youth, Give me the drink ! - Madoe again repeats My hope in thee ! - All motherly love is gone, His warning, and again with look and voice Sufferance wellnigh worn out. Erillyab chides; but he of all restraint When she had eeased, Still the deep feeling fill'd her, and her eye Impatient, eries alond, Am I a child? Give ! give ! or I will take ! - Perchance ye think Dwelt on him, still in thought. Brother ! she eried, I and my God alike ery ont in vain ! As Madoe would have soothed her, doubt not me But ye shall find us true ! Mine is no feeble heart. Abundantly Give him the horn! Did the Great Spirit overpay all woes, Cadwallon answer'd; there will eome upon him And this the heaviest, when he sent thee here, The friend and the deliverer. Evil tongues Folly and sleep, and then an after-pain, Which may bring wisdom with it, if he learn May seatter lies; bad spirits and bad men Therefrom to heed our warning .- As thou say'st, May league against thy life ; but go thon on, No child art thou ! - the choice is in thy hand; -Brother ! He loves thee, and will be thy shield. Drink, if thou wilt, and suffer, and in pain Remember us. He elineh'd the horn, and swill'd The sweet intoxication copious down. V. So had grew worse. The potent draught provoked Fierce pride and savage insolence. Ay! now WAR DENOUNCED. It seems that I have taught ye who I am ! The inebriate wretch exclaim'd. This land is mine, Thus is the day, when, in a foreign grave, Not hers; the kingdom and the power are mine; King Owen's relies shall be laid to rest. 1 am the master! No bright emblazonries bedeek'd his bier, Hath it made thee mad? No tapers blazed, no prelate sung the mass, No choristers the funeral dirge intoned, Erillyab eried. - Ask thou the Snake-God that ! Quoth he; ask Neolin and Aztlan that! No mitred abbots, and no tonsured train, [me Hear me, thou Son of the Waters! wilt thou have Lengthen'd the pomp of ceremonious woe. For friend or foe? - Give me that woman there, His decent bier was with white linen spread And store me with this blessed beverage, And canopied; two elks and bisons yoked And thou shalt dwell in my domains, - or else, Drew on the ear ; foremost Cadwallon bore Blood ! blood ! The Snake-God calls for blood ; the The Crucifix; with single voice distinct, The good priest Llorien chanted loud and deep Gods The solemn sevice; Madoe next the bier Of Aztlan and the people call for blood; They call on me, and I will give them blood, Follow'd his father's corpse ; bareheaded then 'Fill they have had their fill. Came all the people, silently and slow. Meanwhile the Queen In wonder and amazement heard, and grief; The burial-place was in a grassy plat, A little level glade of snnny green, Watching the fiendish workings of his face, And turning to the Prince at times, as if Between the river and a rocky bank, She look'd to him for comfort. Give him drink, To be at peace ! quoth Madoc. The good mead Which, like a buttress, from the precipice Of naked rock sloped out. On either side 'Twas skirted by the woodlands. A stone cross Did its good office soon; his dizzy eyes Roll'd with a sleepy swim; the joyous thrill Stood on Cynetha's grave, sole monument, Died away; and as every limb relax'd, Beneath a single cocoa, whose straight trunk Down sunk his heavy head, and down he fell. Rose like an obelisk, and waved on high Then said the Prince, We must rejoice in this, Its palmy plumage, green and never sere. O Queen and friend, that, evil though it be, Here by Cynetha's side, with Christian prayers, Evil is brought to light; he hath divulged, All wrongs forgotten now, was Owen laid. In this mad mood, what else hath been conceal'd Rest, King of Gwyneth, in a foreign grave! By guilty eunning. Set a watch upon him, From foul indignity of Romish pride

Rest in the kingdom of thy noble son !

Ambassadors from Aztlan in the vale Awaited their return, —Yuhidthiton, Chief of the Chiefs, and Helhua the Priest; With these came Malinal. They met the Prince, And with a sullen stateliness return'd His salutation; then the Chief began: Lord of the Strangers, hear me! by my voice The People, and the Pabas, and the King Of Aztlan speak. Our injured Gods have elaim'd Their wonted worship, and made manifest Their wonted worship, and made manifest Their wrath; we dare not impiouly provoke The Dreadful. Worship ye in your own way; But we must keep the path our fathers kept.

We parted, O Yuhidthiton ! as friends And brethren, said the Christian Prince ; — alas, That this should be our meeting ! When we pledged,

In the broad daylight and the eye of Heaven, Our hands in peace, ye heard the will of God, And felt, and understood. This calm assent Ye would belie, by midnight miracles Scared, and such signs of darkness as beseem The Demons whom ye dread; or, likelier, Duped by the eraft of those accursed men, Whose trade is blood. Ask thou of thine own heart, Yuhidthiton, —

But Helhua broke his speech: Our bidding is to tell thee, quoth the Priest, That Aztlan hath restored, and will maintain, Her aneient faith. If it offendeth thee, Move thou thy dwelling-place !

Madoe replied,

This day have I deposited in earth My father's bones; and where his bones are laid, There mine shall moulder.

Malinal at that Advanced ;-Prince Madoc, said the youth, I come, True to thy faith and thee, and to the weal Of Aztlan true, and bearing, for that truth, Reproach and shame, and scorn and obloquy. In sorrow come 1 here, a banish'd man; Here take, in sorrow, my abiding-place, Cut off from all my kin, from all old ties Divorced; all dear familiar countenances No longer to be present to my sight; The very mother-language which I learn'd, A lisping baby on my mother's knees, No more with its sweet sounds to comfort me. So be it! - To his brother then he turn'd; Yuhidthiton, said he, when thou shalt find --As find thou wilt - that those accursed men Have played the juggler with thee, and deceived Thine honest heart, - when Aztlan groans in blood, -

Bid her remember then, that Malinal Is in the dwellings of her enemy; Where all his hope in banishment hath been To intercede for her, and heal her wounds, And mitigate her righteous punishment. Sternly and sullenly his brother heard; Yet hearken'd he as one whose heart perforce Suppress'd its instinct; and there might be seen A sorrow in his silent stubbornness. And now his ministers on either hand A water-vessel fill, and heap dry sedge And straw before his face, and fire the pile. He, looking upward, spread his arms and eried, Hear me, ye Gods of Aztlan, as we were, And are, and will be yours! Behold your foes! He stoop'd, and lifted up one ample urn,— Thus let their blood be shed!— and far away He whirl'd the scattering water. Then again Raised the full vase,— Thus let their lives be quench'd!

And out he pour'd it on the flaming pile.

The steam-cloud, hissing from the extinguish'r heap,

Spread like a mist, and ere it melted off, Homeward the heralds of the war had turn'd.

V1.

THE FESTIVAL OF THE DEAD.

THE Hoamen in their Council-hall are met To hold the Feast of Souls; seat above seat, Ranged round the circling theatre they sit. No light but from the central fire, whose smoke, Slow passing through the over aperture, Excludes the day, and fills the conic roof, And hangs above them like a cloud. Around, The ghastly bodies of their chiefs are hung, Shrivell'd and parch'd by heat; the humbler dead Lie on the floor, - white bones, exposed to view, On deer, or elk-skin laid, or softer fur, Or web, the work of many a mournful hour; The loathlier forms of fresh mortality Swathed, and in decent tenderness conceal'd. Beside each body pious gifts are laid, Mantle, and belt, and feathery eoronal, The bow he used in war, his drinking shell, His arrows for the chase, the sarbaean, Through whose long tube the slender shaft, breath driven, [wives, Might pierce the winged game. Husbands and Parents and children, there in death they lie; The widow'd, and the parent, and the child, Look on in silence. Not a sound is heard But of the crackling brand, or mouldering fire, Or when, amid yon pendent string of shells, The slow wind wakes a shrill and feeble sound, -A sound of sorrow to the mind attuned By sights of woe.

Ayayaea at length

Came forward: — Spirits, is it well with ye? Is it well, Brethren? said the aged Priest; Have ye received your mourning, and the rites Of righteous grief? or round your dwelling-place Still do your shadows roam dissatisfied, And to the cries of wailing wee return A voice of lamentation? Teach us now, If we in aught have fail'd, that I, your Priese,

When I shall join ye soon, - as soon I must, -May unimpeded pass the perilous floods, And in the Country of the Dead, be hail'd By you with song, and dance, and grateful joy.

So saying, to the Oracle he turn'd, Awaiting there the silence which implied Peaceful assent. Against the eastern wall, Fronting the narrow portal's winding way, An Image stood . a cloak of fur disguised The rude proportion of its unconth limbs; The skull of some old seer of days of old Topp'd it, and with a visor this was mask'd, Honoring the oracular Spirit, who at times There took his resting-place. Ayayaca Repeated, Brethren, is it well with ye? And raised the visor. But he started back, Appall'd and shuddering; for a moony light Lay in its eyeless sockets, and there came From its immovable and bony jaws A long, deep groan, thrice utter'd, and thrice felt In every heart of all the hearers round. The good old Priest stood tottering, like a man Stricken with palsy; and he gazed with eyes Of asking horror round, as if he look'd For counsel in that fear. But Neolin Sprung boldly to the Oracle, and cried, Speak, Spirit! tell us of our sin, and teach The atonement! A sepulchral voice replied, Ye have for other Gods forsaken us, And we abandon you !--- and crash with that, The Image fell.

A loud and hideous shrick, As of a demon, Neolin set up; So wild a yell, that, even in that hour, It brought fresh terror to the startled ear. While yet they sat, pale and irresolute, Helhua the Azteca came in. He bore A shield and arrow, - symbols these of war, Yet now beheld with hope, so great relief They felt his human presence.

Hoamen, hear me! The messenger began; Erillyab, hear, Priests, Elders, People ! but hear chiefly thou, Prince Amalahta, as of these by birth, So now of years mature, the rightful Lord !-Shall it be peace or war? - thus Aztlan saith; She, in her anger, from the land will root The Children of the Sea; but viewing you In merey, to your former vassalage Invites ye, and remits the tribute lives, And for rebellion claimeth no revenge.

Oh, praise your Gods! cried Neolin, and hail This day-spring of new hope ! Aztlan remits The tribute lives, - what more could Madoc give? She claimeth no revenge, and if she claimed, He could not save. O Hoamen, bless your Gods; Appease them ! Thou, Prince Amalahta, speak, And seize the mercy. Amalahta stood

In act of speech; but then Erillyab rose, -Who gives thee, Boy, this Elder's privilege? The Queen exclaim'd; - and thou, Priest Neolin, This Priest of Aztlan, whose insidious tongue

Curb thou thy traitorous tongue! The reign is mine :

I hold it from my father, he from his; Age before age, beyond the memory Of man it hath been thus. My father fell In battle for his people, and his sons Fell by his side; they perish'd, but their names Are with the names we love, - their happy souls Pursue in fields of bliss the shadowy deer; The spirit of that noble blood which ran From their death-wounds, is in the ruddy clouds Which go before the Sun, when he comes forth In glory. Last of that illustrions race Was I, Erillyab. Ye remember well, Elders, that day when I assembled here The people, and demanded at their choice The worthiest, to perpetnate our old line Of Kings and Warriors. - To the wind he spread His black and blood-red banner. Even now, I hear his war-drum's tripled sound, that call'd The youth to battle; even now behold The hope which lit his dark and fiery eye, And kindled with a sunnier glow his cheek. As he from yonder war-pole, in his pride, Took the death-doers down. -- Lo, here the bones Of King Tepollomi ! - my husband's bones ! -There should be some among ye who beheld, When, all with arrows quill'd, and clothed with blood As with a purple garment, he sustain'd The unequal conflict, till the Aztecas Took him at vantage, and their monarch's club Let loose his struggling soul. Look, Hoamen, here, See through how wide a wound his spirit fled ! Twenty long years of mournful widowhood Have past away; so long have I maintain'd The little empire left us, loving well My people, and by them as well beloved. Say, Hoamen, am I still your Queen? At once

The whole assembly rose with one acclaim, ---Still, O Erillyab, O Beloved, rule Thy own beloved people !

But the Gods¹

Cried Amalahta, - but the Oracle ! The Oracle ! quoth she ; what hath it said That forty years of suffering hath not taught This wretched people ?- They abandon us?-So let them go! Where were they at that hour, When, like a blasting night-wind in the spring, The multitudes of Aztlan came upon us? Where were they when my father went to war? Where were they when thy father's stiffen'd corpse, Even after death a slave, held up the lamp To light his conqueror's revels? - Think not, Boy, To palter with me thus! A fire may tremble Within the sockets of a skull, and groans May issue from a dead man's fleshless jaws, And images may fall, and yet no God Be there ! - If it had walk'd abroad with life, That had indeed been something !

Then she turn'd Her voice toward the people. - Ye have heard

For this brave anger ! - In your name I take The war-gift !

Gods of Aztlan, Helhua cried, As to Erillyab's ready hand he gave The deadly symbol, in your name I give The war-gift! Ye have thirsted over-long; Take now your fill of blood!— He turn'd away, And Queen Erillyab bade the tribe fulfil Their customary rites.

Each family Bore its own dead, and to the general grave, With melancholy song and sob of woe, The slow procession moves. The general grave Was delved within a deep and shady dell, Fronting a cavern in the rock, — the scene Of many a bloody rite, ere Madoc came, — A temple, as they deem'd, by Nature made, Where the Snake-Idol stood. On fur and cloth Of woven grass, they lay their burdens down, Within the ample pit; their offerings range Beside, and piously a portion take Of that cold earth, to which forever now Consign'd, they leave their fathers, dust to dust; Sad relie that, and wise remembrancer.

But as with bark and resinous boughs they pile The sepulchre, suddenly Neolin Sprung up aloft, and shriek'd, as one who treads Upon a viper in his heedless path. The God! the very God! he cried, and howl'd One long, shrill, piereing, modulated ery; Whereat from that dark temple issued forth A Serpent, huge and hideous. On he came, Straight to the sound, and curl'd around the Priest His mighty folds innocuous, overtopping His human height, and arching down his head, Songht in the hands of Neolin for food; Then questing, rear'd, and stretch'd, and waved his neck,

And glanced his forky tongue. Who then had seen

The man, with what triumphant fearlessness, Arms, thighs, and neck, and body, wreathed and ring'd

In those tremendous folds, he stood secure, Play'd with the reptile's jaws, and call'd for food, Food for the present God!— who then had seen The fiendish joy which fired his countenance, Might well have ween'd that he had summoned up The dreadful monster from its native Hell, By devilish power, himself a Fiend inflesh'd.

for the God! he cried; Lincoya's blood! of the Serpent's foe. - Lincova's blood ! malahta, and the people turn'd yes to seek the victim, as if each his own safety in that saerifice. crillyab raised her voice, confused, confounded; she alone exclaim'd, shall answer this! Unheard her voice bewilder'd people, by the Priest ed; and Lincoya sure had fallen tim of their fear, had he been found In that wild hour; but when his watchful eye Beheld the Serpent from his den come forth, He fled to bear the tidings. - Neolin Repeats the accursed call, Food for the God ! Ayayaca, his unbelieving Priest! At once all eager eyes were fix'd on him, But he came forward calmly at the call; Lo! here am I! quoth he; and from his head Plucking the thin gray hairs, he dealt them round — Countrymen, kinsmen, brethren, children, take These in remembrance of me! there will be No relic of your aged Priest but this. From manhood to old age, full threescore years, Have I been your true servant : fit it is That I, who witness'd Aztlan's first assault, Should perish her last victim ! - and he moved Towards the death. But then Erillyab Seized him, and by the garment drew him back !--By the Great Spirit, but he shall not die ! The Queen exclaim'd; nor shalt thou triumph thus, Liar and traitor ! Hoamen, to your homes ! Madoe shall answer this!

Irresolute

They heard, and inobedient; to obey Fearing, yet fearful to remain. Anon, The Queen repeats her bidding, To your homes, My people !- But when Neolin perceived The growing stir and motion of the crowd, As from the outward ring they moved away, He utter'd a new cry, and disentangling The passive reptile's folds, rush'd out among them, With outstretch'd hands, like one possess'd, to seize His victim. Then they fled; for who could tell On whom the madman, in that hellish fit, Might cast the lot? An eight-years' boy he seized, And held him by the leg, and, whirling him In ritual dance, till breath and sense were gone, Set up the death-song of the sacrifice. Amalahta, and what others rooted love Of evil leagued with him, accomplices In treason, join'd the death-song and the dance

Some, too, there were, believing what they fear'd, Who yielded to their old idolatry,

And mingled in the worship. Round and round The accursed minister of murder whirl'd

His senseless victim; they, too, round and round In maddening motion, and with maddening cries Revolving, whirl'd and wheel'd. At length, when now,

According to old rites, he should have dash'd On the stone Idol's head the wretch's brains, Neolin stopp'd, and once again began The long, shrill, piercing, modulated cry. The Serpent knew the call, and, rolling on, Wave above wave, his rising length, advanced His open jaws: then, with the expected prey, Glides to the dark recesses of his den.

VII.

THE SNAKE-GOD.

MEANTIME Erillyab's messenger had girt His loins, and, like a roebuck, o'er the hills He sped. He met Cadwallon and the Prince In arms, so quickly Madoe had obey'd Lincoya's call; at noon he heard the call; And still the sun was riding high in heaven, When up the valley where the Hoamen dwelt He led his twenty spears. O welcome, friend And brother! cried the Queen. Even as thou saidst,

So hath it proved; and those accursed schemes Of treachery, which that wretched boy reveal'd Under the influence of thy potent drink, Have ripen'd to effect. From what a snare The timely warning saved me ! for, be sure, What 1 had seen I else should have believed, In utter fear confounded. The Great Spirit, Who taught thee to foresee the evil thing, Will give thee power to quell it.

On they went

Toward the dell, where now the Idolaters Had built their dedicated fire, and still With feast, and fits of song, and violent dance, Pursued their rites. When Neolin perceived The Prince approach, fearlessly he came forth, And raised his arm, and cried, Strangers, away ! Away, profane ! hence to your mother-land ! Hence to your waters ; for the God is here ;— He came for blood, and he shall have his fill ! Impious, away !

Seize him ! exclaim'd the Prince; Nor had he time for motion nor for flight, So instantly was that command obey'd. Hoamen, said Madoc, hear me ! — I came here Stranger alike to Aztlan and to you; I found ye an oppress'd and wretched race, Groaning beneath your chains; at your request, For your deliverance, I unsheathed the sword, Redeem'd ye from your bondage, and preserved Your children from the slaughter. With those foes Whose burden ye for forty years endured, This traitor hath conspired, against yourselves,

Your Queen, and me, your friend; the solemn faith Which in the face of yonder sun we pledged, Each to the other, this perfidious man Hath broken, and hath stain'd his hands this day With innocent blood. Life must atone for life; Ere I destroy the Serpent, whom his wiles Have train'd so well, last victim, he shall glut The monster's maw.

Strike, man! quoth Neolin. This is my consummation! the reward Of my true faith! the best that I could ask, The best the God could give :— to rest in him, Body with body be incorporate, Soul into soul absorb'd, and I and He One life, inseparable, for evermore. Strike; I am weary of this mortal part; Unite me to the God!

Triumphantly

He spake; the assembled people, at his words, With rising awe gazed on the miscreant; Madoe himself, when now he would have given The sign for death, in admiration paused; Such power hath fortitude. And he perceived The auspicious moment, and set up his ery. Forth, from the dark recesses of the cave, The Serpent came : the Hoamen at the sight Shouted, and they who held the Priest, appall'd, Relax'd their hold. On came the mighty Snake, And twined, in many a wreath, round Neolin, Darting aright, aleft, his sinuous neck, With searching eye, and lifted jaw, and tongue Quivering, and hiss as of a heavy shower Upon the summer woods. The Britons stood Astounded at the powerful reptile's bulk, And that strange sight. His girth was as of man, But easily could he have overtopp'd Goliath's helmed head, or that huge King Of Basan, hugest of the Anakim . What then was human strength, if once involved Within those dreadful coils? - The multitude Fell prone, and worshipp'd ; pale Erillyab grew, And turn'd upon the Prince a doubtful eye; The Britons too were pale, albeit they held Their spears protended; and they also look'd On Madoc, who the while stood silently Contemplating how wiseliest he might cope With that surpassing strength.

But Neolin,

Well hoping now success, when he had awed The general feeling thus, exclaim'd aloud -Blood for the God ! give him the Stranger's blood ! Avenge him on his foes! And then, perchance, Terror had urged them to some desperate deed, Had Madoe ponder'd more, or paused in act One moment. From the sacrificial flames He snatch'd a firebrand, and with fire and sword, Rush'd at the monster; back the monster drew His head upraised recoiling, and the Prince Smote Neolin; all circled as he was, And clipp'd in his false Deity's embrace, Smote he the accursed Priest; the avenging sword Fell on his neck ; through flesh and bone it drove Deep in the chest: the wretched criminal Totter'd, and those huge rings a moment held His bloody corpse upright, while Madoc struck

The Serpent: twice he struck him, and the sword Glanced from the impenetrable scales; nor more Avail'd its thrust, though driven by that strong arm; For on the unyielding skin the temper'd blade Bent. He sprung upward then, and in the eyes Of the huge monster flashed the fiery brand. Impatient of the smoke and burning, back The reptile wreathed, and from his loosening clasp Dropp'd the dead Neolin, and turn'd, and fled To his dark den.

The Hoamen, at that sight, Raised a loud wonder-cry, with one accord, Great is the Son of Ocean, and his God Is mightiest ! But Erillyab silently Approach'd the great Deliverer; her whole frame Trembled with strong emotion, and she took His hand, and gazed a moment earnestly, Having no power of speech, till with a gush Of tears her utterance came, and she exclaim'd, Blessed art thou, my brother! for the power Of God is in thee ! - and she would have kissed His hand in adoration ; but he cried, God is indeed with us, and in his name Will we complete the work !--- then to the cave Advanced, and call'd for fire. Bring fire ! quoth he ; By his own element this spawn of hell Shall perish! and he enter'd, to explore The cavern depths. Cadwallon follow'd him, Bearing in either hand a flaming brand ; For sword or spear avail'd not.

Far in the hill, Cave within cave, the ample grotto pierced, Fit vestibule Three chambers in the rock. The first to that wild temple, long and low, Shut out the outward day. The second vault Had its own daylight from a central chasm High in the hollow; here the Image stood, Their rude idolatry, -a sculptured snake, If term of art may such misshapen form Beseem, - around a human figure coil'd, And all begrimed with blood. The inmost cell Dark; and far up within its blackest depth They saw the Serpent's still small eye of fire. Not if they thinn'd the forest for their pile, Could they, with flame or suffocating smoke, Destroy him there; for through the open roof The clouds would pass away. They paused not long;

Drive him beneath the chasm, Cadwallon cricd, And hem him in with fire, and from above We crush him.

Forth they went, and climb'd the hill With all their people. Their united strength Loosen'd the rocks, and ranged them round the brink,

Impending. With Cadwallon on the height Ten Britons wait; ten with the Prince descend, And with a frebrand each in either hand, Enter the outer cave. Madoc advanced, And at the entrance of the inner den, He took his stand alone. A bow he bore, And arrows round whose heads dry tow was twined, In pine-gum dipp'd; he kindled these, and shot The fiery shafts. Upon the scaly skin, As on a rock, the bone-tipp'd arrows fell, But at their bright and blazing light effray'd, Out rush'd the reptile. Madoc from his path Retired against the side, and call'd his men, And in they came, and circled round the Snake , And shaking all their flames, as with a wheel Of fire, they ring'd him in. From side to side The monster turns !— where'er he turns, the flame Flares in his nostrils and his blinking eyes; Nor aught against the dreaded element Did that brute force avail, which could have crush'd Milo's young limbs, or Theban Hercules, Or old Manoah's mightier son, ere yet Shorn of his strength. They press him now, and now

Give back, here urging, and here yielding way, Till right beneath the chasm they centre him. At once the crags are loosed, and down they fall Thundering. They fell like thunder, but the crash Of scale and bone was heard. In agony The Serpent writhed beneath the blow; in vain, From under the incumbent load essay'd To drag his mangled folds. One heavier stone Fasten'd and flatten'd him; yet still, with tail Ten cubits long, he lash'd the air, and foined From side to side, and raised his raging head Above the height of man, though half his length Lay mntilate. Who then had felt the force Of that wild fury, little had to him Buckler or corselet profited, or mail, Or might of human arm. The Britons shrunk Beyond its arc of motion; but the Prince Took a long spear, and springing on the stone Which fix'd the monster down, provoked his rage. Uplifts the Snake his head retorted, high He lifts it over Madoc, then darts down To seize his prey. The Prince, with foot advanced, Inclines his body back, and points the spear With sure and certain aim, then drives it up, Into his open jaws; two cubits deep It pierced, the monster forcing on the wound. He closed his teeth for anguish, and bit short The ashen hilt. But not the rage which now Clangs all his scales, can from its seat dislodge The barbed shaft; nor those contortions wild, Nor those convulsive shudderings, nor the threes Which shake his inmost entrails, as with the air In suffocating gulps the monster now Inhales his own life-blood. The Prince descends; He lifts another lance; and now the Snake, Gasping, as if exhausted, on the ground Reclines his head one moment. Madoc seized That moment, planted in his eye the spear, Then setting foot upon his neck, drove down Through bone, and brain, and throat, and to the earth

Infixed the mortal weapon. Yet once more The Snake essay'd to rise; his dying strength Fail'd him, nor longer did those mighty folds Obey the moving impulse, crush'd and scotch'd; In every ring, through all his mangled length, The shrinking muscles quiver'd, then collapsed In death.

Cadwallon and his comrades now Enter the den; they roll away the crag Which held him down, pluck out the mortal spear,

Then drag him forth to day; the force conjoin'd
Of all the Britons difficultly drag
His lifeless bulk. But when the Hoamen saw
That form portentous trailing in its gore,
The jaws, which, in the morning, they had seen
Purpled with human blood, now in their own
Blackening, - aknee they fell before the Prince,
And in adoring admiration raised
Their hands with one accord, and all in fear
Worshipped the mighty Deicide. But he,
Recoiling from those sinful honors, cried,
Drag out the Idol now, and heap the fire,
That all may be consumed !
Forthwith they heap'd
The sacrificial fire, and on the pile
The Serpent, and the Image, and the corpse
Of Neolin were laid; with prompt supply
They feed the raging flames, hour after hour,
Till now the black and nauseous smoke is spent,
And mingled with the ruins of the pile,
The undistinguishable ashes lay.
Go! cried Prince Madoc, cast them in the stream,
And scatter them upon the winds, that so
No relic of this foul idolatry
Pollute the land. To-morrow meet me here,

Hoamen, and I will purify yon den

Of your abominations. Come ye here

With humble hearts; for ye, too, in the sight

Of the Great Spirit, the Beloved One,

Must be made pure, and cleansed from your offence,

And take upon yourselves his holy law.

VIII.

THE CONVERSION OF THE HOAMEN.

How beautiful, O Sun, is thine uprise, And on how fair a scene! Before the Cave The Elders of the Hoamen wait the will Of their Deliverer; ranged without their ring The tribe look on, thronging the narrow vale, And what of gradual rise the shelving combe Displayed, or steeper eminence of wood, Broken with crags and sunny slope of green, And grassy platform. With the Elders sat The Queen and Prince, their rank's prerogative, Excluded else for sex unfit, and youth For counsel immature. Before the arch. To that rude fane, rude portal, stands the Cross, By Madoc's hand victorious planted there. And lo, Prince Madoc comes! no longer mail'd In arms of mortal might; the spear and sword, The hauberk and the helmet laid aside, Gorget and gauntlet, greaves and shield, - he comes

In peaceful tunic clad, and mantle long; His hyacinthine locks now shadowing That face, which late, with iron overbrow'd, Struck from within the aventayle such awe And terror to the heart. Barcheaded he, Following the servant of the altar, leads The reverential train. Before them, raised On high, the sacred images are borne; There, in faint semblance, holiest Mary bends In virgin beauty o'er her babe divine, -A sight which almost to idolatry Might win the soul by love. But who can gaze Upon that other form, which on the rood In agony is stretch'd? - his hands transfix'd, And lacerate with the body's pendent weight; The black and deadly paleness of his face, Streak'd with the blood which from that crown of scorn Hath ceased to flow; the side-wound streaming still: And open still those eyes, from which the look Not yet hath pass'd away, that went to Heaven, When, in that hour, the Son of Man exclaim'd, Forgive them, for they know not what they do ! And now arrived before the cave, the train Halt: to the assembled elders, where they sat Ranged in half circle, Madoc then advanced, And raised, as if in act to speak, his hand. Thereat was every human sound suppress'd; And every quicken'd ear and eager eye Were centred on his lips. The Prince began, -Hoamen, friends, brethren, - friends we have been long, And brethren shall be, ere the day go down, --I come not here propounding doubtful things

For counsel, and deliberate resolve Of searching thought; but with authority From Heaven, to give the law, and to enforce Obedience. Ye shall worship God alone, The One Eternal. That Beloved One Ye shall not serve with offer'd fruits, or smoke Of sacrificial fire, or blood, or life; Far other sacrifice he claims, - a soul Resign'd, a will subdued, a heart made clean From all offence. Not for your lots on earth, Menial or mighty, slave or highly-born, For cunning in the chase, or strength in war, Shall ye be judged hereafter ; - as ye keep The law of love, as ye shall tame your wrath, Forego revenge, forgive your enemies, Do good to them that wrong ye, ye will find Your bliss or bale. This law came down from Heaven.

Lo, ye behold Him there by whom it came; The Spirit was in Him, and for the sins Of man He suffered thus, and by His death Must all mankind be blest. Not knowing Him, Ye wander'd on in error; knowing now, And not obeying, what was error once Is guilt and wilful wrong. If ever more Ye bow to your false deities the knee; If ever more ye worship them with feast, Or sacrifice, or dance; whoso offends Shall from among the people be cut off, Like a corrupted member, lest he taint The whole with death. With what appointed rites

Your homage must be paid, ye shall be tanght; Your children in the way that they shall go

Be train'd from childhood up. Make ye, meantime,

Your prayer to that Beloved One, who sees The secrets of all hearts; and set ye up This the memorial of his chosen Son, And Her, who, blessed among women, fed The Appointed at Her breast, and by His cross Endured intenser anguish; therefore sharing His glory now, with sunbeams robed, the Moon Her footstool, and a wreath of stars her crown.

Hoamen, ye deem us children of a race Mightier than ye, and wiser, and by Heaven Beloved and favor'd more. From this pure law Hath all proceeded, — wisdom, power, whate'er Here elevates the soul, and makes it ripe For higher powers and more exalted bliss. Share then our law, and be with us, on earth, Partakers of these blessings, and in Heaven, Co-heritors with us of endless joy.

Ere yet one breath or motion had disturb'd The reverential hush, Erillyab rose. My people, said the Queen, their God is best And mightiest. Him to whom we offered up Blood of our blood and of our flesh the flesh, Vainly we deem'd divine; no spirit he Of good or evil, by the conquering arm Of Madoc mortal proved. What then remains But that the blessing proffer'd thus in love, In love we take? — Deliverer, Teacher, Friend, First in the fellowship of faith I claim The initiatory rite.

I also, cried The venerable Priest Ayayaca, Old as I am, I also, like a child, Would learn this wisdom yet before I die. The Elders rose and answer'd, We and all ! And from the congregated tribe burst forth One universal shout, — Great is the God Of Madoc, — worthy to be served is He !

Then to the mountain rivulet, which roll'd Like amber over its dark bed of rock, Did Madoc lead Erillyab, in the name Of JESUS, to his Christian family Accepted now. On her and on her son, The Elders and the People, Llorien Sprinkled the sanctifying waters. Day Was scarcely two hours old when he began His work, and when he ceased, the sun had past The heights of noon. Ye saw that blessed work, Sons of the Cymry, Cadog, Deiniol, Padarn, and Teilo! ye whose sainted names Your monumental temples still record; Thou, David, still revered, who in the vale, Where, by old Hatteril's wintry torrents swollen, Rude Hodney rolls his raging stream, didst choose Thy hermit home; and ye who by the sword Of the fierce Saxon, when the bloodier Monk Urged on the work of murder, for your faith And freedom fell, - Martyrs and Saints, ye saw This triumph of the Cymry and the Cross, And struck your golden harps to hymns of joy.

IX.

TLALALA.

As now the rites were ended, Caradoc Came from the ships, leading an Azteca Guarded and bound. Prince Madoc, said the Bard, Lo! the first captive of our arms I bring. Alone, beside the river I had stray'd, When, from his lurking-place, the savage hurl'd A javelin. At the rustle of the reeds, From whence the blow was aim'd, I turn'd in time, And heard it whizz beside me. Well it was, That from the ships they saw and succor'd me; For, subtle as a serpent in my grasp, He seemed all joint and flexure; nor had I Armor to ward, nor weapon to offend, To battle all unused and unprepared; But I, too, here upon this barbarous land, Like Elmur and like Aronan of old, Must lift the ruddy spear.

This is no day For vengeance, answered Madoc, else his deed Had met no mercy. Freely let him go! Perchance the tidings of our triumph here May yet reclaim his country. - Azteca, Go, let your Pabas know that we have crush'd Their complots here; beneath our righteous sword The Priest and his false Deity have fallen; The idols are consumed, and, in their stead, The emblems of our holy faith set up, Whereof the Hoamen have this day been made Partakers. Say to Aztlan, when she, too, Will make her temples clean, and put away Her foul abominations, and accept The Christian Cross, that Madoc then accords Forgiveness for the past, and peace to come. This better part let her, of her free-will And wisdom, choose in time.

Till Madoc spake,

The captive reckless of his peril stood, Gazing with resolute and careless eye, As one in whom the lot of life or death Moved neither fear nor feeling; but that eye Now sparkling with defiance, — Seek ye peace ? He cried: O weak and woman-hearted man! Already wouldst thou lay the sword to rest? Not with the burial of the sword this strife Must end, for never doth the Tree of Peace Strike root and flourish, till the strong man is hand Upon his enemy's grave hath planted it. Come ye to Aztlan then in quest of peace? Ye feeble souls, if that be what ye seek, Fly hence! our Aztlan suffers on her soil No living stranger.

Do thy bidding, Chief! Calmly Cadwallon answered. To her choice Let Aztlan look, lest what she now reject In insolence of strength, she take upon her, In sorrow, and in suffering, and in shame, By strong compulsion, penitent too late. Thou hast beheld our ships with gallant men Freighted, a numerous force, — and for our arms, — Surely thy nation hath acquired of them Disastrous knowledge.

Curse upon your arms! Exclaim'd the savage: — Is there one among you Dare lay that cowardly advantage by, And meet me, man to man, in honest strife? That I might grapple with him, weaponless, On yonder rock, breast against breast, fair force Of limb, and breath, and bleod, — till one, or both, Dash'd down the shattering precipice, should feed The mountain eagle ! — Give me, I beseech you, That joy !

As wisely, said Cynetha's son, Thy foe might challenge thee, and bid thee let Thy strong right hand hang idle in the fray, That so his weakness with thy strength might cope In equal battle ! — Not in wrongful war, The tyrants of our weaker brethren, Wield we these dreadful arms, — but when assail'd By fraud and force, when call'd upon to aid The feeble and oppressed, shall we not Then put our terrors forth, and thunder-strike The guilty ?

Silently the Savage heard ; Joy brighten'd in his eyes, as they unloosed His bonds; he stretched his arms at length, to feel His liberty, and like a greyhound then Slipp'd from the leash, he bounded o'er the hills. What was from early morning till noon day The steady travel of a well-girt man, He with fleet feet and unfatiguable, In three short hours liath traversed; in the lake He plunged, now shooting forth his pointed arms, Arrow-like darting on ; recumbent now, Forces with springing feet his easier way ; Then with new speed, as freshen'd by repose, Again he breasts the water. On the shore Of Aztlan now he stands, and breathes at will, And wrings his dripping locks; then through the gate Pursued his way.

Green garlands deck the gate; Gay are the temples with green boughs affix'd ; The door-posts and the lintels hung with wreaths; The fire of sacrifice, with flames bedimm'd, Burns in the sun-light, pale ; the victims wait Around, impatient of their death delay'd. The Priest, before Tezealipoea's shrine, Watches the maize-strown threshold, to announce The footsteps of the God ; for this the day, When to his favor'd city he vouchsafes His annual presence, and, with unseen feet, Imprints the maize-strown threshold; follow'd soon By all whose altars with eternal fires Aztlan illumed, and fed with human blood ; --Mexitli, woman-born, who from the womb, Child of no mortal sire, leap'd terrible, The arm'd avenger of his mother's fame ; And he whose will the subject winds obey, Quetzalcoal; and Tlaloc, Water-God, And all the host of Deities, whose power Requites with bounty Aztlan's pious zeal, Health and rich increase giving to her sons, And withering in the war her enemies.

Green-garlanded, the temples green with boughs, The door-posts and the lintels hung with wreaths; And yonder victims, ranged around the fire, Are destin'd, with the steam of saerifice, To greet their dreadful coming.

With the train Of warrior Chiefs Coanacotzin stood, That when the Priest proclaim'd the enter'd God, His lips before the present Deity Might pour effectual prayer. The assembled Chiefs Saw Tlalala approach, more welcome now, As one whose absence from the appointed rites Had waken'd fear and wonder. - Think not ye, The youth exclaim'd, eareless impiety Could this day lead me wandering. I went forth To dip my javelin in the Strangers' blood -A sacrifice, methought, our Gods had loved To seent, and sooner hasten'd to enjoy. I fail'd, and fell a prisoner; but their fear Released me - coward fear, or childish hope, That, like Yuhidthiton, I might become Their friend, and merit chastisement from Heaven, Pleading the Strangers' cause. They bade me go And proffer peace. - Chiefs, were it possible That tongue of mine could win you to that shame, Out would I pluck the member, though my soul Followed its bloody roots. The Stranger finds No peace in Aztlan, but the peace of death !

"Tis bravely said ! Yuhidthiton replied, And fairly mayst thou boast, young Tlalala, For thou art brave in battle. Yet 'twere well If that same fearless tongue were taught to check Its boyish lieense now. No law forbade Our friendship with the Stranger, when my voice Pleaded for proffered peace; that fault I shared In common with the King, and with the Chiefs, The Pabas, and the People, none foreseeing Danger or guilt; but when at length the Gods Made evident their wrath in prodigies, I yielded to their manifested will My prompt obedience. - Bravely hast thou said, And brave thou art, young Tiger of the War ! But thou hast dealt with other enemies Than these impenetrable men, - with foes, Whose conquered Gods lie idle in their chains, And with tame weakness brook captivity. When thou hast met the Strangers in the fight, And in the doings of that fight outdone Yuhidthiton, revile him then for one Slow to defend his country and his faith; Till then, with reverence, as beseems thy youtb Respect thou his full fame !

I wrong it not! I wrong it not! eried the young Azteea; But truly, as I hope to equal it, Honor thy well-earn'd glory. — But this peace ! — Renounce it! — say that it shall never be ! — Never, — as long as there are Gods in Heaven, Or men in Aztlan !

And all the host of Deities, whose power
Requites with bounty Aztlan's pious zeal,
Health and rich increase giving to her sons,
And withering in the war her enemies.The Gods themselves have answer'd. Never yet
By holier ardor were our countrymen
Possess'd; peace-offerings of repentance fill.
The temple courts; from every voice ascends

The contrite prayer; daily the victim's heart Sends its propitiatory steam to Heaven; And if the aid divine may be procured By the most dread solemnitics of faith, And rigor of severest penitence, Soon shall the present influence strengthen us, And Aztlan be triumphant.

While they spake, The ceaseless sound of song and instrument Rung through the air, now rising like the voice Of angry ocean, now subsiding soft, As when the breeze of evening dies away. The horn, and shrill-toned pipe, and drum, that gave

Its music to the hand, and hollow'd wood, Drum-like, whose thunders, ever and anon, Commingling with the sea-shell's spiral roar, Closed the full harmony. And now the eve Past on, and, through the twilight visible, The frequent fire-flies' brightening beauties shone. Anxious and often now the Priest inspects The maize-strown threshold; for the wonted hour Was come, and yet no footstep of the God ! More radiant now the fire of sacrifice, Fed to full fury, blazed; and its red smoke Imparted to the darker atmosphere Such obscure light, as, o'er Vesuvio seen, Or pillared upon Etna's mountain-head, Makes darkness dreadful. In the captives' cheeks Then might a livid paleness have been seen, And wilder terror in their ghastly eyes, Expecting momently the pang of death. Soon in the multitude a doubt arose,

Which none durst mention, lest his neighbor's fears, Divulged, should strengthen his; — the hour was past,

And yet no foot had mark'd the sprinkled maize !

X.

THE ARRIVAL OF THE GODS.

Now every moment gave their doubts new force, And every wondering eye disclosed the fear Which on the tongue was trembling, when to the Emaciate like some bare anatomy, [King, And deadly pale, Tezozomoe was led, By two supporting Priests. Ten painful months, Immured amid the forest had he dwelt, In abstinence and solitary prayer Passing his nights and days : thus did the Gods From their High Priest exact, when they enforced, By danger or distress, the penance due For public sins; and he had dwelt ten months, Praying and fasting, and in solitude, Till now might every bone of his lean limbs Be told, and in his starved and bony face The living eye appeared unnatural, -A ghostly sight.

In breathless eagerness The multitude drew round as he began, — O King, the Gods of Aztlan are not come; They will not come before the Strangers' blood Smoke on their altars; but they have beheld My days of prayer, and nights of watchfulness, And fasts austere, and bloody disciplines, And have reveal'd their pleasure. Who is here, Who to the White King's dwelling-place dare go, And execute their will?

Scarce had he said, When Tlalala exclaim'd, I am the man.

Hear then ! Tezozomoc replied. - Ye know That self-denial and long penance purge The film and foulness of mortality, For more immediate intercourse with Heaven Preparing the pure spirit; and all eyes May witness that with no relaxing zeal I have perform'd my duty. Much I fear'd For Aztlan's sins, and oft, in bitterness, Have groan'd and bled for her iniquity; But chiefly for this solemn day the fear Was strong upon me, lest her Deities, Estranged, should turn away, and we be left A spiritless and God-abandoned race, A warning to the earth. Ten weary months Have the raw maize and running water been My only food; but not a grain of maize Hath stay'd the gnawing appetite, nor drop Of water cool'd my parch'd and painful tongue, Since yester-morn arose. Fasting I pray'd, And, praying, gash'd myself; and all night long, I watch'd, and wept, and supplicated Heaven, Till the weak flesh, its life-blood almost drain'd, Sunk with the long austerity: a dread Of death eame over me; a deathy chill Ran through my veins, and loosen'd every limb; Dim grew mine eyes; and I could feel my heart, Dying away within me, intermit Its slow and feeble throbs, then suddenly Start, as it seem'd exerting all its force In one last effort. On the ground I fell, I know not if entranced, or dead indeed, But without motion, hearing, sight, or sense, Feeling, or breath, or life. From that strange state, Even in such blessed freedom from all pain That sure I thought myself in very Heaven, I woke, and raised my eyelids, and beheld A light which seemed to penetrate my bones With life and health. Before me, visible, Stood Coatlantona; a wreath of flowers Circled her hair, and from their odorous leaves Arose a lambent flame; not fitfully, Nor with faint flash or spark of earthly flowers; From these, forever flowing forth, there play'd, In one perpetual dance of pointed light, The azure radiance of innocuous fire. She spake - Hear, Aztlan! and give ear, O King She said. Not yet the offended Gods relax Their anger; they require the Strangers' blood, The foretaste of their banquet. Let their will Be known to Aztlan, and the brave perform Their bidding; I, meantime, will seek to soothe, With all a mother's power, Mexitli's wrath. So let the maidens daily with fresh flowers Garland my temple ! - Daily with fresh flowers Garland her temple, Aztlan! and revere The gentle mother of thy guardian God !

And let the brave, exclaim'd young Tlalala, Perform her bidding ! Servant of the Gods, Declare their will ! — 1s it, that I should seek The strangers, in the first who meets my way To plunge the holy weapon ? Say thou to me, Do this ! — and I depart to do the deed, Though my life-blood should mingle with the foe's. O brave young Chief! Tezozomoc replied, With better fortune may the grateful Gods Reward thy valor ! deed so hazardons They ask not. Couldst thou from the mountain holds	On a blue throne, with four huge silver snakes, As if the keepers of the sanctuary, Circled, with stretching neck and fangs display'd, Mexitli sat; another graven snake Belted with scales of gold his monster bulk. Around the neck a loathsome collar hung, Of human hearts; the face was mask'd with gold; His specular eyes seem'd fire; one hand uprear'd A club; the other, as in battle, held The shield; and over all suspended hung The banner of the nation. They beheld In awe, and knelt before the Terrible God.
Tempt one of these rash foemen to pursue	Guardian of Aztlan! cried Tezozomoc,
Thine artful flight, an ambush'd band might rise	Who to thy mortal mother hast assign'd
Upon the unsuspecting enemy, And intercept his way; then hitherward	The kingdom o'er all trees, and arborets, And herbs, and flowers, giving her endless life,
The captive should be led, and Aztlan's Gods	A Deity among the Deities;
On their own altars see the sacrifice,	While Coatlantona implores thy love
Well pleased, and Aztlan's sons, inspirited, Behold the omen of assured success.	To thine own people, they in fear approach Thy awful fane, who know no fear beside,
Thou know'st that Tialoc's annual festival	And offer up the worthiest sacrifice,
Is close at hand. A stranger's child would prove	The blood of heroes!
A victim, whose rare value would deserve His certain favor. More I need not say.	To the ready Chiefs He turn'd, and said, Now stretch your arms, and
Choose thou the force for ambush; and thyself	make
Alone, or with a chosen comrade, seek	The offering to the God. They their bare arms
The mountain dwellers. Instant as he ceased,	Stretched forth, and stabbed them with the aloe- Then in a golden vase Tezozomoc [point
Occllopan began : I go with thee,	Received the mingled streams, and held it up
O Tlalala! My friend! — If one alone	Toward the giant Idol, and exclaim'd, Terrible God! Protector of our realm!
Could have the honor of this enterprise, My love might yield it thee; — but thou wilt need	Receive thine incense! Let the steam of blood
A comrade Tlalala, I go with thee !	Ascend to thee, delightful ! So mayst thou
Whom, the Chief answer'd, should my heart	Still to thy chosen people lend thine aid; And these blaspheming strangers from the earth
select, Its tried companion else, but thee, so oft	Be swept away; as erst the monster race
My brother in the battle? We will go,	Of Mammuth, Heaven's fierce ministers of wrath,
Shedder of blood! together will we go, Now, ere the midnight!	Who drain'd the lakes in thirst, and for their food Exterminated nations. And as when,
Nay! the Priest replied,	Their dreadful ministry of death fulfill'd,
A little while delay; and ere ye go,	Ipalnemoani, by whom we live,
Devote yourselves to Heaven! Feebly he spake, Like one exhausted; gathering then new force,	Bade thee go forth, and with thy lightnings fill The vault of Heaven, and with thy thunders rock
As with laborious effort, he pursued,—	The rooted earth, till of the monster race
Bedew Mexitli's altar with your blood,	Only their monumental bones remain'd, -
And go beneath his guidage. I have yet Strength to officiate, and to bless your zeal.	So arm thy favor'd people with thy might, Terrible God! and purify the land
	From these blaspheming foes !
So saying, to the Temple of the God	He said, and gave
He led the way. The warriors follow'd him; And with his chiefs, Coanocotzin went,	Ocellopan the vase. — Chiefs, ye have pour'd Your strength and courage to the Terrible God,
To grace with all solemnity the rite.	Devoted to his service; take ye now
They pass the Wall of Serpents, and ascend The massive fabric; four times they surround	The beverage he hath hallow'd. In your youth Ye have quaff'd manly blood, that manly thoughts
Its ample square ; the fifth, they reach the height.	Might ripen in your hearts; so now with this,
There, on the level top, two temple-towers	Which mingling from such noble veins hath flowed.
Were rear'd; the one Tezcalipoca's fane, Supreme of Heaven, where now the wily Priest	Increase of valor drink, and added force. Ocellopan received the bloody vase,
Stood, watchful for his presence, and observed	And drank, and gave in silence to his friend
The maize-strown threshold. His the other pile,	The consecrated draught; then Thalala
By whose peculiar power and patronage	Drain'd off the offering. Braver blood than this My lips can never taste! quoth he; but soon
Aztlan was blest, Mexitli, woman-born. Before the entrance, the eternal fire	Grant me, Mexitli, a more grateful cup,-
Was burning; bare of foot they enter'd there.	The Stranger's life!

Ocellopan inquired. Yea, all is done, Answer'd the Priest. Go! and the guardian God Of Aztlan be your guide!

They left the fane. Lo! as Tezozomoc was passing by The eternal fire, the eternal fire shot up A long blue flame. He started ; he exclaim'd, The God ! the God ! Tezcalipoca's Priest Echoed the welcome cry, The God! the God! For lo! his footsteps mark the maize-strown floor. A mighty shout from all the multitudes Of Aztlan rose; they cast into the fire The victims, whose last shricks of agony Mingled unheeded with the eries of joy. Then louder from the spiral sea-shell's depth Swell'd the full roar, and from the hollow wood Peal'd deeper thunders. Round the choral band, The circling nobles, gay with gorgeous plumes, And gems which sparkled to the midnight fire, Moved in the solemn dance; each in his hand, In measured movements lifts the feathery shield, And shakes a rattling ball to measured sounds. With quicker steps, the inferior chiefs without, Equal in number, but in just array, The spreading radii of the mystic wheel, Revolve; and, outermost, the youths roll round, In motions rapid as their quicken'd blood. So thus with song and harmony the night Past on in Aztlan, and all hearts rejoiced.

X1.

THE CAPTURE.

MEANTIME from Aztlan, on their enterprise, Shedder of Blood and Tiger of the War, Ocellopan and Tlalala set forth. With chosen followers, through the silent night, Silent they travell'd on. After a way Circuitous and far through lonely tracks, They reach'd the mountains, and amid the shade Of thickets covering the uncultured slope, Their patient ambush placed. The chiefs alone Held on, till, winding in ascent, they reach'd The heights which o'er the Briton's mountain hold Impended; there they stood, and by the moon, Who yet, with undiminished lustre, hung High in the dark blue firmament, from thence Explored the steep descent. Precipitous The rock beneath them lay, a sudden eliff. Bare and unbroken; in its midway holes, Where never hand could reach, nor eye intrude, The eagle built her eyrie. Farther on, Its interrupted erags and ancient woods Offered a difficult way. From erag to crag, By rocky shelf, by trunk, or root, or bough, A painful toil and perilous, they past; And now, stretch'd out amid the matted shrubs, Which, at the entrance of the valley, clothed The rugged bank, they crouch'd.

Are all the rites perform'd ? [The owls have ceased their night-song. On the top Of yon magnolia the loud turkey's voice Is heralding the dawn; from tree to tree Extends the wakening watch-note, far and wide, Till the whole woodlands echo with the cry. Now breaks the morning; but as yet no foot Hath mark'd the dews, nor sound of man is heard. Then first Ocellopan beheld, where, near, Beneath the shelter of a half-roof'd hut, A sleeping stranger lay. He pointed him To Tlalala. The Tiger look'd around : None else was nigh. - Shall I descend, he said, And strike him? Here is none to see the deed. We offered to the Gods our mingled blood Last night; and now, I deem it, they present An offering which shall more propitiate them, And omen sure success. I will go down And kill!

He said, and, gliding like a snake, Where Caradoc lay sleeping, made his way. Sweetly slept he, and pleasant were his dreams Of Britain, and the blue-eyed maid he loved. The Azteca stood over him; he knew His victim, and the power of vengeance gave Malignant joy. Once hast thou 'scaped my arm : But what shall save thee now? the Tiger thought, Exulting; and he raised his spear to strike. That instant, o'er the Briton's unseen harp The gale of morning past, and swept its strings Into so sweet a harmony, that sure It seem'd no earthly tone. The savage man Suspends his stroke; he looks astonish'd round: No human hand is near : - and hark ! again The aerial music swells and dies away. Then first the heart of Tlalala felt fear : He thought that some protecting spirit watch'd Beside the Stranger, and, abash'd, withdrew.

A God protects him! to Ocellopan, Whispering, he said. Didst thou not hear the sound Which enter'd into me, and fix'd my arm Powerless above him? Was it not a voice From thine own Gods to strengthen thee, replied His sterner comrade, and make evident Their pleasure in the deed? Nay! Tlalala Rejoin'd; they speak in darkness and in storms. The thunder is their voice, that peals through heaven, Or, rolling underneath us, makes earth rock In tempest, and destroys the sons of men. It was no sound of theirs, Ocellopan! No voice to hearten, - for 1 felt it pass Unmanning every limb; yea, it relax'd The sinews of my soul. Shedder of Blood, I cannot lift my hand against the man. Go, if thy heart be stronger ! But meantime Young Caradoc arose, of his escape Unconscious; and by this the stirring sounds Of day began, increasing now, as all

By this the stars Now to their toil betake them. Some go fell Grew dim; the glow-worm hath put out her lamp; The stately tree; some frem the trunk low-laid

Hew the huge boughs; here round the fire they char [In vain thou leadest on the late pursuit! The stake-points; here they level with a line The ground-plot, and infix the ready piles, Or, interknitting them with osiers, weave The wicker wall; others along the lake, From its shoal waters, gather reeds and canes,-Light roofing, suited to the genial sky. The woodman's measured stroke, the regular saw, The wain slow-creaking, and the voice of man Answering his fellow, or in single toil, Cheering his labor with a cheerful song, Strange concert made to those fierce Azteeas, Who, beast-like, in their silent lurking-place Couch'd close and still, observant for their prey.

All overseeing, and directing all, From place to place moved Madoc, and beneld The dwellings rise. Young Hoel at his side Ran on, best pleased when at his Uncle's side Courting indulgent love. And now they came Beside the half-roof'd hut of Caradoc; Of all the mountain-dwellings that the last. The little boy, in boyish wantonness, Would quit his Uncle's hold, and haste away, With childhood's frolic speed, then laugh aloud, To tempt pursuit; now running to the huts, Now toward the entrance of the valley straits. But wheresoe'er he turned, Ocellopan, With hunter's eye, pursued his heedless course, In breath-suspending vigilance. Ah me ! The little wretch toward his lurking-place Draws near, and ealls on Madoe; and the Prince Thinks of no danger nigh, and follows not The childish lure ! nearer the covert now Young Hoel runs, and stops, and calls again; Then like a lion, from his couching-place, Ocellopan leap'd forth, and seized his prey.

Loud shriek'd the affrighted child, as in his arms The savage grasp'd him; startled at the ery, Madoe beheld him hastening through the pass. Quick as instinctive love can urge his feet He follows, and he now almost hath reach'd The encumber'd ravisher, and hope inspires New speed, - yet nearer now, and nearer still, And lo! the child holds out his little arms! That instant, as the Prince almost had laid His hand upon the boy, young Tlalala Leap'd on his neek, and soon, though Madoe's strength, With frantie fury, shook him from his hold, Far down the steep Ocellopan had fled. Ah! what avails it now, that they, by whom Madoe was standing to survey their toil, Have miss'd their Chief, and spread the quick alarm? What now avails it, that, with distant aid, His gallant men come down? Regarding nought But Hoel, but the wretched Llaian's grief, He rushes on; and ever as he draws Near to the child, the Tiger Tlalala Impedes his way; and now they reach the place Of ambush, and the ambush'd band arise, And Madoe is their prisoner.

Caradoe,

In vain, Cadwallon, hath thy love alarm'd Caught the first sound of evil! They pour out Tumultuous from the vale, a half-arm'd troop; Each with such weapons as his hasty hand Can seize, they rush to battle. Gallant men, Your valor boots not! It avails not now, With such fierce onset that ye charge the foe, And drive with such full force the weapon home ' They, while ye slaughter them, impede pursuit, And far away, meantime, their comrades bear The captive Prince. In vain his noble heart Swells now with wild and suffocating rage; In vain he struggles : - they have bound his limbs With the tough osier, and his struggles now But bind more close and cuttingly the band. They hasten on; and while they bear the prize, Leaving their ill-doomed fellows in the fight To check pursuit, foremost afar of all, With unabating strength, by joy inspired, Ocellopan to Aztlan bears the child.

XII.

HOEL.

Good tidings travel fast. - The chief is seen; He hastens on; he holds the child on high; lle shouts aloud. Through Aztlan spreads the news;

Each to his neighbor tells the happy tale, -Joy, - joy to Aztlan! the Blood-shedder comes! Thaloe has given his victim.

Ah, poor child !

They from the gate swarm out to welcome thee ; Warriors, and men grown gray, and youths, and maids,

Exulting, forth they crowd. The mothers throng To view thee, and, while thinking of thy doom, They clasp their own dear infants to the breast With deeper love, delighted think that thou Shalt suffer for them. He, poor child, admires The strange array! with wonder he beholds Their olive limbs, half bare, their plumy crowns, And gazes round and round, where all was new, Forgetful of his fears. But when the Priest Approach'd to take him from the Warrior's arms, Then Hoel scream'd, and from that hideous man Averting, to Oeellopan he turn'd, And would have elung to him, so dreadful late, Stern as he was, and terrible of eye, Less dreadful than the Priest, whose dark aspect Which nature with her harshest characters Had featured, art made worse. His cowl was white; His untrimm'd hair, a long and loathsome mass, With cotton cords intwisted, elung with gum, And matted with the blood, which, every morn, He from his temples drew before the God, In sacrifice; bare were his arms, and smear'd

Black. But his countenance a stronger dread Than all the horrors of that outward garb, Struck with quick instinct to young Hoel's heart.

It was a face whose settled sullenness No gentle feeling ever had disturb'd; Which, when he probed a victim's living breast, Retained its hard composure. Such was he

Who took the son of Llaian, heeding not His cries, and screams, and arms in suppliant guise Stretch'd out to all around, and strugglings vain. He to the Temple of the Water-God Convey'd his victim. By the threshold, there The ministering Virgins stood, a comely band Of high-born damsels, to the temple rites By pious parents vow'd. Gladly to them The little Hoel leap'd; their gentle looks No fear excited; and he gazed around, Pleased and surprised, unconscious to what end These things were tending. O'er the rush-strown floor

They to the azure Idol led the boy, Now not reluctant, and they raised the hymn.

God of the Waters ! at whose will the streams Flow in their wonted channel, and diffuse Their plenty round, the blood and life of earth; At whose command they swell, and o'er their banks

Burst with resistless ruin, making vain The toils and hopes of man, — behold this child ! O strong to bless, and mighty to destroy, Thaloc! behold thy victim ! so mayst thou Restrain the peaceful streams within their banks, And bless the labors of the husbandman.

God of the Mountains ! at whose will the clouds Cluster around the heights; who sendest them To shed their fertilizing showers, and raise The drooping herb, and o'er the thirsty vale Spread their green freshness; at whose voice the hills

Grow black with storms; whose wrath the thunder speaks;

Whose bow of anger shoots the lightning shafts, To blast the works of man; -- behold this child ! O strong to bless, and mighty to destroy, Thaloe ! behold thy victim ! so mayst thou Lay by the fiery arrows of thy rage, And bid the genial rains and dews descend.

O thou, Companion of the powerful God, Companion and Beloved !- when he treads The mountain-top, whose breath diffuses round The sweets of summer; when he rides the waves, Whose presence is the sunshine and the calm, -Aiauh, O green-robed Goddess, see this child! Behold thy victim! so mayst thou appease The sterner mind of Tlaloc when he frowns, And Aztlan flourish in thy fostering smile. Young Spirits! ye whom Aztlan's piety Hath given to Tlaloc, to enjoy with him, For aye, the cool delights of Tlalocan, -Young Spirits of the happy ; who have left Your Heaven to-day, unseen assistants here,-Behold your comrade ! see the chosen child, Who through the lonely cave of death must pass, Like you, to join you in eternal joy. 50

Now from the rush-strown temple they depart. They place their smiling victim in a car, Upon whose sides of pearly shell there play'd, Shading and shifting still, the rainbow light. On virgin shoulders is he borne aloft, With dance before, and song and music round ; And thus they seek, in festival array, The water-side. There lies the sacred bark, All gay with gold, and garlanded with flowers : The virgins with the joyous boy embark Ten boatmen urge them on; the Priests behind Follow, and all the long solemnity. The lake is overspread with boats; the sun Shines on the gilded prows, the feathery crowns, The sparkling waves. Green islets float along, Where high-born damsels, under jasmine bowers, Raise the sweet voice, to which the echoing cars, In modulated motion, rise and fall. The moving multitude along the shore Flows like a stream; bright shines the unclouded sky; Heaven, earth, and waters wear one face of joy. Young Hoel with delight beholds the pomp; His heart throbs joyfully; and if he thinks Upon his mother now, 'tis but to think How beautiful a tale for her glad ear

He hath when he returns. Meantime the maids Weave garlands for his head, and raise the song.

Oh! happy thou, whom early from the world The Gods require ! not by the wasting worm Of sorrow canker'd, nor condemn'd to feel The pang of sickness, nor the wound of war, Nor the long miseries of protracted age; But thus in childhood chosen of the God, To share his joys. Soon shall thy rescned sonl, Child of the Stranger ! in his blissful world, Mix with the blessed spirits; for not thine, Amid the central darkness of the earth, To endure the eternal void ; - not thine to live, Dead to all objects of eye, ear, or sense, In the long horrors of one endless night, With endless being eurs'd. For thee the bowers Of Tlalocan have blossom'd with new sweets; For thee have its immortal trees matured The fruits of Heaven; thy comrades even now Wait thee, impatient, in their fields of bliss; The God will welcome thee, his chosen child, And Aiauh love thee with a mother's love. Child of the Stranger, dreary is thy way ! Darkness and Famine through the cave of Death Must guide thee. Happy thou, when on that night The morning of the eternal day shall dawn.

So as they sung young lloel's song of death, With rapid strength the boatmen plied their oars, And through the water swift they glided on; And now to shore they drew. The stately bank Rose with the majesty of woods o'erhung, And rocks, or peering through the forest shade, Or rising from the lake, and with their bulk Glassing its dark, deep waters. Half way up, A cavern piereed the rock; no human foot Had trod its depths, nor ever sunbeam reach'd Its long recesses and mysterious gloom; To Tlaloc it was hallowed; and the stone, Which closed its entrance, never was removed, Save when the yearly festival return'd, And in its womb a child was sepulchred, The living victim. Up the winding path, That to the entrance of the cavern led, With many a painful step the train ascend : But many a time, upon that long ascent, Young Hoel would have paused, with weariness Exhausted now. They urge him on, - poor child ! They urge him on ! - Where is Cadwallon's aid? Where is the sword of Ririd? where the arm Of Madoc now? - Oh! better had he lived, Unknowing and unknown, on Arvon's plain, And trod upon his noble father's grave, With peasant feet, unconscious !- They have reach'd

The cavern now, and from its mouth the Priests Roll the huge portal. Thitherward they force The son of Llaian. A cold air comes out; — It chills him, and his feet recoil; — in vain His feet recoil; — in vain he turns to fly, Affrighted at the sudden gloom that spreads Around; — the den is closed, and he is left In solitude and darkness, — left to die !

COATEL.

THAT morn from Aztlan Coatel had gone, In search of flowers, amid the woods and crags, To deck the shrine of Coatlantona; Such flowers as in the solitary wilds Hiding their modest beauty, made their worth More valued for its rareness. 'Twas to her A grateful task; not only for she fled Those cruel rites, to which nor reverent use Nor frequent custom could familiarize Her gentle heart, and teach it to put off All womanly feeling; - but that from all eyes Escaped, and all obtrusive fellowship, She in that solitude might send her soul To where Lincoya with the Strangers dwelt. She from the summit of the woodland heights Gazed on the lake below. The sound of song And instrument, in soften'd harmony, Had reach'd her where she stray'd; and she beheld The pomp, and listen'd to the floating sounds, A moment, with delight : but then a fear Came on her, for she knew with what design The Tiger and Ocellopan had sought The dwellings of the Cymry. - Now the boats Drew nearer, and she knew the Stranger's child. She watch'd them land below; she saw them wind The ascent; - and now from that abhorred cave The stone is roll'd away, - and now the child From light and life is cavern'd. Coatel Thought of his mother then, of all the ills Her fear would augur, and how worse than all Which even a mother's maddening fear could feign, His actual fate. She thought of this, and bow'd Her face upon her knees, and closed her eyes, Shuddering. Suddenly in the brake beside, A rustling startled her, and from the shrubs, A Vulture rose.

She moved toward the spot, Led by an idle impulse, as it seem'd, To see from whence the carrion bird had fled. The bushes overhung a narrow chasm Which pierced the hill: upon its mossy sides Shade-loving herbs and flowers luxuriant grew, And jutting crags made easy the descent. A little way descending, Coatel [heard, Stoop'd for the flowers, and heard, or thought she A feeble sound below. She raised her head, And anxiously she listen'd for the sound, Not without fear. - Feebly again, and like A distant cry, it came; and then she thought, Perhaps it was the voice of that poor child, By the slow pain of hunger doom'd to die. She shudder'd at the thought, and breathed a groan Of unavailing pity ; - but the sound Came nearer, and her trembling heart conceived A dangerous hope. The Vulture from that chasm Had fled, perchance accustomed in the cave To seek his banquet, and by living feet Alarm'd : - there was an entrance then below ; And were it possible that she could save The Stranger's child, — Oh, what a joy it were To tell Lincoya that!

It was a thought Which made her heart with terror and delight Throb audibly. From crag to crag she past, Descending, and beheld a narrow cave Enter the hill. A little way the light Fell; but its feeble glimmering she herself Obstructed half, as stooping in she went. The arch grew loftier, and the increasing gloom Fill'd her with more affright; and now she paused; For at a sudden and abrupt descent She stood, and fear'd its unseen depth; her heart Fail'd, and she back had hasten'd; but the erv Reach'd her again, the near and certain cry Of that most pitiable innocent. Again adown the dark descent she look'd, Straining her eyes; by this the strengthen'd sight Had grown adapted to the gloom around, And her dilated pupils now received Dim sense of objects near. Something below, White in the darkness, lay; it mark'd the depth; Still Coatel stood dubious; but she heard The wailing of the child, and his loud sobs; ----Then, clinging to the rock with fearful hands, Her feet explored below, and twice she felt Firm footing, ere her fearful hold relax'd. The sound she made, along the hollow rock Ran echoing. Hoel heard it, and he came Groping along the side. A dim, dim light Broke on the darkness of his sepulchre ; A human form drew near him; - he sprang on, Screaming with joy, and clung to Coatel, And eried, Oh, take me from this dismal place ' She answer'd not; she understood him not; But clasp'd the little victim to her breast, And shed delightful tears.

But from that den Of darkness and of horror, Coatel

Durst not convey the child, though in her heart There was a female tenderness which yearn'd, As with maternal love, to cherish him. She hush'd his clamors, fearful lest the sound Might reach some other ear; she kiss'd away The tears that stream'd adown his little cheeks; She gave him food, which in the morn she brought, For her own wants, from Aztlan. Some few words Of Britain's ancient language she had learn'd From her Lincoya, in those happy days Of peace, when Aztlan was the Stranger's friend : Aptly she learnt, what willingly he taught, Terms of endearment, and the parting words Which promised quick return. She to the child These precious words address'd; and if it chanced Imperfect knowledge, or some difficult sound, Check'd her heart's utterance, then the gentle tone, The fond caress, intelligibly spake

Affection's language. But when she arose, And would have climb'd the ascent, the affrighted boy

Fast held her, and his tears interpreted The prayer to leave him not. Again she kiss'd His tears away; again of soon return Assured and soothed him; till reluctantly And weeping, but in silence, he unloosed His grasp; and up the difficult ascent Coatel climb'd, and to the light of day Returning, with her flowers she hasten'd home.

THE STONE OF SACRIFICE.

WHO comes to Aztlan, bounding like a deer Along the plain ? - The herald of success; For, lo! his locks are braided, and his loins Cinctured with white; and see, he lifts the shield, And brandishes the sword. The populace Flock round, impatient for the tale of joy, And follow to the palace in his path. Joy! joy! the Tiger hath achieved his quest! They bring a captive home ! - Triumphantly Coanocotzin and his Chiefs go forth To greet the youth triumphant, and receive The victim, whom the gracious gods have given, Sure omen and first fruits of victory. A woman leads the train, young, beautiful, -More beautiful for that translucent joy Flushing her cheek, and sparkling in her eye; -Her hair is twined with festal flowers, her robe With flowing wreaths adorn'd; she holds a child, He, too, bedeck'd and garlanded with flowers, And, lifting him, with agile force of arm, In graceful action, to harmonions step Accordant, leads the dance. It is the wife Of Tlalala, who, with his child, goes forth To meet her hero husband.

And behold,

The Tiger comes! and ere the shouts and sounds Of gratulation cease, his followers bear The captive Prince. At that so welcome sight,

Loud rose the glad acclaim; nor knew they yet That he who there lay patient in his bonds, Expecting the inevitable lot, Was Madoc. Patient in his bonds he lay, Exhausted with vain efforts, hopeless now, And silently resign'd. But when the King Approach'd the prisoner, and beheld his face, And knew the Chief of Strangers, at that sound Electric joy shot through the multitude, And, like the raging of the hurricane, Their thundering transports peal'd. A deeper joy, A nobler triumph, kindled Tlalala, As, limb by limb, his eye survey'd the Prince, With a calm fierceness. And, by this, the Priests Approach'd their victim, clad in vestments white Of sacrifice, which from the shoulders fell, As from the breast, unbending, broad, and straight, Leaving their black arms bare. The blood-red robe. The turquoise pendent from his down-drawn lip, The crown of glossy plumage, whose green hue Vied with his emerald ear-drops, mark'd their Chief, Tezozomoc: his thin and ghastly cheek, Which - save the temple serpents, when he brought Their human banquet, - never living eye Rejoiced to see, became more ghastly now, As in Mexitli's name, upon the Prince He laid his murtherous hand. But, as he spake, Up darted Tlalala his eagle glance. -Away! away! he shall not perish so! The warrior cried. - Not tamely, by the knife, Nor on the jasper stone, his blood shall flow ! The Gods of Aztlan love a Warrior Priest! I am their Priest to-day! A murmuring

Ran through the train; nor waited he to hear Denial thence; but on the multitude Alond he call'd : - When first our fathers seized This land, there was a savage chief who stopp'd Their progress. He had gained the rank he bore By long probation : stripes, which laid his flesh All bleeding bare, had forced not one complaint; Not when the working bowels might be seen, One movement; hand-bound, he had been con fined

Where myriad insects on his nakedness Infix'd their venomous anger, and no start, No shudder, shook his frame; last in a net Suspended, he had felt the agony Of fire, which to his bones and marrow pierced, And breathed the suffocating smoke which i I'd His lungs with fire, without a groan, a breath, A look betokening sense; so gallantly Had he subdued his nature. This brave man Met Aztlan in the war, and put her Chiefs To shame. Our Elders have not yet forgot How from the slaughtered brother of their King He stripp'd the skin, and formed of it a drum, Whose sound affrighted armies. With this man My father coped in battle; here he led him, An offering to the God; and man to man, He slew him here in fight. I was a child, Just old enough to lift my father's shield;

But I remember, on that glorious day, When from the sacred combat he return'd, His red hands reeking with the hot heart's blod, How in his arms he took me, and besought The God whom he had served, to bless his boy, And make me like my father. Men of Aztlan, Mexitli heard his prayer; — here I have brought The Stranger-Chief, the noblest sacrifice That ever graced the altar of the God; Let then his death be noble! so my boy Shall, in the day of battle, think of me; And as I follow'd my brave father's steps, Pursue my path of glory.

Ere the Priest Could frame denial, had the Monarch's look Given his assent. — Refuse not this, he said, O servant of the Gods! Ile hath not here His arms to save him; and the Tiger's strength Yields to no mortal might. Then for his sword He call'd, and bade Yuhidthiton address The Stranger-Chief.

Yuhidthiton began, — The Gods of Aztlan triumph, and thy blood Must wet their altars. Prince, thou shalt not die The coward's death; but, sworded, and in fight, Fall as becomes the valiant. Should thine arm Subdue in battle six successive foes, Life, liberty, and glory, will repay The noble conquest. Madoc, hope not this ! Strong are the brave of Aztlan ! Then they loosed

The Ocean Chieftain's bonds; they rent away His garments; and with songs and shouts of joy, They led him to the Stone of Saerifice. Round was that Stone of blood ; the half-raised arm Of one of manly growth, who stood below, Might rest upon its height; the circle small, An active boy might almost bound across. Nor needed for the combat ampler space; For in the centre was the prisoner's foot Fast fetter'd down. Thus fetter'd, Madoc stood. He held a buckler, light and small, of cane O'erlaid with beaten gold; his sword, the King, Honoring a noble enemy, had given, A weapon tried in war,-to Madoc's grasp Strange and unwieldy : 'twas a broad, strong staff, Set thick with transverse stones, on either side Keen-edged as Syrian steel. But when he felt The weapon, Madoc call'd to mind his deeds Done on the Saxon in his father's land, And hope arose within him. Nor, though now Naked he stood, did fear for that assail llis steady heart; for often had he seen His gallant countrymen, with naked breasts, Rush on their iron-coated enemy, And win the conquest.

Now hath Tlalala Array'd himself for battle. First he donn'd A gipion, quilted close of gossampine; O'er that a jointed mail of plates of gold, Bespotted like the tiger's speckled pride, To speak his rank; it clad his arms half-way, Half-way his thighs; but cuishes had he none, Nor gauntlets, nor feet-armor. On his helm There yawn'd the semblance of a tiger's head, The long, white teeth extended, as for prey; Proud crest, to blazon his proud title forth. And now toward the fatal stage equipp'd For fight he went; when, from the press behind, A warrior's voice was heard, and clad in arms, And shaking in his angry grasp the swora, Ocellopan rush'd on, and cried aloud, And for himself the holy combat claim'd. The Tiger, heedless of his clamor, sprung Upon the stone, and turn'd him to the war. Fierce leaping forward came Ocellopan, And bounded up the ascent, and seized his arm ----Why wouldst thou rob me of a deed like this? Equal our peril in the enterprise, Equal our merit; - thou wouldst reap alone The guerdon! Never shall my children lift Their little hands at thee, and say, Lo! there The Chief who slew the White King !-- Tlalala, Trust to the lot, or turn on me, and prove, By the best chance to which the brave appeal, Who best deserves this glory !

Stung to wrath, The Tiger answer'd not; he raised his sword, And they had rushed to battle; but the Priests Came hastening up, and by their common Gods, And by their common country, bade them cease Their impious strife, and let the lot decide From whom Mexitli should that day receive His noble victim. Both unsatisfied, But both obedient, heard. Two equal shafts, As outwardly they seem'd, the Paba brought; His mantle hid their points; and Tlalala Drew forth the broken stave. A bitter smile Darken'd his cheek, as angrily he cast To earth the hostile lot. -- Shedder of Blood, Thine is the first adventure ! he exclaim'd; But thou mayst perish here! - and in his heart The Tiger hoped Ocellopan might fall, As sullenly retiring from the stage, He mingled with the crowd.

In hattle, on the Stone of Sacrifice, Prince Madoe and the Life-Destroyer stood. This clad in arms complete, free to advance In quick assault, or shun the threaten'd blow, Wielding his wonted sword; the other, stripp'd, Save of that fragile shield, of all defence; His weapon strange and cumbrous; and pinn'a down, Disabled from all onset, all retreat.

With looks of greedy joy, Ocellopan Survey'd his foe, and wonder'd to behold The breast so broad, the bare and brawny limbs, Of matchless strength. The eye of Madoc, too, Dwelt on his foe; his countenance was calm, Something more pale than wonted; like a man Prepared to meet his death. The Azteca Fiercely began the fight; now here, now there, Aright, aleft, above, below, he wheel'd The rapid sword: still Madoc's rapid eye Pursued the motion, and his ready shield, In prompt interposition, caught the blow, Or turn'd its edge aside. Nor did the Prince Yet aim the sword to wound, but held it forth

Another shield, to save him, till his hand, Familiar with its weight and shape unconth, Might wield it well to vengeance. Thus he stood, Bailling the impatient enemy, who now Wax'd wrathful, thus to waste, in idle strokes, Reiterate so oft, his bootless strength. And now yet more exasperate he grew; For from the eager multitude was heard, Amid the din of undistinguish'd sounds, The Tiger's murmur'd name, as though they thought,

Had he been on the Stone, ere this, besure, The Gods had tasted of their saerifice, Now all too long delayed. Then fiercelier, And yet more rapidly, he drove the sword; But still the wary Prince or met its fall, And broke the force, or bent him from the blow; And now retiring, and advancing now, As one free foot permitted, still provoked, And baffled still the savage; and sometimes With cautious strength did Madoe aim attack, Mastering each moment now with abler sway The acquainted sword. But, though as yet unharm'd

In life or limb, more perilous the strife Grew momently; for with repeated strokes, Battered and broken now, the shield hung loose; And shouts of triumph from the multitude Arose, as piecemeal they beheld it fall, And saw the Prince exposed.

That welcome sight, Those welcome sounds, inspired Ocellopan; He felt each limb new-strung. Impatient now Of conquest long delay'd, with wilder rage He drives the weapon; Madoe's lifted sword Received its edge, and shiver'd with the blow. A shriek of transport burst from all around ; For lo! the White King, shieldless, weaponless, Naked before his foe ! That savage foe, Dallying with the delight of victory, Drew back a moment to enjoy the sight, Then yell'd in triumph, and sprang on to give The consummating blow. Madoe beheld The coming death; he darted up his hand Instinctively to save, and caught the wrist In its mid fall, and drove with desperate force The splintered truncheon of his broken sword Full in the enemy's face. Beneath his eye It broke its way, and where the nasal nerves Branch in fine fibrils o'er their mazy seat, Burst through, and, slanting upward, in the brain Buried its jagged point.

Madoe himself Stood at his fall astonished, at escape Unhoped, and strange success. The multitude Beheld, and they were silent, and they stood Gazing in terror. But far other thoughts Rose in the Tiger's heart; it was a joy To Tlalala; and forth he sprung, and up The Stone of Sacrifice, and call'd aloud To bring the Prince another sword and shield, For his last strife. Then, in that interval, Upon Ocellopan he fixed his eyes, Contemplating the dead, as though thereby

To kindle in his heart a fiercer thirst For vengeance. Nor to Madoe was the sting Of anger wanting, when in Tlalala He knew the captive whom his merey freed, The man whose ambush had that day destroyed Young Hoel and himself; - for sure he deem'd Young Hoel was with God, and he himself At his death day arrived. And now he grasp'd A second sword, and held another shield; And from the Stone of Blood Ocellopan Was borne away; and, fresh in arms, and fierce With all that makes a savage thirst for war, -Hope, vengeance, courage, superstitious hate, -A second foe came on. By this the Prince Could wield his weapon well; and dreading now Lest, in protracted combat, he might stand Again defenceless, he put forth his strength, As oft assailing as assailed, and watch'd So well the Tiger's motions, and received The Tiger's blows so warily, and aimed His own so fierce and fast, that in the crowd Doubt and alarm prevailed. Ilanquel grew Pale at her husband's danger; and she elasp d The infant to her breast, whom late she held On high, to see his victory. The throng Of the beholders silently look'd on; And in their silence might at times be heard An indrawn breath of terror; and the Priests Angrily murmured, that in evil hour, Coanocotzin had indulged the pride Of vaunting valor, and from certain death Reprieved the foe.

But now a murmur rose Amid the multitude; and they who stood So thickly throng'd, and with such eager eyes Late watch'd the fight, hastily now broke up. And with disorder'd speed and sudden arms, Ran to the eity gates. More eager now, Conscious of what had chanced, fought Tlalala . And hope invigorated Madoc's heart; For well he ween'd Cadwallon was at hand, Leading his gallant friends. Aright he ween'd; At hand Cadwallon was! His gallant friends Came from the mountains with impetuous speed, To save or to revenge. Nor long endured The combat now : the Priests ascend the stone, And bid the Tiger hasten to defend His country and his Gods; and, hand and foot, Binding the eaptive Prince, they bear him thence, And lay him in the temple. Then his heart Resign'd itself to death, and Madoc thought Of Llaian and Goervyl; and he felt That death was dreadful. But not so the King Permitted; but not so had Heaven decreed; For noble was the King of Aztlan's heart, And pure his tongue from falsehood : he had said, That by the warrior's death should Madoe die; Nor dared the Pabas violently break The irrevocable word. There Madoe lay In solitude; the distant battle reach'd His ear; inactive and in bonds he lay, Expecting the dread issue, and almost Wish'd for the perils of the fight again.

XV.

THE BATTLE.

Nor unprepared Cadwallon found the sons Of Aztlan, nor defenceless were her walls; But when the Britons' distant march was seen, A ready army issued from her gates, And dight themselves to battle: these the King Coanocotzin had, with timely care, And provident for danger, thus arrayed. Forth issning from the gates, they met the foe, And with the sound of sonorous instruments, And with their shouts, and screams, and yells, drove back

The Britons' fainter war-c as the swell Of ocean, flowing onward, up its course Repels the river-stream. Their darts and stones Fell like the rain drops of the snumer-shower, So fast, and on the helmet and the shield, On the strong corselet and the netted mail, So innocent they fell. But not in vain The bowmen of Deheubarth sent, that day, Their iron bolts abroad; those volant deaths Descended on the naked multitude, And through the chieftain's quilted gossampine, Through feathery breastplate and effulgent gold, They reach'd the life.

But soon no interval For archers' art was left, nor scope for flight Of stone from whirling sling : both hosts, alike Impatient for the proof of war, press on; The Aztecas, to shun the arrowy storm, The Cymry, to release their Lord, or heap Aztlan in ruins, for his monument. Spear against spear, and shield to shield, and breast To breast, they met; equal in force of limb, And strength of heart, in resolute resolve And stubborn effort of determined wrath: The few, advantaged by their iron mail; The weaklier arm'd, of near retreat assured And succor close at hand, in tenfold troops Their formen overnumbering. And of all That mighty multitude, did every man Of either host, alike inspired by all That stings to will and strengthens to perform, Then put forth all his power; for well they knew Aztlan that day must triumph or must fall. Then sword and mace on helm and buckler rang, And hurtling javelins whirr'd along the sky. Nor when they hurled the javelin, did the sons Of Aztlan, prodigal of weapons, loose The lance, to serve them for no second stroke; A line of ample measure still retain'd The missile shaft; and when its blow was spent, Swiftly the dexterous spearman coiled the string, And sped again the artificer of death. Rattling, like summer hailstones, they descend, But from the Britons' iron panoply, Baffled and blunted, fell; nor more avail'd The stony falchion there, whose broken edge Inflicts no second wound; nor profited, On the strong buckler or the crested helm, The knotty club; though fast, in blinding showers,

Those javelins fly, those heavy weapons fall With stunning weight. Meantime, with wonted strength, The men of Gwyneth through their fenceless foes Those lances thrust, whose terrors had so oft Affrayed the Saxons, and whose home-driven points So oft had pierced the Normen's knightly arms. Little did then his pomp of plumes bestead The Azteca, or glittering pride of gold, Against the tempered sword; little his casque, Gay with its feathery coronal, or dress'd In graven terrors, when the Britons' hand Drove in through helm and head the short-piked mace; Or swung its iron weights with shattering sway, Which, where they struck, destroyed. Beneath those arms The men of Aztlan fell; and whose dropp'd Dead or disabled, him his comrades bore Away with instant caution, lest the sight Of those whom they had slaughtered might inspire The fee with hope and courage. Fast they fell, And fast were resupplied, man after man Succeeding to the death. Nor in the town Did now the sight of their slain countrymen, Momentarily carried in and piled in heaps, Awake one thought of fear. Hark ! through the streets Of Aztlan, how from house to house, and tower To tower, reiterate, Paynalton's name Calls all her sons to battle ! at whose name . All must go forth, and follow to the field The Leader of the Armies of the Gods, Whom, in his unseen power, Mexitli now Sends out to lead his people. They, in crowds, Throng for their weapons to the House of Arms, Beneath their guardian Deity preserved, Through years of peace; and there the Pabasstood Within the temple-court, and dealt around The ablution of the Stone of Sacrifice, Bidding them, with the holy beverage, Imbibe diviner valor, strength of arm Not to be wearied, hope of victory, And certain faith of endless joy in Heaven, Their sure reward. - Oh, happy, cried the Priests, Your brethren who have fallen ! already they Have joined the company of blessed souls; Already they, with song and harmony, And in the dance of beauty, are gone forth, To follow down his western path of light Yon Sun, the Prince of Glory, from the world Retiring to the Palace of his rest. Oh, happy they, who, for their country's eause, And for their Gods, shall die the brave man's death ! Them will their country consecrate with praise ! Them will the Gods reward .- They neard the Priests

Intoxicate, and from the gate swarmed out, Tumultuous, to the fight of martyrdom.

But when Cadwallon every moment saw The enemies increase, and with what rage Of drunken valor to the fight they rush'd,

As best he could, providing, form'd the troops Of Britain into one collected mass: Three equal sides it offered to the foe, Close and compact; no multitude could break The condensed strength; its narrow point press'd on, Entering the throng's resistance, like a wedge, Still from behind impell'd. So, thought the Chief, Likeliest the gates of Aztlan might be gain'd, And Hoel and the Prince preserved, if yet They were among mankind. Nor could the force Of hostile thousands break that strength condensed, Against whose iron sides the stream of war

He, against that impetuous attack,

Roll'd unavailing, as the ocean waves Which idly round some insulated rock Foam furious, warning with their silvery smoke The mariner far off. Nor could the point Of that compacted body, though it bore Right on the foe, and with united force Press'd on to enter, through the multitude Win now its difficult way; as where the sea Pours through some strait its violent waters, swoln By inland fresh, vainly the oarmen there With all their weight and strength essay to drive Their galley through the pass, the stress and strain Availing scarce to stem the impetnons stream.

And hark! above the deafening din of fight Another shout, heard like the thunder-peal, Amid the war of winds! Lincoya comes, Leading the mountain-dwellers. From the shock Aztlan recoil'd. And now a second troop Of Britons to the town advanced, for war Impatient and revenge. Cadwallon these, With tidings of their gallant Prince enthrall'd, Had summoned from the ships. That dreadful tale Roused them to fury. Not a man was left To guard the fleet; for who could have endured That idle duty? who could have endured The long, inactive, miserable hours, And hope, and expectation, and the rage Of maddening anguish? Ririd led them on; In whom a brother's love had call'd not up More spirit-stirring pain, than trembled now In every British heart; so dear to all Was Madoc. On they came; and Aztlan then Had fled appall'd; but in that dangerous hour Her faith preserved her. From the gate her Priests Rush'd desperate out, and to the foremost rank Forced their wild way, and fought with martyr zeal. Through all the host contagious fury spread; Nor had the sight that hour enabled them To mightier efforts, had Mexitli, clad In all his imaged terrors, gone before Their way, and driven upon his enemies His giant club destroying. Then more ficrce The conflict grew; the din of arms, the yell Of savage rage, the shriek of agony, The groan of death, commingled in one sound Of undistinguished horrors: while the Sun, Retiring slow beneath the plain's far verge, Shed o'er the quiet hills his fading light.

XVI.

THE WOMEN.

SILENT and solitary is thy vale, Caermadoc, and how melaucholy now That solitude and silence ! — Broad noon-day, And not a sound of human life is there ! The fisher's net, abandoned in his haste, Sways idly in the waters ; in the tree, Where its last stroke had pierced, the hatchet hangs :

The birds, beside the mattock and the spade, Hunt in the new-turn'd mould, and fearlessly Fly through the eage-work of the imperfect wall; Or through the vacant dwelling's open door, Pass and repass secure.

In Madoc's house, Aud on his bed of reeds, Goervyl lies, Her face toward the ground. She neither weeps, Nor sighs, nor groans; too strong her agony For outward sign of anguish, and for prayer Too hopeless was the ill; and though, at times, The pious exclamation past her lips, Thy will be done! yet was that utterance Rather the breathing of a broken heart, Than of a soul resigned. Mervyn, beside, Hangs over his dear mistress silently, Having no hope or comfort to bestow, Nor anght but sobs and unavailing tears. The women of Caermadoc, like a flock Collected in their panie, stand around The house of their lost leader; and they too Are mute in their despair. Llaian aloue Is absent; wildly hath she wander'd forth To seek her child; and such the general woe, That none hath mark'd her absence. Yet have they,

Though unprotected thus, no selfish fear; The sudden evil had destroyed all thought, All sense, of present danger to themselves, All foresight.

Yet new terrors! Malinal, Panting with speed, bursts in, and takes the arms Of Madoc down. Goervyl, at that sound, Started in sudden hope; but when she saw The Azteca, she uttered a faint scream Of wrongful fear, remembering not the proofs Of his tried truth, nor recognizing aught In those known features, save their hostile hue. But he, by worser fear abating soon Her vain alarm, exclaim'd, I saw a band Of Hoamen coming up the straits, for ill, Besure, for Amalahta leads them on. Buckle this harness on, that, being arm'd, I may defend the entrance.

Scarce had she Fastened the breastplate with her trembling hands, When, flying from the sight of men in arms, The women crowded in. Hastily he seized The shield and spear, and on the threshold took His stand; but, waken'd now to provident thought, Goervyl, following, helm'd him. There was now No time to gird the bauldric on; she held Her brother's sword, and bade him look to her For prompt supply of weapons; in herself Being resolved not idly to abide, Nor unprepared of hand or heart to meet The issue of the danger, nor to die Reluctant now.

Rightly had they divined The Hoaman's felon purpose. When he heard The fate of Madoc, from his mother's eye He mask'd his secret joy, and took his arms, And to the rescue, with the foremost band, Set forth. But soon upon the way, he told The associates of his crime, that now their hour Of triumph was arrived; Caermadoc, left Defenceless, would become, with all its wealth, The spoiler's easy prey - raiment, and arms, And iron; skins of that sweet beverage, Which to a sense of its own life could stir The joyful blood; the women, above all, Whom to the forest they might bear away, To be their slaves, if so their pleasure was : Or, yielding them to Aztlan, for such prize Receive a royal guerdon. Twelve there were, Long leagued with him in guilt, who turn'd aside : And they have reach'd Caermadoc now, and now Rush onward where they see the women fly; When, on the threshold, clad in Cimbric arms, And with long lance protended, Malinal Rebuffs them from the entrance. At that sight Suddenly quail'd, they stood, as midnight thieves Who find the master waking; but erelong, Gathering a boastful courage, as they saw No other guard, press'd forward, and essay'd To turn his spear aside. Its steady point, True to the impelling strength, held on, and thrust The foremost through the breast, and breath and blood

Followed the re-drawn shaft. Nor seem'd the strife Unequal now, though, with their numbers, they Beleaguer'd in half-ring the door, where he, The sole defender, stood. From side to side So well and swiftly did he veer the lanee, That every enemy beheld its point Aim'd at himself direct. But chief on one Had Malinal his deadly purpose fix'd, On Amalahta; by his death to quell The present danger, and cut off the root Of many an evil, certain else to spring From that accursed stock. On him his eye Turn'd with more eager wilfulness, and dwelt With keener ken; and now, with sudden step Bending his body on, at him he drives The meditated blow; but that ill Prince, As chiefly sought, so chiefly fearing, swerved Timely aside; and ere the Azteca Recovered from the frustrate aim, the spear Was seized, and from his hold by stress and weight Of numbers wrench'd. He, facing still the foe, And holding at arm's length the targe, put back His hand, and called Goervyl, and from her Received the sword; - in time, for the enemy Press'd on so near, that, having now no scope To raise his arm, he drove the blade straight on. It entered at the mouth of one who stood

With face aslant, and glanced along the teeth Through to the ear, then, slivering downward, left The cheek-flap dangling. He, in that same point Of time, as if a single impulse gave Birth to the double action, dash'd his shield Against another's head, with so fierce swing And sway of strength, that his third enemy Fell at his feet. Astounded by such proof Of prowess, and by unexpected loss Dismayed, the foe gave back, beyond the reach Of his strong arm; and there awhile they stood, Beholding him at bay, and counselling How best to work their vengeance upon him, Their sole opponent. Soon did they behold The vantage, overlook'd by hasty hope, How vulnerable he stood, his arms and thighs Bare for their butt. At once they bent their bows, At once ten arrows fled; seven, shot in vain, Rung on his shield; but, with unhappier mark, Two shafts hung quivering in his leg; a third Below the shoulder pierced. Then Malinal Groan'd, not for anguish of his wounds, but grief And agony of spirit; yet resolved To his last gasp to guard that precions post, Nor longer able to endure afoot, He, falling on his knees, received nnharm'd Upon the shield, now ample for defence, Their second shower, and still defied the foc. But they, now sure of conquest, hasten'd on To thrust him down; and he too felt his strength Ebbing away. Goervyl, in that hour Of horror and despair, collected still, Caught him, and by the shoulders drew him in; And, calling on her comrades, with their help Shut to the door in time, and with their weight Secured it, not their strength; for she alone, Found worthy of her noble ancestry, In this emergence felt her faculties All present, and heroic strength of heart, To cope with danger and contempt of death. Shame on ye, British women ! shame ! exclaim'd The daughter of King Owen, as she saw The trembling hands and bloodless countenance Pale as sepulchral marble; silent some; Others with womanish cries lamenting now That ever, in unhappy hour, they left Their native land; - a pardonable fear; For hark, the war-whoop! sound, whereto the [howl Of tigers or hyenas, heard at night By captive from barbarian foes escaped, And wandering in the pathless wilderness, Were music. Shame on ye! Goervyl cried; Think what your fathers were, your husbands what, And what your sons should be ! These savages Seek not to wreak on ye immediate death; So are ye safe, if safety such as this Be worth a thought; and in the interval We yet may gain, by keeping to the last This entrance, easily to be maintain'd By us, though women, against fees so few ; -Who knows what succor chance, or timely thought Of our own friends may send, or Providence, Who slumbereth not? - While thus she spake, a hand

.n at the window came, o.' one who sought That way to win the entrance. She drew out The arrow through the arm of Malinal, With gentle care, — the readiest weapon that, — And held it short above the bony barb, And, adding deeds to words, with all her might She stabbed it through the hand. The sudden pain

Provoked a cry, and back the savage fell, Loosening his hold, and maim'd for further war. Nay! leave that entrance open! she exclaim'd To one who would have closed it, — who comes next

Shall not go thence so cheaply !—for she now Had taken up a spear to guard that way, Easily guarded, even by female night. O heart of proof! what now avails thy worth And excellent courage? for the savage foe, With mattock and with spade, for other use Design'd, hew now upon the door, and rend The wattled sides; and they within shrink back, For now it splinters through,—and lo, the way Is open to the spoiler!

Then once more, Collecting his last strength, did Malinal Rise on his knees, and over him the maid Stands with the ready spear, she guarding him Who guarded her so well. Roused to new force By that exampled valor, and with will To achieve one service yet before he died, -If death indeed, as sure he thought, were nigh, -Malinal gathered up his fainting powers; And reaching forward, with a blow that threw His body on, upon the knee he smote One Hoaman more, and brought him to the ground. The foe fell over him; but he, prepared, Threw him with sudden jerk aside, and rose Upon one hand, and with the other plunged Between his ribs the mortal blade. Meantime Amalahta, rushing in blind eagerness To seize Goervyl, set at nought the power Of female hands, and stooping as he came, Beneath her spear-point, thought with lifted arm To turn the thrust aside. But she drew back, And lowered at once the spear, with aim so sure, That on the front it met him, and ploughed up The whole scalp-length. He, blinded by the blood, Staggered aside, escaping by that chance A second push, else mortal. And by this, The women, learning courage from despair, And by Goervyl's bold example fired, Took heart, and rushing on with one accord, Drove out the foe. Then took they hope; for then They saw but seven remain in plight for war; And, knowing their own number, in the pride Of strength, caught up stones, stayes, or axe, or spear,

To hostile use converting whatsoe'er The hasty hand could seize. Such fieree attack Confused the ruffian band; nor had they room To aim the arrow, nor to speed the spear, Each now beset by many. But their Prince, Still mindful of his purport, call'd to them — Secure my passage while I bear away The White King's Sister; having her, the law

Of peace is in our power. - And on he went Toward Goervyl, and, with sudden turn, While on another foe her eye was fix'd, Ran in upon her, and stoop'd down, and elasp'd The maid above the knees, and throwing her Over his shoulder, to the valley straits Set off; - ill seconded in ill attempt; For now his comrades are too close beset To aid their Chief, and Mervyn hath beheld His lady's peril. At the sight, inspired With force, as if indeed that manly garb Had elothed a manly heart, the Page ran on, And with a bill-hook striking at his ham, Cut the back sinews. Amalahta fell; The Maid fell with him : and she first hath risen, While, grovelling on the earth, he gnash'd his teeth For agony. Yet, even in those pangs, Remembering still revenge, he turn'd and seized Goervyl's skirt, and pluck'd her to the ground, And roll'd himself upon her, and essayed To kneel upon her breast; but she elinch'd fast His bloody locks, and drew him down aside, Faint now with anguish, and with loss of blood ; And Mervyn, coming to her help again, As once again he rose, around the neek Seized him, with throttling grasp, and held him down, -

Strange strife and horrible, — till Malinal Crawl'd to the spot, and thrust into his groin. The mortal sword of Madoc; he himself, At the same moment, fainting, now no more By his strong will upheld, the service done. The few surviving traitors, at the sight Of their fallen Prince and Leader, now too late Believed that some diviner power had given These female arms strength for their overthrow, Themselves proved weak before them, as, of late, Their God, by Madoc erush'd.

Away they fled Toward the valley straits; but in the gorge Erillyab met their flight: and then her heart, Boding the evil, smote her, and she bade Her people seize, and bring them on in bonds, For judgment. She herself, with quicken'd pace, Advanced, to know the worst; and o'er the dead Casting a rapid glance, she knew her son. She knew him by his garments, by the work Of her own hands; for now his face, besmeared And black with gore, and stiffened in its pangs, Bore of the life no semblance. — God is good ! She cried, and closed her eyelids, and her lips Shook, and her eountenance changed. But in her heart

She quell'd the natural feeling. — Bear away These wretches! to her followers she exclaim'd; And root them from the earth. Then she ap proach'd

Goervyl, who was pale and trembling now, Exhausted with past effort ; and she took Gently the maiden's tremulous hand, and said, God comfort thee, my Sister ! At that voice Of consolation, from her dreamy state, Goervyl to a sense of all her wod Awoke, and burst into a gush of tears God comfort thee, my Sister ! cried the Queen;

Even as He strengthens me. I would not raise Deceitful hope, — but in His Hand, even yet, The issue hangs, and He is merciful.

Yea, daughter of Aberfraw, take thou hope! For Madoe lives! — he lives to wield the sword Of righteous vengeance, and accomplish all.

XVII.

THE DELIVERANCE.

MADOC, meantime, in bonds and solitude, Lay listening to the tumult. How his heart Panted! how then, with fruitless strength, he strove And struggled for enlargement, as the sound Of battle from without the city came; While all things near were still, nor foot of man, Nor voice, in that deserted part, were heard. At length one light and solitary step Approach'd the place; a woman cross'd the door; From Madoe's busy mind her image pass'd Quick as the form that caused it; but not so Did the remembrance fly from Coatel, That Madoe lay in bonds. That thought possess'd Her soul, and made her, as she garlanded The fane of Coatlantona with flowers, Tremble in strong emotion.

It was now The hour of dusk; the Pabas all were gone, Gone to the battle ; - none could see her steps ; The gate was nigh. A momentary thought Shot through her; she delay'd not to reflect, But hastened to the Prince, and took the knife Of sacrifice, which by the altar hung, And cut his bonds, and with an eager eye, Motioning haste and silence, to the gate She led him. Fast along the forest way, And fearfully, he followed to the chasm. She beckon'd, and descended, and drew out From underneath her vest, a cage, or net It rather might be called, so fine the twigs Which knit it, where, confined, two fire-flies gave Their Instre. By that light did Madoe first Behold the features of his lovely guide; And through the entrance of the eavern gloom, He followed in full trust.

Now have they reach'd

The abrupt descent; there Coatel held forth Her living lamp, and turning, with a smile Sweet as good Angels wear when they present Their mortal charge before the throne of Heaven, She show'd where little Hoel slept below. Poor child! he lay upon that very spot, The last whereto his feet had follow'd her; And, as he slept, his hand was on the bones Of one who years agone had perish'd there, There, on the place where last his wretched eyes Could eatch the gleam of day. But when the voice,

The well-known voice of Madoe wakened him, — His Uncle's voice, — he started, with a scream Which echoed thro' the cavern's winding length,

And stretch'd his arms to reach him. Madoc hush'd

The dangerous transport, raised him up the ascent, And followed Coatel again, whose face, Though tears of pleasure still were coursing down, Betokened fear and haste. Adown the wood They went; and, coasting now the lake, her eye First what they sought beheld, a light canoe, Moor'd to the bank. Then in her arms she took The child, and kiss'd him with maternal love, And placed him in the boat; but when the Prince, With looks, and gestures, and imperfect words, Such as the look, the gesture, well explain'd, Urged her to follow, doubtfully she stood : A dread of danger, for the thing she had done, Came on her, and Lineoya rose to mind. Almost she had resolved; but then she thought Of her dear father, whom that flight would leave Alone in age; how he would weep for her, As one among the dead, and to the grave Go sorrowing; or, if ever it were known What she had dared, that on his head the weight Of punishment would fall. That dreadful fear Resolved her, and she waved her head, and raised Her hand, to bid the Prince depart in haste, With looks whose painful seriousness forbade All further effort. Yet unwillingly, And boding evil, Madoe from the shore Push'd off his little boat. She on its way Stood gazing for a moment, lost in thought, Then struck into the woods.

Swift through the lake Madoe's strong arm impell'd the light canoe. Fainter and fainter to his distant ear The sound of battle came; and now the Moon Arose in heaven, and poured o'er lake and land A soft and mellowing ray. Along the shore Llaian was wandering with distracted steps, And groaning for her child. She saw the boat Approach ; and as on Madoe's naked limbs, And on his countenance, the moonbeam fell, And as she saw the boy in that dim light, It seemed as though the Spirits of the dead Were moving on the waters; and she stood With open lips that breathed not, and fix'd eyes, Watching the unreal shapes : but when the boat Drew nigh, and Madoe landed, and she saw His step substantial, and the child came near, Unable then to move, or speak, or breathe, Down on the sand she sank.

But who can tell,

Who comprehend, her agony of joy, When, by the Prince's care restored to sense, She recognized her child, she heard the name Of mother from that voice, which, sure, she thought Had pour'd upon some Priest's remorseless ear

Its last vain prayer for life? No tear relieved
The insupportable feeling that convulsed
Her swelling breast. She look'd, and look'd, and felt
The child, lest some delusion should have mock'd
Her soul to madness; then the gushing joy
Burst forth, and with caresses and with tears

She mingled broken prayers of thanks to Heaven

And now the Prince, when joy had had its course, Said to her, Knowest thou the mountain path? For 1 would to the battle. But at that, A sudden damp of dread came over her. O leave us not! she cried; lest haply ill Should have befallen; for I remember, now, How in the woods I spied a savage band Making towards Caermadoc. God forefend The evil that I fear ! - What ! Madoc cried, Were ye then left defenceless? - She replied, All ran to arms: there was no time for thought, Nor counsel, in that sudden ill; nor one Of all thy people, who could, in that hour, Have brook'd home-duty, when thy life or death Hung on the chance.

Now God be merciful! Said he; for of Goervyl then he thought, And the cold sweat started at every pore. Give me the boy ! — he travels all too slow. Then in his arms he took him, and sped on, Suffering more painful terrors than of late His own near death provoked. They held their way

In silence up the heights; and, when at length They reached the entrance of the vale, the Prince Bade her remain, while he went on, to spy The footsteps of the spoiler. Soon he saw Men, in the moonlight, stretch'd upon the ground; And quickening then his pace, in worst alarm, Along the shade, with cautious step, he moved Toward one, to seize his weapons : 'twas a corpse ; Nor whether, at the sight, to hope or fear Yet knew he. But anon, a steady light, As of a taper, seen in his own home, Comforted him; and, drawing nearer now, He saw his sister on her knees, beside The rushes, ministering to a wounded man. Safe that the dear one lived, then back he sped With joyful haste, and summon'd Llaian on, And in loud talk advanced. Erillyab first Came forward at the sound; for she had faith To trust the voice. -- They live! they live! she cried ;

God hath redeem'd them !- Nor the Maiden yet Believed the actual joy; like one astound, Or as if struggling with a dream, she stood, Till he came close, and spread his arms, and call'd, Goervyl !- and she fell in his embrace.

But Madoc lingered not; his eager soul Was in the war: in haste he donn'd his arms; And as he felt his own good sword again, Exulting played his heart. —Boy, he exclaim'd To Mervyn, arm thyself, and follow me! For in this battle we shall break the power Of our blood-thirsty foe: and, in thine age, Wouldst thou not wish, when young men crowd arounu,

To hear thee chronicle their fathers' deeds, Wouldst thou not wish to add, — And I, too, fought In that day's conflict?

Mervyn's cheek turn'd pale A moment, then, with terror all suffused, Grew fever-red. Nay, nay, Goervyl cried,

He is too young for battles !— But the Prince, With erring judgment, in that fear-flush'd cheek Beheld the glow of enterprising hope, And youthful courage. I was such a boy, Sister ! he cried, at Counsyllt; and that day, In my first field, with stripling arm, smote down Many a tall Saxon. Saidst thou not but now, How bravely, in the fight of yesterday, He flesh'd his sword,— and wouldst thou keep him here,

And rob him of his glory? See his cheek ! How it hath crimson'd at the unworthy thought ! Arm ! arm ! and to the battle !

How her heart Then panted! how, with late regret, and vain, Senena wished Goervyl then had heard The secret, trembling on her lips so oft, So oft by shame withheld. She thought that now She could have fallen upon her Lady's neck, And told her all; but when she saw the Prince, Imperious shame forbade her, and she felt It were an easier thing to die than speak. Avail'd not now regret or female fear! She mail'd her delicate limbs; beneath the plate Compress'd her bosom; on her golden locks The helmet's overheavy load she placed; Hung from her neck the shield; and, though the sword,

Which swung beside her, lightest she had chosen, Though in her hand she held the slenderest spear, Alike unwieldy for the maiden's grasp, The sword and ashen lance. But as she touch'd The murderous point, an icy shudder ran Through every fibre of her trembling frame; And, overcome by womanly terror, then, The damsel to Goervyl turn'd, and let The breastplate fall, and on her bosom placed The Lady's hand, and hid her face, and cried, Save me! The warrior, who beheld the act, And heard not the low voice, with angry eye Glow'd on the seemly boy of feeble heart. But, in Goervyl, joy had overpower'd The wonder; joy, to find the boy she loved Was one to whom her heart with closer love Might cling; and to her brother she exclaim'd, She must not go! We women in the war Have done our parts.

A moment Madoc dwelt On the false Mervyn, with an eye from whence Displeasure did not wholly pass away. Nor loitering to resolve Love's riddle now, To Malinal he turn'd, where on his couch The wounded youth was laid - True friend, said he, And brother mine, - for truly by that name I trust to greet thee, - if in this near fight, My hour should overtake me, - as who knows The lot of war? - Goervyl hath my charge To quite thee for thy service with herself; That so thou mayest raise up seed to me Of mine own blood, who may inherit here The obedience of thy people and of mine --Malinal took his hand, and to his lips Feebly he press'd it, saying, One boon more, Father and friend, I ask ! - if thou shouldst meet Yuhidthiton in battle, think of me

XVIII.

THE VICTORY.

MERCIFUL God! how horrible is night Upon the plain of Aztlan! there the shout Of battle, the barbarian yell, the bray Of dissonant instruments, the clang of arms, The shriek of agony, the groan of death, In one wild uproar and continuous din, Shake the still air; while, overhead, the Moon, Regardless of the stir of this low world, Holds on her heavenly way. Still unallay'd By slanghter raged the battle, unrelax'd By lengthened toil; anger supplying still Strength undiminish'd for the desperate strife. And lo! where, yonder, on the temple top, Blazing aleft, the sacrificial fire, Scene more accurst and hideous than the war, Displays to all the vale; for whosee'er That night the Aztecas could bear away, Hoaman or Briton, thither was he borne; And as they stretch'd him on the stone of blood, Did the huge tambour of the God, with voice Loud as the thunder-peal, and heard as far, Proclaim the act of death, more visible Than in broad day-light, by those midnight fires Distinctlier seen. Sight that with horror fill'd The Cymry, and to mightier efforts roused. Howbeit, this abhorred idolatry Work'd for their safety; the delnded foes, Obstinate in their faith, forbearing still The mortal stroke, that they might to the God Present the living victim, and to him Let the life flow.

And now the orient sky Glow'd with the ruddy morning, when the Prince Came to the field. He lifted up his voice, And shonted, Madoc ! Madoc ! They who heard The cry, astonish'd, turn'd; and when they saw The conntenance his open helm disclosed, They echoed, Madoc ! Madoc ! Through the host Spread the miraculous joy - Ile lives! he lives! He comes himself in arms ! - Lincova heard, As he had raised his arm to strike a foe, And stay'd the stroke, and thrust him off, and cried, Go tell the tidings to thy countrymen, Madoc is in the war! Tell them his God Hath set the White King free ! Astonishment Seized on the Azteca; on all who heard, Amazement and dismay ; and Madoc now Stood in the foremost battle, and his sword -His own good sword-flash'd like the sudden death

Of lightning in their eyes.

The King of Aztlan Heard and beheld, and in his noble heart Heroic hope arose. Forward he moved, And in the shock of battle, front to front, Encountered Madoc. A strong-statured man Coanocotzin stood, one well who knew The ways of war, and never yet in fight Had found an equal foe. Adown his back Hung the long robe of feathered royalty; Gold fenced his arms and legs; upon his helm A sculptured snake protends the arrowy tongue; Around a coronal of plumes arose, Brighter than beam the rainbow hues of light, Or than the evening glories which the sun Slants o'er the moving, many-color'd sea ---Such their snrpassing beanty; bells of gold Emboss'd his glittering helmet, and where'er Their sound was heard, there lay the press of war, And Death was busiest there. Over the breast And o'er the golden breastplate of the King, A feathery cnirass, beautiful to eye, Light as the robe of peace, yet strong to save; For the sharp falchion's baffled edge would glide From its smooth softness. On his arm he held A bnckler overlaid with beaten gold; And so he stood, guarding his thighs and legs, His breast and shoulders also, with the length Of his broad shield.

Opposed, in mail complete, Stood Madoc in his strength. The flexile chains Gave play to his full muscles, and displayed How broad his shoulders, and his ample breast. Small was his shield, there broadest where it fenced The well of life, and gradual to a point Lessening, steel-strong, and wieldy in his grasp. It bore those blazoned eaglets, at whose sight, Along the Marches, or where holy Dee Through Cestrian pastures rolls his tamer stream, So oft the yeoman had, in days of yore, Chrsing his perilous tenure, wound the horn, And warden from the castle-tower rung out The loud alarum-bell, heard far and wide. Upon his helm no sculptured dragon sat, Sat no fantastic terrors ; a white plume Nodded above, far-seen, floating like foam Upon the stream of battle, always where The tide ran strongest. Man to man opposed, The Sea Lord and the King of Aztlan stood.

Fast on the intervening buckler fell The Azteca's stone falchion. Who hath watch'd The midnight lightnings of the summer storm, That with their awful blaze irradiate heaven, Then leave a blacker night? So quick, so fierce, Flash'd Madoc's sword, which, like the serpent's tongue, Seemed double, in its rapid whirl of light.

Unequal arms! for on the British shield Avail'd not the stone falchion's brittle edge, And in the golden buckler, Madoc's sword Bit deep. Coanocotzin saw, and dropp'd The unprofitable weapon, and received [force, His ponderous club, — that club, heneath whose Driven by his father's arm, Tepolloni Had fallen subdued, — and fast and fierce he drove The massy weight on Madoc. From his shield, The deadening force communicated ran Up his stnnt'd arm; anon, upon his helm Crashing, it came; — his eyes shot fire, his brain Swam dizzy, — he recoils, — he recels, — again The club descends.

That danger to himself Recall'd the Lord of Ocean. On he spring, Within the falling weapon's curve of death, Shunning its frustrate aim, and breast to breast He grappled with the King. The pliant mail Bent to his straining limbs, while plates of gold, The feathery robe, the buckler's amplitude, Cumbered the Azteca, and from his arm, Clinch'd in the Briton's mighty grasp, at once He dropp'd the impeding buckler, and let fall The unfastened club; which when the Prince beheld.

He thrust him off, and drawing back, resumed The sword that from his wrist suspended hung, And twice he smote the King; twice from the quilt Of plumes the iron glides; and lot the King — So well his soldiers watch their monarch's need — Shakes in his hand a spear.

But now a cry

Burst on the ear of Madoc, and he saw Through opening ranks, where Urien was convey'd, A captive, to his death. Grief, then, and shame, And rage, inspired him. With a mighty blow He cleft Coancectzin's helm ; exposed The monarch stood; — again the thunder-stroke Came on him, and he fell. — The multitude, Forgetful of their country and themselves, Crowd round their dying King. Madoc, whose eye Still follow'd Urien, call'd npon his men, And through the broken army of the foe, Press'd to his rescue.

But far off the old man Was borne with furious speed. Ririd alone Pursued his path, and through the thick of war Close on the captors, with avenging sword, Follow'd right on, and through the multitude, And through the gate of Aztlan, made his way, And through the streets, till from the temple-mound, The press of Pabas and the populace Repell'd him, while the old man was hurried up. Hark ! that infernal tambour ! o'er the lake Its long, loud thunders roll, and through the hills, Awakening all their echoes. Ye accurs'd, Ye blow the fall too soon ! Ye Dogs of Hell, The Hart is yet at bay ! - Thus long the old man, As one exhausted or resign'd, had lain, Resisting not; but at that knell of death, Springing with unexpected force, he freed His feet, and shook the Pabas from their hold, And, with his armed hand, between the eyes Smote one so sternly, that to earth he fell, Bleeding, and all astound. A man of proof Was Urien in his day, thought worthiest, In martial thewes and manly discipline, To train the sons of Owen. He had lost Youth's supple sleight ; yet still the skill remain'd, And in his stiffen'd limbs a strength, which yet Might put the young to shame. And now he set His back against the altar, resolute Not as a victim by the knife to die, But in the act of battle, as became A man grown gray in arms; and in his heart There was a living hope; for now he knew That Madoc lived, nor could the struggle long Endure against that arm.

Soon was the way Laid open by the sword ; for side by side The brethren of Aberfraw mow'd their path ; And, following close, the Cymry drive along. Till on the summit of the mound their cry Of victory rings aloud. The temple floor, So often which had reek'd with innocent blood, Reeks now with righteous slaughter. Franticly, In the wild fury of their desperate zeal, The Priests crowd round the God, and with their knives

Hack at the foe, and call on him to save ; --At the Altar, at the Idol's feet they Iall. Nor with less frenzy did the multitude Flock to defend their God. Fast as they fell, New victims rush'd upon the British sword ; And sure that day had rooted from the earth The Aztecas, and on their conquerors drawn Promiscuous ruin, had not Madoc now Beheld from whence the fearless ardor sprang ; --They saw Mexitli ; momently they hoped That he would rise in vengeance. Madoc seized A massy club, and from his azure throne Shattered the giant idol.

At that sight The men of Aztlan pause; so was their pause Dreadful, as when a multitude expect [saw The Earthquake's second shock. But when they Earth did not open, nor the temple fall, To crush their impious enemics, dismay'd, They felt themselves forsaken by their Gods; Then from their temples and their homes they fled, And, leaving Aztlan to the conqueror, Sought the near city, whither they had sent Their women, timely saved.

But Tlalala,

With growing fury as the danger grew, Raged in the battle; but Yuhidthiton Still with calm courage, till no hope remain'd, Fronted the rushing foe. When all was vain, When hack within the gate Cadwallon's force Resistless had compell'd them, then the Chief Call'd on the Tiger — Let us bear from hence The dead Ocellopan, the slaughter'd King; Not to the Strangers should their bones be left, O Tlalal ! — The Tiger wept with rage, With generous anger. To the place of death, Where, side by side, the noble dead were stretch'd, They fought their way. Eight warriors join'd their shields;

On these - a bier which well beseem'd the dead -The lifeless Chiefs were laid. Yuhidthiton Call'd on the people - Men of Aztlan! yet One effort more ! Bear hence Ocellopan; Bear hence the body of your noble King ! Not to the Strangers should their bones be left ! That whose heard, with wailing and loud cries, Press'd round the body-bearers; few indeed, For few were they who in that fearful hour Had ears to hear, - but with a holy zeal, Careless of death, around the bier they ranged Their bulwark breasts. So toward the farther gate They held their steady way, while ontermost, In unabated valor, Tlalala Faced, with Yuhidthiton, the foe's pursuit. Vain valor then, and fatal piety, As the fierce conquerors hore on their retreat, If Madoc had not seen their perilous strife:

Remembering Malinal, and in his heart Honoring a gallant foe, he call'd aloud, And bade his people cease the hot pursuit. So, through the city gate, they bore away The dead; and, last of all their countrymen, Leaving their homes and temples to the foe, Yuhidthiton and Tlalala retired

THE FUNERAL.

SOUTHWARD of Aztlan stood, beside the Lake, A city of the Aztecas, by name Patamba. Thither, from the first alarm, The women and infirm old men were sent, And children: thither they who from the fight, And from the fall of Aztlan, had escaped, In scattered bands, repair'd. Their City lost, Their Monarch slain, their Idols overthrown, -These tidings spread dismay ; but to dismay Succeeded horror soon, and kindling rage ; Horror, by each new eircumstance increased, By numbers, rage imbolden'd. Lo! to the town, Lamenting loud, a numerous train approach, Like mountain torrents, swelling as they go. Borne in the midst, upon the bier of shields, The noble dead were seen. To tenfold grief That spectacle provoked, to tenfold wrath That anguish stung them. With their yells and groans Curses are mix'd, and threats, and hitter vows Of vengeance full and speedy. From the wreek Of Aztlan who is saved? Tezozomoc, Chief servant of the Gods, their favored Priest, The voice by whom they speak; young Tlalala, Whom even defeat with fresher glory crowns; And full of fame, their country's rock of strength, Yuhidthiton: him to their sovereign slain Allied in blood, mature in wisdom him, Of valor unsurpassable, by all Beloved and honor'd, him the general voice Acclaims their King; him they demand, to lead Their gathered force to battle, to revenge Fheir Lord, their Gods, their kinsmen, to redeem Their altars and their country.

But the dead First from the nation's gratitude require The rites of death. On mats of mountain palm, Wrought of rare texture and of richest hues, The slaughter'd warriors, side by side, were laid; Their bodies wrapp'd in many-color'd robes Of gossampine, bedeck'd with gems and gold. The livid paleness of the countenance, A mask conceal'd, and hid their ghastly wounds. The Pabas stood around, and one by one, Placed in their hands the sacred aloe leaves, With mystic forms and characters inscribed; And as each leaf was given, Tezozomoc Address'd the dead - So may ye safely pass Between the mountains, which in endless war Hurtle, with horrible uproar, and frush Of rocks that meet in battle. Arm'd with this,

In safety shall ye walk along the road, Where the Great Serpent from his lurid eyes Shoots lightning, and across the guarded way Vibrates his tongue of fire. Receive the third, And cross the waters where the Crocodile In vain expects his prey. Your passport this Through the Eight Deserts; through the Eight Hills this;

And this be your defence against the Wind, Whose fury sweeps like dust the uprooted rocks, Whose keenness cuts the soul. Ye noble Dead, Protected with these potent amulets, Soon shall your Spirits reach triumphantly The Palace of the Sun !

The funeral train Moved to Mexitli's temple. First on high The noble dead were borne; in loud lament Then follow'd all by blood allied to them, Or by affection's voluntary ties Attach'd more closely, brethren, kinsmen, wives. The Peers of Aztlan, all who from the sword Of Britain had escaped, honoring the rites, Came clad in rich array, and bore the arms And ensigns of the dead. The slaves went last, And dwarfs, the pastime of the living chiefs, In life their sport and mockery, and in death Their victims. Wailing and with Inneral hymns, The long procession moved. Mexitli's Priest, With all his servants, from the temple-gate Advanced to meet the train. Two piles were built Within the sacred court, of odorous wood, And rich with gums; on these, with all their robes, Their ensigns, and their arms, they laid the dead, Then lit the pile. The rapid light ran up; Up flamed the fire; and o'er the darken'd sky Sweet clouds of incense curl'd.

The Pabas theu

Perform'd their bloody office. First they slew
The women whom the slaughter'd most had loved,
Who most had loved the dead. Silent they went Toward the fatal stone, resisting not,
Nor sorrowing, nor dismay'd, but, as it seem'd, Stunn'd, senseless. One alone there was, whose cheek
Was flush'd, whose eye was animate with fire :
Her most in life Coanocotzin prized,
By ten years' love endear'd, his counsellor,
His friend, the partner of his secret thoughts;

Such had she been, such merited to be.
She, as she bared her bosom to the knife,
Call'd on Yuhidthiton — Take heed, O King !
Aloud she cried, and pointed to the Priests;
Beware these wicked men! they to the war
Forced my dead Lord — Thou knowest, and I know,
He loved the Strangers; that his noble mind,
Enlighten'd by their lore, had willingly
Pnt down these cursed altars! — As she spake,
They dragg'd her to the stone. — Nay! nay! she cried,
There needs not force ! I go to join my Lord !

The knife was in her breast. Tezozomoc, Trembling with rage, held up toward the Sun Her reeking heart.

The dwarfs and slaves died last

That bloody office done, they gathered up The ashes of the dead, and coffer'd them Apart; the teeth with them, which unconsumed Among the ashes lay, a single lock Shorn from the corpse, and his lip-emerald, Now held to be the Spirit's flawless heart, In better worlds. The Priest then held on high The little ark which shrined his last remains, And call'd upon the people; - Aztecas, This was your King, the bountiful, the brave, Coanocotzin! Men of Aztlan, hold His memory holy ! learn from him to love Your country and your Gods; for them to live Like him, like him to die. So from yon Heaven, Where in the Spring of Light his Spirit bathes, Often shall he descend; hover above On evening clouds, or plumed with rainbow wings, Sip honey from the flowers, and warble joy. Honor his memory ! emulate his worth ! So saying, in the temple-tower he laid The relics of the King.

These duties done, The living claim their care. His birth, his deeds, The general love, the general voice, have mark'd Yuhidthiton for King. Bareheaded, bare Of foot, of limb, scarfed only round the loins, The Chieftain to Mexitli's temple moved, And knelt before the God. Tezozomoc King over Aztlan there anointed him, And over him, from hallowed cedar-branch, Sprinkled the holy water. Then the Priest In a black garment robed him, figured white With skulls and bones, a garb to emblem war, Slaughter, and ruin, his imperial tasks. Next in his hand the Priest a censer placed; And while he knelt, directing to the God The steaming incense, thus address'd the King: Chosen by the people, by the Gods approved, Swear to protect thy subjects, to maintain The worship of thy fathers, to observe Their laws, to make the Sun pursue his course, The clouds descend in rain, the rivers hold Their wonted channels, and the fruits of earth To ripen in their season ; Swear, O King ! And prosper, as thou holdest good thine oath. He raised his voice, and swore. Then on his brow Tezozomoe the crown of Aztlan placed; And in the robe of emblem'd royalty, Preceded by the golden wands of state, Yuhidthiton went forth, anointed King

THE DEATH OF COATEL.

WHEN now the multitude beheld their King, In gratulations of reiterate joy They shout his name, and hid him lead them on To vengeance. But to answer that appeal Tezozomoe advanced. — Oh! go not forth, Cried the Chief Paba, till the land be purged From her offence! No God will lead ye on, While there is guilt in Aztlan. Let the Priests Who from the ruined city have escaped, And all who in her temples have perform'd The ennobling service of her injured Gods, Gather together now.

He spake; the train Assembled, priests and matrons, youths and mails. Servants of Heaven! aloud the Arch-Priest began, The Gods had favor'd Aztlan; bound for death The White King lay: our countrymen were strong In battle, and the conquest had been ours, ---I speak not from myself, but as the Powers, Whose voice on earth I am, impel the truth, -The conquest had been ours; but treason lurk'd In Aztlan, treason and foul sacrilege; And therefore were her children in the hour Of need abandon'd; therefore were her youth Cut down, her altars therefore overthrown. The White King, whom ye saw upon the Stone Of Sacrifice, and whom ye held in bonds, Stood in the foremost fight and slew your Lord. Not by a God, O Azteeas, enlarged Broke he his bondage! by a mortal hand, An impious, sacrilegious, traitorous hand, Yonr city was hetray'd, your King was slain, Your shrines polluted. The insulted Power, He who is terrible, beheld the deed; And now he calls for vengeance.

Stern he spake,

And from Mexitli's altar hade the Priest Bring forth the sacred water. In his hand He took the vase, and held it up, and cried, Accurs'd be he who did this deed! Accurs'd The father who begat him, and the breast At which he fed! Death be his portion now, Eternal infamy his lot on earth, His doom eternal horrors! Let his name, From sire to son, be in the people's mouth, Through every generation! Let a curse Of deep, and pious, and effectual hate, Forever follow the detested name; And every curse inflict upon his soul A stab of mortal anguish.

Then he gave The vase. — Drink one by one! the innocent Boldly; on them the water hath no power; But let the guilty tremble! it shall flow A draught of agony and death to him, A stream of fiery poison.

Coatel!

What were thy horrors when the fatal vase Pass'd to thy trial, — when Tezozomoc Fixed his keen eye on thee! A deathiness Came over her, — her blood ran back, — her joints Shook like the palsy, and the dreadful cup Dropp'd from her conscious hold. The Priest exclaim'd,

The hand of God ! the avenger manifest ! Drag her to the altar ! — At that sound of death, The life forsook her limbs, and down she fell, Senseless. They dragg'd her to the Stone of Blood, All senseless as she lay ; — in that dread hour Nature was kind.

Tezozomoc then eried, Bring forth the kindred of this wretch accursea, That none pollute the earth! An aged Priest Came forth, and answered, There is none but I, The father of the dead.

To death with him ! Exclaim'd Tezozomoc; to death with him; And purify the nation ! — But the King Permitted not that crime. — Chief of the Priests, If he be guilty, let the guilty bleed, Said he; but never, while 1 live and reign, The innocent shall suffer. Hear him speak !

Hear me! the old man replied. That fatal day I never saw my child. At morn she left The city, seeking flowers to dress the shrine Of Coatlantona; and that at eve I stood among the Pabas in the gate, Blessing our soldiers, as they issued out, Let them who saw bear witness. — Two came forth, And testified Aculhua spake the words Of truth.

Full well 1 know, the old man pursued, My daughter loved the Strangers, — that her heart Was not with Aztlan; but not 1 the cause ! Ye all remember how the Maid was given, — She being, in truth, of all our Maids the flower, — In spousals to Lincoya, him who fled From sacrifice. It was a misery For me to see my only child condemn'd In early widowhood to waste her youth, — My only, and my beautifulest girl! Chief of the Priests, you order'd; 1 obey'd. Not mine the fault, if, when Lincoya fled, And fought among the enemies, her heart Was with her husband.

He is innocent¹ He shall not die ! Yuhidthiton exclaim'd Nay, King Yuhidthiton ! Aculhua eried, I merit death. My country overthrown, My daughter slain, alike demand on me That justice. When her years of ministry, Vow'd to the temple, had expired, my love, My selfish love, still suffer'd her to give Her youth to me, by filial piety In widowhood detain'd. That selfish crime Heavily, - heavily, - do I explate ! But I am old; and she was all to me. O King Yuhidthiton, I ask for death; In mercy, let me die ! eruel it were To bid me waste away alone in age, By the slow pain of grief. - Give me the knife Which pierced my daughter's bosom !

The old man

Moved to the altar; none opposed his way; With a firm hand he buried in his heart The reeking flint, and fell upon his child

XXI.

THE SPORTS.

A TRANSITORY gloom that sight of death Impress'd upon the assembled multitude; But soon the brute and unreflecting crew Turn'd to their sports. Some bare their olive limbs,

And in the race contend; with hopes and fears Which rouse to rage, some urge the mimic war. Here one upon his ample shoulders bears A comrade's weight, upon whose head a third Stands poised, like Mercury in act to fly. Two others balance here on their shoulders A bifork'd beam, while on its height a third To nimble cadence shifts his glancing feet, And shakes a plume aloft, and wheels around A wreath of bells with modulating sway. Here round a lofty mast the dancers move Quick, to quick music; from its top affix'd, Each holds a colored cord, and as they weave The complex crossings of the mazy dance, The checker'd network twists around the tree Its intertexture of harmonious hues.

But now a shout went forth; the Fliers mount, And from all meaner sports the multitude Flock to their favorite pastime. In the ground, Branchless and bark'd, the trunk of some tall pine Is planted; near its summit a square frame; Four cords pass through the perforated square, And fifty times and twice around the tree, A mystic number, are entwined above. Four Aztecas, equipp'd with wings, ascend, And round them bind the ropes; anon they wave Their pinions, and upborne on spreading plumes, Launch on the air, and wheel in circling flight, The lengthening cords untwisting as they fly. A fifth above, upon the perilous point Dances, and shakes a flag; and on the frame, Others the while maintain their giddy stand, Till now, with many a round, the wheeling cords Draw near their utmost length, and toward the ground

The adrial circlers speed; then down the ropes They spring, and on their way from line to line Pass, while the shouting multitude endure A shuddering admiration.

On such sports, Their feelings centred in the joy of sight, The multitude stood gazing, when a man, Breathless, and with broad eyes, came running on, His pale lips trembling, and his bloodless check Like one who meets a lion in his path. The fire! the fire! the temple! he exclaim'd; Mexitli ! - They, astonish'd at his words, Hasten toward the wonder, - and behold ! The inner fane is sheeted white with fire. Dumb with affright they stood; the inquiring King Look'd to Tezozomoe; the Priest replied, I go! the Gods protect me; - and therewith He entered boldly in the house of flame. But instant bounding with inebriate joy, He issues forth - The God! the God! he cries Joy !- joy !- the God !- the visible hand c' Heaven!

Repressing then his transport — Ye all know How that in Aztlan Madoc's impious hand Destroyed Mexitli's image; — it is here, Unbroken, and the same! — Toward the gate They press; they see the Giant Idol there, The serpent girding him, his neck with hearts Beaded, and in his hand the club, — even such

As oft in Aztlan, on his azure throne, They had adored the God, they see him now, Unbroken and the same ! — Again the Priest Enter'd; again a second joy inspired To frenzy all around; — for forth he came, Shouting with new delight, — for in his hand The banner of the nation he upheld, That banner to their fathers sent from Heaven, By them abandoned to the conqueror.

He motion'd silence, and the crowd were still. People of Aztlan! he began, when first Your fathers from their native land went forth, In search of better seats, this banner came From Heaven. The Famine and the Pestilence Had been among them; in their hearts the spring Of courage was dried up: with midnight fires Radiate, by midnight thunders heralded, This banner came from Heaven; and with it came Health, valor, victory. Aztecas: again The God restores the blessing. To the God Move now in solemn dance of grateful joy; Exalt for him the song.

They form'd the dance, They raised the hymn, and sung Mexitli's praise. Glory to thee, the Great, the Terrible, Mexitli, guardian God! - From whence art thou, O Son of Mystery? From whence art thou, Whose sire thy Mother knew not? She at eve Walk'd in the temple court, and saw from heaven A plume descend, as bright and beautiful, As if some spirit had imbodied there The rainbow hues, or dipp'd it in the light Of setting suns. To her it floated down; She placed it in her bosom, to bedeck The altar of the God; she sought it there; Amazed she found it not; amazed she felt Another life infused. - From whence art thou, O Son of Mystery? From whence art thou, Whose sire thy Mother knew not?

Grief was hers,

Wonder and grief, for life was in her womb, And her stern children with revengeful eyes Beheld their mother's shame. She saw their frowns, She knew their plots of blood. Where shall she look

For succor, when her sons conspire her death? Where hope for comfort, when her daughter whets The impious knife of murder? — From her womb The voice of comfort came, the timely aid: Already at her breast the blow was aim'd, When forth Mexitli leap'd, and in his hand The angry spear, to punish and to save. Glory to thee, the Great, the Terrible, Mexitli, guardian God! Arise and save,

Mexitli, save thy people! Dreadful one, Arise, redeem thy city, and revenge! An impious, an impenetrable foe, Hath blacken'd thine own altars with the blood Of thine own priests; hath dash'd thine Image down.

In vain did valor's naked breast oppose Their mighty arms; in vain the feeble sword 52 On their impenetrable mail was driven. Not against thee, Avenger, shall those arms Avail, nor that impenetrable mail Resist the fiery arrows of thy wrath. Arise, go forth in anger, and destrov ?

THE DEATH OF LINCOYA.

AZTLAN, meantime, presents a hideous scene Of slaughter. The hot sunbeam, in her streets, Parch'd the blood pools; the slain were heap'd in hills:

The victors, stretch'd in every little shade, With unhelm'd heads, reclining on their shields, Slept the deep sleep of weariness. Erelong, To needful labor rising, from the gates They drag the dead ; and with united toil, They dig upon the plain the general grave, The grave of thousands, deep, and wide, and long. Ten such they delved, and o'er the multitudes Who levell'd with the plain the deep-dug pits, Ten monumental hills they heap'd on high. Next, horror heightening joy, they overthrew The skull-built towers, the files of human heads, And earth to earth consign'd them. To the flames They cast the idols, and upon the wind Scatter'd their ashes; then the temples fell, Whose black and putrid walls were sealed with whose black and putrid walls were scaled with blood,

Victorious thus In Aztlan, it behoved the Cymry now There to collect their strength, and there await, Or thence with centred numbers urge, the war. For this was Ririd missioned to the ships; For this Lincova from the hills invites Erillyab and her tribe. There did not breathe, On this wide world a happier man that day Than young Lincoya, when from their retreat He bade his countrymen come repossess The land of their forefathers; proud at heart To think how great a part himself had borne In their revenge, and that beloved one, The gentle savior of the Prince, whom well He knew his own dear love, and for the deed Still dearer loved the dearest. Round the youth Women and children, the infirm and old, Gather to hear his tale; and as they stood With eyes of steady wonder, outstretch'd necks, And open lips of listening eagerness, Fast play'd the tide of triumph in his veins, Flush'd his brown cheek, and kindled his dark eye.

And now, reposing from his toil awhile, Lincoya, on a crag above the straits, Sat underneath a tree, whose twinkling leaves Sung to the gale at noon. Ayayaca Sat by him in the shade; the old man had loved The youth beside him from his boyhood up. And still would call him boy. They sat and watch'd The laden bisons winding down the way, The multitude who now with joy forsook Their desolated dwellings; and their talk Was of the days of sorrow, when they groan'd Beneath the intolerable yoke, till sent By the Great Spirit o'er the pathless deep Prince Madoc the Deliverer came to save. As thus they communed, came a woman up, Seeking Lincoya; 'twas Aculhua's slave, The nurse of Coatel. Her wretched cye, Her pale and livid countenance, foretold Some tale of misery, and his life-blood ebb'd In ominous fear. But when he heard her words Of death, he seized the lance, and raised his arm To strike the blow of comfort.

The old man Caught his uplifted hand — O'erhasty boy, Quoth he, regain her yet, if she was dear ! Seek thy beloved in the Land of Souls, And beg her from the Gods. The Gods will hear, And, in just recompense of love so true, Restore their charge.

The miserable youth Turned at his words a hesitating eye. I knew a prisoner, - so the old man pursued, Or hoping to beguile the youth's despair With tales that suited the despair of youth, Or credulous himself of what he told, l knew a prisoner once who welcomed death With merriment, and songs, and joy of heart, Because, he said, the friends whom he loved best Were gone before him to the Land of Souls; Nor would they, to resume their mortal state, Even when the Keeper of the Land allowed, Forsake its pleasures; therefore he rejoiced To die and join them there. I question'd him How of these hidden things unknowable So certainly he spake. The man replied, One of our nation lost the maid he loved, Nor would he bear his sorrow, - being one Into whose heart fear never found a way,-But to the Country of the Dead pursued Her spirit. Many toils he underwent, And many dangers gallantly surpass'd, Till to the Country of the Dead he came. Gently the Guardian of the Land received The living suppliant; listen'd to his prayer, And gave him back the Spirit of the Maid. But from that happy country, from the songs Of joyance, from the splendor-sparkling dance, Unwillingly compell'd, the Maiden's Soul Loathed to return; and he was warn'd to guard The subtle captive well and warily, Till, in her mortal tenement relodged, Earthly delights might win her to remain A sojourner on earth. Such lessoning The Ruler of the Souls departed gave ; And mindful of his charge, the adventurer brought His subtle captive home. There underneath The shelder of a hut, his friends had watch'd The Maiden's corpse, secured it from the sun, And fann'd away the insect swarms of heaven. A busy hand marr'd all the enterprise; Curious to see the Spirit, he unloosed The knotted bag which held her, and she fled.

Lincoya, thou art brave; where man has gone Thou wouldst not fear to follow!

Silently Lincoya listen'd, and with unmoved eyes; At length he answered, Is the journey long? The old man replied, A way of many moons. I know a shorter path ! exclaimed the youth; And up he sprung, and from the precipice Darted: a moment, — and Ayayaca heard His body fall upon the rocks below.

ХХИІ.

CARADOC AND SENENA.

MAID of the golden locks, far other lot May gentle Heaven assign thy happier love, Blue-eyed Senena! — She, though not as yet Had she put off her boy-habiliments, Had told Goervyl all the history Of her sad flight, and easy pardon gain'd From that sweet heart, for guile which meant no ill, And secrecy, in shame too long maintain'd. With her dear Lady now, at this still hour

With her dear Lady new, at this still hour Of evening is the seeming page gone forth, Beside Caermadoc mere. They loitered on, Along the windings of its grassy shore, In such free interchange of inward thought As the calm hour invited; or at times, Willingly silent, listening to the bird Whose one repeated melancholy note, By oft repeating melancholy made, Solicited the ear; or gladlier now Hearkening that cheerful one, who knoweth all The songs of all the winged choristers, And in one sequence of melodious sounds Pours all their music. But a wilder strain At fits eame o'er the water; rising now, Now with a dying fall, in sink and swell More exquisitely sweet than ever art Of man evoked from instrument of touch, Or beat, or breath. It was the evening gale, Which, passing o'er the harp of Caradoc, Swept all its chords at once, and blended all Their music into one continuous flow. The solitary Bard, beside his harp, Lean'd underneath a tree, whose spreading boughs, With broken shade that shifted to the breeze, Play'd on the waving waters. Overhead There was the leafy murmur, at his foot The lake's perpetual ripple; and from far, Borne on the modulating gale, was heard The roaring of the mountain cataract --A blind man would have loved the lovely spot.

Here was Senena by her Lady led, Trembling, but not reluctant. They drew nigh, Their steps unheard upon the elastic moss, Till playfully Goervyl, with quick touch, Ran o'er the harp-strings. At the sudden sound He rose.—Hath, then, thy hand, quoth she, O Bard, થયું છે.

- Forgot its cunning, that the wind should be Thine harper?—Come! one strain for Britain's sake;
- And let the theme be Woman ! He replied,
- But if the strain offend, O Lady fair,
- Blame thou the theme, not me ! Then to the harp He sung, — Three things a wise man will not trust,
- The Wind, the Sunshine of an April day, And Woman's plighted faith. I have beheld The Weathercock upon the steeple-point Steady from morn till eve; and I have seen The bees go forth upon an April morn, Secure the sunshine will not end in showers; But when was Woman true?

False Bard! thereat, With smile of playful anger, she exclaim'd, False Bard! and slanderous song! Were such thy thoughts

Of woman, when thy youthful lays were heard In Heilyn's hall? — But at that name his heart Leap'd, and his cheek with sudden flush was fired; In Heilyn's hall, quoth he, I learn'd the song. There was a Maid, who dwelt among the hills Of Arvon, and to one of humbler birth Had pledged her troth—nor rashly, nor beguiled ; — They had been playmates in their infancy, And she in all his thoughts had borne a part, And all his joys. The Moon and all the Stars Witness'd their mutual vows; and for her sake The song was framed; for, in the face of day, She broke them. — But her name? Goervyl ask'd; Quoth he, The poet loved her still too well, To couple it with shame.

O fate unjust Of womankind! she eried; our virtues bloom, Like violets, in shade and solitude, While evil eyes hunt all our failings out For evil tongues to bruit abroad in jest, And song of obloquy !- I knew a Maid, And she, too, dwelt in Arvon, and she too, Loved one of lowly birth, who ill repaid Her spotless faith; for he to ill reports, And tales of falsehood cunningly devised, Lent a light ear, and to his rival left The loathing Maid. The wedding-day arrived ; The harpers and the gleemen, far and near, Came to the wedding-feast; the wedding-guests Were come, the altar dress'd, the bridemaids met, The father, and the bridegroom, and the priest, Wait for the bride But she the while did off Her bridal robes, and clipp'd her golden locks, And put on boy's attire, through wood and wild To seek her own true love; and over sea, Forsaking all for him, she followed him, --Nor hoping nor deserving fate so fair; And at his side she stood, and heard him wrong Her faith with slanderous tales; and his dull eye, As it had learn'd his heart's forgetfulness, Knows not the trembling one, who even now Yearns to forgive him all !

He turn'd; he knew The blue-eyed Maid, who fell upon his breast.

XXIV.

THE EMBASSY.

HARK! from the towers of Aztlan how the shouts Of clamorous joy re-ring ! the rocks and hills Take up the joyful sound, and o'er the lake Roll their slow echoes. - Thou art beautiful, Queen of the Valley ! thou art beautiful ! Thy walls, like silver, sparkle to the sun; Melodious wave thy groves ; thy garden-sweets Enrich the pleasant air ; upon the lake Lie the long shadows of thy towers; and high In heaven thy temple-pyramids arise, Upon whose summit now, far visible Against the clear blue sky, the Cross of Christ Proclaims unto the nations round the news Of thy redemption. Thou art beautiful, Aztlan ! O City of the Cymbric Prince ! Long mayst thou flourish in thy beauty, long Prosper beneath the righteous conqueror, Who conquers to redeem ! Long years of peace And happiness await thy Lord and thee, Queen of the Valley !

Hither joyfully

The Hoamen came to repossess the land Of their forefathers. Joyfully the youth Come shouting, with acclaim of grateful praise, Their great Deliverer's name; the old, in talk Of other days, which mingled with their joy Memory of many a hard calamity, And thoughts of time and change, and human life How changeful and how brief. Prince Madoe met Erillyab at the gate. — Sister and Queen, Said he, here let us hold united reign, O'er our united people; by one faith, One interest bound, and closer to be link'd By laws, and language, and domestic ties, Till both become one race, for evermore Indissolubly knit.

O friend, she cried, The last of all my family am I; Yet sure, though last, the happiest, and by Heaven Favored abundantly above them all. Dear Friend, and Brother dear! enough for me Beneath the shadow of thy shield to dwell, And see my people, by thy fostering care, Made worthy of their fortune. Graciously Hath the Beloved One appointed all, Educing good from ill, himself being good. Then to the royal palace of the Kings Of Aztlan, Madoe led Erillyab, There where her sires had held their ruder reign, To pass the happy remnant of her years, Honor'd and loved by all.

Now had the Prince Provided for defence, disposing all As though a ready enemy approach'd. But from Patanha yet no army moved: Four Heralds only, by the King despatch'd, Drew nigh the town. The Hoamen, as they came Knew the green mantle of their privilege, The symbols which they bore, an arrow-point Depress'd, a shield, a net, which, from the arm Suspended, held their food. They through the gate | Pass with permitted entrance, and demand To see the Ocean Prince. The Conqueror Received them, and the elder thus began: Thus to the White King, King Yuhidthiton His bidding sends; such greeting as from foe Foe may receive, where individual hate Is none, but honor and assured esteem, And what were friendship, did the Gods permit, The King of Aztlan sends. Oh, dream not thou That Aztlan is subdued; nor in the pride Of conquest tempt thy fortune! Unprepared For battle, at an hour of festival, Her children were surprised; and thou canst tell How perilously they maintain'd the long And doubtful strife. From yonder temple-mount Look round the plain, and count her towns, and mark

Her countless villages, whose habitants All are in arms against thee ! Thinkest thou To root them from the land ? Or wouldst thou live, Harass'd by night and day with endless war, War at thy gates; and to thy children leave That curse for their inheritance? - The land Is all before thee: Go in peace, and choose Thy dwelling-place, North, South, or East, or West; Or mount again thy houses of the sea, And search the waters. Whatsoe'er thy wants Demand, will Aztlan willingly supply, Prepared with friendly succor, to assist Thy soon departure. Thus Yuhidthiton, Remembering his old friendship, counsels thee; Thus, as the King of Aztlan, for himself And people, he commands. If obstinate, If blind to your own welfare, ye persist, Woe to ye, wretches! to the armed man, Who in the fight must perish; to the wife, Who vainly on her husband's aid will call; Woe to the babe that hangs upon the breast; For Aztlan comes in anger, and her Gods Spare none.

The Conqueror ealmly answer'd him — By force we won your city, Azteca; By force we will maintain it: — to the King Repeat my saying. — To this goodly land Your fathers came for an abiding-place, Strangers, like us, but not, like us, in peace. They conquer'd and destroyed. A tyrant race, Bloody and faithless, to the hills they drove The unoffending children of the vale, And, day by day, in cruel sacrifice Consumed them. God hath sent the Avengers here !

Powerful to save we come, and to destroy, When Merey on Destruction calls for aid. Go tell your nation that we know their force, That they know ours; that their Patamba soon Shall fall like Aztlan; and what other towns They seek in flight, shall like Patamba fall; Fill, broken in their strength and spirit-crush'd, They bow the knee, or leave the land to us, Its worthier Lords.

If this be thy reply, Son of the Ocean! said the messenger, I bid thee, in the King of Aztlan's name, Mortal defiance. In the field of blood, Before our multitudes shall trample down Thy mad and miserable countrymen, Yuhidthiton invites thee to the strife Of equal danger. So may he avenge Coanocotzin, or like him in death Discharge his duty.

Tell Yuhidthiton, Madoe replied, that in the field of blood I never shunn'd a foe. But say thou to him, I will not seek him there, against his life To raise the hand which hath been join'd with his In peace. — With that the Heralds went their way; Nor to the right nor to the left they turn, But to Patamba straight they journey back.

XXV.

THE LAKE FIGHT.

THE mariners, meantime, at Ririd's will, Unreeve the rigging, and the masts they strike ; And now ashore they haul the lighten'd hulks, Tear up the deck, the severed planks bear off, Disjoin the well-scarfed timbers, and the keel Loosen asunder; then to the lake-side Bear the materials, where the Ocean Lord Himself directs their work. Twelve vessels there, Fitted alike to catch the wind, or sweep With oars the moveless surface, they prepare: Lay down the keel, the stern-post rear, and fix The strong-curved timbers. Others from the wood Bring the tall pines, and from their hissing trunks Force, by the aid of fire, the needful gum; Beneath the close-calk'd planks its odorous stream They pour; then, last, the round-projecting prows With iron arm, and launch, in uproar loud Of joy, anticipating victory, The galleys long and sharp. The masts are rear'd,

The galleys long and sharp. The mass are real a, The sails are bent, and lo! the ready barks Lie on the lake.

It chanced the Hoamen found A spy of Aztlan, and before the Prinee They led him. But when Madoc bade him tell, As his life-ransom, what his nation's force, And what their plans, the savage answered him, With dark and sullen eye and smile of wrath, If aught the knowledge of my country's force Could profit thee, be sure, ere I would let My tongue play traitor, thon shouldst limb from limb

Hew me, and make each separate member feel A separate agony of death. O Prince ! But I will tell ye of my nation's force, That ye may know and tremble at your doom ; That fear may half subdue ye to the sword Ofvengeance. — Can ye count the stars of Heaven? The waves which ruffle o'er the lake? the leaves Swept from the autunnal forest? Can ye look Upon the eternal snows of yonder height, And number each particular flake that formed The mountain-mas? — So numberless they come, Whee'er can wield the sword, or hurl the lance,

Or aim the arrow; from the growing boy, Ambitious of the battle, to the old man, Who to revenge his country and his Gods Hastens, and then to die. By land they come; And years must pass away ere on their path The grass again will grow: they come by lake; And ye shall see the shoals of their cances Darken the waters. Strangers! when our Gods Have conquered, when ye lie upon the Stone Of Sacrifice, extended one by one, Half of our armies cannot taste your flesh, Though given in equal shares, and every share Minced like a nestling's food !

Madoc replied,

Azteca, we are few; but through the woods The Lion walks alone. The lesser fowls Flock nultitudinous in heaven, and fly Before the Eagle's coming. We are few; And yet thy nation hath experienced us Enough for conquest. Tell thy countrymen, We can maintain the city which we won.

So saying, he turn'd away, rejoiced at heart To know himself alike by lake or land Prepared to meet their power.

The fateful day

Draws on; hy night the Aztecas embark. At day-break from Patamba they set forth, From every creek and inlet of the lake, All moving towards Aztlan; safely thus Weening to reach the plain before her walls, And fresh for battle. Shine thou forth, O Sun ! Shine fairly forth upon a scene so fair ! Their thousand boats, and the ten thousand oars From whose broad bowls the waters fall and flash, And twice ten thousand feathered helms, and shields, Glittering with gold and scarlet plumery. Onward they come with song and swelling horn; While, louder than all voice and instrument, The dash of their ten thousand oars, from shore To shore, and hill to hill, reëchoing rolls, In undistinguishable peals of sound And endless echo. On the other side Advance the British barks; the freshening breeze Fills the broad sail; around the rushing keel The waters sing; while proudly they sail on, Lords of the water. Shine thou forth, O Sun ! Shine forth upon their hour of victory !

Onward the Cymry speed. The Aztecas, Though wondering at that unexpected sight, Bravely made on to meet them, seized their bows, And showered, like rain, upon the pavaised barks The rattling shafts. Strong blows the auspicious gale;

Madoc, the Lord of Ocean, leads the way; He holds the helm; the galley where he guides Flies on, and full upon the first cance Drives shattering; midway its long length it struck, And o'cr the wreck with unimpeded force Dashes among the fleet. The astonished men Gaze in mactive terror. They behold Their splinter'd vessels floating all around, Their warriors struggling in the lake, with arms

Experienced in the battle vainly now. Dismay'd they drop their bows, and cast away Their unavailing spears, and take to flight, Before the Masters of the Elements, Who rode the waters, and who made the winds Wing them to vengeance! Forward now they bend, And backward then, with strenuous strain of arm, Press the broad paddle. - Hope of victory Was none, nor of defence, nor of revenge, To sweeten death. Toward the shore they speed ; Toward the shore they lift their longing eyes: -O fools, to meet on their own element The Sons of Ocean ! - Could they but aland Set foot, the strife were equal, or to die Less dreadful. But, as if with wings of wind, On fly the British barks !- the favoring breeze Blows strong; - far, far, behind their roaring keels Lies the long line of foam; the helm directs Their force; they move as with the limbs of life, Obedient to the will that governs them. Where'er they pass, the crashing shock is heard, The dash of broken waters, and the cry Of sinking multitudes. Here one plies fast The practised limbs of youth, but o'er his head The galley drives; one follows a canoe With skill availing only to prolong Suffering; another, as with wiser aim He swims across, to meet his coming friends, Stunn'd by the hasty and unheeding oar, Sinks senseless to the depths. Lo! yonder boat Grasp'd by the thronging strugglers; its light length Yields to the overbearing weight, and all Share the same ruin. Here another shows Crueler contest, where the crew hack off The hands that hang for life upon its side, Lest all together perish; then in vain The voice of friend or kinsman prays for mercy : Imperious self controls all other thoughts : And still they deal around unnatural wounds, When the strong bark of Britain over all Sails in the path of death. - God of the Lake, Tlaloc! and thou, O Aiauh, green-robed Queen! How many a wretch, in dying agonies, Invoked ye in the misery of that day ! Long after, on the tainted lake, the dead Weltered; there, perch'd upon his floating prey, The vulture fed in daylight; and the wolves, Assembled at their banquet round its banks, Disturb'd the midnight with their howl of joy.

XXVI.

THE CLOSE OF THE CENTURY.

THERE was mourning in Patamba; the north wind Blew o'er the lake, and drifted to the shore The floating wreck and bodies of the dead. Then on the shore the mother might be seen Seeking her child; the father to the tomb, With limbs too weak for that unhappy weight, Bearing the bloated body of his son; The wife, who, in expectant agony, Watch'd the black carcass on the coming wave.

On every brow terror was legible, Anguish in every eye. There was not one Who, in the general ruin, did not share Peculiar grief, and in his country's loss Lament some dear one dead. Along the lake The frequent funeral-piles, for many a day, With the noon-light their melancholy flames Dimly commingled; while the mourners stood Watching the pile, to feed the lingering fire, As slowly it consumed the watery corpse.

Thou didst not fear, young Tlalala! thy soul, Unconquered and unconquerable, rose Superior to its fortune. When the Chiefs Hung their dejected heads, as men subdued In spirit, then didst thou, Yuhidthiton, Calm in the hour of evil, still maintain Thy even courage. They from man to man Go, with the mourners mourning, and by grief Exciting rage, till, at the promised fight, The hope of vengeance, a ferocious joy Flash'd in the eyes which glisten'd still with tears Of tender memory. To the brave they spake Of Aztlan's strength, — for Aztlan still was strong :—

The late defeat, — not there by manly might, By honorable valor, by the force Of arms subdued, shame aggravated loss; The White Men from the waters came, perchanee Sons of the Ocean, by their parent Gods Aided, and conquerors not by human skill. When man met man, when in the field of fight The soldier on firm earth should plant his foot, Then would the trial be, the struggle then, The glory, the revenge.

Tezozomoc,

Alike unbroken by defeat, endured The evil day; but in his sullen mind [King Work'd thoughts of other vengeance. He the Summon'd apart from all, with Tlalala, And thus advised them : We have vainly tried The war; these mighty Strangers will not yield To mortal strength; yet shall they be cut off, So ye will heed my counsel, and to force Add wisdom's aid. Put on a friendly front; Send to their Prince the messenger of peace; He will believe our words; he will forgive The past; — the offender may. So days and months,

Yea, years, if needful, will we wear a face Of friendliness, till some some fit hour arrive, When we may fire their dwellings in the night, Or mingle poison in their cups of mirth. The warrior, from whose force the Lion flies, Falls by the Serpent's tooth.

Thou speakest well, Tlalala answer'd; but my spirit ill Can brook revenge delay'd.

The Priest then turn'd His small and glittering cyc toward the King; But on the Monarch's mild and manly brow A meaning sat, which made that crafty eye Bend, quickly abash'd. While yet I was a child, Replied the King of Aztlan, on my heart My father laid two precepts. Boy, be brave ! So, in the midnight battle, shalt thou meet, Fearless, the sudden foe. Boy, let thy lips Be clean from falsehood ! In the mid-day sun, So never shalt thou need from mortal man To turn thy guilty face. Tezozomoc, Holy I keep the lessons of my sire.

But if the enemy, with their dreadful arms, Again, said Tlalala, -- If again the Gods Will our defeat, Yuhidthiton replied, Vain is it for the feeble power of man To strive against their will. I augur not Of ill, young Tiger ! but if ill betide, The land is all before us. Let me hear Of perfidy and serpent-wiles no more ! In the noon-day war, and in the face of Heaven, I meet my foes. Let Aztlan follow me; And if one man of all her multitudes Shall better play the warrior in that hour, Be his the sceptre ! But if the people fear The perilous strife, and own themselves subdued, Let us depart ! The universal Sun Confines not to one land his partial beams; Nor is man rooted, like a tree, whose seed The winds on some ungenial soil have cast, There where he cannot prosper.

The dark Priest Conceal'd revengeful anger, and replied, Let the King's will be done ! An awful day Draws on; the Circle of the Years is full; We tremble for the event. The times are strange; There are portentous changes in the world; Perchance its end is come.

Be it thy care, Priest of the Gods, to see the needful rites Duly perform'd, Yuhidthiton replied. On the third day, if yonder Lord of Light Begin the Circle of the Years anew, Again we march to war.

One day is past; Another day comes on. At earliest dawn Then was there heard through all Patamba's streets The warning voice, — Woe! woe! the Sun hath reach'd The limits of his course; he hath fulfill'd

The appointed cycle ! - Fast, and weep, and pray ; Four Suns have perish'd, - fast, and weep, and Lest the fifth perish also. On the first [pray,---The floods arose; the waters of the heavens, Bursting their everlasting boundaries, Whelm'd in one deluge earth, and sea, and sky, And quench'd its orb of fire. The second Sun Then had its birth, and ran its round of years ; Till, having reach'd its date, it fell from heaven, And crush'd the race of men. Another life The Gods assign'd to Nature ; the third Sun Form'd the celestial circle; then its flames Burst forth, and overspread earth, sea, and sky, Deluging the wide universe with fire, Till all things were consumed, and its own flames Fed on itself, and spent themselves, and all Was vacancy and darkness. Yet again

The World had being, and another Sun Roll'd round the path of Heaven. That perish'd too:

The mighty Whirlwinds rose, and far away Scattered its dying flames. The fifth was born; The fifth to-day completes its destined course, Perchance to rise no more. O Aztlan, fast And pray! the Cycle of the Years is full!

Thus through Patamba did the ominous voice Exhort the people. Fervent vows all day Were made, with loud lament; in every fane, In every dwelling-place of man, were prayers, The supplications of the affrighted heart, Earnestly offered up with tears and groans. So past the forenoon; and when now the Sun Sloped from his southern height the downward way Of Heaven, again the ominous warner cried, Woe! woe! the Cycle of the Years is full! Quench every fire! Extinguish every light! And every fire was quench'd, and every light Extinguish'd at the voice.

Meantime the Priests Began the rites. They gash'd themselves, and plunged Into the sacred pond of Ezapan,

Till the clear water, on whose bed of sand The sunbeams sparkled late, opaque with blood, On its black surface mirror'd all things round. The children of the temple, in long search, Had gather'd, for the service of this day, All venomous things that fly, or wind their path With sinuous trail, or crawl on reptile feet. These, in one caldron, o'er the sacred fire They scorch, till of the loathsome living tribes, Who, writhing in their burning agonies, Fix on each other ill-directed wounds, Ashes alone are left. In infants' blood They mix the infernal unction, and the Priests Anoint themselves therewith.

Lo! from the South

The Orb of Glory his regardless way Holds on. Again Patanba's streets receive The ominous voice, — Woe ! woe ! the Sun pursues His journey to the limits of his course ! Let every man in darkness veil his wife ; Veil every maiden's face ; let every child Be hid in darkness, there to weep and pray, That they may see again the birth of hght ! They heard, and every husband veil'd his wife In darkness ; every maiden's face was veil'd ; The children were in darkness led to pray, That they might see the birth of light once more.

Westward the Sun proceeds; the tall tree casts A longer shade; the night-eyed insect tribes Wake to their portion of the circling hours; The water-fowl, retiring to the shore, Sweep in long files the surface of the lake. Then from Patamba to the sacred mount The Priests go forth; but not with songs of joy, Nor cheerful instruments they go, nor train Of festive followers; silent and alone, Leading one victim to his dreadful death, They to the mountain-summit wend their way.

On the south shore, and level with the lake, Patamba stood; westward were seen the walls Of Aztlan rising on a gentle slope; Southward the plain extended far and wide; To the east the mountain-boundary began, And there the sacred mountain rear'd its head; Above the neighboring heights, its lofty peak Was visible far off. In the vale below, Along the level borders of the lake, The assembled Aztecas, with wistful eye, Gaze on the sacred summit, hoping there Soon to behold the fire of sacrifice Arise, sure omen of continued light. The Pabas to the sacred peak begin Their way, and, as they go, with ancient songs Hymn the departed Sun.

O Light of Life,

Yet once again arise! yet once again Commence thy course of glory! Time hath seen Four generations of mankind destroy'd, When the four Suns expired; oh, let not thou, Hunan thyself of yore, the human race Languish, and die in darkness!

The fourth Sun Had perish'd; for the mighty Whirlwinds rose, And swept it, with the dust of the shatter'd world, Into the great abyss. The eternal Gods Built a new World, and to a Hero race Assign'd it for their goodly dwelling-place, And shedding on the bones of the destroy'd A quickening dew, from them, as from a seed, Made a new race of human-kind spring up, The menials of the Heroes born of Heaven. But in the firmament no orb of day Perform'd its course ; Nature was blind ; the fount Of light had ceased to flow; the eye of Heaven Was quench'd in darkness. In the sad obscure, The earth-possessors to their parent Gods Pray'd for another Sun, their bidding heard, And in obedience raised a flaming pile. Hopeful they circled it, when from above The voice of the Invisible proclaim'd, That he who bravely plunged amid the fire Should live again in Heaven, and there shine forth The Sun of the young World. The Hero race Grew pale, and from the fiery trial shrunk. Thou, Nahuaztin, thou, O mortal born, Heardest! thy heart was strong, the flames received Their victim, and the humbled Heroes saw The orient sky, with smiles of rosy joy, Welcome the coming of the new-born God. O human once, now let not human-kind Languish, and die in darkness!

In the East

Then didst thou pause to see the Hero race Perish. In vain, with impious arms, they strove Against thy will; in vain against thine orb They shot their shafts; the arrows of their pride Fell on themselves; they perish'd, to thy praise. So perish still thine impious enemies, O Lord of Day! But to the race devout, Who offer up their morning sacrifice, Honoring thy godhead, and with morning hymns, And with the joy of music and of dance,

MADOC 1N AZTLAN.

Welcome thy glad uprise, — to them, O Sun, Still let the fountain-streams of splendor flow, Still smile on them propitious, thou whose smile Is light, and life, and joyance ! Once again, Parent of Being, Prince of Glory, rise, Begin thy course of beauty once again !

Such was their ancient song, as up the height Slowly they wound their way. The multitude Beneath repeat the strain; with fearful eyes They watch the spreading glories of the west! And when at length the hastening orb hath sunk Below the plain, such sinking at the heart They feel, as he who, hopeless of return, From his dear home departs. Still on the light, The last green light that lingers in the west, Their looks are fasten'd, till the clouds of night Roll on, and close in darkness the whole heaven. Then ceased their songs; then o'er the crowded vale

No voice of man was heard. Silent and still They stood, all turn'd toward the east, in hope There on the holy mountain to behold The sacred fire, and know that once again The Sun begins his stated round of years.

The Moon arose; she shone upon the lake, Which lay one smooth expanse of silver light; She shone upon the hills and rocks, and east Upon their hollows and their hidden glens A blacker depth of shade. Who then look'd round, Beholding all that mighty multitude, Felt yet severer awe, — so solemmly still The thronging thousands stood. The breeze was heard

That rustled in the reeds; the little wave, That rippled to the shore and left no foam, Sent its low murmurs far.

Meantime the Priests Have stretch'd their victim on the mountain-top; A miserable man, his breast is bare, Bare for the death that waits him; but no hand May there inflict the blow of mercy. Piled On his bare breast, the cedar boughs are laid; On his bare breast, dry sedge and odorous gums Laid ready to receive the sacred spark, And blaze, to herald the ascending Sun, Upon his living altar. Round the wretch The inhuman ministers of rites accurs'd Stand, and expect the signal when to strike The seed of fire. Their Chief, Tezozomoc, Apart from all, upon the pinnacle Of that high mountain, eastward turns his eyes; For now the hour draws nigh, and speedily He looks to see the first faint dawn of day Break through the orient sky.

Impatiently

The multitude await the happy sign. Long hath the midnight pass'd, and every hour, Yea, every moment, to their torturing fears Seem'd lengthen'd out, insufferably long. Silent they stood, and breathless in suspense. The breeze had fallen; no stirring breath of wind Rustled the reeds. Oppressive, motionless, It was a labor and a pain to breathe The close, hot, heavy air. — Hark ! from the woods The howl of their wild tenants ! and the birds, — The day-birds, in blind darkness fluttering, Fearful to rest, uttering portentous cries ! Anon, the sound of distant thunders came ; They peal beneath their feet. Earth shakes and yawns, —

And lo! upon the sacred mountain's top, The light — the mighty flame! A cataract Of fire bursts upward from the mountain-head, — High, — high, — it shoots! the liquid fire boils out, It streams in torrents down! Tezozomoc Beholds the judgment: wretched, — wretched man, On the upmost pinnacle he stands, and sees The lava floods beneath him : and his hour Is come. The fiery shower, descending, heaps Red ashes round; they fall like drifted snows, And bury and consume the accursed Priest.

The Tempest is abroad. Fierce from the North A wind uptears the lake, whose lowest depths Rock, while convulsions shake the solid earth. Where is Patamba? where the multitudes Who throng'd her level shores? The mighty Lake Hath burst its bounds, and yon wide valley roars, A troubled sea, before the rolling storm.

XXVII.

THE MIGRATION OF THE AZTECAS.

The storm hath ceased; but still the lava-tides Roll down the mountain-side in streams of fire; Down to the lake they roll, and yet roll on, All burning, through the waters. Heaven above Glows round the burning mount, and fiery clouds Scour through the black and starless firmament. Far off, the Eagle, in her mountain-nest, Lies watching in alarm, with steady eye, The midnight radiance.

But the storm hath ceased; The earth is still; — and lo! while yet the dawn Is struggling through the eastern eloud, the barks Of Madoc on the lake!

What man is he On yonder crag, all dripping from the flood, Who hath escaped its force ? He lies along, Now near exhaust with self-preserving toil, And still his eye dwells on the spreading waves, Where late the multitudes of Aztlan stood, Collected in their strength. It is the King Of Aztlan, who, extended on the rock, Looks vainly for his people. He beholds The barks of Madoc plying to preserve The strugglers ; - but how few ! upon the crags Which verge the northern shore, upon the heights Eastward, how few have refuged ! Then the King Almost repented him of life preserved, And wished the waves had whelmed him, or the sword Fallen on him, ere this ill, this wretchedness,

This desolation. Spirit-troubled thus, He call'd to mind how, from the first, his heart

Inclined to peace, and how reluctantly, Obedient to the Pabas and their Gods, Had he to this unhappy war been driven. All now was ended: it remain'd to yield, To obey the inevitable will of Heaven, From Aztlan to depart. As thus he mused, A Bird, upon a bough which overhung The rock, as though in echo to his thought, Cried ont, - Depart! depart! - for so the note, Articulately in his native tongue, Spake to the Azteca. The King look'd up; The hour, the horrors round him, had impress'd Feelings and fears well fitted to receive All superstition; and the voice which cried, Depart! depart! seem'd like the voice of fate. He thought, perhaps Coanocotzin's soul, Descending from his blissful halls in the hour Of evil, thus to comfort and advise, Hover'd above him.

Lo! toward the rock, Oaring with feeble arms his difficult way, A warrior struggles: he hath reach'd the rock, Hath grasp'd it, but his strength, exhausted, fails To lift hin from the depth. The King descends Timely in aid; he holds the feeble one By his long locks, and on the safety-place Lands him. He, panting, from his clotted hair Shook the thick waters, from his forchead wiped The blinding drops; on his preserver's face Then look'd, and knew the King. Then Tlalala Fell on his neck, and groan'd. They laid them down In silence, for their hearts were full of woe.

The sun came forth; it shone upon the rock; They felt the kindly beams; their strengthen'd blood

Flow'd with a freer action. They arose, And look'd around, if aught of hope might meet Their prospect. On the lake the galleys plied Their toil successfully, ever to the shore Bearing their rescued charge: the eastern heights, Rightward and leftward of the fiery mount, Were throng'd with fugitives, whose growing crowds Speckled the ascent. Then Tlalala took hope,

And his young heart, reviving, reassumed Its wonted vigor. Let us to the heights, He eried; — all is not lost, Yuhidthiton! When they behold thy countenance, the sight Will eheer them in their woe, and they will bless The Gods of Aztlan.

To the heights they went; And when the remnant of the people saw Yuhidthiton preserved, such comfort then They felt, as utter wretchedness can feel, That only gives grief utterance, only speaks In groans and recollections of the past. He look'd around; a multitude was there, — But where the strength of Aztlan? where her hosts? Her marshall'd myriads where, whom yester Sun Had seen in arms array'd, in spirit high, Mighty in youth and courage? — What were these, This remnant of the people? Women most,

Who from Patamba, when the shock began, 53 Ran with their infants; widow'd now, yet each Among the few who from the lake escaped, Wandering, with eager eyes and wretched hope The King beheld and groan'd; against a tree He lean'd, and bow'd his head, subdued of soul.

Meantime, amid the crowd, doth Tlalala Seek for his wife and boy. In vain he seeks llanquel there; in vain for her he asks; A troubled look, a melancholy eye, A silent motion of the hopeless head, — These answer him. But Tlalala repress'd His anguish, and he call'd upon the King; — Yuhidthiton! thou seest thy people left; Their fate must be determined; they are here Houseless, and wanting food.

The King look'd up, lt is determined, Tlalala! the Gods Have ernsh'd ns. Who can stand against their wrath?

Have we not life and strength? the Tiger cried. Disperse these women to the towns which stand Beyond the ruinous waters; against them The White Men will not war. Ourselves are few, Too few to root the invaders from our land, Or meet them with the hope of equal fight; Yet may we shelter in the woods, and share The Lion's liberty; and man by man Destroy them, till they shall not dare to walk Beyond their city walls, to sow their fields, Or bring the larvest in. We may steal forth In the dark midnight, go and burn and kill, Till all their dreams shall be of fire and death, Their sleep be fear and misery.

Then the King Stretch'd forth his hand, and pointed to the lake Were Madoe's galleys still to those who clung To the tree-tops for life, or faintly still Were floating on the waters, gave their aid.-O think not, Tlalala, that evermore Will I against those noble enemies Raise my right hand in war, lest righteous Heaven Should blast the impions hand and thankless heart ! The Gods are leagued with them; the Elements Banded against us! For our overthrow Were yonder mountain-springs of fire ordain'd; For our destruction the earth-thunders loosed. And the everlasting boundaries of the lake Gave way, that these destroying floods might roll Over the brave of Aztlan !- We must leave The country which our fathers won in arms; We must depart.

The word yet vibrated Fresh on their hearing, when the Bird above, Flapping his heavy wings, repeats the sound, Depart! — Ye hear! the King exclaim'd; It is an onnen sent to me from Heaven; I heard it late in solitude, the voice Of fate! — It is Coanocotzin's soul Who connsels our departure. — And the Biro Still flew around, and in his wheeling flight Pronounced the articulate note. The people heard In faith, and Tilalal made no reply; But dark his brow, and gloomy was his frown.

Proclaim it where ye go : third morning we begin our march.

n o'er the lake a winged galley sped, ng the Ocean Prince. He bore, preserved Aztlan's bloody temples were cast down, shes of the Dead. The King received elics, and his heart was full; his eye on his father's urn. At length he said, hore request, O Madoe ! - If the lake d ever to its ancient bounds return, ed in the highest of Patamba's towers cotzin rests. - But wherefore this? wilt respect the ashes of the King.

Then he turn d.

And lifted up his voice, and call'd upon The people : - All whom fear or feebleness Withhold from following my adventurous path, Prince Madoc will receive. No blood must flow, No Paba dwell among them. Take upon ye, Ye who are weak of body or of heart, The Strangers' easy yoke : beneath their sway Ye may remember me without regret. Soon take your choice, and speedily depart, Lest ye impede the adventurers. - As he spake, Tears flow'd, and groans were heard. The line was drawn,

Against the feeble; here they may remain In peace, and to the grave in peace go down. But they who would not have their children lose The name their fathers hore, will join our march. Ere ye set forth, behold the destined way.

MADOC IN AZTLAN.

Which whose would accept the Strangers' yoke Should pass. A multitude o'erpast the line; But all the youth of Aztlan crowded round Yuhidthiton, their own beloved King.

So two days long, with unremitting toil, The barks of Britain to the adventurers Bore due supply; and to new habitants The city of the Cymry spread her gates; And in the vale around, and on the heights, Their numerous tents were pitch'd. Meantime the tale

Of ruin went abroad, and how the Gods Had driven her sons from Aztlan. To the King, Companions of his venturous enterprise, The bold repair'd; the timid and the weak, All whom, averse from perilous wanderings, A gentler nature had disposed to peace, Beneath the Strangers' easy rule remain'd. Now the third morning came. At break of day The mountain echoes to the busy sound Of multitudes. Before the moving tribe The Pabas bear, enclosed from public sight, Mexitli; and the ashes of the Kings Follow the Chair of God. Yubidthiton Then leads the marshall'd ranks, and by his side, Silent and thoughtfully, went Tlalala.

At the north gate of Aztlan, Malinal, Borne in a litter, waited their approach; And now alighting, as the train drew nigh, Propp'd by a friendly arm, with feeble step Advanced to meet the King. Yuhidthiton, With eye severe and darkening countenance, Met his advance. I did not think, quoth he, Thou wouldst have ventured this! and liefer far Should I have borne away with me the thought That Malinal had shunn'd his brother's sight, Because their common blood yet raised in him A sense of his own shame ! - Comest thou to show Those wounds, the marks of thine unnatural war Against thy country? Or to boast the meed Of thy dishonor, that thou tarriest here, Sharing the bounty of the Conqueror, While, with the remnant of his countrymen, Saving the Gods of Aztlan and the name, Thy brother and thy King goes forth to seek His fortune !

Calm and low the youth replied, Ill dost thou judge of me, Yuhidthiton ! And rashly doth my brother wrong the heart He better should have known! Howbeit, I come Prepared for grief. These honorable wounds Were gain'd when, singly, at Caermadoc, I Opposed the ruffian Hoamen; and even now, Thus feeble as thou seest me, come I thence, For this farewell. Brother, - Yuhidthiton, -By the true love which thou didst bear my youth, Which ever, with a love as true my heart Hath answer'd, - by the memory of that hour When at our mother's funeral pile we stood, Go not away in wrath, but call to mind What thou hast ever known me! Side by side We fought against the Strangers, side by side We fell; together in the council-hall

We counsell'd peace, together in the field Of the assembly pledged the word of peace. When plots of secret slaughter were devised, I raised my voice alone; alone I kept My plighted faith; alone I prophesied The judgment of just Heaven: for this I bore Reproach, and shame, and wrongful banishment, In the action self-approved, and justified By this unhappy issue.

As he spake, Did natural feeling strive within the King, And thoughts of other days, and brotherly love, And inward consciousness that had he too Stood forth, obedient to his better mind, Nor weakly yielded to the wily priests, Wilfully blind, perchance even now in peace The kingdom of his fathers had preserved Her name and empire. — Malinal, he cried, Thy brother's heart is sore; in better times I may with kindlier thoughts remember thee, And honor thy true virtue. Now fare well!

So saying, to his heart he held the youth, Then turn'd away. But then cried Tlalala, Farewell, Yuhidthiton! the Tiger cried; For I too will not leave my native land, — Thou who wert King of Aztlan! Go thy way; And be it prosperous. Through the gate thou seest Yon tree that overhangs my father's house; My father lies beneath it. Call to mind Sometimes that tree; for at its foot in peace Shall Tlalala be laid, who will not live Survivor of his country.

Thus he said, And through the gate, regardless of the King, Turn'd to his native door. Yuhidthiton Follow'd, and Madoe; but in vain their words Essay'd to move the Tiger's steady heart; When from the door a tottering boy came forth, And clung around his knees with joyful cries, And called him father. At the joyful sound Out ran Ilanquel; and the astonish'd man Beheld his wife and boy, whom sure he deem'd Whelm'd in the flood; but them the British barks, Returning homeward from their merciful quest, Found floating on the waters. - For a while, Abandoned by all desperate thoughts, he stood. Soon he collected, and to Madoc turn'd, And said, O Prince, this woman and her boy I leave to thee. As thou hast ever found In me a fearless, unrelenting foe, Fighting with ceaseless zeal his country's cause, Respect them !- Nay, Ilanquel ! hast thou yet To learn with what unshakable resolve My soul maintains its purposes? I leave thee To a brave foe's protection. - Lay me, Madoc, Here in my father's grave.

With that he took His mantle off, and veil'd llanquel's face; — Woman, thou mayst not look upon the Sun, Who sets to rise no more! — That done, he placed His javelin-hilt against the ground; the point He fitted to his heart; and, holding firm The shaft, fell forward, still with steady hand Guiding the death-blow on.

So in the land Madoc was left sole Lord ; and far away Yuhidthiton led forth the Aztecas, To spread in other lands Mexitli's name, And rear a mightier empire, and set up Again their foul idolatry ; till Heaven, Making blind Zeal and bloody Avarice Its ministers of vengeance, sent among them The heroic Spaniard's unrelenting sword.

We neighbor nearer to the Sun !- I. p. 375, col. 2.

Columbus inferred this from the elevation of the Pole at Paria. "How it cometh to pass," says Pietro Martire, " that at the beginning of the evening twilight it is elevate in that region only five degrees in the month of June, and in the morning twilight to be elevate fifteen degrees by the same quadrant, I do not understand, nor yet do the reasons which he bringeth in any point satisfy me. For he saith that he hereby conjectured that the Earth is not perfectly round, but that, when it was created, there was a certain heap raised thereon, much higher than the other parts of the same. So that, as he sayth, it is not round after the form of an apple or n ball, as others think, but rather like a pear as it hangeth on the tree, and that Paria is the region which possesseth the sapereminent or highest part thereof, nearest unto heaven. In so much, that he earnestly contendeth the earthly Paradise to be situate in the tops of those three hills which the Watchmen saw out of the top castle of the ship ; and that the outrageous streams of the fresh waters which so violently issue out of the said gulfs, and strive so with the salt water, fall headlong from the tops of the said mountains." - PIETRO MARTIRE, Dec. 1, Book 6.

A devout worshipper of this Deity once set out to sea if ha could find him; he reached the sea-coast, and there the God appeared to him, and bade him call the Whale, and the Mermaid, and the Tortoise, to make a bridge for him, over which he might pass to the house of the Sun, and bring back from thence instruments of music and singers to celebrate his festivals. The Whale, the Mermaid, and the Tortoise accordingly made the bridge, and the man went over it, singing, as he went, a song which the God taught him. As soon as the Sun heard him, he cantioned all his servants and people not to answer to the song, for they who answered would be obliged to abandon his House and follow the Singer. Some there were, however, who could not resist the voice of the charmer, and these he brought back with him to earth, together with the drum called Huahuneth and the Tepunaztli. - Torque-MADA, 1. 6, c. 43.

" The manner in which, he says, he obtained the spirit of divination was this : He was admitted into the presence of a Great Man, who informed him that he loved, pitied, and desired to do him good. It was not in this world that he saw the Great Man, but in a world above, at a vast distance from this The Great Man, he says, was clothed with the Day, yes with the brightest Day, he ever saw ; a Day of many years, yea of everlasting continuance! This whole world, he says, was drawn upon him, so that in him the Earth and all things in it might be seen. I asked him if rocks, mountains, and seas were drawn upon or appeared in him? he replied, that every thing that was beautiful and lovely in the earth was upon him, and might he seen by looking on him, as well as if one was on the earth to take a view of them there. By the side of the Great Man, he says, stood his Shadow or Spirit, for he used chichung, the word they commonly make use of to express that of the man which survives the body, which word properly signifies a shadow. This shadow, he says, was as lovely as the Man himself, and filled all places, and was most agreeable as well as wonderful to him. Here, he says, he tarried some time, and was unspeakably entertained and delighted with a view of the Great Man, of his Shadow, and of all things in him. And what is most of all astonishing, he imagines all this to have passed before he was born ; he never had been, he says, in this world at that time, and what confirms him in the belief of this is, that the Great Man told him, that he must come down to earth, be born of such a woman, meet with such and such things, and in particular that he should once in his life he guilty of murder; at this he was displeased, and told the Great Man he would never murder. But the Great Man replied, I have said it, and it shall be so; which has accordingly happened. At this time, he says, the Great Man asked him what he would choose in life ; he replied, first to be a Hunter, and afterwards to be a Powwow, or Divine ; whereupon the Great Man told him, he should have what he desired, and that his Shadow should go along with him down to earth, and be with him for ever. There was, he says, all this time no word spoken between them; the conference was not carried on by any human language, but they had a kind of mental intelligence of each other's thoughts, dispositions, and proposals. After this, he says, he saw the Great Man no more, but supposes he now came down to earth to be horn; but the Shadow of the Great Man still attended him, and ever after continued to appear to him in dreams and other ways. This Shadow used sometimes to direct him in dreams to go to such a place and hunt, assuring him he should there meet with success, which accordingly proved so ; and when he had been there some time, the Spirit would order him to another place, so that he had success in hunting, according to the Great Man's promise, made to him at the time of his choosing this employment.

" There were some times when this Spirit came upon him in a special manner, and he was full of what he saw in the Great Man, and then, he says, he was all light, and not only light himself, but it was light all around him, so that he could see through men, and knew the thoughts of their hearts. These depths of Satan I leave to others to fathom or to dive into as they please, and do not pretend, for my own part, to know what ideas to affix to such terms, end cannot well guess what conceptions of things these creatures have at these times when they call themselves all light." - DAVIO BRAINERD'S Journal.

Had Brainerd been a Jesuit, his superiors would certainly have thought him a fit candidate for the crown of martyrdom, and worthy to be made a Saint.

He found one of the Indian conjurers who seemed to have something like grace in him, only he would not believe in the Devil. "Of all the sights," says he, "I ever saw among place, and there turn up a large space of land, which they do them, or indeed any where else, none appeared so frightful, or so | hatred of innovation which is to be found in all ignorant pernear akin to what is usually imagined of infernal powers ! none ever excited such images of terror in my mind as the appearance of one, who was a devout and zealous reformer, or rather restorer, of what he supposed was the succeent religion of the Indians. He mode his appearance in his postifical garb, which was a coat of bears' skins, dressed with the hair on, and hanging down to his toes, a pair of hear-skin stockings, and a great wooden face, painted the one half black, and the other tawny, about the color of an Iadian's skie, with an extravagant mouth, cut very much awry; the face fastened to a bear-skin cap, which was drawn over his head. He advanced towards me with the instrument in his hood that he used for music in his idolatrous worship, which was a dry tortoisashell, with some corn in it, and the neck of it drawn on to a piece of wood, which made a very convenient handle. As he came forward, he heat his tune with the rattle, and danced with all his might, but did not suffer any part of his body, not so much as his fingers, to be seen; and no man would have guessed, by his appearance and actions, that he could have been a human creature, if they had not had some intimation of it otherwise. When he came neur me, I could not but shrink away from him, although it was then noonday, and I knew who it was, his appearance and gestures were so prodigiously frightful. He had a house consecrated to religious uses, with divers images cut out upon the several parts of it; I went in, and found the ground best almost as hard as a rock, with their frequent dancing on it. I discoursed with him about Christianity, and some of my discourse he seemed to like, but some of it he disliked entirely. He told me that God had taught him his religion, and that he never would turn from it, but wanted to find some that would join heartily with him in it; for the Indians, he said, were grown very degenerate and corrept. He had thought, he suid, of leaving ell his friends, and travelling abroad, in order to find some that would join with him; for he believed God had some good people somewhere, that felt as he did. He had not always, he said, felt as he now did, but had formerly been like the rest of the Indians, until about four or five years before that time ; then, he said, his heart was very much distressed, so that he could not live emong the Indians, but got away into the woods, and lived alone for some months. At length, he said, God comforted his heart, and showed him what he should do, and since that time he had known God, and tried to serve him; and loved all men, be they who they would, so as he never did hefore. He treated me with uncommon courtesy, and seemed to be hearty in it; and I was told by the Indians, that he opposed their drinking strong liquor with all his power ; and if, at any time, he could not dissuade them from it by all he could say, he would leave them, and go crying into the woods. It was manifest he had a set of religious notions that he had looked into for himself, and not taken for granted upon bare tradition; and he relished or disrelished whetever was spoken of a religious nature, according as it either agreed or disagreed with his standard. And while I was discoursing, he would sometimes say, " Now, that I like ; so God has taught me ; " and some of his scotiments seemed very just. Yet he utterly denied the being of a Devil, and declared there was no such creature known among the Indians of old times, whose religion, he supposes, he was attempting to revive. He likewise told me, that departed souls all went southward, and that the difference between the good and bad was this, that the former were admitted into a beautiful town with spiritual walls, or walls agreeable to the nature of souls ; and that the latter would for ever hover round those walls, and is vain attempt to get in. He seemed to he siscere, honest, and conscientious is his own way, and according to his own religious notions, which was more than I ever saw is any other Pagnu ; and I perceived he was looked upon and derided by most of the Indians as a precise zealot, who made a needsess noise about religious matters. But I must say, there was comething in his temper and disposition, that looked more like true religion than any thing I ever observed amongst other heatheas." - BRAINERO.

A good description of Welsh beauty is given by Mr. Yorke, from one of their original chronicles, in the account of Grufydd ab Cynan und his Queen.

" Grnfydd, in his person, was of moderate stature, having yellow hair, a round face, and a fair and agreeable complexion; eyes rather large, light eyebrows, a comely heard, a round neck, white skie, strong limbs, long fingers, straight legs, and hundsome feet. He was, moreover, skilful in divers languages, courteous and civil to his friends, fierce to his enemies, and resolute in hattle ; of a passionate temper, and fertile imagination .- Angharad, his wife, was an accomplished person: her hair was long, and of a flaxen color; her eyes large and rolling ; and her features brilliant and heautiful. She was tall and well proportioned ; her leg and foot handsome ; her fingers long, and her nails thin and transparent. She was good-tempered, cheerfol, discreet, witty, and gave good advice as well as alms to her needy dependents, and never transgressed the laws of duty."

Their happy souls

Pursue, in fields of bliss, the shadowy deer. -- VI. p. 382, col. 2. This opinion of the American Indians may be illustrated by a very beautiful story from Carver's Travels : ---

"Whilst I remained among them, a couple, whose tent was adjacent to mine, lost a son of about four years of age. The parents were so much affected at the death of their favorite child, that they pursued the usual testimonies of grief with auch uncommon rigor, as through the weight of sorrow and hose of blood to occasion the death of the father. The woman, who had hitherto been inconsolable, no soner saw her husband expire, than she dried up her tears, and appeared cheerful and resigned. As I knew not how to account for so extraordinary a transition, I took an opportunity to ask her the reason of it; telling her, at the same time, that I should have imagined the loss of her husband would rather have occasioned an increase of grief than such a sudden diminution of it.

"She informed me, that as the child was so young when it died, and unable to support itself in the country of spirits, both she and her husband hud been apprehensive that its situation would be fur from being happy; but no sooner did she helold its father depart for the same place, who not only loved the child with the tenderest affection, but was a good hunter, and would be able to provide plentifully for its support, than she ceased to mourn. She added, that she now saw no reason to continue her tears, as the child, on whom she doted, was under the care and protection of a fond father, and she had only one wish that remained ungratified, which was that of heing herself with them.

"Expression so replete with unaffected tenderness, and sentiments that would have done honor to a Roman matten made an impression on my mind greatly in favor of the people to whom she belonged, and tended not a little to connteract the prejudices I had hitherto entertaised, in common with every other traveller, of Indian insensibility and want of parental tenderness. Her subsequent conduct confirmed the favorable opinion I had just imbibed, and convinced me that, notwithstanding the apparent suspension of her grief, some particles of that reluctance to be separated from a beloved relation, which is implanted by nature or custom in every human heart, still lurked in hers. I observed that she went almost every evening to the foot of the tree, on a branch of which the bodies of her husband and child were laid, and after cutting off a lock of her hair, and throwing it on the ground, in a plaintive melancholy song bemoaned its fate. A recapitulation of the actions he might have performed, had his life been spared, appeared to be her favorite theme; and whilst she foretold the fame that would have attended an imitation of his father's virtues, her grief seemed to be suspended. 'If thou hadst continued with us, my dear Son,' would she ery, ' how well would the bow have become thy hand, and how fatal would thy arrows have proved to the enemies of our hands! thou wouldst often have drunk their blood and eaten their flesh, and numerous slaves would have rewarded thy toils. With a nervous arm wouldst thou have seized the wounded buffalo, or have combated the fury of the enraged hear. Thou wouldst have overtaken the flying elk, and have kept pace on the mountain's brow with the fleetest deer. What feats mightst thou not have performed, hadst thou staid among ns till age had given thee strength, and thy father had instructed thee in every Indian accomplishment !! In terms like these did this untutored savage he wail the loss of her son, and frequently would she pass the greatest part of the night in the affectionate employ."

Among the last comers, one Avila, n cacique, had great authority, who understanding that Vadlivia affirmed the God of the Christians was the only Creator of all things, in a great rage cried out, he would never allow Pillan, the God of tho Chilenians, to be denied the power of creating. Valdivia inquired of him concerning this imaginary deity. Avila told him that his God did, after death, translate the chief men of the nation and soldiers of known bravery to places where there was dancing and drinking, there to live happy forever; that the blood of noble men slain in battle was placed aboat the Sun, and changed into red clouds, which sometimes adorn his trising. — Hist. of Paraguay, &c. by F. The Snake Idol. - VI. p. 383, col. I.

Snake-worship was common in America. Bernal Diaz, p. 3, 7, 125. The idol described VII. p. 246, somewhat resembles what the Spaniards found at Campeche, which is thus described by the oldest historian of the Discoveries. " Our men were conducted to a broade crosse-way, standing on the side of the towne. Here they shew them a square stage or pulpit foure steppes high, partly of clammy bitumen, and partly of small stones, whereto the image of a man cut in marble was joyned two foure-footed anknown beastes fastening upon him, which, like madde dogges, seemed they would tear the marble man's guts out of his belly. And by the Image stood a Serpent, besmeared all with goare bloud, devouring a marble lion, which Serpent, compacted of bitumen and small stones incorporated together, was seven and fortie fect in length, and as thicke as a great oxe. Next unto it were three rafters or stakes fastened to the grounde, which three others crossed underpropped with stones ; in which place they punish malefactors condemned, for proof whereof they saw innumerable broken arrows, all bloudie, scattered on the grounde, and the

> from his head Plucking the thin gray hairs, he dealt them round. VI. p. 338, col. 2.

Some passages in Mr. Mackenzie's Travels suggested this to me.

" Our guide called aloud to the fugitives, and entreated them to stay, but without effect ; the old man, however, did not hesitate to approach us, and represented himself as too far advanced in life, and too indifferent about the short time he had to remain in the world, to be very anxious about escaping from any danger that threatened him; at the same time he pulled the gray hairs from his head by handfulls to distribute among us, and implored our favor for himself and his relations.

"As we were ready to embark, our new recruit was de sired to prepare himself for his departure, which he would have declined ; but as none of his friends would take his place, we may be said, after the delay of an hour, to have compelled him to embark. Previous to his departure, a ceremony took place, of which I could not learn the meaning; he cut off a lock of his hair, and having divided it into three parts, he fastened one of them to the hair on the upper parts of his wife's head, blowing on it three times with all the violence in his power, and uttering certain words. The other two he fastened with the same formalities on the heads of his two children." - MACKENZIE.

Of the wonderful docility of the Snake one instance may suffice.

" An Indian belonging to the Menomonie, having taken a rattle-snake, found means to tame it : and when he had done this, treated it as a Deity; calling it his great Father, and carrying it with him in a box wherever he went. This he had done for several summers, when Monsieur Pinnisance acci-dentally met with him at this carrying-place, just as he was setting off for a winter's hunt. The French gentleman was surprised one day to see the Indian place the hox which contained his God on the ground, and opening the dear, give him his liberty ; telling him, whilst he did it, to be sure and return by the time he himself should come back, which was to be in the month of May following. As this was but October, Monsieur told the Indian, whose simplicity astonished him, that he fancied he might wait long enough, when May arrived, for the arrival of his great Father. The Indian was so confident of his creature's obedience, that he offered to lay the Frenchman a wager of two gallons of rum, that at the time appointed he would come and crawl into his box. This was agreed on, and the second week in May following fixed for the determination of the wager. At that period they both met there again ; when the Indian set down his box, and called for his great Father. The Snake heard him not ; and the time being now expired, he acknowledged that he had lost. However, without seeming to be disconraged, he offered to double the bet if his father came not within two days more. This was further agread on ; when, behold, on the second day, about one o'clock, the snake arrived, and of his own accord crawled into the box, which was placed ready for him. The French gentleman vouched for the truth of this story, and, from the accounts no reason to doubt its veracity." - CARVER'S Travels.

We have not taken animals enough into alliance with ns. In one of the most interesting families which it was ever my good fortune to visit, I saw a child suckled by a goat. The gull should be taught to catch fish for us in the sea, the otter in fresh water. The more spiders there were in the stable, the less would the horses suffer from the flies. The great American fire-fly should be imported into Spain to catch musquitoes. Snakes would make good mousers; but one favorite mouse should be kept to rid the house of cockreaches. The toad is an excellent fly-catcher, and in hot countries a reward should be offered to the man who could discover what insect feeds upon fleas; for, say the Spaniards, no ay criatura tan li bre, a quien falta su Alguacil.

.... that huge King

Of Basan, hugest of the Anakim. - VII. p. 384, col. 2.

Og, the King of Basan, was the largest man thet ever lived: all Giants, Titans, and Ogers are but dwarfs to him; Garegantua himself is no more compared to Og, than Tom Thumh is to Garagantua. For thus say the Rabbis; Moses chose out twelve Chiefs, and advanced with them till they approached the land of Canaan, where Jericho was, and there he sent those chiefs that they might spy out the land for him. One of the Giants met them; he was called Og the son of Anak, and the height of his stature was twenty-three thousand and thirty-three cubits. Now Og used to catch the clouds and draw them towards him and drink their waters; and he used to take the fishes out of the depths of tha sea, and toast them against the orh of the Sun and eat them. It is related of him by tradition, that in the time of the deluge he weat to Noah and said to him, Take me with thee in the Ark ; but Noah made answer, Depart from me, O thou enemy of God ! And when the water covered the highest mountains of the earth, it did not reach to Og's knees. Og lived three thousand years, end then God destroyed him by the hand of Moses. For when the army of Moses covered a space of nine miles, Og came and looked at it, and reached out his hand to a mountain, and cut from it a stone so wide, that it could have covered the whole army, and he put it upon his head, that he might throw it upon them. But God sent a lapwing, who made a hole through the stone with his bill so that it slipt over his head, and hung round his neck like a necklace, and he was borne down to the ground by its weight. Then Moses ran to him ; Moses was himself ten cubits in stature, and he took a spear ten cubits long, and threw it up ten cuhits high, and yet it only reached the heel of Og, who was lying prostrate, and thus he slew him. And then came a great multitude with scythes, and cut off his head, and when he was dead his body lay for a whole year, reaching as far as the river Nile in Egypt. His mother's name was Enac, one of the daughters of Adam, and she was the first harlot; her fingers were two cubits long, and upon every finger she had two sharp nails, like two sickles. But because she was a harlot. God sent against her lions as big as elephants, and wolves as hig as camels, and cagles as hig as asses, and they killed her and eat her.

When Og met the spies who were sent hy Moses, he took them all twelve in his hand and put them in his wallet; and carried them to his wife and said to her, Look, I beseech you, at these men who want to fight with us! and he emptied them out hefore her, and asked her if he should tread upon them; but she said, Let them go and tell their people what they have seen. When they were got out they said to each other, If we should tell these things to the children of Israel they would forsake Moses; let us therefore relate what we have seen only to Moses and Aaron. And they took with them one grape stone from the grapes of that country, and it was as much as a camel could carry. And they began to advise the people that they should not go to war, saying what they had seen; but two of them, namely, Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun, concealed it .- MA-BACCI.

Even if the grapes had not been propertioned to Og's capacious mouth, the Rabhis would not have let him starve There were Behemoths for him to roast whole ; and Bar-Cha na saw a fish to which Whales are but sprats, and Leviathao but a herring. "We saw a fish," says he, "into whose nostrils the worm called Tima had got and killed it; and it was cast upon the shore with such force by the sea, that it overthrew sixty maritime citics: sixty other cities fed upon its flesh, and what they left was salted for the food of sixty cities more."

From one of the pupils of his eyes they filled thirty barrels of oil. A year or two afterwards, as we past by the same place, we saw men cutting up his bones, with which the same cities were built up again. - MARACCI.

This mode of offence has been adopted wherever bows and arrows were in use. De Bry represents it in the 31st plate to Le Moyne de Morgues.

"The Medes poisoned their arrows with a bitminous liquor called naphta, whereof there was great plenty in Media, Persia, and Assyria. The arrow, being steeped in it, and shot from a slack bow, (far swift and violent motion took off from its virtue,) burnt the flesh with such violence, that water rather increased than extinguished the malignant flame: dust alone could put a stop to it, and, in some degree, allay the unspeakable paio it occasioned." - Universal History.

They are informed in some places that the Kings and Noblemen have immortal souls, and believe that the souls of the rest perish together with their bodies, except the familiar friends of the Princes themselves, and those only who suffer themselves to be baried alive together with their masters' funerals: for their ancestors have left them so persunded, joyfully walk to perpetual delights through pleasant places always green, eating, drinking, and giving themselves to sports, and dancing with women after their old manner while they were living, and this they hold for a certain truth. Thereupon many, striving with a kind of emulation, cast themselves headlong into the sepulchres of their Lords, which, if his familiar friends defer to do, they think their souls become temporary instead of certail. — PIETRO MARTIRE.

When 1 was upon the Sierras of Guaturo, says Oviedo, and had taken prisoner the Caeique of the Province who had rebelled, I asked him whose graves were those which were in a house of his; and he told me, of some Indians who had killed themselves when the Cacique his father died. But because they often used to bury a quantity of wrought gold with them, I had two of the graves opened, and found in them a small quantity of maize, and a small instrument. When I inquired the reason of this, the Cacique and his Indians replied, that they who were buried there were laborers, who had been well skilled in sowing corn and in gathering it in, and were his and his father's servants, who, that their souls might not die with their bodies, had slain themselves upon his father's death, and that maize with the tools was laid there with them that they might sow it in heaven. In reply to this, I hade them see how the Tuyra had deceived them, and that nll he had told them was a lie : for though they had long been dead, they had never fetched the maize, which was now rotten and good for nothing, so that they had sown nothing in heaven. But the Cacique answered, that was because they found plenty there, and did not want it .-- Relacion sumaria de la Historia Natural de las Indias, par el Capitan GONZALO FEBNANOEZ DE UVIEDO

The two first of these Saints with Madog Morvyn, are called the three holy bachelors of the Isle of Britain. Cadog the Wise was a Bard who flourished in the sixth century. He is one of the three protectors of innocence ; bis protection was through the church law : Blas's by the compon law ; and Pedrogyl's by the law of arms; these three were also called the just Knights of the Court of Arthur. Codeg was the first of whom there is any account, who collected the British Proverbs. There is a church dedicated to him in Caermarthenshire, and two in Monmouthshire. Deiniol hus churches dedicated to him in Monmouth, Cardigan, and Penibrokeshires. In the year 525 be founded a college at Bangor, where he was Abbot, and when it was raised to the dignity of Bishopric he was the first Bishop. Padarn and Teilo rank with Dewi or David, as the three blessed Visitors, for they went about preaching the faith to all degrees of people, not only without reward, but themselves alleviating the distresses of the poor as far as their means extended. Padarn found a congregation at a place called from him Llanbadarn Vaar, where he had the title of Archbishop. Teilo established the college at Llandaff; the many places called Llandeilo were so named in honor of him. He and Cadog and David were the three canonical Saints of Britain. - Combrian Biography.

Teilo, or Telian, as he is called by David Williams, took an active part against the heresy of Pelagius, the great Welshman. "Such was the lustre of his zeal, that by something like a pun on his name, he was compared to the sun and called $11\lambda_{10}v$; and when slain at the altar, devotees contended with so much virulence for the reputation of possessing his body, that the Priests, to avoid scandalous divisions, found three miraculous bodies of the Saint, as similar, according to the phrase used on the occasion, as one egg to another; and miracles were equally performed at the tombs of all the three." D. WILLIAMS's Hist. of Monmouthshire.

This miracle is claimed by some Agiologists for St. Baldred, Confessour ; " whose memory in ancient tymes hath byo very famous in the kingdome of Scotland. For that he having sometymes preached to the people of three villages acere adjoyning one to the other in Scotland, called Aldham, Tiningham, and Preston, was so holy a man of life, that when he was dead, the people of ech village contended ona with another which of them should have his body; in so much, that at last, they not agreeing thereabout, took armes, and each of them sought by force to enjoy the same. And when the matter came to issue, the said sacred body was found all whole in three distinct places of the house where he died ; so as the people of each village coming thither, and carrying the same away, placed it in their churches, and kept it with great honor and veneration for the miracles that at each place it pleased God to worke." - English Martyrology.

The story may be as true of the one Saint as of the other, a solution in which Romanists and Protestants will agree. Godwin (in Catal. Ep. Landae.) says that the Churches which contended for the Welsh Saint, were Pennalum, the burialplace of his family, Llandeilo Yawr, where he died, and Llandaff, where he had been Bishop; and he adds, in honor of his own church, that by frequent miracles at his tomb it was certain Llandaff possessed the true body. Yet in such a case as this the fac simile might have been not unreasonably deemed more curious than the original.

The polypns's power of producing as many heads, legs, and arms as were wanted, has been possessed by all the great Saints.

St. Teilo left his own country for a time because it was infested by an infections disorder, called the Yellow Plague, which attacked both men and beasts.—Copgrave, quoted in Cressy's Church History of Britany.

"A. D. 462. It happened on a day, as Gildas was in a sermon, (Reader, whether smiling or frowning, forgive the digression.) a Nunne big with child came into the congregation, whereat the preacher presently was struck dumb, (would not a maid's child amaze any mar?) and could proceed no farther. Afterwards he gave this reason for his silence, because that Virgin bare in her body an infant of such signal sanctity as far transcended him. Thus, as lesser head stones are reported to lose their virtue in the presence of those that are bigger, so Gildas was silenced at the approach of the Welsh St. David, (heing then but Hans in Kelder,) though afterwards, like Zachary, he recovered his speech again." — FULLER'S Church History of Great Britain.

"David one day was preaching in an open field to the multitude, and could not be well seen because of the concourse, (though they make him four cubits high, a man and a half in stature.) when behold the Earth where on be stood, officiously heaving itself up, mounted him up to a competent visibility above all his andience. Whereas our Savior himself, when he taught the people, was pleased to choose a mountain, making use of the advantage of Nature witheut improving his miraculous power." - FULLES

David is indebted to the Romancers for his famo as a Champion of Christendom: huw he came by his leck is a question which the Antiquarians have not determined. Aquella noche, que era la vigilia de el festival dia, en la qual el Demonio les tenta persuadido que llegaba el Dios mancebo Tezcatlipuca, ponian una estera que llamaban petate, en el suelo y entrada de la Capella Mayor de su abominable Templo; sobre la qual cernian y polvoreaban una poca de harina de muiz, que es su trigo ; y esto era al principio de la noche, la qual pasaba el Sumo Sacerdote en vela, iendo, y viniendo muy a menudo a ver la estera, si por ventura hallaba impresa, en la harina alguna huella da el Dios que aguarduban. Ya las mas horas pasadas de la noche, (que ordinariamente era de media noche abajo,) veia la señal de su llegada, que era una pisada, d huella de pie humano estampada, y señolada en la harina. Luego que el Satrapa y Sacerdote la veia comenzaba d decir d voces, " Ya llegò nuestro Dios ! Ya llegò nuestro Dios ! nuestro Gran Dios es venido!" A esta voz acudia todo el Pueblo, que ya la estaban aguardando, unos en los Templos, y otros en sus casas, velando ; y luego sonaban todos los instrumentos musicos, y comenzaban grandes regocijos, y bailaban, y cantaban, muy concertadamente, con mucha solemnidad y contento, celebrando la venida y llegada de su falso y mentiroso Dios. Y procedian en su baile hasta el dia, en todo el qual creian que llegaban todos los demás. - Porque fingian ser unos mas mozos que otros, y tener unos mas vigor y fuerzas que otros, y por esta razon no ser d una su llegada, sino en diferentes tiempos.

TORQUEMADA, L. X. C. 24.

Tezcalipoca was believed to arrive first, because he was the youngest of the Gods, and never waxed old: Telpucti, the Youth, was one of his titles. On the night of his arrival a general carousal took place, in which it was the custom, particularly for old people, men and women alike, to drink immoderately; for they said the liquor which they drank would go to wash the feet of the God, after his journey. And I, says the Franciscan provincial, — who, if he had been a philosopher, would perhaps have not written a book at all, or certainly not so interesting a one, — I say, that this is a great mistake, and the truth is, that they washed their own stripes and filled them with liquor, which made them merry, and the firmes got up into their heads and overset them; with which fall it is not to be wondered at that they fell into such errors and follishness.

In the reign of Rajah Chundrunund, a Brahmin woman came to aue for justice, against the unknown murderer of her husband. The Rajah demanded, whether she had reason to suspect any one of the deed. She replied, that her husband was a man of a very fair character, and that she had never known any one hear him ill-will, excepting one man, with whem he was continually disputing upon points of philosophy. This person being brought before the Rajah, denied the charge ; and the wife was not satisfied with the cause being determined by the ordeal trial, from the dread that he might escape by means of witchcraft. The Rajah was so much perplexed how to decide upon the case, that he could neither eat nor sleep. At length he saw in a dream a sage, who taught him an incantation, which he should utter over a heap of rice flour, and then scatter the meal upon the ground, and direct the suspected person to walk over it; if there appeared upon the meal the impression of the feet of two persons, then the accused was certainly the murderer. When the Rajah awoke, he did as the vision had commanded him, and the Brahmin was proved guilty. - Aycen-Akbery.

It was thought that Tezca uften visited the Mexicans, but except on this occasion, ha always came incognito. A stone seat was placed at every crossing, or division, of a street, called Momortli or Ichialoca, where he is expected; and this was continually hung with fresh garlands and green bonghs, that he might rest there. — TORQUEMADA, 1. 6, c. 20.

God of the Winds: his temple was circular, "for even as the ayre goeth rounde about the heavens, even for that consideration they made his temple round. The entrance of that temple had a dore made lyke unto the mouth of a serpent, and was paynted with foule and divilish gestures, with great teeth and gummes wrought, which was a thing to feare those that should enter thereat, and especially the Christians, unto whom it represented very Hell with that ougly face and monsterous teeth." — GOMARA.

Some history is blended with fable in the legend of Quetzalcohnath, for such is the uglyography of his name. He was chief of a band of strangers who landed at Panuco, coming from the North : their dress was black, long, and loose, like the Turkish dress, or the Cassack, says Torquemada, open before, without hood or cape, the sleeves full, hut not reaching quite to the elbow ; such dresses were, even in his time, used by the natives in some of their dances, in memory of this event. Their leader was a white man, florid, and having a large beard. At first he settled in Tullan, but left that province in consequence of the vices of its Lords Huemac and Tezcalipoce, and removed to Cholullan. He taught the natives to cut the green stones, called chalchibuites, which were so highly valued, and to work silver and gold. Every thing flourished in his reign; the head of maize was a man's load, and the cotton grew of all colors ; he had one palace of emcrahls, another of silver, another of shells, one of all kinds of wood, one of turquoises, and one of feathers ; his commands were proclaimed by a cryer from the Sierra of Tzatzitepee, near the city of Tulle, and were heard as far as the sea-coast, and for more than a hundred leagues round. Fr. Bernardino de Sahagun heard such a voice once in the dead of the night, far exceeding the power of any human voice : he was told that it was to summon the laborer to the maizes fields; but both he and Torquemada believed it was the Devil's doing. Notwithstanding his power, Quetzalcoal was driven out by Tezcalipoca and Huemac: before he departed he burnt or buried all his treasures, converted the cocoa-trees into others of less worth, and sent off all the sweet singing birds, who had before abounded, to go before him to Tlapallan, the land of the Sun, whither he himself had been summoned. The Indians always thought he would return, and when first they sow the Spanish ships, thought he was come in these moving temples. They worshipped him, for the useful arts which he had taught. for the tranquillity they had enjoyed under his government, and because he never suffered blood to be shed in sacrifice, hut ordered bread and flowers, and incense to be offered up instead. - TORQUEMADA, 1. 3, c. 7; 1. 6, c. 24.

Some suthors have supposed that these strangers came from Ireland, because they scarred their faces and eat human flesh : this is no compliment to the Irish, and certainly does not accord with the legend. Others that they were Curthaginians, because New Spain was called Anshnace, and the Phœnicians were children of Anak. That the Carthaginians peopled America, is the more likely, say they, hecause they bored their cars, and so did the Incas of Peru. One of these princes, in process of time, says Garcilasso, being willing to enlarge the privileges of his people, gave them permission to bore their cars also, — but not so wide as the Incas.

This much may legitimately be deduced from the legend, that New Spain, as well as Peru, was civilized by a foreign adventurer, who, it seems, attempted to destroy the sanguinary superstition of the country, but was himself driven out by the priests.

God of the Waters: he is mentioned more particularly in Section XII. Thalocateculuit, the Lord of Paradise, as he is also called, was the oldest of the country Gods. His Image was that of a man sitting on a square seat, with a vessel before him, in which a specimen of all the different grains and fruit seeds in the country was to be offered; it was a sort of pumice stone, and, according to tradition, had been found upon the mountains. One of the Kings of Tetzcuco ordered a better Idol to be made, which was destroyed by lightning, and the original ene in consequence replaced with foor and trembling. As one of the arms had been broken in removing.

Some of my readers will stumble at this name; but to these who would accuse me of designing to Hottentotify the lagguage by introducing one of the barharous clacks, I must reply, that the seand is Grecian. The writers who have supposed that America was peopled from Plato's Island, observe that the dl, a combination so remarkably frequent in the Mexican tongue, has probably a reference to Atlantis and the Atlantic, Atl being the Mexican word for water, and Tlaloc the God of the waters — an argument quite worthy of the hypothesis. — Fn. The quaintest opinion ever started upon this obscure subject is that of Fr. Pedro Simon, who argued that the Indians were of the tribe of Isseehar, because he was "a strong oss in a pleasant land, who bowed his shoulder to besr, and became a servant unto tribute." If the Hebrew word, which is rendered tribute, may mean taxes as well, I humbly submit it to consideration, whether Issachar dath not typify John Bull.

The most painful pensace to which any of these Priests were subjected, was that which the Chololiceas performed every four years, in honor of Quetzalcoal. All the Priests sat round the walls in the temple, holding a censer in their hands : from this posture they were not permitted to move, except [when they went out for the necessary calls of nature; two hours they might sleep at the hegianing of the night, and one after sunrise ; at midnight, they bathed, smeared themselves with a black unction, and pricked their ears to offer the blood : the twenty-one remaining hours they sate in the same posture incensing the idol, and in that same posture took the little sleep permitted them ; this continued sixty days ; if any one slept out of his time, his companions pricked him : the ceremony continued twenty days longer, but they were then permitted more rest. - TORQUEMADA, l. 10, c. 32.

Mr. Jefferson informs us, that a late governor of Virginia, baying asked some delegates of the Delawares what they knew or had heard respecting this animal, the chief speaker immediately put himself into an oratorical attitude, and, with a pomp suited to the elevation of his subject, informed him, that it was a tradition handed down from their fathers, that in ancient times, a herd of them came to the Big-bone-licks, and began a universal destruction of the bears, deer, elks, huffaloes, and other animals which had been created for the use of the Indians; that the Great Man above, looking down, and seeing this, was so enraged, that he seized his lightning, descended to the earth, and seated himself upon a neighboring mountain on a rock, on which his seat and the print of his feet are still to be seen, and hurled his holts among them, till the whole were slaughtered, except the big bull, who, presenting his forehead to the shafts, shook them off as they fell; but at length missing one, it wounded him on the side, whereon, springing around, he bounded over the Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois, and, finally, over the great lakes, where he is living at this day.

Colonel G. Morgan, in a note to Mr. Morse, says, " These bones are found only at the Salt Licks, on the Ohio ; some few scattered grinders have, indeed, been found in other places; but it has been supposed these have been brought from the above-mentioned deposit by Indian warriors and others, who have passed it, as we know many have been spread in this When I first visited the Salt Licks," says the manner. Colonel, "in 1766, I met here a large party of the Iroquois and Wyondot Indians, who were then on a war expedition against the Chicasaw tribe. The head chief was a very old man to he engaged in war; he told me he was eighty-four years old ; he was probably as much as eighty. I fixed on this venerable chief, as a person from whom some knowledge might be obtained. After making him some acceptable presents of tobacco, paint, ammunition, &c., and complimenting him upon the wisdom of his nation, their prowess in war, and rudence in peace, I intimated my ignorance respecting the great bones before us, which nothing but his superior knowledge could remove, and accordingly requested him to inform me what he knew concerning them. Agreeably to the customs of his nation, he informed me in substance as follows :

"Whilst I was yet a boy, I passed this road several times to war against the Catawhas; and the wise old chiefs, among whom was my grandfather, then gave me the tradition, handed down to us, respecting thesa bones, the like to which are found in no other part of the country ; it is as follows : After the Great Spirit first formed the world, he made the various hirds and beasts which now inhahit it. He also made man; but having formed him white, and very imperfect and ill-tempered, he placed him on one side of it where he now inhabits, and from whence he has lately found a passage across the great water, to he a plague to us. As the Great Spirit was not the account of their musical instruments is taken.

pleased with this his work, he took of black elay, and made what you call a negro, with a woolly head. This black man was much better than the white man; but still he did not answer the wish of the Great Spirit ; that is, he was imperfect. At last the Great Spirit, having procured a piece of pure, fine red clay, formed from it the red man, perfectly to his mind; and he was so well pleased with him that he placed him on this great island, separate from the white and black men, and gave him rules for his conduct, promising happiness in proportion as they should be observed. He increased exceedingly. and was perfectly happy for ages; but the foolish young people, at length forgetting his rules, became exceedingly ill-tempered and wicked. In consequence of this the Great Spirit created the Great Buffalo, the bones of which you now see before us; these made war upon the human species alone, and destroyed all but a few, who repented and promised the Great Spirit to live according to his laws, if ha would restrain the devouring enemy: whereupon he sent lightning and thunder, and destroyed the whole race, in this spot, two excepted, a male and a female, which he shut up in yonder mountain, ready to let loose again, should occasion require."

The following tradition, existing among the natives, we give in the very terms of a Shawance Indian, to show that the impression made on their minds by it must have been forcible. " Ten thousand moens ago, when nought but gloomy forests covered this land of the sleeping sun, long before the pale men, with thunder and fire at their command, rushed on the wings of the wind to ruin this garden of nature ; when nought but the untamed wanderers of the woods, and men as unrestrained as they were the lords of the soil; a race of animals were in being, huge as the frowning precipice, cruel as the bloody panther, swift as the descending eagle, and terrible as the angel of night. The pines crashed beneath their feet, and the lake shrunk when they slaked their thirst; the forceful javelin in voin was hurled, and the barbed arrow fell harmless from their side. Forests were laid waste at a meal; the groans of expiring animals were every where heard; and whole villages inhabited by men were destroyed in a moment. The cry of universal distress extended even to the region of peace in the west, and the Good Spirit interposed to save the unhappy. The forked lightnings glearned all around, and londest thunder rocked the globe. The bolts of heaven were hurled upon the cruel destroyers alone, and the mountains echoed with the bellowings of death. All were killed except one male, the fiercest of the race, and him even the artillery of the skies assailed in vain. He ascended the bluest summit which shades the source of the Monongahela, and, rearing aloud, bid defiance to every vengeance. The red lightning scorched the lofty firs, and rived the knotty oaks, but only glanced upon the enraged monster. At length, maddened with fury, he leaped over the waves of the west at a bound, and this moment reigns the uncontrolled monarch of the wildemess, in despite of even Omnipotence itself."- WINTER-BOTHAM. The tradition probably is Indian, but certainly not the bombast.

There is a more remarkable tale of kindred barbarity in Irish history. The royal family had been all cut off except one girl, and the wise men of the country fed her apon children's flesh to make her the sooner marriageable. I have not the book to refer to, and cannot therefore live the names; but the story is in Kenting's history.

"I was awakened in the morning early, by the cheering converse of the wild tarkey-cock (Mileagris accidentials) saluting each other, from the sun-hrightened tops of the lofty Capressus distiche and Magnolia grandiflore. They begin at early dawn, and continue till suntise, from March to the last of April. The high forests ring with the noise, like the erowing of the domestic cock, of these social sentinels, the watch-word being caught and repeated, from one to another, for hundreds of miles around; insomuch, that the whole conntry is, for an hour or more, in an universal shout. A little after sunrise, their crowing gradually ceases, they quit their high lodging places, and alight on the earth, where, expanding their silver-bordered train, they strut and dance round about the cony female, while the deep forests seem to tremble with their shill noise." — BARTRAN.

" They distinguished three places for the souls when separated from the body : Those of soldiers who died in battle or in captivity among their enemies, and those of women who died is labor, went to the House of the Sun, whom they considered as the Prince of Glory, where they led a life of endless delight ; where, every day, at the first appearance of the sun's rays, they hailed his hirth with rejoicings ; and with dancing, and the music of instruments and of voices, attended him to his meridian ; there they met the souls of the women, ned with the same festivity accompanied him to his setting : they next supposed, that these spirits, after four years of that glorious life, went to animate clouds, and hirds of heautiful feathers and of sweet song, but always at liberty to rise again to heaven, or to descend upon the earth, to warble and suck the flowers. -- The souls of those that were drowned or struck by lightning, of those who died of dropsy, tumors, wounds, and other such disenses, went along with the souls of children, at least of those which were sacrificed to Tlaloc, the God of Water, to a cool and delightful place called Thalocan, where that God resided, and where they were to enjoy tha most delicious repasts, with every other kind of pleasure. - Lastly, the third place allotted to the souls of those who suffered any other kind of death was Mictlan, or Hell, which they conceived to be a place of utter darkness, in which reigned a God, called Mictlanteuctli, Lord of Hell, and a Goddess, named Miclancihuath. I em of opinion that they believed Hell to be a place in the centre of the earth, hut they did not imagine that the souls underwent any other punishment there than what they suffered by the darkness of their abode. Siguenza thought the Mexicans placed Hell in the northern part of the earth, as the word Mictlampa signified towards hoth." - CLAVIGEBO.

When any person whose manner of death entitled him to a place in Thalocan was buried, (for they were never burnt,) a rol or bogh was haid in the grave with him, that it might bud out again and flourish in that Paradise. --- TORQUEMADA, 1, 13, c. 48.

The souls of all the children who had been offered to Thuloc, were believed to be present at all after sucrifices, under the care of a large and heautiful serpent, called Xiuhcoath.— TORQUEMALA, I. 8, c. 14.

Artificial islands are common in China as well as in Mexico.

"The Chinese fishermen, having no houses on abore, not stationary abode, but moving about in their vessels upon the extensive lakes and rivers, have no inducement to cultivate patches of ground, which the pursuits of their profession might require them to leave for the profit of another; they prefer, therefore, to plant their onions on rafts of bamboo, well interwoven with reeds and long gross, and covered with earth; and these floating gardens are towed after their boats." — BAB-Row's Oling.

> To Tialoc it was hallowed; and the stone, Which closed its entrance, never was removed, Save when the yearly fastival returned, And in its womb a child was sepulchred, The living victim. — XII. p. 394, col. 1.

There were three yearly sacrifices to Tlaloc. At the first, two children were drowoed in the Lake of Mexico ; but in all the provinces they were sacrificed on the mountains; they were a boy and girl, from three to four years old : in this last case the hodies wera preserved in a stone chest, as relics, I suppose, says Torquemada, of persons whose hands were clean from actual sin ; though their souls were foul with the original stain, of which they were neither cleansed nor purged, and therefore they went to the place appointed for all like them who perish unbaptized. - At the second, four children, from six to seven years of age, who were brought for the purpose, the price heing contributed by the chiefs, were shut up in a cavern, and left to die with hunger : the cavern was not opened again till the next year's socrifice. - The third continued during the three rainy months, during all which time children were offered up on the mountains; these also were bought ; the heart and blood were given in sacrifice, the hodies were feasted on by the chiefs and priests. - TORQUEMADA, l. 7, c. 21.

"In the country of the Mistecos was a cave sacred to the Water God. Its entrance was concealed, for though this Idol was generally revenced, this his temple was known to few ; it was necessary to crawl the length of a muskct-shot, and then the way, sometimes open and sometimes narrow, extended for a mile, before it reached the great dome, a place 70 feet long, and 40 wide, where were the idol and the altar ; the Idol was a rude column of stalactites, or incrustations, formed by a spring of petrifying water, and other fantastic figures had thus grown around it. The ways of the cave were so intricate, that sometimes those who had unwarily hewildered themselves there perished. The Friar who discovered this Idoldestroyed it, and filled up the entrance." — PAOILLA, p. 643.

"The head of a sacrificed person was strung up; the limbs esten at the feast; the body given to the wild beests which were kept within the temple circuits; moreover, in that accursed house they kept vipers and venomous snakes, who had something at their tails which sounded like morris-hells, and they are the worst of all vipers; these were kept in cradles, and barrels, and earthen vessels, upon feathers, and there they laid their eggs, and nursed up their snakelings, and they were fed with the bodies of the sacrificed and with dog's flesh. We learnt for certain, that, after they had driven us from Mexico, and slain above 850 of our soldiers and of the men of Norvaez, these beasts and snakes, who had been offered to their cruel idol to be in his company, were supported upon their flesh for many days. When these lions and tigers roared, and the jackals and foxes howled, and the snakes hissed, it was a grim thing to hear them, and it seemed like hell." - BERNAL DIAZ.

Some of the Orinoco tribes required these severe probations, which are described by Gumilla, c. 35; the principle upon which they acted is strikingly stated by the Abbé Marigny in an Arabian anecdote. "Ali having been chosen by Nasser for Emir, or general of his army, against Makan, being one day before this prince, whose orders he was receiving, made a convolsive motion with his whole body on feeling an acute bite: Nasser perceived it not. After receiving his orders, the Emir returned home, and taking off his clothes to examine the bite, found the scorpion that had bitts him. Nasser, leareing this adventure, when next he saw the Emir, reproved him for having sustained the evil, without complaioing at the moment, that it might have been remedied. "How, sir," replied the Emir, "should I be capable of braving the arrow's poist, and the sabre'a edge, at the head of your emines, and far form you, if in your presence I could not bear the bite of a scorpion !""

The Romans had a weapon of this kind which they colled Actides, having a thong fixed to it by which it might be drawn back : it was full of spikes, so as to injure both when it struck and when it was withdrawn. — Ress's Cycl.

A retractile weapon of tremendous effect was used by the Gothic tribes. Its use is thus described in a very interesting poem of the sixth century.

> At nonus pugnæ Helmnod successit, et ipse Incertum triplici gestabat fune tridentem, Quem post terga quidem stantes socii tenuerunt ; Consiliumque fuit, dum cuspes missa sederet In clypeo, cuncti pariter traxisse studerent, Ut vel sic hominem dejecissent furibundum, Atque sub hac certum sibi spe posuere triumphum Nec mora ; Dur, totas fundens in brachia vires, Misit in adversum magna cum voce tridentem, Et dicens, finis ferro tibi, calve, sub isto. Qui, ventos penetrans, jaculorum more coruscat; Quod genus aspidis, ex alta sese arbore, tanto Turbine demittit, quo cuncto obstantia vincat. Quid moror? umbonem scindit, peltaque resultat. Clamorem Franci tollunt, saltusque resultant ; Obnicique trahunt restim simul atque vicissim; Nec dubitat princeps tali se aptare labori ; Manarunt cunctis sudoris flumina membris : Sed tamen hic intra velut esculus astitit heros, Qui non plus petit astra comis, quam tartara fibris, Contensiens omnes ventorum, immota, fragores.

This weapon, < tich is described by Suidas, Enstatius, and Agathias, was called Ango, and was a barbed trident; if it entered the body, it could not be extracted without certain death, and if it only pierced the shield, the shield became unmanageable, and the enemy was left exposed.

The Cataia, which Virgil mentions as a Teutonic weapon, was also retractile. This was a club of about a yard long, with a heavy end worked into four sharp points; to the thin end, or handle, a cord was fixed, which enabled a person, well trained, to throw it with great force and exactness, and then by n jerk to bring it back to his hand, either to renew his throw, or to use it in close combat. This weapon was called Cat and Catai. -- Cambrian Register.

An old priest of the Tlatelucas, when they were at war with the Mexicans, advised them to drink the huly beverage before they went to battle: this was made by washing the Stone of Sacrifice; the king drank first, and then all his chiefs and soldiers in order; it made them eager and impatient for the fight. — TERQUEMADA, 1. 2, c. 58.

To physic soldiers before a campaign seems an odd way of raising their courage, yet this was done by one of the fiercest American tribes.

"When the warriers among the Natchez had assembled in sufficient numbers for their expedition, the Medicine of War was prepared in the chief's cabin. This was an emetic, composed of a root boiled in water. The warriors, sometimes to the number of three hundred, seated themselves round the kettles or caldrons; about a gallon was served to each; the ceremony was to swellow it at one draught, and then discharge it again with such loud erucations and efforts as might be heard at a great distance." -- HERIGT'S History of Canada.

Odd as this method of administering medicine may appear, some tribes have a still more extraordinary mode of dispensing it.

"As I was informed there was to be a physic dence at night, curiosity led me to the town-house to see the preparation. A vessel of their own make, that might contain twonty gallons, (there being a great many to take the medicine,) was set on the fire, round which stood several goards filled with river water, which was poured into the pot. This done, there arose one of the beloved women, who, opening a deerskin filled with various roots and herbs, took out a small haudful of something like fine salt, part of which she threw on the head man's seat, and part on the fire close to the pot; she then took out the wing of a swan, and, after flourishing it over the pet, stood fixed for near a minute, muttering something to herself; then taking a shruh like laurel, which I supposed was the physic, she throw it into the pot, and returned to her seat. As no more ceremony seemed to be going on, I took a walk till the Indians essembled to teke it. At my return I found the house quite full; they danced neer an hour round the pot, till one of them, with a small gourd that might hold about a gill, took some of the physic, and drank it, after which all the rest took in turn. One of their head men presented me with some, and in a manner compolled me to drink, though I would willingly have declined. It was, however, much more palatable than I expected, having a strong taste of sassafras ; the Indian who presented it told me it was taken to wash away their sins, so that this is a spiritual medicine, and might be ranked among their religious ceremonies. They are very solicitous about its success ; the conjurer, for several mornings before it is drank, makes a dreadful howling, yelling, and hollowing from the top of the town-house, to frighten away apparitions and evil spirits." - TIMBERLAKE.

It is well known that Madame Merian painted nne of these insects by its own light.

" In Hispaniola and the rest of the Ocean Islandes, there

heardes of cattel. Gnattes of divers kindes, ingendered of that moystn heate, grievously afflict the colonies seated on the brinke thereof, and that not only in the night, as in other countries; therefore the inhabitants build low houses, and make little doores therein, scarce able to receive the master. and without holes, that the gnatts may have so extrance. And for that cause also, they forbeare to light to:ches or candels, for that the gnatts by natural instituet follow the light; yet neverthelesse they often finde a way in. Nature hath given that pestilent mischiefe, and hath also given a remedy ; as she hath given us cattes to destroy the filthy progeny of mise, so hath she given them pretty and commodious hunters, which they call Cucuij. These he harmless winged worms, somewhat less than battes or reere mise, I should rather call them a kind of beetles, because they have other wings after the same order under their hard-winged sheath, which they close within the sheath when they leave flying. To this little creature (as we see flyes shine by night, and certaine sluggish worms lying in thick hedges) provident nature hath given some very cleere looking-glasses; two in the seate of the eyes, and two lying hid in the flank, under the sheath, which he then sheweth, when, ofter the manner of the beetle, unsheathing his thin wings, he taketh his flight into the eyre ; whereupon every Cucuius bringeth four lights or candels with him. But how they are a remedy for sn great a mischiefe, as is the stinging of these gnatts, which in some places are little less than bees, it is a pleasant thing to hear. Hea who understandeth he hath those troublesome guestes (the gnattes) at home, or fearcth lest they may get in, diligently hunteth after the Cucuij, which he deceiveth by this means and industry, which necessity (effecting wonders) hath sought nut : whose wanteth Cucuij, geeth out of the house in the first twilight of the night, corrying a burning fire-brande in his hande, and ascendeth the next hillock, that the Cucuij may sea it, and hee swingeth the fire-brande about calling Cucuius aloud, and beateth the ayre withal, often calling and crying out, Cucuic, Cucuie. Many simple people suppose that the Cucuij, delighted with that noise, come flying and flocking together to the bellowing sound of him that calleth them, for they come with a speedy and headlong course ; but I rather thinks the Cucuij make haste to the brightness of the fire-brande, because swarmes of gnatts fly unto every light, which the Cucuij cate in the very eyre, as the martlets and swallowes doe. Behold the desired number of Cucuij, at what time the hunter costeth the fire-brande out of his hand. Some Cucuius sometimes followeth the fire-brande, and lighteth on the grounde; then is he easily taken, as travellers may take a beetle if they have need thereof, walking with his wings shutt. Others denia that the Cucuij are woont to be taken after this manner, but say, that the hunters especially have boughs full of leaves ready prepared, or broad linnen cloaths, wherewith they smite the Cucuius flying about on high, and strike him to the ground, where he lyeth as it were astonished, and suffereth himself to bee taken ; or, as they say, following the fall of the fly, they take the preye, by casting the same bushie bough or linen cloath upon him : howsoever it bee, the hunter havinge the hunting Cucuij, returneth home, and shutting the doore of the house, letteth the preya goe. The Cucuij loosed, swiftly flyeth about the whole house seeking gnatts, under their hanging bedds, and about the faces of them that sleepe, whiche the gnatts used to assayle : they seem to execute the office of watchmen, that such as are shut in may quietly rest. Another pleasant and profitable commodity proceedeth from the Cucuij. As many eyes as every Cucuius openeth, the hoste enjoyeth the light of so many candels ; so that the inhabitants spinne, sewe, weave, and dance by the light of the flying Cucuij. The inhabitants thinke that the Cucuius is delighted with the harmony and melody of their singing, and that hee also exerciseth his motion in the syre according to the action of their dancing ; but hee, by reason of the divers circuit of the gnatts, of necessity swiftly flyeth about divers ways to seek his food. Our men also reade and write by that light, which always continueth until he have gotten enough whereby he may be well fedd. The gnatts being cleansed, or driven out of doors, the Cucuius beginning to famish, the light beginneth to faile ; therefore when they see his light to waxe dim, opening the little doore, they set him at libertie, that he may seeke his foode.

" In sport and merriment, or to the intent to terrific such as | are afrayd of avery shadow, they say, that many wonton wild fellowes sometimes rubbed their faces by night with the flesh of a Cucuius, being killed, with purpose to meet their neighbors with a flaming countenance, as with us sometimes wanton young men, putting a gaping toothed vizard over their face, endeavor to terrifie children, or women, who are easily frighted ; for the face being anointed with the lump or fleshy part of the Cucuius, shineth like a flame of fire; yet in short space that fiery virtue waxeth feeble and is extinguished, sceing it is a certain hright humour received in a thin aubstance. There is also another wonderful commodity proceeding from the Cucuius ; the islanders appointed by our menn, goe with their good will by night, with two Cucuij tied to the great toes of their feet; for the traveller goeth better by the direction of these lights, than if he brought so many candels with him as their open eyes; he also carryeth another in his hand to seek the Utiæ by night, a certain kind of cony, a little exceeding a mouse in bignesse and bulke of hodie : which four-footed heast they onely knewe before our coming thither, and did eate the same. They also go a fishing by the light of the Cucuij." - PIETRO MARTIRE.

I have no other authority for attributing this artifice to Tezozomoc, then that it has been practised very often and very successfully.

"A Chief of Dsjedda," says Niebuhr, "informed me that two hundred ducats had been stolen from him, and wented ma to discover the thief. I excused myself, saying, that I left that sublime science to the Mahommedaa sages; and very soon afterwards a celebrated Schech showed, indeed, that he knew more than I did. He placed all the servants in a row, made a long prayer, then put into the mouth of each a bit of paper, and ordered them all to swallow it, after having assured them that it would not harm the innocent, but that the punishment of Heaven would fall on the guilty; after which he examined the mouth of every one, and one of them, who had not swallowed the paper, confessed that he had stolen the money."

Comment la Dame de une grosse Maison ou il hantoit, perdit ung Dyamant en sa maison, qu'il luy fist subtillement recouvrer. - Chap. 22, p. 58.

> Ung certain jour, la Dame de l'hostel Eut ung ennuy, lequel pour vray fut tel, Car elle avoit en sa main gauche ou dextre Ung Dyamant, que l'on renommoit de estre De la valeur de bien cinq cens ducatz; Or, pour soubdain vous advertir du cas, Ou en dormant, ou en faisant la veille, Du doy luy cheut, dont tres fort s'esmerveille, Qu' el' ne le treuve est son eueur très marry, Et n'ose aussi le dire a son mary ; Mais a Faifeu allée est s'en complaindre, Qui respondit, sans grandement la plaindre, Que bien failloit que le Seigneur le sceust, Et qu'elle luy dist ains qu'il s'en apperçeust. En ce fuisant le vaillant Pierre Maistre La recouvrer luy est alle promettre, Ce moyennant qu'il eust cinquante escuz, Qu'elle luy promist, sans en faire refuz, Pareillement qu'auchun de la maison L'eust point trouvé, il en rendroit raison. Incontinent Faifeu fist tout content Tast assembler serviteurs et servantes, Grans et petitz, et les portes fermantes, Les fist renger en une chambre a part. Ou de grant peur chascun d'eul: avoit part. Quant il eust fait, appella Sieur et Dame, Desquelz amé estoit de corps et de ame, Et devant eulz au servans fist sermon Du Dyamant, leur disant ; nous chermon, Et scavons bien par l'art de nicromance Celuy qui le a ; et tout en evidance Feignoit chermer la chambre en tous endroitz, Se pourmenant devant boytteux ou droitz. The trial by ordeal more probably originated in wisdom than in superstition. The Water of Jealonsy is tha oldest example. This seems to have been enjoined for enabling women, when unjustly suspected, fully to exculpate themselves; for no one who was guilty would have ventured upon the trial.

I have heard an anecdote of John Heuderson, which is characteristic of that remarkable man. The maid servant, one evening, at a house whara ha was visiting, begged that she might be excused from bringing in the tea, for he was a conjurer, she said. When this was told him, he desired the mistress would insist upon her coming in ; this was done : he fixed his eye upon her, and after she had left the room said, Take care of her; she is not honest. It was soon found that he had rightly understood the cause of her alarm.

There was a young man in despair for the death of his sister, whom he loved with extreme affection. The idea of tha departed recurred to him incessantly. He resolved to seek her in the Land of Souls, and flattered himself with the hope of bringing her back with him. His voyage was long and laborious, but he surmounted all the obstacles, and overcame every difficulty. At length he found a solitary old man, or rather genius, who, having questioned him concerning his enterprise, encouraged him to pursue it, and taught him tha means of success. He gave him a little empty calabash to contain the soul of his sister, and promised on his return to give him the brain, which he had in his possession, being placed there, by virtue of his office, to keep the brains of the dead. The young man profited by his instructions, finished his course successfully, and arrived in the Land of Souls, the inhabitants of which were much astonished to see him, and fied at his presence. Tharonhiaouagon received him well, and protected him by his counsel from the old woman his grandmother, who, under the appearance of a feigned regard, wished to destroy him by making him eat the flesh of serpents and vipers, which were to her delicacies. The souls being assembled to dance, as was their custom, he recognized that of his sister; Tharonhiaonagon assisted him to take it by surprise, without which help he never would have succeeded, for when he advanced to seize it, it vanished like a dream of the night, end left him as confounded as was Æneas when he attempted to embrace the shade of his father Anchises. Nevertheless he took it, confined it, and in spite of the attempts and stratagems of this captive soul, which sought but to deliver itself from its prison, he brought it back the same road by which ha came to his own village. 1 know not if he recollected to taka the brain, or judged it unnecessary ; but as soon as he errived, ha dug up the body, and prepared it according to the instructions he had received, to render it fit for the reception of the soul, which was to reanimate it. Every thing was ready for this resurrection, when the impertinent enricity of one of those who were present prevented its success. The captive soul, finding itself free, fled away, and the whole journey was rendered useless. The young man derived no other advantaga than that of having been at the Land of Souls, and the power of giving certain tidings of it, which were transmitted to posterity. - LAFITAU sur les Moeurs de Sauvages Ameriquains. Tom. I. p. 401.

"One, I remember, effirmed to me that himself had been dead four days; that most of his friends in that time were gathered together to his funeral; and that he should have bcca buried, but that some of his relations at a great distance, who were sent for upon that occasion, were not arrived, before whose coming he came to life again. In this tima he says he went to the place where the sun rises, (imagining the earth to be a plain,) and directly over that place, at a great height in the air, he was admitted, he says, into a great honse, which he supposes was several miles in length, and saw many wonderful things, too tedious as well as ridiculous to mention. Another person, a woman, whom I have not seen, hut been credibly informed of by the Indians, declares she was dead several days; that her soul went southward, and feasted and danced with the happy spirits ; and that she found all things exactly agreeable to the Indian notions of a future state.11-BRAINERO.

The Mocking Bird is often mentioned, and with much feeling, in Mr. Davis's Travels in America, a very singular and interesting volume. He describes bimself in one place as listening by moonlight to one that usually perched within a few yards of his log hut. A negress was sitting on tha threshold of the next door, smoking the stump of an old pipe. Please God Almighty, exclaimed the old woman, how sacet that Mooking Bird sing! he never tire. By day and by night it sings alike ; when weary of mocking others, the bird takes p its own natural strain, and so joyous a creature is it, that it will jump and dance to its own music. The bird is perfectly domestic, for the Americans hold it sacred. Would that we had more of these humane prejudices in England !— if that word may be applied to a feeling so good in itself and in its teedency.

A good eld Protestant missionary mentions another of the American singing-birds very technically.

"Of black birds there be millions, which are great devonces of the Indian corn as soon as it appears out of the ground: unto this sort of birds, especially, may the mystical fowls, the Divells, he well resembled, (and so it pleaseth the Lord Jesus himself to observe, Matt. 13,) which mystical fowl follow the sowing of the word, pick it up from loose and careless hearers, as these black birds follow the material seed: against thesa they are very careful, both to set their core deep enough, that it may have a strong root, not so apt to be pluckt up, as also they put up little watch-houses in the middle of their fields, in which they or their biggest children lodge." - Roora WILLIAMS.

GASCOIGNE'S GOOD-MOFFOW.

But of all the sougsters in America who warble their woodnotes wild, the frogs are the most extraordinary.

"Prepared as I was," says a traveller, "to hear something extraordinary from these animals, I confess the first frag concert I beard in America was so much beyond any thing I condiconceive of the powers of these musicians, that I was truly astonished. This performance was al fresca, and took place on the 18th, (April instant,) in a large swamp, where there were at least ten thousand performers, and, I really believe, not two exactly in the same pitch, if the octave can possibly admit of so many divisions, or shakes of semitones. An Ifibernian musician, who, like myself, was present for the first time at this concert of antimusic, exclaimed, 'By Jasus, hut they stop out of tune to a nicety!'

"I have been since informed by an amatcur who resided many years in this country, and made this species of music his peculiar study, that on these occasions the treble is performed by the Tree Fregs, the smallest and most beautiful species; they are always of the same color as the bark of the tree they inhabit, and their note is not unlike the chirp of a cricket : the next in size are our counter-tenors; they have a note resembling the setting of a saw. A still larger species sing tenor, and the under part is supported by the Bull Frogs, which are as large as a man's foot, and bellow out the bass in a tone as lond and sonorous as that of the animal from which they take their name." — Travels in America by W. PATEST, Musicion.

"I have often thought," says this lively traveller, " if an enthusiastic cockney of weak nerves, who had never been out of the sound of Bow-bell, could anddenly be conveyed from his bed in the middle of the night, and laid fast asleep in an American swamp, he would, on waking, fancy himself in the infernal regions : his first sensations would be from the atings of a myriad of musquitoes ; waking with the smart, his ears would he assailed with the horrid noises of the fregs; on lifting up his eyes, he would have a faint view of the night-hawks, flapping their ominous wings over his devoted head, visible only from the glimmering light of the fire-flies, which he would naturally conclude were sparks from the bottomless pit. Nothing would be wanting at this moment to complete the illusion, but one of those dreadful explosions of thunder and lightning, so extravagantly described by Lee in Œdipus. 'Call you these peals of thunder but the yawn of bellowing clouds? By Jave, they seem to me the world's last groans, and those large sheets of flame its last blaze ! ""

The hideons figures of their idels are easily accounted for hy the Historian of the Dominicans in Mexico.

"As often as the Devil appeared to the Mexicans, they made immediately an idol of the figure in which they had seen hior; sometimes as a lion, other times as a dog, other times as a serpent; and as the ambitions Devil took advantage of this weakness, he assumed a new form every time to gain a new image in which he might be worshipped. The natural timidity of the Indians aided the design of the Devil, and he appeared to them in horrible and affrighting figures, that he might have them the more submissive to his will; for this reason it is that the idols which we still see in Mexico, placed in the corners of the streets as spoils of the Gospel, are so deformed and ngly. — Fr. Ballads and Metrical Tales.

PREFACE.

Most of the pieces in this volume were written in early life, a few are comparatively of recent date, and there are some of them which lay unfinished for nearly thirty years.

Upon reading, on their first appearance, certain of these Ballads, and of the lighter pieces now comprised in the third volume of this collective edition," Mr. Edgeworth said to me, "Take my word for it, Sir, the bent of your genius is for comedy." I was as little displeased with the intended compliment as one of the most distinguished poets of this age was with Mr. Sheridan, who, upon returning a play which he had offered for acceptance at Drury Lane, told him it was a comical tragedy.

My late friend, Mr. William Taylor of Norwich, whom none who knew him intimately can ever call to mind without affection and regret, has this passage in his Life of Dr. Sayers : - " Not long after this, (the year 1800,) Mr. Robert Southey visited Norwich, was introduced to Dr. Sayers, and partook those feelings of complacent admiration which his presence was adapted to inspire, - Dr. Sayers pointed out to us in conversation, as adapted for the theme of a ballad, a story related by Olaus Magnus of a witch, whose coffin was confined by three chains, sprinkled with holy water; but who was, nevertheless, carried off by demons. Already, I believe, Dr. Sayers had made a ballad on the subject; so did I, and so did Mr. Southey; but after seeing the Old Woman of Berkeley, we agreed in awarding to it the preference. Still, the very different manner in which each had employed the same basis of narration might render welcome the opportunity of comparison; but I have not found among the papers of Dr. Sayers a copy of his poem."

There is a mistake here as to the date. This, my first visit to Norwich, was in the spring of 1798; and I had so much to interest me there in the society of my kind host and friend Mr. William Taylor, that the mention at Dr. Sayers's table of the story in Olaus Magnus made no impression on me at the time, and was presently forgotten. Indeed, if I had known that either he or his friend had written or intended to write a ballad upon the subject, that knowledge, however much the story might have pleased me, would have withheld me from all thought of versifying it. In the autumn of the same year, I passed some days at Hereford with Mr. William Bowyer Thomas, one of the friends with whom, in 1796, I had visited the Arrabida Convent near Setubal. By his means I obtained permission to make use of the books in the Cathedral Library; and accordingly I was locked up for several mornings in that part of the Cathedral where the books were kept in chains. So little were these books used at that time, that, in placing them upon the shelves, no regard had been had to the length of the chains; and when the volume which I wished to consult was fastened to one of the upper shelves by a short chain, the only means by which it was possible to make use of it was, by piling upon the reading desk as many volumes with longer chains as would reach up to the length of its tether; then, by standing on a chair, I was able to effect my purpose. There, and thus, I first read the story of the Old Woman of Berkeley, in Matthew of Westminster, and transcribed it into a pocket-book. I had no recollection of what had passed at Dr. Sayers's; but the circumstantial details in the monkish Chronicle impressed me so strongly, that I began to versify them that very evening. It was the last day of our pleasant visit at Hereford; and on the following morning the remainder of the Ballad was pencilled in a postchaise on our way to Abberley.

Mr. Wathen, a singular and obliging person, who afterwards made a voyage to the East Indies, and published an account of what he saw there, traced for me a fac simile of a wooden ent in the Nuremberg Chronicle, (which was among the prisoners in the Cathedral.) It represents the Old Woman's forcible abduetion from her intended place of burial. This was put into the hands of a Bristol artist; and the engraving in wood which he made from it was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, in the second volume of my poems, 1799. The Devil alludes to it in his Walk, when he complains of a certain poet as having "put him in ugly ballads, with libellous pictures, for sale."

The passage from Matthew of Westminster was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, and it has continued to be so in every subsequent edition of my minor poems from that time to the present; for whenever 1 have founded either a poem, or part of one, upon any legend, or portion of history, I have either extracted the passage to which 1 was indebted, if its length allowed, or have referred to it. Mr. Payne Collier, however, after the Ballad, with its parentage affixed, had been twenty years before the public, discovered that I had copied the story from Heywood's Nine Books of various History concerning Women, and that I had not thought proper to acknowledge the obligation. The discovery is thus stated in that gentleman's Poetical Decameron, (vol. i. p. 323.) Speaking of the book, one of his Interlocators says, "It is not of such rarity or singularity as to deserve particular notice now; only, if you refer to p. 443, you will find the story on which Mr. Southey founded his mock-ballad of the Old Woman of Berkeley. You will see, too, that the mode in which it is told is extremely similar.

"MORTON. Had Mr. Southey seen Heywood's book ?

"BOURNE. It is not improbable ; or some quotation from it, the resemblance is so exact; you may judge from the few following sentences.

Part of Heywood's narration is then given; upon which one of the speakers observes, " ' The resemblance is exact, and it is not unlikely that Heywood and Southey copied from the same original."

"BOURNE. Perhaps so; Heywood quotes Guillerimus in Special. Histor. lib. xxvi. c. 26. He afterwards relates, as Southey, that the Devil placed the Old Woman of Berkeley before him on a black horse, and that her screams were heard four miles off."

It cannot, however, be disputed, that Mr. Payne Collier has made one discovery relating to this subject; for he has discovered that the Old Woman of Berkeley is a mock-ballad. Certainly this was never suspected by the Author or any of his friends. It obtained a very different character in Russia, where, having been translated and published, it was prohibited for this singular reason, that children were said to be frightened by it. This I was told by a Russian traveller who called upon me at Keswick.

KESWICE, 8th March, 1838.

MARY, THE MAID OF THE INN.

The circumstances related in the following Ballad were teld me, when a school-boy, as having happened in the north of Eegland. Either Furnes or Kirkstall Abbey (I forget which) was named as the scene. The original story, however, is in Dr. Plot's Ristory of Staffordshire.

" Amongst the unusual accidents," says this amusing author, " that have attended the female sex in the course of their lives, I think I may else reckon the narrow escapes they have made from death. Whereof I met with one mentiened with admiration hy every body at Leek, that happened oot far off at the Black Meer of Morridge, which, though famous for nothing for which it is commonly reputed sn, (as that it is bottemless, no cattle will drink of it, er birds fly ovar or settla upon it, all which I found false,) yet is so, for the signal deliverance of a poor weman enticed thither in a dismal, stormy night, by a bloody ruffisn, who had first getten her with child, and intended, ia this remote inhospitable place, to have despatched her by drowning. The same night (Providence so ordering it) there were several persons of inferior rank drinking in an alchouse at Leek, whereof one having been out, and observing the darkness and other ill circumstances of the weather, coming in again, said to the rest of his companions, that he were a stout man indeed that would venture te go to the Black Meer of Morridge in such a night as that; to which ona of them replying, that, for a crown, or some such sum, he weuld undertaka it, the rest, joining their purses, said he should have his demand. The bargain being struck, away he went on his journey with a stick in his hand, which he was to leave thera as a testimony of his performance. At length, coming near the Meer, he heard the lamentable cries of this distressed woman, hegging for mercy, which at first put him to a stand; but being a man of great resolution and some policy, he went holdly on, however, counterfeiting the presence of divers other persons, calling Jack, Dick, and Tom, and crying, Here are the rogues we look'd for. &c.; which being heard by the murderer, he left the woman and fled; whom the other man found by the Meer side almost stripped of her clothes, and brought her with him to Leek as an ample testimony of his having been at the Meer, and of God's previdence too."-P. 291.

The metre is Mr. Lewis's invention ; and metre is one of the few things concerning which popularity may be admitted as a proof of merit. The ballad has become popular owing to the metra and tha story ; and it has been made the subject of a fine picture by Mr. Barker.

Who is yonder poor Maniac, whose wildly-fix'd eves

Seem a heart overcharged to express?

She weeps not, yet often and deeply she sighs;

She never complains, but her silence implies

The composure of settled distress.

No pity she looks for, no alms doth she seek;

Nor for raiment nor food doth she care :

Through her tatters the winds of the winter blow bleak

On that wither'd breast, and her weather-worn check

Hath the hue of a mortal despair

Yet cheerful and happy, nor distant the day, Poor Mary the Maniac hath been;

The Traveller remembers who journey'd this way No damsel so lovely, no damsel so gay,

As Mary, the Maid of the Inn.

Her cheerful address fill'd the guests with delight As she welcomed them in with a smile;

Her heart was a stranger to childish affright,

And Mary would walk by the Abbey at night

When the wind whistled down the dark aisle.

She loved, and young Richard had settled the day, And she hoped to be happy for life;

But Richard was idle and worthless, and they Who knew him would pity poor Mary, and say That she was too good for his wife.

'Twas in autumn, and stormy and dark was the night,

And fast were the windows and door;

Two guests sat enjoying the fire that burnt bright, And smoking, in silence, with tranquil delight, They listen'd to hear the wind roar.

MARY, THE MAID OF THE INN.

- "'Tis pleasant," cried one," seated by the fireside, To hear the wind whistle without.
- "What a night for the Abbey!" his comrade replied;
- " Methinks a man's courage would now be well tried

Who should wander the ruins about.

" I myself, like a school-boy, should tremble to hear The hoarse ivy shake over my head;

And could fancy I saw, half persuaded by fear, Some ugly old Abbot's grim spirit appear ;

For this wind might awaken the dead ! "

- "I'll wager a dinner," the other one cried, "That Mary would venture there now."
- "Then wager and lose! with a sneer he replied; "I'll warrant she'd fancy a ghost by her side,
- And faint if she saw a white cow."

"Will Mary this charge on her courage allow?" His companion exclaim'd, with a smile ;

"I shall win, - for I know she will venture there now,

And earn a new bonnet by bringing a bough From the elder that grows in the aisle."

With fearless good-humor did Mary comply, And her way to the Abbey she bent; The night was dark, and the wind was high, And as hollowly howling it swept through the sky, She shiver'd with cold as she went.

12.

O'er the path so well known still proceeded the Maid

Where the Abbey rose dim on the sight;

Through the gateway she enter'd; she felt not afraid,

Yet the ruins were lonely and wild, and their shade Seem'd to deepen the gloom of the night.

All around her was silent, save when the rude blast Howl'd dismally round the old pile;

Over weed-cover'd fragments she fearlessly pass'd, And arrived at the innermost ruin at last,

Where the elder-tree grew in the aisle.

Well pleased did she reach it, and quickly drew near,

And hastily gather'd the bough ;

When the sound of a voice seem'd to rise on her ear, She paused, and she listen'd intently, in fear,

And her heart panted painfully now.

The wind blew; the hoarse ivy shook over her head; She listen'd - nought else could she hear;

The wind fell; her heart sunk in her bosom with dread.

For she heard in the ruins distinctly the tread Of footsteps approaching her near.

Behind a wide column, half breathless with fear, She crept to conceal herself there :

That instant the moon o'er a dark cloud shone clear,

And she saw in the moonlight two ruffians appear, And between them a corpse did they bear.

17.

Then Mary could feel her heart-blood curdle cold; Again the rough wind hurried by;

It blew off the hat of the one, and, behold,

Even close to the feet of poor Mary it roll'd;

She felt, and expected to die.

"Curse the hat!" he exclaims. " Nay, come on till we hide

The dead body," his comrade replies. She beholds them in safety pass on by her side;

She seizes the hat, - fear her courage supplied, -And fast through the Abbey she flies.

19.

- She ran with wild speed ; she rush'd in at the door ; She gaz'd in her terror around;
- Then her limbs could support their faint burden no more.
- And exhausted and breathless she sank on the Unable to utter a sound. ffloor,

Ere yet her pale lips could the story impart, For a moment the hat met her view; ---

Her eyes from that object convulsively start,

For - what a cold horror then thrilled through her heart

When the name of her Richard she knew !

Where the old Abbey stands, on the common hard by,

His gibbet is now to be seen;

His irons you still from the road may espy;

The traveller beholds them, and thinks with a sigh Of poor Mary, the Maid of the Inn.

DONICA.

"In Finland there is a Castle which is called the New Rock monted about with a river of unsounded depth, the water black, and the fish therein very distasteful to the palate In this are spectres often seen, which foreshow either the death of the Governor, or of some prime officer belonging to the place; and most commonly it appeareth in the shape of a harper, sweetly singing and dallying and playing under the water."

⁴⁴ It is reported of one Donica, that after she was dead, the Devil walked in her hody for the space of two years, so that none suspected but she was still alive; for she did both speak and eat, though very sparingly; only she bad a deep paleness on her countenance, which was the only sign of death. At length, a Magician coming by where she was then in the company of many other virgins, as soon as he heheld her, he said, 'Fair Maids, why keep you company with this dead Virgin, whom you suppose to be alive?' when, taking away the magic charm which was tied under her arm, the body fell down lifeless and without motion."

The following Ballad is founded on these stories. They are to be found in the notes to the Hierarchies of the Blessed Angels; a Poem by Thomas Heywood, printed in folio by Adam Islip, 1635.

HIGH on a rock whose castled shade Darken'd the lake below, In ancient strength majestic stood The towers of Arlinkow.

The fisher in the lake below Durst never cast his net, Nor ever swallow in its waves Her passing wing would wet.

The cattle from its ominous banks In wild alarm would run, Though parch'd with thirst, and faint beneath The summer's scorehing sun; —

For sometimes, when no passing breeze The long, lank sedges waved, All white with foam, and heaving high,

Its deafening billows raved ; --

And when the tempest from its base The rooted pine would shake,

The powerless storm unruffling swept Across the calm dead lake ; --

And ever, then, when death drew near The house of Arlinkow, Its dark, unfathom'd waters sent Strange music from helow.

The Lord of Arlinkow was old; One only child had he; Donica was the Maiden's name, As fair as air might be.

A bloom as bright as opening morn Suffused her clear, white cheek; The music of her voice was mild; Her full, dark eyes were meek.

Far was her beauty known, for none So fair could Finland boast; Her parents loved the Maiden much, Young Eherhard loved her most.

Together did they hope to tread The pleasant path of life; For now the day drew near to make Donica Eberhard's wife. The eve was fair, and mild the air; Along the lake they stray; The eastern hill reflected bright The tints of fading day.

And brightly o'er the water stream'd The liquid radiance wide; Donica's little dog ran on, And gamboll'd at her side.

Youth, health, and love bloom'd on her cheek, Her full, dark eyes express, In many a glance, to Eherhard Her soul's meek tenderness.

Nor sound was heard, nor passing gale Sigh'd through the long, lank sedge; The air was hush'd; no little wave Dimpled the water's edge; —

When suddenly the lake sent forth Its music from beneath, And slowly o'er the waters sail'd The solemn sounds of death.

As those deep sounds of death arose, Donica's cheek grew pale, And in the arms of Eberhard The lifeless Maiden fell.

Loudly the Youth in terror shrick'd, And loud he call'd for aid, And with a wild and eager look Gazed on the lifeless Maid.

But soon again did better thoughts In Eberhard arise; And he with trembling hope beheld The Maiden raise her eyes.

And, on his arm reclined, she moved With feeble pace and slow, And soon, with strength recover'd, reach'd The towers of Arlinkow.

Yet never to Donica's cheeks Return'd their lively hue; Her cheeks were deathy white and wan, Her lips a livid blue.

Her eyes, so bright and black of yore, Were now more black and bright, And heam'd strange lustre in her face, So deadly wan and white.

The dog that gamboll'd by her side, And loved with her to stray, Now at his alter'd mistress howl'd, And fled in fear away.

Yet did the faithful Eberhard Not love the Maid the less; He gazed with sorrow, but he gazed With deeper tenderness.

RUDIGER.

And when he found her health unharm'd, He would not brook delay, But press'd the not unwilling Maid To fix the bridal day.

And when at length it came, with joy He hail'd the bridal day, And onward to the honse of God They went their willing way.

But when they at the altar stood, And heard the sacred rite, The hallow'd tapers dimly stream'd A pale, sulphureous light.

And when the Yonth, with holy warmth, Her hand in his did hold, Sudden he felt Donica's hand Grow deadly damp and cold.

But loudly then he shrick'd, for lo ' A spirit met his view, And Eberhard in the angel form His own Donica knew

That instant from her earthly frame A Demon howling fled, And at the side of Eberhard The livid corpse fell dead.

Bristol, 1796.

RUDIGER.

"Divers Princes and Noblemen being assembled in a beantiful and fair Palace, which was situate upon the river Rhine, they beheld a boat or small barge make toward the shore, drawn by a Swan in a silver chain, the one end fastened about her neck, the other to the vessel; and in it an unknown soldier, a man of a comely personage and graceful presence, who stepped apon the shore; which done, the boat guided by the Swan, left him, and floated down the river. This man fell afterward in league with a fair gentlewoman, married her, and by her had many children. After some years, the same Swan came with the same barge unto the same place; the soldier, entering into it, was carried thenee the way he came, left wife, children, and family, and was never seen amongst them after."

"Now who can judge this to be other than one of those spirits that are named Incubi?" says Thomas Heywood. I have adopted his story, but not his solution, making the unknown soldier not an evil spirit, but one who had purchased prosperity from a malevolent being, by the promised sacrifice of his first-born child.

BRIGHT on the mountain's heathy slope The day's last splendors shine, And rich, with many a radiant hue, Gleam gayly on the Rhine.

And many a one from Waldhurst's walls Along the river stroll'd, As ruffling o'er the pleasant stream The evening gales came cold. So as they stray'd, a swan they saw Sail stately up and strong, And by a silver chain he drew A little boat along,—

Whose streamer, to the gentle breeze, Long floating, flutter'd light Beneath whose crimson canopy There lay reclined a knight.

With arching crest and swelling breast, On sail'd the stately swan, And lightly up the parting tide The little boat came on.

And onward to the shore they drew, Where, having left the knight, The little boat adown the stream Fell soon beyond the sight.

Was never a knight in Waldhurst's walls Could with this stranger vie; Was never a youth at aught esteem'd When Rudiger was by.

Was never a maid in Waldhurst's walls Might match with Margaret; Her cheek was fair, her eyes were dark, Her silken locks like jet.

And many a rich and noble youth Had sought to win the fair; But never a rich and noble youth Could rival Rudiger.

At every tilt and tourney he Still bore away the prize; For knightly feats superior still, And knightly courtesies.

His gallant feats, his looks, his love, Soon won the willing fair; And soon did Margaret become The wife of Rudiger.

Like morning dreams of happiness, Fast roll'd the months away; For he was kind, and she was kind; And who so bless'd as they?

Yet Rudiger would sometimes sit Absorb'd in silent thought, And his dark, downward eye would seem With anxious meaning fraught;—

But soon he raised his looks again, And smiled his cares away; And mid the hall of gayety Was none like him so gay.

And onward roll'd the waning months, The hour appointed came, And Margaret her Rudiger Hail'd with a father's name.

RUDIGER.

But silently did Rudiger The little infant see; And darkly on the babe he gazed, — A gloomy man was he.

And when to bless the little babe The holy Father came, To cleanse the stains of sin away In Christ's redeeming name,—

Then did the cheek of Rudiger Assume a death-pale hue, And on his clammy forchead stood The cold, convulsive dew; —

And faltering in his speech, he bade The Priest the rites delay, Till he could, to right health restored, Enjoy the festive day.

When o'er the many-tinted sky He saw the day decline, He called upon his Margaret To walk beside the Rhine; ____

"And we will take the little babe; For soft the breeze that blows, And the mild murmurs of the stream Will lull him to repose."

And so together forth they went ; The evening breeze was mild ; And Rudiger upon his arm Pillow'd the little child.

Many gay companies that evc Along the river roam; But when the mist began to rise, They all betook them home.

Yet Rudiger continued still Along the banks to roam; Nor aught could Margaret prevail To turn his footsteps home.

"Oh, turn thee, turn thee, Rudiger; The rising mists behold; The evening wind is damp and chill; The little babe is cold!"

"Now hush thee, hush thee, Margaret, The mists will do no harm; And from the wind the little babe Is shelter'd on my arm."

"Oh, turn thee, turn thee, Rudiger; Why onward wilt thou roam? The moon is up; the night is cold; And we are far from home."

He answer'd not; for now he saw A Swan come sailing strong; And by a silver chain he drew A little boat along. To shore they came, and to the boat Fast leap'd he with the child; And in leap'd Margaret, breathless now, And pale with fear, and wild.

With arching crest and swelling breast On sail'd the stately Swan, And lightly down the rapid tide The little boat went on.

The full-orb'd moon, that beam'd around Pale splendor through the night, Cast through the erimson canopy A dim, discolor'd light.

And swiftly down the hurrying stream In silence still they sail, And the long streamer, fluttering fast, Flapp'd to the heavy gale.

And he was mute in sullen thought, And she was mute with fear; Nor sound but of the parting tide Broke on the listening ear.

The little babe began to cry; Then Margaret raised her head, And with a quick and hollow voice, "Give me the child!" she said.

"Now hush thee, hush thee, Margaret, Nor my poor heart distress; I do but pay perforce the price Of former happiness.

"And hush thee too, my little babe, Thy cries so feeble cease; Lie still, lie still; — a little while, And thou shalt be at peace."

So, as he spake, to land they drew, And swift he stepp'd on shore ; And him behind did Margaret Close follow evermore.

It was a place all desolate ; Nor house nor tree was there, But there a rocky mountain rose, Barren, and bleak, and bare ;—

And at its base a cavern yawn'd; No eye its depth might view; For in the moonbeam shining round That darkness darker grew.

Cold horror crept through Margaret's blood; Her heart it paused with fear, When Rudiger approach'd the cave, And cried, "Lo, I am here!"

A deep, sepulchral sound the cave Return'd — " Lo, I am here!" And black from out the cavern gloom Two giant arms appear. And Rudiger approach'd, and held The little infant nigh; Then Margaret shriek'd, and gather'd then New powers from agony.

And round the baby fast and close Her trembling arms she folds, And with a strong, convulsive grasp The little infant holds.

"Now help me, Jesus!" loud she cries, And loud on God she calls; Then from the grasp of Rudiger The little infant falls.

The mother holds her precious babe; But the black arms clasp'd him round, And dragg'd the wretched Rudiger Adown the dark profound.

JASPAR.

JASPAR was poor, and vice and want Had made his heart like stone; And Jaspar look'd with envious eyes On riches not his own.

On plunder bent, abroad he went Toward the close of day, And loiter'd on the lonely road Impatient for his prey.

No traveller came — he loiter'd long, And often look'd around, And paused and listen'd eagerly To catch some coming sound.

He sat him down beside the stream That cross'd the lonely way; So fair a scene might well have charm'd All evil thoughts away.

He sat beneath a willow-tree, Which cast a trembling shade; The gentle river, full in front, A little island made,—

Where pleasantly the moonbeam shone Upon the poplar-trees, Whose shadow on the stream below Play'd slowly to the breeze.

He listen'd—and he heard the wind That waved the willow-tree; He heard the waters flow along, And murmur quictly.

He listen'd for the traveller's tread; The nightingale sung sweet; -- He started up, for now he heard The sound of coming feet; -

He started up, and grasp'd a stake, And waited for his prey; There came a lonely traveller,

And Jaspar cross'd his way.

But Jaspar's threats and curses fail'd The traveller to appall; He would not lightly yield the purse Which held his little all.

Awhile he strnggled; but he strove With Jaspar's strength in vain; Beneath his blows he fell, and groan'd, And never spake again.

Jaspar raised up the murder'd man, And plnnged him in the flood, And in the running water then He cleansed his hands from blood.

The waters closed around the corpse, And cleansed his hands from gore; The willow waved, the stream flow'd on, And murmured as before.

There was no human eye had seen The blood the murderer spilt, And Jaspar's conscience never felt The avenging goad of guilt.

And soon the ruffian had consumed The gold he gain'd so ill; And years of secret guilt pass'd on,

And he was needy still.

One eve, beside the alehouse fire He sat, as it befell,

When in there came a laboring man Whom Jaspar knew full well.

He sat him down by Jaspar's side, A melancholy man;

For, spite of honest toil, the world Went hard with Jonathan.

His toil a little earn'd, and he With little was content; But siekness on his wife had fallen, And all was wellnigh spent.

Long with his wife and little ones He shared the scanty meal, And saw their looks of wretchedness, And felt what wretches feel.

Their Landlord, a hard man, that day Had seized the little left; And now the sufferer found himself Of every thing bereft.

He lean'd his head upon his hand, His elbow on his knee;

And so by Jaspar's side he sat, And not a word said he.

"Nay, — why so downcast?" Jaspar cried, "Come — cheer up, Jonathan!

Drink, neighbor, drink ! 'twill warm thy heart ; Come ! come ! take courage, man !"

He took the cup that Jaspar gave, And down he drain'd it quick; "I have a wife," said Jonathan, "And she is deadly sick.

"She has no bed to lie upon; I saw them take her hed — And I have children — would to God That they and I were dead!

"Our Landlord he goes home to-night, And he will sleep in peace —

I would that I were in my grave, For there all troubles cease.

"In vain I pray'd him to forhear, Though wealth enough has he ' God be to him as merciless As he has heen to me ! "

When Jaspar saw the poor man's soul On all his ills intent,

He plied him with the heartening eup, And with him forth he went.

"This Landlord on his homeward road Twere easy now to meet.

He listen'd to the tempter's voice; The thought it made him start; — His head was hot, and wretchedness Had harden'd now his heart.

Along the lonely road they went, And waited for their prey; They sat them down beside the stream That cross'd the lonely way.

They sat them down beside the stream, And never a word they said ; They sat and listen'd silently To hear the traveller's tread.

The night was calm; the uight was dark; No star was in the sky;

The wind it waved the willow houghs; The stream flow'd quietly.

The night was calm; the air was still; Sweet sung the nightingale; The soul of Jonathan was soothed; His heart began to fail. 56 "'Tis weary waiting here," he cried, "And now the honr is late; Methinks he will not come to-night; No longer let us wait."

"Have patience, man!" the ruffian said; "A little we may wait; But longer shall his wife expect Her husband at the gate."

Then Jonathan grew siek at heart; "My conscience yet is clear; Jaspar — it is not yet too late — I will not linger here."

- "How now!" cried Jaspar; "why, I thought Thy conscience was asleep;
- No more such qualms; the night is dark; The river here is deep."
- "What matters that," said Jonathan, Whose blood began to freeze,

"When there is One above, whose eye The deeds of darkness sees?"

"We are safe enough," said Jaspar then, "If that be all thy fear; Nor eye above, nor eye helow,

Can pierce the darkness here."

That instant, as the murderer spake, There came a sudden light; Strong as the mid-day sun it shone, Though all around was night.

It hung upon the willow-tree; It hung upon the flood; It gave to view the poplar isle, And all the scene of blood.

The traveller who journeys there, He surely hath espied A madman who has made his home Upon the river's side.

His cheek is pale; his cye is wild; His looks bespeak despair; For Jaspar, since that hour, has made His home, unshelter'd, there.

And fearful are his dreams at night, And dread to him the day ;

He thinks upon his untold crime, And never dares to pray.

The summer suns, the winter storms, O'er him unheeded roll;

For heavy is the weight of blood Upon the maniae's soul.

LORD WILLIAM.

LORD WILLIAM.

An imitation of this Ballad, in French verse, by J. F. Chatelain, was printed at Tournay, about 1820.

> No eye heheld when William plunged Young Edmund in the stream; No human ear but William's heard Young Edmund's drowning seream.

Submissive all the vassals own'd The murderer for their Lord; And he as rightful heir possess'd The house of Erlingford.

The ancient house of Erlingford Stood in a fair domain, And Severn's ample waters near Roll'd through the fertile plain.

And often the wayfaring man Would love to linger there, Forgetful of his onward road, To gaze on scenes so fair.

But never could Lord William dare To gaze on Severn's stream; In every wind that swept its waves He heard young Edmund's scream.

In vain, at midnight's silent hour, Sleep closed the murderer's eyes; In every dream the murderer saw Yonng Edmund's form arise.

In vain, by restless conscience driven, Lord William left his home, Far from the scenes that saw his guilt, In pilgrimage to roam; —

To other climes the pilgrim fled, But could not fly despair; He sought his home again, but peace Was still a stranger there.

Slow were the passing hours, yet swift The months appeared to roll; And now the day return'd that shook With terror William's soul;---

A day that William never felt Return without dismay; For well had conscience calendar'd Young Edmund's dying day.

A fearful day was that; the rains Fell fast, with tempest roar, And the swollen tide of Severn spread Far on the level shore. In vain Lord William sought the feast; In vain he quaff'd the howl, And strove with noisy mirth to drown The anguish of his soul.

The tempest, as its sudden swell In gusty howlings came, With cold and deathlike feeling seem'd To thrill his shuddering frame.

Reluctant now, as night came on, His lonely conch he press'd; And, wearied ont, he sunk to sleep,— To sleep,—but not to rest.

Beside that couch his brother's form, Lord Edmund, seem'd to stand, Such and so pale as when in death He grasp'd his brother's hand;

Such and so pale his face as when, With faint and faltering tongue, To William's care, a dying charge,

He left his orphan son.

"I bade thee with a father's love My orphan Edmund guard; — Well, William, hast thou kept thy charge? Take now thy due reward."

He started up, each limb convulsed With agonizing fear;

He only heard the storm of night, --'Twas music to his ear

When lo! the voice of loud alarm His inmost soul appalls;
"What ho! Lord William, rise in haste 1 The water saps thy walls!"

He rose in haste; beneath the walls lle saw the flood appear; It hemm'd him round; 'twas midnight now;

No human aid was near.

He heard a shout of joy; for now A boat approach'd the wall; And eager to the welcome aid They crowd for safety all.

"My boat is small," the hoatman cried; "Twill bear but one away; Come in, Lord William, and do ye In God's protection stay."

Strange feeling filled them at his voice, Even in that hour of woe,

That, save their Lord, there was not one Who wish'd with him to go.

But William leap'd into the boat, His terror was so sore;

"Thou shalt have half my gold," he cried; Haste — haste to yonder shore "

ST. PATRICK'S PURGATORY.

The boatman plied the oar; the boat Went light along the stream; Sudden Lord William heard a cry Like Edmund's drowning scream.

- The boatman paused "Methought I heard A child's distressful cry !"
- "Twas but the howling wind of night," Lord William made reply.
- "Haste haste ply swift and strong the oar; Haste — haste across the stream !" Again Lord William heard a cry Like Edmund's drowning scream.
- "I heard a child's distressful voice," The boatman cried again.
- "Nay, hasten on the night is dark And we should search in vain."
- "O God! Lord William, dost thou know How dreadful 'tis to die? And canst thon without pity hear A child's expiring cry?

"How horrible it is to sink Beneath the closing stream, To stretch the powerless arms in vain, In vain for help to scream !"

The shriek again was heard; it came More deep, more piercing loud; That instant o'er the flood the moon

- Shone through a broken cloud; --
- And near them they beheld a child, Upon a crag he stood,

A little crag, and all around Was spread the rising flood.

- The boatman plied the oar; the boat Approach'd his resting-place;
- The moonbeam shone upon the child, And show'd how pale his face.
- "Now reach thine hand!" the hoatman cried, "Lord William, reach and save!"
- The child stretch'd forth his little hands To grasp the hand he gave.
- Then William shriek'd; the hands he felt Were cold, and damp, and dead !
- He held young Edmund in his arms, A heavier weight than lead.

The boat sunk down; the murderer sunk Beneath the avenging stream: He rose; he shriek'd; no human ear Heard William's drowning scream.

ST. PATRICK'S PURGATORY.

This Ballad was published (1801) in the Tales of Wonder, by Mr. Lewis, who found it among the wefts and strays of the Press. He never knew that it was mine; but after his death, I bestowed some pains in recomposing it, because he had thought it worth preserving.

It is founded upon the abridged extract which M. Le Grand has given in his Fabliaux of a Metrical legend, by Marie de France.

"ENTER, Sir Knight," the Warden cried, "And trust in Heaven, whate'er betide, Since you have reach'd this bourn; But first receive refreshment due; 'Twill then be time to welcome you If ever you return."

2.

Three sops were brought of bread and wine; Well might Sir Owen then divine The mystic warning given, That he against our ghostly Foe Must soon to mortal combat go, And put his trust in Heaven.

3.

Sir Owen pass'd the convent gate ; The warden him conducted straight To where a coffin lay ; The Monks around in silence stand, Each with a funeral torch in hand, Whose light bedimm'd the day.

4.

"Few Pilgrims ever reach this bonrn," They said, "but fewer still return; Yet, let what will ensue, Our duties are prescribed and clear; Put off all mortal weakness here; This coffin is for you.

5.

"Lie there, while we, with pious breath, Raise over you the dirge of death; This comfort we can give; Belike no living hands may pay This office to your lifeless clay; Receive it while you live!"

6.

Sir Owen in a shroud was dress'd, They placed a cross upon his breast, And down he laid his head; Around him stood the funeral train, And sung, with slow and solemn strain, The Service of the Dead.

7.

Then to the entrance of the Cave They led the Christian warrior brave;

ST. PATRICK'S PURGATORY.

Some fear he well might feel, For none of all the Monks could tell The terrors of that mystic cell, Its secrets none reveal.

8.

"Now enter here," the Warden cried, "And God, Sir Owen, be your guide! Your name shall live in story: For of the few who reach this shore, Still fewer venture to explore St. Patrick's Purgatory."

9.

Adown the Cavern's long descent, Feeling his way, Sir Owen went, With cautious feet and slow; Unarm'd, for neither sword nor spear, Nor shield of proof, avail'd him here Against our ghostly Foe.

10.

The ground was moist beneath his tread; Large drops fell beavy on his head; The air was damp and chill; And sudden shudderings o'er him came, And he could feel through all his frame An icy sharpness thrill.

11.

Now steeper grew the dark descent; In fervent prayer the Pilgrim went; "Twas silence all around, Save his own echo from the cell, And the large drops that frequent fell With dull and heavy sound.

12.

But colder now he felt the cell; Those heavy drops no longer fell; Thin grew the piercing air; And now upon his aching sight There dawn'd, far off, a feeble light; In hope he hasten'd there.

13.

Emerging now once more to day, A fozen waste before him lay, A desert wild and wide, Where ice-rocks, in a sunless sky, On ice-rocks piled, and mountains high, Were heap'd on every side.

14.

Impending as about to fall They seem'd; and, had that sight been all, Enough that sight had been To make the stoutest eourage quail; For what could courage there avail Against what then was seen?

15.

He saw, as on in faith he past, Where many a frozen wretch was fast Within the ice-elefts pent, Yet living still, and doom'd to bear, In absolute and dumb despair, Their endless punishment.

16.

A voice then spake within his ear, And filled his inmost soul with fear, — "O mortal Man," it said, "Adventurers like thyself were these ! He seem'd to feel his life-blood freeze, And yet subdued his dread.

17.

"O mortal Man," the Voice pursued, "Be wise in time! for thine own good Alone I connsel thee; Take pity on thyself; retrace Thy steps, and fly this dolorous place, While yet thy feet are free.

18.

"I warn thee once ! I warn thee twize Behold ! that mass of mountain-ice Is trembling o'er thy head ! One warning is allow'd thee more; O mortal Man, that warning o'er, And thou art worse than dead !"

19.

Not without fear, Sir Owen still Held on with strength of righteous will, In faith and fervent prayer; When at the word, "I warn thee thrice "" Down came the mass of mountain ice, And overwhelm'd him there 20.

Crush'd though, it seem'd, in every bone, And sense for suffering left alone, A living hope remain'd; In whom he had believed he knew, And thence the holy courage grew That still his soul sustain'd.

21.

For he, as he beheld it fall, Fail'd not in faith on Christ to eall — "Lord, Thon canst save!" he cried; Oh, heavenly help vouchsafed in need, When perfect faith is found indeed! The rocks of ice divide.

22.

Like dust before the storm-wind's sway The shivered fragments roll'd away, And left the passage free; New strength he feels; all pain is gone; New life Sir Owen breathes; and on He goes rejoicingly.

-23

Yet other trials he must meet; For soon a close and piercing heat

Relax'd each loosen'd limb; The sweat stream'd out from every part; In short, quick beatings toil'd his heart; His throbbing eyes grew dim.

Along the wide and wasted land A stream of fire, through banks of sand, Its molten billows spread ; Thin vapors, tremulously light, Hung quivering o'er the glowing white ; The air he breathed was red.

25.

A Paradise beyond was seen, Of shady groves and gardens green, Fair flowers and fruitful trees, And flowing fountains cool and clear, Whose gurgling music reach'd his ear, Borne on the burning breeze.

26.

How should he pass that molten flood. While gazing wistfully he stood, A Fiend, as in a dream, "Thus!" answer'd the unutter'd thought, Stretch'd forth a mighty arm, and caught And cast him in the stream.

Sir Owen groan'd; for then he felt His eyeballs burn, his marrow melt, His brain like liquid lead; And from his heart the boiling blood Its agonizing course pursued Through limbs like iron red.

28.

Yet, giving way to no despair, But mindful of the aid of prayer, "Lord, Thou canst save!" he said; And then a breath from Eden came; With life and healing through his frame The blissful influence spread.

29.

No Fiends may now his way oppose; The gates of Paradise unclose; Free entrance there is given; And songs of triumph meet his ear, Enrapt, Sir Owen seems to hear The harmonies of Heaven.

30.

"Come, Pilgrim! take thy foretaste meet, Thou who hast trod with fearless feet St. Patrick's Purgatory; For after death these seats divine, Reward eternal, shall be thine, And thine eternal glory."

31.

Inebriate with the deep delight, Dim grew the Pilgrim's swimming sight; His senses died away; And when to life he woke, before The Cavern-mouth he saw once more The light of earthly day.

Westbury, 1798.

THE CROSS ROADS.

The tragedy related in this Ballad happened about the year 1760, in the parish of Bedminster, near Bristol. One wbo was present at the funeral told me the story and the circumstances of the interment, as I have versified them.

THERE was an old man breaking stones To mend the turnpike way; He sat him down beside a brook, And out his bread and cheese he took; For now it was mid-day.

2.

He lean'd his back against a post; His feet the brook ran by; And there were water-cresses growing, And pleasant was the water's flowing, For he was hot and dry.

3.

A soldier, with his knapsack on, Came travelling o'er the down; The sun was strong, and he was tired; And he of the old man inquired "How far to Bristol town?"

4.

"Half an hour's walk for a young man, By lanes, and fields, and stiles; But you the foot-path do not know; And if along the road you go, Why, then 'tis three good miles."

5.

The soldier took his knapsack off, For he was hot and dry; And out his bread and cheese he took, And he sat down beside the brook To dine in company.

6.

"Old friend! in faith," the soldier says, "I envy you, almost; My shoulders have been sorely press'd, And I should like to sit, and rest My back against that post.

7.

"In such a sweltering day as this, A knapsack is the devil; And if on t'other side I sat, It would not only spoil our chat, But make me seem uncivil."

THE CROSS ROADS.

The old man laugh'd and moved. — "I wish It were a great-arm'd chair! But this may help a man at need; — And yet it was a cursed deed That ever brought it there.

9.

"There's a poor girl lies buried here, Beneath this very place; The earth upon her corpse is press'd, This post was driven into her breast, And a stone is on her face."

10.

The soldier had but just lean'd back, And now he half rose up. "There's sure no harm in dining here, My friend? and yet, to be sincere, I should not like to sup."

11.

"God rest her! she is still enough Who sleeps beneath my feet!" The old man cried. "No harm 1 trow, She ever did herself, though now She lies where four roads meet.

12.

"I have past by about that hour When men are not most brave; It did not make my courage fail, And I have heard the nightingale Sing sweetly on her grave.

13.

" I have past by about that hour When ghosts their freedom have · But here I saw no ghastly sight ; And quietly the glow-worm's light Was shining on her grave.

14.

"There's one who, like a Christian, lies Beneath the church-tree's shade; I'd rather go a long mile round, Than pass at evening through the ground Wherein that man is laid.

15.

" A decent burial that man had, The bell was heard to toll, When he was laid in holy ground; But for all the wealth in Bristol town I would not be with his soul!

16.

"Didst see a house below the hill Which the winds and the rains destroy? In that farm-house did that man dwell, And I remember it full well

When . was a growing boy.

"But she was a poor parish girl, Who came up from the west: From service hard she ran away, And at that house, in evil day, Was taken into rest.

18.

"A man of a bad name was he; An evil life he led; Passion made his dark facc turn white, And his gray eyes were large and light, And in anger they grew red.

19.

"The man was bad, the mother worse, Bad fruit of evil stem; 'Twould make your hair to stand on end If I should tell to you, my friend, The things that were told of them ' 20.

"Didst see an out-house standing by ? The walls alone remain; It was a stable then, but now Its mossy roof has fallen through, All rotted by the rain.

21.

"This poor girl she had served with them Some half-a-year or more, When she was found hung up one day, Stiff as a corpse, and cold as clay, Behind that stable door.

22.

"It is a wild and lonesome place; No hut or house is near; Should one meet a murderer there alone, 'Twere vain to scream, and the dying groan Would never reach mortal ear.

23.

"And there were strange reports about; But still the coroner found That she by her own hand had died, And should buried be by the way-side, And not in Christian ground.

24

"This was the very place he chose, Just where these four roads meet, And I was one among the throng That hither follow'd them along; I shall never the sight forget!

25.

"They carried her upon a board In the clothes in which she died, I saw the cap blown off her head; Her face was of a dark, dark red; Her eyes were starting wide:

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON A WICKED BISHOP.

"I think they could not have been closed, So widely did they strain. O Lord, it was a ghastly sight,

And it often made me wake at night, When I saw it in dreams again.

"They laid her where these four roads meet, Here in this very place. The earth upon her corpse was press'd, This post was driven into her breast,

And a stone is on her face.'

Westbury, 1798.

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON A WICKED BISHOP.

Here followeth the History of HATTO, Archbishop of Mentz.

It hapned in the year 914, that there was an exceeding great famine in Germany, at what time Otho surnamed the Great was Emperor, and one Hatto, ouce Abbot of Fulda, was Archbishop of Mentz, of the Bishops after Crescens and Crescentius the two and thirtieth, of the Archbishops after St. Bonifacius the thirteenth. This Hatto in tha time of this great famine afore-mentioned, when he saw the poor peopla of tha country exceedingly oppressed with famine, assembled a great company of them together into a Barne, and, like a most accursed and mercilesse caitiffe, burnt up those poor innocent souls, that were so far from doubting any such matter, that they rather hoped to receive soma comfort and relief at his hands. The reason that moved the prelat to commit that execrable impiety was, hecause he thought the famine would the sooner cease, if these unprofitable beggars that consumed more bread than they were worthy to eat, were dispatched out of the world. For he said that those poor folks were like to Mice, that were good for oothing but to devour corne. But God Almighty, the just avenger of the poor folks' quarrel, did not long suffer this hainous tyranny, this most detestable fact, unpunished. For he mustered up an army of Mice against the Archbishop, and sent them to persecute him as his furious Alastors, so that they afflicted him both day and night, and would not suffer him to take his rest in any place. Whereupon the Prelate, thinking that ha should ha secure from the injury of Mice if he were in a certain tower, that standeth in the Bhine near to the towne, betook himself unto the said tower as te a safe refuge and sanctuary from his enemies, and locked himself in. But the innumerable troupes of Mice chased him continually very eagerly, and awumme unto him upon the top of the water to execute the just judgment of God, and so at last he was most miserably devoured by those sillie creatures; who pursued him with such hitter hostility, that it is recorded they scraped and knawed out his very name from tha walls and tapistry wherein it was written, after they had so cruelly devoured his body. Wherefore the tower wherein he was eaten up by the Mice is shewn to this day, for a perpetual monument to all succeeding ages of the barbarous and inhuman tyranny of this impious Prelate, being situate in a little green Island in the midst of the Rhine near to the towne of Bingen, and is commonly called in the German Tongue the MOWSE-TURN. CORVAT'S Crudities, pp. 571, 572.

Other authors who record this tale say that the Bisbop was eaten by Rats.

THE summer and autumn had been so wet, That in winter the corn was growing yet; 'Twas a piteous sight, to see, all around, The grain lie rotting on the ground

Every day the starving poor Crowded around Bishop Hatto's door, For he had a plentiful last-year's store, And all the neighborhood could tell His granaries were furnish'd well.

At last Bishop Hatto appointed a day To quiet the poor without delay; He bade them to his great Barn repair, And they should have food for the winter there Rejoiced such tidings good to hear, The poor folk flock'd from far and near; The great Barn was full as it could hold Of women and children, and young and old.

Then when he saw it could hold no more, Bishop Hatto he made fast the door; And while for merey on Christ they call, He set fire to the Barn and burnt them all.

"I' faith, 'tis an excellent bonfire !" quoth he, "And the country is greatly obliged to me, For ridding it in these times forlorn Of Rats that only consume the corn."

So then to his palace returned he, And he sat down to supper merrily, And he slept that night like an innocent man; But Bishop Hatto never slept again.

In the morning, as he enter'd the hall Where his picture hung against the wall, A sweat like death all over him came, For the Rats had eaten it out of the frame.

As he look'd, there came a man from his farm; He had a countenance white with alarm; "My Lord, I open'd your granaries this morn, And the Rats had eaten all your corn."

Another came running presently, And he was pale as pale could be, — "Fly! my Lord Bishop, fly," quoth he, "Ten thousand Rats are coming this way, — The Lord forgive you for yesterday!"

" I'll go to my tower on the Rhine," replied he, "'Tis the safest place in Germany; The walls are high, and the shores are steep, And the stream is strong, and the water deep."

Bishop Hatto fearfully hasten'd away, And he eross'd the Rhine without delay, And reach'd his tower, and barr'd with care All the windows, doors, and loop-holes there.

He laid him down and closed his eyes; — But soon a scream made him arise; He started, and saw two eyes of flame On h's pillow, from whence the screaming came.

THE PIOUS PAINTER.

He listen'd and look'd; — it was only the Cat, But the Bishop he grew more fearful for that; For she sat screaming, mad with fear At the Army of Rats that were drawing near.

For they have swam over the river so deep, And they have climb'd the shores so steep, And up the Tower their way is bent, To do the work for which they were sent.

They are not to be told by the dozen or score; By thousands they come, and by myriads and more. Such numbers had never been heard of before; Such a judgment had never been witness'd of yore.

Down on his knees the Bishop fell, And faster and faster his beads did he tell, As louder and louder drawing near The gnawing of their teeth he could hear.

And in at the windows, and in at the door, And through the walls, helter-skelter they pour, And down from the ceiling, and up through the floor, From the right and the left, from hehind and before, From within and without, from above and below, And all at once to the Bishop they go.

They have whetted their teeth against the stones; And now they pick the Bishop's bones; They gnaw'd the flesh from every limb, For they were sent to do judgment on him!

THE PIOUS PAINTER.

The legend of the Pious Painter is related in the Pia Hilaria of Gazzus; but the Pious Poet has omitted the second pert of the story, though it rests upon quite as good authority as the first. It is to be found in the Fablianz of Le Grand.

THE FIRST PART.

THERE once was a painter, in Catholic days, Like Job, who eschewed all evil; Still on his Madonnas the curious may gaze With applause and with pleasure; but chiefly his praise

And delight was in painting the Devil.

They were Angels, compared to the Devils he drew, Who besieged poor St. Anthony's cell;

Such hurning hot eyes, such a furnace-like hue! And round them a sulphurous coloring he threw,

That their breath seem'd of brimstone to smell.

And now had the artist a picture begun ; Twas over the Virgin's church-door ; She stood on the Dragon, embracing her Son; Many Devils already the artist had done, But this must outdo all hefore.

The Old Dragon's imps, as they fled through the air. At seeing it, paused on the wing; For he had the likeness so just to a hair,

That they came as Apollyon himself had been there, To pay their respects to their King.

Every child, at beholding it, trembled with dread, And scream'd as he turn'd away quick. Not an old woman saw it, but, raising her head, Dropp'd a bead, made a cross on her wrinkles, and said,

Lord, keep me from ugly Old Nick !

What the Painter so earnestly thought on by day, He sometimes would dream of by night; But once he was startled as sleeping he lay; 'Twas no fancy, no dream; he could plainly survey That the Devil himself was in sight.

7.

"You rascally dauber!" old Beelzebub cries, "Take heed how you wrong me again! Though yonr caricatures for myself I despise, Make me handsomer now in the multitude's eyes, Or sce if I threaten in vain!"

8.

Now the Painter was bold, and religious beside, And on faith he had certain reliance; So carefully he the grim countenance eyed, And thank'd him for sitting, with Catholic pride, And sturdily bade him defiance.

9.

Betimes in the morning the Painter arose; He is ready as soon as 'tis light. Every look, every line, every feature he knows; 'Tis fresh in his eye; to his labor he goes, And he has the old Wicked One quite.

10.

Happy man! he is sure the resemblance can't fail; The tip of the nose is like fire; [mail, There's his grin and his fangs, and his dragon-like And the very identical curl of his tail, —

So that nothing is left to desire.

He looks and retouches again with delight, "Tis a portrait complete to his mind;

And exulting again and again at the sight,

He looks round for applause, and he sees with affright

The Original standing behind.

"Fool! Idiot!" old Beelzebub grinn'd as he spoke, And stamp'd on the scaffold in ire;

THE PIOUS PAINTER.

The Painter grew pale, for he knew it no joke; 'Twas a terrible height, and the scaffolding broke, The Devil could wish it no higher.

13.

" He!p --- help ! Blessed Mary !" he cried in alarm, As the scaffold sunk under his feet.

From the canvass the Virgin extended her arm; She caught the good Painter; she saved him from harm;

There were hundreds who saw in the street.

The Old Dragon fled when the wonder he spied, And cursed his own fruitless endeavor; While the Painter call'd after his rage to deride, Shook his pallet and brushes in triumph, and cried,

"I'll paint thee more ugly than ever!"

THE SECOND PART.

THE Painter so pious all praise had acquired For defying the malice of Hell; The Monks the unerring resemblance admired; Not a Lady lived near but her portrait desired From a hand that succeeded so well.

One there was to be painted the number among Of features most fair to behold; The country around of fair Marguerite rung; Margnerite she was lovely, and lively, and young; Her husband was ugly and old.

3.

O Painter, avoid her! O Painter, take care, For Satan is watchful for you! Take heed lest you fall in the Wicked One's snare; The net is made ready; O Painter, beware Of Satan and Marguerite too.

4.

She seats herself now; now she lifts up her head; On the artist she fixes her eyes; The colors are ready, the canvass is spread; He lays on the white, and he lays on the red, And the features of beauty arise.

5.

He is come to her eyes, eyes so bright and so blue ! There's a look which he cannot express; — His colors are dull to their quick-sparkling hue; More and more on the lady he fixes his view; On the canvass he looks less and less.

6.

In vain he retouches; her eyes sparkle more, And that look which fair Marguerite gave !

57

Many Devils the Artist had painted of yore, But he never had tried a live Angel before, — St. Anthony, help him and save !

7.

He yielded, alas! — for the truth must be told, — To the Woman, the Tempter, and Fate. It was settled the Lady, so fair to behold.

Should elope from her Husband, so ugly and old, With the Painter, so pious of late.

Now Satan exults in his vengeance complete ; To the Husband he makes the scheme known ; Night comes, and the lovers impatiently meet ; Together they fly ; they are seized in the street,

And in prison the Painter is thrown.

With Repentance, his only companion, he lies, And a dismal companion is she !

On a sudden, he saw the Old Enemy rise,

"Now, you villanous dauber!" Sir Beelzebub cries, "You are paid for your insults to me!

"But my tender heart you may easily move If to what 1 propose you agree, That picture, — be just! the resemblance improve;

Make a handsomer portrait; your chains I'll remove, And you shall this instant be free."

Overjoy'd, the conditions so easy he hears; "1'll make you quite handsome!" he said. He said, and his chain on the Devil appears; Released from his prison, released from his fears, The Painter is snug in his bed.

12.

At morn he arises, composes his look, And proceeds to his work as before; The people beheld him, the culprit they took; They thought that the Painter his prison had broke, And to prison they led him once more.

13.

They open the dungeon; — behold, in his place In the corner old Beelzebub lay; He smirks, and he smiles, and he leers with a grace, That the Painter might catch all the charms of his face, Then vanish'd in lightning away.

14.

Quoth the Painter, "I trust you'll suspect me no more,

Since you find my assertions were true.

But I'll alter the picture above the Church-door, For he never vouchsaled me a sitting before, And I must give the Devil his due "

ST. MICHAEL'S CHAIR.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHAIR.

"Know all men that the most Holy Father Gragory, in tha year from the incarnation of our Lord 1070, bearing an effection of extraordinary devoutness to the Church of St. Michael's Mount, has piously granted to ull the faithful who shall reach or visit it, with their oblations and alms, a remission of a third part of their penances." - At the beginning of the 15th century, "Because, it was said, this privilege is still unknown to many, therefore we the servants of God, and the ministers of this church in Christ, do require and request of all of you who possess the care of souls, for the sake of mutual accommodation, to publish these words in your respective churches; that your parishioners and subjects may be more carefully animated to a greater exhortation of devontness, and may more gloriously in pilgrimages frequent this place, for the gracious attainment of the gifts and indul-gencies sforesaid." From this publication of the privilege oid undoubtedly commence that numerous resort of pilgrims to the church which Carew intimates ; and of which Norden, who generally is the mere copier of Carew, yet is here the enlarger of him, says, " The Mount hath been much resorted unto by pilgrims in devotion to St. Michael.29 Then too was framed assuredly that seat on the tower, which is so ridiculously described by Carew, as " a little without the castle, - a bad seat in a craggy place, - somewhat dangerous for access ; " when it is a chair composed of stones projecting from the two sides of the tower battlements, and uniting into a kind of basin for a seat just at the southwestern angle, but elevated above the battlements on each side, having its back just within, and hanging high over the rocky precipice below. It thus "appears somewhat dangerous " indeed, but not merely "for access," though the climber to it must actually turn his whole body at that altitude to take his seat in it, but from the altitude irself, and from its projection over the precipice. It also appears an evident addition to the building. And it was assuredly made at this period, not for the ridiculous purpose to which alone it professedly ministers at present, - that of enabling women who sit in it to govern their husbands afterwards; but for such of the pilgrims as had stronger heads, and bolder spirits, to complete their devotions at the Mount, by sitting in this St. Michael's Chair, as denominated, and these show ing themselves as pilgrims, to the country round. Hence, in an author who lends us information without knowing it, as he alludes to customs without feeling the force of them, we read this transient information :

> Who knows not Mighel'a Mount and Cheir, The pilgrim's holy vauut?

Norden also reëchoes Carew, in saying, "St. Michael's chair is fabled to be in the Mount." We thus find a reason for the construction of the chair, that comports with all the uses of the church on which it is constructed, and that ministered equally with this to the purposes of religion then predominant ; a religion, dealing more in exteriors than our own, operating more than our own, through the hody, upon the soul ; and so leaving, perhaps, a more sensible impression upon the spirits. To sit in the chair then, was not merely, as Carew represents the oct, "somewhat dangerous " in the attempt, " and therefore holy in the adventure," but also holy in itself, as on the church tower; more holy in its purposes, as the seat of the pilgrims; and most holy as the seat of a few in accomplishment of all their vows; as the chair of a few, in invitation of all the country .-WHITAKER'S Supplement to the First and Second Book of POLWHELE's History of Cornwall, pp. 6, 7.

MERRILY, merrily rung the bells, The bells of St. Michael's tower, When Richard Penlake and Rebecca his wife Arrived at St. Michael's door. Richard Penlake was a cheerful man, Cheerful, and frank, and free; But he led a sad life with Rebecca his wife, For a terrible shrew was she.

Richard Penlake a scolding would take, Till patience avail'd no longer; Then Richard Penlake his crab-stick would take, And show her that he was the stronger.

- Rebecca his wife had often wish'd To sit in St. Michael's chair; For she should be the mistress then, If she had once sat there.
- It chanced that Richard Penlake fell sick ; They thought he would have died ;
- Rebeeca his wife made a vow for his life, As she knelt by his bed-side.
- "Now hear my prayer, St. Michael! and spare My husband's life," quoth she;

"And to thine altar we will go Six marks to give to thee."

Richard Penlake repeated the vow, For woundily sick was he;

" Save me, St. Michael, and we will go Six marks to give to thee."

When Riehard grew well, Rebecca his wife Teased him by night and by day :

"O mine own dear! for you I fear, If we the vow delay."

Merrily, merrily rung the bells, The bells of St. Michael's tower, When Richard Penlake and Rebecca his wife Arrived at St. Michael's door.

Six marks they on the altar laid, And Richard knelt in prayer: She left him to pray, and stole away To sit in St. Michael's chair.

Up the tower Rebecca ran, Round, and round, and round; 'Twas a giddy sight to stand a-top, And look upon the ground.

"A curse on the ringers for rocking The tower!" Rebecca eried, As over the church battlements She strode with a long stride.

" A blessing on St. Michael's chair !" She said, as she sat down : Merrily, merrily rung the bells,

And out Rebeeca was thrown.

Tidings to Richard Penlake were brough' That his good wife was dead :

"Now shall we toll for her poor soul The great church bell?" they said

KING HENRY V. AND THE HERMIT OF DREUX.

"Toll at her burying," quoth Richard Penlake, "Toll at her burying," quoth he; "But don't disturb the ringers now In compliment to me."

Westbury, 1798.

KING HENRY V. AND THE HERMIT OF DREUX.

While Henry V. lay at the siege of Dreux, an honest Hermit, nuknown to him, came and told him the great evils he brought on Christendam by his unjust ambition, who usurped the kingdom of France, against all manner of right, and contrary to the will of God; wherefore, in his holy name, he threatened him with a severe and sudden punishment if he desisted not from his enterprise. Henry took this exhartation either as an idle whimsey, or a suggestion of the dauphin's, and was but the more confirmed in his design. But the holw soon followed the threatening; for, within some few months after, he was smitten with a straoge and incurable discase. — MEZERAY.

HE pass'd unquestion'd through the camp; Their heads the soldiers bent In silent reverence, or begg'd A blessing as he went; And so the Hermit pass'd along, And reached the royal tent.

King Henry sat in his tent alone; The map before him lay; Fresh conquests he was planning there To grace the future day.

King Henry lifted up his eyes The intruder to behold; With reverence he the hermit saw;

For the holy man was old;

His look was gentle as a Saint's, And yet his eye was bold.

- "Repent thee, Henry, of the wrongs Which thou hast done this land!
- O King, repent in time, for know The judgment is at hand.

"I have pass'd forty years of peace Beside the river Blaise;

But what a weight of woe hast thou Laid on my latter days !

"I used to see along the stream The white sail gliding down, That wafted food, in better times, To yonder peaceful town.

"Henry! I never now behold The white sail gliding down; Famine, Disease, and Death, and Thou Destroy that wretched town.

"I used to hear the traveller's voice As here he pass'd along, Or maiden, as she loiter'd home Singing her even-song.

"No traveller's voice may now be heard; In fear he hastens by; But I have heard the village maid In vain for succor cry.

" I used to see the youths row down, And watch the dripping oar, As pleasantly their viol's tones

Came soften'd to the shore.

- "King Henry, many a blacken'd corpse I now see floating down!
- Thou man of blood! repent in time, And leave this leaguer'd town."

"I shall go on," King Henry cried, "And conquer this good land; Seest thou not, Hermit, that the Lord Hath given it to my hand?"

The Hermit heard King Henry speak, And angrily look'd down;— His face was gentle, and for that

More solemn was his frown.

"What if no miracle from Heaven The murderer's arm control;

Think you for that the weight of blood Lies lighter on his soul ?

"Thou conqueror King, repent in time, Or dread the coming woe!

For, Henry, thon hast heard the threat, And soon shalt feel the blow!"

King Henry forced a careless smile, As the hermit went his way; But Henry soon remember'd him Upon his dying day.

On the Study-table a book there lay, Which Agrippa himself had been reading that day; The letters were written with blood therein, And the leaves were made of dead men's skin;—

And these horrible leaves of magic between Were the ugliest pictures that ever were seen, The likeness of things so foul to behold, That what they were is not fit to be told.

The young man he began to read He knew not what; but he would proceed, When there was heard a sound at the door Which, as he read on, grew more and more.

And more and more the knocking grew; The young man knew not what to do; But, trembling, in fear he sat within, Till the door was broke, and the Devil came in.

Two hideous horns on bis head he had got, Like iron heated nine times red-hot; The breath of his nostrils was brimstone blue, And his tail like a fiery serpent grew.

"What wouldst thou with me?" the Wicked One cried,

But not a word the young man replied; Every hair on his head was standing upright, And his limbs like a palsy shook with affright.

"What wouldst thou with me?" cried the Author of ill;

But the wretched young man was silent still; Not a word had his lips the power to say, And his marrow seem'd to be melting away.

"What wouldst thou with me?" the third time he cries,

And a flash of lightning came from his eyes, And he lifted his griffin claw in the air, And the young man had not strength for a prayer.

His eyes red fire and fury dart As out he tore the young man's heart; He grinn'd a horrible grin at his prey; And in a clap of thunder vanish'd away.

THE MORAL. Ilenceforth let all young men take heed How in a Conjurer's books they read.

KING CHARLEMAIN.

François Petrarque, fort renomme entre les Poètes Italiens, discourant en un epistre son voyage de France et de l'Allemaigne, nous raconte que passant par la ville d'Aiz, il apprit de quelques

Prestres une histoire prodigcuse qu'ils tenvient de main en main pour tres veritable. Qui estoit que Charles le Grand, apres avoir conquesté plusieurs pays, s'esperdit de telle façon en l'amour d'une simple femme, que mettant tout honneur et reputation en arriere, il oublia non seulement les affaires de son royaume, mais aussi le soing de sa propre personne, au grand desplaisir de chacun ; estant seulement ententif d courtiser ceste dame : laquelle par bonheur commencu d s'aliter d'une grosse maladie, qui lui apporta la mort. Dont les Princes et grands Scigneurs furent fort rejouis, esperans que par ceste mort, Charles reprendrat comme devant et ses esprits et les affuires du royaume en main : tontesfois il se trouva tellement infutué de ceste amour, qu' encores cherissoit-il ce cadaver, l'embrassant, baisant, accolant de la meme façon que derant, et au lien de prester l'oreille aux legations qui luy survenoient, il l'entretenoit de mille bayes, comme s'elle eust esté pleine de vie. Ce corps commençoit deja non seulement d mal sentir, mais aussi se tournoit en putrefaction, et neantmoins n'y avoit aucun de ses fuvoris qui luy en osast parler ; dont advint que l'Archevesque Turpin mieux advisé que les autres, pourpensa que telle chose ne pouvoit estre advenue sans quelque soreellerie. Au moyen dequoy espiant un jour l'heure que le Roy s'estoit absenté de la chambre, commença de foitiller le corps de toutes parts, finalement trouva dans sa bouche au dessous de sa langue un anneau qu'il luy osta. Le jour mesme Charlemaigne retournant sur ses premieres brisees, se trouva fort estonne de voir une carcasse ainsi puante. Parquoy, comme s'il se fust resveillé d'un profond sommeil, commanda que l'on l'ensevelist promptement. Ce qui fut fait ; mais en contr' eschange de ceste folie, il tourna tous ses pensemens vers l'Archevesque porteur de cest anneau, ne pouvant estre de là en avant sans luy, et le suivant en tous les endroits. Quoy voyant ce sage Prelat, et craignant que cest annean ne tombast en mains de quelque autre, le jetta dans un las prochain de la ville. Depuis lequel temps an dit que ce Roy se trouve si espris de l'amour du licu, qu'il ne se desempara de la ville d'Aix, où il bastit un Pulais, et un Monastere, en l'un desquels il parfit le reste de ses jours, et en Poutre voulut estre ensevely, ordonnant par son testament que tous les Empereurs de Rome eussent à se faire sacrer premierement en ce lieu. - PASQUIER. Recherches de la France. L. 6, C. 33.

This very learned author has strangely mistaken Aix in Savoy, the real scene of the legend, for Aix-la-Chapelle. The ruins of a building said to have been Charlemain's palace are still to be seen on the Lake of Bourget

IT was strange that he loved her, for youth was gone And the bloom of her beauty was fled: [by, 'Twas the glance of the harlot that gleam'd in her eye,

And all but the Monarch could plainly descry From whence came her white and her red.

Yet he thought with Agatha none might compare, And he gloried in wearing her chain;

The court was a desert if she were not there;

To him she alone among women seem'd fair,

Such dotage possess'd Charlemain.

The soldier, the statesman, the courtier, the maid, Alike the proud leman detest;

And the good old Archbishop, who ceased to upbraid,

Shook his gray head in sorrow, and silently prav'd That he soon might consign her to rest.

A joy ill-dissembled soon gladdens them all, For Agatha sickens and dies.

KING CHARLEMAIN.

And now they are ready with bier and with pall; The tapers gleam gloomy amid the high hall, And the strains of the requiem arise.

But Charlemain sent them in anger away, For she should not be buried, he said; And despite of all counsel, for many a day, Where array'd in her costly apparel she lay, The Monarch would sit by the dead.

6.

The cares of the kingdom demand him in vain, And the army cry out for their lord; The Lombards, the fierce misbelievers of Spain, Now rayage the realms of the proud Charlemain, And still he unsheaths not the sword.

ř.,

The soldiers they clamor, the Monks bend in prayer In the quiet retreats of the cell;

The physicians to counsel together repair,

And with common consent, one and all they declare That his senses are bound by a spell.

Then, with relics protected, and confident grown, And telling devoutly his beads,

The good old Archbishop, when this was made known,

Steals in when he hears that the corpse is alone, And to look for the spell he proceeds.

He searches with care, though with tremulous haste,

For the spell that bewitches the king; And under her tongue, for security placed, Its margin with mystical characters traced,

At length he discovers a ring.

Rejoicing he seized it, and hasten'd away; The Monarch reënter'd the room; The enchantment was ended, and, suddenly gay, He bade the attendants no longer delay, But bear her with speed to the tomb.

11.

Now merriment, joyance, and feasting again Enliven'd the palace of Aix; And now by his heralds did King Charlemain Invite to his palace the courtier train To hold a high festival day.

12.

And anxiously now for the festival day The highly-born Maidens prepare: And now, all apparel'd in costly array, Exulting they come to the palace of Aix, Young and aged, the brave and the fair.

13.

Oh! happy the Damsel who, 'mid her competers, For a moment engaged the King's eye! Now glowing with hopes, and now fever'd with fears,

Each maid or triumphant or jealous appears, As noticed by him, or pass'd by.

And now, as the evening approach'd, to the ball In anxious suspense they advance,

Hoping each on herself that the King's choice might fall,

When, lo! to the utter confusion of all, He ask'd the Archbishop to dance.

The damsels they laugh, and the harons they stare; 'Twas mirth and astonishment all;

And the Archbishop started, and mutter'd a prayer,

And, wroth at receiving such mockery there,

In haste he withdrew from the hall.

The moon dimpled over the water with light As he wander'd along the lake side;

But the King had pursued, and, o'erjoyed at his sight,

"Oh turn thee, Archbishop, my joy and delight, Oh turn thee, my charmer," he cried.

17.

"Oh come where the feast, and the dance, and the song,

Invite thee to mirth and to love;

Or at this happy moment, away from the throng,

To the shade of yon wood let us hasten along,-

The moon never pierces that grove."

18.

As thus by new madness the King-scem'd possess'd,

In new wonder the Archbishop heard;

Then Charlemain warmly and eagerly press'd

The good old man's poor, wither'd hand to his breast,

And kiss'd his long, gray, grizzle beard.

19.

"Let us well, then, these fortunate moments employ !"

Cried the Monarch with passionate tone;

- "Come away then, dear charmer, --- my angel, --my joy, ---
- Nay, struggle not now, —'tis in vain to be coy, And remember that we are alone."

20.

"Blessed Mary, protect me!" the Archbishop cried;

"What madness has come to the King!"

In vain to escape from the monarch he tried,

When luckily he on his finger espied

The glitter of Agatha's ring.

Overjoy'd, the good prelate remember'd the spell, And far in the lake flung the ring ;

The waters closed round it, and wondrous to tell, Released from the cursed enchantment of hell, His reason return'd to the King.

22.

But he built him a palace there close by the bay, And there did he love to remain;

And the traveller who will, may behold at this day A monument still in the ruins at Aix

Of the spell that possess'd Charlemain.

ST. ROMUALD.

Les Catalans ayant appris que S. Romuald vouloit quitter leurs pags, en furent très-affigés ; ils délibérérent sur les moyens de l'en empêcher, et le seul qu'ils imaginèrent comme le plus sûr, fat de le tuer, ofin de profiter du moins de ses reliques et des guerisons et autres miracles qu'elles opéreroient après sa mort. La dévotion que les Catalans avoient pour lui, ne plut point du tout d S. Romuald; il usa de stratagème et leur échappa. Sr., Foix, Essais Historiques sur Furis. - T. 5, p. 163.

St. Foix, who is often more amusing than trustworthy, has fathered this story upon the Spaniards, though it belongs to his own countrymen, the circumstances having happened when Romuald was a monk of the Convent of St. Michael's, in Aquitaine. It is thus related by Yepes. En esta ocasion sucedio una cosa bien extraordinaria, porque los naturales de la tierra donde estava el monasterio de San Miguel, estimavan en tanto a San Romoaldo, que fultandoles la paciencia de que se quisiesse yr, dicron en un terrible disparate, a quien llama muy bien San Pedro Damiano Impia Pietas, piedad crucl: porque queriendose yr San Romoaldo, determinaron de matarle, para que ya que no le podian tener en su tierra vivo, alomenos gozassen de sus reliquias y cuerpo santo. Supo San Romoaldo la determinacian bestial y indiscreta de aquella gente : y tomo una prudente resolucion, porque imitando a David, que fingio que estava loco, por no caer en manos de sus enemigos, assi San Romoaldo se hizo raer la cabrea, y con algunos ademanes, y palubras mal concertadas que dezus, le tuvieron por hombre que le avia faltado el juyzio, con que se asseguraron los naturales de la tierra que ya perpetuamente le tendrian en ella : y con semejante estratagema y traça tuvo lugar San Romoaldo de hurtarse, y a cencerros topados (como dizen) huyr de aquella tierra, y llegar a Italia a la ciudad de Ravena.

Curonica General de la Orden de San Benito. - T. 5, ff. 274.

Villegas in his Flos Santtarum, (February 7th,) records some of St. Romuald's achievements against the Devil and his imps. He records also the other virtues of the Saint, as specified in the poem. They are more fully stated by Yepes. Tenia tres cilicios, los quales mudava de treynta en treynta dias: no los labavu, sino ponialos ul ayre, y d la agua que lloria, con que se matavon algunos simundicias, que se criavan en ellos. — ff. 298. Quando alguna vez eratentado de la gula, y dessecou comer de algun manyar, tomorale en las manos, miravale, oliale, y despues que estava despierto el apetito, dezia, O gula, gula, quan dulce y suare te parece este manjar 1 pero no te ha de entrar en provecho ! y entonces se mortificara, y le dezava, y le embiava entero, o al silleriço, o a los pobres.
Piere is a free translation of this poem, by Bilderdijk, in the second volume of his Krekdzangen, p. 113.

ONE day, it matters not to know How many hundred years ago, A Frenchman stopp'd at an inn door: The Landlord came to welcome him, and chat Of this and that, For he had seen the Traveller there before. "Doth holy Romuald dwell Still in his cell?" ' The Traveller ask'd, "or is the old man dead?" "No; he has left his loving flock, and we So great a Christian never more shall see," The Landlord answer'd, and he shook his head.

"Ah, sir, we knew his worth! If ever there did live a Saint on earth! — Why, Sir, he always used to wear a shirt For thirty days, all seasons, day and night: Good man, he knew it was not right For Dnst and Ashes to fall out with Dirt; And then he only hung it out in the rain, And put it on again.

"There has been perilous work With him and the Devil there in yonder cell; For Satan used to manl him like a Turk. There they would sometimes fight All through a winter's night, From sunset until morn, He with a cross, the Devil with his horn; The Devil spitting fire, with might and main, Enough to make St. Michael half afraid; He splashing holy water till he made His red hide hiss again, And the hot vapor fill'd the smoking cell. This was so common that his face became All black and yellow with the brimstone flame, And then he smell, — O Lord! how he did smell '

"Then, Sir! to see how he would mortify The flesh! If any one had dainty fare, Good man, he would come there, And look at all the delicate things, and cry 'O Belly, Belly,

You would be gormandizing now, I know; But it shall not be so! ---

Home to your bread and water - home, I tell ye !''

"But," quoth the Traveller, "wherefore did he leave

A flock that knew his saintly worth so well?"

"Why," said the Landlord, "Sir, it so hefell He heard unluckily of our intent

- To do him a great honor; and, yon know, He was not covetous of fame helow,
- And so by stealth one night away he went."

"What might this honor be?" the Traveller cried. "Why, Sir," the host replied,

"We thought perhaps that he might one day leave us;

And then should strangers have The good man's grave,

A loss like that would naturally grieve ug, For he'll be made a Saint of, to be sure.

Therefore we thought it prudent to secure His relics while we might;

And so we meant to strangle him one night '

THE KING OF THE CROCODILES.

KING OF THE CROCODILES.

- The people at Isna, in Upper Egypt, have a superstition concerning Crocodiles similar to that entertained in the West Indies; they say there is a King of them who resides near Isna, and who has ears, but no tail; and he possesses an uncommon regal quality, that of doing no harm. Some are bold enough to assert that they have seen him. — BROWN'S Tratels.
- If the Crocodile Dynasty in Egypt had been described as distinguished by a long neck, as well as the want of a tail, it might be supposed that some tradition of the Ichthyosaurus, or other variety of the Præadamite Crocodile, was preserved in those countries.
- No one who has perused Mr. Watetton's Wanderings will think there is any thing more extraordinary in the woman's attack upon her intended devourer, than in what that enterprising and most observant naturalist has himself performed. He has ridden a Crocodile, twisting the huge reptile's fore legs on his back by main force, and using them as a bidle. "Should it be asked," ho says, "how 1 managed to keep my seat, I would answer, I hunted some years with Lord Darlington's fox-hounds."
- There is a translation of this ballad by Bilderdijk, published in his Krekelzangen, 1822, vol. ii. p. 109, before the second part was written.

PART I.

"Now, Woman, why without your veil? And wherefore do you look so pale? And, Woman, why do you groan so sadly, And wherefore beat your bosom madly?"

"Oh! I have lost my darling boy, In whom my soul had all its joy; And I for sorrow have torn my veil, And sorrow hath made my very heart pale

"Oh, I have lost my darling child, And that's the loss that makes me wild; He stoop'd to the river down to drink, And there was a Crocodile by the brink.

"He did not venture in to swim; He only stoop'd to drink at the brim; But under the reeds the Crocodile lay, And struck with his tail, and swept him away.

"Now take me in your boat, I pray, For down the river lies my way, And me to the Reed Island bring, For I will go to the Crocodile King.

"He reigns not now in Croeodilople, Proud as the Turk at Constantinople; No ruins of his great City remain, The Island of Reeds is his whole domain.

"Like a Dervise there he passes his days, Turns up his eyes, and fasts and prays; And being grown pious, and meek, and mild, He now never eats man, woman, or child. "The King of the Crocodiles never does wrong; He has no tail, so stiff and strong; He has no tail to strike and slay, But he has ears to hear what I say.

"And to the King I will complain How my poor child was wickedly slain; The King of the Crocodiles he is good, And I shall have the murderer's blood."

The man replied, "No, Woman, no, To the Island of Reeds I will not go; I would not for any worldly thing See the face of the Crocodile King."

"Then lend me now your little boat, And 1 will down the river float. I tell thee that no worldly thing Shall keep me from the Crocodile King.

"The King of the Crocodiles he is good, And therefore will give me blood for blood; Being so mighty and so just, He can revenge me; he will, and he must."

The Woman she leap'd into the boat, And down the river alone did she float; And fast with the stream the boat proceeds; And now she is come to the Island of Reeds.

The King of the Crocodiles there was seen; He sat upon the eggs of the Queen; And all around, a numerous rout, The young Prince Crocodiles crawl'd about.

The Woman shook every limb with fear, As she to the Crocodile King came near; For never man without fear and awe The face of his Crocodile Majesty saw.

She fell upon her bended knee, And said, "O King, have pity on me, For I have lost my darling child, And that's the loss that makes me wild.

"A Crocodile ate him for his food; Now let me have the murderer's blood; Let me have vengeance for my boy, The only thing that can give me joy.

"I know that you, Sire ! never do wrong, You have no tail, so stiff and strong, You have no tail to strike and slay, But you have cars to hear what I say."

"You have dene well," the King replies, And fixed on her his little eyes; "Good Woman, yes, you have done right, But you have not described me quite.

"I have no tail to strike and slay, And I have ears to hear what you say, I have teeth, moreover, as you may see, And I will make a meal of thee."

Bristol, 1799.

THE KING OF THE CROCODILES .- THE ROSE.

PART II.

WICKED the word, and bootless the boast, As cruel King Crocodile found to his cost; And proper reward of tyrannical might, He show'd his teeth, but he miss'd his bite.

"A meal of me!" the Woman eried, Taking wit in her anger, and courage beside; She took him his forelegs and hind between, And trundled him off the eggs of the Queen.

To revenge herself then she did not fail; He was slow in his motions for want of a tail; But well for the Woman was it, the while, That the Queen was gadding abroad in the Nile.

Two Crocodile Princes, as they play'd on the sand, She caught, and grasping them one in each hand, Thrust the head of one into the throat of the other, And made each Prince Crocodile choke his brother.

And when she had truss'd three couple this way, She carried them off, and hasten'd away, And plying her oars with might and main, Cross'd the river, and got to the shore again.

When the Crocodile Queen came home, she found That her eggs were broken and scattered around, And that six young Princes, darlings all, Were missing, for none of them answer'd her call.

Then many a not very pleasant thing Pass'd between her and the Crocodile King: "Is this your care of the nest?" cried she. "It comes of your gadding abroad," said he.

The queen had the better in this dispute, And the Crocodile King found it best to be mute, While a terrible peal in his ears she rung, For the Queen had a tail as well as a tongue.

In woful patience he let her rail, Standing less in fear of her tongue than her tail, And knowing that all the words which were spoken Could not mend one of the eggs that were broken.

The Woman, meantime, was very well pleased; She had saved her life, and her heart was eased; The justice she ask'd in vain for her son, She had taken herself, and six for one.

"Mash-Allah!" her neighbors exclaim'd in delight.

She gave them a funeral supper that night, Where they all agreed that revenge was sweet, And young Prince Crocodiles delicate meat.

THE ROSE.

moche as a fayre Maydeu was blamed with wroog and aclaundred, that sche hadd don fornicacioun, for whiche caues sche wea demed to the dethe, and to be brent in that place, to the whiche she was ladd. And as the fyre began to brenne about hire, ahe made her preperes to oure Lord, that als wissely as acbe was not gylty of that synne, that he wold help hire, and make it to be knowen to alle men of his mercyfulle grace : and whance ache had thus scyd, sche entered into the fuyer, and anon was the fuyer quenched and oute, and the brondes that weren brennynge becomen white Roseres, fulle of roses, and theise werein the first Roseres and roses, both white and rede, that every ony man saughe. And thus was this Maiden saved by the grace of God.— The Voiage and Traicale of Sir John Maunderille.

NAY, EDITH ! spare the Rose ; — perhaps it lives, And feels the noontide sun, and drinks refresh'd The dews of night; let not thy gentle hand Tear its life-strings asunder, and destroy The sense of being ! — Why that infidel smile ? Come, I will bribe thee to be mereiful; And thou shalt have a tale of other days, — For I am skill'd in legendary lore, — So thou will let it live. There was a time Ere this, the freshest, sweetest flower that blooms, Bedeek'd the bowers of earth. Thou hast not heard How first by miracle its fragrant leaves Spread to the sun their blushing loveliness.

There dwelt in Bethlehem a Jewish maid, And Zillah was her name, so passing fair That all Judea spake the virgin's praise. He who had seen her eye's dark radiance How it reveal'd her soul, and what a soul Beam'd in the mild effulgence, woe to him' For not in solitude, for not in crowds, Might he escape remembrance, nor avoid Her imaged form, which followed every where, And filled the heart, and fix'd the absent eye. Alas for him! her bosom own'd no love Save the strong ardor of religious zeal, For Zillah on her God had centred all Her spirit's deep affections. So for her Her tribes-men sigh'd in vain, yet reverenced The obdurate virtue that destroy'd their hopes.

One man there was, a vain and wretched man, Who saw, desired, despaired, and hated her. His sensual eye had gloated on her cheek Even till the flush of angry modesty Gave it new charms, and made him gloat the more. She loathed the man; for Hamuel's eye was bold, And the strong workings of brute selfishness Had moulded his broad features; and she fear'd The bitterness of wounded vanity That with a fiendish hue would overeast His faint and lying smile. Nor vain her fear; For Hamuel vow'd revenge, and laid a plot Against her virgin fame. He spread abroad Whispers that travel fast, and ill reports That soon obtain belief; how Zillah's eye, When in the temple heaven-ward it was raised, Did swim with rapturous zeal, but there were those Who had beheld the enthusiast's melting glance With other feelings fill'd ; - that 'twas a task Of easy sort to play the saint by day

Betwene the Cytee and the Chirche of Bethlehem, is the felde Floridus, that is to seyne, the felde florsched. For els Before the public eye, but that all eyes

Were closed at night; — that Zillah's life was foul, Yea, forfeit to the law.

Shame — shame to man, That he should trust so easily the tongue Which stabs another's fame! The ill report Was heard, repeated, and believed, and soon, — For Hamuel, by his well-schemed villany, Produced such semblances of guilt, — the Maid Was to the fire condemn'd.

Without the walls, There was a barren field; a place abhorr'd, For it was there where wretched criminals Receiv'd their death; and there they fix'd the stake, And piled the fuel round, which should consume The injured Maid, abandon'd, as it seem'd, By God and Man. The assembled Bethlemites Beheld the scene, and when they saw the Maid Bound to the stake, with what calm holiness She lifted up her patient looks to Heaven, They doubted of her guilt. With other thoughts Stood Hamuel near the pile; him savage joy Led thitherward, but now within his heart Unwonted feelings stirr'd, and the first pangs Of wakening guilt, anticipant of Hell. The eye of Zillah, as it glanced around, Fell on the slanderer once, and rested there A moment; like a dagger did it pierce, And struck into his soul a cureless wound. Conseience! thou God within us! not in the hour Of triumph dost thou spare the guilty wretch; Not in the hour of infamy and death Forsake the virtuous! They draw near the stake,-They bring the torch!-hold, hold your erring hands !

Yet quench the rising flames ! - they rise ! they spread !

They reach the suffering Maid! oh God protect The innocent one!

They rose, they spread, they raged ; ---The breath of God went forth; the ascending fire Beneath its influence bent, and all its flames In one long lightning-flash concentrating, Darted and blasted Hamuel, -him alone. Hark !--- what a fearful scream the multitude Pour forth ! - and yet more miracles ! the stake Branches and buds, and, spreading its green leaves, Embowers and canopies the innocent Maid, Who there stands glorified; and Roses, then First seen on earth since Paradise was lost, Profusely blossom round her, white and red, In all their rich variety of hues; And fragrance such as our first parents breathed In Eden she inhales, vouchsafed to her A presage sure of Paradise regain'd.

THE LOVER'S ROCK.

De la Peña de los Enamorados.

Un moço Christiano estava cautivo en Granada, sus partes y diligencia eran tales, su buen termino y cortesia, que su amo hazia mucha confiança del dentro y fuera de su casa. Una hija suya al tanto se le aficiona y puso en el los ojos. Pero como quier que ella fuesse casadera, y el moço escluvo, no podian passar adelante como deseavan; ca el amor mal se puede encubrir, y temian si el padre della, y smo del, lo sabia, pagurian con las cabeças. Acordaron de huir a tierra de Christianos, resolucion que al moço venia mejor, por bolver a los suyos, que a ella por desterrarse de su patria : si ya no la movia el desco de hazerse Christiana, lo que yo no creo. Tomaron su camino con todo scereto, hasta llegar al peñasco ya dicho, en que la moça cansada se puso a reposar. En esto vieron assomar a su padre con gente de acavallo, que venia en su seguimiento. Que podian hazer, o a que parte bolverse? que consejo tomar? mentirosas las esperanças de los hombres y miserables sus intentos. Acudieron u lo que solo les que lava de encumbrar aquel peñol, trepando por aquellos riscos, que era reparo assuz flaco. El padre con un semblante sañudo los mando abazar : amenaçava les sino obedecian de executar en ellos una muerte muy eruel. Los que acompañavan al pndre los amonestavan lo mismo, pues solo les restava aquella esperança de alançar perdon de la misericordia de su padre, con hazer lo que les mandara, y echarseles a los pies. No quisicron venir en esto. Los Moros puestos a pie acometieron a subir el peñasco ; pero el mogo les defendio la subida con galgas, piedras y palos, y todo lo demas que le venía a la mano, y le servia de armas en aquella desesperacion. El padre visto esto, hizo venir de un pueblo alli cerca vallesteros para que de lezos los flechassen. Ellos vista su perdicion, acordaron con su mucrte librarse de los denuestos y tormentos mayores qui temian. Las palabras que en este trance se dizeron, no ay para que relaturlas. Finalmente abraçados entresi fuertemente, se ccharon del peñol abazo, por aquella parte en que los mirava su cruel y sanudo padre. Deste manera espiraron antes de llegar a lo baxo, con lastima de los presentes, y aun con lagrimas de algunos que se movian con aquel tristo erpectaculo de aquellos moços desgraciados, y a pesar del padre, como estavan, los enterraron en aquel mismo lugar; constancia que se empleura mejor en otra hazaña, y les fuera bien contada la muerte, si la padecieron por la virtud y en defensa de la verdadera religion, y no por satisfacer a sus apetitos desenfrenados MARIANA

THE Maiden, through the favoring night, From Granada took her flight; She bade her Father's house farewell, And fled away with Manuel.

No Moorish maid might hope to vie With Laila's cheek or Laila's eye; No maiden loved with purer truth, Or ever loved a lovelier youth.

In fear they fled, across the plain, The father's wrath, the captive's chain; In hope to Seville on they flee, To peace, and love, and liberty

Chiuma they have left, and now, Beneath a precipice's brow, Where Guadalhoree winds its way, There in the shade awhile they lay; —

For now the sun was near its height, And she was weary with her flight; She laid her head on Manuel's breast, And pleasant was the maiden's rest.

While thus the lovely Laila slept, A fearful watch yonng Manuel kept. Alas! her Father and his train He sees come speeding o'er the plain.

GARCI FERRANDEZ.

The Maiden started from her sleep ; They sought for refuge up the steep; To scale the precipice's brow Their only hope of safety now.

But them the angry Father sees; With voice and arm he menaces; And now the Moors approach the steep ; Loud are his curses, loud and deep.

Then Manuel's heart grew wild with woe; He loosen'd stones and roll'd below ; He loosen'd crags; for Manuel strove For life, and liberty, and love.

The ascent was perilous and high ; The Moors they durst not venture nigh; The fugitives stood safely there; They stood in safety and despair.

The Moorish chief unmoved could see His daughter bend her suppliant knee; He heard his child for pardon plead, And swore the offenders both should bleed.

He bade the archers bend the bow, And make the Christian fall below; He bade the archers aim the dart, And pierce the Maid's apostate heart.

The archers aim'd their arrows there; She clasp'd young Manuel in despair ; "Death, Manuel, shall set us free! Then leap below, and die with me."

He clasp'd her close, and cried, Farewell ! . In one another's arms they fell; And falling o'er the rock's steep side, In one another's arms they died.

And side by side they there are laid, The Christian youth and Moorish maid; But never Cross was planted there, Because they perish'd for despair.

Yet every Moorish maid can tell Where Laila lies, who loved so well; And every youth, who passes there, Says for Manuel's soul a prayer.

GARCI FERRANDEZ.

This story, which later historians have taken some pains to disprove, may be found in the Coronica General de Espana.

PART I.

1. In an evil day and an hour of woe Did Garci Ferrandez wed!

He wedded the Lady Argentine, As ancient stories tell; He loved the Lady Argentine, Alas! for what befell! The Lady Argentine hath fled; In an evil day and an hour of woe She hath left the husband who loved her well, To go to Count Aymerique's bed

Garci Ferrandez was brave and young, The comeliest of the land; There was never a knight of Leon in fight Who could meet the force of his matchless might; There was never a foe in the infidel band Who against his dreadful sword could stand; And yet Count Garci's strong right hand Was shapely, and soft, and white; As white and as soft as a lady's hand Was the hand of the beautiful knight.

3.

In an evil day and an hour of woe To Garei's Hall did Count Aymerique go; In an evil hour and a luckless night From Garci's Hall did he take his flight, And bear with him that lady bright, That lady false, his bale and bane. There was feasting and joy in Count Aymerique's bower, When he, with triumph, and pomp, and pride, Brought home the adulteress like a bride: His daughter only sat in her tower; She sat in her lonely tower alone, And for her dead mother she made her moan; "Methinks," said she, "my father for me Might have brought a bridegroom home. A stepmother he brings hither instead ; Count Aymerique will not his daughter should wed, But he brings home a leman for his own bed." So thoughts of good and thoughts of ill Were working thus in Abba's will; And Argentine, with evil intent, Ever to work her woe was bent;

That still she sat in her tower alone, And in that melancholy gloom, When for her mother she made her moan, She wish'd her father too in the tomb.

She watches the pilgrims and poor who wait For daily food at her father's gate. "I would some Knight were there," thought she, " Disguised in pilgrim-weeds for me ! For Aymerique's blessing I would not stay, Nor he nor his leman should say me nay, But I with him would wend away."

She watches her handmaid the pittance deal; They took their dole and went away; But yonder is one who lingers still; As though he had something in his will, Some sceret which he fain would say;

GARCI FERRANDEZ.

And close to the portal she sees him go; He talks with her handmaid in accents low; Oh then she thought that time went slow, And long were the minutes that she must wait Till her handmaid came from the castle-gate.

From the castle-gate her handmaid came, And told her that a Knight was there, Who sought to speak with Abba the fair, Count Aymerique's beautiful daughter and heir. She bade the stranger to her bower; His stature was tall, his features bold; A goodlier form might never maid At tilt or tourney hope to see; And though in pilgrim-weeds arrayed, Yet noble in his weeds was he, And did his arms in them enfold As they were robes of royalty.

He told his name to the high-born fair; He said that vengeance led him there. "Now aid me, lady dear," quoth he, "To smite the adulteress in her pride; Your wrongs and mine avenged shall be, And I will take you for my bride." He pledged the word of a true Knight; From out the weeds his hand he drew; She took the hand that Garci gave, And then she knew his tale was true, For she saw the warrior's hand so white, And she knew the fame of the beautiful Knight.

PART H.

'Tis the hour of noon; The bell of the convent hath done, And the Sexts are begun; The Count and his leman are gone to their meat. They look to their pages, and lo they see Where Abba, a stranger so long before, The ewer, and basin, and napkin bore; She came and knelt on her bended knee, And first to her father minister'd she: Count Aymerique look'd on his daughter down; He look'd on her then without a frown.

And next to the Lady Argentine Humbly she went and knelt; The Lady Argentine the while A haughty wonder felt; Her face put on an evil smile; "I hitle thought that I should see The Lady Abba kneel to me In service of love and courtesy! Count Aymerique," the leman cried, "Is she weary of her solitude, Or hath she quell'd her pride?" Abba no angry word replied; She only raised her eyes, and cried, "Let not the Lady Argentine Be wroth at ministry of mine!" She look'd at Aymerique, and sigh'd; "My father will not frown, I ween, That Abba again at his board should be seen!" Then Aymerique raised her from her knee, And kiss'd her eyes, and bade her be The daughter she was wont to be.

The wine hath warm'd Count Aymerique; That mood his crafty daughter knew ; She came and kiss'd her father's cheek, And stroked his beard with gentle hand, And winning eye and action bland, As she in childhood used to do. "A boon ! Count Aymerique," quoth she ; "If I have found favor in thy sight, Let me sleep at my father's feet to-night. Grant this," quoth she, "so I shall see That you will let your Abba be The daughter she was wont to be." With asking eye did Abba speak ; Her voice was soft and sweet; The wine had warm'd Count Aymerique, And when the hour of rest was come, She lay at her father's feet.

In Aymerique's arms the adulteress lay; Their talk was of the distant day, How they from Garci fled away In the silent hour of night; And then amid their wanton play They mock'd the beautiful Knight Far, far away his castle lay, The weary road of many a day; "And travel long," they said, " to him, It seem'd, was small delight; And he belike was loath with blood To stain his hands so white." They little thought that Garei then Heard every scornful word ! They little thought the avenging hand Was on the avenging sword ! Fearless, unpenitent, unblest, Without a prayer they sunk to rest, The adulterer on the leman's breast.

Then Abba, listening still in fear, To hear the breathing long and slow, At length the appointed signal gave, Aud Garei rose and struck the blow. One blow sufficed for Aymerique, — He made uo moan, he utter'd no groan; But his death-start waken'd Argentine,

And by the chamber lamp she saw The bloody falchion shine ! She raised for help her in-drawn breath ; But her shriek of fear was her shriek of death.

In an evil day and an hour of woe Did Garci Ferrandez wed!

One wicked wife he has sent to her grave; He hath taken a worse to his bed.

Bristol, 1801

KING RAMIRO.

- The remarkable story here varsified is thus related in the Nubliario de D. Pedro, Conda de Bracelos, son of D. Diniz, king of Portugal, a singularly valuable and curious work, published by the Coronista Mayor of that kingdom, Juan Bautista Lavaña, at Rome, in 1640. King D. Diniz reigned from 1279 to 1323.
- El Rey D. Ramiro o segundo de Leom, ouvio falar da fermosura e bondade de huma Moura; e como era de alto sangue irmã de Alboazar Albucadam, filha de D. Zadam Zada, bisneta del Rey Aboalli, o que conquerco a terra no tempo del Rey Rodrigo, Este Alboazar era Senhor de toda a terra desde Gaya atd Sautarem ; e ouve muytas batalhas com Christaös, estremadamente com este Rey Ramiro; e el Rey Ramiro fez com elle grandes amizudes por cobrar aquella Moura, que el muyto amava; e fez emfinta que o amava muyto; e mandoulhe dizer que o queria ver, por se aver de conhecer com elle por as amizades serem mais firmes ; e Alboazar mandoulhe dizer que lhe prazia dello, e que fosse a Gaya, e hi se veria com el. E el Rey Ramiro foyse ld em tres gales com fidalgos, e pidiolhe aquella Moura que lha desse, e falaia Christam, e cazaria com ella ; e Alboazar lhe respondeo, tu tens molher, e filhos della, e es Christao; como podes tu casar duas vezes ? E el lhe dixe, eu verdade era, mas elle era tam parente da Rainha D. Aldonza sua molher, ca a santa Igreja os partiria. E Alboazar juroulhe por sa ley de Mafamede, ca lha nom daria por todo o reyno que elle avia, que a tenha desposada com el Rey de Marrocos.
- Este Rey D. Ramiro trazia hua grande Astrologo que avia nome Amaö; e por sås artes tirvua huma nogte donde estara, e lerova ds galès que hi estavam prestas, e entrou Rey Ramiro com a Moura em huma galè. A esto chegou Alboazar, e alli foy contenda grande entre elles; e despareceron hi dos de Rey Ramiro vinte dous dos boms que hi levava, e da outra compohna muyta : e el levou d Moura a Minhôr, e de ahi a Leom, e bautizoua, e poslhe nome Ortiga, que queria tanto dizer em aquel tempo, como castíguda e ensinuda, e comprida de todos os hens.
- Alboazar tevese por mal viltado desto, e pensou em como poderia vingar tal deshoira, e ouvio fular em como a Ruinha D. Aldınça, molher del Rey Ramiro estava em Minhor. Postou sás naos e outras velas, o melhor que pode, e mais encuberto ; e foy d quelle lugar de Minhor, e entrou a villa, e filhou a Rainha D. Aldonça, e meteoa nas naos com donos e donzellas que achou, e das outras companhas muytas, veyose a o Castello de Gaya, que era em a quelle tempo de grandes edificios e nobres poços.
- A el Rey Ramiro contarom este feyto, e foy em tamanha tristeza que foy louco hūs doze dias : e como cobrou seu entendimento mandou por seu filho o Infante D. Ordonho, c por algüs seus vassallos que entendeo que erao para grao feyto, e meteose com elles em cinco galês, ca nom pode mais aver, e num quiz levar galeutes se nom aquelles que entendeo que poderiom reger as galés, e mandou a os fidalgos que remassem em lugar de galeotes ; e esta fez elle porque as galès erom poucas, e por irem mais fidalgos, e as galès irem mais aparadas para aquel mester para que ia; e el cubrio as galès de pano verde, e entrou com ellas por Sam Jooo de Furado, que agora chamao Sam Joane de Foz. Aquel lugar de huma parte e outra era a ribeyra cuberta de arbores, e as galês encostouas so as ramos dellas; e porque erao cubertas de pano verde, nom pareciao. El deceo de noyte a terra com todos os seus, e falou com o Infante, que se deutassem so as arbores o mais encuberto que fazer podessem, e por nenhuma guiza nom se abalassem, até que ouvissem a voz de seu corno, e ouvindoo que lhe acorressem a grao pressa. El vestiose em panos de tacanho, e sua espada, e seu lorigo e o corno so hi; e foyse deytar a huma fante que estava so o castello de Gaya. E esto fazia Rey Ramiro por ver a Rainha sa molher, para aver conselho com ella, como poderia mais cumpridamente aver direyto de Alboazar, e de todos seus filhos, e de toda sa companha; ca tinha que pello conselho della cobraria todo, ca cometenda este feyto em outra maneyra, poderia escapar Alboatar e scus filhos: e porque el era de grad coraço, punha em esta guiza seu feyto em grad ventura; mas as cousas que sad ordenadas de Deos, vem a aquello que a elle apraz, e nom assim como os homês pensad.

Aconteceo assi, que Alboazar Albucadao fora a correr monte contra Alafons, e humn sergente que avia nome Perona, natural de França, que aviao levado com a Rainha servia ante ella: levantouse pella manha, assi como avia de costume de lhe ir cor agoa para as maõs a aquella fonte, e achou hi jazer Rey Ramiro, e nom o conhecco. El pediolhe na Aravia da agoa por Deos, ca se nom podia de alli levantar ; e ella deolha por huma aceter ; e el meteo hum camafeo na boca, e aquel camafeo avia partido com sa molher a Rainha por a metade; e el devse a bever, e deytou o camafeo no aceter. E a sergente foyse, e deo agoa d Rainha, e ellu vio o camofeo, e reconheceo logo, e a Rainha perguntou, quem achara no caminho ? e ella respondeo, que nom achara ninguem; e ella lhe dire que mentua, e que o nom negasse, e que lhe faria bem e merce ; e a sergente lhe dize, que achara hi hum Mouro doente e lazerado, e lhe pedira agoa que beliesse por Deos, e que lha dera; e a Ruinha dixe que lhe fosse por elle, e o trouzesse enculvrtamente. E a sergente foy ld, e dixelhe, homem pobre, a Rainha minha senhora ros manda chamar, e esto he por vosso hem, cá ella mandara pensar de vos. E. Rey Ramiro respondeo so si, assi o mande Deos. Foyse com ella, e entrarom pella porta da camara, e conheceo a Rainha, e dizelhe, Rey Ramiro que te aduce aqui ? e el lhe respondeo, o vosso amor. E ella lhe dize, veste morto : e el lhe dixe, pequeña maravilha, pois o faço por vossso amor. E ella respondeo, nom me has tu amor, pois de aqui levaste Ortiga, que mais prezas que a mi; mas vayte hora para essa trascomaro, e escusarmery destas donas e donzellas, e irmeey logo para ti. A camara era de abobeda, e como Rey Ramiro foy dentro, fechou ella a porta com grunde endeado. E elle jazendo na camara, chegou Albouzar, e foyse para sd camara; e a Rainha lhe disc, se tu aqui tivesses Rey Ramiro, que lhe farias? O Moura respondeo, o que faria a mim; matalo com grandes tormentos. E Rey Ramiro ouvia tudo, e a Rainha dixe, Pois senhor, nprestes o tens ; ed aqui esta fechado em esta trascamora, ca ora te podes della vingar a tua vontade.

- Rey Ramiro entendeo que era enganado por sel molher, que ja de alli nom podia escapar se nom por arte alguma; e maginou que era tempo de se ajudar de seu saber, e dize a grao alta voz, Alboazar Albucadam, sahe que cu te errey mal; mostrandote amizade, levy desta cuza td irmä, que nom era de minha ley; e me confessey este pecado a meu Abade; e el me deo em pendença, que me vcesse meter em ten poder o muis vilmente que pudesse; e se me tu matar quizesses, que te pedisse que, como eu fizera tam grande pecado ante a tá pessoa, e ante os teus. em filhar ta irmā, mostrandote bom amor, que bem assi me desses morte em praça vergouhosa; e por quanto a pecado que en fiz, foy em grandes terras soudo, que bem assi fosse a minha morte soadu por hum corno, e mostrada a todos os teus. E hora te peço pois de morrer ey, que faças chamar teus filhos e filhas, e teus parentes, e os gentes desta villa, e me faças ir a este curral que he de grande ouvida, e me ponhas em lugar alto, e me legres tanger meu corno, que trago para esto, a tanto, atá que me saya o folgo e u alma do corpo. Em esta filharas vengança de mi, e teus filhos e parentes averao prazer, e a minha alma serd salva. Esto me nom deves de negar por salvamento de minha alma; que sabes que por td ley deves sulvar se poderes as almas de todas as leys.
- E esto devia el, por fuzer vir alli todos seus filhos e parentes, por se vingar delles ; ca em outra guiza nom os poderia achar em hum ; e porque o curral era alto de muros, e nom avia mais que huma porta por hu os seus aviao de entrar. Alboazar pensou no que lhe pedia, e filhou delle lastima, e dixe contra a Rainha, Este homem rependido hê de seu pecado; mais ey eu errado a elle cd elle d mi ; grao torto faria de o matar, pois se poe em meu poder. A Ruinha respondeolhe, Alboazar, fraco de coraçõ, cu sey quem he Rey Ramiro; e sey de certo, se o salvas de morte, que lhe nom podes escapar que a nom prenias aet ; ca el he artegroso a vingador, assi como tu sabes. E nom ouviste tu dizer, como el tirou os olhos a D. Ordonho seu irmao que era mor de dias, por a deserdar do Reyno? e nom te acordas quantas lides ouveste com elle, e te venceo; e te matou e cativou muytos bons? e ja te esqueceo a força que te fez de te irmā? e em como eu cra sa molher, me trouxeste, que he a mor des honra que os Christaõs podem aver? Nom es para viver, nem es para nada, se te nom vingas. E se o tu nom fazes por tua alma, porque assi a salvas, porque he homem de outra ley, e em contrario da tua; e tu dulhe a morte que te pede, pois ja vem aconselhado de seu Abade; ca graõ pecado farias, se ha partisses.

Alboazar olhou o dizer da Rainha, e dize em seu coraçom, de md ventura he o homem que se fía de nenkha molher: esta hês di molher lidima, e tem Infantes e Infantas del, e quer sá morte deshourada; eu nom ey porque della fíe; eu ulongalaey de mi. É pensou em o que lhe dezu a Rainha, em como Rey Ramiro era urteyroso e vingador; e receouse delle, se o nom matase; e munhau chamar todos os que eron maquele lugar, e dire a Rey Ramiro, Tu vieste aqui e fizeste gram locura, que nos teus puços puderas filhar pendença; e porque sey se me tu tivesses em teu poder, nom escaparia du morte, eu te quero cumprir o que me pides pur salvamento de tua alma.

Mundouo tirar da camara, e levouo a o curral, e pollo sobre hum gram padraõ que hi estavo, e mandou que tarjesse seu corno d tanto atd que lue saisseo folgo. E el Rey Ramiro lhe pedio que ficesse hi estor a Rainha, e as donas e donzellas, e todos seus filhos, e parentes e cidadaõs naquel curral, e Alboazar fezeo assi.

El Rey Ramiro tangeo seu corno a todo seu poder, para ouvirem os seus, e o Infunte D. Ordonho seu filho quando ouvio o corno, acorreolhe cam todos seus vassallos, e meteromse pella porta do curral ; e Rey Ramiro deceose do padrao donde estava, c veyo contra o Infante, e dixe : Meu filho, vossa madre nom moura, nem as donas e donzellas que com ella vierao ; e guardaya de cajom, que outra morte merece. Alli tirou a espada du bainha, e deo com clla a Alboazar por cima da cabeça, que o fendeo atd os peytos. Alli morerao quatro filhos e tres filhas de Alboazar Albucadaö; e todos os Mouros e Mouras que estavao no curral : e nom ficou em essa villa de Guya pedra com pedra, que todu nom fosse em terra. Filhou el Rey Ramiro sd molher com sás donas e donzellas que estavaõ com ella, e quanto aver achou, e meteo nas galês ; e despois que este ouve acabado, chamou o Infante seu filho, e os seus fidalgos, e contoulhes tudo, como lhe aviera com a Rainha sa molher, e elle que lhe dera ajuda para fazer della mais crua justiça na sd terra. Esto ouverom todos por estranho de tamanha moldade de molher ; e o Infante D. Ordonho sairaolhe as lagrimas polos olhos, e dire contra seu padre, Senhor a mi nom cabe de falar em esto, porque he mi madre; se nom tanto, que olheis por vossa honra.

E entrarom entom nas gales, e chegorom à foz de Ancora, e amarrarao as galês para folgarem, porque aviao muyto trabalhado aquelles dias : alli forom dizer a el Rey que a Rainha seia chorando ; e el Rey dize, Vamola ver. Foy ld, e perguntoulhe porque chorava? E ella respondeo, Porque mataste aquelle Mouro, que era melhor que ti. O Infante dire contra seu padre, Isto he demonio ; que quereis della ? que pode ser que vos fugira. E el Reymandoua entas amarrar a huma mo, e lancala no mar, e desaquelle tempo lhe chamarom Foz de Ancora. Por este pecado que dixe o Infante D. Ordonho contra sa madre, dizcrom despois as gentes que por esso fora deserdado dos povos de Castella. Rey Ramiro fuyse a Leaô, e fez sás cortes muy ricas, e falou com os seus de sás terras, e mostroulhes a mal-dade da Rainha Aldonça sa molher: que elle avia por bem de cazar com D. Ortiga, que era de alto linhage : e elles todos a huma voz o louvarom, e ouveromno por bem. Elle foy da boa rida, e fez o Mosteyro de S. Juliao, e outros hospitaes muytos; e os que della decenderon forom muyto cumplidos. - Fr. 111 -116

E o Mouro lhe disse, viestes a morrer; mas querote perguntar, que se me tiveces em Mier, que morte me darias? El Rey Ramiro era muito faminto, e respondeolhe assim, eu te daria hum capaõ assado, e huma regueifa, a fariate tudo comer, e dartchia em sima en sa capa chea de vinho que bebesse. — Provas, T. 1, p. 213.

J.

GREEN grow the alder-trees, and close To the water-side by St. Joam da Foz. From the castle of Gaya the Warden sees The water and the alder-trees; And only these the Warden sees; No danger near doth Gaya fear; No danger nigh doth the Warden spy;

He sees not where the galleys lie Under the alders silently;

For the galleys with green are cover'd o'er, They have crept by night along the shore; And they lie at anchor, now it is morn, Awaiting the sound of Ramiro's horn.

In traveller's weeds Ramiro sate By the fountain at the castle-gate; But under the weeds was his breastplate, And the sword he had tried in so many fights, And the horn whose sound would ring around, And be known so well by his knights.

3.

From the gate Aldonza's damsel came To fill her pitcher at the spring,

And she saw, but she knew not, her master the King.

In the Moorish tongue Ramiro spake, And begg'd a draught for mercy's sake, That he his burning thirst might slake; For, worn by a long malady, Not strength enow, he said, had he To lift it from the spring.

She gave her pitcher to the King, And from his mouth he dropp'd a ring Which he had with Aldonza broken; So in the water from the spring Queen Aldonza found the token. With that she bade her damsel bring Sccretly the stranger in.

5.

"What brings thee hither, Ramiro?" she eried;
"The love of you," the King replied.
"Nay! nay! it is not so!" quoth she;
"Ramiro, say not this to me!
I know your Moorish concubine
Hath now the love which once was mine.
If you had loved me as you say,
You would never have stolen Ortiga away;
If you had never loved another,
I had not been here in Gaya to-day
The wife of Ortiga's brother!
But hide thee here, — a step I hear,
King Alboazar draweth near."

In her alcove she bade him hide: "King Alboazar, my lord," she eried, "What wouldst thou do, if at this hour King Ramiro were in thy power?" "This I would do," the Moor replied; "I would hew him limb from limb; As he, I know, would deal by me, _So I would deal by him."

KING RAMIRO.

"Alboazar!" Queen Aldonza said, "Lo! here I give him to thy will; _n yon alcove thou hast thy foe. Now thy vengeance then fulfil!"

7.

With that up spake the Christian king : "O Alboazar, deal by me As I would surely deal with thee, If I were you, and you were me ! Like a friend you guested me many a day; Like a foe I stole your sister away : The sin was great, and I felt its weight, All joy by day the thought oppress'd, And all night long it troubled my rest; Till I could not bear the burden of care, But told my Confessor in despair. And he, my sinful soul to save, This penance for atonement gave; That I before you should appear, And yield myself your prisoner here, If my repentance was sincere, That I might by a public death Breathe shamefully out my latest breath.

"King Alboazar, this I would do, If you were I, and I were you; That no one should say you were meanly fed, I would give you a roasted capon first, And a good ring loaf of wheaten bread, And a skinful of wine to quench your thirst; And after that I would grant you the thing Which you eame to me petitioning. Now this, O King, is what I crave, That I my sinful soul may save : Let me be led to your bull-ring, And call your sons and daughters all, And assemble the people, both great and small, And let me be set upon a stone, That by all the multitude I may be known, And bid me then this horn to blow, And I will blow a blast so strong, And wind the horn so loud and long, That the breath in my body at last shall be gone, And I shall drop dead in sight of the throng. Thus your revenge, O King, will be brave, Granting the boon which I come to erave, And the people a holyday sight will have, And I my precious soul shall save; For this is the penance my Confessor gave, King Alboazar, this I would do, If you were I, and I were you."

9.

"This man repents his sin, be sure !" To Queen Aldonza said the Moor; "He hath stolen my sister away from me; I have taken from him his wife; Shame then would it be, when he comes to me, And I his true repentance see, If I for vengeance should take his life."

10.

"O Alboazar!" then quoth she, "Weak of heart as weak can be!

Full of revenge and wiles is he. Look at those eyes beneath that brow ; I know Ramiro better than thou ! Kill him, for thou hast him now ; He must die, be sure, or thou. Hast thou not heard the history How, to the throne that he might rise, He pluck'd out his brother Ordoño's eyes? And dost not remember his prowess in fight. How often he met thee and put thee to flight, And plunder'd thy country for many a day? And how many Moors he has slain in the strife, And how many more carried captives away? How he came to show friendship - and thou dids: believe him? How he ravish'd thy sister - and wouldst thou forgive him? And hast thou forgotten that I am his wife, And that now by thy side I lie like a bride, The worst shame that can ever a Christian betide? And cruel it were, when you see his despair, If vainly you thought in compassion to spare, And refused him the boon he comes hither to crave,

For no other way his poor soul can he save, Than by doing the penance his Confessor gave."

As Queen Aldonza thus replies, The Moor upon her fixed his eyes, And he said in his heart, Unhappy is he Who putteth his trust in a woman ! Thou art King Ramiro's wedded wife, And thus wouldst thou take away his life ! What cause have I to confide in thee ? I will put this woman away from me. These were the thoughts that pass'd in his breast But he call'd to mind Ramiro's might; And he fear'd to meet him hereafter in fight, And he granted the King's request.

12.

So he gave him a roasted capon first, And a skinful of wine to quench his thirst; And he called for his sons and daughters all, And assembled the people, both great and small

And to the bull-ring he led the king; And he set him there upon a stone, That by all the multitude he might be known; And he hade him blow through his horn a blast, As long as his breath and his life should last.

Oh, then his horn Ramiro wound : The walls rebound the pealing sound, That far and wide rings echoing round ; Louder and louder Ramiro blows, And farther the blast and farther goes ; Till it reaches the galleys where they lie close Under the alders, by St. Joam da Foz. It roused his knights from their repose, And they and their merry men arose. Away to Gaya they speed them straight; Like a torrent they burst through the city gate; And they rush among the Moorish throng, And slaughter their infidel foes. Then his good sword Ramiro drew, Upon the Moorish King he flew, And he gave him one blow, for there needed not two; They killed his sons and his daughters too; Every Moorish soul they slew; Not one escaped of the infidel crew;

14.

15.

They carried the wicked Queen aboard, And they took counsel what to do to her; They tied a millstone round her neck, And overboard in the sea they threw her. But a heavier weight than that millstone lay On Ramiro's soul at his dying day.

INCHCAPE ROCK.

An old writer mentions a curious tradition which may be worth quoting. "By east the Isle of May," says ho, "t wolve miles from all land in the German seas, lyes a great hidden rock, called Incheape, very dangerous for navigators, because it is overflowed everie tide. It is reported, in old times, upon the saide rock there was a bell, fixed upon a tree or timber, which rang continually, being moved by the sea, giving notice to the saylers of the danger. This bell or clocke was put there and maintained by the Abbot of Aberbrothok, and being taken down by a sea pirate, a yeare thereafter he perished upon the same rocke, with ship and goodes, in the rightcons judgement of Gol."—Stocoaro's Remarks on Scotland.

No stir in the air, no stir in the sea, The ship was still as she could be; Her sails from heaven received no motion; Her keel was steady in the occan.

Without either sign or sound of their shock, The waves flow'd over the Inchcape Rock; So little they rose, so little they fell, They did not move the Inchcape Bell.

The Abbot of Aberbrothok

Had placed that Bell on the Inchcape Rock; On a buoy in the storm it floated and swung, And over the waves its warning rung.

When the Rock was hid by the surge's swell, The mariners heard the warning Bell; And then they knew the perilous Rock, And blest the Abbot of Aberbrothok.

The Sun in heaven was shining gay; All things were joyful on that day; The sea-birds scream'd as they wheel'd round, And there was joyance in their sound.

The buoy of the Inchcape Bell was seen A darker speck on the ocean green; Sir Ralph the Rover walk'd his deck, And he fix'd his eye on the darker speck.

He felt the cheering power of spring; It made him whistle, it made him sing; His heart was mirthful to excess, But the Rover's mirth was wickedness.

His eye was on the Inchcape float; Quoth he, "My men, put out the boat, And row me to the Inchcape Rock, And I'll plague the Abbot of Aberbrothok."

The boat is lower'd, the boatmen row, And to the Inchcape Rock they go; Sir Ralph bent over from the boat, And he cut the Bell from the Inchcape float.

Down sunk the Bell with a gurgling sound; The bubbles rose and burst around; Quoth Sir Ralph, "The next who comes to the Rock Won't bless the Abbot of Aberbrothok."

Sir Ralph the Rover sail'd away; He scour'd the seas for many a day; And now, grown rich with plunder'd store, He steers his course for Scotland's shore.

So thick a haze o'erspreads the sky, They cannot see the Sun on high; The wind hath blown a gale all day; At evening it hath died away.

On the deck the Rover takes his stand; So dark it is they see no land. Quoth Sır Ralph, "It will be lighter soon, For there is the dawn of the rising Moon."

"Canst hear," said one, "the breakers roar? For methinks we should be near the shore." "Now where we are I cannot tell, But I wish I could hear the Inchcape Bell."

They hear no sound; the swell is strong; Though the wind hath fallen, they drift along, Till the vessel strikes with a shivering shock, --"Oh Christ! it is the Inchcape Rock!"

Sir Ralph the Rover tore his hair; He curs'd himself in his despair; The waves rush in on every side; The ship is sinking beneath the tide.

But, even in his dying fear, One dreadful sound could the Rover hear — A sound as if, with the Inchcape Bell, The Devil below was ringing his knell.

WELL OF ST. KEYNE.

"I know not whether it he worth the reporting, that there is in Cornwall, near the parish of St. Neots, a Well, arched over with the robes of four kinds of trees, withy, oak, elm, and ash, dedicated to St. Keyne. The reported virtue of the water is this, that whether husband or wife come first to drink thereof, they get the mastery therehy." - FULLER.

- This passage in one of the folios of the Worthy old Fuller, who, as be says, knew not whether it were worth the reporting, suggested the following Ballad; and the Ballad has produced so many imitations, that it may be prudent here thus to assert ite originality, lost I should be accused horeafter of having committed the plagiarism which has been practised upon it.
- "Next," says Carew, in his Survey of Cornwall, p. 150, "I will relate you another of the Cornish natural wonders, viz. St. Kayne's Well; but lest you make a wonder first at the Saint, before you take notice of the Well, you must understand, that this was not Kayne the manqueller, but one of a gentler spirit and milder sex, to wit, a woman. He who caused the spring to be pictured, added this rhyme for an exposition : --

- festival used to be celebrated in Brecknockshire, on October 8, there is a brief account in the English Martyrologe. Father Cressy, the Benedictine, gives her history more fully. "Illustrious," says he, "she was for her birth, being the daughter of Breganus, prince of that province in Wales, which, from him, was afterwards called Brecknockshire; but more illustrious for her zeal to preserve her chastity, for which reason she was called in the British language Keynevayre, that is, Keyna the Virgin."
- 2. This Prince Braganus, or Brachanns, the father of St. Keyna, is * said to have had twelve sons and twelve daughters by his lady, called Marcella, daughter of Theodoric son of Tethphalt, Prince of Garthmatrin, the same region called afterward Brecknock. Their first-born son was St. Canoc: and their eldest daughter was Gladus, who was mother of Cadocus by St. Gunley, a holy king of the southern Britons. The second daughter was Melaria, the mother of the holy Archbishop St. David. Thus writes Capgrave, neither dother of their children besides St. Keyna.
- 3. But in Giraldus Cambrensis † another daughter is commemorated, called St. Almedha. And David Powel ‡ makes mention of a fifth named Tydvaël, who was the wife of Congen the son of Cadel, Prince of Powisland; and mother of Brochmael, surnamed Scithroc, who slew Ethelfred King of the Northumbers.
- 4. Concerning the Holy Virgin St. Keyna, we find this narration in the outhor of her life, extant in Capgrave ; § "She was of royal blood, being daughter of Braganus, Prince of Brecknockshire. When she came to ripe years many noble persons sought her in marriage; but she utterly refosed that state, having consecrated her virginity to our Lord hy a perpetual vow. For which cause she was afterward hy the Britons called Keyn-wiri, that is, Keyna the Virgin."
- 5. At length she determined to forsake her country and find

‡ D. Povvel in Annotat. ad Girald. § Capgrav. in S. Keyna. out some desart place, where she might attend to contemplation. Therefore, directing her journey beyond Severn, and there meeting with certain woody places, she made her request to the prince of that country that she might be permitted to serve God in that solitude. His answer was, that he was very willing to grant her request, hut that that place did so swarm with serpents that neither men nor beasts could inhabit it. But she constantly replied, that her firm trust was in the name end assistance of Almighty God, to drive all that poisonous brood out of that region.

- 6. Hereupon the place was granted to the Holy Virgin; who presently prostrating herself in forvent prayer to Gol, obtained of him to change all the serpents and vipers there into stones. And to this day the stones in that region do resemble the windings of serpents through all the fields and villages, as if they had been framed so by the hand of the engraver.
- 7. Our learned Camden, in his diligent search after antiquities, seems to have visited this country, being a part of Somersetshire, though he is willing to disparage the miracle. His words are, "On the western bank of Avon is seen the town of Cainsham. Some are of opinion that it was named so from Keyna, a most holy British Virgin, who, according to the credulous persuasion of former ages, is believed to have tunned serpents into stones; because such like miracles of sporting nature are there sometimes found in the quarries. I myself saw a stone brought from theac representing a serpent rolled up into a spire; the head of it stuck out in the outward surface, and the end of the tail terminated in the centre."
- 8. But let us prosecute the life of this holy Virgin. Many years being spent by her in this solitary place, and the fame of her sanctity every where divulged, and many ornories built by her, her nephew St. Cadoe performing a pil-grimage to the Mount of St. Michael, met thero with his blessed annt, St. Keyna, at whose sight he was replenished with great joy. And being desirous to bring her hack to her own country, the inhabitants of that region would not permit him. But afterward, by the admoniton of an angel, the holy Maid returned to the place of her nativity, whree, on the top of a hillock seated at the foot of a high montain, she made a little hubitation for herself; and by her prayers to God obtained a spring there to flow out of the earth, which, by the merits of the Holy Virgin, afforded health to divers infimities.
- 9. But when the time of her consummation approached, one night she, hy the revelation of the Holy Ghost, saw in a vision, as it were, a fiery pillar, the base whereof was fixed on her bed; now her hed was the pavement strewed over with a few hranches of trees. And in this vision two angels appeared to her; one of which approaching respectfully to her, seemed to take off the sackfolth with which she was covered, and instead thereof to put on her a smock of fine linea, and over that a tunic of purple, and last of all a mantle all woven with gold. Which having done, he thus said to her; "Prepare yourself to come with ns, that we may lead you into your heavenly Father's kingdom." Hereupon she wept with excess of joy, and endeavoring to follow the angels she awaked, and found her body infimed with a fever, so that she perceived her end was near.
- 10. Therefore, sending for her nephew Cadocus, she said to him, "This is the place above all others beloved by me; here my memory shall be perpetuated. This place I will often visit in spirit if it may be permitted me. And I am assured it shall he permitted me, because our Lord has granted me this place as a certain inheritance. The time will come when this place as a certain inheritance. The time will come when this place shall be inhubited by a sinful people, which notwithstanding I will violently root out of this sent. My tomb shall be a long while anknown, till the coming of other people, whom, hy my prayers, I shall bring hither; them will I protect and defend; and in this place shall the name of our Lord he blessed for ever."
- II. After this, her soul being ready to depart out of her body, she saw standing hefore her a troop of heavenly angels, ready, joyfully, to receive her soul, and to transport it without any fear or danger from her spiritual enemies. Which, having told to those who stood by, her blessed soul wes freed from the prisco of her body, on the eighth day before the Ides of Octoher. In her dissolution, her face suiled, and was all of a rosy color; and so sweat a fragrancy proceeded from her sacred virgin body, that those who were present thought themselves in the joy of Paradise. St. Cadocuse hurid her in her own uratory, where for many years she had led a most holy, mortified life, very acceptable to God. Church History of Brittany, Book X., Ch. 14.

- Such is the history of St. Keyne, as related by F. Serenus Cressy, permissu superiorum, et approbatione Dactorum. There was evidently a scheme of setting up a shrine connected with the logend. In one part it was well conceived, for the Cornu Ammonis is no where so frequently found as near Keynsham; fine specimens are to be seen over the doors of many of the houses there, and I have often observed fragments among the stones which were broken up to mend the road. The Welsh seem nearly to have forgotten this saint. Mr. Owen, in his Cambrian Biography, enumerates two daughters of Brychan, Ceindrech, and Ceinwen, both ranked among saints, and the latter having two churches dedicated to her in Mona. One of these is probably St. Keyne.
- A WELL there is in the west country, And a clearer one never was seen; There is not a wife in the west country
- But has heard of the Well of St. Keyne.
- An oak and an elm-tree stand beside, And behind doth an ash-tree grow, And a willow from the bank above Droops to the water below.
- A traveller came to the Well of St. Keyne;
- Joyfully he drew nigh,
- For from cock-crow he had been travelling, And there was not a cloud in the sky.
- He drank of the water so eool and clear, For thirsty and hot was he; And he sat down upon the bank Under the willow-tree.
- There came a man from the house hard by, At the Well to fill his pail; On the Well-side he rested it,
- And he bade the Stranger hail.
- "Now art thou a bachelor, Stranger?" quoth he; "For an if thou hast a wife, The happiest draught thou hast drank this day
- That ever thou didst in thy life.
- " Or has thy good woman, if one thou hast, Ever here in Cornwall been?
- For an if she have, I'll venture my life, She has drank of the Well of St. Keyne."
- "I have left a good woman who never was here," The Stranger he made reply;
- "But that my draught should be the better for that, I pray you answer me why."
- "St. Keyne," quoth the Cornish-man, "many a Drank of this crystal Well; [time And before the Angel summon'd her, She laid on the water a spell.
- "If the Husband of this gifted Well Shall drink before his Wife,

- A happy man thenceforth is he, For he shall be Master for life.
- "But if the Wife should drink of it first, God help the Husband then !"
- The Stranger stoop'd to the Well of St. Keyne, And drank of the water again.
- "You drank of the Well, I warrant, betimes?" He to the Cornish-man said:
- But the Cornish-man smiled as the Stranger spake, And sheepishly shook his head.
- "I hasten'd as soon as the wedding was done, And left my Wife in the porch;
- But i' faith she had been wiser than me, For she took a bottle to church."

BISHOP BRUNO.

⁶⁴ Bruno, the Bishop of Herbipolitanum, sailing in the river of Danubius, with Heury the Third, then Emperor, being not far from a place which the Germanes call Ben Strudel, or the devouring gulfe, which is near outo Grinon, a castle in Austria, a spirit was heard clamoring aloud, ⁶ Ho, ho, Bishop Bruno, whither art thou travelling? but dispose of thyselfe how thou pleasest, thoushalt be my prey and spoil.⁷ At the hearing of these words they were all stupified, and the Bishop with the rest crossed and blessed themselves. The issue was, that within a short time nfier, the Bishop, feasting with the Emperor in a castle belonging to the countesse of Esburch, a rafter fell from the roof of the chamber wherein they sate, and strooke him dead at the table.⁷¹ — Hxwword's Hierarchie of the Blessed Angels.

BISHOP BRUNO awoke in the dead midnight, And he heard his heart beat loud with affright He dreamt he had rung the palace bell, And the sound it gave was his passing knell

Bishop Bruno smiled at his fears so vain; He turned to sleep, and he dreamt again; He rang at the palace gate once more, And Death was the Porter that open'd the door.

He started up at the fearful dream, [scream; And he heard at his window the screech-ow] Bishop Bruno slept no more that night, ---Oh ! glad was he when he saw the day-light !

Now he goes forth in proud array, For he with the Emperor dines to-day; There was not a Baron in Germany That went with a nobler train than he.

Before and behind his soldiers ride : The people throng'd to see their pride, They bow'd the head, and the knee they hent, But nobody bless'd him as he went.

So he went on stately and proud, When he heard a voice that cried aloud,

"Ho! ho! Bishop Bruno! you travel with glee; But I would have you know, you travel to me!"

Behind, and before, and on either side, He look'd, but nobody he espied; And the Bishop at that grew cold with fear, For he heard the words distinct and clear.

And when he rang at the palace bell, He almost expected to hear his knell; And when the Porter turn'd the key, He almost expected Death to see.

But soon the Bishop recover'd his glee, For the Emperor welcomed him royally; And now the tables were spread, and there Were choicest wines and dainty fare.

And now the Bishop had bless'd the meat, When a voice was heard as he sat in his seat, — "With the Emperor now you are dining with glee, But know, Bishop Bruno, you sup with me!"

The Bishop then grew pale with affright, And suddenly lost his appetite; All the wine and dainty cheer Could not comfort his heart, that was sick with fear.

But by little and little recovered he, For the wine went flowing merrily, Till at length he forgot his former dread, And his cheeks again grew rosy rcd.

When he sat down to the royal fare, Bishop Bruno was the saddest man there; But when the masquers enter'd the hall, He was the merriest man of all.

Then from amid the masquers' crowd There went a voice hollow and loud, — "You have past the day, Bishop Bruno, in glee; But you must pass the night with me!"

His cheek grows pale, and his eyeballs glare, And stiff round his tonsure bristled his hair; With that there came one from the masquers' hand, And took the Bishop by the hand.

The bony hand suspended his breath; His marrow grew cold at the touch of Death; On saints in vain he attempted to call; Bishop Bruno fell dead in the palace hall.

A TRUE BALLAD

ΟF

ST. ANTIDIUS, THE POPE, AND THE DEVIL.

Deste Atendio cuentan las estorias que le avino, que el martes despues de Ramos, passo por la puente de un rio que ha nombre Divino ; e vio en un campo gran compaña de diablos que estavan contando a sus principes los males que fuzien por las tierras ; e entre todos los otros estava un negro a manera de Etyopiano: e alabavase que avic siete años que andava lídiando con el Papa por le fazer pecar; e nunca pudiera sy non entonces que le fiziera fazer ya que pecado muy grave; e esto provava lo por la sandalia del apostoligo que traye. E Sant Atendio que vido aquello, llamo aquel diablo, e conjurol por la virtud de Dus e por la Santa Cruz que lo llevasse a Roma; e cavalgo en el; e llevol a Roma, el jueves de la cena a hora de missa, el Papa que querie revestirse para dezir missa; dero sant Atendio al diablo a la puerta e durol que lo atendiese ; e el entro dentro e saco el Papa aparte, e dicol que fiziesse penitencia de aquel pecado; e el quiso lo negar, mas fizo gelo otorgar el santo obispo con a sandalia que le dio E fizo el Papa penitencia; e dizo sant Atendio la missa en su logar, c consagro la crisma; e tomo una partida della para sy; e despediosse del Papa, e salio fuera, e cavalgo en el diablo, e llevo lo a su arçobispado el sabado de pascua a hora de missa. - Cono-NICA DE ESPANA.

This Saint Ateadio, according to the Chronica General, was Bishop of Vesytana in Gaul, and martyred by the Vandals in the year 411. The Spaniards have a tradition that he was Bishop of Jaen : they say, " that as the Devil was crossing the sea with this unwelcome load upon his back, he artfully endeavored to make Atendio pronounce the name of Jesus, which, as it breaks all spells, would have enabled him to throw him off into the water ; but that the Bishop, understanding his intent, only replied, Arre Diablo, "Geeup Devil!" and they add, " that when he arrived at Rome, his hat was still covered with the snow which had fallen upon it while he was passing the Alps, and that the hat is still shown at Rome in confirmation of the story and the miracle." Feyjuo has two letters upon this whimsical legend among his Cartas Eruditas. In the first (T. 1, Carta 24.) he replies to a correspondent who had gravely inquired his opinion upon the story, "De buen humar," says he, " estaba V. md. quando le ocurriò inquirir mi dictamen, sobre la Historicta de el Obispo de Jahen, de quien se cuenta, que fue a Roma en una noche, caballero sobre la espalda de un Diablo de alquiler : Triste de mi, si essa curivsidad se hace contagiosa, y dan muchos en sequir el exemplo de V. md. consultandome sobre cuentos de ninos y viejas." Nevertheless, though he thus treats the story as an old wife's tale, he bestows some reasoning upon it. " As he heard it," he says, " it did not appear whether the use which the Bishop made of the Devil were licit or illicit; that is, whether he made usa of him ua a wizard, by virtue of a compact, or by virtue of authority, having the permission of the Most High so to do. In either case there is a great incongruity. In the first, iansmuch as it is not credible that the Devil should voluntarily serve the Bishop for the purpose of preventing a great evil to the church : - I say voluntarily, because the notion that a com-pact is so hinding upon the Devil that he can in no ways resist the pleasure of the person with whom he has contracted es cosa de Theologos de Vade d la cinta. In tha second, because the journey being designed for a holy purpose, it is more conformable to reason that it should have heen executed by the ministry of a good angel than of a bad one; as, for instance, Habakkuk was transported by the ministry of a good angel from Judea to Babylon, that he might carry food to the imprisoned Daniel. If you should oppose to me the example of Christ, who was carried by the Devil to the pinnacle of the temple, 1 reply, that there are two manifest disparities. The first, that Christ conducted himself in this case passively and permissively ; the second, that the Devil placed him upon the pinnacle of the Temple, not for any good end, but with a most wicked intention. "But," pursues the good Benedictine, "why should I fatigue myself with arguing? I hold the story unworthy of being critically examined till it be shown me written in some history, either ecclesiastical or profane, which is en-titled to some credit."

Soon efter this letter was published, another correspondent in formed Feyjoo, that the story in question was written in the General Chronicle of King D. Alphonso the Wise. This incited him to farther inquiry. He found the same legend in the Speculum Historiale of Vincentius Belovacensis, and there discovered that the saint was called Antidius, not Athendius, and that the scene lay upon the river Dunius instead of the river Divinus. Here too he found a reference to Sigebertus Gemblacensis; and in that author, the account which the Chronicler had followed and the explanation of his errors in the topography : his Vesytania proving to be Besançon, and the river the Doubs, which the Romans called Dubius, Dubis, and Aduadubis. But he found also to his comfort, that though Jean Jacques Chiflet, a physician of Besançon, had endeavored to prove the truth of the story for the honor of his nation or city, in a book entitled Vesontio Civitas Imperialis Libera Sequanorum, and had cited certain ancient Acts and Brevieries, in support of it, the veracious Bollandists had decided that these Acts were apocryphal, the Breviaries not to be believed in this point, and the whole story a fable which had been equally related of St. Maximus Taurinensis and Pope Leo the Great. These Bollandists strain at a guat, and swallow an Aullay with equal gravity. Fortified by their authority, Feyjoo, who was worthy to have belonged to a more enlightened church, triumphantly dismissed the legend, and observed, "that the contriver was a clumsy fabler to make the Devil spend two days upon the journey, which," as he says, "is slow travelling for an infernal postilion." (Carus Eruditas, T. 2, C. 21.) The discussion, however, reminded him of a curious story, which he thus relates ; - " There is in this city of Oviedo a poor Porter, called by name Pedro Moreno, of whom a tale is told similar in substance to this of the Bishop of Jaca. The circumstance is related in this manner. Some letters had been delivered to him which he was to carry to Madrid with more than ordinary diligence, because expedition was of importance. At a little distance from this city, he met with a friar, who offered to join company with him for the journey : to this he objected, upon the ground, that he was going in great baste, and that the friar would not be able to keep pace with him ; but in fine, the friar prevailed upon him to let it be so, and at the same time gave him a walking-stick for his use. So they began to travel together, and that so well, that Valladolid being forty leagues (160 miles) from Oviedo, they got beyond that city on the first day to dinner. The rest of the journey was performed with the same celerity. This story spread through the whole place, and was helieved by all the vulgar (and hy some also who were not of the vulgar) when it came to my ears: the authority referred to was the man himself, who had related it to an infinite number of persons. I sent for him to my cell to examine him. He affirmed that the story was true, but by questioning and cross-questioning him concerning the particulars, I made him fall into many contradictions. Moreover, I found that he had told the story with many variations to different persons. What I clearly ascertained was, that he had heard the legend of the Bishop of Jaen, and thought to become a famous man, by making a like fable believed of himself. I believe that many persons were undeceived when my inquiry was known. But before this examination was made, to how many places had the report of this miraculous journey extended, where the exposure of the falsehood will never reach ! Perhaps, if this writing should not prevent it, the journey of Pedro Moreno, the Porter, will one day be little less famous in Spain than that of the Bishop of Jaen."-Cartas Eruditas, T. 1, C. 24.

According to Marullus, as quoted by Zuinger in his great Theatrum Humana Vite, i. 417, Antidius was Bishop of Tours, and Zosimus was the Pope whom he served so essentially by riding post to his aid.

A very incorrect copy of this Ballad was printed and sold by J. Bailey, 116 Chancery Lane, price 6d., with a print from a juvenile design by G. Cruickshank. I think myself fortunate in having accidentally obtained this broadside, which, for its rarity, will one day he deemed valuable in a collection of the works of a truly original and inimitable artist.

> It is Antidins the Bishop Who now at even tide, Taking the air and saying a prayer, Walks by the river side.

The Devil had business that evening, And he upon earth would go; For it was in the month of August, And the weather was close below.

He had his books to settle; And up to earth he hied, To do it there in the evening air, All by the river side.

His imps came flying around him, Of his affairs to tell; From the north, and the south, and the east, and the west, They brought him the news that he liked best, Of things they had done, And the souls they had won, And how they sped well In the service of Hell.

There came a devil posting in, Return'd from his employ; Seven years had he been gone from Hell; And now he came grinning for joy.

"Seven years," quoth he, " of trouble and toil Have I labor'd the Pope to win; And I to-day have caught him; He hath done a deadly sin!" And then he took the Devil's book, And wrote the deed therein. Oh, then King Beelzebub, for joy, He drew his mouth so wide You might have seen his iron teeth, Four and forty from side to side.

He wagg'd his ears, he twisted his tail, He knew not for joy what to do; In his hoofs and his horns, in his heels and his corns,

It tickled him all through.

The Bishop, who beheld all this, Straight how to act bethought him; He leap'd upon the Devil's back, And by the horns he caught him.

And he said a Pater-noster As fast as he could say, And made a cross on the Devil's head, And bade him to Rome away.

Away, away, the Devil flew All through the clear moonlight; I warrant who saw them on their way He did not sleep that night.

Without bridle, or saddle, or whip, or spur, Away they go like the wind; The beads of the Bishop are hanging before, And the tail of the Devil behind.

They met a Witch, and she hail'd them, As soon as she came within call; "Ave Maria!" the Bishop exclaim'd; It frightened her broomstick, and she got a fall.

He ran against a shooting star, So fast for fear did he sail, And he singed the beard of the Bishop Against a comet's tail; And he pass'd between the horns of the moon, With Antidius on his back; And there was an eclipse that night Which was not in the almanac.

> The Bishop, just as they set out, To tell his beads begun; And he was by the bed of the Pope Before the string was done.

The Pope fell down upon his knees, In terror and confusion, And he confess'd the deadly sin, And he had absolution.

And all the Popes in bliss that be, Sung, O be joyful! then; And all the Popes in bale that be, They howl'd for envy then; For they before kept jubilee, Expecting his good company, Down in the Devil's den.

But what was this the Pope had done To bind his soul to Hell? Ah! that is the mystery of this wonderful history, And I wish that I could tell!

But would you know, there you must go; You can easily find the way; It is a broad and a well-known road, That is travell'd by night and by day.

And you must look in the Devil's book; You will find one debt that was never paid yet, If you search the leaves throughout; And that is the mystery of this wonderful history, And the way to find it ont.

GONZALO HERMIGUEZ.

This story is related at length by Bernardo de Brito, in his Cronica de Cister., l. vi. c. l. where he has preserved, also, part of a poem by;Gonzalo Hermiguez. The verses are said to be the oldest in the Portuguese language; and Brito says there were more of them, but he thought it sufficient to cite these for his purpose. If they had been correctly printed, it might have been difficult to make out their meaning ; but from a text so corrupted, it is impossible.

IN arms and in anger, in struggle and strife, Gonzalo Hermiguez won his wife; He slew the Moor who from the fray Was rescuing Fatima that day; In vain she shriek'd: Gonzalo press'd The Moorish prisoner to his breast: That breast in iron was array'd; The gauntlet was bloody that grasp'd the Maid; Through the beaver-sight his eye Glared fierce, and red, and wrathfully; And while he bore the captive away, His heart rejoiced, and he blest the day.

Under the lemon walk's odorons shade Gonzalo Hermiguez wooed the Maid; The ringlets of his raven hair Waved upon the evening air, And gentle thoughts, that raise a sigh, Soften'd the warrior's dark-brown eye, When he with passion and sweet song Wooed her to forgive the wrong. Till she no more could say him nay; And the Moorish Maiden blest the day When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

3.

To the holy Church, with pomp and pride, Gonzalo Herniguez led his bride. In the sacred font that happy day Her stain of sin was wash'd away; There did the Moorish Maiden claim Another faith, another name; There, as a Christian convert, plight Her faith unto the Christian Knight; And Oriana blest the day When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

4.

Of Affonso Henriques' court the pride Were Gonzalo Hermiguez and his bride; In battle strongest of the strong, In peace the master of the song, Gonzalo of all was first in fame, The loveliest she and the happiest dame. But ready for her heavenly birth, She was not left to fade on earth; In that dread hour, with Heaven in view, The comfort of her faith she knew, And blest on her death-bed the day When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

Through a long and holy life. Gonzalo Hermiguez mourn'd his wife. The arms wherewith he won his bride, Sword, shield, and lance, were laid aside. That head which the high-plumed helm had worn Was now of its tresses shaven and shorn, A Monk of Alcobaça he Eminent for sanctity. Contented in his humble cell The meekest of the meek to dwell, His business was, by night and day, For Oriana's soul to pray. Never day did he let pass But scored to her account a mass; Devoutly for the dear one dead With self-inflicted stripes he bled; This was Gonzalo's sole employ, This was Gonzalo's only joy; Till love, thus purified, became A holy, yea, a heavenly flame; And now in heaven doth bless the day When he bore the Moorish captive away.

QUEEN ORRACA

AND

THE FIVE MARTYRS OF MOROCCO.

This legend is related in the Chronicle of Affanso II., and i the Historia Serafica of Fr. Manoel da Esperança.

The Friars five have girt their loins, And taken staff in hand; And never shall those Friars again Hear mass in Christian land.

They went to Queen Orraca, To thank her and bless her then;

QUEEN ORRACA AND THE FIVE MARTYRS.

And Queen Orraca in tears Knelt to the holy men.

"Three things, Queen Orraca, We prophesy to you: Hear us, in the name of God! For time will prove them true

"In Morocco we must martyr'd be; Christ hath vouchsafed it thus: We shall shed our blood for Him Who shed his blood for us.

"To Coimbra shall our bodies be brought, Such being the will divine;

That Christians may behold and feel Blessings at our shrine.

"And when unto that place of rest Our bodies shall draw nigh, Who sees us first, the King or you, That one that night must die.

"Fare thee well, Queen Orraca! For thy soul a mass we will say, Every day as long as we live, And on thy dying day."

The Friars they blest her, one by one, Where she knelt on her knee; And they departed to the land Of the Moors beyond the sea.

"What news, O King Affonso, What news of the Friars five? Have they preach'd to the Miramamolin, And are they still alive?"

"They have fought the fight, O Queen' They have run the race; In robes of white they hold the palm Before the throne of Grace.

"All naked in the sun and air Their mangled bodies lie; What Christian dared to bury them, By the bloody Moors would die."

"What news, O King Affonso, Of the Martyrs five what news? Doth the bloody Miramamolin Their burial still refuse?"

"That on a dunghill they should rot, The bloody Moor decreed; This: their dishonor'd bodies should The dogs and vultures feed; —

"But the thunder of God roll'd over them, And the lightning of God flash'd round; Nor thing impure, nor man impure, Could approach the holy ground. "A thousand miracles appall'd The cruel Pagan's mind; Our brother Pedro brings them here, In Coimbra to be shrined."

Every altar in Coimbra Is dress'd for the festival day; All the people in Coimbra Are dight in their richest array;—

Every bell in Coimbra Doth merrily, merrily ring; The Clergy and the Knights await To go forth with the Queen and the King

"Come forth, come forth, Queen Orraca; We make the procession stay."

" I beseech thee, King Affonso, Go you alone to-day.

"I have pain in my head this morning; I am ill at heart also:

Go without me, King Affonso, For I am too faint to go."

"The relics of the Martyrs five All maladies can cure; They will requite the charity You show'd them once, be sure:

"Come forth then, Queen Orraca; You make the procession stay:

It were a scandal and a sin To abide at home to-day."

Upon her palfrey she is set, And forward then they go; And over the long bridge they pass, And up the long hill wind slow.

"Prick forward, King Affonso, And do not wait for me; To meet them close by Coimbra, It were discourtesy;—

"A little while I needs must wait, Till this sore pain be gone;— I will proceed the best I can;

But do you and your Knights prick on.

The King and his Knights prick'd up the hill Faster than before;

The King and his Knights have topp'd the hill, And now they are seen no more.

As the King and his Knights went down the hill, A wild boar cross'd the way;

"Follow him! follow him!" eried the King; "We have time by the Queen's delay."

A-hunting of the boar astray Is King Affonso gone : Slowly, slowly, but straight the while, Queen Orraca is coming on.

THE OLD WOMAN OF BERKELEY.

And winding now the train appears Between the olive-trees : Queen Orraca alighted then, And fell upon her knees.

The Friars of Alanquer came first, And next the relics past; — Queen Orraca look'd to see The King and his Knights come last.

She heard the horses tramp behind; At that she turn'd her face : King Affonso and his Knights came up

All panting from the chase.

"Have pity upon my poor soul, Holy Martyrs five !" cried she :

"Holy Mary, Mother of God, Virgin, pray for me!"

5.

That day in Coimbra Many a heart was gay; But the heaviest heart in Coimbra Was that poor Queen's that day.

The festival is over, The sun hath sunk in the west; All the people in Coimbra Have betaken themselves to rest.

Queen Orraca's Father Confessor At midnight is awake, Kneeling at the Martyrs' shrine, And praying for her sake.

Just at the midnight hour, when all Was still as still could be, Into the Church of Santa Cruz Came a saintly company.

All in robes of russet gray, Poorly were they dight; Each one girdled with a cord, Like a Friar Minorite.

But from those robes of russet gray, There flow'd a heavenly light; For each one was the blessed soul Of a Friar Minorite.

Brighter than their brethren, Among the beantiful band, Five were there who each did bear A palm-branch in his hand.

He who led the brethren, A living man was he; And yet he shone the brightest Of all the company.

Before the steps of the altar, Each one bow'd his head; And then with solemn voice they sung The Service of the Dead. "And who are ye, ye blessed Saints " The Father Confessor said ;

"And for what happy soul sing ye The Service of the Dead?"

"These are the souls of our brethren in bliss; The Martyrs five are we:

And this is onr father Francisco, Among us bodily.

"We are come hither to perform Our promise to the Queen; Go thou to King Affonso, And say what thou hast seen."

There was loud knocking at the door, As the heavenly vision fled; And the porter called to the Confessor, To tell him the Queen was dead.

OLD WOMAN OF BERKELEY, A BALLAD.

SHOWING HOW AN OLD WOMAN RODE DOUBLE, AND WHO RODE BEFORE HER.

A. D. 852. Circa dies istos, mulier quadam malefica, in villà quæ Berkeleia dicitur degens, gulæ amatrix ac petulantiæ, flagitiis modum usque in senium et auguriis non ponens, usque ad mortem impudica permansit. Hae die quadam cum sederet ad prandium, cornicula quam pro delitiis pascebat, nescio quid garrire capit ; quo audito, mulieris cultellus de manu excidit, simul et facies pallescere capit, et emisso rugitu, hodie, inquit, accipiam grande incommodum, hodieque ad sulcum ultimum meum pervenit aratrum. Quo dieto, nuncius doloris intrarit; muliere vero percunctata ad quid veniret, affero, inquit, tibi filii tui obitum et totus familie ejus ex subità ruinà interitum. Hoc quoque dolore mulier permota, lecto protinus decubuit graviter infirmata; sentiensque morbum subrepere ad vitalia, liberos quos habuit superstites, monachum videliect et monacham, per epistolam invitavit; advenientes autem voce singultiente alloquitur. Ego, inquit, o pueri, meo miserabili fato damoniacis semper artibus inservivi; ego omnium vitiorum sentina, ego illecebrarum omnium fui magistra. Erat tamen mihi inter hæc mala spes vestræ religionis, quæ meam solidaret animam desperatam; vos expectubam propugnatores contra dæmones, tutores contra savissimos hostes. Nunc igitur quoniam ad finem vitæ perveni, rogo vos per materna ubera, ut mea tentatis alleriare tormenta. Insuite me defunctam in corio cervino, ac deinde in sarcophago lapideo supponite, operculumque ferro et plumbo constringite, ac demum lapidem tribus cathenis ferreis et fortissimis circundantes, elericos quinquaginta psalmorum cantores, et tot per tres dies presbyteros missarum celebratores applicate, qui feroces lenigent adversariorum incursus. Ita si tribus noctibus secura jacuero, quartà die me infodite humo.

Factunque est ut præceperat illis. Sed, proh dolor ! nil preces, nil lacryma, nil demum naluere calhene. Primis enim duabus noetibus, cum chori psallentium corpori assistebant, advenientes Demones ostium cetlesiæ confregerunt ingenti obiee clausum, extremasque calhenas negotio levi dirumpuat ; medua autem quæ fortior erat, illibata manebat. Tertià autem noete, circa gallicinium, strepitu hostium adventantum, omne monasterium visum est a fundamento moreri. Unus ergo damonum, et vultu cateris terribilior et staturà eminentor, januas Ecclesia impetu violento concussas in fragmenta dejecit. Devererunt elerici cum laicis, metu steterunt omnium capilli, et psalmorum concentus defecit. Damon ergo gestu ut videbatur arroganti ad sepulekrum accedens, et nomen mulieris modicum ingeminans, surgere imperavit. Qui respondente, quod nequiret pro vinculis, jam malo tuo, inqut, solueris; et protinus cathenam que caterorum ferocium demonum deluserat, celut stuppeum vinculum rumpebut. Operculum etiam sepulekri pede depellens, mulierem palam onnibus ab ecclesià extraxit, ubi pre forirus niger equus super per misera mulier projeta, ab ceulis assistentium evanut. Audiebatur tamen clamores per quaturo fere milieria horribites, auxilium postulantes.

- Ista itaque que retuli incredibilia non erunt, si legatur beati Gregorii dialogue, in quo refert, hominem in ecclesià sepultum, a demondus foras ejectum. Et apud Francos Carolus Murtellus insignis vir fortitudinus, qui Saracenos Galliam ingressos, Hispaniam redire compulit, eractis vitre sue diebus, in Ecclesià beuti Dionysi legitur fuisse sepultus. Scd quia patrimonia, cum decimis omnium fore ecclesiarum Gallie, pro stipendio commilitonum suorum mutilaverat, miserabiliter a malignis spiritilus de sepulehro corporaliter anulsus, usque in hodiernum diem nusquam comparat. – MATTHEW OF WEST-MINSTER.
- This story is also related by Olaus Magnus, and in the Nuremberg Chronicle. But William of Malmesbury acems to have been the original authority, end he had the story from an eye-witness. "When I shall have related it," he says, "the credit of the narrative will not he shaken, though the minds of the hearers should be incredulous, for I have heard it from a man of such character who would succar he had seen it, that I should blush to disbelieve." — Sharpe's WILLIAM of MALMESURY, p. 264.

THE Raven croak'd as she sat at her meal, And the Old Woman knew what he said, And she grew pale at the Raven's tale, And sicken'd, and went to her bed.

"Now fetch me my children, and fetch them with speed,"

The Old Woman of Berkeley said;

- "The Monk my son, and my daughter the Nun, Bid them hasten, or I shall be dead."
- The Monk her son, and her daughter the Nun, Their way to Berkeley went;

And they have brought, with pious thought, The holy sacrament.

The Old Woman shriek'd as they enter'd her door;

And she cried with a voice of despair, "Now take away the sacrament, For its presence 1 cannot bear!"

Her lip it trembled with agony; The sweat ran down her brow; "I have tortures in store for evermore, But spare me, my children, now!"

Away they sent the sacrament ; The fit it left her weak ;

She look'd at her children with ghastly eyes, And faintly struggled to speak.

"All kind of sin I have rioted in, And the judgment now must be ; But I secured my children's souls ; Oh! pray, my children, for me! 60 " I have 'nointed myself with infants' fat; The fiends have been my slaves; From sleeping babes I have suck'd the breath; And, breaking by charms the sleep of death, I have call'd the dead from their graves. "And the Devil will fetch me now in fire, My witchcrafts to atone; And I, who have troubled the dead man's grave, Shall never have rest in my own. " Bless, I entreat, my winding sheet, My children, I beg of you; And with holy water sprinkle my shroud, And sprinkle my coffin too. "And let me be chain'd in my coffin of stone, And fasten it strong, I implore, Vith iron bars, and with three chains Chain it to the church floor. "And bless the chains, and sprinkle them ; And let fifty Priests stand round, Who night and day the mass may say Where I lie on the ground. "And see that fifty Choristers Beside the bier attend me, And day and night, by the tapers' light, With holy hymns defend me. "Let the church bells all, both great and small, Be toll'd by night and day, To drive from thence the fiends who come To bear my body away. "And ever have the church-door barr'd After the even-song; And I beseech you, children dear, Let the bars and bolts be strong. " And let this be three days and nights, My wretched corpse to save; Till the fourth morning keep me safe, And then I may rest in my grave." The Old Woman of Berkeley laid her down, And her eyes grew deadly dim Short came her breath, and the struggle of death Did loosen every limb. They bless'd the old woman's winding sheet With rites and prayers due; With holy water they sprinkled her shroud, And they sprinkled her coffin too. And they chain'd her in her coffin of stone, And with iron barr'd it down. And in the church with three strong chains They chain'd it to the ground. And they bless'd the chains, and sprinkled them And fifty Priests stood round, By night and day the mass to say Where she lay on the ground.

THE OLD WOMAN OF BERKELEY.

And fifty sacred Choristers Beside the bier attend her, Who day and mght, by the tapers' light, Should with holy hymns defend her.

To see the Priests and Choristers It was a goodly sight, Each holding, as it were a staff, A taper burning bright.

And the church bells all, both great and small, Did toll so loud and long; And they have barr'd the church door hard,

After the even-song.

And the first night the tapers' light Burnt steadily and clear; But they without a hideous rout Of angry fiends could hear; ---

A hideous roar at the church door, Like a long thuuder peal; And the Priests they pray'd, and the Choristers sung Louder, in fearful zeal.

Loud toll'd the bell; the priests pray'd well; The tapers they burnt bright;

The Monk her son, and her daughter the Nun, They told their beads all night.

The cock he crew; the Fiends they flew From the voice of the morning away;

Then undisturb'd the Choristers sing, And the fifty Priests they pray;

As they had sung and pray'd all night, They pray'd and sung all day.

The second night the tapers' light Burnt dismally and blue,

And every one saw his neighbor's face Like a dead man's face to view.

And yells and eries without arise, That the stoutest heart might shock,

And a deafening roaring like a cataract pouring Over a mountain rock.

The Monk and Nun they told their beads As fast as they could tell, And aye as louder grew the noise,

The faster went the bell.

Louder and louder the Choristers sung, As they trembled more and more; And the Priests as they pray'd to Heaven for aid, They smote their breasts full sore.

The cock he crew; the Fiends they flew From the voice of the morning away; Then undisturb'd the Choristers sing, And the fifty Priests they pray; As they had sung and pray'd all night, They pray'd and sung all day. The third night came, and the tapers' flame A frightful stench did make; And they burnt as though they had been dipp'd

In the burning brimstone lake.

And the loud commotion, like the rushing of ocean,

Grew momently more and more; And strokes as of a battering-ram Did shake the strong church door.

The bellmen they for very fear Could toll the bell no longer; And still as louder grew the strokes, Their fear it grew the stronger.

The Monk and Nun forgot their beads; They fell on the ground in dismay; There was not a single Saint in heaven To whom they did not pray.

And the Choristers' song, which late was so strong, Falter'd with consternation ; For the church did rock as an earthquake shock

For the church did rock as an earthquake shock Uplifted its foundation.

And a sound was heard like the trumpet's blast That shall one day wake the dead; The strong church door could bear no more, And the bolts and the bars they fled;—

And the tapers' light was extinguish'd quite; ' And the Choristers faintly sung; And the Priests, dismay'd, panted and pray'd, And on all Saints in heaven for aid They call'd with trembling tongue.

And in He came with eyes of flame, The Devil, to fetch the dead; And all the church with his presence glow'd Like a fiery furnace red.

He laid his hand on the iron chains, And like flax they moulder'd asunder, And the coffin lid, which was barr'd so firm, He burst with his voice of thunder.

And he bade the Old Woman of Berkeley rise, And come with her master away;

A cold sweat started on that cold corpse, At the voice she was forced to obey.

She rose on her feet in her winding-sheet; Her dead flesh quiver'd with fear; And a groan like that which the Old Woman gave Never did mortal hear.

She follow'd her Master to the church door; There stood a black horse there; His breath was red like furnace smoke, His eyes like a meteor's glare.

The Devil he flung her on the horse, And he leap'd up before,

THE SURGEON'S WARNING. 47

And she was seen no more.	So pray take care of me.
They saw her no more; but her cries	" I have made candles of dead men's fat;
For four miles round they could hear;	The Sextons have been my slaves;

SURGEON'S WARNING.	My brethren, l entreat, And see the coffin weigh'd, I beg, Lest the plumber should be a cheat.
The subject of this parody was suggested by a friend, to whom also I am indebted for some of the stanzas. Respecting the patent coffins herein mentioned, after the man- ner of Catholic Poets, who confess the actions they attribute to their Saints and Deity to he but fiction, I hereby declare that it is by no means my design to depreciate that useful in- vention; and all persons to whom this Ballad shall come are requested to take notice, that nothing herein asserted concerning the aforesaid coffins is true, except that the maker and patentee lives by St. Martin's Lane.	 "And let it be solder'd closely down, Strong as strong can be, I implore; And put it in a patent coffin, That I may rise no more. "If they carry me off in the patent coffin, Their labor will be in vain; Let the Undertaker see it bought of the maker, Who lives by St. Martin's Lane.
'THE Doctor whisper'd to the Nurse,	"And bury me in my brother's church,
And the Surgeon knew what he said;	For that will safer be;
And he grew pale at the Doctor's tale,	And, I implore, lock the church door,
And trembled in his sick bed.	And pray take care of the key.

By one, by two, by three;	My wretched corpse to save;

First of the company.	Enough to rest in my grave."
The Surgeon swore, as they enter'd his door, —	The Surgeon laid him down in his bed;
'Twas fearful his oaths to hear, —	His eyes grew deadly dim;
"Now send these scoundrels out of my sight,	Short came his breath, and the struggle of death
I beseech ye, my brethren dear!"	Did loosen every limb.
He foam'd at the mouth with the rage he felt,	They put him in lead when he was dead,
And he wrinkled his black eyebrow :	And, with precaution meet,
"That rascal Joe would be at me, I know,	First they the leaden coffin weigh,
But, zounds, let him spare me now!"	Lest the plumber should be a cheat.
Then out they sent the Prentices;	They had it solder'd closely down,
The fit it left him weak;	And examin'd it o'er and o'er;
Ile look'd at his brothers with ghastly eyes,	And they put it in a patent coffin,

THE SURGEON'S WARNING .- HENRY THE HERMIT. 476 And they could not stand the sound in his hand, So the Undertaker saw it bought of the maker, Who lives by St. Martin's Lane. For he made the guineas chink. In his brother's church they buried him, And conscience, late that had such weight, That safer he might be; All in a moment fails; They lock'd the door, and would not trust For well they knew that it was true The Sexton with the key. A dead man tells no tales. And three men in the vestry watch, And they gave all their powder and ball, To save him if they ean; And took the gold so bright; And, should he come there, to shoot they swear And they drank their beer, and made good cheer, A Resurrection Man. Till now it was midnight. And the first night, by lantern light, Then, though the key of the church-door Through the church-yard as they went, Was left with the Parson, his brother, A guinea of gold the Sexton show'd It open'd at the Sexton's touch, ---That Mister Joseph sent. Because he had another. But conscience was tough; it was not enough; And in they go, with that villain Joe, And their honesty never swerved ; To fetch the body by night; And they bade him go, with Mister Joe, And all the church look'd dismally To the devil, as he deserved. By his dark-lantern light. So all night long, by the vestry fire, They laid the pick-axe to the stones, They quaff'd their gin and ale; And they moved them soon asunder; And they did drink, as you may think, They shovell'd away the hard-press'd elay, And told full many a tale. And came to the coffin under. The Cock he crew, Cock-a-doodle-doo! They burst the patent coffin first, Past five! the watchmen said; And they cut through the lead; And they went away, for while it was day And they laugh'd aloud when they saw the shroud, Because they had got at the dead. They might safely leave the dead. The second night, by lantern light, And they allow'd the Sexton the shroud, Through the church-yard as they went, And they put the coffin back; And nose and knees they then did squeeze He whisper'd anew, and show'd them two, That Mister Joseph sent. The Surgeon in a sack. The guineas were bright, and attracted their sight, The watchmen, as they pass'd along, They look'd so heavy and new; Full four yards off could smell, And their fingers itch'd as they were bewitch'd, And a enrse bestow'd upon the load And they knew not what to do. So disagreeable. But they waver'd not long, for conscience was So they earried the sack a-pick-a-back, And they carved him bone from bone; strong, And they thought they might get more; But what became of the Surgeon's soul And they refused the gold, but not Was never to mortal known. So rudely as before. Westbury, 1798. So all night long, by the vestry fire, They quaff'd their gin and ale; And they did drink, as you may think, And told full many a tale. HENRY THE HERMIT. The third night, as, by lantern light, Through the church-yard they went, IT was a little island where he dwelt, He bade them see, and show'd them three, A solitary islet, bleak and bare, That Mister Joseph sent. Short, seanty herbage spotting with dark spots Its gray stone surface. Never mariner They look'd askance with greedy glance; Approach'd that rude and uninviting coast, The guineas they shone bright; Nor ever fisherman his lonely bark For the Sexton on the yellow gold Anchor'd beside its shore. It was a place Let fall his lantern light. Befitting well a rigid anchoret, And he look'd sly with his roguish eye, Dead to the hopes, and vanities, and joys,

And gave a well-timed wink;

And purposes of life ; and he had dwelt

Many long years upon that lonely isle; For in ripe manhood he abandon'd arms, Honors, and friends, and country, and the world, And had grown old in solitude. That isle Some solitary man, in other times, Had made his dwelling-place; and Henry found The little chapel which his toil had built Now by the storms unroof'd, his bed of leaves Wind-scatter'd; and his grave o'ergrown with grass, And thistles, whose white seeds there wing'd in vain, Wither'd on rocks, or in the waves were lost. So he repair'd the chapel's ruin'd roof, Clear'd the gray lichens from the altar-stone, And underneath a rock that shelter'd him From the sea-blast, he built his hermitage. [food, The peasants from the shore would bring him And beg his prayers; but human converse else He knew not in that utter solitude; Nor ever visited the haunts of men. Save when some sinful wretch on a sick bed Implored his blessing and his aid in death. That summons he delay'd not to obey,

Though the night-tempest or autumnal wind Madden'd the waves; and though the mariner, Albeit relying on his saintly load, Grew pale to see the peril. Thus he lived A most austere and self-denying man, Till abstinence, and age, and watchfulness, Had worn him down, and it was pain at last To rise at midnight from his bed of leaves, And bend his knees in prayer. Yet not the less, Though with reluctance of infirmity, Rose he at midnight from his bed of leaves, And bent his knees in prayer; but with more zeal, More self-condemning fervor, raised his voice, Imploring pardon for the natural sin Of that reluctance, till the atoning prayer Had satisfied his heart, and given it peace, And the repented fault became a joy.

One night, upon the shore his chapel-bell Was heard; the air was calm, and its far sounds Over the water came, distinct and loud. Alarm'd, at that unusual hour, to hear Its toll irregular, a monk arose, And cross'd to the island-chapel. On a stone Henry was sitting there, dead, cold, and stiff, The bell-rope in his hand, and at his fect The lamp * that stream'd a long, unsteady light.

Westbury, 1799.

ST. GUALBERTO.

ADDRESSED TO GEORGE BURNETT.

Milton has made the name of Vallumbrosa familiar to English readers; few of whom, unless they have visited the spet,

* This story is related in the English Martyrology, 1608.

know that it is the chief seat of a religious order founded by St. Gualberto. A passage in one of Miss Seward's early letters shows how well Milton had observed the peculiar feature of its auturnnal scenery. "I have heard my father say, that when he was in Italy with Lord Charles Fitzroy, they travelled through Vallumbrosa in auturn, after the leaves had begun to fall; and that their guide was ohliged to try what was land, and what water, by pushing a long pole before him, which he carried in his hand, the vale being so very irriguous, and the leaves so totally covering the surface of the streams." --- Poetical Works of ANNE SEWARD, with Extracts from her Literary Correspondence, vol. i. p. lxxxvi.

THE work is done; the fabric is complete; Distinct the Traveller sees its distant tower,

Yet, ere his steps attain the sacred seat,

Must toil for many a league and many an hour. Elate the Abbot sees the pile, and knows, Stateliest of convents now, his new Moscera rose.

Long were the tale that told Moscera's pride, Its columns' cluster'd strength and lofty state, How many a saint bedeck'd its sculptured side;

What intersecting arches graced its gate ; Its towers how high, its massy walls how strong,

These fairly to describe were sure a tedious song.

Yet while the fane rose slowly from the ground, But little store of charity, I ween,

The passing pilgrim at Moscera found; And often there the mendicant was seen Hopeless to turn him from the convent door, Because this costly work still kept the brethren poor.

Now all is finish'd, and from every side They flock to view the fabric, young and old. Who now can tell Rodulfo's secret pride, When, on the Sabbath-day, his eyes behold The multitudes that crowd his church's floor, Some sure to serve their God, to see Moscera more?

5.

So chanced it that Gualberto pass'd that way, Since sainted for a life of saintly deeds.

He paused, the new-rear'd convent to survey, And, o'er the structure whilst his eye proceeds, Sorrowed, as one whose holier feelings deem That ill so proud a pile did humble monks beseem.

Him, musing as he stood, Rodulfo saw, And forth he came to greet the holy guest; For him he knew as one who held the law Of Benedict, and each severe behest

So duly kept with such religious care,

That Heaven had oft vouchsafed its wonders to his prayer.

It is Gualberto! and mine aged eyes Did not deceive me: yet full many a year Hath slipp'd away, since last you bade farewell To me your host and my uncomfortable cell.

8.

"Twas but a sorry welcome then you found, And such as suited ill a guest so dear. The pile was ruinons, the base unsound;

It glads me more to bid you welcome here,

For you can call to mind our former state; Come, brother, pass with me the new Moscera's gate."

So spake the cheerful Abbot; but no smile Of answering joy relax'd Gualberto's brow; He raised his hand, and pointed to the pile —

"Moscera better pleased me then, than now; A palace this, befitting kingly pride!

Will holiness, my friend, in palace pomp abide?"

10.

"Ay," cries Rodulfo, "'tis a stately place ! And pomp becomes the House of Worship well. Nay, scowl not round with so severe a face ! When earthly kings in seats of grandeur dwell, Where art exhausted decks the sumptuous hall, Can poor and sordid huts beseem the Lord of all?"

11.

"And ye have rear'd these stately towers on high To serve your God?" the Monk severe replied; "It rose from zeal and earnest piety,

And prompted by no worldly thoughts beside ? Abbot, to him who prays with soul sincere, However poor the cell, God will incline his ear.

"Rodulfo! while this haughty building rose, Still was the pilgrim welcome at your door? Did charity relieve the orphan's woes?

Clothed ye the naked? did ye feed the poor? He who with alms most succors the distress'd, Proud Abbot! know he serves his heavenly Father best 13.

"Did they in sumptuous palaces go dwell Who first abandon'd all to serve the Lord? Their place of worship was the desert cell; Wild fruits and berries spread their frugal board; And if a brook, like this, ran murmuring by,

They bless'd their gracients God, and 'thought it luxury.'"

14.

Then anger darken'd in Rodulfo's face; "Enough of preaching," sharply he replied; "Thou art grown envious; 'tis a common case;

Humility is made the cloak of pride. Proud of our home's magnificence are we, But thou art far more proud in rags and beggary." With that Gualberto cried in fervent tone, "O Father, hear me! If this costly pile

Was for thine honor rear'd, and thine alone, Bless it, O Father, with thy fostering smile! Still may it stand, and never evil know,

Long as beside its walls the endless stream shall flow.

"But, Lord, if vain and worldly-minded men Have wasted here the wealth which thou hast lent,

To pamper worldly pride; frown on it then ! Soon be thy vengeance manifestly sent!

Let yonder brook, that gently flows beside,

Now from its base sweep down the unholy house of pride!"

17.

He said, — and lo, the brook no longer flows ! 'The waters pause, and now they swell on high; Erect in one collected heap they rose;

The affrighted brethren from Moscera fly,

And upon all the Saints in Heaven they call, To save them in their flight from that impending fall.

Down the heap'd waters came, and, with a sound Like thunder, overthrown the fabric falls;

Swept far and wide, its fragments strow the ground,

Prone lie its columns now, its high-arch'd walls; Earth shakes beneath the onward-rolling tide,

That from its base swept down the unholy house of pride.

* * * * *

Were old Gualberto's reasons built on truth, Dear George, or like Moscera's base unsound?

This sure I know, that glad am I, in sooth, IIe only play'd his pranks on foreign ground;

For had he turn'd the stream on England too,

The Vandal monk had spoilt full many a goodly view.

Then Malmesbury's arch had never met my sight,

Nor Battle's vast and venerable pile;

I had not traversed then with such delight

'The hallowed ruins of our Alfred's isle,

Where many a pilgrim's curse is well bestow'd On those who rob its walls to mend the turnpike road.

Wells would have fallen, dear George, our country's pride;

And Canning's stately church been rear'd in vain;

Nor had the traveller Ely's tower descried,

Which when thou seest far o'er the fenny plain, Dear George, I counsel thee to turn that way; Its ancient beauties sure will well reward delay.

- And we should never then have heard, I think, At evening hour, great Tom's tremendous knell.
- The fountain streams that now in Christ-church stink,

Had Niagara'd o'er the quadrangle;

- But, as 'twas beauty that deserved the flood,
- I ween, dear George, thy own old Pompey might have stood.

Then had not Westminster, the house of God, Served for a concert-room, or signal-post:

Old Thames, obedient to the father's nod, Had swept down Greenwich, England's noblest boast;

And, eager to destroy the unholy walls,

Fleet Ditch had roll'd up hill to overwhelm St. Paul's.

24.

George, dost thou deem the legendary deeds Of saints like this but rubbish, a mere store Of trash, that he flings time away who reads? And wouldst thou rather bid me puzzle o'er

Matter and Mind and all the eternal round,

Plunged headlong down the dark and fathomless profound?

Now do 1 bless the man who undertook These Monks and Martyrs to biographize; And love to ponder o'er his ponderous book,

The mingle-mangle mass of truth and lies, Where waking fancies mix'd with dreams appear, And blind and honest zeal, and holy faith sincere.

All is not truth; and yet, methinks, 'twere hard Of wilful fraud such fablers to accuse;

What if a Monk, from better themes debarr d, Should for an edifying story choose

How some great Saint the Flesh and Fiend o'ereame;

His taste I trow, and not his conscience, were to blame.

27

No fault of his, if what he thus design'd, Like pious novels for the use of youth,

Obtain'd such hold upon the simple mind

That was received at length for gospel-truth. A fair account ! and shouldst thou like the plea, Thank thou our valued friend, dear George, who taught it me.

All is not false which seems at first a lie. Fernan Antolinez, a Spanish knight, Kneit at the mass, when, lo! the troops hard by Before the expected hour began the fight. Though courage, duty, honor, summon'd there, He chose to forfeit all, not leave the unfinish'd prayer.

29.

But while devoutly thus the unarm'd knight Waits till the holy service should be o'er, Even then the foremost in the furious fight

Was he beheld to bathe his sword in gore; First in the van his plumes were seen to play, And all to him decreed the glory of the day.

The truth is told, and men at once exclaim'd, Heaven had his Guardian Angel deign'd to send;

And thus the tale is handed down to fame. Now, if our good Sir Fernan had a friend

Who in this critical season served him well,

Dear George, the tale is true, and yet no miracle.

31.

I am not one who scan with scornful eyes The dreams which make the enthusiast's best delight;

Nor thou the legendary lore despise, If of Gualberto yet again I write,

How first impell'd he sought the convent cell;

A simple tale it is, but one that pleased me well.

32.

Fortune had smiled upon Gualberto's birth, The heir of Valdespesa's rich domains;

An only child, he grew in years and worth, And well repaid a father's anxious pains.

In many a field that father had been tried,

Well for his valor known, and not less known for pride.

33.

It chanced that one in kindred near allied Was slain by his hereditary foe;

Much by his sorrow moved, and more by pride, The father vow'd that blood for blood should flow;

And from his youth Gualberto had been taught That with unceasing hate should just revenge be sought.

Long did they wait; at length the tidings came That, through a lone and unfrequented way,

Soon would Anselmo — such the murderer's name —

Pass on his journey home, an easy prey.

"Go," said the father, "meet him in the wood !"

And young Gualberto went, and laid in wait for blood.

When now the youth was at the forest shade Arrived, it drew toward the close of day; Anselmo haply might be long delay'd,

And he, already wearied with his way,

Bencath an ancient oak his limbs reclined, And thoughts of near revenge alone possess'd his mind.

36.

Slow sunk the glorious sun; a roseate light Spread o'er the forest from his lingering rays;

The glowing clouds upon Gualberto's sight Soften'd in shade, — he could not choose but gaze;

And now a placid grayness clad the heaven, Save where the west retain'd the last green light of even.

37.

Cool breathed the grateful air, and fresher now The fragrance of the autumnal leaves arose; The passing gale scarce moved the o'erhanging bough,

And not a sound disturb'd the deep repose, Save when a falling leaf came fluttering by,

Save the near brooklet's stream that murmur'd quietly.

Is there who has not felt the deep delight, The hush of soul, that scenes like these impart?

The heart they will not soften is not right;

And young Gualberto was not hard of heart. Yet sure he thinks revenge becomes him well, When from a neighboring church he heard the vesper-bell.

39.

The Romanist who hears that vesper-bell, Howe'er employ'd, must send a prayer to Heaven.

In foreign lands I liked the custom well;

For with the calm and sober thoughts of even It well accords; and wert thou journeying there,

It would not hurt thee, George, to join that vesper-prayer.

Gualberto had been duly taught to hold All pious customs with religious care; And—for the young man's feelings were not cold,— He never yet had miss'd his vesper-prayer. But strange misgivings now his heart invade; And when the vesper-bell had ceased, he had not pray'd.

41.

And wherefore was it that he had not pray'd? The sudden doubt arose within his mind, And many a former precept then he weigh'd,

The words of Him who died to save mankind; How 'twas the meek who should inherit Heaven,

And man must man forgive, if he would be forgiven.

Troubled at heart, almost he felt a hope, That vet some chance his victim might delay. I ogue has gastado, siguiendo tu parecer, en este magnifico edi-

So as he mused adown the neighboring slope, He saw a lonely traveller on his way;

And now he knows the man so much abhorr'd,— His holier thoughts are gone, he bares the murderous sword.

"The house of Valdespesa gives the blow! Go, and our vengeance to our kinsman tell!

Despair and terror seized the unarm'd foe, And prostrate at the young man's knees he fell,

And stopp'd his hand and cried, "Oh, do not take A wretched sinner's life! mercy for Jesus' sake!"

At that most blessed name, as at a spell, Conscience, the power within him, smote his heart.

His hand, for murder raised, unharming fell; He felt cold sweat-drops on his forehead start;

A moment mute in holy horror stood, Then cried, "Joy, joy, my God! I have not shed his blood!"

45.

He raised Anselmo up, and bade him live, And bless, for both preserved, that holy name;

And pray'd the astonish'd foeman to forgive The bloody purpose led by which he came.

Then to the neighboring church he sped away, His overburden'd soul before his God to lay.

46.

He ran with breathless speed, — he reach'd the door, —

For grace vonchsafed; before the cross he fell, And raised his swimming eyes, and thought that there

He saw the imaged Christ smile favoring on his prayer.

A blest illusion ! from that very night The Monk's austerest life devout he led;

And still he felt the enthusiast's deep delight; Seraphic visions floated round his head;

The joys of heaven foretasted fill'd his soul;

And still the good man's name adorns the sainted roll.

Earth shakes beneath the onward-rolling tide, That from its base swept down the unholy house of pride. Stanza 18, p. 478.

Era amigo de pobreza, en tanto grado, que sentia mucho, que los Monasterios se edificassen sumptuosamente; y assi visitando el de Mosecra y viendo un edificio grande, y elegante, buelto a Rodulpho, que era alli Abad, con el rostro ayrado le dizo: Con lo que has gastado, siguiendo tu parecer, en este magnifico edificio, has quitado el sustento a muchos pobres. Puso los ojos en un pequeño arroyo, que coerio alli cerca, y dico, Dios Omnipotente, que sueles hacer grandes cosas de pequenas criaturas, yo te ruego, que uca por medio de esta pequeño acroyo vengonza de este gran edificio. Dico esto, y fuese de alli como abominando el lugar; y siendo oido, el arroyuelo comenzo a crecer, y fue de suerte, que recogiendo un monte de agua, y tomando de atrás la corriente, vino con ten grande impetu, que llevando piedras y arboles consigo, derribo el edificio. —

Flos Sanctorum, por El Maestro Alonso de Villegas.

Quodam itaque tempore cum monasteria, quæ sub suo erant regimine, solito more inviserct, venit ad canobium cui vocabulum est Muscetum ; ubi cum casas corneret grandiores pulchrioresque quam vellet; accersito venerabili viro domino Rodulfo, qui eas construxerat, et ab illo ibi ordinatus fuerat Abbas, severissimo vultu dizit : Tu in isto loco hæc tibi fabricasti palatia ? Et conversus ad parvissimum rivum qui inibi juxta currebat, dixit; O Regambule, si me de Rodulfo, et istis ejus domibus vindicaveris, utrem aqua Sevæ fluminis pleaum, undis tuis augebo. Et hee dicens sine morà discessit. Cujus imperium, ac si rationabilis homo, rivus ille suscipiens, illo recedente intumescere capit, et nescio unde largissima aquarum fluenta congregans, relicto proprio alveo de monte præcipitanter ruit, gravissimos petrarum scopulos atque arbores secum trahens, in prædictas domos illisus terra tenus cas dejecit. Quà ultione completà, quasi pro mercede, quod promiserat, Pater recepit. Quà pro re Abbas ille turbatus eum Fratribus, de loco mutare disponchat canobium. Quibus ille hæc consolationis verba locutus est : Nolite, inquit, timere ne habitetis quia rivus ille nec quidquam mali vobis facturus est, nec ultra vobis nocebit. Quod ejus vaticinium verum firmumque usque hodie permanet. Denique ille sape dictus rivulus, quod tune casu, immo plus imperio Patris acciderit, nec antea facerat, nec ulterius fecit.

Fernan Antolinez, a Spanish knight. - Stanza 28, p. 479.

Acontecio en aquella * batalla una cosa digna de memoria. Fernan Antolinez, hombre noble y muy devoto, oia missa al tiempo que se dio señal de acometer, costumbre ordinaria suya antes de la pelea; por no dezarla començada, se quedo en el templo quando se toco à la arma. Esta piedad quan ogradable fuesse a Dios, se entendio por un milogro. Estavase primero en la Iglesia, despues escondudo en su casa, temia no le afrentassen como a cobarde. En tanto, otro a el semejante, es a sobo su Angel bieno, pelea entre los primeros ton valientemente, que la vitoria de aquel dia se atribuyo en gran parte al valor de el golpes, y las manchas de la sangre que se hallaron frescas en sus armas y cavallo. Assi publicado el caso, y sobido lo que passava, quedo mas conocida la inocencia y esfuerço de Antolinez. — MARIANA.

Perhaps this miracle, and its obvious interpretation, may have suggested to Florian the circumstance by which his Gonsalvo is prevented from combating and killing the brother of his mistress. Florian is fond of Spanish literature.

A simple tale it is, but one that pleased me well. Stanza 31, p. 479.

Llamose el padre Gualberto, y era senor de Valdespesa, que está entre Sena, y Florencia : seguia la milicia ; y como le matassen un su deudo cercano injustamente, indignados, assi el hijo, que era ya hombre, como el padre, con mucho cuydado buscavan ocasion, como vengar aquella muerte. Sucedio, que veniendo d Florencia el hijo, con un criado suyo, hombre valiente, y los dos bien armados, d cavallo, vio d su enemigo, y en lugar que era impossible irseles : lo qual considerado por el contrario, y que tenia cierta su muerte, descendió de un cavallo, en que venia, y puesto de rodillas le pidió, juntas las manos, por Jesu Christo crucificado, le perdonasse la vida. Enternecióse Juan Gualberto, oyendo el nombre de Jesu Christo crucificado ; y diróle, que por amor de aquel Senor, que rogó en la Cruz por los que le pusieron en ella, el le perdonava. Pidióle, que se levantasse, y perdiesse el temor, que ya no por enemigo, sino por amigo le queria, y que de Dios, por quien hacia esto, esperava el premio. Passó adelante Gualberto; y viendo una Iglesia en un monte cerca de Florencia, llamada de San Miniato, que era de Monges negros, entró en ellu paro dar gracias à Jesu Christo nuestro Señor por la merced, que le havia hecho en favorecerle, de que perdonasse, y no tomasse venganza de su enemigo : pusose de rodillas delante de un Crucifixo, el qual, viendolo el, y otros que estavan presentes, desde la Cruz inclinó la cabeza d Gualberta, como agradeciendo, y dandole gracias, de que por su amor huviesse perdonado la vida d su enemigo. Descubrióse el caso, y fue publico, y muy celebrado, y el Crucifizo fue tenido en grande revorencia en aquella Iglesia de S. Miniato. Quedó Juan Gualberto de este acaceimiento, trocado en otro varon, y determinó dezar el mundo, y las cosas perecederas de el. — VILLEGAS. Flos Sanctorum.

He saw the imaged Christ smile favoring on his prayer. Stanza 46, p. 480.

Sir Peter Damian relates a story so similar to this of Gualherto in almost all circumstances, that Cuper found it advisable to disparage his authority on this occasion, and quote some of his own declarations, that he was not always satisfied of the truth or accuracy of what he related. Cum in tot aliis narrationibus id sibi contigisse fateatur Petrus Damiani, idem in hae Crucifixi historià ipsi evenisse non injuria suspicor. The Bollandist then proceeds to declare his own stout belief in the miracle as belonging to St. Gualberto. Ut ut est, ego Crucifizi sese inclinantis miraculum S. Joanni Gualberto accidisse historicá fide credo, atque istud in dubium revocare, summæ pervicacia, ne dicam dementia, esse existimo. Quid enim historicè tandem certum erit, si omnibus historicis, atque etiam vetustissimis synchronis aut subæqualibus fuctum aliquod narrantibus, de eo dubitare licent? Intolerabilis sane est hæc mentis pertinacia, quam quidam nostri temporis Aristarchi, ac præsertim heterodoxi, prudentiam aut constantiam vocare non erubescunt.

Non ignoro scriptores aliquos in vitium contrarium incurrisse, et in exornando hoc miracalo nimios fuisse; inter quos jure merito numerori potest Ludovicus Zacconius, qui sinc ullo vetorum testimonio, colloquium inter Crucifizum et S. Joannem Gualbertum ex suo, ut opinor, cerebro finzit. Hec tamen additamenta miraculi veritatem non negant, sed potius confirmant, quamvis per hyperbolen maxime repreheudendam. — Acta SS. 50. 3, p. 314.

THE MARCH TO MOSCOW.

1.

THE Emperor Nap he would set off On a summer excursion to Moscow; The fields were green, and the sky was blue, Morbleu! Parbleu! What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

2.

Four hundred thousand men and more Must go with him to Moscow : There were Marshals by the dozen, And Dukes by the score ; Princes a few, and Kings one or two; While the fields are so green, and the sky so blue, Morbleu ! Parbleu ! What a pleasant excursion to Moscow !

3.

There was Junot and Augereau, Heigh-ho for Moscow! Dombrowsky and Poniatowsky, Marshal Ney, lack-a-day! General Rapp, and the Emperor Nap; Nothing would do, While the fields were so green, and the sky so blue, Morbleu! Parbleu! Nothing would do For the whole of this crew, But they must be marching to Moscow.

4.

The Emperor Nap he talk'd so big That he frighten'd Mr. Roscoe. John Bull, he cries, if you'll be wise, Ask the Emperor Nap if he will please To grant you peace, upon your knees, Because he is going to Moscow ! He'll make all the Poles come out of their holes, And beat the Russians, and eat the Prussians; For the fields are green, and the sky is blue, Morbleu ! Parbleu ! And he'll certainly march to Moscow !

And Counsellor Brougham was all in a fume At the thought of the march to Moscow: The Russians, he said, they were undone, And the great Fee-Faw-Fum Would presently come, With a hop, step, and jump, unto London. For, as for his conquering Russia, However some persons might scoff it, Do it he could, and do it he would, And from doing it nothing would come but good, And nothing could call him off it. Mr. Jeffrey said so, who must certainly know, For he was the Edinburgh Prophet. They all of them knew Mr. Jeffrey's Review, Which with Holy Writ ought to be reckon'd : It was, through thick and thin, to its party true; Its back was buff, and its sides were blue, Morbleu! Parbleu! It served them for Law and for Gospel too.

But the Russians stoutly they turned to Upon the road to Moscow. Nap had to fight his way all through; They could fight, though they could not parlezvous; But the fields were green, and the sky was blue, Morbleu! Parbleu! And so he got to Moscow.

7.

He found the place too warm for him, For they set fire to Moscow. To get there had cost him much ado, And then no better course he knew, While the fields were green, and the sky was blue, Morbleu ! Parbleu ! But to march back again from Moscow.

8.

The Russians they stuck close to him All on the road from Moscow. There was Tormazow and Jemalow. And all the others that end in ow; Milarodovitch and Jaladovitch, And Karatschkowitch, And all the others that end in itch; Schamscheff, Sonchosaneff, And Schepaleff, And all the others that end in eff; Wasiltschikoff, Kostomaroff, And Tchoglokoff, And all the others that end in off; Rajeffsky, and Novereffsky, And Rieffsky, And all the others that end in effsky; Oscharoffsky and Rostoffsky, And all the others that end in offsky, And Platoff he play'd them off, And Shouvaloff he shovell'd them off. And Markoff he mark'd them off. And Krosnoff he cross'd them off, And Tuchkoff he touch'd them off, And Boroskoff he bored them off, And Kutousoff he cut them off, And Parenzoff he pared them off, And Worronzoff he worried them off, And Doctoroff he doctor'd them off, And Rodionoff he flogg'd them off. And, last of all, an Admiral came, A terrible man with a terrible name, A name which you all know by sight very well, But which no one can speak, and no one can spell. They stuck close to Nap with all their might; They were on the left and on the right, Behind and before, and by day and by night; He would rather parlez-yous than fight; But he look'd white, and he look'd blue, Morbleu ! Parbleu !

When parlez-vous no more would do, For they remember'd Moscow.

9.

And then came on the frost and snow, All on the road from Moscow.

The wind and the weather he found, in that hour, Cared nothing for him, nor for all his power; For him who, while Europe erouch'd under his rod, Put his trust in his Fortune, and not in his God. Worse and worse every day the elements grew, The fields were so white, and the sky so blue, Saerebleu ! Ventrebleu ! What a horrible journey from Moscow !

What then thought the Emperor Nap Upon the road from Moscow? Why, I ween he thought it small delight To fight all day, and to freeze all night; And he was besides in a very great fright, . For a whole skin he liked to be in; And so, not knowing what else to do, When the fields were so white, and the sky so blue, Morbleu! Parbleu! He stole away, — I tell you true, —

Upon the road from Moscow. 'Tis myself, quoth he, I must mind most, So the Devil may take the hindmost.

I1.

Too cold upon the road was he; Too hot had he been at Moscow ; But colder and hotter he may be, For the grave is colder than Moscovy; And a place there is to be kept in view, Where the fire is red, and the brimstone blue, Morblen ! Parblen ! Which he must go to, If the Pope say true, If he does not in time look about him; Where his namesake almost He may have for his Host; He has reckon'd too long without him; If that Host get him in Purgatory, He won't leave him there alone with his glory; But there he must stay for a very long day, For from thence there is no stealing away, As there was on the road from Moscow

BROUGH BELLS.

The church at Brough is a pretty large, handsome, ancient building. The steeple is not so old, having been built about the year 1513, under the direction of Thomas Blenkinsop, of Helbeck, Esq. There are in it four excellent bells, by much the largest in the county, except the great bell at Kirkby Thore. Concerning these hells at Brough, there is a tradition that they were given by ono Brunskill, who lived upon Stanemore, in the remotest part of the parish, and had a great many cattle. One time it happened that his Bull fell a bellowing, which in the dialect of the country is called eruning, this being the genuine Saxon word to denote that vociferation. Thereupon he said to one of his neighbors, 'Hearest thou how lond this bull crunes? If these cattle should all crune together, might they not be heard from Brough hither?' He onswered, 'Yea.' (Well then,' says Branskill, 'Pill make them all crune together.' And he sold them all, and with the price thereof he bought the said bells, (or perhaps ho might get the old bells new cast and made larger.) There is a monument in the hody of the church, in the south wall, between the highest and second window, and in which it is said tho said Branskill was the last that was interred."—Nicolson and Burns' History and Antiquities of Westmoreland and Cumberland, vol. i, p. 571.

- "At the further Brough there was a chapel or oratory, founded by John Brunskill, (probably the same who gave the bells,) in 1506. Unto whom Thomas Blenkinsop, Esq., of Helbeck, gave the ground called Gibgarth, on condition that he should huild a chapel there, and also an hospital, with two heds in it for travellers and other poor people, and maintain for ever, paying to him and his hairs twopence rent at Pentecost yearly, and on defect of such maintaining and repairing the said chapel, hospital, and beds, the land to revert to the said Thomas and his heirs. In pursuance where of, he, the said John Brunskill, founded an oratory or chapel, dedicated to Our Lady St. Mary, the Mother of Christ, and to St. Gabriel, the Archangel; who, as Roger, Bishop of Carlisle, and Richard, Abbot of Shap, did, by writing under their hands and seals, affirm, wrought many fair and divers miracles by the sufferance of our Lord God. Two priests were established to sing and to pray in the said chapel for evermore, for the souls of all the benefactors of the said chapel that were departed from the world, and for the welfare of those that were living. One of the said priests was to teach grammar, the other to instruct children willing to learn singing, freely, without any salary from them. The foundation of this chapel was confirmed both by the Bishop of Carlisle and the Arehbishop of York, and yet was after-wards opposed by the Vicar of Brough, who conceived himself much prejudiced thereby, and particularly in respect of the oblations which were given from him to the said chapel. Whereupon he set up the cross, and lighted up candles in the church at mid-time of the day, caused the bells to be rung, and cursed with bell, book, and candle, all those that should receive any oblations of those that resorted to the said chapel, or should give any encouragement unto the same. Brunskill, the founder, complained to the Archhishop's Court, at York, against the vicar, Mr. Rasebeck, and obtained a sharp citation against him ; censuring him as an abandoned wretch, and inflated with diabolical venom for opposing so good a work. Not withstanding which, Mr. Rascheck appealed to the Pope, and an agreement was made between the founder and him, by a composition of twenty shillings yearly, to he paid to Mr. Rasebeck, and his successors, vicars of Brough.
- "Thus the chapel continued till the dissolution of the religious houses. And the priest that taught to sing being removed, the other that taught grammar was thought fit to be continued as master of a free-school; and by the commissioners, Sir Walter Mildmay and Robert Kellison, Esq., order was taken, and a fund settled for this purpose. So that a salary of 77.118.42 was to be paid yearly to the master of the school by the king's auditors, they receiving all the rents and revenues which formerly belonged unto it as a chapel, and which were given to it by the founder and other benefactors.

"This is all the endowment which it hath at present, (1777,) except a convenient dwelling-house and garden, which were given hy one of the schoolmasters, Mr. John Beck. But it was formerly very bountifully endowed by several henefactors; as Henry, Earl of Cumberland, Edward Musgrave, of Hartley, Esq., William Musgrave, son of Richard Musgrave, of Brough, Thomas Blenkinsop, Esq., Hugh Newton, and divers others, who gave lunds in Brough, Stanemore, Moreton, Yanewith, Mekel-Strickland, Bampton Cundall, and Mekel-Ashby, all in Westmoreland; and in Penrith, in Cumberland, and West-Laton, in Yorkshire, and Bernard Castle, in the county of Darham." - b, p. 574.

BROUGH BELLS.

ONE day to Helbeck 1 had stroll'd, Among the Crossfell Hills, And, resting in its rocky grove, Sat listening to the rills, —

The while to their sweet undersong The birds sang blithe around, And the soft west wind awoke the wood To an intermitting sound.

Louder or fainter, as it rose Or died away, was borne The harmony of merry bells, From Brough, that pleasant morn.

"Why are the merry bells of Brough, My friend, so few?" said I;

"They disappoint the expectant ear, Which they should gratify.

"One, two, three, four; one, two, three, four; 'Tis still one, two, three, four;

Mellow and silvery are the tones; But I wish the bells were more ! "

"What! art thou critical?" quoth he; "Eschew that heart's disease That seeketh for displeasure where The intent hath been to please.

"By those four bells there hangs a tale, Which being told, I guess,

Will make thee hear their scanty peal With proper thankfulness.

"Not by the Cliffords were they given, Nor by the Tuftons' line; Thou hearest in that peal the crnne

Of old John Brunskill's kine.

"On Stanemore's side, one summer eve, John Brunskill sat to see

His herds in yonder Borrodale Come winding up the lea.

"Behind them, on the lowland's verge, In the evening light serene,

- Brough's silent tower, then newly built By Blenkinsop, was seen.
- "Slowly they came in long array, With loitering pace at will;

At times a low from them was heard, Far off, for all was still.

"The hills return'd that lonely sound Upon the tranquil air;

The only sound it was, which then Awoke the echoes there.

"'Thou hear'st that lordly bull of mine, Neighbor,' quoth Brunskill then;

'How loudly to the hills he crunes, That crune to him again ! "' Thinkest thou if yon whole herd at once Their voices should combine, Were they at Brough, that we might not Hear plainly from this upland spot That cruning of the kine?'

"'That were a crune, indeed,' replied His comrade, 'which, I ween, Might at the Spital well be heard, And in all dales between

"" Up Mallerstang to Eden's springs, The eastern wind upon its wings The mighty voice would bear; And Appleby would hear the sound, Methinks, when skies are fair.'

"" Then shall the herd,' John Brunskill cried, "From yon dumb steeple crune, And thou and I, on this hill-side, Will listen to their tune.

"'So, while the merry Bells of Brough, For many an age ring on, John Brunskill will remember'd be, When he is dead and gone, ---

"'As one who, in his latter years, Contented with enough, Gave freely what he well could spare To buy the Bells of Brough.'

"Thus it hath proved: three hundred years Since then have past away, And Brunskill's is a living name Among us to this day."

"More pleasure," I replied, "shall I From this time forth partake, When I remember Helbeek woods, For old John Brunskill's sake.

"He knew how wholesome it would be, Among these wild, wide fells, And upland vales, to eatch, at times, The sound of Christian bells; —

"What feelings and what impulses Their cadence might convey To herdsman or to shepherd boy, Whiling in indolent employ The solitary day; —

"That, when his brethren were convened To meet for social prayer, He too, admonish'd by the call, In spirit might be there ; —

"Or, when a glad thanksgiving sound, Upon the winds of Heaven, Was sent to speak a Nation's joy, For some great blessing given, - ·

"For victory by sea or land, And happy peace at length;

QUEEN MARY'S CHRISTENING.

Peace by his country's valor won, And 'stablish'd by her strength; —

"When such exultant peals were borne Upon the mountain air, The sound should stir his blood, and give An English impulse there."

Such thoughts were in the old man's mind, When he that eve look'd down From Stanemore's side on Borrodale,

And on the distant town. And had I store of wealth, methinks,

Another herd of kine, John Brunskill, I would freely give, That they might crune with thine.

Keswick, 1828.

QUEEN MARY'S CHRISTENING.

Estava la Reyna (Doña Maria) lo mas del tiempo en la villa de Mompeller, y las veres que el Rey yva alla, no hazia con ella vida de marido ; y muy dissolutamente se rendia a otras mugeres, porque era muy sujeto a aquel view. Sucedio que estando en Miraval la Reyna, y el Rey Don Pedro en un lugar alli cerca, junto a Mompeller, que se dize Lates, un Rico Hombre de Aragon, que se dezia Don Guillen de Alcala, por grandes ruegos y instancia llevo al Rey adonde la Reyna estuva messa, segun se escrive, que tenia recabado que cumpliria su voluntad una dama de quien era servidor ; y en su lugar pusole en la camara de la Reyna ; y en aquella noche que tuvo participacion con ella, quedo preñoda de un hijo, el qual puro en Mompeller en la casa de los de Tornamira, en la vespera de la Purificación de nuestra Señora del año 1207. Mando lacgo la Reyna llevar al Infante a la Iglesia de Santa Maria, y al templo de Sant Fermin, pare dar gracias a nuestro Schor, por averle dado hijo tan impensadamente ; y buelto a palacio mando encender doze velas de un mismo peso y tamaño, y ponerles los nombres de los doze Apostoles, para que de aquella que mas durasse, tomasse el nombre; y assi fue llamado Jayme. --ZURITA, L. 2, C. 59.

The story is told at much greater length in La Historia del may alto e invencible Rey Don Jayme de Aragon, Primero deste nombre, llamado El Conquistador. Computesta primero en lengua Latino por el Maestro Beruardino Gomes Miedes, Arcediano de Murviedro, y Canonigo de Valencia, agora nuevamente traduzida por el mesmo Autor en lengua Castillana. – Valoncia, 1584.

There are three chapters relating to the "mystery of this wonderful history," in the first book of this work.

Cap. x. Como bolvio el Rey (D. Pedro) de Roma a Zurugoza, y de los modos que la Reyna su madre tuvo para casurle con la Señora de Mompeller, y como fue ulla.

Cap. xi. De la notable invrneron y arte que la Reyna Doña Maria uso viendose tan despreciada del Rey, para concrbar del. Cap. xiii. Del Nacimiento del Principe Don Jayme, y de los estraños mysterios que en su bantismo acaccieron.

Miedes thus gives his reason for taking much pains in compiling a faithful statement of the circumstances: — Conforman todos los historiadores antiguos y modernos en contur la estrana concepcion y nacimiento del Infante Don Jayme; puesto que en el modo y discurso de cada cosa, y como ello passo, discrepan en alga; puestos unos le passan brere y suecimtamente por mas honestidad, como la propria historia del Rey; otros cuentan muchas y diversas cosas sobre ello, porque son amigos de passar por todo, y es cierto que convienen todos con el Rey, y como esta dicho, en solo el modo differen. Por tanto, tumando de cada uno lo mas provable y menos discrepante, nos resolvemos en lo siguiente. — P. 13. In justice to the Queen, I om bound to say that Miedes represents her as beautiful and of unblemished reputation, hermesa y housestissima; and in justice to the King, profligate as he was, that there was a very strong suspicion of Doña Maria's being secretly married to another husband, by whom she had two daughters, a story which had reached the King, and which Miedes seems to accredit.

THE first wish of Queen Mary's heart Is, that she may bear a son, Who shall inherit in his time The kingdom of Aragon.

She hath put up prayers to all the Saints This blessing to accord, But ehiefly she hath call'd upon The Apostles of our Lord.

The second wish of Queen Mary's heart Is to have that son call'd James, Because she thought for a Spanish King

'Twas the best of all good names.

To give him this name of her own will Is what may not be done,

For, having applied to all the Twelve, She may not prefer the one.

By one of their names she hath vow'd to call Her son, if son it should be;

But which, is a point whereon she must let The Apostles themselves agree.

Already Queen Mary hath to them Contracted a grateful debt;

And from their patronage she hoped For these further blessings yet.

Alas! it was not her hap to be As handsome as she was good; And that her husband King Pedro thought so, She very well understood.

She had lost him from her lawful bed For lack of personal graces,

And by prayers to them, and a pious deceit, She had compass'd his embraces.

But if this hope of a son should fail, All hope must fail with it then,

For she could not expect by a second device To compass the King again.

Queen Mary hath had her first heart's wish-She hath brought forth a beautiful boy;

And the bells have rung, and masses been sung, And bonfires have blazed for joy.

And many's the cask of the good red wine, And many the cask of the white,

Which was broach'd for joy that morning, And emptied before it was night.

But now for Queen Mary's second heart's wish, It must be determined now ;

QUEEN MARY'S CHRISTENING.

And Bishop Boyl, her Confessor, Is the person who taught her how.

Twelve waxen tapers he hath had made, In size and weight the same; And to each of these twelve tapers, He hath given an Apostle's name.

One holy Nun had bleached the wax, Another the wicks had spun; And the golden candlesticks were bless'd, Which they were set upon.

From that which should burn the longest, The infant his name must take; And the Saint who own'd it was to be His Patron for his name's sake.

A godlier or a goodlier sight Was nowhere to be seen, Methinks, that day, in Christendom, Than in the chamber of that good Queen.

Twelve little altars have been there Erected, for the nonce; And the twelve tapers are set thereon, Which are all to be lit at once.

Altars more gorgeously dress'd You nowhere could desire; At each there stood a ministering Priest In his most rich attire.

A high altar hath there been raised, Where the Crucifix you see; And the sacred Pix that shines with gold And sparkles with jewelry.

Bishop Boyl, with his precious mitre on, Hath taken there his stand, In robes which were embroidered By the Queen's own royal hand.

In one part of the ante-room The Ladies of the Queen, All with their rosaries in hand, Upon their knees are seen.

In the other part of the ante-room, The Chiefs of the realm you behold, Ricos Omes, and Bishops, and Abbots, And Knights, and Barons bold.

Queen Mary could behold all this As she lay in her state bed; And from the pillow needed not To lift her languid head.

One fear she had, though still her heart The unwelcome thought eschew'd, That haply the unlucky lot Might fall upon St. Jude.

But the Saints, she trusted, that ill chance Would certainly forefend; And moreover there was a double hope Of seeing the wish'd-for end; ---

Because there was a double chance For the best of all good names; If it should not be Santiago himself, It might be the lesser St. James.

And now Bishop Boyl hath said the mass; And as soon as the mass was done, The priests, who by the twelve tapers stood, Each instantly lighted one.

The tapers were short and slender too, Yet to the expectant throng,

Before they to the socket burnt, The time, I trow, seem'd long

The first that went out was St. Peter, The second was St. John; And now St. Matthias is going, And now St. Matthew is gone.

Next there went St. Andrew; There goes St. Philip too; And see! there is an end Of St. Bartholomew.

St. Simon is in the snuff; But it was a matter of doubt Whether he or St. Thomas could be said Soonest to have gone out.

There are only three remaining, St. Jude, and the two St. James; And great was then Queen Mary's hope For the best of all good names.

Great was then Queen Mary's hope, But greater her fear, I guess, When one of the three went out, And that one was St. James the Less.

They are now within less than quarter-inch, The only remaining two ! When there came a thief in St. James, And it made a gutter too !

Up started Queen Mary, Up she sat in her bed; "I never ean call him Judas.' She clasp'd her hands and said

"1 never can call him Judas!" Again did she exclaim; "Holy Mother, preserve us! It is not a Christian name!"

She spread her hands, and elasp'd them again, And the Infant in the eradle

Set up a cry, an angry cry, As loud as he was able.

"Holy Mother, preserve us!" The Queen her prayer renew'd;

ROPRECHT THE ROBBER.

When in came a moth at the window, And flutter'd about St. Jude

St. James hath fallen in the socket, But as yet the flame is not out; And St. Jude hath singed the silly moth That flutters so blindly abont.

And before the flame and the molten wax That silly moth could kill, It hath beat out St. Jude with its wings, And St. James is burning still!

Oh, that was a joy for Queen Mary's heart; The babe is christened James; The Prince of Aragon hath got The best of all good names!

Glory to Santiago, The mighty one in war! James he is call'd, and he shall be King James the Conqueror!

Now shall the Crescent wane, The Cross be set on high In triumph upon many a Mosque; Woe, woe to Mawnetry!

Valencia shall be subdued; Majorca shall be won; The Moors be ronted every where; Joy, joy, for Aragon!

Shine brighter now, ye stars, that crown Our Lady del Pilar, And rejoice in thy grave, Cid Campeador, Ruydiez de Bivar !

Keswick, 1829.

ROPRECHT THE ROBBER.

The story here versified is told by Taylor the Water Poet, in his "Three Weeks, Three Days, and Three Hours' Observations from London to Hamburgh, in Germany; amongst Jews and Gentiles, with Descriptions of Towns and Towers, Castles and Citadels, artificial Gallowses and natural Hangmen; and dedicated for the present to the absent Odcombian Knight Errant, Sir Thomas Corpat," It is in the volume of his collected works, p. 82, of the third paging.

Collein, which is the scene of this story, is more probably Kollen on the Elbe, in Bohemia, or a town of the same name in Prussia, than Cologne, to which great city the reader will perceive t had good reasons for transferring it.

PART I.

ROFRECHT the Robber is taken at last; In Cologne they have him fast; Trial is over, and sentence past; And hopes of escape were vain, he knew, For the gallows now must have its due. But though pardon cannot here be bought, It may for the other world, he thought; And so, to his comfort, with one consent The Friars assured their penitent.

Money, they teach him, when rightly given, Is put out to account with Heaven; For snffrages therefore his plunder went, Sinfully gotten, but piously spent.

All Saints, whose shrines are in that city, They tell him, will on him have pity, Seeing he hath liberally paid, In this time of need, for their good aid.

In the Three Kings they bid him confide, Who there in Cologne lie side by side : And from the Eleven Thousand Virgins eke, Intercession for him will they bespeak.

And also a sharer he shall be In the merits of their community; All which they promise, he need not fear, Through Purgatory will carry him clear.

Though the furnace of Babylon could not compare With the terrible fire that rages there, Yet they their part will so zealonsly do, He shall only but frizzle as he flies through.

And they will help him to die well, And he shall be hang'd with book and bell; And moreover with holy water they Will sprinkle him, ere they turn away.

For buried Roprecht must not be; He is to be left on the triple tree; That they who pass along may spy Where the famous Robber is hanging on high Seen is that gibbet far and wide From the Rhine and from the Dusseldorff side; And from all roads which cross the sand, North, south, and west, in that level land.

It will be a comfortable sight To see him there by day and by night; For Roprecht the Robber many a year Had kept the country round in fear.

So the Friars assisted, by special grace, With book and hell to the fatal place; And he was hang'd on the triple tree, With as much honor as man could be.

In his suit of irons he was hung; They sprinkled him then, and their psalm they sung; And turning away when this duty was paid, They said, What a goodly end he had made '

The crowd broke up, and went their way; All were gone by the close of day; And Roprecht the Robber was left there Hanging alone in the moonlight air

ROPRECHT THE ROBBER.

The last who look'd back for a parting sight, Beheld him there in the clear moonlight; But the first who look'd when the morning shone, Saw in dismay that Roprecht was gone.

PART II.

THE stir in Cologne is greater to-day Than all the bustle of yesterday; Hundreds and thousands went out to see; The irons and chains, as well as he, Were gone, but the rope was left on the tree.

A wonderful thing! for every one said He had hung till he was dead, dead, dead, And on the gallows was seen, from noon Till ten o'clock, in the light of the moon.

Moreover the Hangman was ready to swear He had done his part with all due care; And that certainly better hang'd than he No one ever was, or ever could be.

Neither kith nor kin, to bear him away, And funeral rites in secret pay, Had he; and none that pains would take, With risk of the law, for a stranger's sake.

So 'twas thought, because he had died so well, He was taken away by miracle. But would he again alive be found? Or had he been laid in holy ground?

If in holy ground his relics were laid, Some marvellous sign would show, they said; If restored to life, a Friar he would be, Or a holy Hermit certainly, And die in the odor of sanctity.

That thus it would prove they could not doubt, Of a man whose end had been so devout; And to disputing then they fell About who had wrought this miracle.

Had the Three Kings this mercy shown, Who were the pride and honor of Cologne? Or was it an act of proper grace, From the Army of Virgins of British race, Who were also the glory of that place?

Pardon, some said, they might presume, Being a kingly act, from the Kings must come; But others maintained that St. Ursula's heart Would sooner be moved to the merciful part.

There was one who thought this aid divine Came from the other bank of the Rhine; For Roprecht there, too, had for favor applied, Because his birthplace was on that side.

To Dusseldorff then the praise might belong, And its Army of Martyrs, ten thousand strong; But he for a Dusseldorff man was known, And no one would listen to him in Cologne, Where the people would have the whole wonder their own.

The Friars, who help'd him to die so well, Put in their claim to the miracle; Greater things than this, as their Annals could tell, The stock of their merits for sinful men Had done before, and would do again.

"Twas a whole week's wonder in that great town, And in all places, up the river and down; But a greater wonder took place of it then, For Roprecht was found on the gallows again !

PART III.

WITH that the whole city flocked out to see; There Roprecht was on the triple tree, Dead, past all doubt, as dead could be; But fresh he was as if spells had charm'd him, And neither wind nor weather had harm'd him.

While the multitude stood in a muse, One said, I am sure he was hang'd in shoes! In this the Hangman and all concurr'd; But now, behold, he was booted and spurr'd!

Plainly therefore it was to be seen, That somewhere on horseback he had been; And at this the people marvelled more, Than at any thing which had happened before.

For not in riding trim was he When he disappeared from the triple tree; And his suit of irons he still was in, With the collar that clipp'd him under the chin.

With that this second thought befell, That perhaps he had not died so well, Nor had Saints perform'd the miracle; But rather there was cause to fear, That the foul Fiend had been busy here!

Roprecht the Robber had long been their curse, And hanging had only made him worse; For bad as he was when living, they said They had rather meet him alive than dead.

What a horse must it be which he had ridden ! No earthly beast could be so bestridden; And when by a hell horse a dead rider was carried, The whole land would be fearfully harried!

So some were for digging a pit in the place, And burying him there with a stone on his face; And that hard on his body the earth should be press'd,

And exorcists be sent for to lay him at rest.

But others, whose knowledge was greater, opined That this corpse was too strong to be confined; No weight of earth which they could lay

ROPRECHT THE ROBBER.

Would hold him down a single day, If he chose to get up and ride away.

There was no keeping Vampires under ground; And bad as a Vampire he might be found, Pests against whom, it was understood, Exorcism never had done any good.

But fire, they said, had been proved to be The only infallible remedy; So they were for burning the body outright, Which would put a stop to his riding by night.

Others were for searching the mystery out, And setting a guard the gallows about, Who should keep a careful watch, and see Whether Witch or Devil it might be That helped him down from the triple tree; —

For that there were Witches in the land, Was what all by this might understand; And they must not let the occasion slip For detecting that cursed fellowship.

Some were for this, and some for that, And some they could not tell for what; And never was such commotion known In that great city of Cologne.

PART IV.

PIETER SNOVE was a hoor of good renown, Who dwelt about an hour and a half from the town; And he, while the people were all in debate, Went quietly in at the city gate.

For Father Kijf he sought abont, His confessor, till he found him out; But the Father Confessor wondered to see The old man, and what his errand might be.

The good Priest did not wonder less When Pieter said he was come to confess; "Why, Pieter, how can this be so? I confessed thee some ten days ago!

"Thy conscience, methinks, may be well at rest, An honest man among the best; I would that all my flock, like thee, Kept clear accounts with Heaven and me!"

Always before, without confusion, Being sure of easy absolution, Pieter his little slips had summ'd; But he hesitated now, and he haw'd, and humm'd.

And something so strange the Father saw In Pieter's looks, and his hum and his haw, That he began to doubt it was something more Than a trifle omitted in last week's score.

At length it came out, that in the affair Of Roprecht the Robber he had some share; The Confessor then gave a start in fear — "God grant there have been no witchcraft here!"

Pieter Snoye, who was looking down, With something between a smile and a frown, Felt that suspicion move his bile, And look'd up with more of a frown than a smile.

"Fifty years I, Pieter Snoye, Have lived in this country, man and boy, And have always paid the Church her due, And kept short scores with Heaven and you.

"The Devil himself, though Devil he be, Would not dare impute that sin to me; He might charge me as well with heresy; And if he did, here, in this place, I'd call him liar, and spit in his face!"

The Father, he saw, cast a gracious eye When he heard him thus the Devil defy; The wrath, of which he had eased his mind, Left a comfortable sort of warmth behind,

Like what a cheerful cup will impart, In a social hour, to an honest man's heart; And he added, "For all the witchcraft here, I shall presently make that matter clear.

"Though I am, as you very well know, Father Kijf, A peaceable man, and keep clear of strife, It's a queerish business that now I've been in; But I can't say that it's much of a sin.

"However, it needs must be confess'd, And as it will set this people at rest, To come with it at once was best: Moreover, if I delayed, I thought That some might perhaps into trouble be brought,

"Under the seal I tell it you, And you will judge what is best to do, That no hurt to me and my son may ensue. No earthly harm have we intended, And what was ill done has been well mended.

"I and my son, Piet Pieterszoon, Were returning home by the light of the moon, From this good city of Cologne, On the night of the execution day; And hard by the gibbet was our way.

"About midnight it was we were passing by, My son, Piet Pieterszoon, and I, When we heard a moaning as we came near, Which made us quake at first for fear.

"But the moaning was presently heard again, And we knew it was nothing ghostly then; 'Lord help us, Father!' Piet Pieterszoon said, 'Roprecht, for certain, is not dead!'

"So under the gallows our cart we drive, And, sure enough, the man was alive;

Because of the irons that he was in, He was hanging, not by the neck, but the chin. "The reason why things had got thus wrong, Was, that the rope had been left too long; The Hangman's fault — a clumsy rogue, He is not fit to hang a dog. "Now Roprecht, as long as the people were there, Never stirr'd hand or foot in the air; But when at last he was left alone, By that time so much of his strength was gone, That he could do little more than groan.

"Piet and I had been sitting it out, Till a latish hour, at a christening bout; And perhaps we were rash, as you may think, And a little soft, or so, for drink.

"Father Kijf, we could not bear To leave him hanging in misery there; And 'twas an act of mercy, I cannot but say, To get him down, and take him away.

"And, as you know, all people said What a goodly end that day he had made; So we thought for certain, Father Kijf, That, if he were saved, he would mend his life.

"My son, Piet Pieterszoon, and 1, We took him down, seeing none was nigh; And we took off his suit of irons with care, When we got him home, and we hid him there.

"The secret, as you may guess, was known To Alit, my wife, but to her alone; And never sick man, I dare aver, Was better tended than he was by her "Good advice, moreover, as good could be, He had from Alit, my wife, and me; And no one could promise fairer than he: So that we and Piet Pieterszoon, our son, Thought that we a very good deed had done.

"You may well think we laughed in our sleeve, At what the people then seem'd to believe; Queer enough it was to hear them say, That the Three Kings took Roprecht away;—

"Or that St. Ursula, who is in bliss, With her Army of Virgins had done this: The Three Kings and St. Ursula, too, I warrant, had something better to do.

"Piet Pieterszoon, my son, and I, We heard them talk as we stood by, And Piet look'd at me with a comical eye. We thought them fools, but, as you shall see, Not over-wise ourselves were we.

"For I must tell you, Father Kijf, That when we told this to Alit, my wife, She at the notion perk'd up with delight, And said she believed the people were right. "Had not Roprecht put in the Saints his hope, And who but they should have loosen'd the rope, When they saw that no one could intend To make at the gallows a better end?

"Yes, she said, it was perfectly clear That there must have been a miracle here; And we had the happiness to be in it, Having been brought there just at the minute.

"And therefore it would become us to make An offering for this favor's sake To the Three Kings and the Virgins too, Since we could not tell to which it was due.

"For greater honor there could be none Than what in this business the Saints had done To us and Piet Pieterszoon, our son; She talk'd me over, Father Kijf, With that tongue of hers, did Alit, my wife.

"Lord, forgive us ! as if the Saints would deign To come and help such a rogue in grain; When the only mercy the case could admit Would have been to make his halter fit !

"That would have made one hanging do, In happy season for him too, When he was in a proper cue; And have saved some work, as you will see, To my son, Piet Pieterszoon, and me.

"Well, Father, we kept him at bed and board, Till his neck was cured and his strength restored, And we should have sent him off this day With something to help him on his way.

"But this wicked Roprecht, what did he? Though he had been saved thus mercifully, Hanging had done him so little good, That he took to his old ways as soon as he could.

"Last night, when we were all asleep, Out of his bed did this gallows-bird creep; Piet Pieterszoon's boots and spurs he put on, And stole my best horse, and away he was gone '

"Now Alit, my wife, did not sleep so hard, But she heard the horse's feet in the yard; And when she jogg'd me, and bade me awake, My mind misgave me as soon as she spake.

"To the window my good woman went, And watch'd which way his course he bent; And in such time as a pipe can be lit, Our horses were ready with bridle and bit.

"Away, as fast as we could hie, We went, Piet Pieterszoon and I; And still on the plain we had him in sight; The moon did not shine for nothing that night.

"Knowing the ground, and riding fast, We came up with him at last, And — would you believe it? Father Kijf, The ungrateful wretch would have taken my life, If he had not miss'd his stroke with a knife!

"The struggle in no long time was done, Because, you know, we were two to one; But yet all our strength we were fain to try, Piet Pieterszoon, my son, and I.

"When we had got him on the ground, We fastened his hands, and his legs we bound; And across the horse we laid him then, And brought him back to the house again.

"' We have robb'd the gallows, and that was ill Said I to Piet Pieterszoon, my son; [done !' ' And restitution we must make To that same gallows, for justice' sake.'

" In his suit of irons the rogue we array'd, And once again in the cart he was laid! Night not yet so far was spent, But there was time enough for our intent; And back to the triple tree we went.

" His own rope was ready there; To measure the length we took good care; And the job which the bungling Hangman begun, This time, I think, was properly done By me and Piet Pieterszoon, my son."

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

The legend on which this poem is founded is related in the Vida y Hazañas del Gran Tamorlan, con la descripcion de las Tierras de su Imperio y Scñorio, escrita por Ruy Gozzalez de Clavijo, Camarcro del muy alto y Poderoso Scñor Don Enriqae. Tercero deste nombre, Rey de Castilla y de Lear; con un Itinerario de lo sucedido en la Embajada, que por dicho Scñor el Rey hizo al dicho Principe, llanado por otro nombre Tanurbee, año del nacimiento de 1403.

The ambassadors had seen at Constantinople, in the Church of St. John of the Stone, el brazo izquierdo de Sant Juan Baptista; el qual brazo era de so el ombro ayuso fasta en la mano. E este brazo faé quamado, è non tenia salvo el cuero e el hueso, e à las coyunturas del cado a de la mano estaba guarnecida de oro con picdras. They then went to a church of our Lady, called Peribelico, é aqui in esta Iglesia estaba el otra braza del bienaventurado Sant Juan Baptista, el qual fué mostrado à los dichos Embajadores : el qual brazo era el derecho, y cra desde el codo ayusa con su mano; é estaba bien fresco é sano ; é como quiera que dicen que todo el cuerpo del bienaventurado Sant Juan fué que mada, salvo elun dedo de la mano derecha con que señala quanda diro, Ecce Agnus Dei, todo este dieho brazo estaba sano segun alli paresció : estaba engustonada con unus vergas de oro delgadas, y fallesciale el dedo pulgar; y la razon que los Monges decian porque fallescia aquel dedo de alli, era esta : Decian que en la ciudad de Antiochia, al tiempo que en ella avia idolatras, que andaba en el una figura de Dragon, à que avian por castumbre los de la cindad de dar cada ano à comer à aquel Dragon una persona. E qui echaban sucrtes a qual caeria; e que uquel à quien caia, que non pudiese escusar que lo non comiese aquel Dragon. La qual suerte diz que eayó en aquel tiempo à una fija de un ome bueno, e que quando vido que non podía escusar de dar su fija à aquel Dragon, que ovo gran cuita en su corazon, e que con dolor de la fija, que se fuera à una Iglesia de Monges Christianos, que entonces en la dicha ciudad avia, é diro à las Monges

PART I.

PITHYBIAN was a Pagan, An easy-hearted man, And Pagan sure he thought to end, As Pagan he began; Thought he, the one must needs be true, The old Religion, or the new, And therefore nothing care I; I call Diana the Divine; My daughter worships at the shrine Of the Christian Goddess, Mary. In this uncertain matter If I the wrong course take,

Mary to me will mercy show For my Marana's sake.

If I am right, and Dian bend Her dreadful bow, or Phæbus send

His shafts abroad for slaughter, Safe from their arrows shall I be,

And the twin Deities for me

Will spare my dear-loved daughter.

If every one in Antioch Had reasoned in this strain, It never would have raised alarm

In Satan's dark domain.

But Mary's Image every day

Looks down on erowds who come to pray; Her votaries never falter;

While Dian's temple is so bare,

That unless her Priestess take good care, She will have a grass-green altar.

Perceiving this, the old Dragon Inflamed with anger grew;

Earthquakes and Plagues were common ills, There needed something new;

Some vengeance so severe and strange That forepast times, in all their range,

With no portent could match it; So for himself a nest he made, And in that nest an cgg he laid, And down he sat to hatch it.

He built it by the fountain Of Phlegethon's red flood,

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

In the innermost abyss, the place Of central solitude ; Of adamantine blocks unhewn, With lava scoria interstrewn, The sole material fitting; With amianth he lined the nest, And incombustible asbest, To bear the fiery sitting.

There, with malignant patience, He sat in fell despite, Till this dracontine cockatrice Should break its way to light. Meantime his angry heart to cheer, He thought that all this while no fear The Antiocheans stood in, Of what, on deadliest vengeance bent, With imperturbable intent, He there for them was brooding.

The months of incubation At length were duly past; And now the infernal Dragon-chick Hath burst its shell at last; At which long-look'd-for sight enrapt, For joy the father Dragon clapp'd His brazen wings like thunder, So londly that the mighty sound Was like an earthquake felt around, And all above and under.

The diabolic youngling Came out no callow birth, Puling, defenceless, blind and weak, Like bird or beast of earth; Or man, most helpless thing of all That fly, or swim, or creep, or crawl; But in his perfect figure; His horns, his dreadful tail, his sting, Scales, teeth, and claws, and every thing, Complete and in their vigor.

The Old Dragon was delighted, And proud withal to see In what perfection he had hatch'd His hellish progeny; And round and round, with fold on fold, His tail about the imp he roll'd, In fond and close enlacement; And neck round neck, with many a turn, He coil'd, which was, you may discern,

Their manner of cmbracement.

PART II.

A VOICE was heard in Antioch, Whence uttered none could know; But from their sleep it wakened all, Proclaiming, Woe, woe, woe ! It sounded here, it sounded there, Within, without, and every where, A terror and a warning;

Repeated thrice the dreadful word By every living soul was heard Before the hour of morning. And in the air a rushing Past over, in the night; And as it past, there past with it A meteoric light; The blind that piercing light intense Felt in their long-seal'd visual sense, With sudden, short sensation : The deaf that rushing in the sky Could hear, and that portentous cry Reach'd them with consternation. The astonished Antiocheans Impatiently await The break of day, not knowing when Or what might be their fate. Alas! what then the people hear, Only with certitude of fear Their sinking hearts affrighted; For in the fertile vale below, Came news that, in that night of woe, A Dragon had alighted. It was no earthly monster

In Libyan deserts nurs'd; Nor had the Lerna lake sent forth This winged worm accurs'd; The Old Dragon's own laid egg was this, The fierce Young Dragon of the abyss, Who from the fiery fountain, Through earth's concavities, that night Had made his way, and taken flight Out of a burning mountain.

A voice that went before him The cry of woe preferred; The motion of his brazen wings Was what the deaf had heard; The flashing of his eyes, that light The which upon their inward sight The blind had felt astounded; What wonder then, when from the wall They saw him in the vale, if all With terror were confounded?

Compared to that strong armor Of scales which he was in, The hide of a rhinoceros Was like a lady's skin. A battering-ram might play in vain Upon his head, with might and main, Thongh fifty men had work'd it; And from his tail they saw him fling Out, like a rocket, a long sting, When he for pastime jerk'd it.

To whom of Gods or Heroes Should they for aid apply? Where should they look for succor now, Or whither should they fly? For now no Demigods were found Like those whose deathless deeds abound In ancient song and story; No Hercules was then on earth, Nor yet of her St. George's birth Could Cappadocia glory.

And even these against him Had found their strength but small; He could have swallowed Hercules, Club, lion-skin, and all. Yea, had St. George himself been there Upon the fiercest steed that e'er To battle bore bestrider, This dreadful Dragon, in his might, One mouthful only, and one bite, Had made of horse and rider.

They see how unavailing All human force must prove; Oh, might their earnest prayers obtain Protection from above! The Christians sought our Lady's shrine, To invocate her aid divine; And, with a like emotion, The Pagans, on that fearful day, Took to Diana's fane their way, And offered their devotion.

But there the offended Goddess Beheld them with a frown; The indignant altar heaved itself, And shook their offerings down; The Priestess, with a deathlike hue, Pale as the marble Image grew; The marble Image redden'd; And these poor suppliants, at the sight, Felt, in fresh access of affright, Their hearts within them deaden'd

Behold the marble eyeballs With life and motion shine ! And from the moving marble lips There comes a voice divine, A demon voice, by all the crowd Distinctly heard, nor low, nor loud, But deep, and clear, and thrilling; And carrying to the soul such dread That they perforce must what it said Obey, however unwilling.

Ilear! hear! it said, ye people! The ancient Gods have sent,
In anger for your long neglect, This signal punishment.
To mortal Mary vows were paid,
And prayers preferr'd, and offerings made;
Our temples were deserted;
Now when our vengeance makes ye wise,
Unto your proper Deities
In fear ye have reverted!

Hear now the dreadful judgment For this which ye have done : — The infernal Dragon will devour Your daughters, one by one; A Christian Virgin, every day, Ye must present him for his prey, With garlands deek'd, as meet is That with the Christians he begins Is what, in mercy to your sins, Ye owe to my entreaties.

Whether, if to my worship Ye now continue true, I may, when these are ail consumed, Avert the ill from you, That on the Ancient Gods depends, If they be made once more your friends By your sincere repentance : But for the present, no delay ; Cast lots among ye, and obey The inexorable sentence.

PART III.

THOUGH to the Pagan priesthood A triumph this might seem, Few families there were who thus Could in their grief misdeem; For, oft in those distracted days, Parent and child went different ways, The sister and the brother; And when, in spirit moved, the wife Chose one religions course of life, The husband took the other.

Therefore in every household Was seen the face of fear: They who were safe themselves, exposed In those whom they held dear. The lists are made, and in the urn The names are placed to wait their turn For this far worse than slaughter: And from that fatal urn, the first Drawn for this dreadful death accurs'd Was of Pithyrian's daughter. With Christian-like composure, Marana heard her lot; And though her countenance at first Grew pale, she trembled not. Not for herself the Virgin grieved; She knew in whom she had believed, Knew that a crown of glory In Heaven would recompense her worth, And her good name remain on earth The theme of sacred story. Her tears were for her father, How he should bear this grief,

Poor wretched heathen, if he still Remain'd in misbelief; Her looks amid the multitude, Who struck with deep compassion stood.

Are seeking for Pithyrian : He eannot bear to meet her eye.

Where goest thou? whither wouldst thou fly, Thou miserable Syrian?

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

Hath sudden hope inspired him, Or is it in despair That through the throng he made his way, And sped he knew not where? For how could he the sight sustain, When now the sacrificial train Inhumanly surround her! How bear to see her when, with flowers From rosiers and from jasmine bowers, They like a victim crown'd her! He knew not why nor whither So fast he hurried thence, But felt like one possess'd by some Controlling influence; Nor turn'd he to Diana's fane, Inly assured that prayers were vain If made for such protection; His pagan faith he now forgot, And the wild way he took was not His own, but Heaven's direction. He who had never enter'd A Christian church till then, Except in idle mood profane, To view the ways of men, Now to a Christian church made straight, And hastened through its open gate, By his good Angel guided, And thinking, though he knew not why, That there some blessed Power on high Had help for him provided. Wildly he look'd about him On many a form divine, Whose Image o'er its altar stood, And many a sculptured shrine, In which believers might behold Relies more precious than the gold And jewels which encased them, With painful search from far and near Brought to be venerated here, Where piety had placed them. There stood the Virgin Mother, Crown'd with a starry wreath, And there the awful Crucifix Appeared to bleed and breathe; Martyrs to whom their palm is given, And sainted Maids who now in Heaven With glory are invested; Glancing o'er these, his rapid eye Toward one image that stood nigh Was drawn, and there it rested. The countenance that fix'd him Was of a sun-burnt mien;

The face was like a Prophet's face Inspired, but yet serene; His arms, and legs, and feet were bare, The raiment was of camel's hair, That, loosely hanging round him, Fell from the shoulders to the knee; And round the loins, though elsewhere free, A leathern girdle bound him. With his right arm uplifted, The great Precursor stood, Thus represented to the life In carved and painted wood. Below the real arm was laid Within a crystal shrine display'd For public veneration; Not now of flesh and blood, — but bone, Sinews, and shrivell'd skin alone, In ghastly preservation.

Moved by a secret impulse Which he could not withstand, Let me, Pithyrian cried, adore That blessed arm and hand! This day, this miserable day, My pagan faith I put away, Abjure it and abhor it; And in the Saints I put my trust, And in the Cross; and, if I must, Will die a Martyr for it.

This is the arm whose succor Ileaven brings me here to seek ! Oh, let me press it to my lips, And so its aid bespeak ! A strong faith makes me now presume That when to this unhappy doom A hellish power hath brought her, The heavenly hand, whose mortal mould I humbly worship, will unfold Its strength, and save my daughter.

The Sacristan with wonder And pity heard his prayer, And placed the relie in his hand, As he knelt humbly there. Right thankfully the kneeling man To that confiding Sacristan Return'd it, after kissing; And he within its crystal shrine Replaced the precious arm divine, Nor saw that aught was missing.

PART IV.

OH piety audacious ! Oh boldness of belief ! Oh sacrilegious force of faith, That then inspired the thief ! Oh wonderful extent of love, That Saints enthroned in bliss above Should bear such profanation, And not by some immediate act, Striking the offender in the fact, Prevent the perpetration !

But sure the Saint that impulse Himself from Heaven had sent, In mercy predetermining The marvellous event; So inconceivable a thought, Seeming with such irreverence fraught,

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

Could else have no beginning; Nor else might such a deed be done, As then Pithyrian ventured on, Yet had no fear of sinning.

Not as that Church he enter'd Did he from it depart, Like one bewildered by his grief, But confident at heart; Trinmphantly he went his way, And bore the Holy Thumb away, Elated with his plunder; That Holy Thumb which well he knew Could pierce the Dragon through and through, Like Jupiter's own thunder.

Meantime was meek Marana For sacrifice array'd; And now in sad procession forth They led the flower-crown'd Maid. Of this infernal triumph vain, The Pagan Priests precede the train; Oh hearts devoid of pity! And to behold the abhorr'd event, At far or nearer distance went The whole of that great city.

The Christians go to succor The sufferer with their prayers, The Pagans to a spectacle Which dreadfully declares, In this their over-ruling hour, Their Gods' abominable power; Yet not without emotion Of grief, and horror, and remorse, And natural piety, whose force Prevail'd o'er false devotion

The walls and towers are cluster'd, And every hill and height That overlooks the vale, is throng'd For this accursed sight. Why art thou joyful, thou green Earth? Wherefore, ye happy Birds, your mirth Are ye in carols voicing? And thou, O Sun, in yon blue sky, How canst thou hold thy course on high This day, as if rejoicing?

Already the procession Hath past the city gate ; And now along the vale it moves With solemn pace sedate. And now the spot before them lies Where, waiting for his promised prize, The Dragon's chosen haunt is ; Blacken'd beneath his blasting feet, Though yesterday a green retreat Beside the clear Orontes.

There the procession halted; The Priests on either hand Dividing then, a long array, In order took their stand.

Midway between the Maid is left, Alone, of human aid bereft: The Dragon now hath spied her; But in that moment of most need, Arriving breathless with his speed, Her Father stood beside her. On came the Dragon rampant, Half running, half on wing, His tail uplifted o'er his back In many a spiral ring; His scales he ruffled in his pride; His brazen pennons, waving wide, Were gloriously distended; His nostrils smoked; his eyes flash'd fire; His lips were drawn; and in his ire His mighty jaws extended. On came the Dragon rampant, Expecting there no check, And open-mouth'd to swallow both He stretch'd his burnish'd neck. Pithyrian put his daughter by, Waiting for this with watchful eye, And ready to prevent it; Within arm's length he let him come, Then in he threw the Holy Thumb, And down his throat he sent it. The hugest brazen mortar That ever yet fired bomb, Could not have check'd this fiendish beast As did that Holy Thumb. He stagger'd as he wheel'd short round; His loose feet scraped along the ground, To lift themselves unable; His pennons in their weakness flagg'd; His tail, erected late, now dragg'd, Just like a long, wet cable. A rumbling and a tumbling Was heard in his inside ; He gasp'd, he panted, he lay down, He roll'd from side to side; He moan'd, he groan'd, he snuff'd, he snored He growl'd, he howl'd, he raved, he roar'd; But loud as were his clamors, Far louder was the inward din, Like a hundred braziers working in A caldron with their hammers. The hammering came faster, More faint the moaning sound ; And now his body swells, and now It rises from the ground. Not upward with his own consent, Nor borne by his own wings, he went ; Their vigor was abated; But lifted, no one could tell how,

By power unseen, with which he now Was visibly inflated.

Abominable Dragon, Now art thou overmatch'd;

EPILOGUE TO THE YOUNG DRAGON.

And better had it been for thee That thou hadst ne'er been hatch'd; For now, distended like a ball To its full stretch, in sight of all, The body mounts ascendant; The head before, the tail behind, The wings, like sails that want a wind, On either side are pendant. Not without special mercy

Was he thus borne on high, Till he appear'd no bigger than An Eagle in the sky. For when about some three miles height, Yet still in perfect reach of sight, — Oh, wonder of all wonders ! — He burst in pieces, with a sound Heard for a hundred league's around, And like a thousand thunders.

But had that great explosion Been in the lower sky, All Antioch would have been laid In ruins, certainly. And in that vast assembled ront Who crowded joyfully about Pithyrian and his daughter, The splinters of the monster's hide Must needs have made on every side A very dreadful slaughter.

So far the broken pieces Were now dispersed around, And shiver'd so to dust, that not A fragment e'er was found. The Holy Thumb, (so it is thought,) When it this miracle had wrought, At once to Heaven ascended ; As if, when it had thus display'd Its power, and saved the Christian Maid, Its work on earth was ended.

But at Constantinople The arm and hand were shown, Until the mighty Ottoman O'erthrew the Grecian throne. And when the Monks, this tale who told To pious visitors, would hold The holy hand for kissing, They never fail'd, with faith devout, In confirmation to point out That there the Thumb was missing

EPILOGUE TO THE YOUNG DRAGON.

1 TOLD my tale of the Holy Thumb That split the Dragon asunder, 63 And my daughters made great eyes as they heard, Which were full of delight and wonder.

With listening lips and looks intent, There sat an eager boy, Who shouted sometimes, and elapp'd his hands, And could not sit still for joy.

But when I look'd at my Mistress's face, It was all too grave the while; And when I ceased, methought there was more Of reproof than of praise in her smile.

That smile I read aright, for thus Reprovingly said she,

"Such tales are meet for youthful ears, But give little content to me.

"From thee far rather would I hear Some sober, sadder lay,

Such as I oft have heard, well pleased Before those locks were gray."

"Nay, Mistress mine," I made reply, "The Autumn hath its flowers, Nor ever is the sky more gay Than in its evening hours.

"Our good old Cat, Earl Tomlemagne, Upon a warm Spring day, Even like a kitten at its sport, Is sometimes seen to play.

"That sense which held me back in youth From all intemperate gladness, That same good instinct bids me shun

Unprofitable sadness.

"Nor marvel you if I prefer Of playful themes to sing; The October grove hath brighter tints Than Summer or than Spring;

"For o'er the leaves, before they fall, Such hues hath Nature thrown, That the woods wear, in sunless days,

A sunshine of their own.

"Why should I seek to call forth tears? The source from whence we weep Too near the surface lies in youth; In age it lies too deep.

"Enough of foresight sad, too much Of retrospect, have I; And well for me that I sometimes Can put those feelings by;—

"From public ills, and thoughts that else Might weigh me down to earth, That I can gain some intervals For healthful, hopeful mirth; —

"That I can sport in tales which suit Young auditors like these, Yet, if I err not, may content The few I seek to please.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY; PREFACE.

- "I know in what responsive minds My lightest lay will wake A sense of pleasure, for its own, And for its author's sake
- " I know the eyes in which the light Of memory will appear;
- I know the lips, which, while they read, Will wear a smile sincere ; -
- "The hearts to which my sportive song The thought of days will bring,

When they and I, whose Winter now Comes on, were in our Spring.

"And I their well-known voices too, Though far away, can hear,

Distinctly, even as when in dreams They reach the inward ear.

"' There speaks the man we knew of yore," Well pleased I hear them say,

Such was he in his lighter moods, Before our heads were gray.

- "" Buoyant he was in spirit, quick Of fancy, blithe of heart, And Care, and Time, and Change have left Untouch'd his better part.'
- "Thus say my morning friends who now Are in the vale of years,

And I, save such as thus may rise, Would draw no other tears."

Ballads and Metrical Tales.

VOL. II.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE two volumes of this collection, which consist of Ballads and Metrical Tales, contain the kind; those which were written with most facility and most glee, and those upon which most time and pains were bestowed, according to the subject and the mode of treating it.

The Tale of Paraguay was published separately in 1825, having been so long in hand that the Dedication was written many years before the Poem was completed.

All for Love, and The Legend of a Cock and a Hen, were published together in a little volume in 1829.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

PREFACE.

ONE of my friends observed to me, in a letter, that many stories which are said to be founded on fact, have in reality been foundered on it. This is the case, if there be any gross violation committed, or ignorance betrayed, of historical manners in the prominent parts of a narrative wherein the writer affects to observe them; or when the ground-work is taken from some part of history so popular and well known that any mixture of fiction disturbs the sense of truth. Still more sn, if the subject be in itself so momentous that any alloy of invention must of necessity debase it; but most of all in thames drawn from Scripture, whether from the more familiar or the more awful portions; for when what is true is sacred, whatever may be added to it is so surely felt to be false, that it appears profane.

Founded on fact the Poem is, which is here committed to the world; hnt, whatever may be its defects, it is liable to none of thesa objections. The story is so singular, so simple, Author's earliest and latest productions of that pand, withal, so complete, that it must have been injured by any alteration. How faithfully it has been followed, the reader may perceive, if he chooses to consult the abridged translation of Dohrizhoffer's History of the Abipones; and for those who may be gratified with what Pinkerton has well called the lively singularity of the old man's Latin, the passage from the original is here subjoined.

> "Ad Australes fluvii Empalado ripas Hispanorum turma Herbæ Paraquaricæ conficiendæ operam dabat. Deficientibus jam arboribus, è quibus illa folia rescinduntur, exploratores tres emiserant, qui trans illud flumen arbores desideratas investigarent. Forte in tugurium, agrumque frumento Turcico coositum incidere, ex quo hanc sylvam barbarorum contuberniis scatere perperam arguebant. Hæc notitia tanto omnes perculit metu, ut suspenso, ad quem conducti fuerant, labora suis aliquamdiu in tuguriis laterent, ut limax intra concham. Din noctuque hostilis aggressio formidabatur. Ad liberandus se hoc terrore cursor ad S. Joachimi oppidum missus, qui, ut barbaros istic habitantes perquiramus, inventosque ad nostram transferamus coloniam flagitavit. Sina tergiversatione operam addixi meam. Licet trium hebdomadum itinere defunctus Nato servatori sacra die ex Mbaebera domum redierim, S. Joannis apostoli festo iter mox aggressus sum cum quadraginta Indorum meorum comitatu. Fluviis ob continuatum dies complures imbrem turgentibus profectio perardua nobis exstitit. Accepto ex Hispanorum tugurio viarum duce, trajectoque flumine Empalado sylvas onmes ad fluvii Mondag miri ripas usqua attentis oculis pervagati, tertio demum die, humano, quod deteximus, vestigio nos ducente ædiculam attigimus, ubi mater vetula, cum filio vicesimum, filinque quintum decimum annum agente annis abhinc multis degehat. Quibus in latebris Indi alii versarentur, à me rogata mater, neminem mortalium præter se, binasque proles, his in sylvis superesse, omnes, qui per hanc viciniam habitaverant, variolarum dira peste dudum extinctes fuisse, respondit. De dicti veritate ancipitem me dum observaret filius : tuto, ait, fidem adbibueris matri mes ista affirmati : nanqua ipsus ego uxoren mibi quesiturus romotissimas etiam sylvas identidem percursavi, quin tamen vel hominis umbram reperirem uspiam. Es! nature instinctu adolesceus barbarus, conjugium cum sorore sibi neutiquam licere, intellexit. Is multis post mensibus meo in oppido, nullos præter se homines illis in sylvis degere, iterum, iterumque ingenue mibi asseveravit. Idena confirmarunt Hispani, à quibus evocatus sum, ultre biennum in conquirenda herbu deia per illas sylvas occupati, non mediocri eum quæstu.

·· Vetulam matrem congruis argumentis hortatus sum ad meum ut oppidum, siquidem luberet, commigaret ocyus, se, suosque melion fortuna illic usuros, policitus. Lubenter invitationi meæ obtemperatam se, respondit; rem unicam migrationi sum obstare. Sunt mihi, ait, tres, quos coram vides, apri à prime ætate mansuefacti ; nos quoque euntes caniculi more sequentur. Hi, si campum oridum videant, vel extra sylvarum umbram à sole ordenti videantur, peribunt confestim, timeo. Hanc solicitudinem, quæso, animo ejicias tuo, reposui ; cerdi mihi fore chara animalcula, nil dubites. Sole æstuante umbram, ubi ubi demum, captabimus. Neque lacunæ, amnes, paludes, ubi refrigerentur tua hac corcula, usquam decrunt. Talibus delinite promissis se nobiscum ituram, spopondit. Et vero postridie iter ingressi, calendis Januarii incolumes oppidum attigimus, licet per viam binæ fulminibus, imbribusque horrendis fætæ tempestates nobis incubuerint, ac tigris rugitu assiduo totam per noctem minitans nobis iterum, iterumque propinquarit. Hispanos, queis matrem duabus cum prolibus per transennam exbibui, nihilque omuino Indorum sylvestrium in tota late vicinia superesse, significavi, timoris sui et puduit, et pœnituit. Autumaverant equidem sylvas Empalado, et Mondag fluminibus interjectas barbarorum habitationibus, perinde ut formicis, undique scatere. Jam de forma, habitudine, vivendi ratione, quam in matre, ejusque prolibus observaveram, dicendum obiter aliquid. Ab incunte ætate in Mondag litorihus, culicum, serpentum, eliorumque enimalculorum noxiorum frequentia oppide infectis consedere. Palmarum ramis tuguriolum definiebatur. Aqua semper lutulenta potum ; orborum fructus, elces, damulæ, euniculi, aves variæ, frumentum turcicum, radices arboris mandio dapem ; tela ex foliis caraquatà contexta vestitum, lectumque præbuere. Mel, quod exesis in arboribus passim prostat, inter cupedias numerabatur. Tabacæ, quam peti vocant Quaranii, fumum ex arundine, cui liqueum vasculum cacabi instar præfixum, diu noctuque bauserat vetula ; filius tabacæ folia in pulverem redacta ore mandere nunquam desiit. Concha ad lapidem exacuta pro cultro utebantur, interdum nrundine fissa. Adolescens matris, sororisque nutricius bina ferri frustilla, cultri olim confracti reliquias, pollicem lata, et pollice nil longiora, ligno, ceu manubrio inserta, cera, filoque circumligata cingulo gestabat suo. Hoc instrumento sagittas scitissime elaborare, decipulas è ligno ad capiendas alces facere, arberes, ubi mellis indicium viderat, perfodere, slisque id genus præstare solebat. Cum argille, è qua ollæ conficiuntur, nusquam esset, carnibus assis, uon coctis vescebantur per omnem vitam. Herbæ Paraquaricæ folia non nisi frigida perfudere, eum vas, quo aquam recepto more calefacerent, uon haberent. Ignem per affrictum celerem duorum lignellorum nôrunt promptissime elicere, omnium Americanorum more, quod alio loco exponam uberius. Ad restinguendam sitim nqua palustri, semperque, ni ab Austro frigido refrigeretur tantisper, tepida utebantur, cui adferendæ, asservandæque ingentes cucurbitæ pro cantharis serviunt. Ut, quam eurta illis domi fuerit suppellex, porro videas, de eorum vestitu facienda est mentio.

"Puellæ pariter breve reticulum, in quo noctibus cubabat, per diem vestitus instar fuerat. Cum nimis diaphana mibi videretur, ut verecundiæ censultum irem in Indorum, Hispanorumque præscutia, lintenm gossipinum, quo lotas manus terginus, illius nuditati tegendæ destinavi. Puella linteum, quod illi Indi mei porrexerant, iterum, iterumque complicatum papyri instar, capiti imposuit suo, e-u elypeum contra solis æstus; verum admonita ab Indis ille se involvit. Juveni quoque, ne verecundos offenderet eculos, perizomate linea, quibns in itineribus contra culieum morsus caput obvolveram meum, invito obtrusi. Prius celsissimas arbores simii velocitate scandebat, ut fructus ab apris tribus devorandos, inde decerperet. Caligis, veluti compedibus, impeditus vix gressum figere potuit. Tanta rerum penurio, frugalitate tanta cum in solitudine vietitarent semper, ac anachoretarum veterum rigores, asperitatesque experirentur, sorte sua contentissimos, tranquillo animo, corporeque morborum nescios illos suspexi, Ex quo palam fit, naturam paucis contentam esse ; erubescant illi, quibus saturandis, ornandisque totus orbis vix sufficit. Ex ultimis terree finibus, ex uceani, sylvarum, camporum, montium, tellurisque grencio, ex elementis omnibus, et unde non? avide petuntur subsidia, quæ ed comendum corpus, ad oblectandum palatum faciunt. Verum dum oblectare se, or-nareque putont, se onerant, opprimuutque. Dum delicias multiplicant suas, opes, viresque imminuunt quotidie, formæ venustatem labefactant, morbos adsciscunt sibi, mortemque accelerant eu infeliciores, quo fuerint delicatiores.

"Tres mei sylvicolæ, de quibus sermo, rituum Quaraniis barbaris propriorum vel immemores, vel contemptores fuerunt, Crinibus pessis sine ulla incisione, vel ligamine incedebant. Juveni nec labium pertusum, nec vertex psittacorum plumis coronatus. Matri, filizque inaures nulla, quamvis illa collo circumdederit monilis loco funiculum, è quo frustilla ligni pyramidati, set multi ponderis pendebant; è mutuo illorum collisu ad quenivis gressum strepitus edebatur. Primo conspectu interrogavi vetulam: num ad terrendos culices strepitans hoc monile è collo suspenderit? moxque globulorum vitreorum exquisiti coloris fascem ligneis bis ponderibus substitui. Mater, filiusque corpore crant procero, forma honesta; filia vultu tam candido, tamque eleganti, ut à Poetis Driadas inter Nymphas, Ilamadriadasque numerari, ab Europzo quovis pulchra dici tutò posset. Ililaritatem decoram affidilitati conjunctam præ se ferebat. Nostro adventu repentino minime terreri, recreari potius videbatur. Quaranica lingua loquentes nos liberales inter cachinnos risit, nos illam cadem respondentem. Cum enim extra aliorum Indorum societatem fratri, matrique duntaxat colloqueretur, verbis Quaranicis retentis quidem, ridicula quadam dialectus irrepsit. Sic quaruçi sol : yaçi luna: cheraçi ægroto dicimus reliqui, et illud e cum subjecta notula veluti s pronunciamus, quarassi, yassi, cherassi; illi quaratschi, yatschi, cheratschi dicebant. Juvenis præter matrem, sororemque nullam unquam vidit fæminam; neque præter patrem suum virum aliquem. Puella matrem duntaxat novit, nullam præterea fæminam. Virum præter fratrem suum ne eminus quidem conspexit, dum enim utero à matre gestabatur, pater ejus à tigride fuerat discerptus. Ad fructus seu humi, sen in arboribus natos conquirendos, ad ligna, foco necessaria, colligenda sylvam dumetis, arundinibus, spinisque horrentem solers puella peragravit quotidie, quibus pedes misere pertusos bahebat. Ne incomitata esset, psittacum exilem humero, simiolum brachio insidentem circumtulit plerumque, nullo tigridum metu, queis omnis illa vicinia abundat, vel me ipso teste oculato. Pridie ejus diei, quo in istorum contubernium incurrimus, parum abfuit, quin dormiens à propinqua jam tigride devorarer. Indi mei ejus rugitu expergefacti et hastis et admotis celeriter ignibus vitam servarunt meam. His in nemoribus, cum minor sit ferarum copia, tigrides fame stimulante ferociunt atrocius, avidiusque in obvios assiliunt homines, quam in campis, ubi, cum infinita vis pecorum omnis generis oberret, præda, famisque remedium, quoties lubet, illis in promptu est. Novi proselyti in oppido mox vestiti reliquorum more, et præ reliquis quotidiano cibo liberaliter refecti sunt. Curatum quoque à me diligenter, ad sylvas vicinas cum aliis ut excurrant frequentius, umbra, amænaque arborum, queis assueveraut, viriditate fruituri. Experientia equidem novimus, ut pisces extra aquam cito interenut, sic barbaros è sylvis ad oppida translatos sæpe contabescere, victus, aerisque mutatione, ac solis potissimum æstu corporum habitudinem perturbante, quippe quæ à pueritia bumidis, frigidiusculis, opacisque nemoribus assueverunt. Idem fuit matris, filii, filizque nostro in oppido fatum. Paneis ab adventu suo hebdomadibus gravedine, rheumateque totum corpus pervadente tentabantur omnes. His oculorum, auriumque dolor, ac haud multo post surditas successit. Mærora animi, cibique omnis fastidium vires absumpsit adeo, ut extrema demum macies, tabesque nullis remoduis proficientibus consequerctur. Aliquot mensilius languesceus mater scuicula, Christianæ disciplinæ rudimentis rite imbuta, sacroque tiacta latice prima occubuit, animo tam sereno, Divinisque | sime inopum curæ relinquuntur." - Dobrizhoffer de Abiponivoluntatibus acquiescente, ut illam ad superos transisse nil dubitaverim. Puella, que plena vigoris, venustatisque oppidum ingrediebatur, viribus exhausta, sui omnino jam dissimilis, floris instar paulatim marcescens vix ossibus hæsit, ac denique matrem ad tumulum secuta est, et nisi vehementissime fallor, ad Cœlum. Quid si cum regum sapientissimo dicamus : illam post sacrum, quo expiata est, baptisma consummatum in brevi explevisse tempora multa: placitam Deo fuisse annam illius : raptam esse, ne malitia mutaret intellectum ejus. Illud certissimum: qui innocentissimæ puellæ integritatem laudibus, funus præproperum lacrymis non prosequeretur, neminem in oppido fnisse. Frater illius tum superstes oandem, quâ mater, sororque extinctæ sunt, invaletudinem sensit, sed, quia robustior, superavit. Quin et ex morbillis, qui multas in oppido edebant strages, subinde convaluit adeo, ut confirmata penitus valetudine nihil illi porro metuendum esse videretur. Hilari erat animo, statis horis sacram adivit ædem, Christiana dogmata condidicit perdiligenter, morigerum, placidumque se præbuit omnibus, ac frugis optimæ indicia passim dedit. Ad periclitandam tamen illius in oppido perseverantiam tantisper differendum ejus baptismum existimavi. Hæc inter adest forte Indus Christianus, qui hunc catechumenum me jubente suis dudum habebat in ædibus, vir probus, et agri dives. Hic: mi Pater, ajebat, sylvicola noster equidem optime valet, verum milii videtur ad delirandum propendere. Nil sibi jam dolere, sed noctes sibi insomnes abire, inquit, spectabilem sibi matrem cum sorore adesse quot noctibus, et amica voce sibi dicere : .Ndecaray, ndecaray àuga, nderemimo a eyrupi ord yu yebi ndererahabone. Sine te, quæso, baptizari. Cræter tuam expectationem veniemus iterum te abducturæ. Hoc alloquio, hoc aspectu sibi somnum impediri, ait. Jubeas illum meo nomine, respondi, bono esse animo. Tristem matris, sororisque, quibuscum, per omnem ætatem versatus est, recordationem somniorum ejusmodi causam essa. Illas cœlo, ut quidem mihi verisimile, receptas nihil jam negotii his in terris habere. Hæc ego. Verum paucos post dies idem redit Indus, eadem, quæ nuper, refert, suamque de timenda catechumeni deliratione suspicionem confirmat. Aliquid rei aubesse, suspicatus actutum ejus in domum propero, sedentem deprehendo. Rogatus à me : qui se habeat? incolumen, doloris omnis expertem se esse ridens reponit, addit tamen : vigilando semper se nortem agere, quod mater, sororque identidem præsentes sibi offerantur, de baptismo accelerando moneant, et inopinate se abducendum, minentur; idcirco nullam se quietis partem capere posse, iterum, iterumque mihi affirmat candore, ut semper alias, summo. Somniari ab illo talia, atque adeo contemni posse, autumaveram ; memor tamen, somnia monitiones cœlestes, Dei oracula non raro exstitisse, uti divinis ex literis patet, in negotio tanti momenti visum mihi est catechumeni et securitati et tranquillitati consulere. De illins perseverantia, de religionis capitum scientia aat cortus præmissis interrogationibusque necessariis eum sacris undis mox ablui, Ludovici nomine insignivi. Iloc a ma præstitum 23 Junii, S. Joannis Baptistæ vigilia circa huram decimam antemeridianam. Eodem die circa vesperum nullo morbo, aut apoplexiæ indicio accedente placidissime expiravit.

" Hic eventus, universo oppido compertus, quemque juratus testari possum, in admirationem rapuit omnes. Lectoris arbitrio, quid de hoc sentiendum sit, relinquo. Nunquam tamen in animum inducere meum, potni, ut factum hoc fortuitum putarem. Eximiæ Dei elementiæ tribuo, quod hi tres sylvicolæ à me sint reperti in ignotis sylvarum latebris, quod mihi ad oppidum meum, ad amplectendam religionem so bortanti morem promptissime gesserint, quod sacra latice explati vitam clauserint. Optimum Numen in Cælo consociatos voluit, qui tot annos in sylva contubernales fuere incredibili morum integritate. Fateor, duleissimam mihi etiamnum accidere expeditionis ad flumen Empalado memoriam, quæ licet multis molestiis, per culisque mihi constiterit, ternis illis avlvicolis felicissima fuit; Hispanis utilissima : hi equidem à me facti certiores, quod per immensos illos nemorum tractus nulla porro Barbarorum vestigia extent, istic per triennium quæstu maximo multa centenariorum millia berbæ Paraquaricæ collegerunt. Neque id rarum, missionariorum, qui sylvas herbæ feraces barbaris liberant, sudore, ac periculo Hispanos ditescere mercatores. His tamen nunquam in mentem venit ad alendos, vestiendosque catechumenos vel micam, filumve contribuere. Ilforum corpora, ut animi missionariorum sæpiabus, Lib. Prodromus, pp. 97-106.

TO EDITH MAY SOUTHEY.

EDITH ! ten years are number'd, since the day, Which ushers in the eheerful month of May, To us by thy dear birth, my daughter dear, Was blest. Thou therefore didst the name partake

Of that sweet month, the sweetest of the year; But fitlier was it given thee for the sake Of a good man, thy father's friend sincere, Who at the font made answer in thy name. Thy love and reverence rightly may he claim, For elosely hath he been with me allied In friendship's holy bonds, from that first hour When in our yonth we met on Tejo's side; Bonds which, defying now all Fortune's power, Time hath not loosen'd, nor will Death divide.

A child more welcome, by indulgent Heaven Never to parents' tears and prayers was given: For searcely eight months at thy happy birth Had pass'd, since of thy sister we were left, -Our first-born and our only babe, bereft. Too fair a flower was she for this rude earth ! The features of her beauteous infancy Have faded from me, like a passing eloud, Or like the glories of an evening sky: And seldom hath my tongue pronounced her name

Since she was summon'd to a happier sphere. But that dear love, so deeply wounded then, I in my soul with silent faith sincere Devoutly cherish till we meet again.

I saw thee first with trembling thankfulness, O daughter of my hopes and of my fears! Press'd on thy senseless cheek a troubled kiss, And breathed my blessing over thee with tears. But memory did not long our bliss alloy ; For gentle nature, who had given relief, Wean'd with new love the chasten'd heart from grief;

And the sweet season minister'd to jey.

It was a season when their leaves and flowers The trees as to an Aretic summer spread; When chilling wintry winds and snowy showers, Which had too long usurp'd the vernal hours, Like spectres from the sight of morning, fled Before the presence of that joyous May; And groves and gardens all the live-long day Rung with the birds' loud love-songs. Over all, One thrush was heard from morn till even-fall;

A TALE OF PARAGUAY; DEDICATION; PROEM.

Thy Mother well remembers when she lay The happy prisoner of the genial bed, How from yon lofty poplar's topmost spray, At earliest dawn his thrilling pipe was heard; And when the light of evening died away, That blithe and indefatigable bird Still his redundant song of joy and love preferr'd.

How I have doted on thine infant smiles At morning, when thine eyes unclosed on mine; How, as the months in swift succession roll'd, I mark'd thy human faculties unfold, And watch'd the dawning of the light divine; And with what artifice of playful guiles Won from thy lips with still-repeated wiles Kiss after kiss, a reckoning often told, — Something I ween thou know'st; for thou hast seen

Thy sisters in their turn such fondness prove, And felt how childhood, in its winning years, The attemper'd soul to tenderness can move. This thou canst tell; but not the hopes and fears With which a parent's heart doth overflow, — The thoughts and cares inwoven with that love, —

Its nature and its depth, thou dost not, canst not know.

The years which since thy birth have pass'd away May well to thy young retrospect appear A measureless extent: — like yesterday To me, so soon they fill'd their short career. To thee discourse of reason have they brought, With sense of time and change; and something too

Of this precarious state of things have taught, Where Man abideth never in one stay; And of mortality a mournful thought. And I have seen thine eyes suffused in grief, When I have said that with autumnal gray The touch of eld hath mark'd thy father's head; That even the longest day of life is brief, And mine is falling fast into the yellow leaf.

Thy happy nature from the painful thought With instinct turns, and scarcely canst thou bear To hear me name the Grave. Thou knowest not How large a portion of my heart is there ! The faces which I loved in infancy Are gone; and bosom-friends of riper age, With whom I fondly talk'd of years to come, Summon'd before me to their heritage Are in the better world, beyond the tomb. And I have brethren there, and sisters dear, And dearer babes. I therefore needs must dwell Often in thought with those whom still I love so well.

Thus wilt thou feel in thy maturer mind; When grief shall be thy portion, thou wilt find Safe consolation in such thoughts as these, — A present refuge in affliction's hour. And if indulgent Heaven thy lot should bless With all imaginable happiness, Here shalt thou have, my child, beyond all power Of chance, thy holiest, surest, best delight. Take therefore now thy Father's latest lay, — Perhaps his last; — and treasure in thine heart The feelings that its musing strains convey. A song it is of life's declining day, Yet meet for youth. Vain passions to excite, No strains of morbid sentiment 1 sing, Nor tell of idle loves with ill-spent breath; A reverent offering to the Grave I bring, And twine a garland for the brow of Death.

Keswick, 1314.

PROEM.

THAT was a memorable day for Spain, When on Pamplona's towers, so basely won, The Frenchmen stood, and saw upon the plain Their long-expected succors hastening on: Exultingly they mark'd the brave array, And deen'd their leader should his purpose gain, Though Wellington and England barr'd the way. Anon the hayonets glitter'd in the sun, And frequent cannon flash'd, whose lurid light Redden'd through sulphurous smoke; fast volleying round

Roll'd the war-thunders, and with long rebound Backward from many a rock and cloud-capt height

In answering peals Pyrene sent the sound. Impatient for relief, toward the fight The hungry garrison their eye-balls strain : Vain was the Frenchman's skill, his valor vain ; And even then, when eager hope almost Had moved their irreligious lips to prayer, Averting from the fatal scene their sight, They breathed the execrations of despair. For Wellesley's star hath risen ascendant there, Once more he drove the host of France to flight, And triumph'd once again for God and for the right.

That was a day, whose influence far and wide The struggling nations felt; it was a joy Wherewith all Europe rung from side to side. Yet hath Pamplona seen, in former time, A moment big with mightier consequence, Affecting many an age and distant clime. That day it was which saw in her defence, Contending with the French before her wall, A noble soldier of Guipuzcoa fall, Sore hurt, but not to death. For when long care Restored his shatter'd leg, and set him free, He would not brook a slight deformity, As one who, being gay and debonnair, In courts conspicuous as in camps must be : So he, forsooth, a shapely boot must wear: And the vain man, with peril of his life,

Laid the recover'd limb again beneath the knife.

CANTO 1.

Long time upon the bed of pain he lay, Whiling with books the weary hours away; And from that circumstance and this vain man A train of long events their course began, Whose term it is not given us yet to see. Who hath not heard Loyola's sainted name, Before whom Kings and Nations bow'd the knee? Thy aonals, Ethiopia, might proclaim What deeds arose from that prolific day; And of dark plots might shuddering Europe tell. But Science, too, her trophies would display; Faith give the martyrs of Japan their fame; And Charity on works of love would dwell In California's dolorous regions drear; And where, amid a pathless world of wood, Gathering a thousand rivers on his way, Huge Orellana rolls his affluent flood; And where the happier sons of Paraguay, By gentleness and pious art subdued, Bow'd their meek heads beneath the Jesuits' sway,

And lived and died in filial servitude.

I love thus uncontroll'd, as in a dream, To muse upon the course of human things; Exploring sometimes the remotest springs, Far as tradition lends one goiding gleam; Or following, upon Thought's audacious wings, Into Futurity, the endless stream.
But now, in quest of no ambitious height, I go where Truth and Nature lead my way, And ceasing here from desultory flight, In measured strains I tell a Tale of Paraguay.

CANTO I.

JENNER! forever shall thy honor'd name Among the children of mankind be bless'd, Who by thy skill hast tanght us how to tame One dire disease, — the lamentable pest Which Africa sent forth to scourge the West, As if in vengeance for her sable brood So many an age remorselessly oppress'd. For that most fearful malady subdued Receive a poet's praise, a father's gratitude.

Fair promise be this triumph of an age When Man, with vain desires no longer blind, And wise, though late, his only war shall wage, Against the miseries which afflict mankind, Striving with virtuous heart and strenuous mind Till evil from the earth shall pass away. Lo, this his glorious destiny assign'd ! For that bless'd consummation let us pray,

And trust in fervent faith, and labor as we may,

3.

The hideous malady which lost its power When Jenner's art the dire contagion stay'd, Among Columbia's sons, in fatal hour, Across the wide Atlantic wave convey'd, Its fiercest form of pestilence display'd: Where'er its deadly course the plague began, Vainly the wretched sufferer look'd for aid; Parent from child, and child from parent ran, For tyrannous fear dissolved all natural bonds of man.

A feeble nation of Guarani race,

Thinn'd by perpetual wars, but unsubdued,

Had taken up at length a resting-place

- Among those tracts of lake, and swamp, and wood,
- Where Mondai, issuing from its solitude, Flows with slow stream to Empalado's hed.

It was a region desolate and rude;

- But thither had the horde for safety fled,
- And being there conceal'd, in peace their lives they led.

There had the tribe a safe asylum found Amid those marshes wide and woodlands dense, With pathless wilds and waters spread around, And labyrinthine swamps, a sure defence From human foes, — but not from pestilence. The spotted plague appear'd, that direst ill; How brought among them none could tell, or whence;

The mortal seed had lain among them still, And quicken'd now to work the Lord's mysterious will.

Alas, it was no medicable grief

Which herbs might reach! Nor could the juggler's power,

With all his antic nummeries, bring relief.

Faith might not aid him in that ruling hour,

Hunself a victim now. The dreadful stour

None could escape, nor aught its force assuage.

The marriageable maiden had her dower

- From death; the strong man sunk beneath its rage,
- And death cut short the thread of childhood and of age.

7.

No time for customary mourning now; With hand close-clinch'd to pluck the rooted hair,

To beat the bosom, on the swelling brow Inflict redoubled blows, and blindly tear The checks, indenting bloody furrows there, The deep-traced signs indelible of woe;

Then to some crag, or bank abrupt, repair,

And giving grief .ts scope, infuriate throw The impatient body thence upon the earth below.

Devices these by poor, weak nature taught, Which thus a change of suffering would obtain; And flying from intolerable thought, And piereing recollections, would full fain Distract itself by sense of fleshly pain

From anguish that the soul must else endure. Easier all outward torments to sustain, Than those heart-wounds which only time can cure.

And He in whom alone the hopes of man are sure.

None sorrow'd here ; the sense of woe was sear'd, When every one endured his own sore ill. The prostrate sufferers neither hoped nor fear'd; The body labor'd, but the heart was still :---So let the conquering malady fulfil Its fatal course, rest cometh at the end ! Passive they lay with neither wish nor will For aught but this; nor did they long attend That welcome boon from death, the never-failing friend.

Who is there to make ready now the pit, The house that will content from this day forth Its easy tenant? Who in vestments fit Shall swathe the sleeper for his bed of earth, Now tractable as when a babe at birth? Who now the ample funeral urn shall knead, And, burying it beneath his proper hearth, Deposit there with careful hands the dead, And lightly then relay the floor above his head?

11.

Unwept, unshrouded, and unsepulehred, The hammock, where they hang, for windingsheet

And grave suffices the deserted dead: There from the armadillo's searching feet Safer than if within the tomb's retreat. The carrion birds obscene in vain essay To find that quarry: round and round they beat The air, but fear to enter for their prey, And from the silent door the jaguar turns away.

But nature for her universal law

Hath other, surer instruments in store,

Whom from the haunts of men no wonted awe Withholds as with a spell. In swarms they pour From wood and swamp; and when their work is o'er,

On the white bones the mouldering roof will fall; Seeds will take root, and spring in sun and shower;

And Mother Earth ere long with her green pall, Resuming to herself the wreck, will cover all.

Oh! better thus with earth to have their part, Than in Egyptian catacombs to lie, Age after age preserved by horrid art, In ghastly image of humanity!

Strange pride that with corruption thus would vie !

And strange delusion that would thus maintain The fleshly form, till cycles shall pass by, And in the series of the eternal chain,

The spirit come to seek its old abode again.

One pair alone survived the general fate; Left in such drear and mournful solitude, That death might seem a preferable state. Not more depress'd the Arkite patriarch stood, When landing first on Ararat he view'd, Where all around the mountain summits lay, Like islands seen and the boundless flood: Nor our first parents more forlorn than they, Through Eden when they took their solitary way.

15.

Alike to them it seem'd, in their despair, Whither they wander'd from the infected spot. Chance might direct their steps : they took no care;

Come well or ill to them, it matter'd not!

Left as they were in that unhappy lot,

- The sole survivors they of all their race,
- They reck'd not when their fate, nor where, nor what,

In this resignment to their hopeless case, Indifferent to all choice or circumstance of place.

That palsying stupor past away ere long, And as the spring of health resumed its power, They felt that life was dear, and hope was strong. What marvel? 'Twas with them the morning hour,

When bliss appears to be the natural dower Of all the creatures of this joyous earth;

And sorrow, fleeting, like a vernal shower, Scarce interrupts the current of our mirth;

Such is the happy heart we bring with us at birth.

17.

Though of his nature and his boundless love Erring, yet tutor'd by instinctive sense, They rightly deem'd the Power who rules above Had saved them from the wasting pestilence. That favoring power would still be their defence : Thus were they by their late deliverance taught To place a child-like trust in Providence,

And in their state forlorn they found this thought Of natural faith with hope and consolation fraught.

And now they built themselves a leafy bower, Amid a glade, slow Mondai's stream beside, Screen'd from the southern blast of piercing power;

Not like their native dwelling, long and wide, By skilful toil of numbers edified,

The common home of all, their human nest,

- Where threescore hammocks, pendant side by side,
- Were ranged, and on the ground the fires were dress'd;

Alas, that populous hive hath now no living guest !

A few firm stakes they planted in the ground, Circling a narrow space, yet large enow; These, strongly interknit, they closed around With basket-work of many a pliant bough. The roof was like the sides; the door was low, And rude the hut, and trimm'd with little care, For little heart had they to dress it now; Yet was the humble structure fresh and fair, And soon its inmates found that love night sojourn there.

Quiara could recall to mind the course Of twenty summers; perfectly he knew Whate'er his fathers taught of skill or force. Right to the mark his whizzing lance he threw, And from his bow the unerring arrow flew With fatal aim: and when the laden hee Buzz'd by him in its flight, he could pursue Its path with certain ken, and follow free Until he traced the hive in hidden bank or tree.

Of answering years was Monnema, nor less Expert in all her sex's household ways. The Indian weed she skilfully could dress; And in what depth to drop the yellow maize She knew, and when around its stem to raise The lighten'd soil; and well could she prepare Its ripen'd seed for food, her proper praise; Or in the embers turn with frequent care

And how to macerate the bark she knew, And draw apart its beaten fibres fine, And bleaching them in sun, and air, and dew, From dry and glossy filaments entwine, With rapid twirl of hand, the lengthening line; Next interknitting well the twisted thread, In many an even mesh its knots combine,

And shape in tapering length the pensile bed, Light hammock there to haug beneath the leafy shed.

Time had been when, expert in works of clay, She lent her hands the swelling urn to mould, And fill'd it for the appointed festal day With the beloved beverage which the bold Quaff'd in their triumph and their joy of old; The fruitful cause of many an uproar rude, When, in their drunken bravery uncontroll'd, Some bitter jest awoke the dormant feud,

And wrath, and rage, and strife, and wounds, and death ensued.

These occupations were gone by: the skill Was useless now, which once had been her pride. Content were they, when thirst impell'd, to fill The dry and hollow gourd from Mondai's side; The river from its sluggish bed supplied A draught for repetition all unmeet; Howbeit the bodily want was satisfied; No feverish pulse ensued, nor ireful heat;

Their days were undisturb'd, their natural sleep was sweet.

She, too, had learn'd in youth how best to trim The honor'd Chief for his triumphal day, And covering with soft gums the obedient limb And body, then with feathers overlay, In regular hues disposed, a rich display. Well pleased the glorious savage stood, and cyed The growing work ; then, vain of his array, Look'd with complacent frown from side to side, Stalk'd with elater step, and swell'd with statelier pride.

Feasts and carousals, vanity and strife, Could have no place with them in solitude To break the tenor of their even life. Quiara day by day his game pursued, Searching the air, the water, and the wood, With hawk-like eye, and arrow sure as fate; And Monnema prepared the hunter's food : Cast with him here in this forlorn estate, In all things for the man was she a fitting mate.

The Moon had gather'd oft her monthly store Of light, and oft in darkness left the sky, Since Monnema a growing burden bore Of life and hope. The appointed weeks go by; And now her hour is come, and none is nigh To help: but human help she needed none. A few short throes endured with scarce a cry, Upon the bank she laid her new-born son, Then slid into the stream, and bathed, and all was done.

Might old observances have there been kept, Then should the husband to that pensile bed, Like one exhausted with the birth, have crept, And laying down in feeble guise his head, For many a day been nursed and dieted With tender care, to childing mothers due. Certes a custom strange, and yet far spread Through many a savage tribe, howe'er it grew, And once in the old world known as widely as the new.

29.

This could not then be done; he might not lay The bow and those unerring shafts aside; Nor through the appointed weeks forego the prey,

Still to be sought amid those regions wide, None being there who should the while provide That lonely household with their needful food. So, still Quiara through the forest plied

His daily task, and in the thickest wood Still laid his snares for hirds, and still the chase pursued.

But seldom may such thoughts of mingled joy A father's agitated breast dilate, As when he first beheld that infant boy. Who hath not proved it, ill can estimate

CANTO I. A

The feeling of that stirring hour, — the weight Of that new sense, the thoughtful, pensive bliss. In all the changes of our changeful state, Even from the cradle to the grave, I wis, The heart doth undergo no change so great as this.

31.

A deeper and unwonted feeling fill'd These parents, gazing on their new-born son. Already in their busy hopes they build On this frail sand. Now let the seasons run, And let the natural work of time be done With them, — for unto them a child is born ; And when the hand of Death may reach the one, The other will not now be left to mourn solitary wratch all uttack forders

A solitary wretch, all utterly forlorn.

Thus Monnema and thus Quiara thought, Though each the melancholy thought repress'd; They could not choose but feel, yet utter'd not The human feeling, which in hours of rest Often would rise, and fill the boding breast With a dread foretaste of that mournful day, When, at the inexorable Power's behest, The unwilling spirit, called perforce away,

Must leave, forever leave, its dear connatural clay.

Link'd as they were, where each to each was all, How might the poor survivor hope to bear That heaviest loss which one day must befall, Nor sink beneath the weight of his despair? Scarce could the heart even for a moment dare That miserable time to contemplate,

When the dread Messenger should find them there,

From whom is no escape, — and reckless Fate, Whom it had bound so close, forever separate.

Lighter that burden lay upon the heart When this dear babe was born to share their lot; They could endure to think that they must part.

Then too a glad consolatory thought Arose, while gazing on the child they sought With hope their dreary prospect to delude, Till they almost believed, as fancy tanght, How that from them a tribe should spring renew'd,

To people and possess that ample solitude.

35.

Such hope they felt, but felt that whatsoe'er The undiscoverable to come might prove, Unwise it were to let that bootless care Disturb the present hours of peace and love. For they had gain'd a happiness above The state which in their native horde was known : No outward canses were there here to move Discord and alien thoughts ; being thus alone

From all mankind, their hearts and their desires were one.

Different their love in kind and in degree From what their poor depraved forefathers knew, With whom degenerate instincts were left free To take their course, and blindly to pursue, Unheeding they the ills that must ensue, The bent of brute desire. No moral tie Bound the hard husband to his servile crew Of wives; and they the chance of change might try,

All love destroy'd by such preposterous liberty.

Far other tie this solitary pair Indissolubly bound; true helpmates they, In joy or grief, in weal or woe to share, In sickness or in health, through life's long day; Aud reassuming in their hearts her sway Benignant Nature made the burden light. It was the Woman's pleasure to obey, The Man's to ease her toil in all he might; So each in serving each obtain'd the best delight.

38.

And as connubial, so parental love Obey'd unerring Nature's order here, For now no force of impious custom strove Against her law; — such as was wont to sear The unhappy heart with usages severe, Till harden'd mothers in the grave could lay Their living babes with no compunctious tear; So monstrous men become, when from the way Of primal light they turn through heathen paths

Of primal light they turn through heathen paths astray.

Deliver'd from this yoke, in them henceforth The springs of natural love may freely flow: New joys, new virtues with that happy birth Are born, and with the growing infant grow. Source of our purest happiness below Is that benignant law which hath entwined Dearest delight with strongest duty, so That in the healthy heart and righteous mind Ever they co-exist, inseparably combined.

40.

Oh! bliss for them when in that infant face They now the unfolding faculties descry, And fondly gazing, trace — or think they trace — The first faint speculation in that eye, Which hitherto hath roll'd in vacancy ! Oh! bliss in that soft countenance to seek Some mark of recognition, and espy The quiet smile which in the innocent cheek

Of kindness and of kind its consciousness doth speak!

For him, if born among their native tribe,

Some haughty name his parents had thought good,

As weening that where with they should ascribe The strength of some fierce tenant of the wood,

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

CANTO II.

The water, or the aërial solitude, Jaguar or vulture, water-wolf or snake, The beast that prowls abroad in search of blood, Or reptile that within the treacherous brake Waits for the prey, upcoil'd, its hunger to aslake.

42.

Now soften'd as their spirits were by love, Abhorrent from such thoughts they turn'd away; And with a happier feeling, from the dove, They named the child Yeruti. On a day, When, smiling at his mother's breast in play, They in his tones of murmuring pleasure heard A sweet resemblance of the stoek-dove's lay, Fondly they named him from that gentle bird; And soon such happy use endear'd the fitting word.

Days past, and moons have wax'd and waned, and still

This dovelet, nestled in their leafy bower, Obtains increase of sense, and strength, and will, As in due order many a latent power Expands, — humanity's exalted dower; And they, while thus the days serenely fled, Beheld him flourish like a vigorous flower, Which, lifting from a genial soil its head,

By seasonable suns and kindly showers is fed.

Erelong the cares of helpless babyhood To the next stage of infancy give place, That age with sense of conscions growth endued, When every gesture hath its proper grace: Then come the unsteady step, the tottering pace; And watchful hopes and emulous thoughts appear;

The imitative lips essay to trace

Their words, observant both with eye and ear, In mutilated sounds which parents love to hear.

45.

Serenely thus the seasons pass away; And, oh! how rapidly they seem to fly With those for whom to-morrow, like to-day, Glides on in peaceful uniformity! Five years have since Yeruti's birth gone by, Five happy years;—and ere the Moon which then

Hung like a Sylphid's light canoe on high Should fill its circle, Monnema, again,

Laying her burden down, must bear a mother's pain.

46.

Alas, a keener pang, before that day, Must by the wretched Monnema be borne ! In quest of game Quiara went his way To roam the wilds, as he was wont, one morn; She look'd in vain at eve for his return. By moonlight, through the midnight solitude, She sought him; and she found his garment torn, His bow and useless arrows in the wood,

Marks of a jaguar's feet, a broken spear, and blood.

CANTO II.

O THOU who, listening to the Poet's song, Dost yield thy willing spirit to his sway, Look not that I should painfully prolong The sad narration of that fatal day With tragic details; all too true the lay. Nor is my purpose e'er to entertain The heart with nseless grief; but, as I may, Blend in my calm and meditative strain Consolatory thoughts, the balm for real pain.

O Youth or Maiden, whosoe'er thou art, Safe in my guidance may thy spirit be; I wound not wantonly the tender heart; And if sometimes a tear of sympathy Should rise, it will from bitterness be free — Yea, with a healing virtue be endued, As thou, in this true tale, shalt hear from me Of evils overcome, and grief subdued, And virtues springing up like flowers in solitude.

3.

The unhappy Monnema, when thus bereft, Sunk not beneath the desolating blow. Widow'd she was; but still her child was left; For him must she sustain the weight of woe, Which else would in that hour have laid her low. Nor wish'd she now the work of death complete; Then only doth the soul of woman know Its proper strength, when love and duty meet;

Invincible the heart wherein they have their seat.

The seamen who, upon some coral reef, Are cast amid the interminable main, Still cling to life, and, hoping for relief, Drag on their days of wretchedness and pain. In turtle-shells they hoard the scanty rain, And eat its flesh, sun-dried for lack of fire, Till the weak body can no more sustain Its wants, but sinks beneath its sufferings dire; Most miserable man who sees the rest expire !

5.

He lingers there while months and years go by, And holds his hope though months and years have past;

And still at morning round the farthest sky, And still at eve his eagle glance is cast, If there he may behold the far-off mast Arise, for which he hath not ceased to pray. And if perchance a ship should come at last, And bear him from that disual bank away,

He blesses God that he hath lived to see that day.

So strong a hold hath life upon the sonl, Which sees no dawning of eternal light, But subject to this mortal frame's control, Forgetful of its origin and right,

CANTO II.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

507

Content in bondage dwells and utter night. By worthier ties was this poor mother bound To life; even while her grief was at the height, Then in maternal love support she found, And in maternal cares a healing for her wound.

7.

For now her hour is come : a girl is born, Poor infant, all unconscious of its fate, How passing strange, how utterly forlorn ! The genial season served to mitigate, In all it might, their sorrowful estate, Supplying to the mother, at her door, From neighboring trees, which bent beneath their weight,

A full supply of fruitage now mature; So in that time of need their sustenance was sure.

Nor then alone, but alway did the Eye Of Mercy look upon that lonely bower. Days past, and weeks; and months and years went by, And never evil thing the while bad power To enter there. 'The boy, in sun and shower,

Rejoicing in his strength to youthhed grew; And Mooma, that beloved girl, a dower Of gentleness from bounteous nature drew, With all that should the heart of womankind imbue.

The tears which o'er her infancy were shed Profuse, resented not of grief alone : Maternal love their bitterness allay'd, And, with a strength and virtue all its own, Sustain'd the breaking heart. A look, a tone, A gesture of that innocent babe, in eyes With saddest recollections overflown, Would sometimes make a tender smile arise,

Like sunshine opening through a shower in vernal skies.

No looks but those of tenderness were found To turn upon that helpless infant dear; And as her sense unfolded, never sound Of wrath or discord brake upon her ear. Her soul its native purity sincere Possess'd, by no example here defiled; From envious passions free, exempt from fear, Unknowing of all ill, amid the wild Beloving and beloved she grew, a happy child.

11.

Yea, where that solitary bower was placed, Though all unlike to Paradise the scene, (A wide circumference of woodlands waste,) Something of what in Eden might have been Was shadow'd there imperfectly, I ween, In this fair creature: safe from all offence, Expanding like a shelter'd plant screne, Evils that fret and stain being far from thence,

Her heart in peace and joy retain'd its innocence.

At first the infant to Yeruti proved A cause of wonder and disturbing joy. A stronger tie than that of kindred moved His inmost being, as the happy boy Felt in his heart of hearts, without alloy, The sense of kind: a fellow creature she, In whom, when now she ceased to be a toy For tender sport, his soul rejoiced to see Connatural powers expand, and growing sympathy 13.

For her he cull'd the fairest flowers, and sought Throughout the woods the earliest fruits for her. The cayman's eggs, the honeycomb he brought To this beloved sister, — whatsoe'er, To his poor thought, of delieate or rare The wilds might yield, solicitous to find. They who affirm all natural acts declare

Self-love to be the ruler of the mind,

Judge from their own mean hearts, and foully wrong mankind.

14.

Three souls in whom no selfishness had place Were here; three happy souls, which undefiled, Albeit in darkness, still retain'd a trace Of their celestial origin. The wild Was as a sanctuary where Nature smiled Upon these simple children of her own, And, cherishing whate'er was meek and mild, Call'd forth the gentle virtues, such alone,

The evils which evoke the stronger being unknown.

What though at birth we bring with us the seed Of sin, a mortal taint, — in heart and will Too surely felt, too plainly shown in deed, — Our fatal heritage; yet are we still

The children of the All-Merciful; and ill

They teach, who tell us that from hence must flow

God's wrath, and then, his justice to fulfil, Death everlasting, never-ending woe: O miserable lot of man if it were so !

I miserable lot of man if it were so:

16.

Falsely and impiously teach they who thus Our heavenly Father's holy will misread! In bounty hath the Lord created us, In love redeem'd. From this authentic creed Let no bewildering sophistry impede The heart's entire assent, for God is good. Hold firm this faith, and, in whatever need, Doubt not but thou wilt find thy soul endued With all-sufficing strength of heavenly fortitude !

17.

By nature peceable and frail are we, Easily beguiled; to vice, to error prone; But apt for virtue too. Humanity Is not a field where tares and thorns alone Are left to spring; good seed hath there been sown With no unsparing hand. Sometimes the shoot ls choked with weeds, or withers on a stone; But in a kindly soil it strikes its root,

And flourisheth, and bringeth forth abundant fruit.

Love, duty, generous feeling, tenderness, Spring in the uncontaminated mind; And these were Mooma's natural dower. Nor less

Had liberal Nature to the boy assign'd, Happier herein than if among mankind Their lot had fallen, — oh, certes happier here ! That all things tended still more close to bind Their earliest ties, and they from year to year Retain'd a childish heart, fond, simple, and sincere.

They had no sad reflection to alloy The calm contentment of the passing day, Nor foresight to disturb the present joy. Not so with Monnema; albeit the sway Of time had reach'd her heart, and worn away, At length, the grief so deeply seated there, The future often, like a burden, lay Upon that heart, a cause of secret care

And melancholy thought; yet did she not despair.

Chance from the fellowship of human kind Had cut them off, and chance might reunite. On this poor possibility her mind Reposed; she did not for herself invite The unlikely thought, and cherish with delight The dream of what such change might haply bring;

Gladness with hope long since had taken flight From her; she felt that life was on the wing,

And happiness, like youth, has here no second spring.

So were her feelings to her lot composed, That to herself all change had now been pain. For Time upon her own desires had closed; But in her children as she lived again, For their dear sake she learnt to entertain A wish for human intercourse renew'd; And oftentimes, while they devour'd the strain, Would she beguile their evening solitude

With stories strangely told and strangely understood.

Little she knew, for little had she seen, And little of traditionary lore in inthe of traditionary for

Had reach'd her ear; and yet to them, I ween, Their mother's knowledge seem'd a boundless store.

A world it opened to their thoughts, yea, more, — Another world beyond this mortal state.

Bereft of her, they had indeed been poor;

Being left to animal sense, degenerate;

Mere creatures, they had sunk below the beasts' estate.

The human race, from her they understood, Was not within that lonely hut confined, But distant far beyond their world of wood Were tribes and powerful nations of their kind; And of the old observances which bind People and chiefs, the ties of man and wife, The laws of kin religiously assign'd, Rites, customs, scenes of riotry and strife, And all the strange vicissitudes of savage life.

Wondering they listen to the wondrous tale; But no repining thought such tales excite: Only a wish, if wishes might avail, Was haply felt, with juvenile delight, To mingle in the social dance at night, Where the broad moonshine, level as a flood, O'erspread the plain, and in the silver light, Well pleased, the placid elders sat and view'd

The sport, and seem'd therein to feel their youth renew'd.

But when the darker scenes their mother drew, What crimes were wrought when drunken fury raged;

What miseries from their fatal discord grew,

When horde with horde in deadly strife engaged; The rancorous hate with which their wars they waged;

The more unnatural horrors which ensued,

When, with inveterate vengeance unassuaged, The victors round their slaughter'd captives stood, [blood;-

And habes were brought to dip their little hands in 26.

Horrent they heard; and with her hands the Maid Press'd her eyes close, as if she strove to hlot The hateful image which her mind portray'd. The Boy sat silently, intent in thought; Then, with a deep-drawn sigh, as if he sought To heave the oppressive feeling from his breast, Complacently compared their harmless lot

With such wild life, outrageous and unblest; Securely thus to live, he said, was surely best.

On tales of blood they could not bear to dwell; From such their hearts abhorrent shrunk in fear. Better they liked that Monnema should tell Of things unseen; what Power had placed them here,

And whence the living spirit came, and where It past, when parted from this mortal mould; Of such mysterious themes with willing ear They heard, devoutly listening while she told Strangely-disfigured truths, and fables feign'd of old.

By the Great Spirit man was made, she said; His voice it was which peal'd along the sky, And shook the heavens, and fill'd the earth with Alone and inaccessible, on high [dread.

CANTO II.

CANTO II.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

He had his dwelling-place eternally, And Father was his name. This all knew well; But none had seen his face; and if his eye Regarded what upon the earth befell, Or if he cared for man, she knew not :-- who could tell?

But this, she said, was sure — that after death There was reward, and there was punishment: And that the evil-doers, when the breath Of their injurious lives at length was spent, Into all noxious forms abhorr'd were sent, Of beasts and reptiles; so retaining still Their old propensities, on evil bent, They work'd where'r they might their wicked will,

The natural foes of man, whom we pursue and kill.

Of better spirits, some there were who said That in the grave they had their place of rest. Lightly they laid the earth upon the dead, Lest in its narrow tenement the guest Should suffer underneath such load oppress'd. But that death surely set the spirit free, Sad proof to them poor Monnema address'd, Drawn from their father's fate; no grave had he Wherein his soul might dwell. This therefore could not be.

31.

Likelier they taught who said that to the Land Of Souls the happy spirit took its flight, A region underneath the sole command Of the Good Power; by him for the upright Appointed and replenish'd with delight; A land where nothing evil ever came, Sorrow, nor pain, nor peril, nor affright, Nor change, nor death; but there the human frame.

Untouch'd by age or ill, continued still the same.

Winds would not pierce it there, nor heat and cold Grieve, nor thirst parch, and hunger pine; but there

The sun by day its even influence hold With genial warmth, and thro' the unclouded air The moou upon her nightly journey fare: The lakes and fish-full streams are never dry; Trees ever green perpetual fruitage bear; And, wheresoe'er the hunter turns his eye,

Water, and earth, and heaven, to him their stores supply.

33.

And once there was a way to that good land, For in mid-earth a wondrous Tree there grew, By which the adventurer might, with foot and hand,

From branch to branch his upward course pursue;

An easy path, if what were said he true,

Albeit the ascent was long; and when the height Was gain'd, that blissful region was in view, Wherein the traveller safely might alight, And roam abroad at will, and take his free delight.

O happy time, when ingress thus was given To the upper world, and at their pleasure they Whose hearts were strong might pass from Earth to Heaven

By their own act and choice! In evil day Mishap had fatally cut off that way, And none may now the Land of Spirits gain, Till from its dear-loved tenement of clay,

Violence or age, infirmity and pain,

Divorce the soul which there full gladly would remain.

35.

Such grievons loss had by their own misdeed Upon the unworthy race of men been brought. An aged woman once, who could not speed In fishing, earnestly one day besonght

Her countrymen, that they of what they canght A portion would upon her wants bestow. They set her hunger and her age at nought,

And still to her entreaties answered no !

And mock'd her, till they made her heart with rage o'erflow.

But that Old Woman, by such wanton wrong Inflamed, wenthurrying down; and in the pride Of magic power, wherein the crone was strong, Her human form infirm she laid aside. Better the Capiguara's limbs supplied

A strength accordant to her fierce intent;

These she assumed, and, burrowing deep and wide

Beneath the Tree, with vicious will, she went, To inflict upon mankind a lasting punishment.

37.

Downward she wrought her way, and all around Laboring, the solid earth she undermined, And loosen'd all the roots; then from the ground Emerging, in her hatred of her kind, Resumed her proper form, and breathed a wind Which gather'd like a tempest round its head: Eftsoon the lofty Tree its top inclined, Uptorn with horrible convulsion dread, and erect helf the world its might market law

And over half the world its mighty wreck lay spread.

But never scion sprouted from that Tree, Nor seed sprang up; and thus the easy way, Which had till then for young and old been free, Was closed upon the sons of men for aye. The mighty ruin moulder'd where it lay, Till not a trace was left; and now in sooth Almost had all remembrance past away. This from the elders she had heard in youth; Some said it was a tale, and some a very truth.

CANTO II.

Nathless departed spirits at their will Could from the Land of Souls pass to and fro; They come to us in sleep when all is still, Sometimes to warn against the impending blow, Alas! more oft to visit us in woe: Though in their presence there was poor relief! And this had sad experience made her know; For when Quiara came, his stay was brief, And, waking then, she felt a freshen'd sense of grief.

Yet to behold his face again, and hear His voice, though painful, was a deep delight; It was a joy to think that he was near, To see him in the visions of the night,— To know that the departed still requite The love which to their memory still will cling : And though he might not bless her waking sight With his dear presence, 'twas a blessed thing That sleep would thus sometimes his actual image bring.

41.

Why comes he not to me? Yeruti cries; And Mooma, echoing with a sigh the thought, Ask'd why it was that to her longing eyes No dream the image of her father brought; Nor Monnema to solve that question sought In vain, content in ignorance to dwell; Perhaps it was because they knew him not; Perhaps — but sooth she could not answer well; What the departed did, themselves alone could tell.

42.

What one tribe held another disbelieved, For all concerning this was dark, she said, Uncertain all, and hard to be received. The dreadful race, from whom their fathers fled, Boasted that even the Country of the Dead Was theirs, and where their Spirits chose to go, The ghosts of other men retired in dread Before the face of that victorious foe;

No better, then, the world above, than this below !

What then, alas! if this were true, was death? Only a mournful change from ill to ill! And some there were who said the living breath Would ne'er be taken from us by the will Of the Good Father, but continue still To feed with life the mortal frame he gave, Did not mischance' or wicked witchcraft kill; — Evils from which no carc avail'd to save, And whereby all were sent to fill the greedy grave.

44.

In vain to counterwork the baleful charm By spells of rival witchcraft was it sought; Less potent was that art to help than harm. No means of safety old experience brought: Nor better fortune did they find who thought From Death, as from some living foe, to fly; For speed or subterfuge avail'd them nought; But wheresoe'er they fled they found him nigh: None ever could elude that unseen enemy.

45.

Bootless the boast, and vain the proud intent Of those who hoped, with arrogant display Of arms and force, to scare him from their tent, As if their threatful shouts and fierce array Of war could drive the Invisible away ! Sometimes, regardless of the sufferer's groan, They dragg'd the dying out, and as a prey Exposed him, that, content with him alone, Death might depart, and thus his fate avert their

Depart he might, — but only to return In quest of other victims, soon or late; When they who held this fond belief, would learn, Each by his own inevitable fate, That, in the course of man's uncertain state, Death is the one and only certain thing. Oh folly then to fly or deprecate That which, at last, Time, ever on the wing, Certain as day and night, to weary age must bring !

47.

While thus the Matron spake, the youthful twain Listen'd in deep attention, wistfully; Whether with more of wonder or of pain Uneath it were to tell. With steady eye Intent they heard; and when she paused, a sigh Their sorrowful foreboding seem'd to speak: Questions to which she could not give reply Yeruti ask'd; and for that Maiden meek, Involuntary tears ran down her quiet cheek.

A different sentiment within them stirr'd, When Monnema recall'd to mind, one day, Imperfectly, what she had sometimes heard In childhood, long ago, the Elders say, — Almost from memory had it pass'd away, — How there appear'd amid the woodlands men Whom the Great Spirit sent there to convey His gracious will; but little heed she then Had given, and like a dream it now recurr'd again.

49.

But these young questioners, from time to time, Call'd up the long-forgotten theme anew. Strange men theywere, from some remotest clime, She said, of different speech, uncouth to view, Having hair upon their face, and white in hue. Across the World of waters wide they came Devotedly the Father's work to do, And seek the Red Men out, and in his name His merciful laws, and love, and promises proclaim.

50.

They served a Maid more beautiful than tongue Could tell, or heart conceive. Of human race, All heavenly as that Virgin was, she sprung; But for her beauty and celestial grace, Being one in whose pure elements no trace Had e'er inhered of sin or mortal stain,

The highest Heaven was now her dwelling-place; There as a Queen divine she held her reign, And there in endless joy forever would remain.

Her feet upon the crescent Moon were set, And, moving in their order round her head, The Stars compose her sparkling coronet. There at her breast the Virgin Mother fed A Babe divine, who was to judge the dead; Such power the Spirit gave this awful Child: Severe he was, and in his anger dread, Yet alway at his Mother's will grew mild, So well did he obey that Maiden undefiled.

52

Sometimes she had descended from above To visit her true votaries, and requite Such as had served her well. And for her love, These bearded men, forsaking all delight, With labor long and dangers infinite, Across the great blue waters came, and sought The Red Men here, to win them, if they might, From bloody ways, rejoiced to profit aught, Even when with their own lives the benefit was bought.

For trusting in this heavenly Maiden's grace, It was for them a joyful thing to die, As men who went to have their happy place With her, and with that Holy Child, on high, In fields of bliss above the starry sky, In glory, at the Virgin Mother's feet; And all who kept their lessons faithfully An everlasting guerdon there would meet, When Death had led their souls to that celestial seat.

54.

On earth they offer'd, too, an easy life To those who their mild lessons would obey, Exempt from want, from danger, and from strife; And from the forest leading them away, They placed them underneath this Virgin's sway, A numerous fellowship, in peace to dwell; Their high and happy office there to pay Devotions due, which she requited well,

Their heavenly Guardian she in whatsoe'er befell.

Thus Monnema remember'd, it was told By one who, in his hot and headstrong youth, Had left her happy service; but when old, Lamented oft, with unavailing ruth,

- And thoughts which, sharper than a serpent's tooth,
- Pierced him, that he had changed that peaceful place

For the fierce freedom and the ways uncouth Of their wild life, and lost that Lady's grace, Wherefore he had no hope to see in Heaven her face.

56.

And she remember'd, too, when first they fled For safety to the farthest solitude Before their cruel foes, and lived in dread That thither, too, their steps might be pursued By those old enemies athirst for blood, How some among them hoped to see the day When these beloved messengers of good To that lone hiding-place might find the way, And them to their abode of blessedness convey.

57.

Such tales excited in Yeruti's heart A stirring hope that haply he might meet Some minister of Heaven; and many a part, Untrod before, of that wild wood retreat, Did he, with indefatigable feet, Explore; yet ever from the fruitless quest Return'd at evening to his native seat By daily disappointment undepress'd, —

So buoyant was the hope that fill'd his youthful breast.

At length the hour approach'd that should fulfil His harmless heart's desire, when they shall see Their fellow-kind, and take for good or ill

The fearful chance,—for such it needs must be,— Of change from that entire simplicity.

Yet wherefore should the thought of change appall?

Grief it perhaps might bring, and injury, And death; — but evil never can befall The ristrong for the Fue of Herron is over a

The virtuous, for the Eye of Heaven is over all.

CANTO III.

AMD those marshy woodlands far and wide, Which spread beyond the soaring vulture's eye, There grew, on Empalado's southern side, Groves of that tree whose leaves adust supply The Spaniards with their daily luxury; A beverage whose salubrious use obtains Through many a land of mines and slavery, Even over all La Plata's sea-like plains,

And Chili's mountain realm, and proud Peru's domains.

But better for the injured Indian race Had woods of manchineel the land o'erspread: Yea, in that tree so bless'd by Nature's grace A direr curse had they inherited, Than if the Upas there had rear'd its head, And sent its baleful scions all around, Blasting where'er its effluent force was shed, In air and water, and the infected ground, All things wherein the breath or sap of life is found.

3.

The poor Guaranies dreamt of no such ill, When, for themselves in miserable hour, The virtues of that leaf, with pure good will, They taught their unsuspected visitor, New in the land as yet. They learnt his power Too soon, which law nor conscience could restrain;

A fearless, but inhuman conqueror,

Heart-harden'd by the accursed lust of gain :

O fatal thirst of gold ! O fonl reproach for Spain !

For gold and silver had the Spaniards sought, Exploring Paragnay with desperate pains; Their way through forests, axe in hand, they wrought;

Drench'd from above by unremitting rains, They waded over inundated plains, Forward by hope of plunder still allured; So they might one day count their golden gains, They cared not at what cost of sin procured;

All dangers they defied, all sufferings they endured.

Barren alike of glory and of gold That region proved to them; nor would the soil Unto their unindustrious hands unfold Harvests, the fruit of peace, and wine and oil, The treasures that repay contented toil With health and weal; treasures that with them bring No guilt for priest and penance to assoil,

Nor with their venom arm the awaken'd sting Of conscience at that hour when life is vanishing.

But, keen of eye in their pursuit of gain, The conquerors look'd for lucre in this tree: An annual harvest there might they attain, Without the cost of annual industry. 'Twas but to gather in what there grew free, And share Potosi's wealth. Nor thence alone, But gold in glad exchange they soon should see From all that once the Incas called their own,

Or where the Zippa's power or Zaque's laws were known.

For this, in fact though not in name a slave, The Indian from his family was torn; And droves on droves were sent to find a grave In woods and swamps, by toil severe outworn, No friend at hand to succor or to mourn, In death unpitied, as in life unbless'd. O miserable race, to slavery born! Yet when we look beyond this world's unrest,

More miserable then the oppressors than the oppress'd.

Often had Kings essay'd to check the ill By edicts not so well enforced as meant; A present power was wanting to fulfil Remote authority's sincere intent. To Avarice, on its present purpose bent, The voice of distant Justice spake in vain; False magistrates and priests their influence lent The accursed thing for luere to maintain:

O fatal thirst of gold ! O foul reproach for Spain !

O foul reproach ! but not for Spain alone, But for all lands that bear the Christian name ! Where'er commercial slavery is known; O shall not Justice, trumpet-tongued, proclaim The foul reproach, the black offence, the same ? Hear, guilty France ! and thou, O England, hear ! Thou who hast half redeem'd thyself from shame, When slavery from thy realms shall disappear, Then from this guilt, and not till then, wilt thou be clear.

10.

Uncheck'd in Paraguay it ran its course, Till all the gentler children of the land Well nigh had been consumed without remorse. The bolder tribes meantime, whose skilful hand Had tamed the horse, in many a warlike band Kept the field well with bow and dreadful spear. And now the Spaniards dared no more withstand Their force, but in their towns grew pale with fear, If the Mocobio or the Abipon drew near.

11.

Bear witness, Chaco, thou, from thy domain With Spanish blood, as erst with Indian, fed ! And Corrientes, by whose church the slain Were piled in heaps, till for the gather'd dead One common grave was dug, one service said ! Thou too, Parana, thy sad witness bear

From shores with many a mournful vestige spread,

And monumental crosses here and there,

And monumental names that tell where dwellings were !

12.

Nor would with all their power the Kings of Spain,

Austrian or Bourbon, have at last avail'd This torrent of destruction to restrain, And save a people every where assail'd By men before whose face their courage quail'd, But for the virtuous agency of those Who with the Cross alone, when arms had fail'd, Achieved a peaceful triumph o'er the foes, And gave that weary land the blessings of repose.

For whensoe'er the Spaniards felt or fear'd An Indian enemy, they call'd for aid Upon Loyola's sons, now long endear'd To many a happy tribe, by them convey'd From the open wilderness or woodland shade, In towns of happiest polity to dwell. Freely these faithful ministers essay'd The ardnous enterprise, contented well

If with success they sped, or if as martyrs fell.

And now it chanced some traders, who had fell'd The trees of precions foliage far and wide On Empalado's shore, when they beheld The inviting woodlands on its northern side, Cross'd thither in their quest, and there espied

513

Yeruti's footsteps: searching then the shade, At length a lonely dwelling they descried, And at the thought of hostile hordes dismay'd, To the nearest mission sped, and ask'd the Jesuit's aid.

15.

That was a call which ne'er was made in vain Upon Loyola's sons. In Paraguay Much of injustice had they to complain, Much of neglect; but faithful laborers they In the Lord's vineyard, there was no delay When summon'd to his work. A little band Of converts made them ready for the way; Their spiritual father took a Cross in hand

To be his staff, and forth they went to search the land.

He was a man of rarest qualities, Who to this barbarous region had confined A spirit with the learned and the wise Worthy to take its place, and from mankind Receive their homage, to the immortal mind Paid in its just inheritance of fame. But he to humbler thoughts his heart inclined ; From Gratz, amid the Styrian hills, he came, And Dobrizhofferwas the good man's honor'd name.

17.

It was his evil fortune to behold The labors of his painful life destroy'd; His flock, which he had hrought within the fold, Dispersed; the work of ages render'd void, And all of good that Paraguay enjoy'd By blind and suicidal Power o'erthrown. So he the years of his old age employ'd, A faithful chronicler in handing down Names which he loved, and things well worthy to

And thus, when exiled from the dear-loved scene, In proud Vienna he beguiled the pain Of sad remembrance; and the Empress Queen, That great Teresa, she did not disdain In gracious mood sometimes to entertain Discourse with him both pleasurable and sage; And sure a willing ear she well might deign To one whose tales may equally engage

The wondering mind of youth, the thoughtful heart of age.

But of his native speech because well nigh Disuse in him forgetfulness had wrought, In Latin he composed his history — A garrulous, but a lively tale, and fraught With matter of delight and food for thought. And if he could in Merlin's glass have seen By whom his tomset to speak our tongue were taught,

The old man would have felt as pleased, I ween, As when he won the car of that great Empress Queen. 20.

Little he deem'd when with his Indian band He through the wilds set forth upon his way, A Poet then unborn, and in a land Which had proscribed his order, should one day Take up from thenee his moralizing lay, And shape a song that, with no fiction dress'd, Should to his worth its grateful tribute pay, And sinking deep in many an English breast, Foster that faith divine that keeps the heart at rest.

Behold him on his way! the hreviary Which from his girdle hangs, his only shield; That well-known habit is his panoply, That Cross, the only weapon he will wield: By day, he bears it for his staff afield, By night, it is the pillow of his bed: No other lodging these wild woods can yield Than earth's hard lap, and rustling overhead A canopy of deep and tangled boughs far spread.

22.

Yet may they not without some cautious care Take up their inn content upon the ground. First it behoves to clear a circle there, And trample down the grass and plantage round, Where many a deadly reptile might be found, Whom with its bright and comfortable heat The flame would else allure : such plagues abound In these thick woods, and therefore must they beat [feet.

The earth, and trample well the herbs beneath their

And now they heap dry reeds and broken wood: The spark is struck, the crackling fagots blaze, And cheer that unaccustom'd solitude. Soon have they made their frugal meal of maize; In grateful adoration then they raise The evening hymn. How solemn in the wild That sweet accordant strain wherewith they praise

The Queen of Angels, merciful and mild! Hail, holiest Mary! Maid, and Mother undefiled.

Blame as thou mayst the Papist's erring creed, But not their salutary rite of even ! The prayers that from a pious soul proceed, Though misdirected, reach the ear of Heaven. Us, unto whom a purer faith is given, As our best birthright it behoves to hold The precious charge ; but, oh, beware the leaven Which makes the heart of charity grow cold ! We own one Shepherd, we shall be at last one fold.

25.

Thinkest thou the little company who here Pour forth their hymn devout at close of day, Feel it no aid that those who hold them dear, At the same hour the self-same homage pay, Commending them to Heaven when far away? That the sweet bells are heard in solemn chime Through all the happy towns of Paragnay,

Where now their brethren in one point of time Join in the general prayer, with sympathy sublime?

That to the glorious Mother of their Lord Whole Christendom that hour its homage pays? From court and cottage that with one accord Ascends the universal strain of praise? Amid the crowded city's restless ways, One reverential thought pervades the throng; The traveller on his lonely road obeys The sacred hour, and as he fares along, In spirit hears and joins his household's even-song.

What if they think that every prayer enroll'd Shall one day in their good account appear; That guardian Angels hover round and fold Their wings in adoration while they hear; Ministrant Spirits through the ethereal sphere Waft it with joy, and to the grateful theme, Well pleased, the Mighty Mother bends her ear? A vain delusion this we rightly deem:

Yet what they feel is not a more illusive dream.

That prayer perform'd, around the fire reclined Beneath the leafy canopy they lay Their limbs: the Indians soon to sleep resign'd; And the good Father with that toilsome day Fatigued, full fain to sleep, — if sleep he may, — Whom all tormenting insects there assail; More to be dreaded these than beasts of prey Against whom strength may cope, or skill prevail;

But art of man against these enemies must fail.

Patience itself, that should the sovereign cure For ills that touch ourselves alone, supply, Lends little aid to one who must endure This plague : the small tormentors fill the sky, And swarm about their prey ; there he must lie And suffer while the hours of darkness wear ; At times he utters with a deep-drawn sigh Some name adored, in accents of despair Breathed sorrowfully forth, half murmur and half prayer.

Welcome to him the earliest gleam of light; Welcome to him the earliest sound of day; That, from the sufferings of that weary night Released, he may resume his willing way, Well pleased again the perils to essay 'Of that drear wilderness, with hope renew'd: Success will all his labors overpay;

A quest like his is cheerfully pursued ; The heart is happy still that is intent on good.

And now where Empalado's waters creep Through low and level shores of woodland wide, They come; prepared to cross the sluggish deep, An ill-shaped coracle of hardest hide, Ruder than ever Cambrian fisher plied Where Towey and the salt-sea waters meet, The Indians launch; they steady it and guide, Winning their way with arms and practised feet, While in the tottering boat the Father keeps his seat.

For three long summer days on every side They search in vain the sylvan solitude; The fourth a human footstep is espied, And through the mazes of the pathless wood With hound-like skill and hawk-like eye pursued;

For keen upon their pious quest are they As e'er were hunters on the track of blood. Where softer ground or trodden herbs hetray The slightest mark of man, they there explore the way.

More cautious when more certain of the trace, In silence they proceed; not like a crew Of jovial hunters, who the joyous chase With hound and horn in open field pursue, Cheering their way with jubilant halloo, And hurrying forward to their spoil desired, The panting game before them, full in view: Humaner thoughts this little band inspired, et with a houre as high their cantle hearts upper

Yet with a hope as high their gentle hearts were fired.

Nor is their virtuous hope devoid of fear; The perils of that enterprise they know; Some savage horde may have its fastness here,

A race to whom a stranger is a foe,

Who not for friendly words, nor proffer'd show Of gifts, will peace or parley entertain.

If by such hands their blameless blood should flow

To serve the Lamb who for their sins was slain, Blessed indeed their lot, for so to die is gain!

35.

Them, thus pursuing where the track may lead, A human voice arrests upon their way;

They stop, and thither, whence the sounds procced,

All eyes are turn'd in wonder, — not dismay, For sure such sounds might charm all fear away; No nightingale whose brooding mate is nigh, From some sequester'd bower at close of day, No lark rejoicing in the orient sky,

Ever pour'd forth so wild a strain of melody.

The voice which through the ringing forest floats Is one which having ne'er been taught the skill Of marshalling sweet words to sweeter notes, Utters all nnpremeditate, at will, A modulated sequence, loud and shrill, Of inarticulate and long-breathed sound, Varying its tones with rise, and fall, and trill, Till all the solitary woods around

With that far-piercing power of melody resound.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

CANTO III.

37.

In mute astonishment attent to hear, As if by some enclantment held, they stood, With bending head, fix'd eye, and eager ear, And hand upraised in warning attitude To check all speech or step that might intrude On that sweet strain. Them leaving, thus spellbound,

A little way alone into the wood

The Father gently moved toward the sound, Treading with quiet feet upon the grassy ground.

Anon advancing thus the trees between, He saw beside her bower the songstress wild, Not distant far, himself the while unseen. Mooma it was, that happy maiden mild, Who, in the sunshinc, like a careless child Of nature, in her joy was caroling. A heavier heart than his it had beguiled So to have heard so fair a creature sing The strains which she had learnt from all sweet birds of spring.

For these had been her teachers, these alone; And she, in many an emulous essay, At length into a descant of her own Had blended all their notes, a wild display Of sounds in rich, irregular array; And now as blithe as bird in vernal bower, Pour'd in full flow the unexpressive lay, Rejoicing in her consciousness of power,

But in the inborn sense of harmony yet more.

In joy had she begun the ambitious song, With rapid interchange of sink and swell; And sometimes high the note was rais'd, and long Produced, with shake and effort sensible, As if the voice exulted there to dwell; But when she could no more that pitch sustain, So thrillingly attuned the cadence fell, That with the music of its dying strain She moved herself to tears of pleasurable pain.

41.

It might be deem'd some dim presage possess'd The virgin's soul; that some mysterious sense Of change to come, upon her mind impress'd, Had then call'd forth, e'er she departed thence, A requiem to their days of innocence. For what thou losest in thy native shade There is one change alone that may compense, O Mooma, innocent and simple maid, Only one change, and it will not be long delay'd!

42.

When now the Father issued from the wood Into that little glade in open sight, Like one entranced, beholding him, she stood; Yet had she more of wonder than affright, Yet less of wonder than of dread delight, When thus the actual vision came in view; For instantly the maiden read aright Wherefore he came; his garb and beard she knew;

All that her mother heard had then indeed been true.

Nor was the Father fill'd with less surprise; He too strange fancies well might entertain, When this so fair a creature met his eyes. He might have thought her not of mortal strain; Rather, as bards of yore were wont to feign, A nymph divine of Mondai's seeret stream; Or haply of Diana's woodland train; For in her beauty Mooma such might seem, Being less a child of earth than like a poet's dream.

44.

No art of barbarous ornament had searr'd And stain'd her virgin limbs, or 'filed her face; Nor ever yet had evil passion marr'd In her sweet countenance the natural grace Of innocence and youth; nor was there trace Of sorrow, or of hardening want and care. Strange was it in this wild and savage place, Which seem'd to be for beasts a fitting lair,

Thus to behold a maid so gentle and so fair.

45.

Across her shoulders was a hammock flung ; By night it was the maiden's bed, by day Her only garment. Round her as it hung, In short, unequal folds of loose array, The open meshes, when she moves, display Her form. She stood with fix'd and wondering eyes;

And trembling like a leaf upon the spray, Even for excess of joy, with eager cries

She call'd her mother forth to share that glad surprise.

46.

At that unwonted call, with quicken'd pace, The matron hnrried thither, half in fear. How strange to Monnema a stranger's face ! How strange it was a stranger's voice to hear ! How strangely to her disaccustom'd ear Came even the accents of her native tongue ! But when she saw her countrymen appear, Tears for that unexpected blessing sprung, And once again she felt as if her heart were young.

47.

Soon was her melancholy story told And glad consent unto that Father good Was given, that they to join his happy fold Would leave with him their forest solitude. Why comes not now Yeruti from the wood? Why tarrieth he so late this blessed day? They long to see their joy in his renew'd, And look impatiently toward his way, And think they hear his step, and chide his long delay.

48.

He comes at length, a happy man, to find His only dream of hope fulfill'd at last.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

CANTO IV

The sunshine of his all-believing mind There is no doubt or fear to overcast; No chilling forethought checks his bliss; the past Leaves no regret for him, and all to come ls change, and wonder, and delight. How fast Hath busy fancy conjured up a sum

Of joys unknown, whereof the expectance makes him dumb !

O happy day, the Messenger of Heaven Hath found them in their lonely dwelling-place ! O happy day, to them it would be given To snare in that Eternal Mother's grace, And one day see in Heaven her glorious face, Where Angels round her mercy-throne adore ! Now shall they mingle with the human race, Sequester'd from their fellow-kind no more ;

O joy of joys supreme ! O bliss for them in store !

Full of such hopes this night they lay them down,
But, not as they were wont, this night to rest.
Their old tranquillity of heart is gone;
The peace wherewith till now they have been blest.
Hath taken its departure. In the breast

Fast-following thoughts and busy faucies throng; Their sleep itself is feverish, and possess'd With dreams that to the wakeful mind belong;

To Mooma and the youth then first the night seem'd long.

51.

Day comes, and now a first and last farewell To that fair bower within their native wood, Their quiet nest till now. The bird may dwell Henceforth in safety there, and rear her brood, And beasts and reptiles undisturb'd intrude; Reckless of this, the simple tenants go, Emerging from their peaceful solitude,

To mingle with the world, --- but not to know Its crimes, nor to partake its cares, nor feel its woe.

CANTO IV.

The bells rung blithely from St. Mary's tower When in St. Joachin's the news was told That Dobrizhoffer from his quest that hour Drew nigh: the glad Guaranies, young and old, Throng through the gate, rejoicing to behold His face again; and all with heartfelt glee Welcome the Pastor to his peaceful fold, Where so beloved amid his flock was he, That this return was like a day of jubilee.

How more than strange, how marvellous a sight To the new-comers was this multitude ! Something like fear was mingled with affright, When they the busy scene of turmoil view'd; Wonder itself the sense of joy subdued, And with its all-unwonted weight oppress'd These children of the quiet solitude; And now and then a sigh that heaved the breast

Unconsciously bewray'd their feeling of unrest.

Not more prodigious than that little town Seem'd to these comers, were the pomp and power

To us of ancient Rome in her renown;

Nor the elder Babylon, or ere that hour

When her high gardens, and her cloud-capt tower,

And her broad walls before the Persian fell; Nor those dread fanes on Nile's forsaken shore, Whose ruins yet their pristine grandeur tell,

Wherein the demon Gods themselves might deign to dwell.

But if, all humble as it was, that scene Possess'd a poor and uninstructed mind With awe, the thoughtful spirit, well 1 ween, Something to move its wonder there might find, Something of consolation for its kind, Some hope and earnest of a happier age, When vain pursuits no more the heart shall blind, But Faith the evils of this earth assuage, And to all souls assure their heavenly heritage.

Yes; for in history's mournful map, the eye On Paraguay, as on a sunny spot, May rest complacent: to humanity, There, and there only, hath a peaceful lot Been granted, by Ambition troubled not, By Avarice undebased, exempt from care, By perilous passions undisturb'd. And what If Glory never rear'd her standard there, Nor with her clarion's blast awoke the slumbering air?

6.

Content and cheerful Piety were found Within those humble walls. From youth to age The simple dwellers paced their even round Of duty, not desiring to engage

Upon the busy world's contentious stage, Whose ways they wisely had been train'd to dread:

Their inoffensive lives in pupilage Perpetually, but peacefully they led, From all temptation saved, and sure of daily bread.

They on the Jesuit, who was nothing loath, Reposed alike their conscience and their cares; And he, with equal faith, the trust of both Accepted and discharged. The bliss is theirs Of that entire dependence that prepares Entire submission, let what may befall; And his whole careful course of life declares

That for their good he holds them thus in thrall, Their Father and their Friend, Priest, Ruler, all in all.

CANTO IV.

Food, raiment, shelter, safety, he provides;
No forecast, no anxieties have they;
The Jesuit governs, and instructs, and guides;
Their part it is to honor and obey,
Like children under wise parental sway.
All thoughts and wishes are to him confess'd;
And when, at length, in life's last, weary day,
In sure and certain hope they sink to rest,
By him their cycs are closed, by him their hurial blest.

Deem not their lives of happiness devoid, Though thus the years their course obscurely fill; In rural and in household arts employ'd, And many a pleasing task of pliant skill, For emulation here unmix'd with ill, Sufficient scope was given. Each had assign'd His proper part, which yet left free the will; So well they knew to mould the ductile mind By whom the scheme of that wise order was combined 10.

It was a land of priestcraft, but the Priest Believed himself the fahles that he taught: Corrupt their forms, and yet those forms at least Preserv'd a salutary faith that wrought, Maugre the alloy, the saving end it sought. Benevolence had gain'd such empire there, That even superstition had been bronght An aspect of humanity to wear,

And make the weal of man its first and only care.

Nor lack'd they store of innocent delight, Music and song, and dance and proud array, Whate'er might win the ear, or charm the sight; Banners and pageantry in rich display Brought forth upon some Saint's high holyday, The altar dress'd, the church with garlands hung, Arches and floral bowers beside the way, And festal tables spread for old and young, Gladness in every heart, and mirth on every tongue.

12.

Thon who despisest so debased a fate, As in the pride of wisdom thou mayst call These meek, submissive Indians' low estate, Look round the world, and see where over all Injurious passions hold mankind in thrall, How barbarous Force asserts a ruthless reign, Or Mammon, o'er his portion of the ball, Hath learn'd a baser empire to maintain — Mammon, the god of all who give their souls to gain.

Behold the fraudful arts, the covert strife, The jarring interests that engross mankind; The low pursuits, the selfish aims of life; Studies that weary and contract the mind, That bring no joy, and leave no peace behind; And Death approaching to dissolve the spell! The immortal soul, which hath so long been blind,

Recovers then clear sight, and sees too well The error of its ways, when irretrievable.

Far happier the Guaranies' humble race, With whom, in dutiful contentment wise, The gentle virtues had their dwelling-place. With them the dear, domestic charities Sustain'd no blight from fortune; natural ties There suffer'd no divorcement, save alone That which in course of nature might arise; No artificial wants and ills were known;

15.

Obedience in its laws that takes delight Was theirs; simplicity that knows no art; Love, friendship, grateful duty in its height; Meekness and truth, that keep all strife apart, And faith and hope which elevate the heart Upon its heavenly heritage intent. Poor, erring, self-tormentor that thou art, O Man! and on thine own undoing bent, Obarewith canst thou he heat if not with thes Wherewith canst thou be blest, if not with these content?

Mild pupils in submission's perfect school, Two thousand souls were gather'd here, and here Beneath the Jesnit's all-embracing rule They dwelt, obeying him with love sincere, That never knew distrust, nor felt a fear, Nor anxious thought which wears the heart away. Sacred to them their laws, their Ruler dear; Humbler or happier none could be than they, Who knew it for their good in all things to obey.

17.

The Patron Saint, from whom their town was named,

Was that St. Joachin, who, legends say, Unto the Saints in Limbo first proclaim'd The Advent. Being permitted, on the day That Death enlarged him from this mortal clay, His daughter's high election to behold, Thither his soul, glad herald, wing'd its way,

And to the Prophets and the Patriarchs old The tidings of great joy and near deliverance told.

There on the altar was his image set, The lamp before it burning night and day, And there was incensed, when his votaries met Before the sacred shrine, their beads to say, And for his fancied intercession pray, Devoutly as in faith they bent the knee. Such adoration they were taught to pay; Good man, how little had he ween'd that he Should thus obtain a place in Rome's idolatry!

19.

But chiefly there the Mother of our Lord, His blessed daughter, by the multitude Was for their special patroness adored.

But there they dwelt as if the world were all their own.

Amid the square on high her image stood, Clasping the Babe in her beatitude, The Babe Divine on whom she fix'd her sight; And in their hearts, albe the work was rude, It rais'd the thought of all-commanding might, Combin'd with boundless love and mercy infinite.

20.

To this great family the Jesuit brought flis new-found children now; for young and old He deem'd alike his children while he wrought For their salvation, — seeking to unfold The saving mysteries in the creed enroll'd, To their slow minds, that could but ill conceive The import of the mighty truths he told. But errors they have none to which they cleave, And whatsoe'er he tells they willingly believe.

21.

Safe from that pride of ignorance were they That with small knowledge thinks itself full wise. How at believing aught should these delay, When every where new objects met their eyes To fill the soul with wonder and surprise? Not of itself, but by temptation bred, In man doth impious unbelief arise; It is our instinct to believe and dread; God bids us love, and then our faith is perfected.

Quick to believe, and slow to comprehend, Like children, unto all the teacher tanght Submissively an easy ear they lend: And to the font at once he might have brought These converts, if the Father had not thought Theirs was a case for wise and safe delay, Lest lightly learn'd might lightly be forgot; And meanwhile due instruction day by day

Would to their opening minds the sense of truth convey.

Of this they reck'd not whether soon or late; For overpowering wonderment possess'd Their faculties; and in this new estate Strange sights, and sounds, and thoughts, well nigh oppress'd

Their sense, and raised a turmoil in the breast Resenting less of pleasure than of pain; And sleep afforded them no natural rest, But in their dreams, a mixed, disorder'd train,

The busy scenes of day disturb'd their hearts again.

Even when the spirit to that secret wood Return'd, slow Mondai's silent stream beside, No longer there it found the solitude Which late it left: strange faces were descried, Voices, and sounds of music far and wide, And buildings seem'd to tower amid the trees, And forms of men and beasts on every side, As ever-wakeful fancy hears and sees

All things that it had heard, and seen, and more than these.

For in their sleep strange forms deform'd they saw

Of frightful fiends, their ghostly enemies, And souls who must abide the rigorous law Weltering in fire, and there with dolorous cries Blaspheming roll around their hopeless eyes; And those who doom'd a shorter term to bear In penal flames, look upward to the skies, Seeking and finding consolation there, And feel, like dew from heaven, the precious aid of prayer.

26.

And Angels who around their glorions Queen In adoration bent their heads abased; And infant faces in their dreams were seen Hovering on cherub-wings; and Spirits placed To be their guards invisible, who chased With fiery arms their fiendish foes away; Such visions overheated fancy traced, Peopling the night with a confused array

That made its hours of rest more restless than the day.

To all who from an old erratic course Of life, within the Jesuit's fold were led, The change was perilous. They felt the force Of habit, when, till then in forests bred, A thick, perpetual umbrage overhead, They came to dwell in open light and air. This ill the Fathers long had learnt to dread, And still devised such means as might prepare The new-reclaim'd unhurt this total change to bear.

All thoughts and occupations to commute, To change their air, their water, and their food, And those old habits suddenly uproot, Conform'd to which the vital powers pursued Their functions, — such mutation is too rude For man's fine frame unshaken to sustain. And these poor children of the solitude Began erelong to pay the bitter pain

That their new way of life brought with it in its train.

On Monnema the apprehended ill Came first; the matron sunk beneath the weight Of a strong malady, whose force no skill In healing might avert or mitigate. Yet, happy in her children's safe estate, Her thankfulness for them she still express'd; And yielding then complacently to fate, With Christian rites her passing hour was bless'd, And with a Chistian's hope she was consign'd to rest.

They laid her in the Garden of the Dead; Such as a Christian burial-place should be Was that fair spot, where every grave was spread With flowers, and not a weed to spring was free; But the pure blossoms of the orange-tree Dropp'd like a shower of fragrance on the bier; And palms, the type of immortality, Planted in stately colonnades appear,

That all was verdant there throughout the unvarying year.

Nor ever did irreverent feet intrude Within that sacred spot; nor sound of mirth, Unseemly there, profane the solitude, Where solemuly committed earth to earth, Waiting the summons for their second birth, Whole generations in Death's peaceful fold Collected lay; green innocence, ripe worth, Youth full of hope, and age whose days were told,

Compress'd alike into that mass of mortal mould.

32.

Mortal, and yet at the Arehangel's voice To put on immortality. That call Shall one day make the sentient dust rejoice; These bodies then shall rise, and cast off all Corruption, with whate'er of earthly thrall Had clogg'd the heavenly image, then set free. How then should Death a Christian's heart appall?

Lo, Heaven for you is open ; — enter, ye Children of God, and heirs of his eternity!

This hope supported Mooma, hand in hand When with Yeruti at the grave she stood. Less even now of death they understand Than of the joys eternal that ensued; The bliss of infinite beatitude To them had been their teacher's favorite theme, Wherewith their hearts so fully were imbued,

That it the sole reality might seem,

Life, death, and all things else, a shadow or a dream.

34.

Yea, so possess'd with that best hope were they, That if the heavens had opened overhead, And the Archangel with his trump that day To judgment had convoked the quick and dead, They would have heard the summons not with dread, But in the joy of faith that knows no fear; Come, Lord! come quickly! would this pair have said,

And thou, O Queen of men and Angels dear,

Lid us, whom thou hast loved, into thy happy sphere!

35.

They wept not at the grave, though overwrought With feelings there as if the heart would break. Some haply might have deem'd they suffered not;

Yet they who look'd upon that Maiden meek Might see what deep emotion blanched her cheek. An inward light there was which fill'd her eyes, And told, more forcibly than words could speak,

That this disruption of her earliest ties Had shaken mind and frame in all their faculties.

It was not passion only that disturb'd Her gentle nature thus; it was not grief; Nor human feeling by the effort curb'd Of some misdeeming duty, when relief Were surely to be found, albeit brief, If sorrow at its springs might freely flow; Nor yet repining, stronger than belief In its first force, that shook the Maiden so,

Though these alone might that frail fabric overthrow.

The seeds of death were in her at that hour; Soon was their quickening and their growth display'd;

Thenceforth she droop'd and wither'd like a flower,

Which, when it flourish'd in its native shade, Some child to his own garden hath convey'd, And planted in the sun, to pine away. Thus was the gentle Mooma seen to fade, Not under sharp disease, but day by day Losing the powers of life in visible decay 38.

The sunny hue that tinged her cheek was gone ; A deathy paleness settled in its stead; The light of joy which in her eyes had shone, Now like a lamp that is no longer fed Grew dim; but when she raised her heavy head, Some proffer'd help of kindness to partake, Those feeble eyes a languid lustre shed, And her sad smile of thankfulness would wake

Grief even in callous hearts for that sweet snfferer's sake.

How had Yeruti borne to see her fade? But he was spared the lamentable sight, Himself upon the bed of sickness laid. Joy of his heart, and of his eyes the light, Had Mooma been to him, his soul's delight, On whom his mind forever was intent, His darling thought by day, his dream by night, The playmate of his youth in mercy sent,

With whom his life had passed in peacefulest content.

Well was it for the youth, and well for her As there in placid helplessness she lay, He was not present with his love to stir Emotions that might shake her feeble clay, And rouse up in her heart a strong array Of feelings, hurtful only when they bind To earth the soul that soon must pass away. But this was spared them; and no pain of mind To trouble her had she, instinctively resign'd.

CANTO IV.

Nor was there wanting to the sufferers aught Of careful kindness to alleviate The affliction; for the universal thought In that poor town was of their sad estate, And what might best relieve or mitigate Their case, what help of nature or of art; And many were the prayers compassionate

- That the good Saints their healing would impart,
- Breathed in that maid's behalf from many a tender heart.

42.

And vows were made for her, if vows might save;

- She for herself the while preferr'd no prayer ;
- For when she stood beside her Mother's grave,
- Her earthly hopes and thoughts had ended there.
- Her only longing now was, free as air
- From this obstructive flesh to take her flight

For Paradise, and seek her Mother there,

And then, regaining her beloved sight,

Rest in the eternal sense of undisturb'd delight.

43.

- Her heart was there, and there she felt and knew
- That soon full surely should her spirit be.
- And who can tell what foretastes might ensue
- To one, whose soul, from all earth's thraldom free,

Was waiting thus for immortality?

- Sometimes she spake with short and hurried breath,
- As if some happy sight she seem'd to see, While, in the fulness of a perfect faith,
- Even with a lover's hope, she lay and look'd for death.

I said that for herself the patient maid Preferr'd no prayer; but oft her feeble tongue And feebler breath a voice of praise essay'd; And duly when the vesper bell was rung, Her evening hymn in faint accord she sung So piously, that they who gathered round, Awe-stricken on her heavenly accents hung, As though they thought it were no mortal sound,

But that the place whereon they stood was holy ground.

45.

At such an hour, when Dobrizhoffer stood Beside her bed, oh ! how unlike, he thought, This voice to that which, ringing through the wood, Ilad led him to the secret bower he sought !

And was it then for this that he had brought ? That harmless household from their native shade?

Death had already been the mother's lot;

And this fair Mooma, was she form'd to fade So soon, — so soon must she in earth's cold lap be laid?

46.

Yet he had no misgiving at the sight; And wherefore should he? He had acted well, And deeming of the ways of God aright, Knew that to such as these, whate'er befell Must needs for them be best. But who could dwell

Unmoved upon the fate of one so young, So blithesome late? What marvel if tears fell From that good man as over her he hung,

And that the prayers he said came faltering from his tongue !

47.

She saw him weep, and she could understand The cause thus tremulously that made him speak.

By his emotion moved, she took his hand ;

A gleam of pleasure o'er her pallid cheek

- Past, while she look'd at him with meaning meek,
- And for a little while, as loath to part,
- Detaining him, her fingers, lank and weak,
- Play'd with their hold; then letting him depart,

She gave him a slow smile that touch'd him to the heart.

48.

Mourn not for her! for what hath life to give That should detain her ready spirit here? Thinkest thou that it were worth a wish to live, Could wishes hold her from her proper sphere? That simple heart, that innocence sincere The world would stain. Fitter she ne'er could be For the great change; and now that change is near, Oh, who would keep her soul from being free?

Maiden beloved of Heaven, to die is best for thee !

49.

She hath pass'd away, and on her lips a smile Hath settled, fix'd in death. Judged they aright, Or suffered they their fancy to beguile The reason, who believed that she had sight Of Heaven before her spirit took its flight; That Angels waited round her lowly bed; And that, in that last effort of delight, When lifting up her dying arms, she said, l come! a ray from heaven upon her face was shed?

50.

St. Joachin's had never seen a day Of such profuse and general grief before, As when, with tapers, dirge, and long array, The Maiden's body to the grave they bore. All eyes, all hearts, her early death deplore; Yet, wondering at the fortune they lament, They the wise ways of Providence adore, By whom the Pastor surely had been sent,

When to the Mondai woods upon his quest he went

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

521

51. 'This was, indeed, a chosen family, For Heaven's especial favor mark'd, they said; Shut out from all mankind they seem'd to be; Yet mercifully there were visited, That so within the fold they might be led, Then eall'd away to bliss. Already two In their baptismal innocence were dead; The third was on the bed of death they knew, And in the appointed course must presently ensue.

52.

They marvell'd, therefore, when the youth once more

Rose from his bed, and walk'd abroad again; Severe had been the malady, and sore The trial, while life struggled to maintain Its seat against the sharp assaults of pain: But life in him was vigorous; long he lay

Ere it could its ascendency regain ;

Then, when the natural powers resumed their sway,

All trace of late disease past rapidly away.

53.

The first inquiry, when his mind was free, Was for his Sister. She was gone, they said, Gone to her Mother, evermore to be With her in Heaven. At this no tears he shed, Nor was he seen to sorrow for the dead; But took the fatal tidings in such part As if a dull, unfeeling nature bred His unconcern; for hard would seem the heart To which a loss like his no suffering could impart.

54.

How little do they see what is, who frame Their hasty judgment upon that which seems ! Waters that babble on their way proclaim A shallowness; but in their strength deep streams Flow silently. Of death Yeruti deems Not as an ill, but as the last great good, Compared wherewith all other he esteems Transient and void : how then should thought intrude

Of sorrow in his heart for their beatitude?

55.

While dwelling in their sylvan solitude Less had Yeruti learn'd to entertain A sense of age than death. He understood Something of death from creatures he had slain; But here the ills which follow in the train Of age had first to him been manifest, — The shrunken form, the limbs that move with pain,

The failing sense, infirmity, unrest, --

That in his heart he said to die betimes was best.

56.

Nor had he lost the dead: they were but gone Before him, whither he should shortly go. Their robes of glory they had first put on; He, cumber'd with mortality, below Must yet abide awhile, content to know He should not wait in long expectance here. What cause then for repining, or for woe? Soon shall he join them in their heavenly sphere, And often, even now, he knew that they were near.

57.

'Twas but in open day to close his eyes, And shut out the unprofitable view Of all this weary world's realities, And forthwith, even as if they lived anew, The dead were with him; features, form, and hue, And looks, and gestures, were restored again : Their actual presence in his heart he knew; And when their converse was disturb'd, oh, then How flat and stale it was to mix with living men !

58.

But not the less, whate'er was to be done, With living men he took his part content, At loom, in garden, or a-field, as one Whose spirit, wholly on obedience bent, To every task its prompt attention lent. Alert in labor he among the best ; And when to church the congregation went, None more exact than he to cross his breast, And kneel, or rise, and do in all things like the rest.

59.

Cheerful he was, almost like one elate With wine, before it hath disturb'd his power Of reason. Yet he seem'd to feel the weight Of time; for always, when from yonder tower He heard the elock tell out the passing hour, The sound appeared to give him some delight; And when the evening shades began to lower, Then was he seen to watch the fading light As if his heart rejoiced at the return of night.

60.

The old man, to whom he had been given in care, To Dobrizhoffer came one day, and said, The trouble which our youth was thought to bear With such indifference hath deranged his head. He says that he is nightly visited; His Mother and his Sister come and say That he must give this message from the dead, Not to defer his baptism, and delay A soul upon the earth which should no longer stay.

61.

A dream the Jesuit deem'd it; a decent Upon itself by feverish fancy wrought; A mere delusion, which it were not meet To censure, lest the youth's distemper'd thought Might thereby be to further error brought; But he himself its vanity would find,— They argued thus,— if it were noticed not. His baptism was in fitting time design'd,

The father said, and then dismiss'd it from his mind

But the old Indian came again ere long With the same tale, and freely then confess d

His doubt that he had done Yeruti wrong; For something more than common seem'd impress'd;

And now he thought that certes it were best From the youth's lips his own account to hear; Haply the father then to his request Might yield, regarding his desire sincere,

Nor wait for further time if there were aught to fear.

63.

Considerately the Jesuit heard, and bade The yonth be called. Yeruti told his tale. Nightly these blessed spirits came, he said, To warn him he must come within the pale Of Christ without delay; nor must he fail This warning to their pastor to repeat, Till the renewed entreaty should prevail. Life's business then for him would be complete, And 'twas to tell him this they left their starry seat.

64.

Came they to him in dreams ?— he could not tell ; Sleeping or waking now small difference made ; For even, while he slept, he knew full well That his dear Mother and that darling Maid Both in the Garden of the Dead were laid ; And yet he saw them as in life, the same, Save only that in radiant robes array'd,

And round about their presence when they came There shone an effluent light as of a harmless flame.

And where he was he knew, the time, the place, —

All circumstantial things to him were clear. Its own heart undisturb'd. His Mother's face How could he choose but know; or, knowing, fear Her presence and that Maid's, to him more dear Than all that had been left him now below?

Their love had drawn them from their happy sphere;

That dearest love unchanged they came to show; And he must be baptized, and then he too might go.

66.

With searching ken the Jesnit, while he spake, Perused him, if in countenance or tone Aught might be found appearing to partake Of madness. Mark of passion there was none; None of derangement : in his eye alone, As from a hidden fountain emanate, Something of an unusual brightness shone : But neither word nor look betrayed a state

Of wandering, and his speech, though earnest, was sedate.

67.

Regular his pulse, from all disorder free, The vital powers perform'd their part assign'd; And to whate'er was ask'd collectedly lle answer'd. Nothing troubled him in mind; Why should it? Were not all around him kind? Did not all love him with a love sincere, And seem in serving him a joy to find? He had no want, no pain, no grief, no fear; But he must be baptized ; he could not tarry here 68.

Thy will be done, Father in heaven who art! The pastor said, nor longer now denied; But with a weight of awe upon his heart Enter'd the ehurch, and there, the font beside, With holy water, ehrism, and salt applied, Perform'd in all solemnity the rite. His feeling was that hour with fear allied; Yernti's was a sense of pure delight,

And while he knelt his eyes seem'd larger and more bright.

His wish hath been obtain'd; and this being done, His soul was to its full desire content. The day in its accustom'd course pass'd on; The Indian mark'd him ere to rest he went, How o'er his beads, as he was wont, he bent, And then, like one who casts all care aside, Lay down. The old man fear'd no ill event, When, "Ye are come for me!" Yernti cried; "Yes, I am ready now!" and instantly he died.

NOTES.

So he, for sooth, a shapely boot must wear - Preem, p. 501.

His leg had been set by the French after their conquest of Pamplona, and re-set after his removal to his father's house. The latter operation is described as having been most severe, but borne by him, in his wonted manner, without any manifestation of suffering. Fer some time his life was despaired of. "When the danger of death was past, and the bones were knit and becoming firm, two inconveniences remained : one occasioned by a portion of bone below the knee, which projected so as to occasion some deformity; the other was a contraction of the leg, which prevented him from walking erect or standing firmly on his feet. Now, as he was very so-licitous about his appearance, and intended at that time to follow the course of a military life, which he had begun, he inquired of his medical attendants, in the first place, whether the bone could be removed, which stuod out in so unsightly a manner. They answered that it was possible to remova it, but the operation would be exceedingly painful, much more so than any which he had before undergone. He nevertheless directed them to cut it out, that he might have his will, and (as he himself related in my hearing, says Ribadeneira) that he might wear fashionable and well-fitting boots. Nor could he be dissuaded from this determination. He would not consent to be bound during the operation, and went through it with the same firmness of mind which he had manifested in the former operations. By this means the deformity of the bone was removed. The contraction of the leg was in soms degree relieved by other applications, and especially by certain machines, with which, during many days, ard with great and continual pain, it was stretched ; nevertheless it could not be so extended, but that it always remained something sherter than the other." - Ribadeneira, Vita S. Ignatii Loyolæ, Acta SS. Jul. t. 7, p. 659.

A close-fitting hoot seems to have been as fushionable at one time as close-fitting innominables of buckskin were about the year 1700; and perhaps it was as severe an operation to get into them for the first time. "The greasy shoemaker," says Tom Nash, with his squirrel's skin, and a whole stall of ware upon his arm, enters, and wrencheth his legs for an hour together, and after shows his tally. The operation of fitting a Spanish dandy with short-laced quarter-boots is thus minutely described by Juan de Zavaleta, who was historiographer at the commencement of Carlus the Second's reign.

Eutra el zapatero eliendo à cansado. Saca de las hormas los zapatos, con tanta difeutual como si desoltara las hormas. Sientase en una silla el galan; hincase el zapatro de rodillas, apocorase de una pierna con tantos tirones y desagrados, como si le embiaran a que le dicra tormento. Mete un calzador en el talom del zapato, encapillale atro en la punta del pie, y luego empieza a guar el zapato por encima del calzador. Apenas ha caminado poco mas que los dedos del pie, quando es menester arrastrarle con unas tenzas, y aun arrastrado se resiste. Ponese en pice la gueicnet fatigado, pero contento de que los zapatos le vengan angostos; y de orden del zapatero da tres ó quatro patadas en el suelo, con tanta fuerza, que pues no se quicbra, dece de ser de bronze.

Acozeados dan de si el cordovan y la suila; pullejos en fin de nnimales, que obedecen a golpes. Buelvese a sentar el tal señor, dobla àzia fuera el copete del zapato, cogele con la boca de las tenvaras, hinca el oficial junto a el entrambas rodillas, afirmase en el suelo con la mano i quierda, y puesto de bruzas sobre el pue, hacho arco los dos dedos de la muno derecha que forman el jeme, va con ellos ayudando a llevar por el empeine arriba el cordovan, de quien tira con las tenatas su dueño. Buelve a ponerse en una rodilla, como primero estara; empuña con la nan mano la punta del pie, y con la palma de la otra da sobre su mano tan grandes golpes como si los diera con una paln de jugar a la pelota; que es la necessidad tan discreta, que se haze el pobre el mal a si mismo, par no hazersele a aquel de quien necessita.

Ajustada ya la punta del pie, acude al talon ; humedece con la lengua los remates de las costuras, porque na falseen las costuras de secas par los remates. Tremenda vanidad, sufrir en sus pies un hambre la boca de otro hambre, solo por tener aliñados los pies ! Desdobla el zapatero el talon, dase una buelta con el calzador a la mano, y empieza a encaxar en el pie la segunda porcion del zapato. Manda que se baxe la punta, y hazese lo que manda. Llama àzia a si el zapato con tal fuerza, que entre su cuerpo, y el espaldar de la silla abrevia torpe y desaliñadamente al que calza. Dizele luego que haga talon, y el hombre obcdece como un esclavo. Ordenale despues que dé en el suelo una patada, y el da la patuda, como se le ordena. Buelve a sentarse ; saca el cruel ministro el calzador del empeine, y por donde salió el calzador mete un palo, que llaman costa, y contra el buelve y rebuelve el sacabucadas, que saca los bocados del cordovan, para que entren las cintas ; y dera en el empeine del pie un dolor, y unas señales, como si huviera sacado de alli los bacados. Aguijerea las orejas, passa la ciuta con una aguja, lleva las orejas a que cierren el zapato, ajustalos, y da luego con tanta fuerza el nudo, que si pudieran ahagar a un hombre por la garganta del pie, le ahagara. Haze la rosa despues con mas cuydado que gracia. Buelve a devanarse a la mano el calzador, que está colgando del talon ; tira del como quien retoca, dá em la otra mano palmadas en la planta, como quien ussienta, y saca el catzador, echandase toda ázia atrás. Pone el galan el pie en el suelo, y quedase mirandole. Levan tase el zapatero, arrasa con el dedo el sudor de la frente, y queda respirando como si huviera corrido. Todo esta se ahorrava con hazer el zapato un poco mayor que el pic. Padecen luego entrambos otro tanto con el pie segundo. Llega el ultima y fiero trance de darle el dinero. Recoge el aficial sus baratijas. Recibe su estipendio, sale por la puerta de la sala mirando si es buena la pluta que le han dado, dezando à su duena de movimientos tan torpes como si le huviera echado unos grillos.

Si pensaràn los que se calzan opretado que se achican el pic. Si lo piensan se engañan. Los huessos no se pueden meter unos en otros : con esto es fuerza que si le quitan de lo largo al zapato, se dable el pie por las coyunturas, y cretca úzia arriba lo que le menguan de adelante. Si le estrechan lo ancho, es precisa que se alargue aquella carne oprimida. Con la misma cantidad de pie que se tenian, se quedan los que calzan sisado. La que hazen es utormentarse, y dezur los pies de peor hechura. El animal à quinn mas largas pies dio la naturaleza segun su cantilad, es el hombre; porque, como ha de andar todo el eucrpo sobre cllos, y no son mas de dos, quiso que andaviesse seguro. El que se los quiere abreviar, gana parece que tiene de caer, y de caer en los vieios, donde se hará mayor mal, que en las piedras. La parte viete le puso Duos al hombre en la fobrica de su eucrpo mas cerea de la tierra, son los pies : quiso sın duda que fuera lo parte mas humilde de su fabrica : pero las galanes viciosos les quitan humildad con los alños, y los ensoberecen con el coylado. Enfatla esto a Dios tanto, que avienda de hazer al hombre animal que pisasse la tierra, hizo la tierra de tal calidad, que se publiesce imprimir en el la la huella del hombre. Abierta daza su sepultara el pie que se levanta, y parece que se levanta de la sepultara. Tremendad crueldad es caloquecer con el adorno al que se quere tragar la tierra a cada passo. — El dia-de Fiesta. Obras de D. Juan de Zavaleta, p. 179, 180.

"In comes the shoemaker in the odor of haste and fatigue. He takes the shoes off the last with as much difficulty as if he were skinning the lasts. The gallant seats himself upon a chair; the shoemaker kneels down, and takes possession of one foot, which he handles as if he were sent there to administer the torture. He puts one shoeing skin * in the heel of the shoe, fits the other upon the point of the foot, and then begins to guide the shoe over the shoeing-skin. Scarcely has it got farther than the toes when it is hand work. The patient stands up, fatigued with the operation, but well pleased that the shoes are tight; and by the shoemaker's directions he stamps three or four times on the floor, with such force that it must be of iron if it does not give way.

"The cordovan and the soles being thus beaten, submit; they are the skins of animals who abey blows. Our gallant returns to his seat, he turns up the upper leather of the shee, and lays hold on it with the pincers; the tradesman kneels close by him on both knees, rests on the ground with his left hand, and bending in this all-four's position over the foot, making an arch with those fingers of the right hand which form the span, assists in drawing on the upper part of the cordovan, the gallant pulling the while with tho pincers. He then puts himself on one knee, lays hold of the end of the foot with one band, and with the palm of the other strikes his own hand as hard as if he were striking a ball with a racket. For necessity is a discret that the poor man inflicts this pain upon himself that he may give none to the person of whose custom he stands in need.

" The end of the foot being thus adjusted, he repairs to the heel, and with his tongue moistens the end of the seams, that they may not give way for being dry. Tremendous vanity, that one man should allow the mouth of another to be applied to his feet that he may have them trimly set out ! The sheemaker unfolds the heel, turns round with the shoeing-skin in his hand, and begins to fit the second part of the shoe upon the foot. He desires the gallant to put the end of the foot down, and the gallant does as he is desired. He draws the slive towards him with such force that the person who is thus being shoed is compressed in an unseemly manner between the shoemaker's hody and the back of the chair. Presently he tells him to put his heel down, and the man is as obedient as a slave. He orders him then to stamp upon the ground, and the man stamps as he is ordered. The gallant then seats himself again; the cruel operator draws the shoeing-skin from the instep, and in its place drives in a stick which they call casta.† He then turns upon it the punch, which makes the holes in the leather, through which the ribands are to pass ; he again twists round his hand the strip of hare's-skin which hangs from the heel, and pulls it as if he were ringing a hell, and leaves upon the upper part of the top such pain and marks as if he had punched the holes in it. He bores the ears, passes the string through with a bodkin, brings the ears together that they may fasten the shoe, fits them to their intended place, and ties the knot with such force, that if it were possible to strangle n man by the neck of his foot, strangled the gallant would be. Then he makes the rose, with more care than grace. He goes then to take out the shoeing-skin, which is still hanging from the heel; he lays hold of this, strikes the sole of the foot with his other hand as if settling it, and draws out the skin, bringing out all with it. The gallant puts his foot to the ground, and remains looking at it. The shoemaker rises, wipes the sweat from his forehead with his fingers, and draws his breath like one who has been running. All this trouble might have been saved by making the shoe a little larger than the foot. Presently both have to go through the same pains with the other foot. Now comes the last and terrible act of payment. The tradesman collects his tools, receives his money, and goes out at the door, looking at the silver to see if it is good, and leaving the gallant walking as much at his case as if he had been put in fetters.

"If they who wear tight shoes think that thereby they can lessen the size of their feet, they are mistaken. The bones cannot be squeezed one into another; if therefore the shoe is made short, the foot must be crooked at the joints, and grow upward if is net allowed to grow forward. If it is pinched in the breadth, the flesh which is thus constrained must extend itself in length. They, who are shod thus miscrably remain with just the same quantity of foot.

"Of all animals, man is the one to which, in proportion to its size, nature has given the largest feet ; because as his whole hody is to be supported upon them, and he has only two, she chose that he should walk in safety. He who wishes to abbreviate them acts as if he were inclined to fall, and to fall into vices which will do him more injury than if he fell upon stones. The feet are the part which in the fabric of the human body are placed nearest to the earth ; they are meant therefore to be the humblest part of his frame, but gallants take away all humility by adorning and setting them forth in bravery. This so displeases the Creator, that having to make man an animal who should walk upon the earth, he made the earth of such properties, that the fuotstops should sink into it. The foot which is lifted from the ground leaves its own grave open, and seems as if it rose from the grave. What a tremendous thing is it then to set off with adornments that which the earth wishes to devont at every step ! "

Whiling with books the tedious hours away. - Proem, p. 502.

Vede quanto importa a liçad de bons livros! Se a livro fora de cavallerias, sahiria Ignacio hum grande cavalleyro; foy hum huro de vidas de Saatos, sahio hum grande Santo. Se lera cavallerias, sahiria Ignacio hum Cavalleyro da ardente espada; lea vidas de Santos, saho hum Santo da ardente tacha.— Vieyra, Sermam de S. Ignacio, t. i. 308.

See, says Vieyra, the importance of reading good books. If it had been a book of knight-errantry, Ignacio would have become a great knight-errant; it was the Lives of the Saints, and Ignatius become a great saint. If he had read about knights, he might have proved a Knight of the Burning Sword : he read about saints, and proved a Saint of the Burning Torch.

Nothing could seem more probable than that Cervantes had this part of Loyola's history in his mind when he described the rise of Don Quixote's madness, if Cervantes had not shown himself in one of his dramas to be thoroughly inbued with the pestilent superstition of his country. El dichosa Rufan is one of those monstrous compositions which nothing but the antichristian fables of the Romish church could have produced.

Landor, however, supposes that Cervantes intended to satirize a favorite dogma of the Spaniards. The passage occurs in his thirteenth conversation.

"The most dexterous attack ever made against the worship among catholics, which opens so many side-chapels to pilfering and imposture, is that of Cervantes,

" Leopold. I do not remember in what part.

" President. Throughout Don Quixote. Dulcinea was the peeriess, the immaculate, and death was denounce against all who hesitated to admit the assertion of her pe ections. Surely your highness never could have imagined that Cervantes was such a knight-errant as to attack knight-errantry, a folly that had ceased more than a century, if indeed it was any folly at all; and the idea that he ridiculed the poems and romances founded on it is not less improbable, for they contained all the literature of the nation, excepting the garniture of chapter-houses, theology, and pervaled, as with a thread of gold, the beautiful histories of this illustrious people. He delighted the idlors of romance by the jokes he scattered amongst them on the false taste of his predecessors and of his rivals; and he delighted his own heart by this solitary archery; well knowing what amusement those who came another day would find in picking up his arrows and discovering the bull'seye hits.

"Charles V. was the knight of La Mancha, devoting his labors and vigils, his wars and treaties, to the chimerical idea of making all minds, like watches, turn their indexes by a simultaneous movement to one point. Sancho Panza was the symbol of the people, possessing sound sense in all other matters, but ready to follow the most extravagant visionary in this, and combining implicit belief in it with the grossest sensuality. For religion, when it is hot enough to produce enthusiasm, hurns up and kills every seed intrusted to its bosom." — Inaginary Concersations, vol. i. 187.

Benedetto di Virgilio, the Italian ploughman, thus describes the course of Loyola's reading, in his heroic poem upon that Saint's life.

Vaccination. - Canto I. st. 1.

It is odd that in Hindestan, where it might have heen supposed superstition would have facilitated the introduction of this proctice, a prove fraud was found necessary for removing the prejudice against it.

Meeperal Streenivaschary, a Brahmin, thus writes to Dr. Anderson, at Madras, en vaccine inoculation.

"It might be useful to remove a prejudice in the minds of the people, arising from the term cow-peck, being taken literally in our Tamul tongue; whereas there can be ne douht that it has been a drep of nectar from the exuberant udders of the cews in England, and no way similar to the humor discharged from the tongue and feet of diseased cattle in this country." — FORCES'S Oriental Manairs, vol. iii, p. 423.

For tyrannous fear dissolved all natural bonds of man. Canto I. st. 3.

Mackenzie gives a dreadful picture of the effect of small-pox among the North American Indiane.

"The small-pox spread its destructive and desolating power, as the fire consumes the dry grass of the field. The fatal infection spread around with a haneful rapidity, which no flight could escape, and with a fatal effect that nething could resist. It destroyed with its pestilential breath whole families and tribes; and the herrid scene presented to these who had the melancholy and afflicting opportunity of heholding it, a combination of the dead, the dying, and such as, to avoid the herrid fate of their friends around them, prepared to diseppoint the plague of its prey, by terminating their own existence.

"The habits and lives of these devoted people, which provided not to-day for the wants of to-morrow, must have heightened the pairs of such an affliction, by leaving them not only without remedy, but even without alleviation. Nonght was left them but to submit in ageny and despair.

"Te aggravate the picture, if aggravation were possible, may be added the putrid carcasses which the wolves, with a furieous voracity, dragged forth from the huts, or which were mangled within them by the dogs, whose bunger was satisfied with the disfigured remains of their masters. Ner was it uncemmen for the father of a family, whom the infection had net reached, te call them around him, to represent the cruel sufferings and herrid fate of their relations, from the influence of some evil spirit, who was preparing to extirpate their race; and te incite them to baffle death, with all its herrors, by their own poniards. At the same time, if their hearts failed them in this necessary act, he was himself ready to perform the deed of mercy with his ewn hand, as the last act of his affection, and instantly to follow them to the common place of rest and refuge from human evil."

And from the silent door the jaguar turns away.

Cante I. st. 11.

I may be forgiven for not having strictly adhered to natura, history in this instance. The liberty which I have taken is mentioned, that it may not be suppesed to have arisen from ignerance of this animal's habits.

The jaguar will net attack a living horse if a dead one be near, and when it kills its prey, it drags it to its den, but is said not te eat the body till it becemes putrid. They are caught in large traps of the cage kind, haited with stinking meat, and then speared or shot through the bars. The Chalcaquines had a braver way of killing them: they prevoked the animal, frented it, received its attack upon a thick truncheen, which they held by the two ends, threw it down while its teeth were fixed in the wood, and ripped the creature np before it could recover. (Techo, p. 29.) A great profit is made by their skins. The jaguar which has once tasted human flesh becemes a mest formidable asimal; such a heast is called a tigre cevado, a fleshed tiger. There was one which t infested the road between Santa Fé and Santiago, and had killed ten men; after which a party of soldiers were sent to destroy it. The same thing is said of the lion and other beasts of prey, probably with truth; not, as is vulgarly supposed, because they have a particular appetite for this kind of food, but because, having once fed upon man, they from that time regard him, like any animal of inferior strength, as their natural prey. "It is a constant observation in Numidia," says Bruce, " that the lion avoids and flies from the face of men, till by some accident they have been brought to engage, and the heast has prevailed against him; then that feeling of superiority, imprinted by the Creator in the heart of all animals, for man's preservation, seems to forsoke him. The lion, having once tasted human blood, relinquishes the pursuit after the flock. He repairs to some highway or frequented path, and has heen known, in the kingdom of Tunis, to interrupt the road to a market for several weeks; and in this he persists, till hunters or soldiers are sent out to destroy him." Dobrizhoffer saw the skin of a jaguar which was as long as the standard hide. He says, also, that he saw one attack two horses which were coupled with a thong, kill one, and drag the other away ofter it.

A most unpleasant habit of this heast is, that in cold or wet weather he chooses to lodge within doors, and will steal into the house. A girl at Corrientes, who slept with her mother, saw one lying under the bed when she rose in the morning : she had presence of mind to bid her mother lie still, went for help, and soon rid the house of its perilons visiter. Cat-like, the jaguar is a good climber; but Dubrizhoffer tells us how a traveller who takes to a tree for shelter may profit by the position : In prompta consilium: arina pro armis est: hac si tignifis ad arboris pedem unitation scoulos compersoris, salea res est. Quâ datà portâ fuget illico. (i. 280.) He who first did this must have been a good marksman as well as a cool fellow, and it was well for him that he reserved his fire till the jaguar was within shot.

Dolrizhoffer seems to credit an opinion (which is held in India of the tiger also) that the jaguar's claws are in a certain degree venomens; the scar which they leave is said to be always liable to a very painful and burning sense of heat. But that author, in his usual amusing manner, repeats many credulous notions concerning the animal; as that its burnt elaws are a remedy for the tooth-ache; and that it has amode of decoying fish, by standing neck-deep in the water, and spitting out a white foam, which allures them within reach. Techo (30) says the same thing of a large snake.

An opinion that wounds inflicted by the stroke of animals of this kind are envenomed is found in the East also. Captain Williamson snys, " However trivial the scratches made by the claws of tigers may appear, yet, whether it he owing to any noxious quality in the claw itself, to the manner in which the tiger strikes, or any other matter, I have no hesitation in saying, that at least a majority of such as have been under my notice died; and I have generally remarked, that those whose cases appeared the least alarming were most suddenly carried off. I have ever thought the perturbation arising from the nature of the attack to have a considerable share in the fatality alluded to, especially os I never knew any one wounded by a tiger to die without suffering for some days under that most dreadful symptom, a locked jaw ! Such as have been wounded to appearance severely, but accompanied with a moderate hæmorrhage, I have commonly found to recover, excepting in the rainy season; at that period I should expect serious consequences from either a bite or a scratch." - Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 52.

Wild beasts were so numerous and fierce in one part of Mexico, among the Otomites, that Fr. Juan de Grijalva says in his time, in one year, more than 250 Indians were devoured by them. "There then prevailed an opinion," he proceeds, "and still it prevails among many, that those tigers and lions were certain Indian sorcerers, whom they call Nahmles, who by diabolical art transform themselves into beasts, and tear the Indians in pieces, either to revenge themselves for some offences which they have received, or to do them evil, which is the proper condition of the Devil, and an effect of his fierceness. Some traces of these diabolical acts have heen seen in our time, for in the year 1579, the deaths of this kind heing many, and the suspicion wehement, some Indians were put to the question, and they confessed the crime, and were executed for it. With all this experience and proof, there are many persons who doubt these transformations, and say that the land being mountainous produces wild beasts, and the beasts being once fleshed commit these great raveges. And it was through the weak understandings of the Indians that they were persuaded to believe their conjurcrs could thus metamorphose themselves; and, if these poor wretches confessed themselves guilty of such a crime, it was owing to their weakness under the torture; and so they suffered for an offence which they had never committed."

Fother Grijalva, however, holds with his Father S. Augustine, who has said, concerning such things, hac ad nos non quibuscunque qualibus credere putaremus indignum, sed eis referentibus pervenerunt, quos nobis non existimaremus fuisse mentitos. "In the days of my Father S. Augustine," he says, "wonderful things were related of certain inn-keepers in Italy, who transformed passengers into beasts of huiden, to bring to their inns straw, barley, and whatever was wanted from the towns, and then metamarphosed them into their own persons, that they might purchase, as customers, the very commodities they had carried. And in our times the witches of Logrono make so many of these transformations, that now no one can doubt them. This matter of the Nahuales, or sorcerers of Tututepec, has been confessed by so many, that that alone suffices to make it credible. The best proof which can he had is, that they were condemned to death by course of justice ; and it is temerity to condemn the judges, for it is to be believed that they made all due inquiry. Our brethren who have been ministers there, and are also judges of the interior court, (that is, of the conscience,) have all held these transformations to be certain; so that there ought to be no doubt concerning it. On the contrary, it is useful to understand it, that if at any time in heathen lands the devil should work any of these metamorphoses, the Indians may see we are not surprised at them, and do not hold them as miraculous, but can explain to them the reason and cause of these effects, which astonish and terrify them so greatly."

He proceeds to show that the devil con only exercise this power as far as he is permitted by God, in punishment for sin, and that the metamorphosis is not real, butfordly apparent; the soreerer not heing actually transformed into a lion, but seeming as if he were so both to himself and others. In what manner he con tear a man really to pieces with imaginary claws, and devour him in earnest with on imaginary month, the good friar has not condescended to explain. — Historia de la Orden de S. Augustin en la Provincia de N. España, pp. 34, 35.

Preserved with horrid art In ghastly image of humanity. - Canto I. at. 13.

The more ghastly in proportion as more of the appearance of life is preserved in the revolting practice. Such, however, it was not to the feelings of the Egyptians, who had as much pride in a collection of their ancestors, as one of the strongest family feeling could have in a collection of family pictures. The body, Diodarus says, is delivered to the kindred with every member so whole and entire that no part of the body seems to be altered, even to the very hairs of the eyelids and the evebrows, so that the beauty and shape of the face seems just as before. By which means many of the Egyptians, laying up the bodies of their ancestors in stately monuments, perfectly see the true visage and countenance of those who were buried many ages hefore they themselves were born; so that in regarding the propertion of every one of these bodics, and the lineaments of their faces, they take exceeding great delight, even as if they were still living among them. (Book i.)

They believe, says Herodotus, (Eutcrpe, § 123,) that on the dissolution of the hody the soul immediately enters into some other animal; and that after using as vehicles every species of terrestrial, aquatic, and winged creatures, it finally enters a second time into a human body. They affirm that it undergoes all these changes in the space of three thousand years. This opinion some among the Greeks have of different periods of time adopted as their own; but I shall not, though I could, specify their names.

How little did the Egyptians apprehend that the bodies which they preserved with such care, to be ready again for use when the cycle should be fulfilled, would one day be regarded as an article of trade, broken up, exported piecemeal, and administered in grains and scruples, as a costly medicine, to rich patients! A preference was even given to virgin nummy.

The bodies of the Incas, from the foundar of the empire, were preserved in the Temple of the Sun: they were seated each on his litter, and in such excellent preservation that they seemed to be alive; according to the testimony of P. Acosta and Garcilaso, who saw them and touched them. It is not known in what manner they were prepared, so as to resist the injuries of time. Gomara (c. 195) says they were enhalmed by the jnice of certaio fugrant trees, which was ponred down their throats, and by unguents of gum. Acosta says that a certain bitomen was used, and that plates of gold were placed iostead of eyes, so well fitted that the want of the real eye was not perceived. Garcilaso thooght the chief preparation consisted in freezing them with enow. They were buried in one of the courts of the hospital of St. Andres. — Merc. Peruana, No. 221.

Hideons exhibitions of this kind are sometimes made in monasteries, where they are in perfect accord with monastic auperstition. I remember seeing two human bodies, dry and shrivelled, snspended in the Casa dos Ossos, at Evora, a chapel, the walls of which are lined with skulls and hones.

"Among the remarkable objects in the vicinity of Palermo pointed out to strangers, they fail not to singularize a convent of Capuchins at a small distance from town, the heautiful gardens of which serve as a public walk. You are shown, under the fabric, a vault divided into four great galleries, into which the light is admitted by windows cut out at the tep of each extremity. In this vanlt are preserved, not in flesh, but is skin and bone, all the Capuchins who have died in the convent since its foundation, as well as the bodies of several persons from the city. There are here private tombs helonging to opulent families, who, even after annihilation, disdain to be confounded with the vulgar part of mankind. It is said, that in order to secure the preservation of these hodies, they are prepared by being gradually dried before a slow fire, so as to consume the flesh without greatly injuring the skin; when perfectly dry, they are invested with the Capuchin habit, and placed upright, on tablets, disposed step above step along the sides of the vault ; the head, the arms, and the feet are left naked. A preservation like this is horrid. The skin discolored, dry, and as if it had been tanned, nny, torn io some places, glued close to the bones. It is easy to imagine, from the different grimaces of this numerons assemblage of flashless figures, rendered still more frightful by a long beard on the chio, what a hideous spectacle this must exhibit ; and whoever has seen a Capuchin elive, may form an idea of this singular repository of dead friars." - Sonnini.

It is not surprising that such practices arise from anperstition ; but it is strange, indeed, that they should afford any gratification to pride. That excellent man, Fletcher of Madeley, has a striking remark upon this subject. "The murderer," says he, "is dissected in the surgeon's hall, gratis; and the rich sinner is embowelled in his own apartment at great expense. The robber, exposed to open air, wastes away in hoops of iron; and the gentleman, confined to a damp vault, moulders away in sheets of lead; and while the fowls of the air greedily prey upon the one, the vermin of the earth eagerly devont the other."

How different is the feeling of the Hindoos upon this subject from that of the Egyptians! "A mansion with bones for its rafters and beams; with nerves and tendons for cords; with muscles and blood for mortar; with skin for its ontward covering; filled with no sweet perfume, but loaded with feces and urine; a mansion infested by age and by sorrow; the seat of malady, harassed with pains, haunted with the quality of darkness, and incapable of standing long. Such a mansion of the vital soul lets its occupier always cheerfully quit."— Inst. of Menu.

Inconvenient as this may seem, it was the full dress of the Topi and Guarani tilbes. A fashion less gorgeous and chaborate, but more refined, is described by one of the best old travellers to the East, François Pyrard.

⁴⁵ The inhabitants of the Maldives use on feast days this kind of gallantry. They bruise sanders (sandal-wood) and camphire, on very slicke and smooth stones, (which they bring from the firm hand), and sometimes other sorts of odoriferous woods. After they compound it with water distilled of flowers, and overspread their bodies with this paste, from the girdle upwords; adding many forms with their finger, such as they imagine. It is somewhat like cut and pinked doublets, end of an excellent savor. They dress their wives or lemans in this sort, and make upon their backs works and shadows as they please." Skin-prints Pinchas calls this. — Pyrard de Laral. Purchas, p. 1655.

The abominable practice of tarring and feathering was bot too well known during the American war. It even found ita way to England. I remember, when a child, to have seen a man in this condition in the streets of Bristol.

The costume of the savages, who figured so frequently in the pageants of the sixteenth century, seems to have been designed to imitate the Brazilian trubes, best known to the French and English at that time. Indeed, this is stated by Vincent Carloix, when, in describing an entertainment given to Marcehal de Vieilleville hy the captains of the galleys at Marseilles, he says, Ayant lić six galéres ensemble de front, et faited dresser les tables dessus, et tapissées en façon de grandes salles ; ayant accusatrés les forceats en Bressiliens pour servir, ils firent une infinité de gambades et de tourbions d la façon des saurages, que personne n'avoit encore occus; dont tout le monde, avec une extresme allaigresse, s'esbahissoit merpeilleusement. — Mémoires, l. x. ch. 18.

Je la trouve chez les Iberiens, ou les premiers peuples d'Espagne; je la trouve chez les ancuens habitans de l'Isle de Corse; elle étui chez les Tibareniens en Asie; elle est aujourd'hui dans quelquesancs de nos provinces voisines d'Espagne, ou cela s'appele faire couvade; elle est encore vers le Japon, et dans l'Amerique chez les Caraibes et les Galibis. — Lafitau, Mœurs des Sauvages, t. 1, p. 50.

Strabo says this strange custom existed in Cantabria, (l. iii, p. 174, ed. 1571,) so that its Gascon extraction has been direct. Diodorna Sicolus is the authority for its existence in Corsica. (Book iii. ch. I, English translation, 1814, vol. i. p. 305.) Apollonius Rhodius describes it among the Tibareni, (l. ii. 1012:) $\dot{\omega}_{5}$ (aropeī Nuµ $\phi \delta \delta \omega \rho os ~iv~ riaiv~v \delta \mu ois, says$ the scholiast.

Voicy la brutalité de nos sauvages dans leurs réjonissance pour Varroissement de leur famille. C'est qu'au même tems que la femme est delivrée le mary se met au lit, pour s'y plaindre et y faire Vaccouchée; coutume, que bien que sauvage et ridicule se trouve neantmoins d ce que l'on dit, parmy les paysans d'une ecrtaine province de France; et ils appellent cela faire la couvade. Mais ce qui est de fiacheuse pour le pauere Caraibe qui s'est mis au lit au lieu de Vaccouchée, c'est qu'on luy fait faire dicte dix ou doure jours de suite, ne luy donnant rien par jour qu'un morteau de cassave, et un peu d'eau dans laquelle on a aussi fait boullir un peu de ce pain de racine. Après il mange un peu plus : mais il n'entame la cassare qu'luy est presentée que par le milieu durant quelques quarante jours, en laissant les bords entiers qu'il pend d sa case, pour servir à un festin qu'il fuit ordinairement en suite à tous ses amis. Et même il s'abstient après cela, quelquefois dix mois ou un an entier de plusieurs viandes, comme de lamantin, de tortuë, de pourceau, de poules, de poisson, et de choses délicates, craignant par une pitoyable folie que cela ne nuise d l'enfant. Mais ils ne font ce grand jusne qu'à la naissance de leur premier enfant. - Rochefort. Hist. Morale des Iles Antilles, c. 23, p. 495.

Marco Polo, (l. ii. c. 41,) the other authority to which Lafitau refers, speaks of the custom as existing in the great Khan's province of Cardandan. Hanno un' usanza che subito ch' una donna ha partorito, si leva del letto, e lavato il funciullo e ravolto ne' panni, il marito si mette a giacere in letto in sua vece. e tiene il figliaolo appresso di se, havendo la cura di quello per quaranta giorni, che non si parte mai. Et gli amici e parenti vanno a visitarlo per rallegrarlo e consolarlo ; e le donne che sono da parto fanno quel che bisogna per casa, portando da mangiare e bere al marito, ch' e nel letto, e dando il latte al fanciullo, che gli è appresso. - Ramusio, t. ii. p. 36, ed. 1583.

Yet this custom, preposterous as it is, is not more strange than an opinion which was once so prevalent in this country that Primerose made it the subject of a chapter in his work, De Vulgi Erroribus in Medicina, and thought it necessary to prove, by physical reasons, maritum loco uxoris gravida non agrotare, for such is the title of one of his chapters. He says, Inter errores quamplurimos maxime ridendus hic esse videtur, quod vir credatur ægrotare, lisque affici symptomatis, quibus ipsa mulier prægnans solet, illudque experientiå confirmatum plurimi esse volunt. Habebam agrum febre laborentem cum urina valde accensà et turbidà, qui agrotationis sua nullam causam agnoscebat quam uxoris sua graviditatem. Nullibi terrarum quam in Anglià id abservatum memini me audivisse, aut legisse unquam. - Nec si quis maritus cum uxor gravida est, agrotat ab uxore infectus fuit, sed potest ex peculiari proprii corporis vitio id pati. Sicut dum hee scribo, pluit ; non est tamen pluvia out causa scriptionis, out scriptura pluvia. Res nova non est, viros et mulieres etiam simul ægrotare. At mirum est hactenusque ignotum, graviditatem affectum esse contagiosum, et non alias mulieres sed viros, quas natura immunes ab hoc labore fecit, solos infici. Pratereu observatum est non omnibus mulicribus ejusmodi symptomata, aut saltem non omnin singulis contingere ; at tamen accidit sape ut cum mulier bene valet, ægrotet maritus, etiam absens per aliquot milliaria. Sed quoniam ex solà relatione absurditas hujus erroris patet, plura non addam. Jupiter Bacchum in femore. Palladem in ccrebro gestavit. Sed hoc illi esto proprium. - Lib. ii. c. 13.

This notion, however, is probably not yet extinct, for 1 know that it existed in full force some thirty years ago, and that not in the lowest rank of life.

Till hardened mathers in the grave could lay Their living babes with no computcious tear. Canto I, st. 38.

This dreadful practice is carried to such an extent in the heart of South America, that whole tribes have become extinct in consequence of it, and of another practice, hardly less nefarious.

Those bloody African savages, the Giagas, reared no children whatsoever ; " for as soon," says Battell, " as the woman is delivered of her child, it is presently buried quick ; so that there is not one child brought up in all this generation. But when they take any town, they keep the boys and girls of thirteen or fourteen years of age as their own children, but the men and women they kill and eat. These little boys they train up in the wars, and hang a collar about their necks for a disgrace, which is never taken off till he proveth himself a man, and brings his enemy's head to the general ; and then it is taken off, and he is a free man, and is called 'gonso,' or 'soldier.' This maketh them all desperate and forward to be free, and counted men, and so they do increase. A generation without generation, says Purchas, p. 977.

Among the causes for which the Knisteneaux women procure abortion, Mackenzia (p. 98) assigns that of hatred | Azara, t. iv. p. 130, No. cccxx.

for the father. No other traveller has ever suspected the existence of this motive. They sometimes kill their femala children to save them from the miseries which they themselves have suffered.

The practice among the Panches of Bogota was, that if the first-born proved a girl, it was destroyed, and every girl in auccession till the mother bore a boy, after which girls were allowed to live ; but if the first-born were a boy, all the children then were reared. - Piedrahita, p. 11.

Perhaps the most flagitious motive for which this crime has ever become a practice, is that which the Guana women assign for it; they destroy the greater number of their femals infants in order to keep up the value of the sex. (Azara, t. ii 85-100. See Hist. of Brazil, vol. ii. 379.) A knowledge of the evils which polygamy brings upon some of their neighbors may have led to this mode of preventing it.

Father Gumilla one day hitterly reproved a Betoya woman (whom he describes as having more capacity than any other of the Indians in those parts,) for killing her new-born daughter. She listened to him without lifting her eyes from the ground, and when he had done, and thought that she was convinced of her guilt, and heartily repented of it, she said, "Father, if you will not be angry, I will tell you what is in my heart." Ha promised that he would not, and bade her speak freely. This she said to me, he says, as follows, literally translated from the Betoya tongue. "Would to God, Father, would to God, my mother when she brought me forth had loved me so well and pitied me so much as to have saved me from all those troubles which I have endured till this day, and am to endure til. death ! If my mother had buried me as soon as I was born I should have died, but should not have felt death, and should have been spared from that death which must come, and should have escaped so many things hitterer than death ; who knowe how many more such I must endura before I die ! Consider well, Father, the hardships that a poor Indian woman endurea among these Indians ! They go with us to the plantations, but they have a bow and arrow in their hands, nothing more ; wa go with a basket full of things on the back, one child at tha breast, another upon the hasket. Their business is to shoot a bird or a fish, ours is to dig and work in the field; at evening they go home without any burden ; we, besides our children, have to carry roots for their food, and maize to make their drink. They, when they reach the house, go to converse with their friends; we have to seek wood, fetch water, and prepara their supper. Having supped, they go to sleep ; but we almost all the night are pounding maize to make their chica. And what is the end of this our watching and labor? They drink the chica, they get drunk, and being out of their senses, beat us with sticks, take us by the hair, drag us about and trample on us. Would to God, Father, that my mother had huried me when she brought me forth! You know that I complain with cause, for all that I have said you witness every day. But our greatest pain you do not know, because you never can suffer it. You do not know, Father, the death it is for that poor Indian woman, when having served her husband as a slave, sweating in the field, and in the house without sleep, at the end of twenty years she sees him take a girl for another wife. Her he loves, and though she ill uses our children, we cannot interfere, for he neither loves us nor cares for us now. A girl is to command over us, and treat us as her servants, and if we speak, they silence us with sticks. Can any Indian woman do better for the daughter which she brings forth than to save it from all these troubles, and deliver it from this slavery, worse than death? I say again, Father, would to God my mother had made me feel her kindness by hurying me as soon as I was born ! Then would not this heart have had now so much to feel, nor these eyes so much to weep for."

Here, says Gumilla, tears put an end to her speech : and the worst is, that all which she said, and all she would have said, if grief had allowed her to proceed, is true. - Orinoco Illustrado, t. ii. p. 65, ad. 1791.

Some of the Orinoco tribes believe that their first forefathers grew upon trees. — Gumilla, t. i. c. fi.

The Othomacas, one of the rudest of the Orinocu tribes, suppose themselves descended from a pile of stones upon the top of a rock called Baraguan, and that they all return to stone as they came from it; so that this mass of rock is composed of their forefathers. Therefore, though they hury their dead, within the year they take off their heads and carry them to the holes in the rock. — Gumilla, t. i. c. 6.

These are the odd people who always for a first marriage give a girl to an old man, and a youth to an old woman. Polygamy is not in use among them; and they say, that if the young people came together, there could he no good household mangement. — Gumulla, t. i. c. 12.

P. Labbé (Lett. Edif. t, viii, p. 180, edit. 1781) speaks of a tribe on the north bank of the Plata who put their women to death when they were thirty years old, thinking they had then lived long enough. I have not seen this custom mentioned by any other writer, nor do I believe that it can possibly have existed.

And Father was his name. - Canto II. st. 28.

Tupa. It is the Tupi and Guarani name for Father, for Thunder, and for the Supreme Being.

The Patagones call the Supreme Being Soychu, a word which is said to express that which cannot be seen, which is worthy of all veneration, and which is out of the world. They may thus explain the word; but it connot contain this meaning; it is a definition of what they mean, and apparently not such as a savage would give. The dead they call Soychubet; they who are with God, and out of the world.

The Puelches, Picunches, and Moluches have no name for God. Their prayers are made to the sun, whom they regard ns the giver of all good. A Jesuit once admonished them to worship that God who created all things, and this orb among the rest; but they replied, they had never known any thing greater or hetter than the sun. — Dobrizhafter, t. ii, p. 100. The most remarkable mode of successition I remember to

The most remarkable mode of superstition I remember to nave met with is one which is mentioned by the Bishop of Santa Marta, in his History of the Nuevo Reyno de Granada. He tells us, that "the Pijaos of the Nuevo Reyno worshipped nothing visible or invisible, except the spirits of those whom they killed for the purpose of deifying them. For they thought that if an innocent person were put to death, he hecume a god, and in that capacity would be gratefol to those who were the authors of his apotheosis. For this reason they used to catch strangers and kill them; not thinking one of their own horde, or of their enemies, could he esteemed innocent, and therefore fitting. A woman or a child would do. But after a few months they held it necessary to make a new gol, the old one either having lost his power, or changed his place, or perhaps by that time discharged himself of his lebt of gratitude." — Piedrahita, p. 12.

> And once there was a way to that good land, For in mid-earth a wondrous Tree there grew. Canto 11, st. 33.

Los Mocobis fingian un Arbol, que en su idioma llamaban Nalliogdigua, de altura tan desmedida que llegaba desde la terra al cielo. Por el de rama en rama ganando siempre maior elevacion subian las almas à pezcar de un rio y lagunas muy grandes, que abunduban de pescado regaladisimo. Pero un dia que el alma de una Vieja no pudo pescar cosa alguna, y los pescadores lu negaron el socorro de una limosna para su mantenimiento, se irritó tanto contra la nacion Mocobi que, transfigurante en Capizuara tomó el exercicio de roer el Arbol por donde subian al ciclo, y no desistió hasta derribarlo en ticra con incrrible sentimiento y dano irreparable de toda la nacion.

This legend is contained in a manuscript history of Paraguay, the Rio de la Plata, and Tucuman. For the use of the first volume (a transcript of which is in my possession) I am beholden, as for other civilities of the same kind, to Mr. Thomas Kinder. This portion of the work contains a good account of the native tribes; the second volume contains

The land of souls. - Canto II. st. 39.

Mnny of the Indian speculations respecting the condition of souls in a future state are given in my History of Brazil. A description of a Keltic Island of the Blessed, as dressed up by Ossian Macpherson, may be found in the notes to Madee. A Tonga one is thus described in the very curious and valuable work of Mr. Mariner.

"The Tonga people universally and positively helieve in the existence of a large island lying at a considerable distance to the N. W. of their own islands, which they consider to be the place of residence of their gods, and of the souls of their nobles and mataboohes. This island is supposed to be much larger than all their own islands put together; to he well stocked with all kinds of useful and ornamental plants always in a state of high perfection, and always bearing the richest fruits and the most Leautiful flowers, according to their respective natures ; that when these fruits or flowers are plucked, others immediately occupy their place, and that the whole atmosphere is filled with the most delightful fragrance that the imagination can conceive, proceeding from these immortal plants. The island is also well stocked with the most heautiful birds of all imaginable kinds, as well as with abundance of hogs, all of which are immortal, unless they are killed to provide food for the Hotooss, or gods ; but the moment a hog or bird is killed, another living hog or bird immediately comes into existence to supply its place, the same as with the fruits and flowers; and this, as far as they know or suppose, is the only mode of propagation of plants and animals. The island of Bolotoo is supposed to be so far off as to render it dangerous for their canoes to attempt going there; and it is supposed, moreover, that even if they were to succeed in reaching so far, unless it happened to be the particular will of the guds, they would be sure to miss it. They give, however, an account of a Tonga canoe, which, in her return from the Feejee Islands a long time ago, was driven by stress of weather to Bolotoo : ignorant of the place where they were, and being much in want of provisions, and seeing the country abound in all sorts of fruit, the crew landed, and proceeded to pluck some bread fruit, but to their unspeakable astonishment they could no more lay hold of it than if it were a shadow. They walked through the trunks of the trees, and passed through the substance of the houses, (which were built like those of Tonga,) without feeling any resistance. They at length saw some of the Hotooas, who passed through the substance of their hodies as if there was nothing there. The Hotouas recommended them to go away immediately, as they had no proper food for them, and promised them a fair wind and a speedy passage. They accordingly put directly to sea, and in two days, sailing with the utmost velocity, they arrived at Hamoa, (the Navigators' Island,) at which place they wanted to touch before they got to Tonga. Having remained at Hamon two or three days, they sailed for Tonga, where they arrived with great speed, but in the course of a few days they all died, not us a punishment for having been at Bolotoo, but ns a natural consequence, the air of Bolotoo, os it were, infecting mortal bodies with speedy death."

In Yucatan their notion of the happy after death was, that they rested in a delightful land, under the shade of a great tree, where there was plenty of food and drink, — Herrera, iv, 10, n.

The Austral tribes believe that the dead live in some region under the earth, where they have their tents, and hunt the souls of ostriches. — Dobrizk, ii, 295.

The Persians have a great reverence for large, old trees, thinking that the souls of the happy delight to dwell in them, and for this reason they call them pir, which signifies an old man, by which uame they also designate the supposed inhabitant. Pietra Della Valle describes a producious tree of this character, in the hollow of which tapers were always kept burning to the bonor of the Pir. He pitched his tent under its boughs twice ; once with his wife when on his way to [feeting, the Brahmins address the respective elements in words embork for Europe, end again when returning with her corpse. The passage wherein he speaks of this last night's lodging is very affecting. We soon forgive this excellent traveller for his concombry, take an interest in his domestic affairs, and part with him et last as with an old friend.

Who thought

From Death, as from some living foe, to fly. - Canto II. st. 44.

An opinion of this kind has extended to people in a much higher grede of society than the American Indians.

"After this DEATH appeared in Dwaraka in a human shape, the color of his skin being black and yellow, his head close shorn, and all his limbs distorted. He placed himself at men's doors, so that all those who saw him shuddered with apprehension, and became even as dead men from mere affright. Every person to whose door he came shot an arrow et him; and the moment the arrow quitted the bow-string, they saw the spectre no more, nor knew which way he was gone "- Life of Creeshna.

This is a poetical invention; but such an invention has formed a popular belief in Greece, if M. Pouqueville may be trusted.

"The Evil Eye, the Cacodamon, has been seen wondering over the roofs of the houses. Who can dure to doubt this? It was in the form of a withered old woman, covered with funeral rags; she was heard to call by their names those who are to be cut off from the number of the living. Nocturnal concerts, voices murmuring amid the silence of the darkest nights have been heard in the air ; phantoms have been seen wandering about in solitary places, in the streets, in the markets; the dogs have howled with the must dismal and melancholy tone, and their cries have been repeated by the echoes along the desert streets. It is when such things happen, as I was told very seriously by an inhabitant of Nauplia di Romania, that great care must be taken not to answer if you should be called during the night ; if you hear symphonies, bury yourself in the bed clothes, and do not listen to them; it is the Old Woman, it is the Plague itself that knocks at your door." - Pouqueville, 189.

The Patagones end other Austral tribes attribute all diseases to an evil spirit. Their conjurers therefore heat drums by the patient, which have hideous figures painted upon them, thinking thus to frighten away the cause. If he dies, his relations endeavor to take vengeance upon those who pretended to cure him; but if one of the chiefs dies, all the conjurers are slain, unless they can save themselves by flight. - Dubrizhaffer, t. ii. 286.

They dragged the dying out. - Canto 11, st. 45.

The Austral tribes sometimes hury the dying, thinking it an act of mercy thus to shorten their sufferings. (Dobrizh, t. ii. 286.) But in general this practice, which extends widely among savages, arises from the selfish feeling assigned in the text. Superstition, without this selfishness, produces a practice of the same kind, though not absolutely as brutal, in the East. "The moorda or chultrics are small huts in which a Hindon, when given over by his physicians, is deposited, and left alone to expire, and be carried off by the sacred flood." Cruso, in Forbes, iv. 99.

"When there is no hope of recovery, the patient is generally removed from the bed, and laid on a platform of fresh earth, either out of doors, or prepared purposely in some adjoining room or viranda, that he may there breathe his last. In a physical sense, this removal at so critical a period must be often attended with fatal consequences; though perhaps not quite so decisive as that of exposing an aged parent or a dying friend on the banks of the Ganges. I now only mention the eircumstances as forming part of the Hindoo religious system. After having expired upon the earth, the body is carried to the water-side, and washed with many ceremonies It is then laid upon the funeral pile, that the fire may have a share of the victim : the ashes are finally scattered in the air, and fall upon the weter.

" During the funeral ceremony, which is solemn and af-to the following purport ; although there may be e different mode of performing these religious rites in other parts of Hindostan.

"O Earth ! to thee we commend our brother ; of thee he was formed ; by thee he was sustained ; and unto thee he now returns !

"O Fire ! then hadst a claim in our brother ; during his life he subsisted by thy influence in nature; to thee we commit his body; thou emblem of purity, may his spirit be purified on entering a new state of existence.

"O Air! while the breath of life continued, our brother respired by thee; his last breath is now departed; to thee wo yield him.

" O Water ! thou didst contribute to the life of our brother : thon wert one of his sustaining elements. His remains are now dispersed ; receive thy share of him, who has now taken an everlasting flight ! " - Forbes's Oriental Memoirs, iii. 12.

> And she, in many an emulous essay, At length into a descant of her own Had blended all their notes. - Canto III. st. 39, &cc.

An extract from a journal written in Switzerland will be the best comment upon the description in these stanzas, which indeed were probably suggested by my recollections of the Stanbach.

"While we were at the waterfall, some half score peasants, chiefly women and girls, assembled just out of reach of the spray, and set up - surely the wildest chorus that ever was heard by human ears - a song, not of articulate sounds, but in which the voice was used as a mere instrument of music, more flexible than any which art could produce, - sweet, powerful, and thrilling beyond description."

It will he seen by the subjoined sonnet of Mr. Wordsworth's, who visited this spot three years after me, that he was not less impressed than I had been by this wild concert of voices.

On approaching the Stanb-bach, Lauterbrunnen.

Tracks let me follow far from human kind Which these illusive greetings may not reach; Where only Nature tunes her voice to teach Careless pursuits, and raptures unconfined. No Mermaid warbles (to allay the wind That drives some vessel towards a dangerous beach) More thrilling melodies ! no cavera'd Witch, Chanting a love-spell, over intertwined Notes shrill and wild with art more musical ! Alas ! that from the lips of abject Went And Idleness in tatters mendicant They should proceed - enjoyment to inthrall, And with regret and useless pity haunt This bold, this pure, this sky-born Waterfall !

"The vocal powers of these musical beggars (says Mr. Wordsworth) may seem to be exaggerated ; but this wild and savage air was utterly unlike any sounds I had ever heard ; the notes reached me from a distance, and on what occasion they were sung I could not guess, only they seemed to belong in some way or other to the waterfall; and reminded me of religious services chanted to streams and fountains in Pagan times."

Some dim presage. - Canto III. st. 41.

Upon this subject an old Spanish romancer speaks thus: Aunque hombre no sabe lo de adelante como ha de venir, el espiritu lo siente, y antes que renga se duele dello : y de aqui se levantaron los grandes sospiros que hombres dan a sobrevienta no pensando en ninguna cosa, como a muchos acaesce : que aquel que el sospiro echa de si, el espiritu es que siente el mal que ha de ser. - Chronica del Rey D. Rodrigo, p. ii. c. 171.

suys, that nets are sometimes worn among the Guaranis instead of clothes, and refers to this very story in proof of his assertion. I believe he had no other ground for it. He adds, that "perhaps they were worn only to keep off the flies;" as if those blood-suckers were to be kept off by open network!

We owe something, however, to the person who introduces us to a good and valuable book, and I am indebted originally to Mr. Pinkerton for my knowledge of Dobrizhoffer. He says of him, when referring to the Historia de Absponibus, "the lively singularity of the old man's Latin is itself an amosement; and though sometimes garrulous, he is redundant in authentic and curious information. His work, though bearing a restricted title, is the best account yet published of the whole viceroyalty of La Plata."

Her feet upon the crescent moon were set. - Canto III. st. 51.

These lines are highly esteemed by the Portuguese critics.

Canto 111. st, 51.

" How hath the conceit of Christ's humiliation here on earth, of his dependence on his mother during the time of his formation and birth, and of his subjection to her in his infancy, brought forth preposterous and more than heathenish transformations of his glory in the superstitious daughters of the idolatrous church ! They cannot conceive Christ as King, unless they acknowledge her as Queen Dowager of heaven : her title of Lady is sequiparant to his title of Lord; her authority fur some purposes held as great, her bowels of compunction (towards the weaker sex especially) more tender. And as the Heathens frame Gods suitable to their own desire, solicitiog them most, (though otherwise less potent,) whom they conceive to be most favorable to their present suits, so hath the blessed Virgin, throughout the Romish Church, obtained (what she never sought) the entire monopoly of women's prayers in their travails ; as if her presence at others' distressful labors (for she herself, by their doctrine, brought forth her first-born and only son without pain) had wrought in her a truer feeling or tenderer tonch, than the High Priest of their souls can have of their infirmities ; or as if she would use more faithful and effectual intercession with her Son, than he can or will do with his Father. Some, in our times, out of the weakness of their sex, matching with the impetuousness of their adulterous and disloyal zeal, have in this kind been so impotently outrageous as to intercept others' supplications directed to Christ, and superscribe them in this form unto his mother; Blessed Lady, command thy son to hear this woman's prayers, and send her deliverance! These, and the like speeches, have moved some good women, in other points tainted rather with superstition than preciseness, to dispense with the law of secrecy, seldom violated in their parliaments ; and I know not whether I should attribute it to their courage or stupidity, not to be more affrighted at such blashhemies. than at some monstrous and prodigious birth. This and the like inhred inclinations unto superstition, in the rude and uninstructed people, are more artificially set forward by the fabulous Roman Legendary and his Limner, than the like were in the heathen, by heathen poets and painters."- Dr. Thomas Jackson's Works, vol. i. 1007.

Tyranny of the Spaniards. -- Canto IV. st. 7, 8.

The consumption of the Indians in the Paraguay tea-trade, and the means taken by the Jesuits for cultivating the Caatree, are described by Dobrizhoffer.

The Encontenderos compelled the unhappy people whom they found living where they liked, to settle in such places as were most convenient fur the work in which they were now to be compulsorily employed. All their work was task-work, imposed with little moderation, and exacted without mercy. This tyranny extended to the women and children ; and as all the Spaniards, the officers of justice as well as the Encomenderos, were implicated in it, the Indians had none to whom they could look for protection. Even the institutions of Christianity, by which the Spanish government hoped to better the temporal condition of its new subjects, were made the occasion of new grievances and more intolerable oppression. For, as the Indians were legally free, - free, therefore, to marry where they pleased, and the wife was to follow the husband, --- every means was taken to prevent a marriage between two Indians who belonged to different Repartmentos, and the interest of the master counteracted all the efforts of the priest. The Spanish women are said to have exceeded their husbands in cruelty on such occasions, and to have instigated them to the most violent and iniquitous measures, that they might not lose their female attendants. The consequence was, that profligacy of manners among the Indians was rather encouraged than restrained, as it is now in the English sugar islands, where the planter is not a religious man. - Lozano, 1. 1, § 3, 6, 7.

St. Joachin. - Canto IV. st. 17.

The legend of his visit to Limbo is given here in a translated extract from that very curious work, the Life of the Virgin Mary, as related by herself to Sister Maria de Jesus, Abbess of the Franciscan Couvent de la Inmaculada Concepcion at Agreda, and published with the sanction of all the ecclesization authorities in Spain.

After some conversation between the Almighty and the Virgin, at that time three years and a half old, the Franciscan confessor, who was the accomplice of the abless in this blusphemous imposture, proceeds thus :—

" The Most High received this morning sacrifice from his tender spouse, Mary the most holy, and with a pleased countenance said to her, . Thou art beautiful in thy thoughts, O Prince's daughter, my dove, and my beloved ! I admit thy desires, which are agreeable to my eyes : and it is my will, in fulfilment of them, that thou shouldest understand the time draws nigh, when by my divine oppointment thy father Joachin must pass from this mortal life to the life immortal and eternal. His death shall be short, and he will soon rest in peace, and be placed with the Saints in Limbo, awaiting the redemption of the whole human race,? This information from the Lord neither disturbed nor troubled the regal breast of Mary, the Princess of Heaven ; yet as the love of children to their parents is a debt due by nature, and that love in all its perfection existed in this most holy child, a natural grief at losing her most holy father Joachin, whom as a daughter she devoutly loved, could not fail to be resented. The tender and sweet child Mary felt a movement of grief compatible with the screnity of her magnanimous heart : and acting with greatness in every thing, following both grace and nature, she made a fervent prayer for her father Joachin: she besought the Lord, that, as the mighty and true God, he would look upon him in the hour of his happy death, and defend him from the Devil, especially in that hour, and preserve him, and appoint him in the number of his elect, as one who in his life had confessed and mugnified his holy and adorable name. And the more to oblige his Majesty, the most faithful daughter offered to endure for her father, the most holy Joachin, all that the Lord might ordain.

⁴⁴ His Majesty necepted this petition, and consoled the divine child, assuring her that he would be with her father as a merciful and compassionate remunerator of those who love and serve him, and that he would place him with the Potriarcha, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and he prepared her again to receive and suffer other troubles. Eight days before the death of the holy Patriarch Janchin, Mary the most holy had other advices from the Lord, deel ring the day and hour in which he was to die, as in fact it occurred, only six months after our Queen went to reside in the temple. When her Highness had received this information from the Lord, she hesonght the twelve angels, (who, I have before said, were those whom St. John names in the Revelation,) that they would be with her father Joachin in his sickness, and comfort hun, and console him in it; and thus they did. And for the last hear of his transit she sent all those of her guard, and besought the Lord that he would make them manifest to her father for his greater consolution. The Most High granted this, and in every thing fulfilled the desire of his elect, unique, and perfect one: and the great Patriarch and happy Joachin saw the thousand holy angels who guarded his daughter Maria, at whose petition and desire the grace of the Almighty superabounded, and by his command the angel said to Joachin these things: —

" Man of God, the Most High and Mighty is thy eternal salvation, and he sends thee from his holy place the necessary and timely assistance for thy soul! Mary, thy daughter, sends ns to be with thee at this hour, in which thou hast to pay to thy Creator the debt of natural death. She is thy most faithful and powerful intercessor with the Most High, in whose name and peace depart thou from this world with consolation and joy, that he hath made thee parent of so blessed a daughter. And although his incomprehensible Majesty, in his serene wisdom, hath not till now munifested to thee the sacrament and dignity in which he will constitute thy daughter, it is his pleasure that thou shouldest know it now, to the intent that thou mayest magnify him and praise him, and that at such news the jubilee of thy spirit may be joined with the grief and natural sadness of death. Mary, thy daughter, and our Queen, is the one chosen by the arm of the Omniputent, that the Divine Word may in her clothe himself with flesh, and with the human form. She is to be the happy Mother of the Messiah, blessed among women, superior to all creatures, and inferior only to God himself. Thy most happy daughter is to be the repuirer of what the human race lost by the first fall, and the high mountain whereon the new law of grace is to he formed and established. Therefore, as thou leavest now in the world its restauratrix and daughter, by whom God prepares for it the fitting remedy, depart thou in joy ; and the Lord will bless thee from Zion, and will give thee a place among the Saints, that thou mayest attain to the sight and possession of the happy Jerusalem."

"While the holy Angels spake these words to Joachin, St. Anna, his wife, was present, standing by the pillow of his hed; and she heard, and, by divine permission, understood them. At the same time, the holy Patriarch Joachin lost his speech, and entering upon the common way of all flesh, hegan to die, with a marvellous straggle between the delight of such joyful tidings and the pain of death. During this conflict with his interior powers, many and fervent acts of divine love, of faith, and adoration, and praise, and thanksgiving, and humiliation, and other virtues, did he heroically perform ; and thus absorbed in the new knowledge of so divine a mystery he came to the end of his natural life, dying the precious death of the Saints. His most holy spirit was carried by the Angels to the Limbo of the Holy Fathers and of the Just: and for a new consolation and light in the long night wherein they dwelt, the Most High ordered that the soul of the holy Patriarch Joachin should be the new Paranymph and Amhassador of his Great Majosty, for announcing to all that congregation of the Just, how the day of eternal light had now dawned, and the day-break was born, Mary, the most holy daughter of Joachin and of Anna, from whom should be born the Sun of Divinity, Christ, Restorer of the whole human race. The Holy Fathers and the Just in Limbo heard these tidings, and in their jubilee composed new hymns of thanksgiving to the Most High.

"This happy death of the Patriarch St. Joachin occurred (as I have before said) half a year after his daughter, Mary the most holy, entered the Temple; and when she was at the tender age of three and a half, she was thus left in the world without a natural father. The age of the Patriarch was sixty and nine years, distributed and divided thus; at the age of forty six years, he took St. Anna to wife; twenty years after this marriage, Mary the most holy was born; and the three years and a half of her Highness's age make sixty-nine and a half, a few days more or less.

"The boly Patriarch and father of our Queen being dead, the holy Angels of her guard returned incontinently to her presence, and gave her notice of all that had occurred in her father's transit. Forthwith the most prudent child selicited with prayers for the consolation of her mother St. Anna, entreating that the Lord would, as a father, direct and govern her in the solitude wherein, by the loss of her husband, Joachin, she was left. St. Anna herself sent also news of his death, which was first communicated to the Mistress of our divine Princess, that, in imparting it, she might console her. The Mistress did this, and the most wise child heard her. with all composure and dissimulation, but with the patience and the modesty of a Queen; but ahe was not ignorant of the event which her Mistress related to her as news." - Mistica Ciudad de Dios, par. I, 1. 2, c. 16, § 664-669. Madrid, 1744.

It was in the middle of the seventeenth century that the work, from which this extract is translated, was palmed upon the Spaniards as a new revelation. Gross and blasphemous as the imposture is, the work was still current when I procured my copy, about twenty years ago; and it is not included in the Spanish Index Expurgatorius of 1790, the last (I believe) which was published, and which is now before me.

He could not tarry here. - Canto IV. st. 67

A case precisely of the same kind is mentioned by Mr. Mariner. " A young Chief at Tonga, a very handsome man, was inspired by the ghost of a woman in Bolotoo, who had fallen in love with him. On a sudden, he felt himself lowspirited, and, shortly afterwards, fainted away. When he came to himself, he was very ill, and was taken accordingly to the house of a priest. As yet, he did not know who it was that inspired him, but the priest informed him that it was a woman of Bolotoo, mentioning her name, who had died some years before, and who wished him now to die, that he might he near her. He accordingly died in two days. The Chief said he suspected this, from the dreams he had had at different times, when the figure of a woman came to him in the night. Mr. Mariner was with the sick Chief three or four times during his illness, and heard the priest foretell his death, and relate the occasion of it." - Mariner.

The following similar cuse appeared in a newspaper :-" Died, on Sunday evening, the 14th instant, John Sackcouse, aged 22, a native of the west coast of Greenland. This Eskimany has occupied a considerable share of the public attention, and his loss will be very generally felt. He had already rendered important service to the country in the late expedition of discovery, and great expectations were naturally formed of the utility which he would prove on the expedition about to sail for Baffin's Bay. The Admiralty, with great liberality and judgment, had directed the greatest pains to be taken in his further education; and he had been several months in Edinburgh with this view, when he was seized with a violent inflammation in the chest, which carried him off in a tow days. He was extremely docile, and, though rather slow in the attainment of knowledge, he was industrious, zealous, and cheerful, and was always grateful for the kindness and attention shown to him. His amiable disposition and simple manuers had interested those who had opportunities of knowing him personally, in a way that will not soon be forgotten. To the public, his loss, we fear, is irreparable - to his friends, it is doubly severe. Just before his death, the poor Eskimaux said he knew he was going to die ; that his father and mother had died in the same way; and that his sister, who was the last of all his relations, had just appeared to him, and called him away." - Edinburgh Courant, Feb. 19.

ALL FOR LOVE,

A SINNER WELL SAVED.

TO CAROLINE BOWLES.

Could I look forward to a distant day With hope of building some elaborate lay, Then would I wait till worthier strains of mine Might bear inscribed thy name, O Caroline ! For I would, while my voice is heard on earth, Bear witness to thy genius and thy worth. But we have both been taught to feel with fear How frail the tenure of existence here, What unforeseen calamities prevent, Alas, how off ! the hest-resolved intent; And therefore this poor volume I address To thee, dear friend, and sister Poetess.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Keswick, 21 Feb. 1829.

The story of the following Poem is taken from a Life of St. Basil, ascribed to his contemporary St. Amphilochius, Bishop of Icooium; a Latin version of which, made by Cardinal Ursus in the ninth century, is inserted by Rosweyde, among the Lives of the Fathers, in his compilation Historiae Termiticae. The original had not then been printed, but Rosweyde obtained a copy of it from the Royal Library at Paris. He intimates no suspicion concerning the authentieity of the life, or the truth of this particular legend; observing only, that hare narratio apud solum invenitur Amphilochium. It is, indeed, the flower of the work, and as such had been culled by some earlier translator than Ursus.

- The very learned Dominican, P. François Combefis, published the original, with a version of his own, and endeavored to establish its authenticity in opposition to Baronius, who supposed the life to have been written by some other Amphilechius, not by the Bishop of tconium. Had Combefis possessed powers of mind equal to his erudition, he might even then have been in some degree projudiced upon this subject, for, according to Baillet, il avoit un attachement particulier pour S. Basile. His version is inserted in the Acta Sanctorum, Jun. t. ii. pp. 937-957.) But the Bolhandist Baert brands the life there as apocryphal; and in his anotations treats Combefis more rudely, it may be suspected, than he would have done, had he not belonged to a rival and hostile order.
- Should the reader be desirous of comparing the Poem with the Legend, he may find the story, as transcribed from Rosweyde, among the Notes.

I.

A YOUTH hath enter'd the Sorcerer's door, But he dares not lift his eye, For his knees fail, and his flesh quakes, And his heart beats audibly.

"Look up, young man!" the Sorcerer said; "Lay open thy wishes to me! Or art thou too modest to tell thy tale? If so, I can tell it thee. "Thy name is Eleëmon; Proterius's freedman thou art; And on Cyra, thy Master's daughter, Thou hast madly fix'd thy heart.

"But fearing (as thou well mayest fear !) The high-born Maid to woo, Thon hast tried what secret prayers, and vows, And sacrifice might do.

"Thou hast prayed unto all Saints in Heaven, And to Mary their vaunted Queen; And little furtherance hast thou found From them, or from her, I ween!

"And thou, I know, the Ancient Gods, In hope forlorn, hast tried, If haply Venus might obtain The maiden for thy bride.

"On Jove and Phæbus thou hast call'd, And on Astarte's name; And on her, who still at Ephesus Retains a faded fame.

"Thy voice to Baal hath been raised; To Nile's old Deities; And to all Gods of elder time, Adored by men in every clime, When they ruled earth, seas, and skies.

"Their Images are deaf! Their Oracles are dumb! And therefore thou, in thy despair, To Abibas art come.

" Ay, because neither Saints nor Gods Thy pleasure will fulfil, Thou comest to me, Eleëmon, To ask if Satan will!

"I answer thee, Yes. But a faint heart Can never accomplish its ends; Put thy trust boldly in him, and be sure He never forsakes his friends."

While Eleëmon listen'd He shudder'd inwardly, At the ugly voice of Abibas, And the look in his wicked eye.

And he could then almost have given His fatal purpose o'er; But his Good Angel had left him When he entered the Sorcerer's door.

So, in the strength of evil shame, His mind the young man knit Into a desperate resolve, For his bad purpose fit.

"Let thy Master give me what I seek, O Servant of Satan," he said, "As I ask firmly, and for his Renounce all other aid!

"'Time presses. Cyra is content To bid the world farewell, And pass her days, a virgin vow'd, Among Emmelia's sisterhood, The tenant of a cell.

"Thus hath her father will'd, that so A life of rigor here below May fit her for the skies, And Heaven acceptably receive His costliest sacrifice.

"The admiring people say of this That Angels, or that Saints in bliss, The holy thought inspire; And she is call'd a blessed Maid, And he a happy Sire.

"Through Cappadocia far and wide The news hath found its way, And erowds to Cæsarea flock To attend the solemn day.

"The robes are ready, rich with gold, Even like a bridal dress, Which at the altar she will wear When self-devoted she stands there In all her loveliness.

"And that coarse habit too, which she Must then put on, is made, Therein to be for life and death Unchangeably array'd.

"This night, this precious night is ours, Late, late, I come to you; But all that must be dared, or done, Prepared to dare and do."

"Thon hast hesitated long !" said Abibas, "And thon hast done amiss, In praying to Him whom I name not, That it never might come to this !

⁴ But thou hast chosen thy part, and here thon art, And thou shalt have thy desire; And though at the eleventh hour Thou hast eome to serve our Prince of Power, He will give thee in full thine hire.

"These Tablets take;" (he wrote as he spake;) "My letters, which thon art to bear, Wherein I shall commend thee To the Prince of the Powers of the Air.

"Go from the North Gate ont, and take On a Pagan's tomb thy stand; And, looking to the North, hold up The Tablets in thy hand; —

"And call the Spirits of the Air, That they my messenger may bear To the place whither he would pass, And there present him to their Prince In the name of Abibas. "The passage will be swift and safe; No danger awaits thee beyond; Thou wilt only have now to sign and seal, And hereafter to pay the Bond."

ſ١.

SUUNNING human sight, like a thief in the night, Eleëmon made no delay, But went unto a Pagan's tomb Beside the public way.

> Enclosed with barren elms it stood, There planted when the dead Within the last abode of man Had been deposited.

And thrice ten years those barren trees, Enjoying light and air, Had grown and flourish'd, while the dead In darkness moulder'd there.

Long had they overtopp'd the tomb; And elosed was now that upper room Where friends were wont to ponr, Upon the honor'd dust below, Libations through the floor.

There on that unblest monument The young man took his stand, And northward he the tablets held In his nplifted hand.

A courage not his own he felt, A wicked fortitude, Wherewith bad influences unseen That hour his heart endued.

The rising Moon grew pale in heaven At that unhappy sight; And all the blessed Stars seem'd then To close their twinkling light; And a shuddering in the elms was heard, Though winds were still that night.

> He call'd the Spirits of the Air, He call'd them in the name Of Abibas; and at the call The attendant Spirits eame.

A strong hand, which he could not see, Took his uplifted hand; He felt a strong arm eirele him, And lift him from his stand;—

A whirr of unseen wings he heard Abont him every where, Whieh onward, with a mighty force, Impell'd him through the air.

Fast through the middle sky and far It hurried him along;

The Hurricane is not so swift, The Torrent not so strong;-

The Lightning travels not so fast, The Sunbeams not so far; And now behind him he hath left The Moon and every Star.

And still, erect as on the tomb In impious act he stood, Is he rapt onward — onward — still In that fix'd attitude.

But as he from the living world Approach'd where Spirits dwell, His bearers there in thinner air Were dimly visible;—

Shapeless, and scarce to be descried In darkness where they flew; But still, as they advanced, the more And more distinct they grew.

And when their way fast-speeding they Through their own region went, Then were they in their substance seen, The angelic form, the fiendish mien, Face, look, and lineament.

Behold where dawns before them now, Far off, the boreal ray, Sole daylight of that frozen zone, The limit of their way.

In that drear realm of outer night, Like the shadow, or the ghost of light, It moved in the restless skies, And went and came, like a feeble flame That flickers before it dies.

There the fallen Scraph reign'd supreme Amid the utter waste; There, on the everlasting ice, His dolorous throne was placed

> Son of the Morning! is it then For this that thou hast given Thy seat, preëminent among The hierarchies of Heaven?—

As if dominion here could joy To blasted pride impart; Or this cold region slake the fire Of Hell within the heart!

Thither the Evil Angels bear The youth, and, rendering homage there Their service they evince, And in the name of Abibas Present him to their Prince :

Just as they seized him when he made The Sorcerer's mandate known, In that same act and attitude They set him before the throne. The fallen Scraph cast on him A dark, disdainful look ; And from his raised hand scornfully The proffer'd tablets took.

"Ay,—love!" he cried. "It serves me well There was the Trojan boy,— His love brought forth a ten years' war, And fired the towers of Troy.

"And when my own Mark Antony Against young Cæsar strove, And Rome's whole world was set in arms, The cause was,—all for love !

"Some for ambition sell themselves; By avarice some are driven; Pride, envy, hatred, best will move Some souls; and some for only love Renounce their hopes of Heaven.

"Yes, of all human follies, love, Methinks, hath served me best; The Apple had done but little for me, If Eve had not done the rest.

"Well then, young Amorist, whom love Hath brought unto this pass, I am willing to perform the word Of my servant Abibas.

"Thy Master's daughter shall be thine, And with her sire's consent; And not more to thy heart's desire Than to her own content.

"Yea, more ; -- I give thee with the girl, Thine after-days to bless, Health, wealth, long life, and whatsoe'er The world calls happiness.

"But, mark me!—on conditions, youth ' No paltering here we know! Dost thou here, solemnly, this hour, Thy hope of Heaven forego?

"Dost thou renounce thy baptism, And bind thyself to me, My woful portion to partake Through all eternity?

"No lurking purpose shall avail, When youth may fail and courage quail, To cheat me by contrition ! I will have thee written down among The children of Perdition.

"Remember, I deceive thee not, Nor have I tempted thee! Thou comest of thine own accord, And actest knowingly.

"Dost thou, who now to choose art free, Forever pledge thyself to me? As I shall help thee, say!"--

"I do; so help me, Satan!" said The wilful castaway.

"A resolute answer," quoth the Fiend; "And now then, Child of Dust, In further proof of that firm heart, Thou wilt sign a Bond before we part, For I take thee not on trust!"

Swift as thought, a scroll and a reed were brought, And to Eleëmon's breast, Just where the heart-stroke plays, the point Of the reed was gently press'd.

> It pierced not in, nor touch'd the skin; But the sense that it caused was such, As when an electric pellet of light Comes forcibly out at a touch; --

A sense no sooner felt than gone, But, with that short feeling, then A drop of his heart's blood came forth And fill'd the fatal pen.

And with that pen accurs'd he sign'd The execrable scroll, Whereby he to perdition bound His miserable soul.

"Eleëmon, Eleëmon!" then said the Demon, "The girl shall be thine, By the tie she holds divine, Till time that tie shall sever; And by this writing thou art mine, Forever, and ever, and ever!"

III.

Look at yon silent dwelling now ' A heavenly sight is there, Where Cyra in her Chamber kneels Before the Cross in prayer.

She is not loath to leave the world; For she hath been taught with joy To think that prayer and praise thenceforth Will be her life's employ.

And thus her mind hath she inclined, Her pleasure being still (An only child, and motherless) To do her Father's will.

The moonlight falls upon her face, Upraised in fervor meek, While peaceful tears of piety Are stealing down her cheek.

That duty done, the harmless maid Disposed herself to rest; No sin, no sorrow in her soul, No trouble in her breast. But when upon the pillow then, Composed, she laid her head, She little thought what unseen Powers Kept watch beside her bed.

A double ward had she that night, When evil near her drew; Her own Good Angel guarding her, And Elcëmon's too.

Their charge it was to keep her safe From all unholy things; And o'er her, while she slept, they spread The shadow of their wings.

So when an Evil Dream drew nigh, They barr'd him from access, Nor suffer'd him to reach her with A breath of sinfulness.

But with his instigations they A hallowing influence blent, And made his fiendish ministry Subserve to their intent.

Thus, while in troubled sleep she lay, Strange impulses were given, Emotions earthly and of earth, With heavenly ones of Heaven.

And now the nightingale hath ceased Her strain, who all night long Hath in the garden rosier trill'd A rich and rapturous song.

The storks on roof, and dome, and tower, Forbear their clattering din, As now the motions and the sounds Of daily life begin.

Then, as from dreams that seem'd no dreams, The wondering Maid awoke, A low, sweet voice was in her ear, Such as we might expect to hear If some Good Angel spoke.

> According with her dreams, it said, "So, Cyra, must it be; The dutics of a wedded life Hath Heaven ordain'd for thee."

This was no dream full well she knew; For open-eyed she lay, Conscious of thought and wakefulness, And in the light of day; And twice it spake, if doubt had been, To do all doubt away.

Alas! but how shall she make known This late and sudden change? Or how obtain belief for what Even to herself is strange?

How will her Father brook a turn That must to all seem shame?

How bear to think that vulgar tongues Are busy with her name? —

That she should for a voice — a dream — Expose herself to be the theme Of wonder and of scorn; — Public as her intent had been, And this the appointed morn!

The Nuns even now are all alert; The altar hath been dress'd, The scissors that should clip her hair Provided, and the black hood there, And there the sable vest.

And there the Priests are robing now; The Singers in their station; Hark! in the city she can hear The stir of expectation!

Through every gate the people pour, And guests on roof, and porch, and tower, Expectant take their place; The streets are swarming, and the church Already fills apace.

Speak, then, she must: her heart she felt This night had changed its choice; Nor dared the Maiden disobey, — Nor did she wish to (sooth to say,) — That sweet and welcome voice.

Her Father comes: she studies not For gloss, or for pretence; The plain, straight course will Cyra take (Which none without remorse forsake) Of truth and innocence.

"O Father, hear me patiently !" The blushing Maiden said; "I tremble, Father, while I speak, But surely not for dread;—

"If all my wishes have till now Found favor in thy sight, And ever to perform thy will Hath been my best delight, Why should I fear to tell thee now The visions of this night?

" I stood in a dream at the altar, — But it was as an earthly Bride; And Eleëmon, thy freedman, Was the Bridegroom at my side.

"Thou, Father, gavest me to him, With thy free and full consent; And—why should I dissemble it²— Methought I was content.

⁶ Months then and years were crowded In the course of that busy night; I clasp'd a baby to my breast, And, oh! with what delight! 63 "Yea, I was fruitful as a vine; Our Heavenly Parent me and mine In all things seem'd to bless; Our ways were ways of peace, our paths Were paths of pleasantness.

"When I taught lisping lips to pray, The joy it was to me, O Father, thus to train these plants For immortality !

" I saw their little winning ways Their grandsire's love engage; Methought they were the pride, the joy, The crown of his old age.

"When from the Vision I awoke, A voice was in my ear,— A waking voice,—I heard it twice; No human tongue was near;—

"No human utterance so could reach The secret soul, no human speech So make the soul rejoice; In hearing it I felt and knew It was an Angel's voice!

"And thus, in words distinct, it said : — 'So, Cyra, must it be ! The dutics of a wedded life Hath Heaven ordain'd for thee.'"

Her cheek was like the new-blown rose, While thus she told her tale; Proterius listened earnestly, And as he heard grew pale;—

For he, too, in the dreams of night, At the altar had seem'd to stand, And to Eleëmon, his freedman, Had given his daughter's hand.

Their offspring, courting his caress, About his knees had throng'd; A lovely progeny, in whom, When he was in the silent tomb, His line should be prolong'd.

And he had heard a waking voice, Which said it so must be, Pronouncing upon Cyra's name A holiest eulogy : —

"Her shall her husband praise, and her Her children bless'd shall call; Many daughters have done virtuously, But thine excelleth them all!"

No marvel if his heart were moved, The dream he saw was one; He kiss'd his trembling child, and said, "The will of Heaven be done!"

> Little did child or sire in this-The work of sorcery fear;

As little did Eleëmon think That the hand of Heaven was here.

IV.

FROM house to house, from street to street, The rapid rumor flies; Incredulons ears it found, and hands Are lifted in surprise; And tongues through all the astonish'd town Are busier now than eyes.

"So sudden and so strange a change ' A Freedman, too, the choice ! The shame,—the scandal,—and for what ? A vision and a voice !

"Had she not chosen the strait gate,— The narrow way,— the holy state,— The Sanctuary's abode? Would Heaven call back its votary To the broad and beaten road?

"To carnal wishes would it turn The mortified intent? For this are miracles vouchsafed? For this are Angels sent?

"A plain collusion! a device Between the girl and youth! Good easy man must the Father be, To take such tale for truth!"

So jndged the acrid and the austere, And they whose evil heart Inelines them, in whate'er betides, To take the evil part.

But others, whom a kindlier frame To better thoughts inclined, Preserved, amid their wonderment, An equitable mind.

They would not of Proterius thus Injuriously misdeem, — A grave, good man, and with the wise For wisdom in esteem.

No easy ear, or vain belief, Would he to falsehood lend; Nor ever might light motive him From well-weigh'd purpose bend.

And surely on his pions child, The gentle Cyra, meek and mild, Could no suspicion rest; For in this daughter he had been Above all fathers blest.

As dutiful as beautiful, Her praise was widely known, Being one who, as she grew in years, Had still in goodness grown And what though Eleëmon were A man of lowly birth? Enough it was if Nature had Ennobled him with worth.

"This was no doubtful thing," they said, "For he had in the house been bred, Nor e'er from thence removed; But there from childhood had been known, And trusted, and approved.

"Such as he wee, his qualities Might to the world excuse The Maid and Father for their choice, Without the vision and the voice, Had they been free to choose.

"But Heaven by miracle had made Its pleasure manifest; That manifested will must set All doubtful thoughts to rest. Mysterious though they be, the ways Of Providence are best."

The wondering City thus discoursed; To Abibas alone The secret truth, and even to him But half the truth, was known.

Meantime the Church hath been prepared For spousal celebration; The Sisters to their cells retire, Amazed at such mutation.

The habit and hood of camel's hair, Which with the sacred seissors there On the altar were display'd, Are taken thence, and in their stead The marriage rings are laid.

Behold, in garments gay with gold, For other spousals wrought, The Maiden from her Father's house With bridal pomp is brought.

And now before the Holy Door In the Ante-nave they stand; The Bride and Bridegroom side by side, The Paranymphs, in festal pride, Arranged on either hand.

Then from the Sanctuary the Priests, With incense burning sweet, Advance, and at the Holy Door The Bride and Bridegroom meet.

There to the Bride and Bride groom they The marriage tapers gave; And to the altar as they go, With cross-way movement to and fro, The thuribule they wave.

For fruitfulness, and perfect love, And constant peace, they pray'd,

On Elcëmon, the Lord's Servant, And Cyra, the Lord's Handmaid.

They call'd upon the Lord to bless Their spousal celebration, And sanctify the marriage rite To both their souls' salvation.

A pause at every prayer they made; Whereat, with one accord, The Choristers took up their part, And sung, in tones that thrill'd the heart, Have mercy on us, Lord !

Then with the marriage rings the priest Betroth'd them each to each, And, as the sacred pledge was given, Resumed his awful speech; ---

Pronouncing them, before high Heaven This hour espoused to be, Now and forevermore, for time, And for eternity.

This did he in the presence Of Angels and of men; And at every pause the Choristers Intoned their deep Amen!

Then to that gracious Lord, the Priest His supplication made, Who, as our sacred Scriptures tell, Did bring Rebecca to the well When Abraham's servant pray'd.

He call'd upon that gracious Lord To stablish with his power The espousals made between them, In truth and love, this hour;—

And with his mercy and his word Their lot, now link'd, to bless, And let his Angel guide them In the way of righteousness.

With a Christian benediction, The Priest dismiss'd them then, And the Choristers, with louder voice, Intoned the last Amen!

The days of Espousals are over ; And on the Crowning-day, To the sacred fane the bridal train, A gay procession, take again Through thronging streets their way.

Before them, by the Paranymphs, The coronals are borne, Composed of all sweet flowers of spring By virgin hands that morn.

With lighted tapers in array They enter the Holy Door, And the Priest with the waving thuribule Perfumes the way before. He raised his voice, and call'd aloud On Him who from the side Of our first Father, while he slept, Form'd Eve to be his bride ; —

Creating Woman thus for Man A helpmate meet to be, For youth and age, for good and ill, For weal and woe, united still In strict society,—

Flesh of his flesh; appointing them One flesh to be, one heart. Whom God hath joined together, Them let not man dispart!

And on our Lord he call'd, by whom The marriage feast was blest, When first by miracle he made His glory manifest.

Then, in the ever-blessed Name, Almighty over all, From the man's Paranymph he took The marriage coronal;—

And crowning him therewith, in that Thrice holy Name, he said, "Eleëmon, the Servant of God, is crown'd For Cyra, the Lord's Handmaid!"

Next, with like action and like words, Upon her brow he set Her coronal, intwined wherein The rose and lily met; How beautifully they beseem'd Her locks of glossy jet!

Her he for Eleëmon crown'd, The Servant of the Lord; — Alas, how little did that name With his true state accord!

"Crown them with honor, Lord!" he said, "With blessings crown the righteous head To them let peace be given, A holy life, a hopeful end, A heavenly crown in Heaven!"

Still as he made each separate prayer For blessings that they in life might share, And for their eternal bliss, The echoing Choristers replied, "O Lord, so grant thou this!"

How differently, meantime, before The altar as they knelt, While they the sacred rites partake Which endless matrimony make, The Bride and Bridegroom felt!

She, who possess'd her soul in peace And thoughtful happiness, With her whole heart had inly join'd In each devout address.

His lips the while had only moved In hollow repetition; For he had steel'd himself, like one Bound over to perdition

In present joy he wrapp'd his heart, And resolutely cast All other thoughts beside him, Of the future, or the past.

v.

Twelve years have held their quiet course Since Cyra's nuptial day; How happily, how rapidly, Those years have past away!

Bless'd in her husband she hath been; He loved her as sincerely, (Most sinful and unhappy man !) As he had bought her dearly.

She hath been fruitful as a vine, And in her children bless'd; Sorrow hath not come near her yet, Nor fears to shake, nor cares to fret, Nor grief to wound the breast.

 And bless'd alike would her husband be, Were all things as they seem; Eleëmon hath every earthly good, And with every man's esteem.

But where the accursed reed had drawn The heart-blood from his breast, A small red spot remain'd Indelibly impress'd.

Nor cou. I he from his heart throw off The consciousness of his state; it was there with a dull, uneasy sense, A coldness and a weight; —

It was there when he lay down at night, It was there when at morn he rose; He feels it whatever he does, It is with him wherever he goes.

No occupation from his mind That constant sense can keep; It is present in his waking hours, It is present in his sleep;—

But still he felt it most, And with painfulest weight it press'd, O miserable man ! When he was happiest.

O miserable man, Who hath all the world to friend, Yet dares not in prosperity Remember his latter end! But happy man, whate'er His earthly lot may be, Who looks on Death as the Angel That shall set his spirit free, And bear it to its heritage Of immortality!

In such faith hath Proterius lived; And strong is that faith, and fresh, As if obtaining then new power, When he hath reach'd the awful hour Appointed for all flesh.

Eleëmon and his daughter With his latest breath he bless'd, And saying to them, "We shall meet Again before the Mercy-seat!" Went peacefully to rest.

This is the balm which God Hath given for every grief; And Cyra, in her anguisb, Look'd heavenward for relief.

But her miserable husband Heard a voice within him say, "Eleëmon, Eleëmon, Thou art sold to the Demon!" And his heart seem'd dying away Whole Cæsarea is pour'd forth To see the funeral state, When Proterius is borne to his resting-place Without the Northern Gate.

Not like a Pagan's is his bier At doleful midnight borne By ghastly torchlight, and with wail Of women hired to mourn.

With tapers in the face of day, These rites their faithful hope display; In long procession slow, With hymns that fortify the heart, And prayers that soften woe.

In honor of the dead man's rank, But of his virtues more, The holy Bishop Basil Was one the bier who hore.

And with the Bishop side by side, As nearest to the dead allied, Was Eleëmon seen : All mark'd, but none could read aright, The trouble in his mien.

" Ilis master's benefits on him Were well bestow'd," they said, "Whose sorrow now full plainly show'd How well he loved the dead."

They little ween'd what thoughts in him The solemn psalm awoke,

Which to all other hearts that hour Its surest comfort spoke : ---

"Gather my Saints together; In peace let them be laid, They who with me," thus saith the Lord, "Their covenant have made!"

What pangs to Eleëmon then, O wretchedest of wretched men, That psalmody convey'd! For conscience told him that he, too, A covenant had made.

And when he would have closed his ears Against the unwelcome word, Then from some elms beside the way A Raven's croak was heard.

To him it seem'd a hollow voice That warn'd him of his doom; For the tree whereon the Raven sat Grew over the Pagan's tomb.

V1.

WHEN weariness would let her No longer pray and weep, And midnight long was past, Then Cyra fell asleep.

Into that wretched sleep she sunk Which only sorrow knows, Wherein the exhausted body rests, But the heart hath no repose.

Of her Father she was dreaming, Still aware that he was dead, When, in the visions of the night, He stood beside her bed.

Crown'd and in robes of light he came, She saw he had found grace; And yet there seem'd to be A trouble in his face.

The eye and look were still the same That she from her cradle knew; And he put forth his hand, and blest her, As he had been wont to do.

> But then the smile benign Of love forsook his face, And a sorrowful displeasure Came darkly in its place; —

And he cast on Eleëmon A melancholy eye, And sternly said, "I bless thee not,— Bondsman! thou knowest why!"

Again to Cyra then he turn'd,--"Let not thy husband rest Till he hath wash'd away with tears The red spot from his breast !

"Hold fast thy hope, and Heaven will not Forsake thee in thine hour: Good Angels will be near thee, And evil ones shall fear thee, And Faith will give thee power."

Perturb'd, yet comforted, she woke; For in her waking ear The words were heard which promised her A strength above all fear.

An odor, that refresh'd no less Her spirit with its blessedness Than her corporeal frame, Was breathed around, and she surely found That from Paradise it came.

And, though the form revered was gone, A clear, unearthly light Remain'd, encompassing the bed, When all around was night.

It narrow'd as she gazed; And soon she saw it rest, Concentred, like an eye of light, Upon her husband's breast.

Not doubting now the presence Of some good presiding Power, Collectedness as well as strength Was given her in this hour.

And rising half, the while in deep But troubled sleep he lay, She drew the covering from his breast With cautious hand away.

The small, round, blood-red mark she saw; Eleëmon felt her not; But in his sleep he groan'd, and cried, "Ont! ont—accursed spot!"

The darkness of surrounding night Closed then upon that eye of light. She waited for the break Of day, and lay the while in prayer For that poor sinner's sake —

In fearful, miserable prayer; But while she pray'd, the load of care Less heavily bore on her heart, And light was given, enabling her To choose her difficult part.

And she drew, as comfortable texts Unto her thoughts recurr'd, Refreshment from the living well Of God's unerring word.

But when the earliest dawn appear'd, Herself in haste she array'd, And watch'd his waking patiently,

And still as she watched she pray'd; And when Eleëmon had risen, She spake to him, and said: —

"We have been visited this night; My Father's Ghost I have seen; I heard his voice, — an awful voice '— And so hast thou, I ween!"

Eleëmon was pale when he awoke ; But paler then he grew, And over his whole countenance There came a deathlike hue.

Still he controll'd himself, and sought Her question to beguile; And forcing, while he answer'd her, A faint and hollow smile, ---

"Cyra," he said, "thy thoughts possess'd With one too painful theme, Their own imaginations For reality misdeem ; Let not my dearest, best beloved, Be troubled for a dream !"

> "O Eleëmon," she replied, "Dissemble not with me thus; Ill it becomes me to forget What Dreams have been to us!

"Thinkest thou there can be peace for me, Near to me as thou art, While some unknown and fearful sin Is festering at thy heart?

"Eleëmon, Eleëmon, I may not let thee rest, Till thou hast wash'd away with tears The red spot from thy breast '

"Thus to conceal thy crime from me, It is no tenderness ! The worst is better known than fear'd. Whatever it be, confess ; And the Merciful will cleanse thee From all unrighteousness!"

Like an aspen leaf he trembled, And his imploring eye Bespake compassion, ere his lips Could utter their dreaded reply.

" O dearly loved, as dearly bought, My sin and punishment I had thought To bear through life alone; Too much the Vision hath reveal'd, And all must now be known!

"On thee, methinks, and only thee, Dare I for pity call; A'bhor me not, — renounce me not, — My life, my love, my all !

" And, Cyra, sure, if ever cause Might be a sinner's plea, 'Twould be for that lost wretch who sold His hope of Heaven for thee !

"Thou seest a miserable man Given over to despair, Who has bound himself, by his act and deed, To the Prince of the Powers of the Air."

She seized him by the arm, And hurrying him into the street, "Come with me to the Church," she cried, "And to Basil the Bishop's feet !"

VII.

PUBLIC must be the sinner's shame, As heinous his offence; So Basil said, when he ordain'd His form of penitence.

And never had such dismay been felt Through that astonish'd town, As when, at morn, the Crier went Proclaiming up and down, —

"The miserable sinner, Eleëmon, Who for love hath sold himself to the Demon, His guilt before God and man declares; And beseeches all good Christians To aid him with their prayers."

Many were the hearts compassionate Whom that woful petition moved; For he had borne his fortune meekly, And therefore was well beloved.

Open his hand had been, And liberal of its store; And the prayers of the needy arose, Who had daily been fed at his door.

They, too, whom Cyra's secret aid Relieved from pressing cares, In this her day of wretchedness, Repaid her with their prayers.

And from many a gentle bosom Supplications for mercy were sent, If haply they might aid The wretched penitent.

Sorely such aid he needed then ' Basil himself, of living men The powerfulest in prayer, For pity, rather than in hope, Had bidden him not despair.

So hard a thing for him it seem'd To wrest from Satan's hand The fatal Bond, which, while retain'd, Must against him in judgment stand.

" Dost thou believe," he said, " that Grace Itself can reach this grief?"

me with me to the church or ne effective And to dasis the Wichops feet

And hurrying him into the street if me with me to the Cluip by by of

With a feeble voice, and a woful eye, "Lord, I believe!" was the sinner's reply; "Help thou mine unbelief!"

The Bishop then cross'd him on the brow, And cross'd him on the breast; And told him, if he did his part With true remorse and faithful heart, God's mercy might do the rest.

"Alone in the holy Relic-room Must thou pass day and night, And wage with thy ghostly enemies A more than mortal fight.

"The trial may be long, and the struggle strong, Yet be not thou dismay'd; For thou mayst count on Saints in Heaven, And on earthly prayers for aid.

"And in thy mind this scripture bear With steadfast faithfulness, whate'er To appall thee may arrive, — "When the wicked man turneth away from his sin, He shall save his soul alive!'

> "Take courage as thou lookest around On the relics of the blest; And night and day, continue to pray, Until thy tears have wash'd away The stigma from thy breast!"

"Let me be with him !" Cyra cried; "If thou mayst not be there; In this sore trial I at least My faithful part may bear:

" My presence may some comfort prove, Yea, haply some defence; O Father, in myself I feel The strength of innocence!"

" Nay, Daughter, nay; it must not be ' Though dutiful this desire; He may by Heaven's good grace be saved, But only as if by fire;—

"Sights which should never meet thine eye Before him may appear; And fiendish voices proffer words Which should never assail thy ear; Alone must he this trance sustain; Keep thou thy vigils here!"

> He led him to the Relic-room; Alone he left him there; And Cyra with the Nuns remain'd To pass her time in prayer.

Alone was Eleëmon left For mercy on Heaven to call; Deep and unceasing were his prayers, But not a tear would fall.

His lips were parch'd, his head was hot, His eyeballs throbb'd with heat; And in that utter silence He could hear his temples beat.

But cold his feet, and cold his hands; And at his heart there lay An icy coldness unrelieved, While he pray'd the livelong day.

A long, long day ! It pass'd away In dreadful expectation; Yet free throughout the day was he From outward molestation.

Nor sight appear'd, nor voice was heard, Though every moment both he fear'd; The Spirits of the Air Were busy the while in infusing Suggestions of despair.

And he in strong endeavor still Against them strove with earnest will; Heart-piercing was his cry, Heart-breathed his groaning; but it seem'd That the source of tears was dry.

And now had evening closed; The dim lamp-light alone On the stone cross, and the marble walls, And the shrines of the Martyrs, shone.

Before the Cross Eleëmon lay: His knees were on the ground; Courage enough to touch the Cross Itself, he had not found.

But on the steps of the pedestal His lifted hands were laid; And in that lowliest attitude The suffering sinner pray'd.

A strong temptation of the Fiend, Which bade him despair and die, He with the aid of Scripture Had faithfully put by; And then, as with a dawning hope, He raised this contrite cry :--

"O that mine eyes were fountains ' If the good grace of Heaven Would give me tears, methinks I then Might hope to be forgiven!"

To that meek prayer a short, loud laugh From fiendish lips replied : Close at his ear he felt it, And it sounded on every side.

From the four walls and the vaulted roof A shont of mockery rung; And the echoing ground repeated the sound, Which peal'd above, and below, and around, From many a fiendish tongue.

The lamps went out at that hideous shout, But darkness had there no place,

For the room was fill'd with a lurid light That came from a Demon's face.

A dreadful face it was, — too well By Eleëmon known! Alas! he had seen it when he stood Before the dolorous Throne.

"Eleëmon! Eleëmon!" Sternly said the Demon, How have I merited this? I kept my covenant with thee, And placed thee in worldly bliss!

"And still thou mightest have had, Thine after-days to bless, Health, wealth, long life, and whatsoe'er The World calls happiness.

"Fool, to forego thine carthly joys, Who hast no hope beyond ! For judgment must be given for me, When I sue thee upon the Bond.

"Remember I deceived thee not; Nor had I tempted thee : Thou camest of thine own accord, And didst act knowingly !

"I told thee thou mightst vainly think To cheat me by contrition, When thou wert written down among The Children of Perdition!

" 'So help me, Satan !' were thy words When thou didst this allow; I help'd thee, Eleëmon, then, — And I will have thee now !"

At the words of the Fiend, from the floor Eleëmon in agony sprung; Up the steps of the pedestal he ran, And to the Cross he clung.

And then it seem'd as if he drew, While he clasp'd the senseless stone, A strength he had not felt till then, A hope he had not known.

So when the Demon ccased, He answer'd him not a word; But, looking upward, he His faithful prayer preferr'd:

"All, all, to Thee, my Lord And Savior, 1 confess ! And I know that Thou canst cleanse me From all unrighteousness !

"I have turned away from my sin; In Thee do l put my trust; To such Thou hast promised forgiveness, And Thou art faithful and just!"

With that the Demon disappear'd; The lamps resumed their light; Nor voice nor vision more Disturb'd him through the night.

He stirr'd not from his station, But there stood fix'd in prayer; And when Basil the Bishop enter'd At morn, he found him there.

VIII.

WELL might the Bishop see what he Had undergone that night; Remorse and agony of mind Had made his dark hair white.

So should the inner change, he ween'd, With the outward sign accord; And holy Basil cross'd himself, And blest our gracious Lord.

"Well hast thou done," said he, "my son, And faithfully fought the fight; So shall this day complete, I trust, The victory of the night.

" I fear'd that forty days and nights Too little all might be; But great and strange hath been the change One night hath wrought in thee.'

> "O Father, Father," he replied, "And hath it been but one? An endless time it seem'd to me ! I almost thought Eternity With me had been begun.

"And surely this poor flesh and blood Such terrors could not have withstood, If grace had not been given; But when I clasp'd the blessed Cross, I then had help from Heaven.

"The coldness from my heart is gone; But still the weight is there, And thoughts, which I abhor, will come And tempt me to despair.

"Those thoughts I constantly repel; And all, methinks, might yet be well, Could I but weep once more, And with true tears of penitence My dreadful state deplore.

"Tears are denied; their source is dried! And must it still be so? O Thou, who from a rock didst make The living waters flow,---

"A broken and a bleeding heart This hour I offer Thee;

And, when Thou seest good, my tears Shall then again be free !"

A knocking at the door was heard As he ended this reply; Hearing that unexpected sound, The Bishop turn'd his eye, And his venerable Mother, Emmelia, the Abbess, drew nigh.

"We have not ceased this mournful night," Said she, "on Heaven to call; And our afflicted Cyra Hath edified us all.

"More fervent prayers from suffering heart, I ween, have ne'er been sent; And now she asks, as some relief, In this her overwhelming grief, To see the penitent.

"So earnestly she ask'd, that I Her wish would not defer; And I have brought her to the door : Forgive me, Son, if I err."

"Hard were I did I not consent To thy compassionate intent, O Mother," he replied; And raising then his voice, "Come in, Thou innocent!" he cried.

That welcome word when Cyra heard, With a sad pace and slow, Forward she came, like one whose heart Was overcharged with woe.

Her face was pale, — long illness would Have changed those features less; And long-continued tears had dimm'd Her eyes with heaviness.

Her husband's words had reach'd her ear When at the door she stood; "Thou hast pray'd in vain for tears," she said, "While I have pour'd a flood !

"Mine flow, and they will flow; they must; They cannot be repress'd! And oh, that they might wash away The stigma from thy breast!

"Oh that these tears might cleanse that spot, — Tears which I cannot check!" Profusely weeping as she spake, She fell upon his neck.

> He clasp'd the mourner close, and in That passionate embrace, In grief for her, almost forgot His own tremendous case.

Warm as they fell he felt her tears, And in true sympathy, So gracious Heaven permitted then, His own to flow were free.

And then the weight was taken off, Which at his heart had press'd; — 69 O mercy! and the crimson spot Hath vanish'd from his breast!

At that most happy sight, The four, with one accord, Fell on their knees, and blest The mercy of the Lord.

"What then! before the strife is done, Would ye of victory boast?" Said a Voice above: "they reckon too soon, Who reckon without their host!"

"Mine is he by a Bond Which holds him fast in law : I drew it myself for certainty, And sharper than me must the Lawyer he Who in it can find a flaw !

"Before the Congregation, And in the face of day, Whoever may pray, and whoever gainsay, I will challenge him for my Bondsman, And carry him quick away!"

"Ha, Satan! dost thou in thy pride," With righteous anger Basil cried, "Defy the force of prayer? In the face of the Church wilt thou brave it? Why, then we will meet thee there!

"There mayst thou set forth thy right, With all thy might, before the sight Of all the Congregation." And they that hour shall see the power Of the Lord unto salvation!

"A challenge fair! We meet then there" Rejoin'd the Prince of the Powers of the Air; "The Bondsman is mine by right. Let the whole city come at thy call, And great and small: in face of them all I will have him in thy despite!

So having said, he tarried not To hear the Saint's reply. "Beneath the sign which Constantine," Said Basil, "beheld in the sky, We strive, and have our strength therein Therein our victory!"

1X.

THE Church is fill'd; so great the faith That City in its Bishop hath; And now the Congregation Are waiting there in trembling prayer And terrible expectation.

Emmelia and her sisterhood Have taken there their seat; And Choristers, and Monks, and Prieste And Psalmists there, and Exoreists, Are station'd in order meet.

In sackcloth clad, with ashes strown Upon his whiter hair, Before the steps of the altar, His feet for penance bare, Eleëmon stands, a spectacle For men and Angels there.

Beside him Cyra stood, in weal Or woe, in good or ill, Not to be sever'd from his side, His faithful helpmate still.

Dishevell'd were her raven locks, As one in mourner's guise; And pale she was, but faith and hope Had now relumed her eyes.

At the altar Basil took his stand; He held the Gospel in his hand, And in his ardent eye Sure trust was seen, and conscious power, And strength for victory.

> At his command the Chorister Enounced the Prophet's song, "To God our Savior mercies And forgivenesses belong."

Ten thonsand voices join'd to raise The holy hymn on high, And hearts were thrill'd and eyes were fill'd By that full harmony.

And when they ceased, and Basil's hand A warning signal gave, The whole huge multitude was hush'd In a stillness like that of the grave.

The Sun was high in a bright blue sky; But a chill came over the crowd, And the Church was suddenly darken'd, As if by a passing cloud.

A sound as of a tempest rose, Though the day was calm and clear; Intrepid must the heart have been Which did not then feel fear.

In the sound of the storm came the dreadful Form; The Churck then darken'd more, And He was seen erect on the screen Over the Holy Door.

> Day-light had sicken'd at his sight; And the gloomy Presence threw A shade profound over all around, Like a cheerless twilight hue.

"I come hither," said the Demon, "For my Bondsman Eleëmon! Mine is he, body and soul. See all men!" and with that on high He held the open scroll.

> The fatal signature appear'd, To all the multitude, Distinct as when the accursed pen Had traced it with fresh blood. "See all men!" Satan cried again, And then his claim pursued.

"I ask for justice! I prefer An equitable suit! I appeal to the Law, and the case Admitteth of no dispute.

" If there be justice here, If Law have place in Heaven, Award npon this Bond Must then for me be given.

"What to my rightful claim, Basil, canst thou gainsay, That I should not seize the Bondsman, And carry him quick away?

> "The writing is confess'd;— No plea against it shown;— The forfeiture is mine, And now I take my own!

"Hold there!" cried Basil, with a voice That arrested him on his way, When from the screen he would have swoopt To pounce upon his prey;—

"Hold there, I say! Thou canst not sue Upon this Bond by law! A sorry legalist were he Who could not, in thy boasted plea, Detect its fatal flaw.

"The Deed is null, for it was framed With fraudulent intent; A thing unlawful in itself; A wicked instrument,— Not to be pleaded in the Courts.— Sir Fiend, thy cause is shent!

"This were enough; but, more than this, A maxim, as thou knowest, it is, Whereof all Laws partake, That no one may of his own wrong His own advantage make.

"The man, thou sayest, thy Bondsman is; Mark, now, how stands the fact! Thou hast allow'd, nay, aided him, As a Freedman, to contract A marriage with this Christian woman here, And by a public act.

"That act being publicly perform'd With thy full cognizance, Claim to him as thy Bondsman thou Canst never more advance; —

"For when they solemnly were then United, in sight of Angels and men, The matrimonial band Gave to the wife a right in him; And we on this might stand.

"Thy claim upon the man was by Thy silence then forsaken; A marriage thus by thee procured May not by thee be shaken; And thou, O Satan, as thou seest, In thine own snare art taken!"

So Basil said, and paused awhile; The Arch-fiend answer'd not; But he heaved in vexation A sulphurous sigh for the Bishop's vocation, And thus to himself he thought: —

"The Law thy calling ought to have been, With thy wit so ready, and tongue so free ! To prove by reason, in reason's despite, That right is wrong, and wrong is right, And white is black, and black is white,— What a loss have I had in thee !"

"I rest not here," the Saint pursued; "Though thou in this mayst see That in the meshes of thine own net I could entangle thee!

"Fiend, thou thyself didst bring about The spousal celebration, Which link'd them by the nuptial tie For both their souls' salvation.

"Thou sufferedst them before high Heaven With solemn rites espoused to be, Then and for evermore, for time And for eternity.

> "That tie holds good; those rites Will reach their whole intent; And thou of his salvation wert Thyself the instrument.

"And now, methinks, thou seest in this A higher power than thine; And that thy ways were overruled, To work the will divine!"

> With rising energy he spake, And more majestic look; And with authoritative hand Held forth the Saered Book.

Then with a voice of power he said, "The Bond is null and void! It is nullified, as thou knowest well, By a Covenant whose strength by Hell Can never be destroy'd! —

"The Covenant of grace, That greatest work of Heaven, Which whoso claims in perfect faith, His sins shall be forgiven.

"Were they as scarlet red, They should be white as wool; This is the All-mighty's Covenant, Who is All-mereiful! "His Minister am 1! In his All-mighty name To this repentant sinner God's pardon I proclaim!

" In token that against his soul The sin shall no longer stand, The writing is effaced, which there Thou holdest in thy hand !

"Angels that are in bliss above This triumph of Redeeming Love Will witness, and rejoice; And ye shall now in thunder hear Heaven's ratifying voice!"

A peal of thunder shook the pile; The Church was fill'd with light; And when the flash was past, the Fiend Had vanish'd from their sight.

He fied as he came, but in anger and shame; The pardon was complete; And the impious seroll was dropp'd, a blank, At Eleëmon's feet.

Pater autem cum lachrymis dicebat : Hen mihi peccatori ! quid est quod contight miser& filie mea ? quis thesaurum meam furatus est ? quis filie men injuriam intulit ? quis dulce oculorum meorum lamen extincit ? ego te semper supercalesti spinso consiliatus sum desponsare Christo, et Angelorum contubernio sociam constituere, et in psalmis et hymnis et canticis spiritualibus canere Deo accelerabum : tu autem in lasciviam petulantiæ insanisti ! Dimitte me, sient volo, cum Dro contractum facere, ne deducas senectutem meam cum marore in infernam, neque confusione nobilitatem parentum tuorum operias. Que in nihilum reputans, que à patre sibi dicebantur, perseverabat elamans : Pater mi, unt fac desiderium meum, aut privis pauxillum mortuam me videbis. Pater itaque ejus in magnà dementatione constitutus, tam immensitate mastitue absorptus, quam amicorum consiliis acquiescens se admonentium, ac dicentium, expedire potiás voluntatem puella fieri. quam sese maribus interficere, consensit, et præcepit fieri desiderium puelle putitis, quam cam critiabili tradere morti. Et moz protulit puerum qui quarebatur, simul et propriam genitam, et dans eis omnia bona sua, dient : Salve nata vere misera : multum lamentuberis repanitens in novissimis, quando nikil tibi proderit. Porrò nefandi matrimonii conjugio facto, et diabolicæ operationis completo facinore, et pauco tempore pretereunte, notatus est puer à quibusdam, quid non ingrederetur ceclesiam, neque attrectaret immortalia et vivifica Sacramenta, et dicunt miscranda uxori ejus : Noveris quia maritus tuus, quem elegisti, non est Christianus, sed extraneus est d'fide, et penitils est alienus. Qua tenebris et dirà plagà referta, projecit se in pavimentum, et capit ungulis semetipsam discerpere, et percutere pectus, atque clamare : Nemo umquam qui parentibus inobediens fuit, salvus factus est. Quis annuntiabit patri mco confusionem meam ? Heu mihi infeluci! in quod perditionis profundum descendi ! quore nata sum ? vel nata quare non statim indireptibilis facta sum? Hujusmodi er no eam complorantem seductus vir ejus agnoscens, venit ad eam, asseverans non se ita rei veritatem hobere : quæ in refrigerium suasoriis ejus verbis deveniens, divit ad eum : Si vis mihi satisfacere, et infelicem animam meum certificare, cras ego et tu pergemus unanimiter ad ecclesiam, et coram me sume iutemerata musteria, et taliter mihi poteris satisfacere. Tunc coactus dirit ei sententiam capituli. Protinus ergo puella femineà infirmitate deposità, et consilio bono accepto, currit ad pastorem et discipulum Christi Basiliam, adversus tantam clamons impictatem : Misericordiana mihi misera præsta sancte Dei, miserere mei discipule Domini, que contractum cum demonibus feci. Misercre mei, qua proprio putri facta sum inobediens. Et cognita illi fecit rei gesta negotia. Porro sonctus Dei convucato puero, sciscitabatur ab eo si hæc hujusmodi essent. Qui ad sanetum cam lachrymis ait : Etiam sancte Dei. Nam etsi ergo tacuero, oper. mea clamabunt. Et charravit ei et ipse malignam diaboli operationem, qualiter ab exordio usque ad finem fuerit subsecutus. Tune dieit ei : Vis converti ad Dominum Deum nostrum? Qui dixit : Etiam volo, sed non passum. Dicit ci : Cur ? Respondit : In scriptis abrenuntiavi Christo, et fadus pepegi cum diabolo. Dieit ei sanctus : Non tibi sit eura ; benignus est Deus naster, et suscipiet te panitentiam agentem. Benignus enim est super malitiis nostris. Et projiciens se puella ad pedes ejus, evangelice rogabat eum, dierns : Discipule Christi Dei nostri, si quid potes, adjura nos! Dicit sanctus ad puerum : Credis posse salvari? At ille dixit : Credo, Domine, adjura incredulitatem meam. Et confestim adprehensà manu quis, et facto super cum Christi signo simul et oratione, retrusit illum in uno loco intra quem sucri habebantur amictus, et datà ei regula orarit et unse pro illo per tres dies. Post auos visitarit cum. et dixit : Quomodo te habes, fili ? Dicit ei puer : In magnà sum, domine, defectione. Sancte Dei, non suffera clamores, pavores, jacula, et lapidationes ipsorum Tenentes enim propriæ manus med seripturam, objurgantur in me, dicentes : Tuvenisti ad nos, non nos ad te. Et dicit ei sanctus : Noli timere, fili mi, tantummodò erede. Et datà ci modica escà, et facto super cum Christi dennò signo et oratione, inclusit cum ; et post paucos dies visitavit illum, et dixit : Quomodo to habes, fili ? Ait : Pater sancte, à longe clamores eorum audio simul et minas; nava non video illos. Et rursus dato ei cibo, et effusà oratione clausit ostium, et discessit. Pratered quadragesimo die abist ad cum, et dicit illi : Quomodo te habes, frater ? Respondst et dicit ci : Benè, sancte Dei. Vidi enim te hodie in sommo pugnantem pro me, et vincentem Diabolum. Mox ergo secundum consuctudinem factà oratione eduxit illum, et duxit illum ad cubiculum suum. Mané autem facto, convocato tam venerabili clero, quam monasteriis et omni Christo amabili populo, dixit eis : Filii mei dilecti, universi gratias agamus Domino : Ecce enim futurum est, et ovem perditam pastor bonus super humeros suos imponat, et reducat Ecclesiæ : Et nos oportet pervigilem ducere nactem, et deprecari voluntatem ipsius, ut non vineat corruptor animarum. Quo protinus acto, et promptissime populo congregato, per totam noctem und cum bono pastore deprecati sunt Deum, cum laerymis pro ipso clamantes, Kyrie eleison. Et diluculà und cum omni multitudine populi assumit sunctus puerum, et tenens derteram manum ejus, duxit eum in sanctum Dei ecclesiam cum psalmis et hymnis. Et ecce Diabolus, qui vita nostra semper invidit, si hanc sine tristitia viderit, cum tota permiciosa virtute sua venit, et puero invisibiliter comprehenso, voluit raperc illum de manu sancti : et canit puer clamans dicere : Sancte Dei auxiliare mihi, et adeò contra illum impudenti instantià venit, ut ipsum cyregium Basilium simul cum illo impelleret et subverteret. Conversus ergo sanctus ed Diabolum ait : Impudentissime, et animarum violator, pater tenchrarum et perditionis, non tibi sufficit tua perditio, quam tibimet ipsi et his, qui sub te sunt, acquisisti, sed adhae non quieseis, et Dei mei plasma tentando? Diabolus verò dicit ad cum : Prajudicas mihi, Basili : ita ut multi ex nohis undirent voces ejus. At vero sanctus Dei ad eum : increpat, inquit, tibi Dominus, diabole. At ille, Basili, prejudicium mihi facis. Non ivi coo ad cum, sed ille venit ad me, abrenuntiando Christum, mecumque est sponsione pactuatus, et ecce scriptum habeo, et in die judicii caram communi judice deferam illud. Sanctus antem Domine deret : Benedictus Dominus Deus meus, non deponet populus iste manus ab excelso cali, nisi redduleris scriptum. Et conversus dixit plebi : Tollite manus vestras in calum, universi clamantes cum lacrymis, Kyrie eleison. Cumque staret populus horâ multâ extensas habrates manus in calum, ecce scriptum pueri in aerem deportatum, et ab omnibus visum venit, et positum est in manus egregii patris nostri pasturis Basilii. Suscepto anten 110, gratias egit Deo, gavisnsque vehementer una cum universa plebe, dixit ad pucrum : Recognoscis litterulas has, frater? At ille dixit ad cum : Etium sancte Dei, propriæ manus meæ scriptura est. Et diruptà scripturà introduzit cum in ccclesiam, et dignus habitus est sarris interesse Missarum officiis, et participatione sacrorum mysteriorum, et muneribus Christi. Et factà susreptione mogna recreavit universum populum, et ducto puero et instructo, atque datà ei decenti regula, tradidit cum uvori ejus, indesinenter glorificantem et laudantem Deum. . Amen.

Baert, though he pronounces the life in which this legend appears to be apocryphal, does not deliver a decided opinion upon the legend itself. He says, " Helladium Basilii in Episcopatu successorem faisse, omnibus est indubitatum ; vitam decessoris ab illo conscriptam, credimus (ut par est) S. Joanni Damasceno, qui utinam ad nos tantum transmississet the saurum ; eum enim videtur præ oculis habusse, eurs locum inde unum descripsit in vratione pro sacris Imaginibus. An vero ca, que hie narrantur, ex Helladio sunt, lector judicet. Potust enim fieri, ut co quo Pscudo-Amphiluchius scripsit tempore, fragmenta quædum Helladii extarent, quæ ipse retulerit in Basilium suum. Quod attinet ad Proterii filiam, a diemone in amorem juvenis concitatam, simile quid contigisse B. Mariw Antiochenæ referimus toma 7 Maji, die 29, pag. 52. Mihi tamen verosimilius est, eumdem qui Amphilochium mentitus est, mentiri etiam Helladium potuisse." - p. 952-3. Jun. t. 2.

The story, to which Baert refers, resembles the legend of St. Basil in one part, but is utterly unlike it in the circum stances wherein he has supposed the resemblance to exist. It | appears to have been one of those fictions which were composed honestly as works of imagination, not like the lives of St. Benedict, St. Francis, St. Dominic, St. Ignatius Loyola, and so many of their respective orders, with a fraudulent intent, to impose upon mankind. Like other such fictions, however, it has been adopted and legitimated by credulity and fraud, and the blessed Mary, the Virgin of Antioch, has her place accordingly in the Acta Sanctorum, on the 29th of May. But as the legend evidently was not written when Antioch was a Christian city, and, moreover, as the legend itself contains nothing whatever by which its age could be determined, Papebroche presents it as eo habendam esse loco, quo multa in Vitis Sanctorum Patram, utilem quidem instructionem continentia ad formandos mores, sed ad historicum certitudinem parum aut nihil. Igitur istam quoque ut talem hic damus; liberum lectori relinquentes, ut cam quo volet gradu credibilitatis collocet.

In this legend, one of the chief persons in Antioch, Anthemius by name, failing to win the affections of Maria, who was the daughter of a poor widow, and had resolved to lead a life of celibacy, applies to a Magician to assist him. The Magician sends two demons to influence mother and daughter in their sleep, so as to bring Maria to Anthemius's bedchamber; but the temptations of worldly wealth, which are offered, have only the effect of alarming them ; they rise in the middle of the night, and go toward the Church, there to pray for protection and deliverance ; and, on the way thither, one demon takes upon him Maria's form, while the other personates the mother, and thus decoys Maria into the apartment where Anthemius is expecting her. She is, however, allowed to depart uninjured, upon a promise to return at the end of fifteen days, and live with him as a servant, provided he will offer her no violence. Nothing can be more unlike the story of Proterius's daughter. Having extorted an oath from her, that she would return according to this promise, Authemius remains, wondering at the great power of the Magician. "Certes," thought he, "one who can do what he hath done in this matter is greater than all men ; why, then, should I not offer him all 1 am worth, if he will make me equal to himself?" And, being inflamed with this desire, he said within himself. "If I were such as he is, whatever I might wish for would be within my reach." This thought came into his mind as if it were by Divine Providence, to the end that he might willingly let the virgin depart, and that she might not be bound by the nefarious oath which she had taken, and that the devil, who was the instigator of his evil desires, might be confounded in his designs, both upon the virgin herself, and upon him who was at this time the virgin's enemy.

" As soon, therefore, as it was day, Anthemius went out to seek for the Sorcerer, and to give him thanks. Having found him, and saluted him, he delivered to him, with many thanks, the gold which he had promised ; and then, falling at his fect, earnestly entreated that he might be made such as the Sorcerer himself was, promising that, if this could be effected through his means, he would requite him with whatever sum he might demand. But the Sorcerer replied, 'that it was not possible for him to be made a sorcerer also, because he was a Christian, having been made such by his baptism.2 But Anthemius answered, 'Then I renounce my baptism and Christian name, if I may be made a sorcerer.' Still the Sorcerer replied, 'Thou canst not be made a sorceror, neither canst thou keep the laws of the sorcerers, the which if thun wert not to keep, thou wouldst then fall from a place which could never again be recovered.' But Anthemius, again embracing his feet, promised that he would perform whatever should be enjoined him. Then the Sorcerer, seeing his perseverance, asked for paper, and having written therein what he thought good, gave it to Anthemius, and said, ' Take this writing, and, in the dead of tee night, go out of the city, supperless, and stand upon yonder little bridge. A huge multitude will pass over it, about midnight, with a mighty uproar, and with their Prince seated in a chariot: yet fear not thou, for thou wilt not be hurt, having with thee this my writing; but hold up the writing, so that it may be perceived : and if thou shouldest be asked what thou doest there at that hour, or who thou art, say, 'The Great Master sent me to my Lord the Prince, with this letter, that I might deliver it unto him.' But take heed neither to sign thyself as a Christian, nor to call upon Christ; for in either case thy desire would then be frustrated.?

" Anthemius, therefore, having received the letter, went his way; and, when night came, he went out of the city, and took his stand upon the little bridge, holding up the writing in his hand. About midnight, a great multitude came there, and horsemen in great numbers, and the Prince himself sitting in a chariot; and they who went first surrounded him, saying, "Who is this that standeth here?" To whom Anthemius made answer, 'The Great Master bath sent me to my Lord the Prince with this letter.? And they took the letter from him, and delivered it to the Prince, who sat in the charlot; and he, having received and read the same, wrote something in the same paper, and gave it to Anthemius, that he should carry it to the Sorcerer. So, in the morning, Anthemius, having returned, delivered it to the Sorcerer, who, having perused it, said, 'Wouldst thou know what he hath written to us? even just as I before said to thee, to wit, 'Knowest thou not that this man is a Christian? Such a one I can in no wise admit, unless, according to our manner, he performeth all things, and renounceth and abhorreth his faith.' When Anthemius heard this, he replied, ' Master, now as elsewhile I abjure the name of Christian, and the faith, and the baptism.' Then the Sorcerer wrote again; and giving the writing to Anthemins, said, ' Go again, and take thy stand at night at the same place, and when he shall come, give him this, and attend to what he shall say.' Accordingly he went his way, and took his stand at the time and place appointed. Behold, at the same hour the same company appeared again, and they said unto him, ' Wherefore hast thou returned hither ? ' Anthemius answered and said, ' Lord, the Great Master hath sent me back with this writing.' The Prince then received it, and read, and again wrote in it, and gave it again to be returned to the Sorcerer. To whom Anthemius went again in the morning, and he, having read the writing, said unto him, 'Knowest thou what he hath written unto me in reply? I wrote to him, saying, " All these things, Lord, he bath abjured before me ; admit him, therefore, if it pleaseth thee." But he hath written back, " Unless he abjurcth all this in writing, and in his own hand, I will not admit him." Say now, then, what wilt thou that I should do for thee?'

" The wretched Anthemius answered and said, ' Master, I am ready to do this also.' And with that he seated himself, and wrote thus : - I, Anthemius, adjure Christ and his faith. I abjure also his baptism, and the cross, and the Christian name, and 1 promise that I will never again use them, or invoke them.' But, while he was thus writing, a copious sweat ran from him, from the top of his head to the soles of his feet, so that his whole inner garment was wet therewith, as he himself afterwards with continual teurs confessed. He nevertheless went on writing, and, when it was finished, he gave the writing to the Sorcerer to read, who, when he had perused it, said, 'This is well; go thy way again, and he will now certainly receive thee. And when he shall have admitted thee, say to him reverently, I beseech thee, Lord, assign to me those who may be at my bidding ; and he will assign unto thee as many as thon wilt have. But this I advise thee, not to take more than one or two familiars, inasmuch as more would perplex thee, and would be perpetually disturbing thee night and day, that thou mightest give them what to do. Then Anthemius returned to the same place as before, and awaited there, and the same company came there again at midnight, and the leader of them, having incontinently recognized Anthemius, hegan to cry out, 'Lord, the Great Master hath again sent lather this man with his commands : * and the Prince hada him draw nigh. And Anthemius, drawing nigh, gave unto him his profession of abjuration, full of calamity and woe. He, having received and read it, mised it on high in his hand, and began to exclaim, ' Christ, behold Anthemius, who heretofore was thine, hath, by this writing, abjured and execrated thee ! I am not the author of this his deed ; but be, offering himself to my service with many entreaties, hath of his own accord written this his profession of abjuration, and delivered it to me. Have thon then therefore no care of him from this time forth !' And he repeated these words a second time, and again a third.

"But when Anthemius heard that dreadful voice, he trembled from head to foot, and hegan at the some time to cry aloud, and to say, "Give me back the writing ! I am a Christian ! I beserch thee, I adjure thee ! I will be a Christian ! Give me back the profession which I have wickedly written !? But when the miserable man was proceeding thus to exclaim, the Prince said unto him, ' Never again mayst thou have this thy profession, which I shall produce in the terrible day of judgment. From this moment thou art mine, and I have thee in my power at will, unless an outrage be done to justice." With these words he departed, leaving Anthemius. But Authemius lay prostrate on his face upon the bridge till it was dawn, weeping and lamenting his condition. As soon as it was daylight he rose, and returned to his own house, where he remained weeping and lamenting, not knowing what he should do. Now there was another city, some eighteen miles off, where there was said to be a Bishop, who was a man of God. To him, therefore, he resolved to repair, that he might obtain his intercession, and having confessed the whole matter even as it had taken place, to he again by him baptized; for in his own city he was ashamed to confess what he had done. Having then cut off his hair, and clad himself in sackcloth, he departed, and came unto the Bishop, and having made himself known, was admitted to him, and threw himself at his feet, saying, 'I beseech thee, baptize mel? But the Bishop replied, " Can I believe that thou hast not yet been baptized?" Then he, taking the Bishop apart, told him the whole matter, saying, 'I have indeed received haptism when I was a child, but having now renounced it in writing, behold I am unbaptized !' To which the Bishop replied, ' How camest thou persuaded that thou hast been unbaptized of the baptism which thou hast received ?' Anthemius answered, 'In that nuhappy hour when I wrote the abjuration of my Lord and Savior, and of his baptism, incontinently a profuse sweat hurst out, even from the top of my head to the soles of my feet, so that my inner garments were wet therewith; and from that time I have believed of a truth, that even as I then abjured my baptism, so did it depart from me. Now, if thou canst, O venerable Father, help me, in compassion upon one who has thus voluntarily undone himself.' He said this prostrate on the ground, and bedewed with tears.

"When the man of God, the Bishop, heard this, he threw lamself upon the ground, and lay there beside Anthemins, weeping and praying to the Lord. Then, after a long while, rising, he roused Anthemius, and said to him, ' Verily, son, I dare not again purify by baptism a man who bath been already baptized, for among Christians there is no second baptism, except of tears. Yet do not thou despair of thy salvation, nor of the divine mercy, but rather commit thyself to God, praying and humbly beseeching him for all the remainder of thy life; and God, who is good and merciful, may render back to thee the writing of thy abjuration, and moreover furgive thee that impirity, as he forgave the ten thousand talents to the debtor in the Gospel. Hope not to find a better way than this, for there is no other to be found.' He then being persuaded thus to do, and having obtained the Bishop's prayers, went his way, weeping and groaning for the sin which he had committed; and having returned home, he sold all his goods, and set at liberty all his people, both men servants and maid servants, giving them also of his possessions, and the rest of his goods he distributed to the churches, and to the poor, secretly, by the hand of a faithful servant. Moreover, he gave three pounds of gold to the mother of that Virgin, with the love of whom the Demon, to his awn destruction, had inflamed him, having placed them in a certain church, saying, 'I beseech ye, pray to God for me a sinner: I shall never again trouble you, nor any other person; for I depart I know not whither, to bewail the wickedness of my deeds.? Thus this man did, - and from that time be was seen no more, casting himself wholly upon the mercy of God, to which nono who hath betaken himself can perish.

¹⁴ But we, who have heard the relation of this dreadful thing, praise the Almighty Lord our God, and adore the greatness of his works, that he hath protected the virgin Maria in her holy intention of leading a single file, and hath taken her mother out of poverty, affording liberally to them both for their support and maintenance, and hath delivered her also from the fear of sin, avoiding the transgression of the oath, which had passed between Maria the virgin and her enemy Anthemius, by annalling it. For the Lord brought these things to pass before the fifteen days, which were the appointed time between them, had elapsed. Wherefore we may say with the Evangelist, Our Lord hath done all things well. Nor hath he suffered the suppliant, who seeks him in ponitence, to perish; for he sailt, I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Let us, therefore, continue to entreat him, that we may he protected by his A1mighty hand, and may be delivered from all the devices of the Devil, and that, being aided by the prayers of the Saints, we may be worthy to attain the kingdom of Heaven. To the Lord our God belong all honor, and glory, and adoration, now and always, forever and ever. Amen."

The Greeks appear to have delighted in fictions of this peculiar kind. The most extravagant of such legends is that of St. Justina and St. Cyprian, which Martens and Durand present as a voitable history, censuring Bishop Fell for treating it os fabulons! It is much too long for insertion in this place, but it would be injured by abridging it. The reader may find it in the Thesaurus Novus Ancedotorum, t. iii. pp. 1618-1650. Calderon has token it for the subject of his Magico Fredigueso.

It was the north of Heaven that Lucifer, according to grave authors, attempted to take by storm. En aver eriado Dios con tanta hermosura el cielo y la terra, quedo ordenada su celestal Corte de divinas Hierarchias; mas reynô tanto la ingratitud en uno de los Cortesanos, viendose tan lindo y bello, y en mas eminente lugar que los demas (segun Theodoreto) que quiso emparejar con el Altissimo, y subir al Aquilon, formando para esto una quadrilla de sus confidentes y parciales.

The marriage. - p. 538, col. 2.

The description of the marriage service is taken from Dr King's work upon "the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia." "In all the offices of the Greek Church," he says, "there is not perhaps a more corious service than this of matrimony, nor any which earries more genuine marks of antiquity ; os from the bare perusal of it may be seen, at ona view, most of the ceremonics which antiquarians have taken great pains to ascertain." It agrees very closely with the ritual given by Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, t. ii. pp. 390-398.

In these ceremonies,

" The which do endless matrimony make," the parties are betrothed to each other "for their salvation," -- "now and forever, even unto ages of ages."

"A certain crown of flowers used in matriages," says the excellent Bishop Heber, (writing from the Carnatic,) " has been denonneed to me as a device of Satan! And a gentleman has just written to complain that the Danish Government of Tranquebar will not allow him to excommunicate some young persons for wearing masks, and acting, as it appears, in a Christmas munimery, or at least in some private rustic thearticals. If this be heathenish, Heaven help the wicked! Basil, of living men The powerfulest in prayer. — p. 542, col. 2.

The most remarkable instance of St. Basil's power in prayer is to be found, not in either of his lives, the veracious or the apocryphal one, but in e very curious account of the opinions held by the Armenian Christians, as drawn up for the information of Pope Benedict XII., and inserted by Domenica Bernino in his Historia di tutte l'Heresie (Secolo xiv. cap. iv. t. iii, pp. 508-536.) It is there related that on the sixth day of the Creation, when the rebellious angels fell from heaven through that opening in the firmament which the Armenians call Arocea, and we the Galaxy, one unlucky angel, who had no participation in their sin, but seems to have heen caught in the crowd, fell with them; and many others would in like manoer have fallen by no fault of their owe, if the Lord had not said unto them, Pax vobis. But this unfortunate angel was not restored till he obtained, it is not said hnw, the prayers of St. Basil; his condition meantime, from the sixth day of the Creation to the fourth century of the Christian era, must have been even more uncomfortable than that of Klopstock's repentant Devil. - p. 512, § 16.

Eleëmon's penance. - p. 543, col. 1.

In the legend the penitent is left forty days and nights to contend with the Powers of Darkness in the Relic Chamber. Captain Hall relates an amusing example of the manner in which pennece may he managed at this time in Mexico. "I went," he says, " to the Convent of Le Cruz to visit e ⁶⁵ I went," he says, "to the Convent of L6 Craz to visit e friend who was doing penance, not for a sin he had committed, but for one he was preparing to commit. The case was this : -- Don N, had recently lost his wife, and, not choosing to live a disposition to take little trouble in such a research, or, probably, thinking that no labor could procure for him any one so suitable as what his own house afforded, he proposed the matter to bis lately lamented wife's sister, who had lived in his house several years; and who, as he told me himself, was not only a very good sort of person, but one well acquainted with all the details of bis household, known and esteemed by his children, and accustomed to his society.

" The church, however, looked exceedingly grave upon the occasion ; not, however, as I at first supposed, from the nearness of the connection, or the shortness of the interval since the first wife's death, but because the intended lady had stood godmother to four of Don N.'s children. This, the church said, was a serious bar to the new elliance, which nothing could surmount but protracted penances and extensive charity. Don N. was urgent; and a council was assembled to deliberate on the matter. The learned body declared, after some discussion, the case to be a very knotty one; end that, as the lady had been four times godmother to Don N.'s children, it was impossible she could matry him. Nevertheless, the Fathers (compassionate persons !) wished to give the unhappy couple another chance ; and agreed to refer the question to a learned doctor in the neighborhood, skilled in all difficult questions of cashistry. This sage person decided that, according to the canons of the church, the marriage might take place, on payment of a fine of four hundred dollars ; two for the poor in pocket, and two for the poor in spirit ; namely, the priests. But to explate the crime of marrying a quadruple godmother, a slight penance must also be submitted to in the following manner. Don N. was to place himself on his knees before the altar, with a long wax candle burning in his hand, while his intended lady stood by his side holding another ; this was to be repeated in the face of the congregation, for one hour, during every Sunday and fast-day throughout a whole year; after which purifying exposure, the parties were to be held elig ble to proceed with the marriage. Don N., who chose rather to put his conscience than his knees to such discipline, took his own measures on the occasion. What these were, the idle public took the liberty of guessing broadly enough, but no one could say positively. At the end of a week, however, it was announced, that the case had undergone a careful reëxamination, and that it had been deemed proper to commute the penance into one week's retirement from the world; that is to say, Don N. was to shut himself up in the Couvent of La Cruz, there to fast and pray in solitude and silence for seven days. The manner in which this penance was performed is an appropriate commentary on the whole transaction. The penitent, aided and assisted by two or three of the jovial friars of the convent, passed the evening in discussing some capital wine, sent out for the occasion by Don N. himself, after eating a dinner, prepared by the cook of the convent, the hest in New Galicia. As for silence end solitude, his romping boys and girls were with him during all the morning ; besides a score of visitors, who strolled daily out of town as far as the convent, to keep up the poor man's spirits, by relating all the gossip which was afloat aboat his marriage, his penitecce, and the wonderful kindness of the church." — CAPT. HALL'S Journal, vol. ii. pp. 210—214.

"I have read of a gentleman," says Bishop Taylor, " who, being on his death-bed, and his confessor searching and dressing his wounded soul, wes found to be obliged to make restitution of a considerable sum of money, with the diminution of his estate. His confessor found him desirous to be saved, a lover of his religion, and yet to have a kindness for his estate, which he desired might he entirely transmitted to his beloved heir: he would serve God with all his heart, and repented him of his sin, of his rapine and injustice ; he begged for pardon passionately, he humhly hoped for mercy, he resolved, in case he did recover, to live strictly, to love God, to reverence his priests, to be charitable to the poor ; but to make restitution be found impossible to him, and he hoped the commandment would not require it of him, and desired to be relieved by an easy and a favorable interpretation; for it is ten thousand pities so many good actions and good purposes should be in vain, but it is worse, infinitely worse, if the man should perish. What should the confessor do in this case ? - shall not the man be relieved, and his piety be accepted; or shall the rigor and severity of his confessor, and his scrupulous fears and impertinent niceness, cast away a soul either into future misery, or present discomfort? Neither one ner other was to be done ; and the good man was only to consider what God had made necessary, not what the vices of his penitent and his present follies should make so. Well: the priest insists upon his first resolution, " Non dimittitur peccatum, nisi restituatur ablatum ;' the sick man could have no ease by the loss of a duty. The poor clinic desires the confessor to deal with his son, and try if he could be made willing that his father might go to heaven at charge of his son, which when he had attempted, he was answered with extreme rudeness and injurious language ; which caused great trouble to the priesand to the dying father. At last the religious man found out this device, telling his penitent, that unless by corporal penances there could be made satisfaction in exchange of restitution, he knew no hopes ; but because the profit of the estate, which was obliged to restitution, was to descend upon the son, he thought something might be hoped, if, by way of commutation, the son would hold his finger in a burning candle for a quarter of an hour. The glad father, being overjoyed at this loop-bole of eternity, this glimpse of heaven, and the certain retaining of the whole estate, called to his son, told him the comlition and the advantages to them both, making no question but he would gladly undertake the penance. But the son with indignation replied, the woold not endure so much torture to save the whole estate.' To which the priest, espying his advantage, made this quick return to the old man : - ' Sir, if your son will not, for a quarter of an hour, endure the pains of a burning finger to save your soul, will you, to save a portion of the estate for him, endure the flames of hell to eternal ages ?' The unreasonableness of the odds, and the ungratefulness of the son, and the importunity of the priest, and the fear of hell, and the indispensable necessity of restitution, awakened the old man from his lethargy, and he bowed himself to the rule, made restitution, and had hopes of pardon and present comfort."-- Works of JEREMY TAYLOR, vol. xili, p. 38.

The penances which Indian families voluntarily undertake and perform would be deemed impossible in Europe, if they had not been witnessed by so many persons of unquestionable authority. The penances which the Bramins enjoin are probably more severe than they would otherwise be, on this account, lest they should seem triffing in the eyes of a people accustomed to such exhibitions.

" If a Shoodrn go to a Brambunee of bad character, he must renonnce life by casting himself into a large fire. If a Shoodru go to a Branhunce of unsullied character, he must tie straw round the different parts of his body, and cast himself into the fire. The woman must be placed on an ass and led round the city, and then go the Great Way: the meaning of this is, she must wander to these sacred places of the Hindoos where the climate is exceedingly cold, and proceed till she actually perish with cold. This is a meritorious way of terminating life, and is mentioned as such in the Hindoo writings."— WARD, vol. i. p. 427.

Sometimes the law is frustrated by its own severity. " It is a dogma of general notoricty, that if a Jungum has the mischance to lose his Lingum, he ought not to survive the misfortune. Poornia, the present minister of Mysoor, relates an incident of a Ling-ayet friend of his, who had unhappily lost his portable god, and came to take a last farewell. The Indians, like more enlightened nations, readily laugh at the absurdities of every sect but their own, and Poornia gave him better counsel. It is a part of the ceremonial, preceding the sacrifice of the individual, that the principal persons of the sect should assemble on the banks of some holy stream, and placing in a basket the lingum images of the whole assembly, parify them in the sacred waters. The destined victim, in conformity to the advice of his friend, suddenly seized the basket, and overturned its contents into the rapid Caveri. ' Now, my friends,' said he, ' we are on equal terms : let us prepare to dic together.' The discussion terminated according to expectation. The whole party took an oath of inviolable secrecy, and each privately provided himself with a new image of the lingum." - WILKS, vol. i. p. 506.

In 1790, when the Mahrattas were to have cooperated with Lord Cornwallis at Seringapatam, their general, Parasu Ram Bhao, became unclean from eating with a Bramin who had -kissed a cobbler's wife. There was no stream near holy enough to wash away the impurity ; so he marched his whole immense army to the junction of the Tungha and the Badra, Major Moor, who was with him, says, " During this march, uncalled for in a military point of view, the army laid waste scores of towns and thousands of acres, - indeed, whole districts; we fought battles, stormed forts, destroyed a large army, and ran every military risk. Having reached the sacred place of junction, he washed, and having been made clean, was weighed against gold and silver ; his weight was 16,000 pagodas, about 70001., which was given to the Bramins. They who had eaten with the Bramin at the same time, in like manner washed away the defilement ; but the weighing is a coremony peculiar to the great." - Mooa's Handu Infanticide, p. 234.

¹⁰ The present king of Travancore has conquered, or carried war into all the countries which lay round his dominions, and lives in the continual exercise of his arms. To atone for the blood which he has spilt, the Brachmans personaled him that it was necessary he should be born anew : this ceremony consisted in putting the prince into the body of a golden cow of immense value, where, after he had lain the time prescribed, he came out regenerated, and freed from all the crimes of his former life. The cow was afterwards cut up, and divided amongst the seers who had invented this extraordinary method for the remission of his sins.¹⁹ — ORNE's Fragments.

A far less expensive form was observed among the ancient Greeks, in cases wherein a second lirth was deemed indispensable; " for in Greece they thought not those pure and clean who had been carried forth for deal to be interred, or whose sepulchre and funerals had been solemnized or prepared; neither were such allowed to frequent the company of others, nor suffered to como near unto their sacrifices. And there goeth a report of a certain man named Aristinus, one of those who had been possessed with this superstition; have he sand and prayer unto the god, for to be delivered out of this perplexed anxiety that troubled hum by occasion of the said custom, or law, then in force, and that the prophetess Pythia returned this answer :—

> " Look whatseever women do, in childbed newly laid,

Unto their babes which they brought forth, the very same, 1 say,

See that be done to thee again ; and after that be sure,

Unto the blessed Gods with hands to sacrifice, most pure.

"Which eracle thus delivered, Aristinns, having well peadered and considered, committed himself as an infant new bern unto women, for to be washed, to be wrapped in swaddling clothes, and to be suckled with the breast-head: after which all such others, whom we call Hysteropotmous, that is to say, those whose graves were made as if they were dead, did the semblable. Howheit some do say that, before Aristinus was born, these cormonies were observed about these Hysteropotmoi, and that this was a right ancient custom kept in the semblable case." - PLDTURCH's Morals, tr. by Philemon Holland, p. 852.

There is the authority of a Holy Man, in the Romance of Merlin, — which is as good authority for such a fact as any thing in the Acta Sancterum, — that the Devil, like other wild beasts who prowl about seeking what they may devour, is afraid of a light. The Holy Mun'a advice to a pious damsel is never to lie down in the dark: "garde que la ou tu coucheras il y at lousjours clarté, car le Diable hait toutes cleres choses; ne ne vient pas voulentiers ou il y a clarte." — vol. i. f. 4.

And white is black, and black is white. - p. 547, col. 1.

Satan might have been reconciled to St. Basil's profession if he had understood, by his faculty of second-sight, that this, which it is sometimes the business of a lawyer to prove, would one day he the duty of the Romanists to believe, if their church were to tell them so. No less a personage than St. Ignatius Loyola has asserted this. In his Exerctia Spiritualia, the 13th of the Rules which are laid down ad sentiendum can Ecclesia, is in these words:--

"Denique, at ipsi Ecclesiæ Catholicæ omnino unanimes, conformesque simus, si quid, quod oculis nostris apparet album, nigrum illa esse definierit, debemos itidem, quod nigrum sit, pronuntiare. Indubiate namque credendum est, enden esse Domini nostri Jesu Christi, et Ecclesiæ orthodora, sponsæ ejus, spiritum, per quem gubernamur ac dirigimur ad salutem; neque alinm esse Deum, qui olim tradidit Decalogi præcepta, et qui nune temports Ecclesiam hierurchiciam instruit atque regit." — p. 141. Antwerpiæ, 1655.

Such is the implicit obedience enjoined in those Spiritual Exercises, of which Pope Paul III, said in his brief, sub annulo Piscatoris, "Omnia et singula in eis contenta, ex certà scientà nostrà, approbanus, collaudanus, ac presentis scripti patrocinio communius." The Romanists are to believe that black is white, if the Roman Church tells them so: morally and politically it has often told them so, and they have believed and acted accordingly.

This is not the only miracle of this kind recorded of St. Basil.

" There was a certain woman of noble family, and born of rich parents, who was wholly made up of the vanities of this world, and beyond measure arrogant in all things; she, becoming a widow, wasted her substance shamelessly, living a loose and profligate life, doing none of those things which are enjoined by the Lord, but wallowing like a swine in the mire and filth of her iniquities. But being at length, by the will of God, brought to a consideration of her own estate, and her mind filled with consciousness of the immeasurable offences which she had committed, she called to remembrance the multitude of her sins, and bewailed them penitently, saying, Wee to me a sinner, how shall I render an account of the multitude of my sins ! I have profaned a spiritual temple ; I have defiled the soul which inhabiteth this body! Wce is me, woe is me ! what have I done ! what hath befallen me ! Shall I say, like the Harlot or the Publican, that I have sinned? But no one has sinned like me ! How, then, shall I be assured that God will receive my repentance ?" While she meditated in herself upon these things, He, who would that all should be saved and brought back into the way of truth, and would have no one perish, was pleased to bring unto her remembrance all the sins which she had committed from her youth up. And she set down in writing all these offences, even all that she had committed from her youth to this her elder age ; and, last of all, she set down one great and heinous sin, the worst of all ; and having done this, she folded up the writing, and fastened it with lead. After this, having waited till a convenient season, when holy Basil was accustomed to go to the church that he might pray there, she ran before to meet him, and threw the writing at his feet, and prostrated herself before him, saying, 'O, hely man of God, have compassion upon me a sinner, yea, the vilest of sinners ! The most blessed man stopt thereat, and asked of her ' wherefore she thus groaned and lamented : ' and she said unto him, Saint of God, see, I have set down all my sins and iniquities in this writing, and I have folded it, and fastened it with lead ; do not thun, I charge thee, open it, but by thy powerful prayers blot out all that is written therein." Then the great and holy Basil held up the writing, and, looking toward Heaven, said, 'O Lord, to Thee alone all the deeds of this woman are manifest ! Thou hast taken away the sins of the world, and more easily mayst thou blot out these of this single soul. Before thee, indeed, all our offences are numbered ; but thy mercy is infinite.' Saying thus, he went into the church, holding the aforesaid writing in his hand; and prostrating himself before the altar, there he remeined through the night, and on the morrow, during the performance of all the masses which were celebrated there, entreating God for this woman's sake. And when she came to him, he gave her the writing, and said to her, ' Woman, hast thou heard that the remission of sins can come from God alone ?' She answered, 'Yea, father; and therefore have I supplicated thee that thou shouldst intercede with that most merciful God in my behalf.' And then she opened the writing, and found that it was all blotted out, save only that the one great and most beinous sin still remained written there. But she, seeing that this great sin was still legible as before, beat her breast, and began to bewail herself, and falling at his feet again, with many tears she said, ' Have compassion upon me, O Servant of the Most Iligh, and as thou hast once exerted thyself in prayer for all my sins, and hast prevailed, so now intercede, as thou canst, that this offence also may be blutted out.' Thereat holy Basil wept for pity; and he said unto her, 'Woman, arise ! I also am a sinner, and have myself need of forgiveness. He who hath blotted out thus much, hath granted thee remission of thy sins as far as hath to him seemed good; and God, who hath taken away the sins of the world, is able tu take from thee this remaining sin also; and if thou wilt keep his commandments, and walk in his ways, thou shalt not only have forgiveness, but wilt also become worthy of glory. But go thou into the desert, and there thou wilt fied a holy man, who is well known to all the holy fathers, and who is called Ephram. Give thou this writing to him, and he will intercede for thee, and will prevail with the Lord.'

" The woman then commended herself to the holy Bishop's prayers, and hastened away into the desert, and performed a long journey therein. She came to the great and wonderful Hermit, who was called Ephram by name, ond knocking at his door, she cried aloud, saying, 'Have compassion on me, Saint of God, have compassion on me !? But he, having heen forewarned in spirit concerning the errand on which she came, replied unto her, saying, 'Woman, depart, for I also am a man and a sinner, standing myself in need of an intercessor.' But she held out the writing, and said, ' The holy Archbishop Basil sent me to thee, that thou mightst intercede for me, and that therethrough the sin which is written herein might be blotted out. The other many sins holy Basil both hlotted out by his prayers : Saint of God, do not thou think it much to intercede with the Lord for me for this one sin, seeing that I am sent unto thee to that end.' But that confessor made answer, 'No, daughter ! Could he obtain from the Lord the remission of so many other sins, and cannot he intercede and prevail for this single one ? Go thy way back, therefore, and tarry not, that thou mayst find him before his soul be departed from his body.' Then the woman commended herself to the holy Confessor Ephram, and returned to Casarea.

" But when she entered that city, she met the persons who were bearing the body of St. Basil to burial; seeing which, she threw herself upon the ground, and hegan to cry aloud against the holy man, saying, 'Woe is me a sinner, woe is me a lost wretch, woe is me ! O man of God, thou hast sent me into the desert, that thou mightst be rid of me, and not wearied more; and behold I am returned from my bootless journey, having gone over so great a way in vain ! The Lord God see to this thing, and judge between me and thee, inasmuch as thou couldst have interceded with Him for me, and have prevailed, if thou hadst not sent me away to another. Saying this, she threw the writing upon the bier whereon the body of holy Basil was borne, and related before the people all that passed between them. One of the clergy then desiring to know what this one sin was, took up the writing, and opened it, and found that it was clean blotted out : whereupon he cried with a loud voice unto the woman, and said, ' O woman, there is nothing written herein! Why dost thou consume thyself with so much labor and sorrow, not knowing the great thiogs of God unto thee ward, and his inscrutable mercies?' Then the multitude of the people, seeing this glorious and great miracle, glorified God, who hath such power, that he remitteth the sins of all who are living, and giveth grace to his servants, that after their decease they should heal all sickness and all infirmity ; and hath given unto them power for remitting all sins to those who preserve a right faith in the Lord, continuing in good works, and glorifying God and our Lord end Savior." - Vite Potrum, pp. 159, 160.

" In the days of the blessed Theodemir, Bishop of Compostella, there was a certain Itslian, who had hardly dared confess to his own Priest and Bishop a certain enormous crime which he had formerly committed. His Bishop having heard the confession, and heing struck with astonishment and horror at so great an offence, dared not appoint what penance he should perform. Nevertheless, being moved with com passion, he sent the sinner with a schedule, in which the offence was written, to the Church of Santiago at Compostella, enjoining him that he should, with his whole heart, implore the aid of the blessed Apostle, and submit himself to the sentence of the Bishop of that Apostolical Church. He therefore, without delay, went to Santiago in Galicia, and there placed the schedule, which contained the statement of his crime, upon the venerable altar, repenting that he had committed so great a sin, and entreating forgiveness, with tears and sobs, from God and the Apostle. This was on Santiago's Day, being the eighth of the Kalends of August, and at the first hour.

" When the blessed Theodemir, Bishop of the See of Compostella, came attired in his pontificals to sing mass at the altar that day at the third hour, he found the schedule under the covering of the altar, and demanded forthwith, wherefore, and by whom it had been placed there. The Penitent upon this came forward, and on his knees declared, with many tears, before all the people, the crime which he had committed, and the injunctions which had been laid on him by his own Bishop. The holy Bishop then opened the schedule, and found nothing written therein; it oppeared as if no letters had ever been inscribed there. A marvellous thing, and an exceeding joy, for which great praise and glory were incontinently readered to God and the Apostle, the people all singing, * This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes !? The holy Bishop then of a truth believing, that the penitent had obtained forgiveness with God through the merits of the Apostle, would impose upon him no other penance for the erime which he had committed, except that of keeping Friday as a fist from that time forth, and having absolved him from all his other sins, he dismissed him to his own country. Hence it may be inferred, that if any one shall truly repent, and, going from distant countries to Galicia, shall there, with his whole heart, entreat pardon from God, and pray for the aid of the blessed Santiago, the record of his misdeeds shall, without all doubt, be blotted out forever." - Acta SS. Jul. t. vi. p. 48.

There is a miracle of the same kind related of St. Antonio, --- and probably many other examples might be found.

THE

PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA;

BEING THE

LEGEND OF A COCK AND A HEN,

TO THE HONOR AND GLORY OF SANTIAGO.

A CHRISTMAS TALE.

" Res similis fictæ; sed quid mihi fingere prodest." Ov10, Met. xiii. v. 935.

" Hear also no lean story of theirs ! " - LIGHTFOOT.

- The Legend, (for a genuine Legend it is,) which has been made the subject of the ensuing Ballad, is related by Bishop Patrick in his Parable of tha Pilgrim. (ch. XXV, pp. 430 --434.) Udal ap Rhys relates it in his Tour through Spain and Portugal. (pp. 35--38.) Both these writers refer to Lucius Marineus Siculus as their authority. And it is told also in the Journal du Voyage d'Espagne, (Paris, 1669.) by a Consettler who was attached to the French Embassy in that country. (p. 18.)
- The story may likewise he found in the Acta Sanctorum. A duplicate of the principal mincale occurs in the third volume, for the month of May, (die 12^{A_1} p. 171.) and is there ascribed to S. Domingo de la Calzada, the author, Luiz de la Vega, contending, that both relations are to be received as true, the Bollandist (Henschenius) contrariwise opining that they are distinct miracles, but leaving the reader nevertheless to determine freely for himself utrum id malt, an arco credere velit, unicum dumtarat esse quad sub quadam circumstantiarum varietate refertur ut geminum.
- In the sixth volume of the same work, for the month of July, (die 25°_{3}) the legend of the Pilgrim is twice told, once (p. 45) as occurring to a native of Urrecht, (Cæsarius Heisterhachensis is the authority,) once as having befallen a German at Thoulouse, (p. 50;) the latter story is in the collection of Santiago's miracles, which Pope Calixtus II. is said to have compiled. The extract from Lucius Marineus Siculus may also be seen there. It is here annexed as it stands in the fifth book of that author's work de rebus Hispania memorabilibus.
- " In antiquissima civitate quam Suncti Dominici Culciatensis vulgus appellat, gallum vidimus et gallinam, qui dum virerunt, cujus coloris fuissent ignoramus : postca vero cum jugulati fuissent et assi, candidissimi revixerunt, magnam Dei potentiam summumque miraculum referentes. Cuius rei veritas et ratio sie se habet. Vir quidam probus et amicus Dei, et uxor ejus, optima mulicr, cum filio adolescentulo magna probitatis, ad Sanctum Jacobum Compostellum praficiscentes, in hanc urbem itineris labore defessi ingrediuntur, et quiescendi gratià restiterunt in domo cujusdam qui adultam filiam habebat. Qua cum adolescentem pulchra facie vidisset, ejus amore capta est. Et cum juvenis ab ea requisitus atque veratus, ejus vota repugnasset, amorem convertit in odium, et ci nocere cupiens, tempore quo discedere volebant ejus cucullo crateram sui patris clam reposuit. Cumque peregrini mane discessissent, exclamavit puellu coram parentibus cruteram sibi fuisse subreptam.
- Quod audiens Prator satellites confestim misit, ut peregrinos reducerent. Qui cum venissent, puella conscia sui secleris accessit od juvenem et crateram eruit e cucullo. Quajropter comperto delecto, juvenis in campum productus iniquâ sententià et sine culpà laqueo suspensus est : miserique parentes cum filium deplorassent, postea discedentes Compastrilam pervenerunt. Ubi solutis votis et Deo gratias agentes subinde reileuntes ad locum pervenerunt, ubi filius crat suspensus, et mater multis perfusa lacrymis ad filium accessit, multim desuadente marito.

Cumque filium suspiceret, dixit et filius, Mater meu noli flere super me : ego enim vivus sum, quoniam Virgo Dei genetriz, et Sanctus Jacobus me sustinent et servant incolumem. Vade charissima mater ad judicem qui me falsò condemnarit, et die ei me vivere propter innocentiam meam, ut me liberari jubeat, tibique restituat. Properut solicita mater, et præ nimio gaudio flens uberius, Pratorem convenit in mensa sedentem, qui gallum et gallinam assos scindere volebat. 4 Prator, inquit, filius meus vivit; jube solvi, obsecro !' Quod cum audisset Prætor, existimans cam quod dicebat propter amorem maternum somniasse, respondit subridens, ' quid hoc est, bona mulier ? Ne fallaris ! sic enim vivit filius tuus, ut vivunt hæ aves ! ? Et vix hoc dixerat cum gallus et gallina saltaverunt in mensa, statimque gallus cantavit. Quod cum Prætor vidisset uttonitus continuo egreditur, vocat sacerdotes, et cives, proficiscuntur ad juvenum suspensum ; et invenerunt incolumem valdeque lætantem, et parentibus restituunt ; domumque reversi gallum capiunt et gallinam, et in ecclesinm transferunt magnà solemnitate. Que ibi clause res admirabiles et Dei potentiam testificantes observantur, ubi septennio vivunt ; hunc enim terminum Deus illis instituit; et in fine septennii antequam moriantur, pullum relinquant et pullam sui coloris et magnitudinis; et hoc fit in ea ecclesia quolibet septennio. Magnæ quoque admirationis est, quod omnes per hanc urbem transenntes peregrini, qui sunt innumerabiles, galli hujus et gallinæ plumam capiunt, et numqunm illis plumæ deficiunt. Hoc ego testar, propterca quod vidi et interfui, plumamque mecum fero." - Rerum Hispanicarum Scriptores, t. ii. p. 805.

Luiz de la Vega agrees with Murineus Siculus in all the particulars of this perpetual miracle, except the latter; " sed scriptore illum fictionis arguit, quod asscrat, plumas galli et gallinæ, quæ quotidie peregrinis illac transcuntbus distribuuntur, prodigiose multplicari: affirmat auten tamquan testis oeulatus, in ed exclesià designatum esse quemdam elericum, qui plumas illas conservi et peregrinus distribut; a negat continuum multiplicationis miraculum d. Marineo Siculo tam confidenter assertum, in cà urbe videri, aut patrari. Multis tamen probare nittur reliqua omnia prodigia esse vera, testaturque ad perpetuam rei memoriam in superiori ceclesia parte omnium oenlis erponi idem patholum, in quo peregrinus suspensus fuit." — Acta Sanctorum, Jul. t. vi. p. 46.

PRELUDE.

"TELL us a story, old Robin Gray ! This merry Christmas time ; We are all in our glory ; so tell us a story, Either in prose or in rhyme.

"Open your budget, old Robin Gray ! We very well know it is full : Come ! out with a murder,—a Goblin,—a Ghost, Or a tale of a Cock and a Bull!"

> "I have no tale of a Cock and a Bull, My good little women and men; But 'twill do as well, perhaps, if I tell A tale of a Cock and a Hen."

INTRODUCTION.

You have all of you heard of St. James for Spain As one of the Champions Seven, Who, having been good Knights on Earth, Became Hermits, and Saints in Heaven.

Their history once was in good repute, And so it ought to be still; Little friends, I dare say you have read it: And if not, why, I hope you will.

THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA.

Of this St. James that book proclaims Great actions manifold; But more amazing are the things Which of him in Spain are told;—

How once a ship, of marble made, Came sailing o'er the sea, Wherein his headless corpse was laid, Perfumed with sanctity;—

And how, though then he had no head, He afterwards had two, Which both work'd miracles so well, That it was not possible to tell The false one from the true; —*

And how he used to fight the Moors Upon a milk-white charger: Large tales of him the Spaniards tell, Munchausen tells no larger.

But in their cause, of latter years, He has not been so hearty; For that he never struck a stroke is plain, When our Duke, in many a hard campaign, Beat the French armies out of Spain, And conquer'd Bonaparté.

Yet still they worship him in Spain, And believe in him with might and main; Santiago there they call him; And if any one there should doubt these tales, They've an Inquisition to maul him.

At Compostella, in his Church, His body and one head Have been, for some eight hundred years, By Pilgrims visited.

Old scores might there be clean rubb'd off; And tickets there were given To clear all toll-gates on the way Between the Church-yard and Heaven.

Some went for payment of a vow In time of trouble made ; And some, who found that pilgrimage Was a pleasant sort of trade ; —

And some, 1 trow, because it was Believed, as well as said,

* Whereby, my little friends, we see That an original may sometimes be No better than its fac simile; A useful truth I trow, Which picture-buyers won't believe, But which picture-dealers know.

Young Connoisseurs who will be, Remember I say this --For your benefit hereafter --In a parenthesis.

And not to interrupt The order of nurration, This warning shall be printed By way of annotation. That all, who in their mortal stage Did not perform this pilgrimage, Must make it when they were dead;—

Some upon penance for their sins, In person, or by attorney; And some who were or had been sick; And some who thought to cheat Old Nick; And some who liked the journey;

Which well they might when ways were safe; And therefore rich and poor Went in that age on pilgrimage, As folks now make a tour.

The poor with scrip, the rich with purse, They took their chance for better for worse, From many a foreign land, With a scallop-shell in the hat for badge, And a Pilgrim's staff in hand.

Something there is, the which to leave Untold would not be well, Relating to the Pilgrim's staff, And to the scallop-shell.

For the scallop shows, in a coat of arms, That of the bearer's line Some one, in former days, hath been To Santiago's shrine.

And the staff was bored and drilled for those Who on a flute could play; And thus the merry Pilgrim had Ilis music on the way

THE LEGEND.

PART I.

ONCE on a time, three Pilgrins true, Being Father, and Mother, and Son, For pure devotion to the Saint, This pilgrimage begun.

Their names, little friends, I am sorry to say, In none of my books can I find; But the son, if you please, we'll call Pierre; What the parents were call'd, never mind.

From France they came, in which fair land They were people of good renown; And they took up their lodging one night on the way In La Calzada town.

Now, if poor Pilgrims they had been, And had lodged in the Hospice instead of the lnn, My good little women and men, Why, then you never would have heard This tale of the Cock and the Hen.

For the innkeepers they had a daughter, Sad to say, who was just such another As Potiphar's daughter, I think, would have been, If she follow'd the ways of her mother.

> This wicked woman to our Pierre Behaved like Potiphar's wife; And, because she fail'd to win his love, She resolved to take his life.

So she pack'd up a silver cup In his wallet privily; And then, as soon as they were gone, She raised a hue and ery.

The Pilgrims were overtaken ; The people gather'd round ; Their wallets were search'd, and in Pierre's The silver cup was found.

They dragg'd him before the Aleayde; A hasty Judge was he; "The theft," he said, " was plain and proved, And hang'd the thief must be." So to the gallows our poor Pierre Was hurried instantly.

If I should now relate The piteous lamentation, Which for their son these parents made, My little friends, I am afraid You'd weep at the relation.

But Pierre in Santiago still His constant faith profess'd; When to the gallows he was led, "Twas a short way to Heaven," he said, "Though not the pleasantest."

And from their pilgrimage he charged His parents not to cease, Saying that, unless they promised this, He could not be hang'd in peace.

They promised it with heavy hearts: Pierre then, therewith content, Was hang'd; and they upon their way 'To Compostella went.

PART II.

Four weeks they travell'd painfully; They paid their vows, and then To La Calzada's fatal town Did they come back again.

The Mother would not be withheld, But go she must to see Where her poor Pierre was left to hang Upon the gallows tree.

Oh tale most marvellous to hear, Most marvellous to tell ! Eight weeks had he been hanging there, And yet was alive and well ! "Mother," said he, "I am glad you're return'd; It is time I should now be released: Though I cannot complain that I'm tired, And my neck does not ache in the least.

"The Sun has not scoreh'd me by day; The Moon has not chill'd me by night; And the winds have but help'd me to swing, As if in a dream of delight.

> " Go you to the Aleayde, That hasty Judge unjust; Tell him Santiago has saved me, And take me down he must!"

Now, you must know the Aleayde, Not thinking himself a great sinner, Just then at table had sat down, About to begin his dinner.

His knife was raised to carve, The dish before him then; Two roasted fowls were laid therein; That very morning they had been A Cock and his faithful Hen

In came the Mother wild with joy; "A miracle!" she cried; But that most hasty Judge unjust Repell'd her in his pride.

"Think not," quoth he, "to tales like this That I should give belief! Santiago never would bestow His miracles, full well I know, On a Frenchman and a thief."

And pointing to the Fowls, o'er which He held his ready knife, "As easily might I believe These birds should come to life!"

The good Saint would not let him thus The Mother's true tale withstand; So up rose the Fowls in the dish, And down dropp'd the knife from his hand.

The Coek would have erow'd if he could; To caekle the Hen had a wish; And they both slipp'd about in the gravy, Before they got out of the disin.

And when each would have open'd its eyes, For the purpose of looking about them, They saw they had no eyes to open, And that there was no seeing without them.

All this was to them a great wonder; They stagger'd and reel'd on the table; And either to guess where they were, Or what was their plight, or how they came there, Alas! they were wholly unable;—

Because, you must know, that that morning -A thing which they thought very hard --

THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA.

'The Cook had cut off their heads, And thrown them away in the yard.

The Hen would have prank'd up her feathers, But plucking had sadly deform'd her; And for want of them she would have shiver'd with cold, If the roasting she had had not warm'd her.

And the Cock felt exceedingly queer; He thought it a very odd thing That his head and his voice were he did not know where, And his gizzard tuck'd under his wing.

> The gizzard got into its place, But how, Santiago knows best; And so, by the help of the Saint, Did the liver and all the rest.

The heads saw their way to the bodies; In they came from the yard without check, And each took its own proper station, To the very great joy of the neck.

And in flew the feathers, like snow in a shower, For they all became white on the way; And the Cock and the Hen in a trice were refledged, And then who so happy as they?

Cluck ! cluck ! cried the Hen right merrily then The Cock his clarion blew ; Full glad was he to hear again His own cock-a-doo-del-doo !

PART III.

"A MIRACLE! a miracle!" The people shouted, as they might well, When the news went through the town; And every child, and woman, and man Took up the cry, and away they ran To see Pierre taken down.

They made a famous procession; My good little women and men, Such a sight was never seen before, And I think will never again.

Santiago's Image, large as life, Went first with banners, and drum, and fife; And next, as was most meet, The twice-born Cock and Hen were borne Along the thronging street.

Perch'd on a cross-pole hoisted high, They were raised in sight of the crowd; And, when the people set up a cry, The Hen she cluck'd in sympathy, And the Cock he crow'd aloud.

And because they very well knew for why They were carried in such solemnity, And saw the Saint and his banners before 'em, They behaved with the greatest propriety, And most correct decorum.

The Knife, which had cut off their heads that morn, Still red with their innocent blood, was borne; The scullion boy he carried it; And the Skewers also made a part of the show, With which they were truss'd for the spit.

The Cock in triumph nore that Spit As high as he was able; And the Dish was display'd, wherein they were laid, When they had been served at table.

With eager faith the crowd press'd round; There was a scramble of women and men For who should dip a finger-tip In the blessed Gravy then.

Next went the Alcayde, beating his breast, Crying aloud, like a man distress'd, And amazed at the loss of his dinner, "Santiago, Santiago! Have mercy on me a sinner!"

And lifting oftentimes his hands Towards the Cock and Hen, "Orate pro nobis!" devoutly he cried; And as devoutly the people replied, Whenever he said it, "Amen!"

The Father and Mother were last in the train; Rejoicingly they came, And extoll'd, with tears of gratitude, Santiago's glorious name.

> So, with all honors that might be, They gently unhang'd Pierre; No hurt or harm had he sustain'd, But, to make the wonder clear, A deep, black halter-mark remain'd Just under his left ear.

PART IV.

AND now, my little listening dears, With open mouths and open ears, Like a rhymer whose only art is That of telling a plain, unvarnish'd tale, To let you know, I must not fail, What became of all the partics.

Pierre went on to Compostella To finish his pilgrimage; His parents went back with him joyfully, After which they return'd to their own country; And there, I believe, that all the three Lived to a good old age.

> For the gallows on which Pierre So happily had swung,

THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA.

It was resolved that never more On it should man be hung.

To the Church it was transplanted, As ancient books declare; And the people in commotion, With an uproar of devotion, Set it up for a relie there.

What became of the halter I know not, Because the old books show not; But we may suppose and hope, That the city presented Pierre With that interesting rope.

For in his family — and this The Corporation knew — It rightly would be valued more Than any cordon bleu.

The Innkeeper's wicked daughter Confess'd what she had done ; So they put her in a convent, And she was made a Nun.

The Alcayde had been so frighten'd That he never ate fowls again; And he always pull'd off his hat When he saw a Cock and Hen. Wherever he sat at table, Not an egg might there be placed; And he never even muster'd courage for a custard, Though garlic tempted him to taste Of an omelet now and then.

But always, after such a transgression, He hasten'd away to make confession; And not till he had confess'd, And the Priest had absolved him, did he feel His conscience and stomach at rest.

The twice-born Birds to the Pilgrim's Church, As by miracle consecrated, Were given ; and there unto the Saint They were publicly dedicated.

At their dedication the Corporation A fund for their keep supplied; And after following the Saint and his banners, This Cock and Hen were so changed in their manners, That.the Priests were edified.

Gentle as any turtle-dove, Saint Cock became all meekness and love; Most dutiful of wives, Saint Hen she never peck'd again; So they led happy lives.

The ways of ordinary fowls You must know they had clean forsaken; And if every Cock and Hen in Spain Had their example taken, Why, then — the Spaniards would have had No eggs to eat with bacon. These blessed Fowls, at seven years' end, In the odor of sanctity died; They were carefully pluck'd, and then They were buried, side by side.

And, lest the fact should be forgotten, (Which would have been a pity,) 'Twas decreed, in honor of their worth, That a Cock and Henshould be borne thenceforth In the arms of that ancient City.

Two eggs Saint Hen had laid, no more; The chicken were her delight; A Cock and Hen they proved, And both, like their parents, were virtuous and white.

The last act of the Holy Hen Was to rear this precious brood; and, when Saint Cock and she were dead, This couple, as the lawful heirs, Succeeded in their stead.

They also lived seven years; And they laid eggs but two, From which two milk-white chicken To Cock and Henhood grew; And always their posterity The self-same course pursue.

Not one of these eggs ever addled, (With wonder be it spoken !) Not one of them ever was lost, Not one of them ever was broken.

Sacred they are; neither magpie, nor rat, Snake, weasel, nor marten approaching them And woe to the irreverent wretch Who should even dream of poaching them '

Thus, then, is this great miracle Continued to this day; And to their Church all Pilgrims go, When they are on the way; And some of the feathers are given them; For which they always pay.

No price is set upon them; And this leaves all persons at ease; The Poor give as much as they can, The Rich as much as they please.

But that the more they give the better, Is very well understood; Seeing whatever is thus disposed of Is for their own souls' good;—

For Santiago will always Befriend his true believers; And the money is for him, the Priests Being only his receivers.

To make the miracle the more, Of these feathers there is always store, And all are genuine too;

NOTES TO THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA.

All of the original Cock and Hen, Which the Priests will swear is true.

Thousands a thousand times told have bought them; And if myriads and tens of myriads sought them, They would still find some to buy;

For, however great were the demand, So great would be the supply.

And if any of you, my small friends, Should visit those parts, I dare say You will bring away some of the feathers, And think of old Robin Gray.

NOTES.

A ship of marble made. - p. 555, col. 1.

The marble ship I have not found any where except in Geddes, who must have found it in some version of the legend which has not fullen into my hands. But that the ship was made of marble I believe to be quite as true as any other part of the legend of Santiago. — Whether of marble or not, it was a miracelous ship which, without cars or sails, performed the voyage from Joppa to Iria Flava, now El Padron, in Galicia, in seven days.

Classical fables were still so passable when the Historia Compostclana was written, that the safe passage of this ship over the Syttes, and between Scylla and Charybdis, is ascribed to the presiding hand of Providence. — España Sagrada, t. xx. p. 6.

.... his headless corpse, - p. 555, col. 1.

How the body came to leave its head behind is a circumstance which has not been accounted for; and yet it requires explanation, because we are assured that Santiago took particular care not to part with his head, when it was cut off.

"At the moment," says the Annalist of Golicia, "when the cruel executioner severed from its neck the precious head of the sacred Apostle, the body miracolonsly raised its hands and caught it, and io that posture it entined till night. The astonished Jews attempted to separate it, but in vain; for upon touching the venerable corpse, their arms became cold, as if frozen, and they remained without the use of them." — Añales de Galicia, por El Doctor D. Francisco Xavier Manuel de la Huerta y Vega. — Sautago, 1733.

Perhaps his companions dropped it on their way to the coast, for the poet tells us they travelled in the dark, and in a hurry :

⁴⁴ Cubiertos de la noche con el manto Sin que ningun contrario los impila, Mus presto que si fueran a galope, Lleran el cuerpo a la ciudad de Jope.¹⁹ — 1b. ff. 65.

But according to the Historia Compostelana, (España Sagrada, t. xx. p. 6,) there is the testimony of Pope St. Leo, that the original head came with the body.

And how, though then he had no head, He afterwards had two. - p. 555, col. 1.

This is a small allowance, and must be understood with reference to the two most authentic ones in that part of tha world, — that at Braga, and one of the two at Compostells. It is a common thing for Saints to be polycephalous; and Santiago is almost as great a pluralist in heads as St. John the Baptist has been made by the dealers in relice. There are some half dozen heads, and almost as many whole bodies ascribed to him, - all in good odor, all having worked miracles, and all, beyond a doubt, equally authentic.

And how he used to fight the Moors. - p. 555, col. 1.

Most appropriately therefore, according to P. Sautel, was he called Boanerges.

⁴¹ Conspicitur media cataphractus in aere ductor, Qui dedit in trepidam barbara castra fugam. Tam cito tam validæ eur terga dedere phalanges? Nimrum Tonitru Filus ista patrat.¹⁰ Annus Sacer Poeticus, vol. ii. p. 32.

—"siendo acá en España nuestro amparo y defensa en las guerras, mereció con razon este nombre: pues mas feroz que trueno ni rayo espantaba, confundia y desbarataba los grandes exercitos de los Moros." — Morales, Coronica Gen. de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 4.

> " Vitoria Espana, vitoria, que tienes en tu defensa, uno de los Doze Pares; mas no de nacion Francesa. Hijo es tuyo, y tantos mata que parece que su fuerza ercede a la de la muerte quando mas furiosa y presta." Ludesma, Conceptos Espirituales, p. 242

The Spanish Clergy had a powerful motive for propagating these fables; their Privilegio de los votos being one of the most gainful, as well as most impudent forgeries, that ever was committed.

"The two sons of Zebedee manifested," says Morales," their conrage and great heart, and the faith which was strengthening in them, by their engerness to revenge the injury done to their kinsmun and master when the Samaritans would not receive him into their city. Then Santiago and St. John distinguished themselves from the other Apostles, by coming forward, and saying to our Savior, 'Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from Heaven and coosume them ? * It seems as if (according to the Castilian proverb concerning kinsmen) their blood boiled in them to kill and to destroy. because of the part which they had in his. But be not in such laste, O glorions Apostle Santiago, to shed the blood of others for Christ, your cousin-german! It will not be long before you will give it to him, and for him will give all your own. Let him first shed his for yen, that, when yours shall he mingled with it by another new tie of spiritual relationship, and by a new friendship in murtyrdom, it shall be more esteemed by him, and held in great account. Let the debt he well made out, that the payment may be the more due. Let the benefit he cumpleted, that you may make the recompense under greater obligation, and with more will. Then will it he worth more, and manifest more gratitude. Learn meantime from your Master, that love is not shown in killing and destroying the souls of others for the beloved, but in mertifying and offering your own to death. This, which is the height and perfection of love, your Master will teach you, and thenceforth you will not content yourself with any thing less. And if you aro desirous, for Christ's sake, to smite and slay his enemies, have patience awhile, fierce Saint ! (Santo fcroz.) There will come a time when you shall wage war for your Master, sword in hand, and in your person shall slaughter myriads and myriads of Moors, his wicked enemies !" - Coronica General de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 8.

An old hymn, which was formerly used in the service of his day, likens this Apostle to - a Lion's whelp !

> "Electus hie Apostolus Decorus et amabilis, Velut Leonis catulus Vicit bella certaminis." — Divi Tutelares, 229.

"Thirty-eight visible appearances," says the Padro Maestro Fray Felipe de la Gandara, Chronicler General of the Kingdom of Galicia,—" thirty-eight visible appearances, in as many different battles, aiding and favoring the Spaniards, are recounted by the very learned Don Miguel Erce Gimencz in his most eradite and laborious work upon the Preaching of Santiago in Spain; from which work the illustrissimas Doctor Don Antonio Calderon has collected them in his book upon the Excellencies of this Apostle. And I hold it for certain that his appearances have been many more; and that in every victory, which the Spaniards have achieved over their enemies, this their Great Captain has been present with his favor and intercession."—Armas i Trianfos del Reino de Galicia, p. 648.

The Chrunista General proceeds to say that Galicia may be especially proud of its part in all these victories, the Saint having publicly prided himself upon his connection with that kingdom; for being asked in a battle once, who and what he was, (being a stranger,) he replied, "I am a Soldier, a Kinsman of the Eternal King, a Citizen and Iahabitant of Compostella, and my name is James." For this fact the Chronicler assures us that book of manuscript sermons, preached in Paris three centuries before his time by a Franciscan Friar, is sufficient authority: "esvaliente autoridad?" — Armas i Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, p. 649.

..... still they worship him in Spain, And believe in him with might and main. - p. 555, col. I.

Ant. Macedo. Divi Tutelares Orbis Christiani, p. 228.

Santiago there they call him. - p. 555, col. I.

"The true name of this Saint," says Ambrosio de Morales, " was Jacobo, (that is, according to the Spanish form,) taken with little difference from that of the Patriarch Jacob. A greater is that which we Spaniards have made, corrupting the word little by little, till it has become the very different one which we now use. From Santo Jacobo we shortened it, as we commonly do with proper names, and said Santo Jaco. We clipped it again after this abbreviation, and by taking away one letter, and changing another, made it into Santiago. The alteration did not stop here ; but because Yage or Tiage hy itself did not sound distinctly and well, we began to call it Diago, as may be seen in Spanish writings of two or three hundred years old. At last, having passed through all these mutations, we rested with Diego for the ordinary name, reserving that of Santiago when we speak of the Saint." - Coronica General de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 2.

Florez pursues the corruption further: "nombrandole por la rot latina Jacobus Apostolus can abreviacion y rulgaridad Jacobo Apostolo, ò Giacomo Postolo, ò Jiac Apostol." — España Sagrada, L. xix, P. 71.

It has not been explained how Jack in this country was transferred from James to John.

The Prior Cayrasco de Figueroa assures us that St. James was a gentleman, his father Zebedce being " Varon de ilustre sangre y Galileo, Puesto que usava el arte piscatoria, Que entonees no eru illicito, ni feo, Ní aora en muchas partes menos gloria, La gente principal tener oficio, O por su menester, o su exercicio."

Templo Militante, p. iii. p. 83.

Morales also takes some pains to establish this point. Zehedee, he assures us, "era hombre principal, señor de un nuoio, con que seguia la presea;" and it is clear, he says, "como padre y hjos seguian este trato de la pesqueria honradamente, mas como señores que como oficiales ("— Coronica Gen. de España, l. ix c. vii. § 3.

They've an Inquisition to maul him. - p. 555, col. 1.

Under the dominion of that atrocious Tribunal Ambrosio de Morales might truly say, "No one will date dony that the body of the glorious Apostle is in the city which is named after him, and that it was brought thither, and afterwards discovered there by the great miracles," — of which he proceeds to give an account. "People have been burnt for less," — os a fellow at Leeds said the other day of a woman whom he suspected of bewitching him.

There is nothing of which the Spanish and Portuguese au thors have boasted with greater complacency and pleasure than of the said Inquisition. A notable example of this is afforded in the following passage from the Templo Militante, Flos Santorum, y Triumphos de sus Virtudes, by D. Bartelome Cayrasen de Figueroa, Prior and Canon of the Cathedral Church of Grand Canary. (Lisbon, 1613.)

> " _____ gloriosa España, Aunque de nucho puedes gloriarte, No está en esso el valor que te acompaña, Sino en tener la Fé por estandarte : Por estu la provincia mas estraña, Y todo el orbe teme de enojarte ; Por esta de tu nombre tiembla el mundo Y el cavernoso Tartaro profundo.

The high eltar at Compostella is, es all the altars formerly were in Galicia and Asturias, not close to the wall, but a little detached from it. It is ten feet in length, and very wide, with a splendid frontispiece of silver. The eltar itself is hollow, end at the Gospel end there is a small door, never opened except to royal visitors, and when a new Archbishop first comes to take possession. It was opened for Ambrosio de Morales, because he was commissioned to inspect the churches : nothing, however, was to be seen within, except two large, flat stones, which formed the floor, and et the end of them a hole shout the size of an orange, but filled with mortar. Below is the vault in which the body of Santiago is said to be deposited in the merble coffin wherein it was found. The vault extends under the altar and its steps, and some way back under the Capella Mayor: it is in fact a part of the Crypt welled off with a thick well, para dezar cerrado del todo el santo cuerpo.

The Snint, whose real presence is thus carefully concealed, receives his pilgrims in effigy. The image is a half figure of stone, a little less than lite, git and painted, holding in one hand a book, and as if giving a blessing with the other. Esta en cabello, without either crown or glory, on the head, but a large silver crown is suspended immediately above, almost ao es to touch the head; and the last ceremony which a pilgrim performs is to ascend to the image, which is over the altar, hy a staircase from the Epistle side, kiss it reverently on the head, embrace it, and place this crown upon it, and then go down on the Gospel side. — Fiage de Morales, t. xx. p. 154.

"Ingens sub templo forniz, et claustra per umbras Magna jacent, cacaque donus, queis magna Jacobi Ossa sepulchrali funa est in sede latera. Nulli fas homiaum sacratum insistere limen; Est vidisse nefas, nec eundi pervins usus: E longè veniam ezorant atque oscula figunt Liminibus, redeuntque domos; variasque galeris Jucobi effigies addunt, humerosque hacillis Circundant, conchisque super fulgentibus ornant." Paciecis, lib. vii. p. 117.

The sepulchre was thus closed by the first Archbishop, D. Diego Gelmirez, "que ga de ninguna manera se puede ver, m entenderse como està. Y esto hizo con prudentissimo consejo aquel gran Principe y valeroso Perlado, y con reverencia devota, porque cada uno no quisiese ver y tratar aquel precioso relicario comumente, y sin el debido respete; que se pierde sin duda quando los cuerpos santos y sus sepulturas pueden ser vistas valgarmente de todos." — MonaLes, l. ix, c. vii. § 67.

A print of the sepulchre, from an illuminated drawing in the manuscript of the Historia Compositicana, is given in the 20th volume of the España Sagrada. And in that history (pp. 50, 51) is the following characteristic account of the enlargement of the altar by D. Diego Gelmirez.

" Among the other worthinesses, with the which the aforesaid Bishop in no inactive solicitude hustened to decorate his Church, we have been careful to defend from the death of oblivion whatsoever his restauratory hand did to the altar of the said Church. But, lest in bringing forward all singular circumstances we should wander into devious ways, we will direct our intention to the straight path, and commit to succeeding remembrance so far as our possibility may reveal those things which we beheld with our own eyes. For of how small dimensions the altar of Santiago formerly was, lest we should be supposed to diminish it in our relation, may better be collected from the measure of the altarlet itself. But as religion increased in the knowledge of the Christian faith, that another altarlet, a little larger than the other, was placed over it by those who were zealous for their holy faith, our uncient fathers have declared unto us as well by faithful words, as by the assured testimony of writings. But the aforesaid Bishop being vehemently desirous of increasing the beanty of his Church, and seeing that this little altar, though thus enlarged, was altogether unworthy of so great an Apostle, thought it worthy of pions consideration to aggrandize the Apostolical altar. Wherefore, being confirmed thereunto by the prudent counsel of religions men, although the Canons stoutly resisted him in this matter, he declared his determinution to demolish the habitacle which was made in the likeness of the sepulchre below, in which sepulchre we learn, without all doubt, that the remains of the most holy Apostle are enclosed. They indeed repeatedly asserted that a work which, rude and deformed as it was, was nevertheless edified in hunor to the remains of such holy personages, ought by no means to be destroyed, lest they themselves or their lord should be stricken with lightning from heaven, and suffer the immediate punishment of such audacity. But he, like a strennous soldier, protected with the impenetrable shield of a good resolution, forasmuch as, with the eye of his penetration, he perceived that they regarded external things more than inner ones, trampled upon their fears with the foot of his right intention, and levelled to the ground their habitacle, and enlarged the altar, which had originally been so small a one, now for the third time, with marble placed over and about it on all sides, making it as it ought to be. Without delay also he marvellously began a silver frontispiece for this egregious and excellent work, and more marvellously completed it."

There used to be interpreters at Compostella for all languages; lenguageros they were called. They had a silver wond, with a hand and finger pointed at the top, to show the relies with. Among those relies is the head of St. James the Less; a grieder; in a splendid gold reliquary, of one St. James, it has not been determined which; one of St. Christopher's arms, of modest dimensions; and seven heads of the Eleven Thousand Virgins. These are from the list which Morales gives; but that good and learned man, who often swallawed the bull and stuck at the tail, omits some more curious ones, which are noticed in an authentic inventory. (España Sagrada, t. xix, p. 344.) Among these are part of our Le(\tilde{z} = raiment, of the earth on which he stood, of the bread which he brake, of his blood, and of the Virgin's milk.

A late editor of Old Fortunatus is reminded in one of hinotes of Martinus Scriblerus, by a passage in the play, when, as he should have seen, is evidently allusive 'o such relies as those at Compostella.

"there can I show thee The hall of gold that set all Troy on fire : There shalt thou see the scarf of Cupid's mother, Saatch'd from the soft moist ivory of her arm To wrap about Adonis' wounded thigh : There shalt thou see a wheel of Titan's car, Which dropp'd from Heaven when Phaeton fired the world I'll give thee - the fan of Proserpine, Which, in reward for a sweet Thracian song, The black-brow'd Empress threw to Orpheus, Being come to fetch Eurydice from hell."

..... all who in their mortal stage Did not perform this pilgrimage, Must make it when they were dead. — p. 555, col. 2.

"Huc Lysix properant urbes, huc gentes lberæ Turbæ adeunt, Gallique onnes, et Flandria cantu Insignis, populique Itali, Rhenusque bicornis Conflut, et donis altaria sacra frequentant; Numque ferunt vici qui non hac templa patentes Invisunt, post fata illue, et funeris unbras Venturos, munusque istud præstare beatts Larte vinan stellisque albam, que notee serenû Fulgurat, et longo designat tramite calum."

Fray Luys de Escohar has this among the five hundred proverbs of his Litany : --

— el camino a la muerte es como el de Santiago.

Las quatrocientas, &c. ff. 140.

It seems to allude to this superstition, meaning, that it is a journey which all must take. The particular part of the pilgrimage, which must be performed either in ghost or in person, is that of crawling through a hole in the rock at El Padron, which the Apostle is said to have made with his staff. In allusion to this part of the pilgrimage, which is not deemed so indispensable at Compostella as at Padron, they have this proverb - Quien va à Santiago, y non va à Padron, 6 faz Romeria o non. The pilgrim, indeed, must be incurious who would not extend his journey thither ; a copious fountain, of the coldest and finest water which Morales tasted in Galicia, rises under the high altar, but on the outside of the church; the pilgrims drink of it, and wash in its waters, as the Apostle is said to have done : they ascend the steps in the rock upon their knees, and finally perform the passage which must be made by all : " y cierto, considerado el sitio, y la hermosa vista que de alli hay à la ciudad, que estaba abaro en lo llano, y à toda la ancha hoya llena de grandes arbuledas y frescuras de mas de dos leguas en largo, lugar es aparejado para mucha contemplacion." - Viage de MORALES, p. 174.

One of Pantagruel's Questions Encylopédiques is, "Utrum le noir Scorpion pourroit souffrir solution de continuité en sa substance, et par Veffusion de son sang obseurcir et embrunir la voye lactée, au grand interest et dommage des Lifrelofres Jacobipetes?" – RAELAIS, t. ii. p. 417.

The scallop-shell. - p. 555, col. 2.

"The escallops, being denominated by ancient authors that Shells of Gales, or Galicia, plainly apply to this pulgrimage in particular." - Fosbrooke, British Monachism, p. 423.

Fuller is therefore mistaken when, speaking of the Dacres family, (Church Hist. cont. xii. p. 42,) who gave their arms gules, three scallop-shells argent, ho says, "which scallop-shells, (I mean the nethermost of them, because most concave and capacious,) smooth within, and artificially plated without, was oftlines cup and dish to the pilgrims in Palestine, and thereupon their arms often charged therewith."

That the scallop belonged exclusively to the Compostella pilgrim is certain, as the following miracle may show.

"The ship, in which the body of the Apostle was embarked, passed swiftly by a village in Portugal called Bouzas, wherein there dwelt a noble and powerful lord, who on that day married one of his daughters to the son of another person as considerable as himself, lord of the land of Amaya. The nuptiels were celebrated in the village of Bouzas, and many noble knights of that province came to the sulemnity. One of their sports was that of throwing the cane, and in this the bridegroom chose to bear a part, commanding a troop, that he might display his dexterity. The place for the sport was on the coast of the ocean, and the bridegroom's horse, hecoming ungovernable, plunged into the sca, and sunk under the immensity of its waters, and, at the moment when the ship was passing by, rose again close beside it. There were several miracles in this case. The first was, that the sea bore upon its waves the horse and horseman, as if it had been firm land, after not having drowned them when they were so long a time The second was, that the wind, which was under water. driving the ship in full speed to its port, suddenly fell, and left it motionless; the third, and most remarkable, was, that both the garments of the knight, and the trappings of the horse. came out of the sea covered with scallop-shells.

" The knight, astonished at such an unexpected adventure, and seeing the disciples of the Apostle, who with equal astonishment were looking at him from the ship, asked them what it was that had brought him where he found himself. To which the disciples, being inspired by Heaven, replied, that certes Christ, through the merit of a certain servant of his, whose body they were transporting in that ship, had chosen to manifest his power upon him, for his good, by means of this miracle.' The knight then humbly requested them to tell him who Christ was, and who was that Servant of his of whom they spake, and what was the good which he was to derive. The disciples then briefly catechized him; and the knight, having thus been instructed, said to them, ' Friends and Sirs, you, who have served Christ and his holy Apostle, which I as yet have not done, ask of him to show you for what purpose he has put these scallop-shells upon me, because ao strange a marvel cannot have been wrought without some great mystery.' With that the disciples made their prayer accordingly, and, when they had prayed, they heard a voice from Heaven, which said thus unto the knight, 'Our Lord Christ has thought good to shaw by this act all persons present and to come, who may choose to love and serve this his servant, and who shall go to visit him where he shall be interred, that they take with them from thence other such scallopshells as these with which thou art covered, as a seal of privilege, confirming that they are his, and will be sa from that time forward : and he promises that afterwards, in the Day of the last Judgment, they shall be recognized of God for his; and that, because of the honors which they have done to this his servant and friend, in going to visit him and to venerate him, he will receive them into his glory and his Paradise.

"When the knight heard these words, immediately he made the disciples baptize him; and while they were so doing, he noticed, with devotion and attention, the ceremonies of the sacred ministry, and, when it was done, he took his leave of them, commending himself to their grace, and entreating of them that they would commend him in their prayers to Christ and his Apostle Santiago. At that instant the wind, which till then had been still, struck the sails, and the ship hegan to cleave the wido sea. The knight then directed his course toward the shore, riding upon the water, in sight of the great multitude, which from the shore was watching him; and when he reached the share, and was surrounded by them, he related to them what had happened. The natives, astonished at the sight of such stupendous miracles, were converted, and the knight, with his own hand, baptized his bride."

The facts are thus related, to the letter, in the Sanctoral Portugues, from whence the Breviaries of Alcobaça and St.

Cucufate copied it, and that of Oviedo in the Hymn for the Apostle's Day, — from which autharities the moderns have taken it. The Genealogists say that the Vieyras of Portugal are descended from this knight, because the scallop is called by that name in their tongue, and that family bear it in their arms. The Pimenteles make the same pretensions, and also bear four scalleps in their shield. The Rihadaneyras also advance a similar claim, and they bear a cross with five scallaps.

" This is the origin of the shells with which the pilgruns, who come to visit the body of our glorious Patron, adorn themselves, the custom having, without doubt, been preserved by tradition from that time. The circumstances are confirmed by pictures representing it, which from ancient times have been preserved in various cities. In the Church of St. Maria de Aracœli at Rome, on the Gospel side, there is a spacious chapel, dedicated to our glorious Patron; it was painted in the year 1441, and in one compartment this adventure is represented : there is the ship, having the hody of the Apostle on the poop, and the seven Disciples on board : close to the ship, upon the sea, is a knight upon a black horse, with a red saddle and trappings, both covered with scallop-shells. The same story is painted in the parish church of Santiago at Madrid: and it is related in a very ancient manuscript, which is preserved in the library of the Monastery of St. Juan de los Reyes, at Toledo. In the Ancient Breviary of the Holy Church of Oviedo, mention is made of this prodigy in these verses, upon the vesper of the glorious Saint :-

> Cunctis mare cernentibus, Sed a profundo ducitur, Natus Regis submergitur Totus plenus conchilibus.

Finally, the fact is authenticated by their Holinesses Alexander III., Gregory IX., and Clement V., who in their Bulls grant a faculty to the Archbishop of Compostella, that they may exammunicate those who sell these shells to pilgrims any where except in the city of Santiago, and they ossign this reason, because the shells are the hadge of the Apostel Santiago. And thus in the Church of St. Clement ut Rome, which is enriched with the body of St. Clement, Pope and Martyr, is a picture of the Apostel Santiago, apparently nore than five hundred years old, which is adorned with scallopshells on the garment and hat, as his proper badge."— $A\bar{m}alcs$ de Galicia, val. i. pp. 95, 96.

Gwillim, in his account of this bearing, says nothing of its origin. But he says, " The Escallop (arcording to Dioscorides) is engendered of the Dew and Air, and hath no blood at all in itself, notwithstanding in man's body of any other food it turneth soonest into blood. The cating of this fish raw is said to cure a surfeit. Such (he adde) is the beautiful shape that nature hath bestowed upon this shell, as that the Collar of the Order of St. Michel in France, in the first institution thereof, was richly garnished with certain pieces of gold artificially wrought, as near as the artificer could by imitation express the stamp of nature." — Display of Herakby, p. 171, (first edit.)

One of the three manners in which Santiago is commonly represented, is in the costume of a Compostellan pilgrim, with a scallop-shell in his hat. All three are described in a book, as rare of occurrence as curious in its subject, thus entitled, Proton CHAISTIANUS EAUDITUS: Siler, de Erroribus, qui passim admittantr rirea pingendas atque effingendas Sucras Imagines. Libri Octo rum Appendice. Opus Sucras Scriptura, atque Ecclesiastica Historia studiosis non inutile. Authore R. P. M. Fr. One of the Censors of this book says, prodit in lurem Pictor Christianus cruditissimi pecturis cruditissimus fatus, obstitricante N. RR. P. M. Fr. Josepho Campatano de la Vega. The work was published by the Master's direction at the cost of the Order; the Master dedicated it to N. Señora de las Mercedes as claboratum excultanque quantum potuit, by her assistance; and there is a censura prefixed by Ferreras the Historian, speaking forcibly of the importance of the undertaking, and of the great ability with which it is executed.

Instead of perceiving that Santiago is represented in the costume of his own pilgrims, this outhor supposed that the Saint is so attired because he had travelled over Spain ! The whola passage is curious for its grave and cool credulity. " Sanctus Jacobus Zebedei filius, Hispanic primarius (quidquid alii commenti sint) Patronus atque Apostolus, bifariam sapius a Pictoribus describitur. .... the staff was bared and drilled far those Who an a flute could play. - p. 555, col. 2.

Sir John Hawkins says, "that the pilgrims to St. James of Compostella excavated a staff, or walking-stick, into a musical instrument for recreation on their journey."—History of Music, vol. iv. p. 139, quoted in Fosbrocke's British Monachism, p. 469. Mr. Fosbrocke thinks that "this ascription of the invention of the Baurdan to these pilgrims in particular is very questionable." Sir John prohably aupposed, with Richelet, that the Baurdan was peculiar to these pilgrims, and therefore that they had invented it.

Mr. Fosbrooke more than doubts tha Etymon from a musical uso. "Tha barbarous Greek Bopdovta," he observes, "signified a beast of burden, and the Bourdon was a staff of support. But the various meanings of the word, as given by Cotgrave, make out its history satisfactorily. Bourdon, a drone, or dorre-bee, (Richelet says grasse mauche, ennemie des abeilles,) also the humming or buzzing of bees; also the drone of a bugpipe; also a pilgrim's staff; also a walking-staff, having a sword, &cc. within it.

"It was doubtless applied to the use of pitching the note, or accompanying the songs which pilgrims used to recreate themselves on their journeys, and supposed by Menestrier to be hymns and canticles." — Fasbraake, p. 432.

In Germany, "walking-sticks that serve as tubes for pipes, with a compressing pump at one end to make a fire, and a machine at the other for impaling insects without destroying their beauty, are common." (Hodgkins's Travels, vol. ii. p. 135.) I have seen a telescope and a barometer in a walkingstick, if that name may be applied to a staff of copper.

The twice-born Cock and Hen. - p. 557, col. 1.

There is another story of a bird among the miracles of Santiago; the poor subject of the miracle was not so fortunate as the Cock and Hen of the Alcayde; but the story is true. It occurred in Italy; and the Spanish fable is not more characteristic of the fraudulent practices carried on in the Romish Charch; then he Italian story is of the pitiable superstition which such frauds fostered, and which was, and is to this day, encouraged by the dignitaries of that church.

At the request of St. Atto, Rishop of Pisjota, the Pisjotans say that some relics, taken from Santiagu's most precious head, were given to their church by the Archbishop of Compostella, Diego Gelmirez, a persoa well known in Spanisk history. "Nullus umquam mortalium head donum impetrare posset," he affirmed, when he made the git i 1 and the historian of the translator adds, " quad verê a Domino factum credimus et nan dubtamus, sicut manifestis et apertis indiciis manifeste d aperté miracula declarabunt." There is a good collection of these miracles, but this of the Bird is the most remarkable.

"In those days," says the writer, "another miracle, as pious as it is glorious, was wrought by the Lord, in the which he who worthily perpends it will perceive what may pertain to the edification of all those who visit the shrine of Santiago, and of all faithful Christians. About three weeks after the consecration of Santiago's altar, a certain girl of the country near Pistoja was plucking hemp in a garden, when she observed a pigeon flying through the air, which came near her, and alighted : upon which she put up a prayer to tha Lord Santiago, saying, ' O Lord Santiago, if the things which are related of thee at Pistoja be true, and thou workest miracles, as the Pistojans affirm, give me this pigeon, that it may come into my hands !! Forthwith the pigeon rose from the spot where it had alighted, and, as if it were a tame bird, came to her, and she took it in her hands, and held it there as if it had been lifeless. What then did the girl do? She carried it home, showed it to her father, and to him and the rest of the family related in what manner it had come to her hands Some of them said, ' Let us kill and eat it ;' others said, ' Do not hurt it, but let it go.' So the girl opened her hand, to see what it would do. The pigeon, finding itself at liberty, fled to the ground, and joined the poultry which were then picking up their food, nor did it afterwards go from the house, but remained in their company, as if it belonged to them.

"All therefore regarding, with no common wonder, the remarkable tameness of this pigeon, which indeed was not a tame bird, but a wild one, they went to a priest in the adjacent city, and acquainted him with the circumstances. The priest, giving good counsel to the girl and her father, as he was hound to do, said, 'We will go together to our Lord the Bishop, on Sunday, and act as he may think proper to direct us in this matter.' Accordingly, on the Sunday they went to Pistoja, and presented the pigeon to the Bishop, who, with his Canons, was then devoutly celebrating mass in honor of Santiago, upon the holy altar which had been consecrated to his honor. The prelate, when he had listened to their story, took the bird, and placed it upon the wall of the chancel, which is round about the cltar of Santiago, and there it remained three weeks, never departing from thence, excepting that sometimes, and that very seldom, it flew about the church, but always returned without delay to its own station, and thera mildly, gently, harmlessly, and tamely continued; and rarely did it take food.

"But people from Luces, and other strangers, plucked feathers from its neck, that they might carry them away for devotion, and, moreover, that they might exhibit them to those who had not seen the bird itself. From such injuries it never attempted to defend itself, though its neck was skinned by this plucking, and this tha uothinking people continued to do, till at length the pigeon paid the debt of nature. And it was no wonder that it died; for how could any creature live that scarcely ever ute or slept? People came thither night and day from all parts, and one ofter another disturbed it, and every night vigils were kept there, the clergy and the people with loud voices singing praises to the Lord, and many lights were continually burning thera : how, therefore, could it live, when it was never allowed to be at rest? The clergy and people, grieving at its death, as indeed it was a thing to be lamented, took counsel, and hung up the skin and feathers to he seen there by all comers.

"In such and so great a matter, what could be mnre gratifying, what more convenient than this wonderful sign which the Almighty was pleased to give us? There is no need to relate any thing more concerning the aforesaid pigeon; it was seen there openly and publicly by all comers, so that not only the laity and clergy of that eity, but many religious peopla from other parts, abbots, friers, clergy, and loity, are able to attest the truth. And I also add this my testimony as a true and faithful witness, for I saw the pigeon myself for a whole week, and actually touched it with my own hands."

There is a postscript to this story, as melancholy as the tale itself. The sick, and the crippled, and the fame, had been brought to this church, in expectation of obtaining a miraculous cure by virtue of the new relics which had arrived. Among thesa was a poor woman in the last stage of disease, who had been brought upon her pallet into the church, and was laid in a corner, and left there; nor was it observed that this poor creature was in articulo mortis, tiff the pigeon flaw to the place, and alighted upon her, and so drew the attention of the people in the church to the dying woman, quam quidem, prout credimus, nisi columba monstrasset, nema morientem vidisset. " Antiguedad sagrada, el que se arriedra De te, sera su verso falto y manco."

PREFACE

SEVERAL years ago, in the Introduction of my "Letters to Mr. Charles Butler, vindicating the Book of the Church," I had occasion to state that, while a school-boy at Westminster, I had formed an intention of exhibiting the most remarkable forms of Mythology which have at any time obtained among mankind, by making each the groundwork of a narrative poem. The performance, as might be expected, fell far short of the design, and yet it proved something more than a dream of juvenile ambition.

I began with the Mahommedan religion, as being that with which I was then best acquainted myself, and of which every one who had read the Arabian Nights' Entertainments possessed all the knowledge necessary for readily understanding and entering into the intent and spirit of the poem. Mr. Wilberforce thought that I had conveyed in it a very false impression of that religion, and that the moral sublimity which he admired in it was owing to this flattering misrepresentation. But Thalaba the Destroyer was professedly an Arabian Tale. The design required that I should bring into view the best features of that system of belief and worship which had been developed under the Covenant with Ishmael, placing in the most favorable light the morality of the Koran, and what the least corrupted of the Mahommedans retain of the patriarchal faith. It would have been altogether incongruous to have touched upon the abominations engrafted upon it; first by the false Prophet himself, who appears to have been far more remarkable for audacious profligacy than for any intellectual endowments, and afterwards by the spirit of Oriental despotism which accompanied Mahommedanism wherever it was established.

Heathen Mythologies have generally been represented by Christian poets as the work of the Devil and his Angels; and the machinery derived from them was thus rendered credible, according to what was during many ages a received opinion. The plan mpon which I proceeded in Madoc was to produce the effect of machinery as far as was consistent with the character of the poem, by representing the most remarkable religion of the New World such as it was, a system of atrocious priestcraft. It was not here, as in Thalaba, the foundation of the poem, but, as usual in what are called epic poems, only incidentally connected with it.

When I took up, for my next subject, that mythology which Sir William Jones had been the first to introduce into English poetry, I soon perceived that the best mode of treating it would be to construct a story altogether mythological. In what form to compose it was then to be determined. No such question had arisen concerning any of my former poems. I should never for a moment have thought of any other measure than blank verse for Joan of Arc, and for Madoc, and afterwards for Roderick. The reason why the irregular, rhymeless lyrics of Dr. Sayers were preferred for Thalaba was, that the freedom and variety of such verse were suited to the story. Indeed, of all the landatory criticisms with which I have been favored during a long literary life, none ever gratified me more than that of Henry Kirke White upon this occasion, when he observed, that if any other known measure had been adopted, the poem would have been deprived of half its beauty, and all its propriety. And when he added, that the author never seemed to inquire how other men would treat a subject, or what might be the fashion of the times, but took that course which his own sense of fitness jointed out, I could not have desired more appropriate commendation.

The same sense of fitness which made me choose for an Arabian tale the simplest and easiest form of verse, induced me to take a different course in an Indian poem. It appeared to me, that here neither the tone of morals, nor the strain of poetry, could be pitched too high; that nothing but moral sublimity could compensate for the extravagance of the fictions, and that all the skill I might possess in the art of poetry was required to counterbalance the disadvantage of a mythology with which few readers were likely to be well acquainted, and which would appear monstrous if its deformities were not kept out of sight. I endeavored, therefore, to combine the utmost richness of versification with the greatest freedom. The spirit of the poem was Indian, but there was nothing Oriental in the style. I had learnt the language of poetry from our own great masters and the great poets of antiquity.

No poem could have been more deliberately "according to planned, nor more carefully composed. It was commenced at Lisbon on the first of May, IS01, and recommenced in the summer of the same year at Kingsdown, in the same house (endeared to me once by many delightful but now mournful recollections) in which Madoc had been finished, and Thalaba begun. A little was added during the winter of that year in London. It was resumed at Kingsdown in the summer of 1502, and then laid aside till 1806, during which interval Madoc was reconstructed and published. Resuming it then once more, all that had been written was recast at Keswick: there I proceeded with it leisurely, and finished it on the 25th of November, 1809. It is the only one of my long poems of which detached parts were written to be afterwards inserted in their proper places. Were I to name the persons to whom it was communicated during its progress, it would be admitted now that I might well be encouraged by their approbation; and, indeed, when it was published, I must have been very unreasonable if I had not been satisfied with its reception.

It was not till the present edition of these Poems was in the press, that, eight-and-twenty years after Kehama had been published, I first saw the article npon it in the Monthly Review, parts of which cannot be more appropriately preserved any where than here; it shows the determination with which the Reviewer entered upon his task, and the importance which he attached to it.

"Throughout our literary career we cannot recollect a more favorable opportunity than the present for a full discharge of our critical duty. We are indeed bound now to make a firm stand for the purity of our poetic taste against this last and most desperate assault, conducted as it is by a writer of considerable reputation, and unquestionably of considerable abilities. If this poem were to be tolerated, all things after it may demand impunity, and it will be in vain to contend hereafter for any one established rule of poetry as to design and subject, as to character and incident, as to language and versification. We may return at once to the rude hymn in honor of Bacchus, and indite strains adapted to the recitation of rustics in the season of the vintage :---

Quæ canerent agerentque peruucti facibus ora.

It shall be our plan to establish these points, we hope, beyond reasonable controversy, by a complete analysis of the twenty-four sections (as they may truly be called) of the portentous work, and by ample quotations interspersed with remarks, in which we shall endeavor to withhold no praise that can fairly be claimed, and no censure that is obviously deserved."

The reviewer fulfilled his promises, however much he failed in his object. He was not more liberal of censure than of praise, and he was not sparing of quotations. The analysis was sufficiently complete for the purposes of criticism, except that the critic did not always give himself the trouble to understand what he was determined to ridicule. "It is necessary for us," he said, "according to our purpose of deterring future writers from the choice of such a story, or for such a management of that story, to detail the gross follies of the work in question; and, tedious as the operation may be, we trust that, in the judgment of all those lovers of literature who duly value the preservation of sound principles of composition among us, the end will excuse the means." The means were ridicule and reprobation, and the end at which he aimed was thus stated in the Review

"We know not that Mr. Southey's most devoted admirers can complain of our having omitted a single incident essential to the display of his character or the development of his plot. To other readers we should apologize for our prolixity, were we not desirous, as we hinted before, of giving a death-blow to the gross extravagances of the author's school of poetry, if we cannot hope to reform so great an offender as himself. In general, all that nature and all that art has lavished on him is rendered useless by his obstinate adherence to his own system of fancied originality, in which every thing that is good is old, and every thing that is new is good for nothing. Convinced as we are that many of the author's faults proceed from mere idleness, deserving even less indulgence than the erroneous principles of his poetical system, we shall conclude by a general exhortation to all critics to condemn, and to all writers to avoid, the example of combined carelessness and perversity which is here afforded by Mr. Southey; and we shall mark this last and worst eccentricity of his Muse with the following character : -- Here is the composition of a poet not more distinguished by his genius and knowledge, than by his contempt for public opinion and the utter depravity of his taste - a depravity which is incorrigible, and, we are sorry to add, most unblushingly rejoicing in its own hopelessness of amendment.

The Monthly Review has, I believe, been for some years defunet. I never knew to whom I was beholden for the good service rendered me in that Journal, when such assistance was of most value; nor by whom I was subsequently, during several years, favored in the same Journal with such flagrant civilities as those of which the reader has here seen a sample.

KESWICK, 19th May, 1838.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

In the religion of the Hindoos, which of all false religions is the most monstrons in its fables, and the most fatal in its effects, there is one remarkable peculiarity. Prayers, penances, and sacrifices, are supposed to possess an inherent and actual value, in no degree depending upon the disposition or motive of the person who performs them. They are drafts upon Heaven, for which the Gods cannot refuse payment. The worst men, bent upon the worst designs, have in this manner obtained power which has made them formidable to the Supreme Deities themselves, and rendered an Arutar, or Incarnation of Veeshnoo the Preserver, necessary. This belief is the foundation of the following Poem. The story is original; but, in all its parts, consistent with the superstition upon which it is built; and however startling the fictions may appear, they might almost be called credible when compared with the genuine tales of Hindoo mythology.

No figures can be imagined more anti-picturesque, and less poetical, than the mythological personages of the Bramins. This deformity was easily kept out of sight: - their hundred hands are but a clumsy personification of power; their numerous heads only a gross image of divinity, "whose countenance," as the Bhagvat-Geeta expresses it, "is turned on every side." To the other obvious objection, that the religion of Hindostan is not generally known enough to supply fit machinery for an English poem, I can only answer, that, if every allusion to it throughout the work is not sufficiently self-explained to render the passage intelligible, there is a want of skill in the poet. Even those readers who should be wholly unacquainted with the writings of our learned Orientalists, will find all the preliminary knowledge that can be needful, in the brief explanation of mythological names prefixed to the Poem.

BRAMA, the Creator. VEESHNOO, ... the Preserver.

SEEVA, the Destroyer.

- These form the Trimeurtce, or Trinity, as it has been called, of the Bramins. The allegory is obvious, but has been made for the Trimourtee, not the Trimourtee for the allegory; and these Deities are regarded by the people as three distinct and personal Gods. The Iwo latter have at this day their hostile sects of worshippers; that of Seeva is the most numerous; and in this Peem, Seeva is represented as Supreme among the Gods. This is the same God whose name is variously written Seeb, Sieven, and Siva; Chiven by the French ; Xiven by the Portuguese ; and whom European writers sometimes denominate Eswara, Iswaren, Mahadeo, Mahadeva, Rutren, - according to which of his thousand and eight names prevailed in the country where they obtained their information. INORA, God of the Elements.
- The SWEROA, . . his Peradise, one of the Hindoo heavens.
- YAMEN, Lord of Hell, and Judge of the Dead.
- PADALON, Hell, -- under the Earth, and, like the Earth, of an octagon shape; its eight gates are guarded by as many Gods.
- MARRIATALY, .. the Goddess who is chiefly worshipped by the lower castes.
- POLLEAR, or Ganesa, the Protector of Travellers. His statues are placed in the highways, and sometimes in a small, lonely sanctuary, in the streets and in the fields.
- CASYAPA, the Father of the Immortals.
- DEVETAS, the Inferior Deities.
- SURAS, Good Spirits.
- Asuras, Evil Spirits, or Devils.
- GLENGOVEERS, . the most beautiful of the Good Spirits, the Grindeuvers of Sonnerat.

THE FUNERAL.

1.

MIDNIGHT, and yet no eye Through all the Imperial City closed in sleep ! Behold her streets a-blaze With light that seems to kindle the red sky,

Her myriads swarming through the crowded Ways

Master and slave, old age and infancy, All, all abroad to gaze; House-top and balcony Clustered with women, who throw back their veils With unimpeded and insatiate sight To view the funeral pomp which passes by, As if the mournful rite Were but to them a scene of joyance and delight.

Vainly, ye blessed twinklers of the night, Your feeble beams ye shed, Quench'd in the unnatural light which might outstare Even the broad eye of day;

And thou from the bload eye of vay, And thou from thy celestial way Pourest, O Moon, an ineffectual ray! For lo! ten thousand torches flame and flare Upon the midnight air, Blotting the lights of heaven With one portentous glare. Behold, the fragrant smoke, in many a fold Ascending, floats along the fiery sky, And hangeth visible on high, A dark and waving canopy.

Hark ! 'tis the funeral trumpet's breath ! 'Tis the dirge of death ! At once ten thousand drums begin, With one long thunder-peal the ear assailing; Ten thousand voices then join in, And with one deep and general din Pour their wild wailing. The song of praise is drown'd Amid the deafening sound; You hear no more the trumpet's tone, You hear no more the mourner's moan, Though the trumpet's breath, and the dirge of death, Swell with commingled force the funeral yell. But rising over all, in one acclaim, Is heard the echoed and reëchoed name, From all that countless rout ----Arvalan ! Arvalan ! Arvalan! Arvalan! Ten times ten thousand voices in one shout Call Arvalan ! the overpowering sound, From house to house repeated, rings about, From tower to tower rolls round.

4.

The death-procession moves along; Their bald heads shining to the torches' ray, The Bramins lead the way, Chanting the funeral song. And now at once they shout, Arvalan ! Arvalan ! With quick rebound of sound, All in accordant cry, Arvalan ! Arvalan ! The universal multitude reply. In vain ye thunder on his ear the name; Would ye awake the dead ? Borne upright in his palanquin, There Arvalan is seen ! A glow is on his face, — a lively red; It is the crimson canopy Which o'er his cheek a reddening shade hath shed; He moves, — he nods his head, — But the motion comes from the bearers' tread, As the body, borne aloft in state, Sways with the impulse of its own dead weight.

5.

Close following his dead son, Kehama came, Nor joining in the ritual song, Nor calling the dear name; With head depress'd, and funeral vest, And arms enfolded on his breast, Silent and lost in thought he moves along. King of the world, his slaves, unenvying now, Behold their wretched Lord; rejoiced they see The mighty Rajah's misery; That nature in his pride hath dealt the blow, And taught the Master of Mankind to know Even he himself is man, and not exempt from woe.

6.

O sight of grief! the wives of Arvalan, Young Azla, young Nealliny, are seen ! Their widow-robes of white, With gold and jewels bright, Each like an Eastern queen. Woe! woe! around their palanquin, As on a bridal day, With symphony, and dance, and song, Their kindred and their friends come on The dance of sacrifice ! the funeral song ! And next the victim slaves in long array, Richly bedight to grace the fatal day, Move onward to their death: The clarions' stirring breath Lifts their thin robes in every flowing fold, And swells the woven gold, That on the agitated air Flutters and glitters to the torch's glare.

7.

A man and maid of aspect wan and wild, Then, side by side, by bowmen guarded, came; O wretched father! O unhappy child! Them were all eyes of all the throng exploring — Is this the daring man Who raised his fatal hand at Arvalan? Is this the wretch condemn'd to feel Kehama's dreadful wrath? Then were all hearts of all the throng deploring; For not in that innumerable throng Was one who loved the dead; for who could know What aggravated wrong Provoked the desperate blow '

8.

 Far, far behind, beyond all reach of sight, In order'd files the torches flow along,
 One ever-lengthening line of gliding light Far, far behind,
 Rolls on the undistinguishable clamor Of horn, and trump, and tambour;

Incessant as the roar Of streams which down the wintry mountain pour, And londer than the dread commotion Of breakers on a rocky shore, When the winds rage over the waves, And Ocean to the Tempest raves.

And now toward the bank they go, Where, winding on their way below, Deep and strong the waters flow. Here doth the funeral pile appear With myrrh and ambergris bestrew'd, And built of precious sandal wood. They cease their music and their outcry here; Gently they rest the bier; They wet the face of Arvalan, -No sign of life the sprinkled drops excite; They feel his breast, - no motion there; They feel his lips, - no breath ; For not with feeble, nor with erring hand, The brave avenger dealt the blow of death. Then, with a doubling peal and deeper blast, The tambours and the trumpets sound on high, And with a last and loudest cry They call on Arvalan.

10.

Woe! woe! for Azla takes her seat Upon the funeral pile; Calmly she took her seat, Calmly the whole terrific pomp survey'd; As on her lap the while The lifeless head of Arvalan was laid.

11.

Woe! woe! Nealliny, The young Nealliny, They strip her ornaments away, Bracelet and anklet, ring, and chain, and zone; Aronnd her neck they leave The marriage knot alone, — That marriage band, which, when Yon waning moon was young, Around her virgin neck With bridal joy was hung. Then with white flowers, the coronal of death, Her jetty locks they crown.

12.

O sight of misery ! You cannot hear her cries, — their sound In that wild dissonance is drown'd; — But in her face you see The supplication and the agony, — See in her swelling throat the desperate strength That with vain effort struggles yet for life; Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife, Now wildly at full length Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread; — They force her on, they bind her to the dead.

13.

Then all around retire ; Circling the pile, the ministering Bramins stand, 72 Each lifting in his hand a torch on fire. Alone the Father of the dead advanced And lit the funeral pyre.

14.

At once on every side The circling torches drop; At once on every side The fragrant oil is pour'd: At once on every side The rapid flames rush up. Then hand in hand the victim band Roll in the dance around the funeral pyre ; Their garments' flying folds Float inward to the fire; In drunken whirl they wheel around; One drops, - another plunges in; And still with overwhelming dim The tambours and the trumpets sound; And clap of hand, and shouts, and cries, From all the multitude arise; While round and round, in giddy wheel, Intoxicate they roll and reel, Till one by one whirl'd in they fall, And the devouring flames have swallow'd all.

15.

Then all was still; the drums and clarions ceased; The multitude were hush'd in silent awe; Only the roaring of the flames was heard.

Π.

THE CURSE.

1.

ALONE towards the Table of the Dead Kehama moved; there on the altar-stone Honey and rice he spread. There, with collected voice and painful tone, He call'd upon his son. Lo! Arvalan appears; Only Kehama's powerful eye beheld The thin, ethereal spirit hovering nigh; Only the Rajah's ear Receiv'd his feeble breath. And is this all? the mournful Spirit said, This all thon canst give me after death? This unavailing pomp, These empty pageantries, that mock the dead '

2.

In bitterness the Rajah heard, And groan'd, and smote his breast, and o'er his face Cowl'd the white mourning vest.

3.

ARVALAN. Art thou not powerful, — even like a God ² And must I, through my years of wandering, Shivering and naked to the elements, In wretchedness await The hour of Yamen's wrath ²

I thought thou wouldst imbody me anew, Undying as I am; — Yea, re-create me! — Father, is this all? This all? and thou Almighty!

But in that wrongful and upbraiding tone Kehama found relief; For rising anger half suppress'd his grief. Reproach not me! he cried, Had I not spell-secur'd thee from disease, Fire, sword, — all common accidents of man, — And thou! — fool, fool — to perish by a stake ! And by a peasant's arm! — Even now, when from reluctant Heaven, Forcing new gifts and mightier attributes, So soon I should have quell'd the Death-God's power.

5.

Waste not thy wrath on me, quoth Arvalan ; It was my hour of folly! Fate prevail'd; Nor boots it to reproach me that I fell. I am in misery, Father! Other souls, Predoom'd to Indra's Heaven, enjoy the dawn Of bliss; to them the temper'd elements Minister joy : genial delight the sun Sheds on their happy being, and the stars Effuse on them benignant influences; And thus o'er earth and air they roam at will, And, when the number of their days is full, Go fearlessly before the awful throne. But 1, - all naked feeling and raw life, -What worse than this hath Yamen's hell in store? If ever thou didst love me, merey, father ! Save me, for thou can'st save - the Elements Know and obey thy voice.

6.

KEHAMA.

The Elements Shall sin no more against thee; whilst I speak, Already dost thou feel their power is gone.

Fear not! I cannot call again the past; Fate hath made that its own; but Fate shall yield To me the future; and thy doom be fix'd

By mine, not Yamen's will. Meantime all power, Whereof thy feeble spirit can be made Participant, I give. Is there aught else To mitigate thy lot?

ARVALAN.

Only the sight of vengeance. Give me that! Vengeance, full, worthy vengeance!—not the stroke

Of sudden punishment, — no agony That spends itself, and leaves the wretch at rest, But lasting, long revenge.

КЕНАМА,

What, boy? is that cup sweet? then take thy fill! 7.

So, as he spake, a glow of dreadful pride Inflamed his check; with quick and angry stride He moved toward the pile, And raised his hand to hush the crowd, and cried, Bring forth the murderer! At the Rajah's voice, Calmly, and like a man whom lear had stunn'd, Ladurlad came, obedient to the call; But Kailyal started at the sound, And gave a womanly shrick; and back she drew, And eagerly she roll'd her eyes around, As if to seek for aid, albeit she knew No aid could there be found.

It chanced that near her, on the river-brink, The seulptured form of Marriataly stood; It was an Idol roughly hewn of wood, Artless, and mean, and rude; The Goddess of the poor was she; None else regarded her with piety. But when that holy Image Kailyal view'd, To that she sprung, to that she clung; On her own Goddess with elose-clasping arms, For life the maiden hung.

9.

They seized the maid; with unrelenting grasp They bruised her tender limbs; She, nothing yielding, to this only hope Clings with the strength of frenzy and despair; She sereams not now, she breathes not now, She sends not up one vow, She forms not in her soul one secret prayer, All thought, all feeling, and all powers of life In the one effort centring. Wrathful they With tug and strain would force the maid away; Didst thou, O Marriataly, see their strife? In pity didst thou see the suffering maid? Or was thine anger kindled, that rude hands Assail'd thy holy Image? — for behold The holy image shakes!

10.

Irreverently bold, they deem the maid Relax'd her stubborn hold, And now with force redoubled drag their prey; And now the rooted hol to their sway Bends, — yields, — and now it falls. But then they scream; For hol, they feel the crumbling bank give way

For lo! they feel the erumbling bank give way, And all are plunged into the stream.

11.

She hath escaped my will, Kehama cried; She hath escaped, — but thou art here; I have thee still, The worser criminal ! And on Ladurlad, while he spake, severe He fix'd his dreadful frown. The strong reflection of the pile Lit his dark lineaments, Uit the protonded brow, the gathered front.

Lit the protruded brow, the gathered front, The steady eye of wrath.

But while the fearful silence yet endured, Ladurlad roused himself;

Н.

Ere yet the voice of destiny Which trembled on the Rajah's lips was loosed, Eager he interposed, As if despair had waken'd him to hope; Mercy! oh mercy! only in defence — Only instinctively — Only to save my child, I smote the Prince; King of the world, be merciful! Crush me — but torture not!

13.

The Man-Almighty deign'd him no reply; Still he stood silent; in no human mood Of mercy, in no hesitating thought Of right and justice. At the length he raised His brow, yet unrelax'd, — his lips unclosed, And, uttered from the heart, With the whole feeling of his soul enforced, The gathered vengeance came.

14.

I charm thy life From the weapons of strife, From stone and from wood, From fire and from flood, From the serpent's tooth, And the beasts of blood : From Sickness I charm thee. And Time shall not harm thee; But Earth, which is mine, Its fruits shall deny thee; And Water shall hear me, And know thee and fly thee; And the Winds shall not touch thee When they pass by thee, And the Dews shall not wet thee, When they fall nigh thee: And thou shalt seek Death To release thee, in vain; Thou shalt live in thy pain, While Kehama shall reign, With a fire in thy heart, And a fire in thy brain; And Sleep shall obey me, And visit thee never, And the Curse shall be on thee Forever and ever.

15.

There where the Curse had stricken him, There stood the miserable man, There stood Ladurlad, with loose-hanging arms, And eyes of idiot wandering. Was it a dream? alas! He heard the river flow ; He heard the crumbling of the pile ; He heard the erumbling of the pile ; He heard the wind which shower'd The thin, white ashes round. There motionless he stood, As if he hoped it were a dream, And feared to move, lest he should prove The actual misery ; And still at times he met Kehama's eye, Kehama's eye, that fastened on him still.

III.

THE RECOVERY.

1.

The Rajah turned toward the pile again; Loud rose the song of death from all the crowd; Their din the instruments begin, And once again join in With overwhelming sound. Ladurlad starts, — he looks around; What hast thou here in view, O wretched man, in this disastrous scene? The soldier train, the Bramins who renew Their ministry around the funeral pyre, The empty palanquins, The dinily-fading fire.

2.

Where, too, is she whom most his heart held dear, His best-beloved Kailyal, where is she, The solace and the joy of many a year Of widowhood? is she then gone, And is he left all-utterly alone, To bear his blasting curse, and none To succor or deplore him? He staggers from the dreadful spot; the throng Give way in fear before him; Like one who carries pestilence about, Shuddering they shun him, where he moves along And now he wanders on Beyond the noisy rout: He cannot fly and leave his Curse behind ; Yet doth he seem to find A comfort in the change of circumstance. Adown the shore he strays, Unknowing where his wretched feet shall rest, But farthest from the fatal place is best.

3.

By this in the orient sky appears the gleam Of day. Lo! what is yonder in the stream, Down the slow river floating slow, In distance indistinct and dimly seen? The childless one, with idle eye, Followed its motion thoughtlessly; Idly he gazed, unknowing why, And half unconscious that he watch'd its way. Belike it is a tree Which some rude tempest, in its sudden sway, Tore from the rock, or from the hollow shore

The undermining stream hath swept away.

But when anon outswelling, by its side, A woman's robe he spied, Oh then Ladurlad started, As one, who in his grave Had heard an Angel's call. Yea, Marriataly, thou hast deign'd to save ! Yea, Goddess! it is she, Kailyal, still clinging senselessly To thy dear Image, and in happy hour

Upborne aniid the wave By that preserving power.

Headlong in hope and in joy Ladurlad plunged in the water; The Water knew Kehama's spell; The Water shrunk before him. Blind to the miraele, He rushes to his daughter, And treads the river depths in transport wild, And clasps, and saves his child.

6.

Upon the farther side, a level shore Of sand was spread : thither Ladurlad bore His daughter, holding still with senseless hand The saving Goddess; there upon the sand He laid the livid maid, Raised up against his knees her drooping head; Bent to her lips, — her lips as pale as death, — If he might feel her breath, His own the while in hope and dread suspended;

Chafed her cold breast, and ever and anon Let his hand rest, upon her heart extended.

Soon did his touch perceive, or fancy, there The first faint motion of returning life. He chafes her feet, and lays them bare In the sun; and now again upon her breast Lays his hot hand; and now her lips he press'd, For now the stronger throb of life he knew; And her lips tremble too! The breath comes palpably : Her quivering lids unclose, Feebly and feebly fall,

Relapsing, as it seem'd, to dead repose.

So in her father's arms thus languidly, While over her with earnest gaze he hung, Silent and motionless she lay, And painfully and slowly writhed at fits; At fits, to short convulsive starts was stung. Till when the struggle and strong agony Had left her, quietly she lay reposed; Iler eyes now resting on Ladurlad's face, Relapsing now, and now again unclosed. The look she fix'd upon his face implies Nor thought nor feeling; senselessly she lies, Composed like one who sleeps with open eyes.

Long he lean'd over her, In silence and in fear. Kailya!!—at length he cried in such a tone As a poor mother ventures who draws near, With silent footstep, to her child's sick bed. My Father! cried the maid, and raised her head, Awakening then to life and thought,—thou here? For when his voice she heard, The dreadful past recurr'd,

Which dimly, like a dream of pain, Till now with troubled sense confused her brain. 10.

And hath he spared us then? she cried, Half rising as she spake,

For hope and joy the sudden strength supplied; In mercy hath he curb'd his cruel will,

That still then livest? But as thus she said, Impatient of that look of hope, her sire Shook hastily his head;

Oh! he hath laid a Curse upon my life, A clinging curse, quoth he;

Hath sent a fire into my heart and brain, A burning fire, forever there to be!

The Winds of Heaven must never breathe on me, The Rains and Dews must never fall on me;

Water must mock my thirst, and shrink from me, The common Earth must yield no fruit to me; Sleep, blessed Sleep! must never light on me; And Death, who comes to all, must fly from me, And never, never, set Ladurlad free.

11.

This is a dream ! exclaimed the incredulous maid, Yet in her voice the while a fear express'd, Which in her larger eye was manifest. This is a dream ! she rose, and laid her hand Upon her father's brow, to try the charm ; He could not bear the pressure there; — he shrunk ; He warded off her arm, As though it were an enemy's blow; he smote His danghter's arm aside. Her eye glanced down ; his mantle she espied,

And caught it up. — Oh misery ! Kailyal cried, He bore me from the river-depths, and yet Ilis garment is not wet !

IV.

THE DEPARTURE.

1.

RECLINED beneath a Cocoa's feathery shade Ladurlad lies,

And Kailyal on his lap her head hath laid, To hide her streaming eyes.

The boatman, sailing on his easy way, With envious eye beheld them where they lay;

For every herb and flower Was fresh and fragrant with the early dew; Sweet sung the birds in that delicious hour,

And the cool gale of morning, as it blew, Not yet subdued by day's increasing power,

Ruffling the surface of the silvery stream, Swept o'er the moisten'd sand, and raised no shower.

Telling their tale of love, The boatman thought they lay At that lone hour, and who so blest as they!

2.

But now the Sun in heaven is high; The little songsters of the sky Sit silent in the sultry hour;

They pant and palpitate with heat; Their bills are open languidly To catch the passing air; They hear it not, they feel it not, It murmurs not, it moves not. The boatman, as he looks to land, Admires what men so mad to linger there, For yonder Cocca's shade behind them falls, A single spot upon the burning sand.

There all the morning was Ladurlad laid Silent and motionless, like one at ease; There motionless upon her father's knees Reclined the silent maid. The man was still, pondering with steady mind, As if it were another's Curse, His own portentous lot; Scanning it o'er and o'er in busy thought, As though it were a last night's tale of woe, Before the cottage door By some old beldam sung, While young and old, assembled round, Listened, as if by witchery bound, In fearful pleasure to her wondrous tongue.

4.

Musing so long he lay, that all things seem Unreal to his sense, even like a dream,
A monstrous dream of things which could not be.
That beating, burning brow, — why it was now
The height of noon, and he was lying there In the broad sun, all bare !
What if he felt no wind ! the air was still. That was the general will
Of Nature, not his own peculiar doom; Yon rows of rice erect and silent stand,
The shadow of the Cocoa's lighest plume Is steady on the sand.

Is it indeed a dream? He rose to try; Impatient to the water side he went, And down he bent, And in the stream he plunged his hasty arm To break the visionary charm. With fearful eye and fearful heart, His daughter watch'd the event ; She saw the start and shudder, She heard the in-drawn groan, For the Water knew Kehama's charm; The Water shrunk before his arm; His dry hand moved about unmoisten'd there; As easily might that dry hand avail To stop the passing gale, Or grasp the impassive air. He is Almighty then ! Exclaim'd the wretched man in his despair: Air knows him; Water knows him; Sleep His dreadful word will keep; Even in the grave there is no rest for me, Cut off from that last hope, - the wretch's joy; And Veeshnoo hath no power to save, Nor Seeva to destroy.

Oh! wrong not them! quoth Kailyal; Wrong not the Heavenly Powers! Our hope is all in them. They are not blind! And lighter wrongs than ours, And lighter crimes than his, Have drawn the Incarnate down among mankind Already have the Immortals heard our cries, And in the mercy of their righteousness Beheld us in the hour of our distress : She spake with streaming eyes, Where pious love and ardent feeling beam. And turning to the Image threw Her grateful arms around it. - It was thou Who savedst me from the stream ! My Marriataly, it was thou ! I had not else been here To share my Father's Curse, To suffer now, - and yet to thank thee thus !

7.

Here then, the maiden cried, dear Father, here Raise our own Goddess, our divine Preserver ! The nighty of the earth despise her rites; She loves the poor who serve her. Set up her Image here; With heart and voice the guardian Goddess bless For jealously would she resent Neglect and thanklessness;— Set up her Image here, And bless her for her aid with tongue and sou sincere. 8.

So saying, on her knees the maid Began the pious toil. Soon their joint labor scoops the easy soil; They raise the Image up with reverent hand, And round its rooted base they heap the sand. O Thou whom we adore, O Marriataly, thee do I implore, The virgin cried; my Goddess, pardon thou The unwilling wrong, that I no more, With dance and song, Can do thy daily service, as of yore ! The flowers which last I wreathed around thy brow, Are withering there; and never now Shall I at eye adore thee,

And swimming round, with arms outspread, Poise the full pitcher on my head, In dexterous dance before thee, While underneath the reedy shed, at rest My father sat the evening rites to view, And blest thy name, and blest His daughter too.

Then heaving from her heart a heavy sigh, O Goddess! from that happy home, cried she, The Almighty Man hath forced us! And homeward with the thought unconsciously She turn'd her dizzy cyc. —But there on high, With many a dome, and pinnacle, and spire,

The summits of the Golden Palaces Blazed in the dark blue sky, aloft, like fire. Father, away ! she cried, away ! Why linger we so nigh ? For not to him hath Nature given The thousand eyes of Deity, Always and every where, with open sight, To persecute our flight ! Away — away ! she said, And took her father's hand, and like a child He followed where she led.

V.

THE SEPARATION.

1.

EVENING comes on : arising from the stream, Homeward the tall flamingo wings his flight; And where he sails athwart the setting beam, His scarlet plumage glows with deeper light. The watchman, at the wish'd approach of night, Gladly forsakes the field, where he all day, To scare the winged plunderers from their prey, With shout and sling, on yonder clay-built height, Hath borne the sultry ray. Hark! at the Golden Palaces

The Bramin strikes the hour. For leagues and leagues around, the brazen sound Rolls through the stillness of departing day, Like thunder far away.

Behold them wandering on their hopeless way, Unknowing where they stray, Yet sure where'er they stop to find no rest. The evening gale is blowing; It plays among the trees; Like plumes upon a warrior's crest, They see you cocoas tossing to the breeze. Ladurlad views them with impatient mind; Impatiently he hears The gale of evening blowing, The sound of waters flowing, As if all sights and sounds combined To mock his irremediable woe; For not for him the blessed waters flow; For not for him the gales of evening blow; A fire is in his heart and brain.

And Nature hath no healing for his pain.

The Moon is up, still pale Amid the lingering light. A cloud, ascending in the eastern sky, Sails slowly o'er the vale, And darkens round, and closes in the night. No hospitable house is nigh, No traveller's home, the wanderers to invite; Forlorn, and with long watching overworn, The wretched father and the wretched child Lie down amid the wild. Before them, full in sight, A white flag, flapping to the winds of night, Marks where the tiger seized a human prey. Far, far away, with natural dread Shunning the perilons spot, At other times abhorrent had they fled, But now they heed it not. Nothing they care ; the boding death-flag now In vain for them may gleam and flutter there. Despair and agony in him Prevent all other thought ; And Kailyal hath no heart or sense for aught, Save her dear father's strange and miserable lot

-5,

There, in the woodland shade, Upon the lap of that unhappy maid, His head Ladurlad laid, And never word he spake ; Nor heaved he one complaining sigh, Nor groaned he with his misery, But silently, for her dear sake, Endured the raging pain. And now the moon was hid on high; No stars were glimmering in the sky; She could not see her father's eye, How red with burning agony : Perhaps he may be cooler now, She hoped, and long'd to touch his brow With gentle hand, yet did not dare To lay the painful pressure there. Now forward from the tree she bent, And anxiously her head she leant, And listened to his breath. Ladurlad's breath was short and quick, Yet regular it came, And like the slumber of the sick, In pantings still the same. Oh, if he sleeps ! - her lips unclose, Intently listening to the sound, That equal sound so like repose. Still quietly the sufferer lies, Bearing his torment now with resolute will; He neither moves, nor groans, nor sighs. Doth satiate cruelty bestow This little respite to his woe, She thought, or are there Gods who look helow?

6.

Perchance, thought Kailyal, willingly deceived, Our Marriataly hath his pain relieved,
And she hath bade the blessed Sleep assnage It is agony, despite the Rajah's rage.
That was a hope which fill'd her gushing eyes,
And made her heart in silent yearnings rise,
To bless the power divine in thankfulness.
And yielding to that joyful thought her mind,
Backward the maid her aching head reclined
Against the tree, and to her father's breath
In fear she hearken'd still with earnest ear.
But soon forgetful fits the effort broke :
In starts of recollection then she woke,
Till now, benignant Nature overcame
The Virgin's weary and exhausted frame, Nor able more her painful watch to keep, She closed her heavy lids, and sunk to sleep.

Υ.

7.

Vain was her hope ! he did not rest from pain ; The Curse was burning in his brain ; Alas! the innocent maiden thought he slept ; But Sleep the Rajah's dread commandment kept ; Sleep knew Kehama's Curse. The dews of night fell round them now ; They never bathed Ladurlad's brow ; They never bathed Ladurlad's brow ; They knew Kehama's Curse. The night-wind is abroad ; Aloft it moves among the stirring trees ; He only heard the breeze, — No healing aid to him it brought ; It play'd around his head, and touch'd him not ; It knew Kehama's curse. •

8.

Listening, Ladurlad lay in his despair, If Kailyal slept, for wherefore should she share Her father's wretchedness, which none could cure ? Better alone to suffer; he must bear The burden of his Curse; but why endure The unavailing presence of her grief? She, too, apart from him, might find relief; For dead the Rajah deem'd her, and as thus Already she his dread revenge had fled, So might she still escape, and live secure.

9.

Gently he lifts his head, And Kailyal does not feel; Gently he rises up, -she slumbers still; Gently he steals away with silent tread. Anon she started, for she felt him gone; She call'd, and through the stillness of the night, His step was heard in flight. Mistrustful for a moment of the sound, She listens; till the step is heard no more; But then she knows that he indeed is gone, And with a thrilling shriek she rushes on. The darkness and the wood impede her speed; She lifts her voice again -Ladurlad ! - and again, alike in vain, And with a louder cry Straining its tone to hoarseness ; - far away, Selfish in misery,

He heard the call, and faster did he fly.

10.

She leans against that tree whose jutting bough Smote her so rudely. Her poor heart, How audibly it panted, With sudden stop and start !
Her breath, how short and painfully it came ! Hark ! all is still around her, — And the night so utterly dark,
She opened her eyes, and she closed them, And the blackness and blank were the same.

11,

'Twas like a dream of horror, and she stood Half doubting whether all indeed were true. A Tiger's howl, loud echoing through the wood, Roused her; the dreadful sound she knew, And turn'd instinctively to what she fear'd.
Far off the Tiger's hungry howl was heard; A nearer horror met the maiden's view, For right before her a dim form appear'd, A human form in that black night, Distinctly shaped by its own lurid light, Such light as the sickly Moon is seen to shed, Through spell-raised fogs, a bloody, baleful red.

12.

That Spectre fix'd his eyes upon her full; The light which shone in their accursed orbs Was like a light from Hell; And it grew deeper, kindling with the view. She could not turn her sight From that infernal gaze, which like a spell Bound her, and held her rooted to the ground. It palsied every power; Her limbs avail'd her not in that dread hour : There was no moving thence ; Thought, memory, sense were gone : She heard not now the Tiger's nearer cry; She thought not on her father now; Her cold heart's-blood ran back : Her hand lay senseless on the bough it clasp a; Her feet were motionless; Her fascinated eyes Like the stone eyeballs of a statue fix'd, Yet conscious of the sight that blasted them.

13.

The wind is abroad ; It opens the clouds ; Seattered before the gale, They skurry through the sky, And the darkness, retiring, rolls over the vale. The Stars in their beauty come forth on high, And through the dark blue night The Moon rides on triumphant, broad and bright. Distinct aud darkening in her light Appears that Spectre foul ; The moonbeam gives his face and form to sight, The shape of man, The living form and face of Arvalan ! — His hands are spread to clasp her.

14.

But at that sight of dread the Maid awoke ; As if a lightning-stroke Had burst the spell of fear, Away she broke all franticly, and fled. There stood a temple near, beside the way, An open fanc of Pollear, gentle God, To whom the travellers for protection pray. With elephantine head and eye severe, Here stood his image, such as when he seiz'd And tore the rebel Giant from the ground, With mighty trunk wreathed round His impotent bulk, and on his tusks, on high Impaled upheld him between earth and sky.

15.

Thither the affrighted Maiden sped her flight, And she hath reach'd the place of sanetuary;

And now within the temple in despite, Yea, even before the altar, in his sight, Hath Arvalan, with fleshly arm of might, Seized her. That instant the insulted God Caught him aloft, and from his sinuous grasp, As if from some tort catapult let loose, Over the forest hurl'd him all abroad.

16.

O'ereome with dread, She tarried not to see what heavenly Power Had saved her in that hour: Breathless and faint she fled. And now her foot struck on the knotted root Of a broad manehineel, and there the Maid Fell senselessly beneath the deadly shade.

VI.

CASYAPA.

1.

SHALL this, then, be thy fate, O lovely Maid?
Thus, Kailyal, must thy sorrows then be ended?
Her face upon the ground,
Her arms at length extended,
There, like a eorpsc, behold her laid
Beneath the deadly shade.
What if the hungry Tiger, prowling by,
Should snuff his banquet nigh?
Alas! Death needs not now his ministry;
The baleful boughs hang o'er her,
The poison-dews descend.
What Power will now restore her?
What God will be her friend?

2.

Bright and so beautiful was that fair night, It might have calm'd the gay amid their mirth, And given the wretched a delight in tears. One of the Glendoveers, The loveliest race of all of heavenly birth, Hovering with gentle motion o'er the earth, Amid the moonlight air, In sportive flight was floating round and round, Unknowing where his joyous way was tending. He saw the Maid where motionless she lay, And stoop'd his flight deseending, And raised her from the ground. Her heavy eyelids are half closed; Her checks are pale and livid like the dead; Down hang her loose arms lifelessly; Down hangs her languid head.

3.

With timely pity touch'd for one so fair, The gentle Glendoveer Press'd her, thus pale and senseless, to his breast, And springs aloft in air with sinewy wings, And bears the Maiden there, Where Himakoot, the holy Mount, on high From mid-earth rising in mid-heaven, Shines in its glory like the throne of Even. Soaring with strenuous flight above, He bears her to the blessed Grove, Where in his ancient and august abodes, There dwells old Casyapa, the Sire of Gods.

4.

The Father of the Immortals sat, Where, underneath the Tree of Life, The Fountains of the Sacred River sprung; The Father of the Immortals smiled Benignant on his son. Knowest thou, he said, my child, Ereenia, knowest thou whom thou bringest here, A mortal to the holy atmosphere?

EREENIA.

I found her in the Groves of Earth, Beneath a poison-tree, Thus lifeless as thou seest her. In pity have I brought her to these bowers, Not erring, Father! by that smile — By that benignant eye!

CASYAPA.

What if the Maid be sinful? if her ways Were ways of darkness, and her death predoom'd To that black hour of midnight, when the Moon Hath turn'd her face away, Unwilling to behold The unhappy end of guilt?

EREENIA.

Then what a lie, my Sire, were written here, In these fair characters! and she had died, Sure proof of purer life and happier doom, Now in the moonlight, in the eye of Heaven, If I had left so fair a flower to fade. But thon, — all knowing as thou art, Why askest thou of me? O Father, oldest, holiest, wisest, best, To whom all things are plain, Why askest thou of me?

> CASYAPA. Knowest thou Kehamə?

EREENIA

The Almighty Man ! Who knows not him and his tremendous power The Tyrant of the Earth, The Enemy of Heaven !

> CASYAPA. Fearest thou the Rajah?

> > EREENIA. He is terrible !

CASYAPA.

Yea, he is terrible! such power hath he, That hope hath entered Hell. The Asuras and the spirits of the damn'd Acclaim their Hero; Yamen, with the might Of Godhead, searee can quell The rebel race accurs'd:

Half from their beds of tortnre they uprise, And half uproot their chains. Is there not fear in Heaven? The souls that are in bliss suspend their joy; The danger hath disturb'd The calm of Deity, And Brama fears, and Veeshnoo turns his face In donbt toward Seeva's throne.

EREENIA.

I have seen Indra tremble at his prayers, And at his dreadful penances turn pale. They claim and wrest from Seeva power so vast, That even Seeva's self, The Highest, cannot grant and be secure.

CASVAPA.

And darest thou, Ereenia, brave The Almighty Tyrant's power?

> EREENIA. I brave him, Father! I?

CASYAPA.

Darest thou brave his vengeance?—For, if not, Take her again to earth, Cast her before the Tiger in his path, Or where the death-dew-dropping tree May work Kehama's will.

EREENIA.

Never!

CASYAPA. Then meet his wrath ! for He, even He, Hath set upon this worm his wanton foot.

EREENIA.

I knew her not, how wretched and how fair, When here I wafted her — poor Child of Earth, Shall I forsake thee, seeing thee so fair, So wretched? O my Father, let the Maid Dwell in the Sacred Grove !

CASVAPA.

That mnst not be, For Force and Evil then would enter here; Ganges, the holy stream which cleanseth sin, Would flow from hence polluted in its springs, And they who gasp upon its banks in death, Feel no salvation. Piety, and Peace, And Wisdom, these are mine; but not the power Which could protect her from the Almighty Man; Nor when the Spirit of dead Arvalan Should persecute her here to glut his rage, To heap upon her yet more agony, And ripen more damnation for himself.

EREENIA.

Dead Arvalan?

CASYAPA.

All power to him, whereof The disimbodied spirit in its state Of weakness could be made participant, 73 Kehama hath assign'd, nntil his days Of wandering shall be number'd.

EREENIA.

Look ! she drinks The gale of healing from the blessed Groves. She stirs, and lo ! her hand Hath touch'd the Holy River in its source, Who would have shrunk if aught impure were nigh CASYAPA. The Maiden, of a truth, is pure from sin.

The waters of the Holy Spring Abont the hand of Kailyal play; They rise, they sparkle, and they sing, Leaping where languidly she lay, As if with that rejoicing stir The Holy Spring would welcome her. The Tree of Life, which o'er her spread, Benignant bow'd its sacred head, And dropp'd its dews of healing; And her heart-blood, at every breath Recovering from the strife of death, Drew in new strength and feeling. Behold her beantiful in her repose, A life-bloom reddening now her dark-brown cheek: And lo ! her eyes unclose, Dark as the depth of Ganges' spring profound, When night hangs over it; Bright as the Moon's refulgent beam, That quivers on its clear up-sparkling stream.

6.

Soon she let fall her lids, As one who, from a blissful dream Waking to thoughts of pain, Fain would return to sleep, and dream again. Distrustful of the sight, She moves not, fearing to disturb The deep and full delight. In wonder fix'd, opening again her eye She gazes silently, Thinking her mortal pilgrimage was past, That she had reach'd her heavenly home of rest, And these were Gods before her, Or spirits of the blest.

7.

Lo! at Ereenia's voice, A Ship of Heaven comes sailing down the skies. Where wouldst thou bear her? cries The ancient Sire of Gods. Straight to the Swerga, to my bower of bliss, The Glendoveer replies, To Indra's own abodes. Foe of her foe, were it alone for this Indra should gnard her from his vengeance there; But if the God forbear, Unwilling yet the perilous strife to try, Or shrinking from the dreadful Rajah's might,---Weak as I am, O Father, even I Stand forth in Seeva's sight. Trust thou in him whate'er betide, And stand forth fearlessly! The Sire of Gods replied: All that He wills is right; and doubt not thou, Howe'er our feeble scope of sight May fail us now, His righteous will in all things must be done. My blessing be upon thee, O my son!

8.

VII.

THE SWERGA

1.

THEN in the Ship of Heaven, Ereenia laid The waking, wondering Maid; The Ship of Heaven, instinct with thought, display'd Its living sail, and glides along the sky On either side, in wavy tide, The clouds of morn along its path divide; The Winds, who swept in wild career on high, Before its presence check their charmed force; The Winds, that loitering lagg'd along their course, Around the living Bark enamor'd play, Swell underneath the sail, and sing before its way.

2.

That Bark, in shape, was like the furrow'd shell Wherein the Sea-Nymphs to their parent-King, On festal day, their duteous offerings bring. Its hue? — Go watch the last green light Ere Evening yields the western sky to Night; Or fix upon the Sun thy strenuous sight Till thou hast reach'd its orb of chrysolite. The sail, from end to end display'd, Bent, like a rainbow, o'er the Maid. An Angel's head, with visual eye, Through trackless space, directs its chosen way; Nor aid of wing, nor foot, nor fin, Requires to voyage o'er the obedient sky.

Disturbs the surface of the silver stream, Through air and sunshine sails the Ship of Heaven.

Recumbent there the Maiden glides along On her acrial way. How swift she feels not, thongh the swiftest wind Had flagg'd in flight behind. Motionless as a sleeping babe she lay, And all serene in mind, Feeling no fear; for that ethereal air

With such new life and joyance fill'd her heart, Fear could not enter there ;

For sure she deem'd her mortal part was o'er, And she was sailing to the heavenly shore; And that angelic form, who moved beside, Was some good Spirit sent to be her guide. Daughter of Earth! therein thou deem'st aright, And never yet did form more beautiful.

In dreams of night descending from on high, Bless the religious Virgin's gifted sight, Nor, like a vision of delight, Rise on the raptured Poet's inward eye. Of human form divine was he,

The immortal Youth of Heaven who floated by, Even such as that divinest form shall be In those blest stages of our onward race, When no infirmity,

Low thought, nor base desire, nor wasting care, Deface the semblance of our heavenly sire.

The wings of Eagle or of Cherubim Had seem'd unworthy him; Angelic power, and dignity, and grace, Were in his glorious pennons; from the neck Down to the ankle reach'd their swelling web, Richer than robes of Tyrian dye, that deck Imperial Majesty; Their color like the winter's moonless sky, When all the stars of midnight's canopy Shine forth; or like the azure deep at noon, Reflecting back to heaven a brighter blue. Such was their tint when elosed; but when outspread, The permeating light Shed through their substance thin a varying hue; Now bright as when the rose, Beauteous as fragrant, gives to scent and sight

A like delight; now like the juice that flows From Douro's generous vine; Or ruby when with deepest red it glows; Or as the morning elouds refulgent shine, When, at forthcoming of the Lord of Day,

The Orient, like a shrine, Kindles as it receives the rising ray, And heralding his way, Proclaims the presence of the Power divine.

Proclaims the presence of the Fower divine.

6.

Thus glorious were the wings Of that celestial Spirit, as he went Disporting through his native element. Nor these alone

The gorgeous beauties that they gave to view; Through the broad membrane branched a pliant bone,

Spreading like fibres from their parent stem ; Its veins like interwoven silver shone, Or as the chaster hue

Of pearls that grace some Sultan's diadera. Now with slow stroke and strong behold him smite

The buoyant air, and now in gentler flight, On motionless wing expanded, shoot along.

7.

Through air and sunshine sails the Ship of Heaven; Far, far beneath them lies The gross and heavy atmosphere of earth,

And with the Swerga gales, The Maid of mortal birth At every breath a new delight inhales. And now toward its port the Ship of Heaven, Swift as a falling meteor, shapes its flight, Yet gently as the dews of night that gem, And do not bend the hare-bell's slenderest stem. Daughter of Earth, Ereenia cried, alight; This is thy place of rest, the Swerga this; Lo, here my Bower of Bliss!

He furl'd his azure wings, which round him fold Graceful as robes of Grecian chief of old. The happy Kailyal knew not where to gaze; Her eyes around in joyful wonder roam, Now turn'd upon the lovely Glendoveer, Now on bis heavenly home.

EREENIA.

Here, Maiden, rest in peace, And I will guard thee, feeble as I am. The Almighty Rajah shall not harm thee here, While Indra keeps his throne.

KAILYAL.

Alas, thou fearest him ! Immortal as thou art, thou fearest him ! I thought that death had saved me from his power ; Not even the dead are safe.

EREENIA.

Long years of life and happiness, O Child of Earth, be thine ! From death I sav'd thee, and from all thy foes Will save thee, while the Swerga is secure.

KAILYAL.

Not me alone, O gentle Deveta ! I have a Father suffering upon earth, A persecuted, wretched, poor, good man, For whose strange misery There is no human help; And none but I dare comfort him Beneath Kehama's Curse; O gentle Deveta, protect him too !

EREENIA.

Come, plead thyself to Indra! Words like thine May win their purpose, rouse his slumbering heart, And make him yet put forth his arm to wield The thunder, while the thunder is his own.

9.

Then to the Garden of the Deity Ereenia led the Maid. In the mid garden tower'd a giant Tree; Rock-rooted on a mountain-top, it grew, Rear'd its unrivall'd head on high, And stretch'd a thousand branches o'er the sky, Drinking with all its leaves celestial dew. Lo! where from thence, as from a living well, A thousand torrents flow ! For still in one perpetual shower,

Like diamond drops, ethereal waters fell From every leaf of all its ample bower. Rolling adown the steep From that aerial height, Through the deep shade of aromatic trees, Half seen, the cataracts shoot their gleams of light, And pour upon the breeze Their thousand voices; far away the roar, In modulations of delightful sound, Half heard and ever varying, floats around. Below, an ample Lake expanded lies, Blue as the o'er-arching skies; Forth issuing from that lovely Lake A thousand rivers water Paradise. Full to the brink, yet never overflowing, They cool the amorous gales, which, ever blowing, O'er their melodious surface love to stray; Then, winging back their way, Their vapors to the parent Tree repay ; And ending thus where they began, And feeding thus the source from whence they came, The eternal rivers of the Swerga ran, Forever renovate, yet still the same.

On that ethereal lake, whose waters lie Blue and transpicuous, like another sky, The Elements had rear'd their King's abode. A strong, controlling power their strife suspended. And there their hostile essences they blended, To form a Palace worthy of the God. Built on the Lake, the waters were its floor; And here its walls were water arch'd with fire ; And here were fire with water vaulted o'er; And spires and pinnacles of fire Round watery cupolas aspire, And coofs of flame are turreted around With cloud, and shafts of cloud with flame are bound.

Here, too, the Elements forever veer, Ranging around with endless interchanging; Pursued in love, and so in love pursuing, In endless revolutions here they roll; Forever their mysterious work renewing; The parts all shifting, still unchanged the whole.

Even we on earth at intervals descry Gleams of the glory, streaks of flowing light, Openings of heaven, and streams that flash at night,

In fitful splendor, through the northern sky.

11.

Impatient of delay, Ereenia caught The Maid aloft, and spread his wings abroad, And bore her to the presence of the God. There Indra sat upon his throne reclined, Where Devetas adore him; The lute of Nared, warbling on the wind,

All tones of magie harmony combined To soothe his troubled mind,

While the dark-eyed Apsaras danced before him. In vain the God-musician play'd,

In vain the dark-eyed Nymphs of Heaven essay'd

To charm him with their beauties in the dance; And when he saw the mortal Maid appear, Led by the heroic Glendoveer, A deeper trouble fill'd his conntenance. What hast thou done, Ereenia, said the God, Bringing a mortal here? And while he spake, his eye was on the Maid; The look he gave was solemn, not severe; No hope to Kailyal it convey'd, And yet it struck no fear; There was a sad displeasure in his air, But pity too was there.

EREENIA.

Hear me, O Indra! On the lower earth I found this child of man, by what mishap I know not, lying in the lap of death. Aloft I bore her to our Father's grove, Not having other thought, than when the gales Of bliss had heal'd her, upon earth again To leave its lovely daughter. Other thoughts Arose, when Casyapa declared her fate; For she is one who groaus beneath the power Of the dread Rajah, terrible alike To men and Gods. His son, dead Arvalan, Arm'd with a portion, Indra, of thy power, Already wrested from thee, persecutes The Maid, the helpless one, the innocent. What, then, behoved me but to waft her here To my own Bower of Bliss? what other choice? The spirit of foul Arvalan not yet Hath power to enter here ; here thou art yet Supreme, and yet the Swerga is thine own.

INDRA.

No child of man, Ereenia, in the Bowers Of Bliss may sojourn, till he hath put off His mortal part; for on mortality Time, and Infirnity, and Death attend, Close followers they, and in their mournful train Sorrow, and Pain, and Mutability. Did these find entrance here, we should behold Our joys, like earthly summers, pass away. Those joys perchance may pass; a stronger hand May wrest my sceptre, and unparadise The Swerga; — but, Ereenia, if we fall, Let it be Fate's own arm that casts us down; We will not rashly hasten and provoke The blow, nor bring ourselves the ruin on.

EREENIA.

Fear courts the blow, Fear brings the ruin on. Needs must the chariot-wheels of Destiny Crush him who throws himself before their track, Patient and prostrate.

INDRA.

All may yet be well. Who knows but Veesnnoo will descend and save, Once more incarnate?

EREENIA.

Look not there for help, Nor build on unsubstantial hope thy trust. Our Father Casyapa hath said he turns His doubtful eye to Seeva, even as thou Dost look to him for aid. But thine own strength Should for thine own salvation be put forth; Then might the higher Powers approving see And bless the brave resolve.— Oh that my arm Could wield yon lightnings which play idly there, In inoffensive radiance, round thy head! The Swerga should not need a champion now, Nor Earth implore deliverance still in vain!

INDRA.

Thinkest thou I want the will? rash Son of Heaven, What if my arm be feeble as thine own Against the dread Kehama? He went on Conquering in irresistible career, Till his triumphant car had measured o'er The insufficient earth, and all the Kings Of men received his yoke; then had he won His will, to ride upon their necks elate, And crown his conquests with the sacrifice That should, to men and gods, proclaim him Lord And Sovereign Master of the vassal World, Sole Rajah, the Omnipotent below. The steam of that portentous sacrifice Arose to Heaven. Then was the hour to strike; Then, in the consummation of his pride, His height of glory, then the thunderbolt Should have gone forth, and hurl'd him from his throne Down to the fiery floor of Padalon, To everlasting burnings, agony Eternal, and remorse which knows no end. That hour went by : grown impious in success, By prayer and penances he wrested now Such power from Fate, that soon, if Seeva turn not His eyes on earth, and no Avatar save, Soon will he seize the Swerga for his own, Roll on through Padalon his chariot wheels, Tear up the adamantine bolts which lock The accurs'd Asuras to its burning floor,

And force the drink of Immortality From Yamen's charge. Vain were it now to strive; My thunder cannot pierce the sphere of power

Wherewith, as with a girdle, he is bound.

KAILYAL.

Take me to earth, O gentle Deveta ! Take me again to earth ! This is no place Of rest for me ! — My Father still must bear His Curse, — he shall not bear it all alone; Take me to earth, that I may follow him ! — I do not fear the Almighty Man! the Gods Are feeble here; but there are higher Powers, Who will not turn their eyes from wrongs like ours;

Take me to earth, O gentle Deveta !-

12.

Saying thus, she knelt, and to his knees she clung, And bow'd her head, in tears and silence praying. Rising anon, around his neek she flung

Her arms, and there with folded hands she hung, And fixing on the guardian Glendoveer

Her eyes, more eloquent than Angel's tongue, Again she cried, There is no comfort here! I must he with my Father in his pain. — Take me to earth, O Deveta, again !

Indra with admiration beard the Maid. O Child of Earth, he cried, Already in thy spirit thus divine, Whatever weal or woe betide, Be that high sense of duty still thy guide, And all good Powers will aid a soul like thine. Then turning to Ercenia, thus he said — Take her where Ganges hath its second birth, Below our sphere, and yet above the earth; There may Ladurlad rest beyond the power Of the dread Rajah, till the fated hour.

VIII.

THE SACRIFICE.

Dost thou tremble, O Indra, O God of the sky, Why slumber those thunders of thine? Dost thou tremble on high, -Wilt thou tamely the Swerga resign, -Art thou smitten, O Indra, with dread? Or seest thou not, seest thou not, Monarch divine, How many a day to Seeva's shrine Kehama his victim hath led? Nine and ninety days are fled, Nine and ninety steeds have bled; One more, the rite will be complete --One victim more, and this the dreadful day. Then will the impious Rajah seize thy seat, And wrest the thunder-sceptrc from thy sway. Along the mead the hallow'd Steed Yet bends at liberty his way; At noon his consummating blood will flow. O day of woe! above, below; That blood confirms the Almighty Tyrant's reign ! Thou tremblest, O Indra, O God of the Sky, Thy thunder is vain ; Thou tremblest on high for thy power! But where is Veeshnoo at this hour? But where is Seeva's eve? Is the Destroyer blind? Is the Preserver careless for mankind?

2.

Along the mead the hallow'd Steed Still wanders whereso'er he will, O'er hill, or dale, or plain; No human hand hath trick'd that mane From, which he shakes the morning dew; His mouth has never felt the rein; His lips have never froth'd the chain; For pure of blemish and of stain, His neck unbroke to mortal yoke, Like Nature free the Steed must be, Fit offering for the Immortals he. A year and day the Steed must stray Wherever chance may guide his way, Before he fall at Seeva's shrine : The year and day have pass'd away, Nor touch of man hath marr'd the rite divine And now at noon the Steed must bleed, The perfect rite to-day must force the meed Which Fate reluctant shudders to bestow; Then must the Swerga-God Yield to the Tyrant of the World below; Then must the Devetas obey The Rajah's rod, and groan beneath his hateful sway.

3.

The Sun rides high; the hour is nigh; The multitude, who long Lest aught should mar the rite, In circle wide on every side, Have kept the Steed in sight, Contract their circle now, and drive him on. Drawn in long files before the Temple-court, The Rajah's archers flank an ample space; Here, moving onward still, they drive him near, Then, opening, give him way to enter here.

4.

Behold him ; how he starts and flings his head ! On either side in glittering order spread, The archers ranged in narrowing lines appear ; The multitude behind close up the rear With moon-like bend, and silently await The awful end, The rite that shall from Indra wrest his power.

In front, with far-stretched walls, and many a tower,

Turret, and dome, and pinnacle elate, The huge Pagoda seems to load the land: And there before the gate The Bramin band expectant stand; The axe is ready for Kehama's hand.

5.

Hark ! at the Golden Palaces The Bramin strikes the time ! One, two, three, four, a thrice-told chime, And then again, one, two. The bowl that in its vessel floats, anew Must fill and sink again ; Then will the final stroke be due. The Sun rides high, the noon is nigh, And silently, as if spell-bound, The multitude expect the sound.

6.

Lo! how the Steed, with sudden start, Turns his quick head to every part! Long files of men on every side appear. The sight might well his heart affright; And yet the silence that is here Inspires a stranger fear; For not a murmur, not a sound Of breath or motion rises round; No stir is heard in all that mighty crowd; He neighs, and from the temple-wall The voice reëchoes loud, Loud and distinct, as from a hill Across a lonely vale, when all is still.

VIII.

Within the temple, on his golden throne Reclined, Kehama lies, Watching with steady eyes The perfumed light that, burning bright, Metes out the passing hours. On either hand his eunuchs stand, Freshening with fans of peacock-plumes the air, Which, redolent of all rich gums and flowers, Seems, overcharged with sweets, to stagnate there. Lo! the time-taper's flame, ascending slow, Creeps up its coil toward the fated line; Kehama rises and goes forth, And from the altar, ready where it lies, He takes the axe of sacrifice.

That instant, from the crowd, with sudden shout, A Man sprang out To lay upon the Steed his hand profane. A thousand archers, with unerring eye, At once let fly, And with their hurtling arrows fill the sky. In vain they fall upon him fast as rain; He bears a charmed life, which may defy All weapons, - and the darts that whizz around, As from an adamantine panoply Repell'd, fall idly to the ground. Kehama clasp'd his hands in agony, And saw him grasp the hallow'd courser's mane, Spring up with sudden bound, And with a frantic cry, And madman's gesture, gallop round and round.

9.

They seize, they drag him to the Rajah's feet. What doom will now be his, — what vengeance meet

Will he, who knows no mercy, now require? The obsequious guards around, with blood-hound eye,

Look for the word, in slow-consuming fire, By piecemeal death, to make the wretch expire,

Or hoist his living carcass, hook'd on high, To feed the fowls and insects of the sky; Or if anght worse inventive cruelty

To that remorseless heart of royalty Might prompt, accursed instruments they stand To work the wicked will with wicked hand. Far other thoughts were in the multitude; Pity, and human feelings, held them still;

And stifled sighs and groans suppress'd were there, And many a secret curse and inward prayer Call'd on the insulted Gods to save mankind. Expecting some new crime, in fear they stood, Some horror which would make the natural blood Start, with cold shudderings thrill the sinking heart, Whiten the lip, and make the abhorrent eye

Roll back and close, press'd in for agony.

How then fared he for whom the mighty crowd Suffer'd in spirit thus, — how then fared he? A ghastly smile was on his lip, his eye Glared with a ghastly hope, as he drew nigh, And cried alond, Yes, Rajah! it is I! And wilt thou kill me now? The countenance of the Almighty Man Fell when he knew Ladurlad, and his brow Was clouded with despite, as one ashamed. That wretch again! indignant he exclaim'd, And smote his forchead, and stood silently Awhile in wrath: then, with ferocious smile, And eyes which seem'd to darken his dark cheek, Let him go free! he cried; he hath his Curse, And vengeance upon him can wreak no worse — But ye who did not stop him — tremble ye !

11.

Ile bade the archers pile their weapons there : No manly courage fill'd the slavish band, No sweetening vengeance roused a brave despair. Ile call'd his horsemen then, and gave command To hem the offenders in, and hew them down. Ten thonsand cimeters, at once uprear'd, Flash up, like waters sparkling to the sun; A second time the fatal brands appear'd Lifted aloft,—they glitter'd then no more; Their light was gone, their splendor quench'd in gore.

At noon the massacre begun, And night closed in before the work of death was done.

IX.

THE HOME-SCENE.

1.

The steam of slaughter from that place of blood Spread o'er the tainted sky.

Vultures, for whom the Rajah's tyranny So oft had furnish'd food, from far and nigh Sped to the lure · aloft, with joyful cry,

Wheeling around, they hover'd overhead;

Or, on the temple perch'd with greedy eye, Impatient watch'd the dead.

Far off the Tigers, in the inmost wood,

Heard the death shriek, and snuff d the scent of blood;

They rose, and through the covert went their way, Conch'd at the forest edge, and waited for their prey.

2.

He who had sought for death went wandering on; The hope which had inspired his heart was gone;

Yet a wild joyance still inflamed his face, A smile of vengeance, a triumphant glow.

Where goes he? — Whither should Ladurlad go! Unwittingly the wretch's footsteps trace

Their wonted path toward his dwelling-place; And wandering on, unknowing where,

He starts like one surprised at finding he is there.

3.

Behold his lowly home, By yonder broad-bough'd plane o'ershaded:

There Marriataly's Image stands, And there the garland twined by Kailyal's hands Around its brow hath faded. The peacocks, at their master's sight, Quick from the leafy thatch alight, And hurry round, and search the ground, And veer their glancing necks from side to side, Expecting from his hand Their daily dole which erst the Maid supplied, Now all too long denied.

4.

But, as he gazed around, How strange did all accustom'd sights appear ! How differently did each familiar sound Assail his alter'd ear! Here stood the marriage bower, Rear'd in that happy hour When he, with festal joy and youthful pride, Had brought Yedillian home, his beauteous bride. Leaves not its own, and many a borrow'd flower, Had then bedeek'd it, withering ere the night; But he who look'd from that auspicious day For years of long delight, And would not see the marriage bower decay, There planted and nurs'd up, with daily eare, The sweetest herbs that seent the ambient air, And train'd them round to live and flourish there. Nor when dread Yamen's will Had call'd Yedillian from his arms away, Ceased he to tend the marriage-bower, but still, Sorrowing, had dress'd it like a pious rite Due to the monument of past delight.

He took his wonted seat before the door, -Even as of yore, When he was wont to view, with placid eyes, His daughter at her evening sacrifice. Here were the flowers which she so carefully Did love to rear for Marriataly's brow; Neglected now, Their heavy heads were drooping, over-blown; All else appear'd the same as heretofore, All - save himself alone; How happy then, - and now a wretch for evermore ! 6.

The market-flag, which, hoisted high, From far and nigh, Above yon cocoa grove is seen, Hangs motionless amid the sultry sky. Loud sounds the village drum; a happy crowd Is there; Ladurlad hears their distant voices, But with their joy no more his heart rejoices; And how their old companion now may fare Little they know, and less they eare; The torment he is doom'd to bear Was but to them the wonder of a day, A burden of sad thoughts soon put away.

7.

And yet it seem'd, to his distemper'd ear,

As if they wrong'd him with their merriment Resentfully he turn'd away his eyes, Yet turn'd them but to find Sights that enraged his mind With envious grief more wild and overpowering. The tank which fed his fields was there, and there The large-leaved lotus on the waters flowering There, from the intolerable heat The buffaloes retreat; Only their nostrils raised to meet the air,

Amid the sheltering element they rest. Impatient of the sight, he closed his eyes, And bow'd his burning head, and in despair Calling on Indra, - Thunder-God! he said, Thou owest to me alone this day thy throne ; Be grateful, and in mercy strike me dead.

Despair had roused him to that hopeless prayer; Yet thinking on the heavenly Powers, his mind Drew comfort; and he rose and gather'd flowers, And twined a crown for Marriataly's brow; And taking then her wither'd garland down, Replaced it with the blooming coronal. Not for myself, the unhappy Father cried, Not for myself, O Mighty One! I pray, Accursed as I am beyond thy aid ! But, oh ! be gracious still to that dear Maid Who crown'd thee with these garlands day by day, And danced before thee ave at even-tide In beauty and in pride. O Marriataly, whereso'er she stray Forlorn and wretched, still be thou her guide !

A loud and fiendish laugh replied, Scoffing his prayer. Aloft, as from the air, The sound of insult came : he look'd, and there The visage of dead Arvalan came forth, Only his face amid the clear blue sky, With long-drawn lips of insolent mockery, And eyes whose lurid glare Was like a sulphur fire, Mingling with darkness ere its flames expire.

Ladurlad knew him well : enraged to see The cause of all his misery, He stoop'd and lifted from the ground A stake, whose fatal point was black with blood ; The same wherewith his hand had dealt the wound, When Arvalan, in hour with evil fraught, For violation seized the shrieking Maid. Thus arm'd, in act again to strike he stood, And twice with inefficient wrath essay'd To smite the impassive shade. The lips of seorn their mockery-laugh renew'd, And Arvalan put forth a hand, and eaught The sunbeam, and condensing there its light, Upon Ladurlad turn'd the burning stream. Vain eruelty ! the stake Fell in white ashes from his hold, but he Endured no added pain; his agony Was full, and at the height; They knew not that the wretched man was near; The burning stream of radiance nothing harm'd him;

A fire was in his heart and brain, And from all other flame Kehama's Curse had charm'd him.

Anon the Spirit waved a second hand; Down rush'd the obedient whirlwind from the sky, Scoop'd up the sand like smoke, and from on high Shed the hot shower upon Ladurlad's head. Where'er he turns, the accursed Hand is there; East, West, and North, and South, on every side The land accursed waves in air to guide The dizzying storm; ears, nostrils, eyes, and mouth It fills and chokes, and clogging every pore, Taught him new torments might be yet in store. Where shall he turn to fly? behold his house In flames ! uprooted lies the marriage-bower, The Goddess buried by the sandy shower. Blindly, with staggering step, he reels about,

And still the accursed Hand pursued, And still the lips of scorn their mockery-laugh renew'd.

What, Arvalan ! hast thou so soon forgot The grasp of Pollear ? Wilt thou still defy The righteous Powers of heaven ? or know'st thou not

That there are yet superior Powers on high, Son of the Wicked? — Lo, in rapid flight, Ereenia hastens from the ethereal height; Bright is the sword celestial in his hand; Like lightning in its path athwart the sky, He comes and drives, with angel-arm, the blow. Oft have the Asuras, in the wars of Heaven, Felt that keen sword by arm angelic driven, And fled before it from the fields of light. Thrice through the vulnerable shade The Glendoveer impels the griding blade; The wicked Shade flies howling from his foe. So let that Spirit foul Fly, and, for impotence of anger, howl, Writhing with anguish, and his wounds deplore; Worse punishment hath Arvalan deserved, And righteous Fate hath heavier doom in store.

Not now the Glendoveer pursues his flight; Ile bade the Ship of Heaven alight, And gently there he laid The astonish'd Father by the happy Maid, The Maid now shedding tears of deep delight. Beholding all things with incredulous eyes, Still dizzy with the sand-storm, there he lay, While, sailing up the skies, the living Bark Through air and sunshine held its heavenly way.

Х.

MOUNT MERU.

Ι.

Swirt through the sky the vessel of the Snras Sails up the fields of other like an Angel. Rich is the freight, O Vessel, that thou hearest! Beauty and Virtue, Fatherly cares and filial veneration,

Hearts which are proved and strengthen'd by affliction,

Manly resentment, fortitude, and action, Womanly goodness;

All with which Nature halloweth her daughters, Tenderness, truth, and purity, and meekness, Piety, patience, faith, and resignation, Love and devotement.

Ship of the Gods, how richly art thou laden! Proud of the charge, thou voyagest rejoicing; Clouds float around to honor thee, and Evening Lingers in heaven.

A Stream descends on Meru Mountain; None hath seen its secret fountain; It had its birth, so Sages say, Upon the memorable day When Parvati presumed to lay, In wanton play,

Her hands, too venturous Goddess, in her mirth, On Seeva's eyes, the light and life of Earth. Thereat the heart of the Universe stood still; The Elements ceased their influences; the Hours Stopp'd on the eternal round; Motion, and Breath, Time, Change, and Life, and Death, In sudden trance oppress'd, forgot their powers.

A moment and the dread eclipse was ended; But, at the thought of Nature thus suspended,

The sweat on Seeva's forehead stood, And Ganges thence upon the world descended, The Holy River, the Redceming Flood.

None hath seen its secret fountain; But on the top of Meru Mountain, Which rises o'er the hills of earth, In light and clouds, it hath its mortal birth. Earth seems that pinnacle to rear Sublime above this worldly sphere, Its cradle, and its altar, and its throne ; And there the new-born River lies Outspread heneath its native skies, As if it there would love to dwell Alone and unapproachable. Soon flowing forward, and resign'd To the will of the Creating Mind, It springs at once, with sudden leap, Down from the immeasurable steep. From rock to rock, with shivering force rebounding, The mighty cataract rushes; Heaven around, Like thunder, with the incessant roar resounding,

And Meru's summit shaking with the sound mg. Wide spreads the snowy foam, the sparkling spray Dances aloft; and ever there, at morning, The earliest sunbeams haste to wing their way, With rainbow wreaths the holy stream adorning; And duly the adoring Moon at night Sheds her white glory there, And in the watery air Suspends her halo-crowns of silver light.

A mountain-valley in its blessed breast Receives the stream, which there delights to lie, Untroubled and at rest, Beneath the untainted sky. There, in a lovely lake, it seems to sleep, And thence, through many a channel dark and deep, Their secret way the holy Waters wind, Till, rising underneath the root Of the Tree of Life on Hemakoot, Majestic forth they flow to purify mankind.

5.

Towards this Lake, above the nether sphere, The living Bark, with angel eye, Directs its course along the obedient sky. Kehama hath not yet dominion here; And till the dreaded hour, When Indra by the Rajah shall be driven Dethroned from Heaven, Here may Ladurlad rest beyond his power.

6.

The living Bark alights; the Glendoveer Then lays Ladurlad by the blessed Lake; ---O happy Sire, and yet more happy Daughter ! The ethereal gales his agony aslake, His daughter's tears are on his cheek, His hand is in the water; The innocent man, the man oppress'd, --Oh joy !- hath found a place of rest Beyond Kehama's sway; [away. The Curse extends not here; his pains have past 7.

O happy Sire, and happy Daughter ! Ye on the banks of that celestial water Your resting-place and sanctuary have found. What! hath not then their mortal taint defiled The sacred, solitary ground? Vain thought! the Holy Valley smiled, Receiving such a Sire and Child; Ganges, who seem'd asleep to lie, Beheld them with benignant eye, And rippled round melodiously, And roll'd her little waves, to meet And welcome their beloved feet. The gales of Swerga thither fled, And heavenly odors there were shed About, below, and overhead; And Earth, rejoicing in their tread, Hath built them up a blooming Bower, Where every amaranthine flower Its deathless blossom interweaves With bright and undecaying leaves.

Three happy beings are there here -The Sire, the Maid, the Glendoveer. A fourth approaches, - who is this That enters in the Bower of Bliss? No form so fair might painter find Among the daughters of mankind; For death her beauties hath refined, And unto her a form hath given Framed of the elements of Heaven; Pure dwelling-place for perfect mind. She stood and gazed on Sire and Child; Her tongue not yet had power to speak; The tears were streaming down her cheek ; And when those tears her sight beguiled, And still her faltering accents fail'd, The Spirit, mute and motionless, Spread out her arms for the caress, Made still and silent with excess Of love and painful happiness.

The Maid that lovely form survey'd; Wistful she gazed, and knew her not, But Nature to her heart convey'd A sudden thrill, a startling thought, A feeling many a year forgot, Now like a dream anew recurring, As if again in every vein Her mother's milk was stirring. With straining neck and earnest eye She stretch'd her hands imploringly, As if she fain would have her nigh, Yet fear'd to meet the wish'd embrace, At once with love and awe oppress'd. Not so Ladurlad; he could trace, Though brighten'd with angelic grace, His own Yedillian's earthly face; He ran and held her to his breast¹ Oh joy above all joys of Heaven, By Death alone to others given, This moment hath to him restored The early-lost, the long-deplored.

10.

They sin who tell us Love can die. With life all other passions fly, All others are but vanity. In Heaven Ambition eannot dwell, Nor Avarice in the vaults of Hell; Earthly these passions of the Earth, They perish where they have their birth; But Love is indestructible. Its holy flame forever burneth; From Heaven it came, to Heaven returneth; Too oft on Earth a troubled guest, At times deceived, at times oppress'd, It here is tried and purified, Then hath in Heaven its perfect rest :

It soweth here with toil and care, But the harvest-time of Love is there

Oh! when a Mother meets on high The Babe she lost in infancy, Hath she not then, for pains and fears, The day of woe, the watchful night, For all her sorrow, all her tears, An over-payment of delight?

12.

A blessed family is this, Assembled in the Bower of Bliss! Strange woe, Ladurlad, hath been thine,

And pangs beyond all human measure, And thy reward is now divine, A foretaste of eternal pleasure. He knew indeed there was a day When all these joys would pass away, And he must guit this blest abode, And, taking up again the spell, Groan underneath the baleful load, And wander o'er the world again, Most wretched of the sons of men : Yet was this brief repose, as when A traveller in the Arabian sands, Half fainting on his sultry road, Hath reach'd the water-place at last; And resting there beside the well, Thinks of the perils he has past, And gazes o'er the unbounded plain, The plain which must be traversed still, And drinks, - yet cannot drink his fill, Then girds his patient loins again. So to Ladurlad now was given New strength, and confidence in Heaven, And hope, and faith invincible.

For often would Ereenia tell Of what in elder days befell, When other Tyrants, in their might, Usurp'd dominion o'er the earth; And Veeshnoo took a human birth, Deliverer of the Sons of men, And slew the huge Ermaccasen, And piecemeal rent, with lion force, Errenen's accursed corse, And humbled Baly in his pride; And when the Giant Ravanen Had borne triumphant from his side Sita, the earth-born God's beloved bride, Then from his island-kingdom, laugh'd to scorn The insulted husband, and his power defied ; How, to revenge the wrong, in wrath he hied, Bridging the sea before his dreadful way, And met the hundred-headed foe, And dealt him the unerring blow; By Brama's hand the righteons lance was given, And by that arm immortal driven, It laid the mighty Tyrant low; And Earth, and Ocean, and high Heaven, Rejoiced to see his overthrow. Oh! doubt not thou, Yedillian cried, Such fate Kehama will betide; For there are Gods who look below, ---Seeva, the Avenger, is not blind, Nor Veeshnoo careless for mankind.

14.

Thus was Ladurlad's soul imbued With hope and holy fortitude; And Child and Sire, with pious mind, Alike resolved, alike resign'd, Look'd onward to the evil day: Faith was their comfort, Faith their stay; They trusted Woe would pass away, And Tyranny would sink subdued, And Evil yield to Good. Lovely wert thon, O Flower of Earth ' Above all flowers of mortal birth; But foster'd in this Blissful Bower, From day to day, and hour to honr, Lovelier grew the lovely flower.

O blessed, blessed company ! When men and heavenly spirits greet, And they whom Death had sever'd meet, And hold again communion sweet;— O blessed, blessed company !

The Sun, careering round the sky, Beheld them with rejoicing eye, And bade his willing Charioteer Relax his speed as they drew near; Arounin check'd the rainbow reins, The seven green coursers shook their manes, And brighter rays around them threw; The Car of Glory in their view More radiant, more resplendent grew; And Surya, through his veil of light, Beheld the Bower, and blest the sight.

17.

The Lord of Night, as he sail'd by, Stay'd his pearly boat on high; And while around the Blissful Bower, He bade the softest moonlight flow, Linger'd to see that earthly flower, Forgetful of his Dragon foe, Who, mindful of their ancient feud, With open jaws of rage pursued.

18.

There all good Spirits of the air, Suras and Devetas, repair; Aloft they love to hover there, And view the flower of mortal birth, Here for her innocence and worth, Transplanted from the fields of earth; And him, who, on the dreadful day When Heaven was fill'd with consternation And Indra trembled with dismay, And for the sounds of joy and mirth, Wee was heard and lamentation, Defied the Rajah in his pride, Though all in Heaven and Earth beside Stood mute in dolorous expectation; And, rushing forward in that hour, Saved the Swerga from his power. Grateful for this they hover nigh, And bless that blessed Company.

19.

One God alone, with wanton eye, Beheld them in their Bower; O ye, he cried, who have defied The Rajah, will ye mock my power? 'Twas Camdeo riding on his lory, 'Twas the immortal Youth of Love; If men below and Gods above, Subject alike, quoth he, have felt these darts, Shall ye alone, of all in story,

x.

Boast impenetrable hearts? Hover here, my gentle lory, Gently hover, while I see To whom hath Fate decreed the glory, To the Glendoveer or me.

Then, in the dewy evening sky, The bird of gorgeous plumery Poised his wings, and hover'd nigh. It chanced at that delightful hour Kailyal sat before the Bower, On the green bank with amaranth sweet, Where Ganges warbled at her feet. Ereenia there, before the Maid, His sails of ocean blue display'd; And sportive in her sight Moved slowly o'er the lake with gliding flight; Anon, with sudden stroke and strong, In rapid course careering, swept along; Now shooting downward from his heavenly height, Plunged in the deep below, Then rising, soar'd again, And shook the sparkling waters off like rain, And hovering o'er the silver surface hung. At him young Camdeo bent the bow; With living bees the bow was strung, The fatal bow of sugar-cane, And flowers which would inflame the heart With their petals barb'd the dart.

2I.

The shaft, unerringly address'd, Unerring flew, and smote Ereenia's breast. Ah, Wanton! cried the Glendoveer, Go aim at idler hearts; Thy skill is baffled here ! A deeper love 1 bear that Maid divine. A love that springeth from a higher will, A holier power than thine !

22.

A second shaft, while thus Ereenia cried, Had Camdeo aim'd at Kailyal's side ; But, lo! the Bees which strung his bow Broke off, and took their flight. To that sweet Flower of earth they wing their way, Around her raven tresses play, And buzz about her with delight, As if with that melodious sound They strove to pay their willing duty To mortal purity and beauty.

93

Ah! Wanton! cried the Glendoveer, No power hast thou for mischief here ! Choose thou some idler breast, For these are proof, by nobler thoughts possess'd. Go, to thy plains of Matra go, And string again thy broken bow !

21

Rightly Ereenia spake; and ill had thoughts Of earthly love beseem'd the sanctuary Where Kailyal had been wafted, that the Soul Of her dead Mother there might strengthen her, Feeding her with the milk of heavenly lore, And influxes of Heaven imbue her heart With hope, and faith, and holy fortitude, Against the evil day. Here rest a while In peace, O father ! mark'd for misery Above all sons of men; O daughter! doom'd For sufferings and for trials above all Of women ; - yet both favor'd, both beloved By all good Powers, rest here a while in peace.

X1.

THE ENCHANTRESS.

1.

WHEN from the sword, by arm angelic driven, Foul Arvalan fled howling, wild in pain, Ilis thin, essential spirit, rent and riven With wounds, united soon and heal'd again ; Backward the accursed turn'd his eye in flight, Remindful of revengeful thoughts even then, And saw where, gliding through the evening light, The Ship of Heaven sail'd upward through the sky, Then, like a meteor, vanish'd from his sight. Where should he follow? vainly might he try To trace through trackless air its rapid course ; Nor dared he that angelic arm defy, Still sore and writhing from its dreaded force.

 $\mathbf{2}$.

Should he the lust of vengeance lay aside? Too long had Arvalan in ill been train'd; Nurs'd up in power, and tyranny, and pride, His soul the ignominious thought disdain'd. Or to his mighty Father should he go, Complaining of defeature twice sustain'd, And ask new powers to meet the immortal foe?-Repulse he fear'd not, but he fear'd rebuke, And shamed to tell him of his overthrow. There dwelt a dread Enchantress in a nook Obscure; old helpmate she to him had been, Lending her aid in many a secret sin; And there, for counsel, now his way he took.

3.

She was a woman whose unlovely youth, Even like a canker'd rose which none will cull, Had wither'd on the stalk; her heart was full Of passions which had found no natural scope, Feelings which there had grown, but ripen'd not,

Desires unsatisfied, abortive hope, Repinings which provoked vindictive thought: These restless elements forever wrought,

Fermenting in her with perpetual stir, And thus, her spirit to all evil moved, She hated men because they loved not her, And hated women because they were lov'd. And thus, in wrath, and hatred, and despair, She tempted Hell to tempt her, and resign'd Her body to the Demons of the Air, Wicked and wanton fiends, who where they will Wander abroad, sti^p seeking to do ill.

And take whatever vacant form they find, Carcass of man or beast that life hath left, Foul instrument for them of fouler mind. To these the Witch her wretched body gave, So they would wreak her vengeance on mankind; She thus at once their mistress and their slave; And they, to do such service nothing loath, Obey'd her bidding, slaves and masters both.

So from this cursed intercourse she caught Contagious power of mischief, and was taught Such secrets as are damnable to guess. Is there a child whose little lovely ways Might win all hearts, — on whom his parents gaze Till they shed tears of joy and tenderness? Oh! hide him from that Witch's withering sight! Oh! hide him from the eye of Lorinite! Her look hath crippling in it, and her curse All plagues which on mortality can light; Death is his doom if she behold, — or worse, — Diseases loathsome and incurable, And inward sufferings that no tongue can tell.

5.

Woe was to him on whom that eye of hate Was bent; for, certain as the stroke of Fate, It did its mortal work, nor human arts Could save the unhappy wretch, her chosen prey; For gazing, she consumed his vital parts, Eating his very core of life away. The wine which from yon wounded palm on high Fills yonder gourd, as slowly it distils, Grows sour at once if Lorrinite pass by. The deadliest worm from which all creatures fly, Fled from the deadlier venom of her eye; The babe unborn, within its mother's womb, Started and trembled when the Witch came nigh; And in the silent chambers of the tomb, Death shudder'd her unholy tread to hear, And from the dry and mouldering bones did fear Force a cold sweat, when Lorrinite was near.

Power made her haughty : by ambition fired, Erelong to mightier mischiefs she aspired. The Calis, who o'er eities rule unseen, Each in her own domain a Demon Queen, And there adored with blood and human life, They knew her, and in their accurs'd employ She stirr'd up neighboring states to mortal strife. Sani, the dreadful God, who rides abroad Upon the King of the Ravens, to destroy The offending sons of men, when his four hands Were weary with their toil, would let her do His work of vengeance upon guilty lands; And Lorrinite, at his commandment, knew When the ripe earthquake should be loosed, and where To point its course. And in the baneful air

To point its course. And in the baneful air The pregnant seeds of death he bade her strew, All deadly plagues and pestilence to brew. The Locusts were her army, and their bands, Where'er she turn'd her skinny finger, flew. The floods in ruin roll'd at her commands; And when, in time of drought, the husbandman Beheld the gathered rain about to fall, Her breath would drive it to the desert sands,

While in the marshes' parch'd and gaping soil The rice-roots by the searching Sun were dried, And in lean groups, assembled at the side

Of the empty tank, the cattle dropp'd and died; And Famine, at her bidding, wasted wide The wretched land, till, in the public way, Promiseuous where the dead and dying lay, Dogs fed on human bones in the open light of day.

7.

Her secret cell the accursed Arvalan, In quest of vengeance, sought, and thus began : — Mighty mother ! mother wise ! Revenge me on my enemies.

LORRINITE.

Comest thou, son, for aid to me? Tell me who have injured thee, Where they are, and who they be; Of the Earth, or of the Sea, Or of the aërial company? Earth, nor Sea, nor Air is free From the powers who wait on me, And my tremendous witchery.

ARVALAN.

She for whom so ill 1 sped, Whom my father deemeth dead, Lives, for Marriataly's aid From the water saved the Maid. In hatred I desire her still, And in revenge would have my will. A Deveta with wings of blue, And sword whose edge even now I rue, In a Ship of Heaven on high, Pilots her along the sky. Where they voyage thou canst tell, Mistress of the mighty spell.

8.

At this the Witch, through shrivell'd lips and thin Sent forth a sound half whistle and half hiss. Two winged Hands came in, Armless and bodiless, Bearing a globe of liquid crystal, set In frame as diamond bright, yet black as jet. A thousand eyes were quench'd in endless night To form that magic globe; for Lorrinite Had, from their sockets, drawn the liquid sight, And kneaded it, with re-creating skill, Into this organ of her mighty will. Look in yonder orb, she cried; Tell me what is there descried.

9.

ARVALAN. A mountain top, in clouds of light Enveloped, rises on my sight; Thence a cataract rushes down, Hung with many a rainbow crown; Light and clouds conceal its head; Below, a silver lake is spread;

Upon its shores a Bower I see Fit home for blessed company. See, they come forward, — ono, two, three, — The last a Maiden, — it is she ! The foremost shakes his wings of blue; 'Tis he whose sword even yet I rue; And in that other one I know The visage of my deadliest foe. Mother, let thy magic might Arm me for the mortal fight; Helm, and shield, and mail afford, Proof against his dreaded sword. Then will I invade their seat; Then shall vengeance be complete.

IO. LORRINITE.

Spirits, who obey my will, Hear him, and his wish fulfil!

So spake the mighty Witch, nor further spell Needed; anon a sound, like smother'd thunder, Was heard, slow rolling under; The solid pavement of the cell Quaked, heaved, and cleft asunder, 'And at the feet of Arvalan display'd, Helmet and mail, and shield and cimeter, were laid.

11.

The Asuras, often put to flight And seatter'd in the fields of light By their foes' celestial might, Forged this enchanted armor for the fight. 'Mid fires intense did they anneal, In mountain furnaces, the quivering steel, Till, trembling through each deepening hue, It settled in a midnight blue; Last they cast it, to aslake, In the penal icy lake. Then they consigned it to the Giant brood; And while they forged the impenetrable arms, The Evil Powers, to oversee them, stood, And there imbued The work of Giant strength with magic charms. Foul Arvalan, with joy, survey'd The crescent sabre's cloudy blade, With deeper joy the impervious mail, The shield and helmet of avail. Soon did he himself array, And bade her speed him on his way.

12.

Then she led him to the den, Where her chariot, night and day, Stood harness'd ready for the way. Two Dragons, yoked in adamant, convey The magic car; from either collar sprung An adamantine rib, which met in air, O'erarch'd, and cross'd, and bent, diverging there, And firmly in its are upbore, Upon their brazen neeks, the seat of power. Arvalan mounts the car, and in his hand Receives the magic reins from Lorrinite; The Dragons, long obedient to command, Their ample sails expand; Like steeds well-broken to fair lady's hand They feel the reins of might, And up the northern sky begin their flight.

13.

Son of the Wicked, doth thy soul delight To think its hour of vengeance now is nigh? Lo! where the far-off light Of Indra's palace flashes on his sight, And Meru's heavenly summit shines on high, With clouds of glory bright, Amid the dark-blue sky. Already, in his hope, doth he espy, Himself secure in mail of tenfold charms, Ereenia writhing from the magic blade, The Father sent to bear his Curse, — the Maid Resisting vainly in his impious arms.

14.

Ah, Sinner! whose anticipating soul Incurs the guilt even when the crime is spared! Joyous toward Meru's summit on he fared, While the twin Dragons, rising as he guides, With steady flight, steer northward for the pole. Anon, with irresistible control, Force mightier far than his arrests their course; It wrought as though a Power unseen had caught Their adamantine yokes to drag them on. Straight on they bend their way, and now, in vain, Upward doth Arvalan direct the rein; The rein of magic might avails no more;

Bootless its strength against that unseen Power, That, in their mid career,

Hath seized the Chariot and the Charioteer. With hands resisting, and down-pressing feet Upon their hold insisting,

He struggles to maintain his difficult seat. Seeking in vain with that strange Power to vie, Their doubled speed the affrighted Dragons try. Forced in a stream from whence was no retreat, Strong as they are, behold them whirled along, Headlong, with useless pennons, through the sky.

15.

What Power was that, which, with resistless might, Foil'd the dread magic thus of Lorrinite? 'Twas all commanding Nature. — They were here Within the sphere of the adamantine rocks Which gird Mount Mern ronnd, as far below That heavenly height where Ganges hath its birth Involv'd in clouds and light, So far above its roots of ice and snow.

16.

On — on they roll, — rapt headlong they roll on , — The lost canoe, less rapidly than this, Down the precipitous stream is whirl'd along

To the brink of Niagara's dread abyss.

On—on they roll, and now, with shivering shock, Are dash'd against the rock that girds the Pole. Down from his shatter'd mail the unhappy Soul Is dropp'd,—ten thousand thousand fathoms down,—

Till in an ice-rift, 'mid the eternal snow,

Foul Arvalan is stopp'd. There let him howl, Groan there, — and there, with unavailing moan, For aid on his Almighty Father call.

17.

All human sounds are lost Amid those deserts of perpetual frost, Old Winter's drear domain, Beyond the limits of the living World, Beyond Kehama's reign. Of utterance and of motion soon bereft, Frozen to the ice-rock, there behold him lie, Only the painful sense of Being left, A Spirit who must feel, and cannot die, Bleaching and bare beneath the polar sky.

XII.

THE SACRIFICE COMPLETED.

1.

O YE who, by the Lake On Meru Mount, partake The joys which Heaven hath destin'd for the blest, Swift, swift the moments fly, The silent hours go by, And ye must leave your dear abode of rest. O wretched Man, prepare Again thy Curse to bear! Prepare, O wretched Maid, for further woe ! The fatal hour draws near, When Indra's heavenly sphere Must own the Tyrant of the World below. To-day the hundredth Steed At Seeva's shrine must bleed; The dreadful sacrifice is full to-day ; Nor man nor God hath power, At this momentous hour, Again to save the Swerga from his sway. Fresh woes, O Maid divine, Fresh trials must be thine : And what must thou, Ladurlad, yet endure ! But let your hearts be strong, And rise against all wrong, For Providence is just, and virtue is secure.

They, little deeming that the fatal day Was come, beheld, where through the morning sky A Ship of Heaven drew nigh. Onward they watch it steer its steady flight; Till, wondering, they espy Old Casyapa, the Sire of Gods, alight. But when Ereenia saw the Sire appear, At that unwonted and unwelcome sight His heart received a sudden shock of fear. Thy presence doth its doleful tidings tell, O Father! cried the startled Glendoveer! The dreadful hour is near! I know it well ! Not for less import would the Sire of Gods Forsake his ancient and august abodes. 3.

Even so, serene the immortal Sire replies; Soon like an earthquake will ye feel the blow Which consummates the mighty sacrifice : And this World, and its Heaven, and all therein, Are then Kehama's. To the second ring Of these seven Spheres, the Swerga King, Even now, prepares for flight, Beyond the circle of the conquer'd world, Beyond the Rajah's might. Ocean, that clips this inmost of the Spheres, And girds it round with everlasting roar, Set like a gem appears Within that bending shore. Thither fly all the Sons of heavenly race : I, too, forsake mine ancient dwelling-place. And now, O Child and Father, ye must go . Take up the burden of your woe, And wander once again below. With patient heart hold onward to the end : Be true unto yourselves, and bear in mind

Be true unto yourselves, and bear in mind That every God is still the good Man's friend; And when the Wicked have their day assign'd, Then they who suffer bravely save mankind.

Oh, tell me, cried Erecnia, — for from thee Nought can be hidden, — when the end will be.

Seek not to know, old Casyapa replied, What pleaseth Heaven to hide. Dark is the abyss of Time, But light enough to guide your steps is given; Whatever weal or woe betide, Turn never from the way of truth aside, And leave the event, in holy hope, to Heaven The moment is at hand; no more delay; Ascend the ethereal bark, and go your way; And Ye, of heavenly nature, follow me.

The will of Heaven be done, Ladurlad cried; Nor more the man replied, But placed his daughter in the ethereal bark,

Then took his seat beside. There was no word at parting, no adieu. Down from that empyreal height they flew: One groan Ladurlad breathed, yet utter'd not,

When, to his heart and brain, The fiery Curse again like lightning shot. And now on earth the Sire and Child alight; Up soar'd the Ship of Heaven, and sail'd away from sight.

O ye immortal Bowers, Where hitherto the Hours Have led their dance of happiness for aye, With what a sense of woe Do ye expect the blow, And see your heavenly dwellers driven away ! Lo ! where the aunnay-birds of graceful mien, Whose milk-white forms were seen, Lovely as Nymphs, your ancient trees between.

XIII.

And by your silent springs, With melancholy cry, Now spread unwilling wings; Their stately necks reluctant they protend, And through the sullen sky, To other worlds, their mournful progress bend.

The affrighted gales to-day O'er their beloved streams no longer play ; The streams of Paradise have ceased to flow; The Fountain-Tree withholds its diamond-shower In this portentous hour, -

This dolorous honr, - this universal woe. Where is the Palace, whose far-flashing beams, With streaks and streams of ever-varying light, Brighten'd the polar night

Around the frozen North's extremest shore? Gone like a morning rainbow, - like a dream, -A star that shoots and falls, and then is seen no more.

Now! now! - Before the Golden Palaces. The Bramin strikes the inevitable hour. The fatal blow is given, That over Earth and Heaven Confirms the Almighty Rajah in his power. All evil Spirits then, That roam the World about, Or wander through the sky, Set up a joyful shont. The Asnras and the Giants join the cry; The damn'd in Padalon acclaim Their hoped Deliverer's name; Heaven trembles with the thunder-drowning sound ; Back starts affrighted Ocean from the shore, And the adamantine vanlts and brazen floor Of Hell are shaken with the roar. Up rose the Rajah through the conquer'd sky, To seize the Swerga for his proud abode; Myriads of evil Genii round him fly,

As royally on wings of winds he rode, And scaled high Heaven, triumphant like a God.

XIII.

THE RETREAT.

а.

AROUND her Father's neck the Maiden lock'd Her arms, when that portentous blow was given; Clinging to him she heard the dread nproar, And felt the shuddering shock which ran through Heaven:

Earth underneath them rock'd, Her strong foundations heaving in commotion, Such as wild winds upraise in raving Ocean, As though the solid base were rent asunder. And lo! where, storming the astonish'd sky, Kehama and his evil host ascend ! Before them rolls the thunder;

Ten thousand thousand lightnings round them fly; Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height;

Upward the lengthening pageantries aspire, Leaving from Earth to Heaven a widening wake of fire.

When the wild nproar was at length allay'd, And Earth, recovering from the shock, was still, Thus to her Father spake the imploring Maid : -Oh! by the love which we so long have borne Each other, and we ne'er shall cease to bear, -Oh! by the sufferings we have shared, And must not cease to share,-One boon I supplicate in this dread honr, One consolation in this hour of woc! Father, thon hast it in thy power; Thon wilt not, Father, sure refuse me now The only comfort my poor heart can know.

O dearest, dearest Kailyal! with a smile Of tenderness and anguish, he replied, O best beloved, and to be loved the best, Best worthy, --- set thy duteous heart at rest. I know thy wish, and let what will betide, Ne'er will I leave thee wilfully again. My soul is strengthen'd to endure its pain; Be thon, in all my wanderings, still my guide; Be thou, in all my sufferings, at my side.

4.

The Maiden, at those welcome words, impress'd A passionate kiss upon her Father's cheek : They look'd around them then, as if to seek

Where they should turn, North, Sonth, or East, or West,

Wherever to their vagrant feet seem'd best. But, turning from the view her mournful eyes, Oh, whither should we wander? Kailyal cries, Or wherefore seek in vain a place of rest?

Have we not here the Earth beneath our tread, Heaven overhead,

A brook that winds through this sequester'd glade, And yonder woods, to yield us fruit and shade?

The little all our wants require is nigh; Hope we have none; - why travel on in fear? We cannot fly from Fate, and Fate will find us here.

'Twas a fair scene wherein they stood, A green and sunny glade amid the wood, And in the midst an aged Bannian grew. It was a goodly sight to see That venerable tree, For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread, Fifty straight columns propp'd its lofty head; And many a long, depending shoot, Seeking to strike its root,

Straight like a plummet, grew towards the ground. Some on the lower boughs which cross'd their way, Fixing their bearded fibres, round and round, With many a ring and wild contortion wound ; Some to the passing wind, at times, with sway Of gentle motion swung;

Others, of younger growth, nnmoved, were hung

Beneath was smooth and fair to sight, Nor weeds nor briers deform'd the natural floor, And through the leafy cope which bower'd it o'er Came gleams of cheeker'd light.

So like a temple did it seem, that there A pious heart's first impulse would be prayer.

6.

A brook, with easy current, murmur'd near; Water so cool and clear The peasants drink not from the humble well, Which they, with sacrifice of rural pride, Have wedded to the cocoa-grove beside; Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense To those in towns who dwell, The work of Kings, in their beneficence. Fed by perpetual springs, a small lagoon, Pellucid, deep, and still, in silence join'd, And swell'd the passing stream. Like burnish'd steel

Glowing, it lay beneath the eye of noon; And when the breezes, in their play, Ruffled the darkening surface, then, with gleam Of sudden light, around the lotus stem It rippled, and the sacred flowers, that crown The lakelet with their roseate beauty, ride, In casy waving rock'd, from side to side ; And as the wind upheaves

Their broad and buoyant weight, the glossy leaves Flap on the twinkling waters, up and down.

7.

They built them here a bower, of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use; and light and long Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain; Lithe creepers, then, the wicker sides supply, And the tall jungle-grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky. And here did Kailyal, each returning day, Pour forth libations from the brook to pay The Spirits of her Sires their grateful rite; In such libations pour'd in open glades, Beside clear streams and solitary shades, The Spirits of the virtuous dead delight. And duly here, to Marriataly's praise, The Maid, as with an angel's voice of song, Pour'd her melodious lays Upon the gales of even, And gliding in religious dance along, Moved graceful as the dark-eyed Nymphs of Heaven;

Such harmony to all her steps was given.

Thus ever, in her Father's doting eye, Kailyal perform'd the customary rite ; He, patient of his burning pain the while, Beheld her, and approved her pious toil; And sometimes, at the sight, A melancholy smile Would gleam upon his awful countenance. He, too, by day and night, and every hour, Paid to a higher Power his sacrifice; An offering, not of ghee, or fruit, and rice, Flower-crown, or blood; but of a heart subdued,

A resolute, unconquer'd fortitude, An agony repress'd, a will resign'd, To her, who, on her secret throne reclin'd, Amid the Sea of Milk, by Veeshnoo's side, Looks with an eye of mercy on mankind. By the Preserver, with his power endued, There Voomdavee beholds this lower clime, And marks the silent sufferings of the good, To recompense them in her own good time.

O force of faith ! O strength of virtuous will ! Behold him in his endless martyrdom, Triumphant still ! The Curse still burning in his heart and brain ;

And yet doth he remain Patient the while, and tranguil, and content! The pious soul hath framed unto itself

A second nature, to exist in pain As in its own allotted element.

10

Such strength the will reveal'd had given This holy pair, such influxes of grace, That to their solitary resting-place They brought the peace of Heaven. Yea, all around was hallow'd! Danger, Fear, Nor thought of evil ever enter'd here. A charm was on the Leopard when he came Within the circle of that mystic glade; Submiss he crouch'd before the heavenly Maid, And offer'd to her touch his speckled side; Or, with arch'd back erect, and bending head, And eyes half-closed for pleasure, would he stand, Courting the pressure of her gentle hand.

11.

Trampling his path through wood and brake, And canes which crackling fall before his way, And tassel-grass, whose silvery feathers play, O'ertopping the young trees, On comes the Elephant, to slake His thirst at noon in yon pellucid springs. Lo! from his trunk upturn'd, aloft he flings The grateful shower; and now Plucking the broad-leaved bough Of yonder plane, with wavy motion slow, Fanning the languid air, He moves it to and fro. But when that form of beauty meets his sight, The trunk its undulating motion stops, From his forgetful hold the plane-branch drops, Reverent he kneels, and lifts his rational eyes

To her as if in prayer; And when she pours her angel voice in song, Intranced he listens to the thrilling notes,

Till his strong temples, bathed with sudden dews, Their fragrance of delight and love diffuse.

12.

Lo! as the voice melodious floats around, The Antelope draws near,

The Tigress leaves her toothless cubs to hear; The Snake comes gliding from the secret brake, Himself in fascination forced along

By that enchanting song;

The antic Monkeys, whose wild gambols late, When not a breeze waved the tall jungle-grass, Shook the whole wood, are hush'd, and silently Hang on the cluster'd tree.

All things in wonder and delight are still; Only at times the Nightingale is heard, Not that in emulous skill that sweetest bird Her rival strain would try. A mighty songster, with the Maid to vie; She only bore her part in powerful sympathy.

Well might they thus adore that heavenly Maid ! For never Nymph of Mountain, Or Grove, or Lake, or Fountain, With a diviner presence fill'd the shade. No idle ornaments deface Her natural grace, Musk-spot, nor sandal-streak, nor scarlet stain, Ear-drop nor chain, nor arm nor ankle-ring, Nor trinketry on front, or neck, or breast, Marring the perfect form : she seem'd a thing Of Heaven's prime uncorrupted work, a child Of early nature undefiled, A daughter of the years of innocence. And therefore all things loved her. When she stood Beside the glassy pool, the fish, that flies Quick as an arrow from all other eyes, Hover'd to gaze on her. The mother bird,

When Kailyal's step she heard, Sought not to tempt her from her secret nest, But, hastening to the dear retreat, would fly To meet and welcome her benignant eye.

Hope we have none, said Kailyal to her Sire. Said she aright? and had the mortal Maid No thoughts of heavenly aid, ---No secret hopes her inmost heart to move With longings of such deep and pure desire, As Vestal Maids, whose piety is love, Feel in their ecstasies, when, rapp'd above, Their souls unto their heavenly Spouse aspire? Why else so often doth that searching eye Roam through the scope of sky? Why, if she sees a distant speck on high, Starts there that quick suffusion to her cheek? 'Tis but the Eagle in his heavenly height; Reluctant to believe, she hears his cry, And marks his wheeling flight, Then pensively averts her mournful sight. Why ever else, at morn, that waking sigh, Because the lovely form no more is nigh Which hath been present to her soul all night; And that injurious fear

Which ever, as it riseth, is repress'd, Yet riseth still within her troubled breast, That she no more shall see the Glendoveer !

Hath he forgotten me? The wrongful thought Would stir within her, and, though still repell'd With shame and self-reproaches, would recur. 75

Days after days unvarying come and go, And neither friend nor foe Approaches them in their sequester'd bower. Maid of strange destiny ! but think not thou Thou art forgotten now, And hast no cause for further hope or fear; High-fated Maid, thou dost not know What eyes watch over thee for weal and woe ! Even at this hour, Searching the dark decrees divine. Kehama, in the fulness of his power, Perceives his thread of fate entwine with thine. The Glendoveer, from his far sphere, With love that never sleeps, beholds thee here, And in the hour permitted will be near. Dark Lorrinite on thee hath fixed her sight,

And laid her wiles, to aid Foul Arvalan when he shall next appear; For well she ween'd his Spirit would renew Old vengeance now, with unremitting hate; The Enchantress well that evil nature knew;

The accursed Spirit hath his prey in view; And thus, while all their separate hopes pursue, All work, unconsciously, the will of Fate.

16.

Fate work'd its own the while. A band Of Yoguees, as they roam'd the land, Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut, their God, Stray'd to this solitary glade, And reach'd the bower wherein the Maid abode Wondering at form so fair, they deem'd the Power Divine had led them to his chosen bride,

And seized and bore her from her Father's side.

XIV.

JAGA-NAUT.

1.

Joy in the City of great Jaga-Nant! Joy in the seven-headed Idol's shrine ! A Virgin-bride his ministers have brought, A mortal Maid, in form and face divine, Peerless among all daughters of mankind; Search'd they the world again from East to West, In endless quest, Seeking the fairest and the best. No maid so lovely might they hope to find ;-For she hath breathed celestial air, And heavenly food hath been her fare. And heavenly thoughts and feelings give her face That heavenly grace. Joy in the City of great Jaga-Naut, Joy in the seven-headed Idol's shrine !

The fairest Maid his Yoguees sought;

A fairer than the fairest have they brought, A Maid of charms surpassing human thought,

A Maid divine.

Now bring ye forth the Chariot of the God ' Bring him abroad,

That through the swarming City he may ride; And by his side Place ye the Maid of more than mortal grace, The Maid of perfect form and heavenly face; Set her aloft in triumph, like a bride Upon the Bridal Car, And spread the joyful tidings wide and far, — Spread it with trump and voice, That all may hear, and all who hear rejoice, — Great Jaga-Naut hath found his mate ! the God Will ride abroad ! To-night will he go forth from his abode ! Ye myriads who adore him, Prepare the way before him !

Uprear'd on twenty wheels clate, Huge as a Ship, the Bridal Car appear'd; Loud creak its ponderous wheels, as through the gate A thousand Bramins drag the enormous load. There throned aloft in state, The Image of the seven-headed God Came forth from his abode; and at his side Sat Kailyal like a bride.

A bridal statue rather might she seem, For she regarded all things like a dream, Having no thought, nor fear, nor will, nor aught Save hope and faith, that lived within her still.

4. O silent Night, how have they startled thee With the brazen trnmpet's blare ! And thou, O Moon ! whose quiet light serene Filleth wide heaven, and bathing hill and wood, Spreads o'er the peaceful valley like a flood, How have they dimm'd thee with the torches' glare, Which round you moving pageant flame and flare, As the wild rout, with deafening song and shout, Fling their long flashes out, That, like infernal lightnings, fire the air. 5. A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main, To drag that sacred wain, And scarce can draw along the enormous load. Prone fall the frantic votaries in its road, And calling on the God, Their self-devoted bodies there they lay To pave his chariot-way. On Jaga-Naut they call;

The ponderous Car rolls on, and crushes all. Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path. Groans rise unheard; the dying cry, And death and agony Are trodden under foot by yon mad throng, Who follow close, and thrms the deadly wheels along.

Pale grows the Maid at this accursed sight; The yells which round her rise Have roused her with affright,

And fear hath given to her dilated eyes A wilder light. Where shall those eyes be turn'd? she knows not where ! Downward they dare not look, for there Is deatn, and horror, and despair; Nor can her patient looks to Heaven repair, For the huge Idol over her, in air, Spreads his seven hideous heads, and wide Extends their snaky necks on every side ; And all around, behind, before The Bridal Car, is the raging rout, With frantic shout and deafening roar, Tossing the torches' flames about. And the double double peals of the drum are there, And the startling burst of the trumpet's blare ;

And the gong, that seems, with its thunders dread, To astound the living, and waken the dead. The ear-strings throb as if they were rent, And the eyelids drop as stunned and spent. Fain would the Maid have kept them fast; But open they start at the crack of the blast.

Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia : where, In this dread hour of horror and despair ?
Thinking on him, she strove her fear to quell — If he be near me, then will all be well; And, if he reek not for my misery, Let come the worst; it matters not to me. Repel that wrongful thought, O Maid ! thou feelest, but believ'st it not; It is thine own imperfect nature's fault That lets one doubt of him arise within ; And this the Virgin knew ; and like a sin Repell'd the thought, and still believed him true, And summon'd up her spirit to endure All forms of fear, in that firm trust secure.

She needs that faith, she needs that consolation, For now the Car hath measured back its track Of death, and hath reëntered now its station. There, in the Temple-court, with song and dance, A harlot-band, to meet the Maid, advance. The drum hath ceas'd its peals ; the trump and gong Are still ; the frantic crowd forbcar their yells ; And sweet it was to hear the voice of song, And the sweet music of their girdle-bells, Armlets and anklets, that, with cheerful sonnd, Symphonious tukled as they wheel'd around.

9.

They sung a bridal measure, A song of pleasure, A hymn of joyance and of gratulation. Go, chosen One, they cried, Go, happy bride ! For thee the God descends in expectation ! For thy dear sake He leaves his Heaven, O Maid of matchless charms !

Go, happy One, the bed divine partake, And fill his longing arms! Thus to the inner fane,

With circling dance and hymeneal strain,

The astonish'd Maid they led,

And there they laid her on the bridal bed. Then forth they go, and close the Temple-gate, And leave the wretched Kailyal to her fate.

10.

Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia, where? From the loathed bed she starts, and in the air Looks up, as if she thought to find him there ; Then, in despair, Anguish, and agony, and hopeless prayer, Prostrate she laid herself upon the floor. There trembling as she lay, The Bramin of the fane advanced, And came to seize his prey. But as the abominable Priest drew nigh, A power invisible opposed his way; Starting, he utter'd wildly a death-ery, And fell. At that the Maid all eagerly Lifted in hope her head; She thought her own deliverer had been near ; When lo ! with other life reanimate, She saw the dead arise, And in the fiendish joy within his eyes, She knew the hateful Spirit who look'd through Their specular orbs, - clothed in the flesh of man,

She knew the accursed soul of Arvalan.

Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia, where ? But not in vain, with sudden shriek of fear, She calls Ereenia now; the Glendoveer Is here! Upon the guilty sight he burst Like lightning from a cloud, and caught the accurs'd, Bore him to the roof aloft, and on the floor With vengeance dash'd him, quivering there in gore. Lo! from the pregnant air - heart-withering sight -There issued forth the dreadful Lorrinite. Seize him! the Enchantress cried; A host of Demons at her word appear, And, like tornado winds, from every side At once they ---- h upon the Glendoveer. Alone against a legion, little here Avails his single might, Nor that celestial falchion, which in fight So oft had put the rebel race to flight. There are no Gods on earth to give him aid; Hemm'd round, he is overpower'd, beat down, and bound.

And at the feet of Lorrinite is laid.

Meantime the seatter'd members of the slain, Obedient to her mighty voice, assumed Their vital form again, And that foul Spirit, upon vengeance bent, Fled to the fleshly tenement.

Lo! here, quoth Lorrinite, thou seest thy foe! Him in the Ancient Sepulchres, below The billows of the Ocean, will I lay;

Gods are there none to help him now, and there For Man there is no way.

To that dread scene of durance and despair,

Asuras, bear your enemy! I go To chain him in the Tombs. Meantime do thou, Freed from thy foe, and now secure from fear, Son of Kehama, take thy pleasure here.

13.

Her words the accursed race obey'd; Forth with a sound like rushing winds they fled ; And of all aid from Earth or Heaven bereft, Alone with Arvalan the Maid was left. But in that hour of agony, the Maid Deserted not herself; her very dread Had calm'd her; and her heart Knew the whole horror, and its only part. Yamen, receive me undefiled ! she said, And seized a toreh, and fired the bridal bed. Up ran the rapid flames; on every side They find their fuel wheresoe'er they spread; Thin hangings, fragrant gums, and odorous wood, That piled like sacrificial altars stood. Around they run, and upward they aspire, And, lo! the huge Pagoda lined with fire.

14.

The wicked Sonl, who had assumed again A form of sensible flesh for his fonl will, Still bent on base revenge, and baffled still, Felt that corporeal shape alike to pain Obnoxious as to pleasure : forth he flew, Howling and scorch'd by the devouring flame; Accursed Spirit! Still condemn'd to rue, The act of sin and punishment the same. Freed from his loathsome tonch, a natural dread Came on the self-devoted, and she drew Back from the flames, which now toward her spread, And, like a living monster, seem'd to dart

Their hungry tongues toward their shrinking prey. Soon she subdued her heart;

" O Father ! " she exclaim'd, " there was no way But this ! And thon, Ereenia, who for me Sufferest, my soul shall bear thee company."

15.

So having said, she knit Her body up to work her soul's desire, And rush at once among the thickest fire. A sudden cry withheld her, — "Kailyal, stay! Child! daughter! I am here!" the voice exclaims, And from the gate, unharm'd, through smoke and flames,

Like as a God, Ladurlad made his way; Wrapp'd his preserving arms around, and bore His Child, uninjured, o'er the burning floor.

THE CITY OF BALY.

1. RAILYAL. Ereenia !

LADURLAD.

Nay, let no reproachful thought Wrong his heroic heart! The Evil Powers

xv.

Have the dominion o'er this wretched World, And no good Spirit now can venture here

KAILYAL.

Alas, my Father! he hath ventured here, And saved me from one horror. But the Powers Of Evil beat him down, and bore away To some dread scene of durance and despair;

The Ancient Tombs, methonght their mistress said,

Beneath the ocean waves; no way for Man Is there; and Gods, she boasted, there are none On Earth to help him now.

LANURLAD.

Is that her boast?

And hath she laid him in the Ancient Tombs, Relying that the Waves will guard him there? Short-sighted are the eyes of Wickedness, And all its craft hut folly. Oh my child! The Curses of the Wicked are upon me, And the immortal Deities, who see And suffer all things for their own wise end, Have made them blessings to us!

KAILYAL.

Then thou knowest Where they have borne him?

LADURLAD.

To the Sepulchres Of the Ancient Kings, which Baly, in his power, Made in primeval times; and built above them A City, like the Cities of the Gods, Being like a God himself. For many an age Hath Ocean warr'd against his Palaces, Till, overwheln'd, they lie beneath the waves, Not overthrown, so well the awful Chief Had laid their deep fonndations. Rightly said The Accursed, that no way for man was there ; But not like man am I !

2.

Up from the ground the Maid exultant sprung, And clapp'd her happy hands in attitude Of thanks to Heaven, and flung Her arms around her Father's neck, and stood Struggling awhile for utterance, with excess Of hope and pious thankfulness. Come — come ! she cried. Oh let us not delay, — He is in torments there, — away ! — away !

3.

Long time they travell'd on; at dawn of day Still setting forward with the earliest light, Nor ceasing from their way Till darkness closed the night. Short refuge from the noontide heat, Reluctantly compell'd, the Maiden took, And ill her indefatigable feet Could that brief respite brook. Hope kept her up, and her intense desire Supports that heart which ne'er at danger quails, Those feet which never tire, That frame which never fails. 4.

Their talk was of the City of the days Of old, Earth's wonder once, and of the fame Of Baly, its great founder, — he whose name, In ancient story and in poet's praise, Liveth and flourisheth for endless glory,

Because his might

Put down the wrong, and aye upheld the right. Till for ambition, as old sages tell, At length the universal Monarch fell: For he too, having made the World his own,

Then in his pride, had driven The Devetas from Heaven, And seized triumphantly the Swerga throne. The Incarnate came before the Mighty One, In dwarfish stature, and in mien obscure; The sacred cord he bore, And ask'd, for Brama's sake, a little boon, Three steps of Baly's ample reign, no more. Poor was the boon required, and poor was he Who begg'd, — a little wretch it seem'd to be;

But Baly ne'er refused a suppliant's prayer. He on the Dwarf cast down A glance of pity in contemptuous mood, And bade him take the boon,

And measure where he would.

5.

Lo, Son of giant birth, I take my grant! the Incarnate Power replies. With his first step he measured o'er the Earth; The second spann'd the skies. Three paces thou hast granted; Twice have I set my footstep, Veeshnoo cries, Where shall the third be planted?

6.

Then Baly knew the God, and at his feet, In homage due, he laid his humbled head. Mighty art thou, O Lord of Earth and Heaven, Mighty art thou! he said ; Be merciful, and let me be forgiven. He ask'd for mercy of the Merciful, And mercy for his virtue's sake was shown. For though he was cast down to Padalon, Yet there, by Yamen's throne, Doth Baly sit in majesty and might, To judge the dead, and sentence them aright. And forasmuch as he was still the friend Of righteousness, it is permitted him, Yearly, from those drear regions to ascend And walk the Earth, that he may hear his name Still hymn'd and honor'd by the grateful voice Of human-kind, and in his fame rejoice.

Such was the talk they held upon their way, Of him to whose old City they were bound;

And now, upon their journey, many a day Had risen and closed, and many a week gone round,

And many a realm and region had they pass'd, When now the Ancient Towers appear'd at last.

ð96

Their golden summits, in the noon-day light, Shone o'er the dark-green deep that roll'd between ; For domes, and pinnacles, and spires were seen Peering above the sea - a mournful sight! Well might the sad beholder ween from thence What works of wonder the devouring wave Had swallow'd there, when monuments so brave Bore record of their old magnificence. And on the sandy shore, beside the verge Of Ocean, here and there, a rock-hewn fane Resisted in its strength the surf and surge That on their deep foundations heat in vain. In solitude the Ancient Temples stood, Once resonant with instrument and song, And solemn dance of festive multitude; Now, as the weary ages pass along, Hearing no voice save of the Ocean flood, Which roars forever on the restless shores; Or visiting their solitary caves, The lonely sound of winds, that moan around Accordant to the melancholy waves.

9.

With reverence did the travellers see The works of ancient days, and silently Approach the shore. Now on the yellow sand, Where round their feet the rising surges part, They stand. Ladurlad's heart Exulted in his wondrous destiny. To Heaven he raised his hand In attitude of stern, heroic pride; Oh what a Power, he cried, Thou dreadful Rajah, doth thy curse impart! I thank thee now ! - Then turning to the Maid, Thou seest how far and wide Yon Towers extend, he said ; My search must needs be long. Meantime the flood Will cast thee up thy food, -And in the Chambers of the Rock, by night, Take thou thy safe abode. No prowling beast to harm thee, or affright, Can enter there; but wrap thyself with care From the foul Birds obscene that thirst for blood; For in such caverns doth the Bat delight

To have its haunts. Do thou, with stone and shout,

Ere thou liest down at evening, seare them out, And in this robe of mine involve thy feet. Duly commend us both to Heaven in prayer; Be of good heart, and may thy sleep be sweet!

10.

So saying, he put back his arm, and gave The cloth which girt his loins, and press'd her hand

With fervent love, then from the sand Advanced into the sea; the coming Wave Which knew Kehama's curse, before his way Started, and on he went as on dry land; And still around his path the waters parted. She stands upon the shore, where sea-weeds play, Lashing her polisi'd ankles, and the spray Which off her Father, like a rambow, fled, Falls on her like a shower; there Kailyal stands, And sees the billows rise above his head.
She, at the startling sight, forgot the power
The Curse had given him, and held forth her hands Imploringly, — her voice was on the wind, And the deaf Ocean o'er Ladurlad closed.
Soon she recall'd his destiny to mind, And, shaking off that natural fear, composed Iler soul with prayer, to wait the event resign'd 11.

Alone, upon the solitary strand, The lovely one is left; behold her go, Pacing with patient footsteps, to and fro, Along the bending sand. Save her, ye Gods ! from Evil Powers, and here From man she need not fear : For never Traveller comes near These awful ruins of the days of yore, Nor fisher's bark, nor venturous mariner, Approach the sacred shore. All day she walk'd the beach; at night she sought The chamber of the Rock; with stone and shout Assail'd the Bats obseene, and scared them out; Then in her Father's robe involved her feet, And wrapp'd her mantle round to guard her head, And laid her down: the rock was Kailyal's bed;

Her chamber-lamps were in the starry sky; The winds and waters were her lullaby.

Be of good heart, and may thy sleep be sweet, Ladurlad said. — Alas! that cannot be To one whose days are days of misery. How often did she stretch her hands to greet Ercenia, rescued in the dreams of night! How oft, amid the vision of delight, Fear in her heart all is not as it scems! Then from unsettled slumber start, and hear The Winds that moan above, the Waves below! Thou hast been call'd, O Sleep! the friend of Woe;

But 'tis the happy who have call'd thee so.

Another day, another night are gone; A second passes, and a third wanes on. So long she paced the shore, So often on the beach she took her stand, That the wild Sea-Birds knew her, and no more Fled, when she past beside them on the strand. Bright shine the golden summits in the light

Of the noon-sun, and lovelier far by night Their moonlight glories o'er the sea they shed : Fair is the dark-green deep : by night and day, Unvex'd with storms, the peaceful billows play, As when they closed upon Ladurlad's head;

The firmament above is bright and clear; The sea-fowl, lords of water, air, and land, Joyous alike upon the wing appear,

Or when they ride the waves, or walk the sand ; Beauty, and light, and joy are every where;

There is no sadness and no sorrow here, Save what that single human breast contains; But oh! what hopes, and fears, and pains are there '

14. Seven miserable days the expectant Maid, From earliest dawn till evening, watch'd the shore ; Hope left her then ; and in her heart she said, Never should she behold her Father more.

THE ANCIENT SEPULCHRES

WHEN the broad Ocean on Ladurlad's head Had elosed and arch'd him o'er, With steady tread he held his way Adown the sloping shore. The dark-green waves with emerald hue Imbue the beams of day. And on the wrinkled sand below, Rolling their mazy network to and fro, Light shadows shift and play. The hungry Shark, at scent of prey, Toward Ladurlad darted ; Beholding then that human form erect, How like a God the depths he trod. Appall'd the monster started, And in his fear departed. Onward Ladurlad went with heart elate, And now hath reach'd the Aneient City's gate.

2.

Wondering he stood awhile to gaze Upon the works of elder days. The brazen portals open stood, Even as the fearful multitude Had left them, when they fled Before the rising flood. High overhead, sublime, The mighty gateway's storied roof was spread, Dwarfing the puny piles of younger time. With the deeds of days of vore That ample roof was seulptured o'er, And many a godlike form there met his eye, And many an emblem dark of mystery. Through these wide portals oft had Baly rode Triumphant from his proud abode, When, in his greatness, he bestrode The Aullay, hugest of four-footed kind, The Aullay-Horse, that in his force, With elephantine trunk, could bind And lift the elephant, and on the wind Whirl him away, with sway and swing, Even like a pebble from the practis'd sling.

Those streets which never, since the days of yore, By human footstep had been visited, Those streets which never more A human foot shall tread, Ladurlad trod. In sun-light and sea-green, The thousand Palaees were seen Of that proud City, whose superb abodes Seem'd rear'd by Giants for the immortal Gods. How silent and how beautiful they stand, Like things of Nature ! the eternal rocks Themselves not firmer. Neither hath the sand Drifted within their gates and chok'd their doors, Nor slime defiled their pavements and their floors.

Did then the Ocean wage His war for love and envy, not in rage, O thou fair City, that he spared thee thus? Art thou Varounin's capital and court, Where all the Sea Gods for delight resort, A place too godlike to be held by ns, The poor degenerate children of the earth? So thought Ladurlad, as he look'd around, Weening to hear the sound Of Mermaid's shell, and song, Of choral throng from some imperial hall, Wherein the Immortal Powers, at festival, Their high carousals keep; But all is silence dread, Silence profound and dead, The everlasting stillness of the Deep.

Through many a solitary street, And silent market-place, and lonely square, Arm'd with the mighty Curse, behold him fare. And now his feet attain that royal fane Where Baly held of old his awful reign. What once had been the Gardens spread around, Fair Gardens, once which wore perpetual green, Where all sweet flowers through all the year were found, And all fair fruits were through all seasons seen;

A place of Paradise, where each device Of emulous Art with Nature strove to vie; And Nature, on her part, Call'd forth new powers wherewith to vanquish

Art.

The Swerga-God himself, with envious eye, Survey'd those peerless gardens in their prime; Nor ever did the Lord of Light,

Who circles Earth and Heaven npon his way, Behold from eldest time a goodlier sight Than were the groves which Baly, in his might, Made for his chosen place of solace and delight

5.

It was a Garden still beyond all price ; Even yet it was a place of Paradise; For where the mighty Ocean could not spare, There had he, with his own creation, Sought to repair his work of devastation. And here were coral bowers, And grots of madrepores, And banks of sponge, as soft and fair to eye As e'er was mossy bed Whereon the Wood Nymphs lie, With languid limbs, in summer's sultry hours Here, too, were living flowers Which, like a bud compacted, Their purple cups contracted, And now, in open blossom spread, Stretch'd like green anthers many a seeking head And arborets of jointed stone were there, And plants of fibres fine, as silkworm's thread, Yea, beautiful as Mermaid's golden hair

XVI

Upon the waves dispread. Others that, like the broad banana growing, Raised their long, wrinkled leaves of purple hue, Like streamers wide outflowing. And whatsoe'er the depths of Ocean hide From human eyes, Ladurlad there espied, — Trees of the deep, and shrubs, and fruits, and flowers, As fair as ours, Wherewith the Sea Nymphs love their loeks to braid, When to their father's hall, at festival Repairing, they, in emulous array,

Their charms display, To grace the banquet and the solemn day.

The golden fountains had not ceased to flow ; And where they mingled with the briny Sea, There was a sight of wonder and delight, To see the fish, like birds in air, Above Ladurlad flying. Round those strange waters they repair, Their scarlet fins outspread and plying ; They float with gentle hovering there ; And now, upon those little wings, As if to dare forbidden things, With wilful purpose bent, Swift as an arrow from a bow, They shoot across, and to and fro, In rapid glance, like lightning go Through that unwonted element.

7.

Almost in scenes so wondrous fair, Ladurlad had forgot The mighty cause which led him there; His busy eye was every where; His mind had lost all thought; His heart, surrender'd to the joys Of sight, was happy as a boy's. But soon the awakening thought recurs Of him who in the Sepulehres, Hopeless of human aid, in chains is laid;

And her who, on the solitary shore, By night and day, her weary watch will keep, Till she shall see them issuing from the deep.

Now hath Ladurlad reach'd the Court Of the great Palace of the King: its floor Was of the marble rock; and there, before The imperial door, A mighty Image on the steps was seen, Of stature huge, of countenance serene. A crown and sceptre at his feet were laid; One hand a scroll display'd; The other pointed there, that all might see; My name is Death, it said; In mercy have the Gods appointed me. Two brazen gates beneath him, night and day, Stood open; and within them yon behold Descending steps, which in the living stone

Were hewn, a spacious way Down to the Chambers of the Kings of old. 9.

Trembling with hope, the adventurons man descended. The sea-green light of day Not far along the vault extended; But where the slant reflection ended, Another light was seen Of red and fiery hue, That with the water blended,

And gave the secrets of the Tombs to view.

Deep in the marble rock, the Hall Of Death was hollow'd out, a chamber wide, Low-roof'd, and long; on either side, Each in his own alcove, and on his throne, The Kings of old were seated : in his hand Each held the sceptre of command, From whenee, across that scene of endless night, A carbuncle diffused its everlasting light.

11.

So well had the embalmers done their part With spice and precious unguents to imbue The perfect eorpse, that each had still the hue Of living man, and every limb was still Supple, and firm, and full, as when of yore Its motion answered to the moving will. The robes of royalty, which once they wore, Long since had mouldered off, and left them bare: Naked upon their thrones behold them there, Statutes of actual flech m a fearful sight!

Statues of actual flesh — a fearful sight! Their large and rayless eyes, Dimly reflecting to that gem-born light, Glazed, fix'd, and meaningless, — yet, open wide, Their ghastly balls belied The mockery of life in all beside.

12.

But if, amid these chambers drear, Death were a sight of shuddering and of fear, Life was a thing of stranger horror here. For at the farther end, in yon alcove, Where Baly should have lain, had he obey'd Man's common lot, behold Ereenia laid. Strong fetters link him to the rock; his eye Now rolls and widens, as with effort vain He strives to break the chain, Now seems to brood upon his misery. Before him couch'd there lay One of the mighty monsters of the deep, Whom Lorrinite, encountering on the way, There station'd, his perpetual guard to keep: In the sport of wanton power, sne charm'd him there,

As if to mock the Glendoveer's despair.

Upward his form was human, save that here The skin was cover'd o'er with scale on scale Compact, a panoply of natural mail. Ilis mouth, from ear to ear, Weapon'd with triple teeth, extended wide, And tusks on either side; A double snake below, he roll'd His supple length behind in many a sinuous fold.

14

With red and kindling eye, the Beast beholds A living man draw nigh, And rising on his folds, In hungry joy awaits the expected feast, His mouth half open, and his teeth unsheath'd. Then on be sprung, and in his sealy arms Seized him, and fasten'd on his neck, to suck, With greedy lips, the warm life-blood: and sure But for the nighty power of magic charms, As easily as, in the blithesome hour Of spring, a child doth crop the meadow-flower, Piecemeal those claws Had rent their victim, and those armed jaws Snapp'd him in twain. Naked Ladurlad stood, Yet fearless and unharm'd in this dread strife, So well Kehama's Curse had charm'd his fated life.

He too, - for anger, rising at the sight Of him he sought, in such strange thrall confined, With desperate courage fired Ladurlad's mind, -He too unto the fight himself address'd, And grappling breast to breast, With foot firm-planted stands, And seized the monster's throat with both his hands. Vainly, with throttling grasp, he press'd The impenetrable scales; And lo! the Guard rose up, and round his foe, With gliding motion, wreath'd his lengthening coils, Then tighten'd all their folds with stress and strain. Nought would the raging Tiger's strength avail, If once involved within those mighty toils; The arm'd Rhinoceros, so elasp'd, in vain Had trusted to his hide of rugged mail, His bones all broken, and the breath of life Crush'd from the lungs, in that unequal strife. Again, and yet again, he sought to break The impassive limbs; but when the Monster found His utmost power was vain, A moment he relax'd in every round,

A moment he relax d in every round, Then knit his coils again with closer strain, And, bearing forward, forced him to the ground.

IC.

Ereenia groan'd in anguish at the sight Of this dread fight: once more the Glendoveer Essay'd to break his bonds, and fear For that brave father who had sought him here, Stung him to wilder strugglings. From the rock He raised himself half up, with might and main, Pluck'd at the adamantine chain, And now, with long and unrelaxing strain, In obstinate effort of indignant strength, Labor'd and strove in vain; Till his immortal sinews fail'd at length; And yielding, with an inward groan, to fate, Despairingly, he let himself again Fall prostrate on his prison-bed of stone, Body and chain alike with lifeless weight. 17.

Struggling they lay in mortal fray All day, while day was in our upper sphere, For light of day And natural darkness never entered here, All night, with unabated might, They waged the unremitting fight. A second day, a second night, With furious will they wrestled still. The third came on, the fourth is gone; Another comes, another goes; And yet no respite, no repose ! But day and night, and night and day, Involv'd in mortal strife they lay; Six days and nights have pass'd away, And still they wage, with mutual rage, The unremitting fray. With mutual rage their war they wage, But not with mutual will; For when the seventh morning came, The monster's worn and wearied frame In this strange contest fails; And weaker, weaker, every hour, He yields beneath strong Nature's power, For now the Curse prevails.

I8.

Sometimes the Beast sprung up to bear His foe aloft; and trusting there. To shake him from his hold, Relax'd the rings that wreath'd him round; But on his throat Ladurlad hung, And weigh'd him to the ground; And if they sink, or if they float, Alike with stubborn clasp he clung, Tenacious of his grasp; For well he knew with what a power, Exempt from Nature's laws, The Curse had arm'd him for this hour; And in the monster's gasping jaws, And in his hollow eye, Well could Ladurlad now deserv The certain signs of victory.

19.

And now the Beast no more can keep His painful watch; his eyes, oppress'd, Are fainting for their natural sleep; His living flesh and blood must rest; The Beast must sleep or die. Then he, full faint and languidly, Unwreathes his rings and strives to fly, And still retreating, slowly trails His stiff and heavy length of scales. But that unweariable foe, With will relentless follows still; No breathing-time, no pause of fight He gives, but presses on his flight; Along the vaulted chambers, and the ascent Up to the emerald-tinted light of day, He harasses his way, Till lifeless, underneath his grasp, The huge Sea Monster lay, 20.

That obstinate work is done ; Ladurlad cried, One labor yet remains ! And thoughtfully he eyed Ereenia's ponderous chains ; And with faint effort, half-despairing, tried The rivets deep in-driven. Instinctively, As if in search of aid, he look'd around : Oh, then how gladly, in the near alcove, Fallen on the ground its lifeless Lord beside, The crescent cimeter he spied, Whose clondy blade, with potent spells imbued, Had lain so many an age unhurt in solitude !

21.

Joyfully springing there, He seized the weapon, and with eager stroke Hew'd at the chain; the force was dealt in vain, For not as if through yielding air Pass'd the descending cimeter, Its deaden'd way the heavy water broke; Yet it bit deep. Again, with both his hands, He wields the blade, and dealt a surer blow. The baser metal yields To that fine edge, and lo! the Glendoveer Rises and snaps the half-sever'd links, and stands Freed from his broken bands.

XVII.

BALY.

1.

THIS is the appointed night, The night of joy and consecrated mirth, When from his judgment-seat in Padalon, By Yamen's throne, Baly goes forth, that he may walk the Earth Unseen, and hear his name Still hymn'd and honor'd by the grateful voice Of human-kind, and in his fame rejoice. Therefore, from door to door, and street to street, With willing feet, Shaking their firebands, the glad children run; Baly! great Baly! they acclaim; Where'er they run they bear the mighty name; Where'er they meet, Baly ! great Baly ! still their choral tongues repeat. Therefore at every door the votive flame Through pendent lanterns sheds its painted light, And rockets, hissing upward through the sky, Fall like a shower of stars From Heaven's black canopy. Therefore, on yonder mountain's templed height, The brazen caldron blazes through the night. Huge as a Ship that travels the main sea Is that capacious brass; its wick as tall As is the mast of some great admiral. Ten thousand votaries bring Camphor and ghee to feed the sacred flame; And while, through regions round, the nations see Its fiery pillar enrling high in heaven, Baly ! great Baly ! they exclaim, Forever hallowed be his blessed name ! Honor and praise to him for evermore be given .

Why art not thou among the festive throng, Baly, O righteous Judge ! to hear thy fame? Still, as of yore, with pageantry and song, The glowing streets along, They celebrate thy name; Baly ! great Baly ! still The grateful habitants of Earth acelaim, Baly ! great Baly ! still The ringing walls and echoing towers proclaim. From yonder mountain the portentous flame Still blazes to the nations, as hefore; All things appear to human eyes the same, As perfect as of yore; To human eyes, - but how unlike to thine ! Thine, which were wont to see The Company divine, That with their presence came to honor thee ! For all the blessed ones of mortal birth Who have been clothed with immortality, From the eight corners of the Earth, From the Seven Worlds assembling, all Wont to attend thy solemn festival. Then did thine eyes behold The wide air peopled with that glorious train; Now mayst thou seek the blessed ones in vain, For Earth and Air are now beneath the Rajah's reign.

3.

Therefore the righteous Jndge hath walk'd the Earth In sorrow and in solitude to-night The sound of human mirth To him is no delight; He turns away from that ungrateful sight, Hallowed not now by visitants divine, And there he bends his melancholy way, Where, in yon full-orb'd Moon's refulgent light, The Golden Towers of his old City shine Above the silver sea. The ancient Chief There bent his way in grief, As if sad thoughts indulged would work their own relief.

4.

There he beholds, upon the sand, A lovely Maiden in the moonlight stand. The land-breeze lifts her locks of jet; The waves around her polish'd ankles play, Her bosom with the salt sea-spray is wet; Her arms are cross'd, unconsciously, to fold That bosom from the cold, While, statne-like, she seems her watch to keep,

Gazing intently on the restless deep.

Seven miserable days had Kailyal there, From earliest dawn till evening, watch'd the deep; Six nights, within the chamber of the rock, Had laid her down, and found in prayer That comfort which she sought in vain from sleep But when the seventh night came,

601

XVII.

Never should she behold her father more, The wretched Maiden said, in her despair; Yet would not quit the shore, Nor turn her eyes one moment from the sea: Never before Had Kailyal watch'd it so impatiently, Never so eagerly had hoped before, As now, when she believed, and said, all hope was o'er.

Beholding her, how beautiful she stood, In that wild solitude, Baly from his invisibility Had issued then, to know her cause of woe; But that in the air beside her, he espied Two Powers of Evil for her hurt allied, Foul Arvalan and dreadful Lorrinite. Walking in darkness him they could not see, And marking with what demon-like delight They kept their innocent prey in sight, He waits, expecting what the end may be.

7.

She starts; for lo! where, floating many a rood, A Monster, hugest of the Ocean brood, Weltering and lifeless, drifts toward the shore. Backward she starts in fear before the flood, And, when the waves retreat, They leave their hideous burden at her feet.

8.

She ventures to approach with timid tread; She starts, and half draws back in fear, Then stops, and stretches out her head, To see if that huge Beast indeed be dead. Now, growing bold, the Maid advances near, Even to the margin of the ocean-flood. Rightly she reads her Father's victory, And lifts her joyous hands exultingly To Heaven in gratitude. Then, spreading them toward the Sea, While pious tears bedim her streaming eyes, Come! come! my Father, come to me; Ereenia, come! she crise; Lo! from the opening deep they rise, And to Ladurlad's arms the happy Kailyal flies.

9.

She turn'd from him, to meet, with beating heart, The Glendovcer's embrace.
Now turn to me, for mine thou art !
Foul Arvalan exclaim'd; his loathsome face Came forth, and from the air, In fleshly form, he burst.
Always in horror and despair,
Had Kailyal seen that form and face accurs'd; But yet so sharp a pang had ne'er Shot with a thrill like death through all her frame, As now when on her hour of joy the Spectre came.

10.

Vain is resistance now; The fiendish laugh of Lorrinite is heard; And at her dreadful word, The Asuras once again appear, And seize Ladurlad and the Glendoveer.

11.

Hold your accursed hands ! A voice exclaim'd, whose dread commands Were fear'd through all the vaults of Padalon; And there among them, in the midnight air, The presence of the mighty Baly shone. He, making manifest his mightiness, Put forth on every side a hundred arms, And seized the Soreeress; maugre all her charms, Her and her fiendish ministers he caught With force as uncontrollable as fate, And that unhappy Soul, to whom The Almighty Rajah's power availeth not Living to avert, nor dead to mitigate, His righteous doom.

12.

Help, help, Kehama! Father, help! he eried; But Baly tarried not to abide That mightier Power; with irresistible feet He stamp'd and cleft the Earth; it open'd wide, And gave him way to his own Judgment-seat. Down, like a plummet, to the World below He sunk, and bore his prey

To punishment deserved, and endless woc.

XVIII.

KEHAMA'S DESCENT.

I.

THE Earth, by Baly's feet divided, Closed o'er his way as to the Judgment-seat He plunged and bore his prev. Scarce had the shock subsided, When, darting from the Swerga's heavenly heights, Kehama, like a thunderbolt, alights. In wrath he came; a bickering flame Flash'd from his eyes, which made the moonlight dim, And passion forcing way from every limb, Like furnace-smoke, with terrors wrapt him round. Furious he smote the ground ; Earth trembled underneath the dreadful stroke, Again in sunder riven; He hurl'd in rage his whirling weapon down. But lo! the fiery sheekra to his feet Return'd, as if by equal force re-driven, And from the abyss the voice of Baly came Not yet, O Rajah, hast thou won

The realms of Padalon !

Earth and the Swerga are thine own; But, till Kehama shall subdue the throne Of Hell, in torments Yamen holds his son 2.

Fool that he is ! — in torments let him lie ! Kehama, wrathful at his son, replied. But what am I,

That thou shouldst brave me?-kindling in his pride

The dreadful Rajah cried. Ho! Yamen! hear me. God of Padalon, Prepare thy throne, And let the Amreeta cup Be ready for my lips, when 1 anon Triumphantly shall take my seat thereon, And plant upon thy neck my royal feet.

3.

In voice like thunder thus the Rajah cried, tmpending o'er the abyss, with menacing hand Put forth, as in the action of command, And eyes that darted their red anger down. Then, drawing back, he let the earth subside, And, as his wrath relax'd, survey'd, Thoughtfully and silently, the mortal Maid. Her eye the while was on the farthest sky, Where up the ethereal height Ereenia rose and pass'd away from sight. Never had she so joyfully Beheld the coming of the Glendoveer, Dear as he was and he deserved to be, As now she saw him rise and disappear. Come now what will, within her heart said she; For thou art safe, and what have I to fear?

4.

Meantime the Almighty Rajah, late In power, and majesty, and wrath array'd, Had laid his terrors by, And gazed upon the Maid. Pride could not quit his cye, Nor that remorseless nature from his front Depart; yet whoso had beheld him then, Had felt some admiration mix'd with dread, And might have said,

That sure he seem'd to be the King of Men! Less than the greatest that he could not be, Who carried in his port such might and majesty.

In fear no longer for the Glendoveer, Now toward the Rajah Kailyal turn'd her eyes, As if to ask what doom awaited her. But then surprise, Even as with fascination, held them there; So strange a thing it seen'd to see the change Of purport in that all-commanding brow, Which thoughtfully was bent upon her now. Wondering she gazed, the while her Father's eye Was fixed upon Kehama haughtily; It spake defiance to him, high disdain, Stern patience unsubduable by pain, And pride triumphant over agony.

6.

Ladurlad, said the Rajah, thou and I Alike have done the work of Destiny, Unknowing each to what the impulse tended; But now that over Earth and Heaven my reign Is stablish'd, and the ways of Fate are plain Before me, here our enmity is ended.

I take away thy Curse. - As thus he said,

The fire which in Ladurlad's heart and brain Was burning, fled, and left him free from pain. So rapidly his torments were departed, That at the sudden ease he started, As with a shock, and to his head His hands up-fled, As if he felt through every failing limb The power and sense of life forsaking him.

7.

Then turning to the Maid, the Rajah cried, O Virgin, above all of mortal birth Favor'd alike in beauty and in worth, And in the glories of thy destiny, Now let thy happy heart exult with pride, For Fate hath chosen thee To be Kehama's bride, To be the Queen of Heaven and Earth, And of whatever Worlds beside Infinity may hide; for I can see The writing which, at thy nativity, All-knowing Nature wrought upon thy brain, In branching veins, which to the gifted eye Map out the mazes of futurity. There is it written, Maid, that thou and I, Alone of human kind a deathless pair, Are doom'd to share The Amreeta-drink divine Of immortality. Come, Maiden mme ! High-fated One, ascend the subject sky, And hy Kehama's side Sit on the Swerga throne, his equal bride.

Oh never, — never, — Father! Kailyal cried; It is not as he saith, — it cannot be! I!—I his bride! Nature is never false; he wrongeth her! My heart belies such lines of destiny.

There is no other true interpreter !

9.

At that reply, Kehama's darkening brow Bewray'd the anger which he yet suppress'd; Counsel thy daughter! tell her thou art now Free from thy Curse, he said, and bid her bow In thankfulness to Fate's benign behest. Bid her her stubborn will restrain,— For Destiny at last must be obey'd,— And tell her, while obedience is delay'd, Thy Curse will burn again.

10.

She needeth not my counsel, he replied. And idly, Rajah, dost thou reason thus Of Destiny! for though all other things Were subject to the starry influencings, And bow'd submissive to thy tyranny,

The virtuous heart and resolute mind are free. Thus in their wisdom did the Gods decree

When they created man. Let come what will This is our rock of strength; in every ill, Sorrow, oppression, pain, and agony, The spirit of the good is unsubdued,

And, suffer as they may, they triumph still

-11.

Obstinate fools ! exclaim'd the Mighty One ; Fate and my pleasure must be done, And ye resist in vain ! Take your fit gnerdon till we meet again ! So saying, his vindictive hand he flung Towards them, fill'd with eurses ; then on high Aloft he sprung, and vanish'd through the Sky.

XIX.

MOUNT CALASAY.

1.

THE Rajah, scattering curses as he rose, Soar'd to the Swerga, and resumed his throne. Not for his own redoubled agony, Which now, through heart and brain, With renovated pain, Rush'd to its seat, Ladurlad breathes that groan. That groan is for his child; he groan'd to see That she was stricken now with leprosy, Which, as the enemy vindictive fled, O'er all her frame with quick contagion spread. She, wondering at events so passing strange, And fill'd with hope and fear, And joy to see the Tyrant disappear, And glad expectance of her Glendoveer, Perceived not in herself the hideous change. His burning pain, she thought, had forced the groan

Her father breathed; his agonies alone Were present to her mind; she clasp'd his knees, Wept for his Curse, and did not feel her own.

Nor, when she saw her plague, did her good heart, True to itself, even for a moment fail. Ha, Rajah! with disdainful smile she cries, Mighty, and wise, and wicked as thou art, Still thy blind vengeance acts a friendly part. Shall I not thank thee for this scurf and scale Of dire deformity, whose loathsomeness, Surer than panoply of strongest mail, Arms me against all foes? Oh, better so, Better such foul disgrace, Than that this innocent face Should tempt thy wooing! That I need not dread : Nor ever impions foe

Will offer outrage now, nor further woe Will beauty draw on my unhappy head; Safe through the unholy world may Kailyal go.

Her face, in virtuous pride, Was lifted to the skies, As him and his poor vengeance she defied ; But earthward, when she ceased, she turn'd hereyes, As if she sought to hide The tear which in her own despite would rise. Did then the thought of her own Glendoveer Call forth that natural tear? Was it a woman's fear,

A thought of earthly love which troubled her? Like yon thin cloud, amid the moonlight sky, That flits before the wind, And leaves no trace behind, The womanly pang pass'd over Kailyal's mind. This is a loathsome sight to human eye, Half shrinking at herself, the maiden thought; Will it be so to him? Oh, surely not ! The immortal Powers, who see Through the poor wrappings of mortality, Behold the soul, the beautiful soul, within, Exempt from age and wasting maladies, And undeform'd, while pure and free from sin This is a loathsome sight to human eyes, But not to eyes divine, Ereenia, Son of Heaven, oh, not to thine !

The wrongful thought of fear, the womanly pain Had pass'd away; her heart was calm again. She raised her head, expecting now to see The Glendoveer appear; Where hath he fled, quoth she,

That he should tarry now? Oh ! had she known Whither the adventurous Son of Heaven was flown, Strong as her spirit was, it had not borne The appalling thought, nor dared to hope for his return.

For he in search of Seeva's throne was gone, To tell his tale of wrong; In search of Seeva's own abode The Glendoveer began his heavenly road. O wild emprise ! above the farthest skies He hoped to rise ! Him who is throned beyond the reach of thought, The Alone, the Inaecessible, he sought. O wild emprise! for when, in days of yore, For proud preëminence of power, Brama and Veeshnoo, wild with rage, contended, And Seeva, in his might, Their dread contention ended, Before their sight In form a fiery column did he tower, Whose head above the highest height extended, Whose base below the deepest depth descended. Downward, its depth to sound, Veeshnoo a thousand years explored The fathomless profound,

And yet no base he found :

Upward, to reach its head,

Ten myriad years the aspiring Brama soar'd, And still, as up he fled,

Above him still the Immeasurable spread.

The rivals own'd their Lord, And trembled and adored.

And trembled and addr

How shall the Glendoveer attain What Brama and what Veeshnoo sought in vain?

Ne'er did such thought of lofty daring enter Celestial Spirit's mind. O wild adventure That throne to find, for he must leave behind

This World, that in the centre, Within its salt-sea girdle, lies confined ; Yea, the Seven Earths that, each with its own ocean, Ring clasping ring, compose the mighty round. What power of motion, In less than endless years shall bear him there, Along the limitless extent, To the utmost bound of the remotest spheres? What strength of wing Suffice to pierce the Golden Firmament That closes all within? Yet he hath pass'd the measureless extent, And pierced the Golden Firmament; For Faith hath given him power, and Space and Time Vanish before that energy sublime. Nor doth eternal Night And outer Darkness check his resolute flight; By strong desire through all he makes his way, Till Seeva's Seat appears, - behold Mount Calasay !

Behold the Silver Mountain! round about Seven ladders stand, so high, the aching eye, Seeking their tops in vain amid the sky, Might deem they led from earth to highest Heaven. Ages would pass away, And worlds with age decay, Ere one, whose patient feet, from ring to ring, Must win their upward way, Could reach the summit of Mount Calasay. But that strong power that nerved his wing, That all-surmounting will, Intensity of faith and holiest love, Sustain'd Ereenia still; And he hath gain'd the plain, the sanctuary above.

8.

Lo, there the Silver Bell, That, self-sustain'd, hangs buoyant in the air ! Lo! the broad Table there, too bright For mortal sight, From whose four sides the bordering gems unite Their harmonizing rays, In one mid fount of many-color'd light. The stream of splendor, flashing as it flows, Plays round, and feeds the stem of yon celestial Rose !

Where is the Sage whose wisdom can declare The hidden things of that mysterious flower, That flower which serves all mysteries to bear? The sacred Triangle is there,

Holding the Emblem which no tongue may tell; Is this the Heaven of Heavens, where Seeva's self doth dwell?

Here first the Glendoveer Felt his wing flag, and paused upon his flight. Was it that fear came over him, when here He saw the imagined throne appear? Not so, for his immortal sight Endured the Table's light; Distinctly he beheld all things around, And doubt and wonder rose within his mind That this was all he found. Howbeit he lifted up his voice, and spake. There is oppression in the World below; Earth groans beneath the yoke; yea, in her woe She asks if the Avenger's eye is blind? Awake, O Lord, awake ! Too long thy vengeance sleepeth. Holiest One ' Put thon thy terrors on for merey's sake,

And strike the blow, in justice to mankind !

So, as he pray'd, intenser faith he felt; His spirit seem'd to melt With ardent yearnings of increasing love; Upward he turn'd his eyes, As if there should be something yet above; Let me not, Seeva! seek in vain! he eries; Thou art not here, - for how should these contain thee? Thou art not here, - for how should I sustain thee? But thou, where'er thou art, Canst hear the voice of prayer, Canst read the righteous heart. Thy dwelling who can tell? Or who, O Lord, hath seen thy secret throne? But Thou art not alone, Not unapproachable ! O all-containing Mind, Thou who art every where, Whom all who seek shall find, Hear me, O Seeva! hear the suppliant's prayer!

11.

So saying, up he sprung, And struck the Bell, which self-suspended hung Before the mystic Rose. From side to side the silver tongue Melodious swung, and far and wide Soul-thrilling tones of heavenly music rung. Abash'd, confounded It left the Glendoveer; yea, all astounded In overpowering fear and deep dismay; For when that Bell had sounded, The Rose, with all the mysteries it surrounded, The Bell, the Table, and Mount Calasay, The holy Hill itself, with all thereon, Even as a morning dream, before the day, Dissolves away, they faded and were gone.

12.

Where shall he rest his wing ? where turn for flight For all around is Light, Primal, essential, all-pervading Light! Heart cannot think, nor tongue declare, Nor eyes of Angel bear That Glory unimaginably bright; The Sun himself had seem'd A speek of darkness there, Amid that Light of Light!

13.

Down fell the Glendoveer ; Down through all regions, to our mundane sphere

He fell; but in his ear A Voice, which from within him came, was heard, The indubitable word Of Him to whom all secret things are known Go, ye who suffer, go to Yamen's throne. He hath the remedy for every woe; He setteth right whate'er is wrong below.

XX.

THE EMBARKATION.

1.

Down from the Heaven of Heavens Ereenia fell Precipitate, yet imperceptible His fall; nor had he cause nor thought of fear; And when he came within this mundane sphere, And felt that Earth was near, The Glendoveer his azure wings expanded, And, sloping down the sky Toward the spot from whence he sprung on high, There on the shore he landed.

2.

Kailyal advanced to meet him, Not moving now as she was wont to greet him, Joy in her eye and in her eager pace; With a calm smile of melancholy pride She met him now, and, turning half aside, Her warning hand repell'd the dear embrace.

3.

Strange things, Ereenia, have befallen us here, The Virgin said; the Almighty Man hath read The lines which, traced by Nature on my brain, There to the gifted eye Make all my fortunes plain, Mapping the mazes of futurity. lle sued for peace, for it is written there That I with him the Amreeta cup must share ; Wherefore he bade me come, and by his side Sit on the Swerga-throne, his equal bride. 1 need not tell thee what reply was given; My heart, the sure interpreter of Heaven, His impious words belied. Thou seest his poor revenge ! So having said, One look she glanced upon her leprous stain Indignantly, and shook Her head in calm disdain 4.

O Maid of soul divine ! O more than ever dear, And more than ever mine, Replied the Glendoveer; · He hath not read, be sure, the mystic ways Of Fate; almighty as he is, that maze Hath mock'd his fallible sight. Said he the Amreeta cup ? So far aright The Evil One may see; for Fate displays Her hidden things in part, and part conceals, Baffling the wicked eye

Alike with what she hides, and what reveals,

When with unholy purpose it would pry Into the secrets of futurity. So may it be permitted him to see Dimly the inscrutable decree; For to the World below, Where Yamen guards the Amreeta, we must go; Thus Seeva hath express'd his will; even he, The Holiest, hath ordain'd it; there, he saith, All wrongs shall be redress'd By Yamen, by the righteous Power of Death.

Forthwith the Father and the fated Maid, And that heroic Spirit, who for them Such flight had late essay'd, The will of Heaven obey'd. They went their way along the road That leads to Yamen's dread abode.

6.

Many a day hath pass'd away Since they began their arduous way, Their way of toil and pain ; And now their weary feet attain The Earth's remotest bound, Where outer Ocean girds it round. But not like other Oceans this : Rather it seem'd a drear abyss, Upon whose brink they stood. Oh ! scene of fear ! the travellers hear The raging of the flood ; They hear how fearfully it roars, But clouds of darker shade than night Forever hovering round those shores, Hide all things from their sight ; The Sun upon that darkness pours His unavailing light, Nor ever Moon nor Stars display, Through the thick shade, one guiding ray To show the perils of the way.

7.

There, in a creek, a vessel lay; Just on the confines of the day, It rode at anchor in its bay, These venturous pilgrims to convey Across that outer Sea. Strange vessel sure it seem'd to be, And all unfit for such wild sea ! For through its yawning side the wave Was oozing in ; the mast was frail, And old and torn its only sail. How may that crazy vessel brave The billows that in wild commotion Forever roar and rave? How hope to cross the dreadful Ocean O'er which eternal shadows dwell. Whose secrets none return to tell!

8.

Well might the travellers fear to enter ! But summon'd once on that adventure, For them was no retreat. Nor boots it with reluctant feet To linger on the strand, Aboard ! aboard ! An awful voice, that left no choice, Sent forth its stern command, Aboard ! aboard ! The travellers hear that voice in fear, And breathe to Heaven an inward prayer, And take their seats in silence there.

9.

Self-hoisted then, behold the sail Expands itself before the gale ; Hands which they cannot see, let shp The cable of that fated Ship ; The land breeze sends her on her way, And lo! they leave the living light of day !

XXI.

THE WORLD'S END.

1.

SWIFT as an arrow in its flight The Ship shot through the incumbent night; And they have left behind The raging billows and the roaring wind, The storm, the darkness, and all mortal fears; And lo! another light To guide their way appears, The light of other spheres.

2.

That instant from Ladurlad's heart and brain The Curse was gone; he feels again Fresh as in youth's fair morning, and the Maid Hath lost her leprons stain. The Tyrant then hath no dominion here, Starting, she cried; O happy, happy hour! We are beyond his power! Then, raising to the Glendoveer, With heavenly beauty bright, her angel face, Turn'd not reluctant now, and met his dear embrace.

3.

Swift glides the Ship with gentle motion Across that calm and quiet ocean, That glassy sea, which seem'd to be The mirror of tranquillity. Their pleasant passage soon was o'er; The Ship hath reach'd its destined shore -A level belt of ice, which bound, As with an adamantine mound, The waters of the sleeping Ocean round. Strange forms were on the strand Of earth-born spirits slain before their time; Who, wandering over sea, and sky, and land, Had so fulfill'd their term; and now were met Upon this icy belt, a motley band, Waiting their summons at the appointed hour. When each before the Judgment-seat must stand,

And hear his doom from Baly's righteous power.

4. Foul with habitual crimes, a hideous crew Were there, the race of rapine and of blood. Now, having overpass'd the mortal flood, Their own deformity they knew, And knew the meed that to their deeds was due. Therefore in fear and agony they stood, Expecting when the Evil Messenger Among them should appear. But with their fear A hope was mingled now; O'er the dark shade of guilt a deeper hue It threw, and gave a fiercer character To the wild eye, and lip, and sinful brow. They hoped that soon Kehama would subdue The inexorable God, and seize his throne, Reduce the infernal World to his command, And, with his irresistible right hand,

Redeem them from the vaults of Padalon.

Apart from these, a milder company, The victims of offences not their own, Look'd when the appointed Messenger should eome; Gather'd together some, and some alone Brooding in silence on their future doom. Widows whom, to their husbands' funeral fire, Force or strong error led, to share the pyre, As to their everlasting marriage-bed ; And babes, by sin unstain'd, Whom erring parents vow'd 'To Ganges, and the holy stream profaned With that strange sacrifice, rite unordain'd By Law, by sacred Nature unallow'd ; Others more hapless in their destiny, Scarce having first inhaled their vital breath, Whose cradles from some tree Unnatural hands suspended, Then left, till gentle Death, Coming like Sleep, their feeble moanings ended ; Or for his prey the ravenous Kite descended; Or marching like an army from their caves, The Pismires blacken'd o'er, then, bleach'd and bare,

Innocent Souls! thus set so early free From sin, and sorrow, and mortality, Their spotless spirits all-creating Love Received into its universal breast. Yon blue screne above

Was their domain; clouds pillow'd them to rest; The Elements on them like nurses tended,

And with their growth ethereal substance blended. Less pure than these is that strange Indian bird, Who never dips in earthly streams her bill,

But, when the sound of coming showers is heard, Looks up, and from the clouds receives her fill.

Less pure the footless fowl of Heaven, that never Rest upon earth, but on the wing forever

Hovering o'er flowers, their fragrant food inhale, Drink the descending dew upon its way, And sleep aloft while floating on the gale 7.

And thus these innocents, in yonder sky, Grow and are strengthen'd, while the allotted years

Perform their course; then hitherward they fly, Being free from moral taint, so free from fears, A joyous band, expecting soon to soar To Indra's happy spheres, And mingle with the blessed company Of heavenly spirits there for evermore.

A Gulf profound surrounded This icy belt; the opposite side With highest rocks was bounded, But where their heads they hide, Or where their base is founded, None could espy. Above all reach of sight They rose; the second Earth was on their height; Their feet were fix'd in everlasting night.

9.

So deep the Gulf, no eye Could plumb its dark profundity, Yet all its depth must try; for this the road To Padalon, and Yamen's dread abode. And from below continually Ministrant Demons rose and caught The Souls whose hour was come; Then, with their burden fraught, Plunged down, and bore them to receive their doom.

10.

Then might be seen who went in hope, and who Trembled to meet the meed Of many a foul misdeed, as wild they threw Their arms retorted from the Demons' grasp, And look'd around, all eagerly, to seek For help, where help was none; and strove for aid To clasp the nearest shade; Yea, with imploring looks and horrent shriek, Even from one Demon to another bending, With hands extending, Their mercy they essay'd. Still from the dreadful Gulf avert their eyes, In vain; down plunge the Demons, and their cries Feebly, as down they sink, from that profound arise.

11.

What heart of living man could undisturb'd Bear sight so sad as this! What wonder there If Kailyal's lip were blanch'd with inmost dread! The chill which from that icy belt Struck through her, was less keen than what she felt With her heart's blood through every limb dispread. Close to the Glendoveer she clung,

And clasping round his neck her trembling hands, She closed her eyes, and there in silence hung.

12.

Then to Ladurlad said the Glendoveer, These Demons, whom thou seest, the ministers Of Yamen, wonder to behold us here; But for the dead they come, and not for us; Therefore, albeit they gaze upon thee thus, Have thou no fear.

A little while thou must be left alone, Till I have borne thy daughter down, And placed her safely by the throne Of him who keeps the Gate of Padalon.

Then, taking Kailyal in his arms, he said, Be of good heart, Beloved ! it is I Who bear thee. Saying this, his wings he spread, Sprung upward in the sky, and poised his flight, Then plunged into the Gulf, and sought the World of Night.

XXH.

THE GATE OF PADALON.

۱.

THE strong foundations of this inmost Earth Rest upon Padalon. That icy Mound, Which girt the mortal Ocean round, Reach'd the profound,— Ice in the regions of the upper air, Crystal midway, and adamant below, Whose strength sufficed to bear The weight of all this upper World of ours, And with its rampart closed the Realm of Woe. Eight gates hath Padalon; eight heavenly Powers Have them in charge, each alway at his post, Lest from their penal caves the accursed host, Maugre the might of Baly and the God,

Should break, and carry ruin all abroad.

Those gates stand ever open, night and day, And Sonls of mortal men Forever throng the way. Some from the dolorous den, Children of sin and wrath, return no more : They, fit companions of the Spirits accurs'd, Are doom'd, like them in baths of fire immers'd, Or weltering upon beds of molten ore, Or stretch'd upon the brazen floor, Are fasten'd down with adamantine chains; While on their substance, inconsumable, Leeches of fire forever hang and pull,

And worms of fire forever gnaw their food, That, still renew'd,

Freshens forever their perpetual pains.

3.

Others there were whom Baly's voice condemn'd By long and painful penance, to atone

Their fleshly deeds. Them from the Judgment Throne,

Dread Azyoruca, where she sat involved In darkness as a tent, received, and dealt To each the measure of his punishment; Till, in the central springs of fire, the Will Impure is purged away; and the freed soul,

Thus fitted to receive a second birth, Imbodied once again, revisits Earth.

But they whom Baly's righteous voice absolved, And Yamen, viewing with benignant eye, Dismiss'd to seek their heritage on high, How joyfully they leave this gloomy bourn, The dread sojourn Of Guilt and twin-born Punishment and Woe, And wild Remorse, here link'd with worse Despair ! They to the eastern Gate rejoicing go: The Ship of Heaven awaits their coming there; And on they sail, greeting the blessed light Through realms of upper air, Bound for the Swerga once ; but now no more Their voyage rests upon that happy shore, Since Indra, by the dreadful Rajah's might Compell'd, hath taken flight; On to the second World their way they wend,

And there, in trembling hope, await the doubtful end.

For still in them doth hope predominate, Faith's precious privilege, when higher Powers Give way to fear in these portentous hours. Behold the Wardens eight Each silent at his gate Expectant stands; they turn their anxious eyes Within, and listening to the dizzy din Of mutinous uproar, each in all his hands Holds all his weapons, ready for the fight. For, hark ! what clamorous cries Upon Kehama, for deliverance, call ! Come, Rajah! they exclaim; too long we groan In torments. Come, Deliverer! yonder throne Awaits thee. Now, Kehama ! Rajah, now ! Earthly Almighty, wherefore tarriest thou?-Such were the sounds that rung, in wild uproar, O'er all the echoing vaults of Padalon; And as the Asuras from the brazen floor, Struggling against their fetters, strove to rise, Their clashing chains were heard, and shricks and cries,

With curses mix'd, against the Fiends who urge, Fierce on their rebel limbs, the avenging scourge.

These were the sounds which, at the southern Gate, Assail'd Ereenia's ear; alighting here, He laid before Neroodi's feet the Maid, Who, pale and cold with fear, Hung on his neck, well nigh a lifeless weight.

7.

Who and what art thou? eried the Guardian Power, Sight so unwonted wondering to behold, -O Son of Light! Who comest here at this portentous hour, When Yamen's throne Trembles, and all our might can scarce keep down The rebel race from seizing Padalon,-Who and what art thou? and what wild despair, 77

Or wilder hope, from realms of upper air, Tempts thee to bear This mortal Maid to our forlorn abodes / Fitter for her, I ween, the Swerga bowers. And sweet society of heavenly Powers, Than this, - a doleful scene, Even in securest hours. And whither would ye go ' Alas! can human or celestial car Unmadden'd hear The shricks and yellings of infernal woe? Can living flesh and blood

Endure the passage of the fiery flood ! 8.

Lord of the Gate, replied the Glendoveer, We come obedient to the will of Fate; And haply doom'd to bring Hope and salvation to the Infernal King; For Seeva sends us here; Even He to whom futurity is known, The Holiest, bade us go to Yamen's throne. Thou seest my precious charge ; Under thy care, secure from harm, I leave her, While I ascend to bear her Father down. Beneath the shelter of thine arm receive her!

Then quoth he to the Maid, Be of good cheer, my Kailval! dearest dear, In faith subdue thy dread; Anon I shall be here. So having said, Aloft, with vigorous bound, the Glendoveer Sprung in celestial might, And soaring up, in spiral circles, wound llis indefatigable flight.

But as he thus departed, The Maid, who at Neroodi's feet was lying, Like one intranced or dying, Recovering strength from sudden terror, started; And, gazing after him, with straining sight And straining arms, she stood, As if in attitude To win him back from flight. Yea, she had shaped his name For utterance, to recall and bid him stay, Nor leave her thus alone; but virtuous shame Repress'd the unbidden sounds upon their way .

And calling faith to aid, Even in this fearful hour, the pious Maid Collected conrage, till she seem'd to be Calm and in hope; such power hath piety.

Before the Giant Keeper of the Gate She cross'd her patient arms, and at his feet Prepar'd to meet

The awful will of Fate with equal mind, She took her seat resign'd.

11.

Even the stern trouble of Neroodi's brow Relax'd as he beheld the valiant Maid. Hope, long unfelt till now, Rose in his heart reviving, and a smile

XXII.

Dawn'd in his brightening countenance, the while He gazed on her with wonder and delight. The blessing of the Powers of Padalon, Virgin, be on thee! said the admiring God; And o.essed oe the hour that gave thee birth, Daughter of Earth! For thou to this forlorn abode hast brought Hope, who too long hath been a stranger here. And surely for no lamentable lot, Nature, that erreth not, To thee that heart of fortitude hath given, Those eyes of purity, that face of love : ---If thou beëst not the inheritrix of Heaven, There is no truth above.

12.

Thus as Neroodi spake, his brow severe Shone with an inward joy; for sure he thought, When Seeva sent so fair a creature here, In this momentous hour, Erelong the World's deliverance would be wrought, And Padalon escape the Rajah's power. With pious mind the Maid, in humble guise Inclined, received his blessing silently, And raised her grateful eyes A moment, then again Abased them at his presence. Hark ! on high The sound of coming wings ! -- her anxious ears Have caught the distant sound. Ereenia brings His burden down ! Upstarting from her seat, How joyfully she rears Her eager head! and scarce upon the ground Ladurlad's giddy feet their footing found, When with her trembling arms she clasp'd him round. No word of greeting, No other sign of joy at that strange meeting; Expectant of their fate, Silent, and hand in hand, Before the Infernal Gate, The Father and his pious Daughter stand.

13.

Then to Neroodi said the Glendoveer, No Heaven-born Spirit e'er hath visited This region drear and dread, but I, the first Who tread your World accurs'd. Lord of the Gate, to whom these realms are known, Direct our fated way to Yamen's throne.

14.

Bring forth my Chariot, Carmala! quoth then The Keeper of the way. It was the Car wherein, On Yamen's festal day, When all the Powers of Hell attend their King, Yearly to Yamenpur did he repair To pay his homage there. Poised on a single wheel, it mov'd along, Instinct with motion; by what wondrous skill Compact, no human tongue could tell, Nor human wit devise; but on that wheel, Moving or still, As if with life indued, The Car miraculous supported stood.

15.

Then Carmala brought forth two mantles, white As the swan's breast, and bright as mountain snow, When from the wintry sky The sun, late rising, shines upon the height, And rolling vapors fill the vale below. Not without pain the unaccustom'd sight That brightness could sustain; For neither mortal stain, Nor parts corruptible, remain, Nor aught that time could touch, or force destroy, In that pure web whereof the robes were wrought; So long had it in tenfold fires been tried, And blanch'd, and to that brightness purified. Apparell'd thus, alone, Children of Earth, Neroodi cried, In safety may ye pass to Yamen's throne. Thus only can your living flesh and blood Endure the passage of the fiery flood.

16.

Of other frame, O son of Heaven, art thou ! Yet hast thou now to go Through regions which thy heavenly mould will try. Glories unutterably bright, I know,

And beams intense of empyrean light, Thine eye divine can bear; but fires of woe, The sight of torments, and the cry Of absolute despair,— Might not these things dismay thee on thy flight,

And thy strong pennons flag and fail thee there? Trust not thy wings, celestial though thou art,

Nor thy good heart, which horror might assail, And pity quail,

Pity in these abodes of no avail; But take thy seat this mortal pair beside, And Carmala the infernal Car will guide. Go, and may happy end your way betide ! So, as he spake, the self-moved Car roll'd on; And lo ! they pass the Gate of Padalon.

XXIII.

PADALON.

1.

WHOE'ER hath loved, with venturous step, to tread The chambers dread Of some deep cave, and seen his taper's beam Lost in the arch of darkness overhead,

And mark'd its gleam,

Playing afar upon the sunless stream, Where from their secret bed,

And course unknown and inaeccessible, The silent waters well, --

Whoe'er hath trod such caves of endless night, He knows, when measuring back the gloomy way, With what delight refresh'd, his eye

Perceives the shadow of the light of day, Through the far portal slanting, where it falls Dimly reflected on the watery walls; How heavenly seems the sky; And how, with quicken'd feet, he hastens up, Eager again to greet The 'ving World and blessed sunshine there, And drink, as from a cup

Of joy, with thirsty lips, the open air.

2.

Far other light than that of day there shone Upon the travellers, entering Padalon.
They too in darkness enter'd on their way, But far before the Car,
A glow, as of a fiery furnace light,
Fill'd all before them. 'Twas a light which made Darkness itself appear
A thing of comfort, and the sight, dismay'd,
Shrunk inward from the molten atmosphere.
Their way was through the adamantine rock
Which girt the World of Woe; on either side Its massive walls arose, and overhead
Arch'd the long passage; onward as they ride,
With stronger glare the light around them spread,

And lo! the regions dread, The World of Woe before them, opening wide.

3.

There rolls the fiery flood, Girding the realms of Padalon around. A sea of flame it seem'd to be, Sea without bound; For neither mortal nor immortal sight Could pierce across through that intensest light. A single rib of steel, Keen as the edge of keenest cimeter, Spann'd this wide gulf of fire. The infernal

Car Roll'd to the Gulf, and, on its single wheel Self-balanced, rose upon that edge of steel.

Red-quivering float the vapors overhead; The fiery gulf, beneath them spread, Tosses its billowing blaze with rush and roar; Steady and swift the self-moved Chariot went, Winning the long ascent,

Then, downward rolling, gains the farther shore.

But, oh ! what sounds and sights of woe, What sights and sounds of fear, Assail the mortal travellers here ! Their way was on a causey straight and wide, Where penal vaults on either side were seen, Ranged like the cells wherein Those wondrous winged alchemists infold Their stores of liquid gold. Thick walls of adamant divide The dungeons; and from yonder cireling flood, Off-streams of fire through secret channels glide, And wind among them, and in each provide An everlasting food Of rightful torments for the accursed brood.

5. These were the rebel race, who, in their might Confiding impiously, would fain have driven The deities supreme from highest Heaven ; But by the Suras, in celestial fight, Opposed and put to flight, Here, in their penal dens, the accursed crew, Not for its crime, but for its failure, rue Their wild ambition. Yet again they long The contest to renew, And wield their arms again in happier hour; And with united power, Following Kehama's triumph, to press on From World to World, and Heaven to Heaven, and Sphere To Sphere, till Hemakoot shall be their own, And Meru Mount, and Indra's Swerga-Bowers, And Brama's region, where the heavenly Hours Weave the vast circle of his age-long day. Even over Veeshnoo's empyreal seat They trust the Rajah shall extend their sway, And that the seven-headed Snake, whereon The strong Preserver sets his conquering feet, Will rise and shake him headlong from his throne, When, in their irresistible array, Amid the Milky Sea they force their way. Even higher yet their frantic thoughts aspire ; Yea, on their beds of torment as they lie, The highest, holiest Seeva, they defy, And tell him they shall have anon their day, When they will storm his realm, and seize Mount Calasay.

Such impious hopes torment Their raging hearts, impious and impotent; And now, with unendurable desire And lust of vengeance, that, like inward fire, Doth aggravate their punishment, they rave Upon Kehama; him the accursed rout Acclaim; with furious cries and maddening shout They call on him to save; Kehama! they exclaim; Thundering the dreadful eelor rolls about, And Hell's whole vault repeats Kehama's name.

7.

Over these dens of punishment, the host Of Padalon maintain eternal guard, Keeping upon the walls their vigilant ward. At every angle stood A watch-tower, the decurion Demon's post, Where raised on high he view'd with sleepless eye His trust, that all was well. And over these, -Such was the perfect discipline of Hell, -Captains of fifties and of hundreds held Authority, each in his loftier tower; And chiefs of legions over them had power; And thus all Hell with towers was girt around. Aloft the brazen turrets shone In the red light of Padalon; And on the walls between, Dark moving, the infernal Guards were seen, Gigantic Demons, pacing to and fro;

XXIII.

Who, ever and anon

Spreading their crimson pennons, plunged below, Faster to rivet down the Asuras' chains, And with the snaky scourge and fiercer pains, Repress their rage rebellious. Loud around, In mingled sound, the echoing lash, the clash Of chains, the ponderous hammer's iron stroke, With execrations, groans, and shrieks, and cries, Combined, in one wild dissonance, arise; And through the din there broke, Like thunder heard through all the warring winds, The dreadful name. Kehama, still they rave, Hasten and save !

Now, now, Deliverer ! now, Kehama, now ! Earthly Almighty, wherefore tarriest thou?

Oh, if that name abhorr'd, Thus utter'd, could well nigh Dismay the Powers of Hell, and daunt their Lord, How fearfully to Kailyal's ear it came ! She, as the car roll'd on its rapid way, Bent down her head, and closed her eyes for dread ; And deafening, with strong effort from within, Her ears against the din, Cover'd and press'd them close with both her hands. Sure, if the mortal Maiden had not fed On heavenly food, and long been strengthened With heavenly converse for such end vouchsafed, Her human heart had fail'd, and she had died Beneath the horrors of this awful hour. But Heaven supplied a power Beyond her earthly nature, to the measure Of need infusing strength; And Fate, whose secret and unerring pleasure Appointed all, decreed An ample meed and recompense at length. High-fated Maid, the righteous hour is nigh ! The all-embracing eye Of Retribution still beholdeth thee;

Bear onward to the end, O Maid, courageously ! 9.

On roll'd the car, and lo! afar Upon its height the towers of Yamenpur Rise on the astonish'd sight. Behold the infernal City, Yamen's seat Of empire, in the midst of Padalon, Where the eight causeys meet. There, on a rock of adamant, it stood, Resplendent far and wide, Itself of solid diamond edified, And all around it roll'd the fiery flood. Eight bridges arch'd the stream; huge piles of brass Magnificent, such structures as beseem The Seat and Capital of such great God, Worthy of Yamen's own august abode. A brazen tower and gateway at each end Of each was raised, where Giant Wardens stood, Station'd in arms the passage to defend, That never foe might cross the fiery flood.

Oh, what a gorgeous sight it was to see The Diamond City blazing on its height With more than mid-sun splendor, by the light Of its own fiery river!

Its towers, and domes, and pinnacles, and spires, Turrets and battlements, that flash and quiver Through the red, restless atmosphere forever;

And hovering overhead,

The smoke and vapors of all Padalon, Fit firmament for such a world, were spread, With surge, and swell, and everlasting motion, Heaving and opening like tumultuous ocean.

11.

Nor were there wanting there Such glories as bescem'd such region well; For though with our blue heaven and genial air The firmament of Hell might not compare, As little might our earthly tempests vie With the dread storms of that infernal sky, Whose clouds of all metallic elements Sublimed were full. For, when its thunder broke, Not all the united World's artillery, In one discharge, could equal that loud stroke; And though the Diamond Towers and Battlements Stood firm upon their adamantine rock, Yet while it volleyed round the vanlt of Hell, Earth's solid arch was shaken with the shock, And Cities in one mighty ruin fell.

Through the red sky terrific meteors scour; Huge stones come hailing down; or sulphurshower.

> Floating amid the lurid air like snow, Kindles in its descent,

And with blue fire-drops rains on all below. At times the whole supernal element, Igniting, burst in one vast sheet of flame, And roar'd as with the sound Of rushing winds, above, helow, around, Anon the flame was spent, and overhead A heavy cloud of moving darkness spread.

12.

Straight to the brazen bridge and gate The self-moved Chariot bears its mortal load. At sight of Carmala, On either side the Giant Guards divide, And give the charlot way. Up yonder winding road it rolls along, Swift as the hittern soars on spiral wing,

And lo ! the Palace of the Infernal King !

13.

Two forms inseparable in unity Hath Yamen; even as with hope or fear The Soul regardeth him doth he appear; For hope and fear.

At that dread hour, from ominous conscience spring,

And err not in their bodings. Therefore some, They who polluted with offences come,

Behold him as the King Of Terrors, black of aspect, red of eye, Reflecting back upon the sinful mind, Heighten'd with vengeance, and with wrath divine, Its own inborn deformity.

But to the righteous Spirit how benign His awful countenance, Where, tempering justice with parental love, Goodness, and heavenly grace, And sweetest mercy shine ! Yet is he still Himself the same, one form, one face, one will; And these his twofold aspects are but one; And change is none In him for change in Yamen could not be; The Immutable is he.

He sat upon a marble sepulchre, Massive and huge, where, at the Monarch's feet, The righteous Baly had his Judgment-seat. A Golden Throne before them vacant stood; Three human forms sustain'd its ponderous weight, With lifted hands outspread, and shoulders bow'd Bending beneath the load.

A fourth was wanting. They were of the hue Of coals of fire; yet were they flesh and blood, And living breath they drew;

And their red eyeballs roll'd with ghastly stare, As thus, for their misdeeds, they stood tormented there.

On steps of gold those living Statues stood, Who bore the Golden Throne. A cloud behind Immovable was spread; not all the light Of all the flaines and fires of Padalon Could pierce its depth of night. There Azyoruea veil'd her awful form In those eternal shadows: there she sat, And as the trembling Souls, who erowd around

The Judgment-seat, received the doom of fate, Her giant arms, extending from the cloud, Drew them within the darkness. Moving out To grasp and bear away the innumerous rout, Forever and forever thus were seen The thousand mighty arms of that dread Queen.

16.

Ilere, issuing from the Car, the Glendoveer
Did homage to the God, then raised his head.
Suppliants we come, he said,
I need not tell thee by what wrongs oppress'd,
For nought can pass on earth to thee unknown;

Sufferers from tyranny we seek for rest, And Seeva bade us go to Yamen's throne ;

Here, he hath said, all wrongs shall be redress'd. Yamen replied, Even now the hour draws near,

When Fate its hidden ways will manifest. Not for light purpose would the Wisest send His suppliants here, when we, in doubt and fear,

The awful issue of the honr attend. Wait ye in patience and in faith the end !

XXIV.

THE AMREETA.

1.

So spake the King of Padalon, when, lo ! The voice of lamentation ceas'd in Hell, And sudden silence all around them fell, Silence more wild and terrible Than all the infernal dissonance before. Through that portentous stillness, far away, Unwonted sounds were heard, advancing on And deepening on their way; For now the inexorable hour Was come, and, in the fulness of his power, Now that the dreadful rites had all been done, Kehama from the Swerga hastened down To seize upon the throne of Padalon.

-2

He came in all his might and majesty, With all his terrors clad, and all his pride; And, by the attribute of Deity, Which he had won from Heaven, self-multiplied, The Almighty Man appear'd on every side. In the same indivisible point of time, At the eight Gates he stood at once, and beat The Warden-Gods of Hell beneath his feet; Then, in his brazen Cars of triumph, straight, At the same moment, drove through every gate. By Aullays, hugest of created kind, Fiercest, and fleeter than the viewless wind, His Cars were drawn, ten yokes of ten abreast, -What less sufficed for such almighty weight? Eight bridges from the fiery flood arose, Growing before his way; and on he goes, And drives the thundering Chariot-wheels along, At once o'er all the roads of Padalon.

3.

Silent and motionless remain The Asuras on their bed of pain, Waiting, with breathless hope, the great event. All Hell was hush'd in dread, Such awe that omnipresent coming spread; Nor had its voice been heard, though all its rout Innumerable had lifted up one shout; Nor, if the infernal firmament Had in one unimaginable burst Spent its collected thunders, had the sound Been audible, such louder terrors went Before his forms substantial. Round about The presence scattered lightnings far and wide, That quench'd on every side, With their intensest blaze, the feebler fire Of Padalon, even as the stars go out, When, with prodigious light, Some blazing meteor fills the astonish'd night.

4.

The Diamond City shakes! The adamantine Rock Is loosen'd with the shoek! From its foundation moved, it heaves and quakes,

XXIII.

The brazen portals, crumbling, fall to dust; Prone fall the Giant Guards Beneath the Aullays crush'd ; On, on, through Yamenpur, their thundering feet Speed from all points to Yamen's Judgment-seat. And lo! where multiplied, Behind, before him, and on every side, Wielding all weapons in his countless hands, Around the Lord of Hell Kehama stands! Then, too, the Lord of Hell put forth his might: Thick darkness, blacker than the blackest night, Rose from their wrath, and veil'd The unutterable fight. The power of Fate and Sacrifice prevail'd, And soon the strife was done. Then did the Man-God reassume His unity, absorbing into one The consubstantiate shapes; and as the gloom Opened, fallen Yamen on the ground was seen, His neck beneath the conquering Rajah's feet, Who on the marble tomb Had his triumphal seat.

5.

Silent the Man-Almighty sat; a smile Gleam'd on his dreadful lips, the while, Dallying with power, he paused from following up His conquest, as a man in social hour Sips of the grateful cup, Again and yet again, with eurious taste, Searching its subtile flavor ere he drink ; Even so Kehama now forbore his haste, Having within his reach whate'er he sought. On his own haughty power he seem'd to muse, Pampering his arrogant heart with silent thought. Before him stood the Golden Throne in sight, Right opposite; he could not choose but see, Nor seeing choose but wonder. Who are ye Who bear the Golden Throne tormented there? He cried; for whom doth Destiny prepare The Imperial Seat? and why are ye but Three?

6.

FIRST STATUE.

I of the Children of Mankind was first, Me miserable ! who, adding store to store, Heap'd np superfluous wealth ; and now accurs'd, Forever I the frantic crime deplore.

SECOND STATUE.

I o'er my Brethren of Mankind the first Usurping power, set up a throne sublime, A King and Conqueror; therefore thus accurst, Forever I in vain repent the crime.

THIRD STATUE.

I on the Children of Mankind the first, In God's most holy name, imposed a tale Of impious falsehood; therefore thus accurst, Forever I in vain the crime bewail.

7.

Even as thou here beholdest us, Here we have stood, tormented thus, Such countless ages, that they seem to be Long as eternity ; And still we are but Three. A Fourth will come to share Our pain, at yonder vacant corner bear His portion of the burden, and complete The Golden Throne for Yamen's Judgment-seat. Thus hath it been appointed : he must be Equal in guilt to us, the guilty Three. Kehama, come ! too long we wait for thee !

8.

Thereat, with one accord, The Three took up the word, like choral song, Come, Rajah ! Man-God ! Earth's Almighty Lord ! Kehama, come ! we wait for thee too long.

9.

A short and sudden laugh of wondering pride Burst from him in his triumph : to reply Scornful he deign'd not; but with alter'd eye, Wherein some doubtful meaning seem'd to lie, He turn'd to Kailyal. Maiden, thus he cried, I need not bid thee see How vain it is to strive with Fate's decree, When hither thou hast fled to fly from me, And lo! even here thou find'st me at thy side. Mine thou must be, being doom'd with me to share The Amreeta cup of immortality ; Yea, by Myself I swear, It hath been thus appointed. Joyfully Join then thy hand, and heart, and will with mine. Nor at such glorious destiny repine, Nor in thy folly more provoke my wrath divine.

I0.

She answer'd, I have said. It must not be ! Almighty as thou art, Thou hast put all things underneath thy feet ; But still the resolute heart And virtuous will are free. Never, oh ! never, — never — can there be Communion, Rajah, between thee and me.

Π.

Once more, quoth he, I urge, and once alone. Thou seest yon Golden Throne, Where I anon shall set thee by my side; Take thou thy seat thereon, Kehama's willing bride, And I will place the Kingdoms of the World Beneath thy Father's feet, Appointing him the King of mortal men : Else underneath that Throne, The Fourth supporter he shall stand and groan; Prayers will be vain to move my mercy then.

12.

Again the Virgin answer'd, I have said! Ladurlad caught her in his proud embrace, While on his neek she hid In agony her face.

13.

Bring forth the Amreeta-cup! Kehama cried To Yamen, rising sternly in his pride.

It is within the Marble Sepulchre, The vanquish'd Lord of Padalon replied; Bid it be open'd. Give thy treasure up ! Exclaim'd the Man-Almighty to the Tomh. And at his voice and look The massy fabric shook, and open'd wide. A huge Anatomy was seen reclined Within its marble womb. Give me the Cnp ! Again Kehama cried; no other charm Was needed than that voice of stern command. From his repose the ghastly form arose, Put forth his bony and gigantic arm, And gave the Amreeta to the Rajah's hand. Take . drink ! with accents dread the Spectre said ; For thee and Kailyal hath it been assign'd, Ye only of the Children of Mankind.

Then was the Man-Almighty's heart elate; This is the consummation! he exclaim'd; Thus have 1 triumphed over Death and Fate. Now, Seeva! look to thine abode! Henceforth, on equal footing we engage, Alike immortal now; and we shall wage Our warfare, God to God! Joy fill'd his impious soul, And to his lips he raised the fatal bowl.

15.

Thus long the Glendoveer had stood Watching the wonders of the eventful hour, Amazed, but undismay'd; for in his heart Faith, overcoming fear, maintain'd its power. Nor had that faith abated, when the God Of Padalon was beaten down in fight; For then he look'd to see the heavenly might Of Seeva break upon them. But when now He saw the Amreeta in Kehama's hand, An impulse which defied all self-command In that extremity Stung him, and he resolved to seize the cup, And dare the Rajah's force in Seeva's sight. Forward he sprung to tempt the unequal fray,

When, lo! the Anatomy With warning arm, withstood his desperate way, And from the Golden Throne the Fiery Three Again, in one accord, renew'd their song — Kehama, come! we wait for thee too long.

O fool of drunken hope and frantic vice! Madman! to seek for power beyond thy scope Of knowledge, and to deem Less than Omniscience could suffice To wield Omnipotence! O fool, to dream That immortality could be

The meed of evil ! — yea, thou hast it now, Victim of thine own wicked heart's device; Thou hast thine object now, and now must pay the price.

He did not know the holy mystery Of that divinest cnp, that as the lips Which touch it, even such its quality, Good or malignant: Madman! and he thinks The blessed prize is won, and joyfully he drinks.

18.

Then Seeva open'd on the Accursed One His Eye of Anger : upon him alone The wrath-beam fell. He shudders — but too late ; The deed is done ; The dreadful liquor works the will of Fate. Immortal he would be, Immortal he is made ; but through his veins Torture at once and immortality, A stream of poison doth the Amreeta run, And while within the burning anguish flows, His outward body glows,

Like molten ore, beneath the avenging Eye, Doom'd thus to live and burn eternally.

19.

The Fiery Three, Beholding him, set up a fiendish ery, A song of jubilee ! Come, Brother, come ! they sung; too long Have we expected thee; Henceforth we bear no more

The unequal weight. Come, Brother, we are Four !

20.

Vain his almightiness, for mightier pain Subdued all power; pain ruled supreme alone; And yielding to the bony hand The unemptied cup, he moved toward the Throne, And at the vacant corner took his stand. Behold the Golden Throne at length complete,

And Yamen silently ascends the Judgment-seat.

For two alone, of all mankind, to me The Amreeta Cup was given, Then said the Anatomy;

The Man hath drank, the Woman's turn is next. Come, Kailyal, come, receive thy doom, And do the Will of Heaven ! —

Wonder, and Fear, and Awe at once perplex'd The mortal Maiden's heart; but over all Hope rose triumphant. With a trembling hand, Obedient to his call,

She took the fated Cup; and, lifting up Her eyes, where holy tears began to swell, Is it not your command,

Ye heavenly Powers? as on her knees she fell, The pious Virgin cried;

Ye know my innocent will, my heart sincere ; Ye govern all things still, And wherefore should I fear?

22.

She said, and drank. The Eye of Mercy beam'd Upon the Maid : a cloud of fragrance steam'd Like incense-smoke as all her mortal frame Dissolved beneath the potent agency Of that mysterious dranght; such quality From her pure touch the fated Cup partook. Like one entranced she knelt, Feeling her body melt

XXIV.

'NOTES TO THE CURSE OF KEHAMA.

Till all but what was heavenly pass'd away: Yet still she felt Her Spirit strong within her, the same heart,

With the same loves, and all her heavenly part Unchang'd, and ripen'd to such perfect state In this miraculous birth, as here on Earth, Dimly our holiest hopes anticipate.

23.

Mine ! mine ! with rapturous joy Ereenia cried, Immortal now, and yet not more divine; Mine, mine, - forever mine ! The immortal Maid replied, Forever, ever thine !

21.

Then Yamen said, O thou to whom by Fate, Alone of all mankind, this lot is given, Daughter of Earth, but now the Child of Heaven ! Go with thy heavenly Mate, Partaker now of his immortal bliss; Go to the Swerga Bowers, And there recall the hours Of endless happiness.

25.

But that sweet Angel, - for she still retain'd Her human loves and human piety, ---As if reluctant at the God's commands, Linger'd, with anxious eye Upon her Father fix'd, and spread her hands Toward him wistfully. Go! Yamen said, nor east that look behind Upon Ladurlad at this parting hour,

For thou shalt find him in thy Mother's Bower.

96

The Car-for Carmala his word obey'd-Moved on, and bore away the Maid, While from the Golden Throne the Lord of Death With love benignant on Ladurlad smiled, And gently on his head his blessing laid. As sweetly as a Child, Whom neither thought disturbs nor care encumbers, Tired with long play, at close of summer day,

Lies down and slumbers,

Even thus, as sweet a boon of sleep partaking, By Yamen blest, Ladurlad sunk to rest.

Blessed that sleep! more blessed was the waking! For on that night a heavenly morning broke; The light of heaven was round him when he woke ; And in the Swerga, in Yedillian's Bower,

All whom he loved he met, to part no more.

NOTES.

Calmly she took her scat. - I. 10, p. 560.

"SHE," says Bernier, " whom I saw burn herself, when I parted from Surat to travel into Persia, in the presence of Monsiour Chardin of Paris, and of many English and Dutch, was of a middle age, and not unhandsome. To represent unto yon burnt ; I believe she was not above twelve years of ege. This the undanneed cheorfulness that appeared in her countenance, the resolution with which she marched, washed herself, spoke to the people ; the coofidence with which she looked upon us, viewed her little cabin, made up of very dry millet-straw and small wood, went into this cabin, and sat down upon the pile, and took her husband's head into her lap, and a torch into ber own hand, and kindled the cabin, whilst I know not how many Brahmans were busy in kindling the fire round about. To represent to you, I say, all this as it ought, is not possible for me; I can et present scarce believe it myself, though it be but a few days since I saw it."

They strip her ornaments away. - I. II, p. 569.

She went out again to the river, and taking up some water in her hands, muttered some prayers, and offered it to the sun. All her ornaments were then taken from her; and her armlets were broken, and chaplets of white flowers were put npon her neck and hands. Her hair was tucked up with five combs; and her forehead was marked with clay in the same manner as that of her husband. - STAVOBINUS.

Around her neck they leave The marriage-knot alone. - I. II, p. 569.

When the time for consummating the marriage is come, they light the fire Homao with the wood of Ravasiton. The Brainin blesses the former, which, being done, the bridegroom takes three handfuls of rice, and throws it on the bride's head, who does the same to him. Afterwards the bride's father clothes her in a dress according to his condition, and washes the bridegroom's feet; the bride's mother observing to pour out the water. This being done, the father puts his daughter's hand in his own, puts water into it, some pieces of money, and, giving it to the bridegroom, says, at the same time, 1 have no longer any thing to do with yon, and I give you np to the power of snother. The Tali, which is a ribbon with a golden bead hanging at it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridegroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride's neck. This knot is what particularly secures his possession of her; for before he had had the Tali on, all the rest of the ceremonies might have been made to no purpose; for it has sometimes happened that when the bridegroom was going to fix it on, the bride's father has discovered his not being satisfied with the bridegroom's gift, when another, offering more, has carried off the bride with her father's consent. But, when once the Tali is put on, the marringe is indissoluble; and whenever the busband dies, the Tali is burnt along with him, to show that the marriage bands are broke. Besides these particular ceremonies, the people have notice of the wedding by a Pandal, which is raised hefore the bride's door some days before. The whole concludes with an entertainment which the bride's father gives to the common friends; and during this festivity, which continues five days, alms are given to the poor, and the fire Homan is kept in. The seventh day, the new-married couple set out for the bridegroom's house, whither they frequently go by torchlight. The bride and bridegroom are carried in a sedan, pass through the chief streets of the city, and are accompanied by their friends, who are either on horseback nr mounted on elephants. - A. ROGER.

They force her on, they bind her to the dead. - I. 12, p. 569

"Tis true, says Bernier, that I have seen some of them, which, at the sight of the pile and the fire, appeared to have some apprehension, and that perbaps would have gone back. Those demons the Bramins that are there with their great sticks, astonish them, and hearten them up, or even thrust them in; as I have seen it done to a young woman, that retreated five or six paces from the pile, and to another, that was much disturbed when she saw the fire take bold of ber clothes, these executioners thrusting ber in with their long poles.

At Lahor, I saw a very handsome and a very young woman poor unhappy creature appeared rather dead than alive when she came near the pile; she shook and wept hitterly. Meanwhile, three or four of these executioners, the Branins, together with an old hag that held her under the arm, thrust her on, and made her sit down upon the wood; and lest she should run away, they tied her legs and hands; and so they burnt her alive. I had enough to do to contain myself for indignation. — BERVER.

Pietro della Valle coaversed with a widow who was about to bura herself by her own choica. She told bim, inat generally speaking, women were not forced to buru themselves; hut sometimes, among people of rank, when a young woman, who was handsome, was left a widow, and in danger of marrying again, (which is never practised among them, because of the confusion and disgrace which are inseparable from such a thing.) or of falling into other irregularities, then indeed the relations of the husband, if they are at all tenacious of the honor of the family, compel her to burn herself, whether she likes it or no, merely to prevent the inconveniences which might take place.

Dellon also, whom I consider as one of the best travellers in the East, expressly asserts, that widows are hurnt there 'de gré, ou de force. L'on n'ca voit que trop qui après avoir Résiré et demandé la mort avec un courage intrepide, et après avoir obtenu et achété la permission de se brûler, out tremblé à la veuë du bucher, se sont repenties, mais trop turd, de leur in prudence, et ont fait d'inutiles efforts pour se retrater. Muis lorsque cela arrive, bien loin que les Brameues soient touchés d'aucune pitié, ils lient cruellement ces malheureuses, et les brilent par force, sans avoir aucun égard à leurs plaintes, ni à leurs cris.'' — Tom. i. p. 138.

It would be easy to multiply authorities upon this point. Let it suffice to mention one important historical fact : When the great Albequerque had established himself at Gon, he forbade these accursed sacrifices ; the women extelled him for it as their benefacter and deliverer, (Commentarios de Alb. ii. 20,) and no European in India was ever so popular, or so revered hy the natives. Yet, if we are to believe the anti-missionaries, none but fools, fanatics, and pretenders to humanity, would wish to deprive the Hindoo women of the right of burning themselves! "It may be useful (says Colonel Mark Wilks) to examine the reasonableness of interfering with the most exceptionable of all their institutions. It has been thought an abomination not to be tolerated, that a widow should immolate herself on the funeral pile of her deceased husband. But what judgment should we form of the Hindoo, who (if any of our institutions admitted the parallel) should forcibly pretend to stand between a Christian and the hope of eternal salvation? And shall we not hold him to be a driveller ia politics and morals, a fanatic in religion, and a pretender in humanity, who would foreibly wrest this hope from the Hindoo widow ?" - Historical Sketches of the South of India, vol. i. p. 499.

Such opinions, and such language, may safely be left to the indignation and pity which they cannot fail to excite. I shall only express my astonishment, that any thing so monstrous, and so miserably futile, should have proceeded from a man of learning, great good sense, and general good feelings, as Calonel Wilks evidently appears to be.

One drops, another plunges in. - 1. 14, p. 569.

When Bernier was passing from Amad-Avad to Agra, there came news to him in a borough, where the caravan rested under the shale, (staying for the cool of the evening to march on their journey,) that a woman was then upon the point of burning herself with the body of her husband. I presently rose, says he, and ran to the place where it was to be done, which was great pit, with a pile of wood raised in it, whereon I saw laid a dead corpse and a woman, which, at a distance, seemed to me pretty fair, sitting near it on the same pile, besides four or five Bramins putting the fire to it from all sides ; five women of a middle age, and well enough dressed, holding one another by the hand, and dancing about the pit, and a great crowd of people, men and women, looking on. The pile of wood was presently nil on fire, hecause store of oil and butter had been thrown upon it : and I saw, at the same of the woman, that were imbued with well-scented oils, ningled with powder of sandal and saffron. All this I saw, but observed not that the woman was at all disturbed ; yea, it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce, with great force, these two words, fire, two, to signify, according to the opinion of those that hold the soul's transmigration, that this was the fifth time she had burnt herself with the same husband, and that there remained hut two more for perfection; as if sho had that time this remembrance, or some prophetical spirit. But here ended not this infernal tragedy : I thought it was only by way of coremony that these five women sung and danced about the pit; but I was altogether surprised when I saw that the flame having taken hold of the clothes of one of them, she cast herself, with her head foremost, into the pit, and that after her, another, being overcome by the flame and the smoke, did the like; and my astonishment reduchled afterwards, when I saw that the remaining three took one another again by the hand, continued their dance without any apparent fear; and that at length they precipitated themselves, one after another, into the fire, as their companions had done. I learnt that these had been five slaves, who, having seen their mistress extremely afflicted at the sickness of her hasband, and heard her promise him, that she would not survive him, but burn herself with him, were so touched with compassion and tenderness towards this their mistress, that they engaged themselves in a promise to follow her in her resolution, and to burn themselves with her. - BERNIER.

time, through the flames, that the fire took hold of the clothes

This excellent traveller relates an extraordinary circumstance which occurred at one of these sacrifices. A woman was engaged in some love-intrigues with a young Mahomedan, her neighbor, who was a tailor, and could play finely upon the tabor. This woman, in the hopes she had of marrying this young man, poisoned her husband, and presently came away to tell the tailor, that it was time to be gone together, as they had projected, or else she should be obliged to burn herself. The young man, fearing lest he might be entangled in a mischievous business, flatly refused her. The woman, not at all surprised at it, went to her relations, and advertised them of the sudden death of her husband, and openly protested that she would not survive him, but burn herself with him. Her kindred, well satisfied with so generous a resolution, and the great honor she did to the whole family, presently had a pit made and filled with wood, exposing the corpse upon it, and kindling the fire. All being prepared, the woman goes to embrace and bid farewell to all her kindred that were there about the pit, among whom was also the tailor, who had been invited to play upon the tabor that day, with many others of that sort of men, according to the custom of the country. This fury of a woman being also come to this young man, made sign as if she would bid him farewell with the rest; but, instead of gently embracing him, she taketh him with all her force about his collar, pulls him to the pit, and tumbleth him, together with herself, into the ditch, where they both were soon despatched. - BERNIER.

The Hindows sometimes erect a chapel on the spot where one of three sacrifices has been performed, both on account of the soul of the deceased, and as a trophy of her virtue. I remember to have seen one of these places, where the spot on which the funeral pile had been erected, was enclosed and covered with bomboos, formed into a kind of bower, planted with flowering creepers. The inside was set round with flowers, and at one end there was an image. — CaNFURD.

Some of the Yogees, who smear themselves with ashes, use none but what they collect from funeral piles, --humon ashes!--PIETRO DELLA VALLE.

From a late investigation, it appears, that the number of women who sacrifice themselves within thirty miles round Calcutta every year, is, on an average, upwords of two hundred. The Pundits have already been called on to produce the snation of their Shasters for this custom. The passages exhibited are vague and general in their meaning, and differently interpreted by the same casts. Some sacred verses commend the practice, but none command it; and the l'undits refer once more to custom. They have, however, intimited, that if government will pass a regulation, amercing by fine every Brahmin who attends a burning, or every Zemudar who permits him to attend it, tho practice cannot possibly long continue; for that the eccemony, unstanctified by the presence of the priests, will lose its dignity and consequence in the eves of the people.

The civilized world may expect soon to hear of the abolition of this opprobrium of a Christian administration, the female sacrifice ; which has subsisted, to our certain knowledge, since the time of Alexander the Great. - CLAUDIUS BUCHANAN.

This practice, however, was manifestly unknown when the Institutes of Menu were written. Instructions are there given for the conduct of a widow : " Let her," it is said, conaciate her body, by living voluntarily on pure flowers, roots, and fruit; but let her not, when her lord is deceased, even pronounce the name of another man. Let her continue till death forgiving all injuries, performing harsh duties, avoiding every sensual pleasure, and cheerfully practising the incomparable rules of virtue, which have been followed by such women as were devoted to one only husband. Many thousands of Brahmins, having avoided sensuality from their carly youth, and having left no issue in their families, have asconded nevertheless to heaven; and, like those abstemious men, a virtuous wife ascends to heaven, though she have no child, if, after the decease of her lord, she devote herself to pious austerity; but a widow, who, from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased hushand by marrying again, brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the seat of her lord."- Inst. of Menu, ch. 5, 157-161.

Second marriages were permitted to men. - Ibid., 167, 8, 9.

Lo! Arvalan appears. - 11. 1, p. 569.

Many believe that some souls are sent back to the spot where their bodies were burnt, or where their ashes are preserved, to wait there until the new bodies they are destined to occupy he ready for their reception. This appears to correspond with an opinion of Plato, which, with namy other tenets of that philosopher, was adopted by the early Christians; and an ordinance of the Romish church is still extant, prohibiting having lights or making merriment in church-yards at hight, lest they should disturb the souls that might come thither. - CRAWFURD.

According to the Danish missionaries, the souls of those who are untimely slain wander about as diabolical spectres, doing evil to mankind, and possessing those whom they persceute. - NIECAMP, i. 10, § 14.

The inhabitants of the hills near Rajamahall believe that when God sends a messenger to summon a person to his presence, if the messenger should mistake his object, and carry off another, he is desired by the Deity to take him away; but as the earthly mansion of this soul must be decayed, it is destined to remain mid-way between heaven and earth, and never can return to the presence of God. Whoever commits homicide without a divine order, and whoever is killed by a snuke, as a punishment for some concealed crime, will be doomed to the same state of wandering ; and whoever hangs himself will wander eternally with a rope about his neck. Asiat. Researches.

Pope Benedict XII, drew up a list of 117 heretical opinions held by the Armenian Christians, which he sent to the king of Armenia, --- instead of any other assistance, when that prince applied to him for aid against the Mahomedans. This piper was first published by Bernino, and exhibits a curious mixture of mythologies. One of their opinions was, that the souls of the adult wander about in the air till the day of judgment ; neither hell, nor the heavenly, nor the terrestrial paradise, being open to them till that day shall have passed.

Davemant, in one of his plays, speculates upon such a state of wandering as the lot of the soul after death : --

> I must to darkness go, hover in clouds, Or in remote untroubled air, silent As thought, or what is uncreated yet; Or I must rest in some cold shade, and shall Perhaps ne'er see that everlasting spring Of which philosophy so long has dreamt, And seems rather to wish than understand.

Love and Honor.

I know no other author who has so often expressed to those who could understand him, his doubts respecting a future state, and how burdensome he felt them

Undying as I am ! - 11. 3, p. 570.

The Soul is not a thing of which a man may say, it hath been, it is about to be, or is to be hereafter ; for it is a thing without birth ; it is ancient, constant, and eternal, and is not to be destroyed in this its mortal frame. How can the man who believeth that this thing is incorruptible, eternal, inexhaustible, and without hirth, think that he can either kill or cause it to be killed ! As a man throweth away old garments and putteth on new, even so the Soul, having quitted its old mortal frames, entereth into others which are new. The weapon divideth it not, the fire burneth it not, the water corrupteth it not, the wind drieth it not away ; - for it is indivisible, inconsumable, incorruptible, and is not to be dried away - it is eternal, universal, permanent, immovable ; it is invisible, inconceivable, and unalterable. - BHAGVAT GEETA.

It was my hour of folly. - H. 5, p. 570.

" Among the qualities required for the proper execution of public business, mention is made, ' That a man must be abla to keep in subjection his lust, his anger, his avariee, his folly, and his pride.' The folly there specified is not to be understood in the usual sense of the word in an European idiom, as a negative quality, or the mere want of sense, but as a kind of obstinately stupid lethargy, or perverse absence of mind, in which the will is not altogether passive : it seems to he a weakoess peculiar to Asia, for we cannot find a term by which to express the precise idea in the European languages It operates somewhat like the violent impulse of fear, under which men will utter falsehoods totally incompatible with each other, and utterly contrary to their own opinion, knowledge, and conviction ; and, it may be added, also, their inclination and intention.

" A very remarkable instance of this temporary frenzy happened lately in the supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta, where a man (not an idiot) swore, upon a trial, that he was no kind of relation to his brother, who was then in Court, and who had constantly supported him from his infancy; and that he lived in a house by himself, for which he paid the rent from his own pocket, when it was proved that he was not worth a rupee, and when the person, in whose house he had always resided, stood at the bar close to him.

" Another conjecture, and that exceedingly acute and ingenious, has been started upon this folly, that it may mean the deception which a man permits to be imposed on his judgment by his passions ; as acts of rapacity and avarice are often committed by men who ascribe them to prudence and a just assertion of their own right; malice and rancor pass for justice, and brutality for spirit. This opinion, when thoroughly examined, will very nearly tally with the former; for all the passions, as well as fear, have an equal efficacy to disturb and distort the mind ; hut, to account for the folly here spoken of as being the offspring of the passions, instead of drawing a parallel between it and the impulses of those passions, we must suppose the impulses to act with infinitely more violence upon an Asiatic mind than we can ever have seen exemplified in Europe. It is, however, something like the madness so inimitably delineated in the Hero of Cervantes, sensible enough upon some occasions, and at the same time completely wild, and unconscious of itself upon others, and that, too, originally produced by an effort of the will, though, in the end, overpowering and superseding its functions." HALHEO.

But I, all naked feeling and raw life. -- II. 5, p. 570.

By the vital souls of those men who have committed size in the body, another body, composed of nerves, with five sensations, in order to be susceptible of torment, shall certainly be assumed after death ; and being intimately united with those minute nervous particles, according to their distribution, they shall feel in that new body the pangs inflicted in each case by the sentence of Yama. - Inst. of Menu.

Henry More, the Platonist, has two applicable stanzas in his Song of the Soul : --

> Like to a light fast lock'd in lantern dark, Whereby by night our wary steps we guide

In slabh; streats, and dirty channels mark, Some weaser rays through the black top do glide, And flusher streams, perhaps, from horny side ; But when we've past the peril of the way, Arrived at home, and laid that case aside, -The oaked light how clearly doth it ray, And spread its joyful beams as bright as summer's day.

Even so the soul, in this contracted state,

- Confined to these straight instruments of sense, More dull and narrowly doth operate ;
- At this hole hears, the sight must ray from thence, - ileta tastes, there smells ; - but when she's gone from hence,

Like naked lamp she is one shining sphere, And round about has perfect cognoscence ;

Whate'er in her horizon doth appear,

She is one orb of aense, all eye, all airy sar.

Amid the uncouth allegory, and more uncouth language, of this strange aeries of poems, a few passages are to be found of exceeding beauty. Milton, who was the author's friend, had evidently read them.

Marriataly. - 11. 8, p. 570.

Maristale, as Sonnerat spells the name, was wife of the penitent Chamadaguini, and mother of Parassourama, who was, in part, an incarnation of Veeshno. This goddess, says Sonnerat, commanded the elements, hut could not preserve that empire longer than her heart was pure. One day, while she was coffecting water out of a tank, and, according to her custom, was making a bowl of earth to carry it to the house, she saw on the surface of the water some figures of Grindovers, (Glendoveers,) which were flying over her head. Struck with their beauty, her heart admitted an impure thought, and the earth of the bowl dissolved. From that time she was obliged to make use of an ordinary vessel. This discovered to Chamadaguini that his wife bad deviated from purity ; and in the excess of his rage, he ordered his son to drag her to the place were criminals were executed, and to behead her. The order was executed ; but Parassourama was so much afflicted for the loss of his mother, that Chamadaguini told him to take up the hody, and fasten the head upon it, and repeat a prayer (which he taught him for that purpose) in her ear, and then his mother would come to life again. The son ran eagerly to perform what he was ordered, but, hy a very singular blonder, he joined the head of his mother to the body of a Parichi, who had been executed for her crimes ; a monstrous union, which gave to this woman the virtues of a goddess, and the vices of a criminal. The goddess, becoming impute by such a mixture, was driven from her house, and committed all kinds of cruelties. The Deverkels, perceiving the destruction she made, appeased her by giving her power to cure the small-pox, and promising that she should be implored for that disorder. Mariatale is the great goddess of the Parias ; - to honor her, they have a custom of dancing with several pots of water on their heads, placed one above the other; these pots are adorned with the leaves of the Margosies, n tree consecrated to her.

> The little songsters of the sky Sit silent in the sultry hour. - IV. 2, p. 572.

The tufted lark, fixed to this fruitful land, says Sonnini, appaking of Egypt, never forsakes it ; it seems, however, that the excessive heat annoys him. You may see these birds, as well as sparrows, in the middle of the day, with their bills half open, and the muscles of their breasts agitated, breathing with difficulty, and as if they panted for respiration. The instinct which induces them to prefer those means of subsistence which are easily obtained, and in ahundance, although attended with some suffering, resembles the mind of man, whom a thirst for riches engages to brave calamities and danters without number.

The watchman. - V. 1, p. 574.

The watchmen are provided with no offensive weapons excepting a sling ; on the contrary, they continue the whole day standing, in one single position, upon a pillar of clay raised about ten feet, where they remain bellowing continually, that they may terrify, without hurting, the birds who feed upon the crop. Every considerable field contains several such sentinels, stationed at different corners, who repeat the call from one to another so incessantly, that the invaders have hardly any opportunity of making a good livelihood in the field.

These watchmen are forced, during the rains, to erect, instead of a clay pillar, a scaffolding of wood as high as the crop, over which they suspend a roof of straw, to shelter their naked hodies from the rain. - TENNANT.

The Golden Palaces. - V. 1, p. 574.

Every thing belonging to the Sovereign of Ava has the addition of shoe, or golden, annexed to it; even his majesty's person is never mentioned but in conjunction with this precious metal. When a subject means to affirm that the king has heard any thing, he says, "It has reached the golden ears ; " he who obtained admission to the royal presence has been at the "golden feet." The perfume of otta of roses, a robleman observed one day, "was an odor grateful to the golden nose." - SYMES.

A cloud, ascending in the eastern sky, Sails slowly o'er the vale, And darkens round, and closes in the night. - V. 3, p. 574.

At this season of the year, it is not uncommon, towards the evening, to see a small black cloud rising in the eastern part of the horizon, and afterwards spreading itself to the northwest. This phenomenon is always attended with a violent storm of wind, and flashes of the strongest and most vivid lightning and heavy thunder, which is followed by raia. These storms sometimes last for half an hour or more ; and, when they disperse, they leave the air greatly freshened, and the sky of a deep, clear and transparent blue. When they occur near the full moon, the whole atmosphere is illuminated hy a soft but brilliant silver light, attended with gentle airs. --HODGES.

A white flag, flapping to the winds of night, Marks where the tiger seized a human prey. - V. 4, p. 574.

It is usual to place a small, white, triangular flag, fixed to a bamhoo staff, of ten or twelve feet long, at the place where a tiger has destroyed a man. It is common for the passengers, also, each to throw a stone or brick near the spot, so that, in the course of a little time, a pile, equal to a good wagon-load, is collected. This custom, as well as the fixing a rag on any particular thorn-hush, near the fatal spot, is in use, likewise, on various accounts. Many brambles may be seen in a day's journey, completely envered with this motley assemblage of remnants, The sight of the flags and piles of stones imparts a certain melancholy, not perhaps altogether devoid of apprehension. They may be said to be of service in pointing out the places most frequented by tigers. - Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 22.

Gently he steals away with silent tread, - V. 9, p. 575.

This part of the poem has been censured, upon the ground that Ladurhad's conduct in thus forsaking his daughter is inconsistent with his affection for her. There is a passage in Mr. Milman's version of Nala and Damayanti so curiously resembling it in the situation of the two persons, that any one might suppose I had imitated the Sanscrit, if Kehama had not been published five-and-twenty years before Mr. Milman's most characteristic specimen of Indian poetry. Indeed, it is to him that I am obliged for pointing out the very singular coincidence.

" Mighty is thy father's kingdom - once was mine as mighty, too ;

Never will I there seek refuge - in my base extremity.

There I once appeared in glory — to the exalting of thy pride; Shall 1 now appear in miscry — to the increasing of thy shame?"

Nala thus to Damayanti - spake again, and yet again,

Comforting the noble lady — scant in half a garment clad. Both together, by one garment — covered, roamed they here and there :

Wearied out by thirst nucl famine — to a cabin drew they near, When they reached that lowly cabin — then did great Nishadha's king

With the princess of Vidarbha -- on the hard earth seat them down ;

Naked, with no mut to rest on -- wet with mire and stained with dust.

Weary then with Damayanti - on the earth he fell asleep.

Sank the lovely Damayanti — by his side with sleep oppress'd, She thus plunged in sudden misery — she the tender, the devont.

But while on the cold earth slumbered - Damayanti, all distraught,

Nala in his mind by sorrow - might no longer calmly sleep ;

For the losing of his kingdom -- the desertion of his friends, And his weary forest wanderings -- painful on his thought arose ;

"If I do it, what may follow ? - whet if I refuse to do?

Were my instant death the better — or to abandon her I love. But to me too deep devoted — suffers she distress and shame; Reft of me, she home may wander — to her royal father's house;

Faithful wandering ever with me-certain sorrow will she bear,

But if separated from me-chance of solace may be hers."

Long within his heart he pondered — and again, again weighed o'er.

- Best he thought it Damayanti-to desert, that wretched king.
- From her virtue none dare harm her in the lonely forest way,

Her the fortunate, the noble, my devoted wedded wife.

Thus his mind on Damayanti — dwelt in its perverted thought, Wrought by Kali's evil influence — to desert his lovely wife. Of himself without a garment — and of her with only one

As he thought, approached he near her — to divide that single robe.

"How shall I divide the garment - by my loved one unperceived ?"

Pondering this within his spirit - round the cabin Nala went; In that narrow cabin's circuit - Nala wandered here and there, Till he found without a scabbard — shining, a well-tempered

- sword.
- Then when half that only garment he had severed and put on,

F.1 her sleep Viderbha's princess — with he wildered mind he fled.

Yet, his cruel heart relenting - to the cabin turns he back ;

On the slumbering Damayanti — gazing, sadly wept the king ; ¹⁰ Thou that san por wind hath ever — roughly visited, my

- love!
- On the hard earth in a cabin-sleepest with thy guardian gone.
- Thus attired in half a garment she that aye so sweetly smiled,

Like to one distracted, beauteous - how at length will she awake !

- How will't fare with Bhima's daughter -- lone, abandoned by her lord,
- Wandering in the savage forest where wild beasts and serpents dwell !
- May the suns and winds of heaven --- may the genii of the woods,
- Noblest, may they all protect thee -- thine own virtue thy best guard,"
- To his wife of peerless heauty on the earth, 'twas thus he spake.

Then of sense hereft by Kali - Nala hastily set forth ;

And departing, still departing — he returned again, again; Dragged away by that bad demon — ever by his love drawn back.

Nala, thus his heart divided — into two conflicting parts, Like a swing goes backward, forward — from the cabin, to and fro.

Tora away at length: ay Kali — flies afar the frantic king, Leaving there his wife in slumber — making miserable noons, Reft of sense, possessed by Kali — thinking still on her heleft, Passed he in the lonely forest — leaving his deserted wife.

Pollcar. - V. 14, p. 575.

The first and greatest of the sous of Sevee is Pollear; he presides over marriages : the Indians build no house without having first carried a Pollear on the ground, which they sprinkle with oil, and throw flowers on it every day. If they do not invoke it before they undertake any enterprise, they believe that God will make them forget what they wanted to undertake, and that their labor will be in vain. He is represented with an elephant's head, and mounted on a rat; but in the pagodas they place him on a pedestal, with his legs almost crossed. A rat is always put before the door of his chapel. This rat was a giant, called Gudja-mouga-chourin, on whom the gods had bestowed immortality, as well as great powers, which he abused, and did much harm to mankind. Pollear, entreated by the sages and penitents to deliver them, pulled out one of his tusks, and threw it against Gudja mouga-chourin; the tooth entered the giant's stomach, end overthrew him, who immediately changed himself into a rat as large as a mountain, and came to attack Pollear; who sprung on his back, telling him, that hereafter he should ever be his earrier.

The Indians, in their adoration of this god, cross their arms, shut the fist, and in this manner give themselves several blows on the temples; then, but always with the arms crossed, they take hold of their cars, and make three inclinations, bending the knee; after which, with their hands joined, they address their prayers to him, and strike their forehead. They have a great veneration for this deity, whose image they place in all temples, streets, highways, and in the country, at the foot of some tree; that all the world may have an opportunity of invoking him before they undertake any concern; and that travellers may make their adorations and offerings to him before they pursue their journey. — SONNERAT.

The Glendoveers. - VI. p. 576.

This word is altered from the Grindouvers of Sonnerat. who describes these celestial children of Casyapa as famour for their beauty; they have wings, he adds, and fly in the air with their wives. I do not know whether they are the Gandharnas of the English Orientalists. The wings with which they are attired in the poem are borrowed from the neglected story of Peter Wilkins. At a recent sale of manuscripts, the anthor's assignment of this book to Dodsley for ten guineas was brought to light, and it then appeared that his name, which till then had been unknown, was R. Paltock. Nothing more has been discovered concerning him. His book, however, is a work of great genius, and I know that both Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Coleridge thought as highly of it as 1 do. His winged people are the most beautiful creatures of imagination that ever were devised. I copy his minute description of the graundce, as he calls it ;- Stothard has made some delightful drawings of it in the Novelist's Magazine.

"She first threw up two long branches, or ribs, of the whalebone, as I called it before, (and indeed for several of its properties, as toughness, elasticity, and plinbleness, nothing I have ever seen can so justly be compared to it.) which were jointed behind to the upper bone of the spine, and which, when not extended, lie bent over the shoulders on each side of the neck forwards, from whence, by neutre and neutrer approaches, they just meet at the lower rim of the belly in a sort of point; but, when extended, they stand their whole length above the shoulders, not perpendicularly, but spreading outwards, with a web of the softest and most pliable and spongy membrane that can he imagined in the interstices between them, traching from their root or joint on the back up bboxe the hunder part of the head, and neat half way their own length; but, when closed, the membrane falls down in the middle upon the neck, like a handkerchief. There are also j two other ribs, rising, as it were, from the same root, which, when npen, run horizontally, but not so long as the others. These are filled up in the interstice between them and the upper ones with the same membrane; and on the lower sida of this is also a deep flap of the membrane, so that the arms can be either above or below it in flight, and are always above it when closed. This last rib, when shut, flaps under the upper one, and also falls down with it before to the waist; but it is not joined to the ribs below. Along the whule spine-bone runs a strong, flat, broad, gristly cartilage, to which are joined several other of these ribs, all which open horizontally, and are filled in the interstices with the above membrane, and are juinted to the ribs of the person just where the plane of the back hegins to turn towards the breast and belly; and, when shut, wrap the body round to the joints on the contrary side, folding neatly one side over the other.

"At the lower spine are two more ribs extended horizontally when open, jointed again to the hips, and long enough to meet the joint on the contrary side across the belly : and from the hip-joint, which is on the outermost edge of the hip-hone. runs a pliable cartilage quite down the outside of the thigh and leg to the ankle; from which there branch out divers other ribs, horizontally also when open, but, when closed, they encompass the whole thigh and leg, rolling inwards across the back of the leg and thigh, till they reach and just cover the cartilage. The interstices of these are filled up with the same membrane. From the two ribs which join to the lower spine-hone, there hangs down a sort of short apron, very full of plaits, from hip-joint to hip-joint, and reaches below the buttocks, half way or more to the haors. This has also several small limber rihs in it. Just upon the lower spice-joint, and above the apron, as I call it, there are two other long hranches, which when close, extend upon the back from the point they join at below to the shoulders, where each rib has a clasper, which reaching over the shoulders, just under the fold of the uppermost branch or ribs, hold up the two ribs flat to the back, like a V, the interstices of which arc filled up with the aforesaid membrane. This last piece, in flight, falls down almost to the ankles, where the two claspers, lapping under each leg within-side, hold it very fast; and then, also, the short apron is drawn up, by the strength of the rihs in it, between the thighs, forward and covers as far as the rim of the belly. The whole arms are covered also from the shoulders to the wrist with the same delicate membrane, fastened to ribs of proportionable dimensions, and jointed to a cartilage on the outside in the same manner as on the legs. It is very surprising to feel the difference of these ribs when open and when closed; for closed they are as pliable as the finest whalebone, or more so ; but, when extended, are as strong and stiff as a bone. They are tapering from the roots, and ere broader or narrower, as best suits the places they occupy, and the stress they are put to, up to their points, which are almost as small as a hair. The membrane between them is the most elastic thing I ever met with, occupying no more space, when the ribs are closed, than just from rib to rib, as flat and smooth as possible ; but, when extended in some postures, will dilate itself surprisingly.

"It is the most amazing thing in the world to observe the large expansion of this graundee when open, and, when closed, (as it all is in a moment, upon the party's descent,) to see it fit so close and compact to the body as no tailor can come up to it; and then the several ribs lie so justly disposed in the several parts, that instead of being, as one would imagine, a disadvantage to the shape, they make the body and limbs look extremely clegant; and, by the different adjustment of their liacs on the hody and limbs, the whole, to my fancy, somewhat resembles the dress of the old Roman warriors in their auxkins; and, to appearance, seems much more noble than any fictitious garb I ever saw, or can frame a notion of to myself."

Mount Himakoot. - VI. 3, p. 576.

Dushmanta. Say, Matali, what mountain is that which, like an evening cloud, pours exhilarating streams, and forms a golden zone between the western and eastern seas?

Mutati. That, O king! is the mountain of Gandharvas, samed Hémacúta : the universe contains not a more excellent place for the successful devotion of the pious. There Casyapa, father of the immortals, ruler of men, son of Marichi, who sprang from the self-existent, resides with his consort Aditi, blessed in hely retirement. — We now enter the sanctuary of him who rules the world, and the groves which are watered by streams from celestial sources.

Dushmanta. I see with equal assume that the pious and their awful retreat. It becomes, indeed, pure spirits to feed on balmy air in a forest blooming with trees of life; to both in rills dyed yellow with the golden dust of the lotus, and to fortify their virtue in the mysterious bath; to mediate in caves, the pebbles of which are unblemished gems; and to restrain their passions, even though mynphs of exquisite beauty frolick around them. In this grove alone is attained the summit of true piety, to which other hermits in vain aspire.— SACONTALA.

Her death predoom'd To that black hour of midnight, when the Moon Hath turn'd her face away, Unwilling to behold The unhappy end of guilt! -- VI. 4, p. 576.

I will now speak to thee of that time in which, should a devout man die, he will never return; and of that time in which, dying, he shall return again to earth.

Those holy men who are acquainted with Brahma, departing this life in the fiery light of day, in the bright senson of the moon, within the six months of the sun's northern course, go unto him: but those who depart in the gloomy night of the moon's dark season, and whilst the sun is yet within the southern path of his journey, ascend for a while into the regions of the moon, and again return to mortal hirth. These two, Light and Darkness, are esteemed the World's eternal ways: he who walketh in the former path returneth not; whilst he who walketh in the latter cometh back again upon the enrth. —KEESHNS, in the Bhagrad Greta.

Indra. - VI. 4, p. 577.

The Judian God of the visible Heavens is called Indra, or the King; and Divespetir, Lord of the Sky. He has the character of the Roman Genius, or chief of the Good Spirits. His consort is named Sachi; his celestial city, Amaravoti; his palace, Vaijayanta; his garden, Nandana; his chief eleplant, Airceat; his charioteer, Matali; and his weapon, Vajra, ur the thunderbolt. He is the regent of winds and showers, and, though the East is peculiarly under his care, yet his Olympus is Meru, or the North Pole, allegorically represented as a mountain of gold and gens. He is the Prince of the beneficent Genii. — Sir W. JoxEs.

A distinct idea of Indra, the King of Immortals, may be collected from a passage in the sinth section of the Geeta.

"These having, through virtue, reached the mansion of the king of Suras, feast on the exquisite heavenly food of the Gods; they who have enjoyed this lofty region of SWEROA, but whose virtue is exhausted, revisit the habitation of mortals."

He is the God of thunder and the five elements, with inferior Genii under his command; and is conceived to govern the eastern quarter of the world, but to preside, like the Genius or Agathodacmon of the ancients, over the celestial bands, which are stationed on the summit of MERU, or the North Pole, where he solaces the Gods with nectar and heavenly music.

The Cinnaras are the male dancers in SWEAGA, or the Heaven of Indra, and the Apsaras are his dancing girls, answering to the fairies of the Persians, and to the damsels called in the Koran hhúru lluyùa, or, with antelope's eyes. — Sir W. Jowes.

I have seen Indra tremble at his prayers,

And at his dreadful penances turn pale. - VI. 4, p. 577.

Of such penances Mr. Halhed has produced a curious specimen.

"In the wood Midhan, which is on the confines of the kingdoms of Brege, Tarakee selected a pleasant and beautiful spot, adorned with verdure and blossoms, and there exercised himself in penance and mortification, externally with the sincerest piety, but in reality, the most malignant intention, and with the determined purpose of oppressing the Devetas; penances such as credulity itself was astonished to hear; and they are here recounted : --

1. For a hundred years, he held up his arms and one foot towards heaven, and fixed his eyes upon the sun the whole time.

2. For a hundred years, he remained standing on tiptoe.

3. For a hundred years more, he nourished himself with nothing but water.

For a bundred years more, he lived upon nothing but air.
 For a bundred years more, he stood and made his adorations in the river.

6. For a hundred years more he made those adorations buried up to his neek in the earth.

7. For a hundred years more, enveloped with fire.

8. For a hundred years more, he stood upon his head with his feet towards heaven.

9. For a hundred years more, he stood apon the palm of one hand resting on the ground.

10. For a hundred years more, he hung by his hand from the branch of a tree.

11. For a hundred years more, he hung from a tree with his head downwards.

When he at length come to a respite from these severe mortifications, a radiant glory encircled the devotee, and a flame of fire, arising from his head, began to consume the whole world.²⁹ — From the Seva Pooraun, $M_{AUAICE'}$'s History of Hindostan.

You see a pious Yogi, motionless as a pollard, holding his thick, bushy hair, and fixing his eyes on the solar orb. Mark--his body is half covered with a white ant's edifice made of raised clay; the skin of a snake supplies the place of his sacerdotal thread, and pirt of it girds his loins; a number of knotty plants encircle and wound his neck, and surrounding birds' nests almost conceal his shoulders.

That even Seeva's self,

The Highest, cannot grant and be secure. - VI. 4, p. 577.

It will be seen from the following fable, that Seeva had once been reduced to a very humiliating employment by one of Kehama's predecessors ; --

Ravana, by his power and infernal arts, had subjugated all the gods and demigods, and forced them to perform menial offices about his person and household. Indra made garlands of flowers to adorn him withal; Agni was his cook; Surya supplied light by day, and Chandra by night; Varuna putveyed water for the palace; Kavera furnished eash. The whole nava-graha (the nine planetary spheres) sometimes arranged themselves into a ladder, by which, they serving as steps, the tyrant ascended his throne. Brahma (for the great gods were there also; and I give this anecdote as I find it in my memoranda, without any improved arrangement) - Brahma was a herald, proclaiming the giant's titles, the day of the week, month, &c. daily in the palace, - a sort of speaking almanae : Mahadeva, (i. e. Seeva,) in his Avatara of Kandeh-roo, performed the office of barber, and trimmed the giants' beards : Visknu had the honorable occupation of instructing and drilling the dancing and singing girls, and selecting the fairest for the royal hed : Ganesa had the care of the cows, goats, and herds : Vaya swept the house ; Yama washed the linen ; - and in this manner were all the gods employed in the menial offices of Ravana, who reluked and flogged them in defult of industry and attention. Nor were the female divinities exempted; for Bhavani, in her name and form of Sutni, was head Aya, or nurse, to Ravana's children ; Lakshmi and Saraswati were also among them, but it does not appear in what capacity. - MOORE's Hindu Pautheon, p. 333.

Seeva was once in danger even of annihilation. "In passing from the town of Silgut to Deonhully," says Colonel Wilks, "I hecame necidentally informed of a seet, peenliar, as I since understand, to the north-eastern parts of Mysoor, the women of which universally undergo the amputation of the first joints of the third and fourth fugers of their right.

hands. On my arrival at Deonhully, after ascertaining that the request would not give offence, I desired to see some of these women; and, the same afternoon, seven of them at-tended at my tent. The sect is a subdivision of the Murreson Wokul,* and belongs to the fourth great class of the Hindoos, viz. the Souder. Every woman of the sect, previously to piercing the ears of ber eldest daughter, preparatory to her being betrothed in marriage, must necessarily undergo this mutilation, which is performed by the blacksmith of the village for a regulated fee, by a surgical process sufficiently rude. The finger to be amputated is placed on a block ; the blacksmith places a chisel over the articulation of the joint, and chops it off at a single blow. If the girl to be betrothed is motherless, and the mother of the boy have not before been subject to the operation, it is incumbent on her to perform that secrifice. After satisfying myself with regard to the facts of the case, I inquired into the origin of so strange a practice, and one of the women related, with great fluency, the following traditionary tale, which has since been repeated to ma, with no material deviation, by several others of the sect.

A Rachas (or giant) named Vrica, and in after times Busmaa-sour, or the giant of the ashes, had, by a course of anstere devotion to Makadeo, (Seeva,) obtained from him the promise of whatever boon he should ask. The Rachas accordingly demanded, that every person on whose head he should place his right hand might instantly be reduced to ashes; and Mahadeo conferred the boon, without suspicion of the purpose for which it was designed.

The Rachas no sooner found himself possessed of this formidable power, than he attempted to use it for the destruction of his benefactor. Mahadeo field, the Rachas pursued, and followed the fugitive so closely as to cluase him into a thick grove; where Mahadeo, cbanging his form and bulk, concealed binself in the centre of a frnit, then called tunda pundoo, but since named linga tunda, from the resemblance which its kernel thenceforward assumed to the ling, the appropriate enblem of Mahadeo.

The Rachas having lost sight of Mahadeo, inquired of a husbandman, who was working in the adjoining field, whether he had seen the fugitive, and what direction he had taken. The husbandman, who had attentively observed the whole transaction, fearful of the future resentment of Mahadee, and equally alarmed for the present vengeance of the giant, answered aloud, that he had seen no fugitive, hut pointed, at tha same time, with the little finger of his right hand, to the placa of Mahadeo's concealment.

In this extremity,[†] Vishuon descended, in the form of a beautiful damsel, to the rescue of Muhadeo. The Rachas becaue instantly enamored j— the damsel was a pure Brahmin, and might not be approached by the unclean Rachas. By degrees she appeared to relent; and as a previous condition to farther advances, engioned the performance of his ablutions in a neighboring pool. After these were finished, she prescribed, as a further purification, the performance of the Sandia,—a ceremony in which the right hand is successively applied to the breast, to the crown of the head, and to other parts of the body. The Rachas, thinking only of love, and forgetful of the powers of his right hand, performed the Sandia, and was himself reduced to ashes.

Mahadeo now issued from the linga tunda, and, after the proper acknowledgments for his deliverance, proceeded to discuss the guilt of the treacherous husbandman, and determined on the loss of the finger with which he had offended, as the proper punishment of his crime.

The wife of the husbandman, who had just arrived at tha field with food for her husband, hearing this dreadful sentence, threw herself at the feet of Mahadeo. She represented the certain ruin of her family, if her husband should be disabled for some months from performing the labors of the farm, and hesought the Deity to accept two of her fingers, instead of one frem her husband. Mahadeo, pleased with so sincere a proof of conjugal affection, accepted the exchange, and ordained that her female posterity, in all future generations, should sacrifice two fingers at his temple, as a memorial of the transaction, and of their exclusive devotion to the Gpd of the Ling.

- Murresoo, or Mursoo, in the Hala Canara, signifies rude, uncivilized ; Woku¹, a husbandman.
- † Dignus vindice nodus.

The practice is, accordingly, confined to the supposed posterity of this single woman, and is not common to the whole set of Murresoo-Wokul. I accertained the actual number of families who observed this practice in three successive districts through which I afterwards possed, and I conjecture that, within the limits of Mysoor, they may amount to about twe thousand houses.

The Hill of Sectee, in the talook of Colar, where the giant was destroyed, is (according to this tradition) formed of the ashes of Busmaa-soot. It is held in particular veneration by th sect, as the chief seat of their appropriate sacrifice; and the fact of its containing little or no moisture is held to be a miraculeus proof that the ashes of the giaot continue to obsorb the most violent and continued rain. This is a remarkable example of easy credulity. I have examined the meuntain, which is of a sloping form, and composed of coarse granite." — Hist. Sketches of the South of India, vol. i. p. 442, note.

The Ship of Heaven. - VII. 1, p. 578.

1 have converted the Vimana, or self-moving Car of the Gods, into a Ship. Captain Wilford has given the history of its invention, — and, what is more curious, has attempted to settle the geography of the story.

"A most pious and venerable sage, named RISHI'CE'SA, being very far advanced in years, had resolved to visit, before he died, all the famed places of pilgrimage ; and, having performed his resolution, he bothed at last in the sacred water of the Calli, where he observed some fishes engaged in amorous play, and reflecting on their numerous progeny, which would sport like them in the stream, he lamented the improbability of leaving any children: but, since he might possibly be a father, even at his great age, he went immediately to the king of thet country, HIBANYAVERNA, who had fifty daughters, and demanded one of them in marriage. So strange a demand gave the prince great uneasiness: yet he was unwilling to incur the displeasure of a saint whose imprecations he dreaded ; he, therefore, invoked Heri, or Vishnu, to inspire him with a wise answer, and told the hear philosopher, that he sheuld marry any one of his daughters, who, of her own accord, should fix on him us her bridegroom. The sage, rather disconcerted, left the palace ; but, calling to mind the two sens of Aswini, he hastened to their terrestrial abode, and requested that they would bestow on him both youth and beauty: they immedistely conducted him to Abhimatada, which we suppose to be Abydus, in Upper Egypt; and, when he had bathed in the peol of Rupayauvana, he was restored to the flower of his age, with the graces and charms of CA'MA'OE'VA. On his return to the palace, he entered the secret spartments, called antahpura, where the fifty princesses were assembled; and they were all so transported with the vision of more than human besuty, that they fell into an ecstasy, whence the place was afterwards named Mohast-han, or Mohana, and is, possibly, the same with Mohannan. They no sooner had receivered from their trance, than each of them exclaimed, that she would be his bride ; and their altercation having brought HINANYAVERNA into their apartment, he termineted the centest by giving them all in marriage to RISHI'CE'SA, who became the father of a hundred sons; and, when he succeeded to the throne, built the city of Suc-haverddhana, framed vimânas, or celestial, self-moving cars, in which he visited the gods, and made gardens, abounding in delights, which rivalled the bowers of INDAA ; but, having obtained the desire which he formed at Matoyasangama, or the place where the fish were assembled, he resigned the kingdom to his eldest son HIRANYAVBIDDAH, and returned, in his former shape, to the hanks of the Ca'li, where he closed his days in devotion." - WILFORD. Dushmanta. In what path of the winds are we now journeying ?

Matali. This is the way which leads along the triple river, heaven's brightest ornament, and causes you luminaries to roll in a circle with diffused beams; it is the course of a gentle breeze which supports the floating forms of the gods; and this path was the second step of Vishnu when he confounded the prood Balj. The Raining Tree. - VH. 9, p. 579

The island of Fierro is one of the most considerable of the Canaries; and I concerve that name to be given it upon this account, that its soil, not affording so much as a drop of fresh water, seems to be of tron; and, indeed, there is in this island neither river, nor rivulet, nor well, nor spring, save that only towards the sea-side, there are some wells; but they lie at such a distance from the city, that the inhabitants can make no use thereof. But the great Preserver and Sustainer of all remedies this inconvenience by a way so extraerdinary, that a nan will be forced to sit down and acknowledge that he gives in this an undeniable demonstration of his goodness and infinite providence.

For in the midst of the island, there is a tree, which is the only one of its kind, inasmuch as it hath no resemblance to those mentioned by us in this relation, nor to any other known to as in Europe. The leaves of it are long and narrow, and continue in a constant verdure, winter and summer; and its branches are covered with a cloud, which is never dispelled, but resolved into a moisture, which causes the fall from its leaves a very clear water, and that in such abundance, that the cisterns, which are placed at the foot of the tree to receive it, are never empty, but contain enough to supply both men and beasts. — MANDELSIO.

Feyjoo denies the existence of any such tree, upon the authority of P. Tallandier, a French Josuit, (quoted in Mém, de Trevoux, 2715, art. 97), who visited the island. "Assi no dudo," he adds, "que este Feuix de les plantas es ten fingido como el de las aves." — Theut. Crit. Tom. ii. Disc. 2, § 65. What authority is due to the testimony of this French Jesuit I do not know, never having seen his book; but it appears, from the undonlutel evidence of Glas, that the existence of such a tree is believed in the Canaries, and positively affirmed by the inhabitants of Fierre itself.

"There are," says this excellent author, " only three fountains of water in the whole island ; one of them is called Acof,* which, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, significs river; a name, however, which does not seem to have been given it on account of its yielding much water, for in that respect it hardly deserves the name of a fountain. More to the northward is another called Hapie; and in the middle of the island is a spring, yielding a stream about the thickness of a man's finger. This last was discovered in the year 1565, and is called the Fountain of Anton Hernandez. On account of the scarcity of water, the sheep, goats, and swine here do not drink in the summer, but are taught to dig up the roots of fern, and chew them to quench their thirst. The great cattle are watered at those fountains, and at a place where water distils from the leaves of a tree. Many writers have made mention of this famous tree ; some in such a manner as to make it appear miraculous ; others again deny the existence of any such tree, among whom is Father Feyjoo, a modern Spanish author, in his Theatro Critico. But he, and those who agree with him in this matter, sre as much mistaken as they who would make it appear miraculous. This is the only island of all the Canaries which I have not been in ; but I have sailed with natives of Hierro, who, when questioned about the existence of this tree, answered in the affirmative.

The author of the History of the Discovery and Conquest has given us a particular account of it, which I shall relate here at large. "The district in which this tree stands is called Tigulahe; near to which, and in the cliff, or steep rorky ascent that surrounds the whole island, is a narrow gutter or gulley, which commences at the sea, and continues to the summit of the cliff, where it joins or coincides with a valley, which is terminated by the steep front of a rock. On | the top of this rock grows a tree, called, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, Garse, i. c. Sacred or Holy Tree, which, for many years, has been preserved sound, entire, and fresh. Its leaves constantly distil such a quantity of water as is sufficient to furnish drink to every living creature in Hierro; nature having provided this remedy for the drought of the island. It is situated about a league and a half from the sea. Nobody knows of what species it is, only that it is catled Til. It is distinct from other trees, and stands by itself; the circumference of the trunk is about twelve spans, the diameter four, and in height, from the ground to the top of the highest branch, forty spans : The circumference of all the branches together is one hundred and twenty feet. The branches are thick and extended; the lowest commence about the height of an ell from the ground. Its fruit resembles the acorn, and tastes something like the kernel of a pine not, but is softer and more aromatic. The leaves of this tree resemble those of the langel, but are larger, wider, and more curved; they come forth in a perpetual succession, so that the tree always remains green. Near to it grows a thorn, which fastens on many of its branches, and interweaves with them; and, at a small distance from the Garse, are some beech-trees, bresos, and thorns. On the north side of the trank are two large tanks, or cisterns, of rough stone, or rather one cistern divided, each half being twenty feet square, and sixteen spans in depth. One of these contains water for the drinking of the inhabitants, and the other that which they use for their cattle, washing, and such like purposes. Every morning, near this part of the island, a cloud or mist arises from the sea, which the south and easterly winds force against the fore-mentioned steep cliff; so that the cloud, having no vent but by the gutter, gradually ascends it, and from thence advances slowly to the extremity of the valley, where it is stopped and checked by the front of the rock which terminates the valley, and then rests upon the thick leaves and wide-spreading branches of the tree; from whence it distils in drops during the remainder of the day, until it is at length exhausted, in the same manner that we see water drip from the leaves of trees after a heavy shower of rain. This distillation is not peculiar to the Garse, or Til, for the bresos which grow near it likewise drop water; but their teaves being but few and narrow, the quantity is so triffing, that, though the natives save some of it, yet they make little or no account of any but what distils from the Til; which, together with the water of some fountains, and what is saved in the winter season, is sufficient to serve them and their flocks. This tree yields most water in those years when the Levant, or easterly winds have prevailed for a continuance; for hy these winds only the clouds or mists are drawn hither from the sea. A person lives on the spot near which this tree grows, who is appointed by the Conncil to take care of it and its water, and is allowed a house to live in, with a certain salary. He every day distributes to each family of the district seven pots or vessels full of water, hesides what he gives to the principal people of the island."

Whether the tree which yields water at this present time be the same as that mentioned in the above description, I cannot pretend to determine, but it is probable there has been a succession of them; for Pliny, describing the Fortunate Islands, says, "In the mountains of Ombrion are trees resembling the plant Fernla, from which water may be procured by pressure. What comes from the black kind is bitter, but that which the white yields is sweet and palatable."—GLAS'S History of the Canary Islands.

Cordeyro (Historia Insulana, lib. ii. c. 5) says, that this tree resembles what in other places is called the Th (Tilia) the Linden Tree; and he proceeds, from these three letters, to make it an emblem of the Trinity. The water, he says, was called the Agua Santa, and the tree itself the Sauta Arrore, — appellations not ill bestowed. According to his account the water was delivered out in stated portions.

There is an account of a similar tree in Cockburne's Travels; but this I believe to be a work of fiction. Bernal Duaz, however, mentions one as growing at Nuce, in Honduras, "Que en mitad de la siesta, por recio sol que hiziesse, parecia que la soubra del arbol refrescava al coraton, caia del uno como recio mug delgado que confortava las caberos."—206.

There may be some exaggeration in the accounts of the Fierro Tree, but that the story has some foundation I have no doubt. The islanders of St. Thomas say, that they have a sort of trees whose leaves continually are distilling water. (Barbot. in Charckle, 405.) It is certain that a dew falls in hot weather from the line, — a fact of which any person may easily convince himself. The same property has been observed in other English trees, as appears by the following extract from the Monthly Magazine : —

"In the beginning of August, after a sunshiny day, the air became suddenly misty about six o'clock; I walked, however, by the road-side from seven to eight, and observed, in many places, that a shower of big drops of water was falling under the large trees, although no rain tell elsewhere. The road and path continued dusty, and the field-gates showed an signs of being wetted by the mist. I have often noticed the like fict, but have not met with a satisfactory explanation of this power in trees to condense mist."

I am not the only poet who has availed himself of the Fierro Tree. It is thus introduced in the Columbus of Carrata, — a singular work, containing, amid many extravagances, some passages of rare merit: —

> Ecce autem inspector miri dum devius ignis Fertur, in occursum miræ magis ineidit undæ. Nared. - VII. 11, p. 579.

A very distinguished son of Brahma, named Nared, hears a strong resemblance to Herones or Mercury; he was a wisk legislator, great in arts and in arms, an eloquent messenger of the Gods, either to one another or to favored mortals, and a musician of exquisite skill. His invention of the Fina, or Indian lute, is thus described in the poem entitled Magha: "Nared sat watching from time to time his large Fina, which, by the impulse of the breeze, yielded notes that pierced successively the regions of his ear, and proceeded by musical intervals."—Asiatic Researches, Sir W. JONES.

The Vina is an Æolian harp. The people of Amboyna have a different kind of Æolian instrument, which is thus described in the first account of D'Entrecasteaux's Voyage; " Being on the sea-shore, I heard some wind-instruments, the harmony of which, though sometimes very correct, was intermixed with discordant notes that were by no means unpleasing. These sounds, which were very musical, and formed fine cadences, seemed to come from such a distance, that I for some time imagined the natives were having a concert beyond the roadstead, near a myriameter from the spot where I stood. My ear was greatly deceived respecting the distance, for I was not a hundred meters from the instrument. It was a humboo at least twenty meters in height, which had been fixed in a vertical situation by the sea-side. I remarked between each knot a slit about three centimeters long by a centimeter and a half wide ; these slits formed so many holes, which, when the wind introduced itself into them, gave agreeable and diversified sounds. As the knots of this long bamboo were very numerous, care had been taken to make holes in different directions, in order that, on whatever side the wind blew, it might always meet with some of them. I cannot convey a better idea of the sound of this instrument, than by comparing them te those of the Harmonica." --- LABILLARDIFRE. Voyage in Scarch of La Perouse.

Nareda, the mythological offspring of Sarasvati, patroness of misic, is famed for his taleats in that science. So great, were they, that he became presumptions; and emulating the divine strains of Krishna, he was punisbed by having his Fina placed in the paws of a bear, whence it emitted sounds far sweeter than the ministrelsy of the mortified musician. I have a picture of this joke, in which Krishna is forcing his relactant friend to attend to his rough-visaged rival, who is ridiculously touching the chords of poor Nareda's Vina, accompanied by a brother Bruin on the cymbals. Krishna passed several practical jokes on his humble and affectionate friend : he metamorphosed him once into a woman, at another time into a bear. - Moore's Hindu Pantheon, p. 204.

Sole Rajah, the Omnipotent below. - VII. 11, p. 580.

No person has given so complete a sample of the obsurdity of Oriental titles as the Dutch traveller Struys, in his enumeration of "the proud and blasphemous titles of the King of Siam, — they will hardly bear sense," says the translator, in what he calls, by a happy blunder, "the idiotism of our tongne."

The Alliance, written with letters of fine gold, being full of godlike glory. The most Excellent, containing all wise sciences. Tho most Happy, which is not in the world among men. The Best and most Certain that is in Heaven, Earth, and Hell. The greatest Sweet, and friendly Reyal Word; whose powerful sounding properties and glorious fame range through the world, as if the dead were raised by a godlike power, and wonderfully purged from ghostly end corporal corruption. At this both spiritual and secular men admire with a special joy, whereas no dignity may be herewith compared. Proceeding from a friendly, illustrious, inconquerable, most mighty and most high Lord; and a royal Crown of Gold, adorned with nine sorts of precious stones. The greatest, clearest, and most godlike Lord of unblamable Souls. The most Holy, seeing every where, and protecting Sovereign of the city Junis, whose many streets and open gates are thronged by troops of men, which is the chief metropolis of the whole world, the royal throne of the earth, that is adorned with nine sorts of stones and most pleasant valleys. He who guides the reins of the world, and has a house more than the Gods of fine gold and of precious stones; they the godlike Lords of thrones and of fine gold; the White, Red, and Round-tayPd Elephants, - which excellent creatures are the chiefest of the nine sorts of Gods. To none hath the divine Lord given, in whose hand is the victorious sword; who is like the fiery-armed God of Battails, to the most illustrious.

The second is as blasphemous as the first, though hardly swells so far out of sense.

The highest PADUCCO SYRY SULTAN, NELMONAM WEL-GACA, NELMOCHADIN MAGIVIITHA, JOUKEN DER EAUTEN ALLAULA FYLAN, King of the whole world ; who makes the water rise and flow. A King that is like a God, and shines like the sun at noon-day. A King that gives a glance like the Moon when it is at full. Elected of God to be worthy as the North Star, being of the race and offspring of the great Alexander; with a great understanding, as a round orb, that tumbles hither and thither, able to guess at the depth of the great sea. A King that hath amended all the funerals of the departed Saints, and is as righteous as God, and of such power, that all the world may come and shelter under his wings. A King that doth right in all things, as the Kings of old have done. A King more liberal than all Kings. A King that hath many mines of gold that God hath lent him; who hath built temples half gold and half brass; sitting upon a throne of pure gold, and of all sorts of precious stones. A King of the white Elephant, which Elephant is the King of all Elephants, before whom many thousands of other Elephants must bow and fall upon their knees. He whose eyes shine like the morning-star. A King that hath Elephants with four teeth. red, purple, and pied. Elephants, ay, and a BYYTENAQUES Elephant; for which God has given him many and divers sorts of apparel wrought with most fine gold, ennobled with many precious stones : and, besides these, so many Elephants ased in battel, having harnesses of iron, their teeth tipt with steel, and their harnesses laid over with shining brass. A King that has many hundred horses, whose trappings are wrought with fine gold, and adorned with precious stones of every sort that are found in the universal world where the Sun shines, and these shod with fine gold ; besides so many hundred horses that are used in war of every kind. A King who has all Emperours, Kings, Princes, and Sovereigns in the whole world from the rising to the going down of the sun, under subjection ; - and such as can obtain his favor are by him promoted to great honor; but, on the cootrary, such as revolt, he burns with fire. A King who can show the power of God, and whatever God has made.

And so, hy this time, I hope you have heard enough of a King of Elephants and Horses, though not a word of his Asses. - STRUYS.

The Sacrifice. - VIII. p. 581.

The Aswamedha, or sacrifice of a horse. Considerable difficulties usually attended that ceremony ; for the consecrated herse was to be set at liberty for a certain time, and followed at a distance by the owner, or his champion, who was usually one of his near kinsman; and, if any person should ettempt to stop it in its rambles, a battle must inevitably ensue; besidas, as the performer of a hundred Aswamedhas became equal to the God of the firmament, Indra was perpetually on the watch, and generally carried off the sacred animal by force or by fraud. - WILFORD. Asiat. Res.

Mr. Halbed gives a very curious account of this remarkable sacrifice : -- performance of that ceremony which is open to the inspection of the world, namely, bringing a borse and sacrificing him : but Ashum-meed is to be taken in a mystic signification, as implying that the sacrificer must look upon himself to be typified in that horse, such as he shall be described, because the religious duty of the Ashum-meed-Jugg comprehends all those other religious duties, to the performance of which all the wise and boly direct all their actions, and by which all the sincere professors of every different faith air. at perfection : the mystic signification thereof is as follows :

"The head of that unblemished horse is the symbol of the morning; his eyes are the sun; his breath the wind; his wide-opening mouth is the Bishwaner, or that innate warmth which invigorates all the world: his body typifies one eatire year; his back paradise; his belly the plains; his hoofs this earth; his sides the four quarters of the heavens; the bones thereof the intermediate spaces between the four quarters ; the rest of his limbs represent all distinct matter ; the places where those limbs meet, or his joints, imply the months and halves of the months, which are called peche (or fortnights); his feet signify night and day; and night and day are of four kinds. 1. The night and day of Birhina, 2. The night and day of angels, 3. The night and day of the world of the spirits of deceased ancestors, 4. The night and day of mortals; these four kinds are typified in his four feet. The rest of his hones are the constellations of the fixed stars, which are the twentyeight stages of the moon's course, called the Lunar year : his flesh is the clouds; his food the sand; his tendons the river; his spleen and his liver the mountains; the hair of his body the vegetables, and his long hair the trees ; the fore part of his body typifies the first half of the day, and the hinder part the latter half; his yawning is the flash of the lightning, and his turning himself is the thunder of the cloud; his urine represents the rain, and his mental reflection is his only speech. The golden vessels, which are prepared before the horse is let loose, are the light of the day, and the place where those vessels are kept is a type of the Ocean of the East ; the silver vessels which are prepared after the horse is let loose, are the light of the night; and the place where those vessels are kept is a type of the Ocean of the West; these two sorts of vessels are always before and after the horse. The Arabian horse, which, on account of his swiftness, is called the Hy, is the performer of the journeys of angels; the Tajee, which is of the race of Persian horses, is the performer of the journeys of the Kundherps (or good spirits;) the Wazba, which is of the race of the deformed Tazee horses, is the performer of the journeys of the Jins (or demons ;) and the Ashoo, which is of the race of Turkish horses, is the performer of the journeys of mankind. This one horse, which performs these several services, on account of his four different sorts of riders, obtains the four different appellations. The place where this horse remains is the great ocean, which signifies the great spirit of Perm-Atma, or the Universal Soul, which proceeds also from that Perm-Atma, and is comprehended in the same Perm-Atma. The intent of this sacrifice is, that a man should consider himself to be in the place of that horse, and look upon all these articles as typified in himself; and, conceiving the Atma (or divine soul) to be an ocean, should let all thought of self be absorbed in that Atma." - HALHED, from Darul Shekuh.

Compare this specimen of Eastern sublimity with the description of the horse in Job! Compare it also with the account of the Bengal horses, in the very amusing work of Captain Williamson, - " which said horses," he says, " have generally Roman noses, and sharp, narrow forebeads, much white in their eyes, ill-shaped ears, square heads, thin necks, narrow chests, shallow girths, lank bellies, cat hanns, goose rumps, and switch tails." - Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 206.

The bowl that in its vessel floats. - VIII. 5, p. 581.

The day and night are here divided into four quarters, each of six hours, and these again into fifteen parts, of twenty-four minutes each. For a chronometer they use a kind of dish of thin brass, at the bottom of which there is a little hole ; this is put into a vessel with water, and it runs full in a certain time. They begin their first quarter at six in the morning. "The Ashum-meed-Jugg does not merely consist in the They strike the quarters and subdivisions of time with a wooden hammer, upon a flat piece of iron or steel, of about ten inches in diameter, which is called a garnial, and gives a pretty smart sound, which can be heard at some distance. The quarters are first struck, and then as many times as the brass dish has run full in that quarter. None but the chief men of a district are allowed to have a garnial, and still they may not strike the first division of the first quarter, which is a privilege reserved to the nabb alone. Those who attend at these clocks must be of the Bramin cast. — STAVORINUS.

Lo! the time-toper's flame, ascending slow, Creeps up its coil. — VIII. 7, p. 582.

They make a sort of paste of the dust of a certain sort of wood, (the learned and rich men of sandal, engle-wood, and others that are odoriferous,) and of this paste they make sticks of several sorts, drawing them through a hole, that they may be of an equal thickness. They commonly make them one, two, or three yards long, abont the thickness of a goosequill, to burn in the pagods before their idols, or to use like a match to coavey fire from one thing to another. These sticks or ropes they coil, beginning at the centre, and so form a spiral, conical figure, like a fisherman's wheel, so that the last circle shall be one, two, or three spans in diameter, and will last one, two, or three days, or more, according as it is in thickness. There are of them in the temples that last ten, twenty, and thirty days. This thing is hung up by the centre, and is lighted at the lower end, whence the fire gently and insensibly runs round all the coil, on which there are generally five marks, to distinguish the five parts of the night. This method of measuring time is so exact and true, that they scarce ever find any considerable mistake in it. The learned travellers, and all others, who will rise at a certain honr to follow their business, hang a little weight at the mark that shows the hour they have a mind to rise at, which, when the fire comes thither, drops into a brass basin set under it; and so the noise of it falling awakes them, as our alarum-clocks do. --- GEMELLI CARERI.

At noon the massacre begun, And night closed in before the work of death was done. VIII. 11, p. 582.

Of such massacres the ancient and modern history of the East supply but too many examples. One may suffice :

After the surrender of the Ilbars Khan, Nadir prohibited his soldiers from molesting the inhabitants ; but their rapacity was more powerful than their habits of obedience, or even their dread of his displeasure, and they accordingly began to plunder. The instant Nadir heard of their disobedience, he ordered the offenders to be brought before him, and the officers were beheaded in his presence, and the private soldiers dismissed with the loss of their ears and aoses. The executioners toiled till sunset, when be commanded the headless trunks with their arms to be carried to the main-guard, and there to be exposed for two days, as an example to others. I was present the whole time, and saw the wonderful hand of God, which employs such instruments for the execution of his divine vengeance; although not one of the executioners was satisfied with Nadir Shah, yet nobody dared to disobey his commands: - a father beheaded his son, and a brother a brother, and yet presumed not to complain .- Asour KUNREM.

Behold his lowly home,

By yonder broad-bough'd Plane o'ershaded. - IX. 3, p. 582.

The plane-tree, that species termed the Platanus Orientalis, is commonly cultivated in Cashmire, where it is said to arrive st a greater perfection than in other countries. This tree, which, in most parts of Asia, is called the Chinur, grows to the size of an oak, and has a taper, straight trunk, with a silver-colored bark; and its leaf, not unlike an expanded hand, is of a pale green. When in full foliage, it has a grand and beautiful appearance; and, in the hot weather, it affords a refreshing shade. - FORSTER.

The marriage bower. - IX. 4, p. 583

The Pandal is a kind of arbor or hower raised before the doors of young matricd women. They set up two or three poles, seven or eight foot in length, round which the leaves of the Pisan-tree, the symbol of joy, are entwined. These poles support others that are laid crossways, which are cov ered with leaves, in order to form a shade. The Siriperes are allowed to set up no more than three pillars, and the infringing of this custom would be sufficient to cause an insurrection. — A. Rogen, in Picart.

The market-flag. - IX. 6, p. 583.

Many villages have markets on particular days, when not only finits, grain, and the common necessaries of life are sold, but occasionally manufactures of various descriptions. These markets are well known to all the neighboring country, being on appointed days of the week, or of the lunar month; but, to remind those, who may be travelling, of their vicinity to tha means of supply, a naugaurah, or large kettle-drum, is beat during the forenoon, and a small flag, usually of white linea, with some symbolical figures in colors, or with a colored border, is hoisted on a very long bamboo, kept upright by means of ropes fastened to pins driven into the ground. The flags of Hindoo villages are generally square and plain; those of the Mussulman's towns are ordinarily triangular, and bear the type of their religion, viz. a double-bladed cimeter. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 100.

There, from the intolerable heat, The buffaloes retreat. — IX. 7, p. 583.

About noon, in hot weather, the buffalo throws herself into the water or mud of a tank, if there be one accessible at a convenient distance; and leaving nothing above water but her nose, continues there fir five or six hours, or until the beat abates. — BUCHANAN.

In the hot season, when water becomes very scarce, the buffalces avail themselves of any puddle they may find among the covers, wherein they roll and rub themselves, so as in a very short time to change what was st first a shallow flat, into a deep pit, sufficient to conceal their own bulk. The humidity of the soil, even when the water may have evaporated, is particularly gratifying to these animals, which cannot hear heat, and which, if not indulged in a free access to the water, never thrive. — Oriental Sports, vol. i, p. 259.

The buffalo not only delights in the water, but will not thrive unless it have a swamp to wallow in. There, rolling themselves, they speedily work deep hollows, wherein they lay immersed. No place seems to delight the buffalo more than the deep verdure on the confines of jiels and marshes, especially if surrounded by tall grass, so as to afford concealment and shade, while the body is covered by the water. In such situations they seem to enjoy a perfect eestasy, having, in general, nothing above the surface but their eyes and nostricly bidden from view. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 49.

Captain Beaver describes these animals as to he found during the heat of the day in the creeks and on the shores of the Island of Bulama, almost totally immerged in water, little more than their heads appearing above it.

Mount Meru. - X. p. 584.

According to the orthodox Hindus, the globe is divided into two hemispheres, both called Meru; but the superior hemisphere is distinguished by the name of Sumeru, which implies beauty and excellence, in opposition to the lower hemisphere, or Cumeru, which signifies the reverse: by Meru, without any adjunct, they generally mean the higher or northern hemisphere, which they describe, with a profusion of poetic imagery, as the seat of delights; while they represent Cumeru as the dreary habitation of demons, in some parts intensely cold, and in others so hot that the waters are continnally boiling. In strict propriety, Meru denotes the pole and the polar regions; but it is the celestial north pole round which they place the gardens and metropolis of Indra, while Yana holds his court in the opposite polar circle, or the station of Asuras, who warred with the Suras, or gods of the firmament, -- WILFORO, Asiatic Researches.

In the Faya Puránà, we are told, that the water or Ogha of the ocean, coming down from heaven like a stream of Amrita upon Mera, encircles it through seven channels, for the space of 81,000 Fojanas, and then divides into four streams, which, falling from the immense height of Meru, rest themselves in four lakes, from which they spring over the mountains through the air, just brushing the summits. This wild account was not unknown in the west; for this passage is translated almost verbally, by Pliny and Q. Curtins, in speaking of the Ganges. Cum magno fragore ipsius statum fontis Ganges erumpit, et magnorum montium juga recto alveo stringit, et ubi primum mollis planties contingent, in quodam lacu hospitatur. The words in Italies are from Pliny, (vi. c. Is.) the others from Curtins, (viii. c.). — CAFT. WILFORD. As. Res. vol., viii., p. 322. Calcutta edition.

The Swarganga, or Mandacini, rises from under the feet of Veeshno, at the polar star, and, passing through the circle of the moon, it falls upon the summit of Meru; where it divides into four streams, flowing towards the four cardinal points. These four branches pass through four rocks, carved into the shape of four heads of different animals. The Ganges, running towards the south, passes through a cow's head: to the west is a horse's head, from which flows the Chaashn or Oxus; towards the east, is the head of an elephant, from which flows the river Sita; and to the north, is a lion's head, from which flows the Bhadrasama. — WILFORD. As. Res. v. viii, p. 317. Calc, edition.

The mountains through which the Ganges flows at Hurdwar, present the spectator with the view of a grand natural amphitheatre; their appearance is rugged, and destitute of verdure; they run in ridges and hluff points, in a direction east and west: at the back of the largest range rise, towering to the clouds, the lofty mountains of Himmalayah, whose tops are covered with perpetual snow, which, on clear days, present a most sublime prospect. Their large jagged masses, broken into a variety of irregular shapes, added to their stupendous height, impress the mind with an idea of antiquity and grandear, coeval with the creation; and the eternal frost with which they are incruted, appears to preclude the possibility of mortals ever attaining their summit.

In viewing this grand spectacle of nature, the traveller may easily yield his assent to, and pardon the superstitions veneration of, the Hindoo votary, who, in the fervor of his imagination, assigns the summit of these icy regions as the abode of the great Mahadeo, or First Cause, where, seated on his throne of ice, he is supposed to receive the homage of the surrounding universe. — FRANKLIN's Life of George Thomas, p. 41.

At Gangóttara, three small streams fall down from impassable snowy precipices, and unite into a small hasin below, which is considered by the Hindus as the source of the Ganges, over which, at that place, a man can step. This is one of the five Tirthas, or stations, more eminently sacred than the rest upon this sacred river. Narayana Shastri, who gave this account, had visited it. — BUCHANAN.

The mountain, called Cailasa Cungri, is exceedingly lofty. On its summit there is a Bhowjputr tree, from the root of which sprouts or gushes a small stream, which the people say is the source of the Ganges, and that it comes from Vaicont'ha, or Heaven, as is also related in the Puránas; although this source appears to the sight to flow from the spot where grows this Bhowjputr tree, which is at an ascent of some miles; and yet above this there is a still loftier summit, where no one goes; but I have heard that, on that uppermost pinnacle, there is a fountain or cavity, to which a Jogui somehow penetrated, who, having immersed his little finger in it, it became petrified. — PURANA PORA. Asiatic Researches.

Respecting the true source of the Ganges much uncertainty still prevails. In vain one of the most powerful sovereigns of Indostan, the emperor Achar, at the close of the sixteenth century, sent a number of men, an army of discoverers, provided with every necessary, and the most potent recommendations, to explore the course of the mighty river which adorned and fertilized the vast extent of his dominions. They were not able to penetrate beyond the famous Mouth of the Coro. This is an immense aperture, in a ridge of the mountains of Thibet, to which the nutives of India have given this appellation, from the fancied or real resemblance of the rocks which form the stupendous chasm, to the mouth of an anomal esteemed sacred throughout Indostan from the remotest antiquity. From this opening, the Ganges, precipitating itself ioto a large and deep basin at the foot of the mountains, forms a cataract, which is called Gangotri. The impracticability of scaling these precipitous rocks, and advancing beyond this formidable pass, has prevented the tracing whence this rushing mass of water takes its primary rise. — WILCOCKE, Note to Stateorinus.

The birth of Ganges. - X. 2, p. 584.

I am indebted to Sir William Jones's Hymn to Ganga, for this fable :--

6	Above the stretch of mortal ken,
	On bless'd Cailasa's top, where every stem
	Glow'd with a vegetable gem,
	Mahe'sa stood, the dread and joy of men;
	While Parvati, to gain a hoon,
	Fix'd on his locks a heaniy moon,
	And hid his frontal eye in jocuad play,
	With reluctant sweet delay.
	All nature straight was lock'd in dim eclipse,
	Till Brahmans pure, with hallow'd lips,
	And warhled prayers, restored the day ;
	When Ganga from his brow, by heavenly fingers press'd, Sprang radiant, and, descending, graced the caveros of the west,"

The descent of the Ganges is related in the Ramayuna, one of the most celebrated of the sacred books of the Bramins. This work the excellent and learned Baptist missionaries at Serampore are at this time employed in printing and translating; one volume has arrived in Europe, and from it I am tempted here to insert an extract of considerable length. The reader will be less disposed to condemn the fictions of Kehama as extravagant, when he compares them with this genuine specimen of Hindoo fable. He will perceive, too, that no undue importance has been attributed to the Horse of the Sacrifice in the Poem.

" The son of Kooshika having, in mellifluous accents, related these things to Rama, again addressed the descendant of Kakootitha. Formerly, O hero ! there was a king of Hyoodhya, named Sugura, the Sovereign of Mea, virtuous, desirous of children, but childless ; O Rama! the daughter of Vidurhhakeshinee, virtuous, attached to truth, was his chief consort, and the daughter of Urishtunemi, Soomuti, unequalled in beauty, his second spouse. With these two consorts, the great king, going to Himuvat, engaged in sacred austerities on the mountain in whose sacred stream Bhrigoo constantly bathed. A hundred years being completed, the sage Bhrigoo, clothed with truth, readered propitious by his austerities, granted him this blessing : O sinless One ! thou shalt obtain a most numerous progeny; tby fame, O chief of men ! will be unparalleled in the universe. From one of thy consorts, O sire ! shall spring the founder of thy race, and, from the other, sixty thousand sons.

"The queens, pleased, approached the chief of men who was thus speaking, and, with hands respectfully joined, asked, O Brahman! who shall be the one son, and who shall produce the multitude? We, O Brahman! desire to hear May thy words be verified. Hearing their request, the most virtuous Bhrigoo replied in these admirable words: Freelysay which of these favors ye desire, whether the one, founder of the family, or the multitude of valiant, renowned, energetic sons. O Rama! son of Rughoo, Keshinee hearing the words of the sage, in the presence of the king accepted the one son, the founder of the family; and Soomit, sister of Soopurat, accepted the sixty thousand sons, active and renowned. The king, O son of Rughoo! having respectfully circumambulated the sage, howing the head, returned with his sponses to his own city.

"After some time had elapsed, his eldest spouse Keshinee hore to Sugura a son, named Usumunja; and Soomuti, O chief of men ! brought forth a gourd, from which, on its being opened, came forth sixty thousand sons. These, carefully brough up by their nurses, in jars filled with clarified butter, in process of time attained the state of youth; * and, after a long period, the sixty thousand soms of Sugura, possessed of youth and beauty, became men. The eldest son, the offspring of Sugura, O son of Rughoo! chief of men, seizing children, would throw them into the waters of the Suruyoo, and sport himself with their drowning pags. This evil person, the distresser of good onen, devoted to the injury of the citizens, was by his father expelled from the city. The son of Usununja, the heroic Ungshooman, in conversation courteous and affectionate, was esteemed by all.

"After a long time, O chief of men! Sugara formed the steady resolve, · I will perform a sacrifice." Versed in the Veda, the king, attended by his instructors, having determined the things relating to the sacrificial work, began to prepare the sarrifice.

" Hearing the words of Vishwa-mitra, the son of Rughoo, highly gratified in the midst of the story, addressed the sage, bright as the ardent flame, Peace he to Thee : I desire, O Brahman, to hear this story at large, how my predecessors performed the sacrifice. Hearing his words, Vishwa-mitra, smiling, pleasantly replied to Rama: 'Attend, then, O Rama! to the story of Sugura, repeated at full length. Where the great mountain Himuvat, the happy father-in-law of Shunkura, and the mountain Bindhyo, overlooking the country around, proudly vie with each other, there was the sacrifice of the great Sugara performed. That land, sacred and renowned, is the habitation of Rakshuses. At the command of Sugura, the hero Ungshooman, O Rama ! eminent in archery, a mighty charioteer, was the attendant (of the While the king was performing the sacrifice, a serhorse.t) pent, assuming the form of Ununta, rose from the earth, and seized the sacrificial horse. The sacrificial victim being stolen, all the priests, O son of Rughoo! going to the king, said, Thy consecrated horse has been stolen by some one in the form of a serpent. Kill the thief, and bring back the sacred horse. This interruption in the sacrifice portends evil to us all. Take those steps, O king ! which may lead to the completion of the sacrifice. Having heard the advice of his instructors, the king, calling his sixty thousand sons into the assembly, said, I perceive that the Rakshuses have not been to this great sacrifice. A sacrifice of the Nagas is now performing by the sages, and some god, in the form of a serpent, has stolen the devoted horse. Whoever he be, who, at the time of the Deeksha, has been the cause of this afflictive circumstance, this unhappy event, whether he be gone to Patala, or whether he remain in the waters, kill him, O sons ! and bring hack my victim. May success attend you, O my sons! At my command traverse the sea-girt earth, digging with mighty labor, till you obtain a sight of the horse ; each one piercing the carth to the depth of a yojuna, go you in search of him who stole the sacred horse. Being consecrated by the Decksha, I, with my grandson, and my teachers, will remain with the sacrifice unfinished, till I again behold my devoted horse.'

"Thus instructed by their father Sugara, they, in obedience to him, went with cheerfal mind, O Rama ! to the hottom of the earth. The strong ones, having gone over the earth without obtaining a sight of the hore, each of these mighty men pierced the carth to the depth of a yojuna, with their mighty arm, the stroke of which resembled the thunderholt. Pierced by Kooddalas; thy Purigibas, § by Shooks.]| by Mooshulas, ¶ and Shuktis, the earth cried out as in darkness. Then arose, O Raghuva ! a dreadful cry of the serpents, the Usooras, the Rakshusses, and other creatures, as of beings suffering death. These angry youths, O son of Rughao ! dug the earth even to Patala, to the extent of sixty thousand yojunas. Thus, O prince ! the sons of the sovering of men traversed Jumboodweepa, enclosed with mountains, digging wherever they came. The gods now, with the Gundhurwas and the great serpents, struck with astonishment, went all of them to Bruhma, and, bowing even to the foot of the great spirit, they, full of terror, with dejected countenance, addressed him thus: 'O Deva! O divine One! the whole earth, covered with mountains and woods, with rivers and continents, the sons of Sugura are now digging up. By these digging, O Bruhma! the mightiest beings are killed. This is the stealer of our consecrated victims; by this (fellow) our horse was taken away.' Thus saying, these sons of Sugura destroy all creatures. O most Powerful! having head this, it becomes the to interpose, before these horse-seekers destroy all thy creatures endued with life.''

Thus far the thirty-second Section, describing the digging of earth.

SECTION THIRTY-THREE.

" Hearing the words of the gods, the divine Bruhma replied to these affrighted ones, stupefied with the Yuma-like power of these youths : The wise Vasoo-deva, the great Madhuva, who claims the earth for his sponse, that divine one, residing in the form of Kupila, supports the earth. By the fire of his wrath he will destroy the sons of the king. This piercing of the earth must, I suppose, he perceived by him, and he will (effect) the destruction of the long-sighted sons of Sugura. The thirty-three gods,* enemy subduing, having heard the words of Bruhma, returned home full of joy. The sons of Sugura highly renowned, thus digging the earth, a sound was produced resembling that of conflicting elements. Having encompassed and penetrated the whole earth, the sons of Sugura, returning to their father, said, The whole earth has been traversed by us; and all the powerful gods, the Danuvas, the Ruckshuses, the Pishachas, the serpents, and hydras aref killed; but we have not seen thy horse, nor the thief. What shall we do? Success be to thee : he pleased to determine what more is proper. The virtuous king, having heard the words of his sons, O son of Rughoo! angrily replied, Again commence digging. Having penetrated the earth, and found the stealer of the horse, having accomplished your intention, return again. Attentive to the words of their father, the great Sugara, the sixty thousand descended to Patala, and there renewed their digging. There, O chief of men! they saw the elephan* of that quarter of the globe, in size resembling a mountain, with distorted eyes, supporting with his head this earth, with its mountains and forests, covered with various countries, and adorned with numerona cities. When, for the sake of rest, O Kakootsha! the great elephant, through distress, refreshes himself by moving his head, an carthquake is produced.

" Having respectfully circumambulated this mighty elephant, guardian of the quarter, they, O Rama ! praising him, penetrated into Patala. After they had thus penetrated the east quarter, they opened their way to the south. Here they saw that great elephant Muha-pudma, equal to a huge mountain, sustaining the earth with his head. Beholding him, they were filled with surprise ; and, after the usual circumambulation, the sixty thousand sons of the great Sugura perforated the west quarter. In this these mighty ones saw the elephant Soumunusa, of equal size. Having respectfully saluted him, and inquired respecting his health, these valiant ones digging. arrived at the north. In this quarter, O chief of Rughuo ! they saw the snow-white elephant Bhudra, supporting this earth with his beautiful body. Circumambulating him, they again penetrated the earth, and proceeding north-east to that re nowned quarter; all the sons of Sugura, through anger, pierced the earth again. There all those magnanimous ones, terrible in swiftness, and of mighty prowess, saw Kupila, Vasodeva the eternal, ‡ and near him the horse feeding. Filled, O son of Rughuo! with unparalleled joy, they all, knowing him to be the stealer of the horse, with eyes starting with rage, seizing their spades and their langulas, and even trees and stones, ran towards him fall of wrath, calling ont, Stop, stop! thou at the stealer of our sacrificial horse: Thou stupid one, know that we who have found thee are the sons of Rughoo. Kupila, filled with excessive anger, uttered from his nostrik a loud sound, and instantly, O Kakoostha! by Kupila of immeasurable power, were all the sons of Sugura turned to a heap of ashes.²¹

Thus far the thirty-third Section, describing the interview with Kupila.

SECTION THIRTY-FOUR.

"O son of Rughoo! Sugura, perceiving that his sons had been absent a long time, thus addressed his grandson, illustions by his own might: Thou art a hero, possessed of science, in prowess equal to thy predecessors. Search out the fate of thy paternal relatives, and the person by whom the horse was stolen, that we may avenge ourselves on these subterraneous beings, powerful and great. Take thy cimeter and bow, O beloved one I and finding out thy deceased paternal relatives, destroy my adversary. The proposed end being thus accomplished, return Bring me happily through this sacrifice.

" Thus particularly addressed by the great Sugara, Ungshooman, swift and powerful, taking his bow and eimeter, departed. Urged by the king, the chief of men traversed the subterraneous road dug by his great ancestors. There the mighty one saw the elephant of the quarter, adored by the gods, the Dannyas and Rukshuses, the Pishachas, the birds and the serpents. Having circumambulated him, and asked concerning his welfare, Ungshooman inquired for his paternal relatives, and the stealer of the sacred victim. The mighty elephant of the quarter hearing, replied, O son of Usumunja! thou wilt accomplish thine intention, and speedily return with the horse. Having heard this, he, with due respect, inquired, in regular succession, of all the elephants of the quarters. Honored by all these guardians of the eight sides of the earth, acquainted with speech, and eminent in cloquence, he was told, Thou wilt return with the horse. Upon this encouraging declaration, he swiftly went to the place where lay his paternal relatives, the sons of Sugara, reduced to a heap of ashes. (At this sight) the son of Usumunja, overwhelmed with sorrow on account of their death, cried out with excess of grief. In this state of grief, the chief of men beheld, grazing near, the sacriticial horse. The illustrious one, desirous of performing the funeral obsequies of these sons of the king, looked around for n receptacle of water, but in vain. Extending his cager view, he saw, O Rama ! the sovereign of birds, the nucle of his paternal relatives, Soopurna, in size resembling a mountain. Vinuteya, of mighty prowess, addressed him thus ; Grieve not, O chief of men ! this slaughter is approved by the universe, These great ones were reduced to ashes by Kupila of unmeasurable might. It is not proper for thee, O wise one ! to pour common water upon these ashes. Gunga, O chief of men! is the eldest daughter of Himuvnt. With her sacred stream, O valiant one ! perform the funeral veremonies for thine ancestors. If the purifier of the world flow on them, reduced to a heap of ashes, these ashes being wetted by Gunga, the illuminator of the world, the sixty thousand sons of thy grandfather will be received into heaven. May success attend thee ! Bring Gunga to the earth from the residence of the gods. If thou art able, O chief of men ! possessor of the ample share, let the descent of Gunga be accomplished by thee. Take the horse, and go forth. It is thine, O hero! for to complete the great paternal sacrifice.

"Having heard these words of Soopurna, Ungshooman, the heroic, speedily seizing the horse, returned. Then, O son of Rughoo! being come to the king, who was still performing the initiatory ceremonics, he related to him the whole affair, and the advice of Soopurna.

¹⁶ After hearing the terror-inspiring relation of Ungshooman, the king finished the sacrifice, in exact conformity to the tenor and spirit of the ordinance; having tinished his sacrifice, the sovereign of the earth returned to his palace. The king, however, was unable to devise any way for the descent of Gunga from heaven; after a long time, unable to fix upon any method, he departed to heaven, having reigned thirty thousand years.

"Sugara having, O Rama! paid the debt of nature, the people chose Ungshooman, the pious, for their sovereign. Ungshooman, O son of Rughoo! was a very great monarch. His son was called Dwileepa. Having placed him on the throne, he, O Raguva ! retiring to the pleasant top of Mount Himuvut, performed the most severe austerities. This excellent sovereign of men, illustrious as the immortals, was exceedingly desirons of the descent of Gunga ; but not obtaining his wish, the renowned monarch, rich in sacred austerities, departed to heaven, after having abode in the forest sacred to austerities thirty-two thousand years. Dwileepa, the highly energetic, heing made acquainted with the slaughter of his paternal great-uncles, was overwhelmed with grief; but was still unable to fix upon a way of deliverance. How shall I accomplish the descent of Gunga? How shall I perform the funeral ablutions of these relatives? How shall I deliver them? In such cogitations was his mind constantly engaged. While these ideas filled the mind of the king, thoroughly acquainted with sacred duties, there was born to him a most virtuons son, called Bhugee-rutha. The illustrious king Dwilcepa performed many sacrifices, and governed the kingdom for thirty thousand years; but, O chief of men ! no way of obtaining the deliverance of his ancestors appearing, he, by a disease, discharged the debt of nature. Having installed his own son Bhugee-rutha in the kingdom, the lord of men departed to the paradise of Indra, through the merits of his own virtuous deeds.

" The pious, the royal sage, Bhugee-rutha, O son of Rughoo! was childless. Desirons of offspring, yet childless, the great monarch intrusted the kingdom to the care of his counsellors; and, having his heart set on obtaining the descent of Gunga, engaged in a long course of sacred austerities upon the mountain Gokurna. With hands erected, he, O son of Rughoo! surrounded in the hot season with five fires,* according to the prescribed ordinance in the cold season lying in water; and in the rainy season exposed to the descending clouds, feeding on fallen leaves, with his mind restrained, and his sensual feelings subdued, this valiant and great king continued a thousand years in the practice of the most severe austerities. The magnanimous monarch of mighty arm having finished this period, the divine Bruhma, the lord of creatures, the supreme governor, was highly pleased; and with the gods. going near to the great Bhugee-rutha, employed in sacred austerities, said to him, I am propitious. O performer of sacred vows ! ask a blessing. The mighty, the illustrious Bhugee-rutha, with hands respectfully joined, replied to the sire of all, O divine one ! if thou art pleased with me, if the fruit of my austerities may be granted, let all the sons of Sugura obtain water for their funeral rites. The ashes of the great ones heing wetted by the water of Gunga, let all my ancestors ascend to the eternal heaven.† Let a child, O divine one ? he granted to ns, that our family become not extinct. O God ! let this great blessing be granted to the family of Ikshwakoo. The venerable sire of all replied to the king thus requesting in the sweetest and most pleasing accents ; Bhugeerutha, thou mighty charioteer, be this great wish of thine heart accomplished. Let prosperity attend thee, thou increaser of the family of Ikshwakoo! Engage Hura, O king! to receive (in her descent) Gunga the eldest daughter of the mountain Himuvnt. The earth, O king ! cannot sustain the descent of Gunga, nor beside Shooleef do I behold any one, O king! able to receive her. The creator having thus replied to the king, and spoken to Gunga, returned to heaven with Macroots and all the gods."

Thus far the thirty-fourth Section, describing the gift of the blessing to Bughee-rntha.

SECTION THIRTY-FIVE.

"Pruja-puti being gone, Bhugee-rutha, O Rama ! with uplifted arm, without support, without a helper, immovable as a dry tree, and feeding on air, remained day and night on the tip of his great toe upon the afflicted earth. A full year having now elapsed, the husband of Ooma, and the lord of animals, who is reverenced by all worlds, said to the king, I am propitious to thee, O chief of men? I will accomplish thy utmost desire. To him the sovereign replied, O Ilura, receive | Gunga ! Bhurga,* thus addressed, replied, I will perform thy desire; I will receive her on my head, the daughter of the mountain. Muheshwra then, mounting on the summit of Himuvut, addressed Gunga, the river flowing in the ether, saying, Descend, O Gunga ! The eldest daughter of Himuvut, adored by the universe, having heard the words of the lord of Ooma, was tilled with anger, and assuming, O Rama ! a form of amazing size, with insupportable celerity, fell from the air upon the auspicious head of Shiva. The goddess Gunga, irresistible, thought within herself, 1 will bear down Shunkura with my stream, and enter Patala. The divine Hura, the three-eyed God, was aware of her proud resolution, and, being angry, determined to prevent her design. The purifier, fallen upon the sacred head of Roodra, was detained, O Rama! in the recesses of the orb of his Juta, resembling llimuvut, and was unable, by the greatest efforts, to descend to the earth. From the borders of the orb of his Juta, the goddess could not obtain regress, but wandered there for many series of years. Thus situated, Bhugee-rutha beheld her wandering there, and again engaged in severe austerities.

"With these austerities, O son of Rughoo! Hura being greatly pleased, discharged Gunga towards the lake Vindoe. In her flowing forth seven streams were produced. Three of these streams, † heautiful, filled with water conveying happiness, liladinee, Pavunee, and Nulinee, directed their course eastward ; while Soochukohoo, I Seeta,  and Sindhoo, it three pellucid mighty rivers, flowed to the west. The seventh of these streams followed king Bhugee-rutha. The royal sage, the illustrious Bhugee-rutha, seated on a resplendent car, led the way, while Gunga followed. Pouring down from the sky upon the head of Shunkura, and afterwards upon the earth, her streams rolled along with a shrill sound. The earth was willingly chosen by the fallen fishes, the turtles, the porpoises, and the birds. The royal sages, the Gundhurvas, the Yukshas, and the Siddhas, beheld her falling from the ether to the earth; yea, the gods, immeasurable in power, filled with surprise, came thither with chariots resembling a city, horses, and elephants, and litters, desirous of seeing the wonderful and unparalleled descent of Gunga into the world, Irradiated by the descending gods, and the splendor of their ornaments, the cloudless atmosphere shone with the splendor of a hundred suns, while, by the nneasy porpoises, the serpents, and the fishes, the air was coruscated as with lightning. Through the white foam of the waters, spreading in a thousand directions, and the flights of water-fowl, the atmosphere appeared tilled with autumnal clouds. The water, pure from defilement, falling from the head of Shunkurn, and thence to the earth, ran in some places with a rapid stream, in others in a tortuous current; here widely spreading, there descending into caverns, and again spouting upward; in some places it moved slowly, stream uniting with stream; while repelled in others, it rose upwards, and again fell to the earth. Knowing its purity, the sages, the Gundhurvas, and the inhabitants of the earth, touched the water fallen from the body of Bhuva.11 Those who, through a curse, had fallen from heaven to earth, having performed ablution in this stream, became free from sin; cleansed from sin by this water, and restored to happiness, they entered the sky, and returned again to beaven. By this illustrious stream was the world rejoiced, and by performing ablution in Gunga, became free from impurity.

"The royal sage, Bhugee-rutha, full of energy, went before, seated on his resplendent car, while Gunga followed after. The gods, O Rama ! with the sages, the Dityas, the Danuvas, the Rakshuses, the chief Gundhurvas, and Yukshas, with the Kinnuras, the chief serpents, and all the Upsuras, together, with aquatic animals, following the chariot of Bhugee-rutha, attended Gunga. Whither king Bhugee-rutha went, thither went the renowned Gunga, the chief of streams, the destroyer of all sin.

"After this, Gunga, in her course, inundated this sacrificial ground of the great Juhnoo of astonishing deeds, who was then offering sacrifice. Juhnoo, O Rughuva! perceiving her pride enraged, drank up the whole of the water of Gungaa most astonishing deed! At this the gods, the Gundhurvas, and the sages, exceedingly surprised, adored the great Juhnoo, the most excellent of men, and named Gunga the daughter of this great sage.

"The illustrious chief of men, pleased, discharged Gunga from his ears. Having liberated her, he, recognizing the great Bhugee-rutha, the chief of kings, then present, duly honored him, and returned to the place of sacrifice. From this deed Gunga, the daughter of Jahnoo, obtained the name Jahnuvee.

"Gunga now went forward again, following the chariot of Bhugee-rutha. Having reached the sea, the chief of streams proceeded to Patala, to accomplish the work of Bughee-rutha. The wise and royal sage, having, with great labor, conducted Gunga thither, there beheld his ancestors reduced to ashes Then, O chief of Rughoo's rave, that heap of ashes, bathed by the excellent waters of Gunga, and purified from sin, the sons of the king obtained heaven. Having arrived at the sea, the king, followed by Gunga, entered the subterraneous regions, where lay the sacred ashes. After these, O Rama ! had been laved by the water of Gunga, Bruhma, the lord of all, thus addressed the king: O chief of men! thy predecessors, the sixty thousand sons of the great Sugara, are all delivered by thee; and the great and perennial receptacle of water, called by Sugara's name, shall henceforth he universally known by the appellation of Sagura.* As long, O king ! as the waters of the sea continue in the earth, so long shall the sons of Sugura remain in heaven, in all the splendor of gods.

"This Gunga, O king ! shall be thy eldest daughter, known throughout the three worlds (by the name) Bhagee-ruthee; and because she passed through the earth, the chief of rivers shall be called Gunga | throughout the universe. (She shall also be) called Triputhaga, on account of her proceeding forward in three different directions, watering the three worlds. Thus is she named hy the gods and sages. She is called Gunga, O sovereign of the Vashyas! on account of her flowing through Gang; ‡ and her third name, O thou observer of vows! is Bhagee-ruthee. O, accomplished one! through affection to thee, and regard to me, these names will remain ; as long as Gunga, the great river, shall remain in the world, so long shall thy deathless fame live throughout the universe. O lord of men! O king! perform here the funeral rites of all thine ancestors. Relinquish thy vows, § O king! this devout wish of theirs was not obtained by thine ancestors highly renowned, chief among the pious ; not by Ungshooman, naparalleled in the universe, so earnestly desiring the descent of Gunga, O beloved one! was this object of desire obtained. Nor, O possessor of prosperity ! O sinless one ! could she he (obtained) by thine illustrious father Dwileepa, the Rajurshi eminently accomplished, whose energy was equal to that of a Muhurshi, and who, established in all the virtues of the Kshutras, in sacred austerities equalled myself. This great design has been fully accomplished by thee, O chief of men ! Thy fame, the blessing so much desired, will spread throughout the world. O subduer of cnemics ! this descent of Gunga has been effected by thee. This Gunga is the great abode of virtue; by this deed thou art become possessed of the divisity itself. In this stream constantly hathe thyself, C chief of men ! Furified, O most excellent of mortals ne a partaker of the fruit of holiness; perform the funeral ceremonies of all thy ancestors. May blessings attend thee, O chief of mea ! I return to heaven.

"The renowned one, the sovereign of the gods, the size of the universe, having thus spoken, returned to heaven.

"King Bhugee-ruth, the royal sage, having performed the funcral ceremonies of the descendants of Sugara, in properorder of succession, according to the ordinance; the renowned one having also, O chief of ment performed the customary

"Thus, O Rama! has the story of Gunga been related at large by me. May prosperity attend thee: may every good be thine. The evening is fast receding. He who causes this relation, securing wealth, fame, longevity, posterity, and heaven, to be heard among the Brahmans, the Kshutriyas, or the other tribes of men, his ancestors rejoice, and to him are the gods propitious : and he who hears this admirable story of the descent of Gunga, ensuring long life, shall obtain, O Kakootstha! all the wishes of his heart. All his sins shall be destroyed, and his life and fame be abundantly prolonged." End of the thirty-fifth Section, describing the descent of Gunga.

Parvati. - X. 2, p. 584.

A.l the Devatas, and other inhabitants of the celestial regions, heing collected at the snmmons of Bhagavat, to arrange the ceremonials of the marriage of Sceva and Parvati, first came Brahma, mounted on his goose, with the Reyshees at his stirrup ; next Veeshnu, riding on Garoor, bis eagle, with the chank, the chakra, the club, and the pedive in his hands; Eendra also, and Yama, and Cuvera, and Varuna, and the rivers Ganga and Jumna, and the seven Seas. The Gandarvas also, and Apsaras, and Vasookee, and other serpents, in obedience to the commands of Seeva, all dressed in superb chains and habits of ceremony, were to be seen in order amidst the crowded and glittering cavalcade.

And now, Seeva, after the arrival of all the Devetas, and the completion of the preparations for the procession, set out, in the utmost pomp and splendor, from the mountain Kilas. His third eye flamed like the snn, and the crescent on his forchead assumed the form of a radiated diadem ; his snakes were exchanged for chains and necklaces of pearls and rubies, his ashes for sandal and perfume, and his elephant's skin for a silken rohe, so that none of the Devetas in brilliance came near his figure. The bridal attendants now spread wide abroad the carpet of congratulation, and arranged in order the banquet of bliss. Nature herself assumed the appearance of renovated youth, and the sorrowing universe recalled its longforgotten happiness. The Gandarvas and Apsaras began their includious songs, and the Genes and Keeners displayed the magic of their various musical instruments. The earth and its inhabitants exulted with tongues of glorification and triumph : fresh moisture invigorated the withered victims of time; a thousand happy and animating conceptions inspired the hearts of the intelligent, and enlightened the wisdom of the thoughtful : The kingdom of external forms obtained gladness ; the world of intellect acquired brightness. The dwellers upon earth stocked the casket of their ideas with the jewels of delight, and reverend pilgrims exchanged their beads for pearls. The joy of those on earth ascended up to heaven, and the Tree of the bliss of those in Heaven extended its auspicions branches downwards to the carth. The eyes of the Devetas flamed like torches on beholding these scenes of rapture, and the hearts of the just kindled like touchwood on hearing these ravishing symphonics. Thus Seeva set off like a garden in full blow, and paradise was eclipsed by his motion. - MAU-BICE, from the Seeva-Pooruun.

Thereat the heart of the Universe stood still. - X. 2, p. 584.

Long after these lines were written, I was amused at finding a parallel passage in a sermon :

Surya. - X 16, p. 586.

Surva, the Sun. The poets and painters describe his car as drawa by seven green horses, preceded by Arun, or the Dawn who acts as his charioteer, and followed by thousands of genii, worshipping him, and modulating his praises. Surya is believed to have descended frequently from his car in a human shape, and to have left a race on earth, who are equally renowned in the Indian stories with the Heliadai of Greece. It is very singular that his two sons, called Aswinau or Aswinicumarau, in the Dual, should be considered as twin brothers, and painted like Castor and Pollux ; but they have each the character of Æsculapius among the gods, and are believed to have been born of a nymph, who, in the form of a mare, was impregnated with sunbeams. - Sir W. Jones.

That sun, O daughter of Ganga! than which nothing is higher, to which nothing is equal, ealightens the annmit of the sky - with the sky enlightens the earth - with the earth enlightens the lower worlds; enlightens the higher worlds, enlightens other worlds ; - it enlightens the breast, - enlightens all besides the breast. - Sir W. JONES, from the Veda.

Forgetful of his Dragon foe. - X. 16, p. 586.

Ra'hu was the son of Cas'napa and Ditu, according to some authorities ; but others represent Sinhica' (perhaps the sphinx) as his natural mother. He had four arms; his lower parts ended in a tail like that of a dragon; and his aspect was grim and gloomy, like the darkness of the chaos, whence he had also the name of Tamas. He was the adviser of all mischief among the Daityas, who had a regard for him; but among the De'vetas it was his chief delight to sow dissension ; and when the gods had produced the amrit, by churning the ocean, he disguised himself like one of them, and received a portion of it; but the Sun and Moon having discovered his fraud, Vishnu severed his head and two of his arms from the rest of his monstrous body. That part of the nectureous fluid which he had time to swallow secured his immortality : his trunk and dragon-like tail fell on the mountain of Malaya, where Mini, a Brahmon, carefully preserved them by the name of Ce'tu; and, as if a complete hody had been formed from them, like a dismembered polype, he is even said to have adopted Cetu as his own child. The head, with two arms, fell on the sands of Barbara, where Pi't'he'na's was then walking with Sinhica', by some called his wife : They carried the Daitya to their palace, and adopted him as their son ; whence he acquired the name of Paite he'nasi. This extravagant fable is, no doubt, astronomical ; Ra'hu and Cr'tu being clearly the nodes, or what astrologers call the head and tail of the dragon. It is added, that they appeased Vishnu, and obtained re-admission to the firmament, but were no longer visible from the earth, their enlightened sides being turned from it; that Ra'hu strives, during eclipses, to wreak vengeance on the Sun and Moon, who detected him; and that Ce'tu often appears as a comet, a whirlwind, a fiery meteor, a water-spout, or a column of sand. - WILFORD. Suras. - X. 18, p. 586.

The word Sura, in Sauscrit, signifies both wine and true wealth ; hence, in the first C'hand of the Ramayan of VALMIC, it is expressly said that the Devetas, having received the Sura, acquired the title of Suras, and the Doilyas that of Asura, from not having received it. The Veda is represented as that wine and true wealth. - PATERSON. Asiat. Researches.

Eternal CAMA ! or doth SMARA bright, Or prond ANANGA, give the more delight? Sir W Jones.

He was the son of M_{XYX} , or the general attracting power, and married to REITY, or Affection, and his boson friend is BESSENT, or Spring. He is represented us a beautiful youth, bometimes conversing with his mother and consort in the midst of his gardens and temples; sometimes riding by moonlight on a parrot or lory, and attended by dancing girls or nymphs, the foremost of whom bears his colors, which are a fish on a red ground. His favorite place of resort is a large tract of country round Agra, and principally the plains of Matra, where KRISHEN also, and the nine GoPLA, who are elearly the Apollo and Mass of the Greeks, usually spend the night with music and dance. His how of sugar-cane or flowers, with a string of hees, and his fire arrows, each pointed with an Indian blossom of a heating quality, are allegories equally new and beautiful.

It is possible that the words Dipue and Cupid, which have the same signification, may have the same origin; since we know that the old Hetrorians, from whom great part of the Roman language and religion was derived, and whose system had a near affinity with that of the Persians and Indians, used to write their lines alternately forwards and backwards, as furrows are made by the plough. — Sir W. JONES.

Mahadeva and Parvati were playing with dice at the ancient game of Chaturanga, when they disputed, and parted in wrath ; the goddess retiring to the forest of Gauri, and the god repairing to Cushadwip. They severally performed rigid acts of devotion to the Supreme Being ; but the bres which they kindled blazed so vehemently as to threaten a general conflagration. The Devas, in great alarm, hastened to Brahma, who led them to Mahadeva, and supplicated him to recall his consert ; but the wrathful deity only answered, That she must come by her own free choice. They accordingly despatched Ganga, the river goddess, who prevailed on Parvati to return to him, on condition that his love for her should be restored. The celestial mediators then employed Cama-Deva, who wounded Mahadeva with one of his flowery arrows ; but the angry divinity reduced him to ashes with a flame from his eye. Parvati soon after presented herself before him in the form of a Cirati, or daughter of a mountaineer, and, seeing him enamored of her, resumed her own shape. In the place where they were reconciled, a grove sprang up, which was named Camavana; and the relenting god, in the character of Cameswara, consoled the afflicted Reti, the widow of Cama, by assuring her that she should rejoin her husband when he should be born again in the form of Pradyumna, son of Crishna, and should put Samhara to death. 'This favorable prediction was in due time accomplished, and Pradyumna having sprung to life, he was instantly seized by the demon Sambara, who placed him in a chest, which he threw into the occan ; but a large fish, which had swallowed the chest, was caught in a net, and carried to the palace of a tyrant, where the unfortunate Reti had been compelled to do menial service. It was her lot to open the fish, and seeing an infant in the chest, she nursed him in private, and educated him, till he had sufficient strength to destroy the malignant Sambara. He had before considered Reti as his mother ; but the minds of them both being irradiated, the prophecy of Mahadeva was remembered, and the God of Love was again united with the Goddess of Pleasure. - WILFORD Asiatic Researches.

Eating his very core of life away. - X1. 5, p. 588.

One of the wonders of this country is the Jiggerkhar, (or liver-cater.) One of this class can steal away the liver of another by looks and incantations. Other accounts say, that, by looking at a person, he deprives him of his senses, and then steals from him something resembling the seed of a pomegranate, which he hides in the calf of his leg. The Jiggerkhar throws on the fire the grain before described, which thereupon spreads to the size of a dish, and he distributes it amongst his fellows, to be eaten ; which ceremony concludes the life of the fuscinated person. A Jiggerkhar is uble to communicate his art to another, which he does by learning him the incantations and by making him eat a bit of the liver-cake. If any one cut open the ca f of the magician's leg, extract the grain, and give it to the afflicted person to eat, he immediately recovers. Those Jiggerkhars are mostly women. It is said, moreover, that they can bring intelligence from a great distance in a short space of time; and if they are thrown into a river, with a stone tied to them, they nevertheless will not sink. In order to deprive any one of this wicked power, they brand his temples, and every joint in his body, cram his eyes with salt, suspend him for forty days in a subterraneous cavern, and repeat over him certain incentations. In this state he is called Detche-rch. Although, after having undergone this discipline, he is not able to destroy the liver of any one, yet he retains the power of being able to discover another Jiggerkhar, and is used for detecting those discover another apotion, or by repeating an incentation. Many other marvellous stories are told of these people. — AVEEN ACEEN.

An Arabian old woman, by name Meluk, was thrown in prison, on a charge of having bewitched, or, as they call it, eaten the heart of a young native of Ormnz, who had lately, from being a Christian, turned Mahommedan. The cause of offence was, that the young man, after keeping company some time with one of her daughters, had forsaken her ; he himself, who was in a pitiable condition, and in danger of his life, was one of her accusers. This sort of witchcraft, which the Indians call eating the heart, and which is what we call bewitching as sorcerers do by their venomous and deadly looks, is not a new thing, nor unheard of elsewhere; for many persons practised it formerly in Sclavonia, and the country of the Triballes, as we learn from Ortelius, who took the account from Pliny, who, upon the report of Isigones, testifies, that this species of enchantment was much in use among these people, and many others whom he mentions, as it is at present here, especially among the Arabians who inhabit the western coast of the Persian gulf, where this art is common. The way in which they do it is only by the eyes and the mouth, keeping the eyes fixed steadily upon the person whose heart they design to eat, and pronouncing, hetween their teeth, I know not what diabolical words, by virtue of which, and by the operation of the devil, the person, how balo and strong soever, falls immediately into an unknown and incurable disease, which makes him appear phthisical, consumes him little by little, and at last destroys him. And this takes place faster or slower as the heart is eaten, as they say ; for these sorcerers can either eat the whole or a part only; that is, can consume it entirely and at once, or hit by bit, as they please. The vulgar give it this name, because they believe that the devil, acting upon the imagination of the witch when she mutters her wicked words, represents invisibly to her the heart and entrails of the patient, taken out of his body, and makes her devour them. In which these wretches find so delightful a task, that very often, to satisfy their appetite, without any impulse of resentment or ennity, they will destroy innocent persons, and even their nearest relatives, as there is a report that our prisoner killed one of her own daughters in this manner.

This was confirmed to me by a similar story, which I heard at Ispahan, from the mouth of P. Sebastian de Jesus, a Portuguese Augustinian, a man to be believed, and of singular virtue, who was prior of their convent when I departed. He assured me, that, in one of the places dependent upon Portu gal, on the confines of Arabia Felix, 1 know not whether it was at Mascate or at Orniuz, an Arab having been taken up for a similar crime, and convicted of it, for he confessed the fact, the captain, or governor of the place, who was a Portuguese, that he might better understand the truth of these black and devilish actions, of which there is no doubt in this country, made the sorcerer be brought before him before he was led to his punishment, and asked him, if he could cat the inside of a cucumber without opening it, as well as the heart of a man? The sorcerer said yes ; and, in order to prove it, a cucumber was brought : he looked at it, never touching it, steadily for some time, with his usual enchantments, and then told the captain he had eaten the whole inside; and accordingly when it was opened, nothing was found but the rind. This is not impossible ; for the devil, of whom they make use in these operations, having, in the order of nature, greater power than all inferior creatures, ean, with God's permission, produce these effects, and others more marvellous.

The same father told me, that one of these sorcerers, whether it was the same or not I do not know, having been taken for a similar offence, was asked if he could eat the heart of the Portuguese captain ? and he replied no; for the Franks had a certain thing upon the breast, which covered them like a cuirass, and was so impenetrable, that it was proof against all his charms. This can be nothing else but the virtue of baptism, the armor of the faith, and the privileges of the sons of the church, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail.

To return, however, to my first subject : - This witch of Combru made some difficulty at first to confess her guilt ; but seeing herself pressed with threats of death, and being led, in fact, to the public square, where I saw her with the sick young man, she said, that though she had not been the cause of his complaint, perhaps she could cure it, if they would let her remain alone with him, in his house, without interruption; by which she tacitly confessed her witchcraft: for it is held certain in these countries, that these wicked women can remove the malady which they have caused, if it he not come to the last extremity. And of many remedies which they use to restore health to the sufferers, there is one very extraordinary, which is, that the witch casts something out of her mouth, like the grain of a pomegranate, which is believed to be a part of the heart she had eaten. The patient picks it up immediately, as part of his own intestines, and greedily swallows it; and by this means, as if his heart was replaced in his body, he recovers by degrees his health. I dare not assure you of these things as certainly true, not having myself seen them, surpassing as they do the course of nature. If they are as is said, it can be only in appearance, by the illusions of the devil; and if the afflicted recover actually their health, it is because the same devil ceases to torment them. Without dwelling longer upon these curious speculations, the witch having given hopes that she would cure the patient, the officers promised that she should receive no injury, and they were both sent home ; but an archer was set over her as a guard, that she might not escape. - PIETRO DELLA VALLE.

The Calis. - XI. 6, p. 588.

The Calis and Pandaris are the protectresses of cities; each city has its own. They address prayers to these tutelary divinities, and build temples to them, offering to them blood in sacrifice, and sometimes human victims. These objects of worship are not immortal, and they take their name from the city over which they preside, or from the form in which they are represented. They are commonly framed of a gigantic stature, having several arms, and the head surrounded with frames; several force animals are also placed under their fect.—SOMERAT

Sani, the dreadful God, who rides abroad Upon the King of the Ravens. - X1. 6, p. 588.

Major Moor has a curious remark upon this subject : -" Sani being among the astrologers of India, as well as with their sapicut brethren of Europe, a planet of malignant aspects, the ill-omened raven may be deemed a fit Vahan for such a dreaded being. But this is not, I think, a sufficient reason for the conspicuous introduction of the raven into the mythological machinery of the Hindu system, so accurate, so connected, and so complete in all its parts; although the investigations that it hath hitherto undergone have not fully developed or reached such points of perfection. Now let me ask the reason, why, both in England and in India, the raven is so rare a bird? It breeds every year, like the crow, and is much longer lived ; and while the latter bird abounds every where, to a degree bordering on nuisance, a pair of ravens, for they are seldom seen singly or in trius, are searcely found duplicated in any place. Perhaps, take England or India over, two pair of ravens will not be found, on an average, in the extent of five hundred or a thousand acres. I know not, for I write where I have no access to books, if our naturalists have sought the theory of this ; or whether it may have first occurred to me, which it did while contemplating the character and attributes of Sani, that the raven destroys its young ; and if this notion be well founded, and on no other can I account for the rareness of the annual-breeding, long-lived raven, we shall at once see the propriety of symbolizing it with he Saturn, or Kronos, or Time, devouring or destroying his own ed offspring." — Moon's Hindu Pantheon, p. 311.

"It is remarked by Naturalists, that young ravens are forsaken before they are fledged; and therefore they would starve, if Providence had not appointed that the scraps of raw meat dropped round the nest should engender maggoets and worms which serve to support them till they are in a condition to rove for food. And thus it is he feedeth the ravens." From an old Magazine.

A similar invention occurs in Dr. Reaumont's Psyche, one of the most extraordinary poems in our language. I am far from claiming any merit for such inventions, which no man can value more cleaply, —but such as it is, I am not beholden for it to this forgotten writer, whose strange, long, but by no means uninteresting work I had never read till after two editions of Kehana were printed :—

Be true unto yourselves. - XII. 3, p. 590.

The passage in which Menu exhorts a witness to speak the truth is one of the few sublime ones in his Institutes. "The soul itself is its own witness; the soul itself is its own refuge; offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men! — The sinful have said in their hearts, None see us. Yes, the gods distinctly see them, and so does the spirit within their breasts. — The guardian deities of the firmament, of the earth, of the waters, of the human heart, of the moon, of the sun, and of fire, of punishment after death, of the winds, of night, of both twilights, and of justice, perfectly know the state of all spirits clothed with bodies — O friend to vitue! that supreme Spirit, which those believest one and the came with thyself, resides in thy bosom perpetually, and is an all-knowing inspector of thy goodness or of thy wickedness. The Aunnay Birds. - XII. 6, p. 590.

The Aunnays act a considerable part in the history of the Nella Rujah, an amusing romance, for a translation of which we are indebted to Mr. Kindersley. They are milk-white, and remarkable for the gracefulness of their walk.

The Bannian Tree. - XIII. 5, p. 591.

The Burghut, or Bannian, often measures from twenty-four to thirty feet in girth. It is distinguished from every other tree hitherto known, by the very peculiar circumstance of throwing out roots frum all its branches. These, being pendeat, and perfectly lax, in time reach the ground, which they penetrate, and ultimately become substantial props to the very massy horizontal boughs, which, but for such a support, must either be stopped in their growth, or give way, from their own weight. Many of these quondam roots, changing their outward appearance from a brown, rough rind to a regular bark, not unlike that of the beech, increase to a great diameter. They may be often seen from four to five feet in circumference, and in a true perpendicular line. An observer, ignorant of their nature, might think them artificial, and that they had been placed for the purpose of sustaining the boughs from which they originated. They proceed from all the branches indiscriminately, whether near or far removed from the ground. They appear like new swahs, such as are in use on board ships : however, few reach sufficiently low to take a held of the soil, except those of the lower branches. I have seen some do so from a great height, but they were thin, and did act promise well. Many of the ramifications pendent from the higher boughs are seen to turn round the lower branches, but without any obvious effect on either ; possibly, however, they may derive sustenance even from that partial mode of communication. The height of a full-grown Bannian may be from sixty to eighty feet; and many of them, I am fully confident, cover at least two acres. Their leaves are similar to, but rather larger than those of the laurel. The wood of the trunk is used only for fuel; it is light and brittle; but the pillars formed by the roots are valuable, being extremely elastic and light, working with ease, and possessing great toughness: it resembles a good kind of ash. — Oriental Field Sports, vol. ii. p. 113.

....., the Well Which they, with sacrifice of rural pride, Have wedded to the cocoa-grove beside. — XIII. 6, p. 592.

It is a general practice, that, when a plantation is made, a well should be dug at one of its sides. The well and the tope are married; a ceremony at which all the village attends, and in which often much money is expended. The well is considered as the husband, as its waters, which are copiously furnished to the young trees during the first hot season, are supposed to cherish and impregnate them. Though vanity and superstition are evidently the basis of these institutions, yet we cannot help admiring their effects, so beautifully ornomenting a torrid country, and affording such general convenience. — Oriental Sports, p. 10.

Tanks. - XIII. 6, p 592,

Some of these tanks are of very great extent, often covering eight or ten acres; and, besides having steps of masonry, perhaps fifty or sixty feet in breadth, are faced with brickwork, plastered in the most substantial manner. The corners are generally ornameated with round or polygon pavilions of a neat appearance. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 116.

There are two kinds of tanks, which we confound under one common name, though nothing can be more different. The first is the Eray, which is formed by throwing a mound or bank across a valley or hollow ground, so that the rain water collects in the upper part of the valley, and is let out on the lower part by shices, for the purposes of cultivation. The other kind is the Culam, which is formed by digging out the earth, and is destined for supplying the inhabitants with water for domestic purposes. The Culams are very frequently lined on all the four sides with ent stone, and are the most elegant works of the natives, — BUCHAMAN.

Where there are no springs or rivers to furnish them with water, as it is in the northern parts, where there are but two or three springs, they supply this defect by saving of rain water ; which they do by casting up great banks in convenient places, to stop and contain the rains that fall, and so save it till they have occasion to let it out into the fields. They are made rounding like a (, or half moon. Every town has one of these ponds, which if they can but get filled with water, they count their corn is as good as in the barn. It was no small work to the ancient inhabitants to make all these banks, of which there is a great number, being some two, some three, fathoms in height, and in length some above a mile, some less, not all of a size. They are now grown over with great trees, and so seem natural hills. When they would use the water, they cut a gap in one end of the hank, and so draw the water by little and little, as they have occasion, for the watering their corn.

These ponds, in dry weather, dry pp quite. If they should dig these ponds deep, it would not be so convenient for them. It would, indeed, contain the water well, but would not so well, nor in such plenty, empty out itself into their grounds. In these ponds are alligators, which, when the water is dried np, depart into the woods and down to the rivers, and, in the time of rains, come up again into the ponds. They are but small, nor do use to catch people, nevertheless they stand in some fear of them.

The corn they sow in these parts is of that sort that is soonest ripe, fearing lest their waters should fail. As the water dries out of these ponds, they make use of them for fields, treading the mud with buffaloes, and thea sowing rice thereon, and frequently casting up water with scoops on it. —KNax, p. 9.

The Lotus. - XIII. 6, p. 592.

The lotus abounds in the numerous lakes and ponds of the province of Garah; and we had the plensure of comparing several varieties; single and full, white, and tinged with deep or with faint tints of red. To a near view, the simple elegance of the white lotus gains no accession of heauty from the multiplication of its petals, nor from the tinge of gaudy hue; but the richest tint is most pleasing, when a lake, covered with full-blown lotus, is contemplated. — Journey from Mirzapat to Nagpur. — Asiatic Annual Register, 1806.

They built them here a Bower, &c. - XIII. 7, p. 592

The materials of which these houses are made are always easy to be procured, and the structure is so simple, that a spacious, and by no means uncomfortable dwelling, suited to the climate, may be erected in one day. Our habitation, consisting of three small rooms, and a hall open to the north, in little more than four hours was in readiness for our reception; fifty or sixty laborers completed it in that time, and on emergency could perform the work in much less. Bamboos, grass for thatching, and the ground ratan, are all the materials requisite: not a nail is used in the whole edifice. A row of strong bamboos, from eight to ten feet high, are fixed firm in the ground, which describe the outline, and are the supporters of the huilding: smaller bamboos are then tied horizontally, by strips of the ground ratan, to these upright posts; the walls, composed of bamboo mats, are fastened to the sides with similar ligatures; bamboo rafters are quickly raised, and a roof formed, over which thatch is spread in regular layers, and bound to the roof by filaments of ratan. A floer of bamhoo grating is next laid in the inside, elevated two or three feet above the ground: this grating is supported on hamboos, and covered with mats and carpets. Thus ends the process, which is not more simple than effectual. When the workmen take pains, a house of this sort is proof against very inclement weather. We experienced, during our stay at Meeday, a severe storm of wind and rain, but no water penetrated, nor thatch escaped : and if the tempest should blow down the house, the inhabitants would run no risk of having their brains knocked out, or their bones broken ; the fall of the whole fabric would not crush a lady's lap-dog. - SYMES's Embassy to Ara.

Jungle-grass. - XIII. 7, p. 592.

In this district the long grass called jungle is more prevalent than I ever yet noticed. It rises to the height of seven or eight feet, and is topped with a heautiful white down, resembling a swan's feather. It is the mantle with which nature here covers all the uncultivated ground, and at once veils the indolence of the people and the nakedness of their land. It has a fine showy appearance, as it undulates in the wind, like the waves of the sea. Nothing but the want of groater variety to its color prevents it from being one of the first and nost beautiful objects in that rich store of productions with which nature spontaneously supplies the improvident natives. $-T_{\rm ENNANT}$.

The Hindoos are enjoined by the Feds to effer a cake, which is called Peeuda, to the ghosts of their ancestors, as fur hack as the third generation. This ceremony is performed on the day of the new moon in every month. The offering of water is in like manner commanded to be performed daily; and this ceremony is called Tarpan, to satisfy, to appease. The souls of such men as have left children to continue their generation, are supposed to be transported, immediately upon quitting their bodies, into a certain region called the Petree Log, where they may continue in proportion to their former virtues, provided these ceremonies be not neglected ; otherwise they are precipitated into Nark, and doomed to be born again in the bodies of unclean beasts ; and until, by repeated regenerations, all their sins are done away, and they attain such a degree of perfection as will entitle them to what is called Monktee, eternal salvation, by which is understood a release from future transmigration, and an absorption in the nature of the godhead, who is called Brahm. - WILKINS. Tassel-grass. - XIII. 11, p. 592.

The Surput, or tassel-grass, which is much the same as the guinea-grass, grows to the height of twelve or fourteen feet. Its stem becomes so thick as to resemble in some measure a reed. It is very strong, and grows very luxuriantly: it is even used as a fence against cattle; for which purpose, it is often planted on banks excavated from ditches, to enclose fields of corn, &c. It grows wild in all the uncultivated parts of India, but especially in the lower provinces, in which it occupies immense tracts; sometimes mixing with, and rising above, coppices; affording an asylum for elephants, rhinoceroses, tigers, &c. It frequently is laid by high winds, of which breeding sows fail not to take advantage, by forming their nosts, and concealing their young under the prostrate grass. - Oriental Sports, vol i. p. 32.

Nature has provided the elephant with means to cool its heated surface, by enabling it to draw from its throat, by the aid of its trunk, a copious supply of saliva, which the animal spurts with force very frequently all over its skin. Till his strong temples, bathed with sudden dews, Their fragrance of delight and love diffuse. - XIII. 11, p. 592

The Hindoo poets frequently allude to the fragrant juice which oozes, at certain seasons, from small ducts in the temples of the male elephant, and is useful in relieving him from the redundant moisture, with which he is then oppressed ; and they even describe the bees as ellured by the scent, and mistaking it for that of the sweetost flowers. When Crishna visited Sanc'ha-dwip, and had destroyed the demon who infested that delightful country, he passed along the bank of a river, and was charmed with a delicious odor, which its waters diffused in their course. He was eager to view the source of so fragrant a stream, but was informed by the natives that it flowed from the temples of an elephant, immensely large, milk-white, and beautifully formed; that he governed a numerous race of elephants ; and that the odoriferons fluid which exuded from his temples in the season of love had formed the river; that the Devas, or inferior gods, and the Apsaras, or nymphs, hathed and sported in its waters, impassioned and intoxicated with the liquid perfume. - WILFORD. The custom is principally coufined to the male sex, though the women occasionally wear a round spot, either of sandal, which is of a light dun color, or of sing wiff, that is, a preparation of vermilion, between the eyebrows, and a stripe of the samo running up the front of the head, in the furrow made according to the general practice of dividing all the frontal hair equally to the right and left, where it is rendered smooth, and glazed by a thick mucilage, made by steeping linseed for a while in water. In doing this, a girl seldom escapes without drawing blood, and rubbing part of the skin from her hand; and as every well-dressed girl has a number of rings on each arm, and as these are frequently breaking, the poor creatures suffer much from their love of admiration. — BuchAMAN.

The dear retreat. - XIII. 13, p. 593.

There is a heautiful passage in Statius, which may be quoted here: it is in that poet's best manner: --

Qualis vicino volucris jan sedula partu, Janque timens què fronde domum suspendat inanem, Providt hine ventos, hine anxia cogitat angues, Hine homines; tandem dubiæ placet umbra, novisque Vix stetil in ramis, et protinus arbor amatur.

Achil. ii. 212.

Jaga-Naut. - XIV. p. 593.

This temple is to the Hindoos what Mecca is to the Mahommedans. It is resorted to by pilgrims from every quarter of India. It is the chief seat of Brahminical power, and a strong-hold of their superstition. At the annual festival of the Butt Jattra, seven hundred thousand persons (as has been computed by the Pundits in College) assemble at this place. The number of deaths in a single year, caused by voluntary devotement, by imprisonment for non-payment of the demands of the Brahmins, or by the scarcity of provisions for such a multitude, is incredible. The precincts of the place are covered with bones.—CLAUDUS BUCHNANN.

Many thousands of people are employed in carrying water from Hurdwar to Juggeruat, for the uses of that temple. It is there supposed to be peculiarly holy, as it issues from what is called the Cow's Month. This superstitious action is the cause of as much lost labor as would long since have converted the largest province of Asia into a garden. The numbers thus employed are immense; they travel with two flasks of the water slung over the shoulder by means of an elastic piece of bamhoo. The same quantity which employs, perhaps, fifteen thousand persons, might easily he carried down the Ganges in a few boats annually. Princes and families of distinction have this water carried to them in all parts of Hindostan; it is drank at feasts, as well as upon religious occasions.— TENNAT.

A small river uear Kinouge is held by some as even more efficacious in washing away moral defilement that the Ganges itself. Dr. Tennant says, that a person in Coylou drinks daily of this water, though at the distance of, perhaps, three thousand miles, and at the expense of five thousand rupces per month!

No distinction of castes is made at this temple, but all, like a nation descended from one common stock, eat, drink, and make merry together. -- STAVORINUS.

The seven-headed Idol. - XIV. 1, p. 593.

The idol of Juggernat is in shape like a serpent, with seven heads; and on the checks of each head it hath the form of a wing popn each check, which wings open, and shut, and flap, as it is carried in a stately chariot, and the idol in the midst of it; and one of the maguls sitting behind it in the chariot, upon a convenient place, with a canopy, to keep the sun from injuning of it.

When I, with horror, beheld these strange things, I called to mind the eighteenth chapter of the Revelations, and the first verse, and likewise the sixteenth and seventeenth verses of the said chapter, in which places there is a beast, and such idolatrous worship mentioned; and those sayings in that text are herein truly accomplished in the sixteenth verse; for the Brahmins are all marked in the forehead, and likewise all that come to worship the idol are marked also in their foreheads. — BRUTON. Churchill's Collection.

The Chariot of the God. - XIV. 2, p. 593.

The size of the chariot is not exaggerated. Speaking of ther such, Niecamp says, Currus tam horrewide magnitudinis sunt, ut vel mille hommes uni trahendo vix sufficiant. — V. i. 10, 5, 18.

They have built a great chariot, that goeth on sixteen wheels of a side, and every wheel is five feet in height, and the chariot itself is about thirty feet high. In this chariot, on their great festival days, at night, they place their wicked god Jaggarnat; and all the Bramins, being in number nine thousand, then attend this great idol, besides of ashmen and fackeires some thousands, or more than a good many.

The chariot is most richly adorned with most rich and costly ornaments; and the aforesaid wheels are placed very complete in a round circle, so artificially that every wheel doth its proper office without any impediment; for the chariot is aloft, and in the centre betwixt the wheels : they have also more than two thousand lights with them. And this chariot, with the idol, is elso drawn with the greatest and best men of the town; and they are so eager and greedy to draw it, that whosoever, by shouldering, crowding, shoving, heaving, thrusting, or any violent way, can but come to lay a hand upon the ropes, they think themselves blessed and happy ; and when it is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves as a sacrifice to this idol, and desperately lie down on the ground, that the chariot-wheels may un over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken arms, some broken legs; so that many of them are so destroyed, and by this means they think to merit heaven.-BAUTON. Churchill's Collection.

They sometimes lie down in the track of this machine e few hours before its errival, and, taking a soporiferous draught, hope to meet death asleep. - CLAUDIUS BUCHANAN.

A harlot-band. - XIV. 8, p. 594.

There are in India common women, called Wives of the Idol. When a woman has made a vow to obtain children, if she brings into the world a beautiful daughter, she carries her to Bod, so their idol is called, with whom she leaves her. This girl, when she is arrived at a proper age, takes an apartment in the public place, hangs a curtain before the door, and waits for those who are passing, as well Indians as those of other sects among whom this debanchery is permitted. She prostitutes herself for a certain price, and all that she can thus acquire she carries to the priest of the idol, that he may apply it to the service of the temple. Let us, says the Mohammedan relater, bless the almighty and glorious God, that he has chosen us, to exempt us from all the crimes into which men are led by their unbelief. — Anciennes Relations.

Incited, unquestionably, says Mr. Maurice, by the hieroglyphic emblem of vice so conspicuously elevated, and so strikingly painted in the temples of Mahadeo, the priests of that deity industriously selected the most beautiful females that could be found, and, in their tenderest years, with great pomp and solemnity, consecrated them (as it is impiously called) to the service of the presiding divinity of the pagoda.

They were trained up in every art to delude and to delight; and to the fascination of external heanty, their artful betrayers added the attractions arising from mental accomplishments. Thus was an invariable rule of the Hindoos, that women have no concern with literature, dispensed with upon this infamous occasion. The moment these hapless victims reached maturity, they fell victims to the lust of the Brahmins. They were early taught to practise the most alluring blandishments, to roll the expressive eye of wanton pleasure, and to invite to criminal indulgence, by stealing upon the beholder the tender look of voluptuous languishing. They were instructed to mould their elegant and airy forms into the most enticing attitudes and the most lascivious gestures, while the rapid and graceful motion of their feet, adorned with golden bells, and glittering with jewels, kept unison with the exquisite melody of their voices. Every pagoda has a band of these young sirens, whose business, on great festivals, is to dance in public before the idol, to sing hymns in his honor, and in private to enrich the treasury of that pagoda with the wages of prostitution. These women are not, however, regarded in a dishonorable light; they are considered as wedded to the idol, end they partake of the veneration paid to him. They are forbidden ever to desert the pagoda where they are educated, and are never permitted to marry; but the offspring, if any, of their criminal embraces are considered as sacred to the idol: the boys are taught to play on the sacred instruments used at the festivals, and the daughters are devoted to the abandoned occupations of their mothers. - Indian Antiquities.

These impostors take a young maid, of the fairest they can meet with, to be the bride, (as they speak and bear the hesotted people in hand,) of Jagannat, and they leave her all night in the temple (whither they have carried her) with the idol, making her believe that Jagannat himself will come and embrace her, and appointing her to ask him, whether it will be a fruitful year, what kind of processions, feasts, prayers, and alms he demands to be made for it. In the mean time one of these lustful priests enters at night hy a little back door into the temple, deflowereth this young maid, and maketh her believe any thing he pleaseth; and the next day, being transported from this temple into another, with the same magnificence she was carried before upon the chariot of triumph, on the side of Jagannat, her bridegroom : these Brahmans meke her say aloud, before all the people, whatsoever she hath been taught of these cheats, as if she had learnt it from the very month of Jagannat. - BERNIER.

Baly. - XV. p. 595.

The fifth incarnation was in a Bramin dwarf, under the name of Vamen; it was wrought to restrain the pride of the giant Baly. The latter, after having conquered the gods, expelled them from Sorgon; he was generous, true to his word, compassionate, and charitable. Vichenou, under the form of a very little Brannin, presented himself before him while he was sacrificing, and asked him for three paces of land to build a hut. Baly ridiculed the apparent imbecility of the dwarf, in telling him that he ought not to limit his demand to a bequest so trifling; that his generosity could bestow a much larger donation of land. Vamen answered, that being of so small a stature, what he asked was more than sufficient. The prince immediately granted his request, and, to ratify his donstion, poured water into his right hand; which was ne sooner done, than the dwarf grew so prodigiously, that his body filled the universe! He measured the earth with one pace, and the heevens with another, and then summoned Ba.7 to give him his word for the third. The prince than recognized Vichenou, adored him, and presented his head to him; but the god, satisfied with his submission, sent him to govern the Padalon, and permitted him to return every year to the earth, the day of the full moon, in the month of November. -SONNERAT'S Voyages, vol. i. p. 24.

The Sacred Cord. - XV. 4, p. 596.

The Brahmans who officiate at the temple generally go with their heads uncovered, and the upper part of the body naked. The Zennar, or sacred string, is hung round the body from the left shoulder; a piece of white cotton cloth is wrapped round the loins, which descends under the knee, but lower on the left side than on the other; and in cold weather they sometimes cover their hodies with a shawl, and their heads with a red cap. The Zennar is mode of a particular kind of perconial cotton, called Verma: it is composed of a certain number of threads of a fixed length. The Zennar worn by the Khatrices has fewer threads than that worn by the Brahmans; and that worn by the Bhyse fewer than that worn by the Khatrics; but those of the Soodra caste are excluded from this distinctioo, none of them being permitted to wear it. — CRAFVERD.

The city of Baly. - XV. 7, p. 596.

Ruins of Mahabalipur, the City of the great Baly.

A rock or rather hill of stone, is that which first engrosses the attention on approaching the place ; for as it rises abruptly out of a level plain of great extent, consists chiefly of one single stone, and is situated very near to the sea-beach, it is such a kind of object as an inquisitive traveller would naturally turn aside to examine. Its shape is also singular and ro-mantic, and, from a distant view, has an appearance like some antique and lofty edifice. On coming near to the foot of the reck from the north, works of imagery and sculpture crowd so thick upon the eye, as might seem to favor the iden of a petrified town, like those that have been fabled in different parts of the world, by too credulous travellers. Proceeding on by the foot of the hill, on the side facing the sea, there is a pageda rising out of the ground, of one solid stone, shout sixteen or eighteen feet high, which seems to have been cut upon the spot, out of a detached rock, that has been found of a proper size for that purpose. The top is arched, and the style of erchitecture, according to which it is formed, different from any now used in those parts. A little farther on, there appears upon a huge surface of stone that juts out e little from the side of the hill, a numerous group of human figures, in bass-relief, considerably larger than life, representing the most remarkable persons whose actions are celebrated in the Mahabharit, each of them in an attitude, or with weapons, or other insignia, expressive of his character, or of some one of his most famous exploits. All these figures are doubtless much less distinct than they were at first ; for upon comparing these and the rest of the sculptures that are exposed to the senair, with others at the same place, whose situation has afforded them protection from that element, the difference is strikingthe former being every where much defaced, while the others are fresh as recently finished. An excavation in another part of the east side of the great rock appears to have been made on the same plan, and for the same purpose that Chowltries are usually built in that country, that is to say, for the accommodation of travellers. The rock is hollowed out to the size of a spacious room, and two or three rows of pillars are left, as a seeming support to the mountainous mass of stone which forms the rooi.

The ascent of the hill on the north is, from its natural shape, gradual and easy at first, and is in other parts rendered more so hy very excellent steps, cut out in several places where the communication would be difficult or impracticable without them. A winding stair of this sort leads to a kind of temple cut out of the solid rock, with some figures of idols in high relief upon the walls, very well finished. From this temple there are flights of steps, that seem to have led to some edifice formerly standing upon the hill; nor does it seem absurd to suppose that this may have been a palace, to which this temple may have appertained; for besides the small detached ranges of stairs that are here and there cut in the work and seem as if they had once led to different parts of one great building, there appear in many places small water channels cut also in the rock, ns if for drains to a house; and the whole top of the hill is strewed with amall round pieces of brick, which may be supposed, from their oppearence, to have been worn down to their present form during the lapse of many ages. On a plain surface of the rock, which may once have served as the floor of some spartment, there is a platform of stone, about eight or nine feet long, by three or four wide, in a situation rather elevated, with two or three steps leading up to it, perfectly resembling a conch or bod, and a lion very well executed at the upper end of it, by way of pillow : the whole of one piece being part of the hill itself. This the Bramins, inhabitants of the place, call the bed of Dhermorajah, or Judishter, the eldest of the five brothers, whose exploits are the leading subject in the Mahabhârit. And at a considerable distance from this, at such a distance, indeed, as the apartments of the women might be supposed to be from that of the men, is a bath, excavated also from the rock, with steps in the inside, which the Bramins call the Bath of Dropedy, the wife of Judishter and his brothers. How much credit is due to this tradition, and whether this stone couch may not have been anciently used as a kind of throne, rather than a bed, is matter for futuro inquiry. A circumstance, however, which may seem to favor this idea is, that a throae, in the Sunserit and other Hindoo languages, is called Singhasen, which is compounded of Sing, a lion, and âsen, a sent.

But though these works may be deemed stupendous, they are surpassed by others that are to be seen at the distance of about a mile, or a mile and balf, to the south of the hill. They consist of two pagodas, of about thirty feet long, by twenty feet wide, and about as many in height, cut out of the solio rock, and each consisting originally of one single stone. Their form is different from the style of architecture according to which idol temples are now built in that country. These sculptures approach nearer to the Gothic taste, being surmonnted by arched roofs or domes, not semicircular, but composed of two segments of circles meeting in a point at top. Near these also stand an elephant full as big as life, and a lion much larger than the natural size, both hown also out of one stone.

The great rock is shout fifty or one hundred yards from the ses; but close to the sea are the remains of a pagedn built of brick, and dedicated to Sib, the greatest part of which has evidently been swallowed up by that element ; for the door of the innermost apartment, in which the idol is placed, and before which there are always two or three spacious courts surrounded with walls, is now washed by the waves, and the pillar used to discover the meridian at the time of founding the pagoda, is seen standing at some distance in the sea. In the neighborhood of this building there are some detached rocks, washed also by the waves, on which there appear sculptures, though now much worn and defaced. And the natives of the place declared to the writer of this account, that the more aged people among them remembered to have seen the tops of several pagodas far out in the sen, which, being covered with copper, (probably gilt,) were particularly visible at sunrise, as their shining surface used then to reflect the sun's rays, but that now that effect was no longer produced, as the copper had since become incrusted with mould and verdigris. - CHAMBERS. Thou hast been call'd, O Sleep ! the friend of Woe, But 'tis the happy who have call'd thee so. - XV. 12, p. 597.

Daniel has a beautiful passage concerning Richard II.sufficiently resembling this part of the poem to be inserted here:

> To Flint, from thence, into a restless bed, That miserahle night he comes conveyed; Poorly provided, poorly followed, Uncourted, unrespected, unobey'd; Where, if uncertain Sleep but hovered Over the draoping cares that heavy weigh'd, Millions of figures Fantasy presents Unto that sorrow wsken'd grief augments.

His new misfortune makes deluded Sleep Say 'twas not so : — false dreams the truth deny . Wherewith he starts ; feels waking cares do creep Upon his soul, and give his dreams the lie, Then sleeps again ; — and then again as deep Deceits of darkness mack his misery.

The Aullay. - XVI. 2, p. 598.

This monster of Hindeo imagination is a horse with the trunk of an elephant, but bearing about the same proportion to the elephant in size, that the elephant itself does to a common sheep. In one of the prints to Mr. Kindersley's "Specimens of Hindoo Literature," an aullay is represented taking up an elephant with his trunk.

Did then the Ocean wage His war for love and envy, not in rage, O thou fair City, that he spared thee thus ? - XVI. 3, p. 598.

Malecheren, (which is probably another name for Baly,) in an excursion which he made one day alone, and in disguise, came to a garden in the environs of his city Mahabalipoor, where was a fountain so inviting, that two celestial nymphs had come down to bathe there. The Rajah became onamored of one of them, who condescended to allow of his attachment to her; and she and her sister nymph used thenceforward to have frequent interviews with him in that garden. On one of those occasions they brought with them a mule inhabitant of the heavenly regions, to whom they introduced the Rajah, and between him and Malecheren a strict friendship ensued in consequence of which he agreed, at the Rajah's earnest request, to carry him in disguise to see the court of the divine Inder - a favor never before granted to any mortal. The Rajah returned from thence with new ideas of splendor and magnificence, which he immediately adopted in regulating his court and his retinue, and in beautifying his seat of government. By this means Mahâbalipoor became soon celebrated beyond all the cities of the earth ; and an account of its magnificence having been brought to the gods assembled at the court of Inder, their jealousy was so much excited at it, that they sent orders to the God of the Sea to let loose his billows, and overflow a place which impiously pretended to vie in splendor This command he obeyed, with their celestial mansions. and the city was at once overflowed by that furious element nor has it ever since been able to rear its head. - CHAMBERS. The Seven Earths. - XIX. 6, p. 605.

The seas which surround these earths are, 1. of selt water, enclosing our inmost earth ; 2. of fresh water ; 3. of tyre, curdled milk; 4. of ghee, clarified butter; 5. of cauloo, a liquor drawn from the pullum tree ; 6. of liquid sugar ; 7. of milk. The whole system is enclosed in one broad circumference of pure gold, beyond which reigns impenetrable darkness. --KINDERSLEY.

I know not whether the following fable was invented to sccount for the saltness of our sea : -

" Agastya is recorded to have been very low in stature ; and one day, previously to the rectifying the too oblique posture of the earth, walking with Veeshnu on the shore of the ocean, the insolent Deep asked the god who that dwarf was strutting by his side. Veeshnu replied, it was the patriarch Agastya going to restore the earth to its true balance. The sea, in utter contempt of his pygmy form, dashed him with his spray as he passed along ; on which the sage, greatly incensed at the designed affront, scooped up some of the water in the hollow of his hand, and drank it off: he again and again repeated the draught, nor desisted till he had drained the bed of the ocean of the entire volume of its waters. Alarmed at this effect of his holy indignation, and dreading an universal drought, the Devetas made intercession with Agastya to relent from his anger, and again restore on element so necessary to the existence of nature, both enimate end inanimate. Agestys, pacified, granted their request, and discharged the imbibed fluid in a way becoming the histories of a gross physical people to relate, but hy no means proper for this page ; a way, however, that evinced his sovereign power, while it marked his ineffable contempt for the vain fury of an element, contending with a being armed with the dalegated power of the Creater of all things. After this miracle, the earth being, by the same power, restored to its just balance, Agastya and Vecshng separated ; when the latter, to prevent any similar accident occurring, commanded the great serpent (that is, of the sphere) to wind its enormous folds round the seven continents, of which, according to Senscreet geography, the earth consists, and appointed, as perpetual guardians, to watch over and protect it, the eight powerful genil, so renowned in the Hindoo system of mythology, as presiding over the eight points of the world." -- MAURICE.

The Paurenics (said Ramachandra to Sir William Jones) will tell you that our earth is a plane figure, studded with eight mountains, and surrounded by seven seas of milk, nectar, and other fluids ; that the part which we inhahit is one of seven islands, to which eleven smaller isles are subordinate; that a god, riding on a huge elephant, guards each of the eight regions ; and that a mountain of gold rises and gleams in the contre. - Asiatic Researches.

Mount Calasay. --- XIX. 6, p. 605.

The residence of Ixora is upon the silver mount Calaja, to delicious place, planted with all sorts of trees, that bear fruit all the year round. The roses and other flowers send forth a most edoriferous scent; and the pond at the foot of the mount is enclosed with pleasont walks of trees, that afford an agreeable shade, whilst the pencocks and divers other birds entertain the ear with their harmonions noise, as the beautiful women do the eyes. The circumjacent woods are inhabited by a certain people called Munis, or Ruis, who, avoiding the conversation of others, spend their time in offering daily sacrifices to their god

It is observable that, though these pagans are generally black themselves, they do represent these Rivis to be of a fair complexion, with long, white beards, and long gaments hanging crossways, from about the neck down over the breast. They are in such high esteem among them, they believe that whem they bless are blessed, and whom they curse are cursed.

Within the mountain lives another generation, called Jezaquinnera and Quendra, who are free from all trouble, spend their days in continual contempletion, praises, and prayers to God. Round about the mountain stand seven ladders, by which you asceed to a spacions plain, in the middle whereof is a bell of silver, and a square table, surrounded with nine precious stones, of divers colors. Upon this table lies a silver rose, called Tamora Pua, which contains two women as bright and fair as a pearl: one is called Briggsiri, i.e. the Lady of the Mouth; the other Tarasiri, i.e. the Lady of the Tongue, — because they praise God with the mouth and tongue. In the centre of this rose is the triangle of Quivelinga, which they say is the permanent residence of God. — BALD EUS.

The footless Fowl of Heaven. - XXI. 6, p. 607.

There is a bird that falls down out of the air dead, and is found sometimes in the Molucca Islands, that has no feet at all. The bigness of her body and bill, as likewise the form of them, is much the same as a swallow's; but the spreading out of her wings and tail has no less compass than an eagle's. She lives and breeds in the air, comes not near the earth but for her burial, for the largeness and lightness of her wings and tail sustain her without lassitude. And the laying of her eggs, and breeding of her young, is upon the back of the male, which is made hollow, as also the breast of the female, for the more easy incubation. Also two strings, like two shoemaker's ends, come from the hinder parts of the male, while she hatches her eggs on the hollow of his back. The dew of heaven is appointed her for food, her region being too far removed from the approach of flies and such like insects.

This is the entire story and philosophy of this miraculous hird in Cardan, who professes himself to have seen it no less than thrice, and to have described it accordingly. The contrivances whereof, if the matter were certainly true, are as evident arguments of a Divine Providence, as that copperring, with the Greek * inscription upon it, was an undeniable monument of the artifice and finger of man.

But that the reproach of over-much credulity may not lie upon Cardan alone, Scaliger, who lay at eatch with him to take him tripping wherever he could, cavils not with any thing in the whole nurration but the bigness of wings and the litteness of the hody; which he undertakes to correct from one of his own which was sent him by Orvesanus from Java. Nay, he confirms what his antagonist has wrote, partly by history

• The inscription runs thus: Είμι ἐκείνως ἰχθὸς ταύτη λίμνη παντοπρωτος ἐπιτεθείς διὰ τοῦ κοσμητοῦ Φεδηρίκου β τὰς χεῖρας εν τὴ ἐ. ἡμερα τοῦ Ὁκτωδρίου. α. σ. λ. This pike was taken about Hailprun, the imperial city of Suevia, in the year 1497. --Gesner. and partly by reason; affirming, that himself, in his own garden, found two little birds with membranaceous wings utterly devoid of legs; their form was near to that of a bat's. Not is he deterred from tha belief of the perpetual flying of the Manucodiata, by the gaping of the feathers of her wings, which seem thereby less fit to sustain her body, but further makes the narration probable by what he has observed in kites hovering in the air, as he saith, for a whole hour together without flapping of her wings, or changing place. And he has found also how she may sleep in the air, from the example of fishes, which he has seen sleeping in the water without sinking themselves to the bottom, and without changing place, but lying stock still, punulis tantum nescia quid motiuncule meditantes, only wagging a little their fins, as licedlessly and unconcernedly as horses while they are asleep wag their ears to displace the flies that sit upon them. Wherever Scaliger admitting that the Manucodiata is perpetually on the wing in the air, he must of necessity admit also that manaer of incubation that Cardan describes, else how could their generations continue?

Franciscus Hernandeo affirms the same with Cardan expressly in every thing; as also Eusebius Nierembergius, who is so taken with the story of this bird, that he could not abstain from celebrating her miraculous properties in a short but elegant copy of verses; and does after, though confidently opposed, assert the main matter again in prose.

Such are the suffrages of Cardan, Scaliger, Hernandeo, Nieremhergius. But Aldrovandus rejects that fable of her feeding on the dew of heaven, and of her incuhiture on the back of the male, with much scorn and indignation. And as for the former, his reasons are no ways contemptible, he alleging that dew is a body not perfectly enough mixed, or heterogeneal enough for food, nor the hard bill of the bird made for such easie uses as sipping this soft moisture.

To which I know not what Cardan and the rest would answer, unless this, that they mean by dew the more unctuous moisture of the air, which as it may not be alike every where, so these birds may be fitted with a natural sagacity to find it out where it is. That there is dew in this sense day and night, (as well as in the morning,) and in all seasons of the year ; and therefore a constant supply of moisture and spirits to their perpetual flying, which they more copiously imbibe by reason of their exercise : That the thicker parts of this moisture stick and convert into flesh, and that the lightness of their feathers is so great, that their pains in sustaining themselves are not over-much. That what is homogeneal and simple to our sight is fit enough to be the rudiments of generation, all animals being generated of a kind of clear crystalline liquor ; and that, therefore, it may be also of nutrition ; that orpiae and sea-house-leek are nourished and grow, being hung in the air, and that dock-weed has its root no deeper than near the upper parts of the water ; and, lastly, that the bills of these birds are for their hetter flying, by cutting the way, and for hetter ornament; for the rectifying also and composing of their feathers, while they swim in the air with as much ease as swans do in rivers.

To his great impatiency against their manner of incubation, they would happily return this answer : That the way is not ridiculous; but it may be rather necessary from what Aldrovandus himself not only acknowledges but contends for, namely, that they have no feet at all. For hence it is manifest that they cannot light upon the ground, nor any where rest on their Lellies, and be able to get on wing again, because they cannot creep out of holes of rocks, as swifts and such like short-footed birds can, they having no feet at all to creep with. Besides, as Aristotle well argues concerning the long legs of certain water-fowl, that they were made so long, because they were to wade in the water and catch fish, adding that excellent aphorism, Tà yop opjovo mpòs Tô Epyov h φύσις ποιεί άλλ' ού το έργον πρός τα όργανα, sa may we rationally conclude, will they say, that as the long legs of these water-fowl imply a design of their haunting the water, o want of legs in these Manucodiatas argue they are never to come down to the earth, because they can neither stand there nor get off again. And if they never come on the earth, or any other resting-place, where can their eggs be laid or hatched but on the back of the male?

Besides that Cardaa pleases himself with that Antiphonic in nature, that as the Ostrich being a bird, yet never flies in the air, and never rests upon the earth. And as for Allrovandus, his presumption from the five several Manucodiatas that hn had seen, and in which he could observe ao such figuration of parts as implied a fitness for such a manner of incubation, Cardan will answer, Myself has seen three, and Scaliger one, who both agree against yon.

However, you see that both Cardan, Aldrovandus, and the rest, do jointly agree in allowing the Manucodiata no feet, as also in furnishing her with two strings, hanging at the hinder parts of her body, which Aldrovandus will have to he in the female as well as in the male, though Cardan's experience reacheth not so far.

But Pighafetta and Closins will easily end this grand controversy betwixt Cardan and Aldrovandus, if it be tua which they report, and if they speak of the same kind of Birds of Paradiso. For they hoth affirm hat they bave feet a palm long, and that with all confidence imaginable; but Nierembergins on the contrary affirms, that one that was an eye-wituess, and that had taken up one of these birds newly dead, told him that it had no feet at all. Johnston also gives his suffrage with Nierembergius in this, though with Aldrovandus he rejects the manner of their incubation.

But unless they can raise themselves from the ground by the stiffness of some of the feathers of their wings, or rather by virtue of those nervous strings which they may have a power to stiffen when they are alive, by transfusing spirits into them, and making them serve as well instead of legs to raise them from the ground as to hang upon the booghe of trees, by a slight thing being able to raise or hold up their light-feathered bodies in the air, as a small twig will us in the water, I sheald rather incline to the testimony of Pighafetta and Clusius than to the judgment of the rest, and believe those mariners that told him that the legs are pulled off by them that take them, and exenterate them and dry them in the sun for either their private use or sale.

Which conclusion would the best solve the credit of Aristotle, who long since has so peremptorily pronounced, $\tilde{v}\tau\tau$ $\pi\tau\eta\nu\delta\nu$ µ $\delta\nu\sigma\nu$ ov $\delta\dot{c}\dot{v}$ $i\sigma\tau\nu$ $i\omega_{\pi\epsilon\rho}$ $\nu\epsilon\sigma\tau\kappa\delta\nu$ µ $\delta\nu\sigma\nu$ $i\sigma\tau\nu$ $i\chi\partial\deltas$, that there is not any bird that only flies as the fish only swims,

But thus our Bird of Paradise is quite flown and vanished into a figment or fable. But if any one will condole the loss of so convicing an argument for a Providence that fits one thing to another, I must take the freedom to tell him, that, unless he be a greater admirer of novelty than a searcher into the indissoluble consequences of things, I shall supply his meditation with what of this nature is as strongly conclusive, and remind, that it will be his own reproach if he cannot spy as clear an inference from an ordinary truth as from either an uncertainty or a fiction. And in this regard, the bringing this doubtful narration into play may not justly seem to no purpose, it carrying so serious and castigatory a piece of pleasantry with it.

The Manucodiata's living on the dew is no part of the convictiveness of a Providence in this story: But the being excellently well provided of wings and feathers, tarta levitatis supellectile exernata, as Nierembergius speaks, being so well furnished with all advantuges for lightness, that it seems harder for her to sink down, as he conceits, than to be borne up in the air; that a bird thus fitted for that region should have no legs to stand on the earth, this would be a considerable indication of a discriminating Providence, that on purpose avoids all usclessness and superfluities.

The other remarkable, and it is a notorious one, is the cavity on the back of the male and in the breast of the female, for incubation; and the third and last, the use of those strings, as Carolan supposes, for the better keeping them together in incubiture.

If these considerations of this strange story strike so strongly upon thee as to convince thee of a Providence, think it humor, and not judgment, if what I put in lieu of them, and is hut ordinary, have not the same force with thee.

For is not the fish's wanting feet, (as we observed before,) she being sufficiently supplied with fus in so thick an element as the water, as great an argument for a Providence as so light a bird's wanting feet in that thinner element of the air, the extreme lightness of her furniture being appropriated to the thinness of that element? And is not the same Providence seea, and that as conspicuously, in allotting but very short legs to those birds that are called Apoleo both in Plinie and Aristotle, upon whom she has bestowed such large and strong wings, and a power of flying so long and swift, as in giving oo legs at all to the Manncodiata, who has still a greater power of wing and lightnoss of body?

And as for the cavities on the back of the male and in the breast of the female, is that design of nature any more certain and plain than in the genital parts of the male and female in all kinds of animals? What greater argument of counsel and purpose of fitting one thing for another can there be than that? And if we should make a more inward search into the contrivances of these parts in an ordinary hen, and consider how or by what force an egg of so great a growth and higness is transmitted from the ovarium through the infundibulum into the processus of the uterus, the membranes being so thin and the passage so very small, to see to the principle of that motion cannot be thought less than divine.

And if you would compare the protuberant paps of teats in the females of heasts with that cavity in the breast of the she-Manucodiata, whether of them, think you, is the plainer pledge of a knowing and designing Providence?

And, lastly, for the strings that are conceived to held together the male and female in their incubiture, what a toy is it, if compared with those invisible links and ties that engage ordinary hirds to sit upon their eggs, they having no visible allurement to such a tedious service ? — HENAY MORE'S Antidate against Alkeism, b. ii. ch. 11.

"Mankind," says Jeremy Taylor, "now taken ia his whole constitution and design, are like the Birds of Paradise, which travellers tell us of in the Molneca Islands, born without legs, but by a celestial power they have a recompense made to them far that defect, and they always hover in the air and feed on the dew of Heaven; so are we Birds of Paradise, but cas tout from thence, and born without legs, — without strength to walk in the laws of God, or to go to Heaven; but by a Power from above, we are adopted in our new birth to a celestial conversation; we feed on the dew of Heaven; 'the just does live by faith,' and breathes in this new life by the Spirit of God." — Vol. ix, 339. Famen. - XXII. 4, p. 609.

Yama was a child of the Sun, and thence nomed Vairaswata; another of his titles was Dhermaraja, or King of Justice; and a third Putripeti, or Lord of the Patriarchs: but he is chiefly distinguished as Judge of departed souls; for the Hindus believe that, when a soul leaves its body, it immediately repairs to Yamapur, or the city of Yama, where it recrives a just sentence from him, and thence either ascends to Skerga, or the first Heaven; or is driven down to Narac, the region of serpents; or assumes on earth the form of some animal, unless its offence has been such, that it ought to be condemned to a vegetable, or even to a mineral prison. — Sir W. JeNES.

There is a story concerning Yamen which will remind the reader, in its purport, of the fable of Love and Death. "A finnous penitent, Morrugendumagarcri by name, had, during a long series of years, served the gods with uncommon and most exemplary piety. This very virtuous man, having no children, was extremely desirous of having one, and therefore daily hesonght the god Xiven, (or Seeva,) to grant him one. At length the god heard his desire, but, hefore he indulged it him, he asked him, whether he would have several children, who should be long-lived and wicked, or one virtuous and prudent, who should die in his sixtcenth year. The penitent chose the latter: his wife conceived, and was hoppily delivered of the promised son, whom they named Marcandem. The boy, like his father, zcalensly devoted himself to the worship of Xiven ; but as soon as he had attained his sixteenth year, the officers of Yhamen, god of death, were sent on the earth, to remove him from thence.

"Young Marcandem, being informed on what errand they were come, told them, with a resolute air, that he was resolved not to die, and that they might go back, if they pleased. They returned to their master, and told him the whole affair. Yhamen immediately mounted his great huffle, and set out. Being come, he told the youth that he acted very rashly in refusing to leave the world, and it was unjust in him, for Xiven had promised him a life only of sixteen years, and the term was expired. But this reason did not satisfy Marcandem, who persisted in his resolution not to die; and, fearing lest the god of death should attempt to take him away by force, he ran to his oratory, and taking the Lingam, clasped it to his breast. Meantime Yhamen came down from his buffle, throw a rope about the youth's neck, and held him fast therewith, as also the Lingam, which Marcandem grasped with all his strength, and was going to drag them both into hell, when Xiven issued out of the Lingam, drove back the king of the dead, and gave him so furious a blow that he killed him on the spot.

"The god of death being thus slain, mankind multiplied so that the earth was no longer able to contain them. The gods represented this to Xiven, and be, at their entreaty, restored Yhamen to life, and to all the power he had before enjoyed. Yhamen immediately despatched a herald to all parts of the world, to summon all the old men. The herald got drunk before he set out, and, without staying till the fumes of the world, presument to his commission; and, instead of publisbing this order, he declared, that it was the will and pleasure of Yhamen that, from this day forward, all the leaves, fruits, and flowers, whether ripe or green, should fall to the ground. This proclamation was no sconer issued than men began to yield to death. But before Yhamen was killed, only the old were deprived of life, and now people of all ages are summoned indiscriminately." — ProArt.

And Brama's region, where the heavenly Hours Weave the vast circle of his age-long day. XXIII, 5, p. 611.

They whe are acquainted with day and night know that the day of Brahma is as a thousand revolutions of the Foogs, and that his night extended for a thousand more. On the coming of that day all things proceed from invisibility to visibility; so, on the approach of night, they are all dissolved away in that which is called invisible. The universe, even, having existed, is again dissolved; and now again, on the approach of day, hy divine necessity, it is repreduced. That which, upon the dissolution of all things else, is not destroyed, is superior and of another nature from that visibility: it is invisible and eternal. He who is thus called invisible and incorruptible is even he who is called the Supreme Abode; which men having ence obtained, they never more return to earth : that is my monsion. — KAEESHNA, in the Bhagavat Geeta.

The guess, that Brama and his wife Saraswodi may be Abraham and Sarah, has more letters in its favor than are usually to be found in such guesses. — NIECAMP, p. i. c. 10, § 2.

The true cause why there is no idel of Brama, (except the head, which is his share in the Trimonter,) is probably to be found in the conquest of his sect. A different reason, however, is implied in the Veda : " Of Him, it says, whose glory is so great, there is no image : — He is the incomprehensible Being which illumines all, delights all, whence all proceeded ; — that by which they live when born, and that to which all must return." — MooR's Hindu Pantheon, p. 4.

Two forms inseparable in unity, Hath Yamen. — XXIII. 13, p. 612.

The Dharma-Raja, or king of justice, has two countenances; one is mild and full of benevolence; those alone who abound with virtue see it. He helds a court of justice, where are many assistants, among whom are many just and pious kings; Chitragupta acts as chief secretary. These holy men determine what is dharma and adharma, just and unjust. His (Dharma-Rajo's) servant is celled Carmala: he brings the righteous on celestial cars, which go of themselves, whenever holy men are to be brought in, according to the directions of the Dharma-Raja, who is the sovereign of the Pitrus. This is called his divine countenance, and the righteous alone do see it. His other countenance, or form, is called Yama; this the wicked alone can see: it has large teeth and a monstrous body. Yama is the lord of Patala; there he orders some to be beaten, some to be cut to pieces, some to be devaued by monsters, &c. His servant is called Cashmala, who, with ropes round their necks, drags the wicked over rugged paths, and throws them headlong into hell. He is unmerciful, and hard is his heart; every hody trembles at the sight of him. — WilFORO. Asiatic Researches.

Punishment is the Magistrate; Punishment is the Inspirer of Terror; Punishment is the Defender from Calamity; Punishment is the Guardian of those that sleep; Punishment, with a black aspect and a red eye, tempts the guilty. — HAL-Heo's Gentoe Code, ch. xxi. sect. 8.

lo Patala (or the infernal regions) resides the sovereign Queen of the Nagas, (large snakes or dragons:) she is beautiful, and her name is Asyoruca. There, in a cave, she performed Taparya with such rigorous ansterity, that fire sprang from her body, and formed numerous agnitiraths (places of sacred fire) in Patala. These fires, forcing their way through the earth, waters, and mountains, formed various openiegs or mouths, called from thence the flaming mouths, or juala multik. By Samudr (Oceanus) a daughter was born unto her, called Rama-Devi. She is most beautiful; she is Lacshmi; and her name is Asyotcarsha, or Asyotcrishta. He came in all his might and majesty. - XXIV. 2, p. 613.

What is this to the coming of Seeva, as given us by Mr. Maurice, from the Seeva Paurana?

" In the place of the right wheel blazed the Sun, in the place of the left was the Moon; instead of the brazen nails and bolts, which firmly held the ponderous wheels, were distributed Bramins on the right hand, and Reyshees on the left ; in lieu of the canopy on the top of the chariot was overspread the vault of Heaven; the counterpoise of the wheels was on the east and west, and the four Semordres were instead of the cushions and holsters; the four Vedas were placed as the horses of the charint, and Saraswaty was for the bell; the piece of wood by which the horses are driven was the threelettered Mantra, while Brama himself was the charioteer, and the Nacshatras and stars were distributed about it by way of ornaments. Sumaru was in the place of a bow, the scrpent Seschanaga was stationed as the string, Veeshnu instead of an arrow, and fire was constituted its point. Ganges and other rivers were appointed its precursors; and the setting out of the chariot, with its appendages and furniture, one would affirm to be the year of twelve months gracefully moving forwards.

"When Seeva, with his numerous troops and prodigious army, was mounted, Brama drove so furiously, that thought itself, which, in its ropid career, compasses Heaven and Earth, could not keep pace with it. By the motion of the chariot Heaven and Earth were put into a tremor ; and, as the Earth was not able to bear up under this burden, the Cow of the Earth, Kam-deva, took upon itself to support the weight. Seeva went with intention to destroy Treepoor ; and the multitude of Devetas, and Reyshees, and Apsaras who waited on his stirrup, opening their mouths, in transports of joy and praise, exclaimed, Jaya ! Jaya ! so that Parveti, not being able to bear his absence, set out to accompany Seeva, and in as justant was up with him ; while the light which brightened an his countenance, on the arrival of Parvati, surpassed all imagination and description. The Genii of the eight regions, armed with all kinds of weapons, but particularly with agnyastra, or fire-darts, like moving mountains, advanced in front of the army; and Eendra and other Devatas, some of them mounted on elephants, some on horses, others on chariots, or on camels or buffaloes, were stationed on each side, while all the other order of Devetas, to the amount of some lacks, formed the centre. The Munictuvaras, with long hair on their heads, like Saniassis, holding their staves in their hands, danced as they went along ; the Syddyhas, who revolve about the heavens, opening their mouths in praise of Seeva rained flowers upon his head; and the vaulted heaven, which is like on inverted goblet, being appointed in the place of a drum exalted his dignity by its majestic resonnding."

Throughout the Hindoo fables there is the constant mistaks of bulk for sublimity.

By the attribute of Deity, self-multiplied, The Almighty Man appeur'd on every side. XXIV. 2, p. 613,

This more than polypus power was once exerted by Krishna on a curious accasion.

It happened in Dwarka, a splendid city built by Viswakarma, by command of Krishna, on the sea-shore, in the province of Guterat, that his musical associate, Nareda, had no wife or substitute; and he hioted to his friend the decency of sparing him one from his long catalogue of ladies. Krishna generously told him to win and wear any one he chose, not immediately in requisition for himself. Nareda accordingly went wooing to one house, but found his master there; to a second, — he was again forestalled; a third, the same; to a fourth, fifth, the same: in fine, after the round of sixteen thousand of these domiciliary visits, he was still forced to sigh and keep single; for Krishaa was in every house, variously employed, and so domesticated, that each hady congratulated herself on her exclusive and uninterrupted possession of the ardent dei, ty, — Mooa's Hindu Pauhton, p. 204.

Eight of the chief gods have each their sacti, or energy, proceeding from them, differing from them in sex, but in every other respect exactly like them, with the same form, the same decorations, the same weapons, and the same vehicle. — Asiat. Res. 8vo edit, vol. viii, p. 68, 82.

The manner in which this divine power is displayed by Kehama, in his combat with Yamee, will remind some readers of the Irishman, who brought in four prisoners, and being osked how he had taken them, replied, he had surrounded them.

The Amreeta, or Drink of Immortality. XXIV. 9, p. 614.

Mr. Wilkins has given the genuine history of this liquor, which was produced by churning the sea with a mountain.

"There is a fair and stately mountain, and its name is Meroo, a most exalted mass of glory, reflecting the sunny rays from the splendid surface of its gilded horas. It is clothed in gold, and is the respected haunt of Dens and Gandhareas. It is inconceivable, and not to be encompassed by sinful man; and it is guarded by dreadful serpents. Many celestial medicinal plants adorn its sides; and it stands, piercing the heaven with its aspiring summit, a mighty hill, inaccessible even by the human mind. It is adorned with trees and pleasant streams, and resonndeth with the delightful songs of various birds.

"The Soors, and all the glorious hosts of heaven, having ascended to the summit of this lofty mountain, sparkling with precious gems, and for eternal oges raised, were sitting in solemn syaod, meditating the discovery of the Amereta, the Water of Immortality. The Deta Narayan being also there, spoke unto Brahma, whilst the Soors were thus consulting together, and said, 'Let the Ocean, as a pot of milk, be churned by the united labor of the Soors and Asoors' and Meu 'ne mighty waters have been stirred up, the Amereta shal, be found. Let them collect together every medicinal herb, and every precious thing, and let them stir the Ocean, and they shall discover the Amereta'

"There is also enother mighty mnuntain, whose ntme is Mandar, and its rocky summits are like towering clouds. It is clothed in a net of the entangled tendrils of the twining creeper, and resoundeth with the humnony of various birds. Innumerable savage beasts infest its borders; and it is the respected humt of Kennars, Detes, and Apsars. It standeth eleven thousand Yiejan above the earth, and eleven thousand more below its surface.

" As the united hands of Dews were unable to remove this Brahma, and addressed them in these words : ' Exert, O masters ! yunr most superior wisdom to remove the mountain Mandar, and employ your utmost power fur our good.'

" Feeshnoo and Brahma having suid, ' It shall be according to your wish,' he with the lotus eye directed the King of Serpents to appear ; and Ananta arose, and was instructed in that work hy Brahma, and commanded hy Narayan to perform it. Then Ananta, by his power, took up that king of mountains, together with all its forests and every inhabitant thereof; and the Soors accompanied him into the presence of the Ocean, whom they addressed, saying, 'We will stir up thy waters to obtain the Amreeta.' And the Lord of the Waters replied, ' Let me also have a share, seeing I am to bear the violent agitation that will be caused by the whirling of the mountain ! Then the Soors and Asoors spoke unto Koorma-raj, the King of the Tortoises, upon the strand of the Ocean, and said, " My lord is able to be the supporter of this mountain.' The Tortoise replied, 'Be it so;' and it was placed upon his back.

"So the mountain heing set upon the back of the Tortoise, Eendra hegan to whirl it shont as it were a machine. The mountain Mandar served as a churs, and the serpent Fasoakee for the rope; and thus in former days did the Dews, and Asoors, and the Danoos, hegin to stir up the waters of the ocean for the discovery of the Amrecta.

"The mighty Asoors were employed on the side of the serpent's head, whilst all the Soors assembled about his tail. Ananta, that sovereign Dew, stood neur Narayan.

" They now pull forth the serpent's head repentedly, and as often let it go; whilst there issued from his mouth, thus violeatly drawing to and fro hy the Sours and Asoors, a continual stream of fire and smoke and wind, which ascending in thick clouds, replete with lightning, it began to rain down upon the heavenly bands, who were already fatigued with their labor ; whilst a shower of flowers was shaken from the top of the mountain, covering the heads of all, hoth Soors and Asoors. In the mean time the roaring of the ocean, whilst violently agitated with the whirling of the mountain Mandar by the Soors and Asoors, was like the hellowing of a mighty cloud. Thousands of the various productions of the waters were torn to pieces by the mountain, and confounded with the bries flood ; and every specific heing of the deep, and ell the inhabitanta of the great abyss which is below the earth, were annihilated ; whilst, from the violent agitation of the mountain, the forest trees were dashed ngainst each other, and precipitated from its atmost height, with all the birds thereon ; from whose violent confrication a raging fire was produced, involving the whole mountain with smoke and flome, as with a dark-blue cloud, and the lightning's vivid flash. The lion and the retreating elephant are overtaken by the devouring flames, and every vital being and every specific thing are coosumed in the general conflagration.

" The raging flames, thus spreading destruction on all sides, were at length quenched by a shower of cloud-borne water, poured down hy the immortal Eendra. And now a heterogeneous stream of the concocted juices of various trees and plants ran down into the hriny flood.

"It was from this milk-like stream of jnices, produced from those trees and plaats and a mixture of melted gold, that the Soors obtained their immortality.

" The waters of the Ocean now being assimilated with those juices, were converted into milk, and from that milk a kind of butter was prescutly produced ; when the heavenly bands went again into the presence of Brahma, the granter of woons, and addressed him, saying, ' Except Narayan, every other Soor and Asoor is fatigued with his labor, and still the Amreeta doth not appear; wherefore the charming of the Ocean is at a stand.' Then Brahma said unto Narayan, "Endue them with recruited strength, for thou art their support.' And Narayan answered and said, 'I will give fiesh vigor to such as cooperate in the work. Let Mandar be whirled about, and the bed of the ocean be kept stendy."

"When they heard the words of Nurayan, they all isturned again to the work, and began to stir about with great force that hutter of the ocean, when there presently arose from ont the troubled deep, first the Moon, with a pleasing countenance, shining with ten thousand heams of gentle light ; next followed Sree, the goddess of fortune, whose sent is the white mountain, they went before Feesknoo, who was sitting with | lily of the waters ; then Soura-Devce, the goddess of wine, and the white horse called Oohisrava. And after these there was produced from the unctuous mass the jewell Kowstoobh, that glorious sparkling gem worn by Narayan on his breast; also Parcejat, the tree of plenty, and Suorablee, the cow that granted every heart's desire.

"The moon, Soora-Devee, the goddess of Sree, and the Horse, as swift as thought, instantly marched away towards the Dcws, keeping in the path of the Sun.

"Then the Dew Dhanwantaree, in human shape, came forth, holding in his hand a white vessel fillet - th the immortal jaice Amrecta. When the Asoors beheld these wondrous things appear, they raised their tumultuous voices for tha Amreeta, and each of them clamorously exclaimed, ' This of right is mine."

"In the mean time Travat, a mighty elephant, arose, now kept by the god of thunder; and as they continued to churn the ocean more than enough, that deadly poison issued from its bed, burning like a raging fire, whose dreadful fumes in a moment spread throughout the world, confounding the three regions of the universe with the mortal stench, until Seev, at the word of Brahma, swallowed the fatal drug, to save mankind ; which, remaining in the throat of that sovereign Devo of magic form, from that time he hath been called Neel-Kant, because his throat was stained blue.

"When the Asuars beheld this miraculous deed, they became desperate, and the Amreeta and the goddess Sree became the source of endless hatred.

"Then Narayan assumed the character and person of Moheence Maya, the power of enchantment, is a female form of wooderful heanty, and stood before the Asoors, whose minds being fascinated by her presence, and deprived of reason, they seized the Amrecta and gave it unto her.

"The Asoors now clothe themselves in costly armor, and, seizing their various weapons, rush on together to attack the Soors. In the mean time Narayan, in the femule form, having obtained the Amreeta from the hands of their leader, the hosta of Soors, during the tumult and confusion of the Asoors, drank of the living water.

"And it so fell out, that whilst the Sours were quenching their thirst for immortality, Rahoo, an Asoor, assumed the form of a Soor, and began to drink also: and the water had but reached his throat, when the Sun and Moon, in frieadship to the Soors, discovered the deccit; and instantly Narayan cut off his head as he was drinking, with his splendid weapon Chakra. And the gigantic head of the Asoor, emblem of a mountain's sammit, being thus separated from his body by the Chakra's edge, bounded into the beavens with a dreadful cry, whilst his ponderous trunk fell, cleaving the ground asunder, and shoking the whole carth noto its foundation, with all its islands, rocks, and forests; and from that time the head of Rahou resolved an eternal enmity, and continueth, even into this day, at times to seize upon the San and Moon.

" Now Narayan, having quitted the female figure he had assumed, began to disturb the Asoors with sundry celestial weapons; and from that instant a dreadful battle was commenced, on the ocean's briny strand, between the Asoors and the Soors. Innumerable shurp and missile weapons were hurled, and thousands of piercing datts and hattle-axes fell on all sides. The Asours vomit blood from the wounds of the Chakra, and fall upon the ground pierced by the sword, the spear, and spiked club. Heads, glittering with polished gold, divided by the Pattees' blade, drop incessantly; and mangled bodies, wallowing in their gore, lay like fragments of mighty rocks, sparkling with gems and precious orcs. Millions of sighs and groans arise on every side ; and the sun is overcast with blood, as they clash their arms, and wound each other with their dreadful instruments of destruction.

"Now the battle is fought with the iron-spiked club, and, as they close, with clinched fist ; and the din of war ascendeth to the heavens. They cry, 'Pursue! strike! fell to the ground !' so that a horrid and tampltuous noise is heard on all sides.

"In the midst of this dreadful hurry and confusion of the fight, Nur and Nurayan entered the field together. Narayan, beholding a celestial how in the hand of Nar, it reminded him of his Chakra, the destroyer of the Asours. The faithful weapon, by name Soudarsan, ready at the mind's call, flew down from heaven with direct and refulgent speed, bcantiful, yet terrible to behald : and being arrived, glowing like the sacrificial flame, and spreading terror eround, Naragar, with his right arm formed like the elephantine trunk, hurled forth the ponderous orb, the speedy messenger and glorious ruin of hostile towns; who, taging like the final all-destroying fire, shot bounding with desolating force, killing thousands of the Asoors in his rapid flight, burning and involving, like the lambent filame, and cutting down all that would oppose him. Anon he climbeth the heavens, and now again darteth into the field like a Pessach, to feast in blood.

"Now the dauntless Assors strive, with repeated strength, to crush the Sours with rocks and mountains, which, hurled in vast numbers into the heavens, appeared like scattered clouds, and fell, with all the trees thereon, in millions of fear-exciting torrents, striking violently against each other with a mighty noise; and in their fall the earth, with all its fields and forests, is driven from its foundation: they thunder furiously at each other as they roll along the field, and spend their strength in mutual conflict.

"Now Nar, seeing the Soors overwhelmed with fear, filled from wh up the path to Heaven with showers of golden-headed arrows, streams.

and split the mountain summits with his unerring shafts; and the Asoors, finding themselves again sore pressed by the Soors, precipitately flee; some rush headlong into the briny waters of the ocean, and others hide themselves within the bowels of the earth.

"The rage of the glorious Chakra, Soodarsan, which for a while burnt like the oil-fed fire, now grew cool, and he retired into the heavens from whence he came. And the Soors having obtained the victory, the mountain Mandar was carried hack to its former station with great respect, while the waters also retired, filling the firmannent and the heavens with their dreadful roarings.

"The Soors' guarded the Amreeta with great care, and rejoiced exceedingly because of their success. And Ecndra, with all his innortal bands, gave the water of life unto Narayan, to keep it for their use." - MAHABARAT.

Amrita, or Immortal, is, according to Sir William Jones, the name which the mythologists of Tibet apply to a celestial tree, bearing ambrosial fruit, and adjoining to four vast rocks, from which as many sacred rivers derive their several streams.

A TRAGIC POEM.

Tanto acrior apud majores, sicut virtutibus gloria, ita flagitiis pœnitentia, fuit. Sed hæc aliaqae, ex veteri memoria petita, quotiens res locusque exempla recti, aut solatia mali, poscet, haud absurdé memorahimus.

TO GROSVENOR CHARLES BEDFORD,

THIS POEM IS INSCRIBED,

IN LASTING MEMORIAL OF A LONG AND UNINTERRUPTED FRIENDSHIP,

BY HIS OLD SCHOOLFELLOW,

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

As the ample Moon, In the deep stillness of a summer even Rising behind a thick and lofty Grove, Burns like an unconsuming fire of light In the green trees ; and kindling on all sides Their leafy umbrage, turns the dusky veil Into a substance glorious as her own, Yea, with her own incorporated, by power Capacious and serene ; - like power abides In Man's celestial Spirit ; Virtue thus Sets forth and magnifies herself ; thus feeds A cahn, a heautiful and silent fire, From the encumbrances of mortal life, From error, disappointment, - nay, from guilt; And sometimes, so relenting Justice wills, From palpable oppressions of Despair.

WURDSWORTH.

PREFACE.

This poem was commenced at Keswick, Dec. 2, 1809, and finished there July 14, 1814.

A French translation, by M. B. de S., in three volumes 12mo., was published in 1820, and another by M. le Chevalier^{* *}, in one volume 8vo., 1821. Both are in prose.

When the latest of these versions was nearly ready for publication, the publisher, who was also the printer, insisted upon having a life of the author prefixed. The French public, he said, knew nothing of M. Southey, and in order to make the book sell, it must be managed to interest them for the writer. The Chevalier represented as a conclusive reason for not attempting any thing of the kind, that he was not acquainted with M. Southey's private history. "Would you believe it?" says a friend of the translator's, from whose letter . transscribe what follows; "this was his answer verbatim : ' Nimporte, écrivez toujours ; brodez, brodezla un peu; que ce soit vrui ou non ce ne fait ricn; qui prendra la peine de s'informer ?'" Accordingly a Notice sur M. Southey was composed, not exactly in conformity with the publisher's notions

In one of these versions a notable mistake occurs, occasioned by the French pronunciation of an English word. The whole passage indeed, in both versions, may be regarded as euriously exemplifying the difference between French and English poetry.

"The lamps and tapers now grew pale, And through the eastern windows slanting fell The roseate ray of morn. Within those walls Returning day restored no cheerful sounds Or joyous motions of awakening life ; But in the stream of light the speckled motes As if in mimicry of insect play, Floated with mazy movement. Sloping down Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam, And rested on the sinful woman's grave As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven. So be it ! cried Pelayo, even so ! As in a momentary interval, When thought expelling thought, had left his mind Open and passive to the influxes Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there, -So be it, Heavenly Father, even so ! Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed Forgiveness there; for let not thou the groans Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain ! And thou, poor soul, who from the dolorous house Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me To shorten and assuage thy penal term, Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts And other duties than this garb, this night Enjoin, should thus have past! Our mother-land Exacted of my heart the sacrifice ; And many a vigil must thy son perform Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses, And tented fields, outwatching for her sake The starry host, and ready for the work Of day, before the sun begins his course."*

Il se livroit à toutes ces réflexions, quand la lumière des lampes et des cierges commença à pálir, et que les premières teintes de l'aurore se montrèrent à travers les hautes croisées tournées vers l'orient. Le retour du jour ne ramena point dans ces murs des sons joyeux ni les mouremens de la vie qui se réreille ; les seuls papillons de nuit, agitant leurs oiles pesantes, bourdonnaient encore sous les voûtes ténébreuses. Bientôt le premier rayon du soleil glissant obliquement par-dessus l'autel, rint s'arrêter sur la tombe de la femaie pécheresse, et la lumière du ciel sembla y pénétrer. " Que ce présage s'accomplisse," s'écria Pelage, qui absorbé dans ses medutations, fixait en ce moment ses yeux sur le tombeau de sa merc ; " Dieu de miséricorde, qu'il en soit ainsi ! Puisse ta bouté rivifiante y rerser de même le pardou ! Que les sanglots de la pénitence expirante, et que mes prières amères ne montent point en vain derant le trone (ternel. Et toi, paurre ame, qui de ton séjour douloureux de souffrances et de larmes, espères en moi pour abréger et adoucir ton supplite, temporaire, pardonne moi d'avoir, sous ces habits et dans cette nuit, détourné mes pensées sur d'autres devoirs. Notre putrie commune a exige de moi ce sacrifice, et ton fils doit dorénavant accomplir plus d'une rille dans la profondeur des forêts sur la cime des monts, dans les plaines couvertes de tentes, obsereant, pour l'amour de l'Espagne, la marche des astres de la nuit, et préparant l'ouvrage de su journée orant que le soleil ne commence sa course."—T. i. pp. 175—177.

In the other translation the motes are not converted into moths, — but the image is omitted.

Consumées dans des soins pareils les rapides heures s'écouloient, les lampes et les torches commençoient à pâlir, et l'oblique rayon du matin doroit déjà les vitraux élevés qui regardoient vers l'Orient : le retour du jour ne ramenoit point, dans cette sumbre enceinte, les sons joyeux, ni le tableuu mourant de la vie qui se reveille ; mais, tombant d'en haut, le céleste rayon, possant au-dessus de l'autel, vint frupper le tombeau de la femme pécheresse. "Ainsi soit-il," s'écria Pelage; "ainsi soit-il, o divin Créateur ! Puisse ta vivifiante bonte verser ainsi le purdon en ce lieu ! Que les gémissemens d'une mort pénitente, que mes amères prières ne suient pas arrivées en vain devant la trône de miséricorde ! Et toi, qui, de ton séjour de souffrances et de larmes, regardes vers ton fils, pour abréger et soulager tes peines, pardonne, si d'autres devoirs ont rempli les heures que cette nuit et cet habit m'enjoignoient de te cunsaerer ! Notre potrie exigeoit ce sacrifice ; d'autres rigiles m'attendent dans les bois et les défilés de nos montagnes; et bientôt sous la tente, il me faudra veiller, le soir, avant que le ciel ne se courre d'étoiles, être prêt pour le travail du jour, avant que le soleil ne commence sa course." - Pp. 92, 93.

A very good translation, in Dutch verse, was published in two volumes, 8vo, 1523-4, with this title: — "Rodrigo de Goth, Koning van Spanje. Naar het Engelsch van Sonthey gevolgd, door Vrouwe Katharina Wilhelmina Bilderdijk. Te 's Gravenhage." It was sent to me with the following epistle from her husband, Mr. Willem Bilderdijk.

"Dabam Lugduni in Batavis. Ipsis idib. Februar. CIOIOCCCXXIV.'

I went to Leyden in 1825, for the purpose of seeing the writer of this epistle, and the lady who had translated my poem, and addressed it to me in some very affecting stanzas. It so happened, that on my arrival in that city, I was laid up under a surgeon's care; they took me into their house, and made the days of my confinement as pleasurable as they were memorable. I have never been acquainted with a man of higher intellectual power, nor of greater learning, nor of more various and extensive knowledge than Bilderdijk, confessedly the most distinguished man of letters in his own country. His wife was worthy of him. I paid them another visit the following year. They are now both gone to their rest, and I shall not look upon their like again.

Soon after the publication of Roderick, I received the following curious letter from the Ettrick Shepherd, (who had passed a few days with me in the preceding autninn,) giving me an account of his endeavors to procure a favorable notice of the poem in the Edinburgh Review.

" Edinburgh, Dec. 15, 1814.

"MY DEAR SIR,

" I was very happy at seeing the post-mark of Keswick, and quite proud of the pleasure you make me believe my " Wake " has given to the beauteous and happy group at Greta Ilall. Indeed, few things could give me more pleasure, for I left my heart a sojourner among them. I have had a higher opinion of matrimony since that period than ever I had before; and I desire that you will positively give my kindest respects to each of them individually.

Tuum vero nomen, Vir celeberrime ac spectatis- | see by the Papers, and if I may believe some com munications that I have got, the public opinion of it is high; but these communications to an author are not to be depended on.

> "I have read Roderick over and over again, and am the more and more convinced that it is the noblest epic poem of the age. I have had some correspondence and s good deal of conversation with Mr. Jeffrey about it, though he does not agree with me in every particular. He says it is too long, and wants clasticity, and will not, he fears, be generally read, though much may be said in its favor. I had even teased him to let me review it for him, on account, as 1 said, that he could not appreciate its merits. I copy one sentence out of the letter he sent in answer to mine :----

> "'For Southey I have, as well as you, great respect, and when he will let me, great admiration; but he is a most provoking fellow, and at least as conceited as his neighbor Wordsworth. I cannot just trust you with his Roderick; but I shall be extremely happy to talk over that and other kindred subjects with you; for 1 am every way disposed to give Southey a lavish allowance of praise ; and few things would give me greater pleasure than to find he had afforded me a fair opportunity. But I must do my duty according to my own apprehensions of it.

> "I supped with him last night, but there was so many people that I got but little conversation with him; but what we had was solely about you and Wordsworth. I suppose you have heard what a crushing review he has given the latter. I still found him persisting in his first asseveration, that it was heavy; but what was my pleasure to find that he had only got to the seventeenth division ! I assured him he had the marrow of the thing to come at as yet, and in that I was joined by Mr. Alison. There was at the same time a Lady Mjoined us at the instant; short as her remark was, it seemed to make more impression on Jeffrey than all our arguments :- " Oh, I do love Southey !" that was all.

> " I have no room to tell you more. But I beg that you will not do any thing, nor publish any thing that will nettle Jeffrey for the present, knowing, as you do, how omnipotent he is with the fashionable world, and seemingly so well disposed toward you.

"I am ever yours most truly,

" JAMES HOGG.

"I wish the Notes may be safe enough. I never looked at them. I wish these large quartoes were all in hell burning."

The reader will be as much amused as I was with poor Hogg's earnest desire that I would not say any thing which might tend to frustrate his friendly intentions.

> But what success the Shepherd met, Is to the world a secret yet.

There can be no reason, however, for withhold-"The Pilgrim of the Sun is published, as you will | ing what was said in my reply of the crushing review which had been given to Mr. Wordsworth's pocm: — "He crush the Excursion !! Tell him he might as easily crush Skiddaw!"

KESWICK, 15 June, 1838.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

THE history of the Wisi-Goths for some years before their overthrow is very imperfectly known. It is, however, apparent that the enmity between the royal families of Chindasuintho and Wamba was one main cause of the destruction of the kingdom, the latter party having assisted in betraying their country to the Moors for the gratification of their own revenge. Theodofred and Favila were younger sons of King Chindasuintho; King Witiza, who was of Wamba's family, put out the eyes of Theodofred, and murdered Favila, at the instigation of that Chieftain's wife, with whom he lived in adultery. Pelayo, the son of Favila, and afterwards the founder of the Spanish monarchy, was driven into exile. Roderick, the son of Theodofred, recovered the throne, and put out Witiza's eyes in vengeance for his father; but he spared Orpas, the brother of the tyrant, as being a Priest, and Ebba and Sisibert, the two sons of Witiza, by Pelayo's mother. It may be convenient thus briefly to premise these circumstances of an obscure portion of history, with which few readers can be supposed to be familiar; and a list of the principal persons who are introduced, or spoken of, may as properly be prefixed to a Poem as to a Play.

WITIZA, King of the Wisi-Goths; dethroned and blinded by Roderick.
THEODOFRED, SOU OF King Chindasuintho, blinded by King Witiza.
FAVILA, his brother ; put to death by Witiza.

commences.)

The four latter persons are imaginary. All the others are mentioned in history. I onght, however, to observe, that Romano is a creature of monkish legends; that the name of Pelayo's sister has not been preserved; and that that of Roderick's mother, Ruscilo, has been altered to Rusilla. for the sake of euphony.

I.

RODERICK AND ROMANO.

Long had the crimes of Spain cried out to Heaven: At length the measure of offence was full. Count Julian call'd the invaders; not because Inhuman priests with unoffending blood Had stain'd their country; not because a yoke Of iron servitude oppress'd and gall'd The children of the soil : a private wrong Roused the remorseless Baron. Mad to wreak His vengeance, for his violated child, On Roderick's head, in evil hour for Spain, For that unhappy daughter, and himself, -Desperate apostate ! - on the Moors he call'd ; And like a cloud of locusts, whom the South Wafts from the plains of wasted Africa, The Mussulmen upon Iberia's shore Descend. A countless multitude they came; Syrian, Moor, Saracen, Greek renegade, Persian, and Copt, and Tatar, in one bond Of erring faith conjoin'd, -- strong in the youth And heat of zeal, - a dreadful brotherhood, In whom all turbulent vices were let loose; While Conscience, with their impious creed aceurs'd Drunk as with wine, had sanctified to them All bloody, all abominable things.

Thou, Calpe, saw'st their coming; ancient Rock Renown'd, no longer now shalt thou be call'd From Gods and Heroes of the years of yorc, Kronos, or hundred-handed Briareus, Bacchus, or Hercules; but doom'd to bear The name of thy new conqueror, and thenceforth To stand his everlasting monument. Thou saw'st the dark-blue waters flash before Their ominous way, and whiten round their keels; Their swarthy myriads darkening o'er thy sands. There, on the beach, the Misbelievers spread Their banners, flaunting to the sun and breeze; Fair shone the sun upon their prond array, White turbans, glittering armor, shields engrail'd With gold, and eimeters of Syrian steel; And gently did the breezes, as in sport,

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

Curl their long flags outrolling, and display The blazon'd scrolls of blasphemy. Too soon The gales of Spain from that unhappy land Wafted, as from an open charnel-house, The taint of death; and that bright sun, from fields Of slaughter, with the morning dew drew up Corruption through the infected atmosphere.

Then fell the kingdom of the Goths; their hour Was come, and Vengeance, long withheld, went loose.

Famine and Pestilence had wasted them, And Treason, like an old and eating sore, Consumed the bones and sinews of their strength; And, worst of enemies, their Sins were arm'd Against them. Yet the sceptre from their hands Pass'd not away inglorious, nor was shame Left for their children's lasting heritage; Eight summer days, from morn till latest eve, The fatal fight endured, till perfidy Prevailing to their overthrow, they sunk Defeated, not dishonor'd. On the banks Of Chrysus, Roderick's royal car was found, His battle-horse Orelio, and that helm Whose horns, amid the thickest of the fray Eminent, had mark'd his presence. Did the stream Receive him with the undistinguish'd dead, Christian and Moor, who clogg'd its course that day?

So thought the Conqueror ; and from that day forth, Memorial of his perfect victory,

He bade the river bear the name of Joy. So thought the Goths; they said no prayer for him, For him no service sung, nor mourning made, But charged their crimes upon his head, and cursed His memory.

Bravely in that eight-days' fight The King had striven, — for victory first, while hope

Remain'd, then desperately in search of death. The arrows pass'd him by to right and left; The spear-point pierced him not; the cimeter Glanced from his helmet. Is the shield of Heaven, Wretch that I am, extended over me? Cried Roderick; and he dropp'd Orelio's reins, And threw his hands aloft in frantic prayer, -Death is the only mercy that 1 crave, Death soon and short, death and forgetfulness! Aloud he cried; but in his inmost heart There answer'd him a secret voice, that spake Of righteousness and judgment after death, And God's redeeming love, which fain would save The guilty soul alive. 'Twas agony, And yet 'twas hope; -a momentary light, That flash'd through utter darkness on the Cross To point salvation, then left all within Dark as before. Fear, never felt till then, Sudden and irresistible as stroke Of lightning, smote him. From his horse he dropp'd, Whether with buman impulse, or by Heaven Struck down, he knew not; loosen'd from his wrist The sword-chain, and let fall the sword, whose hilt Clung to his palm a moment ere it fell, Glued there with Moorish gore. His royal robe,

His horned helmet and enamell'd mail, He cast aside, and taking from the dead A peasant's garment, in those weeds involved Stole like a thief in darkness from the field.

Evening closed round to favor him. All night He fled, the sound of battle in his ear Ringing, and sights of death before his eyes, With former over horrible of eager fiends That seem'd to hover round, and gulfs of fire Opening beneath his fect. At times the groan Of some poor fugitive, who, bearing with him His mortal hurt, had fallen beside the way, Roused him from these dread visions, and he call'd In answering groans on his Redeemer's name, That word the only prayer that pass'd his lips, Or rose within his heart. Then would he see The Cross whereon a bleeding Savior hung, Who call'd on him to come and cleanse his soul In those all-bealing streams, which from his wounds,

As from perpetual springs, forever flow'd. No hart e'er panted for the water-brooks As Roderick thirsted there to drink and live; But Hell was interposed; and worse than Hell-Yea, to his eyes more dreadful than the fiends Who flock'd like hungry ravens round his head, -Florinda stood between, and warn'd him off With her abhorrent hands, - that agony Still in her face, which, when the deed was done, Inflicted on her ravisher the curse That it invoked from Heaven. - Oh, what a night Of waking horrors! Nor, when morning came, Did the realities of light and day Bring aught of comfort ; wheresoe'er he went The tidings of defeat had gone before; And leaving their defenceless homes to seek What shelter walls and battlements might yield, Old men with feeble feet, and tottering babes, And widows with their infants in their arms, Hurried along. Nor royal festival, Nor sacred pageant, with like multitudes E'er fill'd the public way. All whom the sword Had spared were here; bed-rid infirmity Alone was left behind ; the cripple plied His crutches; with her child of yesterday The mother fled, and she whose hour was come Fell by the road.

Less dreadful than this view Of outward suffering which the day disclosed, Had night and darkness seem'd to Roderick's heart, With all their dread creations. From the throng He turn'd aside, unable to endure This burden of the general woe; nor walls, Nor towers, nor mountain fastnesses he sought; A firmer hold his spirit yearn'd to find, A rock of surer strength. Unknowing where, Straight through the wild be hasten'd on all day, And with unslacken'd speed was travelling still When evening gather'd round. Seven days, from morn Till night, he travell'd thus; the forest oaks,

The fig-grove by the fearful husbandman Forsaken to the spoiler, and the vines, Where fox and household dog together now

Fed on the vintage, gave him food; the hand Of Heaven was on him, and the agony Which wrought within, supplied a strength beyond All natural force of man.

١.

When the eighth eye Was come, he found himself on Ana's banks, Fast by the Caulian Schools. It was the hour Of vespers; but no vesper-bell was heard, Nor other sound, than of the passing stream, Or stork, who, flapping with wide wing the air, Sought her broad nest upon the silent tower. Brethren and pupils thence alike had fled To save themselves within the embattled walls Of neighboring Merida. One aged Monk Alone was left behind; he would not leave The sacred spot beloved, for having served There, from his childhood up to ripe old age, God's holy altar, it became him now, He thought, before that altar to await The merciless misbelievers, and lay down His life, a willing martyr. So he staid When all were gone, and duly fed the lamps, And kept devotedly the altar dress'd, And duly offer'd up the sacrifice. Four days and nights he thus had pass'd alone, In such high mood of saintly fortitude, That hope of Heaven became a heavenly joy; And now at evening to the gate he went, If he might spy the Moors, -- for it seem'd long To tarry for his crown.

Before the Cross

Roderick had thrown himself; his body raised, Half kneeling, half at length he lay; his arms Embraced its foot, and from his lifted face Tears streaming down bedew'd the senseless stone. He had not wept till now; and at the gush Of these first tears, it seem'd as if his heart, From a long winter's icy thrall let loose, Had open'd to the genial influences Of Heaven. In attitude, but not in act Of prayer he lay; an agony of tears Was all his soul could offer. When the Monk Beheld him suffering thus, he raised him up, And took him by the arm, and led him in ; And there, before the altar, in the name Of Him whose bleeding image there was hung, Spake comfort, and adjured him in that name There to lay down the burden of his sins. Lo! said Romano, I am waiting here The coming of the Moors, that from their hands My spirit may receive the purple robe Of martyrdom, and rise to claim its crown. That God who willeth not the sinner's death Hath led thee hither. Threescore years and five, Even from the hour when I, a five-years' child, Enter'd the schools, have I continued here, And served the altar : not in all those years Hath such a contrite and a broken heart Appear'd before me. O my brother, Heaven Hath sent thee for thy comfort, and for mine, That my last earthly act may reconcile A sinner to his God.

. Then Roderick knelt Before the holy man, and strove to speak. Thou seest, he cried, — thou seest, — but memory And a rude Cross, and at its foot a grave,

And suffocating thoughts repress'd the word, And shudderings like an ague-fit, from head To foot convulsed him; till at length, subduing His nature to the effort, he exclaim'd, Spreading his hands and lifting up his face, As if resolved in penitence to bear A human eye upon his shame, — Thou seest Roderick the Goth ! That name would have sufficed To tell its whole abhorred history : He not the less pursned, — the ravisher, The cause of all this ruin ! Having said, In the same posture motionless he knelt, Arms straighten'd down, and hands ontspread, and eyes Raised to the Monk, like one who from his voice Awaited life or death.

All night the old man

Pray'd with his penitent, and minister'd Unto the wounded soul, till he infused A healing hope of mercy that allay'd Its heat of anguish. But Romano saw What strong temptations of despair beset, And how he needed in this second birth, Even like a yearling child, a fosterer's care. Father in Heaven, he cried, thy will be done ! Surely I hoped that I this day should sing Hosannahs at thy throne ; but thou hast yet Work for thy servant here. He girt his loins, And from her altar took, with reverent hands, Our Lady's image down : In this, quoth he, We have our guide, and guard, and comforter, The best provision for our perilous way. Fear not but we shall find a resting-place; The Almighty's hand is on us.

They went forth ; They cross'd the stream; and when Romano turn'd For his last look toward the Caulian towers, Far off the Moorish standards in the light Of morn were glittering, where the miscreant host Toward the Lusitanian capital To lay their siege advanced ; the eastern breeze Bore to the fearful travellers far away The sound of horn and tambour o'er the plain. All day they hasten'd, and when evening fell, Sped toward the setting sun, as if its line Of glory came from Heaven to point their course. But feeble were the feet of that old man For such a weary length of way; and now Being pass'd the danger, (for in Merida Sacaru long in resolute defence Withstood the tide of war,) with easier pace The wanderers journey'd on; till having cross'd Rich Tagus, and the rapid Zezere, They from Albardos' hoary height beheld Pine-forest, fruitful vale, and that fair lake Where Alcoa, mingled there with Baza's stream, Rests on its passage to the western sea, That sea the aim and boundary of their toil.

The fourth week of their painful pilgrimage Was full, when they arrived where from the land A rocky hill, rising with steep ascent, O'erhning the glittering beach; there, on the top, A little, lowly hermitage they found, And a rude Cross, and at its foot a grave, Bearing no name, nor other monument. Where better could they rest than here, where faith, And secret penitence, and happiest death, Had bless'd the spot, and brought good Angels down,

And open'd, as it were, a way to Heaven? Behind them was the desert, offering fruit And water for their need; on either side The white sand sparkling to the sun; in front, Great Ocean with its everlasting voice, As in perpetual jubilee, proclaim'd The wonders of the Almighty, filling thus The pauses of their fervent orisons. Where better could the wanderers rest than here?

n.

RODERICK IN SOLITUDE.

TWELVE months they sojourn'd in their solitude, And then beneath the burden of old age Romano sunk. No brethren were there here To spread the sackcloth, and with ashes strow That penitential bed, and gather round To sing his requiem, and with prayer and psalm Assist him in his hour of agony. He lay on the bare earth, which long had been His only couch; beside him Roderick knelt, Moisten'd from time to time his blacken'd hips, Received a blessing with his latest breath, Then elosed his eyes, and by the nameless grave Of the fore-tenant of that holy place Consign'd him, earth to earth.

Two graves are here; And Roderick, transverse at their feet, began To break the third. In all his intervals Of prayer, save only when he search'd the woods And fill'd the water-cruise, he labor'd there ; And when the work was done, and he had laid Himself at length within its narrow sides And measured it, he shook his head to think There was no other business now for him. Poor wretch, thy bed is ready, he exclaim'd, And would that night were come ! - It was a task, All gloomy as it was, which had beguiled The sense of solitude; but now he felt The burden of the solitary hours : The silence of that lonely hermitage Lay on him like a spell ; and at the voice Of his own prayers, he started, half aghast. Then, too, as on Romano's grave he sat And pored upon his own, a natural thought Arose within him, - well might he have spared That useless toil; the sepulchre would be No hiding-place for him; no Christian hands Were here who should compose his decent corpse And cover it with earth. There he might drag His wretched body at its passing hour; But there the Sea-Birds of her heritage Would rob the worm, or peradventure seize, Ere death had done its work, their helpless prey. Even now they did not fear him : when he walk'd Beside them on the beach, regardlessly

They saw his coming ; and their whirring wings Upon the height had sometimes fann'd his cheek, As if, being thus alone, humanity Had lost its rank, and the prerogative Of man were done away.

For his lost crown And sceptre never had he felt a thought Of pain; repentance had no pangs to spare For trifles such as these, - the loss of these Was a cheap penalty ; - that he had faller. Down to the lowest depth of wretchedness, His hope and consolation. But to lose His human station in the scale of things, --To see brute nature scorn him, and renounce Its homage to the human form divine; ---Had then Almighty vengeance thus reveal'd His punishment, and was he fallen indeed Below fallen man, below redemption's reach, ---Made lower than the beasts, and like the heasts To perish !- Such temptations troubled him By day, and in the visions of the night; And even in sleep he struggled with the thought, And waking with the effort of his prayers, The dream assail'd him still.

A wilder form Sometimes his poignant penitence assumed, Starting with force revived from intervals Of calmer passion, or exhausted rest; When floating back upon the tide of thought Remembrance to a self-excusing strain Beguiled him, and recall'd in long array The sorrows and the secret impulses Which to the abyss of wretchedness and guilt Led their unwary victim. The evil hour Return'd upon him, when reluctantly Yielding to worldly counsel his assent, In wedlock to an ill-assorted mate He gave his cold, unwilling hand: then came The disappointment of the barren bed, The hope deceived, the soul dissatisfied, Home without love, and privacy from which Delight was banish'd first, and peace too soon Departed. Was it strange that, when he met A heart attuned, - a spirit like his own, Of lofty pitch, yet in affection mild, And tender as a youthful mother's joy, ---Oh, was it strange if, at such sympathy, The feelings, which within his breast repell'd And chill'd, had shrunk, should open forth like flowers

After cold winds of night, when gentle gales Restore the genial sun? If all were known, Would it indeed be not to be forgiven? — (Thus would he lay the unction to his soul,) If all were truly known, as Heaven knows all, Heaven, that is merciful as well as just, — A passion slow and mutual in its growth, Pure as fraternal love, long self-conceal'd, And when confess'd in silence, long-controll'd; Treacherous occasion, human frailty, fear Of endless separation, worse than death, — The purpose and the hope with which the Fiend Tempted, deceived, and madden'd him; — but then As at a new temptation would he start, Shuddering beneath the intolerable shame,

And clinch in agony his matted hair; While in his soul the perilous thought arose, How easy 'twere to plunge where yonder waves Invited him to rest.

Oh for a voice Of comfort, - for a ray of hope from Heaven! A hand that from these billows of despair May reach and snatch him ere he sink ingulf'd! At length, as life, when it hath lain long time Oppress'd beneath some grievous malady, Seems to rouse up with re-collected strength, And the sick man doth feel within himself A second spring, so Roderick's better mind Arose to save him. Lo! the western sun Flames o'er the broad Atlantic; on the verge Of glowing ocean rests; retiring then Draws with it all its rays, and sudden night Fills the whole cope of heaven. The penitent Knelt by Romano's grave, and falling prone, Clasp'd with extended arms the funeral mould. Father! he cried; Companion! only friend, When all beside was lost ! thou too art gone, And the poor sinner whom from utter death Thy providential hand preserved, once more Totters upon the gulf. I am too weak For solitude, - too vile a wretch to bear This everlasting commune with myself. The Tempter hath assail'd me; my own heart Is leagued with him; Despair hath laid the nets To take my soul, and Memory, like a ghost, Haunts me, and drives me to the toils. O Saint, While 1 was bless'd with thee, the hermitage Was my sure haven ! Look upon me still, For from thy heavenly mansion thou canst see The suppliant; look upon thy child in Christ. Is there no other way for penitence? I ask not martyrdom; for what am I That I should pray for triumphs, the fit meed Of a long life of holy works like thine; Or how should I presumptuously aspire To wear the heavenly crown resign'd by thee, For my poor sinful sake? Oh point me thou Some humblest, painfulest, severest path, --Some new austerity, unheard of yet In Syrian fields of glory, or the sands Of holiest Egypt. Let me bind my brow With thorns, and barefoot seek Jerusalem, Tracking the way with blood; there, day by day, Inflict upon this guilty flesh the scourge, Drink vinegar and gall, and for my bed Hang with extended limbs upon the Cross, A nightly crucifixion ! - any thing Of action, difficulty, bodily pain, Labor, and outward suffering, --- any thing But stillness and this dreadful solitude ! Romano! Father! let me hear thy voice In dreams, O sainted Soul! or from the grave Speak to thy penitent; even from the grave Thine were a voice of comfort.

Thus he cried, Easing the pressure of his burden'd heart With passionate prayer; thus pour'd his spirit forth, Till, with the long, impetuous effort spent, His spirit fail'd, and, laying on the grave His weary head as on a pillow, sleep

Fell on him. He had pray'd to hear a voice Of consolation, and in dreams a voice Of consolation came. Roderick, it said, -Roderick, my poor, unhappy, sinful child, Jesus have mercy on thee ! - Not if Heaven Had opened, and Romano, visible In his beatitude, had breathed that prayer ; ---Not if the grave had spoken, had it pierced So deeply in his soul, nor wrung his heart With such compunctious visitings, nor given So quick, so keen a pang. It was that voice Which sung his fretful infancy to sleep So patiently; which soothed his childish griefs, Counsell'd, with anguish and prophetic tears, His headstrong youth. And lo! his Mother stood Before him in the vision; in those weeds Which never from the hour when to the grave She follow'd her dear lord Theodofred Rusilla laid aside; but in her face A sorrow that bespake a heavier load At heart, and more unmitigated woe, ----Yea, a more mortal wretchedness than when Witiza's ruffians and the 'red-hot brass Had done their work, and in her arms she held Her eyeless husband; wiped away the sweat Which still his tortures forced from every pore; Cool'd his scorch'd lids with medicinal herbs, And pray'd the while for patience for herself And him, and pray'd for vengeance too, and found Best comfort in her curses. In his dream, Groaning he knelt before her to beseech Her blessing, and she raised her hands to lay A benediction on him. But those hands Were chain'd, and casting a wild look around, With thrilling voice she cried, Will no one break These shameful fetters? Pedro, Theudemir, Athanagild, where are ye? Roderick's arm Is wither'd; - Chiefs of Spain, but where are ye? And thou, Pelayo, thou our surest hope, Dost thou, too, sleep ? - Awake, Pelayo ! - up ! -Why tarriest thou, Deliverer? - But with that She broke her bonds, and, lo ! her form was changed !

Radiant in arms she stood ! a bloody Cross Gleam'd on her breastplate; in her shield display'd, Erect a lion ramp'd; her helmed head Rose like the Berecynthian Goddess crown'd With towers, and in her dreadful hand the sword Red as a firebrand blazed. Anon the tramp Of horsemen, and the din of multitudes Moving to mortal conflict, rang around; The battle-song, the clang of sword and shield, War-cries, and tumult, strife, and hate, and rage, Blasphemous prayers, confusion, agony, Rout, and pursuit, and death; and over all The shout of victory, - Spain and Victory ! Roderick, as the strong vision master'd him, Rush'd to the fight rejoicing : starting then, As his own effort burst the charm of sleep, He found himself upon that lonely grave In moonlight and in silence. But the dream Wrought in him still; for still he felt his heart Pant, and his wither'd arm was trembling still; And still that voice was in his ear which call'd On Jesus for his sake.

Oh, might he hear That actual voice ! and 'if Rusilla lived, — If shame and anguish for his crimes not yet Had brought her to the grave, — sure she would bless

Her penitent child, and pour into his heart Prayers and forgiveness, which like precious balm Would heal the wounded soul. Nor to herself Less precious, or less healing, would the voice That spake forgiveness flow. She wept her son Forever lost, cut off with all the weight Of unrepented sin upon his head, Sin which had weigh'd a nation down - what joy To know that .ighteous Heaven had in its wrath Remember'd mercy, and she yet might meet The child whom she had borne, redeem'd, in bliss ! The sudden impulse of such thoughts confirm'd That unacknowledged purpose, which till now Vainly had sought its end. He girt his loins, Laid holiest Mary's image in a cleft Of the rock, where, shelter'd from the elements, It might abide till happier days came on, From all defilement safe; pour'd his last prayer Upon Romano's grave, and kiss'd the earth Which cover'd his remains, and wept as if At long leave-taking, then began his way.

III.

ADOSINDA.

'Twas now the earliest morning; soon the Sun, Rising above Albardos, pour'd his light Amid the forest, and with ray aslant Entering its depth, illumed the branchless pines, Brighten'd their bark, tinged with a redder hue Its rusty stains, and cast along the floor Long lines of shadow, where they rose erect Like pillars of the temple. With slow foot Roderick pursued his way; for penitence, Remorse which gave no respite, and the long And painful conflict of his troubled soul, Had worn him down. Now, brighter thoughts arose.

And that triumphant vision floated still Before his sight with all her blazonry, Her castled helm, and the victorious sword That flash'd like lightning o'er the field of blood. Sustain'd by thoughts like these, from morn tilleve He journey'd, and drew near Leyria's walls. 'Twas even-song time, but not a bell was heard; Instead thereof, on her polluted towers, Bidding the Moors to their unhallow'd prayer, The crier stood, and with his sonoreus voice Fill'd the delicious vale where Lena winds Through groves and pastoral meads. The sound, the sight

Of turban, girdle, robe, and cimeter, And tawny skins, awoke contending thoughts Of anger, shame, and anguish in the Goth; The face of human-kind so long unseen Confused him now, and through the streets he went With hagged mien, and countenance like one

Crazed or bewilder'd. All who met him turn'd. And wonder'd as he pass'd. One stopp'd him short. Put alms into his hand, and then desired, In broken Gothic speech, the moon-struck man To bless him. With a look of vacancy Roderick received the alms; his wandering eye Fell on the money; and the fallen King, Seeing his own royal impress on the piece, Broke out into a quick, convulsive voice, That seem'd like laughter first, but ended soon In hollow groans suppress'd : the Mussulman Shrunk at the ghastly sound, and magnified The name of Allah as he hasten'd on A Christian woman, spinning at her door, Beheld him, and, with sudden pity touch'd, She laid her spindle by, and running in, Took bread, and following after, call'd him back, And placing in his passive hands the loaf, She said, Christ Jesus for his mother's sake Have mercy on thee! With a look that seem'd Like idiotcy he heard her, and stood still, Staring awhile; then, bursting into tears, Wept like a child, and thus relieved his heart, Full even to bursting else with swelling thoughts. So through the streets, and through the northern gate,

Did Roderick, reckless of a resting-place, With feeble yet with hurried step pursue His agitated way; and when he reach'd The open fields, and found himself alone Beneath the starry canopy of Heaven, The sense of solitude, so dreadful late, Was then repose and comfort. There he stopp'd Beside a little rill, and brake the loaf; And shedding o'er that long untasted food Painful but quiet tears, with grateful soul He breathed thanksgiving forth, then made his bed On heath and myrtle.

But when he arose At day-break, and pursued his way, his heart Felt lighten'd that the shock of mingling first Among his fellow-kind was overpast; And journeying on, he greeted whom he met With such short interchange of benison As each to other gentle travellers give, Recovering thus the power of social speech Which he had long disused. When hunger press'd, He ask'd for alms : slight supplication served ; A countenance so pale and woe-begone Moved all to pity; and the marks it bore Of rigorous penance and austerest life, With something, too, of majesty that still Appear'd amid the wreck, inspired a sense Of reverence too. The goat-herd on the hills Open'd his scrip for him; the babe in arms, Affrighted at his visage, turn'd away, And clinging to the mother's neck in tears, Would yet again look up, and then again Shrink back, with cry renew'd. The bolder imps Sporting beside the way, at his approach Brake off their games for wonder, and stood still In silence; some among them cried, A Saint! The village matron, when she gave him food, Besought his prayers; and one entreated him To lay his healing hands upon her child,

III.

For with a sore and hopeless malady Wasting it long had lain, — and sure, she said He was a man of God

Thus travelling on, He pass'd the vale where wild Arunca pours Its wintry torrents; and the happier site Of old Conimbrica, whose ruin'd towers Bore record of the fierce Alani's wrath. Mondego, too, he cross'd, not yet renown'd In roet's amorous lay; and left behind The walls at whose foundation pious hands Of Priest, and Monk, and Bishop meekly toil'd, -So had the insulting Arian given command. Those stately palaces and rich domains Were now the Moor's; and many a weary age Must Coimbra wear the misbeliever's yoke, Before Fernando's banner through her gate Shall pass triumphant, and her hallow'd Mosque Behold the hero of Bivar receive The knighthood which he glorified so oft In his victorious fields. Oh, if the years To come might then have risen on Roderick's soul, How had they kindled and consoled his heart ! -What joy might Douro's haven then have given, Whence Portugal, the faithful and the brave, Shall take her name illustrious !- what, those walls Where Mumadona one day will erect Convent, and town, and towers, which shall become The cradle of that famous monarchy ! What joy might these prophetic scenes have given,-What ample vengeance on the Mussulman, Driven out with foul defeat, and made to feel In Africa the wrongs he wrought to Spain ; And still pursued by that relentless sword, Even to the farthest Orient, where his power Received its mortal wound ! Oh years of pride! In undiscoverable futurity, Yet unevolved, your destined glories lay; And all that Roderick in these fated scenes Beheld, was grief and wretchedness, - the waste Of recent war, and that more mournful calm Of joyless, helpless, hopeless servitude. 'Twas not the ruin'd walls of church or tower, Cottage, or hall, or convent, black with smoke; 'Twas not the unburied bones, which, where the dogs And crows had strown then, lay amid the field Bleaching in sun or shower, that wrung his heart With keenest anguish : 'twas when he beheld The turban'd traitor show his shameless front In the open eye of Heaven, - the renegade, On whose base, brutal nature, unredeem'd, Even black apostasy itself could stamp No deeper reprobation at the hour Assign'd fall prostrate; and unite the names Of God and the Blasphemer, - impious prayer, -Most impious, when from unbelieving lips The accursëd utterance came. Then Roderick's heart

With indignation burnt, and then he long'd To be a King again, that so, for Spain Betray'd and his Redeemer thus renounced, He might inflict due punishment, and make These wretches feel his wrath. But when he saw The daughters of the land, — who, as they went With cheerful step to church, were wont to show Their innocent faces to all passers' eyes, Freely, and free from sin as when they look'd In adoration and in praise to Heaven, — Now mask'd in Moorish mufflers, to the Mosque Holding uncompanied their jealous way, His spirit seem'd at that unhappy sight To die away within him, and he, too, Would fain have died, so death could bring with it Entire oblivion.

Rent with thoughts like these, He reach'd that city, once the seat renown'd Of Suevi kings, where, in contempt of Rome Degenerate long, the North's heroic race Raised first a rival throne ; now from its state Of proud regality debased and fallen. Still bounteous nature o'er the lovely vale, Where like a Queen rose Bracara august, Pour'd forth her gifts profuse; perennial springs Flow'd for her habitants, and genial suns, With kindly showers to bless the happy clime, Combined in vain their gentle influences; For patient servitude was there, who bow'd His neck beneath the Moor, and silent grief That eats into the soul. The walls and stones Seem'd to reproach their dwellers; stately piles Yet undecay'd, the mighty monuments Of Roman pomp, Barbaric palaees, And Gothie halls, where haughty Barons late Gladden'd their faithful vassals with the feast And flowing bowl, alike the spoiler's now.

Leaving these captive scenes behind, he cross'd Cavado's silver current, and the banks Of Lima, through whose groves, in after years, Mournful yet sweet, Diogo's amorous lute Prolong'd its tuneful echoes. But when now, Beyond Arnoya's tributary tide, He came where Minho roll'd its ampler stream By Auria's ancient walls, fresh horrors met His startled view; for prostrate in the dust Those walls were laid, and towers and temples stood Tottering in frightful ruins, as the flame Had left them black and bare; and through the streets, All with the recent wreck of war bestrown, Helmet and turban, cimeter and sword, Christian and Moor in death promiscuous lay, Each where they fell; and blood-flakes, parch'd and crack'd Like the dry slime of some receding flood; And half-burnt bodies, which allured from far The wolf and raven, and to impious food Tempted the houseless dog. A thrilling pang, A sweat like death, a sickness of the soul, Came over Roderick. Soon they pass'd away, And admiration in their stead arose, Stern joy and inextinguishable hope,

With wrath, and hate, and sacred vengeance now Indissolubly link'd. O valiant race, и.

O people excellently brave, he cried, True Goths ye fell, and faithful to the last; Though overpower'd, triumphant, and in death Unconquer'd ! Holy be your memory ! Bless'd and glorious now and evermore Be your heroic names!- Led by the sound, As thus he cried alond, a woman came Toward him from the ruins. For the love Of Christ, she said, lend me a little while Thy charitable help !- Her words, her.voice, Her look, more horror to his heart convey'd Than all the havock round; for though she spake With the calm utterance of despair, in tones Deep breathed and low, yet never sweeter voice Pour'd forth its hymns in ecstasy to Heaven. Her hands were bloody, and her garments stain'd With blood, her face with blood and dust defiled. Beauty and youth, and grace and majesty, Had every charm of form and feature given ; But now upon her rigid countenance Severest anguish set a fixedness Ghastlier than death.

She led him through the streets A little way along, where four low walls, Heap'd rudely from the ruins round, enclosed A narrow space: and there upon the ground Four bodies, decently composed, were laid, Though horrid all with wounds and clotted gore : A venerable ancient, by his side A comely matron, for whose middle age, (If ruthless slaughter had not intervened,) Nature, it seem'd, and gentle Time, might well Have many a calm declining year in store; The third an armed warrior, on his breast An infant, over whom his arms were cross'd. There, - with firm eye and steady countenance, Unfaltering, she address'd him, - there they lie, Child, Husband, Parents, - Adosinda's all ! I could not break the earth with these poor hands, Nor other tomb provide, - but let that pass! Auria itself is now but one wide tomb For all its habitants : -- What better grave ? What worthier monument? - Oh, cover not Their blood, thou Earth ! and ye, ye blessed Souls Of Heroes and of murder'd Innocents, Oh, never let your everlasting cries Cease round the Eternal Throne, till the Most High For all these unexampled wrongs hath given Full, overflowing vengeance !

While she spake, She raised her lofty hands to Heaven, as if Calling for justice on the Judgment-seat; Then laid them on her eyes, and, leaning on, Bent o'er the open sepulchre.

But soon,

With quiet mien collectedly, like one Who from intense devotion, and the act Of ardent prayer, arising, girds himself For this world's daily business she arose, And said to Roderick, Help me now to raise The covering of the tofub.

Which had gather'd for this funeral use, They roof'd the vault; then, laying stones above, They closed it down; last, rendering all secure, Stones upon stones they piled, till all appear'd A huge and shapeless heap. Enough, she cried, And taking Roderick's hands in both her own, And wringing them with fervent thankfulness, May God show mercy to thee, she exclaim'd, When most thon needest mercy ! Who thon art I know not; not of Auria, --- for of all Her sons and daughters, save the one who stands Before thee, not a soul is left alive. But thon hast render'd to me, in my hour Of need, the only help which man could give. What else of consolation may be found For one so utterly bereft, from Heaven And from myself must come. For deem not thou That I shall sink beneath calamity : This visitation, like a lightning-stroke, Hath seathed the fruit and blossom of my youth; One hour hath orphan'd me, and widow'd me, And made me childless. In this sepulchre Lie buried all my earthward hopes and fears, All human loves and natural charities ; -All womanly tenderness, all gentle thoughts, All female weakness too, I bury here, Yea, all my former nature. There remain Revenge and death : - the bitterness of death Is past, and Heaven already hath vouchsafed A foretaste of revenge.

Look here ! she cried, And drawing back, held forth her bloody hands, — 'Tis Moorish !— In the day of massacre, A captain of Alcahman's murderous host Reserved me from the slaughter. Not because My rank and station tempted 'him with thoughts Of ransom, for amid the general waste Of ruin all was lost; — nor yet, be sure, That pity moved him, — they who from this race Accurs'd for pity look, such pity find As ravenous wolves show the defenceless flock. My husband at my feet had fallen; my babe, — Spare me that thought, O God !— and then — even then,

Amid the maddening throes of agony Which rent my sonl, - when, if this solid Earth Had open'd, and let ont the central fire, Before whose all-involving flames wide Heaven Shall shrivel like a scroll, and be consumed, The universal wreck had been to me Relief and comfort ; - even then this Moor Turn'd on me his libidinous eyes, and bade His men reserve me safely for an hour Of dalliance, - me ! - me in my agonies ! But when I found for what this miscreant child Of Hell had snatch'd me from the butchery, The very horror of that monstrous thought Saved me from madness; I was calm at once, -Yet comforted and reconciled to life; Hatred became to me the life of life, Its purpose and its power.

The glutted Moors At length broke up. This hell-dog turn'd aside Toward his home; we travell'd fast and far, Till by a forest edge at eve he pitched His tents. I wash'd and ate at his command, Forcing revolted nature; I composed My gaments, and bound up my scatter'd hair;

And when he took my hand, and to his couch Would fain have drawn me, gently 1 retired From that abominable touch, and said, Forhear to-night, I pray thee, for this day A widow, as thou seest me, am 1 made; Therefore, according to our law, must watch And pray to-night. The loathsome villain paused Ere he assented, then laid down to rest; While, at the door of the pavilion, 1 Knelt on the ground, and bowed my face to earth; But when the neighboring tents had ceased their stir,

IV.

The fires were out, and all were fast asleep, Then I arose. The blessed Moon from Heaven Lent me her holy light. I did not pray For strength, for strength was given me as I drew The cimeter, and standing o'er his couch, Raised it in both my hands with steady aim, And smote his neck. Upward, as from a spring When newly open'd by the husbandman, The villain's life-blood spouted. Twice I struck, So making vengeance sure; then, praising God, Retired amid the wood, and measured back My patient way to Auria, to perform This duty which thou seest

As thus she spake, Roderick, intently listening, had forgot His crown, his kingdom, his calamities, His crimes, - so like a spell upon the Goth Her powerful words prevail'd. With open lips, And eager ear, and eyes which, while they watch'd Her features, caught the spirit that she breathed, Mute and enrapt he stood, and motionless; The vision rose before him; and that shout, Which, like a thunder-peal, victorious Spain Sent through the welkin, rung within his soul Its deep, prophetic echoes. On his brow The pride and power of former majesty Dawn'd once again, but changed and purified; Duty and high heroic purposes Now hallow'd it, and, as with inward light, Illumed his meagre countenance austere.

Awhile in silence Adosinda stood, Reading his alter'd visage and the thoughts Which thus transfigured him. Ay, she exclaim'd, My tale hath moved thee ! it might move the dead, Quicken captivity's dead soul, and rouse This prostrate country from her mortal trance : Therefore 1 live to tell it ; and for this Hath the Lord God Almighty given to me A spirit not mine own and strength from Heaven; Dealing with me as in the days of old With that Bethulian Matron when she saved His people from the spoiler. What remains But that the life which he hath thus preserved I consecrate to him? Not yeil'd and yow'd To pass my days in holiness and peace; Nor yet between sepulchral walls immured, Alive to penitence alone; my rule Ile hath himself prescribed, and hath infused A passion in this woman's breast, wherein All passions and all virtues are combined; Love, hatred, joy, and anguish, and despair, And hope, and natural piety, and faith,

Make up the mighty feeling. Call it not Revenge! thus sanctified, and thus sublimed, 'Tis daty, 'tis devotion. Like the grace Of God, it came and saved me; and in it Spain must have her salvation. In thy hands Here, on the grave of all my family, I make my vow.

She said, and, kneeling down, Placed within Roderick's palms her folded hands This life, she cried, I dedicate to God, Therewith to do him service in the way Which he hath shown. To rouse the land against This impious, this intolerable yoke,— To offer up the invader's hateful blood,— This shall be my employ, my rule and rite, Observances and sacrifice of faith; For this I hold the life which he hath given, A sacred trust; for this, when it shall suit His service, joyfully will lay it down. So deal with me as I fulfil the pledge, O Lord my God, my Savior, and my indge.

Then rising from the earth, she spread her arms, And looking round with sweeping eyes exclaim'd, Auria, and Spain, and Heaven receive the vow !

IV.

THE MONASTERY OF ST. FELIX.

THUS long had Roderick heard her powerful words In silence, awed before her; but his heart Was fill'd the while with swelling sympathy, And now with impulse not to be restrain'd The feeling overpower'd him. Hear me too, Auria, and Spain, and Heaven! he cried; and thou Who risest thus above mortality, Sufferer and patriot, saint and heroine, The servant and the chosen of the Lord, -For surely such thou art, - receive in me The first-fruits of thy calling. Kneeling then, And placing, as he spake, his hand in hers, As thou hast sworn, the royal Goth pursued, Even so I swear; my soul hath found at length Her rest and refuge; in the invader's blood She must efface her stains of mortal sin, And in redeeming this lost land, work out Redemption for herself. Herein 1 place My penance for the past, my hope to come, My faith and my good works; here offer up All thoughts and passions of mine inmost heart, My days and nights, - this flesh, this blood, this life,

Yea, this whole being, do I here devote For Spain. Receive the vow, all Saints in Heaven, And prosper its good end ! — Clap now your wings, The Goth with louder utterance, as he rose, Exclaim'd, — elap now your wings exultingly, Ye ravenous fowl of Heaven; and in your dens Set up, ye wolves of Spain, a yell of joy; For, lo! a nation hath this day been sworn To furnish forth your banquet; for a strife

Hath been commenced, the which, from this day | forth, Permits no breathing-time, and knows no end

Till in this land the last invader bow His neck beneath the exterminating sword.

Said I not rightly? Adosinda cried; The will which goads me on is not mine own ; 'Tis from on high, - yea, verily of Heaven! But who art thou who hast profess'd with me, My first sworn brother in the appointed rule? Tell me thy name.

Ask any thing but that ! The fallen King replied. My name was lost When from the Goths the sceptre pass'd away. The nation will arise regenerate; Strong in her second youth, and beautiful, And like a spirit which hath shaken off The clog of dull mortality, shall Spain Arise in glory. But for my good name No resurrection is appointed here. Let it be blotted out on earth : in Heaven There shall be written with it penitence, And grace, and saving faith, and such good deeds Wrought in atonement as my soul this day Hath sworn to offer up.

Then be thy name, She answer'd, Maccabee, from this day forth; For this day art thou born again; and like Those brethren of old times, whose holy names Live in the memory of all noble hearts For love and admiration, ever young, -So for our native country, for her hearths And altars, for her cradles and her graves, Hast thou thyself devoted. Let us now Each to our work - among the neighboring hills, I to the vassals of my father's house; Thou to Visonia. Tell the Abbot there What thou hast seen at Auria; and with him Take counsel who, of all our Baronage, Is worthiest to lead on the sons of Spain, And wear upon his brow the Spanish crown. Now, brother, fare thee well! we part in hope, And we shall meet again, he sure, in joy.

So saying, Adosinda left the King Alone amid the ruins. There he stood, As when Elisha, on the farther bank Of Jordan, saw that elder prophet mount The fiery chariot, and the steeds of fire, Trampling the whirlwind, bear him up the sky : Thus gazing after her did Roderick stand; And as the immortal Tishbite left behind His mantle and prophetic power, even so Had her inspiring presence left infused The spirit which she breathed. Gazing he stood, As at a heavenly visitation there Vouchsafed in mercy to himself and Spain; And when the heroic mourner from his sight Had pass'd away, still reverential awe Held him suspended there and motionless. Then turning from the ghastly scene of death Up murmuring Lona, he began toward The holy Bierzo his obedient way. [vale Sil's ample stream he cross'd, where through the Ambitious boyhood, girls in timid youth,

Of Orras, from that sacred land it bears The whole collected waters; northward then, Skirting the heights of Aguiar, he reach'd That consecrated pile amid the wild, Which sainted Fructuoso in his zeal Rear'd to St. Felix, on Visonia's banks.

In commune with a priest of age mature, Whose thoughtful visage and majestic mier Bespake authority and weight of eare, Odoar, the venerable Abbot, sat, When ushering Roderick in, the Porter said, A stranger came from Auria, and required His private ear. From Anria? said the old man; Comest thou from Anria, brother? 1 can spare Thy painful errand then, - we know the worst.

Nay, answer'd Roderick, but thou hast not heard My tale. Where that devoted city lies In ashes, mid the ruins and the dead I found a woman, whom the Moors had borne Captive away; but she, by Heaven inspired And her good heart, with her own arm had wrought Her own deliverance, smiting in his tent A lustful Moorish miscreant, as of yore By Judith's holy deed the Assyrian fell. And that same spirit which had strengthen'd her Work'd in her still. Four walls with patient toil She rear'd, wherein, as in a sepulchre, With her own hands she laid her murder'd babe, Her husband and her parents, side by side; And when we cover'd in this shapeless tomb, There, on the grave of all her family, Did this courageous mourner dedicate All thoughts and actions of her future life To her poor country. For she said, that Heaven, Supporting her, in merey had vouchsafed A foretaste of revenge; that, like the grace Of God, revenge had saved her; that in it Spain must have her salvation; and henceforth That passion, thus sublimed and sanctified, Must be to all the loyal sons of Spain The pole-star of their faith, their rule and rite, Observances and worthiest sacrifice. I took the yow, unworthy as I am, Her first sworn follower in the appointed rule; And then we parted; she among the hills To rouse the vassals of her father's house; I at her bidding hitherward, to ask Thy counsel, who, of our old Baronage, Shall place upon his brow the Spanish crown.

The Lady Adosinda? Odoar cried. Roderick made answer, So she call'd herself.

Oh, none but she ! exclaim'd the good old man, Clasping his hands, which trembled as he spake, u act of pious passion raised to Heaven, -Oh, none but Adosinda ! — none but she, — None but that noble heart, which was the heart Of Auria while it stood, its life and strength, More than her father's presence, or the arm Of her brave husband, valiant as he was. Hers was the spirit which inspired old age,

And virgins in the beauty of their spring, And youthful mothers, doting, like herself, With ever-anxious love. She breathed through all That zeal and that devoted faithfulness, Which to the invader's threats and promises Turn'd a deaf ear alike; which in the head And flood of prosperous fortune check'd his course. Repell'd him from the walls, and when at length His overpowering numbers forced their way, Even in that uttermost extremity Unyielding, still from street to street, from house To house, from floor to floor, maintain'd the fight; Till by their altars falling, in their doors, And on their household hearths, and by their beds And cradles, and their fathers' sepulchres, This noble army, gloriously revenged, Embraced their martyrdom. Heroic souls ! Well have ye done, and righteously discharged Your arduous part! Your service is perform'd, Your earthly warfare done ! Ye have put on The purple robe of everlasting peace ! Ye have received your crown ! Ye bear the palm Before the throne of Grace ! With that he paused, Checking the strong emotions of his soul. Then, with a solemn tone, addressing him, Who shared his secret thoughts, Thou knowest, he said, O Urban, that they have not fallen in vain; For by this virtuous sacrifice they thinn'd Alcahman's thousands; and his broken force, Exhausted by their dear-bought victory, Turn'd back from Auria, leaving us to breathe Among our mountains yet. We lack not here Good hearts, nor valiant hands. What walls, or towers, Or battlements are like these fastnesses, These rocks, and glens, and everlasting hills? Give but that Aurian spirit, and the Moors Will spend their force as idly on these holds As round the rocky girdle of the land The wild Cantabrian billows waste their rage. Give but that spirit ! - Heaven hath given it us, If Adosinda thus, as from the dead, Be granted to our prayers! And who art thou, Said Urban, who hast taken on thyself This rule of warlike faith? Thy countenance And those poor weeds bespeak a life ere this Devoted to austere observances. Only Pelayo. Roderick replied, I am a sinful man, One who in solitude hath long deplored

One who in solitude hath long deplored A life misspent; but never bound by vows, Till Adosinda taught me where to find Comfort, and how to work forgiveness out. When that exalted woman took my vow, She call'd me Maccabee; from this day forth Be that my earthly name. But tell me now, Whom shall we rouse to take upon his head The crown of Spain? Where are the Gothic Chiefs?

Sacaru, Theudemir, Athanagild,

All who survived that eight-days' obstinate fight,

When clogg'd with bodies, Chrysus scarce could force

Its bloody stream along? Witiza's sons, Bad offspring of a stock accurs'd, I know, Have put the turban on their recreant heads. Where are your own Cantabrian Lords? I ween, Eudon, and Pedro, and Pelayo now Have ceased their rivalry. If Pelayo live, His were the worthy heart and rightful hand To wield the sceptre and the sword of Spain.

Odoar and Urban eyed him while he spake, As if they wonder'd whose the tongue might be Familiar thus with Chiefs and thoughts of state. They scann'd his countenance, but not a trace Betray'd the Royal Goth: snnk was that eye Of sovereignty, and on the emaciate cheek Had penitence and anguish deeply drawn Their furrows premature, - forestalling time, And shedding upon thirty's brow more snows Than threescore winters in their natural course Might else have sprinkled there. It seems indeed That thou hast pass'd thy days in solitude, Replied the Abbot, or thou wouldst not ask Of things so long gone by. Athanagild And Theudemir have taken on their necks The yoke. Sacaru play'd a nobler part. Long within Merida did he withstand The invader's hot assault; and when at length, Hopeless of all relief, he yielded up The gates, disdaining in his fathers' land To breathe the air of bondage, with a few Found faithful till the last, indignantly Did he toward the ocean bend his way, And shaking from his feet the dust of Spain, Took ship, and hoisted sail through seas unknown To seek for freedom. Our Cantabrian Chiefs All have submitted, but the wary Moor Trusteth not all alike. At his own Court He holds Pelayo, as suspecting most That calm and manly spirit; Pedro's son There too is held as hostage, and secures His father's faith; Count Eudon is despised, And so lives unniolested. When he pays His tribute, an uncomfortable thought May then perhaps disturb him; - or more like He meditates how profitable 'twere To be a Moor; and if apostasy Were all, and to be unbaptized might serve, -But I waste breath upon a wretch like this; Pelayo is the only hope of Spain,

If, as we believe,

Said Urban then, the hand of Heaven is here, And dreadful though they be, yet for wise end Of good, these visitations do its work; And dimly as our mortal sight may sean The future, yet methinks my soul descries How in Pelayo should the purposes Of Heaven be best accomplish'd. All too long, Here in their own inheritance, the sons Of Spain have groan'd beneath a foreign yoke, Punic and Roman, Kelt, and Goth, and Greek : This latter tempest comes to sweep away All proud distinctions which commingling blood And time's long course have fail'd to efface; and | And light discourse : the talk which now went now

Perchance it is the will of Fate to rear Upon the soil of Spain a Spanish throne, Restoring in Pelayo's native line The sceptre to the Spaniard.

Go thou, then,

And seek Pelayo at the Conqueror's Court. Tell him the mountaineers are unsubdued; The precious time they needed hath been gain'd By Auria's sacrifice, and all they ask Is him to guide them on. In Odoar's name And Urban's, tell him that the hour is come.

Then, pausing for a moment, he pursued : ---The rule which thou hast taken on thyself Toledo ratifies: 'tis meet for Spain, And as the will divine, to be received, Observed, and spread abroad. Come hither thou, Who for thyself hast chosen the good part; Let me lay hands on thee, and consecrate Thy life unto the Lord.

Me! Roderick cried; Me! sinner that I am ! - and while he spake His wither'd eheek grew paler, and his limbs Shook. As thou goest among the infidels, Pursued the Primate, many thou wilt find Fallen from the faith; by weakness some betray'd, Some led astray by baser hope of gain, And haply, too, by ill example led Of those in whom they trusted. Yet have these Their lonely hours, when sorrow, or the touch Of sickness, and that awful power divine Which hath its dwelling in the heart of man, Life of his soul, his monitor and judge, Move them with silent impulse; but they look For help, and finding none to succor them, The irrevocable moment passeth by. Therefore, my brother, in the name of Christ Thus I lay hands on thee, that in His name Thou with His gracious promises mayst raise The fallen, and comfort those that are in need, And bring salvation to the penitent. Now, brother, go thy way : the peace of God Be with thee, and his blessing prosper us!

V.

RODERICK AND SIVERIAN.

BETWEEN St. Felix and the regal seat Of Abdalaziz, ancient Cordoba, Lay many a long day's journey interposed; And many a mountain range hath Roderick cross'd, And many a lovely vale, ere he beheld Where Betis, winding through the unbounded plain, Roll'd his majestic waters. There, at eve. Entering an inn, he took his humble seat With other travellers round the crackling hearth, Where heath and eistus gave their fragrant flame. That flame no longer, as in other times, Lit up the countenance of easy mirth round Was of the grief that press'd on every heart;

Of Spain subdued; the sceptre of the Goths Broken; their nation and their name effaced; Slaughter and mourning, which had left no house Unvisited; and shame, which set its mark On every Spaniard's face. One who had seen His sons fall bravely at his side, bewail'd The unhappy chance which, rescuing him from death,

Left him the last of all his family; Yet he rejoiced to think that none who drew Their blood from him remain'd to wear the yoke, Be at the miscreant's beck, and propagate A breed of slaves to serve them. Here sat one Who told of fair possessions lost, and babes To goodly fortunes born, of all bereft. Another for a virgin daughter mourn'd, The lewd barbarian's spoil. A fourth had seen His only child forsake him in his age, And for a Moor renounce her hope in Christ. His was the heaviest grief of all, he said; And clinching, as he spake, his hoary locks, He cursed King Roderick's soul.

Oh, curse him not ! Roderick exclaim'd, all shuddering as he spake. Oh, for the love of Jesus, curse him not ! Sufficient is the dreadful load of guilt That lies upon his miserable sonl! O brother, do not curse that sinful soul, Which Jesus suffer'd on the cross to save !

But then an old man, who had sat thus long A silent listener, from his seat arose, And moving round to Roderick, took his hand; Christ bless thee, brother, for that Christian speech, He said; and shame on me that any tongue Readier than mine was found to utter it! His own emotion fill'd him while he spake, So that he did not feel how Roderick's hand Shook like a palsied limb; and none could see How, at his well-known voice, the countenance Of that poor traveller suddenly was changed, And sunk with deadlier paleness; for the flame Was spent, and from behind him, on the wall High hung, the lamp with feeble glimmering play'd.

Oh, it is ever thus! the old man pursued; The crimes and woes of universal Spain Are charged on him; and curses, which should aim At living heads, pursue beyond the grave His poor unhappy soul! As if his sin Had wronght the fall of our old monarchy ! As if the Mussulmen, in their career, Would ne'er have overleap'd the gulf which parts Iberia from the Mauritanian shore, If Julian had not beckon'd them !- Alas ! The evils which drew on our overthrow, Would soon by other means have wrought their end, Though Julian's daughter should have lived and died

A virgin vow'd and veil'd.

Touch not on that,

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

Shrinking with inward shiverings at the thought, The penitent exclaim'd. Oh, if thou lovest The soul of Roderick, touch not on that deed ! God, in his mercy, may forgive it him, But human tongue must never speak his name Without reproach and utter infamy, For that abhorred act. Even thou - But here Siverian taking up the word, brake off, Unwittingly, the incantious speech. Even I, Quoth he, who nursed him in his father's hall,-Even I can only for that deed of shame Offer in agony my secret prayers. But Spain hath witness'd other crimes as foul : Have we not seen Favila's shameless wife, Throned in Witiza's ivory car, parade Our towns with regal pageantry, and bid The murderous tyrant in her husband's blood Dip his adulterous hand? Did we not see Pelayo, by that bloody king's pursuit, And that unnatural mother, from the land With open outcry, like an outlaw'd thief, Hunted? And saw ye not Theodofred, As through the streets 1 guided his dark steps, Roll mournfully toward the noon-day sun His blank and senseless eyeballs ? Spain saw this, And suffer'd it ! - I seek not to excuse The sin of Roderick. Jesu, who beholds The burning tears I shed in solitude, Knows how I plead for him in midnight prayer. But if, when he victoriously revenged The wrongs of Chindasuintho's house, his sword Had not for mercy turn'd aside its edge, Oh what a day of glory had there been Upon the banks of Chrysus ! Curse not him, Who in that fatal conflict to the last So valiantly maintain'd his country's cause ; But if your sorrow needs must have its vent In curses, let your imprecations strike The caitiffs, who, when Roderick's horned helm Rose eminent amid the thickest fight, Betraying him who spared and trusted them, Forsook their King, their Country, and their God, And gave the Moor his conquest. Ay ! they said,

These were Witiza's hateful progeny; And in an evil hour the unhappy King Had spared the viperous brood. With that they talk'd How Sisibert and Ebba through the land Guided the foe; and Orpas, who had cast The mitre from his renegado brow, Went with the armies of the infidels; And how in Hispalis, even where his hands llad minister'd so oft the bread of life, The circumcised apostate did not shame To show in open day his turban'd head. The Queen too, Egilona, one exclaim'd; Was she not married to the enemy, The Moor, the Misbeliever? What a heart Were hers, that she could pride and plume herself To rank among his herd of concubines, [sav Having been what she had been ! And who could How far domestic wrongs and discontent Had wrought upon the King !- Hereat the old man, Raising beneath the knit and curly brow His mournful eyes, replied, This I can tell, That that unquiet spirit and unblest, Though Roderick never told his sorrows, drove Rusilla from the palace of her son. She could not bear to see his generous mind Wither beneath the unwholesome influence, And cankering at the core. And I know well, That oft, when she deplored his barren bcd, The thought of Egilona's qualities Came like a bitter medicine for her grief, And to the extinction of her husband's line, Sad consolation, reconciled her heart.

But Roderick, while they communed thus, had ceased

To hear, such painfulest anxiety The sight of that old, venerable man Awoke. A sickening fear came over him : The hope which led him from his hermitage Now seem'd forever gone; for well he knew Nothing but death could break the ties which bound That faithful servant to his father's house. She then for whose forgiveness he had yearn'd, Who in her blessing would have given and found The peace of Heaven, - she then was to the grave Gone down disconsolate at last; in this, Of all the woes of her unhappy life Unhappiest, that she did not live to see God had vouchsafed repentance to her child. But then a hope arose that yet she lived ; The weighty cause which led Siverian here Might draw him from her side ; better to know The worst than fear it. And with that he bent Over the ambers, and with head half raised Aslant, and shadow'd by his hand, he said, Where is King Roderick's mother? lives she still?

God hath upheld her, the old man replied; She bears this last and heaviest of her griefs, Not as she bore her husband's wrongs, when hope And her indignant heart supported her; But patiently, like one who finds from Heaven A comfort which the world can neither give Nor take away. — Roderick inquired no more; He breathed a silent prayer in gratitude, Then wrapt his cloak around him, and lay down Where he might weep unseen.

When morning came, Earliest of all the travellers he went forth. And linger'd for Siverian by the way, Beside a fountain, where the constant fall Of water its perpetual gurgling made, To the wayfaring or the musing man Sweetest of all sweet sounds. The Christian hand, Whose general charity for man and beast Built it in hetter times, had with a cross Of well-hewn stone crested the pious work, Which now the misbelievers had cast down, And broken in the dust it lay defiled. Roderick beheld it lying at his feet, And gathering reverently the fragments up, Placed them within the cistern, and restored With careful collocation its dear form, -So might the waters, like a crystal shrine,

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

Preserve it from pollution. Kneeling then, O'er the memorial of redeeming love He bent, and mingled with the fount his tears, And pour'd his spirit to the Crucified.

A Moor came by, and seeing him, exclaim'd, Ah, Kaffer! worshipper of wood and stone, God's curse confound thee! And as Roderick turn'd

His face, the miscreant spurn'd him with his foot Between the eyes. The indignant King arose, And fell'd him to the ground. But then the Moor Drew forth his dagger, rising as he cried, What! darëst thou, thou infidel and slave, Strike a believer? and he aim'd a blow [arm, At Roderick's breast. But Roderick caught his And closed, and wrench'd the dagger from his hold,—

Such timely strength did those emaciate limbs From indignation draw, - and in his neck With mortal stroke he drove the avenging steel Hilt deep. Then, as the thirsty sand drank in The expiring miscreant's blood, he look'd around In sudden apprehension, lest the Moors Had seen them; but Siverian was in sight, The only traveller, and he smote his mule, And hasten'd up. Ah, brother ! said the old man, Thine is a spirit of the ancient mould ! And would to God a thousand men like thee Had fought at Roderick's side on that last day When treason overpower'd him ! Now, alas ! A manly Gothic heart doth ill accord With these unhappy times. Come, let us hide This carrion, while the favoring hour permits.

So saying, he alighted. Soon they scoop'd Amid loose-lying sand a hasty grave, And levell'd over it the easy soil. Father, said Roderick, as they journey'd on, Let this thing be a seal and sacrament Of truth between us. Wherefore should there be Concealment between two right Gothic hearts In evil days like ours? What thou hast seen Is but the first fruit of the sacrifice. Which on this injured and polluted soil, As on a bloody altar, I have sworn To offer to insulted Heaven for Spain, Her vengeance and her explation. This Was but a hasty act, by sudden wrong Provoked : but I am bound for Cordoba, On weighty mission from Visonia sent, To breathe into Pelayo's ear a voice Of spirit-stirring power, which like the trump Of the Archangel, shall awake dead Spain. The northern mountaineers are unsubdued; They call upon Pelayo for their chief; Odoar and Urban tell him that the hour Is come. Thon, too, I ween, old man, artcharged, With no light errand, or thou wouldst not now Have left the ruins of thy master's house.

Who art thon? cried Siverian, as he search'd The wan and wither'd features of the King. Thy face is of a stranger; but thy voice Disturbs me like a dream.

Roderick replied, Thou seest me as I am, — a stranger; one Whose fortunes in the general wreck were lost, His name and lineage utterly extinct, Himself in mercy spared, surviving all; -In mercy, that the bitter cup might heal A soul diseased. Now, having east the slough Of old offences, thou beholdest me A man new-born; in second baptism named, Like those who in Judea bravely raised Against the Heathen's impious tyranny The banner of Jehovah, Maecabee; So call me. In that name hath Urban laid His consecrating hands upon my head; And in that name have I myself for Spain Devoted. 'Tell me now why thou art sent To Cordoba ; for sure thou goest not An idle gazer to the Conqueror's court.

Thou judgest well, the old man replied. 1, too, Seek the Cantabrian Prince, the hope of Spain, With other tidings charged, for other end Designed, yet such as well may work with thine. My noble mistress sends me to avert The shame that threats his house. The renegade Numacian, he who, for the infidels, Oppresses Gegio, insolently wooes His sister. Moulded in a wicked womb, The unworthy Guisla hath inherited Her mother's leprous taint; and, willingly, She to the circumcised and upstart slave, Disdaining all admonishment, gives ear. The Lady Gaudiosa sees in this, With the quick foresight of maternal eare, The impending danger to her husband's house, Knowing his generous spirit ne'er will brook The base alliance. Guisla lewdly sets His will at nonght; but that vile renegade, From hatred, and from avarice, and from fear, Will seek the extinction of Pelayo's line. This, too, my venerable mistress sees ; Wherefore these valiant and high-minded dames Send me to Cordoba; that, if the Prince Cannot, by timely interdiction, stop The irrevocable act of infamy, He may, at least, to his own safety look, Being timely warn'd. Thy mistress sojourns then

With Gaudiosa, in Pelayo's hall? Said Roderick. 'Tis her natural home, rejoin'd Siverian : Chindasuintho's royal race Have ever shared one lot of weal or woe ; And she who hath beheld her own fair shoot, The goodly summit of that ancient tree, Struck by Heaven's bolt, seeks shelter now beneath The only branch of its majestic stem That still survives the storm.

Thus they pursued Their journey, each from other gathering store For thought, with many a silent interval Of mournful meditation, till they saw The temples and the towers of Cordoba Shining majestic in the light of eve. Before them, Betis roll'd his glittering stream, In many a silvery winding traced afar

Amid the ample plain. Behind the walls And stately piles, which crown'd its margin, rich With olives, and with sunny slope of vines, And many a lovely hamlet interspersed, Whose citron bowers were once the abode of peace, Height above height, receding hills were seen Imbued with evening hues; and over all The summits of the dark sierra rose, Lifting their heads amid the silent sky. The traveller who, with a heart at ease, Had seen the goodly vision, would have loved To linger, seeking with insatiate sight To treasure up its image, deep impress'd, A joy for years to come. O Cordoba, Exclaim'd the old man, how princely are thy towers, How fair thy vales, thy hills how beautiful ! The sun who sheds on thee his parting smiles Sees not in all his wide career a scene Lovelier, nor more exuberantly blest By bounteous earth and heaven. The very gales Of Eden waft not from the immortal bowers Odors to sense more exquisite, than these Which, breathing from thy groves and gardens, now

Recall in me such thoughts of bitterness. The time has been when happy was their lot Who had their birthright here; but happy now Are they who to thy bosom are gone home, Because they feel not in their graves the feet That trample upon Spain. 'Tis well that age Hath made me like a child, that I can weep: My heart would else have broken, overcharged, And I, false servant, should lie down to rest Before my work is done.

Hard by their path, A little way without the walls, there stood An edifice, whereto, as by a spell, Siverian's heart was drawn. Brother, quoth he, 'Tis like the urgency of our return Will brook of no retardment; and this spot It were a sin if I should pass, and leave Unvisited. Beseech you turn with me, The while I offer up one duteous prayer.

Roderick made no reply. He had not dared To turn his face toward those walls; but now He follow'd where the old man led the way. Lord! in his heart the silent sufferer said, Forgive my feeble soul, which would have shrunk From this, — for what am I that I should put The bitter cup aside! O let my shame And anguish be accepted in thy sight?

VI.

RODERICK IN TIMES PAST.

THE mansion whitherward they went, was one Which in his youth Theodofred had built: Thither had he brought home, in happy hour, His blooming bride; there fondled on his knee The lovely boy she bore him. Close beside, A temple to that Saint he rear'd, who first, As old tradition tells, proclaim'd to Spain The gospel-tidings; and in health and youth, There mindful of mortality, he saw His sepulchre prepared. Witiza took For his adulterous leman and himself The stately pile : but to that sepulchre, When from captivity and darkness death Enlarged him, was Theodofred consign'd; For that unhappy woman, wasting then Beneath a mortal malady, at heart Was smitten, and the Tyrant at her prayer This poor and tardy restitution made. Soon the repentant sinner follow'd him; And calling on Pelayo ere she died, For his own wrongs, and for his father's death, Implored forgiveness of her absent child, -If it were possible he could forgive Crimes black as hers, she said. And by the pangs Of her remorse, - by her last agonies, -The unntterable horrors of her death, -And by the blood of Jesus on the cross For sinners given, did she beseech his prayers In aid of her most miserable soul. Thus mingling sudden shricks with hopeless yows, And uttering franticly Pelayo's name, And crying out for mercy in despair, Here had she made her dreadful end, and here Her wretched body was deposited. That presence seem'd to desecrate the place : Thenceforth the usurper shunn'd it with the heart Of conscious guilt; nor could Rusilla bear These groves and bowers, which, like funereal shades, Oppress'd her with their monumental forms : One day of bitter and severe delight,

One day of bitter and severe delight, When Roderick came for vengeance, she endured, And then forever left her bridal halls.

Oh, when I last beheld yon princely pile, Exclaim'd Siverian, with what other thoughts Full, and elate of spirit, did I pass Its joyous gates! The weedery which through The interstices of those neglected courts Uncheck'd had flourish'd long, and seeded there, Was trampled then and bruised beneath the feet Of thronging crowds. Here, drawn in fair array, The faithful vassals of my master's house, Their javelins sparkling to the morning sun, Spread their triumphant banners; high-plumed helms

Rose o'er the martial ranks, and praucing steeds Made answer to the trumpet's stirring voice; While yonder towers shock the dull silence off Which long to their deserted walls had clung, And with redoubling echoes swell'd the shout That hail'd victorious Roderick. Louder rose The acclamation, when the dust was seen Rising beneath his chariot-wheels far off; But nearer as the youthful hero came, All sounds of all the multitude were hush'd, And from the thousands and ten thousands here, Whom Cordoba and Hispalis sent forth, — Yea, whom all Bætica, all Spain pour'd out To greet his triumph, — not a whisper rose

To Heaven, such awe and reverence master'd them,

Such expectation held them motionless. Conqueror and King he came ; but with no joy Of conquest, and no pride of sovereignty That day display'd; for at his father's grave Did Roderick come to offer up his vow Of vengeance well perform'd. Three coal-black steeds

Drew on his ivory chariot : by his side, Still wrapt in mourning for the long-deceased, Rusilla sat; a deeper paleness blanch'd Her faded countenance, but in her eye The light of her majestic nature shone. Bound, and expecting at their hands the death So well deserved, Witiza follow'd them ; Aghast and trembling, first he gazed around, Wildly from side to side ; then from the face Of universal exectation shrnnk, Hanging his wretched head abased; and poor Of spirit, with unmanly tears deplored His fortune, not his crimes. With bolder front, Confiding in his priestly character, Came Orpas next; and then the spurious race Whom in unhappy hour Favila's wife Brought forth for Spain. O merey ill bestow'd, When Roderick, in compassion for their youth, And for Pelayo's sake, forbore to crush The brood of vipers !

Err perchance he might, Replied the Goth, suppressing, as he spake, All outward signs of pain, though every word Went like a dagger to his bleeding heart; — But sure, I ween, that error is not placed Among his sins. Old man, thou mayst regret The mercy ill deserved, and worse return'd, But not for this wouldst thou reproach the King !

Reproach him ? cried Siverian ; - I reproach My child, - my noble boy, - whom every tongue Bless'd at that hour, - whose love fill'd every heart With joy, and every eye with joyful tears ! My brave, my beautiful, my generous boy ! Brave, beantiful, and generous as he was, Never so brave, so beautiful, so great As then, - not even on that glorious day, When on the field of victory, elevate Amid the thousands who acclaim'd him King, Firm on the shield above their heads upraised, Erect he stood, and waved his bloody sword -Why dost thou shake thy head as if in doubt? I do not dream, nor fable ! Ten short years Have scarcely past away, since all within The Pyrenean hills, and the three seas Which girdled Spain, echoed in one response The acelamation from that field of fight-Or doth aught ail thee, that thy body quakes And shudders thus?

'Tis but a chill, replied The King, in passing from the open air Under the shadow of this thick-set grove.

Oh! if this scene awoke in thee such thoughts As swell my bosom here, the old man pursued, Sunshine, or shade, and all things from without, Would be alike indifferent. Gracious God, Only but ten short years, — and all so changed ! Ten little years since in yon court he check'd His fiery steeds. The steeds obey'd his hand, The whirling wheels stood still, and when he leap'd

Upon the pavement, the whole people heard, In their deep silence, open-ear'd, the sound. With slower movement from the ivory seat Rusilla rose, her arm, as down she stepp'd, Extended to her son's supporting hand; Not for default of firm or agile strength, But that the feeling of that solemn hour Subdued her then, and tears bedimm'd her sight. Howbeit when to her husband's grave she came, On the sepulchral stone she bow'd her head Awhile; then rose collectedly, and fix'd Upon the seene her calm and steady eye. Roderick, - oh, when did valor wear a form So beautiful, so noble, so angust? Or vengeance, when did it put on before A character so awful, so divine? Roderick stood up, and reaching to the tomb His hands, my hero cried, Theodofred ! Father! 1 stand before thee once again, According to thy prayer, when kneeling down Between thy knees I took my last farewell; And vow'd by all thy sufferings, all thy wrongs, And by my mother's days and nights of woe, Her silent angnish, and the grief which then Even from thee she did not seek to hide, That, if our eruel parting should avail To save me from the Tyrant's jealous guilt, Surely should my avenging sword fulfil Whate'er he omen'd. Oh that time, I cried, Would give the strength of manhood to this arm, Already would it find a manly heart To guide it to its purpose! And I swore Never again to see my father's face, Nor ask my mother's blessing, till I brought, Dead or in chains, the Tyrant to thy feet. Boy as I was, before all Saints in Heaven, And highest God, whose justice slumbereth not, 1 made the vow. According to thy prayer, In all things, O my father, is that vow Perform'd, alas, too well ! for thou didst pray, While, looking up, I felt the burning tears Which from thy sightless sockets stream'd, drop down,-

That to thy grave, and not thy living feet, The oppressor might be led. Behold him there, Father! Theodofred! no longer now In darkness, from thy heavenly seat look down, And see before thy grave thine enemy In bonds, awaiting judgment at my hand!

Thus while the hero spake, Witiza stood Listening in agony, with open mouth, And head, hall-raised, toward his sentence turn'd; His eyelids stiffen'd and pursed up, — his eyes Rigid, and wild, and wide; and when the King Had ceased, amid the silence which ensued, The dastard's chains were heard, link against link Clinking. At length upon his knees he fell, And lifting up his trembling hands, outstretch'd

20	DERICK	, THE	LAST	OF	THE	GOTHS
----	--------	-------	------	----	-----	-------

In supplication, - Mercy ! he exclaim'd, -Chains, dungeons, darkness, - any thing but death ! -

I did not touch his life.

F

Roderick replied, His hour, whenever it had come, had found A soul prepared : he lived in peace with Heaven; And life prolong'd for him, was bliss delay'd. But life, in pain, and darkness, and despair, For thee, all leprous as thou art with crimes, Is mercy. - Take him hence, and let him see The light of day no more !

Such Roderick was

When last I saw these courts, - his theatre Of glory; - such when last I visited

My master's grave! Ten years have hardly held

Their course, ten little years - break, break, old heart -

Oh, why art thou so tough?

As thus he spake,

They reach'd the church. The door before his hand

Gave way; both blinded with their tears, they went Straight to the tomb; and there Siverian knelt, And bow'd his face upon the sepulchre, Weeping aloud; while Roderick, overpower'd, And calling upon earth to cover him, Threw himself prostrate on his father's grave.

Thus as they lay, an awful voice, in tones Severe, address'd them. Who are ye, it said, That with your passion thus, and on this night, Disturb my prayers? Starting they rose; there stood

A man before them of majestic form And stature, clad in sackcloth, bare of foot, Pale and in tears, with ashes on his head.

VII.

RODERICK AND PELAYO.

"Twas not in vain that on her absent son, Pelayo's mother, from the bed of death, Call'd for forgiveness, and in agony Besonght his prayers ; all guilty as she was, Sure he had not been human, if that cry Had fail'd to pierce him. When he heard the tale, He bless'd the messenger, even while his speech Was faltering, - while from head to foot he shook With icy feelings from his inmost heart Effused. It changed the nature of his woe, Making the burden more endurable : The life-long sorrow that remain'd, became A healing and a chastening grief, and brought His soul, in close communion, nearer Heaven. For he had been her first-born, and the love Which at her breast he drew, and from her smiles, And from her voice of tenderness imbibed, Gave such unnatural horror to her crimes, That when the thought came over him, it seem'd As if the milk which with his infant life Had blended thrill'd like poison through his frame. And what are we? - a weak, unhappy race, 84

It was a woe beyond all reach of hope, Till with the dreadful tale of her remorse Faith touch'd his heart; and ever from that day Did he for her who bore him, night and morn, Pour out the anguish of his soul in prayer : But chiefly as the night return'd, which heard Her last expiring groans of penitence, Then through the long and painful hours, before The altar, like a penitent himself, He kept his vigils; and when Roderick's sword Subdued Witiza, and the land was free, Duly upon her grave he offer'd up His yearly sacrifice of agony And prayer. This was the night, and he it was Who now before Siverian and the King Stood up in sackcloth.

The old man, from fear Recovering and from wonder, knew him first. It is the Prince ! he cried, and bending down, Embraced his knees. The action and the word Awaken'd Roderick ; he shook off the load Of struggling thoughts, which, pressing on his heart, Held him like one entranced ; yet, all untaught To bend before the face of man, confused Awhile he stood, forgetful of his part. But when Siverian cried, My Lord, my Lord, Now God be praised that I have found thee thus, My Lord and Prince, Spain's only hope and mine ! Then Roderick, echoing him, exclaim'd, My Lord, And Prince, Pelayo ! - and approaching near, He bent his knee obeisant : but his head Earthward inclined ; while the old man, looking up From his low gesture to Pelayo's face, Wept at beholding him for grief and joy.

Siverian ! cried the chief, - of whom hath Death Bereaved me, that thou comest to Cordoba? Children, or wife ? - Or hath the merciless scythe Of this abhorr'd and jealous tyranny Made my house desolate at one wide sweep?

They are as thou couldst wish, the old man replied,

Wert thou but lord of thine own house again, And Spain were Spain once more. A tale of ill I bear, but one that touches not the heart Like what thy tears forebode. The renegade Numacian wooes thy sister, and she lends To the vile slave, unworthily, her ear: The Lady Gaudiosa hath in vain Warn'd her of all the evils which await A union thus accurs'd : she sets at nought Her faith, her lineage, and thy certain wrath.

Pelayo, hearing him, remain'd awhile Silent; then turning to his mother's grave,-O thou poor dust, hath then the infectious taint Survived thy dread remorse, that it should run In Guisla's veins? he cried ; - I should have heard This shameful sorrow any where but here? -----Humble thyself, proud heart; thou, gracious Heaven,

Be merciful ! - it is the original flaw, -

Born to our sad inheritance of sin	Hath striven against its mightier enemies,
And death ! — He smote his forehead as he spake,	Roman or Carthaginian, Greek or Goth;
And from his head the ashes fell, like snow	So often by superior arms oppress'd,
Shaken from some dry beech-leaves, when a bird	More often by superior arts beguiled;
Lights on the bending spray. A little while	Yet, amid all its sufferings, all the waste
In silence, rather than in thought, he stood	Of sword and fire remorselessly employ'd,
Passive beneath the sorrow : turning then,	Unconquer'd and unconquerable still; —
And what doth Gaudiosa counsel me?	Son of that injured and illustrious stock,
lle ask'd the old man; for she hath ever been	Stand forward thou, draw forth the sword of Spain,
My wise and faithful eounsellor. — He replied,	Restore them to their rights, too long withheld,
The Lady Gaudiosa bade me say	And place upon thy brow the Spanish crown.

She sees the danger which on every part
Besets her husband's house. — Here she had	When Roderick ceased, the princely Moun-

But when my noble Mistress gave in charge,	Gazed on the passionate orator awhile,
How I should tell thee that in evil times	With eyes intently fix'd, and thoughtful brow;
The bravest counsels ever are the best,	Then turning to the altar, he let fall
Then that high-minded Lady thus rejoin'd :	The sackeloth robe, which late, with folded arms,
Whatever be my Lord's resolve, he knows	Against his heart was press'd; and stretching forth
I bear a mind prepared.	His hands toward the crucifix, exclaim'd,
Brave spirits ! cried	My God and my Redeemer ! where but here,
Pelayo, worthy to remove all stain	Before thy awful presence, in this garb,
Of weakness from their sex ! I should be less	With penitential ashes thus bestrown,
Than man, if, drawing strength where others find	Could I so fitly answer to the call
Their hearts most open to assault of fear,
	Of Spain, and for her sake, and in thy name,
l quail'd at danger. Never be it said	Accept the Crown of Thorns she proffers me?
Of Spain, that in the hour of her distress
Her women were as heroes, but her men	And where but here, said Roderick in his heart,
Perform'd the woman's part.	Could I so properly, with humbled knee
Roderick at that	And willing soul, confirm my forfeiture? —
Look'd up, and taking up the word, exclaim'd,	The action follow'd on that secret thought:
O Prince, in better days the pride of Spain,	He knelt, and took Pelayo's hand, and cried,
And prostrate as she lies, her surest hope,	First of the Spaniards, let me with this kiss
Hear now my tale. The fire which seem'd extinct	Do homage to thee here, my Lord and King !
Hath risen revigorate : a living spark	With voice unchanged and steady countenance
From Auria's ashes, by a woman's hand	He spake; but when Siverian follow'd him,
Preserved and quicken'd, kindles far and wide	The old man trembled as his lips pronounced
The beacon-flame o'er all the Asturian hills.	The faltering vow; and rising he exclaim'd,
There hath a vow been offer'd up, which binds	God grant thee, O my Prince, a better fate
Us and our children's children to the work	Than thy poor kinsman's, who in happier days
Of holy hatred. In the name of Spain	Received thy homage here! Grief choked his
That yow hath been pronounced, and register'd	speech,
Above, to be the bond whereby we stand	And, bursting into tears, he sobb'd aloud.
For condemnation or acceptance. Heaven	Tears too adown Pelayo's manly cheek
Received the irrevocable vow, and Earth	Roll'd silently. Roderick alone appear'd
Must witness its fulfilment; Earth and Heaven	Unmoved and calm; for now the royal Geth
Call upon thee, Pelayo ! Upon thee	Had offer'd his accepted sacrifice,
The spirits of thy royal ancestors	And therefore in his soul he felt that peace
Look down expectant; unto thee, from fields	Which follows painful duty well perform'd, -
Laid waste, and hamlets burnt, and eities sack'd,	Perfect and heavenly peace, — the peace of God
The blood of infancy and helpless age
Cries out; thy native mountains call for thee,
Echoing from all their armed sons thy name.
And deem not thou that hot impatience goads	VIII.

Send me, their sworn and trusted messenger,
To summon thee, and tell thee in their name	FAIN would Pelayo have that hour obey'd
That now the hour is come : For sure it seems,	The call, commencing his adventurous flight,
Thus saith the Primate, Heaven's high will to rear	As one whose soul impatiently endured
Upon the soil of Spain a Spanish throne,	His country's thraldom, and in daily prayer
Restoring in thy native line, O Prince,	Imploring her deliverance, cried to Heaven,
The sceptre to the Spaniard. Worthy son	How long, O Lord, how long ! - But other thoughts
Of that most-ancient and heroic race,	Curbing his spirit, made him yet awhile
Of that most another and heroio race,	Curbing ins spirit, made nun yet awnie

Of all the Gothic baronage, the Moors Watch'd with regard of wary policy, -Knowing his powerful name, his noble mind, And how in him the old Iberian blood, Of royal and remotest ancestry, From undisputed source flow'd undefiled ; His mother's after-guilt attainting not The claim legitimate he derived from her, Her first-born in her time of innocence. He, too, of Chindasuintho's regal line Sole remnant now, drew after him the love Of all true Goths, uniting in himself Thus, by this double right, the general heart Of Spain. For this the renegado crew, Wretches in whom their conscions guilt and fear Engender'd cruelest hatred, still advised The extinction of Pelayo's house ; but most The apostate Prelate, in iniquity Witiza's genuine brother as in blood, Orpas, pursued his life. He never ceased With busy zeal, true traitor, to infuse His deadly rancor in the Moorish chief; Their only danger, ever he observed, Was from Pelayo; root his lineage out, The Caliph's empire then would be secure, And universal Spain, all hope of change Being lost, receive the Prophet's conquering law. Then did the Arch-villain urge the Moor at once To cut off future peril, telling him Death was a trusty keeper, and that none E'er broke the prison of the grave. But here Keen malice overshot its mark; the Moor, Who from the plunder of their native land Had bought the recreant crew that join'd his arms, Or cheaplier with their own possessions bribed Their sordid souls, saw through the flimsy show Of policy wherewith they sought to cloak Old enmity and selfish aims : he scorn'd To let their private purposes incline His counsels, and believing Spain subdued, Smiled, in the pride of power and victory, Disdainful at the thought of further strife. Howbeit he held Pelayo at his court, And told him that, until his countrymen Submissively should lay their weapons down, He from his children and paternal hearth Apart must dwell; nor hope to see again His native mountains and their vales beloved, Till all the Asturian and Cantabrian hills Had bow'd before the Caliph; Cordoba Must be his nightly prison till that hour This night, by special favor from the Moor Ask'd and vouchsafed he past without the walls, Keeping his yearly vigil; on this night, Therefore, the princely Spaniard could not fly, Being thus in strongest bonds by honor held; Nor would he by his own escape expose To stricter bondage, or belike to death, Count Pedro's son. The ancient enmity Of rival houses from Pelayo's heart Had, like a thing forgotten, past away ; He pitied child and parent, separated By the stern mandate of unfeeling power, And almost with a father's eyes beheld The boy, his fellow in captivity.

In form and feature, growing strength of limb, A gentle heart, a soul affectionate, A joyous spirit fill'd with generous thoughts, And genius heightening and ennobling all; The blossom of all manly virtues made His boyhood beautiful. Shield, gracious Heaven, In this ungenial season perilous, — Thus would Pelayo sometimes breathe in prayer The aspirations of prophetic hope, flet Shield, gracious Heaven, the blooming tree ! and This goodly promise, for thy people's sake, Yield its abundant fruitage. When the Prince, With hope, and fear, and grief, and shame, disturb'd, And sad remembrance, and the shadowy light Of days before him, thronging as in dreams, Whose quick succession fill'd and overpower'd Awhile the nnresisting faculty, Could, in the calm of troubled thoughts subducd. Seek in his heart for counsel, his first care Was for the boy; how best they might evade The Moor, and renegade's more watchful eye; And leaving in some unsuspicious guise The city, through what unfrequented track Safeliest pursue with speed their dangerous way. Consumed in cares like these, the flecting hours Went by. The lamps and tapers now grew pale, And through the eastern window slanting fell The roseate ray of morn. Within those walls Returning day restored no cheerful sounds Or joyous motions of awakening life; But in the stream of light the speekled motes, As if in mimicry of insect play, Floated with mazy movement. Sloping down Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam, And rested on the sinful woman's grave As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven. So be it ! cried Pelayo, even so ! As in a momentary interval, When thought expelling thought, had left his mind Open and passive to the influxes Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there, --So be it, Heavenly Father, even so ! Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed Forgiveness there; for let not thou the groans Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain ! And thou, poor soul, who, from the dolorous house Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me To shorten and assuage thy penal term, Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts And other duties than this garb, this night Enjoin, should thus have past ! Our mother-land Exacted of my heart the sacrifice ; And many a vigil must thy son perform Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses, And tented fields, outwatching for her sake The starry host, and ready for the work Of day, before the sun begins his course. The noble Mountaineer, concluding then With silent prayer the service of the night,

Went forth. Without the porch, awaiting him,

For young Alphonso was in truth an heir

Of nature's largest patrimony ; rich

VIII.

He saw Alphonso, pacing to and fro With patient step and eye reverted oft. He, springing forward when he heard the door Move on its heavy hinges, ran to him, And welcomed him with smiles of youthful love. I have been watching yonder moon, quoth he, How it grew pale and paler as the sun Scatter'd the flying shades ; but woe is me, For on the towers of Cordoba the while l'hat baleful crescent glitter'd in the morn, And with its insolent triumph seem'd to mock The omen I had found. - Last night I dream* That thou wert in the field in arms for Spain, And I was at thy side : the infidels Beset us round, but we with our good swords Hew'd out a way. Methought I stabb'd a Moor Who would have slain thee; but with that I woke For joy, and wept to find it but a dream.

Thus, as he spake, a livelier glow o'erspread His cheek, and starting tears again suffused The brightening lustre of his eyes. The Prince Regarded him a moment steadfastly, As if in quick resolve; then, looking round On every side with keen and rapid glance, Drew him within the ehnreh. Alphonso's heart Throbb'd with a joyful boding as he mark'd The calmness of Pelayo's countenance Kindle with solemn thoughts, expressing now High purposes of resolute hope. He gazed All eagerly to hear what most he wish'd. If, said the Prince, thy dream were verified, And I indeed were in the field in arms For Spain, wouldst thou be at Pelayo's side?-If I should break these bonds, and fly to rear Our country's banner on our native hills, Wouldst thou, Alphonso, share my dangerous flight?

Dear boy, - and wilt thou take thy lot with me For death, or for deliverance?

Shall I swear? Replied the impatient boy; and laying hand Upon the altar, on his knee he bent, Looking towards Pelayo with such joy Of reverential love, as if a God Were present to receive the eager vow. Nay, guoth Pelayo : what hast thou to do With oaths? - Bright emanation as thou art, It were a wrong to thy unsullied soul, A sin to nature, were 1 to require Promise or vow from thee ! Enough for me That thy heart answers to the stirring eall. Alphonso, follow thou in happy faith Alway the indwelling voice that counsels thee; And then, let fall the issue as it may, Shall all thy paths be in the light of Heaven, The peace of Heaven be with thee in all hours.

How then, exclaim'd the boy, shall I discharge The burden of this happiness, — how ease My overflowing soul? — Oh gracious God, Shall I behold my mother's face again, — My father's hall, — my native hills and vales, And hear the voices of their streams again, — And free as I was born amid those scenes Beloved, maintain my country's freedom there, --Or, failing in the sacred enterprise, Die as becomes a Spaniard? -- Saying thus, He lifted up his hands and eyes toward The image of the Crucified, and cried, O Thou who didst with thy most precious blood Redeem us, Jesu! help us while we seek Earthly redemption from this yoke of shame, And misbelief, and death.

The noble boy Then rose, and would have knelt again to clasp Pelayo's knees, and kiss his hand in act Of homage; but the Prince, preventing this, Bent over him in fatherly embrace, And breathed a fervent blessing on his head

IX.

FLORINDA.

THERE sat a woman like a supplicant, Muffled and cloak'd, before Pelayo's gate, Awaiting when he should return that morn. She rose at his approach, and bow'd her head, And, with a low and trembling utterance, Besought him to vouchsafe her speech within In privacy. And when they were alone, And the doors closed, she knelt and clasp'd his knees, Saying, A boon! a boon! This night, O Prince, Hast thou kept vigil for thy mother's soul: For her soul's sake, and for the soul of him Whom once, in happier days, of all mankind Thou heldest for thy chosen bosom friend, Oh, for the sake of his poor suffering soul, Refuse me not!

How should I dare refuse, Being thus adjured? he answer'd. Thy request Is granted, woman, — be it what it may, So it be lawful, and within the bounds Of possible achievement: — aught unfit Thou wouldst not with these adjurations seek. But who thou art, I marvel, that dost touch Upon that string, and ask in Roderick's name!--She bared her face, and, looking up, replied, Florinda! — Shrinking then, with both her hands She hid herself, and bow'd her head abased Upon her knee, — as one who, if the grave Had oped beneath her, would have thrown herself, Even like a lover, in the arms of Death.

Pelayo stood confused : he had not seen Count Julian's daughter since, in Roderick's court, Glittering in beauty and in innocence, A radiant vision, in her joy she moved ; More like a poet's dream, or form divine, Heaven's prototype of perfect womanhood, So lovely was the presence, — than a thing Of earth and perishable elements. Now had he seen her in her winding-sheet, Less painful would that spectacle have proved; For peace is with the dead, and piety Bringeth a patient hope to those who mourn

IX

O'er the departed; but this alter'd face, Bearing its deadly sorrow character'd, Came to him like a ghost, which in the grave Could find no rest. IIe, taking her cold hand, Raised her, and would have spoken; but his tongue Fail'd in its office, and could only speak In under tones compassionate her name.

The voice of pity soothed and melted her; And when the Prince bade her be comforted. Proffering his zealous aid in whatsoe'er Might please her to appoint, a feeble smile Pass'd slowly over ber pale countenance, Like moonlight on a marble statue. Heaven Requite thee, Prince ! she answer'd. All I ask Is but a quiet resting-place, wherein A broken heart, in prayer and humble hope, May wait for its deliverance. Even this My most unhappy fate denies me here. Griefs which are known too widely and too well I need not now remember. I could bear Privation of all Christian ordinances; The woe which kills hath saved me too, and made A temple of this ruin'd tabernaele, Wherein redeeming God doth not disdair. To let his presence shine. And I could bear To see the turban on my father's brow, ----Sorrow beyond all sorrows, - shame of shames, -Yet to be borne, while 1 with tears of blood, And throes of agony, in his behalf Implore and wrestle with offended Heaven. This I have borne resign'd: but other ills, And worse, assail me now ; the which to bear, If to avoid be possible, would draw Damnation down. Orpas, the perjured Priest, The apostate Orpas, claims me for his bride. Obdurate as he is, the wretch profanes My sacred woe, and wooes me to his bed, The thing I am, - the living death thou seest !

Misereant! exclaim'd Pelayo. Might I meet That renegado, sword to cimeter, In open field, never did man approach The altar for the sacrifice in faith More sure, than I should hew the villain down! But how should Julian favor his demand? — Julian, who hath so passionately loved His child, so dreadfully revenged her wrongs!

Count Julian, she replied, hath none but me, And it hath, therefore, been his heart's desire To see his ancient line by me preserved. This was their covenant when, in fatal hour For Spain, and for themselves, in traitorous bond Of union they combined. My father, stung To madness, only thought of how to make His yengeance sure; the Prelate, calm and cool, When he renounced his outward faith in Christ, Indulged at once his hatred of the King, His inbred wickedness, and a haughty hope, Versed as he was in treasons, to direct The invaders by his secret policy, And at their head, aided by Julian's power, Reign as a Moor upon that throne to which The priestly order else had barr'd his way.

The African hath conquer'd for himself; But Orpas coveteth Count Julian's lands, And claims to have the covenant perform'd. Friendless, and worse than fatherless, I come To thee for succor. Send me secretly, — For well I know all faithful hearts must be At thy devotion, — with a trusty guide To guard me on the way, that I may reach Some Christian land, where Christian rites are free, And there discharge a vow, alas! too long, Too fatally delay'd. Aid me in this For Roderick's sake, Pelayo! and thy name Shall be remember'd in my latest prayer.

Be comforted ! the Prince replied; but when He spake of comfort, twice did he break off The idle words, feeling that earth had none For grief so irremediable as hers. At length he took her hand, and pressing it, And forcing through involuntary tears A mournful smile affectionate, he said, Say not that thou art friendless while 1 live ! Thou couldst not to a readier ear have told Thy sorrows, nor have ask'd in fitter hour What for my country's honor, for my rank, My faith, and sacred knighthood, I am bound In duty to perform; which not to do Would show me undeserving of the names Of Goth, Prince, Christian, even of Man. This day, Lady, prepare to take thy lot with me, And soon as evening closes meet me here. Duties bring blessings with them, and I hold Thy coming for a happy augury, In this most awful crisis of my fate.

RODERICK AND FLORINDA.

WITH sword and breastplate, under rustic weeds Conceal'd, at dusk Pelayo pass'd the gate, Florinda following near, disguised alike. Two peasants on their mules they seem'd, at eve Returning from the town. Not distant far, Alphonso by the appointed orange-grove, With anxious eye and agitated heart, Watch'd for the Prince's coming. Eagerly At every foot-fall through the gloom he strain'd His sight, nor did he recognize him when The Chieftain thus accompanied drew nigh; And when the expected signal called him on, Doubting this female presence, half in fear Obev'd the call. Pelavo too perceived The boy was not alone; he not for that Delay'd the summons, but lest need should be, Laying hand upon his sword, toward him bent In act soliciting speech, and low of voice Inquired, if friend or foe. Forgive me, cried Alphonso, that I did not tell thee this, Full as I was of happiness, before. 'Tis Hoya, servant of my father's house, Unto whose dutiful care and love, when sent

1X.

To this vile bondage, 1 was given in charge. How could I look upon my father's face, If I had in my joy deserted him, Who was to me found faithful? — Right! replied The Prince; and viewing him with silent joy, Blessed the Mother, in his heart he said, Who gave thee birth! but sure of womankind Most blessed she whose hand her happy stars Sball link with thine! and with that thought the form

Of Hermesind, his daughter, to his soul Came in her beauty.

Soon, by devious tracks, They turn'd aside. The favoring moon arose, To guide them on their flight through upland paths Remote from frequentage, and dales retired, Forest and mountain glen. Before their feet The fire-flies, swarming in the woodland shade, Sprung up like sparks, and twinkled round their way;

The timorous blackbird, starting at their step, Fled from the thicket with shrill note of fear; And far below them in the peopled dell, When all the soothing sounds of eve had ceased, The distant watch-dog's voice at times was heard, Answering the nearer wolf. All through the night Among the hills they travell'd silently; Till when the stars were setting, at what hour The breath of Heaven is coldest, they beheld Within a lonely grove the expected fire, Where Roderick and his comrade anxiously Look'd for the appointed meeting. Halting there, They from the burden and the bit relieved Their patient bearers, and around the fire Partook of needful food and grateful rest.

Bright rose the flame replenish'd; it illumed The cork-tree's furrow'd rind, its rifts, and swells, And redder scars, - and where its aged boughs O'erbower'd the travellers, cast upon the leaves A floating, gray, unrealizing gleam. Alphonso, light of heart, upon the heath Lay carelessly dispread, in happy dreams Of home; his faithful Hoya slept beside. Years and fatigue to old Siverian brought Easy oblivion; and the Prince himself, Yielding to weary nature's gentle will, Forgot his cares awhile. Florinda sat Beholding Roderick with fix'd eyes intent, Yet unregardant of the countenance Whereon they dwelt; in other thoughts absorb'd, Collecting fortitude for what she yearn'd, Yet trembled to perform. Her steady look Disturb'd the Goth, albeit he little ween'd What agony awaited him that hour. Her face, well nigh as changed as his, was now Half-hidden, and the lustre of her eye Extinct; nor did her voice awaken in him One startling recollection when she spake, So altered were its tones.

Father, she said, All thankful as I am to leave behind The unhappy walls of Cordoba, not less Of consolation doth my heart receive At sight of one to whom 1 may disclose The sins which trouble me, and at his feet Lay down repentantly, in Jesu's name, The burden of my spirit. In his name Hear me, and pour into a wounded soul The balm of pious counsel. — Saying thus, She drew toward the minister ordain'd, And kneeling by him, Father, dost thou know The wretch who kneels beside thee? she inquired. He answered, Surely we are each to each Equally unknown.

Then said she, Here thou seest One who is known too fatally for all, — The daughter of Count Julian. — Well it was For Roderick that no eye beheld him now ; From head to foot a sharper pang than death Thrill'd him ; his heart, as at a mortal stroke, Ceased from its functions : his breath fail'd, and when

The power of life, recovering, set its springs Again in action, cold and clammy sweat Starting at every pore suffused his frame. Their presence help'd him to subdue himself; For else, had none been nigh, he would have fallen Before Florinda prostrate on the earth, And in that mutual agony belike Both souls had taken flight. She mark'd him not, For having told her name, she bow'd her head, Breathing a short and silent prayer to Heaven, While, as a penitent, she wrought herself To open to his eye her hidden wounds.

Father, at length she said, all tongues amid This general ruin shed their bitterness On Roderick, load his memory with reproach, And with their curses persecute his soul.-Why shouldst thou tell me this? exclaim'd the Goth, From his cold forehead wiping, as he spake, The death-like moisture; - why of Roderick's gnilt Tell me? Or thinkest thou I know it not? Alas! who hath not heard the hideous tale Of Roderick's shame! Babes learn it from their nurses, And children, by their mothers unreproved, Link their first execrations to his name. Oh, it hath caught a taint of infamy, That, like Iscariot's, through all time shall last, Reeking and fresh forever! There ! she cried. Drawing her body backward where she knelt, And stretching forth her arms with head upraised, -There ! it pursues me still ! - I came to thee, Father, for comfort, and thou heapest fire Upon my head. But hear me patiently, And let me undeceive thee; self-abased, Not to arraign another, do 1 come; -I come a self-accuser, self-condemn'd To take upon myself the pain deserved; For 1 have drank the cup of bitterness, And having drank therein of heavenly grace, I must not put away the cup of shame.

Thus as she spake she falter'd at the close, And in that dying fall her voice sent forth Somewhat of its original sweetness. Thou !--Thon self-abased ! exclaim'd the astonish'd King ;--Thou self-condemn'd! -- The cnp of shame for thee! Thee -- thee, Florinda !-- But the very excess Of passion check'd his speech, restraining thus From further transport, which had haply else Master'd him; and he sat like one entranced, Gazing upon that countenance so fallen, So changed : her face, raised from its muffler now, Was turn'd toward him, and the fire-light shone Full on its mortal paleness; but the shade Conceal'd the King.

She roused him from the spell Which held him like a statue motionless. Thou, too, quoth she, dost join the general curse, Like one, who, when he sees a felon's grave, Casting a stone there as he passes by, Adds to the heap of shame. Oh, what are we, Frail creatures as we are, that we should sit In judgment, man on man! and what were we, If the All-merciful should mete to us With the same rigorous measure wherewithal Sinner to sinner metes! But God beholds The secrets of the heart, - therefore his name Is Merciful. Servant of God, see thou The hidden things of mine, and judge thou then In charity thy brother who hath fallen .-Nay, near me to the end ! I loved the King, --Tenderly, passionately, madly loved him. Sinful it was to love a child of earth With such entire devotion as I loved Roderick, the heroic Prince, the glorious Goth ! And yet methought this was its only crime, The imaginative passion seem'd so pure; Quiet and calm like duty, hope nor fear Disturb'd the deep contentment of that love; He was the sunshine of my soul, and like A flower, I lived and flourish'd in his light. Oh, bear not with me thus impatiently ! No tale of weakness this, that in the act Of peniteuce, indulgent to itself, With garrulous palliation half repeats The sin it ill repents. I will be brief, And shrink not from confessing how the love Which thus began in innocence, betray'd My unsuspecting heart; nor me alone, But him, before whom, shining as he shone With whatsoe'er is noble, whatsoe'er Is lovely, whatsoever good and great, 1 was as dust and ashes, - him, alas! This glorious being, this exalted Prince, Even him, with all his royalty of soul, Did this ill-omen'd, this accursed love, To his most lamentable fall betray And utter ruin. Thus it was: The King, By counsels of cold statesmen ill-advised, 'To an unworthy mate had bound himself In politic wedlock. Wherefore should I tell How Nature upon Egilona's form, Profuse of beauty, lavishing her gifts, Left, like a statue from the graver's hands, Deformity and hollowness beneath The rich external? For the love of pomp

And emptiest vanity, hath she not incurr'd The grief and wonder of good men, the jibes Of vulgar ribaldry, the reproach of all; Profaning the most holy sacrament Of marriage, to become chief of the wives Of Abdalaziz, of the Infidel, The Moor, the tyrant-enemy of Spain ! All know her now; but they alone who knew What Roderick was, can judge his wretchedness, To that light spirit and unfeeling heart In hopeless bondage bound. No children rose From this unhappy union, towards whom The springs of love, within his soul confined, Might flow in joy and fulness; nor was he One, like Witiza, of the vulgar crew, Who in promiseuous appetite can find All their vile nature seeks. Alas for man ! Exuberant health diseases him, frail worm ! And the slight bias of untoward chance Makes his best virtue from the even line, With fatal declination, swerve aside. Ay, thou mayst grean for poor mortality, -Well, Father, mayst thou groan !

My evil fate

Made me an inmate of the royal house, And Roderick found in me, if not a heart Like his, - for who was like the heroic Goth?-One which at least felt his surpassing worth, And loved him for himself. - A little yet Bear with me, reverend Father, for I touch Upon the point, and this long prologue goes, As justice bids, to palliate his offence, Not mine. The passion, which I fondly thought Such as fond sisters for a brother feel, Grew day by day, and strengthen'd in its growth, Till the beloved presence had become Needful as food or necessary sleep, My hope, light, sunshine, life, and every thing. Thus lapp'd in dreams of bliss, I might have lived Contented with this pure idolatry, Had he been happy; but I saw and knew The inward discontent and household griefs Which he subdued in silence; and alas! Pity with admiration mingling then, Alloy'd, and lower'd, and humanized my love, Till to the level of my lowliness It brought him down; and in this treacherous heart Too often the repining thought arose, That if Florinda had been Roderick's Queen, Then might domestic peace and happiness Have bless'd his home and crown'd our wedded loves. Too often did that sinful thought recur.

Too feebly the temptation was repell'd.

See, Father, I have probed my inmost soul; Have search'd to its remotest source the sin; And tracing it through all its specious forms Of fair disguisement, I present it now, Even as it lies before the eye of God, Bare and exposed, convicted and condemn d. One eve, as in the bowers which overhang The glen where Tagus rolls between his rocks I roam'd alone, alone I met the King. His countenance was troubled, and his speech

Like that of one whose tongue to light discourse O let me close At fits constrain'd, betrays a heart disturb'd : The dreadful tale ! I told him of my vow; I too, albeit unconscious of his thoughts, And from sincere and scrupulous piety, With anxious looks reveal'd what wandering words But more, I fear me, in that desperate mood In vain essay'd to hide. A little while Of obstinate will perverse, the which, with pride, Did this oppressive intercourse endure, And shame, and self-reproach, doth sometimes Till our eyes met in silence, each to each make Telling their mutual tale, then consciously A woman's tongue, her own worst enemy, Together fell abash'd. He took my hand, Run counter to her dearest heart's desire, ----And said, Florinda, would that thou and I In that unhappy mood did I resist Earlier had met! Oh, what a blissful lot All his most earnest prayers to let the power Had then been mine, who might have found in Of holy Church, never more rightfully thee Invoked, he said, than now in our behalf, The sweet companion and the friend endear'd, Release us from our fatal bonds. He urged A fruitful wife and crown of earthly joys! With kindling warmth his suit, like one whose Thou too shouldst then have been of womankind life Happiest, as now the loveliest. - And with that, Hung on the issue ; I dissembled not First giving way to passion first disclosed, My cruel self-reproaches, nor my grief, He press'd upon my lips a guilty kiss, ---Yet desperately maintain'd the rash resolve; Alas! more guiltily received than given. Till, in the passionate argument, he grew Passive and yielding, and yet self-reproach'd, Incensed, inflamed, and madden'd or possess'd-Trembling I stood, upheld in his embrace ; For Hell too surely at that hour prevail'd, When coming steps were heard, and Roderick said, And with such subtile toils enveloped him, Meet me to-morrow, I beseech thee, here, That even in the extremity of guilt Queen of my heart ! Oh meet me here again, No guilt he purported, but rather meant My own Florinda, meet me here again ! ---An amplest recompense of life-long love Tongue, eye, and pressure of the impassion'd hand For transitory wrong, which fate perverse -Solicited and urged the ardent suit, Thus madly he deceived himself - compell'd, And from my hesitating, hurried lips And therefore stern necessity excused. The word of promise fatally was drawn. Here then, O Father, at thy feet I own O Roderick, Roderick! hadst thou told me all Myself the guiltier; for full well I knew Thy purpose at that hour, from what a world These were his thoughts, but vengeance master'd Of woe had thou and I - The bitterness me, Of that reflection overcame her then, And in my agony I cursed the man Whom I loved best. And chok'd her speech. But Roderick sat the while Dost thou recall that curse? Cried Roderick, in a deep and inward voice, Covering his face with both his hands close-press'd, His head bow'd down, his spirit to such point Still with his head depress'd, and covering still Of sufferance knit, as one who patiently His countenance. Recall it ? she exclaim'd ; Father, I come to thee because I gave Awaits the uplifted sword. Till now, said she, The reins to wrath too long, - because I wrought Resuming her confession, I had lived, His ruin, death, and infamy. - O God, Forgive the wicked vengeance thus indulged, If not in innocence, yet self-deceived, And of my perilous and sinful state As I forgive the King ! - But teach me thou Unconscious. But this fatal hour reveal'd What reparation more than tears and prayers To my awakening soul her guilt and shame :

And in those agonies with which remorse,

Immured; and, like redeemed Magdalen,

Fretted the rock, and moisten'd round her cave

Thus, as I thought, accomplish'd, I believed

My soul was calm, and that the peace of Heaven

Or that Egyptian penitent, whose tears

The thirsty desert, so to mourn my fall.

Descended to accept and bless my vow; And in this faith, prepared to consummate

The sacrifice, I went to meet the King.

And I should be his Queen.

See, Father, what a snare had Satan laid!

For Roderick came to tell me that the Church

From his unfruitful bed would set him free,

The struggle ending thus, the victory

Doth triumph o'er the lacerated heart, That night - that miserable night - I vow'd,

A virgin dedicate, to pass my life

May now be made; - how shall I vindicate His injured name, and take upon myself-Wrestling with weakness and with cherish'd sin, Daughter of Julian, firmly he replied, Speak not of that, I charge thee ! On his fame The Ethiop dye, fixed ineffaceably, Forever will abide; so it must be, So should be : 'tis his rightful punishment ; And if to the full measure of his sin The punishment hath fallen, the more our hope That through the blood of Jesus he may find That sin forgiven him. Pausing then, he raised

His hand, and pointed where Siverian lay Stretch'd on the heath. To that old man, said he, And to the mother of the unhappy Goth, Tell, if it please thee, - not what thou hast pour'd Into my secret ear, but that the child For whom they mourn with anguish unallay'd, Sinn'd not from vicious will, or heart corrupt, But fell by fatal circumstance betray'd.

And if in charity to them thou sayest Something to palliate, something to excuse An act of sudden frenzy when the Fiend O'ercame him, thou wilt do for Roderick All he could ask thee, all that can be done On earth, and all his spirit could endure.

Venturing towards her an imploring look, Wilt thou join with me for his soul in prayer? He said, and trembled as he spake. That voice Of sympathy was like Heaven's influence, Wounding at once and comforting the soul. O Father, Christ requite thee! she exclaim'd; Thon hast set free the springs which withering griefs

Have closed too long. Forgive me, for I thought Thou wert a rigid and unpitying judge ; One whose stern virtue, feeling in itself No flaw of frailty, heard impatiently Of weakness and of guilt. I wrong'd thee,

Father! -With that she took his hand, and kissing it, Bathed it with tears. Then in a firmer speech, For Roderick, for Count Julian, and myself, Three wretchedest of all the human race,

Who have destroyed each other and ourselves, Mutually wrong'd and wronging, let us pray!

XI.

COUNT PEDRO'S CASTLE.

Twelve weary days with unremitting speed, Shunning frequented tracks, the travellers Pursued their way; the mountain path they chose, The forest or the lonely heath wide-spread, Where eistus shrubs sole seen exhaled at noon Their fine balsamic odor all around ; Strow'd with their blossoms, frail as beautiful, The thirsty soil at eve ; and when the sun Relumed the gladden'd earth, opening anew Their stores exuberant, prodigal as frail, Whiten'd again the wilderness. They left The dark Sierra's skirts behind, and cross'd The wilds where Ana, in her native hills, Collects her sister springs, and hurries on Her course melodious amid loveliest glens, With forest and with fruitage overbower'd. These scenes profusely blest by Heaven they left, Where o'er the hazel and the quince the vine Wide-mantling spreads; and clinging round the cork

And ilex, hangs amid their dusky leaves Garlands of brightest hue, with reddening fruit Pendent, or clusters cool of glassy green. So holding on o'er mountain and o'er vale, Tagus they cross'd, where, midland on his way, The King of Rivers rolls his stately stream; And rude Alverehes' wide and stony bed, And Duero distant far, and many a stream And many a field obscure, in future war For bloody theatre of famous deeds Foredoom'd; and deserts where, in years to come, His lonely pastime; neither could he hear

Shall populous towns arise, and crested towers. And stately temples rear their heads on high.

Cautious, with course circuitons they shunn'd The embattled city, which, in eldest time, Thrice-greatest Hermes built, so fables say, Now subjugate, but fated to behold Erelong the heroic Prince (who, passing now Unknown and silently the dangerous track, Turns thither his regardant eye) come down Victorious from the heights, and bear abroad Her banner'd Lion, symbol to the Moor Of rout and death through many an age of blood Lo, there the Asturian hills ! Far in the west, Huge Rabanal and Foncebadon huge, Preëminent, their giant bulk display, Darkening with earliest shade, the distant vales Of Leon, and with evening premature. Far in Cantabria eastward, the long line Extends beyond the reach of eagle's eye, When buoyant in mid-heaven the bird of Jove Soars at his loftiest pitch. In the north, before The travellers the Erbasian mountains rise, Bounding the land beloved, their native land.

How then, Alphonso, did thy eager soul Chide the slow hours and painful way, which seem'd Lengthening to grow before their lagging pace! Youth of heroic thought and high desire, 'Tis not the spur of lofty enterprise That with unequal throbbing hurries now The unquiet heart, now makes it sink dismay'd; 'Tis not impatient joy which thus disturbs In that young breast the healthful spring of life; Joy and ambition have forsaken him. His soul is sick with hope. So near his home, So near his mother's arms; - alas! perchance The long d-for meeting may be yet far off As earth from heaven. Sorrow, in these long months

Of separation, may have laid her low; Or what if at his flight the bloody Moor Hath sent his ministers of slaughter forth, And he himself should thus have brought the sword Upon his father's head? - Sure Hoya too The same dark presage feels, the fearful boy Said in himself; or wherefore is his brow Thus overcast with heaviness, and why Looks he thus anxiously in silence round?

Just then that faithful servant raised his hand, And turning to Alphonso with a smile, He pointed where Count Pedro's towers far off Peer'd in the dell below; faint was the smile, And while it sat upon his lips, his eye Retain'd its troubled speculation still. For long had he look'd wistfully in vain, Seeking where far or near he might espy From whom to learn if time or chance had wrought Change in his master's house : but on the hills Nor goatherd could he see, nor traveller, Nor huntsman early at his sports afield, Nor angler following up the mountain glen

XI.

Carol, or pipe, or shout of shepherd's boy, Nor woodman's axe, for not a human sound Disturb'd the silence of the solitude.

Is it the spoiler's work? At yonder door Behold the favorite kidling bleats unheard ; The next stands open, and the sparrows there Boldly pass in and out. Thither he turn'd To seek what indications were within ; The chestnut-bread was on the shelf, the ehurn, As if in haste forsaken, full and fresh; The recent fire had monIder'd on the hearth; And broken cobwebs mark'd the whiter space Where from the wall the buckler and the sword Had late been taken down. Wonder at first Had mitigated fear; bnt Hoya now Return'd to tell the symbols of good hope, And they prick'd forward joyfully. Erelong Perceptible above the ceaseless sound Of yonder stream, a voice of multitudes, As if in loud aeelaim, was heard far off; And nearer as they drew, distincter shouts Came from the dell, and at Count Pedro's gate The human swarm were seen, - a motley group, Maids, mothers, helpless infancy, weak age, And wondering children, and tumultuous boys, Hot youth, and resolute manhood gather'd there, In uproar all. Anon the moving mass Falls in half circle back ; a general cry Bursts forth; exultant arms are lifted up, And eaps are thrown aloft, as through the gate Count Pedro's banner came. Alphonso shriek'd For joy, and smote his steed and gallop'd on.

Fronting the gate, the standard-bearer holds His precious charge. Behind, the men divide In order'd files; green boyhood presses there, And waning eld, pleading a yonthful soul, Entreats admission. All is ardor here, Hope, and brave purposes, and minds resolved. Nor where the weaker sex is left apart Doth aught of fear find atterance, though perchance Some paler checks might there be seen, some eyes Big with sad bodings, and some natural tears. Count Pedro's war-horse in the vacant space Strikes with impatient hoof the trodden turf, And gazing round upon the martial show, Proud of his stately trappings, flings his head, And snorts and champs the bit, and neighing shrill Wakes the near echo with his voice of joy. The page beside him holds his master's spear, And shield, and helmet. In the eastle-gate Count Pedro stands, his countenance resolved, Put mournful, for Favinia on his arm Hung, passionate with her fears, and held him back. Go not, she eried, with this deluded crew? She hath not, Pedro, with her frantic words Bereft thy faculty, --- she is erazed with grief, And her delirium hath infected these ; But, Pedro, thou art ealm; thou dost not share The madness of the crowd ; thy sober mind Surveys the danger in its whole extent, And sees the certain ruin, — for thou know'st I know thou hast no hope. Unhappy man, Why then for this most desperate enterprise

Wilt thon devote thy son, thine only child? Not for myself 1 plead, nor even for thee; Thou art a soldier, and thou canst not fear The face of death; and I should welcond it As the best visitant whom Heaven could send. Not for our lives I speak then, — were they worth The thought of preservation; — Nature soon Must call for them; the sword that should cut short Sorrow's slow work were merciful to us. . But spare Alphonso ! there is time and hope In store for him. O thou who gavest him lite, Seal not his death, his death and mine at once !

Peace! he replied: thou know'st there is no ehoice;

l did not raise the storm ; I eannot turn lts course aside ! but where yon banner goes Thy Lord must not be absent ! Spare me then, Favinia, lest I hear thy honor'd name Now first attainted with deserved reproach. The boy is in God's hands. Ile who of yore Walk'd with the sons of Judah in the fire, And from the lions' den drew Daniel forth Unhurt, ean save him, — if it be his will.

Even as he spake, the astonish'd troop set up A shout of joy which rung through all the hills. Alphonso heeds not how they break their ranks And gather ronnd to greet him; from his horse Precipitate and panting off he springs. Pedro grew pale, and trembled at his sight; Favinia elasp'd her hands, and looking up To Heaven as she embraeed the boy, exclaim'd, Lord God, forgive me for my sinful fears; Unworthy that I am, --- my son, my son !

XII.

THE VOW.

ALWAYS I knew thee for a generous foe, Pelayo! said the Count; and in our time Of enmity, thou too, I know, didst feel The feud between us was but of the honse, Not of the heart. Brethren in arms henceforth We stand or fall together; nor will 1 Look to the event with one misgiving thought, -That were to prove myself unworthy now Of Heaven's benignant providence, this hour, Scarcely by less than miracle, vouchsafed. I will believe that we have days in store Of hope, now risen again as from the dead, --Of vengeance, - of portentous victory, -Yea, maugre all unlikelihoods, - of peace. Let us then here indissolubly knit Our ancient houses, that those happy days, When they arrive, may find us more than friends, And bound by closer than fraternal ties. Thou hast a daughter, Prince, to whom my heart Yearns now, as if in winning infancy Her smiles had been its daily food of love. I need not tell thee what Alphonso is, ---Thou know'st the boy !

Already had that hope, Replied Pelayo, risen within my soul. O Thou, who, in thy mercy, from the house Of Moo..sh bondage hast deliver'd us, Fulfil the pious purposes for which Here, in thy presence, thus we pledge our hands!

Strange hour to plight espousals ! yielding half To superstitious thoughts, Favinia cried, And these strange witnesses! - The times are strange, With thoughtful speech composed her Lord replies; And what thon seest accords with them. This day ls wonderful; nor could auspicious Heaven With fairer or with fitter omen gild Our enterprise, when, strong in heart and hope, We take the field, preparing thus for works Of piety and love. Unwillingly I yielded to my people's general voice, Thinking that she who with her powerful words To this excess had roused and kindled them, Spake from the spirit of her griefs alone, Not with prophetic impulse. Be that sin Forgiven me ! and the calm and quiet faith Which, in the place of incredulity, Hath fill'd me, now that seeing I believe, Doth give of happy end to righteous cause A presage, not presumptuous, but assured.

Then Pedro told Pelayo how from vale To vale the exalted Adosinda went, Exciting sire and son, in holy war Conquering or dying, to secure their place In Paradise; and how reluctantly, And mourning for his child by his own act Thus doom'd to death, he bade with heavy heart His banner be brought forth. Devoid alike Of purpose and of hope himself, he meant To march toward the western Mountaineers, Where Odoar by his counsel might direct Their force conjoin'd. Now, said he, we must haste

To Cangas, there, Pelayo, to secure, With timely speed, 1 trust in God, thy house.

Then looking to his men, he cried, Bring forth The armor which in Wamba's wars 1 wore.— Alphonso's heart leapt at the auspicious words. Count Pedro mark'd the rising glow of joy,— Donbly to thee, Alphonso, he pursued, This day above all other days is blest, From whence, as from a birth-day, thou wilt date Thy life in arms!

Rejoicing in their task, The servants of the house, with emulous love, Dispute the charge. One brings the cuirass, one The buckler; this exultingly displays The sword; his comrade lifts the helm on high; The greaves, the gauntlets they divide; a spur Seems now to dignify the officious hand Which for such service bears it to his Lord. Greek artists in the imperial city forged That splendid armor, perfect in their eraft; With curious skill they wrought it, framed alike To shine amid the pageantry of war, And for the proof of battle. Many a time Alphonso from his nurse's lap had stretch'd llis infant hands toward it eagerly, Where gleaming to the central fire it hung High in the hall; and many a time had wish'd, With boyish ardor, that the day were come When Pedro to his prayers would grant the boon, His dearest heart's desire. Count Pedro then Would smile, and in his heart rejoice to see The noble instinct manifest itself. Then, too, Favinia, with maternal pride, Would turn her eyes exulting to her Lord, And in that silent language bid him mark His spirit in his boy; all danger then Was distant, and if secret forethought faint Of manhood's perils, and the chance of war, Hateful to mothers, pass'd across her mind, The ill remote gave to the present hour A heighten'd feeling of secure delight.

No season this for old solemnities, For wassailry and sport; - the bath, the bed, The vigil, - all preparatory rites Omitted now, - here, in the face of Heaven, Before the vassals of his father's house, With them in instant peril to partake The chance of life or death, the heroic boy Dons his first arms; the coated scales of steel Which o'er the tunic to his knees depend, The hose, the sleeves of mail; bareheaded then He stood. But when Count Pedro took the spurs, And bent his knee in service to his son, Alphonso from that gesture half drew back, Starting in reverence, and a deeper hue Spread o'er the glow of joy which flush'd his cheeks.

Do thou the rest, Pelayo! said the Count; So shall the ceremony of this hour Exceed in honor what in form it lacks. The Prince from Hoya's faithful hand receiv'd The sword; he girt it round the youth, and drew And placed it in his hand; unsheathing then His own good falchion, with its burnish'd hlade He touch'd Alphonso's neck, and with a kiss Gave him his rank in arms.

Thus long the crowd llad look'd intently on, in silence hush'd; Loud and continuous now with one accord, Shout following shout, their acclamations rose; Blessings were breathed from every heart, and joy, Powerful alike in all, which, as with force Of an inebriating cup, inspired The youthful, from the eye of age drew tears. The uproar died away, when, standing forth, Roderick, with lifted hand, besought a pause For speech, and moved towards the youth. 1, too, Young Baron, he began, must do my part; Not with prerogative of earthly power, But as the servant of the living God, The God of Hosts. This day thou promisest To die, when honor calls thee, for thy faith. For thy liege Lord, and for thy native land; The duties which at birth we all contract, Are by the high profession of this hour Made thine especially. Thy noble blood,

XII.

The thoughts with which thy childhood hath been fed,

And thine own noble nature more than all, Are sureties for thee. But these dreadful times Demand a further pledge; for it hath pleased The Highest, as he tried his Saints of old, So in the fiery furnace of his wrath To prove and purify the sons of Spain; And they must knit their spirits to the proof, Or sink, forever lost. Hold forth thy sword, Young Baron, and before thy people take The vow which, in Toledo's sacred name, Poor as these weeds bespeak me, I am here To minister with delegated power.

With reverential awe was Roderick heard By all, so well authority became That mien, and voice, and countenance anstere. Pelayo with complacent eye beheld The unlook'd-for interposal, and the Count Bends toward Alphonso his approving head. The youth, obedient, loosen'd from his belt The sword, and looking, while his heart beat fast, To Roderick, reverently expectant stood.

O noble youth, the Royal Goth pursued, Thy country is in bonds; an impious foe Oppresses her; he brings with him strange laws, Strange language, evil customs, and false faith, And forces them on Spain. Swear that thy soul Will make no covenant with these accursed, But that the sword shall be from this day forth Thy children's portion, to be handed down From sire to son, a sacred heritage, Through every generation, till the work Be done, and this insulted land hath drunk In sacrifice the last invader's blood!

Bear witness, ancient Mountains ! eried the youth, And ye, my native Streams, who hold your course

And ye, my naive Streams, who hold your cours Forever; — this dear Earth, and yonder Sky, Be witness! for myself I make the vow, And for my children's children. Here I stand Their sponsor, binding them in sight of Heaven, As by a new baptismal sacrament, To wage hereditary, holy war, Perpetual, patient, persevering war, Till not one living enemy pollute The sacred soil of Spain.

So, as he ceased, While yet toward the clear, blue firmament His eyes were raised, he lifted to his lips The sword, with reverent gesture bending then, Devoutly kiss'd its cross.

And ye! exclaimed Roderick, as, turning to the assembled troop, He motion'd with authoritative hand, — Ye children of the hills and sons of Spain!

Through every heart the rapid feeling ran, — For us! they answer'd all with one accord, And at the word they knelt: People and Prince, The young and old, the father and the son, At once they knelt; with one accord they cried, For us, and for our seed! with one accord They cross'd their fervent arms, and with bent head Inclined toward that awful voice from whence The inspiring impulse came. The Royal Goth Made answer, — I receive your vow for Spain And for the Lord of Hosts: your cause is good; Go forward in his spirit and his strength.

Ne'er in his happiest hours had Roderick With such commanding majesty dispensed His princely gifts, as dignified him now, When, with slow movement, solemnly upraised, Toward the kneeling troop he spread his arms, As if the expanded soul diffused itself, And carried to all spirits with the act Its effluent inspiration. Silently The people knelt, and when they rose, such awe Held them in silence, that the eagle's cry, Who far above them, at her highest flight A speek searce visible, gyred round and round, Was heard distinctly; and the mountain stream, Which from the distant glen sent forth its sounds Wafted upon the wind, grew audible In that deep hush of feeling, like the voice Of waters in the stillness of the night.

COUNT EUDON.

THAT awful silence still endured, when one, Who to the northern entrance of the vale

Had turn'd his casual eye, exclaim'd, The Moors!—

For from the forest verge a troop were seen

Hastening toward Pedro's hall. Their forward speed

Was check'd when they beheld his banner spread, And saw his order'd spears in prompt array,

Marshalled to meet their coming. But the pride Of power and insolence of long command

Prick'd on their Chief presumptuous: We are come

Late for prevention, cried the haughty Moor, But never time more fit for punishment! These unbelieving slaves must feel and know Their master's arm!—On, faithful Mussulmen, On—on,—and hew down the rebellious dogs!— Then, as he spuri'd his steed, Allah is great! Mahommed is his Prophet! he exclaim'd, And led the charge.

Count Pedro met the Chiel' In full eareer; ae bore him from his horse A full spear's length upon the lance transfix'd; Then leaving in his breast the mortal shaft, Pass'd on, and, breaking through the turban'd files, Open'd a path. Pelayo, who that day Fought in the ranks afoot, for other war Yet unequipp'd, pursued and smote the foe, But ever on Alphonso, at his side, Retained a watchful eye. The gallant boy Gave his good sword that hour its earliest taste

Cheap was the victory now for Spain achieved;	Extolling, for his deeds that day display'd,
For the first fervor of their zeal inspired	The noble boy. Oh! when had Heaven, they said
The Mountaineers, - the presence of their Chiefs,	With such especial favor manifest
The sight of all dear objects, all dear ties,	Illustrated a first essay in arms!
The air they breathed, the soil whereon they trod,	They bless'd the father from whose loins he sprung.
Duty, devotion, faith, and hope, and joy.	The mother at whose happy breast he fed;
And little had the misbelievers ween'd	And pray'd that their young hero's fields might be

A greeting deadly as their own intent;	Thus they indulged

Scatter'd before the impetuous Mountaineers,	But with a different fear: the African

As in precipitate rout they fled before	Such apprehension as without reproach

From the fight apart	Quiver, were of his own unworthiness,
Two Africans had stood, who held in charge	Old enmity, and that he stood in power
Count Eudon. When they saw their countrymen	Of hated and hereditary foes.
Falter, give way, and fly before the foe,	I came not with them willingly! he cried,
One turn'd toward him with malignant rage,	Addressing Pedro and the Prince at once,
And saying, Infidel! thou shalt not live	Rolling from each to each his restless eyes

Count Pedro, and Alphonso, and the Prince	Count Pedro half repress'd a mournful smile,
Stood on a little rocky eminence	Wherein compassion seem'd to mitigate
Which overlook'd the vale. Pedro had put	His deep contempt. Methinks, said he, the Moor

xiii.

This Baron on the way, and seek thee here To bear thee hence in bonds. A messenger From Cordoba, whose speed denoted well He came with urgent tidings, was the cause Of this our sudden movement. We went forth Three hundred men; an equal force was sent For Cangas, on like errand, as I ween. Four hundred in the city then were left. If other force be moving from the south, I know not, save that all appearances Denote alarm and vigilance

The Prince Fix'd upon Eudon then his eye severe; Baron, he said, the die of war is cast; What part art thou prepared to take? against, Or with the oppressor?

Not against my friends, — Not against you ! — the irresolute wretch replied, Hasty, yet faltering in his fearful speech; But, — have ye weigh'd it well? — It is not yet Too late, — their numbers, — their victorious force, Which hath already trodden in the dust The sceptre of the Goths: — the throne destroy'd, — Our towns subdued, — our country overrun, — The people to the yoke of their new Lords Resign'd in peace — Can 1 not mediate? — Were it not batter through my agency To gain such terms, — such honorable terms? —

Terms! cried Pelayo, cutting short at once That dastard speech, and checking, ere it grew Too powerful for restraint, the incipient wrath Which in indignant murmurs breathing round, Rose like a gathering storm, learn thou what terms Asturias, this day speaking by my voice, Doth constitute to be the law between Thee and thy Country. Our portentous age, As with an earthquake's desolating force, Hath loosen'd and disjointed the whole frame Of social order, and she calls not now For service with the force of sovereign will. That which was common duty in old times, Becomes an arduous, glorious virtue now ; And every one, as between Hell and Heaven, In free election must be left to choose. Asturias asks not of thee to partake The cup which we have pledged ; she claims from none

The dauntless fortitude, the mind resolved, Which only God can give ; - therefore such peace As thou canst find where all around is war, She leaves thee to enjoy. But think not, Count, That because thou art weak, one valiant arm, One generous spirit must be lost to Spain ! The vassal owes no service to the Lord Who to his Country doth acknowledge none. The summons which thou hast not heart to give, I and Count Pedro over thy domains Will send abroad ; the vassals who were thine Will fight beneath our banners, and our wants Shall from thy lands, as from a patrimony Which hath reverted to the common stock, Be fed : such tribute, too, as to the Moors Thou renderest, we will take It is the price

Which in this land for weakness must be paid While evil stars prevail. And mark me, Chief! Fear is a treacherous counsellor! I know Thou thinkëst that beneath his horses' hoofs The Moor will trample our poor numbers down; But join not, in contempt of us and Heaven, His multitudes! for if thou shouldst be found Against thy country, on the readiest tree Those recreant bones shall rattle in the wind, When the birds have left them bare.

As thus he spake, Count Eudon heard and trembled : every joint Was loosen'd, every fibre of his flesh Thrill'd, and from every pore effused, cold sweat Clung on his quivering limbs. Shame forced it forth, Envy, and inward consciousness, and fear Predominant, which stifled in his heart Hatred and rage. Before his livid lips Could shape to utterance their essay'd reply, Compassionately Pedro interposed. Go, Barcn, to the Castle, said the Count; There let thy wound be look'd to, and consult Thy better mind at leisure. Let this Moor Attend upon thee there, and when thou wilt, Follow thy fortunes — To Pelayo then Ile turn'd, and saying, All-too-long, O Prince, Hath this unlook'd-for conflict held thee here,— Ile bade his gallant men begin their march.

Flush'd with success, and in auspicious hour, The Mountaineers set forth. Blessings and prayers Pursued them at their parting, and the tears Which fell were tears of fervor, not of grief. The sun was verging to the western slope Of Heaven, but they till midnight travell'd on; Renewing then at early dawn their way, They held their unremitting course from morn Till latest eve, such urgent cause impell'd; And night had closed around, when to the vale Where Sella in her ampler bed receives Pionia's stream they came. Massive and black Pelayo's castle there was seen; its lines And battlements against the deep blue sky Distinct in solid darkness visible. No light is in the tower. Eager to know The worst, and with that fatal certainty To terminate intolerable dread, He spurr'd his courser forward. All his fears Too surely are fulfill'd, - for open stand The doors, and mournfully at times a dog Fills with his howling the deserted hall. A moment overcome with wretchedness, Silent Pelayo stood ! recovering then, Lord God, resign'd he cried, thy will be done !

XIV.

THE RESCUE.

COUNT, said Pelayo, Nature hath assign'd Two sovereign remedies for human grief;

Religion, surest, firmest, first and best, Strength to the weak, and to the wounded balm; And strenuous action next. Think not I came With unprovided heart. My noble wife, In the last solemn words, the last farewell With which she charged her secret messenger, Told me that whatsoe'er was my resolve, She bore a mind prepared. And well I know The evil, be it what it may, hath found In her a courage equal to the hour. Captivity, or death, or what worse pangs, She in her children may be doom'd to feel, Will never make that steady soul repent Its virtuous purpose. 1, too, did not cast My single life into the lot, but knew These dearer pledges on the die were set; And if the worst have fallen, I shall but bear That in my breast, which, with transfiguring power Of picty, makes chastening sorrow take The form of hope, and sees, in Death, the friend And the restoring Angel. We must rest Perforce, and wait what tidings night may bring, Haply of comfort. Ho, there ! kindle fires, And see if aught of hospitality Can yet within these mournful walls be found !

Thus while he spake, lights were descried far off Moving among the trees, and coming sounds Were heard as of a distant multitude. Anon a company of horse and foot, Advancing in disorderly array, Came up the vale; before them and beside Their torches flash'd on Sella's rippling stream; Now glean'd through chestnut groves, emerging now,

O'er their huge boughs and radiated leaves Cast broad and bright a transitory glare. That sight inspired with strength the mountaineers; All sense of weariness, all wish for rest At once were gone ; impatient in desire Of second victory alert they stood ; And when the hostile symbols, which from far Imagination to their wish had shaped, Vanish'd in nearer vision, high-wrought hope Departing, left the spirit pall'd and blank. No turban'd race, no sons of Africa Were they who now came winding up the vale, As waving wide before their horses' feet The torch-light floated, with its hovering glare Blackening the incumbent and surrounding night. Helmet and breastplate glitter'd as they came, And spears crect; and nearer as they drew Were the loose folds of female garments seen On those who led the company. Who then Had stood beside Pelayo, might have heard The beating of his heart.

But vainly there Songht he with wistful eye the well-known forms Beloved; and plainly night it now be seen, That from some bloody conflict they return'd Victorious, — for at every saddle-bow A gory head was hung. Anon, they stopp'd, Levelling, in quick alarm, their ready spears. Hold ! who goes there? cried one. A hundred tongues Sent forth with one accord the glad reply, Friends and Asturians. Onward moved the lights. ---The people knew their lord. Then what a shout Rung through the valley ! From their clay-built nests, Beneath the overbrowing battlements, Now first disturb'd, the affrighted martins flew, And uttering notes of terror short and shrill, Amid the yellow glare and lurid smoke Wheel'd giddily. Then plainly was it shown How well the vassals loved their generous lord, How like a father the Asturian Prince Was dear. They crowded round; they clasp'd his knees; They snatch'd his hand; they fell upon his neck, -They wept; - they blest Almighty Providence, Which had restored him thus from bondage free; God was with them and their good cause, they said; His hand was here. - His shield was over them, --His spirit was abroad, - His power displayed; And pointing to their bloody trophies then, They told Pelayo, there he might behold The first fruits of the harvest they should soon Reap in the field of war ! Benignantly, With voice, and look, and gesture, did the Prince To these warm greetings of tumultuous joy Respond; and sure, if at that moment aught Could for a while have overpower'd those fears Which, from the inmost heart, o'er all his frame Diffused their chilling influence, worthy pride, And sympathy of love, and joy, and hope, Had then possess'd him wholly. Even now His spirit rose; the sense of power, the sight Of his brave people, ready where he led To fight their country's battles, and the thought Of instant action, and deliverance, -If Heaven, which thus far had protected him, Should favor still, - revived his heart, and gave Fresh impulse to its spring. In vain he sought, Amid that turbulent greeting, to inquire Where Gaudiosa was, his children where, Who call'd them to the field, who captain'd them ; And how these women, thus with arms and death Environ'd, came amid their company; For yet, amid the fluctuating light And tumult of the crowd, he knew them not.

Guisla was one. The Moors had found in her A willing and concerted prisoner. Gladly to Gegio, to the renegade, On whom her loose and shameless love was bent, Had she set forth; and in her heart she curs'd The busy spirit, who, with powerful call Rousing Pelayo's people, led them on In quick pursual, and victoriously Achieved the rescue, to her mind perverse Unwelcome as unlook'd for. With dismay She recognized her brother, dreaded now More than he once was dear; her countenance Was turn'd toward him, - not with eager joy To court his sight, and meeting its first glance, Exchange delightful welcome, soul with soul : Hers was the conscious eye, that cannot choose

XIV.

But look to what it fears. She could not shun His presence, and the rigid smile constrain'd, With which she coldly dress'd her features, ill Conceal'd her inward thoughts, and the despite Of obstinate guilt and unrepentant shame. Sullenly thus, upon her mule she sat, Waiting the greeting which she did not dare Bring on. But who is she that, at her side, Upon a stately war-horse eminent, Holds the loose rein with careless hand ? A helm Presses the clusters of her flaxen hair : The shield is on her arm; her breast is mail'd; A sword-belt is her girdle, and right well It may be seen that sword hath done its work To-day, for upward from the wrist her sleeve Is stiff with blood. An unregardant eye, As one whose thoughts were not of earth, she cast Upon the turmoil round. One countenance So strongly mark'd, so passion-worn, was there, That it recall'd her mind. Ha! Maccabee! Lifting her arm, exultingly she cried, Did I not tell thee we should meet in joy? Well, Brother, hast thou done thy part, - 1, too, Have not been wanting ! Now be His the praise From whom the impulse came !

That startling call, That voice so well remember'd, touch'd the Goth With timely impulse now; for he had seen His Mother's face, - and at her sight, the past And present mingled like a frightful dream, Which from some dread reality derives Its deepest horror. Adosinda's voice Dispersed the waking vision. Little decm'd Rusilla, at that moment, that the child, For whom her supplications day and night Were offer'd, breathed the living air. Her heart Was calm; her placid countenance, though grief Deeper than time had left its traces there, Retain'd its dignity screne; yet, when Siverian, pressing through the people, kiss'd Her reverend hand, some quiet tears ran down. As she approach'd the Prince, the crowd made way Respectful. The maternal smile which bore Her greeting, from Pelayo's heart at once Dispell'd its boding. What he would have ask'd She knew, and bending from her palfrey down, Told him that they for whom he look'd were safe, And that in secret he should hear the rest.

XV.

RODERICK AT CANGAS.

How calmly gliding through the dark-blue sky The midnight Moon ascends! Her placid beams Through thinly-scatter'd leaves and boughs grotesque,

Mottle with mazy shades the orchard slope ; Here, o'er the chestnut's fretted foliage, gray And massy, motionless they spread ; here shine Upon the crags, deepening with blacker night Their chasms; and there the glittering argentry Ripples and glances on the confluent streams. A lovelier, purer light than that of day Rests on the hills; and oh, how awfully Into that deep and tranquil firmament The summits of Auseva rise serene ! The watchman on the battlements partakes The stillness of the solemn hour; he feels The silence of the earth, the endless sound Of flowing water soothes him, and the stars, Which in that brightest moonlight well nigh quench'd Scarce visible, as in the utmost depth Of yonder sapphire infinite, are seen, Draw on, with elevating influence, Toward eternity the attemper'd mind. Musing on worlds beyond the grave he stands, And to the Virgin Mother silently Prefers her hymn of praise. The mountaineers Before the eastle, round their mouldering fires, Lie on the hearth outstretch'd. Pelayo's hall Is full, and he upon his careful couch Hears all around the deep and long-drawn breath Of sleep ; for gentle night hath brought to these Perfect and undisturb'd repose, alike Of corporal powers and inward faculty. Wakeful the while he lay, yet more by hope Than grief or anxions thoughts possess'd, - though grief For Guisla's guilt, which freshen'd in his heart The memory of their wretched mother's crune, Still made its presence felt, like the dull sense Of some perpetual inward malady; And the whole peril of the future lay Before him clearly seen. He had heard all; How that unworthy sister, obstinate In wrong and shameless, rather seem'd to woo The upstart renegado than to wait His wooing; how, as guilt to guilt led on, Spurning at gentle admonition first, When Gaudiosa hopelessly forbore From further counsel, then in sullen mood Resentful, Guisla soon began to hate The virtuous presence before which she felt Her nature how inferior, and her fault How foul. Despiteful thus she grew, because Humbled, yet unrepentant. Who could say To what excess had passions might impel A woman thus possess'd? She could not fail To mark Siverian's absence, for what end Her conscience but too surely had divined: And Gaudiosa, well aware that all To the vile paramour was thus made known, Had to safe hiding-place, with timely fear, Removed her children. Well the event had proved How needful was that caution ; for at night She sought the mountain solitudes, and morn Beheld Numacian's soldiers at the gate. Vet did not sorrow in Pelayo's heart For this domestic shame prevail that hour, Nor gathering danger weigh his spirit down The anticipated meeting put to flight These painful thoughts: to-morrow will restore All whom his heart holds dear; his wife heloved, No longer now remember'd for regret, Is present to his soul with hope and joy;

His inward eye beholds Favila's form In opening youth robust, and Hermesind, His daughter, lovely as a budding rose; Their images beguile the hours of night, Till with the earliest morning he may seek Their secret hold.

The nightingale not yet Had ceased her song, nor had the early lark Her dewy nest forsaken, when the Prince Upward beside Pionia took his way Toward Auseva. Heavily to him, Impatient for the morrow's happiness, Long night had linger'd; but it seem'd more long To Roderiek's aching heart. He, too, had watch'd For dawn, and seen the earliest break of day, And heard its earliest sounds; and when the Prince Went forth, the melaneholy man was seen With pensive pace upon Pionia's side Wandering alone and slow. For he had left The wearying place of his unrest, that morn With its cold dews might bathe his throbbing brow, And with its breath allay the feverish heat That burnt within. Alas! the gales of morn Reach not the fever of a wounded heart! How shall he meet his Mother's eye, how make His secret known, and from that voice revered Obtain forgiveness, - all that he has now To ask, ere on the lap of earth in peace He lay his head resign'd? In silent prayer He supplicated Heaven to strengthen him Against that trying hour, there seeking aid Where all who seek shall find ; and thus his soul Received support, and gather'd fortitude, Never than now more needful, for the hour Was nigh. He saw Siverian drawing near, And with a dim but quick foreboding met The good old man; yet when he heard him say, My Lady sends to seek thee, like a knell To one expecting and prepared for death, But fearing the dread point that hastens ou, It smote his heart. He follow'd silently, And knit his suffering spirit to the proof.

He went resolved to tell his Mother all, Fall at her feet, and drinking the last dregs Of bitterness, receive the only good Earth had in store for him. Resolved for this He went; yet was it a relief to find That painful resolution must await A fitter season, when no eye but Heaven's Might witness to their mutual agony. Count Julian's daughter with Rusilla sat; Both had been weeping, both were pale, but calm. With head as for humility abased Roderick approach'd, and bending, on his breast He cross'd his humble arms. Rusilla rose In reverence to the priestly character, And with a mournful eye regarding him, Thus she began : - Good Father, I have heard From my old faithful servant and true friend, Thou didst reprove the inconsiderate tongue, That in the anguish of its spirit pour'd A curse upon my poor unhappy ehild. O Father Maecabee, this is a hard world, And hasty in its judgments! Time has been, 86

When not a tongue within the Pyrenees Dared whisper in dispraise of Roderick's name, Lest, if the conscious air had caught the sound, The vengeance of the honest multitude Should fall upon the traitorous head, or brand For life-long infamy the lying lips. Now, if a voice be raised in his behalf, 'Tis noted for a wonder, and the man Who utters the strange speech shall be admired For such excess of Christian charity. Thy Christian charity hath not been lost ; ---Father, I feel its virtue : --- it hath been Balm to my heart; --- with words and grateful tears, ---All that is left me now for gratitude, ---

I thank thee, and beseech thee in thy prayers That thou wilt still remember Roderick's name.

Roderick so long had to this hour look'd on, That when the actual point of trial came, Torpid and numb'd it found him; cold he grew, And as the vital spirits to the heart Retreated o'er his wither'd countenance, Deathy and damp, a whiter paleness spread. Unmoved the while, the inward feeling seenid, Even in such dull insensibility As gradual age brings on, or slow disease, Beneath whose progress lingering life survives The power of suffering. Wondering at himself, Yet gathering confidence, he raised his eyes, Then slowly shaking as he bent his head, O venerable Lady, he replied, If aught may comfort that unhappy soul, It must be thy compassion, and thy prayers. She whom he most hath wrong'd, she who alone On earth can grant forgiveness for his erime, She hath forgiven him; and thy blessing now Were all that he could ask, -- all that could bring Profit or eonsolation to his soul, If he hath been, as sure we may believe A penitent sincere.

Oh, had he lived,

Replied Rusilla, never penitence Had equall'd his! full well I know his heart, Vehement in all things. He would on himself Have wreak'd such penance as had reach'd the height Of fleshly suffering - yea, which being told With its portentous rigor should have made The memory of his fault, o'erpower'd and lost In shuddering pity and astonishment, Fade like a feebler horror. Otherwise Seem'd good to Heaven. I murmur not, nor doubt The boundless merey of redeeming love. For sure I trust that not in his offence Harden'd and reprobate was my lost son, A child of wrath, cut off! - that dreadful thought, Not even amid the first fresh wretchedness, When the ruin burst around me like a flood, Assail'd my soul. I ever deem'd his fall An act of sudden madness ; and this day Hath in unlook'd-for confirmation given A livelier hope, a more assured faith. Smiling benignant then amid her tears, She took Florinda by the hand, and said, xv.

I little thought that I should live to bless Count Julian's daughter! She hath brought to me The last, the best, the only comfort earth Could minister to this afflicted heart, And my gray hairs may now unto the grave Go down in peace.

Happy, Florinda cried, Are they for whom the grave hath peace in store ! The wrongs they have sustain'd, the woes they bear, Pass not that holy threshold, where Death heals The broken heart. O Lady, thou mayst trust In humble hope, through Him who on the Cross Gave his atoning blood for lost mankind, To meet beyond the grave thy child forgiven. 1 too with Roderick there may interchange Forgiveness. But the grief which wastes away This mortal frame, hastening the happy hour Of my enlargement, is but a light part Of what my soul endures ! - that grief hath lost Its sting :--- I have a keener sorrow here, ---One which, - but God forefend that dire event, -May pass with me the portals of the grave, And with a thought, like sin which cannot die, Imbitter Heaven. My father hath renounced His hope in Christ! It was his love for me Which drove him to perdition - I was born To ruin all who loved me, - all 1 loved ! Perhaps I sinn'd in leaving him; -- that fear Rises within me to disturb the peace Which 1 should else have found.

To Roderick then

The pious mourner turn'd her suppliant eyes: O Father, there is virtue in thy prayers! I do beseech thee offer them to Heaven In his behalf! For Roderick's sake, for mine, Wrestle with Him whose name is Merciful, That Julian may with penitence be touch'd, And clinging to the Cross, implore that grace Which ne'er was sought in vain. For Roderick's sake

And mine, pray for him! We have been the cause Of his offence! What other miseries May from that same unhappy source have risen, Are earthly, temporal, reparable all; — But if a soul be lost through our misdeeds, That were eternal evil! Pray for him, Good Father Maccabee, and be thy prayers More fervent, as the deeper is the crime.

While thus Florinda spake, the dog who lay Before Rusilla's feet, eyeing him long And wistfully, had recognized at length, Changed as he was and in those sordid weeds, His royal master. And he rose and lick'd His wither'd hand, and earnestly look'd up With eyes whose human meaning did not need The aid of speech ; and moan'd, as if at once To court and chide the long-withheld caress. A feeling uncommix'd with sense of guilt Or shame, yet painfulest, thrill'd through the King;

But he to self-control now long inured, Repress'd his rising heart, nor other tears, Full as his struggling bosom was, let fall Than seem'd to follow on Florinda's words. Looking toward her then, yet so that still He shunn'd the meeting of her eye, he said, Virtuous and pious as thou art, and ripe For Heaven, O Lady, I must think the man Hath not by his good Angel been cast off For whom thy supplications rise. The Lord, Whose justice doth in its unerring course Visit the children for the sire's offence, Shall He not in his boundless mercy hear The daughter's prayer, and for her sake restore The guilty parent? My soul shall with thine In earnest and continual duty join. — How deeply, how devoutly, He will know To whom the cry is raised !

Thus having said,

Deliberately, in self-possession still, Himself from that most painful interview Dispeeding, he withdrew. The watchful dog Follow'd his footsteps close. But he retired Into the thickest grove; there yielding way To his o'erburden'd nature, from all eyes Apart, he cast himself upon the ground, And threw his arms around the dog, and cried, While tears stream'd down, Thou, Theron, then hast known Thy poor lost master, - Theron, none but thou !

COVADONGA.

MEANTIME Pelayo up the vale pursued Eastward his way, before the sun had climb'd Auseva's brow, or shed his silvering beams Upon Europa's summit, where the snows Through all revolving seasons hold their seat. A happy man he went, his heart at rest, Of hope, and virtue, and affection full, To all exhilarating influences Of earth and heaven alive. With kindred joy He heard the lark, who from her airy height, On twinkling pinions poised, pour'd forth profuse, In thrilling sequence of exuberant song, As one whose joyous nature overflow'd With life and power, her rich and rapturous strain The early bee, buzzing along the way, From flower to flower, bore gladness on its wing To his rejoicing sense; and he pursued, With quicken'd eye alert, the frolic hare, Where from the green herb in her wanton path She brush'd away the dews. For he long time, Far from his home and from his native hills, Had dwelt in bondage ; and the mountain breeze, Which he had with the breath of infancy Inhaled, such impulse to his heart restored, As if the seasons had roll'd back, and life Enjoy'd a second spring.

Through fertile fields He went, by cots with pear-trees overbower'd, Or spreading to the sun their trellised vines : Through orchards now, and now by thymy banks, Where wooden hives in some warm nook were hid

XVI.

From wind and shower ; and now through shadowy paths,

Where hazels fringed Pionia's vocal stream ; Till where the loftier hills to narrower bound Confine the vale, he reach'd those huts remote, Which should hereafter to the noble line Of Soto origin and name impart ; A gallant lineage, long in fields of war And faithful chronicler's enduring page Blazon'd; but most by him illustrated, Avid of gold, yet greedier of renown, Whom not the spoils of Atabalipa Could satisfy insatiate, nor the fame Of that wide empire overthrown appease; But he to Florida's disastrous shores In evil hour his gallant comrades led, Through savage woods and swamps, and hostile tribes,

The Apalachian arrows, and the snares Of wilier foes, hunger, and thirst, and toil; Till from ambition's feverish dream the touch Of Death awoke him; and when he had seen The fruit of all his treasures, all his toil, Foresight, and long endurance, fade away, Earth to the restless one refusing rest, In the great river's midland bed he left His honor'd hones.

A mountain rivulet, Now calm and lovely in its summer course, Held by those huts its everlasting way Towards Pionia. They, whose flocks and herds Drink of its water, call it Deva. Here Pelayo southward up the ruder vale Traced it, his guide unerring. Amid heaps Of mountain wreck, on either side thrown high, The wide-spread traces of its wintry might, The tortuous channel wound ; o'er beds of sand Here silently it flows; here, from the rock Rebutted, curls and eddies; plunges here Precipitate; here roaring among crags, It leaps, and foams, and whirls, and hurries on. Gray alders here and bushy hazels hid The mossy side; their wreath'd and knotted feet, Bared by the current, now against its force Repaying the support they found, upheld The bank secure. Here, bending to the stream, The birch fantastic stretch'd its rugged trunk, Tall and erect from whence, as from their base, Each like a tree, its silver branches grew. The cherry here hung, for the birds of heaven, Its rosy frnit on high. The elder there Its purple berries o'er the water bent, Heavily hanging. Here, amid the brook, Gray as the stone to which it clung, half root, Half trunk, the young ash rises from the rock ; And there its parent lifts a lofty head, And spreads its graceful boughs; the passing wind With twinkling motion lifts the silent leaves, And shakes its rattling tufts.

Soon had the Prince Behind him left the farthest dwelling-place Of man; no fields of waving corn were here, Nor wicker storehouse for the autumnal grain, Vineyard, nor bowery fig, nor fruitful grove; Only the rocky vale, the mountain stream, Incumbent crags, and hills that over hills Arose on either hand, here hung with woods, Here rich with heath, that o'er some smooth ascent

Its purple glory spread, or golden gorse; Bare here, and striated with many a hue, Scored by the wintry rain; by torrents here Riven, and with overhanging rocks abrupt. Pelayo, npward as he east his eyes Where erags loose-hanging o'er the narrow pass Impended, there beheld his country's strength Insuperable, and in his heart rejoiced. Oh that the Mussulman were here, he cried, With all his myriads! While thy day endures, Moor! thou mayst lord it in the plains; but here Hath nature, for the free and brave, prepared A sanctuary, where no oppressor's power, No might of human tyranny, can pierce

The tears which started then sprang not alone From lofty thoughts of elevating joy; For love and admiration had their part, And virtuous pride. Here then thou hast retired, My Gaudiosa ! in his heart he said; Excellent woman ! ne'er was richer boon By fate benign to favor'd man indulged, Than when thou wert, before the face of Heaven, Given me to be my children's mother, brave And virtuous as thou art ! Here thou hast fled, Thou, who wert nursed in palaces, to dwell In rocks and mountain caves ! — The thought was proud,

Yet not without a sense of inmost pain; For never had Pelayo, till that hour, So deeply felt the force of solitude. High over head, the eagle soar'd serene, And the gray lizard, on the rocks below, Bask'd in the sun : no living creature else, In this remotest wilderness, was seen; Nor living voice was there, — only the flow Of Deva, and the rushing of its springs, Long in the distance heard, which nearer now, With endless reperenssion deep and loud, Throbb'd on the dizzy sense.

The ascending vale, Long straiten'd by the narrowing mountains, here Was closed. In front, a rock, abrupt and bare, Stood eminent, in height exceeding far All edifice of human power, by King, Or Caliph, or barbaric Sultan rear'd, Or mightier tyrants of the world of old, Assyrian or Egyptian, in their pride; Yet, far above, beyond the reach of sight, Swell after swell, the heathery mountain rose Here, in two sources, from the living rock The everlasting springs of Deva gush'd. Upon a smooth and grassy plat below, By nature there, as for an altar, dress'd, They join'd their sister stream, which from the earth Well'd silently. In such a seene, rude man, With pardonable error, might have knelt, Feeling a present Deity, and made His offering to the fountain Nymph devout

XVI.

The arching rock disclosed, above the springs, A cave, where hugest son of giant birth, That e'er of old in forest of romance 'Gainst knights and ladies waged discourteous war, Erect within the portal, might have stood. The broken stone allow'd for hand and foot No difficult ascent, above the base In height a tall man's stature, measured thrice. No holier spot than Covadonga Spain Boasts in her wide extent, though all her realms Be with the noblest blood of martyrdom, In elder or in later days, enrich'd, And glorified with tales of heavenly aid By many a miracle made manifest; Nor in the heroic annals of her fame Doth she show forth a scene of more renown. Then, save the hunter, drawn in keen pursuit Beyond his wonted hannts, or shepherd's boy, Following the pleasure of his straggling flock, None knew the place.

Pelayo, when he saw Those glittering sources and their sacred cave, Took from his side the bugle, silver-tipt, And with a breath long drawn, and slow expired, Sent forth that strain, which, echoing from the walls *

Of Cangas, wont to tell his glad return When from the chase he came. At the first sound Favila started in the cave, and cried, My father's horn !- A sudden flush suffused Hermesind's cheek, and she with quicken'd eye Look'd eager to her mother silently; But Gaudiosa trembled and grew pale, Doubting her sense deceived. A second time The bugle breathed its well-known notes abroad; And Hermesind around her mother's neek Threw her white arms, and earnestly exclaim'd, 'Tis he !- But when a third and broader blast Rung in the echoing archway, ne'er did wand, With magic power endued, call up a sight So strange, as sure in that wild solitude It seem'd, when from the bowels of the rock The mother and her children hastened forth; She in the sober charms and dignity Of womanhood mature, nor verging yet Upon decay; in gesture like a Queen, Such inborn and habitual majesty Ennobled all her steps - or Priestess, chosen Because within such faultless work of Heaven Inspiring Deity might seem to make Its habitation known,-Favila such In form and stature as the Sea Nymph's son, When that wise Centaur from his cave well pleased Beheld the boy divine his growing strength Against some shaggy lionet essay, And fixing in the half-grown mane his hands, Roll with him in fierce dalliance intertwined. But like a creature of some higher sphere Ilis sister came ; she scarcely touch'd the rock, So light was Hermesind's adrial speed. Beauty, and grace, and innocence in her In heavenly union shone. One who had held The faith of elder Greece, would sure have thought She was some glorious nymph of seed divine, Oread or Dryad, of Diana's train The youngest and the loveliest: yea, she seem'd Angel, or soul beatified, from realms Of bliss, on errand of parental love, To earth re-sent, — if tears and trembling limbs With such celestial natures might consist.

Embraced by all, in turn embracing each, The husband and the father for a while Forgot his country and all things beside : Life hath few moments of such pure delight, Such foretaste of the perfect joy of Heaven. And when the thought recurr'd of sufferings past, Perils which threaten'd still, and arduous toil Yet to be undergone, remember'd griefs Heighten'd the present happiness; and hope Upon the shadows of futurity Shone like the sun upon the morning mists, When driven before his rising rays they roll, And melt, and leave the prospect bright and clear.

When now Pelayo's eyes had drank their fill Of love from those dear faces, he went up To view the hiding-place. Spacions it was As that Sicilian cavern in the hill, Wherein earth-shaking Neptune's giant son Duly at eve was wont to fold his flock, Ere the wise Ithacan, over that brute force By wiles prevailing, for a life-long night Seel'd his broad eye. The healthful air had here Free entrance, and the cheerful light of heaven; But at the end, an opening in the floor Of rock disclosed a wider vault below, Which never sunbeam visited, nor breath Of vivifying morning came to cheer. No light was there but that which from above In dim reflection fell, or found its way, Broken and quivering, through the glassy stream, Where through the rock it gush'd. That shadowy light Sufficed to show, where from their secret bed The waters issued; with whose rapid course, And with whose everlasting cataracts Such motion to the chill, damp atmosphere Was given, as if the solid walls of rock

Were shaken with the sound.

Glad to respire The upper air, Pelayo hasten'd back From that drear den. Look! Hermesind exclaim'd, Taking her father's hand; thon hast not seen My chamber : - See ! - did ever ringdove choose In so secure a nook her hiding-place, Or build a warmer nest? 'Tis fragrant too, As warm, and not more sweet than soft; for thyme And myrtle with the elastic heath are laid, And, over all, this dry and pillowy moss, -Smiling she spake. Pelayo kiss'd the child, And, sighing, said within himself, I trust In Heaven, whene'er thy May of life is come, Sweet bird, that thou shalt have a blither bower! Fitlier, he thought, such chamber might beseem Some hermit of Hilarion's school austere, Or old Antonius, he who from the hell

XVI.

Of his bewilder'd phantasy saw fiends In actual vision, a foul throng grotesque Of all horrific shapes and forms obscene Crowd in broad day before his open eyes. That feeling cast a momentary shade Of sadness o'er his soul. But deeper thoughts, If he might have foreseen the things to come, Would there have fill'd him; for within that cave

His own remains were one day doom'd to find Their final place of rest; and in that spot, Where that dear child with innocent delight Had spread her mossy couch, the sepulchre Shall in the consecrated rock be hewn, Where with Alphonso, her beloved lord, Laid side by side, must Hermesind partake The everlasting marriage-bed, when he, Leaving a name perdurable on earth, Hath changed his earthly for a heavenly crown. Dear child, upon that fated spot she stood, In all the beauty of her opening youth, In health's rich bloom, in virgin innocence, While her eyes sparkled and her heart o'erflow'd With pure and perfect joy of filial love.

Many a slow century since that day hath fill'd Its course, and countless multitudes have trod With pilgrim feet that consecrated cave; Yet not in all those ages, amid all The untold concourse, hath one breast been swollen With such emotions as Pelayo felt That hour. O Gaudiosa, he exclaim'd, And thou couldst seek for shelter here, amid This awful solitude, in mountain caves ! Thou noble spirit! Oh, when hearts like thine Grow on this sacred soil, would it not be In me, thy husband, double infamy, And tenfold guilt, if I despair'd of Spain? In all her visitations, favoring Heaven Hath left her still the unconquerable mind; And thus being worthy of redemption, sure ls she to be redeem'd.

Beholding her Through tears he spake, and press'd upon her lips A kiss of deepest love. Think ever thus, She answer'd, and that faith will give the power In which it trusts. When to this mountain hold

These children, thy dear images, I brought, I said within myself, Where should they fly But to the bosom of their native hills? I brought them here as to a sanctuary,

- Where, for the temple's sake, the indwelling God
- Would guard his supplicants. O my dear Lord, Proud as I was to know that they were thine,

Was it a sin if I almost believed, That Spain, her destiny being link'd with theirs,

Must save the precious charge ? So let us think,

The chief replied, so feel, and teach, and act. Spain is our common parent: let the sons Be to the parent true, and in her strength And Heaven, their sure deliverance they will find.

RODERICK AND SIVERIAN.

O HOLLEST Mary, Maid and Mother ! thou In Covadonga, at thy rocky shrine, Hast witness'd whatsoe'er of human bliss Heart can conceive most perfect! Faithful love, Long cross'd by envious stars, hath there attain d Its crown, in endless matrimony given; The youthful mother there hath to the font Her first-born borne, and there, with deeper sense Of gratitude for that dear babe redeem'd From threatening death, return'd to pay her vows. But ne'er on nuptial, nor baptismal day, Nor from their grateful pilgrimage discharged, Did happier group their way down Deva's vale Rejoicing hold, than this blest family, O'er whom the mighty Spirit of the Land Spread his protecting wings. The children, free In youthhead's happy season from all cares That might disturb the hour, yet capable Of that intense and unalloyed delight Which childhood feels when it enjoys again The dear parental presence long deprived ; Nor were the parents now less bless'd than they, Even to the height of human happiness; For Gaudiosa and her Lord that hour Let no misgiving thoughts intrude : she fix'd Her hopes on him, and his were fix'd on Heaven, And hope in that courageous heart derived Such rooted strength and confidence assured In righteousness, that 'twas to him like faith ----An everlasting sunshine of the soul, Illumining and quickening all its powers.

But on Pionia's side meantime a heart As generous, and as full of noble thoughts, Lay stricken with the deadliest bolts of grief. Upon a smooth gray stone sat Roderick there; The wind above him stirr'd the hazel boughs, And murmuring at his feet the river ran. He sat with folded arms and head declined Upon his breast, feeding on bitter thoughts, Till nature gave him in the exhausted sense Of woe a respite something like repose; And then the quiet sound of gentle winds And waters with their lulling consonance Beguiled him of himself. Of all within Oblivious there he sat, sentient alone Of outward nature, - of the whispering leaves That soothed his ear, - the genial breath of Heaven That fann'd his eheek, - the stream's perpetual flow, That, with its shadows and its glancing lights, Dimples and thread-like motions infinite, Forever varying and yet still the same, Like time toward eternity, ran by. Resting his head upon his master's knees, Upon the bank beside him Theron lay. What matters change of state and circumstance, Or lapse of years, with all their dread events, To him? What matters it that Roderick wears The crown no longer, nor the sceptre wields? ---It is the dear-loved hand, whose friendly touch Had flatter'd him so oft; it is the voice, At whose glad summons to the field so oft From slumber he had started, shaking off Dreams of the chase, to share the actual joy; The eye, whose recognition he was wont To watch and welcome with exultant tongue.

A coming step, unheard by Roderick, roused His watchful ear, and turning he beheld Siverian. Father, said the good old man, As Theron rose and fawn'd about his knees, Hast thou some charm, which draws about thee thus The hearts of all our house, -even to the beast That lacks discourse of reason, but too oft, With uncorrupted feeling and dumb faith, Puts lordly man to shame? - The king replied, 'Tis that mysterious sense by which mankind To fix their friendships and their loves are led, And which with fainter influence doth extend To such poor things as this. As we put off The cares and passions of this fretful world, It may be too that we thus far approach To elder nature, and regain in part The privilege through sin in Eden lost. The timid hare soon learns that she may trust The solitary penitent, and birds Will light upon the hermit's harmless hand.

Thus Roderick answer'd in excursive speech, Thinking to draw the old man's mind from what Might touch him else too nearly, and himself Disposed to follow on the lure he threw, As one whom such imaginations led Out of the world of his own miseries. But to regardless ears his words were given, For on the dog Siverian gazed the while, * Pursuing his own thoughts. Thou hast not felt, Exclaim'd the old man, the earthquake and the storm; The kingdom's overthrow, the wreck of Spain, The ruin of thy royal master's house, Have reach'd not thee ! - Then turning to the King, When the destroying enemy drew nigh Toledo, he continued, and we fled Before their fury, even while her grief Was fresh, my Mistress would not leave behind This faithful creature. Well we knew she thought Of Roderick then, although she named him not; For never since the fatal certainty Fell on us all, hath that unhappy name, Save in her prayers, been known to pass her lips Before this day. She names him now, and weeps; But now her tears are tears of thankfulness ; For blessed hath thy coming been to her And all who loved the King. His faltering voice Here fail'd him, and he paused : recovering soon,

When that poor injured Lady, he pursued, Did in my presence to the Prince absolve The unhappy King —

Absolve him! Roderick cried, And in that strong emotion turn'd his face Sternly toward Siverian, for the sense Of shame and self-reproach drove from his mind All other thoughts. The good old man replied, Of human judgments humanly I speak. Who knows not what Pelayo's life hath been ? Not happier in all dear domestic ties, Than worthy for his virtue of the bliss Which is that virtue's fruit; and yet did he Absolve, upon Florinda's tale, the King. Siverian, thus he said, what most I hoped, And still within my secret heart believed, ls now made certain. Roderick hath been More sinn'd against than sinning. And with that He clasp'd his hands, and, lifting them to Heaven, Cried, Would to God that he were yet alive ! For not more gladly did I draw my sword Against Witiza in our common cause, Than I would fight beneath his banners now, And vindicate his name !

Did he say this? The Prince? Pelayo? in astonishment Roderick exclaim'd.— He said it, quoth the old man.

None better knew his kinsman's noble heart, None loved him better, none bewail'd him more : And as he felt, like me, for his reproach A deeper grief than for his death, even so He cherish'd in his heart the constant thought Something was yet untold, which, being known, Would palliate his offence, and make the fall Of one, till then, so excellently good, Less monstrons, less revolting to belief, More to be pitied, more to be forgiven.

While thus he spake, the fallen King felt his face Burn, and his blood flow fast. Down, guilty thoughts ! Frmly he said within his soul; lie still, Thou heart of flesh ! I thought thou hadst been quell'd, And quell'd thou shalt be ! Help me, O my God, That I may crucify this inward foe ! Yea, thou hast help'd me, Father ! I am strong, O Savior, in thy strength. As he breath'd thus His inward supplications, the old man Eyed him with frequent and unsteady looks. He had a secret trembling on his lips, And hesitated, still irresolute In utterance to imbody the dear hope : Fain would he have it strengthen'd and assured By this concording jndgment, yet he fear'd To have it chill'd in cold accoil. At length Venturing, he brake with interrupted speech The troubled silence. Father Maccabee, I cannot rest till I have laid my heart Open before thee. When Pelayo wish'd That his poor kinsman were alive to rear His banner once again, a sudden thought ---A hope — a fancy — what shall it be call'd? Possess'd me, that perhaps the wish might see Its glad accomplishment, - that Roderick lived, And might in glory take the field once more For Spain. - I see thou startest at the thought ' Yet spurn it not with hasty nubelief,

XVII

As though 'twere utterly beyond the scope Of possible contingency. I think That I have calmly satisfied myself How this is more than idle faney, more Than mere imaginations of a mind Which from its wishes builds a baseless faith. His horse, his royal robe, his horned helm, His mail and sword were found upon the field; But if King Roderick had in battle fallen, That sword, I know, would only have been found Clinch'd in the hand which, living, knew so well To wield the dreadful steel ! Not in the throng Confounded, nor amid the torpid stream, Opening with ignominious arms a way For flight, would he have perish'd! Where the strife Was hottest, ring'd about with slaughter'd foes,

Should Roderick have been found: by this sure mark

Ye should have known him, if nought else remain'd,

That his whole body had been gored with wounds, And quill'd with spears, as if the Moors had felt That in his single life the victory lay, More than in all the host!

Siverian's eyes Shone with a youthful ardor while he spake ; His gathering brow grew stern; and as he raised His arm, a warrior's impulse character'd The impassion'd gesture. But the King was calm, And heard him with unchanging countenance; For he had taken his resolve, and felt Once more the peace of God within his soul, As in that hour when by his father's grave He knelt before Pelayo.

Soon the old man Pursued in calmer tones - Thus much I dare Believe, that Roderiek fell not on that day When treason brought about his overthrow. If yet he live, for sure I think I know His noble mind, 'tis in some wilderness, Where, in some savage den inhumed, he drags The weary load of life, and on his flesh, As on a mortal enemy, inflicts Fierce vengeance with immitigable hand. Oh that I knew but where to bend my way In his dear search ! my voice perhaps might reach His heart, might reconcile him to himself, Restore him to his mother ere she dies, His people and his country : with the sword, Them and his own good name should he redeem. Oh might I but behold him once again Leading to battle these intrepid bands, Such as he was, - yea, rising from his fall More glorious, more beloved! Soon, 1 believe, Joy would accomplish then what grief hath fail'd To do with this old heart, and I should die Clasping his knees with such intense delight, That when I woke in Heaven, even Heaven itself

Could have no higher happiness in store.

Thus fervently he spake, and copious tears Ran down his checks. Full oft the Royal Goth, Since he came forth again among markind, Had trembled lest some curions eye should read His lineaments too closely; now he long'd To fall upon the neck of that old man, And give his full heart utterance. But the sense Of duty, by the pride of self-control Corroborate, made him steadily repress His yearning nature. Whether Roderick live, Paying in penitence the bitter price Of sin, he answered, or if earth hath given Rest to his earthly part, is only known To him and Heaven. Dead is he to the world; And let not these imaginations rob His soul of thy continual prayers, whose aid Too surely, in whatever world, he needs. The faithful love that mitigates his fault, Heavenward address'd, may mitigate his doom. Living or dead, old man, be sure his soul, -It were unworthy else, - doth hold with thine Entire communion : Doubt not he relies Firmly on thee, as on a father's love, Counts on thy offices, and joins with thee In sympathy and fervent act of faith, Though regions, or though worlds, should intervene.

Lost as he is, to Roderick this must be Thy first, best, dearest duty; next must be To hold right onward in that noble path, Which he would counsel, could his voice be heard. Now therefore aid me, while I call upon The Leaders and the People, that this day We may acclaim Pelayo for our King.

XVIII.

THE ACCLAMATION.

Now, when from Covadonga, down the vale Holding his way, the princely mountaineer Came with that happy family in sight Of Cangas and his native towers, far off He saw before the gate, in fair array, The assembled land. Broad banners were display'd, And spears were sparkling to the sun; shields shone, And helmets glitter'd, and the blaring horn, With frequent sally of impatient joy, Provoked the echoes round. Well he areeds, From yonder ensigns and augmented force,

That Odoar and the Primate from the west Have brought their aid; but wherefore all were thus Instructed as for some great festival, He found not, till Favila's quicker eye Catching the ready buckler, the glad boy Leap'd up, and clapping his exultant hands, Shouted, King! King! my father shall be King This day! Pelayo started at the word, And the first thought which smote him brought a sigh For Roderick's fall; the second was of hope, Deliverance for his country, for himself Enduring fame, and glory for his line.

That high prophetic forethought gather'd strength,

XVII.

As looking to his honor'd mate, he read Her sonl's accordant augury; her eyes Brighten'd; the quicken'd action of the blood Tinged with a deeper hue her glowing check, And on her lips there sat a smile which spake The honorable pride of perfect love, Rejoicing, for her husband's sake, to share The lot he chose, the perils he defied, The lofty fortune which their faith foresaw.

Roderick, in front of all the assembled troops, Held the broad buckler, following to the end That steady purpose to the which his zeal Had this day wrought the Chiefs. Tall as himself, Erect it stood beside him, and his hands Hung resting on the rim. This was an hour That sweeten'd life, repaid and recompensed All losses; and although it could not heal All griefs, yet laid them for a while to rest. The active, agitating joy that fill'd The vale, that with contagious influence spread Through all the exulting mountaineers, that gave New ardor to all spirits, to all breasts Inspired fresh impulse of excited hope, Moved every tongue, and strengthen'd every limb, -That joy which every man reflected saw From every face of all the multitude, And heard in every voice, in every sound, Reach'd not the King. Aloof from sympathy, He from the solitude of his own soul Beheld the busy scene. None shared or knew His deep and incommunicable joy; None but that heavenly Father, who alone

Beholds the struggles of the heart, alone Sees and rewards the secret sacrifice.

Among the chiefs conspicuous, Urban stood, He whom, with well-weigh'd choice, in arduous time,

To arduous office the consenting Church Had call'd when Sindered, fear-smitten, fled; Unfaithful shepherd, who for life alone Solicitous, forsook his flock, when most In peril and in suffering they required A pastor's care. Far off at Rome he dwells In ignominious safety, while the Church Keeps in her annals the deserter's name, But from the service, which with daily zeal Devout her ancient prelacy recalls, Blots it, unworthy to partake her prayers. Urban, to that high station thus being eall'd, From whence disanimating fear had driven The former primate, for the general weal Consulting first, removed with timely care The relics and the written works of Saints, Toledo's choicest treasure, prized beyond All wealth, their living and their dead remains; These to the mountain fastnesses he bore Of unsubdued Cantabria, there deposed, One day to be the boast of yet unbuilt Oviedo, and the dear idolatry Of multitudes unborn. To things of state Then giving thought mature, he held advice With Odoar, whom of counsel competent

And firm of heart he knew. What then they plann'd,

Time and the course of overruled events To earlier act had ripen'd, than their hope Had ever in its gladdest dream proposed; And here by agents unforeseen, and means Beyond the scope of foresight brought about, This day they saw their dearest heart's desire Accorded them; all-able Providence Thus having ordered all, that Spain this hour With happiest omens, and on surest base, Should from its ruins rear again her throne.

For aeclamation and for sacring now One form must serve, more solemn for the breach Of old observances, whose absence here Deeplier impress'd the heart, than all display Of regal pomp and wealth pontifical, Of vestments radiant with their gems, and stiff With ornature of gold; the glittering train, The long procession, and the full-voieed choir. This day the forms of piety and war In strange but fitting union must combine. Not in his alb, and cope, and orary, Came Urban now, nor wore he mitre here, Precious or auriphrygiate; bare of head He stood, all else in arms complete, and o'er His gorget's iron rings the pall was thrown Of wool undyed, which on the Apostle's tomb Gregory had laid, and sanctified with prayer; That from the living Pontiff and the dead, Replete with holiness, it might impart Doubly derived its grace. One Page beside Bore his broad-shadow'd helm; another's hand Held the long spear, more suited in these times For Urban, than the crosier richly wrought With silver foliature, the elaborate work Of Grecian or Italian artist, train'd In the eastern capital, or sacred Rome, Still o'er the west predominant, though fallen. Better the spear befits the shepherd's hand When robbers break the fold. Now he had laid The weapon by, and held a natural cross Of rudest form, unpeel'd, even as it grew On the near oak that morn.

Mutilate alike

Of royal rites was this solemnity. Where was the rubied crown, the sceptre where, And where the golden pome, the proud array Of ermines, aureate vests, and jewelry, With all which Leuvigild for after kings Left, ostentatious of his power? The Moor Had made his spoil of these, and on the field Of Xeres, where contending multitudes Had trampled it beneath their bloody feet, The standard of the Goths forgotten lay Defiled, and rotting there in sun and rain. Utterly is it lost; nor evermore Herald or antiquary's patient search Shall from forgetfulness avail to save Those blazon'd arms, so fatally of old Renown'd through all the affrighted Occident. That banner, before which imperial Rome First to a conqueror bow'd her head abased; Which when the dreadful Hun, with all his powers,

689

Came like a deluge rolling o'er the world, Made head, and in the front of battle broke His force, till then resistless; which so oft Had with alternate fortune braved the Frank; Driven the Byzantine from the farthest shores Of Spain, long lingering there, to final flight; And of their kingdoms and their name despoil'd The Vandal, and the Alan, and the Sueve; Blotted from human records is it now As it had never been. So let it rest With things forgotten ! But Oblivion ne'er Shall cancel from the historic roll, nor Time, Who changeth all, obscure that fated sign, Which brighter now than mountain snows at noon To the bright sun displays its argent field.

Rose not the vision then upon thy soul, O Roderick, when within that argent field Thou saw'st the rampant Lion, red as if Upon some noblest quarry he had roll'd, Rejoicing in his satiate rage, and drunk With blood and fury? Did the auguries Which open'd on thy spirit bring with them A perilous consolation, deadening heart And soul, yea, worse than death — that thou through all Thy checker'd way of life, evil and good, Thy errors and thy virtues, hadst but been The poor, mere instrument of things ordain'd, ---Doing or suffering, impotent alike To will or act, - perpetually bemock'd With semblance of volition, yet in all Blind worker of the ways of destiny ! That thought intolerable, which in the hour Of woe indignant conscience had repell'd, As little might it find reception now, When the regenerate spirit self-approved Beheld its sacrifice complete. With faith Elate, he saw the banner'd Lion float Refulgent, and recall'd that thrilling shout Which he had heard when on Romano's grave The joy of victory woke him from his dream, And sent him with prophetic hope to work Fulfilment of the great events ordain'd, There in imagination's inner world Prefigured to his soul.

Alone, advanced Before the ranks, the Goth in silence stood, While from all voices round, loquacious joy Mingled its buzz continuous with the blast Of horn, shrill pipe, and tinkling cymbals' clash, And sound of deafening drum. But when the Prince Drew nigh, and Urban, with the Cross upheld, Stepp'd forth to meet him, all at once were still'd With instantaneous hush; as when the wind, Before whose violent gusts the forest oaks, Tossing like billows their tempestuous heads, Roar like a raging sea, suspends its force, And leaves so dead a calm that not a leaf Moves on the silent spray. The passing air Bore with it from the woodland undisturb'd The ringdove's wooing, and the quiet voice Of waters warbling near.

> Son of a race 87

Of Heroes and of Kings! the Primate thus Address'd him, Thou in whom the Gothie blood, Mingling with old Iberia's, hath restored To Spain a ruler of her native line, Stand forth, and in the face of God and man Swear to uphold the right, abate the wrong, With equitable hand, protect the Cross Whereon thy lips this day shall seal their vow, And underneath that hallow'd symbol, wage Holy and inextinguishable war Against the accursëd nation that usurps Thy country's sacred soil !

So speak of me Now and forever, O my countrymen! Replied Pelayo; and so deal with me Here and hereafter, thou Almighty God, In whom I put my trust!

Lord God of Hosts,

Urban pursued, of Angels and of Men Creator and Disposer, King of Kings, Ruler of Earth and Heaven, - look down this day, And multiply thy blessings on the head Of this thy servant, chosen in thy sight! Be thou his counsellor, his comforter, His hope, his joy, his refuge, and his strength; Crown him with justice, and with fortitude ; Defend him with thine all-sufficient shield ; Surround him every where with the right hand Of thine all-present power, and with the might Of thine omnipotence; send in his aid Thy unseen Angels forth, that potently And royally against all enemies He may endure and trinmph! Bless the land O'er which he is appointed; bless thou it With the waters of the firmament, the springs Of the low-lying deep, the fruits which Sun And Moon mature for man, the precious stores Of the eternal hills, and all the gifts Of Earth, its wealth and fulness!

Then he took

Pelayo's hand, and on his finger placed The mystic circlet. — With this ring, O Prince, To our dear Spain, who like a widow now Mourneth in desolation, I thee wed · For weal or woe thon takest her, till death Dispart the union. Be it blest to her, To thee, and to thy seed !

Thus when he ceased, He gave the awaited signal. Roderick brought The buckler : Eight for strength and stature chosen Came to their honor'd office : Round the shield Standing, they lower it for the Chieftain's feet, Then, slowly raised upon their shoulders, lift The steady weight. Erect Pelayo stands, And thrice he brandishes the burnish'd sword, While Urhan to the assembled people cries, Spaniards, behold your King ! The multitude Then sent forth all their voice with glad aeclaim, Raising the loud Real; thrice did the word Ring through the air, and echo from the walls Of Cangas. Far and wide the thundering shout, Rolling among reduplicating rocks, Peal'd o'er the hills, and up the mountain vales. The wild ass starting in the forest glade Ran to the covert; the affrighted wolf

Skulk'd through the thicket to a closer brake; The sluggish bear, awakened in his den, Roused uo and answer'd with a sullen growl, Low-breathed and long; and at the uproar scared, The brooding eagle from her nest took wing.

Heroes and Chiefs of old ! and ye who bore Firm to the last your part in that dread strife, When Julian and Witiza's viler race Betray'd their country, hear ye from yon Heaven The joyful acclamation which proclaims That Spain is born again ! O ye who died In that disastrous field, and ye who fell Embracing with a martyr's love your death Amid the flames of Auria; and all ye Victims innumerable, whose cries unheard On earth, but heard in Heaven, from all the land Went up for vengeance ; not in vain ye cry Before the eternal throne ! - Rest, innocent blood ! Vengeance is due, and vengeance will be given. Rest, innocent blood? The appointed age is come ! [there The star that harbingers a glorious day Hath risen! Lo, there the Avenger stands! Lo, He brandishes the avenging sword ! Lo, there The avenging banner spreads its argent field Refulgent with auspicious light ! - Rejoice, O Leon, for thy banner is displayed ; Rejoice with all thy mountains, and thy vales And streams! And thou, O Spain, through all thy realms.

For thy deliverance cometh! Even now, As from all sides the miscreant hosts move on; — From southern Betis; from the western lands, Where through redundant vales smooth Minho flows,

And Douro pours through vine-clad hills the wealth Of Leon's gathered waters ; from the plains Burgensian, in old time Vardulia call'd, But in their castellated strength erelong To be design'd Castille, a deathless name ; From midland regions where Toledo reigns Proud city on her royal eminence, And Tagus bends his sickle round the scene Of Roderick's fall; from rich Rioja's fields; Dark Ebro's shores ; the walls of Salduba, Seat of the Sedetanians old, by Rome Cæsarian and August denominate, Now Zaragoza, in this later time Above all cities of the earth renown'd For duty perfectly perform'd ; - East, West, And South, where'er their gather'd multitudes, Urged by the speed of vigorous tyranny, With more than with commeasurable strength llaste to prevent the danger, crush the hopes Of rising Spain, and rivet round her neck The eternal yoke, - the ravenous fowls of heaven Flock there presentient of their food obscene, Following the accursed armies, whom too well They know their purveyors long. Pursue their march,

Ominous attendants! Ere the moon hath fill'd Her horns, these purveyors shall become the prey, And ye on Moorish, not on Christian flesh Wearying your beaks, shall clog your scaly feet With foreign gore. Soon will ye learn to know, Followers and harbingers of blood, the flag Of Leon where it bids you to your feast ! Terror and flight shall with that flag go forth, And Havock and the Dogs of War and Death Thou Covadonga with the tainted stream Of Deva, and this now rejoicing vale, Soon its primitial triumphs wilt behold! Nor shall the glories of the noon be less Than such miraculous promise of the dawn Witness Clavijo, where the dreadful cry Of Santiago, then first heard o'erpower'd The Akbar, and that holier name blaspheme. By misbelieving lips ! Simancas, thou Be witness ! And do ye your record bear, Tolosan mountains, where the Almohade Beheld his myriads scatter'd and destroy'd, Like locusts swept before the stormy North ! Thou too, Salado, on that later day When Africa received her final foil, And thy swollen stream incarnadined, roll'd back The invaders to the deep, - there shall they toss Till, on their native Mauritanian shore, The waves shall east their bones to whiten there.

RODERICK AND RUSILLA.

WHEN all had been perform'd, the royal Goth Look'd up towards the chamber in the tower, Where, gazing on the multitude below, Alone Rusilla stood. He met her eye, For it was singling him amid the crowd; Obeying then the hand which beckon'd him, He went with heart prepared, nor shrinking now, But arm'd with self-approving thoughts that hour. Entering in tremulous haste, he closed the door, And turn'd to clasp her knees; but lo, she spread Her arms, and catching him in close embrace, Fell on his neck, and cried, My Son, my Son ! -Erelong, controlling that first agony With effort of strong will, backward she bent, And gazing on his head, now shorn and gray, And on his furrow'd countenance, exclaim'd, Still, still my Roderick ! the same noble mind ! The same heroic heart ! Still, still my Son !-Changed, - yet not wholly fallen, - not wholly lost,

He cried, — not wholly in the sight of Heaven Unworthy, O my Mother, nor in thine ! She lock'd her arms again around his neck, Saying, Lord, let me now depart in peace ! And bow'd her head again, and silently Gave way to tears.

When that first force was spent, And passion in exhaustment found relief, — I knew thee, said Rusilla, when the dog Rose from my feet, and lick'd his master's hand. All flash'd upon me then; the instinctive sense That goes unerringly where reason fails, --The voice, the eye, --a mother's thoughts are quick, --Miraculous as it seem'd, -- Siverian's tale, --

XIX. Florinda's, -every action, -every word, -Whatever there is given us to enjoy, Each strengthening each, and all confirming all, That we enjoy forever, still the same. -Reveal'd thee, O my Son ! but I restrain'd Much might Count Julian's sword achieve for My heart, and yielded to thy holier will Spain And me, but more will his dear daughter's soul The thoughts which rose to tempt a soul net yet Effect in Heaven; and soon will she be there, Wean'd wholly from the world. What thoughts ? replied An Angel at the throne of Grace, to plead Roderick. That I might see thee yet again In his behalf and mine. Such as thon wert, she answer'd; not alone 1 knew thy heart, 'To Heaven and me restored, but to thyself,-She answer'd, and subdued the vain desire. Thy Crown, - thy Country, - all within thy It was the World's last effort. Thou hast chosen The better part. Yes, Roderick, even on earth reach; Heaven so disposing all things, that the means There is a praise above the monarch's fame, Which wrought the ill, might work the remedy. A higher, holier, more enduring praise, Methought I saw thee once again the hope, -And this will yet be thine ! The strength, - the pride of Spain ! What but this, With every breath of good or ill report, Fallen as I am, have I to offer Heaven? > THE times are big with tidings; every hour From east, and west, and south, the breathless scouts

Bring swift alarums in; the gathering foe, Advancing from all quarters to one point, Close their wide crescent. Nor was aid of fear To magnify their numbers needed now ; They came in myriads. Africa had pour'd Fresh shoals upon the coast of wretched Spain; Lured from their hungry deserts to the scene Of spoil, like vultures to the battle-field, Fierce, unrelenting, habited in erimes, Like bidden guests the mirthful ruffians flock

Time enters not, nor Mutability; Beauty and goodness are unfading there ;

The thoughts of royalty ! Time might renew

Might prove my strength regenerate ; but the hour,

My soul was born again through grace, this heart

Died to the world. Dreams such as thine pass now

How soon they fade, how fast the night shuts in.

But in that World to which my hopes look on,

Their growth, as for Manoah's captive son,

And I too on the miscreant race, like him,

Like evening clouds before me; if I think

How beautiful they seem, 'tis but to feel

When, in its second best nativity,

To that free feast which in their Prophet's name Rapine and Lust proclaim'd. Nor were the chiefs Of victory less assured, by long success Elate, and proud of that o'erwhelming strength, Which, surely they believed, as it had roll'd Thus far uncheck'd, would roll victorious on, Till, like the Orient, the subjected West Should bow in reverence at Mahommed's name; And pilgrims, from remotest Arctic shores, Tread with religious feet the burning sands Of Araby, and Meeca's stony soil. Proud of his part in Roderick's overthrow, Their leader Abulcacem came, a man Immitigable, long in war renown'd. Here Magued comes, who on the conquer'd walls Of Cordoba, by treacherous fear betray'd, Planted the moony standard : Ibrahim here, He, who, by Genil and in Darro's vales, Had for the Moors the fairest portion won Of all their spoils, fairest and best maintain'd, And to the Alpuxarras given in trust His other name, through them preserved in song. Here too Alcahman, vaunting his late deeds At Auria, all her children by the sword Cut off, her bulwarks razed, her towers laid low, Her dwellings by devouring flames consumed, Bloody and hard of heart, he little ween'd, Vain-boastful chief! that from those fatal flames The fire of retribution had gone forth, Which soon should wrap him round.

The renegades

Here too were seen, Ebba and Sisibert; A spurious brood, but of their parent's crimes True heirs, in guilt begotten, and in ill Train'd up. The same unnatural rage that turn'd Their swords against their country, made them seek, Unmindful of their wretched mother's end, Pelavo's life. No enmity is like Domestic hatred. For his blood they thirst, As if that sacrifice might satisfy Witiza's guilty ghost, efface the shame Of their adulterous birth, and one crime more Crowning a hideous course, emancipate Thenceforth their spirits from all earthly fear. This was their only care; but other thoughts Were rankling in that elder villain's mind, Their kinsman Orpas, he of all the crew Who in this fatal visitation fell, The fonlest and the falsest wretch that e'er Renounced his baptism. From his cherish'd views Of royalty cut off, he coveted Count Julian's wide domains, and hopeless now To gain them through the daughter, laid his toils Against the father's life, - the instrument Of his ambition first, and now design'd Its victim. To this end, with cautious hints, At favoring season ventured, he possess'd The leader's mind; then, subtly fostering The doubts himself had sown, with bolder charge He bade him warily regard the Count, Lest underneath an outward show of faith The heart uncircumcised were Christian still; Else, wherefore had Florinda not obey'd Her dear-loved sire's example, and embraced The saving truth? Else, wherefore was her hand,

Plighted to him so long, so long withheld, Till she had found a fitting hour to fly With that audacious Prince, who now, in arms, Defied the Caliph's power; — for who could doubt That in his company she fled, perhaps The mover of his flight? What if the Count Himself had plann'd the evasion which he feign'd In sorrow to condemn? What if she went, A pledge assured, to tell the mountaineers That when they met the Mussulmen in the heat Of fight, her father, passing to their side, Would draw the victory with him? — Thus he breathed

Fiend-like in Abulcacem's ear his schemes Of murderous malice; and the course of things, Erelong, in part approving his discourse, Aided his aim, and gave his wishes weight. For scarce on the Asturian territory Had they set foot, when, with the speed of fear, Count Eudon, nothing doubting that their force Would like a flood sweep all resistance down, Hasten'd to plead his merits; - he alone, Found faithful in obedience through reproach And danger, when the madden'd multitude Hurried their chiefs along, and high and low With one infectious frenzy seized, provoked The invincible in arms. Pelayo led The raging crew, - he doubtless the prime spring Of all these perilous movements; and 'twas said He brought the assurance of a strong support, Connt Julian's aid, for in his company From Cordoba, Count Julian's daughter came.

Thus Eudon spake before the assembled chiefs; When instantly a stern and wrathful voice Replied, 1 know Pelayo never made That senseless promise! He who raised the tale Lies foully; but the bitterest enemy That ever hunted for Pelayo's life Hath never with the charge of falsehood touch'd His name.

The Baron had not recognized Till then, beneath the turban's shadowing folds, Julian's swart visage, where the fiery skies Of Africa, through many a year's long course, Had set their hue inburnt. Something he sought In quick excuse to say of common fame, Lightly believed and busily diffused, And that no enunity had moved his speech Repeating rumor's tale. Julian replied, Count Eudon, neither for thyself nor me Excuse is needed here. The path I tread Is one wherein there can be no return, No pause, no looking back ! A choice like mine For time and for eternity is made, Once and forever! and as easily The breath of vain report might build again The throne which my just vengeance overthrew, As in the Caliph and his Captain's mind Affect the opinion of my well-tried truth. The tidings which thou givest me of my child Touch me more vitally; bad though they be, A secret apprehension of aught worse Makes me with joy receive them.

Then the Count

To Abulcacem turn'd his speech, and said, I pray thee, Chief, give me a messenger By whom I may to this unhappy child Despatch a father's bidding, such as yet May win her back. What I would say requires No veil of privacy; before ye all The errand shall be given.

Boldly he spake, Yet wary in that show of open truth, For well he knew what dangers girt him round Amid the faithless race. Blind with revenge, For them in madness had he sacrificed His name, his baptism, and his native land, To feel, still powerful as he was, that life Hung on their jealous favor. But his heart Approved him now, where love, too long restrain'd, Resumed its healing influence, leading him Right on with no misgiving. Chiefs, he said, Hear me, and let your wisdom judge between Me and Prince Orpas !--- Known it is to all, Too well, what mortal injury provoked My spirit to that vengeance which your aid So signally hath given. A covenant We made when first our purpose we combined, That he should have Florinda for his wife, My only child; so should she be, I thought, Revenged and honor'd best. My word was given Truly, nor did I cease to use all means Of counsel or command, entreating her Sometimes with tears, seeking sometimes with threats

Of an offended father's curse to enforce Obedience; that, she said, the Christian law Forbade ; moreover she had yow'd herself A servant to the Lord. In vain I strove To win her to the Prophet's saving faith, Using perhaps a rigor to that end Beyond permitted means, and to my heart, Which loved her dearer than its own life-blood, Abhorrent. Silently she suffer'd all; Or, when I urged her with most vehemence, Only replied, I knew her fix'd resolve, And eraved my patience but a little while, Till death should set her free. Touch'd as I was, I yet persisted, till at length, to escape The ceaseless importunity, she fled : And verily I fear'd, until this hour, My rigor to some fearfuler resolve Than flight, had driven my child. Chiefs, 1 appeal To each and all, and, Orpas, to thyself Especially, if, having thus essay'd All means that law and nature have allow'd

To bend her will, I may not rightfully Hold myself free, that promise being void Which eannot be fulfill'd. Thou sayest then,

Orpas replied, that from her false belief Her stubborn opposition drew its force. I should have thought that from the ways corrupt Of these idolatrous Christians, little care Might have sufficient to wean a duteous child, The example of a parent so beloved Leading the way; and yet I will not doubt Thou didst enforce with all sincerity

And holy zeal upon thy daughter's mind The truths of Islam.

Julian knit his brow, And scowling on the insidious renegade, He answer'd, By what reasoning my poor mind Was from the old idolatry reclaim'd, None better knows than Seville's mitred chief, Who, first renouncing errors which he taught, Led me his follower to the Prophet's pale. Thy lessons I repeated as I could; Of graven images, unnatural vows, False records, fabling creeds, and jugghr.g priests, Who, making sanctity the cloak of sin, Laugh'd at the fools on whose credulity They fatten'd. To these arguments, whose worth Prince Orpas, least of all men, should impeach, I added, like a soldier bred in arms, And to the subtleties of schools unused, The flagrant fact, that Heaven with victory, Where'er they turn'd, attested and approved The chosen Prophet's arms. If thou wert still The mitred Metropolitan, and I Some wretch of Arian or of Hebrew race, Thy proper business then might be to pry And question me for lurking flaws of faith. We Mussulmen, Prince Orpas, live beneath A wiser law, which with the iniquities Of thine old eraft, hath abrogated this Its foulest practice !

As Count Julian ceased, From underneath his black and gather'd brow There went a look, which with these wary words Bore to the heart of that false renegade Their whole envenon'd meaning. Haughtily Withdrawing then his alter'd eyes, he said, Too much of this! Return we to the sum Of my discourse. Let Abulcaeem say, In whom the Caliph speaks, if with all faith Having essay'd in vain all means to win My child's consent, I may not hold henceforth The covenant discharged.

The Moor replied, Well hast thou said, and rightly mayst assure Thy daughter that the Prophet's holy law Forbids compulsion. Give thine errand now; The messenger is here.

Then Julian said, Go to Pelayo, and from him entreat Admittance to my child, where'er she be. Say to her, that her father solemnly Annuls the covenant with Orpas pledged, Nor with solicitations, nor with threats, Will urge her more, nor from that liberty Of faith restrain her, which the Prophet's law, Liberal as Heaven from whence it came, to all Indulges. Tell her that her father says His days are number'd, and beseeches her By that dear love, which from her infancy Still he hath borne her, growing as she grew, Nursed in our weal and strengthen'd in our woe, She will not in the evening of his life Leave him forsaken and alone. Enough Of sorrow, tell her, have her injuries Brought on her father's head; let not her act Thus aggravate the burden. Tell her, too,

XX.

That when he pray'd her to return, he wept Profusely as a child; but bitterer tears Than ever fell from childhood's eyes, were those Which traced his hardy checks.

With faltering voice He spake, and after he had ceased from speech His lip was quivering still. The Moorish chief Then to the messenger his bidding gave. Say, cried he, to these rebel infidels, Thus Ahulcacem, in the Caliph's name Exhorteth them : Repent and be forgiven ! Nor think to stop the dreadful storm of war, Which, conquering and to conquer, must fulfil Its destined circle, rolling eastward now, Back from the subjugated west, to sweep Thrones and dominions down, till in the hond Of unity all nations join, and Earth Acknowledge, as she sees one Sun in heaven, One God, one Chief, one Prophet, and one Law. Jerusalem, the holy City, bows To holier Mecca's creed ; the Crescent shines Triumphant o'er the eternal pyramids; On the cold altars of the worshippers Of Fire, moss grows, and reptiles leave their slime; The African idolatries are fallen, And Europe's senseless gods of stone and wood Have had their day. Tell these misguided men, A moment for repentance yet is left, And mercy the submitted neck will spare Before the sword is drawn; but once unsheath'd, Let Auria witness how that dreadful sword Accomplisheth its work ! They little know The Moors, who hope in battle to withstand Their valor, or in flight escape their rage ! Amid our deserts, we hunt down the birds Of heaven, - wings do not save them ! Nor shall rocks.

And holds, and fastnesses, avail to save These mountaineers. Is not the Earth the Lord's? And we, his chosen people, whom he sends To conquer and possess it in his name?

XXI.

THE FOUNTAIN IN THE FOREST.

THE second eve had closed upon their march Within the Asturian border, and the Moors Had pitch'd their tents amid an open wood Upon the mountain side. As day grew dim, Their scatter'd fires shone with distincter light Among the trees, above whose top the smoke Diffused itself, and stain'd the evening sky. Erelong the stir of occupation ceased, And all the murmur of the busy host, Subsiding, died away, as through the camp The crier, from a knoll, proclaim'd the hour For prayer appointed, and with sonorous voice, Thrice, in melodious modulation full, Pronounced the highest name. There is no God But God, he cried; there is no God but God! 'Mahommed is the Prophet of the Lord !

Come ye to prayer! to prayer! The Lord is great!

There is no God but God! — Thus he pronounced His ritual form, mingling with holiest truth The audacious name accursed. The multitude Made their ablutions in the mountain stream Obedient, then their faces to the earth Bent in formality of easy prayer.

An arrow's flight above that mountain stream There was a little glade, where underneath A long, smooth, mossy stone a fountain rose. An oak grew near, and with its ample boughs O'ercanopied the spring; its fretted roots Emboss'd the bank, and on their tufted hark Grew plants which love the moisture and the shade;

Short ferns, and longer leaves of wrinkled green Which bent toward the spring, and when the wind Made itself felt, just touch'd with gentle dip The glassy surface, ruffled ne'er but then, Save when a bubble rising from the depth Burst, and with faintest circles mark'd its place, Or if an insect skimm'd it with its wing, Or when in heavier drops the gather'd rain Fell from the oak's high bower. The mountain roe, When, having drank there, he would bound across,

Drew up upon the bank his meeting feet, And put forth half his force. With silent lapse From thence through mossy banks the water stole, Then marmaring hastened to the glen below. Diana might have loved in that sweet spot To take her noontide rest; and when she stoop'd Hot from the chase to drink, well pleased had seen Her own bright crescent, and the brighter face It crown'd, reflected there

Beside that spring Count Julian's tent was pitch'd upon the glade; There his ablutions Moor-like he perform'd, And Moor-like knelt in prayer, bowing his head Upon the mossy hank. There was a sound Of voices at the tent when he arose. And lo! with hurried step a woman came Toward him; rightly then his heart presaged, And ere he could behold her countenance, Florinda knelt, and with uplifted arms Embraced her sire. He raised her from the ground, Kiss'd her, and clasp'd her to his heart, and said, Thou hast not then forsaken me, my child ! Howe'er the inexorable will of Fate May, in the world which is to come, divide Our everlasting destinies, in this Thou wilt not, O my child, abandon me ! And then, with deep and interrupted voice, Nor seeking to restrain his copions tears, My blessing be upon thy head, he cried, A father's blessing ! Though all faiths were false, It should not lose its worth ! - She lock'd her hands Around his neck, and gazing in his face Through streaming tears, exclaim'd, Oh, never more, Here or hereafter, never let us part!

And breathing then a prayer in silence forth, The name of Jesus trembled on her tongue.

XXI

Whom hast thou there? cried Julian, and drew Spain hath not for back,

Seeing that near them stood a meagre man In humble garb, who rested with raised hands On a long staff, bending his head like one Who, when he hears the distant vesper-bell, Halts by the way, and, all unseen of men, Offers his homage in the eye of Heaven. She answered, Let not my dear father frown In anger on his child! Thy messenger Told me that I should be restrain 'd no more From liberty of faith, which the new law Indulged to all; how soon my hour might come I knew not, and although that hour will bring Few terrors, yet methinks I would not be Without a Christian comforter in death.

A Priest! exclaimed the Count, and drawing back,

Stoop'd for his turban, that he might not lack Some outward symbol of apostasy; For still in war his wonted arms he wore, Nor for the cimeter had changed the sword Accustomed to his hand. He covered now His short, gray hair, and under the white folds, His swarthy brow, which gather'd as he rose, Darken'd. Oh, frown not thus! Florinda said ; A kind and gentle counsellor is this, One who pours balm into a wounded soul, And mitigates the griefs he cannot heal. I told him I had vow'd to pass my days A servant of the Lord, yet that my heart, Hearing the message of thy love, was drawn With powerful yearnings back. Follow thy heart -

It answers to the call of duty here, He said, nor canst thou better serve the Lord Than at thy father's side.

Count Julian's brow, While thus she spake, insensibly relax'd. A Priest, cried he, and thus with even hand Weigh vows and natural duty in the scale? In what old heresy hath he been train'd? Or in what wilderness hath he escaped The domineering Prelate's fire and sword? Come hither, man, and tell me who thou art!

A sinner, Roderick, drawing nigh, replied, Brought to repentance by the grace of God, And trusting for forgiveness through the blood Of Christ in humble hope.

A smile of scorn Julian assumed, but merely from the lips It came; for he was troubled while he gazed On the strong countenance and thoughtful eye Before him. A new law hath been proclaim'd, Said he, which overthrows in its career The Christian altars of idolatry. What think'st thou of the Prophet?—Roderick Made answer, I am in the Moorish camp, And he who asketh is a Mussulman. How then should I reply?—Safely, rejoin'd The renegade, and freely mayst thou speak To all that Julian asks. Is not the yoke Of Meeca easy, and its burden light?— Spain hath not found it so, the Goth replied, And groaning, turn'd away his countenance.

Count Julian knit his brow, and stood awhile Regarding him with meditative eye In silence. Thou art honest too! he cried; Why, 'twas in quest of such a man as this That the old Grecian search'd by lantern light, In open day, the city's crowded streets; So rare he deem'd the virtue. Honesty, And sense of natural duty in a Priest! Now for a miracle, ye Saints of Spain! I shall not pry too closely for the wires, For, seeing what I see, ye have me now In the believing mood!

O blessed Saints, Florinda cried, 'tis from the bitterness, Not from the hardness of the heart, he speaks! Hear him ! and in your goodness give the scoff The virtue of a prayer! So saying, she raised Her hands, in fervent action clasp'd, to Ileaven, Then as, still clasp'd, they fell, toward her sire She turn'd her eyes, beholding him through tears The look, the gesture, and that silent woe, Soften'd her father's heart, which in this hour Was open to the influences of love. Priest, thy vocation were a blessed one, Said Julian, if its mighty power were used To lessen human misery, not to swell The mournful sum, already all-too-great. If, as thy former counsel should imply, Thou art not one who would for his craft's sake Fret with corrosives and inflame the wound, Which the poor sufferer brings to thee in trust That thou with virtuous balm wilt bind it up, --If, as I think, thou art not one of those Whose villany makes honest men turn Moors, Thou then wilt answer with unbias'd mind What I shall ask thee, and exoreise thus The sick and feverish conscience of my child, From inbred phantoms, fiend-like, which possess Her innocent spirit. Children we are all Of one great Father, in whatever clime Nature or chance hath cast the seeds of life, All tongues, all colors; neither after death Shall we be sorted into languages And tints,-white, black, and tawny, Greek and Goth, Northmen and offspring of hot Africa, The All-Father, He in whom we live and move, He the indifferent Judge of all, regards Nations, and hues, and dialects alike; According to their works shall they be judged, When even-handed Justice in the scale Their good and evil weighs. All creeds, I ween, Agree in this, and hold it orthodox.

Roderick, perceiving here that Julian paused, As if he waited for acknowledgment Of that plain truth, in motion of assent Inclined his brow complacently, and said, Even so: What follows? — This, resumed the Count; That creeds, like colors, being but accident, Are therefore in the scale imponderable - –

XXI.

Thou seest my meaning; — That from every faith, As every clime, there is a way to Heaven; And thou and I may meet in Paradise.

Oh grant it, God ! cried Roderick fervently, And smote his breast. Oh grant it, gracious God! Through the dear blood of Jesus, grant that he And I may meet before the mercy-throne ! That were a triumph of Redeeming Love, For which admiring Angels would renew Their hallelujahs through the choir of Heaven ! Man! quoth Count Julian, wherefore art thou moved To this strange passion? I require of thee Thy judgment, not thy prayers ! Be not displeased! In gentle voice subdued the Goth replies; A prayer, from whatsoever lips it flow, By thine own rule should find the way to lleaven, So that the heart in its sincerity Straight forward breathe it forth. I, like thyself, Am all untrain'd to subtilties of speech, Nor competent of this great argument Thou openest; and perhaps shall answer thee Wide of the words, but to the purport home. There are to whom the light of gospel truth Hath never reach'd; of such 1 needs must deem As of the sons of men who had their day Before the light was given. But, Count, for those Who, born amid the light, to darkness turn, Wilful in error, - I dare only say, God doth not leave the unhappy soul without An inward monitor, and till the grave Open, the gate of mercy is not closed Priest-like! the renegade replied, and shook His head in scorn. What is not in the craft Is error, and for error there shall be No mercy found in Him whom yet ye name The Merciful!

Now God forbid, rejoin'd The fallen King, that one who stands in need Of mercy for his sins should argue thus Of error! Thou hast said that thou and I, Thon dying in name a Mussulman, and I A servant of the Cross, may meet in Heaven. Time was when in our fathers' ways we walk'd Regardlessly alike; faith being to each-For so far thou hast reason'd rightly --- like Our country's fashion and our mother-tongue, Of mere inheritance, - no thing of choice In judgment fix'd, nor rooted in the heart. Me have the arrows of calamity Sore stricken; sinking underneath the weight Of sorrow, yet more heavily oppress'd Beneath the burden of my sins, I turn'd In that dread hour to Him who from the Cross Calls to the heavy-laden. There I found Relief and comfort; there I have my hope, My strength, and my salvation; there, the grave Ready beneath my feet, and Heaven in view, I to the King of Terrors say, Come, Death, -Come quickly! Thou too wert a stricken deer, Julian, -- God pardon the unhappy hand That wounded thee! - but whither didst thou go

For healing ? Thou hast turn'd away from Him, Who saith, Forgive, as ye would be forgiven ; And, that the Moorish sword might do thy work, Received the creed of Mecca: with what fruit For Spain, let tell her cities sack'd, her sons Slaughter'd, her daughters than thine own dear child More foully wrong'd, more wretched ! For thyself, Thou hast had thy fill of vengeance, and, perhaps, The cup was sweet; but it hath left behind A bitter relish ! Gladly would thy soul Forget the past; as little canst thou bear To send into futurity thy thoughts. And for this Now, what is it, Count, but fear, -However bravely thou mayst bear thy front, -Danger, remorse, and stinging obloquy?

One only hope, one only remedy, One only refuge yet remains. — My life Is at thy mercy, Count ! Call, if thou wilt, Thy men, and to the Moors deliver me ! Or strike thyself! Death were from any hand A welcome gift; from thine, and in this cause, A boon indeed ! My latest words on earth Should tell thee that all sins may be effaced, Bid thee repent, have faith, and be forgiven ! Strike, Julian, if thou wilt, and send my soul To intercede for thine, that we may meet, Thou, and thy child, and I, beyond the grave.

Thus Roderick spake, and spread his arms as if He offer'd to the sword his willing breast, With looks of passionate persuasion fix'd Upon the Count, who, in his first access Of anger, seem'd as though he would have call'd His guards to seize the Priest. The attitude Disarm'd him, and that fervent zeal sincere, And more than both, the look and voice, which like A mystery troubled him. Florinda too Hung on his arm with both her hands, and cried.

Hung on his arm with both her hands, and cried, O father, wrong him not ! he speaks from God ! Life and salvation are upon his tongue ! Judge thou the value of that faith whereby, Reflecting on the past, I murmur not, And to the end of all look on with joy Of hope assured !

Peace, innocent! replied The Count, and from her hold withdrew his arm; Then, with a gather'd brow of mournfulness Rather than wrath, regarding Roderick, said, Thou preachest that all sins may be effaced; Is there forgiveness, Christian, in thy creed For Roderick's crime? — For Roderick and for thee, Count Julian, said the Goth, and, as he spake, Trembled through every fibre of his frame. The gate of Heaven is open. Julian threw His wrathful hand aloft, and cried, Away! Earth could not hold us both. nor can one Heaven Contain my deadliest eneny and me!

My father, say not thus! Florinda cried; I have forgiven him! I have pray'd for him! For him, for thee, and for myself I pour One constant prayer to Ileaven! In passion then She knelt, and bending back, with arms and face

To be the minion of prosperity, Raised toward the sky, the supplicant exclaim'd, Richest in corporal gifts and wealth of mind, Redeemer, heal his heart! It is the grief Honor and fame attending him abroad, Which festers there that hath bewilder'd him ! Peace and all dear domestic joys at home, Save him, Redeemer! by thy precious death Save, save him, O my God! Then on her face And sunshine till the evening of his days Closed in without a cloud, - even such a man She fell, and thus with bitterness pursued Would from the gloom and horror of his heart In silent throes her agonizing prayer. Confirm thy fatal thought, were this world all ! Afflict not thus thyself, my child, the Count Oh! who could bear the haunting mystery, Exclaim'd; O dearest, be thou comforted; If death and retribution did not solve Set but thy heart at rest, I ask no more ! The riddle, and to heavenliest harmony Peace, dearest, peace ! - and weeping as he spake, Reduce the seeming chaos ! - Here we see He knelt to raise her. Roderick also knelt; The water at its well-head; clear it is, Be comforted, he cried, and rest in faith Not more transpicuous the invisible air; That God will hear thy prayers ! they must be Pure as an infant's thoughts; and here to life heard. And good directed all its uses serve. The herb grows greener on its brink ; sweet flowers He who could doubt the worth of pravers like thine, Bend o'er the stream that feeds their freshened May doubt of all things ! Sainted as thou art In sufferings here, this miracle will be roots; The red-breast loves it for his wintry haunts; Thy work and thy reward ! And when the buds begin to open forth, Then, raising her, They seated her upon the fountain's brink, Builds near it with his mate their brooding nest; The thirsty stag, with widening nostrils, there And there beside her sat. The moon had risen, Invigorated draws his copious draught; And that fair spring lay blackened half in shade, And there, amid its flags, the wild boar stands, Half like a burnish'd mirror in her light. By that reflected light Count Julian saw Nor suffering wrong nor meditating hurt. Through woodlands wild and solitary fields, That Roderick's face was bathed with tears, and Unsullied thus it holds its bounteous course ; pale But when it reaches the resorts of men, As monumental marble. Friend, said he, Whether thy faith be fabulous, or sent The service of the city there defiles Indeed from Heaven, its dearest gift to man, The tainted stream; corrupt and foul it flows Through loathsome banks and o'er a bed impure, Thy heart is true : and had the mitred Priest Till in the sea, the appointed end to which Of Seville been like thee, or hadst thou held The place he fill'd ; - but this is idle talk, -Through all its way it hastens, 'tis received, And, losing all pollution, mingles there Things are as they will be ; and we, poor slaves, In the wide world of waters. So is it Fret in the harness as we may, must drag With the great stream of things, if all were seen; The Car of Destiny where'er she drives, Inexorable and blind ! Good the beginning, good the end shall be, Oh wretched man! And transitory evil only make The good end happier. Ages pass away, Cried Roderick, if thou seekest to assuage Thrones fall, and nations disappear, and worlds Thy wounded spirit with that deadly drug, Hell's subtlest venom ; look to thine own heart, Grow old and go to wreck; the soul alone Endures, and what she chooseth for herself, Where thou hast Will and Conscience to belie This juggling sophistry, and lead thee yet The arbiter of her own destiny, Through penitence to Heaven ! That only shall be permanent. But guilt, Whate'er it be And all our suffering? said the Count. The Goth That governs us, in mournful tone the Count Replied, Repentance taketh sin away, Replied, Fate, Providence, or Allah's will, Death remedies the rest. - Soothed by the strain Or reckless Fortune, still the effect the same, A world of evil and of misery ! Of such discourse, Julian was silent then, Look where we will, we meet it; wheresoe'er And sat contemplating. Florinda too We go, we bear it with us. Here we sit Was calm'd. If sore experience may be thought Upon the margin of this peaceful spring, To teach the uses of adversity, She said, alas! who better learn'd than I And oh ! what volumes of calamity Would be unfolded here, if either heart In that sad school! Methinks, if ye would know Laid open its sad records! Tell me not How visitations of calamity Affect the pious soul, 'tis shown ye there ! Of goodr.ess! Either in some freak of power This frame of things was fashion'd, then cast off Look yonder at that cloud, which, through the sky Sailing alone, doth cross, in her career, To take its own wild ceurse, the sport of chance; The rolling Moon ! I watch'd it as it came, Or the bad Spirit o'er the Good prevails, And in the eternal conflict hath arisen And deem'd the deep opake would blot her beams But, melting like a wreath of snow, it hangs Lord of the ascendant! In folds of wavy silver round, and clothes Rightly wouldst thou say, The orb with richer beanties than her own, Were there no world but this! the Goth replied. The happiest child of earth that e'er was mark'd Then passing, leaves her in her light serene

Thus having said, the pious sufferer sat, Beholding with fix'd eyes that lovely orb, Till quiet tears confused in dizzy light The broken moonbeams. They too by the toil Of spirit, as by travail of the day Subdued, were silent, yielding to the nour. The silver cloud diffusing slowly past, And now into its airy elements Resolved is gone ; while through the azure depth Alone in heaven the glorious Moon pursues Her course appointed, with indifferent beams Shining upon the silent hills around, And the dark tents of that unholy host, Who, all unconscious of impending fate, Take their last slumber there. The camp is still; The fires have mouldered, and the breeze which stirs The soft and snowy embers, just lays bare At times a red and evanescent light, Or for a moment wakes a feeble flame. They by the fountain hear the stream below, Whose murmurs, as the wind arose or fell, Fuller or fainter reach the ear attuned. And now the nightingale, not distant far, Began her solitary song, and pour'd To the cold moon a richer, stronger strain Than that with which the lyrie lark salutes The new-born day. Her deep and thrilling song Seem'd with its piercing melody to reach The soul, and in mysterious unison Blend with all thoughts of gentleness and love. Their hearts were open to the healing power Of nature; and the splendor of the night, The flow of waters, and that sweetest lay Came to them like a copious evening dew Falling on vernal herbs which thirst for rain.

THE MOORISH COUNCIL.

THUS they beside the fountain sat, of food And rest forgetful, when a messenger Summon'd Count Julian to the Leader's tent. In council there, at that late hour, he found The assembled Chiefs, on sudden tidings call'd Of unexpected weight from Cordoba. Jealous that Abdalaziz had assumed A regal state, affecting in his court The forms of Gothie sovereignty, the Moors, Whom artful spirits of ambitious mould Stirr'd up, had risen against him in revolt : And he who late had in the Caliph's name Ruled from the Ocean to the Pyrenees, A mutilate and headless carcass now, From pitying hands received beside the road A hasty grave, scarce hidden there from dogs And ravens, nor from wintry rains secure. She, too, who in the wreck of Spain preserved Her queenly rank, the wife of Roderick first, Of Abdalaziz after, and to both Alike unhappy, shared the ruin now Her counsels had brought on; for she had led The infatuate Moor, in dangerous vauntery,

To these aspiring forms, --- so should he gain Respect and honor from the Mussuiman, She said, and that the obedience of the Goths Follow'd the sceptre. In an evil hour She gave the counsel, and in evil hour He lent a willing ear; the popular rage Fell on them both; and they to whom her name Had been a mark for mockery and reproach, Shudder'd with human horror at her fate. Ayub was heading the wild anarchy; But where the cement of authority Is wanting, all things there are dislocate : The mutinous soldiery, by every cry Of rumor set in wild career, were driven By every gust of passion, setting up One hour, what in the impulse of the next, Equally unreasoning, they destroy'd; thus all Was in misrule where uproar gave the law, And ere from far Damascus they could learn The Caliph's pleasure, many a moon must pass. What should be done? should Abulcacem march To Cordoba, and in the Caliph's name Assume the power which to his rank in arms Rightly devolved, restoring thus the reign Of order? or pursue, with quicken'd speed, The end of this great armament, and crush Rebellion first, then to domestic ills Apply his undivided mind and force Victorious? What, in this emergency, Was Julian's counsel, Abuleacem ask'd; Should they accomplish soon their enterprise ? Or would the insurgent infidels prolong The contest, seeking by protracted war To weary them, and trusting in the strength Of these wild hills?

Julian replied, The Chief Of this revolt is wary, resolute, Of approved worth in war: a desperate part He for himself deliberately hath chosen, Confiding in the hereditary love Borne to him by these hardy mountaineers ---A love which his own noble qualities Have strengthen'd so that every heart is his. When ye can bring them to the open proof Of battle, ye will find them in his cause Lavish of life; but well they know the strength Of their own fastnesses, the mountain paths Impervious to pursuit, the vantages Of rock, and pass, and woodland, and ravine; And hardly will ye tempt them to forego These natural aids wherein they put their trust As in their stubborn spirit, each alike Deem'd by themselves invincible, and so By Roman found and Goth - beneath whose sway Slowly persuaded rather than subdued They came, and still through every change retam'a Their manners obstinate and barbarous speech. My counsel, therefore, is, that we secure With strong increase of force the adjacent posts, And chiefly Gegio, leaving them so mann'd As may abate the hope of enterprise, Their strength being told. Time, in a strife like this, Becomes the ally of those who trust in him: Make then with Time your covenant. Old feuds

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

May disunite the chiefs: some may be gain'd By fair entreaty, others by the stroke Of nature, or of policy, cut off. This was the ecounsel which in Cordoba I offer'd Abdalaziz: in ill hour Rejecting it, he sent upon this war His father's faithful friend! Dark are the ways Of Destiny! Had I been at his side, Old Muza would not now have mourn'd his age Left childless, nor had Ayub dared defy The Caliph's represented power. The case Calls for thine instant presence, with the weight Of thy legitimate authority.

Julian, said Orpas, turning from beneath His turban to the Count a erafty eye, Thy daughter is return'd; doth she not bring Some tidings of the movements of the foe? The Count replied, When child and parent meet First reconciled from discontents which wrung The hearts of both, ill should their converse be Of wariike matters! There hath been no time For such inquiries, neither should I think To ask her touching that for which I know She hath neither eye nor thought.

There was a time -Orpas with smile malignant thus replied --When in the progress of the Caliph's arms Count Julian's daughter had an interest Which touch'd her nearly ! But her turn is served, And hatred of Prince Orpas may beget Indifference to the cause. Yet Destiny Still guideth to the service of the faith The wayward heart of woman ; for as one Delivered Roderick to the avenging sword, So hath another at this hour betray'd Pelavo to his fall. His sister came At nightfall to my tent a fugitive. She tells me that, on learning our approach, The rebel to a eavern in the hills Had sent his wife and children, and with them Those of his followers, thinking, there conceal'd, They might be safe. She, moved by injuries Which stung her spirit, on the way escaped, And for revenge will guide us. In reward She asks her brother's forfeiture of lands In marriage with Numaeian : something too Touching his life, that for her services It might be spared, she said ; - an after-thought To salve decorum, and if conscience wake, Serve as a sop; but when the sword shall smite Pelayo and his dangerous race, I ween, That a thin kerchief will dry all the tears The Lady Guisla sheds !

'Tis the old taint ! Said Julian mournfully : from her mother's womb She brought the inbred wickedness which now In ripe infection blossoms. Woman, woman, Still to the Goths art thou the instrument Of overthrow : thy virtue and thy vice Fatal alike to them !

Say rather, cried The insidious renegade, that Allah thus By woman punisheth the idolatry Of those who raise a woman to the rank Of godhead, calling on their Mary's name With senseless prayers. In vain shall they invoke Her trusted succor now! Like silly birds, By lear betray'd, they fly into the toils; And this Pelayo, who, in lengthen'd war Baffling our force, has thought perhaps to reign Prince of the Mountains, when we hold his wife And offspring at our mercy, must himself Come to the lure.

Enough, the Leader said; This unexpected work of favoring Fate Opens an easy way to our desires, And renders further counsel needless now. Great is the Prophet whose protecting power Goes with the faithful forth! The rebels' days Are number'd; Allah hath deliver'd them Into our hands!

So saying he arose; The Chiefs withdrew; Orpas alone remain'd Obedient to his indicated will. The event, said Abulcacem, hath approved Thy judgment in all points; his daughter comes At the first summons, even as thou saidst; Her errand with the insurgents done, she brings Their well-concerted project back, a safe And unexpected messenger ; - the Moor -The shallow Moor — must see and not perceive ; Must hear and understand not; yea, must bear, Poor easy fool, to serve their after-mirth, A part in his own undoing ! But just Heaven With this unlook'd-for incident hath marr'd Their complots, and the sword shall eut this web Of treason.

Well, the renegade replied, Thou knowest Count Julian's spirit, quiek in wiles In act audacious. Baffled now, he thinks Either by instant warning 6 apprize The rebels of their danger, or preserve The hostages when fallen into our power, Till secret craft contrive, or open force Win their enlargement. Haply, too, he dreams Of Cordoba, the avenger and the friend Of Abdalaziz, in that cause to arm Moor against Moor, preparing for himself The victory o'er the enfeebled conquerors. Success in treason hath imbolden'd him, And power but serves him for fresh treachery, false

To Roderick first, and to the Caliph now.

The guilt, said Abulcacem, is confirm'd, The sentence past; all that is now required Is to strike sure and safely. He hath with him A veteran force devoted to his will, Whom to provoke were perilous; nor less Of peril lies there in delay: what course Between these equal dangers should we steer?

They have been train'd beneath him in the wars Of Africa, the renegade replied; Men are they, who, from their youth up, have found Their occupation and their joy in arms; Indifferent to the cause for which they fight, Put faithful to their leader, who bath won

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

By license largely given, yet temper'd still With exercise of firm authority, Their whole devotion. Vainly should we seek By proof of Julian's guilt to pacify Such martial spirits, unto whom all creeds And countries are alike; but take away The head, and forthwith their fidelity Goes at the market price. The act must be Sudden and secret; poison is too slow. Thus it may best be done; the Mountaineers, Doubtless, erelong will rouse us with some spur Of sudden enterprise; at such a time A trusty minister approaching him May smite him, so that all shall think the spear Comes from the hostile troops. Right counsellor !

Cried Abulcacem, thou shalt have his lands, The proper meed of thy fidelity: His daughter thou mayst take or leave. Go now And find a faithful instrument to put Our purpose in effect! — And when 'tis done, — The Moor, as Orpas from the tent withdrew, Muttering pursued, — look for a like reward Thyself! That restless head of wickedness In the grave will brood no treasons. Other babes Seream when the Devil, as they spring to life, Infects them with his touch; but thou didst stretch Thine arms to meet him, and, like mother's milk, Suck the congenial evil! Thou hast tried Both laws, and, were there aught to gain, wouldst prove

A third as readily; but when thy sins Are weigh'd, 'twill be against an empty scale, And neither Prophet will avail thee then!

THE VALE OF COVADONGA.

THE camp is stirring, and ere day hath dawn'd The tents are struck. Early they rise whom Hope Awakens, and they travel fast with whom She goes companion of the way. By noon Hath Abulcacem in his speed attain'd The Vale of Cangas. Well the trusty scouts Observe his march, and, fleet as mountain roes, From post to post, with instantaneous speed, The warning bear: none else is nigh: the vale Hath been deserted, and Pelayo's hall Is open to the foe, who on the tower Hoist their white signal-flag. In Sella's stream The misbelieving multitudes perform, With hot and hasty hand, their noontide rite, Then hurryingly repeat the Impostor's prayer. Here they divide ; the Chieftain halts with half The host, retaining Julian and his men, Whom where the valley widen'd he disposed, Liable to first attack, that so the deed Of murder plann'd with Orpas might be done. The other force the Moor Alcahman led, Whom Guisla guided up Pionia's stream Eastward to Soto. Ibrahim went with him, Proud of Granada's snowy heights subdued,

And boasting of his skill in mountain war; Yet sure he deem'd an easier victory Awaited him this day. Little, quoth he, Weens the vain Mountaineer, who puts his trust In dens and rocky fastnesses, how close Destruction is at hand! Belike he thinks The Humma's happy wings have shadow'd him, And therefore Fate with royalty must crown His chosen head! Pity the cimeter With its rude edge so soon should interrupt The pleasant dream'

There can be no escape For those who in the cave seek shelter, cried Alcahman; yield they must, or from their holes Like bees we smoke them out. The Chief perhaps May reign awhile King of the wolves and bears, Till his own subjects hunt him down, or kites And crows divide what hunger may have left Upon his ghastly limbs. Happier for him That destiny should this day to our hands Deliver him; short would be his sufferings then; And we right joyfully should in one hour Behold our work accomplish'd, and his race Extinct.

Thus these, in mockery and in thoughts Of bloody triumph, to the future blind, Indulged the scornful vein; nor deem'd that they Whom to the sword's unsparing edge they doom'd, Even then in joyful expectation pray'd To Heaven for their approach, and, at their post Prepared, were trembling with excess of hope. Here in these mountain straits the Mountaineer Had felt his country's strength insuperable; Here he had pray'd to see the Mussulman With all his myriads ; therefore had he look'd To Covadonga as a sanetuary Apt for concealment, easy of defence ; And Guisla's flight, though to his heart it sent A pang more poignant for their mother's sake, Yet did it further in its consequence His hope and project, surer than decoy Well-laid, or best-concerted stratagem. That sullen and revengeful mind, he knew, Would follow to the extremity of guilt Its long fore-purposed shame : the toils were laid, And she who by the Mussulmen full sure Thought on her kindred her revenge to wreak, Led the Moors in.

Count Pedro and his son Were hovering with the main Asturian force In the wider vale to watch occasion there, And with hot onset when the alarm began Pursue the vantage. In the fated straits Of Deva had the King disposed the rest : Amid the hanging woods, and on the cliffs, A long mile's length on either side its bed, They lay. The lever, and the axe, and saw Had skilfully been plied; and trees and stones, A dread artillery, ranged on erag, and shelf, And steep descent, were ready at the word Precipitate to roll resistless down The faithful maiden not more wistfully Looks for the day that brings her lover home, Scarce more impatiently the horse endures The rein, when load and shrill the hunter's horn

XXIII.

Rings in his joyous ears, than at their post The Mountaineers await their certain prey; Yet mindful of their Prince's order, oft And solemnly enforced, with eagerness Subdued by minds well-master'd, they expect The appointed signal.

Hand must not be raised, Foot stirr'd, nor voice be utter'd, said the Chief, Till the word pass: impatience would mar all. God hath deliver'd over to your hands His chemies and ours, so we but use The occasion wisely. Not till the word pass From man to man transmitted, "In the name " Of God, for Spain and Vengeance!" let a hand Be lifted; on obedience all depends. Their march below with noise of horse and foot, And haply with the clang of instruments, Might drown all other signal, this is sure ; But wait it calmly; it will not be given Till the whole line hath enter'd in the toils. Comrades, be patient, so shall none escape Who once set foot within these straits of death. Thus had Pelayo on the Mountaineers With frequent and impressive charge enforced The needful exhortation. This alone He doubted, that the Mussulmen might see The perils of the vale, and warily Forbear to enter. But they thought to find, As Guisla told, the main Asturian force Seeking concealment there, no other aid Soliciting from these their native hills; And that, the babes and women having fallen In thraldom, they would lay their weapons down, And supplicate forgiveness for their sake. Nor did the Moors perceive in what a strait They enter'd; for the morn had risen o'ercast, And when the Sun had reach'd the height of heaven, Dimly his pale and beamless orb was seen Moving through mist. A soft and gentle rain, Scarce heavier than the summer's evening dew, Descended, - through so still an atmosphere, That every leaf upon the moveless trees Was studded o'er with rain-drops, bright and full, None falling till from its own weight o'erswollen The motion came.

Low on the mountain side The fleecy vapor hung, and in its veil, With all their dreadful preparations, wrapp'd The Mountaineers; — in breathless hope they lay, Some blessing God in silence for the power This day vouchsafed; others with fervency Of prayer and vow invoked the Mother-Maid, Beseeching her that in this favoring hour She would be strongly with them. From helow, Meantime, distinct they heard the passing tramp Of horse and foot, continues as the sound Of Deva's stream, and barbarous tongues commix'd With laughter, and with frequent shouts, — for all Exultant came, expecting sure success; Blind wretches, over whom the ruin hung !

They say, quoth one, that though the Prophet's soul

Doth, with the black-eyed Houris bathe in bliss, Life hath not left his body, which bears up By its miraculous power the holy tomb, And holds it, at Medina, in the air, Buoyant between the temple's floor and roof; And there the Angels fly to him with news From East, West, North, and South, of what befalls

His faithful people. If, when he shall hear The tale of this day's work, he should, for joy, Forget that he is dead, and walk abroad, --It were as good a miracle as when He sliced the moon ! Sir Angel, hear me now, Whoe'er thou he'st who art about to speed From Spain to Araby! when thou hast got The Prophet's ear, be sure thou tellest him How bravely Ghauleb did his part to-day, And with what special reverence he alone Desired thee to commend him to his grace !--Fie on thee, scoffer that thou art! replied His comrade; thou wilt never leave these gibes Till some commission'd arrow through the teeth Shall nail the offending tongue. Hast thou not heard

How, when our clay is leaven'd first with life, The ministering Angel brings it from that spot Whereon 'tis written in the eternal book That soul and body must their parting take, And earth to earth return ? How knowest thou But that the spirit who compounded thee, To distant Syria from this very vale Bore thy component dust, and Azrael here Awaits thee at this hour? — Little thought he Who spake, that, in that valley, at that hour, One death awaited both !

Thus they pursued Toward the cave their inauspicious way. Weak childhood there, and ineffective age, In the chambers of the rock, were placed secure; But of the women, all whom with the babes Maternal eare detain'd not, were aloft To aid in the destruction; by the side Of fathers, hrethren, husbands, station'd there, They watch and pray. Pelayo in the cave, With the venerable primate, took his post. Ranged on the rising cliffs, on either hand, Vigilant sentinels, with eye intent, Observe his movements, when to take the word And pass it forward. He, in arms complete, Stands in the portal; a stern majesty Reign'd in his countenance severe that hour, And in his eye a deep and dreadful joy Shone, as advancing up the vale he saw The Moorish banners. God hath blinded them ' He said; the measure of their crimes is full! O Vale of Deva, famous shalt thou be From this day forth forever; and to these Thy springs shall unborn generations come In pilgrimage, and hallow with their prayers The cradle of their native monarchy !

There was a stirring in the air; the sun Prevail'd, and gradually the brightening mist Began to rise and mclt. A jutting crag Upon the right projected o'er the stream, Not farther from the cave than a strong hand Expert, with deadly aim, might cast the spear, Or a strong voice, pitch'd to full compass, make Its clear articulation heard distinct. A venturous dalesman, once ascending there To rob the eagle's nest, had fallen, and hnng Among the heather, wondrously preserved : Therefore had he with pious gratitude Placed on that overhanging brow a Cross, Tall as the mast of some light fisher's skiff, And from the vale conspicuous. As the Moors Advanced, the Chieftain in the van was seen, Known by his arms, and from the crag a voice Pronounced his name, - Alcahman! hoa, look up, Alcaliman! As the Goating mist drew up, It had divided there, and open'd round The Cross; part clinging to the rock beneath, Hovering and waving part in fleeey folds, A canopy of silver light condensed To shape and substance. In the midst there stood A female form, one hand upon the Cross, The other raised in menacing act; below Loose flow'd her raiment, but her breast was arm'd, And helmeted her head. The Moor turn'd pale, For on the walls of Auria he had seen That well-known figure, and had well believed She rested with the dead. What, hoa! she cried, Alcahman! In the name of all who fell At Auria in the massacre, this hour I summon thee before the throne of God To answer for the innocent blood ! This hour, Moor, Miscreant, Murderer, Child of Hell, this hour I summon thee to judgment ! - In the name Of God! for Spain and Vengeance!

Thus she closed Her speech; for taking from the Primate's hand That oaken cross which at the sacring rites Had served for crosier, at the cavern's mouth, Pelayo lifted it and gave the word. From voice to voice on either side it pass'd With rapid repetition, — In the name Of God ! for Spain and Vengeance ! and forthwith, On either side, along the whole defile, The Asturians, shouting in the name of God, Set the whole ruin loose ! Huge trunks and stones, And loosen'd crags, down, down they roll'd with rush,

And bound, and thundering force. Such was the fall,

As when some city, by the laboring earth Heaved from its strong foundations, is cast down, And all its dwellings, towers, and palaces, In one wide desolation prostrated. From end to end of that long strait, the crash Was heard continuous, and, commix'd with sounds More dreadful, shricks of horror, and despair, And death, - the wild and agonizing cry Of that whole host in one destruction whelm'd. Vain was all valor there, all martial skill; The valiant arm is helpless now; the feet Swift in the race avail not now to save ; They perish; all their thousands perish there, -Horsemen and infantry, they perish all, ---The outward armor and the bones within Broken, and bruised, and crush'd. Echo prolong'd The long uproar: a silence then ensued,

Through which the sound of Deva's stream was heard,

A lonely voice of waters, wild and sweet; The lingering groan, the faintly-utter'd prayer, The louder curses of despairing death, Ascended not so high. Down from the cave Pelayo hastes; the Asturians hasten down; Fierce and immitigable down they speed On all sides; and along the vale of blood The avenging sword did merey's work that hour.

XXIV.

RODERICK AND COUNT JULIAN.

Thou hast been busy, Death! this day, and yet But half thy work is done; the Gates of Hell Are throng'd, yet twice ten thousand spirits more, Who from their warm and healthful tenements Fear no divorce, must, ere the sun go down, Enter the world of woe! The Gate of Heaven Is open too, and Angels round the throne Of Mercy on their golden harps this day Shall sing the triumphs of Redeeming Love.

There was a Church at Cangas dedicate To that Apostle unto whom his Lord Had given the keys — a humble edifice, Whose rude and time-worn structure suited well That vale among the mountains. Its low roof With stone plants and with moss was overgrown, Short fern, and richer weeds, which from the eaves Hung their long tresses down. White lichens clothed

The sides, save where the ivy spread, which bower'd The porch, and clustering round the pointed wall, Wherein two bells, each open to the wind, Hung side by side, threaded with hairy shoots The double niche; and climbing to the eross, Wreathed it, and half conceal'd its sacred form With bushy tufts luxuriant. Here in the font – Borne hither with rejoicing and with prayers Of all the happy land, who saw in him The lineage of their ancient Chiefs renew'd — The Prince had been immersed: and here within An oaken galilee, now black with age, His old Iberian ancestors were laid.

Two stately oaks stood nigh, in the full growth Of many a century. They had flourish'd there Before the Gothic sword was felt in Spain, And when the ancient sceptre of the Goths Was broken, there they flourish'd still. Their boughs, Mingled on high, and stretching wide around, Form'd a deep shade, beneath which canopy, Upon the ground Count Julian's board was spread; For to his daughter he had left his tent, Pitched for her use hard by. He at the board Sat with his trusted Captains, Gunderick, Felix and Miro, Theudered and Paul, Basil and Cottila, and Virimar, Men through all fortunes faithful to their Lord, And to that old and tried fidelity, By personal love and honor held in ties Strong as religious bonds. As there they sat, In the distant vale a rising dust was seen, And frequent flash of steel, — the flying fight Of men who, by a fiery foe pursued, Put forth their coursers at full speed, to reach The aid in which they trust. Up sprung the Chiefs, And hastily taking helm, and shield, and spear, Sped to their post.

Amid the chestnut groves On Sella's side, Alphonso had in charge To watch the foe: a prowling band came nigh, Whom, with the ardor of impetuous youth, He charged, and followed them in close pursuit : Quick succors join'd them; and the strife grew hot, Ere Pedro, hastening to bring off his son, Or Julian and his Captains, - bent alike That hour to abstain from combat, (for by this Full sure they deem'd Alcahman had secured The easy means of certain victory,) -Could reach the spot. Both thus in their intent According, somewhat had they now allay'd The fury of the fight, though still spears flew, And strokes of sword and mace were interchanged, When, passing through the troop, a Moor came up On errand from the Chief, to Julian sent ; A fatal errand fatally perform'd For Julian, for the Chief, and for himself, And all that host of Mussulmen he brought; For while with well-dissembled words he lured The warrior's ear, the dexterous ruffian mark'd The favoring moment and unguarded place, And plunged a javelin in his side. The Count Fell, but in falling called to Cottila, -Treachery! the Moor! the Moor!- He too on whom

He call'd had seen the blow from whence it came, And seized the Murderer. Miscreant! he exclaim'd,

Who set thee on? The Mussulman, who saw His secret purpose bailled, undismayed, Replies, What I have done is authorized; To punish treachery and prevent worse ill, Orpas and Abulcacem sent me here; The service of the Caliph and the Faith Required the blow.

The Prophet and the Fiend Reward thee then ! cried Cottila ; meantime Take thou from me thy proper earthly meed ; Villain ! - and lifting, as he spake, the sword, He smote him on the neck; the trenchant blade Through vein and artery pass'd and yielding bone; And on the shoulder, as the assassin dropp'd, His head half-severed fell. The curse of God Fall on the Caliph, and the Faith, and thee ! Stamping for anguish, Cottila pursued ; African dogs, thus is it ye requite Our services? - But dearly shall ye pay For this day's work !- O fellow-soldiers, here, Stretching his hands toward the host, he cried, Behold your noble leader basely slain ! He who for twenty years hath led us forth To war, and brought us home with victory, -

Here he lies foully murdered, — by the Moors, — Those whom he trusted, whom he served so well! Our turn is next ! but neither will we wait Idly, nor tamely fall !

Amid the grief, Tumult, and rage, of those who gather'd round, When Julian could be heard, I have yet life, He said, for vengeance. Virimar, speed thou To yonder Mountaineers, and tell their Chiefs That Julian's veteran army joins this day Pelayo's standard ! The command devolves On Gunderick. Fellow-soldiers, who so well Redress'd the wrongs of your old General, Ye will not let his death go unrevenged !-Tears then were seen on many an iron cheek, And groans were heard from many a resolute heart, And yows with imprecations mix'd went forth, And curses check'd by sobs. Bear me apart, Said Julian, with a faint and painful voice, And let me see my daughter ere I die.

Scarce had he spoken when the pitying throng Divide before her. Eagerly she came; A deep and fearful lustre in her eye, A look of settled woe, - pale, deadly pale, Yet to no lamentations giving way, Nor tears nor groans ; --- within her breaking heart She bore the grief, and kneeling solemnly Beside him, raised her awful hands to heaven, And cried, Lord God ! be with him in this hour ! Two things have I to think of, O my child -Vengeance and thee, said Julian. For the first I have provided: what remains of life As best may comfort thee may so be best Employ'd; let me be borne within the church, And thou, with that good man who follows thee, Attend me there.

Thus when Florinda heard Her father speak, a gleam of heavenly joy Shone through the anguish of her countenance. O gracious God, she cried, my prayers are heard ; Now let me die ! - They raised him from the earth ; He, knitting, as they lifted him, his brow, Drew in, through open lips and teeth firm-closed, His painful breath, and on the lance laid hand, Lest its long shaft should shake the mortal wound. Gently his men, with slow and steady step, Their suffering burden bore, and in the Church Before the altar laid him down, his head Upon Florinda's knees. - Now, friends, said he, Farewell. 1 ever hoped to meet my death Among ye, like a soldier, - but not thus ! Go join the Asturians; and in after-years, When of your old commander ye shall talk, How well he loved his followers, what he was In battle, and how basely he was slain, Let not the tale its fit completion lack, But say how bravely was his death revenged. Vengeance! in that good word doth Julian make His testament ; your faithful swords must give The will its full performance. Leave me now; I have done with worldly things. Comrades, fare. well,

And love my memory !

They with copious tears

Of burning anger, grief exasperating Their rage, and fury giving force to grief, Hasten'd to form their ranks against the Moors. Julian meantime toward the altar turn'd His languid eyes. That Image, is it not St. Peter? he inquired; he who denied His Lord, and was forgiven? — Roderick rejoin'd, It is the Apostle; and may that same Lord, O Julian, to thy soul's salvation bless The seasonable thought!

The dying Count Then fix'd upon the Goth his earnest eyes. No time, said he, is this for bravery, As little for dissemblance. 1 would fain Die in the faith wherein my fathers died, Whereto they pledged me in mine infancy. A soldier's habits, he pursued, have steel'd My spirit, and perhaps I do not fear This passage as I ought. But if to feel That I have sinn'd, and from my soul renounce The Impostor's faith, which never in that soul Obtain'd a place, - if at the Savior's feet, Laden with guilt, to east myself and ery, Lord, I believe ! help thou my unbelief ! If this in the sincerity of death Sufficieth, - Father, let me from thy lips Receive the assurances with which the Church Doth bless the dying Christian.

Roderick raised His eyes to heaven, and crossing on his breast His open palms-Mysterious are thy ways And merciful, O gracious Lord! he cried, Who to this end hast thus been pleased to lead My wandering steps! O Father, this thy son Hath sinn'd and gone astray : but hast not Thou Said, When the sinner from his evil ways Turneth, that he shall save his soul alive, And Angels at the sight rejoice in Heaven! Therefore do I, in thy most holy name, Into thy family receive again Him who was lost, and in that name absolve The Penitent. - So saying, on the head Of Julian solemnly he laid his hands. Then to the altar tremblingly he turn'd, And took the bread, and breaking it, pursued ---Julian ! receive from me the Bread of Life ! In silence reverently the Count partook The reconciling rite, and to his lips Roderick then held the consecrated cup.

Me too! exclaim'd Florinda, who till then Had listen'd speechlessly; thou Man of God, I also must partake! The Lord hath heard My prayers! one sacrament, — one hour, — one grave, —

One resurrection !

That dread office done, Count Julian with amazement saw the Priest Kneel down before him. By the sacrament Which we have here partaken, Roderiek cried, In this most awful moment; by that hope, — That holy faith which comforts thee in death, Grant thy forgiveness, Julian, ere thou diest! Behold the man who most hath injured thee! Roderick, the wretched Goth, the guilty cause Of all thy guilt, — the unworthy instrument Of thy redemption, — kneels before thee here, And prays to be forgiven !

Roderick ! exclaim'd The dying Count,-Roderick !- and from the floor With violent effort half he raised himself; The spear hung heavy in his side, and pain And weakness overcame him, that he fell Back on his daughter's lap. O Death, cried he, -Passing his hand across his cold, damp brow, -Thou tamest the strong limb, and conquerest The stubborn heart! But yesterday I said One Heaven could not contain mine enemy And me; and now I lift my dying voice To say, Forgive me, Lord, as 1 forgive [eyes Him who hath done the wrong !- He closed his A moment; then with sudden impulse cried,-Roderick, thy wife is dead, - the Church hath power

To free thee from thy vows, - the broken heart Might yet be heal'd, the wrong redress'd, the throne Rebuilt by that same hand which pull'd it down, And these cursed Africans - Oh for a month Of that waste life which millions misbestow !-His voice was passionate, and in his eye With glowing animation while he spake The vehement spirit shone : its effort soon Was past, and painfully, with feeble breath, In slow and difficult utterance he pursued, -Vain hope, if all the evil was ordain'd, And this wide wreck the will and work of Heaven, We but the poor occasion ! Death will make All clear, and, joining us in better worlds, Complete our union there ! Do for me now One friendly office more : - draw forth the spear, And free me from this pain !- Receive his soul, Savior ! exclaim'd the Goth, as he perform'd The fatal service. Julian eried, O friend !---True friend ! - and gave to him his dying hand. Then said he to Florinda, I go first, Thou followest ! -- kiss me, child ! -- and now, good night!

When from her father's body she arose, Her check was flush'd, and in her eyes there beam'd A wilder brightness. On the Goth she gazed,

While underneath the emotions of that hour

Exhausted life gave way. O God! she said, Lifting her hands, thou hast restored me all,—

All — in one hour ! — and round his neck she threw

Her arms, and cried, My Roderick! mine in Heaven!

Groaning, he clasp'd her close, and in that act And agony her happy spirit fled.

RODERICK IN BATTLE.

EIGHT thousand men had to Asturias march'd Beneath Count Julian's banner; the remains RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

him;

Be that remember'd in his history,

And let no shame be offer'd his remains.

Of that brave army which in Africa So well against the Mussulman made head, Till sense of injuries insupportable, And raging thirst of vengeance, overthrew Their leader's noble spirit. To revenge His quarrel, twice that number left their bones, Slain in unnatural battle, on the field Of Xeres, when the sceptre from the Goths By righteons Heaven was reft. Others had fallen Consumed in sieges, alway by the Moor To the front of war opposed. The policy, With whatsoever show of honor cloak'd, Was gross, and this surviving band had oft At their caronsals, of the flagrant wrong, Held such discourse as stirs the mounting blood, The common danger with one discontent Affecting chiefs and men. Nor had the bonds Of rooted discipline and faith attach'd Thus long restrain'd them, had they not known well

That Julian in their just resentment shared, And fix'd their hopes on him. Slight impulse now Sufficed to make these fiery martialists Break forth in open fury; and though first Count Pedro listen'd with suspicious ear To Julian's dying errand, deeming it Some new decoy of treason, - when he found A second legate follow'd Virimar, And then a third, and saw the turbulence Of the camp, and how against the Moors in haste They form'd their lines, he knew that Providence This hour had for his country interposed, And in such faith advanced to use the aid Thus wondrously ordain'd. The eager Chiefs Hasten to greet him, Cottila and Paul, Basil and Miro, Theudered, Gunderick, Felix, and all who held authority; The zealous services of their brave host They proffer'd, and besought him instantly To lead against the African their force Combined, and in good hour assail a foe Divided, nor for such attack prepared.

While thus they communed, Roderick from the church

Came forth, and seeing Pedro, bent his way Toward them. Sirs, said he, the Count is dead; He died a Christian, reconciled to Heaven, In faith; and when his danghter had received His dying breath, her spirit too took flight. One sacrament, one death, united them : And I beseech ye, ye who from the work Of blood which lies before us may return, — If, as 1 think, it should not be my fate, — That in one grave with Christian ceremonies Ye lay them side by side. In Heaven I ween They are met through merey : — ill befall the man Who should in death divide them ! — Then he turn'd

His speech to Pedro in an under voice.That Roderick took the shield, and round hisThe King, said he, 1 know, with noble mindHung it, and vanlted in the seat. My horseWill judge of the departed; Christian-likeMy noble horse ! he cried, with flattering hasHe died, and with a manly penitence :My noble horse ! he cried, with flattering hasThey who condemn him most should call to mindI thank him for't — hath kept thee daintily !

As Pedro would have answer'd, a loud cry Of menacing imprecation from the troops Arose; for Orpas, by the Moorish Chief Sent to allay the storm his villany Had stirr'd, came hastening on a milk-white steed And at safe distance having check'd the rein, Beekon'd for parley. 'Twas Orelio On which he rode, Roderick's own battle-horse, Who from his master's hand had wont to feed, And with a glad doeility obey His voice familiar. At the sight the Goth Started, and indignation to his soul Brought back the thoughts and feelings of old times. Suffer me, Count, he cried, to answer him, And hold these back the while ! Thus having said, He waited no reply, but as he was, Bareheaded, in his weeds, and all unarin'd, Advanced toward the renegade. Sir Priest, Quoth Orpas as he came, I hold no talk With thee; my errand is with Gunderick And the Captains of the host, to whom 1 bring Such liberal offers and clear proof-The Goth Breaking with scornful voice his speech, ex claim'd, What, could no steed but Roderick's serve thy turn ! I should have thought some sleek and sober mule Long train'd in shackles to procession pace, More suited to my lord of Seville's use Than this good war-horse, - he who never bore A villain, until Orpas cross'd his back !--Wretch ! cried the astonish'd renegade, and stoop'd Foaming with anger, from the saddle-bow, To reach his weapon. Ere the hasty hand, Trembling in passion, could perform its will, Roderick had seized the reins. How now, he cried, Orelio! old companion, - my good horse, -Off with this recreant burden ! - And with that He raised his hand, and rear'd and back'd the steed. To that remember'd voice and arm of power Obedient. Down the helpless traitor fell, Violently thrown, and Roderick over him Thrice led, with just and unrelenting hand, The trampling hoofs. Go, join Witiza now, Where he lies howling, the avenger cried, And tell him Roderick sent thee !

How grievous was the wrong which madden'd

At that sight, Count Julian's soldiers and the Astarian hest Set up a shout, a joyful shout, which rung Wide through the welkin. Their exulting cry With londer acclamation was renew'd, When from the expiring miscreant's neck they saw That Roderick took the shield, and round his own Hung it, and vanlted in the seat. My horse ! My noble horse ! he cried, with flattering hand Patting his high-arch'd neck ! the renegade — I thank him for't — hath kept thee daintily !

Orelio, thou art in thy beauty still, Thy pride and strength! Orelio, my good horse, Once more thou bearest to the field thy Lord, He who so oft hath fed and cherish'd thee, He for whose sake, wherever thon wert seen, Thon wert by all men honor'd. Once again Thou hast thy proper master! Do thy part As thon wert wont; and bear him gloriously, My beautiful Orelio, - to the last -The happiest of his fields ! - Then he drew forth The cimeter, and waving it aloft, Rode toward the troops; its unaecustom'd shape Disliked him. Renegade in all things! cried The Goth, and east it from him; to the Chiefs Then said, If I have done ye service here, Help me, I pray you, to a Spanish sword ! The trustiest blade that e'er in Bilbilis Was dipp'd, would not to-day be misbestowed On this right hand !- Go, some one, Gunderick cried, And bring Count Julian's sword. Whoe'er thou art. The worth which thou hast shown avenging him Entitles thee to wear it. But thou goest For battle unequipp'd ; - haste there, and strip Yon villain of his armor ! Late he spake, So fast the Moors came on. It matters not, Replied the Goth; there's many a mountaineer, Who in no better armor eased this day Than his wonted leathern gipion, will be found In the hottest battle, yet bring off untouch'd The unguarded life he ventures. - Taking then Count Julian's sword, he fitted round his wrist The chain, and eyeing the elaborate steel With stern regard of joy - The African Under unhappy stars was born, he eried, Who tastes thy edge !- Make ready for the charge ! They come - they come ! - On, brethren, to the field ! ---The word is, Vengeance ! Vengeance was the word; From man to man, and rank to rank it pass'd, By every heart enforced, by every voice Sent forth in loud defiance of the foe. The enemy in shriller sounds return'd Their Akbar and the Prophet's trusted name. The horsemen lower'd their spears, the infantry, Deliberately, with slow and steady step, Advanced; the bow-strings twang'd, and arrows hiss'd, And javelins hurtled by. Anon the hosts Met in the shock of battle, horse and man Conflicting; shield struck shield, and sword, and mace, And curtle-axe on helm and buckler rung; Armor was riven, and wounds were interchanged, And many a spirit from its mortal hold Hurried to bliss or bale. Well did the Chiefs Of Julian's army in that hour support Their old esteem; and well Count Pedro there Enhanced his former praise ; and by his side,

Rejoicing like a bridegroom in the strife,

Alphonso through the host of infidels

Bore on his bloody lance dismay and death. But there was worst confusion and uproar, There widest slaughter and dismay, where, proud Of his recover'd Lord, Orelio plunged Through thickest ranks, trampling beneath his feet The living and the dead. Where'er he turns, The Moors divide and fly. What man is this, Appall'd they say, who to the front of war Bareheaded offers thus his naked life? Replete with power he is, and terrible, Like some destroying Angel! Sure his lips Have drank of Kaf's dark fountain, and he comes Strong in his immortality! Fly! fly! They said ; this is no human foe !- Nor less Of wonder fill'd the Spaniards when they saw How flight and terror went before his way, And slanghter in his path. Behold, eries one, With what command and knightly ease he sits The intrepid steed, and deals from side to side His dreadful blows! Not Roderick in his power Bestrode with such command and majesty That noble war-horse. His loose robe this day Is death's black banner, shaking from its folds Dismay and ruin. Of no mortal mould Is he who in that garb of peace affronts Whole hosts, and sees them seatter where he turns ' Auspicions Heaven beholds us, and some Saint Revisits earth !

Ay, eries another, Heaven Hath ever with especial bounty bless'd Above all other lands its favor'd Spain; Choosing her children forth from all mankind For its peculiar people, as of yore Abraham's ungrateful race beneath the Law. Who knows not how on that most holy night When peace on Earth by Angels was proclaim'd, The light which o'er the fields of Bethlehem shone, Irradiated whole Spain? not just display'd, As to the Shepherds, and again withdrawn; All the long winter hours from eve till morn Her forests, and her mountains, and her plains, Her hills and valleys, were imbathed in light, A light which came not from the sun, or moon, Or stars, by secondary powers dispensed, But from the fountain-springs, the Light of Light Effluent. And wherefore should we not believe That this may be some Saint or Angel, charged To lead us to miraculous vietory? Hath not the Virgin Mother, oftentimes Descending, clothed in glory, sanctified With feet adorable our happy soil !-Mark'd ye not, said another, how he east In wrath the unhallow'd eimeter away, And ealled for Christian weapon? Oh, be sure This is the aid of Heaven! On, comrades, on ! A miracle to-day is wrought for Spain! Victory and Vengeance ! Hew the misereants down, And spare not! hew them down in sacrifice i God is with us! his Saints are in the field ! Victory, miraculous Victory !

Thus they Inflamed with wild belief the keen desire Of vengeance on their enemies abhorr'd. The Moorish Chief, meantime, o'erlooked the fight

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

From an eminence, and cursed the renegade Whose counsels sorting to such ill effect Had brought this danger on. Lo, from the East Comes fresh alarm ! a few poor fugitives Well nigh with fear examinate came up, From Covadonga flying, and the rear Of that destruction, scarce with breath to tell Their dreadful tale. When Abulcacem heard, Stricken with horror, like a man bereft Of sense, he stood. O Prophet, he exclaim'd, A hard and cruel fortune hast thou brought This day upon thy servant! Must I then Here with disgrace and ruin close a life Of glorious deeds? But how should man resist Fate's irreversible decrees, or why Marmur at what must be? They who survive May mourn the evil which this day begins : My part will soon be done !- Grief then gave way To rage, and cursing Guisla, he pursued -Oh that that treacherous woman were but here ' It were a consolation to give her The evil death she merits! That reward She hath had, a Moor replied. For when we reach'd The entrance of the vale, it was her choice There in the farthest dwellings to be left, Lest she should see her brother's face; but thence We found her flying at the overthrow, And visiting the treason on her head, Pierced her with wounds. - Poor vengeance for a host Destroyed! said Abulcacem in his soul. Howbeit, resolving to the last to do His office, he roused up his spirit. Go, Strike off Count Eudon's head! he cried; the fear Which brought him to our camp will bring him else In arms against us now ; for Sisihert And Ebba, he continued thus in thought, Their uncle's fate forever bars all plots Of treason on their part; no hope have they Of safety but with us. He call'd them then With chosen troops to join him in the front Of battle, that, by bravely making head, Retreat might now be won. Then fiercer raged The conflict, and more frequent cries of death, Mingling with imprecations and with prayers, Rose through the din of war. By this the blood Which Deva down her fatal channel pour'd,

Which Deva down her lath channel pour d, Purpling Pionia's course, had reach'd and stain'd The wider stream of Sella. Soon far off The frequent glance of spears and gleam of arms Were seen, which sparkled to the westering orb, Where down the vale impatient to complete The glorious work so well that day begun, Pelayo led his troops. On foot they came, Chieftains and men alike; the Oaken Cross Triumphant, borne on high, precedes their march, And broad and bright the argent banner shone. Roderick, who, dealing death from side to side, Had through the Moorish army now made way, Beheld it flash, and judging well what aid Approach'd, with sudden impulse that way rode, To tell of what had pass'd, — lest in the strife They should engage with Julian's men, and mar The mighty consummation. One ran on To meet him fleet of foot, and having given His tale to this swift messenger, the Goth Halted awhile to let Orelio breathe. Siverian, quoth Pelayo, if mine eyes Deceive me not, yon horse, whose reeking sides Are red with slanghter, is the same on whom The apostate Orpas in his vaintery Wont to parade the streets of Cordoba. But thou shouldst know him best; regard him well, Is't not Orelio?

Either it is he, The old man replied, or one so like to him, Whom all thought matchless, that similitude Would be the greater wonder. But behold, What man is he who in that disarray Doth with such power and majesty bestride The noble steed, as if he felt himself In his own proper seat? Look, how he leans To cherish him; and how the gallant horse Curves up his stately neck, and bends his head, As if again to court that gentle touch, And answer to the voice which praises him ! Can it be Maccabee? rejoin'd the King, Or are the secret wishes of my soul Indeed fulfill'd, and hath the grave given up Its dead? - So saying, on the old man he turn'd Eyes full of wide astonishment, which told The incipient thought that for incredible He spake no further. But enough had pass'd, For old Siverian started at the words Like one who sees a spectre, and exclaim'd, Blind that I was to know him not till now ! My Master, O my Master!

He meantime With easy pace moved on to meet their march. King, to Pelayo he began, this day, By means scarce less than miracle, thy throne Is stablish'd, and the wrongs of Spain revenged. Orpas, the accursed, upon yonder field Lies ready for the ravens. By the Moors Treacherously slain, Count Julian will be found Before Saint Peter's altar; nnto him Grace was vonchsafed; and by that holy power Which at Visonia by the Primate's hand Of his own proper act to me was given, Unworthy as I am, - yet sure I think Not without mystery, as the event hath shown, ---Did I accept Count Julian's penitence, And reconcile the dying man to Heaven. Beside him hath his daughter gone to rest. Deal honorably with his remains, and let One grave with Christian rites receive them both Is it not written that as the Tree falls So it shall lie?

In this and at. things else, Pelayo answer'd, looking wistfully Upon the Goth, thy pleasure shall be done. Then Roderick saw that he was known, and turn d His head away in silence. But the old man Laid hold upon his bridle, and look'd up In his master's face, weeping and silently. Thereat the Goth, with fervent pressure, took His hand, and bending down toward him, said,

XXV.

My good Siverian, go not thou this day To war! I charge thee keep thyself from harm! Thou art past the age for combats, and with whom Hereafter should thy mistress talk of me If thon wert gone? — Thou seest I am unarm'd; Thus disarray'd as thou beholdest me, Clean through yon miscreant army have I cut My way unhurt; but being once by Heaven Preserved, I would not perish with the guilt Of having wilfully provoked my death. Give me thy helmet and thy cuirass !— Nay, — Thou wert not wont to let me ask in vain, Nor to oppose me when my will was known ! To thee, methinks, I should be still the King.

Thus saying, they withdrew a little way Within the trees. Roderick alighted there, And in the old man's armor dight himself. Dost thon not marvel by what wondrous chance, Said he, Orelio to his master's hand Hath been restored? I found the renegade Of Seville on his back, and hurl'd him down Headlong to the earth. The noble animal Rejoicingly obey'd my hand to shake His recreant burden off, and trample out The life which once I spared in evil hour. Now let me meet Witiza's viperous sons In yonder field, and then I may go rest In peace, —my work is done !

And nobly done ' Exclaim'd the old man. Oh! thou art greater now

Than in that glorious hour of victory When grovelling in the dust Witiza lay, The prisoner of thy hand !- Roderick replied, O good Siverian, happier victory Thy son hath now achieved, - the victory Over the world, his sins, and his despair. If on the field my body should be found, See it, I charge thee, laid in Julian's grave, And let no idle ear be told for whom Thou mournest. Thou wilt use Orelio As doth beseem the steed which hath so oft Carried a King to battle ; - he hath done Good service for his rightful Lord tu-day, And better yet must do. Siverian, now Farewell! I think we shall not meet again Till it be in that world where never change Is known, and they who love shall part no more. Commend me to my mother's prayers, and say That never man enjoy'd a heavenlier peace Than Roderick at this hour. O faithful friend, How dear thou art to me these tears may tell !

With that he fell upon the old man's neck; Then vanited in the saddle, gave the reins, And soon rejoin'd the host. On, courades, on ! Victory and Vengeance ! he exclaim'd, and took The lead on that good charger, he alone Horsed for the onset. They, with one consent, Gave all their voices to the inspiring ery, Victory and Vengeance ! and the hills and rocks Caught the prophetic shout and roll'd it round. Count Pedro's people heard amid the heat Of battle, and return'd the glad acclaim. The astonish'd Mussulmen, on all sides charged, Hear that tremendous cry; yet manfully They stood, and every where, with gallant front, Opposed in fair array the shock of war. Desperately they fought, like men expert in arms. And knowing that no safety could be found, Save from their own right hands. No former day Of all his long career had seen their chief Approved so well; nor had Witiza's sons Ever before this hour achieved in fight Such feats of resolute valor. Sisibert Beheld Pelayo in the field afoot, And twice essay'd beneath his horse's feet To thrust him down. Twice did the Prince evade The shock, and twice upon his shield received The fratricidal sword. Tempt me no more, Son of Witiza, cried the indignant chief, Lest I forget what mother gave thee birth ! Go meet thy death from any hand but mine ! He said, and turn'd aside. Fitliest from me ! Exclaim'd a dreadful voice, as through the throng Orelio forced his way: fitliest from me Receive the rightful death too long withheld ! 'Tis Roderick strikes the blow ! And as he spake, Upon the traitor's shoulder fierce he drove The weapon, well-bestow'd. He in the seat Totter'd and fell. The Avenger hasten'd on In search of Ebba; and in the heat of fight Rejoicing, and forgetful of all else, Set up his cry, as he was wont in youth ---Roderick the Goth !- his war-cry known so well. Pelayo eagerly took up the word, And should out his kinsman's name beloved -Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory! Roderick and Vengeance ! Odoar gave it forth; Urban repeated it, and through his ranks Count Pedro sent the cry. Not from the field Of his great victory, when Witiza fell, With louder acclamations had that name Been borne abroad upon the winds of heaven. The unreflecting throng, who yesterday, If it had pass'd their lips, would with a curse Have clogg'd it, echoed it as if it came From some celestial voice in the air, reveal'd To be the certain pledge of all their hopes. Roderick the Goth ! Roderick and Victory ! Roderick and Vengeance! O'er the field it spread, All hearts and tongnes uniting in the ery; Mountains, and rocks, and vales recehoed round,

And he, rejoicing in his strength, rode on, Laying on the Moors with that good sword, and smote, And overthrew, and scatter'd, and destroy'd,

And trampled down; and scatter d, and destroy d, And trampled down; and still at every blow Exultingly he sent the war-cry forth, Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory ¹ Roderick and Vengeance!

Thus he made his way, Smiting and slaying, through the astonish'd ranks: Till he beheld, where, on a fiery barb, Ebba, performing well a soldier's part, Dealt to the right and left his deadly blows. With mutual rage they met. The renegade Displays a eimeter, the splendid gift

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

Of Walid from Damaseus sent; its hilt Emboss'd with gems, its blade of perfect steel, Which, like a mirror sparkling to the sun With dazzling splendor, flash'd. The Goth objects Ilis shield, and on its rim received the edge Driven from its aim aside, and of its force Diminish'd. Many a frustrate stroke was dealt On either part, and many a foin and thrust Aim'd and rebated; many a deadly blow Straight, or reverse, delivered and repell'd. Roderick at length with better speed hath reach'd The apostate's turban, and through all its folds The true Cantahrian weapon making way Attain'd his forehead. Wretch! the avenger cried, It comes from Roderick's hand ! Roderick the Goth 1

XXV.

Who spared, who trusted thee, and was betray'd! Go tell thy father now how thon hast sped With all thy treasons! Saying thus, he seized The miserable, who, blinded now with blood, Reel'd in the saddle; and with sidelong step Backing Orelio, drew him to the ground. He shricking, as beneath the horse's feet He fell, forgot his late-learnt creed, and called On Mary's name. The dreadful Goth pass'd on, Still plunging through the thickest war, and still Scattering, where'er he turn'd, the affrighted ranks.

O who could tell what deeds were wrought that day;

Or who endure to hear the tale of rage, Hatred, and madness, and despair, and fear, Horror, and wounds, and agony, and death, The cries, the blasphemies, the shrieks, and groans, And prayers, which mingled with the din of arms In one wild uproar of terrific sounds; While over all predominant was heard, Reiterate from the conquerors o'er the field, Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory! Roderick and Vengeanee ! - Woe for Africa ! Woe for the circumcised ! Woe for the faith Of the lying Ishmaelite that hour ! The Chiefs Have fallen; the Moors, confused, and captainless, And panic-stricken, vainly seek to escape The inevitable fate. Turn where they will, Strong in his cause, rejoicing in success, Insatiate at the banquet of revenge, The enemy is there; look where they will, Death hath environed their devoted ranks : Fly where they will, the avenger and the sword Await them, - wretches ! whom the righteous arm Hath overtaken ! - Join'd in bonds of faith Accurs'd, the most flagitious of mankind From all parts met are here ; the apostate Greek, The vicious Syrian, and the sullen Copt, The Persian cruel and corrupt of soul, The Arabian robber, and the prowling sons Of Africa, who from their thirsty sands Pray that the locusts on the peopled plain May settle and prepare their way. Conjoined Beneath an impious faith, which sanctifies To them all deeds of wickedness and blood, -Yea, and halloos them on, - here are they met To be conjoin'd in punishment this hour. For plunder, violation, massacre,

All bideous, all unutterable things, The righteous, the immitigable sword Exacts due vengeance now ! the ery of blood Is heard : the measure of their crimes is full; Such merey as the Moor at Auria gave, Such merey hath he found this dreadful hour !

The evening darken'd, but the avenging sword Turn'd not away its edge till night had closed Upon the field of blood. The Chieftains then Blew .ne recall, and from their perfect work Return'd rejoicing, all but he for whom All look'd with most expectance. He full sure Had thought upon that field to find his end Desired, and with Florinda in the grave Rest, in indissoluble union join'd. But still where through the press of war he went Half-arm'd, and like a lover seeking death, The arrows pass'd him by to right and left; The spear-point pierced him not; the cimeter Glanced from his helmet; he, when he beheld The rout complete, saw that the shield of Heaven Had been extended over him once more, And bowed before its will. Upon the banks Of Sella was Orelio found, his legs And flanks incarnadined, his poitral smeared With froth, and foam, and gore, his silver mane Sprinkled with blood, which hung on every hair, Aspersed like dew-drops; trembling there he stood From the toil of battle, and at times sent forth His tremulous voice far echoing loud and shrill, A frequent, anxious cry, with which he seem'd To call the master whom he loved so well, And who had thus again forsaken him. Siverian's helm and cuirass on the grass Lay near; and Julian's sword, its hilt and chain Clotted with blood; but where was he whose hand Had wielded it so well that glorious day ? ---

Days, months, and years, and generations pass'd, And centuries held their course, before, far off Within a hermitage near Viseu's walls A humble tomb was found, which bore inscribed In ancient characters King Roderick's name.

NOTES.

Count Julian called the invaders. - I. p. 649. col. 2.

The story of Count Julian and his daughter has been treated as a fible by some nuthors, because it is not mentioned by the three writers who lived nearest the time. But those writers state the mere fact of the conquest of Spain as briefly as possible, without entering into particulars of any kind; and the best Spanish historians and antiquaries are persuaded that there is no cause for disbelieving the uniform and concurrent tradition of both Moors and Christians.

For the purposes of poetry, it is immaterial whether the story be true or false. I have represented the Count as a man both sinned against and sinning, and equally to be commiserated and condemned. The author of the Tragedy of Count Julian has contemplated his character in a grander point of view, and represented him as a man self-justified in bringing an army of foreign auxiliaries to assist him in delivoring his recede, the evils which he is thus bringing upon her.

Not victory that o'ershadows him, sees he ! No airy and light passion stirs abroad To ruffle or to soothe him ; all are quell'd Beneath a mightier, sterner, stress of mind : Wakeful he sits, and lonely and unmoved, Beyond the arrows, views, or shouts of men : As oftentimes an eagle, when the sun Threws e'er the varying earth his early ray, Stands solitary, stands immovable Upon some highest cliff, and rolls his eye, Clear, constant, unobservant, unabased, In the cold light, above the dews of morn.

Act 5, Scene 2.

Parts of this tragedy are as fine in their kind as any thing which can be found in the whole compass of English poetry. Juan de Mena places Count Julian with Orpas, the renegado Archbishop of Seville, in the deepest pit of hell.

> No buenamente te puedo callar Orpas maldito, ni a ti Julian, Pues soys en el valle mas hondo de afan, Que no se redime jamas por llorar : Qual ya crueza vos pudo indignar A vender un dia las tierras y leges De Espana, las quales pujança de reyes En años u tantos no pudo cobrar.

Copla 91.

A Portuguese poet, Andre da Sylva Mascarenhas, is mere indulgent to the Count, and seems to consider it as a mark of degeneracy in his ewo times, that the same crime would ne lenger provoke the same vengeance. His catalogue of women who have become famons by the evil of which they have been the occasion, begins with Eve, and ends with Anne Boleyn.

> Louvar se pode ao Conde o sentimento Da offensa da sua honestidade, Se o nam vituperara co crucuto Disburate da Hispana Christandade ; Se hoje ouvera stapros cento c cento Nesta nossa infeliz lascira idade, Non se perdera nam a forte Espanha, Que o crime frequentado nam se estranha.

Por mulheres porem se tem perdido Muitos reynos da outra e desta cida ; Por Eva se perdeo o Ceo subido, Por Helena a Asia esclarcoida ; Por Cleopatra o Egypto foi veneida, Assiria por Simiramis perdida, Por Cava se perdeo a forte Espanha, E por Anna Bolena a Gram Bretanha. Destruicam de Espanha, p. 9.

Inhuman priests with unoffending blood Had stain'd their country. - I. p. 649, col. 2.

Never has any country been so cursed by the spirit of persecution as Spain. Under the Heathen Emperors it had its full share of suffering, and the first fital precedent of appealiog to the secular power to punish heresy with death, occurred in Scain. Then came the Arian controversy. There was as much bigotry, as much rancor, as little of the spirit of Christianity, and as much intolerance, on one part as on the other : but the successful party were better politicians, and more expert in the management of miracles.

Near to the city of Osen, or Ossel, there was a famous Catholic church, and a more famous haptistery, which was in the form of a cross. On Holy Thursday is every year, the bishop, the clergy, and the people assembled there, saw that the baptistery was empty, and enjoyed a marvellous fragrance, which differed from that of any, or all, flowers and spices, for it was an odor which came as the vesper of the divine virtue that was about to manifest itself. Then they fastened the dours of the church, and sealed them. On Easter Eve the country from a tyrant, and foreseeing, when it is too late to | doors were opened, the baptistery was found full of water, and all the children born within the preceding twelve months were baptized. Theudisclo, an Arian king, set his seal also upon the doors for two successive years, and set a guard there. Still the miraculous baptistery was filled. The third year he suspected pipes, and ordered a trench to be dug round the building ; but before the day of trial arrived, he was murdered, as opportunely as Arius himself. The trench was dry, but the workmen did not dig deep enough, and the miracle was continued. When the victory of the Catholic party was complete, it was no loager necessary to keep it up. The same haptistery was employed to convince the Spaniards of their error in keeping Easter. In Brito's time, a few ruins, called Oscla, were shown near the river Cambria; the broken baptistery was then called the Bath, and some wild superstitions which the peasantry related bere traces of the original legend. The trick was not oncommon ; it was practised in Sicily and in other places. The story, however, is of some value, as showing that baptism was administered * only once a year, (except in cases of danger,) that immersion was the manner, and that infants were baptized.

Arianism seems to have lingered in Spain long after its defeat. The names Pelayo (Pelagius) and Arias certainly appear to indicate a cherished heresy, and Brite † must bave felt this when he deduced the former name from Saint Pelayo of the teath century; for how came the Saint by it, and how could Brito have forgotten the founder of the Spanish monarchy?

In the latter half of the eleventh century, the Count of Barcelona, Ramon Berenguer, Cap de estopa, as he was called, for his bushy head, made war upon some Christians who are said to have turned Arians, and took the castles into which they retired,† By the number of their castles, which he gave to those chiefs who assisted him in conquering them, they appear to have been numerous. It is not improbable that those people were really what they are called ; for Arian has never been, like Manichwan, a torm ignorantly and indiscriminately given to heretics of all descriptions; and there is no heresy which would be so well understood in Spain, and so likely to have revived there.

The feelings of the triumphant party toward their opponents are well marked by the manner in which St. Isidore speaks of the death of the emperor Valens. Thraciam frero incendiisque depopulantur, deletoque Romanorum exercitu ipsum Valentem jaculo vulneratum, in quadam villa fugientem succenderunt, ut merito ipse ab eis vivus temporali cremarctar incendio, qui tam pulchras animas ignibus æternis § tradiderat. If the truth of this opinion should be doubted, there is a good Athanasian miracle in the Chronicon || of S. Isidore and Melitus, to prove it. A certain Arian, by name Olympius, heing in the bath, blasphemed the Holy Trinity, and, behold ! being struck by an angel with three fiery darts, he was visibly consumed.

With regard to the Arians, the Catholics only did to the others as the others would have done to them; but the persecution of the Jews was equally unprovoked and inhuman. They are said to have betrayed many towns to the Moors; and it would be strange indeed if they had not, by every means in their power, assisted in overthrowing a government under which they were miserably oppressed. St. Isidere has a memorable passage relating to their cruel persecution and compulsery conversion under Sisebut; Qui initio regni Judavos ud Fidem Christianam permorens æmulationem quidem habuit, sed non scenndum scuntiam : potestate enim cumpulit, quos provucare fidei ratione oportait. Sed sicut est scriptum sive per occasionem sive per veritatem, Christus annuntiatur, in hoc gaudeo et gaudeba. - S. Isidor, Christ, Goth. Espana Sagrada, 6, 502.

The Moorish conquest procured for them an interval of repose, till the Inquisition was established, and by its damnable acts put all former herrors out of remembrance. When To- (ledo was recovered from the Mours by Alonso VI., the Jews of that city waited upon the conquerer, and assured him that they were part of the ten tribes whom Nebuchadnezzar had transported into Spain ; not the descendants of the Jerusalem Jews who had crucified Christ. Their encesters, they said, were entirely innecent of the crucifixion ; for when Caiaphas the high-priest had written to the Toledan synagogues to ask their advice respecting the person who called himself the Messiah, and whether he should be slain, the Toledon Jews returned for answer, that in their judgment the prophecies seemed to be fulfilled in this person, and, therefore, he ought not by any means to he put to death. This reply they preduced in the original Hebrew, and in Arabic, as it had been translated by command of King Galifre. Alooso gave car to the story, had the letter rendered into Latin and Castilian, and deposited it among the archives of Toledo. The latter version is thus printed by Sandoval: --

Levi Archisinagogo, et Samuel, et Joseph, homes bonos del Aljama de Toledo, a Eleasar Muyd gran Sacerdote, e a Samuel Canud, y Anas, y Cayphas, homes bonos de la Aljama de la Terra Santa, Salud en el Dios de Israel.

Azarias voso home, Maeso en ley nos aduxo las cartas que vos nos embiavades, por las quales nos faziades saber cuemo passava la facienda del Propheta Nazaret, que diz que facie muchas sennas. Colo por esta vila, non ha mucho, un cierto Samuel, fil de Amacias, et fablo nusco, et reconto muchas bondades deste home, que ye, que es hame homildaso et manso, que fabla con los lageriados, que fuz a todos bien, e que faciendole a el mal, el non fuz mal a ninguem; et que es home fuerte can superbos et hames malos, et que vos malamente teniades enemiga con ele, por quanto en faz el descubria vosos pecados, ca por quanto facia esto, le aviades mala voluntad. Et perquirimos deste hame, en que año, o mes o dia, avia nacido: et que nos lo dixesse: falamos que el dia de la sua Natividade foron vistos en estas partes tres soles muelle a muelle, fizieron soldemente ua sol; it enemo nosos padres cataron esta sennn, asmados dixeroa que cedo el Messias naceria, et que por aventura era ja nacido. Catad hermanos si por aventura ha ja venida et non le ayades acutado. Relataba tambien el susodicho home, que el suo pay le recontava, que ciertos Magos, homes de mucha supiencia, en la sua Natividade legaron a tierra santa, perquiriendo logar donde el niño suncto era nacido ; y que Herodes voso Rey se asmo, et diposito junto a homes sabios de sua vila, e perquirio dande nasceria el Infante, por quien perquiriun Magos, et le respondieron, en Betlem de Juda, segun que Micheas depergino profeto. Et que dixeron aqueles Magos, que una estrella de grun craredad, de luenac aduro a tierra santa : catad non sea esta quela profezia, cataran Reyes, et andaran en eraridad de la sua Natividade. Otrosi, catad non persigades al que forades tenudos mucho hourar et recibir de bou talante. Mais fazed lo que tuvieres por bien aguisada ; nos vos dezimos que niu por conseja, na por noso alvedrio ceniremos en consentimiento de la suu morte. Ca, si nos esto fiziessemos, logo seria nnesco, que la profezia que diz, congregaronse de consuno contra el Sennor, et contra el suo Messias. E damos vos este consejo, maguera sodes homes de muyta sapença, que tengades grande aficamento sobre tamana fazienda, porque el Dios de Israel enojado con vusco, non destruya casu segunda de voso segundo templa. Ca sepades cierto, cedo ha de ser destruyda ; el por esta rason nasos untepassados, que salieron de captiverio de Babylonia, siendo suo Capitane Pyrro, que embio Rey Cyro, et aduzo nusco muytas riqueças que tallo de Babylonia el año de sesenta et nueve de captivuluile, et foron recebidos en Toledo de Gentiles que y moravan, et edificaron una grande Alama, et non quisieron bolver a Jerusalem otra veguda a edificar Temple, aviendo ser destruido otra vegada. De Toledo catorze dias del mes Nisau, Era de Cesur diez y ocho, y de Augusto Octaviano setenta y uno. - Sandoval, 71.

Had Alonso been as zealous as some of his Gothic preaccessors, or his most Catholic successors, he might have found a fair pretext in this letter for ordering all the Jews of Toledo to the font, unless they would show cause why they should adhere to the opinion of Cataphas and the Jerusalem Jews, rather than to that of their own aneestors.

General Vallancy believes that the Spanish Jews were brought into the Peninsula by Nebuchadnezzar, and idmits these Toledans as authority. He quotes Count de Gehelin, and refers to Strabo and Ezekiel. The proof from Ezekiel rests upon the word Orb, Earb, Warb, or Gharh; which is made into Algarve !

A Jew in Tirante el Blanco (p. 2, c. 74, f. 243) explains the difference between the different races of Jews. They are three, he says. One, the progeny of those who took counsel for the death of Christ ; and they were known by this, that they were in continual motion, hands and fect, and never could rest; neither could their spirit ever be still, and they had very little shame. The second were the descendants of those who put in execution and assisted at the various parts of the sufferings and death of Christ, and they never could look any mao in the face, nor could they, without great difficulty, ever look up to heaven. The third were the children of David, who did all they could to prevent the death of Christ, and shut themselves up in the temple that they might not witness it. These are affable, good men, who love their neighbors; a quiet, peaceable race, who can look any where.

Thomas Tamaio de Vargas, the editor of the spurious Luitprand, says, that not only many Hebrew words are mixed with the old Spanish, but that, prô dolor ! the black and stucking Jewish blood had been mingled with the most pure blood of the Spaniards, (p. 96.) They were very anxious, he says, to intermarry, and spoil the pure blood. And he adds, that the Spaniards call them putos, quia putant. " But," says Sir Thomas Browne, " that an unsavory odor is gentilitious, or national to the Jews, we cannot well concede. And if, (according to good relations,) where they may freely speak it, they forbear not to boast that there are at present many thousand Jews in Spain, France, and England, and some dispensed withal even to the degree of priesthood, it is a matter very considerable, and could they be smelled out, would much advantage not only the church of Christ, but also the coffers of princes. - The ground that begat or propagated this assertion night be the distasteful averseness of the Christian from the Jew upon the villany of that fact, which made them abominable, and 'stick in the nostrils of all mcn.' Which real practice and metaphorical expression did after proceed into a literal construction, but was a fraudulent illation; for such an evil savor their father Jacob acknowledged in himself, when he said his sons had made him stink in the land, that is, to be abominable unto the inhabitants thereof. Another cause is urged by Campegius, and much received by Christians; that this ill savor is a curse derived upon them by Christ, end stands as a badge or brand of a generation that crucified their Salvator. But this is a conceit without all warrant, and an easy way to take off dispute in what point of obscurity soever." Fulgar Errors, Book iv. ch. 10.

The Mahommedans also hold a like opinion of the unsavoriness of the Jews, and account for it by this legend, which is given by Sale. "Some of the children of Israel abandoned their dwellings hecause of a pestilence, or, as others say, to avoid serving in a religious war; but es they fled, God streek them all dead in a certain valley. About eight days or more after, when their hodies were corrupted, the Prophet Ezekiel happening to pass that way, at the sight wept; whereupon God said to him, 'Call to them, O Ezekiel, and I will restore them to life'. And accordingly, on the prophet's call, they all arose, and lived several years after; but they retained the color and stench of dend corpses as long as they lived, and the clothes they wore were changed as black as pitch, which qualities they transmitted to their posterity.'?

One of our own travellers* tells us of a curious practical application of this helief in Barbary. "The Moors of Tangler," he says, "when they want rain, and have prayed in vanfor it, set the Jews to work, saying, that though God wonl't not grant it to the prayers of the faithful, he would to the Jews, in order to be rid of their stink." Ludierons as thus is, South has a passage concerning the Jews, which is little nore reasonable, in one of his serimons. "The truth is," he says, "they were all along a cross, odd, untoward sort of people, and such as God seems to have chosen, and (as the Prophets sometimes phrase it) to have espoused to hunself, upon the very same necemant that Socrates espoused Xantupe, may for her extreme ill conditions, above all that he could possibily find.

Of the condition of slaves under the Spanish Wisigoths, I have given an account in the Introduction to the Chronicle of the Col. This also, like the persecution of the Jews, must greatly have facilitated the Moorish conquest. Another facilitating cause was, that notwithstanding their frequent civil disturbances, they had in great measure ceased to be a warlike people. The many laws in the Fuero Jurgo, for compelling men to military service, prove this. These laws are full of complaints that the people would avoid the service to have effeminated the northern conquerors, till the Normans renovated the race, and the institutions of chivalry and the crusades produced a new era.

Gibel-al-Tarif, the mountain of Tarif, is the received etymology of Gibrahtar: Ben Hazel, a Granadan Moor, says ex-pressly, that the mountain derived its name from this general. Its former appellations may be seen in the Historia de Gibraltar, hy Don Ignacio Lopez de Ayula. The derivation of the word Calpe is not known : Florian de Ocampo identifies it with the English word galloping, in a passage which may amuse the Spanish scholar. " La segunda nombradia fue llamarle Calpe, cuya razon, segun dicen algunos, procedio de que los Andaluces ancianos en su lengua vieja solian llamar Calepas y Calpes a qualesquier cosas enhuestas y levantadas, agora fuesen peñascos, o pizarras, o maderos, o piedras menores, como lo significamos en los diez y ocho capitulos precedentes : y dicen que con estar alli junto de Gibraltar sobre sus marinas el risco, que ya dire muy encumbrado y enhiesto, qual hoy dia parece, lo llamaban Calpes aquellas Andaluces pasados : y por su respecto la mesma publicion vino tambien a tener despues aquel proprio nombre. Na fultan otras personas que siguiendo las Escrituras Griegas pongan esta razon del nombre Calpes mucho diversamente, diciendo, que quando los cosarios Argonautas desembarcaron en España, cerca del estrecho, segun yu lo declaramos, el tiempo que hacian sus exercicios arriba dichos, de saltos y luchas, y musicas acurdadas, bien asi como los pastores Españoles comarcanos recibian contentamientos grande, mirado las tales desenvolturas y ligerezas, no menos aquellos Griegos recien venidos notabun algunos juegos. dado que trabajosos y difíciles, que las mesmos pastores obraban entre si para su recreacion y deporte ; particularmente consideruran un regocijo de caballos, donde ciertos dias aplazados veninn todos a se juntar como para cosa de gran pundonor.

" El qual regocijo hacian desta manera. Tomaban yeguas en pelo, quanto mus corredoras y ligeras podian haber, y puestos ellos encimu desnudos sin alguna ropa, ataban en las quixadas barbicachos de rama, toreidos y majados a manera de freno, con que salian del puesto dos a dos a la par corriendo lo mas que sus yegnas podian, para llegar a cierta senal de pizarras enhiestas o de maderos hincados y livantados en fin de la carrera. Venidos al medio trecho de su corrida sultaban de las yrgnas en tierra, no lus purando ni deteniendo : y asi trabados por el barbicacho, corrian tambien ellos à pie, sin las devor, puesto que mas furia llevasen : porque si las dexaban ó se desprendian dellas, y no sustentaban el freno continuamente, hasta ser pasada la currera, perdian la reputation y las apuestas, quedando tan amenguados y vencidos, quanto quedaria triunfunte quica primero lleguse con su yegun para tomar la presa que tenían en el fin de la carrera sobre las pizarras o maderos hincados. Quando saltaban de sus yegnas, dicen que les iban hablando porque no se detaviesen, voceandules y dievendoles a menudo palabras animosos y dulees : llamabanles pies hermosas, generosas en el correr, casta real, hembras preciosas, acrecentadoras de sus honras, y mas otras razones muchas con que las tenian vezadas, a no se parar ni perder el impetu comenzado : de manera que los tropeles en este punto, los pundonares y regocijos de cocrer, y de no mostrar flozedad era cosa mucho de notar, asi por la parte de los hombres, como por parte de las yeguas. A los Griegos Argonautas los parecio juego tan varonil que muchas veces lo probaron tambien ellos a revuelta de los Espanoles, como quiera que jamas pudieron tener aquella vigilancia ni ligereza, ni reciura que teniun estos otros para durar con sus yeguas. Y dado que las tales yeguas corriesen harto furiosas, y les ensenasen muchos dias antes a seguir estas parejas, quanto mejor entendian a la verdad, ni las de los unos, ni las de los otros corrian tanto despues que saltaban dellas, como quando los traiun encima : y asi las palabras que los Griegos en aquella sazon puestos a pie hablaban eran tambien al mesmo proposito conformes a las de los Andaluces Españoles en su lengua provincial, nombrundolas Calupes, Calopes, Culopes a la contina, que fue palubra Griega, compuesta de dos vocablos: uno Calos, que significa e sa hermosa, ligera y agraciada : otro Pus, que quiere decir pie, como que las llamasen pies agraciados, o pies desenvueltos y ligeros : y por abreviar mas el vocablo, para que sus yeguas lo pudiesen mas presto sentir, acortabanlo con una letra menos en el medio, y en lugor de nombrarlas Calopes, les deciam Culpes, que significa lo mesmo Calopes : la qual palabra me parece dura todavia hasta nuestro siglo presente, donde pocas letras mudadas, por decir Calopes o Calpes, la pronunciamos Galopes, quando los caballos y yeguas, o qualesquier otros animales, no corren a todo poder sino trote largo seguido. Vino desto que las mesmas fiestas y manera del juego se nombraron Calpes : dado que para conmigu bustara saber la vietoria deste juego consistir en ligereza de pies, y por eso solo deberse llamar Calopes a Calpe, sin anadir lo que hablaban a las yeguas, pues aquello primero comprehende bastantemente la razon deste vocablo. Pero si todaria fue cierto que les decian aquellas palabras quando corrian sas parejas, ninguna cosa daña dexarlas aqui puestas." - Coronica General de Espana, c. 38.

And, worst of enemies, their Sins were arm'd Against them. - I. p. 650, col. 1.

The following description of the state of the Christian world when the Saraeens began their conquests, is taken from a singular manuscript, " where in the history of the Cruisades and of all the Mahommedan emperors from A. D. 55%, to A. D. 1588, is gathered out of the Chronikes of William Archbishop of Tyreus, the protoscribe of Palestine, of Busilius Jhohanues Heraldus, and sundry others, and reduced into a peem epike by Robert Barret, 1610." The author was an old soldier, whose language is a compound of Josuth Sylvester and King Cambyses, with a strong relish of Ancient Pistol.

> Now in this sin-flood age not only in East Did the impious imps the faithful persecute, But like affliction them pursued in West, And in all parts the good trod under floot; For faith in some was cold, from others fled, And fear of God dislodged out human hearts;

Astrea flown to skies, and in her stead Iniquity enthronized; in all parts Violence had vogue, and on sathanized earth Fraud, Mischief, Murder martialled the Camp; Sweet Virtue fied the field : Hope, out of breath ; And Vice, all-stainer, every soul did stamp; So that it seem'd World drew to's evening tide, Nought else expecting but Christ's second coming ; For Charity was cold on every side, And Truth and Trust were gone from earth a-mumming. All things confused ran, so that it seemed The World return would to his chaos old ; Princes the path of justice not esteemed, Headlong with prince ran people young and old. All sainct confederations infringed, And for light cause would prince with prince enquarrel; Countries bestreamed with blood, with fire besinged, All set to each, all murders sorts unbarrelled. No wight his own could own ; 'twas current coin Each man to strip, provided he were rich. The church sacrileged, choir made cot for swine, And zealous ministers were made to scritche. Robbing was made fair purchase, murder manhood, And none secure by land ne sea could pass; The humble, heartless, ireful hearts ran wood, Esteemed most who mischief most could dress; All lubrick Justs shameless without comptroll Ran full career ; each would a rider be ; And Heaven's friend, all sainct Continency, Wes banished quite : Lasciviousness did roll, Frugality, healthful Sobriety No place could find ; all parts enquartered were With Bacchus-brutes and Satyres-luxury. All lawless games here sway, with blasphemes roare, "Twixt Clerk and Laick difference was none, Disguized all, phantastic out of aorme; But as the Prophet says, as Priests do run, So run the people, peevish in disform. The Bishops graded once, dumb dogs become, Their heads sin vyncting, flocks abandou soon ; Princes applauders, person-acceptors, The good's deharrers and the bad's abetters ; Fleshly all, all filthy simonized, Preferring profit 'fore the Eternal's praise. The church enschismed, court all atheized, The commons kankred, all all in distrayes ; The plotting politician's pate admired, Their skill consisting in preventions scull, Pathicks preferred, Cyprin ware desired, Ocean of mischiel's flowing moon-tide full : So that it seem'd that all flesh desperately Like wolf-scared sheep were plunged beadlong down In pit of hell: puddled all pestfully The court, church, commons, province, city, town; All haggards ; none reclaimed once could be No by the word, the word 'bused by organs bad, Ne yet hy signs that spotted chrystal sky, Ne other prodigies, presages sad, Neither gust shakings of this settled globe ; Neither sharpe pencil of war, famine, pest, Could once one ray engrave in steeled breast, Or Christians cause their sin-jagged robe disrobe.

Thus stood the sad state of that sin-stain'd time, And Christians of this our all-zeal cold time, Let us now par'llel that time with our time, Our parallel'd time will parallel that time, Then triple-sainet, thou just geometer true, Our time not parallel by thy justice line, But with thy mercy's paralleling brow, Reform our crimeful Angles by grace thine.

Roderick's royal car. - I. p. 650, col. 1.

"Roderike, the first day after the battayle, observing the auncient guise of his countrey, came into the fielde apparailled in a gowne of heaten golde, heving also on his head a crown of gold, and golden shoes, end all his other apparaile sot with rich pearles and precious stones, ryding in a horse-litter of ivorie, drawne by two goodly horses ; which order the Goths used alwayes in battailes for this consideration, that the souldiours, well-knowing their king could not escape away by flight from them, shuld he assured that there was none other way but either to die togither in that place, or else to winne the victorie; for it had bene a thing most shamefull and reproachful to forsake their prince and enoyated soversigne. Which custome and maner many free confederate cities of Italie following, trimmed and edorned for the warres a certain chayre of estate, called Carocio, wherein were set the penons and ensigns of all the confederates; this chayre, in battaile, was drawn by many oxen, wherby the whole hoast was given to understand that they could not with any honesty flie, by reason of the slow pace end unweldinesse of those heavie beasts." - A Notable Historie of the Saracens, drawen out of Augustine Curio, and sundry other good Authours. By Thomas Newton, 1575.

> En ruedas de morfil, envuelto en sedas, De oro lu frente orlada, y mas dispuesto Al truntfo y al festin que a la pelea, El sucesor indigno de Alarico Llevo tras si la maldicion eterna. Ah ! yo la vi: la lid por siete dias Duro, mas no fue lid, fue una sangrienta Carniceria : huyeron los cobardes Los traiblores vendieron sus banderas, Los fuertes, los leales percieron. — QUINTANA.

The outhor of the chivalrous Chronicle of King Don Rodrigo gives a singular description of this car, upon the anthority of his pretended original Eleastras; for he, "seeing that calamities went on increasing, and that the destruction of the Goths was at hand, thought that if things were to end as they had begun, it would be a marvel if there should be in Spain any king or lord of the lineage of the Goths after the death of King Don Rodrigo; and therefore it imported much that he should leave behind him a remembrance of the customs of the Gothic kings, and of the manner in which they were wont to enter into battle, and how they went to war. And he says, that the king used to go in a car made after a strange fashion. The wheels of this car were made of the bones of elephants, and the exletree was of fine silver, and the perch was of fine gold. It was drawn by two horses, who were of great size and gentle; and upon the car there was pitched a tent, sa large that it covered the whole car, and it was of fine cloth of gold, upon which were wrought all the great feats in arms which had been achieved until that time; and the pillar of the tent was of gold, and many stones of great value were set in it, which sent forth such splendor, that by night there was no need of any other light therein. And the car and the horses hore the same adornments as the king, and these were full of pearls the largest which could be found. And in the middle of the car there was a scat placed against the pillar of the tent ; and this seat was of great price, insomuch that the value of it cannot he summed up, so many and so great were the stanes which were set in it; and it was wrought so subtly and or such rare workmanship, that they who saw it marvellen thereat. And upon this seat the king was seated, being lifted up so high that all in the hast, little or great, might behold him. And in this manuer it was appointed that the king should go to war. And round about the car there were to go a thousand knights, who had all been knighted by the hand of the king, all armed ; and in the day of battle they were to be on foot round about the car; and all plighted homage to the king not to depart from it in any manner whatsoever, and that they would rather receive their death there, than go from their place beside the car. And the king had his crown upon his head. And in this guise all the kings of the Goths, who had been lords of Spain, were to go to battle; and this custom they had all observed till the King Don Rodrigo; but be, hecause of the great grief which he had in his heart, would never ascend the car, neither did he go in it into the battle."— Part i, c 215.

That helm Whose horns, amid the threkest of the fray Eminent, had mark'd his presence. — 1. p. 650, col. 1.

Morales describes this horned helmet from a coin. "Tiene de la una parte su rostro, harto diferente de los que en las otras Monedas de estas Reyes parceen. Tiene manera de estar armado, y salenle por cima de la celada unas puntas como cuernos pequeños y derechos por ambos ladas, que lo hacen estraño y espuntable." Florez has given this coin in his Medallas de Espana, from the ouly one which was known to be in existence, and which was then in the collection of the Infinte D. Gabriel, It was struck at Egitania, the present Idana, and, like all the coins of the Visigoth kings, is of the rudest kind. The lines wnich Morales describes are sufficiently apparent, and if they are no. intended for lonns, it is impossible to guess what else they may have been meant to represent.

"These Goth'e coins," says P. D. Jeronyma Contador de Argote, "thave a the sand harbarisms, as well in their letters as in other circumstances. They mingle Greek characters with Latin ones; and in what regards the relief or figure, oothing can be more dissimilar thav the representation to the thing which it is intended to represent. I will relate what happened to me with one, however much D Egidio de Albernos de Macedo may reprehend me for it in his Parcer Anathomico. Valerio Pinto de Sa, un honorable citizen of Braga, of whom, in various parts of these Memoirs, I have made well-deserved mention, and of whose friendship I have been proud ever since I have been in that city, gave me, some six or seven years ago, a gold coin of King Leovigildo, who was the first of the Gothic kings of Spain that coined money, for till then both Goths and Sueves used the Roman. I examined it leisurely, and what I clearly saw was a cross on the one side upon some steps, and some ill-shaped letters around it; and on the reverse something, 1 knew not what: It seemed to me like a tree, or a stake which shot out some branches : Round about were some letters, more distinct; I could not, however, ascertain what they signified. It happened about that time that I had the honor of a visit from the most illustrious Sr. D. Francisco de Almeida, then a most wortby Academician of the Royal Academy, and at present a most deserving and eminent Principal of the Holy Patriarchal Church. He saw this coin, and he also was puzzled by the side which represented what I called a tree. He asked me to lend it him, that he might examine it more at leisure. He took it away, and after some days returned it, saying, that he had examined it with a microscope, and that what I had taken for a stake was without question the portrait of King Leovigildo. I confess that I was not yet entirely satisfied : however, I showed it afterwards to divers persons, all of whom said they knew not what the said figure could be; hut when I desired them to see if it could he this portrait, they all agreed that it was. This undeceived me, and by looking at the coin in every possible light, at last 1 came to see it also, and acknowledge the truth with the rest. And afterwards I found in the Dialogues of Antonio Agostinho, treating of these Gothic coins, that there are some of such rude workmanship, that where a face should be represented, some represent a pitcher, and others an urn." - Memorias de Braga, t. iii. p. lix.

Guadalete had heen thus interpreted to Florez. (Espana Sagrada, t. 9, p. 53.) Earlier writers had asserted (but without proof) that the Ancients called it Lethe, and the Moors added to these names their word for river. Lope de Vega alludes to this opinion:

The French Jeauits relate of one of their converts in Canaia à Huron, by name Jean Arniand Andeouarahen, that once estant en guerre eschauffe au combat, il s'enfonça si avant dans les darts et les flêches des ennemis, qu'il fut abandonné des siens dans le plus fort de la meslée. Ce fut alors qu'il se recommenda plus particulièrement d Dieu : il sentit pour lors un secours si présent, que du depuis, appuyé sur cette mesme coufiance, il est tolijours le premier et le plus avant dans les périls, ct jawais ne palit, pour quelque danger qu'il envisage. Je voyois, disont-il, comme une gresle de flêches venir fondre sur moy ; je n'avois point d'autre bouclier pour les arrester, que la croyance seule que Dieu disposant de ma vie, il en feroit selon sa volonté. The aite of this monastery, which was one of the most flourishing aeminaries of that age, is believed to have been two leagues from Merida, upon the Guadiana, where the Ermida, or Chapel of Cubillana, stands at present, or was standing a few years ago. The legend, from which I have taken such circumstances as might easily have happened, and as suited my plan, was invented by a race of men who, in the talent of invention, have left all poets and romancers far behind them, Florez refers to Brito for it, and excuses himself from relating it, hecause it is not necessary to his * subject ;- in reality he neither believed the story, nor chose to express his objections to it. His disbelief was probably founded upon the suspicious character of Brito, who was not at that time so decidedly condemned by his countrymen as he is at present. I give the legend from this veracious Cistercian. Most of his other fabrications have been exploded, but this has given rise to a popular and fashionable idolatry, which still maintains its ground.

" The monk did not venture to leave him alone in that disconsolate state, and taking him apart, besought him by the passion of Jesus Christ to consent that they twain should go together, and save a venerable image of the Virgin Mary our Lady, which in that convent flourished with great miracles, and had been brought from the city of Nazareth by a Greek monk, called Cyriac, at such time as a heresy in the parts of the East arose against the use and veneration of images ; and with it a relic of the Apostle St. Bartholomew, and another of St. Bras, which were kept in an ivory coffer, for it would be a great sacrilege to leave them exposed to the ill treatment of harbarians, who, according to public fame, left neither temple uor sacred place which they did not profane, casting the images into the fire, and dragging them at their horses' tails for a greater opprobrium to the baptized people. The King, seeing himself thus conjured by the passion of our Redcemer Jesus Christ, in whom alone he had consolation and hope of remedy, and considering the piety of the thing in which he was chosen for companion, let himself be overcome by his entreaties ; and taking in his arms the little image of our Lady, and Romano the coffer with the relics, and some provision for the journey, they struck into the middle of Portugal, having their faces alway towards the west, and seeking the coast of the ocean sea, because in those times it was a land more solitary, and less frequented by people, where they throught the Moors would not reach so soon, hecause, as there were no countries to conquer in those parts, there was no occasion which should lead them thither. Twenty-and-six days the two companions travelled without touching at any inhabited place, and after enduring many difficulties in crossing mountains and fording rivers, they had sight of the ocean sea on the 22d of November, being the day of the Virgin Martyr St. Cecilia ; and as if in that place they should have an end of their labors, they took some comfort, and gave thanks to God, for that he had saved them from the hand of their enemics. The place which they reached is in the Coutos of Alcohaça, near to where we now see the town of Pederneira, on the eastern side of which there rises, in the midst of certain sands, a hill of rock and firm land, somewhat prolonged from north to south, so lefty and well proportioned that it scemeth miraculously placed in that site, being surrounded on all sides with plains covered with sand, without height or rock to which it appears connected. And forasmuch as the manner thereof draws to it the eyes of whosoever heholds this work of nature, the king and the monk desired to ascend the height of it, to see whether it would afford a place for them in which to pass their lives. They found there a little hermitage with a holy crucifix, and no other signs of man, save only a plain tomb, without writing or epitaph to declare whose it might he. The situation of the place, which, ascending to a notable height, gives a prospect by sea and by land as far as the eyes can reach, and the sudden sight of the crucifix, caused in the mind of the king such excitement and so great consolation, that, embracing the foot of the cross, he lay there melting away in rivers of tears, not now of grief for the kingdoms and dominious which he had lost, but of consolation in seeing that in exchange the crucified Jesus himself had in this solitary mountain offered himself to him, in whose company he resolved to pass the remainder of his life; and this he declared to the monk, who, to content him, and also because he saw that the place was convenient for contemplation, approved the king's resolve, and abode there with him some days; during which, perceiving some inconvenience in living upon the summit of the mountain, from whence it was necessary to descend with much labor, whenever they would drink, or seek for herbs and fruits for their food ; and moreover, understanding that it was the king's desire to remain there alone, that he might vent himself in tears and exclamations, which he made oftentimes before the image of Christ, he went with his consent to a place little more than a mile from the mountain, which being on the one side smooth and of easy approach, hangs on the other over the sea with so huge a precipice that it is two hundred fathoms in perpendicular height, from the top of the rock to the water. There, between two great rocks, each of which projects over the sea, hanging suspended from the height in such a form, that they seem to threaten destruction to him who sees them from the beach, Romano found a little cave, made naturally in the cliff. which he cularged with some walls of loose stone, built up with his own hands, and having thus made a sort of hermitage, he placed therein the image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth, which he had brought from the Caulinean convent, and which being small, and of a dark color, with the infant Jesus in its arms, hath in the countenance a certain perfection, with a modesty so remarkable, that at first sight it presents something miraculous; and having been known and venerated so great a number of years, during many of which it was in a place which did not protect it from the injuries of weather, it hath never been painted, neither bath it been found necessary to renew it. The situation of this hermitage was, and is now, within sight of the monutain where the king dwelt; and though the memorials from whence I am deriving the circumstances of these events do not specify it, it is to be believed that they often saw each other, and held such divine communion as their mode of life and the holiness of the place required ; especially considering the great temptations of the Devil which the king suffered at the beginning of his penitence, for which the comisels and instructions of the monk would be necessary, and the aid of his prayers, and the presence of the relics of St. Bartholomew, which miraculously saved him many times from various illusions of the enemy. And in these our days there are seen upon the top of the mountain, in the living rock, certain human footsteps, and others of a different form, which the common people, without knowing the person, affirm to be the footsteps of St. Bartholomew and the Devil, who was there defeated and his illusions confounded by the saint, coming in aid of a devont man who called upon him in the force of his tribulation. This must have been the king, (though the common people know it not,) whom the saint thus visibly aided, and he chose that for a memorial of this aid, and of the power which God has given him over the evil spirits, these marks should remain impressed upon the living rock. And the ancient name of the mountair being Seono, it was changed into that of the Apostle, and is called at present St. Bartholomew's ; and the hermitage which remains upon the top of it is under the invocation of the same saint and of St. Bras, which must have arisen from the relics of these two spints that Romano brought with him and left with the king for his consolation, when he withdrew with the mage of Our Lady to the place of which we have spoken, where he lived little more than a year; and then knowing the time of his death, be communicated it to the king, beseeching him that, in requital for the love with which he had accompanied him, he would remember to pray to God for his soul, and would give his body to the carth, from which it had sprung; and that having to depart from that land, he would leave there the image and the relics, in such manner as he should dispose them before he died. With that Romano departed to enjoy the reward descrived by his labors, leaving the king with fresh occasion of grief for want of so good a compinion. Of what more passed in this place, and of the temptations and tribulations which he endured till the end of his life, there is no authentic historian, not memorial which should certify them, more than some relations mingled with fabulous tales in the ancient Chronicle of King Don Rodrigo, where, among the truths which are taken from the Moor Rasis, there are many things notoriously impossible ; such as the journey which the king took, being guided by a white cloud till he same near Visco; and the penance in which he ended his life there, enclosing himself alive in a certain tomb with a serpent which he had bred for that purpose. But as these are things difficult to believe, we will pass them over in silence, leaving to the judgment of the curious the credit which an ancient picture deserves, still existing near Viseo, in the church of St. Michael, over the tomb of the sold King Don Roderick, in which is seen 6 serpent painted with two heads; and in the tomh itself, which is of wrought stone, a round hole, through which they say that the snake entered. That which is certain of all this is, as our historians relate, that the king came to this place, and in the hermitage of St. Michael, which we now see near Viseo, ended his days in great penauce, no man knowing the manner thereof; neither was there any other memorial clearer than that in process of time a writing was found upon a certain tomb in this church with these words : HIC REQUESCIT RUDERICUS ULTIMUS REX GOTHORUM, Here rests Roderick, the last King of the Goths. I remember to have seen these very words written in black upon an arch of the wall, which is over the tomb of the king, although the Archhishop Don Rodrigo, and they who follow him, give a longer inscription, not observing that all which he has added are his own curses and imprecations upon Count Don Julian, (as Ambrosio de Morales has properly remarked, following the Bishop of Salamanca and others,) and not parts of the same inscription, as they make them. The church in which is the tomb of the king is at present very small, and of great antiquity, especially the first chapel, joined to which on either side is a cell of the same length, but narrow, and dark also, having no more light than what enters through a little window opening to the east. In one of these cells (that which is on the south side) it is said that a certain hermit dwelt, by whose advice the king governed himself in the course of his penance ; and at this time his grave is shown close to the walls of the chapel, on the Epistle side. In the other cell (which is on the north) the king passed his life, paying now, in the strnitness of that place, for the largoness of his palaces, and the liberties of his former life, whereby he had offended his Creator. And in the wall of the chapel which answers to the Gospel side, there remains a sort of arch, in which the tomb is seen, wherein are his bones; and it is devoutly visited by the natives, who believe that through his means the Lord does miracles there upon persons afflicted with agnes and other like maladies. Under the said arch, in the part answering to it in the inside of the cell, I saw painted on the wall the hermit and the king, with the serpent with two heads, and I read the letters which are given above, all defaced by time, and bearing marks of great antiquity, yet so that they could distinetly he seen. The tomb is flat, and made of a single stone, n which a man's body can scarcely find room. When I saw it it was open, the stone which had served to cover it not being there, neither the bones of the king, which they told me had neen carried into Castille some years before, but in what manner they knew not, nor by whose order ; neither could I discover, by all the inquiries which I made among the old people of that city, who had reason to be acquiinted with a thing of so much importance, if it were as certain as some of tnem affirmed it to he." - BRITO, Mouarchia Lusitania, P. 1i. 7, c. 3.

no doubt, he did the more willingly because he bears a part in it himself. In the days of Affonso Henriquez, the first king of Portogal, this part of the country was governed by D. Fuas Roopinho, a knight famous in the Portuguese chronicles, who resided in the castle at Porto de Mos. This Dom Fuas, " when he saw the land secure from enemies, used often to go out hunting among the sands and thickets between the town and the sea, where, in those days, there used to be great store of game, and even now, though the land is so populous, there is still some ; and as he followed this exercise, the proper pastime of noble and spirited men, and came sometimes to the sca-shore, he came upon that remorkable rock, which, being level on the side of the north, and on a line with the flat country, ends towards the south in a precipice over the waves of the sea, of a prodigious height, cansing the greater admiration to him who, going over the plain country without finding any irregularity, finds himself, when least expecting it, soddenly on the summit of such a height. And as he was curiously regarding this natural wonder, he perceived between the two higgest cliffs which stand out from the ground and project over the sea, a sort of house built of loose stones, which, from its form and antiquity, made him go himself to examine it; and descending by the chasm between the two rocks, he entered into a low cavern, where, upon a little eltar, he saw the venerable Image of the Virgin Mary of Nazarcth, being of such perfection and modesty as are found in very few images of that size. The Catholic knight venerated it with all submission, and would have removed it to his castle of Purto de Mos, to have it held in more veneration, but that he feared to offend it if he should move it from a habitation where it had abode for so many years. This consideration made him leave it for the present in the same place and manner in which he found it; and although he visited it afterwards when in course of the chase he came to those parts, nevertheless he never took in hand to improve the poor hermitage in which it was, nor would be have done it, if the Virgin had not saved him from a notorious danger of death, which, peradventure, God permitted as a punishment for his negligence, and in this manner to make the virtue of the Holy Image manifest to the world. It was thus, that going to his ordinary exercise of the chase, in the month of September, in the year of Christ 1182, and on the 14th of the month, being the day on which the church celebrates the festival of the Exaltation of the Cross upon the which Christ redcemed the human race, as the day rose thick with clouds, which ordinarily arise from the sea, and the country round about could not he seen by reason of the clouds, save for a little space, it befell that the dogs put up a stag, (if indeed it were one,) and Dom Fuas pressing his horse in pursuit, without fear of any danger, because he thought it was all plain ground, and the mist hindered him from seeing where he was, found himself upon the very edge of the rock on the precipice, two hundred fathoms above the sea, at a moment when it was no longer in his power to turn the reins, nor could be do any thing more than invoke the succors of the Virgin Mary, whose image was in that place ; and she succored him in such a manner, that less than two palms from the edge of the rock, on a long and narrow point thereof, the horse stopped as if it had been made of stone, the marks of his hoofs remaining in proof of the miracle imprinted in the living rock, such as at this day they are seen by all strangers and persons on pilgrimage, who go to visit the Image of Our Lody; and it is a notable thing, and deserving of serious consideration, to see that in the midst of this rock, upon which the miracle happened, and on the side towards the east, and in a part where, because it is suspended in the air, it is not pussible that any human being could reach, Nature herself has impressed a cross as if nailed to the nardness of the rock, as though she had sanctified that cliff therewith, and marked it with that holy sign, to be the theatre in which the miraculous circumstance was to be celebrated ; which, by reason that it took place on the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, seemed as if it showed the honor and glory which should from thence redound to the Lord who redeemed us thereon. Dom Fuas, seeing himself delivered from so great danger, and knowing

" The great venerableness of the Image of our Lady of Nazareth which the king left hidden in the very place where Romano in bis lifetime had placed it, and the continual miracle which she showed formerly, and still shows," induced F. Bernardo de Brito to continue the history of this Image, which,

from whence the grace had come to him, went to the little | hermitage, where, with that great devotion which the presence of the miracle occasioned, he gave infinite thanks to Our Lady, accusing himself hefore her of having neglected to repair the house, and promising all the amends which his possibility permitted. His huntsmen afterwards arrived, following the track of the horse, and knowing the marvel which had occorred, they prostrated themselves before the Image of Our Lady, adding with their astonishment to the devotion of Dom Foas, who, hearing that tho stag had not been seen, and that the dogs had found so track of him in any part, though one had been represented before him to draw him on, understood that it was an illusion of the Devil, seeking by that means to make him perish miserably. All these considerations enhanced the greatness of the miracle, and the obligations of Dom Fues, who, tarrying there some days, made workmen come from Leyria and Porto de Mos, to make another hermitage, in which the Lady should be more venerated ; and as they were demolishing the first, they found placed betweep the stones of the altar a little box of ivory, and within it relics of St. Bras, St. Bartholomew, and other saints, with a perchment, wherein a relation was given of how and at what time those relics and the image were brought there, according as has been aforesaid. A vaulted chapel was soon made, after a good form for times so ancient, nver the very place where the Lady had been; and to the end that it might be seen from all sides, they left it open with four arches, which in process of time were closed, to prevent the damage which the rains and storms did within the chepel, and in this manner it remains in our days. The Lady remained in her place, being soon known and visited by the faithful, who flocked there upon the fame of her appearance : the valiant and holy king D. Affonso Henriquez, being one of the first whom Dom Fnas advised of what had happened, and he, accompanied with the great persons of his court, and with his son, D. Sancho, came to visit the Image of the Lady, and see with his own eyes the marks of so rare a miracle as that which had taken place ; and with his consent, D. Fuas made a donation to the Lady of a certain quantity of land round about, which was at that time a wild thicket, and for the greater part is so still, being well nigh all wild sands incapable of giving fruit, and would produce nothing more than heath and some wild pine-trees. And because it establishes the truth of all that I have said, and relates in its own manner the history of the Image of the Lady, I will place it here in the form in which I saw it in the Record Room at Alcobaça, preserving throughout the Latin and the barbarism of its composition ; which is as follows : --

" Sab nomine Patris, nec noa et ejus prolis, in unius potentia Deitatis, incipit carta donationis, necnon et devotionis, quam ego Fuas Ropinho tenens Porto de Mos, et terrum de Albardos usque Leirenam, et Turres Veteres, facio Ecclesia Santa Maria de Nazareth, quæ de pauco tempore surgit fundata super mare, ubi de sœculis antiquis jacebat, inter lapides et spinas multas, de tota illa terra quæ jacet inter fiumiaa quæ venit per Alcoabaz, et aquam nuncupatam de faraturio, et dividitur de isto modo: de illa foz de flumine Alcobaz, quomodo vadit per aquas bellas, deinde inter mare et mata de Patayas usque; finir in ipso furaturio, quam ego obtinui de rege Alfonso, et per suum consensum facio præsentem seriem ad prædictam Ecclesiam Beate Mariæ Virginis, quam feci supra mare, ut in sæculis perpetuis memorentur mirnbilia Dei, et sit notam omnibus hominibus, quomodo a morte fuerim salvatus per pictatem Dei et Beata Maria quam vocunt de Nazaret, tali sucesu. This deed, which establishes all the principal facts that 1 have related, did not take effect, because the lands of which it disposed were already part of the Coutos of Alcobaça, which King Don Affonso had given some years before to our father St. Bernard; and Dom Fuas compensated for them with certain properties near Pombal, as is proved by another writing annexed to the former, but which I forbear to insert, as appertaining little to the thread of my history; and resuming the course thereof, you must know, that the image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth remained in the chapel which Dom Fuas made for it, till the year of Christ 1377, in the which, King Dom Fernando of Portugal founded for it the house in which it now is, having been enlarged and beautified by Queen Dona Lianor, wife of King Dom Joam II., and surrounded with porticoes by King Dom Manoel. And now in our times a chapel (Capela mor) of good fabric has been built, with voluntary contributions, and the rents of the brotherhood ; and in the old hermitage founded by Dom Fuas 1., with the help of some devout persons, had another chapel opened under ground, in order to discover the very rock and cavern in which the Holy Image had been hidden so great a number of years ; there is a descent to it hy eight or ten steps, and a notable consolation it is to those who consider the great antiquity of that sunctuary. And for that the memory of things so remarkable onght not to be lost, I composed an inscription briefly recounting the whole: and Dr. Ruy Lourenço, who was thea Provedor of the Comarca of Leyria, and visitor of the said church for the king, ordered it to be engraven in marble. It is as follows -

" Sacra Virginis Maria veneranda Imago, a Mouasterio Cauliniana prope Emeritam, quo Aothorum tempore, a Nazareth translata, miraculis claruerat, in generali Hispania clade, Ann.

18 NOTES TO RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

Ann. Domini MCCLXXVII. Virgini et perpetudatt. D. D. F. B. D. B. ex voto."

From these things, taken as faithfully as I possibly could from the deed of gift and from history, we see clearly the great antiquity of the sanctuary, since it is 893 years since the Image of the Lady was brought to the place where it now is; and although we do not know the exact year in which it was brought from Nazareth, it is certain at least that it was before King Recaredo, who began to reign in the year of Christ 586; so that it is 1021 years, a little more or less, since it came to Spain; and as it came then, as one well known, and celebrated for miracles in the parts of the East, it may well be understood that this is one of the most famous and ancient Images, and nearest to the times of the apostles, that the world at present possesses. — Bairo Monarchia Lusitana, p. 2, l. 7, c. 4.

This legend cannot have been invented before Emanuel's reign, for Duarte Galavani says nothing of it in his Chronicle of Affonso Henriquez, though he relates the exploits and death of D. Fuas Roupinho. I believe there is no earlier anthority for it than Bernardo de Brito himself. It is one of many articles of the same kind from the great manufactory of Alcobaca, and is at this day as firmly believed by the people of Portugal as any article of the Christian faith. How indeed should they fail to believe it? I have a print - it is one of the most popular devotional prints in Portugal - which represents the miracle. The diabolical stag is flying down the precipice, and looking back with a wicked turn of the head, in hopes of seeing Dom Funs follow him; the horse is rearing up with his hind feet upon the brink of the precipice; the knight has dropped his hunting-spear, his cocked hat is falling behind him, and an exclamation to the Virgin is coming out of his mouth. The Virgin with a crown upon her head, and the Babe with a crown upon his, at her brenst, appear in the sky amidst clouds of glory. N. S. de Nazaré is written above this precious print, and this more precious information below it, - O. Ema Sur. Cardeal Patriarcha concede 50 dias de Indulga, a qm. rezar huma have Ma, diante desta Image. His Eminency the Cardinal Patriarch grants fifty days indulgence to whosoever shall say un Ave-Maria before this Image. The print is included, and plenty of Ave-Marias are said before it in full faith, for this Nossa Senhora de Nazuré is in high vogue. Before the French invasion, this famous Image used annually to be escorted by the Court to Cape Espichel. In 1796 I happened to be upon the Tagus at the time of her embarkation at Belem. She was carried in a sort of sedan-chair, of which the fashion resembled that of the Lord Mayor's coach; a processional gun-boat preceded the Image and the Court, and I was literally caught in a shower of rockets, if any of which had fallen upon the heretical heads of me and my companion, it would not improhably have been considered as a new miracle wrought by the wonder-working Senhora.

In July, 1808, the French, under General Thomieres, robbed this church of Our Lady of Nazareth ; their hooty, in jewels and plate, was estimated at more than 200,000 ernzados. Jose Accursio das Neves, the Portuguese historian of those disastrous times, expresses his surprise that no means should have bren taken by those who had the care of these treasures, for securing them in time. Care, however, seems to have been taken of the Great Diana of the Temple, for though it is stated that they destroyed or injured several images, no menion is made of any insult or damage having been offered to this. They sacked the town and set fire to it, but it escaped with the loss of only thirteen or fourteen houses ; the suburb or village, on the beach, was less fortunate ; there only four honses of more than 300 remained unconsumed, and all the boats and fishing-nets were destroyed. - Historia da Invasam. &c. t. 4, p. 85.

Spreading his hands, and lefting up his face, &c. I. p. 651, col. 2.

My friend Walter Scott's Vision of Don Roderick supplies a singular contrast to the picture which is represented in this passage. I have great pleasure in quoting the stanzas; if the contrast had been intentional, it could not have been more complete.

But, far within, Toledo's Prelate lent An ear of fearful wonder to the King; The silver lamp a fitful lustre sent, So long that sad confession witnessing; For Roderick told of many a hidden thing, Such as are loathly utter'd to tha zx, When Fear, Remorse, and Shame, the bosom wriog, And Guilt his secret burden cannot bear, And Conscience seeks in speech a respite from Despair

Full on the F clate's face, and silver hair, The stream of failing light was feebly roll'd; But Roderick's visage, though his head was bare, Was shadow'd by his hand and maatle's fold, While of his hidden sout the sins he told.

Proud Alaric's descendant could not brook, That mortal man his bearing should behold, Or boast that he had seen, when conscience shook, Fear tame a monarch's brow, remorse a warrior's look.

This part of the story is thus nakedly stated by Dr. Andre da Sylva Mascarenhas, in a long narrative poem with this title — A destruiçam de Espanha, Restauruçam Summaria de mesma.

Some new austerity, unheard of yet In Syrian fields of glary, or the sands Of haliest Egypt. - 11. p. 653, col. I.

Egypt has been, from the earliest ages, the theatre of the most abject and absurd superstitions, and very little henefit was produced by a conversion which exchanged crocodiles and [monkeys for monks and mountebanks. The first monastery is said to have been established in that country by St. Anthony the Great, towards the close of the third century. He who rests in solitude, said the saint, is saved from three conflicts, from the war of hearing, and of speech, and of sight; and he has only to maintain the struggle against his own heart. (Acta Sanctorum, t. ii. p. 143.) Indolence was not the only virtue which he and his disciples introduced into the catalogue of Christian perfections S. Eufraxia entered a convent consisting of a hundred and thirty nuss, not one of whom had ever washed her feet; the very mention of the bath was an Ebomination to them, (Acta Sanctorum, March 13.) St. Macarius had renounced most of the decencies of life; but he returned one day to his convent, humbled and mortified, exclaiming, - I am not yet a clock, but I have seen monks ! for he had met two of these wretches stark naked. - Acta Sanctorum, i. p. 107.

The principles which these madmen established were, that every indulgence is sinful; that whatever is gratifying to the body, must be injurious to the soul; that in proportion as man inflicts torments upon himself, he pleases his Creator; that the ties of natural affection wean the heart from God; and that every social duty must be abandoned by him who would be perfect. The doctrine of two principles has never produced such practical evils in any other system as in the Romish. Manes, indeed, attributes all evil to the equal power of the Evil Principle, (that power being only for a time,) but some of the corrupted forms of Christianity actually exclude a good one !

There is a curious passage in the Bibliotheca Orientelis of Assemanus, in which the deserts are supposed to have been originally intended for the use of these saints, compensating for their sterility by the abundant crop of virtues which they were to produce . In illà vero soli vastitate, que procul a Nili ripis quaquaversus latissime protenditur, non urbes, non domicilia, non agri, non arbores, sed desertum, arena, feræ; non tamen hanc terræ partem (ut Eucherii verbis utar) inutilem, et inhonoratam dimisit Deus, quum in primordiis rerum omnia in sapientià faceret, et singula quæque futuris usibus apta distingueret ; sed cuneta non magis præsentis magnificentia, quam futuri præscientia creans, venturis, ut arbitror, Sanctis Eremum paravit. Credo, his illam locupletem fructibus voluit, et pro indulgentioris nature vice, hunc Sanctorum dare facundiam, ut sic pinguescerent fines deserti : Et quum irrigaret de superioribus suis montes, abundaret quoque multiplicatu fruge convalles locorumque damna supplicet, quum habitationem sterilem habitatore ditaret.

"If the ways of religion," says South, " are ways of pleasantness, such as are not ways of pleasantness are not truly and properly ways of religion. Upon which ground it is easy to see what judgment is to be passed upon all those affected, uncommanded, absurd austerities, so much prized and exercised by some of the Romish profession. Pilgrimages, going barefoot, hair-shirts and whips, with other such gospel-artillery, are their only helps to devotion; things never enjoined, either by the prophets under the Jewish, or by the apostles under the Christian economy, who yet surely understood the proper and the most efficacious instruments of piety, as well as any confessor or friar of all the order of St. Francis, or any casuist whatsoever.

" It seems that with them a man sometimes cannot be a penitent unless he elso turns vagabond, and foots it to Jerusalem, or wanders over this or that part of the world to visit the shrines of such or such a pretended saint, though perhaps in his life ten times more ridiculous than themselves. Thus. that which was Cain's error, is become their religion. He that thinks to explate a sin by going barefoot, only makes oue folly the atonement for another. Paul, indeed, was scourged and heaten by the Jews, but we never read that he beat or scourged himself; and if they think that his keeping under of his body imports so much, they must first prove that the hody cannot be kept under by a virtuous mind, and that the mind cannot he made virtuous but by a sconrge, and consequently that thongs and whip-cord are means of grace, and things necossary to salvation. The truth is, if men's religion lies no deeper than their skin, it is possible that they may scourge themselves into very great improvements.

"But they will find that bedily exercise touches not the soul, and that neither pride, nor lust, nor covetousness, was ever mortified by corporal discipline; 'tis oot the back, but the heart that must bleed for sin; and, consequently, that in their whole course they are like men out of their way; lot them lash on never so fast, they are not at all the nearer to their journey's end; and howsoever they deceive themselves and others, they may as well expect to bring a cart as a soul to Heaven by such means." — Sermons, vol. i. p. 34.

The history of Europe during the dark ages abounds with examples of exceutation, as it was called by those writers who endeavored, towards the middle of the 17th century, to introduce the style-ornate into our prose after it had been basished from poetry. In the East, the practice is still continued. When Alboquerque took possession of Ormaz, he sent to Portugal fifteen of its former kings, whom he found there, each of whom, in his turn, had been deposed and blinded !

In the semi-barburous stage of society, any kind of personal hlemish seems to have been considered as disqualifying a prince from the succession, like the law of the Nazarenes. Yorwerth, the son of Owen Gwynedh, was set aside in Wales because of his broken nose; Count Oliba, in Barcelona, because he could never speak till he had stamped with his foot three times like a goat. Aquest Oliba frare del Conte en Grifa no era a dret da sos membras. In the treaty between our Heary V. and Charles VI. of France, by which Heary was appointed King of France after Charles's decease, it was decreed that the French should "swear to become liege men and vassals to our said son King Henry, and ohey him as the true King of France, and without any opposition or dispute shall receive him as such, and never pay obelience to any other as king or regent of France, but to our said son King Henry, unless our said son should lose life or limb, or he attacked by a mortal discase, or suffer diminution in person, state, honor," or goods.²⁷

A remarkable instance of the inconvenient manner in which the b and the v are indiscriminately used by the Spaniards, occurs here in the original edition. The w not being used in that language, it would naturally be represented by vv; and here, the printer, using most unluckily hus typographical license, has made the word Vbitisa.

"The Spaniards," says that late worthy Jo. Sandford, some time fellow of Magdalane college, in Oxford, (in his Spanish Grammar, 1632,) "do with a kind of wantonness so confond the sound of b with v, that it is hard to determine when and in what words it should retain its own power of a labial letter, which gave just cause of laughter at that Spaniard who, being in conversation with a French lady, and minding to commend her children for fair, said unto her, using the Spanish liberty in pronouncing the French, — Madame, yous aver des veaux cufuns, telling her that she had calves to her children, instead of saying, heaux enfans, fuir children. Neither can I well pustify him who wrote veneficio for beneficio."

Conimbrica, whose ruined towers Bore record of the fierce Alani's wrath. -- III. p. 655, col. 1.

The Roman Conimbrica stood about two leagues from the present Ceimhra, on the site of Condeyxa Velha. Ataces, king of the Alanes, won it from the Sueves, and, in revenge for its obstinate resistance, dispeopled it, making all its inhabitants, without distinction of persons, work at the foundation of Coimhra where it now stands. Hermenerico, the king of the Sueves, attacked him while thus employed, but was defeated and pursued to the Donro ; peace was then made, and Sindasunda, daughter of the conquered, given in marriage to the conquerer. In memory of the pacification thus effected, Atuces bore upon his banners a damsel in a tower, with a dragen vert on one side, and a lion rouge on the other, the bearings of himself and his marriage-father; and this device being sculptured upon the towers of Coimbra, still remains as the city arms. Two letters of Arisbert, bishop of Porto, to Samerius, archdeacon of Braga, which are preserved at Alcobaca, relate these events as the news of the day, -- that is, if the authority of Alcobaçan records, and of Bernardo de Brito, can be admitted. - Mon. Drogo Bernardes, one of the best of the Portugneso poets, was born on the banks of the Linn, and passionately find of its scenery. Some of his sonnets will bear comparison with the hest poems of their kind. There is a charge of plagiarism against him for having printed several of Camoens's sonnets as his own; to obtain any proofs upon this subject would be very difficult; this, however, is certain, that his own undisputed productions reachable them so closely in unaffected tenderness and in sweetness of diction, that the whole appear like the works of one anthor.

> Sacaru indignonthy Did he toward the occan bend his way, And, shaking from his feet the dust of Spain, Took ship, and hoisted sail through scas unknown To seek for freedom. -- IV. p. 659, col. 2.

This tale, which is repeated by Bleda, rests on no better authority than that of Abulcacim,* which may, however, by admitted, so far as to show that it was a provalent opinion 'a his time.

Antonio Galvam, in his Tratado dos Descobrimentos Antigo: e Modernos, relates a current, and manifestly fabulous story, which has been supposed to refer to Sacaru, and the companions of his emigration. "They say," he says, "that at this time, A. D. 1447, a Portuguese ship sailing out of the Straits of Gibraltar, was carried by a storm much farther to the west than she had intended, and came to an island where there were seven cities, and where our language was spoken . and the people asked whether the Moors still occupied Spain, from whence they had fled after the loss of King Don Rodrige The contramaster of the ship said, that he brought away a little sand from the island, and sold it to a geldsmith in Lishon, who extracted from it a good quantity of gold. It is said that the Infante D. Pedro, who governed at that time, ordered these things to be written in the Casa do Tomho. And some will have it that these lands and islands at which the Portuguese touched, were those which are now called the Antilhas and New Spain." (P. 24.)

This Antilia, or Island of the Seven Cities, is hid down in Martin Behaim's map; the story was soon improved by giving seven hishops to the seven cities: and Galvam has been accased by Hornius of having invented it to give his countrymen the honor of having discovered the West Indies! Now, it is evident that Antonio Galvam relates the story as if he did not helieve it, — contam — they relate, — and, dix, it is said, never affirming the fact, nor making any inference from it, but merely stating it as a report; and it is certain, which perhaps Hornius did not know, that there never lived a man of pare integrity then Antonio Galvam; a man whose history is disgraceful, not to his country, but to the government under which he lived, and whose nuiform and unsulfied virtue entitles him to rank among the best men that have ever done honor to human nature.

The writers who repeat this story of the Seven Islands and their bishops, have also been pleased to find traces of Sacaru in the new world, for which the imaginary resemblances to Christianity which were found in Yucatan and other places, serve them as proofs. — Gregoria Garcia, Origen de los Indios, 1, iv. c. 20.

The work of Ahnlcacim, in which the story first appears, has been roundly asserted to be the forgery of the translator, Mignel de Luna. The Portuguese academician, Contador de Argote, speaking of this romantic history, acquits him of the fraud, which has with little reflection been laid to his charge. [Pedraça, he says, in the Grandezas de Granada, and Rodrigo Caro, in the Grandezas de Sevilla, both affirm that the original Arabic exists in the Escurial, and Escolano asserts the same, although Nicholas Antonio says that the catalogues of that library do not make mention of any such book. If Luca had forged it, it would not have had many of those blunders which are observed in it; nor is there any reason for imputing such e frand to Lunz, a man well skilled in Arabic, and of good reputation. What I suspect is, that the book was composed by a Granadan Moor, and the reason which induces me to form this opinion is, the minuteness with which he describes the conquest which Tarif made of these parts of the kingdom of Granada, of the Alpuxarras and the Serra Neveda, pointing out the etymologies of the names of places, and other circumstances, which any one who reads with attention will observe. As to the time in which the composer of this amusiog romance flourished, it was certainly after the reign of Bedeci Aben Habnz, who governed, and was Lord of, Granada about the year 1013, as Marmol relates, after the Arabian writers ; and the reason which I have for this assertion is, that in the romance of Abulcacim the story is told which gave occusion to the said Bedeci Aben Habuz to set up in Granada that famous vane, which represents a knight upon horseback in bronze, with a spear in the right hand, and a club in the left, and these words in Arabic, - Bedeci Aben Habuz says, that in this manner Andalusia must be kept ! the figure moves with every wind, and veers about from one end to another. - Memorias de Braga, t. iii. p. 120.

In the fabulous Chronicle of D. Rodrigo, Sacarus, as he is there called, is a conspicnous personage; but the tale of his emigration was not then current, and the author kills him before the Moors appear upon the stage. He seems to have designed him as a representation of perfect generosity.

> All too long, Here in their own inheritance, the sons Of Spain have groan'd beneath a foreign yoke. IV. p. 659, col. 2.

There had been a law to prohibit intermarriages between the Goths and Romans; this law Recessuintho annulled,* observing, in his edict, that the people ought in no slight degree to rejoice at the repeal. It is curious that the distinction should have existed so long; but it is found also in a law of Wamba's, and doubtless must have continued till both names were lost together in the general wreck. The vile principle was laid down in the laws of the Wisigoths, that such as the root is, such onght the branch to be, — gran confusion es de linage, quande el fiyo non seneya al padre, que aquelo ques de la raiz, debu ere en a eima, and upon this principle a law was made to keep the children of slaves, slaves also.

" Many men well versed in history," says Contador de Argote, (Memorias de Brags, 3, 273,) " think, and think rightly, that this was a civil war, and that the monarchy was divided into two factions, of which the least powerful availed itself of the Arabs as auxiliaries; and that these auxiliaries made themselves masters, and easily effected their iotent by means of the divisions in the country."

"The natives of Spain," says Joan de Barros, "never hore much love to the Goths, who were strangers and comelings, and when they came had no right there, for the whole beloaged to the Roman empire. It is believed that the greater part of those whom the Moors slew were Goths, and it is said that, on one side and on the other, in the course of two years there were slain by the sword seven bundred thousand men. The Christians who escaped chose that the name of Goths should be lost; and though some Castillians complain that the race should be extinguished, saying with Don Jorge Manrique, Pues la sangre de los Godos y el linage y la nobleza tan crecida, por quantas vias y modos se sune su grande alteza en esta vida.

* Fuero Juzgo, L. 3. tit. 1. leg. 1. 91 I must say that I see no good foundation for this; for they were a proud nation and barbarous, and were a long time hereties of the sects of Arins and Eutychins and Pelagina, and can be praised as nothing except as warriors, who were so greedy for dominion, that wherever they reached they lais every thing hare like locusts, and therefore the emperou ceded to them this country. The people who dwelt in it before were a better mee, always praised and feared, and respected by the Romans, loyal and faithful and true and reasonable: and if the Goths afterwards were worthy of any estimation they became so here: for as plants lose their bitterness and improve by being planted and translated into a good soil, (as is said of peaches,) so does a good land change its inhabitants, and of rustic and barbarous make them polished and virtuous.

"The Moors did not say that they came against the Christians, but against the Goths, who had usurged Spain; and it appears that to the people of the land it mattered little whether they were under Goths or Moors; or indeed it might not be too much to say that they preferred the Moors, not only because all new things and changes would be pleasing, but because they were exasperated against the Goths for what they had done against the Christians, (i. e. the Carbolics,) and for the bad government of King Witiza."

"You are not to think," says the Chronicler, "that Count Don Julian and the Bishop Don Orpas came of the lineage of the Goths, but of the lineage of the Cæsars, and therefore they were not grieved that the good lineage should be destroyed." — Chr. del K. D. Rodrigo, p. i. c. 248.

For this fact there is the unquestiooable testimony of Isidorus Pacensis. Per idem tempus in Æra 735, anno imperii ejus 9. Arabum 97. Florez relates the story in the words of the old translation of an Arabic original imputed to Rasis. "When Belazin, the son of Muza, remained for Lord of Spain, and had ordered his effairs right well, they told him tidings of Ulaca, who had been the wife of King D. Rodrigo, that she was a right worthy dame, and right beautiful, and of a great lineage, and that she was a native of Africa ; whereapon he sent for her, and ordered that beasts should be given her, and much property, and mea-servants and maid-servants, and all things that she could require, till she could come to him. And they brought her unto him, and when he saw her, he was well pleased with her, and said, Ulaca, tell me of thy affairs, and conceal nothing from me; for thou knowest 1 may do with thee according to my will, being my captive. And when she heard this, it increased the grief which she had in her heart, and her sorrow was such, that she had well nigh fallen dead to the ground, and she replied weeping and said, Baron, what wouldst thou know more of my affairs? For doth not all the world know, that I, a young damsel, being married with King

D. Rodrigo, was with him Lady of Spain, and dwelt in booor and in all pleasure, more than I deserved ; and therefore it was God's will that they should endure no longer? And now I am in dishonor greater than ever was dame of such high state : For I am plundered, and have not a single palm of inheritance; and 1 am a captive, and brought into bondage. I also have been mistress of all the land that I hchold. Therefore, Sir, have pity upon my misfortunes; and in respect of the great lineage which you know to be mine, suffer not that wrong or violence be offered me by any one; and, Sir, if it be your grace you will ransom me. There are men I know who would take compassion on me, and give you for me a great sum. And Belazin said to her, Be certain that so long as I live, you shall never go from my house. And Ulaca said, What then, Sir, would you do with me? and Belazin said, 1 will that you should remain in my house, and there you shall be free from all wretchedness, with my other wives. And she said, In an evil day was I born, if it is to be true that I have been wife of the honored king of Spain, and now have to live in a stranger's house as the concubine and eaptive of another ! And I swear unto God whose pleasure it is to dismay me thus, that I will rather seek my own death as soon as I can; for I will endure no more misery, seeing that by death I can escape it. And when Belazin saw that she thus lamented, he said to her, Good dame, think not that we have concubines, but by our law we may have seven wives, if we can maintain them, and therefore you shall be my wife, like each of the others; and all things which your law requires that a man should do for his wife, will 1 do for you ; and therefore you have no cause to lament ; and be sure that I will do you much honor, and will make all who love me serve and honor you, and you shall be mistress of all my wives. To this she made answer and said, Sir, offer me no violence concerning my law, but let me live as a Christiau: And to this Belazin was nothing loth, and he granted it, and his marriage was performed with her according to the luw of the Moors; and every day he liked ber more, and did her such honor that greater could not be. And it hefell that Belazin being one day with Ulaca, she said to him, Sir, do not think it ill if I tell you of a thing in which you do not act as if you knew the custom. And he said, Wherein is it that 1 err? Sir, said she, because you have no crown, for no one was ever confirmed in Spain, except be had a crown upon his head. He said, This which you say is nothing, for we have it not of our lineage, neither is it our custom to wear a crown. She said, Many good reasons are there why a crown is of use, and it would injure you nothing, but be well for you, and when you should wear your crown upon your head, God would know you and others also by it : And she said, You would look full comely with it, and it would be great nobleness to you, and be right fitting, and you should wear in it certain stones, which will be good for you, and avail you. And in a short time afterwards, Belazin went to dwell at Seville, and ha carried Ulaca with him, and she took of her gold, and of her pearls, and of her precious stones, which she had many and good, and made him the noblest crown that ever was seen by man, and gave it him, and hade him take it, and place it where it should be well kept; and Ulaca, as she was a woman of understanding and prudence, ordered her affairs as well as Belazin, so that he loved her much and did great honor to her, and did many of those things which she desired; so that he was well pleased with the Christians, and did them much good, and showed favor unto them." - Memorias de las Reynas Catholicas, 1, p. 28.

The issue of this was fatal to Abdalaziz. In Albucacim's history, it is said that he was converted by this Christian wife, and for that reason put to death by his father. Others have supposed that by means of ber influence he was endeavoring to make himself King of Spain, independent of the Caliph. A characteristic circumstance is added. Egilona was very desirous to convert her busband, and that she might at least obtaio from him some mark of outward respect for her images, made the door of the apartment in which she kept them, so law, that he could not eater without bowing. — Bleda, p. 214.

The character of this Queen is beautifully conceived by the author of Count Julian :--

Beaming with virtue inaccessible Stood Egilona ; for her lord she lived, And for the heavens that raised her sphere so high : All thoughts were on her -all beside her own. Negligent as the blossoms of the field, Arrayed in candor and simplicity, Before her path she mard the streams of joy Murmur her pame in all their cadences, Saw them in every scene, in light, in shade, Reflect her image ; but acknowledged them Hers most complete when flowing from her most. All things in want of her, herself of none, Pomp and dominion lay beneath her feet Unfelt and unregarded : now behold The earthly passions war against the heavenly ! Pride against love ; amhition and revenge Against devotion and compliancy -Her glorious beams adversity hath blunted, And coming nearer to our quiet view, The original clay of coarse mortality Hardens and flaws around her.

One day of bitter and severe delight. - VI. p. 663, col. 2.

1 have ventured to borrow this expression from the tragedy of Count Julian. Nothing can be finer than the passage in which it occurs.

Abdalazis. Thou lovest still thy country? Julian. Abdalazis,

All men with human feelings love their country. Not the high-born or wealthy man alone, Who looks upon his children, each one led By its gay handmaid, from the high alcove, And hears them once a-day; not only he Who hath forgotten, when his guest inquires The name of some far village all his own ; Whose rivers bound the province, and whose hills Touch the last cloud upon the level sky : No; better men still better love their country 'Tis the old mansion of their earliest friends, The chapel of their first and best devotions ; When violence, or perfidy, invades, Or when unworthy lords hold wassail there, And wiser heads are drooping round its moats, At last they fix their steady and stiff eye There, there alone - stand while the trumpet blows, And view the hostile flames above its towers Spire, with a bitter and severe delight.

Restoring in thy native line, O Prince, The sceptre to the Spaniard. - VII. p. 606, col. 1.

This was a favorite opinion of Garihays, himself a Biscayan, but be has little better proof for it than the fact, that Gothic names disappeared with Roderick, and that Pelayo and his successors drew their nomenclature from a different stock. He says, indeed, that ancient writings are not wanting to support his opinion. Some rude commentator has written against this assertion in the margin of my copy, miente Garibay; and 1 am afraid the commentator is the truer man of the two.

There is a fabulous tale of Pclayo's birth, which, like many other tales of no better authority, has legends and relies to support it. The story, according to Dr. D. Christoval Lozano, in bis history of Los Reyes Nuevos de Toledo, is this. Luz, uiece to Egilona, and sister of Roderick, dwelt at Toledo, is the palace of King Egics. Duke Favila, her father's hothem fell in love with her, and came from his residence in Cantabria to ask her in marriage, expecting to find no other obstacle than the dispensable one of consenguinity. But it so happened, that the King was wooing Luz to become his concubine; her refusal made him jealons, as he could not conceive that it proceeded from any cause except lave for another, and as his temper and power were not to be provoked without danger, Favila dared not openly make his suit. He and his mistress therefore met in private, and plighted their vowa before an image of the Virgin. The consequences soon became apparent, - the more so, because, as Dr. Lozano assures us, there were at that time no fashions to conceal such things, Y mas que en aquella era no se avian inventado los guarda-infantes. The king observed the alteration is her shape, and placed spies upon her, meaning to destroy the child and punish the mother with the rigor of the law, death by fire being the puaishment for such an offence. Luz was well aware of the danger. She trusted her Camarera and one servant: They made an ark: She herself, as soon as the infant was horn, threw water in his face, and baptized him by the name of Pelayo: a writing was placed with him in the ark, requesting that wheever should find it would breed up the boy with care, for he was of good lineage. Money enough was added to support him for eight years, and the ark was then launched upon the Tagus, where it floated down the stream all night, all day, and ell the following night. On the second morning it grounded near Alcantara, and was found by Grafeses, who happened to be Luz's uncle. The king's suspicion being confirmed by the sudden alteration in the lady's eppearance, he used every means to detect her, but without avail; he even ordered all children to be examined who had been born in or around Toledo within three mooths, and full inquiry to be made into the circumstances of their births: Te the astonishment of later historians, 35,000 of that age were found, end not one among them of suspicious extraction. The tale proceeds in the ordinary form of romance. The lady is accused of incontinence, and to he burnt, unless a champion defeats her accuser. Favila of course undertakes her defence, and of course is victorious. A second battle follows with the same success, and fresh combets would have followed, if a hermit had not brought the king to repeatance. Grafeses in due time discovers the secret, and restores the child to his parents

This fabrious chronicle seems to be the oldest written source of this story, but some such tradition had probably long been current. The ark was shown at Alcantara, in the convent of St. Benito ; and a description of it, with reasons why its authenticity should be admitted, may be found in Francisco de Pisa's Description de Toledo, 1. iii. c. i.

Gedfrey was actually crowned with thorns in Jerusslem, a circumstance which has given rise to a curious question in heraldry, - thus curiously stated and commented by Rohert Barret, in that part of his long poem which relates to this Prince : --

A Prince religious, if ever eny, Considering the age wherein he lived, Vice-hater great, eadped with virtues many, True humilized, void of mundane pride ; For though he now created were great king, Yet would he not, as royal pomp requires, Encrewned be with crownet glistering Of gold and gems to mundains vain desires ; But with a pricking, pricking crown of thern, Bearing thereto a Christian reverence, Sith Heaven's King, man's Redeemer, did not scorn To wear such crown within that city's fence, When as, cross-loden, humblely he went, All cowring under burden of that weed, To free man 'To pay the pain of mao's due punishment, from hell.

Hermesind. - X. p. 670, col. I.

Mariana derives the name of Hermesinda from the reverence in which Hermenegild was held in Spain, - a prince who has been sainted for having renounced the Homooisian creed, and raised a civil war against his father in favor of the Homoousian one. It is not a little curions, when the fate of D. Carlos is remembered, that his name should have been inserted in the calendar, at the solicitation of Philip II.! From the same source Mariana derives the names Hermenisinda, Armengol, Ermengand, Hermegildez, and Hermildez But here, as Brito has done with Pelayo, he seems to forget that the name was current before it was borne by the Saint, and the derivations from it as numerous. Its root may he found in Herman, whose German name will prevail over the Latinized Arminius

The story of the Enchanted Tower at Toledo is well known to every English reader. It neither accorded with the character of my poem to introduce the fiction, nor would it have been prudent to have touched upon it after Walter Scott. The account of the Archhishop Rodrego, and of Abulcacim, may be found in his notes. What follows here is translated from the fabulous chronicle of King Don Rodrigo.

"And there came to him the keepers of the house which was in Toledo, which they called Plensure with Pain, the Perfect Guard, the secret of that which is to come ; and it was called also by another name, the Honor of God. And these keepers came before the king, and said unto him, Sire since God hath done thee such good, and such favor as that thou shouldst be king of all Spain, we come to require of thee that theo wouldst go to Toledo, and put thy lock upon the house which we are appointed to keep. And the king demanded of them what house was that, and wherefore he should put upon it his lock. And they said unto him, Sire, we will willingly tell thee, that thou mayst know. Sire, troe it is, that when Hercoles the Strong came into Spain, he made in it many marvellous things in those places where he understood that they might hest remain ; and thus when he was in Toledo he understood well that that city woold be one of the best in Spain ; and saw that the kings who should he Lords of Spain would have more pleasure to continue dwelling therein than in any other part ; and seeing that things would come after many ways, some contrariwise to others, it pleased him to leave many enchantments mude, to the end that after his death his power and wisdom might by them be known. And he made in Toledo a house, after the manner which we shall now describe, with great mastership, so that we have not heard tell of any other such : The which is made after this guise. There are four hons of metal under the foundation of this house ; and so large are they, that a man sitting upon a great horse on the one side, and another in like manner upon the other, cannot see each other, so large are the lions. And the house is upon them, and it is entirely round, and so lofty that there is not a man in the world who can throw a stone to the top: and many have attempted this, but they never could. And there is not a man of this age who can tell you by what manner this house was made, neither whose anderstanding can reach to say in what manner it is worked within. But of that which we have seen without, we have to tell thee. Certes in the whole house there is no stone higger than the hand of a man, and the most of them are of jasper and marble, so clear and shining, that they seem to be crystal. They are of so many colors that we do not think there are two stones in it of the same color; and so cunningly are they joined one with another, that if it were not for the many colors, you would not believe but that the whole house was made of one entire stone. And the stones are placed in such manner one by suother, that seeing them you may know all the things of the battles aforepast, and of great feats. And this is not by pictures, but the color of the stones, and the great art of joining one with the other, make it appear thus. And sans doubt he who should wish to know the truth of the great deeds of arms which have been wrought in the world, might by means of that house know it. See now in what manner Hercules was wise and fortunate, and right valiant, and acquainted with the things which were to come. And when he was Lord of Spain, he made it after this guise, which we have related unto you. And he commanded that neither King nor Lord of Spain who might come after him, should seek to know that which was within; hut that every one instead should put a lock upon the doors thereof, even as he himself did, for he first put on a lock, and fastened it with his key. And after him there has been no King nor Lord in Spain, who has thought it good to go from his bidding ; but every one as he came put on each his lock, according to that which Hercules appointed. And now that we have told thee the manner of the honse, and that which we know concerning it, we require of thee that thou shouldst go thither, and put on thy lock on the gates thereof, even as all the kings have done who have reigned in Spain until this time. And the King Don Rodrigo hearing the marvellous things of this house, and desiring to know what there was within, and moreover being a man of great heart, wished to know of all things how they were and for what guise. He made answer, that no such lock would he put upon that house, and that by all means he would know what there was within. And they said unto him, Sire, you will not do that which has never been dony in Spain ; be pleased therefore to observe that which the other kings have observed. And the king said unto them, Leave off now, and I will appoint the soonest that may be how I may go to see this house, and then I will do that which shall seem good. And he would give them no other reply. And when they saw that he would give them no other reply, they dared not persist farther, and they dispeeded themselves of him, and went their way.

"Now it came to pass that the King Don Rodrigo called to how it was made, they found in it nothing but one pillar, and mind how he had been required to put a lock upon the doors that not very large, and round, and of the height of a man of of the house which was in Toledo, and he resolved to carry into effect that unto which his heart inclined him. And one day he gathered together all the greatest knights of Spain, who were there with him, and went to see this house, and he saw that it was more marvellons than those who were its keepers had told him, and as he was thus beholding it, he said, Friends, I will by all means see what there is in this house which Hercoles made. And when the great Lords who were with him heard this, they began to say unto him that he ought not to do this : for there was no reason why he should do that which never king nor Cæsar, that had been Lord of Spain since Hercoles, had done until that time. And the king said unto them, Friends, in this house there is nothing but what may be seen. I am well sure that the chantments cannot hinder me, and this heing so, I have nothing to fear. And the knights said, Do that, sir, which you think good, but this is not done by our counsel. And when he saw that they were all of a different accord from that which he wished to do, he said, Now gainsay me as you will, for let what will happen I shall not forhear to do my pleasure. And forthwith he went to the doors, and ordered all the locks to be opened; and this was a great labor, for so many were the keys and the locks, that if they had not seen it, it would have been a great thing to believe. And after they were unlocked, the king pushed the door with his hand, and he went in, and the chief persons who were there with him, as many as he pleased, and they found a hall made in a square, being as wide on one part as on the other, and in it there was a bed richly furnished, and there was bid in that bed the statue of a man, exceeding great, and armed at all points, and he had the one arm stretched out, and a writing in his hand. And when the king and those who were with him saw this hed, and the man who was laid in it, they marvelled what it might be, and they said, Certes, that bed was one of the wonders of Hercules and of his enchantments. And when they saw the writing which he held in his hand, they showed it to the king, and the king went to him, and took it from his hand, and opened it and read it, and it said thus, Audacious one, thou who shalt read this writing, mark well what thou art, and how great evil through thee shall come to pass, for even as Spain was peopled and conquered by me, so by thee shall it be depopulated and lost. And I say unto thee, that I was Hercules the strong, he who conquered the greater part of the world, and all Spain ; and I slow Geryon the Great, who was Lord thereof; and I alone subdued all these lands of Spain, and conquered many nations, and brave knights, and never any one could conquer me, save only Death. Look well to what thou doest, for from this world thou wilt carry with thee nothing but the good which thou hast done.

" And when the king had read the writing he was troubled, and he wished then that he had not begun this thing. Howbeit he made semblance as if it touched him not, and said that no man was powerful enough to know that which is to come, except the true God. And all the knights who were present were much troubled because of what the writing said; and having seen this they went to behold another apartment, which was so marvellous, that no man can relate how marvellous it was. The colors which were therein were four-The one part of the apartment was white as snow; and the other, which was over against it, was more black than pitch ; and another part was green as a fine emerald, and that which was over against it was redder than fresh blood ; and the whole apartment was bright and more lucid than crystal, and it was so beautiful, and the color thereof so fine, that it seemed as if each of the sides were made of a single stone, and all who were there present said that there was not more than a single stone in each, and that there was no joining of one stone with another, for every side of the whole four appeared to be one solid slab; and they all said, that never in the world had such a work as this elsewhere been made, and that it must le held for a remarkable thing, and for one of the wonders of the world. And in all the apartments there was no beam, nor any work of wood, neither within nor without; and as the floor thereof was flat, so also was the ceiling. Above these were windows, and so many, that they gave a great light, so that all which was within might be seen as clearly as that which was without. And when they had seen the apartment how it was made, they found in it nothing but one pillar, and mean stature : and there was a door in it right cunningly (made, and upon it was a little writing in Greek letters, which said, Hercules made this house in the year of Adam three hundred and six. And when the king had read these letters, and understood that which they said, he opened the door, and when it was opened they found Hebrew letters which said, This house is one of the wonders of Hercules ; and when they had read these letters they saw a niche made in that pillar, in which was a coffer of silver, right subtly wrought, and after a strange manner, and it was gilded, and covered with many precious stones, and of great price, and it was fastened with a lock of mother-of-pearl. And this was made in such a manner that it was a strange thing, and there were cut upon it Greek letters which said, It cannot be but that the king, in whose time this coffer shall be opened, shall see wonders before his death : thus said Hercules the Lord of Greece and of Spain, who knew some of those things which are to come. And when the king understood this, he said, Within this coffer lies that which I seek to know, and which Hercules has so atrongly forbidden to be known. And he took the lock and broke it with his hands, for there was no other who durst break it : and when the lock was broken, and the coffer open, they found nothing within, except a white cloth folded hetween two pieces of copper; and he took it und opened it, and found Moors portrayed therein with turbans, and banners in their hands, and with their swords round their necks, and thair bows behind them at the saddle-bow, and over these figures were letters which said, When this cloth shall be opened, and these figures seen, men appareled like them shall conquer Spain and shall be Lords thereof.

"When the King Don Rodrigo saw this, he was troubled at heart, and all the knights who were with him. And they said noto him, Now, sir, you may see what has hefallen you, because you would not listen to those who counselled you not to pry into so great a thing, and because you despised the kings who were before you, who all observed the commands of Hercules, and ordered them to be observed, but you would not do this. And he had greater trouble in his heart than he had ever before felt; howbeit he began to comfort them all, and said to them, God forbid that all this which we have seen abould come to pass. Nevertheless, I say, that if things must be according as they are here declared, I could not set aside that which hath been ordained, and, therefore, it appears that I am he by whom this house was to be opened, and that for me it was reserved. And seeing it is done, there is no reason that we should grieve for that which cannot be prevented, if it must needs come. And let come what may, with all my power 1 will strive against that which Hercules has foretold, even till I take my death in resisting it : and if you will all do in like manner, I doubt whether the whole world can take from us our power. But if by God it hath been appointed, no strength and no art can avail against his Almighty power, but that all things must be fulfilled even as th him seemeth good. In this guise they went out of the house, and he charged them all that they should tell no man of what they had seen there, and ordered the doors to be fastened in the same manner as before. And they had hardly finished fastening them, when they beheld an engle fall right down from the sky, as if it had descended from Heaven, carrying a burning firebrand, which it laid upon the top of the bouse, and began to fan it with its wings ; and the firebrand with the motion of the air began to blaze, and the house was kindled and burnt as if it had been made of rosin ; so strong and mighty were the flames and so high did they blaze up, that it was a great marvel, and it burnt so long that there did not remain the sign of a single stone, and all was burnt into ashes. And after a while there came a great flight of hirds small and black, who hovered over the ashes, and they were so many, that with the fanning of their wings, all the ashes were stirred up, and rose into the air, and were scattered over the whole of Spain ; and many of those persons upon whom the ashes fell, appeared as if they had been besmeared with blood. All this happened in a day, and many said afterwards, that all those persons upon whom those ashes fell, died in battle when Spain was conquered and lost; and this was the first sign of the destruction of Spain." - Chronica del Rey D. Rodrigo, Part I. c. 28-30.

The Spanish ballad upon the subject, fine as the subject is is flat as a flounder : --

De los nabilissimos Godos que en Castilla avian reynado Rodrigo reyno el postrero de los reyes que han passado; en cuyo tiempo los Moros todo Espana avian gonado, sino fuera las Asturias que defendio Don Pelayo En Toledo esta Rodrigo al comienço del reynado; vinole gran voluntad de ver lo que esta cerrado en la torre que esta alli, antigua de muchos años. En esta torre los reyes cada uno hecho un canado. porque lo ordenara ansi Hercules el afamado, que gano primero a España de Gerion gran tirano. Creyo el rey que avia en la torre grun thesoro alli guardado; la torre fue lucgo abierta y quitados los canados; no ay en ella cosa alguna, sola una cara han hallado. El rey la mandura abrir; un paño dentro se ha hallado, con unas letras latinas que dizen en Castellano, Quando aquestas cerraduras que cierran estas canados, fueren abiertas y visto lo en el paño debuxado, España sera perdida, y toda ella asolada; ganaran la gente estrana como aqui est an figurados, los rostros muy denegridos, los braços arremangados, muchas colores vestidas, en las cabeças tocados, alçadas tracran sus señas en cavallos cavalgando, largas lanças en sus manos, con espadas en su lado. Alarabes se diran, y de aquesta tierra estraños; perderase toda España, que nada no aura fincado. El rey con sus ricos hombres todos se avian espantado, quando vieron las fionras y letrus que hemos contado; buelven a cerrar la torre, quedo el rey muy angustiado. Juan Yague de Salas relates a singular part of this miracle, which I have not seen recorded any where but in his very rare and curious poem : —

The Chronica General del Rey Don Alfonso gives a singular account of the first inhabitant of this fatal spot : --

"There was a king who had to name Rocas; he was of the east country from Edom, wherein was paradise, and for the love of wisdom he forsook his kingdom, and went about the world seeking knowledge. And in a country between the east and the north, he found seventy pillars ; thirty were of brass, thirty of marble, and they lay upon the ground, and upon them was written all knowledge and the nature of things. These Rocas translated, and carried with him the book in which he had translated them, by which he did marvels. He came to Troy when the people under Laomedon were building the city, and seeing them he laughed. They asked him why, and he replied, that if they know what was to happen, they would cease from their work. Then they took him and led him before Laomedon, and Laomedon asked him for why he had spoken these words, and Royas answered, that he had spoken truth, for the people should be put to the sword, and the city be destroyed by fire. Wherefore the Trojans would have slain him, but Laomedon, judging that he spake from folly, put him in prison to see if he would repent. He, fearful of death, by his art sent a sleep upon the guards, and filed off his irons, and went his way. And he came to the seven hills by the Tiber, and there, upon a stone, he wrote the letters Roma, and Romulus found them, and gave them as a name to his city, because they have a resemblance to his own.

" Then went King Royas westward, and he entered Spain, and went round it and through it, till coming to the spot where Toledo stands, he discovered that it was the central place of the country, and that one day a city should there be huilt, and there he found a cave, into which he entered. There lay in it a huge dragon, and Rocas in fear besought the dragon not to hurt him, for they were both creatures of God. And the dragon took such love towards him, that he always brought him part of his food from the chase, and they dwelt together in the cave. One day, an honorable man of that land, hy name Tartus, was hunting in that mountain, and he found a bear, and the bear fled into the cave, and Rocas, in fear, addressed him as he had done the dragon, and the hear quietly lay down, and Rocas fondled his head ; and Tartns following, saw Rocas, how his heard was long, and his hody covered with hair, and he thought it was a wild man, and fitted an arrow to his bow, and drew the string. Then Rocus besought him in the name of God not to slay him, and obtained security for himself and the bear under his protection. And when Tartus heard how he was a king, he invited him to leave that den and return with him, and he would give him his only daughter in marriage, and leave him all that he had. By this the dragon returned. Tartus was alarmed, and would have fled, but Rocas interfered, and the dragon threw down half an ox, for he had devoured the rest, and asked the stranger to stop and eat. Tartus declined the invitation, for he must be gone. Then said Rocas to the drugon, My friend, I must now leave you, for we have sojourned together long enough. So he departed, and married, and had two sons; and, for love of the dragon, he built a tower over the cave, and dwelt there. After his death, one of his sons huilt another, and King Pirros added more building, and this was the beginning of Toledo."

Redeemed Magdalen. - X. p. 672, col. 1.

Lardner published a letter to Jonas Hanway, showing why houses for the reception of penitent harlots ought not to be called Magdalen Houses; Mary Magdalen not being the sinner recorded in the 7th chapter of Luke, but a woman of distinction and excellent character, who labored under some bodily infirmity, which our Lord miracolously healed.

In the Shibboleth of Jean Despagne is an article thus entitled: De Marie Magdelaine laquelle fuussement on dit avoir este femme de mauvaise vie: Le tort que luy font les Theologiens pour la plus part en leurs sermons, en leurs livres; et specialement la Bible Angloise en l'Argument du 7e chap. de S. Luc.

"The injury," says this Hugonot divine, "which the Romish church does to another Mary, the sister of Lazarra, has been sufficiently confuted by the orthodox. It has been ignorantly believed that this Mary, and another who was of Magdala, and the sinner who is spoken of in the 7th of Luke, are the same person, confounding the three in one. We have justified one of the three, to wit, her of Bethany, the sister of Lazarus; but her of Magdala we still defame, as if that Magdalen were the sinner of whom St. Luke speaks.

" Nothing is more common in the mouth of the vulgar than the wicked life of the Magdalen. The preachers who wish to confess souls that are afflicted with horror at their sins, represent to them this woman as one of the most immodest and dissolute that ever existed, to whom, however, God has shown mercy. And upon this same prejudice, which is altogether imaginary, has been founded a reason why the Son of God, having been raised from the dead, appeared to Mary Magdalen before any other person; for, say they, it is because she had greater need of consolation, having been a greater sinner than the others. - He who wrote the Practice of Piety places her with the greatest offenders, even with Manasses, one of the wickedest of men : and to authorize this error the more, it has been inserted in the Bible itself. For the argument to the 7th of Luke in the English version says, that the woman whose sins were in greater number than those of others - the woman, who till then had lived a wicked and infamous life - was Mary Magdalen. But, 1st, The text gives no name to this sinner: Where then has it been found? Which of the Evangelists, or what other authentic writing, has taught us the proper name or surname of the woman? For she who poured an ointment upon Christ (Matth. xxvi. John xii.) was not this sinner, nor Mary Magdalen, hut a sister of Lazarus. All these circumstances show that they are two different stories, two divers actions, performed at divers times, in divers places, and by divers persons. 2dly, Where do we find that Mary Magdalen ever anointed the feet of our Savior? 3dln, Where do we find that Mary Magdalen had been a woman of evil life ? The gospel tells us that she had been tormented with seven devils or evil spirits, an affliction which might happen to the holiest person in the world : But we du not see even the shadow of a word there which marks her with infomy. Why then do we still adhere to an invention not only fahalous, but injurious to the memory of a woman illustrious in piety? We ought as well to beware of hearing false witness against the dead as against the living.

"It is remarkable that neither the sinner (Luke vii.) nor the adulteress who is spoken of in the 8th of Jehn, are named in the sacred history, any more than the thief who was converted on the cross. There are particular reasons, beyond a doubt, and we may in part conjecture them, why the Holy Spirit has abstained from relating the names of these great sinners, although converted. It is not then for us to impose them; still less to appropriate them to persons whom the Scripture dues not accuse of any enormous sins."

That Egyptian penitent. - X. p. 672, col. I.

St. Mary the Egyptian. This is one of those religious romances which may probably have been written to edify the people, without any intention of deceiving them. Some parts of the legend are beautifully conceived. An English Romanist has versified it in eight books, under the title of the Triamph of the Cross, or Penitent of Egypt. Birmingham, 1776. He had the advantage of believing his story, — which ought to have acted like inspiration.

Lope de Vega quotes scripture la proof of the opinion expressed in this last couplet. 2 Kings, ch. xiii. Old Barret tells the story as Ancient Pistol would have done :-

" In Ulit's time there regatized in Spain One Roderick, king from the Gothians race't; Into whose secret heart with silent strain Instretcht the 'sturber of hart pudike chust, Him enamoravizing of a piece, A piece by Nature quaintly symmetrized, Eofayred with beauty as Helen fair of Greece : Count Julian's daughter of bed-wedlockized, Yeleaped Caba; who in court surshined The rest, as Hesperus the dimmed stars. This piece the king in his Love's-closet shrined, Survicting her by wile, gold, gems, or forced jars." It is thus related in the fabulous Chronicle: — "Despues que el Rey ovo descubierto su coragon a la Caoa, no era dia que la no requiriesse una vez o dos, y ella se defendía con buena razon: empero al cabo como el Rey no pensava cosa como en esto, un dia en la siesta embio con un donzel suyo por la Caoa; y ella vino a su mandado; y como en essa hora no avia en toda su camara otro ninguno sino ellos todos tres, el cumplio com ella todo lo que puso. Empero tanto sabed que si ella quisiera dar bores que bien fuera oyda de la reyna, mas callosse con lo que el Rey quiso fater." — P. 1, c. 172.

In this fabulous Chronicle Roderick's fall is represented as the work of his stars : — "Y aunque a las veres pensate el gran yerro en que tocava, y en la maldad que su coraçon avia cometido, tanto era el ardor que tenia que lo dividava todo, y esto acarreava la malandança que le avia de venir, y la destruycion de Espana que avia de aver comienço para se hater ; y quiero vos decir que sa constelación no pudía escusar que esto no passasse assi ; y yu Dios lo avia dezado en su discrecion ; y el por cosa que fuesse no se podía arredrar que no topasse en ello." — P. 1, c. 164.

" Certes," says the fahulous Chronicler, " he was a Lord of greater bounty than ever had been seen before his time. - He used to say, that if all the world were his, he would rather lose it than one friend ; for the world was a thing which, if it were lost, might be recovered ; but a friend once lost could never he recovered for all the treasure in the world. And hecause he was thus bountiful, all those of Spain were likewise ; and they had the fame of being the most liberal men in the world, especially those of the lineage of the Goths. Never a thing was asked at his hands, whether great or small, to which he could say no; and never king nor other great lord asked aid of him that he denied, hut gave them of his treasures and of his people as much as they needed. And doubt not, but that if fortune had oot ordered that in his time the lineage of the Goths should be cut off, and Spain destroyed, there was no king or emperor whom he would not have brought into subjection; and if the whole world ought to be placed in the power of one mas, (speaking of worldly things,) there never was, nor will be, a man deserving to possess it, save be clone. But as envy is the beginning of all evil, and saw how great was the goodness of this king, she never rested till she had brought about that things should be utterly reversed, even till she had destroyed him. Oh what great damage to the world will it be when God shall consent that so much bounty, and courage, and frankness, and loyalty should be destroyed forever ! All nations ought to clad themselves in wretched weeds one day in the week to mours for the flower of the world, and especially ought the people of Spain to make such mourning." - Chronica del Rey Don Rodrigo, p. 1, c. 55.

And again, when the last battle is approaching, he praises the king: — "Yel Rey era el mas esforçado hombre de coraçon que nunca se oyo dezir: y el mas franco de todo lo que podia arer; y preciava mas cobrar amigos que no quanto tesoro pulitese estar en su reyno, hasta el dia que ereyo el consejo del traydor del conde Don Julian; y a maravilla era buen cavallero que al tempo que el no era rey, no se hallara cavallero que al su bondad se ygualasse, y tanto sabed que sino por estas malandanças que le vinieron, nunca cavallero al mundo de tales condiciones fue; que nunca a el vino chico ni grande que del se partiesse despagado a culpa suya." — P. 1, c. 213.

In the valuable history of this king by a contemporary writer, the following character of the French is given: —

"Hujus igitur gloriosis temporibus, Galliarum terra altriz perfidu infami denotatur elogio, que utique inastimabili infidelitatis febre vezata, genita a se infidelum depaseret membra. Julian, Hist, Wambre, §5. – Espana Sagrada, 6, 544.

The bath, the bed, The vigil. — X11. p. 675, col. 2.

The Partidas have some curious matter upon this subject. " Cleanliness makes things appear well to those who behold them, even as propriety makes them seemly, each in its way. And therefore the ancients held it good that knights should be made cleanly. For even as they ought to have cleanliness within them in their manners and customs, so ought they to have it without in their garments, and in the arms which they wear. For albeit their business is hard and cruch, being to strike and to slay; yet notwithstanding they may not so far forego their natural inclinations, as not to be pleased with fair and goodly things, especially when they wear them. For on one part they give joy and delight, and on the other make them fearlessly perform feats of arms, because they are aware that by them they are known, and that because of them men tako more heed to what they do. Therefore, for this reason, cleanliness and propriety do not diminish the hardihood and erucity which they ought to have. Moreover, as is aforesaid, that which appears without is the signification of what they have in their inclinations within. And therefore the ancients ordained that the squire, who is of noble lineage, should keep vigil the day before he receives knighthood. And after mid-day the squires shall bathe him, and wash his head with their hands, and lay him in the goodliest bed that may be. And there the knights shall draw on his hose, and clothe him with the best garments that can be had. And when the cleansing of the body has been performed, they shall do as much to the soul, taking him to the church, where he is to labor in watching and heseeching mercy of God, that he will forgive him his sins, and guide him so that he may demcan himself well in that order which he is about to receive; to the end that he may defend his law, and do all other things according as it behoveth him, and that he would be his defender and keeper in all daugers and in all difficulties. And he ought to bear in mind how God is powerful above all things, and can show his power in them when he listeth, and especially in affairs of arms. For in his hand are life and death, to give and to take away, and to make the weak strong, and the strong weak. And when he is making this prayer, he must be with his kneet bent, and all the rest of the time on foot, as long as he can bear it. For the vigil of knights was not ordained to be a sport, nor for any thing else, except that they, and those who go there, should pray to God to protect them, and direct them in the right way, and support them, as men who are entering upon the way of death.²⁷ — Part. ii. T.t. 21, Ley 13.

"When the vigil is over, as soon as it is day, he ought first to hear mass, and pray God to direct all his feats to his service. And afterwards he who is to knight him shall come and ask him if he would receive the order of knighthood; and if he answereth yea, then shall it be asked him, if he will maintaio it as it ought to be maintained; and when he shall have promised to do this, that knight shall fasten on his spurs, or order some other knight to fasten them on, according to what manner of man he may be, and the rank which he holdeth. And this they do to signify, that as a knight putteth spurs on the right and on the left, to make his horse gallop straight forward, even so he ought to let his actions be straight forward, swerving on neither side. And then shall his sword be girt on over his brial. - Formerly it was ordained that when noble men were made knights, they should be armed at all points, as if they were about to do hattle. But it was not held good that their heads should be covered, for they who cover their heads do so for two reasons; the one to hide something there which hath an ill look, and for that reason they may well cover them with any fair and becoming covering. The other reason is, when a man hath done some unseemly thing of which he is ashamed. And this in no wise becometh noble knights. For when they are about to receive so noble and so honorable a thing as knighthood, it is not fitting that they should enter into it with any evil shame, neither with fear. And whea they shall have girded on his sword, they shall draw it from out the scabbard, and place it in his right hand, and make him swear these three things : first, that he shall not fear to die for his faith, if need be; secondly, for his natural Lord; thirdly, for his country ; and when he hath sworn this, theo shall the blow on the neek be given him, in order that thesa things aforesaid may come into his mind, saying, God guard him to his service, and let him perform all that he hath promised ; and after this, he who hath conferred the order upon him, shall kiss him, in token of the faith and peace and brotherhood which ought to be observed among knights. And the same ought all the knights to do who are in that place, not only at that time, but whenever they shall meet with him during that whole year." - Part. ii. Tit. 21, Ley 14.

"The gilt spurs which the knights put on have many significations; for the gold, which is so greatly extermed, ha puts upon his feet, denoting thereby, that the knight shall not for gold commit any malignity or treason, or like deed, that would detract from the honor of knighthood. The spurs are sharp, that they may quicken the speed of the horse; and this signifies that the knight ought to spur and prick on the people, and make them virtuons; for one knight with his virtues is sufficient to make many people virtuous, and on tha other hand, he ought to prick a perverse people to make them forth." — Trante il Blonco, p. 1, C. 19, ff. 44.

The Hermit reads to Tirante a chapter from the Arbor de battaglie, explaining the origin of knighthood. The world, it is there said, was corrupted, when God, to the intent that he might be loved, honored, served, and feared once more, chose out from every thousand men one who was more amiable, more affable, more wise, more loyal, more strong, more noble-minded, more virtuous, and of better customs than all the others: And then he sought among all beasts for that which was the goodliest, and the swiftest and which could bear the greatest fatigue, and might be convenient for the service of man; and he chose the horse, and gave him to this man who was chosen from the thousand; and for this reason he was called cavallero, because the best animal was thus joined to the most noble man. And when Romulus founded Rome, he chose out a thousand young men to be knights, and furno nominati militi porche mille furono fatti in un tempo cavalleri. - P. 1, C, 14, ff. 40.

The custom which some kings had of knighting themselves is consured by the Partidas. -P. ii. T. 21, L. 11. It is there said, that there must be one to give, and another to receive the order. And a knight can no more knight, than a priest can ordain himself. ⁶ When the Infante Hernando of Castile was chosen king nf Aragon, he knighted himself on his coronation day: — De que tots los Barans nobles ho tengeren una gran maravella cam el matzz se feu cavaller, qui segons los dessus dits deyen nenguno pat esser cavaller, sino dones nos fa cavaller de ma de cavaller qui hage lorde de cavallera.¹⁰ — Tomich. C. 47, ff. 68.

⁴⁴ The qualifications for a knight, cavallero, or horse-soldier, in the barburons stage of society, were three: lst, That he should be able to endure fatigue, hardship, and privations. 2d/y, That he should have been used to strike, that his blows oright be the more deadly. 3d/y, That he should be hloodyminded, and rob, hack, and destroy the enemy without compunction. The persons, therefore, who were preferred, were mountaineers, accustomed to hunting, — carpenters, blacksmithe, stone-cutters, and butchers. But it being found that such persons would sometimes run away, it was then discovered that they who were chosen for cavaliers ought to have a natural sense of shane. And for this reason it was appointed that they should be mee of family." — Partida, ii. 7. 21, L. 2. Vegetius, I. 1, c. 7.

The privileges of knighthood were at one time so great, that if the goods of a knight were liable to seizure, they could not be seized where he or his wife were present, nor even where his cloak or shield was to be found. — Part. ii. Tit. 21, Ley 23.

Canciani (T. 3, p. 34) gives a representation of Roland from the porch of the Cathedral at Verona, which is supposed to have been built about the beginning of the ninth century. The figure is identified by the inscription on the sword,— Du-riu-dar-da. The lorica, which Canciani explains, Vestica bellica maculis ferreis contexta, is illustrated by this figure. It is a coat or fock of scale-mail reaching to the knees, and with half sleeves. The ouly hand which appears is unarmed, as far as the elbow. The right leg also is unarmed; the other leg and foot are in the same sort of armor as the coat. The end of a loose garment appears under the mail. The shield reaches from the chin to the middle of the leg; it is broad enough at the top to cover the breast and shoulder, and slopes gradually off to the form of a long oval.

> At every saddle-baw A gory head was hung. - XIV. p. 679, col. 1.

This picture frequently occurs in the Spanish Chronicles. Sigurd the elder, Earl of Orkaey, owed his death to a like custom. "Suddenly clapping spurs to his horse, as he was returning home in triumph, bearing, like each of his followers, one of these bloody spoils, a large front tooth in the mouth of the head which hung dangling by his side, cut the calf of his log, - the wound mortified, and he died. The Earl must have lueen bare-legged." - Torfeus, quated in Edmonston's View of the Zetland Islands, vol. i. p. 33.

Covadonga. - XVI. p. 684, col. 1.

The valley of Covadonga is thus described by the Conte do Saldueña; — and the description is a fair specimen of his poem; -

Yace de Asturias, donde el Sol infante Sus montes con primeras luces baña, De Covadanga el sitia, que triunfante Cana fue en que racia la insigne España Vierte en el Sela liquidos cristales Can Buena y Diba, que de la montaña Deben la vida d la fragosa copa, A quien la antiguedad llamó de Europa

Aqui la juventud de un bello llano Compite d flores, tuces de la esphera : Y burlando el Invierno y el Verana Eterna vive en el la Primavera : Sobre sus glebas se derrama ufana El produgioso cuerno de la Fiera De Amaltea, y uronas, y colores Confunden los mutices con alores. Robustos troncos, can pobladas ramas Vuelven el sitia rustica Alameda, Y del Sol na permiten a las llamas La espeso penetrar de la Arbaleda : Pierden sus rayos las ardientes famas, Pues la frondosidad opuesta veda

La luz al dia, y denso verde muro Crepusculo le viste al ayre puro.

Sigeiendo la ribera de Peonia Al Oriente Estival, y algo inclinada A la parte que mira al medio dia, Otro valle se vé mas dilatado ; A la derecha de esta selva umbria Reynazo corre, que precipitado Va d dar d Bueña en liquidos abrazas Su podre vena en cristalinos lazos. Sin passar de Reynazo el successivo Curso, dexando presto su torrente, Con el cristal se encuentra fugitiva De Deba, a quien la Cueba dio la fuente e La admiracion aqui ruro motivo Ve, formando la senda su corriente, Pues la estrecho del sitio peñascoso Hace camino del licor undaso. Hecha serpiente Deva del camina En circulo se eurosca tortuosa, Vomitando veneno cristalino En el liquido aljufar proceloso : En las arillas con vivaz destino, En tasiga se vuelre, que espumoso Inficiana lethal al pie ligero, Quando le pisa incanto el passagero.

Ya de este valle cierran las campañas, Crecienda de sus riscos la estatura, Desmosuradas tanta las montañas

Que afuscan ya del Sol la lumbre pura Son rusticos los lados, las entraños

Del valle visten siempre la hermosura

Fronsidad el ayre, y de colores El suelo texe alfombra de primores.

Aunque los montes con espesas breñas El lado al sitin formam horroroso, Y contra su verdor desnudas peñas Compiten de lo llano lo frondoso; Piatados pojarillos dulces senas Al son del agua en trino sonoroso De ignorados idiomas en su canto Dan eoa arpados picos dulce encanto.

Lo ultimo de este valle la alta sierra De Covadonga ocupa, donde fuerte Se expone el Herov al juego de la guerra, Sut temor negro ocaso de la suerte : Los qué animosos este sitio encuerra

El ceño despreciando de la muerte, Su pecho encienden en la altiva llama Que no cabra en las trompas de la Fama.

De Diba en ella la preciosa fuente Al llano brota arroyos de cristales, Donde ca pequena balsa su corriente Se detiene en suspensos manaatuales : Despues se precipita su torrente Quanto sus ondas enfreno neutrales, Con sonoroso ruido de la peña El curso de sus aguas se despeña.

Cierra todo este valle esta robusta Peña, donde la Cueva está divina, Que amenoza tajada a ser injusta Del breve llano formidable ruma : Parece quiere ser con saña adusta Seco padron, y fiera se destina A crigirse epitufio peñascoso, Sepultando su horror el sitio hermoso.

De piedra viva tan tremenda altura Que la vista al nurarla se estremece; Yasta greña se visto, y la hermosura De la fertilidad seca aborrece: Es tan desmesurada su estatura Que estrecha el ayre, y barbara parece Que quiere que la sirvan de Cimera Las fulminantes luces de la Esphera.

Como a dos picas en la peña dura Construye en eireo una abertura rara, De una pica de alto, y dos de anchura, Rica de sombras su mansion avara : Fentana, ó boca de la cuera obseura

Donde el Sol no dispensa su luz clara, Tan corta, que su centro tenebroso Aun no admite crepusculo dudoso.

Ea este sitio puez, donde compite La rustquez con las pintadas flores, Puez la pelada sierra no permite A la vista, sino es yertos horrores : Por el contrurio el llano que ea si admite De los bellos matices los primores, Efecto siendo de naturaleza La union en lo fealdad, y la belleza.

A tiorba de cristal las dulces aves Corresponden en trinos amurosos, Vertiendo en blando son tonos suares Ecos los agres beben harmoniosos : Ennudecen su canto quando graves Bemoles gorgrando mas preciosos, Es maestro d la barbara Capilla El Raysenor, plumada maravilla.

Elige este distrito la Divina Providencia d lo grave de la hazaña, Pues aqui su justicia determina La monarquia fabricar de Espana: A las cortas reliquias, que d la ruina Reservô su piedad, enciende en saña Religiosa, que à Imperio sin regunda Abra futura llave Nuevo Mundo.

La una mana de una vira pena, Y qual si tambien fuera el agua viva, Parte la bana, y perte se despuña Coa rapida corricate fugitura: Despues distinto un largo arronjo enseña Que por diversas partes se derriba, Con diférente curso en vario modo, Hasta que a donde nace buelve todo.

Otra, que alta descubre ancho Orizonte, Como agraviada del lugar segundo Sustenta un monstruo que parece un monte, Qual Atlante que ticae en peso el mundo : Y como suele el caudaloso Oronte Dar el ancho tributo al mar prufundo, Assi se arroja con furiosas ondas, Por las partes mas baxas y mas hondas.

Sale bramando la tercera fuente, Como un mar, y despues por el arena

Va con ton maisa y placifae corrente Tao grata y sossegada, y tan screna, Que a las fieras, ganados, peces, gente, Puede aplacar la sed, menguar la pena, Y da despues la buelta, y forma el cuerno De la Luna, imitando el curso eterno.

Nace la quarta de una gran caverna, Y siguiendo su prospera derrota Parece que por arte se govierna, Segun va destulando gota a gota : No vido antigua edad, edad moderna En region muy propinqua, o muy remota, Fuente tan peregrina, obre lan aucea, En gruta artíficiosa, o tosca eucea. Faller, the Worthy, has a heautiful passage in his Church History concerning "Primitive Monks with their Piety and Painfutness." - " When the furnace of persecution in the infancy of Christianity was grown so hot, that most cities, towns, and populous places were visited with that epidemical disease, many pious men fled into deserts, there to live with more safety, and serve God with less disturbance. No wild humor to make themselves miserable, and to choose and court their own calamity, put them on this project, much less any super stitious opinion of transcendent sanctity in a solitary life, made them willingly to leave their former habitations. For whereas all men by their birth are indebted to their country, there to stay and discharge all civil relations, it had been dis honesty in them like hankrupts to run away into the wilder ness to defraud their country, their creditor, except some violent occasion (such as persecution was) forced them thereunto; and this was the first original of monks in the world, so called from µóvos, because living alone by themselves.

"Here they in the deserts hoped to find rocks and stocks, yea beasts themselves, more kind than men had been to them What would hide and heat, cover and keep warm, served them for clothes, not placing (as their successors in after ages) any holiaess in their habit, folded up in the offected fashion thereof. As for their food, the grass was their cloth, the ground their table, herbs and roots their diet, wild fruits and berries their dainties, hunger their sauce, their nails their knives, their hands their cups, the next well their wine-cellar; but what their bill of fare wanted in cheer it had in grace, their life being constantly spent in prayer, reading, musing, and such like pious employments. They turned solitariness itself into society; and cleaving themselves asunder by the divine art of meditation, did make of one, two or more, opposing, answering, moderating in their own bosoms, and husy in themselves with variety of heavenly recreations. It would do one good even but to think of their gnodness, and at the rebound and second hand to meditate upon their meditations. For if ever poverty was to be envied it was here. And I appeal to the moderate men of these times, whether in the height of these woful wars, they have not sometimes wisht (nut out of passionate distemper, but serious recollection of themselves) some such private place to retire unto, where, out of the noise of this clamorous world, they might have reposed themselves, and served God with more quiet."

" Je ne serois pas en grande peine," says Pierre de Marca, " de rechercher les noms des Evesques des Bearn, si la saincte et louable pratique des anciens Peres d'inserer dans les Diptyches, et cayers sacrés de chascune Eglise, les noms des Evesques orthodores, et qui estoient decedés dans la communion de l' Eglise Catholique, eust este continuce jusqu' aux derniers siccles. Et je pourrois me sereir en cette reacoutre du moyen que l' Empereur Justinian et le cinquiesme Concile General employerent, pour sçavoir si Theodore Evesque de Mopsuestie estoit reconnu apres sa mort pour Evesque de l' Eglise qu'il avoit possedée durant sa vie. Car ils ordonnerent a l' Enesque et au Clergé de cette ville, de revoir les Deptyches de leur Eglise, et de rapporter fidellement ce qu'ds y trouveroient. Ce qu' ayant execute diligemment, ils firent rapport qu'apris avoir fueilleté quatre divers cayers en parchemin, qui estoient leurs Diptyches, ils y avoient trouvé le nom de tous les Evesques de ce siege ; horsmis qu' en la place de Theodore, avoit esté substitué le nom de Cyrille, qui estoit le Patriarche d' Alexandrie ; lequel presidant au Concile d' Ephese avoit condamné l' heresie de Nestorius et de Theodore de Mopsuestre. D'ou il apert que les noms de tous les Evesques depuis l' origine et l'establissement de chascune des Eglises estoient euregistres dans les cauers que l'on appelloit Diptyches, et que l'on les recitoit nom par nom en leur lieu, pendant la celebration de la Liturgie, tant pour tesmoigner la continuation de la communion avec les Evesques decedés, que l'on avoit eue avec eurmesmes vivans, qu' afin de procurer par les pricres publiques, et par l'efficace du Sacrifice non sanglant, en la celebration du quel ils estoient recommendés a Dieu, suivant l'ordonnance des Apostres, un grand profit, soulagement, et refraichissement pour leurs ames, comme enseignent Cyrille de Hierusalem, Chrysostume, ct Epiphane." - Histoire de Bearn, l. 4, c. 9, § 1.

"Some time before they made oblation for the dead, it was usual in some ages to recite the names of such eminent hishops, or saints, or martyrs, as were particularly to be mentioned in this part of the service. To this purpose they had certain books, which they called their Holy Books, and commonly their Diptychs, from their being folded together, wherein the names of such persons were written, that the deacon might rehearse them as occasion required in the time of divine service. Cardinal Bona and Schelstrate make three sorts of these Diptychs; one wherein the names of hishops only were written, and more particularly such bishops as had been governors of that particular church : a second, wherein the names of the living were written, who were eminent and conspicuous either for any office and dignity, or some benefaction and good work, whereby they had deserved well of the church ; in this rank were the patriarchs and hishops of great sees, and the hishop and clergy of that particular church ; together with the emperors and magistrates, and others most conspicuous among the people : the third was the book containing the names of such as were deceased in Catholic communion. - These therefore were of use, partly to preserve the memory of such eminent men as wero dead in the communion of the church, and partly to make honorable mention of such general councils as had established the chief articles of the faith ; and to erase the names either of men or councils out of these Deptychs, was the same thing as to declare that they were heterodox, and such as they thought unworthy to hold communion with. as criminals, or some way deviating from the faith. Upon this account St. Cyprian ordered the name of Geminins Victor to be left out among those that were commemorated at the holy table, because he had broken the rules of the church. And Evagrius observes of Theodorus, Bishop of Mopsnestra, that his name was struck out of the Holy Books, that is, the Diptychs, upon the account of his heretical opinions, after death. And St. Austin, speaking of Cæcihan, Bishop of Carthage, whom the Donatists falsely accused of being ordained by Traditores, or men who had delivered up tho Bible to be burned ia the times of persecution, tells them that if they could make good any real charge against burn, they would no longer name him among the rest of the bishops, whom they believed to be faithful and incocent, at the altar."---Bingham, b. 15, ch. 3, sect. 17.

Orary. - XVIII. p. 688, col. 2.

" The Council of Laodicea has two canons concerning the little habit called the Orarium, which was a scarf or tippet to he worn upon the shoulders; and might be used by bishops, preshyters, and deacons, but not by subdeacons, singers, or readers, who are expressly debarred the use of it in that couneil. - The first council of Braga speaks of the tunica and the orarium as both belonging to deacons. And the third council of Braga orders priests to wear the orarium on both shoulders when they ministered at the altar. By which we learn that the tunica or surplice was common to all the clergy, the orarium on the left shoulder proper to deacons, and on both shoulders the distinguishing badge of priests. - The fourth council of Toledo is most particular in these distinctions. For in one canon it says, that if a bishop, presbyter, or deacon, he unjustly degraded, and be found innocent by a synod, yet they shall not be what they were before, unless they receive the degrees they had lost from the hands of the bishops before the altar. If he be a bishop, he must receive his orarium, his ring, and his staff : if a presbyter, his orarium and planeta : if a deacon, his orarium and alba. And in another canon, that the deacon shall wear but one orarium, and that upon his left shoulder, where with he is to give the signal of prayers to the people. Where we may observe also the reason of the name orarium in the coclesiastical sense ab orando, from praying, though in common acceptation it signifies no more than an handkerchief to wipe the face, and so comes ab ore, in which signification it is sometimes used by St. Ambrose and St. Austin, as well as by the old Roman authors. But here we take it in the ecclesiastical sense for a sacred habit apprupriated to bishops, priests, and descons, in the solemnities of divine service, in which sense it appears to have been a habit distinct from that of civil and common use, by all the authorities that have been mentioned." - Bingham, b. 13, c. 8, sect. 2.

The pall Of wool undyed, which on the Apostle's tomb Gregory had laid. — XVIII. p. 688, col. 2.

" By the way, the pall is a pontifical vestment, considerable for the matter, making, and mysteries thereof. For the matter, it is made of lamb's wooll and superstition. I say of lamh's woull, as it comes from the sheep's back, without any other artificiall colour, spun, say some, by a peculiar order of nunnes, first cast into the tombe of St. Peter, taken from his body, say others, surely most sacred if from both ; and superstitiously adorned with little black crosses. For the form thereof; the breadth exceeded not three fingers, one of uur bachelours' lambskin hoods in Cambridge would make three of them, having two labells hanging dewn before and behind, which the archbishops onely, when going to the altar, put about their necks, above their other pontificall ornaments. Three mysteries were couched therein. First, Humility, which beautifies the clergy above all their costly copes. Secondly, Innocency, to imitate lamb-like simplicitie. And, Thirdly, Industry, to follow him who fetched his wandering sheep home on his shoulders. But to speak plainly, the mystery of mysteries in the pall was, that the archbishops receiving it shewed therein their dependence on Rome; and a mote in this manner ceremoniously taken was a sufficient acknowledgement of their subjection. And as it owned Rome's power, so in after ages it increased their profit. For, though now such palls were freely given to archbishops, whose places in Britain for the present were rather cumbersome than commodions, having little more than their paines for their labour ; yet in after ages the archhishop of Canterburie's pall was sold for five thousand florenes, so that the pope might well have the golden fleece if he could sell all his lamb's wooll at that rate. Onely let me add, that the author of Cauterbury-book stiles this pall Tanquam grande Christi Sacramentum. It is well tanquam came in to help it, or else we should have had eight sacraments." -- Fuller's Church History, page 71.

> The relies and the written works of Saints, Toledo's choicest treasure, prized beyond All wealth, their loving and their dead remains; These to the mountain fustnesses he bore Of unsubdued Cantabria, there deposed, One day to be the boast of yet unbuilt Oviedo, and the dcar idolatry Of multitudes unborn. - XVIII, p. 688, col. 1.

"Among those," says Morales, " who then passed from Toledo to Asturias, was the archbishop of Toledo, named Urban. - Ile, with a holy foresight, collected the sacred relics which he could, and the most precious books of his own church and of others, determining to carry them all to the Astarias, in order that the holy relics might not be profaned or treated with little reverence by the infidels; and that the hooks of the Holy Scriptures, and of the ecclesiastical offices, and the works of our holy doctors, might not he lost. - And although many relics are mentioned which the archhishop then carried from Toledo, especial mention is made of a holy ark ful, of many and most remarkable relics, which through divers chances and dangers, had been brought from Jerusalem to Toledo, and of which all that is fitting shall be related in its place, if it please God that this history should proceed. It is also expressly said, that the cope which Our Lady gave to St. Ildefouso, was then carried to the Asturias with the other relics; and heing so capital a relic, it was a worthy thing to write of it thus particularly. Of the sacred books which were saved at that time, there are specified tha Holy Scriptures, the Councils, the works of St. Isidore, and St. Ildefouso, and of St. Julian the archhishnp of Toledo. And es there is at this day in the church of Oviedo that holy ark, together with many others of the relics which were then removed, so do I verily believe that there are in the library of that church three or four books of those which were then brought from Toledo. 1 am led to this belief by seeing that they are written in a form of Gothic letters, which being com pared with writings six hundred years old, are without doubt much older, and of characters so different, that they may well be attributed to the times of the Goths. One is the volume of the Councils, another is a Santoral, another contains the books of St. Isidore de Naturis Rerum, with other works of other nuthors. And there are also some leaves of a Bible, --To put these sacred relics in greater security, and avoid the danger of the Moors, they hid them in e cave, and in a sort of deep pit therein, two leagues from the city of Oviede, (which was not at that time built,) in a mountain, which was for this roason called Montesacro. It is now by a slight corruption called Monsagro; and the people of that country hold the cave in great veneration, and a great romery, or pilgrimage, is made on St. Magdalen's day. -- Morales, 1. 12, c. 71.

The place where the relics were deposited is curiously described in the Romantic Chronicle. He found that in this land of Asturias there was a sierra, full great, and high, the which had only two entrances, after this manner. On the one entrance, there was a great river, which was to be passed seven times, and in none of those seven places was it fordable at any time, except in the month of July. And after the river hed been crost seven times, there was an ascent of a long league up a high mountain, which is full of many great trees and great thickets, wherein are many wild beasts, such as bears and boars and wolves, and there is a pass there between two rocks, which ten men might defend against the whole world, and this is the one entrance. The other is, that you must ascend this great mountain, by a path of two full leagues in length, on the one side having always the river, and the way so narrow, that one man must go before another, and one man can defend the path in such manner, that no arbalist, nor engine of other kind, nor any other thing, can hurt him, not if the whole world were to come against him. And if any one were to stumble upon this path, he would fall more than two thousand fathoms, down over rocks into the river, which lies at such a depth that the water appears blacker than pitch. And upon that mountain there is a good spring, and a plain where there are good meadows, and room enough to raise grain for eight or ten persons for a year ; and the snow is always there for company, enduring from one year to suother. And upon that mountain the archhishop made two churches, one to the honour of St. Mary Magdalen, and the other to the honour of St. Michael, and there he placed all these reliques, where he had no fear that any should take them; and for the hunour of these relics, the archhishop consecrated the whole mountain, and appointed good guard over the sacred relics, and left there three men of good life, who were willing to remain there, serving God, and doing penance for their sins." - P. 2, c. 48. Of the Camara Santa, Morales has given a curious account in his Journal: the substance, with other remarkable circumstances, he afterwards thus inserted, in his great history :--

" The other church (or chapel) which King Alonso el Casto ordered to be built on the south side of the Iglesia Mayor, (or cathedral,) was with the advocation of the Glorious Archangel St. Michael. And in order that he might elevate it. he placed under it another church of the Virgin and Martyr St. Leocadia, somewhat low, and vaulted with a strong arch, to support the great weight which was to be laid upon it. The king's motive for thus elevating this church of St. Michael, I believe certainly to have been because of the great humidity of that land. He had determined to place in this church the famous relics of which we shall presently speak, and the humidity of the region is so great, that even in summer the furniture of the houses on high ground is covered with mold. This religious prince therefore elevated the church with becoming foresight for reverence and better preservation of the precious treasure which was therein to be deposited. For this reason they call it Camara, (the chamber,) and for the many and great relics which it con tains, it has most deservedly the appellation of Holy. ascend to it hy a flight of twenty-two steps, which begin in the cross of the Iglesia Mayor, (or cathedral,) and lead to a vaulted apartment twenty feet square, where there is an altar upon which mass is said ; for within there is no altar, neither is mass said there by reason of the reverence shewn to so great a sanctuary ; and it may be seen that K. D. Alonse intended in his plan that there should be no altar within. In this apartment or outer chapel is a great arched door, with a very strong fastening; it leads to another smaller square chamber, vaulted also, with a square door, which also is fastened with another strong fastening, and these are the fastenings and keys which the Bishop Sampyro admires for their strength and security.

"The square door is the door of the Holy Chamber, which is in the form of a complete church, and you descend to it by twelve steps. The body of this church is twenty-four fect in length, and sixteen in width. Its arched mof is of the same dimensions. The roof is most richly wrought, and supported upon six columns of divers kinds of marhle, all precious and right beautiful, upon which the twelve apostles are sculptured, two and two. The ground is laid with Mosaic work, with variety of columns, representing jusper ware. The Bishop Sampyro had good reason to complain of the darkness of this church, which has only one small window in the upper part of the chapel; and, therefore, in this which we call the body of the church, there are commonly three silver lamps burning, the one in the middle larger than the other two, and many other lights are kindled when the relics are shewn. These are kept within a grating, which divides the chapel from the church. The chapel has two rich marbles at the entrance ; it is eighteen feet in length, and its width somewhat less; the floor and the roof are after the same fashion as those of the church, but it is one estade lower, which in those times seems to have been customary in Asturias and in Gallicia, the Capillas Mayores, or principal chapels, heing much lower than the body of the church. The roof of the chapel is plain, and has painted in the middle our Saviour in the midst of the four evangelists; and this performance is so ancient, that it is manifestly of the age of the founder. At this iron grating strangers are usually detained; there is a lower one within of wood, to which persons are admitted who deserve this privilege for their dignity; and few there he who enter farther. This church the king built to remove to it, as accordingly he forthwith removed, the Holy Ark, the holy bodies, and the other great relics, which, at the destruction of Spain, were hidden in the cave and well of Monsagro, and for this cause he had it built with so much care, and so richly, and with such security ...

"I have described the Camara Santa thus particularly, that what I may say of the most precious relics which it contains may be the better enjoyed. I will particularize the most principal of them, beginning with the Holy Ark, which with great reason has deserved this name. It is in the midst of the chapel, close to the wooden grate, so that you can only go round it on three sides, and it is placed upon a stone pedestal, wrought with mouldings of a palm in height. It is a vara and a half (about five feet) in length; little less than a vara wide, and about as deep, that part which is of silver, not including the height which the pedestal gives it. The cover is flat, and it is covered in all parts with silver plates of some thickness, and gilt on some places. In the front, or that side which fronts the body of the church, it has the twelve apostles in more than half relief, and on the sides there are histories of Our Lady in the same silver-work. On the flat part of the cover there is a large crucifix engraved with many other images round about it. The sides are claborately wrought with foliage, and the whole displays great antiquity. The cover has round about it four lines in the silver, which, however, are imperfect, the silver being wanting in some places. What they contain is this, as I have copied it faithfully, with its bad Latin and other faults : ---

" This inscription, with its bad Latin and other defects, and by reason of the parts that are lost, can ill be translated. Nevertheless I shall render it, in order that it may be enjoyed by all. It says thus : Know all the congregation of Catholic people, worthy of God, whose the famous relies are, which they venerate within the most precious sides of this ark. Know then that herein is great part of the wood or cross of our Lord. Of his garment for which they cast lots. Of the blessed bread whereof he ate at the supper. Of his lineu, of the holy handkerchief, (the Sudario,) and of his most holy blood. Of the holy ground which he then trod with his holy feet. Of the garments of his mother the Virgin Mary, and also of her milk, which is a great wonder. With these also there are many capital relics of saints, whose names we shall write here as we can. Saint Peter, St. Thomas, St. Bartholomew. Bunes of the prophets, and of all the Apostles, and of many other saints whose names are known only to the wisdom of God. The noble King Don Alonso, heing full of humble devotion for all these holy relics, made this repository, adorned and ennobled with pledges of the saints, and on the outside covered with silver, and gilded with no little cunning. For the which may he deserve after this life the company of these Saints in heaven, heing aided by their intercession. - These holy relics were placed here by the care and by the hands of many clergy and prelates, who were here assembled with the said King D. Alonso, and with his chosen sister called Donna Urraca. Tu whom may the Redeemer of all grant remission and pardon of their sins, for the reverence and rich reliquary which they made for the said relics of the Apostles, and for those of the Saints, St. Justus and Pastor, St. Cosme and St. Damian, St. Eulalia the Virgin, and of the Saints Maximus, Germaous, Baudilus, Pantaleon, Cyprianus and Justina, Sebastian, Facundus and Primitivus, Christopher, Cucufatus, Felix and Sulpicius. -

"The sum of the manner in which this Holy Ark came into Spain is this, conformably to what is written by all our grave authors. When Cosroes the King of Persia, in the time of the Emperor Heraclius, came upon the Holy Land, and took the city of Jerusslem, the bishop of that city, who was called Philip, and his clergy, with pious forethought, secreted the Holy Ark, which from the time of the Apostles had been kept there, and its stores augmented with new relies, which were deposited therein. After the victory of Cosroes, the Bishop Philip, with many of his clergy, passed into Africa, carrying with them the Holy Ark : and there it remained some years, till the Saracens entered into that province also, end then Fulgentius the Bishop of Ruspina, with providence like that which had made Philip bring it to Africa, removed it into Spain. Thus it came to the Holy Church of Toledo, and was from thence removed to Asturias, and hidden in the cave of Monsegro : finally, King D. Alonso el Casto removed it to the Camnra Santa; and afterwards K. D. Alonso the Great enriched it. Thus our histories write, and the same is read in the lessons on the festival which the church of Oviedo celebrates of the coming there of this Holy Ark, with a sermon proper for the day, and much solemnity, the service being said on the 13th of March, after vespers, above in the church of the Camara Santa. This is a most weighty testimony which the Huly Ark possesses of its own authenticity, and of the genuincness of the most great treasure which it contains. - These also are strong testimonies, that K. D. Alonso the Great should not only have made the Ark so rich, but that this king should also have fortified the city of Oviedo, surrounding it with walls, and making for it a castle, and building also the castle of Gauzon upon the shore, for tha defence and security of this hely treasure, and for another end,) decorations of silver round about ; in the hollow of this senare. as he left written upon the stone of which we have elsewhere spoken. Another testimony of great outbority, is the great revereece which has been shewn to this Holy Ark, from the time which is spoken of by Alonso the Great in the inscription, to these our days. This is so great that no one has dared to open it, melancholy examples being related of some daring attempts which have been made. That which occurred in our days is not mournful, but rather of much devotion and holy jey. The most illustrious Señor D. Christoval de Rojas y Sandoval, who is now the most worthy Archhishop of Seville, when he was Bishop of Ovieds, determined to open the holy Ark. For this, as the singular devotion and most holy zeal for the glory of God which he has in all things, admonished him, he made such pious preparations as the fame of so celestial a treasure shewed to be necessary. He proclaimed solemply a fast of forty days in his church and through all his diocese, commanding that prayers should be made to our Lord, beseeching him that he would be pleased with what was inteoded, his Most-Illustriousness giving the example, which is very common and very edifying in his church, in himself, and in the ministers thereof. Three days before the Sunday on which the Ark was to be opened, he ordered all persons to fast. and to make greater prayers with processions. When the day arrived, he said pontifical mass, and preached, infusing with his holy exhortations much of his own devout desires into the hearts of the hearers. The mass being finished, clad as he was, he ascended to the Camara Santa, with much outward selemnity, and with much fervor of devotion internally in his heart; and having there again renewed his humble prayers to our Lord, and quickened the ardor of that sacred desire which had influenced him; on his knees as he was hefore the Holy Ark, he took the key to open it. At the moment when he stretched out his hand to put the key in the lock, suddenly he felt such horror and dismay, and found himself so hereft of all power (tan impossibilitado) to move it in any way, that it was impossible for him to proceed, or do any thing but remain in that holy consternation, without having strength or ability for more. And as if he had come there to oppose and prevent that which purposely, and with so much desire and preparation, he had intended to do, he desisted from his intent, and gave it up, his whole holy desire being turned into a chill of humble shrinking and fear. Among other things which his most Illustrions Lordship relates of what he then felt, he says, that his hair stood up in such a manner and with such force, that it seemed to him, as if it lifted the mitre a considerable wey from his head. Now, we all know that this famous prelata has vigor and persevering courage for all the great things which he undertakes in the service of our Lord; but in this manner the Holy Ark remained unopeoed then, and thus I believe it will always remain, fastened more surely with veneration and reverence, and with respect of these examples, than with the strong bolt of its lock.

" In the inscription of this Holy Ark, mention is made of the relics of St. Bandilus, and by reason that he is a Saint very little known, it will he proper to say something of him. This Saiot is much reverenced in Salamanca and in Zamora, and in both cities he has a parochial church, and in Zamora they have a good part of his relics. They have so much corrupted the name, calling him St. Boal, that the Saint is now scarcely known by his own.

"They of the church say, that the cope of St. Ildefonso, which Our Lady gave him, is in the Ark. This may well be believed, since our good authors particularly relate that it was carried to Oviedo with the Holy Ark, and with the other relics, and it does not now appear among them, and there is much more reason to think that it has been very carefully put away, than that it has been lost. Also they say, that when the celestial cope was put into the Holy Ark, they took out of it the piece of the holy Sudario, in which the head of our Redeenier was wrapped up for his interment, as is said in the inscription of the Ark. This is one of the most famous relics in all Christendom, and therefore it is most richly adorned, and reverently preserved, being shown only three times in the year with the greatest solemnity. The hox in which it is kept is wrought without of gold and azure, with beautiful mouldings and pictures, and other ornaments of much anthority. Within this there is a square piece of wood, covered entirely with black velvet, with silver handles, and other the holy Sudario is stretched and fastened upon the velvet; it is a thin linen cloth, three quarters long and half a vara wide, and in many places full of the divine blood from the head of our Redeemer, in divers forms and stains of various sizes; wherein some persons observe marks of the divine countenance and other particularities. I did not perceive this; but the feeling which came upon me when I looked at it is sufficient to make me believe any thing of it; and if a wretch like me was thus affected, what must it be with those who deserve of our Lord greater regalements on such an occasion ! It is exhibited to the people three times in the year ; on Good Friday, and on the two festivals of the Cross in May and in September, and there is then a great concourse from all the country, and from distant parts. This part of the cross of the church where the Camara Santa is, is richly hung, and in the first apartment of the Camara, a corridor is erected for this exhibition, which is closed that day with curtains of black valvet, and a canopy that extends over the varandas. The Bishop in his pontificals, with his assistants and other grave persons, places himself behind the curtains with the Holy Sudario, holding it by the silver handles, covered with a veil. The curtains are undrawn, and the quiristers below immediately hegin the Misercre. The Bishop lifts the veil. and at the sight of the Holy Sudario, another music begins of the voices of the people, deeply affected with devotion, which verily penetrates all hearts. The Bishop stands some time, turning the Sacred Relic to all sides, and afterwards the veil being replaced, and the curtains redrawn, he replaces the Holy Sudario in its box. With all these solemnities, the very Illustrious and most Reverend Seãor, M. D. Gonzalo de Solorzano, Bishop of Oviedo, exhibited this Holy Relic on the day of Santiago, in the year of our Redeemer 1572, in order that I might bear a more complete relation of the whole to the King our Lord, I having at that time undertaken this sacred journey by his command.

"Another chest, with a covering of crimson and brocade, contains a good quantity of hones, and some pieces of a head ; which, although they are very damp, have a most sweet odor, and this all we who were present perceived, when they wera shown me, and we spoke of it as of a notable and marvellous thing. The account which they of the church give of this holy body is, that it is that of St. Serrano, without knowing any thing more of it. I, considering the great dampuess of the sacred bones, helieve certainly that it was brought up to the Camara Santa from the church of Leocadia, which, as it has been seen, is underneath it. And there, in the altar, the great stone-chest is empty, in which King Alonso el Casto enclosed many relies, as the Bishop Sampyro writes. For myself I have always held for certain, that the body of St. Leocadia is that which is in this rich chest. And in this opinion I am the more confirmed since the year 1580, when such exquisite diligence has been used by our Spaniards in the monastery of St. Gisleno, near Mons da Henao in Flanders, to verify whether the body of St. Leocadia, which they have there, is that of our Saint. The result has been, that it was ascertained beyond all doubt to be the same; since an authentic writing was found of the person who carried it thither by favor of one of our earliest kings, and he carried it from Oviedo without dispute ; because, according to my researches, it is certain that it was there. Now I affirm, that the king who gave part left part also; and neither is that which is there so much, that what we saw at Oviedo might not well have been left, neither is this so much but that which is at Mons might well have been given.

" In the church below, in a hollow made for this purpose, with grates, and a gate well ornamented, is one of the vessels which our Redeemer Jesus Christ filled with miraculoos wine at the marriage in Galilee. It is of white marhle, of an ancient fashion, more than three feet high, and two wide at the mouth, and contains more than six arrobas. And forasmuch as it is in the wall of the church of K. Alonso el Casto, and all the work about it is very ancient, it may be believed that the said king ordered it to be placed there." - Coronica General de Espana, l. 13, b. 40.

Morales gives an outline of this vessel in his Journal, and observes, that if the Christians transported it by land, partieular strength and the aid of God would have been necessary to carry it so many leagnes, and move it over the ruggad water from Andalusia or Portugal, and in that case this would have been a land journey of only four or five leagues. In his Journal, Morales mentions certain other relics of which the church of Oviedo boasted, but for which he required better evidence than could be adduced for them. Such were a portion of Tobit's fish, and of Samson's honey-comb, with other such things, which, he says, would lessen the credit of tha Ark, where, according to the Bishop of Oviedo, D. Pelayo, und Sebastian, Bishop of Salamanea, they were deposited. Of these precious relics he says nothing in his history, oeither does he mention a piece of Moses's rod, a large piece of St. Barthelomew's skin, and the sole of St. Peter's shoe, all which he enumerates in his Journal, implying rather than expressing his doubts of their authenticity. As a scrupulous and faithful entiquary, Morales was accustomed to require evidence, and to investigate it; and for these he could find no other testimony than tradition and antiquity, which, as presumptive proofs, were strong corroborants of faith, but did not suffice of themselves. The Holy Ark has all the evidence which he required, and the reverence with which he regarded it, is curiously expressed in his Journal. " I have now," he says, "described the material part of the Camara Santa. The spiritual and devout character which it derives from the sacred treasures which it contains, and the feeling which is experienced upon entering it, cannot be described without giving infinite thanks to our Lord, that he has been pleased to suffer a wretch like me to enjoy it. I write this in the church before the grating, and God knows I am as it were beside myself with fear and reverence, and I can only beseech God to give me strength to proceed with that for which I have no power myself."-T. 10, Flage, p. 91.

Morales, like Origen, had given in his youth a decisive proof of the sincerity of his religious feelings, and it sometimes seems as if he had emacoulated his mind as well as his body. But with all this abject superstition, he was a thoroughly pious and good man. His life is deeply interesting, and his writings, besides their great historical and antiquarian value, derive additional interest from the picture of the author's mind which they so frequently display. The portrait prefixed to the last edition of his work is singularly characteristic.

his knife, and exclaiming Bismillah, in the name of God, cuts the throat of the game.— Jackson's Morocco, p. 121.

A white flag, called El Alem, the signal, is hoisted every day at twelve o'clock, to warn the people ont of hearing, or at a great distance, to prepare, by the necessary preliminary ahlutions, to prostrate themselves before God at the service of prayer. — Jackson's Marocco, p. 149.

Life hath not left his body. - XXIII. p. 701, col. 1.

Among the Prerogatives et Propriétés singulières du Prophète, Gagnier states that, "Il est vivant dans son Tombeau. Il fait la prière dans ce Tombeau à chaque fois que le Cricur en fait la proclamation, et au même tems qu'on la recite. Il y a un Ange posté sur son Tombeau qui a le soin ile lui donner avis des Prières que les Fidèles font pour lui." — Vie de Mahomet, l. "i, c. 18.

The common notion, that the impostor's tomb is snspended by means of a loadstone, is well known. Labat, in his Afrique Occidentale, (T. ii. p. 143,) mentions the lie of a Marabout, who, on his return from a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, affirmed, "que le tombeau de Mahomet etoit porté en l'air par le moyen de certains Anges qui se relayent d'heure en heures pour souteuir ce fardran." These fahles, however, are modest in comparison with those which the Franciscans and Dominicans havo invented to magnify their founders. Hast thou not heard How, when our clay is leaven'd first with life, The ministering Angel brings it from that spot Whereon 'tis written in the eternal book That soul and body must their parting take, And earth to earth return ? — XXIII. p. 701, col. 2.

The Persians, in their creed, have a pleasant imagination concerning the death of men. They say that every one must come and die in the place where the Angel took the earth of which he hath been made, thinking that one of these spirithas the care of forming the human creature, which he doth by mingling a little earth with the seed. — Therenot.

They perish, all their thousands perish there. XXIII. p. 702, col. 1.

The battle of Covadonga is one of the great miracles of Spanish history. It was asserted for many centuries, without contradiction, and is still believed by the people, that when the Moors attacked Pelayo in the cave, their weapons were turned back upon themselves; that the Virgin Mary appeared in the clouds, and that part of a mountain fell upon the Infdels, and crushed those who were flying from the destruction. In what manner that destruction might have been effected, was exemplified upon a smaller scale in the Tyrol, in the memorable war of 1809.

Barret sums np the story briefly, and in the true strain of Mine Ancient.

The Sarr'cen, hearing that th' Astnrianites Had King created, and stood on their guard, Sends multitudes of Mohametized knights To ronse them out their rocks, and force their ward. Pelagins, hearing of this enterprise, Prepares his petty power on Auseve mount; Alchameh comes with Zarzen multiplies, Meaning Pelagins' forces to dismount. To blows they come; but lo ! a stroke divine. The Iber, few, beats numbrous Sarracene, Two myriads with Mahomet went to dine In Parca's park.

The Bread of Life. - XXIV. p. 704, col. 1.

It is now admitted by the best informed of the Romish writers themselves, that, for a thousand years, no other but common or leavened bread was used in the Eucharist. Tha wafer was introduced about the eleventh century. And as far down as the twelfth century, the people were admitted to communicate in both kinds.

According to the Comendador Fernan Nunez, in his Commentary upon the Trezientas, the tomb of Count Julian was shown in his days about four leagues from Huesca, at a castle called Loarri, on the outside of a church, which was in the castle.

His wonted leathern gipion. - XXV. p. 706, col. 1.

The Musical Pilgrim in Purchas thus describes the Leonese:-

Wymmen in that land nse no vnlleo, But alle in lether be the wonnden: And her hevedez wonderly ben trust, Standing in her forheved as a crest, In ronld clonthez lappet alle be forn Like to the prikke of a N'nnicorn. And men have donbelettez full schert, Bare legget and light to stert. — P. 1331

Purchas supposes this very curious poem to have been written about 200 years before he published it, i. e. about 1425

It is probably much older. In entering Castille from Elvas, the author says,

Now into Castell schall we fare Over the river, the land is bare Full of heath and hunger also, And Sarasynez Governonriz thereto.

Now Badajoz, and that part of the country, was finally recovered from the Moors in the early part of the thirteenth century. Purchas perhaps judged from the age of the manuscript, which may have been written about the time on which he fixes, and the language modernized by the transcriber.

A more extraordinary example of the divine favor townrds Spain is triumphantly brought forward by Francisco de Pisa. "Our Lord God," says he, "has been pleased to preserve these kingdoms in the purity of the Fuith, like a terrestrial Paradise, by means of the Cherubim of the Holy Office, which, with its sword of fire, has defended the entrance, through the merits and patronage of the most serene Virgin Mary the Mother of God." This passage is truly and lamentably characteristic.

The Oaken Cross. - XXV. p. 707, col. 1.

The oaken cross which Pelayo bere in battle is said to have been preserved at Oviedo, in the Camara Santa, in company with that which the angels made for Alfonso the Great, concerning which Morales delivers a careful opinion, how much of it was made by the angels, and how much has been human workmanship. The people of Cangas, not willing that Pelayo's cross should be in any thing inferior to his successor's, insist that it fell from Heaven. Morales, however, says, it is more certain that the king had it made to go out with it to battle at Covadonga. It was covered with gold and enamel in the year 908; when Morales wrote, it was in fine preservation, and doubtless so continued till the present generation. Upon the top branch of the cross there was this inscription : Susceptum placide maneat hoc in honore Dei, quod offerunt famuli Christi Adefonsus Princeps et Scemena Regina. On the right arm, Quisquis auferre hac donaria nostra presumpserit, fulmine divino intereat ipse. On the left, Hoc opus perfectum est, concessum est Sancto Salvatori Ovetensis Sedis. Hoc signo tuctur pius, hoc signo vincitur inimicus. On the foot, Et operatum est in Castello Gauzon anno Regni nostri XVII discurrente Era DCCCCXLVI.

"There is no other testimony," says Morales, " that this is the cross of King Don Pelayo, than tradition handed down from one age to another. I wish the king had stated that it was so in his inscription, and I even think he would not have been silent upon this point, unless he had wished to imitate Alonso el Casto, who, in like manner, says nothing concerning the Angels upon his cross." This passage is very characteristic of good old Ambrosio. Like a mirror sparkling to the sun. - XXV. p. 709, col. 1.

I have nowhere seen a more curious description of a battle between Christians and Saracens than in Barret's manuscript;

And whilst the Saracen with furious rush The Syrian shocks, the Syrian as round Down shouldreth Saracen: whilst Babel blade Sends soul Byzantine to the starred cell, Byzantine pike with like-employed trade, Packs Babel's spirit posting down to hell.

The Enharawans, or Arabs of the Desert, rejoice to see the clouds of locusts proceeding towards the north, anticipating therefrom a general mortality, which they call elkhere, the good, or the benediction; for, after depopulating the rich plains of Barbary, it affords to them an opportunity of emanating from their arid recesses; in the desert, to pitch their tents in the desolated plains, or along the banks of some river. — Jackson's Morocco, p. 106.

The account which the Romantic Chronicle gives of Roderick after his disappearance, is in so singular a strain of fiction, that I have been tempted to translate it. It strikingly exemplifies the doctrine of penance, of which monastic history supplies many instances almost as extraordinary as this fable Chap. 238. - How the King Don Rodrigo left the battle and arrived at a hermitage, and of that which befell him.

" Now when the King Don Rodrigo had escaped from the battle, he began to go as fast as he could upon his horse along the banks of the Guadalete, and night came on, and the horse began to fail by reason of the many wounds which he had received ; and as he went thus by the river side deploring the great ruin which had come upon him, he knew not where he was, and the horse got into a quagmine, and when he was in he could not get out. And when the king saw this he alighted, and stript off all his rich arms and the furniture thereof, and took off his crown from his head, and threw them all into the quagmire, saying, Of earth was I made, and even so are all my deeds like unto mud and mire. Therefore my pomp and vanity shall he buried in this mud till it has all returned again to earth, as I myself must do. And the vile end which I have deserved will beseem me well, seeing that I have been the principal cause of this great cruelty. And as he thus stript off all his rich apparel, he cast the shoes from his feet. and went his way, and wandered on towards Portuga.; and he travelled so far that night and the day following, that he came to a hermitage near the sea, where there was a good man (who had dwelt there serving God for full forty years ; and now he was of great age, for he was well nigh a hundred years old. And he entered into the hermitage, and found a crucifix therein, heing the image of our Lord Jesus Christ, even as he was crucified, and for the remembrance of Him, he beat both his knees to the ground, and claspt his hands, weeping and confessing his sins before God, for he weened not that any man in the world saw or heard him. And he said thus, O very Loul who by thy word hast made all the world from nothing which it was, and hast created all things, those which are visible to men, and those which are invisible, the heavenly as well as the earthly, and who didst incarnate thyself that thou mightst undergo the passion and death, to save those who firmly put their trust a thee, giving up thy holy ghost from thy glorified body upon the tree of the true cross, - and who didst descend into Hell, and deliveredst thy friends from thence, and didst regale them with the glory of Heaven : And afterwards thy holy spirit came again into that most holy hody, which thou wast pleased to take upon thee in this world ; and, manifesting thyself for the true God which thou wert, thou didst deign to abide in this dark world forty days with their nights, and then thou didst ascend into thy heavealy glory, and didst enlighten with the grace of the Holy Ghost thy beloved disciples. I beseech thee, O Lord, that thou wouldst enlighten me, a king in tribulation, wretched and full of many sins, and deserving all evils; let not the soul which is thine, and which cost thee so dear, receive the evil and the desert of this abominable flesh; and may it please thee, O Lord, after the downfall, destruction, perdition, and desolution, which 1, a miserable king, have suffered in this world, that my discoasolate soul may not be forgottee by thee, and that all this misery may be in satisfaction for my errors. And I earnestly beseech thee, O Lord, that thy grace may breathe upon me, that in this world I may make satisfaction for my sins, so that at the Great Day of Judgment I may not be condemned to the torments of hell.

"Having said these words, weeping as though he would hurst, he remained there a long hour. And when the Hermit heard him say all this, he was greatly astonished, and he went unto him. And when the King saw him he was little pleased; howheit after he had talked with him, he would rather have found him there than have been restored again to the great honor which he had lost; for the Hermit comforted him in such wise in this his tribulation, that he was right well contented; and he confessed unto him, and told him all that concerned him. And the Hermit said to him, King, thou shalt remain in this hermitage, which is a remote place, and where thou mayst lead thy life as long as it shall please God. And for me, on the third day from hence, I shall pass away out of this world; and then shalt bury me, and thou shalt take my garments, and fulfil the time of a year in this hermitage. Take no thought as to provision for thy support, for every Friday thou shalt have it after the same manner as I, and thou shalt so husband it, that it may suffice thee for the whole week ; That flesh which hath been fostered in great delight shall suffer abstineace, lest it should grow proud ; and then shalt endure hunger and cold and thirst in the love of our Lord, that he may have compassion upon thee. Thy station till the hour of sleep must always be upon that rock, where there is an oratory facing the east ; and thou shalt continue the service of God in such manner as God will direct thee to do. And take heed that thy soul fall not into temptation. And since thou hast spoken this day of penitence, to-morrow thou shalt communicate and receive the true hody of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will be thy protection and support against the enemy and the persecutor. And put thou thy firm trust in the sign of the Cross; and thus shalt thou please thy Savior.

" Many other things the holy Hermit said, which made the King right joyful to hear them; and there they continued till it was the hour for sleep. And the holy Hermit showed him his hed, and said, When I shall have left the company, thou will follow the ways which I have followed, for which our Lord will have mercy upon thee, and will extend his hand over thee, that theu mayst persevere in good, and in his holy service. And then they laid down and slept till it was the hour of matins, when they should both arise. And the Hermit awake him, for as the King had not slept for a long time.

and was moreover full weary, he would not have awaked so soon, if the Hermit had not roused him; and they said their hours. And when it was time, the Hermit said mass, and the King heard it with great devotion, and communicated with great contrition, and remained in prayer for the space of two hours. And the hour for taking food came, and the Hermit took a loaf which was made of pannick and of rye, and gave half thereof to the King, and took for himself the other half: And they ate little of it, as men who could not eat more, the one by reason of age, and the other because he was not used to such farc. And thus they continued till the third day, when the holy Hermit departed this life.

Ch. 239. — How the Hermit died, and the King found a writing in his hand.

"On the third day, the pious Hermit expired at the same hour which he had said to the King, whereat the King was full sorrowful, as one who took great consolution in the lessons which he gave. And when he had thus deceased, the King by himself, with his hands, and with an oaken stick which was there, made his grave. And when he was about to bury him, he found a writing in his hand; and he took it and opened it, and found that it contained these words.

Ch. 240. - Of the rule of life which the Hermit left written for King Don Rodrigo.

" O King, who through thy sins hast lost the great honor in which thou wert placed, take heed that thy soul also come not into the same judgment which both fallen upon thy flesh. And receive into thy heart the instructions that I shall give thee now, and see that thou swerve not from them, nor abatest them a jot; for if thon observest them not, or departest in ought from them, thon wilt bring damnation upon thy soul; for all that thou shalt find in this writing is given thee for penance, and thou must learn with great contrition of repentance, and with humbleness of patience, to be content with that which God hath given thee to suffer in this world. And that then mayst not he deceived in case any company should come unto thee, mark and observe this and pass in it thy life. Thou shalt arise two hours after midnight, and say thy matins within the hermitage. When the day breaks thou shalt go to the oratory, and kneeling upon the ground, say the whole hours by the breviary, and when thou hast finished them thou shalt say certain prayers of our Lord, which thou wilt find therein. And when thou hast done this, contemplate then upon the great power of our Lord, and upon his mercy, and also upon the most holy passion which he suffered for mankind upon the cross, being himself very God, and maker of all things ; and how with great humility he chose to be incarnate in a poor virgin, and not to come as a king, but as a mediator among the nations. And contemplate also upon the poor life which he always led in this world, to give us an example ; and that he will come at the day of judgment to judge the quick and the dead, and give to every one the meed which he hath deserved. Then shalt thou give sustenance to thy flesh of that bread of pannick and rye, which shall be brought to thee every Friday in the manner that I have said; and of other food thou shalt not eat, although it should be given or sent thee; neither shalt thon change thy bread. And when thou hast eaten give thanks to God, because he has let thee come to repentance ; and then thou shalt go to the oratory, and there give praise to the Virgin our Lady holy Mary, mother of God, in such manner as shall come to thee in devotion. If, when thou hast finished, heaviness should come upon thee, thou mayst sleep, and when thou shalt have rested us long as is reasonable, return those to thy orstory, and there remain, making thy prayers always upon thy knees, and for nothing which may befall thee depart thou from thence, till thou hast made an end of thy proyers, whether it rain or snow, or if a tempest should blow. And for as much as the flesh could austain so many nundane pleasures, so must it suffer also celestial abstinences; two mosses thou hast heard in this hermitage, and in it, it is God's will that thou shalt hear no more, for more would not be to his service. And if those observest these things, God will have compassion upon thy deserts. And when the King had read this, he haid it upor the altar, in a place where it would be well preserved.

Ch. 241, — How the Devil came in the form of a Hermit to deceive the King Don Rodrigo.

"Now when the King had made a grave in which to bury the Hermit, the Devil was troubled at the good course which the King had taken, and he cast about for means how he might deceive him; and he found none so certain as to come to him is the figure of a hermit, and keep company with him, to turn him aside from those doctrines which the Hermit had given him, that ha might not fulfil his penitonce. And the King being in great haste to bury the body, the Devil came to him with a long white beard, and a great hood over the eyes, and some paternosters hanging from his girdle, and supporting himself upon a staff as though he were lame, and could not go. And when he came where the King was, he humbled himself, and said unto him, Peace he with thee ! And the King turned toward that side from which he came, and when he saw him of so great age, he thought that it was some holy man who knew of the death of the Hermit, and was come to bury him; and he humbled himself, and went towards him to kiss his hand, and the Devil would not, saying, It is not fitting that a King should kiss the hand of a poor servant of God. And the King was astonished at hearing himself named, and believed that this must needs be a man of holy life, and that he spake by some revelation ; nevertheless, he said, I am not a king, but a miserable sinner, for whom it had been better never to have been born, than that so much evil should have happened through me. And the false Hermit said to him, Think not that thou hast so much fault as thou imaginest in what has now been done, for even if thou hadst had no part in it, this destruction would have fallen at this time. And since it was ordained that it should be so, the fault is not thine ; some fault thou hadst, but it was very little. And think not that I speak this of myself; for my words are those of a spirit made and created by the will of God, who speaks through me this and many other things, which hereafter thou shalt know, that then mayst see how God has given me power that I should know all thy concerns, and counsel thee in what manner thou shouldst live. And albeit I have more need of rest than of labor, by reason of my age, which is far greater than my countenance shows, yet I have disposed myself to laber for the love of thee, to console thee in this thy persecution, knowing that this good man was about to die. Of a trath you may believe that on this day month I was in Rome, being there in the church of St. John de Lateran, out of which I had never gone for thirty years, till I came now to keep then company according as I am commanded. Marvel not that a man of so great age, and crippled as I am, should have been able to traverse so much land in so short time, for certes I tell thee that he who speaks in this form which thou seest, has given me strength to go through so great a journey; and sans doubt I feel myself as strong now as on the day when I set forth. And the King said to him, Friend of God, I rejoice much in thy coming, for that in my misfortunes I shall be by thee consoled and instructed in that which must be done to fulfil my penitence ; I rejoice also that this holy Hermit here shall receive burial from the hands of a man much more rightcous than I. And the false Hermit said, Think not, King, that it is for the service of God to give to any person a name not appertaining to him. And this I say because I well know the life of this person, what it was; and as thou knowest nothing of celestials, thou thinkest that as the tosgue speaketh, even such is the heart. But I tell thee the habit doth not make the monk, and it is from such persons as these that the saying arose which is common in the world, I would have justice, but not for my own house. This I say to thee, hecause he commanded thee to perform a penance such as never man did, the which is, that they shouldst eat only once a day, and that of such bread that even the shepherds' dogs would not eat it; and of this that thou shouldst not eat as much as thou couldst; and appointed thee the term of a year that thou shouldst continue in this diet. Also he commanded thee that thou shouldst not hear mass during the time that thou abidest here, for that the two masses which thou hast heard should suffice ; look now if that doctrine he good, which bids a man forget the holy sacrament ! Certes I tell thee that only for that which he commanded thee to observe, his soul is consigned to a place where I would not that thine should go for all the world, if it were in my power, with all its riches.

Nevertheless, to be rid of the ill smell which he would give, it is fit that you should bury him, and while you do this I will go for food. And the King said, Friend of God, do not take this trouble, but remain still, and before noon there will come food, which will suffice for you and for me; help me now to give burial to this good man, which will be much for the service of God, although he may have been a sinner. And the false Hermit answered, King, it would he less evil to roll him over these rocks into the sea ; but if not, let him lie thus upon the earth till the birds and the beasts devour his flesh. And the King marvelled at this: nevertheless though he believen that this false Hermit was a servant of God, he left not for that to bury the good Hermit who there lay without life, and he began by himself to carry him to the grave which he had made. And as he was employed in burying him, he saw that the false Hermit went away over the mountaios at a great rate, not as one who was a cripple, but like a stout man and a young; and he marvelled what this might mean.

Ch. 242. — How King Don Rodrigo informed himself concerning the penance which he was to perform, from the writing which the holy Hermit left him.

"When the King had finished burying the good servant of God, he went to the altar, and took the writing in his hand, and read it to inform himself well of it. And when he had read it, he saw that of a certainty all that was said therein was for the service of God, and was of good doctrine for his soul; and he said, that, according to the greatness of his sins, it heloved that his penitence must be severe, if he wished to save his sonl. And then he called to mind the life which St. Mary Magdalen endured, for which God had mercy on her. And forthwith he went to his oratory, and began his prayers; and he remained there till it was near moon; and he knew that he had nothing to eat, and awaited till it should be brought him.

Ch. 243. — How the Devil brought meat to King Don Rodrigo that he should eat it; and he would only eat of the Hermit's bread.

"After it was mid-day the false Hermit came with a basket spon his shoulders, and went straight to where the King was, and he came sweating and weary. And the King had compassion on him, howbeit he said nothing, neither did he leave his prayers. And the false Hermit said to him, King, make an end of thy prayers, for it is time to eat; and here I bring fond. And the King lifted up his eyes and looked toward him, and he saw that there came into the hermitage a shepherd with a wallet upon his back, and he thought this must be he who brought him that which he was to eat. And so is truth it was, that that shepherd brought every Friday four loaves of pannick and rye for the holy Hermit, upon which he lived during the week. And as this shepherd knew not that the good man was dead, he did no more than put his bread upon the altar, and go his way. And the King, when he had ceased praying, rose up from the oratory, and went to the false Ilermit. And he found the four loaves, and he took one, and brake it in the middle, and laid by the rest carefully, and he went out of the hermitage into the portal, where there was a table full small, and he luid a cloth upon it, and the bread which he was to eat, and the water ; and he began to bless the table, and then seated himself. And the false Hermit noted well how he blest the table, and arose from where he was, and went to the King, and said, King, take of this poor fare which I have brought, and which has been given me ip alms. And he took out two loaves which were full whith, and a roasted partridge, and a fowl, of which the legs were wanting; and he placed it upon the table. And when the King saw it, his eyes were filled with tears, for he could not but call to mind his great honor in former times, and how it was now fallen, and that his table had never before been served like this. And he said, addressing himself to the Lord, Praised be thy name, those who canst make the high low, and the low nothing. And he turned to his bread, and did eat thereof. And though he had great hunger, yet could he scarcely eat thereof, for he had never used it till in that hermitage, and now it seemed worsa by reason of the white bread which that false Hermit had brought. And the false

Hermit, who saw that he gave no regard neither to the bread, nor the meat which he had brought, said to the King, Why catest thou not of this which God has sent thee? and the King said, I came not to this hermitage to serve God, but to do penance for my sins, that my soul may not be lost. And the penance which is given me in this life, I must observe for a year, and not depart from it, lest it should prove to my great And the false Hermit said, llow, King, hath it been burt. given thee for penance, that thon shouldst let thyself die for desnair? The Gosnel commands not so; contrariwise it forhids man to do any such penance through which the body might be brought to death ; for if in killing another, he who causes the death is held for a murderer, much more is he who killeth kimself; and such thou wouldst be. And now through despair thou wouldst let thyself die of hunger, that thou mightst no longer live in this world, wherefore I say eat of this food that I have brought thee some little, that thou mayst not die. And with that he began to entright heartily. And the King, when he beheld him, was seized with affection to do the like, howbeit he was withheld, and would eat nothing thereof. And as it was time when he would drink of the water, the false Hermit said to him, that he should drink of the wine ; and the King would only taste of that water ; and as he went to take of it, the false Hermit struggled with him, but he could not prevail, and the King did according to his rule, and departed not from it. And when he had eaten, he began to give thanks to God. And the false Hermit, who saw that he would have to cross himself at arising from the table. rose up before him, as one who was about to do sumething : and the King heeded it not. And when he had thus eaten, he went to the oratory, and began to give praises to the Virgin Mary, according as the good man had commanded him, when that traitor went to him and said, Certes this doctrine which thou holdest is no way to serve God, for suns doubt when the stomach is heated with food the will shall have no power to pray as it ought ; and although the tongue may say the prayers, the heart confirms them not, being hindered by the force which nature derives from the food. Therefore I say to thee that thou oughtest to sleep first; for whilst thou art sleeping the food will settle, and the will will then be more able for contemplation. Moreover, God is not pleased with prayers without contrition, as with one who speaketh of one thing, and hath his heart placed on another, so that he can give no faith to the words which he beginneth. If thou wouldst be saved, O King, it behaves thee to listen to me; and if thou wilt not believe me, I will depart and leave thee, as one who will take no counsel, except from himself. And the King replied, If I should see that thou confirmedst the good manner of life whereof my soul bath need, according as it was appointed by the good man whom I have buried, then would I follow thy way. But I see that thy life is not that of a man of abstinence, nor of one who forsukes worldly enjoyments for the love of God; rather it seemeth by what I see in thee that thy life is a strengthening of worldly glory; for thou satisfiest thy flesh with good viunds as I was wont to do, when I was puffed up with the vanities of the world. Wherefore I will in no wise follow thy wny, for I see that thou art a worldly man, who deceivest God and the world, and when it comes to the end thou thyself wilt be deceived.

Ch. 244. — Of what the Devil said to King Don Rodrigo to dispart him from his penance.

" The false Hermit said to him, For what reason art thou certain that the rule which this deceiver whom thou hast ruried appointed for thee, will be salvation for thy soul, and .hat what I say to thee is not of a truth ? Thou understandest me not well: I never forbade thee that thou shouldst hear mass, as he has done; for this is one of the good things that man may every day see his Savior and adore him. And seeing that he forbade thee to do this, thou mayst be certain that as he deceived his own soul, he would deceive thine also. For at the hour when man passeth away out of the world, he would fain that that same hour should be the end of all the world; and thus that enemy did, for where he went, thither he would draw thee also. Now since God hath given thee sense and reason, thou mayst clearly understand that his counsel and doctrine are deceitful, and what thou oughtest to do.

Ch. 245. - Of the reply which the King made to the Dout.

"Sans doubt, said the King, he forbade me not that I should hear mass; but because he commanded me that I should fulfil my penance here for the term of a year, as he knew the hour of his own death, so ulso he knew that no other person who could say mass would come to this hermitage within the year; and, therefore, he said to me, that in this hermitage I should not hear mass, but he never forbade me from hearing it.

Ch. 246. — Of the reasoning which the false Hermit made to King Don Rodrigo.

" The false Hermit said, Now thou thyself manifestest that he was not so worthy as a man ought to be who knows that which is to come. For according to thy words, he knew not that I should come here, who can say mass if I please ; and if there he good judgment in thee, thou wilt understand that I must needs be nearer to God, because I know all which he had commanded thee to do, and also how he was to die. And I can know better in what place he is, than he who has commanded thee to observe this rule, knew concerning himself while he was here. But this I tell thee, that as I came to teach thee the way in which thou shouldst live, and thou wilt not follow my directions, I will return as I came. And now I marvel not at any thing which has befallen thee, for thou hast a right stubborn heart ; hard and painful wilt thou find the way of thy salvation, and in vain wilt then do all this, for it is a thing which profiteth nothing.

Ch. 247. — Of the reply which King Don Rodrigo made to the false Hermit.

"Good man, said the King, all that thou shalt command me to do beyond the rule which the holy Hermit appointed me, that will I do; that in which my penance may be more severe, willingly will I do it. But in other manner I will not take thy counsel; and as thou hast talked enough of this, leave me, therefore, to my prayers. And then the King bent his knees, and began to go on with his rule. And the false Hermit, when he saw this, departed, and returned not again for a month; and all that time the King maintained his pen, ance, in the mannet which had been appointed him. And by water, his flesh fell away, and he became such that there was not a man in the world who would have known him. Thus he remained in the hermitage, thinking of no other thing than.

Ch. 248. — Of what the fulse Hermit said to King Don Rodrigo to dispart him from his rule.

"King Don Rodrigo living thus, one day, between midnight and dawn, the false Hermit came to the hermitage; and not in the same figure as before, but appearing more youthful, so that he would not be known. And he called at the door, and the King looked who it might be, and saw that he was habited like a servant of God, and be opened the door forthwith. And they saluted each other. And when they saw each other, the false Hermit greeted the King, and demanded of him where the father was ; and the King answered, that for more than a month there had been no person dwelling there save himself. And the false Hermit, when he heard this, made semblance as if he were afflicted with exceeding grief, and said, How came this to be, for it is not yet six weeks since I came here and confessed my sins to the father who abode here, and then departed from this hermitage to my own, which is a league from hence ? And King Don Rodrigo said, Friend, know that this Hermit is now in Paradise, as I believe, and I buried him with my own hands; and he showed him the place where he lay. And when he went there he began to kiss the earth of the grave, and to make great dole and lamentation over him. And when some half hour had past, he withdrew, making semblance as if he wished to suy his hours. And before the King had finished to say his, he came to him, and said, Good man, will you say mass? And the King answered, that he never said it. Then, said the false Hermit, Hear me then in penitence, for I would confess And the King seeing that it was for the service of God to hear him in penitence, they seated themselves both at the foot of the altar. And when the false Hermit spake, it appeared that he hul no sin to confess ; for he hegan to relate many great services which he had done to God, as well in the life which he led as in other things. And before the King could absolve hun he rose up, and asked if things were ready for the mass. And the King said that he knew not, and hade him look. It was now time that he should go to his oratory. And the false Hermit asked him that he should assist him in saying mass, and then he should hear it. And the King said, that for nothing in the world would be leave to fulfil his penance, according as it had been appointed him : and he went to his oratory. And the false Hermit made as if he put on the vestments and all the ornaments, and begun to say mass, to the end that he might deceive the King, and make him cease to observe his penance, and come to adore the mass. And he made a watery cloud arise, so that it rained heavily where the King was. And when he saw that he could in no ways entice him, then he went to him, and said, Good man, for that you may be placed out of danger in cases which at all times will happen, seeing that you are alone, I have consecrated the body of Jesus Christ, that you may adore it every day, since you may not hear mass; and thus you may fulfil your penance as a faithful Christian. And with that he dispeeded himself, saying, In the coffer upon the altar you will find the Corpus Christi : when you rise from hence go and adore it. When he had suid this, he went his way. And the King believed that what he said was true, and held that he was a good man, and of holy life.

Ch. 249. - How the Holy Ghost visited King Don Rodrigo.

" Now when the King had ended his prayers, which he used to say every day before he took his food, he saw a good man come towards him, elad in white garments, and with a fresh countenance and a cheerful, and a cross upon his breast. And as he arrived where the King was, he blest him; and when the King saw him he perceived that it was a revelation of God, and he joined his hands and placed himself on his knees upon the ground, weeping plenti ully. And the holy man said, King, who art desirous of heavenly glory, continue the service which thou art performing for the love of my holy name; and take heed lest the enemy overcome thre, as he who many times bath overcome thee, whereby thou hast come to what thou now art. And believe none of all those who may come to thee here, for they come for no other cause but only to deceive thee, and withdraw thee from the service which thou dost me. And always observe the rule given thee by the holy man whom thou buriedst; for 1 am content with it, and thy soul shall receive refreshment if thou observest it. Come here, and I will show thee how the Devil thought to deceive thee, that thou mightst adore him. Then the King nrose and went, alway upon his knees, following the Holy Spirit of God; and when he was within the hermitage, our Lord spake and said, Depart from hence, thou cursed one, and go thy way, for thou hast no power to deceive him who continnes in my service. Get thee to the infernal pains which are suffered by those who are in the ninth torment ! And at that hour the King plainly saw how from the ark, which was upon the altar, there went out a foul and filthy devil, with more than fifty tails, and as many eyes, who, uttering great yells, departed from the place. And the King was greatly dismayed at the manner in which the false Hermit had de ceived him. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, King, let thy hope be in my name, and I will alway be with thee, so thou wilt not let thyself be sanquished by the enemy, Then the Holy Spirit of God departed, and the King remained full joyful and greatly comforted, as if he had been in celestial glory. And thus he continued his life for nearly two months.

Ch. 250, — How the Devil would have deceived King Don Rodrigo in the figure of Count Don Jahan.

⁴⁴ The King was in his oratory one Sunday toward nightfall, just ns the sun was setting, when he saw a man coming toward aim, clad in such guise as is fitting for one who follows arms. And as he looked at him, he saw that it was the Count Don Julian who approached ; and he saw that hehind him there came a great power of armed people. And the false Count, when he drew nigh, made obeisance to him; and the King was amazed at seeing him, for he knew him well: nevertheless he remained still. And the false Count came to him, and would have kissed his hand, but the King would not give it, neither would he rise up from the oratory : and the false Count knel! upon the ground before him, and said, Sir, forasmuch as I am he who sinned against thee like a man who is a traitor to his Lord, and as I did it with great wrath and fury, which possessed my heart through the strength of the Devil, our Lord God hath had compassion upon me, and would not that I should be utterly lost, nor that Spain should be destroyed, nor that thou, sir, shouldst be put down from thy great honor and state, and the great lordship which thou hadst in Spain. And he has shown me, in a revelation, how thou wert here in this hermitage doing this great penance for thy sins. Wherefore I say to thee, that thou shouldst do justice upon me, and take vengeance according to thy will, as upon one who deserves it, for I acknowledge that thou wert my lord, and also the great treason into which I have fallen. Wherefore, sir, I pray and beseech thee hy the one only God, that thou wilt take the power of Spain, which is there awaiting thee, and that thou wilt go forth to defend the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, and suffer not that poor Spain should he utterly destroyed, seeing that thou canst defend it and protect it. And then Count Jolian drew his sword, and gave it to the King, saving, Sir, take this my sword, and with thine own hand do justice upon me, and take such vengeance as thou pleasest; for I will suffer it with much patience, seeing I have sinned against thee. And the King was greatly troubled at this sight, and at his words also, and knew not what he should do, neither what he should say. Howbeit, presently he called to mind what the Holy Spirit of God had said to him, how he should take heed lest the Devil should subdue him; and so he said nothing, but continued in his prayer. And the false Count Don Julian said to him, Sir, wilt then not turn for the Holy Faith of Je-os Christ, which is utterly going to destruction? rise up and defend it, for I bring thee a full great power; and thus thou wilt serve God and recover the honor which thou hadst lost. Rise then and go forth, and have pity upon miserable Spain, which is about to be lost; and have compassion also upon so many people as are perishing for want of a Lord who should defend them. Now all these words were only meant to deceive him, for it was the Devil who had taken the form of Count Dou Julian, and not the Count himself. But the King could no longer restrain himself from replying, and he said, Go you, Count, and defend the land with this force which you have assembled, even as you went to destroy it by the great treason which you committed against me and against God. And even as you brought the men, who are enemies of God and of his Holy Faith, and led them into Spain, so now thrust them out and defend it ; for 1 will neither slay you, nor assist you in it. Leave me to myself; 1 am no longer for the world, for here I will do penance for my sins. Urge me, therefore, no more with these reasons. And the false Count Don Julian rose, and went to the great company which he had brought there, and brought them all before the King. And the King, when he helield that great company of knights, saw some among them whom he surely thought had been shin in battle. And they all said to him with load voices, Sir, whom wilt thou send us, that we may take him for our King and Lord to protect and defend us, seeing that those wilt not defend the land, neither go with us? Woulds thou give us thy nephew the Infant Don Sancho? He is dead. What then woulds: thou command us that we should do? Look to it well, sir; it is no service of God that thou shouldst let perish so great n Christianity as is every day perishing, because thou art here dwelling in this solitude. Look to it, for God will require an account at thy hands: thou hadst the churge of defending them, and thou lettest them die. And tell us what course shall we take. And when the King heard these words he was moved to compassion : and the tears came into his eyes, su that he could not restrain them ; and he was in such state that his thoughts failed him, and he was silent, and made no rendy to any thing that they could say. And all these companies who saw him complained so much the more, and sent forth great eries, and made a great tomult and uproar, and said, O miserable King, why wilt thou not rouse thyself for thy own sake, and for that of all thy people whom thou seest without a Lord? and thon wilt not even speak a word to comfort them, and tell them what they shall do. And all this while the King did nothing but weep, and answered them never a word. And when this vile race saw that they could not take him from thence, and that he answered them nothing, and that they could not overcome him by whatever they might do, they went forthwith from the mountain down into a plain, which was then made to appear before the King, and there they drew up their battles in such guise as the King Den Rodrigo was used to darrain them. And eft-soon he saw great multitudes of strange people, who came from the other side, and they began a battle so fierce and so cruel, that the King thought he had never seen one like it. And the one party put the other to the worst, and followed after them in pursuit. And then there came messengers to the King, telling him that his people had conquered, and had slain many of the enemy; but the King was confounded, and as it were beside himself, and heeded not, neither did he know what they said, and he answered nothing. And then they all went away, and seemed to the King that the one were pursuing the others, and this continued till the first crowing of the cock. And the King recovered his senses : howbeit he knew not whether it was a vision, or if it had indeed happened; but he called to mind that he had not completed the prayers which he made every day; and he hegan them again and finished them. And when he had finished, great part of the night was past, and he laid himself down to sleep. And then for three months he had no other temptation.

Ch. 251. - How the Devil, in the figure of La Cava, the daughter of Count Don Julian, sought to deceive King Don Rodrigo.

"The King was aaying his prayers at the hour of vespers on a Tuesday, when he saw peeple on horseback coming toward him : and as they were about the reach of a cross-bow from him, he saw that they alighted, and that there came toward him a woman, who was full nobly clad; and when she came near, he knew her that she was La Cava, the daughter of Count Don Julian, and she seemed to him more beautiful than he had ever before seen her in his life. And when she drew nigh, she humbled herself, and said, Sir, what fortune has brought you to this wretched life in which you have so long continued? And the King held his peace, and said aothing. And that false Cava said, Sir, it is a month since a holy man, clad in white garments, and having a red cross upon his breast, appeared to me when I was with my father Count Don Julian in Toledo; where he now holds the seat of the lordship of Spain, as he who, by force of arms, has subdued the Moors, and killed or made captives of them all. At the honr when this holy man appeared to me, I was alone in my chamber, having great sorrow in my heart, because I had no certain news where you was, and whether your soul continued to live in this world, or in another. And, moreover, I was full sorrowful, because of the death of my Lady the Queen Eliaca, your wife, who is now deceased. And for these things my heart was full sorrowful, and in great trouble with griefs and thoughts, which came to me I know not from whence, and I was like one bereft of his judgment. And while I was contemplating in this state, the holy man appeared to me in such wise as I have said, and said to me, Of what art thou taking thought? Cease to lament, for without me thou canst do nothing certain of that which thou desirest. But that the dominion of Spain may not pass away from the power of the Goths, and that he who shall have it may descend from thy seed, and be of the generation of King Don Rodrigo, it is my will that thou shouldst know where he is, and that thou shouldst go to him, and that he should go in unto thee, and that thou shouldst conceive of him a sou, and shalt call his name Felbersan, the which shall be such a one that he shall reduce under his forces all tho earth which is below the firmament. Depart, therefore, from hence, and go to the place where he is, and make no tarriance : for thus it behoveth for the service of God, and for the weal and protection and defence of the land, And I said to him, Sir, how can this be which you tell me, seeing that King Don Rodrigo is dead ; for his enemies slew him when they won the battle in which the great chivalry of Spain perished

And he said to me, Cava, think not he is dead, for he liveth, and passeth his life along in a hermitage; of the which thy father Count Don Julian will certify thee, for he went to seek him there, and found him there when he evercame the Moors. He will tell thee that he is alive, and in what place is the hermitage wherein he abideth. And I said to him, But if King Den Redrige passeth his life after this manner in the service of God, he will not approach me that I may conceive of him this son who shall prove so good. And since it thus pleases yeu, give me a sign by which I may show him that this is pleasing to God, and that he may do this which you say, seeing so great good is to follow from it. And, moreover, he will be brought to such weakness that he will not he able to obey, by reason of the great abstinence to which his body has been subjected during his continuance there. And the holy man said to me, Care not for this, for Gud will give him strength; and thou shelt say to him for a sign that he may believe thee, hew I told him that he should take heed lest the enemy deceive him, and how I bade the Devil depart from the altar where he was in the ark instead of the Cornus Christi, for that he should adore him. When thou tellest him this he will believe thee, and will understand that it is by the command of God. And when he had said these words he disappeared, so that I saw him no more ; and I remained for a full hour, being greatly comforted, because I knew of your life, so that it seemed to mo there were no other glory in this world. And when I came to myself I went incontinently to my father Count Don Julian, and told him all that had befallen me with the holy man who came in that holy vision; and I asked him if he knew aught concerning you. And he told me how he had gone to you with all his chivalry to bid you come out from thence to defend your country, which the enemies had taken from you, and that you would not ; but rather commended it to him that he should undertake it, and defend the land and govern it; and that it grieved him to think that you would not be alive, because of the great abstinence which you imposed every day upon your flesh : nevertheless, since it pleases our Lord that I should have a son by you, who should be so good a maa that he should recover all Spain, he would have me go to this place, where I should find you if you were alive; and right content would he be that there should remain of you so great good. And I, sir King, seeing how it pleased God that this should be accomplished, according as I have said, am come here in secret, for aeither man nor woman knoweth of this, save my father Count Don Julian; for I have told my people who came with me to remain yonder, because I would go and confess to a holy man who had made his abode here more than fifty years. Now, since God is the author of this, recover yourself, and remember the time when you told me that there was nothing in the world which you loved so much as me, nor which you desired so greatly as to obtain a promise of me, the which I could not give at that hour, by reason that the Queen was living, and I knew it to be great sin. And if I come to you now, it is hy command of God, for it pleases him to send me here; and, also, because the Queen is no longer in this present life. And because you are so fallen away of your strength, let us go into the hermitage, or I will order a tent to be placed here, and let us sup together, that your heart may revive and you may fulfil the command of God.

Ch. 252, — How the Devil would have deceived King Data Rodrigo, if the Holy Spirit had not visited and protected how.

"As the King heard all this, his whole body began to tremble, and his soul within him also; and all sense and power passed away from him, so that he was in a trance, and then it was revealed to him that he should take heed agatast that temptation. And the false Cava, who saw him thus extranced, made many burning torches of wax come there, by renson that it was cold, and because that the King sleaded derive heat; also there was a pavilion pitched there, and a table set within it with many viands thereon, and all the people who came with her were seen to lodge themeelves himself, he saw that the false Cava was drest in a close-fitting kirtle, which came half way below the knee, and so seemed to him the faire-st woman that he had ever seen in his life, and i appeared to the King that she sold to him, Here, sir, come and take your supper. And the King began again to tremble and lose his judgment, and fell into such a state that he knew not where he was, and it was revealed to him in that hour that he should guard against the temptation. And when he came to himself he saw that the pavilion was spread over his head; and seeing himself in that place, he looked for the oratory, and perceived that it was where it used to be; and within the pavilion he saw the false Cava, who was there with him, and that she was standing beside a bed, which was a full rich one, and that she began to take off her kirtle, and remained in her shift only, and with her long hair, which reached to her feet ; and she said to him, See, sir, here in your power that which you most desired, and which is now awaiting you. Rejoice, then, and take heart, and do that which God has appointed, and which will recover Spain, and recompense the losses, and aorrows, and wrongs, which you have endured. And then she turned toward the King, for the Devil thought thus to tempt him, and make him break the penance which he had begun ; and certes I ween there was no living man who would not right gladly have approached her. And then before him, in his sight, she begun to comb and to plait her golden locks. And the King, seeing how beautiful she was, began to tremble all over, as if he had been struck with palsy; and he lost his judgment again, and became entranced, and remained thus a long while before he came again to himself. And it was revealed to him again that he should take heed how the Devil tempted him, and that he should have firm hope in God, and not break the penance which the holy Hermit had appointed him. But ever when he recovered from these trances, he forgot all which had been revealed to him while he was entranced; and now he found that there was a large estrade placed by him, and that La Cava was lying there beside him on some pillows, which were richly wrought in gold, undrest, as he had seen her, and that she said to him, Come, sir, for you tarry long, and it will soon he day-break. And the King seeing her so near him, then he was greatly troubled, yet could he not withdraw his eyes from her; but he called to mind how the Holy Spirit of God had bade him that he should always confide in his name, and place his true hope in the sign of the cross. And he clasped his hands, and lifted them towards Heaven, and weeping bitterly, and in great contrition, he said, O Lord and very God Jesus Christ, deliver me from all temptation, and preserve my soul, that it fall not into perdition. And while he was praying thus, he saw how there came from the hermitage a great brightness, and he said, Deliver me Lord, from the power of the Devil, that I may not be deceived, nor withdrawn from thy holy service. And at that hour he made the sign of the cross upon his forehead, and blest himself; and at that hour the false Cava fell down the rock into the sea, with such a sound as if the whole world were falling to pieces, and with the plunge which she made the sea dashed up so high, that where the oratory was the King was wetted with the spray. And he remained in such astonishment that he could not for an hour recover himself. And when he came to himself he began to pray with great repentance, as if he had been on the point of falling into temptation. And the Holy Spirit of God came to him in that same manner in which he had seen it the former time. And he fell on his face upon the ground, and began to lament full bitterly, and to say, Lord, have morey upon my soul, and forsake me not among mine enemics, who would withdraw me from thee. And the Holy Spirit said to him, O King, of little faith, how hast thon been on the point of perishing ! And the King made no reply, for he did nothing but weep. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, Take heed, King, lest the Devil deceive thee, and have power over thee, that thou shouldst not fulfil the penance which thou hast commenced, neither save thy soul. And the King lifted up his countenance, and had great shame to behold him. Howheit he took courage, and said, Lord, have mercy upon me, and let me not br tempted by the enemy, for my heart is weak, and hath no power to defend itself against the false one : for my judgment is clean confounded, as one who hath no virtue if he be not aided by thy grace. Deliver me, Lord, for thy holy mercy and compassion : my salvation caunot come through the strength of my heart, for it is wholly full of fear, like a thing which is overcome. And the Holy Spirit of God sand to him. Take courage and fear not, for thou shalt dep rt from this place sooner than thou thinkest. And when it is time I will guide thee to the place where thou shalt do thy penance, that thy soul may receive salvation. When thou shalt see a little white cloud appear above thee, and that there is no other in the sky, follow after it: and in the place where it shall stop shalt then fulfil thy penance, according as the chief priest in that place shall appoint it thee. And take heart, and alway call to mind my holy name, and have true faith and constant hope in thy Savior. And when he had said this he departed, And the King was greatly comforted and full of grace, as one with whom God was present in his mercy. And he abode in the hermitage a whole year, according to his reckoning, and twelve days more. And one day, when it was full clear, the King looked up and saw above him the cloud of which the Holy Spirit of God had told him; and when he saw it he was full joyful, and gave many thanks to God. Nevertheless the King did not rise from his prayers, neither did the cloud move from above him. And when he had finished his prayers he looked at the cloud and saw that it moved forward.

Ch. 253. - How King Don Rodrigo departed from the hermitage, and arrived where he was to do penance.

" The King arose from the oratory and followed the cloud; and so great was the pleasure which he had, that he cared not for food, neither remembered it, but went after that his holy guide. And at night he saw how the cloud, when the sun was about to set, turned to the right of the road toward the mountains; and it went on so far, that before night had closed it came to a hermitage, in which there was a good man for a Hermit, who was more than ninety years of age, and there it stopt. And the King perceived that he was to rest there, and the good man welcomed the King, and they spake together of many things. And the King was well contented with his speech, and saw that certes he was a servant of God. And all that day the King had not eaten, and he was barefoot, and his raiment tattered; and as he had not been used to travel a-foot, and with his feet bare, his feet were swollen with blisters, And when it was an hour after night, the Hermit gave him a loaf, full small, which was made of rye, and there were ashes kneaded with it, and the King ate it : and when he had eaten they said prayers. And when they had said their hours, they lay down to sleep. And when it was midnight they arose and said their hours : and when they had said them the King went out of the hermitage, and saw that the cloud did not move ; and then the King understood that he had to tarry here, or that he was to hear mass before he departed, and he asked the Hermit to hear his confession, and the Hermit confessed bim. And when he had confessed, he said that he would communicate, and the good Hermit saw that it was good, and he put on his vestments and said mass; and the King heard the mass, and received the very body of our Lord Jesus Christ, And when the King had done this, he went out to look at the cloud. And as he went out of the hermitage he saw that the cloud hegan to move, and then he dispeeded himself from the Hermit, and they embraced each other weeping, and each entreated the other, that he would bear him in mind, and remember him in his prayers. And when the King had dispeeded himself, he followed after his holy guide, and the holy Hermit returned to his hermitage. And the King Don Rodrigo, notwithstanding his feet were swollen and full of blisters, and that in many places they were broken and bleeding, such and so great was the joy which he felt at going on in the course which he now held, that he endured it all as though he felt nothing. And he went, according as it seemed to him, full six leagues, and arrived at a convent of Black Monks, and there the cloud stopt, and would proceed no farther. And at that convent there was an Abbot who led an extraordinary good and holy life ; and they were not there like other monk» and he was a great friend of God and of our Lady the Virgin St. Mary ; and this Abbot took the King to his cell, and asked if he would eat as he was wont to do, or like the other monks; and the King said, that he would do as he should direct him. And the Abbot ordered that a loaf should be brought of pannick and maize mixed together, and a jar of water, and on the other side he had food placed such as the monks used ; and the King would eat only of the pannick bread, as he had been wont to do, and he drank of the water. And when he had eaten, the Abbo asked him if he would remain that eight or not, and the King said that he knew not, but that he would go out and see whether he were to go or to remain. And the Abhot said that it was the hour of vespers, and that he ought to remain ; and the King went out and saw that the cloud moved, and that it behoved him to go, and he dispeeded himself from the Abbot, and they commended themselves each to the other in his prayers. And the Abbot saw plainly how that cloud had guided him, and how there was no other in the sky, and he marvelled greatly, and said, Certes this is some holy man, and he gave thanks to God. And the King went on that evening till he came to a church which was solitary and remote from peopled places ; and there the cloud stopt, and he abode there that night. And the King went into the church, and found in it a lamp burning, and it rejoiced him much, for by the light of it he said his hours as well before he should sleep as after. And on the morrow when he had made his prayer, he went out of the church and beheld the cloud, and saw that it moved ; and he went after it, and after two days' journey he came to a place which where it is, or what it is called, is not said, save that it is the place of his burial, for such it is. And there the cloud stopt, and proceeded no farther; and it rested without the town over an ancient heroritage. And the Elder of that place incontinently knew by the lloly Spirit how King Don Rodrigo was come there : but he knew not his name, neither who he was; and he asked him if he meant to lead his life there, and he answered that it was to he as God should please. And the Elder said to him, Friend, I am the Elder of this place, for all the others, when they knew that King Don Rodrige and his chivalry were slain and vanquished, fled from hence for fear of the Mours, and of the traitor Count Don Julian, and they all weat to the monatains to escape. And I remained, putting my trust in our Lord God, and in his holy hands: for that I would rather abide that which may befall and take my adveature here, than utterly forsake our mother holy church ; while I am able I will remain here and not forsake it, but rather receive my death. And therefore I say, that if you are to abide here you must provide yourself of that whereof you have need. And the King said, Friend of God, concerning my tarriance I cannot certify you ; though surely I think that I shall abide ; and if for the service of God you will be pleased to send me every day that I remain a loaf of pannick and water, I shall he contented therewith. And the Elder promised this, and departed forthwith and went to his home, and sent him a loaf of pannick and water. And the cloud remained there three days over that hermitage, and when the three days were at an end, it was seen no more. And the King, when he could no longer see it, understood that there he must perform his penance, and gave many thanks to God, and was full joyful thereat. And on the morrow the Elder came to see him, and they communed with each other in such manner, that the King confessed to him all the sins which he had committed during his whole life till that time, all which he called to mind with great contrition, weeping full bitterly and groaning for his errors and sins. And the Elder was greatly astonished and said, that on the third day from thence he would appoint him his penance. And he weat to his church and confessed, and addrest himself to prayer in such guise that he neither ate nor drank, nor raised himself from one place, weeping bitterly, and beseeching God that he would show him what penance he should appoint the King ; for after no other manner did he think to appoint it, than such as his holy mercy and compassion should direct. And on the third day he heard a voice which said thus : Command King Don Rodrigo that he go to a fountain which is below his hermitage, and he shall find there a smooth stone ; and bid him lift it up, and under it he shall find three little serpents, the one having two heads. And hid him take that which bath two heads, and carry it away, and place it in a jar, and nurse it secretly, so that no person in the world shall know thereof, save only he and thou; and let him keep it till it wax so great that it hath made three turns within the jar, and puts its head out; and when it is of that greatness, then let him take it out, and lay it in a tomb which is there, and lie down himself with it, naked ; and close the tomb well, that the serpent may not be able to go out ; and in this manner God is pleased that King Don Rodrigo should de penance.

Ch. 254. - Of the penance which was appointed King Dor-Rodrigo.

" The Elder when he heard the voice was greatly amazed at so rigotous a penance as this, and gave many thanks to God, and he went to King Don Rodrigo, and told him the manner how he had heard the voice ; and the King was full juyful and content and pleased therewith, and gave many thanks to our Lord, for that he should now complete his penance and save his soul. And therewith in great joy, and shedding many tears for pleasure, he went to the fountain as he had been directed, and found the smooth stone. And when he had litted it up, he found the three serpents according as the Elder had said, and he took that which had two heads, and he took it and put it in a great jar, such as would he a large wine vessel, and nurst it there till it was of such higness as the voice had said. And when King Don Rodrigo saw that it was of this biguess he confessed to the Elder, weeping full hitterly, demanding favor of God that he would give him grace and strength with patience to fulfil that penance without any temptation or trouble of soul ; to the end that, the penance being completed, it might please our Lord God to receive his soul into his glory. And before the fifth day after the serpent was thus big, the King and the Elder went to the tomb, and they cleansed it well within; and the King placed himself in it naked as he was born, and the serpent with him, and the Elder with a great lever laid the stone upon the top. And the King besought the Elder that he would pray to our Lord to give him grace that he might patiently endure that penauce, and the Elder promised him, and thus the King remained in his tomb, and the serpent with him. And the Elder consoled him, saying to him many things to the end that he might not be dismayed, neither fall into despair, whereby he should lose the service of God. And all this was so secret that no man knew it, save only the King and the Elder. And when it was day-break the Elder went to the church and said mass, with many tears and with great devotion beseeching God that he would have mercy and compassion upon King Don Rodrigo, that with true devotion and repentance he might complete his penance in this manner, which was for his service. And when he had said mass, he went to the place where King Don Rodrigo lay, and asked him how he fared, and the King answered, Well, thanks to God, and better than he deserved, but that as yet he was just as when he went in. And the Elder strengthened him as much as he could, telling him that he should call to mind how he had been a sinner, and that he should give thanks to our Lord God, for that he had visited him in this world, and delivered him from many temptations, and had himself appointed for him this penance ; the which he should suffer and taka with patience, for soon he would be in heavenly glory. And the King said to him, that he well knew how according to his great sins he merited a stronger penance : but that he gave many thanks to our Lord Jesus, for that he himself had given him this penance, which he did receive and take with great patience; and he besought the Elder that he would continue to pray our Lord God that he would let him fulfil it. And the Elder said to him many good things concerning our Lord God. And the King lay there three days, during all which time the serpent would not seize on him. And when the third day, after that he had gone into the tonib, was completed, the serpent rose from his side, and crept upon his belly and his breast, and began with the one head to eat at his nature, and with the other straight toward his heart. And at this time the Elder came to the tomb, and asked him how he fared, and he said, Well, thanks to God, for now the serpent had begun to eat. And the Elder asked him at what place, and he answered at two, one right against the he ort with which he had conceived all the ills that he had done, and th other at his nature, the which had been the cause of the great destruction of Spain. And the Elder said that God was with him, and exhorted him that he should be of good courage, for new all his persecutions both of the body and of the soul would have an end. And the King ceased not always to demand help of our Lord, and to entreat that of his holy mercy he would be plensed to forgive him. And the Elder went to his home, and would not seat himself to cat, but retired into his chamber, and weeping, prayed full devoutly to our Lord that he would give strength to the King that he might complete his penance. And the serpent, us he was dying for hunger, and moreover was large, had in one minute enten the nature, and began to eat at the howels; nevertheless he did not eat so fast, but that the King endured in that forment from an hour before night till it was past the middle of the day. And when the serpent broke through the web of the heart, he staid there and ale no further. And incontinently the King gave up his spirit to our Lord, who by his holy merey took him into his glory. And at that hour when he expired all the bells of the place rang of themselves as if men had rung them. Then the Ehler knew that the King was dead, and that his soul was saved.²

Thomas Newton, in his "Notable History of the Saracens," seems to imagine that this story is allegorical. "Nowe," he says, "whereas it is reported, and written that he followed a starre or a messenger of God, which conducted and guided him in his way; it may be so, and the same hath also happened to others; but it may as well also be understoode of a certaine secrete starre moving and directing his will.

⁴⁴ And whereas they say he was put by that holy man into a cave or hole, and a serpent with him that had two heads, which in two days' space gnawed all the flesh off his holy from the hones; this, beyng simplic taken and understanded, hath no likelihood of any truth. For what sanctity, what religion, or what pietic, commandeth to kill a penitent person, and one that seeketh comfort of bys afflicted mind by amendment of hfe, with such borrible torments and straunge punishment? Wherefore I woulde rather think it to be spoken mysticallye, and that the serpent with two heads signifieth his sinful and gylky conscience."

How Carestes found the grave of King Don Rodrigo at Visco in Portugal.

"I, Carestes, vassal of King Don Alfonso of Leon, son-inlaw of the Knight uf God, King Don Pelayo, when the said King Don Alfonso won Viseo from the Moors who held it, found a grave in a field, upon the which were written in Gothic letters, the words which you shall here read. This grave was in front of a little church, without the town of Viseo, and the superscription of the writing was thus: —

Of the writing which was upon the grave of King Don Rodrigo.

"Here lies King Don Rodrigo, the last of the Goths. Cursed be the wrath of the traitor Julian, for it was of long endurance, and cursed be his anger, for it was obdurate and evil, for he was mad with rage, and stomachful with pride, and puffed up with folly, and void of loyalty, and unmindlu of the laws, and a despiser thereof; eruel in himself, a slayer of his lord, a destroyer of his country, a truitor to his countrymen; bitter is his name; and it is as grief and sorrow in the mouth of him who pronounces it; and it shall always be cursed by all that speak of him."

That veracious chronicler Carestes then concludes his true bistory in these words: — " And by this which I found written upon this grave, I am of mind that King Don Rodrigo lies there, and because of the life which ho led in his penitence, according as ye have heard, which also was in the same tomb written in a book of parchment, I believe without donbt that it is true, and because of the great penance which he did, that God was pleased to make it known in such manner as it past, for those who hereafter shall have to rule and govern, to the end that all men may see how soon pirde is abased and humility exalted. This Chronicle is composed in memory of the noble King Don Rodrigo; that God pardon his sins, and that the son of the Virgin without stain, Jesus Christ, bring us to true repentance, who liveth and reigneth for ever and ever. Amen.

Thanks be to God ! "

I believe the Archbishop Roderick of Toledo is the earliest writer who mentions this discovery. He died in 1247. The fact may very possibly have been true, for there seems to have been no intention of setting up a shrine connected with it. The archbishop's words are as follow: —

"Quid de Rege Roderico acciderit ignoratur; tamen corona vestes et insignia et calciamenta auro et lapidibus adornata, et equas qui Orclia dicebatur, in loca tremulo juzita flurum sine corpore sunt inventa. Quid autem de corpore fuerit fuctum penitus ignoratur, nisi quod modernis temporibus apud Fiseum civitatem Portugallia inscriptus tamulus inxenitur, Hie jacet Rodericus ultimus Rex Gothorum. Lope do Vega has made this epitaph, with its accompanying reflections, into two stanzas of Latin rhymes, which occur in the midst of oue of his long poems : ---

> Hoc jacet in sarcophago Rex ille Penultimus Gotherum in Hispania, Inflix Rultricns; viator sile, Nc forté percet tota Lusitania, Provocatus Cupidinis missile Telo, tam magnà affectus fuit insanià Quam tota Hiberna rinculis astricta Testatur marta, lachrimatur victa.

TO JOHN MAY,

AFTER A FRIENDSHIP OF TWENTY YEARS

THIS POEM IS INSCRIBED,

IN TESTIMONY OF THE HIGHEST ESTEEM AND AFFECTION,

BY ROBERT SOUTHEY.

ARGUMENT.

THE first part of this Poem describes a journey to the scene of war. The second is in an allegorical form; it exposes the gross material philosophy which has been the guiding principle of the French politicians, from Mirabeau to Bonaparte; and it states the opinions of those persons who lament the restoration of the Bourbons, because the hopes which they entertained from the French Revolution have not been realized; and of those who see only evil, or blind chance, in the course of human events.

To the Christian philosopher all things are consistent and clear. Our first parents brought with them the light of natural religion and the moral law; as men departed from these, they tended towards barbarous and savage life; large portions of the world are in this degenerated state; still, upon the great scale, the human race, from the beginning, has been progressive. But the direct object of Bonaparte was to establish a military despotism wherever his power extended; and the immediate and inevitable consequence of such a system is to brutalize and degrade mankind The contest in which this country was engaged against that Tyrant, was a struggle between good and evil principles; and never was there a victory so important to .he best hopes of human nature as that which was won by British valor at Waterloo, -1.a effects extending over the whole civilized world, and involving the vital interests of all mankind.

That victory leaves England in security and peace. In no age, and in no country, has man ever existed under circumstances so favorable to the full development of his moral and intellectual faculties, as in England at this time. The peace which she has won by the battle of Waterloo, leaves her at leisure to pursue the great objects and duties of bettering her own condition, and diffusing the blessings of civilization and Christianity.

PROEM.

ONCE more 1 see thee, Skiddaw ! once again Behold thee in thy majesty serene,

Where, like the bulwark of this favor'd plain, Alone thou standest, monarch of the scene –

Thou glorious Mountain, on whose ample breast The sunbeams love to play, the vapors love to rest

 $\mathbf{2}$.

Once more, O Derwent, to thy awful shores I come, insatiate of the accustom'd sight,

And, listening as the eternal torrent roars, Drink in with eye and ear a fresh delight; For I have wander'd far by land and sea,

In all my wanderings still remembering thee.

3.

Twelve years, (how large a part of man's briet day !)

Nor idly nor ingloriously spent,

Of evil and of good have held their way, Since first upon thy banks I pitch'd my tent.

Hither I came in manhood's active prime, And here my head hath felt the touch of time.

4.

Heaven hath with goodly increase blest me here, Where childless and oppress'd with grief I came With voice of fervent thankfulness sincere

Let me the blessings which are mine proclaim: Here I possess — what more should I require? — Books, children, leisure, — all my heart's desire.

5.

O joyful hour, when to our longing home

The long-expected wheels at length drew nigh! When the first sound went forth, "They come, they come!"

And hope's impatience quicken'd every eye! Never had man whom Heaven would heap with bliss

More glad return, more happy hour than this."

6.

Aloft on yonder bench, with arms dispread, My boy stood, shouting there his father's name,

Waving his hat around his happy head; And there, a younger group, his sisters came: Smiling they stood with looks of pleased surprise, While tears of joy were seen in elder eyes.

7.

Soon each and all came crowding round to share The cordial greeting, the beloved sight;

What welcomings of hand and lip were there ' And when those overflowings of delight

Subsided to a sense of quiet bliss, Life hath no purer, deeper happiness.

The young companion of our weary way Found here the end desired of all her ills;

She who, in sickness pining many a day, Hunger'd and thirsted for her native hills,

Forgetful now of sufferings pass'd and pain, Rejoiced to see her own dear home again.

9.

Recover'd now, the homesick mountaineer Sat by the playmate of her infancy,

Iler twin-like comrade, --- render'd doubly dear For that long absence : full of life was she,

With voluble discourse and eager mien Telling of all the wonders she had seen.

10.

Here silently between her parents stood My dark-eyed Bertha, timid as a dove;

And gently off from time to time she woo'd Pressure of hand, or word, or look of love, With impulse shy of bashful tenderness, Soliciting again the wish'd caress.

Η.

The younger twain, in wonder lost were they, My gentle Kate, and my sweet Isabel:

Long of our promised coming, day by day, It had been their delight to hear and tell;

And now, when that long-promised hour was come,

Surprise and wakening Memory held them dumb.

12.

For in the infant mind, as in the old, When to its second childhood life declines,

A dim and troubled power doth Memory hold :

But soon the light of young Remembrance shines

Renew'd, and influences of dormant love, Waken'd within, with quickening influence move 13.

O happy season theirs, when absence brings Small feeling of privation, none of pain, Yet at the present object love re-springs,

As night-closed flowers at morn expand again Nor deem our second infancy unblest, When gradually composed we sink to rest.

14.

Soon they grew blithe as they were wont to be; Her old endearments each began to seek :

And Isabel drew near to elimb my knee,

And pat with fonding hand her father's check, With voice, and touch, and look, reviving thus The feelings which had slept in long disuse.

But there stood one whose heart could entertain And comprehend the fulness of the joy;

The father, teacher, playmate, was again Come to his only and his studious boy : And he beheld again that mother's eye Which with such ceaseless care had watch'd his infancy.

16.

Bring forth the treasures now, — a proud display, — For rich as Eastern merehants we return !

Behold the black Beguine, the Sister gray, The Friars whose heads with sober motion turn, The Ark well-fill'd with all its numerous hives, Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japhet, and their wives;—

17.

The tumbler, loose of limb; the wrestlers twain; And many a toy beside of quaint device,

Which, when his fleecy troops no more can gain Their pasture on the mountains hoar with ice, The German shepherd earves with eurious knife,

Earning in easy toil the food of frugal life.

18.

It was a group which Richter, had he view'd, Might have deem'd worthy of his perfect skilt,

The keen impatience of the younger brood, Their eager eyes and fingers never still; The hope, the wonder, and the restless joy Of those glad girls and that vociferous boy! —

19.

The aged friend serene with quiet smile, Who in their pleasure finds her own delight;

The mother's heart-felt happiness the while; The aunts, rejoicing in the joyful sight; And he who, in his gayety of heart, With glib and noisy tongue perform'd the showman's part.

20.

Scoff ye who will! but let me, gracious Heaven, Preserve this boyish heart till life's last day!

For so that inward light by Nature given Shall still direct, and cheer me on my way, And, brightening as the shades of age descend, Shine forth with heavenly radiance at the end.

21.

This was the morning light vouchsafed, which led My favor'd footsteps to the Muses' hill,

Whose arduous paths I have not ceased to tread, From good to better persevering still;

And if but self-approved, to praise or blame Indifferent, while I toil for lasting fame.

22.

And, O ye nymphs of Castaly divine ! Whom I have dutifully served so long,

Benignant to your votary now incline, That I may win your ear with gentle song,

Such as, I ween, is ne'er disown'd by you, -A low, prelusive strain, to nature true.

23.

But when I reach at themes of loftier thought, And tell of things surpassing earthly sense,

(Which by yourselves, O Muses, I am taught,) Then aid me with your fuller influence,

And to the height of that great argument, Support my spirit in her strong ascent !

24.

So may I boldly round my temples bind The laurel which my master Spenser wore;

And free in spirit as the mountain wind That makes my symphony, in this lone hour, No perishable song of triumph raise, But sing in worthy strains my Country's praise.

THE JOURNEY.

FLANDERS

1.

OUR world hath seen the work of war's debate Consummated in one momentous day

Twice in the course of time; and twice the fate Of unborn ages hung upon the fray: First at Platæa, in that awful hour When Greece united smote the Persian's power.

 $\mathbf{2}$.

For had the Persian triumph'd, then the spring Of knowledge from that living source had ceased All would have fallen before the barbarous King, Art, Science, Freedom; the despotic East, Setting her mark upon the race subdued,

Had stamp'd them in the mould of sensual servitude.

3.

The second day was that when Martel broke The Mussulmen, delivering France oppress'd,

And in one mighty conflict, from the yoke Of misbelieving Mecca saved the West; Else had the Impostor's law destroy'd the ties Of public weal and private charities.

Such was the danger when that Man of Blood Burst from the iron Isle, and brought again, Like Satan rising from the sulphurous flood,

His impious legions to the battle plain : Such too was our deliverance when the field

Of Waterloo beheld his fortunes yield.

5.

I, who, with faith unshaken from the first, Even when the Tyrant seem'd to touch the skies, Had look'd to see the high-blown bubble burst,

And for a fall conspicuous as his rise, Even in that faith had look'd not for defeat So swift, so overwhelming, so complete.

6.

Mc most of all men it behoved to raise The strain of triumph for this foe subdued,

To give a voice to joy, and in my lays Exalt a nation's hymn of gratitude, And blazon forth in song that day's renown, — For I was graced with England's laurel crown.

7.

And as I once had journey'd to behold, Far off, Ourique's consecrated field,

Where Portugal, the faithful and the bold, Assumed the symbols of her sacred shield, More reason now that I should bend my way The field of British glory to survey.

So forth 1 set upon this pilgrimage, And took the partner of my life with me,

And one dear girl just ripe enough of age Retentively to see what 1 should see; That thus, with mutual recollections fraught,

We might bring home a store for after-thought.

9.

We left our pleasant Land of Lakes, and went Thronghout whole England's length, a weary way, Even to the farthest shores of eastern Kent : Embarking there upon an autumn day, Toward Ostend we held our course all night, And anchor'd by its quay at morning's earliest light.

10.

Small vestige there of that old siege appears, And little of remembrance would be found,

When, for the space of three long, painful years, The persevering Spaniard girt it round,

And gallant youths, of many a realm from far, Went students to that busy school of war.

11.

Yet still those wars of obstinate defence Their lessons offer to the soldier's hand;

Large knowledge may the statesman draw from thence;

And still from underneath the drifted sand Sometimes the storm, or passing foot, lays bare Part of the harvest Death has gather'd there.

12.

Peace be within thy walls, thou famous town, For thy brave bearing in those times of old;

May plenty thy industrious children crown, And prosperous merchants day by day behold Many a rich vessel, from the injurious sea, Enter the bosom of thy quiet quay.

13.

Embarking there, we glided on between Strait banks raised high above the level land,

With many a cheerful dwelling, white and green, In goodly neighborhood on either hand.

Huge-timber'd bridges o'er the passage lay, Which wheel'd aside and gave us easy way.

14.

Four horses, aided by the favoring breeze, Drew our gay vessel, slow, and sleek, and large; Crack goes the whip; the steersman at his ease

Directs the way, and steady went the barge. Ere evening closed, to Bruges thus we came, — Fair city, worthy of her ancient fame.

15.

The season of her splendor is gone by, Yet every where its monuments remain -

Temples which rear their stately heads on high, Canals that intersect the fertile plain,

Wide streets and squares, with many a court and hall

Spacious and undefaced, but ancient all.

16.

Time hath not wrong'd her, nor hath Ruin sought Rudely her splendid structures to destroy,

Save in those recent days, with evil fraught, When Mutability, in drunken joy

Triumphant, and from all restraint released, Let loose the fierce and many-headed beast.

17.

But for the scars in that unhappy rage Inflicted, firm she stands and undecay'd; Like our first sires', a beautiful old age Is hers, in venerable years array'd; And yet to her benignant stars may bring, What fate denies to man, — a second spring.

18.

When I may read of tilts in days of old, And tourneys graced by chieftains of renown, Fair dames, grave citizens, and warriors bold,

If Fancy would portray some stately town, Which for such pomp fit theatre should be, Fair Bruges, I shall then remember thee.

19.

Nor did thy landscape yield me less delight, Seen from the deck as slow it glided by,

Or when beneath us, from thy Belfroy's height, Its boundless circle met the bending sky;

The waters smooth and straight, thy proper boast, And lines of road-side trees in long perspective lost.

20.

No happier landscape may on earth be seen, Rich gardens all around and fruitful groves,

White dwellings trim relieved with lively green, The pollard that the Flemish painter loves, With aspens tall and poplars fair to view, Casting o'er all the land a gray and willowy hue.

My lot hath lain in scenes sublime and rude, Where still devoutly I have served and sought The Power divine which dwells in solitude.

In boyhood was I wont, with rapture fraught, Amid those rocks and woods to wander free, Where Avon hastens to the Severn sea.

22.

In Cintra also have 1 dwelt erewhile, That earthly Eden, and have seen at eve

The sea-mists, gathering round its mountain pile, Whelm with their billows all below, but leave One pinnacle sole seen, whereon it stood Like the Ark on Ararat, above the flood.

23.

And now am I a Cumbrian mountaineer; Their wintry garment of unsullied snow

The mountains have put on, the heavens are clear, And yon dark lake spreads silently below ;

Who sees them only in their summer hour

Sees but their beauties half, and knows not half their power.

24.

Yet hath the Flemish scene a charm for me That soothes and wins upon the willing heart; Though all is level as the sleeping sca,

A natural beauty springs from perfect art, And something more than pleasure fills the breast, To see how well-directed toil is blest.

25.

Two nights have past; the morning opens well; Fair are the aspects of the favoring sky;

750

Soon yon sweet chimes the appointed hour will tell,

For here to music Time moves merrily : Aboard ! aboard ! no more must we delay, — Farewell, good people of the Fleur de Bled !

26.

Beside the busy wharf the Trekschuit rides, With painted plumes and tent-like awning gay;

Carts, barrows, coaches, hurry from all sides, And passengers and porters throng the way, Contending all at once in clamorous speech, — French, Flemish, English, — each confusing each.

27.

All disregardant of the Babel sound,

A swan kept oaring near with upraised eye, — A beauteous pensioner, who daily found

The bounty of such casual company; Nor left us till the bell said all was done, And slowly we our watery way begun.

23.

Europe can boast no richer, goodlier scene,

Than that through which our pleasant passage lay,

By fertile fields and fruitful gardens green, The journey of a short autumnal day;

Sleek, well-fed steeds our steady vessel drew; The heavens were fair, and Mirth was of our crew.

29.

Along the smooth canal's unbending line,

Beguiling time with light discourse, we went, Nor wanting savory food nor generous wine.

Ashore, too, there was feast and merriment; The jovial peasants at some village fair Were dancing, drinking, smoking, gambling there.

30.

Of these, or of the ancient towers of Ghent Renown'd, I must not tarry now to tell;

Of picture, or of church, or monument;

Nor how we mounted to that ponderous bell, The Belfroy's boast, which bears old Roland's name,

Nor yields to Oxford Tom, or Tom of Lincoln's fame; --

31.

Nor of that sisterhood whom to their rule Of holy life no hasty vows restrain,

Who, meek disciples of the Christian school, Watch by the bed of sickness and of pain :

Oh what a strength divine doth Faith impart To inborn goodness in the female heart!

32.

A gentle party from the shores of Kent Thus far had been our comrades, as befell;

Fortune had link'd us first, and now Consent, -(For why should Choice divide whom Chance so well Had join'd?) and they to view the famous ground,

Like us, were to the Field of Battle bound.

33.

Farther as yet they look'd not than that quest, — The land was all before them where to choose. So we consorted here as seemed best;

Who would such pleasant fellowship refuse Of ladies fair and gentle comrades free ? Certes we were a joyous company.

34.

Yet lack'd we not discourse for graver times, Such as might suit sage auditors, I ween ;

For some among us, in far distant climes The cities and the ways of men had seen; No unobservant travellers they, but well Of what they there had learnt they knew to tell.

35.

The one of frozen Moscovy could speak, And well his willing listeners entertain With tales of that inclement region bleak,

The pageantry and pomp of Catherine's reign, And that proud city, which with wise intent The mighty founder raised, his own great monument.

36.

And one had dwelt with Malabars and Moors, Where fertile earth and genial heaven dispense Profuse their bounty upon Indian shores;

Whate'er delights the eye, or charms the sense, The valleys with perpetual fruitage bless'd, The mountains with unfading foliage dress'd.

37.

He those barbaric palaces had seen, The work of Eastern potentates of old; And in the Temples of the Rock had been, Awe-struck their dread recesses to behold; A gifted hand was his, which by its skill Could to the eye portray such wondrous scenes at will.

38.

A third, who from the Land of Lakes with me Went out upon this pleasant pilgrimage,

Had sojourn'd long beyond the Atlantic sea ; Adventurous was his spirit as his age, For he in far Brazil, through wood and waste, Had travell'd many a day, and there his heart was placed.

39.

Wild region, — happy if at night he found The shelter of some rude Tapnya's shed,

Else would he take his lodgment on the ground, Or from the tree suspend his hardy bed;

And sometimes, starting at the jaguar's eries,

See through the murky night the prowler's fiery eyes.

40.

And sometimes over thirsty deserts drear,

And he a comrade to my heart's content:

For he of what I most desired could tell, [well. And loved the Portugals because he knew them]

41.

Here to the easy barge we bade adieu; Land-travellers now along the well-paved way,

Where road-side trees still lengthening on the view, Before us and behind unvarying lay : Through lands well labor'd to Alost we came,

Where whilome treachery stain'd the English name.

42.

Then saw we Afflighem, by ruin rent, Whose venerable fragments strow the land;

Grown wise too late, the multitude lament The ravage of their own unhappy hand; Its records in their frenzy torn and tost, Its precious stores of learning wreck'd and lost.

43.

Whatever else we saw was cheerful all, The signs of steady labor well repaid;

The grapes were ripe on every cottage wall, And merry peasants seated in the shade

Of garner, or within the open door, [store. From gather'd hop-vines pluck'd the plenteous 44.

Through Assche, for water and for cakes renown'd, We pass'd, pursuing still our way, though late;

And when the shades of night were closing round, Brussels received us through her friendly gate, —

Proud city, fated many a change to see, And now the seat of new-made monarchy.

II.

BRUSSELS.

1.

WHERE might a gayer spectacle be found

Than Brussels offer'd on that festive night, Her squares and palaces irradiate round

To welcome the imperial Moscovite, Who now, the wrongs of Europe twice redress'd, Came there a welcome and a glorious guest?

2.

Iler mile-long avenue with lamps was hung, Innumerous, which diffused a light like day;

Where, through the line of splendor, old and young Paraded all in festival array;

While fiery barges, plying to and fro,

Illumined as they moved the liquid glass below.

By day with hurrying crowds the streets were throng'd,

'fo gain of this great Czar a passing sight;

And music, dance, and banquetings prolong'd The various work of pleasure through the night.

Vou might have deem'd, to see that joyous town, That wretchedness and pain were there unknown.

4.

Yet three short months had scarcely pass'd away, Since, shaken with the approaching battle's breath,

Her inmost chambers trembled with dismay; And now, within her walls, insatiate Death, Devourer whom no harvest e'er can fill, The gleanings of that field was gathering still.

5.

Within those walls there linger'd at that hour Many a brave soldier on the bed of pain,

Whom aid of human art should ne'er restore To see his country and his friends again; And many a victim of that fell debate Whose life yet waver'd in the scales of fate.

6.

Some I beheld, for whom the doubtful scale Had to the side of life inclined at length;

Emaciate was their form, their features pale, The limbs, so vigorous late, bereft of strength; And for their gay habiliments of yore,

The habit of the House of Pain they wore.

7.

Some in the courts of that great hospital, That they might taste the sun and open air, Crawl'd out; or sat beneath the southern wall;

Or, leaning in the gate, stood gazing there In listless guise upon the passers by,

Whiling away the hours of slow recovery.

8.

Others in wagons borne abroad I saw, Albeit recovering, still a mournful sight:

Languid and helpless, some were stretch'd on straw;

Some, more advanced, sustain'd themselves upright,

And with bold eye and careless front, methought, Seem'd to set wounds and death again at nought.

9.

Well had it fared with these; nor went it ill With those whom war had of a limb bereft,

Leaving the life untouch'd, that they had still Enough for health as for existence left;

But some there were who lived to draw the breath Of pain through hopeless years of lingering death.

10.

Here might the hideous face of war be seen, Stripp'd of all pomp, adornment, and disguise .

It was a dismal spectacle, I ween, Such as might well to the beholders' eyes

Bring sudden tears, and make the pious mind Grieve for the crimes and follies of mankind.

11.

What had it been, then, in the recent days Of that great triumph, when the open wound

752

III. THE POET'S	PILGRIMAGE. 753
Was festering, and along the crowded ways, Hour after hour, was heard the incessant sound Of wheels, which o'er the rough and stony road Convey'd their living, agonizing load!	A horseman who in haste pursued his road Would reach it as the second hour began. The way is through a forest deep and wide, Extending many a mile on either side.
 12. Hearts little to the melting mood inclined Grew sick to see their sufferings; and the thought Still comes with horror to the shuddering mind Of those sad days when Belgian cars were taught The British soldier's cry, half groan, half prayer, Breathed when his pain is more than he can bear. 	2. No cheerful woodland this of antic trees, With thickets varied and with sunny glade; Look where he will, the weary traveller sees One gloomy, thick, impenetrable shade Of tall, straight trunks, which move before his sight, With interchange of lines of long green light. 3.
13. Brave spirits, nobly had their part been done! Brussels could show, where Senne's slow waters glide, The cannon which their matchless valor won, Proud trophies of the field, ranged side by side, Where, as they stood in inoffensive row, The solitary guard paced to and fro.	 Here, where the woods, receding from the road, Have left, on either hand, an open space For fields and gardens, and for man's abode, Stands Waterloo; a little, lowly place, Obscure till now, when it hath risen to fame, And given the victory its English name. 4.
14. Unconscious instruments of human woe, Some for their mark the royal lilies bore, Fix'd there when Britain was the Bourbon's foe; And some, emboss'd in brazen letters, wore The sign of that abhorr'd misrule, which broke The guilty nation for a Tyrant's yoke.	What time the second Carlos ruled in Spain, Last of the Austrian line by Fate decreed, Here Castanaca reared a votive fane, Praying the Patron Saints to bless with seed His childless sovereign; Heaven denied an heir, And Europe mourn'd in blood the frustrate prayer 5.
15. Others were stamp'd with that Usurper's name,— Recorders thus of many a change were they, Their deadly work through every change the same; Nor ever had they seen a bloodier day, Than when, as their late thunders roll'd around, Brukert in all here sitis e fil the curved	That temple to onr hearts was hallow'd now; For many a wounded Briton there was laid, With such poor help as time might then allow From the fresh carnage of the field convey'd; And they whom human succors could not save Here in its precincts found a hasty grave. 6.
Brabant in all her cities felt the sound. 16. Then ceased their occupation. From the field Of battle here in triumph were they brought; Ribbons and flowers, and laurels half conceal'd Their brazen mouths, so late with ruin fraught; Women beheld them pass with joyful eyes, And children clapp'd their hands and rent the air	And here, on marble tablets set on high, In English lines by foreign workmen traced, Are names familiar to an English eye; Their brethren here the fit memorials placed, Whose unadorn'd inscriptions briefly tell Their gallant comrades' rank, and where they fell. 7.
with cries. 17. Now idly on the banks of Senne they lay, Like toys with which a child is pleased no more : Only the British traveller bends his way To see them on that unfrequented shore, And, as a mournful feeling blends with pride,	The stateliest monument of public pride, Enrich'd with all magnificence of art, To honor Chieftains who in victory died, Would wake no stronger feeling in the heart Than these plain tablets, by the soldier's hand Raised to his comrades in a foreign land. 8.
Semembers those who fought, and those who died.	Not far removed yon find the burial-ground, Yet so that skirts of woodland intervene; A small enclosure, rudely fenced around; Three grave-stones only for the dead are seen. One bears the name of some rich villager, The first for whom a stone was planted there.

THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

SOUTHWARD from Brussels lies the field of blood, Some three hours' journey for a well-girt man ; 95

9.

Beneath the second is a German laid, Whom Bremen, shaking off the Frenchman s yoke,

Sent with her sons the general cause to aid; He in the fight received his mortal stroke, Yet for his country's aggravated woes Lived to see vengeance on her hated focs.

10.

A son of Erin sleeps helow the third; By friendly hands his body where it lay

Upon the field of blood had been interr'd,

And thence by those who mourn'd him borne away,

In pious reverence for departed worth, Laid here with holy rites in consecrated earth.

11.

Repose in peace, brave soldiers, who have found In Waterloo and Soigny's shade your rest! Ere this hath British valor made that ground

Sacred to you, and for your foes unbless'd, When Marlborough here, victorious in his might, Surprised the French, and smote them in their flight.

12.

Those wars are as a tale of times gone by, For so doth perishable fame decay,--

Here on the ground wherein the slaughter'd lie, The memory of that fight is pass'd away ;---

And even our glorious Blenheim to the field Of Waterloo and Wellington must yield.

13.

Soon shall we reach that scene of mighty deeds, In one unbending line a short league hence;

Aright the forest from the road recedes,

With wide sweep trending south and westward thence;

Aleft along the line it keeps its place,

Some half hour's distance at a traveller's pace.

14.

The country here expands, a wide-spread scene; No Flemish gardens fringed with willows these;

Nor rich Brabantine pastures ever green,

With trenches lined and rows of aspen trees; In tillage here the unwooded, open land Returns its increase to the farmer's hand.

15.

Behold the scene where Slaughter had full sway : A mile before us lieth Mount St. John,

The hamlet which the Highlanders that day

Preserved from spoil; yet as much farther on The single farm is placed, now known to fame, Which from the sacred hedge derives its name.

16.

Straight onward yet for one like distance more, And there the house of Belle Alliance stands,

So named, I guess, by some in days of yore, In friendship or in wedlock joining hands:

Little did they who call'd it thus foresee The place that name should hold in history ! Deyond these points the fight extended not --Small theatre for such a tragedy !

Its breadth scarce more, from eastern Papelot To where the groves of Hougoumont on high Rear in the west their venerable head, And cover with their shade the countless dead.

18.

But wouldst thou tread this celebrated ground, And trace with understanding eyes a scene

Above all other fields of war renown'd,

From western Hougoumont thy way begin; There was our strength on that side, and there first, In all its force, the storm of battle burst.

19.

Strike eastward then across toward La Haye,

The single farm: with dead the fields between Are lined, and thou wilt see upon the way

Long wave-like dips and swells which intervene, Such as would breathe the war-horse, and impede, When that deep soil was wet, his martial speed.

20.

This is the ground whereon the young Nassau, Emuling that day his ancestors' renown, Received his hurt; admiring Belgium saw The youth proved worthy of his destined crown : All tongues his prowess on that day proclaim, And children lisp his praise and bless their Prince's name.

21.

When thou hast reach'd La Haye, survey it well; Here was the heat and centre of the strife;

This point must Britain hold whate'er befell, And here both armies were profuse of life · Once it was lost, — and then a stander by Belike had trembled for the victory.

22.

Not so the leader, on whose equal mind Such interests hung in that momentous day; So well had he his motley troops assign'd,

That where the vital points of action lay, There had he placed those soldiers whom he knew No fears could quail, no dangers could subdue.

23.

Small was his British force, nor had he here The Portugals, in heart so near allied, The worthy comrades of his late career,

Who fought so oft and conquer'd at his side, When with the Red Cross join'd in brave advance, The glorious Quinas mock'd the air of France.

24.

Now of the troops with whom he took the field, Some were of doubtful faith, and others raw;

He station'd these where they might stand or yield; But where the stress of battle he foresaw,

There were his links (his own strong words I speak) And rivets, which no human force could break.

25.

O my brave countrymen, ye answer'd well To that heroic trust! Nor less did ye,

Whose worth your grateful country aye shall tell, True children of our sister Germany,

Who, while she groan'd beneath the oppressor's chain,

Fought for her freedom in the fields of Spain.

26.

La Haye, bear witness! sacred is it hight, And sacred is it truly from that day;

For never braver blood was spent in fight

Than Britain here hath mingled with the clay. Set where thou wilt thy foot, thou scarce canst tread

Here on a spot unhallow'd by the dead.

27.

Here was it that the Highlanders withstood

The tide of hostile power, received its weight With resolute strength, and stemm'd and turn'd the flood;

And fitly here, as in that Grecian strait, The funeral stone might say, Go, traveller, tell Scotland, that in our duty here we fell.

28.

Still eastward from this point thy way pursue. There grows a single hedge along the lane, -

No other is there far or near in view:

The raging enemy essay'd in vain

To pass that line, - a braver foe withstood, And this whole ground was moisten'd with their blood.

29.

Leading his gallant men, as he was wont, The hot assailants' onset to repel,

Advancing hat in hand, here in the front Of battle and of danger, Picton fell;

Lamented Chief! than whom no braver name His country's annals shall consign to fame.

30.

Scheldt had not seen us, had his voice been heard, Return with shame from her disastrous coast:

But Fortune soon to fairer fields preferr'd His worth approved, which Cambria long may boast :

France felt him then, and Pertugal and Spain His honor'd memory will for aye retain.

31.

Hence to the high-wall'd house of Papelot, The battle's boundary on the left, incline ;

Here thou seest Frischermont not far remote, From whence, like ministers of wrath divine,

The Prussians, issuing on the yielding foe, Consummated their great and total overthrow.

32.

Deem not that I the martial skill should boast, Where horse and foot were station'd, here to tell, Bear from ill-cover'd graves a taint of death

What points were occupied by either host, And how the battle raged, and what befell, And how our great Commander's eagle eye, Which comprehended all, secured the victory.

33.

This were the historian's, not the poet's part; Such task would ill the gentle Muse beseem,

Who, to the thoughtful mind and pious heart, Comes with her offering from this awful theme; Content if what she saw and gather'd there She may in unambitious song declare.

34.

Look how upon the Ocean's treacherous face The breeze and summer sunshine softly play, And the green-heaving billows bear no trace

Of all the wrath and wreck of yesterday;-So from the field, which here we look'd upon, The vestiges of dreadful war were gone.

35.

Earth had received into her silent womb Her slaughter'd creatures: horse and man they lay,

And friend and foe, within the general tomb. Equal had been their lot; one fatal day For all, - one labor, - and one place of rest They found within their common parent's breast.

36.

The passing seasons had not yet effaced The stamp of numerons hoofs impress'd by force Of cavalry, whose path might still be traced.

Yet Nature every where resumed her course; Low pansies to the sun their purple gave, And the soft poppy blossom'd on the grave.

37.

In parts the careful farmer had renew'd His labors, late by battle frustrated;

And where the unconscious soil had been imbued With blood, profuscly there like water shed,

There had his ploughshare turn'd the guilty ground,

And the green corn was springing all around.

38.

The graves he left for natural thought humane Untouch'd; and here and there, where in the strife

Contending feet had trampled down the grain, Some hardier roots were found, which of their Tenacious, had put forth a second head, And sprung, and ear'd, and ripen'd on the dead.

39.

Some marks of wreck were scatter'd all around, As shoe, and belt, and broken bandoleer,

And hats which bore the mark of mortal wound; Gun-flints and balls for those who closelier peer;

And sometimes did the breeze upon its breath

More vestige of destructive man was seen Where man in works of peace had labor'd more;

At Hougoumont the hottest strife had been,

Where trees and walls the mournful record bore Of war's wild rage, trunks pierced with many a wound.

And roofs and half-burnt rafters on the ground.

41.

A goodly mansion this, with gardens fair, And ancient groves and fruitful orchard wide, Its dove-cot and its decent house of prayer,

Its ample stalls and garners well supplied, And spacious bartons clean, well-wall'd around, Where all the wealth of rural life was found.

42.

That goodly mansion on the ground was laid, Save here and there a blacken'd, broken wall;

The wounded who were borne beneath its shade Had there been crush'd and buried by the fall;

And there they lie, where they received their doem, —

Oh, let ne hand disturb that honorable temb!

43.

Contiguous to this wreck, the little fane, For worship hallow'd, still uninjured stands,

Save that its Crucifix displays too plain

The marks of outrage from irreverent hands. Alas, to think such irreligious deed

Of wrong from British soldiers should proceed!

44.

The dove-cot too remains; scared at the fight, The birds sought shelter in the forest shade;

But still they kept their native haunts in sight, And, when few days their terror had allay'd, Forseek again the solitary wood, For their old home and human neighborhood.

45.

The gardener's dwelling was untouch'd; his wife

Fled with her children to some near retreat, And there lay trembling for her husband's life : He stood the issue, saw the foe's retreat,

And lives unhart, where thousands fell around, To tell the story of that famous ground.

46.

His generous dog was well approved that hour, By courage as by love to man allied;

He through the fiery storm and iron shower Kept the ground bravely by his master's side; And now, when to the stranger's hand he draws, The noble beast seems conscious of applause.

47.

Toward the grove, the wall with musket-holes Is pierced; our soldiers here their station held

Against the foe; and many were the souls Then from their fleshly tenements expell'd.

Six hundred Frenchmen have been burnt close by, And underneath one mound their bones and ashes

One streak of blood upon the wall was traced, In length a man's just stature from the head There where it gush'd you saw it uneffaced :

Of all the blood which on that day was shed, This mortal stain alone remain'd impress'd,— The all-devouring earth had drunk the rest.

49.

Here, from the heaps who strew'd the fatal plain, Was Howard's corse by faithful hands convey'd,

And, not to be confounded with the slain, llere in a grave apart with reverence laid, Till hence his honor'd relics o'er the seas Were borne to England, there to rest in peace.

50.

Another grave had yielded up its dead, From whence to bear his son a father came, That he might lay him where his own gray head

Erc long must needs be laid. That soldier's name Was not remember'd there, yet may the verse Present this reverent tribute to his hearse.

51.

Was it a soothing or a mournful thought, Amid this scene of slaughter as we stood,

Where armies had with recent fury fought, To mark how gentle Nature still pursued

Her quiet course, as if she took no care For what her noblest work had suffer'd there ?

52.

The pears had ripen'd on the garden wall;

Those leaves which on the autumnal earth were spread,

The trees, though pierced and scarr'd with many a ball,

Had only in their natural season shed :

Flowers were in seed, whose buds to swell began When such wild havock here was made of man !

53.

Throughout the garden, fruits, and herbs, and flowers,

You saw in growth, or ripeness, or decay;

The green and well-trimm'd dial mark'd the hours With gliding shadow as they pass'd away;

Who would have thought, to see this garden fair, Such horrors had so late been acted there !

54.

Now, Hougoument, farewell to thy domain ! Might I dispose of thee, no woodman's hand Should e'er thy venerable groves profane;

Untouch'd, and like a temple should they stand, And, consecrate by general feeling, wave

Their branches o'er the ground where cleep the brave.

55.

Thy ruins, as they fell, should aye remain, — What monument so fit for those below?

Thy garden through whole ages should retain The form and fashion which it weareth now, he.

THE

That future pilgrims here might all things see, Such as they were at this great victory.

IV.

THE SCENE OF WAR.

No cloud the azure vault of heaven distain'd That day when we the field of war survey'd ;

The leaves were falling, but the groves retain'd Foliage enough for beauty and for shade; Soft airs prevail'd, and through the sunny hours The bees were busy on the year's last flowers.

2.

Well was the season with the scene combined. The autumnal sunshine suited well the mood

Which here possess'd the meditative mind, --

A human sense upon the field of blood, A Christian thankfulness, a British pride, Temper'd by solemn thought, yet still to joy allied.

3.

What British heart that would not feel a flow, Upon that ground, of elevating pride?

What British cheek is there that would not glow To hear our country blest and magnified ?—

For Britain here was blest by old and young, Admired by every heart, and praised by every tongue.

4.

Not for brave bearing in the field alone

Doth grateful Belgium bless the British name; The order and the perfect honor shown

In all things, have enhanced the soldier's fame; For this we heard the admiring people raise One universal voice sincere of praise.

5.

Yet with indignant feeling they inquired Wherefore we spared the author of this strife?

Why had we not, as highest law required,

With ignominy closed the culprit's life? For him alone had all this blood been shed, — Why had not vengeance struck the guilty head?

6.

O God! they said, it was a piteous thing To see the after-horrors of the fight,

The lingering death, the hopeless suffering, — What heart of flesh unmoved could bear the sight?

7.

How will ye answer to all after-time For that great lesson which ye fail'd to give ? As if excess of guilt excused the crime,

Black as he is with blood, ye let him live !

Children of evil, take your course henceforth, For what is Justice but a name on earth !

8.

Vain had it been with these in glozing speech Of precedents to use the specious tongue : This might perplex the ear, but fail to reach

The heart, from whence that honest feeling sprung;

And had I dared my inner sense belie,

The voice of blood was there to join them in their ery.

9.

We left the field of battle in such mood

As human hearts from thence should bear away,

And musing thus our purposed route pursued,

Which still through scenes of recent bloodshed lay,

Where Prussia late, with strong and stern delight, Hung on her hated foes to persecute their flight.

10.

No hour for tarriance that, or for remorse ! Vengeance, who long had hunger'd, took her fill, And Retribution held its righteous course : As when in elder time, the Sun stood still On Gibeon, and the Moon above the vale Of Ajalon hung motionless and pale.

11.

And what though no portentous day was given To render here the work of wrath complete;

The Sun, I ween, seem'd standing still in heaven To those who hurried from that dire defeat; And when they pray'd for darkness in their flight, The Moon arose upon them broad and bright.

12.

No covert might they find; the open land, O'er which so late exultingly they pass'd,

Lay all before them and on either hand;

Close on their flight the avengers follow'd fast, And when they reach'd Genappe, and there drew breath,

Short respite found they there from fear and death.

13.

That fatal town betray'd them to more loss ; Through one long street the only passage lay,

And then the narrow bridge they needs must cross Where Dyle, a shallow streamlet, cross'd the way:

For life they fied, — no thought had they but fear, And their own baggage ehok'd the outlet here.

14.

He who had bridged the Danube's affluent stream, With all the unbroken Austrian power in sight, (So had his empire vanish'd like a dream,)

Was by this brook impeded in his flight, — And then what passions did he witness there Rage, terror, excerations, and despair !

THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE.

15.

E.e through the wreek his passage could be made, Three miserable honrs, which seem'd like years, Was he in that ignoble strait delay'd;

The dreadful Prossian's cry was in his ears, Fear in his heart, and in his sonl that hell Whose due rewards he merited so well.

£6.

Foremost again, as he was wont to be

In flight, though not the foremost in the strife, The Tyrant hurried on, of infamy

Regardless, nor regarding onght but life; ---O wretch! without the courage or the faith To die with those whom he had led to death!

17.

Meantime his guilty followers in disgrace, Whose pride forever now was beaten down,

Some in the houses sought a hiding-place; While at the entrance of that fatal town

Others, who yet some show of heart display'd, A short, vain effort of resistance made ; — 18.

Feeble and ill-sustain'd ! — The foe burst through : With unabating heat they search'd around ;

The wretches from their lurking-holes they drew, --

Such merey as the French had given they found; Death had more victims there in that one hour Than fifty years might else have render'd to his power.

19.

Here did we inn upon our pilgrimage, After such day an unfit resting-place :

For who from ghastly thoughts could disengage The hannted mind, when every where the trace Of death was seen, — the blood-stain on the wall, And musket-marks in chamber and in hall!

20.

All talk, too, was of death. They show'd us here The room where Brunswick's body had been laid,

Where his brave followers, bending o'er the bier, In bitterness their vow of vengeanee made;

Where Wellington beheld the slaughter'd Chief, And for a while gave way to manly grief.

21.

- Duhesme, whose crimes the Catalans may tell, Died here; — with sabre strokes the posts are scored,
- Hewn down upon the threshold where he fell, Himself then tasting of the ruthless sword;

A Brunswicker discharged the debt of Spain. And where hedropp'd the stone preserves the stain.

22.

Too much of life hath on thy plains been shed, Brabant! so oft the seene of war's debate ;

But ne'er with blood were they so largely fed As in this rout and wreck; when righteous Fate

Bronght on the French, in warning to all times, A vengeance wide and sweeping as their crimes ;-

23.

Vengeance for Egypt and for Syria's wrong; For Portugal's unutterable woes;

For Germany, who suffer'd all too long

Beneath these lawless, faithless, godless foes; For blood which on the Lord so long had cried,

For Earth oppress'd, and Heaven insulted and defied.

24.

We follow'd from Genappe their line of flight To the Cross Roads, where Britain's sons sustain'd Against such perilous force the desperate fight; Deserving for that field, so well maintain'd, Such fame as for a like devotion's meed The world hath to the Spartan band decreed.

25.

Upon this ground the noble Brunswick died, Led on too rashly by his ardent heart;

Long shall his grateful country tell with pride How manfully he chose the better part; When groaning Germany in chains was bound, He only of her Princes faithful found.

26.

And here right bravely did the German band Once more sustain their well-deserved applanse;

As when, revenging there their native land, In Spain they labor'd for the general cause.

In this most arduous strife none more than they Endured the heat and burden of the day.

27.

Here too we heard the praise of British worth, Still best approved when most severely tried;

Here were broad patches of loose-lying earth, Sufficing searce the mingled bones to hide, ---

And half-uncover'd graves, where one might see The loathliest features of mortality.

28.

Eastward from hence we struck, and reach'd the field

Of Ligny, where the Prussian, on that day By far-outnumbering force constrain'd to yield,

Fronted the foe, and held them still at bay; And in that brave defeat acquired fresh elaim To glory, and enhanced his country's fame.

29.

Here was a seene which fancy might delight To treasure up among her cherish'd stores,

And bring again before the inward sight Often when she recalls the long-pass'd hours;-Well-enltured hill and dale extending wide, Hamlets and village spires on every side;-- 30.

The automnal-tinted groves; the upland mill, Which oft was won and lost amid the fray; Green pastures water'd by the silent rill; The lordly Castle yielding to decay, With bridge and barbican, and moat and tower,

A fairer sight perchance than when it frown'd in power; --

31.

The avenue before its ruin'd gate,

Which, when the Castle, suffering less from time

Than havock, hath foregone its strength and state, Uninjured flourisherh in nature's prime;

To us a grateful shade did it supply,

Glad of that shelter from the noontide sky ; --

32.

The quarries deep, where many a massive block For some Parisian monument of pride,

Hewn with long labor from the granite rock, Lay in the change of fortune cast aside; But rightly with those stones should Prussia build

Her monumental pile on Ligny's bloody field !---

33.

The wealthy village bearing but too plain The dismal marks of recent fire and spoil; Its decent habitants, an active train,

And many a one at work with needful toil On roof or thatch, the ruin to repair, —

May never War repeat such devastation there !

34.

Ill had we done if we had hurried by A scene in faithful history to be famed

Through long succeeding ages; nor may I

The hospitality let pass unnamed, And courteous kindness on that distant ground,

Which, strangers as we were, for England's sake we found.

35.

And dear to England should be Ligny's name; Prussia and England both were proved that day;

Each generous nation so the other's fame

Her ample tribute of applause will pay; Long as the memory of those labors past, Unbroken may their Yair Alliance last!

36.

The tales which of that field I could unfold, Better it is that silence should conceal.

They who had seen them shudder'd while they told Of things so hideous; and they cried with zeal, One man hath caused all this, of men the worst, —

O wherefore have ye spared his head accurst?

37.

It fits not now to tell our farther way Through many a scene by bounteous nature blest,

Nor how we found, where'er our journey lay, An Englishman was still an honor'd guest;

But still upon this point, where'er we went, The indignant voice was heard of discontent.

38.

And hence there lay, too plainly might we see, An ominous feeling upon every heart: What hope of lasting order could there be, They said, where Justice has not had her part? Wisdom doth rule with Justice by her side; Justice from Wisdom none may e'er divide.

39.

The shaken mind felt all things insecure : Accustom'd long to see successful crimes, And helplessly the heavy yoke endure,

They now look'd back upon their fathers' times, Ere the wild rule of Anarchy began,

As to some happier world, or golden age of man.

40.

As they who in the vale of years advance, And the dark eve is closing on their way, When on their mind the recollections glance

Of early joy, and Hone's delightful day, Behold, in brighter hues than those of truth, The light of morning on the fields of youth.

41.

Those who amid these troubles had grown gray, Recurr'd with mournful feeling to the past;

Blest had we known our blessings, they would say; We were not worthy that our bliss should last! Peaceful we were, and flourishing, and free; But madly we required more liberty!

42.

Remorsoless France had long oppress'd the land, And for her frantic projects drain'd its blood; And now they felt the Prussian's heavy hand: He came to aid them; bravely had he stood In their defence; — but oh! in peace how ill The soldier's deeds, how insolent his will!

43.

One general wish prevail'd, — if they might see The happy order of old times restored; Give them their former laws and liberty;

This their desires and secret prayers implored , -Forgetful, as the stream of time flows on, That that which passes is forever gone.

PART II.

THE VISION.

THE TOWER

1.

I THOUGHT upon these things in solitude, And mused upon them in the silent night; The open graves, the recent scene of blood,

Were present to the soul's creative sight; These mournful images my mind possess'd, And mingled with the visions of my rest.

2.

Methought that I was travelling o'er a plain Whose limits, far beyond all reach of sense,

The aching, anxious sight explored in vain.

How 1 came there I could not tell, nor whence; Nor where my melancholy journey lay; Only that soon the night would close upon my way.

3.

Behind me was a dolorous, dreary scene, With huge and mouldering ruins widely spread;

Wastes which had whilome fertile regions been,

Tombs which had lost all record of the dead; And where the dim horizon seem'd to close, Far off the gloomy Pyramids arose.

4.

Full fain would I have known what lay before, But lifted there in vain my mortal eye;

That point with cloud and mist was cover'd o'er, As though the earth were mingled with the sky.

Yet thither, as some power unseen impell'd, My blind, involuntary way I held.

5.

Across the plain innumerable crowds,

Like me, were on their destined journey bent, Toward the land of shadows and of clouds:

One pace they travelled, to one point they went; -

A motley multitude of old and young,

Men of all climes and hues, and every tongue.

6.

Erelong I came upon a field of dead,

- Where heaps of recent carnage fill'd the way; A ghastly sight, --- nor was there where to tread,
- So thickly slaughter'd, horse and man, they lay.

Methought that in that place of death I knew Again the late-seen field of Waterloo.

7.

Troubled I stood, and doubtful where to go;

A cold, damp shuddering ran through all my frame;

Fain would I fly from that dread scene, when, lo ! A voice as from above pronounced my name;

And looking to the sound, by the way-side I saw a lofty structure edified.

8.

Most like it seem'd to that aspiring Tower Which old Ambition rear'd on Babel's plam,

As if he ween'd in his presumptuous power To scale high Heaven, with daring pride profane;

Such was its giddy height; and round and round The spiral steps in long ascension wound.

Its frail foundations upon sand were placed, And round about it mouldering rubbish lay; For easily by time and storms defaced,

The loose materials crumbled in decay; Rising so high, and built so insecure, Ill might such perishable work endure.

10.

I not the less went up, and as I drew

Toward the top, more firm the structure scem'd, With nicer art composed, and fair to view:

- Strong and well-built, perchance, I might have deem'd
- The pile, had I not seen and understood

Of what frail matter form'd, and on what base it stood 11.

There, on the summit, a grave personage Received and welcomed me in courteous guise;

On his gray temples were the marks of age, As one whom years, methought, should render wise.

I saw that thou wert fill'd with doubt and fear, He said, and therefore have I call'd thee here.

12.

Hence from this eminence sublime I see The wanderings of the erring crowd below, And pitying thee in thy perplexity,

Will tell thee all that thou canst need to know To guide thy steps aright. I bent my head As if in thanks, — And who art thou? I said.

13.

He answer'd, I am Wisdom. Mother Earth Me, in her vigor self-conceiving, bore; And as from eldest time I date my birth, Eternally with her shall I endure; Her noblest offspring 1, to whom alone The course of sublunary things is known.

14.

Master ! quoth I, regarding him, I thought That Wisdom was the child divine of Heaven.

15.

Thus while he spake I scann'd his features well; Small but audacions was the Old Man's eye; His countenance was hard, and seem'd to tell

Of knowledge less than of effrontery.

Instruct me then, I said, for thou shouldst know From whence I came, and whither I must go.

I6.

Art thou then one who would his mind perplex. With knowledge bootless even if attain'd?

Fond man! he answer'd; --- wherefore shouldst thou yex

Thy heart with seeking what may not be gain'd?

l.

Regard not what has been, nor what may be; O Child of Earth, this Now is all that toucheth thee !

17.

He who performs the journey of to-day

Cares not if yesterday were shower or sun : . To-morrow let the heavens be what they may, And what recks he? — his wayfare will be done.

Heedless of what hereafter may befall, Live whilst thou livest, for this life is all!

18.

I kept my rising indignation down,

That I might hear what farther he would teach; Yet on my darken'd brow the instinctive frown,

Gathering at that abominable speech,

Maintain'd its place : he mark'd it, and pursued, Tuning his practised tongue to subtle flattery's mood : ---

19.

Do I not know thee, -- that from earliest youth Knowledge hath been thy only heart's desire?

Here seeing all things as they are in truth, I show thee all to which thy thoughts aspire : No vapors here impede the exalted sense, Nor mists of earth attain this eminence.

20.

Whither thy way, thou askest me, and what The region dark whereto thy footsteps tend,

And where, by one inevitable lot,

The course of all yon multitude must end. Take thou this glass, whose perfect power shall aid Thy faulty vision, and therewith explore the shade.

21.

Eager I look'd; but seeing with surprise

That the same darkness still the view o'erspread, Half angrily I turn'd away mine eyes.

Complacent then the Old Man smiled and said, Darkness is all! what more wouldst thou descry? Rest now content, for farther none can spy.

22.

Now mark me, Child of Earth ! he thus pursued; Let not the hypocrites thy reason blind,

And to the quest of some unreal good

Divert with dogmas vain thine erring mind: Learn thou, whate'er the motive they may call, That Pleasure is the aim, and Self the spring of all.

23.

This is the root of knowledge. Wise are they Who to this guiding principle attend;

They, as they press along the world's highway, With single aim pursue their steady end; No rain computation checks their sure creer:

No vain compunction checks their sure career; No idle dreams deceive; their heart is here.

24.

They from the nature and the fate of man, Thus clearly understood, derive their strength; 96 Knowing that as from nothing they began, To nothing they must needs return at length; This knowledge steels the heart and clears the mind,

And they create on earth the Heaven they find.

25.

Such, I made answer, was the Tyrant's creed Who bruised the nations with his iron rod, Till on yon field the wretch received his meed From Britain, and the outstretch'd arm of God. Behold him now, — Death ever in his view, The only change for him, — and Judgment to ensue!

26.

Behold him when the unbidden thoughts arise Of his old passions and unbridled power;

As the fierce tiger in confinement lies,

And dreams of blood that he must taste no more, ---

Then waking in that appetite of rage,

Frets to and fro within his narrow cage.

27.

Hath he not chosen well? the Old Man replied; Bravely he aim'd at universal sway;

And never earthly Chief was glorified Like this Napoleon in his prosperous day. All-ruling Fate itself hath not the power

To alter what has been : and he has had his hour

28.

Take him, I answer'd, at his fortune's flood ;

Russia his friend, the Austrian wars surceased, When Kings, his creatures some, and some subdued,

Like vassals waited at his marriage feast; And Europe like a map before him lay, Of which he gave at will, or took away.

29.

Call then to mind Navarre's heroic chief, Wandering by night and day through wood and glen,

His country's sufferings like a private grief Wringing his heart: would Mina even then Those perils and that sorrow have foregone To be that Tyrant on his prosperons throne?

30.

But wherefore name I him whose arm was free? A living hope his noble heart sustain'd,

A faith which bade him through all dangers see The triumph his enduring country gain'd.

See Hofer with no earthly hope to aid, --

His country lost, himself to chains and death betray'd !

31.

By those he served deserted in his need;

Given to the unrelenting Tyrant's power,

His heart, his conscience, and his sure renown, For the malignant murderer's erimes and erown?

32.

Him too, I know, a worthy thought of fame In that dread tranee upheld; — the foresight sure

That in his own dear country his good name Long as the streams and mountains should endure;

The herdsmen on the hills should sing his praise, And children learn his deeds through all succeeding days.

33.

Turn we to those in whom no glorious thought Lent its strong succor to the passive mind;

Endured their sorrows by the world unknown, And look'd for their reward to Death alone:

34.

Mothers within Gerona's leaguer'd wall, [die; --Who saw their famish'd children pine and Widows surviving Zaragoza's fall

To linger in abhorr'd captivity ; --

Yet would not have exchanged their sacred woe For all the empire of their miscreant foe !

35.

Serene the Old Man replied, and smiled with scorn, Behold the effect of error! thus to wear

The days of miserable life forlorn,

Struggling with evil and consumed with care; — Poor fools, whom vain and empty hopes mislead! They reap their sufferings for their only meed.

36.

O false one, I exclaim'd, whom canst thou fool With such gross sophisms, but the wicked heart?

The pupils of thine own unhappy school Are they who choose the vain and empty part; How oft in age, in sickness, and in woe,

Have they complain'd that all was vanity helow !

37.

Look at that mighty Gaznevide, Mahmood, When, pining in his Palace of Delight,

He bade the gather'd spoils of realms subdued Be spread before him to regale his sight, Whate'er the Orient boasts of rich and rare,—

And then he wept to think what toys they were !

38,

Look at the Russian minion when he play'd With pearls and jewels which surpass'd all price;

And now apart their various hues array'd, Blended their colors now in union nice,

Then, weary of the bawbles, with a sigh, Swept them aside, and thought that all was vanity !

39.

Wean'd by the fatal Messenger from pride, The Syrian through the streets exposed his shroud;

And one that ravaged kingdoms far and wide Upon the bed of sickness cried aloud, What boots my empire in this mortal throe? For the Grave calls me now, and I must go!

40.

Thus felt these wretched men, because decay Had touch'd them in their vitals; Death stood by;

And Reason, when the props of flesh gave way, Purged as with euphrasy the mortal eye.

Who seeks for worldly honors, wealth, or power, Will find them vain indeed at that dread hour !

41.

These things are vain; but all things are not so; The virtues and the hopes of human-kind!-

Yea, by the God who, ordering all below,

In his own image made the immortal mind, Desires there are which draw from Him their birth, And bring forth lasting fruits for Heaven and Earth.

42.

Therefore through evil and through good content, The righteous man performs his part assign'd;

In bondage lingering, or with sufferings spent, Therefore doth peace support the heroic mind; And from the dreadful sacrifice of all, Meek woman doth not shrink at Duty's call.

43.

Therefore the Martyr clasps the stake in faith, And sings thanksgiving while the flames aspire; Victorious over agony and death,

Sublime he stands, and triumphs in the fire, As though to him Elijah's lot were given, And that the chariot and the steeds of Heaven.

Π.

THE EVIL PROPHET.

1.

WITH that my passionate discourse 1 brake; Too fast the thought, too strong the feeling came.

Composed the Old Man listen'd while I spake, Nor moved to wrath, nor capable of shame; And when I ceased, unalter'd was his mien, His hard eye unabash'd, his front serene.

2.

Hard is it error from the mind to weed, He answer'd, where it strikes so deep a root.

Let us to other argument proceed,

And if we may, discover what the fruit Of this long strife, — what harvest of great good The World shall reap for all this cost of blood!

3.

Assuming then a frown as thus he said,

He stretch'd his hand from that commanding height;

Behold, quoth he, where thrice ten thousand dead | And saw his legions, raging from the fight,

Are laid, the victims of a single fight! And thrice ten thousand more at Ligny lie, Slain for the prelude to this tragedy!

4.

This but a page of the great book of war, — A drop amid the sea of human wees! —

Thon canst remember when the Morning Star Of Freedom on rejoicing France arose,

Over her vine-clad hills and regions gay, Fair even as Phosphor, who foreruns the day.

5.

Such and so beautiful that Star's uprise; But soon the glorious dawn was overcast:

A baleful track it held across the skies, Till now, through all its fatal changes past, Its course fulfill'd, its aspects understood,

On Waterloo it hath gone down in blood.

6.

Where now the hopes with which thine ardent youth

Rejoicingly to run its race began? Where now the reign of Liberty and Truth,

The Rights Omnipotent of Equal Man,

The principles should make all discord cease,

And bid poor human-kind repose at length in peace?

7.

Behold the Bourbon to that throne by force Restored, from whence by fury he was cast:

Thus to the point where it began its course, The melancholy cycle comes at last;

8.

The peace which thus at Waterloo ye won, Shall it endure with this exasperate foe?

In gratitude for all that ye have done, Will France her ancient enmity forego?

Her wounded spirit, her envenom'd will Ye know, — and ample means are left her still.

What though the tresses of her strength be shorn; The roots remain untouch'd; and as of old

The bondsman Samson felt his power return To his knit sinews, so shall ye behold

France, like a giant fresh from sleep, arise And rush upon her slumbering enemies.

10.

Woe then for Belgium! for this ill-doom'd land, The theatre of strife through every age!

Look from this eminence, whereon we stand,— What is the region round us but a stage

For the mad pastime of Ambition made, Whereon War's dreadful drama may be play'd?

11.

Thus hath it been from history's earliest light, When yonder by the Sabis Cæsar stood, And saw his legions, raging from the fight, Root out the noble nation they subdued; Even at this day the peasant findeth there The relies of that ruthless massacre.

12.

Need I recall the long religious strife?

Or William's hard-fought fields? or Marlborough's fame,

Here purchased at such lavish price of life, — Or Fontenoy, or Fleurus' later name? Wherever here the foot of man may tread, The blood of man hath on that spot been shed.

13.

Shall then Futurity a happier train Unfold, than this dark picture of the past?

Dreamst thou again of some Saturnian reign, Or that this ill-compacted realm should last? Its wealth and weakness to the foe are known, And the first shock subverts its baseless throne.

14.

O wretched country, better should thy soil Be laid again beneath the invading seas,

Thou goodliest masterpiece of human toil,

If still thou must be doom'd to scenes like these!

O Destiny inexorable and blind !

O miserable lot of poor mankind !

15.

Saying thus, he fix'd on me a searching eye Of stern regard, as if my heart to reach.

Yet gave he now no leisure to reply;

For ere I might dispose my thoughts for speech, The Old Man, as one who felt and understood Ilis strength, the theme of his discourse pursued.

16.

If we look farther, what shall we behold But every where the swelling seeds of ill, Half-smother'd fires, and causes manifold

Of strife to come; the powerful watching still For fresh occasion to enlarge his power, The weak and injured waiting for their hour?

17.

Will the rude Cossack with his spoils bear back The love of peace and humanizing art?

Think ye the mighty Moscovite shall lack Some specious business for the ambitious heart? Or the black Eagle, when she moults her plume, The form and temper of the Dove assume?

18.

From the old Germanic chaos hath there risen A happier order of establish'd things?

And is the Italian Mind from papal prison Set free to soar upon its native wings? Or look to Spain, and let her Despot tell If there thy high-raised hopes are answer'd well !

19.

At that appeal my spirit breathed a groan ; But he triumphantly pursued his speech : O Child of Earth, he cried with loftier tone, The present and the past one lesson teach; Look where thon wilt, the history of man Is but a thorny maze, without a plan '

20

The winds which have in viewless heaven their birth.

The waves which in their fury meet the clouds, The central storms which shake the solid earth,

And from volcanoes burst in fiery floods, Are not more vague, and purportless, and blind, Than is the course of things among mankind !

21.

Rash hands unravel what the wise have spun; Realms which in story fill so large a part,

Rear'd by the strong, are by the weak undone; Barbarians overthrow the works of art,

And what force spares is sapp'd by sure decay,-So earthly things are changed and pass away.

22

And think not thou thy England hath a spell, That she this general fortune should elude;

Easier to crush the foreign foe, than quell The malice which misleads the multitude,

And that dread malady of erring zeal, Which like a cancer cats into the commonweal.

93

The fabric of her power is undermined; The earthquake underneath it will have way, And all that glorious structure, as the wind

Scatters a summer cloud, be swept away ; For Destiny, on this terrestrial ball, Drives on her iron car, and erushes all.

9.1

Thus as he ended, his mysterious form [view. Enlarged, grew dim, and vanish'd from my

At once on all sides rush'd the gather'd storm, The thunders roll'd around, the wild winds blew,

And as the tempest round the summit beat, The whole frail fabric shook beneath my feet.

III.

THE SACRED MOUNTAIN.

1.

Bur then, methought, I heard a voice exclaim, Hither, my Son, oh, hither take thy flight!

A heavenly voice which call'd me by my name,

And bade me hasten from that treacherous height :

The voice it was which I was wont to hear, Sweet as a Mother's to her infant's ear.

I hesitated no, but at the call Sprung from the summit of that tottering tower. Of her abominations, as of yore ;

There is a motion known in dreams to all, When, buoyant by some self-sustaining power, Through air we seem to glide, as if set free From all encumbrance of mortality.

Thus borne aloft, I reach'd the Sacred Hill, And left the scene of tempests far hehind;

But that old tempter's parting language still Press'd like a painful burden on my mind; The troubled soul had lost her inward light, And all within was black as Erebus and Night.

4.

The thoughts which I had known in youth return'd, But, oh, how changed ! a sad and spectral train ; And while for all the miseries past I mourn'd,

And for the lives which had been given in vain, In sorrow and in fear I turn'd mine eye From the dark aspects of futurity.

5.

I sought the thickest woodland's shade profound, As suited best my melancholy mood,

And east myself upon the gloomy ground. When lo ! a gradual radiance fill'd the wood;

A heavenly presence rose upon my view, And in that form divine the awful Muse I knew.

6.

Hath then that Spirit false perplex'd thy heart, O thou of little faith ! severe she cried.

Bear with me, Goddess, heavenly as thou art, Bear with my earthly nature ! I replied,

And let me pour into thine ear my grief; Thou canst enlighten, thou canst give relief.

7.

The ploughshare had gone deep, the sower's hand Had scatter'd in the open soil the grain ;

The harrow, too, had well prepared the land; I look'd to see the fruit of all this pain !-Alas! the thorns and old inveterate weed

Have sprung again, and stifled the good seed.

8.

I hoped that Italy should break her chains, Foreign and papal, with the world's applause, Knit in firm union her divided reigns, And rear a well-built pile of equal laws : Then might the wrongs of Venice be forgiven, And joy should reach Petrarca's soul in Heaven.

9.

I hoped that that abhorr'd Idolatry Had in the strife received its mortal wound : The Souls which from beneath the Altar cry,

At length, I thought, had their just vengeance found ; -

In purple and in searlet elad, behold

The Harlot sits, adorn'd with gems and gold !

10.

The golden cup she bears full to the brim

II.

764

Her eyeballs with inebriate triumph swim; Though drunk with righteous blood, she thirsts for more,

Eager to reassert her influence fell, And once again let loose the Dogs of Hell 11.

Woe for that people, too, who by their path For these late triumphs first made plain the way;

Whom, in the Valley of the Shade of Death, No fears nor fiery sufferings could dismay; Art could not tempt, nor violence enthrall

Their firm devotion, faithful found through all.

12.

Strange race of haughty heart and stubborn will, Slavery they love, and ehains with pride they wear;

Inflexible alike in good or ill,

The inveterate stamp of servitude they bear. Oh fate perverse, to see all change withstood, There only where all change must needs be good !

13.

But them no foe can force, nor friend persuade; Impassive souls in iron forms enclosed,

As though of human mould they were not made, But of some sterner elements composed,

Against offending nations to be sent,

The ruthless ministers of punishment.

14.

Where are those Minas after that eareer Wherewith all Europe rang from side to side?

Had Ferdinand no merey for that life, Exposed so long for him in daily, hourly strife !

15.

From her Athenian orator of old

Greece never listen'd to sublimer strain Than that with which, for truth and freedom bold,

Quintana moved the inmost soul of Spain. What meed is his let Ferdinand declare —

Chains, and the silent dungeon, and despair !

16.

For this hath England borne so brave a part! Spent with endurance, or in battle slain,

Is it for this so many an English heart

Lies mingled with the insensate soil of Spain ! Is this the issue, this the happy birth

In those long throes and that strong agony brought forth !

17.

By the wild hands of bestial Anarchy, -

Then might it seem that He who ordereth all Doth take for sublunary things no care ; --

The burden of that thought is more than I can bear.

18.

Even as a mother listens to her ehild My plaint the Muse divine benignant heard, Then answer'd, in reproving accents mild, What if thou seest the fruit of hope deferr'd;

Dost thou for this in faltering faith repine? A manlier, wiser virtue should be thine !

19.

Ere the good seed can give its fruit in Spain, The light must shine on that bedarken'd land, And Italy must break her papal chain,

Ere the soil answer to the sower's hand; For, till the sons their fathers' fault repent, The old error brings its direful punishment.

20.

Hath not experience bade the wise man see Poor hope from innovations premature?

All sudden ehange is ill: slow grows the tree Which in its strength through ages shall endure.

In that ungrateful earth it long may lie Domant, but fear not that the seed should die.

21.

Falsely that Tempter taught thee that the past Was but a blind, inextricable maze;

Falsely he taught that evil overeast

With gathering tempests these propitious days, That he in subtle snares thy soul might bind, And rob thee of thy hopes for human-kind.

22.

He told thee the beginning and the end Were indistinguishable all, and dark ;

And when from his vain Tower he bade thee bend Thy eurious eye, well knew he that no spark

Of heavenly light would reach the baffled sense; The mists of earth lay round him all too dense.

23.

Must I, as thou hadst chosen the evil part, Tell thee that Man is free and God is good? These primal truths are rooted in thy heart:

But these, being rightly felt and understood,

Should bring with them a hope, ealm, constant, sure,

Patient, and on the rock of faith secure.

24.

The Monitress Divine, as thus she spake, Induced me gently on, ascending still, And thus emerging from that mournful brake

We drew toward the summit of the hill,

And reach'd a green and sunny place, so fair As well with long-lost Eden might compare.

25.

Broad cedars grew around that lovely glade, Exempted from deeay, and never sere,

Their wide-spread boughs diffused a fragrant shade;

The cypress incorruptible was here, With fluted stem and head aspiring high, Nature's proud column, pointing to the sky.

ui.

26.

There, too, the vigorous olive in its pride, As in its own Apulian soil uncheck'd,

Tower'd high, and spread its glaucous foliage wide : With liveliest hues the mead beneath was deck'd,

Gift of that grateful tree that with its root Repays the earth, from whence it feeds its fruit.

27.

There, too, the sacred bay, of brighter green, Exalted its rejoicing head on high;

And there the martyrs' holier palm was seen Waving its plumage as the breeze went by. All fruits which ripen under genial skies Grew there, as in another Paradise.

23.

And over all that lovely glade there grew All wholesome roots and plants of healing power;

The herb of grace, the medicinal rue, The poppy rich in worth as gay in flower;

The heart's-ease that delighteth every eye, And sage divine, and virtuous euphrasy.

29.

Unwounded here Judæa's balm distill'd Its precions juice; the snowy jasmine here Spread its luxuriant tresses wide, and fill'd

With fragrance the delicious atmosphere ; More piercing still did orange-flowers dispense From golden groves the purest joy of sense.

30.

As low it lurk'd the tufted moss between, The violet there its modest perfume shed,

Like humble virtue, rather felt than seen: And here the Rose of Sharon rear'd its head, The glory of all flowers, to sense and sight Yielding their full contentment of delight.

31.

A gentle river wound its quiet way Through this sequester'd glade, meandering wide;

Smooth as a mirror here the surface lay, Where the pure lotus, floating in its pride, Enjoy'd the breath of heaven, the sun's warm beam,

And the cool freshness of its native stream.

32.

Here, o'er green weeds, whose tresses waved outspread,

With silent lapse the glassy waters run ; llere, in fleet motion o'er a pebbly bed,

Gliding they glance and ripple to the sun; The stirring breeze that swept them in its flight, Raised on the stream a shower of sparkling light.

33.

And all sweet birds sung there their lays of love; The mellow thrush, the blackbird loud and shrill,

The rapturous nightingale that shook the grove, Made the ears vibrate, and the heart-strings thrill;

The ambitious lark, that, soaring in the sky, Pour'd forth her lyric strain of ecstasy. Sometimes, when that wild chorus intermits, The linnet's song was heard amid the trees,

A low, sweet voice; and sweeter still, at fits The ringdove's wooing came upon the breeze;

While with the wind which moved the leaves among,

The murmuring waters join'd in undersong.

35.

The hare disported here, and fear'd no ill, For never evil thing that glade came nigh;

The sheep were free to wander at their will, As needing there no earthly shepherd's eye;

The bird sought no concealment for her nest,

So perfect was the peace wherewith those bowers were blest.

36.

All blending thus with all in one delight,

The soul was soothed, and satisfied, and fill'd; This mingled bliss of sense, and sound, and sight,

The flow of boisterous mirth might there have still'd,

And, sinking in the gentle spirit deep,

Have touch'd those strings of joy which make us weep.

37.

Even thus in earthly gardens had it been, If earthly gardens might with these compare ;

But more than all such influences, I ween, There was a heavenly virtue in the air,

Which laid all vain, perplexing thoughts to rest, And heal'd, and calm'd, and purified the breast.

38.

Then said I to that guide divine, My soul, When here we enter'd, was o'ercharged with grief;

For evil doubts, which I could not control, Beset my troubled spirit. This relief, ---

This change, --- whence are they? Almost it might seem

I never lived till now : - all else had been a dream.

39.

My heavenly teacher answer'd, Say not seem; — In this place all things are what they appear;

And they who feel the past a feverish dream, Wake to reality on entering here.

These waters are the Well of Life, and lo!

The Rock of Ages there, from whence they flow

40.

Saying thus, we came upon an inner glade, The holiest place that human eyes might see;

For all that vale was like a temple made By Nature's hand, and this the sanctuary; Where, in its bed of living rock, the Rood

Of Man's redemption firmly planted stood.

41.

And at its foot the never-failing Well Of Life profusely flow'd that all might drink.

Most blessed Water ! Neither tongue can tell	49.
The blessedness thereof, nor heart can think, Save only those to whom it hath been given	She took me by the hand, and on we went; Hope urged me forward, and my soul was strong.
To taste of that divinest gift of Heaven.	With winged speed we scaled the steep ascent,
	Nor seen'd the labor difficult or long,
42.	Ere on the summit of the sacred hill
There grew a goodly Tree this Well beside ; -	Upraised I stood, where I might gaze my fill.
Behold a branch from Eden planted here, Pluelt'd from the Tree of Knowledge said my	50.
Pluck'd from the Tree of Knowledge, said my guide.	Below me lay, unfolded like a scroll,
O Child of Adam, put away thy fear, -	The boundless region where I wauder'd late,
In thy first father's grave it hath its root;	Where I might see realms spread and oceans roll,
Taste thou the bitter, but the wholesome fruit.	And mountains from their cloud-surmounting
43.	state
In awe I heard, and trembled, and obey'd:	Dwarf'd like a map beneath the excursive sight, So ample was the range from that commanding
The bitterness was even as of death;	height.
I felt a cold and piercing thrill pervade
My loosen'd limbs, and losing sight and breath,	51.
To earth I should have fallen in my despair,	Eastward with darkness round on every side,
Had I not clasp'd the Cross, and been supported there.	An eye of light was in the farthest sky.
mere.	Lo, the beginning!
44.	Comes from lost Eden, from the primal land
My heart, I thought, was bursting with the force	Of man " waved over hy the fiery brand."
Of that most fatal fruit; soul-sick I felt,	10
And tears ran down in such continuous course,	52.
As if the very eyes themselves should melt. But then I heard my heavenly teacher say,	Look now toward the end! no mists obscure, Nor clouds will there impede the strengthen'd
Drink, and this mortal stound will pass away.	sight;
1	Unblench'd thine eye the vision may endure.
45.	I look'd, - surrounded with effulgent light
I stoop'd and drank of that divinest Well,	More glorious than all glorious hues of even,
Fresh from the Rock of Ages where it ran, It had a heavenly quality to quell	The Angel Death stood there in the open Gate of Ileaven.
My pain : - I rose a renovated man,
And would not now, when that relief was known,
For worlds the needful suffering have foregone.
46.	IV.
Even as the Eagle (ancient storyers say)	THE HOPES OF MAN.
When, faint with years, she feels her flagging wing,	1.
Soars up toward the mid sun's piercing ray,	Now, said my heavenly Teacher, all is clear !
Then, fill'd with fire, into some living spring	Bear the Beginning and the End in mind,
Plunges, and casting there her aged plumes, The vigorous strength of primal youth resumes; —	The course of human things will then appear Beneath its proper laws; and thou wilt find,
The right of brinding out resultes,	Through all their seeming labyrinth, the plan
47.	Which " vindicates the ways of God to Man."
Such change in me that blessed Water wrought;
The bitterness which, from its fatal root,
The Tree derived, with painful healing fraught, Pass'd clean away: and in its place the fruit	Free choice doth Man possess of good or ill;
Pass'd clean away; and in its place the fruit Produced, by virtue of that wondrous wave,	All were but mockery else. From Wisdom's way, Too oft, perverted by the tainted will,
The savor which in Paradise it gave.	Is his rebellious nature drawn astray;
	Therefore an inward monitor is given,
48.	A voice that answers to the law of Heaven.
Now, said the heavenly Muse, thou mayst ad-	3.
vance, Fitly prepared toward the mountain's beight.	Frail as he is, and as an infant weak.

O Child of Man, this necessary trauce

Hath purified from flaw thy mortal sight, That, with scope unconfined of vision free, Thou the beginning and the end mayst see.

The knowledge of his weakness is his strength;

For succor is vouchsafed to those who seek In humble faith sincere; and when at length Death sets the disimbodied spirit free, According to their deeds their lot shall be.

ш.

Thus, should the chance of private fortune raise A transitory doubt, Death answers all.

And in the scale of nations, if the ways Of Providence mysterious we may call, Yet, rightly view'd, all history doth impart Comfort, and hope, and strength to the believing heart.

5.

For through the lapse of ages may the course Of moral good progressive still be seen,

Though mournful dynasties of Fraud and Force, Dark Vice and purblind Ignorance intervene; Empires and Nations rise, decay and fall, But still the Good survives and perseveres through all.

Yca, even in those most lamentable times, When, every where to wars and wocs a prey, Earth seem'd but one wide theatre of crimes,

Good unperceived had work'd its silent way, And all those dread convulsions did but clear The obstructed path to give it free career.

7.

But deem not thou some overruling Fate, Directing all things with benign decree,

Through all the turnoil of this mortal state, Appoints that what is best shall therefore be; Even as from man his future doom proceeds, So nations rise or fall according to their deeds.

Light at the first was given to human-kind, And Law was written in the human heart.

If they forsake the Light, perverse of mind, And wilfully prefer the evil part, Then to their own devices are they left,

By their own choice of Heaven's support bereft.

9.

The individual culprit may sometimes Unpunish'd to his after-reckoning go:

Not thus collective man, — for public crimes Draw on their proper punishment below ; When Nations go astray, from age to age

The effects remain, a fatal heritage.

10.

Bear witness, Egypt, thy huge monuments Of priestly fraud and tyranny austere ! Bear witness thou, whose only name presents

All holy feelings to religion dear, —

In Earth's dark circlet once the precious gen Of living light, — O fallen Jerusalem !

11.

See barbarous Africa, on every side

To error, wretchedness, and crimes resign'd ! Behold the vicious Orient, far and wide

Enthrall'd in slavery! As the human mind Corrupts and goes to wreck, Earth sickens there, And the contagion taints the ambient air. They had the Light, and from the Light ver turn'd;

What marvel if they grope in darkness lost? They had the Law; — God's natural Law they scorn'd,

And choosing error, thus they pay the cost ! Wherever Falsehood and Oppression reign, There degradation follows in their train.

13.

What, then, in these late days had Europe been, This moral, intellectual heart of earth, —

From which the nations who lie dead in sin Should one day yet receive their second birth, → To what had she been sunk if brutal Force Had taken unrestrain'd its impious course '

14.

The Light had been extinguish'd, -- this, be sure, The first wise aim of conscious Tyranny,

Which knows it may not with the Light endure -But where Light is not, Freedom cannot be; "Where Freedom is not, there no Virtue is;"

Where Virtue is not, there no Happiness.

15.

If among hateful Tyrants of all times For endless exceration handed down, One may be found surpassing all in crimes, One that for infamy should bear the crown, Napoleon is that man, in guilt the first, Preeminently bad among the worst.

16.

For not, like Scythian conquerors, did he tread From his youth up the common path of blood. Nor like some Eastern Tyrant was he bred In sensual harems, ignorant of good; — Their vices from the circumstance have grown ' His, by deliberate purpose, were his own.

17.

Not led away by circumstance he crr'd, But from the wicked heart his error came :

By Fortune to the highest place preferr'd, He sought through evil means an evil aim, And all his ruthless measures were design'd To enslave, degrade, and brutalize mankind.

18.

Some barbarous dream of empire to fulfil, Those iron ages he would have restored,

When Law was but the ruffian soldier's will, Might govern'd all, the sceptre was the sword,

And Peace, not elsewhere finding where to dwell, Sought a sad refuge in the convent-cell.

19.

Too far had he succeeded ! In his mould An evil generation had been framed,

By no religion temper'd or controll'd, By foul examples of all crimes inflamed, Of faith, of honor, of compassion void ; —

Such were the fitting agents he employ'd.

20.

Believing as yon lying Spirit taught, They to that vain philosophy held fast,

And trusted that, as they began from nought, To nothing they should needs return at last; Hence no restraint of conscience, no remorse, But every baleful passion took its course.

2I.

And had they triumph'd, Earth had once again, To Violence subdued, and impious Pride,

Verged to such state of wickedness, as when The Giantry of old their God defied,

And Heaven, impatient of a world like this, Open'd its flood-gates, and broke up the abyss.

22.

That danger is gone hy. On Waterloo

The Tyrant's fortune in the scale was weigh'd, — His fortune and the World's, — and England threw Her sword into the balance — down it sway'd:

And when in battle first he met that foe, There he received his mortal overthrow.

23.

O my brave Countrymen, with that I said, — For then my heart with transport overflow'd, –

O Men of England! nobly have ye paid The debt which to your ancestors ye owed, And gather'd for your children's heritage A glory that shall last from age to age!

24.

And we did well when on our Mountain's height For Waterloo we raised the festal flame,

And in our triumph taught the startled night To ring with Wellington's victorious name,

Making the far-off mariner admire To see the crest of Skiddaw plumed with fire.

25.

The Moon who had in silence visited His lonely summit from the birth of time,

That hour an unavailing splendor shed, Lost in the effulgence of the flame sublime, In whose broad blaze rejoicingly we stood, And all below a depth of blackest solitude.

26.

Fit theatre for this great joy we chose; For never since above the abating Flood

Emerging, first that pinnacle arose,

Had cause been given for deeper gratitude, For prouder joy to every English heart, When England had so well perform'd her ardnous part.

27.

The Muse replied with gentle smile benign, --Well mayst thou praise the land that gave thee birth,

And bless the Fate which made that country thine ; For of all ages and all parts of earth,

To choose thy time and place did Fate allow, Wise choice would be this England and this Now. And populous hamlets rise amid the wild.

97

28.

From bodily and mental bondage, there Hath Man his full emancipation gain'd; The viewless and illimitable air

Is not more free than Thought; all unrestrain'd, Nor pined in want, nor sunk in sensual sloth, There may the immortal Mind attain its growth.

29.

There, under Freedom's tutelary wing, Deliberate Courage fears no human foe; There, undefiled, as in their native spring,

The living waters of Religion flow; There, like a beacon, the transmitted Light, Conspicuous to all nations, burneth bright.

30.

The virtuous will she hath, which should aspire To spread the sphere of happiness and light; She hath the power to answer her desire, The wisdom to direct her power aright; The will, the power, the wisdom thus combined, What glorious prospects open on mankind !

31.

Behold ! she cried, and lifting up her hand, The shaping elements obey 'd her will ; — A vapor gather'd round our lofty stand, Roll'd in thick volumes o'er the Sacred Hill ; Descending then, its surges far and near Fill'd all the wide subjacent atmosphere.

32.

As I have seen from Skiddaw's stony height The fleecy clouds seud round me on their way, Condense beneath, and hide the vale from sight,

Then, opening, just disclose where Derwent lay Burnish'd with sunshine like a silver shield,

Or old Enchanter's glass, for magic forms fit field ;--

33.

So at her will, in that receding sheet Of mist wherewith the world was overlaid,

A living picture moved beneath our feet. A spacious City first was there display'd, The seat where England from her ancient reign Doth rule the Ocean as her own domain.

34.

In splendor with those famous cities old, Whose power it hath surpass'd, it now might vie;

Through many a bridge the wealthy river roll'd; Aspiring columns rear'd their heads on high; Triumphal arches spann'd the roads, and gave Due guerdon to the memory of the brave.

35.

A landscape follow'd, such as might compare With Flemish fields for well-requited toil:

The wonder-working hand had every where Subdued all eircumstance of stubborn soil; In fen and moor reelaim'd, rieh gardens smiled, And populous hamlets ruse amid the wild.

36.

There the old seaman, on his native shore, Enjoy'd the competence deserved so well; The soldier, his dread occupation o'er,

Of well-rewarded service loved to tell;

The gray-hair'd laborer there, whose work was done,

In comfort saw the day of life go down.

37.

Such was the lot of eld; for childhood there The duties which belong to life was taught:

The good seed, early sown and nursed with care, This bounteous harvest in its season brought; Thus youth for manhood, manhood for old age Prepared, and found their weal in every stage.

38.

Enough of knowledge unto all was given In wisdom's way to guide their steps on earth,

And make the immortal spirit fit for heaven.

This needful learning was their right of birth; Further might each, who chose it, persevere; No mind was lost for lack of culture here.

39.

In sunny days, when sweetest flowers are rife, Fill fields and gardens with their murmuring. Oh joy to see the State in perfect health !

Her numbers were her pride, and power, and wealth.

40.

Then saw I, as the magic picture moved, Her shores enrich'd with many a port and pier;

No gift of liberal Nature unimproved. The seas their never-failing harvest here Supplied, as bounteous as the air which fed Israel, when manna fell from heaven for bread.

41.

Many a tall vessel in her harbors lay, About to spread its canvass to the breeze, Bound upon happy errand to convey

The adventurous colonist beyond the seas, Foward those distant lands where Britain blest With her redundant life the East and West.

42.

The landscape changed ; --- a region next was seen, Where sable swans on rivers yet unfound

Glided through broad savannahs ever green; Innumerous flocks and herds were feeding round, And scatter'd farms appear'd, and hamlets fair, And rising towns, which made another Britain there.

43.

Then, thick as stars which stud the moonless sky, Green islands in a peaceful sea were seen;

Darken'd no more with blind idolatry, Nor curst with hideous usages obscene,

But heal'd of leprous crimes, from butchering strife

Deliver'd, and reclaim'd to moral life

44.

Around the rude Morai, the temple now Of truth, hosannahs to the Holiest rung: There, from the Christian's equal marriage-vow,

In natural growth, the household virtues sprung; Children were taught the paths of heavenly peace, And age in hope look'd on to its release.

45.

The light those happy Islanders enjoy'd,

Good messengers from Britain had convey d; (Where might such bounty wiselier be employ'd?)

One people with their teachers were they made, Their arts, their language, and their faith the same.

And, blest in all, for all they blest the British name.

46.

Then rose a different land, where loftiest trees High o'er the grove their fan-like foliage rear; Where spicy bowers upon the passing breeze

Diffuse their precious fragrance far and near; And yet untaught to bend his massive knee, Wisest of brutes, the elephant roams free.

47.

Ministrant there to health and public good, The busy axe was heard on every side,

Opening new channels, that the noxious wood With wind and sunshine might be purified, And that wise Government, the general friend, Might every where its eye and arm extend.

48.

The half-brutal Bedah came from his retreat, To human life by human kindness won; The Cingalese beheld that work complete

Which Holland in her day had well begun ; The Candian, prospering under Britain's reign, Blest the redeeming hand which broke his chain.

49.

Colors and castes were heeded there no more; Laws which depraved, degraded, and oppress'd, Were laid aside, for on that happy shore

All men with equal liberty were blest; And through the land, the breeze upon its swells Bore the sweet music of the Sabbath bells.

50.

Again the picture changed; those Isles I saw With every crime through three long centuries curst,

While unrelenting Avarice gave the law;

Scene of the injured Indians' sufferings first, Then doom'd, for Europe's lasting shame, to see The wider-wasting guilt of Slavery.

51.

That foulest blot had been at length effaced ; Slavery was gone, and all the power it gave,

Whereby so long our nature was debased, Baleful alike to master and to slave.

O lovely Isles! ye were indeed a sight To fill the spirit with intense delight!

NOTES TO THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE

52.

For willing industry and cheerful toil Perform'd their easy task, with Hope to aid;

And the free children of that happy soil

Dwelt each in peace beneath his cocoa's shade ; — A race who with the European mind The adapted mould of Africa combined.

53.

Anon, methought that in a spacious Square, Of some great town the goodly ornament,

Three statutes I beheld, of sculpture fair :

These, said the Muse, are they whom one consent Shall there deem worthy of the purest fame; — Knowest thou who best such gratitude may claim?

54.

Clarkson, I answer'd, first; whom to have seen And known in social hours may be my pride,

Such friendship being praise; and one, I ween, Is Wilberforce, placed rightly at his side,

Whose eloquent voice in that great cause was heard

So oft and well. But who shall be the third?

55.

Time, said my Teacher, will reveal the name Of him who with these worthies shall enjoy

The equal honor of enduring fame; ---

He who the root of evil shall destroy, And from our Laws shall blot the accursed word Of Slave, shall rightly stand with them preferr'd.

56.

Enough! the Goddess cried : with that the cloud Obey'd, and closed upon the magic scene :

Thus much, quoth she, is to thine hopes allow'd; Ills may impede, delays may intervene,

But scenes like these the coming age will bless, If England but pursue the course of righteousness.

57.

On she must go progressively in good,

In wisdom and in weal, — or she must wane. Like Ocean, she may have her ebb and flood,

But stagnates not. And now her path is plain : Heaven's first command she may fulfil in peace, Replenishing the earth with her increase.

58.

Peace she hath won, — with her victorious hand Hath won through rightful war auspicious peace;

Nor this alone, but that in every land The withering rule of violence may cease. Was ever War with such blest victory crown'd? Did ever Victory with such fruits abound?

59.

Rightly for this shall all good men rejoice, They most who most abhor all deeds of blood ;

Rightly for this with reverential voice

Exalt to Heaven their hymns of gratitude ; For ne'er till now did Heaven thy country bless With such transcendent cause for joy and thankfulness. 60

If they in heart all tyranny abhor,

This was the fall of Freedom's direst foe; If they detest the impious lnst of war,

Here hath that passion had its overthrow; — As the best prospects of mankind are dear, Their joy should be complete, their prayers of praise sincere.

61.

And thou to whom in spirit at this hour The vision of thy Country's bliss is given,

Who feelest that she holo. Yer trusted power To do the will and spread the word of Heaven, — Hold fast the faith which animates thy mind, And in thy songs proclaim the hopes of human-kind.

NOTES.

PART I.

The second day was that when Martel broke The Mussulmen. - I. 3, p. 749.

Upon this subject Miss Plumptre relates a remarkable anecdote, in the words of one of the sufferers at Lyons: --

"At my entranca into the prison of the Recluse I found about twelve hundred of my fellow-citizens already immured there, distributed in different apartments. The doom of four fifths of them at least was considered as inevitable ; it was less a prison than a fold, where the innocent sheep patiently waited the hour that was to carry them to the revolutionary shumbles. In this dreary abode, how long, how tedious did the days appear! they seemed to have many more than twenty-four hours. Yet we were allowed to read and write, and were composed enough to avail ourselves of this privilege ; nay, we could sometimes even so far forget our situation as to sport and gambol together. The continued images of destruction and devastation which we had before our eyes, the little hope that appeared to any of us of escaping our menaced fate, so familiarized us with the idea of death, that a stoical screnity had taken possession of our minds : we had been kept in a state of fear till the sentiment of fear was lost. All our conversation bore the character of this disposition : it was reflective, but not complaining; it was serious without being melancholy; and often presented novel and striking ideas. One day, when we were conversing on the inevitable chain of events, and the irrevocable order of things, on a sudden one of our party exclaimed that we owed all our misfortunes to Charles Martel. We thought him raving; but thus he reasoned to prove his hypothesis. 'Had not Charles Martel,' said he, ' conquered the Saracens, these latter, already masters of Guienne, of Saintonge, of Perigord, and of Poiton, would suon have extended their dominion over all France, and from that time we should have had no more religious quarrels, no more state disputes ; we should not now have assemblies of the people, clubs, committees of public safety, sieges, imprisonments, bloody executions.' To this man the Turkish system of government appeared preferable to the revolutionary regime; and, all chances calculated, he preferred the bow-string of the Bashaw, rarely drawn, to the axe of the guillotine, incessantly at work."

That old siege - I. 10, p. 750.

"It is uncertain what numbers were slain during the siege of Ostend, yet it is said that there was found in a commissary's pocket, who was slain before Ostend the 7th of August, before the yielding thereof, divers remarkable notes and observations, and among the rest what number died without in the archduke's camp, of every degree.

Masters of the camp	7
Colonels	15
Sergeants Maiors	29
Coptaines	565
Lieutenants	1116
Ensignes	322
Sergeants	1911
Corporals	1166
Lanspisadoes	600
Soldiers	34 66 3
Marriners	611
Women and children	119

All which amount to 72124 persons; which number is not so great, considering the long siego, sickness, and the cold winters upon the sea coast, in so cold a climate, fighting against the elements. It is unknown what number died in the town, the which is thought much less, for that there were not so many in the town, and they were better lodged, had more base, and were better victualled." — GRIMESTONE'S Hist. of the Netherlands, p. 1317.

"The hesieged in Ostend had certain adventuring soldiers whom they called Lopers, of the which, among other captains, were the young captain Grenu, and captain Adam Van Leest. Their arms which they bore were a long and great pike, with a flat head at the neather end thereof, to the end that it should not sink too deep into the mud, a harquebuse huog in a searf, as we have said of Frebuters, a coutclas at his side, and his dagger about his neck, who would usually leap over a ditch four and twenty foot broad, skirmishing often with his enemy so as no horsenan could overtake them before they had leapt over the ditches againe." — Ibid. 1290.

"In remembrance of the long siege of Ostend, and the winning of Sluce, there were certaine counters made in the United Provinces, both of silver and copper, the one having on the one side the picture of Ostend, and on the other the towns of Rhinherg, Grave, Sluce, Ardenbourg, and the forts of Isendyke and Cadsant, with this inscription round about. 'Plus triennie obsessa, bosti rudera, patriæ quatuor ez me urbes dedi. Anno 1604.' Ostend being more than three years besieged, gave the enemie a heap of stones, and to her native country four townes.

"The town of Utrecht did also make a triumphant piece of coyne both of gold and silver, where on the one side stood the siege of Ostend, and on the other the siege of Sluce, and all the forts and havens, and on both sides round about was graven,

'Jehovah prius dederat plus quam perdidimus.' "

Ibid. 1318.

Many a rich vessel, from the injurious sea, Enter the bosom of thy quiet quay. - I. 12, p. 750.

These lines are borrowed from Quarles; — the passage in which they occur would be very pleasing if he had not disfigured it in a most extraordinary manner.

Saile gentle Pinnace ! now the heavens are clear, The winds blow fair : behold the harbor's near. Tridented Neptune bath forgot to frown, The rocks are past ; the storme is overblown. Up weather-beaten voyagers and rouze ye, Forsake your loathed Cabbins ; up and louze ye Upon the open decks, and smell the land: Cheare up, the welcome shoare is nigh at hand. Saile gentle Pinnace with a prosperous gale To the Isle of Peace : saile gentle Pinnace saile ! Fortune conduct thee ; let thy keele divide The silver streames, that thou maist safely slide Into the bosom of thy quiet Key, And quiet thee fairly of the injurious Sea. Quantes's Argalus & Parthena.

Bruges. - I, 14, p. 750.

Urbs est ad miraculum pulchra, potens, amana, says Luigi Gnicciardini. Its power is gone by, but its beauty is perhaps more impressive now than in the days of its splendor and prosperity.

M. Paquet Syphorien, and many writers after him, mention the preservation of the nonuments of Charles the Bold, and his daughter Mary of Bargundy, wife to the Archduke Maximilian; but they do not mention the name of the Bead ew lo preserved them at the imminent risk of his own life. Pierre Dezitter is this person's name. During the revolutionary frenzy, when the noh seemed to take most pleasure in destroying whatever was most venerable, he took these splendid tombs to pieces and buried them during the night, for which he was proscribed and a reward of 2000 franes set upon his head. Bonaparte, after his matriage into the Austrian family, rewarded him with 1000 franes, and gave 10,000 for ornamenting the chapel in which the tombs were replaced. This has been done with little taste.

The Beguines. Helyot is mistaken when he says (t. viii, p. 6) that the Beguinage at Mechlin is the finest in all Flanders; it is not comparable to that at Ghent, which for extent and beauty may be called the Capital of the community.

...... Alost, Where whilome treachery stain'd the English name. I. 41, p. 752

In 1583, " the English garrison of Alost being mutinied for their puy, the Ganthois did not only refuse to give it them, but did threaten to force them out, or else to famish them. In the mean time the Prince of Parma did not let slip this opportunity to make his profit thereby, but did solicit them hy fair words and promises to pay them ; and these English companies, not accustomed to endure hunger and want, began to give ear unto him, for that their Colonel Sir John Norris and the States were somewhat slow to provide for their pay, for the which they intended to give order, but it was too late. For after that the English had chased away the rest of the garrison which were of the country, then did Captain Pigot, Vincent, Tailor, and others, agree to deliver up the town unto the Spaniard, giving them for their pay, which they received, thirty thousand pistolets. And so the said town was delivered unto the Spaniard in the beginning of December, and filled with Wallons. Most of these English went to serve the Prince of Purma in his camp before Eckloo, but finding that he trusted them not, they ran in a manner all away." - GRIMESTONE, 833.

It is one proof of the improved state of general feeling in the more civilized states of Europe, that instances of this kind of treachery have long since ceased even to be suspected. During the long wars in the Netherlands, nothing was more common than for officers to change their party, — considering war as a mere profession, in which their services, ike those of a lawyer, were for the hest bidder.

Then saw we Afflighem, by ruin rent. - I. 42, p. 752.

This magnificent Abbey was destroyed during the Revolution, — an act of popular madress which the people in its vicinity now spoke of with unavailing regret. The library was at one time the richest in Brabant; "celeberrima," Luigi Guiceiardini calls it, "adeo quidem, ut quod ad libros antiquos habatur pro locupletissima simul et landatissima universa istins tractus." The destruction of books during the Revolution was deplorably great. A bookseller at Brussels told me he had himself at one time sent off five and tweaty wagon-loads for waste paper, and sold more than 100,000h, weight for the same purpose! In this manner were the convent-libraries destroved.

Assche, for water and for cakes renown'd. - 1. 44, p. 752.

The Flemish name of chese said cakes has a marvellously uncouth appearance — suyker-kockrkcns, — novertheless they are good cakes, and are sold by Judocus de Bisschop, at the sign of the Moor, next door to the Auberge la Tête-de-Bauf. This information is for those whom it may concern.

One of our coachmen, who had been employed (like all his fraternity) in removing the wounded, asked us what was the meaning of the English word O Lord! for thus, he sold, the wounded were continually crying out.

Brabant in all her cities felt the sound. - H. 15, p. 753.

The battle of the 18th was heard throughout the whole of Brabant, and in some directions far beyond it. It was distinetly heard at Herve; and I have heen assured, incredible as it may seem, that it was perceived at Amieos. The firing on the 16th was heard at Antwerp, — not that of the 18th, though the scene of action was nearer.

Here Castanaca rear'd a votive fane. --- 111. 4, p. 753.

The following dedicatory inscription is placed over the portice of Waterloo Church : —

D. O. M. Et D. D. Josepho et Anaæ Hoc Sacellum Pro Desiderata Dominiis Catholicis Caroli. 2. Hisp. Ind. Regis Belg. Principis Prosapia Fran. Ant. Agurto Marchio de Castanaca Belg. Guberntor.

Carlos II. of Spain, one of the most wretched of men, married for his first wife Marie Louise, Lowis the Fourteenth's aiece. A cutious instance of the public anxiety that she should produce an heir to the throne is preserved by Florez in his Memorias de las Reynas Catholicas. When she had heen merried two years without issue, this strange epigram, if so it mey be called, wes circulated.

> Parid bella Flor de Lıs En affliccion tan estrana : Si paris, paris d Espana, Si no paris, d Paris.

Florez describes the dress of the bride at her esponsals; it was a robe of murray velvet embroidcred with fleurs de lys of gold trimmed with ermine and jewels, and with a train of seven ells long; the princesses of the blood had all long trains, but not so long, the length being according to their proximity to the throne. The description of a Queen's dress accorded well with the antiquarian pursuits of Florez ; but it is amusing to observe some of the expressions of this laborious writer, a munk of the most rigid habits, whose life was spent in severe study, and in practices of mortification. In her head-dress, he says, she wore porcelain pins which supported large diamonds, - y convertian en ciclo aquel poco de tierra : and at the ball after the espousals, el Christianissimo danzo con la Catholica. These appellations sound almost as oddly as Messrs, Bogue and Bennett's description of St. Paul in a minuet, and Timothy at a card-table.

This puor Queen lived eight years with a husband whose mind and body were equally debilitated. Never were the miscrises of a mere state-marriage more lamentably exemplified. In her last illness, when she was advised to implore the prayers of a personage who was living in the odor of sanctity for her recovery, she replied, Certainly I will not ; - it would be folly to ask for a life which is worth so little. And when, toward the last, her Confessor inquired if any thing troubled her, her answer was that she was in perfect peace, and rejoiced that she was dying, — en paz me hallo Padre, y may gustos de morir. She died on the 12th of February; and such was the solicitude for an heir to the monarchy, that on the 15th of May a second marriage was concluded for the King.

NOTES TO THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE.

D. O. M. Ici repose le Colonel De Langrehr, Commandur. le premier Bataillon de Bremen, Blessé à Mort à la Battaile de Waterloo, le 18 June, 1815, et enterré le lendemuin, agé, de 40 ans. R. I. P.

Lord Uxbridge's leg is buried in a garden opposite to the inn, or rather public-house, at Waterloo. The owner of the house in which the amputation was performed considers it as a relic which has fallen to his share. He had deposited it at first behind the house; but as he intended to plant a tree upon the spot, he considered, that as the ground there was not his own property, the boys might injure or destroy the tree, and therefore he removed the leg into his own garden, where it lies in a proper sort of coffin, under a mound of earth about three or four feet in diameter. A tuft of Michaelmas daisies was in blossom upon this mound when we were at Waterloo; but this was a temporary ornament: in November the owner meant to plant a weeping willow there. He was obliging enough to give me a copy of an epituph which he had prepared, and which, he said, was then in the stone-cutter's hands. It is as follows : --

Ci est enterrée la Jambe de l'Alvstre, brave, et vaillant Comte Urbrudge, Lieutenant-Général, Commandant en Chef la Cavaleric Anglosse, Belge, et Hollamhoise; blessé le 18 Juin, 1815, a la mémorable bataille de Waterloo; qui par son héroisme a concouru au trimmphe de la cause du Genre humain, glorieusement décidée par l'éclatante victoire du ult jour

When Marlborough here, victorious in his might, Surprised the French, and smote them in their flight. HI. 11, p. 754.

A detachment of the French was intrenched at Waterloo Chapel, August, 1705, when the Dake of Marlborough advanced to attack the French army at Over Ysche, and this detachment was destroyed with great slaughter. (*Echard's Gaz*etter.) The Sieur La Lande says, "on donne la chasse à un parte François qui étoit d'Waterloo." Marlborough was prevented by the Deputies of the States from pursuing his advantage, and attacking the enemy, at a time when he made sure of victory. — Hist. de l'Empereur Charles VI. t. ii. p. 90.

> Mount St. John, The hamlet which the Highlanders that day Preserved from spoil. --- 111. 15, p. 754.

The peasant who led us over the field resided at this handet. Mont St. Jean was every thing to him, and his frequent exclamations of admiration for the courage of the Highlanders in particular, and indeed of the whole army, always ended with a reference to his own dwelling-place: "if they had not fought so well, Oh mon Dicu, Mont St. Jean would have been hornt."

Small theatre for such a tragedy. - III. 17, p. 754.

So important a battle perhaps was never hefore fought within go small an extent of ground. I computed the distance between Hougoumont and Papelot at three miles; in a straight line it might probably not exceed two and a half.

Our guide was very much displeased at the name which the battle had obtained in England. Why call it the battle of Waterloo? he said, -- call it Mont St. Jean, call it La Belle Alliance, call it Hougoamont, call it La Haye Sainte, call it Papelot, -- any thing but Waterloo

The youth proved worthy of his destined crown. III. 20, p. 754.

A man at Les Quatre Bras, who spoke with the usual enthusiasm of the Frince of Orange's conduct in the campaign, declared that he fought " like a devil on horseback." Looking at a portrait of the Queen of the Netherlands, a lady observed that there was a resemblance to the Prince; a young Fleming was quite angry at this, — he could not bear that his here should not be thought beautiful as well as brave.

Genappe. --- IV. 12, p. 757.

At the Roy d'Espagne, where we were lodged, Wellington had his head-quarters on the 17th, Bonaparte on the 18th, and Blucher on the 19th. The coachmen had told us that it was an asset bon auberge; but when one of them in the morning asked how we had passed the night, he observed that no one ever slept at Genappe, — it was impossible, because of the continual passing of posts and coal-carts.

The Cross Roads. -- IV. 24, p. 758.

It is odd that the inscription upon the directing-post at Les Quatre Bras, (or rather boards, for they are fastened against a house,) should be given wrongly in the account of the campaign printed at Frankfort. The real directions are, a de pte ver St. Douler a de pte ver Genappe a de pte ver Marbais

a de pte ver Frasne, spelt in this manner, and ill cut. I happened to copy it in a mood of superfluous minuteness.

A fat and jolly Walloon, who inhabited this corner house, ate his dinner in peace at twelve o'clock on the Jith, and was diven out by the balls flying about his ears at four the same day. This man described that part of the action which took place in his sight, with great nnimaticn. He was particularly impressed by the rage, — the absolute fury which the Frene displayed; they cursed the English while they were fighting and cursed the precision with which the English grape-shot was fired, which, suid the man, was ucither too high nor too low, but struck right in the middle. The last time that a British army had been in this place, the Duke of York slept in this man's bed, — an event which the Walloon remembered with gratitude as well as pride, the Duke having given him a Loois d'or.

O wherefore have ye spared his head accursed ! - 1V, 36, p. 759.

Among the peasantry with whom we conversed this feeling was universal. We met with many persons who disliked the union with Holland, and who hated the Prussians, but none who spoke in favor or even in palliation of Bonaparts. The manner in which this ferocious beast, as they call him, has been treated, has given a great shock to the moral feelings of mankind. The almost general mode of accounting for it on the Continent, is by a supposition that England purposely let him loose from Elba in order to have a pretext for again attacking France, and crippling a country which she had left too strong, and which would soon have outstripped her in prosperity. I found it impossible to dispossess even men of sound judgment and great ability of this belief, preposterous as it is; and when they read the account of the luxuries which have been sent to St. Holena for the accommodation of this great criminal, they will consider it as the fullest proof of their opinion.

And now they felt the Prussian's heavy hand. - IV. 42, p. 759.

Wherever we went we heard one ery of complaint against the Prussians, -- except at Ligoy, where the people had witnessed only their courage and their sufferings. This is the effact of making the military spirit predominate in a nation. The conduct of our men was universally extolled; but it required years of exortion and severity before Lord Wellington brought the British army to its present state of discipline. The moral discipline of an army has never perhaps been understoed by any General, except the great Gustavus. Even in its best state, with all the alleviations of courtesy and honor, with all the correctives of morality and religion, war is so great an evil, that to engage in it without a clear necessity is a crime of the blackest dye. When the necessity is clear, (and such, assuredly, I hold it to have been in our struggle with Bonaparto), it then becomes a crime to shrink from it.

What I have said of the Prussians relates solely to their conduct in an allied country; and I must also say that the Prussian officers with whom I had the good fortune to associate, were men who in every respect did honor to their profession and to their country. But that the general conduct of their troops in Belgium had excited a strong feeling of disgust and indignation we had abundant and indisputable testimony. In France they had old wrongs to revenze, — and forgivencess of injurics is not among the virtues which are taught in camps. The annexed ancedotes are reprinted from one of our newspapers, and ought to be preserved.

" A Prussian Officer, on his arrival at Paris, particularly requested to be billeted on the house of a lady inhabiting the Fauxbourg St. Germain. His request was complied with, and on his arriving at the lady's hotel, he was shown into a small but comfortable sitting-room, with a handsome bedchamber adjoining it. With these rooms he appeared greatly dissatisfied, and desired that the lady should give up to him her apartment, (on the first floor,) which was very spucious, and very elegantly furnished. To this the lady made the strongest objections; but the Officer insisted, and she was under the necessity of retiring to the second floor. He afterwards sent a message to her by one of her servants, saying that he destined the second floor for his Aid-de-Camp, This occasioned more violent remonstrances from &c. &c. the lady, but they were totally unavailing, and unattended to by the Officer, whose only answer was, 'obcissez d mes ordres.' He then called for the cook, and told him he must prepare a handsome dinner for six persons, and desired the lady's butler to take care that the hest wines the cellar contained should be forthcoming. After dinner he desired the hostess should be sent for ; - she obeyed the summons. The Officer then addressed her, and said, ' No doubt, Madam, but you consider my conduct as indecorous and brutal in the extreme.' 'I must confess,' replied she, 'that I did not expect such treatment from an officer; as, in general, military men are ever disposed to show every degree of deference and respect to our sex.1 ' You thick me then a most perfect harbarian ? answer me frankly.' 'If you really, then, desire my undisguised opinion of the subject, I must say, that I think your conduct truly barbarous." 'Madam, I am entirely of your opinion; but I only wished to give you a specimen of the behavior and conduct of your son, during six months that he resided in my house, after the entrance of the French army into the Prussian capital. I do not, however, mean to follow a bad example. You will resume, therefore, your apartment tomorrow, and I will seek ladgings at some public botel.' The lady then retired, extolling the generous conduct of the Prussian officer, and deprecuting that of her son."

"Another Prussian officer was lodged at the house of Marshal Ney, in whose stables and coach-house he found a great number of horses and caringes. He immediately ordered some Prussian soldiers, who accompanied him, to take away nine of the horses and three of the carriages. Ney's servants violently remonstrated against this proceeding, on which the Prussian officer observed, 'They are my property, insamuch as your master took the same number of horses and carriages from me when he entered Berlin with the French army.' I think you will agree with me, that the lex talionis was never more properly nor more justly resorted to."

PART II.

The Martyr. - 1. 43, p. 762.

Sir Themas Brewn writes upon this subject with his usual feeling.

"We spplaud not," says he, " the judgment of Machiavel, that Christianity makes men cowards, or that, with the confidence of hut half dying, the despised virtues of patience and humility have abased the spirits of men, which pagan principles exalted; but rather regulated the wildness of auducities in the attempts, grounds and eternal sequels of death, wherein men of the boldest spirit are often prodigiously temerarions. Nor can we extenuate the valor of ancient martyrs, who contemned death in the uncomfortable scene of their lives, and in their decrepit martyrdoms did probably lose not many months of their days, or parted with life when it was searce worth living. For (beside that long time past holds no consideration unto a slender time to come) they had no small disadvantage from the constitution of old age, which naturally makes men fearful, and complexionally superannuated from the hold and courageous thoughts of youth and fervent years. But the contempt of death from corporal animosity promoteth not our felicity. They may sit in the Orchestra and noblest seats of Heaven who have held up shaking hands in the fire, and humanly contended for glory." - Hydriotaphia, 17.

> In purple and in scarlet clad, behold The Harlot sits, adorned with gems and gold ! III. 9, p. 764.

The homely but scriptural appellation by which our fathers were wont to designate the Church of Rome has been delieately softened down by later writers. Three seen her somewhere called the Searlet Woman, — and Helen Maria Williams names her the Dissolute of Babylon.

Let me here offer a suggestion in defence of Voltuire. Is it not probable, or rather can any person doubt, that the ċcrassz Pinfame, upon which suborrible a charge against him has been raised, refers to the Church of Rome, under this well-known designation? No man can hold the principles of Voltaire in stronger abhorrence than I do, —hut it is an act of justice to exculpate him from this moustrous accusation.

> For till the sons their fathers' faults repent, The old error brings its direful punishment.

"Political ebimeras," says Count Stolberg, "are innumerable j but the most chimerical of all is the project of imagining that a people deeply suck in degeneracy are capable of recovering the ancient grandeur of freedom. Who tosses the bird into the air after his wings are elipped? So far from restoring it to the power of flight, it will but disable it more." -Travels, iii, 139.

Pour'd forth her lyric strain. - III. 33, p. 766

The epithet lyric, as applied to the lark, is borrowed from one of Donne's poems. I mention this more particularly for the purpose of repairing an accidental omission in the notes to Roderick; — it is the duty of every poet to acknowledge all his obligations of this kind to his predecessors.

Draw on their proper punishment below. - 1V. 9, p. 768.

I will insert here a passage from one of Lord Brooke's poems. Few writers have ever given proofs of probunder thought than this friend of Sir Philip Sydney. Itad his eommand of language been equal to his strength of intellect, I scarcely know the author whom he would not have surpassed

NOTES TO THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE.

XXL.

Some love no equals, some superiors scorn, One seeks more worlds, and this will Helen have; This covets gold, with divers faces borne,

These humors reign, and lead men to their grave ; Whereby for bayes and little wages we Ruin ourselves to raise up tyranny.

XXII.

And as when winds among themselves do jar, Seas there are test, and wave with wave must fight; So when power's restless humors bring forth War,

There people bear the faults and wounds of Might ; The error and discases of the head

Descending still until the limbs be dead.

XXIIL

Yet are not people's errors ever free From guilt of wounds they suffer by the war ; Never did any public misery Rise of uself : God's plagues still grounded are On common stains of our humanity ; And to the flame which mineth mankind Man gives the matter, or at least gives wind. A Treatic of Warres.

The extract which follows, from the same author, hears as directly upon the effects of the military system as if it had been written with a reference to Bonaparte's government. The thoughtful reader will perceive its intrinsic value, through its difficult language and uncouth versification.

LIX.

Let us then thus conclude, that only they Whose end in this world is the world to come, Whose hearts' desire is that their desires may Measure themselves by Truth's eternal doem. Can in the War find nothing that they prize, Who in the world would not be great or wise.

With these, I say, War, Conquest, Honor, Fame, Stand (as the world) neglected or forsaken,

Like Error's cobwebs, in whose curious frame She only joys and mourns, takes and is taken : In which these dying, that to God live thus, Endure our conquests, would not conquer us.

LXI.

Where all states else that stand on power, not grace, And gage desire by no such spiritual measure, Make it their end to reign in every place,

To war for honor, for revenge and pleasure ; Thinking the strong should keep the weak in awe, And every inequality give law.

These serve the world to rule her by her arts, Raise mortal trephies upon mortal passion;

Their wealth, strength, glory, growing from those hearts Which to their ends they run and disfashion ; The more remote from God the less remorse ; Which still gives Honer power, Occasion force.

These make the Sword their judge of wrong and right, Their story Fame, their laws but Power and Wit; Their endless mine all vanities of Might, Napoleon. - IV. 15, p. 768.

It is amusing to look back upon the flattery which was offered to Bonaparte. Some poems of Mme, Fanny de Beauharneis exhibit rich specimens of this kind : she praises him for > la douce humanité Que le dévore de sa flamme.

Of the battle of Austerlitz she says,

Dans ce jour mémorable on dut finir la guerre, Et que nommeront maints auteurs La Trinité des Empereurs, Vous seul en êtes le mystère.

Subsequent events give to some of these adulatory strain an interest which they would else have wanted.

> Napoléon, objet de nos hommages. Et Josephine, objet non moins aimé, Couple que l' Eternel l'un pour l'autre a forme, Vous étes ses plus beaux ouvrages.

In some stanzas, called Les Trois Bateaux, upon the vessels in which Alexander and Bonaparte held their conferences before the Peace of Tilsit, the following prophecy is introduced, with a felicity worthy of the Edinburgh Review : --

> Tremble, tremble, fière Albion ! Guide par d'heureuses étoiles, Ces généreux bateaux, exempts d'ambition, Vont triompher par-tout de tes cent mille voiles.

Here follows part of an Arabic poem by Michael Sabbag addressed to Bonaparte on his marriage with Marie Louise, and printed, with translations in French prose and German verse, in the first volume of the Fundgruben des Orients : -

"August Prince, whom Heaven has given us for Sovereign, and who holdest among the greatest monarchs of thy age the same rank which the diadem holds upon the head of Kings,

" Thou hast reached the summit of happiness, and by thine invincible courage hast attained a glory which the mind of man can scarcely comprehend;

"Thou hast imprinted upon the front of time the remembrance of thine innumerable exploits in characters of light, one of which alone suffices with its brilliant rays to enlighten the whole universe.

"Who can resist him who is never abandoned by the assistance of Heaven, who has Victory for his guide, and whose course is directed by God himself?

" In every age Fortune produces a hero who is the pearl of his time; amidst all these extraordinary men thou shinest like an inestimable diamond in a necklace of precious stones.

night about the time when Bonaparte assumed the empire. Among the squibs to which this gave occasion, was the following question and answer between Pasquin and Marforio. Pasquin inquires, Mais qu'est ce qui est devenu done de la Liberté? — Heyday, what is become of Liberty then? — To which Marforio replies, Bête! elle est morte en s'accouchant d'un Empereur.— Blockhead! she is dead in bringing forth an Emperor.— Miss PLUMTRE's Narrative, ii. 382.

Lieutenant Bowerbank, in his Journal of what passed on board the Bellerophon, has applied a passage from Horace to the same effect, with humorous felicity.

> I, BONE, quo virtus tua te vocat, Grandia laturus meritorum præmia. Epist. 2, lib. ii. v. 37.

One bead more in this string of quotations: Un Roi philosophe, says the Comte de Puissaye, speaking of Frederick of Prussia, dans le sens de nos jours, est selan moi le plus terriblo fléau que le ciel puisse envoyer aux habitans de la terre. Mais Pidée d'un Roi philosophe et despote, est un injure au sens commun, un outrage à la raison. — Mémoires, t. il. 125.

"How highly has Britain been honored," says Alexander Kuox, in a letter to Hannah More, written not long after the battle of Waterloo; " and yet how awfully has all undue exultation been repressed by the critical turn which, after all, effected a prosperous conclusion ! It was not human wisdom which wrought our deliverance; for when policy (as well as prowess) had dono its utmost, Bonaparte's return from Elba seemed at once to undo all that had been accomplished. It was not human power; for at Waterloo the prize was as much as ever to be contended for ; and notwithstanding all that had been achieved, the fate of Europe once more trembled on the balance. Never, surely, did so momentons and vital a contest terminate at once so happily and so instructively." — Knox's Remains, iv. 297.

CARMEN NUPTIALE.

The Lay of the Laureate.

TO HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE,

THE FOLLOWING POEM IS DEDICATED

WITH PROFOUND RESPECT, BY HER ROYAL HIGHNESS'S MOST DUTIFUL

AND MOST DEVOTED SERVANT,

ROBERT SOUTHEY,

POET LAUREATE.

PROEM.

1.

THERE was a time when all my youthful thought Was of the Muse; and of the Poet's fame,

How fair it flourisheth, and fadeth not, — Alone enduring, when the Monarch's name Is but an empty sound, the Conqueror's bust Moulders and is forgotten in the dust.

How best to build the imperishable lay Was then my daily care, my dream by night; And early in adventurous essay My spirit imp'd her wings for stronger flight; 98 Fair regions Fancy open'd to my view, — "There lies thy path," she said; "do thou tha path pursue!

3.

"For what hast thou to do with wealth or power, Thou whom rich Nature at thy happy birth Bless'd in her bounty with the largest dower

That Heaven indulges to a child of Earth,— Then when the sacred Sisters for their own Baptized thee in the springs of Helicon?

"They promised for thee that thou shouldst eschew All low desires, all empty vanities; That thou shouldst, still to Truth and Freedom true,

The applause or censure of the herd despise; And, in obedience to their impulse given, Walk in the light of Nature and of Heaven.

5.

" Along the World's highway let others crowd, Jostling and moiling on through dust and heat;

Far from the vain, the vicious, and the proud, Take thou, content in solitude, thy seat;

To noble ends devote thy sacred art,

And nurse for better worlds thine own immortal part ! "

6.

Praise to that Power who, from my earliest days, Thus taught me what to seek and what to shun,

Who turn'd my footsteps from the crowded ways, Appointing me my better course to run

In solutude, with studious leisure bless'd, The mind unfetter'd, and the heart at rest.

ĩ.

For therefore have my days been days of joy, And all my paths are paths of pleasantness:

And still my heart, as when I was a boy, Doth never know an ebb of cheerfulness; Time, which matures the intellectual part, Hath tinged my hairs with gray, but left untouch'd my heart.

8.

Sometimes I soar where Fancy guides the rein, Beyond this visible diurnal sphere;

But most, with long and self-approving pain, Patient pursue the historian's task severe;

Thus in the ages which are past I live,

And those which are to come my sure reward will give.

9.

Yea, in this now, while Malice frets her hour, Is foretaste given me of that meed divine;

Here, undisturb'd in this sequester'd bower, The friendship of the good and wise is mine;

And that green wreath which decks the Bard when dead,

That laureate garland, crowns my living head.

10.

That wreath which, in Eliza's golden days, My Master dear, divinest Spenser, wore,

That which rewarded Drayton's learned lays, Which thoughtful Ben and gentle Daniel bore, -

Grin, Envy, through thy ragged mask of scorn ! In honor it was given, with honor it is worn !

1.

Proudly I raised the high thanksgiving strain Of victory in a rightful cause achieved;

For which I long had look'd, and not in vain, As one who, with firm faith and undeceived,

In history and the heart of man could find Sure presage of deliverance for mankind. Proudly I offer'd to the royal ear My song of joy when War's dread work was done,

And glorious Britain round her satiate spear The olive garland twined, by Victory won; Exulting as became me in such cause,

I offer'd to the Prince his People's just applause.

13.

And when, as if the tales of old Romance Were but to typify his splendid reign,

Princes and Potentates from conquer'd France, And chiefs in arms approved, a peerless train, Assembled at his Court, — my dutcons lays Preferr'd a welcome of enduring praise.

14.

And when that last and most momentous hour Beheld the re-risen cause of evil yield

To the Red Cross and England's arm of power, I sung of Waterloo's unequall'd field, Paying the tribute of a soul imbued With deepest joy devout and awful gratitude.

15.

Such strains beseem'd me well. But how shall I To hymeneal numbers tune the string,

Who to the trumpet's martial symphony, And to the mountain gales am wont to sing? How may these unaccustom'd accents suit To the sweet dulcimer and courtly luie?

16.

Fitter for me the lofty strain severe, That calls for vengeance for mankind oppress'd;

Fitter the songs that youth may love to hear, Which warm and elevate the throbbing breast; Fitter for me with meed of solemn verse, In reverence, to adorn the hero's hearse.

17.

But then my Master dear arose to mind, He on whose song, while yet I was a boy,

My spirit fed, attracted to its kind,

And still insatiate of the growing joy; — He on whose tomb these eyes were wont to dwell With inward yearnings which I may not tell; – 18.

He whose green bays shall bloom forever young, And whose dear name whenever I repeat,

Reverence and love are trembling on my tongue; Sweet Spenser, sweetest Bard; yet not more sweet

Than pure was he, and not more pure than wise, High Priest of all the Muses' mysteries.

19.

I call'd to mind that mighty Master's song,

When he brought home his beautifulest bride, And Mulla murmur'd her sweet undersong,

And Mole with all his mountain woods replied Never to mortal lips a strain was given More rich with love, more redolent of Heaven 20.

His cup of joy was mantling to the brim,

Yet solemn thoughts enhanced his deep delight; A holy feeling fill'd his marriage-hymn,

And Love aspired with Faith a heavenward flight.

And hast not thou, my Soul, a solemn theme? I said, and mused until I fell into a dream.

THE DREAM.

I.

METHOUGHT I heard a stir of hasty feet, And horses tramp'd and coaches roll'd along,

And there were busy voices in the street, As if a multitude were hurrying on ;

A stir it was which only could befall Upon some great and solemn festival.

$\mathbf{2}$.

Such crowds I saw, and in such glad array, It seem'd some general joy had fill'd the land;

Age had a sunshine on its cheek that day, And children, tottering by the mother's hand, Too young to ask why all this joy should be, Partook it, and rejoiced for sympathy.

3.

The shops, that no dull care might intervene,

Were closed; the doors within were lined with heads;

Glad faces were at every window seen,

And from the cluster'd house-tops and the leads, Others, who took their stand in patient row, Look'd down upon the crowds that swarm'd below.

4.

And every one of all that numerous throng On head or breast a marriage symbol wore;

The war-horse proudly, as he paced along, Those joyous colors in his forelock wore,

And arch'd his stately neck as for delight, To show his mane thus pompously bedight.

5.

From every church the merry bells rung round With gladdening harmony heard far and wide;

In many a mingled peal of swelling sound, The hurrying music came on every side;

And banners from the steeples waved on high, And streamers flutter'd in the sun and sky.

6.

Anon the cannon's voice in thunder spake; Westward it came; the East returned the sound;

Burst after burst the innocuous thunders brake, And roll'd from side to side with quick rebound. O happy land, where that terrific voice Speaks but to bid all habitants rejoice !

Thereat the crowd rush'd forward one and all, And I too in my dream was borne along. Eftsoon, methought, I reach'd a festal hall, Where guards in order ranged repell'd the throng, But I had entrance through that guarded door, In honor to the laureate crown I wore.

З.

That spacious hall was hung with trophies round, Memorials proud of many a well-won day : The flag of France there trail'd toward the greund;

There in captivity her Eagles lay, And under each, in aye-enduring gold, One well-known word its fatal story told.

9.

There read I Nile, conspicuous from afar; And Egypt and Maida there were found; And Copenhagen there and Trafalgar; Vimeiro and Busaco's day renown'd;

There too was seen Barrosa's bloody name, And Albuhera, dcar-bought field of fame.

10.

Yon spoils from boastful Massena were won; Those Marmont left in that illustrious fight

By Salamanca, when too soon the sun

Went down, and darkness hid the Frenchman's flight.

These from Vittoria were in triumph borne,

When from the Intruder's head Spain's stolen crown was torn.

11.

These on Pyrene's awful heights were gain'd, The trophies of that memorable day,

When deep with blood her mountain springs were stain'd.

Above the clouds and lightnings of that fray,

Wheeling afar the affrighted eagles fled;

At eve the wolves came forth and prey'd upon the dead.

12.

And blood-stain'd flags were here from Orthies borne,

Trampled by France beneath her flying feet; And what before Thoulouse from Soult were torn,

When the stern Marshal met his last defeat, Vielding once more to Britain's arm of might, And Wellington in mercy spared his flight.

I3.

There hung the Eagles which, with victory flush'd, From Fleurus and from Ligny proudly flew, To see the Usurper's high-swollen fortune crush'd

Forever on the field of Waterloo, —

Day of all days, surpassing in its fame All fields of elder or of later name !

of elder of of later hame

14.

There, too, the painter's universal art Each story told to all beholders' eyes;

And Sculpture there had done her fitting part, Bidding the forms perdurable arise Of those great Chiefs who in the field of hght

Had best upheld their country's sacred right.

15.

There stood our peerless Edward, gentle-soul'd, The Sable Prince, of chivalry the flower;

And that Plantagenet of sterner mould, lle who the conquer'd erown of Gallia wore;

And Blake, and Nelson, Glory's favorite son,

And Marlborough there, and Wolfe, and Wellington.

16.

But from the statues and the storied wall, The living scene withdrew my wondering sense;

For with accordant pomp that gorgeous hall Was fill'd; and I heheld the opulence Of Britain's Court, — a proud assemblage there,

Her Statesmen, and her Warriors, and her Fair.

Amid that Hall of Victory, side by side, Conspicuous o'er the splendid company,

There sat a royal Bridegroom and his Bride; In her fair cheek, and in her bright blue eye, Her flaxen locks, and her benignant mien,

The marks of Brunswick's Royal Line were seen.

18.

Of princely lineage and of princely heart, [fight, The Bridegroom seem'd, — a man approved in Who in the great deliverance bore his part,

And had pursued the recreant Tyrant's flight, When, driven from injured Germany, he fled, Bearing the curse of God and Man upon his head.

19.

Guardant before his feet a Lion lay, The Saxon Lion, terrible of yore,

Who, in his wither'd linbs and lean decay, The marks of long and cruel bondage bore;

But broken now beside him lay the chain, Which gall'd and fretted late his neek and mane.

20.

A Lion too was couch'd before the Bride;

That noble Beast had never felt the chain; Strong were his sinewy limbs and smooth his hide, And o'er his shoulders broad the affluent mane Dishevell'd hung; beneath his feet were laid Torn flags of France, whereon his bed he made.

Full different were those Lions twain in plight, Yet were they of one brood; and side by side Of old, the Gallic Tiger in his might

They many a time had met, and quell'd his pride, And made the treacherous spoiler from their ire, Cowering and erippled, to his den retire.

22.

Two forms divine on either side the throne, Its heavenly guardians, male and female stood;

It's eye was bold, and on his brow there shone

Contempt of all base things, and pride subdued To wisdom's will: a warrior's garb he wore, And Hexor was the name the Genius bore. That other form was in a snow-white vest, As well her virgin loveliness became;

Erect her port, and on her spotless breast A blood-red cross was hung: FAITH was her name,

As by that sacred emblem might be seen, And by her eagle eye, and by her dove-like mien.

24.

.Ier likeness such to that robuster power, That sure ans sister she might have been deem'd,

Child of one womb at one auspicious hour. Akin they were, yet not as thus it seem'd; For he of VALOR was the eldest son, From Areté in happy union sprung.

But her to Phronis Eusebeia bore, She whom her mother Dicé sent to earth; What marvel then if thus their features wore Resemblant lineaments of kindred birth, Dicé being child of Him who rules above, VALOR his earth-born son; so both derived from Jove.

26.

While I stood gazing, suddenly the air Was fill'd with solemn music breathing round; And yet no mortal instruments were there,

Nor seem'd that melody an earthly sound, So wondrously it came, so passing sweet, For some strange pageant sure a prelude meet.

27.

In every breast methought there seen'd to be A hush of reverence mingled with dismay; For now appear'd a heavenly company

Toward the royal seat who held their way; A female Form majestic led them on, --

With awful port she came, and stood before the Throne.

28.

Gentle her mien, and void of all offence; But if aught wrong'd her, she could strike such fear,

As when Minerva, in her Sire's defence, Shook in Phlegræan fields her dreadful spear. Yet her benignant aspect told that ne'er Would she refuse to heed a suppliant's prayer.

29.

The Trident of the Seas in her right hand, The sceptre which that Bride was born to wield, She bore, in symbol of her just command,

And in her left display'd the Red-Cross shield. A plume of milk-white feathers overspread The laurell'd helm which graced her lofty head.

30.

Daughter of Brunswick's fated line, she said, While joyful realms then gratulations pay,

And ask for blessings on thy bridal bed,

We, too, descend upon this happy day ;-

Receive with willing ear what we impart, And treasure up our counsels in thy heart!

31.

Long may it be ere thon art call'd to bear The weight of empire in a day of woe! Be it thy favor'd lot meantime to share

The joys which from domestic virtne flow, And may the lessons which are now impress'd, In years of leisnre, sink into thy breast.

32.

Look to thy Sire, and in his steady way, As in his Father's he, learn thou to tread;

That thus, when comes the inevitable day, No other change be felt than of the head

Which wears the crown; thy name will then be blest

Like theirs, when thou, too, shalt be call'd to rest.

33.

Love peace and cherish peace ; but use it so That War may find thee ready at all hours ;

And ever when thon strikest, let the blow Be swift and sure : then put forth all the powers Which God hath given thee to redress thy wrong,

And, powerful as thon art, the strife will not be long.

34.

Let not the sacred Trident from thy hand Depart, nor lay the falchion from thy side !

Queen of the Seas, and mighty on the land, Thy power shall then be dreaded far and wide :

And trusting still in God and in the Right, Thon mayst again defy the World's collected might.

35.

Thus as she ceased, a comely Sage came on, His temples and capacious forehead spread

With locks of venerable eld, which shone As when, in wintry morns, on Skiddaw's head The cloud, the sunshine, and the snow unite, So silvery, so unsullied, and so white.

36.

Of Kronos and the Nymph Mnemosyné He sprnng, on either side a birth divine;

Thus to the Olympian Gods allied was he, And brother to the sacred Sisters nine,

With whom he dwelt in interchange of lore, Each thus instructing each for evermore.

37.

They call'd him Praxis in the Olympian tongue ; But nere on earth Experience was his name.

Whatever things have pass'd to him were known, And he could see the future ere it came;

Such foresight was his patient wisdom's meed, — Alas for those who his wise counsels will not heed !

38.

He bore a goodly volume, which he laid Between that princely couple on the throne. Lo, there my work for this great realm, he said, My work, which with the kingdom's growth has grown,

The rights, the usages, the laws wherein Blessed above all nations she hath been 39.

Such as the sacred trust to thee is given, So nnimpair'd transmit it to thy line :

Preserve it as the choicest gift of Heaven, Alway to make the bliss of thee and thine : The talisman of England's strength is there, — With reverence guard it, and with jealons care !

40.

The next who stood before that royal pair Came gliding like a vision o'er the ground;

A glory went before him through the air, Ambrosial odors floated all around, His purple wings a heavenly lustre shed A silvery halo hover'd round his head 41.

The Angel of the English Church was this, With whose divinest presence there appear'd

A glorious train, inheritors of bliss,

Saints in the memory of the good revered,

Who, having render'd back their vital breath To Him from whom it eame, were perfected by Death.

42.

Edward the spotless Tudor, there I knew, In whose pure hreast, with pious nurthre fed,

All generons hopes and gentle virtues grew;

A heavenly diadem adorn'd his head, --Most blessed Prince, whose saintly name might most blesset i mee, whose sampy hame high

The understanding heart to tears of reverent love.

43.

Less radiant than King Edward, Cranmer came, But pnrged from persecution's sable spot;

For he had given his body to the flame,

And now in that right hand, which, flinching not, He proffer'd to the fire's atoning doom,

Bore he the unfading palm of martyrdom.

44.

There too came Latimer, in worth allied,

Who, to the stake when brought by Romish rage, As if with prison weeds he cast aside

The infirmity of flesh and weight of age, Bow-bent till then with weakness, in his shroud Stood up erect and firm before the admiring crowd.

45.

With these, partakers in beatitnde, Bearing like them the palm, their emblem meet,

The Noble Army came, who had subdued

All frailty, putting death beneath their feet : Their robes were like the mountain snow, and bright

As though they had been dipp'd in the fountain springs of light.

THE LAY OF THE LAUREATE.

46.

For these were they who valiantly endured The fierce extremity of mortal pain, By no weak tenderness to life allured,

The victims of that hateful Henry's reign, And of the bloody Queen, beneath whose sway Rome lit her fires, and Fiends kept holyday.

47.

O pardon me, thrice holy Spirits dear, That hastily I now must pass ye by !

No want of duteons reverence is there here; None better knows nor deeplier feels than I What to your sufferings and your faith we owe,

Ye valiant champions for the truth below !

48.

Hereafter, haply, with maturer care, (So Heaven permit,) that reverence shall be shown.

Now of my vision 1 must needs declare, And how the Angel stood before the throne,

And, fixing on that Princess, as he spake, His eye benign, the awful silence brake.

49.

Thus said the Angel — Thou to whom one day There shall in earthly guardianship be given

The English Church, preserve it from decay! Ere now for that most sacred charge hath Heaven In perilous times provided female means, Blessing it beneath the rule of pious Queens.

50.

Bear thou that great Eliza in thy mind, Who from a wreck this fabric edified;

And HER who, to a nation's voice resign'd,

When Rome in hope its willest engines plied, By her own heart and righteous Heaven approved, Stood up against the Father whom she loved.

51.

Laying all mean regards aside, fill Thou Her seats with wisdom and with learned worth;

That so, whene'er attack'd, with fearless brow Her champions may defend her rights on earth; Link'd is her welfare closely with thine own;

One fate attends the Altar and the Throne !

52.

Think not that lapse of ages shall abate The inveterate malice of that Harlot old;

Fallen though thou deem'st her from her high estate, She proffers still the envenom'd cup of gold,

And her fierce Beast, whose names are Blasphemy, The same that was, is still, and still must be.

53.

The stern Sectarian in unnatural league Joins her to war against their hated foe;

Error and Faction aid the bold intrigue, And the dark Atheist seeks her overthrow, While giant Zeal in arms against her stands, Barks with a hundred months, and lifts a hundred hands.

54.

Built on a rock, the fabric may repel Their utmost rage, if all within be sound ; But if within the gates Indifference dwell, Woe to her then ! there needs no ontward wound ! Through her whole frame benumb'd, a letbal sleep, Like the cold poison of the asp, will creep.

55.

In thee, as in a cresset set on high, The light of piety should shine far seen,

A guiding beacon fix'd for every eye :

Thus from the influence of an honor'd Queen, As from its spring, should public good proceed, — The peace of Heaven will be thy proper meed.

56.

So should return that happy state of yore, When piety and joy went hand in hand;

The love which to his flock the shepherd bore, The old observances which cheer'd the land,

The household prayers which, honoring God's high name,

Kept the lamp trimm'd and fed the sacred flame.

57.

Thus having spoke, away the Angel pass'd With all his train, dissolving from the sight: A transitory shadow overcast

The sudden void they left; all meaner light Seeming like darkness to the eye which lost The full effulgence of that heavenly host.

58.

Eftsoon, in reappearing light confess'd, There stood another Minister of bliss,

With his own radiance clothed as with a vest. One of the angelic company was this, Who, guardians of the rising human race, Alway in Heaven behold the Father's face.

59.

Somewhile he fix'd upon the royal Bride A contemplative eye of thoughtful grief;

The trouble of that look benign implied A sense of wrongs for which he sought relief,

And that Earth's evils which go unredress'd May waken sorrow in an Angel's breast.

60.

I plead for babes and sucklings, he began, Those who are now, and who are yet to be;

I plead for all the surest hopes of man, The vital welfare of humanity :

Oh! let not bestial Ignorance maintain Longer within the land her brutalizing reign.

61.

O Lady, if some new-born babe should bless, In answer to a nation's prayers, thy love, When thou, beholding it in tenderness,

The deepest, holiest joy of earth shalt prove, In that the likeness of all infants see,

And call to mind that hour what now thou hear'st from me.

THE LAY OF THE LAUREATE.

62.

Then seeing infant man, that Lord of Earth, Most weak and helpless of all breathing things,

Remember that as Nature makes at birth No different law for Peasants or for Kings, And at the end no difference may befall,

The "short parenthesis of life" is all

63.

But in that space, how wide may be their doom Of honor or dishonor, good or ill!

From Nature's hand like plastic clay they come, To take from eircumstance their woe or weal;

And as the form and pressure may be given, They wither upon earth, or ripen there for Heaven.

64.

Is it then fitting that one soul should pine For lack of culture in this favor'd land? — That spirits of capacity divine

Perish, like seeds upon the desert sand?— That needful knowledge in this age of light Should not by hirth be every Briton's right?

65.

Little can private zeal effect alone;

The State must this state-malady redress; For as, of all the ways of life, but one --

The path of duty — leads to happiness, So in their duty States must find at length Their welfare, and their safety, and their strength.

66.

This the first duty, carefully to train The children in the way that they should go; Then of the family of guilt and pain

How large a part were banish'd from below ! How would the people love with surest cause Their country, and revere her venerable laws !

67.

Is there, alas! within the human soul An inbred taint disposing it for ill?

More need that early culture should control And discipline by love the pliant will !

The heart of man is rich in all good seeds; Neglected, it is choked with tares and noxious weeds.

6S.

He ceased, and sudden from some unseen throng A choral peal arose and shook the hall;

As when ten thousand children with their song Fill the resounding temple of St. Paul ; ---

Scarce can the heart their powerful tones sustain;--

" Save, or we perish ! " was the thrilling strain.

69.

"Save, or we perish !" thrice the strain was sung By unseen Souls innumerous hovering round;

And whilst the hall with their deep chorus rung, The inmost heart was shaken with the sound ;

I felt the refluent blood forsake my face, And my knees trembled in that awful place. 70.

Anon two female forms before our view Came side by side, a beauteous couplement; The first a virgin clad in skyey blue;

Upward to Heaven her steadfast eyes were bent, Her countenance an anxious meaning bore, Yet such as might have made her loyed the more.

71.

This was that maiden, "sober, chaste, and wise," Who bringeth to all hearts their best delight :

"Though spoused, yet wanting wedlock's solemnize;"

"Daughter of Cælia, and Speranza hight, I knew her well as one whose portraiture In my dear Master's verse forever will endure.

72.

Her sister, too, the same divinest page Taught me to know for that Charissa fair

"Of goodly grace and comely personage, Of wondrous beauty and of bounty rare, Full of great love," in whose most gentle mien The charms of perfect womanhood were seen.

73.

This lovely pair unroll'd before the throne "Earth's melancholy map," whereon to sight Two broad divisions at a glance were shown, —

The empires these of Darkness and of Light. Well might the thoughtful bosom sigh to mark How wide a portion of the map was dark.

74.

Behold, Charissa cried, how large a space Of Earth lies unredeem'd! Oh, grief to think

That countless myriads of immortal race, In error born, in ignorance must sink, Train'd up in customs which corrupt the heart,

And following miserably the evil part!

75.

Regard the expanded Orient, from the shores Of scorch'd Arabia and the Persian sea, To where the inhospitable Ocean roars

Against the rocks of frozen Tartary ; Look next at those Australian isles, which lie Thick as the stars that stud the wintry sky;—

76.

Then let thy mind contemplative survey That spacious region, where, in elder time, Earth's unremember'd conquerors held the sway;

And Science, trusting in her skill sublime, With lore abstruse the sculptured walls o'erspread, Its import now forgotten with the dead.

77.

From Nile and Congo's undiscover'd springs To the four seas which gird the unhappy land, Behold it left a prey to barbarous Kings,

The Robber, or the Trader's ruthless hand: Sinning and suffering, every where unbless'd, Behold her wretched sons, oppressing and oppress'd ' 78.

To England is the Eastern empire given, And hers the sceptre of the circling main; Shall she not then diffuse the word of Heaven

Through all the regions of her trusted reign, — Wage against evil things the hallow'd strife, And sow with liberal hand the seeds of life!

79.

By strenuous efforts in a rightful cause,

Gloriously hath she surpass'd her ancient fame, And won in arms the astonish'd World's applause.

Yet may she win in peace a nobler name, And Nations, which now lie in error blind, Hail her the Friend and Teacher of Mankind!

Oh! what a part were that, Speranza then Exclaim'd, to act upon Earth's ample stage!

Oh! what a name among the sons of men To leave, which should endure from age to age!

And what a strength that ministry of good Should find in love and human gratitude '

81.

Speed thou the work, Redeemer of the World! That the long miseries of mankind may cease!

Where'er the Red Cross banner is unfurl'd There let it carry truth, and light, and peace ! Did not the Angels who announced thy birth Proclaim it with the sound of Peace on Earth?

82.

Bless thou this happy Island, that the stream Of blessing far and wide from hence may flow!

Bless it that thus thy saving Merey's beam Reflected hence may shine on all below !

Thy kingdom come! thy will be done, O Lord !

And be thy Holy Name through all the world adored !

83.

Thus as Speranza cried, she clasp'd her hands, And heavenward lifted them in ardent prayer.

Lo! at the act the vaulted roof expands, — Heaven opens, — and in empyreal air

Pouring its splendors through the inferior sky More bright than noon-day suns the CRoss appears on high.

84.

A strain of heavenly harmony ensued,

Such as but once to mortal ears was known, — The voice of that Angelic Multitude,

Who, in their Orders, stand around the Throne; PEACE UPON EARTH, GOOD WILL TO MEN! they sung,

And Heaven and Earth with that prophetic anthem rung.

85.

In holy fear I fell upon the ground, And hid my face, unable to endure The glory, or sustain the piercing sound; In fear and yet in trembling joy, for sure My soul that hour yearn'd strongly to be free, That it might spread its wings in immortality.

86.

Gone was the glory when I raised my head; But in the air appear'd a form half seen,

Below with shadows dimly garmented, And indistinct and dreadful was his mien:

Yet, when 1 gazed intentlier, 1 could trace Divinest beauty in that awful face.

87.

Hear me, O Princess! said the shadowy form, As, in administering this mighty land,

Thou with thy best endeavor shalt perform The will of Heaven, so shall my faithful hand Thy great and endless recompense supply; —

My name is DEATH : THE LAST, BEST FRIEND AM I!

EPILOGUE.

1.

Is this the Nuptial Song? with brow severe Perchance the votaries of the world will say:

Are these fit strains for Royal ears to hear?

What man is he who thus assorts his lay, And dares pronounce with inauspicious breath, In Hymeneal verse, the name of Death?

2.

Remote from cheerful intercourse of men, Hath he indulged his melancholy mood,

And, like the hermit in some sullen den, Fed his distemper'd mind in solitude? Or have fanatic dreams distraught his sense, That thus he should presume with bold irrevcrence?

З.

O Royal Lady, ill they judge the heart That reverently approaches thee to-day,

And anxious to perform its fitting part, Prefers the tribute of this duteous lay ! Not with displeasure should his song be read Who prays for Heaven's best blessings on thy head.

4.

He prays that many a year may pass away Ere the State call thee from a life of love;

Vex'd by no public cares, that day by day Thy heart the dear domestic joys may prove,

And gracious Heaven thy chosen nuptials bless With all a Wife's and all a Mother's happiness.

5.

He prays that, for thine own and England's sake, The Virtues and the Honsehold Charities

Their favor'd seat beside thy hearth may take; That when the Nation thither turn their eyes,

There the conspicuous model they may find Of all which makes the bliss of human-kind.

6.

He prays that, when the sceptre to thy hand In due succession shall descend at length,

Prosperity and Peace may bless the Land, Truth be thy counsellor, and Heaven thy streigh;

That every tongue thy praises may proclaim, And every heart in secret bless thy name.

7.

He prays that thou mayst strenuously maintain The wise laws handed down from sire to son;

He prays that, under thy auspicious reign, All may be added, which is left undone, To make the realm, its polity complete, In all things happy, as in all things great; ---

8,

That, through the will of thy enlighten'd mind, Brute man may be to social life reclaim'd;

That, in compassion for forlorn mankind, The saving Faith may widely be proclaim'd

Through erring lands, beneath thy fostering care; ---

This is his ardent hope, his loyal prayer.

9.

In every cottage may thy power be blest For blessings which should every where abound ;

Thy will, beneficent, from East to West,

May bring forth good where'er the sun goes round,

And thus, through future times, should CHAR-LOTTE's fame

Surpass our great ELIZA's golden name.

10.

Of awful subjects have I dared to sing ; Yet surely are they such, as, view'd aright,

Contentment to thy better mind may bring ; A strain which haply may thy heart invite

To ponder well how to thy choice is given

A glorious name on Earth, a high reward in Heaven.

11.

Light strains, though cheerful as the hues of spring,

Would wither like a wreath of vernal flowers; The amaranthine garland which I bring Shall keep its verdure through all after-hours; — Yea, while the Poet's name is doom'd to live, So long this garland shall its fragrance give.

12.

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown :" Thus said the Bard who spake of kingly cares;

But calmly may the Sovereign then lie down When grateful Nations guard him with their

How sweet a sleep awaits the Royal head When these keep watch and ward around the bed '

L'ENVOY.

Go, little Book; from this my solitude, I cast thee on the waters: --- go thy ways ! And if, as I believe, thy vein be good,

The World will find thee, after many days. Be it with thee according to thy worth :----Go, little Book! in faith I send thee forth

NOTES.

The "short parenthesis of life" is all. - 62, p. 783

I have borrowed this striking expression from Storer.

All as my chrysom, so my winding sheet; None joy'd my birth, none mourn'd my death to see; The short parenthesis of tife was aweet, But short ; — what was before, unknown to me, Aod what must follow is the Lord's decree.

STORER'S Life and Death of Wolsey.

Let me insert here a beautiful passage from this forgotten poet, whose work has been retrieved from oblivion in the Heliconia. Wolsey is speaking.

> More fit the dirige of a mournful quire In dull sad notes all sorrows to exceed, For him in whom the Prince's love is dead.

I om the tomb where that affection lies, That was the closet where it living kept: Yet wise men say affection never dies ; — No, but it turns, and when it long hath slept, Looks heavy, like the eyet Lat long hath wept. O could it die, — that were a restful state ! But living, it converts to deadly hate.

Funcral Song,

FOR THE PRINCESS CHARLOTTE OF WALES.

IN its summer pride array'd, Low our Tree of Hope is laid ! Low it lies: — in evil hour, Visiting the bridal bower, Death hath levell'd root and flower. Windsor, in thy sacred shade, (This the end of pomp and power !) Have the rites of death been paid : Windsor, in thy sacred shade Is the Flower of Brunswick laid !

Ye whose relics rest around, Tenants of this funeral ground ! Know ye, Spirits, who is come, By inmitigable doom Summon'd to the untimely tomb? Late with youth and splendor crown'd, Late in beauty's vernal bloom, Late with love and joyance blest; Never more lamented guest Was in Windsor laid to rest.

Henry, thou of saintly worth, Thou, to whom thy Windsor gave Nativity, and name, and grave; Thou art in this hallowed earth Cradled for the immortal birth ! Heavily upon his head Ancestral crimes were visited: He, in spirit like a child, Meek of heart and undefiled, Patiently his crown resign'd, And fix'd on heaven his heavenly mind, Blessing, while he kiss'd the rod, His Redeemer and his God. Now may he in realms of bliss Greet a soul as pure as his.

Passive as that humble spirit Lies his bold dethroner too; A dreadful debt did he inherit To his injured lineage due; Ill-starr'd prince, whose martial merit His own England long might rue! Mournful was that Edward's fame, Won in fields contested well, While he sought his rightful claim : Witness Aire's unhappy water, Where the ruthless Clifford fell; And when Wharfe ran red with slaughter, On the day of Towton's field, Gathering, in its guilty flood, The carnage and the ill-spilt blood That forty thousand lives could yield. Cressy was to this but sport, Poictiers but a pageant vain; And the victory of Spain Seem'd a strife for pastime mean

FUNERAL SONG.

And the work of Agincourt Only like a tournament; Half the blood which there was spent, Had sufficed again to gain Anjou and ill-yielded Maine, Normandy and Aquitaine, And Our Lady's Ancient towers, Maugre all the Valois' powers, Had a second time been ours. — A gentle daughter of thy line, Edward, lays her dust with thine.

Thou, Elizabeth, art here; Thou to whom all griefs were known; Who wert placed upon the bier In happier hour than on the throne. Fatal daughter, fatal mother, Raised to that ill-omen'd station, Father, uncle, sons, and brother, Mourn'd in blood her elevation ! Woodville, in the realms of bliss, To thine offspring thou mayst say, Early death is happiness; And favor'd in their lot are they Who are not left to learn below That length of life is length of woe. Lightly let this ground be press'd; A broken heart is here at rest.

But thou, Seymour, with a greeting Such as sisters use at meeting, Joy, and sympathy, and love, Wilt hail her in the seats above. Like in loveliness were ye; By a like lamented doom, Hurried to an early tomb. While together, spirits blest, Here your earthly relics rest; Fellow angels shall ye be In the angelic company.

Henry, too, hath here his part; At the gentle Seymour's side, With his best beloved bride, Cold and quiet, here are laid The ashes of that fiery heart. Not with his tyrannic spirit, Shall our Charlotte's soul inherit; No, by Fisher's hoary head, — By More, the learned and the good, — By Katharine's wrongs and Boleyn's blood, By the life so basely shed Of the pride of Norfolk's line, By the axe so often red, By the fire with martyrs fed, Hateful Henry, not with thee May her happy spirit be !

And here lies one whose tragic name A reverential thought may claim; That nurder'd Monarch, whom the grave Revealing its long secret, gave Again to sight, that we might spy His couldy face and waking eye¹ There, thrice fifty years, it lay, Exempt from natural decay, Unclosed and bright, as if to say, A plague, of bloodier, baser birth, Than that beneath whose rage he bled, Was loose upon our guilty earth; — Such awful warning from the dead Was given by that portentous eye; Then it closed eternally.

Ye whose relics rest around, Tenants of this funeral ground; Even in your immortal spheres, What fresh yearnings will ye feel, When this earthly guest appears! Us she leaves in grief and tears; But to you will she reveal Tidings of old England's weal; Of a righteous war pursued, Long, through evil and through good, With unshaken fortitude ; Of peace, in battle twice achieved; Of her fiercest foe subdued, And Europe from the yoke reliev'd, Upon that Brabantine plain ! Such the proud, the virtuous story, Such the great, the endless glory Of her father's splendid reign ! He who wore the sable mail Might, at this heroic tale, Wish himself on earth again.

One who reverently, for thee, Raised the strain of bridal verse, Flower of Brunswick! mournfully Lays a garland on thy hearse.

788 A VISION OF JUDGMENT; DEDICATION; PREFACE.

A Vision of Judgment.

TO THE KING.

SIR,

IO INL KING.

ONLY to Your Majesty can the present publication with propriety be addressed. As a tribute to the sacred memory of our late revered Sovereign, it is my duty to present it to Your Majesty's notice; and to whom could an experiment, which, perhaps, may be considered hereafter as of some importance in English Poetry, he so fitly inscribed, as to the Royal and munificent Patron of science, art, and literature?

We owe much to the House of Brunswick; but to none of that illustrious House more than to Your Majesty, under whose government the military renown of Great Britain has been carried to the highest point of glory. From that pure glory there has been nothing to detract; the success was not more splendid than the cause was good ; and the event was deserved by the generosity, the justice, the wisdom, and the magnanimity of the counsels which prepared it. The same perfect integrity has been manifested in the whole administration of public affairs. More has been done than was ever before attempted, for mitigating the evils incident to our stage of society; for imbuing the rising race with those sound principles of religion on which the welfare of states has its only secure foundation; and for opening new regions to the redundant enterprise and industry of the people. Under Your Majesty's government, the Metropolis is rivalling in beauty those cities which it has long surpassed in greatness: sciences, arts, and letters are flourishing beyond all former example; and the last triumph of nautical discovery and of the British flag, which had so often been essayed in vain, has been accomplished. The brightest portion of British history will be that which records the improvements, the works, and the achievements of the Georgian Age.

That Your Majesty may long continue to reign over a free and prosperous people, and that the blessings of the happiest form of government which has ever been raised by human wisdom under the favor of Divine Providence, may, under Your Majesty's protection, be transmitted unimpaired to posterity, is the prayer of

Your MAJESTY'S

Most dutiful Subject and Servant,

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

PREFACE

THE PRESENT EDITION

THE VISION OF JUDGMENT.

Soos after the publication of this poem, the Reverend S. Tillbrook, B. D., at that time Fellow of Peterhouse, and an old acquaintance of mine, published a pamphlet entitled,

" HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL REMARKS

UPON

THE MODERN HEXAMETERS,

ANO UPON

MR. SOUTHEY'S VISION OF JUDGMENT.

⁴The Hexameter Verse I grant to be a gentleman of an ancient house, (so is many an English beggar;) yet this elimo of ours he cannot thrive in; our speech is too eraggy for him to set his plough in; he goes twitching and hopping, like a man running upon quagmires, up the hill in one syllable, and down the date in another, retaining no part of that strictly smooth gait which he vannts himself with among the Greeks and Latins.'— THOMAS NASH.

CAMBRIDGE.

1822."

The following extracts comprise the most important of Mr. Tillbrook's animadversions : ----

"The Laureate says that 'if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new pronunciation.' But why not attempt to teach this tune on new principles ? why leave the public without a guide to the accents and divisions of the Georgian hexameter? This should have been done either by - borrowing from the Latin rules - adopting those of the early prosodians -- or by inventing a new metronome. It is difficult to recommend, much more to establish, any theoretical attempt upon individual authority, because practical experience is the best and ultimate test of success. After repeated trials, the enterprise in question has uniformly failed, and experience has shown that all modern imitations of the epic are unworthy of becoming denizens among our English metres. The system attempted by the Laureate is professedly an imitation of the ancient systems; but every copy is good or bad as it resembles or differs from its original. In defence of his enterprise, Mr. Southey should not have contented himself with a bare exposition of the measures of his verse, but should have actually noted the cæsuras, accented the syllables, and divided the fect. In matters of rhythm and sound, the untried ear cannot always eatch the precise meaning of the musician or poet, especially where an original air is turned into a variation; and this seems precisely the case between the modernized and original epic, the difference acknowledged by the Laureate being the variation alluded to.

"A table, exhibiting the varieties which Mr. S. has adopted, and their agreement or disagreement with the legitimate hexameter, should have been drawn out. Critical experience has long ago selected and established certain canons for the iambic, sapphic, alcaic, and other metres; and Greek or Latin verses constructed according to these laws invariably excel both in rhythm and melody. - There are in the Vision of Judgment parts which may charm and delight, but they do so from no metrical effect. The reader (notwithstanding the Laureate's caution) soon finds himself in a tangled path, and gets bewildered for want of those guides which lead him smoothly through the Siege of Troy. But if he travel far with the Muse of modern epic, he will have little running, frequent haltings, some stumbling and jostling, and now and then find the good lady gaping, or sitting crosslegged in the midst of a barbarous rabble of monosyllabic particles.

"But it will be easier to show the comparative and probable sources of excellence or failure in the composition of the modern hexameter, by an analysis of the Greek and Latin languages, compared as to their literal and syllabic relations. To effect this, four separate tables have been drawn, containing the component parts and totals of eight verses of hexametrical dimensions, taken severally from the Hiad, Æneid, Vision of Judgment, and from a poem by Schiller. The divisions are calculated to show the totals of words, syllables, consonants, vowels, diphthongs, letters, and variety of final syllables. It will be seen from this tabular exposition that the Greek and Latin are nearly analogous, except that the balance of polysyllables inclines to the former. The diphthongs are more and the consonants fewer, and the total of letters and words also is less with the Greek. The conclusion therefore is, that the euphony, and syllabic power of speech, must likewise be on the side of the Greeks.

"In the English scale, the number of monosyllables is fire times as great as in either of the two ancient languages, and more than twice as great as in the German. The English consonants are very nearly double those of the Greek or Latin, and the total number of words bears nearly the same ratio both to the Greek and Latin, viz. two to one. By necessity of grammar, a large prosertion of these words consists of monosyllables and expletives. Neither the consonants in the German, nor the total of letters, is so numerous as in the English, and the same relation holds between the final varieties of these two languages.

"It has been before remarked that the Teutonic hexameter may be rendered somewhat superior to the English. This superiority is in a great measure to be attributed to the smaller aggregate of consonants and monosyllables which distinguish the German vocabulary. But the unprejudiced reader will draw what inferences he pleases from the comparative powers of each language, and regulate his decision according to the apparent truth or falsehood of the whole of the argument ard evidence.

" ' Excludat jurgia Finis.'

" In taking leave of this question, the Writer again assures Mr. Southey of his high regard both for the private and literary life of the Laureate of the present age. The pen which has traced these Remarks, if it be not that of a ready writer, would fain be considered as that of a humble critic, actuated by no other motives than those of friendly discussions, and a desire to preserve the Epic Muse of Greece and Latium free from the barbarities of modern imitation.

"It is against the metre — the metrical association and arrangement — against the innovation, not the innovator, that the writer protests; the merits or demerits therefore of the Vision of Judgment, as a poem, he leaves to abler reviewers and to posterity. It will be read and admired by a few persons, just as the attempts of other Hexametrists have been. The experiments of Trissino, Sydney, and Spenser, produced a short-lived sensation, which perished with the sympathetic caprice of the times. The reputation of Mr. Southey may, even in the Georgian age, produce a parallel effect; but, independent of the probable causes of the failure already stated, the poem itself, being an occasional one, is on that account, also, more liable to forgetfulness.

"Viatrita, via tuta, is therefore as good a password for the aspirant who would climb Parnassus, as for the humble pilgrim who plods along the beaten path of Prose. There is no necessity, indeed no apology, for attempting to revive those misshapen forms of Poetry, — those 'immodulata poemata,' which have long ago been laid to rest, shrouded in cobwebs and buried in the dust. Ennius may be pardoned his imaginary metempsychosis, his Somnia Pythagorea, and assumption of the title 'Alter Homerus,' but the world would be loath now-a-days to allow the same privileges to an English poet.

"Had there been any good chance of imitating the classic hexameter, surely he (who by distinction among our Poets was called 'divine') must have succeeded in the enterprise. Spenser, however, relinquished the hopeless task; and it is to be regretted that his example, in this respect at least, has not acted preventively upon his worthy successor.

" In the farrage of metrical trash which has been extracted from the modern hexametrists of different countries, what is there worthy of example or remembrance, either in the subjects or execution of their performances? Human nature is indeed so fickle in her intellectual operations, that the most absurd and impracticable speculations have ever found partisans ready to advocate their truth, and embark in the execution of them. But the career of such preposterous enterprises can neither be prosperous nor long. To wage war against the opinions of the wise and experienced, is to challenge the fate of poor Dick Tinto, who after all his illspent time and labor, found himself ' patronized by one or two of those judicious persons who make a virtue of being singular, and of pitching their own opinions against those of the world in matters of taste and criticism.' Ever since the Republic of Letters was established, innovators of one kind or other have endeavored to supplant the sterling writers, not only of Greece and Rome, but of every civilized country. But when ingenuity or imitation can be foisted upon true scholarship, as the representative of original genius, the taste of the public must either be sadly perverted to relish what is bad, or be already satiated with that which is good.

"There can now be little, or rather no honor conferred upon our own legitimate Muse, by an attempt to naturalize a bastard race of metre, which has been banished from the most enlightened countries of Europe. Within the last two centuries, literature, arms, and commerce have extended our vernacular tongue over a vast portion of the globe, and it is spreading still further. On this, if on no other account, it behaves the guardians of our native quarry to see that it maintains its proper excellence, and to recommend, as worthy of imitation, only such standard works of art or science, as may have received the repeated sanction of the scholar and critic. The arts are naturally initative ; they will, however, sometimes, from mistaken judgment or self-confidence, undertake to copy that which is We cannot, under any coloring or inimitable. disguise, mistake the Muse of modern hexameter for the original Calliope of Homer or Virgil.

" In the preface to the Vision of Judgment, Mr. Southey assures us that a desire to realize one of the hopes of his youth was one among the leading causes of his enterprise : to this motive might have been superadded the conscientious discharge of an official duty, and the public expression of his loyalty and attachment to the reigning sovereign. With these, or such like considerations, the imaginary apotheosis of our late revered monarch seems to have cooperated in the plan and exocution of a poem, which cannot fail of giving offence to many serious and well-meaning persons. To dive into the mysteries of heaven, and to pronounce upon the eternal condition of departed kings or others, is unquestionably a bold, if not a presumptuous undertaking. But when this is carried on under the bias of political feelings, there is greater danger of its becoming erroneous, or digressing into what some might call impiety. It and quantities of words, with which not one but must, however, be remembered, that the 'Vision of Judgment' is neither more nor less than a poet's dream. Objections of a similar kind might apply to Dante or Milton, and to the subjects of their great labors, and in short to all scriptural themes. It would be difficult, perhaps, to determine in what manner the scenes of the Vision of Judgment could have been unobjectionably pertrayed. But there is no reason why a gentleman and scholar, like Mr. Southey, (who cannot, any more than the rest of the world, be deemed infallible,) should be loaded with abuse which would have been hardly justifiable had he published a series of poems as licentious as many of recent notoriety. No wonder, therefore, that the offended pride of the Laureate turns in disgust from the counsel of such unworthy rivals. When the eivilities of learning cease to be cherished. admonition will become nauseous, and criticism will lose half its usefulness. It is, however, to be hoped, that no dispassionate inquirer will be ranked, even by the Laureate, among the Duncery of the Georgian age. At all events, the Writer of the present remarks had rather accept an humble place among those whom King James has styled 'the docile bairnes of knowledge.' The Writer's stock in trade as a critic is poor and homely; a little recollection of the rules of prosody, accent, and rhythm, imprinted upon early memory by rod or ferula; an Etonian master and grammar -- remnants of seanning and proving - an ordinary pair of ears, and lungs no better than those of other folks. These seanty materials have been exercised in the examination of the 'Vision of Judgment,' and conclusions very different from those of its author have been deduced. And when the reader has perused the following eulogy by the Laureate upon the excellence of our blank verse, he will surely ask himself why that gentleman did not apply it in the composition of a poem, which, from the nature of its argument, embraced the terrible and sublime as well as the tender and pathetie. 'Take our blank verse for all in all, in all its gradations, from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or any other language, for might, and majesty, and flexibility, and compass.' A host of authors might be brought in support of this panegyrie upon English blank verse; but as it is against the modern hexametrists that the Writer has waged a somewhat long (though, as he trusts, a friendly) warfare, he will now draw his last shaft from the quiver of honest old Puttenham, and when he has shot it, will hang up his bow and shake hands with the Laureaie. Now, peradventure, with us Englishmen, it be somewhat too late to admit a new invention of feete and times, that our forefathers never used, nor ever observed till this day, either in their measures or in their pronunciation, and perchance will seem in us a presumptuous part to attempt; considering also it would be hard to find many men to like one man's choice, in the limitation of times every eare, is to be pleased and made a particular [effect, may produce very bad verses? You might judge; being most truly said that a multitude, or commonality, is hard to please and easy to offend. And therefore I intend not to proceed any further in this curiositye, than to shew the small subtility that any other hath yet done, and not by imitation, but by observation; not to the intent to have it put in execution in our vulgar Poesie, but to be pleasantly scanned upon, as are all novelties so frivolous and ridiculous as it.' "

After thanking Mr. Tillbrook for sending me his paniphlet, and for explaining what I should else have been sorry to notice, that it contained no intimation of the personal acquaintance and mutual good will which had so long subsisted between us, I addressed to him the following cursory remarks in reply to his observations : -

" The greater part of your Treatise is employed in very ably and pleasantly supplying the deficiencies of my Preface, in points wherein it was necess?rily deficient, because I was out of reach of materials. The remarks which are directed against my own hexameters appear to me altogether ill four:ded. You try the measure by Greek and Latin prosody : you might as well try me by the Laws of Solon, or the Twelve Tables. 1 have distinctly stated that the English hexameter is not constructed upon those canons, but bears the same relation to the ancient, that our heroic line does to the iambic verse. I have explained the principle of adaptation which I had chosen, and by that principle the measure ought to be judged.

"You bring forward arguments which are derived from music. But it by no means follows that a principle which holds good in music, should therefore be applicable to metre. The arts of music and poetry are essentially distinct; and I have had opportunities of observing that very skilful musieians may be as utterly without ear for metre, as I am myself without ear for music. If these arguments were valid, they would apply to the German hexameter as well as to the English; but the measure is as firmly established among the Germans as blank verse is with us, and, having been sanetioned by the practice of their best poets, can never become obsolete so long as the works of Voss, and Göethe, and Schiller are remembered, that is, as long as the language lasts.

"Twice you have remarked upon the length of the verse as oceasioning a difficulty in reading it aloud. Surely you have taken up this argument with little consideration, because it lay upon the surface. It is doubly fallacious : first, upon your own principle; for if the English verse is not isochronous with the Latin, it must be shorter; and, secondly, because the breath is regulated in reading by the length of the sentence, not by that of the verse.

"Why did you bring against my trochee in the fifth place an argument just as applicable to the spondaic verse, and which, indeed, is only saying that a versifier who writes without any regard to |

as well object to the Alexandrine that it admits of twelve monosyllables. And how is it that you, who know Glaramara so well, should have made me answerable for a vowel dropped at the press?

"You have dealt fairly in not selecting single lines, which, taken singly, would be unfavorable specimens; but methinks you should have exhibited one extract of sufficient length to show the effect of the measure. I certainly think that any paragraph of the poem containing from ten lines upward would confute all the reasoning which you have advanced, or which any one could adduce against the experiment.

"But I have done. It is a question dc gustibus, and therefore interminable. The proof of the pudding must be in the eating; and not all the reasoning in the world will ever persuade any one that the pudding which he dislikes is a good pudding, or that the pudding which pleases his palate and agrees with his stomach can be a bad one. I am glad that I have made the experiment, and quite satisfied with the result. The critics who write and who talk are with you; so, I dare say, are the whole posse of schoolmasters. The women, the young poets, and the docile bairns are with me.

"I thank you for speaking kindly and considerately concerning the subject of the Vision, and remain,

" My dear Sir,

"Yours very truly,

" ROBERT SOUTHLY

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

HAVING long been of opinion that an English metre might be constructed in imitation of the ancient hexameter, which would be perfectly consistent with the character of our language, and capable of great richness, variety, and strength, 1 have now made the experiment. It will have some disadvantages to contend with, both among learned and unlearned readers; among the former especially, because, though they may divest themselves of all prejudice against an innovation, which has generally been thought impracticable, and might even be disposed to regard the attempt favorably, nevertheless they will, from inveterate association, be continually reminded of rules which are inapplicable to our tongue; and looking for quantity where emphasis only ought to be expected, will perhaps less easily be reconciled to the measure, than those persons who consider it simply as it is. To the one class it is necessary that I should explain the nature of the verse; to the other, the principle of adaption which has been followed.

First, then, to the former, who, in glancing over these long lines, will perceive that they have none of the customary characteristics of English versification, being neither marked by rhyme, nor by any certain number of syllables, nor by any regular recurrence of emphasis throughout the verse. Upon closer observation, they will find that (with a very few exceptions) there is a regular recurrence of emphasis in the last five syllables of every line, the first and the fourth of those syllables being accented, the others not. These five syllables form two of the feet by which the verse is measured, and which are called dactyls and trochees, the dactyl consisting of one long syllable and two short ones, as exemplified in the name of Wellington; the trochee, of one long and one short, as exemplified in the name of Nelson. Of such feet, there are six in every verse. The four first are disposed according to the judgment and convenience of the writer; that is, they may be all dactyls or all trochees, or any mixture of both in any arrangement; but the fifth is always a dactyl, and the sixth always a trochee, except in some rare instances, when, for the sake of variety, or of some particular effect, a trochee is admitted in the fifth place. One more remark will suffice for this preliminary explanation. These feet are not constituted each by a separate word, but are made up of one or more, or of parts of words, the end of one and the beginning of another, as may happen. A verse of the Psalms, originally pointed out by Harris of Salisbury, as a natural and perfect hexameter, will exemplify what has been said : ---

W by do the [heathen] rage, and the [people i-] -magine a [vain thing?

This, I think, will make the general construction of the metre perfectly intelligible to persons who may be unacquainted with the rules of Latin versification; those, especially, who are still to be called gentle readers, in this ungentle age. But it is not necessary to understand the principle upon which the verse is constructed, in order to feel the harmony and power of a metrical composition; -if it were, how few would be capable of enjoying poetry ! In the present case, any one who reads a page of these hexameters aloud, with just that natural regard to emphasis which the sense of the passage indicates, and the usual pronunciation of the words requires, will perceive the rhythm, and find no more difficulty in giving it its proper effect, than in reading blank verse. This has often been tried, and with invariable success. If, indeed, it were not so, the fault would be in the composition, not in the measure.

The learned reader will have perceived, by what has already been said, that in forming this English measure in imitation, rather than upon the model of the ancient hexameter, the trochee has been substituted for the spondee, as by the Germans. This substitution is rendered necessary by the nature of our pronunciation, which is so rapid, that I believe the whole vocabulary of the language does not afford a single instance of a genuine native * spondee. The spondee, of course, is not excluded from the verse; and where it occurs, the effect, in general, is good. This alteration was necessary; but it is not the only one which, upon mature consideration and fair trial, it has been deemed expedient to make. If every line were to begin with a long syllable, the measure would presently appear exotic and forced, as being directly opposite to the general character of all our dignified metres, and indeed to the genius of the English language. Therefore the license has been taken of using any foot of two or three syllables at the beginning of a line; and sometimes, though less frequently, in the second, third, or fourth place. The metre, thus constructed, bears the same analogy to the ancient hexameter that our ten-syllable or heroic line does to iambic verse; iambic it is called, and it is so in its general movement; but it admits of many other feet, and would, in fact, soon become insupportably monotonous without their frequent intermixture.

* And only one of foreign derivation, which is the word \mathfrak{L}_{gypt} . Some readers, who have never practised metrical

П.

Twenty years ago, when the rhythmical romance of Thalaba was sent from Portugal to the press, I requested, in the preface to that poem, that the author might not be supposed to prefer the rhythm in which it was written, abstractedly considered, to the regular blank verse, the noblest measure, in his judgment, of which our admirable language is capable : it was added, that the measure which was there used, had, in that instance, been preferred, because it suited the character of the poem, being, as it were, the Arabesque ornament of an Arabian tale. Notwithstanding this explicit declaration, the duncery of that day attacked me as if I had considered the measure of Thalaba to be in itself essentially and absolutely better than blank verse. The duncery of this day may probably pursue the same course on the present occasion. With that body I wage no war, and enter into no explanations. But to the great majority of my readers, who will take up the book without malevolence, and, having a proper sense of honor in themselves, will believe the declarations of a writer whose veracity they have no reason to doubt, I will state what are the defects, and what the advantages, of the metre which is here submitted to their judgment, as they appear to me after this fair experiment of its powers.

It is not a legitimate inference, that because the hexameter has been successfully introduced in the German language, it can be naturalized as well in English. The English is not so well adapted for it, because it does not abound in like manner with polysyllabic words. The feet, therefore, must too frequently be made up of monosyllables, and of distinct words, whereby the verse is resolved and decomposed into its component feet, and the feet into their component syllables, instead of being composition in their own language, may perhaps doubt this, and suppose that such words as twilight and evening are spondaic; but they only appear so when they are pronounced singly, the last syllable then hanging upon the tongue, and dwelling on the ear, like the last stroke of the clock. articulated and inosculated throughout, as in the j of a saner judgment, and regarded the morals German, still more in the Greek, and most in the Latin measure. This is certainly a great defect." From the same cause the casura generally coincides with a pause in the sentence; but, though this breaks the continuity of the verse, it ought, perhaps, rather to be considered as an advantage; for the measure, like blank verse, thus acquires a greater variety. It may possibly be objected, that the four first feet are not metrical enough in their effect, and the two last too much so. I do not feel the objection; but it has been advanced by one, whose opinion upon any question, and especially upon a question of poetry, would make me distrust my own, where it happened to be different. Lastly, the doublc-ending may be censured as double rhymes used to be ; but that objection belongs to the duncery.

On the other hand, the range of the verse being from thirteen syllables to seventeen, it derives from that range an advantage in the union of variety with regularity, which is peculiar to itself. The capability which is thus gained, may perhaps be better appreciated by a few readers from their own sense of power, than it is exemplified in this experiment.

I do not, however, present the English hexameter as something better than our established metres, but as something different, and which therefore, for that reason, may sometimes advantageously be used. Take our blank verse, for all in all, in all its gradations, from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or in any other language, for might and majesty, and flexibility and compass. And this is affirmed, not as the predilection of a young writer, or the preference of one inexperienced in the difficulties of composition, but as an opinion formed and confirmed during the long and diligent study, and the long and laborious practice of the art. But I am satisfied also that the English hexameter is a legitimate and good measure, with which our literature ought to be enriched.

" I first adventure ; follow me who list ! "

Ш.

I am well aware that the public are peculiarly intolerant of such innovations; not less so than the populace used to be of any foreign fashion, whether of foppery or convenience. Would that this literary intolerance were under the influence

* It leads also to this inconvenience, that the English line greatly exceeds the ancient one in literal length, so that it is actually too long for any page, if printed in types of the ordinary proportion to the size of the book, whatever that may be. The same inconvenience was formerly felt in that fine measure of the Elizabethan age, the seven-footed couplet y, which, to the dimination of its powers, was, for that reason, divided into quatrains, (the pause generally falling upon the eighth syllable,) and then converted into the common ballad stanza. The hexameter cannot be thus divided, and therefore must generally look neither like prose nor poetry. This is noticed as merely a dissight, and of no moment, on poetry not being, like that of the Chinese, addressed to the eye instead of the ent.

more than the manner of a composition; the spirit rather than the form ! Would that it were directed against those monstrous combinations of horrors and mockery, lewdness and impiety, with which English poetry has, in our days, first heen polluted ! For more than half a century English literature had been distinguished by its moral purity, the effect, and, in its turn, the cause of an improvement in national manners. A father might, without apprehension of evil, have put into the hands of his children any book which issued from the press, if it did not bear, either in its title-page or frontispiece, manifest signs that it was intended as furniture for the brothel. There was no danger in any work which bore the name of a respectable publisher, or was to be procured at any respectable bookseller's. This was particularly the case with regard to our poetry. It is now no longer so; and woe to those by whom the offence cometh! The greater the talents of the offender, the greater is his guilt, and the more enduring will be his shame. Whether it be that the laws are in themselves unable to abate an evil of this magnitude, or whether it be that they are remissly administered, and with such injustice that the celebrity of an offender serves as a privilege whereby he obtains impunity, individuals are bound to consider that such pernicious works would neither be published nor written, if they were discouraged as they might, and ought to be, by public feeling; every person, therefore, who purchases such books, or admits them into his house, promotes the mischief, and thereby, as far as in him lies, becomes an aider and abettor of the crime.

The publication of a lascivious book is one of the worst offences that can be committed against the well-being of society. It is a sin, to the consequences of which no limits can be assigned, and those consequences no after-repentance in the writer can counteract. Whatever remorse of conscience he may feel when his hour comes (and come it must!) will be of no avail. The poignancy of a death-bed repentance cannot cancel one copy of the thousands which are sent abroad ; and as long as it continues to be read, so long is he the pander of posterity, and so long is he heaping up guilt upon his soul in perpetual accumulation.

These remarks are not more severe than the offence deserves, even when applied to those immoral writers who have not been conscious of any evil intention in their writings, who would acknowledge a little levity, a little warmth of coloring, and so forth, in that sort of language with which men gloss over their favorite vices, and deceive themselves. What, then, should be said of those for whom the thoughtlessness and inebriety of wanton youth can no longer be pleaded, but who have written in sober manhood and with deliberate purpose? — Men of diseased * hearts and depraved imaginations, who, forming a system of opinions to suit their own unhappy course of conduct, have rebelled against the holiest ordinances of human society, and hating that revealed religion which, with all their efforts and bravadoes, they are unable entirely to disbelieve, labor to make others as miserable as themselves, by infecting them with a moral virus that eats into the soul ! The school which they have set up may properly be called the Satanic school; for though their productions breathe the spirit of Belial in their lascivious parts, and the spirit of Moloch in those loathsome images of atrocities and horrors which they delight to represent, they are more especially characterized by a Satanic spirit of pride and audacions impiety, which still betrays the wretched feeling of hopelessness wherewith it is allied.

This evil is political as well as moral, for indeed moral and political evils are inseparably connected. Truly has it been affirmed by one of our ablest and clearest* reasoners, that "the destruction of governments may be proved and deduced from the general corruption of the subjects' manners, as a direct and natural cause thereof, by a demenstration as certain as any in the mathematics." There is no maxim more frequently enforced by Machiavelli, than that where the manners of a people are generally corrupted, there the government cannot long subsist, — a truth which all history exemplifies; and there is no means whereby that corruption can be so surely and rapidly diffused, as by poisoning the waters of literature.

Let rulers of the state look to this in time ! But, to use the words of South, if "our physicians think the best way of curing a disease is to pamper it, the Lord in mercy prepare the kingdom to suffer what IIe by miracle only can prevent!"

No apology is offered for these remarks. The subject led to them; and the occasion of introducing them was willingly taken, because it is the duty of every one, whose opinion may have any influence, to expose the drift and aim of those writers who are laboring to subvert the foundations of human virtue and of human happiness.

This essay, which is full of fine critical remarks and striking thoughts felicitously expressed, reached me from Pisa, while the proof of the present sheet was before me. Of its author, (the author of Gebir and Count Julian) I will only say in this place, that to have obtained his approbation as a poet, and possessed his friendship as a man, will be remembered among the honors of my life, when the petty enmities of this generation will be forgotten, and its ephemeral reputations shall have passed away.

IV.

Returning to the point from whence I digressed, I am aware not only that any metrical innovation which meets the eye of the reader generally provokes his displeasure, but that there prevails a particular prejudice against the introduction of hexameters in our language. The experiment, it is alleged, was tried in the Elizabethan age, and failed, though made under the greatest possible advantages of favor, being encouraged by the great patron of literature, Sir Philip Sydney, (in letters, as well as in all other accomplishments and all virtues, the most illustrious ornament of that illustrious court,) and by the Queen herself.

That attempt failed, because it was made upon a scheme which inevitably prevented its success. No principle of adaption was tried. Sydney, and his followers wished to subject the English pronunciation to the rules of Latin prosody; but if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new * pronunciation. There was the further obstacle of unusual and violent elisions; and moreover, the easy and natural order of our speech was distorted by the frequent use of forced inversions, which are utterly improper in an uninflected langnage. Even if the subjects for the experiment had been judiciously chosen, and well composed in all other respects, these errors must have been fatal; but Sydney, whose prose is so full of imagery and felicitous expressions, that he is one of our greatest poets in prose, and whose other poems contain beauties of a high order, seems to have lost all ear t for rhythm, and all feeling of poetry, when he was engaged in metrical experiments.

What in Sydney's hands was uncouth and difficult was made ridiculous by Stanihurst, whose translation of the four first books of the Æneid into hexameters is one of the most portentous compositions in any language. No satire could so effectually have exposed the measure to derision. The specimens which Abraham Fraunce produced were free from Stanihurst's eccentricities, and were much less awkward and constrained than Sydney's. But the mistaken principle upon which the metre was constructed was fatal, and would have proved so even if Fraunce had possessed greater powers of thought and of diction. The failure therefore was complete,‡ and for some generations it secons

Well may a pastor plain ; but alas! his plaints be not esteemed öppress'd with ruinoüs conceits by the help of an outcry Déspair most tragical clause to a deadly request. Hard like a rich marble ; hard but a fair diamond.

† That the reader may not suppose I have depreciated Sydney and his followers, by imputing to the faults of their execution a failure which the nature of the metre itself might explain, I have added a few fair samples at the end of the poem.

[‡] A writer in the Censura Literaria (vol. iv. 386[‡]) has said, that hexameters were "much in vogue, owing to the pernicious example of Spenser and Gabriel Harvey." They were never in vogue. There is no reason to believe, that Spenser ever wrote an English hexameter Gabriel Harvey's to have prevented any thought of repeating the experiment.

Goldsmith, in later days, delivered * an opinion in its favor, observing, that all the feet of the ancient poetry are still found in the versification of living languages, and that it is impossible the same measure, composed of the same times, should have a good effect upon the ear in one language, and a bad effect in another. He had seen, he says, several late specimens of English hexameters and sapphies, so happily composed, that they were, in all respects, as melodious and agreeable to the ear as the works of Virgil and Horace. What these specimens † were I have not discovered ; - the sapphics may possibly have been those by Dr. Watts. Proofs of the practicability of the hexameter were given, about twenty years ago, by some translations from the Messiah of Klopstock, which appeared in example only incurred ridicule; and as for Spenser, the only specimen which he is known to have produced is the following Tetrasticon: —

- See ye the blindefoulded pretie God, that feathered arches, Of lovers miseries which maketh his bloodie game?
- Wote ye why his mother with a veile hath covered his face? Trust me, leaste he my love happily chance to behold.

With so little knowledge of facts, and so little regard to accuracy, are confident ossertions sometimes made !

Gabriel Harvey was one of the great promoters of the attempt; and Spenser, who was bis intimate friend, is believed to have sanctioned it by his opinion, — certainly not by his example. That great master of versification has left only one piece which is not written in rhyme. It was printed in Davison's Poetical Rhapsodie, and is inserted in Warton's Observations on the Paery Queen, vol. ii. p. 245. The author has called it an lambic Elegy, but neither by any rule of quantity, or violence of accentuation, can it be reduced to iambics.

* " It is generally supposed," says Goldsmith, " that the genius of the English language will not admit of Greek or Latin measure ; but this, we apprehend, is a mistake owing to the prejudice of education. It is impossible that the same measure, composed of the same times, should have a good effect upon the ear in one language, and a bad effect in another. The truth is, we have been accustomed from our infancy to the numbers of English poetry, and the very sound and signification of the words disposes the ear to receive them in a certain manner; so that its disappointment must he attended with a disagreeable sensation. In imbibing the first rudiments of education, we acquire, as it were, another ear for the numbers of Greek and Latin poetry; and this being reserved entirely for the sounds and significations of the words that constitute those dead languages, will not easily accommodate itself to the sounds of our vernacular tongue, though conveyed in the same time and measure. In a word, Latin and Greek have annexed to them the ideas of the ancient measure from which they are not easily disjoined. But we will venture to say, this difficulty might be surmounted by an effort of attention and a little practice; and in that case we should in time be as well pleased with English, as with Latin hexameters." - Goldsmith's Essays, vol. ii. p. 265.

† Mr. Park (Censura Literaria, vol. iv. 233) mentions an attempt to revive what he calls "this obsolute whimsey by an anonymous writer in 1737, who translated the first and fourth Eclogues of Virgil, &c. into hexametrical verse, and prefixed a vindication of his attempt, with directions for the reader's pronunciation."

I venture to hope that this excellent English scholar will no longer think the scheme of writing English hexameters a mere whimsey. Glad indeed should I be, if my old acquaintance were to be as well pleased with the present attempt as I have been with some of his Morning Thoughts and Midnight Musings. the Monthly Magazine, and by an eelogue, entitled The Showman, printed in the second volume of the Annual Anthology. These were written by my old friend Mr. William Taylor of Norwieh, the translator of Burger's Lenora; — of whom it would be difficult to say, whether he is more deservedly admired by all who know him for the variety of his talents, the richness and ingenuity of his discourse, and the liveliness of his fancy, or loved and esteemed by them for the goodness of his heart. In repeating the experiment upon a more adequate scale, and upon a subject suited to the movement, 1 have fulfilled one of the hopes and intentions of my early life.

THE TRANCE.

- 'Twas at that sober hour when the light of day is receding,
- And from surrounding things the hues where with day has adorn'd them
- Fade, like the hopes of youth, till the beauty of earth is departed :
- Pensive, though not in thought, I stood at the window, beholding
- Mountain, and lake, and vale; the valley disrobed of its verdure;
- Derwent, retaining yet from eve a glassy reflection
- Where his expanded breast, then still and smooth as a mirror,
- Under the woods reposed; the hills that, calm and majestic,
- Lifted their heads in the silent sky, from far Glaramara
- Bleacrag, and Maidenmawr, to Grizedal and westermost Withop.
- Dark and distinct they rose. The clouds had gather'd above them
- High in the middle air, huge, purple, pillowy masses,
- While in the west beyond was the last pale tint of the twilight;
- Green as a stream in the glen whose pure and chrysolite waters
- Flow o'er a schistous bed, and serene as the age of the righteous.
- Earth was hush'd and still; all motion and sound were suspended:
- Neither man was heard, bird, beast, nor humming of insect,
- Only the voice of the Greta, heard only when all is in stillness.
- Pensive I stood and alone; the hour and the scene had subdued me;
- And as 1 gazed in the west, where Infinity seem'd to be open,
- Yearn'd to be free from time, and felt that this life is a thraldom.

Thus as I stood, the bell, which awhile from its warning had rested,

- And in a vault I found myself placed, arch'd oven on all sides.
- Narrow and low was that house of the dead. Around it were coffins,
- Each in its niche, and palls, and urns, and funeral hatchments;
- Velvets of Tyrian dye, retaining their hues unfaded;
- Blazonry vivid still, as if fresh from the touch of the limner;
- Nor was the golden fringe, nor the golden broidery tarnish'd.

Whence came the light whereby that place of death was discover'd?

- For there was there no lamp, whose wondrous flame inextinguish'd,
- As with a vital power endued, renewing its substance,
- Age after age unchanged, endureth in self-subsistence;
- Nor did the cheerful beam of day, direct or reflected,
- Penetrate there. That low and subterranean ehamber

Saw not the living ray, nor felt the breeze; but forever,

- Closely immured, was seal'd in perpetual silence and darkness.
- Whence then this lovely light, calm, pure, and soft, and cerulean,
- Such as the sapphire sheds? And whence this air that infuses
- Strength while I breathe it in, and a sense of life, and a stillness,
- Filling the heart with peace, and giving a joy that contents it?

Not of the Earth that light; and these paradisiacal breathings,

Not of the Earth are they 1

These thoughts were passing within me, When there arose around a strain of heavenly music.

- Such as the hermit hears when Angels visit his slumbers.
- Faintly it first began, scarce heard; and gentle its rising,
- Low as the softest breath that passes in summer at evening
- O'er the Eolian strings, felt there when nothing is moving,
- Save the thistle-down, lighter than air, and the leaf of the aspen.
- Then, as it swell'd and rose, the thrilling melody deepen'd;
- Such, methought, should the music be, which is heard in the closter,

THE AWAKENING.

- THEN I beheld the King. From a cloud which cover'd the pavement
- His reverend form uprose : heavenward his face was directed,
- Heavenward his eyes were raised, and heavenward his arms were extended.
- Lord, it is past! he cried ; the mist, and the weight, and the darkness ; -
- That long and weary night, that long, drear dream of desertion.
- Father, to Thee I come ! My days have been many and evil;
- Heavy my burden of care, and grievous hath been my affliction.
- Thou hast releas'd me at length. O Lord, in Thee have I trusted;
- Thou art my hope and my strength !- And then, in profound adoration,
- Crossing his arms on his breast, he bent and worshipp'd in silence.
 - Presently one approach'd to greet him with joyful obeisance;
- He of whom, in an hour of woe, the assassin bereaved us,
- When his counsels most, and his resolute virtue were needed.

- of Fortune,

Far away, confined in a rocky isle of the ocean,

- Fights his battles again, and pleased to win in the chamber
- What he lost in the field, in fancy conquers his conqueror.
- There he reviles his foes, and there the ungrateful accuses,
- For his own defaults, the men who too faithfully served him;
- Frets, and complains, and intrigues, and abuses the mercy that spared him.
- Oh that my King could have known these things ! could have witness'd how England
- Check'd in its full career the force of her enemy's empire,
- Singly defied his arms and his arts, and baffled them singly,
- Roused from their lethal sleep, with the stirring example, the nations,
- And the refluent tide swept him and his fortune before it.

Oh that my King, ere he died, might have seen the fruit of his counsels !

Nay, it is better thus, the Monarch piously answer'd;

- Here 1 can bear the joy; it comes as an earnest of Heaven.
- Righteous art Thou, O Lord ! long-suffering, but sure are thy judgments.

THE ELDER WORTHIES.

- LIFT up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting Portals, Be ye lift up ! Behold, the Worthies are there to
- receive him,
- They who, in later days, or in elderages, ennobled,
- Britain's dear name. Bede I beheld, who, humble and holy,
- Shone like a single star, serene in a night of darkness.
- Bacon also was there, the marvellous Friar; and he who
- Struck the spark from which the Bohemian kindled his taper;
- Thence the flame, long and hardly preserved, was to Luther transmitted,
- Mighty soul, and he lifted his torch, and enlighten'd the nations.
 - Thee, too, Father Chaucer, I saw, and delighted to see thee,
- At whose well undefiled I drank in my youth, and was strengthen'd;
- With whose mind immortal so oft I have communed, partaking
- All its manifold moods, and willingly moved at its pleasure.
- Bearing the palm of martyrdom, Cranmer was there in his meekness,
- Holy name, to be ever revered ! And Cecil, whose wisdom
- Stablish'd the Church and State, Eliza's pillar of council.
- And Shakspeare, who in our hearts for himself hath erected an empire
- Not to be shaken by Time, nor e'er by another divided.
- But with what love did 1 then behold the face of my master, —
- Spenser, my master dear! with whom in boyhood I wander'd
- Through the regions of Faery land, in forest or garden
- Spending delicious hours, or at tilt and tourney rejoicing;
- Yea, by the magic of verse enlarged, and translated in spirit,
- In the World of Romance free denizen I; till awakening,
- When the spell was dissolved, this real earth and its uses
- Seem'd to me weary, and stale, and flat.

With other emotion

- Milton's severer shade I saw, and in reverence humbled
- Gazed on that soul sublime: of passion now as of blindness
- Heal'd, and no longer here to Kings and to Hierarchs hostile,
- He was assoil'd from taint of the fatal fruit; and in Eden

- Not again to be lost, consorted an equal with Angels.
- Taylor too was there, from whose mind of its treasures redundant
- Streams of eloquence flow'd, like an inexhaustible fountain:
- And the victor of Blenheim, alike in all virtues accomplish'd,
- Public or private, he; the perfect soldier and statesman,
- England's reproach and her pride; her pride for his noble achievements,
- Her reproach for the wrongs he endured. And Newton, exalted
- There above those orbs whose motions from earth he had measured,
- Through infinity ranging in thought. And Berkeley, angelic
- Now in substance as soul, that kingdom enjoying where all things
- Are what they seem, and the good and the beautiful there are eternal.

THE WORTHIES OF THE GEORGIAN AGE.

- THESE with a kindred host of great and illustrious spirits
- Stood apart, while a train, whom nearer duty attracted,
- Through the Gate of Bliss came forth to welcome their Sovereign.
- Many were they and glorious all. Conspicuous among them
- Wolfe was seen. And the seaman who fell on the shores of Owylee,
- Leaving a lasting name, to humanity dear as to science.
- And the mighty musician of Germany, ours by adoption,
- Who beheld in the King his munificent pupil and patron.
- Reynolds, with whom began that school of art which hath equall'd
- Richest Italy's works, and the masterly labors of Belgium,
- Came in that famous array. And Hogarth, who follow'd no master,
- Nor by pupil shall e'er be approach'd, alone in his greatness.
- Reverend in comely mien, of aspect mild and benignant,
- There, too, Wesley I saw and knew, whose zeal apostolic,
- Though with error alloy'd, hath on earth its merited honor,
- As in heaven its reward. And Mansfield, the just and intrepid ;
- Wise Judge, by the craft of the Law ne'er seduced from its purpose;

This effect of twilight, and in the very scene described, has been lately represented by Mr. William Westall, in one of his Views of the Lakes, with the true feeling and power of genius. The range of mountains which is described in these introductory lines, may also be seen in his View of the Vale of Keswick from the Penrith road.

Green as a stream in the glen whose pure and chrysolite waters Flow o'er a schistous bed. -1. col. 2, p. 795.

St. Pierre, who is often a funciful, generally a delightful, but always an animated and ingenious writer, has some characteristic speculations concerning this green light of evening. lle says, Je suis porté d'attribuer d'la couleur verte des végétaux qui couvrent en été une grande partie de notre hémisphère, cette belle teinte d'émeraude que l'on apperçoit quelquefois dans cette saison au firmament, vers le couchre du soled. Elle est rare dans nos climats ; mais elle est fréquente entre les trapiques, où l'été dure toute l'année. Je sais bien qu'on peut rendre raison de ce phénomène por la simple réfraction des rayons du soleil dans Patmosphère, ce prisme sphérique de notre globe. Mais, outre qu'on peut objecter que la couleur verte ne se voit point en hiver dans notre eicl, c'est que je peux apporter d l'appui de mon opinion d'autres faits qui semblent prouver que la couleur même azurée de l'atmosphère n'est qu'une réflection de celle de l'océan. En effet, les gluces flottantes qui descendent tous les ans du pole nord, s'annoncent, devant de paroître sur l'horizon, par une lueur blanche qui éclaire le ciel jour et nuit, et qui n'est qu'un reflet des neiges cristallisées qui les composent. Cette lueur paroît semblable d celle de l'aurare boréale, dont le foyer est au milieu des glaces même de notre pole, mais dont la couleur blanche est mélangée de jaune, de rouge, et de vert, parce qu'elle participe des couleurs du sol ferrugineux et de la verdure des forêts de sapins qui convrent notre zone glaciale. La cause de cette variation de couleurs dans notre aurore boréale est d'autant plus vraisemblable, que l'aurore australe, comme l'a observé le Capitaine Cook, en diffère en ce que sa couleur blanche n'est jamais mélangée que de teintes bleues, qui n'ont lieu, selon moi, que parce que les glaces du pole austral, sans continent et sans végétaux, sont entourées de toutes parts de l'océan, qui est blou. Ne grande partie de glaciers très-élevés, nous renvoie en lumièrs d'un blanc bleuâtre les rayons du soleil, qui sont dorés dans notre atmosphère ferrugineuse? N'est-ce pas par la réverbération d'un sol composé de fer, que la pluncte de Murs nous réfléchit. en tout temps, une lumière rouge? N'est-il pas plus naturel d'attribuer ces coulcurs constantes aux réverbérations du sol, des mers, et des végétaux de ces planétes, plutôt qu'aux réfractions variables des rayons du soleil dans leurs atmosphères, dont les couleurs devroient changer à toute heure, suivant leurs différens aspects avec cet astre! Comme Murs apparoît constamment rouge d la terre, il est possible que la terre appuroisse d Mars comme une pierrerie brillante des couleurs de l'opale au pole nord, de celles de l'aigue-marine au pole sud, et, tour-d-tour, de celles du saphir et de l'émeraude dans le reste de sa circonférence. Mais, sans sortir de notre atmosphère, je crois que la terre y renvoie la couleur bleue de son océan avec des reflets de la couleur verte de ses végétaux, en tout temps dans la zone torride, et en été seulement dans nos climats, par la même raison que ces deux poles y refléchissent des aurores boréales différentes, qui participent des couleurs de la terre, ou des mers qui les avoisinent.

Peut-être même notre atmosphère réfléchit-elle quelquefois les formes des paysages, qui annoncent les îles aux navigateurs bien long temps avant qu'às puissent y aborder. Il est remarquable qu'elles ne se montrent comme les reflets de verdure qu'à l'horizon et du côte du soleil couchant. Je eiterai, d ce sujet, un homme de l'Ile de France qui apercevoit dans le ciel les images des vaisseaux qui étoient en pleine mer : le célèbre Vernet, qui m'a atteste avoir vu une fois dans les nuages les tours et les remparts d'une ville située d sept lieues de lui ; et le phénoméne du détroit de Sicile, connu sous le nom de Fee-Morgane. Les nuages et les vapeurs de l'atmosphère peuvent fort bien réflèchir les formes et les couleurs des objets terrestres, puisqu'ils refléchissent dans les parélies l'image du soleil au point de la rendre ardente comme le solcil lui-même. Enfin, les caux de la terre répétent les couleurs et les formes des nunges de l'atmosphère : pourquoi les vapeurs de l'atmosphère ? à leur tour, ne pourroient-elles pas réfléchir le bleu de la mrr, la verdure et le jaune de la terre, ainsi que les couleurs chatoyantes des glaces polaires ?

Au reste, je ne donne mon opinion que comme mon opinion. L'histoire de la nature est une édifice d peine commencé; ne eraignons pas d'y poser quelques pierres d'attente : nos neveux s'en servicont pour l'agrandir, ou les suprimeront comme superflues. Si mon autorité est nulle dans l'avenir, peu importera que je me sois trompé sur ce point : mon ouverage renterer dans Pobseurité d'ord ut étoit sorti. Mais s'il est un jour de quelque considération, mon erreur en physique sera plus utile à la morale, qu'une vérité d'ailleurs indifierente au banheur des hommes. Or en conclura avec raison qu'il faut être en garde contre les écri vains même accrédités. — Harmonies de la Nature, 1, i, 129.

"I am inclined to attribute to the green color of the vegetables with which, during the summer, a great part of our hemisphere is covered, that beautiful emerald tint which we sometimes perceive at that season in the firmament, towards the setting of the sun. It is rare in our climates, but is frequent between the tropics, where summer continues throughout the year. I know that this phenomenon may be explained by the simple refraction of the rays of the sun in the atmosphere, that spherical prism of our globe. But to this it may be objected, that the green color is not seen during the winter in our sky; and moreover, I can support my opinion by other facts, which appear to prove that even the azure color of the atmosphere is only a reflection of that of the ocean. In fact, the floating ice which descends every year from the North Pole, is announced before it appears upon the horizon, by a white blink which enlightens the heaven day and night, and which is only a reflection of the crystallized snows, of which those masses are composed. This blink resembles the light of the aurora borealis, the centre of which is in the middle of the ice of our pole, but the white color of which is mixed with yellow, with red, and with green, because it partakes of the color of a ferruginous soil, and of the verdure of the pine forests which cover our icy zone. This explanation of these variations of color in our aurora borealis, is so much the more probable, because that of the aurora australis, as Captain Cook has observed, differs in that its white color is mixed with blue tints alone, which can only be, according to my opinion, because the ice of the austral pole (where there is no continent and no vegetation) is surrounded on all parts with the ocean, which is blue. Do we not sue that the moon, which we suppose to be covered in great part with very elevated glaciers, sends back to us, in a light of a bluish white, the rays of the sun, which are golden in our ferruginous atmosphere? Is it not by the reverberation of a soil composed of iron, that the planet Mars reflects upon us, at all times, a red light? Is it not more natural to attribute these coastant colors to the reverberation of the soil, of the seas, and of the vegetables of these planets, rather than to the variable refractions of the rays of the sun in their atmospheres, the colors of which ought to change every hour, according to their different aspects with regard to that stor? As Mars appears constantly red to the earth, it is possible that the earth might appear to Mars like a brilliant jewel, of the color of the opal towards the North Pole, of the agoa marina at the South Pole, and alternately of the sapphire in the rest of its circumference. But without going out of our atmosphere, I believe that the earth reflects there the blue color of its ocenn with the green of its vegetation, at all times in the torrid zone, and in summer only in our climate, for the same reason that its two poles reflect their different auroras, which participate of the colors of the earth or the seas that are near them.

"Perhaps our atmosphere sometimes reflects landscapes, which announce islands to the sailors long hefore they reach them. It is remarkable that they show themselves, like the reflections of verdure, only in the horizon and on the side of the setting sun. I shall cite, on this subject, a man of the Isle of France, who used to perceive in the sky the images of vessels which were out in full sea ; the celebrated Vernet, who related to me that he had once seen in the clouds the ramparts of a town, situated seven leagues distant from him, and the phenomenon of the straits of Sicily, known under the name of the Fata Morgana. The clouds and the vapors of the atmosphere may very well reflect the forms and the colors of earthly objects, since they reflect in parhelions the image of the sun, so as to render it burning as the sun itself. In fine, if the waters of the carth repeat the colors and the forms of the clouds of the atmosphere, why then should not the vapors of the atmosphere, in their turn, reflect the blue of the sea, the verdure and the yellow of the earth, as well as the glancing colors of the polar ices?

⁶⁴ I advance my opinion, however, only as my opinion. The history of nature is an edifice which, as yet, is scarcely commenced; let us not fear to carry some stones towards the building; our grandchildren will use them, or lay them aside if they be useless. If my authority is of no weight hereafter, it will import little that I have deceived myself upon this point; my work will enter into obscurity, from whence it came; but if it should be, in future, of some consideration, my error in physics will be more useful to morals than a truth, otherwise indifferent to the happiness of mankind. For it will be inferred with reason, that it is necessary to regard even writers of credit with caution."

In one point of fact, St. Pierre is certainly mistaken. The green evening light is seen as often in winter as in summer. Having been led to look for it in consequence of suspecting the accuracy of his remarks, I noticed it on the very day when this extract was transcribed for the press, (late in December,) and twice in the course of the ensuing week; and I observed it, not in the evening alone, and in the west, (in which quarter, however, and at which time, it is most frequently seen.) but in different parts of the sky, and at different times of the day.

Whether France or Britain be threatened, Soon will the issue show, or if both at once are endanger'd. HI. col. I, p. 798.

The murder of the Duke of Berry, and the Cato-street conspiracy, were both planned at the time of the King's death.

This is the Gate of Bliss. - IV. col. 2, p. 798.

The reader will so surely think of the admirable passage of Dante, which was in the writer's mind when these lines were composed, that I should not think it necessary to notice the imitation, were it not that we live in an age of plagiarism; when not our jackdaws only, but some of our swans also, trick themselves in borrowed plumage. I have never contracted an obligation of this kind, either to contemporary or predecessor, without acknowledging it.

Discontent and disloyalty, like the teeth of the dragon, He had sown on the winds; they had ripen'd beyond the Atlantic. V. col. 2, p. 799,

"Our New World," says M. Simond, "has generally the credit of having first lighted the torch which was to illuminate, and soon set in a blaze, the finest part of Europe ; yet I think the flint was struck, and the first spark elicited, by the patriot, John Wilkes, a few years before. In a time of profound peace, the restless spirits of men, deprived of other objects of public curiosity, seized with avidity on those questions which were then agitated with so much violence in England, touching the rights of the people, end of the government, and the nature of power. The end of the political drama was in favor of what was called, and in some respect was, the liberty of the people. Encouraged by the success of this great comedian. the curtain was no sooner dropped on the scene of Europe, than new actors hastened to raise it again in America, and to give the world a new play, infinitely more interesting, and more brilliant, than the first."

Dr. Franklin describes the state of things during the reign of Wilkes and liberty. He says, "There have been amazing contests all over the kingdom, twenty or thirty thousand pounds of a side spent in several places, and inconceivable mischief done, by drunken, mad mohs, to houses, windows, &c. The scenes have been horrible. London was illuminated two nights mnning, at the command of the mob, for the success of Wilkes in the Middlesex election; the second night exceeded any thing of the kind ever seen here on the greatest occasions of rejoicing, as even the small cross streets, lanes, courts, and other out-of-the-way places, were all in a hlazo with lights, and the principal streets all night long, as the mobs weat round again after two o'clock, and obliged people who had extinguished their candles, to light them again. Those who refused had all their windows destroyed. The damage done, and the expense of candles, has been computed at fifty thousand pounds. It must have been great, though probably not so much. The ferment is not yet over, for he has promised to surrender to the court next Wednesday, and another tumnit is then expected; and what the upshot will be, no one can yet foresee. It is really an extraordinary event, to see an outlaw and exile, of bad personal character, not worth a farthing, come over from France, set himself up as a candidate for the capital of the kingdom, miss his election only by being too late in his application, and immediately carrying it for the principal county. The moh, (spirited up by numbers of different ballads, sung or roared in every street.) requiring gentlemen and ladies of all ranks, as they passed in their carriages, to shout for Wilkes and liberty, marking the same words on all their coaches with chalk, and No 45 on every door, which extends a vast way along the roads in the country. I went last week to Winchester, and observed that for fifteen miles out of town there was scarce a door or window-shutter next the road unmarked; and this continued here and there quite to Winchester, which is sixty-four miles.

Even this capital, the residence of the king, is now a daily scene of lawless riot and confusion. Mobs patrolling the street at noonday, some knocking all down that will not roar for Wilkes and liberty; courts of justice afraid to give judgment against kim; conl-heavers and porters pulling down the houses of coul-merchants that refuse to give them more wages ; sawyers destroying saw-atills; sailors ourigging all the outward-bound ships, and suffering none to sail till merchants agree to mise their pay; watermen destroying private boats, and threatening bridges; soldiers firing among the mobs, and killing men, women, and children, which seems only to have produced an universal sullenness, that looks like a great black cloud coming on, ready to burst in a general tempest. What the event will be God only knows. But some punishment seems preparing for a people who are ungratefully abusing the best constitution, and the best king, any nation was ever blessed with; intent on nothing but luxury, licentiousness, power, places, pensions and plunder, while the ministry, divided in their councils, with little regard for each other, wearied by perpetual oppositions, in continual apprehension of changes, intent on secoring popularity, in case they should lose favor, have, for some years past, had little time or inclination to attend to our small affairs, whose remoteness makes them eppear still smaller.

All respect to law and government seems to be lost among the common people, who are moreover continually inflamed by seditious scribblers to trample on authority, and every thing that used to keep them in order.²⁷

Thou too didst act with upright heart, as befitted a Sovereign, True to his sacred trust, to his crown, his kingdom, and people. VI. col. 1, p. 801.

I am pleased to find (since the first publication of this poem) the same opinion forcibly expressed by Cowper. "It appears to me," he says, (writing in 1782,) "that the king is bound, hoth by the duty he owes to himself and to his people, to consider himsell, with respect to every inch of his territories, as a trustee deriving his interest in them from God, and invested with them by divine authority, for the benefit of his subjects. As he may not sell them or waste them, so he may not resign them to an enemy, or transfer his right to govern them to any, not even to themselves, so long as it is possible for him to keep it. If he does, he betrays at once his own interest, and that of his other dominious. It may he said, suppose Providence has ordained that they shall be wrested from him, how then? I answer, that cannot appear to be the case, till God's purpose is actually accomplished; and in the mean time the most prohable prospect of such an event does not release him from his obligation to hold them to the last moment, forasmuch as adverse appearances are no infallible indications of God's designs, hut may give place to more comfortable symptoms when we least expect it. Viewing the thing in this light, if I sat on his Majesty's throne, I should he as obstinate as him, because, if I quitted the contest while I had any means left of carrying it on, I should never know that I had not relinquished what I might have retained, or be able to render a satisfactory answer to the doubts and inquiries of my own conscience."

The wise and dignified manner in which the late King received the first minister from the United States of America is well known. It is not so generally known that anxiety and sleeplessness, during the American war, are believed by those persons who had the best opportunity for forming an opinion upon the subject, to have laid the foundation of that malady by which the King was afflicted during the latter years of his life.

Upon the publication of Captain Cook's Voyages, a copy of this national work was sent to Dr. Franklin, by the King's desire, because he had given orders for the protection of that illustrious navigator, in case he should full in with any American cruisers on his way home.

Casm in that insolent hour, and over his fortune triumphant. VIII. col. 1, p. 802.

The behavior of Charles in that insolent hour extorted admiration even from the better part of the Commonwealth'smen. It is thus finely described by Audrew Marvel: -- While round the armed bands Did clap their bloody hands, He nothing common did, or mean. Upon that memorable scene; But with his keener eye The axe's edge did try: Nor call'd the Gods with vulgar spight To vindicate his helpless right; But how'd his comely head Down, as upon a hed.

Magnificent Edward,

He who made the English renown, and the fame of his Windsor In the Orient and Occident known from Tagus to Tigris. V111. col. 2, p. 802

The celebrity which Windsor had obtained, as being the most splendid court in Christendom, and the scat of chivalry, may be plainly seen in the romance of Amadis, which was written in Portugal, towards the latter end of Edward the Third's reign. The Portuguese in that age took their military terms from the English, and St. George came into fashion among them at the same time, as being the English Santiago.

A dispute arose between two knights, the one a Cypriot, the other a Frenchman, who were serving the King of Armenia against the Soldan of Babylon. The other Christian captains in the anny determined that they should decide it by single combat before King Edward of England, as the most worthy and honorable prince in ell Christendom; and the quarrel, which hegan in Armenia, was actually thus decided within the lists, et the palace of Westminster. It was won, not very honorably, by the Frenchman.

He, who discovering the secret Of the dark and ebullient abyss, with the fire of Vesuvius Arm'd the chemist's hand. — XI, col. 1, p. $\dot{c}05$.

Though chemistry is one of the subjects of which I am contented to be ignorant, I can nevertheless perceive and appreciate the real genius indicated by Dr. Clarke's discovery in the art of fusion. See his Treatise upon the Gas Blew-Pipe; or the account of it in the Quarterly Review, No. xlvi. p. 466.

In referring to the Safety Lamp of Sir Humphrey Davy, I must not be understood as representing that to be the most important of his many and great discoveries. No praise can add to his deserved celebrity.

Not to his affectionate spirit Could the act of madness innate for guilt be accounted. XI. col. 1, p. 805.

The act of suicide is very far from being so certain an indication of insanity as it is usually considered by our inquests. But in the case of Chatterton, it was the manifestation of an hereditary disease. There was a madness in his family. His only sister, during one part of her life, was under confinement.

The law respecting suicide is a most barbarous one; and of late years has never been carried into effect without exciting horror and disgust. It might be a sulutary enactment that all suicides should be given up for dissection. This would certainly prevent many women from committing self-monder, and possibly might in time he useful to physiology. But a sufficient objection to it is, that it would aggravate the distrees of afflicted families.

The gentle Amelia. - XII. col. 2, p. 805.

In one of his few intervals of sanity, after the death of this beloved daughter, the late King gave orders that a monument should be crected to the memory of one of her attendants, in St George's Chapel, with the following inscription :---

SPECIMENS, & c.

King GEORGE IH. caused to be interred near this place the body of MARY GASCOIGNE, Servant to the Princess AMELIA; and this stone to be inscribed in testimony of his grateful sense of the faithful services and attachment of an amiable Young Woman to his beloved Daughter, whom she survived only three months. She died 19th of Febreary, 1811.

This may probably be considered as the last act of his life; - a very affecting one it is, and worthy of remembrance. Such a monument is more honorable to the King by whom it was set up, than if he had erected a pyramid.

SPECIMENS. &c.

THE annexed Specimens of Sir Philip Sydney's hexameters will sefficiently evince that the failers of the attempt to naturalize this fine measure in his days, was owing to the manner which the attempt was made, not the measure itself.

First shall fertile grounds not yield increase of a good seed, First the rivers shall cease to repay their floods to the oceao : First may a trusty greyhound transform bimself to a tyger. First shall vertue he vice, and heauty be counted a blemish ; Ere that I leave with song of praise her praise to solemnize, Her praise, whence to the world all praise hath his only beginning:

But yet well I do find each man most wise in his own case. None can speak of a woend with skill, if he have not a wound felt: [ment:

Great to thee my state seems, thy state is blest by my judg-And yet neither of us great or hlest deemeth his own self, For yet (weigh this, alas !) great is not great to the greater. What judge you doth a hillnek show, by the lofty Olympus? Such my minute greatness doth seem compar'd to the greatest. When Cedars to the ground fall down by the weight of an Emmet,

Or when a rich Rubie's price be the worth of a Walnut, Or to the Sun for wonders seem small sparks of a candle : Then by my high Cedar, rich Rubie, and only shining Sun, Vertues, riches, heauties of mine shall great he reputed. Oh, no, no, worthy Shepherd, worth can never enter a title, Where proofs justly do teach, thus matcht, such worth to be [them nought worth ;

Let not a Puppet abuse thy sprite, Kings' Crowns do not help From the cruel headach, nor shoes of gold do the gout heal; And precious Couches full oft are shak't with a feaver. If then a bodily evil in a bodily gloze he not hidden, Shall such morning dews he an ease to the heat of a love's fire ?

Sydney's pentameters appear even more uncouth than his hexameters, as more unlike their model; for, in our pronunciation, the Latin pentameter reads as if it ended with two trochees.

- Fortune, Nature, Love, long have contended about me, Which should most miseries cast on a worm that I am.
- Fortune thus 'gan say, misery and misfortune is all one, And of misfortune, fortune hath only the gift.

With strong foes on land, on sea with contrary tempests, Still do I cross this wretch what so he taketh in hand.

Tush, tush, said Nature, this is all but a trifle, a man's self Gives haps or mishaps, even as he ordereth his heart.

But so his humor I frame, in a mould of choler adusted, That the delights of life shall he to bim doloroes.

Love smiled, and thus said ; what joyn'd to desire is unhappy : But if he nought do desire, what can Heraclitus ail?

None but I work by desire : by desire have I kindled in his soul Infornal agonies into a beauty divine :

Where thou poor Nature left'st all thy due glory, to Fortune Her vertue is soveraign, Fortune a vassal of hers.

Nature abasht went back : Fortune blesht : yet she replied thus :

And even in that love shall I reserve him a spite.

Thus, thus, alas ! woful by Nature, unhappy hy Fortune ; Bet most wretched I am, now love wakes my desire.

Sydney has also given examples in his Arcadia of Anaereontic, Phaleocian, Sapphie, and Asclepiad verse, all written upon the same erroneous principle. These persons who consider it ridiculous to write English verses upon any scheme of Latin versification, may perhaps be surprised to learn that they have read, as blank verse, many lines which are perfect Sapphics or Phaleuciaus. Rowe's tragedies are fall of such lines.

The Censura Literaria sepplies me with two choice samples of Staniherst's Virgil.

" Neere joynctlye brayeth with rufflerye * rumboled .Etna: Soomtyme owt it bolcketh t from bulck clouds grimly bedimmed Stauihurst's Virgil is certainly one of those curiosities in our literature which ought to be reprinted. Yet notwithstanding the almost incredible absurdity of this version, Stanihurst is entitled to an honorable remembrance for the part which he contributed to Holinshed's Collection of Chronicles. None of our Chroniclers possessed a mind better stored, nor an intellect more perpetually on the alert.

Sydney, who failed so entirely in writing hexameters, has written concerning them in his Defence of Poesie, with the good sense and propriety of thought by which that beautiful treatise is distinguished. Let me not be thought to disparage this admirable man and delightfol writer, because it has been necessary for me to show the cause of his failure in an attempt wherein I have now followed him. I should not forgive myself were I ever to mention Sydney without an expression of reverence and love.

* Ruffling seems to be turbulent noise. A ruffler was formerly a boisterous bully.

" Of versifying," he says, " there are two sorts, the one ancient, the other modern; the ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and, according to that, framed his verse ; the modern, observing only number, with some regard of the accent; the chief life of it standeth in that like sounding of the words which we call Rhyme. Whether of these be the more excellent, would bear many speeches, the ancient, no doubt, more fit for musick, both words and time observing quantity, and more fit lively to express divers passions by the low or lofty sound of the well-weighed syllable. The latter likewise with his Rhyme striketh a certain musick to the ear; and, in fine, since it doth delight, though by another way, it obtaineth the same purpose, there being in either sweetness, and wanting in neither majesty. Truly the English, before any vulgar language I know, is fit for both sorts ; for, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels, that it must ever be cumbered with elisions : the Dutch so, of the other side, with consonants, that they cannot yield the sweet sliding ht for a verse. The French, in his whole language, hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable, saving two, called Antepenultima; and little more bath the Spanish, and therefore very gracelesly may they use Dactyls; the English is subject to none of these defects. Now for Rhyme, though we do not observe quantity, yet we observe the accent very precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely.

"That Cæsura, or breathing-place, in the midst of the verse, neither Italian nor Spanish have; the French and we never almost fail of. Lastly, the very Rhyme itself the Italian cannet put in the last syllable, by the French named the Masculine Rhyme, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the Female, or the next before that, which the Italian call Sdrucciola; the example of the former is Bueno Suono: of the Sdrucciola, is Femina Semina. The French, on the other side, hath beth the male, as Bon Son; and the Female, as Plaise, Taise, but the Sdrucciola he hath not, where the English hath all three, as Duc, True, Father, Rather, Motion, Potion, with much more, which might be said, but that already 1 find the trifling of this discourse is too much enlarged."

The French attempted to introduce the ancient metres some years before the trial was made in England. Pasquier says, that Estienne Jodelle led the way in the year 1553, by this distich upon the poems of Olivier de Maigny, "lequel," he adds, "est eraucanent une petit chef-d'auvre."

Phabus, Amour, Cypris, veut sauver, nourcir et orner Ton vers et chef, d'umbre, de flamme, de fleurs.

Pasquier himself, three years afterwards, at the solicitation of a friend, produced the following "essay de plus longue haleine:"-

- Rieu ne me plaist sinon de te chanter, et servir et orner; Rien ne te plaist mon bien, rien ne te plaist que ma mort. Plus je requiers, et plus je me tiens seur d'estre refusé,
- Et ce refus pourtant point ue me semble refus.
- O trompeurs attraicts, desir ardent, prompte volonté, Espoir, non espoir, ains miserable pipeur.
- Discours mensongers, trahistreux ocil, aspre cruauté, Qui me ruine le corps, qui me ruine le cœur.
- Pourquoy tant de faveurs t'ont les Cieux mis d l'abandon, Ou pourquoy dans moy si violente fureur?
- Si vaine est ma fureur, si vain est tout ce que des cieux Tu tiens, s'en toy gist cette cruelle rigeur :
- Dirux patrons de l'amour bannissez d'elle la beauté, Ou bien l'accouplez d'une amiable pitié ;
- Ou si dans le miel vous meslez un venemeuz fiel, Vueillez Dieuz que l'amour r'entre dedans le Chaos : Commandez, que le froid, l'eau, l'Esté, l'humide, l'ardeur :

Brief que ce tout par tout tende à l'abisme de tous, Pour finir ma douleur, pour finir cette cruauté,

Qui me ruine le corps, qui me ruine le cœur.

Non helas que ce rond soit tout un sans se rechanger, Mais que va Sourde se change, ou de face, ou de façons : Mais que ma Sourde se change, et plus douce escoute les voix, Voix que je seme criant, voix que je seme, riant

Et que le feu du froid desormais puisse triompher, Et que le froid au feu perde sa lente vigeur : Ainsi s'assopira mon tourment, et la cruauté Qui me ruine le corps, qui me ruine le caur.

" Je ne dy pas," says the anthor, " que ces vers soient de quelque valeur, aussi ne les mets-je icy sur la monstre en intention qu'on les trouve tels ; mais bien estime-je qu'ils sont autant fluides que les Latins, et d tant veux-je que l'on pense nostre vulgaire estre aucunement capable de ce subject." Pasquier's verses were not published till many years after they were written ; and in the mean time Jean Antoine de Baif made the attempt upon a larger scale, - " Toutesfois, says Pasquier, " en ce subject si mouvais parrain que non seulement il ne fut suivy d'aucun, mais au contraire descouragea un chacun de s'y em ployer. D'autant que tout ce qu'il en fit estoit tant despourveu de cette naifveté qui doit accompagner nos auvres, qu'aussi tost que cette sienne poësie voit la lumiere, elle mourut comme un avorton." The Abbe Gonjet, therefore, had no reason to reppresent this attempt as a proof of the bad taste of the age : the bad taste of an age is proved, when vicious compositions are applauded, not when they are unsuccessful. Jean Antoine de Baif is the writer of whom Cardinal du Perron said, " qu'il ctoit bon homme, mais qu'il ctoit méchant poète François."

I subjoin a specimen of Spanish Hexameters, from an Eclogue by D. Esteban de Villegas, a poct of great and deserved estimation in his own country.

Licidas y Coridon, Coridon el amante de Filis, Pastor el uno de Cubras, el otro de blancas Orejas, Ambos a dos tiernos, motos ambos, Arcades ambos, Yiendo que los rayos del Solfatigaban al Orbe, Y que vibrando fuego feró: la Cunicula ladra, Al puro cristal, que cria la furnte sonora, Lievados del són alegre de su blando susurro, Las plantas veloces nueven, los pasos animan, Y al tronco de un verde enebro se sientan amigos.

Tu, que los erguidos sobrepujas del hondo Timavo Peñones, generoso Duque, con tu inchita frente, Si acuso tocare el eco de mi rústica avena Tus sienes, si acaso llega a tu fértil abono, Francisco, del acento mio la sonora Tulia, One pio, responde grato, censura severo : No menos al caro hermano generoso retratas, Que al tronco prudente sigues, generoso naciste Heroe, que guarde el Ciclo dilatando tus años : Licidas y Coridon, Coridon el amante de Filis, Pastores, las Musas amon, recrearte desean : Tu, cuerdo, perdona entretanto la bárbura Musa, Que presto, inspirando Pean con amigo Coturno, En trompa, que al Olimpo llegue por el ábrego suelta, Tu fama llevarán los ccos del Gauges al Istro. Y lucgo, torcicudo el vuelo, del aquilo al Austro.

It is admitted by the Spaniards, that the fitness of their language for the hexameter has been established by Villegas; his success, however, did not induce other peets to follow the example. I know not whom it was that he followed, for he was not the first to make the attempt. Neither do I know whether it was over made in Portuguese, except in some verses upon St. Ursula and the Eleven Thousand Virgins, which are Latin as well as Portuguese, and were written as a whimsical proof of the affinity of the two languages. I have met with no specimens in Italian. The complete success of the metre in Germany is well known. The Bohemians have learnt the tune, and have, like their neighbors, a translation of the Iliad in the measure of the original. This I learn accidentally from a Bohemian grammur ; which shows me also, that the Bohemians make a dactyl of Achilles, probably because they pronounce the χ with a strong aspirate

OLIVER NEWMAN:

A New England Tale, with other Poetical Remains.

PREFACE.

THE principal Poem of this volume, OLIVER NEW-MAN, was well known to many friends of the late Poet Laureate : and it is presumed that those persons at least, who have heard him read portions of it, with his peculiar and highly expressive intonation, will welcome with pleasure, not however unmingled with melancholy, this his last poetical work, imperfect as it is. Oliver Newman was not a rapid production : the first idea of it seems to have arisen in his mind in 1811; it was commenced in January, 1815; and having been continued at different intervals, amid the pressure of more urgent business, received its last additions in September, 1829. Although this is not the place to speak critically, one observation perhaps may be pardoned-that this poem seems to possess in a considerable degree a quality which some of the Author's other poems were judged by several critics to be deficient in, viz, a human interest: we feel that we are among persons of a like nature with ourselves, and their sufferings touch the heart. A general account of the story upon which it is based, and the intended plan, has been drawn up from the Author's notes, and printed as an AP-PENDIX. It was thought better to do this, than to leave the reader entirely without information : yet the sketch is presented with considerable misgivings; because it is likely, that to some persons, notwithstauding that the Author's own words are used wherever it is possible, the dry bones of a poem may seem not only uninteresting, but even repulsive. Neither can such a sketch be certainly a true representation of the mere story of the perfect work; because, even of the few particulars there noted, several might, in the working out of the poem, be altered or expunged.

Of the other pieces here collected, the "Fragmentary Thoughts occasioned by his Son's Death," and the "Short Passages of Scripture," are printed as much for the purpose of giving fresh proof of the purity and elevation of his character, as for their own intrinsic beauty. His son Herbert—o. whom he wrote thus in the Colloquies, "I called to mind my hopeful II——— too, so often the sweet companion of my morning walks to this very spot, in whom I had fondly thought my better part should have survived me, and

> 'With whom it seem'd my very life Went half away'''--- died 17th April, 1816, being about ten years old, a boy of remarkable genius and sweetness of disposition. These Fragments bear a date at their commencement, 3d May, 1816, but do not seem all written at the same time. The Author at one time contemplated founding mpon them a considerable work, of a meditative and deeply serious cast. Bat, although he, like Schiller, after the vanishing of his Ideals, always found "Employment," the never-tiring," one of his truest friends,—yet this first attractive to him, had not, when tried, the dertake this new labour. soothing effect upon his feelings which was needfal; and in March, 1817, he writes, that he "had not recovered heart enough to proceed with it."

The "Passages of Scripture" are found in one of his latest note-books: they were evidently not written with any view to publication, but arose simply from the pure pleasure which he took in marking down, after his own fashion, verses that attracted his poetical taste, either by the force of some peculiar idea, or by the musical harmony of the words in our English version. Moreover, these passages seem illustrative of the structure and choice of language in some of his poems; for they lead us to observe in them also the effects of habitual study of the Holy Scriptures, evidenced not only by the references, which are frequently given, but also, which is more important, by the apparently unconscious use of a diction borrowed from the poetical and imaginative portions of the Bible.

It was natural that a writer of so energetic a mind as the late Poet Laureate, would leave many unfinished projects. Besides the Fragments here published, he had commenced a poem on "Robin Hood," the manuscript of which is not among his other poetical papers. He had also thought of a series of "Inscriptions in honour of English Poets, the notice of which, as it is short, may be here inserted, for the use of those who may take pleasure in cultivating that style, of which Akenside is the prototype.

Lastly, it may be not unfitly recorded, that some notes exist, preparatory to a poem in honour of her Majesty Queen Victoria. During the first years of this reign, severe reflections were from time to time made upon the Poet Laurcate, for his silence. Now, the solemn events which have happened since that time, allow us to suppose that the Spirit of Poetry

It only remains to be said, that these poems are printed as he left them ; and that, as none of them had received his final corrections for the press, there may be defects of language which he himself would have removed. At the same time it is honestly avowed that, deservedly high as his reputation, both as a poet and a man, has stood among the writers of his generation-now, alas i fast departing from us,-a strong confidence is felt that this small volume will in no way derogate from it; and in this hope it is committed to the world.

FUNERAL AT SEA.

THE summer sun is riding high Amid a bright and cloudless sky; Beneath whose deep o'er-arching blue The circle of the Atlantic sea, Reflecting back a deeper hue, Is heaving peacefully.

The winds are still, the ship with idle motion Rocks gently on the gentle ocean ;

Loose hang her sails, awaiting when the breeze Again shall wake to waft her on her way. Glancing beside, the dolphins, as they play,

Their gorgeous tints suffused with gold display;

And gay bonitos in their beauty glide : With arrowy speed, in close pursuit,

They through the azure waters shoot ;

A feebler shoal before them in affright Spring from the wave, and in short flight, On wet and plumeless wing essay

The aërial element :

The greedy followers, on the chase intent, Dart forward still with keen and upturn'd sight,

And, to their proper danger blind the while, Heed not the sharks, which have for many a day Hover'd behind the ship, presentient of their prey.

> So fair a season might persuade Yon crowd to try the fisher's trade ; Yet from the stern no line is hung, Nor bait by eager sea-boy flung ; Nor doth the watchful sailor stand Alert to strike, harpoon in hand,

Upon the deck assembled, old and young, Bareheaded all in reverence, see them there ;

Behold where, hoisted half-mast high, The English flag hangs mournfully;

And hark ! what solemn sounds are these Heard in the silence of the seas ?

" Man that is born of woman, short his time, And full of woe! he springeth like a flower, Or like the grass, that, green at morning prime, Is cut and withereth ere the evening hour; Never doth he continue in one stay, But like a sbadow doth he pass away." It was that awfal strain, which saith How in the midst of life we are in death: "Yet not for ever, O Lord God most high! Savionr! yet not for ever shall we die!"

Ne'er from a voice more eloquent did prayer Arise, with fervent piety sincere. To every heart, of all the listening crew, It made its way, and drew Even from the hardy seaman's cyes a tcar. "God," he pursued, "hath taken to himself The sonl of our departed sister dear; We then commit her body to the deep;" He paused, and, at the word, The coffin's plunge was heard.

A female voice of anguish then brake forth With sobs convulsive of a heart opprest. It was a daughter's agonizing cry: But soon hath she represt The fit of passionate grief, And listening patiently, In that religious effort gained relief. Beside the gray-hair'd captain doth she stand; One arm is linked in his; the other hand

Hid with the handkerchief her face, and prest Her eyes, whence burning tears continuous flow. Down hung her head upon her breast,

And thus the maiden stood in silent woe.

Again was heard the preacher's earnest voice : It bade the righteous in their faith rejoice, Their sure and certain hope in Christ; for blest In Him are they, who from their lahours rest. It rose into a high thanksgiving strain, And praised the Lord, who from a world of pain Had now been pleased to set his servant free; Hasten thy kingdom, Lord, that all may rest in thec !

> Now in the grace of God dismiss'd, They separate as they may,

To narrow limits of the ship confined Nor did the impression lightly pass away, Even from the unreflecting sailor's mind. They pitied that sweet maiden, all bereft, Alone on shipboard among strangers left. They spake of that young preacher, day by day How while the fever held its fatal course, He minister'd at the patient sufferer's side, Holding of faith and hope his high discourse ; And how, when all had join'd in humble prayer, She solemnly confided to his care, Till to her father's hands she could be given. Her child forlorn,-and blest him ere she died. They call'd to mind, how peaceful, how serene, Like one who seem'd already half in heaven, After that act she yielded up her breath ; And sure they wish'd their end like hers, I ween, And for a comforter like him in death.

II.

THE VOYAGE.

THE maiden on her narrow bed To needful solitude hath fled ; He who perform'd the funeral prayer Leans o'er the vessel's head, and there Contemplating the sea and sky, He muses of eternity. The captain paces to and fro The deck with steady step and slow, And at his side a passenger, Conversing as they go. Their talk was of that maid forlorn, The mournful service of the morn, And the young man, whose voice of heartfelt faith Breathed hope and comfort o'er the bed of death. " Captain," quoth Randolph, "you have borne, Ere this, I ween, to Boston's shore, Saints by the dozen, and the score: But if he preach as he can pray, The Boston men will bless the day On which you brought this treasure o'er: A youth like him they well may call A son of thunder, or a second Paul." Thereat the captain smiled, and said, " Oh hang the broad face and round head, Hard as iron, and heavy as lead ! I have whistled for a wind ere now, And thought it cheap to crack a sail, If it sent the canting breed below. Jonah was three days in the whale, But I have had fellows here, I trow, With lungs of brazen power, Who would not fail to preach a whale Dead sick in half an hour. One Sunday, when on the banks we lay, These Roundheads, think ye, what did they !

S13

Because, they said, 'twas the sabbath day, And hallow'd by the Lord, They took the fish, which their servants caught, And threw them overboard. Newman is made of different clay; He walks in his own quiet way: And yet bencath that sober mien Gleams of a spirit may be seen, Which show what temper lies supprest Within his meck and unambitions breast: He seemeth sarely one of gentle seed, Whose sires for many an age were wont to lead In courts and conneils, and in camps to bleed."

Randolph replied, " He rules his tongne too well Ever of those from whom he sprung to tell: Whatever rank they once possess'd In camps and conneils, is, I ween, suppress'd In prudent silence. Little love that pair Could to the royal Martyr bear, Be sare, who named their offspring Oliver. You have mark'd that volame, over which he seems To pore and meditate, like one who dreams, Pondering upon the page with thought intense, That nonght, which passes round him, can from thence His fix'd attention move: He carries it aboat his person still, Nor lays it from him for a moment's time. At my request, one day, with no good will, He lent it me : what, think ye, did it prove ? A rigmarole of verses without rhyme, About the apple, and the cause of sin, By the blind old traitor Milton ! and within, Upon the cover, he had written thus, As if some saintly relic it had been, Which the fond owner gloried in possessing : 'Given me by my most venerable friend, The anthor, with his blessing !'''

CAPTAIN.

Sits the wind there !

RANDOLPH.

Retarning him the book, I told him I was sorry he could find None who deserved his veneration more Than one who, in the blackest deed of guilt That blots onr annals, stands participant, A volunteer in that worst infamy, Stain'd to the core with blessed Charles his blood, Although by some capricions mercy spared, Strangely, as if by miracle, he still Lived to disparage justice.

CAPTAIN.

And how brook'd he

Your reprehension?

RANDOLPH.

With his wonted air Of self-possession, and a mind subdued : And yet it moved him ; for, though looks and words By the strong mastery of his practised will Were overruled, the mounting blood betray'd An impulse in its secret spring too deep For his control. By taking up my speech, He answered with a simulated smile: "Sir, you say well ; by miracle indeed The life so fairly forfeited seems spared ; And it was worth the special care of Heaven ; Else had the hangman and the insensate axe Cut off this toil divine." With that his eyes Flash'd, and a warmer feeling flush'd his cheek : "Time will bring down the pyramids," he cried, " Eldest of haman works, and wear away The dreadfal Alps, coeval with himself: Bat while yon san shall hold his place assign'd, This ocean ebb and flow, and the round earth, Obedient to the Almighty Mover, fill Her silent revolutions, Milton's mind Shall dwell with us, an influence and a power ; And this great monument, which he hath built, Outliving empires, pyramids, and Alps, Endure, the lasting wonder of mankind."

CAPTAIN.

This is stark madness.

RANDOLPH.

Or stark poetry, Two things as near as Grub Street and Moorfields. But he came bravely off; for, softening soon To his habitual suavity, he said, Far was it from his thought to vindicate Ill deeds of treason and of blood. The wise Had sometimes err'd, the virtuous gone astray: Too surely in ourselves we felt the seed " Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world and all our woe:" His friend, like other men, had drawn a part Of that sad heritage ; he loved in him His wisdom and his virtue, not his faults.

CAPTAIN.

Well said, and manfully, like one who speaks The honest truth.

RANDOLPH.

Why, so it sounds, and seems.

CAPTAIN.

And we must needs admit, he hath not left His native country in that piggish mood Which neither will be led nor driven, but grants And strives with stubborn neck and groundling snont,

Struggling through mire and brake, to right and left, No matter where, so it can only take

The way it should not go. One of that herd, Rather than read the service, would have seen The dead thrown overboard without a prayer.

RANDOLPH.

Yet he hath freaks and follies of opinion; The bubbles of a yeasty mind, that works As it would crack its vessel.

CAPTAIN.

They are ever The sweetest nuts in which the maggot breeds.

RANDOLPH.

But, once fly-stricken, what avails their sweetness? Only to feed a pamper'd grub, that leaves Nothing but dirt and hollowness behind it. Tainted the young man is, and deeply too, I fear, by birth and breeding: I perceive it With sorrow, seeing on how fair a stock The unlucky graft is set.

CAPTAIN.

Why then, alas For that poor Annabel, if she must have This farther cause to rue our baneful factions. The wretched strife already hath entail'd Upon her luckless family the loss Of fair possessions, friends, and native land ! And now a chance hath offer'd, which to her, I trow, might largely make amends for all: It would be hard indeed, when all things seem To square so well—youth, opportunity, Their fortunes one, the natural dower of each So equal, and so bountifully given, A dying mother's blessing to crown all— It would be hard indeed, should loyalty Forbid the banns.

RANDOLPH.

l know her father's temper, True as his own Toledo to the cause Wherein they both were tried. Nor will neglect, Ingratitude of courts, and banishment, (For a grant in the Amorican wilderness Only calls exile by a fairer name,) Subdue his high-wrought virtue. Satisfied At last, by years of painful proof, That loyalty must find in its own prond sense Its own reward, that pride he will bequeath His children as their best inheritance, A single heir-loom rescued from the wreck, And worth whate'er was lost.

CAPTAIN.

'Tis well the youth Thinks less of earth than heaven, and hath his heart More with the angels than on human love: But if such thoughts and hopes have enter'd it, As would some forty years ago have found

Quick entrance, and warm welcome too, in mine, His ugly baptism may mar all, and make hum Breathe maledictions on his godfathers, Though old Nol himself were one.

RANDOLPH

Howbeit 't will win him Worship and friends in the city of the saints; And, to the ears of sober Boston men, Oliver will be a name more savonry Than Tribulation, or Stand-fast-in-the-Lord, Increase or Nathan, Gershom, Ichabod, Praise-God, or any of the Barebones breed. They rise upon the oak-holyday with faces A full inch longer than they took to bed: Experienced nurses feed their babes that day With spoons, because the mother's milk is sonr ; And when they mourn upon the Martyrdom, 'Tis for the explation, not the crime. Oh they love dearly one of the precious seed ! Tyburn, since Sixty, in their secret hearts Holds place of Calvary. For saints and martyrs, None like their own Hugh Peters, and the heads On the Hall your only relics! Fifteen years They have hid among them the two regicides, Shifting from den to cover, as we found Where the scant lay. But earth them as they will, I shall unkennel them, and from their holes Drag them to light and justice.

CAPTAIN.

There hath been Much wholesome sickness thrown away, Sir Randolph

On your strong stomach! Two sea voyages Have not sufficed to clear the bile wherewith You left New England!

RANDOLPH.

Nay, it rises in me

As I draw near their shores.

CAPTAIN.

Why then, look shortly For a sharp fit; for, if the sky tell true, Anon we shall have wind, and to our wish.

So spake the Captain, for his eye, Versed in all signs and weathers, Discerned faint traccs in the eastern sky, Such as a lion's paw might leave Upon the desert, when the sands are dry.

The dog-vane now blows out with its light feathers;

And lo! the ship, which like a log hath lain, Heavily rolling on the long slow swell,

Stirs with her proper impulse now, and gathers A power like life beneath the helmsman's will.

Her head lies right; the rising breeze Astern comes rippling o'er the sens; A tramp of feet ! a sound of busy voices ! The cordage rattles, and the topsails fill; All hands are active, every heart rejoices.

Blest with fair seas, and favourable skies, Right for her promised land The gallant vessel flies; Far, far behind her now The foamy furrow lies; Like dust around her prow The ocean spray is driven.

O thou fair creature of the human hand ! Thou, who wert palsied late, When the dead calm lay heavy on the deep, Again hast thou received the breath of heaven, And, waking from thy sleep, As strength again to those broad wings is given, Thou puttest forth thy beauty and thy state ! Hold on with happy winds thy prosperous way, And may no storm that goodly pride abate, Nor baffling airs thy destined course delay, Nor the sea-rover seize thee for his prey ; But minist'ring angels wait To watch for thee, against all ill event From man, or from the reckless element. Thou hast a richer freight Than ever vessel bore from Ophir old, Or spicey India sent, Or Lisbon welcomed to her joyful quay From her Brazilian land of gems and gold ; Thou carriest pions hope, and pure desires, Such as approving angels might behold ; A heart of finest mould, A spirit that aspires To heaven, and draws its flame from heavenly fires; Genius, Devotion, Faith, Stronger than time or Death, A temper of the high heroic mood, By that strong faith exalted, and subdued To a magnanimous fortitude. The blossom of all virtues dost thou bear, The seed of noble actions! Go thy way Rejoicingly, from fear and evil free : These shall be thy defence, Beneath the all-present arm of Providence. Against all perils of the treacherous sea.

III.

CAPE COD.

DAYS pass, winds veer, and favouring skies Change like the face of fortune; storms arise; Safely, but not within her port desired, The good ship lies. Where the long sandy Cape Bends and embraces round, As with a lover's arm, the shelter'd sea, A haven she hath found From adverse gales and boisterous billows free.

Now strike your sails, Ye toil-worn mariners, and take your rest Long as the fierce north-west In that wild fit prevails, Tossing the waves uptorn with frantic sway. Keep ye within the bay, Contented to delay Your course till the elemental madness cease, And heaven and ocean are again at peace.

How gladly there,

Sick of the uncomfortable ocean, The impatient passengers approach the shore; Escaping from the sense of endless motion, To feel firm earth beneath their feet once more, To breathe again the air With taint of bilge and cordage undefiled, And drink of living springs, if there they may, And with fresh fruits and wholesome food repair Their spirits, weary of the watery way.

And oh ! how beautiful The things of earth appear To eyes that far and near For many a week have seen Only the circle of the restless sea ! With what a fresh delight They gaze again on fields and forests green, Hovel, or whatsoe'er May bear the trace of man's industrious hand ; How grateful to their sight The shore of shelving sand, As the light boat moves joyfully to land !

Woods they beheld, and huts, and piles of wood, And many a trace of toil, But not green fields or pastures. 'Twas a land Of pines and sand; Dark pines, that from the loose and sparkling soil Rose in their strength aspiring: far and wide They sent their searching roots on every side, And thus, by depth and long extension, found Firm hold and grasp within that treacherous ground : So had they risen and flourish'd ; till the earth, Unstable as its neighbouring ocean there, Like an unnatural mother, heap'd around Their trunks its wavy furrows white and high ; And stifled thus the living things it bore. Half huried thus they stand, Their summits sere and dry, Marking, like monuments, the funeral mound ; As when the masts of some tall vessel show Where, on the fatal shoals, the wreck lies whelm'd helow.

Such was the ungenial earth ; nor was the air Fresh and delightful there : A aoisome taint upon the breath it hore ; For they who dwelt upon that sandy shore, Of meadows and of gardens took no care ; They sow'd not, neither did they reap : The ocean was their field, their flocks and herds The unyriad-moving armics of the deep ; The whale their mighty chase, whose bones bestrew'd The sandy margin of that ample bay, And all about, in many a loathly heap, The offal and the reeking refuse lay, Left there for dogs obscene and carrion birds a prey.

Oliver, as they approach'd, said thoughtfully : "It was within this bay That they, into the wilderness who bore The seeds of English faith and liberty, First set their feet upon the shore. Here they put in, escaping from the rage Of tempests, and by treacherous pilotage Led, as it seem'd to fallible men, astray : But God was with them; and the Providence Which errs not, had design'd his people's way."

"A blessed day for England had it been," Randolph exclaim'd, "had Providence thought good,

If the whole stern round-headed brotherhood Had follow'd, man and woman, great and small; New England might have prosper'd with the brood, Or seas and sharks been welcome to them all."

" Alas, how many a broken family Hath felt that bitter wish !" the youth replied; And, as he spake, he breathed a silent sigh. "The wounded heart is prone to entertain Presumptuous thoughts and feelings, which arraign The appointed course of things. But what are we, Short-sighted creatures of an hour, That we should judge? In part alone we see, And this but dimly. He, who ordereth all, Beholdeth all, at once, and to the end: Upon His wisdom and His power, His mercy and His boundless love, we rest; And resting thus in humble faith, we know, Whether the present be for weal or woe, For us whatever is must needs be best."

Thus, while he spake, the boat had reach'd the land;
And, grating gently, rested on the sand.
They step ashore; the dwellers gather nigh:
"Whence comes the vessel? whither is she bound?"
Then for Old England's welfare they inquire;—
Eager alike for question and reply,
With open lips and ears attending round;—
What news of war, and plague, and plots, and fire?
Till satisfied of these, with cheerful care
The board and bowl they hasten to prepare;
Each active in his way,

Glad of some lawful business, that may break The tedium of an idle Sabbath-day.

But, from the stir of that loquacious crew, Oliver meantime apart from all withdrew. Beyond the bare and sapless pines, which stood Half-overwhelm'd with sand, He pass'd, and entering in the wood, Indulged his burthen'd heart in solitude. " Thou Earth, receive me, from my native land Au unoffending exile ! Hear my claim ! In search of wealth I have not sought thy shore, Nor covetous of fame, Nor treading in the ambitious steps of power ; But hiding from the world a hapless name, And sacrificing all At holiest duty's call, Thou barbarous Land, of thee I only crave-For those I love-concealment and a grave." Thus he relieved his breast; yet did not dare

Allow himself full utterance, even there: To part he gave a voice; and then, in fear, Shaped with his lips, inaudibly, the rest: With that the very air Might not be trusted; and he look'd around, Alarm'd, lest human ear Had eaught the unfinish'd sound. Some tears stole down his cheek, now not repress'd. And, kneeling on the earth, he kiss'd the ground.

Unbidden thoughts then took their course, and drew The future and the past before his view : The haunts, the friendships, and the hopes of youth— All, all forsaken ;—no dear voice, Ever again to bid his heart rejoice ! Familiar scenes and faces Only in dreams should he behold again ; But, in their places, The wilderness, wild beasts, and savage men !

Soon from that poignant thought His soul upon the wings of hope took flight; And strong imagination brought Visions of joy before his inward sight. Of regions yet by Englishmen unsought, And ancient woods, was that delightful dream,---The broad savannah, and the silver stream. Fair bowers were there, and gardens smiled. And harvests flourish'd in the wild ; And, while he made Redeeming Love his theme,-Savage no longer now--The Indians stood around, And drank salvation with the sound. One Christian grave was there, Turf'd well, and weeded by his pious care, And redolent of many a fragrant flower And herb profusely planted all about.

Within bis bower An old man sate, in patience and in peace,

While the low sands of life ran out, Awaiting his release. That old man laid his hand upon his head, And blest him daily, when the day was done; And Heaven was open to him, and he saw His mother's spirit smile, and bless her son.

Thus to the voluntary dream resign'd He lay, while tlended sounds of air and sea Lull'd his unconcious mind With their wild symphony. The wind was in the pines, awakening there A sea-like sound continuous, and a swell At fitful intervals, that mingled well With ocean's louder roar, When the long curling waves, Reach after reach in regular rising, fell Upon the sandy shore. Long might he there have lain, but that, in tones Which seem'd of haste to tell. Once, twice, and thrice prouounced he heard his name : Too sweetly to his cars the accents came, Breathed from the gentle lips of Annabel. With hurried pace she comes, and flush'd in face. And with a look, half-pity, half-affright, Which, while she spake, enlarged her timid eyes : "O, sir ! I have seen a piteous sight !"

The shuddering maiden cries; " A poor wild woman. Woe is me ! among What worse than heathen people are we thrown ? Beasts, in our England, are not treated thus,— Our very stones would rise Against such cruelties ! But you, perhaps, can reach the stony heart,— Oh come, then, and perform your Christian part."

She led him hastily toward a shed, Where, fetter'd to the door post, on the ground An Indian woman sate. Her hands were bound, Her shoulders and her back were waled and scored With recent stripes. A boy stood by, Some seven years old, who with a piteous eye Beheld his suffering mother, and deplored Her injuries with a cry, Deep, but not loud,-an utterance that express'd The mingled feelings swelling in his breast,-Instinctive love intense, the burning sense Of wrong, intolerable grief of heart, And rage, to think his arm could not fulfil The pious vengeance of his passionate will. His sister by the door Lay basking in the sun : too young was she

To feel the burthen of their misery ; Reckless of all that pass'd, her little hand Play'd idly with the soft and glittering sand.

At this abhorred sight, Had there been place for aught But pity, half relieved by indignation, They would have seen that Indian woman's face Not with surprise alone, but admiration: With such severe composure, such an air Of stern endurance, did she bear Her lot of absolute despair. You rather might have deem'd, So fix'd and hard the strong bronze features seem'd, That they were of some molten statue part, Than the live sentient index of a heart Suffering and struggling with extremest wrong: But that the coarse jet hair upon her back Hung loose, and lauk, and long, And that sometimes she moved her large black eye, And look'd upon the boy who there stood weeping by.

Oliver in vain attempted to assuage, With gentle tones and looks compassionate, The bitterness of that young Indian's rage. The boy drew back abhorrent from his hand, Eyed him with fierce disdain, and breathed In inarticulate sounds his deadly hate. Not so the mother ; she could understand His thoughtful pity, and the tears which fell Copiously down the cheeks of Annabel. Touch'd by that unaccustomed sympathy Her countenance relax'd : she moved her head As if to thank them both Then frowning, as she raised her mournful eye,— "Bad Christian-man ! bad English-man !" she said : And Oliver a sudden sense of shame Felt for the English and the Christian name.

IV

THE CAPTIVES RANSOMED.

OLIVER.

I pray you, sir, who owns the Indian woman That is chain'd in yonder hut?

CAPE'S-MAN.

What ! you have seen them, The she-wolf and her whelps ?

OLIVER.

She hath indeed A strange wild aspect, and the boy appears Of a fierce nature. I should think her owner Would find her an unprofitable stave.

CAPE'S-MAN.

Why, sir, you reckon rightly ; and, methinks, Without a conjuror's skill you well may think so: Those fetters, and the marks upon her skin, Speak her deserts. On week-days with the whip

We keep her tightly to her work ; but thus Her Sabbath must be spent, or she would put The wilderness between her and her owner. An honest dealer never paid good money For a worse piece : and for that boy of hers, He is a true-bred savage, blood and bone, To the marrow and heart's core.

RANDOLPH.

I warrant him ! No mother like your squaw to train a child In the way she would have him go; she makes him subtler

Than the sly snake, untameable as bear Or buffalo, fierce as a famish'd wolf, And crueller than French judges, Spanish friars, Or Dutchmen in the East. His earliest plaything Is a green scalp, and then, for lollipop, The toasted finger of an Englishman ! Young as he is, I dare be sworn he knows Where is the liveliest part to stick a skewer Into a prisoner's flesh, and where to scoop The tenderest mouthful. If the Devil himself Would learn devices to afflict the damn'd With sharper torments, he might go to school To a New England savage.

CAPE'S-MAN.

I perceive, sir, You know them well. Perhaps you may have heard Of this young deviling's father ;—he was noted For a most bloody savage in his day: They call'd him Kawnacom.

RANDOLPH.

What! Kawnacom, The Narhaganset Sagamore ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

The same ; A sort of captain, or of prince, among them.

RANDOLPH.

A most notorious villain ! But I left him At peace with the English ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

And you find him so,— Under the only bail he would not break ; A bullet through the heart is surety for him. You have not learnt, I guess, what dreadful work There is in the back country?—Families Burnt in their houses ; stragglers tomahawk'd And scalp'd, or dragg'd away that they may die By piecemeal murder, to make mockery For these incarnate devils at the stake. Farms are forsaken ; towns are insecure ; Men sleep with one eye open, and the gun By their bed-side. And, what is worst, they know not How far the league extends, nor whom to trust Among these treacherous tribes. Old people say That things were not so bad in the Pequod war.

RANDOLPH.

What then, have we been idle ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

Hitherto But little has been done. The evil found us Lapp'd in security, and unprepared: Nor know we where to strike, nor whom, so darkly The mischief hath been laid.

RANDOLPH.

Strike where we will, So we strike hard, we cannot err. The blow That rids us of an Indian does good service

OLIVER.

That were a better service which should win The savage to your friendship.

CAPE'S-MAN.

You are young, sir,

And, I perceive, a stranger in the land; Or you would know how bootless is the attempt To tame and civilize these enemies,

Man-beasts, or man-fiends,-call them which you will,-

Their monstrous nature being half brute, half devil, Nothing about them human but their form. He, who expends his kindness on a savage Thinking to win his friendship, might as wisely Plant thorns and hope to gather grapes at vintage.

OLIVER.

Look but to Martha's Vineyard, and behold On your own shores the impossibility Achieved-the standing miracle display'd In public view, apparent to all eyes, And famous through all countries wheresoe'er The Gospel truth is known. Many are the hearts In distant England which have overflow'd With pious joy to read of Hiacoomes. Whose prayerful house the pestilence past by; And blind Wawompek,-he, within whose doors The glad thanksgiving strain of choral praise Fails not, at morn and eve, from year to year; And the Sachem, who rejoiced because the time Of light was come, and now his countrymen, Erring and lost, no longer should go down In ignorance and darkness to the grave ; And poor old Lazarus, that rich poor man, The child of poverty, but rich in faith, And his assured inheritance in heaven.

RANDOLPH.

Young sir, it is with stories as with men;

That credit oftentimes they gain abroad, Which, either for misluck or misdesert, They fail to find at home.

OLIVER.

Are these things false, then ? Is there no truth in Mayhew's life of love ? Hath not the impatient Welshman's zeal, that blazed Even like a burning and consuming fire, Refined itself into a steady light Among the Indians ?—and the name of Williams, The signal once for strife where're he went, Become a passport and a word of peace Through savage nations ? Or is this a tale Set forth to mock our weak credulity ; And all that holy Eliot hath perform'd Only a fable cunningly devised ?

CAPE'S-MAN.

He comes out qualified to lecture us Upon our own affairs !

RANDOLFH.

The things you talk of Serve but with us to comfort our old women, Furnish an elder with some choice discourse For a dull synod, and sometimes help out Sir Spintext at a pinch, when he would think it A sin did he dismiss his hungry flock Before the second glass be fairly spent. Much have you read, and have believed as largely ; And yet one week's abode in the colony Will teach you more than all your English reading.

OLIVER.

Sir, I am easy of belief, for that way My temper leads me,-liable to err; And yet, I hope, not obstinate in error ; But ready still to thank the riper judgment That may correct my inexperienced years. You paint the Indians to the life, I doubt not: Children of sin, and therefore heirs of wrath, The likeness of their Heavenly Sire in them Seems utterly defaced ; and in its stead, Almost, it might be thought, the Evil Power Had set his stamp and image. This should move us The more to deep compassion ; men ourselves, In whom the accident of birth alone Makes all this awful difference ! And remembering, That from our common parent we derive Our nature's common malady innate. For which our common Saviour offers us The only cure,-oh ! ought we not to feel How good and merciful a deed it were To bring these poor lost sheep within his fold !

RANDOLPR.

Sheep call you them, forsooth ! When you can gather

Bears, wolves and tigers in a fold, hope then To tame such sheep as these.

OLIVER.

What is there, sir, That may not by assiduous care be won To do our will? Give me a lion's cub, Torn from the teat, and I will so train up The noble beast, that he shall fondle me, And lay his placid head upon my knees, And lick my hand, and couch my bed-side, And guard me with a dog's fidelity.

RANDOLPH.

Behold a litter ready to your wish! Our friend, if I mistake not, will afford An easy purchase, dam and cubs. What say you, My lion-tamer?

CAPE'S-MAN.

You shall have them cheap, sir! A bargain that may tempt you; come, for half That they would fetch in the Barbadoes market. I meant to ship them thither, but would rather Sell at a loss than keep that woman longer.

Thus had the jeer grown serious, and it drew Into the young man's check a deeper hue. Moments there are in life,—alas,—how few !— When, casting cold prudential doubts aside, We take a generous impulse for our guide, And, following promptly what the heart thinks best, Commit to Providence the rest, Sure that no after-reckoning will arise, Of shame, or sorrow, for the heart is wise. And happy they who thus in faith obey Their better nature: err sometimes they may, And some sad thoughts lie heavy in the breast, Such as by hope deceived are left behind; But, like a shadow, these will pass away From the pure sunshine of a peaceful mind.

Thus feeling, Oliver obey'd His uncorrupted heart; nor paused, nor weigh'd What hindrance, what displeasure might ensue; But from his little store of worldly wealth, Poor as it was, the ready ransom drew. Half-earnest, half-sarcastic, Randolph now Sought him from that rash purpose to dissuade; While the hard Cape's-man, nothing nice, Counted the money, glad to get his price.

THE PORTRAIT.

AT length the adverse gales have ceased ; The breath of morn is from the east, Where, burnisbing with gold the restless sea, Uprose the sun in radiant majesty. Unfelt that breath upon the seas, Unheard amid the silent trees, It breathes so quietly: Yet have the seamen, on their way intent, Perceived the auspicious sign. The sails are bent, The anchor raised ; the swelling canvas now Fills with the fresh'ning breeze ; the Cape recedes, Its sandhills and its pines In distance fade away. Steady she holds her course ; and still the day Is young, when lo ! the haven is in sight ; And ere from his meridian height the sun Declines, within that haven's gentle breast, From the long labours of her weary way,

The vessel comes to rest.

Scatter'd within the peaceful bay Many a fair isle and islet lay, And rocks and banks which threaten'd there No peril to the mariner. The shores which bent around were gay With maizals, and with pastures green, And rails and hedge-row trees between, And fields for harvest white, And dwellings sprinkled up and down; And round about the cluster'd town, Which rose in sunshine bright, Was many a shelter'd garden spot, And many a sunny orchard plot, And bowers which might invite The studious man to take his seat Within their quiet, cool retreat, When noon was at its height. No heart that was at ease, I ween, Could gaze on that surrounding scene Without a calm delight.

Behold upon the quay a press Of business and of idleness, Where these new-comers land. Kinsfolk with anxious questions meet; And friends and light acquaintance greet With jocand shake of hand : The idlers ask the crew of what Upon their way befell; And all, and more than all they know, The wondering sailors tell. From tongue to tongue the tidings ran; The lady's death,—the strange young man; His moody ways, his gift of prayer, The maid committed to his care, Ste destined bride, they nothing doubting deem'd;

And how, by sudden fit of pity moved, From slavery he redeem'd The children and the wife of Kawnacom, (An act that all admired, but none approved,) And to their savage tribe, they fear'd, Reckless of counsel, would conduct them home. All marvell'd at the tale ; the many jeer'd : "Mad as the Quakers!" some exclaim'd ; and some Pray'd that his rash and unenlighten'd will Might cause no after-troubles in a state Pester'd with errors and new fancies still. Some shook their heads ; the more compassionate Ohserved, that where so kind a heart was found, Pity it was the wits should not be sound.

" It is a madness which the world will cure," Leverett, the Governor, said, " too soon, be sure." Randolph had risen to leave him, when the youth Enter'd the Governor's door, "Come, let me play," Quoth he, "the usher !" in his wonted way, Mingling with sportive speech sarcastic truth. "Your Excellency here beholds the Man! The Quaker-Church of England-Puritan, Knight-errant, preacher, and we know not what, So many things he is, and he is not; A hero, certes, if he would but fight ; A Solomon, if his notions were but right. Should he into a lion's den be thrown,-Look at those arms and eyes, and you might swear That he would act the London 'Prentice there ; But trusting to the mind, forsooth, alone He'd take the cubs, like lambkins, to his breast, And, Daniel-like, by faith subdae the rest. Then for the harder task of savage-quelling He hath a talent which exceeds all telling. Two full-bred devilings he has taught to greet him, And kiss as lovingly as they would eat him; And he hath bought their mother squaw, to teach That pleasant lingo the Six-nation speech ; Words, which would choke a Dutchman or a Jew, Damfound Old Nick, and which from me or you Could not be forced by ipecacuanha, Drop from his oratoric lips like manna. So fine withal his temper proves, that it Hath borne unhurt the file of my rough wit ; This to his honour I am bound to tell : Would that he took true counsel half as well ! And now, sir, as your favour may befriend him, To that in right good earnest I commend him !"

"A man of caustic speech !" the Governor said, Following him with his eye, as forth he went: "Yet hath this humour no unkind intent; His commendation, sir, shall have its weight, The rest we take as it is meant."

The youth

To that urbane accoil, with grateful eye, And gentle motion of the bending head, Return'd a mute reply. There was a troubled meaning in his look,

And o'er his brow an ashy paleness spread, As forth he took A little casket, and, with trembling hand Presenting it to Leverett, said : "Thus I discharge my mother's last command; On her death-bed she told me I should need No other friend with you in my behalf to plead." The Governor's countenance changed, as he received That message from the dead ; And when he open'd and contemplated The sad bequest, Tears fill'd his eyes, which could not be represt. It was a woman's picture, in her youth And bloom portray'd by Cooper's perfect skill. The eyes, which death had quench'd, Kept there their life and living lustre still; The auburn locks, which sorrow's withering hand, Forestalling time, had changed to early grey, Disparting from the ivory forehead, fell In ringlets which might tempt the breath of May; The lips, now cold as clay, Seem'd to breathe warmth and vernal fragrance there : The cheeks were in their maiden freshness fair. Thus had the limner's art divine preserved A beauty which from earth had pass'd away; And it had caught the mind which gave that face Its surest charm, its own peculiar grace. A modest mien, A meek, submissive gentleness serene, A heart on duty stay'd, Simple, sincere, affectionate, sedate, Were in that virgin countenance portray'd: She was an angel now ; and yet, More beautiful than this fair counterfeit, Even in heaven, her spirit scarce could be, Nor seem from stain of ill, and evil thoughts, more free. Time was, when Leverett had worn That picture like a relic in his breast; And duly, morn and night, With Love's idolatry Fix'd on its beauties his adoring sight, And to his lips the precious crystal prest. Time was, when, in the visions of his rest, That image of delight Came with sweet smiles, and musical voice, to bless His sleep, and all his dreams were happiness. And still, though course of time, and fatal force Of circumstance, grave thoughts, and worldly cares (Ah ! how unlike the blissful hopes of youth, From which it had been worse than death to part !) Had fortified as well as heal'd his heart, That vision, in her beauty and her truth, Sometimes would visit him ; and he, With a confused but conscious faculty, Knowing full well That this, which seem'd, too surely could not be,

Struggled against the spell. Unchanged and unimpair'd by thirty years, Her image came, but only to distress The heart she wont to bless. Till from the painful unreality He woke, disturb'd in spirit, and in tears. But he was master of his waking soul, And could control All unbecoming passion, and all feeling That needs repressing or concealing. Howbeit he songht not to restrain His deep emotion now, nor turn'd aside His natural tears to hide, which freely fell ; But wiping them away a moment, eyed Oliver's pale countenance and anxious brow, Perusing there his mother's lineaments: Then took his hand, and said, "Thou need'st not tell Thy hapless name and perilous secret now, I know them but too well."

VI.

FUTURE PROSPECTS.

LEVERETT.

WHY hast thou ventured hither? With what hepe Or end hath natural piety betray'd thee To this forlorn attempt? If to escape Had offer'd chance enough to tempt despair, The desperate effort had ere this been tried. Besure, it hath been meditated oft, And bravely; and, had life been all the stake, Life had been cheaply set upon the die, To lose it being gain.

OLIVER.

They must forego,

The dear desire of e'er revisiting Their native land,-and in my mother's grave That hope, I ween, will now be laid at rest: Nor could they safely seek a resting-place In Europe, even if we reach'd a ship, And left these shores behind us. Oft and well Have I perpended this, devising ways For flight, and schemes of plausible disguise, Such thoughts in disappointment ending alway ; Till having offer'd up in fervent faith A disciplined and humbled beart to Heaven, A better hope arose. The wilderness Is open to us! Thither will we go, Far in the wilds, where foot of Englishman Hath never trod. The equal elements Will not deny our portion : Mother Earth In unappropriated freedom, there Holds forth her liberal iap ; her springs, her fruits, Her creatures of the land and air and stream,

To her free children freely offering. Hid from the world, a double duty there May I perform, to God and man discharged, Serving my human and my Heavenly Sire; There, treading in your saintly Eliot's path, Guide the poor Indian in the way to Heaven ! And, in the foretaste of its joys assured, Receive mine own exceeding great reward.

LEVERETT.

Oh pitiable lot Oh poor humanity,

When virtue thus can wrong the heroic heart, And blind the noble intellect! Thou dreamest Of peopling some Arcadian solitude With human angels, —ignorant, alas! Of time, place, circumstance, and men, and things,— The Indians, and thy father, and thyself!

OLIVER.

Myself at least I know, prepared to act Or suffer, with a soul for all events Resign'd.

LEVERETT.

To suffer, rightly thou may'st say; Easily we screw our courage to that point, The issue being remote, and hope and chance

Between us and the event. But how prepared to act? Ere thou couldst hold With these Red tribes the commonest discourse Of needful things and every-day concerns, Years of laborious pupilage must pass, Unless the cloven flame upon thy head Should light, and loose thy speech by miracle. But wherefore with the show of difficulties Should I dissuade thee from an enterprise Impossible to attempt?

OLIVER.

A poet, sir,

In whose dark sayings deeper wisdom lies Than ancient oracles enounced, or statesmen Appear to reach in these ignoble times, Hath taught me to believe, "impossible Is but the faith of fear."

LEVERETT.

Are poets, then,

Thy teachers? O, young man, their flattering lore But ill prepares the spirit for the uses Of ordinary life !

OLIVER.

They best prepare it, Who warn the heart against its own illusions; And, strengthening it with patient hope and faith, Arm it against all issues. To such teachers My inexperienced youth by Providence

Was mereifully led. Penn hath allow'd me To call him friend, in no sectarian use Of words; and I have sate at Milton's feet A reverential listener.

LEVERETT.

Milton's friendship

Will neither hurt nor help thee in a land, Where they, who stiffliest hold his errors, lift not Their thoughts above the earth to follow him, When his strong spirit mounts upon the wing, Beyond their grovelling vision. But well is it Thou hast not from Penn's dangerous fellowship Learnt his sectarian speech, and other follies Wherewith that formal informality Provokes the law. New England writes her statutes In blood against the Quakers. Thou hast 'scaped

Their clownish and uncivil usages; But if there be an inner taint, take heed To keep it hidden: openly I must not Allow the violation of our laws.

OLIVER.

Oh we have trespass'd largely on your goodness ; Generous beyond example, as thou art, Too largely have we tax'd it ; and the cause, The dreadful eause alone can palliate Conduct like ours towards thee. Not for worlds Would I do aught that might displeasure thee, Best earthly friend ! whom my dear mother never Named without tears, and holiest gratitude, Such as will surely bring upon thy head The blessing that it pray'd for. I come here, Not wilfully and madly to provoke Intolerant laws, nor farther to presume Upon thy noble nature ; but to thank thee, In her dear name, for all which thou hast done; To tell thee, as she charged me, that in death She bless'd thee for thy goodness ; and, performing Her latest wish and will, to take the burthen Of our unhappy fortunes on myself.

LEVERETT.

Her latest wish and will!

OLIVER.

It was a thought

Which added to her griefs, that you should stand In jeopardy for us; howbeit, she said, She hoped and felt and trusted that you knew Her innuost mind, and Heaven would recompense A true affection, too severely tried.

LEVERETT.

Thus it was ever with her gentle heart, By some strange fortune fated still to prove That in her strength alone the root Of her sole weakness lay. Poor heart! a victim always at the call

Of fancied duty ; only then unjust, Only then obstinate, when offering up Itself a bleeding sacrifice ! I know, And understand, in what devoted mood Her acquiescence to thy dreams was given ; Such as aspiring saints desire, and martyrs Reach in their triumph, when they clasp the stake.

OLIVER.

'Twas in no height of feverish exaltation, In no delusion of the heated mind, That her consent was given : but mutually Our hearts received, as I believe, from Heaven The impulse. By the test of prayer we tried, And in the balance of the sanctuary Weighed it; and having taken our resolve, Partook that inward peace, wherewith the Spirit Doth set the seal to its authentic acts. Shake not thy head thus mournfully, nor thus In disapproval kuit the incredulous brow ! The purpose, which at first was entertain'd With doubtfulness and fear, increased in strength, While long infirmity and wasting pain Cousumed her mortal mould; and at that hour, When it is no illusion to believe That the departing soul hath sight of heaven Opening before its happy flight, and feels The expansion of diviner faculties Than this gross earth unfolds, her looks and tokens Confirm'd the injunction of her latest voice, And bless'd, and for obedience strengthen'd me, Betide what may.

LEVERETT.

For me, then, it remains Only to show what obstacles impede The perilous course from which I must not farther Essay to turn thee. Thou, who art not less In mind than lineaments thy mother's image, Judge for thyself if they be superable. Thy grandsire lives, indeed,-if it be life, When the poor flesh, surviving, doth entomb The reasonable soul defunct. Below The reach of grief and dauger he hath sunk. The tale of his dear daughter's death to him Will be like baptism to a chrysome babe, Something that means he knows and recks not what. Safely in court might he hold up the haud, Now trenibling and unconscious, which subscribed The fatal warrant: even the sword of law Would, in his pitiable estate, acknowledge The visitation of a higher Power, And turn away its edge. But as thou canst not, Eucumber'd with a twichild man, pursue Thy purpose, it must of necessity Be laid aside, at least till death remove The impediment not else removable.

OLIVER.

So be it. We must patiently await The hour of his release. With time and death Sure reckoning may be made.

LEVERETT.

That hour in truth Cauuot be long delay'd. But what shall make Thy father to thy dreams defer his own ? If in his corporal uses man becomes The slave of habit, strouger are the chains In which the mind is bound, a willing thrall.

OLIVER.

I understand you not !

LEVERETT.

You do not know

Your father.

OLIVER.

Only by report, alas ! As England in his years of fortune knew him ; Religious, faithful, excellently skill'd In war, and in his single person brave To all men's admiration.

LEVERETT.

Yet I think Enthusiast as thon art, thon needest not Learn with how much alloy the richest vein Of virtues is too often found combined. 'Tis the condition of humanity, Frail and infirm at best; and they who boast Sinless perfection for their privilege, By the proud folly of the claim, confute Their own insane pretension.

OLIVER.

Surely, sir, My father hath not in the school of Christ So poorly profited, nor lived so long A stranger to himself and his own heart, That he should hold this error.

LEVERETT.

Glad I am

Thou seest it erroneons. Other notions He holds too near akin to it, the breed Of those pestiferons and portentous times Wherein his lot had fallen. Even yet he thinks The kingdom of the saints shall be in strength Establish'd; finds in whatsoe'er occurs The accomplishment of some dark prophecy; Interprets, and expounds, and calculates That soon he shall be call'd to bear his part In setting up again the broken work Left incomplete by chosen Oliver. Thus he in one continuous dream of hope Beguiles the tedious years.

OLIVER.

Herein I see not

What should impede my purpose. In the forest, The sense of freedom and security, Healing a wounded spirit, may restore To health his mind diseased.

LEVERETT.

But if the patient Reject the means of cure ? He will not leave A place of refuge which the Lord prepared For him in his distress; and where full surely He trusts the call will reach him, to come forth And fight the battles of the good old cause, For which he doth endure contentedly This living martyrdom. Thy father thus Would answer thee ; the malady is rooted In him so deeply now. It is become Essential in his being : long success, Beyond the most audacious of his thoughts, Fed and inflamed it first ; long suffering since Hath as it were annealed it in his soul With stubborn fortitude, bewilder'd faith. Love, hatred, indignation, all strong passions, The bitterest feelings, and the tenderest thoughts, Yea, all his earthly, all his heavenly hopes. And Russel-for such sympathy alone Could influence him to harbour long such guests-Fosters the old delusion which he shares, And ministers to it, even in his prayers.

OLIVER.

My father will not be persuaded then, You think ?

LEVERETT.

I know he will not. There are minds, The course of which, as of some slow disease, Known by its fatal frequency too well, We see with helpless foresight, hopelessly. But, if he listen'd to thy moving words, What would it now avail? The wilderness Affords no shelter while the Indians, Fiercer than beasts, and willier, are in arms.

OLIVER.

I have a passport for the wilderness Safer than statesmen could accord, or states Enforce with all their strength. The Indian woman, Of whom Sir Randolph in his mockery told thee; She and her children will be my protection Among the wildest tribes.

LEVERETT.

And was this thought, then, Thy motive for the act?

OLIVER.

I will not say It had so much of forethought: but the ways Of Providence open before me now. The impulse, which appear'd like foolishness To worldly censure, and which tremblingly I follow'd, for this issue was design'd : Oh doubt it not ! And had I disobey'd The inward and unerring monitor That hour, infirm of faith, how had I then Disherited myself of this fair hope !

LEVERETT.

A Narhaganset woman, is she not ? The widow of a Sagamore, who fell In the outbreak of these troubles?

OLIVER.

So they told me; A noted savage, Kawnacom his name.

LEVERETT.

Something, methinks, I see in this, wherein Our purposes may square, and my straight path Of policy with thy eccentric course Fall in and meet at the end. But, understand me. Rather would I for thine own sake dissuade thee, And for the sake of that dear Saint in heaven. From an adventure of remotest hope And imminent peril : but if thy resolve Be obstinate against all reason, blameless Then may I, both in her sight and in thine. Betide the issue how it will, promote The purpose which in vain I disapprove. One trust we have ; all-able Providence Will overrule our ways, and haply too. Knowing the upright intention, rectify Our erring judgments. Let the matter sleep Till I have taken counsel with my pillow And this night's waking thoughts. See me tomorrow

As early as you will, before the stir Of business hath begun: and now farewell.

VII.

THE INDIAN WAR.

With many an anxious thought opprest, From busy sleep more wearying than unrest, Hath Oliver arisen;

And from his bed of feverish care. Glad to respire the cool fresh morning air Gone forth as from a prison. The wakeful governor received his guest And ere the morning board was placed, They to and fro the garden paced In earnest talk, while Leverett told How mutual injuries of old, And mutual fears, the envenom'd will, Suspicions still conceal'd but festering still, And policy that shrunk from nothing ill, (Savage or civilized-oh shame To man's perverted power !---in this the same,) Youth's fiery courage, and eld's rooted hate Had brought the danger on, which now assail'd the state.

The times were fearful; wheresoe'er around Among the Indian tribes he turn'd his view, False friends, or open enemies, were found. How wide their league he rather fear'd than knew. But this was understood, That feuds deliver'd down for many an age, From sire to son in sacred heritage, Wherewith their very nature seem'd imbued, Had been with dread solemnities forsworn And secret rites accurst, in fell intent That they should root the English from the land, And the last white man's blood Be of their bond the seal and sacrament.

In truth they were a formidable foe; Compared with ours, their numbers made them so; Crafty, deceitful, murderous, merciless: Yet with heroic qualities endued: Contempt of death, surpassing fortitude, Patience through all privations, self-control Even such as saints and sages scarce attain, And a sustain'd screnity of soul, Which Fortune might assault or tempt in vain, Not to be moved by pleasure or by pain.

OLIVER.

Alas to think they have not long ere this Been link'd with you in Christian fellowship!

LEVERETT.

Look at divided Christendom !—at Englaud; Her wounds, inflicted by sectarian rage, Open and festering,—never to be heal'd ! Look at thy father's house; a threefold cord Of brotherhood trebly disparted there; Then tell me, where may Christian fellowship In this wide world be found ? Alas, my friend, I see it only in the Promised Land. From Pisgah's summit, through the glass of Faith, Far in the regions of futurity. Yet something we have done, which—though I own it Far short of what true policy requires,

And in the scale of national duty weighing Lighter than dust—may show we are not wholly The slaves of Mammon. Fretted as we have been By schisms, by rampant heresies disturb'd, And by that spiritual pride possess'd, whose touch, With influence lethal as aspic's tooth, Numbs the life-blood of charity, this England Hath sons, whose names, if there be any praise, Shall have their place with saints of primitive times

Euroll'd, true heroes of humanity.

OLIVER.

Oh doubt not that their virtue and their prayers Will in this time of trial speed you more Than all your carnal strength !

LEVERETT.

That faith might better

Beseem thine uncle of the seminary, The Oratorian, than thy father's son. A monk may put his trust in beads and sackcloth; But Oliver's saints wore buff, and their right hands Wrought for themselves the miracles they ask'd for. Think not, young man, that I disparage prayer, Because I hold that he, who calls on Heaven For help against his temporal enemies, Then with most cause and surest hope prefers His supplication, when he best exerts The prudence and the strength which God hath given him.

OLIVER.

There is a strength in patience which exceedeth All other power; a prudence in the Gospel Passing, as needs it must, all human wisdom. That Gospel teaches passiveness and peace.

LEVERETT.

Patience he needs, Heaven knows! who hath to deal

With one enamour'd of a young opinion, And like a giddy amorist pursuing The passionate folly, reckless where it leads him. Remember that you come not here to teach: Remember too, that something like respect Is due to years, and something to experience; Some deference to our station; some attention— And this at least will be allow'd—to one Who at all hazards has approved himself Thy mother's friend, and would no less be thine.

Abash'd at that reproof severe Stood Oliver, unable to abate The rising glow of shame that fired his cheek, Or check the starting tear.

But then the Governor's eye compassionate Even in reproof, — the pause he interposed, — The low relenting tone wherein he closed

His stern though fit authoritative strain, Temper'd the needful pain.

" O best and kindest friend, O friend revered, I feel and own, Wbether I spake in error or in truth, That thy rebuke is just," replied the youth : "Forgive me! and no more will I offend ; But listen, and in all things, that I may, Humbly and zealously obey."

LEVERETT.

Hear then, and patiently, while I instruct thee Of things as yet unchronicled in books, But bearing on this crisis, and the knowledge Whereof in thine adventure will be found Specially needful. When the English laid The poor foundations of our colony, (For poor indeed they seem'd; and yet I ween In happy hour a corner-stone was placed That ne'er shall be removed !) they found the land Contested sometimes, and sometimes possess'd In captious peace, between three powerful nations, Or rather families of tribes. Omitting The minor distributions (which are many And barbarous all), suffice it to name these In order of their strength ; the Pequods first ; The Narhagansets, unto whom belong Thy ransom'd eaptives; lastly, the Moheagans, Who occupied the immediate territory Whereon our sad adventurers set foot. With Massasoyt, chief Saehem of the latter, A league was made, of mutual benefit ; For, under Providence, his only friendship, In the first hardships of the settlement, Saved them alive ; and their alliance proved A shield against his enemies. This being The end to which he look'd, who was a man Advanced in years, far-sighted, honourable, And of a spirit, which, if he had sway'd An European sceptre, might have blest The people over whom its rule extended, The league was faithfully on both sides observed ; And ere his death the old man solemnly Renew'd it for his sons, who for themselves In their own persons ratified the engagement.

But men and times were changed, when the elder In the one youth an enterprising temper, youth Ambitious of command; and in the other Succeeded to his sire ; for the Colonists, Now-well acquainted with these Indian neighbours, Loath'd their unseemly usages, abhort'd Their most incredible eruelty, despised Their easy ignorance, — and practised on it. I seek not to conceal our own offenees : Compared with other nations, — even with England, Such as corrupted England long hath been, — We are a sober, yea, a righteous people : But Trade, which in the mother-land is one Of many wheels, bearing a part alone,

And that too but subordinate, in the movements Of a complicate and wonderful machine, Is in our simple order the main-spring That governs all. And where Trade rules, alas ' Whatever name be worshipp'd in the temples, Mammon receives the heart's idolatry, And is the god of the land.

Our Indian friends Too soon had reason to abate their friendship ; And politic interests, which had held them to us, Were loosen'd, when they saw their ancient foes, The dreaded Pequods, by our arms pursued In vigorous war, and rooted from the land, Till the name alone remain'd, with none to own it. This Alexander, so the youth was ealled, Finding that check removed, and being also By his father's death set free from all control, Plotted against the English, in resentment Partly, no doubt, because strict pains in teaching (Less wise than well intended) had been spent On his indoeile and unwilling spirit; But having injuries also to provoke A haughty courage. Ere his schemes were ripe He was, on sure intelligence, arrested ; And disappointed malice, joined with anger, Raising a fever in his heart and brain, Deliver'd him from our restraint by death. He left a brother, who inherited His rights and wrongs, - that Philip who is now The scourge and terror of the colony.

Think not that these were names imposed in baptism :

Upon that point the heart of Massasoyt Was harden'd; and his sons, like him, regarded With mingled hatred and contempt a faith They failed to understand. But it is held A mark of honour to bestow, a pledge Of friendship to receive, new appellations; Which here too, among savages, import Something of peerage, of deserved esteem, Or of imputed worth, the commonalty (Strange as such custom may appear) being nameless.

My predecessor, with too true presage, Fix'd on these names, less for the Christian sound Which use hath given them, than because he saw In the one youth an enterprising temper, Ambitions of command; and in the other, More to be fear'd, a deep dissembling spirit, Which, if the time required, could brook its wrongs, And in all outward patience chew the while The cud of bitter thoughts. He being yet young, The station, which his sire had filled, devolved Upon a chief, who was alike approved In council and in war; the right remaining For Philip to succeed in course of years, If years should validate the acknowledged claim Of birthright; for that claim, among the Indians, Is held defeasible by ill-desert.

And if one tribe, One chief, unto thy words of peace incline A willing ear, the league in all its parts Will feel its ill-compacted strength relax: Once loosen'd, it dissolves.

The Governor

Paused then ; and fixing on the youth a look Benign though mournful, "Mark me, Oliver," He said ; "I call upon thy mother's soul To witness-if the spirits of the dead Are cognizant of what is done below-That I have sought in all sincerity To turn thee from thy purpose! If the event Be fatal, before thee, and her, and Heaven, Shall I stand unreproved ; and with my sorrow No self-reproach will mingle. But if still Thy purpose holdeth firm, God speed thee! Go In hope! I would not that my words should prove A load to weigh thy buoyaut spirit down. It may be thou may'st render to the state Some emittent service in this time of need. And thus-O son of an unhappy house, Born to a sad inheritance! it may be, That in this other England, this new world, Thou may'st recast thy fortunes : may'st acquire Such honour as consists with peace of mind In the end; and for thy children's children gain In this good land a goodly heritage."

VIII.

PARTING WORDS.

Sox of a hapless house ! What were the thoughts which then within thy breast, At thy true friend's concluding words, arose ? Doth that quick flush disclose A feeling thon hast labour'd to control, And hitherto represt In singleness of heart and strength of soul ? A light, which like a sudden hope might seem, Kindled his cheek, and brighten'd in his eye : But it departed like a gleam, That for a moment in the heavy sky Is open'd when the storm is hurrying by ; And then his countenance resumed Its meek screnity.

Nor did that sad composure change, When of the gentle maiden Leverett spake, Whom to his charge her mother's dying prayer In Christian confidence consign'd. And yet it was a theme which well might wake Oppugnant feelings in his inmost mind; For with a hope upon that mother's heart, Implied, though not express'd, the solemn care Was given; and therefore in the young man's heart Uneasily it lay, As if he were anjust, And had received a trust

And had received a trust He could not, must not, did not dare— And yet would fain—repay.

"That trust I could not choose but take," he said; "And all that I stand pledged for to the dead Is soon discharged; it will not from my way Detain me long, nor lead me far astray."

"'Tis but the easy distance of a day From Hadley," quoth the Governor ; and he spread A map before them, rudely drawn, wherein Wild forests stretching far and wide were seen, Rivers whose inland course was unexplored, And infant settlements, as yet ill-stored, Few, and with dreary intervals between. "Here in the vale of the Connecticut," Said Leverett, " Willboy's allotment lies : A part from our immediate enemies Remote, and, if reliance might be put On distance, safe. From hence it bears due west Some five day's travel through the woods ; and now The least frequented path will be the best, That thou may'st leave behind thee on the left The troubled country. Here thou see'st it south, About these creeks and inlets and the mouth Of Providence river, and the region wide Of lakes and swamps in woodland interspersed, That darkens o'er the land on every side. This then will be thy course, to render first The damsel to her father's hands ; then seek Thy fortune with thine Indian company In the Narhaganset lands. If it fall fair, Thou wilt among their people leave them there, And to that painful interview proceed, Which of thy dearest hope, full well I know, Must undeceive thee. It shall be my care To the Connecticut thy way to speed ; From thence, alas ! I can but follow thee With anxious thoughts in spirit and in prayer. But I will suffer no ill bodings now : The Lord is merciful, and thy intent Is righteous, and to him we leave the event."

Thus having ended, to the board he led His guest: too full of care were they For appetite or easy talk that day. "This caution let me give thee," Leverett said, "That Willoby is a high old Cavalier !" "Fear not lest I should jar upon his ear

With ill-attuned discourse," the Youth replied. "He bore a part, a brave one too, I hear, In those unhappy times, and may look back Upon the strife with passion and with pride : My soul abhors the ill deeds on either side, Even if it had not cost me all too dear. Likelier it is that in my Father's sight I may appear degenerate, and excite Sorrow or sterner notions in a heart, The which, albeit with piety imbued, Is to a Christian temper unsubdued : But this too I can bear. Oh what a strength For sufferance to the patient soul is given When, wholly humbled, it hath placed at length Its only hope in Heaven." " Nay," answer'd Leverett, " earth, I trust, hath yet Good hope for thee in store, One day with fair performance to be crown'd : For one who doth so well discharge the debt Of filial duty, will not Heaven fulfil The eternal promise which it made of yore ? Happy, and long, I trust, thy days shall be, Here, in the land which the Lord giveth thec." And then, as if with such discursive speech To draw his mind from gloomy thoughts away, Did Leverett reach His lifted hand towards the town and bay, Bright in the morning sunshine as they lay Before them : " Is it not a goodly land," He cried, " where nought is wanting that may bless

The heart of man with wholesome happiness? Summer subdues not here To sloth the dissolute mind : Nor doth the rigorous year In long inaction bind His icc-lock'd arm and torpid faculties. But changeful skies And varying seasons, in their due career, Bring forth his powers ; and in the vigorous frame The human spirit thrives and ripens here ! Where might the sober mind, Which Heaven with temperate desires hath blest, A land of happier promise find? Where might a good man fitlicr fix his rest? Where better might he choose a burial-place For him and for his race? Where wiselier plant the tree Of his posterity?"

The smile wherewith the youth received his speech Was cold and feeble, — one in which the heart Too plainly had no part ; Constrain'd it came, and slowly past away. "Truly thou say'st, O friend !" He said ; "and well are they Who, far from plagues and plots, and from the rage Of faction, for their children may prepare A peaceful heritage. For me, if other end Await me, fall my fortune as it may, A comfort and a strength it is to know That wheresoe'er I go, There is the same Heaven over me on high, Whereon in faith to fix the steady eye; The same access for prayer; The same God, always present, every where; And if no home, yet every where the bed Which Earth makes ready for the weary head.

"But wherefore should I talk of weariness Thus early in the day, And when the morning calls me on my way? In brightness and in beauty hath it risen, As if the eternal skies Approved and smiled upon our enterprise ! Now then farewell! That we shall meet again, True friend! we know; but whether among men Or angels who can tell ? It is not ours To choose, or to foresee; Such choice or foresight would but ill agree With man's imperfect powers, Enough for him, that what is best will be."

JOURNEY THROUGH THE FOREST.

THEY are on their way, and they have enter'd now The forest that from earliest time hath stood, By human culture unsubdued. Strangelier assorted company Than this, which through that ancient wood Their solitary course pursued. No errant knight might chance to see, Wandering, in good King Arthur's days, Through Faery or Loegria land, Where most adventures were at hand. Liken'd the gentle Annabel might be To sweet Serena, ere the blatant mouth And cankerous tooth Had with their venom stain'd her harmless youth. And he who paced beside her steed Might seem, in form, and strength, and manly grace, Like Calidore, when he had laid aside His glorious thoughts and martial pride, And, as a shepherd, in the sylvan shade, Woo'd Pastorella for his bride, Contented to forego for her the meed Of high desert; and with true love How largely for ambition overpaid ! Such Oliver might seem, and such the maid.

S30

But lighter hearts, 1 weeu, of yore The errant knights and damsels bore, In ages when the shield and lance Gave law through all the realms of Old Romance; Who roam'd at hap, or on adventure bent, Searching the seas, the isles, and continent; When they, in bower, in hermitage, and hall, Were welcomed every where by all, Or underneath the greenwood tree Took up their inn contentedly.

For in that pensive maiden's mien Had recent sorrow left its trace. And plainly too might there be seen A present trouble in her face : She fear'd the melancholy meeting, When grief would mar her father's greeting; And hardly less, I ween, the nain With which she soon must part From one whose image would remain The inmate of her heart. For wishes, from herself till now conceal'd-Conceal'd, if not represt-And thoughts, to which the will had not consented, Forlornly as she felt them now reveal'd. Her secret soul unwillingly confess'd, Unwillingly repented: And hopes, that had arisen she scarce knew how,

Were first acknowledged when they fail'd her now,

Think not that Oliver was free The while from painful sympathy: What more had he required his lot to bless, Than in the depth of those clear eyes was seen-The modest, meek, confiding gentleness, That soften'd while it sanctified her mien ; Those looks, devoid of art. Whose mild intelligence he loved to meet; The voice, that, varying still, but always sweet, Still found a chord responsive in his heart ? If ever at his fate he half repined, If ever o'er his calm and constant mind The doubt, the trouble, and the cloud, were brought, 'Twas at the thought, That cruel circumstance two souls must sever, Whom God, he surely felt, would else have join'd for ever.

Uneasy now became perforce The inevitable intercourse, Too grateful heretofore : Each in the other could descry The tone constrain'd, the alter'd eye. They knew that each to each could seem No longer as of yore ; And yet, while thus estranged, I deem, Each loved the other more. Hers was perhaps the saddest heart ; His the more forced and painful part ; A sense of proper maiden pride To her the needful strength supplied. Then first perhaps the Virgin thought How large a dower of love and faithfulness Her gentle spirit could have brought A kindred heart to bless; Herself then first she understood With what capacities endued; Then first, by undeserved neglect Roused to a consciousness of self-respect, Felt she was not more willing to be won Than worthy to be woo'd.

Had they from such disturbant thoughts been free, It had been sure for them A gladsome sight to see The Indian children, with what glee They breathed their native air of liberty. Food to the weary man with toil forespent Not more refreshment brings, Than did the forest breeze upon its wings To these true younglings of the wilderness: A happy sight, a sight of hearts content ! For blitbe were they As swallows, wheeling in the summer sky At close of day ; As insects, when on high Their mazy dance they thread In myriads overhead, Where sunbeams through the thinner foliage gleam. Or spin in rapid circles as they play, Where winds are still, Upon the surface of the unrippled stream : Yea, gamesome in their innocence were they As lambs in fragrant pasture, at their will The udder when to press They run, for hunger less Than joy, and very love and wantonness. Nor less contentment had it brought To see what change benevolence had wrought In the wild Indian mother, whom they first Had seen, her spirit strong Madden'd by violence of wrong, For veugeance in her inmost soul, With natural but with ferine rage, athirst. That soul unhoped-for kindness had subdued : Her looks, and words, and actions, now combined, Express'd, in that composure of the mind Which uneffaceable sorrow had left behind, A lively ever-watchful gratitude. Oliver seem'd to her a creature Less of this earth than of celestial nature . And Annabel as well Had won from her a love like veneration ; (So goodness on the grateful heart can gain;) Though charms of European tint and feature No beauty to an Indian eye convey, Regarded with disdain, As if they were the original stamp and stain Of an inferior clay, Proved in some earlier, inexpert creation, And then, for degradation,

When the red man was fashion'd, put away.

Pamya was troubled now, for she had seen Their alter'd mien : Some change there was, she knew not what, nor why. Some infelicity; Which yet she might descry Rose not from wrath nor alienated will ; For in their converse still The tones were such as meet The ear of love, and still The smiles they interchanged, though sad, were sweet : Yet plainly she could tell, all was not well. They too could read in her observant eye Its apprehension and its sympathy : And surely she, had but her speech been free, Had prest, how earnestly ! for explanation, And sought to bring about The full and perfect reconciliation Dearly desired by both, she did not doubt. Their hearts were merciful and meek she knew, And could not to each other but be true: But on her tongue the curse of Babel hung. And when the eager wish her breast was swelling, Eye-speaking thoughts were all she could impart, Intelligibly telling The deep indwelling yearnings of the heart. Four days they travell'd through the endless wood, Measuring their journey still to reach at eve

Some settler's home, and sure of their receiving Such hospitality, sincere though rude, As men who felt no want, and had no vice Of chilling avarice, In their plain kindness found a joy in giving. The fifth morn rose, and with the morn rose they, That they might reach that day Their journey's end ; and through the forest wide Did they their weary way Hold on from early dawn till eventide ; But ere the light of eve Began to fade, their guide, Accustomed to descry With instantaneous eye The slightest trace of man, a smoke espied, Staining a little space of open sky: " Yon is the place we seek !" he said ; nor knew What a cold feeling, at the words, ran through х.

On, what a happy meeting had been here, Willohy thought, in anguish, when he prest His daughter to his widow'd breast; If that dear hope which served so long to cheer His patient labours in the wilderness

Had wholly heen fulfill'd, as now in part ; After so many storms and troubles past, Here had the faithful partner of his heart

Rejoiced to reach the quiet port at last.

OLIVER NEWMAN.

TwE following sketch of the story intended to be worked out in this poem is, with the exception of those passages otherwise appropriated by references, drawn from very brief and sometimes contradictory notes in Mr. Southey's handwriting.

In the published letters from Mr. Southey to Mr. W. Taylor of Norwich, there is a passage, written in Jan. 1811, which records the earliest germ of this poem in his mind. "In reviewing Holmes's American Annals, I pointed out Philip's war as the proper subject for an Anglo-American Iliad. I have now fallen in love with it myself, and am brooding over it with the full intention of falling to work as soon as Pelayo is completed. The main interest will fix upon Goffe, the regicide, for whom I invent a Quaker son, a new character you will allow for heroic poetry. This Oliver Goffe, however, is to be the hero." The poem itself is in the first draught called Oliver Goffe.

The facts relating to those regicides whose fate is alluded to in the poem are as follow :* "When the restoration appeared inevitable, Colonel Goffe, with his father-in-law, Colonel Whalley, sceing that their life was in danger, left the kingdom, and arrived in America on the 27th of July, 1660. For some time they resided at Cambridge, four miles from Boston, attending public service, and being received with respect and hospitality by the inhabitants. But when the Act of Idemnity, out of which they were expressly excepted, arrived at Boston, in November, the magistrates withdrew their protection, and Whalley and Goffe retired to New Haven. Here they were forced to conceal themselves, and eventually to fly to a retirement, called Hatchet's Harbour, in the woods, where they remained two nights, till a cave in the side of a hill was prepared to conceal them. To this hill they gave the name of Providence, and remained some weeks in their hiding-place, sleeping,

The latter part of Goffe's life ven, was suspected by the magistrates of concealing seems not to be known with certainty. Dwight says, them, they went publicly to the deputy-governor of New Haven to offer themselves up; but he refused to take any notice of them, suffering them to return again to the woods. The pursuit of them afterwards relaxing, they remained two years in a house near Milford, where they "requently praved and preached at private meetings in their chamber; till the king's commissioners coming to Boston, they were again driven to their cave in the woods. Here some Indians discovered their beds, which obliged them to seek a fresh refuge: and they went to Hadley, 100 miles distant, where they were received by Mr. Rus- thers being a clergyman of the Church of England, sell, the minister, and remained as long as they lived, very few persons knowing who they were. Also the of the colony.* "The following story has been traditionally conveyed down among the inhabitants of count of the war, are matter of history. Hadley. In the course of Philip's war, which inand amongst them those in the neighbourhood of this town, the inhabitants thought it proper to observe the 1st of September, 1675, as a day of fasting and of principle intended to be exhibited-yiz, zeal and prayer. While they were in the church, and for the Christian faith, inflexible truth, peacefulness, employed in their worship, they were surprised by and endurance-were not exclusively belonging to a band of savages. The people instantly betook that seet whose operations and whose sufferings in themselves to their arms, which, according to the New England he had been contemplating; and at custom of the times, they had carried with them to the same time, that some features of their character the church, and, rushing out of the house, attacked were both unmanageable in poetry and distasteful to their invaders. The panic under which they began his own mind. There was also another reason for the conflict was, however, so great, and their num- the alteration, namely, that he found it necessary for ber was so disproportioned to that of their enemies, his plot, that, at least in one instance, Oliver's usual that they fought doubtfully at first, and in a short mode of conduct should bend to circumstances; and time began evidently to give way. At this time an such a compliance would be morally, and therefore ancient man, with hoary locks, of a most venerable poetically, probable in a person swayed only by a and dignified aspect, and in a dress widely differing from that of the inhabitants, appeared suddenly at their head, and with a firm voice, and an example of undaunted resolution, reanimated their spirits-led them again to the conflict-and totally routed the savages. When the battle was ended, the stranger suddenly disappeared; and no person knew whence he had come, or whither he had gone. The relief was so timely, so sudden, so unexpected, and so providential; the appearance and the retreat of him who furnished it, were so unaccountable, his person was so dignified and commanding, his resolution so superior, and his interference so decisive, that the inhabitants, without any uncommon exertion of credulity, readily believed him to be an angel sent by Heaven for their preservation. Nor was this opinion seriously controverted until it was discovered, several years afterwards, that Goffe and Whalley had been lodged in the house of Mr. Russell. Then it when the weather was tempestuous, in a house near | was known that their deliverer was Goffe, Whalley immediately before the passage above quoted, "After Whalley's death, Goffe quitted Hadley, went into Connecticut, and afterwards, according to tradition, to the neighbourhood of New York. Here he is said to have lived some time, and, the better to disguise himself, to have carried vegetables at times to market. It is said that having been discovered here, he retired secretly to the colony of Rhode Island, and there lived with a son of Whalley during the remainder of his life."

Goffe's was a divided family-one of his browhile another was become a Roman Catholic priest. To this division allusion is made in Leverett's conversation with Oliver. Of the other persons introduced, the following are historical: Leverett the gavernor, who succeeded Bellingham, in 1673; he represented doing in the poem : and Randolph, of While they were at Hadley the Indian war broke whom the people of New England said "that he names of the Indian chieftains, and the general ac-

The following notes will explain the intended bearing of this character upon the story

1811. "A son of Goffe, a Quaker, gone after his mother's death to seek his father. He, by converting one of the principal Sachems, weakens Metacom's party so materially as to decide the contest; and with that Sachem he retires into the interior. He and his father are discovered, and he will not lift his hand in defence. A party of Indians take them all, he still passive; hence his influence begins with their astonishment." "The points on which Oliver's Quakerism is put to the test are, in not denying his father's name, and in not hfting a hand to defend him."

1814. "Oliver must be so far instrumental in terminating the war as to obtain security for his father; and this instrumentality must be effected wholly by means conformable to his peculiar opinions. But * Dwights Travels in New England, vol i. p. 317. London. 1923. those opinions must yield where they are wrong."

ascertained, it has been thought better to sketch it now puts himself under Oliver's guidance. This out, however rudely, from the author's lints, than to leave an entire blank.

X. Oliver at Willoby's House.

They remain awhile at Willoby's, that Pamya may be their protection. When some Indians appear, she goes out, and finds among a party of Indians one of her own tribe. After her story, the calumet is smoked, and the door of Willoby's house painted with marks indicating that it was under their protection. Then they venture to depart. A sort of half-confidence has first been made to Willoby in consequence of his wife's letter, and a sort of halfengagement formed. Willoby had known one of the Goffes. His moral reasons for leaving England,on account of his sons, seeing the character of the times, and that all that we pray in the Litany to be delivered from, was come upon the country-blindness of heart, pride, vain-glory and hypocrisy, envy, hatred and malice, false doctrine, heresy and schism, sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion, &c.

XI. The Wounded Indian.

Oliver journeying with Pamya and her children through the forest, finds a wounded Indian, by whom they stay till a party of his countrymen see them. This is the Mohawk, whom Philip had meant to kill, and not scalped, to create a belief that he had been killed by the English. (An historical fact, and represented as not of unfrequent occurrence.) Many hints for forest scenery, which are noted down, woald probably belong to this canto. At night Oliver is seen reading by firelight in the wood.

XII. Whalley's body.

The Indians conduct the party to their Sachem: on the way they meet with Whalley's body being conveyed somewhere for interment. Oliver knows it by a mutilated hand. Likeness of Whalley to his daughter [Oliver's mother]; that family character of face which the infant brings into the world, and into which the countenance settles in old age, when the character which individual pursuits and passions have induced fades away, and the natural lineaments recover their primary cast. The death of Whalley sets Goffe at liberty. They reach the encampment of Indians, and Pamya is restored to her own friends, the Narhagansets.

XIII. The Affair of Hadley.

A renegade (in one place named Joshua Tift, the English savage and traitor,) being among the Indians, calls Oliver a spy, insults and strikes him. This Oliver endures patiently, making no retaliation. This fellow relates the affair of Hadley, "the most disastrous day that ever befell New England," and especially the marvellous apparition of one during the conflict, who was really Goffe, Oliver's father.

XIV. Reasoning with the Sachems.

The interest of this scene is to turn chiefly upon two points: the effect for good which Oliver's words have upon an old Indian chief, who has formerly children baptized.

Imperfectly as the latter part of the story can be been impressed by Eliot or R. Williams, and who man belongs to the tribe of Sakanets, who are probably connected with the Narhaganset stock. -1t would have been contrary to history to make the Narhaganset chieftain himself influenced at this time by Oliver. The other point is, the peculiar character of Philip, composed of hatred and vindietiveness against the English, united with gloomy forebodings about the issue of the war.

These may be some of his words, or rather the more hopeful Canonchet's:

The forest and the swamp are our allies; Have we not with these giants of the wood A sacred immemorial brotherhood?

The land itself will aid her proper children.

XV. Oliver reaches his Father.

When Oliver mentions the wilderness, Goffe replies, it is not there that he must prepare the way of the Lord, but in the streets of London.

XVI. The Arrest.

A party sent by Randolph, with Willoby the cavalicr at their head, surprise them .-- Willoby offers to let them go, if Oliver will declare that this person is not Goffe. Meeting with Randolph.

XVII. Rescue

The whole party are surprised by the Sakonets .---Goffe and Willoby escape.-Randolph and Oliver are taken, and carried to the encampment of the Sachems. -Oliver is recognized and welcomed.-Randolph is to be burnt, but Oliver obtains his life and safe dismission: they separate.

XVIII. Defeat of the Indians.

Goffe meanwhile has rallied some stragglers, who attack and defeat the Sakonet party, and take some; for whom Oliver intercedes, engaging for them that they shall commit no more hostilities .- He then goes with these Indians to negotiate with their tribe.

X1X. Annabel a Prisoner.

While this discussion is going on, Annabel is brought in a prisoner by the renegade: in the dispute which ensues, Oliver kills him. This is the point in which Oliver's passiveness is to give way to a just wrath. Before he knocks out the fellow's brains he stands "trembling, but not with fear."

XX. Peace.

The Sakonet tribe make peace with the English; Oliver going with the chiefs to the English headquarters to sign it .- The Mohawk, whom he had saved in the forest, meets him there, at the head of his party.

XXI. Death of Philip.

Oliver's services are now clearly seen .- Randolph solicits for him a grant of land .-- Willoby gives him his daughter, and Russell marries them .-- Pamya's

FRAGMENTARY THOUGHTS

OCCASIONED BY HIS SON'S DEATH.*

THY life was a day, and sum it well, life is but a week of such days,—with how mach storm, and cold, and darkness! Thine was a sweet spring holyday,—a vernal Sabbath, all sunshine, hope, and promise.

and that name In sacred silence buried, which was still At morn and eve the never-wearying theme Of dear discourse.

playfal thoughts Turn'd now to gall and esel.

He to whom Heaven in mercy hath assign'd Life's wholesome wormwood, fears no bitterness when

From th' hand of Death he drinks the Amreeta cup,

Beauties of nature,—the passion of my youth, Nursed ap and ripen'd to a settled love, Whereto my heart is wedded.

Feeling at Westminster, when summer evening sent a sadness to my heart, and I sate pining for green fields, and banks of flowers, and running streams,—or dreaming of Avon and her rocks and woods.

No more great attempts, only a few autumnal flowers, like second primroses, &c.

They who look for mc in our Father's kingdom Will look for Him also; inseparably Shall we be so remembered.

* Letter to Mr. W. Taylor, March, 1817. "I have begun a desultory pnem in blank verse, pitched in a higher key than Cowper's, and in a wiser strain of philosophy than Young's; but as yet I have not recovered heart enough to proceed with it; nor is it likely that it will be published during my life." The Grave the house of Hope: It is the haven whither we are bound On the rough sea of life, and thence she lands In her own country, on the immortal shore.

Come, then, Pain and infirmity — appointed guests, My heart is ready.

My soul Needed perhaps a longer discipline, Or sorer penance, here.

A respite something like repose is gain'd While I invoke them, and the troubled tide Of feeling, for a while allay'd, obeys A tranquillizing influence, that might seem By some benign intelligence dispensed, Who lends an ear to man.

They are not, though, Mere unrealities: rather, I ween, The ancient Poets, in the graceful garb Of fiction, have transmitted earliest truths, Ill understood ; adorning, as they deem'd, With mythic tales things cringly received, And mingling with primeval verities Their own devices vain. For what to us Scripture assures, by searching proof confirm'd, And inward certainty of sober Faith, Tradition unto them deliver'd down Changed and corrupted in the course of time, And haply also by delusive art Of Evil Powers.

LITTLE BOOK, IN GREEN AND GOLD.

Little Book, in green and gold, Thou art thus bedight to hold ROBERT SOUTHEY'S Album rhymes. Wrung from him in busy times : Not a few to his vexation, By importune application ; Some in half-sarcastic strain, More against than with the grain ; Other some, he must confess, Bubbles blown in idleness; Some in earnest, some in jest, Good for little at the best: Yet because his daughter dear Would collect them fondly here, Little Book, in gold and green, Thou art not unfitly seen Thus apparell'd for her pleasure, Like the casket of a treasure. Other owner, well I know, Never more can prize thee so.

Little Book, when thou art old. Time will dim thy green and gold. Little Book, thon wilt outlive The pleasure thon wert made to give : Dear domestic recollections, Home-born loves, and old affections, Incommunicable they : And when these have passed away, As perforce they must, from earth, Where is then thy former worth? Other value, then, I ween, Little Book, may supervene, Happily if unto some Thou in due descent shouldst come. Who would something find in thee Like a relic's sanctity, And in whom thou may'st awake, For thy former owner's sake, A pious thought, a natural sigh, A feeling of mortality.

When those feelings, and that race, Have in course of time given place, Little worth, and little prized, Disregarded or despised, Thou wilt then be bought and sold, In thy faded green and gold. Then, unless some curious eye Thee upon the shelf should spy. Dust will gather on thee there, And the worms, that never spare. Feed their fill within, and hide, Burrowing safely in thy side, Till transfigured out they come From that emblem of the tomb : Or, by mould and damp consumed, Thou to perish may'st be doom'd.

But if some collector find thee, He will, as a prize, re-bind thee; And thou may'st again be seen Gayly drest in gold and green.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE ALBUM OF ROTHA Q.

ROTHA, after long delays, Since thy book must cross the Raise, Down I sit to turn a stave, Be it gay or be it grave.

Wiser wish than what thy name Prompts for thee I cannot frame : Nowhere find a better theme Than thy native namesake stream. Lovelier river is their none Underneath an English sun; From its source it issues bright Upon hoar Hellvellyn's height, Flowing where its summer voice Makes the mountain herds rejoice : Down the dale it issues then : Not polluted there by men; While its lucid waters take Their pastoral course from lake to lake, Please the eye in every part, Lull the ear and soothe the heart, Till into Windermere sedate They flow and uncontaminate.

Rotha, such from youth to age Be thy mortal pilgrimage;

Thus in childhood blithe and free, Thus in thy maturity, Blest and blessing, may it be; And a course in welfare past, Thus serenely close at last.

IMAGINATION AND REALITY.

THE hill was in the sunshine gay and green, The vale below could not be seen ; A cloud hung over it, A thin white eloud, that scarce was seen to fly, So slowly did it flit : Yet cloud methinks I err in calling it, It spread so evenly along the sky. It gave the hills beyond a hue So beautiful and blue, That I stood loitering for the view : Loitering and musing thoughtfully stood I, For well those hills I knew, And many a time had travell'd them all o'er; Yet now such change the hazy air had wrought, That I could well have thought I never had beheld the scene before. But while I gazed the cloud was passing by ; On the slow air it slowly travell'd on, Eftsoon and that deceitful haze was gone, Which had beguiled me with its mockery; And all things seem'd again the things they were. Alas! but then they were not half so fair As I had shaped them in the hazy air !

MADRIGAL,

TRANSLATED FROM LUIS MARTIN.

[This poem is selected for publication from a small volume of translations, because, having been printed before in a newspaper, it attracted the attention of Mr. D'Israeli, who has inserted it in the "Curiosities of Literature," as a beautiful specimen of a kind of extravagance characteristic of Spanish poetry. It seemed, therefore, worth while to place it among the poems of the "Translator.]

On the green margin of the land, Where Guadalhorce winds his way, My Lady lay. With golden key Sleep's gentle hand

Had elosed her eyes so bright, Her eyes-two suns of light,

And bade his balmy dews

Her rosy cheeks suffuse.

The River God in slumber saw her laid. He raised his dripping head With weeds o'erspread, Clad in his watery robes approach'd the maid, And with cold kiss, like Death, Drank the rieh perfume of the maiden's breath. The maiden felt that icy kiss; Her sums unclosed, their flame Full and unclouded on the intruder came. Amazed, the bold intruder felt His frothy body melt, And heard the radiance on his bosom hiss; And forced in blind confusion to retire, Leapt in the water to escape the fire.

February, 1799.

MOHAMMED;

A FRAGMENT, WRITTEN IN 1799.

CLOAK'n in the garment of green, who lies on the bed of Mohammed,

Restless and full of fear, yet semblant of one that is sleeping ?

- Every sound of the feet at his door he hears, and the breathing
- Low of inaudible words: he knows their meaning of murder,
- Knows what manner of men await his outgoing, and listens

All their tread, and their whisp'ring, till even the play of his pulses

Disturbs him, so deep his attention. The men of the Koreish

Fix on the green-robed youth their eyes; impatiently watchful

- Wait they the steps of his rising, the coming of him whom they hated.
- He rises and makes himself pure, and turning towards the Caaba,
- Loud he repeats his prayer: they hear, and, in eagerness trembling,
- Grasp the hilts of their swords—their swords that are sworn to the slaughter.
- But when the youth went forth, they saw, and behold ! it was Ali !
- Steady the hero's face: it was pale, for his life was a blessing;
- It was ealm, for in death he look'd on to the erown of the martyr.
- Dark as they were of soul, and goaded by rage disappointed,

- They shed not the blood of the youth, but remember'd their chieftain his father, Abu Taleb the good, and respected the virtue of friendship. Bafiled, and full of wrath, through Mecca they scatter the tidings: "He has fled, has discovered our plans, has cluded our vengeance. Saw ye the steps of his flight ? Where lurks he, the lying blasphemer ? Now to the chase, to the chase; scize now the bow and the quiver; Now with the sword and the spear, ye stubborn of Mecca ! pursue him ; Seek him now to the north and the south, to the sunset and sunrise; They Follow, follow the chosen one's flight !" rush from the city : Over the plain they pursue him, pursue him with cries and with curses-Sounds that rung over the plain, and rung in the echoing mountains; And Mecca received in her streets the din of their clamorous uproar.
 - But the voice of the Moslem, the silent prayer of the faithful,
 - Rose to the throne of God; and tears of the heart overflowing
 - Interceded for him whom they loved and believed his apostle.
 - "Where is the blasphemous fled ?---the lying disturber of Mecca ?
 - Has he journey'd to Tayof? Under the shield of his uncle
 - Lurks he for safety there ?---or to Yathreb, the credulous city ?
- Or seeks he the Ethiop's court, where the earlier runaways shelter ?"
- Lashing their steeds, they pursue ; to the east and the dwelling of Abbas
- Hasten the thirsty for blood; to the north they hurry, to Yathreb;
- Some to the shore of the sea, lest haply a hark might await him,
- And the waves should become his protectors: impetnously rashing,
- Drive they in fury along; hencath the hoofs of their horses
- Sparkles the rock of the valley, and rises the dust of the desert.
 - Others the while, more cool in wrath, and thoughtful in-fury,
- Over the town search sedulous: they in the Hashemites' dwellings
- Seek for the man proscribed; in the dwellings of Hamza and Omar,
- Ali, Abubeker, and Saad, and Abu Obeidah;

- All whom the Prophet loved, who believed in the son of Abdallah.
- Every house they search in the populous city, whose threshold
- Ever his feet had trod: thus vainly through Mecca they seek him;
- Then, unassuaged of hate, of rancour and wrath unabated,
- They to the mountains turn, to seek in their dens and retirings
- If from the death he lurks: they enter the cavern of Hira,
- Place of his fasting and prayer; the cavern of Hira is lonely.
- Not in the depth of the cave, and not in the mountain retirings,
- Not in their hollows and glens, can they track the steps of his going.
- So through the day they sought; and still, when the sun was descending,
- They were among the hills: then faint, disappointed, and weary,
- Turning their faces homeward, they journey'd slowly and sullen
- Down their rough mountain path ; but often paused, and around them
- Linger'd with prowling eyes: a little wide of their pathway,
- Thus as they paused, they saw in the side of the stony mountain
- A cave-mouth, narrow and high: the hill had the hue of the evening
- Rich on its rugged sides, and the chasm was distinct in its blackness.
- Thither turning, they sped; and one who forewent his companions
- Came to the cavern's month : disturb'd by the noise of his footsteps,
- From her nest, in the side of the chasm, a pigeon affrighted
- Fled. The advancing pursuers heard the whirr of her pinions,
- And he who was first exclaim'd," There is none in the hole of the mountain;
- For lo! a pigeon fled from her nest at the sound of my coming,
- And the spider hath spread his network over the entrance."
- Then from the cave he turn'd.
 - Was thy spirit shaken, Mohammed,
- When in the depth of the rock thou heardest the voice of the Koreish?
- He who was with thee trembled; the sweat on his forehead was chilly,
- And his eyes in alarm were turn'd towards thee in the darkness.
- Silent they sat in the rock; nor moved they, nor breathed they; but listen'd
- Long to the tread of the feet, that, fainter and fainter sounding,
