§ 1137. Complete Statement of Trustee's Title and Rights.¹— The subject of the trustee's title and rights to assets is threefold; the trustee succeeds to the bankrupt's title and stands in his

1. Bankr. Act, § 70 (a): "Title to Property."—"The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt, upon his appointment and qualification, and his successor or successors, if he shall have one or more, upon his or their appointment and qualification, shall in turn be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt, as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, except in so far as it is to property which is exempt, to all (1) documents relating to his property; (2) interests in patents, patent rights, copyrights, and trade marks; (3) powers which he might have exercised for his own benefit, but not those which he might have exercised for some other persons; (4) property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors; (5) property which prior to the filing of the petition he could by any means have transferred or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him."

See Bankr. Act, §§ 70 (e); 67 (a); 67 (b); 67 (c), (c), (f); 60 (a), (b); 47 (a) (2).

shoes and has the bankrupt's rights and remedies; and he also takes the property, in cases unaffected by any fraud of the bankrupt towards creditors, in the same plight and condition in which the bankrupt held it and subject to all equities and rights imposed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt, except where there has been some transfer or encumbrance of the property or seizure of it by legal process, void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the Bankrupt Act, although, as to the property coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, he takes it in such plight and condition only to the extent that some creditor would have taken it had such creditor held a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, and, as to the property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, held an unsatisfied execution.

But in cases affected by the fraud of the bankrupt towards creditors, as also where there has been some transfer, encumbrance, or holding of the property void as to the bankrupt's creditors or inuring to their benefit by State law, for want of record or otherwise, the trustee succeeds to the rights of any creditor already qualified by State law to avoid the transfer, encumbrance or holding or who would be qualified thereby had such creditor as to the property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, held a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, or, as to the property not in such custody, been a creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied, even though in fact no creditor may actually hold or have held such lien or execution.

And in addition thereto the trustee has the peculiar rights conferred by the special provisions of the Bankrupt Act, to avoid preferential and fraudulent transfers and liens obtained by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy.

Thus the trustee has the bankrupt's rights, title and powers, and is subject to his liabilities so far as a creditor would be subject thereto; he has the rights and remedies of creditors under the State law, both such as any existing creditor actually has asserted or is in position to assert and also such as any creditor might have had had such creditor become "armed with process" at the time of the bankruptcy; and he also has the peculiar rights conferred by the Act for the recovery of preferences and the nullification of liens acquired by legal proceedings within the four months before the bankruptcy.

§ 1138. Section 70 (a) to Be Construed with Cognate Sections—Trustee Gets More than Bankrupt's Title and Rights.—The statute, in § 70 (a), declares that the title taken by the trustee is the title the bankrupt had, but this clause must be read in conjunction with other sections of the statute and with two other parts of the same section, otherwise a wholly insufficient idea of the complete title and rights of the trustee will be had.²

It is true the title which the trustee takes is that of the bankrupt. But his rights are those of the bankrupt and more. He has, by the positive provisions of the Act, the further rights which any creditor had by State law at the time of the bankruptcy, to set aside fraudulent transfers or liens and to expose the resultant title of the bankrupt.

Thomas v. Sugarman [even before Amendment of 1910], 19 A. B. R. 509, 157 Fed. 669 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The complainant as trustee, however, represents not only the bankrupt alleged to be a party to the fraud, but his creditors who are innocent, and he may assert on their account rights against Sugarman, which the bankrupt could not."

In addition thereto he has the special rights conferred by the bankruptcy law itself in protection of the insolvent estate and its preservation as a fund for the benefit of all creditors, namely, the peculiar rights of avoiding preferential transfers and liens obtained by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy.

That the trustee's rights are not and never have been restricted to those of the bankrupt will become evident as the subject is developed. Indeed, had it not been so, the Bankruptcy Act would have been a menace to the commercial community instead of a safeguard of it; for upon bankruptcy the remedies available to creditors are suspended and are superseded, with certain exceptions, by those available to the trustee. Thus (except in certain exceptional circumstances) the creditors may no longer pursue the debtor's property in their own right; therefore, it would have been most disastrous had the trustee not been given the right to continue the pursuit of it in the ways that were being availed of by creditors at the time of the bankruptcy.

Beasley v. Coggins, 12 A. B. R. 358, 48 Fla. 215: "Section 70 (e) was intended to provide simply that the trustee in bankruptcy should have the same right to avoid conveyances as was possessed by creditors, or any of them, and this with especial reference to the Statute of 13 Elizabeth. Under the Bankruptcy Act, when one is thereunder adjudged a bankrupt, creditors are not permitted to attack fraudulent conveyances of their debtor, made more than four months of the adjudication of bankruptcy; and, if the trustee could not do so, then the act would constitute a device to permit fraudulent conveyances to take effect with impunity, in case they are successfully concealed for the specified four months. It is only by holding that the trustee is subrogated to the rights of creditors against a fraudulent conveyance that full effect and operation can be given to the Statute of 13 Eliz. against fraudulent conveyances, from which our statute is substantially taken."

In re Garcewich, 8 A. B. R. 152, 115 Fed. 87 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "It is not the meaning of the present Act that the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy should secure immunity to the title of fraudulent vendors or mortgagors, and deprive creditors of a resort to property out of which, but for the proceedings, they could have satisfied their claims,"

This clause 70 (a), then, giving the trustee, by operation of law, the bankrupt's title, should be read in conjunction with certain other parts of the statute, namely, in conjunction with subdivision, or rather class (4), of the same clause of this § 70, giving the trustee title also.

"to all property transferred by him [the bankrupt] in fraud of his creditors."

Also in conjunction with clause (e) of § 70, authorizing the trustee to avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of such bankrupt might have avoided, which reads as follows:³

"The trustee may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of such bankrupt might have avoided, and may recover the property so transferred, or its value, from the person to whom it was transferred, unless he was a bona fide holder for value prior to the date of the adjudication."

Also in conjunction with class (5) of § 70 (a):⁴

"Property which at the time of the filing of the petition, the bankrupt could by any means have transferred or which could have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him."

In re Garcewich, 8 A. B. R. 152, 115 Fed. 87 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Section 70 declares in express terms that the title of the bankrupt shall vest in the trustee to 'all property which prior to the filing of the petition he could by any means have transferred or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him.' That language is sufficiently comprehensive to vest the trustee with title to all property of the bankrupt as against the fraudulent title of another."

And in conjunction with clause (a) of § 67⁵ which provides that:

"Claims which for want of record or other reasons would not have been valid liens as against the claims of any creditor of the bankrupt shall not be liens against his estate."

And in conjunction with clause (b) of § 67, which reads:⁶

" * * * whenever a creditor is prevented from enforcing his rights as against a lien created or attempted to be created by his debtor, who afterwards, becomes bankrupt the trustee of the estate of such bankrupt shall be subrogated to and may enforce such rights of said creditor for the benefit of the estate."

6. Fourth St. Nat'l B'k v. Millbourne Mills Co., 22 A. B. R. 442, 172 Fed. 177 (C. C. A. Pa.).

And in conjunction with clause (e) of § 67 which reads:

"That all conveyances, transfers, assignments or encumbrances of his property, or any part thereof, made or given by a person adjudged a bankrupt under the provisions of this act subsequent to the passage of this act and within four months prior to the filing of the petition, with the intent and purpose on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them, shall be null and void as against the creditors of such debtor, except as to purchasers in good faith and for a present fair consideration; and all property of the debtor conveyed, transferred, assigned, or encumbered as aforesaid shall, if he be adjudged a bankrupt, and the same is not exempt from execution and liability for debts by the law of his domicile, be and remain a part of the assets and estate of the bankrupt and shall pass to his said trustee, whose duty it shall be to recover and reclaim the same by legal proceedings or otherwise for the benefit of the creditors." "And all conveyances, transfers, or incumbrances of his property made by a debtor at any time within four months prior to the filing of the petition against him, and while insolvent, which are held null and void as against the creditors of such debtor by the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which such property is situate, shall be deemed null and void under this Act against the creditors of such debtor if he be adjudged a bankrupt, and such property shall pass to the assignee and be by him reclaimed and recovered for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt."

And in conjunction with § 47 (a) (2) as amended in 1910, reading:

"And such trustee, as to all property in the custody, or coming into the custody, of the bankruptcy court shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon; and also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied."

And finally in conjunction with §§ 60 and 67 (c) and (f) of the Act relative to voidable preferences and nullified liens obtained by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy.

State Bk. v. Cox, 16 A. B. R. 36, 143 Fed. 91 (C. C. A. Ills.): "The formal title of the bankrupt to the estate passes to the trustee (70a) 'by operation of law' as of the date of adjudication, but the trustee is vested as well under subdivisions (4) and (5) with property transferred in fraud of creditors, and 'property which prior to the filing of the petition' the bankrupt 'could by any means have transferred' or which might have been levied upon and sold. Thus the narrow construction of the first-mentioned provision, which is sought for escape from liability for the plain violation of the Act through the seizure in question, not only ignores these succeeding and comprehensive clauses, but it would nullify the terms and entire policy of the act for the protection of creditors against spoliation of estates subject to bankruptcy proceedings."

Now, it is fundamental in law that a debtor cannot himself avoid his own fraudulent transfer, this being so because the fraudulent transfer gives a good title against him and no court will listen to his plea for declaring it null nor let him so stultify himself as to say he transferred the property fraudulently and now wants it back. So it is only creditors who can avoid fraudulent transfers, although in a qualified sense the debtor still has the title.⁷

Andrews v. Mather, 9 A. B. R. 299, 134 Ala. 358: "Although property which has been fraudulently conveyed ceases to belong to the grantor, so far as any claim he himself can set up is concerned, yet the law regards property which has been fraudulently conveyed as still the property of the grantor, so far as creditors are concerned. The assignee in bankruptcy is an officer created for the benefit of creditors, and he is permitted to regard property fraudulently conveyed in the same way in which creditors are permitted to regard it."

Chesapeake Shoe Co. v. Seldner, 10 A. B. R. 466, 473, 122 Fed. 593 (C. C. A. Va.): "As between the bankrupt and his fraudulent grantee, the bankrupt has no title and to give any effect, or even meaning to Clause 4 (§ 70) we must construe the words 'title of the bankrupt' as between the bankrupt and his creditors."

Compare, inferentially, to same effect, Bardes v. Bank, 4 A. B. R. 175, 175 U. S. 526: "It was argued for the appellant that the clause cannot apply to a case like the present one, because the bankrupt could not have brought a suit to set aside a conveyance made by himself in fraud of his creditors. But the clause concerns the jurisdiction only, and not the merits, of a case; the forum in which a case may be tried, and not the way in which it must be decided; the right to decide the case, and not the principles which must govern the decision. The bankrupt himself could have brought a suit to recover property, which he claimed as his own, against one asserting an adverse title in it; and the incapacity of the bankrupt to set aside his own fraudulent conveyance is a matter affecting the merits of such an action, and not the jurisdiction of the court to entertain and determine it."

Likewise an unrecorded or defectively recorded mortgage or other voluntarily given lien upon the bankrupt's property is always good between the parties; so that, again, it is only as to creditors that unrecorded liens are void. So when the statute, in § 70 (a), says the trustee shall be vested with the title of the bankrupt, the provision must not be thought to limit the trustee's rights to the mere rights of the bankrupt.

As long as other sections of the Act give the trustee greater rights than merely those that might be asserted by the bankrupt, the statute must be construed to mean that he takes the bankrupt's title and rights and in addition thereto takes more—takes also the rights of creditors, not only those rights that have been already actually asserted by some creditor but any and all that might have been asserted had the trustee been a judgment creditor who had levied on the property in his custody or who holds an unsatisfied execution as to property not in his custody, as well as the rights of creditors under State law to avoid fraudulent transactions.

The Bankruptcy Act, itself, then, gives the trustee by § 70 (a) not only the bankrupt's own title, but also expressly vests in him, by § 70 (a) (4), title to all property transferred by the bankrupt in fraud of creditors; and, by § 70 (c), gives him the right to clear away from the bankrupt's title to property all fraudulent transfers of such title which any creditor might, under State law, have avoided; and, by § 67 (a) and § 47 (a) (2) as amended in 1910, gives him the right to clear away from the bankrupt's title to property all liens that would for any reason not have been valid liens against the claims of creditors under State law had there been no bankruptcy, § 47 (a) (2) as amended in 1910,⁸ giving to the trustee in addition to the rights or remedies already asserted by any creditor, all rights and remedies which any creditor might have had had there been no bankruptcy and had such creditor levied execution or acquired a lien by equitable process or held an execution returned unsatisfied, all which rights are in addition to the peculiar rights conferred on the trustee by the special provisions of the Bankruptcy Act relative to avoiding preferential transfers and liens obtained by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy.

It is doubtless true that the trustee's title since the Amendment of 1910 is the most extensive and complete of any in jurisprudence.

It also must be borne in mind that the Amendment of 1910, by placing the trustee in the position of an execution creditor with a levy on the property in his custody and with an unsatisfied execution on the property not in his custody, gives him more than the rights which any creditor might have chanced already to have asserted. It gives him in addition thereto, all rights which would have been obtainable by creditors under State law had the trustee been an officer holding an execution or equitable process in behalf of all creditors. This right is not a right derived from existing creditors. It is not a transfer from any creditor by operation of law of that creditor's existing lien or levy, as seems to have been held in one case.⁹ It is a right derived from the statute itself conferring upon the trustee the attributes of a creditor "armed with process."

In re Farmer's Co'op. Co., 30 A. B. R. 187, 190, 202 Fed. 1008 (D. C. N. D.): "In my judgment, however, § 47 of the Bankruptcy Act as amended does not depend upon any such distinction. The trustee in bankruptcy derives his rights and powers from the statute, and not from the creditors of the estate. If any creditor under local statute can obtain priority over an unfiled or unrecorded instrument, by levy of attachment or execution, the trustee in Bankruptcy, under § 47 as amended, has all the rights and remedies of such creditor. * * *

"A fair interpretation of the statute in the light of the weight of authority, as above pointed out, gives to the trustee all the rights of the most favored creditor under the local law and any property thus held by the trustee becomes a part of the general estate to be apportioned among all creditors in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act on that subject."

8. This amendment ought to have been inserted at § 70 or § 67 rather than at § 47. It was placed at § 47 through one of those exigencies of legislation which sometimes occur to mar the symmetry of statutory enactments.

§ 1139. General Discussion of Trustee's Title and Rights.—As noted later in § 1208, et seq., the underlying theory of the Act of 1898, as well as of all former acts of the United States and also of those of England, denied to the trustee in bankruptcy, except as to fraudulent transfers and holdings, any right which creditors merely might have exercised but had not already actually exercised, or placed themselves in position, under State law, to exercise, the idea being that the bankruptcy adjudication in no wise in and of itself affected the title, but merely transferred whatever rights the bankrupt or any of his creditors actually had acquired—save and except always, of course, as to fraudulent transactions and as to preferences and liens by legal proceedings within the four months period voidable by the peculiar provisions of Bankruptcy Law.

According, indeed, to some of the decisions before the Amendment of 1910, it was even doubtful whether, as to unrecorded liens, in States where void only as to creditors "armed with process," the trustee succeeded to the rights of all creditors who were thus "armed with process"—this subrogation to such rights being confined, by some of the decisions, merely to the rights of those creditors who had acquired liens by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy, void as to the trustee under § 67f but preservable for the benefit of the estate upon order duly made; indeed, such would seem to have been the logical result of the holding that the trustee succeeded to the rights only of such creditors who had been armed with process, for certainly he did not succeed to the rights of any creditor armed with process as to any levy not made within the four months preceding the bankruptcy, but rather took title subject thereto. Thus the ultimate logic of the holdings of the courts before the Amendment of 1910, must eventually have narrowed the trustee's title as successor to the creditors' rights, to a short range.

The idea of bankruptcy jurisprudence during its entire history, up until the Amendment of 1910, was that the bankruptcy picked up the estate precisely where it found it, giving the trustee thereby no additional rights save such as were conferred by the peculiar provisions of the act relative to preferences and legal liens acquired within the four months period, although giving to him all rights possessed by the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy, and all rights then asserted by any creditor or which any creditor had already placed himself in a position to assert.¹⁰

R. 74. * * * York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 352, 15 Am. B. R. 633. * * * In the Hewitt case, there was a sale of property to the bankrupt upon condition that the title should not pass until the property was paid for. Such a conditional sale was good in New York State, where the contract was made, and it was held good as against the trustee in bankruptcy, because it was good against the bankrupt. It was further held that the property was not, under the facts and the law of New York, such as might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against the bankrupt, nor could she have transferred it, within the meaning of § 70 of the Bankrupt Act. It was a clear case for the application of the doctrine that the trustee stands in the shoes of the bankrupt, and there was nothing in the act which made any inconsistent provision. In Thompson v. Fairbanks, the question arose as to the validity of a chattel mortgage (which had been duly filed) upon after-acquired property as against the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The mortgagee took possession of the mortgaged property before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and the question raised was whether there was a violation of any provision of the Bankruptcy Act. It was held that the validity of such a mortgage was a local, and not a Federal, question, and that in such case this court would follow the decisions of the State court; and as in Vermont such a mortgage was good, and the taking possession of the property related back to the date of the mortgage, even as against an assignee in insolvency, it was good as against the trustee in bankruptcy. It was said: 'Under the present Bankrupt Act, the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt, except in cases where there has been a conveyance or encumbrance of the property which is void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the act.' As there was no provision therein making such a mortgage void, the mortgagee was permitted to enforce his mortgage as a valid instrument, and to retain possession of the property. There was no fraud in fact and no transfer of any property in fraud of creditors, and the property was not, at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or at the time of the adjudication, liable to levy and sale under judicial process against the bankrupt. It had already been taken possession of by the mortgagee under a valid mortgage, and was not subject to any other liability of the mortgagor. Humphrey v. Tatman reiterates the principle that whether such a mortgage as is referred to in the Fairbanks case is good or bad depends upon the State law. In York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, the same question arose as in the Hewitt case. There was a sale of property to one who thereafter became bankrupt, with a condition that no title to the property should pass until it was paid for. Such a conditional sale was good under the Ohio law, where the instrument was executed, except as to those creditors who, between the time of the execution of the instrument and the filing thereof, had obtained some specific lien upon the property. There were no such creditors, and hence there was no one who could question the validity of the instrument at the time the trustee's title would have accrued, unless it was the trustee in bankruptcy. He made the claim that the adjudication in bankruptcy was equivalent to a judgment or an attachment or other specific lien on the property, so as to prevent the vendor from asserting its title and its legal right to remove the property on account of the non-payment of the purchase price. We held that, as the conditional sale was valid by the law of Ohio, except as to a certain class of creditors, if there were no such creditors there was no one who could question the validity of the instrument; that the adjudication in bankruptcy did not give the trustee the right to do so, because in that case the adjudication did not operate as the equivalent of a judgment or attachment or other specific lien on the property. The trustee represented no one who had that right as there were no creditors who had liens on the property when the title of the trustee to the property of the bankrupt accrued. Section 70 of the Bankrupt Act had no application. There was no property within either the fourth or fifth subdivision of that section. The fact that if there had been a creditor of the bankrupt of the class mentioned who had obtained a specific lien on the property prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy, the trustee could in that case have enforced the same, did not make any difference, because no such thing had been done when the adjudication in bankruptcy was made. This court had theretofore approved the remark in re New York Economical Printing Co., 6 Am. B. R. 615, 49 C. C. A. 133, 110 Fed. 514, 518, that the present Bankrupt Act contemplates that a lien good as against the bankrupt and all of his creditors at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy should remain undisturbed. Hewit case, supra. Upon these facts it was reiterated that the trustee takes the property as the bankrupt held it. The case at bar bears no resemblance in its facts to the cases just cited. There was no valid disposition of the property in the case before us, or any valid lien. The so-called warehouse receipts issued by the warehousing company to the knitting company, upon the facts of this case, gave no lien under the law in Wisconsin, in which State they were issued. In such case this court follows the State court. Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266; Dooley v. Pease, 180 U. S. 126. By § 70a, the trustee in bankruptcy is vested, by operation of law, with the title of the bankrupt to all property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors, and to all property which, prior to the filing of the petition, might have been levied upon and sold by judicial process against him; and, by subdivision (e) of the same section, the trustee in bankruptcy may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of the bankrupt might avoid, and may recover the property so transferred, or its value. Here are special provisions placing the title to the property transferred by fraud or otherwise, as mentioned, in the trustee in bankruptcy, and giving him the power to avoid the same. The title to this property was in the knitting company. There had been no valid pledge of it, because the possession had been, at all times, in the knitting company, and it could have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against the knitting company at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy. The security company had, of course, full knowledge that the knitting company in fact, at least, shared in the possession of the property. It was itself an actor, or it acquiesced in the arrangement under which it had, at most, a partial, possession, and even that was subject to the control of the knitting company. The method taken to store the property was, as found by the District Court, a mere device or subterfuge to enable the bankrupt to hypothecate the receipts, and thus raise money upon secret liens on property in the possession of the pledgor and under its control; and such scheme, the court said, ought not to receive judicial sanction. Such a scheme, under the facts, and as carried out in this case, and with regard to Wisconsin law, was a fraud in fact, and neither the receipts nor the so-called pledge could be asserted against any of the creditors. It was held by the Circuit Court of Appeals in a case arising in Wisconsin, relative to a chattel mortgage, which gave power to the mortgagor to make sales from the mortgaged property for his own use and benefit, that such a mortgage was fraudulent in fact, so it could not be asserted even against general creditors; citing Wisconsin cases. Re Antigo Screen Door Co., 10 Am. B. R. 306, 59 C. C. A. 248, 123 Fed. 249, 254. A further question was ruled upon in the above-cited case. It was in respect to a second mortgage upon chattels, which had not been properly filed, but the mortgagee had taken possession of the mortgaged property prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, although long subsequent to the giving of the mortgage, and it was held that the mortgagee might hold the property as against the trustee in bankruptcy representing general creditors. There was no fraud in fact alleged. It was said by Judge Jenkins, in delivering the opinion of the court: 'When the statute (Rev. Stat. Wis. 1898, § 2313) declares that a chattel mortgage shall be invalid against any other person than the parties thereto unless possession be delivered and retained, or the mortgage be filed,—there being no actual fraud and no collusive delay in the filing or the taking of possession,—we think the statute must be construed to mean that the omission to file or to take possession renders the mortgage invalid only as to the creditor who, by execution or attachment, has acquired a lien upon the property.' The case illustrates the distinction taken between fraud in fact and the mere failure to file a mortgage otherwise valid against the world. Under the circumstances of this case we are satisfied there was no valid pledge and no equitable lien in favor of the interveners which would take precedence of the title of the trustee by virtue of the special provisions of the Bankruptcy Act." The principles of this case are further explicated in In re Standard Tel. & Elec. Co. (Knapp v. Milw. Tr. Co.), 24 A. B. R. 761, 216 U. S. 545, quoted at §§ 1211, 1258.

In re Bailey & Sons, 21 A. B. R. 911, 166 Fed. 982 (D. C. Pa.): "The doctrine of York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 15 A. B. R. 633, 201 U. S. 344, that the trustee ordinarily takes no better title to the property than the bankrupt himself had, does not apply. It may be true that the present transaction was good between the claimant and the bankrupt, but under the facts in proof the trustee's title is better than the bankrupt's because the Bankruptcy Act declares the attempted transfer to be a voidable preference and expressly authorizes the trustee to avoid it."

Although, to be sure, the trustee was not confined to the bankrupt's title and rights, yet no force nor effect was given to the seizure or possession of the bankruptcy court itself, although such seizure was as effectually a sequestration as could possibly be a seizure by the legal or equitable process of any other court; whereby, also, creditors' hands were tied from asserting rights against the property, and yet the selfsame creditors were bound by the bankrupt's own title. The effect of such construction of the act was to make unrecorded liens, in States where "creditor" was construed to mean a creditor who had fastened a lien by levy of process upon the property, perfectly valid in the bankruptcy court, although a similar sequestration in the State court might have nullified such unrecorded liens. In this way the object of the recording statutes in the prevention of secret liens was oftentimes quite defeated in bankruptcy. Indeed, in many States general creditors came to find they had less rights in the bankruptcy court than in the State court, as to transfers or instruments voidable only as to creditors "armed with process." Such, indeed, was the effect of the noted case of York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, in the State where the case arose.

Before the Amendment of 1910, the statute, in §§ 67 and 70, as well as elsewhere, seemed to strive to give the trustee the same rights and remedies that any creditor "might" have exercised to avoid transfers, whether actually exercised or not, which provisions might naturally have been construed to give him either the right to take all necessary steps that would have been required of such creditor, or, perhaps, even to have dispensed with such preliminary steps altogether; and certainly, even before the Amendment of 1910, the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings having tied the creditors' hands so that they could not help themselves with their ordinary remedies, it might have seemed not only natural, but also a correct construction of the law to have held that the trustee was subrogated not only to all rights and remedies for avoiding transfers which any creditor had already begun to assert, but also to all rights and remedies which any creditor "might" have asserted, as, indeed, the very wording of § 70 (e) would seem to have indicated.

However, the courts rejected such construction, as inapplicable except in cases of actual fraud and where State law did not require "arming with process;" and they relegated the trustee to the "shoes of the bankrupt," where he remained until the Amendment of 1910, which lifted him, out of the shoes of the bankrupt and placed him in the position of a creditor "armed with process."

It is manifest that this amendment changes materially the title of the trustee, so that the rules enunciated in the decisions prior to the Amendment of 1910 must be further qualified by the proviso that the trustee is limited by the bankrupt's title, only in so far as a creditor under the State law would have been bound thereby had such creditor possessed a levy upon the property at the time of its coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, or had had an execution returned unsatisfied as to the property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court.¹¹

In re Franklin Lumber Co., 26 A. B. R. 37, 187 Fed. 281 (D. C. Pa.): "It is to be noted that § 47a (2) as amended by the Act of June 25th, 1910 applies to the present dispute. Under that amendment, if properly coming into the custody of the court be claimed by another, the trustee is vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon. An agreement therefore which would previously have been valid between the parties—such, for example, as was considered in Davis v. Crompton (C. C. A. 3d Cir.) 20 A. B. R. 53, 158 Fed. 735 (209 U. S. 548)—is no longer necessarily valid against the trustee. He is in the position of a creditor holding a legal or equitable lien, and the agreement is to be scrutinized from that point of view. * * * Assuming that the bankrupt would be bound by the words of this agreement and could not deny it to be a lease, his trustee is not so bound, and may contend that the contract is really one of conditional sale. In such a contention he may offer any competent and relevant evidence, and it is obvious I think that the conduct of the parties may ordinarily throw much light on the true meaning of their agreement. If they treat it as a contract of sale, it makes no difference what name they have given it. * * * In reality it has always been a contract of conditional sale, although it may be true that the bankrupt himself would not have been permitted to prove its true character. Neither could the trustee have proved its true character until the Act of June 25, 1910, was passed, but since that date he has been put upon the footing of a creditor with a legal or equitable lien, and may take full advantage of such rights. Whenever therefore such a creditor may attack a contract, in form a bailment, on the ground that it is really a conditional sale, and may support the attack by competent and relevant evidence that throws light on the true meaning of the contract—the trustee has the same right. The mere form of the agreement does not bind him, as it might bind the bankrupt."

11. See § 1270 et seq., for detailed discussion of trustee's rights by the Amendment of 1910.

To the extent, and only to the extent, then, that a creditor, were he a levying creditor on the property in the custody of the court, or a creditor holding an unsatisfied execution as to property not in the custody respectively, would be bound, the trustee is bound and limited by the bankrupt's rights and by the rights already possessed or asserted by creditors.

The complete statement, then, of the trustee's title and rights, since the Amendment of 1910, is that above given at § 1137.

Hereafter, beginning at § 1143, we will take up in detail the various leading propositions and their subdivisions, fully explicating the rights, title and remedies of the trustee in bankruptcy.

§ 1140. Local Law Determines Effectiveness of Transaction to Accomplish Transfer of Title, Also Time Title Passes.—In all the several branches of the discussion of the trustee's title and rights, whether they be those derived as the successor of the bankrupt or of the creditors, or be those independently conferred by the special provisions of the bankruptcy act itself, it is to be borne constantly in mind that the state law determines the efficiency of acts and transactions to effect the transfer of title of the property involved and also the time of the passing of title.¹²

Inferentially and suggestively In re Baxter & Co., 18 A. B. R. 450, 154 Fed. 22 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "All rules concerning the transfer of property are 'primarily at least, a matter of State regulation, and not one of purely commercial law' (Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 276) and State laws, creating interests in or liens upon property without the State, control the federal courts whenever the question arises as to the validity, extent and all the conditions of such an interest or lien. Thus, the effect and validity of chattel mortgages and general assignments are determined by the law of the State in which they are made."

And the reason of the rule is obvious. The Bankrupt Act did not—before the Amendment of 1910—seek to give creditors through the trustee in bankruptcy any greater rights in each State than they would have had without the law, except where it conferred upon the trustee the peculiar rights granted by its special provisions relative to preferences, legal liens and fraudulent conveyances.

In re Cohn, 22 A. B. R. 761, 171 Fed. 568 (D. C. N. Dak.): "The cardinal principle of the Bankruptcy Act is to grant to creditors only those rights which would have been theirs had bankruptcy not supervened."

And by the Amendment of 1910 it simply gave to the bankruptcy proceedings the effect of arming the trustee with process, so that the creditors might not be debarred by the bankruptcy from asserting in behalf of all creditors the rights given to creditors by State law dependent on their being "armed with process."

The essential nature of the transfer or seizure, as to its effectiveness in each case to transfer title is, in pursuance of the same theory, left to the rules of property of the State, so that it is possible, even with regard to the peculiar rights conferred by the Act relative to preferences, legal liens and fraudulent conveyances within four months, that what will amount to a voidable bankruptcy preference in one State will not amount to a voidable bankruptcy preference in another State, and that what will amount to a void lien by legal proceedings in one State will not amount to a void lien in another State, the power of the particular transaction in each instance to effect a transfer of title, and, incidentally, the time such transfer of title shall be considered as having taken place and the kinds of property affected thereby, being left to the rules of each State.

Thus, it is quite possible, in accordance with the rules that precisely the same facts might lead to different results in different States, depending in great degree—even in regard to the peculiar titles conferred by the Bankruptcy Act itself as aforesaid—upon the effectiveness of those facts to transfer title in the several instances.

In other words, the nature of the transaction, that is to say, whether for instance, it amounts to a sale or bailment or pledge or mortgage or some other transfer of property, or whether sufficient delivery has been made to pass title, or whether recording or filing of an instrument be required and, if so, as to whom it will be void for lack of recording, etc., etc., is to be determined by State law, and the bankruptcy court will take it as so determined.¹³

Thus, it has been held, in accordance with local law, that an equitable assignment of a debt, not requiring to be recorded, takes effect as consummated at the time of giving notice to the debtor. In re Wilson, 23 A. B. R. 814 (D. C. Hawaii).

So, the local law will govern as to what constitutes a legal or equitable assignment. In re Stiger, 29 A. B. R. 253, 202 Fed. 791 (D. C. N. J.).

In re Hartdagen, 26 A. B. R. 532, 189 Fed. 546 (D. C. Pa.): "The interpretation of the contract is for the court and the intention of the parties must be ascertained from the writing. In bankruptcy its construction and validity must be determined by the local laws of the state." (This case further quoted at § 1242.)

However, after the State law has once settled the nature of the transaction, once determined whether the facts are sufficient to constitute a transfer of title, and, if so, the time the transfer takes effect and the property affected thereby, then the Bankrupt Act may forthwith step in and declare whether it is a voidable preference or a nullified legal lien.

§ 1141. Also Governs Validity, Except Where Peculiar Rights as to Preferences, Liens by Legal Proceedings, etc., Conferred by Act Itself, Involved.—Where not affected by the peculiar provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, the law of the State will control in bankruptcy as to the validity of mortgages and other liens, and as to ownership and other interests in property.¹⁴

In considering the following quotations in this section, as also the citations in the notes, care must be taken to distinguish between the cases cited or quoted as to whether they arose before or after the Amendment of 1910 to Bankruptcy Act, § 47 A (2), whereby the trustee was lifted out of his former station "in the bankrupt's shoes" and was given the standing of a "creditor armed with process;" for, whilst it is still true that the local law governs the validity of liens, contracts and other transactions in bankruptcy (except where the peculiar rights conferred by the bankruptcy law as to preferences and liens by legal proceedings within four months are concerned) yet it is no longer so because the trustee "stands in the bankrupt's shoes," which was apparently the basis of most of the decisions, since he now stands also in all respects as a creditor and is bound by the bankrupt's title and rights only in so far as a creditor would be so bound. Thus, it is the State law that governs.

Thompson v. Fairbanks, 13 A. B. R. 442, 196 U. S. 516: "The Supreme Court of the United States, in determining the validity of a chattel mortgage covering after-acquired property, will accept as decisive the settled law of the State in which the mortgage was given, as established by the decisions of its highest Courts."

Hiscock v. Varick Bk., 18 A. B. R. 6, 206 U. S. 28: "The contracts of pledge were made, executed and to be performed in the State of New York, and the rights of the parties were governed by the law of that State. No preference under the Bankruptcy Act was alleged or proved, nor was there any allegation or proof that the pledge of the securities was in fraud of the rights of the creditors or trustee. The questions of the extent and validity of the pledge were local questions, and the decisions of the courts of New York are to be followed by this court."

Hewitt v. Berlin Machine Wks., 11 A. B. R. 709, 194 U. In re Hickerson, 20 A. B. R. 682, 162 Fed. 345 (D. C. Idaho): "The validity of such a mortgage [mortgage withheld from record by agreement] is a local question, and the decisions of the State courts will control."

In re Chantler Suit & Cloak Co., 18 A. B. R. 498, 151 Fed. 952 (D. C. R. I.): "The latter case [Thompson v. Fairbanks, supra] also decides that, on the question of the validity of a mortgage upon after-acquired property, the federal court will follow the decisions of the State court."

In re Burke, 22 A. B. R. 69, 168 Fed. 994 (D. C. Ga.): "In the construction of State statutes defining property rights, the United States courts generally follow the rulings of the supreme appellate tribunal of the State. * * * This is peculiarly true as to real property, but it is also true as to other property rights. A clear statement of this doctrine may be found in Bates' Federal Equity Procedure, vol. 1, par. 9. The doctrine is particularly valuable in the administration of the bankruptcy law, for the reason that it conserves the liens which are created and recognized by the laws of the States. Statutes creating such liens, however, are in derogation of the rights of the general creditors, which are common rights, and under the well-known general principle such statutes must be strictly construed. Presumptively the possession of property by the bankrupt is vested by operation of law in the trustee, and when a claimant thereto insists upon a latent or undisclosed title he must bear the burden of showing his superior right or privilege. It is then the duty of the court to regard critically the statutes of the State, as authoritatively construed by State courts, and determine each case accordingly."

In re Elletson Co., 23 A. B. R. 530, 174 Fed. 859 (D. C. W. Va.): "The Supreme Court has also determined that the question of whether such a deed of trust is valid or not is a local one and must be governed by the State court decisions which the Federal courts will follow."

In re Gilligan, 23 A. B. R. 668, 152 Fed. 605 (C. C. A. Ind.): "There being no creditors having special equities in the bankrupt estate, the sole question presented by this record is, whether, under the Indiana law, the conditional sale of personal property by a manufacturer to a retailer, for the purposes of resale, with an agreement to reserve title in the original vendor until paid for, is valid or not; and to determine such question we go to the Indiana law, in force at the time that the order appealed from was entered, as interpreted by her own courts." This case quoted further at § 1263.

Guarantee Title & Trust Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 24 A. B. R. 330, 185 Fed. 373 (C. C. A. Or as decided by the highest court of the State which has passed upon the particular point, provided the same be not inconsistent with decisions of the highest court of the State.¹⁶

Or as interpreted by the higher federal courts in previous decisions.¹⁷

And it is held in other cases that where the question depends upon a rule of distribution in equity or of preference among various claimants to funds in the hands of the court for distribution in accordance with equitable principles, the Federal decisions control, and not those of the State where the contract was made.¹⁸

Likewise the Federal Courts, administering the general law of equity, as accepted in England, and as generally accepted in this country, may recognize and establish an equitable claim within the purview of the general rules of equity, though, under the decisions of the State Court, it has no status under the local law.¹⁹

And where common law and not statutory law is involved, the Federal courts are not bound to follow the State decisions.²¹

And it is the law of the place where the performance of a contract is stipulated to be carried out that governs, not that of the place of its making.²²

Thus the local law governs as to recording;²³ and other formalities such as those required by statute as to sales of merchandise in bulk.²⁴

Also, local law governs as to pleading the statute of limitations as to fraudulent real estate transfers;²⁵ likewise, as to part performance taking a transaction out of the statute of frauds;²⁶ likewise, as to chattel mortgages covering after-acquired property, the State law determining when the lien is to be considered as attaching, whether at the date of the chattel mortgage or of the acquisition of the property;²⁷ likewise, also, as to who are meant by the term "creditors" when applied to unrecorded liens under State statute;²⁸ likewise, as to the effect of withholding mortgages from record;²⁹ and as to the validity of powers of sale in chattel mortgages.³⁰

§ 1142. Detailed Discussion of Trustee's Title and Rights.—

In the preceding sections have been given a general discussion of the trustee's title and rights, from which has been derived the "Complete Statement" thereof with which the discussion opened. We now take up in detail these various rights of the trustee and discuss them in their order, bearing in mind not only that the subject is threefold, but also that there are subdivisions. Thus, we discuss the title and rights of the trustee, first, as successor to the bankrupt; second, as successor to creditors, finding this second class subdivided into three subclasses; and third, the peculiar rights conferred by the Bankruptcy Act itself, which we also find to be divided into three subclasses.

And, first, as to the title and rights of the trustee as successor to the bankrupt.

DIVISION 1.

TRUSTEE'S TITLE AND RIGHTS AS SUCCESSOR TO BANKRUPT'S TITLE AND RIGHTS.

§ 1143. First, Trustee's Title and Rights as Successor to Bankrupt's Title and Rights—Statement.—In accordance with the changes made by the Amendment of 1910, as previously noted in the discussion of §§ 1137 and 1139, the correct statement of the rights and title which the trustee takes as successor of the bankrupt's rights and title, now would be as follows:

The trustee succeeds to the bankrupt's title and stands in his shoes and has the bankrupt's rights and remedies, and also takes the property, in cases unaffected by any fraud of the bankrupt towards creditors, in the same plight and condition in which the bankrupt held it and subject to all equities and rights imposed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt, except where there has been some transfer or encumbrance of the property or seizure of it by legal process, void as against some creditor under State law to whose rights the trustee is subrogated, or void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the Bankruptcy Act, but as to the property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, takes it in such plight and condition only to the extent that some creditor would have taken it had such creditor held a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, and, as to property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, held an unsatisfied execution.³⁸

The trustee, then, is bound by all the acts, contracts and conditions of

38. Bankr. Act, § 70 (a): "The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt, upon his appointment and qualification, and his successor or successors, if he shall have one or more, upon his or their appointment and qualification, shall in turn be vested by operation of law with the title of bankrupt, as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, except in so far as it is to property which is exempt, to all. * * *" the bankrupt's ownership (except such as would be invalid by State law as against some creditor or are void by the peculiar provisions of the Bankruptcy Act itself relative to preferential and fraudulent transfers and liens by legal proceedings within the four months) and the trustee has all the rights and is entitled to make all the defenses the bankrupt has. He "stands," under such circumstances, "in the shoes of the bankrupt."

Bankr. Act, § 47 (a) (2), as amended in 1910: "And such trustees, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon; and also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied."

Thus, if no circumstances exist that would have entitled a creditor, under the State law, to avoid the contract of the bankrupt or the lien upon his property, and if there was no preference nor lien obtained by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy and while the bankrupt was insolvent, then the trustee is bound and bound solely by the bankrupt's contracts and transfers, and this is so, no matter how onerous, how unprofitable, how improvident or unwise they may have been, being so bound to the same extent the bankrupt himself, or a general creditor of the bankrupt, would have been bound. His claims and interests in property are subject to all defenses, counterclaims, offsets, liens and rights that would have been available against the debtor had the debtor not been adjudged bankrupt.

Thompson v. Fairbanks, 13 A. B. R. 445, 196 U. S. 516 [decided before the Amendment of 1910]: "Under that law [of 1867] it was held that the assignee in bankruptcy stood in the shoes of the bankrupt, and that 'except where, within a prescribed period before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, an attachment has been sued out against the property of the bankrupt, or where his disposition of his property was, under the statute, fraudulent and void, his assignees take his real and personal estate, subject to all equities, liens, and encumbrances thereon, whether created by act or by operation of law.' Yeatman v. New Orleans Sav. Inst., 95 U. S. 674. See, also, Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731; Hauselt v. Harrison, 105 U. S. 401. Under the present Bankrupt Act, the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt, except in cases where there has been a conveyance or encumbrance of the property which is void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the Act."

York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 15 A. B. R. 637, 201 U. S. 344 [decided before the Amendment of 1910]: "Under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act the trustee in bankruptcy is vested with no better right or title to the bankrupt's property than belonged to the bankrupt at the time when the trustee's title accrued. At that time, the right, as between the bankrupt and the York Manufacturing Co., was in the latter company to take the machinery on account of default in the payment therefor. The trustee under such circumstances stands simply in the shoes of the bankrupt and as between them he has no greater right than the bankrupt."

In re New York Economical Printing Co., 6 A. B. R. 615, 110 Fed. 514 (C. C. A. N. Y.) [decided before the Amendment of 1910]: "The Bankrupt Act does not vest the trustee with any better right or title to the bankrupt's property than belongs to the bankrupt or to his creditors at the time when the trustee's title accrues. The present Act like all preceding bankrupt acts, contemplates that a lien good at that time as against the debtor and as against all of his creditors shall remain undisturbed. If it is one which has been obtained in contravention of some provision of the Act, which is fraudulent as to creditors, or invalid as to creditors for want of record, it is invalid as to the trustee; and if it was one which was invalid as to some particular creditor, though valid as to other creditors, the trustee is in certain cases subrogated to the rights of that creditor."

In re Blake, 17 A. B. R. 669 (C. C. A. Mo.) [decided before the Amendment of 1910]: "A trustee in bankruptcy, in cases unaffected by fraud, and wherein no attachments nor executions have been levied upon the property of the bankrupt stands in the shoes of the latter and has no higher nor better rights."

In re Garcewich, 8 A. B. R. 152, 115 Fed. 87 (C. C. A. N. Y.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "Under the present Bankrupt Act, as under previous bankrupt acts, the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt, except in cases where there has been a conveyance or incumbrance of the property which is void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the act."

Compare [1841] Winsor v. McClellan, 2 Story 492, Fed. Cas. 17,887 (C. C. Mass.): "Now the principle has been long established that the assignee in bankruptcy does not stand in the position of a purchaser, nor even in so favorable a position as an individual creditor may stand. 2 Story, Eq. Jur., §§ 1228, 1229, 1411; Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare 549, 563; Muir v. Schenck, 3 Hill, 228; Murray v. Lylburn, 2 Johns. Ch. 441, 443; Deac. Bankr. (Ed. 1827) pp. 320, 321, ch. 10, § 3. The assignee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities which exists against the same in the hands of the bankrupt. This was clearly laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, 162, and has ever since been adhered to, not only in courts of equity, but also, as the case of Leslie v. Guthrie, 1 Bing. N. C. 697, abundantly shown, at law. But I need not dwell upon this point, as it comes very fully under consideration in the case of Rand v. Winslow (not reported), at the last October term of the Circuit Court in Maine."

[1841] Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story 630, Fed. Cases No. 9,673: "The present is a question between the assignee of a bankrupt, acting for the benefit of all the creditors, and the mortgagee, claiming title under his mortgage. * * * Now, it is most material to bear in mind under this aspect of the case, that it is a well-established doctrine that (except in cases of fraud), assignees in bankruptcy take only such rights and interests as the bankrupt himself had and could himself claim and assert, at the time of his bankruptcy, and consequently they are affected with all the equities which would affect the bankrupt himself if he were asserting those rights and interests. This was expressly laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, 162, where he said: 'The ground that the court go upon is this: that assignees of bankrupts, though they are trustees for the creditors, yet stand in the place of the bankrupt, and they can take in no better manner than he could.'"

[1867] Yeatman v. Institution, 95 U. S. 764: "The established rule is that, except in cases of attachment against the property of the bankrupt within a prescribed time preceding the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and except in cases where the disposition of property by the bankrupt is declared by law to be fraudulent and void, the assignee takes the title, subject to all equities, liens or encumbrances whether created by operation of law or by act of the bankrupt which existed against the property in the hands of the bankrupt."

[1867] Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731: "He takes the property in the same 'plight and condition' that the bankrupt held it. Winsor v. McClellan, 2 Story 492. The assignee can assert, in behalf of the general creditors, no claim to the proceeds of the sale of that property which the bankrupts themselves could not have asserted in a contest exclusively between them and their mortgagee."

In re Great Western Mfg. Co., 18 A. B. R. 259, 152 Fed. 123 (C. C. A. Neb.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "A trustee in bankruptcy stands in the shoes of the bankrupt, and has no better title than he, in the absence of fraud, or of attaching or judgment creditors at the time of the filing of the petition."

Crosby v. Miller, 46 A. B. R. 814 (Ct. Appl. D. C.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The assignee under the last Bankruptcy Act, and the trustee under the present bankruptcy law takes only such title as the bankrupt had subject to all equities. * * * There is no doubt that the trustee under the present law takes the title subject to all equities, liens or encumbrances, whether created by operation of law or by the bankrupt which existed against the property in the hands of the bankrupt."

Zartman, Trustee, v. Nat. Bank, 216 U. S. 134, 23 A. B. R. 635 (affirming 139 N. Y. 133) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The trustee claims that he takes the same kind of title as a bona fide purchaser for value; but the rule applicable to this and all similar cases is that the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt, not as an innocent purchaser, but as the debtor had it at the time of the petition, subject to all valid claims, liens, and equities. Tompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 Am. B. R. 437, * * * and cases cited. And this is so well settled that our jurisdiction of the writ of errors is exceedingly doubtful."

Davis v. Crompton, 20 A. B. R. 53, 158 Fed. 735 (C. C. A. Pa.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "It has been often declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, that under the present Bankrupt Act, the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt. It would seem that no other interpretation of § 70 of the act * * * consistent with the rights and vested interests of third parties, could be maintained. The trustee in a certain sense is the bankrupt. The bankrupt's title is his title, whether it be to things in possession or to choses in action. His title cannot rise higher than that of the bankrupt, so as to impinge upon or destroy the interest in or title to property, good as against the bankrupt himself. It is true, that, by the language of § 70, the trustee of the estate of the bankrupt is 'vested, by operation of law, with the title of the bankrupt, as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt, * * * to all * * * (5) property which, prior to the filing of the petition, he could, by any means, have transferred, or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against him.' But, taking the title of the bankrupt as it existed in him at the time of the adjudication, the trustee takes it subject to the superior title of the vendor. Otherwise, the title of the trustee would be superior to the title held by the bankrupt, and therefore not the title of the bankrupt to the property described in clause 5 of § 70, but one entirely different therefrom. It is this precise title, and no other, which is vested by operation of law in the trustee."

Canning Machinery Co. v. Fuller, 20 A. B. R. 157, 158 Fed. 588 (C. C. A. Ala.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "In considering these propositions, we have to bear in mind that the respondent has no other title than the title the bankrupt had."

Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hurley, 18 A. B. R. 396, 153 Fed. 503 (C. C. A. Kans. affirmed 22 A. B. R. 17, 213 U. S. 126) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The trustee stands in the shoes of the bankrupt. Whatever rights a third party had against the property of a bankrupt before adjudication, that party, in the absence of fraud or fixed liens created by State statutes in favor of others, has against his estate in bankruptcy." Quoted further at § 932.

In re Chantler Cloak & Suit Co., 18 A. B. R. 498, 151 Fed. 952 (D. C. R. I.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The trustee in bankruptcy takes the property subject to all the equities imposed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt which are not invalid as to creditors."

In re Mertens, 15 A. B. R. 369, 142 Fed. 445 (C. C. A. N. Y.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "Now the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt in the condition in which he finds it at the date of the adjudication, unless it has been incumbered fraudulently or in contravention of some of the provisions of the act."

Wood Co. v. Eubanks, 22 A. B. R. 307, 169 Fed. 929 (C. C. A. N. C.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "It is well settled that the trustee of a bankrupt stands in the shoes of the bankrupt and occupies the same relation to the creditors that the bankrupt sustained prior to the date on which he was adjudged bankrupt."

In re Hunt, 14 A. B. R. 423, 139 Fed. 286 (D. C. N. Y.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "A trustee in bankruptcy is not a purchaser in good faith nor does he occupy the position of such a purchaser. He takes the property of the bankrupt in cases not affected by fraud in the same plight and condition the bankrupt held it as of the date of the adjudication and subject to all equities impressed on it in the hands of the bankrupt, except in cases where there has been some conveyance or encumbrance void as against the trustee, made so by some positive enactment of the Bankruptcy Law. * * * He takes the title the bankrupt then had, no more, no less. Section 70, subd. (a). He takes title to such property charged with all liens and equities valid against the bankrupt unless, as just stated, they are made void or voidable by some positive provision of the Act. But in some cases liens may be avoided by the trustee that could not have been avoided by the bankrupt if the bankruptcy proceedings had not intervened."

Obiter, Gove v. Morton Trust Co., 12 A. B. R. 300 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. App. Div.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "We suppose it will not be disputed that the trustee in bankruptcy takes the property of the bankrupt, subject to all liens and charges against it which might be enforced except for the provisions of the Bankruptcy Law."

In re Foundry & Machine Co., 17 A. B. R. 293, 147 Fed. 828 (D. C. Wis.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "By this provision the trustee takes no better title than the bankrupt had. Liens which were at that time valid against the bankrupt remain undisturbed. * * * A trustee in bankruptcy is vested with no better right than the bankrupt. He does not take property sold to the bankrupt by conditional sale with a reservation of title in the vendor. The property is subject to all equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt. A ruling of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals that a seizure by the Bankruptcy Court operates as an attachment and an injunction for the benefit of all the persons having interests in the property was reversed in York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 353, 15 Am. B. R. 633."

Partially. In re Kellogg, 10 A. B. R. 10, 112 Fed. 52 (C. C. A. N. Y.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The plaintiff, as trustee, stands in the shoes of the bankrupt. * * * He is the legal representative of the bankrupt."

Partially, In re MacDonald, 14 A. B. R. 804, 138 Fed. 463 (D. C. Conn.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "Upon adjudication, the trustee took title to all property which was then vested in the bankrupt, subject to all valid claims, liens and equities."

Partially, Duplan Silk Co. v. Spencer, 8 A. B. R. 375, 115 Fed. 689 (C. C. A. Penn.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The trustee in bankruptcy, seeking by proceeding at law to enforce the title of the bankrupt to personal property so situated will be subject to all legal and equitable claims of others which exist against the bankrupt not in fraud of the Bankrupt Law or the rights of general creditors."

Partially, In re Nicholas, 10 A. B. R. 296, 122 Fed. 299 (D. C. N. Y.) [Before Amendment of 1910]: "The trustee in bankruptcy, on his appointment, took title to all the property on hand, subject to any rights of the appellant; but he took that title charged with all the liens, incumbrances and obligations existing against it, as they would have existed had all the property remained in the hands of the bankrupt, and he took no other or greater interest in the property, and no other or greater rights under the contract, than the bankrupt himself had."

In re Torchia, 26 A. B. R. 188, 185 Fed. 576 (D. C. Pa.): "Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, § 70, the trustee is vested with the title of the bankrupt mortgagor by act of law and not by the act of the bankrupt. The mortgagee is no nearer to the possession of the mortgaged premises after the election of the trustee than he was before. He could not have higher rights against the trustee than he had against the bankrupt. * * * The trustee stands in the shoes of the bankrupt. He could contest the right to the attorney's commission had he been made a party to the proceedings in the court in which the judgments were entered. He raised the objection before the referee upon distribution at the first opportunity, and his objections should have been sustained." [This case arose after the bankruptcy Amendments of 1910.]

But the bankrupt's title which is taken is subject, however, always to the qualification "except in cases where there has been a conveyance or encumbrance of the property which is void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the act."

In re McDonald, 23 A. B. R. 51, 173 Fed. 99 (D. C. Mass.): "But all this is always subject to the qualification expressly stated in Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 526, 'except in cases where there has been a conveyance or encumbrance of the property which is void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the act.'"

Or where there has been fraud of the bankrupt towards his creditors; or where the conveyance would be affected differently as to a "creditor armed with process."

§ 1144. Intervention of Creditors' Rights Causing Modification of Rule That Bankrupt's Title Taken.—In applying the principle of the trustee's succession to the bankrupt's title, it must not be forgotten that in many instances where it is said the bankrupt's title is the title taken, the rules of evidence as to the sufficiency of a transaction to effect a change of title, etc., will be different where creditors' rights have intervened from what it would be were the bankrupt's rights alone involved. This is notably so where the sufficiency or insufficiency of facts to constitute a delivery passing title is involved: what would amount to a sufficient delivery to pass title as against the bankrupt alone might be insufficient where creditors' rights have intervened.³⁹

Again, what would amount to sufficiently clear proof of a resulting trust in favor of a wife, may be different where the rights of creditors become involved, as, for instance, where the husband becomes bankrupt.⁴⁰

Amendment of 1910 Giving Trustee Rights of Levying Creditor.—The Amendment of 1910, to Bankr. Act, § 47 (a), giving the trustee the rights of a levying creditor as to property in the custody, or coming into the custody, of the bankruptcy court, enables the trustee to take advantage, as to such property, of local law giving different rights where levying creditors' rights intervene.

In re Franklin Lumber Co., 26 A. B. R. 37, 187 Fed. 281 (D. C. Pa.): "It is to be noted that § 47 (a) (2) as amended by the Act of June 25, 1910, applies to the present dispute. Under that amendment, if property coming into custody of the court be claimed by another, the trustee is vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon. An agreement therefore which would previously have been valid between the parties—such, for example, as was considered in Davis v. Crompton (C. C. A., 3d Cir.), 20 Am. B. R. 53, 158 Fed. 735 (209 U. S. 548)—is no longer necessarily valid against the trustee. He is in the position of a creditor holding a legal or equitable lien, and the agreement is to be scrutinized from that point of view.

"Assuming that the bankrupt would be bound by the words of this agreement and could not deny it to be a lease, his trustee is not so bound and may contend that the contract is really one of conditional sale. In such contention he may offer any competent and relevant evidence, and it is obvious I think that the conduct of the parties may ordinarily throw much light on the true meaning of their agreement. If they treat it as a contract of sale, it makes no difference what name they have given it. A creditor may adopt his own construction, and they cannot successfully object. This is well settled in Pennsylvania and elsewhere." This case is further quoted at §§ 1141 and 1228.

Since the passage of the Amendment of 1910, to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47 (a) (2), discussed heretofore in §§ 1137, 1139 and hereafter in § 1207, et seq., it is necessary to add the qualification, always, that the trustee, as thus bound by the bankrupt's sales, contracts, etc., is only bound thereby to the same extent that an existing creditor would be bound thereby under State law or a creditor whether actually existing or not, would be bound thereby had the latter levied legal or equitable process at the time the custody of the bankruptcy court arose over the property involved or had had an execution returned unsatisfied. So that, in considering all of the following paragraphs under this division and the cases cited thereunder, such qualification must always be borne in mind. Thus, in a State where a creditor of the bankrupt, had he been a levying creditor

(as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court) or a creditor holding an execution returned unsatisfied (as to property not in its custody), would have better rights than the bankrupt himself possessed, then, in that State, the trustee would also possess such creditor's rights rather than be limited to those merely of the bankrupt.⁴¹

But the Amendment is not retroactive.⁴²

§ 1144¹/₄. But Trustee May Abandon Burdensome Property or Unprofitable Contracts.—While it is true that the trustee is bound in his rights to property by the bankrupt's acts and contracts, he is not bound to accept burdensome property nor unprofitable contracts that would entail his performance of duties that would be burdensome to the estate; but he may refuse to accept or assume the same, leaving the other party to his remedy for the breach.⁴³

Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hurley, 18 A. B. R. 396, 153 Fed. 503 (C. C. A. Kans., affirmed in 213 U. S. 126, 22 A. B. R. 17): "It is well settled that trustees in bankruptcy are not bound to accept property or take over contracts which are onerous and unprofitable, and which would burden, rather than benefit, the estate. In the execution of their trust they are confronted at the outset with the duty of electing whether to assume an existing executory contract, continue its performance, and ultimately dispose of it for the benefit of the estate or to renounce it and leave the injured party to such legal remedies for the breach, as the case affords." § 1145. Bound by Bankrupt's Sales, Mortgages, Deliveries, Bailments, Contracts and Equitable Liens.—Thus, the trustee in laying claim to property is bound by the terms of the bankrupt's sales or conveyances of it and of his covenants, contracts and acts in relation thereto as construed by state law, no matter how onerous, unprofitable or unwise they may be—save and except, always, as the same may be in fraud of creditors' rights or void as to creditors or be in contravention of statute.⁴⁴

R. 17): "Another and conclusive answer to the trustees' contention in this case is found in their conduct on assuming the duties of their trust. They found an assignable executory contract in force between the bankrupt and the railway company—one that might be advantageous or disadvantageous to the estate. It was evidenced by writing, but the parties had changed its mode of performance as already pointed out, so that as between them it consisted of the original instrument and the agreed modification. It is well settled that trustees in bankruptcy are not bound to accept property or take over contracts which are onerous and unprofitable, and which would burden, rather than benefit, the estate. In the execution of their trust they are confronted at the outset with the duty of electing whether to assume an existing executory contract, continue its performance, and ultimately dispose of it for the benefit of the estate or to renounce it and leave the injured party to such legal remedies for the breach, as the case affords. Second, it was a sale upon credit of 60 days, with a discount of 2 per cent for cash, with privilege of vendor to require an advance of $8,000, which was in fact made. Third, the lumber as cut was piled separate from other kinds and each length and width separate, as per the contract. * * * The construction of the contract and the determination of the matter of when title passed were questions of general law. And so was the question as to whether the parties had changed the contract, so as to pass the title at the yard, without delivery on the cars or preliminary inspection or measurement. The contract made no provision in respect to inspection to determine grade, nor as to measurement. If the parties elected to deliver without inspection or measurement, the title would pass if so accepted. The one essential thing was that the hemlock lumber then cut and piled should be then and there appropriated to this contract. In the absence of conditions to the contrary, the title would pass upon such appropriation subject to grading and measurement later as a preliminary to settlement of the price according to the written agreement."

Likewise, as to the sufficiency of facts to constitute "warehousing."⁴⁸ Where a part of the bankrupt's premises is used as a storage warehouse, under the name of an independent warehouse corporation, and warehouse receipts are issued on the bankrupt's goods therein, such facts have been held to convey a good title to the pledgee, no fraud being shown.⁴⁹ Also the delivery of a distilling company's own bonded warehouse receipt has been held to be sufficient delivery to consummate a pledge of whiskey, even though the warehouse were on the pledgor's own premises, by reason of the stringent regulations of the government.⁵⁰ But where there has been no actual change of possession, but a mere pretended change, the pledge will not be upheld.⁵¹

(Security) Warehousing Co. v. Hand, 19 A. B. R. 291, 206 U. S. 415 (affirming S. C., 16 A. B. R. 49, 143 Fed. 42, C. C. A. Wis.): "The findings show that the receipts of the warehousing company were not entitled to the status of negotiable instruments, the transfer of which operates as a delivery of the property mentioned in them. Upon that question the case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court below, wherein it was said that the 'receipts themselves would put the holders on notice of the facts.' If the receipts were not negotiable instruments, it is contended that the transactions showed a valid pledge of the property to some of the appellants, and hence they are entitled to its possession until they are paid the debts due them from the bankrupt. Whether there was a sufficient change of possession of the thing pledged to render the same valid under the law of Wisconsin, we think was correctly answered in the negative by the courts below. Geilfuss v. Corrigan, 95 Wis. 651, 665, 669, 37 L. R. A. 166, 60 Am. St. Rep. 143, 70 N. W. 306. The general law of pledge requires possession, and it cannot exist without it. Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467 * * *. There was scarcely a semblance of an attempt at such change of possession from the hands of the knitting company to the hands of the warehousing company. Actual possession of the property in question was exercised by and existed with the knitting company substantially the same after the issuing of the receipts as before. It is a trifling with words to call the various transactions between the knitting company and the warehousing company a transfer of possession from the former to the latter. There was really no delivery, and no change of possession, continuous or otherwise. The alleged change was a mere pretense, a sham."

milling company, to pledge its property for money advanced, while still retaining possession and dominion over it. The form adopted was the issuing of so-called certificates, for so much grain or flour, in store at the mills, these certificates being issued to different parties, as collateral to loans, somewhat like ordinary warehouse receipts. The grain in question was contained in tanks, adjoining the mills, from which it was run to the mills, to be made into flour, by means of a conveyor, by simply unlocking a slide. It was drawn upon freely, in this way, no definite quantity being kept on hand, and there being no special arrangement with the holders of certificates, with regard to it, except that it was not to be reduced beyond the amount called for thereby. The fact is, that it was a shifting quantity, sometimes running far below this, although sometimes possibly above it, there being certificates outstanding at the time of bankruptcy for a hundred and thirty-eight thousand bushels, while there were but eighty-three thousand bushels on hand. The difference is ascribed to the depredation of insects, by which the grain became heated and lost weight, but it is difficult to see how fifty-five thousand bushels could have disappeared in that way. Nor is it material, the fact being, from whatever cause, that it was not there. The arrangement with regard to the flour was somewhat similar. It was stored in barrels in the basement of the company's warehouse under the charge of the superintendent, in three sections, two of two hundred barrels each, and one of eight hundred barrels, divided off from each other, by upright posts, and all bearing a certain common brand. There was also a sign that it was not to be touched by an employee; but aside from what this might vaguely imply, there was nothing to indicate that there was any control or ownership over it other than that of the bankrupt company in whose possession it was. Differing from the grain, there was no change in the quantity of the flour from the start; and certificates for the whole twelve hundred barrels were issued to the one bank. It is clear upon this showing, that the certificate holders have no case. The certificates, admittedly, cannot be sustained as warehouse receipts, however they may bear that form. A man cannot make a warehouse of himself as to his own goods. Bank v. Jagode, 186 Pa. 556; Security Warehousing Co. v. Hand, 206 U. S. 415, 19 Am. B. R. 291. Neither, there having been no delivery of the property, was there a valid pledge. The lien of a pledge, undoubtedly is preserved in bankruptcy. Hiscock v. Varick Bank, 206 U. S. 28, 18 Am. B. R. 1. But to have this so, the essentials of a pledge must appear, to which possession is indispensable, there being no lien as there is no pledge, without it."

Similarly, a bona fide sale of personal property by a debtor to another and a contemporaneous lease back at a rental to the seller, who, all the time, retained possession of the chattels, was held not to have passed title to the intended purchaser, for lack of delivery.

In re Beihl, 23 A. B. R. 905, 176 Fed. 583 (D. C. Pa.): "I see no difference in principle between this case and Re Millbourne Mills Co. (C. C. A., 3d Circuit), 20 Am. B. R. 746, 172 Fed. 177. There the milling company was the absolute owner of grain and flour in its own possession, and undertook to pledge it by issuing warehouse receipts, but without delivering the property itself. The attempted pledge was held to be invalid and of course therefore the absolute title had passed to the trustee. This is precisely what happened here. The bankrupt had an absolute title to the horses and wagons in his own possession, and undertook to pledge them by a somewhat round-about method, but without delivering the property. The bill of sale and the so-called lease and the parol contract concerning the payment of the past due claim for coal—taken together, as they should be taken—clearly amount to a pledge or mortgage of the property. The bill of sale is equivalent to the deed, and the lease and parol agreement constitute the defeasance.”

Thus, a verbal assignment of book accounts where there was no manual delivery of any kind has been sustained in bankruptcy.⁵²

So, where the bankrupt set aside certain securities for the protection of a creditor prior to the four months period and during solvency entered the transaction on his books, and notified the creditor thereof, it was held that the delivery over to the creditor of such securities within the four months period was valid and binding on the trustee, notwithstanding that the securities were changed from time to time, and that the bankrupt was insolvent at the time of delivery.

Sexton v. Kessler & Co., 28 A. B. R. 85, 228 U. S. 634 (affirming S. C., 21 A. B. R. 807, 172 Fed. 535, C. C. A. N. Y., quoted post, § 1370): “It may be assumed that the arrangement between the parties was made in good faith and intended and believed to be valid, and, on the other hand, that at the time of the change of custody on October 25 within four months of the petition, the New York firm was insolvent and that the English Company had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended if its rights began only on that date.

“So far as the interpretation of the transaction is concerned, it seems to us that there is only one fair way to deal with it. The parties were business men acting without lawyers and in good faith attempting to create a present security out of specified bonds and stocks. Their conduct should be construed as adopting whatever method consistent with the facts and with the rights reserved is most fitted to accomplish the result. If an express declaration of an equitable lien, or again a statement that the New York firm constituted itself the servant of the English company to maintain possession for the latter, or that it held upon certain trusts, or that a mortgage was intended, or any other form of words would affect what the parties meant, we may assume that it was within the import of what was done, written or said. So that question is whether anything in the situation of fact or the rights reserved prevents the intended creation of a right in rem, or at least one that is to be preferred to the claim of the trustee.

“The Bankruptcy Law itself does not avoid the transaction (Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 Am. B. R. 437; Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 95, 14 Am. B. R. 74). A trustee in bankruptcy does not stand like an attaching creditor; he gets no lien by the mere fact of his appointment (York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 15 Am. B. R. 633; Zartman v. First National Bank of Waterloo, 216 U. S. 134, 138, 23 Am. B. R. 635).” [This case arose before the Amendment of 1910 to § 47 (a) giving him the rights of a levying creditor.]

“The most obvious objection is that the continued physical power of the New York firm over the securities and its rights to withdraw and substitute admittedly reserved are inconsistent with a title or lien of the English house in any form. But the decisions of this court and of New York agree that there may be title in a stronger case than this. When a broker agrees to carry stock for a customer he may buy stocks to fill several orders in a lump; he may increase his single purchase by stock of the same kind that he wants for himself; he may pledge the whole block thus purchased for what sum he likes, or deliver it all in satisfaction of later orders, and he may satisfy the earlier customer with any stock that he has on hand or that he buys when the time for delivery comes. Yet, as he is bound to keep stock enough to satisfy his contract, as the New York firm in this case was bound to substitute other security, if it withdrew any, the customer is held to have such an interest that a delivery to him by an insolvent broker is not a preference. Richardson v. Shaw, 209 U. S. 365, 19 A. B. R. 717; Markham v. Joudon, 41 N. Y. 235. So a depositor in a grain elevator may have a property in grain in a certain elevator, although the keeper is at liberty to mix his own or other grain with the deposit and empty and refill the receptacle twenty times before making good his receipt to the depositor concerned."

The preceding propositions must, of course, be taken with the qualification necessitated by the Amendment of 1910, that the trustee is bound by the bankrupt's title to be sure but, if the property be in the custody of the bankruptcy court, then he is bound only to the extent a creditor would have been bound had he levied legal process thereon, and if it be not in the custody of the court then only to the extent a creditor would have been bound thereby had he held an execution returned unsatisfied. Thus, as to attempted warehousing.

In re Nelson, 27 A. B. R. 272, 191 Fed. 233 (D. C. S. Dak.): "Applying its plain interpretation to this section and amendment, it follows that an agreement which would have been binding upon and could have been enforced between the parties hereto prior to the Amendment of 1910 no longer necessarily binds the trustee. His position is no longer the same as that of the bankrupt, but he is now in the position of a creditor holding a legal or equitable lien, and in this case the conditional sale of this property and the writing above set forth, termed a 'warehouse receipt,' are to be interpreted exactly as if the trustee were a creditor holding such lien."

§ 1147. Bankrupt's Contracts of Purchase or Sale, and His Mortgages.—Likewise, the trustee is bound by the terms of the bankrupt's purchases, sales⁵³ and mortgages.⁵⁴ Thus, as to "sale and return,"

Instance, corporation selling its stock for a patent right, the trustee cannot enforce any "unpaid stock subscription," for there is none unpaid. Sternbergh v. (Duryea) Power Co., 20 A. B. the bankrupt's pledges.⁷⁰

Again, in accordance with this rule the vendee's equitable interest in land for the purchase price already paid, will be protected where the seller's bankruptcy prevents the seller from completing the contract.⁷¹ And the validity and effect of a deed of trust securing an annuity to a wife, where a decree for alimony was subsequently changed to such arrangement by agreement, although the parties subsequently remarried, was decided in accordance with the bankrupt's rights under State law; and accumulated interest thereon was held not allowable.⁷² The question as to whether a certain transaction amounted to a "novation" or a mere substitution, where the purchaser of a plant took up an old mortgage and gave a new one covering more property, was decided in accordance with the bankrupt's rights under State law.⁷³

Thus, also, as to whether chattel mortgages are void for indefiniteness has been decided in accordance with the State law.⁷⁴

And the bankrupt estate has been held bound by the bankrupt's husband's signing of the bankrupt's name to a conditional sale contract, although the seller supposed himself to be dealing with the husband and that the signature was the husband's own signature.⁷⁵

And the assumption by the executive officers of a bankrupt corporation, of the functions of a board of directors with the acquiescence of the stockholders, has been held to bind the corporation and hence to bind the trustee.⁷⁶

The interest on mortgages is also included within the protection of the law; for the trustee takes title to mortgaged property subject to the mortgage debt including interest, the bankruptcy adjudication not operating to cut off the interest.⁷⁷

Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 152 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa, affirmed in 22 A. B. R. 1, 213 U. The covenant for the sale and the application of the proceeds of these lands to the payment of the debt and interest was valid and binding, and it ran with the land, so that when the latter came into the hands of the trustee it was mortgaged for the payment of the interest as much as for the payment of the principal. * * * Another rule might prevail if the proceeds of the mortgaged property were insufficient to pay the mortgaged debt and its interest in full and the mortgagee was seeking to collect an unpaid balance by sharing with

Certificates of stock bought and paid for by a customer belong to the customer and the trustee must surrender them.⁸⁰

The trustee is also bound by federal statutes where they would be applicable had no bankruptcy intervened; and so an assignment of a valid claim against the United States Government has been held absolutely void, under U. S. Rev. Stat., § 3477, for lack of formal acknowledgment, witnesses, etc.⁸¹

§ 1147½. Conditional Sales.—Likewise, the trustee is bound by the bankrupt's contracts of conditional sale.⁸²

§ 1147¾. Assignment of Book Accounts and Notice to Debtors.—Successive assignments of book accounts by the bankrupt from time to time, under an arrangement whereby the assignee advances money up to a certain percent of their face value, the bankrupt continuing to collect the accounts in his own name, though as agent of the assignee and accounting to him therefor, are effective to transfer the title to the accounts even though no notice is given to the debtors; nor is the arrangement itself fraudulent in law, where it is not actually fraudulent and where neither party knows of the bankrupt's insolvency.

Greedy v. Dockendorff, 231 U. S. 513, 31 A. B. R. 407 (affirming 103 Fed. 475): "The case was referred to a special master, who found that it did not appear that either the petitioner or the bankrupt knew that the latter was insolvent at the time of the supposed preference, or that there were any transfers with intent to defraud creditors, and found for the petitioner. His finding of facts and conclusions were concurred in by the District Court and Circuit Court of Appeals (203 Fed. Rep. 475, 121 C. C. A. 597). But no sufficient reason is shown for departing from our ordinary rules, where the master, the court of first instance, and the Circuit Court of Appeals have agreed, and in the course of the hearing this was admitted. * * *

"The trustee relies upon the general application of the lien under the agreement as constituting a fraud in law. Whatever effect it might have as evidence must be laid on one side in view of the findings below. The question here is whether successive assignments of accounts by way of security, in pursuance of a contract under which advances were made to enable the assignor to get the goods on the faith of the undertaking that the accounts should be assigned, were bad because the contract embraced all accounts, although neither party contemplated any fraud. The rule of the English statutes as to reputed ownership may extend to debts growing due to the bankrupt in the course of his business, but we have no such statute. The advances were the means by which the bankrupt got the ownership of the goods. The contract of itself would operate as a conveyance as soon as the rights to which it applied were acquired. Field v. New York, 6 N. Y. 179. We do not see why in the interval between the acquisition of the goods and the specific assignment of accounts the right of general creditors without lien should intervene to defeat a security given in good faith when, but for the promise of it, the property never would have come into the bankrupt's hands. There may have been a moment when the goods could have been attached, or when, if insolvency had been made known, as in National City Bank v. Hotchkiss (U. S. Sup. Ct.), 31 Am. B. R. 291, it would have been too late to make the promised lien good. But in this case the lien was acquired before any knowledge of insolvency and before any attachment intervened. See Jaquith v. Alden, 189 U. S. 78, 9 Am. B. R. 773; Coder v. Arts, 213 U. S. 223, 22 Am. B. R. 1; Van Iderstine v. Nat. Discount Co., 227 U. S. 575, 583, 29 Am. B. R. 478. It is objected that this lien was secret. But notice to the debtors was not necessary to the validity of the assignment as against creditors (Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508, 522), and merely keeping silence to the latter, whether known or unknown, created no estoppel. Wiser v. Lawler, 189 U. S. 260, 270; Ackerman v. True, 175 N. Y. 353, 363. There was no active concealment and no attempt to mislead any one interested to know the truth.

"We content ourselves with this very general answer to an argument that dealt with many details that we have not mentioned, because those details were material only to a reconsideration of the findings of fact. Probably a hope of securing such a reconsideration was one of the inducements towards bringing the case here."

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Greey v. Dockendorff above quoted indicates strongly, however, that such an arrangement might well be found to be fraudulent in fact, though not fraudulent as matter of law; and it cannot be doubted that, if the arrangement for the advance is made on the express understanding that it shall be kept secret and that notice shall not be given to the debtors who owe the accounts, it is such activity as would warrant a conclusion of actual fraud.

The English doctrine of "Reputed Ownership" makes the failure to give notice to the debtors, where accounts receivable are assigned by way of security, equivalent to a failure to deliver tangible chattels to a pledgee or mortgagee thereof, whose rights as against levying creditors, as well as against bona fide purchasers or encumbrancers would be forfeited unless the instrument of transfer were recorded, where possession is not actually changed and the former owner is left the ostensible owner. But such is not the rule in the United States, where the recording acts, relative to transfers of personal property, have been held not to apply to choses in action but only to tangible property.

A verbal assignment of book accounts where there is no manual delivery of any kind, has been sustained in bankruptcy.^{82a} In accordance with the rule, notice to debtors whose debts on book accounts have been assigned by the bankrupt as collateral security has been held not essential to the validity of the assignment.^{82b}

On the other hand, it has been held that the assignment of a debt requires for its validity as to third parties notice to the debtor, but not acceptance by him.^{82c}

A verbal assignment by way of mortgage or pledge of book accounts to be after acquired, as security for present endorsement by relatives has been upheld in accordance with the rights of the parties under state law.^{82d}

But, at any rate, mere notices at the bottom of invoices authorizing remittances to be made to third parties have been held not to be assignments of accounts to such parties.^{82e}

§ 1148. Bankrupt's Assumption of Mortgage or Other Obligation.—The trustee is bound by the bankrupt's assumption of mortgages,⁸³ or other obligations.⁸⁴

But compare, apparently contra, In re Laundry Co., 23 A. B. R. 859, 176 Fed. 740 (D. C. N. Y.), wherein the court held that the renewal of a chattel mortgage given by a corporation for borrowed money, where the assent of two-thirds of the stockholders had not been obtained as required under the New York statute, was invalid as against the trustee, though the bankrupt itself would have been estopped.

Notes, Secured by Accounts, in Turn Transferred as Collateral by Holder, under Representation.—Instance, banking firm's trustee in bankruptcy estopped from claiming that proceeds of accounts pledged with it by a bankrupt merchant should be paid to the banking firm's trustee rather than to banks to which the banking firm had transferred the merchant's notes under

§ 1149½. Right of Subrogation.—The right of subrogation, in accordance with the ordinary rules of equity, is unimpaired.⁸⁶

Thus, the trustee takes the property subject to the right of subrogation of one paying off liens thereon, where such right of subrogation would have existed against the bankrupt.^{86a} Again, he takes it subject to the rights of the bankrupt's children, who had surrendered to their father life insurance policies for specific purposes, to subrogation to certain mortgages paid off through misuse of the policies.^{86b}

§ 1150. Specific Contractual Rights and Equitable Liens.—Specific contractual rights (where recording is not necessary) and equitable liens and assignments created by the bankrupt are binding on the trustee,⁸⁷ if binding on the bankrupt by State law and not void as in fraud of creditor's rights^{87a} nor in contravention of the Bankruptcy Act.^{87b}

Thus, where an owner had a right by specific contract to use material left on the premises by a building contractor, it was held that title to the material did not pass to the trustee.⁸⁸ Again, an equitable lien on property already pledged (or already subject to an equitable lien by contract) and in a third person's hands, was held valid without delivery to the equitable lienors, the trustee's rights being held to be those of the bankrupt under State law.⁸⁹

Again, where a contract to furnish certain articles provides that, until sold, or paid for in cash, they should remain the seller's property, and, when sold, all proceeds of the sale, including cash, notes, etc., should be kept separate as a trust fund and be turned over to the seller as collateral security, the seller's rights are unimpaired by the bankruptcy.⁹⁰

Likewise, as to equitable assignments of insurance policies: the trustee stands in the bankrupt's shoes. Thus, an agreement made at the time of commencing a line of credit, to procure and assign to the creditor policies of fire insurance covering the goods to be purchased therewith, operates as an equitable assignment and is valid in bankruptcy.⁹¹ Likewise, an oral agreement to insure for the benefit of a mortgagee will operate as an equitable lien upon the proceeds of a fire insurance policy taken out by the mortgagor in his own name;⁹² but not as an equitable lien upon the proceeds of a policy taken out by the grantee of the equity of redemption.⁹³

It has been held that an equitable assignment of a part of a fund will not operate as against a trustee or receiver in bankruptcy, unless the debtor or fundholder has notice of it.⁹⁴ And the validity of an assignment of future earned wages has been decided (at any rate as to wages earned before bankruptcy, where such assignment is not void as a preference) in accordance with general law.⁹⁵

Thus, equitable liens upon standing timber, created by verbal agreement before the four months period, have been held valid as against the trustee, the bankrupt's potential interest in the logs and timber being held sufficient.⁹⁶

Again, where a mining company was under contract to supply a railway company with coal, but became embarrassed, and the railway company thereupon advanced it money to meet its pay roll on the oral agreement that such money should be advance payment for the coal, an equitable pledge was thereby created of the unmined coal which the Supreme Court upheld in bankruptcy.

Hurley v. Atchison Ry. Co., 22 A. B. R. 17, 213 U. S. 126: "Equity looks at the substance, and not at the form. That the coal for which this money was advanced was not yet mined, but remained in the ground to be mined and delivered from day to day, as required, does not change the transaction into one of an ordinary independent loan on the credit of the coal company or upon express mortgage security. It implies a purpose that the coal, as mined, should be delivered, and is, from an equitable standpoint, to be considered as a pledge of the unmined coal to the extent of the advancement. The equitable rights of the parties were not changed by the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings. All obligations of a legal and equitable nature remained undisturbed thereby. If there had been no bankruptcy proceedings, the coal as mined was, according to the understanding of the parties, to be delivered as already paid for by the advancement."

And, similarly, where a bona fide contract of purchase of a lumber mill's entire output is in existence, on which moneys have been advanced to the seller, the delivery of lumber thereunder, though on the eve of the seller's bankruptcy, is valid.⁹⁸

Likewise, a contract providing that lumber as manufactured was to be "applied upon the contract," has been held to give rise to an equitable lien upon the lumber afterwards manufactured.⁹⁹

A bona fide pledgee of stock standing in the bankrupt's name, will be protected though the stock was originally subscribed for the bankrupt's father who afterwards died before completing payment, the bankrupt completing payment with his own funds and taking the stock in his own name, though executor of his father's estate.¹

Likewise, in accordance with the rule, a draft drawn by a landlord on his agent for future rents to be collected and discounted at bank, has been held to operate as an equitable assignment of the rents as they later accrued and to be good against the landlord's trustee in bankruptcy.²

Similarly, the trustee's right to the proceeds of the sale of the bankrupt's seat in a stock exchange is subject to the lien of creditor members, under the rules of the exchange.⁴

A building contract stipulating against liens and duly recorded has been held, in accordance with the state law, to bar liens in Pennsylvania.⁵ And, in accordance with general law, where an agreement for a contemporaneous mortgage has been disregarded and goods commingled, the seller has been held to have a lien on the entire mass for the purchase price.⁶

A six months' delay in carrying out an agreement, made contemporaneously with delivery, to give later a lease or conditional sales contract, has been held not to invalidate the lease or contract when executed.⁷ And the wife's right to the proceeds of corporate stock held as security, where by State law she is incapacitated to contract, has been decided in accordance with State law.⁸

Similarly, liens created by an agreement to secure "by the goods themselves" have been upheld.¹¹ And an equitable lien before four months has

Where equitable assignments have been made by bankrupts of parts of funds due them as contractors from owners, the rights of the trustee have been decided in bankruptcy in accordance with the State law.¹³ But a mere promise by a government contractor, made before the four months period, to pay a subcontractor with the money expected from the government on an estimate, will not constitute an "equitable assignment" of the money.¹⁴ And in accordance with the main proposition, it has been held, that, where a bank has refused payment of the check of the bankrupt because of rumors of his failure, the holder has no right to the deposit but that the deposit should be ordered paid over to the trustee.¹⁵

But the reservation of secret charges or liens upon property are not to be upheld as "equitable liens" to which the property is to be considered subject in the hands of the trustee, where they amount to a fraud upon the law.¹⁷ And the essentials of an equitable lien must exist, else it will not be sustained as such;^{17a} thus, where a vendor's lien is claimed the essentials of such a lien must exist.^{17b}

An equitable assignment has been defined to be any writing or act which shows an intention to transfer the specific funds in the hands of another, the same being completed when notice is given to the fund holder.¹⁸

An equitable assignment of a bankrupt legatee's interest in his ancestor's estate, not yet actually paid over, is not created by the mere written agreement of a prior assignee thereof to pay to another creditor any surplus over and above his own debt and other prior liens and costs and expenses.

existence have been upheld as equitable assignments. Here Ballantine had a vested life interest in the two estates over and above all that had been assigned by him to the finance company and others. He assigned no part of that remaining interest to the appellees. He simply authorized the finance company, if at any future time it should receive money on his account in excess of what he owed to it and certain other parties, to pay out of that excess the claims of appellees."

An assignment of a subcontract for furnishing and setting tile for buildings, as collateral security for borrowed money, has been held not to pass title to the tile itself, the wording of the contract being insufficient.²⁰

Similarly, patented articles left with the bankrupt to be sold under license—the trustee is bound by the terms of the license.²¹

That a wife's delivery of money to her husband is presumptively a gift, has been decided in accordance with State law; likewise, whether sufficient proof exists to establish a resulting trust in favor of a wife in lands bought in her husband's name, has been decided in accordance with general rules of law.²⁴

So as to the assignment of contracts entered into with a municipality for paving.²⁵

In one case where notes had been given by a merchant from time to time to a banking firm for money which the banking firm used in paying the merchant's debts, taking the accounts of the merchant's customers as security and afterwards the banking firm in turn itself pledged the notes with a bank under the representation that they were secured by good accounts and merchandise, it was held, upon the ultimate bankruptcy of both the merchant and the banking firm, that the latter's trustee was not entitled to the proceeds of the merchant's account for the banking firm's own creditors, but at best merely to hold as a trustee in equity, for the benefit of the banks.²³

A bank's ownership will be protected where it accepts and pays drafts for the purchase price of goods imported and receives bills of lading which it then exchanges for trust receipts of the purchaser who agrees therein to hold the goods as security for the advances or to sell them and apply the proceeds on the bank's claim, the bank reserving the right at any time to cancel the trust and take possession of the goods.²⁷ present. One common method, which seems to have been adopted in this case, is as follows: A merchant who wishes to import goods for which he has not funds to pay obtains credit from a bank to a fixed amount, against which he draws for the price of the goods to the order of the vendor or the vendor draws for the price to his own order. The draft with bill of lading indorsed in blank or to the order of the bank is forwarded by the vendor to the banker for acceptance. The banker accepts the draft payable in one, two, three, or four months, as the case may be, forwards the bill of lading indorsed in blank to his agent in New York, who delivers the same to the importer against a receipt called a trust receipt, whereby he agrees to sell the goods for account of the banker, to pay him the proceeds and so put him in funds to take up the acceptance at maturity. * * * The purpose of the parties, describe the trust receipt as you will, was to keep the title to the goods in the bankers until their acceptances for the price of the goods were paid. The courts, without always defining exactly what the relation between the parties is or always defining it in the same way, still are astute to protect the rights of the banker in such case. * * * It would be most inequitable that the bankrupt or his trustee should escape from the performance of this obligation for the benefit of any one except a bona fide purchaser for value or creditors protected by statute."

Thus, the trustee is bound by the bankrupt's previous transfer of all his property to another person to sell and apply upon the claims of all creditors except certain ones named;²⁸ that is to say, of course, unless such transfer be invalid for fraud or as being an assignment for the benefit of creditors within four months of the bankruptcy.

It has been held that a third party in possession of real estate under claim of equitable right thereto by virtue of an oral contract is not affected by the Amendment of 1910 to Bankruptcy Act, § 47 (a) (2).^{28a}

of taking over the executory contract in question the trustees in this case determined to do so, assumed the contract and entered upon its execution. They mined coal, delivered it to the railway company, and, in the language of the trial court, 'performed fully all the terms of the contract as it was written,' but failed to conform to the condition created by the oral agreement to deliver coal to the railway company in payment of the advances made by it to keep the mine going." Quoted further ante, § 1145.

§ 1151. Forfeiture Clauses, Rent, etc.—The trustee is bound by all forfeiture clauses and rent covenants of the bankrupt. Thus, where forfeiture of a long term lease was declared before bankruptcy for failure to build as covenanted, the trustee is bound by the forfeiture and the bankruptcy court will enforce it.²⁹ But he may urge that forfeiture has been waived by the conduct of the parties.³⁰

§ 1152. Fixtures.—The trustee takes the property under the bankrupt's rights as to fixtures.

Thus, it has been held by the bankruptcy court, in accordance with local or general law, that a steam engine was not a fixture; yet, if so, that the vendor's lien thereon was entitled to priority and that the trustee had no right thereto until the balance of the purchase price was tendered by him;³¹ and the bankrupt vendee's right to remove alleged fixtures, where the contract preserves certain rights of removal, has been decided in accordance with local law;³² thus, if the fixtures are such that, under the local law, or the provisions of the lease, they belonged to the landlord, the tenant's trustee is not vested therewith;³³ and whether a lien on realty covers certain fixtures and is entitled to participate in the distribution of a fund derived from a sale thereof, will also be decided in accordance with the law of the State.³⁴

§ 1152½. After-Acquired Property.—The trustee stands in the bankrupt's shoes as to after-acquired property and as to the right to the increase of property, etc.

Mercantile & Stock Co. v. Galloway, 19 A. B. R. 244, 156 Fed. 504 (D. C. Ore.): "Another suggestion is that it was incompetent for the parties thus to impose a lien upon after-acquired property. It is sufficient answer to this that Buck had at least a potential interest in the logs and lumber, and it is believed that it was competent for him to affix the lien, looking first to the manufacture of such logs and lumber; the timber out of which the product was to be manufactured being his by indisputable purchase."

Except, always, of course where creditors under State law have greater rights, as to which see post, § 1207, et seq.

Obiter, Henderson v. Mayer, 225 U. S. 631, 28 A. B. R. 387: "But the statute was not intended to lessen rights already existing, nor to defeat those inchoate liens given by statute, of which all creditors were bound to take notice and subject to which they are presumed to have contracted when they dealt with the insolvent. Liens in favor of laborers, mechanics and contractors are of this character; and although they may be perfected by record or foreclosure within four months of the bankruptcy, they are not created by judgments, nor are they treated as having been obtained through legal proceedings, even when it is necessary to enforce them by some form of legal proceedings. The statutes of the various states differ as to the time when such liens attach, and also as to the property they cover. * * * In some cases the lien dates from the commencement of the work or from the completion of the contract. In others, prior to the levy, they are referred to as being dormant or inchoate liens, or as 'a right to a lien.' In re Bennett, 18 A. B. R. 320, 153 Fed. 677; In re Laird, 6 A. B. R. 1, 109 Fed. 550. But the courts, dealing especially with bankruptcy matters, have almost uniformly held that these statutory preferences are not obtained through legal proceedings, and therefore, are not defeated by § 67 f, even where the registration, foreclosure, or levy, necessary to their completion or enforcement, was within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy." Quoted further at § 1160.

Nor is it a lien given by way of preference to secure a pre-existing debt.³⁸ It comes under none of the heads of those liens or conveyances or transfers that are void as against the trustee in bankruptcy. Contra, In re Monroe Lumber Co., 24 A. B. R. 371, 186 Fed. 252 (D. C. Miss.): "Where the laborers of a saw mill corporation which had been placed in the hands of receivers in the state court, with suspension of operations, instituted proceedings in such court to establish a lien for their services upon all the property of the corporation, which proceedings were pending in said court at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy of said corporation no lien had been so fixed as that the adjudication did not nullify." But this case is not well reasoned. The state statute referred to seems clearly to have provided for a definite lien as a substantive right, the legal proceedings not creating the lien but merely enforcing it. However, if the state courts have held that it was not a "lien" but a mere "priority," then the rules of § 2197, post, would probably apply. See post, §§ 1437, 1444, 1586, 2196, 2197 and 2198.

according to law if record thereof is necessary in order to impart notice, shall not be affected by this act."³⁹

This becomes plain when one comes to reflect upon the nature of a mechanic's lien. A mechanic's lien arises by operation of law and, according to the law of most, if not all, of the States, begins with the first stone laid, the first nail driven or the first load of material dumped on the premises. It grows as the edifice grows and expands with the development of the work. It is there in an inchoate form from the beginning. It is essentially and clearly a lien arising upon a presently passing consideration, and must be assumed to have been in the contemplation of the parties engaged in the work both as owners and contractors. Therefore, such a lien is one given and accepted upon a present consideration, and is within the meaning of clause (d) of § 70, and is not a preference nor a lien obtained by legal proceedings. Moreover, such a lien is good against creditors under the State law, so is not void for want of record. Even if the bankruptcy of the owner occurs before the lien affidavit is filed, the lien is not affected in most States so long as the affidavit is filed at some time within the statutory period for filing, although after the adjudication of bankruptcy; for the filing of the affidavit does not, in most States, create the lien—it simply prolongs it. It is merely the statutory notice of the lien that must be given some time within the prescribed period after the completion of the work in order to continue the notice after the newness of the work itself has worn off and ceased to be a reminder of the rights of those who have done the work.⁴⁰

Obiter, Moore v. Green, 16 A. B. R. 653, 145 Fed. 211 (C. C. A. W. Va.): "The lien here claimed is analogous to that of mechanics, materialmen, sub-contractors, etc., which class of liens have been respected and enforced under the present Bankruptcy Act. They are given a lien by statute, but to be effective the same must be preserved and secured within a prescribed period by filing such claims, duly perfected, etc., for recordation in the designated court of the State. Being thus entitled to this inchoate lien, taking the steps to secure the benefit thereof within four months of bankruptcy has in every instance, so far as we are advised, been held not to be the taking of legal proceedings in contravention of the Act, but merely doing the necessary thing—taking the essential step—to secure the existing right under the statute. In this class of claims, by reason of the work done or supplies furnished under the agreement between the parties, the statute declares that there shall exist for the amount due a lien, upon the same being properly perfected. In this case the lien arises pursuant to the statute, and under and by virtue of the deed or transfer of the debtor's property, he being an insolvent, provided the creditors assail the same within the statutory period. To say that they should lose the right thus secured by taking the step necessary to secure or make the same effective would be an anomaly.

This view of the law has been steadily maintained by the bankruptcy courts under the present Bankruptcy Act."

However, in States where the filing of the affidavit comes too late if delayed until after creditors' rights have attached by levy of execution or attachment or otherwise, then, of course, it would be too late in bankruptcy, since the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act, § 47 (a) (2), gives the trustee the rights of a creditor "armed with process."

§ 1156. Subcontractors' Liens.—The same rules would apply in most States to subcontractors' liens.⁴¹ But, owing to the phraseology of the statutes in some of the States, such liens have sometimes there been held not to arise and progress coincidently with the furnishing of the work or materials but to arise only upon the filing of the statutory affidavit or notice, not being merely perpetuated thereby. In such States the subcontractor has, in some decisions, been held to be a mere general creditor until he files his affidavit or notice, and the assignment of the contract by the head contractor would therefore defeat his rights. Therefore, in those States, if the head contractor is put into bankruptcy before the subcontractor has filed his affidavit or notice, the subcontractor may, by these holdings, lose his opportunity to get a lien. Such was the holding in the case of In re Roeber, 9 A. B. R. 303, 121 Fed. 449 (C. C. A. N. Y.), reversing 9 A. B. R. 778; itself reversed in In re Grissler, 13 A. B. R. 510, 136 Fed. 754 (C. C. A. N. Y.).⁴²

However, the Court of Appeals of New York State⁴³ held the same as the District Court, in this case, and it would therefore seem that the U. S. C. C. A. in 9 A. B. R. 303, is in error, the federal courts being bound to follow the decisions of the highest court of the State as to the validity of liens created by the State statutes. Subsequently the Circuit Court of Appeals corrected the error, in the case In re Grissler, 13 A. B. R. 510, 136 Fed. 754 (C. C. A. N. Y.).

In Pennsylvania the subcontractor acquires rights against the fund only by instituting suit and garnisheeing the owner; and therefore it is there held that the legal proceedings create the lien and do not simply enforce a lien already pre-existing.⁴⁴ where the landlord has only a common-law right of distress. In re West Side Paper Co. (C. C. A. 3d Cir.), 20 A. B. R. 660, 162 Fed. 110, 89 C. C. A. 110. This is often referred to as a lien, but is only in the nature of security. 3 Black Com. 18. The pledge, or quasi-pledge, which the landlord is said to have, is, at most, only a power to seize chattels found on the rented premises. These he could take into possession and hold until the rent was paid. Doe ex dem Gladney v. Deavors, 11 Ga. 84. But before the distraint the landlord at common law has 'no lien on any particular portion of the goods and is only an ordinary creditor except that he has the right of distress by reason of which he may place himself in a better position.' Sutton v. Reese, 9 Jr. (N. S.) 456. It is true that prior to levy it covers no specific property, and attaches only to what is seized under the distress warrant issued to enforce the lien given by statute. But in this respect it is the full equivalent to a common-law distress, the lien of which is held not to be discharged by 67f. * * * The fact that the warrant could be levied upon property which had never been on the rented premises does not change the nature of the landlord's right, though it may increase the extent of his security."

In re West Side Paper Co., 20 A. B. R. 660, 162 Fed. 110 (C. C. A. Pa.): "Distress for rent in arrear, is one of the most ancient, as well as 'one of the most efficient of the landlord's remedies for the collection of rent.' It is in most of our States, as it was at common law, a right sui generis, belonging to the landlord whenever the relation of landlord and tenant existed. It appears to have been abolished in a few of the States, and in most of them its exercise has been regulated by statute. Its essential characteristics are, however, for the most part the same as existed at common law. In Pennsylvania, as at common law, the distress warrant issues directly from the landlord to his bailiff, who, if he happens to be a constable, is no less the agent and bailiff of the landlord than if he were a private person. The State law provides that, after the goods have been distrained, or levied upon, unless the same be replevied by the plaintiff within five days, the landlord may apply to the sheriff of the county, or to a constable, who is required to take proceedings for the sale of the said goods, or so much thereof as may be required for the satisfaction of the rent. In other respects, the right of the landlord remains for the most part as it was at common law. The right to distrain or levy upon all the goods upon the demised premises, whether those of the tenant or of a stranger, arises the moment the relation of landlord and tenant is established. It is a right in the nature of a lien, rather than a lien, until the goods are actually distrained under a landlord's warrant. It was originally in the nature of a property right in the reditus or return from the land, reserved to the landlord. No suit or proceeding at law, whether in personam or in rem, in the proper sense of those words, was necessary for the assertion of this right. It belongs to that small category of personal rights, the assertion of which has always been independent of legal procedure; of which the right to abate a nuisance, under certain circumstances, and the right to distrain cattle damage feasant, are examples. While there is no specific lien, except on the goods actually distrained under the landlord's warrant, all the goods on the demised premises are to be considered as being under a quasi pledge, which gives superiority to the specific lien established by the distraint. Such a lien is in no sense 'obtained through legal proceedings.' Nor is it within the spirit of the bankrupt law in this regard, as evidenced by other provisions thereof, as well as that of 67f, above quoted."

In re Burns, 23 A. B. R. 640, 175 Fed. 633 (D. C. Ga.): "See particularly the opinion of Circuit Judge Grosscup. In re Robinson & Smith, 18 Am. B. R. 503, 154 Fed. 343, speaking for the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, when he held that the provision of the bankruptcy law on which the trustee here relies 'relates only to those actions of proceedings taken by creditors who, having no existing lien or right of lien, resting in existing contract, entered into in good faith, seek to obtain a preference by being first in the race of diligence, and such provisions do not affect that lien obtained by a landlord by the levy of a distress warrant for rent.' This case is precisely in point, and long postdates any adverse holding. 'The right of the landlord is one upon which every permanent hope of general prosperity must depend. Our legislature, in the several statutes set forth in the various sections of the Code of Georgia, have made very clear the policy of the State on this subject. Section after section reiterates not only the right of the landlord to a general lien, but they also give a special lien upon the crops made on the land. The general lien attaches to all of the property of the debtor liable to levy and sale. It is true that this lien attaches from the date of the levy, but that does not mean that the right of the landlord to the general lien, or to the special lien, is created by levy. The right exists by virtue of the statute.

* * * But the State law has created the general right, and as well the special right, and the lien of the landlord thus created is one of those debts having priority by the law of the State, which under the express provisions of the Bankruptcy Act * * *, must be paid from the assets of the bankrupt, provided the lien has attached, before the general creditors can participate therein. It follows, in my judgment, that the bankruptcy of the tenant does not defeat this lien of highest dignity except the lien of taxes."

But this subject is complicated by the fact that landlords are frequently also given priority by State law, upon distribution of an insolvent's estate, regardless of lien, and that this priority is preserved in bankruptcy by § 64 (b) (5). Therefore, these latter cases come with equal propriety both under the subject of the preservation of State priorities under Bankruptcy Distribution, and under the subject of the preservation of liens.⁵¹

The right to claim the lien arises under this section and may be enforced at any time after the supplies are furnished; but may be lost by failure to comply with some provisions of the Act giving the right. The only requirement is that the lien shall be filed within the 90 days after the last item of the bill becomes due and payable. If the claim is filed within that time, the lien secured relates to the time the supplies were furnished."

Likewise, the subcontractor may serve his "stop" notice or file his affidavit after the bankruptcy of the owner;⁵⁴ or after the bankruptcy of the head contractor.⁵⁵

§ 1162. Failure to Perfect Lien in Statutory Form Invalidates.—Failure to perfect the lien according to the statutory formalities invalidates it.⁵⁶

In re Kerbey-Dennis Co., 2 A. B. R. 402, 95 Fed. 166 (C. C. A. Wis., affirming 2 A. B. R. 218, 94 Fed. 818): "The apparent inequity, in now denying equity, results, however, not from the Bankruptcy Act, but from their own omission to comply with the requirements of the local law. Both of these classes of laborers had liens upon the product upon which their labor was expended. The one class preserved their liens by proper proceedings, which the statute giving the lien rendered imperative for its continuance. The other class omitted so to do, and, therefore, by force of the statute which created the right, the lien is gone forever."

Grainger & Co. v. Riley (In re Globe Printing Co.), 28 A. B. R. 114, 201 Fed. 901 (C. C. A. Ky.): "The statute authorizes a lien in favor of mechanics, laborers and materialmen, and provides that no person shall acquire this lien, unless he shall notify in writing the owner of the property to be held liable or his authorized agent, immediately after the last item of material or labor is furnished, of his intention to hold the property liable and the amount for which he claimed a lien. Nothing is left to inference or conjecture. A compliance with this provision is, as we think, conditio sine qua non. A lien, such as is sought here, for labor performed or material furnished is unknown to the common law, and is a purely statutory one. That there must be a substantial compliance with the terms of such statute is everywhere maintained and upon the conditions provided or in the act giving the lien."

In re Franklin, 18 A. B. R. 220, 151 Fed. 642 (D. C. N. Car.): "Before a creditor can claim a lien given by a State statute he must comply with the statute and perfect his lien. It is only after so perfected that they are protected by the court of bankruptcy or by any other court."

⁵⁵. Crane Co. v. Smythe, 11 A. B. R. 747, 87 N. Y. Supp. 917. In this case it was, in substance, held, that the adjudication in bankruptcy of a building contractor did not cut off the right of a materialman to file and enforce his lien for materials used in the building.

Verbal Notice to Owner under Ohio Law.—Notice to the owner of the filing of the lien affidavit may be verbal. See In re Boner, 26 A. B. R. 321, 189 Fed. 93 (D. C. Ohio).

§ 1163. But Where Perfecting Dependent on Legal Proceedings, Bankruptcy May Dispense with Same.—But where the perfecting or maintaining of a lien is by state statute made to depend upon the taking of certain legal proceedings within a specified time, the lien is absolved from such condition by the bankruptcy itself, the property thereby being already in custodia legis such that interference with it would be contempt.⁵⁷ Or perhaps the Bankruptcy Court would permit such proceedings to be taken with limitation of their effect, in analogy to the rule prevailing in regard to exempt property and to perfecting rights against a surety on a bankrupt's appeal bond.⁵⁸

§ 1164. Consent to Payment of Fund into Bankruptcy Court.—Where all parties in lien cases consent that the owner may pay the fund into the bankruptcy court, the litigation may be there carried on.⁵⁹

§ 1165. Without Consent, State Court Proper Forum, Where Contractor or Subcontractor Bankrupt.—Without consent of the parties, the state court is the proper forum, where it is not the owner but the contractor or subcontractor who is the bankrupt, and where third parties claim interests; ⁶⁰ likewise, where the bankrupt was owner but sold the property before the bankruptcy, the purchaser retaining part of the purchase price to take care of liens that might be filed.⁶¹

The rule would be different were it specific property that was thus placed by a stake holder in the custody of the bankruptcy court without the consent of the other parties. In that event the actual possession of the property would carry with it jurisdiction to adjudicate the rights of all persons claiming interests therein, whether such persons would consent to the jurisdiction or not. But the subject of subcontractors' liens is a debt—the owners' debt to the head contractor, which they have sought to appropriate by filing their subcontractors' claims; and, no matter if the owner pay an equivalent sum of money into the bankruptcy registry, he cannot thereby discharge his debt without the subcontractors' consent, and the subcontractors may still sue him for the debt garnisheed by their statutory affidavits, notwithstanding. The bankruptcy court is not an appropriate forum for suing the owner for a mere debt, jurisdiction to recover debts—unless they be the money expression of the value of property belonging to the estate—not existing in the bankruptcy courts, even by the Amendment of 1903.⁶²

DOWER RIGHTS, CURTESY RIGHTS AND WIDOW'S AND CHILDREN'S DISTRIBUTIVE SHARE.

§ 1166. Inchoate Dower Right Unimpaired.—The inchoate right of dower is unimpaired and the trustee takes the property subject to the right becoming consummate through the bankrupt's death.⁶³

§ 1166¼. Except Where Dower Not Good against Levying or Judgment Creditors.—But inchoate dower is cut off by the husband's bankruptcy where it would be cut off under the state law as against a levying creditor; and it has been held in Pennsylvania that, since the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), confers upon the trustee the attributes of a creditor "armed with process," dower right is barred, since in that State a sale on execution bars dower in the execution debtor's real estate.⁶⁴

In re Codori, 30 A. B. R. 453, 207 Fed. 784 (D. C. Pa.): "Whether the right to dower under the order if sold accordingly, would have been extinguished depends entirely upon the amendment of § 47a(2) of the Bankruptcy Act, since before a sale would not have so operated. Lazier v. Porter, 109 U. S. 84; In re Shaeffer (D. C., Pa.), 5 Am. B. R. 248, 105 Fed. 352. By the provisions of § 70, subdivision 5, the trustee is invested with the bankrupt's title to all property which he, prior to the filing of the petition, could have transferred, or by judicial process might have been sold for him. And as to such property the trustee by § 47a(2) as amended, by the Act of June 25, 1910, 'shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceeding thereon.' The trustee, therefore, as has often been decided, concerning such real estate of the bankrupt in his possession, is in the position of a lien creditor. The amendment had the effect of vesting in the trustee the enlarged rights, remedies and powers of a judgment or other creditor having a lien upon the bankrupt's real estate (Bank of North America v. Penna. Motor Car Co., 235 Pa. 194), enabling him to sell such real estate acquitted and discharged of the inchoate right of the widow's dower, to the same effect as by a sheriff's sale after levy on proper writ of execution.

"In Pennsylvania the widow's right to dower in her husband's real estate has not been favored so as to exclude the just demands upon it for his debts. She is entitled to dower only in what remains of her husband's estate after payment of debts. His land has always been held as an asset or chattel for the payment of his debts; and the sale of his land on judgment, mortgage or other lien whatever has been held to bar the wife's right of dower in such Hence the order to sell free and discharged of liens by the enlarged authority conferred by the amendment placing the trustee into the position of a lien creditor contemplated the discharge of the widow's inchoate right of dower and the trustee had no authority to sell otherwise. To have done so beyond doubt operated to the prejudice of the bankrupt's creditors, since it is well understood that real estate is not as desirable with as without such interest as the trustee attempted to reserve."

§ 1166½. Dower in Lands Located in Another State.—From the wording of the statute, it might seem that where the bankrupt owns real estate located in another State, and dies, his widow is entitled to such dower rights as would belong to her in the State of the bankrupt's residence.⁶⁵

Such a construction, however, might lead to the giving of greater or perhaps less dower to the widow than she would be entitled to under the laws of the State where the land was actually located; and it is altogether likely that the proviso of § 8, "That in case of death the widow and children shall be entitled to all rights of dower and allowance fixed by the laws of the State of the bankrupt's residence," should be read as if the clause "fixed by the laws of the State of the bankrupt's residence" modified simply "allowance" and not also "dower;" by this construction the right of dower being left in each State in precisely the condition the State law intended.

Thomas v. Woods, 23 A. B. R. 132, 173 Fed. 585 (C. C. A. Kans.): "It is next urged that the right of dower belongs in the same class as the right of exemptions and homesteads, which are confined by § 6 of the Bankruptcy Act to the State of the bankrupt's domicile. Their similitude is very slight. Both are in a general way for the protection of the family. There, however, their likeness ceases. The homestead and exemptions are a part of the bankrupt's estate. They are both primarily to be claimed by him and set off to him. Their selection from his estate arises at the time when that estate is to be appropriated to the payment of the claims of his creditors. Dower, on the other hand, is no part of the bankrupt's estate. The wife derives no right from him either by grant or contract. As the Supreme Court says in Randall v. Krieger, 23 Wall. 137, 148: 'It is wholly given by law.' Congress has plenary power over the subject of exemptions, because they are part of the bankrupt's estate. It may, as in the present law, adopt the exemption laws of the several States, or it may, as in the Act of 1867 * * *, adopt local laws in part, and supplement these with a schedule of its own. Its power to deal with the subject, however, arises out of the fact that exemptions are a part of the bankrupt's estate. This consideration shows that the right of dower does not belong in the same class. Again, the right of dower has nothing to do with the insolvency of the husband. It arises from time to time during the marriage relation as the husband acquires real property. If the wife has not released her right of dower, it is as much her own private, absolute property as if she had acquired it by purchase. That estate can no more be transferred to her husband's creditors than any other portion of her separate estate. At the present time in the United States, the wife, as to her property rights, is a third person, and her estate is no more affected by the insolvency of her husband than is the property of other third parties. In our judgment it would be beyond the constitutional power of Congress to provide that in case of bankruptcy the dower rights of the bankrupt's wife, as defined by laws of the several States, ceased, and the real property owned by him passed to his trustee in bankruptcy discharged from such right of dower. Bankruptcy can only deal with what in law belongs to the bankrupt. It may annul his acts and the acts of his creditors which interfere with the just enforcement of its provisions. It cannot, however annul an act of the legislature of a State which previous to the statute of bankruptcy had vested an estate in the wife of the bankrupt. Its whole field of operation is circumscribed to getting in the estate which under the law belongs to the bankrupt, and distributing the same to his creditors. It cannot reach out and take property which under the laws belongs to the wife, and apply it to the payment of the bankrupt's debts, any more than it could seize that portion of her property which she acquired by purchase or devise. Again, it does not follow that because the right of homestead and exemptions is confined in most of the States to the domicile of the claimant, such a restriction would be appropriate in regard to dower. Dower is not measured in value or quantity as homesteads or exemptions are. The amount of it is dependent solely upon the amount of real property of which the husband is seized. * * * The proviso deals with two classes of rights: First, the widow's right of dower in real property; second, the allowances to the family out of the personal estate. This second class of rights is necessarily fixed by the laws of the State of the bankrupt's residence, for general rights in personal property follow the person of the owner and are determined by the laws of the State of his residence. The framer of the proviso used, in its last clause, language which was entirely appropriate to the allowances, and in part appropriate as to the right of dower. Having in mind several classes of rights, he made the not uncommon mistake of using language which was not quite comprehensive enough to cover all those rights under all conditions. If the proviso was a grant of rights, there would be reason in restricting the rights to its language; but, being intended to protect existing rights, it ought not to be given an interpretation which would destroy any part of those rights."

65. Bank v. Act, § 8; Hurley v. Devlin, 18 A. B. R. 627, 151 Fed. 919 (D. C. Kans.), overruled by Thomas v. Woods, 23 A. B. R. 132, 173 Fed. 585

It has been held that the bankruptcy court wherein the adjudication of bankruptcy was had may determine the rights of dower in land located in another State, in the custody of the trustee there.

Hurley v. Devlin, 18 A. B. R. 627, 151 Fed. 919 (D. C. Kans., sustained on this point, though reversed on other points, by Thomas v. Woods, post): "The ultimate question for determination, therefore, is, shall the trustees of the estate being administered in this court at the suit of the widow be compelled to appear in the State courts of foreign states to defend their interests, or supposed interests in the estate, when at the time such suits were brought they were in the actual possession of the property in the custody of this court, in the due process of administration. * * * While the act itself nowhere provides in what court or by what procedure the widow's rights to dower and the allowance to the widow and children provided for by § 8 thereof is to be determined and set apart, yet the above-quoted provisions clearly stake out, define, and limit the rights of the widow and the creditors of the deceased bankrupt as represented by the trusttees in the bankrupt estate. Hence, it is clear, in whatever court jurisdiction of the controversy resides, the rights of the parties are governed, controlled, and must be measured by the Bankrupt Act, and not by the laws of the particular State in which the property is situate, except in so far only as such laws are adopted and preserved by the act for the determination of such rights. As has been seen, this was the State of the residence of the bankrupt before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings. For this reason jurisdiction was conferred upon this court by the Bankrupt Act for the purpose of entertaining the voluntary petition of the debtor to be adjudged a bankrupt, to take possession of his property through its appropriate officers, wherever situate, to conserve the estate, and to determine the rights of the respective creditors, and all others therein, and through its trustee or trustees to set apart all exemptions to the bankrupt and to pass title to nonexempt property to the purchasers thereof from the trustees in the settlement of the sequestered estate. As has been further seen before the death of the bankrupt, while the widow's right of courtesy or dower in the lands of her husband remained inchoate, and for that reason afforded her no right of suit or action for its ascertainment and allowance, the trustees of the estate reduced the same to their actual possession, and were proceeding with the administration of the estate in this court in conformity with the provisions of the act, when the contingency giving her the right of action for her dower happened, and when the suits were brought by her in the State courts of foreign States. This court having assumed jurisdiction of the administration of this bankrupt estate, and having through its receivers taken actual possession of the property in which the widow, by the happening of the subsequent event of the death of her husband, acquired the interest she now asserts (an interest in and right to a portion of such property), I am of the opinion the determination of the controversy involving such right is drawn to and must be asserted in this court having jurisdiction of the administration of the estate and the custody of the property; that this jurisdiction, of necessity, is exclusive, and that the widow may, if she is so advised by her solicitors, exhibit her bill against the trustees and all parties in interest in said property, and all property in which she claims to be endowed out of her husband's estate to this court, and that this court, has full, ample, and exclusive jurisdiction to cause all such parties to be brought before it and to make complete determination of the rights of all parties." See § 1706½.

Or otherwise in the custody of the bankruptcy court, as, for instance, in the custody of the bankrupt at the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition.

Thomas v. Woods, 23 A. B. R. 132, 173 Fed. 585 (C. C. A. Kans., reversing on other grounds and affirming on this ground Hurley v. Devlin, supra): "The objection of the appellant that the trial court was without jurisdiction of the property, because it was not situated in the district of Kansas, has no merit. Upon the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, all property held by or for the bankrupt is brought within the custody of the court of bankruptcy, and, upon adjudication, that court is vested with jurisdiction to determine all liens and interests affecting it. This jurisdiction is coextensive with the United States."

It is questionable, however, whether the bankruptcy court has such jurisdiction to adjudicate titles to real estate in other States. Though the act is a "uniform law," yet that does not give the bankruptcy court extra-territorial jurisdiction; and in matters of title to real estate jurisdiction has always been particularly confined to land within the district, though indirectly land elsewhere may be affected by the exercise of control over parties interested therein who may be found in the district. Were it not so, in the course of years, the devolution of title to real estate from one to another, with all the vicissitudes of the successive owners involved, would complicate the search of records intolerably, sometimes resulting in the search of titles in many different States, each State a one time State of the residence of some bankrupt owner of the land. Doubtless, ancillary bankruptcy proceedings might be instituted for such purpose in the district wherein the land is located.

§ 1166³. Release of Dower in Preferential or Fraudulent Mortgage.—A release of dower is a mere incident to the transfer itself and falls with the fall of the transfer, so that such a release by a bankrupt's wife does not remain available to a mortgagee upon the avoidance of the mortgage itself as being preferential or fraudulent against the bankrupt's creditors.⁶⁷ bankruptcy law would seem to be utterly hostile to the idea of returning to a creditor, goods as to which title but not actual possession had passed to the bankrupt, and thus securing to the creditor who stops the goods payment in full, as against partial dividends to other creditors. But at the time the bankruptcy law of 1867, and the bankruptcy law of 1898, were passed, the doctrine of stoppage in transitu was well known in the courts and in the general body of the law. The application of the doctrine of stoppage in transitu, since the passage of the Bankruptcy Act, and its recognition by the courts, indicates that it cannot be inferred from the bankruptcy statute that a principal of law, so recognized by the courts as to have become a legal right, was wiped out and intended to be disregarded, when no express evidence of that intent was set forth in the text of the law. For the sake of consistency, and in order to carry out the principle of the bankruptcy statute, that the filing of a petition and the appointment of a receiver is notice to the world and creates an inchoate title which cannot be disregarded by those who have in their possession any part of the bankrupt estate, as indicated in the Muller case, supra, the doctrine of stoppage in transitu might have been excluded, if it had seemed wise to those framing the law so to do. But, as has been said, the trend of decision and the language of the statutes seem to indicate that no change in the doctrine of stoppage in transitu was made by either of the Bankruptcy Acts of the United States, and the present case must depend upon the determination of the issue involved, according to the principle of that doctrine as set forth by decisions."

§ 1167. Widow's and Children's Allowances.—The widow's and children's allowances are a charge upon the property coming into the bankruptcy court if the bankrupt dies after the petition is filed and before adjudication.⁶⁸ But if he die after adjudication, the widow and children have no right to allowance out of the bankrupt assets.⁶⁹

A claim presented against the estate by one who wrongfully stopped goods in transit, may be reduced to the extent of the loss caused by his action.⁷²

The right of stoppage in transitu has been lost if the goods reach the actual possession of the trustee at the designated terminus; and the same rule has been enunciated as to the possession of the receiver, even though the goods were shipped after the consignee had gone into bankruptcy.⁷³

In re Allen, 24 A. B. R. 574, 178 Fed. 879 (D. C. Until there was an actual delivery the right of the petitioners to stop and reclaim the goods was unquestionable. But not afterwards. It was too late, once the receiver representing the estate had taken possession of them."

Seizure before the goods have reached their destination will not, however, end the right of stoppage in transitu.

In re Northrup, 20 A. B. R. 86, 159 Fed. 686 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The District Court also reached the conclusion that the Syracuse Bank remitted the proceeds of its collections to the Central Bank through a mistake of fact. This conclusion is apparently based upon the assumption that, had the Syracuse Bank been advised of the collection of the Paul draft, it would have set off the accounts. But it does not appear that the Syracuse Bank had any right to make such offset. On the contrary, it seems clear that it had no such right. The bankrupts undoubtedly acted wrongfully in failing to give notice of the collection of the Paul draft. But this was a matter outside the obligation of the Syracuse Bank to remit for what it had collected."

It has been held that money remitted to a creditor for a specific purpose cannot, by application against the debtor's will to another purpose, be converted into a debt so that it may come within the rules of offset of mutual debts or demands.

[1867] Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 541: "The money was remitted to the plaintiffs for a specific purpose. It was not intended the title thereto should pass to them for another purpose. The plaintiffs were not, therefore, authorized, by crediting it on account, to convert it into a mere debt. Nor was it money remitted to be used, or held in trust, in any manner to result in a debt of the plaintiffs to Hopkins or Hopkins & Co. Strictly speaking, then, it could not be classed as among the "mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties," authorized by the twentieth section of the bankrupt law, to be set-off against each other; for that section was not intended to change or enlarge the law of set-off beyond what the principles of legal or equitable set-off previously authorized. *Sawyer v. § 1174. And May Be Only Contingently Owing.—Indeed a debt not due and only contingently owing may be set-off: as the bankrupt's liability as endorser on discounted paper not yet due may have offset against it a deposit in bank.⁸³

§ 1175. Separate Debt Not to Be Offset against Joint Debt.—A separate debt cannot be set off against a joint debt in bankruptcy unless growing out of a transaction or under circumstances establishing that the joint credit had been given on account of the separate debt.⁸⁴

§ 1176. Mutual Debts to Be between Same Parties, in Same Capacity.—But the mutual debts must be between the same persons, in the same capacity: thus, a debt due from a bankrupt to an individual partner of a solvent firm, may not be offset against a debt due the estate from the partnership;⁸⁵ although if the firm were insolvent a different rule might prevail.⁸⁶ Nor may an individual claim be set off against a trustee's claim.⁸⁷

Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 13 A. B. R. 451, 196 U. S. 502: "Now, as we have seen, from the facts found, it must be that the agreement between Harrison and the tie company obligated the latter, when it made the deduction from pay rolls, to remit to Harrison the amount of such deduction, irrespective of the account between itself and Harrison. It follows that as to such deductions the tie company stood towards Harrison in the relation of a trustee, and therefore, the case was not one of mutual credits and debts, within the meaning of the set off clause of the bankrupt law."

Nor can a debt due from a partner individually be set off against a judgment recovered by the firm's trustee for a partnership debt.⁸⁸

And it has been held, though by a divided court, that where the receiver and trustee in bankruptcy perform services and furnish material in endeavoring to complete the bankrupt's contract, the other party may not offset damages for the bankrupt's failure to complete the contract, at any rate not as against the receivers' and trustees' claim for materials and services though he might as against the portion of the bankrupt's work still unpaid for.

may be set up as against a claim for services or material supplied by the trustee, even if they in doing so are but continuing a contract partly performed by the bankrupt."

§ 1177. Offset Must Be Provable Debt.—A set-off or counterclaim is not allowable in favor of any debtor of the bankrupt which is not itself provable against the estate; the claim sought to be set off must itself be a "provable debt."⁸⁹ Thus, a surety paying part of his principal's debt after adjudication of the principal, may offset the amount paid, by way of pro tanto subrogation to the creditor's claim, against a debt due from the surety to the estate.⁹⁰ But "provable" means provable in nature, not that it may be proved; thus, claims not filed within the year are nevertheless provable, though too late to be "proved."⁹¹

Similarly, the bankrupt has been allowed to offset a claim for unliquidated damages arising from the false representations of the creditor in inducing the bankrupt to enter into the contract of sale involved in the claim.⁹²

§ 1178. But Claim Not Proved within Year, Nevertheless Available as Offset.—But claims that are provable in their nature and have not been "proved" [filed] within the year are nevertheless available as offsets, if otherwise proper offsets.⁹³

Such comaker's only right was to present the creditor's claim and take the dividends thereon. Compare, quære, In re Dillon, 4 A. B. R. 63, 100 Fed. 627 (D. C. Mass.).

Morgan v. Wordell, 6 A. B. R. 167, 178 Mass. 350, 59 N. E. 1037. In this case it was held, that a claim on which a preference had been received was on that account not a "provable" debt and yet might be used as an offset, if a "mutual credit." The right to offset the claim itself on which a preference had been received was denied on the ground that it was not "provable" against the estate, but the claim in the form of a claim for indemnity was finally permitted to be offset, as being a mutual credit, the payment by the surety giving rise evidently to a claim in his own right for indemnity or contribution as to which he would not need to stand in the creditor's shoes.

In re Becher Bros., 15 A. B. R. 228, 139 Fed. 366 (D. C. Penn.): In this case the trustee in bankruptcy of a tenant was denied the right to offset against the landlord's claim for unpaid rent damages in tort for negligently permitting water to flow into tenant's premises.

Bankruptcy Act regardless of the fact that it failed to prove its claim in bankruptcy."

Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Graham, 16 A. B. R. 615, 145 Fed. 610 (C. C. A. W. Va.): "But we think it cannot be true that such failure to prove the claim to the excess in the bankruptcy proceeding leaves the company in the position of a mere debtor. Statutes of limitation are strictly construed. But even if the rule of construction were otherwise, the language of the clause in question and its context seem to us to plainly limit its effect to proceedings in bankruptcy. In enacting the Bankrupt Act, Congress could have had no reason for requiring a debtor creditor, whose claim against exceeds his debt to the bankrupt, to prove the excess and insist upon his rights as a creditor of the estate. And hence there was no reason for penalizing such failure by imposing a limitation upon the right of a person thus situated who does not wish to prove and claim the excess. The full purpose of § 57n seems to us to be subserved when it is held that the limitation applies merely to claims sought to be asserted in the bankruptcy proceeding.

"We think the true solution of the question before us is that the counterclaim which may be set off in an independent action brought by the trustee is (subject to the restrictions of § 68b, 30 Stat. 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3,450]) one that is provable in its nature, and need not necessarily be one that has been, or may yet be, proved in the bankruptcy proceeding."

This rule would seem to apply to cases where the trustee in bankruptcy has recovered a preference and the preferential transferee has failed to prove his claim in the bankruptcy court within the year.

Yet, compare, obiter, Ommen, Trustee, v. Talcott, 23 A. B. R. 570, 175 Fed. 259, 261 (D. C. N. Y.): "In equity his claim as beneficiary must be subject to the same rules of limitation as though he applied in the bankruptcy court for his beneficial interest pro rata in the funds of that court. In other words, it is a case in which a court of equity ought to observe the same limitation in giving a remedy on the cross-bill as the claim itself would be subject to were suit brought upon it in the tribunal which normally has jurisdiction over it. Besides, I think that Mr. Czaki has shown that the cases which seem to permit a claim of this character to be set off are all cases arising in bankruptcy, and that a court of equity has never attempted to allow a claim at a time when it could no longer be proved. All these were cases originally in bankruptcy, and, if so, they are equally authorities to the defendant in a bankruptcy court as they are in a court of equity. It is true that Page v. Rogers, 211 U. S. 575, 21 Am. B. R. 496, 53 L. Ed. 332, was a case in which the decree was in equity, but in that case the court did not allow the set-off in the suit itself, but, on the contrary, directed the defendant to file his proof of claim in the bankruptcy court. On the other hand, there is a hope of the substantial determination of this litigation, if the cross-bill is not interjected at the present time, and, in view of the extraordinary delays which the suit has already suffered, I am not in the least disposed to give the parties any further grounds for procrastination. I will not, however, deprive the defendant of the use of so much of the recovery as he is apparently entitled to under his claim in bankruptcy, and therefore I will let him retain in his hands that proportion of his assets which his claim in bankruptcy, if filed, represents of the total of all claims filed, including his own. This he may do if at the time the decree is entered he has already filed his proof of claim in the bankruptcy court. Of course, a certain portion of his dividend so retained he will have to pay over as his proportion of the expenses of administration, but that cannot be ascertained at the present time. When I come to decide the case and direct the final decree, I will therefore allow the defendant to retain his proportion of his claim in bankruptcy out of the proceeds of this suit. If the complainant desires, the defendant will be obliged to give security for the payment of the portion so retained, provided he does not succeed in proving his claim in bankruptcy for any part or all of the same, and the complainant will be permitted at any time to apply at the foot of the decree for a modification as to that portion, if the defendant procrastinate in pressing his claim in bankruptcy, or to compel him to pay his share of the expenses."

§ 1179. Voidable Preference Not Available as Offset in Favor of Preferred Creditor.—Preferences voidable under § 60 (a) and (b) are not allowable as set-offs to claims against preferred creditors on the ground that the preferences and the claims constitute mutual debts and credits.⁹⁴

Inasmuch as a debt upon which a preference has been given is nevertheless "provable" though not "allowable" (as noted, ante, § 632), the refusal to permit the offsetting of preferences must either be based on general principles of statutory construction or upon the interpretation of the term "provable" here to mean "allowable."

creates at the same time, on the part of the bank, an obligation to pay the amount of the deposit as soon as the depositor may see fit to draw a check against it. It is not a transfer of property as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift or security. It is true that it creates a debt, which, if the creditor may set it off under § 68, amounts to permitting a creditor of that class to obtain more from the bankrupt's estate than creditors who are not in the same situation, and do not hold any debts of the bankrupt subject to set-off. But this does not, in our opinion, operate to enlarge the scope of the statute defining preferences so as to prevent set-off in cases coming within the terms of § 68a. If this argument were to prevail it would, in cases of insolvency, defeat the right of set-off recognized and enforced in the law, as every creditor of the bankrupt holding a claim against the estate subject to reduction to the full amount of a debt due the bankrupt receives a preference in the fact that to the extent of the set-off he is paid in full."

But doubtless if the deposit is not all the time subject to check, but is a deposit against the particular debt, it would amount to a method of paying the debt by "transfer" and would be a preference, if other conditions of a preference also existed. However, the giving to the bank of a check on the deposit to pay the note has been held to be merely the recognition and voluntary exercise of the right of offset already existing and not to be a preference.^{97a}

And the rule is not changed where a bank holds ample security for the debt at the time of bankruptcy, but, by delay, the security depreciates and leaves a deficit: the deposit may still be offset.⁹⁸ And the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition is the date at which the provability is to be tested.⁹⁹ Similarly, it would appear that the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition is the date for determining the status of the deposit;¹ and it has been held that fractions of a day may be disregarded, where substantial justice is thus done;² so that in one case the deposit of a check on the identical day of the filing of the bankruptcy petition, though actually before the filing thereof (especially since it was deposited for collection

§ 1181. Creditor Selling Claim to Effect Indirect Preference by Purchaser's Using Claim as Offset to Purchase Price.—A creditor of the bankrupt cannot avoid the prohibitions of the Act against preferences by assigning his claim to one who in turn uses it as part of the purchase price of assets bought from the bankrupt.⁴

Similarly, a creditor who purchased a portion of the bankrupt's property, whilst the bankrupt's business was in the hands of a creditors' committee (of which the purchasing creditor was a member), has been refused the right of offsetting his claim against the unpaid purchase price.⁵

§ 1182. Offsets Purchased with Knowledge of Insolvency or to Use as Offset, etc., Not Allowable.—But a set-off or counterclaim is not allowable in favor of any debtor of the bankrupt which was purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition, or within four months before such filing, with a view to such use and with knowledge or notice that such bankrupt was insolvent, or had committed an act of bankruptcy.⁶

Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 13 A. B. R. 452, 196 U. S. 502: "To allow the set-off under the circumstances disclosed would violate the plain intendment of the inhibition contained in clause b (2) of § 68. * * * That is to say, whether or not the trust relation was engendered, the result would still be that the tie company, within the prohibited period, and with knowledge of the insolvency of Harrison, acquired the claims of the latter against the laborers, with a view to using the same by way of payment or set-off, so as to obtain an advantage over the other creditors which it was not lawfully entitled to do."

Compare, Hackney v. Hargreaves Bros., 13 A. B. R. 164 (Neb. Sup. Ct.): "A creditor of a bankrupt cannot escape the consequences of the Bankrupt Act regarding unlawful preferences by assigning his account to a purchaser of the property of the bankrupt, under an arrangement whereby such purchaser offers to assume the liability and satisfy such account, contingent upon the purchase of the bankrupt's property and where in the sale of such bankrupt's property as a part of the consideration, such purchaser agrees to and assumes such liability, and reserves from the purchase price an amount sufficient to satisfy the same.

"In such a case the legal effect of the transaction is to appropriate out of the assets of the bankrupt the amount required and used in the satisfaction of such claim by the purchaser assuming the liability, and other essential elements not being lacking, an unlawful preference in favor of such creditor results therefrom."

But the provision is only applicable where the trustee is one of the parties. It is not applicable as between strangers upon claims assigned and claims owing by the bankrupt.⁷

§ 1183. Burden of Proof of Propriety of Offset on Debtor.—The burden of proof is on the debtor seeking to use the offset to show it was received before the bankruptcy and without knowledge of the impending bankruptcy.⁸

§ 1184. Supervening Insolvency Destroying Right of Offset.—Wherever supervening insolvency would destroy the right of set-off, had there been no proceedings in bankruptcy, it will likewise destroy it in bankruptcy. Thus, a creditor who has purchased a portion of the bankrupt's property whilst it was in charge of an advisory creditors' committee, may not offset his claim against the unpaid purchase price;⁹ although, no doubt, the creditor could, by proper proceedings, offset the dividend to which he might be entitled against the unpaid purchase price.

§ 1185. Thus, Stockholding Creditor May Not Offset against Unpaid Subscriptions.—Thus a stockholder who is also a creditor may not offset his claim against his liability for unpaid stock subscription, after the corporation becomes insolvent.¹⁰

Kiskadden v. Steinle, 29 A. B. R. 346, 203 Fed. 374 (C. C. A. Ohio): "However, we think the true interpretation of § 68a and b and of such rule is, that after the corporation becomes insolvent, any sum due upon a stock subscription is impressed with the character of a trust in favor of all the creditors alike, except only such as may have given credit to the company with knowledge of the scheme of stock issue. Hence, to apply such an unpaid subscription as a set-off to an ordinary claim held by the subscriber against the corporation would be to appropriate the rights of the other creditors in the subscription debt to the exclusive benefit of the person owing it; or, on the other hand, it might, as respects his co-stockholders, subject him to the payment of more than his ratable share of the bankrupt's debts. It cannot be said, then, that the debts in question are in their nature both mutual and in the same right; nor that after the bankruptcy there was any reason for enforcing stockholder's liability or Bauman's ratable share thereof except for the equal benefit of all the creditors."

In re Albert Goodman Shoe Co., 3 A. B. R. 200, 96 Fed. 949 (D. C. Penna.): "He cannot be permitted to diminish a fund that he is under obligation to increase and thereby deprive the other creditors of money that it would be his duty immediately to return. If the Company had continued to be solvent, it might or might not have been at liberty, under all circumstances, to set-off his subscription against his liability on the note. That point is not now involved for the fact of insolvency has supervened, and this creates a situation in which the rights of other creditors must also be considered. It would be highly inequitable to allow him to apply a part of the assets for his own benefit, until he has put into the funds money that he justly owes. He must cease to be a debtor before he can enforce his claim as a creditor."

Babbitt v. Read, 23 A. B. R. 254, 173 Fed. 712 (U. S. C. C. N. Y.): "Coming to the second defense, the set-off alleged is not available against the trustee in bankruptcy, because it involves no mutual debt or credit between the stockholder and the estate of the bankrupt, within § 68 of the Bankruptcy Act. Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610, 21 L. Ed. 731. When the Central Trust Company, as trustee under the mortgage, distributes among the bondholders it represents the dividend paid it by the trustee in bankruptcy, so far as the same has been collected from the stockholders, this equity can be adjusted. In that proceeding the paying stockholders will get back whatever they are entitled to as bondholders. The trustee in bankruptcy is not concerned in settling the equities of the bondholders and the stockholders inter sese. If, however, for the protection of creditors other than the bondholders, it should prove necessary to settle these equities in the bankruptcy court, that court has power to do so, because it is necessary for the proper distribution of the bankrupt's estate."

A dividend declared by the bankrupt corporation when not earned, of course may not be offset by a stockholder against the trustee's suit for unpaid stock subscription.¹¹

Nor may a stockholder, after the bankruptcy of the corporation, rescind his stock subscription for fraud or misrepresentation and present his claim for moneys paid by him, for sharing in the bankruptcy dividends; and this is so, notwithstanding the fraud was not discovered before.¹²

Perhaps such instances should rather come under the subject of the creditor's title taken by the trustee.

However, the dividend on the stockholding creditor's claim may, without doubt, be offset against his unpaid subscription.¹³

§ 1186. Supervening Insolvency Creating Right of Offset.—On the other hand wherever supervening insolvency would give rise to the right of set-off, the right is enforceable in bankruptcy.¹⁴

Schuler v. Israel, 120 U. S. 606: "While it may be true that in a suit brought by Israel against the bank it could, in an ordinary action at law, only make plea of set-off of so much of Israel's debt to the bank as was then due, it could by filing a bill in chancery in such a case, alleging Israel's insolvency, and that, if it was compelled to pay its own debt to Israel, the debt which Israel owed it, but which was not due would be lost, be relieved by a proper decree in equity."

And this right may be exercised by the trustee against an insolvent stockholder who is also a creditor.¹⁵

§ 1187. No Judgment against Trustee for Excess of Offset.—But such claims can only be used for set-off—no affirmative judgment for any excess can be rendered against the trustee;¹⁶ although of course the excess may be presented as a claim against the estate.¹⁷

§ 1188. Likewise, No Judgment in Bankruptcy Proceedings against Claimant Where Estate's Claim Exceeds Claimant's.—Likewise there may be no judgment in the bankruptcy proceeding against the claimant where the estate's offset exceeds the creditor's claim. The trustee must seek his remedy by plenary action.¹⁸

APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS.

§ 1189. Application of Payments.—The rights of the parties as to the application of payments remain unimpaired by the debtor's subsequent bankruptcy, and the trustee takes title subject thereto.¹⁹

§ 1190. Thus, Creditor's Right to Apply in Absence of Debtor's Instructions.—The right of a creditor to apply payments as he may desire, in the absence of instructions from the debtor before the application, is unimpaired by the debtor's subsequent bankruptcy; although thereby the creditor is permitted to apply them on an unsecured debt rather than on a secured debt;²⁰ or on a claim not entitled to priority rather than on a priority claim.²¹

But if he apply payments received during the four months period before bankruptcy (limited for avoiding preferences) on wages earned before the statutory period of three months (limited for priority of wages), thus leaving a priority claim for the full amount earned within the statutory three months, he must surrender the preferential payments, for the payments were not made on claims entitled to priority,²² but not, if he did not receive the payments with reasonable grounds of belief, etc.²³ And a creditor may not apply a payment upon an unpaid check where the check was given before and the payment made after, a new invoice of goods was sold on credit to the insolvent, so as to enable him to offset the invoice against the payment as being a "new credit" subsequent to a preference.²⁴

SPECIFIC DEFENSES AND RIGHTS OF BANKRUPT TO WHICH TRUSTEE SUCCEEDS.

§ 1192. Trustee Succeeds to Bankrupt's Defenses and Rights.

—On the other hand, the trustee is entitled to urge all the rights and all the defenses the bankrupt might have urged had there been no bankruptcy.³⁰

Drew v. Myers, 22 A. B. R. 656, 81 Neb. 750: "We think it safe to say that the trustee of a bankrupt may maintain any action which the bankrupt might have maintained but for the intervention of the bankruptcy, and it is not necessary in such a case for him to state that the property already in his hands is insufficient to pay the debts of the bankrupt. It is only when he brings an action which is in the nature of a creditor's bill that he is required to make such an allegation."

Amendment of 1910.—The Amendment of 1910, giving the trustee also the title of a creditor levying process as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court, and of a creditor with execution unsatisfied as to property not in such custody, does not prevent the trustee's succession to all the bankrupt's defenses and rights; the trustee still is entitled to urge all the rights and all the defenses the bankrupt might have urged had there been no bankruptcy.³¹

³¹ Bankr. Act, § 70a.

§ 1193. May Interpose Bar of Statute of Limitations.—The trustee may plead the statute of limitations and indeed it is his duty to do so.³²

In re Wooten, 9 A. B. R. 247, 250, 118 Fed. 670 (D. C. N. Car.): "It is the duty of the trustee to plead the statute of limitations, especially when required by creditors whom he represents."

Impliedly, In re Lorillard, 5 A. B. R. 603, 604, 107 Fed. 677 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Two objections are urged to the allowance of these claims, (a) that they were outlawed at the time the petition was filed. * * * What written statement will be sufficient to take a case out of the operation of the statute of limitations is regulated by the provisions of the New York Code of Civil Procedure. Discussions of the general subject found in the opinions of the Federal courts and of courts of other States are, therefore, unpersuasive. The statute of New York, as interpreted by the New York courts, is controlling."

The fact that the bankrupt, after the filing of the petition, executes an acknowledgment of indebtedness wherein the statute of limitations is waived, does not prevent the trustee from setting up the statute as a bar to such indebtedness.³³

It is also held, that any creditor may interpose the defense;³⁴ but this rule would properly apply only where no trustee had yet been appointed, or where the creditor's special rights, as distinguished from the rights of all the other creditors, are involved.

Whether the trustee in bankruptcy of this estate in such a representative and might interpose such objection for the purpose of preventing the allowance of illegal interest on this claim, need not be determined, for he is not interposing such objection."

In re Stern, 16 A. B. R. 510, 144 Fed. 956 (C. C. A. Iowa): "Under the Statutes of Iowa and the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, § 57 (a), the defense of usury is as available to the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy as to the debtor himself."

But creditors may not interpose the objection, for they do not succeed to the bankrupt's personal privileges, although the trustee does so succeed.

In re Worth, 12 A. B. R. 566, 130 Fed. 927 (D. C. Iowa): "It is the settled rule in Iowa that under these sections the plea or defense of usury is personal to the borrower and cannot be interposed by a stranger to the contract. * * * The objecting creditors in the present case are in no manner parties or privies to the alleged usurious contract of the Sheldon State Bank, in no manner connected therewith, and cannot therefore be heard to interpose the objection of usury thereto."

And the burden of proof rests on the trustee pleading the usury.⁴⁰

§ 1197. May Redeem Mortgaged Property.—So, also, he may exercise the bankrupt's right to redeem mortgaged property;⁴¹ and may do so even after the creditors' time for redemption conferred by State statute had expired, if it is still within the bankrupt's statutory time, although this right usually is held to be purely personal to the debtor and not to inure to creditors.⁴²

§ 1198. May Recover Property Misapplied to Agent's Private Debt.—So, also, he may exercise the right of a principal, on the principal's discovery of the fraud, to recover property belonging to the principal that has been used by his agent with the knowledge of the agent's creditor to pay the agent's own debt.⁴³

§ 1199. Thus, the trustee has been held entitled to counterclaim or offset against a creditor's claim, damages suffered by the bankrupt through the creditor's fraudulent representation inducing the entering into the contract claimed upon; and the words "mutual debts" used in § 68 (a) will include rights of action existing in favor of the bankrupt against a creditor for false representations inducing the bankrupt to enter into a contract for the sale of goods.⁵⁹ And the burden of proof is upon the trustee to establish his counterclaim,⁶⁰ since the claim itself is prima facie established by the deposition for proof of debt introduced in evidence by the creditor.

To hold otherwise would establish the dangerous doctrine that a managing officer of a corporation, having possession of its notes and securities, could dispose of them at will. Finally, it is clear that an attempt upon the part of even a majority of stockholders to divert the corporation assets to purposes wholly outside of the scope of its charter powers, purposes that clearly can inure to no benefit to it or its stockholders and creditors as such, is ultra vires and void. We therefore, for these reasons, find no error in the ruling of the court below that the notes and deed of trust executed by the bankrupt corporation are void as against its creditors."

Act, § 47a (2), provides that the trustee, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, and also as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied. This amendment, whilst still preserving to the trustee all the rights, remedies and powers of the bankrupt, as given in the Bankruptcy Act, § 70, no longer limits him to those rights, but effectually lifts him out of his former contracted position "in the shoes of the bankrupt," and gives to him the rights also of a creditor "armed with process" so that, as previously remarked, in § 1137 et seq., the trustee's title is enlarged, and, instead of being merely the successor to the bankrupt's title, with, of course the peculiar rights conferred by the Bankruptcy Act relative to preferences, etc., and the very limited additional rights of any existing creditor (in some States only if such creditor be "armed with process"), it now includes also whatever rights creditors under State law would have had had they been "armed with process," whether actually so "armed" or not; the trustee being deemed a levying creditor, so far as property in the custody of the bankruptcy court is concerned, and a creditor armed with an execution returned unsatisfied as to property not in such custody.

By this amendment the discussions of §§ 1208, 1209, 1210, 1211, 1212, 1213, 1214, of the first edition of this treatise are displaced, although they are still instructive as explaining the meaning of the Amendment of 1910 in this particular, as well as showing the reasonings of the courts in adopting the former doctrine, and they are accordingly given in substance in the notes to § 1270 together with all later decisions rendered under the law as it stood before the Amendment.

A full discussion of the changes effected by the Amendment of 1910 in the title of the trustee is had, ante, in § 1137 et seq. In accordance with the rules therein enunciated the statement of the trustee's title and rights as successor to the creditors is now as follows, to-wit:

In cases affected by the fraud of the bankrupt towards creditors, as also where there has been some transfer, encumbrance, or holding of the property void as to the bankrupt's creditors or inuring to their benefit by State law, for want of record or otherwise, the trustee succeeds to the rights of any existing creditor already qualified by State law; and, also, as to the property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, the trustee is to be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, and, as to the property not in such custody, is to be deemed vested, as of the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition, with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied.

§ 1208. Trustee's Title and Rights as Successor to Creditors a Three-Fold Subject.—Not only is it true that the title of the trustee is three fold, namely that he takes first the title of the bankrupt, second the title of creditors under state law, and third the peculiar rights conferred by the bankruptcy act to set aside preferential transfers and liens by legal proceedings acquired within four months of the bankruptcy, but it is also to be noted that the second title of the trustee, namely, that which he derives under state law from creditors, is itself a three-fold subject. Thus, as to the trustee's rights as successor to creditors under state law, the trustee has the right to set aside fraudulent transfers and to recover property fraudulently held, this right being guaranteed by § 70 (a) (4), § 70 (e) and § 67 (e) of the Bankruptcy Act; second, he is subrogated to, or clothed with, the rights of any existing creditor as to whom any transaction is voidable, such right being guaranteed to him by § 67 (a), (b), (e) and, as to subrogation, (f) of the Bankruptcy Act; third, the trustee is, by the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47 (a) (2), to be deemed a creditor under state law "armed with process," whether or not, in fact, there be such a creditor actually in existence.

It must, therefore, not be overlooked that the Amendment of 1910 to § 47 (a) 2 of the Act, whereby the trustee is virtually made a creditor "armed with process," does not express all the rights and title of the trustee which he has under local law. For example, the rights he has under the Amendment of 1910 would not antedate the filing of the bankruptcy petition. So, for example, there might be cases where liens were not recorded for a time and yet were ultimately recorded before the filing of the bankruptcy petition. These liens, in most states, would nevertheless be valid and so would not be affected by the Amendment. Yet they could be avoided by the trustee, if, during the period that they were not recorded and within four months of the filing of the bankruptcy petition, some creditor had obtained a lien by legal proceedings thereon, since by Bankruptcy Act, § 67, the trustee would be subrogated to and could enforce the rights of such creditor. Again, as to fraudulently transferred property, or property held under fraudulent trust, the trustee would have right and title thereto, even were it not for the Amendment of 1910, such right and title being given to him by §§ 70 (a) (4), 70 (e) and 67 (e) and in some respects by §§ 67 (a) and 67 (b) these latter sections being aided as to some transactions by the subrogation of liens for the benefit of the estate provided for in § 67 (f).

So the trustee's second title which we are now about to consider—his title as a creditor, or as the successor to creditors, under state law—naturally divides itself into the following sub-heads:

Rights as to fraudulent transfers and holdings, under § 70 (a) (4) and § 70 (e) and § 67 (e).

Rights which some existing creditor actually has acquired and to which the trustee is subrogated under § 67 (a), (b) and (c) as aided by the provisions of § 67 (f) for the preservation for the benefit of the bankrupt estate of otherwise nullified liens.

Rights which are independently conferred by the Amendment of 1910 to § 47 (a) (2) whereby he is to be deemed vested with the rights of a creditor under state law "armed with process."⁶⁹

We will take up these sub-heads in their order.

SUBDIVISION "A."

FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS AND PROPERTY HELD ON FRAUDULENT TRUSTS.

§ 1209. Fraudulently Transferred Property Recoverable.—As to property "affected by the bankrupt's fraud towards creditors," as we have seen in preceding sections [§§ 1137, et seq., 1207, 1208], the title taken by

69. Bankr. Act, § 70 (a) 4: "The trustee shall be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt * * * to all * * * (4) property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors."

Bankr. Act, § 70 (c): "The trustee may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of such bankrupt might have avoided, and may recover the property so transferred, unless he was a bona fide holder for value, prior to the date of the adjudication. Such property may be recovered or its value collected from whoever may have received it, except a bona fide holder for value."

Bankr. Act, § 67 (a): "Claims which for want of record or for other reasons would not have been valid liens as against the claims of the creditor of the bankrupt shall not be liens against his estate."

Bankr. Act, § 67 (b): "Whenever a creditor is prevented from enforcing his rights as against a lien created, or attempted to be created, by his debtor, who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, the trustee of the estate of such bankrupt shall be subrogated to and may enforce such rights of such creditor for the benefit of the estate."

Bankr. Act, § 67 (e): "And all conveyances, transfers or incumbrances of his property made by a debtor at any time within four months prior to the filing of the petition against him, and while insolvent, which are held null and void as against the creditors of such debtor by the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which such property is situate, shall be deemed null and void under this act against the creditors of such debtor if he be adjudged a bankrupt, and such property shall pass to the assignee [trustee] and be by him reclaimed and recovered for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt."

Bankr. Act, § 67 (f) in its latter clauses provides for the trustee's subrogation to liens of creditors obtained by legal proceedings within four months of the bankruptcy and which are therefore null and void under the earlier clause of the section as against the trustee, but as to which some prior transfer or lien upon the property would be itself rendered void under State law though good as to the trustee. Thus § 67 (f) in its earlier clauses "prevent" to use the words of § 67 (f) "the creditor from enforcing his rights as against" the prior transfer or encumbrance, but in its latter clause preserves the lien for the benefit of the estate, this latter clause reading " * * * unless the court shall, on due notice, order the right under such levy, judgment, attachment or other lien shall be preserved for the benefit of the estate; and thereupon the same may pass to and shall be preserved by the trustee for the benefit of the estate as aforesaid."

Bankr. Act, § 47 (a) (2) as Amended in 1910: "and such trustees, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon; and also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied."

the trustee, at no time in the history of the bankruptcy law, has been necessarily that of creditors "armed with process," much less that of the bankrupt himself. As to such property he neither "stands in the shoes of the bankrupt" nor requires "arming with process." To property transferred fraudulently by the bankrupt, the Bankruptcy Act, from its first enactment, always has given direct title to the trustee, in § 70 (a) (4); whilst as to property not "transferred" by the bankrupt, but otherwise held by him or for him in fraud of creditors, the uniform exception in the Supreme Court's decisions, which have stated the rule as to standing "in the bankrupt's shoes" always with the qualification that the trustee so stands only "in cases unaffected by the fraud of the bankrupt towards creditors," disposes, similarly, of the necessity of the existence of creditors "armed with process;" so that the creditor's title taken in cases of fraud has always been fundamentally different from what it has been in other cases where the creditor's title is taken, in other cases the trustee getting (until the Amendment of 1910 gave him better rights) only such title as already had been actually asserted by some creditor.

Property, then, which, according to the state law, has been fraudulently transferred is recoverable by the trustee and the fraudulent transaction may be set aside.⁷⁰ trustee in bankruptcy takes only the title and right of the bankrupt and therefore he cannot assert a right not possessed by the knitting company. It is no new doctrine that the assignee or trustee in bankruptcy stands in the shoes of the bankrupt and that the property in his hands, unless otherwise provided by the Bankrupt Act, is subject to all of the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt. This has been the rule under former acts and is now the rule * * * By § 70 (a) the trustee in bankruptcy is vested, by operation of law, with the title of the bankrupt to all property transferred by operation of law, with the title of the bankrupt to all property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors, and to all property which prior to the filing of the petition might have been levied on and sold by judicial process against him; and by subdivision (e) of the same section, the trustee in bankruptcy may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of the bankrupt might avoid, and may recover the property so transferred or its value. Here are special provisions placing the title of the property transferred by fraud or otherwise, as mentioned, in the trustee in bankruptcy, and giving him the power to avoid the same. * * * The case illustrates the distinction taken between fraud in fact and the mere failure to file a mortgage otherwise valid against the world."

subsec. 4, 30 Stat. 566), provides that the trustee shall be vested by operation of law with any property transferred by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors, the precise language of the Act being 'transferred by him in fraud of his creditors.' There is no four months limitation on this class of transfers, and this provision includes fraudulent conveyances which are so by the common law, by statute law, and by any other recognized rule of law of the State. Of course, the fraudulent bankrupt is without right to set aside a conveyance made by him in fraud of his creditors. It is valid between the parties, but, by operation of the very terms of the Act, the right which before bankruptcy belonged to the creditors passed from them, and is vested in the trustee."

Beasley v. Coggins, 12 A. B. R. 355, 48 Fla. 215, 57 So. Rep. 213: "Section 70 (e) was intended to provide simply that the trustee in bankruptcy should have the same right to avoid conveyances as was possessed by creditors, or any of them, and this with especial reference to the statute of 13 Elizabeth. Under the Bankruptcy Act, when one is thereunder adjudged a bankrupt, creditors are not permitted to attack fraudulent conveyances of their debtor, made more than four months of the adjudication of bankruptcy; and, if the trustee could not do so, then the act would constitute 'a device to permit fraudulent conveyances to take effect with impunity in case they are successfully concealed for the specified four months.' Lewis v. Bishop, 47 App. Div. 554, text, 558, 62 N. Y. Supp. 618. It is only by holding that the trustee is subrogated to the

"A trustee in bankruptcy occupies a relation similar to that of a judgment creditor of the bankrupt, and may file a bill in equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of real estate by the bankrupt, although neither the trustee nor any creditor has reduced any claim against the bankrupt to judgment."

Am. Mach. Co. v. Norment, 19 A. B. R. 679, 157 Fed. 801 (C. C. A. B. N. Car.): "But again we must go a step farther. For these parties to secure from this insolvent lumber company this deed of trust, sufficient to consume the sum total of its assets, to secure debts not its own, but personal ones alone of its principal stockholder and manager; debts of his incurred before its corporate birth, not one dollar of which, so far as shown, it derived any benefit of—not only stamps the transaction outside of the saving subdivision 'd' of § 67 of the act, but clearly brings it within the scope of subdivision 'e' of that section. It must be held a clear fraud upon the rights of creditors, and both the deed of trust and the debt itself must be held void as to such creditors."

In re Carpenter, 11 A. B. R. 147, 125 Fed. 831 (D. C. N. Y.): "The trustee in bankruptcy may take advantage of the invalidity of this instrument the same as a judgment creditor. 6. Bankrupts, commission merchants, by contract do all their commission business in the name of another firm of commission merchants to whom the bankrupts' lease is assigned and who guarantee the consignments and receive a commission for so doing; but the bankrupts continue to occupy the leasehold and attend to the actual management of the business; the other firm claiming, on bankruptcy, to have a factor's lien for advances on the property in the bankrupt's possession; held, not to be a fraudulent device to hinder creditors. Rytenberg v. Schefer, 11 A. B. R. 652, 131 Fed. 313 (D. C. N. Y.).

7. An action, by a purchaser from the trustee, who had purchased the trustee's interest in certain contracts securing commissions as insurance agent which the bankrupt had transferred to his wife. The purchaser recovered on the ground of its being a preference but was refused relief on the other ground of fraudulent conveyance. Bryan v. Madden, 11 A. B. R. 763, 78 N. Y. Supp. 230.

8. One partner of an insolvent firm selling out to the other operates to hinder and delay firm creditors and to subordinate their rights in the partnership assets to the claims of the indi-

Andrews v. Mather, 9 A. B. R. 296, 134 Ala. 358: "Although property which has been fraudulently conveyed ceases to belong to the grantor, so far as any claim he himself can set up is concerned, yet the law regards property which has been fraudulently conveyed, as still the property of the grantor, so far as creditors are concerned. The assignee in bankruptcy is an officer created for the benefit of creditors, and he is permitted to regard property fraudulently conveyed in the same way in which creditors are permitted to regard it."

Mitchell v. Mitchell, 17 A. B. R. 389 (D. C. N. Car.): "A trustee in bankruptcy may avoid a mortgage fraudulent under a bankrupt law. The title attempted to be passed by such mortgage vests in such trustee. He stands in the shoes of the bankrupt, but represents the creditors, and is entitled to possession, and may bring an action to enforce his right of possession. He can maintain any action either could maintain. Such an action is not analogous to a creditor's bill, and it is no objection to it that the claims against the bankrupt are not in judgment. The title is vested in him by operation of law.

"It is argued that the mortgage in controversy being good as between the parties is also good as between the mortgagees and trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor; but the rule is well settled that the trustee represents the rights of creditors, and may attack conveyances made by the bankrupt in fraud of creditors. It is so provided in the statute. The trustee may prosecute any suit to recover assets in the hands of third parties, or to enforce the payment of claims that could have been prosecuted by the creditors themselves had no proceedings in bankruptcy been instituted."

In re Gebbie & Co., 21 A. B. R. 691, 167 Fed. 609 (D. C. Pa.): "As it seems to me the superiority of the trustee's title is clear. the act, that the filing of the petition is something more than the dedication by the bankrupt of his property to the payment of his debts; that the trustee is not only invested with the title of the property, but since, after the filing of the petition, the creditors are powerless to pursue and enforce their rights, the trustee is vested with their rights of action with respect to all property of the bankrupt transferred by him or encumbered by him in fraud of his creditors, and may assail, in behalf of the creditors, all such transfers and encumbrances to the same extent that creditors could have done had no petition been filed. The filing of the petition, followed by seizure and by adjudication in bankruptcy, is a seizure of the property by the law for the benefit of creditors, and an appropriation of it to the payment of the debts of the bankrupt. It is a seizure of the property by legal process, equal in rank to and of the same force and effect as by execution or attachment." The case discloses a want of good faith, resulting in an actual fraud upon the general creditors."

Norcross v. Nathan, 3 A. B. R. 622 (D. C. Nev.): "The trustee in bankruptcy stands in the place of the creditors of the bankrupt, and has the same rights and may pursue the same remedies in their behalf as they could or would have been entitled to if there had been no adjudication in bankruptcy." [This statement was made in connection with property fraudulently transferred.]

In re Gray, 3 A. B. R. 647 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div.): "When, however, the trustee seeks to avoid a fraudulent or any avoidable transfer by the bankrupt antedating the four months, he does so, not in the right conferred as a concomitant to the due operation of the system, but exclusively in the creditors' common-law right. He is, with relation to these anterior transfers, so to speak, subrogated to that right. Such of these anterior transfers as any creditor might have avoided, he may avoid. Such as no creditor could have avoided, he cannot avoid."

A sale, although for present valuable consideration, may be set aside if made with fraudulent intent participated in by the purchaser.⁷¹

Obiter, In re Pease, 12 A. B. R. 68, 129 Fed. 446 (D. C. Mich.): “Even though a present, fair consideration be paid for property transferred to the hindrance, delay of, or in fraud upon creditors, it will not save the conveyance. ‘A sale may be void for bad faith, though the buyer pays the full value of the property bought.’ This is the consequence where his purpose is to aid the seller in perpetrating a fraud upon his creditors, and where he buys recklessly, with guilty knowledge.”

Thomas v. Fletcher, 18 A. B. R. 623, 153 Fed. 226 (D. C. Me.): “I have had occasion before, when issues of this sort have been presented, to refer to Blennerhassett v. Sherman, 105 U. S. 100, in which the court said: ‘It is not enough, in order to support a settlement against creditors, that it be made for a valuable consideration. It must also be bona fide. If it be made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud them, it is void as against them, although there may be in the strictest sense a valuable or even an adequate consideration.’ In Davis v. Schwartz, 155 U. S. 631, Mr. Justice Brown, in speaking for the Supreme court, said: ‘It has been the accepted law ever since Twyne’s Case, 3 Coke, 80, that good faith, as well as a valuable consideration, is necessary to support a conveyance as against creditors. In that case Pierce, being indebted to Twyne in £400, was sued by a third party for £200. Pending such suit, he conveyed all his property to Twyne in consideration of his debt, but continued in possession, sold certain sheep, and set his mark on others. It was resolved to be a fraudulent gift, though the deed declared that it was made bona fide. Most of the cases illustrative of this doctrine, however, have been like that of Twyne, wherein a debtor, knowing that an execution was to be taken out against him, had sold his property to a vendee having knowledge of the facts, for the express purpose of avoiding a levy, or receiving a consideration which could not be reached by execution. In such cases the fact that he receives a good consideration will not validate the transaction, unless at least the creditor has obtained the benefit of the consideration.’”

Thus, the sale, hurriedly, by a retail merchant, of his entire stock of goods, throws the burden upon the purchaser of inquiring into the seller’s financial condition.⁷²

Allen v. McMannes, 19 A. B. R. 276, 156 Fed. 615 (D. C. Wis.): “The sale of an entire stock of goods of a retail merchant is a suspicious circumstance per se, naturally calculated to put the purchaser on inquiry. Walbrun v. Babbitt, 16 Wall. 577, 21 L. Ed. 489; In re Knopf (D. C.), 16 Am. B. R. 432, 146 Fed. 109; Dokken v. Page, 17 Am. B. R. 228, 147 Fed. 438, 77 C. C. A. 674. Such a purchase is presumptively questionable, and casts the burden of proof on the purchaser to show that he had no notice of facts or circumstances sufficient to arrest his attention, puts him on inquiry, and requires him to use such means of knowledge as were at hand in order to learn whether the seller is not in financial difficulty, and whether a general statement, such as that the book accounts are sufficient to pay the mercantile creditors, was true.”

But the mere selling out of the usual course of business is not of itself proof, nor does it make a prima facie case of fraudulent intent, alone considered.^{72a}

And tender of the actual consideration received for the transfer is not necessary when the suit is in behalf of creditors.⁷³ Nor is it necessary to trace the actual consideration paid upon setting aside the purchase of an annuity not yet matured.⁷⁴

Pretended "warehousings" and the pledging of warehouse receipts based thereon, and similar transactions, the debtor retaining possession and power of disposition, are fraudulent and void as against the trustee.⁷⁵

Chattel mortgages with powers of sale, are void as against the trustee where there is no agreement that the proceeds be applied on the debt, where such mortgages are held void as to creditors by the law of the State.⁷⁶

Conditional sales of personal property, where the conditional buyer has the power of selling in the usual course of business, are, in general, void.⁷⁷

Property that never stood in the bankrupt's name may nevertheless be recovered, if title was taken and is held by another on secret trust for him.⁷⁸

Likewise, where goods are nominally sold to a go-between corporation whose stock, all but two shares, is owned by the bankrupt and which was organized for the very purpose of protecting the seller in its dealings with the bankrupt, it has been held that the nominal buyer was the "alter ego" of the bankrupt and that the goods in its possession belonged to the bankrupt estate.⁷⁹

There must exist an intent to hinder, delay or defraud, more than merely the making of the transfer itself necessarily would cause, to render the transfer fraudulent, where the transfer is applied upon a pre-existing debt.⁸⁰

Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 152 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa): "A transfer by an insolvent, within four months prior to the filing of a petition, for the purpose of securing or paying a pre-existing debt, without any intent or purpose to affect other creditors injuriously beyond the necessary effect of the security, is lawful, if not violative of other provisions of law, and it does not evidence any intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors within the meaning of Bankruptcy Act, 1898, § 67e."

The intent need not be actually to cheat and defraud; it is enough if it be to hinder and delay; and it does not alter the legal effect that the debtor honestly believed that by making such conveyance he would be able to continue in business and in time work out of it a profit sufficient to pay all debts; nor that the transferee shared in such belief.

In re Ellertson Co., 23 A. B. R. 530, 174 Fed. 859 (D. C. Va.): "The intent may not be to actually cheat and defraud; it is enough if it be to hinder and delay. A debtor may honestly believe that by making such conveyance of personal property he will be able to continue in business and in time work out of it a profit sufficient to pay all debts existing and that may be incurred in accomplishing this purpose. The favored creditor, to be secured may share in this view and be willing to sell his property on long time thus secured, in order to allow the experiment to be tried. But it is not sound morality nor good law to allow these two to determine the rights of others, or to hinder or delay those others in the enforcement of their rights."

And intent may be gathered from surrounding circumstances.⁸³

But the transfer of exempt property cannot be set aside as fraudulent.⁸⁴

The discharge of the bankrupt does not affect the right of recovery.^{84a}

The trustee may sell his interest in property, which has been fraudulently transferred without having recovered the property.

In re Downing, 27 A. B. R. 228, 201 Fed. 93 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The trustee has a transferable interest in real estate owned by the bankrupt and transferred by him in fraud of his creditors, even though made more than four months prior to the proceedings in bankruptcy and may sell this interest, together with the right vested in him by statute to maintain an action to set aside such fraudulent transfer. The sale is to be made without warranty or representation of any kind and the purchaser takes simply the trustee's interest in the real property and his right to bring an action. The right may be valuable and it may be worthless; whoever buys does so with a full understanding of the character of the claim, he cannot be misled into thinking that the District Court or this court has in any way recognized the validity of the claim by directing that it be sold."

§ 1210. Likewise, Property Not "Transferred" by Bankrupt but Held on Secret Trust for Him.—Likewise property not "transferred" by the bankrupt, but obtained in the name of another for his benefit or otherwise fraudulently held in trust for him, is recoverable by the trustee.⁸⁵

Before the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act, § 47 (a) (2), giving the trustee the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor under state law armed with process, it was doubted, in some decisions, whether under Bankr. Act, § 70 (a) (4) and (e) the trustee could take property held under fraudulent trust for the bankrupt but which had never been in the bankrupt's name and hence never had been "transferred" by him, the Bankr. Act, §§ 70 (a) (4) and (c), and 67 (e), under which he derived his rights as against fraudulent transactions referring only to fraudulent "transfers" by the bankrupt, such decisions, however, conceding that he might do so under Bankr. Act, § 67 (a) and (f), if a creditor armed with process existed, to whose right he might be subrogated.

R. 255, 90 Minn. 74; Merrill v. Hussey, 16 A. B. R. 816, 64 Atl. (Me.) 819, in which case title was fraudulently taken in the name of another.

Analogously, London v. Epstein, 24 A. B. R. 557, 123 App. Div. N. Y. 399: "In fine, the difficulty in the way of the plaintiff is that the fee never was in the bankrupt, but always in third parties; that neither legal nor equitable interest in this property ever existed in the bankrupt; that he 'had no remaining right on which, through judgment and execution, creditors could by any process fasten a specific lien.' The statute that declares the resulting trust is solely for the benefit of certain creditors and makes against 'the property of a third party which the debtor never owned.'"

But such was doubtless a too narrow construction of the extent of the Bankruptcy Act's provisions relative to fraudulent transactions even before the Amendment of 1910 unless the State law required the existence of a levying creditor in such instances; for property held on secret trust for the bankrupt was recoverable by the trustee as being the bankrupt's property, the fraudulent holding in another's name not making it any the less his property.

However, the question is practically set at rest by the Amendment of 1910, to § 47 (a) (2), for by that Amendment the trustee is endowed with all the rights of a creditor under state law, among which would be found always the right to subject property held on fraudulent trust for the bankrupt though never standing in the bankrupt's name.

§ 1211. Constructively Fraudulent Though Not Actually So.— That the transaction is merely "fraudulent in law," without intentional bad faith, does not alter the rule.⁸⁶

R. 671, 162 Fed. 675): "While there was a finding that no intentional bad faith was shown, still we agree with the Court of Appeals and the district judge that, under the law of Wisconsin, as construed by her highest court, such conditions as were contained in these mortgages rendered them fraudulent in law and void as to creditors. * * * In this case the stipulations of the mortgages practically permitted the mortgagor to dispose of the property for his own benefit except that it must make certain provisions for a sinking fund and interest on the bonds; and, with the consent of the trustee, no provision need be made for the sinking fund, or interest, and the moneys which otherwise would have been placed therein for the purchase of bonds might be applied for the benefit of the mortgagor, whether as dividends or for the benefit of its business and property. Such provisions are clearly within the Wisconsin decisions, for they permit the mortgagor to have the benefit of the property, to keep it in his possession, and to appropriate the proceeds to his own use. The Wisconsin decisions render such mortgages invalid as to creditors, because the effect of such provisions is to give the beneficial use of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor in possession, and to make possible the use of the mortgage as a protection against creditors of the mortgagor when they shall undertake to assert their rights.

86. See same doctrine, § 1257, et seq.

"But it is said the trustee in bankruptcy may not defend against these mortgages. It is contended that they are good as between the parties, and that as to them the trustee in bankruptcy occupies no better position than the bankrupt."

"The principles announced in Security Warehousing Co. v. Hand, 206 U. S. 415, 19 Am. B. R. 291, when applied to the present case are decisive of the question here presented. Under the Wisconsin statutes and decisions of the highest court of that State the conditions contained upon the face of this mortgage were such as to render it fraudulent in law and void as to creditors, and prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy the property might have been levied upon and sold by judicial process against the bankrupt.

"It is true that in Security Warehousing Co. v. Hand the court said that the attempted pledge was a 'mere pretense, a sham;' but the courts of Wisconsin have held that such provisions as are in these mortgages, giving the bankrupt the right to dispose of the mortgaged property for its own benefit, rendered the conveyance fraudulent in law, and therefore void as to creditors. This brings the conveyance within the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, as one which the trustee may attack, as conclusively as it would if fraudulent intent in fact were shown to exist." Quotations from this decision are further found at § 1258; and, on questions of procedure, at § 2875 and § 2969.

§ 1211½. Fraudulent or Preferential Transfers by State Law Inuring to Benefit of All Creditors, Whether So Inure in Bankruptcy.

—Fraudulent or preferential transfers declared by State law, as matter of substantive law and not merely as remedial law, to inure to the benefit of all creditors, will operate to the benefit of all creditors in Bankruptcy.⁸⁷ trust deed, moreover, was void under the statute of West Virginia to the extent that it sought to prefer one creditor over another, provided the same was assailed within four months of the recordation thereof, and by reference to § 67 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act such invalidity is expressly recognized."

In re Kohler, 20 A. B. R. 89, 159 Fed. 871 (C. C. A. Ohio): "Sections 6343 and 6344 of the Revised Statutes of Ohio regulate the recovery and distribution of property conveyed in fraud of creditors. Section 6343 provides that every sale or transfer procured by a debtor to be rendered with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, shall be declared void as to creditors of such debtor at the suit of any creditor or creditors 'as hereinafter provided,' and shall operate as an assignment and transfer of all the property and effects of such debtor, and shall inure to the equal benefit of such creditor or creditors in proportion to the amount of their respective demands, including those which are unmatured. Section 6344 provides that any creditor, as to whom any of the acts prohibited in § 6343 are void, 'whether the claim of such creditor has matured or will thereafter mature,' may commence an action to have such act declared void, and such court shall appoint a trustee, who shall proceed by due course of law to recover possession of all property so sold, etc., 'and to administer the same for the equal benefit of all creditors,' as in other cases of assignment to trustees for the benefit of creditors. These sections appear to us to provide clearly that where property is conveyed in fraud of creditors, it may be recovered by a trustee 'for the equal benefit of all creditors,' and we understand this to mean for the equal benefit of all creditors, not part of them, not simply those existing at the time the transfer was fraudulently made."

Clingman v. Miller, 20 A. B. R. 360, 160 Fed. 326 (C. C. A. Kans.): "The law of Kansas does not prohibit preferences, but it does say that if a debtor makes a deed of general assignment for the benefit of his creditors he must treat all alike, and that he cannot evade this prohibition of the statute by making simultaneously with the deed of assignment a separate transfer which creates a preference. The preference would be void if contained in the deed of assignment, and it is no less so because made outside of it, but at the same time and as a part of the same transaction. The intent of Pendleton is the true and guiding principle. As was said in Lumber Co. v. Ott, supra, at page 630: 'With what intent did Ott in this case execute the various instruments prior to the general assignment? Was he intending a general assignment, and seeking to evade the statute, and to give preferences by other instruments? Or was he, finding himself involved and likely to be closed out by some of his creditors, simply preferring some, uncertain as to what disposition he should make of the balance of his property after they had been secured?' The knowledge, or want of knowledge, of the purpose and intent of Pendleton at the time of the transfer by Miller & Co. is immaterial under the laws of Kansas; otherwise, the prohibition of the statute would be rendered useless."

Thus, preferential transfers under the New York Stock Corporation Law have repeatedly been held available to creditors in bankruptcy.⁸⁸

Again, where State law declares to be preferential a transfer which is not preferential under the Bankrupt Act, the trustee in bankruptcy may succeed to the rights of any creditor who has already instituted proceedings under the State law, and the lien of such proceedings may be preserved; for example, where by State law the transfer of individual property by one member of a partnership, not himself adjudged bankrupt, is held to be preferential as to the firm creditors.⁸⁹ So, also, as to voidable sales under the New Jersey "Act to prohibit sales of merchandise in bulk in fraud of creditors."⁹⁰

In such instances it seems that the four months limitation does not apply.⁹¹

But it is well settled that the United States alone can complain of a violation of § 5201, Rev. Stat., which, in some instances, prohibits a national bank from accepting a pledge of its own capital stock.⁹² Nor does this statute prohibit a national bank from accepting its capital stock as security, where such action is necessary for the protection of a pre-existing debt to secure the bank against loss.⁹³

§ 1212. "Creditor Armed with Process" Not Requisite.—In suits by the trustee to recover property fraudulently transferred, it is not requisite that there exist a creditor "armed with process," the Bankruptcy Act itself, in § 70 (a) (+), specifically providing that title to such property shall pass to the trustee.^{93a}

Thomas v. Roddy, 19 A. B. R. 873, 122 App. Div. 857, 107 N. Y. Supp. 473: "The trustee, by this provision of the act, is invested with the title of all property of the bankrupt transferred by him in fraud of creditors, unless his right in this respect is restricted—which I do not believe it is—by subdivision e. The policy of the act is to secure an equal distribution of all property of the bankrupt among all his creditors. For that purpose the trustee represents all the creditors and may maintain an action to set aside any transfer which any creditor could or which any creditor might acquire by any process taken by him. Matter of McNamara, 2 Am. any individual creditor could have done so or not. Platt v. Matthews, 10 Fed. 280; Matter of Leland, 10 Blatchf. 503. Judge Wallace, who delivered the opinion in the Matthews case, concluded by saying: 'Numerous other authorities might be cited to sustain the position that an assignee may proceed to recover property transferred in fraud of creditors whether any creditor was in a position to attack the transfer or not, and that his title accrues by force of the act, and not through the rights of the creditor to assert the fraud.' The same view was entertained by the Court of Appeals in Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424. There the court had under consideration the construction to be put upon chapter 314 of the Laws of 1858 in connection with the Bankruptcy Act of 1867. The provisions of that act are somewhat similar to the one under consideration in so far as relates to the maintenance of an action by an assignee or a trustee, irrespective of the rights of individual creditors. The court, speaking through Judge Allen, said: 'Upon sound reason and the policy of the law, as well as the authorities quoted and others that might be referred to, there can be no doubt, we think, that the plaintiff as assignee has a right of action for property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors, although none of the creditors have acquired a specific lien. It is not such liens, or any particular interest in the property, or an interest for the benefit of any one creditor or class of creditors, that is vested in the assignee, but the entire property fraudulently transferred and for the benefit of all the creditors. The assignee takes title not under any claim of right existing in the creditors, but under the statute, and that right he may assert by action, although no individual creditor, or all the creditors combined, could have a standing in court to challenge the conveyance.' Therefore, it seems to me, even though it be held, as contended, that the complaint does not show that any of the creditors whose claims were filed in the bankruptcy proceeding were in a position to attack the transfers, nevertheless, the trustee may do so. This must be so if the reasoning in the authorities cited be sound. To hold that a trustee cannot attack a fraudulent conveyance made by the bankrupt more than four months before the filing of the petition, without showing that some creditor had obtained a judgment and issued execution thereon, so that he could maintain a similar action, would be simply to provide an easy and convenient method for a dishonest debtor to dispose of his property. In that case the debtor could fraudulently dispose of all his property more than four months before bankruptcy proceedings were instituted, and unless some creditor—intermediate the disposition of the property and the filing of the petition in bankruptcy—had put himself in position to attack the fraudulent transfers by obtaining a judgment, issuing an execution and having the same returned unsatisfied, the trustee would be powerless to reach the property fraudulently disposed of."

Thus, the trustee may bring an action for trespass on the case based on a conspiracy to fraudulently secrete and transfer the bankrupt's property.⁹⁴ Likewise he may proceed to set aside chattel mortgages with power of sale.⁹⁵

But property fraudulently bought and held in the name of another, title never having been in the bankrupt, was held before the Amendment of 1910, not recoverable by the trustee under the New York statutes, since the trustee was not in the position of a judgment creditor whose remedies

§ 1213. Badges of Fraud Considered Together, Not Separately.—Badges of fraud are to be considered together, not separately.⁹⁷

Houck v. Christy, 18 A. B. R. 330, 152 Fed. 612 (C. C. A. Kans.): "Moreover, we think the evidence before recited brings the case well within the rule that badges of fraud, altogether inconclusive if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient to constitute conclusive proof of fraudulent intent on the part of both vendor and vendee."

Orr v. Park, 25 A. B. R. 544, 183 Fed. 683 (C. C. A. Ga.): "Dunn Bros. remaining in possession of the goods, continuing business, and selling goods, just as before the mortgage was made; their failure to sign the mortgage and have it witnessed until from one to three months after it purports to have been made; their possession of the mortgage subsequent to their signing it; and the withholding it from record—are badges of fraud which were sufficient, in our opinion, to warrant the judgment and finding of the referee that the mortgage was made to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of said Dunn Bros., and was null and void, in which judgment and finding we concur."

§ 1213½. Great Latitude in Admission of Evidence.—Questions of fraud can scarcely ever be proved by direct evidence, and great latitude is to be allowed in the admission of all the circumstances fairly connected with the case.⁹⁸

§ 1213¾. Conspiracy to Defraud.—Action may be brought by the trustee against several defendants for conspiracy to defraud creditors,⁹⁹ although it is held in one case that it must appear that property was actually taken.¹ However, the latter holding seems to lose sight of § 70 (a) (6), which passes title to the trustee to "rights of action arising * * * from the unlawful taking or detention of, or injury to" the bankrupt's property.

At any rate, such action may not be brought in the District Court if it be a suit merely for damages for the conspiracy and not a suit to recover property, or the value of property wrongfully transferred by the bankrupt.²

§ 1214. Fraudulent Transfers before Four Months of Bankruptcy.—Even fraudulent transfers made previously to the four months period may be set aside at the suit of the trustee and the assets held for creditors.³

Beasley v. Coggins, 12 A. B. R. 355, 48 Fla. 215 (Sup. Ct. Fla.): "Under the Bankruptcy Act, when one is thereunder adjudged a bankrupt, creditors are not permitted to attack fraudulent conveyances of their debtor, made more than four months of the adjudication of bankruptcy; and, if the trustee could not do so, then the act would constitute 'a device to permit fraudulent conveyances to take effect with impunity in case they are successfully concealed for the specified four months.'"

Obiter, Babbitt v. Kelley, 9 A. B. R. 338 (St. Louis Ct. App.): "A trustee in bankruptcy may sue to set aside a conveyance made by a bankrupt in actual fraud of creditors earlier than four months prior to the instituting of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and in fact is only barred by the limitation period which would bar creditors whom he represents."

Thus as to "voluntary conveyances" by way of gift, to hinder and delay creditors,⁴ or transfers for nominal considerations, for the same purpose, as, for example, to avoid levy of attachment.⁵

So, also, it seems that the trustee may sell his interest in property so transferred, together with the right to bring action for its recovery.⁶

§ 1215. Fraudulent Transfers before Passage of Bankruptcy Act.—Also fraudulent transfers made before the passage of the Bankruptcy Act itself may be set aside.⁷

§ 1215 $\frac{1}{2}$. Insolvency, Whether Requisite.—There are several different sections of the Bankruptcy Act giving rights to the trustee as to property fraudulently transferred. Thus, § 70 (a) (4) vests title in the trustee to all “property transferred by him [the bankrupt] in fraud of his creditors.” Again, § 70 (e) provides that “the trustee may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of such bankrupt might have avoided.” Section 67 (e) also has two clauses somewhat differing in their provisions as to fraudulent transfers, but both limited to transfers occurring within four months preceding the bankruptcy. The first of these clauses [discussed post at § 1493, et seq.] does not require, in hæc verbis, proof of insolvency in order to establish a prima facie case, but the second clause does require such proof, in the following words:

“And all conveyances, transfers or incumbrances of his property made by a debtor at any time within four months prior to the filing of the petition against him, and while insolvent, which are held null and void as against the creditors of such debtor by the laws of the state, Territory or District in which such property is situate, shall be deemed null and void under this act against the creditors of such debtor, if he be adjudged a bankrupt,” etc.

In general, then, it would appear that, where the action is brought under favor of the general provisions of § 70 or under the first clause of § 67 (3), insolvency is not a requisite element, though generally necessary in practice as a matter of evidence to establish fraudulent intent.

Obiter, Spencer v. Nekemoto, 24 A. B. R. 517 (D. C. Hawaii): “Under the allegation that the payment to Nekemoto was made with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, proof of insolvency is not essential, under § 67 (e), covering this point, although insolvency would appear to be generally an existing condition where there is an attempt to defraud creditors.”

§ 1216. Transfer Itself Creating the Insolvency.—The insolvency may have been created by the transfer itself.⁸

Spencer v. Nekemoto, 24 A. B. R. 517 (D. C. Hawaii): “If he was not insolvent then, his payment of these notes made him so and would seem to have brought his case within Bankruptcy Act, § 67 (e).”

§ 1217. Complicity of Transferee to Be Shown.—Unless complicity of the transferee in the fraudulent intent be shown, proof of the debtor's fraudulent intent alone is insufficient;⁹ unless the action be brought under Bankr. Act, § 67 (e).^{9a}

Bush v. Export Storage Co., 14 A. B. R. 142, 138 Fed. 914 (D. C. Tenn.): "It may be affirmed to be true, as a general proposition, that under any State system of jurisprudence it is necessary, in order to set aside a conveyance or transfer of property as fraudulent against creditors, that the fraud must have been participated in by the vendee or purchaser as well as the vendor. If there are some exceptions, or apparent exceptions, they are not important."

The fact that the creditors have taken no affirmative or independent action to collect their claims, but simply have accepted the advantages which the fraudulent debtor has voluntarily given them for his own purposes and as a part of the fraudulent scheme, does not dispense with the necessity of proving participation of the transferee in the intent.¹⁰

And the transferee will not necessarily be exonerated by the fact that he shared the transferor's belief that the transfer, though it might delay creditors for the present, yet in the end would enable the debtor to pay all debts and extricate himself safely.¹¹

The transferee need not, however, be an active participant in the fraud.¹²

If however, the transfer were made within the four months preceding bankruptcy, then, under § 67 (e), proof solely of the bankrupt's fraudulent intent is sufficient to make a prima facie case, it being matter of defense to prove the transfer to have been made in good faith and for a presently passing consideration.¹³

§ 1218. Transferee Innocent but Consideration from Him Purely Executory.—If the transferee be entirely innocent yet the consideration moving from him be wholly executory, as, for example, a mere promise to do something at a future time not yet arrived, it has been held that the fraud of the transferor alone will suffice to avoid the transfer, and the trustee may recover the property transferred.^{13a}

Blanchard v. Tyler, 12 Mich. 339, 86 Am. Dec. 57:" We are strongly inclined to think, from the testimony of Hearse himself, who was sworn in his own behalf, that he was well aware of the nature of the title, and of the attempted fraud of Tyler, and that he took the conveyance for the very purpose of aiding Tyler in the perpetration of the fraud upon the complainant. But whether he did so or not, or whether he had full notice at the time, is immaterial. He paid nothing to Tyler at the time. Tyler was owing him, he says, seven dollars and fifty cents which was to apply on the purchase, and he gave him a note, not negotiable, for $600, less the last mentioned sum. This note, it was understood, should be paid by turning out other notes. This, it is claimed, was done, but not till some considerable time afterwards. Yet he admits that immediately after the sale to him he was fully informed of the nature of the title. Whatever he paid, therefore, was after such notice; and such payment, if in fact any notes of value were turned out, was made in his own wrong and he must bear the loss."

Haughwout v. Murphy, 21 N. J. Eq. 118: "It is held that a bona fide purchaser without notice is only protected so far as the purchase money is actually paid before notice. That securities have been given for the payment is not sufficient to protect him."

Kitteridge v. Chapment, 36 Iowa 348: "An actual payment given is necessary to the character of a subsequent bona fide purchaser for value and giving a security or existing bond or other obligation for payment is not sufficient. (Cases cited.) In holding that actual payment is generally necessary to the character of a purchaser for value, we do not mean to decide that where the purchaser has executed negotiable securities which have been actually negotiated, so as to render him liable thereon, to the holder, he would not, in such case be entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser, but that actual payment, or what is equivalent thereto, before notice, is indispensable to the character of a purchaser for a valuable consideration."

merely preferential transfer may turn out to be a fraudulent transfer by proof of a secret trust.¹⁶

Van Iderstine v. National Discount Co., 29 A. B. R. 478, 227 U. S. 575: "Conveyances may be fraudulent because the debtor intends to put the property and its proceeds beyond the reach of his creditors; or because he intends to hinder and delay them as a class; or by preferring one who is favored above the others. There is no necessary connection between the intent to defraud and that to prefer, but inasmuch as one of the common incidents of a fraudulent conveyance is the purpose on the part of the grantor to apply the proceeds in such manner as to prefer his family or business connections, the existence of such intent to prefer is an important matter to be considered in determining whether there was also one to defraud. But the two purposes are not of the same quality either in conscience or in law, and one may exist without the other. The statute recognizes the difference between the intent to defraud and the intent to prefer, and also the difference between a fraudulent and a preferential conveyance. One is inherently and always vicious; the other innocent and valid, except when made in violation of the express provision of a statute. One is malum per se and the other malum prohibitum,—and then only to the extent that it is forbidden. A fraudulent conveyance is void regardless of its date; a preference is valid unless made within the prohibited period. It is therefore not in itself unlawful to prefer, nor fraudulent for one, though insolvent, to borrow in order to use the money in making a preference. So that, even if the Discount Company knew that Fellerman borrowed the money in order to pay off an honest debt the transfer would not have been subject of attack by the trustee, except for the fact that a petition in bankruptcy was filed within four months thereafter. But the institution of such proceedings did not relate back and convert a lawful transfer into a fraudulent conveyance."

§ 1221. Mortgages Withheld from Record.—Mortgages purposely withheld from record in order to give false credit are void in bankruptcy as against the trustee, where void by state law.

Mortgages eventually filed before bankruptcy, but withheld for a period from record by agreement for the purpose of giving credit, are void in bankruptcy, where void under the State law.¹⁷

Compare, Rogers v. Page, 15 A. B. R. 502, 140 Fed. 596 (C. C. A. Tenn.): "The mere fact that a mortgage has, by negligence been omitted from registration does not avoid it as between parties. Obiter, Mattley v. Wolfe, 23 A. B. R. 673, 175 Fed. 619 (D. C. Neb.), reversed on other grounds, Mattley v. Geisler, 26 A. B. R. 116, 187 Fed. 970 (C. C. A.): "This mortgage was not recorded for over eight months after it was given, and this was pursuant to an agreement that, because it would injure the mortgagor's credit, the mortgage was not to be filed unless the mortgagor was about to get into difficulty with his creditors, in which case the mortgagor was to notify Wolfe, so that he might file his mortgage. About seven months before his adjudication as a bankrupt, Parker had also given a chattel mortgage to one McWhinney on his stock of goods and fixtures to secure a note given by him for money loaned to him by McWhinney. This mortgage was withheld from record pursuant to a similar agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee that, because it would injure Parker's credit, the mortgage was not to be filed except in case some creditor threatened trouble. The note and mortgage were twice renewed, and substantially the same understanding was had between the mortgagor and mortgagee with reference to the filing of these renewal mortgages. By § 67a of the Bankruptcy Act * * *: Claims which for want of record or for other reasons would not have been valid liens as against the claims of the creditors of the bankrupt shall not be liens against his estate. The validity of the claim which is thus to be tested is determined by law of this State. * * * Such an agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of Nebraska, renders the mortgage fraudulent as to certain creditors. Those creditors who can avoid the mortgage as fraudulent are those who have been misled by the keeping of the mortgage from record, and during the interim between its execution and recording have extended credit to the mortgagor on the faith that the mortgagor was the owner of such property. * * * There is no proof in this case that any creditors extended credit to Parker during the time the mortgages were withheld from record or in the belief that he was the owner of the property mortgaged."

But in Iowa, Kentucky and probably other states there must be showing made that it was withheld by agreement or that prejudice resulted from the withholding.¹⁸ And such mortgages are void in Georgia only as to innocent parties becoming creditors meantime.¹⁹

Likewise, apparently in Iowa. Compare, Post v. Berry, 23 A. B. R. 699, 175 Fed. 564 (C. C. A. Iowa).

Though both chattel and real estate mortgages are equally void if withheld to give false credit, yet a distinction is to be noted between them as to the necessity for showing such fraudulent intent; for even without the aid of the Amendment of 1910 "arming the trustee with process," in some states a chattel mortgage is void if merely withheld, whilst in most of the states the mere withholding of a real estate mortgage is not sufficient unless it be done with intent to obtain credit or unless some other fraudulent intent exists. Thus, in New York it is unnecessary to show the withholding of a chattel mortgage to have been done with fraudulent intent or that prejudice resulted, for such withholding, of itself, makes the mortgage void, unless it is explained as necessary;²⁰ whilst, in the same state, as to real estate mortgages it further must be shown that the withholding resulted in inducing credit, so as to estop the mortgagee.²¹

In re Hunt, 14 A. B. R. 416, 139 Fed. 283 (D. C. N. Y.): "In short, it is not made to appear that the nonfiling of the mortgage either induced any person to give credit to Hunt or forbear suit or bankruptcy proceedings. If the evidence established that Honeywell, president of the bank, mortgagee, kept secret and withheld the mortgage from record for the purpose of allowing the four months to run so as to defeat the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act relating to preferences, and intended so to do when he took it, this court would hold that such acts were in fraud of the Act and rendered the mortgage void. * * *

"I cannot find from this evidence that the failure to record the mortgage was accompanied by such acts on the part of the mortgagee or of its agents that a fictitious credit was given to Hunt, now the bankrupt, or that the acts of the defendant induced any creditor to forego any right. The defendant is not estopped from asserting the mortgage."

But such mortgages are not void in some states unless actual fraudulent intent is proved²² or actual levy has been made by some creditor before record;²³ and are void, in South Carolina, only as to parties becoming creditors in the meantime, but as to them are void whether they be simple contract creditors or levying creditors.²⁴

In other states, a mortgage withheld from record is void as against a

Thus, a chattel mortgage withheld from record for only three months and through the carelessness of an attorney was held absolutely void as against the receiver in bankruptcy. In re Schmidt, 24 A. B. R. 687, 181 Fed. 73 (C. C. A. N. Y.).

creditor becoming such after the execution and before the recording, whether such creditor be "armed with process" or not; and the trustee succeeds to such right.²⁵

And where withheld from record, but not by agreement with the mortgagor, the mortgage may not be void;²⁶ but, at any rate, the withholding from record is a circumstance to be considered as indicating fraud.²⁷ And the failure to record a deed given as security where invalid by State law is invalid in bankruptcy.²⁸

And the renewing of a real estate mortgage by giving a new one within every six months in order to comply with a statute requiring recording within six months of the date of execution, but the keeping of the entire series of renewals off the record, is a fraudulent scheme and is void as to creditors and the trustee, although the last renewal was recorded within the six months of its execution and before bankruptcy.²⁹

But in one case, a real estate mortgage which was not recorded until after the mortgagor's bankruptcy, but had not been withheld to give false credit, was held good.³⁰ And chattel mortgages so withheld are, "a fortiori," void as against the trustee, where void by state law as against simple contract creditors who become such during the interval.³¹

Obiter, McAtee v. Shade, 26 A. B. R. 151, 185 Fed. 442 (C. C. A. Mo.): "That the mortgage would be void as to those creditors, if any, who extended credit to the bankrupt after it was made and before it was recorded, seems clear."

In re Wade, 26 A. B. R. 169, 185 Fed. 664 (D. C. Mo.): "But failure to record may be cured as to prior creditors—that is to say, those existing at the time the mortgage was given—if the mortgagee take the property into his possession before such creditors have thus intervened, and, in that case, no lien in favor of such creditors is impressed upon the property in the hands of the trustee.

"But not so in the case of subsequent creditors; that is to say, those whose rights have intervened between the giving of the mortgage and its admission to record. As to such creditors the mortgage is absolutely void, and an equity in favor of such creditors is impressed upon the property which follows it into the hands of the trustee in bankruptcy.

"The fact that the general creditor may, subsequent to the origin of his debt, receive notice of a secret mortgage, will not destroy his right which accrued prior to the notice. The creditor does not have to show that he was injured by the concealment of the mortgage; the statute assumes injury and deception and itself avoids the mortgage. The mortgagor need not have a fraudulent intent, as the statute requires no such condition. Taking possession after fraud is committed will not nullify it. So that the statute exactly meets and fully protects one who extended credit to a mortgagor in possession of the property and the mortgage not recorded."

But the debt itself may be proved, if otherwise valid, the claim upon the withheld mortgage being waived,³² or being adjudicated invalid.³³

And such withholding is held to operate by way of estoppel, even as against creditors not "armed with process" the mortgagee being estopped from asserting his lien by virtue of having given false appearance of ownership.

Clayton v. Exch. Bank, 10 A. B. R. 173, 121 Fed. 630 (C. C. A. Ga.): "Up to the very moment that Josephson filed his petition in bankruptcy, both he and the bank, so far as actions could speak—and they often speak more forcibly than words—asserted that the property of the former was not mortgaged. Both seemingly profited by this course. It seems to us inequitable to permit the bank at the last moment to produce the mortgages, and contradict the assertions made by the conduct of both the mortgagor and the mortgagee, to the injury of those who were misled and deceived. It has been said that, if one is silent when he should speak, he will not be permitted to speak when he should be silent; and is it not also just to say that if one, for improper motive, refuses to claim openly under a mortgage when duty to others requires him to do so, he shall not be permitted to assert such claim when justice to others forbids?"

In re Tysor-Cheatham Mercantile Co., 24 A. B. R. 434, 178 Fed. 733 (D. C. Ga.): "Now, is it not true, in view of that reasoning, that if the general creditors—the unsecured creditors of the mercantile corporation here—knew at the very moment of its organization it had conveyed away by mortgage, not only the storehouse in which the business was to be conducted; that it had no other property, that all credit would have been refused? I think there can be scarcely a doubt of it. And if the paper is treated as a mortgage, so far as the rights of subsequent creditors are concerned, that mortgage ought to have been put upon the record, so that they would have the constructive notice of its existence. This seems wise; otherwise, men might be induced to part with their values to irresponsible purchasers, when, if the instruments had been properly registered, they could examine the records in the clerk's office and ascertain whether or not the would-be purchaser had that degree of solvency which he claimed to have."

Whether further proof must be made that the withholding actually did cause the giving of credit in reliance upon the appearance of unrestricted ownership, such as proof of a search of the public record, is to be decided in accordance with the state law.

§ 1222. Conditional Sales Contracts Withheld from Record.—Conditional sales contracts purposely withheld from record to give credit follow the same rules applicable to chattel mortgages, where subject to such rules by State law. Thus they are void in Maine.

In re Perkins, 19 A. B. R. 134, 155 Fed. 237 (D. C. Me.): "The facts in the case at bar disclose that the nonrecording of a 'conditional sales contract' was not a mere matter of omission. It was in pursuance of a distinct plan that there should be no record of this contract; but that the wagons should appear to be the property of the vendee. The lien was never attempted to be brought to light until after the failure of the bankrupt and his voluntary assignment. The vendee was put into possession of the wagons, of which he was apparently the absolute owner. * * * He also cites York Manufacturing Co. v. Cassell, supra, in which the decision is based somewhat upon Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 Am. B. R. 437, 25 Sup. Ct. 660, 49 L. Ed. 577. In that case, in speaking for the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Peckham said: 'Under the present Bankrupt Act the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt, except in cases where there has been a conveyance or incumbrance of the property which is void as against the trustee by some positive provision of the act.' But the case at bar is not 'unaffected by fraud.' The facts bring it distinctly within the rule given by Judge Wallace in re Garcewich, supra. In coming to a conclusion, the court gets little assistance from the line of cases which hold that, in equity, for certain purposes, the trustee merely stands in the shoes of the bankrupt, and takes all property subject to valid liens; for the case at bar does not disclose a 'valid lien,' but rather an attempted lien which is invalid and fraudulent."

an equitable lien—a something which is neither a mortgage nor a conditional sale, but a partial reservation of interest on the part of the vendor, not obnoxious to any law of the State of New York, and within the equity of the Bankruptcy Act as interpreted in the case last cited. It must be admitted that no actual fraud is shown or suspected in this transaction, and that the courts of this State have gone far in upholding the validity of hypothecations of personal property even where the goods which are hypothecated were to be turned into money by the mortgagor, bailee, or conditional vendee, provided it was also agreed that the proceeds of such sale or use were to be applied in diminution of the debt secured by the goods themselves. Prentiss Tool, etc., Co. v. Schirmer, 136 N. Y. 304, 32 N. E. 849, 32 Am. St. Rep. 737. But I am not aware that it has been doubted since Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y., § 424, that where a right existed in a chattel mortgagor to sell the mortgaged property and use the proceeds thereof generally in his own business is (however honest in intent) a fraud upon the law. The wholesome rule is summarily stated in Re Garcewich, 8 A. B. R. 149, 115 Fed. 87, that when property is delivered to a vendee for consumption or sale, or to be dealt with in any way inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, the transaction cannot be upheld as a conditional sale and is a fraud upon the creditors of the vendee. That rule in my judgment applies to this case. While I think as above indicated that the transaction is really a mortgage, and as such void for want of filing, yet it makes no difference whether it be denominated in one way or another it still remains true that the filatures in question were delivered to the bankrupt with obvious intent that they should be used and consumed in the ordinary course of that bankrupt's business, and for the benefit thereof. Secret liens are to be discouraged, and where, even innocently, vendors seeking to create such liens permit so obvious a badge of fraud as here appears to exist in their contracts, they must take the legal consequences, and the matter is not bettered by a name. An equitable lien which involves a fraud upon the law is none the less obnoxious because so different in form from the better known mortgage or conditional sale as hardly to fall under either well-known category."

§ 1224½. Transfers of Exempt Property, Whether May Be Fraudulent.—It has been held that creditors may not complain of transfers of exempt property as fraudulent; that only a depletion of assets which might have been subjected by creditors can be fraudulent.⁴⁰

Creditors of Corporation Organized to Take Over Business of Partnership Cannot Complain That Stock Issued to Partners Was without Consideration.—In one case the court held that subsequent creditors of a corporation organized to take over the business of a partnership which was in reality insolvent could not complain, no rights of third parties intervening and all of the old partnership creditors having been paid. Rights as between Subsequent and General Creditors Where Mortgage, Voidable Only as to Subsequent Creditors Is Set Aside.—Under the Amendment of 1910 giving the trustee the rights of a creditor "armed with process," it has been held that the distinction between subsequent and prior creditors does not exist upon the setting aside of an unrecorded instrument, void under that amendment, since the trustee derives his rights from the statute and not from existing creditors. In re (Holbrook) Shoe & Leather Co., 21 A. B. R. 511, 165 Fed. 973 (D. C. Mont.): "Surely the law will not allow this mere form of corporate organization, a mere fiction, to be used to thwart the substance of right, and thus permit the innocent creditors to be deprived of what is theirs, but will disregard the corporate entity and hold the real parties as actually having in their hands the property which is lawfully in the custody of the law, as belonging to the bankrupt. It follows that Dunn must be regarded as but a servant and agent, running a branch store of the Holbrook Company in Helena, under the style of the Packard Shoe Company; and it must be held as established that when he purchased his shares, and put the money in the shares of the Packard Company, he was really lending money to the amount of his subscription to the Holbrook Company; and so, in fact, became a creditor of the Holbrook Company, of which organization he was also a director."

In re Berkowitz, 22 A. B. R. 233, 173 Fed. 1012 (D. C. N. J.): "The Berkowitz Tailoring Company was incorporated shortly before the petition in bankruptcy was filed. The bankrupt was then insolvent and conveyed all his assets to the company for an alleged consideration of $1,500. The incorporators were the bankrupt and three of his brothers-in-law. These brothers-in-law seem to have paid into the corporation, for its capital stock, the sum of $2,000, and the bankrupt $25. The brothers-in-law made no inquiry concerning the quantity or value of the property transferred to the company by the bankrupt and have nothing whatever to do with the business of the company. If they did in fact pay $2,000 into the treasury of the corporation, it is clear that their purpose was not to invest that sum in the business on their own account, but to aid the bankrupt in business that was to be treated by him as his own and not as a business in which they had any interest whatever. The corporation was intended to operate as a cloak to shield the property from seizure by the bankrupt's creditors. Obviously, it was a fraud upon the creditors of the bankrupt. The referee's orders of September 26 and 27, 1907, directing the receiver to seize the property in possession of the company, were amply sustained by the proofs, and will be confirmed."

Thus, it was held in one case that where ninety-nine per cent of the stock of a manufacturing corporation was owned by a partnership and the remainder of the stock was held by relatives of one of the partners who as officers and directors of the corporation maintained its business for the benefit of the partnership, the corporation was a mere adjunct of the firm, and upon its adjudication a receivership in the bankruptcy proceedings was extended to the property in possession of the corporation as a part of the assets of the partnership.⁴³

Again, the court disregarded the fiction of corporate entity and held that the trustee in bankruptcy of the corporation was bound by an unfiled conditional sales contract where the original purchase of the property had been made by the promoters of the corporation with the declared intent of transferring it to the corporation when organized.

York v. Brewster, 23 A. B. R. 474, 174 Fed. 566 (C. C. A. Tex.): "It may be true that notice to a promoter of a corporation is not notice to the corporation itself when formed; but where associates, who hold property subject to a lien or under a conditional sale, combine to create a corporation to hold the property, and to which they transfer it, such associates being the only persons who have any substantial interest in the corporation, the corporation stands in no better position than that in which the associates stood. * * * To avoid a result so unjust, equity will disregard forms, ignore the corporate entity, and treat the buyers, promoters, and their associates in the enterprise as the parties really interested."

Again, the fiction of corporate entity has been disregarded to the extent of consolidating bankruptcy proceedings of a partnership, of its individual members and of a corporation owned wholly by one of the partners.⁴⁴

But such right to ignore corporate entity may be lost by laches or by the intervention of innocent third parties' rights.

In re Alleman Hardware Co., 19 A. B. R. 765, 158 Fed. 119 (D. C. Pa.): "The petitioner, who is the trustee in bankruptcy of L. M. Alleman, asks that the funds realized from the sale of the assets of the L. M. Alleman Hardware Co., which is also bankrupt, be taken out of the hands of its trustees, and turned over to the petitioner to be administered and distributed as the estate of L. M. Alleman individually, whom he represents. This is based on the alleged identity of L. M. Alleman with the hardware company bearing his name, which concern, as it is charged, is nothing more than L. M. Alleman himself in corporate guise. If this were true, the transfer which is asked for might be a proper one to make, although it would still be a question whether the same result could not be reached by allowing the creditors of L. M. Alleman individually to make proof of their claims against the company and so avoid circuitry. But the difficulty is that the facts are not as thus assumed. There is evidence, no doubt, from which it could be found that the arrangement by which in July, 1900, S. L. Johns and H. N. Gitt took a bill of sale from Alleman for his store stock was collusive and fraudulent as to existing creditors, on the strength of which an execution or attachment, levied on the goods, would probably have held. No move of that kind however was made, and the situation at this time is not the same, so as to give a right now to what might have been done then. Over seven years have elapsed, and other rights have come in, which are entitled to consideration here. After an intermediate partnership, bearing the same name, the L. M. Alleman Hardware Co. was incorporated in March, 1903, with the capital of $50,000, Johns subscribing for forty-nine shares, Gitt for forty-eight shares, and Alleman, C. J. Spaulding and George D. Gitt for one share each, and to it the business and stock in trade were duly transferred. In the transaction of its business, following upon that, up to the time it became bankrupt in December, 1906, new goods were purchased by the company and new and independent indebtedness incurred therefor, a large part of which remains unpaid. The parties to whom it is due, having given credit solely to the company, can look to no one else, and must be paid, so far as they are paid at all, out of its property, which the transfer to the trustee of L. M. Alleman, which is sought, would entirely cut off. It is said, however, that laches are not to be imputed to the creditors of L. M. Alleman, in this matter, as it is only since the examination of the parties in the bankruptcy proceedings, that the fraudulent character of the transaction has been disclosed. But while the evidence to establish the fraud, which is charged, may not have been within reach in the same fullness, as now, the outward indications of it were certainly there, and were as well known at the time of the occurrence as at any time since. And even if the details could not have been compelled from the immediate parties, as they have been here, there is no reason why they could not have been effectively obtained from the other witnesses called, who seem to have had knowledge at least of the essential facts. It is to be noted, moreover, that the present petition is refused, not so much upon the ground of laches as out of regard for the rights of creditors of the hardware company who are clearly entitled to the first concern."

§ 1225¾. Distribution Among Prior and Subsequent Creditors, etc., on Setting Aside Transfers Void as to a Class.—Where a transfer, void as to a certain class of creditors under State law, has been set aside, the question as to whether the proceeds shall be shared by all creditors equally or redound solely to the benefit of those belonging to the special class, is largely a question to be determined by State law, though the decisions do not usually place it upon that ground.⁴⁵

Thus, in South Carolina, where a chattel mortgage has been withheld from the records for more than the forty days limit allowed by statute for filing only creditors who have become such during the period of the withholding may share in the proceeds.^{45a}

Simmons v. Greer, 23 A. B. R. 443, 174 Fed. 654 (C. C. A. S. Car.): "The statute of South Carolina enacts that mortgages of real or personal property shall be valid, so as to affect subsequent creditors, whether lien creditors or simple contract creditors, only when recorded within 40 days; but the subsequent recording shall operate as notice to all creditors who become such after the date of the recording. Section 2456 of the Civil Code of South Carolina of 1902. This act, therefore, creates a class of creditors who are not affected by the mortgage, while all others take rights which are subordinate to it. That class is those who have become creditors between the date of the mortgage and the date of its record, and that without regard to whether they are 'lien creditors or simple contract creditors.' If there is a fund to be distributed among creditors, and some take subordinate to a lien, and there are others who are not affected by the lien, the result must be that those who are not affected by the lien are paid first, and the lien creditor is postponed to them. The South Carolina statute governs the rights of the respective parties. By that statute, and the construction placed upon it by the South Carolina courts, the mortgage is good without recording as to the bankrupt and as to all creditors whose rights accrued prior to its execution, and it is of no effect as to those creditors, whether simple contract or lien creditors, whose rights accrued between the execution of the mortgage and its recording."

And the mortgagee is not to be regarded as one of the meantime creditors, nor may he share with those becoming creditors during the period of the withholding.

Simmons v. Greer, 23 A. B. R. 443, 174 Fed. 654 (C. C. A. S. Car.): "The assignments of error on this appeal are in effect that the judge below should have held that Simmons, the mortgagee, was entitled to share in the fund with the subsequent creditors. This contention must be upon the theory that he was as to his debt a subsequent creditor. This, we think, is an obviously strained and untenable construction. Simmons' debt and the mortgage to secure it were created simultaneously, and the debt cannot be said to have been subsequent to the mortgage. The only sensible meaning to be given to the words 'subsequent creditors,' used in the statute, is that they are creditors who become such subsequent to the execution of the mortgage."

Probably the better rule is that, in the absence of State law to the contrary, all creditors participate pro rata, both prior and subsequent creditors.⁴⁶

In re Kohler, 20 A. B. R. 89, 159 Fed. 871 (C. C. A. Ohio): "The matter was referred to a special master who held that the distribution should be pro rata among all the creditors. Exceptions to his report were taken before the court below, who held that the distribution should be limited to those who were creditors at the time of the transfer, on the 22nd of August, 1901. Thus, the question has reached us. The argument in favor of the conclusion reached by the court below seems to be based largely upon what is claimed to be the law of Ohio in such case, while the master in holding the distribution should be made pro rata among all the creditors, plants himself squarely upon what he contends are the policy and provisions of the present bankruptcy law. The court below pointed out that under the finding of facts as he reads it, the transfer was only 'to the detriment of his [bankrupt's] then existing creditors,' which he regards as controlling. The court thinks it 'not harmonious with justice that persons whose legal rights have in no wise been invaded, may participate in funds arising out of the transfer, which did result in the invasion of the rights of others.' And it cannot believe that the bankruptcy law, in distributing an estate, intended to give any more rights to certain creditors than they had prior to its enactment. One object of the bankruptcy law is to prevent preferences and secure equality. The letter of the law, from which we have quoted, provides for an equal distribution. All the estate of a bankrupt is to go to the trustee. This includes preferences and property fraudulently conveyed. In our view, the strong objection to the construction of the lower court is that it provides a ready method of effectuating preferences. A man heavily in debt, and likely to go in deeper, in other words, insolvent, but yet in business, may convey a large part of his property to his wife. Having thus put out an anchor to windward, he has the satisfaction of knowing that if the conveyance stands, his wife is taken care of, but if it is set aside, the creditors existing then will be preferred over the later ones. There may be reasons why the bankrupt would like to prefer his earlier over his later creditors. If so, here is a method ready at hand for the purpose. The construction of § 67f and 67c will be found in the case of First National Bank v. Staake, 202 U. S. 141, 15 Am. B. R. 639. Here, certain attachments had been levied within four months. The court held they could be annulled, or the lien of the attachments could be preserved under the Bankruptcy Act, for the benefit of the estate. There was no method suggested of passing over the property covered by these attachments to the creditors who had secured them. But they could be held by the trustee 'for the benefit of the entire body of creditors, that is, "for the benefit of the estate"—in other words, the statute recognizes the lien of the attachment, but distributes the lien among the whole body of creditors' (202 U. S. 146). We have examined a number of Ohio decisions, but have not found one in which the distribution of the proceeds of property transferred in fraud of creditors, recovered by a trustee in bankruptcy, directly or through others, was limited to creditors existing at the time of the transfer. The precise question does not appear to have been raised, but the rule seems to be that the title of such recovered property would be held by the trustee for the benefit of all the creditors."

But in New York it was held by some of the later bankruptcy decisions before the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act gave the trustee the rights of a levying creditor, that a chattel mortgage withheld from record for only three months and through the mere carelessness of an attorney was absolutely void as against the receiver in bankruptcy and that its proceeds were distributable among all creditors, whether prior or subsequent.⁴⁷

Under the law of Maryland, previously existing creditors not being hurt by the withholding of a mortgage from record, the fact that it is not recorded gives them no other nor better rights than they would have had had it been recorded, and this right is not altered by the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2) of the Bankruptcy Act.⁴⁸

Under the Amendment of 1910, giving the trustee the rights and remedies of a creditor "armed with process," it has been held that upon the setting aside of an unrecorded instrument the division of the proceeds shall be made alike to all creditors whether prior or subsequent.

In re Farmers' Co-Op. Co. of Barlow, No. 2, 30 A. B. R. 190, 202 Fed. 1008 (D. C. N. Dak): "The conditional sales contracts were never filed, and, by § 6181 of the Revised Codes of North Dakota, they were for that reason 'void as to subsequent creditors without notice, and purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith for value.' Section 47a, subd. 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended in 1910, provides that trustees in bankruptcy 'as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.' If that were important, the files in this case show that there are creditors both prior and subsequent to the date of the conditional sale contract here involved. In my judgment, however, § 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended, does not depend upon any such distinction. The trustee in bankruptcy derives his rights and powers from the statute, and not from the creditors of the estate. If any creditor under the local statute can obtain priority over an unfiled or unrecorded instrument by levy of attachment or execution, the trustee in bankruptcy, under § 47 as amended, has all the rights and remedies of such creditor. The distinction between prior and subsequent creditors is confined to the decisions of a few States. By the great weight of authority seizure of the property covered by an unfiled or unrecorded instrument gives to the creditor priority over such instrument, without regard to the time when the credit was given. Leonard Jones, in an article on Chattel Mortgages (6 Cyc. 1068), says: 'An unrecorded mortgage leaves the property as open to seizure by creditors upon a writ of attachment or execution against the mortgagor, as if no mortgage existed.' He collects the authorities and shows that the rule confining the right to subsequent creditors is limited to a few states. See, also, First National Bank v. Ludvigsen, 8 Wyo. 230, 56 Pac. 995, 57 Pac. 934, 80 Am. St. Rep. 928; Pierson v. Hickey, 16 S. D. 46, 91 N. W. 338; Karst v. Gane, 136 N. Y. 316, 32 N. E. 1073.

"To hold that the trustee derives his rights from the creditors of the particular estate, instead of the statute, would greatly embarrass the administration of estates in bankruptcy. It would require first an investigation to ascertain what credit was given subsequent to the unrecorded instrument. This in mercantile cases would be a difficult inquiry, and would often require the splitting of current accounts. Again, under this interpretation, the fund arising from the property covered by the unrecorded instrument would have to be first apportioned among the subsequent creditors, to the exclusion of all other creditors, then to the lienholder, and finally to the general creditors. In re Riehl (D. C., Md.), 29 Am. B. R. 613, 200 Fed. 455. I do not think that Congress, by the 1910 amendment of section 47, intended such a result. A fair interpretation of the statute in the light of the weight of authority, as above pointed out, gives to the trustee all the rights of the most favored creditor under the local law, and any property thus held by the trustee becomes a part of the general estate to be apportioned among all creditors in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act on that subject."

Thus, the hurried purchase of an entire stock of a retail merchant at less than cost, the purchaser making no inquiries, indicates lack of good faith, although the purchaser paid the price and was actually ignorant of the seller's financial condition.⁵³

In re Knopf, 17 A. B. R. 49 (D. C. S. Car.): "Assuming then that the money was actually paid and that Sanders had no actual knowledge of or intentional participation in Knopf's fraudulent purpose with respect to his creditors, is he entitled to be protected as bona fide purchaser? It is well settled that a conveyance made for a fraudulent purpose may be set aside, and that the fraud of the vendor from whom the vendee derives his title will vitiate it if the vendee has either actual or constructive notice of the fraud, and constructive notice is such a knowledge of facts as should excite the suspicions of a man of ordinary prudence, and such as ought to have put him upon inquiry as to the reasons and motives of the vendor, which inquiry if followed with ordinary diligence would have led to the discovery of the fraudulent intent."

And, where the vendees of an unregistered conditional sale contract transferred the property to a corporation, the formation of which and the transfer to which had been the basis of the negotiations for the purchase, the conditional vendees holding the only substantial interests in the corporation, the corporation was held not to be protected as a bona fide purchaser for value, even though third parties had become interested in the purchasing corporation, the court disregarding the fiction of corporate entity in such instance.⁵⁴

It has been held under the Maine Anti-Bulk-Sales Act that, since the Act does not make bulk sales fraudulent as matter of law for failure to conform to the statutory requirements of notice, etc., a purchaser in good faith will be protected, especially where the purchase price has been paid out to creditors.⁵⁵

SUBDIVISION "B."

TRANSACTIONS VOID AS TO EXISTING CREDITORS UNDER STATE LAW, TRUSTEE TAKING WITHOUT AID OF AMENDMENT OF 1910, AND FRAUD NOT NECESSARILY INVOLVED.

§ 1227¼. Trustee's Rights without Aid of Amendment of 1910 and without Fraud Necessarily Involved.—As we have seen, where there is any transfer, incumbrance or holding of property, void as to the bankrupt's creditors or inuring to their benefit by State law for want of record or for any other reason than for fraud, (or, rather, regardless of fraud) the trustee also succeeds to the rights of any existing creditor qualified by State law to avoid it, this being one of the rights the trustee always has possessed and which he still possesses, without regard to fraud and without the aid of the Amendment of 1910.

Naturally, since the Amendment of 1910 does not create the trustee into a creditor nor arm him with process until the date of the bankruptcy, we are interested in this sub-division B of the rights of existing creditors to which the trustee is subrogated, chiefly in cases where the necessary existence of a creditor or the "arming with process" must have occurred before the trustee came upon the scene as a creditor armed with process as of the date of the bankruptcy, an illustration of which case would be that of a previously unrecorded lien which is recorded before the bankruptcy, but after some creditor's rights have attached under the State law, in which case the Amendment of 1910 would not operate to invalidate the lien. The cases under this subdivision B are of two classes, dependent upon whether the State law requires or does not require that the creditor so "existing" before the bankruptcy must also have been a "creditor armed with process" at the period when his rights are claimed to have arisen in order that the transfer or lien be invalid as to him.

§ 1227½. Where by State Law Existing Creditor before Bankruptcy Must Be "Armed with Process."—Where the State law invalidates the transaction only in the event that at some particular time a creditor armed with process was in existence, and it happens that that particular time is a date prior to the bankruptcy, then it is still requisite to such invalidity in bankruptcy, notwithstanding the Amendment of 1910, that some creditor armed with process shall have existed prior to the bankruptcy, to whose rights the trustee could be subrogated under § 67, since the trustee's rights as a creditor "armed with process" under the Amendment of 1910 do not arise until bankruptcy. Thus, those cases decided before the Amendment of 1910 holding the existence of a creditor armed with process essential to the invalidating of the transaction, would be decided the same way now notwithstanding the Amendment of 1910 where such "arming with process" would have been too late under State law had it been deferred until a day which happened to be the date of the bankruptcy. The Amendment of 1910, in other words, does not change the State law as to the necessity of an existing creditor armed with process nor the date he must be "armed" but simply creates the trustee into such a creditor and arms him as of the date of the bankruptcy, leaving cases requiring an "armed" creditor at an earlier date, to the law as it stood before the Amendment of 1910.

Miller v. Acid & Fertilizer Co., 21 A. B. R. 416, 211 U. S. 496 (affirming 117 La. 821): "It is obvious that if, at the time of the alleged preferential transfer to Miller, there were no other creditors of the individual estate of Guillory than Miller, under the rule laid down by the Bankrupt Act, the transfer to him of assets of the individual estate, in payment of an individual debt, did not constitute a preference. That it might have constituted a preference under the State law results from the difference in the classification made by the State law, on the one hand, and the bankruptcy law on the other. * * * As the suit by the creditors was brought within four months before the adjudication in bankruptcy [the filing of the petition?] their right to a lien or preference arising from the suit was annulled by the provisions of subdivision of § 67 of the Bankrupt law. But that section authorized the trustee, with the authority of the court, upon due notice, to preserve the lien for the benefit of the bankrupt estate, and to prosecute the suits to the end for the accomplishment of that purpose. * * * Assuming, therefore, that the trustee was properly authorized, it follows that he was entitled to preserve and enforce the privilege or lien which arose in favor of the creditors, resulting from their pending action, even although the cause of action arise from the State law, and the application of that law was essential to secure the relief sought. To the accomplishment of this end the bankrupt law was cumulative and did not abrogate the State law."

First Nat. Bank v. Staake, 15 A. B. R. 645, 202 U. S. 141 (affirming Receivers v. Staake, 13 A. B. R. 281): "This clause [§ 67 (f)] evidently contemplates that attaching creditors may acquire liens upon property which would not pass to the bankrupt if the liens were absolutely annulled, and therefore recognizes such liens, but extends their operation to the general creditors. * * * As remarked by the Court of Appeals: "The rule that the trustee takes the estate in the same plight as the bankrupt held it, is not applicable to liens which, although valid as to the bankrupt, are invalid as to creditors."

Impliedly, In re Butterwick, 12 A. B. R. 537, 131 Fed. 371 (D. C. Pa.): "The trustee does not stand simply in the shoes of the bankrupt but is vested with the rights of his execution creditors."

Gove v. Morton Trust Co., 12 A. B. R. 300 (Sup. Ct. N. Y. App. Div.): "The present Bankruptcy Act differs in some respects from preceding enactments of that character, in that it gives to the trustee in bankruptcy, in addition to the rights of the bankrupt, and the authority to set aside transfers made in fraud of creditors, the right which creditors would have to take advantage of the failure to file or record a mortgage or other instrument. Here, the right of a judgment creditor to resort to the property covered by the mortgage, and hence to its proceeds, has passed to the plaintiff; and we are of opinion that as a consequence he was entitled to the judgment he prayed for."

In re New York Economical Printing Co., 6 A. B. R. 615, 110 Fed. 518 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Subdivision 'b,' § 67 (Act of 1898), preserves for the benefit of the estate in bankruptcy a right which some particular creditor has been prevented from enforcing by the intervention of the debtor's bankruptcy. If a creditor by an execution or a creditors' bill, has secured a legal or equitable lien upon the mortgaged property before the mortgagor has been adjudicated a bankrupt, under this provision his right will or will not inure to the benefit of the estate, depending upon the time when the lien was acquired. If acquired more than four months before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding, his lien would inure to his own exclusive benefit; but, if acquired at any time within the four months, it would be null and void, under subdivision 'f' of the section, except as preserved for the benefit of the estate as provided in that subdivision and in subdivision 'b'."

Obiter, Watschke v. Thompson, 7 A. B. R. 504 (Sup. Ct. Minn.): "The adjudication in bankruptcy had the effect of dissolving the attachment against the property of the bankrupt and restoring the title of the property to the estate. When the trustee received his appointment, on Nov. 29, there was one or two courses of action open to him; to accept the result of the dissolution, and pursue the property, wherever it might be, or, upon due notice, to obtain an order preserving the benefit of the attachment, if for any purpose the interests of the estate would thereby be best conserved."

In re Baird, 11 A. B. R. 438, 126 Fed. 845 (D. C. Va.): "The power of the court, and indeed its duty to take away from the attaching creditors the benefit of their liens and give it to the trustee is found specifically in § 67f."

§ 1227 $\frac{3}{4}$. Trustee's Subrogation to Existing Creditor Not Armed with Process before Bankruptcy.—Where the State law invalidates the transaction as against any existing creditor whether armed with process or not, then the trustee will be subrogated to the right of any such existing creditor, regardless of the Amendment of 1910 arming him with process.

In several states, certain transactions, notably unrecorded liens of certain classes, are invalidated if there be any existing creditor, whether that creditor be armed with process or not; thus, in the State of New York, unrecorded chattel mortgages are void as against existing creditors whether armed with process or not and such were the holdings before the Amendment of 1910, and these holdings would still remain valid. The trustee would be entitled under § 67 (a) and (b) to avoid such liens even though the liens might have been filed before the bankruptcy.⁵⁷

Karst v. Cane et al., 136 N. Y. 316: "But a delay of six weeks in filing the mortgage is not a compliance with the act. There were no circumstances rendering so long a delay necessary. There can be no doubt that if during the delay in filing, the lien had been acquired by a creditor the mortgage as to such lien would be void. The mortgage was, however, filed before the plaintiff's judgments and executions were obtained. This did not restore the validity of the mortgage as against creditors whose debts were in existence during the default in filing the mortgage, although judgments or executions were not obtained until after the mortgage was in fact filed."

⁵⁷. See, also, Zartman v. First Nat. Bank, 19 A. B. R. 27, 189 N. Y. 267; In re Doran, 17 A. B. R. 799 (D. C. Ky.).

Skilton v. Codington, 15 A. B. R. 817, 185 N. Y. 80: "The rule that a creditor must first recover a judgment is simply one of procedure and does not affect the right. Therefore, where the recovery of a judgment becomes impracticable, it is not an indispensable requisite to enforcing the rights of the creditor."

In re Hickerson, 20 A. B. R. 682, 162 Fed. 345 (D. C. Idaho): "It is not thought that the rule in Idaho should be held to be different from that of New York. In case of an unfiled mortgage the statute itself in terms declares that it is void, not as against "attaching creditors" but as against "creditors." By construction, the courts add that the invalidity can be asserted only by a creditor who in some way connects himself with the property. Here, as we have seen, the requisite privity exists. See also, In re Garcewich, 8 Am. B. R. 149, 115 Fed. 87, 53 C. C. A. 510; In re Standard Telephone & Electric Light Co. (D. C.), 19 A. B. R. 491, 157 Fed. 106; In re Perkins (D. C.), 19 A. B. "With much confidence, the bank relies upon the doctrine of Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 A. B. R. 437, 25 Sup. Ct. 306, 49 L. Ed. 577 and York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 15 A. B. R. 633, 26 Sup. Ct. 481, 50 L. Ed. 782. By these decisions, undoubtedly, the rule is established or recognized that in the absence of fraud the Bankruptcy Act does not confer upon the trustee power to attack a mortgage upon behalf of a general creditor who has secured no lien. In so holding, however, the court defines only the authority conferred upon the trustee by the Federal statute. It is not to be inferred that it would be incompetent for the State Legislature in terms to declare that a non-filed chattel mortgage shall be void as to trustees in bankruptcy, or for the State courts, interpreting existing local law, to declare such a mortgage, or a mortgage permitting the mortgagor to sell the mortgage property and apply the proceeds thereof to his own use, void as against trustees in bankruptcy, and creditors whose claims have been presented and allowed."

In re Fish Bros. Wagon Co., 21 A. B. R. 149, 164 Fed. 553 (C. C. A. Kans.): "The general doctrine is that an assignee in a general assignment under a State statute is neither an innocent purchaser nor a creditor having a lien on the assigned property, but that, like a trustee in bankruptcy, he stands in the shoes of his insolvent and is possessed of no greater right. It seems, however, to be otherwise in Kansas. In Winthorow v. Citizens' Bank, 55 Kan. 378, 40 Pac. 639, it was held that an assignee is not merely the representative of the debtor but is also a trustee for the creditors, in whom title is vested by deed of assignment, and that an unfiled chattel mortgage is void as against the right so secured by him. The effect of the assignment in question here is to be determined by the Kansas law, and it is the same upon an unfiled contract of conditional sale as upon an unfiled chattel mortgage."

As was said by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Thompson v. Paret, 94 Pa. 275—and this statement was approved in *Peek v. Penna.): "The transfer is sought to be justified on the ground that the existing relation between the parties was one of agency only, the respondent merely taking the goods to sell on account, and turning over the proceeds after deducting his commission. Written orders on Childs & Co. are produced to verify this, signed by the respondent, in which he declares that he so receives and holds them; but this is materially qualified by the other evidence, and the court will go behind mere forms to get at the real transaction. Indeed, the orders themselves—aside from the fine print at the bottom—bear on their face the proof that they represent actual purchases, and not consignments. The goods are disposed of to the respondent for a specific price, and on definite terms of credit, with provision on most of them for a discount if paid within a certain time. And while it may be true, as stated by the respondent, that he was only required to pay for each lot as fast as he disposed of it, accounting to Childs & Co. for whatever he received in the way of notes or other securities, yet in making sales he did so in his own name, and was held directly responsible, the securities obtained being taken to himself personally, and guaranteed by him when they were turned over. His obligations to Childs & Co. were plainly regarded as a debt, and he so speaks of them in his testimony. There are too many indicia in this of an ordinary purchase, to warrant the conclusion that anything else was in fact intended."

In re Tice, 15 A. B. R. 97, 139 Fed. 52 (D. C. Pa.): "In Pennsylvania, where goods were delivered by claimant to a bankrupt, under an agreement 'to pay rent for the use of the same,' in certain installments, covering specified periods, and upon making further specified payment, not designated as rent, a bill of sale to be given, the claimant 'to have the privilege of taking' the goods 'if the rent is not paid,' the transaction is a conditional sale and not a bailment, and subjects the property to the claims of the creditors of the bankrupt.

"The general rule in Pennsylvania is that the delivery of goods, with a provision that the title shall not pass until the purchase price has been paid, is void as to creditors of the party to whom they are delivered, and the essential character of the transaction is regarded rather than the particular form assumed."

Of such class of subterfuges are attempted "warehousings" by insolvent debtors of their own property on their own premises, pretending the transaction to be pledges or bailments, but retaining control and substantial possession all the time.⁶⁰

Instance, In re Rodgers, 11 A. B. R. 79, 125 Fed. 169 (C. C. A. Ills.): "We are thus brought to the consideration of the real character and purpose of the transaction between the bankrupt and the storage company. We are to ascertain the real intention of the contracting parties from the whole agreement read in the light of the surrounding circumstances. The bankrupt was largely engaged in purchasing seed upon credit, storing the property purchased in his warehouse. He occupied the premises as a place of business, maintaining an office there, with clerks to assist in the management of the business, and with porters to handle the seed. The premises were subject to a rental of $250 a month. He arranged with the storage company, which had no warehouse of its own, that it would issue warehouse warrants or receipts to the bankrupt for property upon the bankrupt's premises for a certain small charge per month upon the value of the property covered by the receipts. He executed a lease of the premises to the storage company, to continue so long as the bankrupt should desire, and so long as property remained therein for which warrants or receipts had been issued; and this without any payment of rent by the storage company, the rental in fact being paid by the bankrupt. The storage company neither required, nor was it given any key to the premises. The bankrupt remained in possession of the premises as before the agreement, continuing to transact his business there as he had formerly done. There were certain signs placed upon the different floors of the building, indicating that the storage company controlled the premises. These were small and obscure signs, not likely to attract attention, and most of them hidden behind the piles of bags of seed. No sign was displayed upon the exterior of the building indicating any proprietorship of the storage company, or giving notice to the world that any other than the bankrupt had possession and control. There was no open, notorious manifestation of a change of possession, none was intended and there was none in fact. Upon each pile of bags of seed for which the warehouse receipts or warrants were issued there was placed a small tag, which might be discovered upon careful search. The bankrupt substantially treated this property as his own, at times going through the forms prescribed by the storage company, and, whenever he found it necessary, ignoring them. We do not find that the storage company had knowledge of this action of the bankrupt, but it certainly knew that it was possible under the circumstances for the bankrupt to do with the property as he would, since it was left within his control. It is difficult for us to look upon this transaction as a warehousing of property. The storage company assumed no liability to the bankrupt, and assumed only such responsibility as the law imposes upon it with respect to those advancing money upon the faith of its warehouse warrants or receipts. The name of the company is in itself, under the circumstances, a false pretense. It did not store property. It had no premises upon which to store property. The bankrupt stored the property. The bankrupt paid the rental of the premises. It is true that an agent of the storage company occasionally visited the premises and inspected the property in a sort of way, but exercised no supervision or control that would prevent the bankrupt from doing with it as his will might dictate or his financial necessities might require. We cannot but regard this arrangement as a subterfuge, a mere device to enable the bankrupt to hypothecate the warehouse warrants or receipts, and so to raise money upon secret liens upon property in his possession and under his control."

Thus, likewise, unfiled conditional sales and unfiled chattel mortgages are sometimes pretended to be property held in trust.⁶¹

Again, it is often sought to make an absolute sale to the bankrupt appear to be a bailment, in order that the property may be reclaimed. But the property affected will pass if the true nature of the transaction makes it a sale.⁶²

In re Heckathorn, 16 A. B. R. 467 (D. C. Pa.): "It is rather suggestive of an attempt, as is said above, to have the benefit of a sale without the responsibility for it, disposing of the goods at a price and at the same time retaining a hold upon them and upon the proceeds derived from their sale. But why this beating behind the bush when a direct course was open to them? If the intention was that the bankrupt should receive and sell the goods for an account of the petitioners, upon a commission, it would have been easy, in so many words, to say so; and the failure to do it can but be regarded as significant."

In re Morris, 19 A. B. R. 422, 159 Fed. 591 (D. C. Pa.): "It is difficult to give a written instrument a character which the transaction, which it purports to represent, does not inherently bear. While, therefore, it is easy enough to make an agreement speak as a lease or a bailment, where that was what was actually in the mind of the parties, where the fact is that the one desires to sell and the other to buy, the attempt to have the arrangement masquerade in writing as something else is very likely to fail. There are apt terms and provisions for the one, which are inapt and unadaptable for the other, and the result is a nondescript, the different parts of which defeat each other and make manifest the real purpose in view. And this is often also betrayed by the unusual little things which creep in, 'the clausulae inconsuetae pointed to in Twyne's case, 3 Rep. 80, as the sure badges of that which they are intended to hide.' Taylor v. Taylor, 8 How. 183, 205, 12 L. Ed. 1040; In re Baxter (C. C. A.), 152 Fed. 137, 141. As experience teaches, such instruments are prompted by the desire on the part of the owner of the goods to have the benefit of a sale while escaping its responsibilities, retaining a hold on them so as to be secure of the price, without subjecting them to claims of creditors by reason of having parted with the possession, although giving credit to the one obtaining them, in their eyes, as the apparent owner thereby. This is not the policy of the law, and there is no occasion for the courts to be astute in helping to get around it. On the contrary, the result cannot but be healthful where attempted evasions of it are brought to naught."

In re Gehris-Herbine Co., 26 A. B. R. 470, 188 Fed. 502 (D. C. Pa.): "Tested, therefore, by that law, what is the true character of the contract in question? Is it a bailment, or a conditional sale? If it is really and in good faith a bailment, it is valid not only between the parties but against creditors also; for a man does not lose title to his property by hiring it to another, although, he may have parted with the possession and the other may have acquired it. But, if he has really sold it and has also parted with the possession, he will find in numerous jurisdictions—in Pennsylvania, for example—that he cannot enforce against execution creditors a condition that he has retained the title until the price is paid. These rules are too well known to need the support of citation."

In re Gaglione & Sons, 28 A. B. R. 694, 200 Fed. 81 (D. C. Pa.): "In looking the whole transaction over, it discloses a sale of property and not a lease by bailment. It is true that the writing constitutes a valid bailment between the parties, but they went beyond its plain terms and provisions. The purpose of the parties obviously was not to hire out, but to sell the machines. Their acts, as well as their writings, will be regarded by the court in determining the true character of the transaction. Since the amendment of § 47a (2) by the act of June 25, 1910, the trustee is placed upon the footing of a creditor with a legal or equitable lien and may take full advantage of such rights. He may, therefore, attack a contract, in form of a bailment, and offer such evidence as will throw light upon the negotiations, between the parties, disclosing its true meaning to be otherwise. * * *

"To constitute a valid bailment the intent to return the property must be evidenced by the agreement. Now, if this so appears from the writing, and it is otherwise shown conclusively that it was not so intended, a bailment is not to be presumed. In this case the intention to return is denied by the act of the parties, the delivery and acceptance of the notes in payment of the purchase price of the machinery. Such payment or security for payment, if so to be regarded, presupposes a sale and rebuts the idea of a lease. If it had been the intention of the claimant to continue his title to the property, why did he require payment or security for such payment. That he was willing to pass title is evidenced by his act in the acceptance of the notes from the bankrupt, in the exercise of the latter's option to purchase by the terms of the writing, postponed to a future date, and having exercised his option to purchase by the consent of the claimant, title was transferred."

Thus, it is often sought to make it out to be a conditional sale.⁶³

In re Geo. O. Haasam & Son (Flint v. Buttles), 18 A. B. R. 745, 153 Fed. 932 (D. C. Vt.): "In the case at bar, there was an attempted lien, absolutely secret, not even made known to the vendee, and never intended to be brought to light unless the vendee should become insolvent. The vendee was put in possession of a large number of wagons, of which he was apparently the absolute owner. There was a secret attempt on the part of the vendor, should the vendee succeed in getting credit by having about him a large amount of unencumbered property and should thereafter be unable to pay debts so incurred, to make time notes given for said property 'immediately due and payable,' and the vendee deliver to the vendor all goods remaining unsold, and all the while they should remain in the name of the vendor. I cannot conceive in what manner the vendor anticipated that the goods could remain in its name when possession was passed to the vendee and no record made of the transaction. It has been repeatedly held that when personal property is delivered to a vendee for sale, or to be dealt with in a way inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, or so as to destroy his lien or right of property, the transaction cannot be upheld as a conditional sale and is fraud upon the creditors of the vendee."

But where the transaction amounts to a bona fide consignment to the bankrupt or bailment to him, and is not a concealed sale, the trustee does not acquire title.⁶⁴

Plow (Deere) Co. v. McDavid, 14 A. B. R. 664, 137 Fed. 802 (C. C. A. Mo.): "We think it was an agency contract. It is not a contract in which the consignee can sell at any price, or on any terms he may choose, but, as we understand it, it is a contract or consignment of goods to be sold on commission by the consignee, as agent for the consignor, for cash. The plow company had the right, under the contract, to require the goods returned, and in this it lacks one of the necessary elements of a contract of sale, namely, to pay money, or its equivalent, for the goods delivered, with no obligation to return."

In re Galt, 13 A. B. R. 575 (C. C. A. Ills., reversing 9 A. B. R. 682): "Applying to this contract the test stated, it is clear that here was a bailment and not a conditional sale. It was not contemplated that Galt should ever own these wagons. He was to sell them to others for the company, his commissions to be the amount which he might receive over the prices stated in the contract. The proceeds, whether in cash or in notes of the purchaser, were to be immediately returned to the company, the notes being guaranteed by Galt. This was a del credere commission and not a sale. The company could compel a return of the goods not sold. Galt had not the option to pay for them in money. Even with respect to the goods unsold within the twelve months, the option for their return or payment was with the company and not with Galt; and nowhere in the agreement does the latter covenant to pay for these goods as in the case of a sale."

In re Columbus Buggy Co., 16 A. B. R. 759, 143 Fed. 849 (C. C. A. Okla.): "A contract between a furnisher of goods and the receiver that the latter may sell them at such prices as he chooses, that he will account and pay for the goods sold at agreed prices, that he will bear the expenses of insurance, freight, storage and handling and that he will hold the merchandise unsold subject to the order of the furnisher, disclose an agreement of bailment for sale, and does not evidence a conditional sale. Such a contract is not affected by a statute which renders unrecorded contracts for conditional sales voidable by creditors and purchasers."

"An agreed price, a vendor, a vendee, an agreement of the vendor to sell and of the vendee to buy for and pay the agreed price are essential attributes of a contract of sale. The power to require the restoration of the subject of the agreement is an indispensable incident of a contract of bailment."

"The fact that a contract provides that the receiver of goods is to account for those sold at fixed prices and to retain the difference for insurance, storage, commission and expenses does not make the contract an agreement of sale."

Thus, where a contract to furnish certain articles provided that until sold or paid for in cash they should remain the property of the seller, and, when sold, all proceeds of sale including notes, accounts, etc., should be kept separate as a trust fund and be turned over to the seller or be held as collateral security, the court held the seller's rights were unimpaired by the Franklin v. Stoughton Wagon Co., 22 A. B. R. 63, 168 Fed. 857 (C. C. A. Okla.): "Under these provisions we think the wagon company retained full control of the disposition to be made of the wagons, in that it could direct the goods returned to the house or shipped elsewhere as desired, and in this it lacks one of the necessary elements of a contract of sale, namely, to pay money or its equivalent for the goods delivered with no obligation to return."

A bailment is not a transfer, not even under the broad definition of Bankr. Act, § (25), that "transfer shall include the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift or security."⁶⁶ The rule of "noscitur a sociis" would seem to make plain that a bailment was not of a like class with those expressly enumerated.

An executory contract of sale may be converted by verbal agreement made before delivery of the goods, later reduced to writing, into a bailment with alternative of future conversion into a sale.⁶⁷

But it has been held that an attempted conversion of an unrecorded executed conditional sale into a bailment by subsequent agreement will be ineffective.⁶⁸

In re Poore, 15 A. B. R. 407, 139 Fed. 863 (D. C. Pa.): "No doubt, while the matter was still executory, the conditions on which it was held could be readjusted. *Goss Ptg. Co. v. But not to the detriment of those creditors who either were such at the time the machinery was obtained or had become so since then, as to whom it had passed beyond the executory stage."

And the State law controls as to the real character of the transaction.⁶⁹

by the local laws of the States. * * * That such a contract is a conditional sale and is valid without record is the law of Arkansas."

In re Morris, 19 A. B. R. 422, 159 Fed. 591 (D. C. Pa.): "The question is one of local law in which the decisions of the State court control."

First Nat. Bank v. Guarantee Title & Trust Co., 24 A. B. R. 330, 178 Fed. 187 (C. C. A. Pa.): "Whether a conditional contract of sale, chattel mortgage or pledge of personal property is valid against the general creditors of the vendor, mortgagor or pledgor or his trustee in bankruptcy is to be determined by the local laws of the State in which the transaction is had."

It has been held that the subsequent giving of notes by the bankrupt would not operate to change his agency under a consignment contract nor to alter the relation of bailee and bailor, into an absolute sale, where all the evidence shows that the intention among the parties was not to make such change in the relations, and where the consignee was required to account fully for the goods actually sold notwithstanding the notes, the trustee standing simply in the bankrupt's shoes in this regard.⁷⁰

Of course, where such consignment contracts or conditional sales are held to be void by State law as a fraud upon creditors, such a reaffirmance of the continuance of the relation between the parties would not prevail as against the trustee, even before the Amendment of 1910, for in cases of fraud the trustee never has stood "in the bankrupt's shoes."⁷¹

Trustee Now "Armed with Process" by Amendment of 1910.—Wherever State law, in relation to transactions of the sort herein mentioned, would give different rights or a different construction of the facts to a levying creditor from what it would give to a mere general creditor, the trustee will have such different rights or construction.

Thus, as to a conditional sale to which an attempt has been made to give the character of a bailment.

In re Franklin Lumber Co., 26 A. B. R. 37, 187 Fed. 281 (D. C. Pa.): "In reality it has always been a contract of conditional sale although it may be true that the bankrupt himself would not have been permitted to prove its true character. Neither could the trustee have proved its true character until the Act of June 25, 1910, was passed, but since that date he has been put upon the footing of a creditor with a legal or equitable lien, and may take full advantage of such rights. Whenever therefore such a creditor may attack a contract, in form a bailment, on the ground that it is really a conditional sale, and may support the attack by competent and relevant evidence that throws light on the true meaning of the contract—the trustee has the same right. The mere form of the agreement does not bind him, as it might bind the bankrupt." This case further quoted in § 1270.

And where, under the local law, the transaction is void as to lien creditors, it is also void as to the trustee, so far as property in the custody of the bankruptcy court is concerned, by virtue of the Amendment of 1910;⁷² and the trustee may now, by virtue of the amendment, attack these transactions as effectively as if he were a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings.⁷³

§ 1228½. Disguised Conditional Sales Invalid for Lack of Record Even Though No Creditor "Armed with Process" Exists.—Before the Amendment of 1910, it was held that even if the transaction did not amount to a pledge, consignment, bailment, trusteeship, etc., but was in effect a conditional sale, unrecorded, and not an absolute sale, the trustee would not get title in most states, unless some creditor "armed with process" existed;⁷⁴ although in some states they were considered to be fraudulent, in which event the trustee was held not to be "standing in the shoes of the bankrupt;" but by the Amendment of 1910 to Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), the trustee is given, in effect, the rights of a creditor "armed with process."⁷⁵

Of course, if by State law an unfiled conditional sales contract is not void as against levying creditors, it would not be void as against the trustee even under the Amendment of 1910.⁷⁶

§ 1229. Liens Void as to Creditors for Want of Record, Void as to Trustee.—Claims, which, for want of record, would not have been valid liens as against the claims of any creditor of the bankrupt, are not liens against his estate.⁷⁷

§ 1230. Unrecorded or Unfiled Chattel Mortgages Void.—An unrecorded or unfiled chattel mortgage is void as against the trustee in states where recording or filing is required to preserve the lien against creditors.⁷⁸

Recording Part of Instrument.—Failure to record entire contract prevents record of part from operating as

It has been held that the recording of mortgages of chattels real is to be governed by the recording laws relating to mortgages and conveyances of real property, and not those relating to the recording of chattel mortgages.⁷⁹ Thus, an unrecorded chattel mortgage upon a vessel derrick hoister has been held void.⁸⁰

§ 1231. Unfiled Chattel Mortgages Not Void Where Filing or Recording Not Required.—And unfiled chattel mortgages are not void where filing or recording is not required by the State law in order to make them valid as against levying creditors.⁸¹

In re Josephson, 8 A. B. R. 423, 116 Fed. 404 (D. C. Ga.): "The decision of the highest court of a State that recording is not essential to the validity of a chattel mortgage executed therein when the state law does not so require, must be followed by the bankruptcy court."

So, where a chattel mortgage was made in a state wherein recording was required and effected, it does not become invalid because the mortgaged property has been removed to a state wherein recording is not required, and cannot be made.⁸²

§ 1232. Meaning of "Required."—And the term "required," as thus used in recording statutes, means not that recording is compulsory nor that it is essential to validity between the immediate parties, but merely that recording is essential to validity as to creditors.⁸³

First Nat'l Bk. v. Comett, 15 A. B. R. 662, 142 Fed. 33 (C. C. A. Mo.): "Within the meaning of amended § 60a of the Bankruptcy Act, the Missouri law (Rev. St. 1899, § 3404) required the recording of chattel mortgages. To be sure an unrecorded mortgage is not pronounced void absolutely and under all circumstances, but it 'is required to be recorded' in the sense in which that phrase is customarily used, and the language of requirement is similar to that employed in the registry laws of most of the states. found in the phrase 'the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required' of the amendment of § 60a, has reference to the character of the instrument of transfer required to be recorded by the State law rather than to the particular individual who, by reason of adventitious circumstances, may or may not be affected by an unrecorded instrument. Thus an affirmative answer would unhesitatingly be given to the inquiry: 'Does the law of Missouri require the recording of chattel mortgages?'

"The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, in a case involving the registry statute of Texas, held that, as an unrecorded chattel mortgage was good between the parties thereto and against ordinary creditors, and as there were no intervening lienholders or purchasers, it could not be said that a registry or recording was required, and upon the facts of that case it accordingly concluded that a chattel mortgage given before but placed on record within the four months before the institution of bankruptcy proceedings could not be considered as a voidable preference. Meyer Bros. Drug Co. v. Pipkin Drug Co. (C. C. A.), 14 A. B. R. 477, 136 Fed. 396. In effect this is the adoption, without exception or qualification, of the old rule that whether and to what extent a chattel mortgage given before but recorded within the four months' period is valid against a trustee in bankruptcy should be determined exclusively by the State law. In our opinion, the Amendment of 1903 has qualified this rule in respect of the question whether such a mortgage may constitute a voidable preference under subdivisions 'a' and 'b' of § 60. If this has not resulted, we fail to see that Congress has accomplished anything by the amendment."

And some decisions have held that it means that such recording is essential to validity as to levying creditors;⁸⁴ while other decisions take the broader ground that it means "required" for any purpose, whether for validity against levying creditors, "general creditors," "any third person," or merely against innocent purchasers and encumbrancers.⁸⁵

But, at any rate, if the recording is required only to give notice to debtors or to public officers, etc., it is not within the statute, as, for example, where filing of an assignment of a public contract is required to give notice to the disbursing officer.^{85a}

That the transfer is good between the parties without recording does not necessarily remove it from the category of those "required" to be recorded.⁸⁶

§ 1233. Creditor "Armed with Process" No Longer Necessary.

—Before the Amendment of 1910, the doctrine was firmly established, that "creditor" meant levying creditor and that some creditor must have actually levied before bankruptcy, to whose lien the trustee might be subrogated;⁸⁷ but by the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2) of the Bankruptcy

Act, the trustee has been endowed with the rights of a creditor "armed with process."⁸⁸

Where the local law does not itself create a lien in favor of even levying creditors on the failure to record a chattel mortgage, the bankruptcy of the mortgagor cannot create such a lien.⁸⁹

§ 1234. Not Void for Simple Nonrecord in States Where Showing of Damage to Creditors or Other Additional Conditions Also Requisite.—A chattel mortgage is not void for nonrecord in States where the simple failure to file or record it is not enough to avoid it unless damage to creditors is shown or the failure was by agreement of parties;⁹⁰ and it is not void for nonrecord in certain other States except as to subsequent creditors without notice, as in Kentucky;⁹¹ nor in Michigan except as to new creditors, or as to old creditors extending additional time between the date of the executing and the date of the filing;⁹² nor in South Carolina for nonrecord except as to creditors becoming such after the execution of the mortgage and before its filing, and such intervening creditors alone may participate in the fund.⁹³ And a similar rule prevails in New Mexico.⁹⁴ In Maryland subsequent creditors or purchasers without notice are not affected by an unrecorded chattel mortgage.⁹⁵ In Georgia an unrecorded chattel mortgage is void only as against lien creditors, or subsequent purchasers and mortgagees or lienholders in good faith.⁹⁶

§ 1238. As to After-Acquired Property.—The taking of possession of after-acquired property operates in some States to extend the mortgage lien thereto as of the date of the taking of possession, not as of the date of the original execution of the mortgage, and the same holding will prevail in bankruptcy.⁵

Compare, Zartman v. First Nat. Bank, 19 A. B. R. 27, 189 N. Y. 267: "As was said in a case upon which both parties rely: 'The right of the mortgagor in the meantime,' that is, until default, 'to the use of the earnings, amounts, practically, to absolute ownership, and hence the mortgage cannot operate as a lien upon such earnings to the prejudice of the general creditors until actual entry and possession taken, and then only upon what is earned after that time. The lien of the mortgage upon future earnings is consummated as against other creditors only by the fact of the possession of the property, and cannot have any retroactive operation, since it would then deprive the unsecured creditor of the fund, upon the faith of which he may have given credit to the mortgagor during the time when the latter was permitted to deal with and use it as its own. The lien upon the earnings, in favor of the bondholders, attaches only upon what is earned after the time when the lien is perfected by entry and possession.' N. Y. Security & Trust Co. v. Saratoga Gas & El. L. Co., 159 N. Y. 137, 143. If a lien was created by the mortgage upon property not in existence at its date, possession after it came into existence was of no importance. If no lien was created by the mortgage upon such property the taking of possession pursuant to its terms did not create one as against general creditors, who are presumed to have dealt with the mortgagor in reliance upon its absolute ownership of the stock on hand. While the record of the mortgage was notice to all, it was notice of all its terms, which included the right of disposition for the use and benefit of the mortgagor, with no duty to apply the avails upon the mortgage indebtedness. If the question had arisen between the parties to the mortgage, equity might recognize a contract to give a lien and treat it as an actual lien, but it arises between the mortgagee and the general, unsecured creditors, who had little, if anything, to rely upon except the shifting stock, which, directly or indirectly, they themselves had furnished. The credit extended by them enabled the mortgagor to carry on business, and if the product of that credit goes to the mortgagee, not only are they helpless, but, if the law so declared, hereafter manufacturing corporations needing credit will be helpless also."

But in other States it operates to fasten the lien as of the date of the original execution of the mortgage, and in such States the lien will likewise be held to revert, in the bankruptcy court.⁶

The identification and separation of chattels within the four months period where they were indefinitely described in the mortgage, itself operates to fix the lien as of the date of the identification.⁷

§ 1239. Permitting Creditor to Levy after Bankruptcy in Order to "Arm with Process."—In some of the States where the rule is adopted that there must be an actual levy by execution or attachment, and that equitable sequestration is not sufficient, the creditors, by some holdings, are permitted to proceed to judgment after adjudication of bankruptcy and to levy execution, the levy being held to redound thereupon to the benefit of all creditors.⁸

But it is apparently held in one case that this rule applies only where the suits have been started before bankruptcy.⁹

Perhaps this rule is adopted in analogy to the course suggested in Lockwood v. Exch. Bk., 10 A. B. R. 107, 190 U. S. 294, relative to the right of creditors holding notes waiving exemptions to proceed to judgment notwithstanding the bankruptcy.¹⁰

Amendment of 1910.—The matter is set at rest by the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2) whereby the trustee is "deemed to be vested with all the rights, powers and remedies of a creditor armed with process."

§ 1240. Defective Refiling of Chattel Mortgage.—Before the Amendment of 1910, a failure to refile, properly, a chattel mortgage, where under the State law such failure vitiates the mortgage only as to creditors "armed with process," was held, in most states to vitiate it in bankruptcy only where prior to the bankruptcy some creditor had levied execution or attachment, or otherwise was "armed with process."¹¹

And a failure to properly refile a chattel mortgage, after the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2) will vitiate the mortgage even though the mortgage itself was executed before the amendment, for such holding as to the re-filing would not be the same as holding the amendment to be retroactive.

In re Smith, 29 A. B. R. 527, 198 Fed. 876 (D. C. Wis.): "It is assumed as well settled that such filing of a renewal affidavit at a time other than that specified in the statute was wholly nugatory, and therefore the two-year limit expired, and the mortgage ceased to be valid as against those designated on September 5th, 1911. Thus, on June 25, 1910, when the amendatory act was passed, the mortgage was effective, not only as between the parties, but as against all others, because it had been filed.

"Can the mortgagee be heard to say that the amendment is inoperative because at the time of the execution and delivery of the mortgage the rights which purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors could assert had not been conferred upon trustees in bankruptcy? As an academic proposition he might plausibly claim that, not being required, as against the trustee, to file the mortgage at all, the immunity against attack by the latter was a valuable right which should remain unimpaired until the mortgage debt is satisfied. But the practical situation is this: He did in fact file the mortgage, and in doing so shielded it against attack from all sources—he secured the full protection which the statute gives to a filed mortgage. He was at liberty to maintain this protection by filing a renewal affidavit, or he could neglect to do so and thereby hazard attack. Has the amendatory act done anything more than in some degree possibly to change the hazard by introducing the trustee into the class or classes permitted by the State statute to question such mortgage if not filed or renewed? At the time the amendment went into effect, did not the situation itself reserve to the mortgagee all of his rights as they then existed; or, to put it in the least favorable light, is not the amendment entirely consistent with his rights under the mortgage if he would but exercise the choice or opportunity given him by the State statute for the preservation thereof? I think this must be answered affirmatively; and, if so, the question respecting the invalidity of the amendment because retroactive, or for any other reason, is wholly eliminated."

But in New York a failure to refile within the thirty days before the expiration of the year renders the mortgage void as against the trustee in bankruptcy,¹² and such was the holding of the later decisions before the Amendment of 1910.¹³

§ 1240¼. Filing or Refiling in Wrong Place.—A failure to file, or to refile, in the proper place, a chattel mortgage or other instrument requiring filing, is in most States the equivalent of no filing; and the consequences of such failure in such States are in bankruptcy the same as no filing.¹⁴

§ 1240½. Or in Only One Place Where Statute Requires Two.—Likewise, a filing in only one place where the statute requires two, as, for instance, in the place of the mortgagor's business but not in that of his residence, where the statute requires both, is fatal; and, in Massachusetts,

§ 1240³. Defective Execution of Mortgages, etc.—Whether the defective execution of a mortgage, or other instrument of transfer, where no levy has been made by creditors will render the instrument nugatory as against the trustee, would, on principle, depend on State law, as to whether such defect in execution would render it invalid as to the bankrupt, or as to general creditors.¹⁶

Or, since the Amendment of 1910, as to whether State law would render it invalid as to a creditor "armed with process," the trustee, by that amendment, being deemed so armed.

§ 1241. Unrecorded or Unfiled Conditional Sales Contracts, Void.—An unrecorded or unfiled (as the case may be) conditional sale contract is likewise void as against the trustee, in states where recording or filing is required to preserve the vendor's rights as against creditors.¹⁷ existed—for example, if the failure to record the conditional sales contract was brought about through fraud—it was held void in all the states, since, under the prevailing doctrine, the trustee “stood in the bankrupt’s shoes” only in the absence of fraud;²⁰ and the mere sequestration of the property by the bankruptcy court taking possession was held not sufficient “arming with process” to invalidate the unfiled conditional sales contract;²¹ although any prior assignment for the benefit of creditors was held in some states to constitute such an “arming,” the courts holding in such states that the assignment stood in place of a levy for the benefit of all creditors.²²

Amendment of 1910.—However, by the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), the trustee has been effectually “armed” with process,²³ so that the trustee is now vested with the rights of judgment creditors, holding a lien on the property in his custody, and an execution returned unsatisfied as to all property not in his custody.²⁴

In re Calhoun Supply Co., 26 A. B. R. 528, 189 Fed. 537 (D. C. “Before the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, the trustee’s title as against a claim under an unrecorded conditional sale, though the State law required record, did not prevail. *Crucible Steel Co. v. under that law. It seems to me that the language of the amendment should be construed to effectuate this result if it fairly admits of such construction. If the operation of the amendment is restricted to cases in which a creditor has in fact acquired a lien by legal or equitable proceedings, then it adds nothing to the law as it was under the original act. By virtue of § 67 'c' of the original act, the trustee was subrogated to such a lien, if created within four months, and could enforce it for the benefit of the estate. If created beyond four months, under the filing of the petition, it was, of course, valid as against the trustee, under both the original and amended acts. The class of cases, unprovided for by the original act and intended to be reached by the amendment, were those in which no creditors had acquired liens by legal or equitable proceedings and to vest in the trustee for the interest of all creditors the potential rights of creditors with such liens. The language admits of this construction. It recites that such trustee 'shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.' This language aptly refers to such rights, remedies and powers as a creditor holding such a lien is entitled to under the law, rather than to the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor who had actually fastened a lien on the property of the bankrupt estate. * * * The purpose of Congress was to embrace within these words every class of creditors with liens by legal or equitable proceedings favored by the varying registration laws of each of the States. The registration laws of some States include but one of many classes of such creditors. In that case the purpose of Congress is not to be frustrated as to the included class because other classes included in the amendment were not included also in the registration act of that particular State. The breadth of language was used for the purpose of gathering in all classes protected by all local registration acts, and this purpose would be defeated by the construction contended for by the petitioner."

In re Hartdagen, 26 A. B. R. 532, 189 Fed. 546 (D. C. Pa.): "The claimant is a corporation engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, having its principal office at Hoosick Falls, N. Y. The bankrupt was a retail dealer in such implements with residence and place of business at Tillie, Adams County, this district. Between September 1900 and January 1910, the claimant entered into four several agreements with the bankrupt and in pursuance of the same delivered to him certain implements consisting of mowers, side delivery rakes, etc. When Hartdagen was adjudged a bankrupt September 13, 1910 some of these implements being in his possession were turned over to the trustee who on demand declined to deliver them to the petitioner and thereafter these proceedings were instituted. * * * The contracts entered into * * * are agreements of sale whereby the title of the property in question passed to James M. Hartdagen, subject to an agreement stated in the contracts to hold the property in question for the benefit of the company, to secure to it the payment of the purchase price of the property so sold. * * *

"This provision of the Bankruptcy Act puts the trustee, in so far as the assets of the estate are concerned, in the position of a lien creditor, and to this extent this case is distinguished from the case of the York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, and others of its character, which no doubt inspired Congress to enact the amendment recited." This case further quoted at § 1140.

Decisions holding that a trustee has no other rights than such as belonged to the bankrupt are no longer controlling.²⁵

§ 1243. But Where Filing or Recording Not "Required."—But such conditional sales contracts are not void in states where filing or recording is not necessary as against "creditors."²⁶ And in such states, the Amendment, of course, would not affect these conditional sales contracts, since the trustee is himself a "creditor."

§ 1243¼. Whether Preservation of Lien for Benefit of Estate Requisite.—It would seem, also, that the lien of the levy, as to which the unrecorded instrument is void, should be preserved for the benefit of the estate.²⁷

Davis v. Crompton, 20 A. B. R. 53, 158 Fed. 735 (C. C. A. Pa.): "Now, § 67f further provides that such lien shall be deemed wholly discharged and released 'unless the court shall on due notice order that the right under such levy, judgment, attachment or other lien shall be preserved for the benefit of the estate, and thereupon the same may pass to and shall be preserved by the trustee for the benefit of the estate aforesaid.' The trustee did not attempt to preserve this lien. It was the receiver who, through the restraining order, obtained possession of the property discharged of the lien; no proceedings were then taken to preserve the lien, and it was not until April 4, 1907, in the midst of the controversy arising between the conditional vendor (claimant herein) and the trustee, that the trustee filed a petition praying to be subrogated to the rights of the execution creditor, upon which petition an order of subrogation was entered. An examination of the record shows that the execution creditor no longer had any rights at the time the order of subrogation was made, and therefore, the trustee took nothing by virtue of the said order."

§ 1243½. Whether Extent of Lien Measures Extent of Trustee's Rights.—It would seem to follow, logically, that the extent of such creditor's lien would measure the extent of the trustee's rights in the property levied upon as against the conditional vendor; and that as to any excess of the property, over and above the lien, the rights of the conditional vendor would be paramount to those of the trustee precisely as they would be to those of the bankrupt.

§ 1244. Distinction between Conditional Sales, as Mere Retentions of Title, and Chattel Mortgages, as "Transfers."—The fundamental distinction between conditional sales whereby the seller never parts with title and the buyer never gets title, and chattel mortgages, which are "transfers," must be borne in mind and, if borne in mind, will help to reconcile apparently conflicting decisions as to the effect of failure to record instruments of "transfer."²⁹

Compare, In re Cavagnaro, 16 A. B. R. 323, 143 Fed. 668 (D. C. N. H.): "The title of the property under the New Hampshire law thus remaining in the vendor, and the right of a particular creditor thus resulting upon principles of estoppel through the creditor's doing something without notice, like that of making an attachment under legal process, it is not influenced much if at all by § 67 of the Bankrupt Act or the decisions thereunder, which in a large sense relate to situations where the debtor has undertaken to place liens upon property, the title to which was in himself rather than in a vendor."

³⁰. Power of Sale in Conditional Vendee.—But even in States where actual levy is thus required to invalidate the lien for mere nonrecording, if the vendee is given the right to sell in the ordinary course of trade it would seem the property passes to the trustee in

Even in the case of a chattel mortgage, when it is understood between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, that the mortgagor may sell the chattels in his business, and use the proceeds, the transaction is fraudulent in law as against the creditors of the mortgagor. Such an arrangement, if expressed in

In re Cavagnaro, 16 A. B. R. 322, 143 Fed. 668 (D. C. N. H.): "Much of the apparent conflict upon the authorities, in respect to the title of a trustee in bankruptcy to property in possession of the bankrupt under conditional sales, is relieved by a critical examination of the particular phraseology of the statutes upon which the various decisions are founded. In some of the States it is declared by statute that unrecorded conditional sales are only good as between the vendor and vendee, while in others that they shall be void for want of record as against creditors, subsequent purchasers, pledgees, or mortgagees, and in others that the contract shall be recorded within thirty days of the delivery of the property, and in others that it shall be acknowledged and recorded in order to be binding as against others than the vendee and his heirs. Isaac on Conditional Sales in Bankruptcy, 9-12. Thus, it will be seen, under some of the State statutes creditors may hold against an unrecorded conditional contract of sale without regard to the question of actual notice, and under such circumstances trustees in bankruptcy reasonably enough hold a status, with respect to the title of the property, different from that which would exist under a State statute, where the property could only be held under judicial process by an attaching creditor without notice. Hence, it becomes essential to look at the particular provisions of the New Hampshire statute and the New Hampshire authorities as to the status of the title under a conditional sale like the one in question."

§ 1246. Disguised Conditional Sales, Void for Want of Record.—

Transfers amounting to conditional sales, unfiled but pretended to be consignments, leases or conveyances of other interests not requiring filing or recording—the property passes.³¹

§ 1246½. Bills of Sale as Mortgages.—Bills of sale given as security are mortgages, and follow the same rules with regard to filing, powers of sale, etc., as mortgages.³²

In re Reynolds, 18 A. B. R. 666, 153 Fed. 295 (D. C. Ark.): "It is conceded the instrument, defeats its essential nature and qualities as a mortgage, so that, in a legal sense, it is not a security, but merely the expression of a confidence, by the mortgagee in the mortgagor; and, if made, but not expressed in the instrument, is equally vicious, if not more suggestive of fraudulent purpose."

In Pennsylvania conditional sales are void as to creditors (whether recorded or not). In re Butterwick, 12 A. B. R. 536, 131 Fed. 371 (D. C. Penn.).

§ 1247. Chattel Mortgages or Conditional Sales Made in State Where Recording Not Required but Contemplating Delivery Where Required and Vice Versa.—A chattel mortgage³³ or a conditional sale contract³⁴ made in a State whose laws do not require the filing or recording of such mortgages or contracts, which contemplates delivery or use in another State whose laws do require such filing, is governed by the laws of the latter state, and if the chattel mortgage or conditional sale contract is not filed or recorded, and the purchaser goes into bankruptcy, then the trustee of the bankrupt purchaser takes the property free from the liens.

On the other hand, where such an instrument is made in one State, the statutes of which provide for recording in the county "wherein the property shall be kept," and the property covered by said contract is to be kept at a place in another jurisdiction, the statutes of which provide that where a conditional sale made in one State contemplates or expressly provides that the property is to be delivered or used in another State the law of the latter State governs, and if no law of that State inhibits contracts of conditional sale, the validity of the contract in question is to be tested under the general law upon the subject.³⁵

§ 1247½. Removing Mortgaged Chattels or Chattels Sold under Conditional Sale to Another State, without Consent.—Where mortgaged chattels or chattels sold under conditional sale are removed from the state where the mortgage or conditional sales contract has been duly recorded, without the mortgagee's or conditional vendor's consent, the lien of the mortgage and the rights of the conditional vendor remain unaffected.

where the State law declares them good against creditors.³⁷

The Amendment of 1910, § 47a (2), endowing the trustee with the rights of a creditor "armed with process," is applicable to real estate.³⁸

Sturdivant Bank v. Schade, 27 A. B. R. 673, 195 Fed. 188 (C. C. A. Mo.) (Reversing In re Jackson Brick & Tile Co., 26 A. B. R. 916); "The trustee being in possession of the real estate upon which the lien is claimed by virtue of § 47a of the Bankruptcy Act, must be deemed a creditor holding a lien thereon by legal or equitable proceeding." In this case, however, the court held the mortgage valid because good against levying creditor under state law.

An unwitnessed though otherwise duly executed real estate mortgage has been held not to be a lien in Ohio but to be only a contract to give a lien upon which action for specific performance must be begun before the bankruptcy of the mortgagor else it will be invalid as to the trustee in bankruptcy, such holding even having been made in a case arising before the Amendment of 1910 giving the trustee the right of a levying creditor, the court declaring that the principles of Cassell v. York did not apply to real estate mortgages and doubting whether the Supreme Court rightly apprehended the Ohio law in the Cassell v. York case, at best.³⁹

So, in some jurisdictions, an assignment of a mortgage must be recorded in order that it may be valid as against the trustee in bankruptcy.⁴⁰

§ 1249. Unrecorded Sales of Personalty Where Property Still in Seller's Hands.—Unrecorded sales of personalty where the property remains in the hands of the seller are void in some states.⁴¹

§ 1250. Other Liens and Contracts Not Requiring Record.—Where the statute does not require filing a lien is good without it.⁴²

Thus, it has been held that the assignment of a contract, under the New York Lien Law, need not be recorded in order to be effective as against the contractor's trustee in bankruptcy, because that law does not render such an assignment void as to general creditors or creditors entitled to file

§ 1251. Owner's Lien on Material Left on Premises by Bankrupt Contractor.—Thus, the owner's lien upon material left on the premises by a bankrupt contractor, which by contract the owner is entitled to use in completing the job, is not void, although the contract is not recorded.⁴⁴

§ 1252. Equitable Liens upon Property Already Pledged and in Pledgee's Hands.—Likewise, a pledge without delivery of the article involved, may be made operative as an equitable lien, where definite enough, and will be good without recording if the Statute does not require recording.⁴⁵

Similarly an oral agreement to procure fire insurance for the benefit of a mortgagee will operate as an equitable assignment of the proceeds of policies taken out in the mortgagor's own name,⁴⁷ but not of policies taken out by the grantee of the equity of redemption.⁴⁸ else. There would be little left to the established doctrine with regard to pledges, if that was the case; and it is somewhat singular, that in all the litigation, where pledges of personal property have been upset, for want of a delivery, no one should have discovered this easy way out. This is not to say, that an equitable lien, under some circumstances, may not exist; but only that there is nothing to support it here. It never arises or is enforced except against property in the hands of a party to the original transaction out of which it is claimed to grow, or his voluntary representatives, or one who has notice of it and is affected with it as a superior right; within which all the cases cited in support of it will be found to fall. 19 Am. & Eng. Encys. (2 Ed.) 36. It is not good as against a trustee in bankruptcy, taking title, in the interest of creditors, by operation of law, as is the case here."

§ 1258. Chattel Mortgages with Power of Sale, When Void.— Chattel mortgages with power of sale are void as against the trustee if there is no agreement that the proceeds be applied on the debt, where such mortgages are held void as to creditors by the law of the state.⁵⁶

The goods which the chattel mortgage thus authorizes the bankrupt to sell must pass to the trustee under § 70 as being property which the bankrupt might have transferred before the bankruptcy.

Facts held not to constitute chattel mortgage: Executory sale of bankrupt's entire season's output of lumber; lumber left on seller's premises and merely tagged with buyer's name; and permission given to seller to retail therefrom provided replacement be made; considerable more advanced on total purchase price than lumber up to that time manufactured; security taken for excess; held entire transaction does not amount to mortgage. Stelling v. G. W. Jones Lumber Co., 8 A. B. R. 521, 116 Fed. 261 (C. C. A. Wis.).

In re National Bank of Canton, 14 A. B. R. 180, 135 Fed. 62 (C. C. A. Ohio): "Under the settled law of Ohio, the question of good faith is not vital if, under a mortgage of a stock of merchandise, it is expressly or impliedly, provided that the mortgagor shall remain in business as before until condition broken or the mortgagee in his own interest chooses to dispossess him.

"If the instrument has in fact been made in good faith it becomes an effectual security notwithstanding such a provision, from the time the mortgagee takes actual possession.

"But before possession taken such an instrument is void as matter of law as to purchasers and creditors of the mortgagor. * * *

"It is also noticeable that the mortgage contains no clause requiring the mortgagor to account for sales nor that the lien should extend to goods afterwards purchased. * * *

"But with reference to the effect of a mortgage upon a stock of goods with the right of the mortgagor to remain in possession and continue business, the instrument is fraudulent in law regardless of registration, and void as to creditors who acquire rights before the mortgagee takes actual possession. Here the mortgagee never took possession and the seizure under the bankruptcy proceedings, therefore, occurred before the mortgage was validated."

Zartman v. First Nat. Bank, 19 A. B. R. 27, 189 N. Y. 267: "* * * because an agreement permitting the mortgagor to sell for his own benefit renders the mortgage fraudulent as matter of law as to the creditors represented by the plaintiff."

In re Construction & Dry Dock Co., 14 A. B. R. 466 (D. C. N. Y., modified, 16 A. B. R. 325): "As already stated, in the Roberts case, the mortgagor sold, and was permitted to sell, goods in a store; in the Benner case he was empowered to sell lumber; in the case at bar it was contemplated that it should sell material and ships, and it was free to use and consume its stock of materials on hand for the purposes of its business. A mortgage on a pound of sugar and one on a ship should be alike invalid where the same power of disposition is given to the mortgagor. The money was loaned for the very essential purpose of vitalizing the business, so that its stock and material might be made into ships, or other structures to be sold and repaired. Assume that money is loaned to a baker to enable him to conduct his business and to secure the loan a mortgage is taken on the flour constituting the baker's stock in trade, and he is empowered to convert such flour into loaves of bread and to sell the same, would any one contend that the mortgage was an effectual lien upon either the flour or the loaves? In such case the parties constitute the material, and whatever results therefrom, articles of commerce, and the manifest intention is that they shall be sold free from the mortgage. In principle, there is no difference between material in a shipyard, authorized to be converted into boats and ships, and thereupon sold, and flour which is authorized by the parties to be converted into loaves of bread and sold. The magnitude or qualities of the article, or the structure into which it is intended that they shall enter, should not mislead the reason. The law has a common application. If articles are left with the mortgagor to sell in the course of his business and for the purposes of his business, then, under the decisions considered, the mortgage is invalid. If a rule exists, it should be applied logically."

In re Standard Tel. Co., 19 A. B. R. 491, 157 Fed. 106 (D. C. Wis.), affirmed sub. nom. Knapp v. Milw. Tr. Co., 20 A. B. R. 671, 162 Fed. 675 (C. C. A.): "The question of law arising in this case involves the construction of a Wisconsin statute. It is therefore a local question, as the federal court in such a case adopts the ruling of the highest judicial tribunal of the State. This proposition is so familiar as to require the citation of no authorities. The Wisconsin Supreme Court has consistently held that a chattel mortgage, which upon its face stipulates that the mortgagor may retain possession of the mortgaged property, sell and dispose of the same in the usual course of business, and appropriate any part of such proceeds to his own use and benefit, is fraudulent and void as to creditors. * * * Under these cases it is not a question of intent, because such an arrangement necessarily tends to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. The mischief that called forth this stringent doctrine was the hardship imposed upon the general creditor who found between him and his debtor a chattel mortgage on a stock of goods which allowed the mortgagor to retain possession, and to appropriate to his own use, the avails of the business, while such creditor was remediless. As against such creditor, such a mortgagor under Wisconsin decisions is void as matter of law without regard to the question of the intention of the parties to the mortgage. The mortgage in suit expressly allows the mortgagor the privilege of disposing of the avails of the business to its own uses and purposes, provided only: (a) The interest on the bond is paid; (b) the sinking fund, amounting to $500 per quarter, or $2,000 per annum, is provided for. Beyond this the power of sale and appropriation is unrestrained. But the mortgage under consideration contains another more obnoxious provision. By express terms it is stipulated that if and when the mortgagee shall consent to waive the requirements as to the sinking fund, then and in that case the mortgagor is simply required to keep up the interest on the bonds, and is at liberty to apply all the balance of the proceeds of the business to its own uses and purposes. Thus a secret agreement between the parties may result in continuing the lien of the mortgagee indefinitely, and furnish a cover to protect the mortgagor from attacks of creditors while using the proceeds of the business as though the same were his own."

In re Standard Tel. & Elec. Co. (Knapp v. Milw. Tr. Co.), 24 A. B. R. 761, 216 U. S. 545 (affirming 20 A. B. R. 671, 162 Fed. 675, C. C. A., and 19 A. B. R. 491, 157 Fed. 106, D. C.): "It was found as a matter of fact that no statement was filed of the amount of the sales, amount of new stock bought, amount applied on mortgage, etc., every sixty days, as required by the Wisconsin statute, § 2316b; that since the execution of the mortgage the company, in the course of its business, made sales from the mortgaged property and applied the proceeds to its own use; that the property was in possession of the mortgagor; that Knapp, the trustee, knew that the business was being so transacted; that it was understood that the business should be so transacted and sales of the mortgaged property so applied to the mortgagor's use.

"While there was a finding that no intentional bad faith was shown, still we agree with the Court of Appeals and the district judge that, under the law of Wisconsin, as construed by her highest court, such conditions as were contained in these mortgages rendered them fraudulent in law and void as to creditors." Quotation from this decision is continued at § 1211. It is also quoted on questions of procedure at §§ 2875 and 2969.

And this is equally true as to a contract which, in effect, operates as a chattel mortgage.⁵⁷

And it is void, even where the mortgagee has actually seized the goods before bankruptcy, in some states.⁵⁸

The mortgage on the stock of merchandise left in the possession of the bankrupt with the right to sell in the usual course of business, and to buy and add new stock in the same manner, was void as to creditors ab initio, and continued void even after the possession was taken, for the reason that it was a fraud upon creditors under the Arkansas decisions."

And is void whether the mortgage is recorded or not.⁵⁹

In some states, however, the objectionable feature of such mortgages is eliminated by taking possession of the property, pursuant to a reserved power, before a creditor asserts a right thereto by seizure or otherwise.⁶⁰

And such mortgages are valid in some jurisdictions.^{60a}

§ 1259. Not Void if Agreement to Apply Exists Though Agreement Disregarded.—But such mortgage is not void where there is an agreement that the mortgagor should so apply the proceeds.⁶¹

And this is so even though the obligation is disregarded by the mortgagor, if without the mortgagee's consent.⁶²

But if the mortgagee consents, or knowingly acquiesces, the chattel mortgage is void.

In re Hartman, 26 A. B. R. 76, 185 Fed. 196 (D. C. N. Y.): "But when it appears that what was done was in pursuance of a common understanding and with the knowledge and concurrence of both the mortgagor and mortgagee, the conclusion is irresistible that the parties acted pursuant to the agreement actually made, whatever may be found expressed in the mortgage itself."

And in some states, even before the Amendment of 1910 giving the trustee the right of a levying creditor, the mortgage was held void against general creditors, because actually fraudulent.⁶³

§ 1260. And Mere Remaining in Possession and Selling for Short Period without Reservation of Power of Sale, Does Not Vitiare.—

under an agreement for the payment of the price at a future day, and the title by express agreement remain in the vendor until the payment of the purchase price. In such a case the payment is strictly a condition precedent, and until the performance the title does not vest in the buyer. It is one of the exceptional cases in which the law tolerates the separation of the apparent from the real ownership of chattels when the honesty of the transaction is made to appear. But when the purpose for which the possession of the property is delivered is inconsistent with the continued ownership of the vendor, the transaction will be presumed fraudulent as against purchasers and creditors. The transaction will be deemed merely colorable, and the title to have been vested absolutely in the buyer. Ludden v. Hazen, 31 Barb. 650; Frank v. Batten, 49 Hun 91, 1 N. Y. Supp. 705; Bonesteel v. Flack, 41 Barb. 435. When the property is delivered to the vendee for consumption or sale, or to be dealt with in any way inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, or so as to destroy his lien or right of property, the transaction cannot be upheld as a conditional sale, and is a fraud upon the creditors of the vendee. Even in the case of a chattel mortgage, when it is understood between the mortgagor and the mortgagee that the mortgagor may sell the chattels in his business, and use the proceeds, the transaction is fraudulent in law as against the creditors of the mortgagor. Such an arrangement, if expressed in the instrument, defeats its essential nature and qualities as a mortgage, so that, in a legal sense, it is not a security, but merely the expression of a confidence by the mortgagee in the mortgagor; and, if made, but not expressed in the instrument, is equally vicious, if not more suggestive of a fraudulent purpose."

But in some States, they are valid; are valid even as against assignees in insolvency; also are valid whether they be recorded or not, and so, in such States, they are good against the trustee.⁷⁵

In re Newton (Swofford Bros. Dry Goods Co. v. Bryant), 18 A. B. R. 567, 153 Fed. 841 (C. C. A. E. 707, 58 Am. Rep. 382, in which the court indicates, though perhaps by obiter dicta, that the possession of property held by the retailer, for sale, would be inconsistent with continued ownership by the vendor, the Appellate Court of Indiana in West v. Fulling (Ind. App.), 76 N. E. 325, passed squarely upon the proposition under review, holding that an alleged contract under which the vendor sold groceries to another, authorizing the buyer to sell the same in the ordinary course of business, but reserving title until the goods were paid for, was fraudulent—the court reviewing all the Indiana cases, and some of the New York cases on the subject." This case is quoted further at § 1141.

§ 1263½. Equitable Liens and Power of Sale in Other Cases than Mortgages or Conditional Sales.—An equitable lien which involves the apparent ownership in one person who sells in the ordinary course of trade, will not be sustained as against the trustee, where it would work a fraud upon the law.⁷⁷

In re Liberty Silk Co., 18 A. B. R. 582, 152 Fed. 844 (D. C. N. Y.): "But, under the authority of the same decision [Hewitt v. Berlin Machine Wks.] it is asserted that, inasmuch as the trustee has no better right or title to the bankrupt's property than belongs to the bankrupt or to his creditors at the time when the trustee's title accrues, the contract of August 25th, 1905, should be regarded as conferring an equitable lien—a something which is neither a mortgage nor a conditional sale, but a partial reservation of interest on the part of the vendor, not obnoxious to any law of the State of New York, and within the equity of the Bankruptcy Act as interpreted in the case last cited. It must be admitted that no actual fraud is shown or suspected in this transaction, and that the courts of this state have gone far in upholding the validity of hypothecations of personal property even where the goods hypothecated were to be turned into money by the mortgagor, bailee, or conditional vendee, provided it was also agreed that the proceeds of such sale or use were to be applied in diminution of the debt secured by the goods themselves. Prentiss Toll, etc., Co. v. Schirmer, 136 N. Y. 304, 32 N. E. 849, 32 Am. St. Rep. 737. But I am not aware that it has been doubted since Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 424, that where a right existed in a chattel mortgagor to sell the mortgaged property and use the proceeds thereof generally in his own business is, however honest in intent, a fraud upon the law. The wholesome rule is summarily stated in re Garcewich, 8 A. B. R. 149, 115 Fed. 87, that when property is delivered to a vendee for consumption or sale, or to be dealt with in any way inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, the transaction cannot be upheld as a conditional sale and is a fraud upon the creditors of the vendee. That rule in my judgment applies to this case. While I think as above indicated that the transaction is really a mortgage, and as such void for want of filing, yet it makes no difference whether it be denominated in one way or another it still remains true that the filatures in question were delivered to the bankrupt with obvious intent that they should be used and consumed in the ordinary course of that bankrupt's business, and for the benefit thereof. Secret liens are to be discouraged, and where, even innocently, vendors seeking to create such liens permit so obvious a badge of fraud as here appears to exist in their contracts, they must take the legal consequences, and the matter is not bettered by name. An equitable lien which involves a fraud upon the law is none the less obnoxious because so different in form from the better known mortgage or conditional sale as hardly to fall under either well-known category."

§ 1264. Mortgages on After-Acquired Property.—This subject is involved in many other subjects elsewhere discussed.⁷⁸

§ 1264½. Transfers by Insolvent Corporations to Secure Preferred Stockholders.—When a corporation is insolvent it cannot transfer its assets to secure preferred stockholders. They are not creditors and so the transfer is not a preference, though void on grounds of public policy.⁷⁹

9. Simple Contract Creditors in Some States Competent to Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyance.—Where State law permits simple contract creditor to maintain suits to set aside fraudulent conveyances, the trustee has the same right. Andrews v. Mather, 9 A. B. R. 300, 134 Ala. 358; Grunsfeld Bros. v. Brownwell, 11 A. B. R. 601 (Sup. Ct. N. Mex.).

10. Intermediate Creditors' Rights Where Chattel Mortgage Withheld from Record.—Chattel mortgages eventually filed but meanwhile withheld from record are void as to simple contract creditors becoming such in the interval before the filing, in New York, and in Missouri, and are hence void as to the trustee where such creditors exist. In re Metropolitan Co., 15 A. B. R. 119 (Ref. N. Y.). In re Martin, 23 A. B. R. 151, 173 Fed. 597 (C. C. A. Mo.).

11. Rights as between Subsequent and General Creditors Where Mortgage, Voidable Only as to Subsequent Creditors, Is Set Aside.—Subsequent creditors' rights on setting aside a mortgage void as to subsequent creditors alone, for non-record: Thus, where the State law makes a chattel mortgage invalid as to subsequent creditors, whether contract or judgment creditors, unless it is recorded within forty days of its execution or delivery the fund derived by the trustee from the sale of the chattels covered by it is to be divided pro rata amongst subsequent creditors, the balance to apply on the mortgagee's claim and remainder if any to preceding creditors. In re Cannon, 10 A. B. R. 64, 121 Fed. 582 (D. C. S. Car.).

And where such a mortgage has eventually been filed, though thus improperly withheld for a time, only creditors becoming such in the meantime may share in the proceeds, the mortgage being good as to all others. Simmons v. Greer, 23 A. B. R. 443, 174 Fed. 654 (C. C. A. S. Car.), quoted at § 1225¾.

12. Transfer Set Aside, All Creditors to Participate, Not Simply Those Existing at Time of Transfer.—In Ohio, on the setting aside of the transfer, all creditors are to participate in the proceeds; not simply those existing at time of the transfer. In re Kohler, 20 A. B. R. 89, 159 Fed. 871 (C. C. A. Ohio), quoted at § 1225¾.

13. Unrecorded Chattel Mortgage Void as to Intervening General Creditors—When Set Aside in Bankruptcy Intervening Creditors Alone Participate.—In Missouri a chattel mortgage withheld from record for a period but filed before bankruptcy, is void as to intervening creditors whether "armed" or not and hence is void as to the trustee; but on being set aside, the proceeds are distributed among the intervening creditors. In re Martin, 23 A. B. R. 151, 173 Fed. 597 (C. C. A. Mo.).

14. All Mortgages within Three Months of Failure, by State Statute Presumptively Fraudulent unless Rebutted by Proof of Present Real Consideration.—Thus, where the Civil Code of Louisiana makes null and void as presumptively fraudulent all mortgages given within three months of a debtor's failure, unless the mortgagee shall prove that at the moment of the contract he gave a real and effective value for it, such provision is incorporated into the bankruptcy act. In re Jacobs, 1 A. B. R. 518 (D. C. La.).

15. No Evasion of Statute Requiring Recording within Six Months of Execution, by Keeping Renewals Off Record.—State statute requiring mortgages to be recorded within six months of execution cannot be evaded by giving renewals thereof within every six months and keeping the renewals off the record, even though the last one be recorded within the six months and before bankruptcy.

16. "Warehouse" Receipts—Insufficient "Warehousing" Where Merely Space in Bankrupt's Own Warehouse Rented.—It is an insufficient "warehouse" under the Wisconsin Statute to secure the benefits of warehouse receipts, to simply rent space in the bankrupt's warehouse. Warehouse Co. v. Hand, 16 A. B. R. 49 (C. C. A. Wis.); Warehouse Co. v. Hand, 19 A. B. R. 291, 206 U. S. 415. Compare, ante, § 1146.

17. Resident Creditors' Claims Having Priority Over Claims of Foreign Corporation.—The Tennessee statute gives priority, in the distribution of the assets of a foreign corporation, to the claims of resident creditors over the claims of other foreign corporations which have not complied with the statutory regulations for the doing of business by foreign corporation; and this priority has been recognized in bankruptcy, as conferring substantive rights, not dependent upon resort to special remedies. In re Standard Oak Veneer Co., 22 A. B. R. 883, 173 Fed. 103 (D. C. Tenn.), quoted at § 2196.

18. "Sales of Merchandise in Bulk." Under Maine Act, which does not declare fraudulent in law sales in bulk not conducted in compliance with the Statute, a bona fide purchaser was held protected, where the purchase price was used in paying creditors. Gorham v. Buzzell, 24 A. B. R. 440, 178 Fed. 596 (D. C. Me.).

Such sales, where the purchaser is innocent of participation in any fraudulent intent, will not be void (in the absence of any statute regulating the same). Shelton, Trustee, v. Price, 23 A. B. R. 431, 174 Fed. 891 (D. C. Ala.).

19. Conditional Sale Becoming Absolute on Failure to Record Within Ten Days.—Where a State statute makes a conditional sale absolute as to subsequent creditors for failure to register within a certain time, the trustee has been held to succeed to the rights of subsequent creditors. In re American Machine Works (Chilberg v. Smith), 23 A. B. R. 483, 174 Fed. 805 (C. C. A. Wash.).

Impliedly, In re Terrill, 4 A. B. R. 145 (D. C. Vt.): "They were mere preferences which would become void by insolvency proceedings if begun within a required time, and might not be, and in fact were not begun at all."

Compare, inferentially and apparently, but not really contra, In re Boyd, 10 A. B. R. 340, 120 Fed. 999 (D. C. Iowa): "It is a familiar rule that, when property comes under the control and custody of a court, all parties claiming interests or rights thereto will be permitted to assert such rights before the court having the custody of the property. It is equally well settled that in such cases regard will be paid and protection be granted to the substance of the right asserted, even though the court may not be able to adopt and follow the form of the remedy, which under the laws of the State, would be alone open to the claimant if the property was not in the custody of the court."

Compare, obiter and inferentially, Goldman v. Smith, 1 A. B. R. 271, 93 Fed. 182 (D. C. Ky.): "Where there is a preference prohibited by the Kentucky Statute, it does not of itself make the preference a general assignment but requires some proceedings in the State court to have it so declared: hence we have not regarded it as applicable to the question under consideration."

But it has been held that if such special remedies have already been resorted to, or are still available and are actually availed of, then the special rights thereby conferred are to be recognized in bankruptcy, and if the holders to Renewal of Chattel Mortgage.—By statute, in New York, a renewal of a chattel mortgage for money borrowed, not for purchase price, by a corporation, is invalid without the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders, and it has been held that the trustee succeeds to the rights of these creditors, though the corporation may be estopped. In re Laundry Co., 23 A. B. R. 859, 176 Fed. 740 (D. C. N. Y.), which would be, perhaps, good law if occurring since the Amendment of 1910, whereby the trustee has been given the rights of creditors holding executions, but is doubtful law as applied to the situation before the Amendment of 1910, when the trustee was held simply to stand in the shoes of the bankrupt and to be bound by the bankrupt's estoppels, § 1149.

21. Lien Acquired by Delivery of Execution to Sheriff. Thus where, under the local law, a lien is acquired by the delivery of an execution to the sheriff, the trustee may be subrogated to such lien creditors' rights. Rock Island Plow Co. v. Reardon, 27 A. B. R. 492, 222 U. S. 534, affirming 22 A. B. R. 26.

Statute Requiring Tender Back of Part of Purchase Price on Retaking Possession under Conditional Sale.—

It has been held in Ohio that the statute requiring the conditional vendor to refund a part of the purchase price before taking possession of conditionally sold property, does not apply where the conditional vendor does not seek to regain possession thereof from the bankruptcy court, but asks the bankruptcy court merely to sell the property and pay him his lien from the proceeds or to compel the trustee to complete the contract. In re Max Goldman, 23 A. B. R. 497, 174 Fed. 579 (C. C. A. Ohio).

State statute confines the benefit to certain ones to the exclusion of all others such persons will have the same priority in bankruptcy.⁸²

§ 1267. Maintaining Statutory Suits, to Perfect Special Rights, but for Benefit of All.—Perhaps in such cases the bankruptcy court might permit the creditors for the benefit of all to institute litigation or to continue litigation already instituted in the State court, retaining, itself, the custody of the res, under the analogous doctrine of In re Johnson, 11 A. B. R. 544 (D. C. Nev.); In re Mundle, 14 A. B. R. 680, 139 Fed. 691 (D. C. N. Y.); Crosby v. Spear, 11 A. B. R. 613, 98 Me. 542; Chauncey v. Dyke Bros., 9 A. B. R. 444, 119 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Ark.); Vollkommer v. Frank, 14 A. B. R. 695; Small v. Muller, 8 A. B. R. 448 and others; not confining the benefits to certain creditors, however, as seems to be the suggestion in Moore v. Green, 16 A. B. R. 648, 145 Fed. 480 (C. C. A. W. Va.), wherein the court say,

“As to whether the relief to which the petitioner herein is entitled should have been afforded him by proceedings in the bankruptcy court, or that court should have suspended its administration so far as the portion of the assets of the bankrupt is concerned, properly applicable to the lien of the deed of the 13th day of June, 1902, in favor of Mrs. Porterfield, is largely a matter of discretion in the view we take. Either course could have been adopted. No question of jurisdiction was involved. The bankruptcy court clearly had jurisdiction to proceed, and, if needs be, to have stayed the prosecution of the suit in the State court for the time being; but the State court likewise, at the time of the institution of the suit therein and the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, had and still has jurisdiction, and we think, as a matter of convenience, aside from any question of comity, the better plan would have been and is to proceed with the litigation in the State court, to the end that all creditors who may desire to do so may appear therein, and assert their rights to such fund, and in the meantime the bankruptcy proceedings would as to that portion of the estate remain in abeyance; the bankruptcy court carrying out the judgment of the State court, when duly informed thereof, in said proceeding.”

But, of course, it is not bound to do so and it may refuse to permit such controversy over property in its own custody to be carried on elsewhere.⁸³

^{82.} Moore v. Green, 16 A. B. R. 648, 145 Fed. 480 (C. C. A. W. Va., reversing In re Porterfield, 15 A. B. R. 11): In this case a mortgage to secure a pre-existing debt was made by an insolvent before four months prior to the institution of bankruptcy proceedings against the mortgagor; but between the time of its execution and the bankruptcy a creditor started suit in the State Court under a State statute declaring, upon suit instituted within a year, such conveyances should be held to inure to the benefit of all creditors joining. The court held that the legal proceedings in the State court did not create the lien but simply perfected the lien for all creditors joining and that the creditors thus joining were entitled to priority under § 64 (b) (5) and should have distribution made in accordance with the State statute. But compare, §§ 1225³/₄, 1738.

§ 1268. And Where Bankruptcy Court Not in Custody of Property Involved.—Where the bankruptcy court has not the custody of the property involved, the question as to what rights the creditors will acquire under such statutes will depend upon several things: 1st, Undoubtedly, if the trustee or creditors would not be permitted by the State courts to turn the property or its proceeds on recovery over to the bankruptcy court for distribution in accordance with the Bankruptcy law, then the trustee and creditors would not be permitted to commence such suit, nor to maintain one already commenced. 2nd, Probably, also, if the state statute declares that the setting aside of such conveyance shall operate as an assignment for the benefit of creditors, then a substantive right would exist independently of the remedy, in which event the trustee probably would be subrogated to the rights of creditors under such a statute, even if not permitted to avail himself thereof because of the form of the remedy prescribed.⁸⁴

And it has been held that where a transfer is not preferential as against the Bankrupt Act, but is preferential by State law, the trustee may intervene in behalf of all creditors in the pending suit in the State court, and the lien of such suit may be preserved for the benefit of the estate in bankruptcy though annulled as to the particular creditors instituting the suit, such being the holding in a State where the State law declares a transfer by an individual member of a partnership, of his individual property, to be a preference as against partnership creditors of an insolvent partnership, contrary to the rule in bankruptcy.⁸⁵

§ 1269. Prior General Assignment—Whether Effective to Avoid Liens Recorded before Bankruptcy but Not until after Assignment.—Where the State law gives to a general assignment for the benefit of creditors the effect of a levy of execution or attachment so as to avoid unrecorded liens, such liens if not recorded at the time of the assignment although subsequently recorded before the bankruptcy have been held in one case to be void as against the trustee although the assignment itself is nullified by the bankruptcy.

In re Andrae Co., 9 A. B. R. 135, 117 Fed. 561 (D. C. Wis.): "By statute, in Wisconsin, the assignee in such case represents the rights and interests of creditors in respect of transfers or liens which are fraudulent or void as to creditors, and such right is enforceable by a creditor if not enforced by the assignee. * * * As the mortgage was not a valid lien against creditors when their rights accrued under the assignment, it is plain that the subsequent filing gave it no better standing within the State Law. It was equally invalid, under this provision of the Bankruptcy Act, when the petition for involuntary bankruptcy was filed, March 15th, unless that act operates through some of its other provisions to divest the creditors of such right, and thus enables the parties to the void instrument to give it validity by their mere act of filing on ⁸⁴. But compare, obiter (as to act of bankruptcy), Goldman v. Smith, 1 A. B. R. 271, 93 Fed. 182 (D. C. Ky.).

the intermediate day. I am of opinion that neither the terms of the Bankruptcy Act nor intervention thereunder have such anomalous result. True, the making of the assignment was an act of bankruptcy within the act, * * * but the assignment was not void, and, except for the adjudication of bankruptcy, the assignment would have remained in force to be carried out under the State law. It was voidable only; in force when this petition was filed and until displaced by the adjudication thereupon. * * * So considered, the subsequent filing was nugatory, and the mortgage is within § 67a, and not a valid lien against the estate."

Where a prior general assignment is, by State law, effective to avoid unrecorded liens, it will be likewise effective in bankruptcy if the lien be preserved for the benefit of the estate. This proposition is fully discussed post, at § 1489.

However, the principle of this section seems to have been violated in a case where a trust mortgage which operated like an assignment for the benefit of creditors and hence was avoided by the bankruptcy, and as to which unfiled chattel mortgages were by State law void, was given before an unfiled mortgage was finally filed, the giving of the trust mortgage and also the subsequent filing of the chattel mortgage occurring within four months of the bankruptcy; the court refusing to preserve the lien of the trust mortgage for the benefit of all creditors, but declaring it, instead, void for all purposes.^{85a}

§ 1269½. Anti-Bulk-Sales Laws.—Most of the States have in recent years adopted legislation regulating the sales of entire stocks in bulk. In general the trustee succeeds to these rights of creditors, under § 67.⁸⁶

It has been held that the Maine Anti-Bulk-Sales Act does not make such a sale fraudulent in law for non-compliance with the statute, so that where no fraud in fact is shown and the proceeds have been used in paying creditors, the trustee may not recover against the purchaser.⁸⁷

SUBDIVISION "C."

TRUSTEE AS A CREDITOR "ARMED WITH PROCESS"—AMENDMENT OF 1910.

§ 1270. Trustee Now a Creditor "Armed with Process"—Amendment of 1910.—As previously remarked at §§ 1137 and 1207, the Amendment of 1910 to Bankruptcy Act, § 47 (a) (2), endows the trustee with the rights and remedies of a creditor "armed with process." These rights are additional to those previously enjoyed by him and creditors are thereby armed under the Bankruptcy Act of 1898 with more extensive rights and remedies than under any previous bankruptcy law of the United States or of England. The trustee's rights under this amendment are not derivative;

they are not those derived from any existing creditor. They are independent rights conferred by the statute itself. They effectually invest the trustee as representative of the creditors with all the possible rights of creditors under state law. He is in effect erected by the statute into an ideal "creditor"—one might say into all kinds of a creditor, having all rights possible to a creditor under State law.

So the trustee, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, is, in addition to his other rights, to be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon; and also as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court is to be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied.⁸⁸

In re Farmers' Co-Op. Co. of Barlow No. 1, 30 A. B. R. 187, 207 Fed. 108 (D. C. N. Dak.). "The trustee in bankruptcy derives his right from § 47a, subdivision 2, as amended by the Act of 1910. The purpose of the amendment is now reasonably clear. Under the original act several of the Circuit Courts of Appeal had held that the filing of the petition in bankruptcy amounted to a seizure of the property of the bankrupt and conferred upon the trustee the same rights as a creditor would have obtained by the levy of an execution or attachment at the date of the filing of the petition. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 15 A. B. R. 633, the Supreme Court held these decisions to be unsound, and ruled that the trustee simply stood in the shoes of the bankrupt, and took the property subject to every claim that could have been urged against him. The trustee, therefore, as the amendment plainly declares, 'as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.' This language measures the right of the trustee. The history of the statute, as above outlined, shows that those rights are obtained by the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. That act is by the amendment given the same force as a seizure of the property under execution or attachment by a creditor, and cannot be given any retroactive effect. In re Jacobson & Perrill (D. C. Ga.), 29 A. B. R. 603, 200 Fed. 812. If a creditor had levied upon the property here involved at the date of the filing of the petition, he would have acquired no rights as against the plow company, because it had filed its contract some time before; and the trustee, by the very language of the statute, has no higher right than such a creditor."

In re Hammond, 26 A. B. R. 336, 188 Fed. 1020 (D. C. Ohio): "If it were not for the amendment of 1910 we would be referred for determination of the question before us to section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, which read then as now: 'The trustee of the estate of a bankrupt * * * shall * * * be vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt.' And, following the authority of York v. Cassell, it would transpire that, none of the creditors of Hammond having reduced his claim to judgment, the decisions cited above from the Ohio authorities would have no application and Fee could enforce his lien as if the bankruptcy petition had not been filed, for, under the Ohio authorities, the mortgage was good between the parties, and, by the language of the Bankruptcy Act, just quoted, manifestly the trustee stood in the shoes of the bankrupt, York v. Cassell being to the effect that only creditors who have reduced their claims to judgment or who have levied by attachment may assert rights against the mortgagee of a mortgage void in the particulars referred to. But the Act of June 25, 1910, amending the Bankruptcy Law, adds to § 47, paragraph (a), these words: 'And such trustees, as to all properties in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon, and also, as to all property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied.' It seems that this language might have found a more appropriate place in § 70 of the act, but, however that may be, it is plain that the two sections must now be construed together and that the trustee can no longer be said to have the limited title of the bankrupt; wherefore it need not be argued further that, if this mortgage had been made after the amendment, Fee would have had no lien against the trustee. And we think that the amendment effects the same result in this case, although the mortgage is prior in time.

"At any time before or after the adoption of the amendment, any creditor, by reducing his claim to judgment and levying or by suing out an attachment, could have defeated Fee's mortgage. At all times it was in peril of the individual action of Hammond's creditors in this way. The Amendment of 1910 does nothing more under these circumstances than to collectively put these creditors into the position of judgment or attaching creditors by representation. It simply offers another method of effecting a remedy against the mortgage, which already existed, in behalf of the creditor."

In re Williamsburg Knitting Mill, 27 A. B. R. 178, 190 Fed. 871 (D. C. Va.): "The amended act of June 25, 1910, was passed as a result of the decision in the York Mfg. Co. case, 201 U. S. 344, 15 A. B. R. 633, and with a view of meeting the same. * * *

"The language used in this Amendment is clear and comprehensive, and as viewed by the court unequivocally gives to the bankruptcy proceeding the effect of a lien, as is contemplated by the York case, supra, and the same will suffice to give to those claiming rights by reason of the bankruptcy court proceedings, precedence over an unrecorded vendor's lien under the Virginia statute. The amendment does, in fact, give to the bankruptcy proceedings the force of a 'caveat to all the world,' and in effect 'an attachment and injunction,' and the same applies to cases as well of the attempted disposition of property after bankruptcy, as to those asserting title to or lien upon the bankrupt's estate arising out of transactions antedating the bankruptcy. The effect of this change is unquestionably radical and far reaching, as regards the consequence of the institution of bankruptcy proceedings, but it is what Congress had the right to do, and carries out what in the judgment of many should be the effect of such proceeding. It makes the date of the institution of the bankruptcy proceeding, the time as of which rights to, and claims against the estate, should be reckoned with and adjusted, and from and after which period no one creditor or claimant can secure or receive preference or advantage over another. The opinion of Mr. Justice Swayne in Bank v. Sherman, 101 U. S. 403, 406, 25 L. Ed. 866, supra, is particularly appropriate in this respect, the learned justice saying:

"The statute is clear and imperative. Its constitutional validity is not questioned. It contains no qualifications. We cannot interpolate what is claimed. Such a function is beyond the sphere of our power and duty. It is our business to execute the law as we find it, and not to make or modify it. In the disposition of property among creditors, equality is equity. It was the genius and purpose of the statute to secure this result as far as possible from the moment its aid was invoked, whether by debtor or creditor.'

"This view of the effect of this amendment is taken by Remington, an author of recognized authority on bankruptcy laws. In the recent edition of his work (volume 3, p. 331), the author says:

"By the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), "this rejected doctrine" that bankruptcy operates as an "equitable levy" as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court, has become the accepted doctrine.'

"Moreover, this author shows that Congress by the amendment in question purposely sought to modify the decision of York Manufacturing Co. v. Cassell, supra. At page 331 of the same volume (3) the report of the Senate judiciary committee on the amendment of the act is set out in full, stating in terms that its object and purpose was to meet the decision in the York case, and to adopt in lieu thereof the views herein taken. Collier on Bankruptcy (8th Ed.), pp. 541, 542, refers to this amendment approvingly, and in effect takes the same view of the act that Remington does, though he calls attention to the fact that more logically the amendment should have been to § 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, instead of § 47.

"The only decision since the amended act to which the court's attention has been called is that of In re Lausman (D. C., Ky.), 25 Am. B. R. 186, 183 Fed. 647, a decision of Judge Evans, of the Western District of Kentucky. This opinion is entitled to much weight by reason of the recognized ability and experience of the judge rendering the same. The case involved, however, a small amount, and it is fair to assume was not presented as fully as has been the case here, and was decided before the publication of the recent editions of Remington and Collier, the former of which called special attention to the reason for the Senate's action, as above indicated.

"It is earnestly insisted that the amended act, if given the interpretation herein accorded it, is unconstitutional as depriving the petitioners of their property without due process of law. With this view the court cannot agree, as it is in no respect a violation of one's constitutional rights to require him to conform to the recordation acts of the State in which he has property. The vendor's rights in this case would, under the plain terms of the Virginia statute, have been protected against the bankrupt's execution or other lien creditors, and remained unaffected by bankruptcy proceedings, had they seasonably complied with the statute requiring recordation of their reservation of title. The further suggestion is made that the amended act should not be given the effect contended for because of the particular section amended; in other words, it is maintained that the amendment should have been to § 70, subsection 5, instead of to clause 2 of section 47, subd. 'a' of the act. Unquestionably the amendment should more properly have been to the seventieth section of that act, as claimed, which deals with the property as to which the trustee acquires title, instead of section 47, which relates more particularly to the duties of the trustee, but at the same time it does not follow that it should have been necessarily so made, and that Congress could not have expressed its desires and wishes as well under the section prescribing the duties of the trustee as that relating to title to property, and this is just what it apparently did, and in terms so clear, comprehensive, and specific that there can be no serious doubt as to its meaning, intention, and purpose, and the court feels bound by the plain import of the language used.

"The action of the referee sought to be reviewed will be approved and affirmed."

Millikin v. Second Nat'l Bank of Balt. 30 A. B. R. 477, 206 Fed. 14 (C. C. A. Md.), reversing 29 A. B. R. 613:

"Prior to the enactment of the amendment of June 25, 1910, a trustee in bankruptcy in so far as the rights of the bankrupt were concerned stood in the shoes of the bankrupt, and the property taken by him was subject to the enforcement of any rights or equities that could have been enforced between the parties at the time of the adjudication, and at that time the principles contended for by counsel for appellee would have applied to a case like the one at bar. In other words, an unregistered mortgage being good inter partes could have been enforced as such, but the act as amended completely changed the situation, and now the trustee is the representative of all the creditors, thus accomplishing what the law intended, to wit, to cut up by the roots all secret liens or other agreements between the parties. Under the old law a general creditor was not permitted to contest such transactions, and as a result was deprived of the right to share in an equal distribution of the assets of the bankrupt.

"Under the present law (§ 47, subd. 2) a trustee occupies the same position as a judgment creditor with an execution in his hands at the time of the adjudication; the amendment in question being in the following language: * * *

"The Bankruptcy Act was intended to secure an equal and equitable distribution of the assets of the bankrupt among all creditors, * * *

"It will be seen that the provisions of the law [Maryland statute of registration] clearly require that mortgages of personal property shall be recorded within 20 days from the date thereof, and it is apparent that the real purpose of the statute is to prevent one from disposing of his property by mortgage, bill of sale, or other secret conveyances. This requirement renders it impossible for one to execute a secret lien and thereafter deal with the public as though nothing had transpired to lessen or impair his financial ability."

In re Bazemore, 26 A. B. R. 494, 189 Fed. 236 (D. C. Ala.): "Before the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, the trustee's title as against a claim under an unrecorded conditional sale, though the State law required record, did not prevail. (Crucible Steel Co. v. Holt (C. C. A., 6th Cir.), 23 Am. B. R. 302, 174 Fed. 127). It was to obviate this, among other things, that § 47, clause 2, subdivision a, of the Act was amended by inserting the words 'And such trustees, as to all property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.' (Statement of Representative Shirley to the House of Representatives, Congressional Record, 61st Congress, 2d session, pp. 2552-4). And to vest in the trustee the same right to attack secret unrecorded liens, where record was required by the State law, as was given to the judgment creditors and others under that law. It seems to me that the language of the amendment should be construed to effectuate this result if it fairly admits of such construction. If the operation of the amendment is restricted to cases in which a creditor has in fact acquired a lien by legal or equitable proceedings, then it adds nothing to the law as it was under the original act. By virtue of § 67 of the original act the trustee was subrogated to such a lien, if created within four months, and could enforce it for the benefit of the estate. If created beyond four months from the filing of the petition, it was, of course, valid as against the trustee, under both the original and amended acts. The class of cases, unprovided for by the original act, and intended to be reached by the amendment, was that in which no creditors had acquired liens by legal or equitable proceedings and to vest in the trustee for the interest of all creditors the potential rights of creditors potential with such liens. The language is readily susceptible of this construction. It recites that such trustee 'shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.' This language aptly refers to such rights, remedies and powers as a creditor holding such a lien is entitled to under the law, rather than to the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor who had actually fastened a lien on the property of the bankrupt estate."

In re Nelson, 27 A. B. R. 272, 191 Fed. 233 (D. C. S. Dak.): "Under § 47, subdivision (a) (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, as amended in 1910, if property coming into the custody of the court be claimed by another, the trustee is vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon. Applying its plain interpretation to this section and amendment, it follows that an agreement which would have been binding upon and could have been enforced between the parties hereto prior to the Amendment of 1910 no longer necessarily binds the trustee. His position is no longer the same as that of the bankrupt, but he is now in the position of a creditor holding a legal or equitable lien, and in this case the conditional sale of this property and the writing above set forth, termed a 'warehouse receipt,' are to be interpreted exactly as if the trustee were a creditor holding such lien."

Bank of North America v. Pennsylvania Motor Car Company, 235 Pa. 194: "The manifest purpose of the Amendment was to enlarge the rights, remedies and powers of the trustee in bankruptcy, and it had the effect of vesting in the trustee, the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor having a lien. In other words the trustee * * * was given every right which a creditor would have had."

In re Smith, 29 A. B. R. 527, 198 Fed. 876 (D. C. Wis.): "Prior to the passage of this amendment, a trustee in bankruptcy was vested with no better right or title to the bankrupt's property than belonged to the bankrupt at the time when the trustee's title accrued. He 'stood in the shoes of the bankrupt,' and had no greater right; and where, under the State law, which was binding on the bankruptcy court, a chattel mortgage was valid as between the bankrupt and the mortgagee, but not against purchasers, mortgagees or creditors, it was good as against a trustee in bankruptcy. The adjudication of bankruptcy was not an assertion of a lien, and did not put the trustee in the position of creditors who had, through process, acquired specific liens against the property covered by the mortgage. In other words, if the mortgage, though not filed, was good between the parties, the trustee was not a purchaser, a mortgagee, nor a lienee."

In re Dancy, etc., Co., 28 A. B. R. 444, 198 Fed. 336 (D. C. Ala.): "One of the purposes of the amendment was to confer on trustees in bankruptcy the same right to avoid secret unrecorded liens as the creditors would have had under the State laws had not the bankruptcy intervened and the exercise of which they are deprived of by the bankruptcy proceeding. The rights of creditors to avoid unrecorded liens, which the Bankruptcy Act confers on trustees, are to be determined by the laws of the particular State requiring the record. The act was intended to give to the trustee the rights, remedies and powers of each and all classes of creditors who are clothed by the recording statutes of the States, as construed by their courts, with the right to avoid such secret and unrecorded liens or conveyances."

In re Franklin Lumber Co., 26 A. B. R. 37, 187 Fed. 281 (D. C. Pa.): "It is to be noted that § 47a (2) as amended by the Act of June 25, 1910, applies to the present dispute. Under that amendment, if property coming into the custody of the court be claimed by another, the trustee is vested with all the rights, remedies, and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon. An agreement therefore which would previously have been valid between the parties—such, for example, as was considered in Davis v. Crompton (C. C. A., 3d Cir.), 20 Am. B. R. 53, 158 Fed. 735 (209 U. S. 548)—is no longer necessarily valid against the trustee. * * *

"Assuming that the bankrupt would be bound by the words of this agreement and could not deny it to be a lease, his trustee is not so bound, and may contend that the contract is really one of conditional sale. In such a contention he may offer any competent and relevant evidence, and it is obvious I think that the conduct of the parties may ordinarily throw much light on the true meaning of their agreement. If they treat it as a contract of sale, it makes no difference what name they have given it. A creditor may adopt his own construction, and they cannot successfully object. This is well settled in Pennsylvania and elsewhere. Brunswick v. Hoover, 95 Pa. 508; Peek v. Hein, 127 Pa. 500; Ott v. Sweatnam, 166 Pa. 217." This case further quoted at § 1228.

Obiter, In re Geiver, 28 A. B. R. 413, 193 Fed. 128 (D. C. S. Dak.): "* * * under section 47 subd. 'a,' clause 2, as amended by the Act of June 25th, 1910, this property having come into the custody of the court and being claimed by the Henderson State Bank, the trustee is vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.

"It follows that these chattel mortgages which would have been binding upon, and could have been enforced between the parties hereto, prior to the Amendment of 1910, no longer necessarily bind the trustee. His position is no longer the same as that of the bankrupt, but he is now in the position of a creditor holding a legal or equitable lien, and in the case at bar the chattel mortgages are to be interpreted exactly as if the trustee was a creditor holding such lien." However, whilst the foregoing correctly enunciates the law yet it was obiter, because, even before the Amendment of 1910, fraudulent transfers or holdings were voidable by the trustee, see post, § 1209, and this case was that of a chattel mortgage with power of sale, void for fraud under State law, in any event."

Thus, the trustee is vested with the rights of judgment creditors.⁸⁹

Thus, an unrecorded chattel mortgage, or unrecorded conditional sales contract is void as against the trustee.⁹⁰

Thus, dower right is cut off where by the state law dower is not good against a levying creditor, or, as in Pennsylvania, where the wife has dower only in what remains after payment of debts.⁹¹

Thus, the trustee is entitled to the same rights which an execution creditor would have if property in the custody of the bankrupt had been seized by an officer under a writ of attachment or execution; or, where the property consists of money which has been deposited in a bank, if garnishment proceedings had been instituted and served on the depository.⁹²

Thus, the trustee is a creditor armed with process as to a rescission of sale for the fraud of the bankrupt, and his rights are subordinate to those of the defrauded seller where the State law subordinates the rights of an execution creditor to a defrauded seller.⁹³

On the other hand the trustee gets no more rights than creditors "armed with process" under State law. It is also to be borne in mind, that so far as the Amendment of 1910 is concerned, it simply makes available to the trustee the rights conferred by State law upon creditors "armed with process" and the trustee gets no more than such rights.

Thus, where under State law a levying creditor would take subject to an "equitable lien" on after-acquired property, likewise the trustee would take subject thereto and adopt the local construction of the law.^{93a}

Amendment of 1910 Adopts Formerly "Rejected Doctrine."—By the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), the formerly "rejected doctrine" that bankruptcy operates as an "equitable levy" as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court—has become the accepted doctrine.⁹⁴

94. Before the Amendment of 1910 to § 47 (a) (2) the title of the trustee so far as it was in excess of the bankrupt's title as explained in the text, was much more restricted than now. The following was a correct statement of his then-limited title and rights as successor to creditors.

In cases affected by the fraud of the bankrupt towards creditors, the trustee was vested with the title to and could recover the property involved, and in cases where there had been some transfer or encumbrance of the property, void as to creditors by state law for want of record or otherwise, the trustee was held to succeed, and to succeed merely to the rights of any creditor who was actually then qualified under the state law to avoid the transfer or encumbrance or to take advantage of the fraud; in addition to which he possessed the peculiar rights and title conferred by the Bankruptcy Act to avoid preferences, and liens by legal proceedings acquired within four months of the filing of the bankruptcy petition.

See Report No. 691 of the Senate Judiciary Committee of the 61st Congress, Second Session stating the law as it existed before the Amendments of 1910, "One of the most important decisions under the present law is York Manufacturing Company v. Cassell (201 U. S. 344), wherein it was held that property

But the Creditor's Title Taken by the Trustee, Formerly, Was That Only of Some Existing Creditor "Armed with Process."—The statute did not, before the Amendment of 1910, by its wording specify what was meant by the use of the word "creditor" in this connection, although in its § 1 of definitions, the word "creditor" was defined to mean anyone holding a debt, claim or demand provable in bankruptcy. Moreover, the phraseology of § 70 (e), giving the trustee the right to avoid any transfer made by the bankrupt which any creditor "might" have avoided, would not necessarily seem to have implied that some creditor must actually, before the time of the filing of the bankruptcy petition, already have taken all the formal steps, such as the obtaining of judgment against the bankrupt or the attaching of the bankrupt's property before judgment, required of creditors in the process of subjecting debtors' property; and such was the holding in some cases, even before the Amendment of 1910.

Beasley v. Coggins, 12 A. B. R. 355, 57 So. Rep. 213: "A trustee in bankruptcy occupies a relation similar to that of a judgment creditor of the bankrupt, and may file a bill in equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of real estate by the bankrupt, although neither the trustee nor any creditor has reduced any claim against the bankrupt to judgment."

The statute seemed, even before the Amendment of 1910 to strive to give to the trustee the same rights and remedies that any creditor "might" have exercised to avoid transfers, whether actually exercised or not, and such provision might not unnaturally have been construed to give him either the right to take all the necessary steps that would have been required of such creditor, or, perhaps, even to have dispensed with such preliminary steps altogether. Certainly, since the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings itself ties the creditors' hands from helping themselves by their ordinary remedies, it might have seemed not only a natural but also an eminently equitable construction of the law even before the Amendment of 1910 to have held that the trustee was subrogated not only to all rights and remedies for avoiding transfers which any creditor had already begun to assert, but also to all rights and remedies which any creditor "might" have asserted, as, indeed, the very wording of § 70 (3) appears to indicate. Impliedly In re Shaw, 17 A. B. R. 205 (D. C. Me.).

Furthermore, it is a familiar rule in the subject of the equitable remedies of creditors that where there is already a sequestration of all the debtor's property for the benefit of creditors, the obtaining of a preliminary judgment against the debtor, and the return of execution unsatisfied, being vain things, will not be required before resort may be had to equitable remedies against transferees of such debtor and other parties obligated to creditors by virtue of the debtor's dealings with them while insolvent; and this rule was held in some cases applicable in bankruptcy, even before the Amendment of 1910 "armed" the trustee "with process."

Mueller v. Bruss, 8 A. B. R. 442, 112 Wis. 406: "There can be no doubt about the general proposition that, before a mere creditor or his representative can attack a conveyance alleged to have been made by his debtor in fraud of his creditors, he must show that he has exhausted his legal remedies. * * * Obtaining judgment on the claim with a return of an execution unsatisfied, is prima facie evidence of the exhaustion of all legal remedies against the debtor. The rule stated, however, is not inexorable and without exceptions. If it appears that for any reason a judgment against a debtor can not be obtained, it will be excused as a preliminary to a creditor's suit. * * * The principle involved in the exceptions to the rule is that covered by an unrecorded instrument, which would have been void in the State courts had the property been taken by an assignee or receiver or levied upon by attachment or execution, was not void where possession was taken by a receiver or trustee in bankruptcy, the Supreme Court holding that the trustee stood precisely in the bankrupt's shoes with regard to the unrecorded when a party has done all that is possible for him to do to prepare his case for equitable cognizance, he is not to be denied access to the only tribunal capable of granting relief."

Skilton v. Codington, 15 A. B. R. 817, 185 N. Y. 80: "The rule that a creditor must first recover a judgment is simply one of procedure and does not affect the right. Therefore, where the recovery of a judgment becomes impracticable, it is not an indispensable requisite to enforcing the rights of the creditor." See, also, In re Bement (Smith v. Mishawaka Woolen Mfg. Co.), 22 A. B. R. 616, 172 Fed. 98 (C. C. A. Wis.).

Also, Bankr. Act, § 67 (a), providing that "claims which for want of record, or for other reasons, would not have been valid liens as against the claims of the creditors of the bankrupt, shall not be liens against his estate," and Bankr. Act, § 67 (b), providing that "whenever a creditor is prevented from enforcing his rights as against a lien created or attempted to be created by his debtor who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, the trustee of the estate of such bankrupt shall be subrogated to and may enforce such rights of such creditor for the benefit of the estate," are strongly indicative of such intention.

Crucible Steel Co. v. Holt, 23 A. B. R. 302, 174 Fed. 127 (C. C. A. Ky.): "That decision necessarily negatives the application to such a case of the provision of act July 1, 1898, § 67a, that, 'claims which for want of record, or for other reasons, would not have been valid liens as against the claims of the creditors of the bankrupt, shall not be liens against his estate,' and the further provision of § 67b, that 'whenever a creditor is prevented from enforcing his rights as against a lien created or attempted to be created by his debtor who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, the trustee of the estate of such bankrupt shall be subrogated to and may enforce such rights of such creditor for the benefit of the estate.' Those provisions were not referred to in the opinion of the court and, of course, their meaning and scope were not defined further than is done by the necessary implication from the decision; but it cannot be supposed they were overlooked."

See Sheldon v. Parker, 11 A. B. R. 169 (Neb. Sup. Ct.). Compare, to same effect, In re Falls City Shirt Mfg. Co., 3 A. B. R. 437, 98 Fed. 592 (D. C. Ky.), where the court held that the bankruptcy absolves the lienors under a mechanics' lien statute from the requirement of the institution of legal proceedings within a certain specified time.

In re Standard Tel. v. Elec. Co. [Knapp v. Milw T. Co.], 24 A. B. R. 761, 216 U. S. 545 (affirming 20 A. B. R. 671, 162 Fed. 675, 19 A. B. R. 491, 157 Fed. 106), quoted supra.

Such might have been an available construction of the statute as to the title of the trustee in bankruptcy, even before the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act § 47 (a) (2); yet the Supreme Court did not adopt it. On the contrary the Supreme Court carried into the construction of this Act the underlying idea of all our former bankruptcy acts, as well as that of the English Bankruptcy Acts (see Winsor v. McClellan, 2 Story 492, Fed. Cas. 17,887) and of the Massachusetts Insolvency laws (see In re Littlefield, 19 A. B. R. 18, 155 Fed. 838, U. S. C. C. A. Mass.), and denied to the trustee in bankruptcy any right creditors merely might have exercised, but had not already actually exercised, or placed themselves in position under State law to exercise; the idea being that the bankruptcy adjudication in no wise in and of itself affected the title but merely transferred whatever rights the bankrupt or any of his creditors actually had acquired at the time—save and except always as to preferences and liens by legal proceedings within the four months period.

Compare, In re Mullen, 4 A. B. R. 227, 101 Fed. 413 (D. C. Mass.): "Probably § 70 (a) was not so much intended to avoid certain classes of transfers as to declare the right of the trustee to avoid transfers voidable by other persons. A similar observation is applicable to § 70 (a), subd. (5)."

Compare, inferentially, Thomas v. Woods, 23 A. B. R. 132, 173 Fed. 585 (C. C. A. Kans.).

"Creditor" Same as in State Law, So Far as Concerns Necessity of "Arming with Process."—The word instrument, even though in the State courts had the seizure been made by an assignee in insolvency or receiver, or by the sheriff under execution or attachment, the unrecorded lien would have been void as against creditors. By this ruling the trustee in bankruptcy is held to be vested solely with the bankrupt's own ti-

"creditor" as used in the sections of the Bankruptcy Act relating to the title and rights of the trustee has the same meaning that is attached to it by the state law. [First Nat'l Bank v. Title & Trust Co., 24 A. B. R. 330, 178 Fed. 187 C. C. A. Pa., quoted at § 1228] and refers to a creditor "armed with process," where by the state law it is only as to such creditors that the inhibited transfer of the property or lien upon it is void. [Instance, Rock Island Plow Co. v. Reardon, 27 A. B. R. 492, 222 U. S. 354, affirming 22 A. B. R. 26.]

Thus, since the word "creditor," as used in this connection in statutes, generally refers to such creditors only as have levied execution or attachment, or otherwise fastened upon the property itself, an unfiled chattel mortgage or other encumbrance required by law to be filed in order to be valid as against creditors, was, before the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act § 47 (a) (2) had given the trustee the rights of a creditor "armed with process," nevertheless good in bankruptcy, unless some creditor had actually levied execution or attachment, or otherwise fastened on the property before bankruptcy, and the lien of the levy had been preserved for the benefit of the estate.

York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 15 A. B. R. 633, 201 U. S. 344: "We have not been referred to any decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio as to the meaning of the statute requiring the filing of contracts of conditional sales, but we concur with the Circuit Court of Appeals in this case, that the statute would render the unfiled contract void as to the same class of creditors mentioned in the chattel mortgage statute. Therefore the contract would be void as to creditors who before its filing had 'fastened upon the property' by some specific liens. As to creditors who had no such liens, being general creditors only, the statute does not avoid the sale, which is good between the parties to the contract."

In re Economical Printing Co., 6 A. B. R. 615, 110 Fed. 514 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "It remains to consider tle, except as to property fraudulently transferred and as to property which (within four months before the bankruptcy) has been seized by a creditor by legal process or voluntarily transferred to him by way of a preference. The trustee, under the present law, does not (except as to fraudulently transferred whether the trustee can take advantage of the non-compliance with the statute. It has always been held by the courts of New York that only such creditors can take advantage of it as are armed with some legal process authorizing the seizure of the mortgaged property, and are thereby in a position to enforce a lien upon it, * * * and that the mortgage is good as to creditors at large as well as between the parties. Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867 (14 Stat. 517), a failure to file a mortgage of goods and chattels in the manner prescribed by law of the State, while rendering the mortgage void as against the creditors of the mortgagor if it was not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continuous possession of the chattels, did not affect its validity as against the assignee of the mortgagor in bankruptcy. The assignee succeeded merely to the title of the mortgagor, and as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee the validity of the mortgage was unaffected by the failure. Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731, 25 L. Ed. 816. Under the present act, however, by § 67, 'claims which for want of record or for other reasons would not have been valid liens as against the creditors of the bankrupt' are not liens against his estate (subdivision 'a'), and by subdivision 'b,' whenever a creditor is 'prevented from enforcing his rights against a lien created or attempted to be created by his debtor, who afterwards becomes a bankrupt,' the trustee of the estate is subrogated to and may enforce the rights of such creditor for the benefit of the estate. And by § 70 (subd. 'e') 'the trustee may avoid any transfer by the bankrupt of his property which any creditor of such bankrupt might have avoided.' When the mortgagor was adjudicated a bankrupt, there was, so far as appears, but one judgment creditor. Whether any other creditor could have eventually entitled himself to the benefit of the statute was a matter of mere conjecture. It would have depended not only upon his own vigilance in pursuing his legal rights, but also upon the volition of the mortgagor. The mortgagor could have made a general assignment of its property for the benefit of its creditors, or surrendered possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee; and in either event the right of all creditors to impeach the lien would have been extinguished. * * *

"The Bankrupt Act does not vest the trustee with any better right or title to the bankrupt's property than belongs to the bankrupt or to his creditors at the time when the trustee's title accrues. The present act, like all preceding bankrupt acts, contemplates that a lien good at that time as against the debtor and as against all of his creditors shall remain undisturbed. If it is one which has been obtained in contravention of some provision of the act, which is fraudulent as to creditors, or invalid as to creditors for want of record, it is invalid as to the trustee; and if it is one which was invalid as to some particular creditor, though valid as to other creditors, the trustee is in certain cases subrogated to the rights of that creditor. The provisions which have been quoted do not necessarily touch a lien which at the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy was valid as to the bankrupt, and could not then be disturbed by any of his creditors. The lien of the present mortgage would not have been valid as against the claims of the creditors, within the terms of subdivision 'a,' if the creditors had obtained the right to question it, but otherwise it was valid. * * *

"We conclude that, except as to the Reilly judgment, the lien of the mortgage was valid, and that the trustee is entitled only to the amount of that judgment out of the proceeds in the registry of the court."

R. 615, 110 Fed. 514, 517, held that a non-filed mortgage was void only as to creditors who by judgment or attachment or otherwise had seized or were in a position to seize the mortgaged property. Since that decision, however, the Court of Appeals of the State of New York has held that a non-filed mortgage is void as to general creditors although it can not be attacked until they are in a position to seize the mortgaged property by virtue of a judgment, attachment or otherwise. This, however, is a mere matter of procedure and the mortgage is none the less void as to them. Cullen, Ch. J., says in that case: 'As appears by the opinion the result was reached on the assumption that by the law of the State of New York a non-filed chattel mortgage was void only as to judgment creditors obtaining a lien, not as to general creditors. We think the very eminent judge who wrote in the case misconceived the law of the State in this respect. If it were a Federal question we would follow the decision regardless of our own opinion, but as the question is as to the law of this State we must adhere to the prior decisions of this court.' Skilton v. Codington, 185 N. Y. 80, 88, 15 Am. B. R. 810. As we are bound to follow the construction of the State law adopted by the highest court of the State, the case of the Economical Printing Company must be held to have gone too far in deciding that a non-filed mortgage is valid as to general creditors. Regarding the mortgage as void, though not subject to attack because there were no judgments against the bankrupts at the time of the adjudication, the question is whether the trustee is in a position to attack it. We think he is." Citing §§ 67 (a) (d), 70 (a), 70 (a) (5).]

Where "Arming with Process" Not Requisite by State Law, Not Requisite in Bankruptcy.—And where "arming with process" is not necessary by the state law, it was held, even before the Amendment of 1910, not to be requisite in bankruptcy, and if by state law the lien would be void, though no creditor "armed with process" existed, it would be likewise void in bankruptcy.

Bradley, Alders & Co. v. McAfee, 17 A. B. R. 499 (D. C. Mo.): "Under the Missouri Statute it is not necessary, as under the Ohio statute, followed by the Supreme Court in York Manufacturing Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 351, 15 Am. B. R. 633, that to enable the trustee to avail himself of the statute the creditors should, by levy or attachment anterior to the proceedings in bankruptcy, have taken steps 'to fasten upon the property for payment of the debt.' Nor does the case of Hewitt v. Berlin Machine Works, 194 U. S. 296, 11 Am. B. R. 709, apply, as that case arose under the New York statute, which avoided the sale only as to 'Subsequent purchasers in good faith,' and there was no evidence in the case of the creditors being such purchasers.

"As applied to the Missouri statute, the holding by the Court of Appeals of this Circuit in In re Pekin Plow Co., 7 Am. B. R. 369, 112 Fed. 308, 310, is conclusive on this court, which is that:

"The institution of proceedings in bankruptcy amounts to an effectual sequestration for the benefit of all his creditors of all property of all bankrupt. By such a proceeding the creditors "are using the courts of law and their processes for the collection of their debts," and the creditors thereby make an effectual seizure of the property of the bankrupt."

And where the instrument was held the benefit of the trustee by order of court. In this way a distinct advantage is given in bankruptcy to the holders of unrecorded liens. The creditors' hands meanwhile are tied from making any levy, because the separate rights of the creditors have become vested in the trustee for all; besides which, as to property by State law to be void as to the subsequent creditors but not as to prior creditors, the principle of the York v. Cassell case was held not to apply, even before the Amendment of 1910, since the contest then became one between creditors under Bankr. Act, § 64 (b) (5). In re Doran, 17 A. B. R. 799 (D. C. Ky.); but compare, In re Doran, 18 A. B. R. 760, 154 Fed. 467 (C. C. A. Ky.).

Discussion of Certain Formerly Rejected Doctrines—First Rejected Doctrine—That Trustee's Title as to Property Not in Custody, Analogous to Receiver's or Assignee's in State Courts.—The doctrine was held in some cases, even before the Amendment of 1910 that, as to property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, the effect of the bankruptcy was to give the trustee whatever rights a receiver or assignee or similar officer acting in equity for the benefit of creditors would have had in the particular State as to property not in his possession; thus, if, by the State law, preliminary judgment against the bankrupt or prior actual levy upon the property involved were necessary, that such judgment or levy would likewise be necessary in case the trustee in bankruptcy seeks to avoid a transfer; and on the other hand, if in such State such prerequisites were dispensed with in cases of similar equitable sequestrations of the debtor's property, that they would be dispensed with in suits by the trustee in bankruptcy. Compare, In re Standard Tel. Co., 19 A. B. R. 491, 157 Fed. 106 (D. C. Wis.), affirmed sub nom. Knapp v. Milwaukee Trust Co., 20 A. B. R. 671, 162 Fed. 675 (C. C. A., affirmed sub nom. In re Standard Tel. & Elec. Co. [Knapp v. Milw. Tr. Co.], 24 A. B. R. 761, 216 U. S. 545): "The only impediment in the way of the simple creditor is that under the rules of practice he cannot attack the mortgage by an independent action in equity. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has, however, several times held that such a contest may be waged by an assignee representing general creditors under the said assignment laws, upon the theory that his powers were substantially the same as a trustee in bankruptcy, or a sheriff armed with an execution. Batten v. Smith, 62 Wis. 92, 98, 22 N. W. 342; Sheldon Co. v. Mayers, 81 Wis. 627, 51 N. W. 1082; Valley Lumber Co. v. Hogan, 85 Wis. 366, 55 N. W. 415; Re Ellis, 97 Wis. 92, 72 N. W. 387. Formerly the assignee under the voluntary assignment statute represented the assignor only, but by chapter 207, p. 255, Laws 1901, he is authorized to represent creditors, and may sue to set aside any fraudulent conveyance where the creditors might have proceeded if no assignment had been made. This is in substance and effect the same authority with which the trustee is clothed under §§ 60b and 70e and other provisions of the present Bankruptcy Act. * * * It is also true that the effect of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, as laid down in Mueller v. Nugent, 184 U. S. 1, 7 Am. B. R. 224, * * * has been modified by the Supreme Court in York Manufacturing Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 15 Am. B. R. 633, * * * so that the institution of bankruptcy proceedings no longer has the effect of an attachment or an injunction; but the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has squarely decided in Mueller v. Bruss, 8 Am. B. R. 442, 112 Wis. 406, 410, * * * that a trustee in bankruptcy under the present Act, representing only creditors at large, may maintain an action in equity to set aside transfers of property by the bankrupt in fraud of creditors. This is put upon the ground that the Bankruptcy Act renders it practically impossible for creditors to comply with the equitable rule, and that equity does not demand impossibilities. Jackman v. Bank, 125 Wis. 476. * * * Thus it appears that the general doctrine of equity that to institute such a suit a creditor must be armed with a judgment and execution is observed in Wisconsin, but that such rule is one of procedure only, and not a condition precedent. The same doctrine is held in Skilton v. Codington, 15 Am. B. R. 810, 185 N. Y. 80, 77 N. E. 790, 113 Am. St. Rep. 885. This authority is the more persuasive because Wisconsin borrowed its statute from New York. The Wisconsin law in favor of simple creditors commends itself to me on stronger grounds than mere comity. It is in

erty already in the custody of the bankruptcy court, of course individual creditors would be in contempt of court should they levy thereon. Thus the evil of secret liens has continued. It is this evil and the injustice worked upon creditors who rely upon the debtors' apparent ownership against which the bankruptcy harmony with the spirit of the bankrupt law."

Second Formerly Rejected Doctrine—That Bankruptcy Operates as "Equitable Levy," as to Property in Custody.—The second formerly rejected doctrine was that bankruptcy itself operated as an equitable levy as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court.

The rule that the word "creditor" as used in the Bankruptcy Act refers to the same kind of creditors meant by the State statutes in avoiding transfers and liens—i. e., in general, to creditors "armed with process"—was perfectly consistent, to be sure, with the theory that, as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court itself, i. e., property in the possession or control of the bankrupt after adjudication, or of the marshal, receiver or trustee in bankruptcy, either before or after adjudication, the bankruptcy itself operated as an equitable levy; so that, as to such property in States where equitable sequestration operated as a sufficient "arming with process," the bankruptcy itself would likewise have operated to arm with process the trustee for creditors in bankruptcy, and such was the apparent holding in many cases.

In re Rodgers, 11 A. B. R. 93, 125 Fed. 169 (C. C. A. Ills., reversed, on other grounds, sub nom. Bank v. Title & Trust Co., 14 A. B. R. 102, 198 U. S. 280): "The filing of the petition, followed by seizure and by adjudication in bankruptcy, is a seizure of the property by the law for the benefit of creditors, and an appropriation of it to the payment of the debts of the bankrupt. It is a seizure of the property by legal process, equal in rank to and of the same force and effect as by execution or attachment."

Also, In re Nat'l Bk., 14 A. B. R. 184, 135 Fed. 62 (C. C. A. Ohio).

Bankruptcy So Operating as Equitable Levy Precisely as Other Equitable Levies Operate in Same State.—It was a corollary of the formerly rejected doctrine, however, that the bankruptcy operated as such equitable levy on titles in each state only as other equitable levies there operated. While, in accordance with the formerly rejected doctrine under consideration it would be true that bankruptcy, being beyond question a proceeding in equity, would have operated upon titles in each State as other equitable proceedings would have operated there, it correspondingly would have been true that its operation in each State would have been limited to that of similar equitable proceedings in such State. Thus, if, under State law, it required some particular method of seizure by legal proceedings to nullify the particular lien or transfer involved, as by execution or attachment, and if any other method of sequestration by legal proceedings, as receivership, etc., was insufficient to such end, the first-named method alone would have been effective in bankruptcy. [Impliedly, In re Beede, 14 A. B. R. 702, 138 Fed. 441 (D. C. N. Y.).

Formerly Accepted Doctrine—Bankruptcy Not an Equitable Levy.

—The doctrine adopted, however, was different; and bankruptcy was held not to be in the nature of an equitable levy, whether the property were in the actual custody of the bankruptcy court or not. The bankruptcy proceedings, though equitable, were not, in this respect, held to be analogous to a creditor's bill, but on the contrary were held to effect no change in and of themselves, but merely to give the trustee whatever rights the bankrupt and his creditors at the time of bankruptcy actually possessed under state law and were capable of asserting thereunder (save and except always as to the peculiar rights conferred by the Bankruptcy Act, upon bankruptcy, to avoid preferences and liens obtained by legal proceedings within the four months prior to the bankruptcy).

However much might have been said under the law as it then stood without Amendment for the formerly discarded doctrine that bankruptcy operated (as to all property, at any rate, in the custody of the bankruptcy court), precisely as other equitable sequestrations of like nature so operated under the state law, yet such doctrine was expressly and emphatically repudiated by the Supreme Court of the United States; and the contrary doctrine was adopted, namely, that bankruptcy did not operate as law has set its face. The proposed amendment, whilst correcting the defect named, at the same time carefully guards the rights of all parties. It is evident that in the proposed amendment attempt is made to give effect to two ideas quite distinct: First, that as to the property in the custody of the bankruptcy court the bankruptcy trustee shall be considered to have the same title that a creditor holding an execution or other lien by legal or equitable proceedings levied upon that property would have under State law; and, second, that as to property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court the trustee should stand in the position of a judgment creditor holding an execution returned unsatisfied, thus entitling him to proceed precisely as an individual creditor might have done to subject assets. In this way, in effect, proceedings in bankruptcy will give to creditors all the rights that creditors under the State law might have had had there been no bankruptcy and from which they are debarred by the bankruptcy—certainly a very desirable and eminently fair position to be granted to the trustee.”

In re Farmers' Supply Co., 28 A. B. R. 535, 196 Fed. 990 (D. C. Ga.): “This amendment made a vital change in the act. Instead of the trustee having no greater right than the bankrupt would have, he now has, and had when the pres-would an equitable levy under State laws, even as to property in the actual custody of the bankruptcy court, and that bankruptcy proceedings were not to be considered to be analogous to creditors' bills in this respect.

York Mfg. Co. v. Cassell, 15 A. B. R. 635, 201 U. S. 344: “We come then to the question whether the adjudication in bankruptcy was equivalent to a judgment, attachment or other specific lien upon the machinery. The Circuit Court of Appeals has held herein that the seizure by the court of bankruptcy operated as an attachment and an injunction for the benefit of all persons having interests in the bankrupt's estate.

“We are of opinion that it did not operate as a lien upon the machinery as against the York Manufacturing Company, the vendor thereof. Under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act the trustee in bankruptcy is vested with no better right or title to the bankrupt's property than belonged to the bankrupt at the time when the trustee's title accrued. At that time the right, as between the bankrupt and the York Manufacturing Company, was in the latter company to take the machinery on account of default in the payment therefor. The trustee under such circumstances stands simply in the shoes of the bankrupt and as between them he has no greater right than the bankrupt. This is held in Hewitt v. Berlin Machine Works, 194 U. S. 296, 11 Am. B. R. 709. The same view was taken in Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 Am. B. R. 437. It was there stated that ‘under the present Bankrupt Act, the trustee takes the property of the bankrupt, in cases unaffected by fraud, in the same plight and condition that the bankrupt himself held it, and subject to all the equities impressed upon it in the hands of the bankrupt.’ See Yeatman v. Savings Institution, 95 U. S. 764; Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 731; Hauselt v. Harrison, 105 U. S. 401. The same doctrine was reaffirmed in Humphrey v. Tatmen, 198 U. S. 91, 14 Am. B. R. 74. The law of Ohio says the conditional sale contract was good between the parties, although not filed. In such a case the trustee in bankruptcy takes only the rights of the bankrupt, where there are no specific liens, as already stated.

“The remark made in Mueller v. Nugent, 184 U. S. 1, 7 Am. B. R. 224, ‘that the filing of the petition (in bankruptcy) is a caveat to all the world, and in effect and attachment and injunction,’ was made in regard to the particular facts in that case. The case itself raised questions entirely foreign to the one herein arising, and did not involve any inquiry into the title of a trustee in bankruptcy as between himself and the bankrupt, under such facts as are above stated.

“In this case, under the authorities already cited, the York Manufacturing Company had the right, as between itself and the trustee in bankruptcy, to take the property under the unfiled contract with the bankrupt, and the adjudication in bankruptcy did not operate as a lien upon this machinery in favor of the trustee as against the York Manufacturing Company.”

ent bankruptcy proceeding was instituted, the 'rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings.' The lien or priority would undoubtedly be superior to that of the creditor selling goods by a conditional bill of sale as against the property or so much thereof as might come into the hands of the trustee. * * *

"In the case of Williamsburg Knitting Mill (D. C. Va.), 27 Am. B. R. 178, 190 Fed. 871, Judge Waddill, in the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia expresses the same view. In the opinion Judge Waddill says, quoting from 3 Remington on Bankruptcy, p. 331: 'By the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), this rejected doctrine that bankruptcy operates as an equitable levy as to property in the custody of the bankruptcy court, has become the accepted doctrine.' Judge Waddill continues:

"Moreover, this author shows that Congress by the amendment in question purposely sought to modify the decision of York Manufacturing Co. v. Cassell, 201 U. S. 344, 15 Am. B. R. 633, 26 Sup. Ct. 481, 50 L. Ed. 782. At page 231 of the same volume (3 Remington) the report of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the amendment of the act is set out in full, stating in terms that its object and purpose was to meet the decision in the York case, and to adopt in lieu thereof the views herein taken. Collier on Bankruptcy (8th ed.), pp. 541, 542, refers to this amendment approvingly, and, in effect, takes the same view on the act that Remington does, though he calls attention to the fact that more logically the amendment should have been made to section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, instead of § 47.'"

§ 1270 1/10. Whether Amendment Retroactive—Whether Trustee Stands as "Creditor Armed with Process" as to Liens and Contracts Made before Amendment.—It was held in one case that the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2), wherein the trustee is given the rights of a levying creditor, is not retroactive and does not apply to liens and contracts entered into before that amendment took effect.

Arctic Ice Machine Co. v. Armstrong County Trust Co., 27 A. B. R. 562, 192 Fed. 114 (C. C. A. Pa.): "The contract before us antedates the Amendment. The rights of a vendor and vendee were fixed by it. Under the law of Pennsylvania the reservation of title in the Arctic Ice Machine Co. was from March 22, 1909, the date of the contract of sale, to June 25, 1910, the date of the amendment, against any trustee in bankruptcy that might have been appointed for Keener Bros. To hold that the amendment divested the vendor of its reserved title is, independent of any constitutional question, to give it a retroactive effect, not consistent with any expressed intent of Congress. The principle is too well established to be disregarded that a statute shall not, except where the legislative intent is clear, be permitted to have a retroactive effect."

But it has also been held that the Amendment of 1910 is purely remedial, intended to correct a misinterpretation of the Bankruptcy Act, and is not retroactive if applied to liens and contracts entered into before the amendment.

In re Farmers' Co-Op. Co. of Barlow No. 2, 30 A. B. R. 190, 202 Fed. 1005 (D. C. N. Dak.): "The contract of February 23, 1910, was made prior to the Act of 1910, amending § 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, and the referee for this reason held, following Arctic Ice Mach. Co. v. Armstrong County Trust Co. (C. C. A. 3rd. Cir.), 27 A. B. R. 562, 192 Fed. 114, 112 C. C. A. 458, that the Act of 1910 did not apply to articles furnished under that contract, and directed the trustee to return them to the harvester company. The case cited is not a binding authority in this court, but, owing to the eminent court by which it was rendered, I feel great reluctance in taking a different view of the statute from that there adopted. The question, however, was not very fully considered, and it seems to me that the decision proceeds upon a wrong interpretation of the Act. The history of the statute, as given by Remington, vol. 3, p. 331, and explained in Re Farmers' Supply Co. (D. C. Ga.), 28 A. B. R. 535, 196 Fed. 991, and in Re Williamsburg Knitting Co. (D. V. A.), 27 A. B. R. 178, 190 Fed. 871, shows that it was purely remedial, intended to correct a misinterpretation of the Bankruptcy Act by the courts. This view is also manifest on the fact of the statute. It declares that trustees in bankruptcy "shall be deemed" vested with the rights, remedies, etc. It therefore gives a rule of interpretation rather than a substantive right. Remedial and curative statutes may properly be given a retroactive effect. Sutherland on Statutory Construction, §§ 482, 483. The rule is peculiarly applicable in the present case, for the invalidity of the unfiled contract was created, not by the amendment of § 47, but by the State statute, which was in force at the time the contract was made. All the federal law does is to give effect to the invalidity already declared by the State law. It simply enables the trustee, as the representative of creditors, to assert the same rights which the creditors themselves would have possessed if bankruptcy had not intervened. Another reason for this interpretation is found in the fact that the statute is part of a Bankruptcy Act, and that Act generally applies to contracts made prior to its adoption, the same as to subsequent contracts."

And it was held in one case that a failure to properly refile a chattel mortgage after the Amendment of 1910 will vitiate the mortgage, even though the mortgage itself was executed before the amendment and that such a ruling would not be giving to the amendment a retroactive effect.⁹⁶

§ 1270 2/10. Date When Trustee's Lien or Execution Rights Arise.—The interesting question arises under the Amendment of 1910 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2), endowing the trustee with the rights of a creditor "armed with process" as to what shall be considered as the date that these rights shall be deemed to have arisen. As to property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, the right of the trustee as a lien creditor must be held to be the same as that of a creditor actually levying at the time of the acquisition of the custody by the bankruptcy court, whether the trustee had been qualified or not and irrespective also of the date of the adjudication, the property so affected being bound either as of the date of such acquisition of custody, as in some States, or, in other States as of the date of the issuance of process, namely, the filing of the bankruptcy petition and issuance of the subpoena thereunder, dependent in each instance on State law. The title which the trustee, under Bankruptcy Act, § 70, acquires by operation of law is a different title from that which he acquires by operation of law under § 47a (2) of the Amendment of 1910. The title conferred upon the trustee by the ⁹⁶. In re Smith, 29 A. B. R. 527, 198 Fed. 876 (D. C. Wis.), quoted at § 1240.

Bankruptcy Act, § 70, is the "title of the bankrupt," and it is to date from the date of the adjudication, but the title conferred by the Amendment of 1910, under § 47a (2) is not the title of the bankrupt, nor is it a title derived by subrogation from any creditor; it is an independent title, derived neither by subrogation to the bankrupt's rights, nor by subrogation to any creditor's existing rights, but conferred upon the trustee by the statute, whereby the trustee is endowed with the attributes of a creditor "armed with process" under the State law, irrespective of the actual existence of any creditor then and there "armed" with such process. So what the statute intends to do is to give to the seizure or possession by the bankruptcy officials or bankrupt at the time of the filing of the bankruptcy petition or thereafter, whether such seizure be effected by such trustee himself, or by the marshal or a receiver, or even by the bankrupt, the effect of a levy in behalf of all creditors.

Likewise, as to property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court, the filing of the petition, followed by subsequent adjudication, is to be held analogous to the return of an execution unsatisfied, unless, later on, custody thereof is acquired, in which event such obtaining of custody will amount to a levy at law, or by equitable process such as by creditor's bill, injunction, etc.

At any rate, the trustee's rights do not antedate the filing of the bankruptcy petition.

Hart v. Emmerson-Brantingham Co., 30 A. B. R. 218, 203 Fed. 60 (D. C. Mo.): "It seems reasonably clear that the rights, remedies and powers with which the trustee is invested arise, by relation, as of the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings, or as of the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy and not as of an earlier date."

In re Farmers' Co-Op. of Barlow, 30 A. B. R. 187, 202 Fed. 1008 (D. C. N. Dak.): "This language [Bankruptcy Act, § 47a (2)] measures the right of the trustee. The history of the statute as above outlined shows that those rights are obtained by the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. That act is, by the amendment, given the same force as the seizure of the property under execution or attachment of a creditor and cannot be given any retroactive effect. The right to go back four months from the date of the filing of the petition is confined to transactions which are specifically enumerated in the Bankruptcy Act, and the courts cannot properly apply those provisions to other transactions."

On the other hand, to hold that the rights of the trustee as a creditor "armed with process" do not arise until adjudication, would largely defeat the object of the Amendment of 1910, and would afford a convenient method of perpetuating the evils sought to be remedied, by affording opportunity for recording after the nonrecording had accomplished the harm meant to be guarded against by the registration acts of the various states.⁹⁷

§ 1270 3/10. Conditional Sales, Chattel Mortgages, etc., Withheld from Record, but Filed Prior to Bankruptcy.—Unless there be fraud, a conditional contract of sale, or a chattel mortgage, withheld from record for a time but filed or recorded prior to the bankruptcy, is good as against the trustee, if there be no existing creditor armed with process prior to the filing or recording, since the lien given to the trustee by virtue of the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2), cannot be considered as arising until the bankruptcy.⁹⁸

Big Four Implement Co. et al. v. Isom Wright, 31 A. B. R. 125, 207 Fed. 535 (C. C. A. Kans.): "This amendment must speak as of the time of the bankruptcy. The lien which the trustee is considered as holding must be a lien attaching as of that date. There can be no ground for saying that the lien is in existence before the bankruptcy. No case has been cited which so holds. In most of the cases referred to by the trustee the contract was never filed. In Rock Island Plow Company v. Reardon, 222 U. S. 354, 27 Am. B. R. 492, 32 Sup. Ct. 164, 56 L. Ed. 231, the contract was not filed, yet the vendor had taken possession of the property covered by it before the bankruptcy. It appeared, however, in that case, that prior to that possession by the vendor another creditor had secured a lien by execution, which lien was preserved by the trustee for the benefit of the creditors. There is no authority for holding that a trustee can, in his own right, avoid such contracts as these when they have been filed before the bankruptcy. The decisions are to the contrary. Keeble v. John Deere Plow Co. (C. C. A., 5th Cir.), 190 Fed. 1019, 111 C. C. A. 668. Part of the opinion of the court below in this case is found in Re Jacobson & Perrill (D. C., Ga.), 29 Am. B. R. 603, 200 Fed. 812; Re Farmers Co-operative Co. (D. C., N. Dak.), 30 Am. B. R. 187, 202 Fed. 1005; Hart v. Emmerson-Brantingham Co. (D. C., Mo.), 30 Am. B. R. 218, 203 Fed. 60. In Sturtivant Bank v. Schade (C. C. A., 8th Cir.), 27 Am. B. R. 673, 195 Fed. 188, 115 C. C. A. 140, it appeared that a deed was made in 1902 and not recorded until August 8, 1906. A petition in bankruptcy was filed on October 8, 1906, and an adjudication had on October 31, 1906. The trustee came into possession of the real estate covered by the deed. The court considered that any judgment lien which the trustee was deemed to have was created subsequent to August 8, 1906. It is not necessary to determine whether, under the Amendment of 1912, the lien of the trustee attached on the filing of the petition, or on the date of the adjudication, because the filing of the papers in this case preceded both dates."

Similarly, the retaking of possession before bankruptcy of property sold to the bankrupt on conditional sale, cannot be a preference.

Hart v. Emmerson-Brantingham, 30 A. B. R. 218, 203 Fed. 60 (D. C. Mo.): "It is conceded by the defendant that, if the goods in controversy had remained in the possession of the bankrupt up to the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, the provision of the Bankruptcy Act just quoted would have rendered its title invalid as against the trustee, for, in respect of 'property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court,' the amendment of 1910 confers upon the trustee 'all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor holding a lien by legal or equitable proceedings thereon.' But, as the property here in question was turned over by the bankrupt to the defendant, before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding, and never came into the 'custody of the bankruptcy court,' the provision of § 47, clause 2, last referred to, is rendered inapplicable to the facts in the case. The trustee is thus constrained to rely on that portion of § 44, clause 2, which provides that, as to 'property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court,' the trustee 'shall be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor holding an execution duly returned unsatisfied.' It seems reasonably clear that the 'rights, remedies and powers' with which the trustee is invested arise, by relation, as of the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding, or as of the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and not as of an earlier date."

§ 1270 4/10. But Has Rights of Levying Creditor Only as to Property in Custody or Coming into Custody of Bankruptcy Court.

—It must not be forgotten, however, that the trustee gets the rights of a levying creditor only as to property in the custody, or coming into the custody, of the bankruptcy court. As to other property he does not have the rights of a levying creditor, though he may be subrogated, as before the Amendment of 1910, to the lien of a levying creditor who has actually levied thereon within the preceding four months.

It has been held, also, under the Illinois statute requiring the recording of chattel mortgages, that a trustee is a "third person."^{3b}

In re Beckhaus, 24 A. B. R. 380, 177 Fed. 141 (C. C. Ill.): "The term 'third person' is broad enough to include everybody outside of the immediate parties to the instrument and their privies. A simple contract creditor who has not obtained a judgment is just as much a 'third person,' is just as much a stranger to the mortgage, as is the simple contract creditor who has obtained a judgment. Both have the right to enforce payment, if that can be done. The interests of both are prejudiced if the debtor's property is covered by a fraudulent transfer. If at the time of the fraudulent transfer one creditor has obtained a judgment and the other has not, the only difference is that one has proceeded farther than the other in the enforcement of his rights and the protection of his interest. And when it is said that a fraudulent transfer is void only as to judgment creditors the expression means no more than that a creditor can not seize his debtor's property until he has obtained some process which authorizes the seizure. * * * Our examination of the Illinois cases has led us to conclude that the Illinois courts have not decided, independently of procedure and having a regard solely to rights, that simple contract creditors, irrespective of the progress they may have made in suing their debtor, are not 'third persons' within the meaning and intent of the recording statute."

Acme Harvester Co. v. Beekman Co., 222 U. S. 300, 27 A. B. R. 262: "The filing of the petition is an assertion of jurisdiction with a view to the determination of the status of the bankrupt and a settlement and distribution of his estate. The exclusive jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court is so far in rem that the estate is regarded as in custodia leges from the filing of the petition. It is true that under § 70a of the Act of 1898 the trustee of the estate, on his appointment and qualification, is vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt as of the date he was adjudicated a bankrupt, but there are many provisions of the law which show its purpose to hold the property of the bankrupt intact from the time of the filing of the petition, in order that it may be administered under the law if an adjudication in bankruptcy shall follow the beginning of the proceedings. Paragraph 5, § 70a, in reciting the property which vests in the trustee, says there shall vest 'property which prior to the filing of the petition, the bankrupt could by any means transfer or which might have been levied upon and sold under judicial process against the bankrupt.' Under § 67c attachments within four months before the filing of the petition are dissolved by the adjudication in the event of the insolvency of the bankrupt, if its enforcement would work a preference. Provision is made for the prompt taking possession of the bankrupt's property, before adjudication if necessary (§ 69a). Every person is forbidden to receive any property after the filing of the petition, with intent to defeat the purposes of the act. These provisions, and others might be recited, show the policy and purpose of the Bankruptcy Act to hold the estate in the custody of the court for the benefit of creditors after the filing of the petition and until the question of adjudication is determined. To permit creditors to attach the bankrupt's property between the filing of the petition and the time of adjudication would be to encourage a race of diligence to defeat the purposes of the act and prevent the equal distribution of the estate among all creditors of the same class which as above expressed in the text, although the court apparently gives adhesion to the unlimited doctrine that "immediately upon and by virtue of the adjudication, all the property of the bankrupt wherever situate and in whosoever's possession it may be, passes into the custody of the court, and upon the appointment of a trustee vests in him," the court saying: "This is undoubtedly correct and is fully sustained by the authorities cited." The proposition is not correct and never has been correct, for property does not pass "into the custody of the court" regardless of "whosoever's possession it may be in." The facts of the case and the final decision of the court are, however, wholly in conformity with the correct view, as laid down in the text.

Where a state court, in ignorance of the fact that bankruptcy proceedings had been instituted against the attachment debtor, ordered the sale of certain property as perishable, the sale was not interfered with but the trustee was relegated to the proceeds. Jones v. Springer, 226 U. S. 148, 29 A. B. R. 204.

is the policy of the law. The filing of the petition asserts the jurisdiction of the Federal court, the issuing of its process brings the defendant into court, the selection of the trustee is to follow upon the adjudication, and thereupon the estate belonging to the bankrupt, held by him or for him, vests in the trustee. Pending the proceedings the law holds the property to abide the decision of the court upon the question of adjudication as effectively as if an attachment had been issued, and prevents creditors from defeating the purposes of the law by bringing separate attachment suits which would virtually amount to preferences in favor of such creditors."

Obiter, In re Zotti, 26 A. B. R. 234, 186 Fed. 84 (C. C. A. N. Y., affirming S. C., 23 A. B. R. 304): "Of course, the trustee can after adjudication, and the receiver before, compel the surrender of assets in the possession of the bankrupt or of the alleged bankrupt or of any one for him. As to such persons the filing of the petition may be a caveat attachment and injunction. Mueller v. Nugent was just such a case."

However, the maxim quoted ordinarily is to be taken in the alternative; it operates in some cases as an attachment, in others as an injunction, etc. Thus it is not to be taken as literally accurate so far as it likens the operation of the filing in all instances to be the same, for example, in likening it to an "attachment," it certainly would not be so as to property not in the custody of the bankruptcy court. It would be misleading to say in all instances that the mere "filing" of the petition is "in effect an attachment." Such "filing" would operate as an attachment only where the property involved is in the custody of the bankruptcy court or is brought therein either through being in the possession of the bankrupt, or in that of a receiver or marshal of the court, but the mere "filing" certainly would not operate as an "attachment" under any doctrine if the bankruptcy court had no such custody; and no well considered case will be found so to hold.

Fidelity Trust Co. v. Gaskell, 28 A. B. R. 4, 95 Fed. 864 (C. C. A. Mo.): "It is true that the Supreme Court once said that the filing of a petition in bankruptcy is a caveat to all the world and in effect an attachment and an injunction * * * But the later decisions of that court adjudge that the statement quoted applies only to parties who have no substantial claim of a lien upon or title to the property claimed as that of the bankrupt and that against those who have such claims of existing titles or liens when the petition in bankruptcy is filed its filing is neither a caveat nor an attachment, that it creates no lien and that they are strangers to the proceedings in the absence of an order or process making them parties, or some equivalent notice."

Compare, In re Mullen, 4 A. B. R. 229, 101 Fed. 413 (D. C. Mass.): "If the rights of the trustee under § 70 (a), subd. 4, 5, and § 70 (e), are substantially those possessed by the creditors of the bankrupt under the law of Massachusetts, the trustee in this case cannot defeat the respondent's attachment unless the respondent shall be held, before the attachment, to have been affected with notice of the bankruptcy proceedings. I do not think that he was so affected. It has been said indeed, that bankruptcy proceedings affect with notice the whole world (Bank v. Sherman, 101 U. S. 403, 406, 25 L. Ed. 866); and this in spite of § 21 (e). See Hall v. Whiston, 5 Allen 126. But bankruptcy proceedings can hardly affect any one with notice that certain property standing in the name of a stranger belongs to the bankrupt."

Compare, In re Mertens, 15 A. B. R. 369, 144 Fed. 818 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "While the filing of a petition in bankruptcy is a caveat to all the world, the notice ought not to have the effect of paralyzing all business dealings with the debtor, or to prevent lienors or pledgees from enforcing their contracts."

On the other hand the filing of the petition does operate, in a more or less qualified sense, as a "caveat" and "injunction" in that it affects all persons resorting to legal proceedings against the bankrupt or his property, and perhaps some others, with notice of the proceedings²⁸ and bids them beware. To that extent the property is in "custodia legis." Yet, further than this the maxim is not to be relied on as furnishing a working rule for actual practice and is rather high sounding than efficacious. The filing operates as an attachment sometimes and as an injunction sometimes, etc.

TRUSTEE'S TITLE IN EXCESS OF BANKRUPT'S OWN TITLE AND IN EXCESS OF TITLE OF CREDITORS OUT OF BANKRUPTCY—HIS PECULIAR TITLE CONFERRED BY THE BANKRUPTCY ACT: VOIDABLE PREFERENCES AND INVALID LEGAL LIENS.

§ 1271. Third, Trustee's Peculiar Title and Rights Conferred by Bankruptcy Act Itself.—Third, then, as to cases where the title taken by the trustee is in excess of the bankrupt's own title, and also in excess of the title acquired by a levying creditor; where, in addition, it is the greater title conferred by the special provisions of the bankruptcy act itself.

In the orderly development of the treatise, the two subjects peculiar to bankruptcy law are now reached—the subjects of voidable preferences in bankruptcy and of the invalidity of liens obtained by legal proceedings, within the four months preceding bankruptcy; as well as the peculiar modification in the matter of proof of fraudulent transfers, permitted when the transfers occur within the four months preceding the bankruptcy.

§ 1273. General Discussion.—As previously noted,^{30a} bankruptcy law had its origin in the insufficiency of the ordinary remedies of English Common Law to protect creditors where there was a large number of creditors

28. But compare, even on this point, In re Zotti, 26 A. B. R. 236, 186 Fed. 84 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "We think this language [Mueller v. Nugent, 184 U. S. 1, 7 A. B. R. 224] was never intended to be applied to a bank which has honestly paid checks of a depositor without notice that any petition in bankruptcy has been filed against him and who may never be adjudicated a bankrupt at all." By Bankr. Act, § 11, suits or dischargeable debts are ipso facto stayed see post, § 2695. Yet, it is to be observed that in the Southern District of New York the state courts in practice pay no attention to the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings unless a restraining order has been issued from the federal court.

owed by a common debtor. The old remedies were well enough adapted to the protection of the creditor where there were only one or two creditors involved, but they fell short of doing justice where there was a large body of creditors interested in one insolvent estate.

The common law, as naturally might have been expected from the fact that it took its origin in a primitive and simple state of society where large commercial businesses built up on credit were impossible and the existence of a large body of creditors was unheard of, satisfied itself with the maxim "The law favors the diligent creditor." This maxim was high sounding and had the appearance of embodying the right principle, and perhaps it did express the complete rule proper for those days. By the term "diligent creditor," of course, was not meant the "diligent worker," the one who worked from early dawn to late at night, who worked conscientiously and gave full measure. It would perhaps seem right to give such one the first chance. But by the term "diligent creditor" was meant the creditor who was quickest to resort to legal action, who was least forbearing, least trustful and confiding in his debtor's honesty, as well as those who were the most alert. Before the present bankruptcy law was enacted, indeed, the "diligent creditor" in commercial law practice had come to mean most generally the creditor whom the debtor himself most favored, perhaps a friend or relative. It was this kind of a diligent creditor who was generally found first upon the field. And so, the maxim that "the law favors the diligent creditor," came to be inadequate to the doing of justice in cases of insolvency in this period of large commercial dealings on credit. The maxim quite lost its dignity in these modern commercial times. Indeed, precisely through this want arose bankruptcy law, which is founded upon entirely different principles, upon the broad and noble maxims of equity that "Equality is equity," and "He that asks equity must do equity." In bankruptcy law the creditor who first resorts to legal proceedings to seize his debtor's property gets no advantage over his fellow creditors; nor does the creditor whom the debtor favors by paying him in full out of the insolvent estate to the loss of others. The maxim "Equality is equity" governs—not the maxim "the law favors the diligent creditor." The unseemly scramble to be first on the scene, that was the general incident to business failures a few years ago, no longer takes place. The wild race between the sheriff, with his attachments and executions, and the receiver, to get ahead of the inevitable preferred mortgagee and friendly assignee for the benefit of creditors is a thing of the past; under the regime of the Bankruptcy Act "equality is equity." No longer is it that "the law favors the diligent creditor."

In re American Brewing Co., 7 A. B. R. 468, 112 Fed. 752 (C. C. A. Ills.): "The avowed purpose of taking the judgment notes, with power to enter judgment at any time by confession, was to secure appellants against the claims of other creditors, and to give them a preference. That would be legitimate and proper if no Bankrupt Law were in force, and a race of diligence in priority were allowable. But one purpose and effect of the Bankrupt Law is to put an end to such a race of diligence, and to divide the estate ratably among creditors. The essential ethics of that law is that 'equality is equity.'

To use an illustration, it is as if a meagre table were set for a hungry crowd. Common law says to each one "Seize all you can, and as quickly as you can, no matter if the rest get nothing: 'first come, first served' is the rule." Bankruptcy law, on the other hand, says "No, let a fairer rule prevail: let considerateness govern. Let each one take his proportionate share. The meal is too scanty, to be sure, to satisfy all. No one can satisfy fully his wants; but, on the other hand, no one shall be crowded out, no matter how weak or poor he may be or how slow he may have been in getting to the table: each shall have his share." And so have been developed the two striking and distinguishing features of bankruptcy law—that creditors receiving (under certain qualifications and limitations) more than their proportionate share out of the debtor's insolvent estate must surrender the preference into the common fund for all; and that the seizure of property of the insolvent estate (under other certain limitations) by legal proceedings are also void and this property also must be surrendered to form part again of the common fund for all.

Compare, In re Hopkins, 1 A. B. R. 209 (Ref. Ala.): "The Bankruptcy Act of 1898 recognizes and affects two different classes of liens, 1st, those created by the acts of the parties (preferences): second, those acquired by creditors under and by virtue of legal proceedings."

Compare, Farmers' Bank v. Carr, 11 A. B. R. 733, 127 Fed. 690 (C. C. A.): "The essential principle of the bankrupt law is that all of the bankrupt's property be divided equally, without preference, to the payment of his debts. It abhors preferences."

§ 1274. "Trust Fund," Theoretical Basis of Peculiar Titles Conferred by Bankruptcy Act.—Now, what theory lies at the basis of these peculiar provisions of bankruptcy law? Why may not an insolvent debtor pay in full whatsoever creditor he prefers to pay, notwithstanding the remainder may get nothing at all or only a small per cent of their respective claims, so long as the debt paid is an honest and just debt? Why, also, may not a creditor seize and hold by legal process property of the insolvent debtor in satisfaction of his just and due claims? Why is it not permitted to the first creditor who levies to get all he can up to the amount of his full claim; then to the creditor who chances to be second and not first in levying, to get all the rest up to the amount of his claim; and so on with the third and fourth till all the property is exhausted? and why is it not right that those who do not act quickly enough, who happen to be fourth or fifth or tenth or twentieth in levying, get nothing at all to apply upon their claims? Common law has declared that all this really is right; and it says it is so because manifestly it is right that whatever the debtor owns he has on his part a perfect right to use in paying his debts and the creditor on his part to take in payment of his claim. But in the light of bankruptcy law the answer to these questions is different. The answer is simply this: In law the insolvent debtor does own the property belonging to his insolvent estate; but in equity, as developed in the bankruptcy law—at least, if we view the matter from the standpoint of the philosophy of the law—he does not absolutely own it. The insolvent estate is, in theory, a trust fund. While the courts have refused to announce such doctrine as an established principle of general law outside of bankruptcy jurisprudence, and have not enunciated it, in so many words even in bankruptcy jurisprudence, yet some such theory must be the principle of justice on which the peculiar rights conferred by the act really rest. It is only upon some such theory as this of the trust fund that the requirement of surrender of preferences and the return of property seized on legal process can be justified in cases of insolvent estates. Only so can the debtor's right to use what at common law is his own property in the payment of any just debt he may prefer to pay be restricted, and the creditor's right to seize his debtor's property in satisfaction of his just claim be thwarted.

The insolvent estate is, in the philosophy of the law, if not in the announced decisions, not his own—that is the answer.

He is not using his own property with which to pay his debts. He has used up all his own property, as equity looks at it, and this is precisely why he has become insolvent; he is now making use of the common fund contributed by all his creditors. As long as he remains solvent, he may do with his property as he sees fit, for it is his own both in law and also in equity; but the moment he becomes insolvent he ceases to be using up his own capital; and so at the moment of insolvency, equity, in the form of bankruptcy law, steps in and declares his property a trust fund belonging to all his creditors.

In re McGee, 5 A. B. R. 262, 105 Fed. 895 (D. C. N. Y.): "In either instance the property which theoretically at least belongs to all creditors is taken from them and given to a favored creditor—a situation which the Bankruptcy Act was passed to prevent."

This seems to be the theory underlying the treatment in bankruptcy of preferences and legal liens obtained within four months preceding bankruptcy.³¹

In re Keller, 6 A. B. R. 340, 109 Fed. 118 (D. C. Iowa): "The Bankrupt Act may be said to be based upon two fundamental propositions: First, that when a person becomes unable to pay his just debts, the property then remaining to him equitably belongs to his creditors, and should be distributed proportionately among them; and, second, that, if the insolvent debtor in good faith yields up to his creditors his property for distribution among them, he should then be relieved from the debts existing against him at the time he transfers his property to his creditors. The first proposition is not based upon the question of good faith on the part of the debtor, nor upon his knowledge or want of knowledge of his actual financial condition. It rests upon the fact of insolvency; and the equity in favor of the creditors grows out of the fact that it is ordinarily true that the estate possessed by the insolvent debtor represents the goods, property or money obtained by the debtor on credit from his creditors. If in fact the debtor is insolvent, and if in fact he has in possession property which he has bought on credit and which has not been paid for, is not the equity in favor of the creditors fully established, without reference to the mere belief which the debtor may entertain with respect to his ability to pay his debts? It is a matter of common knowledge that persons who are hopelessly insolvent will frequently cling to the belief that they can pay up if only allowed a little time, yet, if time be allowed them, they only become more heavily involved. It cannot, therefore, be successfully maintained that the equity of creditors to the estate of an insolvent debtor is in any true sense dependent upon or affected by his belief touching his actual condition. This equity cannot, however, be carried into effect except through legal machinery; and to that end, among others, the present Bankrupt Act has been adopted. When, through the provisions of that act, an estate of an insolvent debtor has been brought before the court of bankruptcy for distribution, is it not true that among the creditors the general rule is that 'equality is equity;' that is to say, that in the division of the estate each creditor shall receive only his proportionate share of the estate? It must be remembered that the institution of the proceedings in bankruptcy does not create the equity in favor of the creditors, but only sets in motion the machinery by which the equity can be properly enforced. The equity on behalf of the creditors comes into existence when the debtor becomes insolvent."

31. White v. Bradley Timber Co., 9 A. B. R. 442 (D. C. Ala.).

Swartz v. Fourth Nat'l Bk., 8 A. B. R. 677, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The dominant purpose of the prohibition of a preference was not to benefit or injure, or to prevent the benefit or injury, of any creditor or class of creditors, but to prevent the debtor from making any disposition of his property which would prevent its equal distribution—to prevent him from doing anything which would result in the payment out of his property of a larger percentage upon any claim than others of the same class would receive."

In re Schafer, 5 A. B. R. 149, 3 N. B. N. & R. 145 (Ref. N. Y.): "This view is supported by what I conceive to have been the intent of the Congress in the enactment of the bankruptcy law. The underlying idea appears to be that at the moment when a person becomes insolvent, that is, within the definition of the term at § 1, subdivision 15—'Whenever the aggregate of his property * * * shall not at a fair valuation be sufficient in amount to pay his debts'—the property then remaining with the insolvent belongs to his creditors, and to all creditors of the same class pro rata, in equal proportion to their contributions thereto. No preferences among creditors in the same class are intended to be tolerated by the bankrupt law. The purpose of the act was to accomplish such equal distribution as nearly as practicable."

Compare, (1867) In re Reiman & Friedlander, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 34: "The principle upon which the law of bankruptcy has, in legislation, been founded, is that when a man becomes insolvent, the property then remaining to him rightfully belongs to his creditors, and ought to be distributed ratably among them towards the satisfaction of their claims."

§ 1275. Efficiency of Facts to Create Passing of Title and Nature of Title Passing, Determined by State Law.—It must be reiterated that although the Bankruptcy Act itself creates new rights, those to preferentially transferred property and property seized by legal proceedings within the four months preceding the bankruptcy—yet the law of each state determines the sufficiency of the transaction to constitute a “pledge” or “mortgage,” a “sale,” a “legal lien,” or other appropriation of property. The law of the State, it must not be forgotten, all the time, determines the nature or name, so to speak, of the transaction and the time of the passing of title thereby, [except as the Amendment of 1910 to § 60 (b) changes the date of such passing of title] whereupon the Bankruptcy Act steps in and declares that, having such name and title thus passing, it is or is not a voidable transaction.

All this has been previously covered—see ante, § 1139, et seq.—but its pertinency is so great in connection with a discussion of the law of preferences that it bears repetition.^{31a}

At the risk of some repetition, we have thus taken a preliminary survey of the general nature of these two peculiar and important provisions of bankruptcy law, and thus by understanding the theory and principles underlying them are in a better position to take up their formal study in detail. And first, as to preferences:

SUBDIVISION “A.”

VOIDABLE PREFERENCES.

§ 1276. Definition of Preference.—Section 60 (a) as originally enacted defined a preference as follows:

“A person shall be deemed to have given a preference, if, being insolvent, he has procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the enforcement of such judgment or transfer will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditor of the same class.”

Swarts v. Fourth Nat. Bk., 8 A. B. R. 673, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo.): “Section 60 (a) furnishes the legal and controlling definition of the preference specified in § 57 (g) and other parts of the Bankrupt Act.”

By the amendment of February, 1903, the further limitation was added that, in order to constitute such judgment or transfer a preference it must have been taken or made within four months preceding the bankruptcy; so that the section defining the term preference as used in bankruptcy now reads as follows:

“A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has, within four months before the filing of the petition or after the filing of ^{31a} Compare, also, in re Ball, 10 A. B. R. 565, 123 Fed. 164 (D. C. Vt.): “The title to the other goods as well as these is governed by the laws of the State, although what is a preference under the Bankrupt Law must be controlled by that.”

the petition and before the adjudication, procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the enforcement of such judgment or transfer will be to enable any of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class. Where the preference consists in a transfer, such period of four months shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer if by law such recording or registering is required."

Section 60 (b) as amended in 1910 defines the circumstances under which the preference is voidable for the benefit of all creditors as follows:

"If a bankrupt shall have procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against him in favor of any person or have made a transfer of any of his property, and if, at the time of the transfer, or of the entry of the judgment, or of the recording or registering of the transfer if by law recording or registering thereof is required, and being within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy or after the filing thereof and before the adjudication, the bankrupt be insolvent and the judgment or transfer then operate as a preference, and the person receiving it or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall then have reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such judgment or transfer would effect a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee and he may recover the property or its value from such person."

§ 1277. "Preferences," "Voidable Preferences" and "Preferences" That Are "Acts of Bankruptcy," to Be Distinguished.—It must be noted that a preference itself is one thing and a preference that amounts to an act of bankruptcy sufficient to throw a debtor into bankruptcy is the same thing and more; and that a preference which can be avoided by the trustee, so that the property affected by it can be recovered for the benefit of all the creditors, is the same thing and also something more, but that that "something more" is still different.

Thus, a preference in fact may exist even if the debtor did not intend or know that his transfer would result in a preference, and so be insufficient grounds for throwing him into bankruptcy; and it may also exist even if the creditor took it without any cause appearing to him for believing that a preference would be effected thereby, and so may not be sufficient grounds for the creditors to retake possession of the property transferred; for the question as to whether the transfer is or is not a preference is to be determined solely by results, independently of the debtor's intent and independently of the creditor's participation therein; and the questions of intent, etc., with which the preference was given or received simply touch the effect on the debtor's and creditors' respective rights.³²

McDonald v. Clearwater R. Co., 21 A. B. R. 182, 164 Fed. 1007 (U. S. C. A. Idaho): "Upon his own theory, therefore, before plaintiff can succeed in avoiding the alleged preference, the existence of four conditions must be made to appear: First, that the lumber company was insolvent when the assignment was made; second, that the assignment was made upon account of an antecedent indebtedness; third, that the bank had reasonable cause to believe that, by the assignment, it was intended ["intended" changed by Amendment of 1910 to "would be effected"] to give a preference; and, fourth, that the effect of the assignment was to enable the bank to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than other creditors of the same class."

Wright v. Skinner Mfg. Co., 20 A. B. R. 527, 162 Fed. 315 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "It is necessary for the trustee in order to recover under § 60, to establish the following propositions: First: That the payments were made within four months before the filing of the petition. Second: That at the time of the payments the bankrupt was insolvent within the meaning of subd. 15, § 1, of the act. Third: That the effect of the payments was to give the defendants a greater percentage of their debts than other creditors of the same class. Fourth: That the defendants had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended ["intended" changed to "would be effected" by Amendment of 1910] by such payments to give them a preference."

Tunlin v. Bryan, 21 A. B. R. 319, 165 Fed. 166 (C. C. A. Ga.): "The burden of proof is on the complainant, and, unless he shows by sufficient evidence the elements of a voidable preference, he is not entitled to recover. He must prove that the bankrupts (1) while insolvent, (2) within four months of the bankruptcy, (3) made a transfer of their property, i. e., a payment of money, (4) and that the creditor receiving the payment was thereby enabled to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class; and it must also be proved (5) that the person receiving the payment, or to be benefited thereby, had reasonable cause to believe that it was thereby intended to give a preference. Bankruptcy Act, § 60, cls. 'a' and 'b.'"

In re Leech, 22 A. B. R. 599, 171 Fed. 622 (C. C. A. Ky.): "In order to establish that there was an unlawful preference, it must be alleged and proven that at the time of the transfer the party making it was insolvent, that the property transferred was such as his creditors had a right to have subjected to their claims, that he intended a preference, and that the transferee had reasonable cause to believe that the transferer had such an intention."

Taylor v. Nichols, 23 A. B. R. 310, 134 App. Div. 787: "Two facts were required to be proven in order to justify the judgment rendered: First, that at the time of the transfer William H. Nichols was insolvent; and, second, that this defendant had reason-tities concerned in the administration of a bankrupt's estate: 1. The debtor. 2. The trustee. 3. The creditor. As to the debtor, the statute declares that a payment under certain conditions shall be held to be preferential. He is not to be heard upon the question of his intent. The effect of his act is fixed by law. That is the scope and purport of subdivision a. The next section, subdivision b, declares, in effect, that a preferential payment is not void per se, but voidable by the trustee upon a certain condition. And what is the condition? Simply that the trustee shall establish that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe that the payment to him was intended as a preference. [Changed by the Amendment of 1910, to "would effect a preference."] In other words, the trustee's remedy is not absolute, but is made to depend upon proof of the knowledge or belief with which the creditor took the payment. * * * In each case the condition affixed to the remedy ignores the state of mind of one of the parties to the transaction and renders his act dependent upon the purpose of the other."

Swartz v. Fourth Nat'l Bk., 8 A. B. R. 677, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The meaning and effect of § 60 (a) are the same as though it declared every transfer of his property by an insolvent to be a preference which has the effect to 'enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt' out of the property of the insolvent 'than any other of such creditors of the same class.'" to believe that the transfer was made with intent to give him a preference."

Since Amendment of 1910.—Mayer v. Palmer, 31 A. B. R. 225, 208 Fed. 97 (C. C. A. Mo.): "To entitle the trustee to a decree it was necessary that it appear: First, that William W. Reid was insolvent at the time of the transfer; second, that the transfer was made within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy; third, that the effect of the transfer would be to enable Charles A. Mayer to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class; and fourth, that Charles A. Mayer had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended by the transfer to give such preference." [This court ignores the fact that the Amendment of 1910 changed the law from "intended" to "would effect."]

Newman v. Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. R. 399 (Kansas City Court of Appeals): "Four elemental facts must combine to render a preference voidable viz: First, the insolvency of the debtor, at the time of the preference, and by insolvency, as that and equivalent words are defined in the existing law, reference is made not to a person who 'was unable to pay his debts as they became due in the ordinary course of his daily transactions,' but one whose property 'shall not, at a fair valuation, be sufficient in amount to pay his debts.' In re Louis A. Eggert (D. C. Wis.), 3 Am. P. R. 541, 98 Fed. 843. Second, the giving of the preference within four months of the petition in bankruptcy. Third, the effect of securing to the favored creditor a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class may obtain from the estate of the debtor. Fourth, that the preferred creditor, when he received the preference, knew or had reasonable cause to believe that it was the purpose of his debtor to give him a preference over other creditors of the same class. See Gill v. Safe Co., 170 Mo. App. loc. cit. 485, 156 S. W. 811." [This court ignores the fact that the Amendment of 1910 changed the law from "intended" to "would be effected."]

In re Starkweather & Albert, 30 A. B. R. 743, 206 Fed. 797 (D. C. Mo.): "To constitute a voidable preference under this provision of statute, the following must concur: 'The bankrupt must (1) have made a transfer of its property (2) within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and (3) at the time of the transfer the bankrupt must have been insolvent. (4) The transfer must have operated as a preference; i. e. (§ 60a), its effect must have been to enable the bank to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than other creditors of the same class received. Further, the bank or its agent was (5) at the time of the transfer have had reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such transfer would effect a preference.'"

Of course the classification here adopted is simply for the purpose of the author's analysis of the subject and does not pretend to be founded on any classification formally made by any court.

A preference itself has eight elements, which are as follows:

§ 1278. First Element of a Preference—Depletion of Insolvent Fund.—Some portion of the debtor's property must have been appropriated by the transaction and the insolvent estate thereby diminished. Preference implies appropriation of assets and depletion of the trust fund thereby.³³

Bank of Newport v. Herkimer Co. Bank, 225 U. S. 178, 28 A. B. R. 218, affirming Mason v. Herkimer Co. Bank, 22 A. B. R. 733, 172 Fed. 529 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "But, unless the creditor takes by virtue of a disposition by the insolvent debtor of his property for the creditor's benefit, so that the estate of the debtor is thereby diminished, the creditor cannot be charged with receiving a preference by transfer."

Trust & Savings Bank v. Trust Co., 229 U. S. 435, 30 A. B. R. 624: "To constitute a preferential transfer within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act there must be a parting with the bankrupt's property for the benefit of the creditor, and a consequent diminution of the bankrupt's estate."

§ 1279. Entirely Fictitious Transactions.—Thus, an entirely fictitious transaction, where no property is actually taken, cannot constitute a preference.

In re Steam Vehicle Co. of Am., 10 A. B. R. 385, 121 Fed. 939 (D. C. Pa.). "Neither, under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act, can the claimant be properly held to have received a preference. It never received a cent of money or any other consideration on account of the disputed items. No gain has come to it, and no loss has come to the bankrupt, because of what was done; and therefore, as it seems to me, it is impossible to hold that mere juggling with book entries amounts to payment. As I look at the matter, payment means at least that value has passed in some form or other; and the word does not properly embrace a fictitious transaction, such as this, where no value was intended to pass, and where none was actually transferred. Reprehensible as the conduct under consideration was, and whatever its effect might be in other proceedings, it did not do the slightest harm to the other creditors, and did not take from them any part of the bankrupt's assets."

So, also, a void transfer cannot amount to a preference.³⁴

A like result would be obtained, even though the parties actually believed that a transfer had been effected, if, in fact, nothing passed; as, for instance, where one goes through the form of transferring his rights under a revocable privilege which had been revoked prior to the attempted transfer thereof.³⁵

§ 1279¼. Transferring Worthless Equity.—The transfer of an equity of redemption where the lien exceeds the value of the property is not a preference—the estate is not depleted.³⁶

§ 1279½. Trivial Transfers.—The court sometimes will disregard a transaction alleged to be a preferential transfer, because of its triviality, thus, the payment by a grocery firm, of a bill of $3.00 to a creditor a week before the bankruptcy;³⁷ again, the transfer of a worthless account.

In re Hamilton Automobile Co., 31 A. B. R. 205, 209 Fed. 596 (C. C. A. Ills.): “The Bankruptcy Act deals with matter of substance and the mere preferential transfer of a worthless claim does not come within the meaning of the Act.”

Likewise, the payment by an old bachelor, of 60 cents for soda water, coca cola and a bar of soap, and $2.15 for a “dressed doll” have been disregarded as preferential.³⁹

§ 1280. Performance of Labor in Payment of Debt.—Likewise, the performance of labor in payment of a debt has been held not a transfer of property, hence, not a preference.⁴⁰

In re Abraham Steers Lumber Co. (Steers Lumber Co.), 6 A. B. R. 315, 110 Fed. 738 (D. C. N. Y., affirmed 7 A. B. R. 332, 112 Fed. 406): “The labor, credited August 28, and amounting to $37.17, may be offset, as it cannot be regarded as a transfer of property.”

§ 1280½. Taking Possession of One's Own Property.—Of course where one takes his own property out of the possession of the bankrupt, even though within the four months period and whilst the bankrupt was insolvent, it is not a preference.⁴¹

In re Wright—Dana Hardware Co., 30 A. B. R. 582, 207 Fed. 636 (D. C. N. Y.): “On the day of the adjudication in bankruptcy the Warren Paint Company repossessed itself of all the paint then in the warehouse of the bankrupt as its own, and the trustee claims that by so doing it received a preference, and cannot prove and have its claim allowed until it has surrendered such preference. It is self-evident that if the paint taken by the Warren Paint Company was its own property, absolute, it had the right to take possession, and that the taking created no preference.”

§ 1281. Liens Given within Four Months in Fulfillment of Promise Made before.—A chattel mortgage or other lien given within the four months, in fulfillment of a promise to execute one made before the four months period, constitutes a preference, for the mere promise to give the mortgage did not operate to appropriate the property, and so the appropriation took place within the requisite statutory period;⁴² so, as to other transfers made in pursuance of prior agreements.⁴³

§ 1282. No Preference by "Judgment" unless Judgment Operates to Create Lien or Otherwise to Appropriate Property.—A judgment even if "suffered or procured" by the bankrupt to be taken, nevertheless will not amount to a preference unless thereby some property is so sequestered, or a lien obtained upon it, that the enforcement of the judgment would deplete the estate, for the word "judgment" as used in this § 60 (a) means an effective judgment—a judgment whereby property of the bankrupt is in some way appropriated. Therefore, a merely personal judgment, where no lien results, would, of course, not amount to a preference, until levy of execution thereunder.⁴⁴ It would not deplete the trust fund belonging to all the creditors, which is the touchstone of a preference.

Again, an attachment on mesne process before the four months' period not yet followed by judgment before the filing of the bankruptcy petition has been held not to constitute a preference.⁴⁵

§ 1283. Giving of Check or Note Not Preference; but Paying of It Is.—The giving of the debtor's check or note or other instrument of in-

Stover*, 3 A. B. R. 220, 97 Fed. 330 (C. C. A. Mass.) * * * in the cases which have held preferences to have been obtained through legal proceedings and an attachment has formed part of the proceedings, attachment has been either after one judgment in suit, or, if before judgment, has been followed by a judgment before the petition in bankruptcy, so that the attachment will have passed beyond the stage during which it is uncertain whether there is really any claim against the defendant or not."

debtedness is not the giving of the preference;⁴⁶ but it is the payment of it out of the bankrupt's estate that is the preference;⁴⁷ and even where a purchaser of the bankrupt's stock gave his note to the creditor as part of the price it has been held not to be a preference until paid.

Compare, instance, Opp v. Hakes, 15 A. B. R. 700, 142 Fed. 364 (C. C. A. III.): "The appellant has not been paid the amount of the note which constitutes the alleged preference, and, without proof of other circumstances to charge him with such amount, the equitable remedy is surrender of the note, if preferential, and not its assumed value." This decision seems to be wrong on principle, the giving of the note was part of the consideration paid for the transfer and, presumably, pro tanto, diminished the money payment.

§ 1284. Payment Actually Made Not to Be Applied to Evade Preference Statute.—A payment actually made afterwards, cannot be applied on an unpaid note or check made before a certain invoice was sold on credit to the bankrupt, so as to entitle the creditor to offset the invoice against the payment as being a "subsequent credit."⁴⁸

§ 1286. Return of Loan Made for Specific Purpose, Not Preference.—The return of a loan made for a specific purpose, upon the purpose failing, is not a preference.⁵¹ But by this is not meant that the repayment of a loan made for a specific purpose, where the borrower has used it for another purpose, is not preferential: the identical property or fund must be that which is returned, else a preference may exist.

In re Kearney, 21 A. B. R. 721, 167 Fed. 995 (D. C. Pa.): "Upon the foregoing facts, it is clear, I think, that the payment on May 25th to the bankrupt's brother was preferential. Even if it was intended at the time when the loan was made that the money should be used for the specific purpose of paying for the license, and, if not so used, that it should be returned, the testimony seems to show plainly that this intention was not carried out, but that the bankrupt used the money for some other purpose. No effort was made on his behalf to prove what he had done with it. * * * Since, therefore, the money was not traced into a particular fund or deposit, or earmarked in any other way, the inevitable inference is that the check of May 25 was drawn against the general funds of the bankrupt, and was intended to prefer."

§ 1286½. Return of Bailed Property, Not Preference.—The return of bailed property to the bailor of course is not a preference—the bailee's estate has not been depleted.⁵²

§ 1287. Discounting of Bankrupt's Note, Not Preference.—And the discounting of the bankrupt's note by a third party does not constitute a preference, even though the discount money is applied upon the bankrupt's debt; the depletion of the bankrupt estate, and consequently the preference, not occurring until the bankrupt pays the note.⁵³

§ 1288. Payments by Sureties and Endorsers of Bankrupt, Not Preferences.—Payments by sureties and endorsers of the bankrupt, of course, do not constitute preferences and need not be surrendered by the creditor.⁵⁴

Mason v. Herkimer Co. Bank, 22 A. B. R. 733, 172 Fed. 529 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The one thing absolutely essential to a preference is that the bankrupt transfer some portion of his property to the creditor. If the creditor receive none of the bankrupt's property, there is no preference. And that is the primary difficulty with the complainant's case. The defendant bank received no property or money of the Newport Company. The Sheard Company as indorser of the note took up and paid its own funds therefor—funds in which the Newport Company had no interest whatever. It is true that the Sheard Company at the time it paid the note was indebted to the Newport Company [the bankrupt], but that in no sense made its funds the property of the latter. An unsecured creditor has no interest in his debtor's property until he has sequestered it. The money, which the defendant received belonged to the Sheard Company [the indorser], and not to the bankrupt. It follows, then, that there was no preference unless that which was actually done can be treated as the equivalent for something else. And that is the theory of the District Court. It is pointed out that, if the Newport Company [the bankrupt] had collected its claim from the Sheard Company [the indorser], and had itself paid the note, there would have been a transfer from the Newport Company [the bankrupt] to the bank. And it is said that it was merely a short cut for the Sheard Company to pay the note and charge the amount paid upon its account against the Newport Company—that the effect of the two transactions was the same. There would be much force in this argument if the Sheard Company stood in the transaction merely as a debtor of the Newport Company. It may well be that when a debtor with the approval of his creditor takes up the latter's note at a bank, and offsets the amount paid upon his debt, the payment to the bank will be treated as having been made by the creditor; the debtor being really his agent in the transaction. But that was not the situation here. The Sheard Company was the indorser of the note, and had pledged its own property as security therefor. In taking up the note and collateral it acted in its own behalf, and in no sense as the agent of the Newport Company. The note was not discharged. The Sheard Company as against the Newport Company became the holder instead of the bank. Upon no permissible theory in law or equity can it be said that the note was paid by the Newport Company. But it is further urged that the effect of the transaction was to appropriate certain assets of the Newport Company, to wit, its demand against the Sheard Company, to the payment of this note to the exclusion of other creditors. * * * But it cannot be conceded that the result claimed would follow. If the Sheard Company, knowing the Newport Company to be insolvent, acquired the note with a view to using it as a set-off or counterclaim against its debt, it could not legally do so. * * * [Section 68.] And, if the Sheard Company could not offset the note against the account * * * there was no transfer or appropriation of such account, and much less a preference. The debt could still be collected by the trustee of the bankrupt."

The creditor may prove his claim in full, and if his dividends together with the payments received from sureties or endorsers exceed the total amount due, he holds the excess for the benefit of the surety or indorser.⁵⁵

§ 1288½. Payment by Third Party Not Preference.—Of course, the payment of the bankrupt's debt by a third party, where no property of the bankrupt was transferred to such party, is not a preference: the third party simply becomes a creditor in place of the original creditor.

55. Swarts v. Fourth Nat'l Bk., 8 A. B. R. 673, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo.).

In re Kerlin, 31 A. B. R. 12, 209 Fed. 42 (C. C. A. Ohio, reversing 30 A. B. R. 816): "The case then, in its last analysis, amounts only to a substitution of creditors of the alleged bankrupt, and with the result that the indebtedness involved in the transaction was greatly reduced. * * * It is helpful to bear in mind that the transaction did not deplete Kerlin's estate (Continental) Trust Co. v. Title Co., 229 U. S. 435, 30 A. B. R. 624; on the contrary, as already stated, the settlement reduced the indebtedness, and to that extent in effect increased the assets."

§ 1289. Payment, by Maker, of Note Discounted by Bankrupt.—Where a third person's note not belonging to the bankrupt is nevertheless discounted at the bank and placed in the bankrupt's account, the maker's payment of it when due does not constitute a preference; the bankrupt's estate is not depleted.⁵⁶

But if the insolvent fund is depleted by the payment or other transfer, it is a preference: as would be the case where a customer's paper is discounted; and this is so, although third parties bound as sureties for the same debt would have paid the debt anyway.⁵⁷

§ 1290. Depletion of Partnership Assets Where Partnership Not in Bankruptcy but Assets Being Administered in Bankruptcy of Member.—Where partnership property is being administered in the individual bankruptcy proceedings of one of the partners, a mortgage given by the partnership upon partnership property that would have operated as a preference as to partnership creditors had the partnership been in bankruptcy, will not be affected by the individual bankruptcy of the partner—the individual estate, which is the only bankrupt estate involved, has not been depleted.⁵⁸

§ 1291. Conversely, Depletion of Individual Estate Not Preference in Partnership Bankruptcy.—Liens upon the individual property of a member of a bankrupt partnership that would have been voidable had he been individually in bankruptcy, are not voidable where merely the partnership is in bankruptcy.⁵⁹

Iowa), which was also a case where a partner on dissolution of partnership assumed firm debts and afterwards went into bankruptcy: a payment by the firm that would have been a preference had the firm been in bankruptcy was held to be a preference as to the bankrupt partner. Compare, Miller v. Acid & Fertilizer Co., 21 A. B. R. 416, 211 U. S. 496. Compare post, § 2265. Also, compare, same proposition under "Second Element of a Preference," post, § 1312½.

But, for instance of depletion of individual estate where both firm and individuals in bankruptcy, see Brewster v. Goff Lumber Co., 21 A. B. R. 106, 164 Fed. 124 (D. C. Pa.).

A transfer by one member of a partnership of his individual property, within four months of the bankruptcy of the partnership, is not a preference in the partnership bankruptcy.⁶⁰

Nevertheless, the property of the partner is sub modo a fund for firm creditors; and a transfer of it to a firm creditor may operate as an individual preference, for a firm creditor may prove against the individual estate.⁶¹

Mills v. Fisher & Co., 20 A. B. R. 237, 159 Fed. 897 (C. C. A. Tenn.): "There remains the question as to whether John H. Fisher can be individually adjudicated a bankrupt upon the averments of this petition. If we construe the averments to be that Fisher has applied his individual property to the payment of a joint debt, and we think we must, intending to prefer that debt over other firm debts, we are confronted with the question as to whether that is not a preference for which he may be adjudicated a bankrupt? He was individually liable for every partnership debt, as well as liable for his individual debts. In equity, and in bankruptcy, his individual creditors are entitled to be paid out of his individual property before his partnership creditors. Manifestly, if the claim of the Watts Mills is an individual debt against J. H. Fisher, there would be no doubt but that such a preference of one creditor over another of the same class would be an act justifying an adjudication in bankruptcy. That is too plain to need discussion. But that is not the case. The claim of the Watts Mills is against the firm and the preference was not given out of the firm property, but out of the separate property of J. H. Fisher. The utmost right of such a joint creditor against the individual assets of John H. Fisher was to share in them equally with other joint creditors after individual debts had been paid. If, therefore, the debt preferred was an individual debt, it was not a preference of which a partnership creditor can complain, for the debt paid was entitled to a preference over every partnership debt, including, of course, the petitioner's claim. A preference under § 60a of the Bankrupt Act is only such when it will enable any one of his creditors 'to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class.' This is the principle upon which the payment of labor claims is not a preference; provided only that the general assets are enough to pay all other labor claims as great a percentage. * * * While the averments of the petition in respect to the character of the debt preferred are not as clear as they should be, we nevertheless regard the petition as resting the claim to an adjudication against J. H. Fisher upon the fact that he has transferred practically and substantially his entire separate estate, being insolvent at the time, in payment of a debt of the firm of J. H. Fisher and Company, intending to prefer that debt over other debts of the same class. It is no answer to say that partnership creditors are benefited and not injured by such an application of the individual property of one of the members. If the fact be as averred, that there were no joint or firm assets applicable to joint debts, and that neither of the partners had any separate property, other than that transferred to one of the joint creditors, it would seem that the one joint creditor had been very substantially preferred over every other creditor of the same class. That the members of the firm were each liable in solido for the joint debts is not disputable. Undoubtedly the individual creditors of John H. Fisher would be preferred over the joint creditors out of his individual estate. But if there were none, then the whole of that separate property would have been subject to the demands of the joint creditors. If there were such separate creditors, then the right of the joint creditors to the surplus, after paying the other class of debts, is not deniable. That this preference of the individual creditor exists independently of the existence of partnership assets under the Bankrupt Act of 1898, may be conceded upon the reasoning and authority of In re Wilcox, 2 Am. B. R. 117, 94 Fed. 84; In re James, 13 Am. B. R. 341, 133 Fed. 912; and Euclid Nat. Bank v. Union Trust and Deposit Co., 17 Am. B. R. 834, 149 Fed. 975. Nevertheless, the right of a partnership creditor to share in the separate estate of the members of the co-partnership, gives him such an interest in the separate property of its members as to entitle him to prove his claim against the separate estate and to make such a claim the basis for an adjudication of bankruptcy against a member of a firm who has given a preference out of his estate. This was well settled under former acts and in this respect the present law has not changed the rule. In re Melick, Fed. Cas. No. 9,399; In re Jewett, Fed. Cas. No. 7,306; In re Remond, Fed. Cas. No. 11,632; In re Loyd, Fed. Cas. No. 8,429; In re McLean, Fed. Cas. No. 8,879; Hartman v. Peters, 17 Am. B. R. 61, 146 Fed. 82. Upon the facts stated in this petition it is obvious that when one member of a firm which is insolvent and without assets, applies his whole separate estate in satisfaction of one joint liability, that creditor will receive a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class. This, at last, is the supreme test of a preference."

60. Compare same proposition under "Second Element of a Preference," post, § 1312½; obiter, Mills v. Fisher & Co., 20 A. B. R. 237 (C. C. A. Tenn.);

Miller v. Acid & Fertilizer Co., 21 A. B. R. 416, 211 U. S. 496.

§ 1292. Whether Liens upon or Other Transfers of Exempt Property, Preferences.—It has been held that liens upon or other transfers of exempt property do not constitute preferences, since they do not diminish the creditors' assets, title to exempt property not passing to the trustee.⁶²

But it has been held that, at any rate, where the property out of which the exemption is to come exceeds in value the exemption allowance, it may be administered in the bankruptcy court so that the excess may be available as an asset; and, therefore, that a transfer of partially exempt property may constitute a preference to the extent that its actual value exceeds the exemption.⁶³

⁶² See, analogously as to liens by legal proceedings on exempt property, § 1100, et seq.

Compare, obiter, In re Tollett, 5 A. B. R. 404, 106 Fed. 866 (C. C. A. Tenn.), wherein the court held that on recovery of property fraudulently or preferentially conveyed the debtor might have his exemptions therefrom, giving as one reason that since it was exempt it could not have depleted the estate anyway. Such argument, however, proceeds in a circle, for if the transfer did not deplete creditors' assets, then it was not fraudulent nor preferential, hence the property was not recoverable by creditors. A better basis should be found than such argument, it would seem. Compare, also, In re Leech, 22 A. B. R. 599, 171 Fed. 622 (C. C. A. Ky.). Also, compare, § 1033½, note, and § 1095.

That creditors may not complain of transfers of exempt property as fraudulent, see ante, § 1224½.

Compare obiter, In re Wishniefsky, 24 A. B. R. 798, 181 Fed. 896 (D. C. N. J.); Huntington v. Baskerville, 27 A. B. R. 219, 192 Fed. 813 (C. C. A. S. D.).

In re Bailey, 24 A. B. R. 201, 176 Fed. 990 (D. C. Utah): "A mortgage constituting an unlawful preference, where it includes both exempt and non-exempt property, is only voidable by the trustee as to the non-exempt property, and remains a valid mortgage as to the exempt property."

Compare, obiter, Mills v. Fisher & Co., 20 A. B. R. 239, 159 Fed. 897 (C. C. A. Tenn.): "So the transfer of a homestead exemption is not a preference, since it is not subject to the demands of creditors."

Vitzthum v. Large, 20 A. B. R. 666, 162 Fed. 685 (D. C. Iowa): "If a part of the property transferred by the bankrupt to the bank was exempt, or the proceeds of exempt property, under the Iowa statute, the creditors generally would have no right thereto, nor the trustee, to recover the same for their benefit."

Contra, In re Soper, 22 A. B. R. 868, 173 Fed. 116 (D. C. Neb.): "The effect of the surrender of the preference [chattel mortgage on exempt and non-exempt property, which creditor claimed to be still good on the exempt property] was to restore the property of the bankrupt to his estate as if no mortgage had ever been made upon the property. The bankrupt has not lost his right to claim his exemptions unless it is because of the mortgage given by him. The trustee did not obtain the property under the mortgage, but in hostility to it. It came into his hands unburdened by the mortgage, and as if the mortgage had never been given. Therefore neither the trustee nor the bankrupt are estopped by the terms of the mortgage. From the time the trustee took the property until such time as the bankrupt should assert his claim of exemptions, the trustee had the title to all the property, and the mortgage was no lien upon any portion of it. Upon the assertion of the right of the bankrupt to his exemptions, the mortgage was not revived upon the articles selected as exempt."

So, it has been held that the payment of an encumbrance on exempt property within the four months period is not a voidable preference.⁶⁴

It is to be observed, at any rate, that if the questions of the exemptability of the property transferred and, consequently, of the preferential character of the transfer, are to be determined as of the date of each transfer, then the rule of the cases cited would afford a convenient means, by making successive transfers of exempt property, of actually perpetrating preferences with impunity. If each transfer be only small enough to come within the exemption right at the particular time, the entire estate might, by successive transfers, be distributed among a few favored creditors.

§ 1293. Transfers of or Liens on Property That Might Have Been Claimed Exempt but Not Claimed.—Transfers of, or liens upon property that might have been claimed as exempt but is not so claimed, are none the less on that account preferences.⁶⁵

§ 1294. Property Transferred to Be Such as Otherwise Would Have Belonged to Estate.—The property transferred must have been such as otherwise would have belonged to the bankrupt's estate, else there can be no depletion of the trust fund.⁶⁶ Thus, although preferences may be given after the filing of the petition and before adjudication (§ 60a), yet they may only be accomplished as to property, or its proceeds, that was in existence at the time of the filing of the petition and that might then have been transferred by some means or levied on and sold under judicial process.

§ 1294 $\frac{1}{4}$. Release of Dower in Preferential Mortgage.—However, a release of dower by the bankrupt's wife in a mortgage to secure her husband's debt does not remain available to the mortgagee upon the setting aside of the mortgage as a preference, but this is so because a release of dower is only an incident to a conveyance of the estate by the owner, the release falling with the fall of the conveyance.⁶⁷

§ 1294 $\frac{1}{2}$. Property in Foreign Countries.—Doubtless, transfers of property in foreign countries could be preferences, though, if real estate, the only way to reach the case would probably be by such process as could operate on defendants or claimants found in this country, since the title could not pass by operation of law under § 70 (a).⁶⁸

§ 1295. Mere Exchanges of Property, Changes in Form and Transfers Based on Present Consideration, Not Preferences.—"A fair exchange is no robbery." Mere exchanges of property and changes in its form, as, likewise, transfers of it, for which are received at the same time assets of equal value, do not deplete the estate nor constitute a basis of preference.⁶⁹

In re Shepherd, 6 A. B. R. 725 (D. C. Ills.): "The mere exchange of securities within four months is not a preference within the meaning of the Bankrupt Law; the reason being that the exchange takes nothing from the other creditors."

In re Clifford, 14 A. B. R. 283, 136 Fed. 475 (D. C. Iowa): "And for such part of the mortgage the bankrupt then received a present consideration, and his estate was not diminished nor the rights of any of his then existing creditors impaired in the least."

[1867] Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 114: "The mortgage covered the same property. It embraced nothing more. It withdrew nothing from the control of the bankrupt, or from the reach of the bankrupt's creditors, that had not been withdrawn by the bill of sale. Giving the mortgage in lieu of the bill of sale, as was done, was therefore a mere exchange in the form of the security. In no sense can it be regarded as a new preference. The preference, if any, was obtained on the 15th of May, when the bill of sale was given, more than four months before the petition in bankruptcy was filed. It is too well settled to require discussion that an exchange of securities within the four months is not a fraudulent preference within the meaning of the bankrupt law, even when the creditor and the debtor know that the latter is insolvent, if the security given up is a valid one when the exchange is made, and if it be undoubtedly of equal value with the security substituted for it."

McDonald v. Clearwater R. Co., 21 A. B. R. 182, 164 Fed. 1007 (U. S. C. C. Idaho): "Property transferred by a borrower at the time of receiving a loan and for the purpose of making the lender safe, is security; its validity, if unaccompanied by positive fraud, is recognized and enforced in bankruptcy. Transfers which do not diminish the estate of the bankrupt, but which constitute only a fair exchange of property, are not preferences."

§ 1296. Net Result after Becoming Insolvent and within Four Months, the Test.—If the net result of the transactions between the debtor and creditor during the period of insolvency and within the four months of the bankruptcy has been to increase rather than to diminish the trust fund of the creditors, such creditor has not received a greater percentage of his claim out of the insolvent estate than some other creditor of the same class, and there is therefore no preference.⁷⁰ to the seller of that amount, less such dividends as the estate might pay. In these circumstances the payments were no more preferences than if the purchases had been for cash, and, as parts of one continuous bona fide transaction. The law does not demand the segregation of the purchases into independent items so as to create distinct pre-existing debts, thereby putting the seller in the same class as creditors already so situated, and impressing payments with the character of the acquisition of a greater percentage of a total indebtedness thus made up."

Gans v. Ellison, 8 A. B. R. 153, 114 Fed. 734 (C. C. A. Pa.): "Upon the true interpretation of paragraph 'a' of § 60, the preference in such case as this is the net gain to the creditor upon the transactions between him and the debtor. The net balance in favor of the creditor is the real preference under the law. For only to the extent of such net gain does the creditor 'obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditors of the same class.' And so, on the other hand, only to the amount of the net gain to the creditor is the estate of the debtor impaired. If, then, a creditor innocently preferred has given return credits afterwards he has surrendered his preference to the extent of such return credits. To effectuate justice, both sides of the account are to be considered in the case of a creditor who innocently has received preferences, and afterwards in good faith has given the debtor further credit, without security, for property which has become a part of the debtor's estate. Otherwise it is plain that such innocently preferred creditor would be compelled to surrender his preference a second time before he could prove his claim against the bankrupt's estate." Although this case was decided as to "innocent" preferences, so-called, before the Amendment of 1903, the reasoning is still applicable.

Peterson v. Nash, 7 A. B. R. 181, 112 Fed. 311 (C. C. A. Minn.): "The giving and receiving, under such circumstances, may properly enough be regarded as one transaction, resulting not in a preferential payment to the creditor, but, in reality, in the creation of an indebtedness in favor of the creditor for the difference between the two."

In re Geo. M. Hill Co., 12 A. B. R. 221, 120 Fed. 315 (C. C. A. Ills.): "We think that in stating the accounts between the parties, within the rule declared in Jacquith v. Alden, all the transactions between the parties must be included, and that we are not limited to an account as it is stated or was kept by the bank, because we are to inquire, whether the net result of the transaction was to increase or decrease the estate of the bankrupt. If the account was stated including that amount, there remains no question that the net result of the dealings was to decrease the bankrupt's estate, and that the bank is therefore chargeable with the amount of that net decrease as a condition of proving its claim."

§ 1297. Deposits in Bank Subject to Check.—Deposits in bank, subject to check and not made to apply in payment of a debt, are not preferences, though subsequently offset by the bank against a debt owed it by the depositor. The deposit creates a corresponding credit against which checks may be drawn—the estate is not depleted by the making of the deposit, and the subsequent offsetting by the bank does not constitute later a "transfer" by the bankrupt.⁷¹

West v. Bk. of Lahoma, 16 A. B. R. 738, 16 Okla. 508: "The Bank of Lahoma, as shown by the averments in the petition, loaned to Streich the sum of $1,800, and Streich executed his promissory note to the bank for said amount. The bank gave him credit on deposit account for the proceeds of the loan. The bank then became his debtor to the amount of the deposit. He became the debtor to the bank in the amount of the note. The deposit was subject to check, and the transcript of account from the bank's books, which accompanies the petition as an exhibit, shows that the bank paid out on his check $500 of the deposit before the note matured. On the date the note fell due Streich had on deposit of the original sum borrowed $1,300, and the bank applied this sum on his note, and gave him credit for payment of that sum, and charged the same to him on the account. The deposit in the first instance did not create a preference in favor of the bank, for the reason that the bank became his debtor for the full amount of the deposit. His available assets were not diminished by the deposit in the bank, and his other creditors of the same class were in as good a position as they were before. These mutual transactions brought about the exact conditions mentioned in § 68a, a case of mutual debts and mutual credits between the estate of the bankrupt and the creditor, and after the adjudication the bank would have been entitled to have had set off the amount of Streich's deposit against the amount due on his note to the bank, and the right to have the balance allowed against the estate."

But, of course, if it was agreed that the subsequent deposits should be applied as they were made upon pre-existing overdrafts or other debts, then they would not constitute simply "offsets" but would amount to "preferences."⁷²

Compare, to this general effect, In re Starkweather & Albert, 30 A. B. R. 743, 206 Fed. 797 (D. C. Mo.): "While as held in the Massey case, money deposited with the bank in the ordinary course of business creates a relation of debtor and creditor, and while in that case it is held that money so deposited may be applied by the bank as a set-off against any indebtedness by the bankrupt to it, it is distinctly indicated by the Massey case that where a deposit is not made for general purposes, but for the purpose of creating a fund to be used in set-off, the privilege of set-off does not exist, and that the application of such money pursuant to such an arrangement is preferential."

And a deposit was held to constitute a preference where it appeared that the bank induced the making of it with the intention and for the purpose of applying it on an indebtedness owing to the bank by the depositor.⁷³ Thus, where a bank required a depositor to give it a check on his account in payment of notes not then due, the transaction was held to constitute a preference.⁷⁴

Again, the right of offset has been refused where a deposit was made after the bank had ordered that no more certificates should be made, thereby closing the account and terminating the relation of debtor and creditor as to future transactions.

Ernst v. Mechanic's, etc., Bank, 29 A. B. R. 289, 201 Fed. 664 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "In the case of the Mechanics National Bank, a deposit was made by Fiske & Company on the morning of January 19, which the trustee claims should be returned with interest as a voidable preference. This for the reason that the bank had ordered no more certifications to be made before the deposit was received, which it is contended was a closing of the account, so that the relation of debtor and creditor between the firm and the bank did not exist as to this fund. The special master and the court below held that the deposit was made after the bank had knowledge of the broker's insolvency, or at least was put on inquiry, so that the deposit was a voidable preference, just as much as the delivery of the securities. In this view we concur."

Likewise they would amount to preferences if they were simply devices for obtaining payment of the bank's claim by indirect means.⁷⁵

Walsh v. First Nat. Bank, 29 A. B. R. 118, 201 Fed. 522 (C. C. A. Ky.): "The undisputed facts are that the Tiger Shoe Manufacturing Company, the bankrupt, was indebted to the First National Bank of Maysville, Kentucky, in the sum of $2,000.00, with interest, evidenced by two promissory notes, in equal amounts, of date January 4, 1901, and June 9, 1901. The notes had matured. On or about September 24, 1901, the wife of the secretary and treasurer of the bankrupt loaned the bankrupt $3,000 upon a mortgage given by it for $5,000. The amount so loaned was deposited to the bankrupt's credit with the defendant bank, and the amount paid to the bank in satisfaction of the two notes for $1,000 each, with interest, was paid by a check drawn by the secretary and treasurer of the bankrupt on the amount so deposited. The only question presented is as to whether or not the payment of the two notes is a voidable preference? In the absence of a collusion, fraud, or insolvency of the debtor, the bank had a right to apply so much of the deposit as was necessary to the payment of its debt. It did not need a check to enable it to get the money. New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, 192 U. S. 138, 11 Am. B. R. 42, 24 Sup. Ct. 199, 48 L. Ed. 380; Germania Savings Bank & Trust Co. v. Loeb (C. C. A., 6th Cir.), 26 Am. B. R. 238, 188 Fed. 285, 110 C. C. A. 263. However, as was said by the court below, 'The real claim of the appellant is that Hopper (secretary and treasurer of the bankrupt), and his wife were acting in collusion with the defendant bank in order to enable it to get its money and not be subject to a suit to recover it back as a voidable preference.'"

And it has been held that checks deposited for collection on the same day, though shortly before the bankruptcy petition was filed, but not collected until the next day, may not be offset.

Moore v. Third National Bank of Phila., 24 A. B. R. 568 (Pa. Sup. Ct.): "The rule in bankruptcy, as in other judicial proceedings, is that as to the general doctrine, the law does not allow fractions of a day and that such fractions will only be considered where substantial justice so requires. Dutcher v. Wright, 94 U. S. 553; Taylor v. Brown, 147 U. S. 64. The deposit of these checks was not a deposit of money; the bank took the checks for collection, it advanced no money upon them, and parted with nothing upon the faith of the deposit. It was not a holder of checks for value. National Bank v. Bonsor, 38 Pa. Sup. Ct. 275."

However, the Supreme Court has held that the bank's right of offset of a deposit against the customer's notes is not vitiated nor converted into a preference by the intentional giving of checks thereon to pay the notes within the four months prior to the bankruptcy, holding that this was not a voluntary preference, but a voluntary offsetting;⁷⁶ but it is difficult to see what the checks amounted to if not a voluntary transfer; otherwise the giving of them was without significance.

§ 1298. Surplus of Collateral Applied by Pledgee on Other Claims.—Where the lienholder appropriates the equity and applies it to another and pre-existing debt, as by selling the security, for more than the debt secured and applying the surplus on another debt, the appropriation of the equity by virtue of a "banker's lien" constitutes a preference,⁷⁷ the lien being in the contemplation of both parties at the time of the pledging.

§ 1299. Any Kind of Property May Be Subject to Preference.—Any kind of transferable property may be the subject of a preferential transfer, so long as it depletes the estate.⁷⁸ Thus, the transfer of accounts receivable may constitute a preference.⁷⁹

As noted, ante, § 1280, the performance of labor in payment of a debt is not a transfer of property nor does it deplete the estate.

§ 1300. Any Method of Depleting Assets, Sufficient: Indirect Preferences.—Any method of depleting the insolvent fund is sufficient: a preference may be accomplished indirectly.⁸⁰

rectly to the creditor. It may be made to another, for his benefit. If the bankrupt has made a transfer of his property, the effect of which is to enable one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debts than another creditor of the same class, circuitry of arrangement will not avail to save it.

"It is not the mere form or method of the transaction that the act condemns, but the appropriation by the insolvent debtor of a portion of his property to the payment of a creditor's claim, so that thereby the estate is depleted and the creditor obtains an advantage over other creditors. The 'account receivable' of the debtor, that is, the amounts owing to him on open account, are, of course, as susceptible of preferential disposition as other property; and if an insolvent debtor arranges to pay a favored creditor through the disposition of such an account, to the depletion of his estate, it must be regarded as equally a preference, whether he procures the payment to be made on his behalf by the debtor in the account—the same to constitute a payment in whole or part of the latter's debt—or he collects the amount and pays it over to his creditor directly. This implies that, in the former case, the debtor in the account, for the purpose of the preferential payment, is acting as the representative of the insolvent, and is simply complying with the directions of the latter in paying the money to his creditor."

In re Shantz & Son Co., 30 A. B. R. 552, 205 Fed. 425 (D. C. N. Y.): "The record shows that the president of the company during a period of financial stress conceived the plan of selling a part of its machinery—a part which was not in use, and the sale of which, it was thought, would not injure the business. It was his intention to start, with the consent of the purchasers of such machinery, a separate and independent plant; * * * The general scheme, as shown by the evidence, was to induce various creditors of the company to provide funds with which to buy such machinery, and to require them to pay their subscriptions only in case their debts against the company were fully satisfied; the agreement specifically providing that the subscribers were to buy the machinery only in case a sum equal to their subscriptions was first paid to them. This scheme appears so palpably to favor the creditors in question that the presumption at once arises that all the parties had reasonable cause to believe that they were receiving a preference over other general creditors. It is consequently difficult to avoid the conclusion that the plan adopted by the bankrupt company was a device to give certain creditors a preference over other creditors of the same class, and that the petitioning creditors were aware of such intention, and of the intention of the president of the bankrupt company to save as much as possible from the financial wreck and continue the business, notwithstanding the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings."

Johnson v. Hanley, Hoyer Co., 26 A. B. R. 748, 188 Fed. 752 (D. C. R. I.): "Upon the foreclosure of a mortgage upon firm property, there remained after satisfaction of the mortgage debt a considerable surplus belonging to the bankrupt firm. One of the copartners directed the mortgagee to pay from the surplus in his hands a debt due the defendant, a creditor, thereby creating a preference. In legal effect this transaction was the same as a direct payment by the firm to prefer a firm creditor."

Thus the assignment of accounts by an insolvent corporation to one of its officers in payment of an antecedent debt constitutes a preference.⁸¹ Thus, the preference may be made to another for the benefit of the creditor.⁸² As, by a transfer through a dummy.⁸³

In re Beerman, 7 A. B. R. 431, 434, 112 Fed. 663 (D. C. Ga.): "If transactions of this sort are to be permitted, then, instead of a creditor taking a mortgage himself, when a debtor is in failing circumstances, he will get some one else to advance the money, agreeing that the person advancing the money shall suffer no loss, and thereby obtain by indirection a preference which he would be unable to get if he had acted directly with the debtor."

Crooks v. Bank, 3 A. B. R. 242, 46 N. Y. App. Div. 339: "It is the result or effect of the act done which is declared against, not the manner nor method by which it is done. No matter how circuitous the method may be if the effect of the transfer of property, etc."

§ 1301. Purchaser from Bankrupt Using Purchase Price to Pay Off Preferential Liens.—Thus, where the purchaser of the bankrupt's real estate uses the purchase price in paying off judgment liens suffered within the four months, he depletes the estate thereby and causes a preference.

Benjamin v. Chandler, 15 A. B. R. 443, 142 Fed. 242 (D. C. Pa.): "It does not matter that the bankrupt does not himself pay it. That is not to be expected from a failing debtor, and might never in consequence be realized. Neither does execution have to be issued. The lien obtained by virtue of the judgment, whereby payment is secured out of the property, is a sufficient enforcement of it within the meaning of the law. Neither does it change the character of the transaction, that payment is made by a purchaser from the bankrupt who appropriates the price he was to pay in clearing off the liens, in order to have an unencumbered title. The significant thing is, that, by virtue of the judgment which was given him for his debt, the creditor is paid out of the property of the bankrupt, while others not so favored have to wait. There can be no question that, if this was effected through the medium of a sheriff's sale, it would amount to a preference, and there is no essential difference that the sale is private. Otherwise, by a mere disposition of his property to a third party, after covering it with judgments, a failing debtor could prefer and make them all good. The law permits no such evasion of its terms. The payment of a judgment, secured in this way, is as much an enforcement of it as if execution issued and levy were made. By whomever paid, it comes out of the property of the bankrupt, against which it is a lien, and that is enough."

§ 1301½. Or to Pay Off Bankrupt's Debt.—Likewise, where the purchaser from the bankrupt, as part of the consideration, pays off a debt owed by the bankrupt to another creditor, it may be a preference.⁸⁴

§ 1301 $\frac{1}{2}$. Proceeds of Mortgages, etc., Used to Make Preferences.

—It has been held that a mortgage given for money with which to make preferences is voidable as a preference, though given for presently passing consideration, if the mortgagee be cognizant of the purpose.⁸⁵

Walters v. Zimmerman, 30 A. B. R. 776, 208 Fed. 62, also 30 A. B. R. 780, 208 Fed. 62 (D. C. Ohio): "It is well suggested that, to permit these mortgages to stand, made as they are to a person who has at least constructive knowledge of the insolvency of the mortgagor and who is the executive officer and head of the creditor who obtains a preference, would be to furnish an easy opportunity to avoid the provisions of section 60 of the act."

Such was held to be the case where an insolvent debtor, on the eve of the bankruptcy, gave a mortgage on all his assets for a loan from a third party, giving a demand note therefor, the money then being deposited in a bank which was the largest creditor and which had acted as the lender's agent in the transaction.⁸⁶

Likewise, it has been held that a creditor, instrumental in effecting a sale of the bankrupt's business, who procures the assumption of his own debt by the purchaser as part of the transaction, receives an indirect preference.⁸⁷

Taking a mortgage made by the bankrupt to another debtor of the same creditor may be an indirect preference, though such mortgage be given in part for the purchase price of a stock of goods bought by the bankrupt from the other debtor.⁸⁸

But the fact that the mortgagee knew the proceeds were to be used in paying off existing creditors does not, in and of itself, make the mortgage void.⁸⁹

§ 1302. Return of Goods to Seller Where No Right of Rescission Exists, Preference.—Thus, the return of goods to the seller on account of the buyer's insolvency, will constitute a preference, if title had actually passed and no right of rescission existed;⁹⁰ but will not be a preference if the right to rescind the sale for fraud exists.

secure equality of distribution of the assets of an insolvent debtor, if each creditor who was lucky enough to find some of his goods on hand could take them, thus disposing of all the stock which was available for payment of any debts, and leaving the creditors whose merchandise had been entirely parted with by the debtor wholly unprotected; it would be equally as ineffective if the insolvent debtor could transfer his property to favored creditors, under the claim that the trustee took no title to such property."

9. Assignment of claim tainted with a preference to the purchaser of the bankrupt's assets for use as offset to the purchase price, under arrangement whereby such purchaser offers to sat-

Hargreaves Bros.*, 13 A. B. R. 164, 3 Neb. 676 (reversing Hackney v. Raymond Bros. Clarke Co., 10 A. B. R. 213).

10. Transfer to any one who had guaranteed overdrafts of the bankrupt and had subsequently paid the overdrafts. This was, however, a case of a preference as an act of bankruptcy, not as a recoverable preference. Goldman v. Smith, 1 A. B. R. 266, 93 Fed. 182 (D. C. Ky.).

11. Clearing house association is the agent of each constituent bank, such that on recalling the checks presented by the bankrupt bank on the day of its failure it holds the resultant fund for the benefit of all and cannot appropriate it to the use of any particular creditor bank. *Rector v. Likewise, the setting apart and marking of goods as security to an accommodation endorser or maker of a promissory note may be a preference.⁹⁴

Similarly, the taking of judgment on a judgment note given to a surety on a government contract for money advanced the same day to pay the pay roll has been held a preference,⁹⁵ though it would seem to have been based on a substantially presently passing consideration.

1. Bankrupt removed from trusteeship on account of defalcation; ordered by court to make good the defalcation; transfers his store stock to wife who mortgages same and also her own property to raise the money to save husband from disgrace: held not a preference because person to whom payment was made was not a creditor. 2. Insolvent debtor giving his attorney money to effectuate a preference but attorney giving his own check to the creditor for sum in excess. Upson v. Mt. Morris Bk., 14 A. B. R. 6 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div.).

3. In re Denning, 8 A. B. R. 136, 114 Fed. 219 (D. C. Mass.).

5. Stockbroker turning over stock to customer on latter paying up: held no diminution of stockbroker's estate because customer owned stock and simply redeemed from the broker's lien. Richardson v. 6. Note of bankrupt paid by endorser, who released collateral which he had given to the creditor at the time of endorsement, not an indirect preference to the creditor receiving the payment notwithstanding endorser indebted to bankrupt and claims right to offset the right of indemnity against the bankrupt's claim. Mason v. Herkimer Co. Nat. Bank, 22 A. B. R. 733, 172 Fed. 529 (C. C. A. N. Y., reversing 21 A. B. R. 98, 163 Fed. 920).

§ 1304. Second Element of a Preference—The Claim upon Which the Preferential Transfer Is Made Must Have Been the Claim of a Creditor—Preference Implies Advantage Accruing by the Transfer to a “Creditor.”

In re Kayser (ex parte Weisbrod v. Hess), 24 A. B. R. 174, 177 Fed. 383 (C. C. A. N. J.): “As we think, one requirement of this definition has not been met by the foregoing facts. It is true that the bankrupt was insolvent when the $2,600 was paid. It is also true that the money was his, and that the effect of paying it to Weisbrod & Hess will be to reduce the percentage that would otherwise be paid to the petitioning creditor; but it is not true that Weisbrod & Hess were creditors of the bankrupt. On the contrary, the undisputed testimony shows that they were creditors of his wife, and that the loans upon which the $2,600 was paid and credited were made to her and upon the credit of her separate property. In this essential particular the facts do not fit the statutory definition of a preferred creditor.”

§ 1305. Preferential Transfer to Be Distinguished from Fraudulent Transfer.—If the claim is fraudulent or fictitious, the transfer is not a preference but is a fraudulent transfer.⁹⁶ And an apparently merely preferential transfer may be shown to be in reality a fraudulent transfer by proof of the existence of a secret trust in the bankrupt's favor.⁹⁷

§ 1306. Paying Off Liens on Exempt Property—When Not Preference.—Paying off liens on exempt property within four months of bankruptcy, while the debtor is insolvent or otherwise converting nonexempt property into exempt property, will not entitle creditors to subrogation to the liens. The one receiving with knowledge the benefit, is not a creditor but is the bankrupt himself.⁹⁸

§ 1307. Return of Goods to Seller Where Right of Rescission Exists, Not Preference.—Where a seller has the right to rescind a sale and recover the goods, such right being predicated upon the failure of the title to pass for lack of meeting of minds, a return of such goods will not constitute a preference; for the seller thereby is declared never to have been a creditor for the goods and title to them is not in the bankrupt.

But of course, where such right did not exist, the return of the goods would constitute a preference.⁹⁹

§ 1307¼. Return of Goods to Bailor, Not Preference.—Of course the return of bailed goods to the bailor can not be a preference, for the relation of debtor and creditor does not exist.¹

§ 1307½. Payment for Property or Money Converted, Preference.—But the payment for goods wrongfully converted by the bankrupt—not the mere return of the same goods in specie—is a payment upon a provable debt and may constitute a preference.²

Likewise where the bankrupt as a guardian has embezzled funds of his ward, his making good of the defalcation by transfers from his individual estate, is a preference.³

Clarke v. Rogers, 228 U. S. 534, 30 A. B. R. 39, affirming 26 A. B. R. 413, 183 Fed. 518: "The criticism only can be made by putting out of view what the 'one embezzler' represents. He is one being but acts in more than one capacity, and in all of his capacities he has duties and obligations. The relation of a trustee to the trust property is not the same as his relation to his individual property. He certainly may incur obligations to the trust. He can only satisfy the obligations out of his individual property, and by doing so may deplete it, make it deficient, to satisfy its obligations." [This case is quoted further at § 1313 4-10.]

Similarly, the acceptance of a transfer of other property in specie to make good a conversion of funds, is an election to treat the conversion as a debt, and such payment may then be a preference; as, for example, a mortgage to cover a misappropriation of funds by an agent,⁴ or a transfer of real estate to make good a conversion of the proceeds of a note collected by the bankrupt for another.

Atherton v. Green, 24 A. B. R. 650, 179 Fed. 806 (C. C. A. Ills.): "So, the proceeds of the collection belonged to the principals, and the misappropriation vested no right to the fund in favor of the estate in bankruptcy, and the owner in such case is entitled to follow and recover the amount, in so far as it either remains on hand or is traceable into other investments or property derived therefrom. Failing such recourse to the trust fund, it is optional with the owner to treat the misappropriation as an indebtedness, thereby becoming a creditor on a par with other general creditors of the estate and subject to the bankruptcy provisions applicable to such relation. With neither the property nor its proceeds appearing on hand in any form, the fact that the indebtedness arose through conversion of the property gives the owner thereof no right of preference over general creditors."

The making good of a defalcation, however, has been held not to be a preference;⁵ yet, the claim on the defalcation certainly was a provable debt for the tort was waivable and the claim could have been presented ex contractu.⁶

It has been held that where the bankrupt's employees stole flour, which was on deposit for the bankrupt and others with a warehouse, payments and transfers of property by the bankrupt to the warehouse company to make good the shortage, which the warehouse company had in turn made good to its depositors, was not a preference, since the warehouse company was not a creditor of the bankrupt, being liable, if at all, simply for negligence.

Keystone Co. v. Bissell, 30 A. B. R. 213, 203 Fed. 652 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "This section [Bankruptcy Act, § 60 (a) (b)] plainly contemplates that the person to whom the transfer is made is one to whom, at the time, the bankrupt is liable. * * * We are unable to see how the repeated thefts of flour from the compartments of the defendant's warehouse, without any knowledge on its part of the thefts, made it a creditor of the Milling Company. There is a vital distinction between this case and that of Atherton v. Green and similar cases. In the Atherton case, the note which Green sent to the banker, who converted its proceeds, was the property of Green; the stolen flour was not the property of the Warehouse Company. The shipper (or the bank) owned the flour, and the Warehouse Company was merely a custodian or bailee, to keep it safe for the owner until the purchaser paid for it. It is true that the Warehouse Company could have sued for the stolen flour—its possessory title as bailee gave it the right to do so; but in such action it would sue merely as the trustee for the owner and was bound to turn over the proceeds of such suit, less its own charges against the owner, to such owner."

"The bank, as holder of the bill of lading, could have sued the Milling Company directly. It could also have brought an independent suit against the Warehouse Company for negligent care of the flour, in which suit it could recover only upon proof of negligence, and might have been defeated by some proof of acquiescence on its part in the Warehouse Company's methods of protecting the stored goods. But that is an independent action, the issues of which are not properly presented in the suit at bar, to which the bank is not a party, and by the decision of which it will not be bound. The circumstances that the bank might maintain an independent suit against its bailee does not alter the legal relations of the Milling Company and the Warehouse Company. The Milling Company bought the flour from the shipper, and whether it got possession of the flour with the latter's consent, or against it, by stealing it from the latter's custodian, it was the debtor solely of the shipper (or the bank) until the flour was paid for. This action is not brought against the creditor, shipper, or bank, to set aside a transfer of property to him or it.

5. Fry v. Penn Trust Co., 5 A. B. R. 51. Compare, McNaboe v. Columbian Mfg. Co., 18 A. B. R. 684, 153 Fed. 967 (C. C. A. N. Y.).

6. See ante, § 636, and post under subject of "Discharge," § 2733.

On the contrary, the trustee is seeking to recover the value of the property transferred to the Warehouse Company as collateral to the Milling Company's note to it, as if the Warehouse Company had been a creditor of the Milling Company before this note was made. We think it was not such creditor, and that, there being no antecedent liability, the trustee was not entitled to recover."

But, if the fund or property itself is traced and returned in its changed form, in accordance with the rules of equity governing the tracing of trust funds, such return will not be a preference, for neither is the claimant a creditor nor the return a transfer.⁷

§ 1307 $\frac{3}{4}$. Deposits in Bank on Eve of Insolvency, Whether Constitute Trust Fund.—The doctrine seems to be thoroughly established that the receiving of deposits on the eve of insolvency by a bank does not give rise to the relation of debtor and creditor but constitutes a fraud on the part of the bank towards the depositor, the deposit constituting a trust fund reclaimable by the depositor.

In re Silver, 31 A. B. R. 106, 208 Fed. 797 (D. C. Ohio): "We hold then that the facts surrounding this transaction justified petitioners' claim that the bankrupt legally knew of the insolvency of his business when he received the deposits in question. The implied contract, therefore, which ordinarily arises to create the relation of debtor and creditor when deposits are made in a banking institution never was created, and a trust impressed upon these funds in behalf of these several depositors is the equitable result of these transactions."

§ 1308. One Benefited Must Hold Provable Claim, Else Not Preference.—A transfer or judgment to constitute a preference must operate to give a "creditor" a greater percentage of his claim than other creditors.⁸ Now, "creditor" is defined by § 1 (9) to include anyone who owns a demand or claim provable in bankruptcy.⁹ Hence it necessarily follows, that where the one benefited does not hold a provable claim, a preference has not been given. And the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition fixes the status of the creditor's claim.¹⁰

Clarke v. Rogers, 26 A. B. R. 413, 183 Fed. 518 (C. C. A. Mass., affirmed in 228 U. S. 534, 30 A. B. R. 39, quoted at §§ 1307 $\frac{1}{2}$, 1313 4-10): "* * * * it seems to be an accepted doctrine that preferences are within the same subject matter as claims provable, and it is only with reference to claims provable that preferences can be declared. Richardson v. Shaw, 209 U. S. 365, * * * while the definition of 'creditor' and 'debt' do not assume to be exclusive but only inclusive, nevertheless it is undoubtedly the general construction of the statutes in bankruptcy that nothing is within their purview so far as preferences are concerned, except with reference to debts which can be proved for a dividend. On the other hand, it must be accepted that anything which can be proved for a dividend is within the purview of those portions of the statutes which relate to preferences, whether or not they are strictly shadowed out by the words 'creditor' and 'debt' as especially defined in the statute or as otherwise reasonably understood."

The mere fact that a transferee had brought a suit on contract, no judgment having rendered thereon, probably would not be sufficient proof that the demand was a claim of a creditor, unless the other evidence or the pleadings obviates the necessity of such proof.¹¹

§ 1308 $\frac{1}{2}$. Revival of Outlawed Debt.—A bankrupt may revive an outlawed debt if the debt be bona fide, at any time before the filing of the bankruptcy petition, even though his motive be to qualify the creditor for sharing in dividends.

In re Banks, 31 A. B. R. 270, 207 Fed. 662 (D. C. N. Y.): "I cannot hold that a payment made immediately before bankruptcy, or filing a petition in bankruptcy, to renew an outlawed debt and to enable the creditor to come in and share in the distribution, the one receiving it having no reasonable cause to believe it will operate as a preference, is a fraud on creditors or the law."

§ 1309. Payment or Other Transfer on Claim for Personal Injury, etc., Not Preference.—Payments or other transfers to persons holding claims for personal injuries are not transfers to "creditors," within the meaning of the Act, and do not constitute preferences.¹²

§ 1310. Payment or Other Transfer Made to or Enuring to Benefit of Surety, Endorser, etc., of Bankrupt, Even before Principal's Default or before Payment by Surety—Preference.—Thus, on the other hand, payments or other transfers to sureties, endorsers, etc., or enuring to their benefit, may be preferences to them even before the bankrupt principal's default and before any payment by the surety or endorser; for sureties, endorsers, etc., are "creditors" from the signing of the obligation and before default by the principal or payment by the surety.¹³

Mo.): "Mr. Quinn having thus endorsed these notes at once became liable to the bank (the creditor) either as maker or guarantor for their payment, if there was a valid consideration for his endorsement of them, and at the same time became a creditor of the bankrupt."

Lazarus v. Eagan, 30 A. B. R. 287, 206 Fed. 518 (D. C. Pa.): "There is, furthermore, no doubt that at the time of the transfer Greggs was Eagan's creditor by reason of the endorsement of the note at bank. That an indorser or surety on a note may be a creditor within the meaning of the bankruptcy law has been held in a long line of cases. Eagan having permitted or induced payment of the note, thereby intending to relieve himself from payment of all or a portion of it, to that extent was benefited and constituted him a creditor."

Under this doctrine, payment to a holder has been held a preference to an accommodation endorser.¹⁴

§ 1311. Payment or Other Transfer to Present Owner of Claim, Preference to Both Present Owner and Also to Transferrer, if Transferrer Remains Bound as Surety or Endorser.—The payment of the bankrupt's note to the endorsee of the original creditor, or to the present owner, may constitute a preference to the endorsee or original creditor as of the date of the payment, notwithstanding the benefit of the payment may enure also to a surety or endorser.

In re Geo. M. Hill Co., 12 A. B. R. 221, 120 Fed. 315 (C. C. A. Ills.): "It is insisted by the appellant that payment by the bankrupt of notes given by it to third parties and discounted by the bank were, under the law, preferential payments to those for whom the bank discounted the notes, and were not preferential payments to the bank. We are not able to concur in this contention. * * * Within the definitions of the Bankruptcy Act the indorser has been held to be a creditor of the bankrupt, while his liability as endorser is contingent, so as to charge him with preferential payments made to the holder of the note. Swarts v. Siegel, 8 A. B. R. 689, 117 Fed. 13. But none the less is the owner of the note likewise subjected to the penalties of the act for receipt of such preferential payment. Swarts v. Fourth Nat'l Bk. of St. Louis, 8 A. B. R. 673, 117 Fed. 1. In these cases both the bank and the endorsers were held chargeable for receipt of preferential payment by reason of the amount paid to the bank which payment must be refunded before either party could prove an independent claim against the bankrupt with which the other party was in no wise connected. This would not result, as counsel supposed, that in such case the insolvent estate would recover twice what it lost. Only the amount by which the assets of the estate had been depleted must be returned."

On the other hand, the payment of the bankrupt's note to an endorsee of the original creditor likewise may constitute a preference upon the original debt, as of the date of the payment: it enures to the benefit of the endorser or original creditor (if the original creditor is still bound), and gives him a preference.¹⁵

In re Meyer, 8 A. B. R. 598, 115 Fed. 997 (D. C. Tex.): "The debt of Walshe & Co. (the original creditor) was reduced by the payments made by the bankrupt to Brooke, Smith & Co. (the endorsee), and therefore Walshe & Co. enjoyed the fruits of such payments as much as if they had been made direct to them. It would be inequitable and unjust to other creditors to say that they had received nothing on the $350 note given them by the bankrupt."

But in one case it is held to be a preference as of the date of the receipt by the indorser of the consideration from the endorsee.¹⁶

The original transferrer or indorser, or (if still bound) the original creditor, must surrender the preference (if "received with reasonable cause" since the Amendment of 1903) before he can have his claim allowed; for the payment, though made to another, is nevertheless made to extinguish the original claim and the original claimant receives benefit thereby.¹⁷ And the trustee may recover the payment from the endorser, if the payment was made at his request, to relieve him, and with reasonable grounds existing on the indorser's part to believe a preference would be effected thereby.¹⁸

Contra, see obiter, In re Bullock, 8 A. B. R. 646, 116 Fed. 667 (D. C. N. Car.): This question was not necessary to be decided, for there was no proof of insolvency at the time of the payments, anyway.

Compare, apparently contra, In re Weissner, 8 A. B. R. 177 (D. C. N. Y.), where the court held, that money received from third party by creditor on discounting bankrupt's note constituted a preference as of the date the discount money was applied on the bankrupt's debt, although the bankrupt did not pay anything out of his estate until the note matured. This does not seem to be good law, however.

Compare, apparently contra, In re Harpke, 8 A. B. R. 535 (C. C. A. Wis.), where the court held, that the holder of the bankrupt's undorsed note is not debarred from proving his claim thereon, because within the four months period he received from the endorser payment of another note, having reason to believe that the money therefor had come from the bankrupt, though in ignorance of his insolvency at the time of such payment. This would be good law now, since the amendment of 1903 exonerates from the necessity of surrender those receiving preferences without reasonable grounds, etc.; but, quere, whether it was good law when enunciated. The classification of undorsed and indorsed notes into separate classes also is not correct.

§ 1312. Partner Selling Out to Remaining Partner, Not Preference to Individual Creditors.—Where a partner sells out to his sole co-partner, the partnership being insolvent, it has been held, that, in effect, a preference has been made by the partnership to the individual creditors.¹⁹ But this would hardly be a case of preference, for the preference, to be such, must be to a creditor of the bankrupt, but such a transfer does not give any advantage to any creditor of the bankrupt partnership. It simply puts the property out of the reach of all partnership creditors until the individual creditors of the remaining partner have been paid.^{19a}

The placing of a custodian in charge of a partnership store by agreement of all parties, to receive the proceeds of sales and to apply the same upon an execution on an individual judgment against one of the partners, the judgment and all the other proceedings occurring within the four months preceding the bankruptcy of both partners and of the partnership, has been held to constitute a preference.²⁰

But here again it was not a preference because the transfer was not to a creditor of the bankrupt. It was simply a diversion of partnership funds to one receiving the funds with knowledge.²¹

§ 1312¼. Transfers of Individual Property Whether Preferences in Partnership Bankruptcies.—In general, transfers by one member of an insolvent partnership of his individual property within four months of the bankruptcy of the partnership are not preferences in the partnership bankruptcy.²² individual act, and not the joint act of the firm, and, therefore, not an act for which the firm could be adjudged bankrupt."

That is, they are not preferences unless the individual member be also adjudged bankrupt in the same proceedings.^{22a}

But a transfer of individual assets by one member to pay a firm creditor a greater percentage than another firm creditor would get from the same individual estate, may be a preference, since the individual estates constitute, sub modo, funds to which partnership creditors are entitled to resort, in proper order of priority after individual creditors are satisfied in full, so that a transfer to one firm creditor without a like transfer to other firm creditors would be the giving of a greater percentage to one creditor than to another of the "same class" in the order of priority.²³

And such an individual transfer may be a voidable preference in a partnership bankruptcy by state law, of which the trustee may avail himself by subrogation to the rights of any creditor who has already instituted proceedings.²⁴ appellant was to purchase options, or the right to buy grain for future delivery. The appellant paid the bankrupt 3 per cent of the value of the grain which he wished to purchase. He did not aim to purchase grain at that time, but to secure the right to purchase it at a future time. The bankrupt telegraphed the orders to Wrenn & Co., members of the Chicago Board of Trade. They went upon the Exchange in Chicago and entered into a contract with some other member thereof by which the latter agreed to deliver to them at any time in the month named the amount of corn specified in the order. Under the contract no grain was delivered to the bankrupt, and he made no advances thereon and held nothing in pledge. He was accountable to the appellant for balances in his favor, if any there were after selling the grain and making such offsets as were chargeable against the proceeds."

On the other hand, it has been held in New York, and by the United States Supreme Court, and it is the weight of authority, that where a stock broker pledges his customer's stocks in general loans, the customer for whom stocks are carried by the broker is not a creditor and does not receive a voidable preference, although he knows the broker to be insolvent, when he closes the transaction, pays the balance owing the broker and receives stocks worth more in the market than the sum paid to take them up. The customer simply redeems his stock from the broker's lien by "paying up."²⁹

§ 1313 1/10. Public Corporations as Creditors.—There seems to be no reason for exempting public corporations, except of course when acting in their governmental capacity, from the ordinary rules pertaining to preferential transfers; and no State law can exempt them therefrom.³⁰ Thus, a preferential transfer to a township may be set aside.³¹

§ 1313 2/10. One Bankrupt Estate as Preferred Creditor of Another.—The act in § 57 (m) provides that "the claim of any estate which is being administered in bankruptcy against any like estate may be proved by the trustee and allowed by the court in the same manner and upon like terms as the claims of other creditors."

Where a trustee himself became bankrupt, a preference was charged in the later bankruptcy against the former estate as a creditor.³²

§ 1313 3/10. Delivery to Purchaser Who Has Paid in Advance, Whether Preference.—Where a purchaser from the bankrupt has paid partly in advance, the delivery of the goods purchased has been held not to be a preference, if the transaction be bona fide; for the purchaser is not a "creditor" but is, rather, a debtor for the balance due.³³

Templeton, Trustee, v. Kehler, 23 A. B. R. 41, 173 Fed. 574, 575 (D. C. Pa.): "But here there was no antecedent debt, and therefore no preferential payment could be made. The defendant was buying cattle from the bankrupt in the usual course of business, and had advanced money in part payment. The cattle were delivered (the price being concededly fair) and the defendant became the bankrupt's debtor for the balance of the price. * * * He was not the bankrupt's creditor in any proper sense, but is rather to be regarded as the bankrupt's debtor."

Yet such could not be the rule unless title to the goods had already vested in the purchaser or there were some equitable lien thereon in the purchaser's favor, since, if it were simply a payment in advance, then the purchaser was a creditor to the amount theretofore paid, the bankrupt fulfilling his obligation by delivery of goods instead of money.

§ 1313 4/10. Transfer by Bankrupt to Himself in Another Capacity.—A bankrupt, by transferring assets to himself in another capacity, may thereby create a preference; thus, where a bankrupt, as guardian, had misappropriated trust funds, transfers from his individual estate to make good the defalcation were held to be preferences in his individual bankruptcy.

Clarke v. Rogers, 228 U. S. 534, 30 A. B. R. 39 (affirming 26 A. B. R. 413, 183 Fed. 518): "The question in the case is, Do these facts show a preference within the meaning of the bankruptcy law? Putting to one side the identity of Shaw as an individual and Shaw as the trustee of the trusts, there are the elements of a preference. In other words, there is indebtedness; Shaw is indebted to all of the estates of which he was trustee. He used his individual property to pay the indebtedness of the Parsons trust, and he thus gave that trust a preference over the others. It was enabled to the extent of the property transferred to obtain a greater percentage of its debts than the other trusts. * * *"

"But this, appellant contends, is to evolve 'two moral persons out of one embezzler.' The criticism only can be made by putting out of view what the 'one embezzler represents. He is one being but acts in more than one capacity, and in all of his capacities he has duties and obligations. The relation of a trustee to the trust property is not the same as his relation to his individual property. He certainly may incur obligations to the trust. He can only satisfy the obligations out of his individual property, and by doing so may deplete it, make it deficient, to satisfy its obligations. These are realities not fictions. We must overlook essential things to disregard them. * * *"

erence, one to transfer and the other to receive the property, the court answered [the court in the case quoted] answered: 'But where the same person acts as the giver and receiver of the security, the concurrence and participation of two parties to the fraudulent preference exist. * * * One individual acting in two capacities, as debtor and on behalf of the creditor, may constitute the two persons contemplated by the statute.'

"And supplying the element of knowledge of the insolvency and the preference required by the statute, the court said that the ward was bound by the knowledge of his guardian. * * * As we have said, there may be a unity of the person in the individual and the trustee, of the individual and the guardian; we must look beyond it to the difference in his capacities and the duties and obligations resulting from it. These duties and obligations are as distinct and insistent as though exercised by different individuals, and have the same legal consequences."

Clarke v. Rogers, 26 A. B. R. 413, 183 Fed. 518 (C. C. A. Mass.), affirmed in 228 U. S. 534, 30 A. B. R. 39. "Neither, as we have said, is there any difficulty arising from the fact that, in these transactions, Shaw as an individual was dealing with himself as trustee. * * * In other words, it follows beyond all question that we cannot find that what occurred here was not a preference in the event we should be compelled to find that the same transactions were a preference when passing between Shaw as an individual and his successor in the trust."

Rogers v. American Halibut Co., 31 A. B. R. 576 (C. C. A. Mass.): "The bankrupt was the general business manager of the defendant corporation and within the prescribed period he paid the bookkeeper in partial settlement of overdrafts of his accounts with the company the amount in controversy. His insolvency when he made the payment is conclusively shown by his own evidence * * * besides, his knowledge that he was insolvent is to be imputed to the defendant [corporation] and if believed, the evidence would have justified the jury in finding that as manager, charged with the supervision of its business, he had reasonable cause to believe the company's debt would be largely satisfied to the detriment of his other creditors."

§ 1314. Third Element of a Preference—Creditor's Claim Must Have Been Pre-Existing Debt.—The creditor's claim must have a debt—a pre-existing debt: and the transfer will not amount to a preference if made contemporaneously with (or before) the rising of the claim. Preference implies preceding credit.

Section 60 as before noted must be read in conjunction with § 67 (d), among other sections in pari materia. Section 67 (d) is the converse of § 60 so far as transfers by way of lien are concerned, and protects all bona fide liens, duly recorded, where recording is requisite, that are based upon a "present consideration." "Present consideration" in this connection must be given a broader construction than it usually possesses. As the term is commonly used, it is interchangeable with "valuable consideration." Thus, for instance, the extension of time for the payment of a pre-existing debt is commonly held to be a present or "valuable" consideration for a transfer based thereon. And well enough so when the debtor is solvent, for when he is solvent it makes no difference whether his liabilities are reduced or his assets increased—the net result is the same, for the payment of the debt is equivalent to an increase of his assets by just so much. But when a debtor becomes insolvent it is manifestly quite different—it makes a great difference then whether the transaction results in an increase of the common fund or merely in a reduction of the liabilities.

So it is that by the term "present consideration" as used in this connection in bankruptcy is meant not a reduction of liabilities, but an increase or exchange of assets; and thus a lien given merely to secure a pre-existing debt is not—even though not made nor accepted in contemplation of bankruptcy—a valid lien, but if given for money or property then and at that present time passing into the estate, it is valid, unless, of course, it is affected by bad faith.³⁴

In re Wood & Henderson, 20 A. B. R. 1, 210 U. S. 246: "This [payment of attorney in advance for services to be rendered in bankruptcy] is not a case of preference, where part of the estate is transferred to a creditor so as to give him more of the estate than to others of the same class, under § 60. * * * It is a transfer in consideration of future services, to be reduced if found unreasonable in amount."

Davis v. Turner, 9 A. B. R. 716, 120 Fed. 605 (C. C. A. N. Car.): "This would seem to settle the point in question. The previous Bankrupt Act contained, substantially, a provision similar to that in the present law relative to the transfer of property in order to prefer a creditor, but did not make any exception for transactions based upon present consideration; and yet under that act it was held that, where the debtor in good faith makes a transfer for value given at the time, or in pursuance of an agreement made when the consideration passed, such conveyance will not be an act of bankruptcy."

Farmers' Bk. v. Carr, 11 A. B. R. 733, 127 Fed. 690 (C. C. A. S. C.): "The essential principle of the bankrupt law is that all of the bankrupt's property be divided equally, without preference, to the payment of his debts. It abhors preferences. But if bona fide an advance in præsentis be made to one who afterwards within four months becomes a bankrupt, that will be sustained, and a lien therefor held valid."

Stedman v. Bank of Monroe, 9 A. B. R. 4, 117 Fed. 237 (C. C. A. Iowa): "Aside from other provisions of the Bankrupt Act, this recorded chattel mortgage would have been valid security for the prior as well as for the then present loan, according to its terms and purport. It was not illegal, and its continued security of the prior loan merely failed because the bankruptcy of the mortgagor intervened within four months of the giving of the mortgage, and the security, under the terms of the act, became as to the prior loan a preference. But no such result followed in respect to the $3,000 actually loaned when the mortgage was given."

In re Davidson, 5 A. B. R. 528, 109 Fed. 882 (D. C. Iowa): "So the question is, can a bank, knowing a merchant is hard pressed, loan the merchant money with which to pay his debts, the banker at the time, and as part of the same transaction, taking mortgage security, and but for which the money would not have been loaned? * * * The bank did not receive a preference. Without the mortgage, and in the absence of the supposed right to receive the mortgage, the bank would not have parted with its money."

"It is a very different case where one is already a creditor and later insists upon and receives security. Then he may be held to have participated in the preference with all responsibilities. * * *

"The statute certainly cannot be invoked to put an end to legitimate business.

"And if the statute does mean, as is contended by the objecting creditors, then it is readily seen that no business can be transacted with a merchant from the moment he becomes embarrassed."

Furth v. Stahl, 10 A. B. R. 442, 205 Pa. St. 439: "A pledge or payment for a consideration given in the present or to be given in the future, whether in money or goods or services is not a preference. The object of prohibiting preferences is to prevent favoritism whether for secret benefit to himself or other reason among a debtor's creditors, who ought in fairness to stand on the same footing. A transaction by which a debtor parts with something now, in return for something he acquires or is to acquire in the future, is not within the mischief the act was aimed against."

In re Busby, 10 A. B. R. 650, 124 Fed. 469 (D. C. Penn.): "At the time a debt is created, the creditor has the right to dictate the terms on which he will part with his money or property and may, therefore, demand that he shall first be secured to such an extent as satisfies him. With this the Bankruptcy Law does not undertake to interfere, the creditor being allowed to retain without question whatever advantage he has acquired thereby. Bankrupt Act, § 57 c-h. But when a debt is once contracted, payment on account or the transfer of property for the purpose of better securing it, constitutes a preference if the debtor is insolvent at the time, and the result will be to enable the creditor to obtain a greater percentage of his claim than others of the same class. Section 60a. This, in case of the subsequent bankruptcy of the debtor, the law does not allow to go unchallenged. The creditor so preferred must surrender the preference if he desires to participate in the rest of the bankrupt's estate. Section 57g."

In re Belding, 8 A. B. R. 719 (D. C. Mass.): In this case a bank appropriated, under a "banker's lien," surplus collateral held for one loan upon another loan, the court saying, "In so far as this lien was given to secure a pre-existing debt, and was without present consideration it would be invalid as a preference."

In re Great Western Mfg. Co., 18 A. B. R. 261, 152 Fed. 123 (C. C. A. Neb.): "The agreement of conditional sale whereby the vendor retained the title to the machinery and material until its purchase price was paid did not create a preference voidable under the bankruptcy law because it was given for a present consideration, for the machinery and material which were and continued to be the property of the vendor, and because it was made more than four months before the petition in bankruptcy was filed."

In re Union Feather & Wood Mfg. Co., 7 A. B. R. 472 (C. C. A. Ills.): "Nor do we think the payments to Goldman were preferences, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Law. The company in the autumn of 1900, not being insolvent, was in need of ready money to pay its workmen their weekly wages. Goldman came to the assistance of the company, advancing to Peterson the necessary money to meet the pay roll on Saturday night, taking checks for the amounts advanced, which he presented when the company was in funds, and which were then paid to him by the bank. This course of business continued at intervals for some little time. It was rendered necessary by the circumstances, to keep the company a going concern. They were present advances of money upon the checks of the company."

In re Wolf, 3 A. B. R. 555, 98 Fed. 84 (D. C. Iowa): "As the security was given for a debt then created, it was a present security, and not a preference which was created by the mortgage."

In re Porterfield, 15 A. B. R. 18 (D. C. Va.): "Both the State and Bankrupt Act recognize the right to make a transfer giving preference for a new and not an existing consideration or debt, if made in good faith."

McDonald v. Clearwater R. Co., 21 A. B. R. 182, 164 Fed. 1007 (U. S. C. C. Idaho): "It is further conceded that a preference is not voidable unless it is given in satisfaction of an antecedent debt—that is, a debt which existed at the time the transfer was made."

The term "antecedent debt" is sometimes used instead of "pre-existing debt." In bankruptcy law, with regard to preferences, antecedent or pre-existing debt refers to the time of the transfer of the property by which the debt is secured or satisfied in whole or in part.³⁵

In re Fletcher, 136 Mass. 242: "The words, 'pre-existing debt,' in their natural meaning include all debts previously contracted, whether they have become payable or not."

§ 1315. Cash Transactions, Not Preferences.—Cash transactions are not within the prohibition.

But if the transactions are really on credit, the mere calling them by usage of trade "cash" transactions will not take them out of the statute.

In re John Morrow & Co., 13 A. B. R. 392, 134 Fed. 686 (D. C. Ohio): "A sale of goods to be paid for in 10 or 30 days is not, in fact, a cash transaction, and cannot, by agreement of the parties, or a usage of merchants, be regarded as such within the meaning of the Bankrupt Law."

§ 1316. Bona Fide Sales, Whether for Cash or on Credit, Not Preferences.—For the same reason, bona fide sales made by the bankrupt up to the very date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition are valid. To be sure the property sold is taken out of the trust fund, but the price, or the promise to pay the price, has taken its place; and the assets—the trust fund—are not depleted.³⁶

Thus, where there exists a bona fide contract of purchase of the entire output of the bankrupt's lumber mill, the delivery of lumber thereunder, within the four months period, and when the seller was known to be insolvent, has been held not to be a preference, though part of the purchase price had already been advanced.

Mills v. Virginia Carolina Lumber Co., 20 A. B. R. 750, 164 Fed. 168 (C. C. A. N. Car.): "There was no suggestion that the contract made between the Lumber Company and Franklin for the purchase of the entire output of Franklin's mill was not a fair one and one that the law would enforce. The contract was still existing at the time of the adjudication and whatever lumber was on hand as the produce of the mill the Lumber Company had a right to claim, provided it complied with the terms which had been agreed upon. If there had been no payment upon the contract of purchase in advance, the Lumber Company would have been entitled to require the trustee to surrender to it the lumber produced at the mill, provided it complied with the terms of purchase. Having advanced money upon the contract of purchase, the lumber Company thereby became entitled to at least as much of the product of the mill as it had paid for and it could have recovered so much from the trustee, even after the bankruptcy. It is our opinion that at most the taking of the thousand dollars worth of lumber under a claim by the Lumber Company that it was entitled to that specific property by virtue of the contract of purchase cannot be construed into a payment upon an existing debt such as to constitute a preference under the bankruptcy law."

Again, where a purchaser from the bankrupt has paid part of the purchase price in advance, the delivery of the goods to a corresponding amount within the four months period will not constitute a preference; for the delivery is not pro tanto a "transfer" upon a pre-existing debt, the purchaser being a debtor rather than a creditor all the time.³⁷

But it would seem that it must always appear that title to the goods purchased has already passed or that an equitable lien exists or that the money paid in advance is to be kept intact as a distinct fund to become the bankrupt's only on delivery of the goods purchased, otherwise the purchaser is really a creditor.

§ 1317. Payment of Current Rent, Not Preference.—Payment of current rent as it accrues is not a preference; it is upon a contemporaneously arising consideration, rent from its peculiar nature arising out of the property itself, and, constructively at least, being merely a part of the profits from the land, though commuted in money.³⁸

Compare, inferentially, In re Arnstein, 2 N. B. N. & R. 106 (Ref. N. Y., affirmed by D. C.): "A contract of lease is peculiar in its nature and differs in many respects from other contracts. Rent as such is an incident to and grows out of the use and occupancy and is the consideration therefor. Unaccrued rent cannot be said therefore to be a fixed liability then absolutely owing, payable in the future, or indeed a debt of any kind as that word seems to be used in the Act. It is only an unmatured obligation to pay in the future a consideration for future enjoyment and occupancy. This cannot be said to be, properly speaking, a present debt, demand or claim at all, as these words are apparently used in the foregoing provisions, due regard being had to the context, and cannot come within either the clause as to fixed liability then owing, or a debt founded on contract."

But where used as a device for effecting a preference, the payment of current rent may constitute a preference.

In re Lange, 3 A. B. R. 231, 97 Fed. 197 (D. C. N. Y.): "Payment of rent by an insolvent is not necessarily a preference. But when it is done as a means and for the purpose of carrying on a business in fraud of creditors it should be so regarded."

And payment of past due rent may constitute a preference unless such rent were a lien on the leasehold, in which event the doctrine of releasing securities of equal value would apply.³⁹

§ 1318. Payment of Interest in Advance Not Preference.—Payment of interest in advance is not a preference.⁴⁰

§ 1319. Present Transfers to Secure Future Advances, Not Preferences.—Likewise, present liens given or transfers made by the bankrupt to secure future advances are not preferences—but are valid to the extent, at least, of the advances actually made.⁴¹

§ 1319½. Payment of Attorney in Advance Not Preference.—Payment of an attorney for services to be rendered in bankruptcy is not a preference.⁴²

Nor is the securing of the attorney's fees and costs of going into bankruptcy, by way of mortgage or otherwise, a preference; the consideration is a presently passing one, and both items would be entitled to priority of payment out of the estate, in any event.⁴³

§ 1320. Mere Exchanges of Property or Security, Not Preferences.—A mere exchange of one kind of property or security for another of equal value does not constitute a preference.⁴⁴

In re Noel, 14 A. B. R. 715, 137 Fed. 694 (D. C. Md.): "As to the question of preference under the Bankrupt Act, it is clear that a present loan on security is not a preference. * * * This loan was originally made on the security of the mortgage, and there never was a time in all the transactions when Noel had the money without the bank having in hand the mortgage as security. The loan, from its inception, was always secured by the execution of the mortgage, and was always intended to be. If a loan is made upon security, it is not forbidden in good faith to substitute a new security, for the old one."

Deland v. Miller, 11 A. B. R. 744, 119 Iowa 368: "Moreover, it is shown that the mortgage in question was a renewal of another instrument of like character which had been executed by Peterson to the defendants on November 8, 1889. The exchange of these securities did not constitute a preference under the bankrupt law."

McDonald v. Clearwater R. Co., 21 A. B. R. 182, 164 Fed. 1007 (U. S. C. C. Idaho): "Transfers which do not diminish the estate of the bankrupt, but which constitute only a fair exchange of property, are not preferences."

§ 1321. But if New Securities Exceed Value of Old, Preference Arises.—If new securities of greater value are given or additional securities are given, the rule that an exchange of securities is not a preference does not apply;⁴⁵ or if the prior securities were of doubtful value, to the

In pursuance of an agreement made at the time, portions of the material were permitted to be sold from time to time as needed in the manufacture. Not simultaneously, but later, and within the four months period a lot of accounts were pledged to take the place of the material. The court held that this was not a mere exchange of securities, but was a preferential transfer within the four months period, for the effect of the use of the material was to withdraw it from the pledge weeks before the new security was given.

§ 1323. [1876] Stewart v. Hopkins, 30 Ohio St. 531: "But the payment of a mortgage debt, where the mortgage, as in this case, is full security for the debt, is not a preference within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act. For (as Lord Denman reasoned in Marshall v. Lamb, 5 Ad. & Ell. N. S. 115) the assignees have the mortgaged property, and it is indifferent to them whether they have the property free from the mortgage (supposing it to exceed in value the amount of the mortgage) or the property subject to the mortgage and the amount of the mortgage money in cash! It does not diminish the bankrupt's estate available for the payment of his other debts. The payment merely releases the mortgaged premises of the same amount which would otherwise have to be made out of the land for the same purpose by the assignee. It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the United States that an exchange of property or securities which do not diminish the bankrupt's estate, is not a preference under the Bankrupt Act."

Obiter and merely inferentially, Page v. Rogers, 21 A. B. R. 496, 211 U. It may be assumed, without decision, that the payment within four months of a bankruptcy of a mortgage older than four months, and valid inter partes, though unrecorded, cannot be a preference. There is no such case here."

Of course, if the benefit accrues solely to the other lienholders, it might be held to be pro tanto a preference.⁵¹

§ 1325½. § 1326. Liens or Other Transfers, Partly on Present Consideration, Partly on Past, Not Wholly Void but Valid Pro Tanto.—Liens given or other transfers made in part for present contributions to the debtor's assets or in exchange for securities of at least equal value, and in part for past contributions or for securities of less value, are not wholly void, but are good pro tanto, that is to say, are good to the extent of the present contributions or the value of the old securities released.⁵³

Bank v. Bruce, 6 A. B. R. 312, 109 Fed. 71 (C. C. A. S. Stedman v. Bank of Monroe, 9 A. B. R. 4, 117 Fed. 237 (C. C. A. Iowa): "Aside from other provisions [than 67 (d)] of the Bankrupt Act, this recorded chattel mortgage would have been a valid security for the prior as well as of the then present loan, according to its terms and purport. It was not illegal, and its continued security of the prior loan merely failed because the bankruptcy of the mortgagor intervened within four months of the giving of the mortgage, and the security, under the terms of the act, became as to the prior loan a preference. But no such result followed in respect to the $3,000 actually loaned when the mortgage was given."

And the same rule applies where part of the consideration is otherwise improper, as for instance, for usury: as to the usury, the lien is void.⁵⁴

fect the lien as a whole where given partly upon presently passing consideration and partly for a pre-existing debt, the Amendment of 1910 was passed to set the question at rest and to make positive the rule that such protection would not extend any further than to the presently passing consideration.^{54a}

§ 1326¼. Agreements for Liens or Other Transfers Where Lien Not Given until Later.—It is the date of the actual transfer that governs; and the fact that the transfer was in fulfillment of an agreement which itself was based on a valuable consideration passing between the parties previously will not cause the transfer to relate back to the time of the passing of the original consideration to make it a transfer on a presently passing consideration. It is a transfer on a pre-existing obligation; and may, if the other elements coexist, constitute a preference.⁵⁵

§ 1326½. Ratification within Four Months, of Prior Ineffectual Transfer.—Likewise, a ratification, within the four months period, of an unauthorized or ineffectual transfer made before, it would seem would, on the same principle, take effect as of the date of the effectual transfer; and if then the consideration had already passed, the transfer would be upon a pre-existing indebtedness.⁵⁶

§ 1326¾. Perfecting of Pre-Existing Liens or Rights.—The mere perfecting within the four months period, of liens or rights in the property existing before, does not constitute a preference.⁵⁷

§ 1327. Protection of Liens Given on Presently Passing Consideration, etc.—Liens given on a presently passing consideration, in good faith and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon the bankruptcy act and duly recorded where recording is necessary are protected.⁵⁸

§ 1327½. Amendment of 1910, Whether Debt "Pre-Existing" Determined by Date of Transfer or Recording.—It is the author's view that the question whether the debt, in the paying or securing whereof the transfer is made, is to be deemed a pre-existing debt, is to be determined as of the date of the transfer itself or, if effected by an instrument requiring recording by State statute, then it may be determined as of the date of such recording.⁵⁹

59. Bankr. Act, § 60 (b), as amended 1910. See post, § 1334½.

It has been held that notwithstanding the Amendment of 1910 to § 60 (b) the debt must have been pre-existing at the time of the original transfer between the parties, else there would be no preference, the amendment merely operating to move on to the date of recording the proof of insolvency and reasonable cause of belief. Whilst this is a possible construction of the amendment, it clearly was not the construction intended by Congress, since the object of the Amendment was to prevent secret liens by causing the whole transaction to be judged as if the transfer took place at the date of the recording, so that if at the date of the recording the consideration did not contemporaneously pass, then it would be a pre-existing indebtedness such as is essential to a preference.

§ 1328. Fourth Element of a Preference.—The debtor must have made a “transfer” of property or have “procured” or “suffered” the creditor to obtain a judgment operating to appropriate property of the debtor. Preference implies voluntary action on the debtor’s part, and a change of title thereby, of the kind known as “transfer” or a seizure by legal proceedings with the debtor’s assent or acquiescence.⁶¹

Tumlin v. Bryan, 21 A. B. R. 319, 165 Fed. 166 (C. C. A. Ga.): “He must prove that the bankrupts * * * (3) made a transfer of their property, i. e., a payment of money.”

In re Hines, 16 A. B. R. 500, 144 Fed. 543 (D. C. Pa.): “It is essential to a preference * * * that there should be a transfer by the bankrupt of certain of his property to the creditor preferred.”

Irish v. Citizens’ Trust Co., 21 A. B. R. 39 (D. C. N. Y.): “If the furniture company [the bankrupts] in due course of business had deposited this money with the trust company, and it or any part of it had remained there, the simple relation of debtor and creditor would have arisen, and, in the absence of fraud or collusion or intent to give and receive a preference, there would have been mutual demands which could have been set off, the one against the other, even though the deposits were made within the four months preceding the filing of the petition. * * * But such is not this case. The furniture company checked out the money, all of it so far as involved here, and by checks on the account transferred it to the trust company as a payment of notes with intent to prefer and it was accepted as payment of such notes.”

Inferentially, Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 152 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa): “The transfer specified in Bankruptcy Act 1898, § 60 (a), includes a mortgage or a lien voluntarily created by the debtor.”

Similarly, where an instrument is left in escrow or where there is a mere written agreement to make a transfer not acted upon at all before bankruptcy, the fact of the obligation itself and that it arose before the four months period will not excuse a payment made upon the strength of the obligation nor bring the payment within the category of transfers not preferential because of their releasing a corresponding value of property from a lien.⁶²

⁶² Page v. Rogers, 21 A. B. R. 496, 211 U. S. 575, quoted at § 1370.

§ 1329. Voluntary Action of Debtor Requisite to Preference by Way of "Transfer."—Although intent to prefer is not requisite to constitute a transfer a preference, yet there must be at least some voluntary action on the debtor's part or some assent or acquiescence, to constitute the transaction a "transfer." Seizure or appropriation of property by the creditor, or his receipt of it otherwise than by the voluntary act or assent of the debtor, will deprive the transaction of its character as a preference.

Thus, where the property was obtained from the bankrupt by a creditor through fraud or force a preference has not been perpetrated and a suit in replevin or for conversion is the proper remedy.⁶³

Likewise, where it is stolen or embezzled and turned over to the creditor.⁶⁴

Likewise, authority given to a factory by a storekeeper to deduct from each laborer's wages each week the amount then owing to the storekeeper and to remit the same to the storekeeper, gives no authority to the factory to appropriate such deductions on a prior debt owed the factory by the storekeeper, and therefore such appropriation, lacking the element of the debtor's voluntary act, is not a "transfer" and hence not a preference.

Western Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 13 A. B. R. 451, 196 U. S. 502: "To give effect, therefore, to the finding that there was no intention on the part of Harrison to prefer, we must consider that the authority given by him to the tie company to collect from the laborers did not give that company the right, or endow it with the option, when it had collected, to retain the money for its exclusive benefit, and to the detriment of the other creditors of Harrison.

"The result of the facts found, then, is this: Harrison sold his goods to the laborers, and agreed with the tie company that that company, when it paid the laborers, should deduct the amount due by the laborers from the wages which the tie company owed them, and, after making the deduction, should remit to Harrison the amount thus deducted, irrespective of any indebtedness otherwise due by Harrison to the tie company. Did this give rise to a voidable preference within the intendment of § 75g and § 60b of the Bankrupt Act?

"In view of the necessary result of the findings which we have previously pointed out, it is, we think, beyond doubt that the agreement was not a voidable preference within the meaning of the statute, since, considering the agreement alone, it brought about no preference whatever."

But, where a bank, by virtue of a "banker's lien," applies the surplus of collateral held for one debt upon another debt held by it, such appropriation does not lack the debtor's voluntary participation and may constitute a preference.⁶⁵

Of course, the transfer may be effected by an agent of the bankrupt, act-

§ 1329½. Deposits in Bank Offset.—A bank's appropriation of a deposit to the payment of a loan made to the depositor lacks the element of the debtor's assent and is not a preference: it is not a "transfer."⁶⁷

Lowell v. International Trust Co., 19 A. B. R. 853, 158 Fed. 781 (C. C. A. Mass.): "In no sense, however, is a deposit like the deposit here payment, or intended as payment. This is the first condition of the decision in New York Bank v. Massey, and a vital one; because, if a deposit in the usual course of business may be in the nature of a payment, an unlawful preference would necessarily be involved under the circumstances of either New York Bank v. Massey or the case at bar, a suggestion of a possibility which the Supreme Court was compelled to negative."

Trust and Savings Bank v. Trust Co., 229 U. S. 435, 30 A. B. R. 624: "As to the $579.79 we think the right to set off this deposit is established by the principles laid down in New York County Nat. Bank v. Massey, supra. Here there was a deposit subject to be checked out by the bankrupt for specific purposes. The money was not placed in the bank with a view to giving it a benefit, except indirectly, because of the deposit. It was subject to Prince's check, and all of it might have been checked out for the purposes intended."

The Supreme Court has even held that where, within the four months before the bankruptcy the depositor gives to the bank checks on his deposit in payment of notes held by the bank, this may be simply a method of giving form to what the law would accomplish in substance, namely, an "offset;" the ruling on this point, however, being unnecessary to the decision in the particular case since the court also found as a fact that the bank had no reasonable cause to believe a preference would result.

time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and which, under certain circumstances, and in the absence of collusion, might be the subject of set-off, but is rather that of a transfer to a bank of a portion of the bankrupt's estate by the bankrupt's own act prior to the bankruptcy, and which was accepted by the bank in partial payment of an unmatured claim, and concerning which transaction a jury has said that the bank had reasonable cause to believe at the time the payment was made that it was accepting a preference." Compare, In re Davis, 9 A. B. R. 670, 119 Fed. 950 (D. C. Tex.).

But compare, where the application of the deposits by overdrafts was by agreement, obiter, Tomlinson v. Bk. of Lexington, 16 A. B. R. 632 (C. C. A. N. Y.).

payments were not transfers; or—if transfers—that the trustee could not recover the money because the bank had no reasonable cause to believe that the payment of the notes would operate as a preference. * * * The case was then brought here by the trustee, who insists that all the payments were transfers—that if the notes charged to the account are not transfers certainly the giving of the three checks for $5,000 were transfers and that in receiving the same the bank necessarily knew that it was obtaining a preference.

“But if, as found by the referee, the bank had no reasonable cause to believe such transfers would effect a preference, the payments by checks for $15,000 drawn on the deposit account, are as much protected as if on the same dates similar checks had been given in payment of like amounts due another bank with which the Collver Company kept no account. For there is nothing in the statute which deprives a bank, with whom an insolvent is doing business, of the rights of any other creditor taking money without reasonable cause to believe that a preference will result from the payment. * * *

“In this case the referee found as a fact that the bank had no reasonable cause to believe that a preference would result. The district judge made no finding of fact. * * * The Circuit Court of Appeals made no ruling on this subject, and we, therefore, pass to the consideration of the right of set-off in the light of the finding by the referee, by the district judge, and by the Court of Appeals that the deposits were honestly made in due course of business and without any intent to prefer the bank. * * *

“That section [Bankr. Act, § 68(a)] did not create the right of set-off, but recognized its existence and provided a method by which it could be enforced even after bankruptcy. What the old books called a right of stoppage—what business men call set-off, is a right given or recognized by the commercial law of each of the States and is protected by the Bankruptcy Act if the petition is filed before the parties have themselves given checks, charged notes, made book entries, or stated an account whereby the smaller obligation is applied on the larger. If this set-off of mutual debts has been lawfully made by the parties before the petition is filed, there is no necessity of the trustee doing so. If it has not been done by the parties, then, under command of the statute, it must be done by the trustee. But there is nothing in 68a which prevents the parties from voluntarily doing, before the petition is filed, what the law itself requires to be done after proceedings in bankruptcy are instituted. * * * These were mutual debts, and if on the date the first note became due, the Collver Company had failed to pay it, the bank could have enforced its banker’s lien or its right of set-off by applying $5,000 of the deposits in payment of the note which matured that day, and so on as each of the other notes became due. It cannot have been illegal for the parties on Sept. 12, 20, 30, October 3 and 14, to do what the law would have required the trustee to do in stating the account after the petition was filed on December 16, 1910. No money passed in either instance; for whether the checks for $5,000 were paid or notes for $5,000 were charged, was, in either event, a book entry equivalent to the voluntary exercises by the parties of the right of set-off.”

The court below, in the same case, had held that the element of “assent” was not present in such a transaction, since what was done was simply to give form to what the law would have accomplished in substance.

Studley v. Boylston Nat. Bank of Boston, 29 A. B. R. 649, 200 Fed. 249 (C. C. A. Mass.): “It being the fact that the deposits were honestly made, and as also the bankruptcy statutes go beyond the common law, which allows set-off of all debts overdue, in that they also allow set-off of everything due and not due, when brought down to ‘present value’ so far as the interest account is concerned, it follows that in the present case, as stated in Lowell v. International Trust Co., at page 856 of 19 Am. B. R., at page 784 of 158 Fed., at page 140 of 86 C. C. A., what the bank did was simply to give form to what the law itself would accomplish in substance. We will repeat here what we said there, namely: 'What the International Trust Company did in the case at bar, more than what was done in New York Bank v. Massey, was, as we have said, simply to give form to what the law itself accomplished in substance. Moreover, if what was done by the International Trust Company, in distinction from what was done by the creditor in New York Bank v. Massey, accomplished a preference, and for that reason was invalid or has been invalidated, the condition prior to the charging up the demand loans would have been restored by force of law, and the deposit would remain with the International Trust Company, precisely as it did in the case before the Supreme Court, and also the law would be left to operate in precisely the same manner. All this, therefore, raises no substantial difference which we can discover to relieve us from the conclusions of the Supreme Court in the case on which the International Trust Company relies.' In applying these broad principles, whether the depositor gave checks against his deposits for notes as they came due or notes which were overdue, or the bank delayed all proceedings until the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and thus evidenced a statutory set-off, was purely a matter of form; and it follows that the decision of the District Court was correct."

But compare, In re Starkweather & Albert, 30 A. B. R. 743, 206 Fed. 797 (D. C. Mo.): "The matter may be disposed of upon a broader ground; that the bank did not stand upon its right of set-off. It simply threatened to exercise that right. The matter terminated, however, on the basis of voluntary payments by Starkweather & Albert, in giving checks which were received by the bank as payments. While the distinction seems narrow between a payment resulting from the exercise of the right of set-off and a payment by check given in the presence of the power by the bank to exercise this right of set-off and application, yet the legal distinction exists, in that in the one instance the act is that of the bank, and in the other that of the debtor. The distinction seems to be recognized by the authorities. Ridge Ave. Bank v. Studheim (C. C. A. 3rd Cir.), 16 Am. B. R. 863, 145 Fed. 798, 76 C. C. A. 362; Irish v. Citizens' Trust Co., 21 Am. B. R. 39, 163 Fed. 880; Germania Co. v. Loeb, 26 Am. B. R. 238, 188 Fed. 289 (C. C. A.). The precise question seems to have been considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Traders' Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. 87."

§ 1330. Definition of "Transfer."—Transfer under the peculiar definition of the Bankruptcy Act includes the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift or security.⁶⁸

§ 1331. Payments of Money "Transfers."—The word "transfer" has a broader meaning in this bankruptcy law than has been given it in many jurisdictions.⁶⁹

"Transfer" under the present Bankruptcy Act includes a payment of money.⁷⁰

Carson, Pirie et al. v. Chic. Title & T. Co., 5 A. B. R. 818, 182 U. S. 438: "It will be observed that payments in money are not expressly mentioned. Transfers of property are, and one of the contentions of appellants is that by 'transfers of property,' payments in money are not intended. The contention is easily disposed of. It is answered by the definitions contained in § 1. It is there provided that "'transfer" shall include the sale and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally, as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift or security.' It seems necessarily to mean that a transfer of property includes the giving or conveying anything of value—anything which has debt-paying or debt-securing power.

"We are not unaware that a distinction between money and other property is sometimes made, but it would be anomalous in the extreme that in a statute which is concerned with the obligations of debtors and the prevention of preferences to creditors, the readiest and most potent instrumentality to give a preference should have been omitted. Money is certainly property, whether we regard any of its forms or any of its theories. It may be composed of a precious metal, and hence valuable of itself, gaining little or no addition of value from the attributes which give it its ready exchangeability and currency. And its other forms are immediately convertible into the same precious metal, and even without such conversion have, at times, even greater commercial efficacy than it. It would be very strange indeed if such forms of property, with all their sanctions and powers, should be excluded from the statute, and the representatives of private debts which we denominate by the general term 'securities' should be included. We certainly cannot so declare upon one meaning of the word 'transfer.' If the word itself permitted such declaration, which we do not admit, the definition in the statute forbids it. 'Transfer' is defined to be not only the sale of property, but 'every other mode of disposing or parting with property' All technicality and narrowness of meaning is precluded. The word is used in its most comprehensive sense, and is intended to include every means and manner by which property can pass from the ownership and possession of another, and by which the result forbidden by the statute may be peddled to repay the money so received by them. Said § 6343 (Rev. Stat.) makes no provision as to payments made in contemplation of insolvency or to create a preference, or with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. * * * The word 'payment' is as familiar and as well understood, as the words, 'sale, conveyance, transfer mortgage or assignment' and if the general assembly had intended to legislate against payments, it would have used that word. The legislature having omitted the word 'payment' this court cannot read it into the statute by construction; and especially is this true when we never had any legislation in this State against receiving payment of honest claims, and when such a construction would render the constitutional validity of the act doubtful."

§ 1332. "Transfer" Includes, Also, Pledge, Mortgage, Gift, Security, etc.—The word "transfer" as used in the Bankruptcy Act includes moreover not only a payment of money but also a pledge, a mortgage, a gift or security and every other and different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property, absolutely or conditionally.⁷¹ Therefore, a preference may be accomplished by the debtor's pledging his property or part of it, or by mortgaging it or giving it as security for a debt. It is unnecessary to multiply illustrations or citations. Any method of disposing of property to a creditor, or of parting with it or with its possession, even if conditionally, can afford the means of perpetrating a preference. However peculiar the species of property or devious or indirect the method of effecting the transfer, it may result in a preference.⁷²

Deere Plow Co. v. Farmer Store Co., 31 A. B. R. 156 (Wis.): "The contract in question is clearly a conditional sale within the rule of the cases of this and other courts, and, being free from actual fraud, must be held valid and effective. * * * The respondent's contention that the transaction embraced in this contract constituted an unlawful preference under section 60 of the Bankruptcy Act must also fail; the bankrupt transferred no estate in any of this property, nor was anything done by way of securing any antecedent debt of the bankrupt so as to invalidate the transfer within the provisions of this provision of the Bankruptcy Act."

Big Four Implement Co. v. Wright, 31 A. B. R. 125, 207 Fed. 535 (C. C. A. Kan.): "These being contracts of conditional sale, there is no foundation for the claim that the filing of them within four months of the bankruptcy constituted a preference. There could be no preference without a transfer by the bankrupt of his property. If there were any transfer in this case it is evidenced by these instruments dated Dec. 8, 1910, and Jan. 23, 1911. But they transferred no property of Bell. They expressly refrained from transferring any to him."

In re Farmer's Co. of Barlow (No. 1), 30 A. B. R. 187, 202 Fed. 1005 (D. C. N. Dak.): "The trustee's main reliance, however, is that the granting of the petition of the plow company would secure to it a preference over the other creditors of the estate. By section 60a of the Bankruptcy Act, the contract must be judged as of the date of its filing. Because that date fell within four months of the filing of the petition, the referee held that to enforce the provisions of the conditional sale contract would secure to the plow company a preference. I am unable to concur in that view for two reasons: First, the bankrupt never had any title to the property. The title was, by the terms of the contract, reserved to the seller. By the great weight of authority such a reservation is entirely valid. Harkness v. Russell, 118 U. S. 663, 7 Sup. Ct. 51, 30 L. Ed. 285; Williston on Sales, 324. The only right in the property which the bankrupt secured was the right of possession. The property was not, therefore, the property of the bankrupt, and the contract could not in any aspect amount to a transfer of 'its property' within the meaning of §§ 60a and 60b. Second. The reservation of title in the contract does not amount to a transfer from the buyer to the seller. It is simply a reservation of title by the seller to himself as one of the conditions upon which possession of the property is transferred to the buyer. The contract cannot, therefore, be held to amount to a 'transfer' of property from the buyer to the seller. It has sometimes been said by courts and text-writers that a conditional sale amounts to a sale of the property with a mortgage back. That is not its character, and nothing but confusion can result from attempting to describe a conditional sale in terms of a mortgage. If the purchaser pays down a part of the purchase price at the time of the sale, or at a subsequent date before the seller attempts to enforce the condition, it is quite true that the buyer has an equitable interest in the property by reason of the payments. When the facts present such a case, it may be that a court of bankruptcy will find a way to protect the equitable interest of the bankrupt against forfeiture. Williston on Sales, § 579. The present case, however, presents no such question, for the evidence shows, and the referee has found, that the amount now due on the contract considerably exceeds the purchase price of the property here involved."

Baker Ice Machine Co. v. Bailey, 31 A. B. R. 593 (C. C. A. Kans.): "The district court treated the conditional sale contract as a transfer effective May 15th, 1912, the date of its filing to secure an existing indebtedness of that this date being within four months of the time of the filing of the voluntary petition in bankruptcy—July 11, 1912—the transfer was void as a preference. We think this was error and that the error arose from holding that the conditional sale contract operated as a transfer."

Big Four Implement Co. v. Wright, 31 A. B. R. 125, 207 Fed. 535 (C. C. A. Kans.): "These being contracts of conditional sale, there is no foundation for the claim that the filing of them within four months of bankruptcy constitute a preference. There could be no preference without a transfer by the bankrupt of his property. If there was a transfer in this case, it is evidenced by the instrument dated December 8, 1910, and January 23, 1911. But they transferred no property of Bell. They expressly refrained from transferring any to him."

Hart v. Emmerson-Brantingham Co., 30 A. B. R. 218, 203 Fed. 60 (D. C. Mo.): "The return of the goods cannot properly be treated as a preferential transfer, for the defendant took back the property under the assertion of a paramount title and did not take it as a creditor for application upon a debt."

§ 1334¼. Where Recording "Not Necessary."—As noted elsewhere⁷⁸ local or general law, as distinguished from bankruptcy law, determines when a "transfer" shall be considered as consummated where recording is not "necessary." Thus, in the absence of a recording statute to cover the case, general law will control as to the time an assignment of a chose in action will be considered as consummated.

In re Wilson, 23 A. B. R. 814 (D. C. Hawaii): "There is no requirement in the Hawaiian statutes that bills of sale of chattels must be recorded in order to be valid. * * * In view of these facts and considerations, I find that the assignments in question were not complete until notice thereof was given to the county of Kauai, which notice, in both cases, was within four months of the date when the petition for adjudication was filed. But as it appears from all the evidence that the transfers were initiated before the four months began to run, were such transfers preferences under the Bankruptcy Act, § 60a, which makes a transfer by an insolvent person within the four months, a preference? Does the act of the insolvent, in order to make it a preference, require its effectuation by notice according to the above finding? I think not. The transfer is complete when the assignment is made, so far as the assignor can complete it. These transfers, therefore, not having been made within the four months, are not preferences; and this would seem to require the affirmative answer to the submitted question." Quoted also at § 1275.

§ 1334½. Amendment of 1910—Transfer Consummated at Date of Recording.—The Amendment of 1910 to § 60b adopts the date of recording, where recording is required by State law, as the effective date of the consummation of the transfer.⁷⁹ fer if by law recording or registering thereof is required, and being within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy or after the filing thereof and before the adjudication, the bankrupt be insolvent and the judgment or transfer then operate as a preference, and the person receiving it or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall then have reasonable cause to believe that the § 1335. "Procuring or Suffering" Judgment.—Where the preference is not by way of a "transfer," it is essential, at least, that the bankrupt must have "procured or suffered" the creditor to obtain a judgment, under which levy or other seizure was made.⁸⁰

In re Nusbaum, 18 A. B. R. 598, 152 Fed. 835 (D. C. N. Y.): "When the alleged bankrupt * * * being insolvent, voluntarily confessed judgment in favor of certain of his creditors * * * with the intent to prefer such creditors over his other creditors, and permitted them, as he knew they would and as they did, to issue executions thereon and levy upon and sell all his property by virtue thereof, and put the proceeds of such sale of such property in their pockets in payment and satisfaction of their respective debts, as he knew they would and intended they should, be transferred while insolvent * * * with intent to prefer the creditors in whose favor he confessed such judgments, it was not a sale by him in form, but it was a different mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property absolutely, and 'as security' first, and second 'as a payment' to such preferred creditors. * * * It was a 'transfer' within the plain definition of the term found in cl. 25 of § 1 of the act."

Grant v. National Bank of Auburn, 28 A. B. R. 712, 197 Fed. 581 (D. C. N. Y.): "All this was done when the defendant in such judgment and execution, enforcement of such judgment or transfer would effect a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee and he may recover the property or its value from such person."

the Cayuga Construction Company, was insolvent, which fact was known to both the parties, and the judgment was given as a means of effecting a preference and received as such, that is, as a means of transferring the property of the Cayuga Construction Company, or its proceeds, to the said National Bank of Auburn, in satisfaction or payment, so far as it would go, of a prior debt."

"Judgment" probably applies to any court proceedings whereby the estate is depleted; thus, to a fraudulent scheme under cloak of court orders whereby the estate is depleted, as where an assignee in insolvency was to sell under order of court at a purposely low figure to the brother of one partner, who was to pay certain creditors 50 per cent of their claims, the balance to the debtor firm.⁸¹

§ 1336. Warrants of Attorney to Confess Judgment, Continuing Consents.—Judgment levies within the four months period on warrants of attorney to confess judgment executed before the four months, constitute continuing assent or acquiescence.⁸² But "continuing consent" is not necessary; mere passive nonresistance is sufficient.⁸³

§ 1337. Debtor's Voluntary Action Not Implied in Cases of Preferences by Way of Judgments.—The debtor's positive action perhaps is not implied in case the preference be by way of legal proceedings. Mere passive nonresistance may be all that is requisite.⁸⁴

Contra, Johnson v. Anderson, 11 A. B. R. 302, 70 Neb. 233: "In order to constitute a preference, the debtor must do some act to facilitate the proceedings; submissive inactivity is not enough. * * * It is certainly competent for a creditor to institute an attachment suit against a bankrupt, obtain judgment by default, and sell the attached property; and, unless the bankrupt does some act by which he has participated in some way in the act of the creditor, the preference otherwise acquired is a valid preference as against other creditors."

Contra, under law of 1867, Brown v. Jefferson County Nat'l Bk. (C. C. A. N. Y.), 9 Fed. 258: "The mere existence of a desire on the part of a debtor, however strong such desire, that a particular creditor may succeed by suit, judgment, execution and levy in obtaining a preference over other creditors, so that such preference may be maintained, even as against proceedings in bankruptcy which may be subsequently commenced, is not sufficient to establish that the debtor procured or suffered his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to prefer such creditor, if the proceedings of the creditor were the usual proceedings in a suit, unaided by any action of the debtor, either by facilitating the proceedings as to time or method, or by obstructing other creditors who otherwise would obtain priority."

§ 1338. Payment of Proceeds of Execution Sale to Creditor Sufficient without Debtor's Voluntary Action.—The payment of the proceeds of an execution or attachment sale to the levying creditor, if otherwise preferential, is none the less a preference because of the lack of the debtor's voluntary act.⁸⁵

§ 1339. Fifth Element of a Preference.—Where the preference is by way of a transfer, the transfer must have been made by the transferror to satisfy a debt in whole or in part and the property must have been sought to be applied on a debt. Preference, by way of transfer, implies an intent of the transferror to apply the property on a debt, or obligation.

§ 1340. Intent to Apply on Debt to Be Distinguished from Intent to Prefer.—By this is not meant that the transferee must be proved to have intended the transfer as a preference; intent to pay a debt and intent, by paying it, to prefer, are wholly different matters.

Property of the debtor not transferred to apply on a debt, does not give rise to a preference, although it may be used as an offset. Thus, the retaining, to apply on a creditor's own claim against a bankrupt storekeeper, funds deducted by arrangement from the wages of the creditor's employees to pay for supplies furnished the employees by the storekeeper, has been held an offset (although an improper one in this case) and not a preference, since the element of the debtor's application of the payment on the debt was lacking.⁸⁶

§ 1340½. Transfer to Creditor but Not to Apply on Indebtedness.—Though the person to whom the transfer is made be also a creditor, yet the transfer will not be a preference if it is not made to apply upon some debt existing between them. Thus, where the wife of a bankrupt is a bona fide creditor, money given to her by the bankrupt to defray family expenses does not constitute a preference.⁸⁷

But this proposition must not be thought to support the doctrine that a payment upon one debt is not a preference upon other debts existing between the parties. The payment must not be made in reduction of any part of the aggregate indebtedness between the parties, else it will not be lacking in this element of a preference, for the whole state of the indebtedness between the parties is to be taken into account. The doctrine of this section simply is that a transfer made for a different purpose from that of the payment of a debt cannot constitute a preference.

§ 1341. Bankrupt's Deposit in Bank.—Thus, a bankrupt's deposit in bank, so long as it was made as a general deposit subject to check, is not a preference and may be offset: the relation is that of debtor and creditor, and the mutual debts may be offset, the depositing not having been made to pay a debt.⁸⁸

N. Y. County Nat'l Bk. v. Massey, 11 A. B. R. 42, 192 U. S. 138: "The money deposited becomes a part of the general fund of the bank, to be dealt with by it as other moneys, to be lent to customers, and parted with at the will of the bank, and the right of the depositor is to have this debt repaid in whole or in part by honoring checks drawn against the deposits. It creates an ordinary debt, not a privilege or right of a fiduciary character. * * *

"As we have seen, a deposit of money to one's credit in a bank does not operate to diminish the estate of the depositor, for when he parts with the money he creates at the same time, on the part of the bank, an obligation to pay the amount of the deposit as soon as the depositor may see fit to draw a check against it. It is not a transfer of property as a payment, pledge, mortgage, gift or security. It is true that it creates a debt, which, if the creditor may set it off under § 68, amounts to permitting a creditor of that class to obtain more from the bankrupt's estate than creditors who are not in the same situation, and do not hold any debts of the bankrupt subject to set-off. But this does not, in our opinion, operate to enlarge the scope of the statute defining preferences so as to prevent set-off in cases coming within the terms of § 68a. If this argument were to prevail, it would, in cases of insolvency, defeat the right of set-off recognized and enforced in the law, as every creditor of the bankrupt holding a claim against the estate subject to reduction to the full amount of a debt due the bankrupt receives a preference in the fact that to the extent of the set-off he is paid in full."

Lowell v. International Trust Co., 19 A. B. R. 853, 158 Fed. 781 (C. C. A. Mass.): "Undoubtedly the District Court, in ordering a verdict for the defendant, felt compelled thereto by New York Bank v. Massey, * * * We are unable to perceive how we can substantially distinguish the two cases. * * * The plaintiff calls to our attention Traders' Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. 87, * * * but that was distinguished in New York Bank v. Massey, as follows: * * * 'In Traders' Bank v. Campbell, * * * the right of set-off was not relied upon, but a deposit was seized on a judgment which was a preference.' * * * In other words, the bank clearly did not rely at all on its relations to the bankrupt as its customer, but it put itself entirely on its rights as an execution creditor, which rights, as the law then stood, were under the circumstances ineffectual. The plaintiff also urges on us that, in New York Bank v. Massey, the bank took no action formally or otherwise, but merely left it to the law to offset the deposit made by the bankrupt against his indebtedness, while in the case at bar we must accept the statement that the defendant charged up its demand loans against the deposit, or, in other words, went through the formalities of certain alleged journal entries. This, however, was ineffectual either way, whether to benefit or prejudice the International Trust Company. It only gave expression to what the law itself would accomplish, that is, it cleaned up the set-off and left it where the law itself would have left it. At law, it takes two parties to accomplish an effectual payment, both a payor and a payee. Sometimes, of course, the law appropriates moneys in payment, or permits the creditor to do it; but that is in consequence of some express or implied understanding between the parties. In such instances an intention on the part of both parties to make payment on some indebtedness underlies what the law accomplishes, and the law is called in only because, while payment is intended, the particular item of indebtedness to which it shall be appropriated is not specifically pointed out. In no sense, however, is a deposit like the deposit here payment, or intended as payment. This is the first condition of the decision in New York Bank v. Massey, and a vital one; because, if a deposit in the usual course of business, may be in the nature of a payment, an unlawful preference would necessarily be involved under the circumstances of either New York Bank v. Massey or the case at bar, a suggestion of a possibility which the Supreme Court was compelled to negative."

Studley v. Boylston Nat. Bank of Boston, 29 A. B. R. 649, 200 Fed. 249 (C. C. A. Mass.): "Of course, to be within the rule of the cases cited, good faith must exist, and there must be no deposits made after insolvency threatens, wholly or especially for the purpose of enabling a bank to secure an advantage over other creditors. In this case it is plain there was no such intention; and it is also plain that the deposits were honestly made, so that, within the somewhat artificial rule in Bank v. Massey, as stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Day in behalf of the court, at page 147 of 192 U. S., at page 46 of 11 Am. B. R. at page 201 of 24 Sup. Ct. (48 L. Ed. 380): 'A deposit of money to one's credit in a bank does not operate to diminish the assets of the depositor.' It being the fact that the deposits were honestly made, and as also the bankruptcy statutes go beyond the common law, which allows set-off of all debts overdue, in that they also allow set-off of everything due and not due, when brought down to "present value" so far as the interest account is concerned, it follows that in the present case, as stated in Lowell v. International Trust Co., at page 856 of 19 Am. B. R., at page 784 of 158 Fed., at page 140 of 86 C. C. A. what the bank did was simply to give form to what the law itself would accomplish in substance. We will repeat here what we said there, namely: 'What the International Trust Company did in the case at bar, more than what was done in New York Bank v. Massey, was, as we have said, simply to give form to what the law itself accomplished in substance. Moreover, if what was done by the International Trust Company, in distinction from what was done by the creditor in New York Bank v. Massey, accomplished a preference, and for that reason was invalid or has been invalidated, the condition prior to the charging up the demand loans would have been restored by force of law, and the deposit would remain with the International Trust Company, precisely as it did in the case before the Supreme Court, and also the law would be left to operate in precisely the same manner. All this, therefore raises no substantial difference which we can discover to relieve us from the conclusions of the Supreme Court in the case on which the International Trust Company relies:

"In applying these broad principles, whether the depositor gave checks against his deposits for notes as they came due or notes which were overdue, or the bank delayed all proceedings until the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and thus evidenced a statutory set-off, was purely a matter of form; and it follows that the decision of the District Court was correct."

But where the deposit was itself made precisely for the purpose of permitting checks to be drawn to create preferences, the situation would be different.⁸⁹

Likewise, where a bank, being the largest creditor, acted as agent of a lender who loaned the insolvent money, which was deposited in the bank and later "offset" or appropriated by the bank, the loan being on a demand note, a chattel mortgage given to the lender at the time has been held voidable as a preference.⁹⁰

And a deposit will be held to constitute a preference where it appears that the bank induced the making of it with the intention and purpose of applying it on an indebtedness owing to the bank by the depositor;⁹¹ and where a bank required a depositor to give it a check on his account in payment of notes not then due, the transaction was held to constitute a preference.⁹²

Again an intention to accept a preference has been held to exist where a deposit was accepted after the bank had ordered that no more certifications should be made, the order having been made because of the bank's knowledge of impending insolvency;⁹³ but the depositor must have intended to have applied the deposit on the debt owing to the bank, else it could not have been held to be a preference, though it might have been held to be a trust fund.

However, it has been held that checks deposited for collection on the same day, shortly before the bankruptcy petition was filed, but not collected until the next day, may not be offset.⁹⁴

And an offset of the deposit may be allowed even though the notes or other obligations owing to the bank are not yet due,⁹⁵ so long as it is a true offset and not an application of the deposit on the debt by the debtor.

But collusion between the depositor and the bank to make the facts appear as if there were no consent destroys the right of offset.⁹⁶

In re Wright-Dana Hardware Co., 31 A. B. R. 192, 207 Fed. 636 (D. C. N. Y.): "In the case now before this court there was a parting with the bankrupt's property, first a sale and collection of accounts and then a deposit for the benefit of the bank and for the very purpose of having the deposits held by the bank and applied on the notes held by it. The evidence here does show 'collusions with a view to create a preferential transfer of the bankrupt's property to the bank' and no other conclusion is possible. But as to the deposits prior to January 1, 1912, and the application of the deposits on the notes held by the bank, we have a different situation and a different state of facts. As to those transactions it is a question whether they constitute preferential payments or mere offsets. Prior to January 1, 1912, the business of the company was being conducted in the usual manner. Sales were made the money collected and placed in the bank in the usual course."

§ 1342. Sixth Element of a Preference.—The debtor must have been insolvent at the time of the transfer or other voluntary appropriation of property. Preference implies insolvency of the debtor. Of course there can be no preference among creditors if the debtor is solvent, for then he can pay all his debts in full.⁹⁷

The inhibitions of § 60 apply only to preferences given when the debtor is insolvent in fact, and if a lien was perfected before the fire, in the case as presented, it is not affected by that section, although it may remain open to question under § 67, as to 'a present consideration.'"

§ 1343. Definition of Insolvency under Present Act.—Insolvency, as the term is used in the present Bankruptcy Act, is different from what is usually meant in bankruptcy and insolvency law by the term. Its time-honored, legal meaning as used in insolvency proceedings, is inability of the debtor to meet his obligations as they mature in the usual course of business. And this was what was meant by the law of 1867.⁹⁸

Carson v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 5 A. B. R. 824, 182 U. S. 438: "It is pointed out that insolvency has a different meaning under the Act of 1898 than it had under the Act of 1867. Under the latter, the debtor was insolvent when he was unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business. Under the former, when the aggregate of his property at a fair valuation is insufficient to pay his debts."

However, such a definition would make almost every merchant insolvent in the eyes of the law during seasons of panic and financial stringency such as occurred in the United States, for instance, during the dark days of 1893 and 1894, when the wealthiest and most prosperous business men were unable to pay their notes and bills as they became due. Money itself, the medium of payment, was hoarded. Banks had to resort to the artifice of clearing-house scrip—had to create a new kind of money in fact. It was next to impossible to raise money on the best collateral security, and real estate loans of so-called "gilt-edged" value went begging for takers. Almost every merchant was insolvent if the usual legal definition was the test, for everyone, almost, was unable to meet his obligations as they matured in the due course of business. The likelihood that such financial stringencies and industrial depressions are to be recurring and frequently recurring phenomena in the commercial world, undoubtedly was the reason that the framers of the present Bankruptcy Act, coming to their work only two or three years after the crisis of 1893, rejected as intolerable a definition of insolvency such as this, as a basis for bankruptcy proceedings. Indeed, this sweeping definition of insolvency was one of the causes of the popular hatred that grew up against the old Bankruptcy Law of 1867, and was one of the causes of the downfall of that law and of the reluctance of Congress to pass another Bankruptcy Act. Accordingly, Congress chose the more liberal definition and the definition most nearly approximating to the popular idea of insolvency that they set forth in § 1, clause 15, of the Statute, in the following words:

"A person shall be deemed insolvent within the provisions of this act whenever the aggregate of his property, exclusive of any property which he may have conveyed, transferred, concealed or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, with intent to defraud, hinder or delay his creditors, shall not at a fair valuation, be sufficient in amount to pay his debts."⁹⁹

Carson, etc., v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 5 A. B. R. 824, 182 U. S. 438: "The other weakness in the argument is that it exaggerates the difference between the definitions of insolvency and overlooks an advantage to the creditor in the definition contained in the Act of 1898. Inability to pay debts in the ordinary course of business usually accompanies an insufficiency of assets. It may not, of course. At times a debtor's property, though amply sufficient in value to discharge all of his obligations, may not be convertible without sacrifice into that form by which payments may be made. The law regards that possibility. In this there is indulgence to the debtor, and through him to preferred creditors."

Martin v. Bigelow, 7 A. B. R. 220 (N. Y. Sup. Ct.): "To say of a man that he is in failing circumstances, or that he is unable to pay all his debts in full, which means presently unable so to do, is quite a different thing from alleging that his property, taken at a fair valuation, is not sufficient in amount to pay his debts."

And it is to be noted that the definition adopted in the present law is the same as that which for centuries has been the accepted meaning of the term insolvency as used in the law of fraudulent transfers. The term "insolvency," as understood in dealing with contracts and transfers challenged on the ground of fraud, actual or constructive, has always had reference to the insufficiency of the debtor's assets to cover his liabilities, although as understood in the administration of insolvent and former bankrupt laws, it has usually referred to the mere inability of the debtor to pay his debts as they matured in the usual course of business.¹

Compare, Grunsfeld v. Brownell, 11 A. B. R. 601 (Sup. Ct. New Mex.): "The term insolvency as used in bankruptcy and insolvency laws means the inability of a person to pay his debts as they mature in the ordinary course of business, but as used in a general sense, it means a substantial excess of a person's liabilities over the fair cash value of his property."

It will be useful to explicate this definition in order to give a somewhat clearer idea of the meaning of bankruptcy insolvency.

§ 1344. Property Fraudulently Disposed of, Not to Be Counted as Assets.—Property fraudulently disposed of is not to be counted. In arriving at the property that is to be counted in making up the aggregate, all property conveyed, transferred, concealed or removed or permitted to be concealed or removed with intent to defraud or hinder creditors, is to be excluded.²

Thus it is possible that a debtor who has plenty of property to pay all he owes, may make himself insolvent within the bankruptcy definition by fraudulently transferring or concealing so much of it that that which is left will not be enough, even at a fair valuation, to pay all the debts. And so, under such circumstances, if the creditors succeed in recovering the property fraudulently disposed of, they may get their claims paid in full, notwithstanding the bankrupt himself could not say he was not insolvent without confessing to the frauds he himself had perpetrated. The transfer may itself create the insolvency.³

Thus it is possible that a man may be insolvent in bankruptcy under the present definition and yet his creditors ultimately get paid in full.⁴

But property which might be, but is not, claimed by third parties to be recoverable by them as having been transferred to the bankrupt in fraud of such third parties' rights, is not to be excluded.⁵

of mortgage or other security, the equity of redemption is, however, to be counted in.⁶

Acme Food Co. v. Meier, 18 A. B. R. 550, 153 Fed. 74 (C. C. A. Mich.): "Upon the issue that these conveyances were intended as preferences and, therefore, acts of bankruptcy under subdivision 2 of § 3 of the act it was admissible to show that these deeds were intended only as securities and the value of the equity of redemption at the date of each such conveyance. In Lansing Boiler Works v. Ryerson, cited above, we held that the interest of a mortgagor might be taken into account in determining whether when the mortgage was made insolvency existed so as to constitute the security a preference. * * * Thus construed, there was no error in directing the jury to estimate the value of the equity of redemption in determining solvency at the date of each such conveyance. We know of no authority which will justify the exclusion of equitable interests belonging to a debtor when we come to the question of his solvency or insolvency in a bankrupt proceeding."

§ 1346. Property Preferentially Conveyed as Security Not to Be Excluded.—Property not fraudulently but merely preferentially transferred as security, however, is not to be excluded, but is to be counted in as part of the assets.⁷

In re Doscher, 9 A. B. R. 547, 554, 120 Fed. 403 (D. C. N. Where property is transferred in payment of or as security for a just debt, the mere fact that it may involve a preference in bankruptcy, should bankruptcy proceedings be instituted, does not exclude it from consideration in determining the debtor's solvency."

§ 1347. Exempt Property Counted.—Exempt property is to be counted.⁸

Compare In re Duke & Son, 28 A. B. R. 195, 199 Fed. 199 (D. C. Ga.): "In fixing the assets in the foregoing statement I have counted the exempt property as an asset. In re Baumann, 3 A. B. R. 196, 96 Fed. 946 (D. C. Tenn.): "It is entirely true, as stated by Mr. Justice Bradley, In re Bass, 3 Woods, 382, Fed. Cas. No. 1,091, 'that exempted property constitutes no part of the assets in bankruptcy, and that the assignee acquires no title to exempted property.' Nevertheless it does not follow that it is not to be counted when determining the question whether he be solvent or insolvent. * * * If Congress had intended to exclude from the terms of this definition property exempted by law from execution, the phrasing of the statute would have contained the exception either explicitly or by necessary implication—as if the statute had used the phrase 'the aggregate of his property subject to execution at law,' or 'the aggregate of his property available for the payment of his debts,' or 'the aggregate of his property, except such as is exempted by law;' and it is most natural that the language of the statute should have taken some such form if it had been the intention to exclude from the count the value of the exempted property. Although not leviable, it may be used voluntarily for the payment of these debts."

§ 1348. Partnership Not Insolvent, unless All Partners Insolvent.

—A partnership is not to be deemed insolvent unless the aggregate of all its own property, together with all of the individual property of its members in excess of their respective individual indebtedness, is less than its liabilities.⁹

Tumlin v. Bryan, 21 A. B. R. 319, 165 Fed. 166 (C. C. A. Ga.): "And besides, we find no evidence showing what property was owned by the individual members of the bankrupt firm in July, 1906. * * * As each member of the partnership is liable individually for the partnership debts, it seems to follow that, to show such insolvency as to entitle the trustee to recover, the insolvency of the members of the firm should be proved. If a condition exists whereby all diligent creditors may obtain payment in full, it seems useless and unjust to sustain a suit against a defendant who has only collected what was due to him. It is true that a partnership may be treated as an entity, separate from its individual members, for the purpose of its adjudication as a bankrupt * * * but, in a suit to recover a preference, it is not only the insolvency of an intangible entity, but the insolvency of its responsible component parts, that lies at the foundation of the right to relief. If the component parts of the firm may be made to pay the firm's debts, the suit lacks reason and substance, and it cannot be held that the defendant has obtained a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class. If the members of the firm are solvent, all creditors may be paid in full. If the individual members of the partnership are not shown to be insolvent at the date of the payments, the preference is not voidable."

Worrell v. Whitney, 24 A. B. R. 749, 179 Fed. 1014 (D. C. Pa.): "As I view the case, however, it must be decided on another proposition. As I have just said, the firm considered merely as an entity was insolvent on March 22, but there is almost no evidence concerning the financial situation of the partners as individuals as that time. It is impossible therefore to say that the individual assets of the partners taken in connection with the assets of the firm would not have been more than sufficient to pay all the firm debts. The only evidence on the subject of individual insolvency is to be found in the fact that on May 20, two months later, the petition was filed upon which both members were adjudged bankrupt both as individuals and as a firm. But this without more does not enable me to decide safely that they were insolvent as individuals on March 22. No effort was made to prove their individual insolvency at that time. One of the bankrupts was not examined at all, and the other was asked no questions concerning his individual condition when the conveyance was made. With proof upon this subject under the trustee's control, he can hardly expect the court to draw uncertain inferences concerning a fact that he might have established with at least reasonable certainty. The necessity for such proof is supported by * * * the bill is dismissed."

§ 1349. Property to Be Taken at "Fair Valuation."—Again, it must be noted that the property counted in must be counted in at a fair valuation.¹⁰

What constitutes fair valuation is difficult to define.¹¹ We can say, however, what it is not.

§ 1350. "Fair Valuation," Not Value at Sacrifice Sale.—It is not the valuation that would prevail at sheriff's sale, sacrifice sale or forced sale.

Thus, where the bankrupt is a going concern, the value of its assets after the levy of an execution and the consequent cessation of its business may not be the fair valuation.¹²

Nor may such valuation be what the assets actually brought at the sale by the trustee in bankruptcy.¹³

§ 1351. Market Value, as "Fair Valuation."—Moreover, even the market price probably would not be the fair valuation in all cases; for instance property that has no market value at all and property whose market value is abnormally low owing to extraordinary circumstances or financial depression. However, the market valuation of property would usually be its fair valuation except in the instances cited and similar ones.¹⁴

11. In determining the fair valuation in deciding whether an intent to prefer exists on the debtor's part so as to make the preference an act of bankruptcy, it would be permissible to show that the alleged bankrupt actually and bona fide thought a certain valuation would be a fair valuation that would make his assets appear to be sufficient to cover his liabilities, whether in fact they were sufficient or not. See ante, "Intent to Prefer as an Element of Second Act of Bankruptcy," § 132.

14. Price obtained by purchaser at private sale, on resale of the goods

Duncan v. Landis, 5 A. B. R. 649, 106 Fed. 839 (C. C. A. Pa.): "The words 'fair valuation' are equivalent to the present market value of the property in question, but such market value is not to be ascertained by what a purchaser would give who desires to take advantage of the necessities and embarrassments of the owner at a price less than its real value and a charge to the effect that such value should be fixed by the situation of the debtor the number and amount of the obligations owed by such debtor and the time when they were due, as elements to be regarded by the purchaser, is erroneous."

In re Hines, 16 A. B. R. 296, 144 Fed. 142 (D. C. Ore.): "As it respects property considered in a commercial sense, I can conceive of no better or surer standard by which to arrive at a fair valuation than the market value; that is, what the property will probably bring, or is worth in the general market, where everybody buys. It could not be what it is worth to one person or to another specially circumstanced, or having special use for a particular article, but what it is worth as a marketable commodity, at a given time, with no special conditions prevailing other than affect the market generally in the locality where the commodity is for sale."

Stern v. Paper, 25 A. B. R. 451, 183 Fed. 228 (D. C. N. D.): "'Fair valuation' means such a price as a capable and intelligent business man could presently obtain for the property after conferring with those accustomed to buy such property. Such a value will depend upon many circumstances, such as age and condition of the stock, the season of the year, and the state of trade."

§ 1352. "Fair Valuation" Where Bankrupt "Going Concerns" Not "Scrap" nor "Wrecker's" Value.—Where the bankrupt is a "going concern" at the date of the commission of the act of bankruptcy, that fact must be taken into account in fixing "fair valuation;" and "scrap" values or "wrecker's" values will not suffice.¹⁵

Paper Co. v. Goembel, 16 A. B. R. 28 (C. C. A. Ills.): "The valuation for the test of solvency or insolvency under the issue must relate to the conditions, as a going concern, when the alleged preference was given, and not to the mere dead matter after bankruptcy intervened."

But the failing condition of the debtor, though still a "going concern," may be taken into account as influencing the actual "fair valuation" of book accounts.

Spencer v. Nekemoto, 24 A. B. R. 517 (D. C. Hawaii): "Although it is hard to appraise such accounts, which must be considered in relation to a going concern, yet it is very evident that with the business on a decline, as his was in May—his creditors refusing further credit—that the book accounts would not be worth as much as if the business were in a prosperous condition."

The market value, the value which the bankrupt itself could have gotten for the assets, is the "fair" valuation, so it is held in In re Marine Iron Works, 20 A. B. R. 390, 159 Fed. 753 (D. C. N. Y.).

¹⁵ Instance, Motor Vehicle Co. v. Oak Leather Co., 15 A. B. R. 808 (C. C. A. Ills.); impliedly, Chic. Title & T. Co. v. Roebbling's Sons, 5 A. B. R. 371, 107 Fed. 71 (C. C. Ills.).

Thus, the actual value of accounts must govern in determining the question of insolvency; ¹⁶ likewise of insurance policies.¹⁷

Likewise, with the value of bonds, leases, patents, licenses and securities and of other intangible property, it is the actual, fair value that prevails.¹⁸

§ 1353¹/₂. "Good Will" as an Asset.—Doubtless "good will" is an asset which may be taken into account in arriving at "fair valuation;" indeed, such may often be the chief asset. However, its value is very difficult, ordinarily, to determine, and great abuse is likely to creep into an estimate of it.

Compare, McElvain v. Hardesty, 22 A. B. R. 320, 169 Fed. 31 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The trial court also allowed a recovery of the sum of $600 for the good will of the business of C. & C., claimed to have been transferred to McElvain. Without expressing any opinion as to when and under what circumstances, if at all, the good will of a business may be 'property' within the meaning of § 60a and b of the Bankruptcy Act, we content ourselves by stating the conclusion reached that, if the saloon ever had any good will of value known to the law, it had been utterly destroyed by the methods pursued and the results achieved by the bankrupts and McElvain during the seven months of their relationship to it. The evidence satisfies us that there was no good will of value at the time of the transfer, and that the allowance of anything in favor of the trustee on that account was erroneous."

§ 1354. Admissions of Insolvency by Bankrupt Not Competent against Creditor.—Proof of admissions of insolvency itself, or of admissions of facts tending to show insolvency, made by the bankrupt, even before bankruptcy, are not competent evidence against the preferred cred-

"Dead Accounts."—Instance, Alexander v. Redmond, 24 A. B. R. 620, 180 Fed. 92 (C. C. A. N. Y.): It has been held, indeed, that outstanding accounts, in favor of the bankrupt must be such as could be realized upon under an execution in order to warrant consideration as assets. Louisiana & Soc. v. Segen, 28 A. B. R. 19, 407, 196 Fed. 903 (D. C. La.). But such a rule is too strict. "Fair valuation" would imply a more liberal rule, for oftentimes accounts are good as a practical matter that would not be collectible by legal process."

18. Instance, First Nat'l Bk. v. Ice

Co., 14 A. B. R. 448, 136 Fed. 466 (D. C. Penn.): Disputed liability of bondholders on bonus stock issued to them not counted in as assets.

Instance, McGowan v. Knittel, 15 A. B. R. 1, 137 Fed. 1015 (C. C. A. Penn., reversing Knittel v. McGowan, 14 A. B. R. 209, 137 Fed. 453): Record of a reopened judgment against the bankrupt should not be admitted before the jury; especially where opened generally and not specially to let in some particular defense.

Troy Wagon Wks. v. Vastbinder, 12 A. B. R. 352, 130 Fed. 232 (D. C. Penn.): Leases and securities, face value $4,000.00 conceded actual value $1,000.00.

Instance, Motor Vehicle Co. v. Oak Leather Co., 15 A. B. R. 808 (C. C. A. Ills.): Patent.

Instance, In re Foley, 15 A. B. R. 832 (Ref. Pa.): Liquor license: Claimed to be worth $10,000.00 but testimony that only made $100.00 in 18 months.

itor on a suit for recovery of the preference.¹⁹

The bankrupt's uncorroborated testimony as to the precise time of becoming insolvent has been held not sufficient to establish the fact.²⁰

§ 1355. Bankrupt's Books Admissible.—Books of the bankrupt, when properly qualified as evidence, are competent evidence on the question of his insolvency.²¹

Of course their competency is not on the basis of their being admissions, but rather of their being contemporaneous memoranda; except where the issue is the commission of an act of bankruptcy and not the recovery of a preference.

§ 1356. Schedules Inadmissible against Preferred Creditor.—The schedules filed by the bankrupt are inadmissible against the alleged preferred creditor to prove the bankrupt's insolvency. They are the admissions of a mere assignor after he has parted with his interest to the alleged preferred creditor.²²

§ 1357. Inventory and Appraisal in Bankruptcy, whether Admissible.—It has been held that the inventory and appraisal taken by the bankruptcy court are competent evidence.²³

But it is difficult to see how the preferred creditor can be thus bound. Of course, the testimony of the appraisers would likely be admissible, if qualified as witnesses, as throwing light upon the financial condition of the bankrupt at the time of the alleged preferential transfer; but the theory on which the appraisal itself, even though official, is admissible, is not plain.²⁴

§ 1358. Whether Sale by Receiver in State Court or by Trustee in Bankruptcy, Competent.—Prices obtained by a receiver in the State Court before the bankruptcy, although somewhat subsequently to the transfer complained of, are admissible in proof of the fair value at the time of the transfer, in the absence of better proof, and the exclusion of such prices from evidence has been held reversible error.²⁵ Where the evidence shows that the value of the assets has not varied from the time of the alleged preference to the date of a sale by the trustee in bankruptcy, the sale price has been held competent evidence on the issue of insolvency.²⁶ It has also been held that the referee's order confirming the report of the sale is also competent, but not conclusive.²⁷ This ruling, however, though perhaps justifiable in the absence of better evidence, is treading on dangerous ground.^{27a}

§ 1359. Referee's Allowance of Claims, Whether Admissible.—

And it has been held that the orders of allowance of claims by the referee are not admissible, as to the amount of the bankrupt's indebtedness, as against an alleged preferred creditor.²⁸

Cullinane v. State Bk., 12 A. B. R. 776, 123 Iowa 340: "To prove the amount of indebtedness of the firm, the plaintiff called as a witness the referee in bankruptcy, and he was permitted to testify in respect of the number and amount of claims filed with and allowed by him. This testimony was objected to by defendant as incompetent, in that defendant was in no sense a party to the bankruptcy proceedings, and was not bound thereby, or by any findings made therein. We think that under the issues as presented by the pleadings the objection should have been sustained. The defendant was relying upon its mortgage as a specific lien upon the property covered thereby, and under the Bankrupt Act it could be divested of that lien only upon proof of actual insolvency. The finding of the bankruptcy court upon that question, or of any fact involved therein, was not res adjudicata as against defendant, inasmuch as it was not in any sense a party to the bankruptcy proceedings."

But (at any rate, wherever the alleged preferred creditor is applying to the bankruptcy court for dividends) it would seem that he is bound, as a party, by the referee's adjudication as to the validity of claims. This involves quite a different principle from that of the admissibility of the proofs of debt filed by the various creditors.²⁹

§ 1360. Admissions of Agent, as to Insolvency of Principal.—The admissions of an agent are not competent on the subject of insolvency unless within the scope of his authority; thus the admissions of the husband of the bankrupt, acting as the bankrupt's manager in the conducting of her business, have been held not competent to prove insolvency.³⁰

27a. See discussion in preceding paragraph, § 1357.

28. Apparently contra, Credit Men v. Furniture Co., 26 A. B. R. 867 (Utah), but in this case it appears that the "allowance" was not made by the referee, who is, by the bankruptcy act, "The court of bankruptcy," but was made by the trustee—an anomalous proceedings. Of course, the trustee has no power to make an order of allowance and certainly such an "allowance" could hardly attain the dignity of a judicial determination.

29. Compare, Jacobs v. United States, 20 A. B. R. 550, 161 Fed. 694 (C. C. A. Mass.), quoted at § 2329¾.

30. Duncan v. Landis, 5 A. B. R. 675, 106 Fed. 839 (C. C. A. Penn.).

§ 1360½. Bankrupt's General Examination, Whether Admissible.—It has been held that the general examination of the bankrupt may be admitted in the proof of indebtedness as against the preferential transferee.³¹

Of course, the bankrupt is a competent witness on the subject of his debts and liabilities but his previous examination could be admissible in a controversy between the trustee and a transferee only on the theory that it was a deposition already taken in the case, which we find is an incorrect theory.³²

§ 1362. Adjudication of Bankruptcy as Res Adjudicata on Question of Insolvency.—The adjudication of bankruptcy is held by some cases to be conclusively binding upon all creditors in subsequent actions between them and the trustee as to all points necessarily decided therein; from which it would follow that, where insolvency is a necessary element of the act of bankruptcy on which the adjudication is based, the adjudication itself will be res adjudicata as to insolvency at the time of the commission of the act.³⁴

Lazarus v. Eagan, 30 A. B. R. 287, 206 Fed. 518 (D. C. Pa.): "The decree of this court put in evidence adjudicating on the 28th of December, 1911, W. J. Greggs, a bankrupt, conclusively established the fact at issue, as alleged in the petition, that Greggs was insolvent when he transferred his property to his wife and afterwards to Eagan. Any other holding would lead to endless confusion in the administration of the law, and would in many cases, nullify one of the principal purposes of the Bankruptcy Act, as was said in De Groff v. Sang, 92 App. Div. (N. Y.) 564; S. C., 87 N. Y. 78. And it matters not that Eagan was actually without notice of these proceedings. An adjudication being an adjudication in rem, all persons interested in the res are regarded as parties to the bankruptcy proceedings. Among such parties are not only the trustee but all creditors, including lienors."

But the better reasoning seems to be that the doctrine of res judicata does not apply in such cases, for the reasons that the subject matter and the relief in the two cases are not the same. In the first case the status of the debtor is the subject matter, and upon that matter the adjudication of bankruptcy is binding upon the whole world, being an adjudication in a proceedings in rem; but in the latter case the subject matter is the property, and though it may also be a proceedings in rem, the res is different.^{34a} At any rate, an adjudication on the ground of preference is not res judicata on the issue of the existence of a "reasonable cause for belief."^{34b}

§ 1363. Ordinary Rules Apply in Proof of Insolvency.—And, in general, the ordinary rules of evidence are to govern in the proof of insolvency.³⁵

§ 1364. Date of Insolvency and "Fair Valuation," Date Immediately Preceding Transfer.—The proof must show the "fair valuation" and insolvency at the time of the transfer, before the transfer (except, where, under the Amendment of 1910, the date of recording may be taken, at the trustee's option); and not the valuation nor insolvency created by the transfer itself.³⁶

In re Hines, 16 A. B. R. 297 (D. C. Ore.): "* * * the intendment being that the insolvency must exist at the time of suffering the preference to be taken; for, if the debtor is solvent, it would be perfectly proper and legitimate for him to make any sort of preference that he might see fit. 2. Inability to pay debts at a later time, suspension of business, negotiations with creditors for composition, etc., are admissible as evidence tending to prove insufficiency of assets, in the absence of other evidence. In re Elmira Steel Co., 5 A. B. R. 488, 109 Fed. 456 (Special Master N. Y.).

But compare, Martin v. Bigelow, 7 A. B. R. 220 (Sup. Ct. N. Y.), where the adjudication of the debtor on March 11 was held not to relate back to establish his insolvency in the preceding November.

3. Offer of settlement made to creditors prior to bankruptcy on the basis of thirty cents on the dollar is evidence not to be overcome by mere estimates of the value of a lease, good will and fixtures. In re Lange, 3 A. B. R. 231, 97 Fed. 197 (D. C. N. Y.). It is to be borne in mind, however, that this case arose on proof of an act of bankruptcy and might be affected by the possible incompetency of admissions of the bankrupt as against a preferred creditor himself in a suit for recovery of the preference.

permitted to affect the value of his assets. If such were the case, then a person, who was before perfectly solvent, might be rendered insolvent by an action, accompanied by an attachment, and his insolvency would depend upon whether he could pay his debts under the stress of the occasion, and not, under the simple inquiry prescribed by the Bankruptcy Act, whether the aggregate of his property, at a fair valuation, is sufficient in amount to pay his debts."

And fractions of a day may be taken into account.³⁷

§ 1364½. Date, Where Recording Necessary.—Where the transfer is made by means of an instrument which the State law requires to be recorded in order that it may be effective against levying creditors, the date at which the insolvency may be proved to have existed is the date of such recording, for not until recording is there an effective transfer, as against other creditors, under State law.

[Even before Amendment of 1910.] McElvain v. Hardesty, 22 A. B. R. 320, 169 Fed. 31 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The effect of the transfer to McElvain is to be judged as if made on the 7th day of July, 1905, when it was filed for record. If C. & C. were then insolvent, and if the effect of the enforcement of the transfer was to enable McElvain to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of their simple contract creditors, the transfer constituted a preference within the meaning of the bankruptcy law. * * * As, for the purposes of this case, the transfer is to be treated as made on the date the agreement was recorded, so the transferee's belief or cause for belief concerning it must relate to that time."

Amendment of 1910.—The Amendment of 1910 to § 60 (b), expressly brings down to the date of transfer, or, to the date of recording where recording is "required," the proof of the insolvency.³⁸

§ 1365. Debts Owning but Not Yet Due Included in Bankrupt's Liabilities.—It is doubtless true that debts owing, although not yet due, are to be included among the bankrupt's liabilities in determining his insolvency.

§ 1366. Whether Contingent Liabilities Counted in Determining Insolvency.—It does not appear to have been finally settled, however, whether contingent liabilities, as distinguished from debts owing but not yet due, are to be included in the computation.³⁹

§ 1366½. Bankrupt as Surety or Guarantor, Debt to Be Counted.—Where the bankrupt is a surety or guarantor, the obligation is to be counted as a liability; and such has been the holding even where the guaranty is oral, the fact that it is not in writing affecting merely the proof, not the validity.

³⁷. Upson v. Mt. Morris Bk., 14 A. B. R. 11 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div.).

³⁸. See Bankruptcy Act, § 60 (b), as amended in 1910.

Fact of contingency of debts is to be taken into account in determining the intent of the bankrupt, no doubt. See inferentially, Merchants' Nat. Bk. v. Cole, 18 A. B. R. 44, 149 Fed. 708 (C. C. A. Ohio).

Huttig Mfg. Co. v. Edwards, 20 A. B. R. 349, 160 Fed. 619 (C. C. A. Iowa): "A surety or indorser for a bankrupt has been held to be a creditor within the meaning of the bankruptcy law * * * and upon the same principle a guarantor liable upon a fixed liquidated demand as this was, is a debtor to him who holds it, and his liability is to be counted in determining his financial status. That the guaranty may have been oral and therefore within the statute of frauds of Iowa where the transaction occurred is immaterial. The Iowa statute relates merely to the evidence or proof of the undertaking, and not to its validity."

§ 1367. Seventh Element of a Preference—Transfer or Recording within Four Months before Filing of Petition.—The transfer or other appropriation of property, or, when the transfer is such that the law requires the recording of it to make it effective [against creditors] then the recording of the transfer, must have been made within four months before the filing of the bankruptcy petition.⁴⁰

§ 1368. Preferences Obtained before Four Months, Not Voidable.—Preferences obtained before the four months period will not be disturbed⁴¹ except in one instance, namely, that mentioned in the last clause of § 60 (a):

"Where the preference consists in a transfer such period of four months shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required."

In re Dunavant, 3 A. B. R. 41, 96 Fed. 542 (D. C. N. Car.): "A proceeding in bankruptcy does not affect liens accruing more than four months before bankruptcy."

§ 1369. Nature of Limitation.—The four months limitation before the Amendment of 1903^{41a} was evidently by way of a statute of limitations. In theory and in fact before the Amendment of 1903, a preference existed whenever a payment was made out of an insolvent estate whereby one creditor got more than his share of the trust fund, no matter how long beforehand it was that the payment was made, the four months limitation being merely a statute of limitations for recovery, beyond which the court would not investigate transactions.⁴²

40. Bankr. Act, § 60 (a). Merely that a transfer occurred within the four months raises no presumption of a voidable preference, Stich v. Beriman, 15 A. B. R. 466, 49 N. Y. Misc. 104 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div.); Tumlin v. Bryan, 21 A. B. R. 319, 165 Fed. 166 (C. C. A. Ga.), quoted at § 1277, note; Allen v. Gray, 21 A. B. R. 828 (N. Y. Sup. Ct.); In re Starkweather & Albert, 30 A. B. 41a. Found only in § 60 (b), not in § 60 (a).

42. Before the Amendment of 1903

But since the Amendment of 1903 inserted into the very definition of a preference itself that it must have been a transfer or judgment within the four months period, and that such four months should not begin to run until the date of the filing or recording of the instrument creating the preference, where such filing or recording is required by the State statute to impart notice, it might have seemed that the four months' qualification was no longer by way of a statute of limitations, but an essential element of a preference itself; that is to say, after the Amendment of 1903, it was not merely that only preferences received within the four months were voidable but that a transaction was not even a preference unless occurring within the four months period.⁴³ And it would also seem to have followed as a corollary that the fact that the instrument was not recorded until within the four months would have operated propria vigore to bring the entire transaction within the four months period.

§ 1370. Agreements for Liens or for Other Transfers Not Effective until within Four Months, Voidable.—Agreements for liens or for other transfers,⁴⁴ made before the four months period, or at the time of the passing of the original consideration, but not effective until within the four months period, are voidable as preferences, if the other elements of a preference co-exist.

Thus, agreements at the time of making a loan or sale, to give a mortgage later, not executed until within the four months period, are voidable.⁴⁵ changed the law so that so-called "innocently" received preferences no longer needed to be surrendered as a prerequisite to the proof of claims, it was held in several cases that as to "innocently" received preferences, there was no time limit, In re Abraham Steers Lumber Co., 7 A. B. R. 332 (C. C. A. N. Y., affirming 6 A. B. R. 315); In re Jones, 4 A. B. R. 563 (D. C. Mass.).

But in other cases it was held that, there being no express time limit fixed by the statute, the time limit expressly fixed as to preferences knowingly received would be adopted as an equitable rule, In re Beswick, 7 A. B. R. 395 (Ref. Ohio); In re Dickinson, 7 A. B. R. 679 (Ref. N. Y.).

43. But compare, Loeser v. Bank & Trust Co., 17 A. B. R. 630 (C. C. A. Ohio, reversing In re Chadwick, 15 A. B. R. 528, 148 Fed. 975): "It must also be conceded that prior to the amendment of the bankrupt law by the amending Act of February 5, 1903, the preference, if free from actual fraud, would relate to the date of the making and delivery of the instrument creating it." Compare the reasoning in In re Gallagher, 6 A. B. R. 255 (Ref. Mass.). Compare, the reasoning in Tatman v. Humphrey, 12 A.

Lathrop Bank v. Holland, 30 A. B. R. 62 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The agreement that he would not dispose of the horses to be purchased, without its consent, and would give it a chattel mortgage at the end of the venture gave rise to a personal obligation, not a lien as against creditors. * * * If the bank had taken mortgages as the purchases were made but had refrained from recording them, it could not have prevailed against the trustee in bankruptcy. The oral agreement for a mortgage can give no greater right. The equity claimed by the bank is not different from that of any ordinary creditor who relies on his debtor's promise to do or not to do certain things in the future and refrains from adopting one of the various methods of protecting it. A purpose of the Bankruptcy Act and of State recording statutes is to discourage secret equities. We can conceive of a series of acts so secretly related as to be regarded as parts of one entire transaction, and, in contemplation of law, as having been done contemporaneously and therefore secure from disruption to the prejudice of the parties by intervening bankruptcy proceedings. But this case is not of that character."

In re Herman, 31 A. B. R. 243, 207 Fed. 594 (D. C. Iowa): "That it was made pursuant to an agreement to make the same, when the loans were made does not relieve it from operating as a preference, if the other essentials of a voidable preference are present."

In re Great Western Mfg. Co., 18 A. B. R. 263, 153 Fed. 123 (C. C. A. Neb.): "An agreement to mortgage or to transfer is not a mortgage or a transfer. The title remains in the owner unincumbered by the mortgage until the mortgage or transfer is effected. When the agreement is made before, and the mortgage or transfer within the four months, the title stands unincumbered by the latter at the commencement of the four months, and the proceeds of that title are pledged under the bankruptcy law for the benefit of all the creditors pro rata. Any subsequent mortgage or transfer withdraws that title or a portion of its value from these creditors, and a just and fair interpretation and execution of the act demands that such a mortgage or transfer should be adjudged voidable if it is otherwise so, and that the mortgagee or transferee should be remitted to his original agreement. In this way the property at the commencement of the four months and its value may be preserved for the general creditors, and the mortgagee or transferee may retain every lawful advantage his earlier contract confers upon him. Any other course of decision opens a new and enticing way to secure preferences, nullifies every provision of the law to prevent them and invites fraud and perjury. Hold that transfers within four months in performance of agreements to make them before that time do not constitute voidable preferences, and honest debtors would agree with their favored creditors before the four months that they would subsequently secure them by mortgages or transfers of their property, and just before the petitions in bankruptcy were filed they would perform their agreements. Under the law of 1867, on the basis that the assignee in bankruptcy stood in the bankrupt's shoes, and that equity would consider that done which was intended to have been done, it was held that an agreement to execute a chattel mortgage not executed at the time of the original consideration but executed within the four months period, if not purposely withheld from execution, was valid. In re Jackson, 15 N. B. Reg. 438; Burdock v. Jackson, 15 N. B. Reg. 318; Douglass v. Vogeler, 12 N. B. Reg. 493, Fed. Cas. No. 5271.

who made no such contracts might falsely testify that they had done so and thus by fraud and perjury sustain preferential transfers and mortgages made within the four months to relatives or friends. The great body of the creditors would be left without share in the property of their debtor and without remedy, and a law conceived and enacted to secure a fair and equal distribution of the property of debtors among their creditors would fail to accomplish one of its chief objects. This court will hesitate long before it approves a rule so fatal to the most salutary provisions of the bankruptcy law, and our conclusion is:

"A mortgage or transfer of his property by an insolvent debtor within four months of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, which otherwise constitutes a voidable preference, is not deprived of that character or made valid by the fact that it was executed in performance of a contract to do so, made more than four months before the filing of the petition."

Forbes v. Howe, 3 A. B. R. 475, 102 Mass. 427: "A mortgage given by an insolvent debtor to secure advances previously made is not purged of its character as an unlawful preference because it was given in pursuance of an agreement on which the advances had been made; nor because the debtor was induced to give it by the hope of obtaining further credit or means for the continuance of his business; nor because it was intended to make up security which had been reduced by the sale, with the consent of the mortgagee, of property included in a previous mortgage to him, under an understanding that new security should be given."

In re Smith (preference as act of bankruptcy) 23 A. B. R. 864, 176 Fed. 426 (D. C. N. Y.): "So, if the giving of the mortgage or deed was within the four months and the effect will be as stated in § 60, and the one receiving it had reasonable cause to believe a preference was intended, the fact that it was executed and delivered within the four months in execution of a prior oral agreement to execute it does not change the result or prevent the transfer being held a preference."

Obiter and merely inferentially, Page v. Rogers, 21 A. B. R. 496, 211 U. S. 575: "It is further said that I. B. Merriam agreed in writing, on November 15, 1902, to convey the coal lands to Thomas Merriam in satisfaction of the debts due to him or for which he was liable. It is, therefore, argued that, as the conveyance, on June 1, 1903, was in performance of this agreement, which antedated the bankruptcy proceedings by more than four months, it cannot be regarded as a preference. The facts, however, do not raise the question which was argued. Upon a proper interpretation of the evidence we need not determine whether an insolvent debtor may make an agreement to convey a substantial portion of his assets to a favored creditor, keep that agreement secret for more than four months, and then execute it in fraud of the rights of his other creditors, in favor of a creditor who then has reasonable cause to believe that he is receiving a preference. * * * The trust deed was not delivered unconditionally, and the parties to it intended that it should go into effect as a lien only when it was registered, which was never done. The instrument, though actually written, was never delivered as a present, valid, and subsisting obligation. It was executed and held in the possession of the grantor, to be delivered and to become operative as a conveyance at some future time, which never arrived. It was written and held ready for instant use, but never actually used until brought forward to excuse a payment which otherwise would be an unlawful preference. In other words, the paper was not as much as an unrecorded deed; it was not a deed at all."

Thus, agreements for repayment out of a particular fund not consummated until within the four months are voidable.⁴⁶

Smedley v. Speckman, 19 A. B. R. 694, 157 Fed. 815 (C. C. A. Pa.): "This testimony falls far short of evidencing the absolute appropriation by the assignor of the fund sought to be assigned, which is a fundamental requisite of a valid assignment, nor is there any evidence of that surrender by the assignor of all control over the fund that the law requires. A mere promise, though of the clearest and most solemn kind, to pay a debt out of a particular fund, is not an assignment of the fund, even in equity. To make an equitable assignment, there should be such an actual or constructive appropriation of the subject-matter as to confer a complete and present right in the party meant to be provided for, even where the circumstances do not admit of its immediate exercise. If the holder of the fund retain control over it, it is fatal to the claim of the assignee. 'The transfer must be of such a character, that the fund holder can safely pay, and is compellable to do so, though forbidden by the assignor.' Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. 69, 20 L. Ed. 762."

Torrance v. Winfield Nat'l Bk., 11 A. B. R. 185 (Kas.): "An agreement made, while negotiating for a loan, to make repayment out of a certain fund, or the proceeds of a particular enterprise, does not create a lien upon the fund or the proceeds of the enterprise, and, where repayment is made out of the designated

46. Compare, Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 84: "An agreement to pay out of a particular fund, however clear in its terms, is not an equitable assignment. A covenant in the most solemn form has no greater effect. The phraseology employed is not material provided the intent to transfer is manifested. Such an intent and its execution are indispensable. The assignor must not retain any control over the fund, any authority to collect, or any power of revocation. If he do, it is fatal to the claim of the assignee. The transfer must be of such a character that the fund holder can safely pay, and is compellable to do so, though forbidden by the assignor. When the transfer is of the character described, the fund holder is bound from the time of notice."

Compare, Trust v. Child, 21 Wall. 441 (U. S.): "It is well settled that an order to pay a debt out of a particular fund belonging to the debtor gives to the creditor a specific equitable lien upon the fund, and binds it in the hands of the drawee. * * * But a mere agreement to pay out of such fund is not sufficient. Something more is necessary. There must be an appropriation of the fund pro tanto, either by giving an order or by transferring it otherwise in such a manner that the holder is authorized to pay the amount directly to the creditor without the further intervention of the debtor."

Compare, Speckman v. Smedley Bros., 18 A. B. R. 717, 153 Fed. 771 (D. C. Pa.): "There was some loose testimony about an 'arrangement' by which the defendants were to be paid their full claim of $5,400 when the United States paid the final balance due to the bankrupt, but it is clear that no definite amount was agreed upon that the 'arrangement' was not recognized by the United States; and that the bankrupt never lost his control over the fund. Evidently, the bankrupt merely promised to pay the defendants when he received this balance, and the disbursing officer of the government merely promised to notify the defendants when the settlement was to be made, so that they might be present at that time. A check for $5,000 was made payable to the bankrupt, who refused to pay more, and it is, I think, quite clear that the 'arrangement' was nothing more than the usual promise of a debtor to pay when he shall be in funds, followed by the creditor's effort to hold him up to his promise, and by the debtor's effort to get off with as small a payment as possible. Such an 'arrangement' falls short of being an enforceable equitable assignment. When the defendants really set out to obtain a valid assignment, the testimony in reference to another claim against the bankrupt shows that they knew what they needed."

fund within four months of proceedings in bankruptcy, such payment shall be deemed to be preferential, and voidable at the suit of a trustee."

[1867] In re Connor, 1 Low 532, 6 Fed. Cases 315: "By our law, it is not sufficient answer that an oral agreement to give security at some indefinite future period, if demanded, was made at the time the debt was contracted. Such an agreement, resting only in oral contract, without possession of the property, or any such circumstances as would create a legal or equitable lien, cannot be enforced against the assignees after bankruptcy, nor make a conveyance, before bankruptcy but after insolvency, legal, which would otherwise be a preference."

Thus, a depositor's agreement for a lien is thus voidable, if it takes effect within the four months.⁴⁷

But an agreement at the time of delivery to execute a lease or written conditional sales contract, which is not acted upon until within the four months' period, does not come within this rule, since it is not a "transfer" out of the insolvent fund at all, but a "reservation" of title, all the while.⁴⁸ Even though recording be required and such recording be not made until within the four months the transaction will be unimpeachable, unless the property come into the custody of the bankruptcy court before the recording of the instrument, when another principle will come into play, namely, that such custody will operate as a levy of process.⁴⁹

Thus, also, as to the identification and separation of chattels within the four months to bring them under a chattel mortgage executed before the four months.^{49a}

First Nat'l Bk. of Holdredge v. Johnson, 10 A. B. R. 208, 68 Neb. 641: "If the cattle seized and sold were—as there is much in the evidence to suggest—merely part of a larger number of cattle in the feed lots of the mortgagor at the time the instrument was executed, and were not at that time in any way separated or identified, but afterwards and within four months of bankruptcy, and while the mortgagor was insolvent, they were separated or identified through the seizure made by the bank, and the mortgagor acquiesced in such separation and identification, and expressly or by acquiescence agreed that the mortgage should apply to them, it is obvious that the lien was created then for the first time, and that there was a preference within the meaning of § 60 of the Bankruptcy Act."

47. In re Mandel, 10 A. B. R. 774 (D. C. N. Y.): A depositor in a bank, on opening his deposit agreed that all deposits should be subject to a lien in favor of the bank for any money that might be loaned to him. The date of the bank's taking possession under the agreement not the date of the agreement itself controls on the question of preferences. This case is distinguished in In re Hunt, 14 A. B. Pa.): "The effect of a remarking of the billets was not to create a new lien, nor to acquire a preference for an antecedent debt between the parties. The lien acquired August 30, 1901, had not been lost, because no rights of third parties had intervened. The bank, under its contract, had a right of possession to the billets as security for the payment of debt, and could not be held guilty of securing a preference by exercising that right within four months preceding bankruptcy."

Agreements for liens for future advances to help keep the business afloat, the same to become operative on failure to repay, becoming operative within the four months, give rise to voidable preferences.⁵⁰ A chattel mortgage executed in blank before the four months period, but not filled in with the amount of the debt until within the four months period, does not take effect until the filling in and is voidable as a preference.⁵¹

Thus, as to agreements for pledge.⁵²

In re Sheridan, 3 A. B. R. 554, 98 Fed. 406 (D. C. Pa.), distinguished in In re Hunt, 14 A. B. R. 424 (D. C. N. Y.): "The goods here were never actually pledged until the exceptant, for the first time, took them into his possession a few days before the petition was filed. Before that time there was a mere agreement to pledge. The goods were never delivered to the exceptant, nor (assuming, for present purposes, that this would have been good against the other creditors) were they even set apart and continuously treated as his property. Under the facts proved, the pledge was not completed until the date of removal. Lucketts v. Townsend, 49 Am. Dec. 730, note. This being so, the exceptant's title attached upon that date, and the transfer created a preference in violation of the act."

Iron & Supply Co. v. Rolling Mill Co., 11 A. B. R. 200, 125 Fed. 974 (D. C. Ala.), distinguishing in Wilder v. Watts, 15 A. B. R. 60, 138 Fed. 426 (D. C. S. C.): "They were never actually pledged to the bank until the transfer on the 28th day of February, 1903. Before that time there was a mere agreement to pledge. The accounts were never delivered to the bank, or set apart and treated as its property, until that day. The pledge was not completed until the date of the transfer."

Thus, also, as to agreements to insure, or to assign insurance policies, or insurance money.⁵³

Long v. Farmers' Bk., 17 A. B. R. 103 (C. C. A. Iowa): "It does not purport to assign the policies of insurance, but agrees to assign an amount as collateral security sufficient to liquidate the indebtedness to the bank, 'to be applied for this purpose in case of loss by fire.' By the last paragraph it was clearly contemplated by the parties that Wells should retain possession of the policy, and in case of loss he should make the proofs, settle with and collect from the insurance company, and pay over so much of the amount collected as would be sufficient to liquidate the debt to the bank, with authority to compromise with the insurance company, but at a sum not less than the amount of the bank's claim against him. Clearly this did not constitute an assignment of the policies in presenti. This contract was no more than the personal agreement or undertaking of Wells that he would keep the property insured, and in case of loss he would collect and pay over to the bank sufficient to liquidate the debt. The contract conveyed nothing. At most it was but an executory agreement to create a lien upon a fund to arise in case of loss and collection made from the insurance company, when for the first time an equitable lien on the fund would attach. In other words, its effect was a direction to pay in case of loss. Such an agreement, while enforceable inter partes, was not binding upon either the insurer or those claiming an interest under the insured without notice of such lien. Ellis et al. v. Kreutzinger et al., 27 Mo. 311, loc. cit. 314, 72 Am. Dec. 270."

Thus, also, an order by a contractor on the owner to pay a materialman, which was not presented until within the four months of the contractor's bankruptcy, being withheld by agreement not to be presented unless the contractor failed to keep up payments, is a preference as of the date of the presentation.⁵⁴ And, on the same principle, levies under irrevocable powers of attorney to confess judgment, where the power was made more than four months before bankruptcy but not acted upon until within the four months, are void, if otherwise preferential.⁵⁵

Likewise, an agreement entered into before the four months to give a lien or make any other transfer, not acted upon until later, may constitute a transfer as of the date of the actual fulfillment of the agreement and be a preference within four months.⁵⁶

Vitzthum v. Large, 20 A. B. R. 666, 162 Fed. 685 (D. C. Iowa): " * * * if it was transferred to the bank within the four months immediately preceding the bankruptcy, to apply upon a prior debt of the bankrupt, though in pursuance of an agreement made with him prior to said four months that he would do so, it would seem to fall within the rule held by the Court of Appeals, in Long v. Farmers Bank (supra) and In re Great Western Mfg. Co. (supra)."

But the possessing one's self of material, within the four months, and the selling of the same under a subsisting contract made before the four months, has been held not to be a preference:

Savin v. Camp, 3 A. B. R. 579, 98 Fed. 974 (D. C. Ore.), rejected in Torrance v. Winfield Bk., 11 A. B. R. 185 (Sup. Ct. Kas.): "The transfer by the Colby Company to Camp was not a preference under the Bankruptcy Act. It is true, the transaction was consummated within the four months, but it originated in October, 1897. What was done was in pursuance of the pre-existing contract, to which no objection is made. Camp furnished the money out of which the property which is the subject of the sale to him was created. He had good right, in equity and in law, to make provisions for the security of the money so advanced, and the property purchased by his money is a legitimate security and one frequently employed. There is always a strong equity in favor of a lien by one who advances money upon the property which is the product of the money so advanced. This was what the parties intended at the time, and to this, as already stated, there is, and can be, no objection in law or in morals. And so when, at a later date, but still prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, Camp exercised his rights under this valid and equitable arrangement to possess himself of the property and make sale of it in pursuance of his contract, he was not guilty of securing a preference under the Bankruptcy Law."

And where there exists a bona fide contract of purchase of the entire output of the bankrupt's lumber mill, the delivery of lumber thereunder, within the four months and when the seller was known to be insolvent, is not a preference, even though part of the purchase price already had been advanced.⁵⁷

Again, the mere transmitting of actual possession within the four months where there has been a previous sufficient setting apart (though on the debtor's own premises), to constitute a pledge or mortgage or declaration of trust before the four months, will not bring the "transfer" within the four months period.⁵⁸

Sexton v. Kessler & Co., 21 A. B. R. 807, 172 Fed. 535 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "* * * it [the Supreme Court] also states this underlying and controlling distinction: The exercise of a pre-existing right well founded in equity is not a preference, although occurring within the prescribed period; 'the bald creation of a lien within four months' is a preference. The application of the principle involved in this distinction is decisive here in favor of the Manchester house. It had an equitable right to the securities which were held 'in escrow' for its benefit, its rights and equities were created years before the bankruptcy; it could at any time have enforced its right to the possession of the securities; no element of fraud and no intervening rights of purchasers or attaching creditors appear; the securities were not property, the possession of which would be visible to third persons and afford a basis of credit. It is my opinion that possession was taken pursuant to a pre-existing right, and that equitable principles support such right. I think that this is in no aspect a case of the bald creation of a lien within four months of bankruptcy. The case of Zartman v. First National Bank, 189 N. Y. 273, 19 Am. B. R. 27, * * * is not in conflict with these views. In that case there was merely a contract to give a mortgage upon after-acquired property. There was no lien which could have been enlarged or perfected by taking possession."

Also, a bankrupt contractor's unrecorded indemnity agreement to the surety on his bond, whereby he agrees, in the event of inability to complete the contract, to assign "and does hereby assign" to the surety the plant dedicated to the job, has been held valid, although the material, etc., included in the "plant," was not acquired by the contractor until afterwards, the court placing the decision on the doctrine of Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 517, that the lien being good between the parties, was good against the trustee.

Wood v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 16 A. B. R. 25, 143 Fed. 424 (D. C. Mass.): "The auditor finds that at the time the indemnity agreement was executed, King had not begun the contract work and that no part of the plant or material taken was then at Ft. McKinley. It does not appear when the plant or material taken was acquired by King nor when it was taken to Ft. McKinley. Assuming that it was all acquired by King after the execution of the indemnity agreement, the defendant's claim to it when it was taken was, in my opinion, none the less valid. The defendant's right to the property is still, as in Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 517, 13 Am. B. R. 437, and Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 14 Am. B. R. 74, to be judged not by the state of facts existing when possession was taken, but by the state of facts existing when the right was given. Since possession was taken before the bankruptcy, the defendant, upon taking possession, held the property by a title relating back to the time when its right was acquired, at which time, so far as appears, there was nothing to prevent King from giving it such a right, and by a title which is good against the trustee in bankruptcy." This decision might equally as well have been based on the doctrine that the lien given was a present transfer ["does hereby assign"] operative immediately on acquisition of the after-acquired material, etc.

And where the transaction is a present lien and not an agreement to give a lien it will be supported, so far as this element of a preference is concerned.⁵⁹

§ 1370 $\frac{1}{4}$. Ratification within Four Months of Prior Ineffectual Transfer.—Perhaps the ratification, within the four months, of a prior ineffectual transfer would follow the same principle, for the title is not actually parted with until within that period, and the doctrine of reverter to the original date is no stronger, as against creditors, than in the case of agreements for liens. However, this point has not been decided clearly as yet.⁶⁰

§ 1370 $\frac{1}{2}$. Assignment of Accounts before but Collections within Four Months.—Where an assignment of accounts was made by an insolvent debtor to a creditor before the four months period the transaction will not be a preference because of the fact that the accounts are collected within the four months period.⁶¹

It is difficult to perceive on what ground this claim rests, because the substantial rights of the parties were fixed at the time the assignment was made, and the collections were only incidents thereof."

§ 1371. "After-Acquired Property" Taken Possession of by Mortgagee within Four Months.—And it would seem on principle that where "after-acquired property" is acquired within the four months period and possession is thereafter taken under a chattel mortgage attempting in terms to cover after-acquired property, such taking of possession would operate to fix the lien as of the date of the taking of possession, at least of the after-acquired property, and would amount to a preference as of such date; but such is not the holding where the State law declares that the lien under such circumstances reverts to the date of the original mortgage.⁶²

Wilder v. Watts, 15 A. B. R. 57, 138 Fed. 426 (D. C. S. C.): "The testimony supports the answer of the defendant Watts that the money was advanced to him in good faith at a time when he was solvent, to be used in his business; that there was an agreement at that time that his stock of goods was to be insured, and that the policies were to be assigned as security for the loan. There was a present consideration, and an agreement to assign the policies, which, on principle and on authority, created an equitable lien upon the money due on the policies of insurance. * * * The general doctrine is that where a party by express agreement sufficiently indicates an intention to make some particular property, real or personal, or fund, a security for a debt or other obligation, and promises to assign or transfer the property as security, equity, regarding that as done which ought to be done, creates an equitable lien upon the property indicated. * * * The fact that the policies of insurance were not actually delivered to the creditors is of no consequence here. A case might arise in which delay or nondelivery might be important as evidence upon the question of a complete execution of the agreement for a lien, but the testimony shows beyond dispute the agreement for a lien; and equity, which regards the true intention of the transaction, will consider what was actually done as sufficient if the parties themselves treated it as a sufficient performance of that part of the agreement. 'Actual delivery of the policies and continuous possession by the transferee are not indispensable to create and preserve such lien as is now being considered.' Spring v. Ins. Co., 8 Wheat. 268, 5 L. Ed. 614. As most of the standard forms of policies inhibit their assignment before a loss, the actual manual delivery of the policy after the loss suffices."

Y. 1897), regulating chattel mortgages. Nor had it any equitable lien on the actual proceeds of sale. If the authority given in the receipt to the petitioner to deduct the advances from the proceeds of sale could be construed as assignment cognizable in equity, rather than as a promise to pay to be enforced at law, still no such fund ever came into existence. The actual sale was made six months later by order of a different person, viz., the trustee, through another auctioneer. If it were within the power of a court of equity to impress the proceeds of sale inter partes with an equitable lien, such a power would not be exercised to the prejudice of creditors. signed her renunciation of dower, which was the consideration paid. Equity from that date would have compelled the execution of such formal papers as were necessary to enable her to obtain her own, and in such circumstances the date of the formal assignment does not seem to me material. All transactions between a wife and a husband, who afterwards proves to be in failing circumstances ought to be subject to the closest scrutiny by the courts, and no claim by her upon his estate, unless sustained by abundant testimony, ought to be allowed; but in this case there is no question of the absolute good faith of this transaction. That she has parted with a valuable property right upon an express agreement that a specific security should be assigned to her, and the neglect of the husband to make the formal assignment—a neglect for which she is not to be blamed, and which did not work to the prejudice of the creditors—ought not to operate to defeat her title.”

Such was the holding where a New York house had set apart in its own vaults securities in favor of a foreign concern as a basis for drafts, with the stipulation to keep the amount of them continually good, by substitution, and then, within the four months before its bankruptcy and under circumstances indicating plainly to the foreign concern that disaster was impending, had delivered the securities to the foreign concern, part of the court so holding on the theory that a declaration of trust had been made by the New York house, the remainder of the court on the theory that the securities had been both pledged and mortgaged and that the sending of the securities to the foreign house within the four months period did not create a lien but merely enlarged or perfected one already pre-existent.⁶⁵

Such also was the holding as to an oral agreement made before the four months period that the bankrupt's timber and timber contracts should stand as security for advances and supplies, and the equitable lien so created was held to attach also to the proceeds of sale.⁶⁶

Thus an equitable lien for advances made on lumber to be manufactured has been upheld.

Gage Lumber Co. v. McEldowney, 30 A. B. R. 251, 207 Fed. 255 (C. C. A. Ky.): “At the date of the contract the lumber had not been manufactured; but the contract required its manufacture and its distinctive character identified it with its purchasers. * * * Upon the theory that title to the lumber passed to the Gage Company—that is, on the current deliveries it was simply receiving its own property—there was no occasion to pay anything, and each of these 50 per cent payments was a new advance; but, treating the contract as one of equitable lien, this complication disappears and the original advances, so far as unpaid, always remained a lien on all the undelivered lumber manufactured thereunder.

“A court of bankruptcy views transactions of this kind upon the broadest equitable principles; and does not hesitate to effectuate the actual intent of transactions honestly had with a bankrupt, without much restraint as to formality or procedure (Hurley v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., supra, at p. 132, approving language of Circuit Judge Putnam). When we regard the substance and effect of the present transactions, apart from their form, it is reasonably plain that the Clairfield Company would not be heard to say that the Gage Company did not, through its advances and the other company's actual production and stacking of the lumber, acquire an interest, certainly an equitable interest, in this lumber. The essence of the purchaser's right was the fact, constantly to be remembered, that each advance was made for the very purpose of having a particular thing produced. The last analysis of such a transaction is that when the lumber was produced and placed on sticks it was in effect appropriated toward the payment of the loan as required and promised under the contract.

"It is true that in the negotiations leading up to the contract, efforts were made, which failed, to have the lumber as it was piled marked with the name of the Gage Company, also to have a lease made to that company of part of the yard upon which to set aside the lumber as it was manufactured; the representatives of the Clairfield Company expressing as to the one plan, fears that it would injure the credit of the company, and, further, that they did not wish Mrs. Anderson, the president of the company, to know of the advances; * * * but (aside from any question of admissibility of such statements) these features of the negotiations concerned an endeavor of the Gage Company to secure a transfer to it of the title to the lumber as fast as it was produced * * * and while it must be conceded that in one sense such statements would seem to be opposed to a purpose to create an equitable lien, yet no charges of fraud or bad faith are made respecting either the negotiations or the contract; * * * To say, then, that such antecedent negotiations are inconsistent with the idea of an equitable interest in the lumber, is to urge that the repeated use of the words "to put on sticks to apply on our contract" is meaningless; in a word, it is to destroy the most significant portions of the contract."

The giving of a mortgage within the four months period for a pre-existing debt, in pursuance of an agreement to give it made anterior to the four months period and at the time the debt was created, cannot be sustained on the doctrine of an "equitable lien" succeeded by a mortgage, where the other elements of a preference exist.⁶⁷

It has been sought to express the doctrine of the consummating of equitable liens within the four months period as follows: The exercise of a pre-existing right, well founded in equity, is not a preference, although occurring within the prescribed period, it being the "bald assertion" of a lien within the four months that is a preference.

Sexton v. Kessler & Co., 21 A. B. R. 807, 172 Fed. 535 (D. C., affirmed by C. C. A. in 21 A. B. R. 807, 172 Fed. 535, quoted at § 1370; also affirmed by Supreme Court, 225 U. S. 90, 28 A. B. R. 85, quoted at § 1146): "While the Supreme Court in the cases referred to treats the validity of the mortgages and the rights of the mortgagees thereunder to be matters of local law, in my opinion it also states this underlying and controlling distinction. The exercise of a pre-existing right well founded in equity is not a preference, although occurring within the prescribed period; the bald creation of a lien within four months is a preference."

In re Automobile Livery Service Co., 23 A. B. R. 799, 176 Fed. 792 (D. C. Ala.): "If the decisions of the State court hold transactions to create valid liens in cases in which delivery is made subsequent to the agreement to give the lien but before the right of intervening creditors has been fastened upon the property, the delivery of the property, under such circumstances, will not constitute an illegal and voidable preference under the bankruptcy law. * * * In view of the principle asserted by these cases, it seems to me that the exercise of the right to take possession of the pledged property, within the four months, did not constitute an illegal preference, because it was done pursuant to a valid agreement to pledge for which a present consideration moved to the bankrupt, and therefore related back to such agreement, except as against intervening claimants who had perfected liens on the pledged property in the interim, of whom there were none."

§ 1372½. Conditional Sales Contracts.—A conditional sale, unless a mere disguise, is not a "transfer" out of the insolvent fund at all, but is a mere reservation of title to property not yet become part of such fund; therefore, it cannot be a preference, and, a fortiori, the recording of it could not operate as a transfer nor could the failure to record it effect a transfer of the title to the conditional vendee.⁶⁸

§ 1373. State Law Governs as to Time Agreements for Liens, and Taking of Possession or Recording or Acquisition of Property Take Effect as Liens or Other Transfers.—But the state law will govern as to the time that agreements for liens take effect as liens, also, as to whether the taking of possession under an unrecorded instrument, or the recording of such instrument, reverts to the date of the original transaction, or effects a transfer as of the date of the taking of possession or recording.⁶⁹

This may be true for certain purposes, but, under the present circumstances, I must decline to assign a fictitious date to the existence of the lien."

Likewise, it governs as to the time the lien attaches to after-acquired property.⁷⁰

In re Chantler Cloak & Suit Co., 18 A. B. R. 498, 151 Fed. 952 (D. C. R. I.): "The latter case [Thompson v. Fairbanks, supra] also decides that, on the question of the validity of a mortgage upon after-acquired property, the federal court will follow the decisions of the State court. Under Rhode Island decisions, an equitable lien or charge upon the after-acquired property arose as soon as the property was acquired."

§ 1374. Mere Exchanges of Property of Equal Value within Four Months, Not Preferences.—The mere exchange of property of equal value within the four months will not constitute a preference; nor will the renewal of securities of equal value; but if the property last given exceeds the value of the property for which it is exchanged, a preference will exist as to the excess; but the exchange will only be voidable as a preference to the extent of such excess.⁷¹

§ 1375. Four Months—How Computed.—The four months are to be computed by excluding the day the preference was given or recorded, and including the day the petition is filed; but the reverse method is harmless error.⁷²

Fractions of a day are to be considered;⁷³ and it is the time of the filing of the petition, not of the issuance nor service of the subpoena that controls.⁷⁴

§ 1377. Preferences Made after Filing Petition if before Adjudication.—A preference may be made by the bankrupt, after the filing of the petition as well as before, if made before adjudication,⁷⁶ provided it be made with property that was transferable or leviable on at the time of the filing of the petition.

The title vests only "as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt."⁷⁷

§ 1378. After Adjudication, No Preference.—After adjudication it is not within the power of a bankrupt to make a preference: title has passed from him.⁷⁸

This exception was grafted upon the statute by the Amendment of 1903, and was grafted in order to prevent secret preferences by way of mortgages and other liens not recorded until after the four months period had elapsed within which bankruptcy proceedings could have been brought.⁸⁰

However, it had been held, even before the law was amended in 1903, that the date of the recording or filing of a preferential chattel mortgage or other instrument would govern, notwithstanding it was executed and delivered before the four months.⁸¹ But the true rule, before the Amendment of 1903, was contra, namely, that if the actual transfer took place before the four months period, it was good notwithstanding the recording or registering of the transfer occurred within the four months period.⁸² And this was the view held by the courts under the law of 1867.

Sawyer v. Turpin, 91 U. S. 118: "The conveyance was by a bill of sale absolute in its terms, having no condition or defeasance expressed, but it was understood by the parties to be a security for the debt due. It was, in substantial legal effect, though not in form, a mortgage. Having been executed more than four months before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, there is nothing in the case to show that it was invalid. True, it was not recorded, and it may be doubted whether it was admissible to record. True, no possession was taken under it by the vendee; but for neither of these reasons was it the less operative between the parties. It might not have been a protection against the attaching creditors, if there had been any; but there was none. It was in the power of Turpin to put it on record any day, if the recording acts apply to such an instrument, and equally within his power to take possession of the property at any time before other rights against it had accrued. These powers were conferred by the instrument itself, immediately on its execution."

After the Amendment of 1903 it would have seemed on principle that since the Amendment made the four months an essential element of the very definition of a preference itself, the date of the recording or filing ought to have been taken as being the date of the consummation of the transfer so far as creditors in bankruptcy were concerned, and to such effect were some of the decisions after that Amendment, even before the further Amendment of 1910.⁸³

an order of a contractor on funds in the owner's hands was not to be presented unless the contractor did not keep up payments; the court holding it not to be a "transfer" until presentation. Compare, In re Klingman, 4 A. B. R. 254, 101 Fed. 691 (D. C. Iowa). See note In re Wright, 2 A. B. R. 368, 96 Fed. 187 (D. C. Ga.); inferentially, contra, In re U. S. Food Co., 15 A. B. R. 329 (Ref. This would not be the effect of a failure to file or record a conditional sale contract, however, for such contract does not effect a transfer but simply keeps a title that never has left the original owner, preference implying transfer. Bradley Clark & Co. v. Benson, 13 A. B. R. 170, 100 N. W. 670 (Minn.); In re Cavagnaro, 16 A. B. R. 323, 143 Fed. 668 (D. C. N. H.). But see, In re Klingman, 4 A. B. R. 254 (D. C. Iowa). But compare, *Deland v. 1903, when they were left for record; the latter only being within the four months period prior to bankruptcy, necessary to make out a preference. * * * "Having sole regard to the State law, it must be confessed that the deeds in controversy were effective to convey title, whatever their purposes, without being recorded; and, that if this is controlling, it is, to say the least, doubtful whether they can be disturbed. It is only qualifiedly, here, that recording can be said to be required. Originally under the Act of May 28, 1715, 1 Smith's Laws, 95, except as to mortgages, it was permissive merely. Powers v. McFerreran, 2 Serg. & Rawle, 34; Kellar v. Nutz, 5 Serg. & Rawle, 246. But by the Act of May 18, 1775, 1 Sm. Laws, 422, it was made compulsory, within six months, if the grantee would preserve his title as against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees, without notice, for value. * * *

"But, however, the deeds would be regarded under ordinary circumstances, and without passing upon the standing of the trustee with reference to the State law, the case turns, in my judgment, on the construction to be given to that provision of the Bankruptcy Act, and others, by which it is subtended, which, treating of voidable preferences occurring within four months of bankruptcy, prescribes (§ 60a): 'Where the preference consists in a transfer, such period of four months shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer if by law such recording or registering is required.' This was introduced by the amendatory Act of 1903, and was manifestly intended to overcome the decisions under the law as it previously stood (In re Wright, 2 Am. B. R. 364; In re Mersman, 7 Am. B. R. 46; Dean v. Plane, 195 Ill. 495), by which it was held the same as under the Act of 1867 (Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. 360, 375; Sleek v. Turner, 76 Pa. 142), that the date of the delivery of a preferential instrument, rather than the date when it was put on record, marked the beginning of the four months period, although even then, cases were not wanting which held that the date of record was to be taken. In re Klingman, 4 Am. B. R. 254; Chesapeake Shoe Co. v. Seldner, 10 Am. B. R. 466, 122 Fed. 593; Babbitt v. Kelley, 9 Am. B. R. 335; Mathews v. Hardt, 9 Am. B. R. 373; Johnson v. Huff, 13 Am. B. R. 287. It also must be regarded as intended to bring the section where it is found into substantial accord with § 3a, b, where, after defining what shall constitute an act of bankruptcy, and providing that proceedings must be begun within four months after the commission by the bankrupt of the act relied upon, it is declared:

"Such time shall not expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer or assignment, where the act consists in having made a transfer of any of his property with intent to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors, or for the purpose of giving a preference as hereinbefore provided, or a general assignment for the benefit of creditors; if by law such recording or registering is required or permitted; or, if it is not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive or continuous possession of the property, unless the petitioning creditors have received actual notice of such transfer or assignment."

"According to what is so provided, there would seem to be no question that, in this State, where a preferential or a fraudulent transfer, which is relied upon as an act of bankruptcy, consists in a conveyance of real estate, under which possession is not taken, and of which the petitioning creditors have no actual knowledge, it is not committed in legal intendment until the deed or other instrument by which it is accomplished is put on record. Notice is made essential, and where there is none in reality, according to the other alternative, it must be supplied constructively by recording. This is the effect of record by the State law and is thus 'required' within the meaning of this provision. Any other view makes it insensible and useless.

"But whatever construction is thus given to the one section (§ 3a, b), is necessarily carried forward and impressed upon the other (§ 60a). The two are intimately related, the one in that particular being the basis of and dominating the other, and it is the failure to recognize this and to draw them together as they should be, that is responsible for any misapprehension. What is thus 'required' in the way of recording in the one is also 'required' as a consequence in the other, and for the same purpose. It is true that some things are omitted in the transition, but enough is retained to make this manifest. It is none other, for instance, than the preference which is made an act of bankruptcy in the earlier section that is intended to be made voidable at the instance of the trustee, in the interest of creditors, in the later, and upon substantially the same terms, the superadded condition only being present, that the person who received it had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended. In the present case, the petitioning creditors could unquestionably have assigned as an act of bankruptcy, the transfer of his property by the bankrupt to the defendant by the deeds in controversy, they having no knowledge of them, and the deeds having been put on record within the four months period. But if so, how can the defendant successfully deny the effect of them as a preference in his hands? The character of the transaction as a preference does not change in the shifting of the issue from the bankrupt to the preferred creditor. It may, its voidable quality dependent upon whether the creditor had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended. But that is another matter, and does not concern us, being unquestionably present here.

"It seems to me, therefore, clear that in any case, where the facts are the same as they are here, a deed by which a transfer of a bankrupt's property is effected, and under which no possession is taken, is to be judged, on the question of preference, by the date when it is put on record, regardless of the date of delivery; and that, tested by this, the conveyances to the defendant cannot stand. I do not lose sight of the fact that the first of these was several years prior to the passage of the Bankruptcy Act, which is not to be given a retroactive effect if it can be avoided. But the security thereby provided was a continuing one. It was not given merely for the debt then due, but also for whatever might subsequently become so; and it is safe to conclude that the original debt of $573 is long since paid, together with whatever after that antedated the passage of the Act. Thereafter the defendant held his deeds subject to the condition there imposed, and at the risk, if not duly put on record, of having them declared void, as here upon the intervention of bankruptcy within four months after they were. If the result seems in any respect harsh, it is to be remembered that by withholding them as he did, and allowing the bankrupt to remain in full possession and enjoyment of his property, the defendant enabled him to secure a false credit, which has worked fully as much injury to others entirely innocent.

"The only doubt I have is raised by those cases which apparently hold that the right of the trustee to question such a conveyance is to be determined by the State law and what there obtains. Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 Am. B. R. 437; Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 14 Am. B. R. 74, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 567; In re N. Y. Economical Printing Co., 6 A. B. R. 615; In re Shirley, 7 Am. B. R. 299. But all these will be found on examination to have arisen prior to the amendments of 1903, by which the clause with regard to recording was carried forward from the third section to the sixtieth; and do not assume to pass upon the Act as it now stands. Neither do they consider the relation existing between the two sections named. Regarding them as in these respects distinguishable, I have ventured to follow what seems to me to be the natural and necessary construction to be given to this part of the Act, upon which its efficiency in the matter of preferences, in my judgment, in large measure depends."

Compare, suggestively and obiter, Page v. Rogers, 21 A. B. R. 496, 211 U. S. 575 (reversing on other grounds Rogers v. Page): "The facts, however, do not raise the question which was argued. Upon a proper interpretation of the evidence we need not determine whether an insolvent debtor may make an agreement to convey a substantial portion of his assets to a favored creditor, keep that agreement secret for more than four months, and then execute it in fraud of the rights of his other creditors, in favor of a creditor, who then has reasonable cause to believe he is receiving a preference."

And thus a chattel mortgage, although originally given on a presently passing consideration, was, under this doctrine, held to amount to a preference, not having been filed until within the four months period, for it was not effective against creditors as a transfer until filed, and yet, at the date of filing, the consideration on which it was based was past.⁸⁴ And the rule was also held applicable to real estate transfers.⁸⁵

Indeed, the correct view of the effect of the Amendment of 1903 would seem to have been that the date of the recording or filing was thenceforth to be taken as the date of the consummation of the transfer as to creditors, since it was then and not beforehand that the creditor had effectively depleted the trust fund. In accordance with this view proof of insolvency, reasonable cause of belief and of all the other elements of a voidable preference, might properly have been made as of the date of the recording—the date of the "transfer."⁸⁶

In re Hickerson, 20 A. B. R. 682, 162 Fed. 345 (D. C. Idaho): "The mortgage was not recorded for nearly a year after it was executed and delivered and then just a few days before the petition in bankruptcy was filed. * * * Does the mortgage transaction, as disclosed by the record, constitute a preference under § 60a of the Bankruptcy Act? By the Amendment of 1903 * * * it is provided that, to constitute a preference, the period during which the transfer is made shall not Ga.), wherein the court ignores the Amendment of 1910 to § 60b, though noting that the Amendment of 1910 to § 47a (2) would not affect the case, since the mortgage was filed before the rights of the trustee under the latter section became effective as a creditor armed with process.

expire until four months after the date of the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required. The mortgage 'transfer' must therefore be deemed to have been made on the 11th day of February, 1907, only five days before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 14 Am. B. R. 74."

[Even before Amendment of 1910 to Bank. Act, § 60 (b).] Ragan v. Donovan, 26 A. B. R. 311, 189 Fed. 138 (D. C. Ohio): "The court is justified, we think, in holding that the interpretation placed upon the language of Sec. 60 paragraph (a), read in connection with § 3, paragraph (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, by the cases of English v. Ross, Loeser v. Bank, and In re Beckhaus, should be applied to a transaction where deeds of realty are involved, as in this case, and that we should hold that the preference, manifestly attempted in behalf of the bank, should be referred for date to the time of filing the deeds."

McElvain v. Hardesty, 22 A. B. R. 320, 169 Fed. 31 (C. C. A. Mo.): "* * * the effect of the transfer to McElvain is to be judged as if made on the 7th day of July, 1905, when it was filed for record. If C. & C. were then insolvent, and if the effect of the enforcement of the transfer was to enable McElvain to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of their simple contract creditors, the transfer constituted a preference within the meaning of the bankruptcy law. * * * As, for the purpose of this case the transfer is to be treated as made on the date the agreement was recorded, so the transferee's belief or cause for belief concerning it must relate to that time."

First Nat'l Bk. v. Connett, 15 A. B. R. 662, 142 Fed. 33 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The bankrupt was insolvent when he executed the mortgages and when they were recorded. The mortgages constituted a transfer of his property, and their effect was to enable the bank to obtain a greater percentage of its claims than other creditors. They were recorded within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. Therefore, assuming that a recording is required by the law of Missouri, it follows that a preference arose under § 60 (a). And, in our opinion, it also follows that the preference arose when the mortgages were recorded and not as of the date they were given. In other words, the Amendment of 1903 was intended to remedy the evil resulting from secret instruments of transfer of the bankrupt's property, the withholding of them from record until shortly before the institution of bankruptcy proceeding, and the then assertion of them as of the prior date of their execution and delivery. And this was accomplished by making the rights of a creditor thus favored determinable by the conditions existing when he caused the transfer to him to be recorded as required by the State law rather than by those existing at the time he secured it. Under the Act of 1867 not only the question of requirement to record a chattel mortgage, but also the effect of noncompliance therewith, were exclusively controlled by the law of the State. The same construction has been applied to the original act of 1898. Unless there has been some departure from this construction in its relation to voidable preferences, the Amendment of 1903 of § 60 (a), upon which subdivision 'b' thereof depends, is wholly without significance. Contrary to a presumed intent in legislative amendments it serves no purpose and performs no office whatever. Such result can be reasonably avoided by this construction of the amendment: It affects only those instruments of transfer which the State law requires to be registered or recorded; and, as to those, where there is delay, it provides that upon the question of voidable preference they shall speak as of the day of compliance with the local law and not as of the day they were given. This would preclude the application of the doctrine of relation, and it would entail a consequence upon a failure to record that might not be imposed by the law of the State; but we deem it to be not only within the letter of the amendment, but also within the intention to correct an evil which flourished under the construction of the original act."

Nevertheless, such was not the trend of the decisions.⁸⁸ On the contrary, before the Amendment of 1910 to § 60b the weight of authority was to the effect that the Amendment of 1903 simply operated as an extension of the statute of limitations to four months after the recording, where recording was requisite, but left the proof of the different elements of a preference, insolvency, reasonable cause of belief, greater percentage, etc., to be proved as of the date of the original transfer between the parties.

Debus v. Yates, 30 A. B. R. 823, 193 Fed. 429 (D. C. Ky.): "The transfer was to be judged in determining the question of whether or not it constituted a voidable preference as of the time when it was made and not of the time of its registration and unless when it was made, the debtor was insolvent and actually intended a preference and the creditor then had reasonable cause to believe that it was so intended, it is not voidable."

Davis v. Hanover Savings Fund Soc. et al., 31 A. B. R. 368. "The reasoning and citation of authorities in Debus v. Yates, impresses us as they did the learned judge below. * * * Adopting this decision as the correct construction of the § 60a, as amended by the act of February 5, 1903, there is no basis for the suggestion that the mortgage was a voidable preference. The amendment of 1910 makes a radical change in the law in this respect. The mortgage in controversy here, however, was recorded in November 6th, 1909, and does not come within the provisions of that amendment. There is a saving clause in the act of 1910 preventing its application to cases pending when it went into effect, June 25th, 1910. The petition was filed here March 3d, 1910."

Rogers v. Page, 15 A. B. R. 506, 140 Fed. 596 (C. C. A. Tenn. reversed on other ground, Page v. Rogers, supra): "The preference in such case was given when the mortgage was executed and delivered."

In re Jackson, etc., Co., 26 A. B. R. 915, 189 Fed. 636 (D. C. Mo.), reversed on other grounds in Sturdivant Bank v. Schade, 27 A. B. R. 673, 190 Fed. 183 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The provision of the statute * * * was intended to postpone the time within which a transfer is open to attack as a preference * * * [it] cannot properly be so applied as to materially alter the essential character of the transaction * * * if the transfer when made was based upon a present consideration, a delay in recording the instrument does not warrant us in treating the conveyance as if it were made as security for an antecedent debt, because to do so would be to create by construction a transaction different from the actual one."

Christ v. Zehner, 16 A. B. R. 790, 212 Pa. St. 188, 61 Atl. 822: "The only question remaining, then, is as to when the title to the property of the bankrupt actually passed. Was it when the bill of sale was executed and delivered, or when possession of the goods was actually given? The authorities cited by the trial judge seem to fully sustain his conclusion that the property was transferred when the bill of sale was executed and delivered."

§ 1379½. Date of Recording as Date of Preference Since Amendment of 1910.—Section 60b, relating to preferences created by instruments requiring recording, was amended in 1910, so as to make the date of the recording, wherever recording is required, to be the date at which all the various elements of the preference may be proved, at the trustee's option.

We have already seen that as the law stood, even after the Amendment of 1903, as that amendment was construed in many jurisdictions and probably according to the weight of authority, the debtor might, if solvent at the time, or if presently passing consideration had been then received, have given a chattel mortgage or other lien upon his property requiring recording or registering by the State law, and the creditor receiving it might have kept this lien off the record for months or even years thereafter (if not done by collusive agreement) and have filed it within a few days of bankruptcy, and yet the lien would have been held perfectly good, the courts, under these rulings, having declared that the insolvency of the debtor, the existence of a pre-existing debt, and all the other elements of the preference were to be determined as of the date of the transfer between the parties. To be sure, the Amendment of 1903, by declaring the four months period should not begin to run until the date of the recording, where the recording was "required" by state law, evidently attempted to make the date of the recording in such instances the date at which the existence of insolvency, of a pre-existing consideration, of "reasonable cause for belief" and of all the other elements of the preference, should be taken. Nevertheless, that Amendment did not effectually accomplish this object. As the amended law was construed, even if the recording were not done until within the four months period, on the very eve, maybe, of bankruptcy, yet if at the time of the original transfer, which might have occurred a year beforehand, the debtor was solvent, or the lien have been given upon a then presently passing consideration, the transfer was held not to be voidable as a preference, the date of the "transfer" under any theory always being necessarily the date at which all the elements of the preference must be proved to have existed.^{88a}

[Even before Amendment of 1910] In re Sayed, 26 A. B. R. 441, 185 Fed. 962 (D. C. Mich.): "This assignment of the land contract in question was a 'transfer,' and I think the controlling question on this branch of the case must be whether this transfer was 'made' when the paper was signed and delivered and

^{88a.} In re Klein, 28 A. B. R. 263, 197 Fed. 241 (C. C. A. Ohio). This case, In re Klein, the same court sought to distinguish in Carey v. Donohue, 31 A. B. R. 210, by saying that the Klein case "did not involve a preference" which is erroneous, as the gist of the Klein action was the recovery of a preference and "preference" was the main point urged, the chattel mortgage in the Klein case having been kept off the records for eleven months and filed on the eve of bankruptcy, the withholding from record having been made under an arrangement with the bankrupt, he being clearly insolvent at the time of the recording of the deed and the creditor at that time also having had reasonable cause of belief.

took effect as the loans were made, or must be construed as not made until it was recorded. If the former, the transfer was not a preference, because it was not made while the debtor was insolvent, and there was no intent on either side to give or receive a preference, and it was for present and future advances. If the latter, it may be said, owing to the condition of things then existing, to be clearly a preference.

"It is elementary to the definition of a forbidden preference, considered under any section and for any purpose, that it must have been made by the debtor 'while insolvent.' A solvent debtor can not make a preference. It is therefore essential to the argument of the trustee that this transfer of the land contract to the bank was not 'made' in 1907, when it was signed and delivered, nor in 1908, while the bank was making advances on the strength of it; and, indeed, that it had never been 'made' down to the date of the adjudication, because it was not recorded until after adjudication. I can not adopt this theory. This transfer was absolutely and completely made in July, 1907, and all the incidents of security for the amount now due had attached as early as March, 1908, and during all this time Sayed was perfectly solvent, and had a right to give such a security and the bank had a right to receive it.

"Carrying the same inquiry a step further, we find that the intent to give a preference—that is, to pay one creditor leaving other creditors in danger of not being paid as fully—must exist on the part of the giver of the security at the time it is given, and the receiver must then have cause to believe that the giver has such intent. Most certainly, in July, 1907, or March, 1908, Sayed had no such intent, and the bank can not be charged with any notice of an intent which did not exist.

"It is said that a construction of the act which leaves such an unrecorded transfer in legal effect after bankruptcy destroys the force of the act by providing easy means of avoiding the act. If this were true, it could not justify the judicial legislation which seems to me necessary in order to adopt the trustee's theory; but I do not think it is true. The instances where any one has a moral or ethical standing to attack a security given by a perfectly solvent debtor are rare, although they may sometimes occur, and such exceptional instances do not justify straining the statute. If such an instrument is withheld from record by agreement between the parties for the purpose of giving a fictitious credit, it then involves the element of actual fraud, and the question is quite different.

"Some decisions are cited from other circuits, which, while they could be well distinguished on their facts from this case, yet doubtless indicate that the judges writing those opinions thought the statute should be construed as though it said that any transfer, the recording of which was required or permitted by law, should be a preference, if the transferrer was insolvent at the time the instrument was recorded; but, in the absence of any controlling decision, I can not accept this view. The intent on the part of the transferrer must exist at the critical moment. If that moment be the instant of recording, how can it be said that the transferrer then has that intent, when he perhaps gave and delivered the instrument two years before, while he was perfectly solvent, and had continuously supposed that it was recorded, as might well be the case if the lack of recording had been from the carelessness of the secured creditor."

The confusion is to be explained in this way: There are, in reality, two times of transfer in such cases. As between the transferrer and transferee, obviously the time of the transfer is the time of the original execution and delivery of the instrument to the grantee or transferee, regardless of its registration; but as to creditors, or the rest of the outer world, the “transfer” is, by the policy of the State recording statutes, not a complete “transfer” at all until recorded, until delivery to the public recorder—then, and not until then, the debtor signifying to outside parties, to all others who might become interested in his assets, the effectual separation of the lien property from the rest of his assets. This, it must be conceded, is the basic principle upon which rest the recording statutes of the different States. It is also the basic principle of the right to legislate against secret liens. Likewise, in a rightly construed bankruptcy preference statute, the great object should be to make clear that the “transfer,” so far as outside parties becoming interested in the estate are concerned, is not complete or perhaps is not even to be considered a “transfer” at all, in cases where State laws require recording as against creditors, until delivery of the instrument to the recorder for registration.^{88b}

In re Wilson, 23 A. B. R. 814 (D. C. Hawaii): “There is no requirement in the Hawaiian statutes that bills of sale of chattels must be recorded in order to be valid. The old common law that a bill of sale of chattels was fraudulent and void unless followed by the delivery of the property, is now so modified that continued possession by the vendor only raises a presumption of fraud. Such presumption is removed by registration. The principle of law as found in the rule of the common law and the practice under statutes of registration, appears to be that some kind of public notice is essential in all transfers of property so far as the interests of third parties are concerned. Such notice may be by delivery of the chattels or registry of the bill of sale, or, in the case of transfers of real property, by registration of the conveyance. The transfer of a chose in action or any other property to a creditor is a matter of interest to other creditors, who are likely to be closely watching the course of events in the business of the debtor and who may be prejudiced through ignorance of such a transaction; for instance, through failing to file a petition for adjudication within four months thereafter, where there is insolvency.”

Under the decisions, as we have seen in the preceding section, even after the Amendment of 1903, before the Amendment of 1910 creditors were required to prove that, at the time of the “transfer” (that is to say, the transfer between the parties) perhaps several years beforehand, the debtor was then insolvent, which was a practical impossibility, indeed, an unreasonable requirement, since it is always the present insolvent fund of the debtor that is rightly involved and not some ancient fund existing years beforehand.

The Amendment of 1910 makes the date of the recording, where recording is required under State law, the date at which the creditor is to prove the existence of all the elements of a preference—truly the right date, for, as above noted, it is the present insolvent fund with which creditors are concerned, not the debtor's estate in the condition which might have existed several years beforehand.⁸⁹

Report No. 691 of Senate Judiciary Committee of the 61st Congress, Second Session.

Obiter [being a conditional sale, it could not be a preference], In re Farmer's Co. of Barlow (No. 1), 30 A. B. R. 187, 202 Fed. 1005 (D. C. N. Dak.): "By § 60 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act the contract must be judged as of the date of the filing."

In cases of preferences effected by instruments required to be recorded but which are not recorded at all, the date of the effective "transfer" becomes immaterial as to property in the custody or coming into the custody of the bankruptcy court, since, as to such property, the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act, § 47a (2), gives the trustee the rights of a levying creditor, whereby such lien is avoided without proof of its being a preference. On the other hand, preferences effected by instruments requiring to be recorded but which are not recorded at all, where the property concerned does not come into the custody of the bankruptcy court, must still be proved to have been preferences at the date of the transfer between the parties, except where the State law does not require actual seizure of the property but is satisfied with the existence merely of a creditor holding an execution returned unsatisfied; in which latter event the unrecorded lien, also, may be void by operation of Bankr. Act, § 47 (a) (2), as amended in 1910.⁹⁰

§ 1379 $\frac{3}{4}$. Though Consideration Contemporaneous at Time of Original Transaction Does Failure to Record Make It Preexisting Debt?—The effect of the Amendment of 1910 to § 60b is to bring down to the date of the recording the proof of all the elements requisite to make the transfer a preference. The date of the record, then, is to be considered as the date of the effecting of the "transfer" so far as creditors are concerned. However, it is the transfer that is to be considered as taking place at the date of the recording, not the giving of the original consideration; so that, if the original consideration were contemporaneous with the original transfer between the parties, yet, by virtue of the Amendment of 1910, the date of the transfer is moved forward to the date of the recording, leaving the date of the passing of the original consideration, however, as it stood in the first place.

Compare Lathrop Bank v. Holland, 30 A. B. R. 62 (C. C. A. Mo.): "If the bank had taken mortgages as the purchases were made but had refrained from recording them, it could not have prevailed against the trustee in bankruptcy. The oral agreement for a mortgage can give no greater right."

Nevertheless, there is a contrary holding, to the effect that the wording of the statute does not compel such a construction, and that the debt still remains a contemporaneous debt and does not become "pre-existing."⁹¹

istry or recording, the consummation of the preference will date from the actual transfer, as the State law may determine such date to be.⁹²

§ 1380½. Also Where Instrument Not Recorded, Though Recording "Required."—Likewise, where an instrument is not recorded though recording is "required," the preference dates from the actual transfer between the parties.

§ 1381. Whether, Where Not "Required," Preference Dates from Taking of Notorious and Exclusive, etc., Possession.—It is held, in some cases, that where recording or registering is not required by the State law the preference will not even be considered to date from the taking of notorious, exclusive or continuous possession by the beneficiary nor from the giving of actual notice thereof to creditors; and that these provisions of § 3 (b), defining the time limits of a preference as an act of bankruptcy, are not to be imported into § 60 (a) for the recovery of preferences from creditors.⁹³

There is no law in Arkansas requiring a contract of conditional sale to be filed or recorded in any public office. Notwithstanding the views which this and other courts have at times entertained as to the effect of an adjudication in bankruptcy, and the right and title of the trustee resulting therefrom, it has been definitely settled by the Supreme Court that the trustee is vested with no better right or title than belonged to the bankrupt; that he stands simply in the shoes of the bankrupt, and as between them he has no greater right. The right of appellant in this case did not first come into existence when it took possession of the property in controversy on the eve of the bankruptcy proceedings. On the contrary, it was secured by the contract which was executed almost a year before, and it is that date which we must regard rather than the date when possession was taken." Loeser v. Bank & Trust Co., 17 A. B. R. 631, 148 Fed. 975 (C. C. A. Ohio): "What has been the effect of that Amendment? This fact was referred to by Mr. Ray of the House Judiciary Committee, who explained the amendment in question, when proposed in Congress, as intended to prevent preferences under unrecorded instruments given more than four months before the filing of the petition. Touching this he said:

"By adding to "A" a clause which shall be equivalent to that found in § 3, B, (1). It seems that as § 60a now stands, a preferential mortgage may be given and the creditor preferred, by withholding it from record four months be able to dismiss the trustee suit to recover the same though the paper was actually recorded within the four months period. See In re Wright (Ga.), 2 Am. B. R. 364, 96 Fed. 187; In re Mersman (N. Y.), 7 Am. B. R. 46.' Vol. 35, part 7, Cong. Record, 6943.

"Before this amendment, § 60a read as follows:

"A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person, or made a transfer of any of his property, and the effect of the enforcement of such judgment or transfer will be to enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class.' * * *

"(1) A preference which is an act of bankruptcy by § 3 should in an harmonious law be voidable by the trustee. By that section a transfer made by one, 'while insolvent,' of any portion of his property to one or more of his creditors 'with intent to prefer such creditors over his other creditors,' is made an act of bankruptcy, and a petition may be filed against such person 'within four months after the commission of such act.' With respect to the date of the commission of such act of bankruptcy, subdivision (1) of the same section provides, that the date from which the four months begins to run shall be 'the date of the recording or registering of the transfer or assignment when the act consists in having made a transfer of any of his property' * * * 'for the purpose of giving a preference as hereinbefore provided,' * * * 'if by law such recording or registering is required or permitted, or, if it is not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive or continuous possession of the property unless the petitioning creditors have received actual notice of such transfer or assignment.' By § 60a, a definition of a 'preference' is given which under § 3 would constitute an act of bankruptcy and by § 60b, a 'preference' so defined is made voidable by the trustee. But as we have seen heretofore, § 60a and (b) did not make a preference voidable by the trustee unless the preference, whether under a recorded or unrecorded instrument, was given within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy. Thus, a 'preference' under § 3, as denied by § 60a, might constitute an act of bankruptcy and justify an adjudication if given by an unrecorded instrument more than four months prior to bankruptcy and the preference itself be enforced as a perfectly valid act. The plain purpose of the amendment of § 60a was to bring it into harmony with § 3, by making the same period of time the test as to whether a preference may be avoided by the trustee under the former, or may constitute an act of bankruptcy under the latter. The construction given to § 3 should be carried forward and given to § 60a as amended, thus bringing them into consistent relations. 'The two,' said

What is thus "required" in the way of recording in the one is also "required" as a conveyance in the other and for the same purpose.'

"(2) The evil to be corrected was that of secret preferences, given by withholding from record instruments which by the whole policy of recording statutes should be recorded.

"This evil was pointed out by the author of the Amendatory Act of 1903 and the object of the amendment of 60a was stated to be the remedying of this evil. The law as it stood encouraged such secret liens and preferences, for if they could be concealed for four months, though acts of bankruptcy, they were not voidable by the trustee. If we say, that unless the law of the State where the transfer is made makes void all such transfers as to all the world, that it is not a law which 'requires' recording, the evil will continue and judges will continue to bewail the iniquity of a law which makes such a secret transfer an act of bankruptcy and yet holds the preference valid against the bankrupt's estate because made more than four months before starting bankrupt proceedings against the maker. See the lament of Judge Ray, In re Hunt, 14 Am. B. R. 416, 139 Fed. 286-287."

In re Reynolds, 18 A. B. R. 666, 153 Fed. 295 (D. C. Ark.); "It was held by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in In re Antigo Screen Door Company, 10 Am. B. R. 306, 123 Fed. 249, that in the absence of fraud such a mortgage is valid under the laws of Wisconsin, as against the trustee under the Bankrupt Act of 1898. An examination of the cases cited in that opinion will show that other courts, notably Massachusetts, have held the same. The evidence does not disclose any fraud when the mortgage was executed as to the property now under discussion, or even that the mortgagor was then insolvent. It was executed for a loan then made. It took nothing away from creditors. The loan was made in good faith, and the mortgagee got possession under it before any liens attached, and before bankruptcy proceedings began, but within four months of the institution of bankruptcy proceedings. I do not find such a mortgage is void as to creditors under the Arkansas decisions, and if not void as to creditors under the Arkansas decisions, it is not invalid under the Bankrupt Act as to the trustee, unless made void by some positive provision of the act. Is the mortgage void, as against the trustee, by any positive provision of the Bankrupt Act? This question, I think, has been answered conclusively by the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of First National Bank of Buchanan County St. Joseph v. Connett, reported in 15 Am. B. R. 662, 142 Fed. 33. That case is, to all intents and purposes, on all-fours with the case at bar. Indeed, the only difference is that, in that case, the mortgagor was insolvent when the mortgage was given, but the mortgagee was not aware of it. In the case at bar the testimony does not show whether the mortgagor was insolvent when the mortgage was given, or not. But he was insolvent, and the mortgagee knew it, when she took possession. The difference is immaterial, in the opinion of the court; and, therefore, the two cases are on all-fours. * * * The conclusion reached is that the mortgage is void in toto under § 60a of the Bankrupt Act of 1898, as amended by § 13 of the Act of February 5th, 1903. An order will be entered disallowing the claim of Mrs. Poynter in toto until she has surrendered all the property covered by the mortgage in controversy, in her possession or under her control. Upon a compliance with this order her claim will be allowed as an unsecured claim."

In re Francis J. Bird, 25 A. B. R. 24, 180 Fed. 229 (D. C. Minn.): "The important thing is, not that the property be in the possession of the creditor, but that it be out of the possession of the debtor."

And it was held, even before the Amendment of 1903, that § 3 (b) and § 60 (a) should be construed together.⁹⁵

§ 1382. Where "Required" Only as to Bona Fide Purchasers and Encumbrancers or Others Not Creditors.—Where the failure to record or register the transfer does not make the transfer void as to creditors, but only as to bona fide purchasers or encumbrancers, it would seem that the date of the recording would not be the date from which to compute the four months, the case standing precisely as if recording or registering were not required.⁹⁶

Likewise, where the recording or registering is not for the purpose of affecting creditors, but rather to notify debtors or others not creditors, as, for example where the assignment of money under a contract by a public contractor must be filed with the head of the bureau or department in charge of the construction in order to notify the disbursing officer.⁹⁷

However, the rule has been laid down in some well considered cases (discussed in the next section) that if it is "required" for any purpose, as against any person, it is "required" within the purview of Bankr. Act 60 (b) as amended in 1910. Under such ruling, real estate transfers likewise are to be tested for preferences as of the date of the recording, though the recording is only necessary under state law as against bona fide purchasers and encumbrancers.^{97a}

§ 1382½. Or as to Levying Creditors.—One court held that, since "required" refers to creditors, then in states where recording or registering is not "required" in order to be valid against any other creditor than levying creditors the date of the preference is not to be taken as of the date of recording, unless there be such a levying creditor in existence to whose rights the trustee might succeed.⁹⁸ But this case was reversed, the appellate court holding rightly that the word "Required" is descriptive of a general class of instruments with reference to their nature rather than to the particular persons affected by the withholding of it from the records,

Loeser v. Bank & Trust Co., 17 A. B. R. 633, 148 Fed. 475 (C. C. A. Ohio): "We reach the conclusion that the word 'required,' as used in the Amendment, refers to the character of the instrument giving the preference or making the transfer, without reference to the fact that as to certain persons or classes of persons it may be good or bad according to circumstances."

§ 1383. Where State Law Does Not "Require" Recording, but Merely "Permits" It.—Where the State law does not "require" the recording, recording is not necessary, although recording may be "permitted."⁹⁹

Compare, In re Hunt, 14 A. B. R. 416, 139 Fed. 283 (D. C. N. Y.): "This last sentence was added by the amendment of February 5, 1903. As introduced in the House of Representatives by the author of the amendment, as it was reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives and as it passed the House the words 'or permitted, or if not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive or continuous possession of the property transferred' followed the word 'required' and ended the sentence. Had the section become a law in this form the ending of the amendment would have been, 'if by law such recording or registering is required or permitted,' etc. In such case there would be no contention here on this subject. In this regard it followed subdivision b, § 3, of the Act. The Senate struck out the words 'or permitted,' etc., above quoted. Did it regard these words as surplusage? Were they surplusage? This court thinks not. The words 'if by law such recording or registering is required' must mean the same as they would if the words 'to make the transfer valid against the person executing it' or 'to make the transfer valid as against the general creditors of the person executing it' were added after the word 'required.' In New York the registering or recording of a mortgage on real estate is not required in order to give it validity as against the mortgagor, or general or even judgment creditors; consequently recording is not required to give it validity as against the trustee in bankruptcy. The word 'required' does not mean the same as 'permitted,' or the same as the words 'required in any case, or for any purpose.' In some States a real estate mortgage must be recorded or registered to be good as against even general creditors. The laws of New York require the recording of such a mortgage as against purchasers and mortgagees in good faith and for value only."

In the case In re Hunt, the court—Judge Ray, having himself been the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, whose amendment was amended by the striking out of the words "or permitted"—held that the word "required" means, not "required in order to make the transfer valid as against creditors" but "required in order to make the transfer valid as against the person executing it" or "as against the general creditors of the person executing it." Notwithstanding the peculiar weight of that court's opinion, arising from the court's intimate acquaintance with the legislation itself, it would seem that the words "or permitted" would not have added to the strength of the Statute nor have made its meaning at all clearer. On the contrary, it would have introduced confusion and uncertainty, for many kinds of transfers are "permitted" to be recorded, if the recorder's fee is paid. Such being the case, the effect of the adoption of the words "or permitted" would have been to make it necessary to record numberless transfers not ordinarily recorded but whose record might be "permitted." Such indeed, is the subsequent criticism of Judge Ray's reasoning by the Circuit Court of Appeals in Loeser v. Bank & Trust Co., 17 A. B. R. 631, 148 Fed. 475 (C. C. A. Ohio), quoted later.

Perhaps the true rule may go even further: that "required" means "required for any purpose," that is to say, for validity against levying creditors, general creditors, incumbrancers, transferees, "third persons," or for validity against the bankrupt himself.

First Nat'l Bk. v. Connett, 15 A. B. R. 662, 142 Fed. 33 (C. C. A. Mo.): "Within the meaning of amended § 60a of the Bankruptcy Act, the Missouri Law (Rev. St. 1899, § 3404) required the recording of chattel mortgages. To be sure an unrecorded mortgage is not pronounced void absolutely and under all circumstances, but it 'is required to be recorded' in the sense in which that phrase is customarily used, and the language of requirement is similar to that employed in the registry laws of most of the states. The word 'required' found in the phrase 'the recording or registering of the transfer, if by law such recording or registering is required' of the amendment of § 60a, has reference to the character of the instrument of transfer required to be recorded by the State law rather than to the particular individuals who by reason of adventitious circumstances may or may not be affected by an unrecorded instrument. Thus an affirmative answer would unhesitatingly be given to the inquiry: 'Does the law of Missouri require the recording of chattel mortgages?'"

"The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, in a case involving the registry statute of Texas, held that, as an unrecorded chattel mortgage was good between the parties thereto and against ordinary creditors, and as there were no intervening lienholders or purchasers, it could not be said that a registry or recording was required, and upon the facts of that case it accordingly concluded that a chattel mortgage given before but placed on record within the four months before the institution of bankruptcy proceedings could not be considered as a voidable preference. Meyer Bros. Drug Co. v. Pipkin Drug Co. (C. C. A.), 14 A. B. R. 477, 136 Fed. 396. In effect this is the adoption, without exception or qualification, of the old rule that whether and to what extent a chattel mortgage given before but recorded within the four months period is valid against a trustee in bankruptcy should be determined exclusively by the State law. In our opinion, the Amendment of 1903 has qualified this rule in respect of the question whether such a mortgage may constitute a voidable preference under subdivisions 'a' and 'b' of § 60. If this has not resulted, we fail to see that Congress has accomplished anything by the amendment."

Loeser v. Bank & Trust Co., 17 A. B. R. 633, 148 Fed. 475 (C. C. A. Ohio): "Some effect should be given to the amendment of § 60a if the language of the provision will permit. If 'required' be construed as applying only to a law which makes every such transfer absolutely void as to all persons, the amendment will be of no effect, for no recording statute, of which we have any knowledge, makes void transfers or conveyances as between the parties and all of them give effect to such instruments as against some classes of persons having actual notice. The amendment would be idle and the evil sought to be remedied would flourish as before and the legislative purpose be frustrated.

"(4) In view of all of the foregoing considerations we reach the conclusion that the word 'required,' as used in the amendment, refers to the character of the instrument giving the preference or making the transfer, without reference to the fact that as to certain persons or classes of persons it may be good or bad according to circumstances. If to be valid against certain classes of persons, the law of the State 'requires' the constructive notice of registration, it is a transfer which under the amendment is 'required' to be recorded. This takes account of the purpose and policy of recording acts; remedies the evil which flourished under the law before the amendment; gives effect to the plain purpose of Congress; and gives some effect and force to a provision which would otherwise be meaningless, and brings §§ 3 and 60a and 60b into harmony of purpose and meaning.

"(5) We do not ignore the argument, that in § 3 the word 'required' is followed by the words 'or permitted,' and that the latter words are omitted from the amendment, and that the words 'or permitted' were in the Act as introduced by the author of the bill and retained in the amendment as it passed the House but was dropped in the Senate.

"It is a fact of which we may take notice, that it is common to recording statutes to set out a list of contracts, conveyances, and transfers which may be registered, or are 'entitled' or 'permitted' registration. But if an instrument is not 'entitled' or 'permitted' by law to be recorded, its record is of no effect as constructive notice. * * *

"We conclude from the general purpose and policy of recording statutes, that the words 'or permitted' are of no vital signification in § 3. If the instrument giving the preference is one which is 'permitted' to be recorded in order to give it validity as against certain classes of persons, though perfectly valid without record as to other classes, it is an instrument 'required' to be recorded within the meaning of the word as there used. The words 'required' and 'permitted' in the connection used are of synonymous legal meaning. The dropping of the words 'or permitted' by the Senate is, therefore, of vital signification if we are right in regarding § 3 and § 60a as closely connected provisions."

In re Beckhaus, 24 A. B. R. 380, 177 Fed. 141 (C. C. A. Ills.): "The last sentence of § 60a 'where the preference, etc.,' was added by the amendment of 1903. As passed by the House the sentence did not end with 'required.' The continuation was 'or permitted, or if it is not, from the date when the beneficiary takes notorious, exclusive, or continuous possession of the property transferred.' These last-quoted words were stricken out by the Senate. Inasmuch as the present case does not involve 'possession,' but turns wholly upon 'recording,' the inquiry is limited to the effect of the excision of the words 'or permitted' after 'required;' and the particular question concerns the soundness of the petitioner's proposition that such excision compels a construction of the amendment as adopted, whereby a chattel mortgage, which a trustee in bankruptcy is assailing as a voidable preference, is not required to be recorded unless an examination of the local law shows that the chattel mortgage, to be impregnable, must be recorded as notice to the persons presently represented by the trustee.

"If, as we are inclined to believe, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, in In re Loeser (supra), was correct in concluding that 'the words "required" and "permitted" in the connection used are of synonymous legal meaning no effect could be attributed to the dropping of the redundant word.

"If they are not synonymous, the omission of 'permitted' does not imply inevitably (on the basis that no other inference can fairly be drawn) that the law-makers intended that 'required' should be qualified or limited to less than it would have meant if the clause in § 3b and in the original draft of the amendment to § 60a had ended with 'required' for Congress may well have conceived that an insolvent debtor and a diligent creditor were not necessarily to be dealt with in the same way. That is, in the interest of fair and open dealing by those who do business on credit, it might have been thought that an insolvent debtor who does not cause a chattel mortgage given to some of his creditors, to the exclusion of others, to be recorded, whether recording be 'required' or only 'permitted' by the local law, should be liable to be thrown into bankruptcy; while the diligent creditor (diligence being usually favored in the law) should be permitted, after four months, to retain his security, if on taking it he did all the law 'required.' See Little v. Hardware Co., supra.

"Whether the words be deemed synonymous or not, the dropping of 'permitted' only eliminated whatever idea pertained to that word—it could not affect 'required,' for 'required' stands full and untouched, without adverb or clause to cut it down. The primal canon of statutory construction is that the language actually used be given its full and fair meaning, that unqualified words be taken without qualification, and that in the absence of ambiguity extraneous matters be not considered. Under this canon probably nothing more can profitably be said than, if recording is required, it is required. If required for any purpose, or without purpose, how can it be said to be not required? If recording be not required, unless required for all purposes, it could never be said to be required where the instrument is valid between the immediate parties without recording.

"We are further restrained by what seems to us to be the absurd consequences of any other ruling. If a good-faith second mortgage had been taken, then according to the petitioner's theory the trustee could avoid the preference. But if, as is frequently the case, each mortgage was large enough to exhaust the mortgaged property, why should the trustee consume the free assets in his hands in carrying on one end of a lawsuit between the mortgagees? The trustee could gain nothing for the general creditors whichever way the litigation ended, but would be spending their pittances to benefit a preferred creditor. The same would be true even if the recorded second mortgage was less than the value of the mortgaged property; for, on the hypothesis that the trustee has no right to resist the unrecorded first mortgage on behalf of the general creditors, the surplus above the second mortgage would have to be applied upon the first mortgage. Preferential mortgagees and lienholders are 'adverse claimants,' entitled to have their rights determined in plenary suits. They seek to withhold or diminish the fund which otherwise would be shared among the general creditors, and the general creditors are in fact interested in resisting that reduction. Now if the trustee may not assail preferences except in favor of one preferred creditor as against another, and if the general creditors have no interest in such contests except to pray that their fund be not therein completely consumed in costs and fees, the amendment to § 60a not merely failed to accomplish any benefit—it brought about a positive injustice.

"When the amended section is read against the background of the nature and purpose of the act, our interpretation, we believe, is confirmed. The act is a national act. It practically supplants the State insolvency laws. We think it clear that Congress recognized the vast sweep of interstate commerce and meant to free interstate traders from the confusion attendant upon a multiplicity of variant local laws. Therefore the act in all its parts ought to be interpreted in a national view, doing away as far as possible with the variance in the local laws. To release an insolvent debtor from his debts is an act of grace. Through the whole law runs the clear purpose of extending grace only to honest debtors. Honesty, fairness, equity is the whole spirit of the law. Nothing is more abhorrent to equity than deceitful appearances covering secret preferences. So the diligent creditor who obtains security must not help the debtor to be dishonest, unfair, secretive; he can hold his security only on condition that he give his fellow creditors a four-months opportunity to determine whether or not they will file a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor. The openness and fairness of the preferred creditor are made the terms upon which he may retain his preference. In this view the only inquiry is: Does the local law require instruments of the kind in question to be recorded? There is no need of further investigation into the scope or purposes of the local law. There is no concern whether or not the trustee represents innocent purchasers, mortgagees, attachment or execution creditors. No issue is to be made with respect to the validity of the lien claims supposed to be represented by the trustee. Section 60b, which authorizes the trustee to 'recover the property or its value,' says nothing about the representation of the trustee. It is enough on this point that the trustee is the trustee, and that the preferred creditor has failed to record the instrument of transfer, if by the local law instruments of that kind are required for any purpose to be recorded. Only by this interpretation can this national law be administered with anything like uniformity respecting preferences.

"2. Even if the true interpretation of § 60a compelled us to decide this case upon the meaning of the Illinois statute, with due regard to the construction thereof by the Illinois courts, we could not agree with the petitioner.

"Recording a mortgage of chattels left in the possession of the mortgagor is required 'as against the rights and interests of any third person.' The term 'third person' is broad enough to include everybody outside of the immediate parties to the instrument and their privies. A simple contract creditor who has not obtained a judgment is just as much a 'third person,' is just as much a stranger to the mortgage, as is the simple contract creditor who has obtained a judgment. Both have the right to enforce payment, if that can be done. The interests of both are prejudiced if the debtor's property is covered by a fraudulent transfer. If at the time of the fraudulent transfer one creditor has obtained a judgment and the other has not, the only difference is that one has proceeded farther than the other in the enforcement of his rights and the protection of his interests. And when it is said that a fraudulent transfer is void only as to judgment creditors the expression means no more than that a creditor cannot seize his debtor's property until he has obtained some process which authorizes the seizure."

Ragan v. Donovan, 26 A. B. R. 311, 189 Fed. 138 (D. C. Ohio): "And the court proceeds to say (in the Beckhaus case) that any other ruling than that, where recording is required for any purpose or to protect any class of persons, it is 'required' under § 60 (a), is to work positive injustice.

"Chattel mortgages in Illinois, in which State this case was decided, as in Ohio, where the Loeser case was decided, need not be recorded as between the immediate parties, but as to some classes of persons recording is essential to their validity.

"Section 8543, General Code of Ohio (Rev. Stat., § 4134), provides that unrecorded deeds, as to bona fide purchasers for value without knowledge are void; that is to say, for some classes of persons deeds are required to be recorded and as to other classes they are valid without record. Then adopting the reasoning of the Court of Appeals in the Beckhaus case, that, recording being required for some purpose, recording is 'required' under this statute, it seems to us that the application of these authorities to this situation is too clear to need further argument, which might be well grounded upon the case of English v. Ross, supra."

[The same rule held to prevail regarding real estate] Carey v. Donohue, 31 A. B. R. 210, 209 Fed. 328 (C. C. A. Ohio): "It remains to consider the effect of the four months provisions of §§ 60a and 60b. We look to the deed recording act of the state for the purpose of determining whether, under that act, recording of the instrument under review was required. Concededly this was so as to bona fide purchasers; and the principle is settled in this court that through the operation of § 60 upon a voidable transfer falling within such a state requirement, the trustee may avoid the transfer if registered within the four month's period.

In re Donnelly, 27 A. B. R. 509, 193 Fed. 754 (D. C. Ohio): "In the case of Ragan v. Donovan (D. C. Ohio), 26 A. B. R. 311, 189 Fed. 138, involving transactions to which the same The Citizens State Banking Company was a party, this court held that the record of a deed is 'required' within the provisions of § 60a of the Bankruptcy Act, providing that a person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent, he has within four months before the filing of the petition made a transfer of his property, and that the period of four months within which a petition may be filed alleging the transfer as an act of bankruptcy, if with the intent reprehended by the statute, begins to run from the recording of the transfer.

"We have no reason to doubt the correctness of the holding in that case and the full application of the law as therein stated, if correct, to the situation here."

So that it may, nevertheless, be an instrument of a class "required" to be recorded, within the purview of the Amendments of 1903 and 1910, though the penalty for nonrecord under State law may not be invalidity against everybody nor against all classes of creditors and though no creditor of any class as to whom the unrecorded instrument would be invalid happens to be in existence at the time; for the term "required" describes merely the nature of the instrument.

Mattley v. Giesler, 26 A. B. R. 116, 187 Fed. 970 (C. C. A. Neb.): "It provides that every chattel mortgage not accompanied by immediate delivery and followed by continued change of possession 'shall be absolutely void as against the creditors of the mortgagor, and as against subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith' unless it or a true copy be filed with the county clerk whose duty it is to make certain entries regarding it upon the records of his office. This is a requirement of registration within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act and it is none the less so though the penalty for noncompliance is not invalidity as to everybody and for all purposes."

§ 1383¾. Real Estate Transfers—Date of Recording as Date of Preference.—The rule that the date of the recording is to be referred to as the date of the preference has been held to be applicable to real estate transfers as much as to transfers of personal property.¹⁰⁰

Carey v. Donohue, 31 A. B. R. 210, 209 Fed. 328 (C. C. A. Ohio): "It remains to consider the effect of the four-months provisions of §§ 60a and 60b. We look to the deed-recording act of the State for the purpose of determining whether under that act recording of the instrument under review was required. Concededly this was so as to bona fide purchasers; and the principle is settled in this court that through the operation of § 60 upon a voidable transfer falling within such a state requirement, the trustee may avoid the transfer if registered within the four-months period. * * * The situation then (in the Loeser Case) evidently demanded of the court an interpretation of the word 'required,' broad enough to embrace all transactions that could displace the rights of the holder of an unregistered chattel mortgage. Anything less than this would have rendered the word 'required' meaningless.

"There can be no difference, then, between the ruling demanded in the Loeser Case and the principle which should govern the instant case. * * * How then can it be that the difference between a deed and a chattel mortgage, as respects form and classes against whom registration is required, amounts to a distinction between this case and the Loeser Case? Further, the form of the present instrument and its inherent infirmities, give to it every attribute that can be ascribed to a 'transfer,' as the term is used in either § 60a or § 60b; and this was true as to that sort of an instrument, even as those sections stood at the date of the Loeser decision. The sections themselves make no distinction respecting the form or the subject-matter of the transfers they condemn; and hence the reason for avoiding such a deed is in every conceivable sense as clear and as strong as can exist in respect of a chattel mortgage."

§ 1384. Preferences as Affected by Taking Possession within Four Months under Unfiled Mortgages or Mortgages Covering After-Acquired Property.—It has previously been observed (ante, § 1236) that unrecorded instruments may be made effective as against the trustee in bankruptcy by the taking of possession thereunder by the mortgagee before the mortgagor's bankruptcy. This will be true even though such possession be taken within the four months prior thereto, if, by the State law, such taking of possession causes the lien to revert to the date of the original transaction, although it is doubtfully true in case the lien is considered by the State law not to so revert but to arise at the date of the taking of possession.

Although "transfers," whether by way of pledge, mortgage, sale, gift or any other or different mode of parting with property, will be preferences under the Bankruptcy Act, if made within the four months preceding the mortgagor's bankruptcy (provided the other elements of a preference co-exist), yet the Bankruptcy Act looks to the State law to determine the time when such "transfer" is held to be consummated, and the facts that constitute a transaction a "sale," or "mortgage" or "pledge," etc. So it is that in States where the taking of possession under an unrecorded instrument causes the "sale" or "mortgage" or "pledge" to revert to the original date of execution, then in such State the "transfer" will be held to have occurred at the date of the original transaction and not at the date of taking possession.¹

Fisher v. Zollinger, 17 A. B. R. 610, 149 Fed. 54 (C. C. A. Ohio, affirming In re Nat'l Valve Co., 15 A. B. R. 524): "This act of taking possession perfected the lien and made the instrument operative and effective against the world unless the bankrupt trustee has by virtue of some positive provision of the bankrupt law, a right to avoid a mortgage which was good as between the parties and all others who had acquired no intervening rights before the mortgagor took possession. If he has a right to avoid this mortgage under § 60a of the bankrupt law, as a preference made within four months of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy against the mortgagor, it will be because the preference of the mortgage was obtained only when the mortgagee took possession and was not a lien as of the date of the mortgage. But it cannot for a moment be pretended that Zollinger's lien under the mortgage only arose when he took possession. He took possession by virtue of his mortgage and his lien relates to its date. It was not a lien created when he took possession. The lien upon the chattels conveyed was always good as between the parties. That the property was subject to seizure by the process of creditors, or might pass to a subsequent purchaser, may be conceded. The only effect of taking possession was to cut off the possibility of rights accruing to third persons. The status of Zollinger was identical with that of a mortgagee under an unrecorded chattel mortgage. Until recorded the mortgaged property is subject to seizure by third persons. The lien of such an unrecorded mortgage relates to the date of the instrument and is not a preference within the meaning of 60a of the Bankrupt Act, if that date is more than four months antecedent to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against the mortgagor. Rogers v. Page, 15 Am. B. R. 502, 140 Fed. 596; Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 14 Am. B. R. 74. The effect of the amendment of February 5, 1903, upon such unrecorded instruments we need not here considered. * * *

"But the contention of counsel for appellant is, that it was this act of 'taking possession which created the lien and as this took place on the eve of bankruptcy and at a time when Zollinger knew the National Valve Company was insolvent and could not continue its business,' it was therefore a preference obtained, granted within four months preceding the bankruptcy of that company. The whole case must turn here, for, if the preference claimed by Zollinger is not to be attributed to the mortgage as of its date rather than as of the date of this act of taking possession, the decree of the court below must be reversed in so far as Zollinger was permitted to enforce a lien against such after-acquired property. But we cannot assent to the premise of the argument. The lien of Zollinger against the after-acquired property did not arise when he took possession. As to third persons, at law, it was inchoate. The possession then taken only perfected this incipient lien as against third persons who had not therefore acquired rights. The question as to whether the lien thus perfected relates to the date of the instrument of mortgages, or to the date when possession was taken, is, in principle, identical with the lien of a mortgage of chattels providing that the mortgagor shall remain in possession with a power of sale, or the lien secured by an unrecorded transfer of property. In both the latter instances the mortgage is a perfectly valid security as between the parties, and voidable only by certain third persons who may acquire rights, in one case before the mortgagee took possession and in the other before the mortgage goes to record. Neither is there anything in the Ohio decisions that will justify any distinction in principle and prevent the lien from relating to the date of the mortgage which included the contract for the lien. It is true that in Ohio, as in some other jurisdictions, the lien upon after-acquired property is not regarded as valid at law until perfected or completed by possession. Chapman v. Weiman, 4 Ohio St. 481; Francisco v. Ryan, 54 Ohio St. 307. In Francisco v. Ryan, the Ohio court, referring to Chapman v. Weiman, said:

"The principle upon which that case rests is, that the mortgage constitutes a valid and binding contract between the parties, and being so it must be given effect according to the intention of the parties.' * * * Continuing, the court said of such mortgage: It is a complete contract already obligatory upon the parties, and which continues to be so until it is fully executed, so that in taking possession of the acquired property in pursuance of its provisions, the mortgagee exercises a right belonging to him under the mortgage.'

"The court quotes with approval from Chase v. Denny, 130 Mass., where it said:

"If the after-acquired property is taken by the mortgagee into his possession before the intervention of any rights of third persons, he holds it under a valid lien by the operation of the provisions of the mortgage in regard to it'.

"Whether the lien of an unrecorded mortgage, or a mortgage of chattels where the mortgagor is left in possession with a power of sale, shall relate to the date of the instrument or to the date when the lien is completed or perfected as against third persons who have acquired no intervening rights before the recording of the instrument or taking possession of the mortgaged chattels, is ordinarily of no importance. All persons are cut off by the recording of the instrument or the taking of possession who have not theretofore acquired some right. This is also true as to the relation of the lien of an after-acquired property clause upon such after-acquired property. It is only when some insolvency statute, or some bankruptcy law, avoiding preferences obtained within a given time before a general assignment or the filing of a petition in bankruptcy is involved, that the date of a preference under such an instrument becomes important. In neither Chapman v. Weiman nor Francisco v. Ryan, both cited above, was the date of the lien upon the after-acquired property of any importance. Neither was any such question involved in In re Shirley, 7 Am. B. R. 299, 112 Fed. 301, or in In re First National Bank of Canton, 14 Am. B. R. 180, 135 Fed. 66, and any reference in those cases to the effect of registration as that of a new mortgage was figurative and not intended to intimate that the lien was only of the date of registration. That the lien of an unrecorded mortgage is not of the date of recording but is as of the date of the contract for the lien, is well settled. Humphrey v. Tatman, 198 U. S. 91, 14 Am. B. R. 74; Rogers v. Page et al., 15 Am. B. R. 502, 140 Fed. Rep. 342. In case of a mortgage upon property to be acquired, as well as in the other instances above referred to, the lien is the lien contracted for by the instrument of mortgage, and there is just as much room for holding that the lien relates to the date of the contract for the lien in the one instance as in the other. There is nothing in Francisco v. Ryan which is antagonistic to this relation of the lien. Upon the contrary, the reasoning of the Ohio court is plainly in line with that of the Vermont court in Peabody v. Linden, 61 Vermont 318, and Thompson v. Fairbanks, 75 Vermont 361, 369, where it became necessary to decide the date of the lien, because in one case an insolvency statute which avoided preferences obtained within a short time before a general assignment was involved, and the other the effect of § 60a of the Bankrupt Act of 1898 avoiding preferences obtained within four months of bankruptcy."

Some decisions, however, have laid it down as a rule of general law, that the taking of possession under unrecorded instruments within the four months period will not in any event constitute a preference, if the original transaction occurred before the four months;² but those decisions were not rendered recently, and perhaps the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act, § 47 a (2), whereby the trustee is to be deemed vested with all the rights, remedies and powers of a creditor armed with process, as well as the Amendment to Bankr. Act, § 60 (b), above discussed would affect the rule laid down by them.

§ 1384¹₂. Judgments "Within Four Months" but Based upon Attachments Effected before Four Months—Not Preferences.—A preference may be accomplished, as we have seen,³ by way of a judgment or other lien by legal proceedings, but a judgment will not be a preference, of course, unless the depletion of the estate thereby occurred within the four months period; hence a judgment, even though secured within the four months, will not constitute a preference where it is based upon an attachment whose lien was secured before the four months period.⁴

Colston v. Austin Run Mining Co., 28 A. B. R. 92, 194 Fed. 929 (C. C. A. Del.): "Priority is obtained when a lien attaches, and not when it is enforced. The date of the sale is immaterial in this respect; whenever it takes place, it relates back to the date when the lien attached. The attaching creditor in the case before us, therefore, did not obtain a preference by the decree liquidating his debt."

§ 1385. Eighth Element of Preference—Transfer Must Give Creditor Greater Percentage than Other of Same Class.—The effect of the transfer or other appropriation of property must have been to give the creditor receiving it a greater percentage of his claim than some other creditor of the same class in the order of priority. Preference implies advantage of one creditor over others of the same class.⁵

Trivial Transfers.—The court sometimes will disregard an alleged preferential transfer because of its triviality. See ante, § 1279½.

Hart v. Emmerson-Brantingham Co., 30 A. B. R. 218, 203 Fed. 60 (D. C. Mo.): "To entitle him to a judgment, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to both plead and prove that the effect of the transfer complained of was to enable the defendant to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any [some] other creditor of the bankrupt of the same class. The plaintiff has properly pleaded this essential element of a voidable preference, but no evidence has been submitted to sustain the allegation."

It is obvious that if each creditor receives an equal percentage out of the insolvent fund, there can be no preference—that is precisely the equality that the bankruptcy act itself seeks to bring about. It is only because some one is getting more than his share that the bankruptcy act steps in and prohibits the preference.

Swartz v. Fourth Nat'l Bk., 8 A. B. R. 677, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The dominant purpose of the prohibition of a preference was not to benefit or injure, or to prevent the benefit or injury, of any creditor or class of creditors, but to prevent the debtor from making any disposition of his property which would prevent its equal distribution—to prevent him from doing anything which would result in the payment out of his property of a larger percentage upon any claim than others of the same class would receive. * * * The test of a preference, under the act, is the payment, out of the bankrupt's property, of a larger percentage of the creditor's claim than other creditors of the same class receive, and not the benefit or injury to the creditor preferred. Marshall v. Lamb, 5 Q. B. 115, 126, 127."

Livingston v. Heineman, 10 A. B. R. 41, 120 Fed. 786 (C. C. A. Ohio, reversing, on other grounds, In re New, 8 A. B. R. 566): "The equal distribution of the bankrupt's estate among his creditors, contemplated by the Bankruptcy Law, will not admit of one creditor receiving a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditor of the same class."

Obiter, Peterson v. Nash, 7 A. B. R. 181, 112 Fed. 311 (C. C. A. Minn.): "This provision (§ 60 [a]), it seems, does not make the transfer of property (which includes the payment of money), by an insolvent debtor, in and of itself a preference. It must be so done that the effect of the transfer will be to enable one creditor to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditor of the same class."

In re Denning, 8 A. B. R. 135, 114 Fed. 219 (D. C. Mass.): "Only that is a preference which enables a creditor to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class."

Brittain Dry Goods Co. v. Bertenshaw, 11 A. B. R. 629, 68 Kan. 734: "The theory of the national bankrupt law is to secure a distribution of the debtor's property among the creditors ratably and in proportion to their respective claims. If the insolvent debtor himself should make such distribution of his assets, the creditors receiving their equitable shares ought not to be required to restore to the trustee in bankruptcy what they have received, in order that it may be repaid to them again, less the cost of administering the trust. The end and aim of the bankrupt law is to secure payment to creditors of an equal percentage of their claims. If the insolvent person does this, we can see no reason why his creditors should contribute to pay the expenses of bankruptcy proceedings to accomplish the same result."

In re Read, 7 A. B. R. 111 (Ref N. Y.): "Under § 60, subdiv. a, the effect of a preferential transfer must be to enable any one of the bankrupts' creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class. A payment on account which fails to have this effect is not a preference, though all the other elements are present."

Painter v. Napoleon Township, 19 A. B. R. 412, 156 Fed. 289 (D. C. Ohio): "The bill does not aver that the enforcement of the transfer alleged will be to enable the board of trustees to obtain a larger percentage of its debt than any other creditor of the same class. Such an averment is essential to the statement of a cause of action. Section 60a of the Bankrupt Act as amended. 'The test of a preference, under the Act, is the payment, out of the bankrupt's property, of a larger percentage of the creditor's claim than other creditors of the same class receive.' Swartz v. Fourth Nat. Bank of St. Louis, 8 Am. B. R. 673, 117 Fed. 1, 4, 54 C. C. A. 387. To recover, the bill must allege and the proof must sustain four statutory elements constituting a preference: 'First, the insolvency of the debtor at the time the judgment was entered or the transfer made in favor of the creditor;' second, that this was done within four months of bankruptcy; third, that the effect of which was that the defendant obtained a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditor of the bankrupt of the same class; and, fourth, that the defendant or his agent had reasonable grounds to believe that it was intended by such transfer of property (or judgment) to give a preference to the defendant within the meaning of the acts of Congress relating to bankruptcy. If the trustee fails to allege any one of these claims, his bill, declaration or petition is bad on demurrer. If he fails to prove all of these elements, judgments should be entered for the defendant.' * * * The bill having failed to allege the third of the foregoing statutory requirements, the demurrer is for this reason sustained."

Thus, deposits in bank, or transfers made to a trustee, with which to pay all creditors of the same class an equal percentage, do not constitute voidable preferences,⁶ although such transfers might be voidable as constituting assignments for the benefit of creditors within four months preceding bankruptcy.

Similarly, where the creditor receiving the transfer assumes all the debtor's other debts and is a responsible party, a preference will not exist.⁷

§ 1386. If No Net Decrease of Indebtedness during Four Months, No Preference.—If there be mutual dealings within the four months, but their result does not decrease the net indebtedness to the creditor, the creditor has not received a greater percentage of his claim than some other creditor of the same class and there is no preference.⁸

§ 1387. Who Are in "Same Class."—The words "the same class" refer to the classes created by the bankruptcy act itself in prescribing the order of priority in the distribution of the general estate among creditors, as, for instance, taxes are in the first class, wages of workmen, clerks and servants are in the second class, other priorities given out of insolvent estates by state or federal laws are in the third class, and all other creditors constitute the fourth and last class. It seems clear that the classes meant are precisely the classes created by the Bankruptcy Act itself. The Act, in § 64, prescribes what debts have priority and the order of their priority.

Thus, no preference can be predicated upon the fact that an insolvent debtor has paid his taxes, state, national or municipal, for such taxes constitute a class by themselves entitled to the first place in the order of priority in bankruptcy administration, and no one can blame an insolvent debtor for doing that which the law otherwise would do for him.

Next, no preference can arise from an insolvent debtor paying all of his workmen, clerks and servants in full for their work within three months, even though thereby but a small per cent. is left for other creditors, for workmen, clerks and servants constitute a class by themselves entitled in any event to priority of payment out of the bankrupt estate; so general creditors cannot complain because the debtor paid them in full—it was not at the expense of the general creditors.

Nor do secured creditors constitute such a class, because they are not priority creditors in the true sense of the word—they are not entitled to priority of payment out of the trust funds at all; they own (of course by way of security) a definite and described part of the property in the hands of the trustee that by reason of the ownership does not belong to the trust fund at all;⁹ moreover their rights are not created by any "laws of the States or of the United States" granting priority of payments, so they cannot come within the fifth and last class of priority claimants of § 64; but their rights are created by the voluntary acts of the parties themselves; that is to say, a secured creditor is one who owns, who has the title to, certain definite property which once belonged to the estate and which by this ownership has become separated from the fund out of which, and out of which only, can priority payments be made. Therefore, payment to a secured creditor (unless perchance thereby a corresponding release of property of the debtor is obtained and the property restored to the general fund, as to which, see ante, § 1325) will constitute a preference if it operates to give him a greater percentage of his claim than some unsecured general creditor, for he is not in a separate class by himself but—so far as preferences are concerned—is in the same class with unsecured general creditors; that is to say, neither he nor they are entitled to priority of payment out of the trust fund. Otherwise, as we have seen (ante, § 1325), where there are several secured creditors, holding liens upon the same property, and that property is insufficient to pay them all, the bankrupt could pay out his estate with impunity by paying an equal percentage to each of these secured creditors and, unless the liens were thereby so reduced by the payments as to leave a surplus, there would be nothing for general creditors. It could not be claimed, except as against the last of the secured creditors in the order of priority of liens, that the deficit in the value of the security rendered the claim pro tanto unsecured, for that reasoning would invalidate only the payment upon the last claim. If, then, a payment to a secured creditor results in releasing a corresponding amount of property to the general creditors, then the payment would not amount to a preference, for it would come under the rule "fair exchange is no robbery." But a payment that would not so operate would be a preference, for general creditors would pro tanto lose part of their so-called trust fund.

The true rule is that the classes meant are the different classes of priority creditors in their order and, lastly, all other creditors.¹⁰

Swarts v. Fourth Nat'l Bk. St. L., 8 A. B. R. 673, 680, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo., reversing In re Siegel Hillman Dry Goods Co., 7 A. B. R. 351): "While it is true that the Bankrupt Act does not define the word 'class,' nor in terms state what creditors are in the same class, it creates some classes, and specifies others, and it seems to us that the meaning of the word 'class' in the act should if possible, be derived from the statute itself. Section 64, after directing the payment of certain expenses of administration, creates three classes of creditors—parties to whom taxes are owing, employees holding claims for certain wages, and those who, by the laws of the States or of the United States, are entitled to priority. Sections 56b, 57e, and 57h provide for the treatment and Indorsers held to be in different "class" from holders of undorsed notes: In re Happke and Doyle v. Milw. Nat. Bk., 8 A. B. R. 535, 116 Fed. 295 (C. C. A. Wis.), where the Circuit Court of Appeals held that the holder of an indorsed note receiving payment in full of it from the indorser but with knowledge or at least reasonable grounds for believing the money came from the bankrupts—the makers—themselves is held to be in a different class from the holder of an undorsed note.

Landlords held to belong to separate class:

In re Barrett, 6 A. B. R. 199 (Ref. N. Y.), wherein a landlord was held to belong to a class by himself. This decision was right in its results but not for the reasons stated in the opinion. The proper reason was that the payment of current rent is not the payment of a pre-existing debt but is based upon a contemporaneously arising consideration.

In re Belknap, 12 A. B. R. 326 (D. C. Penn.). Also, see obiter in Livingston v. Heineman, 10 A. B. R. 39, 120 Fed. 786 (C. C. A. disposition of claims secured by property, and of claims which have priority. The creditors who hold these various claims, and the general creditors of the estate, constitute the classes of creditors of which the Bankrupt Act treats. Now, if any one of these various classes is taken by itself and examined, it will be seen that each of the creditors in the same class always receives the same percentage upon his claim, out of the estate of the bankrupt, that every other creditor of his class receives. Where the estate is insufficient to pay the claims of different classes in full, the classes receive, out of the bankrupt estate, different percentages of their claims, but creditors of the same class receive the same percentage. The test of classification is the percentage paid upon the claims out of the estate of the bankrupt."

Livingston v. Heineman, 10 A. B. R. 42, 120 Fed. 786 (C. C. A. Ohio, reversing, on other grounds, In re New, 8 A. B. R. 566): " * * * and there are two general classes—first, those who have priority and are to be paid in full; and second, general or unsecured creditors, among whom the balance remaining after paying the creditors of the first class, is to be distributed equally, in proportion to the amount of their respective claims."

Inferentially, In re Read, 7 A. B. R. 111 (Ref. N. Y.): "Workmen, clerks, and servants constitute a distinct class of creditors, and certain conditions and privileges are attached to their claims. If, therefore, there are sufficient assets to pay all workmen, clerks or servants of the same class in full, payments on account prior to the bankruptcy are immaterial, as each creditor of that class is fully paid, and therefore there can be no preference of one over another. It would be circuitous remedy, if creditors so situated should be compelled to refund a preference and then immediately have it returned to them."

In re Belknap, 12 A. B. R. 326 (D. C. Penna.): In this case the court held that a landlord entitled to priority out of insolvent funds by State law is not in the "same class" with unsecured creditors, the court saying: "There is no other creditor of the same class, for there is but a single landlord; and, as the claim for rent had priority over the claims of the general creditors, the distress did not enable the landlord to obtain a greater percentage of his debt. The rent was entitled to be paid first out of the proceeds of the very property upon which the distress was levied, whenever it should be sold by the trustee, and therefore the distress gave no new light, but merely hastened the time of payment. When he distrains, a landlord is simply enforcing the priority which is given to him by law, and in no way gains any improper advantage over other creditors by thus converting the property into money more speedily."

In re Feuerlicht, 8 A. B. R. 550 (Ref. N. Y.): "It seems to me that the motion of the trustee in this matter cannot be allowed for the reason that this is a preferred (priority) claim, and even if a payment to a servant of a part of his wages could be called a preference, in this matter the result would simply be that the claimant would be obliged to pay back to the trustee in bankruptcy, the amount that he has received on account and then demand from the trustee as a preference for wages, the whole of the amount of his wages."

In re Flick, 5 A. B. R. 465, 105 Fed. 503 (Ref. Ohio): "A preference to a person entitled to a priority would only be considered a preference as to other creditors entitled to the same priority and not as to general creditors."

§ 1387½. Firm and Individual Creditors Belong to Different Classes.—Firm and individual creditors belong to different classes; for they each have certain rights reciprocally in the other's estate; so that, in due order of priority, firm creditors are also creditors of each individual and vice versa. Thus it is that an individual transfer to pay a firm debt may constitute individual preference, if other firm creditors (the "same class") do not get a like transfer.¹¹

§ 1388. Preferences among Priority Creditors.—Of course even in the case of payments to those entitled to priority as for instance, a workman, a preference would exist if the insolvent had paid one workman a greater percentage of his claim than the others would receive out of the estate.¹²

§ 1389. Actual Receipt of Like Percentage by Other Creditors Not Essential to Exoneration from Charge of Preference, if Enough Left.—It is not necessary that other creditors of the same class actually shall have received the same proportion in order to exonerate from the charge of preference, if enough is left to give them the same proportion.¹³

Brittain Dry Goods Co. v. Bertenshaw, 11 A. B. R. 631, 68 Kas. 734: "There was a finding that the payment to defendant below prevented the remaining creditors from securing payment of their claims from Ridgeway & Co., but, in the light of other answers of the jury, this means that the payment had the effect to prevent a payment in full to other creditors. In the case of *Pepperdine v. Bank * *  the principle was recognized that if the debtor making the payment had paid, or made provision to pay, other creditors a proportionate amount, the transaction was not a preference. It is essential to a recovery in cases of this kind that the effect of the payment was to enable one creditor to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than other creditors of the same class."

§ 1390. Modes of Proving This Element.—It has been held that proof of its being a preference over others may be established by showing that some other creditors of the same class had received nothing on account during the same period.¹⁴

In re Mayo Contracting Co., 19 A. B. R. 551, 157 Fed. 469 (D. C. Mass.): "If there is any other creditor of the same class who, by the enforcement of the transfer in question, will obtain a less percentage of his debt than the petitioner, I think that the transfer was a preference under § 60 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, and that it was none the less a preference, even though it be true that some creditors can be found who have received larger percentages through other payments made to them within the four months."

Compare, obiter, Hart v. Emmerson-Brantingham, 30 A. B. R. 218, 203 Fed. 60 (D. C. Mo.): "The evidence fails to show what assets came into the hands of the trustee, and what creditors are entitled to participate in the distribution, and hence it is impossible to determine whether the return of the defendant's goods has resulted in giving it a greater percentage of its debt than has, or will be, paid to other creditors."

Or by showing that the creditor receiving the transfer received full pay

Coder v. McPherson, 18 A. B. R. 523, 152 Fed. 951 (C. C. A. Iowa): "As Armstrong was insolvent when he gave the mortgages, their necessary effect was to enable one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than others of the same class, and they therefore created a preference under § 60a."

Or that the transfer was of all his property not exempt from execution, leaving other creditors unpaid.

Gering v. Leyda, 26 A. B. R. 137, 186 Fed. 110 (C. C. A. Neb.): "The evidence submitted in the trial court warranted the jury in concluding that the transfer of the stock of goods and open accounts to plaintiffs in error would enable them to obtain a greater percentage of their debts than other creditors of bankrupt of the same class. The evidence showed that at the time of the sale of the stock and accounts to plaintiffs in error, the bankrupt was indebted to various other creditors whose claims were unsecured and the evidence tended to show that besides the stock of merchandise and accounts, the bankrupt owned no other property that was not exempt from execution."

Obiter, Brittain Dry Goods Co. v. Bertenshaw, 11 A. B. R. 631, 68 Kas. 734: "If plaintiffs in error had received all of their claim, the payment manifestly would have been a preference, for it was clearly shown that the debtor's assets were insufficient to satisfy all they owed."

Of course, unless the debtor were insolvent the transfer could not operate to give the creditor a greater percentage.

McDonald v. Clearwater R. Co., 21 A. B. R. 182, 164 Fed. 1007 (C. C. Idaho): "Not only is there no proof of the aggregate of the lumber company's property at a fair valuation upon the date of the assignment, but the record is also silent as to the value of the bankrupt's assets at any time after the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted. That being the case, upon what basis can the court make a finding that the effect of the assignment was to enable the bank to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than other creditors of the same class?"

§ 1391. Transfer Not Necessarily to Creditor nor Agent if Benefit Accrues to Creditor.—The transfer need not be to the creditor nor to his agent, so long as the effect of it is to enable the creditor to receive out of the debtor's estate a larger percentage of his claim than others of the same class.¹⁶

§ 1392. But Either Actual Receipt or Actual Benefit Requisite.—The property must have been actually received by the creditor or the creditor have actually gotten the benefit of it in some way.¹⁷

Still another instance, Swarts v. Fourth Nat'l Bk., 8 A. B. R. 673, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. Mo.): Two debts upon promissory notes; one series of notes had two accommodation indorsers: the other had four accommodation endorsers: preferences were received on one series of notes; held the preferences must be surrendered before either claim can be allowed, for the two series of notes were in the same "class."

16. See ante, §§ 1300, 1301, 1301½, et seq.

17. Instance where not received nor benefit had: Agent himself a creditor receiving a preference, the surplus to be turned over to principal, who was also a creditor—no surplus shown to

Creditors actually receiving the fruits of a preference also are bound, although not authorizing the proceeding.¹⁸

First, an appropriation of property and depletion of the trust fund: some portion of the debtor's property must have been appropriated by the transaction to the payment of a claim;

Implies, second, an application of the property to the benefit of a creditor: The claim upon which the preferential transfer is made must have been the claim of a creditor;

Implies, third, a preceding creditor: The creditor's claim must have been a debt—a pre-existing debt;

Implies, fourth, voluntary action of the debtor: The debtor must have made a "transfer" or have "procured" or "suffered" the creditor to obtain a judgment, whose enforcement would have operated to appropriate property of the debtor;

Implies, fifth, an application of the property upon a debt.

Implies, sixth, insolvency of the debtor: The debtor must have been insolvent at the time of the transfer or other appropriation of property;

Implies, seventh, a transaction or recording within the four months preceding bankruptcy: The transfer or other appropriation of property, or at any rate the recording of it where recording is required by law, must have been made within four months before the filing of the bankruptcy petition;

Implies, eighth, an advantage to be acquired by one creditor over others of the same class: The effect of the transfer or other appropriation of property in the event it were undisturbed must have been to give the creditor receiving it a greater percentage of his claim than some other creditor of the same class.

With any of these elements lacking there is no preference; with them all existing a preference exists.¹⁹

Thus, mere knowledge of a debtor's insolvency cannot transform into a preference an act which otherwise is no preference.

In re King Co., 7 A. B. R. 619, 113 Fed. 110 (D. C. Mass.): "Bankrupt Act, § 60b, does not provide that the trustee may recover all payments received with knowledge of insolvency, but only preferences so received. This seems to be the inevitable result of Dickson v. Wyman, combined with Pirie v. Trust Co. I must hold, therefore, that knowledge of insolvency did not make a preference of acts which otherwise did not amount to a preference."

18. Stern, Falk & Co. v. Trust Co., 7 A. B. R. 305, 112 Fed. 501 (C. C. A. Ky.).

19. Eventual Adjudication of Bankruptcy, Also Necessary Element.—Of course eventual adjudication of the debtor as a bankrupt is also implied, for the special rights conferred by the bankruptcy law in regard to preferences are dependent on the debtor being adjudged bankrupt.

§ 1394. Voidable Preferences.—Now, while proof of these eight elements will establish a preference, yet, without proof of other elements, they fall short of having any practical effect, either as establishing an act of bankruptcy or a recoverable preference.²⁰

Unless proof also be made that the debtor made the transfer, or procured the judgment to be taken with intent to prefer the creditor receiving it, the proof will fall short of a preference amounting to an act of bankruptcy. Again, unless it is proved that the creditor receiving it, or his agent acting therein, had reasonable cause to believe the transfer would effect a preference then it also falls short of being proof of a voidable preference and the creditor will not be obliged to surrender the property so received by him.

Thus a preference itself has eight elements, as above noted; a preference that amounts to an act of bankruptcy as also noted has these same eight elements and one more element, namely, the debtor's intent to prefer, making nine elements in all; whilst a preference that is voidable so that the property affected by it can be recovered again for the benefit of the bankrupt estate, has the same eight elements, and also one additional element, although this additional element is not the identical additional element requisite to make the preference an act of bankruptcy.

Compare, In re Kerlin, 31 A. B. R. 12, — Fed. — (C. C. A. Ohio, reversing S. C., 30 A. B. R. 816, — Fed. —) "Distinction is urged between the preference defined by that section [§ 60] and the preference forbidden by § 3, art. 2. The difference between a transfer 'with intent to prefer' which is made an act of bankruptcy by the latter provision, and the 'preference' denounced by the former, even since the amendment of 1910, § 60 b, is, as respects the present issue, formal rather than material. True 'intent to prefer,' within the meaning of § 3, art. 2, relates to the debtor, while 'reasonable cause to believe' under § 60 b refers to the creditor; but this difference can affect only the evidence calculated to reveal the debtor's intent in the one instance and the creditor's belief in the other; for there is complete identity between the object of a preference made under the one and that received under the other."

§ 1395. Ninth Additional Element Requisite to Make Preference Voidable—Creditor Must Have Had "Reasonable Cause to Believe" Preference "Would Be Effected."—The additional element requisite to make a preference voidable is that the creditor (or his agent) receiving the preference must have received it under such circumstances as naturally would have caused the ordinary person, had he

21. Bankr. Act, § 60 (b) as amended in 1919: "If a bankrupt shall have procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against him in favor of any person or have made a transfer of any of his property, and if, at the time of the transfer, or of the entry of the judgment, or of the recording or registering of the transfer if by law recording or registration thereof is required, and being within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy or after the filing thereof and before the adjudication, the bankrupt be insolvent and the judgment or transfer then operate as a preference, and the person receiving it or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall then have reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such judgment or transfer would effect a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee and he may recover the property or its value from such person." Cullinane v. State Bk. of Waverly, 12 A. B. R. 779, 123 Iowa 340: "A finding that such was the fact—conceding insolvency—would not be sufficient of itself to defeat the lien of the mortgage. The bank must have had reasonable cause to believe not only that insolvency existed as a fact, but that a preference was intended; and this must be made to appear before the mortgage can be avoided at the suit of the trustee. This is the express provision of the Bankruptcy Act."

Levor v. Seiter, 8 A. B. R. 459 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div.): "The allegations of the complaint may be sufficient as setting forth a cause of action under § 60 of the Bankruptcy Law, but the proof failed to disclose the existence of an element necessary to the maintenance of an action under that section, namely, that the defendants had reasonable cause to believe that their debtors, by suffering a judgment to be taken against them, intended to give a preference to the defendants."

Johnson v. Anderson, 11 A. B. R. 294 (Sup. Ct. Neb.): "The trustee in bankruptcy may recover money paid by the bankrupt as a preference only when the person receiving it had reasonable ground to believe a preference was intended."

Compare, In re Eggert, 4 A. B. R. 452, 107 Fed. 735 (C. C. A. Wis.): "While, therefore, rulings under the former act are inapplicable, in a cerbefore, and the present transaction occurred since, the amendment of 1910 to § 60b, yet the element of reasonable belief of the creditor remains as a fact necessary in substance to allege."

In re Herman, 31 A. B. R. 243, 207 Fed. 594 (D. C. Iowa): "Under the section as so amended [§ 60 (b) amended June 25, 1910] if the bankrupt be in fact insolvent, it is only necessary that the person receiving the transfer, or his or her agent acting therein, shall have reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such transfer will effect a preference to render the transfer voidable by the trustee. See Alexander v. Redmond (C. C. A.), 24 A. B. R. 620, 180 Fed. 95, where it was so held by the court of appeals, 2nd circuit prior to this amendment."

Rogers v. American Halibut Co., 31 A. B. R. 576 (Mass.): "The intention of the bankrupt to confer a preference no longer need be shown, but the plaintiff under the statute as amended still has the burden of proving that the defendant when the payment was received had reasonable cause to believe its debtor was insolvent and that the enforcement of the transfer would result in diminishing the bankrupt's assets applicable for the payment of creditors of the same class."

Ogden v. Reddich, 29 A. B. R. 531, 200 Fed. 977 (D. C. Ky.): "Reasonable cause to believe that the mortgage would effect a preference was reasonable cause to believe that it would operate as a preference. Effect a preference and operate as a preference I understand to be the same thing. The requirement in terms is not that mortgagee or his agent should have reasonable cause to believe that the bankrupt was insolvent and the mortgage would effect a preference, but only that it should have reasonable cause to believe that the mortgage would effect a preference. Belief that the mortgage would effect a preference—i. e., that the property covered thereby was a greater percentage of the bankrupt's property than on a distribution thereof amongst his creditors would be received by his other creditors of the same class—necessarily involved belief that the bankrupt was insolvent, for not otherwise could the mortgagee have had such belief.

"The requirement, therefore, is not only that the bankrupt was insolvent and that the mortgage covered such greater percentage of his property, but that the defendant company, the mortgagee, had reasonable cause to believe both these things. It had such reasonable cause if it had that, the reasonable effect of having which was such a belief. To have such a thing was to know such a thing. The requirement, therefore, is that the mortgagee knew that, the reasonable effect of knowing which, was such belief. It seems to point tain sense, because of this difference in the meaning of the term 'insolvency' they do apply so far as they determine the principles of law by which it is to be ascertained whether a creditor receiving a preference had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor had not at the time, property sufficient, at a fair valuation, to pay all of his debts."

Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 152 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa): "If such a mortgage or lien creates a preference under § 60a, it is nevertheless not voidable under section 60b unless the creditor who receives it or is benefited thereby, had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give a preference by it."

Coder v. Arts, 22 A. B. R. 1, 213 U. S. 223: "Manifestly this conveyance could not be set aside under the provisions of section 60b. For, while it is true that, under the facts found, the conveyance might be deemed a preference, as a transfer of property which would have the effect of enabling one creditor to obtain a larger percentage of his debt or claim than other creditors of the same class, yet as it is distinctly found that neither the mortgagee nor his agent had any reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give a preference, the same could not be avoided under § 60b."

to acknowledge of something short of insolvency, and that the mortgage covered such greater percentage. And it would seem that, to comply therewith, it is not necessary that it appear just what the mortgagee knew. If he acted as if he so believed, the reasonable inference therefrom should be that he had the required knowledge, even though it may not appear just what that knowledge was. The burden was on the plaintiff to establish each one of these three essentials."

[Since Amendment of 1910] Ridgeway v. Kendrick, 31 A. B. R. 497, 208 Fed. 849 (C. C. A. N. J.): "We agree that no grounds exist for setting aside the mortgage to Headley. It cannot be avoided as a preference because the evidence shows clearly that Headley did not have reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended." [Manifestly the court meant, instead of the words "preference was intended" to say, "preference would be effected thereby" since the case arose subsequent to the amendment of 1910 to § 60b.]

In explicating this ninth element requisite to make the preference voidable, the following propositions will be useful:

§ 1396. Existence of Reasonable Cause, Question of Fact.—The question of the existence of the reasonable cause for so believing is a question of fact.²²

Decisions Negating Existence of "Reasonable Cause" under Act of 1867, Additionally Strong under Act of 1898.—Decisions under the Act of 1867, wherein the court has found "reasonable cause" not to have existed, are additionally strong under the present act because insolvency, formerly, consisted in the inability to meet claims as they matured, while by the present act a much broader test is prescribed. On the other hand, those which find reasonable cause existed are now weaker as precedents against the preferred creditor. Getts v. Janesville Wholesale Grocery Co., 21 A. B. R. 9, 163 Fed. 417 (D. law allows a resort to circumstances as the means of ascertaining the truth, and the rule of evidence is well settled that circumstances inconclusive if separately considered may by their joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient. Signs of insolvency were too many and too marked not to warn the president of this bank that he was getting a prohibited advantage over other creditors. The facts are so persuasive that they would have given reasonable ground for suspicion to persons far less astute and less accustomed to the ways of business in general than was the president of this bank." The adjudication of bankruptcy does not establish the existence of reasonable cause for belief on the creditor's part.²⁶

Coder v. Arts, 22 A. B. R. 1, 213 U. S. 223: "A consideration of the provisions of the bankruptcy law as to preferences and conveyances shows that there is a wide difference between the two, notwithstanding they are sometimes spoken of in such a way as to confuse the one with the other. A preference, if it have the effect prescribed in § 60, enabling one creditor to obtain a greater portion of the estate than others of the same class, is not necessarily fraudulent. Preferences are set aside when made within four months, with a view to obtaining an equal distribution of the estate, and in such cases it is only essential to show a transfer by an insolvent debtor to one who, himself or by his agent, knew of the intention to create a preference. In construing the Bankruptcy Act this distinction must be kept constantly in mind. As was said in Githens v. Shiffler, 112 Fed. 505: 'An attempt to prefer is not to be confounded with an attempt to defraud, nor a preferential transfer with a fraudulent one.' In re Maher, 144 Fed. 503-505, it was well said by the district court of Massachusetts: 'In a preferential transfer the fraud is constructive or technical, consisting in the infraction of that rule of equal distribution among all creditors which it is the policy of the law to enforce when all cannot be fully paid. In a fraudulent transfer the fraud is actual—the bankrupt has secured an advantage for himself out of what in law should belong to his creditors, and not to him.'"

Crooks v. People's Nat. Bk., 3 A. B. R. 238, 46 App. Div. N. Y. 335: "Under this statute the question of fraud does not enter; it is the result or effect of the act done that is declared against, not the manner nor method by which it is done, no matter how circuitous the method may be. If the effect of a transfer of property made within four months * * * is to enable any of the bankrupt's creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than others of the same class, then such transfer is voidable if the person receiving it or to be benefited thereby had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference."

But it is not a joinder of inconsistent causes of action to allege the transaction alternatively, as whether a preference or a fraudulent conveyance.²⁸

self actually believed.³⁰

Rogers, Trustee v. Am. Halibut Co., 31 A. B. R. 576 (Mass.): "It is unnecessary to show actual knowledge or belief by the creditor."

In re Andrews, 14 A. B. R. 247, 135 Fed. 599 (D. C. Mass.): "Hardy, whatever his actual belief, had reasonable cause to believe that Andrews was insolvent."

Pratt v. Columbia Bank, 18 A. B. R. 406, 157 Fed. 137 (D. C. N. Knowledge is not necessary, nor even belief, but only reasonable cause to believe, which is a very different thing."

And it is no defense for the creditor to prove that actually he did not so believe.³¹

Thus, the mere fact that the creditor was a young lady, unacquainted with business affairs, who did not appreciate the significance of the facts, was held to be no excuse; the real test being what deduction or inference the ordinary business man would have drawn from the same facts.

Obiter, Wright v. Sampter, 18 A. B. R. 355, 152 Fed. 196 (D. C. N. Y.): "The peculiarity of this case is that the mind to be affected is that of a confiding niece, wholly unacquainted with business knowledge, and however intelligent and prudent in matters within her own experience, incapable of comprehending the significance of business facts, which would have been more than enlightening to men of the business world. It is therefore urged by the defendants that Barbour v. Priest, 103 U. S. 293, justifies the proposition that not only must the facts exist and be sufficiently impressive to make inquiry in such minds as are catalogued in the cases above cited, but they must be sufficient to impress their significance upon the mind of the person to be affected—in this case a woman leading a life apart from the world of business. It was indeed said in the case last cited (one inducing great sympathy for the preferred creditor) that it is 'necessary to prove the existence of this reasonable cause of belief * * * in the mind of the preferred party' (p. 296). But these words must be taken in conjunction with the whole opinion, which was written in express consonance with Grant v. Bank, supra, and the phrase quoted. I take to assume in 'the preferred party' the mind of 'an ordinarily intelligent man.' It would be intolerable that the voidability of a preference should depend not upon the effect of facts admittedly or by proof known to a defendant, but upon the degree of intelligence or experience which such defendant was capable of exercising in respect thereto; such a rule would put a premium upon ignorance and encourage the assumption thereof. The rule here applicable is therefore; would an ordinarily intelligent and prudent business man have had reasonable cause to believe upon any facts known to Miss Sampter that her uncle intended to prefer herself, her sister and mother? I think not." This case is further quoted at § 1399.

Hewitt v. Boston Strawboard Co., 31 A. B. R. 652 (Mass.): "Where there is reasonable cause to believe that at the date of the transfer within the statutory period, the debtor is insolvent and payment is accepted of a debt overdue, it is immaterial whether the creditor actually believes what may have been disclosed as to the true state of affairs."

Alexander v. Redmond [before Amendment of 1910], 24 A. B. R. 620, 180 Fed. 92 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "If he has reasonable cause to believe that that person is insolvent and has also reasonable cause to believe that the effect of the transfer will be to enable the transferee to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditor of the same class, the requirements of the concluding part of § 60 are fully met."

Bardes v. First National Bank of Hawarden, 12 A. B. R. 771, 122 Iowa 443: "We concede the legal proposition contended for in behalf of defendants that a mere suspicion of financial embarrassment is not enough to charge the creditor with knowledge of insolvency. * * * But it is enough to constitute a reasonable cause to believe him insolvent that the facts and circumstances with reference to the debtor's financial condition which are brought home to the creditor are such as would put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, which, if pursued, would lead to knowledge of insolvency."

In re Eggert, 4 A. B. R. 449, 102 Fed. 735 (C. C. A. Wis., affirming 3 A. B. R. 341): "It is not essential that the creditor should have actual knowledge of, or belief in, his debtor's insolvency, but that he should have reasonable cause to believe his debtor to be insolvent; that if facts and circumstances with respect to the debtor's financial condition are brought home to him, such as would put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, the creditor is chargeable with knowledge of the facts which such inquiry should reasonably be expected to disclose."

Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. 40: "It is a general principle that every one must be presumed to intend the necessary consequences of his acts. The transfer, in any case, by a debtor, of a large portion of his property, while he is insolvent, to one creditor, without making provision for an equal distribution of its proceeds to all of his creditors, necessarily operates as a preference to him, and must be taken as conclusive evidence that a preference was intended, unless the debtor can show that he was at the time ignorant of his insolvency, and that his affairs were such that he could reasonably expect to pay all his debts. * * * The burden of proof is upon him in such case, and not upon the assignee or contestant in bankruptcy. * * * The Statute, to defeat the conveyances, does not require that the creditors should have had absolute knowledge on the point, nor even that they should, in fact, have had any belief on the subject. It only requires that they should have had reasonable cause to believe that such was the fact. And reasonable cause they must be considered to have had when such a state of facts was brought to their notice in respect to the affairs and pecuniary condition of the bankrupts as would have led prudent business men to the conclusion that they could not meet their obligations as they matured in the ordinary course of business ['insolvency' under Act of 1867]."

Sundheim v. Ridge Ave. Bk., 15 A. B. R. 132, 134, 138 Fed. 951 (D. C. Pa., affirmed sub nom. Bank v. Sundheim, 16 A. B. R. 863): "Reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give a preference does not require proof that the defendant had either actual knowledge or actual belief, but only such surrounding circumstances as would lead an ordinarily prudent business man to conclude that a preference was intended."

Ogden v. Reddish, 29 A. B. R. 531, 200 Fed. 977 (D. C. Ky.): "One may suspect, believe, or know that such a thing is so, without any interest or desire to have it otherwise; but he cannot fear that it is so without such interest or desire. These mental states are separate and distinct from each other. They do not shade off into one another. Possibly, where a creditor suspects his debtor is insolvent, he also fears that he is. At any rate, he readily passes from the one state to the other. Now, the only one of these four mental states which the statute calls for is knowledge. It does not use the word 'know,' but that which is its equivalent, to wit, 'shall have reasonable cause to believe.' Having reasonable cause to believe is knowing that the reasonable effect of knowing which is belief, or that which reasonably should cause belief. There are different degrees of knowledge which it is possible for the preferred creditor to have. He may know that the debtor is insolvent, and that the transfer to him covers a greater percentage of his property than he is entitled to, and hence that it effects a preference. Possibly this is a greater degree of knowledge than called for by the terms of the statute, but it is within its intent. For if a lesser degree of knowledge suffices, certainly the greater degree is not to be excluded. Then comes, not such knowledge, but knowledge of that the reasonable effect of knowing which is belief to that effect. This degree of knowledge is called for in so many words. Then comes knowledge of that the reasonable effect of knowing which is not such belief, but only a fear or suspicion that such is the case. Such a degree of knowledge is certainly not within the words of the statute.

"The problem I have been considering is whether it is ever possible for a case where the preferred creditor has only such a degree of knowledge to come within the statute, and, if so, on what basis does it come within it? The conviction reached has been that it is possible. If the degree of knowledge is such as to engender fear that such is the case, so strong that the preferred creditor refrains from availing himself of the means at his hand for ascertaining the truth, in order to keep himself in the dark in regard thereto, and to be in position to claim that he did not have reasonable cause to believe that the transfer to him would work a preference, the case is covered by the statute. It is brought within the statute by holding that he had constructive knowledge of what he would have ascertained, had he inquired, and the effect of constructive knowledge is the same always as actual."

The test is, What inference would the ordinarily intelligent business man draw from the facts?

Wright v. Sampter, 18 A. B. R. 355, 152 Fed. 196 (D. C. N. Y.): "The rule is equally well established that it is sufficient if the facts brought home to the person sought to be affected are such as would produce action and inquiry on the part of 'an ordinarily intelligent man' (Grant v. Bank, 97 U. S. 80); 'a prudent business man' (Bank v. Cook, 95 U. S. 343; Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. 40); 'a person of ordinary prudence and discretion' (Wager v. Hall, 16 Wall. 584); 'an ordinarily prudent man' (In re Eggert, 4 Am. B. R. 449); 'a prudent man' (Dutcher v. Wright, 94 U. S. 553)." This case further quoted at § 1398.

Coder v. McPherson, 18 A. B. R. 523, 152 Fed. 951 (C. C. A. Iowa): "Notice of facts which would incite a man of ordinary prudence to an enquiry under similar circumstances is notice of all the facts which a reasonably diligent inquiry would disclose."

Compare, In re Pfaffinger, 18 A. B. R. 807, 154 Fed. 528 (D. C. Ky.): "The test is whether the creditor who is charged with having received a voidable preference had at the time of receiving it such information as ought to have led a reasonably prudent man to the conclusion that a preference was thereby intended, and this includes, as we have seen, the necessary element of sufficient information of the affairs of the debtor as ought to lead a reasonably prudent man to the conclusion that he was then insolvent. Mere suspicion of insolvency is not sufficient, nor is mere unwillingness to trust further. Some authorities, indeed, fix a test to the effect that the creditor must be regarded as having been preferred if at the time of the transfer or payment he had information sufficient to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry, which if made and pursued would lead to a full knowledge of the debtor's condition. Such a rule must have a reasonable construction, and to make it operate justly, must relate to information of the financial condition and property of the debtor, and not merely to whether he had already borrowed from the creditor quite as much or more money than the latter thought it was best to lend to him for other and different reasons."

Thus, the resort to unusual methods of payment or securing of payment will raise an inference of belief that a preference was within the contemplation of the parties.³³

Shale v. Farmers Bank, 25 A. B. R. 888 (Kans.): "Conceding that the bank has the right to set off a depositor's account against a matured indebtedness due the bank, it appears that in this case the payment was not made by the bank applying the depositor's account to the payment, but by a check which it had required the bankrupt to give in payment of notes not due. A payment under somewhat similar circumstances was held to constitute a preference in Ridge Ave. Bank v. Sundheim, 16 A. B. R. 863, 145 Fed. 798 (C. C. A. 3d Cir.). To the same effect is Irish v. Citizens Trust Co., 21 A. B. R. 39, 163 Fed. 880 (D. C. N. Y.), where it was held that a bank cannot charge a debtor's account or receive a check in payment of note it holds, which is not yet due, without constituting a preference under the bankruptcy law. The mere statement of the cashier that he did not believe that Summerfelt was in failing circumstances did not require that the case should be submitted to the jury, in view of the undisputed facts. Proof of actual knowledge or actual belief on the part of the officers of the bank was not required. To constitute a preference it is only necessary to show that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended ["would be obtained" since amendment of 1910]."

Similarly, the taking of a mortgage or other transfer of substantially all

But compare Newman v. Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. of a debtor's property, knowing it to be such, and that other creditors existed, will constitute a preference "with reasonable cause of belief."³⁴

McElvain v. Hardesty, 22 A. B. R. 320, 169 Fed. 31 (C. C. A. Mo.): "Moreover, if McElvain did not have actual knowledge of the insolvent condition of his debtors, we think in the circumstances of this case he is constructively chargeable with that knowledge. He took a transfer of all his debtor's property—of a going concern—in satisfaction of a debt. This, in itself, was an unusual thing, and the reasons which actuated it must have sprung from a fear or suspicion of danger."

In re Virginia Hardwood Mfg. Co., 15 A. B. R. 142, 139 Fed. 209 (D. C. Ark.): "He knew that his mortgage covered so much of the assets that what was left was totally insufficient to pay the other creditors listed on the statement. If he really believed that the bankrupt had (as the statement shows) assets amounting to $104,288.80, and that he was taking practically all of it, and excluding creditors (as the statement shows) who held claims aggregating $13,518.78, he knew that he was getting security far in excess of his claim, and that the effect of it was to hinder and delay the other creditors. * * *

"The same rule is true where a single creditor, with a knowledge of the insolvency of its debtor, takes a mortgage upon substantially all of its assets with the knowledge at the time (as will appear later) that there were outstanding creditors of nearly $49,000, which was the situation in the case at bar when this mortgage was taken."

Pollock v. Jones, 10 A. B. R. 616, 124 Fed. 163 (C. C. A. S. Car.): "It is true that it is said that no good reason existed for supposing that Mr. Pollock knew of this insolvency. It is to be remarked, however, that in getting security Pollock obtained and accepted a mortgage of the entire assets of the firm. * * *

"Yet, by taking this mortgage, covering and controlling their entire stock of goods of every description in their possession, present and future, he practically made the firm at that instant insolvent to the extent, at least, of appropriating all the assets of the firm to the payment of one favored creditor, and if these be required to pay him in full, leaving nothing for other creditors."

And the request and agreement to withhold a mortgage from the records indicates such reasonable cause.³⁵

Likewise, the sale of an entire stock of merchandise is a suspicious circumstance.³⁶

Much more is the acceptance of payment out of the stock of trade where no investigation of values was had, nor any inquiry into the debtor's financial condition and almost the entire stock in trade was thus transferred.

Coleman v. Decatur Egg Case Co., 26 A. B. R. 249, 186 Fed. 136 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The proof shows that on this occasion Vail made no inquiries touching the debts or the assets of the debtor. know anything that would lead him to believe that his debtor was then insolvent, but he admits that he had suspicions.

" * * *. It was an unusual transaction for a creditor to require payment of his merchandise debts out of stock in trade of the debtor and especially so, to go to the extent of taking nearly all of it. The record also seems to disclose a purpose to avoid securing information touching the financial condition of the debtor. Sources of true information concerning it were available to the defendant at the time its president took the stock. The books were there. The debtor who was familiar with his business was there. But neither the books were asked for nor was any question put to the debtor concerning its assets or liabilities. The creditor knew or must have known that by taking practically all his stock in trade he was taking away from his debtor, the means of prosecuting his business."

It has apparently been held even that proof of current rumor and gossip is admissible.³⁷

§ 1400. Cause for Belief Simply That Preference Would Result—Debtor's Intent Immaterial.—By the Amendment of 1910 the cause for belief on the creditor's part is no longer that a preference was "intended" to be given by the bankrupt, but, rather, that a preference would be effected.³⁸

Herron Co. v. Moore, 31 A. B. R. 221, 208 Fed. 134 (C. C. A. The change effected by the Amendment of 1910 does not however affect the judicial interpretation of the phrase "Reasonable cause to believe." Pratt v. Columbia Bank, 18 A. B. R. 406, 157 Fed. 137 (D. C. N. Y.).

Decisions Ignoring Amendment.—A good many decisions have been rendered in cases arising since the Amendment of 1910 wherein the courts, apparently unmindful of the Amendment, have continued to speak of the necessity of proving the reasonable cause for belief to be reasonable cause for belief that a preference "was intended" rather than would be "effected." Instance, Newman v. Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. R. 399 (Kansas City Court of Appeals), quoted at § 1277 note; Mayer v. Palmer, 31 A. B. R. 225, 208 Fed. 97 (C. C. A. Mo.); In re Greenberger, 30 A. receiving the alleged preference payment had, at the time when it was made, reasonable cause to believe that the bankrupt was insolvent, and that in accepting and retaining the same he would receive a larger per cent of his debt than the other creditors of the same class. It is not disputed that, on the date when the payment were made to the appellant, the bankrupt was hopelessly insolvent. It is not disputed that the result of the payments was to give the appellant a greater percentage of its claim than other creditors of the same class. But it is earnestly contended that the evidence falls short of showing that, at the time of the payment of the money or the transfer of the property by the bankrupt to the appellant, the latter had reasonable cause to believe that the payment or the transfers would effect the preference prohibited by the Bankruptcy Act."

In re Harrison, 28 A. B. R. 684, 197 Fed. 320 (D. C. Pa.): "This amendment obviates the necessity of proving (1) the existence of the debtor's intent to prefer, (2) the cause for belief on the part of the creditor that a preference was intended, and (3) that the debtor knew his insolvency. The test now is, whether the person receiving the payment, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, at the time the payment was made, had reasonable cause to believe that the bankrupt was then insolvent and that in accepting and retaining said payment, he would receive a larger percentage of his debt than any other creditor of the same class."

In re Herman, 31 A. B. R. 243, 207 Fed. 594 (D. C. Iowa): "Under the section as so amended, if the bankrupt be in fact insolvent, it is only necessary that the person receiving the transfer, or his or her agent acting therein, shall have reasonable cause to believe that the enforcement of such transfer will effect a preference, to render the transfer voidable by the trustee."

Logically, it is the creditor's knowledge or belief that a preference would be effected that should be the test rather than his knowledge or belief of the debtor's intention to prefer.

Report No. 691 of Senate Judiciary Committee of the 61st Congress, Second Session.

"Further, the Amendment of 1903, making the existence of 'reasonable cause to believe' on the creditor's part a prerequisite to the trustee's right to recover the preference from him, required that this reasonable cause of belief should be that a 'preference was intended to be given,' rather than that a 'preference would be effected.' Logically, it is the creditor's knowledge or belief that a preference would be effected that should be the test, rather than his knowledge or belief of the debtor's intention to prefer."

It is the knowledge of the effect on the creditor's assets that constitutes the wrong doing.

§ 1401. Belief That Preference Would Be Effected May Be Presumed.—Belief on the creditor's part that a preference would be effected by the transaction may be presumed.

Hewitt v. Boston Strawboard Co., 31 A. B. R. 652 (Mass.): "The bankrupt and the defendant must be presumed to have known that what had been done resulted in a preference, even if the form of the transfer consisted of securities received by the bankrupt from a third party."

Before the Amendment of 1910 rendered it unnecessary to prove belief in the debtor's intent, it was nevertheless held that the belief of the existence of such intent might be presumed, and that where a creditor had reasonable grounds to believe the debtor insolvent, and where the obvious effect of the receipt of the money or other property in satisfaction of the obligation under these circumstances was to give him an advantage over other creditors, he was chargeable with notice of intention to prefer.³⁹

English v. Ross, 15 A. B. R. 374, 140 Fed. 630 (D. C. Pa.): “ * * * and, now that it has turned against him, he cannot be heard to say that he did not know he was getting a preference or that one was contemplated. Where that is the necessary result of a transaction it is conclusively presumed to have been intended.”

Obiter, [Western] Tie & Timber Co. v. Brown, 13 A. B. R. 451, 196 U. S. 502: “This conclusion, moreover, is the result of the finding that Harrison had no intention to give the tie company a preference, for if Harrison, being insolvent, to the knowledge of the company, within the prohibited period, gave to the tie company authority to collect the sums due to him by the laborers for goods sold them, with the right, or even the option to apply the money to prior debt due by Harrison to the company, the necessary result of the transaction would have been to create a voidable preference. And if the inevitable result of the transaction would have been to create such a preference, then the law would conclusively impute to Harrison the intention to bring about the result necessarily arising from the nature of the act which he did. Wilson v. City Bank, 17 Wall. 486, 21 L. Ed. 727. To give effect, therefore, to the finding that there was no intention on the part of Harrison to prefer, we must consider that the authority given by him to the tie company to collect from the laborers did not give that company the right, or endow it with the option, when it had collected, to retain the money for its exclusive benefit, and to the detriment of the other creditors of Harrison.

“The result of the facts found, then, is this: Harrison sold his goods to the laborers, and agreed with the tie company that that company, when it paid the laborers, should deduct the amount due by the laborers from the wages which the tie company owed them, and, after making the deduction, should remit to Harrison the amount thus deducted, irrespective of any indebtedness otherwise due by Harrison to the tie company. Did this give rise to a voidable preference within the intendment of § 57g and § 60b of the Bankrupt Act?

Coder v. McPherson, 18 A. B. R. 523, 152 Fed. 951 (C. C. A. Iowa): “In the face of this knowledge, it took these mortgages which, in the aggregate, covered substantially all the unexempt property the debtor owned except a few hogs and horses. The real estate was already mortgaged according to Armstrong's second statement for $147,500, and it took mortgages upon this land and a chattel mortgage upon his tools, machinery, and crops. The inevitable effect of these incumbrances was to deprive the unsecured creditors of every means of collecting their debts; for these mortgages withdrew from attachment and execution substantially all the debtor's unexempt property. The legal presumption is that parties intend the inevitable effect of their acts, and, in view of all these facts, the conclusion is irresistibly borne in upon our minds that * * * the bank * * * when it took these mortgages, had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give it a preference over other creditors of the same class."

In re Hines, 16 A. B. R. 499, 144 Fed. 142 (D. C. Pa.): "In thus monopolizing the last available asset that the debtor had to deal with, he could but know that he was getting more than his share if Hines proved insolvent, to which everything pointed. Of this he took the risk, and now that it has gone against him he cannot be heard to say that he did not know he was getting a preference, or that one was contemplated. When that is the necessary result of a transaction, it is conclusively presumed to have been intended."

And the creditor's denial of any knowledge that he was getting a preference will be unavailing.⁴⁰

English v. Ross, 15 A. B. R. 374, 140 Fed. 630 (D. C. Pa.): "Monopolizing, as he thus did, all the available assets of the bankrupt, the defendant could not but know that he was getting more than his share, if Mangan proved insolvent, to which everything pointed, and of which he was therefore affected with notice."

§ 1402. usual indicia by virtue of which a man is regarded as insolvent, and, consequently, by virtue of which a creditor may be said to have reason to believe that he is insolvent, or the reverse, become, to a very large extent, of no importance."

Thus, a transfer to secure not only a pre-existing debt, but also to secure repayment of money advanced at the time to a debtor with which to make a composition with his other creditors, has been upheld, since, though the facts were sufficient to put the transferee upon inquiry and such transferee knew that he was getting his claim secured in full whilst other creditors were getting but a percentage, yet, the facts were not sufficient, after investigation, to show that the assets were really worth less than the amount of the debts.

In re Bartlett, 22 A. B. R. 891, 172 Fed. 679 (D. C. Pa.): "The bankrupt, of course, was embarrassed, his condition being such that he had to go to his trade creditors with a compromise. But embarrassment is not always insolvency, although it suggests it, and the bank was, therefore, put on inquiry. The bank knew also that it was being secured in full, where other creditors were getting but a fraction. And while it supposed that all the indebtedness outside of its own, except that of Frederick Job, was taken care of by the compromise, it ran the chance of there being others, and, as it now turns out, the bankrupt also owed his wife and uncle. There are other considerations, however, by which the bank is blameless. It may be conceded that, except for the compromise, the bankrupt was insolvent, his indebtedness being close to $12,000, and his assets, at top figures, several hundred dollars less than that. But if he was, the bank had no idea of it. And they took pains to inform themselves. * * * The bankrupt, also, three months before that, had made a statement, showing that he was worth a good deal more than this, which to a certain extent, they had the right to rely on. And the very offer of a compromise suggested an excess of assets, without which there was no inducement for it.

And, either actual knowledge of the debtor's insolvent condition or at any rate actual knowledge of such facts as would have put the creditor on inquiry seems to be necessary.

In re Houghton Web Co., 26 A. B. R. 202, 185 Fed. 213 (D. C. Mass.): "* * * it is clear that the creditor cannot be said to have had reasonable cause to believe such a preference was intended, unless the evidence shows that it knew, or ought to have known, the substantial truth as to the bankrupt's financial condition. Actual knowledge of the facts on its part is not charged by the trustee. He contends that there are circumstances shown which put the bank upon inquiry and render it chargeable with the knowledge which would have been obtained by due inquiry."

§ 1403. Also of All Other Elements of Preference.—Merely to establish grounds which reasonably would have caused the creditor to believe the debtor insolvent is not enough.⁴³

Merely Reasonable Ground of Belief of "Insolvency" Apparently Con-

Cullinane v. State Bank, 12 A. B. R. 776, 123 Iowa 340: "The bank must have reasonable cause to believe not only that insolvency existed as a fact, but that a preference was intended."

Babbitt v. Kelly, 9 A. B. R. 338 (Mo. Ct. App.): "To invalidate a preference, the party benefited, or his agent, must have reasonable cause to believe, not that the debtor is insolvent, but that a preference is intended, the act says: that this involves knowledge by the preferred creditor or his agent, or reasonable cause to believe, that the debtor is insolvent at the time of the alleged preferential act, for the essence of a preference denounced by the Bankrupt Law is that it is given by an insolvent debtor."

Contra, In re Andrews, 14 A. B. R. 247, 135 Fed. 599 (D. C. Mass.): "If the debtor is insolvent, he intends preference by any payment of a pre-existing debt. If the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that the debtor is insolvent then the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that a preference is intended."

The proof must also show reasonable grounds for believing that the other seven elements of a preference existed, namely, that the debtor had made a "transfer" of his property, or suffered a judgment to be taken, etc., that the effect thereof would be to give one creditor a greater percentage of his debt than some other of the same class, etc., etc.⁴⁴

sidered Sufficient.—Many of the reported decisions seem to imply, that the reasonable ground of belief to be proved is merely as to the debtor's insolvency. In re Virginia Hardwood Mfg. Co., 15 A. B. R. 135, 139 Fed. 209 (D. C. Ark.); Johnson v. Anderson, 11 A. B. R. 294 (Neb.).

In re Andrews, 14 A. B. R. 247, 135 Fed. 599 (D. C. Mass., reversed, on this point, in 16 A. B. R. 391): "If the debtor is insolvent he intends preference by any payment of a pre-existing debt. If the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that the debtor is insolvent, then the creditor has reasonable cause to believe a preference is intended.

Suffel v. Nat'l Bk., 16 A. B. R. 259, 106 N. W. (Wis.) 837; In re Beerman, 7 A. B. R. 431, 112 Fed. 663 (D. C. Ga.); In re King, 7 A. B. R. 619, 113 Fed. 110 (D. C. Mass.).

And one case even holds that the petition must allege that the creditor had reasonable grounds for belief not only that a preference was intended but also that the debtor was insolvent. Hicks v. Langhorst, 6 A. B. R. 178 (Com. Pleas Ohio), and note.

This is incorrect: reasonable grounds for belief that a preference was intended, includes reasonable ground for belief that the debtor was insolvent. Savings Bank v. Jewelry Co., 12 A. B. R. 781, 123 Iowa 432.

In re Eggert, 3 A. B. R. 541, 98 Fed. 843 (affirmed in 4 A. B. R. 449, 102 Fed. 735, D. C. Wis.): "To constitute a voidable preference, as defined in §§ 60a, 60b, the creditor must have reasonable cause to believe the debtor to be insolvent in fact, as the foundation for reasonable cause to believe that an unlawful preference is intended;" hence the latter allegation is superfluous, although as evidence it is admissible.

Some few cover the entire field, however. See Johnson v. Anderson, 11 A. B. R. 294 (Sup. Ct. Neb.); compare, Baden v. Bertenshaw, 11 A. B. R. 308, 68 Kans. 32.

Compare, also, In re Goodhile, 12 A. B. R. 374, 130 Fed. 471 (D. C. Iowa): "Under the present law, this decision of the Supreme Court (Merchants' Bank v. Cook, 95 U. S. 342) would require that the condition of the debtor's affairs must be known to be such that prudent business men would conclude that the aggregate of the debtor's property at a fair valuation, was not sufficient to pay his debts' before there is reasonable cause to believe the debtor is insolvent and that a preference would therefore be the result of a payment while in such condition."

Thus, the preferred creditor must be proved to have had reasonable cause to believe a greater per cent would be obtained thereby by him than other creditors would receive.⁴⁵

For instance, where a debtor pays some creditors under a settlement made with all, but has not enough to pay the others, it must be proved that the creditors who were paid had reasonable ground for believing the debtor would be unable to pay all alike.⁴⁶

§ 1404. Burden of Proof.—The burden of proof of the existence of the reasonable cause of belief is on the trustee,⁴⁷ as well as of each element of the preference.⁴⁸ But where the transfer complained of was made to a relative, that fact is important in determining whether the burden has been sustained.⁴⁹

§ 1405. Mere Cause to Suspect Debtor's Insolvency Not Enough.—Merely because some cause to suspect insolvency of the debtor exists is not enough: there must be such a knowledge of facts as would induce a reasonable belief in the ordinary man that a preference would result [formerly, that the debtor "intended" to give a preference.]⁵⁰

Grant v. National Bank, 97 U. S. 80: "It is not enough that some creditor has some cause to suspect the insolvency of his debtor, but he must have such a knowledge of facts as to induce a reasonable belief of his debtor's insolvency, in order to invalidate a security taken for his debt. To make mere suspicion a ground of nullity in such a case would render the business transactions of the community altogether too insecure. It was never the intention of the framers of the act to establish any such rule. A man may have many grounds of suspicion that his debtor is in failing circumstances and yet have no cause for a well grounded belief of the fact. He may be unwilling to trust him further; he may feel anxious about his claims, and have a strong desire to secure it; and yet such belief as the act requires may be wanting. Obtaining additional security or receiving payment of a debt under such circumstances is not prohibited by law. Receiving payment is put in the same category in the section referred to as receiving security. Hundreds of men constantly continue to make payments up to the very eve of their failure, which it would be very unjust and disastrous to set aside. And yet this could be done in a large proportion of cases if mere grounds of suspicion of their insolvency were sufficient for the purpose."

Stucky v. Masonic Savings Bank, 108 U. S. 74: "A creditor dealing with a debtor whom he may suspect to be in insolvent circumstances, but of which he may not have sufficient evidence, may receive payments without violating the bankruptcy law. He may be unwilling to trust him further; he may be anxious about his claim, and desire to secure it; but such relief as the Act requires may be wanting. Additional security and receiving payments under such circumstances are not prohibited by law."

In re Goodhile, 12 A. B. R. 374, 130 Fed. 471 (D. C. Iowa): "No doubt they were desirous of obtaining what was due them, and they may have had suspicions that she was embarrassed or might be insolvent but that is not enough."

And circumstances may seem suspicious after the bankruptcy occurs, that would not have appeared unusual at the time of their occurrence, and would then have presented no "reasonable cause" on which to found a belief of preference.⁵¹

(C. C. A. Mo.): "Suspicion, fear, and facts that arouse suspicion and fear in the mind of the creditor, but give no reasonable ground for him to believe that the debtor intends a preference by his payment or security, do not make such a preference voidable."

Newman v. Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. R. 399 (Kansas City Court of Appeals): "Judicial expressions on the subject of what will and what will not constitute constructive knowledge emphasize the distinction between notice of facts and circumstances which would incite a man of ordinary prudence to an inquiry under similar circumstances and notice of circumstances that would merely excite suspicion. The former is equivalent to notice of all the facts which a reasonably diligent inquiry would disclose (Coder v. McPherson (C. C. A., 8th Cir. O.), 18 Am. B. R. 523, 152 Fed. 951, 82 C. C. A. 99.) while the latter is deemed insufficient to constitute reasonable cause to believe that a preference is intended, and will not put the creditor upon inquiry. * * *

"Turning to the circumstances in evidence, we find nothing in them to contradict the testimony of the credit man to the effect that, when he received the information that Curtis had sold out, he believed, and had cause to believe, that Curtis was solvent. He had before him a recent, written statement from Curtis which showed his net worth to be over $5,000, and on the strength of that statement had just shipped a large quantity of goods to him on credit. Actions speak louder than words, and it would be impossible to think that defendant would have been willing to send goods of such value to a merchant of whose solvency it had even a doubt or suspicion, or to cause defendant to take any other step than that of sending out an agent to obtain a satisfactory settlement of its claim. It is quite an ordinary occurrence for an honest and solvent merchant to sell his business, and it is usual for creditors to regard and treat such an act as calling upon him for the immediate payment of his debts. Diligence of a creditor in such case cannot be construed as evidence of a belief or even of a suspicion that his debtor might be insolvent. The only thing that the credit man knew was that a customer he believed to be solvent had sold out, and that a satisfactory settlement of his indebtedness was in order, and should be effected with usual business celerity.

"The inference is reasonable and in fact very strong that the adjuster made the settlement in ignorance of the fact of Curtis' insolvency, and that he pursued the usual course of investigation and inquiry. He made inquiries of Curtis, the banker, the purchaser, and others, and what he heard from these various sources tended to corroborate the statement of Curtis that he had paid his other debts and had remaining available assets amounting to almost $1000 in excess of his liabilities to defendant. Should we say, as a matter of law, that he should have made other investigations and inquiries? We think not, and hold that the question of whether or not he received notice of circumstances that would have incited a man of ordinary prudence to further inquiry is shown by all the evidence to involve an issue of fact for the jury to solve." [But the facts in this case would seem to have warranted a different verdict by the jury.]

§ 1406. Mere Giving of Unusual Security Insufficient.—Thus merely the giving of unusual security—as, for instance, the depositing with the creditor of certain book accounts as security—is not sufficient in and of itself.⁵² But agreeing to the stipulation that a mortgage is to be kept off the records is indicative of reasonable cause.

⁵². Laundy v. First Nat'l Bk., 11 A. B. R. 223 (Sup. Ct. Kans.). And compare. In re Andrews, 16 A. B. R. 391 (C. C. A. Mass.); McDonald v. Clearwater R. Co., 21 A. B. R. 182, 164 Fed. 1007 (U. S. C. C.).

Rogers v. Page, 15 A. B. R. 505, 149 Fed. 194 (C. C. A. Tenn.): "That he should agree not to record the instrument then taken until he should deem it necessary for his own protection is significant of his knowledge of his brother's condition and of the effect upon his credit if recorded. The very fact that after carrying his brother for years he should demand the immediate payment of his entire debt out of the proceeds of the sale of this land, and his exoneration from liability as surety by the payment of every debt upon which he was bound, admits of but one explanation in the light of this evidence, and that is that he knew his brother was insolvent, and that, if he was not thus preferred, he would lose a large part of his debt."

Likewise, the deeding of each partner's private residence to their importunate creditor, has been held sufficient to indicate the existence of reasonable cause, even though the firm claimed to have large outstanding accounts due them on building contracts, which they were unable to collect.⁵³ But the giving of unusual security, along with other facts, may indicate existence of the reasonable cause.⁵⁴

So, the giving of a mortgage as security for payment of a loan for which the mortgagee held the bankrupt's note will be deemed to be a preference where it appears that the bankrupt was in financial straits and that that fact was known to the mortgagee.⁵⁵

§ 1407. Mere Nonpayment of Claim Long Past Due, or Frequent Duns or Broken Promises, Not Sufficient.—Neither the mere nonpayment of the particular creditor's claim nor the fact that most of the indebtedness to the creditor is past due at the time of the payment on account and that the creditor has been urging payment and the debtor repeatedly promising it, is in itself sufficient cause for drawing the inference.⁵⁶

In re Goodhile, 12 A. B. R. 374, 130 Fed. 471 (D. C. Iowa): "It is true that most of the bankrupt's account with Wyman, Partridge & Co. was past due at the time of these payments, and that the company was urging payment, but that is not sufficient to charge it with reasonable cause to believe that she was insolvent. Neither is the fact that the check was dated ahead, if that were true; and, under the testimony submitted, it was not. Such facts would only show that the debtor was unable to meet payments promptly, and that is not insolvency, under the present bankruptcy law."

In re Wolf Co., 21 A. B. R. 73, 164 Fed. 448 (D. C. Pa., affirmed sub nom. Sharpe v. Allender, 22 A. B. R. 431, 170 Fed. 589 (C. C. He was if the company was insolvent, but not, if it was not; and the case turns therefore on whether the signs of insolvency were such as to put him on inquiry.

affecting him with whatever inquiry would have discovered. It is not easy to decide, much less to point out in advance, what will amount to notice, each case standing pretty much on its own bottom. Mere financial embarrassment is not always enough, although it usually will be. The law differs somewhat in this respect from what it was formerly, owing to the different meaning given to insolvency, which, under the Act of 1867, existed if the debtor was not in a condition to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business (Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. 40), but not now, unless the aggregate of his property is insufficient to meet his obligations. In the present instance, the Wolf Co. was embarrassed, and as we now know, insolvent. * * * It was plain, of course, that the Wolf Co. was in embarrassed circumstances. Its debts were known to be large, its operations extended, and some of them at least unprofitable, and new capital was needed to carry on the business. The proposed reorganization had also failed at least with the existing syndicate, and the money advanced by them had got to be repaid shortly. But, on the other hand, it did not follow from any or all of this, that the company was insolvent in the sense that its assets were not sufficient at a fair valuation to satisfy its obligations. If its debts were large, so was its plant and its business, its machinery being sold all over the United States and even as far as Japan and China. In the proposed reorganization, preferred stock to the amount of $400,000 was to be issued, and a like amount of common, the syndicate who were to finance the operation putting up $150,000 to take care of the outstanding bonds and getting $180,000 of each kind of stock, W. G. Wolf on his part receiving $170,000 of each, leaving $50,000 of each in the treasury. If figures of this magnitude were at all justified as they apparently were in the contemplation of the parties it was hardly suggestive of insolvency. * * * The idea that Allender could go to the books is not to be thought of. Neither could he expect to get access to the report of the experts if it had been asked for. It is not intimate and inaccessible information such as this, that a creditor is bound by, but that which is open to observation and will yield to reasonable inquiry, where it has not been expressly brought home to him. No doubt in the present instance, Allender was anxious over his debt, and pressed for its payment, and may have expressed apprehension with regard to it. But this is not to be carried too far, nor made to operate too strongly against him, particularly in view of the assurances which he had received from those best calculated to know on which he had a right to rely, to the contrary."

At least such fact is not sufficient to authorize a court to find reasonable grounds for belief to be established as a matter of law,⁵⁷ but may be evidence tending to show reasonable cause for belief.⁵⁸

§ 1408. Receiving Payment before Due.—The mere receiving of payment of a debt before it is due is not, in itself, proof of the existence of "reasonable cause to believe."

Sparker v. Marsh, 24 A. B. R. 280, 177 Fed. 739 (D. C. Ark.): "Great stress is laid on the fact that the payments to the bank and the defendant were made before the maturity of the notes. There is no evidence whatever to show that when the defendants received payment that they had any knowledge of the fact that the bank had been paid, but, even had they been advised of that fact, that alone would not have justified a finding that they had reasonable cause to believe the payment was intended as a preference. When White had the money to pay these debts, what would be more natural than that he should do so, especially, if by paying the note held by the defendants he saved the accumulated interest amounting to over $50?"

However, such receiving of payment in advance under certain circumstances and taken in conjunction with other facts may be evidence of the existence of a reasonable cause for belief.⁵⁹ (Dissenting opinion) Powell v. Gate City Bank, 24 A. B. R. 316, 178 Fed. 609 (C. C. A. Mo.): "I shall not attempt an analysis of the proof. It manifestly created grave suspicion in the minds of the majority touching the good faith of the bank, but I think it went further. It is not very material whether the notes held by the bank were on their face payable in 90 days as claimed by the trustee, or whether they were on their face payable on demand as claimed by the bank. The fact is unquestionable that they were discounted for 90 days. The bank collected the interest on them in advance for that period of time. It entered them in its books as payable at the expiration of 90 days only. I cannot avoid the conclusion that whatever, the writing said, the parties, both the Humes Company and the bank, actually understood that the notes were not to be paid until the expiration of 90 days after their several dates. That time had not expired as to any of the notes on June 24th. The sudden call for their payment contrary to the understanding indicates something to my mind. Intelligent people generally act with a motive and for a purpose, and this is particularly true I think with respect to bank officials. They are anxious to loan their money at profitable rates of interest to responsible parties; and to keep it loaned, up to the full permissible legal limit. They are also especially keen and quick to follow up suspicion which points to probable loss. This, it is conceded, had been aroused in this case. With this condition of things as a background it is difficult to conceive why the Gate City Bank should have required the Humes Company to pay off a loan in advance of its actual maturity, especially so when it necessitated the refunding of money already collected by way of discount, unless it believed it would be dangerous to leave its money with the company longer.

"It will avail nothing to discuss the testimony further. Suffice it to say that in my opinion all the facts and circumstances surrounding the payment of the money to the bank pointed strongly one way, and were entirely sufficient to lead an ordinary prudent business man to conclude that a preference was intended. Such being the case, the bank under all the authorities had reasonable cause to believe the Humes Company intended to give it a preference by such payment."

§ 1409. Failure to Investigate No Excuse Where Facts Sufficient to Put on Inquiry.—Failure actually to investigate will not excuse where the creditor's information was sufficient to have put the ordinary business man upon inquiry.⁶⁰

In re McDonald & Sons, 24 A. B. R. 446, 178 Fed. 487 (D. C. S. Car.): "Actual knowledge is not made the criterion of proof in such cases, nor is it necessary that it should appear that the bank actually believed that the mortgagor was insolvent, but the true inquiry is whether Mr. Mullins, as president of the bank, a lawyer, and business man of ordinary prudence, sagacity, and discretion, had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, in view of all the facts and circumstances, and, as it appears that the debtor was in fact insolvent, it seems to me clear that the circumstances were such as would put a person of ordinary prudence and discretion upon inquiry, and that it was his duty to make all such reasonable inquiry, and that there were such means of knowledge as would have enabled him to ascertain the true state of the case. A creditor, under these circumstances, is required to exercise ordinary prudence, and, if they failed to investigate, they are chargeable with all the knowledge which it is reasonable to suppose they would have acquired if they had performed their duty in that regard. Positive proof of collusion between debtor and creditor, by which one may be preferred, is not generally to be expected, and for that reason, among others, the law allows a resort to circumstances as the means of ascertaining the truth, and the rule of evidence is well settled that circumstances inconclusive if separately considered may by their joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient. Signs of insolvency were too many and too marked not to warn the president of this bank that he was getting a prohibited advantage over other creditors. The facts are so persuasive that they would have given reasonable ground for suspicion to persons far less astute and less accustomed to the ways of business in general than was the president of this bank. The unusual nature of the transaction, in connection with all the circumstances, raises such a presumption that it can only be overcome by proof on the part of the preferred creditor that he took the proper steps to find out the pecuniary condition of the debtor. Mr. Mullins has not testified in the case, nor has anyone in behalf of the bank testified as to its knowledge of the pecuniary condition of the bankrupts, or that they made any inquiries concerning it."

Collett v. Bronx Nat. Bank, 29 A. B. R. 454, 200 Fed. 111 (D. C. N. Y.): "Here the bankrupt at the time of giving a preference was confined in jail, and, probably fearing prosecution on a charge of converting a sum of money left with him for deposit in the bank, hastened to make restitution through the instrumentality of the cashier, his debtor, by satisfying the promissory notes which the bank held against him. Various officers of the bank knew of his dilemma. The cashier had full information regarding the accusation, and was probably aware of the bankrupt's financial condition. In any event, it appears that, in obedience to a telephone message from the bankrupt after his apprehension, the cashier discharged his obligations to the former by complying with his request to pay to the bank the amount owed by the cashier to the bankrupt.

"Under such circumstances, the defendant must be deemed to have had reasonable cause to believe that it was receiving a preference. The debt was paid under circumstances which put it upon inquiry and prompted investigation of the bankrupt's financial condition and the intention with which the indebtedness was satisfied. In re McDonald (D. C., S. C.), 24 Am. B. R. 446, 178 Fed. 487; In re Leader (D. C., Ark.), 26 Am. B. R. 668, 190 Fed. 624. Nothing was done by either the bank or its officers towards making an investigation, and the presumption is warranted that by the payment to the bank of its indebtedness against the bankrupt a preference was intended, and that the defendant had reasonable cause to believe such was the intention."

Hewitt v. Boston Strawboard Co., 31 A. B. R. 652 (Mass.): "If he prefers to draw inferences favorable to himself, and to ignore information which would have led to knowledge that his debtor was in failing circumstances, he can not set up his own judgment to the contrary, even if honestly entertained, as a reason why he should be permitted to retain a prohibited advantage."

In re Herman, 31 A. B. R. 243, 207 Fed. 594 (D. C. Iowa): "The fact that no part of the prior loan had been paid, though it was then nine months past due, with the request for an additional loan of $500 to carry him over until fall, was sufficient to put her as a reasonably prudent person upon inquiry as to his then financial condition; and she was then chargeable with all the information that such an inquiry would have disclosed. If such inquiry had then been made, there can be no doubt that it would have disclosed that the bankrupt was hopelessly insolvent, that he was being pressed by the bank for the payment of its debt, that he was unable to do so, and that the mortgage was intended as a preference to Mrs. Crocker over the bank and other creditors of the bankrupt.

"Again, Mrs. Herman acted for her mother in requiring the promise that a mortgage should be given by the bankrupt when the last loan was made (if it was made) and when the mortgage was recorded it was delivered to her to be forwarded to her mother. To hold that she had no reasonable grounds to believe, when she so received and forwarded the mortgage, that it was intended as a preference to her mother, would be to disregard the testimony and sanction a deliberate violation of the Bankruptcy Act."

Lazarus v. Egan, 30 A. B. R. 287, 206 Fed. 518 (D. C. Pa.): "I can not excuse the conduct of Eagan because of the advice of counsel, representing as well the bankrupt. The facts necessary to disclose the bankrupt's true financial situation were within his own reach and I can not be made to believe that he having lived across the street in a small town, known the bankrupt for many years, and a director of the bank in which he was endorser and kept his accounts, was ignorant of them. If he was, he remained so willingly, and the law will not let him profit."

In re Dorr, 28 A. B. R. 505, 196 Fed. 292 (C. C. A. Cal.): "It is true that the mere fact that the bankrupt had no money on deposit at Los Angeles was no indication that he was unable to meet his obligations, for the money might well have been on deposit in one or more of the many other banks in which he carried his accounts. But the fact, if such had been the fact, that the money was deposited in other banks, would not have prevented its immediate transfer to Los Angeles, for the evidence shows, and it is not disputed, that this could have been done 'by wire instantly.' Another fact is that when, on July 7th, the appellant was informed that the money could not be paid him, he still demanded checks for the full sum of $40,000, and on the following day, when he found that the bankrupt could pay him but $14,000, he demanded and received a further check for $26,000, although he knew that the check was drawn on a bank in which there were no funds available for its payment, and that on the following day he would have to return that check and receive others in lieu thereof. In short, he was advised of the desperate financial straits of the bankrupt, and we would not be justified in holding that the referee and the court below erred in holding that he was put upon inquiry to ascertain whether or not the bankrupt was solvent."

Rogers v. Page, 15 A. B. R. 505 (C. C. A. Tenn.): "Thos. Merriam was aware of his brother's condition at the time he bought the land here involved or of such suspicious facts as to charge him with inquiry and notice of such facts as he might have learned by inquiry conducted in good faith."

McElvain v. Hardesty, 22 A. B. R. 320, 169 Fed. 31 (C. C. A. Mo.): "Moreover, if McElvain did not have actual knowledge of the insolvent condition of his debtors, we think in the circumstances of this case he is constructively chargeable with that knowledge. He took a transfer of all his debtors' property—of a going concern—in satisfaction of a debt. This in itself was an unusual thing, and the reasons which actuated it must have sprung from a fear or suspicion of danger. Solvent and prosperous business houses do not commonly pay debts that way. He knew of his own dishonored notes. He knew that his debtors could not have carried on active business for seven months and thereby make enough to pay over $2,600 upon his own indebtedness, assumed by them, without purchasing supplies. These facts and many others disclosed by the record were sufficient to put him as an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry as to his debtor's solvency and to charge him with all the knowledge he could have acquired by the exercise of reasonable diligence."

Plate Glass Co. v. Edwards, 17 A. B. R. 447, 148 Fed. 377 (C. C. A. Iowa): "He testified to efforts to ascertain the bankrupt's financial condition, whether he owed certain parties, and that he relied on the information obtained, but he ignored other sources of information which were at hand and were so obvious and so much more accurate and reliable that in view of the undisputed facts of the case intentional avoidance is suggested."

In re Nassau, 14 A. B. R. 828, 140 Fed. 912 (D. C. Pa.): "The circumstances accompanying the transaction were such as to put the mortgagee's agent upon inquiry, and it can scarcely be doubted that very slight investigation would have led to knowledge of the bankrupt's financial condition."

Brewster v. Goff Lumber Co., 21 A. B. R. 106, 164 Fed. 124 (D. C. Pa.): "But the trustee must go further, to make out a case, and show that the Goffs had reasonable cause to believe that they were getting a preference; and this depends on whether they might or ought to have known, that Moore & Son were insolvent, as to which they were affected with whatever put them on inquiry and would lead to a disclosure, actual knowledge not being required."

Coder v. McPherson, 18 A. B. R. 523, 152 Fed. 951 (C. C. A. Iowa): "Notice of facts which would incite a man of ordinary prudence to an inquiry under similar circumstances is notice of all the facts which a reasonably diligent inquiry would disclose. The bank knew that Armstrong had stated that he owed only $36,000 in December, 1903, that he had given a mortgage to Arts for $98,503.32 in May, 1904, and that he had stated on June 13, 1904, that he owed $147,500 secured by mortgages upon his lands and $47,900 that was unsecured. According to these two statements which he had given to the bank, his indebtedness had increased $159,400 between December 24, 1903, and June 13, 1904, and his assets less than $9,000. Two such statements would inevitably incite the ordinary creditor to inquire what had become of the $150,000 which the increased indebtedness indicated that the debtor had received and had not added to his property during these six months, and such an inquest would have developed the fact at once that Armstrong's statements were not true."

Thus, careful abstinence from making inquiries as to financial condition, when the transfer, which itself is out of the ordinary course of trade, is made, will tend to prove cause for belief.⁶¹ And if the debtor is known to be insolvent it would seem the creditor is bound to exercise ordinary prudence and diligence to ascertain whether or not such insolvent can make a transfer that will not be in violation of the Bankruptcy Act;⁶² and, under such circumstances, if the transfer is out of the usual and ordinary course of trade, it will tend to negative good faith.⁶³

But the rule charging the creditor with knowledge must have a reasonable construction, and to make it operate justly must relate to information concerning the financial condition and property of the debtor.⁶⁴ But it has been held, though the ruling is doubtful and the opposite rule, if anything, more reasonable, that a higher degree of proof is requisite than in cases of fraudulent conveyances.

Suffel v. Nat'l Bk., 16 A. B. R. 262, 106 N. W. (Wis.) 837: "The obvious meaning of this language when construed in connection with the other findings mentioned, is that the court held, as a matter of law, that the present Bankrupt Act does not require the same diligence of creditors concerning preferential payments, that is required of grantees in cases of fraudulent conveyances; and hence, that the facts known to the cashier at the time of receiving the payment, though sufficient to produce in his mind a doubt or suspicion of Dickinson's solvency, yet that they were insufficient to prove that the cashier had at the time reasonable cause to believe that Dickinson was then insolvent or that in making such payment he intended to give a preference to the defendant. This is in harmony with the conclusion of the lengthy opinion of the trial judge, where he said, in effect, that the point to be decided was somewhat difficult, but a considerable reflection had led him to the conclusion that the knowledge of facts and circumstances possessed by the cashier, were well calculated to produce a doubt or raise a suspicion in the mind of an ordinarily intelligent man, as to Dickinson's solvency, but not such as was calculated to produce a belief of it; and as that was essential to the plaintiff's cause of action, he could not recover."

And higher, even, than under the old law of 1867, where insolvency had a different meaning, and consequently, also, reasonable cause for belief of a preference had a different meaning.⁶⁵

The doctrine that the creditor is chargeable with such facts as he would have discovered by investigation where the facts actually known to him were sufficient to put him on inquiry is rejected in some cases.⁶⁶

Where facts are sufficient to put a creditor on inquiry, yet if thereupon such creditor does properly make inquiry and fails to ascertain facts that would indicate a deficiency of assets to meet obligations, it would seem that then the creditor is excused.⁶⁷

Where a debtor has not enough money to carry out a settlement made on an equal percentage with all creditors, it is exacting too great a diligence to require the creditors receiving their shares to investigate the ability of the debtor to pay the others their respective shares likewise.⁶⁸

§ 1410. Date of Recording, Date for Existence of Reasonable Cause of Belief.—Even before the Amendment of 1910, if since the Amendment of 1903, it was probably the true rule that in cases where the transfer was effected by an instrument requiring record by State law to make it effective as against levying creditors, the date of such recording was the date at which the existence of such reasonable cause for belief was to be proved, such being the date of the effective transfer as against other creditors.⁶⁹

The evidence of two witnesses, including Carter, one of the firm, strongly tends to show that McElvain had full knowledge of the hopelessly insolvent financial condition of the firm when he recorded the agreement and took possession of the saloon."

Amendment of 1910.—But by the Amendment of 1910 to Bankr. Act § 60 (b) the question has been put at rest: the date of the recording is the date at which the "reasonable cause" must be proved to have existed.⁷⁰

§ 1411. Cause for Belief Not Necessarily That of Person Receiving—May Be That of Person Benefited.—The reasonable cause for belief need not be on the part of the one actually receiving the preference, but may be either on the part of the one actually receiving it, or on the part of the one benefited by the preference.⁷¹ This rule is particularly applicable to indorsers, etc., upon commercial paper.⁷²

§ 1411½. As, for Instance, Endorsers and Others Secondarily Liable.—Reasonable cause for belief on the part of an endorser or other person secondarily liable is sufficient to charge endorser or other person with the receipt of a voidable preference even though the actual transfer was made to the holder.⁷³

And, of course, where the recovery sought is from the person benefited then the person benefited must be proved to have had the reasonable cause of belief; as, for example, where recovery is sought from an accommodation endorser for the bankrupt, it is essential to prove the existence of the reasonable cause of belief on the part of the endorser.⁷⁴

Hewitt v. Boston Strawboard Co., 31 A. B. R. 652, 214 Mass. 260: "By the express words of the Amendatory act which are merely declaratory of the rule of law that knowledge possessed by an agent may be imputed to his principal, the defendant is bound by the information obtained by the attorney who made the attachment, and acted for it in effecting the settlement."

Collett v. Bronx National Bank, 30 A. B. R. 599, 205 Fed. 370 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "We think that the knowledge which Kolbe, as cashier of the defendant, had November 16th, viz, that Belling had borrowed money on a forged certificate of the bank's stock and was unwilling to make any explanation, was imputable to the bank, and that it constituted reasonable cause to believe that Belling was insolvent. Such an act, and such conduct following it, are the clearest evidence of ruin and desperation. When, on the next day, Kolbe, at Belling's request, applied $1,250 of his indebtedness to Belling on account of Belling's indebtedness to the bank, it followed that the bank had reasonable cause to believe that such payment would give it a preference."

Thus, where a bank receives a note for collection and acts as a mere conduit through which a direct connection is made with the owner or collector, a privity exists, and the collecting bank will be deemed to be the agent of the owner, so that the owner will be chargeable with knowledge of such facts as were known to his collector. On the other hand, however, if the collecting bank acts as an independent contractor in making the collection, no privity exists between it and the owner; nor, in such case, will the owner be chargeable with knowledge of facts known to the collecting bank.⁷⁶

Babbit v. Kelly, 9 A. B. R. 335 (Court of App. at St. Louis, 70 S. W. 384): "Knowledge by an agent of a creditor, or the agent's reasonable cause to believe, that a debtor is insolvent when he does a preferential act in favor of the agent's principal, affects the latter."

§ 1413. Except When Agent Acting for Own Interest.—But, of course, the knowledge of the agent is not the knowledge of the principal when the agent is acting in his own interest.⁷⁸

Obiter, Rogers v. American Halibut Company, 31 A. B. R. 576 (Mass. Sup. Jud. Court): "By § 60b, knowledge possessed by his agent binds the creditor, but this provision is to be taken with the qualification that where the agent is acting in furtherance of his own adverse interest or fraudulently his principal is not bound."

At least, when he is acting solely in his own interest; or when he had acquired the knowledge while acting as attorney for the bankrupt.

And it has been held that where a creditor's attorney has, later, been employed by the bankrupts and, on the morning of the day on which they file their petition and schedules in bankruptcy, receives collection of the creditor's claim in full and straightway turns it over to his client, the attorney himself, in the absence of fraud, may not be charged with the amount, but the trustee must pursue the client.⁷⁹

In re Martin & Co., 29 A. B. R. 705, 167 Fed. 236 (D. C. N. Y.): "The theory of the special commissioner is that, Mr. Turk being aware of the bankrupts' financial condition when he made the payment, it should therefore be regarded as a nullity, and he should be required to pay the money involved into the estate. The theory of Mr. Turk is that he merely acted as agent in the matter, and if there is to be any recovery of the money, recourse to Mr. Paris, the principal, should be had. I think the contention of Mr. Turk should be sustained. No doubt the knowledge which an agent obtains is, under ordinary circumstances, often imputable to his principal, but a somewhat different rule applies where the relations of attorney and client are involved and there is no question of fraud. In the latter case it is the duty of an attorney to turn a collection, made in the ordinary course of business, over to his client and not to a third person. This matter has not been litigated upon any theory of fraud, in which event, a fraud being established, a more stringent rule against the attorney should be applied (Mayer v. Herman, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 1,241. Here an order for the payment of money was made against an attorney who collected the sum in pursuance of business committed to him long before the bankruptcy, and who paid it in due course to his client. It seems to me that compelling the attorney to pay the amount again is not justified, and the referee's order to that effect should not be sustained."

Doubtless a different rule would prevail in case fraud were involved.

Where the president of one corporation stole from it and put the money into another corporation and later stole from the latter corporation and replaced the money taken from the first corporation, without the knowledge of the original victim, it was held not to be a preference, because of the nonexistence of "reasonable cause for belief."⁸⁰ It would seem that several other elements also were lacking—for instance, voluntary action of the corporation from whom the money was last stolen was lacking, hence there was no "transfer;" likewise, it is questionable whether there was a depletion of the assets of the last corporation since the money taken from it was stolen money.

However, where the bankrupt in making the transfer claimed to be preferential is also "then acting therein" for the creditor receiving the transfer, his knowledge is imputable to his principal.

Clarke v. Rogers, 228 U. S. 534, 30 A. B. R. 39: "As we have said, there may be a unity of the person in the individual and the trustee, of the individual and the guardian; we must look beyond it to the difference in his capacities and the duties and obligations resulting from it. These duties and obligations are as distinct and insistent as though exercised by different individuals, and have the same legal consequences. The unity of the person has, of course, an effect. It constitutes such relationship between the different capacities exercised as to impute knowledge of their exercise and for what purpose exercised."

Similarly, where the managing officer of the bankrupt company made payments to himself as a creditor out of the funds of the company.

Cooper v. Miller, 30 A. B. R. 194, 203 Fed. 383 (C. C. A. Ky.): "While the intent of the company is not by reason of the amendment, important here, yet the company was chargeable with the knowledge of its president, and both the company and Miller must have known that the debtor could not pay its other creditors a percentage of their claims similar to the rate he was paying himself, and, consequently, that the enforcement of the transfer would inevitably give to him a preference over the other creditors of the same class. * * * The dual relation of Miller to the company, as its official head and as creditor, we think, justifies the inference that his admissions of the company's insolvent condition meant that he understood the fair value of its property to be less than its debts."

But the fact that the agent and the insolvent have confidential relations; or that the agent's self-interests are antagonistic to those of his principal, will not render the transaction any the less preferential.

Campbell v. Balcomb, 25 A. B. R. 538, 183 Fed. 766 (C. C. A. Ills.): "The statute purports to give the whole law on the subject. In it we find no exceptions to the effect that a preferred creditor may hold his advantage provided his agent and the insolvent have confidential relations, or provided his agent has self-interests antagonistic to a disclosure to his principal. To interpolate such exceptions we deem beyond the proper sphere of statutory construction and violative of the spirit of the act wherein equality of distribution of the bankrupt's inadequate assets is a prime object."

Thus, where the bankrupt had made a mortgage to the president of a bank to which he owed money, with the proceeds of which the bankrupt paid his debt to the bank, the knowledge of the president was imputed to the bank.⁸¹

§ 1414. Whether Public Corporations Chargeable with "Reasonable Cause for Believing."—It is a question whether a public corporation can be charged with participation in the preferential intent, it not being bound by tortious acts of its agents.⁸² But the exemption only applies to its governmental functions, and it would seem that the same rules should apply to public corporations as to other creditors.

Painter v. Napoleon Township, 19 A. B. R. 412, 156 Fed. 289 (D. C. Ohio): "The recitals of the bill indicate that the pleader intended to cover violations of § 60a and § 60b, Bankruptcy Act,— * * * as amended by act, Feb. 5, 1903, * * * and § 67e of the Bankrupt Act. By the Act of 1903 amending §§ 23b, 60b, and 70e, a trustee in bankruptcy is authorized to bring a suit to recover property. This is not an action for personal injury arising from the negligent act of omission or commission on the part of the township's agents, but an action authorized by the national bankrupt law to recover money charged to have been paid to the board of township trustees by Delventhal, while insolvent, within five days prior to his adjudication as a bankrupt, with an intent to create a preference and to defraud his other creditors, and to have been received by the board with reason on its part to believe and know that he was insolvent at the time of payment, and that the payment was purposely made to prefer the township as a creditor. If the averments of the bill are true, and if the effect of the payment to the board of trustees was to enable it to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than any other creditor of the same class, then Delventhal's property, in the distribution of which his creditors are entitled to share, was wrongfully, and in violation of the provisions of the Bankrupt Act received and appropriated by the board of trustees to the use and benefit of the township, and the board now seeks to retain and enjoy the benefits thus obtained by its own wrongful act. The nature of the bankrupt's liability to the township is not stated, nor is there a showing of when and how such liability arose; but, if the board's contention is correct, an insolvent debtor, within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, or after the filing of such petition and before the adjudication thereof, may designedly and successfully, with an intent to defraud his creditors, create a preference in favor of a township whose agents know or have reasonable cause to believe and know that a preference in its behalf is intended, and that the enforcement of such transfer will be to enable it to obtain a greater percentage of its debt than any other of the bankrupt's creditors of the same class. The township would thereby obtain and retain a greater percentage of its debt than any other creditor of the same class, and thus defeat the salutary provisions of a beneficent law designed to accomplish an equitable distribution among creditors of bankrupt estates. In Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, 19 L. Ed. 1040, Mr. Justice Field said: "The obligation to do justice rests upon all persons, natural and artificial, and, if a county obtains the money or property of others without authority, the law, independent of any statute, will compel restitution or compensation." The same obligation in this respect rests upon a township as upon a county. The rights and remedies of a trustee in bankruptcy are created and defined by Congress, which, under the federal Constitution (article 1, § 8, cl. 4), has exclusive control of the subject of bankruptcies, with the one qualification that its laws thereon shall be uniform throughout the United States. The rights given and the remedies thus created by federal statute may be enforced against townships or their boards of trustees. Nor is the State's permission, by legislative enactment or otherwise, necessary to the maintenance of an action of this character, or to make townships or their boards of trustees liable therein. Had the Legislature of Ohio specially enacted that townships and their boards of trustees should be exempt from liability in cases like this, such enactment would be ineffective. Bliss v. City of Brooklyn, 8 Blatchf. 533, Fed. Cas. No. 1,544; May v. Com'rs of Logan County (C. C.), 30 Fed. 250; May v. County of Ralls (C. C.), 31 Fed. 473. If a State law conflicts with an act of Congress, the State law must yield (Smith v. Parsons, 1 Ohio, 236, 13 Am. Dec. 608), because the laws of the United States, when made in pursuance of the Constitution, form the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579; article 6, Const. U. S.; In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 579, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1092; Lewis' Sutherland's Stat. Constr. [2d Ed.] 22)."

Painter v. Township of Napoleon, 26 A. B. R. 324, 190 Fed. 637 (D. C. Ohio): "To say that Napoleon Township did not know of the insolvency of Henry Delventhal and did not know of his indebtedness to it and could not know it until the trustees were convened in session is to state a proposition that we are sure no reasonable person would adhere to, and yet, in the ultimate, that is the proposition involved in the claim that the township had no reasonable cause to know the results of this situation because the facts were known to one member of the board only. If they were known to William Delventhal officially, then, surely, they were known to the township. If we may say that they were known to William Delventhal unofficially only, then we reach the absurd conclusion that if they were known unofficially or in the same way to each of the three individual members of the board of trustees, the township could not be charged with knowledge until these three gravely got together and resolved that their unofficial knowledge should become public."

And knowledge of one of the township trustees who was a brother of the debtor has been held sufficient to bind the township.⁸³ chaser of property from the trustee, or of the trustee's interest in property, at judicial sale has been held entitled to set aside preferential encumbrances upon the property or other preferential transfers of it precisely as would be the trustee himself.

Bryan v. Madden, 11 A. B. R. 763, 78 N. Y. Sup. 220: "If this action had been brought by the trustee his right to recover would have appeared to be clear. Instead of bringing an action, however, by order of the District Court he was directed to transfer the interest of the bankrupt to a purchaser upon a sale made by him which he did. * * * The intention and effect was to assign whatever right the trustee in bankruptcy had, and that right was the same as the one which the trustee himself could reach, for by the orders for the sale and the sale the trustee parted with every interest he had in the bankrupt's contracts. * * * So far as he undertakes to pass property rights he assigns all that he can assign, and it is a wholesome rule that he can dispose of property interests which may be the subject of litigation, allowing others interested to carry the burden."

But this ruling has been expressly disapproved.

Manufacturing Co. v. Lumber Co., 23 A. B. R. 595, 175 Fed. 335 (C. C. A. Mich.): "A conveyance of property by a bankrupt within four months before bankruptcy, which would be fraudulent at the common law, is a void conveyance under the sixty-seventh section of the bankruptcy law, and the title would vest in the bankrupt's trustee. But it is otherwise as to a conveyance which is a mere preference under § 60 of the same act, and would be merely voidable at the suit of the trustee. This is not a suit by the trustee, but by an assignee of the trustee. If the delivery was a preference, the trustee only could maintain a suit to avoid it. He may not transfer to another this right of avoidance. Bryan v. Madden, 15 Am. B. R. 388, 109 App. Div. 876, 96 N. Y. Supp. 465, has been cited to the contrary. We cannot agree to the conclusion of the Supreme Court of New York."

It has been held that whilst the naked right of action to set aside the transfer is not in itself assignable, yet it may pass to the purchaser as an incident to the sale of the trustee's interest in the property.

In re Downing, 27 A. B. R. 309, 199 Fed. 329 (D. C. N. Y.): "It seems to me that inasmuch as the trustee in bankruptcy was vested with all the right, remedies and powers of a judgment creditor of the bankrupt with execution returned unsatisfied, and one of those rights is (assuming the transfer was in fraud of creditors) to set aside the transfer, have the specific real property sold, or sell same, and the proceeds applied to the payment of all proved and allowed claims against the bankrupt, the trustee has an interest in such property. His rights and interest are something more than a mere possibility or expectancy, not coupled with any interest in or growing out of property. And it is something more than a litigious right. If the action is prosecuted successfully the judgment reaches and operates on the specific property sold or transferred by the bankrupt,—the title of the fraudulent vendee is divested,—and the true title transferred to a purchaser as to the trustee in bankruptcy and the proceeds so far as necessary go to the trustee for creditors or to the purchaser of such rights from such trustee. It is true that the transferee (assignee) of the trustee in bankruptcy would not be prosecuting the action for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt but in his own interest and for his own benefit. The answer to this is that such assignee of the trustee has paid a consideration for the transfer of the rights to the trustee, who holds the same for the creditors."

It has also been held that such a purchaser may maintain suit in the trustee's name to set aside the fraudulent encumbrance.

In re Downing, 27 A. B. R. 309, 199 Fed. 329 (D. C. N. Y.): "I am compelled to hold that while the right of a trustee in bankruptcy to bring suit to set aside a deed as made in fraud of the creditors of the bankrupt may not alone be assigned, still a trustee in bankruptcy has a transferable interest in real estate owned by the bankrupt and transferred by him in fraud of his creditors more than four months before the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy against him, and that such trustee may transfer or convey same and assign with it the rights vested in him by statute to maintain an action to set aside such fraudulent transfer."

§ 1416. Right of Preferred Creditors to Offset New Credit.—If a creditor has been preferred, and afterwards, in good faith, gives the debtor further credit, without security of any kind, for property which becomes a part of the debtor's estate, the amount of such new credit remaining unpaid at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy may be set off against the amount which would otherwise be recoverable from him.⁸⁴

Gans v. Ellison, 8 A. B. R. 153, 114 Fed. 734 (C. C. A. Pa.): "Upon the true interpretation of paragraph 'a' of § 60, the preference in such case as this is the net gain to the creditor upon the transactions between him and the debtor. The net balance in favor of the creditor is the real preference under the law. For only to the extent of such net gain does the creditor 'obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other creditors of the same class.' And so, on the other hand, only to the amount of the net gain to the creditor is the estate of the debtor impaired. If, then, a creditor innocently preferred has given return credits afterwards he has surrendered his preference to the extent of such return credits. To effectuate justice, both sides of the account are to be considered in the case of a creditor who innocently has received preferences, and afterwards in good faith has given the debtor further credit without security, for property which has become a part of the debtor's estate. Otherwise it is plain that such innocently preferred creditor would be compelled to surrender his preference a second time before he could prove his claim against the bankrupt's estate." Although this case was decided as to "innocent" preferences before the Amendment of 1903, the principles involved are the same.

§ 1418. Basis of Right.—The basis of the right of offset of new credits against previous preferences is the pro tanto enrichment of the trust fund, by the new property thrown into it after the previous depletion of it occasioned by the taking of the preference out of it.

The theory of thus allowing offset against preferences seems to be that the goods so furnished on credit after the preference, were contributions to the trust fund already belonging to creditors by virtue of the insolvency of the debtor; that correlatively to the right of all creditors to share as equal beneficiaries in the trust fund after the insolvency, is the right of a party to withdraw such subsequent contributions therefrom.⁸⁶

Jacquith v. Alden, 9 A. B. R. 773, 189 U. S. 78: "In the present case all the rubber was sold and delivered after the bankrupt's property had actually become insufficient to pay their debts, and their estate was increased in value thereby to an amount in excess of the payments made. The account was a running account, and the effect of the payments was to keep it alive by the extension of new credits, with the net result of a gain to the estate of $546.89, and a loss to the seller of that amount, less such dividends as the estate might pay. In these circumstances the payments were no more preferences than if the purchases had been for cash, and, as parts of one continuous bona fide transaction, the law does not demand the segregation of the purchases into independent items so as to create distinct pre-existing debts, thereby putting the seller in the same class as creditors already so situated, and impressing payments with the character of the acquisition of a greater percentage of a total indebtedness thus made up."

Peterson v. Nash, 7 A. B. R. 185, 112 Fed. 311 (C. C. A. Minn.): "Nash Brothers by delivering merchandise to the debtor, within four months next preceding the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy by her, and extending credit to her therefor and doing this in the ordinary course of business without knowledge of insolvency, in good faith enhanced the value of the debtor's estate, and while so doing, in like good faith, received payments on general account for an amount less in the aggregate than the value of the merchandise delivered to her. The giving and receiving under such circumstances, may properly enough be regarded as one transaction, resulting not in a preferential § 1419. Net Result, as to Enrichment of Estate after Insolvency, Test.—After the insolvency, the aggregate result to the trust fund, as to whether it has been enriched by the transaction taken as a whole notwithstanding the alleged preference, is to govern.

And the different items of payments, new goods, credits, etc., are not to be taken separately, nor are merely those new credits coming after any particular payment by the debtor to be offset against the payments preceding the particular new credits; but the transaction, after the insolvency within the four months, is to be taken as a whole and the net result taken.⁸⁷

In re Geo. M. Hill Co., 12 A. B. R. 227, 130 Fed. 315 (C. C. A. Ills.): "We think that in stating the accounts between the parties, within the rule declared in Jacquith v. Alden, all the transactions between the parties must be included, and that we are not limited to an account as it is stated or was kept by the bank, because we are to inquire whether the net result of the transaction was to increase or decrease the estate of the bankrupt. If the account was stated including that amount, there remains no question that the net result of the dealings was to decrease the bankrupt's estate, and that the bank is therefore chargeable with the amount of that net decrease as a condition of proving its claim."

Yaple v. Dahl-Millikin Grocery Co., 11 A. B. R. 596, 193 U. S. 526: "Two questions are propounded by this certificate, namely:

"1. Where a creditor has a claim for a balance due against an insolvent debtor afterwards adjudged a bankrupt, upon an open account for goods sold and delivered four months before the adjudication in bankruptcy, and during said period makes a number of sales of merchandise on credit to the insolvent debtor, which becomes a part of the debtor's estate, and during the same period receives payments of sums on account, from time to time, which payments are received in good faith, without knowledge of the debtor's insolvency on the part of the creditor, the sales exceeding in amount during said period the payments made during the same time—has the creditor, under such circumstances, received a preference which he is obliged to surrender before his claim shall be allowed under the Bankrupt Act?

"2. If each of such payments is a preference under the act, is it to be set off, under § 60c of the Act, by deducting subsequent sales therefrom, carrying forward to the next payment any excess of preferences, but not of sales, treating any excess of preferences as thus ascertained as a sum to be surrendered before the allowance of the creditor's claim?"

Wild & Co. v. Provident Life & Trust Co., 22 A. B. R. 109, 214 U. S. 292, reversing 18 A. B. R. 506, 153 Fed. 562. "The facts of the case are simple. The bankrupt became insolvent on or before January 1, 1901, but the claimants had no knowledge of their insolvency during the running of the account hereafter referred to, and the merchandise therein specified was sold and delivered in the ordinary course of business. The appellants sold and delivered merchandise in various items, beginning February 14, 1901, and ending October 8, 1901. The total price of the merchandise thus delivered was $3,377.28. There were payments on account on June 29 and October 10, amounting to $811.36, leaving the net amount by which the bankrupt estate was enriched $2,565.92. The last payment, on October 10, was $634.78, and was two days after the last sale and delivery of merchandise. The single question in the case is whether that payment was a preference. It is conceded that it would not be a preference, in view of the other facts in the case, if it had been followed by a sale and delivery of goods of any value, however small. This concession is made necessary by the decision in Jacquith v. Alden, 189 U. S. 78, 9 Am. B. R. 733, * * * which is, in all respects, like the present case, except that two days after the payment which was alleged to be a preference, merchandise of trifling value was sold and delivered to the bankrupt. But the decision in that case was not rested upon the fact of this slight sale subsequent to the last payment. It was rather put upon the broader principle that all the dealings between the creditor and the bankrupt were after the bankrupt's insolvency, and that their net effect was to enrich the bankrupt's estate by the total sales, less the total payments. The majority of the court thought these facts distinguished the case from Pirie v. Chicago Title & T. Co., 182 U. S. 438, 5 Am. B. R. 814, * * * though there was a difference of opinion upon that point. But all doubt was resolved in Yaple v. Dahl-Millikan Grocery Co., 193 U. S. 526, 11 Am. B. R. 596, * * * where the precise question which is now here was decided by the court, and it was held, where a creditor has a claim upon an open account for goods sold and delivered during the period of four months before the adjudication in bankruptcy, the account being made up of debits and credits, leaving a net amount due from the bankrupt estate, that payments made under such circumstances did not constitute preferences which the creditor was bound to surrender before proving his claim in bankruptcy."

Compare, In re Watkinson, 17 A. B. R. 58 (D. C. Pa.): "We, therefore, hold that an increase of the bankrupt's estate, as a net result of the transactions between the bankrupt and a creditor within four months prior to filing the petition in bankruptcy where the last transaction was a payment on account of the indebtedness, is not sufficient to relieve the creditor from surrendering this last payment as preferential before he is permitted to prove the balance of his claim against the bankrupt's estate, when the account runs far back beyond the four months before the petition is presented and the transactions between them end with a large payment on account of the whole indebtedness. Under such circumstances it is a preferential claim and must be surrendered before the balance of the account of the creditor can be proven. Kimball v. Rosenham Co., 7 Am. B. R. 718, 114 Fed. 85; Sagor Bros., 9 Am. B. R. 361. Where in a running account payment by the bankrupt within the four months have induced new credits, which resulted in a net increase to the estate, the creditor may be said to have once surrendered his preference by the giving of the subsequent credit, but where, as in this case, the bankrupt, beginning far beyond the four months limit, makes a number of purchases, and then finally, within the four months, makes a large payment on account, the creditor has been preferred. To hold otherwise would clearly give him a greater percentage of his debt than would be given to others of the same class."

§ 1420. Where Entire Transaction Occurs within Four Months and after Insolvency, No Preference.—Where the entire transaction—all the items of the running account—occur within the four months period and after insolvency, payments on account are not preferential and need not be surrendered.⁸⁸

§ 1421. Distinct Transactions with Same Creditor within Four Months, Not Severed.—Preference on one debt must be surrendered before any debt may be allowed. Distinct transactions with the same creditor within the four months period, provided of course they result in debts of the same "class," can not be severed. Thus, if the debtor owes the same creditor on a building contract; on a note for money borrowed and also on an open account for goods bought, all which obligations constitute debts of the same "class" within the purview of the bankruptcy act, and pays off in full two of these obligations under such circumstances as would render the payment preferences, the creditor can not have his claim on the third obligation allowed without surrendering the preferences on the other two. It makes no difference that the two transactions are "closed." All the transactions during the four months period and after insolvency, in the relation of debtor and creditor, are to be considered.⁸⁹

Dividing of Indebtedness Ineffectual.—Much less can a creditor with an entire indebtedness avoid this result by dividing it by the taking of several distinct promissory notes therefor.

Dunn v. Gans, 12 A. B. R. 316, 129 Fed. 750 (C. C. A. Penn.): "We do not think that any fair construction of § 57 (g) would permit a creditor of an insolvent debtor to escape the penalty imposed by that section for receiving Livingston v. Heineman, 10 A. B. R. 39, 120 Fed. 786 (C. C. A. Ohio, reversing In re New, 8 A. B. R. 566): "Sometime within four months preceding the filing of the petition in bankruptcy the bank was the owner and legal holder of the two series of notes, which, in so far as the bank was concerned, and for the purposes of the administration of the bankrupt's estate, constituted but a single claim for $9,000, no part of which could have been allowed, in favor of the bank, without the restoration to the bankrupt's estate of the two preferential payments. The disability of the bank in this respect inheres in the claim, and operates against the holder into whose hands it may come, whether by assignment or subrogation."

In re Teslow, 4 A. B. R. 757, 104 Fed. 229 (D. C. Minn.): "The prohibition (against proof of claim without surrender of preference) extends to all claims of such creditors against the estate of the bankrupt, and is not, as in the Act of 1867, confined to the claims 'on account of which the preference is made or given.'"

In re Meyer, 8 A. B. R. 598, 115 Fed. 997 (D. C. Tex.): "While the note for $350 was given to settle a prior, separate, and distinct indebtedness on the part of the bankrupt to Walshe & Co., yet at the time of bankruptcy a portion of this note was still owing, and constituted a portion of the whole debt owing by the bankrupt to Walshe & Co. To rule that a creditor could withhold from proof a note upon which he had received substantial partial payments, and present for allowance other obligations of indebtedness without a surrender of partial payments received, would be, in the judgment of the court, to ignore the plain import of the language above quoted from the Bankruptcy Act."

In re Jourdan, 7 A. B. R. 186 (C. C. A. Mass.): "Section 57 (g) classifies according to creditors and not according to claims."

Swarts v. Fourth Nat'l Bk., 8 A. B. R. 673, 117 Fed. 1 (C. C. A. But where money was loaned to be used for a specific purpose but was not used at all, its return to the lender within the four months is not a preference. Dressel v. North State Lumber Co., 9 A. B. R. 541, 119 Fed. 531 (D. C. N. Car.).

Creditor holding a claim for wages in excess of statutory amount, and extending back during all of the three months and for several months prior thereto, can not apply payments received during the four months upon the items due before the three months and thus leave a priority claim for the full amount allowed by statute and a small common claim, but must surrender all the payments received by him within the four months as preferences—the payments cannot be considered as having been made on priority claims, for the claims were not priority claims when the bankruptcy actually occurred although they would have been priority claims had the bankruptcy occurred sufficiently earlier. In re King Co., 7 A. B. R. 619, 113 Fed. 110 (D. C. Mass.).

that the purpose of the act was that among creditors proving their claims, one should not receive a greater proportionate share of the bankrupt estate than another. To make a distinction between a creditor who lends $5,000 upon one promissory note and receives $2,500 in part payment thereof, and another creditor who lends the same sum on two promissory notes and receives the same payment, is inequitable and unjust."

§ 1422. Subsequent Credit, to Extent of Security Given, Not to Be Offset.—The new credit must have been given without security of any kind, else it can not be offset, except as to the deficit in the value of the security.⁹⁰

§ 1423. Goods Purchased by Subsequent Credit Must Go to Enrich Estate.—The goods so purchased by the subsequent credit must go to form part of the estate.⁹¹

Bank of Wayne v. Gold, 26 A. B. R. 722 (App. Div. N. Y.), 130 N. Y. Supp. 942: "Counsel for appellant further urges that in any event it was entitled to recover certain advances made by it in connection with the mortgaged property after it had taken possession thereof under the mortgage, and before the bankruptcy proceedings were begun. This claim is made under subdivision 'c' of § 60 of the Bankruptcy Act. Reference to this provision of the act discloses that the further credit given the debtor by the creditor, which may be set off as therein provided, must not only be given in good faith and without security, but must also result in property which becomes a part of the debtor's estate. Whether any recovery for such alleged expenditure could in any event be had in the present action it is unnecessary now to determine; for the proof does not disclose that any part thereof resulted in any advantage to, or increase of, the mortgaged property."

Impliedly, In re Morrow, 13 A. B. R. 394, 134 Fed. 686 (D. C. Ohio): "Three years were given in which to pay the then existing indebtedness, and to keep the business going the bankrupts were to be supplied with goods from time to time, upon short credit, and, as the evidence shows, the goods so supplied were, in fact, used in carrying on the business."

But it need not be proved that the goods for which the unpaid new credit was given, remained part of the bankrupt estate up to the time of adjudication.

Kaufman v. Tredway, 12 A. B. R. 683, 196 U. S. 502: "The trial court, and its views were approved by the Superior Court, held that the statute required not merely that the creditor in good faith gave the debtor credit without security and that the money or property in fact passed to the debtor and became a part of his estate, but also that it remained such until the time of the bankruptcy and was transferred to the trustee, or at least that it was used in payment of preferred debts. * * *

⁹¹. Bankr. Act, § 60 (c). Impliedly, Kaufman v. Tredway, 12 A. B. R. 683, 196 U. S. 502.

"It will be noticed that the words used in paragraph 'c' are not 'the bankrupt's estate,' but 'the debtor's estate.' 'Debtor' is also found in the preceding clause as descriptive of the one to whom the credit is given. While the same person is both debtor and bankrupt, first debtor and then bankrupt, the use of the former term is suggestive of the time of the transaction as well as the status of the recipient of the credit. The paragraph further provides that 'the amount of such new credit remaining unpaid at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy may be set off.' It is the nonpayment and not the fact that the property remains still a part of the debtor's estate which entitles to a set-off. It would seem that if Congress intended that which the trial court held to be of the meaning of the statute it would have said 'which becomes a part of the bankrupt's estate' or 'which becomes and remains a part of the debtor's estate until the adjudication in bankruptcy.' "

§ 1424. Creditor Must Have Acted in Good Faith in Acquiring Offset.—The creditor must have acted in good faith in the matter of acquiring the offset.⁹²

Kaufman v. Tredway, 12 A. B. R. 685, 196 U. S. 502: "Further, Congress provided that the creditor act in good faith. Thus it excluded any arrangement by which the creditor, seeking to escape the liability occasioned by the preference he has received, passes money or property over to the debtor with a view to its secretion until after the bankruptcy proceedings have terminated, or with some other wrongful purpose. It means that the creditor should not act in such a way as to intentionally defeat the Bankrupt Act, but should let the debtor have the money or property for some honest purpose. Requiring that it should become a part of the debtor's estate excluded cases in which the creditor delivered the property to a third person on the credit of the debtor, or delivered it to him with instructions to pass it on to some third party. The purpose was that the property which passed from the creditor should in fact become a part of the debtor's estate, and that the credit should be only for such property."

§ 1425. Payments upon Purchases on Subsequent Credit Not Themselves Preferences.—Any payments made upon the purchases thus made on the subsequent credit are not to be held preferences.⁹³

Impliedly, In re Morrow, 13 A. B. R. 394, 134 Fed. 686 (D. C. Ohio): "The payments were not intended to be applied upon the pre-existing indebtedness, the time for the payment of which had been extended one, two and three years, but were for goods which became a part of the bankrupt's estate."

§ 1425½. Offset Only Applicable upon Antecedent Preferential Transfers.—The offset is available only upon antecedent preferential transfers. The credit to be set off must be a "subsequent" credit. The credit may not be set off against a subsequent preferential transfer.⁹⁴

icated upon the payment by the bankrupt of a promissory note made in favor of the defendant. These payments are alleged to have been made at various dates between January 2 and April 20, 1906. The set-offs claimed in the answer are for merchandise alleged to have been sold by defendant to the bankrupt upon credit on February 20 and March 9, 1906. We think that the fair and obvious construction of subdivision c of § 60 of the Bankruptcy Act is that further credits extended to a person who thereafter becomes a bankrupt, may be set off only against antecedent preferential payments, and not against such as may have been made after the extension of the new credits. It follows in the present case that the set-offs claimed by the defendants are inapplicable to some of the causes of action set forth in the complaint."

But of course such rule must be qualified so as not to include payments made, not on the pre-existing indebtedness, but upon the subsequent new credit.⁹⁵

§ 1426. "Innocently" Received Preferences before Amendment of 1903.—Before the Amendment of 1903 to the Bankruptcy Act it was held that preferences must be surrendered before the claim of the creditor could be "allowed," whether he had received the preference with reasonable cause to believe a preference was intended to be given him or not. In other words, preferences per se prevented, until surrender, the allowance of the preferred creditor's claim.⁹⁶

Flowing from these rulings quite a body of decisions grew up relative to so-called "innocently" received preferences, which, in many respects and upon many points, are still pertinent, although "innocently" received preferences need no longer be surrendered. Thus, as to the right of offset of new credits as well as other matters, the decisions as to "innocently" received preferences are in general still applicable and instructive.

§ 1427. "Surrender of Preferences" as Prerequisite to Allowance of Claim.—As to the requirement that preferences received by a creditor must be surrendered before his claim will be allowed, as also as to other matters of practice in the recovery of preferences, see ante, § 768, et seq.⁹⁷

The prerequisite of surrender of preferences is applicable only when a claim is presented for allowance to share in dividends.⁹⁸ The trustee's remedy in other instances is a direct action to recover the preference.

SUBDIVISION "B."

LIENS BY LEGAL PROCEEDINGS NULLIFIED BY BANKRUPTCY.

§ 1429. Second Branch of Trustee's Peculiar Title and Rights Conferred by Bankruptcy Act—Nullification of Liens by Legal Proceedings.—We have now completed our study of the law relating to voidable preferences and of the circumstances which must exist in order to entitle the trustee in bankruptcy to recover the property affected by the preference for the benefit of the bankrupt estate; and in doing so we have finished one branch of the third and last division of the subject of the title and rights of the trustee. As will be recalled, the third division was taken up with the title conferred on the trustee by the peculiar provisions of the bankruptcy law itself in the protection of the insolvent fund from depletion: that is to say, from depletion by the debtor's voluntary act by way of voidable preferences; from depletion by the creditor's act irrespective of the debtor's co-operation, as by liens obtained by legal proceedings invalidated by bankruptcy; and from depletion by fraud, as by way of fraudulent conveyances within the four months preceding bankruptcy. We have finished with voidable preferences. We come now naturally to the second branch of the third division of the subject, and enter upon the consideration of the invalidity of liens obtained by legal proceedings.

All liens obtained by legal proceedings upon property of the bankrupt within four months preceding the filing of the bankruptcy petition and when he is insolvent, are nullified by the adjudication in bankruptcy.

Section 67 "f" of the Statute contains broad and sweeping, unequivocal and unescapable provisions annulling all liens, of every kind whatsoever, obtained by legal proceedings when the bankrupt was insolvent upon the plea. But it is said that if an action is wholly in rem, or partly in rem and partly in personam, its status as an action to reach the res is not disturbed by a discharge of the defendant in bankruptcy, if the plaintiff's interest therein be preserved by the Bankruptcy Act. The authorities seem to be uniform to that effect."

Powers Dry Goods Co. v. Nelson, 7 A. B. R. 506, 10 N. Dak. 580: "The lien of an attachment on personal property of a bankrupt is not destroyed by a mere discharge of the debt secured by the lien, through a discharge under the present National Bankruptcy Act; and, unless such lien is one which is itself declared void by said act, it may be enforced, through a modified form of judgment, as against the property on which the lien exists."

§ 1436. Void, However, Only as to Trustee and Bankrupt, Not as to Lienholders.—The lien is not dissolved except for the benefit of the estate⁹ and of the bankrupt;^{9a} and if it is preserved for the benefit of the estate it is to be treated in determining priorities as still valid as to all other parties and lienholders interested in the property. But if not preserved, then it is annulled as to all lienholders as well as others.¹⁰

In explicating this clause "f" of § 67, the following propositions are to be borne in mind: There are five elements that must exist to make the lien void.

§ 1437. First Element Requisite to Nullify Lien by Legal Proceedings—Must Be Lien by Legal Proceedings.—The lien must have been obtained by legal proceedings and the legal proceedings must have created the lien.¹¹ Thus, liverymen's liens are not liens obtained by legal proceedings.¹² Thus, mechanics' liens do not come within these rules, for they are not liens created by legal proceedings, although the recording and filing of an affidavit or the institution of legal proceedings may be necessary to preserve or evidence them.¹³ Likewise, it was formerly queried whether a landlord's distraint was a legal proceeding;¹⁴

some courts having held that it was a legal proceeding and that the lien thereof was invalidated by the bankruptcy,¹⁵ other courts having held that they are not legal proceedings creating the lien.¹⁶

It would seem that the Supreme Court of the United States has set the matter at rest, holding that landlord's distraint is not a lien by legal proceedings invalidated by § 67 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Henderson v. Mayer, 225 U. S. 631, 28 A. B. R. 389: "Similar rulings [see quotation of preceding portions of this decision at § 1155] have been made where the landlord has only a common-law right of distress. In re West Side Paper Co. (C. C. A. 3d Cir.), 20 A. B. R. 660, 162 Fed. 110, 89 C. C. A. 110. This is often referred to as a lien, but it is 'only in the nature of security.' 3 Black Com. 18. The pledge, or quasi-pledge, which the landlord is said to have, is, at most, only a power to seize chattels found on the rented premises. These he could take into possession and hold until the rent was paid. Doe ex dem, Gladney v. Deavors, 11 Ga. 84. But before the distraint the landlord at common law has 'no lien on any particular portion of the goods and is only an ordinary creditor except that he has the right of distress by reason of which he may place himself in a better position.' Sutton v. Reese, 9 Jur. (N. S.) 456.

"It is true that prior to levy it covers no specific property, and attaches only to what is seized under the distress warrant issued to enforce the lien given by statute. But in this respect it is the full equivalent of a common-law distress—the lien of which is held not to be discharged by 67f. * * * The fact that the warrant could be levied upon property which had never been on the rented premises does not change the nature of the landlord's right, though it may increase the extent of his security."

Similarly, in most States subcontractors' liens are held not to be liens created by legal proceedings; although in other States they are held to be created thereby.¹⁷

Section 67, subd. f. In other words, this particular creditor was prevented by the Bankruptcy Act from enforcing his rights as against the lien attempted to be created, because he would thereby gain a preference contrary to the Bankruptcy Act. * * * Although counsel have not argued the case upon that theory, it seems to me that the complaint may fairly be treated as the ordinary creditors' bill to set aside a transfer of the judgment debtor fraudulent against his creditors. In that view of the case, the lien created by the commencement of the action was void under the Bankruptcy Act; and, under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act already referred to and under § 7 of article I of the Personal Property Law, being chapter 47 of the General Laws, the sole right to maintain an action for the benefit of the creditors resides in the trustee in bankruptcy."

§ 1440. Including Lien Acquired by Creditors by General Assignments.—All kinds of liens by legal proceedings are thus nullified, including the lien acquired by creditors by virtue of statutes regulating assignments for the general benefit of creditors.³¹

§ 1441. Including Statutory Suits in Behalf of All Creditors for Setting Aside Fraudulent or Preferential Transfers Prohibited by State Law.—The better reason would seem to be that § 67 also includes the lien acquired by creditors by virtue of statutory suits for the setting aside of transfers fraudulent or preferential under State law and the administration and distribution of the debtor's property for the general benefit of all creditors.

Compare, Miller v. Acid & Fertilizer Co., 21 A. B. R. 416, 211 U. S. 496: "It is obvious that if, at the time of the alleged preferential transfer to Miller, there were no other creditors of the individual estate of Guillory than Miller, under the rule laid down by the Bankrupt Act, the transfer to him of assets of the individual estate, in payment of an individual debt, did not constitute a preference. That it might have constituted a preference under the State law results from the difference in the classification made by the State law, on the one hand, and the bankruptcy law on the other. So, also, it is evident, having regard to the separation between the partnership and individual estates made by the Bankrupt Act and the method of distribution of those estates, that, if there were no individual creditors, and the sum paid to Miller was returned to the estate as a preference, it would be his right to at once receive back, by way of distribution, that which he was obliged to pay in upon the theory that it was a preference. * * * As the suit by the creditors was brought within four months before the adjudication in bankruptcy, their right to a lien or preference arising from the suit was annulled by the provisions of subdivision f of § 67 of the bankrupt law. But that section authorizes the trustee, with the authority of the court, upon due notice, to preserve liens arising from pending suits for the benefit of the bankrupt estate, and to prosecute the suits to the end for the accomplishment of that purpose."

One case, however, seems to make a distinction between suits brought to set aside transfers as fraudulent and suits brought not precisely to set aside transfers but rather to declare them, under the statute, to inure (as being preferential), to the benefit of all creditors joining in the suit, this case holding, in effect, that such a statutory suit regarding a transfer made before the four months period, although instituted within the four months preceding bankruptcy, does not create a lien by legal proceedings within the purview of § 67 but simply "perfects," a "security," analogous to that of mechanics' liens; and that the bankruptcy court is to recognize the special rights of creditors so joining in the statutory suit and whether to grant them priority over other creditors under § 64 (b) (5), or permit them to go on with their statutory suit to its conclusion.

But compare, In re Gray, 3 A. B. R. 647 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App. Div.): This case states an unnecessary rule—the assignment is void under § 67 (f) as creating a lien by legal proceedings, or under § 67 (c) as being created in fraud upon the Act. See post, "Superceding of State Court's Custody in Cases of General Assignment," § 1602, et seq.

Chattel mortgage kept off record ten months, then filed, void by state law as against a trust mortgage for the benefit of certain creditors, thereafter executed, which trust mortgage itself is void as a preference by bankruptcy occurring within four months, held that the lien of the preference could not be preserved for the benefit of all creditors, to nullify the chattel mortgage, all occurring before the Amendment of 1910. Rouse & Ottenwess v. Huxoll, 31 A. B. R. 115, 208 Fed. 881 (C. C. A. Mich.).

Moore v. Green, 16 A. B. R. 651, 145 Fed. 480 (C. C. A. W. Va., reversing In re Porterfield, 16 A. B. R. 11, 138 Fed. 192): "The proceeding in the State Court was one instituted under the statute of West Virginia, which enabled a creditor of an insolvent debtor to apply to a court of equity to vacate a preference in favor of a particular creditor, and have the conveyance declared to be for the benefit of all creditors properly joining in such suit. This suit was regularly instituted by the petitioner here, the holder of an unsecured debt of some $3,700, and the same under said statute clearly inured to the benefit of himself and all other creditors authorized thereunder to intervene in the suit; and such rights could not, and should not, be destroyed by the subsequent act of the grantor in the trust deed in favor of his wife voluntarily waiting beyond the four months period, and then availing himself of the benefit of the Bankruptcy Act. Certainly such a result ought not to be brought about unless the interpretation of the bankruptcy law imperatively requires it. Until the husband chose to go into bankruptcy, his creditors had no right under the bankrupt law to require him so to do, he being a person 'engaged chiefly in farming or tillage of the soil,' and they had to look to the State law alone to ascertain their status respecting his property by assailing the deed made in favor of his wife, which they did. They could not anticipate that he would subsequently go into bankruptcy. Having thus availed themselves of the remedy prescribed by the State statute to enforce a right secured to them consequent upon the grantor's act while insolvent—to wit, the conveyances of his property to give a preference—upon instituting such proceedings in the State court they thereby became lienors and secured creditors, pursuant to said statute, under the deed of conveyance thus executed by the bankrupt, which conveyance the law declared upon the institution of the suit inured to the benefit alike of the secured creditor in the deed and his other creditors properly joining them. The true intent, spirit, and meaning of the Bankrupt Act, after enumerating the debts for which preference is thereby specially given, such as the payment of costs, taxes, etc., and certain labor claims, is to adopt the order of priority for the payment of debts prescribed by the State law; and by § 64b, subsec. 5, debts of the character here under consideration are plainly covered, namely, 'debts owing to any person who by the laws of the State is entitled to priority.' The debt secured by the trust deed of the 13th of June, 1902, to Mrs. Porterfield, the estate of whose husband is now being administered by the bankrupt court, would clearly be entitled to priority under the laws of West Virginia, under the deed securing the same, either in the State court or in the bankruptcy court sitting in said State. The debt itself has not been assailed, and the deed was apparently made in good faith, and within the time specified by the laws of the State under which the deed was given a proceeding was regularly taken, the effect of which was not to destroy the deed, but to cause the same, by reason of the insolvency of the grantor in the deed, to inure to the benefit of other creditors, as well as the beneficiary named in the deed. This was the condition existing at the time of the bankruptcy proceeding, and hence as to the property covered by that deed to the extent of the debt therein secured the bankruptcy court took and possessed itself of such property impressed with the lien, and liable not alone to that of the beneficiary named in the deed, but subject to the rights of all persons whose interests had attached thereto by reason of the law of the State at the time of the institution of the bankruptcy proceeding. * * *

"The lien here claimed is analogous to that of mechanics, materialmen, sub-contractors, etc., which class of liens have been respected and enforced under the present Bankruptcy Act. They are given a lien by statute, but to be effective the same must be preserved and secured within a prescribed period by filing such claims, duly perfected, etc., for recordation in the designated court of the State. Being thus entitled to this inchoate lien, taking the steps to secure the benefit thereof within four months of bankruptcy has in every instance, so far as we are advised, been held not to be the taking of legal proceedings in contravention of the Act, but merely doing the necessary thing—taking the essential step—to secure the existing right under the statute. In this class of claims, by reason of the work done or supplies furnished under the agreement between the parties, the statute declares that there shall exist for the amount due a lien, upon the same being properly perfected. In this case the lien arises pursuant to the statute, and under and by virtue of the deed or transfer of the debtor's property, he being an insolvent, provided the creditors assail the same within the statutory period. To say that they should lose the right thus secured by taking the step necessary to secure or make the same effective would be an anomaly. This view of the law has been steadily maintained by the bankruptcy courts under the present Bankruptcy Act."

The effect of the holding in Moore v. Green was not especially wrong on the facts of the case, except perhaps for the refusal of the bankruptcy court to permit any other creditors to share in the property recovered than those who had joined in the statutory suit, but the reasoning seems full of dangerous doctrine.

By the same reasoning creditors' suits of all kinds, started within the four months period, would be valid wherever any transfer therein sought to be set aside was made before the four months period. They could all be held to be simply the "perfecting" of a "security" within the four months period, given before that period to the particular creditor invoking the statutory remedy.

The better reason would seem to be that § 67 also includes the lien acquired by creditors by virtue of statutory suits for the setting aside of transfers fraudulent and preferential under State law and the administration and distribution of the debtor's property for the general benefit of all creditors.

Compare, inferentially, and perhaps obiter, First Nat. Bank v. Title & Trust Co., 24 A. B. R. 330, 178 Fed. 187 (C. C. A. Pa.): "Section 67f, like clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the first sentence of 67c, relates only to liens obtained for the benefit of less than all of the bankrupt's general creditors, and not to a lien which benefits all the creditors, and the dissolution of which will result in giving priority to particular creditors * * * As a lien acquired by a particular creditor may be preserved for the benefit of all creditors under § 67f, we see no reason why a lien acquired for the benefit of all creditors, especially where its dissolution will result in giving priority to a particular creditor and thereby militate against the best interests of the general body of creditors, should not be preserved under 67c."

§ 1441½. Including Lien for Non-Provable or Non-Dischargeable Debt.—Liens by legal proceedings obtained on obligations that are themselves not provable or that are not dischargeable are equally as well nullified, for there is no qualification in the nullification of liens by legal proceedings corresponding to that of the avoidance of preferences, that the obligation on which the lien is obtained must be a provable debt. Thus, the levy of execution on a fine imposed by the State for the illegal selling of liquor has been held nullified.

In re Green, 24 A. B. R. 665, 179 Fed. 870 (D. C. Pa.): The grounds for the referee's decision seem to be that the claim of the commonwealth, being a fine, is not a provable claim in bankruptcy; that, not being provable, it will not be affected by a discharge of the bankrupt; and that, not being provable and not affected by the discharge of the bankrupt, the remedies provided by the State of Pennsylvania for the recovery of the judgment should not be affected by the Bankruptcy Act.

"It does not seem to us necessary to determine whether or not the judgment in favor of the commonwealth is provable, or whether or not the claim would be affected by the discharge of the bankrupt. It is sufficient to note that the commonwealth of Pennsylvania has recovered a lien upon the bankrupt's estate within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. I am satisfied that § 67f of the Bankruptcy Act makes no exceptions in favor of any lien creditor whose lien has been obtained through legal proceedings against the bankrupt within four months prior to the filing of the petition, other than such person who may have obtained title by virtue of such proceedings and has been a bona fide purchaser for value without notice or reasonable cause for inquiry."

§ 1442. "Legal Proceedings" Must Have Operated to Create Lien.—Legal proceedings must have operated to create the lien.³² Thus, replevin actions where title is claimed by the plaintiff are not within the prohibition of the section. The cause of action is inconsistent with a lien. It is the assertion of a right in the property itself as owner, not a claim of lien on another's property.

§ 1443. Unfounded Replevin Actions.—But where the replevin action is a mere excuse and without foundation, and is an attempt to seize assets of the bankrupt or to get a preference, it has been held that it will be void.³³

In re Hymes Buggy & Implement Co., 12 A. B. R. 482, 130 Fed. 977 (D. C. Mo.): "The case at bar affords an apt illustration of the inequality and absurdity of allowing an exemption from the operation of § 67f in favor of a claimant who proceeds by writ of replevin. The evidence in this case shows that almost simultaneously with the institution of the replevin suit the petitioner instituted attachment proceedings against the bankrupt, indicating that it knew of the insolvency, and seized goods in the mass of property in said storehouse, but without segregating them. Becoming aware, doubtless, that the seizure under the writ of attachment would be nullified by the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy, the petitioner, under advice of counsel, let go, and resorted to the writ of replevin, the service of which was hardly complete when the proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted."

Obiter, In re Weinger, Bergman & Co., 11 A. B. R. 427, 126 Fed. 875 (D. C. N. Y.): "The strict meaning of the word 'levy' is usually a seizure of the defendant's property, but it does not seem to me a strained construction to hold, in view of the general purpose of this section, that it includes any seizure of property in the bankrupt's possession which he claims to own. If the language of § 67f is not comprehensive enough to cover a suit in replevin to recover property sold and delivered on credit, under a contract which the plaintiff claims a right to rescind for fraud, and a court of bankruptcy has no right to interfere for the protection of general creditors in this class of cases, very grave injustice may result."

But even in cases where the replevin action is thus a mere subterfuge, the proper practice would be for the trustee to intervene therein and assert his rights; for if it were a mere subterfuge, the replevin suit would fail and the trustee be thus vindicated. The plaintiff in the replevin suit is entitled to his day in court to prove it is not a mere subterfuge; and where else should he maintain his rights than in the suit itself?³⁴

§ 1444. Legal Proceedings Not Themselves Creating Liens but Merely Enforcing Pre-Existing Rights or Liens Not Affected.—Legal proceedings that do not themselves operate to create liens, but simply to enforce or give effect to pre-existing rights or liens, are not affected.³⁵

Obiter, Clarke v. Larremore, 9 A. B. R. 478, 188 U. S. 486: "The judgment was not, like that in Metcalf v. Barker, one giving effect to a lien theretofore existing, but one which with the levy of execution thereon created the lien."

Thus, § 67f does not refer to seizures by replevin.³⁶ Likewise, foreclosure suits, where no new lien is created but merely a former valid lien enforced, are not affected.³⁷

Woods v. Klein, 22 A. B. R. 722, 223 Penn. St. 257: "The appellee acquired no right or lien as a preference over other creditors of the appellant within four months of the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings. What he did within that period was the exercise of a right and the enforcement of a lien which had been acquired 18 months before. The right was to take possession of the mortgaged boat and sell it at any time upon the default of the mortgagor. The preference was obtained when the lien attached in 1905, and not when it was enforced in 1907. No provision of the Bankrupt Act contemplates that a valid lien, acquired more than four months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy shall be vacated by the bankruptcy proceedings, or that the enforcement of such a lien by execution shall constitute an illegal preference. Owen v. Brown, 9 Am. B. R. 717, 120 Fed. 812 (C. C. A.). There is a clear distinction between the bald creation of a lien within the four months and the enforcement of one previously acquired. * * * The lien that is invalidated by the Bankrupt Act is one created by a levy, judgment, attachment, or otherwise, within four months. Where the lien is obtained more than four months prior to the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings, it is not only not to be deemed null and void on an adjudication of bankruptcy, but its validity is recognized. When the lien is obtained within four months, the property of the bankrupt is discharged therefrom, but not otherwise."

In re McKane, 18 A. B. R. 594, 152 Fed. 733, 155 Fed. 674 (D. C. N. Y.): "As to the second motion, in which a stay of the sale under the foreclosure is asked, a hasty examination seems to indicate, from the reasoning set forth in the case of Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 165, 9 Am. B. R. 36, that the judgment in foreclosure has not created the lien, and is not within the provisions of § 67f. The judgment is merely a decree by a court having competent jurisdiction directing the enforcement of a lien which can not be affected or vacated by bankruptcy proceedings."

Nor are seizures by the sheriff on execution of property already mortgaged to the same creditor for the same debt affected; ³⁸ nor does § 67 "f" refer to proceedings to give effect to landlord's liens.

In re Robinson & Smith, 18 A. B. R. 563, 154 Fed. 343 (C. C. A. Ills.): "And the claim of appellant is that the seizure in distress is, within these paragraphs, in the nature of a suit or proceeding in attachment, and having been begun within the four months before bankruptcy, is annulled by the adjudication of bankruptcy. We can not concur in this view. The whole question is one of interpretation of the Bankruptcy Act—the policy of that act respecting the recognition of liens in the distribution of bankrupt estates. Paragraphs 'c' and 'f' quoted were meant, in our judgment, to relate only to those actions or proceedings taken by creditors, who having no existing lien or right of lien resting in existing contract, entered into in good faith, seek to obtain preference by being first in a race of diligence—a preference that the bankruptcy law annuls, because the purpose of that law is to substitute equality for diligence. But the lien obtained by the distress warrant under the kind of lease involved in this case is not the result of a race of diligence. Under the lease, and the Illinois law interpreting the lease and the rights of the parties thereunder (Powell v. Dailey, 163 Ill. 646, 45 N. E. 414; Atkins v. Byrnes, 71 Ill. 332) the right of lien was created when the lease was executed, and the tenant entered upon possession of the premises—a right put wholly, at that time, within the control of the landlord, and maturing the moment the landlord chose to mature it. And though it did not actually attach (as in the New York case, 4 Am. B. R. 126, 102 Fed. 292, supra) until within four months of the bankruptcy, it was the kind of lien, it seems to us, that § 67d was intended to preserve; for unquestionably as between the parties to the lease it was a lien, not simply because the distress warrant was actually levied, but because, by contract between them, the levy of the distress warrant was authorized; and as against creditors, such a lien prevails from the moment it is made a matter of record or public notice, not solely because by such record or notice the lien attaches, but because, from the moment of such record or notice, the creditors are informed that the lien, or the right to such lien, had been in existence from the time that the contract authorizing it was entered into. In other words, the lien is not one that the creditor has obtained irrespective of any right or lien given him by the debtor, but wholly by resort to the judicial proceedings in law or equity that are open to all; but is a lien given directly by the debtor and accepted by the creditor, in good faith, and not in contemplation of bankruptcy—just the kind of relationship that distinguishes a lien attaching as the result of contract, from a lien springing out of some independent and adverse proceedings.”

Nor will it cause the bankruptcy court to supersede the custody of the State court under levy thereon.³⁹

Nor does it refer to warrants of eviction in landlord's proceedings to recover possession of leased premises.⁴⁰

Nor does it refer to the mere appointment, within the four months, of a receiver in supplementary proceedings, where the supplementary proceedings were instituted before the four months, property not being seized by him.⁴¹

§ 1445. Lien Valid in Part, and Void as to Balance.—Where the suit is in part a mere foreclosure suit or other suit to realize upon a valid pre-existing lien, and in part creates a lien by legal proceedings upon other assets of the insolvent during the four months period, the legal proceedings will be valid as to the first part and be nullified as to the latter, and the custody of the State Court will be preserved as to the first part and be superseded as to the latter part.⁴²

Where a writ of attachment has been levied within the four months period and while the bankrupt was insolvent, but has been discharged by an undertaking for which the surety takes no security from the bankrupt's estate, the writ will not be vacated after the adjudication in bankruptcy so as to discharge the surety, for the bond has taken the place of the bankrupt's property.^{45a}

King v. Block Amusement Co., 20 A. B. R. 784, 126 App. Div. 48, 111 N. Y. Supp. 102: "Counsel for appellant contends that the effect of these provisions is merely to discharge the lien of the attachment, and not to vacate the writ. He concedes that, so far as the bankrupt is concerned, the cause of action has been discharged, but he urges that his client should be permitted to proceed to judgment against the bankrupt with a perpetual stay against the enforcement of the judgment against the bankrupt, which would protect the latter in all the rights guaranteed by the Bankruptcy Act, and at the same time would enable the plaintiff to enforce the liability of the surety on the undertaking. Authority for that course is found in many cases where the warrant of attachment was procured more than four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699; Holyoke v. Adams, 59 N. Y. 233; Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 165, 9 Am. B. R. 36. See, also, Hillyer v. Le Roy, 12 Am. B. R. 733, 179 N. Y. 369, and Pikert v. Eaton, 81 App. Div. 423. In all of these cases it is to be borne in mind that unless the right of the plaintiff to continue the action to judgment were preserved he would lose the lien duly acquired by the attachment or the benefit of the security of the undertaking which took its place. The effect of the contention of the learned counsel for appellant would be to place his client in a better position by having obtained the undertaking, than if the levy had stood upon the property, for it is clear that under the provisions of the Federal statute herein quoted, if no undertaking had been given to discharge the levy, the levy would be discharged by the decree in bankruptcy and the trustee in bankruptcy would be entitled to the property. In that event the plaintiff's only right would have been to share with other general creditors in his proportion of the proceeds derived from the sale of the property. It is conceded that if the surety had taken security, it would be the duty of the court under subdivision f of § 67 of the Bankruptcy Act to vacate the warrant of attachment as a condition of requiring the surety to deliver over to the trustee in bankruptcy the property pledged. It is argued in behalf of respondent that since the attachment was issued within four months of filing the petition in bankruptcy, and the lien thereof, if the undertaking had not been given, would have been discharged by the bankruptcy of the defendant, the plaintiff has not been prejudiced by the giving of the undertaking, and a construction should not be placed upon the act which would give the plaintiff the advantage of holding the surety on the undertaking when he could not have held the property under the attachment and that the proper construction of these provisions of the Bankruptcy Act is that where the lien is acquired by virtue of a judgment or warrant of attachment recovered or issued within four months of filing the petition in bankruptcy both the lien and the instrument under which it was acquired should be deemed null and void, * * * and the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, so held, in effect, in Klipstein & Co. v. Allen-Miles Co., 14 Am. B. R. 15, 136 Fed. 385. Our Court of Appeals, however, held under the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, which, although different in terms on this point, is not sufficiently different in substance to warrant us in distinguishing and not following the authority, that a warrant of attachment which had been issued within four months of filing the petition in bankruptcy and had been discharged by a similar undertaking but not vacated, was unaffected, at least as to the surety, by the subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy and discharge of the bankrupt, and that where the action was prosecuted to judgment the liability of the surety became thereby fixed. McCombs v. Allen, 82 N. Y. 114. In the case at bar this court following Holyoke v. Adams, supra, recently held that this defendant should not be permitted to amend its answer by setting up its discharge in bankruptcy which would prevent plaintiff obtaining judgment upon which the liability of the surety might be enforced. 125 App. Div. 922. It would seem to follow that the defendant was not entitled to have the warrant of attachment vacated. We are not concerned with the question as to the remedy of the surety over against the estate in bankruptcy or against the bankrupt personally in the event that it shall be obliged to pay any judgment that may be recovered herein (see Hill v. Harding, supra, and Klipstein & Co. v. Allen-Miles Co., supra), and no opinion is expressed on those points."

But after such lien by legal proceedings has been acquired, subsequent transfers may have been made or liens may have been acquired that would have prevented the property passing to the trustee even if the lien by legal proceedings were extinguished. In such event the lien is void only in a certain way, namely, it is void as to the trustee but is good as to subsequent transferees and lienholders, and if it is preserved for the benefit of the bankrupt estate, the trustee gets the advantage of the priority of the lien by legal proceedings, but uses such advantage for the benefit of all creditors.

First National Bk. v. Staake, 15 A. B. R. 644, 202 U. S. 141: "The argument is based upon the theory that the second clause was not intended to apply to liens acquired upon the estate of third parties, but to property which would have passed to Baird's trustee had the attachment not been levied. In other words, that the bankruptcy court has nothing to do with the property, since it really did not belong to the bankrupt, and would have passed to his vendee if the attachments had not been levied upon it. Indeed the opinion especially finds that 'had valid attachments not been levied, the property would have passed to the trustee of the Roanoke Furnace Company.'

"To what extent liens obtained by prior judicial proceedings shall be recognized is a matter wholly within the discretion of Congress. It might have validated all such liens, even though obtained the day before proceedings were instituted. It might probably have invalidated all such liens whenever obtained. It took a middle course, and invalidated all liens obtained through legal proceedings within four months prior to the filing of the petition, but at the same time preserved to the general body of creditors, as against third parties (such as purchasers under an unrecorded deed), such liens as attaching creditors had secured upon property which would have passed to the subsequent purchaser in case the attachment had not been levied. It is true that the attaching creditors are thereby deprived of the fruits of their diligence, but the same thing would have happened had the attachment been levied upon property to which the bankrupt had the whole and undisputed title, or of which he had made a fraudulent conveyance. As remarked by the District Judge, 'In cases where the bankrupt makes a valid conveyance, or where his fraudulent vendee makes a valid conveyance, the purpose of the law is worked out by preserving and enforcing the liens of the attaching creditors for the pro rata benefit of all the creditors.'

"Section 67f is merely carrying out the general purpose of the Act, of securing to the creditors the entire property of the bankrupt, reckoning as part of such property liens obtained by attaching creditors against real estate which had been transferred to another, though no deed had been actually executed and recorded.

"The argument that § 67f in question here, refers only to liens upon property which, if such liens were annulled, would pass to the trustee of the bankrupt, we think is unsound, since that contingency is amply provided for by the prior clause of the section annulling all such liens, and providing that property afected thereby shall pass to the trustee as a part of the estate. Under the argument of the attaching creditors in this case, the subsequent clause would be entirely unnecessary. This clause evidently contemplates that attaching creditors may acquire liens upon property which would not pass to the bankrupt, if the liens were absolutely annulled, and therefore recognizes such liens, but extends their operation to the general creditors. Had no proceedings in bankruptcy been taken doubtless this property would have been sold for the benefit of the attaching creditors."

Property affected by a transfer or lien which itself is void as to the nullified "lien by legal proceedings within four months" will pass to the trustee even though it would not have passed to the trustee if the nullified lien never had existed. In other words the nullified lien may be used as an instrument to avoid other liens or transfers which themselves would not be avoided by the bankruptcy.

Martin v. Globe Bank & Trust Co., 27 A. B. R. 553, 193 Fed. 841 (C. C. A. Ky.): "It is insisted, however, that these decisions are not relevant, because under § 1907 of the Statutes of Kentucky the deed was valid, except as to those creditors whose debts were existing at the date of its delivery; and that, since the banks were the only creditors of that class who obtained liens through the commencement of suits and levies of attachments, the benefits of such liens cannot be extended to anyone else. * * * As respects liens so acquired within the four months, it is difficult to conceive of language of wider scope than this [67c and 67f]. It is not claimed that Atkins was not insolvent at the time these suits were commenced and the attachments levied, and the reason for this is obvious. Atkins was adjudicated a bankrupt within the next succeeding four months, and the present controversy leaves no room for doubt as to his insolvency at the date of the suits and attachments. If the distinction urged on behalf of the banks were sound, it is hard to perceive why it would not be applicable to every case where some of a body of creditors, who all admittedly have equal rights, are more diligent than the others in securing liens through attachments or any of the other means stated in 67c and f; for all the practical results and hardships among the creditors would in that event be identical with those complained of here. It is plainly within the power of Congress to enact that liens so acquired within a specified period should, through bankruptcy proceedings, be applied to the common benefit of all the creditors of a bankrupt."

§ 1447½. Exempt Property.—It was for a long time a disputed question whether liens by legal proceedings obtained within the four months period upon exempt property were nullified by the bankruptcy,⁴⁶ but the question has been definitely set at rest by the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that liens by legal proceedings on exempt property are nullified equally with those on non-exempt property.

Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Hall, 229 U. S. 511, 30 A. B. R. 619 "* * * he insists that if there was a lien against his wages, it was obtained by garnishment served within four months of his bankruptcy and discharged by virtue of the provisions of § 67f. * * * The railroad, on the other hand contends that under § 70 the trustee acquires no title to 'property which is exempt' and that liens thereon are not discharged by § 67f, since that section has reference only to liens on property which can 'pass to the trustee as part of the estate of the bankrupt.' On this question there is a difference of opinion, some state and federal courts holding that the Bankruptcy Act was intended to protect the creditors' trust fund and not the bankrupt's own property and that therefore liens against the exempt property were not annulled even though obtained by legal proceedings within four months of the filing of the petition. In re Driggs (D. C. N. Y.), 22 A. B. R. 621, 171 Fed. 897; Re Durham (D. C. Ark.), 4 A. B. R. 760, 104 Fed. 231. On the other hand, Re Tune (D. C. Ala.), 8 A. B. R. 285, 115 Fed. 906; Re Forbes (C. C. A. 9th Cir.), 26 A. B. R. 355, 186 Fed. 79, hold that 67f, annuls all such liens, both against the property which the trustee takes and that which may be set aside to the bankrupt as exempt. This view, we think, is supported both by the language and the general policy of the Act which was intended not only to secure equality among creditors, but for the benefit of the debtor in discharging him from his liability and enabling him to start afresh with the property set apart to him as exempt. Both of these objects would be defeated if judgments like this present were not annulled, for otherwise the two Iowa plaintiffs would not only obtain a preference over other creditors, but would take property which it was the purpose of the Bankruptcy Act to secure to the debtor.

"Barring exceptional cases, which are specially provided for, the policy of the Act is to fix a four months period in which a creditor cannot obtain an advantage over other creditors nor a lien against the debtor's property. 'All liens obtained by legal proceedings' within that period are declared to be null and void. That universal language is not restricted by the later provision that the property affected by the * * * lien shall be released from the same and pass to the trustee as a part of the estate of the bankrupt. It is true that title to exempt property does not vest in the trustee and cannot be administered by him for the benefit of creditors. But it can pass to the trustee as a part of the estate of the bankrupt for the purposes named elsewhere in the statute, included in which is the duty to segregate, identify and appraise what is claimed to be exempt. * * * In other words, the property is not automatically exempt, but must 'pass to the trustee as a part of the estate'—not to be administered for the benefit of creditors, but to enable him to perform the duties incident to setting apart to the bankrupt what, after a hearing, may be found to be exempt. Custody and possession may be necessary to carry out these duties and all levies, seizures and liens obtained by legal proceedings within the four months that may or do interfere with that possession are annulled. * * * The section does not, however, defeat rights in the exempt property acquired by contract or by waiver of the exemption. These may be enforced or foreclosed by judgment obtained even after the petition in bankruptcy was filed under the principle declared in Lockwood v. Exchange Bank, 190 U. S. 294, 10 A. B. R. 107, 47 L. Ed. 1061, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 751. * * * Those liens having been annulled by § 67f of the Bankruptcy Act, furnished no defense for the railroad when sued by Hall for his wages, earned in Nebraska, exempt by the laws of that state and duly set apart for him by the referee in bankruptcy."

§ 1448. "Judgment" Means Judgment Lien, Not Judgment Itself.

—The "judgment" referred to in § 67f, where the statute invalidates all "judgments" and "other liens," does not refer to judgments where no lien is obtained. It means judgment liens.⁴⁷

⁴⁷ Metcalf v. Barker, 9 A. B. R. 36, Bros., 5 A. B. R. 320, C. C. A. N. Y.); 187 U. S. 165 (reversing In re Lesser obiter, Kinmouth & Braeutigam, 10 A.

In re Beaver Coal Co., 7 A. B. R. 542, 113 Fed. 889 (C. C. A. Ore., affirming 6 A. B. R. 404, 110 Fed. 630): "Construing the language above quoted from § 67 'f' we think it refers solely to liens, and that it does not mean that all judgments rendered within four months prior to bankruptcy shall be null and void. The use of the words 'judgments,' and 'or other liens' indicates that it was the purpose of the act to avoid liens only which were obtained by judicial proceedings within the prescribed time, and not to declare void judgments as such. This view is in harmony with other provisions of the Bankruptcy Law. Judgments rendered even after bankruptcy are sustained as determining the claim thereby adjudged."

In re Blair, 6 A. B. R. 206, 108 Fed. 529 (D. C. Mass.): "Section 67f avoids certain liens, if created within four months. This is its object. It does not avoid judgments or levies, except so far as these create a lien."

In re Kavanaugh, 3 A. B. R. 832, 99 Fed. 928 (D. C. Ky.): "This does, indeed, make certain liens and judgments void if obtained within four months of the adjudication; but it appears to us to be evident that the language, properly construed, was intended only to apply to such judgments as of themselves created liens. Liens thus created were intended to be overthrown and made ineffectual by the adjudication in bankruptcy, unless preserved for the benefit of the estate.

"Probably in most of the States of the Union—certainly in many of them—a judgment for debt, particularly if docketed and indexed, creates a lien upon the debtor's property; and we apprehend, from the connection in which the word 'judgment' is used in the paragraph quoted, that it was meant to confine its meaning to that class of judgments. The section in the main relates to liens, although subsection 'e' provides that certain mortgages or transfers made after the passage of the Bankrupt Act shall also be void upon certain conditions therein provided.

"It seems to us that a clear distinction should be drawn between judgment in this sense, upon a debt—a mere personal liability—and a decree of the chancellor declaring the property rights of parties in a case like the one before us, but which in no way created a lien."

Doyle v. Heath, 4 A. B. R. 705, 22 R. I. 213: "Literally construed, again § 67f avoids 'all judgments' against a bankrupt rendered within four months of the filing of the petition, irrespective of the time of the institution of the suit in which the judgment was ordered, and all such judgments are avoided, although no lien or preference was created thereby, for the language is without limitation or exception. But the difficulty and unreasonableness of adopting a literal construction of the words 'all judgments' appear upon considering the effect produced upon other sections of the act, and upon other provisions of the United States statutes concerning judgments. In the first place, the words are found in the act under the subtitle 'Liens,' and they are conjoined with 'levies, attachments or other liens.' Again, under § 63a of the act the debts which may be proved against a bankrupt are defined as including '(1) a fixed liability, as evidenced by a judgment or an instrument in writing absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition against him;' and this without restriction as to the date of entry of the judgment. And § 63 (5) also includes debts 'founded upon provable debts reduced to judgment after the filing of the petition.' Under § 17, among debts not affected by a discharge are '(2) judgments in actions for fraud or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for willful and malicious injury to the person or property of another'—a manifest inconsistency if the words 'all judgments' are to be taken literally. Again, § 905, Rev. St. U. S., provides that 'the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any State or Territory when duly authenticated as therein specified, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court in the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from which they are taken. And it is hardly to be supposed that this general provision of federal legislation, first substantially enacted in 1790, was intended to be repealed by the single addition of the word 'judgments' in this clause of the Bankrupt Act of 1898. And, if the words 'all judgments' are to be literally construed, they must include judgments rendered in the courts of foreign countries, irrespective of treaty stipulations, and even the judgments of the very court in which the estate of the bankrupt is being administered. We decline to adopt such a construction of the language of the act, and we construe the words 'all judgments' to be qualified and defined by their context, and to be limited to the lien or preference created by such a judgment."

And it means liens by way of levy of execution or attachment, or by way of creditor's bill under judgment.⁴⁸

§ 1449. Judgments Whose Liens Annulled Yet Valid for Other Purposes, as Res Adjudicata, etc.—A judgment whose lien is thus annulled may yet be valid so far as it fixes the extent and validity of the claims involved; and may even be res judicata as to the fraudulent character or otherwise of transfers therein sought to be set aside.⁴⁹

Metcalf v. Barker, 9 A. B. R. 36, 187 U. S. 44: "Moreover other provisions of the act render it unreasonable to impute the intention to annul all judgments recovered within four months. By § 63a, fixed liabilities evidenced by judgments absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition, or founded upon provable debts reduced to judgments after the filing of the petition and before the consideration of application for discharge, may be proved and allowed, while under § 17 judgments in actions of fraud are not released by a discharge, and other parts of the act would be wholly unnecessary if § 67f must be taken literally."

provisions of § 67, and the Metcalfs cannot have the benefit of the decree which directs payment to them of their judgments in the actions at law because the preference created by the decree was made null by the bankrupt Act."

In re Pease, 4 A. B. R. 547 (Ref. N. Y.): "The word 'judgment' is found in a section captioned by the word 'Liens,' and given over to that subject alone. It is apparently limited by the succeeding words, 'or other liens,' and the words, 'the property affected by the levy, judgment, attachment or other lien shall be deemed wholly discharged and released from the same.' Further, by § 63a (1) and (4), judgments are provable debts; while, if all judgments against an insolvent within four months are void, some of the words in § 60a, defining preferences, would be nonsense. An examination of § 3a (3) and § 17a (2) will further demonstrate the weakness of the contention.

"The word 'judgment' is necessary in this clause. Judgments become liens on realty without a levy or other proceeding. Accurately expressed, the judgment is one thing and the lien another; correctly, a judgment so a lien is a judgment lien. This is what is meant by the statute. Had the word 'judgment' been omitted, judgment liens, unlike other liens, might perhaps have been held good, even if against an insolvent and within the four months."

Expressive but obiter, Kinmouth v. Braeutigam, 10 A. B. R. 85 (N. J. Ch.): "The sentiment of the Federal courts seems to be that § 67, par. 'f,' applies only to the lien of judgments, and not to the judgments themselves. The judgment itself may remain until it is ascertainable whether the bankrupt will or will not be discharged. In case of a discharge of the bankrupt, the judgment is released. In case of the failure of the bankrupt to obtain his discharge, the judgment remains. But even in the latter event it can never be enforceable against any property owned by the bankrupt at the time he filed his petition in bankruptcy, but can only be used against after-acquired property. This view in respect to the entry of a judgment after the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, as well as in regard to the force of such judgment as a lien, is supported by the provisions of § 63, par. "a," subd. 5, of the Bankrupt Act. Debts of the bankrupt may be proved and allowed against his estate which are founded upon provable debts reduced to judgment after the filing of the petition, and before the consideration of the bankrupt's application for discharge, less costs incurred and interest accrued after the filing of the petition, and up to the time of the entry of such judgment. Here is a recognition of judgments entered between the filing of the petition and the application for discharge; while the provision respecting the provability of debts so reduced to judgment, less costs and interest accrued after the filing of the petition, is an implied negation of the existence of any lien to be obtained in any manner against the bankrupt's property by force of such judgment."

And while § 67f discharges the lien of an attachment, it does not vacate the writ.⁵⁰

§ 1450. Lien by Legal Proceedings May Have Been Indirectly Effected.—The appropriation may be effected indirectly by the legal proceedings. Thus the property of the bankrupt may be discharged from the attachment levy by the giving of a redelivery bond, but if the bankrupt has pledged property of the estate to indemnify the surety on the redelivery

In the able opinion filed by the referee I concur. If the procedure above outlined had taken place, as it well might, in the United States, it cannot be doubted that the successful attachment creditor would have been obliged to refund the proceeds of his attachment. * * * The fact that the lien was obtained in a foreign country can make no difference in the meaning of the phrase 'in the fraud of the provisions of this act.' That expression does not necessarily mean active fraud or illegality, but intent to prevent equitable distribution of the debtor's property, and where that intent obtains is immaterial. But, further, the decision is in my opinion right upon broad equitable grounds. It may well have been that the trustee acquired no title whatever to the German realty. Oakey v. Bennett, 11 How. 33, * * *. But this proves no more than that Klemm was entitled to enjoy in Germany the fruits of his German legal proceedings."

petition." The decision is correct, but there seems to be an unnecessary reference to the discharge and also to the filing of proofs of claim. The lien if void at all would not be void by virtue of the discharge nor of the filing of a proof of claim but simply by virtue of the provisions of the law annulling liens on adjudication of bankruptcy.

Subsequently such lien, by decree of the State court, was reaffirmed, and became an established liability, which had accrued previously, and prior to the four months' period. This interest was paramount to the rights acquired by the trustee in bankruptcy to the funds in the hands of the receiver. It therefore follows that jurisdiction of the State court over the partnership property of the bankrupts was not divested by the proceedings in bankruptcy." This case was reversed in 11 A. B. R. 674 as far as it concerned the refusal of the bankruptcy court to order the State court receiver to turn over the balance in his hands to the trustee rather than to distribute it to creditors itself. The reviewing court also criticizes the designating of the rights of the transferee as being by way of "an equitable lien." The case was simply that of a payment of a firm creditor by the partnership's transfer of part of its assets more than four months before bankruptcy; the institution of proceedings for dissolution and winding up, culminating in an order entered within four months of subsequent bankruptcy finding the transferee to be a tenant in common—and also to have an equitable lien thereby—and also endeavoring to make distribution among creditors—the latter part of the order being the objectionable part.

§ 1452. If Obtained after Filing of Petition, Not Nullified by § 67 "f"—Though Perhaps Otherwise Void.—Liens obtained by legal proceedings after the filing of the bankruptcy petition are not nullified by § 67 "f," though they may be void for other reasons; for § 67 "f," relating to liens by legal proceedings, unlike § 60 (a), relating to preferences, does not affect liens obtained after the filing of the petition.

Kinmouth v. Braeutigam, 4 A. B. R. 345, 46 Atl. (N. J.) 769: "It is argued on behalf of the motion that the words, 'at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy,' mean at any time after a date that is four months prior to the filing of the petition, even although the lien is obtained subsequent to such filing. I cannot assent to this construction. The words are perfectly plain, and have no inclusion of a judgment obtained after the filing of the petition. The way to prevent judgment in a pending action is to stay the suit until the adjudication in bankruptcy, and a sufficient time afterwards to afford opportunity, to obtain and plead a discharge. Possibly, if default be made, the court will, upon discharge being granted, open the judgment in order to allow it to be pleaded; but it will not vacate a judgment regularly obtained, because of the possibility of a subsequent discharge."

Kinmouth v. Braeutigam, 10 A. B. R. 85, 52 Atl. (N. J.) 226: "Being entered not within four months preceding the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, but after the filing of the petition, it was not successfully challenged on a motion to vacate it."

In re Engel, 5 A. B. R. 372 (D. C. Pa.): "It has been recently decided in St. Cyr v. Daignault that a judgment by default taken since adjudication is void, and that a permanent stay of proceedings should be granted. I have no doubt that the grant of a permanent stay was right, but, with great respect for the opinion of the learned judge who decided that case, I find myself, unable to agree with the reason given therefor. I do not think that clause 'f' of § 67 applies to judgments entered after the adjudication. It seems clear to me that this clause refers entirely to judgments and other liens obtained within four months preceding the filing of the petition; and, indeed, I do not find any provision in the act dealing with the lien of judgments entered after the proceeding in bankruptcy has been begun. The reason for this apparent omission may be found in the fact that § 70 expressly provides that, after the trustee has been appointed, the title to the bankrupt's property shall vest in him as of the date of the adjudication; and while it is true that during the interval between the adjudication and the appointment of the trustee the title to the property remains in the bankrupt, it is a title liable to be divested upon the appointment of a trustee, and a title upon which no permanent lien can be acquired. It may have been thought unnecessary, therefore, to pay any attention to what must be an unavailing effort to obtain a lien."

It would seem on principle that liens by legal proceedings obtained before the passage of the Bankrupt Act

though before a trustee is appointed.⁵⁵

But this inability does not arise through the prohibitions of § 67 (f) as we have seen in the preceding paragraph; although, as we have also seen, preferences may be created by the act of the bankrupt after the filing of the petition if before adjudication, and may be created even by way of legal proceedings.⁵⁶ But it arises from the fact that the assets are already sequestrated in the bankruptcy court and that a seizure thereof by another court is consequently prohibited.⁵⁷

R. 185): "In our opinion the conclusion to be drawn from this language is that it is the lien created by a levy, or a judgment, or an attachment, or otherwise, that is invalidated, and that where the lien is obtained more than four months prior to the filing of the petition, it is not only not to be deemed to be null and void on adjudication, but its validity is recognized. When it is obtained within four months the property is discharged therefrom, but not otherwise. A judgment or decree in enforcement of an otherwise valid pre-existing lien is not the judgment denounced by the statute, which is plainly confined to judgments creating liens. If this were not so the date of the acquisition of a lien by attachment or creditor's bill would be entirely immaterial.

"Moreover other provisions of the act render it unreasonable to impute the intention to annul all judgments recovered within four months.

"By § 63a, fixed liabilities evidenced by judgments absolutely owing at the time of the filing of the petition, or founded upon provable debts reduced to judgments after the filing of the petition and before the consideration of application for discharge, may be proved and allowed, while under § 17 judgments in actions of fraud are not released by a discharge, and other parts of the act would be wholly unnecessary if § 67f must be taken literally."

In re De Lue, 1 A. B. R. 387, 91 Fed. 510 (D. C. Mass.): But perhaps this case is based rather on the error that 67 "f" applies only to involuntary bankruptcies. Compare, Peck Lumber Mfg. Co. v. Mitchell, 1 A. B. R. 701, 95 Fed. 258 (Com. Pleas Pa.). Compare, Bank v. Elliott, 6 A. B. R. 409, 85 N. W. 417. Compare, analogously, In re English, 10 A. B. R. 133 (D. C. N. Y.). In this case the lien was created more than four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, not by legal proceedings, but by the transfer of an interest in the partnership estate.

But in some States the lien has been held as not attaching until judgment. In such States a contrary rule, therefore, would obtain; thus as to creditor's bills; and thus as to attachments: In re Lesser, 5 A. B. R. 326, 108 Fed. 201 (C. C. A. N. Y., disappeared in In re Blair, 6 A. B. R. 206, 108 Fed. 529, and reversed by U. S. Sup. Court in Metcalf v. Barker, 9 A. B. R. 36, 187 U. S. 165); In re Johnson, 6 A. B. R. 202, 108 Fed. 373 (D. C. Vt.); In re Tobias Lesser, 5 A. B. R. 326 (D. C. N. Y.).

Perhaps these latter cases are also to be considered as overruled by Metcalf v. Barker, 9 A. B. R. 36, 187 U. S. 165.

Such is the rule where the attachment or garnishment itself is superseded by the giving of a redelivery bond, the bond taking the place of the property.^{60a}

Nat'l Surety Co. v. Medlock, 19 A. B. R. 654, 2 Ga. App. 665, 58 S. E. 1131: "Whether the service of a summons of garnishment creates a technical lien on the funds in the hands of the garnishee or not, still, especially when the garnishee admits liability and pays the fund into court, or in lieu of such actual payment a statutory bond is substituted, the court acquires such a hold upon the money or the res, such a right to retain and administer the fund, or what has been substituted for the fund, the bond, that the subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy, made more than four months thereafter, will not disturb it."

And the rule is the same where the sheriff sells the property and holds the proceeds to await final judgment.

In re Crafts-Riordan Shoe Co., 26 A. B. R. 449, 185 Fed. 931 (D. C. Mass.): "While the sale might have been prevented by giving bond to dissolve the attachment, it cannot be said that any 'preference' obtained by the attachment, would have been vacated or discharged by such a bond, which would have left the plaintiffs in full possession of any advantage over other creditors which their attachment may have given them."

Similarly, where within the four months, a receiver was appointed in proceedings supplementary to execution which had been instituted before the four months, the lien was held to revert to the date of the order in the supplementary proceedings, not to the date of the appointment of the receiver.

Wrede v. Clark, 21 A. B. R. 821 (N. Y. Sup. Ct., App. Div., reversing 21 A. B. R. 170): "The question for determination is whether the service of the order in supplementary proceedings upon the judgment debtor prior to the four months' period created a lien upon his property rights in the seat on the Stock Exchange, so that if the trustee in bankruptcy took anything he took it subject to such lien; or whether, although the plaintiff was appointed and qualified as receiver during the four months' period, his title to the judgment debtor's rights in the seat related back to the commencement of the proceedings instituted by service of the order on the judgment debtor, so that no title whatever passed to the trustee in bankruptcy. We are of the opinion that a lien was created as of the commencement of the proceedings and that the surplus being insufficient to pay the judgment represented by plaintiff the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to no part of it and that all of it should have been awarded to the plaintiff-receiver. Section 2469 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes that where a receiver in supplementary proceedings has been appointed and has duly qualified so that title to the property of the judgment debtor shall become vested in him, such title extends back by relation for the benefit of the judgment creditor in whose behalf the special proceedings was instituted to the time of the service of the order for examination, and that such title by relation back to the time of the commencement of the proceedings shall be good as against all persons except a purchaser in good faith without notice and for a valuable consideration or the payment of a debt due the judgment debtor in good faith and without notice. The language of the section is plain and the courts have not attempted to construe it other than literally, but have held that upon the appointment of a receiver in supplementary proceedings and his qualification he takes the legal title to all the personal property of the judgment debtor, whether in his hands or in the hands of others, as of the date of service of the order in supplementary proceedings, except as to purchasers in good faith or a debtor who has paid his debt in good faith. (Ward v. Petrie, 157 N. Y. 301, 307.) The commencement of the proceedings supplementary to execution gave the judgment creditor a lien upon the property of the judgment debtor, and that lien having been acquired more than four months prior to the bankruptcy proceedings was not affected thereby."

And where a creditor's petition was begun or levy made before the passage of the Bankruptcy Act, the creditor's bill is not abated nor the lien annulled, although final judgment in the creditor's bill or in the attachment suit, or in the suit to enforce the execution lien, may not be rendered until within the four months or until after adjudication.⁶¹

The same rule has been held to apply to the case of a judgment rendered within the four months upon an award of arbitrators made before the four months, where, by State law, the lien of such judgment reverts to the date of the rendering of the award.⁶²

Likewise, where the attachment is obtained before the four months but judgment is not rendered until after adjudication, the lien is unaffected.⁶³

§ 1456. But Where State Court Attempts Further Distribution.—

But where the State court goes further within the four months period than to make effectual the lien obtained by the legal proceedings prior to the four months period, and attempts further distribution of the remaining assets, a different question arises.

Compare, In re English, 11 A. B. R. 674, 127 Fed. 940 (C. C. A. N. Y., reversing 10 A. B. R. 133): "As to the residue of the funds, however, in the hands of the state court receiver, the situation is different. The state court judgment has settled the rights of the contending tenants in common, and distributed the property between them. The funds remaining after Anna English has had her share are now no longer undivided property of tenants in common, but have been held to belong in severalty to the bankrupts. So much of the judgment of the state court as directs the distribution of these funds of the bankrupts to their creditors is void, being within the four months. Therefore the receiver now holds them only as a custodian temporarily until he can turn them over to the bankrupts. But the trustee in bankruptcy now stands in the shoes of the bankrupts, and it is to him that they should be turned over. And they should be turned over in their entirety, because there is no lien upon them in favor of any creditor which the bankrupt act respects. There is no

In re Higgins, 3 A. B. R. 364, 97 Fed. 775 (D. C. Ky.): "There does not seem to me to be any sound reason for supposing that Congress could have intended to refer to anything except the beginning of that part of the proceeding which secured the writ under which there was a seizure of, and consequent lien upon, some of the debtor's property, whereby it was put in a position where other creditors could see that a lien was being claimed upon it to the exclusion of their otherwise equal right to share in it."

§ 1458. Likewise Levy within Four Months on Judgment Rendered before, Annulled.—And a levy of execution within the four months upon a judgment rendered before the four months, is also annulled;⁶⁵ unless the judgment itself was a lien, in which event the execution of the court's judgment might not contravene the provisions of § 67 "f."⁶⁶

§ 1459. State Law Controls as to Nature of Lien, Time Takes Effect, Abandonment, etc.—The law of the State will control as to the nature of the lien (for instance, whether it be a "lien by legal proceedings" or not), the time it takes effect and the facts sufficient to constitute an abandonment or vitiation of it.⁶⁷

As to lien of supplementary proceed-

In re Thackara Mfg. Co., 15 A. B. R. 259, 140 Fed. 126 (D. C. Pa.): "The question raised in the present case is whether such a lien, which would be protected if duly prosecuted, has been abandoned or has become vacated, through the action of the lien creditor in issuing an execution, and allowing the same to be retained by the sheriff over a long period of time, under an arrangement with the debtor by which the greater part of the indebtedness was gradually liquidated; subsequent executions being in several cases paid in full.

"If the lien thus obtained, which was valid in its inception, continued to be valid as against other creditors, it is no doubt protected by the Bankrupt Act and the claim must be allowed, but the referee (Richard S. Hunter, Esq.) held it to be invalid under the law of Pennsylvania—by which law it must be judged—and refused to award priority for the unpaid balance of the debt. This ruling is now before the court on review, and its correctness has been vigorously attacked. I am of opinion, however, that the referee was right."

On principle, it would seem that the time of the actual "obtaining" of the judgment lien or of the levy of execution or attachment should control; but the tendency of some decisions bearing upon the point seems to be in the opposite direction, to the effect that it does not necessarily control where the statutes or decisions of the State declare that the lien of a judgment or levy shall revert to the beginning of the term or to the attesting of the writ or to some other date.⁶⁸

Impliedly, In re Koslowski, 18 A. B. R. 723, 153 Fed. 823 (D. C. Pa.): "But on the other hand, to the extent that the action is sustained and a judgment recovered within the amount of the award, the lien is carried back to the date of its entry, and takes rank accordingly. First National Bank's Appeal, 100 Pa. 418. This is familiar law, which hardly needs the citation of authorities. The only question is as to how to apply it. It is contended by the trustee and the contesting creditors, as already intimated, that, as the judgment which was secured by the claimant was essential to give effect to the award, and was obtained within four months of bankruptcy, the lien of the award is incapable of enforcement, the judgment being nullified either by those provisions of the Bankruptcy Act (§ 67f) which make void 'all levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens, obtained through legal proceedings, against a person who is insolvent, at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him;' or by those (§ 60a, b) which prohibit and make voidable a preference of one creditor over another which has been similarly secured. * * * Where a valid lien has been secured more than four months prior to bankruptcy, proceedings to enforce the same do not conflict with the bankruptcy law, and may be instituted and prosecuted to the end, if that is requisite. * * * In the present instance, therefore, the applicant was entirely within his rights in taking judgment as he did by agreement with the bankrupt, and it is immaterial that this was within a few days of the filing of the petition. And the merits having been thereby concluded in his favor, the lien of the judgment is carried back to the award, which being sustained to its full amount, excepting interest, is binding as of the date of its entry, and must be paid."

Inferentially, but not necessarily supporting the proposition, In re Fellerath, 2 A. B. R. 40, 95 Fed. 121 (D. C. Ohio): "The first day of that term of court was on November 1st, 1898, so that the judgment lien dated back to that day, although the sheriff could make no levy on the judgment until January 14, 1899."

But compare, In re Engle, 5 A. B. R. 373 (D. C. Pa.): "The bonds accompany and are secured by a mortgage, and it is argued in support of the validity of the executions that the lien of the judgments is carried back by the law of Pennsylvania to the date when the mortgage was recorded, and should, therefore, be considered as if the lien had originated at that time. This may be true for certain purposes, but, under the present circumstances, I must decline to assign a fictitious date to the existence of the lien. It is no doubt true that the bonds are for the same debt that is secured by the mortgage, but the judgments are general judgments, capable of being levied upon any real or personal property belonging to the debtor, as well as upon the property mortgaged, and in all essential respects are like a judgment recovered after trial. Their lien, therefore, must be considered as beginning, if at all, upon the date of entry."

Thus, the lien of supplementary proceedings has been held to revert to the date of the service of the order (anterior to the four months), and not to have arisen at the date of the appointment of a receiver therein, though the latter was appointed within the four months time.⁶⁹

But it has been held that the lien of a levy under an execution on an old judgment upon property acquired by the bankrupt, within the four months period, while insolvent, is void under § 67 "f" of the Bankrupt Act, in a state where the rule of the common law prevails, that the lien of the execution relates back to the test thereof, which is the first day of the term at which the judgment was rendered, although such first day of the term was more than four months before the bankruptcy.⁷⁰

And it would seem on principle that the bankruptcy courts need not, in this particular, adopt the fictions of the State law, since the peculiar title and rights conferred by the Bankruptcy Act for the protection of the insolvent fund are involved.

Keystone Brew. Co. v. Schermer, 31 A. B. R. 279, 241 Pa. 361: "It will be noticed that under this section, two things are required in order to render a lien void: First, it must have been entered within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy * * *. Second, the judgment must have been entered against a person who was insolvent at the date of its entry. * * * Whether or not the bankrupt was insolvent at the time of the entry of the judgment is a question of fact which has been determined by the referee, and he has found that the judgment debtor was not insolvent when the judgment was entered: It was not therefore void for this reason. If the lien of the judgment on the bankrupt's real estate was valid, and was not avoided by the adjudication in bankruptcy, then his grantee took the land subject to the lien of the judgment, and no action by the trustee in bankruptcy to which the lien creditors were not parties, could affect their rights."

And the burden of proof of the insolvency is on the trustee or other party asserting it.

Keystone Brewing Co. v. Schermer, 30 A. B. R. 279, 241 Pa. 361: "We think, too, that the referee rightly held that the burden of proving the insolvency of the judgment debtor at the date of the entry of the judgment rested upon the party alleging it. On the record the judgment is regular and apparently valid, and it is incumbent on those attacking its validity to establish their allegations by affirmative proof."

§ 1461. Fifth Element to Nullify Lien by Legal Proceedings—Debtor Must Eventually Be Adjudged Bankrupt.—The debtor must eventually be adjudged bankrupt, else the lien is not invalidated.⁷² Thus, before adjudication, the lien is not annulled and no power exists to compel summary surrender of the property levied on, although injunction may issue to preserve the status quo.^{72a} Consequently, a receiver may not, before the bankrupt should be insolvent at the time the attachment is levied."

But see curious construction of § 67f, to the effect that if the insolvency occurred at any time within the four months it is sufficient, even though not existing at the time the lien was obtained, as if the clause "at any time" modified merely the insolvency and not the liens by legal proceedings. Cook v. Robinson, 28 A. B. R. 182, 194 Fed. 753 (C. C. A. Alaska): "So that the plaintiff in error is precluded by the adjudication to question the insolvency of Robinson at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and it does not affect the case that Robinson may not have been insolvent at the time the attachments of Cook were levied. This for the reason that by subdivision "f" of § 67 all attachments levied against a person insolvent at any time within the filing of the petition in bankruptcy are deemed null and void in case the adjudication in bankruptcy is made. * * * Cook's attachment therefore having been rendered null and void by reason of the adjudication in bankruptcy, it was of no further potency to affect or encumber the property of the bankrupt, and it follows that the inquiry as to the insolvency of the bankrupt at the time the attachment was levied was wholly irrelevant and immaterial. It could in no way affect the inefficacy of the attachment so rendered by the adjudication." adjudication, be required summarily to surrender the assets in his hands, though the receivership has been created within the four months preceding the bankruptcy.

Obiter, impliedly, In re Kernsten, 6 A. B. R. 519, 110 Fed. 929 (D. C. Wis.): "The further question as to jurisdiction over the assets of the bankrupts, now in the possession of the receiver appointed by the Circuit Court of Calumet County, which is set up in a plea by the answering creditors, is not one affecting the jurisdiction of the court to proceed to an adjudication in bankruptcy, and cannot be raised at this stage of the proceedings, nor in the form here presented. It is true that jurisdiction over the estate of a bankrupt is essential for its due administration under the provisions of the act of Congress, but if the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court to that end is ultimately questioned, the issue can arise only after bankruptcy is adjudged and a trustee or other custodian is appointed and qualified to take possession."

State ex rel Strohl v. Sup. Ct. of Kings Co., 2 A. B. R. 97 (Sup. Ct. Wash.): "It would seem that a corporation created under the laws of this State should be subject to the chancery jurisdiction of the courts, and that creditors of such corporations should have their ordinary remedies under existing State laws until such corporation is adjudged a bankrupt under the law of Congress and by the proper tribunal. Unquestionably, upon such adjudication the power of the State court to further proceed ceases."

Thus, likewise, liens by legal proceedings upon an individual partner's property obtained by an individual creditor are not nullified, where the partnership is adjudicated bankrupt but the partner is not adjudicated bankrupt as an individual.^{73b}

The lien is not invalidated by the mere filing of the petition. It is null and void only "in case the debtor be adjudged bankrupt."^{73c}

§ 1462. Invalidity of Liens by Legal Proceedings Ultimately Rests on Basis of Preference.—Upon reflection, it becomes evident that the invalidity of such liens rests on almost the same basis as the voidability of preferences.⁷⁴

In re Kenney, 5 A. B. R. 357, 105 Fed. 897 (C. C. A. N. Y., affirmed, on other grounds, in Clarke v. Larremore, 188 U. S. 486): "There can be no doubt that it was the intention of Congress by this section to prohibit creditors of a bankrupt from obtaining preferences over other creditors, as the result of any legal proceedings against him, during the period of four months prior to the filing of the petition; and apt words are used to express that intention. shall be deemed null and void, and the property wholly discharged and released from the same. A broad and liberal construction of the section should be adopted if necessary to effect this intent, but no strained construction is necessary in the face of language so comprehensive."

First Nat'l Bk. v. Staake, 15 A. B. R. 645, 202 U. S. 141: "If the interest of Baird in this property were sold solely for the benefit of the attaching creditors, it would obviously result in a preference to those creditors over the general creditors of his estate, and in fraud of the Bankruptcy Act, which is designed to secure equality among all creditors."

In re Tune, 8 A. B. R. 291, 115 Fed. 906 (D. C. Ala.): "The main reason for the four months provision was to prevent the race by creditors to seize the estate of the insolvent when it is found that he is in failing circumstances and to prevent the preferences which would follow if liens and attachments were allowed during that period."

In the case of legal liens to be sure, it is not necessary to prove that the judgment lien was obtained by a creditor—as the term creditor is used in bankruptcy—a judgment lien obtained by anyone being equally void; nor is it necessary to prove that the effect of the enforcement of the lien would be to give such a one a greater percentage of his claim than some one else; nor is it necessary to prove the lienholder had reasonable cause for believing anything—beliefs and intents, in short, cutting no figure in considering the invalidity of legal liens.⁷⁵

Yet the theoretical basis of the invalidity of legal liens is the same as that of the voidability of preferences—protection of the trust fund belonging to all the creditors, so that the maxim, "Equality is equity" may have full sway.

In re Richards, 3 A. B. R. 153, 96 Fed. 935 (C. C. A. Wis.): "It asserts the principle that, as between creditors, "equality is equity" and that the race of diligence must cease, with respect to legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent, at the commencement of four months preceding the filing of the petition."

In re Baird, 11 A. B. R. 437 (D. C. Va.): "While the State law gives to diligent creditors who attach a priority of payment—a preference—over those who do not attach, it is beyond dispute that the intent of the Bankrupt Law (except as to rights gained more than four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy) is just the reverse. The intent of the latter, except as aforesaid, is to pro rata all available assets, and to prevent any priority of payment being obtained by any creditor within the four months, whether by consent of the debtor or by the diligence of the creditor."

Nevertheless the operation of § 67 (f) is not confined to liens that create preferences.⁷⁶

§ 1463. Clause "f" of § 67 Supersedes Clause "c" Where in Conflict.—Clause "f" of § 67 supersedes clause "c" of the same section,⁷⁷ wherever they are in conflict.

In re Richards, 3 A. B. R. 145, 96 Fed. 935 (C. C. A. Wis.): "These two subdivisions, 'e' and 'f,' in our judgment, are plainly antagonistic and irreconcilable. The former saves a lien obtained through legal proceedings begun within four months, unless it was obtained and permitted while the debtor was insolvent, or the creditor had reasonable cause to believe such insolvency, or the lien was sought and permitted in fraud of the provisions of the act. The question of the pecuniary condition of the debtor and knowledge upon the part of the creditor are influential in determining the validity of the lien so obtained. But subdivision 'f' is broader in its scope, and avoids all liens obtained through legal proceedings within the time stated against a person who is insolvent, within the meaning of the subdivision, irrespective of knowledge on the part of the creditor of the fact of insolvency, and irrespective of the question whether the obtaining of the lien was in any way suffered and permitted by the debtor. It avoids all liens obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent within four months before the filing of the petition. We are unable to reconcile these provisions. They are broadly and clearly in antagonism. It is a question, therefore, how they may be reconciled, for that is impossible. The question is, which shall prevail? The rule in such cases is stated by Puffendorf (Potter, Dwar. St. [Ed. 1871] p. 132): 'When we meet with a seeming repugnancy in the terms, conjectures are necessary to work out the genuine sense, by reconciling it, if it is possible, to those terms that seem to be repugnant. But, if there be a clear, evident repugnancy, the latter vacates the former. This rule applies to the making of laws, wills and contracts.'

"Under this rule, subdivision 'f' must control, and we find confirmation of the justice of this rule in the history of this act. Two bills in bankruptcy were presented to Congress; one to the Senate and one to the House of Representatives. They were broadly divergent in spirit. One was supposed to be largely in the interest of the creditor; the other largely in the interest of the debtor. Subdivision 'e' of § 67 was contained in the House bill; subdivision 'f' was contained in the Senate bill. The two houses were at disagreement respecting these bills, and the matter was referred to a conference committee of the two houses near the end of the session, resulting in the incorporation into the House bill of subdivision 'f,' which was in the Senate Bill. Mr. Henderson, in presenting the conference report to the House, stated that subdivi-session, which was begun against a person within four months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by or against such person shall be dissolved by the adjudication of such person to be a bankrupt if (1) it appears that said lien was obtained and permitted while the defendant was insolvent and that its existence and enforcement will work a preference, or (2) the party or parties to be benefited thereby had reasonable cause to believe the defendant was insolvent and in contemplation of bankruptcy, or (3) that such lien was sought and permitted in fraud of the provisions of this Act; or if the dissolution of such lien would militate against the best interests of the estate of such person the same shall not be dissolved, but the trustee of the estate of such person, for the benefit of the estate, shall be subrogated to the rights of the holder of such lien and empowered to perfect and enforce the same in his name as trustee with like force and effect as such holder might have done had not bankruptcy proceedings intervened."

Ala.), where clause 67 (c) is held to apply to "new" liens created by legal proceedings. Also, for peculiar but erroneous construction, see In re Collins, 2 A. B. R. 1 (Ref. Iowa), begun within the four months period while clause 67 (f) applies to liens created within the four months on old proceedings instituted before that time. This construction was rejected: In re Friedman, 1 A. B. R. 510 (Ref. N. Y.).

vision 'f,' was incorporated into the bill to strengthen the bill. 31 Congressional Record, pt. 7, p. 6428, June 28, 1898. The confusion results from the omission of the conference committee to modify the language of subdivision 'c,' or to strike it out altogether; but the passage of the bill by the House with subdivision 'f,' contained in it, after this report of the conference committee, must be taken as an indication of the will of the lawmaking power that the provisions of subdivision 'f' shall prevail, notwithstanding anything antagonistic to them previously found in the act. We are of opinion, therefore, under the rule stated, corroborated and justified by the action of Congress, that the provisions of subdivision 'f' must prevail over those of subdivision 'c,' and that all liens obtained through legal proceedings within the time stated against a person who is insolvent, and irrespective of any sufferance or permission thereof by the debtor and of any knowledge by the creditor of the debtor's insolvency, are avoided if that subdivision can be held to apply to voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy, and if another objection, hereinafter considered, is unavailing."

In re Rhodes, 3 A. B. R. 380 (D. C. Pa.): " * * * under the rule that when there is a clear and evident repugnancy between the two classes of the same statute, the latter vacates the former."

Since clause "f" covers in great part the same transactions and is broader than clause "c," clause "c" need not be considered here further than simply to observe that the persistence of both these clauses indicates the conflict that wages all through the law between the two different theories that struggled for supremacy in the framing of the law. The first theory—that embodied in clause "c"—introduced the element of intent and knowledge; whilst the other theory—that embodied in clause "f"—cast aside all consideration of the intent with which a preference was given or received and made the result of the transaction the real test, that is to say, made its effect upon the insolvent fund the test—as to whether the shares of the other creditors were going to be made less by the transaction than was proportionate. Clause "c," makes the invalidity depend upon the knowledge of the creditor as to its working a preference, or, at any rate, upon the debtor's "permitting" of the lien.⁷⁸

Nevertheless, clause (c) is not to be entirely disregarded, for it is still part of the statute.⁷⁹

First Nat. Bk. v. Title & Trust Co., 24 A. B. R. 330, 178 Fed. 187 (C. C. A. Pa.). "It has been suggested, however, that §§ 67c and 67f are in such conflict that both of them cannot stand, and that 67f must stand as the later declaration of the legislative will. * * * In so far as 67c is in conflict with 67f, the former is doubtless superseded by the latter section. But, if our construction of 67c is correct, the lien now under consideration was not dissolved by any of its provisions, but, on the contrary, it was preserved, and the trustee, by operation of law and without any intervening court order, subrogated to the rights of the former receiver. Section 67f does not conflict with this view of 67c. Section 67f, like clauses 1, 2, and 3, of the first sentence of 67c, relates only to liens obtained for the benefit of less than all of the bankrupt's general creditors, and not to a lien which benefits all the creditors and the dissolution of which will result in giving priority to particular creditors. A trustee in bankruptcy is not by 67f subrogated by mere operation of law to the rights of a levying creditor. He must obtain an order of court preserving the rights of the levying creditor for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate, as was done in First National Bank v. Staake, 202 U. S. 148, 15 Am. B. R. 639. There the Supreme Court, after quoting both 67c and 67f, and without intimating that 67c is superseded by 67f, upheld the lien of an attachment levied on lands which the defendant in attachment had conveyed, and against whom bankruptcy proceedings were commenced within four months after the levy, not for the benefit of the attaching creditor, but for the benefit of the trustee in bankruptcy who thereby acquired priority over the grantee's unrecorded deed."

And it is upon this clause, most reasonably, that the superseding of the custody of the State courts rests in cases of assignments for the benefit of creditors, receiverships, etc.,⁸⁰ and it is rather under this section than under § 67 "f" that such general assignments, receiverships, etc., within the four months, are to be declared null and void as liens by legal proceedings, since § 67 "f" requires insolvency to exist as an essential element to the nullification; whilst § 67 "c" would not so require but would declare such assignments, receiverships, etc., within the four months, absolutely null and void, as being sought and permitted in fraud of the provisions of this Act.⁸¹

And again, it is under this clause that the bankruptcy court has required the surrender of a lien obtained in a foreign country upon property of the bankrupt there, as a prerequisite to the creditor's participation in the bankruptcy here.⁸²

§ 1464. Clause "f" Applies to Voluntary Bankruptcies as Well as to Involuntary.—Clause "f" applies to voluntary bankruptcies as well as to involuntary bankruptcies, notwithstanding it refers in its mere wording only to cases where a petition is filed "against" a person;⁸³ for clause

§ 1465. Does Not Impair Obligations of Contract nor Divest Vested Rights.—Clause "f" does not impair the obligation of a contract nor divest the attaching creditor of a vested right.⁸⁴

§ 1466. Operates Only on Liens Obtained before Filing of Petition.—Clause "f" avoids only liens obtained before the filing of the petition, and does not affect those sought to be obtained afterwards. The latter are to be reached in other ways, if at all.⁸⁵

In re Engle, 5 A. B. R. 372, 105 Fed. 893 (D. C. Pa.): "I do not think that clause 'f' of § 67 applies to judgments entered after the adjudication. It seems clear to me that this clause refers entirely to judgments and other liens obtained within four months preceding the filing of the petition; and, indeed, I do not find any provision in the act dealing with the lien of judgments entered after the proceeding in bankruptcy has been begun. The reason for this apparent omission may be found in the fact that § 70 expressly provides that, after the trustee has been appointed, the title to the bankrupt's property shall vest in him as of the date of the adjudication; and while it is true that during the interval between the adjudication and the appointment of the trustee the title to the property remains in the bankrupt, it is a title liable to be divested upon the appointment of a trustee, and a title upon which no permanent lien can be acquired. It may have been though unnecessary therefore, to pay any attention to what must be an unavailing effort to obtain a lien. A similar view concerning the scope of § 67f has been expressed in the Supreme Court of New Jersey. Kinmouth v. Braeutigam, 4 Am. B. R. 344, 46 Atl. 769. I have been speaking of voluntary bankruptcy merely. In a case of involuntary bankruptcy a question might be presented concerning the lien of a judgment entered after the filing of the petition, but before the entry of adjudication, and this question I have not considered."

Ga.): "The adjudication of the defendant as a bankrupt on a petition filed within four months of the entering of the judgments rendered the judgments null and void, and the nullity and invalidity related back to the time of entry of the judgments, and affected them and all subsequent proceedings."

Thus, a sheriff may not be mulcted by an execution creditor for failure to proceed with diligence to realize upon an execution, where the execution debtor subsequently goes into bankruptcy within the four months, although had he proceeded with diligence, he might have made the money on his execution and safely turned it over to the execution creditor before the bankruptcy.

Mohr & Sons v. Mattox, 12 A. B. R. 333 (Sup. Ct. Ga., distinguishing Levor v. Seiter, 8 A. B. R. 459; also, McKenney v. Cheney, 11 A. B. R. 54): "The judgment creditor, obtains his lien subject to its being defeated if the defendant is adjudicated a bankrupt upon a petition filed within four months from the entry of judgment. It was not the laches of the sheriff which caused the movants to lose their rights under their judgment, but the bankruptcy law, which nullified their lien."

§ 1468. Lien Absolutely Void and Falls of Itself.—The lien falls of itself and becomes null and void without the necessity of bringing an action to annul it. It is ipso facto void. In other words, it is absolutely void, not simply voidable.⁸⁷

Schmilovitz v. Bernstein, 5 A. B. R. 265 (Sup. Ct. R. I.): "It was conceded in the argument of the case, and it is well settled by adjudications under the Bankrupt Act of 1867, that an attachment on mesne process made within four months before the commencement of proceedings under the United States Bankrupt Act by or against the defendant in an action in a State court was dissolved ipso facto by the bankruptcy proceedings. * * * The provisions of the Act of 1898 have the same effect with respect to attachments by mesne process, and work the dissolution of other specified liens as well."

nishiee judgment as completely and effectually as would a formal release executed by the judgment plaintiff. In obedience to the positive mandate of the statute, the court must deem the attachment null and void, and the wages due the bankrupt wholly released and discharged from the same. It is too firmly settled to be open to doubt that, if a garnishee pays over money on a void judgment, he must bear the loss. He will not be heard to say that he paid it in obedience to a void judgment after notice and knowledge that the judgment has been rendered null and void by operation of law. The adjudication having rendered the judgment against the bankrupt and the Pennsylvania Company null and void, it must be treated as a nullity whenever and wherever drawn in question, either in a direct or in a collateral proceeding. Here the judgment is drawn in question collaterally, and its nullity results from the subsequent adjudication by this court of Thomas C. Beals as a bankrupt."

Laches, therefore, cannot be urged as against the trustee.

Hardt v. Schuylkill Plush & Silk Co., 8 A. B. R. 479, 69 App. Div. 90, 74 N. Y. Supp. 549: "I know of no laches on the part of the trustee that would make this attachment valid, which is made void by the provision of the Bankrupt Act."

§ 1469. § 1470. Requisite to Bring Situation to Notice of Court or Officer Seeking to Enforce Lien.—However, in practice it will be found that, while it is not necessary to institute an action to annul the lien, it is usually necessary, and is certainly proper, to institute proceedings of some kind, to bring the matter to the notice of the court or officer in charge.⁸⁸

Certainly the sheriff could not be required to assume the responsibility of releasing a levy valid but for the adjudication of bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy, also, may come into the case where the lien was obtained and ask the court there for the preservation of the lien of the State court proceedings.⁹⁰

§ 1472. Comity Requires Resort First to Court Wherein Lien Obtained.—Comity requires that resort be first had to the State Court wherein the proceedings involving the lien are pending.⁹¹

Obiter, Scheyer v. Book Co., 7 A. B. R. 390, 112 Fed. 407 (C. C. A. Ga.): "In opposition to the adjudication, it has been very vigorously insisted in this court that the adjudication in bankruptcy should not be rendered, because the State Bankruptcy Court, through its receiver and under the judgment of dissolution, has taken possession of all the property of the corporation, and that by reason of the comity which does and ought to prevail between courts of the States and courts of the United States, the adjudication in bankruptcy can result in no administration or other beneficial effect. For the purposes of this case, we may concur with the learned counsel in his views on this matter of comity, but we are of opinion, notwithstanding, that the petitioning creditors have the right to have their insolvent debtor adjudged a bankrupt, if for no other reason still for the purpose of insisting upon the application of the provisions of the Bankrupt Law annulling preferences in certain cases.

"Section 67f of the act of 1898 reads; * * *

ceivership created within the four months: "In contemplation of the Bankrupt Act, in so far as concerned his right to the custody of the property of the bankrupt, he stood as if he had never been appointed by the State court. In such situation, as he holds the property not in his own right, but solely in his claimed official capacity, it was his duty, on notification and demand by the trustee in bankruptcy, to deliver the property to him. But inasmuch as he was the appointee of the State court, as a mere act of courtesy, sometimes, but hardly accurately, termed 'judicial comity,' the bankrupt court in the first instance directed the trustee to prefer a request to the State court for an order on its receiver to deliver the property in his custody to the trustee. In such case, if the State court decline to reciprocate the consideration thus paid to its dignity, the law is well settled that it is then competent for, and the duty of, the bankrupt court to order the receiver to deliver the property over to the trustee, and he would be in contempt if he refuse to comply therewith. Controlling authorities affirm the foregoing proposition."

In re Lesser, 3 A. B. R. 823, 100 Fed. 439 (D. C. N. Y., reversed, on other grounds, sub nom. Metcalf v. Barker, 9 A. B. R. 36, 187 U. S. 165): "Although the partnership receivers, under the adjudication in the Court of Appeals, have no legal title to the property, they are still the custodians of it, as officers of the State court appointed in the second equity suit as above stated. The fund is, therefore, in the custody of the State court, and the trustee should apply to that court to make the proper order for the payment thereof by its receiver to the trustee, in whom it is vested by the Bankrupt Act. The obligations of the Bankrupt Act are as binding upon that court as upon this; and it is not to be doubted that on proper application the State court will give appropriate directions."

In re Kersten, 6 A. B. R. 516, 110 Fed. 931 (D. C. Wis.): "If the adjudication of bankruptcy so operates, as remarked in the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Bryan v. Bernheimer (5 Am. B. R. 623, 629, U. S.), that the property of the bankrupts is 'thereby brought within the jurisdiction of the court of bankruptcy,' it nevertheless rests with the State court, in the first instance, at least, to determine its course when such contingency is duly presented. Moreover, the judicial custody can be changed only through action by the State court for its release, or through plenary procedure, in conformity with the law which governs both jurisdictions, and in accord with comity."

In re Seebold, 5 A. B. R. 364, 105 Fed. 910 (C. C. A. La.): "The State court had the amplest possession of the subject of the controversy and full jurisdiction of the parties at the date of the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings. There is no provision in the present bankrupt law which authorizes or permits the courts of bankruptcy, by the use of either summary or plenary process, to stop the proceedings of the State court in a suit in which it had already, before the institution of the proceedings in bankruptcy, obtained possession of the subject matter and jurisdiction of the parties. What effect the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act may have to stay proceedings in a State court is a question of which that court has full jurisdiction to decide, subject to prescribed methods of review, and which the courts of bankruptcy may not attempt to limit or control without a manifest disregard of that comity which is an essential element of our public law, and under which our State and national systems of judiciary work is admirable harmony. Certainly with, and probably without, an order of the court of bankruptcy, the trustee in this case could have made his application to the State court in the suit therein pending, setting up his claim, or the claim of the estate he represents, to the proceeds in question."

Carling v. Seymour Lumber Co., 8 A. B. R. 30, 113 Fed. 483 (C. C. A. Ga.): "When the State court is in possession, through its receiver, of assets that it is without jurisdiction or authority to hold against a receiver or trustee appointed in bankruptcy proceedings, instead of making a peremptory order on the receiver of the State court to surrender the funds, an injunction, if necessary, might be granted by the bankruptcy court to prevent the unlawful distribution of the assets, until application could be made to the State court for an order to its receiver to surrender the assets to the proper custodian. The laws of the United States being equally binding on all the courts, we cannot assume that the State court would refuse to administer them. We are not now called on to decide what course should be taken in the event of a disregard of the Bankrupt Law by the State court. That such application should be made in the first instance to the State court is sustained, not only by the analogous cases relating to comity, but by adjudications directly in point on this question of practice under the Bankrupt Law."

In re Knight, 11 A. B. R. 1, 125 Fed. 35 (D. C. Ky.): "It would not only be unseemly, but altogether disagreeable, to this court, to pursue any course which would be wanting in the utmost respect and courtesy to the State tribunal, and orders will be made directing the trustee to apply to that court for leave to enter a special appearance in the case there pending, styled 'First National Bank of Fulton v. Henry Knight and others,' for the purpose of filing a copy of this opinion, the orders made in pursuance thereof, a copy of the adjudication in bankruptcy, and an accompanying application for an order of that court directing its receiver to turn over to the trustee in bankruptcy the property of the bankrupt held by the receiver."

And injunction by the Bankruptcy Court will be refused if sought in the first instance;⁹² except perhaps long enough to enable the trustee to apply to the State Court for a surrender.⁹³

And the application to the State court first is not such an election of forum nor is a refusal thereof such a res judicata as to preclude subsequent application to or action by the bankruptcy court.⁹⁴

And the requirement is simply by way of comity, and where an emergency exists, the trustee need not apply first to the State Court, and the bankruptcy court has the right to proceed at once by direct summary proceedings against the court officer.⁹⁵

The proceeding in the District Court was a controversy between the trustee in bankruptcy and the petitioner, as to which was entitled to receive payment from the garnisheed defendant of the indebtedness primarily owing to the bankrupt's estate. But if the lien by legal proceedings was obtained before the filing of the petition and within the four months, but the sale and turning over of the proceeds did not take place until after the filing of the petition and appointment of the receiver in bankruptcy although before the adjudication, the proceeds in the hands of the judgment creditor, who was cognizant of the receivership, may be summarily ordered surrendered. B. R. 353). If the preference was received by the creditor without reasonable cause to believe a preference was intended (§ 60b), it seems not to be recoverable back by the trustee. * * *

"Under the recent decisions of the Supreme Court, I am of opinion that this transaction being completely executed by the payment of the money by the sheriff before the petition was filed, the remedy of the trustee is by plenary action alone in the State court."

Inferentially, obiter, Clarke v. Larremore, 9 A. B. R. 476, 188 U. S. 486: "A different question might have arisen if the writ had been fully executed by payment to the execution creditor."

In re Knickerbocker, 10 A. B. R. 381, 121 Fed. 1004 (D. C. N. Y.): "It is quite true that by § 67f, 30 Stat. 565, all judgments, liens, levies, and other liens are invalidated by adjudication in bankruptcy, and the property affected by them passes to the trustee; but where the proceeds of an execution sale have actually been paid to the judgment creditor—in other words, where the transaction is completely executed—the execution creditor ceases to be a lienor, but has title to the proceeds of his execution. This title may or may not be defeasible, as may be disclosed by an action brought to recover these proceeds. * * *

"The referee was of the opinion that, as the judgment was not satisfied in full by the money realized on the execution sale, the respondents were creditors of the bankrupt, and that jurisdiction may therefore be exercised over this controversy. This contention is without merit. The respondents are not now before this court in the capacity of creditors. They are not seeking to prove a claim, and no order has been made directing a surrender of a preference as a condition of its allowance. * * * The remedy of the trustee, however, must be sought in a plenary suit brought under the provisions of § 23 (b), as amended, either in this court or the proper State tribunal, at his election."

In re Bailey, 16 A. B. R. 289, 144 Fed. 214 (D. C. only affected indirectly by a discharge of the lien. * * * The case at bar, however, presents a different condition from either of the foregoing, by reason of the fact that the purchaser, who is the judgment creditor, has come into the property by virtue of the sheriff's sale, which had been consummated prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and everything had been done that was required by law to be done for a transfer of the debtor's property to the purchaser, through the process of the court, so that, at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, the debtor was not the owner of the property, and not being the owner, a fortiori he was not the owner of the proceeds thereof. Keeping in mind, now, that it is the lien that is declared void by virtue of § 67f, and not the transfer, one can readily understand that the section does not affect the transaction vitally, or render it void. * * * But, while there seems to be some contradiction among the authorities as to when the summary proceeding will be entertained, it is well settled that it is not appropriate for the recovery of the property, or the proceeds thereof, after the same has passed into the hands of the purchaser, all prior to the petition and adjudication in bankruptcy. After the property has passed under such conditions, it amounts to a transfer, and it becomes a preference, if liable at all to the suit of the trustee, and the manner of recovery is prescribed by § 60a and § 60b of the Bankruptcy Act. In such events, it is also necessary to show that the preference was received by the beneficiary under a belief on his part, or having reasonable grounds therefor, that it was intended for such purpose. Otherwise, even the transfer is not voidable."

But a delivery of the attached property to the attaching creditor upon the giving of a redelivery bond by the creditor, is not within the doctrine of this paragraph, for the property, in such circumstances, is still in the custody of the court, in the eyes of the law, the bond standing in the stead of the property, in specie; and the doctrine of this paragraph refers only to the proceeds of property sold under order.³

§ 1478. And Recovery Only to Be Had on Other Grounds than § 67 (f).—And in case the sheriff has already paid the proceeds over to the execution creditor at the time of the filing of the bankruptcy petition, recovery can be had only on proof of a voidable preference or of some other ground of recovery than simply § 67 itself, for the proviso in § 67 (f) applies only to cases where the lien was still in existence at the time of the filing of the bankruptcy petition.⁴

Botts v. Hammond, 3 A. B. R. 775, 99 Fed. 916 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Both of these subdivisions ('c' and 'f' of § 67) deal with the lien as existing. But in the case before us the lien had been merged in the judgment; the property had been sold under lawful orders of the court, having full jurisdiction; the money has been distributed, and the lien gone. There is nothing upon which the subdivision of this section can act or to which these provisions can apply. Were it possible for the District Court, sitting in bankruptcy, to go back, and set aside every step taken, put the trustee in possession of the property, let him administer the same de novo, and pursue all the steps which have been taken, only with increased cost and expense, the petitioning creditors have lost all claim on the process of the court by their delay, after full notice, in taking any steps until the money was distributed, and all the other creditors had committed themselves and had discharged their debtor."

In re Resnek, 21 A. B. R. 740, 167 Fed. 574 (D. C. The remedy, if any the trustee has, against the creditor, is under the provisions of §§ 60a and 60b of the Bankruptcy Act in a plenary action, where it will be necessary to allege and show that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe that the bankrupt, by suffering judgment to be taken against him, intended to give a preference."

Compare, inferentially, to same effect, Johnson v. Anderson, 11 A. B. R. 294 (Sup. Ct. Neb.): "In an action by a trustee in bankruptcy, to recover the proceeds of the property of the bankrupt paid over to a creditor on a judgment in completed attachment proceedings in his favor within four months before the bankruptcy, it must be alleged in the petition that the creditor had reasonable grounds to believe the bankrupt was insolvent, and that by suffering the attachment proceedings and judgment to be taken against him, thereby intended to make a preference."

Peck v. Connell, 6 A. B. R. 93 (Penn. Com. Pleas, affirmed in 8 A. B. R. 500): "If the proceedings have been allowed to go on and the lien has been enforced by sale, there is nothing which enables the money realized or the value of the property to be reached in the hands of the lien creditor. Before it had got to that point the bankrupt court might have intervened and stayed the process; or the court from which it issued, at the instance of creditors who had or were about to institute bankruptcy proceedings, might itself have done so. But the execution went on, a sale was had, and the proceeding is now closed in consequence, leaving nothing for either the bankruptcy court or this court to act upon."

And if such ground is that of preference, then reasonable cause for believing a preference would be effected must, of course, be proved;⁵ as, for

Clarke v. Larremore, Trustee, 9 A. B. R. 476, 188 U. S. 486 (affirming In re Kenney, 5 A. B. R. 355): "It is said that that money was not the property of the bankrupt but of the creditor in the execution. Doubtless as between the judgment creditor and debtor, and while the execution remained in force, the money could not be considered the property of the debtor, and could not be appropriated to the payment of his debts as against the rights of the judgment creditor, but it had not become the property absolutely of the creditor. The writ of execution had not been fully executed. Its command to the sheriff was to seize the property of the judgment debtor, sell it and pay the proceeds over to the creditor. The time within which that was to be done had not elapsed, and the execution was still in his hands not fully executed. The rights of the creditor were still subject to interception. Suppose, for instance, there being no bankruptcy proceedings, the judgment had been reversed by an appellate court and the mandate of reversal filed in the trial court, could it for a moment be claimed that, notwithstanding the reversal of the judgment, the money in the hands of the sheriff belonged to the judgment creditor, and could be recovered by him, or that it was the duty of the sheriff to pay it to him? The purchaser at the sheriff's sale might keep possession of the property which he had purchased, but the money received as the proceeds of such sale would undoubtedly belong and be paid over to the judgment debtor. The bankruptcy proceedings operated in the same way. They took away the foundation upon which the rights of the creditor, obtained by judgment, execution, levy and sale, rested. The duty of the sheriff to pay the money over to the judgment creditor was gone, and that money became the property of the bankrupt, and was subject to the control of his representative in bankruptcy."

Obiter, Mohr & Sons v. Mattox, 12 A. B. R. 332 (Sup. Ct. Ga.): "If the sheriff had immediately levied the executions and sold the property, but had not turned over the proceeds to the plaintiffs, the trustee in bankruptcy would have been entitled to the same for administration in the bankruptcy court."

And the delivery of the attached property to the attaching creditor, under redelivery bond, would not alter the case, since such property is, in legal contemplation, still in the possession of the court's officer, the bond answering therefor.⁸

But if the levy was not made within the four months, then the mere continued possession by the sheriff of the proceeds of sale will not cause the proceeds to pass to the trustee in bankruptcy.⁹

in the District Court, the court did not decide whether the lien itself was void but merely that the sheriff must turn over all the proceeds and work out his lien, if he had any, in the bankruptcy court.

And it is perhaps to be inferred from one case that the sheriff or other court officer may be entitled to his costs as an equitable lien, like assignees on turning over assigned property in case perhaps the attachment operated to benefit all creditors. In re Francis-Valentine Co., 2 A. B. R. 522 (affirming 2 A. B. R. 188, 93 Fed. 945, D. C. Calif.). Such right, however, could not be deemed a right of "priority" for the "actual and necessary expense of preserving the estate" under § 64 (b) except perhaps as to such part thereof as accrued "subsequent to the filing of the petition;" nor could it come within the other priority accorded by § 64 (b) (2) unless it operated to "recover property fraudulently transferred or concealed," which an attachment could hardly be said to accomplish. B. R. 349, Fed. Cas. No. 17145), leaving to that company only the right to prove the debt sued for, and the costs incurred in good faith prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, as an unsecured claim against the estate of the bankrupt."

But, in cases where State or United States laws give priority to the costs, they may have the same priority in bankruptcy, under § 64 (b) (5).¹⁹

In re Lewis, 4 A. B. R. 51, 99 Fed. 935 (D. C. Mass.): "Priority of a sheriff's (attachment) fees under the Massachusetts statute (insolvency) will be recognized and enforced in the bankruptcy court by virtue of § 64 (b) (5) giving priority to debts owing to any person who by the laws of the State or the United States is entitled to priority."

§ 1486. Sheriff No Right to Retain Creditor's Costs, nor to Retain Property Till Costs Paid.—At any rate, the sheriff has no right to retain the execution creditor's costs out of the proceeds of sale nor to retain the property until the costs are paid, for those costs are a claim only against the one who made them, namely, the creditor himself, and are not a lien on the fund; since the creditor himself has no valid lien therefor.²⁰

But compare, In re Schmidt & Co., 21 A. B. R. 593, 177 Fed. 1006 (C. C. A. N. Y.), which arose upon a petition to review an order directing the trustee in bankruptcy to pay the fees of the sheriff of New York on two executions levied upon property of the bankrupt within four months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. "We are satisfied that the language used by Congress in the 67th section of the Bankrupt Act providing that levies under judgment within the period named 'shall be deemed null and void' was not intended to deprive the State's officer of his statutory fees, accruing prior to bankruptcy, under proceedings in the State courts, which were in all respects regular and in accordance with the State law and practice."

However, it may be proper for the sheriff to retain out of the fund in his hands the costs which the bankrupt himself made.

§ 1487. Creditor May Prove Claim Where Lien Nullified, Also Costs.—The creditor whose lien is thus rendered null and void by the bankruptcy is not debarred from proving his claim as an unsecured debt for sharing in the dividends.²¹ And he may also prove his costs.²²

And a seizure, by replevin or otherwise, from his custody, has been treated as a direct interference with the custody of the bankruptcy court.

In re Walsh Bros., 20 A. B. R. 472, 159 Fed. 560, 163 Fed. 352 (D. C. Iowa): "It is urged that, if the plaintiffs in the several replevin suits sold the property replevied by them respectively to the bankrupts, under such circumstances as will entitle them to rescind the sales and reclaim the property, the title to such property would not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy. The merits of this contention will not be heard or considered upon this hearing. It is admitted that the property had been delivered to the bankrupts pursuant to contracts of purchase thereof, and was in their possession when it was seized by the sheriff under the attachment, and was in his custody at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy. The adjudication in bankruptcy discharged the attachment and released the attached property therefrom, unless the court of bankruptcy shall order the lien preserved for the benefit of the bankrupt estate. Bankruptcy Act, § 67f, * * * The adjudication also operated as a seizure of the property, and it was in custodia legis from that time; and upon the appointment and qualification of the trustee the title and right thereto passed to the trustee, who then became its legal custodian for the court of bankruptcy, and that court will award it to whomever it rightly belongs. *White v. First Nat'l Bk. v. Staake, 15 A. B. R. 642, 202 U. S. 141: "This section (67f) makes two distinct provisions for the disposition of the property of an insolvent attached within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him. First, such attachments shall be declared null and void, and the property affected shall be deemed released, and shall pass to the trustee of the estate of the bankrupt; or second, the court may order that the right acquired by the attachment shall be preserved for the benefit of the estate. In the first case the whole property passes free from the attachment. In the second, so much of the value of the property attached as is represented by the attachments passes to the trustee for the benefit of the entire body of creditors that is 'for the benefit of the estate'—in other words the statute recognizes the lien of the attachment, but distributes the lien among the whole body of creditors.

"The first provision contemplates the attachment of property to which the bankrupt has the complete legal and equitable title, which, as soon as the attachment is dissolved, passes at once to the bankrupt's trustee as part of his estate. The second provision evidently does not apply to this, as there is no object in preserving the lien of the attachment for the benefit of the estate, since under the first clause the entire value of the property attached passes to the trustee free from the attachment. The second clause contemplates property in which the bankrupt has an interest which has been secured to attaching

Also, Bankr. Act, § 67 (b): "Whenever a creditor is prevented from enforcing his rights as against a lien created by his debtor, who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, the trustee of the estate of such bankrupt shall be subrogated to and may enforce such rights of such creditor for the benefit of the estate."

Sale of the property had been advertised and was about to be made, at the date of adjudication. On motion of plaintiff and for saving of expense to the estate, the court of bankruptcy ordered the officer making the levy to proceed with the sale."

creditors by the levy of the writ, but which might have passed to another person, as, for instance, a purchaser under an unrecorded deed, but for the fact that the attaching creditors had acquired a prior lien thereon. In such case the statute recognizes the validity of the lien, but preserves it for the benefit of the entire body of creditors, by reason of the fact that the attachment was dissolved as a preferential lien in favor of the attaching creditors, by the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy.

"In the present case Baird had contracted to convey the property to the Roanoke Furnace Company, possession had been taken and the consideration paid, but the deed was not actually executed and recorded until after the attachment had been levied. Hence, under the Virginia statute, the validity of which is not questioned, the lien of the attachment took precedence of the deed, and would have remained a prior lien, had it not been for the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings within four months. This dissolved the attachment, and had the case rested here, the property would have apparently passed to the Furnace Company, or to its trustee in bankruptcy, Shimer; but at this point the court, under the second proviso of 67f, interposed and recognized the lien of the attachment, not, however, solely for the benefit of the attaching creditors, but for the benefit of Baird's estate. Shimer made no objection, and the court declined to express an opinion as to his rights.

"This is one of the very contingencies provided for by the second clause of the section, which apparently vests in the court a certain discretion with regard to the preservation of the right acquired under the attachment or other lien. In this case the court recognized the validity of the lien, the trustee of the Furnace Company making no objection to this; but the attaching creditors insist that, as the lien was acquired for their own benefit, they should not be required to share with the general creditors of Baird's estate."

In re New York Economical Printing Co., 6 A. B. R. 615, 110 Fed. 518 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Subdivision 'b' § 67 (Act of 1898), preserves for the benefit of the estate in bankruptcy a right which some particular creditor has been prevented from enforcing by the intervention of the debtor's bankruptcy. If a creditor, by an execution or a creditors' bill, has secured a legal or equitable lien upon the mortgaged property before the mortgagor has been adjudicated a bankrupt, under this provision his rights will or will not inure to the benefit of the estate, depending upon the time when the lien was acquired. If acquired more than four months before the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding, his lien would inure to his own exclusive benefit; but, if acquired at any time within the four months, it would be null and void, under subdivision 'f' of the section, except as preserved for the benefit of the estate as provided in that subdivision and in subdivision 'b.'"

In re Baird, 11 A. B. R. 438, 126 Fed. 845 (D. C. Va.): "The power of the court, and indeed its duty to take away from the attaching creditors the benefit of their liens and give it to the trustee is found specifically in § 67f."

Obiter, Watschke v. Thompson, 7 A. B. R. 504 (Sup. Ct. Minn.): "The adjudication in bankruptcy had the effect of dissolving the attachment against the property of the bankrupt and restoring the title of the property to the estate. When the trustee received his appointment, on Nov. 29th, there was one or two courses of action open to him; to accept the result of the dissolution, and pursue the property, wherever it might be, or, upon due notice, to obtain an order preserving the benefit of the attachment, if for any purpose the interests of the estate would thereby be best conserved."

Obiter, In re Sentenne & Green Co., 9 A. B. R. 648, 120 Fed. 436 (D. C. Pa.): In this case the question arose as to whether certain after-acquired property came under the lien of a chattel mortgage attempting to cover after-acquired property and if so, whether attachments cut off the mortgagee's right as to such property and should be preserved for the benefit of the creditors in bankruptcy, the court finally refusing to order preservation because of inequity, saying, however, obiter, "But it is conceded that, In re New York Economical Printing Co., 6 Am. B. R. 615, 49 C. C. A. 133, 110 Fed. 514, the Circuit Court of Appeals of this circuit determined that a trustee was not permitted to attack the mortgage unless he represented a creditor 'armed with process;' but the trustee urges that he is thus enabled by the fact that he has been subrogated by the order of this court to the rights of the creditors who levied attachments upon the after-acquired property, even before there was any attempt to foreclose the mortgage. If the order of subrogation be allowed to stand, the trustee's position seems to be correct."

The levying creditor derives no special benefit from the preserving of the lien. It is not preserved for his benefit. Thus the trustee is obliged to assume two apparently inconsistent attitudes—in the State Court, that the lien is valid, in the bankruptcy court, that it is void. These attitudes are really not inconsistent, however, for the lien is valid in the State Court and invalid in the bankruptcy court.

Subrogation to nullified attachment liens, which under State law would have cut off chattel mortgagees' rights to after-acquired property, has been sometimes granted²⁸ and sometimes refused²⁹ on grounds of equity.

Likewise, the preservation of other attachment liens, which would have cut off intervening rights, have been granted³⁰ or refused as the court has deemed equitable.

Likewise, subrogation to the nullified liens of creditors' bills has been sometimes granted,³¹ and at other times refused³² as the court has deemed equitable.

The lien of an assignment for the benefit of creditors has been preserved in order to invalidate unrecorded liens which otherwise would be good as against the trustee in bankruptcy.

In re Fish Bros. Wagon Co., 21 A. B. R. 149, 164 Fed. 553 (C. C. A. Kans.): "We think that a title or lien acquired by an assignee under a general assignment valid according to the law of the State where it is made, that is to the advantage of the estate when it has passed into bankruptcy, is not necessarily destroyed by the supersession of the assignment proceeding, but that upon the order of the court of bankruptcy it may be retained by the trustee for the benefit of the creditors. This conclusion is in harmony with the object sought by express provisions of the Bankruptcy Act for the preservation of liens obtained in judicial proceedings against the debtor, and it is a fair corollary of the settled rule allowing the assignee compensation for acts that are beneficial to the estate which afterwards passes to the trustee."

Similarly, the liens of executions have been preserved, to cut off unrecorded conditional sales contracts and other unrecorded instruments.

Plow Co. v. Reardon, 222 U. S. 354, 27 A. B. R. 492 (affirming Reardon v. Plow Co., 22 A. B. R. 26, 168 Fed. 654 C. C. A.): "The claim of the trustee was in substance (1) that delivery to the sheriff of executions upon the Sechler and Cordage judgments operated without levy to create liens upon the real and personal property of Brown, the judgment debtor, within the county; (2) that such liens were paramount to rights in the property possessed by a vendor under a contract of conditional sale; and (3) that the effect of the subrogation order was to render inoperative as a preference the liens obtained by the judgment creditors through their executions, and to preserve such liens as of the date of the filing of the proceedings in voluntary bankruptcy for the benefit of the estate in bankruptcy. That the Circuit Court of Appeals rightly held the affirmative of these three propositions we entertain no doubt. Upon the first two propositions that court said:

"As the law of Illinois must govern the answer to both questions, and the rule there is well settled, as we believe, for an affirmative answer to each, no difficulty appears in the solution. Paragraph 9 of chapter 77, Rev. Stat. 1874 (2 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1896, p. 2336) provides: "No execution shall bind the goods and chattels of the person against whom it is issued until it is delivered to the sheriff or other proper officer to be executed." This is a modification of the rule at common law which created a lien from the issuance of the writ, and its effect to create a lien in favor of the execution creditor is recognized in numerous decisions noted in Starr & C. Anno. Stat. supra. See Frink v. Pratt, 130 Ill. 327, 331, 22 N. E. 819, one of the citations in appellee's brief. The cases cited contra declaratory of the rule that an officer receiving the execution has "no interest in the property itself" to maintain an action therefor "until after a levy," do not touch the present inquiry of lien in favor of the execution creditor, and are plainly inapplicable. Upon the second question, it is stated in Gilbert v. National Cash Register Co., 176 Ill. 288, 296, 52 N. E. 22, that "whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions," this rule is established in Illinois: "If a person agrees to sell to another a chattel on condition that the price shall be paid within a certain time, retaining the title in himself in the meantime, and delivers the chattel to the vendee so as to clothe him with an apparent ownership, a bona fide purchaser or execution creditor of the latter is entitled to protection as against the claim of the original vendor." The authorities there cited for such rule are deemed sufficient reference; and we remark that no departure appears from the doctrine thus stated in any of the Illinois cases called to our attention.'

"As the execution issued upon the judgments, which executions were held under conditional sale contracts, and such liens were paramount to the rights of the vendor, the plow company, it is manifest that the right of the judgment creditors to resort to such property in satisfaction of their liens could not be destroyed by a mere transfer of possession from one party to the contract to the other party thereto. It also follows in reason, we think, that the liens of the execution creditors in the property as they existed when the petition in voluntary bankruptcy was filed could not be subsequently destroyed by the acts of the creditors, the third parties, to the prejudice of the estate, and that if the rights of the bankrupt estate could be lost by the laches of the trustee, the record presents no evidence of such laches."

Reardon v. Rock Island Plow Co., 22 A. B. R. 26, 168 Fed. 654 (C. C. A. Ills.): "The Bankruptcy Act provides (§ 67b, c. f.) for the preservation of liens in favor of the estate, when obtained by any creditor of the bankrupt, through legal proceedings or otherwise, and set aside in bankruptcy, with the trustee subrogated therein for their enforcement; and the effect of this provision, in reference to an order in bankruptcy so preserving a lien obtained in legal proceedings, is not open to question (First National Bank v. Staake, 202 U. S. 141, 146, 148, 15 Am. B. R. 639, 26 Sup. Ct. 580, 50 L. Ed. 967) as rendering it inoperative as a preference, while the statute recognizes its force otherwise, but 'distributes the lien among the whole body of the creditors,' in conformity with the policy of the act. The executions described in the bill were issued in favor of judgment creditors of the bankrupt and in the hands of the sheriff for levy; and when bankruptcy intervened, liens being claimed, the court made this statutory order, on notice to the claimants—the only notice, as we believe, intended by the provision—so that the trustee became subrogated to any lien obtained by such creditors, as of the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy."

Likewise, the lien of creditors under a suit to set aside a transfer that is preferential under State law but not under the Bankruptcy Law has been preserved.

Miller v. Acic & Fertilizer Co., 21 A. B. R. 416, 211 U. S. 496 (affirming 117 La. 821): "It is obvious that if, at the time of the alleged preferential transfer to Miller, there were no other creditors of the individual estate of Guillory than Miller, under the rule laid down by the Bankrupt Act, the transfer to him of assets of the individual estate, in payment of an individual debt, did not constitute a preference. That it might have constituted a preference under the State law results from the difference in the classification made by the State law, on the one hand, and the bankruptcy law on the other. * * * As the suit by the creditors was brought within four months before the adjudication in bankruptcy, [the filing of the petition?] their right to a lien or preference arising from the suit was annulled by the provisions of subdivision f of § 67 of the bankrupt law. But that section authorized the trustee, with the authority of the court, upon due notice, to preserve liens arising from pending suits for the benefit of the bankrupt estate, and to prosecute the suits to the end for the accomplishment of that purpose. * * * It is inferable that the parties proceeded." [For further quotation, see § 1491.]

Of course orders of subrogation are improper where the lien by legal proceedings was obtained more than four months before the filing of the bankruptcy petition.³³

No order of subrogation will be granted where the lien is upon property not exempt as to the lien but exempt as to others.

In re Jackson, 8 A. B. R. 594 (D. C. Pa.): "The referee refused to make the order holding that exempt property could not be administered by a court of bankruptcy and that the effect of the order prayed for would be to draw the administration of such property into this court. I agree with him."

The referee has jurisdiction to order the trustee to intervene.³⁴

In re Baird, 11 A. B. R. 438, 126 Fed. 845 (D. C. Va.): "It is further argued that the case at bar is not within the intent of the Act, because the right here contended for by the trustee is not mentioned in § 70 (a) of the Act. This argument does not seem to me to be of any force. Section 70 (a) is an enumeration of those properties the title to which passes to the trustee by operation of law. The right here asked for by the trustee can be given him only by order of court. It would have been inconsistent, even absurd, to have provided in § 70 (a) that the rights of attaching creditors in a case such as we have here shall vest in the trustee by operation of law, when it had been provided in 67 (f) that such rights should be vested in the trustee by order of court."

Watschke v. Thompson, 7 A. B. R. 504 (Sup. Ct. Minn.): "Such an action cannot be maintained unless it is based upon the order of the court provided for in subdivision 'f' of § 67, preserving the attachment for the benefit of the estate."

Thompson v. Fairbanks, 13 A. B. R. 437, 196 U. S. 516: "The mortgage assigned to the bank, and the attachment obtained by Ryan, having been dissolved by the bankrupt proceedings, the defendant's rights under his mortgage of April 15, 1891, stood the same as though there had been no subsequent mortgage given, or attachment levied. This is the view taken by the State court of the effect of the dissolution of the mortgage and attachment liens under the Bankrupt Act, and we think it is a correct one. It is stated in the opinion of the State court as follows:

"It is urged that with the annulment of the attachment, the property affected by it passed to the trustee as a part of the estate of the bankrupt under the express provisions of § 67f. There would be more force in this contention were it not for the provision that, by order of the court, an attachment lien may be preserved for the benefit of the estate. If there is no other lien on the property, there can be no occasion for such order; for, on the dissolution of the attachment, the property, unless exempt, would pass to the trustee anyway. It is only when the property for some reason may not otherwise pass to the trustee as a part of the estate that such order is necessary. We think such is the purpose of that provision, and that unless the lien is preserved, the property, as in the case at bar, may be held upon some other lien, and not pass to the trustee. Re Sentenne & G. Co., 9 A. B. R. 648, 120 Fed. 436."

Goodnough Stock Co. v. Galloway, 22 A. B. R. 803, 171 Fed. 940 (D. C. Ga.): "There is provided in that subdivision [Bankr. Act, § 67f] a method whereby the lien of attachment may in proper cases be preserved for the benefit of the estate. This may be done by order of the court on due notice. No attempt, however, was made in the bankruptcy proceeding to so preserve the attachment lien of the bank for the benefit of the estate, and no such order of court has been made within the purview of the Act, and hence it cannot be insisted that the attachment lien still exists for any purpose. The statute was designed to preserve some interest acquired by virtue of the attachment, which would not pass to the trustee by virtue of the bankruptcy proceeding. * * * If the property passes at any rate to the trustee, there is no necessity for invoking the order of the court. The attachment being dissolved, the trustee is not further embarrassed in his settlement of the estate."

And a reasonable time is allowed the trustee to apply for such order.³⁷

The order of preservation is to be made by the bankruptcy court, not by the State court.

Obiter, Miller v. Acid & Fertilizer Co., 21 A. B. R. 416, 211 U. S. 496: "It is inferable that the parties proceeded upon the erroneous conception that the State court, where the suit was pending, was competent to authorize the trustee; but, as no question on that subject was made below or is here raised, we may not reverse the judgment in favor of the trustee because of the absence of authority from the bankrupt court, when presumably the want of authority would have been supplied had its absence been challenged. Assuming, therefore, that the trustee was properly authorized, it follows that he was entitled to preserve and enforce the privilege or lien which arose in favor of the creditors, resulting from their pending action, even although the cause of action arose from the State law, and the application of that law was essential to secure the relief sought. To the accomplishment of this end the bankrupt law was cumulative and did not abrogate the State law." [For further quotation, see ante, § 1489.]

And the referee has jurisdiction to make the order.³⁸

But if the order is not made until after the property is surrendered by the creditor, it is, perhaps, too late; since, then, there is no longer any lien in existence to which the trustee might be subrogated.³⁹

In re Walsh Bros., 28 A. B. R. 243, 195 Fed. 576 (D. C. Ia.): "The adjudication at once discharged and released the lien of the attachment, unless the court should order it preserved for the benefit of the bankrupt estate as provided in the section above quoted. That section does not prescribe when such order shall be made, nor the proceedings required to preserve the lien. The trustee was elected February 13, 1908, and no request was made by him or by any creditor to have the attachment lien preserved, and no order was made by the referee authorizing him to appear in the State court until April 13, following. The attachment lien had then been dissolved and released by operation of law for two months, and the trustee could only be subrogated to such rights as the attaching creditor then had, which were none. In any case wherein it is desired to preserve an attachment or execution lien upon the property for the benefit of the estate under § 67f, steps must be taken to that end before the lien is discharged. Davis v. Crompton (C. C. A., 3d Cir.), 20 Am. B. R. 53, 158 Fed. 735-743, 85 C. C. A. 633. The subrogation of the trustee as plaintiff in the attachment suit after the lien has been discharged does not revive the lien. The trustee therefore acquired no rights under the attachment of P. Walsh, Sr."

But an order of preservation has been held not to be requisite where the lien is dissolved under § 67c, or the state courts' custody superseded, under that section, rather than under § 67 "f."

First Nat. Bk. v. Title & Trust Co., 24 A. B. R. 330, 178 Fed. 187 (C. C. A. Pa.): "In so far as 67 (c) is in conflict with 67 (f) the former is doubtless superseded by the latter section. But, if our construction of 67 c. is correct, the lien now under consideration was not dissolved by any of its provisions, but on the contrary, it was preserved, and the trustee, by operation of law and without any intervening court order, subrogated to the rights of the former receiver. Section 67 f, does not conflict with the view of 67 c. Section 67 f, like clauses 1, 2 and 3 of the first sentence of 67 c, relates only to liens, obtained for the benefit of less than all of the bankrupt's general creditors, and not to a lien which benefits all the creditors and the dissolution of which will result in giving priority to particular creditors. A trustee in bankruptcy is not by 67 f subrogated by mere operation of law to the rights of a levying creditor. He must obtain an order of court preserving the rights of the levying creditor for the benefit of the bankrupt's estate, as was done in First Nat'l Bk. v. Staake, 202 U. S. 148, 15 A. B. R. 639." This case is further quoted at §§ 1446 and 1603.

§ 1491½. Whether Extent of Lien Measures Extent of Trustee's Rights.—It would seem to follow, logically, that the extent of the lien preserved would measure the extent of the trustee's rights acquired by virtue of the preservation. So that, as to any surplus of value of the property over the amount of the lien, the trustee would stand in the bankrupt's shoes.⁴¹

However, it may be that all that is requisite is to establish the qualifications of the creditor as a lien creditor and that when the transfer is voidable as to him it is voidable as to all others entitled to his rights to the extent not of his loss but of their losses.

But an order of preservation is held, not to be necessary where the superseding of the State court's custody occurs through the operation of § 67 (c) rather than of § 67 (f), First Nat. Bank v. Title & Trust Co., 24 A. B. R. 330, 178 Fed. 187 (C. C. A. Pa.), quoted at §§ 1446, 1491 and 1603.

§ 1492. Lien Not Preserved, Is Void as to Other Lienholders on Same Property.—And if the lien is not preserved by order, it is void as to other lienholders on the same property.

Thompson v. Fairbanks, 13 A. B. R. 437, 196 U. S. 516: "The trustee moved under § 67f * * * on notice to the defendant, for an order that the right or lien under the Ryan attachment should be preserved, so that the same might pass to the trustee for the benefit of the estate, as provided for in that section. This was denied. And unless such permission had been granted, the lien of the attachment was not preserved by the Act, but, on the contrary, it was dissolved under § 67c."

And this is so notwithstanding the dissolution of the lien is, as held in In re Merrow, 12 A. B. R. 615, 131 Fed. 993 (D. C. Mass.) for the benefit of the estate. Although the dissolution be for the benefit of the estate, the benefit, by the neglect of the trustee, has been relinquished to the lienholders. It is, indeed, precisely because the other liens are valid and that the lienholders and not the trustee would get the benefit of the dissolution that the lien is to be preserved. The dissolution of liens by legal proceedings under § 67 (f) was intended for the benefit of the estate, not for that of other lienholders, no matter how valid might be their own liens.

§ 1493. Third Branch of Trustee's Peculiar Title and Rights Conferred by Bankruptcy Act—Fraudulent Transfers within Four Months.—Under the last class of titles obtained by the trustee in bankruptcy, the third subject added is not comprehended within the ordinary common-law rights of creditors.⁴²

For the bankruptcy act by its peculiar provisions makes void all transfers made by a bankrupt within four months of his bankruptcy, where such transfers were made with the intent on his part to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, although the transferee in no way participated in such intent; unless such transferee shall prove, by way of defense, his own bona fides and his giving of a present, fair consideration therefor.⁴³

tion, with the intent and purpose on his part to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them, shall be null and void as against the creditors of such debtor, except as to purchasers in good faith and for a present fair consideration; and all property of the debtor conveyed, transferred, assigned, or encumbered as aforesaid shall, if he be adjudged a bankrupt, and the same is not exempt from ex-

This simply throws upon the transferee the burden of proving good faith and present consideration, instead of throwing upon creditors the burden of proving his participation in the fraudulent intent.

In view of the fact that all property fraudulently conveyed passes to the trustee by operation of § 70 of the Act, it is evident no reason for the adding of the first sentence of this § 67 (e) could have existed had it not been that by this peculiar provision conveyances, transfers and incumbrances made by the bankrupt within the four months preceding bankruptcy are void, even if made with merely his own intent to hinder, delay and defraud creditors, unless the transferee prove his own good faith and adequate consideration. At common law and under the statutes, except this bankruptcy statute in its § 67 (e), a prima facie case for setting aside a transfer as fraudulent is not complete unless proof be made by the creditor of the transferee's participation in the fraudulent intent; and a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance, may fail precisely because of this inability to prove affirmatively the transferee's participation in the fraudulent intent.

By this provision of the first part of § 67 (e), then, fraudulent conveyances within the four months are voidable if made with solely the debtor's intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, even if there be no participation of the transferee in the intent, unless the transferee himself prove his own good faith and his giving of a present, fair consideration therefor.

§ 1494. Prima Facie Case without Proof of Transferee's Participation.—It is not necessary, then, in order to make a case for setting aside a fraudulent conveyance made within four months of bankruptcy, to prove in the first instance a participation in the fraudulent intent on the part of the person receiving the conveyance, but good faith and present, fair consideration is a defense to be pleaded and proved by the transferee.⁴⁴ ecution and liability for debts by the law of his domicile, be and remain a part of the assets and estate of the bankrupt and shall pass to his said trustee, whose duty it shall be to recover and reclaim the same by legal proceedings or otherwise for the benefit of the creditors."

Section 67 (e) Covers Two Classes of Fraudulent Transfers.—It must be observed that § 67 (e) covers two classes of fraudulent transfers: First, those where the transferee's fraudulent intent alone need be proved to make out a prima facie case; second, those which are fraudulent by State law. The first class only is being considered at this place since it alone is a title peculiarly conferred by the Bankruptcy Act. The second class has already been considered in connection with the "Title of the Trustee as Successor to the Creditors," ante, § 1216.

Other distinctions as to § 67 (e).

(1) The distinction is also made in one case that fraudulent conveyances made within the four months period are absolutely void upon the filing of the bankruptcy petition while those made before that time are voidable merely. In re Grohs, 1 A. B. R. 465 (Ref. Ohio). - This seems to be a misconception of the object of the statute.

(2) In another case, § 67 (e) is considered to include "frauds upon the Act" as contradistinguished from other frauds upon creditors. In re Gray, 3 A. B. R. 649, 47 App. Div. N. Y. 554 (N. Y. Sup. Ct. App.).

⁴⁴ Also, see Friedman v. Vorhofsky, 105 Ill. App. 414; Shelton, trustee, Sherman v. Luckhardt, 11 A. B. R. 26 (Sup. Ct. Kansas, overruling Sherman v. Luckhardt, 9 A. B. R. 312 Sup. Ct. Kas.): "The clauses quoted from § 57 and § 60 treat alone the subject of preferences. No mention is there made of fraud. The lawmaking power dealt with the subject of fraud in clause "e" of § 67 of the act, and, in language so plain, concise, exact and unequivocal as to leave no room for doubt or construction, there inhibited all transfers of

And also compare, to the effect that § 67 (e) does not, at any rate, refer to payments of money, Blakey v. Booneville Bk., 2 A. B. R. 462 (D. C. Ind.). This case was reversed in Booneville Nat'l Bk. v. Blakey, 6 A. B. R. 13, 107 Fed. 241 (C. C. A. Ind.), but not on this ground.

Inferentially, In re Knopf, 16 A. B. R. 445, 144 Fed. 245 (D. C. S. C.); instance, In re Head and Smith, 7 A. B. R. 556 (D. C. Ark.), the latter being a case where one partner sold out to another partner when the partnership was insolvent; held to be a hindering, delaying and defrauding of firm creditors in an attempt to convert firm property into individual property.

Instance, In re Steinger Mercantile Co., 6 A. B. R. 68, 107 Fed. 669 (C. C. A. Ga.): Executing mortgages in behalf of favored creditors who are not pressing for payment nor asking for security, the mortgages covering all the debtor's property and being concededly made with the intent that the debtors might thereby enforce indulgence from other creditors and further advances from the mortgagees.

Instance, In re Egan State Bk. v. Rice, 9 A. B. R. 437, 119 Fed. 107 (C. C. A. S. Dak., affirming In re Platte, 6 A. B. R. 568): Chattel mortgage with power of sale, where the proceeds of the sales are not applied on the debt (no participation in the fraudulent intent appearing on the mortgagees' part).

Instance held not invalid under § 67 (e). Chattel mortgage within the four months and duly recorded, there being an oral agreement that the goods should be filled to customers supplied by a particular commission house and in its name and net proceeds to be applied to payment of mortgage debt, justifies no inference that the mortgage was made with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. In re Durham, 8 A. B. R. 115, 114 Fed. 750 (D. C. Md.).

Instance held not invalid under § 67 (e): Partner pledging his insurance policies to creditor of firm with stipulation not to become firm property, all under advice of counsel—not under § 67 (e) nor fraudulent: In re Bloch, 15 A. B. R. 748 (C. C. A. N. Y.).

Instance, held not invalid under § 67 (e). Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 153 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa).

Instance, held invalid under § 67 (e) but transferee's intent not adverted to. Henkel v. Seider, 20 A. B. R. 773, 163 Fed. 553 (D. C. N. Y.): Voluntary transfers to wives to avoid creditors.

Instances, In re Pease, 12 A. B. R. 66, 129 Fed. 446 (D. C. Mich.): Chattel mortgage executed within four months period, for presently passing consideration, namely, a loan to be used in making preferential payments, known by mortgagee or of which he had reasonable grounds for inference, is void under § 67 (e).

Instance, Clingman v. Miller, 20 A. B. R. 360, 160 Fed. 326 (C. C. A. Kans.), although this was also under the last clause of § 67 (e) as well as under the first clause, and therefore properly appearing also at § 1269, where it can be found; the court in this case holding that where an insolvent debtor, in a jurisdiction where the statute provides that every general assignment shall be for the benefit of all the creditors of the assignor, on the same day that he made a general assignment for creditors, transferred certain property to a particular creditor by a separate instrument, the trustee in bankruptcy, in a suit to recover the value of property transferred to the particular creditor, is entitled to go to the jury on the question whether the transfer was a part of the transaction which resulted in the making of the general assignment, so as to make the transfer void both under the State law and also under § 67 (e) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1898, and the direction of a verdict against the plaintiff constitutes reversible error.

the property of an insolvent debtor made within four months prior to the institution of bankruptcy proceedings under the act wherein the debtor, with the intent on his part of hindering, delaying or defrauding his creditors, parted with his property regardless of the knowledge of or participation in such fraud by the creditor. This is a case of first instance in this State in construing the above provisions of the act. In other jurisdictions a like view of the act has been reached. Friedman v. Verchofsky, 105 Ill. App. 414; Unmack v. Douglass (Conn.), 55 Atl. 12. There are cases holding a contrary view. Congleton v. Schreiber (N. J. Ch.), 54 Atl. 144; Gamble v. Elkin (Pa.), 54 Atl. 782. However, the reasoning employed in these cases, contrary to the view expressed in this opinion, does not commend itself to our judgment or meet our approval. Such a construction of the act would nullify one of its most important and beneficial provisions."

In re McLam, 3 A. B. R. 245, 97 Fed. 922 (D. C. Vt.): "The provision of the latter act is more prohibitive than that of the former, for no reasonable cause of belief of insolvency and fraud on the act, by the person receiving the preference, is necessary to avoid it. The purpose and intent of the bankrupt only is looked at, and if contrary to the act, is sufficient."

In re Moody, 14 A. B. R. 276, 131 Fed. 525 (D. C. Iowa): "By the plain language of this section, if Moody intended by the sale to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors, the conveyance is null and void as to such creditors, except as against good faith purchasers for a present, fair consideration. It is not necessary that the purchaser should participate in the fraudulent purpose of Moody to render the transaction void as against the trustee. Such purpose being shown it must then be made to appear that the purchase was in good faith, and for a present fair consideration, paid at the time of such purchase."

In re Hill, 15 A. B. R. 499, 140 Fed. 984 (D. C. Calif.): "The evidence is, in my opinion, sufficient to justify the finding of the referee that the intention of the bankrupt in executing the mortgage was to hinder, delay, and defraud his other creditor. It is clear from the evidence that it was the bankrupt's intention in executing this mortgage to give a preference to the petitioner. Such an intent upon his part is one 'to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditor' within the meaning of subdivision 'e' of § 67 of the Bankruptcy Act; and, in determining whether a conveyance or transfer of property made by a bankrupt was in violation of that section, 'the purpose and intent of the bankrupt only is looked at, and, if contrary to the Act, is sufficient' to render such conveyance or transfer void."

The commonly recurring instance of an insolvent merchant selling out his entire stock in trade for less than fair value and to close out;⁴⁵ and the selling out of the entire stock of a retail merchant without inventory,⁴⁶ have been held in several cases to come under this section, throwing the burden of proof of bona fides upon the purchaser.

McNulty v. Wiesen, 12 A. B. R. 341, 130 Fed. 1012 (D. C. Pa.): "Nor is the averment in the answer that the assignment was made to the respondents without any intent on their part to hinder, delay or defraud the creditors of the bankrupt impertinent, for the reason that under § 67e * * * they are required to show that they are purchasers of these accounts in good faith, and for a present, fair consideration."

In re Moody, 14 A. B. R. 276, 134 Fed. 631 (D. C. Iowa): "Such purpose (transferor's fraudulent purpose) * * * being shown, it must then be made to appear that the purchase was in good faith, and for a present, fair consideration, paid at the time of such purchase."

And the burden of proof of such good faith is on the transferee.⁴⁸ And a presently passing consideration must have been given.⁴⁹

Where the consideration moving from the transferee is purely executory, his innocence will not suffice.⁵⁰

§ 1496. What Constitutes "Good Faith."—The standard of good faith as a defense for the transferee under § 67 (e) is the same as that of a creditor in accepting payments or transfers of property as payment or as security from an insolvent debtor.⁵¹

In re Moody, 14 A. B. R. 276, 134 Fed. 631 (D. C. Iowa): "And it is uniformly held that each (a creditor or purchaser), when dealing with one who is in fact insolvent and may be adjudged a bankrupt within four months, to exercise ordinary prudence and diligence to ascertain whether or not such insolvent can make a transfer of his property to him that will not be in violation of the Bankruptcy Law."

Thus, transactions known by the purchaser to be out of the usual and ordinary course of business tend to negative good faith; such as the sale of an entire stock of goods at less than cost.⁵²

Walburn v. Babbit, 16 Wall. 577: "But it is wholly a different thing when he sells his entire stock to one or more persons. This is an unusual occurrence, out of the ordinary mode of transacting such business, is prima facie evidence of fraud, and throws the burden of proof on the purchaser to sustain the validity of his purchase. * * *

"But the law will not let him escape in this way. The question raised by the statute is not his actual belief, but what he had reasonable cause to believe. In purchasing in the way and under the circumstances he did, the law told him that a fraud of some kind was intended on the part of the seller, and he was put on inquiry to ascertain the true condition of Mendelson's [the bankrupt vendor] business. This he did not do, nor did he make any attempt in that direction. Indeed, he contented himself with limiting his inquiries to the object Mendelson had in selling out, and to his future purposes. Something more was required than this information to repel the presumption of fraud which the law raised in the mere fact of a retail merchant selling out his entire stock of goods. If this sort of information could sustain the sale, the provision of the bankrupt law we are considering would be no protection to creditors, for any one in Mendelson's situation, and with the purpose he had in view, would be likely to give the party with whom he was dealing a plausible reason for his conduct. The presumption of fraud arising from the unusual nature of the sale in this case can only be overcome by proof on the part of the buyer that he took the proper steps to find out the pecuniary condition of the seller. All reasonable means, pursued in good faith, must be used for this purpose. If Summerfield [the vendee] had employed any means at all directed to this end, he would have discovered the actual insolvency of Mendelson. In choosing to remain ignorant of what the necessities of his case required him to know, he took the risk of the impeachment of the transaction by the assignee in bankruptcy, in case Mendelson should, within the time limited in the statute, be declared a bankrupt."

Dokken v. Page, 17 A. B. R. 228, 147 Fed. 438 (C. C. A. N. Dak.): "The claim of the intervener is a palpable fraud on the Bankrupt Act. It is full time that speculating purchasers from insolvent debtors should know that under the bankrupt act they cannot stop their ears and shut their eyes lest they may hear or see that such a merchant as Tyeten was selling out his entire stock of goods in order to defeat his creditors in the collection of their just claims. Such speculators on chance seem to think that they can escape the statute by studiously and cunningly placing themselves in a position to half satisfy conscience by saying:

"I did not know the vendor was bankrupt. He did not so inform me; and I did not ask him. I did not know about his creditors, as I did not examine his books. I did not take an inventory of the goods or carefully examine them, as I had a general knowledge of their character, and did not look further"—and the like.

"Under the Bankrupt Act such a purchaser, within the four months' limitation, is presumptively a purchaser with knowledge. To protect his purchase the burden rests upon him to show satisfactorily that he was a purchaser in good faith; that he paid a present, fair consideration for the property; and that he did not know or have reason to believe that the vendor was insolvent."

Although the mere fact that the sale was one out of the usual course of business is not of itself prima facie proof of fraudulent intent, but merely a badge to be taken into consideration along with other facts.

Houck v. Christy, 18 A. B. R. 330, 152 Fed. 612 (C. C. A. Kans.): "It may be that, in the recent case of Dokken v. Page (C. C. A.), 17 Am. B. R. 228, 147 Fed. 438, involving a sale by a retail merchant of his entire stock of goods, we gave undue prominence to the language of the court in Walbrun v. Babbitt; but it was not our intention to say that the fact that the sale was out of the usual and ordinary course of business was, when taken alone, prima facie evidence of fraud under the present Bankruptcy Act, but only that it was a circumstance which, in connection with the surrounding facts disclosed in the opinion, vitiated the sale there under consideration."

Thus, a purchaser is not in good faith where he willfully closes his eyes to information with his reach.⁵³

Thus, likewise, purchasers from one known to be insolvent, or purchasing an entire stock at less than cost, are put upon inquiry, and are bound to investigate, and are not exercising good faith if they do not investigate.⁵⁴

Houck v. Christy, 18 A. B. R. 330, 152 Fed. 612 (C. C. A. Kans.): "One is not a purchaser in good faith, if he purchases with knowledge of the fraudulent intent of the vendor, or under such circumstances as should put him upon inquiry as to the object for which the vendor sells. Jones v. Simpson, 116 U. S. 609, 614, * * *. Apart from what Christy had learned through his connection with the bank, he and Cover knew that Stephenson was engaged in a business in which men usually have creditors, that he had been recently incumbering his property for small amounts, that he was hastily disposing of all of it for much less than its fair value, that he was insisting that he be paid in cash, which it is easy to conceal from creditors, and that the transaction was altogether unusual. Plainly, therefore, they had knowledge of what reasonably should have put them, as prudent men, upon inquiry as to his solvency and purpose, and were chargeable with all the knowledge which would have been acquired by prosecuting the inquiry with reasonable diligence; which they did not do."

In re Levine, 28 A. B. R. 481, 196 Fed. 589 (D. C. N. Y.): "To allow a creditor to invest the amount of his debt in a partnership business, and to receive in exchange stock of a corporation organized to take over that business, and then to allow the corporation to buy back that stock by the giving of a chattel mortgage upon the assets and by the payment of cash, when all of the parties had knowledge of the entire transaction, and when the business was at all times insolvent, is a plain fraud upon all of the creditors."

And it has apparently been held that a mortgagee who gives present and adequate consideration but who knows the proceeds are to be used to defeat the purpose of the Bankrupt Act, as, for instance, to create, indirectly, a preference, is not acting in "good faith" in the transaction, and that his mortgage is voidable.⁵⁵

But where adequate consideration was given, and the sale was talked of for a long time beforehand and everything appeared fair and above board, the transferee's good faith has been held established.⁵⁶

It has been held in Maine that a purchaser in good faith of an entire stock of merchandise in bulk is protected even where there has been failure to comply with the Anti Bulk-Sales-Act, such act not making such sale fraudulent in law.⁵⁷

More than merely the delaying of creditors is requisite; and where the transfer is based upon a presently passing consideration, it will not be void-

able for fraud unless it actually hinders or defrauds creditors and unless the transferee knew or had reasonable notice when he took it that it was intended to hinder or defraud the creditors of the transferrer, or was made in contemplation of or fraud of the bankruptcy law; and in the absence of such knowledge or notice the fact that the lien or other transfer actually hinder creditors by withdrawing securities or property from application to the payment of their debt is insufficient to avoid it.⁵⁸

§ 1496 $\frac{1}{4}$. Badges of Fraud Considered All Together, Not Separately.—Badges of fraud altogether inconclusive if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, be sufficient to constitute conclusive proof of fraudulent intent on the part of both transferrer and transferee.⁵⁹

§ 1496 $\frac{1}{2}$. Great Latitude in Admission of Evidence.—Questions of fraud can scarcely ever be proved by direct evidence, hence the necessity for admission of all circumstances fairly connected with the transaction.⁶⁰

Van Iderstine, trustee, v. Nat'l Discount Co., 23 A. B. R. 345, 174 Fed. 518 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "There is a marked distinction between a preferential payment and a fraudulent conveyance. Every preferential payment must to some extent hinder and delay creditors, but it is not necessarily a fraudulent conveyance. * * * A preferential payment may be constructively fraudulent, but it is not in and of itself a fraudulent conveyance. It can only become the latter in the unusual case where actual fraud in addition to the preferences is established. Thus a secret trust in favor of a person making such payments might turn a mere preference into a fraudulent conveyance. But there is no proof in this case of any intent to hinder or defraud creditors more than the preferential payments in themselves would have hindered them."

Coder v. Arts, 213 U. S. 223, 22 A. B. R. 1: "A consideration of the provisions of the bankruptcy law as to preferences and [fraudulent] conveyances shows that there is a wide difference between the two, notwithstanding they are sometimes spoken of in such a way as to confuse the one with the other. A preference, if it have the effect prescribed in § 60, of enabling one creditor to obtain a greater portion of the estate than others of the same class, is not necessarily fraudulent. Preferences are set aside when made within four months, with a view to obtaining an equal distribution of the estate, and in such cases it is only essential to show a transfer by an insolvent debtor to one who himself or by his agent knew of the intention to create a preference. In construing the Bankruptcy Act this distinction must be kept constantly in mind. As was said in Githens v. Shiffler (D. C.), 7 Am. B. R. 453, 112 Fed. 505: 'An attempt to prefer is not to be confounded with an attempt to defraud, nor a preferential transfer with a fraudulent one.' In re Maher, 16 A. B. R. 343, 144 Fed. 503-509, it was well said by the district court of Massachusetts: 'In a preferential transfer the fraud is constructive or technical, consisting in the infraction of that rule of equal distribution among all creditors which it is the policy of the law to enforce when all cannot be fully paid. In a fraudulent transfer the fraud is actual—the bankrupt has secured an advantage for himself out of what in law should belong to his creditors, and not to him.'"

Sargent v. Blake, 20 A. B. R. 115, 160 Fed. 57 (C. C. A. Me.): "Intentional transfers by insolvents to secure or pay pre-existing debts within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy which are not voidable as preferences under § 67e, or violative of other provisions of law, and which are made without intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors more than such securities or payments necessarily have that effect, do not evidence an intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors within the meaning of § 67e of the Bankruptcy Act of 1898. It is not every intent to hinder or delay creditors in collecting, or to prevent them from collecting, but, an intent to do so unlawfully only that is denounced by that section."

Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 152 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa, affirmed in Coder v. Arts, 22 A. B. R. 1, 213 U. § 1498. And Trustee Must Show Bankrupt's Actual Fraud.—And the trustee must, of course, as part of his case in chief show the bankrupt's fraud in making the transfer.⁶²

Coder v. Arts, 213 U. S. 223, 22 A. B. R. 1: "But the act does not dispense with the necessity of showing, to avoid a conveyance or transfer under § 67e, that the bankrupt had the actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. What is meant when it is required that such conveyances, in order to be set aside, shall be made with the intent on the bankrupt's part to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors? This form of expression is familiar to the law of fraudulent conveyances, and was used at the common law, and in the statute of Elizabeth, and has always been held to require, in order to invalidate a conveyance, that there shall be actual fraud; and it makes no difference that the conveyance was made upon a valuable consideration, if made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors. The question of fraud depends upon the motive. Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 196, 201. The mere fact that one creditor was preferred over another, or that the conveyance might have the effect to secure one creditor and deprive others of the means of obtaining payment, was not sufficient to avoid a conveyance; but it was uniformly recognized that, acting in good faith, a debtor might thus prefer one or more creditors. Stewart v. Dunham, 115 U. S. 61, * * * Huntley v. Kingman & Co., 152 U. S. 527, * * * We are of opinion that Congress, in enacting 67e, and using the terms 'to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors,' intended to adopt them in their well-known meaning as being aimed at conveyances intended to defraud. In § 60 merely preferential transfers are defined, and the terms on which they may be set aside are provided; in 67e, transfers fraudulent under the well recognized principles of the common law and the statute of Elizabeth are invalidated. The same terms are used in § 3, subdivision 1, in which it is made an act of bankruptcy to transfer property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Such transfers have been held to be only those which are actually fraudulent."

Thompson v. Fairbanks, 196 U. S. 516, 13 A. B. R. 443: "There is no finding that in parting with the possession of the property, the mortgagor had any purpose of hindering, delaying or defrauding his creditors or any of them. Without a finding to the effect that there was an intent to defraud, there was no invalid transfer of the property under the provisions of § 67 (e) of the Bankruptcy Law."

The rule of 67 (e) simply relieves the trustee from the necessity, otherwise existing, of showing the transferee's participation therein.

§ 1499. Transfer Must Have Been within Four Months.—The transfer must have been made within the four months preceding the filing of the bankruptcy petition to be voidable, if the transferee's participation in the fraudulent intent be not shown.⁶³

But if made on the same day of the month of the fourth month preceding, it is "within four months."⁶⁴

Voluntary conveyances by way of gift, to avoid creditors, are not limited to four months and do not have to come under § 67 (e).⁶⁵ They are void under Bankruptcy Act, § 70 (a) (4), being "property transferred by him in fraud of his creditors," title to which passes to the trustee by operation of law.

Obiter, Spencer v. Nekemoto, 24 A. B. R. 517 (D. C. Hawaii): "Under the allegation that the payment to Nekemoto was made with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, proof of insolvency is not essential, under § 67 (e), covering this point, although insolvency would appear to be generally an existing condition where there is an attempt to defraud creditors."

PROTECTION OF LIENS WHICH ARE NOT CONTRARY TO THE BANKRUPT ACT.

§ 1500. Protection of Liens Which Are Not in Contravention of Act.—"Liens given or accepted in good faith and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon the act and for a present consideration, which have been recorded according to law, if record be necessary to impart notice, are, but to the extent of such present consideration only, not affected."⁶⁷

Liens given at any time before the filing of the petition upon a presently passing consideration, that is to say, not in payment of a pre-existing debt—not in consideration, in other words, of a reduction of liabilities, but in consideration of the contemporaneous increase or at least replacing of assets—are valid, if they are given or accepted in good faith and not in contemplation of or fraud upon the Bankruptcy Law, and if, also, they have been duly recorded where the State laws require recording in order to impart notice.⁶⁸ terfere in the case of a fraudulent or oppressive enforcement) they may be proceeded upon according to their terms." But the court in In re Brown implies that the burden of showing bad faith is upon the trustee. The facts do not disclose whether the transfer was within the four months period or not.

Am. Mach. Co. v. Norment, 19 A. B. R. 679, 157 Fed. 801 (C. C. A. N. C.): "This deed of trust having been executed within four months of the bankruptcy adjudication can only be maintained on the ground that the debt secured thereby was made in good faith and without fraud to secure a present advancement or loan of money to the bankrupt company, and therefore saved by subdivision 'd' of § 67 of the Bankrupt Act."

Thus, an embarrassed debtor may borrow money and give a mortgage to carry on his business, and if the lender lend in good faith, his mortgage is valid.⁶⁹

Obiter, In re Pease, 12 A. B. R. 68, 129 Fed. 446 (D. C. Mich.): "The propositions that advances may be lawfully made in good faith to a debtor to carry on his business, and that the lender may lawfully take security at the time for such advances without violating the Bankrupt Act, are beyond denial."

But if the loan be in bad faith, it is void even though on a present consideration.⁷⁰

Likewise, mortgages to secure future advances are valid if made in good faith, at any rate to the amount of the advances at the time of the bankruptcy.⁷¹ It will be useful to explicate this clause in some detail.

§ 1501. Is Converse of Avoidance of Liens Opposed to Bankruptcy Act.—This provision of the law protecting certain liens is, substantially, simply the converse of other provisions of the statute invalidating certain transfers. Thus, transfers that are fraudulent as to creditors certainly are not "bona fide," so we find that the right to avoid fraudulent transfers of property, which we have heretofore discussed as one of the trustee's rights, has its converse in the protection given by § 67 (d) to "bona fide" liens. Again, the avoidance of preferences and fraudulent transfers is one of the chief objects and purposes of the Bankruptcy Act, and therefore we find, in § 67 (d) the converse of the trustee's peculiar rights conferred by the Bankruptcy Act to avoid preferences and fraudulent transfers in the provision protecting liens "not in contemplation of nor in fraud upon the Act and upon present consideration."⁷²

Compare, Young v. Upson, 8 A. B. R. 377, 115 Fed. 192 (D. C. N. Y.): "The security was given for a present consideration and therefore no fraud on creditors, under the Bankruptcy Act."

72. Compare, In re Brown, 5 A. B. R. 221 (D. C. Penn.).

Again, we find the converse of the right of the trustee to recover property in cases of unrecorded liens, in the exception of § 67 (d) that the liens, to be protected, must be recorded, if recording is necessary in order to impart notice. Thus, this § 67 (d), protecting certain liens, is simply the converse of other provisions of the Act prohibiting certain other transfers.⁷³

Likewise, we find the converse of the nullification of liens acquired by legal proceedings while the debtor is insolvent within four months of the bankruptcy, under § 67 (f), in the protection of liens not acquired by legal proceedings, or where the legal proceedings simply enforce a lien already existing and not acquired by legal process.⁷⁴

This provision protects assignments, given for presently passing consideration, of wages to be earned in the future under existing contracts of employment.⁷⁵

It is probable that, even had there been no specific enactment protecting such liens, yet, under the doctrine of "expressio unius exclusio alterius" bona fide, duly recorded liens, based on present consideration and not in contravention of the Bankruptcy Act, would have been protected.⁷⁶

In re Soudans Mfg. Co., 8 A. B. R. 51, 113 Fed. 804 (C. C. A. Ind.): "In the Bankruptcy Act of 1867 no express provision appeared for this class of security, but in Tiffany v. Institution, 18 Wall. 375, 388, 21 L. Ed. 868, the Doctrine applicable to security given upon a present consideration was thus stated: * * *

"There is nothing in the Bankrupt Law which interdicts the lending of money to a man in Darby's condition (an insolvent), if the purpose be honest, and the object not fraudulent. And it makes no difference that the lender had good reason to believe the borrower to be insolvent, if the loan was made in good faith, and without any intention to defeat the provisions of the Bankrupt Act. It is not difficult to see that in a season of pressure the power to raise money may be of immense value to a man in embarrassed circumstances. With it he might be saved from bankruptcy, and without it financial ruin would be inevitable. If the struggle to continue his business be an honest one, and not for the fraudulent purpose of diminishing his assets, it is not only not forbidden, but is commendable."

And it must not be considered that liens which do not come within its provisions are rendered invalid by it, unless they be otherwise invalid.

Impliedly, Coder v. Arts, 18 A. B. R. 513, 152 Fed. 943 (C. C. A. Iowa): "And finally, mortgages or transfers, to secure pre-existing debts made within four months of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, are legal and valid, unless voidable by reason of some provision of the bankruptcy law, or of some State laws, notwithstanding the fact that they create preferences. They are valid unless avoided; not void unless validated. The provision of § 67d, that liens for present considerations given and accepted in good faith shall not be affected by the bankruptcy law, does not strike down or render voidable those given and accepted for past considerations."

There is some apparent ambiguity in the use of the word "only" in the Amendment of 1910 to § 67d, whereby the possible construction might be given to this amendment that by implication all other liens except those mentioned in § 67d, as thus amended, are "affected" by the act. However, such is not a proper construction of the amendment. Section 67d, no more now than formerly, creates any additional right of avoiding liens; it is still merely the converse of the avoidance of liens opposed to the Bankruptcy Act. The object of the amendment is manifest. Some of the decisions had gone to the extent of holding an entire lien valid if any portion of it were given on present consideration, thus affording a ready means of defeating the Bankruptcy Law in reference to preferential liens. The true rule, even before the Amendment of 1910, was that a lien might be valid as to the part covered by presently passing consideration and yet be void as to the rest (see ante, § 1326, note), and the Amendment of 1910 simply puts the question at rest.⁷⁷

§ 1502. Lien within Four Months Valid if Other Essentials Exist.

—It will be observed that the lien may be given even during the four months period preceding bankruptcy—it may be given at any time, even up to the hour of bankruptcy, provided the other essentials, good faith, present consideration and recording, exist.⁷⁸

Obiter, In re Wright, 2 A. B. R. 366, 96 Fed. 187 (D. C. Ga.): "This shows that this paragraph refers to liens given or accepted within four months preceding the bankruptcy proceedings. Otherwise, if a lien had been given or accepted even though not for a present consideration, but for an antecedent debt, the lien would be good under all the provisions."

§ 1503. First Essential to Protection of Lien—Unless Both Parties Guilty, Lien Protected.—

The lien must either be given or be accepted in good faith; that is to say, the bad faith of either party alone will be insufficient; they must both participate in the bad faith to make the lien bad on that account.⁷⁹

Thus, for instance, where the loan is made at the time and the lender has reason to suppose that the purpose of the loan is to give encouragement to the borrower, the security is upheld.⁸⁰ Thus, likewise, where a borrower is actually insolvent, but is a man of good standing, having a large number of supposedly profitable contracts and the necessity is supposed to be simply to tide over temporary business embarrassment the lien will be protected.⁸¹

§ 1504. What Constitutes "Good Faith."—"Good faith" means that the creditor should not act in such a way as to intentionally defeat the Bankrupt Act, but should let the debtor have the money or property for some honest purpose.⁸²

Thus, mere knowledge of the borrower's insolvency, without more, is not enough to destroy the good faith.⁸³

Tiffany v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., 18 Wall. 376: "There is nothing in the Bankrupt Act which interdicts the lending of money to a man in Darby's condition, if the purpose be honest and the object not fraudulent. And it makes no difference that the lender had good reason to believe the borrower to be insolvent if the loan was made in good faith, without any intention to defeat the provisions of the Bankrupt Act. It is not difficult to see that in a season of pressure the power to raise ready money may be of immense value to a man in embarrassed circumstances. * * * His estate is not impaired or diminished in consequence, as he gets a present equivalent for the securities he pledges for the payment of the money borrowed. Nor in doing this does he prefer one creditor over another. * * * The preference at which the law is directed can only arise in case of an antecedent debt."

Obiter, In re Pease, 12 A. B. R. 68, 129 Fed. 446 (D. C. Mich.): "These two elements must have concurred in the transaction, to avoid the conveyance. It was not enough that the grantor was believed to be insolvent in order to defeat the title of the grantee, but it must also appear that the grantee knew that the conveyance was made with a view to effect any (some) purpose prohibited by the Act."

It has been held that the fact that neither the creditor nor debtor knew or had reason to know that the debtor was insolvent, or in failing circumstances, must be made to appear. And in some cases it has been held that such fact must be made to appear clearly and without question; ⁸⁴ although the requirement that lack of reasonable cause for believing the debtor insolvent must appear clearly and without question is probably not proper.

Impliedly, Ohio Valley Bank Co. v. Mack, 20 A. B. R. 40, 163 Fed. 155 (C. C. A. Ohio): "It is enough to say that the state of the evidence does not, under the principles affecting appeals upon questions of fact determined by a referee who heard the witnesses and confirmed by the district judge, warrant a refusal to accept the conclusion of the courts below that Stockhoff did not knowingly abet the bankrupt in giving a preference to Charles Mack, Sr. He stands therefore in the attitude of one who took a security for money advanced at the time in good faith. This saves his mortgage."

entially, Crim v. Woodford, 14 A. B. R. 310, 136 Fed. 34 (C. C. A. W. Va.). Obiter, Sebring v. Wellington, 6 A. B. R. 673 (Sup. Ct. App. Div.).

In any event all such cases proceed on an erroneous idea of the rule. The rule is not that both parties must show good faith, but that if either party show bad faith, the lien will not be destroyed because of the other party's bad faith.

And, at any rate, notice of the insolvency of the borrower, to impeach the bona fides of the loan, must be based on a valuation of assets in the condition when the loan was made with the works in operation and not on the appraised value after adjudication.⁸⁵

But he is not in good faith where he willfully closes his eyes to information within reach.⁸⁶

Thus, similarly, a debtor may give a mortgage on his property or sell it to raise the money to make his statutory deposit in going into bankruptcy, and the mortgage will be good.⁸⁷ Again, a debtor may, in contemplation of voluntary bankruptcy proceedings by him or involuntary proceedings against him, prepay or secure an attorney for services to be rendered in the future in relation to the bankruptcy.⁸⁸

But where the lienholder is not acting in good faith, but is aiding a creditor to obtain a preference by a colorable transaction, the lien will not be good.⁸⁹

Thus, where the managing officers of the bankrupt corporation were also managing officers of a little bank which had so grossly overloaned to the bankrupt that the bank examiner had severely criticized them, whereupon one of the officers had endorsed the note and then afterwards had made new notes to the bank, extinguishing the original obligation, a mortgage made to him by the bankrupt at the time of the extinguishment, and withheld from record for a time though eventually filed before the bankruptcy, was held preferential and also not to have been in "good faith."

McAtee v. Shade, 26 A. B. R. 151, 185 Fed. 442 (C. C. A. Mo.): " 'Good faith,' and 'not in contemplation of or in fraud upon the Bankruptcy Act,' are of the essence of this subsection, without which the liens therein mentioned cannot be upheld even though there be a present consideration for them. rupt and Quinn, and that the mortgage to Quinn was made by the bankrupt with intent to prefer Quinn and the Jackson Bank within the meaning of § 60b of the Bankruptcy Act, and accepted by Quinn with reasonable cause to believe that it was so intended. The property covered by the trust deeds to the bank was the same as that covered by the mortgage to Quinn. These trust deeds were made in May, 1905, but were never recorded, for the reason, as Quinn says: 'We did not want the public to know we had made so large a loan to English, therefore they were kept secret and not placed of record, and only the directors of the bank knew of them.' Quinn, English, and the other directors of the bank knew the circumstances under which these trust deeds were made; that the bankrupt was then insolvent; that they were intended by it as a preference to the bank, and were accepted by the bank with reasonable cause to believe that they were so intended. The bank, therefore, could not hold the property under the trust deeds as against the trustee in the event of bankruptcy. It was plainly the purpose, therefore, of Quinn and English by the transaction of June 28, and of July 6 following, to save to the bank the property covered by the unrecorded trust deeds (but which it had lost because of its failure to record them in due time), under the cover of a new mortgage to Quinn upon the same property for a present consideration, but which was in fact, as the trust deeds were, a preference and therefore in fraud of the bankruptcy law. The estate of the bankrupt was not enhanced in the least by this transaction, and its only purpose was to substitute Quinn as its sole creditor, instead of the bank with Quinn as guarantor of its indebtedness. It was a clever attempt to evade the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, and if permitted to succeed would work a plain fraud upon that act. Mr. Quinn did not place his mortgage of record until August 8, 1906, at 6:10 p. m., the evening before the attachment suit of the Sturdivant Bank against the bankrupt was commenced. He says the reason that he did not record it when it was made was: 'That English requested that it be not placed of record because his interests were so interwoven with the bank that placing it on record would shatter the confidence of the community in the bank. Another reason was to give English an opportunity to consummate a deal in St. Louis.' But one conclusion can be drawn from this statement of Mr. Quinn, and that is that he knew, when he took the mortgage of June 28th, of the insolvency of the bankrupt corporation, that the mortgage was intended as a preference for his own benefit and that of the bank, and as a shield to the bankrupt while its president was negotiating a deal in St. Louis, and was to be placed of record only in case a situation should arise making it necessary to do so, and that he accepted it with that in view and with reasonable cause to believe that it was intended as a preference, and with actual knowledge that it was in contemplation of a fraud upon the Bankruptcy Act. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the mortgage to Quinn cannot be sustained under § 67d, and is void under § 60b of the Bankruptcy Act."

Lack of "good faith," it has been held, must amount to actual fraud, to effect an avoidance of a lien given on a presently passing consideration.

Powell v. Gate City Bank, 24 A. B. R. 317, 178 Fed. 609 (C. C. A. Mo.): "The loan and security were not voidable unless R. A. Clark knew or had reasonable notice that they were intended to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the bank, or that they were made in contemplation of or in fraud upon the bankruptcy law. Liens accepted in good faith for a present consideration and not in contemplation of or in fraud upon that act are not affected thereby. Section 67d. The security given for a present loan is not avoided by the fact that it actually hinders or delays creditors by the withdrawal of the security from application to the payment of their claims unless it was given with an actual intent to defraud such creditors and the recipient had actual or legal notice of that purpose. Actual fraud in which the recipient of the lien or security participates is indispensable to the avoidance of a transaction of this nature."

And, likewise, liens given for a presently passing consideration, but the proceeds of which are used in making preferences, are nevertheless good if the mortgagee is ignorant of their intended use⁹⁰ or simply knows that the proceeds are to be used to pay existing creditors, but does not know that such payment of existing creditors would work a preference.⁹¹

The word "or" must be construed "and" here because otherwise a debtor who is about to file his petition in bankruptcy could not make an advantageous sale to any one cognizant of the fact that he is contemplating bankruptcy, although thereby a fund—already well converted into money—would be brought into the bankruptcy court much to the advantage of creditors. As long as no fraud is thus perpetrated, it is perfectly valid.⁹³

The taking of possession within the four months period of after-acquired property under a chattel mortgage covering after-acquired property, in contemplation of bankruptcy proceedings, may or may not be valid, dependent upon the state law determining whether such taking of possession reverts to the date of the original mortgage or not.⁹⁴

In States where, as in New Hampshire and Vermont, neither assignees nor administrators occupy the position of levying creditors, bankruptcy will not so operate.

Compare, In re Peasley, 14 A. B. R. 499, 137 Fed. 190 (D. C. N. Y.): Under New Hampshire law assignees, as for instance an administrator of an insolvent estate are neither attaching creditors nor purchasers for value.

RIGHTS OF CREDITORS AGAINST THIRD PARTIES JOINTLY OR SECONDARILY LIABLE.

§ 1510. Rights of Creditors against Sureties for Bankrupt, etc.—The rights of the creditor against third parties liable jointly with the bankrupt or secondarily for him, are not impaired by the bankrupt's adjudication nor by the bankrupt's discharge.¹

§ 1511. Applies to Secondary Liability on Obligation Itself, Not to Sureties in Court Proceedings—Attachment and Appeal Bonds Released if Liability Dependent on Judgment.—The provision of § 16 applies only to those secondarily liable on the obligation itself and not to those who become surety for the bankrupt in court proceedings instituted against the bankrupt. Wherever the liability of the surety is dependent upon judgment being obtained against the bankrupt, as usually is the case with attachment and appeal bonds, then his discharge, preventing judgment, will prevent the surety's liability from attaching.²

Wolf v. Stix, 99 U. S. 1: "The cases are numerous in which it has been held—and, we believe, correctly—that, if one is bound as surety for another to pay any judgment that may be rendered in a specified action, if the judgment is defeated by the bankruptcy of the person for whom the obligation is assumed the surety will be released. The obvious reason is that the event has not happened on which the liability of the surety was to depend. Of this class of obligations are the ordinary bonds in attachment suits to dissolve an attachment, appeal bonds, and the like."

Klipstein v. Allen-Miles, 14 A. B. R. 15, 136 Fed. 385 (C. C. A. Ga.): "The question is not whether the discharge of the defendant released the liability of the surety, but whether the discharge prevented the happening of the contingency upon which the liability of the surety was to arise. If no judgment can be rendered against the defendant because of the discharge in bankruptcy, then no liability exists on the part of the surety. * * * The liability of the surety on the dissolving garnishment bond is not altered by the discharge of the bankrupt defendant, but the discharge prevents the happening of the contingency on which that liability depends. * * * Moreover, we think that § 16 of the Bankrupt Act manifestly refers to co-debtors, guarantors, or sureties for the bankrupt on the same or original debt—the debt on which the release is given by the discharge."

Goyer v. Jones, 8 A. B. R. 437, 440, 79 Miss. 253: "The appellant insists that, as § 16 of the Bankrupt Law preserves the liability of any person who is in any manner a surety of a bankrupt he should have been permitted to take a judgment in the Circuit Court on the appeal bond against both M. B. and R. A. Jones, with a view of having the execution of said judgment stayed perpetually as to M. B. Jones, and for the sole purpose of enforcing the judgment as to R. A. Jones. The bond stipulates only for the payment of such judgment as may be rendered in the Circuit Court against M. B. Jones."

Likewise, where judgment against the principal is prevented through the operation of § 67 "f" annulling liens obtained by legal proceedings within four months of bankruptcy.

Klipstein v. Allen-Miles, 14 A. B. R. 15, 136 Fed. 385 (C. C. A. Ga.): "Besides this, the garnishment proceedings being had within four months prior to the bankruptcy proceedings, the surety is not relieved because of the discharge of the debtor, but because his bankruptcy avoided the lien acquired by the garnishment and destroyed the remedy by which a judgment could be recovered against the defendant, which is indispensable to make the lien of any avail to the plaintiff."

§ 1511½. Stockholder's Liability Not Released.—The bankruptcy of a corporation will not release a stockholder, director or officer thereof from any liability, as such, under the laws of the State or of the United States.³

§ 1512. Creditor Entitled to All Remedies against Sureties.—A creditor may pursue all remedies against sureties for the bankrupt.

§ 1513½. Creditor's Acceptance of Composition, Whether Releases Surety.—Where the creditor is one of those whose consents in writings, etc., have enabled the bankrupt to fulfill the prerequisites of the right to make a composition, it is altogether likely that the surety is released, unless he had consented to such action. Whatever might be the case with regard to a creditor who participates in the composition for the first time after confirmation, it is manifestly an entirely different case where his own active consent has helped the bankrupt to get the majority in number and amount of claims allowed, which is the prerequisite to his right to file a petition for confirmation of composition.⁵

In re Benedict, 18 A. B. R. 604 (Ref. N. Y.): "While through a 'composition' the principal debtor is as completely relieved from his personal liability as he would be by a 'discharge,' yet such relief is obtained in a different manner. Relief under composition cannot be obtained without the co-operation of the creditors. The active consent of the necessary number of creditors is a condition precedent. Without this active co-operation on the part of the creditors the liability of the principal debtor would remain undischarged and the remedies of the surety unimpaired. Under the Bankruptcy Act, two methods of relief are open to the insolvent debtor. The relief to be obtained is equally effectual and complete whichever method is followed. Under the first method, the insolvent surrenders his entire property for a distribution of the entire avails among his creditors. Under the second method, he may surrender the whole, or, as in this case, only a portion of his property, and with the co-operation of the requisite number of creditors and the consent of the court, he may be equally relieved from further liability to pay his indebtedness. Such relief, while equally effectual and for many purposes of the same quality as the other, it appears to me should not be considered a 'discharge' within the meaning of § 16 and so as to destroy otherwise existing rights of other persons secondarily liable. If a surety is required to pay the debt of his principal, equity demands that he should have an opportunity to indemnify himself—at least to the full measure of the principal's ability to pay—and that if in any way the holder of the claim has co-operated to deprive him of this right, such holder should be denied recourse to the surety. This view has full sanction, it appears to me, in the Matter of McDonald, reported at Federal Cases, 8,753, where it was decided under the Act of 1867 that if the holder of a note assented to the 'discharge' of the maker, without the consent of the endorser, the endorser would be released. Under that act, unless an estate paid fifty per cent., the 'discharge' could only be granted upon consent of the majority in number and amount of the creditors. McDonald was unable to pay the required percentage for a discharge. He procured the written consent of the required number and value of his creditors and was discharged."

Bluegrass Canning Co. v. Steward, 23 A. B. R. 726, 175 Fed. 537 (C. C. A. Ky.): "Pending the suit below the canning company was adjudicated a bankrupt, and this fact was shown in the case. The creditors declined to prosecute the suit. The court below allowed the suit to go on in the name of the bankrupt upon the execution of a bond indemnifying the bankrupt against costs by J. E. Gunther, a surety upon the attachment bond, but announced that it would dismiss the case if the defendants would release the sureties upon the attachment bond. This was declined, and the motion to dismiss the suit because of the plaintiff's bankruptcy was denied. The surety upon the attachment bond had a direct interest in the successful prosecution of the suit, and, if he was willing to indemnify the bankrupt, was properly allowed to go on with the case for his own protection. The bankruptcy of the corporation did not dissolve it. 2 Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, p. 863. While the bankrupt trustee may intervene and prosecute a pending suit if he will, yet, if he does not, we see no reason why the bankrupt may not go on with it if he wishes."

§ 1514. Right to Retain Indemnity Given at Signing Unaffected.

—The rights of the surety to retain and reimburse himself from funds that have been left with him for indemnity by the bankrupt principal are unaffected where the indemnity was given at the time of becoming surety.⁶

§ 1515. No Duty on Creditor to Prove Claim against Bankrupt Principal.—It is not incumbent upon the creditor to take any steps to prove the claim, where, at any rate, the surety does not demand it; nor to notify the surety or endorser, nor tender the note, so as to give the latter an opportunity to present it.⁷

§ 1516. Right of Surety or Endorser to Prove Creditor's Claim against Bankrupt Principal.—If the surety or endorser demands of the creditor that he prove the claim, and the creditor fails or refuses to do so, the surety or endorser may prove the claim himself.⁸ He undoubtedly may prove it without demand, provided he is able to attach the written instrument to his proof of claim.

§ 1517. Where Creditor Refuses to Let Surety Have Written Instrument to Attach to Proof, Surety Not Released.—If the creditor himself fails to prove the claim and refuses to permit the surety to have the written instrument to file with the proof of claim as required by statute, the surety is nevertheless not released. His remedy is to pay the debt.⁹

§ 1518. Unless Surety Offers to Indemnify Creditor against Expense.—But, if the surety should offer to indemnify the creditor against expense and the creditor should still refuse, then, doubtless, the surety would be released, at least to the extent of dividends lost.¹⁰

Board of Commrs. Kan. v. Hurley, 22 A. B. R. 209, 169 Fed. 92 (C. C. A. The filing of a petition in bankruptcy vests in each creditor of the bankrupt an equitable estate in such a proportion of his property as the creditor's claim bears to the entire amount of the provable claims."

§ 1520. But Bankrupt Estate Not to Pay Two Dividends on Same Claim.—But a sound and well-established rule applicable to the settlement of insolvent estates is that the estate must never pay two dividends with respect to the same claim.¹²

First Nat'l Bk. v. Eason, 17 A. B. R. 593, 149 Fed. 204 (C. C. A. Tex.): "The appellant has two obligations of the bankrupt, one is on a note of $15,000 of which the bankrupt was maker, the other is on an indorsement on a forged note for $15,000, given as collateral to secure the first-mentioned note. The appellant seeks to prove both obligations against the bankrupt's estate. There was only one consideration, really only one debt, and the appellant is entitled to only one satisfaction. The payment of either obligation would extinguish the other. The District Court held that the appellant could not prove both and thus establish a double liability against the bankrupt's estate.

"The decree appealed from is affirmed."

§ 1521. Creditor Receiving Dividends Out of Maker's Estate First, Whether May Prove Only for Unpaid Balance against Surety.—But if the creditor receives dividends out of the maker's estate before he has proved his claim against the endorser, it has been held that he may prove against the endorser merely for the unpaid balance.¹³ Yet this would not be the rule except in cases where such dividends out of the maker's estate were received before the filing of the surety's bankruptcy petition.

Board of Commrs. Kans. v. Hurley, 22 A. B. R. 209, 169 Fed. 92 (C. C. A. Kans.): "A single question remains: Is the claim of a creditor against the estate of a surety in bankruptcy upon which the principal has made partial payments after the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy entitled to allowance at and to dividends upon the amount owing upon it when the petition was filed, or upon the amount remaining unpaid upon it when the final allowance of it is made, or when the respective dividends are paid? In the discussion of this question preferences, securities consisting of pledged or mortgaged property, such as are required to be surrendered or applied upon claims by the bankruptcy law, are laid out of consideration, and what is said has no reference to rights under them, because no such rights are in issue here. Laying out of view then such preferences and securities, the status of claims at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and not at any subsequent time, fixes the rights of their owners to share in the distribution of the estate of the bankrupt. § 1522. Creditor Receiving Dividends Out of Surety's Estate First, Surety Entitled to Subrogation to Creditor's Claim against Maker's Estate in Proportion to Dividend Paid by Surety.—And if the creditor shall have received his dividend on his full claim from the surety's estate first, the surety's estate will be entitled to subrogation to the creditor's claim against the maker to the extent of the dividends paid by the surety's estate.

[1841] In re Sterling, Ahrens & Co., 1 Fed. 169: "It is quite obvious, that if this proof is allowed the Oriental Bank will pay a double dividend on the same debt. It appears to me clearly that it is substantially the same debt, because, if all parties had been solvent, whatever sums the Oriental Bank might have paid to the Agra Bank, although they would have paid it, no doubt, for the purpose of performing the contract they had entered into by their indorsement, yet, substantially, whatever sums they might have paid to the Agra Bank would have gone in reduction of the sum which the Oriental had promised to pay to the European Bank. In that case the Oriental Bank could never have been called upon to pay these bills twice over. It would have made no difference that they had entered into two contracts with the two separate parties that they would pay the bills, namely, with the European Bank as acceptors, and with the Agra Bank as holders. It is clear that they would have performed both contracts by paying the bills once. * * * It has been the law for a great number of years, with reference to proofs in bankruptcy, that if an acceptor accepts bills for the accommodation of the drawer, and the drawer enters into a contract, express or implied (and I do not think there is any difference between the two), that he will provide for the bills when they become due, and then the drawer becomes bankrupt, there cannot be a double proof against his estate, namely, one proof by the holder of the bill, and the other proof by the acceptor of the bill on the contract of indemnity. * * * The principle itself—that an insolvent estate, whether wound up in chancery or in bankruptcy, ought not to pay two dividends in respect of the same debt—appears to me to be a perfectly sound principle. If it were not so a creditor could always manage, by getting his debtor to enter into several distinct contracts with different people for the same debt, to obtain higher dividends than the other creditors, and perhaps get his debt paid in full. I apprehend that is what the law does not allow; the true principle is that there shall only be one dividend in respect of what is in substance the same debt, although there may be two separate contracts.”

§ 1523. Discharge of Bankrupt Principal, Equivalent to Return of Execution Unsatisfied.—Discharge of the bankrupt maker is equivalent to a return of execution wholly or partly unsatisfied, so far as the creditor's rights against the surety are concerned.¹⁴

§ 1524. Staying Discharge and Permitting Creditor to Take Judgment to Fix Liability on Surety.—It is proper for the bankruptcy court to stay proceedings for a discharge and to refuse to stay proceedings against the bankrupt, in order to permit a qualified judgment to be taken, where the obtaining of such a judgment or the taking of other steps is necessary in order to perfect the creditor's rights against a third party, surety or guarantor.¹⁵

R. 648: “The district judge was not obliged to grant the stay under § 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, but did so because he thought that the creditor had no better equity against the surety than he had against the bankrupt. As the trustee in bankruptcy has no interest whatever in the claim against the surety we think the creditor's rights and equities are questions to be disposed of by the State court. * * * We think the court in which the action is pending should be left free to take whatever steps it thinks equitable in the premises in accordance with its own practice, and the order granting the stay is therefore reversed.”

In re Remington Auto & Motor Co., 9 A. B. R. 533, 119 Fed. 441 (D. C. N. Y.): "Some of the creditors of this alleged bankrupt corporation are now seeking to put their respective claims in judgment, issue execution, and thus place themselves in a position to bring an action in equity of the nature and for the purpose mentioned. If this preliminary action be necessary when bankruptcy has intervened, the injunction should not be made permanent or continued; for, if such a liability exists, and it can be enforced only by a creditor with judgment and execution returned unsatisfied, or by the trustee, when appointed, after a creditor or creditors have put themselves in this position, then to grant or make permanent this injunction will be to deprive the creditors of their rights. Is this liability an asset of the corporation, and, if so, will it pass to the trustee when appointed, and may he enforce it for the benefit of all? Will the proof of the insolvency of the corporation and the adjudication of its bankruptcy, followed by the proof in due course of the claims of creditors, be a substitute for judgment against the corporation and execution returned unsatisfied? If so, then action by creditors against the stockholders of the corporation may be unnecessary. But suppose the trustee, when appointed, should refuse to bring the action, must the creditors lose their rights to proceed against the stockholders which they might, should they be denied the right to put their claims against the corporation into judgment? * * * So long as uncertainty exists as to the effect of enjoining these creditors from prosecuting their claims against this corporation to judgment, the wise course is to permit the creditors to bring their actions and prosecute them to judgment; otherwise the creditors may be deprived of a valuable part of the assets of the corporation."

Bank v. Elliott, 6 A. B. R. 415, 85 N. W. (Wis.) 417: "It is conceded that if a defendant is discharged in bankruptcy from a debt, pending proceedings to enforce it, he is entitled to plead such circumstances in bar of further proceedings for personal judgment, if the plaintiff does not voluntarily discontinue the action, and to recover on such plea. But it is said that if an action is wholly in rem, or partly in rem and partly in personam, its status as an action to reach the res is not disturbed by a discharge of the defendant in bankruptcy, if the plaintiff's interest therein be preserved by the Bankruptcy Act. The authorities seem to be uniform to that effect. Roberts v. Wood, 38 Wis. 60; Bates v. Tappan, 99 Mass. 376; Bowman v. Harding, 56 Me. 559; Leighton v. Kelsey, 57 Me. 85; Ingraham v. Phillips, 1 Day, 117; Jones v. Lellyett, 39 Ga. 64; Pierce v. Wilcox, 40 Ind. 70; Stoddard v. Locke, 43 Vt. 574; May v. Courtney, 47 Ala. 185; Kittredge v. Warren, 14 N. H. 509; Munson v. Railroad Co., 120 Mass. 81.

"In Bowman v. Harding, it was insisted on behalf of the discharged party that he was, by the express terms of the Bankruptcy Act, released from all his debts, and that no such discharged debt could, by implication, be considered to have sufficient life to form the basis of a judgment even in form against him. The court thought otherwise, reasoning that the language of the Bankruptcy Act, preserving a lien incident to a debt, by implication preserved the debt, notwithstanding its discharge, so far as necessary to make the lien effective. Treating of the same subject, in Leighton v. Kelly, supra, the court said, in substance, the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are not to be construed so as to preclude the rendition of such a judgment as is necessary to enable a lien claimant, whose interest in property is preserved to him by the act, to perfect and realize upon it. In Bates v. Tappan this language was used:

"The provisions for a full discharge * * * must be construed, as they well may be, so as not to prevent the enforcement of a lien, which the statute itself permits, by any requisite proceedings therefor which do not involve a judgment in personam. A lien by attachment can be enforced in no other ways than by the qualified judgment which was rendered in the Superior Court, and it must therefore be affirmed."

"The present Bankruptcy Act has the same features as the Act of 1867, which were the foundation of the adjudications cited. It provides that 'All levies, judgments, attachments, or other liens, obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent, at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him, shall be deemed null and void in case he is adjudged a bankrupt,' etc. Section 67f. The language as clearly, by implication, preserves all liens claimed in legal proceedings, of sufficient age to be outside the four months limit, as it expressly annuls those within such limit. The preservation of certain liens necessarily left the lien claimants free to pursue the necessary legal or equitable remedies to render them effective."

Provided such third party by becoming such surety had not released property of the bankrupt from an attachment, execution or other sequestration by legal proceedings itself annulled by the bankruptcy.¹⁶

Hill v. Harding, 130 U. S. 699: "If an attachment of property in an action in a State court is dissolved by the defendant's entering into a recognizance, with sureties, to pay, within 90 days after any final judgment against him, the amount of that judgment and the defendant, after verdict against him, obtains his discharge in bankruptcy upon proceedings commenced more than four months after the attachment, the Bankrupt Act does not prevent the State court from rendering judgment against him on the verdict, with a perpetual stay of execution, so as to have the plaintiff at liberty to proceed against the sureties. Such attachment being recognized as valid by the Bankruptcy Act (Rev. St., § 5044), a discharge in bankruptcy does not prevent the attaching creditors from taking judgment against the debtor in such limited form as may enable them to reap the benefit of their attachment. When the attachment remains in force, the creditors, notwithstanding the discharge, may have judgment, against the bankrupt, to be levied only upon the property attached. Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. 612, 623; Doe v. Childress, 21 Wall. 642. When the attachment has been dissolved, in accordance with the statutes of the State, by the defendant's entering into a bond or recognizance, with sureties, conditional to pay to the plaintiffs, within a certain number of days after any judgment rendered against him on a final trial, the amount of that judgment, the question whether the State court is powerless to render even a formal judgment against him for the single purpose of charging such sureties, * * * depends upon the extent of the authority of the State court under the local law."

In re Ennis & Stoppani, 22 A. B. R. 679, 171 Fed. 755 (D. C. N. Y.): "Though I cannot wholly vacate the stay, I can, however, permit the petitioner to enter his judgment against the bankrupt, and to do so much else as may be necessary to perfect any rights he may have under the undertaking, if any. The undertaking was taken out more than four months before the petition was filed; and, assuming that the indemnity given the surety created a lien under § 67c or 67f, which it is not necessary to decide, such a lien is not invalid. If the petitioner can enforce the undertaking, I will aid him to do so."

Thus, if the surety were simply a surety on appeal from a judgment in personam, where the judgment did not operate to sequester any property, probably such qualified judgment would be proper, or where, as in Hill v. Harding 130 U. S. 699, the attachment lien vacated was good against bankruptcy, having been taken more than four months preceding bankruptcy.

But where the surety has, by becoming surety, released the bankrupt's property from an invalid lien, it would be manifestly improper to aid the creditor in obtaining the money value of that which the Bankruptcy Act forbids him to obtain in specie.¹⁷

And the matter of stay rests in the sound discretion of the court.¹⁸

But stay should not be granted on application of the trustee where assets of the bankrupt estate are not involved nor creditors' rights prejudiced. Thus, where stay of a creditor's suit in personam had been granted on the ground that the bond in attachment had been given to the creditor after the passage of the Bankruptcy Act and that therefore the creditor must be presumed to have taken it with the act in view, the upper court held that the stay was erroneous because it did not concern the trustee what judgment was had to bind the surety.¹⁹

Such staying of discharge and refusal to stay the creditors' proceedings are not a denial of the bankrupt's right to discharge, nor do they in the slightest degree interfere with his obtaining the full benefit of the discharge when subsequently granted. This is so for the reason that the judgment so obtained "after the filing of the petition and before the consideration of his application for discharge" is, by the express words of § 63 (b) (5) a provable debt; and, being a provable debt is, consequently, discharged by the discharge of the bankrupt. Its enforcement against the bankrupt in personam or against his subsequently acquired property may be enjoined precisely as the enforcement of any other provable judgment debt may be enjoined.

But, even though the bankruptcy court should thus stay the discharge

§ 1525. General Examinations of Bankrupts and Witnesses.—A court of bankruptcy may, upon application of any officer, bankrupt or creditor, by order require any designated person, including the bankrupt and his wife, to appear in court or before the referee, or the judge of any state court, to be examined concerning the acts, conduct or property of a bankrupt whose estate is in process of administration under the act, provided that the wife may be examined only touching business transacted by her or to which she is a party and to determine the facts whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt.¹

And it is made one of the statutory duties of the bankrupt, when present

1. Bankr. Act, § 21 (a). In re Bryant, 26 A. B. R. 504, 188 Fed. 530 (D. C. Pa.).

at the first meeting of his creditors, and at such other times as the court shall order, to submit to an examination concerning the conducting of his business, the cause of his bankruptcy, his dealings with his creditors and other persons, the amount, kind and whereabouts of his property, and, in addition, all matters which may affect the administration and settlement of his estate.²

§ 1526. Analogous to Examinations of Insolvent Debtors Elsewhere.—The bankruptcy law furnishes a most searching and summary method for the discovery of hidden assets, by means of the examination of the bankrupt and other witnesses, and this examination is in practice much used and has always been a feature of bankruptcy jurisprudence from the earliest statute of King Henry VIII down to the present time.³

It is true that similar provisions are to be found in other branches of jurisprudence taken up with the affairs of insolvent debtors, as, for instance, the examination of the debtor in assignment or insolvency proceedings.

Boyd v. Glucklich, 8 A. B. R. 403, 116 Fed. 131 (C. C. A. Iowa): "In some of the States there are laws providing for the examination of debtors under oath for the purpose of discovering what, if any, property they have applicable to the payment of their debts. The proceeding is analogous in all respects to the examination of the bankrupt under the Bankrupt Act."

Nevertheless, it is found in practice that, so far, at any rate, as concerns assignment proceedings, the examination of the debtor, the assignor, does not approach in its keenness the examination of the debtor which is had in bankruptcy. Perhaps the reason for this is not hard to find. In assignment proceedings the creditors have, in fact (whatever be the theory), no common agent to do the examining for them as they have in bankruptcy, and of course no one creditor cares to assume the responsibility and expense of such an examination alone when he himself will reap only a pro rata share of the benefits resulting from the discovery of any hidden assets. To be sure, in theory, assignment laws afford quite as ample opportunity for such examination as does the bankruptcy law and they also supply an officer to make the examination; but that officer is the assignee himself, who owes his office to the favor of the debtor, and most commonly is a personal friend or even the attorney of the assignor, and consequently is more interested in befriending the assignor than in exposing property concealed by him. It is not, then, a matter of surprise that an examination of the assignor under such circumstances would be likely to be lukewarm.

In bankruptcy proceedings, on the other hand, the examination of the bankrupt follows almost as a matter of course, and being conducted by the trustee elected by the creditors and responsible to them, is most searching and inquisitorial in its character.

In re Bryant, 26 A. B. R. 504, 188 Fed. 530 (D. C. Pa.): "The vigorous and skillful use of examination of insolvent bankrupts is often the only means by which creditors are enabled to prevent the bankruptcy act being turned into a shield for dishonesty. If hardship and inconvenience result from such examinations, as they sometimes may, it should be remembered that a discharge of the bankrupt from his debts is a great privilege and a prize that will reward the honest debtor amply for such inconvenience."

§ 1527. Who May Be Examined—"Any Designated Person" Including Bankrupt and Wife.—Any designated person may be examined; including the bankrupt and his wife.⁴ Thus, a trustee or assignee in insolvency may be examined.⁵ Likewise, the officers of a corporation in which the bankrupt was a stockholder or otherwise interested, may be examined and be required to produce corporate books for inspection.⁶ The bankrupt, of course, may be examined.⁷ And the officers and members of corporations are for certain purposes "the bankrupts" in cases of bankrupt corporations,⁸ but of course not so as to entitle them to all the privileges, or subject them to all the liabilities of bankrupts. And it is even a question whether such officers, when examined, are not entitled to witness fees, as any other witness. The bankrupt's wife may be examined.⁹

§ 1528. Examination of Each Witness a Separate Proceeding.—These general examinations of different witnesses are not all one proceedings, and need not be adjourned from day to day until examination of all the witnesses is finished. Each witness' examination is a separate and independent matter, and when it is concluded there need be no adjournment for other witnesses. Witnesses may be examined independently, and in fact their examinations are wholly independent.¹⁰

§ 1529. At Whose Instance Examination to Be Had.—The examination may be had at the instance of the trustee, receiver, or any other officer, or of any creditor, or of the bankrupt¹¹ himself. Thus, it may be

Ordinarily the trustee makes the application; but, in case he refuses to do so, the creditor may apply for an order directing the trustee to examine, or permitting the creditor himself to examine,¹⁴ at the expense of the estate.

§ 1530. One General Examination of Bankrupt a Matter of Absolute Right.—It is an absolute right, of which creditors may not be deprived, to have at some time and place an opportunity to examine the bankrupt.

§ 1531. But Examination of Other Persons Not.—But it is not an absolute and unqualified right that a creditor has to demand the issuance of a summons for the general examination of a third person: it lies within the discretion of the court.

In re Andrews, 12 A. B. R. 267, 130 Fed. 383 (D. C. Mass.): In this case a summons for the examination of the bankrupt's former assignee for creditors was asked for by a creditor, but was refused by the referee, for reasons not stated in the opinion of the reviewing court, and the refusal was sustained, the reviewing court presuming that the examination was being asked for in another interest than that of the estate. The Court said:

"This provision is not intended to give the creditor an unqualified right to demand the issuance of the summons. Ordinarily, the examination is made by the trustee, and after his appointment a creditor should ordinarily apply to him. If the trustee refuses to undertake the examination, the creditor may apply to the court for an order directing him to do so. To order the trustee to examine is manifestly a matter of discretion. Doubtless the creditor may apply to the court in order to carry on the examination himself, but the court is not wholly without discretion to refuse the application."

bankrupt is by rule held in the Southern and Eastern Districts of New York sufficient cause for dismissing the discharge. And it has been held that such dismissal is not obnoxious to the bankruptcy act. In re Wollowitz, 27 A. B. R. 558, 192 Fed. 105 (C. C. A. N. Y.). See also, § 2480. The bankruptcy rule 20 of the Southern District of New York provides as follows: "If the first meeting of creditors is not called and the examination of the bankrupt at such meeting begun, carried on and completed before the discharge is filed, the referee is directed to certify such facts to the court, and thereupon, upon notice to the bankrupt, an application to dismiss the petition for discharge may be made." This rule was necessitated by the rule, since modified, permitting the referee to refuse to call the first meeting of creditors until indemnified therefor. The result of this latter rule was that, the bankrupt not having any money and creditors not being willing to spend any more money, frequently no first meeting was called for months. The subsequent modification of the indemnity rule has obviated the need of the dismissal rule. The dismissal rule still prevails, however, in the Eastern District of New York.

In re Abbey Press, 13 A. B. R. 17, 134 Fed. 51 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Any order for examination of any witness other than the bankrupt, whether on a first or second examination, should be for a special cause shown, but the authorities cited show that it has been uniformly held that it is within the discretion of the referee to decide in each particular case what cause is sufficient and upon what information he will make the order."

§ 1532. Creditor before Filing Claim May Examine, but Proof May Be Required.—A creditor who has not filed his claim nor had the same allowed, may examine the bankrupt and witnesses, even though he may not be entitled to vote for trustee, share in dividends or otherwise participate in creditors' meetings until his claim has been allowed.¹⁵ But the referee may require proof that he is a creditor.

In re Walker, 3 A. B. R. 35, 96 Fed. 550 (D. C. N. Dak.): "The question raised before the referee depends upon the meaning of the term 'creditor,' as employed in these sections. By § 1 of the act it is provided that, unless the same be inconsistent with the context, the word 'creditor' shall be construed to include 'anyone who owns a demand or claim provable in bankruptcy.' There is nothing in the context which requires a restricted meaning of the term as employed in the sections above quoted. Throughout the act, whenever the word is used in a narrow sense, apt language is employed to indicate such an intention. For example, only those whose claims have been allowed are permitted to vote for the trustee (§ 56), or share in the dividends (§ 65), or determine whether a composition shall be accepted (§ 12b). These are some of the cases in which the context shows that the term 'creditor' is used in a narrower sense than that indicated by the definition in § 1, and, when no such restriction is declared by the context, the general terms of the definition must be held to apply. * * * If he is entitled to oppose the discharge without proving his claim, he ought likewise to be allowed to examine the bankrupt for the purpose of establishing the grounds of his objections; and it has been expressly decided that a creditor is entitled to make such examination without first filing specifications of his objections to the discharge. In re Price, 91 Fed. 635. [1 A. B. R. 419.] The general principle to be deduced from the entire act would seem to be that only those creditors whose claims have been proved and allowed can participate either in the management of the estate or in the dividends derived therefrom, but as to all other matters any person having a provable claim is entitled to be heard."

In re Jehu, 2 A. B. R. 498, 94 Fed. 638 (D. C. Iowa): "I know of no provision of the Bankrupt Act which requires that a creditor must file and prove up his claim before he is entitled to an order for the examination of the bankrupt. Before granting an order for the examination of a bankrupt, the referee should be satisfied that the party applying for the order is in fact a creditor of the bankrupt; but, if this fact be shown, no good reason exists why the examination should not be had, even though the creditor may not have proved his claim in set form."

To this end he may probably require the creditor to prove his claim in the usual manner of such proof in bankruptcy. But the referee need not require such method. And it has been held, in some cases, that the fact that the bankrupt included the person in his schedules is sufficient proof.¹⁶

In re Walker, 3 A. B. R. 35, 96 Fed. 550 (D. C. N. Dak.): "Was there sufficient evidence before the referee to show that the creditor has a provable claim against the estate? I think there was. The claim was listed by the bankrupt as a debt which he was owing, and he was required by § 7 of the act to state under oath the amount of the claim, and the consideration out of which it arose. This, of course, would not establish the claim, nor the right of the creditor to share in dividends; but as to such matters as the examination of the bankrupt, and as against him, it certainly makes out at least a prima facie case that the claim exists and is provable against the estate."

And a fortiori, a creditor who has not proved his claim may examine the testimony already taken and written out on general examination, and may even require it to be filed with the referee.¹⁷

In re Kuffler, 18 A. B. R. 587, 153 Fed. 667, 155 Fed. 1018 (D. C. N. Y.): "These cases all support the view that under the circumstances a person listed as a creditor in the bankrupt's schedules is within the meaning of §§ 1, 21a, and 55b of the bankruptcy law. If an outsider should appear at any time in bankruptcy proceedings and demand the right to examine the bankrupt, for the purpose of obtaining evidence, in order to make up his mind whether he should claim to be a creditor, the situation would be entirely different. But when, as in the present case, a person listed as a creditor states that he has a claim against the bankrupt's estate, and demands an examination in order to decide whether he will take an affirmative part in the bankruptcy proceedings, it would seem that the court has power to let him do so. This will not in any way abrogate the rule in this district, which is entirely proper for general purposes, and the permission granted the creditor upon this motion will not free him from any responsibilities or obligations to meet the pecuniary expenses of the examination he desires."

And thus it has been held that a scheduled creditor, though his claim be barred by the statute of limitations, may examine.

In re Kuffler, 18 A. B. R. 587, 153 Fed. 667, 155 Fed. 1018 (D. C. N. Y.): "The statute of limitations is a defense, and not a part of the affirmative claim; and it has been held in a number of cases that a debt may be provable, even where the defense of the statute of limitations is good as against an action brought in the State courts of the State in which the bankruptcy proceeding has been instituted. In re Ray, 1 N. B. R. 203, Fed. Cas. No. 11,589; In re Shepard, 1 N. B. R. 439, Fed. Cas. No. 12,753. Such debts, therefore, being provable and covered by a discharge, it would seem that all the more a creditor included in the schedules, whose identity is established satisfactorily to the referee, is entitled to be given an opportunity to ascertain the exact condition of the bankrupt's estate before he determines whether it is worth his while to become a party to the proceeding and attempt to obtain a portion of whatever dividend may be declared."

§ 1533. Application for Examination—Notice Not Required.—The application for an order for the examination should be to the court of bankruptcy, that is to say, in practice, to the referee. It need not be in writing and no particular form is necessary. No notice need be given to the witness sought to be examined, if it is his first examination; no cause need be given where it is the bankrupt whose examination is sought,¹⁸ although cause should be shown for the examination of other witnesses; no divulging of the questions to be propounded need be made; and neither the bankrupt nor other witness will be heard upon the propriety of issuing such order.¹⁹

In re Howard, 2 A. B. R. 585, 95 Fed. 415 (D. C. Calif.): "The order requiring Hyde to appear as a witness, and be examined concerning the acts, conduct, and property of the bankrupt, was valid, although there was no formal application therefor, showing what questions were proposed to be asked upon such examination, or the particular facts in relation to which he was to be examined. The statute does not contemplate that any such showing shall be made as the basis for an order of this character. The simple application or demand for such an order by any of the persons named in § 21 of the Bankruptcy Law is all that is required to support it."

In re Abbey Press, 13 A. B. R. 11, 134 Fed. 51 (C. C. A. N. In re Cobb, 7 A. B. R. 104, 106 (Ref. Mass.): "Under the present act no notice is required to be given of the examination of a witness by the trustee under § 21a, and there seems to be no better reason for giving notice to the bankrupt under that section than there was under § 26 of the earlier act. There might indeed be very good reasons why the trustee should wish to pursue his investigations without the bankrupt's knowledge, and as it is the bankrupt's duty to give his trustee all the information and assistance in his power, it would certainly seem incongruous to allow his attorney to appear and cross-examine a witness whom the trustee wishes to examine, when the purpose of cross-examination generally is adverse to the interest of the party by whom the witness is presented."

Nor is notice to the bankrupt of the examination of other witnesses requisite.²²

§ 1537. Order for Examination to Be Entered and Served.—An order must be entered for the examination of each witness.²³

Thereupon a copy of this order, or a subpoena, is issued and served upon the witness. It should properly be under the seal of the court.²⁴

§ 1539. But Requisite in Other Cases.—If it is desired to generally examine the bankrupt at any other time than either at the first meeting of creditors or at some adjourned session of the first meeting, an order must be entered and ten days' notice be given to all creditors.²⁶

§ 1541. But Good Cause Must Be Shown.—But such subsequent examination, by better practice, is not to be obtained except for good cause and upon notice to him of the application for a second examination.²⁸

However, it is, of course, not necessary to state what is expected to be proved: it is an investigation, not a trial.

Such an examination is in its very nature an investigation intended to satisfy the minds of those whose judgment it is true is frequently not well founded by which the honest debtor has all to gain."

He may be examined even after his discharge,³⁰ at any rate to see if he has concealed anything since his discharge.³¹

But there seems no good reason for limiting the right of examination to the discovery of assets concealed since the discharge, nor to restrict it to a period of one year from the discharge. As long as the estate is not closed, the right of general examination exists, subject of course to the right of the bankrupt not to be subjected to unnecessary or repetitious examination.

§ 1543. Bankrupt May Be Put under "General" Examination before Adjudication.—Although there was considerable doubt for some time on the question,³² it has now been definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States that the alleged bankrupt may be put under general examination before adjudication.³³

Cameron v. United States, 231 U. S. 710, 31 A. B. R. 604: "This proceeding was prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy, which followed a few days later. Whether the examination of Cameron upon oath at that stage of the proceedings was authorized by the Bankruptcy Act depends upon a construction of clause a, § 21, of the act. The controversy is over the meaning of the phrase, 'a bankrupt whose estate is in process of administration' under this act.' The construction of this provision differs in the federal courts, some of them having held that there can be no such examination until after adjudication, as it is only then that the bankrupt can be subjected to such proceedings. * * * We are of opinion that the estate was in process of administration at the time when the examination before the commissioner was ordered, and the testimony of Cameron given. This court has decided that the filing of the petition in bankruptcy operates to place the property of the alleged bankrupt in custodia legis, and prevents any creditor from attaching it; and, although, by the terms of the Act, the estate does not vest in the trustee at the time of the filing of the petition under the control of the court with a view to its ultimate distribution

"In order to arrive at the true meaning of § 21a other provisions as well as the purpose of the Act must be had in view. The object of the examination of the bankrupt and other witnesses to show the condition of the estate is to enable the court to discover its extent and whereabouts, and to come into possession of it, that the rights of creditors may be preserved. If such examination is postponed until after adjudication, which may not take place for at least twenty days, within which the bankrupt in involuntary bankruptcy is given leave to appear and plead, the estate may be concealed and disposed of, and the purpose of the Act to hold it to distribute for the benefit of creditors defeated. The importance of such early examination of bankrupts was emphasized in Re Fleischer (D. C. N. Y.), 18 A. B. R. 194, 151 Fed. 81. By subdivision 9 of § 7 of the Act, it is provided that the bankrupt shall, 'when present at the first meeting of his creditors, and at such other times as the court shall order, submit to an examination concerning the conducting of his business, the cause of his bankruptcy, his dealings with his creditors and other persons, the amount, kind, and whereabouts of his property, and, in addition, all matters which may affect the administration and settlement of his estate.'

"Here is found authority to examine the bankrupt at such other times than the first meeting of creditors as the court may direct. This section should be read with § 21a, and throws light upon its proper construction. In this case the petitioner had invoked the jurisdiction of the court, a receiver had been appointed to take possession of the property, the court was so far in possession of it as to prevent other courts from seizing it, and thus defeating the bankruptcy jurisdiction. We are of opinion that the estate was then in process of administration, and the examination ordered was within the jurisdiction of the court."

Under the law of 1841,³⁴ as also under the law of 1867,³⁵ it appears to 34. Ex parte Lee, Fed. Cas. 8178 (D. C. N. Y.).

35. In re Salkey, 9 Bank. Reg. 107, Fed. Cas. 12,952 (D. C. Ills.): "The question is whether it is competent for District Judge to make an order for examination of a debtor prior to an adjudication. * * * The question arises under the 26th section of the bankrupt law. That section provides that the Court might, on the application of the assignee in bankruptcy, or of any other creditor, at all times require the 'bankrupt' to submit to an examination.

"It is said that the word 'bankrupt' is used here and that there is a distinction made in the bankrupt law subsequent to an adjudication in bankruptcy. * * * It is insisted that the word 'bankrupt' indicates that an examination can not be had until after an adjudication. * * *

"In one sense this is true. He does not necessarily become technically a bankrupt until he is so decided to be by the Court. The argument urged that there should not be this inquisitorial power exercised over the debtor for the purpose of prying into his business affairs, and because the examination might be injurious to his credit by disclosing facts affecting the same, can hardly have much weight when it is recollected that the law provides certain means by which the Court may proceed to determine whether or not the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy. The power of the Court seems to be plenary, prior to the adjudication, not only over the debtor's property, but over his person.

"It might be said with as much reason that the Court should not exercise this power over either his property or his person until it had actually decided have been possible, upon good cause shown, to obtain an order for the "general" examination of the bankrupt before adjudication. Under the Amendment of 1910, even before the decision of the Supreme Court in Cameron v. United States, it was manifest that, in instances of compositions in bankruptcy without adjudication under Bankruptcy Act, § 12 (a), the bankrupt could have been put under general examination before adjudication.

§ 1544. No Notice Requisite Where Bankrupt Witness upon Issues between Parties.—No notice to creditors is necessary where the bankrupt is called to testify as a mere witness upon some issue between parties in the case.

The statutory requirement that ten days' notice by mail must be given to creditors "of all examinations" of the bankrupt, is probably to protect the bankrupt from vexatious repetitions of examination by different creditors,³⁶ and does not refer to cases where the bankrupt may be needed as a witness to testify for or against some particular issue between parties in the proceedings, but refers to what is termed the "general examination" of the bankrupt, where the bankrupt is put upon the stand and asked miscellaneous questions in a general inquiry concerning his affairs, where no issue is raised, where nothing is to be proved and where no judgment or order results. Of course, whenever a party needs the bankrupt's testimony to support or defend some claim or right, the party is entitled to the testimony of the bankrupt, precisely as much as to that of any other necessary witness; and no notice to creditors is required—a simple subpoena at most is all that is needed to bring the bankrupt.

§ 1545. Bankrupt Examined without Notice before First Meeting, in Relation to Pending Application.—In this way a bankrupt may him to be a bankrupt because, if upon a trial of the fact of bankruptcy, he should be decided not a bankrupt, of course all the proceedings would become irregular.

"An examination under the order as made in this case, is something which necessarily grows out of the administration of the law, which gives to the Court under certain circumstances prescribed therein, power over the person and property of the debtor, for the purpose of protecting the rights of creditors. * * * Independently of the 26th section, however, it would seem to follow as a necessary consequence, from the general scope of the bankrupt law, that circumstances might exist after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and after the debtor is brought within the control of the Court, which would warrant an immediate examination. * * *

"The bankrupt law allows proceedings in bankruptcy to be commenced under a certain state of facts. * * *

That being done, a prima facie case exists, and then the law clothes the Court with all the powers necessary to accomplish the great object in view, namely, to protect the general creditors of the debtor by discovering and taking possession of all his property for equal distribution among them.

"One of the principal objects of the law would be frustrated if adequate means were not provided for the ascertainment of all the facts affecting the property of the debtor. * * *

"So that, on the whole, in view of the purpose of the 26th section, and the general scope of the bankrupt law, I can not doubt the existence of the power exercised, in the instance, by the District Court."

be examined as a witness before he has filed his list of creditors, in aid of some application or motion of some party to the proceedings. Thus, it has been held allowable to examine him, without notice to creditors, for the purpose of gathering the information requisite to fill out the bankrupt's own schedules;³⁷ and to direct the bankrupt to furnish information to aid the court and its officer, the receiver, in the preservation of the estate for creditors, without the giving of notice.³⁸

§ 1547. Broad Scope of General Examination—“Acts, Conduct and Property.”—No rigid rules can be laid down as to the method and scope of the general examination of the bankrupt and witnesses.⁴⁰

In re Foerst, 1 A. B. R. 259, 93 Fed. 190 (D. C. N. Y.): “There is no precise rule governing the admissibility of such testimony, other than that it should be reasonably pertinent to the subject of inquiry. In general, a large latitude of inquiry should be allowed in the examination of persons closely connected with the bankrupt in business dealings, or otherwise, for the purpose of discovering assets and unearthing frauds, upon any reasonable surmise that they have assets of the debtor. The intent of the Bankrupt Law is that only the honest debtor shall be discharged; and that any proper assets of the estate, however concealed, shall be made available to creditors. The examination for this purpose is of necessity, to a considerable extent, a fishing examination. The extent to which it shall be permitted to go must be determined by the sound judgment of the officer before whom it is taken. Reasonable examination should not be allowed to be checked by constant objections that the materiality of the answer may not be immediately apparent, where no harm can arise to the witness from the disclosure, if the transaction is honest. If the result of such an examination may often be a considerable amount of immaterial testimony, this is a much less evil than to stifle examination by technical rules which would defeat the purpose of the act, and discredit the administration of the law in the interest of creditors. Unreasonable discursiveness in the examination will be in some measure checked by making it at the expense of the examining party; if plainly frivolous, or prolix, it should be stopped. Where questionable proceedings have been disclosed, greater latitude in the prosecution of inquiries should be allowed; and the precise form or order in which the questions are put can scarcely be deemed material.

“Upon the above general principles, and upon the matters already disclosed on this examination, I think the witness should answer as respects any moneys or property acquired by her during the year prior to the adjudication, or even farther back, should further testimony show such inquiries to be reasonably pertinent.”

Compare, In re Williams, 10 A. B. R. 538, 123 Fed. 321 (D. C. Tenn.): “It is proper to remark here that the ordinary provisions of law for taking the testimony of absent witnesses contemplate their examination as witnesses to prove definite issues made by the pleadings in the case in which they are examined as witnesses. But in bankruptcy proceedings, while the scope of their examination is much broader, the purpose is none the less definite, although peculiar to bankruptcy proceedings. While they are witnesses in every sense of the word, they are examined inquisitorially for the purpose of discovering what general or specific knowledge they have of the bankrupt's affairs and property; or, to use the language of § 21 of the Act of 1898, they are examined at large 'concerning the acts, conduct, or property of a bankrupt.' There may be no action at law or bill in equity or libel in admiralty or other like proceedings in which they are examined as witnesses upon issues made by pleadings in the ordinary way but there is pending, in the bankruptcy court upon pleadings appropriate to that purpose, the administration of a bankrupt estate about which the trustee needs information from those who have knowledge of the bankrupt's affairs, and every bankruptcy system provides for an inquisitorial examination of all those wherever present who had such knowledge. It is this kind of examination which is provided for by the bankruptcy statute and procured by the ordinary practice for the taking of the testimony of witnesses when they reside beyond the jurisdiction of the court."

No issue is involved. No fact is asserted on one side and denied on the other. No fact is to be proved or disproved. The examination is simply a general inquiry into the "acts, conduct and property of the bankrupt," the cause of his failure, the whereabouts of his property, the contracts relating to his business, and in short an examination into all matters and things of reasonable interest to the creditors;⁴¹ and, as a consequence, a great latitude of inquiry is permitted.

U. S. v. Wechsler, 16 A. B. R. 5, — Fed. — (D. C. N. Y.): "In the case of a trial upon issues framed it must be material to those issues, but this section of the Bankrupt Act, you will perceive, does not provide for any trial. There is no decision to be made necessarily as the result of the giving of this evidence. It is an investigation. He is to be examined concerning the acts, conduct or property of the bankrupt. It is a broad field of inquiry and intended to be so, and this section is the section under which the investigations usually take place about the property of the bankrupt, particularly in cases where there is any suspicion that there has been any attempt to take property and conceal it from creditors. * * * If there have been recent transfers of property or payments of money on the eve of bankruptcy, that is a suspicious fact, particularly if they have been transferred to relatives or connections. All such transfers become material subjects of inquiry; and in order to ascertain what the truth is about them the party examining the bankrupt is not confined to a mere inquiry in the first instance whether the property has been transferred, or a mere explanation of what it was transferred for, but counsel have a right to inquire into all the surrounding circumstances in the case in order to ascertain what the truth is in that respect."

In re Horgan & Slattery, 3 A. B. R. 253, 98 Fed. 414 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The provisions of the Bankruptcy Act authorizing the examination of third persons as witnesses, and compelling the production of books and documents upon such examinations, are intended to enable creditors to discover transactions which may effect the right of the bankrupt to obtain a discharge, and to enable the trustee to ascertain whether any assets exist which should be collected and applied toward the payment of the bankrupt's debts. It is the duty of the Bankruptcy Court to see that such examinations are not permitted to transcend the limit of a legitimate investigation for these purposes; but of necessity this is a duty which involves the exercise of a wide discretion, and which should not be interfered with by an appellate court except when it has been manifestly abused."

Obiter, In re Carley, 5 A. B. R. 554, 106 Fed. 862 (D. C. Ky.): "Speaking generally, I think the provisions of § 21a of the Bankruptcy Act should be liberally construed, so as to enforce full and frank answers by witnesses who are being examined under its provisions as to the 'acts, conduct or property of the bankrupt,' the object being to secure information on those subjects for use in the administration of the bankrupt's estate. The statute was intended for beneficial purposes, and in order to affect them witnesses should fully disclose all their knowledge relative either to the acts, the conduct or the property of the bankrupt."

Obiter, In re Wilcox, 6 A. B. R. 362, 366, 109 Fed. 628 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The right of the trustee extends to a discovery of whatever tends to bring to light the estate of the bankrupt so as to enable the trustee to pursue the estate and reduce it to possession and to enable creditors 'to discover transactions which may affect the right of the bankrupt to obtain a discharge.'"

Compare, obiter, In re Rauchenplat, 9 A. B. R. 763 (D. C. Porto Rico): "Great latitude should be allowed in evidence to find a bankrupt's assets, or unearth fraud, but the court, or if acting by its referee, has a discretion how far this should proceed, and the referee had a legal discretion as to the extent of the examination of the books of the witness."

The examiner is not bound to state what he expects to prove by any of his questions. He is not trying to prove anything. He is simply inquiring and informing himself about his debtor's affairs.⁴²

In re Fixen & Co., 2 A. B. R. 832, 96 Fed. 748 (D. C. Calif.): "The examinations thus provided for are not intended as means of producing testimony pertinent to issues then on trial, but their object is to afford to the creditors, and the officer charged with administering the trust, full information touching the bankrupt's estate in order that necessary steps may be taken for its possession and preservation."

Impliedly, In re Jacobs & Roth, 18 A. B. R. 728, 154 Fed. 988 (D. C. Pa.): "In the course of the examination of Jacob Jacobs, one of the bankrupts, Mr. Sachs, representing certain of the creditors, showed the witness a paper, being a statement of credit made to the Fushan-Zeman Shoe Company in September last, and asked him if he had signed it. Objection was made to the question and the referee ruled that the witness was entitled to at least a statement of the purpose, to which Mr. Sachs replied, 'Purpose to show that the witness made a written statement on or about September 4th, 1906, that it is material, that the testimony given by him at this hearing as regards the financial condition of the partnership about said time,' presumably meaning thereby that it is material with reference to the testimony given by him at this hearing to know the financial condition of the partnership about said time. The referee ruled that this question had relation more to an application for discharge than to an examination of the bankrupt at this time, and sustained the objection. The offer was then renewed and the further reason given that it is for the purpose of proving that on the strength of the written statement offered the bankrupt obtained credit and merchandise from one of the present creditors and that this is within the scope of the purpose of an examination of the bankrupt, which is for the purpose of disclosing all his affairs and dealings with his creditors. Upon the objection being renewed, it was again sustained, and a certificate asked for. The very clause of the Bankrupt Act quoted by the referee authorizes the examination of the bankrupt as to any matter which will aid his creditors in ascertaining what has become of the property with which at any time within a reasonable period prior to the bankruptcy proceedings he has certified himself as being possessed of, in order to enable them to ascertain whether or not he has been guilty of making fraudulent disposition of his property or otherwise disposing of the same to their prejudice and also to learn generally regarding the character and amount of his estate at that time as compared with the present and his conduct and disposition thereof in the meantime."

The only limitation upon the inquiry is that it shall be pertinent to the acts, conduct or property of the bankrupt in some way.

In re Howard, 2 A. B. R. 582, 585, 95 Fed. 415 (D. C. Calif.): "Of course, when the person whose attendance is required appears before the referee, his examination must be relevant to matters concerning the acts, conduct, or property of the bankrupt, and it must be presumed that the referee will confine the examination within legal limits; that is, within limits pertinent to such general inquiry, and the witness will be justified in refusing to answer irrelevant or impertinent questions."

Of course, questions relating to his religion or to his domestic infelicities or to his politics are improper. Also questions whose answers could not in any way throw light on any present assets or on any act that would prevent discharge;⁴³ so, also, would it be improper repeatedly to cover the same ground.⁴⁴

The examination should be decorous and decent, and should not be unduly prolonged nor unnecessarily vexatious. This is about all that can be said as to the nature of the general examination of the bankrupt and witnesses.

In re Jacobs & Roth, 18 A. B. R. 728, 154 Fed. 988 (D. C. Pa.): "It is not intended by this to state that a general voyage of discovery is to be authorized covering any and every period of the bankrupt's business dealings and transactions, but only such as within a reasonable time of the bankruptcy proceeding can fairly be taken to shed some light upon his affairs at that time."

Of course, as before stated, when the bankrupt is called as a witness in support of some issue raised between parties to the proceedings, then the rules for his examination are the same as for any other witness and the fact that it is the bankrupt who is testifying will not alter the rules except, perhaps, in so far as he may or may not be considered an interested party.

The subject of the examination is to be confined to the acts, conduct and property of the bankrupt and his dealings with his creditors, etc., preceding the adjudication; nevertheless, facts occurring subsequently thereto also may be inquired into if in their nature they are such as would likely throw light on the acts, conduct or property of the bankrupt before the adjudication, or on the amount, kind and whereabouts of the property.⁴⁵

The examination is not limited to transactions occurring within the four months preceding the bankruptcy. A full understanding of the acts, conduct and property of the bankrupt may involve inquiry into facts occurring months and even years beforehand.⁴⁶

And it must not be forgotten that he may be examined, too, as to "all matters that may affect the administration and settlement of his estate."^{46a}

§ 1548. Production of Books, Papers and Documents Enforced.—The production of books, papers and documents may be enforced. As to the bankrupt's books, documents, etc., the Act itself vests their title in the trustee.⁴⁷

Third parties, examined as witnesses, may be required to produce their books of account, where showing has been made that property probably has been turned over to them in violation of the Bankruptcy Act. Perhaps mere circumstances of suspicion may suffice to lay a predicate for the production.

And even such showing is not, on principle, necessary if the books also involve transactions with the bankrupt, or in which the trustee is interested. Thus, the minute book of a corporation has been ordered produced.

In re United States Graphite Co., 20 A. B. R. 280, 159 Fed. 300, 161 Fed. 583 (D. C. Pa.): "The referee is engaged in making inquiry as to an alleged fraud between the Pennsylvania Graphite Company, whose minute book is required, and the bankrupt estate, and further, the corporation—the owner of the minute book—is also interested in having an order made for security for payment of rent. So that in these two questions under investigation, if not in the others, the Pennsylvania Graphite Company is a party to this litigation, and is required, in response to the subpoena for that purpose, to produce such specified books and papers as bear upon the questions investigated. When the book has been produced before the referee, of course, counsel, intending to establish certain facts from this minute book, is entitled to see it and to examine its contents for the purpose of ascertaining what it contains in relation to the questions at issue.

An indiscriminate call for a book or paper which, upon its face, could in all probability have no bearing upon the questions investigated, would be improper, and an objection to its examination by counsel for an adverse party would be sustained, but where it appears that the books or paper called for is so obviously the document containing the truthful information concerning the questions investigated, it is clearly the right of counsel to examine the book or paper to see what it discloses as to the matters at issue."

It has been held, though it is a somewhat dangerous precedent, that an officer of a corporation of which the bankrupt was a stockholder can not be compelled on "general examination" of the bankrupt to produce the corporation's books, etc., for the purpose of enabling the trustee to ascertain the value of the stock.⁴⁸ However, were a controversy pending wherein the value of the stock should become of importance, undoubtedly such enquiries might become proper on general examination as an aid to the trustee, for it is the function of a general examination to aid the trustee in realizing on the assets.

And claimants proving debts to share in dividends must produce their books and documents that are pertinent to the claims.⁴⁹

In re Wheeler, 19 A. B. R. 461, 158 Fed. 603 (C. C. A. Conn.): "The president of the bank was on the stand and the book was within his control, being in the hands of his counsel. Said counsel testified that the book did not belong to the bank, but was the president's personal property, containing a mere compilation from the books of the bank, a mere mathematical computation or calculation. Manifestly this statement is largely hearsay; whether the book contains original entries or merely compilations from other entries could be told only by one who knew when and under what circumstances the entries were made. The president himself testified that the book was one which 'he kept during all the time that these payments were being made,' that the 'payments were entered therein as they were made,' and that the entries were in the handwriting of the president or the cashier. Under these circumstances the evidence was competent, certainly as to details of date and amount which could not be carried by the unaided memory; and it should have been produced. Whether or not any particular entry was obnoxious to some valid objection, was a question to be determined by the referee with the book before him."

§ 1549. Whether Federal Equity Rules Govern "General" Examinations.—General Order No. XXII provides that the "examination and cross-examination of the witnesses shall be had in conformity with the mode now adopted in courts of law of the United States," that mode being prescribed by U. S. Rev. Stat., § 721, as follows:

"The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

Yet it is doubtful whether this rule adopts the common-law federal rules, in toto, whereby the mode of examination and cross-examination of witnesses prevailing in the courts of the particular State is accepted in the federal court.⁵⁰

And, in the so-called "general examinations" of the bankrupt and of witnesses, it is doubtful whether the strict rules of Dravo v. Fabel, 132 U. S. 489, as to taking the opposite party's deposition, apply. The relevancy or irrelevancy of questions is for the court to determine.⁵¹

§ 1550. Witness Not Excused because Testimony Would Reveal Private Affairs.—A witness will not be excused from answering an apparently relevant question because of his assertion that the answer would disclose the personal affairs of himself or others, not material to the subject of inquiry;⁵² nor from producing books or documents, for the same reason.⁵³

§ 1551. But Examiner Must Develop Facts Showing Sufficient Connection with Bankrupt to Make Further Inquiry Relevant.—But, after the witness has positively negated the idea that the matter inquired into has any relation to the acts, etc., of the bankrupt, it devolves upon the examiner to develop facts showing sufficient connection with the acts, conduct or property of the bankrupt to make further inquiry reasonably relevant.⁵⁴

In re Carley, 5 A. B. R. 556, 106 Fed. 862 (D. C. Ky.): "But the act does not demand such liberality of construction when it is sought to inquire into the acts, conduct or property of any persons other than the bankrupt himself. Indeed, the act does not authorize, in this mode of proceeding, any examination whatever into matters other than those specifically mentioned, which might, however, include cases where the acts, conduct or property of the witness are so connected or interwoven with those of the bankrupt as to make them virtually the same by reason of community of interest."

Compare, as to practice on opposition to discharge, In re Romine, 14 A. B. R. 785, 138 Fed. 837 (D. C. W. Va.): "It has been settled beyond peradventure for very many years that courts do not compel production of books simply to gratify curiosity, or permit 'fishing' excursions into them to see what can be found that may or may not be of advantage to the parties making the demand. A party cannot obtain a roving commission for the inspection or production of books or papers in order that he may ransack them for evidence to make out his case. He is entitled to production and inspection only when the same is material and necessary to establish his cause of action. The application will not be granted where the facts to be proved by the books can be otherwise established. It will therefore be denied when the party has in his possession or under his control the means of acquiring all the information he seeks to obtain, or when the books do not in themselves contain evidence, but merely information by which evidence can be obtained. It is not permitted to enable a party to ascertain whether he has cause of action or defense, or to ascertain the evidence on which his opponent's action or defense rests."

But proof in advance of the existence of any particular interest or right or relation between the witness and the bankrupt estate is not requisite so long as the circumstances developed might, with other circumstances to which the inquiries are directed, lay a foundation if true, for recovery of assets or for proof of such acts as might bar discharge or affect the claims of parties.

Inferentially, People's Bk. v. Brown, 7 A. B. R. 476, 112 Fed. 652 (C. C. A. N. J.): "It is true that when the appellee was interrogated respecting this real estate it had not been shown that the bankrupt had any interest in it; but his relationship to the parties, to several transactions concerning it, the history of those transactions, and the communications which ensued between the bankrupt and the witness when the latter was served with a subpoena, did appear, and disclosed a state of facts which justified the investigation. Its object was to determine whether the bankrupt did not have an interest in the property which should be applied to the payment of his debts, and the discovery sought would have been superfluous if, as a condition precedent to its requirement, it had been necessary to independently establish the existence of such interest. Although it is the duty of the court to confine such examinations within the limits to which the purposes for which they are authorized restrict them, yet, where there are circumstances warranting the investigation, no obstruction of it should be permitted which is not justified by law. * * *

"The relevancy of any particular matter to the subject under judicial investigation is always for determination by the court, and no witness is entitled to decide for himself that the facts which he is asked to disclose would tend to prove the existence or nonexistence of the ultimate fact to which it is intended to relate them. * * * 'It is, in substance, but an expression of his understanding that the facts which he declines to reveal would, if revealed, appear to be immaterial, and to this opinion of his, though not even evidential, he asks that there shall be conceded determinative force.'"

§ 1552. Whether General Examinations to Be in Writing.—It would seem that, as a rule, the general examinations of witnesses and bankrupts are to be taken down in writing, by or under the direction of the referee, in the form of a deposition, and that they may be in narrative form;⁵⁵ or by question and answer. But it has been held, on the other hand, to be a matter resting in the sound discretion of the referee, whether the examination shall be oral or be taken in writing.⁵⁶ And such would seem to be the reasonable rule.

Undoubtedly, the requirement that it be taken in writing may be waived by counsel of both parties.⁵⁷ Other examinations, taken upon issues joined, are not subject to this requirement.

The deposition must be read over to the bankrupt or other witness, and signed by him in the referee's presence.⁵⁸

The bankrupt or other witness should always be permitted to make a correction in any statement theretofore made and the reason therefor may be taken into consideration by the court in passing upon the credibility of the witness.⁵⁹ Such correction, however, does not permit the bankrupt or other witness to expunge the corrected parts, if they accurately state the testimony actually given, but simply permits the addition of the statement that the former testimony was incorrect and should have been given differently, "as now stated."

§ 1553. Objections to Be Entered on Record.—Objections made must be entered on the record by the referee, together with his rulings thereon.⁶⁰

The ground of objection must, in general, be stated, else exception will not be available on review.⁶¹ Where, however, there is only one possible ground and that one is sufficiently obvious, the reviewing court may consider the objection.⁶²

§ 1554. Referee to Rule on Admissibility and to Exclude Incompetent Testimony.—But the referee is to pass upon the admissibility of evidence offered and to exclude that which is incompetent, irrelevant or otherwise inadmissible.⁶³

In re Wilde's Sons, 11 A. B. R. 714, 131 Fed. 142 (D. C. N. Y.): "This motion involves the question whether a referee in bankruptcy has any power to exclude evidence. As I understand it, an officer appointed to simply take testimony for the use of the court, as, for instance, an examiner in an equity suit, has no jurisdiction to exclude or pass upon testimony. Unless the parties refer any question of the admission of testimony to the court, he is obliged to take all that is offered. But I think that whenever any officer is appointed whose duty it is to take evidence and also to exercise any judicial duty in regard to it, as to decide issues or to state the facts or law in an opinion or report, it is his right and duty to exclude inadmissible evidence upon objection. Why should he admit evidence which it would be his duty to disregard if admitted? Substantially all the cases in which evidence is taken by referees in bankruptcy, either in their character as referees or as special commissioners, are cases in which they either decide questions outright or draw conclusions from the evidence in the shape either of a report or an opinion; and I think that in all such cases the referee has the right to exclude evidence which he deems inadmissible. If error is committed by such exclusion, any party interested can take up the matter immediately on a certificate, or can urge the alleged error on final hearing. I am aware that there are authorities to the contrary for which I feel sincere respect, but none of them is necessarily controlling upon me, and I am not able to concur with them. The delay and expense of a bankruptcy system under which a referee has no power to exclude testimony, however irrelevant, is so great that such a method of procedure should not be permitted unless the principles of law absolutely require it. In my opinion they do not require it in proceedings before referees in bankruptcy."

But this case does not seem to note the distinction between the referee acting in his ordinary functions and as special master on discharge. Compare, however, National Bank v. Abbott, 21 A. B. R. 436, 165 Fed. 852 (C. C. A. Mo.).

In re Ruos, 20 A. B. R. 281, 159 Fed. 252 (D. C. Pa.): "A word upon the practice before referees may be appropriate. Where a question arises concerning the competency of a witness, or the admissibility of evidence, the referee should decide the point himself in the first instance instead of turning the matter over to the court. It will be time enough to certify the question when he is asked to do so in a proper manner. Very often his ruling will be acquiesced in, and the delay of referring the dispute to the court will thus be avoided."

But compare, Missouri, Am. Elec. Co. v. Hamilton Brown Co., 21 A. B. R. 270, 165 Fed. 283 (C. C. A. Mo.): "It is the duty of examiners, masters, referees, and the court taking evidence in controversies in bankruptcy, in the absence of a jury, to take, record, and, in case of an appeal, to return to the reviewing court, all the evidence offered by either party, that which they hold to be incompetent or immaterial as well as that which they deem competent and relevant, to the end that if the appellate court is of the opinion that evidence rejected should have been received it may consider it, render a final decree, and thus conclude the litigation without remanding the suit to procure the rejected evidence. From this rule evidence plainly privileged, the testimony of a privileged witness, and evidence which clearly and affirmatively appears to be so incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial that it would be an abuse of the process or power of the court to compel its production or permit its introduction, are excepted."

Apparently, contra, In re Sturgeon, 14 A. B. R. 682, 139 Fed. 608 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Under General Order No. 22 (18 Sup. Ct. vii), the duty of the referee is to receive the evidence which is offered, to note objections and to record the evidence; and, if either party persists in offering incompetent or irrelevant matter in evidence, the other party has a remedy, because the rule provides that 'the court shall have power to deal with the costs of incompetent, immaterial or irrelevant depositions, or parts of them, as may be just.' The equity practice is to be followed by referees. The order directs him to proceed as referee. The referee must take all the evidence and note objections." But it is to be noted that this was an examination before a referee in another district than the one wherein the bankruptcy was pending and this might afford a distinction.

At any rate, the referee is to exclude evidence that is so clearly incompetent, irrelevant or immaterial that it would have been an abuse of the process or power of the court to have compelled its production.⁶⁴

A rule compelling the referee on general examinations of bankrupts and witnesses, to take down answers, although the questions be incompetent and the answers improper, would lead to interminable confusion, and would practically give over such examinations into the absolute control of the 64. In re Clark, 21 A. B. R. 776 (Ref. Calif.).

examiner, leading to the possibility of intolerable abuse. The distinction noted in In re Wilde's Sons, supra, undoubtedly states the true principle.⁶⁵

§ 1555. General Examination Competent as Admission in Subsequent Litigation against Same Party.—The written deposition taken on general examination and also verbal testimony as to what was testified to on general examination, either of the bankrupt or of any witness, is admissible in evidence, as an admission, in any proceeding against the particular party so previously testifying.⁶⁶

In re Alphin & Lake Cotton Co., 12 A. B. R. 653, 131 Fed. 824 (D. C. Ark., affirmed in 14 A. B. R.): "Their testimony taken under § 7 or § 21—they having the right under the Act to have the assistance of counsel, at the expense of the estate, if necessary, and an opportunity for cross-examination—was clearly admissible in any proceeding against them, other than criminal, as admissions against themselves."

In re Wilcox, 6 A. B. R. 366, 109 Fed. 628 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "The testimony of the bankrupt himself, which is ordinarily reduced to writing by or under the supervision of the referee, and given under the solemnity of an oath, amounts, when protection against criminative testimony has been waived, to his admission, which can be used elsewhere, but not in any criminal or penal proceeding, as in admission against himself (In re Krueger, 2 Lowell 182)."

But is not admissible as against any other party.⁶⁷

65. But compare the practice on hearings in opposition to discharge before referees acting as special masters and where depositions are being taken in one district for use in a bankruptcy proceedings pending in another district, where the rule seems to be that if objection is made and sustained and exception taken the special master is bound nevertheless to take down the answer offered noting the objection thereto, the exception and his rulings.

In re Romine, 14 A. B. R. 785, 138 Fed. 837 (D. C. W. Va.): "It is clear to me that in taking testimony the referee must have it taken down, preferably in narrative form, but, upon objection raised, it is his duty to require the matter to be presented by question, to which the objection and reason thereof is to be clearly but briefly noted; then to enter his ruling thereon as to whether proper or not, and, although he may rule it to be improper, yet allow it to be answered. I am persuaded, however, that he is not called upon to suffer and allow counsel, as in this case, to ask and permit witnesses to answer the same question over and over again, whereby time is unnecessarily consumed and costs incurred; but that upon his notice the fact that the question has been once answered, of the demand to answer has been once positively refused, the court will justify him in preventing vain repetition."

Hart [the claimant] was also examined at such meeting, and was present at the examination as attorney for the bankrupt while the latter was being examined, but was not present when the others were examined, and was not notified at any time before the testimony was taken that it was to be used against him. It seems clear that, aside from his own examination, none of this testimony was admissible against the petitioner upon the hearing of this claim, and it will not be considered as against him."

Bankr. Act, § 7 (9): "No testimony given by the bankrupt shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceedings."

U. S. v. Marsh. Chambers, 13 A. B. R. 708 (D. C. N. Y.): This case extends the doctrine to an unreasonable extent, holding that in a proceeding before a grand jury on an indictment for concealing assets, under § 29, by failing to schedule them, it is unlawful to produce the schedules themselves, as evidence and that an indictment so procured will be dismissed. How can the crime be proved if the very fact itself—corpus delicti, so to speak—cannot be given in evidence. It is doubtful if the proviso of § 7 (9) or the constitutional guaranty would extend so far. The immunity from the use of testimony would hardly extend to the use of schedules.

U. S. v. Simon, 17 A. B. R. 41, 146 Fed. 89 (D. C. Wash.). See discussion in State v. Strait (Minn.), 102 N. W. 913. Also, in Burrell v. State, 12 A. B. R. 132, 194 U. S. 572.

being confined to the "testimony" given upon the examination authorized by the ninth clause of § 7 of the Bankruptcy Act. Under this ruling, therefore, since the repeal of § 860 of the United States Revised Statutes, the schedules of the bankrupt, together with his books and documents, may be used in evidence against him.

Ensign v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 227 U. S. 592, 30 A. B. R. 408: "The reliance of the plaintiffs in error, of course, is upon that part of clause 9 of the section which declares: 'but no testimony given by him shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding.'

"It is insisted that, in accordance with the spirit of the Fifth Amendment, this should be construed as applying to the schedule required to be prepared, sworn to, and filed by the bankrupt under the provisions of the 8th clause. But as a matter of mere interpretation, we deem it clear that it is only the testimony given upon the examination of the bankrupt under clause 9 that is prohibited from being offered in evidence against him in criminal proceeding. The schedule referred to in the 8th clause, and the oath of the bankrupt verifying it, are to be 'filed in court' and, therefore, are, of course, to be in writing. The word 'testimony' more properly refers to oral evidence. It was reasonable for Congress to make a distinction between the schedule, which may presumably be prepared at leisure and scrutinized by the bankrupt with care before he verifies it, and the testimony that he is to give when he submits to an examination at a meeting of creditors or at other times pursuant to the order of the court—a proceeding more or less unfriendly and inquisitorial, as well as summary, and in which it may be presumed that even an honest bankrupt might, through confusion or want of caution, be betrayed into making admissions that he would not deliberately make. Full effect can be given to the clause, 'but no testimony given by him shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding,' by confining it to the testimony given under clause 9, to which the words in question are immediately subjoined. And, we think that proper interpretation requires their effect to be thus limited."

The immunity cannot be evaded by merely reading questions and answers therefrom and questioning the bankrupt thereon, without introducing the examination itself.

Jacobs v. United States, 20 A. B. R. 550, 161 Fed. 694 (C. C. A. Mass.): "The underlying philosophy of the statute in question is that, as a matter of justice to the bankrupt, and also for the interests of creditors, he should be encouraged to testify freely in his examination; but he would have no encouragement thereto if, on being prosecuted for an offense, he could not undertake to absolve himself by his own testimony except at the risk of being tripped or embarrassed by what he had previously sworn to. To permit a course of cross-examination in the method here, whether the documentary evidence taken before the referee was produced in the presence of the jury or not, would be simply to permit an evasion of the statute, because to do so would involve the mischief which the statute intended to guard against, in that the witness might be more harassed and prejudiced than he would be if the whole document had been frankly put into the case."

Nor is the immunity waived by the bankrupt voluntarily offering himself as a witness.⁷¹

71. Jacobs v. United States, 20 A. B. R. 550, 161 Fed. 694 (C. C. A. Mass.).

But this immunity from the use of testimony given by the bankrupt does not prevent prosecution for acts testified to upon examination: the immunity is immunity from the use of evidence so given, not from prosecution.

Burrell v. State, 194 U. S. 572, 12 A. B. R. 132: "It does not say that he shall be exempt from prosecution, but only, in case of prosecution, his testimony cannot be used against him. The two things are different, and cannot be confounded."

In re Walsh, 4 A. B. R. 693, 696, 104 Fed. 518 (D. C. S. Dak.): "If the Congress of the United States desires to draw from the bankrupt testimony that may tend to criminate him, it must by legislation provide, under the ruling in the case of Brown v. Walker, nothing short of immunity from prosecution. Not that it shall never be used in any criminal proceeding against him, but that he cannot be prosecuted by reason of any information gained in this manner."

But in other cases it has been ably contended that the clause does not grant immunity from prosecution for falseness in the testimony itself thus protected; that the immunity extends simply to its use in a prosecution for any actual crime revealed by the testimony, and is based on such testimony being true.⁷²

Edelstein v. U. S., 17 A. B. R. 658, 149 Fed. 636 (C. C. A. Minn.): "The government contends that the immunity has sole reference to the use of evidence in a prosecution for some offense to which his evidence related; that Congress offered as an inducement to a full, frank, and truthful disclosure by a bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors of all matters and things concerning his property and estate that his evidence should not be used against him in any prosecution for any such offense, however much it might implicate him.

"Defendant's argument is that the language employed is comprehensive and unequivocal; 'that no testimony given by him shall be offered against him in any criminal proceeding;' that it, in terms, prohibits the use of the negative answer given by the bankrupt to the question propounded to him, although knowingly and intentionally false, as a basis for the criminal charge involved in the indictment now under consideration. To this we cannot give our assent. There is no rule requiring a literal construction to be placed even upon unambiguous words of a particular clause of a statute without consideration of its context. The meaning of specific words in one part of a statute is often controlled by other provisions of the same act, and frequently by provisions of other acts which are in pari materia. * * *

"Moreover, it would, in effect, secure to the bankrupt the immunity in question for violating his part of the compact, namely, to testify—that is, to testify truthfully—by virtue of which he secured a right to the immunity. We are not willing to impute to Congress any such contradictory and absurd purpose. The words 'any criminal proceeding' cannot sensibly or reasonably be construed so literally and generally as to include the criminal proceeding provided by law for false swearing in giving his testimony."

And the case of Edelstein v. United States has been followed.⁷³

⁷³ United States v. Brod, 23 A. B. R. 740, 176 Fed. 165 (D. C. Ga.).

Wechsler v. United States, 19 A. B. R. 1, 158 Fed. 579 (C. C. A.): "The Bankruptcy Act * * *, requires the bankrupt to submit to an examination under oath as to various matters specified therein, with the proviso that 'no testimony given by him shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding.' It is contended that the immunity thus accorded in broad, unqualified language should apply to prosecution for falsely testifying upon such examination; and it is suggested that the section quoted from does not contain the qualification found in § 860, Rev. St. U. S. * * * (and in other Federal statutes), that the immunity provision 'shall not exempt any * * * witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in * * * testifying as aforesaid.' Plaintiff in error cites in support of his contention the opinion of Judge Hanford in U. S. v. Simon (D. C.), 146 Fed. 89, and the dissenting opinion of Judge Philips in Edelstein v. U. S., 17 Am. B. R. 649, 149 Fed. 636, * * *, which are directly in point and fully sustain his contention. He also cites dicta in Re Marx (D. C.), 4 Am. B. R. 521, 102 Fed. 676, and in Re Logan (D. C.), 4 Am. B. R. 525, 102 Fed. 876; in Re Leslie (D. C.), 9 Am. B. R. 561, 119 Fed. 406; in Re Dow's Estate (D. C.), 5 Am. B. R. 400, 105 Fed. 889, and in Re Gaylord, 7 Am. B. R. 1, 112 Fed. 668, 50 C. C. A. 415. On the other hand, the provision quoted was held not to give immunity from prosecution for giving false testimony upon an examination under the Bankruptcy Act in a well-considered opinion concurred in by a majority of the court in Edelstein v. U. S., 17 Am. B. R. 649, 149 Fed. 636, * * * (C. C. A.); and an application for certiorari in that cause was refused by the Supreme Court (205 U. S. 543). * * * Whatever might be our conclusions were the question presented as a novel one, we are clearly of the opinion that we should follow the construction adopted in the Eighth Circuit and left undisturbed by the Supreme Court, so that in a matter of so much importance the decisions of the Federal courts in the different circuits may be uniform."

Section 860 of the United States Revised Statutes has been repealed since the decision of Wechsler v. United States.⁷⁴ § 1556½. But Such Immunity Is Not a Bar to Prosecution for Perjury Committed by Bankrupt When Examined under § 7 (9).

—For a long time it was doubted whether this immunity did not create an effective obstacle to any conviction for perjury in swearing falsely before the referee, some courts holding the provision granted immunity from prosecution for the falseness of the testimony itself,⁷⁵ while other courts held it extended simply to prosecution for any actual crime revealed by the testimony.⁷⁶

However, the matter has been definitely set at rest by the Supreme Court of the United States, to the effect that the immunity afforded by § 7 (9) is not applicable to a prosecution for perjury committed by the bankrupt when examined under that subdivision of § 7.⁷⁷

⁷⁷ See Daniels v. United States, 27 A. B. R. 790 (C. C. A. Ohio), decided since Glickstein v. United States.

Glickstein v. United States, 222 U. S. 139, 27 A. B. R. 786: "When the legality of a conviction and sentence of Glickstein was before the court below, as the result of error prosecuted by him, the court, stating the facts which we have recited, certified the following question: 'Is subsection 9 and the immunity afforded by it applicable to a prosecution for perjury committed by the bankrupt when examined under it?' * * * "With these propositions in hand, it follows that the precise question for decision is, Did the guaranty of immunity contained in the 9th subdivision of § 7 of the Bankruptcy Act bar a prosecution for perjury for false swearing in giving testimony under the command of the section? In other words, the sole question is, Does the statute, in compelling the giving of testimony, confer an immunity wider than that guaranteed by the Constitution? The argument to maintain that it does is that, as the statute provides for immunity, and does not contain the reservation found in either Rev. Stat., § 860, or that embodied in the Act of 1893, therefore, under the rule that the inclusion of one is the exclusion of the other, such a reservation cannot be implied. Or, to state the proposition in another form, it is that as the statute in the immunity clause says: 'But no testimony given by him (the witness who is compelled to be examined) shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding,' and as these words are unambiguous, there is no room for limiting the language so as to cause the immunity provision not to prohibit the offer of the testimony in a criminal prosecution for perjury. But the contention assumes the question for decision, since it excludes the possibility of construction when, on the face of the statute, the meaning attributed to the immunity clause cannot be given to it without destroying the words of the statute and frustrating its obvious object and intent. This may not be denied, since the statute expressly commands the giving of testimony, and its manifest purpose is to secure truthful testimony, while the limited and exclusive meaning which the contention attributes to the immunity clause would cause the section to be a mere license to commit perjury, and hence not to command the giving of testimony in the true sense of the word. The argument that because the section does not contain an expression of the reservation of a right to prosecute for perjury in harmony with the reservations in Rev. Stat., § 860, and the Act of 1893, therefore it is to be presumed that it was intended that no such right should exist, we think, simply begs the question for decision, since it is impossible in reason to conceive that Congress commanded the giving of testimony, and at the same time intended that false testimony might be given with impunity, in the absence of the most express and specific command to that effect.

Bearing in mind the subject dealt with, we think the reservation of the right to prosecute for perjury, made in the statutes to which we have referred, was but the manifestation of abundant caution; and hence, the absence of such reservation in the statute under consideration may not be taken as indicative of an intention on the part of Congress that perjury might be committed at pleasure. Some of the considerations which we have pointed out were accurately expounded in Edelstein v. United States, 17 Am. B. R. 649, 149 Fed. 636, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 236, 79 C. C. A. 328, by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the eighth circuit, and in Wechsler v. United States, 19 Am. B. R. 1, 158 Fed. 579, 86 C. C. A. 37, by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the second circuit, and this leads us to observe that the necessary result of the conclusion now reached is to disapprove the opinions in Re Marz (D. C. Ky.) 4 Am. B. R. 521, 102 Fed. 676, and Re Logan (D. C. Ky.), 4 Am. B. R. 525, 102 Fed. 876. It follows that the question propounded must receive a negative answer, and our order will be, question certified answered 'No.'

Edelstein v. U. S., 17 A. B. R. 658, 149 Fed. 636 (C. C. A. Minn.): "The government contends that the immunity has sole reference to the use of evidence in a prosecution for some offense to which his evidence related: that Congress offered as an inducement to a full, frank, and truthful disclosure by a bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors of all matters and things concerning his property and estate that his evidence should not be used against him in any prosecution for any such offense, however much it might implicate him. Defendant's argument is that the language employed is comprehensive and unequivocal: 'that no testimony given by him shall be offered against him in any criminal proceeding;' that it, in terms, prohibits the use of the negative answer given by the bankrupt to the question propounded to him, although knowingly and intentionally false, as a basis for the criminal charge involved in the indictment now under consideration. To this we cannot give our assent. There is no rule requiring a literal construction to be placed even upon unambiguous words of a particular clause of a statute without consideration of its context. The meaning of specific words in one part of a statute is often controlled by other provisions of the same act, and frequently by provisions of other acts which are in pari materia. * * * Moreover, it would, in effect, secure to the bankrupt the immunity in question for violating his part of the compact, namely, to testify—that is, to testify truthfully—by virtue of which he secured a right to the immunity. We are not willing to impute to Congress any such contradictory and absurd purpose. The words 'any criminal proceeding cannot sensibly or reasonably be construed so literally and generally as to include the criminal proceeding provided by law for false swearing in giving his testimony.'

§ 1557. Whether Protection Applies Only to Federal Prosecution.—It is a question whether the protection afforded by § 7 (9) of the Bankrupt Act applies only to proceedings in the federal courts,⁷⁸ or whether it also extends to those in the state courts. However, inasmuch as § 7 (9) has been held not to prohibit the use of the bankrupt's schedules,⁷⁹ nor of the books, papers and documents of the bankrupt passing to the trustee by operation of § 70 (a) (1) but is confined solely to testimony given while under examination authorized by § 7 (9) and § 21 (a), the question does not properly arise when the evidence offered to be introduced is the bankrupt's schedules, books, etc.⁸⁰

Ensign v. Commonwealth of Pa., 227 U. S. 592, 30 A. B. R. 408: "For the reasons given, it seems to us clear that the plaintiffs in error were not entitled to have the bankruptcy schedules excluded from evidence, because those schedules were not within the description of 'testimony' in the clause quoted from § 7 of the Bankruptcy Act. And for like reasons, the evidence showing the results of an expert examination of the books of the bankers was also admissible. This conclusion renders it unnecessary for us to consider whether the prohibition with which we have dealt, that 'no testimony given by him shall be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceeding,' is not limited to criminal proceedings in the Federal courts; and upon this question we express no opinion."

On the other hand, where the evidence sought to be introduced against the bankrupt in the state court is testimony given while under the examination authorized by §§ 7 (9) and 21 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, the ques-

In re Nachman, 8 A. B. R. 181, 182, 114 Fed. 995 (D. C. S. It would be no answer to a prosecution which might be instituted in the state courts, which are not created by acts of Congress, and which prescribe their own rules of proceedings independently of Congress."

Evidence taken in the bankrupt's examination may be used against him on the hearing of objections to his discharge: opposition to discharge not being a criminal proceedings, even though a crime be charged.⁸² Also it may be used on hearings upon petitions for orders upon bankrupts to surrender assets claimed to be in their possession,⁸³ and in similar proceedings.

§ 1558. Incriminating Questions—Constitutional Rights Preserved, Notwithstanding § 7 (9).—The constitutional right of a witness granted by the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, to refuse to answer questions and produce documents or other evidence that in his estimation would tend to incriminate him, is preserved, both as to bankrupts and as to all other witnesses; and this is so notwithstanding that, as to the bankrupt, under § 7 (9), no testimony given by him may be offered in evidence against him in any criminal proceedings, this statutory protection of the bankrupt from the use of such testimony not being as broad as his constitutional privilege to refrain from giving it altogether.⁸⁴ Thus, as to the bankrupt, it is preserved.⁸⁵

But this language is not half so strong nor half so broad as the language of the Act of February 25, 1868 (15 Stat. 37), which was considered, and the same argument made in the case of Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 560, in which case the court held that the witness could not be compelled to answer."

In re Walsh, 4 A. B. R. 693, 104 Fed. 518 (D. C. S. I can see that in some instances the fact that the bankrupt stands upon his constitutional guaranty would interfere with the proper administration of the bankruptcy law, but that is not a question which the court has the power to remedy."

In re Nachman, 8 A. B. R. 182, 183, 114 Fed. 995 (D. C. S. C.): "Testimony thus given under compulsion might be used to search out other testimony which could be used against him, a clue to which might not otherwise be obtained, and the immunity provided by the constitution would thus be frittered away. No act of Congress can deprive a citizen of the privileges afforded by the constitution unless it supplies a complete protection from all perils against which the constitution was intended to provide. Section 7 of the Bankrupt Act, cited above, does not provide such complete protection. * * * It may be well contended that the object designed to be accomplished by § 7 of the Bankrupt Act, which requires the bankrupt to submit to an examination concerning the conduct of his business, will be defeated, if the witness is thus permitted to refuse to testify concerning his dealings with his creditors and others, and such undoubtedly is the unfortunate result; but it is for the Congress to provide, if it can, against such contingencies. It might well provide that a witness who refused to answer questions concerning his business should be deprived of his right to a discharge. That would be within its right. The courts cannot deprive a citizen of the constitutional right invoked by him for his protection upon any consideration of inconvenience or for the purpose of administering what it may regard as a salutary and useful law.

"My conclusion, therefore, is that a witness, under examination before a referee in bankruptcy, cannot be compelled to answer a question the answer to which he claims will tend to criminate him."

Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616: "The compulsory production of a man's private papers to be used in evidence against him is equivalent to compelling him to be a witness against himself in a prosecution for a crime, penalty or forfeiture, and is equally within the prohibition of the Fifth amendment."

Likewise, the bankrupt may omit from his schedules answers to questions therein which might tend to incriminate him.

In re Podolin, 30 A. B. R. 576, 205 Fed. 563 (D. C. Pa. affirmed, Podolin v. Warner Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. R. 796, 210 Fed. 97, C. C. A. Pa.): "The referee's order of May 12, 1913, will be so modified as to provide expressly that the bankrupts may omit from their schedules any reference to the transaction with Rudsky. They are still exposed to the danger of prosecution in connection with that transaction, and they should not be compelled to run the not remote risk of having their statements used against them in such a prosecution. The connection between such statements and the evidence required to sustain the prosecution is direct and immediate."

And it is not essential that a prosecution be actually pending.

In re Hess, 14 A. B. R. 562, 134 Fed. 109 (D. C. Wash.): "The fact that no prosecution is now pending against the bankrupt is no answer to his right to claim this constitutional privilege. The meaning of the constitutional provision is not simply that he shall not be compelled to produce books and papers which may contain evidence tending to incriminate him in a pending prosecution for a criminal offense against him, but its object is to insure him against such compulsory production of his books and papers containing incriminating evidence in any proceeding or investigation, whether such compulsory disclosure is sought directly to establish his guilt, or indirectly and incidentally for the purpose of proving facts involved in an issue between other parties. If the disclosure thus made would be capable of being used against him as a confession of crime, or an admission of facts tending to prove the commission of an offense by himself, in any prosecution then pending, or that might be brought against him thereafter, such disclosure would be an accusation of himself, within the meaning of the constitutional provision."

If he were otherwise privileged to withhold the books his petition operates both as a waiver and as a transfer of the right of custody and the books cannot now be withheld or withdrawn upon the assertion that they may contain incriminating evidence or matter."

While the constitutional privilege, granted by the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, is not obligatory upon the state courts since it regulates merely the procedure in the federal courts,⁸⁷ yet, if the disclosure sought to be obtained in the federal court could be used against the bankrupt in a state court prosecution, he may still claim the privilege to refuse to answer, even though he is granted immunity by statute from the use of the testimony in a federal prosecution. The immunity would have to be as broad as his constitutional privilege and extend to the use of his testimony in the state court, to avoid the privilege.⁸⁸

However, it has been held that where the bankrupt has once voluntarily delivered to the federal court, books, documents and papers, the trustee will not be restrained from offering them to the prosecuting authorities of a state.⁸⁹

And the books of the bankrupt which have been surrendered to the trustee, although unwillingly, also may be produced before the grand jury and before the petit jury at the trial, because such use of documentary evidence is not "compelling" the defendant to be a witness against himself.^{89a}

Johnson v. U. S., 227 U. S. 600, 30 A. B. R. 14: "On the first point the facts are simply that the books had been transferred to the trustee in accordance with § 70 of the Bankruptcy Act, and were produced before the grand jury and before the petit jury at the trial. That the transfer lawfully could be required is established by Re Harris, 221 U. S. 274, 26 A. B. R. 302. But the defendant lays hold of an expression in that case, 'the properly careful provision to protect him from use of the books in aid of prosecution,' as an intimation that the books could not be put to such a use.

"Courts proceed step by step. And we now have to consider whether the cautious statement in the former case marked the limit of the law in a case where no rights, if there were any, were saved when the books were transferred. The answer was implied in that decision. A party is privileged from producing the evidence, but not from its production. The transfer by bankruptcy is no different from a transfer by execution of a volume with a confession written on the fly leaf. It is held that a criminal cannot protect himself by getting the legal title to corporate books. Wheeler v. United States, 226 U. S. 478. But the converse proposition is by no means true, that he may keep the protection from the introduction of documentary evidence that he would have had while he retained it, after the title and possession have gone to someone else.

"It is true that the transfer of the books may have been against the defendant's will, but it is compelled by the law as a necessary incident to the distribution of his property, not in order to obtain criminal evidence against him. Of course, a man cannot protect his property from being used to pay his debts by attaching to it a disclosure of crime. If the documentary confession comes to a third hand alio intuitu, as this did, the use of it in court does not compel the defendant to be a witness against himself."

The privilege may not be asserted so as to prevent the production and surrender to the trustee of those documents, books, deeds and instruments in writing, relating to the bankrupt's business, the actual title to which passes to the trustee by operation of law under § 70 (a) (1) as defined by § 1 (13).⁹⁰

In re Harris, 221 U. S. 274, 26 A. B. R. 302: "The question is not of testimony but of surrender—not of compelling the bankrupt to be a witness against himself in a criminal case, present or future, but of compelling him to yield possession of property that he no longer is entitled to keep. If a trustee had been appointed, the title to the books would have vested in him by the express terms of section 70, and the bankrupt could not have withheld possession of what he no longer owned, on the ground that otherwise he might be punished. That is one of the misfortunes of bankruptcy if it follows crime. The right not to be compelled to be a witness against oneself is not a right to appropriate property that may tell one's story."

United States v. Halstead, 27 A. B. R. 302, 195 Fed. 295 (D. C. Ill.): "If the order had been to produce the books in a criminal investigation pending before the grand jury and they contained matter that might incriminate himself, he would have come under the protection of the fifth amendment, and nothing short of statutory immunity would then suffice. But the order was to deliver them as property, the title to which was passed from him, and if, as an incident of that change of possession they should come to be used as evidence in a criminal prosecution, it is one of the misfortunes of bankruptcy. As was said: 'The right not to be compelled to be a witness against one's self is not a right to appropriate property that may tell one's story.'"

And surrender to a receiver may be enforced because the right to enforce title in the trustee later appointed carries with it the right to enforce surrender of possession to the receiver in the meantime.

Nor may the privilege be asserted to prevent the introduction into evidence of the bankrupt's books of account and papers already in the possession of the trustee or receiver.⁹¹

It has been held that the use of the bankrupt's books and papers violates neither the Fourth nor Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.⁹²

§ 1559. Where Answer by No Reasonable Possibility Could Tend to Incriminate, No Privilege.—But where the answer to a question cannot by any reasonable possibility tend to incriminate him, the bankrupt or witness, he must answer.⁹³

Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 599: "The object of the law is to afford to a party, called upon to give evidence in a proceeding inter alios, protection against being brought by means of his own evidence within the penalties of the law. But it would be to convert a salutary protection into a means of abuse if it were to be held that a mere imaginary possibility of danger, however remote and improbable, was sufficient to justify the withholding of evidence essential to the ends of justice."

In re Levin, 11 A. B. R. 382, 131 Fed. 388 (D. C. N. Y.): "As I understand the rule, if the question is of such a description that the answer may or may not criminate the witness, he can refuse to answer (Judge Marshal's opinion on Burr trial). But if the court is convinced that the answer to the question cannot by any possibility criminate him and especially if the witness does not swear that he believes it would, it is the duty of the court to compel him to answer. Otherwise every bankrupt can absolutely refuse to be examined at all." The syllabus in this case is: "A bankrupt under examination may be punished as for contempt for refusing to answer question: (1) As to the accuracy of a creditor's proof of claim; (2) as to whether or not the signature to notes held by a creditor were his; (3) Whether or not he knew a particular creditor who had filed a claim, and whether or not he was a salesman in his employ; (4) as to the identity of his check book after testifying that he could tell whether or not a check has been paid by reference to each of his checks; as each of the questions could not, by any of the questions asked, tend to degrade or incriminate him."

Obiter, In re Kantor & Cohen, 9 A. B. R. 104, 117 Fed. 356 (D. C. N. Y.): "In a case where it clearly appears to the court that a party from whom evidence is sought contumaciously or mistakenly refuses to furnish that which cannot possibly injure him, he will not be permitted to shield himself behind the privilege, but generally the party best knows what he cannot furnish without accusing himself and where it is not perfectly evident and manifest that the evidence called for will not be incriminating, the privilege must be allowed."

so, by answering that they contain incriminating evidence? He may desire to retain possession of his books for the purpose of concealing assets, or he may honestly be mistaken as to the effect of the evidence alleged to be incriminating: the transactions, which, in his judgment, are incriminating, may not be acts or transactions of an incriminating nature, and, if established, may not constitute an offense; the Statute of Limitations may bar a prosecution. All these matters must be considered in passing upon the question as to whether or not the books do contain evidence of an incriminating nature.

"When a witness is before the court in a proceeding, and a question is propounded, it must appear to the court, from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called to give, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness from being compelled to answer, to entitle him to the privilege of silence, and where the fact of the witness being in danger be once made apparent to the court, great latitude should be allowed to him in judging for himself of the effect of any particular question. * * *

"This being the practice when witnesses are called to testify and claim their privilege, it is equally important, under the Bankrupt Law, that the Court should pass upon the probability of danger to the bankrupt when he pleads his constitutional privilege, upon a demand made by a trustee in bankruptcy for him to deliver his books and papers, as required by that Act."

In re Rosenblatt, 16 A. B. R. 308, 143 Fed. 663 (D. C. Pa.): "It is contended that the bankrupts are the sole judges of that question, and they are not required to do more than to claim their constitutional privilege that they are the sole judges of the question as to whether or not the books do contain such evidence, and that they are not required in any manner, by the production of evidence, to satisfy the court that their claim has some foundation in fact. If this be the law, then, bankrupts in every case can retain their books, and creditors will be unable to secure evidence of what in most mercantile concerns is the most valuable asset, to-wit: The book accounts. It would be the greatest possible encouragement to dishonest debtors to practice frauds upon their creditors and then destroy the evidence of it. But this question has been settled by the courts. They have taken a more reasonable view, which requires that it shall appear to the court that the claim is made in good faith and that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger from the production of the books, and when this fact does appear then great latitude should be allowed the claimant in judgment for himself as to the effect of any particular question or production of a book. 'But it would be to convert a salutary protection into a means of abuse if it were to be held that a mere imaginary possibility of danger, however remote and improbable, was sufficient to justify the withholding of evidence essential to the ends of justice.' Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 599. And it would be equally potential in converting a salutary protection into a means of abuse if a bankrupt were permitted to judge entirely for himself, regardless of the facts, whether or not the production of a book will tend to incriminate him."

Obiter, In re Walsh, 4 A. B. R. 693, 696, 104 Fed. 518 (D. C. S. Dak.): "And in questions where the referee is satisfied clearly that the bankrupt would not criminate himself by answering the same, he would not be entitled to the protection."

Inferentially and obiter, In re Nachman, 8 A. B. R. 183, 114 Fed. 905 (D. C. S. C.): "Under the provisions of § 7, the witness is compelled to give testimony concerning his business, and he cannot interpose objections which will shut out all light whatever from his creditors. The constitutional immunity can only be invoked to protect him from answering a question the answer to which might subject him to prosecution. In the further conduct of the examination the referee is directed, whenever a question is propounded, to notify the witness that he is not required to answer it if the answer would tend to criminate himself. It is only questions of that nature that he may refuse to answer. He is not to be permitted to interpose his constitutional immunity as a shield to every inquiry concerning his business, nor is his counsel to be permitted to delay or obstruct inquiry by making objections for him."

In re Bendheim, 24 A. B. R. 254 (D. C. N. Y.): "Undoubtedly it is always a difficult thing to say at just what point a bankrupt who is compelled to answer, and who claims his privilege, should be allowed the exercise of his own unquestioned judgment of the danger of self-incrimination. A priori no question can be said to be outside of the range of proof of some crime, and to allow him to stand mute in all cases is to give him the privilege of keeping silent as to all his affairs, in the interest of merely pedantic and verbal integrity of principle. While in all cases he must be given the benefit of all doubts, there must be something which gives rise to a probability of damage upon which a doubt may be based. Queen v. Boyes, 1 B. & S. 311, 321. * * * But in the absence of some claim on his part coupled with some proof of reasonable expectation that that claim has a basis, his danger is in my judgment purely academic."

And the same qualification applies to the right to omit from schedules reference to certain transactions.

In re Podolin, 30 A. B. R. 576, 205 Fed. 563 (D. C. Pa., affirmed, Podolin v. Warner Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. R. 796, 210 Fed. 97, C. C. A. Pa.) [quoted also at § 1558]: "But their objection to filling out the other schedules cannot be sustained. These (A3, A4, B2C, and B3a) require them to set forth certain facts about their financial condition in October, and I have not been convinced that these facts have so close a connection with the written representations about their condition that were mailed in the preceding June as would tend to convict them of a postal crime in making such representations. In my opinion the connection, if it exists at all, is remote and contingent, and need not be taken into account."

However, even where the answers might perhaps be inculpatory yet the bankrupt may not refuse altogether to file schedules, but must make a bona fide effort to comply with the provisions of the Act, without incriminating himself.

In re Podolin, 29 A. B. R. 406, 202 Fed. 1014 (D. C. Pa., affirmed sub nom. Podolin v. Warner Dry Goods Co., 31 A. B. R. 796, 210 Fed. 97, C. C. A. Pa.): "As a general proposition, the referee's ruling that the bankrupts must file schedules, so far as they can do so without incriminating themselves, is obviously correct. But until an effort is made to comply with his order, it is practically impossible for the court to decide whether a particular fact is to be included or omitted. To decide that a bankrupt is not bound to put his hand to a declaration of fact that may incriminate him, does not advance a particular dispute very much; what is required is an effort in good faith by the bankrupt to file a schedule that obeys the Act up to the point where the court can see that further obedience would violate the constitutional protection. When the bankrupts present such schedules as they can conscientiously declare to be a compliance with the order (saving their constitutional rights) the referee will then be able, either to order them to do specific acts or to approve the refusal to do them; and in either event the District Court will then have something definite to rule upon. Until such a situation is presented, the discussion is almost wholly academic."

And he must set forth in his schedules that he refuses to answer the query because of danger of incrimination: mere silence is not enough.

§ 1560. Privilege Does Not Authorize Refusal to Be Sworn Altogether nor to Produce Documents nor to File Schedules.—And the privilege does not authorize a bankrupt to refuse altogether to be sworn, nor to refuse altogether to produce the documents or books, but simply to refuse to answer questions as they are put or to allow inspection of the particular document or pages of the book as they are called for: the bankrupt must be sworn and the books or documents must be produced.⁹⁴

In re Hark Bros., 14 A. B. R. 624, 136 Fed. 986 (D. C. Pa.): "The order to produce them before him should have been complied with, and then the question as to whether this plea of the bankrupts is well founded could be determined by the referee."

In re Hess, 14 A. B. R. 563, 564, 134 Fed. 109 (D. C. Pa.): "Where, under these circumstances, a bankrupt pleads this privilege, he should be required to bring the books and papers, which he alleges contain the incriminating evidence, before either the court or referee in bankruptcy, and when it is made to appear that his plea is well founded, the court can make such order in the case as will fully protect him from discovery of such evidence, and, at the same time, if possible, enable the trustee to obtain such information from the books as is always necessary and indispensable in the settlement of bankrupt estates."

Compare, even stronger rule, In re Harris, 20 A. B. R. 911, 164 Fed. 292 (D. C. N. Y.): "A rule under which a bankrupt may, in any case, at his own option, refuse to produce his books may, in many instances, almost paralyze the power of the court to administer the estate. No business of any considerable magnitude can be or is carried on without keeping books of account; and when such a business becomes bankrupt it is practically almost impossible for a receiver or trustee to properly discharge his duties without having possession of the books of the business. In view of this necessity in bankruptcy cases it has been held that a bankrupt is not permitted to withhold his books from his trustee on his mere assertion that they tend to incriminate him, but must produce them before the court or referee in bankruptcy in order to have the question determined whether they do, in fact, tend to incriminate him; and that, if it appears that they do contain incriminating evidence, the court can make such an order as will protect the bankrupt from the use of such evidence for any criminal proceeding, and at the same time will enable the trustee to make such use of the books as may be necessary to administer the estate."

Nor, as we have seen in the preceding section, will it permit the bankrupt to refuse altogether to file schedules: he must not only file the schedules but must state therein that the reason he omits the particular item is that its answer would tend to incriminate him.^{94a}

§ 1561. Privilege to Be Claimed at Time Question Asked or Production Demanded.—The time to claim the privilege is when the question is asked, and, if not then claimed, it is waived.⁹⁵

Burrell v. State, 194 U. S. 572, 12 A. B. R. 132: "The statute does not prohibit the use of testimony against the consent of him who gave it. It prescribes a rule of competency of evidence which may or may not be insisted upon. It does not declare a policy of protection of which cannot be waived. And the time to avail of it is when the testimony is offered. After the testimony is admitted, its probative force cannot be limited. This could not be contended even under the broader provision of the Constitution. A witness who voluntarily testifies cannot resist the effect of the testimony by claiming that he was not compellable to give it.

"In the case at bar, the court dealt with testimony which had been admitted without question or objection. * * *

"In the case at bar, as we have already said, plaintiff in error did not claim the protection afforded him by the Bankrupt Act. He made no objection to the use of the testimony which he gave before the referee, nor does he now urge its use as error. He broadly claimed, and now claims, exemption from prosecution. For the reasons we have given the claim is untenable."

And when the book or document is about to be inspected.⁹⁶

The privilege should be claimed by the witness himself.

In re Nachman, 8 A. B. R. 180, 184, 114 Fed. 995 (D. C. S. C.): "If he claims that the answer to any question propounded would tend to criminate him, he cannot be compelled to answer. This claim, to be effective, should be made by the witness himself, but the referee should notify him that a statement that such answer would tend to criminate him would, if false, subject him to a prosecution for perjury, as would any other false oath."

If testimony once be freely given or production of documents once be freely made, the testimony or documents may of course be used thereafter, for the privilege is purely personal and may be waived.

In re Tracy & Co., 23 A. B. R. 438, 177 Fed. 532 (D. C. N. Y.): "Moreover, if freely given once, it may of course be used thereafter (Tucker v. United States, 151 U. S. 164), for the privilege is purely personal and may be waived. Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 597."

In re Bendheim, 24 A. B. R. 254, 180 Fed. 918 (D. C. N. Y.): "Having volunteered upon a disclosure of what was in his shop at that time, he had waived his privilege, for it is well settled that having once embarked upon such a disclosure he has waived his privilege and cannot thereafter stop halfway."

Even where the trustee has permitted such documents to be used by the state authorities in prosecution of the bankrupt in the state courts.⁹⁷

It has been held, however, that where the bankrupt or other witness has given the testimony or produced the document under coercion, as, for example, under the pressure of a court order, and not freely, the privilege would continue.^{97a}

Obiter, In re Tracy & Co., 23 A. B. R. 438, 177 Fed. 532 (D. C. N. United States*, 116 U. S. 616. I do not even say that the mere claim of privilege would not be enough to preserve his rights or that he was obliged to wait for the receiver actually to obtain an order of contempt against him."

§ 1562. Privilege Not Waived by Voluntary Bankruptcy.—The bankrupt does not waive the privilege by filing a voluntary petition.⁹⁸

U. S. v. Goldstein, 12 A. B. R. 760, 132 Fed. 789 (D. C. Va.): "It is suggested that one who files a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, who in theory, at least, knows that he may be required to make full disclosures under § 7, cl. 9, of the Bankruptcy Act is in the position of a defendant in a criminal case who voluntarily takes the witness stand in his own behalf, and that, having waived his constitutional privilege in respect to self-incrimination, he cannot refuse to answer any question. For the sake of argument it may be conceded—though I have not referred to, and have not found, any Virginia decision so holding—that, when a defendant in a criminal cause voluntarily goes on the stand and testifies in his own behalf, he cannot, on cross-examination, claim his privilege and

Also, compare, modification of contra rule, obiter, In re Walsh, 4 A. B. R. 693, 104 Fed. 518 (D. C. S. Dak.): "I will say, however, that it is not every question that the bankrupt may refuse to answer. He would not be protected in case a question was clearly cross-examination of what he had volunteered himself, either in his petition and schedules, or any testimony he had already given before the referee."

Compare, obiter, quere, In re Hess, 14 A. B. R. 562, 563, 134 Fed. 109 (D. C. Wash.).

Quere, if witness volunteers testimony tending to incriminate him does he not waive the privilege on cross-examination as to same matters? U. S. v. Goldstein, 12 A. B. R. 760, 132 Fed. 789 (D. C. Va.); In re Walsh, 4 A. B. R. 693, 696, 104 Fed. 518 (D. C. S. Dak.).

Trustee Permitting Use of Documents or Testimony in State Prosecutions.—Although it is no part of the duty of the trustee, perhaps, to assist in the prosecution of a bankrupt in a State court for an offense connected with the assets or with the bankruptcy, yet it is not improper for him to do so and it may become, indeed, part of good citizenship for him to do so. In re Tracy & Co., 23 A. B. R. 438, 177 Fed. 532 (D. C. N. Y.). Also, see ante, § 915.

Showing Books to Bankrupt's Business Rival.—If the trustee proceeds to show the books to trade rivals of the bankrupts so as to prejudice them in reestablishing themselves in business, it would clearly be wanton and illegal misuse of power. Obiter, In re Tracy & Co., 23 A. B. R. 438, 177 Fed. 532 (D. C. N. Y.).

refuse to answer; and while there is some likeness between the two cases, the analogy is not perfect. It seems to me that the position of the bankrupt is rather more like that of a defendant in a criminal case, who has proposed to testify in his own behalf, and who before so doing concludes to claim his constitutional privilege."

§ 1562½. Conditional Waiver of Privilege.—It is possible that the witness may condition the production of the document or the giving of his testimony so as to limit its use, where the privilege otherwise would be absolute.

Obiter, In re Tracy & Co., 23 A. B. R. 438, 177 Fed. 532 (D. C. N. Y.): "The delivery might have been conditional, but it was not. * * * So long as the petitioner retained his constitutional privilege, he might decline to assist any prosecution against himself; or he might surrender to this court his books only on condition, but when he waives it, he must waive it for all those purposes for which courts exist, and I cannot limit them so as to exclude the proposed use here."

§ 1563. Pendency of Litigation with Witness, No Excuse for Refusing to Testify.—The fact that a controversy, or even a law suit, is already pending in the state court with the witness, involving the same matter, and that the examination will oblige him to uncover his defense, will not excuse the witness from testifying. That is precisely what the examination is for—to ascertain the real facts pertaining to the bankrupt's acts, conduct and property;⁹⁹ nor is it a sufficient excuse that his answers will give evidence which the trustee may use in a subsequent civil action against him.¹ Disclosure of the truth cannot constitute an injury in the eyes of the law, except where it might tend to incriminate.

§ 1564. Conversely, Pendency of Litigation Not Requisite.—Conversely, an examination of a third person may be demanded although no action is pending and no issue joined.²

[1867] In re Krueger, 2 Low. 182: "These examinations thus stand in effect on the footing of summary bills of discovery. The discovery cannot be limited by reference to an action pending, for there is no such limitation in the law, but it is to be confined to the subject matter, the trade, dealings and estate of the bankrupt."

§ 1564½. Right to Inspect Testimony Taken on General Examination.—The testimony taken on general examination is part of the record in the case and is open to the inspection of all persons entitled to inspect such records.³

Thus, a creditor who has not filed his claim is entitled to such inspection; ⁴ even though it will embarrass the trustee in bringing suit against such creditor later.⁵

§ 1565. Privileged Communications Respected.—Of course privileged communications are to be respected as much in bankruptcy as elsewhere. Thus, confidential communications between attorney and client are to be respected.

People's Bk. v. Brown, 7 A. B. R. 478, 112 Fed. 652 (C. C. A. N. J.): "This court has neither authority nor inclination to repudiate the rule which protects from exposure, unless with the client's consent, all communications between him and his counsel, made during the subsistence of that relation, in reference to any matter respecting which the latter has been, and properly could be, professionally consulted. This rule was applied, apparently for the first time, in the case of Berd v. Lovelace, Cary, '88, and for three centuries, at least, it has been steadily upheld by the courts upon the ground that for the proper administration of the law the confidence which it encourages the client to repose in the attorney to whom he resorts for legal advice and assistance should upon all occasions be inavoidable. But it has been forcibly and vehemently assailed."

Thus, by statute, in Michigan the taxpayer's return to the assessors is privileged and may not be used for discovery of assets.⁶

But witnesses claiming the communication to be privileged may be subjected to preliminary examination to enable the court to determine for itself whether the communication sought for be, in the circumstances, a privileged one.

People's Bk. v. Brown, 7 A. B. R. 475, 112 Fed. 652 (C. C. A. N. J.): "Therefore, it is requisite that in every instance it shall be judicially determined whether the particular communication in question be really privileged, and, in order that such primary determination may be advisedly made, 't is indispensable that the court shall be apprised, through preliminary inquiry, of the characterizing circumstances. There is no presumption of privilege, and though its allowance may, in a clear case, be founded upon the voluntary statement of the attorney that his knowledge of the fact to which he is asked to testify was acquired in professional confidence, yet wherever, as in this case, the circumstances suggest that the sufficiency of the grounds of that statement should be considered, it is the right of the opposing party to demand that the proponent of the privilege shall be submitted to such interrogation as may be necessary to test its validity."

And the privilege does not extend to information gained by the attorney from other sources than confidential communications by his client.⁷ And a communication to a wife to be privileged must be confidential.⁸

§ 1566. Bankrupt's Wife Examined Touching "Business Relations."—But the bankrupt's wife may be required to submit to examination, notwithstanding the general rule privileging transactions between husband and wife.⁹

This modification of the common law and statutory provision relative to privileged communications was a valuable amendment to the law, for before it was incorporated into the law it was possible to cover up the most frequently recurring kinds of fraud, namely, fraudulent transfers between husband and wife, both spouses hiding behind the privilege of the marital relation. To be sure, the amendment to § 21 (a) contains the proviso:

“Provided that the wife may be examined only touching business transacted by her or to which she is a party, and to determine the fact whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt.”

But this proviso, on analysis, will be seen not to interfere greatly with a full and free investigation into all the business dealings between husband and wife.

Nevertheless the scope of the examination of the bankrupt's wife since the Amendment of 1903, is still not unlimited.

In re Worrell, 10 A. B. R. 744, 125 Fed. 159 (D. C. Pa.): “But, even in such an inquiry, she cannot be examined generally, the proviso to the clause specially confines the examination to ‘business transacted by her, or to which she is a party, and to determine the fact whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt.’ Her own separate business is, of course, not the subject of inquiry at all, but it is at this point precisely that questions are most likely to arise. Is the particular business her own, or is it her husband's? Obviously, she cannot be allowed to determine that question for herself, and the result is, that a certain degree of latitude in her examination must of necessity be permitted, in order that the court may be sure that she has not been, and is not now, transacting business as a mere cover for the bankrupt, or in aid of a scheme to injure his creditors. If the course of inquiry should reveal matters that, in the end, turn out to concern herself alone, such a result is to be regretted; but this cannot always be obviated, and it is certainly better than to allow her to decide conclusively that the business is hers by making a bare assertion to that effect.”

§ 1567. Competency of Witnesses Governed by What Law.—The competency of witnesses in bankruptcy is, to be sure, governed by the Federal law, Rev. Stat., U. S., § 858, together with such modification as the Amendment of 1903, § 21 (a) introduces, by making a wife competent touching business transactions with her husband.¹⁰

9. Bankr. Act, § 21 (a), as amended. Compare, as to rule before the Amendment of 1903, In re Mayer, 3 A. B. R. 222, 96 Fed. 826 (D. C. Wis.); In re Cohn, 5 A. B. R. 16, 104 Fed. 328 (D. C. Mo.); In re Jefferson, 3 A. B. R. 173, 96 Fed. 826 (D. C. Wash.); In re Fowler, 1 A. B. R. 555, 93 Fed. 417 (D. C. Wis.).

10. Bankr. Act, § 21 (a): “A court of bankruptcy may, * * * require any designated person, including the bankrupt and his wife, to appear * * * to be examined concerning the acts, conduct or property of a bankrupt whose estate is in process of administration under this Act: Provided, That the wife may be examined only touching business transacted by her or to which she is a party, and to determine the fact whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt.”

Smith v. Township, 17 A. B. R. 748, 150 Fed. 257 (C. C. A. Mich.): "It was objected to the testimony of Chamberlain above recited that he was an incompetent witness in regard to the transactions between himself as agent of the bonding company and the bankrupt, because of a statute of Michigan excluding the testimony of one who has acted as an agent for one party to a transaction, where the other party has since deceased, relative to any matter equally within the knowledge of such other party. This objection is renewed here. But this proceeding was in a federal court, and as the statute of the United States relating to the competency of witnesses, as affected by their interests, covers the subject and is paramount, the State statute is not the test, as the District Judge rightly held."

But Revised Statutes of the United States, § 858, was amended by the Act of June 27, 1906, under which it has been held that the law of the state wherein the Federal court is held is to govern as to the competency of witnesses.¹¹ But, of course, this amendment of Revised Statutes, § 858, does not prevail over the specific provision of § 21a, of the Bankruptcy Act, making the wife a competent witness in bankruptcy proceedings. So, since the Amendment of June 27, 1906, to Revised Statutes, § 858, and the Amendment of 1903 to the Bankruptcy Act, § 21a, the complete statement of the competency of witnesses in the bankruptcy courts is as follows: The competency of witnesses to testify in bankruptcy is governed by the state law wherein the particular federal court is sitting, except that, regardless of state law, a party may not testify to transactions with a deceased person where the opposite party is the executor or administrator, and also except that the wife of the bankrupt may be examined, but be examined only, touching business transacted by her with or for the bankrupt or to which she is a party and to determine the fact whether she has transacted or been a party to any business of the bankrupt.

§ 1568. Contempt for "Willfully Evasive" or "Flagrantly False" Testimony.—The bankruptcy court has power to punish a witness for contempt for willfully evasive or flagrantly false testimony on general examination.¹² And such false swearing is punishable as a contempt although also punishable as a crime.¹³

In re Fellerman, 17 A. B. R. 785, 149 Fed. 244 (D. C. N. Y.): "Perjury in the presence of the court is a contempt as old as the courts themselves. It is 'undoubtedly a great contempt.' Stockham v. French, 1 Bing. 365."

§ 1568½. Attendance of Bankrupts or Witnesses Confined as Prisoners or in Institutions.—The attendance of bankrupts or witnesses confined as prisoners or in asylums may be procured by the writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum. This writ is not the high prerogative writ of habeas corpus, but is merely the ancient common-law precept, now authorized by statute, to bring a prisoner into court to testify; and it may be granted and issued by the court at chambers; but its issuance is a matter of discretion, even in cases where the prisoner is the bankrupt and his testimony is wanted at the first meeting of his creditors.

In re Thaw, 21 A. B. R. 561, 166 Fed. 71 (C. C. A. Pa., affirming S. C., 22 A. B. R. 687, 172 Fed. 288): "That the writ under consideration was rightfully allowed in the first instance need not be questioned, and we think is not questionable; but in our opinion it is likewise clear that the order under which it was issued was subject to revocation and the writ itself to annulment. * * * That writ was not the high prerogative writ of habeas corpus, the great object of which is deliverance from unlawful imprisonment, and which either a court, a justice, or a judge may grant and adjudicate, but was merely the ancient common-law precept to bring a prisoner into court to testify, and it was none the less the process of the court from which it issued because the order for its issuance emanated from a judge at chambers. It was granted and issued to bring a prisoner before the United States District Court at Pittsburg, in order that his testimony might there be taken, and it was directed to the custodian of his person, not that an 'inquiry into the cause of restraint of liberty' might be made, but with an object analogous to that sought to be attained by directing a subpœna duces tecum to the custodian of an evidential document, who, of course, upon cause shown, may subsequently be excused from producing it. 'If the desired witness is confined in jail [or in a State hospital for the criminal insane] a subpœna would be of no avail, since he could not obey it and his custodian would still lack authority to bring him. Accordingly a writ to the custodian is necessary, ordering the prisoner to be brought to give testimony. This writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum, grantable in discretion at common law, is now usually authorized by statute as a matter of course.' Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 4, § 2199. It is unnecessary, we think, to say anything further in support of our conclusion that the District Court, 'Judge James S. Young presiding,' did not overstep its lawful authority in quashing the writ in question, unless, as has been suggested, the scope of its general power in this respect was in some way curtailed by § 7 of the Bankruptcy Act. * * * That section, no doubt, makes it the duty of a bankrupt to attend the first meeting of creditors, and to do the several other things there enumerated; but it does not follow, as seems to be supposed, that a 'writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum * * * to produce the bankrupt for examination * * * is a right which his creditors have, and * * * which the bankrupt also has,' and that therefore it must be allowed, upheld, and enforced, regardless of circumstances and conditions. The rule of the common law has always been that this writ, which for centuries has been used to bring prisoners into court to testify, is 'grantable in discretion,' and we have not been convinced that by forced implication there should be attributed to Congress the unexpressed intent to abrogate that rule, and to take from the courts of bankruptcy their wholesome supervisory control of a process which manifestly is capable of misemployment, perversion and abuse. We accordingly hold that the question raised by the petition to quash was for determination in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion."

And it may be refused where the bankrupt may be examined at the place of his confinement.¹⁵

§ 1569. Attendance of Witnesses Residing Out of State or Farther than One Hundred Miles.—It has been held that a witness cannot be compelled to appear for examination before a referee at a place more than one hundred miles distant from his residence, even if it be within the state; and that if his testimony is sought, it can be required only under the rule of the succeeding sections;¹⁶ also that a witness may not be compelled in bankruptcy proceedings to appear for examination before a referee at a place outside the state of the witness' own residence.¹⁷ But these cases seem not only wrong on reason but also to be founded on a misconstruction of the proviso of § 41 of the Act. Indeed, it is necessary to change the word "and" to "or" in that section of the Act in order to arrive at the conclusion reached in the cases criticised. The proviso of § 41 manifestly refers merely to the established rule that a witness may be subpoenaed from without the state if within one hundred miles of his residence, Congress evidently merely seeking to make it clear that nothing in the Act should be held to authorize the calling of a witness from without the state, if resident at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of hearing.

§ 1570. General Examination of Non-Resident Bankrupt or Witness before Another Referee, or State Judge.—The bankrupt or any other witness may be ordered by ancillary proceedings to appear in another district before another referee or the judge of any state court to submit to examination there.¹⁸

And habeas corpus ad testificandum may be refused to bring the bankrupt from another State where he is being confined in an asylum for the criminal insane, if he can be examined at the place of his confinement.¹⁹

§ 1571. Order for Examination in Another District, Whether Ancillary Proceedings Requisite.—A serious question arises where it is desired to take the examination of the bankrupt or of a witness in another district. Before the case of Babbitt v. Dutcher [216 U. S. 102] upholding the ancillary jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts, it had been held by some of the courts which had denied such jurisdiction that the requisite "order" for the general examination, under Bankr. Act, § 21 (a), was to be issued in the original bankruptcy proceedings though served upon the witness in the other district for his appearance before a referee or state judge therein;²⁰ but it is exceedingly doubtful that the court has jurisdiction to issue an order for service out of its own district, even a mere order for examination,²¹ for the power of the bankruptcy courts is confined to their respective territorial limits,²² and there would be no power, furthermore, to punish for disobedience of such order²³ committed in such other district.²⁴ At any rate, such examination may be had in ancillary proceedings.²⁵

Obiter, In re Robinson, 24 A. B. R. 617, 179 Fed. 724 (D. C. Minn.): "It is thus seen that, if the petitioners have the right to an examination of McMasters under § 21a of the Bankruptcy Act, they can obtain it by application to the United States District Court for the Southern District of Illinois. Under these circumstances, I do not feel called upon to decide whether under that section this court has any authority to issue an order requiring McMasters to appear before the referee in bankruptcy at Rock Island, or whether it can authorize the referee himself to require such appearance. Even if this court did have that power, there are certain practical objections in the way of issuance of a subpoena, punishment for contempt, and other matters which might be referred to, that justify me in requiring the petitioners to proceed before the Illinois court. It seems to me, however, that the case does not fall under paragraph 'a,' § 21, but rather under paragraph 'b' of the same section, which is as follows: 'The right to take depositions in proceedings under this Act shall be determined and enjoyed according to the United States laws now in force, or such as may be hereafter enacted relating to the taking of depositions, except as herein provided.'"

Ancillary proceedings can only be instituted "in aid of" a receiver or trustee, and presumably must be instituted by him or in his name; so that the bankrupt or a creditor, as such, may not, in his own name, obtain such an examination in another district but may only do so when authorized by the bankruptcy court to use the receiver's or trustee's name, notwithstanding the unqualified words of § 21 (a) granting such examination on the application of "any officer, bankrupt or creditor * * *." On theory, however, it is to be remembered that the exercise of the drastic power of examination into the "acts, conduct and property of a bankrupt," peculiar to bankruptcy law, is justified only on the basis that it is requisite in order to aid the receiver or trustee in the administration of the estate; and that it is not to be considered to be given as an independent right to be exercised by creditors or by the bankrupt in their individual interests. It is furthermore to be presumed that the bankruptcy court would be prompt to permit a creditor or the bankrupt to use the receiver's or trustee's name for such examination, where satisfied that it might aid in the proper administration of the estate, whether the receiver or trustee thought differently or not.

§ 1572. Method Where before Judge of State Court or Another Referee.—But where the witness thus appears for examination at a place other than that where the proceedings themselves are pending, the referee, or judge, acting in the examination, perhaps should take down all the testimony, merely noting the objections and not ruling upon them, such examination to be thereupon filed with the referee in charge of the proceedings proper, who may himself then pass upon the admissibility of the testimony.²⁶

§ 1572½. Depositions.—The right to take depositions in proceedings in the bankruptcy courts is in general determined and exercised according to the rules of the federal courts.²⁷ However, notice of the taking of such deposition is to be filed with the referee in each case;²⁸ such rule being based probably on the double ground of enabling all parties interested to keep themselves informed, if they wish, as to the progress of the administration and also perhaps of supplying a sort of service of notice upon the whole body of creditors. When depositions are to be taken in opposition to the allowance of a claim, notice must be served upon the claimant, and when in opposition to a discharge notice also must be served upon the bankrupt.²⁹

29. Bankr. Act, § 21 (c): "* * * When depositions are to be taken in

Probably a general examination into the "acts, conduct and property" of the bankrupt can only be had upon order duly made in accordance with § 21 (a) and not by way of deposition under § 21 (b). But a deposition under § 21 (b) rather than an examination under § 21 (a) is the appropriate method in opposition to discharge, for, as we have seen [ante, § 1555], the general examination is not to be considered as a general deposition admissible in any and all controversies whatsoever that might arise in the course of the proceedings but is a mere general discovery, admissible in subsequent litigation only by stipulation of counsel or as an admission against interest in some controversy with the very witness himself as a party litigant.³⁰

§ 1573. Witness, as Such, Not Entitled to Attorney.—A witness is not entitled as such to have an attorney, and his attorney need not be allowed to participate in the proceedings.³¹

In re Abbey Press, 13 A. B. R. 11, 134 Fed. 51 (C. C. A. N. Y.): "Finally, it is contended that the petitioner was entitled to be represented by counsel. "No authority is cited in support of this proposition. Such a course would be contrary to the rulings in other courts, and, as we understand it, contrary to the practice and decisions in the bankruptcy courts. In any event, no such representation should be allowed except in the discretion of the court, that is, of the referee."

§ 1574. But Is Entitled if Witness Be Creditor or Bankrupt.—But if the witness is also a creditor who has proved his claim in the proceedings, or if he is the bankrupt himself,³² it would seem he may, as being a party to the proceedings, be entitled to an attorney and to have his attorney heard on the propriety of questions and to participate in the examination precisely as could any creditor who is not a witness. A contrary rule would allow creditors who were not witnesses to have attorneys participate in the examination, but would debar creditors who were witnesses from the exercise of the same right. So, also, by the same contrary rule, a bankrupt, who in fact is precisely as much of a party to the proceedings as any creditor, would not be entitled to have his attorney participate in the examination when the bankrupt himself was a witness, but would be entitled to participate in the proceedings when he was not a witness. The contrary rule thus would lead to absurdity.

So, while it still remains true that as a mere witness neither a bankrupt opposition to the allowance of a claim notice shall also be served upon the claimant, and when in opposition to a discharge notice shall also be served upon the bankrupt."

§ 1576. Contempt for Disobedience of Subpœna.—Witnesses may be punished for contempt for failure to respond to a subpœna to attend before a referee. But where the witness is required to attend more than one hundred miles from his residence, he should not be attached for contempt for failure to respond unless he has been tendered his fee and mileage.³⁷

§ 1577. No Witness Fees to Bankrupt, but Expenses, Where Examined Away from His Town.—A bankrupt is not entitled to any fees or compensation for attending the court for examination, except that "he shall be paid his actual expenses from the estate when examined or required to attend at any place other than the city, town or village of his residence;"³⁸ although this provision for reimbursement would not extend to his attendance upon the hearings upon his application for discharge.³⁹

§ 1579. Employment of Stenographer.—Upon the application of the trustee an order may be made by the referee authorizing him to employ a stenographer at the expense of the estate to take down the general examination of the bankrupt and witnesses and for other examinations, but the statute itself prescribes that the estate shall not be liable for the expense of such employment beyond the rate of ten cents per folio, that is to say, per 100 words, for both taking down and transcribing the testimony.⁴⁰

In re Ellett Elec. Co., 28 A. B. R. 453, 196 Fed. 400 (D. C. N. Y.): "As to the allowances. According to the certificate of the referee, the assets of the bankrupt estate realized $590.78, and he made allowances to the trustee, his attorney, to the attorney of the bankrupt, and to stenographers amounting to $323.94, leaving a balance of $164.84, taking into consideration the disapproval of the Ellett claim, for distribution among preferred creditors. In view of the services rendered, certain of the allowances are thought excessive.

"The record consists of 53 pages, of which only about 30 are testimony. The stenographers were allowed $62.12, which amount is inordinate. Where three duplicate copies are supplied, a charge of 40 cents per page has in other cases that have come before this court been held a fair and reasonable compensation. The assets of the estate were known to the trustee at the time the Ellett claim against the bankrupt was before the referee to be insufficient to pay in full the preferred claims; therefore, it would have been sufficient to have taken the substance of the evidence arising on the disputed claim, and a summary disposition would have been proper. If the claimant desired a fuller examination or more complete record, he himself should have borne the stenographer's expenses. By § 38, subd. 5, of the Bankruptcy Act, on the application of the trustee, a stenographer may be employed at the expense of the estate, but the compensation cannot exceed 10 cents per folio for reports and transcripts of the proceedings. In view of the fact that three duplicate copies were furnished, perhaps a reasonable additional compensation would not have been subject to criticism, though I think that additional copies should be paid for by the parties desiring them. The large outlay for stenographer's fees and charges before referees and special masters in bankruptcy is a serious barrier to an economical administration of estates in bankruptcy, and such expenses should be curtailed whenever possible. In the federal courts, where there is no official stenographer, the expense for taking shorthand notes of examination and transcribing the same is usually divided by the litigants and taxed to the extent of the amount paid in favor of the prevailing party. The record in this case does not show that the trustee authorized the employment of the stenographers or objected thereto. As much of the expenses was incurred in conducting the examination relating to the Ellett claim, the expense for stenographer's services should rightly fall on the defeated party, but, as no objection to the employment of a stenographer was made by the trustee, I will allow an expense not exceeding $21.20, or 40 cents per page for the three copies of testimony to be charged against the estate."

The statutory provision, of course, does not mean that the stenographer is compelled to work at such rate of compensation, but only that such part of the compensation as will be at the rate of ten cents per folio shall be charged against and paid for from the estate. Evasions of this provision of the law are not to be tolerated. Creditors may personally make up any deficiency if the stenographer is unwilling to take the compensation which may be charged against the estate. And if the testimony be not transcribed, the provisions of § 38 (5) would not forbid the allowance of a per diem to the stenographer, for taking down the testimony in shorthand.

However, the strict wording of the statute, § 38 (5), mentions only the trustee as the applicant for leave to employ a stenographer at the expense of the estate, and it has been held that the trustee must make the application.⁴¹ It has also been held that different rules are to prevail before the adjudication and reference to the referee.⁴²

Where there are no funds in the estate, if the bankrupt desires the testimony on general examination to be taken down in writing, he may be compelled to furnish indemnity therefor.⁴³

§ 1580. Jurisdiction and Conflict of Jurisdiction in Collecting and Protecting Assets.—In the orderly development of the treatise, the subject is now reached of the forum for the assertion of rights in collecting assets belonging to the estate and in defending possession of them when custody is once acquired. The sections of the Bankruptcy Act involved are §§ 2 (7), 23, 38, 60 (b), 67 (e) and 70 (e).¹

§ 1581. Courts Cautious in Dealing with Conflict of Jurisdiction.—Courts must be cautious in dealing with a conflict of jurisdiction.²

But at the proper time the federal courts may by force emphasize the supremacy of the constitution:

Hooks v. Aldridge, 16 A. B. R. 665, 145 Fed. 865 (C. C. A. Tex.): "While it is unquestionable that the federal courts are the final arbiters to settle questions arising under the bankruptcy laws, there are questions relating to comity and procedure, in the event of conflict of opinion between the State courts and the bankruptcy courts as to the possession of the bankrupt's assets, which remain unsettled by decision of the Supreme Court. Whether the bankruptcy courts should make such orders as will preserve the estate, and await the final result of the litigation in the State court, or should act on its own opinion of the want of jurisdiction of the State court, and enforce its order to secure the possession of the property, is one of the questions left unsettled, so far as we are advised, by a decision of the Supreme Court. At a proper time the federal courts, of course, may decree the enforcement of the supremacy of the Constitution and laws of the United States, for it is an "incontrovertible principle that the government of the United States may, by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it."

And the duty to be cautious rests also on State courts. It is reciprocal.³

§ 1582. If State Court First Obtains Possession, It Retains Jurisdiction, Except in Three Instances.—Where property afterwards claimed by the bankruptcy trustee is taken into the custody of the State court (or any other court than the bankruptcy court) before the bankruptcy petition was filed, the State court, or such other court continues to retain jurisdiction over the entire matter except in three instances, later to be explained, and the only thing for the trustee to do is to get himself admitted as a party into the case in the State court and to litigate his rights there. For the rule of law that the Court first obtaining jurisdiction over the "res" retains it to the end, prevails in bankruptcy as well as in every other jurisprudence.⁴

Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521: "The opinion seems to have been quite prevalent in many quarters at one time, the moment a man is declared a bankrupt the District Court, which has adjudged, draws to itself, by that act, not only all control of the bankrupt's property and credits, but that no one can litigate with the assignee or contest rights in another court, except in so far as the Circuit Court took concurrent jurisdiction, and all other courts can proceed no further in suits of which they had, at that time, full cognizance, and it was a prevalent practice to bring any person who contracted with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or of contracts into the bankrupt courts by the service of a rule to show cause, and to dispose of their rights in a summary way. This court has steadily set its face against this view. The debtor of a bankrupt, or the man who contests the right to real and personal property with him, loses none of these rights by the bankruptcy of his adversary. The same courts remain open to him in such contests, and the statute has not divested those courts of jurisdiction in such actions. If it has, for certain classes of actions, concurrent jurisdiction for the benefit of the assignee in the circuit and district courts of the United States, it is concurrent with and does not divest that of the State courts."

Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. (U. S.) 625: "These rules have their foundation, not merely in comity but on necessity. For if one court may enjoin, the other may retort by injunction; and thus the parties be without remedy; being liable to a process for contempt in one, if they dare proceed in the other. Neither can one take property from the custody of the other by replevin, or any other process, for this would produce a conflict extremely embarrassing to the administration of justice."

Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 173, 9 A. B. R. 36 (reversing In re Lesser, 5 A. B. R. and 3 A. B. R.): "The State court had jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter and possession of the property; and it is well settled that where property is in the actual possession of the court this draws to it the right to decide upon conflicting claims to its ultimate possession and control. * * * A judgment or decree in enforcement of an otherwise valid pre-existing lien is not the judgment denounced by the statute, which is plainly confined to judgments creating liens. If this were not so the date of the acquisition of a lien by attachment or creditor's bill would be entirely immaterial."

Pickens v. Dent, 5 A. B. R. 644 (C. C. A. W. Va., affirmed in 9 A. B. R. 47, 187 U. S. 177): "Briefly stated, the rule is this: Considering the peculiar character of our government, and keeping in view the forbearance which courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction exercise towards each other, it follows that the court which first obtains rightful jurisdiction over the subject matter of a controversy must by all other courts be permitted to proceed therein to final judgment. The Federal courts will not interfere with the administration of affairs lawfully in the custody and jurisdiction of a State court, nor will they permit the courts of the State to interfere concerning litigation rightfully submitted to the decision of the courts of the United States. does not in the least modify this rule, but with unusual carefulness guards it in all of its detail, provided the suit pending in the State court was instituted more than four months before the District Court of the United States had adjudicated the bankruptcy."

Impliedly, Carling v. Seymour Lumber Co., 8 A. B. R. 29, 113 Fed. 483 (C. C. A. Ga.): "A receiver or trustee, when appointed in the bankruptcy proceedings, while not entitled to the mortgaged property, will be entitled to any excess arising from the foreclosure sale, when made by order of the State court after the payment of the mortgages and costs of foreclosure. He will also be entitled, when appointed, to the possession of the choses in action and the other property in the hands of the State court's receiver which is not covered by the mortgages. The bankrupt law is equally binding on the State and the Federal court, and we cannot doubt that the former will, on proper application, give full effect to it. Where assets are in the hands of the receiver of one court which legally and equitably belong to the trustee or receiver appointed by another court, comity requires, as a general rule, that application should be made for a proper order to the former court, whose officer has possession of the property. This rule is reciprocal between the Federal and State courts, each respecting the possession of the other."

In re English, 11 A. B. R. 677, 127 Fed. 940 (C. C. A. N. Y., reversing 10 A. B. R. 133): "The situation, as we view it is this: Two parties claimed certain personal property as tenants in common, and sought the aid of the State court to determine their rights and to distribute the property or its proceeds. The state court, by its receiver, took possession of the corpus of the property, and converted it into money, which the receiver held to be distributed between the respective claimants when their rights should be determined. All this took place more than a year before petition in bankruptcy was filed. Indisputably, the state court had full jurisdiction of the parties, or the controversy, of the subject matter, and had reduced the property to its possession. We know of no provision of the Bankrupt Act, and our attention is called to no authority, which will sustain the proposition that, when a year afterwards one of the parties to the action is adjudicated a bankrupt, the state court is shorn of its jurisdiction to determine the controversy and must turn over the property to the bankruptcy court."

In re Seebold, 5 A. B. R. 364, 105 Fed. 910 (C. C. A. La.): "There is no provision in the present bankrupt law which authorizes or permits the courts of bankruptcy, by the use of either summary or plenary process, to stop the proceedings of the State court in a suit in which it had already, before the institution of the proceedings in bankruptcy, obtained possession of the subject matter and jurisdiction of the parties."

Compare, where the subject of the custody is real estate; Frazier v. Southern Loan & Trust Co., 3 A. B. R. 710, 99 Fed. 707 (C. C. A. N. Car.): "The District Court seems to have been of the opinion, and it is the contention of counsel for the respondent in this court, that the receiver must be in the actual possession of the property in order to place it in the custody of the court. This position is erroneous. 'A court of equity, by its order appointing a receiver, takes the subject matter of the litigation out of the control of the parties and into its own hands, and ultimately disposes of all questions, legal or equitable, growing out of the proceeding.' High, Rec., § 4. As stated by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia in Beverly v. Brooks, 4 Gratt. 187: 'A decree appointing receivers levies upon the property an equitable execution.' The possession of the receiver is that of the court, of which he is the ministerial officer. Thus it is that, inasmuch as the receiver is merely an officer of the court appointing him, property in his possession is said to be in the custody of the law. * * * And it is said to be immaterial in this respect that the receiver appointed declines to act, the property being, notwithstanding, in the custody of the law.' Beach, Rec., § 221. Nor is it necessary for a court of equity to take possession of the property in litigation, or to attempt to do so by the appointment of a receiver, where the object of the suit is to set aside a fraudulent conveyance and enforce judgment liens against the land of the debtor."

In re Price & Co., 1 A. B. R. 606, 92 Fed. 987 (D. C. N. Y.): "This court, however, can make no order requiring the receiver in a State court to transfer the assets in his custody to the trustee in bankruptcy. The receiver is an officer of the State Court, the court had full jurisdiction of the action to dissolve the partnership, and under its authority the receiver became vested with the title for the purpose of that action, which included a distribution of the property among creditors. The Bankruptcy Act does, indeed, vest in the trustee the title to all the bankruptcy's property and rights of action whether legal or equitable (30 Stat. 565, § 70) but this does not authorize an interference by one court with the property lawfully in possession of another court of competent jurisdiction."

Linstroth Wagon Co. v. Ballew, 18 A. B. R. 28, 149 Fed. 960 (C. C. A. Tex.): "The features of this case call to mind the opinion which seems to have been quite prevalent in many quarters at one time, while the Bankruptcy Act of 1867 was in force, that the moment a man is declared bankrupt, the District Court, which has so adjudged draws to itself, by that act, not only all control of the bankrupt's property and credits, but that no one can litigate with the trustee contested rights in any other court except in so far as the Circuit Courts had concurrent jurisdiction, and that other courts could proceed no further in suits of which they had, at that time, full cognizance; as the result of which opinion the practice became prevalent to bring any person who contested with the trustee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or contracts, into the Bankruptcy Court by service of the rule to show cause, and dispose of their rights in a summary way. Against this view of the matter and practice which for a time sweepingly prevailed, the Supreme Court steadily set its face. Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 525, 23 L. Ed. 403. On the going into effect of the present Act, some of the referees in bankruptcy and of the judges of those courts, unmindful of the teaching of the Supreme Court under the Act of 1867, or disregarding its lesson, began to follow the practice which had prevailed under that Act, against which the Supreme Court had steadily set its face. With the usual tendency toward the growing weight of precedents, that practice had extended and become widely prevalent before the case of Bardes v. Hawarden Bank, 178 U. S. 524, 4 Am. B. R. 163. * * * These amendments do not touch the case of the appellant. It does not claim the property here in controversy under any transfer from the bankrupt; it expressly disclaims being a creditor of the bankrupt at the time of the institution of this suit. The suit is not founded upon a claim from which a discharge in bankruptcy would be a release, and therefore is not subject to the provisions of § 11a. Before the filing of the involuntary petition, which imparted life to the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy as to Morgan and his estate, the appellant asserted its title to the specific personal property, clearly marked, branded, and distinctly pointed out, which it sought to recover against the bankrupt, then in possession of it, and obtained appropriate preliminary process for placing the property in safe custody pending the trial of appellant's title thereto. It did not seek to acquire or fix a lien by the levy of its writs of sequestration, or by the recovery of a judgment, but to establish its rights to the specific property and recover, lawfully, the possession of it. The appellant could not have sued in the Circuit Court, because the value of the property was less than $2,000; it could not sue in the United States District Court, because that court had no jurisdiction in civil cases, apart from its jurisdiction as a Court of Bankruptcy, and its jurisdiction as a Court of Bankruptcy had then not yet been vitalized by the filing of the involuntary petition. Therefore, it could invoke the jurisdiction of the proper State court only, which it did, and by its petition and the suing out of the writs for which it prayed, that court obtained jurisdiction of the cause and the jurisdiction was not lost, or in any way affected by the subsequent filing of the involuntary petition against Morgan, or by the subsequent adjudication that he was a bankrupt. The trustee might have obtained leave of the Court of Bankruptcy to appear and defend the suit, and have so appeared by leave of the State court; but he was not a necessary party, and whether he did so appear or not the suit could proceed to final judgment which would be binding on the trustee equally with any other party acquiring in interest pendente lite. Therefore, so far as the property itself or the admitted proceeds of that property are concerned, it is immaterial whether we consider that the trustee became or not, legally, a party to the litigation in the State court."

In re Tune, 8 A. B. R. 286, 115 Fed. 906 (D. C. Ala.): "When the only right of possession by the State court of attached property is based on an attachment lien, which is annulled by the adjudication in bankruptcy, the State court loses all jurisdiction of the rem, which is transferred into the exclusive jurisdiction of the court of bankruptcy. There is no longer any right of possession in the officer of the State court, who then holds as bailee for the person rightfully entitled to possession, and becomes a trespasser if he fails to deliver on proper demand.

"In cases of concurrent jurisdiction the court first obtaining possession of the property administers it, but where that court loses jurisdiction, and it is transferred by operation of valid laws to a court of the United States, which has exclusive jurisdiction of the subject matter, the question becomes one of the obedience to the paramount authority of the constitution, and comity can have no influence in determining the right."

In re Gerdes, 4 A. B. R. 346, 102 Fed. 318 (D. C. Ohio): "The State Court had jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties, and the control of the property for the purposes of sale, and it is clear under the authorities that it had power to proceed with the sale and the distribution of the proceeds thereof notwithstanding the commencement, pending the sale, of the proceedings in bankruptcy against Gerdes. Its jurisdiction was not ousted by the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and it has exclusive jurisdiction to determine and enforce the right of Pruden in the property or its proceeds."

Furth v. Stahl, 10 A. B. R. 442 (Sup. Ct. Penna.): "But independently of his acts or agreement the jurisdiction is clear. The court was distributing a fund in its own hands raised by it on its own process. Its authority to do so did not depend on any one's consent."

Inferentially, Turrentine v. Blackwood, 4 A. B. R. 339, 28 So. Rep. 95 (Ala.): "Conceding that the State and Federal Courts have concurrent jurisdiction in certain instances over the bankrupt's property, another principle is universally acknowledged, 'that when two courts have concurrent jurisdiction, that which first takes cognizance of the case, has the right to retain it, to the exclusion of the other; that if a trust estate is being administered by a court of competent jurisdiction, or when property is in gremio legis of a court of rightful jurisdiction, no other court can interfere and wrest from it the possession and jurisdiction first obtained.'" of the adjudication in bankruptcy, the foreclosure proceedings were pending in the State court, and the mortgaged property was in the hands of a receiver appointed by the State court awaiting a determination of such proceedings. The adjudication in bankruptcy and the appointment of a trustee did not have the effect to abate the suit thus pending, or take away the right of the State court to decree and enforce a specific lien upon the property. That the enactment of the general bankruptcy law so far supersedes and suspends the operation of State insolvency laws as that a receiver or assignee in insolvency proceedings instituted under State statutes may be properly required to surrender possession to a trustee in bankruptcy, may be conceded. And such are the cases cited by counsel for appellant. But such doctrine cannot be extended to an action for the enforcement of a specific lien. Jurisdiction of such actions in the State court is not sought to be taken away by the Federal statute, and such could not well be. The action is not one to administer upon the estate of the bankrupt, or any portion of such estate. The purpose thereof is to ascertain if the plaintiff have a right to resort, by virtue of a specific lien claim, to the particular property in controversy, as against all other creditors or claimants, for the payment of his debt or the satisfaction of his demand. His right would be the same whether presented to the State or the Federal court in an action to foreclose, or by way of a claim made in the bankruptcy proceedings. Hence it is that the court which first takes jurisdiction and assumes control of the property retains it for all the purposes of a final order or decree. True, the trustee in bankruptcy may intervene in such action pending in the State court, as did this intervener, and be heard to contest the existence or the validity of the specific lien claimed, and he may well be awarded the property in the event the existence of the lien claimed is denied by the decree. But that a trustee may work an ouster of jurisdiction in the State court in such cases by pointing out the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings has no support in reason or well-considered authority."

In re Greater Amer. Expo., 4 A. B. R. 486, 102 Fed. 986 (C. C. A. Tenn.): "We are of the opinion that the bankrupt court had no right to stay the suit to enforce the lien as against the res in the possession of a third party, to wit, the wrecking company, although the trustee of the bankrupt was incidentally interested in the amount of the lien which might be established, by virtue of the contract which the bankrupt had entered into with the vendee."

Taylor v. Taylor, 4 A. B. R. 217, 59 N. J. Eq. 84 (N. J. Ch.): "The policy of the Federal Supreme Court seems to have been to permit any such suit, which was pending in a State court at the time when bankruptcy proceedings were begun, to proceed to final settlement."

It has been held, but erroneously, that the bankruptcy court will have exclusive jurisdiction in any case where property has been sequestrated by a state court within the four months.⁵

5. In re Knight, 11 A. B. R. 1, 125 Fed. 35 (D. C. Ky.): But in this case the receivership operated to do more than simply to keep custody of property covered by the pre-existing valid lien and so the case was rightly decided though on grounds too broadly stated.

Possession under Writ of General Execution Different.—It has been held that the possession of a sheriff, marshal or constable under writ of general execution does not give jurisdiction to the court over the rem, at least not in the sense in which such officer holds possession where the sale is a judicial sale as distinguished, from an execution sale and such officer therefore may be required to surrender custody, even though the lien of the levy is not nullified by the bankruptcy, the lien following the property.

the lien of the levy, if it has been properly kept up, is not divested by the present proceedings, antedating as it does over four months, it is not necessary to its preservation or enforcement, that the goods should be actually disposed of by the sheriff on the vend. ex. The trustee took subject to the levy and the execution creditor will be entitled to be paid out of the proceeds realized from the goods without regard to who may happen to sell them. But bankruptcy having intervened, jurisdiction over the property of the bankrupt has been drawn to this court under the direction of which the estate is to be now administered, and to this forum parties, who have claims thereon by way of lien or otherwise, are remitted for the ascertainment and establishment of their rights. There is no valid reason why in disregard of this the trustee should be compelled to follow the fund arising from the goods, elsewhere, and it would reverse the natural order and complicate matters to require him to do so. The case of Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 165, 9 Am. B. R. 36, on which reliance is placed, was different. That was a creditor's bill by which not only did the complainant secure a specific lien, but the court in which it was filed obtained direct jurisdiction over the property against which the equity was asserted; and it was with reference to that situation that the bankruptcy proceedings were held to have no effect. But in the present instance the goods are not under the dominion of another court. They have simply been taken by the sheriff upon process as an officer of the law, the same as they might be by a constable on an execution from a magistrate or a bailiff under landlord's warrant on a claim for rent. Surely in the latter, the trustee should not be subjected to the uncertainties of a justice's court or the irresponsible action of a landlord, and if not why should he any more give way to an execution in the hands of the sheriff?

"The petition is therefore sustained and the writ of vend. ex. in the hands of the sheriff stayed."

In re Keet, 11 A. B. R. 117. A stay of execution does not interfere with the lien, as argued; it merely controls its enforcement, in the interest of general creditors where that is deemed advisable. Neither is there any difference in this respect between real and personal property."

Adverse Claimant Himself Becoming Bankrupt.—Where the adverse claimant himself becomes bankrupt the bankruptcy court, of course, obtains jurisdiction, In re Rosenberg, 8 A. B. R. 624, 116 Fed. 402 (D. C. Penn.).

particularly to the fourth headnote in the Knight case, especially pertinent here, which is as follows: 'In general, an adjudication of bankruptcy vests the bankruptcy court with exclusive jurisdiction to administer the property of the bankrupt, as against any State court which may have obtained possession of such property through proceedings instituted within four months prior to the adjudication, and it is immaterial that the proceedings in the State court were for the enforcement of liens not affected by the Bankruptcy Act.'

And in one case it was held that where, within the four months period, an action to enforce a lien was brought in a state court against a bankrupt, its entire property being involved in the litigation, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to stay further proceedings in the action, and, if necessary, to take charge of the property and to supersede the custody of the State court.

Coal Land Co. v. Ruffner, 21 A. B. R. 474, 165 Fed. 881 (C. C. A. W. Va.): "In the case here the whole proceeding in the State court was within four months of the time both of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy and of the adjudication, and the entire property of the bankrupt was involved in the litigation. The District Court, therefore, had the jurisdiction, and the right to assert it, to stay further action by the State court, and if necessary to secure a just and equitable distribution of the bankrupt's estate to take charge of the property to this end. The powers of the District Court in bankruptcy are ample to administer an estate with due regard to priorities or vested liens and to protect all interests in such estate, whether they be legal or equitable." This case further quoted at §§ 1603, 1902.

The rule, however, is stated in the case of Coal Land Co. v. Ruffner in broader terms than the facts necessitated, for the facts showed the case to be that of a lien created by legal proceedings within four months rather than that of legal proceedings within four months merely enforcing good and valid pre-existing liens.⁷

And it was held in one case that even where a foreclosure suit had been started before the bankruptcy, but within four months thereof, and the bankruptcy court afterwards obtained actual possession of the property involved, it had jurisdiction to marshal the liens, to determine all rights in the property, and to enjoin the further prosecution of the foreclosure suit, though there was no claim that the liens were preferential or otherwise invalid.⁸ In this case, however, the state court receiver had voluntarily surrendered possession to the trustee.

The rule is laid down in some cases even more strictly against the bankruptcy court than in the main proposition, to the following effect: Where property afterwards claimed by the trustee is taken into the custody of the state court even after the filing of the petition, but before adjudication and before any bankruptcy officer actually takes possession or any restraining order is applied for the state court continues to retain jurisdiction over the res except in the three instances named, and the only recourse of the trustee is to get admitted as a party into the case in the State Court, if permitted, and to litigate his rights there.

In re Wells, 8 A. B. R. 75, 114 Fed. 222 (D. C. Mo.): "All agree that the court, State or Federal, which first takes possession of the property, retains the possession and the jurisdiction. This is elementary, and cases need not be cited to emphasize the proposition. But the trustee, by counsel, argues that the 'possession' does not mean physical possession. This court, by any of its officers, never has had physical possession of the property. And the decision of this question requires a construction of the bankrupt statute of 1898. Counsel for the trustee insists that the mere filing of the petition in involuntary bankruptcy is notice to the world, and no other court must interfere with any property then in the possession of the bankrupt, and that any subsequent interference by a State court is avoided and nullified by the subsequent adjudication of bankruptcy of the debtor. I decline to so hold, and for reasons which seem to me conclusive. Conflicts between courts over the same property should at all times be avoided, if possible, because at times such conflicts are unseemly. The mistake is constantly being repeated, and sometimes by lawyers, by asserting that the United States courts are greater and more commanding than the State courts. I cannot agree to this. The State courts are courts of general jurisdiction, while a Federal court is one of limited jurisdiction. Of course when a Federal court once acquires jurisdiction, then such jurisdiction becomes complete. And it is true that on some questions the Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction—such as in admiralty and other cases. Under some of the old bankruptcy statutes such has been the case. But it is not so under the act of 1898."

And this rule, in still other cases, is held even to apply—at the discretion, however, of the bankruptcy court—where the suit is started in the state court after adjudication;⁹ and in still other cases is even held to apply where the trustee claims the liens involved are nullified by the peculiar provisions of the Bankruptcy Act itself against preferences, both where the cases are started before the bankruptcy.¹⁰

Savings Bk. v. Jewelry Co., 12 A. B. R. 781, 123 Iowa 432: "His rights would be the same whether presented to the State or Federal court in an action to foreclose, or by way of a claim made in the bankruptcy proceedings."

wherein the court held that where prior to the filing of a petition against an involuntary bankrupt a creditor had brought an attachment suit in a State court, to enforce an asserted right in rem, under the State law the bankruptcy court was without jurisdiction of the res. But in this case it does not appear whether the attachment suit was begun within the four months or not.

Act, he can make the requisite showing. If he does not dispute the validity of any lien asserted by the plaintiff, he can set up his title and rights as trustee, subject to the admitted lien, and the State court will protect his rights in the premises. If he wishes to contest the validity or extent of the adverse claim asserted by the plaintiff in the State court, he can do so by answer or cross bill. If, upon the hearing, the State court holds and adjudges the plaintiff's claim or lien to be invalid and void either at the common law or under the provisions of the Bankrupt Act, that court would, undoubtedly order the property to be delivered to the possession of the trustee. If the State court holds and adjudges the lien of the plaintiff to be valid, it would, upon the proper showing, also recognize the title and rights of the trustee, subject to the lien of the plaintiff, and would enforce the same according to the true intent and meaning of the Bankrupt Act. In some of the discussions had upon this general subject, it seems to be assumed that the State courts cannot aid in carrying out the general provisions of the Bankrupt Act, and that the trustee can only appeal to the courts of bankruptcy when seeking to secure a disposition of a bankrupt's estate under that act; but this is a mistaken view of the law. The State courts, in all proceedings pending before them, have the right to apply and enforce the provisions of the Bankrupt Act in the determination of the questions at issue before them, and can give full protection to the rights of the trustee. The Bankrupt Act is the law of the land, and the State courts have full right to enforce its mandate in all proceedings properly before them. Of course, it is not meant by this that a State court can adjudge a person to be bankrupt, or grant him a discharge, or control the distribution of the bankrupt's estate; but what is meant is that in all suits pending before them, wherein may be involved a contest between the trustee and a third party, which depends, in whole or in part, upon the provisions of the Bankrupt Act, the State courts must, of necessity have full right and jurisdiction to apply and enforce the provisions of the Bankrupt Act, not only in deciding the question of right at issue, but in securing to the parties the proper protection accorded to them under the act. Thus, in the proceedings pending in the State court, even though the court should adjudge the lien of the mortgage to be valid, it would undoubtedly recognize and properly protect the right of the trustee in the mortgaged property, and in ordering a sale of the property would have due regard to the rights and equities of the mortgagees and the trustee alike. Taking into consideration the entire provisions of the act, it clearly appears that it was the intent of Congress to utilize the State as well as the Federal courts in administering the law, at least in cases wherein an adversary claim may exist between the trustee and third parties."

And, in still other cases, the rule is broadly stated to be that neither plenary nor summary process from the courts of bankruptcy will lie to stay proceedings in a state court nor to order the surrender of property thereby, even though possession has been acquired by the state court within four months of the bankruptcy.¹¹

However, it has been held that where, during the pendency of an insolvency petition, a receiver is appointed, but, between the entry of the decree appointing him and the filing of his bond, an officer of the state court takes possession of the goods of the alleged bankrupt found on the premises of the bankrupt, under writ of replevin, such seizure is an unauthorized interference with the possession of the bankruptcy court.

In re Alton Mfg. Co., 19 A. B. R. 805, 158 Fed. 367 (D. C. R. I.): "The goods were seized while in the basement of the Alton Company's mill, and in the possession of said company or its assignees. The act of bankruptcy charged in the creditor's petition was the making of a general assignment for the benefit of creditors. The Supreme Court of Rhode Island has held that an action of replevin in that State is so far a proceeding in rem that, unless the res has actually been taken possession of by the officer, there is nothing before the State court, and the court is without jurisdiction to decide the question of title. Warren v. Leiter, 24 R. I. 36, 39, 52 Atl. 76. If jurisdiction was acquired by the State court, it was not earlier than the time of seizure, about 11 o'clock a. m. We need not consider, therefore, whether the writ was sued out before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, nor pass upon the petitioner's contention that the bankruptcy court acquired jurisdiction of the goods by the mere filing of an involuntary petition. See In re Weinger, Bergman & Co. (D. C.), 11 Am. B. R. 424, 126 Fed. 875. It is enough to inquire whether the bankruptcy court had possession at any time before the seizure in replevin. It is true that the receiver had not filed his bond, nor taken actual possession, but the terms of the decree appointing him were positive: 'It is ordered and decreed that Henry R. Segar of said Westerly be and he is hereby appointed receiver of the goods, chattels, property and effects of the Alton Manufacturing Company,' and, though he was required to give bond, his appointment dated from the entry of the decree, and preceded the seizure in replevin. The entry of this decree, in my opinion, conferred upon the bankruptcy court such jurisdiction of the goods of the bankrupt that a subsequent seizure under a writ of replevin from the State court was unauthorized, and an interference with the possession of the bankruptcy court. White v. Schloerb, 178 U. S. 542, 4 Am. B. R. 178. * * * It is true that in that case there had been an adjudication of bankruptcy, and the entrance to the bankrupt's store had been locked by order of the referee before the seizure. In the present case there had been no adjudication of bankruptcy, and no act of the receiver amounting to an actual taking of possession. For the preservation of the estate, however, a decree appointing a receiver had been entered; and, considering the nature of this decree, it seems to be unnecessary that it should have been followed by an actual seizure by the receiver in order to confer prior jurisdiction on the bankruptcy court. * * * This jurisdiction attached irrespective of the assignment made by the Alton Company for the benefit of creditors, for the rule is the same whether the goods are held by the bankrupt or for him. In Bryan v. Bernheimer, 181 U. S. 192, 193, 5 Am. B. R. 623, * * * it was said that an assignee under a general assignment for creditors is an agent of the bankrupt for the distribution of the proceeds of his property."

On the other hand, going to the opposite extreme, "a certain revisory power" over suits in the state courts was claimed for the bankruptcy courts in one case¹² even though the particular suit in question was merely one to foreclose a mechanic's lien and had been commenced more than four months before the filing of the bankruptcy petition, the cause of the advancing of this novel and somewhat indefinite doctrine being that "It was only by the grace of the State Supreme Court that the final judgment was delayed and a hearing of any kind given the trustee." It would seem to have been error, though, for the state court not to have granted a hearing to the trustee, who was the successor to the bankrupt, in behalf of creditors, of which error he might have taken advantage. Any such doctrine, however, of latent "revisory power," "certain" or uncertain, is unsound. The case (In re Dana, 21 A. B. R. 683, 167 Fed. 529) was one where the state court receiver had voluntarily surrendered possession of the assets to the bankruptcy court, which presents an entirely different proposition.

The true rule, however, is that stated at the beginning of this section.

§ 1583. Simply because Bankruptcy Court Preferable or Trustee Interested, Not Sufficient to Confer Jurisdiction.—Simply because the bankruptcy court can better settle and adjust the rights of the parties, is not sufficient to confer jurisdiction on it under the present law;¹³ nor because the trustee is interested.

In re Greater Amer. Exp., 4 A. B. R. 486, 102 Fed. 986 (C. C. A. Neb.): "The fact that a trustee in bankruptcy may be interested in the result of a litigation which is pending between third parties in a State court does not entitle him to have the proceedings in such action stayed, as between such third parties, and to have the controversy transferred for adjudication to the bankrupt court."

§ 1584. But State Courts May Be Permitted to Retain Jurisdiction Where Better Suited to Adjust Rights, Even Where Bankruptcy Court Might Have Jurisdiction.—But it is true the state courts may be permitted to retain jurisdiction in cases where the bankruptcy courts might assume jurisdiction, but do not do so because the rights of the parties can be better settled in the state courts.¹⁴ questions arising under the bankruptcy laws, there are questions relating to comity and procedure, in the event of conflict of opinion between the State courts and the bankruptcy courts as to the possession of the bankrupt's assets, which remain unsettled by decision of the Supreme Court. Whether the bankruptcy courts should make such orders as will preserve the estate, and await the final result of the litigation in the State court, or should act on its own opinion of the want of jurisdiction of the State court, and enforce its order to secure the possession of the property, is one of the questions left unsettled, so far as we are advised, by a decision of the Supreme Court."

In re United Wireless Tel. Co., 28 A. B. R. 394, 202 Fed. 896 (D. C. N. Y.): "Undoubtedly the very existence of any federal court does presuppose that State courts will not be free from local bias, but it is one thing to provide means to litigate for avoiding that bias, and another to intervene for that reason in the very operation of a court already begun. Even the latter power does exist (Re Hecox, C. C. A. 8th Cir., 21 A. B. R. 314, 164 Fed. 823; Hooks v. Aldridge, C. C. A. 5th Cir., 16 A. B. R. 658, 145 Fed. 865; New Coal and Land Co. v. Ruffner, C. C. A. 4th Cir., 21 A. B. R. 474, 165 Fed. 881) but its existence does not mean it ought always to be exercised, and in fact it ought to be very sparingly exercised, rather after the analogy of habeas corpus. Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 250.

"Indeed nothing more quickly makes contempt for law than to have judges each catching at jurisdiction, and nothing more quickly breeds confidence, than if judges really trust in each other. It shows rather a martial than a judicial vigor to assert such a jurisdiction, and unless it be unavoidable it ought not to be used. This is what the Supreme Court had in mind, I think, in Re Watts, 190 U. S. 1, 10 Am. B. R. 113, 23 Sup. Ct. 718, when it said, at page 35 of 190 U. S., at page 132 of 10 Am. B. R.: 'It remained for the State court to transfer the assets, settle the accounts of its receiver and close its connection with the matter. Errors, if any, committed in so doing could be rectified in due course and in the designated way.'

"Moreover, even if the State court does not so scrupulously regard the limitation of its own jurisdiction as the trustees think it should, they have their appeal, and if by evil chance, that does not serve them, still, since the question is of jurisdiction, the bankruptcy court has an inherent power to protect its own possession and its own suitors, should they be disturbed.

"The trustees complain of the expense of the defense, but I cannot avoid that, for it is an expense which arises from the financial entanglements of the bankrupt before bankruptcy. Besides, it ought not to be laborious or expensive to try the cause, in which they have no interest in the issues, but only in the form of the power to close up its own suit and enter a judgment. I could not, even if I would, enjoin such action, because it was possible that it might press its judgment further than it should. No case goes to that length."

The jurisdiction of the state court is not ousted merely because one of the defendants, in an action pending therein, has been adjudged bankrupt; and, in the absence of a restraining order, such action may be prosecuted to judgment.¹⁵

Indeed, an action brought by the trustee in the bankruptcy court to recover an alleged preference may be stayed for a reasonable time to await the decision of the state court in a suit therein pending, and in which the trustee has intervened, involving the same questions.¹⁶

In re Rudnick & Co., 20 A. B. R. 33, 160 Fed. 903 (C. C. A. N. Y., reversing 18 A. B. R. 750, 158 Fed. 223): "The plaintiffs, in replevin, on the contrary, allege that they were induced to sell the property to the bankrupt by false and fraudulent representations and that the title never passed to the bankrupt. * * * The argument of convenience and expediency is not properly before us, but it cannot be denied that a question which involves the title to property can, to say the least, be determined as well in a plenary suit, where witnesses are seen, examined and cross-examined, as in a summary proceeding based solely upon affidavits. There is no form of action known to the common law in which the rights of both parties can be safe-guarded so thoroughly as in an action of replevin. The jurisdiction of the District Court is purely statutory and unless the Bankruptcy Act permits the taking of property from a state official holding it under process duly issued, the right to do so cannot be maintained. It is contended that § 67f of the act, invalidating levies, judgments, attachments and liens obtained within four months against a person who is insolvent and providing that the property so affected shall pass to the trustee as part of the estate of the bankrupt, vests the necessary power in the District Court. We cannot accede to this view. It is manifest that the section in question deals with the property of the bankrupt. Assuming that Congress might lawfully pass a law requiring the property of third parties, found in the possession of the bankrupt, to be turned over to his trustee as part of his estate; it is sufficient for the purposes of this review that Congress has not done so in the present act. If A leaves his coat with B to be repaired and B refuses to return it, A can reclaim it in an action of replevin, and the status of that suit is not affected by the fact that B subsequently becomes a bankrupt. The mere assertion by B of ownership in the coat does not oust the court of jurisdiction and transfer the controversy to the bankrupt court. It presents a question of fact merely, to be tried in the court first obtaining possession of the property. The distinction between a requisition in replevin and a lien created by levy or attachment is that the former deals primarily with the property of the plaintiff in replevin and the latter with the property of the bankrupt. It is of no moment that the title is in dispute. Mo.): "The question therefore is, does the filing in this court of a petition in involuntary bankruptcy, of itself, and before any order is made by this court, give this court jurisdiction of all the property then in the possession of the bankrupt, whether by him owned or not? And if the bankrupt then has possession of the property, but not owned by him, or the question of ownership is disputed, must the claimant have the question of ownership adjudicated by this court, and to the exclusion of the State court, which has taken possession of the property for adjudication?"

"All agree that the court, State or Federal, which first takes possession of the property, retains the possession and the jurisdiction. This is elementary, and cases need not be cited to emphasize the proposition. But the trustee, by counsel, argues that the 'possession' does not mean physical possession. This court, by any of its officers, never has had physical possession of the property. And the decision of this question requires a construction of the bankrupt statute of 1898. Counsel for the trustee insists that the mere filing of the petition in involuntary bankruptcy is notice to the world, and no other court must interfere with any property then in the possession of the bankrupt, and that any subsequent interference by a State court is avoided and nullified by the subsequent adjudication of bankruptcy of the debtor. I decline to so hold, and for reasons which seem to me conclusive. Conflicts between courts over the same property should at all times be avoided, if possible, because at times such conflicts are unseemly. The mistake is constantly being repeated, and sometimes by lawyers, of asserting that the United States courts are greater and more commanding than the State courts. I cannot agree to this."

(William) Openhym & Sons v. Blake, 19 A. B. R. 639, 157 Fed. 536 (C. C. A. Me.): "Upon learning of the fraud practiced upon them, the appellants promptly rescinded the sale. The bankrupt's entire stock of goods was then in the possession of a receiver appointed by a State court. He was engaged in selling it. Certain creditors of the bankrupt had six days previously filed a petition in bankruptcy, but no injunction against the continued sales was obtained, no receiver in bankruptcy was appointed, and no adjudication was had until a month afterwards. The rescission was properly effected by the assertion of appellants' purpose, the demand of the State court receiver for possession, and the replevin action begun with the permission of the State court. The right of rescission was not affected by the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings."

Contra, In re Weinger, Bergman & Co., 11 A. B. R. 424, 126 Fed. 875 (D. C. N. Y.): "Moreover, in this case, in my opinion, no question can arise which is based on the theory that the State court first obtained jurisdiction. The petition in bankruptcy was filed in this court and notice of it was given to the marshal about the time that the marshal arrived at the bankrupt's store, and before the goods were actually seized and taken away. Under the present Bankrupt Act, as under the Act of 1867, the filing of a petition in bankruptcy is a caveat to all the world, and in effect an attachment and injunction (Mueller v. Nugent, 184 U. S. 1, 7 Am. B. R. 224); and I think that when a petition is filed before a State court acts, the State court cannot, by any subsequent action, claim to have first taken possession of the res. The fact that the bankruptcy court may not have yet made an adjudication, and that no receiver or trustee has yet been appointed, in my opinion, is immaterial. The bankrupts' property is within the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court as soon as the petition is filed, so far as to prevent a State court which subsequently seizes the property from being held to have first obtained exclusive jurisdiction."

Also, contra, In re Hymes Buggy & Implement Co., 12 A. B. R. 477, 130 Fed. 977 (D. C. Mo.): "True it is that the term 'all levies' would ordinarily in practice apply to a seizure under execution for the collection of money on a judgment. But looking at the connection and the whole statute, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that Congress employed the term 'all levies' in its most comprehensive sense, covering any and all seizures of property of the bankrupt within the four months period, under legal process, looking to the enforcement of claims against the bankrupt which would be released by his final discharge. Why nullify judgments, attachments, or other liens 'against a person who is insolvent, at any time within four months prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against him,' and yet leave the claimant free to seize the property of the insolvent under replevin process?" But this case was wrongly reasoned. The assertion of ownership is not the assertion of a lien on the bankrupt's property but a denial that the property is the bankrupt's property; and it does not come within the mischiefs against which the Bankrupt Act was directed. In this particular case it appears the replevin suit was simply a cover and not the assertion of a bona fide claim of ownership. It was really an attempt to make replevin take the place of attachment.

However, it has been held that if the seizure in replevin was made after the appointment of the receiver but before the filing of his bond, and was a seizure from the possession of the bankrupt, it would constitute an unwarranted interference with the custody of the bankruptcy court.²²

§ 1586. Foreclosure and Other Suits Not Themselves Creating Liens Nullified by Bankruptcy, but Simply Enforcing Liens, etc., Not Abated, Where Started before Bankruptcy.—A suit in equity, such as a foreclosure suit or other legal proceedings to enforce a lien which itself is not claimed to be in contravention of the peculiar provisions of the bankruptcy act nullifying liens obtained by legal proceedings, where such suit or other proceedings is instituted before the filing of the bankruptcy petition, is not abated and the state court retains jurisdiction. It is not to be transferred to the bankruptcy court simply because the bankruptcy of the mortgagor or debtor occurs within four months of the commencement of the foreclosure suit.²³

In re Kane, 18 A. B. R. 594, 152 Fed. 587 (D. C. N. Y.): "As to the second motion, in which a stay of the sale under the foreclosure is asked, a hasty examination seems to indicate, from the reasoning set forth in the case of Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 165, 9 Am. B. R. 36, that the judgment in foreclosure has not created the lien, and is not within the provisions of § 67f. The judgment is merely a decree by a court having competent jurisdiction directing the enforcement of a lien which cannot be affected or vacated by bankruptcy proceedings."

In re Rohrer, 24 A. B. R. 52, 177 Fed. 381 (C. C. A. Ohio): "The mortgage lien of Hofer was obtained long prior to a period of four months next preceding the date of filing of the petition in bankruptcy against Rohrer; and while the suit was commenced and the decree of foreclosure rendered within that period, neither the mortgage lien nor the judgment lien is denounced by any provision of the bankruptcy statute. * * * The State court acquired complete jurisdiction and control over the defendants and the property prior to the commencement of the bankruptcy proceeding against Rohrer, and that jurisdiction was not divested by anything done in that proceeding, the rule being applicable that the court which first obtains rightful jurisdiction over the subject-matter should not be interfered with."

But compare, that such suits are stayed ipso facto, Carpenter Bros. v. O'Connor, 1 A. B. R. 381, 16 C. C. Ohio 526: "It is not a case in which there is conflict of jurisdiction as between courts of co-ordinate powers where you are called upon to determine which shall have possession of the property. The Court in Bankruptcy has exclusive jurisdiction to take and administer the assets of the bankrupt, pay his debts in so far as the assets will pay them, and discharge him if he is entitled to a discharge from further payment.

"The State court cannot do this. It cannot determine, at the outset, whether or not the defendant is a bankrupt, nor can it discharge him from the further payment of his debts after his property has been exhausted. So that it is a mistaken idea to say that the State court and the Court in Bankruptcy are co-veny Laws (as was its manifest object), but also for merely foreclosing the mortgage. The court held that the mortgaged property should remain in the hands of the receiver and the trustee be required to intervene and to apply first to the State court. To same effect, analogously, In re Chapman, 3 A. B. R. 607, 99 Fed. 395 (D. C. Ga.).

Heller v. LeRoy, 12 A. B. R. 733, 179 N. Y. 369. This was an equitable action instituted to enforce a judgment lien acquired more than four months prior to bankruptcy wherein also fraudulent conveyances interfering with the lien were sought to be set aside. Also see ante, § 1444.

Contra, In re Sabine, 1 A. B. R. 315 (Ref. N. Y.).

Contra, In re Knight, 11 A. B. R. 1, 125 Fed. 35 (D. C. Ky.). But in this case the receivership operated more broadly than merely to take custody over the property under the mortgage sought to be foreclosed; it operated also to sequester other property for the benefit of the mortgagee, and to such extent was voidable under § 67 "f."

Contra, see note to Taylor v. Taylor, 4 A. B. R. 211 (N. J. Ch.). In re Holloway, 1 A. B. R. 659, 93 Fed. 638 (D. C. Ky.). But in this case the court seems to consider it a matter of discretion.

Compare, analogous propositions ante, §§ 1442, 1444.

Foreclosure Instituted before Four Months.—A fortiori, a foreclosure suit instituted before the four months period would not be superseded; Sample v. Beasley, 20 A. B. R. 164, 158 Fed. 666 (C. C. A. La.): Kneeland v. Pennell, 18 A. B. R. 538 (City Ct. of N. Y.), wherein the foreclosure of an attorney's lien on a judgment by him for the bankrupt was sustained; nor will the bankruptcy court restrain the foreclosure proceedings. In re Pennell, 18 A. B. R. 909, 159 Fed. 500 (D. C. N. Y.). Contra (claiming for the bankruptcy courts "a certain revisory power"), Hobbs v. Head & Dowd, 26 A. B. R. 63 (C. C. A. N. H.), discussed in the text of § 1582.

ordinate courts, each having jurisdiction over the subject matter. The State court has nothing to do with the proceedings in bankruptcy.

"The order of procedure in this case should be under the statute as follows: When the petition in bankruptcy was filed by the defendant, all proceedings in the State court should stop. In other words, in the language of the Bankrupt Act as contained in § 11, 'The proceedings shall be stayed.' This is mandatory. The State court has no right to proceed further in an action there pending until the petition in bankruptcy has been adjudicated. When that has been done, the case may be further stated in the State court at its discretion."

The same rule has been held in some cases even where the foreclosure suit is not instituted until after adjudication of the mortgagor as bankrupt; ²⁴ and even where not instituted until after discharge.²⁵

Foreclosure by sale, under power of sale, is equally protected with that by suit.²⁶

And the state court's jurisdiction will not be divested even though the lien or transfer therein involved (but not the lien of the suit itself) is claimed by the trustee to be in violation of the bankruptcy provisions relative to voidable preferences.²⁷

And if the suit is a foreclosure suit with incidental prayer appropriate to insolvency proceedings, the state court is not divested of jurisdiction, the prayer for general insolvency relief being disregarded.

Carling v. Scymour Lumber Co., 8 A. B. R. 30, 113 Fed. 483 (C. C. A. Ga.): "The Insolvent Traders' Act, before it was superseded, must have been put in operation at the suit of 'unsecured' creditors. Code Ga. 1895, § 2716; Cracker Co. v. Brooke, 91 Ga. 243, 18 S. E. 136. The appointment of a receiver is a jurisdiction often exercised by equity courts in foreclosure suits. The Insolvent Traders' Law provides for a proceeding against insolvents only, and the petition alleges that the defendant therein is insolvent; but that allegation is proper, if not necessary, to obtain a receiver in a foreclosure suit. So of all the averments as to the business embarrassments of the defendant in the petition. They are usual in bills seeking the appointment of a receiver. It is true that the petition contains other averments that are unnecessary and unusual in a foreclosure suit, such as demand and refusal to pay, that the petition is for the benefit of the petitioner and other creditors, etc. These and other averments show that the pleader had in view the Insolvent Traders' Law."

Obiter, Merry v. Jones, 11 A. B. R. 625 (Ga. Sup. Ct.): "Where the main purpose of the suit is to foreclose a mortgage, and there is also an incidental prayer for relief appropriate to insolvency proceedings, a receiver's possession thereunder will not be affected by a subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy."

But if the proceedings are in reality insolvency proceedings with merely incidental prayer for foreclosure, the jurisdiction is divested.

Merry v. Jones, 11 A. B. R. 625 (Sup. Ct. Ga.): "But where the main purpose of the petition is to obtain relief appropriate only in insolvency proceedings, the fact that a mortgage may be foreclosed as an incident therein will not save the case from the nullifying effect of bankruptcy on pending State insolvency proceedings."

And a suit in equity to enforce any other valid right than a lien will not be interfered with.²⁸

But where a foreclosure suit was started within four months before the bankruptcy but the receiver in the foreclosure suit voluntarily surrendered possession to the trustee in bankruptcy, the bankruptcy court had jurisdiction to marshal liens and to enjoin the further prosecution of the foreclosure suit, though it was not claimed that the liens involved were preferential or otherwise invalid.²⁹ It would seem, however, that jurisdiction was conferred on the bankruptcy court by the surrender of the property by the State court receiver, irrespective of the "four months" apparent qualification of the proposition, it being the actual possession of the res, not the "four months," that conferred the jurisdiction.

§ 1587. Custody of State Court Preserved in Part, and in Part Superseded.—If the suit is a foreclosure suit, or other suit in equity, not creating the lien, but simply enforcing it; but the receiver appointed therein does more than simply conserve the assets subject to the lien, and seizes other assets, although doing so by authority of the State law, the possession of the State Court will be protected as to the assets covered by the lien but will be superseded as to the remainder.³⁰

Carling v. Seymour Lumber Co., 8 A. B. R. 30, 113 Fed. 483 (C. C. A. Ga.): "A receiver or trustee, when appointed in the bankruptcy proceedings, while not entitled to the mortgaged property, will be entitled to any excess arising from the foreclosure sale, when made by order of the State court after the payment of the mortgages and costs of foreclosure. He will also be entitled, when appointed, to the possession of the choses in action and the other property in the hands of the State court's receiver which is not covered by the mortgages. The bankrupt law is equally binding on the State and the Federal court, and we cannot doubt that the former will, on proper application give full effect to it. Where assets are in the hands of the receiver of one court which legally and equitably belong to the trustee or receiver appointed by another court, comity requires, as a general rule, that application should be made for a proper order

If the lienholder proves his demand in the bankruptcy proceedings, it would perhaps amount to a waiver of his rights to insist on continuing the foreclosure suit in the State Court. Reed v. Equitable Trust Co., 8 A. B. R. 242, 115 Ga. 780.

But if no seizure nor sequestration of property in the suit in the State Court is made until after the bankruptcy court has assumed jurisdiction the property must be turned over to the bankruptcy court. Carpenter Bros. v. O'Connor, 1 A. B. R. 381 (Ohio C. C.). See post, § 1600.

to the former court, whose officer has possession of the property. This rule is reciprocal between the Federal and State courts, each respecting the possession of the other."

Likewise, if the attachment suit operates to do more than enforce a lien obtained before the four months' period, the state court's custody will be superseded as to the remainder.

§ 1588. Attachments Obtained Prior to Four Months, Not Abated.—Where an attachment lien is obtained more than four months prior to bankruptcy, the attaching creditor should be allowed to prosecute his action to judgment and sale, after the bankruptcy.³¹

Likewise, where a garnishment has been effected before the four months.³²

§ 1589. Landlord's Levy.—Seizure, under state statute, by levy of execution by a landlord, upon goods found on the premises, will not be sufficient ground for ordering surrender of the property levied on: the state court will not be superseded.³³

But of course such levy under process of distraint will not be permitted under process from the State court upon property in the custody of the trustee or receiver.³⁴

§ 1590. Partnership Dissolution Suits.—Suits for dissolution of partnership instituted more than four months before bankruptcy will not be disturbed;³⁵ even where the court decrees therein that a previous transfer by the firm of one-half of the firm assets to pay a debt, is valid and free from the claims of the remaining partnership creditors.³⁶

But the state court must not go further and attempt to distribute the surplus among the particular creditors interested in the suit, but must turn it over to the trustee in bankruptcy of the partnership, if the order of distribution is asked for later than four months before the bankruptcy.³⁷

And if they operate to create liens or priority claims different from those prescribed by the Bankruptcy Act itself, and such liens or priorities are created within the four months, then the jurisdiction of the State court may be divested.³⁸
